
Gabriel Vazquez of Belmonte.
Frontispiece portrait placed before the title page for this English edition.

COMMENTARIES AND DISPUTATIONS

on the First Part of St. Thomas - Volume Two

From Question 27 through 64, and from Question 106 through 114, by Father Gabriel Vazquez of Belmonte, Theologian of the Society of Jesus.

To the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord Don Andreas Pacieccus, Bishop of Segovia. With privilege.

*

Complutum (Alcala), from the press of Ioannes Gratianus, at the widow's house. 1598.

Translated by Stiven Peter.
English edition dated April 24, 2026.

CONTENTS

Quaestio XXVII- On the procession of the divine persons

- Articulus I- Whether there is procession in the divine things (Quaestio XXVII)
- Articulus II- Whether any procession in the divine things can be called generation (Quaestio XXVII)
- Articulus III - Whether there is in the divine things another procession besides the generation of the Word (Quaestio XXVII)
- Articulus IV- Whether the procession of love in the divine things is generation (Quaestio XXVII)
- Articulus V- Whether there are more processions in the divine than two (Quaestio XXVII)

Praefatio

Disputatio CVIII- Whether there are more persons in the Deity

- Caput I- Various heretics attack the Trinity of persons (Disputatio CVIII)
- Caput II- From the Old Testament and the testimony of the Rabbis, a plurality of persons in the divine nature is established (Disputatio CVIII)
- Caput III - The Trinity of Persons against the Jews is shown from the Tetragrammaton (Disputatio CVIII)
- Caput IV- The same is shown against the heretics from the Old and New Testaments (Disputatio CVIII)

Disputatio CIX- Whether the Word or the Son is of the same nature with the Father

- Caput I- Which heretics denied the divinity of the Son (Disputatio CIX)
- Caput II - The divinity and equality of the Son with the Father is proved against heretics from the Scriptures (Disputatio CIX)
- Caput III- The same truth proved from Scripture and the Fathers (Disputatio CIX)
- Caput IV- The arguments of the Arians (Disputatio CIX)
- Caput V- Why that word was rejected in those councils (Disputatio CIX)

Disputatio CX - Whether the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, is of the same substance as the others

- Caput I- Heretics deny the divinity of the Holy Spirit (Disputatio CX)

Caput II- The Catholic truth is proved (Disputatio CX)

Caput III- The arguments of the Macedonians are dissolved (Disputatio CX)

Disputatio CXI- Whether the divine processions are operations of intellect and will

Caput I- The opinion of Durandus (Disputatio CXI)

Caput II- The common scholastic sentence (Disputatio CXI)

Disputatio CXII- What sort of operations of intellect and will the processions are

Caput I- What Henry thinks (Disputatio CXII)

Caput II- The opinion of Scotus and of others (Disputatio CXII)

Caput III- The true opinion (Disputatio CXII)

Disputatio CXIII- Which procession in the divine things is generation

Caput I- The definition of generation (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput II - That the divine Word is truly begotten and Son, but the Holy Spirit is not begotten (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput III- Why the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation; the Fathers vary (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput IV - The reasons of Bonaventure, Durandus, Scotus, and Aegidius on the same question (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput V- The reasoning of Cajetan, Ferrara, and other Thomists (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput VI- Refutation of the preceding reasoning (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput VII - The truer reason why the procession of the Word is generation, but not the procession of the Holy Spirit (Disputatio CXIII)

Caput VIII- The arguments against this later position are resolved (Disputatio CXIII)

Quaestio XXVIII- On the divine relations, which is the second principal part of this matter

Articulus I- Whether in God there are any real relations (Quaestio XXVIII)

Articulus II- Whether the relations in God are real relations (Quaestio XXVIII)

Disputatio CXIV- On whether the divine relations are real according to being - toward

Caput I - The common Catholic judgment; and the opinion of Cajetan and the Canarian (Disputatio CXIV)

Caput II- The contrary view: that the mode "to" (ad) is itself real and intrinsic (Disputatio CXIV)

Disputatio CXV - On whether a relation of reason is formed only by the intellect or also by other powers

Caput I- What Scotus thought (Disputatio CXV)

Caput II - Whether a relation of reason is formed solely by the operation of the intellect, or also by that of other powers (Disputatio CXV)

Quaest. XXVIII

Disputatio CXVI - Whether the divine attributes are distinguished among themselves, and from the essence, by their own nature, or only by conceiving

Caput I- What is meant by the name "attribute" (Disputatio CXVI)

Caput III- The opinion of Scotus (Disputatio CXVI)

Caput IV- That the divine attributes are not distinguished among themselves, or from the essence, before the operation of the intellect, is shown by authority (Disputatio CXVI)

Caput V- Against Scotus by reason; and first with Bernard's argument against Gilbert (Disputatio CXVI)

Disputatio CXVII - Whether the intellect of the wayfarer can distinguish the divine attributes without an order to things really distinct

Caput II - That the attributes belong to God without respect to creatures really distinct, is proved against Durandus (Disputatio CXVII)

Caput III - That the attributes in God cannot be distinguished by us without respect to distinct creatures (Disputatio CXVII)

Disputatio CXVIII - Whether the intellect of God and of the blessed can in God Himself distinguish various attributes

Caput I- Opinion of Henry and of the Canarian (Disputatio CXVIII)

Caput II- That the attributes are not distinguished by the divine intellect, which opinion is also more probable as to the blessed (Disputatio CXVIII)

Caput III- That by the divine intellect, or by the blessed [intellect], the attributes cannot be distinguished by respect to creatures, or to the intellect of one on the way (Disputatio CXVIII)

Caput IV- Corollaries of the foregoing doctrine (Disputatio CXVIII)

Disputatio CXIX - Whether the divine attributes can be predicated mutually of themselves and of the essence

Caput I- The opinion of the Canarian (Disputatio CXIX)

Disputatio CXX - Whether the divine relations are distinguished from the essence in the nature of the thing

Caput I- The opinion of Gilbert (Disputatio CXX)

Caput II- What was done against Gilbert in the Council of Reims (Disputatio CXX)

Caput III- Whether what is the same differs from relation only by a difference in the nature of the thing, and whether in the persons there are three realities (Disputatio CXX)

Caput IV - That relation and essence differ in no way from the nature of the thing, but by our cogitation only (Disputatio CXX)

Caput V- Further rational confirmation; refutation of Scotus and Durandus (Disputatio CXX)

Disputatio CXXI- On whether the divine essence is formally included in the concept of relation

Caput I- The position of Henry of Ghent and of the Canarian, with their reasons (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput II- The truer opinion (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput III- The arguments of the prior opinion are dissolved (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput IV- That the concept of relation does not pertain to the concept of essence (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput V - That essence is more distinct from relation (and from the attributes) than relation from person (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput VI- The truer opinion (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput VII- Corollaries of the preceding doctrine (Disputatio CXXI)

Articulus III - Whether the relations that are in God are really distinguished from each other (Disputatio CXXI)

Caput I- The principle that the mystery of the Trinity is not contrary to reason, variously defended by the Scholastics (Articulus III)

Disputatio CXXIII - How the mystery of the Trinity does not conflict with the principle, "Things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves"

Caput I- That this principle is not against the mystery of the Trinity is variously defended by the Scholastics (Disputatio CXXIII)

Caput II - The true exposition of the aforesaid proposition is not opposed to the mystery of the Trinity (Disputatio CXXIII)

Caput III - That the syllogistic form, as assigned by the logicians, is no less legitimate in divine things than in human (Disputatio CXXIII)

Against the same mystery of the Trinity the difficulty of the syllogistic form also seems to fight in this manner, from the syllogistic form:

Articulus IV- Whether in God there are only four real relations, namely paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession (Disputatio CXXIII)

Quaestio XXIX- On the persons

Articulus I- Whether the following is a fitting definition of person, namely: "Person is an individual substance of a rational nature" (Quaestio XXIX)

Articulus II- Whether "person" is the same as hypostasis, subsistence, and essence (Quaestio XXIX)

Articulus III- Whether the name "Person" ought to be posited in the divine (Quaestio XXIX)

Disputatio CXXIV- On the difference between the Greek words Hypostasis and Ousia

Caput I- Where contention arose in the Church about the word Hypostasis (Disputatio CXXIV)

Caput II- On the antiquity of the word Hypostasis (Disputatio CXXIV)

Caput III - On those who thought hypostasis and ousia are the same, and on the Latin suspicion of the name (Disputatio CXXIV)

Caput IV - The true difference between hypostasis and ousia according to the Fathers (Disputatio CXXIV)

Caput V - On the ecclesiastical and scholastic use of the names "hypostasis," "substance," and "subsistence" (Disputatio CXXIV)

Disputatio CXXV

Caput I- What the Scholastics understand by "subsistence," and what the Fathers (Disputatio CXXV)

Caput II- What Caietan and others have held (Disputatio CXXV)

Caput III- That nothing in God common to the three persons has the notion of subsistence; only relative subsistences in God, none absolute (Disputatio CXXV)

Caput IV - How much we ought in this matter or in this name not to dissent from the Fathers (Disputatio CXXV)

Caput VI- Dissolution of the reasons for the first and second opinions (Disputatio CXXV)

Disputatio CXXVI- Whether there are three existences in God

Caput I - Some later writers affirm that there are three existences in God, and relative eternities (Disputatio CXXVI)

Caput II - That in God there is only one existence, and only one duration, is proved from authority (Disputatio CXXVI)

Caput III- The first reason for our opinion (Disputatio CXXVI)

Disputatio CXXVII

Caput I- Various Scholastic opinions (Disputatio CXXVII)

Caput II- The name Person signifies formally and directly substance; materially, however, but directly relation; essence, however, consequently (Disputatio CXXVII)

Quaestio XXX- On the plurality of persons

Articulus I- Whether there are several persons in the divine (Quaestio XXX)

Articulus II- Whether there are more than three persons in God (Quaestio XXX)

Articulus III- Whether numerical terms posit something in the Godhead (Quaestio XXX)

Articulus IV- Whether this name "person" can be common to the three persons (Quaestio XXX)

Disputatio CXXVIII- Whether the name "unity" signifies something positive, or only a negation

Disputatio CXXIX- Whether numerical names signify something positive in God

Caput I- The two Scholastic opinions (Disputatio CXXIX)

Caput II- The more probable opinion (Disputatio CXXIX)

Caput III- The reason of the second opinion is solved (Disputatio CXXIX)

Disputatio CXXX - Whether the name "Person" signifies a real notion common to the three divine persons

Caput I- Various opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CXXX)

Caput II- The more probable opinion: denominative commonness of "person" (Disputatio CXXX)

Caput III- The solution of the arguments of the third opinion (Disputatio CXXX)

Quaestio XXXI- On those things which pertain to unity or plurality in the divine

Articulus I- Whether there is truly a Trinity in the divine (Quaestio XXXI)

Articulus II- Whether the Son is other than the Father (Quaestio XXXI)

Articulus III - Whether the exclusive expression "alone" is to be added to an essential term in the divine (Quaestio XXXI)

Articulus IV- Whether an exclusive expression can be added to a personal term (Quaestio XXXI)

Disputatio CXXXI- On the varied use of names in the mystery of the Trinity

Caput I- On the names "the same" (idem), "other" (alius), and "another thing" (aliud), "one" (unus), and "one" (vnum) (Disputatio CXXXI)

Caput II- On the names of diversity, separation, and union (Disputatio CXXXI)

Caput III- On the names "triplex" and "multiplex" (Disputatio CXXXI)

Caput IV - On the words "only - begotten" (unicus), "singular" (singularis), and "alone" (solus) (Disputatio CXXXI)

Quaestio XXXII- On the notions of the divine persons

Articulus I - Whether the Trinity of the divine persons can be known by natural reason (Quaestio XXXII)

Articulus II- Whether notions are to be posited in the divine (Quaestio XXXII)

Articulus III- Whether there are only five notions in the divine (Quaestio XXXII)

Articulus IV - Whether it is permissible to hold a contrary opinion about something concerning the notions (Quaestio XXXII)

Disputatio CXXXII- Whether some Gentile philosophers had knowledge of this mystery

Caput I- Many philosophers knew the mystery of the Trinity (Disputatio CXXXII)

Caput II- Whence philosophers had a shadowed knowledge of the Trinity (Disputatio CXXXII)

Disputatio CXXXIII - Whether in this mortal life the Trinity can be evidently demonstrated without a special revelation of God

Caput I - That it cannot be demonstrated that there are more persons in God, against Raymund Lull (Disputatio CXXXIII)

Caput II - That it cannot be demonstrated that there are three persons in God, against the same (Disputatio CXXXIII)

Caput III - Raymond's further discourse; and what judgment is to be made concerning his doctrine (Disputatio CXXXIII)

Disputatio CXXXIV - Whether by divine revelation a quidditative knowledge of this mystery can be communicated to a wayfarer

Caput I- Status quaestionis. (Disputatio CXXXIV)

Caput II- What Scotus and the Nominales hold. (Disputatio CXXXIV)

Caput III- The true opinion of Durandus and Capreolus. (Disputatio CXXXIV)

Caput I- Distinction of the concrete and abstract in the divine (Articulus II)

Caput II- That in God names and concepts abstract and concrete must be handled otherwise than in other things, against Praepositivus and Gregory (Articulus II)

Caput III- What are to be predicated of the notions (Articulus II)

Disputatio CXXXVII- Whether, besides the five notions, a sixth can be constituted

Caput I- Scotus asserts a sixth notion in the Son, namely inspirability (Disputatio CXXXVII)

Caput II- The true opinion of many (Disputatio CXXXVII)

Caput III- The reasons of Durandus and of Canariensis on the same matter (Disputatio CXXXVII)

Caput IV- The reasoning of the more recent authors on the same matter (Disputatio CXXXVII)

Caput V - The true reason why innascibility is a peculiar notion, but not inspirability (Disputatio CXXXVII)

Disputatio CXXXVIII- Whether active spiration is really distinct from paternity and filiation

Caput I- That active spiration differs from paternity and filiation only by our reason, against Scotus and Durandus (Disputatio CXXXVIII)

Caput II- Why it is said that in God there are four real relations (Disputatio CXXXVIII)

Caput III - That by a distinction of reason alone spiration is not predicated of paternity or of filiation; or conversely (Disputatio CXXXVIII)

Quaestio XXXIII- On the persons in particular

Articulus I- Whether it belongs to the Father to be principle (Quaestio XXXIII)

Articulus II- Whether this name Father is a proper name of the divine person (Quaestio XXXIII)

Articulus III - Whether this name Father is said in the divine per prius, according as we take it personally (Quaestio XXXIII)

Articulus IV- Whether to be unbegotten is proper to the Father (Quaestio XXXIII)

Disputatio CXXXIX- On the names which in the Father can signify the notion of principle

Caput I- On the names "Principle" and "Beginning" (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Caput II - The Scriptural places by which some attempt to prove that the Father or the Son is called principle (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Caput III- In what way the Father is called the principle of the whole deity (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Caput IV - The name "Principle" is not said univocally of the essential and notional principle (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Caput V - The term "principle" is said analogically, not equivocally, of the two principles (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Caput VI- On the names Author and Cause (Disputatio CXXXIX)

Disputatio CXL- How the name "unbegotten" is the proper name of the person of the Father

Caput I- That the name "unbegotten" was once held suspect by some of the Fathers (Disputatio CXL)

Caput II- That deservedly thereafter the name "unbegotten" was received by the Fathers, that they might signify the Father's notion (Disputatio CXL)

Caput III- The name "Unbegotten" does not denote negation alone (Disputatio CXL)

Quaestio XXXIV- On the person of the Son

Articulus I- Whether the Word in God is a personal name (Quaestio XXXIV)

Caput I- On ancient and recent heretics, and that, the mystery of the Trinity admitted, the Son is properly called the Word (Articulus I)

Caput II- Various opinions of the Schoolmen (Articulus I)

Caput III- That both the act of saying and the Word in the divine are taken only notionally; the truer sentence (Articulus I)

Caput IV- The arguments of Durandus are solved (Articulus I)

Articulus II- Whether "Word" is the proper name of the Son (Quaestio XXXIV)

Articulus III- Whether by the name "Word" there is imported a respect to creatures (Quaestio XXXIV)

Disputatio CXLI- On the word of the mind and the divine Word

Disputatio CXLII- Whether the Word proceeds from all things that are in God formally

Caput I- Status of the controversy (Disputatio CXLII)

Caput II- Various opinions of the scholastics (Disputatio CXLII)

Caput III- The truer view: that the Word is produced through the knowledge of the essence, the attributes, and, together, of the Father and the Son (Disputatio CXLII)

Caput IV- The Word is not produced by cognition of the Holy Spirit as a per se motive object (Disputatio CXLII)

Disputatio CXLIII- Whether the Word proceeds by the cognition of creatures

Caput I- Two theological opinions (Disputatio CXLIII)

Caput II- Scotus's position is set forth (Disputatio CXLIII)

Caput III- Scotus's position, as truer, is proved by authority (Disputatio CXLIII)

Caput IV- The a priori proof (Disputatio CXLIII)

Caput V- The a posteriori proof (Disputatio CXLIII)

Disputatio CXLIV- In what way the name "Word" denotes a respect

Caput I- The name "Word" in God primarily signifies the relation of what is produced; it connotes essence secondarily (Disputatio CXLIV)

Caput II- On the respect which the divine Word has to creatures, and by what account (Disputatio CXLIV)

Quaestio XXXV- On the Image

Articulus I- Whether image is predicated personally in the divine (Quaestio XXXV)

Articulus II- Whether the name "image" is proper to the Son (Quaestio XXXV)

Caput II - That the notion of image properly belongs to the Son alone is proved by authority (Articulus II)

Caput III- That there is in God the notion of image properly so called is proved by reason (Articulus II)

Caput IV - That the notion of image in God belongs to the Son alone is proved in various ways by the Doctors (Articulus II)

Caput V- The nature of image is clarified (Articulus II)

Quaestio XXXVI- On the things that pertain to the person of the Holy Spirit

Articulus I- Whether this name, Holy Spirit, is a proper name of some divine person (Quaestio XXXVI)

Articulus II- Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son (Quaestio XXXVI)

Replies to objections

Articulus III- Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son (Quaestio XXXVI)

Articulus IV- Whether the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit (Quaestio XXXVI)

Disputatio CXLVI- Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son

Caput I- The Greeks' published heresy; which has endured down to our times, is that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput II- This error is refuted from Scripture (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput III - That the Church has defined the procession of the Spirit from the Son, and on the addition "and the Son" in the symbol (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput IV - Where first this truth was delivered by the Church in the symbol by the addition "and the Son" (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput V- Greek Fathers on the procession of the Spirit from the Son (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput VI - On Greek Fathers who said "from the Father through the Son," and that "through" signifies causality (Disputatio CXLVI)

Caput VII- The Greeks object certain Eastern Fathers (Disputatio CXLVI)

An if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, would He be distinguished from Him?

Disputatio CXLVII

Caput I- Status quaestionis (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput II- The view of Henry, Scotus, and others (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput III- On the sentence of Henry and Scotus and whether it is safe in the faith (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput V - By what arguments this opinion is proved by Durandus, Cajetan, and others (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput VI- By two very strong reasons the aforesaid opinion is confirmed (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput VII - The reasons of the earlier opinion are resolved; the testimony of Anselm is explained (Disputatio CXLVII)

Caput VIII- Corollaries of the preceding doctrine (Disputatio CXLVII)

Disputatio CXLVIII- Whence a real distinction of the divine emanations arises

Caput I- Various Scholastic opinions (Disputatio CXLVIII)

Caput II- The truer opinion: these two emanations are really distinguished only by the opposition which they have by reason of the adjunct (Disputatio CXLVIII)

Disputatio CXLIX- Whether the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit

Caput I- Status quaestionis (Disputatio CXLIX)

Caput II - Durandus and Gregory hold that the Father and the Son cannot be called one principle of the Holy Spirit (Disputatio CXLIX)

Caput III - The sentence of Durandus and Gregory is rightly censured as rash by the Canariensis and more recent theologians (Disputatio CXLIX)

Quaestio XXXVII- On the name of the Holy Spirit, which is Love

Articulus I- Whether "Love" is the proper name of the Holy Spirit (Quaestio XXXVII)

Articulus II- Whether the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit (Quaestio XXXVII)

Caput I- Various Scholastic opinions (Quaestio XXXVII)

Caput II - The proper mode of speaking: that the Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit (Articulus II)

Caput III- The true rationale of the foregoing sentence (Articulus II)

Caput IV- Some objections are solved (Articulus II)

Caput V- In what sense it can be said that the Holy Spirit loves himself with himself (Articulus II)

Caput VI - Whether it is rightly said that the Father is wise, or is wise with begotten wisdom (Articulus II)

Caput VII - In what way it cannot be said that the Son is wise by begotten or by unbegotten wisdom (Articulus II)

Disputatio CLII- Whether the Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit

Caput I- The earlier opinion of the Schoolmen (Disputatio CLII)

Caput II - That the Father and the Son are truly said to love creatures with the Holy Spirit; the more probable opinion (Disputatio CLII)

Quaestio XXXVIII- On the name of the Holy Spirit, that it is gift

Articulus I- Whether "gift" is a personal name (Quaestio XXXVIII)

Articulus II- Whether "gift" is the proper name of the Holy Spirit (Quaestio XXXVIII)

Disputatio CLIII- On whether the notion of gift is the property of the Holy Spirit alone

Caput I- Various opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CLIII)

Caput II - That what is by nature a gift is the property of the Holy Spirit; the truer opinion (Disputatio CLIII)

Disputatio CLIV - Whether the ratio of "gift" belongs to the Holy Spirit according to the essence, or according to the personal property

Caput I- What Scotus and Cajetan hold (Disputatio CLIV)

Caput II - The truer opinion: that by His personal property the Holy Spirit is not only Spirit but also gift (Disputatio CLIV)

Caput III- Corollaries of the preceding doctrine (Disputatio CLIV)

Quaestio XXXIX- On the persons as referred to the essence

Articulus I- Whether in God the essence is the same as the person (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus II- Whether it should be said that three persons are of one essence (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus III - Whether essential names are predicated singularly of the three persons (Quaestio XXXIX)

Notationes circa Articulum

Articulus IV- Whether the essential names in the concrete can stand for the person. (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus V - Whether essential names signified in the abstract can suppose for the person (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus VI- Whether the persons can be predicated of essential names (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus VII- Whether the essential names ought to be appropriated to the persons (Quaestio XXXIX)

Articulus VIII - Whether the essential attributes have been suitably assigned to the persons by the holy Doctors (Quaestio XXXIX)

Disputatio CLV- Whether concrete names are predicated in the singular and in the plural according to the singularity and plurality of forms

Caput I- The opinions of Richard and Durandus (Disputatio CLV)

Caput II- What Marsilius and Gabriel think (Disputatio CLV)

Caput III- The opinion of Cajetan and of other Thomists (Disputatio CLV)

Caput IV- On the rule for concrete substantive names (Disputatio CLV)

Caput V- Corollaries of the preceding opinion (Disputatio CLV)

Caput VI- Arguments against the foregoing opinion (Disputatio CLV)

Caput VIII- The second rule, about adjectives (Disputatio CLV)

Caput I- Two scholastic opinions. (Articulus IV)

Caput II- On the individual concrete of the deity prior to the persons (Articulus IV)

Caput III- The arguments for the first opinion are solved (Articulus IV)

Caput IV- On the sense of the proposition "This God is this God" (Articulus IV)

on the contrary:

Disputatio CLVII - Which of the propositions "God generates" and "God does not generate" is true

Caput I- Why the ancients said the affirmative proposition is true (Disputatio CLVII)

Caput II- The opinion of Durandus and the Nominalists that the negative is true (Disputatio CLVII)

Caput III - On the contradictory status of "God generates" and "God does not generate" (Disputatio CLVII)

Caput IV - The logical supposition of the name "God" in "God generates" and "God does not generate" (Disputatio CLVII)

Caput VI- On how the name "God" supposes with and without notional terms (Disputatio CLVII)

Caput VII - What is to be thought concerning the proposition, "God begot another God" (Disputatio CLVII)

Quaestio XL- On the persons in comparison to relations or properties

Articulus I- Whether relation is the same as person (Quaestio XL)

Articulus II- Whether the persons are distinguished by relations (Quaestio XL)

Articulus III- Whether, the relations or properties being abstracted by the intellect from the persons, the hypostases still remain (Quaestio XL)

Articulus IV- Whether the notional acts are understood prior to the properties (Quaestio XL)

Disputatio CLVIII - Whether the divine person is constituted and distinguished by relations, or by absolute properties

Caput I- That in the persons there are not properties by which they are distinguished and constituted; taught by Praepositinus and Gregory (Disputatio CLVIII)

Caput II- The foregoing opinion is refuted (Disputatio CLVIII)

Caput III- On the opinion that the divine persons are constituted and distinguished by absolute properties (Ioannes de Ripis and Scotus) (Disputatio CLVIII)

Caput V - That the divine persons are constituted and distinguished by relations alone: the truer view (Disputatio CLVIII)

Caput VII- Arguments of Scotus from the ratio of the constituting principle (Disputatio CLVIII)

Disputatio CLIX- How relation constitutes the divine person

Caput I- Statement of the difficulty in the present controversy (Disputatio CLIX)

Caput II- Opinion of Cajetan and of the Canariensis (Disputatio CLIX)

Caput III- What Capreolus and Ferrariensis have thought (Disputatio CLIX)

Caput IV- The opinion of Durandus and Gabriel (Disputatio CLIX)

Caput V- The truer account is set forth (Disputatio CLIX)

Caput VI- The arguments of Scotus adduced in the first chapter are satisfied (Disputatio CLIX)

Quaestio XLI- On the persons in comparison to the notional acts

Articulus I- Whether the notional acts are to be attributed to the persons (Quaestio XLI)

Articulus II- Whether the notional acts are voluntary (Quaestio XLI)

Articulus III- Whether the notional acts are from something (Quaestio XLI)

Articulus IV- Whether in God there is potency with respect to notional acts (Quaestio XLI)

Articulus V- Whether the power of begetting signifies relation, and not essence (Quaestio XLI)

Articulus VI- Whether a notional act can terminate in several persons (Quaestio XLI)

Disputatio CLX- Whether the act of will precedes, accompanies, or follows the notional acts

Caput II- What Scotus and Cajetan thought (Disputatio CLX)

Caput III- That whatever act of God's will concerns the notional acts is in no way prior to them, but posterior to them, is the truer view (Disputatio CLX)

Caput IV- How the Fathers spoke on this matter (Disputatio CLX)

Disputatio CLXI- Whether the Holy Spirit is produced necessarily, or freely

Caput I - Henry's opinion: the Holy Spirit proceeds in one way freely, and in another naturally (Disputatio CLXI)

Caput II- On whether the procession of the Holy Spirit is necessary, natural, and free (Disputatio CLXI)

Caput III - The common sentence: the Holy Spirit's spiration is necessary, natural, and not free (Disputatio CLXI)

Caput IV- The arguments of Scotus are dissolved (Disputatio CLXI)

Disputatio CLXII - What the particle "of" (de) signifies, when it is said that the Son is "of" the substance of the Father

Caput I- That the particle "of" does not signify a material principle, against Henry and Durandus, is proved (Disputatio CLXII)

Caput II - The particle "of" in the aforesaid locution signifies a consubstantial principle (Disputatio CLXII)

Caput III - The formal terminus of procession is the divine essence; but the whole terminus is the person (Disputatio CLXII)

Disputatio CLXIII - On whether in God there is a real productive potency with respect to the notional acts

Caput II- In God there is a true real productive potency, not only with respect to the person produced, but also with respect to the notional act; this is the more probable view. (Disputatio CLXIII)

Disputatio CLXIV- What the producing power is formally within God

Caput I- The opinion of St. Bonaventure (Disputatio CLXIV)

Caput II- Five other opinions of the Scholastics are set forth (Disputatio CLXIV)

Caput III - That the potency which produces a divine person is the divine essence connoting a property is the truer opinion (Disputatio CLXIV)

Caput IV- That the power of generating or of spiring is not in all the persons (Disputatio CLXIV)

Disputatio CLXVI - On whether omnipotence is equally in the three divine persons and whether it includes the potencies of generation and spiration

Caput I- Various opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CLXVI)

Caput II- The true opinion (Disputatio CLXVI)

Quaestio XLII- On the equality and likeness of the divine persons among themselves

Articulus I- Whether equality has a place in the divine (Quaestio XLII)

Caput I- Scotus holds that these relations are real (Articulus I)

Caput II - These relations are only of reason; the more probable opinion, proved in various ways (Articulus I)

Articulus II - Whether a person proceeding is coeternal with His principle, as the Son with the Father (Quaestio XLII)

Articulus III- Whether in the divine persons there is an order of nature (Quaestio XLII)

Articulus IV- Whether the Son is equal to the Father according to magnitude (Quaestio XLII)

Articulus V- Whether the Son is in the Father, and conversely (Quaestio XLII)

Articulus VI- Whether the Son is equal to the Father according to power (Quaestio XLII)

Disputatio CLXVII - Whether among the divine persons there is an order of prior and posterior according to reality

Caput I- What the Scholastics hold (Disputatio CLXVII)

Caput II- Whether among the divine persons there is not only order, but that one is prior in reality according to origin (Disputatio CLXVII)

Disputatio CLXVIII - Whether opposed origins, distinct according to reality, have among themselves an order of prior and posterior

Caput I- The opinions of St. Bonaventure and Durandus (Disputatio CLXVIII)

Caput II- The author's thesis (Disputatio CLXVIII)

Disputatio CLXIX- By what ratio one person is said to be in another

Caput I- The sense of the doubt; Henricus; the first opinion (Disputatio CLXIX)

Quaestio XLIII- On the Mission of the divine persons

Articulus I- Whether it befits any divine person to be sent (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus II- Whether mission (missio) is eternal, or only temporal (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus III- Whether the invisible mission of a divine person is only according to the gift of sanctifying grace (gratia gratum faciens) (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus IV- Whether it befits the Father to be sent (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus V- Whether it befits the Son to be sent invisibly (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus VI - Whether the invisible mission is made to all who are participants in grace (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus VII- Whether it belongs to the Holy Spirit to be sent visibly (Quaestio XLIII)

Articulus VIII - Whether any divine person is sent except by that from whom he proceeds eternally (Quaestio XLIII)

Disputatio CLXX- Various opinions of the Scholastics

Caput I- Various opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CLXX)

Caput II - That mission is only the eternal procession connoting a temporal effect; this is the truer opinion (Disputatio CLXX)

Caput III- Corollaries of the preceding opinion (Disputatio CLXX)

Quaestio XLIV- On the procession of creatures from God, and on the first cause of all beings

Articulus I- Whether it is necessary that every being be created by God (Quaestio XLIV)

Articulus II- Whether prime matter is created by God (Quaestio XLIV)

Articulus III- Whether God is the exemplar cause (Quaestio XLIV)

Articulus IV- That God is the final cause of all things (Quaestio XLIV)

Disputatio CLXXI- Whether one God is the author of all things

Caput I- Various errors of the heretics (Disputatio CLXXI)

Caput II- Catholic doctrine is established against the heretics (Disputatio CLXXI)

Quaestio XLV- On the mode of the emanation of things from the first principle

Articulus I- Whether to create is to make something from nothing (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus II- Whether God can create something (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus III- Whether creation is something in the creature (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus IV- Whether to be created is proper to composites and subsistents (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus V- Whether it belongs to God alone to create (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus VI- Whether to create is proper to some person (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus VII- Whether in creatures it is necessary to find a vestige of the Trinity (Quaestio XLV)

Articulus VIII- Whether creation is admitted in the works of nature and of art (Quaestio XLV)

Disputatio CLXXII- Whether creation is a production from nothing

Caput I- The opinion of Wyclif (Disputatio CLXXII)

Caput II- The foregoing opinion is refuted (Disputatio CLXXII)

Caput III- Exposition of the definition of creation (Disputatio CLXXII)

Disputatio CLXXIII- Whether creation is a pure relation, or something absolute

Caput I- The recent opinion: creation as a real and absolute influx (Disputatio CLXXIII)

Caput II - The true and common opinion: creation is only the creature's relation to the creator (Disputatio CLXXIII)

Caput III - More probable: the relation of creation is not really distinct from the substance of the creature (Disputatio CLXXIII)

Caput IV- The arguments of the prior opinion are resolved (Disputatio CLXXIII)

Disputatio CLXXIV - On whether grace and the supernatural gifts are created or co - created in us

Caput I - Many Scholastics judged that grace and the supernatural gifts in us are created (Disputatio CLXXIV)

Caput II- That neither grace nor any accidental or substantial form that by its nature depends on a subject or on matter is created or co - created is proved by authority (Disputatio CLXXIV)

Caput III- The preceding opinion is confirmed by reason (Disputatio CLXXIV)

Caput IV- Corollaries of the foregoing doctrine (Disputatio CLXXIV)

Disputatio CLXXV- Whether a native power of creating can belong to a creature

Caput I- Durandus asserts that by absolute power this can be done (Disputatio CLXXV)

Disputatio CLXXVI - On whether a creature can be assumed by God as an instrument for creating

Caput I- The opinion that a creature can be assumed as an instrument for creating (Disputatio CLXXVI)

Caput II- The opposite, truer opinion (Disputatio CLXXVI)

Caput III - The preceding opinion is shown by the best reason, with no innate virtue posited in the instrument (Disputatio CLXXVI)

Caput IV- On the so-called "obediential potency" and recent opinions (Disputatio CLXXVI)

Caput V- How the other instruments have a prior operation, or something produced in the effect by their proper power (Disputatio CLXXVI)

Quaestio XLVI- On the principle of the duration of created things

Articulus I- Whether the universe of creatures has existed always (Quaestio XLVI)

Articulus II- Whether the world's having begun is an article of faith (Quaestio XLVI)

Articulus III- That the creation of things was in the beginning of time (Quaestio XLVI)

Disputatio CLXXVII- Whether the world could have been from eternity

Caput I- The Catholic faith teaches that the world began at the beginning of time (Disputatio CLXXVII)

Caput II- Whether a creature could have been from eternity (Disputatio CLXXVII)

Caput III- That a permanent creature, even a corruptible one, but without corruption, could have been from eternity; the more probable opinion holds (Disputatio CLXXVII)

Against the reasons of the opposing position enough has been said

Caput IV - On the eternity of motion and of generations: whether it is possible, as various Scholastics have taught (Disputatio CLXXVII)

Caput V- That this whole universe, apart from the generations of substances and of accidents, as regards the rest, could have been from eternity: the more probable opinion (Disputatio CLXXVII)

Quaestio XLVII- On the distinction of things in general

Articulus I- Whether the multitude and distinction of things is from God (Quaestio XLVII)

Articulus II- Whether the inequality of things is from God (Quaestio XLVII)

Articulus III- Whether there is only one world (Quaestio XLVII)

Quaestio XLVIII- On the distinction of things in particular

Articulus I- Whether evil is some nature (Quaestio XLVIII)

Articulus II- Whether evil is found in things (Quaestio XLVIII)

Articulus III- Whether evil is in good as in a subject (Quaestio XLVIII)

Articulus IV- Whether evil corrupts the whole good (Quaestio XLVIII)

Articulus V- Whether evil is sufficiently divided into fault and punishment (Quaestio XLVIII)

Articulus VI- Whether punishment has more of the notion of evil than fault (Quaestio XLVIII)

Quaestio XLIX- On the cause of evil

Articulus I- Whether the good can be the cause of evil (Quaestio XLIX)

Articulus II- Whether the highest good, which is God, is the cause of evil (Quaestio XLIX)

Articulus III- Whether there is one highest evil which is the cause of all evil (Quaestio XLIX)

Praefatio- Into the treatise on the Angels

Quaestio L- On the substance of the angels absolutely

Articulus I- Whether an angel is altogether incorporeal (Quaestio L)

Articulus II- Whether an angel is composed of matter and form (Quaestio L)

Articulus III- Whether the angels are in any great number (Quaestio L)

Articulus IV- Whether the angels differ in species (Quaestio L)

Articulus V- Whether the angels are corruptible (Quaestio L)

Disputatio CLXXVIII- On Angels being incorporeal

Caput I- Besides the visible creatures there are certain beings abstracted from sensible matter, which we commonly call an Angel (Disputatio CLXXVIII)

Caput II- Who have thought Angels to be corporeal (Disputatio CLXXVIII)

Caput III- The truer opinion is proved by authority (Disputatio CLXXVIII)

Caput IV- The same opinion is shown by Scripture and by reason (Disputatio CLXXVIII)

Caput V- The foundations of the prior opinion are dissolved (Disputatio CLXXVIII)

Disputatio CLXXIX- Whence genus and difference are taken in angels

Caput I- The opinion of Durandus (Disputatio CLXXIX)

Caput II- What Henry and other Scholastics think (Disputatio CLXXIX)

Caput III- The true position (Disputatio CLXXIX)

Disputatio CLXXX- Whether the multitude of angels exceeds the number of bodily things

Caput I- Error concerning the number of the angels (Disputatio CLXXX)

Caput III- There are more angels than men (Disputatio CLXXX)

Disputatio CLXXXI- Whether individual angels by their very nature differ in species

Caput I- Two opinions of St. Thomas and of his disciples (Disputatio CLXXXI)

Disputatio CLXXXII - Whether angels are by nature, or by grace, incorruptible; and whether other things are or are not so by the power of God alone

Caput I- What St. Thomas, Cajetan, and certain Thomists have held (Disputatio CLXXXII)

Caput II - On corruptible and mortal, and likewise on incorruptible and immortal, taken relatively to a power (Disputatio CLXXXII)

Caput III- Corollaries from the preceding doctrine (Disputatio CLXXXII)

Caput IV- The latter, more probable part of our opinion is confirmed (Disputatio CLXXXII)

Caput V- The arguments of the former opinion are dissolved (Disputatio CLXXXII)

Quaestio LI- On the comparison of angels to bodies

Articulus I- Whether angels have bodies naturally united to them (Quaestio LI)

Caput I- The error of the philosophers and of Origen (Articulus I)

Caput II- The true opinion (Quaestio LI)

Articulus II- Whether angels assume bodies (Quaestio LI)

Articulus III- Whether angels in assumed bodies exercise operations of life (Quaestio LI)

Disputatio CLXXXIV - Whether in assumed bodies angels appear truly, or only according to imagination

Caput I - Not only according to imagination, but also in very reality angels appear in bodies (Disputatio CLXXXIV)

Caput II - That to the external senses angels are wont to appear in assumed bodies (Disputatio CLXXXIV)

Caput III- The arguments for the prior opinion are dissolved (Disputatio CLXXXIV)

Caput IV- Of what matter, and by what power, bodies are assumed by angels (Disputatio CLXXXIV)

Disputatio CLXXXV - Whether all the apparitions of God that are narrated to have been made were made by the ministry of angels

Caput I - Some Fathers judged that not all apparitions were made by the ministry of angels (Disputatio CLXXXV)

Caput II - The common and truer opinion is that God always appeared in both Testaments by the ministry of angels (Disputatio CLXXXV)

Disputatio CLXXXVI - Whether operations of life of the latter genus can be done by angels in assumed bodies

Caput I- Various scholastic positions (Disputatio CLXXXVI)

Caput II- The true opinion (Disputatio CLXXXVI)

De locutione

Quaestio LII- On the comparison of angels to place

Articulus I- Whether an angel is in a place (Quaestio LII)

Articulus II- Whether an angel can be in several places at the same time (Quaestio LII)

Articulus III- Whether several angels can be at the same time in the same place (Quaestio LII)

Disputatio CLXXXVII- Whether angels are truly in a bodily place

Caput I- Catholic and certain doctrine (Disputatio CLXXXVII)

Caput II- Arguments against the aforesaid doctrine (Disputatio CLXXXVII)

Disputatio CLXXXVIII- By what account an angel exists in a place

Caput I- Enumeration of opinions and statement of the question (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Caput II - Against the opinion that an angel is in a place by a transitive operation (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Caput III - The third opinion: that an angel is in a place by operation, passion, or presidency (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Caput IV - The fourth opinion: that an angel is in a place by an application of power to act (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Caput VI- Against the preceding opinion (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Caput VII- The true opinion (Disputatio CLXXXVIII)

Disputatio CLXXXIX- Whether an angel is necessarily where he acts

Caput I- That many theologians teach that an angel can act where he is not (Disputatio CLXXXIX)

Caput II- The contrary opinion seems to be embraced (Disputatio CLXXXIX)

Caput III- The foundations of the prior opinion are easily overturned (Disputatio CLXXXIX)

Disputatio CXC- Whether an angel can be in diverse places at the same time

Caput I- Status of the controversy (Disputatio CXC)

Caput II- That some taught an angel can be at once in several non - adequate places (Disputatio CXC)

Caput III - The truer opinion: an angel cannot be in several places, even non - adequate, in any way (Disputatio CXC)

Disputatio CXCII- Whether an angel can be in an indivisible place

Caput I- On the opinions of the theologians (Disputatio CXCII)

Caput II- The view of Scotus (Disputatio CXCII)

Caput III - Why the angel who moves the heaven is not in the whole, but in some part of it (Disputatio CXCII)

Caput I- There arise also Doctors on this question, indeed many who are brought forward to the same opinion by various arguments. (Articulus III)

Disputatio CXCIII- On whether several angels can be in the same place

Caput I- That several angels cannot be in the same place, even if not adequately (Disputatio CXCIII)

Caput II- Refutation of the preceding opinion (Disputatio CXCIII)

Caput III - That several angels cannot be in the same adequate place, as the Thomists teach (Disputatio CXCIII)

Caput IV- The truer opinion: that several angels can be in the same place (Disputatio CXCIII)

Quaestio LIII- On the local motion of angels

Articulus I- Whether an angel can be moved locally (Quaestio LIII)

Articulus II- Whether the Angel passes through the middle (Quaestio LIII)

Articulus III- Whether the motion of an angel is in an instant (Quaestio LIII)

Disputatio CXCIV- Whether an angel can be moved from place to place

Caput I- What Hervaeus and Durandus think (Disputatio CXCIV)

Caput II- The true opinion: that an angel is moved with respect to place (Disputatio CXCIV)

Caput III- That an angel moves himself (Disputatio CXCIV)

Disputatio CXCV- Whether the motion of an angel is something in the angel himself

Caput I - That the motion of an angel is something intrinsic to him, taught by Lichetus (Disputatio CXCV)

Caput II- That an angel is moved only to an extrinsic form, taught by many (Disputatio CXCV)

Caput III- Notes for the explication of the truer view (Disputatio CXCV)

Caput IV- The more probable middle sentence (Disputatio CXCV)

Caput V- Answers to the arguments opposed to our position (Disputatio CXCV)

Caput VI- An Angel can be moved by a continuous motion (Disputatio CXCV)

Disputatio CXCVI- Whether an angel can be moved from extreme to extreme without the middle

Caput I- Various opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CXCVI)

Caput II- The more probable opinion (Disputatio CXCVI)

Caput III- Rebuttal of the arguments (Disputatio CXCVI)

Disputatio CXCVII

Caput I- Whether the motion of an angel through the medium can be in an instant (Disputatio CXCVII)

Caput II - That an angel cannot be moved through the medium in an instant; the truer opinion concludes (Disputatio CXCVII)

Caput III- The arguments of the former sentence are dissolved (Disputatio CXCVII)

Caput IV- On the discrete motion of an angel (Disputatio CXCVII)

Quaestio LIV- On the knowledge of the angels

Articulus I- Whether the angel's understanding is his substance (Quaestio LIV)

Articulus II- Whether the angel's understanding is his existence (Quaestio LIV)

Articulus III- Whether the angel's intellectual power is his essence (Quaestio LIV)

Articulus IV- Whether in an angel there are an agent intellect and a possible intellect (Quaestio LIV)

Articulus V- Whether in angels there is only intellective cognition (Quaestio LIV)

Disputatio CXCVIII- On whether intellection in an angel is his substance

Caput I- The opinion of Aristotle and Durandus (Disputatio CXCVIII)

Caput II- The truer opinion: that intellection in an angel is not his essence (Disputatio CXCVIII)

Disputatio CXCIX- On whether there is in angels an agent and a possible intellect

Caput I- Various opinions (Disputatio CXCIX)

Quaestio LV- On the medium of angelic cognition

Articulus I- Whether the angels know all things through their own substance (Quaestio LV)

Articulus II- Whether the angels understand by species received from things (Quaestio LV)

Articulus III - Whether the higher Angels understand by more universal species than the lower (Quaestio LV)

Disputatio CC- Whether the angels understand by species

Caput I- That Durandus and the Nominalists held that angels, by their essence alone and their intellect, understand all things (Disputatio CC)

Caput II- The common opinion (Disputatio CC)

Caput III- A judgment concerning both opinions (Disputatio CC)

Disputatio CCI- Whether the Angel receives species from things

Caput I- The opinion of Scotus and others (Disputatio CCI)

Caput II - That the Angel receives no species from things: the common and truer opinion is established (Disputatio CCI)

Caput III - In what way the species which the Angel has were from the beginning inborn in his intellect (Disputatio CCI)

Disputatio CCII

Caput I - Whether there can be one species, or quality, in Angels representing many things (Disputatio CCII)

Caput II- The more common and truer opinion: that one and the same numerically species can represent many diverse things, and that such species were granted to Angels (Disputatio CCII)

Disputatio CCIII- Whether, the higher an Angel is, the more he understands by fewer species

Caput I - Scotus and Bassolis deny that higher Angels understand by fewer and more universal species (Disputatio CCIII)

Caput II- Thomists affirm that higher Angels understand by fewer species (Disputatio CCIII)

Caput III- Two other Scholastic opinions (Disputatio CCIII)

Caput IV- The fourth opinion (Henry of Ghent) (Disputatio CCIII)

Quaestio LVI- On the knowledge of Angels on the part of immaterial things

Articulus I- Whether an Angel knows himself (Quaestio LVI)

Caput II- The common sentence: that an angel understands himself through his essence without any added species as a principle of understanding (Articulus I)

Articulus II- Whether one Angel knows another (Quaestio LVI)

Caput I- How one Angel knows another (Articulus II)

Caput II- That one Angel knows another through that other's essence, as some said (Articulus II)

Caput III - That, by the intellect's power alone or through species, one Angel is known by another, as the more probable opinion holds (Articulus II)

Articulus III- Whether an Angel can know God by his natural powers. (Quaestio LVI)

Disputatio CCVI- In what way an Angel naturally knows God

Caput I- Two Scholastic opinions (Disputatio CCVI)

Caput II- The more probable opinion (Disputatio CCVI)

Quaestio LVII- On the knowledge of Angels with respect to material things

Articulus I- Whether Angels know material things (Quaestio LVII)

Articulus II- Whether Angels know singulars (Quaestio LVII)

Articulus III- Whether the Angels know future things (Quaestio LVII)

Articulus IV- Whether angels know the thoughts of hearts (Quaestio LVII)

Articulus V- Whether the angels know the mysteries of grace (Quaestio LVII)

Disputatio CCVII - Whether future contingents proceeding solely from natural causes can be known by an Angel

Caput I- Statement of the question and preliminaries (Disputatio CCVII)

Caput II- The more probable opinion: that contingent events not depending in any way on free choice are known with certitude by Angels (Disputatio CCVII)

Caput III- Dissolution of contrary arguments (Disputatio CCVII)

Disputatio CCVIII - An future contingentia ex libero arbitrio propria virtute ab Angelis certo cognoscantur

Caput II- Some Schoolmen attempt a priori to demonstrate that future contingents from free will cannot be known by Angels, by this reasoning. (Disputatio CCVIII)

Caput III- The difficult argument, to which the Doctors reply in various ways (Disputatio CCVIII)

Caput IV- The true solution of the foregoing argument (Disputatio CCVIII)

Disputatio CCIX- On whether angels know the thoughts of hearts

Caput I- Hervaeus and Durandus: that angels know thoughts and volitions, not only what they are but also what they are about (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput III- The common and much more probable opinion is that the secrets of the heart of one man, or of an angel, cannot be known by another angel. (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput IV - The second and third mode, by which Henry explains the aforesaid common opinion (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput V- Against Henry's "intention" as a mere relation (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput VI - Another way of proving the common opinion; and the attack of Scotus and Durandus (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput VII- Ferrariensis' reply to Durandus (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput VIII- How Cajetan interprets St. Thomas's reasoning (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput IX- Gregory confirms the common opinion by another reason (Disputatio CCIX)

Caput X- The author's judgment (Disputatio CCIX)

Disputatio CCX - What a cogitation or the secrets of the heart are, which an angel by his nature cannot know

Caput I- Preliminaries and the sense of "secrets of the heart" (Disputatio CCX)

Caput II - Not to be judged the same way about affections and about cogitations; a probable opinion (Disputatio CCX)

Disputatio CCXI- One Angel's speaking to another is undoubted. cap. 1.

Caput I- That Angels speak among themselves (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput II- That one Angel speaks to another by impressing into his mind the cognition of the object known by himself, as Scotus maintains (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput III- The opinion of Scotus is refuted (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput IV- Statement and confirmation of the opinion (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput V- Refutation of the foregoing opinion (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput VI- The arguments for the foregoing opinion are refuted (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput VII - Angels speak among themselves by one angel's impressing the cognition of his concept into another's mind (Ockham, Gabriel) (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput VIII - That an angel speaks merely by willing his secret to be manifested (Cajetan, Capreolus) (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput IX- What Durandus held (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput X- On angelic locution by spiritual signs (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput XI - The final opinion in the present controversy: that one angel speaks to another by the expression of an interior word (Disputatio CCXI)

Caput XII- The arguments against the preceding doctrine are dissolved (Disputatio CCXI)

Disputatio CCXII- Whether an angel can speak with another at any distance

Caput I- That a determinate distance is necessary for one angel to speak to another (Disputatio CCXII)

Disputatio CCXIII - Whether one angel can speak to another in such a way that others do not hear, even if they wish

Caput I- That it is possible for one angel to speak so to one that others cannot hear (Disputatio CCXIII)

Caput II- That one angel cannot so speak to another secretly that, if the others will, he is not heard - others not improbably maintain (Disputatio CCXIII)

Disputatio CCXIV- Whether an angel can, by his natural powers, know the mysteries of grace

Caput I- Three diverse opinions of the Scholastics (Disputatio CCXIV)

Caput II- Certain notes for the explanation of the truer opinion (Disputatio CCXIV)

Caput III- On what of the supernatural an angel can know naturally (Disputatio CCXIV)

Caput IV - What in the Eucharist angels can know naturally, and what remains hidden (Disputatio CCXIV)

Disputatio CCXV - On whether the mystery of the Incarnation was revealed to the angels in the state of wayfarers

Caput I- The common opinion is that the mystery of the Incarnation was revealed to the angels in the way (Disputatio CCXV)

Caput II- The testimonies of Scripture and of the Fathers which seem to oppose the foregoing opinion are set forth and explained (Disputatio CCXV)

Caput III- What mysteries the blessed angels have known in the Word (Disputatio CCXV)

Disputatio CCXVI- Whether the intellect of one angel is enlightened by another

Caput I- The opinion of Durandus (Disputatio CCXVI)

Caput II- The second opinion explained in five ways (Disputatio CCXVI)

Caput III- St. Thomas's view (the fifth mode) (Disputatio CCXVI)

Caput IV- Three other ways of explaining, and of defending, the prior opinion (Disputatio CCXVI)

Caput V - That one Angel illumines another by an external proposition alone; confirmation of this opinion (Disputatio CCXVI)

Caput VI- Corollaries of the foregoing doctrine (Disputatio CCXVI)

Disputatio CCXVII - Whether only an inferior angel can be illuminated by a superior, or also a superior by an inferior

Caput I - That only the inferior is illuminated by the superior is the common opinion (Disputatio CCXVII)

Caput II- Corollaries of the preceding doctrine (Disputatio CCXVII)

Disputatio CCXVIII - Whether corporeal and material nature obeys an angel with respect to any form whatsoever

Caput I- That matter does not obey an angel with respect to a substantial form is the common opinion of all (Disputatio CCXVIII)

Caput II- The preceding opinion is confirmed by reason (Disputatio CCXVIII)

Caput III- What accidental form an Angel can produce in matter (Disputatio CCXVIII)

Caput IV- What an angel, or a demon, can do in our imagination (Disputatio CCXVIII)

Quaestio LVIII- On the mode of the cognition of angels

Articulus I - Whether the intellect of an angel is sometimes in potency and sometimes in act (Quaestio LVIII)

Articulus II- Whether an angel can understand many things at once (Quaestio LVIII)

Articulus III- Whether an Angel knows by discursive reasoning (Quaestio LVIII)

Articulus IV- Whether angels understand by composing and dividing (Quaestio LVIII)

Articulus V- Whether falsity can be in the intellect of an angel (Quaestio LVIII)

Articulus VI- Whether in angels there is morning and evening knowledge (Quaestio LVIII)

Disputatio CCXIX- How the intellect of an angel is in potency and in act

Caput I- On the first act of an angel for understanding supernatural things (Disputatio CCXIX)

Caput II- On the natural habits by which the intellect of the angel is in first act (Disputatio CCXIX)

Caput III- On the second act of the angelic intellect, which is to understand (Disputatio CCXIX)

Disputatio CCXX

Caput I- That many things cannot be known at once by an angel except under the mode of one, various Theologians defend. (Disputatio CCXX)

Caput II - The more probable opinion, which even the Thomists embrace, consists in two points (Disputatio CCXX)

Disputatio CCXXI

Caput I- What Durandus holds (Disputatio CCXXI)

Caput II- The second opinion (Disputatio CCXXI)

Caput III- The more probable opinion (Disputatio CCXXI)

Disputatio CCXXII- Whether an angel understands by discursive reasoning

Caput II- The first, more probable part of the opinion (Disputatio CCXXII)

Caput III- The posterior part of the more probable opinion (Disputatio CCXXII)

Caput IV- The argument of Scotus and Gregory is solved (Disputatio CCXXII)

Disputatio CCXXIII - Whether an angel knows that a thing is, or is not, by composition or by division

Caput I- On composition in the angelic intellect (Disputatio CCXXIII)

Caput II- On division in the same intellect of an angel (Disputatio CCXXIII)

Caput III- On composition, division, and discourse (Disputatio CCXXIII)

Quaestio LIX- On the will of the angels

Articulus I- Whether in angels there is will (Quaestio LIX)

Articulus II- Whether in angels the will differs from the intellect (Quaestio LIX)

Articulus III- Whether in angels there is free choice (Quaestio LIX)

Articulus IV- Whether in angels there is an irascible and a concupiscible (Quaestio LIX)

Quaestio LX- On love, or dilection, of the angels

Articulus I- Whether in the angels there is natural love or dilection (Quaestio LX)

Articulus II- Whether in the angels there is elective dilection (Quaestio LX)

Articulus III- Whether an angel loves himself by natural love and by elective love. (Quaestio LX)

Articulus IV- Whether an angel by natural love loves another angel as himself. (Quaestio LX)

Articulus V- Whether an angel by natural love loves God more than himself. (Quaestio LX)

Quaestio LXI- On the production of the angels into the existence of nature

Articulus I- Whether the angels have a cause of their existence (Quaestio LXI)

Articulus II- Whether the angel was produced by God from eternity (Quaestio LXI)

Articulus III- Whether the angels were created before the corporeal world (Quaestio LXI)

Articulus IV- Whether the angels were created in the Empyrean heaven (Quaestio LXI)

Disputatio CCXXIV- On whether the angels were created before the corporeal world

Caput I- Against Aristotle and other philosophers, it is a faith undoubted among the Fathers and the Catholic Church that no spiritual creature was from eternity, but had a beginning of its duration. (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Caput II- That the aforesaid opinion cannot be plainly condemned from Scripture (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Caput III - That there was not sufficient other foundation whereby the aforesaid opinion should be condemned (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Caput IV - That the words of the Lateran Council do not contain the condemnation of the foregoing opinion (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Caput V- The more probable opinion is that the angels were created simultaneously in duration with the corporeal creature (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Caput VI- The arguments of the prior opinion are dissolved (Disputatio CCXXIV)

Quaestio LXII- On the perfection of the Angels in the state of grace and glory

Articulus I- Whether the Angels were in their creation blessed (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus II - Whether an angel needed grace for this, that he might be converted to God (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus III- Whether the angels were created in grace (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus IV- Whether the created angel merited his beatitude (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus V- Whether the angel immediately after one act of merit had beatitude (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus VI- Whether the good angels obtained grace and glory according to the quantity of their natural endowments (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus VII- Whether in the blessed angels there remains natural cognition and love (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus VIII- Whether a blessed angel can sin (Quaestio LXII)

Articulus IX- Whether the blessed angels can make progress in beatitude (Quaestio LXII)

Disputatio CCXXVI - Whether the Angels were created in beatitude only natural, or also supernatural

Caput I- Who have held that the Angels were created in natural beatitude (Disputatio CCXXVI)

Caput II- The contemplation of the way in Angels does not have the true notion of beatitude, though it is akin to beatitude (Disputatio CCXXVI)

Caput III- The bad Angels were not created in the beatitude of the homeland. (Disputatio CCXXVI)

Caput IV - That to the good angels the beatitude of the fatherland was not granted from the beginning of their being (Disputatio CCXXVI)

Disputatio CCXXVII - Whether the angels were created in sanctity and justice before God, or in pure nature

Caput I- Setting aside the opinion that the evil angels sinned in the first instant (Disputatio CCXXVII)

Caput II- That both bad and good angels were created in grace, justice, and holiness before God; and that this is proved by the authority of the Scholastics and the Fathers (Disputatio CCXXVII)

Caput III - The aforesaid opinion is confirmed by testimonies of Scripture and by reason (Disputatio CCXXVII)

Caput IV- The foundation of the prior opinion is overthrown (Disputatio CCXXVII)

Disputatio CCXXVIII- Whether all the Angels were created equal in sanctity and justice

Caput I- On the disposition of the Angels to grace (Disputatio CCXXVIII)

Caput II - That the angels who by natural dignity are more perfect obtained greater grace from God (Disputatio CCXXVIII)

Caput III- The foregoing doctrine is illustrated by certain notes (Disputatio CCXXVIII)

Disputatio CCXXIX - Whether the angel obtained beatitude after one act of merit, or after several

Caput I- That the angels merited beatitude (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput II - That the Master and others held the angels to have merited beatitude by works following it (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput III- The preceding opinion is refuted (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput V- Various ways in which the preceding opinion is explained and defended (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput VI- What Cajetan and others think concerning this matter (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput VII - On the way and the term of the wicked angels, as posited by the aforesaid opinion (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput VIII- Other theologians' opinions (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Caput IX- The opinion of Ferrariensis (Disputatio CCXXIX)

Disputatio CCXXX - Whether the blessed angels can grow in essential beatitude, or only in accidental

Caput I- That the blessed angels do not grow in essential beatitude (Disputatio CCXXX)

Caput II- In what way the accidental beatitude of the angels grows (Disputatio CCXXX)

Quaestio LXIII- On the malice of the angels as to fault

Articulus I- Whether the evil of fault can be in the angels (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus II- Whether in Angels there can be only the sins of pride and envy (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus III- Whether the Angel desired to be as God (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus IV- Whether some demons are naturally evil (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus V - Whether the devil was evil in the first instant of his creation, by the fault of his own will (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus VI- Whether there was any delay between creation and the fall (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus VII - Whether the highest angel among those who sinned was the highest among all (Quaestio LXIII)

Articulus VIII- Whether the sin of the first angel was the cause of the others' sinning (Quaestio LXIII)

Disputatio CCXXXI - Whether there can be made by God some rational creature "Anamartetos," that is, impeccable

Caput I- Two scholastic opinions (Disputatio CCXXXI)

Caput II - No rational creature can be impeccable, and to be without freedom: it is proved by authority (Disputatio CCXXXI)

Caput III- The foundation of the reasons for the preceding sententia (Disputatio CCXXXI)

Caput IV- The opinion opposed to the second sententia is confirmed by reason (Disputatio CCXXXI)

Caput V- Lastly, against the first opinion (Disputatio CCXXXI)

Disputatio CCXXXII- Whether the sin of the Angel was pride, or of another kind

Caput II- The opinions of Scotus and Gabriel are refuted (Disputatio CCXXXII)

Caput III- The same common and true opinion: that the Angel first sinned by pride; but as to what sort that was, this will be shown later (Disputatio CCXXXII)

Caput IV- Certain Scriptural testimonies are weighed for the same opinion (Disputatio CCXXXII)

Disputatio CCXXXIII - Whether the Angel sinned by desiring the hypostatic union with God, or by envying it to man

Caput I- The opinion that the Angel sinned by the appetite of the hypostatic union, or by envying it to man (Disputatio CCXXXIII)

Caput II - The truer opinion: the Angel could have sinned by the appetite of the union, yet did not (Disputatio CCXXXIII)

Disputatio CCXXXIV- Whether the angel sinned by the proud appetite of equality with God

Caput I- Not a few have taught that an angel could not sin by an appetite for equality of nature with God (Disputatio CCXXXIV)

Caput II- With deference to so many, that the angel could sin by the proud desire of equality with God according to nature is sufficiently probable (Disputatio CCXXXIV)

Caput III - That it is not certain that the angel sinned by the desire of equality with God according to essence (Disputatio CCXXXIV)

Disputatio CCXXXV

Caput I- What the Scholastics hold without controversy (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Caput II- Three ways of explaining and defending the common view (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Caput III- A more probable way of defending the common opinion (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Caput IV- An objection against the foregoing doctrine (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Caput V- By what reason the Angel could sin by the appetite of natural beatitude (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Caput VI- How the angel could sin by desiring to be preferred to others (Disputatio CCXXXV)

Disputatio CCXXXVI- Whether an angel could sin in the first instant of his existence

Caput I - The common and truer opinion: that the angels did not sin in the first instant (Disputatio CCXXXVI)

Caput II- Authorities and divisions of opinion (Disputatio CCXXXVI)

Caput III- Judgment on the two opinions (Disputatio CCXXXVI)

Caput IV- In the first instant of their creation the angels could have merited (Disputatio CCXXXVI)

Disputatio CCXXXVII- Two opposite opinions

Caput II- Judgment concerning both opinions (Disputatio CCXXXVII)

Disputatio CCXXXVIII- An peccatum primi Angeli fuerit aliis causa peccandi

Caput I- Two opposed opinions (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput II- Judgment concerning each opinion (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput III - Whether all sinned at the same time, or first the supreme, then the rest (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput IV- What was the sin of the lower Angels (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput I- (Chapter I) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput II- (Chapter II) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput III- (Chapter III) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput IV- (Chapter IV) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput V- (Chapter V) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput VI- (Chapter VI) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Caput VII- (Chapter VII) (Disputatio CCXXXVIII)

Quaestio LXIV- On the punishment of the demons

Article 1 (Articulus 1)

Article 2 (Articulus 2)

Disputation 239 (Disputatio 239)

What is the cause of the perpetual obduracy of demons (Quaenam sit causa perpetuae obdurationis daemonum)

On the contrary a man pilgrim, because he cannot strike with such force, can therefore always return as long as he is on the way

Disputation 240 (Disputatio 240)

Disputation 241 (Disputatio 241)

On the other hand it seems impossible that every good suggestion, even a sufficient one, be denied to a demon

Article 3 (Articulus 3)

Disputation 242 (Disputatio 242)

On the sadness and pain of demons (De tristitia, et dolore daemonum)

On the contrary, when an angel can have an evil proper and joined to himself, he can also be saddened and grieve about it

Article 4 (Articulus 4)

Disputation 244 (Disputatio 244)

Which angels are sent into the service of men (Quinam Angeli in ministerium hominum mittantur)

Disputation 245 (Disputatio 245)

On Guardian Angels and Attacking Demons (De Angelis tutelaribus, et daemonibus oppugnatoribus)

On the guardianship of good angels, chap. 1. On the assault of demons, chap. 2

Disputatio CCXLIII- How demons suffer from fire (Quo pacto daemones patiantur ab igne)

Index

Opera Theologica omnia (Vol. 2)

Quaestio XXVII - On the procession of the divine persons

Having considered, however, those things which pertain to the unity of the divine essence (essentia), it remains to consider those things which pertain to the Trinity of persons in the divine things. And because the divine persons are distinguished according to the relations of origin (relationes originis), according to the order of doctrine we must first consider origin, that is, procession (processio); secondly, the relations of origin; thirdly, the persons.

Concerning procession, five questions are asked: - First, whether there is procession in the divine things. - Second, whether any procession in the divine things can be called generation. - Third, whether besides generation there is some other procession in the divine things. - Fourth, whether that other procession can be called generation. - Fifth, whether in the divine things there are more processions than two.

Praefatio

These matters ought to be called, by name, theological. For the things which are treated about God in theology are of our faith, and therefore what they are entirely lies hidden; many things, however, can be investigated by the light of natural reason, or in some way traced out, not to the prejudice of the mysteries, nor detracting from them. Indeed, against the Trinity of persons in one numerically same essence, if any intellect, not instructed by the light of faith, attempts to rise up, it is dashed to pieces and is not perfected. Nevertheless, in the present disputation of ours, with positions taken only from divine revelation, we shall also not obscurely deduce many things by theological reasoning concerning the matter itself: always holding this, that our Christian faith establishes that true natural reason is not destroyed, but perfected and illumined. It is, moreover, our part to dissolve the arguments and calumnies of adversaries who strive against this mystery, and, aided by the principles of our faith, to overthrow them - so far as theological reasons can afford to a theologian.

And although in this whole present treatment on the Trinity we shall use certain words which Scripture indeed does not expressly have, yet by the Fathers they have been accommodated to this most hidden mystery - such as: essence (essentia), Trinity, subsistence (subsistentia), person (persona), notion, potency (potentia), notional act (actus notionalis), relation (relatio), and the like - which we shall use in their proper places, lest we open a door in the Church to adversaries. For although heretics rightly reject those words by which they attempt to explain away the mystery of the Trinity, Catholics, for good reasons, rightly and readily use those same terms.

Articulus I - Whether there is procession in the divine things

Objicitur: 1) It seems that in God there cannot be any procession. For procession signifies motion outwardly; but in the divine things there is nothing mobile nor extraneous. Therefore neither is there procession. 2) Further, every thing proceeding is diverse from that from which it proceeds. But in God there is no diversity, but supreme simplicity. Therefore in God there is no procession. 3) Further, to proceed from another seems to be repugnant to the notion of the first principle; but God is the first principle, as was shown above. Therefore in God procession has no place.

But on the contrary: The Lord says in John 7: "I proceeded from God."

I answer that, divine Scripture in divine matters uses names that pertain to procession. Various people have taken this procession in different ways. Some, indeed, have taken this procession according as an effect proceeds from its cause. And thus Arius takes it, saying that the Son proceeds from the Father as his first creature, and that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as the creature of both. And according to this, neither the Son nor the Holy Spirit would be true God. Which is contrary to what is said of the Son in 1 John, last chapter: "That we may be in his true Son: this is the true God;" and of the Spirit is said in 1 Corinthians 3: "Do you not know that your members are the temple of the Holy Spirit?" But to have a temple belongs to God alone. Others, however, have taken this procession according as a cause is said to proceed into its effect, inasmuch as it moves it, or imprints its likeness on it. And thus Sabellius took it, saying that the very God the Father is called Son according as he assumed flesh from the Virgin, and he calls the same the Holy Spirit, according as he sanctifies the rational creature and moves it to life. But this acceptance is repugnant to the words of the Lord speaking of himself, John 5: "The Son cannot do anything of himself," and many other things, by which it is shown that he is not himself the Father who is the Son. If one consider diligently, each of these accepted procession according as it is toward something external. Whence neither of them posited procession in God himself. But since every procession is according to some action: just as, according to an action that tends into external matter, there is some procession outwardly; so, according to an action that remains in the agent itself, a certain procession is considered inwardly. And this is most clearly evident in the intellect, whose action - namely, to understand - remains in the understanding subject. But whoever understands, from the very fact that he understands, there proceeds something within him, which is the conception of the understood thing, proceeding by the power of the intellectual faculty, and going forth from his knowledge. This conception is signified by the voice; and the word of the heart is signified by the spoken word. But since God is above all, those things that are said in God are not to be understood according to the mode of the lowest creatures, which are bodies, but according to the likeness of the highest creatures, which are intellectual substances; from which even so the likeness taken falls short of a representation of the divine. Therefore procession is not to be taken according as it is in corporeal things, either by local motion or by the action of some cause into an external effect, as heat heating proceeds into the thing heated; but according to the emanation of an intelligible, as of an intelligible word from one speaking, which remains in him. And thus the Catholic faith posits procession in the divine things.

Reply to the first: That objection proceeds from procession which is local motion, or which is according to an action tending into external matter, or into an external effect. But such a procession is not in the divine things, as has been said.

Reply to the second: That which proceeds according to a procession which is outward must be diverse from that from which it proceeds. But that which proceeds inwardly, by an intelligible procession, need not be diverse; rather, the more perfectly it proceeds, so much the more is it one with that from which it proceeds. For it is manifest that, the more something is understood, the more the intellectual conception is intimate to the one understanding and the more one with him. For the intellect, inasmuch as it actually understands, thereby becomes more one with the understood. Hence, since the divine understanding is at the term of perfection (as was said above), it is necessary that the divine Word be perfectly one with him from whom it proceeds, without any diversity.

Reply to the third: To proceed from a principle as extraneous and diverse is repugnant to the notion of the first principle; but to proceed as an intrinsic beginning and without diversity, by an intelligible mode, is included in the notion of a first principle. For when we say that the builder is the principle of the house, in the notion of this principle is included the conception of his art; and if the builder were the first principle, the conception of his art would be included in the notion of the first principle. But God, who is the first principle of things, is related to created things not as an artificer to his works of art.

Notandum concerning the article. - The conclusion of the article is: In the divine things there is a procession by way of an immanent, intelligible emanation. By this single conclusion St. Thomas most excellently explained what sort of procession in God must be conceded. For since one kind of procession is according to place, another according to an effect from a cause - like heat proceeding from fire - he concludes that neither of those is found in God, because he is neither located in place, nor does anything within him depend on a cause as on an efficient and superior. Therefore there is a procession within God by way of an intelligible emanation, whereby truly something is produced. He speaks here only of the emanation through the intellect, which belongs to the Son alone. For the emanation through the will, which is of the Holy Spirit, he treats in article 3. - Further, it is to be observed that the name "procession" is of itself common to the procession of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; by the usage of the Church, however, it is accommodated to the Holy Spirit, who is not called begotten, but proceeding, as is had in the Athanasian Creed; and the Schoolmen give various reasons for this accommodation.[1] For us, however, it is enough to know that, by the usage of the Church, it is now rightly accommodated to signify the procession of the Holy Spirit, although in a common and universal signification we also frequently use it. - About this article there is wont to be a disputation concerning the word of our intellection. Of this, however, so far as a theologian needs, we shall speak in disputation 142. But those things which, concerning the emanation of the Son, are noteworthy against heretics, we shall treat in the special disputation 109.

1. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 14, q. 1, a. 3; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 13, a. 2, q. 2; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 1.

Articulus II - Whether any procession in the divine things can be called generation Objicitur: 1) It seems that the procession which is in the divine things cannot be called generation. For generation is a change from non-being to being, opposed to corruption, and the subject of both is matter. But none of these belongs to the divine things. Therefore generation cannot be in the divine things. 2) Further, in God there is procession according to an intelligible mode, as has been said; but in us such a procession is not called generation. Therefore neither in God. 3) Further, every begotten receives existence from the begetter. Therefore the existence of any begotten is a received existence. But no received existence is per se subsistent. Since therefore the divine existence is per se subsistent (as was proved above), it follows that the existence of no begotten is divine existence. Therefore there is not generation in the divine things.

But on the contrary: It is said in Psalm 2: "This day I have begotten you."

I answer that, the procession of the Word in the divine things is called generation. For the understanding of this, it should be known that we use the name "generation" in a twofold way. In one way, commonly for all things generable and corruptible; and thus generation is nothing other than a change from non-being to being. In another way, properly in living things; and thus generation signifies the origin of some living thing from a living principle conjoined; and this is properly called "birth." Yet not everything of this sort is called begotten and a son, but properly that which proceeds according to a ratio of likeness. Hence hair or a nail does not have the notion of what is begotten and of a son, but only that which proceeds according to a ratio of likeness - not just any likeness; for worms that are generated in animals do not have the notion of generation and of filiation, although there is likeness according to genus; but there is required, for the notion of such generation, that it proceed according to a ratio of likeness in the nature of the same species, as a man proceeds from a man, and a horse from a horse. Now, in living things which proceed from potency to the act of life, as men and animals, generation includes both senses. But if there be some living being whose life does not go forth from potency into act, the procession (if any be found in such a living being) wholly excludes the first ratio of generation, yet can have the ratio of generation which is proper to living things. Thus, therefore, the procession of the Word in the divine things has the ratio of generation: for it proceeds by way of intelligible action, which is an operation of life; and from a principle conjoined, as was said above; and according to a ratio of likeness, because the conception of the intellect is the likeness of the thing understood, and existing in the same nature as that of the one understanding. For in God to understand and to be are the same, as was shown above. Whence the procession of the Word in the divine things is called generation, and the very Word proceeding is called Son.

Reply to the first: That objection proceeds about generation according to the first notion, insofar as it implies an exit from potency into act; and thus it is not found in the divine things, as was said above.

Reply to the second: To understand, in us, is not the very substance (substantia) of the intellect. Whence the word which proceeds in us according to an intelligible operation is not of the same nature with that from which it proceeds. Hence the ratio of generation does not properly and completely belong to it. But the divine understanding is the very substance of the one understanding, as was shown above. Whence the Word proceeding in God proceeds as subsistent of the same nature; and for this reason it is properly called "begotten" and "Son." Hence too, the Scripture, to signify the procession of divine Wisdom, uses those things which pertain to the generation of living beings, namely conception and birth. For it is said in the person of divine Wisdom, Proverbs 8: "The depths were not yet, and I was already conceived; before the hills I was brought forth." But in our intellect we use the name "conception" according as in the word of our intellect there is found a likeness of the understood thing, although there is not found identity of nature.

Reply to the third: Not everything received is received in some subject; otherwise it could not be said that the whole substance of a created thing is received from God, since there is not some subject of the whole substance receiving something. Thus, therefore, that which is begotten in the divine things receives existence from the begetter, not as something received in a subject.

...than that existence, if it were received in some matter or subject, which is repugnant to the subsistence (subsistentia) of the divine existence (esse). But according to this it is said to be received, inasmuch as, proceeding from another, it has the divine existence, not as if existing as something other than the divine existence. For in the very perfection of the divine existence there is contained both the intelligibly proceeding Word and the principle of the Word, as also whatever pertains to its perfection, as was said above.

Dubitationes circa Articulum. The conclusion of the Article is: The procession (processio) of the Word in the divine things is generation (generatio), and the Word proceeding is the Son. Since this conclusion is certain, and will be proved below in Disputation 113, which sets forth nothing beyond what is extrinsic to the proof of the conclusion, let it now suffice to examine the doubts about the argument of the article proposed by Cajetan and Ferrariensis. For it seems that the Blessed Thomas proves that the divine Word is of the same nature with the producing Father in this way. In God to understand and to be are the same; and therefore God's intellection is His substance: but the being of the Word is to understand; therefore the being of the Word is the substance of God. He indicated this reasoning briefly at the end of the article, and expressly adduced it in Contra Gentiles, book 4, chapter 1.[2] Hence such is Cajetan's doubt. To be understood (intelligi) is nothing in the thing understood; for it seems to be only some extrinsic denomination: therefore, since the Word in the divine things is the thing understood, it follows that its real being is not to be understood, but that from this it only contracts some extrinsic denomination. Next, Ferrariensis proposes another doubt in this way. Although the being of the Word produced through intellection is to be understood, nevertheless it does not follow from this that the divine being agrees to it, even if in God to understand and to be are the same: otherwise, in like manner one could infer that the creatures objectively existing in the mind of God have God's own being, since their being is to be understood. A third argument is what Cajetan brings later in this way. The act of understanding is really distinguished from the concept and the word produced; but to understand is the being of the intellect itself in act: therefore it is not the being of the Word; because two things that are really distinguished do not have the same being. To the same point looks that argument which Ferrariensis proposes earlier: form and matter have the same being in the composite, and yet are really distinguished among themselves; therefore it does not follow in God that intellection and the thing understood, or the intention (as he calls it), are the same.

2. St. Thomas, Summa contra Gentiles, IV, c. 1.

To the first and second, the aforesaid doctors answer in the same way: namely, that "to be understood," or intellection properly signified, is referred one way to the thing understood, which is only the object of intellection, and another way to the concept produced, which is called the Word. For this latter is considered as the production of that which, because by intellection as by an action the Word proceeds, and thus being is attributed to it; wherefore, if to understand is the divine being, to be understood in this mode will also be the divine being, and the thing produced by intellection will be of the same nature, and will have the same being in the producer. But intellection does not regard the object objectively present as something produced by itself; and therefore it posits in it nothing beyond an extrinsic denomination. This doctrine pleases me, if it be applied only to the divine intellection. For in God intellection is a true production of the Word; but in us it is not so, as we shall say in its place. To the third argument, which is Cajetan's, he himself answers in the Commentary in this way: intellection, as it has the notion of action, is the being of the intelligible species; but as it has the notion of passion, it is the being of the Word. Nor is it a wonder if two things really distinct have the same being, just as matter and form in the composite, which also really differ, have the same being. This reply of Cajetan is taken from a certain peculiar doctrine of his. For he thinks that to understand emanates from the intelligible species as being emanates from form; which could be shown false in a few words. But since in God really to understand does not differ from the intelligible species, which is the divine essence, but has the same being with it, we could more easily answer the proposed argument, as Ferrariensis answers another like one (which we also reported above): namely, that all things which participate in the same being are not on that account to be reckoned the same among themselves, unless they participate in the same being as parts of some whole, as body and soul participate in the being of man. Wherefore, since intellection in God and the thing produced (namely, the Word) have the same being, and are not parts of some whole, it follows that they have absolutely the same being; except that intellection, as it is the active production of the Word, and the Word itself, are opposed by relation, and by that opposition they really differ: nevertheless they have the same being and the same substance, which is common in God to the persons and the relations.

Articulus III - Whether there is in the divine things another procession besides the generation of the Word

Objicitur 1. It seems that there is not in the divine things another procession besides the generation of the Word. For by the same reasoning there will be some other procession besides that other procession; and so one would proceed to infinity, which is incongruous. Therefore one must stand at the first, so that there be only one procession in the divine things.

Objicitur 2. Further, in every nature there is found only one mode of communication of that nature. And this is so because operations, according to their termini, have unity and diversity. But procession in the divine things is only according to the communication of the divine nature. Since therefore there is only one divine nature (as was shown above), it follows that there is only one procession in the divine things.

Objicitur 3. Further, if there is in the divine things another procession besides the intelligible procession of the Word, it will be only the procession of love: which is according to the operation of the will (voluntas). But such a procession cannot be other than the procession of the intelligible intellect (intellectus): because in God will is not other than intellect, as was shown above. Therefore in God there is not another procession besides the procession of the Word.

But on the contrary: the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, as is said in John 15. But He is other than the Son, according to that of John 14: "I will ask my Father, and He will give you another Paraclete." Therefore in the divine things there is another procession besides the procession of the Word.

I answer: that in the divine things there are two processions, namely, the procession of the Word and a certain other. For the understanding of which, one must consider that in the divine things there is procession only according to an action which does not tend to something extrinsic, but remains in the very agent. But such an action in an intellectual nature is the action of the intellect and the action of the will. Now the procession of the Word is considered according to the intelligible action. But according to the operation of the will there is found in us a certain other procession, namely, the procession of love, according to which the beloved is in the lover, just as, through the conception of the Word, the thing said or understood is in the one understanding. And hence, besides the procession of the Word, another procession is posited in the divine things, which is the procession of love.

Reply to the first: It is not necessary to proceed to infinity in the processions in the divine things. For a procession which is ad intra in an intellectual nature is terminated in the procession of the will.

Reply to the second: Whatever is in God is God, as was shown above. Which does not happen in other things. And therefore by every procession which is not ad extra the divine nature is communicated, and not some other nature.

Reply to the third: Although in God will and intellect are not other, nevertheless it belongs to the notion of will and of intellect that the processions which are according to the action of each have between themselves a certain order. For there is not a procession of love except in an order to the procession of the Word. For nothing can be loved by the will unless it be conceived in the intellect. Therefore, just as a certain order is considered of the Word to the principle from which it proceeds, although in the divine things the substance of the intellect and the conception of the intellect is the same, so, although in God will and intellect are the same, nevertheless because it belongs to the notion of love that it does not proceed except from the conception of the intellect, the procession of love has a distinction of order from the procession of the Word in the divine things.

Dubitatio circa Articulum. The conclusion is: In God there is another procession besides the generation of the Word; about the truth of which it is to be discussed more at large for us in the following disputations. Now, omitting other matters which Cajetan examines here, let it suffice to explain only the mode in which it is said by St. Thomas that the beloved is in the lover. Whether indeed the word of our intellection is the efficient principle of the operation of the will, which is the topic Cajetan treats here, will be more conveniently disputed below in the Prima Secundae, question 9, article 1.[3] Whether moreover the processions in God are distinguished by themselves or by something of theirs, and how, we shall treat in Disputation 148. Finally, whether by the love of the will something is produced in us, or rather the love itself is the very quality produced in the will, we shall say below, when the disputation shall have fallen upon the production of the word of our intellect.

There is therefore in this article the doubt which Cajetan proposes, whether the beloved is in the lover, or conversely. Aureolus, reported by Capreolus in 1, dist. 10, question 1, article 2, affirms that only the lover is in the beloved, not conversely. He proves it thus: because the affection of the will, which is love, is not a motion of the thing loved toward the lover, but of the lover toward the thing loved; therefore it is said rather that the lover is in the thing loved than conversely. And hence this mark of difference is wont to be assigned between will and intellect, that the intellect draws things to itself, because in itself it expresses their likeness; but the will tends to things: because the affection of love is not a likeness of the thing beloved, but a certain motion toward it; wherefore it is said to be drawn by it, and to be more where it loves than where it animates: as Matthew 6 says, "Where your treasure is, there is your heart also."

Yet with good reason the Blessed Thomas taught in this article, and in the Prima Secundae, article 2, and in Contra Gentiles book 4, chapter 19, whom Cajetan and Ferrariensis follow in the same places, together with the Bishop of Caiarien in this article, and Capreolus in 1, dist. 10, question 1, articles 1 and 2, that not only the beloved is in the lover, but also conversely. The Blessed Thomas explains in that question 23 a twofold mode by which the beloved is in the lover, and the lover in the beloved: for there is a certain mutual coupling and adhesion of power. One mode is according to apprehension, insofar as the beloved is present to the thought of the lover; but conversely the lover is in the thing beloved, insofar as he does not rest, content with a perfunctory consideration of the beloved, but thinks out and investigates the smallest details of the beloved, and strives with his intellect to penetrate into the interior of his friend. Hence when someone is full of thought, we are wont to say that his mind is elsewhere. The other mode is through affection: in this way it is said that the beloved is in the lover by a certain fittingness with him, just as the downward motion of a stone is said to be in gravity, as in a suitable inclination and principle of it, as St. Thomas noted in the same book 4 of the Contra Gentiles. But conversely the lover is said to be in the thing beloved through affection in a twofold way: first, through the love of concupiscence, insofar as he does not rest until he perfectly attains it and fully enjoys it; then through the love of friendship, because he reckons the goods or evils of a friend as his own. And since these modes of speaking follow a metaphor, let what has been said suffice for us, that in both modes we rightly assert both that the beloved is in the lover and conversely.

3. St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae I - II, q. 9, a. 1.

I answer to Aureolus's reasoning from the doctrine of Cajetan in this article, that the beloved is not said to be in the lover because it is drawn by him; for to be loved by someone is not to be drawn by him; but because it is in his affection as in a suitable inclination, which rather belongs to the affection of the thing beloved itself, as to an end. But the intellect is said rather to draw things to itself than to be moved toward them, because in itself it expresses their image, so as to make for itself, and behold, those that do not exist or are absent as if present; but the will is said to be drawn by things, because from the affection about things there is born in the lover a motion to have them, although sometimes he rests altogether in a simple complacency about them, as we said concerning God's will about possible things in Disputation 79, chapter 2.

Articulus IV - Whether the procession of love in the divine things is generation

Ad quartum sic proceditur. It seems that the procession of love in the divine things is generation. For what proceeds in the likeness of nature in living beings is called generated and being born. But that which Objicitur 1. It seems that the procession (processio) of love in the divine is generation (generatio). For that which proceeds in the likeness of nature in living things is called "begotten" and "being born." But that which proceeds in the divine by way of love proceeds in the likeness of nature; otherwise it would be extraneous to the divine nature, and thus it would be a procession ad extra. Therefore that which proceeds in the divine by way of love proceeds as begotten and being born.

Objicitur 2. Further, as likeness belongs to the notion of the word, so too it belongs to the notion of love. Hence it is said in Ecclesiasticus 13 that every animal loves its like. If therefore by reason of likeness it belongs to the word proceeding to be generated and to be born, it seems likewise to belong to love proceeding to be generated.

Objicitur 3. Further, there is nothing in a genus that is not in some species of it. If therefore in the divine there is a certain procession of love, it is necessary that, besides this common name, it have some specific name. But no other name can be given except generation. Therefore it seems that the procession of love in the divine is generation.

Sed contra: On this reasoning it would follow that the Holy Spirit, who proceeds as love, proceeds as begotten. But this is against that of Athanasius: "In his Symbol of faith, 'the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son is neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding.'"[4]

Respondetur: The procession of love in the divine ought not to be called generation. For the evidence of this, it must be known that this is the difference between intellect (intellectus) and will (voluntas), namely, that the intellect is in act by the fact that the thing understood is in the intellect according to its likeness. The will, however, is in act, not by the fact that some likeness of the willed object is in the will, but by the fact that the will has a certain inclination toward the thing willed. The procession, therefore, which is considered according to the notion of intellect, is according to the notion of likeness. And to that extent it can have the notion of generation, because every generator generates its like. But the procession which is considered according to the notion of will is not considered according to the notion of likeness, but rather according to the notion of an impulse and a movement toward something. And therefore that which proceeds in the divine by way of love does not proceed as begotten, or as son, but rather proceeds as Spirit; by which name a certain vital motion and impulse is designated: inasmuch as someone is said, from love, to be moved or impelled to do something.

Reply to the first: Whatever is in the divine is one with the divine nature. Hence, on the part of this unity, the proper notion of this procession or of that, by which one is distinguished from another, cannot be taken; rather it is necessary that the proper notion of this or that procession be taken according to the order of one procession to the other. Now such an order is considered according to the notion of will and of intellect. Hence, according to their proper notion, each procession in the divine receives a name which is imposed to signify the proper notion of the thing. And thence it is that the one proceeding by way of love both receives the divine nature and yet is not said to be born.

Reply to the second: Likeness pertains differently to the word and to love. For it pertains to the word insofar as the word itself is a certain likeness of the thing understood, as the begotten is a likeness of the generator. But it pertains to love, not that love itself be a likeness, but insofar as likeness is a principle of loving. Hence it does not follow that love is begotten, but that the begotten is the principle of love.

4. Athanasius, Symbolum fidei: "Spiritus sanctus a Patre, et Filio non factus, nec creatus, nec genitus, sed procedens."

Reply to the third: We are not able to name God except from creatures, as was said above.[5] And because in creatures the communication of nature is only through generation, the procession in the divine has no proper or specific name except that of generation. Hence the procession which is not generation has remained without a special name; but it can be named spiration, because it is the procession of spirit.

Conclusio est: The procession of love in God is not generation.

Articulus V - Whether there are more processions in the divine than two

Ad quintum sic proceditur. It seems that there are more processions in the divine than two. For, just as knowledge and will are attributed to God, so also is power. If therefore according to the intellect and according to the will two processions are taken in God, it seems that a third should be taken according to power

1. Further, goodness seems especially to be the principle of procession, since the good is said to be diffusive of itself. It seems therefore that according to goodness some procession ought to be taken in the divine.
2. Further, the power of fecundity is greater in God than in us. But in us there is not only one procession of word, but many: for from one word in us another word proceeds, and likewise from one love another love. Therefore also in God there are more processions than two.

But on the contrary: In God there are only two who proceed, namely, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Therefore there are there only two processions.

I answer: Processions in the divine can be taken only according to actions which remain in the agent. But such actions in an intellectual and divine nature are only two, namely, to understand and to will. For to sense, which even seems to be an operation in the one sensing, is outside the intellectual nature; nor is it entirely removed from the kind of actions which are ad extra. For sensing is perfected by the action of the sensible upon the sense. It remains therefore that no other procession can be in God, except that of word and of love.

Reply to the first: Power is a principle of acting upon another; wherefore, according to power, action ad extra is taken. And thus, according to the attribute of power, the procession of a divine person is not taken, but only the procession of creatures.

Reply to the second: The good (as Boethius says in the book De Hebdomadibus) pertains to essence and not to operation, unless perhaps as the object of the will. Hence, since the divine processions must be taken according to certain actions, they are taken according to goodness and suchlike other attributes, yet no other processions are taken except of word and of love, according as God understands and loves his own essence, truth, and goodness.[6]

5. "We cannot name God except from creatures": cf. above, Q. 13, art. 1.
6. Boethius, De Hebdomadibus.

Reply to the third: God by one simple act understands all things, and likewise wills all things. Hence in him there cannot be a procession of word from word, nor of love from love; but in him there is only one perfect word, and one perfect love. And in this his fecundity is manifested.

Summa totius quaestionis. Conclusio est: There is no other procession in God than that of word and of love. Therefore the sum of this whole question is that God is so one in essence, that within himself he produces the Son and love, that is, the Holy Spirit, of altogether the same nature, yet distinct in persons; nor are more sons, or spirits, or persons produced by God; and hence there are in God only three persons distinct by production, but undivided in essence: which Catholic doctrine must be examined by us more deeply in some disputations.

Disputatio CVIII - Whether there are more persons in the Deity

An plures sint in deitate persona. Disput. 108.

Various heretics attack the Trinity of persons. cap. 1.

From the Old Testament and the testimony of the Rabbis the plurality of persons in the divine nature is established. cap. 2.

The Trinity of persons against the Jews is shown from the Tetragrammaton. cap. 3.

The same against the heretics is demonstrated from the Old and New Testament. cap. 4.

Caput I - Various heretics attack the Trinity of persons

Although concerning the mode of procession of the persons and about the property of each one we shall in particular say many things later, nevertheless, before all else it is necessary to explain the number of them and their nature, and to establish it with certain faith: since indeed St. Thomas in this question determines both the number of persons and of processions. Now the number, about which at present there is controversy for us, besides the Jews, innumerable heretics also expressly denied, asserting that there is one God in such a way that not only is his essence one, but also his person. The first author of this error, according to Epiphanius in heresy 57, was Noetus, a certain Asiatic from the city of Ephesus, whence they are also called Noetians.[7] Whom, the same Epiphanius asserts, lived before his own times one hundred and thirty years, more or less. But much more ancient than Noetus, Praxeas seems to have taught the same error, as is gathered from Tertullian, in the book On Prescriptions against the Heretics, the last chapter, in the final words: "After all these, too, one Praxeas introduced a heresy, which Victorinus took care to strengthen."[8] This man says that God the Father Almighty is Jesus Christ, and that he himself was crucified, suffered, and moreover died; further, with profane and sacrilegious rashness he proposes that he himself sits at his own right hand. The same Tertullian writes this in the book against this very Praxeas, chapter one, at the beginning.[9] From which it is clear that the Patripassian heresy, which is commonly attributed to Sabellius, is much more ancient than he. Since therefore Praxeas, just as Sabellius (of whom later), says that the almighty Father was incarnate; together with that same Sabellius he plainly confounds the Trinity of persons into one; wherefore Tertullian, in the book against him, straightaway from the beginning strives to prove the Trinity of persons in one nature.[9] This Praxeas was the first who, according to Tertullian, brought this heresy from Asia into Rome.[9]

7. Epiphanius, Panarion (Haereses), haer. 57.
8. Tertullian, De praescriptionibus adversus haereticos, cap. ult.
9. Tertullian, Adversus Praxean, cap. 1.

In favor of this opinion St. Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter 41, reports the Hermogenians, from Hermogenes; just as also the Praxeans from Praxeas: but with no one else among the more ancient have I read that Hermogenes was of this opinion.[10] Before the times also of Tertullian there were in the same error certain Montanists, in Greek now called Kataphrygians, whose authors, as Eusebius affirms, book 5 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapters 14 and 18, were Montanus, and Priscilla, and Maximilla: and from the Phrygian people they took their name; and as Philastrius testifies, the same people are also called Donatians, from a certain Donatus, who throughout Africa sowed the same heresy: they are also called, as Epiphanius notes, heresy 48, Tascodrugitae.[11] Yet the ancient Fathers seem to have taught the contrary about these Montanists; for Epiphanius not only does not ascribe this error to the Montanists, but also, in the cited heresy, thus says about them: "Concerning the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, they think similarly, as the sound Catholic Church."[11] Wherefore Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter 26, does not number this among the errors of the Montanists; but on the contrary Jerome, in the Epistle to Marcella against Montanus, which is 54, thus writes about the same: "They narrow the Trinity into the straits of one person."[12][13] But Nicephorus, book 4 of the History, chapter 22, seems with a few words to have settled this dispute: "Montanus," he says, "concerning the divine Trinity and the creation of the world, taught the same as we do; some, however, of his followers afterwards were of the opinion that the three substances of the divinity are one." Therefore, although Montanus himself thought rightly concerning the Trinity;[14]

- From the Old Testament and the testimony of the Rabbis the plurality of persons in the divine nature is established. Caput II.
- The Trinity of persons against the Jews is shown from the Tetragrammaton. Caput III.
- The same against the heretics is demonstrated from the Old and the New Testament. Caput IV.

Various heretics attack the Trinity of persons

Although below we shall say many things in detail about the mode of the processions of the persons (processio personarum), and specifically about the property (proprietas) of each, nevertheless before all else it is necessary to explain the number of them and their nature and to set

9. Tertullian, Adversus Praxean, cap. 1.
9. Tertullian, Adversus Praxean, cap. 1.
10. St. Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 41.
11. Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica, V, c. 14, 18; Philastrius; Epiphanius, Haer. 48.
11. Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica, V, c. 14, 18; Philastrius; Epiphanius, Haer. 48.
12. St. Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 26.

it with certain faith; since indeed the Blessed Thomas, in this question, both determines the number of persons and defines the processions.[15] Now as to the number, about which the present controversy is for us, not only all the Jews but also innumerable heretics expressly denied it, asserting that there is one God in such a way that not only is there one essence (essentia) of his, but also one person. The first author of this error, as Epiphanius witnesses in Heresy 57, was Noetus, a certain Asiatic from the city of Ephesus, whence they were called Noetians. The same Epiphanius also asserts that Noetus lived one hundred and thirty years, more or less, before his own time.[16]

Yet Praxeas, much older than Noetus, seems to have taught the same error, as is gathered from Tertullian in the book On Prescriptions against Heretics, in the last chapter, in the last words. After these, Praxeas the heretic took care to strengthen the Patripassian heresy; in the beginning of the book Against Praxeas Tertullian writes the same, from which it is clear that (as would afterwards be said of Sabellius) he confounded the Trinity of persons into one, namely that the Father almighty was incarnate, suffered, and died: besides this, he impiously and sacrilegiously writes in the book against Praxeas that the same Christ crucified and having suffered he sets forth as if sitting at his own right hand with propriety. The same thing is in the first chapter of Against Praxeas; from which it is clear that Patripassianism was his heresy; thus also Sabellius (about whom below) confounded the whole mystery of the Trinity.[17]

When therefore Praxeas, straightway from the beginning, introduced among the Romans this doctrine about one person in one nature, Tertullian thereupon says that Praxeas, a man from Asia, brought this heresy from that region to Rome; with this opinion also, as St. Augustine reports in the book On Heresies, they joined Hermogenes; just as also the Praxeans: but in another author I have read it as Hermotimus. Before the times of Praxeas there were also the Montanists, called in Greek Kata-Phryges, whose authors were Montanus, and Priscilla and Maximilla by name; and they were from the Phrygian people, as Eusebius relates. Likewise also there were the Donatists from a certain Donatus, who sowed the heresy; they were called by that name, as Epiphanius notes in Heresy 48. Yet the ancient Fathers taught contrary to the Montanists; nor does Epiphanius ascribe this very error to the Montanists; instead he writes of them thus.[18]

After Sabellius, the same error was adhered to by Paul of Samosata, as Epiphanius testifies in Heresy 65, and Nicephorus in Ecclesiastical History, book 6, chapter 27; who (as Epiphanius says) after he was elected Bishop of Antioch fell into heresy; then Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium, of whom Epiphanius makes mention in Heresy 71; and since both Catholics and Arians bore with difficulty his error, because he altogether denied the Trinity of persons, they obtained from the Emperor Constantius that the Council of Sirmium be convoked, in which the bishops, wishing to condemn Photinus, adhered to the Arian heresy, as we shall say below. Besides these, Priscillian, Bishop of 13. St. Jerome, Epistola ad Marcellam contra Montanum, ep. 54.

14. Nicephorus, Historia, IV, c. 22.
15. St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae I - II, q. 9, a. 1.
16. Epiphanius, Panarion (Haer. 57).
17. Tertullian, De praescriptione haereticorum, cap. ult.; Tertullian, Adversus Praxean, cap. 1.
18. Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica V, 14, 18; Epiphanius, Panarion (Haer. 48); Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 41; Nicephorus, Historia ecclesiastica IV, 22.

Avila, followed them, as is in Pope Leo the First, Epistle 93 (elsewhere 91) to Turibius; who therefore by episcopal judgment in a council was condemned. Moreover, as Sander relates in book 7 of the Monarchy of the Visible Church, heresy 228, and as Prateolus too notes under the word "Deistae," in the time of Pius IV, under the year 1564, there arose the Deists, or Trinitarians, who, although they confessed three hypostases, denied three persons, understanding God knows what by subsistence (subsistentia). Finally, as the same Sander reports in Heresy 227, Servetus, a Spaniard by nation, when crossing over into Africa learned the Koran, and plainly agreed with the Mohammedans and the Jews, affirming only one person in the divine nature; he was followed by George Blandrata and Francis David.[19]

About the Father and the Son, however, they thought differently, as St. Augustine testifies; whence Augustine also wrote against Marcellus, and Nicephorus, book 4 of Ecclesiastical History, recounts in a few words this dispute. "Montanus," he says, "about the creation of the world taught the same as we do: nevertheless some of his followers afterwards opined that the three substances of the divinity are one." Wherefore, even if Montanus himself had thought rightly about the Trinity, some of his disciples later judged that there are three "divinities."[20]

Caput II - From the Old Testament and the testimony of the Rabbis, a plurality of persons in the divine nature is established

Before we draw out against the heretics the Trinity of persons from the New Scriptures, there is need to prove the same mystery against the Jews, who have faith only in the Old Testament, and to convince them by the testimonies of their own Rabbis. It is first established from Abulensis in his little work on the Trinity, and from Nicholas of Lyra in the little work against the Jews which is found in the Gloss on the Ordinaria: although this mystery of the Trinity cannot be so shown from the Old Testament that we might refute deniers with manifest contradiction, nevertheless there are some testimonies which, if we follow an exposition more in accord with reason and also not unknown to the ancient Rabbis, preach not obscurely this mystery of the Trinity, or at least a plurality of persons. Epiphanius, not ignorant of this matter, in the book Ancoratus speaks thus: "The one Godhead was chiefly announced by Moses; the duality of persons was very earnestly proclaimed by the prophets; but the Trinity of persons was made manifest in the Gospels." Add that there are certain places of the Old Testament explained in the New, by which we may certainly prove to Catholics and even to heretics, who believe in the New Testament, the Trinity or at least some person of it: those we shall later enumerate in chapter 4.[21]

Therefore let us now bring forward the testimonies of the Old Testament against the Jews. First, proof is commonly taken from that passage of Genesis 1, from "In the beginning God created" up to that, "and the Spirit of the Lord was borne upon the waters": from here they gather the mystery of the Trinity, Augustine in the book On Genesis to the Letter, in the incomplete first chapter, Origen, and Rupert on that place: namely, that "in the beginning" is the same as "in the Son," or "in the Word," which is the second person; but that the Spirit of the Lord, who was borne upon the waters, is the third person in the Trinity, whom we call the Spirit; and this exposition is favored by Rabbi Eleazar on that place, as Marsilius Ficino reports, book On the Christian Religion, chapter 34; for interpreting that place he said, "The world was not created except through the Word, or with the Word," as it is held in Psalm 32, "By the Word of the Lord the heavens were established." Jerome, in the Questions on Genesis, says thus on "in the beginning": "Many thought, as is written in the change of the language, and the Papists too so have it written; and Tertullian in the book against Praxeas disputes, and likewise Hilary in the exposition of a certain Psalm affirms, that in Hebrew it is written, 'In the Son God made heaven and earth,' which, if it were so, the persons of the Father and of the Son would be gathered openly from it." But in Hebrew it is not thus, as Jerome rightly observes; it is said Bere'shith, which word signifies beginning or head only among the Hebrews, and in no way the Son. Wherefore all translate either "in the beginning," as the Vulgate and the Seventy, Symmachus, and Theodotion; or "in the head," "in the chapter," as Aquila: although Hilary in Psalm 2 says a little from the beginning that Bere'shith signifies three things among the Hebrews: in the beginning, in the head, in the Son. Tertullian, indeed, whom Jerome also mentions, reports in the book against Praxeas, chapter 5, that some say that in Hebrew Genesis begins thus, "In the beginning God made for himself the Son," whose opinion he himself does not approve: for it is a mere figment. Nevertheless Jerome teaches that by that phrase, "in the beginning," the Son can be denoted; not because the word itself signifies the Son, but because of the incarnate Son that sentence of Psalm 39 is said, "In the head of the book it is written of me."

19. Sanderus, De visibili monarchia, lib. 7, haer. 227 - 228; Prateolus, De haeresibus, verbo "Deistae"; Leo I, Ep. 93 (alias 91) ad Turibium; on Servetus and his followers: Sanderus, loc. cit.

20. Nicephorus, Historia ecclesiastica IV, 22.

21. Epiphanius, Ancoratus: "Una Deitas a Moyse..."; see also Nicholas of Lyra, Opusculum contra Iudaeos, in Glossa ordinaria.

But from the aforesaid testimony, all things weighed, I do not see that the mystery of the Trinity is proved, because the word Bere'shith in no way signifies the Son, as Jerome noted against Hilary, but beginning or head, which is the same; and there it denotes the beginning of time, as Jerome says; and Tertullian in the book against Hermogenes, chapter 19, and many others. Then too, that sentence of Psalm 39, "in the head of the book," is not rightly referred to the beginning of Genesis, but either to the beginning of the Book of Psalms, when it is said in the first Psalm, "but his will is in the law of the Lord," as Augustine and Rufinus teach; for straightway in that same Psalm 39 is subjoined, "that I might do your will, O my God; and your law in the midst of my heart"; as if he were saying, "at the beginning of this Book of Psalms it is written of me, that I should do your will." Or, as Augustine, Eugubinus, Curtius, and more recent authors explain, "in the head of the book," that is, in the volume of the law, it is written of me; because there the divine precepts were handed down, that I should do your will by keeping them. And in Hebrew it is said "in the volume." Now a volume is the same as the whole law. For the Hebrews, nay even the Gentiles of old, used to write on parchments which were rolled up; and the Greeks use our word kephalaion, which the Seventy employ, not only to signify the upper part which is called "head," but also the sum and recapitulation. Wherefore "head" there signifies the sum of the whole law, which was ordered to this, that he should "do the will," etc. Besides, that "in the beginning" in Genesis 1 signifies the beginning of duration is taught, besides Jerome and Tertullian cited, by Ambrose, book 1 of Hexameron, chapters 3 and 4, St. Gregory of Nyssa also in the same work Hexameron, Basil, homily 1 on Hexameron, Athanasius in the oration on that, "All things have been delivered to me by my Father," Chrysostom, homily 2 on Genesis.[22]

Add that the name "spirit," when it is said, "and the Spirit of the Lord was borne upon the waters," much better denotes the air there, as Theodore on question 8 on Genesis and Tertullian in the book against Hermogenes, chapters 31 and 32, explain. For it is called "spirit of the Lord" either because it is a great thing, as "the mind of God" is also called; or because it is moved and impelled by God. Others explain it of the fecundity which God imparted to the waters. Wherefore from that place I do not see how the Trinity is gathered.

Second, the same testimony of Genesis 1, "In the beginning God created," is wont to be brought forward, but for another reason: namely because the Latin word "God" in Hebrew is Elohim in the plural number, whose singular is Eloah; as if in Latin it were said, "created the gods." For the name of God in the plural, joined with a verb of the singular number, is not without mystery: to wit, that Moses might signify the Trinity of persons by the plural name of God, and the unity of essence by the singular verb.

This testimony the Master in I, dist. 2, uses; later Nicholas of Lyra followed him in the places cited, Paul of Burgos in the places cited, Peter Galatinus, book 2 On the Arcana of the Catholic Truth, Cajetan too in the same place upon Genesis, and the like; and of the Rabbis Lyra himself leads forth a witness, Rabbi Huna, who in great price is had among the Hebrews; he said, "Unless by these very letters [of Elohim] the world were created, it would not be created." This is what he says. But Cajetan, whom a little before he cites, without foundation, reproves Catherinus, and with him some more recent writers, who teach that from a similar phrase of Scripture no efficacious argument can be drawn for the Trinity; because it is usual among the Hebrews to use the plural for the singular, and to conjoin a plural noun with a verb of the singular number; indeed even the very name Elohim, Exodus 20, "You shall not have strange gods," in Hebrew is, "There shall not be to you a god other," for "there shall be strange gods," or "there shall be a strange god"; which is the same thing. Therefore the name Elohim joined to a verb of the singular number is empty of mystery, the Hebrew phraseology alone being retained.

Objicitur: They prove this contrary opinion thus: because otherwise it would be permitted even in Latin, for the sake of signifying the mystery of the Trinity, to say, "created the gods," and to call the three divine persons three gods.

Respondetur: But someone could answer that it is not customary among the Latins to signify the divine persons by the name "God," but the nature. Therefore, against Lyra and the opinion of others, let that single argument suffice, namely that it is common among the Hebrews to use the plural for the singular, and to join a plural noun with a singular verb. Therefore from this place of Scripture an efficacious argument for the Trinity cannot be drawn; since it is usual among the Hebrews to use the plural for the singular. Genesis 24: "He placed the hand under the thigh of 22. Jerome, Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim; Tertullian, Adversus Hermogenem, cap. 19; Ambrose, Hexaemeron I, c. 3 - 4; St. Gregory of Nyssa, Hexaemeron; St. Basil, Homilia I in Hexaemeron; Athanasius, Oratio; St. John Chrysostom, Hom. II in Genesim.

Abraham his lord": in Hebrew it is Adonav, "of his lords," in the plural. Exodus 21: "If his lord shall have given him a wife": in Hebrew it is in the same way "his lords." 1 Kings 28: "I saw gods ascending out of the earth"; and yet straightway he asked concerning Samuel alone, whom he alone wished to be raised: "What is his form?" For this is no less from that foundation, than what the Rabbis commonly assert, namely that with Samuel Moses too ascended, a witness of his cause. Nor is it only the custom among the Hebrews to use the plural for the singular: but also to conjoin a plural noun with a verb of the singular number: indeed even the very name Elohim, Exodus 20, "You shall not have strange gods," in Hebrew is, "There shall not be to you a god other," which is the same. Therefore the name Elohim joined to a singular verb is empty of the mystery; the Hebrew phrase alone remaining.

Third, a testimony is taken from Genesis 1: "Let us make man to our image and likeness"; which, on account of the plural number joined with "let us make" and "our," they urge, and about which, since the authority of the Fathers contends, there is no dispute. From this place they gather this mystery, Origen, Basil, and Chrysostom on that place, Ambrose also; and in the book On the Dignity of the Human Condition...

Second, the same testimony from Genesis 1 is wont to be adduced, namely because the Latin word "God" answers to the Hebrew Elohim in the plural number, whose singular is Eloah; so that, as if one were speaking Latin, it would read: "In the beginning God created," that is, "the gods created." For the name of God in the plural joined to a verb in the singular is not without mystery: namely, that Moses might signify the Trinity of persons by the plural name of God, and the unity of essence (essentia) by the singular verb. The Master uses this testimony.[23] After him Nicholas of Lyra, Paul of Burgos in the places cited, Peter Galatinus in book 2 De arcanis, chapter 9, and Catherinus in book 4 against Cajetan; and from a lesser presupposition Onkelos upon Genesis 20 also confirms it, as do Peter Galatinus and Lyra, out of an exposition on Genesis of great price among the Rabbis, where Rabbi Huna is reported to have said: "If this sermon had not been written, it would not have been permitted to say, 'created Elohim,' that is, 'the gods.'"

But Cajetan, whom Catherinus sharply yet groundlessly censures, and with him other recent authors rightly teach that from a like phrase of Scripture no efficacious argument for the Trinity can be drawn, because it is customary among the Hebrews to use the plural for the singular. Genesis 24: "He put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his lord": in Hebrew it is Adonim, "his lords." Exodus 21: "If his lord shall have given him a wife": in Hebrew it is likewise "his lords." 1 Kings 28: "I saw the Lord ascending from the earth": in Hebrew Elohim - "lords," or "gods - ascending"; and forthwith it is subjoined: "What is his form?" In vain does Lyra contrive a response to this latter testimony by feigning that a demon ascended along with Samuel, and therefore that the pythoness said, "I saw lords ascending from the earth," whereas she desired to consult Samuel alone, whom alone it is said to have been permitted to be raised up; for what is "his form"? This indeed denotes one person. Nor is there any better foundation than that which they commonly assert, namely that other persons ascended on account of that cause. Nor only is it that the 23. The Master (Peter Lombard), Sentences, I, dist. 2.

Hebrews use the plural for the singular, and a verb of the plural number is sometimes joined to a singular noun; nay, the very name Elohim, Exodus 20, "Thou shalt not have gods alien to me," that is, "There shall not be to thee a God alien," - how, then, can the Trinity be gathered from that?

Therefore the name Elohim in the plural number joined with a singular verb is void of mystery; it is the Hebrew phrase alone. Nevertheless some assumed hence that it would be permitted also in Latin, for the sake of signifying persons of the Godhead, to say "gods" in the plural for the three divine persons, to say "created the gods," and to call the divine persons "gods." But others reply that among Latins it is not customary to signify the divine persons by the plural "gods"; and so, against Lyra and the others, that single argument suffices, namely that it is common among the Hebrews that the plural stand for the singular, and that the plural verb be taken for the singular. Thus 2 Kings 7 in that place it is said: "And what nation is there, as is the people Israel, for whom God went" - in Hebrew it reads: Haleka Elohim, "the gods went," for "God went."

The third testimony is from Genesis 1: "Let us make man to our image and likeness," which, on account of the Fathers' authority, ought not to be contested. From this Origen, Basil, St. John Chrysostom on that place, Ambrose there, and in the book On the Dignity of the Human Condition, Athanasius, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Augustine in the imperfect work On Genesis to the Letter on that place and City of God 16.6, Cyril in book 1 against Julian, Theodoret, question 19 on Genesis, and Rupert, book 2 on Genesis, chapter 4, conclude this mystery; Athanasius in the oration against the Greeks, Hilary in book 5 On the Trinity, Tertullian in Against Praxeas, chapter 16, and Epiphanius in the Anchoratus. For they contend that those words were not spoken for the sake of majesty and authority alone, as princes are wont to speak. For - so say Basil and Theodoret - what wise craftsman, his tools alone being present and no colleague accompanying him, would say: "Let us make a knife," etc.? Peter Galatinus, book 2 De arcanis, chapter 9 near the end, confirms this interpretation from the Midrash Coheleth in the exposition of Ecclesiastes 2 on those words: "What is a man, that he should follow his king, his maker." For in the Hebrew it stands: "his king, who made him (plural: 'who made')." Therefore that exposition runs thus: "After the king - namely the king of other kings, the holy and blessed God - then wilt thou be able to stand." And he teaches by this saying, which is not written "who made him," but "who made (pl.) him," that, since in the Law it is written, one can say: "For the holy and blessed God, and the house of his judgment, made him." Yet if from this you infer that there are two principles, it does not follow; had it not already been said in Deuteronomy 32: "He made and fashioned or prepared thee"? Up to here the exposition. About this Galatinus notes three things. First, that with the singular noun "king" a plural verb "made" is joined: because when God was making man, he spoke in the plural, "Let us make." For which cause also he thinks Psalm 149 reads, "Let Israel rejoice in him that made him"; in the Hebrew, "in his makers." And Isaiah 54: "Thy rulers" - in Hebrew, "thy makers" - "the name of the Lord of hosts." Where the Tetragrammaton, יהוה, is set down. But perhaps by a Hebrew phrase this was said, as we noted in the former testimony. Second, he notes that the holy and blessed God and the "house of his judgment" concurred to the making of man, that is, the one God who is called holy and blessed, and the Three who are called "the house of his judgment." For "the house of judgment," among the Hebrews, was so called when at least three convened for judgment.

Third, he notes that there are not therefore multiple principles - as that exposition most aptly said - from the fact that the divine counsel of God concurred to the making of man; because in the Trinity there is one nature and the power of principle.

The fourth testimony is Genesis 19: "The Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven." From which place they gather a plurality of persons - Ignatius in the Epistle to the Antiochenes, Justin in the Dialogue with Trypho, long before our age, of which more in the following disputation; Athanasius in the oration against the Greeks; Hilary; Tertullian, book Against Praxeas, chapter 16; Epiphanius in the Anchoratus; Rupert, book 6 on Genesis, chapter 11, in the fire. The Hebrew text also favors: יהוה מאת יהוה, Ichoun Mehet Iehona; because when in both places the ineffable Name is put, which is wont to be applied to God alone, and it is said "the Lord from the Lord," it openly denotes "God from God," which cannot be understood without a multiplication of persons. Favoring also, as Galatinus notes, is what Rabbi Eleazar teaches in the exposition of this place: namely, that wherever in Scripture the ineffable name of God is put, there is always to be understood God and the house of his judgment, as we noted in the preceding testimony.[24] And indeed the Council of Sirmium in canons 13, 16, and 17 anathematizes those who say that in Genesis 1 when Scripture says "Let us make man," the Father spoke to himself and not to the Son and the Holy Spirit; and those who deny that in Genesis 19, when it is said, "The Lord rained from the Lord," it must be understood of the Son and the Father.[25] But the authority of this Council is none, since in many things it is found Arian and it was not legitimately assembled, as we shall say in its place; about which Hilary, in the book On the Synods, Socrates, book 2, chapter 27 of the History, and Nicephorus, book 9, chapters 31, 37, and 38 say much.[26] Dionysius the Carthusian, however, replies that by "the Lord," who is said to "rain from the Lord," there is understood an Angel who sustained the person of God and whom he called "Lord," because "as a Lord" he appeared among the other three. But this exposition does not square with the text, because as we noted, the ineffable name of God is put in both places, which can agree only to the true God. Vatablus, on that place, thinks it is a Hebraism, so that by "The Lord rained from the Lord" there is understood "he rained from himself"; but it is not right that, because of a testimony similar to which the Fathers use, we should so easily elude it, although you need not doubt that a like mode of speaking, according to the Hebrew phrase, is found in Scripture.

Fifth, Galatinus proves from Deuteronomy 6: "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God, the Lord is one." For in Hebrew, in place of that word "Lord," is the ineffable Name: so that by a certain repetition both the Trinity and the unity are insinuated; nor indeed does it seem to be put superfluously, since the ancient Rabbis, whom Galatinus reports, gather the Trinity thence. Rabbi Simeon ben Jochai in the book Zoar thus says: "Hear, O Israel: Rabbi Ibba said: here, O Israel, 'the Ancient,' יהוה, Iehovah, that is, God, who is the beginning of all things, the Ancient of ancients, the root's shoot, and the perfection of all things - and he is called Father; 'our God,' Elohenu, that is, our God, the depth of rivers and the fount of knowledges which proceed from him - and he is called

24. Galatinus, De arcanis, lib. 2, cap. 9 in fine; Rabbi Eleazar in the exposition of this place.
25. Council of Sirmium, canons 13, 16, 17.
26. Hilary, De synodis; Socrates, Historia ecclesiastica II, 27; Nicephorus, Historia ecclesiastica IX, 31, 37 - 38.

Son; 'יהוה,' Iehovah, that is, God - this is the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the two, and he is called the measure of the voice - he is one, that he may conclude and gather up the one with the other. Nor indeed can one be divided from the other." Rabbi Simeon ben Jochai moreover says: "This secret of the sons of Rimon and the first will be revealed to each, until the Messiah shall have come." Something similar is that testimony of Psalm 67: "May God bless us, our God." By which words is signified the Father, "our God," by which is denoted the Son, who, on account of the economy, is in a peculiar way called "ours": "May God bless us," by which the Holy Spirit is insinuated. And that of Isaiah 6: "Holy, holy, holy, the Lord God of hosts." On which thus writes Rabbi Simeon: "Holy - this is the Father; holy - this is the Son; holy - this is the Holy Spirit." Something similar says Rabbi Jonathan ben Uzziel. Of all which testimonies hitherto alleged by us Galatinus reports that he has read them in their most ancient codices; though in those which we now use they have been expunged by the perfidious Rabbis of this age. And certainly we ought not to think that without a great counsel of God similar words were inserted; for which cause also - as Galatinus affirms - the ancient Talmudists ordained that by each of the Jews at least twice in a day, morning and evening, they should be recited; under which they asserted that some secret, to be revealed in the time of the Messiah, lay hidden. For the sake also of this mystery the Trisagion has been set among solemn prayers in the Greek Church: "Holy God, Holy Strong, Holy Immortal, have mercy on us"; of which Felix the Pope makes mention in the Epistle to the Emperor Zeno, and John of Damascus in the Epistle on the Trisagion, chapter 6, and other Fathers.[27]

The sixth testimony is Zachariah 2: "Rejoice and be glad, daughter of Zion: for behold I am coming and I will dwell in your midst, says the Lord. And many nations shall apply themselves to the Lord in that day; and you shall know that the Lord of hosts has sent me to you." The Chaldaean version has thus: "Behold I will be revealed, and I will place the divinity in the midst: it is God; and many peoples shall apply themselves to the people in that time; and they shall be before me for a people; and I will place my divinity in your midst; and you shall know that the God of hosts has sent me to prophesy to you." Where, since the ineffable name of God is put in both places, it is clear that there is speech of God sending and of God sent; but mission necessarily posits two persons, as we shall show clearly in disputation 170.

The seventh testimony is what Galatinus reports, book 2, chapter 3, from Isaiah chapter 48: "Not from the beginning have I spoken in secret; from the time before they were done I was there; and now the Lord God has sent me and his Spirit." Which Galatinus explains more at large and contends that there God sent is speaking from God sending. For he proves that those words do not fit the Prophet himself, because he himself was not there before those things were done. But Adamus and certain more recent authors maintain that they can be understood of the Prophet himself, that he was present in spirit and in mind to those things which he foretold to the people before they were done. And let this suffice against the Jews from the Old Testament alone. For other testimonies of the same kind which in the New are brought forward and explained we shall bring in chapter 4 against the heretics; I pass over other things which Galatinus handles, book 2, chapters 5 and 10, and book 3, chapters 3, 4, 5, and 6; for it is not necessary to pursue each one.

27. Felix, Epistola ad Zenonem imperatorem; St. John Damascene, Epistola de Trisagio, cap. 6.

Caput III - The Trinity of Persons against the Jews is shown from the Tetragrammaton

Not only by the testimonies of Scripture and of the ancient Rabbis, but also from the ineffable name of God, יהוה, Iehovah, which Scripture employs everywhere, according to the sense of the ancient Rabbis, Galatinus, book 2, strongly proves the mystery of the Trinity, matters concerning the mode of writing and pronouncing this name - which we have more at large delivered above in disputation 59, chapters 2 and 3. Rabbenus Haccados, as Galatinus testifies, book 2, chapter 10, writing the mysteries of this name to Antonius, a citizen of Rome, signifies God generating and generated; for there cannot be a generator without a generated, nor generation without one generated, and, conversely, out of the same, love proceeding. He says that this name is called "of twelve letters," which in the Latin tongue signifies "Father God, Son God, Holy Spirit"; and "of forty-two letters," which in our tongue sounds: "Father God, Son God, Holy Spirit, God, Trinity in unity, and unity in Trinity." This is the sentence of Rabbenus Haccados, that is, of "our holy master." Yet each name by which that ineffable name is expounded is not one only, but several together. The first, of twelve letters, is "Ab, Ben, Ruah," that is, "Father, Son, Spirit," or "Ab, El, Ben, Ruah Kados," that is, "Father holy, Son holy, Spirit holy." The name also of forty-two letters is similar; it is not one only, as may be seen in Galatinus. But even the letters with which the ineffable name is written signify, as it were, the hinge of the Trinity, as Theodorus very well observed, book 2 Ad Graecos. And by a very efficacious argument for us are the Rabbis whom we have alleged, who before the advent of Christ so clearly and manifestly proclaimed the Trinity of persons marked by their proper names.

Caput IV - The same is shown against the heretics from the Old and New Testaments

We shall adduce some testimonies of the Old Testament which, since they are in the New already explained against the heretics, who abuse either, have especial force; therefore by them, and by others of the same kind from the New Testament, the Trinity, or plurality of persons, is to be proved in this chapter.

The first testimony is from Psalm 44: "Thy throne, O God, for ever and ever; the scepter of rectitude is the scepter of thy kingdom. Thou hast loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore hath God, thy God, anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Which Paul rightly uses, Hebrews 1, to prove the divinity of the Son.

Now each name by which that ineffable name is expounded is not one only, but several together. The first is of twelve letters: Ab, that is, Father; Ben, that is, Son; Veruach hakodesh, that is, Holy Spirit. The name also of forty-two letters likewise is not one only, as may be seen in Galatinus.[28] But even the letters by which the ineffable name is written signify the same Trinity, as Galatinus has very well observed. For the first letter is iod, which signifies beginning; it seems properly to agree to the Father, for it is the beginning from which the other letters seem to draw their origin. The second is be, which denotes to be and to live, appropriated to the Son: for all things were made through him. The third is vaph, which signifies bond; for it is the copulative conjunction, which is the property of the Holy Spirit. In the fourth place there is set another, he, because, whereas the Son has a twofold reference, one to the Father, the other to the Holy Spirit, by that he repeated twice, the Son with his double reference is signified. Moreover, among the Chaldaeans it is established from the ancient codices of the Rabbins that the ineffable name of God was written so as to denote the same Trinity: it used to be written also with a threefold subscript under a circle in this way; since iod signifies beginning, and the whole Trinity is one beginning of things outside itself in one essence and nature: the Trinity of persons is shown by the triple iod, but the unity of essence by the single vowel kametz.

28. Petrus Galatinus, De arcanis catholicae veritatis, lib. 2, cap. 9.

These things, indeed, which we have adduced from the Old Testament against the Jews, although they are more open, are not so perspicuous as those which are handed on in the Gospel, from which against the heretics we must immediately dispute. Yet they are sufficiently efficacious against them - unless they had been hardened in their own perfidy - in whom, if a ray of light had shone so that they might recognize other mysteries of our faith, they would easily persuade themselves that to their fathers the plurality of persons had in some manner been indicated; not so openly as to Christians: because for the time it thus was expedient, as Theodoret most excellently observed in book 2 To the Greeks.[29] And strong argument for us are the Rabbins whom we have cited, who before the advent of Christ so clearly and manifestly preached the Trinity of persons marked by their proper names.

Some testimonies from the Old and New Testaments

There remain some testimonies of the Old Testament from Psalm 44, which, since they have now been explained in the New, have especial force against the heretics who give credence to both. From these therefore, and from others of the same sort in the New Testament, the Trinity, or most broadly the plurality of persons, is in this chapter to be proved.

The first testimony is Psalm 44: "Thy throne, O God, for ever and ever; the scepter of rectitude is the scepter of thy kingdom. Thou hast loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore hath God, thy God, anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Which Paul rightly uses, Hebrews 1, to prove the divinity of the Son; for the Psalmist speaks with God, whose kingdom is to remain forever: and when he says that he himself has been anointed by his God, he clearly indicates that he is God who is anointed, and God who anoints. And although God according to the divine nature could not be anointed by God, nevertheless the Son, who is truly God, could according to the human nature be anointed by his God, that is, by the Father. Now the whole Psalm is to be understood of the nuptials of Christ with the Church - not of the nuptials of Solomon with the daughter of Pharaoh, or of Ahasuerus with Esther - without any doubt: or at least many things are said in that Psalm which can be fitting to Christ alone: such as are the words just cited.

29. Theodoret, Ad Graecos, lib. 2.

The second is in Psalm 109: "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand," which Christ adduces in Matthew 22 to prove his divinity. And, as the Evangelist bears witness, it was so efficacious against the Jews to whom Christ was speaking, that they could not answer him a word; nor was anyone bold any more to ask him further anything. There, however, the plurality of persons is manifestly shown: for "the Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand"; which, unless there were a distinction of persons, could not conveniently be understood.

The third is Psalm 2: "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee"; which Paul adduces at Hebrews 1. Nor do I think that Paul uses that part of the testimony, "this day have I begotten thee," to prove the eternal generation of the Son, as above in disputation 18, chapter 2, I have abundantly proved; but he urges only the particle, "Son," to prove that Christ was the true Son of God: whence no less rightly is gathered the plurality of persons. For where there is a son, there is also a father: nor can the same person be both father and son of himself. There is added that in the same Psalm it is said, "Embrace discipline." For in Hebrew it reads, "Kiss the son," which we have shown to be altogether the same, disputation 18, chapter 1. Now he speaks of Christ, whom he calls the Son of God, as a little later in the same Psalm, "Thou art my Son," etc. Then when it is said, "Lest ever the Lord be angry, and you perish from the just way," in the Hebrew it is not "the Lord," but the word "be angry" is referred to the Son; wherefore when the Seventy added "the Lord," they signified that the Son himself is Lord God: of whom also that is to be understood, "When his wrath shall be kindled in a short time, blessed are all who trust in him": all which things manifestly proclaim the divinity of the Son, as a person distinct from the Father.

But now let us bring forward some testimonies of the New Testament also, by which we may refute the heretics: John 5, "As the Father has life in himself, so he gave to the Son to have life in himself": we have therefore a Father and a Son. That they are moreover of the same substance and nature, against the Arians will be proved below. John 1: "The only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him." John 14: "I am in the Father, and the Father in me": where the distinction of persons is manifestly shown. For although the attributes of God are said to be in God, indeed even "with God," as Psalm 129, "With the Lord is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption," and Psalm 35, "With thee is the fountain of life," nevertheless it would never be said that "one is in another," and conversely, unless they were personally distinguished: of which mode of circumincession we shall speak in disputation 169. Finally, the Son is often named expressly in Scripture.

But not only is the plurality of persons in the New Testament handed down, but even the Trinity marked by proper names: Matthew last, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." 1 John 5: "There are three who bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit: and these three are one." About which testimony, in the next disputation, chapter 2, we shall say more. Finally, John, chapter 15: "When the Paraclete shall have come, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father": where not only are three named, but also are openly distinguished. First, when it is said that the Spirit is sent by the Father and the Son, he is also distinguished from them, as in disputation 170 we shall plainly show. Then when it is said, "whom I will send from the Father," the Son is distinguished from the Father, since he there denotes that he received from the Father the power of sending, just as of spirating, which he received by generation: as we shall say there. Now then we have sufficiently, in general, proved against the Sabellians and the Jews that there are several - nay, three - persons in the divinity: for about their property and nature we must afterwards dispute against other heretics. The same truth is defined in all the General Councils after Nicaea, in which the Symbol and its confession are received: especially in those which, against Arius, define the divinity of the Son. Against the Sabellians also they dispute from the Fathers: Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, book 7, chapter 1, and book 10, chapter 29; Sixtus the Pope, in the Letter to Dionysius; Leo, that Letter 93, chapter 1; Tertullian in the book Against Praxeas; Epiphanius in the places alleged by us in chapter 1; Euthymius, first part of the Panoplia, title 10.[30]

But our theologians of these times, who dispute against the heretics, bring forward many arguments which the new Sabellians use, and solve them, and dwell long enough on their solutions: but because in them various difficulties are touched upon - arguments which in the various disputations on this matter must be seriously handled - I have judged it now worth the effort to preside over them. From those, namely, which are to be said in their proper places, the trifles and childish objections of the heretics will easily fade away. Now therefore let us engage with the other heretics.

Disputatio CIX - Whether the Word or the Son is of the same nature with the Father

To signify that the Son and the Father are of the same nature, rightly - by the Church's term - "homoousios," that is, consubstantial.

An Verbum seu Filius sit eiusdem naturae cum Patre

- Quinam haeretici divinitatem filii negaverint. Caput I.
- Divinitas et aequalitas Filii cum Patre contra haereticos ex Scripturis probatur. Caput II.
- Eadem veritas ex Patribus ostenditur. Caput III.
- Argumenta Arianorum. Caput IV.

Caput I - Which heretics denied the divinity of the Son

Among those who confessed three persons with God there were not a few heretics who did not think well concerning their nature; and first indeed concerning the person of the Son they said that he was not of the same dignity and substance with the Father, but a creature inferior to God, and that he began in time. Some later writers falsely ascribe this error to Ebion and Cerinthus: they are, however, mistaken. For these heretics only taught that Christ was not God, as is evident from St.

30. Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica VII, 1; X, 29; Sixtus Papa, Epistola ad Dionysium; Leo, Epistola 93, cap. 1; Tertullian, Adversus Praxean; Epiphanius, loci in cap. 1; Euthymius Zigabenus, Panoplia, pars I, tit. 10.

Irenaeus, book 1, chapters 25 and 26; from Philastrius, in his little book On Heresies; from Epiphanius, heresies 28 and 30: which, to be sure, Ebion and Cerinthus could affirm even if they granted the three persons of the Trinity to be equal in nature. Wherefore neither do these seem to have taught against the Trinity, nor against any person of it. The same heresy is attributed to Origen by very weighty men: Epiphanius, in the Letter to John, Bishop of Jerusalem, which among the letters of St. Jerome is number 260; the same also says it in heresy 64; Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in his Paschal Book 2; St. Augustine, in the book On Heresies, chapter 43 - because, as they themselves testify, Origen used to say that it is as absurd to assert that the Father is seen by the Son as that the Son is seen by the Holy Spirit; he said, moreover, that the Son, compared with holy men, is truth, but if compared with the Father, is a lie. Whence he inferred that the Son is not to be prayed to.

But Origen, book 1 of Periarchon, chapters 2 and 3, proves at length that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are equal and of the same nature; and in chapter 3, after the middle, he says thus: "Moreover, in the Trinity nothing greater or less is to be said," which are the words of St. Athanasius in the Symbol; he has many other like things in book 7 on the Epistle to the Romans. Wherefore the same St. Athanasius, in the Letter On the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, uses Origen's testimony against the Arians, and says that none of the ancient fathers could have been alleged by the Arians for this error. I grant indeed that Origen, on the Gospel of John, tome 3, near the end, did not speak quite rightly about the Son of God: but perhaps those words were inserted also by some Arian; or, as Vincent of Lérins says, section 51, he himself did not think with the Arians: yet he afforded them a cause of error. Origen is defended, besides Rufinus, by other fathers in Socrates, book 6 of the History, chapter 15; and among the more recent, Pico of Mirandola in the Apology on this matter, and Sixtus of Siena, annotation 165. Perhaps this error which Epiphanius ascribes to him was by some maliciously inserted in certain Greek codices, as Rufinus testifies in the Apology for him; for in the Latin I myself have not found it: or certainly Origen's disciples, called Origenists, added this also to the many other errors of their Master.

Therefore the first and chief author of this heresy was Arius, from whom even down to this day the heresy has taken its name. He was a presbyter of Alexandria in the time of Pope Sylvester and the Emperor Constantine the Great: and his heresy so prevailed in the Church that it infected almost the whole world, and among the Goths in Spain it endured down to King Reccared in the time of Leander, bishop of Seville. From this many other heresies arose, called by the same name, which Sander relates in book seven De visibili monarchia under Sylvester and Constantine, year 324; of which we shall recount three principal ones.

There were then certain heretics called Aetians, or Eunomians; others, Macedonians, or Semiarians; thirdly, there are some who remain under their own name and are called Arians, whose head was Acacius. The first, called Aetians from Aetius the Syrian, asserted that the Son was of another substance than the Father; they were under Constantine the Emperor and Liberius the Pontiff; see Nicephorus, book 9, chapter 17. They were also called Dissimiles, who said that the Son was dissimilar to the Father, that is, not co-existent, as the Tripartite History, book 5, chapter 42, has it; because they affirmed that the Son was made from non-existents, that is, from nothing. With these agreed Eunomius, at the same time, under Constantine and Liberius; of whom read Nicephorus, book 11, and Rufinus, book 11, chapter 25.

Secondly, there were the Semiarians, whose leader was Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, whence they are called Macedonians, who, although they said that the Son was less than the Father, yet like...[31]

Caput II - The divinity and equality of the Son with the Father is proved against heretics from the Scriptures

Many, with regard to Origen on the Gospel of John toward the end, have noted rightly that he spoke well; but perhaps those words too were by some Arian: Vincent of Lérins himself, Commonitorium, 51, did not think so, yet he drew forth the cause for those things. Others defend Origen, besides the Fathers cited by Socrates, and from the more recent, Pico of Mirandola in his Apology on this matter, and Sixtus of Siena, Bibliotheca sancta, annot. 165: perhaps that error which is ascribed by Rufinus arose in some Greek copies, maliciously inserted; I at least have not found it in Rufinus's Apology for him; or certainly the Origenists, who said they were of Origen, attributed to him, along with the many errors of their Master, this Arian one also. Therefore the first author of this heresy was Arius, from whom down to this day the heresy has taken its name, a presbyter of Alexandria in the time of the Pope and of Constantine the Great: and it prevailed so far in the Church that it almost overwhelmed the whole world, and by the Goths was carried into Spain, and persisted there until the times of King Reccared, as the bishop of Seville attests. From it many other heresies arose, called by the same name, which afterwards in the time of Pope Sylvester and Constantine were condemned in the Nicene Council; among which three chief ones are related by certain authors of this heresy.

First, some heretics were called Aetians, and from them Eunomians; others Macedonians; a third are some who are called by their proper name Acacians. The head of those called Aetians was Aëtius the Syrian. These said that the Son is of another substance, dissimilar; they were under the Emperor Constantius and Pope Liberius. Read Nicephorus, and that they said the Son is dissimilar, not consubstantial, is had likewise in the ecclesiastical histories; for they affirmed that He was from non-beings, that is, from nothing. With these Eunomius agreed under Constantius and Liberius.[32]

Afterwards there were Semi-Arians, whose leader was Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople; these are Macedonians, who, although they proclaimed that the Son was lesser than the Father, yet similar; therefore the Macedonians were called Semi-Arians, because other Arians spoke more harshly concerning the Son: what they thought, however, about the Holy Spirit we shall see in the following disputation. Of all these Epiphanius makes mention in heresy 72 and likewise 73, and St. Augustine, in the book On Heresies from chapter 49 up to 54, and Theodoret, book 4 of the Heretical Fables, and Nicephorus, and Rufinus in the cited places.[32]

31. Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 25 - 26; Philastrius, De haeresibus; Epiphanius, Haer. 28, 30; Epiphanius, Epistola ad Ioannem episcopum Hierosolymitanum (inter epistolas Hieronymi 260) et Haer. 64; Theophilus Alexandrinus, Liber paschalis II; Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 43; Origen, Periarchon I, c. 2 - 3; Athanasius, Epistola de decretis Nicaenae synodi; Vincent of Lérins, Commonitorium, 51; Socrates, Historia ecclesiastica VI, 15; Pico Mirandula, Apologia; Sixtus Senensis, Bibliotheca sancta, annot. 165; Nicephorus, Historia ecclesiastica IX, 17; XI; Rufinus, Historia ecclesiastica XI, 25; Tripartita historia V, 42.

32. Epiphanius, Haer. 72 - 73; St. Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 49 - 54; Theodoret, Haereticarum fabularum compendium, lib. 4; Nicephorus; Rufinus, in the cited places.

There were also certain new Arians, of whom St. Augustine makes mention, book 6 On the Trinity, chapter 1, who said that the Son is eternal, albeit inferior to the Father, whom some of our times seem to have followed; among whom were those who were present at the Council of Rimini. For these said that the Son is begotten of the substance of the Father, as likewise Maximinus, in St. Augustine, in the book Against the Same, not, however, from nothing, as Arius and other severer Arians. But I do not know by what reason St. Augustine, cap. 51, should say that Macedonius thought rightly concerning the Father and the Son, and taught only against the divinity of the Holy Spirit; since the opposite is affirmed by the other Fathers.

To the Arians there afterwards acceded the Metangismonitae, whom St. Augustine commemorates, On Heresies, cap. 58, who said that the Son is in the Father as a lesser vessel in a greater; and on that account they were rightly called by that same name, as it were "pourers-across," says St. Augustine; for in Greek μετὰ is the same as what in Latin is "across," and ἀγγεῖον the same as "vessel," whence metangismos, as it were a pouring of one vessel into another. Prateolus and Sander, however, vary in assigning the time in which these taught. For Prateolus says that they were in the year 221, under the Emperor Heliogabalus and Pope Urban: in which way they were earlier than Arius. But Sander reports them under the Emperor Constantius and Pope Julius: and therefore makes them posterior to Arius.[33]

Afterwards the same error was followed by Variamandus, against whom Idacius Clarus, a Spaniard, writes, whose work is had in the fifth tome of the Bibliotheca sacra. Then Peter Abailard agreed, as Bernard reports, Epistle 190, who posited degrees in the Trinity, assigning to God the Father omnipotence, to the Son semipotence, to the Holy Spirit nullipotence: although at the same time he confessed that the Son, nay the Holy Spirit, is consubstantial to the Father, as Bernard noted there; how this stands with the former I do not understand.

There were also in this error among the sectaries of this age Luther, in the book Against Latomus, where he says, "My soul loathes the word Homoousion," with which word indeed the Fathers have advisedly made use in the Nicene Council, as St. Athanasius testifies in the Epistle on the decrees of that Synod, to show the equality of the Son with the Father. Falsely, however, does Luther assert that the Blessed Jerome wrote that there lies "poison" in that word Homoousion; for he said that not of the name Homoousion, but of the name Hypostasis, as we shall see in disputation 124. Nor did Luther hate only the word Homoousion, but also the very thing signified. For on the first chapter of Genesis he calls the Son the instrument of the Father; which was the way Arius spoke; and from the public prayers he took care to expunge that, "Holy Trinity, one God, have mercy on us": he also deleted that of the First Epistle of John 5, "There are three who give testimony in heaven, etc., and these three are one." Then Melanchthon, in the book Against Stancarus, and in the Epistle to the Elector of Brandenburg, says, "The Son intercedes, asks;" and again, "The Son is the minister of the Father, priest, pontiff, mediator. Finally, the Father commands the Son, 'Ask of me, and I will give you the nations,' etc." All which he attributes to the Son even according to the divine nature.[34] All these things Arius asserted, as is gathered from St. Augustine, in the book Against the Sermon of the Arians: he said also that the Son of God is in the Father as a lesser vessel in a greater; and for that reason, say Basil, Cyril, Augustine, and others, he used to say that divinity and glory were given and restored to him, John 17.[35]

32. Epiphanius, Haer. 72 - 73; St. Augustine, De haeresibus, c. 49 - 54; Theodoret, Haereticarum fabularum compendium, lib. 4; Nicephorus; Rufinus, in the cited places.

33. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, lib. 1; St. John Chrysostom, In Ioan. 10:30.

Lastly, Valentinus Gentilis - of whom we spoke in question 11 - as Benedict Aretius relates in the History of the punishment of Valentinus Gentilis, after he had taught the Tritheite error, asserting three Gods, seeing that by no reason could that be defended by Scripture, declining into Arianism, affirmed that the Son and the Holy Spirit are inferior to the Father, not indeed produced from nothing, as the ancient Arians dogmatized, but from the very substance of the Father: with the new Arians, whom we have mentioned above, he called the Father autotheos, that is, the "essentiator" and God of himself, but the Son and the Holy Spirit "essentiated," in order to denote and show that they are inferior to the Father.[36]

It is much against these heretics, that they may prove the divinity and the equality of the Son with the Father, that they use the Scriptures, by which the divinity of Christ is established: which indeed are illustrious both from the Old Testament and from the New; and those would be of great moment to confirm the divinity of the Son against heretics, if all who deny the divinity of Christ were Arians: but because many deny it, not because they think that the Son according to his proper nature is inferior to the Father, but because they think that in Christ there is only a human nature with its own created person, as Nestorius asserted: and because expressly the divinity of the Son is to be proved by us against Nestorius in part 3, question 2, therefore we have judged it fitting here to set that aside for the moment, and to use only those which speak of the Son as he is the second person in the Trinity.

And first, those testimonies of the Old Testament, and explained by the New, which in the preceding disputation, cap. 4, were brought forward to prove a plurality of persons in God, can also be accommodated to the present purpose. For in Psalm 44 there is set God anointing, and God anointed: and of the latter it is said that his throne shall endure for ever, and the rod of his kingdom is equity; which things cannot in any way belong to a mere creature. Then that of Psalm 2, "Thou art my Son," which whoever is called the Son of God must of necessity be generated from His substance in such a way that he have the same nature with Him. For if he had an inferior [nature], he would not be said to be generated from His substance and from the womb, unless in a most imperfect way: about which testimony we said more there, by which the divinity of the Son is confirmed. Also those places of the same Old Testament make for this, in which both God sending

34. Luther, Contra Latomum; Melanchthon, Contra Stancarum; Epistola ad Electorem Brandeburgensem.

35. St. Augustine, Contra sermonem Arianorum; Basil, Contra Eunomium, lib. 4; St. Augustine, Tract. 105 in Ioann.; St. Cyril, Thesaurus, lib. 10, cap. 2, 9; In Ioann., lib. 11, cap. 17.

36. Benedictus Aretius, Historia de supplicio Valentini Gentilis.

and God sent are contained. For if he who is sent is God, and he who sends is God, of necessity there will be two persons at least of the same divine nature: wherefore either Arius is forced to concede the Son or the Holy Spirit to be equal to the one sending; certainly if he were to admit two persons equal in the divine nature, he would not deny the Son to be consubstantial.

But let us now bring forward the testimonies of the New Testament, which are most manifest.

1. The principal one by which the divinity of Christ is proved is that most excellent confession of Peter, much commended by Christ Himself, Matthew 16: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." For when he said "the Son of the living God," he indicated a natural Son, and the very equality of nature with the Father: who also elsewhere is called "Only-begotten" (John 3) and "His own" (Romans 8). For if He were only adoptive, as Arius replies, He would be neither "only-begotten" nor "His own": since many others also are [sons]. Then too, if Peter pronounced that Christ was only the adoptive Son of God, why would his confession have been preferred by Christ? For those who thought that He was one of the prophets, confessed Him to be the adoptive Son of God: but if Christ is the natural Son of God, not adoptive, surely He must be of the same nature: for in any other [nature] He could only be adoptive.

To the same point look other testimonies, in which the Jews accused Christ that He had made or professed Himself the Son of God (John 19: "We have a law, and according to the law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God") and John 10, when Christ had said that He was the Son of God, the Jews, understanding that He had named Himself God, and so had made Himself equal to the Father, answered: "For a good work we do not stone you, but for blasphemy, and because you, a man, make yourself God," and John 5: "The Jews sought all the more to kill Him, because He not only broke the sabbath, but also called God His own Father, making Himself equal to God." For Christ never excused Himself that He had said that He was God or the Son of God. But if those had been calumnies of the Jews, surely He would by no means have borne them, but, just as in other [cases] too which they falsely objected, He would have refuted them; which, however, He nowhere did: nay rather, in that same chapter 5 of John, after the cited words He says thus: "Amen, amen, I say to you, the Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He sees the Father doing: for whatever He does, these the Son likewise does," etc.; by which words He not only does not respond to the Jews as if they were calumniators, but rather asserts Himself again to be the Son of God, and that He does wholly the same things that the Father does.

1. The second testimony is John 10: "I and the Father are one," which testimony the Fathers commonly use against Arius, that they may prove the divinity of the Son. Here, therefore, first the distinction of persons is asserted when it is said, "I, and the Father"; then the unity of essence (essentia) when it is subjoined, "are one": and that He speaks of the unity of essence and power (potentia) is proved by St. Basil, book 1 Against Eunomius, near the end, and by St. John Chrysostom on that place, from the preceding [words]. For Christ had said, "And no one snatches them (namely, the sheep) out of my hand": He confirms it then by these words, "No one can snatch them out of my Father's hand: I and the Father are one": as if, after the major and minor having been posited, He were to gather this conclusion which He had posited: therefore no one can snatch them out of my hand. Now this conclusion would not follow, if He understood in that minor a lesser one, whom, since He would perceive to have a lesser essence and nature, He would not be seen to gather to Himself an equality of power. Then St. Augustine and St. John Chrysostom, on that passage, prove that, upon hearing that word, the Jews were scandalized, understanding that Christ had made Himself equal to God the Father: about which enough has been said above.[33]

Objicitur (of the Transylvanians): From the fact that Christ, when He had been accused by the Jews, adduces that testimony of Scripture: "I said, you are gods," and in this way, "If He called them gods to whom the word of God came, why do you say of Him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, 'You blaspheme,' because I said, I am the Son of God?" - from which they wish to infer that Christ followed the nominal mode of speech by which the prophets and just men are called sons of God; and that so too Christ was "Son of God" nominally.

Reply, first (with St. Hilary): Most aptly St. Hilary notes, On the Trinity 7, that Christ was arguing rather in this way: If judges and prophets can be called sons of God, how much more He whom the Father has in a peculiar way sanctified in divine power and sent into the world? We can then say, as St. John Chrysostom interprets Christ's prudence in responding to the Jews and repelling their calumny, that in order to ward off the stones He prudently used this way of speaking; not that He denied what He had a little before boldly professed when He said, "I and the Father are one." For otherwise, if He had denied Himself to be equal to God, and [to be] the Son of God not by adoption only but by nature, the hatred of the prophets would surely have immediately ceased, and their will of stoning Him would have been restrained, and they would have desisted.

1. The third testimony is the first of John: "There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit (Spiritus sanctus): and these three are one. And there are three who give testimony on earth, the Spirit, the water, and the blood: and these three are one": by which words St. John signifies that those witnesses are not only heavenly - since certainly there are in heaven also the Angels, who at Christ's nativity and other feasts announced - but are divine witnesses, namely the three persons of the Trinity: and the following words very clearly indicate this: "If we receive the testimony of men, the testimony of God is greater: because this is the testimony of God, which is greater, that He has testified concerning His Son. He that believes in the Son of God has the testimony of God in himself." And lower: "And this is the testimony, that God has given us eternal life; and this life is in His Son": therefore he has distinctly placed at the end the earthly testimony, on account of which we believe that Christ is the Son of God and true God: much more are we led to believe this by the divine testimony. But the earthly testimony is that which John called "of earth," namely of those three which gave testimony on earth at the time of the Passion - namely the Spirit, the water, and the blood - which, flowing forth after the Passion from the side of

33. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, lib. 1; St. John Chrysostom, In Ioan. 10:30.

Christ, are very powerful. For these three plainly indicate that Christ bore the torments not naturally and humanly but by divine virtue: which the centurion also, seeing that He cried out with a loud voice, confessed, saying, Mark 15: "Truly this man was the Son of God," and Luke 23: "Truly this man was just." These therefore again witness that Christ is the Son of God. But the testimony of God is this: which also pertains to the Son of God in heaven, and is of His divinity and person: they testify that He has given us eternal life, and that this life is in His Son. A little earlier the same words are had by John: "Who is he that overcomes the world, but he that believes that Jesus is the Son of God?" And a little below: "There are three who give testimony on earth," etc. By these words it is indicated that the heavenly witnesses - Father, Word, and Holy Spirit - are truly one God and one eternal nature. For these three who are in heaven - Father, Word, and Holy Spirit - are one. And to these are added the words of John: "And we are in the true [one], in His Son Jesus Christ: this is the true God, and eternal life." Three there are, then, who are in heaven, Father, Word, and Holy Spirit; these are God, one and eternal. Three there are who give testimony on earth, the Spirit, water, and blood: these stand as witnesses, because Jesus is the Son of God, and true God: to which words he subjoins, "and the same is nature and substance."

Objicitur, first, by Blandrata, in the Alban disputation, that the words, "There are three who give testimony in heaven," are spurious.

Respondetur, however, by Jerome very gravely: for they are read in that way also in the Epistle of Pope Hyginus; in Cyprian, in the book On the Unity of the Church; in Athanasius, in the book On the Unity of the Deity of the Trinity; in Idacius, in the book Against Variamandus; and Fulgentius handles objections of the Arians against this place in the fifth tome of the Bibliotheca sacra; there also other books treat this matter.[37]

Objicitur, second, by the heretics, that just as the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are said to be "one," so also the Spirit, water, and blood are said to be "one" on earth; therefore "one" is unity of consent, not of essence (essentia).

Respondetur, that the latter three are said to be "one" because they give one testimony; and for this the Evangelists immediately add the effect of this testimony, namely that by it we believe in Christ the Son of God: but of the former three he says, that they are in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit: and these three are one; and he straightway subjoins, "If we receive the testimony of men, the testimony of God is greater": thereby plainly showing that he called the three heavenly persons "one" as one God and one essence.

Caput III - The same truth proved from Scripture and the Fathers

Solution to the first: I answer first that, as to that clause, "and these three are one," when the discourse is about the Spirit, the water, and the blood, it is not found in many of the common copies. Then, omitting this, because in all the Greek copies, and commonly in the Latin vulgate editions, it is found, I say that it is expressed otherwise when it is said of the Spirit, the water, and the blood. For in the Greek we read thus: καὶ οἱ τρεῖς εἰς τὸ ἕν εἰσιν, that is, "and these three are unto one." But of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit he said, "and these three are one," so that John might indicate that those three witnesses on earth are only one in testimony, when he says, "are unto one," namely, one testimony; but the three who are in heaven are one not only in testimony but also in nature and substance (substantia). In this sense the Fathers cited interpret John's words. Add that, even if with Blandrata we were to concede that "and these three are one," when said of the three persons of the Trinity, is to be taken in the same sense as when it is said of the Spirit, the water, and the blood, the testimony alleged would lose nothing of its force. For the testimony of God, which we said is borne concerning Christ, clearly proves his divinity, as was shown above.

Third objection: The same Blandrata objects, against that which we alleged from the same chapter of John, "this is the true God and eternal life," that Christ is indeed true God, yet temporal; because divinity was communicated to him in time, according to Apocalypse 5, "Worthy is the Lamb to receive power and divinity." Solution: But since by no other reason could Christ be God than that his humanity is hypostatically united to the Word of God, we cannot call him a temporal God; because his person (persona) is eternal; nor could anyone who is true God be temporal.

Rejection of Erasmus's new gloss: Fourth, Erasmus - who strives, after a clandestine fashion, to overturn all the foundations of our faith - replies that the words, "this is the true God and eternal life," are referred not to Christ but to the Father, in this way: "And that we may be in his true Son: he (namely, the Father of this Son) is the true God." But since he has no author whom he might follow, it is manifest that he has invented that interpretation out of his own brain; and how groundlessly he has invented it is clear: for the pronoun "this" (hic) points rather to the nearest person than to one more remote; but what immediately preceded was "in his true Son." And in the Greek it is read thus: "in his true Son Jesus Christ; concerning Christ it is, 'this is the true God and eternal life'"; this also harmonizes with that sentence of the same John in the Gospel, chapter 17: "This is eternal life: that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." Therefore John said in that first epistle, chapter 5, that he is true God whom he also called eternal life. Since therefore Christ is called eternal life - as above also in the same chapter, "and this eternal life is in his Son" - it must be believed that he also said of the same, "this is the true God and eternal life." Many other things against Erasmus are learnedly disputed by the Bishop of the Canaries on this article, disputation 1, part 2, which I purposely pass over.

To these there can be added the testimonies in Hebrews 1, where Paul often, even from the Old Scripture, proves the divinity of Christ. And although, as I noted above, the testimonies which speak of Christ's divinity might not weigh much against the Arians - who could perhaps grant that Christ is God against Nestorius, but not the second person in the Trinity - yet the aforesaid testimonies, since they presuppose Christ's distinction from the eternal Father, also very well refute Arius. Among other things Paul says of Christ: "who, being the brightness of glory and the figure of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power; having made purgation of sins, sits at the right hand in the heights," etc. There is shown a personal distinction when it is said, "the figure of his substance," in Greek hypostasis, that is, of the supposit or person (suppositum vel persona), as we shall explain below in disputation 123, chapter 4. Then, when it is said, "upholding all things by the word of his power," it denotes the omnipotence whereby he alone governs all things, as we shall show below in question 34, article 2, when expounding that same passage. On account of which testimony, as Theodoret writes there, the Arians denied this Epistle to be canonical.

37. St. Jerome; Hyginus, Papa, Epistola; St. Cyprian, De unitate Ecclesiae; Athanasius, De unitate Deitatis Trinitatis; Idacius, Adversus Variamandum; Fulgentius, in the fifth tome of the Bibliotheca sacra.

The same truth is shown from the Fathers.

Dionysius, in the first chapter On the Divine Names and in chapter 3 of the Mystical Theology, expressly, together with the unity of the Godhead, concedes the Trinity of persons on account of fecundity. This is handed down in express words by Martialis in his Epistle to the Burdegalenses, chapter 10; Ignatius in his Epistle to the Philippians, where he says that one must believe, not in "one three-named," nor in three incarnates, but in three of the same honor; and many other things besides. There are also Justin, in the book On the Right Explanation of the Faith, and in the Apology to Antoninus, and in the Dialogue with Trypho; Athenagoras, in the Apology to Antoninus; Irenaeus, book 3 Against Heresies, chapters 6, 3, and 10; Clement of Alexandria, book 1 of the Paedagogue; of Origen we have already said enough in the first chapter of this disputation; Tertullian, book 4 Against Marcion, chapter 25, and the book Against Praxeas, chapters 9 and 10.[38]

For the same catholic truth wrote Athanasius his Orations against the Arians; Hilary the books On the Trinity; Ambrose On the Orthodox Faith against the Arians; Augustine the books On the Trinity; but especially, against the Sermon of Arius, against Maximinus the Arian, against Foelicinus; Cyril the books of the Thesaurus; Cassian the books On the Incarnation; Idacius Clarus the book Against Varimandus, which is found in the fifth tome of the Bibliotheca sacra; Gregory the Baetican, Bishop of Eliberris, the book On the Trinity and the Faith against the Arians, which is in the eighth tome of the Bibliotheca sacra; and others whom it would be long to recount.[39]

Finally, this truth has been defined by the Church: first in the Council of Nicaea under Pope Sylvester and the Emperor Constantine; afterwards the same Emperor, in the thirtieth year of his reign, convoked a council at Jerusalem, where the same was defined, and in the Nicene Symbol the clause "consubstantial with the Father" was added, in Greek ὁμοούσιον (Homoousion), because the heretical Semi-Arians said only ὁμοιουσίον (Homoiousion), that is, "of like substance"; the Fathers also added in the same place that part, "God from God, true God from true God." Then in the Council of Constantinople I, chapter 7, and in Toledo I, in the confession of faith, in Ephesus under

38. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, c. 1; Mystica theologia, c. 3; Martialis, Epistola ad Burdegalenses, c. 10; Ignatius, Epistola ad Philippenses; Justin, De recta fidei explicatione; Apologia ad Antoninum; Dialogus cum Tryphone; Athenagoras, Apologia pro Christianis ad Antoninum; Irenaeus, Adversus haereses, lib. 3, c. 6, 3, 10; Clement of Alexandria, Paedagogus, lib. 1; Origen, noted above; Tertullian, Adversus Marcionem, lib. 4, c. 25; Adversus Praxean, c. 9 - 10.

39. Athanasius, Orationes contra Arianos; Hilary, De Trinitate; Ambrose, De fide orthodoxa contra Arianos; Augustine, De Trinitate; also Contra sermonem Arianorum; Contra Maximinum Arianum; Contra Foelicinum; Cyril, Thesaurus; Cassian, De incarnatione; Idacius Clarus, Adversus Varimandum (Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 5); Gregory the Baetican, Bishop of Eliberris, De Trinitate et fide contra Arianos (Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 8).

Celestine, in Chalcedon, and in many others, the same was defined.[40] Of the Supreme Pontiffs, the same was established by Felix I in Epistle 3; Marcellinus I in the Epistle to Salomon; Anacletus in Epistle 2; Hyginus in the first Epistle; John II in the Epistle to Valerius. We could adduce more in confirmation of the same doctrine; but let these suffice, that the new Arians may blush for having recalled from the underworld a doctrine long since condemned.[41]

Caput IV - The arguments of the Arians

In the first place, Valentinus Gentilis and the Transylvanians argue from Ignatius, in the Epistle to the Magnesians, where he says of Christ: "He announced one and only true God his Father." Whence they gather: therefore the Father alone is true God, not the Son. But Valentinus has wrongly understood the particle "only": for it is referred to "God," whom he calls "only and true," as in John 17: "that they may know thee the only true God," so as to exclude other gods; but it is not referred to "Father" so as to exclude the other persons in the same nature, as is clear enough from the words cited.

Second, they object from the same Ignatius, in the Epistle to the Tarsians, where he says of Christ: "And because he is not that very one who is God over all, but the Son of the same," therefore he thinks that the Son of God is not God over all. I answer: Ignatius does not deny that the Son of God is God over all; since a little later, with a few words interposed, he says of Christ that he is not a mere man, "through whom and in whom all things were made"; which he pursues at greater length; and, with some things interposed, he says: "How then is such a one a mere man, having from Mary a beginning whereby he might exist, and not rather the Word of God and the only-begotten Son, of whom it is said, 'In the beginning was the Word,' etc.?" Where he openly confesses him to be God. Therefore, in those earlier words, Ignatius deliberately did not say, "And because he is not he who is God over all," but "And because he is not that very one who is God over all," wishing only to distinguish the Son from the supposed Father, and to assert that he is a different person from that one: therefore he said, "he is not that very one"; for by the pronoun "that one" (ille) he denoted the person. For he appropriated certain of Paul's words to the Father, and certain to the Son: to the person of the Father he attributed those, "one God, the Father, from whom are all things," and him he said is called "God over all"; but those, "one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom are all things," he applied to the Son.

40. Council of Nicaea under Pope Sylvester and Emperor Constantine; the Jerusalem council convoked by Constantine in the thirtieth year of his reign; addition of "consubstantial with the Father" (ὁμοούσιον) against the Semi-Arian ὁμοιουσίον; also the clauses "God from God, true God from true God"; Council of Constantinople I, c. 7; Council of Toledo I; Council of Ephesus under Celestine; Council of Chalcedon; and others.

41. Popes Felix I (Epist. 3); Marcellinus I (Epistola ad Salomonem); Anacletus (Epist. 2); Hyginus (Epist. 1); John II (Epistola ad Valerium).

Third, they allege words of the same Ignatius in the Epistle to the Philippians. For at the beginning of the Epistle he proves that the Father is one, with those words of Deuteronomy 6, "The Lord thy God is one God." Then, after the middle, he introduces Christ speaking with Satan at the time of the temptation in these words: "I know that (namely God) we are one only, to whom I do not refuse to serve," ...

But their arguments, or rather their childish sophistries, let us hear.

Objection 1. They argue first from the same place in Ignatius, where he cites Deuteronomy and John: "that they may know you, the only true God" (John 17), and "The Lord your God is one God" (Deut 6). Therefore, only the Father is God, to whom alone service is due; hence Christ, since he serves, is not God.

Answer to the first. I marvel how blind the eyes of these new Arians are, who either did not see, or rather feign not to have seen, the splendid testimony to Christ's divinity in the same Epistle, in the words that are inserted around the place in question. For after he proved, from those words of Deuteronomy, that the Father is one and not many, he subjoins: "the Son also is one God, the Word, the Only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father." Therefore, when he says, "The Lord your God is one God," appropriating those words to the Father, he did not deny that the Son is the same God. Wherefore, when afterwards Christ says, "I know one only" (that is, one God), he confessed not one only person but one only God, and that one ought to serve him, understanding this according to his humanity; for he had shown at great length a little before, in the same Epistle, that Christ is not a mere man. I grant that from those words of Deuteronomy one does not rightly prove the unity of the person of the Father but of the nature, unless we choose to use them by a certain appropriation.

Objection 2. They object further from the same Ignatius, in the Epistle to the Tarsians, where he says: "For he is not that very one who is God, but the Son of that one"; therefore he thinks that the Son is not "God over all."

Answer. He does not deny that Ignatius calls the Son "God over all," since afterwards, after other things intervening, he speaks of Christ in such wise as to confess him openly to be God. Rather, in those words he is distinguishing supposits: he wished to distinguish the person of the Son from that of the Father supposed as the one speaking; hence he says "he is not that one," for the pronoun denotes a person. Indeed Paul sometimes ascribes certain words to the Father, others to the Son: "Yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things... and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things" (1 Cor 8:6); what he attributes to the Father under the name "one God," he applies to the Son under the name "one Lord," not to exclude the Son from being God over all, but to distinguish the persons, all the while preserving the unity of the divine nature.

Objection 3. From the same Ignatius again: at the beginning of the Epistle to the Philippians he teaches that the Father is the one God; and he introduces Christ, speaking to Satan in the temptation, with these words: "I know God, one only." Therefore the Son is not God over all.

Answer. The reply is as above. When Christ speaks thus, he confesses not one person only but one God, and the service is owed to him; he speaks according to his humanity. Nor did Ignatius, by appropriating testimonies such as Deut 6:4 to the Father, deny that the Son is the same God; rather, he elsewhere confesses openly the Only-begotten Son to be true God, begotten before the ages and the Word in the beginning.

Objection 4. Fourth, they argue from the same Ignatius, at the end of the Epistle to the Antiochenes, where he says, "Farewell in Christ, and in God": therefore he distinguishes Christ from God.

Answer. These are trifles. For Ignatius distinguishes Christ from "God" with respect to the human nature, since the very name "Christ" sometimes signifies the human nature itself, which was anointed, as we shall note below.[42]

Objection 5. Lastly, they allege for themselves those words of the same Ignatius from the Epistle to the Ephesians: "But our physician is the only true God, the Only-begotten, and the invisible Lord of all, the Only-begotten Father and begetter; yet we have also a physician, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Only-begotten Son before the ages, and in the beginning the Word." From which, miserable Arians would insinuate something in their favor, although he plainly admits that the Only-begotten Son is our physician, and true God, begotten before the ages, and the Word. When, however, he calls our physician "the only true God," he is not designating some one person of the Trinity, but only the divine nature, excluding every other false god. In this manner our God is called in Scripture the only true God.

Objection 6. In the second place they argue from Justin.

They bring forward Justin Martyr in the Dialogue with Trypho, long before me, where they relate that he said Christ is another God besides the maker of the world; by which testimony they seem not so much to prove Arianism as Tritheism.

Solution. Although Justin has words that seem to indicate this, nevertheless, if the entire context of his discourse be read, he rather very plainly proves against the Arians that Christ is God. For from that place in Genesis 19, "The Lord rained from the Lord fire and sulphur," he contends that he is God from God, by which the plurality of persons in the same nature is established. He says therefore: those Jews indeed (he means Trypho and his companions) understood nothing, but judged the places which I had adduced to be of no value, to teach that another God or Lord was either or said to be by the Holy Spirit besides the maker of the universe. "I will therefore again try," I say, "to persuade you, who are familiar with the Scriptures, that that which I say is so, and that he who is said and written to be God and Lord, other than the parent of the universe, is also called Angel, because he now announces to men by words," etc. From which words "God, or Lord, other [than the maker of the universe]" should not be read without a pause: rather, after "Dominum" a distinction should be placed. For he contends against Trypho that Christ, whose person that Angel bore - who among the three that appeared to Abraham was seen to be the Lord and "rained from the Lord" - is God from God; and therefore it is said, "The Lord rained from the Lord," not because he wants to show that there is another God, but that there is another who is also God besides him to whom by a certain appropriation the creation and conservation of the universe are ascribed, namely, the Father. And in the aforesaid way Justin is to be understood in that whole discourse, when he says that there is "God and Lord another than he who made the universe." Moreover, that Justin wishes to show there to be in the deity another supposit besides the person of the Father, not another God other than the Father, is shown by his words which he subjoins a little after: "then I will again have recourse to the Scriptures, and I will try to persuade you that he who appeared to Abraham, Jacob, and Moses, and is said and written to be God, is different from that God who made all things - not in counsel and sentence, but in number." Note first, that Justin did not say "that there is a different God," but "that he is different from that God who is said to have made all things," that is, from the Father. For although the Son also created all things, still Scripture and the Fathers seem to appropriate creation and power to the Father; to the Son not in this manner, but "through him" or "in him" were all things made, as shall be said below.[43]

42. On the name "Christ" sometimes signifying the very human nature that was anointed, see the note below at 36, quaest. 19, art. 9, from the Council of Frankfurt.

That, to signify that the Son and the Father are of the same nature, the Church rightly uses the name Homoousios, that is, consubstantial

Up to now we have shown that the Son is of the same substance (substantia), that is, essence (essentia), with the Father; but since in matters of faith one must not only know what is to be held, but also observe the right mode of speaking, it will be worthwhile to subjoin some remarks on the Greek name homoousios, in Latin consubstantial, about which there was some dissension in the Church of God.

That this word was rejected as new by the Council of Ariminum is attested by Athanasius in the Epistle on the Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia, and by Augustine in Book 3 against Maximinus, chapter 14, about the middle; that the same term was rejected by the Council of Sirmium is related by the same Athanasius and by Epiphanius in Heresy 73. Emperor Constantine also, in a letter to Alexander and Arius, said that the question about this word was vain, not worthy of discussion, nor of answering those asking about such things. Erasmus too, imitating the liberty of the Council of Ariminum, as Catherinus reports in the tract on the Immaculate Conception, affirms that, if he had had any authority in those synods in which the peace of the world was being treated, he would have taken care not to know what the word homoousios wished to mean in the divine persons, although amid the tumult of affairs he would rather protect it than attack it. This word also displeased the fathers of the Council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, as Hilary writes in the book On the Synods toward the end. And to many other Catholics besides, such as Hosius and others, it was not acceptable, as the same Hilary relates: because it was a source of ambiguity - lest, to wit, they seem either to agree with Samosata, or, instead of Homoousion, to say Homoiousion, that is, "of like substance," which word the Arians used.

43. Compare infra, quaest. 45, art. 6, on the phrases "through him" and "in him" all things were made.

For that very reason our heretics of the present time, together with the ancient Arians, pursue it with hatred - because they think it exotic and invented by the Fathers in the Council of Nicaea, and nowhere found in the sacred letters.

Nevertheless, this word ought to be in veneration, and indeed for this reason especially, that, against the Arians to whom it is hateful, it most clearly explains the doctrine which the Catholic Church hands down concerning the Son's divinity. For, as Athanasius well admonishes in the Epistle on the Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia not far from the end, and Basil in the Epistle to the handmaids of God, and Ambrose in Book 3 On the Faith, chapter 7, and Hilary in the book On the Synods toward the end, this name signifies not only things that are kindred according to essence, but also - when there is causality - that those things which have existence (existentia) from the same cause are of the same nature. Nor is it necessary, as Athanasius notes, that if one be called homoousios to another, both have proceeded from a third substance; rather it is enough if one arises from the other, as the Only-begotten in one and the same nature and substance.

Epiphanius adds in the Ancoratus that the name Synousion is far different from the word Homoousion; for Synousion signifies unity of substance in such a way as to denote no distinction at all - something the Sabellians would admit; but Homoousion signifies, with the distinction of one from another, the same nature and substance. For that reason the word Homoousios was rightly received by the Church, as that which most fitly confuted the Arian heresy. Besides the Fathers already named, Hilary in the book On the Synods, Marius Victorinus in the book against Arius and in a special treatise on this word preserved in volume 5 of the Bibliotheca sacra, Isidore in Etymologies 7.2, Epiphanius in Heresy 68, Cyril in the first book On the Trinity, Augustine in Epistles 174 and 78, and Fulgentius, among others, treat of and approve this term.[44]

Why then was this word not received in certain Synods?

First, it is no wonder that the Councils of Ariminum and Sirmium - which were not legitimate - rejected this word as new and not contained in the sacred letters, since the Arian heretics had much sway. Indeed, had they not preferred a word which the Arians used, for the same alleged cause - that it was exotic and not found in Scripture - they would have rejected every other of similar sound, such as Homoiousion and Homoion, that is, "like in substance and nature"; for though they seemed not to agree with the Arians, they nevertheless retained their sense. As for Erasmus, he has no authority among us when - under the pretext of a freer way of disputing - he often sows the seeds of almost all heresies.

Second, as to Constantine's opinion: out of excessive zeal for peace he exceeded the due measure, thinking that by this means he would compose peace among all parties; and the Catholic emperor, ill-instructed on this matter, could embrace that view, that the word in question be rejected by common consent.

Third, concerning the Fathers of the Antiochene Council: one must say differently. That Council was held long before Arius; the quarrel then was with Paul of Samosata, and thus they rejected the word lest it seem to favor Samosata's perverse sense. They explained themselves, moreover - how

"consubstantial" can be well understood - lest what they repudiated against Samosata be thought to prejudice the sound sense which the Nicene Fathers later declared. Hilary reports this in the book On the Synods, where he says: "Samosata confessed 'homoousios' badly; but what the Arians later denied, eighty bishops of old repelled, and three-hundred and more at Nicaea defined," and so on.[45]

Fourth, it matters nothing that this word is not in Scripture, as the Fathers cited noted, if it signify what Scripture teaches - namely, that the Son is a distinct supposit (suppositum) from the Father, but of the same substance and nature with him. Thus Augustine answers in Tractate 97 on John, on those words, "I and the Father are one"; and Athanasius, in the Epistle on the Creed of the Nicene Synod, speaks at length to the same effect. And this is the best solution; for we are not bound to use Scripture's very syllables alone, but also such words as - though not literally in Scripture - properly express the sense of Scripture. Ambrose nevertheless, Book 3 On the Faith, chapter 7, and Cyril, in the books On the Trinity, endeavor to derive this name from Scripture: both because in the Lord's Prayer "supersubstantial" bread is asked (as some Latin copies read), and because in Exodus 3 the name of essence is insinuated, "I am who am" - in Greek, ho ōn - from which "ousia" and then "homoousios" are conveniently formed.

Lastly, as for the novelty of the word: we say that the charge of novelty was devised not by Catholics but by the Arians themselves, as Ambrose relates, who made it a calumny that the Fathers had introduced a new word. Eusebius of Nicomedia, an Arian, wrote in a certain letter - cited by Ambrose - complaining of the Nicene confession and especially of the word Homoousion. By such arts they tried to discredit the definition; but the Catholic sense of the Church has ever honored the term which, most fitly and briefly, excludes both Arian subordination and Sabellian confusion.

Caput V - Why that word was rejected in those councils

What we adduced against the use of this name are lighter things. First, it is not surprising that those two councils of Ariminum and Sirmium, which were not legitimate, rejected that word as new and not contained in the sacred Scriptures, since they greatly favored the Arian heresy. For the same reason, as though they judged better, they also rejected another word which the Arians were using, namely homoiousion, that is, "of like substance and nature," because it was exotic and not found in the sacred Scriptures; for thus they seemed to themselves not to agree with the Arians, while nevertheless they fully retained their meaning. Erasmus too has no authority with us, since by his excessive license in speaking he has sown almost all heresies.

---

44. Hilary, De Synodis; Marius Victorinus, Adversus Arrium and the special tract on this word (Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 5); Isidore, Etymologiae 7.2; Epiphanius, Haer. 68; Cyril, De Trinitate; Augustine, Epist. 174 and 78; Fulgentius.

45. Hilary, De Synodis toward the end. See also Athanasius, Epistola de Synodis Arimini et Seleuciae; Augustine, Contra Maximinum 3.14; accounts of Sirmium and Ariminum in Athanasius and Epiphanius; the imperial letter of Constantine to Alexander and Arius; and Erasmus as cited by Catherinus, De immaculata conceptione.

Second, about Constantine we say that he exceeded due measure through zeal for peace, because he thought on that account he ought to establish peace among all; and the Catholic emperor, ill-instructed on this matter, could have embraced their sentence, that the word in question should be rejected by common consent. Yet from zeal we excuse him.

Third, about the Fathers of the Council of Antioch it must be said otherwise, namely, that before the Arian heresy, or any controversy with the Arians about this word, arose, they rejected it only in the sense of Paul of Samosata, who used it to signify that the Father and the Son are two substances numerically different, yet of the same species, as Peter and John are.

Epiphanius in the book Ancoratus adds that the name synousion or synusion is far different from the word homoousion: for synousion signifies unity of substance in such a way that it denotes no distinction; therefore the Sabellians would admit that; but homoousion, while positing the distinction of one from another, signifies the same nature and substance. Therefore the word homoousios was rightly received by the Church, as that by which the Arian heresy was best refuted - a heresy about which, besides the Fathers already cited, Hilary approves in the book On the Synods, Marius Victorinus in the book Against Arius and in the special tract on this word (found in Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 5), Isidore in the Etymologies, book 7, Epiphanius, and Cyril, book 1 On the Trinity; likewise Augustine in Letters 174 and 178, and Fulgentius against the Arians to the seventh objection.[46]

Certainly, as is established from Athanasius, Samosatenus did not say that the Son is consubstantial, but he inferred it as something absurd against the Catholics. That that word had not been introduced into the Mass by Hosius, Hilary makes nothing of, and rightly; but he objects to himself thus: "Yet homoousion can be understood badly." He himself answers: "Let it be established, in what way it can be understood well."

Fourth, it matters nothing that this word is not in Scripture, as the cited Fathers noted, if it truly signifies what Scripture teaches - namely, that the Son is a supposit (suppositum) distinct from the Father, but of the same substance (substantia) and pure nature with him. So also Augustine answers in tractate 97 on John at the words "I and the Father are one," and Athanasius in the Epistle On the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, far from the middle. And this indeed is the best solution: for we must not use only the words of Scripture; but it is also permitted to use certain others, if they rightly express a thing contained in Scripture. Nevertheless Ambrose in book 3 On the Faith, chapter 7, and Cyril in book 1 On the Trinity, try to deduce this name from Scripture, because in Luke 11 (and in Matthew 6 according to some readings) "supersubstantial" bread is said; and because the name ousia, being, has some derivation from Scripture, Exodus 3, "I am who am," in Greek ho on, whence ousia; yet there is no need to take refuge in these.

Finally, about the novelty of the word we say that it was not invented by Catholics but by the Arians, as Ambrose testifies, in the said chapter 7, in order to introduce their own error. For Eusebius of Nicomedia, an Arian, wrote these words in a certain letter, which Ambrose reports: "If we say the true Son of God, and uncreated, we begin to confess him homoousios with the Father." When that letter was recited in the Council of Nicaea, the Fathers (as Ambrose says) put this word into the exposition of the faith, because they saw it to be a terror to the adversaries, so that, as it were, by the sword drawn from them they might cut off the head itself of the nefarious heresy. Therefore what they refused to concede in order to prop up their heresy, the Council, borrowing the same word, rightly defined. The new Arians therefore are deceived when they assert that this word was introduced in the Council of Nicaea. Athanasius also testifies, in the place a little above cited, that this word was used by Dionysius of Alexandria and by Dionysius the Pope of Rome.[47]

46. Epiphanius, Haeresis 68; Cyril, De Trinitate, lib. 1; Augustine, Epist. 174 and 178; Fulgentius, Contra Arianos, ad septimam objectionem.

Note moreover that the Semi-Arians used some other similar name to establish their error: for they called the Son of God homoiousion, that is, "of like substance," so that the unity of essence with the Father might be retained by mere likeness, which can stand along with distinction; but they utterly denied it. Hilary disapproved this word altogether in the book On the Synods toward the end, where, after many things which he said about both names, he speaks thus: "I call to witness the Lord of heaven and earth, that if I had heard neither, I would always nevertheless have thought that by homoousion, homoousion ought to be understood - namely, that nothing can be like to God according to nature, unless it be of the same nature." Athanasius indeed, although in the cited Epistle against the Sirmian and Ariminian Synods he seems to prove the name homoiousion, that is, "of like substance," yet he adds that it does not rightly signify the origin of one from another in the unity of the same nature; nor properly does likeness signify in nature and substance. For "like" is usually said in quality, form, or figure, not in substance. But however that may be, since the Arians used this word contentiously, by no means is it to be used by us.[48]

Disputatio CX - Whether the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, is of the same substance as the others

Caput I - Heretics deny the divinity of the Holy Spirit

The divinity of the Holy Spirit is said to have been impugned by the Macedonians, called from Macedonius, who taught this heresy in the time of the Emperor Constantius and of Pope Liberius; and the author was Macedonius, and Arius too followed the error concerning the person (persona) of the Son which has been said in the foregoing disputation. And again Arius taught the same about the Holy Spirit as Macedonius taught; but because the Arians were divided, and the dispute was more about the person of the Son against them, whereas against Macedonius the action was especially about the person of the Holy Spirit, therefore this heresy was called Macedonian; and the followers of it were called Pneumatomachi, that is, "impugners of the Spirit." Another etymology of the name, which Bernard of Luxemburg reports, is rightly refuted by Castro Against Heresies, book De haeresibus, heresy 10; for Bernard said that Macedonius taught that the Holy Spirit had proceeded from the Son of God and from the mother, and therefore they were called Pneumatomachi. This error, however, was taught not only not by Macedonius, but by no other heretic.

47. Hilary, De Synodis toward the end; Athanasius, Epistola de decretis Nicaenae Synodi; on Dionysius of Alexandria and Dionysius the Pope, see Athanasius in the place a little before cited.

48. Hilary, De Synodis toward the end; Athanasius, Epistola contra Synodum Sirmiensem et Ariminensem.

Before Macedonius there were heretics who, while abstaining from blasphemies, denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit in the same way as Macedonius, as Philaster writes in the little book On Heresies. They were under the emperors Diocletian and Maximian, and Pope Marcellinus. Afterwards a certain heretic named Airas followed, from whom some were called Airani. Moreover, among the Arians not only did some say that the Holy Spirit was not consubstantial to the Father and the Son, but also that he was less than the Son. To this error like is another of Valentinus, who said that the Holy Spirit was a certain Angel, as Athanasius affirms in the Longer Epistle to Serapion after the middle; and the same Athanasius writes that this fancy pleased some Arians; nay, in our age some writers testify that the Transylvanians and Servetians and Francis David held the same.[49] Hither also tends the error of Abaelard, who, as is established from Bernard in Epistle 109, said that the Holy Spirit is the soul of the world, and that he is inferior to the Son; for he attributed omnipotence to the Father, semipotence to the Son, and no power to the Holy Spirit. He also said that the Holy Spirit is not of the substance of the Father, yet that he is consubstantial to him - two things which are mutually repugnant.

Caput II - The Catholic truth is proved

We could first adduce testimonies of the Old Testament by which the divinity of the Holy Spirit would be proved; yet for our present purpose against the heretics the chief places of the New Testament will suffice, in which this is more clearly asserted: Matthew, at the end, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit"; John 3, "Unless one be born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"; Titus 3, "He saved us by the laver of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit." From these places Nazianzen fitly argues for the divinity of the Holy Spirit in these words: If the Holy Spirit is not God to be adored, how does he make me God through baptism? as if he were to say, if in baptism I am sanctified by his invocation and am made God by participation of holiness, therefore he is God to be adored, because God alone it is who sanctifies and blots out sins. The same can be done from that, 2 Corinthians 13: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the charity (caritas) of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with you all, amen": for what else is the communion of the Holy Spirit, if not the sanctification of the soul? therefore he is the author of holiness; and hence God. Then Acts 5: "But Peter said, Ananias, why has Satan tempted thy heart to lie to the Holy Spirit? Thou hast not lied to men, but to God." Finally, 1 John 5: "There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one."

Second, this truth is proved by the decrees of the Councils, wherein against Arius the Son is defined consubstantial to the Father, and in which the Nicene Symbol is received, in which about the Spirit it is said: "And [I believe] in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and lifegiver, who together with the Father and the Son is adored and conglorified." It is also defined in the Lateran Council under Innocent III, and it is reported in the chapter Firmiter, on the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith.

Third, besides the Fathers cited in the preceding disputation, those who specifically treated of the Holy Spirit wrote against this error: Dionysius of Alexandria wrote two books, which Jerome translated into Latin and they are among his works; Basil wrote one book against Eunomius; Ambrose, On the Holy Spirit to Gratian, three books.[50]

From which it follows that the Holy Spirit cannot be the soul of the world, otherwise he would be a creature. For if he is God, therefore he is higher than heaven and than the whole universe; nor can he be defined by that, Job 22: "Do you not consider that God is higher than heaven, and is exalted above the top of the stars?" and 2 Paralip. 2: "Heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee." But if he were the soul of the world, he would be defined and contained by the whole heaven and the universe as by his proper body - which is against the Scripture alleged, and against what above, in disputation 29, has been expressly proved.

Caput III - The arguments of the Macedonians are dissolved

The first argument of the Macedonians was: Nowhere in Scripture is the Holy Spirit called God; therefore he ought not to be called God. It is answered: this is manifestly false, as is clear from the testimonies cited above.

Second, they objected that of John 1: "All things were made by him" (that is, by the Word); therefore even the Holy Spirit was made. Nazianzen answers, in the cited oration on Theology, in order 5 and 7, that not "all things" absolutely were made by the Word, but "whatever things were made"; but the Holy Spirit is outside the order of those things which were made: otherwise even the Father would have been made by the Word.

Third, they alleged that of Amos 4 according to the reading of the Seventy: "I am the Lord, who strengthens the thunder and creates the Spirit"; therefore the Spirit is created by the Lord. I answer with Nazianzen there, with Athanasius in the Epistle to Serapion, and with Basil, book 3 against Eunomius, that "spirit" in that place signifies wind.

Fourth, Romans 8: "The Spirit intercedes for us with inenarrable groanings": but if he were God, he could not intercede. Augustine, in Epistle 121 and in book one against the Maximian Arian, and Nazianzen in Oration 36, numbers 54, 55, 56, understanding this place of the Holy Spirit as the third person in the Trinity, explain it thus: "he intercedes," that is, he makes to intercede, because he helps our infirmity that we may intercede. By the same reason they think that in Galatians 4 it is said, "God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying Abba, Father," for it is the same as that of the same chapter in Romans 8, "You have received the Spirit of adoption, in whom we cry, Abba,

---

49. Athanasius, Epistola longior ad Serapionem; on the Transylvanians, the Servetians, and Francis David (Dauid), see some modern authors.

50. Dionysius of Alexandria, two books on the Holy Spirit (in Latin through Jerome) among his works; Basil, Contra Eunomium, lib. 3; Ambrose, De Spiritu Sancto ad Gratianum, three books.

Father." For because he makes us cry out, in that place we are said to cry out by his power; and he himself is said to cry, "Abba, Father." More easily in my judgment do more recent authors understand it of the Spirit of grace which God infuses into the soul: for he is said to intercede for us, because what we do not know of ourselves how to ask, the Spirit of grace rightly makes us ask. And thus let us weigh the Greek word, hyperentygchanei, which signifies "to intercede," and properly "to petition": there it does not signify "to make to petition," but "to pray"; for he who intercedes also himself asks and entreats.

Finally, that the Holy Spirit is said not to speak from himself, or that he is said to be sent by the Son and to receive from him, and that he is the third person in the Trinity, does not prove that he is a creature; for all these are said of the Holy Spirit by reason of origin (origo), because he proceeds from the Father and the Son, as we shall say in their places. And let these things suffice for proving that in God there are processions (processiones) of persons in the same nature; for all the Fathers and councils teach nothing else while they teach three persons of the same nature - the second being produced from the first, and the third from both; which is gathered from Scripture. For the names Son and Holy Spirit denote procession from another.

Disputatio CXI - Whether the divine processions are operations of intellect and will

Caput I - The opinion of Durandus

The present controversy is commonly handled around the doctrine of St. Thomas, where he discusses the number of processions: for from the number of immanent operations the number also of processions is gathered. Wherefore, that we may know how many processions there are, we must first see whether there are in God operations of intellect (intellectus) and of will (voluntas), and of what sort these are. But before we set forth the sentences of the Scholastics, it is fitting to vindicate Richard of St. Victor from a certain false opinion which is ascribed to him; for some say that he held in such a way as to make the processions to be the operations of the intellect and of the will; whereas he teaches that, although there are in God these internal operations, nevertheless the processions are not to be taken as essential acts common to the three persons, but as notional productions according to which the persons are distinguished.

Certain later writers - Alexander of Hales, Bonaventure in 1, dist. 3, q. 4, a. 1 and dist. 10; the Master (Peter Lombard) in the first book; and the Major (William of Auvergne) in 1, dist. 10, q. 5, art. 1 - do indeed treat of processions as proceeding per intellectum and per voluntatem; others add that one procession is by way of the intellective operation, the other by way of the will's operation. In this understanding Durandus proposed his own sentence in the first book, distinct. 10, in the beginning, as shall be said below.

The first point to be held is that the essential acts are common to all the persons; the processions, however, are not essential operations, nor common, but relative, according to which the divine persons are distinguished among themselves.

Caput II - The common scholastic sentence

Second reason. The processions are really distinguished; therefore the processions are not acts of the intellect and of the will. Next, fecundity belongs no less to God than to creatures; but creatures are fecund proximally by their nature with the intellect left aside: therefore so also is God himself. Indeed, it so belongs to other natures to produce a son, that it by no means belongs to them to do so through the intellect: therefore God too will be fecund, not formally through the intellect, but through the nature, that is, through the essence as essence. Hence he infers in the first book, distinct. 10, q. 2, n. 1, that it is not rightly gathered from the number of immanent operations - namely, of intellect and of will - the number of processions, as Blessed Thomas claims to deduce in article 5; although, the number of persons having been presupposed, it is rightly proved that there are not more than two processions, because one of them must necessarily be unbegotten, that is, proceeding from none. St. Jerome Zanchius the heretic followed Durandus's sentence in a book on the Trinity which he wrote some years ago at Heidelberg, part one of the work, book 5, the last chapter, asserting that that doctrine of the theologians, that the Son proceeds through the intellect, is rash.

Certain more recent authors also attribute this opinion of Durandus to Gregory of Rimini in the first book, distinct. 7, q. 5, art. 2, and distinct. 10, q. 1, and distinct. 13, q. 1; yet without cause: for in those places he only disputes about the principle by which generation is, and proves that there is no principle by which besides the producing person, which he calls the principle that; for he thinks that in God there is not distinguished a principle whereby, as we shall see in Disputation 135; but he does not deny that the procession of the Word is formally intellection, and that the spiration of the Spirit is an act of willing. Therefore, the opinion of Gregory being omitted, about which we shall treat more fully below, let us refute in the following chapter the sentence of Durandus.

It is proved from Scripture, third, that this sentence is clearly gathered against Durandus. For the Son of God is called the Father's Word (John 1; 1 John 5); but a word proceeds only as utterance, and utterance only through an intellect: therefore the procession of the Word is an operation of the intellect. Wherefore Durandus's manner of speaking seems to fall into the heresy of the Alogians. For when he says that the Son of God, by a certain appropriation, proceeds through the intellect, yet not really; and that the act by which he is generated is an operation of the intellect only by appropriation; he must also say that that which proceeds is a word, not truly, but by a certain appropriation - something we shall show to be false in Disputation 142, cap. 2. Although the Alogians claimed not only that there is not properly a word in God (as we shall say in Disputation 141), but also denied the Trinity of persons: hence, at least in manner of speaking, Durandus's sentence does not differ from their error. But how the Holy Spirit is called love, whence it is gathered that his procession is an operation of the will, we shall see in q. 37, art. 1.

Against Durandus, the Scholastics rightly and vigorously unite to defend that the divine processions are operations of the intellect and of the will. Thus taught St. Thomas, Cajetan, and more recent Thomists on the same place; the Bishop of the Canaries in a single disputation on that fifth article; Alexander on the procession of the Word; and on the procession of the Holy Spirit; Bonaventure on the procession of the Word in I, dist. 27, q. 1, and on the procession of the Spirit in distinct. 10, through several questions; Henry in quodlibet 6, q. 1; Scotus in quodlibet 2, art. 2, and on I, dist. 2, part 2, q. 4 (which is seventh in order), and dist. 27, q. 1 and 2; Richard on I, dist. 2, q. 1; Marsilius on I, q. 6, art. 1; Gabriel on I, dist. 7, q. 2, art. 1, 2, and 3; and Major. The consent of the Fathers is also common. For, to omit those who call the Son of God speech or word, as the Evangelist John, from whom we shall afterward take an excellent argument, there are some who expressly say of the Son that he is generated by the Father through the intellect, or proceeds from the memory of the Father: Irenaeus, book 2, cap. 48; Basil, homily on the first chapter of John; St. Augustine, book 5 On the Trinity, caps. 6, 13, and 14, and in the books On the Knowledge of True Life, caps. 14, 16, and 17; Cyril, book 1 on John, cap. 5; Theodoret, book 2 Ad Graecos; Anselm, in the Monologion, caps. 45, 46, 47, and 48; add the testimonies of other Fathers which we shall set forth in the following disputation

But on the contrary: if once it has been proved that generation is an operation of the intellect, no one will doubt that the procession of the Holy Spirit is an operation of the will. Moreover, the opinion of Durandus is refuted also by reason. First, because if it were true, we could assign no reason why the procession of the Word rather than that of the Holy Spirit should be generation, as will appear in Disputation 113. Next, we would not be able to assign the order of prior and posterior according to origin among the proceeding persons - why in which respect this should proceed first and that other later; nor why the Holy Spirit should proceed from the Son. Besides, as St. Thomas says in article 5, since the processions in God ought to be spiritual immanent operations, and in an intellectual nature no other immanent operation can be conceived besides that of intellect and of will, we would vainly call the divine processions operations other than intellection and volition. Finally, the Father would not be said in the Son to see himself as in a mirror rather than with his own proper looking, nor would we say that the Holy Spirit is the love whereby the Father and the Son love one another, unless to the Father there belonged a peculiar notional act of the intellect.

From this doctrine they rightly gather the number of processions, as St. Thomas in art. 5, Cajetan and the more recent authors in the same place, the Bishop of the Canaries in a disputation on that article, Henry in the cited place, Alexander I, q. 47, m. 7, reason 3, Bonaventure in I, dist. 2, q. 4, Scotus in that seventh question and in the cited quodlibet, Gabriel in I, dist. 10, q. 1, art. 1 and 2, Richard and Marsilius in the cited places, teach. For since procession is an immanent operation of intellect and will, and these are only two, as has been proved, it follows that there are only two processions. But this argument certainly proves only that there are two in species, that is, that there is no procession which is not an intellection or a volition; but why there are not more in number, so that each person would produce another, since he has an intellect and will common with the others, is to be seen below at q. 41, art. 6.

Now to the arguments of Durandus a response is made without difficulty. To the first I say: to understand and to will can be considered in a twofold way, as will be explained in the following disputation. First, absolutely and in itself, that is, without the relation of production to the produced term; then with that relation of production added. In the first way they are essential acts and common to the three persons; in the latter way they are not common, but are called notional, that is, proper to someone person or to some persons.

To the latter argument I respond first: not every created nature is fecund proximally by its substance for producing another; only the corporeal is; for a spiritual nature, as an angel, is not thus fecund; and why then is it not more imperfect? I say, moreover, that the corporeal creature is fecund in this way, not because it is able to generate by an accidental potency added to it - this is not controverted among philosophers - but because either it produces without intellect and will, or at least by its very intellection and volition as a proximate principle it does not produce another substance, but only with intellect and will accompanying. Therefore, to concede this manner of fecundity to God would be imperfection; since it does not befit spiritual creatures on account of their higher perfection: therefore it is fitting that fecundity belong to him on that more perfect part by which spiritual creatures surpass corporeal ones, namely by intellect and will; and in this part God surpasses the spiritual creatures, because in this part creatures are infertile. And although in God will and intellect are in no way by their nature distinct from the essence, but are distinguished only in our consideration, nevertheless we ascribe to God a production such that it is formally and truly intellection and volition, although it is not distinguished from the essence; and the faculty of producing is intellect and will, which differ from the essence only in our manner of conceiving. But of the very power of begetting and spirating we shall speak more fully in Disputation 164.

Disputatio CXII - What sort of operations of intellect and will the processions are

- What Henry thinks, Caput I.
- The opinion of Scotus and others, Caput II.
- The true sentence, Caput III.
- Replies to the arguments of Scotus, Caput IV.

Caput I - What Henry thinks

Henry, quodlibet 6, q. 1, while admitting that the Word proceeds by an operation of the intellect and the Spirit by an operation of the will, teaches that they proceed not by just any operation, but by a certain peculiar one. To explain this, he notes that in us there is a twofold act of intellect and of will. For the intellect is partly passive, partly active: it is called passive in comparison with simple knowledge, which is as it were indeterminate and confused; but it is called active with respect to discourse, for which the intellect, informed by that simple knowledge, is rendered able to attain the complete and perfect definition and knowledge of a thing. When, however, it discourses, it indeed has a cognition which is a word, yet still unformed, because it has not yet fully expressed the nature and definition of the thing; but, the discourse having been completed and the perfect definition of the thing having been found, the word is now perfect and full. He took this doctrine from St. Augustine, book 15 On the Trinity, cap. 15.

Then in the will he distinguishes a twofold operation, one in act, with respect to which the will is said to be as it were passive - metaphorically, because it is said to be attracted by the good itself and to be moved in a certain way; and thus love, a simple loving, arises: which operation corresponds to the prior operation of the intellect; the other operation of the will he says is a fervent love, by which the will is borne toward the thing loved and rests in it, which Henry calls zeal or the burning of the will: this love corresponds to the posterior operation of the intellect.

He proposes almost the same notion in God. He distinguishes a twofold knowledge: one he calls essential, which corresponds to the simple knowledge which we first have of things, not because in God it is imperfect, as it is in us, but because the essential knowledge in God is only a certain simple manifestation; whereas the Word in God has the character of manifesting and declaring what already by essential knowledge is made manifest; the posterior knowledge in us makes the prior known and manifest, and so it expresses a word. Therefore, by this posterior knowledge, which is as it were the expression and manifestation of the prior, Henry says, the Word is produced in God.

In the same way, although in God essential love is not imperfect, as in us that prior love is; nevertheless it has only the character of a simple love, and it answers to the prior love which in us is a certain loving whereby the Holy Spirit proceeds; but the posterior love in us - the fervent one, whereby we are vehemently carried - answers in God to the notional operation. He concludes, finally, that the Word in the divine proceeds through a notional act of the intellect, which is to speak, not through the essential act, which is to understand; and that the Holy Spirit proceeds through that fervent love, which is a notional act, not an essential one.

Scotus refutes this sentence of Henry in many places cited in the preceding disputation; and for my part it does not please me especially on these three reasons.

First reason: our intellect and will in the prior act no less exercise the works of life from an internal principle than in the posterior; therefore, no less in the prior act do they move themselves and produce something of life in themselves than in the posterior; the only difference will be that in the prior act, by reason of its imperfection, a more imperfect quality is produced, in the posterior, however, a more perfect one. But since in God the essential operations are carried out no less perfectly than the notional ones, from this side it will not be repugnant that some persons should proceed by essential operations no less than by notional ones.

Second reason: the knowledge of God which is essential is no less distinct and perspicuous than the notional; nor is essential love less fervent and tending toward the thing loved than notional love; therefore Henry's reason, taken from a comparison with us, does not hinder that persons proceed by essential acts, as by notional.

Third reason: Henry seems to assert that notional acts arise from essential ones as from principles, just as in us the posterior act arises from the prior as from its principle. But this is absurd, as Scotus rightly noted in that seventh question cited; for, in part, the principle by which the Father generates the Word is memory according to act (according to our manner of understanding), as St. Augustine teaches, book 15 On the Trinity, cap. 7; therefore essential intellection is not the principle of producing the Word. Add that, as we shall show below, the essential act is included in the notional; therefore it is useless to assign it as the principle of the latter.

Caput II - The opinion of Scotus and of others

Scotus, on I, dist. 2, that seventh question, at the section "They object the contrary" toward the end, and in other places alleged in the preceding disputation, teaching that in God the act of the intellect is altogether essential, in order to satisfy an argument which afterward led Durandus, wants to assert that the Son does not proceed by an act of the intellect, namely, because the act of the intellect is of the essence...

Next, with respect to the will, he distinguishes a twofold cooperation: one in act, with respect to which the will is said to be disposed passively, yet metaphorically, because it is said somehow to be moved by the good itself, being allured by it; and this he calls simple love. This operation corresponds to the prior operation of the intellect. The other operation of the will he says is a fervent love, whereby the will is carried toward the thing loved and rests in it; this Henry calls the zeal or the burning of the will; and this love corresponds to the posterior operation of the intellect.

He explains it thus: in almost the same proportion he distinguishes in God a twofold knowledge (notitia): one he calls essential, which corresponds to the simple knowledge which we first have about things, not because it is imperfect in God as it is in us, but because essential knowledge in God is only a certain simple manifestation. The Word, however, in God bears the character of one manifesting and declaring that which is already made manifest by essential knowledge: just as in us that posterior knowledge is a manifestation of the prior, and therefore it expresses the word. By this latter knowledge, therefore, which is as it were the expression and manifestation of the former, Henry says that in God the Word is produced.

In the same way, although essential love in God is not imperfect as in us that prior love is, nevertheless it has only the character of simple love, and it corresponds to the prior love which is in us; but the love by which the Holy Spirit proceeds is as it were that posterior fervent love of ours, moving toward the thing chosen. He concludes finally from these points that in the divine things the Word proceeds through an act of the intellect which is notional (notionalis), which is to say (dicere), not through an essential act, which is to understand (intelligere); and that the Holy Spirit proceeds through that fervent love which is notional, not essential.

Against this opinion of Henry many reasons are brought forward. The first reason: in us the intellect and the will act in the prior act of life no less from an internal principle than in the posterior; therefore they are no less perfect in the former act than in the latter; the only difference is this, that in the prior act a less perfect quality is produced, but in the posterior a more perfect. And since in God the essential operations are no less perfect than the notional, on this score it will not be repugnant that by those some persons proceed

The second reason, no less distinct and evident, is that God's essential knowledge is not less clear than the notional, nor is essential love less fervent and tending toward the beloved thing than the notional: therefore Henry's rationale does not hinder persons from proceeding through essential acts just as through notional.

The third reason: Henry seems to assert that notional acts arise from essential ones as from principles, as in us a posterior act arises from a prior as from a principle, because we are moved from one to the other. But this is absurd, as Scotus well noted in the cited question 7, because in the Father the principle by which he generates the Word is the fecund memory in the first act for understanding, as St. Augustine teaches (De Trinitate XV, c. 7): therefore essential intellection is not the principle of producing the Word. Add that, as we shall show below, the essential act is included in the notional; therefore it is assigned as the principle of that one in vain.

It is objected, on the contrary, near the end of the cited disputation and in other places, that there are two acts of the intellect in God, so as to satisfy the argument by which Durandus was later induced to assert that the Son does not proceed through an act of the intellect, namely, because the acts of the intellect are essential and common. Scotus therefore says that one act is to understand (intelligere), and that this is essential; another is to say (dicere), and that this, so far as it is saying (dictio), is notional; by the former he asserts that the Son is not led forth to produce the Word, but by the latter he is produced; and that this act is in the Father alone. In the same proportion one ought to philosophize about the act of the will lest he be pressed by the same argument: indeed he said this expressly in Quodlibet 14, q. 4. Here it must be understood a little from the beginning: namely, that one act is the act of love, and that this is essential and common to the three; but another is the act of spirating (spirare), and that this is notional and proper to the Father and the Son - yet he himself does not teach this expressly. In the same opinion seem to have been Alexander when he affirms that to generate and to understand are not altogether the same according to reason, although to generate and to say are entirely the same; for he renders the reason that to understand, taken essentially, is the same as to manifest, and therefore it belongs to the three persons, but to generate and to say belong to the Father alone; nor does Gabriel dissent from this opinion in the cited place.

The foundations of this opinion are two. The first is: if to understand and to say did not differ, then to whomever the one were attributed, the other would also be attributed; therefore, since to understand belongs to the three persons, to say would also belong to the three; which is to produce the Word - yet that is absurd. The second is: intellection (intellectio), precisely as intellection, since it is of itself, is not the production of a term; but saying (dictio) is the production of a term, namely of the Word: therefore procession is not intellection.

This opinion of Scotus is rightly refuted by Cajetan in this article, and by the Bishop of the Canaries in the first article of this question, and in St. Thomas's fourth disputation of the Prima Pars, by this argument. By the very fact that the intellect says something, either simple or complex in an enunciation, it speaks; but to speak spiritually is to understand that very thing which is said and brought forth. For no one speaks or says anything except that which he knows and understands; nor does an intellectual saying only suppose the intellection of that which is said, as happens in the utterance of a bodily voice; rather the very saying is a certain intellection. Otherwise, if in the Father the saying were not formally intellection but presupposed it as prior, common to the three and to all essential things, then the Father would be said to understand himself in his Word no more truly than would the Son and the Holy Spirit; thus the three persons would understand in the Word, while only the Father would produce it. For if the Father does not understand in the Word formally by the very production of the Word, but by essential knowledge; and nevertheless the Word represents things to the Father in such a way that the Father sees them in that essential intellection - why will it not also represent them as in a mirror to the Holy Spirit, so that he too may be said to contemplate those things in the Word itself? But no theologian will grant this. Therefore it cannot be distinguished in God, as Scotus distinguishes, to understand and to say.

Moreover, there is no reason in Scotus's position why the Word should rather represent creatures to the Father than to the Holy Spirit. For if any reason existed, it would especially be that the Father alone produces the Word; but this reason is of no value, if the very saying by which the Father produces the Word is not formally intellection, but the Father is said to understand in the Word by another act, which is intellection, different from the very saying, as is sufficiently clear.

Finally, if the saying by which the Word proceeds were not formally intellection, the Word would not be called begotten Wisdom; for in that case the Holy Spirit would be called Wisdom in the same way, at least proceeding Wisdom, because he is God proceeding, and God is Wisdom. Therefore let it be that the Son is called begotten Wisdom, because he proceeds by the act of Wisdom and of intellection; in which way Athanasius calls the Son such in the oration against the Gregalians of Sabellius, and St. Augustine in many places, especially in De Trinitate XV, chapters 14 and 6, and elsewhere often; for unless this were true, the Son would not be said to proceed from the memory of the Father, which is contrary to Augustine's doctrine in the same book XV, chapter 7; and to Anselm in the Monologion, chapter 47; add also what the same Augustine says in De Trinitate XV, chapter 10: "They said within themselves, thinking," and: "They said within themselves, This man blasphemes"; about which our Lord answered: "Why do you think evil in your hearts?" (Matt 9; cf. Luke 5). From which it is gathered that the very saying of our mind is to think; thus does Augustine say: "What is it to have said within themselves except by thinking?" and below: "Therefore certain thoughts are speeches of the heart"; and among other things he adds: "For it is necessary, since we speak a word within, that we also know; we speak from that very knowledge which we hold in memory; from which knowledge is born a word - what that knowledge itself is, of which that word is born. No one understands the memory and the knowledge in act which the philosophers call in first act"; for Augustine does not think that the word is born from knowledge in second act; whence he immediately subjoins: "For the formed thought from that whereby we know is the word which we say in the heart."

I confess that Augustine, De Trinitate XV, chapter 15, by the thinking through which he asserts the Word is produced, does not mean any intellection whatsoever, but that which is with a certain search and inquiry, as we shall say in disputation 142, chapter 3.

Caput III - The true opinion

A far easier and truer opinion is that of Cajetan in this article, which the Bishop of the Canaries followed in the same article with a single disputation in part 3: namely, that God by the act of saying (dicere), by which he produces the Word, formally exercises intellection (intellectio); and that the act of spirating formally is love or dilection (dilectio). In this way it is true that the Father sees in his Word and understands himself and other things; and that the Father and the Son in the Holy Spirit love themselves and other things. For since the Father by the very intellection produces and expresses the Word, he is rightly said to understand in it, as in the produced term, he and no other person. But that we may make this matter clearer, and satisfy Scotus's arguments, it must be observed that to understand belongs to the very ratio of saying (dictio), and to love to the ratio of spiration (spiratio), so that there be some distinction of reason between them. For if they were altogether the same, to whomever it belonged to understand, to that one too it would belong to say; wherefore saying would be common to the three persons - which is absurd - because intellection belongs to them all.

Therefore, in our way of conceiving, to understand and to say differ; likewise to love and to spirate: not as two particular realities, in the way in which we say that the divine attributes differ among themselves, but as the included and the including, the exceeding and the exceeded. And just as in the divine things person differs from essence because it includes that and adds a peculiar mode by which the essence is contracted, so that it be a person, so the divine person is formally God and cannot be understood without the Godhead; thus the production of the Word, or saying, is intellection. Wherefore in God we can rightly distinguish two essential acts and two notional acts, yet in such a way that the essential acts are included in the notional; and therefore they are not four acts altogether diverse. On this account the opinion of those Thomists who say that to understand is something essential, and something notional and proper to the person of the Father, if it be rightly understood, is true: namely, if the essential "to understand" be included in the notional, and not altogether different from it, as we shall unfold. For which reason the Bishop of the Canaries, in the place cited, ought not absolutely to impugn the opinion of these men.

It follows that we say briefly what that peculiar element is which intellection or notional dilection, which is production, has over and above essential intellection. I say, therefore, that this alone is the relation of production (relatio productionis). For besides the order which an essential action has to the known or loved object, the notional, which is production, has another respect to the produced term: for at once it is engaged about the object while producing the term, and it produces the term while understanding the object or loving it, as will be made clearer in the solution of the second argument.

This doctrine is in harmony with St. Thomas in article 5 of this question, when he says that the processions in the divine things are to be taken according to two immanent actions, namely to understand and to will. Some, to whom Scotus's opinion is pleasing, respond that St. Thomas did not of set purpose say that the two processions in the divine things are those two immanent actions, namely to understand and to will; for thus he would prove what we contend: but that the processions in the divine things are to be taken according to those immanent actions, not in any other consideration, except because they presuppose them. But this interpretation seems quite forced. For if the processions did not formally include those immanent actions, but only presupposed them, it would not follow that the number of the processions should be taken according to the number of those immanent actions.

But on the contrary: And rightly is it inferred that there are only two emanations, because emanation itself ought to be an immanent action (actio immanens), and there are only two immanent actions. Add that St. Thomas, when from the number of actions he infers the number of emanations, asserts in the body of the article, and in the reply to the third, that one is of the Word, the other of Love; but the emanation of Love cannot be through any other operation than through love; therefore, just as the spiration of the Holy Spirit is through love, so the procession of the Word is through intellection.[53]

It is answered: Some, to whom Scotus's opinion is pleasing, respond that St. Thomas did not of set purpose say that the two processions in the divine things are those two immanent actions, namely to understand and to will; for thus he would prove what we contend: but that the processions in the divine things are to be taken according to those immanent actions, not in any other consideration, except because they presuppose them. But this interpretation seems quite forced. For if the processions did not formally include those immanent actions, but only presupposed them, it would not follow that the number of the emanations should be taken according to the number of those immanent actions.

From these things which were noted in the preceding chapter, those two arguments of Scotus, brought in chapter 2 of the disputation, can easily be dissolved. To the first it must be said that therefore it is not common to the three persons to produce the Word or the Holy Spirit, although it belongs to all to understand and to love: for neither by just any intellection in God is the Word produced, nor by just any love the Holy Spirit; but only by that intellection and that love which at once have the character and respect of production. But this is not in the three persons: rather intellection of this sort is in the Father alone, who alone speaks and begets; and spiration is in the Father and the Son only, who alone spirate. And hence the solution of Durandus's first argument, which we set down in the last chapter of the preceding disputation, remains more fully explained; and we shall also make it clearer by the following solution.

53. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 27, a. 5, ad 3; and ad 1 (on processions as of the Word and of Love).

To the later argument it is answered that although intellection, as it is intellection, is not a production of anything, but only is conversant about the object by way of an action which they call grammatical - that is, which regards not what is reproduced, but what is known or loved - nevertheless some intellection is so conversant about objects, whether known or loved, as also to produce - not indeed all the things known or loved, but - some term, which it simultaneously regards both as produced and as object; that is, which it so produces that by the same act essentially it either understands or loves. Of this sort are the notional acts in God. For the essential immanent actions in God are only by way of grammatical action, which is conversant about the thing understood or loved; and when the essential acts of intellection or of love are completed, nothing is produced in God. But the notional divine acts have this peculiarity, that at once they both produce the term and, in producing, they understand or love it - something which belongs to no created intellection or love. For in the human intellect and will the case stands far otherwise: although indeed our intellect by its own power produces something within itself, namely the expressed species (species expressa) of the thing understood, which we commonly call the word, nevertheless that production itself, or the coming-to-be of the expressed species, is not intellection, nor would I call it diction; rather, in us, to understand is formally nothing else than that the intellect be informed by the expressed species itself, which is the actual and living representation of the thing; and in this way the intellect also is said to be carried to the represented thing by way of an action which they call grammatical. Likewise the expressed species is the diction itself: for to understand and to speak, or to enunciate by the intellect, seems to be the same. It can also be called a word, not because it itself is said by the intellect, but because by it we say the thing which we understand: for the word of the voice also is that by which the thing signified is said; except that sometimes "word" is used for the thing said, sometimes for the diction itself; of which we shall treat more fully in disputation 141, chapter 4.

Wherefore a full likeness cannot be drawn from our intellect so as to understand the production of the eternal Word: for this has that peculiarity, that it is at once the production of the Word and the intellection of that which it produces; whereas our intellection is the very word by which formally we understand and say the thing; but the word itself is in no way understood, unless some cognition be reflected back upon it. We are compelled, therefore, to philosophize in a different way about the Word of God and about our own. For since the Father understands in His Word all the things which He knows by notional intellection, the notional intellection cannot be the Word itself; otherwise already the Father would be wise by a generated wisdom as by a form, which is false, as we shall show in disputation 151, chapter 6. Although each is wise in himself and intelligent even in notional intellection, we posit in the Father an active notional intellection, and we call this active generation. But because the quality of being wise in us inheres, and our word inheres in us, therefore we say that the expressed word by the power of our intellect is the very cognition by which we are wise, without any absurdity. How that quality is intellection we have said in part in disputation 38, chapter 2; but about this again in disputation 141, chapter 3. Wherefore we judge it worthwhile here to do nothing about the production of our word - about which the Canarian treats at length - and to forbear that disputation for now: both because the production of the divine Word is not altogether similar to this, and also because, although we should grant that a word is produced in us, it would not therefore be proved that it is also produced in God, although we grant to God true intellection; for unless faith taught the contrary, one could - just as before the mystery of the Trinity was revealed - grant intellection in God, but that it is His very essence (essentia) itself, not, however, the production of any word.

Disputatio CXIII - Which procession in the divine things is generation

Definition of generation, chapter 1.

The divine Word is truly begotten and Son; but the Holy Spirit not so: the Catholic faith teaches this, chapter 2.

Why the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation: the Fathers vary, chapter 3.

The reasons of St. Bonaventure, Durandus, Scotus, and Aegidius on the same matter, chapter 4.

The reason of Cajetan, the Ferraran, and other Thomists, chapter 5.

The foregoing reason is refuted, chapter 6.

The true reason why the procession of the Word is generation, but not the procession of the Holy Spirit, chapter 7.

The arguments against this latter reason are dissolved, chapter 8.

Caput I - The definition of generation

Among the divine processions which we have thus far assigned, that we may determine which is generation, first the true definition of generation must be explained. We premise that "generation" can be taken in two ways: one way generally, the other specifically. Generally it is any substantial change of matter from one form into another, which belongs as much to living things as to inanimate things; specifically, however, it is that which is found only in living things: this is what is wont to be defined properly. The origin of a living thing from a living thing from a conjoined principle, in a likeness of nature. This definition is given by St. Thomas in article 2 of this question and in Contra Gentiles IV, chapter 11;[54] but let us explain the individual parts.

The first is "from a living thing," whereby it is distinguished from generation in general, which is found in non-living things in the universe. The second is "from a conjoined principle," that is, from some separated part of the nature or substance by which generation is made, as by seed. The third is "in a likeness of nature"; this part is variously explained by the doctors. Some understand that the begotten ought to proceed into the same nature at least specifically, so as to be truly begotten and be called son. Others understand by likeness the image, as we shall explain below in chapter 7.

54. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 27, a. 2; Contra Gentiles IV, c. 11.

From this definition St. Thomas gathers that hairs and nails are not generated, nor are they sons: because, although they proceed from living beings and from a living being, yet they do not proceed into a likeness of nature. But more truly, both nails and hairs do not live. If, however, they did live, then indeed for another reason they would be called "begotten," yet not "sons," because namely they would be parts of the same living being: and therefore they would not proceed as a living being from a living being from a conjoined principle, that is, from separated seed; but would be produced by a certain extension of its substance and nature. Nor indeed would they be dissimilar in substantial nature, since they would live by the same animal form, although they would differ in the organs and instruments of life, seeing that they would not feel, as bones do not feel. For it can happen that the same rational soul imparts to some part a substantial grade of living, sentient, and rational nature; yet it does not impart the operations of sensing and understanding, that is, it does not impart the instruments for sensing and for arousing the intellect, as we see in bones. Nor indeed can one say that bones live by a different soul than the rational, since they are integral parts of the human being, and in a human being there is but one soul and substantial form. Nor, moreover, can the rational soul impart a substantial grade of living (which is generic) without also imparting the animal and sentient grades, which are inferior, and imparting the human or rational grade, which is in the highest species: because, since form is individual, it imparts the whole substantial grade to the matter of the individual, and the particular grades from the supreme genus down to the lowest species.

Then from that same definition it follows that Eve was not begotten of Adam, nor his daughter - not because in that manner above nature she was produced: for this would not be enough, if otherwise the parts of the definition were found in her; but because she was not produced from a conjoined principle, that is, from separated seed by the power of the living subject itself; but rather from the rib, by God Himself, as it were from matter, into which by His infinite power, without any disposition of another living subject, He infused the soul.

It seems that the aforesaid definition has been compiled by our theologians from various places in Aristotle. For although in Physics V, text 7 he more broadly defines generation, insofar as it is a change from non-subject into subject, nevertheless in Ethics VIII, chapter 12 he says that what is begotten is conjoined to the begetter; whence they gather that part of the definition, "from a conjoined principle"; and in Metaphysics VII, chapter 8, and De generatione animalium I and II, and De anima IV he teaches that the generator is like to the begotten, and conversely. From these places St. Thomas collects the aforesaid definition in Contra Gentiles IV, chapter 11.[55] But whatever may be Aristotle's mind in those places, the definition is deservedly approved by our theologians; for this reason Cajetan and the Canarian, and others his disciples, receive it with St. Thomas in II, article ... and Gabriel in I, dist. 13, q. 1, a. 1, although he delivers it in other words.[56]

55. Aristotle, Physica V, text 7; Ethica Nicomachea VIII, c. 12; Metaphysica VII, c. 8; De generatione animalium I - II; De anima II (IV in some reckonings).

56. Cajetan on Summa theologiae I, q. 27; the Canarian (Francisco Suárez) and his disciples on the same place; Gabriel (Biel), In I Sent. d. 13, q. 1, a. 1.

Yet against the aforesaid definition there is an argument of this sort. A horse begets a mule and is the father of it, and yet they are not similar in the same nature; therefore that definition is not good.

The Canarian replies that for our present purpose it is enough if it rightly proves that the Son is begotten, because He proceeds living from a living being in a likeness of nature; for whatever proceeds in this way is a son, although not every son proceeds in this way. But this solution, which he applies to that argument later, is less sufficient. For since here we are investigating the true definition of generation, we ought to assign it in such a way that it belong to every, and only to the, thing defined; otherwise, how would we say that the Word of God is the Son of Him of whom He is a living being from a living being, etc., if that is not a true definition of "son"?

A better reply is given by the same Canarian in an earlier place, namely, that the definition must be understood of generation which is not from accident and beyond nature, or monstrous, but of natural generation which frequently occurs. He gathers this answer from Aristotle, Metaphysics VII, chapter 8, text 28, where he says: "Now in certain cases it is manifest that if the father is like to the son, they are not one and the same in number, but one in form, as is the case in natural things; for a man begets a man, unless something happen contrary to nature, as a mare begetting a mule." Others gather the aforesaid solution of the argument, and the meaning of the definition, from De anima II, chapter 4, where he teaches that it is natural to living things to generate a thing like themselves, when the animal is perfect, and is not mutilated in its members, or spontaneously without seed is not born. Therefore, since mule-generation is for the most part beyond nature and monstrous, it is no wonder if it does not agree with the definition of generation.

But Aristotle's mind in those places is not to expound the nature and the definition of generation, but to explain what belongs to animals when they generate, namely, to beget a like to themselves, unless some defect intervenes; whether, however, to those things which are produced thus the ratio of generation and of sonship belongs, he does not define. Therefore we will say to the argument either that that part, "in the likeness of nature," belongs only to perfect and natural generations, not to monstrous ones: and from this let us gather which in God is true generation, and which person is truly Son, since nothing in God can be beyond nature and imperfect or monstrous; or if that be not positable, then that part does not signify the unity of nature even specifically, but the image of the Father's nature: the mule, however, and any animal begotten, even if it proceeds of a different nature, bears some image of the generator, as will be explained in chapter 7; and the greater the expression of the image, the more perfect will be the son and the generation. Wherefore the mule much departs from the nature of sonship, because it expresses the father's nature less perfectly; yet it does express it in some way, and thus it is in some manner his image and a son, even if it be of a different specific nature.

Durandus, however, in the first, distinction 4, question 1, number 8, thus defines generation: "The begotten" (he says) "is that which receives existence (esse) and nature from another in the mode of nature"; and he says that the mode of nature is when the one is from one and not from two; which he explains more at length in distinction 6, question 2; and we shall examine this below in chapter 4.[57]

Another definition, which John Major composed in the First Book, distinction 13, question 1, after the middle, it has seemed good to subjoin here: "Generation" (he says) "is a production not from nothing, by a living knowing being, from another of the same nature in number or in species; whether the thing have existence after non-existence, or always have existence - namely thus, that the produced thing, when there is generation, can act in the production, as the generating thing does." A prolix definition; yet he does explain some things which, although not expressed in the prior definition, are easily understood: such as this, "whether the begotten have existence after non-existence, or always have existence." For when the prior definition says, "It is the origin of a living thing from a living thing," it speaks universally, whether the origin be eternal or be in time; so too in this definition it is said, so as to exclude creation, "a production not from nothing"; and the clause "by a living knowing being" marks what is proper in perfect generation, without denying that in imperfect cases the generator may be non-rational. In this way both definitions, each in its own manner, intend the same notion of generation.

It is said, "Of the same nature in number or in species"; this is added on account of the divine generation, which is in the same nature in number. But this too was rightly understood in the former definition, in that part, "In the likeness of nature," as if it were said, "in the same nature, whether in number or in species."

Then Major adds in his definition two other things which do not seem to be contained in the former. One is that generation ought to be not only "of a living [being] from a living [being]," but also "of an animal and knowing [agent]." On this account among other living things, as in plants, there is not a generation of a son; for one tree is not said to be the daughter of another, even if it has been produced from its seed in the same nature. And although in common speech there are called "sons" of a tree, or of a shrub, or even of an herb, the sprouts or small branches which come forth from the same stock, nevertheless properly speaking they are not sons, whether we follow this, or the earlier, definition. For a son as supposit must differ from the father; but those small branches are joined to the same stock.

The other [point] which Major adds in his definition is that a son can be generated by equivocal or by univocal production; that is, in the same nature according to species, or in another: and that [a son], if he is able, likewise can also beget and produce another. By this part he wishes to exclude the Holy Spirit from the notion of a son, because he is so produced that, by personal property, it does not befit him to produce another. Now this part of the definition is taken from Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate VI, chs. 16 - 17, about which we shall also speak below.[58]

57. Durandus, In I Sent. d. 4, q. 1, n. 8; d. 6, q. 2. John Major (Ioannes Maior), In I Sent. d. 13, q. 1.
58. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate VI, chs. 16 - 17.

Objicitur: Yet Major objects to himself by this reasoning: A horse cannot produce another [animal] in the way the mule was produced from a horse, therefore [the mule] is not the son of the horse.

Respondetur: He himself answers that it is enough, in order that there be a son, if according to the propriety of its nature it befits [the animal] to beget, as indeed it befits; although by some accident it does not befit, as sometimes happens among men. Moreover, by experiment it is established that mules have sometimes been fertile for generating: indeed Theophrastus affirms that in Asia they often generate.

Caput II - That the divine Word is truly begotten and Son, but the Holy Spirit is not begotten

No Catholic doubts that the divine Word, the second person of the Trinity, is truly begotten and a son, and that his procession, since it is in the same nature in number, is generation: for this is gathered from certain testimonies of Scripture. In Isaiah 53 it is said, "His generation who shall declare?" - a place which we treated more fully elsewhere.[59] Some also prove it from that Psalm 2, "This day have I begotten thee"; but we showed above that that place is not understood of the eternal generation of the Son, but of Christ's resurrection.[60] It is proved, however, from that Psalm 109: "From the womb before the daystar I begot thee," where there is no doubt that the discourse is about the Messiah: since both Paul to the Hebrews 5 understands that saying of the same Psalm concerning Christ, "Thou art a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek"; and in Matthew 22 Christ adduces that saying of the same Psalm, "The Lord said to my Lord," to prove that in such wise the Messiah is the son of David, that he is also David's God and Lord. Therefore by those words there is not only expressed the generation of the Son, but how properly it is generation is shown, when it is said, "From the womb," which Theologians in the definition of generation call "from a conjoined principle." Moreover in John 1 it is said, "We have seen his glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten from the Father": for the particle "as" is not diminishing, nor a mere note of likeness; but the Hebrew phrase signifies the very truth: and so in the same chapter again "Only-begotten" is said without that particle, "The Only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father," etc. There also that very propriety of generation - namely, to be "from a conjoined principle" - is properly denoted, when it is said that the Son is "in the bosom of the Father." I pass over other places of the Old Testament, in which "wisdom begotten" is said; and what has been alleged thus far is sufficient for us.

But although the Son of God is truly said to be begotten, some nevertheless hold that he cannot be called a geniture (genitura): because St. Basil, in book 2 against Eunomius, in some measure censures him because he called the Son a geniture. I, for my part, do not doubt that the Son cannot be called a "geniture," since geniture does not signify the thing begotten, but the very act of bringing forth and the origin; whereas the Son is not an origin, but is born from the origin which is the Father. Yet from that testimony of Basil nothing is proved. For he, writing in the Greek tongue, was disputing not about the Latin name "genitura," but about the Greek name γεννημα; and he proved that the Word of God ought to be called either by the Greek name υιός, that is, son, or τέκνον, that is, one born; not however by that Greek name γεννημα, which in Latin is rendered fetus, shoot, fruit, progeny. Basil impugns Eunomius, first, because nowhere does Scripture use such a word; secondly, because no mother or father is wont so to call his son, but by one of the other two [terms]; thirdly, because it is a generic name, and is said as much of a fetus not yet formed and of an aborted [offspring], and of any shoot, even non-sentient, as of a son naturally born; in which sense wine is called "the offspring (genimen) of the vine" (Mark 14), where the same Greek name stands. Of animals, however, it is rarely said, unless of those which are reprobate and are taken into the image of depravity, as in Matthew 3 and Luke 3 the Jews are called by John the Baptist "broods (genimina) of vipers," where the aforesaid Greek name is put; wherefore the interpreter of Basil did not rightly render [it] by "geniture."

59. Vazquez, Disputation 18, ch. 7.
60. Vazquez, Disputation (same), ch. 3.

Nevertheless Gregory Nazianzen, a man of great authority, in Oration 2 on the Son, which is the fourth On Theology and now in the order the 36th, not far from the end, with the Greek name γεννημα calls the Son of the eternal Father; where in the Latin he says, "Let all the house of Israel know that this [man] whom the Lord has made both Lord and Christ." For here "made" is said of the work indeed of him "who is begotten," and of the good will of the begetter. For those words "of him who is begotten" in Greek is γεννημαζος. He also uses the same name in Oration 35 after number 10, where it is said, "and of these the other [is] offspring (soboles)"; but, as Athanasius says, Oration 3 against the Arians, after four leaves, the Arians maliciously confounded these two, γεννημα and ποιημα, that is, begetting and making.[61]

But the same truth has been defined by the Church in all the Councils in which the substantial equality of the Son with the Father is determined; and thus in the Nicene Symbol the Son is said "begotten, not made," and similarly in the Athanasian [Symbol].[62]

The same is clearly gathered from the aforesaid definitions of generation, as we shall show by running through the several parts. For the Son truly proceeds from the Father, a living [being], and knowing, from a living and knowing [one], as is plain; and from a conjoined principle, because he receives the same nature in number from the Father; whereby he surpasses in a wondrous way the other generations of animals, which are effected by some part of the substance - namely, by a seed - cut off and divided from the generator. For the eternal Father so produces the Son and unites him to himself, that he communicates to him his own essence and individual nature. And in this sense they explain that [saying] of Psalm 109, "From the womb before the daystar I begot thee"; St. Augustine there, and Fulgentius to the ninth objection of the Arians. Likewise St. Augustine understands in the same place that of John 1, "The Only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father."[63]

---

61. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 36 (old numbering: Oration 2 On the Son; the fourth On Theology), and Oration 35; St. Athanasius, Oration 3 against the Arians.

62. Symbolum Nicaenum (Nicene Creed); Symbolum Athanasianum (Athanasian Creed).

63. St. Augustine, on Psalm 109; Fulgentius, against the Arians, objection 9; cf. John 1:18.

Likewise that part [of the definition], "in the likeness of nature," befits [the Son], either because he is of the same nature with the Father, or because he is his image - this part indeed remains for us still to be explained, since this disputation will chiefly be about that; yet this is certain to all, that this part, in whatever way it be explained, rightly agrees with the Son.

Note, however, that the name of son and of generation is transferred to God in such a way that it is not metaphorically, as are anger and bodily members; but it is attributed properly, with those imperfections only removed which do not seem essentially to pertain to the formal notion of generation and of son, as that the son should depend on the father as on a higher cause, and that he should receive only a part of his substance, and other things of this sort. But that certain Fathers of the Church say that the name of generation, like many other [names], does not befit God properly, but in a certain likeness: this we have sufficiently explained above.[64]

- Of the Holy Spirit in like manner it is certain that he is not begotten: wherefore his procession is not called generation, but by the common name "procession," and by the proper [name] "spiration." Thus it is expressly defined in the Athanasian Symbol, received by the Church: "The Holy Spirit [is] from the Father and the Son; not made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding." And in the Apostles' Symbol, when it is said, "And [I believe] in Jesus Christ, his (namely, the Father's) only Son." And in the Nicene [Symbol] the Son of God is called "Only-begotten," in which way he is so called in Scripture: John 1, "glory as of the Only-begotten," and again, "the Only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father"; and John 4, "that he might give his Only-begotten Son." For if the procession of the Holy Spirit were generation, and he himself begotten, without doubt the Son of God would not be Only-begotten.[65]

Objicitur: You will object to us Solomon, who in Proverbs 4 says that he is "only-begotten" to his mother: although he had other brothers; and that they were from the same father David is excellently proved by Jansenius on the place cited of Proverbs 4; for in 1 Paralipomenon 3 it is said, "Moreover in Jerusalem were born to him" (namely, to David) "four of Bathsheba," who are said to be David's sons in 2 Kings 5; and thus Lyranus errs when in that chapter of Proverbs 4 he says that these three were Solomon's brothers from the father Uriah.

Solvitur: I answer that Solomon is not said to be his mother's "only-begotten" absolutely, but "before his mother (coram matre sua)"; because by her he was loved as Only-begotten; which the Seventy, attending to this, translated, "beloved before his mother's face." Since therefore in this sense the eternal Son of God cannot be called Only-begotten because he is singly loved by the Father - since the Holy Spirit is loved equally - it follows that "Only-begotten" is used in Scripture of the Son by reason of generation, because he is truly the only one brought forth by his Father by generation; therefore the Holy Spirit is not begotten. The same truth is defined in the Council of Toledo I, which was confirmed by Leo I, in the confession of faith; and in the Council of Toledo II.[66]

64. Vazquez, Disputation 22, ch. 4.
65. Symbolum Apostolorum (Apostles' Creed); Symbolum Nicaenum; John 1:14, 18; John 3:16.
66. Council of Toledo I (confirmed by Pope Leo I) and Council of Toledo II.

But although this is thus confessed by all Catholics, great controversy among them is engaged in the rendering of the reason for this doctrine. The reason for the doubt is this: since the Holy Spirit proceeds as a living [being] from a living principle conjoined [to him], and finally into the likeness of nature with the Father and the Son, because he has the same nature with them, it will come about that his procession seems to be generation, just as is the Son's production. We shall therefore refer the diverse views of the Fathers and of the Scholastics, and finally we shall submit what seems to us more probable.

Caput III - Why the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation; the Fathers vary

The Arians, Macedonians, and Eunomians (who strove to obscure the equality and divinity of the Holy Spirit), as Athanasius writes, in the Epistle on the Holy Spirit to Serapion, use this argument against Catholics and against us: Either the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, and so he will be the Son of the Father and the brother of the Son; or he proceeds from the Son alone, and so he will be the Son of the Son and the grandson of the Father; or from both, and then each will be his parent; and since both cannot be Father, the one will be mother, the other Father. They deduced this reasoning from here: because, since the Holy Spirit proceeds in the same nature, he no less ought to be begotten than the Son; but the Son is begotten. Therefore some absurdity follows from these things, as I have said, unless some reason be adduced to mark some difference between the true processions. Abelard reports the same suggestion; and, as Bernard says in Epistle 190, Abelard said that the Holy Spirit is not "of the substance" of the Father, lest he be his Son; and yet he said [the Spirit] is consubstantial with the Father. But these two are not consistent, as Bernard noted, unless he say that the Father and the Son proceed from the substance of the Spirit - which no one has said up to now. Wherefore Bernard says that it is necessary that he either say that the Holy Spirit is of the substance of the Father and the Son; or, with Arius, confess that he proceeds from the Father and the Son, but is not consubstantial with them. For if he is produced by them, and is of the same substance, assuredly he will be of their substance.[67]

Nevertheless, not a few grave Fathers of the Church did not dare to give any reason for this mystery - why the Holy Spirit does not proceed as Only-begotten, as the Word proceeds. Nazianzen, Oration 5 On Theology (which is in the beginning), thus says: "Do you ask, then, what this procession is? Explain to me the generation of the Only-begotten of the Father, and in turn I, as the interpreter of his nature, will expound it to you; and I will open to you the procession of the Spirit - so that we both may be raving as we pry into God's secrets." Damascene likewise confesses his ignorance in this matter, when in book 1 On the Orthodox Faith, chapter 10, he says in sum that we agree that generation and procession differ in ratio from each other; but as to the difference itself by what modes, we are not permitted to explain it.[68]

The Arians, Macedonians, and Eunomians, who taught against the equality and divinity of the Holy Spirit, as St. Athanasius writes in the Epistles on the Holy Spirit to Serapion, used this argument against the Catholics: Either the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, and thus He will be the Son of the Father and the brother of the Son, the grandson of the Father; or He proceeds from the Son alone, and then each will be His parent; and since both cannot be Father, one will be mother, the other Father. They drew this reason from here: since the Holy Spirit proceeds in the same nature, He ought no less to be begotten than the Son; but if He is begotten, some absurdity follows from what we said; or else some account must be assigned of a difference between the two processions. By the same line of reasoning Abelard, as is reported by St. Bernard in Epistle 190, said that the Holy Spirit is not of the substance (substantia) of the Father, lest He be the Son of that Father, and thus He would be less than the Father - assertions which do not cohere, as St. Bernard noted. Therefore he said either that the Father and the Son are not of one substance, or that the Holy Spirit proceeds from them not substantially; which no Catholic admitted.[69]

67. St. Athanasius, Epistulae ad Serapionem de Spiritu Sancto; Peter Abelard, as cited by St. Bernard, Epistle 190.

The same truth is defined in the Council of Toledo I, which was confirmed by Pope Leo I, in a confession of faith, and in the Council of Toledo II.[70] Likewise, since the Son is called Only-begotten (unigenitus): some, taking this into account, rendered "beloved" in place of "only-begotten"; but since in that sense the eternal Son of God could not be called Only-begotten because He is loved uniquely by the Father - seeing that the Holy Spirit also is loved equally - it follows that in Scripture He is called Only-begotten not because He alone is loved, but because He alone is truly produced for His Father by generation: therefore the Holy Spirit is not begotten. The same point is also expressed in the creeds and Scriptures.[71]

Yet although this is confessed by all Catholics, nevertheless a great controversy is carried on among them in giving a reason for this doctrine. The doubt has its ground because the Holy Spirit proceeds as living from a living principle conjoined, and finally in likeness of nature (natura) with the Father and the Son, since He has the same nature with them: it therefore seems that His procession should be generation (generatio), just as the Son's production is generation. We shall then report the diverse opinions of the Fathers and Scholastics, and at last we shall submit what seems to us more probable.

But first, some Fathers were not willing to give a reason for this mystery, why the Holy Spirit is not Only-begotten (unigenitus), if He proceeds in the same nature as the Son; and they restrained curiosity. St. Gregory Nazianzen says: "If you ask me what this procession (processio) is from the principle, I do not know; the generation, however, I honor by silence."[72] St. John Damascene likewise says: "We have found out that generation and procession differ from each other; but what the mode of this difference is entirely escapes us."[72] St. Augustine says the same. And among the Scholastics, the Master in I Sentences, distinction 13, question unica; Major in I, question 16, article 2; being pressed by the difficulty, affirm that no sufficient reason of this difference can be 68. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 31 (new numbering; old: Oration 5 On Theology); St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 10.

69. St. Athanasius, Epistulae ad Serapionem de Spiritu Sancto; Peter Abelard, as cited by St. Bernard, Epistle 190.

70. Council of Toledo I (confirmed by Pope Leo I) and Council of Toledo II.

71. Apostles' Creed; Nicene Creed; John 1:14, 18; John 3:16.

72. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 31 (new), and Orationes 35 - 36; St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 10.

72. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 31 (new), and Orationes 35 - 36; St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 10.

assigned, and they think the present remedy is to respond to heretics not so much by reason as by the perpetual tradition of the Church and the testimonies of Scripture - which indeed would be enough for Catholics.

But in very truth, since we ought to be prepared to give a reason for the faith that is in us, if in any way that can be done so that the mouths of heretics may be stopped, some of the ancient Fathers also attempted to present some reasons for this difference. Therefore St. Athanasius, in the place cited, first premised that this mystery is not to be curiously scrutinized - since the Cherubim, oppressed by its majesty, veiled their faces - and after he gathered from Scripture that the Son of God is Only-begotten and unique, he subjoins: "But still, lest our silence give the shameless (namely, the heretics) a pretext, let them in turn hear from us." He therefore immediately gives this reason, responding to the Macedonians' objection which we adduced above.

Among men, he who is called son is the father of another; and he who is father is the son of another; and every son has within himself a part of the father, so that he too may be able to beget and to be the father of another. But in God it does not so happen: for God does not have a divided nature, and the Father is not divided, nor does He beget a divided son, such that He could again beget another son. Therefore, because in the divine the Son is not a part of the Father, He Himself does not beget as He is begotten, but He is whole, the splendor and image (imago) of the whole Father. Hence he concludes that in the divine the Father is properly Father, and the Son properly Son: so that the Father is always Father - that is, He is never Son - and the Son is always Son and never Father.

Yet this reason is not effective. For if the eternal Son, receiving from the Father not a part of the nature and substance, but the entire and whole, in turn communicates it whole to the Holy Spirit whom He produces as like to Himself, there seems to be nothing to hinder His being said to beget. For if in human affairs a son, receiving a part of nature, who also communicates a part to another and makes him like to himself in species, is said to beget, why will not the Son of God, communicating His whole nature to the Holy Spirit, also be said to beget Him; just as the Father, because He communicates His whole substance to the Son, is said to beget Him - so that in the divine the Son might not be always Son, but might have the notion of Son and of Father? Surely the reason of Athanasius does not seem to impede this; but another is still to be desired.[73][74]

St. Augustine in De Trinitate V, ch. 14, says that there is, as it were, a contrary ratio of the procession of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: so that the latter is not begotten as the former; for the Word proceeds from the Father as born; but the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as given.[75] But with this reason the intellect does not rest. For when we inquire why the Son is generated in the divine, not the Holy Spirit, we also inquire why the Son proceeds as born, not however the Holy Spirit; for to proceed as born and as son is altogether the same: we therefore still desire a reason of this.

73. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 31 (old numbering: Oration 5 On Theology); St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 10.

74. St. Augustine, on Psalm 109; Fulgentius, against the Arians, objection 9; cf. John 1:18.

75. Vazquez, Disputation 22, ch. 4; St. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 53; Peter of Ailly, In I Sentences; Scotus, In I Sentences, dist. 13, q. 1.

Next, in De Trinitate IX, ch. 12, he thinks there is another cause of this difference: namely, that the Son proceeds by the intellect (intellectus), the Holy Spirit by the will (voluntas); wherefore the Son is a word (verbum), and a certain concept, or offspring (partus), but the Holy Spirit not so: because that which is produced through the intellect is preceded by a certain inquiry along with a desire of finding, and therefore the knowledge produced through the intellect is called an offspring or child (proles), since before its production the intellect, as it were, was in labor; which does not befit love, which proceeds from the will without inquiry, since it is occupied with a thing already possessed. But this reason is weak. For in God the intellect is directed toward the thing understood no less without inquiry and without the labor, as it were, of parturition, than the will toward the thing loved. Then also, even if in us the word of the mind would for that reason be said to be, as it were, a certain offspring, it is nevertheless so called metaphorically; for in reality there is neither offspring, nor son, nor child. If, therefore, by the same reason "begotten" and "child" were ascribed to the divine Word only metaphorically and by a certain appropriation, that would be absurd. It remains, then, that we render a reason why the production of the Word is not only said, but truly also is, generation, and the Word itself is truly begotten and Son.[75]

Finally, the same Augustine, De Trinitate XV, ch. 26, answers the difficulty in another way: he says, therefore, that because in God the Word proceeds from one, He is begotten and Son; but because the Spirit proceeds from two, He is therefore neither begotten nor son: for one who proceeds from two - as a son and begotten - proceeds from one as from a father, from the other as from a mother, which cannot be the case in the divine. This reason was also followed by Anselm in the Monologion, ch. 53, and Peter of Ailly in the first book.[75] But it has little weight. First, although among humans whatever proceeds as son proceeds from two - one as father, another as mother - this nevertheless does not seem necessary universally, even in God. For in the divine the second person proceeds as son and begotten from one only, which is singular and without example; why then could not the Holy Spirit proceed from two, just as son and begotten, even if not from one as from a mother and from another as from a father? Then also, although the Holy Spirit proceeds from two supposits, He is nevertheless produced by them as by one principle; and therefore it is not necessary that one be mother and the other father, which are two principles. Moreover, as Scotus noted in I Sentences, distinction 13, question 1, plurality or unity of principle does not vary the nature (natura) of the action, which indeed I would judge to be true - whether the action be generation or not - for otherwise plurality of supposits would matter very much, so that the Holy Spirit would proceed with a property of such a kind: we shall argue below against that same Scotus in Disputation 150.[75]

75. Vazquez, Disputation 22, ch. 4; St. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 53; Peter of Ailly, In I Sentences; Scotus, In I Sentences, dist. 13, q. 1.

75. Vazquez, Disputation 22, ch. 4; St. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 53; Peter of Ailly, In I Sentences; Scotus, In I Sentences, dist. 13, q. 1.

St. Basil, Against Eunomius, On the Holy Spirit, book 5, ch. 12, says therefore that the Holy Spirit is not to be called son, lest in the Trinity there be a son of the Son, and thus we fall under the suspicion that there are infinite sons or sons in great multitude. But I ask of Basil: either the Holy Spirit is truly son, or not. If He is truly son, what cause can there be for His not being so called, and for saying rather that He is not son? For to profess something by words and to hold the contrary in the heart is duplicity. But if He is not son, a cause must be given on account of which the Word of the Father is said to be begotten and Son rather than the Holy Spirit. For taking away from heretics the suspicion, lest they say there are sons in great multitude in the divine, cannot be a cause on account of which the Holy Spirit truly is not begotten or son; but if any suspicion were to occur to someone because of another mode of speaking, the cause could at most be one of speaking rather than of fact; yet not even in that way could anything obstruct the suspicion so as to hinder the Holy Spirit from being called son, if indeed He truly were such, as has been shown above.[72]

St. Bernard in that Epistle 190 thus replies to Abelard as objecting the aforesaid reason: even if the Holy Spirit is of the substance of the Father, for that reason He is not His son; for not everything that is of someone's substance straightway has, on that account, the one from whom it is as its begetter. He brings in the example of worms produced from the rotting of wood; of moths which proceed from the substance of cloth; of lice and nits which proceed from flesh or from human humor; and yet they are not sons. But to tell the truth, this solution does not fully satisfy, if we press the argument of the heretics thus. Not everything that proceeds from the substance of another is the son of that other; but everything that proceeds living and from a living being from the substance of that other - that is, from a conjoined, producing principle, and not merely as from matter - is the son of the one from whom it proceeds; or let something at least be given which is not son and yet proceeds in this way. But the Holy Spirit proceeds in this way: therefore He is a son. The examples of Bernard do not remove the difficulty: for either that which proceeds is not living; or it does not proceed from a living being; or it does not proceed from a conjoined principle and from the substance of the living being as from a principle.

Lastly, among the Fathers, Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, book 6, chs. 18, 19, 20, and 21, assigns this reason: that it belongs to the notion of son to be the image and figure of the father, which is especially considered in this, that the son receives the nature from the father together with the same power and potency of communicating it; and therefore the Word in the divine, by force of His procession, thus receives the nature from the Father that He can communicate it to the Holy Spirit - He is son and begotten; but the Holy Spirit, because He does not so receive it, is neither son nor begotten, but proceeding. This reason was followed among our Scholastics by Alexander of Hales in I, question 42, member 2, solution 1, and in member 3, article 2, to the third; and Major in I, distinction 13, question 1; and the same Major explained the ultimate definitions cited in the first chapter of this disputation.

---

75. Vazquez, Disputation 22, ch. 4; St. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 53; Peter of Ailly, In I Sentences; Scotus, In I Sentences, dist. 13, q. 1.

72. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 31 (new), and Orationes 35 - 36; St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 10.

This reason also does not persuade me, although the Son is image and figure of the Father - indeed in this the true ratio of sonship is considered, as we shall say: nevertheless, the ratio of image does not consist in this, that the son be able to communicate his own nature to another as the father does; but the ratio of image, which constitutes the true ratio of son, can very well be preserved without a fecundity of communicating one's own nature to another: wherefore he is no less a son and image of the Father who is unable to beget another son than he who can beget another son. Add that, if the Holy Spirit were to produce another person, by the same reasoning He would not be son and image, as indeed He is not now. Finally, if in human affairs a son produces another by generation, he produces him by that very generation; but in the divine the Son does not produce another by generation: therefore, in the mode of producing, the Son in the divine is not the image of the Father as He is among humans.

But you will say: at least in the divine the Son has the fecundity of producing another person and of communicating his own nature to him; which seems sufficient, that He Himself be son and the image of the Father. I answer: just as in the divine it is peculiar to the Son not to beget another son - although among humans one begets another - why cannot the Holy Spirit be son even if He were to produce no other, so that this would be peculiar in the divine? Thus far let it suffice to have said about the reasons of the Fathers. Nor let it be a wonder to anyone if none of them persuade us, and if we prefer to them the reasons of the Scholastics; for this matter has now been examined and disputed by the Scholastics far more, and much stronger reasons have been discovered by them, which we shall weigh in the following chapters.

Basil's reason is still efficacious. Basil, in book 5 against Eunomius, on the Holy Spirit, ch. 12, therefore says that the Holy Spirit is not to be called Son, lest in the Trinity there be a son of a son, and so we fall under the suspicion that there are either infinitely many sons in the divine, or at least a great multitude of them. But I would ask Basil: either the Holy Spirit truly is a son, or he is not. If he truly is a son, what cause can there be why he should not be so called, and should rather be said not to be a son? For to profess one thing in words and to think another in the heart is deceitful. If, however, he is not a son, a cause is to be given why the Word rather should be said to be generated and to be the Son of the Father than the Holy Spirit. For to remove from heretics the suspicion, lest they say that in the divine there is a large multitude of sons, cannot be a cause for which the Holy Spirit truly should not be begotten or a son; but, if that suspicion had any weight, it could only be a cause for preferring one manner of speaking over another. Yet not even in this way could anything be opposed to the suspicion so as to prevent the Holy Spirit from being called Son, if in reality he were such, as has been shown above.

Bernard's solution. Bernard, in that Epistle 190, thus answers Abelard when he objects the foregoing reason: even if the Holy Spirit is of the substance of the Father, he is not therefore the Father's son; for not everything (he says) that is of some substance immediately has as its begetter him of whom it is. He gives the example of worms that are produced from rotting wood, of moths that come forth from the substance of cloth, and of lice and nits that proceed from flesh or from human moisture - and yet they are not sons. But, to tell the truth, the solution does not fully satisfy, if we press the heretic's argument in this way: not everything that proceeds from the substance of another is that other's son; but everything that proceeds living and from a living being from its substance - that is, from a conjoined producing principle, and not merely as from matter - is the son of the one from whom it proceeds; or let there be granted something that is not a son and yet proceeds in this way. But the Holy Spirit proceeds in this way: therefore he is a son. Bernard's examples do not remove the difficulty. For either that which proceeds is not living, or it does not proceed from a living being, or not from a conjoined principle, and from the substance of the living being as from a principle.

Lastly, from the Fathers Richard of St. Victor also brings forward a reason in chs. 18 and 19, namely, that it pertains to the ratio of a son to be the image and figure of the Father; and, in that he principally receives the nature from the Father with the same virtue and power of communicating it - so that he can, as it were, communicate - he is a son. But the Holy Spirit was not thus begotten, rather he proceeds; therefore he does not receive the nature with such fecundity of communicating; therefore he is not a son, nor the image of the Father. This reason does not seem sufficient to me: for a son is not an image on this account - that he be able to generate another son; in this, indeed, we will say lies a ratio not of the son but, rather, of what is required so that he be able to communicate further, as in that fecundity which constitutes the power of generating another; yet the reason which saves the image can be had perfectly well without that power of communicating the nature. Add that, if he were to produce another person by generation, he would be a son and an image of the Father; but if he does not produce another, he is not therefore not an image of the Father. Finally, if in the divine the Son does not have a peculiar power of generating another person - as indeed he does not generate - nonetheless he is a son, and an image of the Father.

Objection against this refutation. But in the divine it is peculiar to the Son that, if he were to generate another son, he would then beget another; why, then, is he not called Son, even if he has not that act, since it is enough that he have the same nature, which pertains to the ratio of sonship and image?

Reply. We say that not all reasons please everyone equally; and it is not a wonder if something is not proved to someone by us, and we prefer these reasons to those: since this matter has been much more examined and disputed by the Scholastics, more efficacious reasons have been discovered by them, which we shall weigh in the following chapters.

Caput IV - The reasons of Bonaventure, Durandus, Scotus, and Aegidius on the same question

Bonaventure in I, dist. 13, q. 2, ad 1; Richard, dist. 13, art. 1, q. 3; and Alexander of Hales, part 1, q. 43, memb. 1 near the end, in order to establish the distinction between the procession of the Son and of the Holy Spirit - why one rather than the other should be called generation - signify that there is a threefold mode of production: first, according to will; second, beyond nature; third, according to nature. The first mode was in the creation of Adam, who was made by the will of God. The second was in the production of Eve, who was formed beyond nature from the rib of Adam. By the third mode Abel was produced from Adam and Eve. They add, then, that generation is the begetting of a living thing by a living thing in the order of nature, not of will or beyond nature. Hence they gather that the procession of the Son is generation, because it is by the intellect and therefore according to nature; and that the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation, because it is by the will, and therefore is neither according to nature nor in a natural mode.[76]

This reason on one side seems to be followed by Durandus, In I, dist. 6, q. 4, n. 16 and following; and on the other side by a reason of St. Augustine which we set out a little above out of De Trinitate XV, ch. 27.[77] Durandus therefore teaches that, although the Son and the Holy Spirit proceed in the mode of nature if they be referred to the producing virtue - because each proceeds necessarily from a principle determined on one side and immutable - yet if they be compared with the supposits from whom they proceed, the Son indeed is produced in the mode of nature, but the Holy Spirit in the mode of will. Therefore, since it belongs to the ratio of son and begotten to proceed in the mode of nature, not of will, as Bonaventure himself teaches, the procession of the Son is generation, not so the procession of the Holy Spirit.[78]

The mode of producing from nature and will, if the producing supposits be considered, Durandus thus explains: to proceed from one and not from several of the same order and of the same grade and perfection, any one of which would of itself be sufficient to produce the effect - then indeed several come together to the same effect by will alone, mutually modifying their power - this is to proceed in the mode of will. Therefore, since the Son proceeds from one, he proceeds in the mode of nature; but to proceed in the mode of will is to proceed from several of the same order, any one of which would of itself be sufficient; therefore, since the Holy Spirit is produced by the Father and the Son, he proceeds in the mode of will, not of nature.[79]

This ratio, however it be explained, does not seem to be embraced. First, because if the ratio of these Doctors were this, namely that the very mode of proceeding both of the Holy Spirit and of the Son is natural - that is, determined to one, according to the mode of nature - and not voluntary, that is, free and indifferent, then nothing on this score would be lacking to the Holy Spirit why he should not be said to be Son and begotten. Wherefore that mode by which the Holy Spirit proceeds by will is far different than that by which Adam was produced by God, who proceeded from God in such a way that, if God had willed, he could not have produced him. From that mode, then, Bonaventure and the others do not rightly conclude that the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation; just as the production of Adam was not generation, because the Holy Spirit proceeds by necessity and the immutability of nature.

Next, against Durandus it is argued thus. That two supposits should come together to produce the Holy Spirit, even preserving a likeness taken from human things, does not prove that the procession of the Holy Spirit is in the mode of will rather than of nature. First, because when two 76. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 13, q. 2, ad 1; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., dist. 13, art. 1, q. 3; Alexander of Hales, Summa, part 1, q. 43, memb. 1, near the end.

77. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 6, q. 4, n. 16 and following; St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, ch. 27.

78. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 4, q. 1, art. 1, q. 8, that the procession of the Son is generation, not so the Holy Spirit's.

79. Durandus, loc. cit., on the difference of proceeding from one or from several of the same order and perfection, each sufficient of itself for the whole effect.

created agents, being perfect, come together to produce one and the same effect which either could produce of itself, they thus come together freely, that is, indifferently: they do not meet and operate naturally. Rightly, then, they are said to operate by will. But if their coming together were altogether natural and necessary, the mode of operation, too, would be natural. But to produce the Holy Spirit, the Father and the Son come together altogether naturally and necessarily; therefore they operate rather in a natural than in a voluntary and indifferent mode. Then also, in the opinion of Durandus, so that two may be said to produce one and the same effect in the mode of will and not of nature, it is necessary that each of them be such as to be able of itself to produce the whole effect entire; for thus, when the two come together at once, as if by their own will, they temper and modify one another's power. But the Holy Spirit is so produced by the Father and by the Son that he cannot of himself proceed from each as from a proper property and character, as we shall show against Scotus in disputation 151. Therefore the mode of producing the Holy Spirit is not made like to agents by will.

Moreover, if for no other reason the mode by which the Father and the Son produce the Holy Spirit is likened to the mode of acting by will, than that there are two producing supposits - since in other respects the mode is truly natural - it follows that the Holy Spirit, by a certain likeness alone, does not seem to be not begotten because he is from two, whereas in reality he is begotten; for he proceeds from two in a natural mode.

Scotus' true solution, if it be proved from supposits. Scotus, however, in I, dist. 13, the sole question, toward the end, easily frees himself from this difficulty. He says, therefore, that these processions differ of themselves, and thus that the production of the Son is of itself formally and by its own nature generation; but that the procession of the Holy Spirit is not of itself generation, but is to be distinguished from it. Scotus is not speaking of the distinction of realities - which others rightly say must be taken from opposition, as will be proved in disputation 149 - but of a quasi-specific distinction, by reason of which one is generation, the other not; and the one proceeding by the one is Son, by the other, not. Aegidius adds likewise, In I, dist. 13, art. 2, that these processions are distinguished formally from the termini produced; which, although it is most true, nevertheless one ought to assign some property in the terminus of the one which is not in the terminus of the other, by which one rather than the other be generation. Just as it is not enough to answer with Scotus that these processions differ of themselves; one must explain what the reason is on account of which the one is of itself generation, the other not.[80]

Caput V - The reasoning of Cajetan, Ferrara, and other Thomists

The disciples of St. Thomas come closer to the true solution of this difficulty; among whom Cajetan - whom many later men follow - proposes this reason why the Word is generated and is Son, but not the Holy Spirit: namely, because the procession of the Word is by the intellect; but that which proceeds by the intellect, by the force of its procession, produces a like to the principle producing; whereas the Holy Spirit proceeds by the will, and that which proceeds by will, by the force of its procession, does not produce a like to the principle producing. Therefore, since to the definition of generation which was set forth above there must be added this part, By the force of its production, it follows that the production of the Word, not of the Holy Spirit, is generation. Moreover, that this clause must be added to the definition is manifest: for although something proceeds living from a living being in the likeness of nature, nevertheless if it does not have this likeness by the force of its production, but from elsewhere, that will not be said to be generated. But the Holy Spirit, even if he proceeds like in nature, does not have that by the force of his production, but from elsewhere, because the very production of his - which is by will - although it is in such a subject, is not, for that reason, generation. But the production of the Son, not only because it is in such a subject, but because it is by the intellect, produces a like; therefore it is generation. St. Thomas touches upon this reason in this question, art. 4, although expressly he does not add that part, By the force of his procession, nor say that it should be added to the definition of generation.[81]

80. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 13, the sole question, toward the end; Aegidius (Giles of Rome), In I Sent., dist. 13, art. 2.

But that this diversity between the procession by intellect and by will may be explained more fully, Cajetan notes, and shows that that which proceeds in God by love does not proceed like by the force of its procession, in that below, q. 35, art. 2, he notes that love in general can be contracted in two ways so that it be such or such a love: in one way, by intrinsic differences, that is, the specific and formal ones within the genus of love; in the other way, by extraneous differences which are outside the genus of that love. Just as color is contracted in the first way by the difference of white and black; in the latter way, by the difference of natural and artificial, which are taken from the subjects themselves. Therefore love in the former way is contracted by the differences of the love of friendship and of concupiscence; in the latter way, however, it is contracted by the differences of such a subject, or even of an object. Hence to be a divine love, or to be about God as object, he says, comes from some extraneous difference, not from a formal and intrinsic one. From this he gathers the discrimination between the procession of the Word and of the Holy Spirit: for the Word, since he proceeds by the intellect, by the force of his procession within the genus of that thing proceeds like and as the image of the Father; for intellection, within its own genus, has this proper quality, that it produces a like to the producing principle. But love, within the genus of love - even when contracted by its proper differences - never produces a like; if, however, insofar as it is divine, it produces a like in the same nature, namely the Holy Spirit, it has that not from its own proper genus, nor from its own proper intrinsic difference, but from an extraneous difference, namely from the subject; for to be divine is not an intrinsic and proper difference, but an extraneous one. The same doctrine Cajetan explains in q. 35, art. 2, on this proposition: The Holy Spirit by the force of his procession proceeds as divine love. Either the sense is: the Holy Spirit proceeds as divine love - that is, as God - by the force of his procession; and this is false, because he does not proceed as God by the force of the procession within the genus of procession, but only by reason of an extraneous difference which comes from the subject. Or the sense is: the Holy Spirit by the force of his procession proceeds as love - that is, specified by its own proper difference - and this is true. In the same way he interprets that proposition which the holy

81. St. Thomas, in this question, art. 4.

Doctor has in the place cited at the end: that love (in that case proceeding like to the principle producing) common to the genus of love, is not proper to the Holy Spirit, insofar as he is divine; but insofar as he is divine he proceeds by an extraneous difference, not a proper and intrinsic one. In the same way Ferrara's doctrine is to be looked at, who likewise teaches that intellection and love can be considered in a twofold manner; either as they are divided and determined by the creature and by the uncreated, which are extraneous to the ratio of intellection and of love; and therefore they are called extraneous differences by Cajetan; or as they are divided by perfections and by very perfections, which per se and properly differentiate operations. Therefore, since we are now speaking of the Word inasmuch as he is an intellection which proceeds, he proceeds like in nature, not insofar as he is an intellection which is divine - because then he is not produced in the same nature - but insofar as he is intellection as such; nor does love, insofar as it is divine, constitute that: for here too the Spirit proceeds in the same nature - not insofar as he is divine, but insofar as he is love; insofar as he is most perfect love, he is not to be considered insofar as he is divine; therefore love as such, and the procession of it, produces like to the principle producing, insofar as it is intellection; for insofar as it is perfect intellection, it produces the most perfect like in the same nature. But the true love, not only insofar as love in general, but even insofar as it is most perfect love in the genus of love, does not produce like to the principle of loving; nor does the most perfect love produce the most perfect like. Therefore only love, insofar as it is divine - that is, in such a subject (which of itself does not pertain to the genus of love) - produces a like; which is not sufficient for the ratio of generation: for this, from its own proper power within its genus, ought to produce a like in nature to the principle producing.[82]

Caput VI - Refutation of the preceding reasoning

The aforesaid reason of Cajetan and Ferrara, although at first sight it seems subtle, yet, when more thoroughly considered, has little weight. At length the Canarian impugns it in the second article of this question and in its commentary; and we too shall confute it with some other arguments.[83]

First, I for my part do not see why that part, By the force of its procession, should be added to the definition of generation, when without it the nature of generation and of the begotten is very well explained. For if something should proceed living from a living being in the likeness of nature - sufficing this, when it is a proceeding from a conjoined principle - it is not fitting to add other things: and thus the Son is generated; our addition of that part, By the force of production, seems only in words to overturn the force of the arguments. For whatever in creatures is produced like to a living being from a living being, from a conjoined principle, cannot but so proceed; not by accident, but by the very force of the production and of generation; and thus it could not be that it should not truly be generated and be a son. Therefore that part, By the force of production, would be sufficiently excluded from the ratio of the begotten by some other part of the definition: since in creatures the aforesaid definition seems to have been taken, it is to be accommodated to God in the same manner (with the imperfection removed), as we noted in ch. 1; nor must some new part be added, namely that which, because of the sole difference which that definition has in the divine - according to Cajetan's second way of philosophizing and of others - is added, a part which in human things was not necessary.

82. Cajetan, In I, q. 35, a. 2 (on the twofold contraction of love by intrinsic and by extraneous differences), and on the proposition that the Holy Spirit proceeds by the force of his procession as divine love; Ferrara (Sylvester Ferrariensis), on the same matter, distinguishing intellection and love as divided by creature and uncreated (extraneous) and by perfection (proper).

83. The Canarian (Canariensis), against the second article of this question and its commentary.

There is no need to add it; this device seems plainly a contrivance and useless.

But come, let us add that part, "by force of the procession," and let us prove still that the reason assigned is not sufficient, namely that the procession of the Holy Spirit is not generation, as follows. Either the Son proceeds similar in nature by force of a procession, insofar as it is a procession by the intellect, or insofar as it is by such an intellect. Not insofar as it is by the intellect; for then every procession by the intellect would be generation. Therefore insofar as it is by such an intellect. When, then, that part "by force of the procession" is added, it is not to be understood of procession by the intellect in general, but of that procession by which the Word proceeds, namely of the divine intellect. But if we so speak of the procession of the Holy Spirit, in the same way he proceeds similar in nature by a vital procession, namely by the divine will; therefore the Holy Spirit will be no less begotten than the Son.

Some reply that this is peculiar to the procession of the Word: that, through it, insofar as it is a procession by the intellect in general, it proceeds similar to its principle; but insofar as it is by such an intellect, it proceeds similar in nature. Yet the Holy Spirit has both, namely that he proceeds similar and that he proceeds in the same nature by force of such a procession, and he has neither by force of the procession by the will insofar as will is will. But this is frivolous; for that part, "by force of the procession," is so added to the definition and refers to the whole, as to signify that the whole of that, namely that it is similar in nature, comes to the begotten thing by force of the procession by which it proceeds, and not otherwise. Wherefore, if the whole does not belong to the Son of God save by reason of such generation, it matters little if it belongs to him to proceed similar by force of a procession by the intellect, as though rather the definition of generation should fit him than the Holy Spirit; and it seems sufficient that it belong also to the Holy Spirit, if both belong to him, namely to proceed similar and in nature by force of such a procession. Wherefore omitting this solution, let us come to the doctrine of Cajetan and of Ferrariensis.

We must prove against Cajetan that procession both by the divine will and by the divine intellect, according to its specific and proper and intrinsic ratio within the genus of procession, produces something similar in the same nature; and this is shown thus.

First, love in general, both of friendship and of concupiscence, is most aptly divided into created and uncreated; and those two differ more than two differences under the same genus; they differ analogically, since in nothing do they agree univocally; wherefore created love and uncreated love under these notions are essentially first diverse: nor is "created" something that befalls our love, nor "uncreated" love divine; therefore created love within its own genus, down to the ultimate species, is always essentially an accident, and for that reason it always, by the force of its own genus and nature, produces an accident and only a likeness of representation, not a likeness in the same nature with the principle. Wherefore by that which is within its own genus it never produces a son nor anything properly begotten. But divine love is in another genus altogether diverse, namely in the genus of the uncreated; for all the things that belong to God and to creatures differ more than by genus; but its nature within its own genus is to be uncreated, not dependent on another, not accidental, but substantial; so that the willing of God by its own proper ratio has existence as substance, and thus it is with the very existence (esse) of God, although it is conceived by us as an affection of that substance: therefore, by the force of its own nature and specific difference, it has to produce a similar [thing] in nature, because it is substantial love.

Second, this is the proposition "in the fourth mode of saying per se": "divine love produces God"; therefore this belongs to it by force of its principle, not from the subject in which it is received, as it were by accident; just as it is per se for heat to heat, but to harden is not per se but is accidental, because it comes from the subject. For who would say that it is accidental and not per se that there belongs to divine love by its nature to produce God; but that this comes to it by accident by reason of the subject - especially because divine love does not operate upon the divine nature as upon a subject (as heat upon clay), but it operates upon the divine nature in such wise as to have from it the power of producing the Holy Spirit; either because will by its own nature is the same as the divine nature, or because, although it is conceived by us as an affection of the nature, nevertheless it is understood as secondary to that [nature], as to the primary principle, for producing God in the same nature. Wherefore that which is set forth as the proximate principle, will modified in our mode of conceiving by relation (as we shall say in Disputation 164), is as it were even the substance itself modified the primary and chief [principle], by the power of which a person comes forth in the same numerical nature. Therefore it belongs per se to the Holy Spirit to proceed similar in the same nature, insofar as it is referred to the principle of his production; and hence his procession, as it is from such a principle, has per se to produce a similar [thing], not, therefore, by an extraneous and accidental difference, but within its own genus it has that [property] as proper to it.

Third, although intellection in any intellect produces a likeness of representation of the thing understood and of the principle understanding, nevertheless within the created genus it never produces a likeness in substantial nature; wherefore no intellection in that genus is generation, but that intellection alone which is divine and is in the genus of the uncreated. For this is substance and the existence (esse) of the intelligent itself; just as uncreated love is the existence of the loving itself. Therefore either to be divine is an extrinsic difference and not proper to intellection in its own genus, or it is proper and intrinsic. If it is extrinsic, as Cajetan said of love, then that which proceeds in God by force of divine intellection does not proceed as begotten in its proper genus and by its proper difference, but by reason of the subject and by an extraneous difference; therefore either neither person is begotten, or both must be begotten. But if to be divine is the proper and intrinsic difference of intellection, it will also be of love; and thus each person will proceed similar by a vital procession; therefore each will be begotten in the same way. There is added that St.

Thomas in the second article of this question shows that the Word in the divine [persons] proceeds in the same nature, because it proceeds by intellection, and the intellection of God is the existence of God himself; and, in the solution to the second [objection] of the same article, he says that therefore the word in us does not proceed similar to the intelligent in substantial nature, because to understand in us is not substance nor the existence of the intelligent; but in God therefore it proceeds similar to the producer in the same nature, because it is substance and the existence of God himself who understands: by which words he undoubtedly assigned the proper and intrinsic difference of the divine intellection, from which it follows that it produces a similar [thing] to the producing principle in substantial nature; but we can in very truth and in the same way say this of love: namely, that in us by it nothing proceeds similar in substantial nature, because it is an accident; but in God, because it is very substance and the existence of God, not otherwise than intellection, by it there proceeds similar in the same nature: therefore there is altogether the same ratio of the divine intellection and of love.[84]

Others have devised a new evasion, fabricated in words alone while in reality they say nothing different from Cajetan: they therefore assert that there is a difference between uncreated will and uncreated intellect; that will, even insofar as it is uncreated and divine, does not, from its proper genus and as it were proper difference (which they call divine and uncreated), produce a similar [thing] in substance; but insofar as it operates in the divine nature, by reason of which the things produced in it are the same with it, since it can admit nothing extraneous with itself. But the uncreated intellect, insofar as it is uncreated, from its proper difference produces a similar [thing] in substantial nature, because, insofar as it is uncreated, it uses the divine essence itself as intelligible species and principle of understanding; which principle, unless there be in the subject in which it operates an impediment (as there is in the blessed creatures), requires that it produce for itself that which is similar in substantial nature. And on that account in God intellection, insofar as it is such, has this as peculiar from its proper genus, that it produce a similar [thing], not so love, save by reason of the subject.

Behold, these fall again into Cajetan's distinction, already sufficiently refuted by us. For although they grant that "created and uncreated," "divine and human," are differences per se of intellect and of will, yet what is "of itself" in the divine nature they think to be extraneous by reason of which they claim, not by reason of the proper difference of divine love, that the Holy Spirit proceeds similar in the same nature; which in my judgment has already been sufficiently impugned.

But finally let us press them first with this reason: to be love is to be divine, just as to be uncreated is; but we call it "divine" not because it is in the divine nature only as in a subject, but because it is from it as from the principle of loving; for love is not from the naked will, except insofar as will is in the divine nature as its affection in our way of understanding, and it is made fruitful by it for loving and for producing God in the same nature; or insofar as it is in reality the same as the divine essence, the same as that having fecundity with it. Therefore in God love, from its principle and not only from the subject, will produce that which is similar, just as intellection; wherefore for love to be uncreated is the same as to be divine, that is, [to be] from the divine nature as from the principle making the will fecund: to be therefore in the divine nature in this way is the per se difference of love, just as to be uncreated is; and hence precisely by the proper difference and not by reason of the subject, by love in God God proceeds similar in nature.

84. St. Thomas, I, q. 27, a. 2, the body and ad 2.

I say: the Holy Spirit thus proceeds by the will of the Father and the Son, that he proceeds from the principle of love, as from an understood Word; just as in us the word, or the thing understood, is the principle of love; only that in God the Word is not merely the thing known and as object, but is also truly the beloved and at once the lover by the same producing principle; and hence also as a producing principle it loves the Father, from whom it proceeds by intellection. Insofar as, however, the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Word in God, he is produced similar by his own proper principle in the same nature; and love, because it is produced from the same principle, has to produce a similar [thing]: just as in us the thing understood, which is a substance, conjoined in such wise as to concur with the producing principle, not only as object, produces the love; by the force of its own existence it sufficiently supplies that the ratio "to proceed similar by force of the procession" in its proper species be fulfilled. And in this way the Doctors commonly teach that the Holy Spirit proceeds by his own proper procession. And let the intelligent consider well how felicitously the authorities are harmonized: that the Holy Spirit, by the very reason of love as divine, proceeds simple in the same nature, from which it is clear that no extraneous reason of principle or of subject is required, but the proper ratio of principle which the divine nature has is sufficient, and is, as is proper, that of will. And thus Cajetan's error is cut off.

Additionally, they object that the proximate principle of procession by the intellect is the essence of God, inasmuch as in the procession by the will it looks toward that [essence] as to its own principle, in which it proceeds; which [claim] shows the same thing that we said above: that that which proceeds similar in nature is produced by the proper principle of the producer; that which proceeds by intellection, because it is produced by the most intimate principle of the producer - namely, the proximate principle producing that which is similar in nature - therefore the proximate principle of intellection differs only by our mode of conceiving from the proximate principle of will: both are the same in God, namely the divine essence, which as species to the intellect, as good to the will, is related, yet both are intrinsically the most proximate principle. Hence their difference - "one is as object," "the other as the very faculty" - does not block that either way what proceeds be not generation; for there is no reason why that which proceeds by love should be any less like in nature than that which proceeds by intellection. Consequently what they say about the "remoteness of the principle" is likewise of no moment: for whether that which proceeds similar be said to proceed by nature from a remote principle that secondarily renders a proximate principle fruitful, or by nature from the proximate principle itself, it matters little for its being called "begotten": for no Scholastic has ever demanded for the ratio of generation any more than this, that what proceeds similar in nature proceed by force of the conjoined principle and not otherwise by accident. Now the conjoined principle is the same in both processions, the intellect and the will.

It is added that the proximate principle of procession by the intellect, which is the divine essence, does not produce a similar [thing] in substantial nature because it is proximate principle "in the mode of object," and because it is the same with the intellect itself; in the second [way], because it is immediate: for in the blessed it is a proximate principle, and yet it does not produce a similar [thing] since it is not the same with the intellect. But it is not enough for the will that in God it be the same with the essence and that by it, as by a second [principle], a similar [thing] be produced in nature, that it be called "generated," as they say of intellection. I say, on the contrary, that according to Ferrariensis one must not in any way make this difference; for either he speaks of intellection in its proper genus, insofar as it is the most perfect, and of love in truth also as most perfect; or else, while he thinks he is presenting perfection in creatures alone by intention, or otherwise, he presents an accidental perfection; but intellect is most perfect, that is, uncreated and subsistent in genus, just as the divine essence is. If he speaks in the former way, then it follows that by the most perfect love a similar [thing] in substantial nature is produced; but then what he says of intellection does not differ from what we say of love, namely that love is substantial and that by it what proceeds is per se and not accidental; and that which proceeds by those operations is not an accident but substantial. But if in the latter way he speaks of intellection as most perfect operation insofar as it is such, that is, most perfect by essence, then here again he plainly embraces Cajetan's view, which we have very often impugned: for thus the Holy Spirit in God, just as the Word, proceeds by cognition, namely insofar as both are divine; that is, uncreated; he proceeds similar in substantial nature, and in the same mode.

On the same

The same doctrine explains Cajetan, in I, q. 35, a. 2, on this proposition: "The Holy Spirit proceeds by the force of his procession as divine love." Either the sense is that "the Holy Spirit proceeds as divine love, that is, as God, by the force of his procession," and this is false; because he does not proceed as God by the force of his procession within the genus of procession, but only by reason of an extraneous difference, which comes from the subject. Or the sense is that "the Holy Spirit by the force of his procession proceeds as divine love," that is, specified by his proper difference, and this is true. In the same way he interprets that proposition which St. Thomas has at the end of this second article of the present question: "How much this - namely to proceed similar to the producing principle - belongs to love, which is the Holy Spirit, insofar as he is divine": that this is true only by reason of an extraneous difference, not proper and intrinsic.

To the same outlook seems to tend the doctrine of Ferrariensis, proposed in the fourth contrary, chapter 11, who says that intellection and love can be considered in a twofold way: either insofar as they are divided and determined by "created" and "uncreated," which are outside the ratio and genus of intellection and love, and therefore are called extraneous differences by Cajetan; or insofar as they are divided by "perfect" and "most perfect," which are per se and proper differences of these operations. Therefore, since the divine Word, by the force of the intellection by which he proceeds, is born similar in nature, not indeed insofar as intellection is intellection, for so it is not produced in the same nature, as is clear, nor only insofar as it is divine (for so also from love, insofar as it is divine, the Spirit proceeds in the same nature), but from intellection insofar as it is most perfect, without considering whether it be divine: for this reason he is Son, and his procession is generation. For if intellection produces a similar [thing] to the principle insofar as it is intellection, that intellection which is most perfect will produce a most perfect similar [thing]; but a most perfect similar [thing] is in the same nature. On the other hand, love, not only as love universally, but also as most perfect in the genus of love, does not produce a similar [thing] in the same nature; because since love does not produce proper differences, it never produces a similar [thing]. But if insofar as it is divine it produces a similar [thing] in the same nature, namely the Holy Spirit, it has that not from its proper genus nor from a proper intrinsic difference, but from an extraneous difference, namely from the subject; for to be divine is not an intrinsic and proper difference, but an extraneous [one].

The Canarian attacks, among other reasons, these very positions of Cajetan and Ferrariensis; and we too shall refute them with some other reasons. First indeed I for my part do not see why that part, "by the force of the procession," should be added to the definition of generation, when without it the common nature and definition of generation and of the begotten are best explained. For if something proceeds living from a living in similarity of nature, as Eve proceeded from Adam, for this very reason it proceeds by generation; because that part, "from the conjoined principle," does not belong to it: if, however, that also belong, as we have explained in chapter 1, then the whole definition and nature of generation would fit it. Finally, whatever proceeds similar in nature from a living and from a principle conjoined cannot proceed so not by accident, but by the force of production and of generation; and thus it cannot but be generated and be a son. Therefore in vain do they add that part "by the force of the production," only that by words they may seem to elude the force of arguments; since whatever in creatures proceeds similar to a living by accident and from elsewhere than by the force of the procession, can sufficiently be excluded from the notion of the begotten by some other part of the definition: and since it seems that the aforesaid definition is taken from the creatures in the same way (the imperfect things being only excluded) to be accommodated to God, as we noted in chapter 1, no new part ought to be added. Wherefore if, because of the sole difficulty which that aforesaid definition has in divine things following the manner of philosophizing of Cajetan and others, that part be added which in human things was not necessary, truly this evasion seems devised and useless.

Caput VII - The truer reason why the procession of the Word is generation, but not the procession of the Holy Spirit

Then, moreover, the Holy Spirit thus proceeds by the will (voluntas) of the Father and the Son, that he proceeds from the Son secondarily: just as from the Word understood; in the way that in us the word, or the thing understood, is the principle of love, except that in God his Word not only concurs as object, nor only as the thing loved (though it does not concur as an end), but also as a producing principle, and he also mutually loves the Father, from whom he proceeded through intellection. And inasmuch as from the Word in God the Holy Spirit proceeds, he is produced like; therefore from his own proper principle he comes forth like in the same nature, and the love that is produced has from that same principle to produce a like: just as if in us the thing understood, which is a substance, were to concur in such a way, as a producing principle, to produce love, that by its own force a substance were to go forth, without doubt what proceeds by the force of such procession would in its proper species be produced like. Those authors, however, were deceived in that they understood the Holy Spirit to proceed as like in the same nature only by reason of the divine nature as subject, whereas in reality he has not only the notion (ratio) of a subject, but also the notion of a principle of the divine nature, as has been proved. And these things are against Cajetan.

Add also that in the procession (processio) by the intellect (intellectus), as in the procession by the will, equal account must be had of the subject, or the nature, in which that which is produced proceeds: because, since it is in the intellect, that which proceeds is produced like in nature, since it is produced by an immanent operation. By this, however, nothing can proceed within God which is an accident, or a substance of another nature: this, however, does not hinder the procession by the intellect from being generation; therefore neither ought it to hinder that that which proceeds by the will be begotten also in the divinity.

But they still reply that there is this difference between that which proceeds by the intellect and that which is produced by the will: that what proceeds by the intellect proceeds like in nature by the force of a proximate principle; for the proximate principle is the divine essence as object, which, along with the intellect, its subject, finds no impediment and produces a like in nature; but the essence is not thus compared with that which proceeds by the will, but as a remote principle. This difference, however, is of no moment: for whether that which proceeds proceed like by nature by the power of a remote principle seconding also the proximate, or by the native power of the proximate principle, it seems to matter little for saying that that which proceeds be called begotten; nor has any Scholastic hitherto required anything else for the notion of generation than that that which proceeds like proceed like in nature by the force of its conjoined principle and not from elsewhere by accident; whereas the remote principle is a conjoined principle. In addition, the proximate principle of production through the intellect, which is the divine essence, does not produce a like in nature because it is a proximate principle in the mode of an object, but because it is the same in reality with the intellect and seconds it by identity: for in the blessed it is a proximate principle, and yet love does not produce a like, because it is not the same as the intellect. Why then will it not suffice that the will in God be the same as the essence and be seconded by it to produce a like in nature, so that it be said to beget as the intellect is said to do?

Truly, against Ferrarienis we can do no business: for when he says that by intellection in its proper genus, inasmuch as it is most perfect, a like in nature is produced; but by love, even most perfect, not so: either he understands "most perfect" in the genus of the created by intensity alone or by some other mode of accidental perfection; or he understands "most perfect," that is, uncreated and infinite in the genus of being, as is the divine essence. If he speaks in the former way, not only by the most perfect love is a like in substantial nature not produced, but neither by intellection; for no created intellection or love is a substance and the existence (esse) of the one acting, but an accident; and thus everything that proceeds by those operations is also an accident, not a substance. But if in the latter way he understands a most perfect operation, namely, inasmuch as it is most perfect by essence and uncreated, he clearly falls into the sentence of Cajetan, or can very easily be impugned: because both the Holy Spirit in God and the Word, inasmuch as he proceeds by an operation infinite according to essence, that is, divine and uncreated, proceeds like in substantial nature: therefore either each is generated in the same way, or neither. No evasion indeed remains for Ferrariense, except what Cajetan contrives about proper and extraneous differences, which we have more than sufficiently blocked.

A far easier and truer reason is assigned by Canariensis in the commentary, art. 2 of this question, on account of which the procession of the Word is generation, but not the procession of the Holy Spirit. The reason is, namely, because the Word not only by the force of his procession proceeds like in nature, that is, has the same nature with the Father, but also as the image (imago) of the Father: but the Spirit proceeds indeed as like in nature to the Father and the Son, from whom he proceeds, but not as their image. For he thinks that that part of the definition, "into the likeness of nature," is to be understood not of the likeness which comes from the unity of nature, but of the likeness which is an image; for not every likeness is an image of that of which it is the likeness. So understood, that part makes all things stand rightly, nor is it necessary to add those other things which the Thomists, on account of those more subtle than true distinctions of Cajetan and Ferrarienis, thought ought to be added, namely, "by the force of production": but whoever has the definition of generation set forth in cap. 1 will truly be a son and begotten, and will have this by the force of his procession and also of his own peculiar mode of proceeding, not from elsewhere.

In confirmation of this opinion and reason two things must be proved for us. One is, that it belongs to the notion of a son, as he is a son, not only to be produced like in nature, but also as the image of the producer. The second is, that in God the Word alone is the image of him from whom he proceeds: for from this it is best inferred that the procession of the Word alone is generation, and that the Word himself alone is the Son. Of these two, the latter will be shown expressly below in disputation 146; wherefore at present let the former alone be proved. And this is gathered from the Fathers.

First, from Athanasius in the Epistle on the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, a little before the middle, where he thus speaks of the Son: "If you name him image, you show him thereby to be a son: for what is like to God, if not his own offspring?" They understand, then, that by the name alone of image is expressed the property of the Son. Wherefore, when he says "for what is like to God," etc., he does not speak of a likeness which is founded only in unity of nature or of quality: for thus the Holy Spirit is like, and therefore Athanasius's reasoning would prove nothing; but he speaks of that likeness which is proper to an image, of which we shall speak in that disputation 145. [85]

85. St. Athanasius, Epistola de decretis Nicaenae synodi, a little before the middle.

And Nazianzen in Oration 4 on Theology, which is 35 in order, thus says: "A brief, compendious, and easy declaration of the paternal nature is the Son. For everything that is begotten defines by a certain tacit voice its begetter," and hence a little below he says that it is rightly called Logos; for logos is called definition.[86]

Richard of St. Victor also in De Trinitate, book 6, chapters 19, 20, and 21, asserts that for this reason the Holy Spirit is not a son, because he is not the image of the Father: he therefore thinks that it belongs to the notion of a son to be the image of the Father, although he himself explains the reason of image, which he says is found in the Son, not in the Holy Spirit, in another way than we do: for he says that the Son is the image of the Father, because he receives the nature from him in such a way that he can in turn communicate it to another; we, however, will say that the notion of image is in this, that he truly represents the Father, which in no way suits the Holy Spirit, as we shall show below in disputation 145, cap. 5.[87]

Next Anselm in the Monologion, that cap. 53, seems to have followed the same reason: for he proposes the aforesaid difficulty in these words: "What then, since this love equally has to be from the Father and the Son, and so is similar to both, that it in no way is dissimilar to them, but is altogether the same as they are: will it be their son, and offspring proceeding from them?" He answers, however: "But just as the Word, as soon as it is considered, shows itself most manifestly to be the offspring of that one from whom it proceeds, the present image of the parent: so love openly shows itself to be the offspring of its parents; yet, although it is understood to proceed from the Father and the Son, it does not at once display to the one contemplating it so clear a likeness of that from whom it is, although, when itself is considered, reason teaches that it is altogether the same thing that the Father and the Son are." Nothing clearer could have been said for our opinion.[88]

But it must be noted that, when Anselm says that for this reason the Word offers at once that it is a son and generated offspring, because it is an image, he is speaking not of a created intellect seeing God clearly, as if the Son were the image of the Father to the intellect beholding God as he is; for, as we shall say in disputation 145, the Son is the image of the Father to the Father alone: that is, the Father alone contemplates himself in him as in an image. Anselm is therefore speaking of any intellect of a wayfarer: who by that very fact that he knows the divine Word to be the manifest image of the Father, understands that he is truly Son and begotten: not, however, because he understands that he is of the same nature; for we indeed confess that the Holy Spirit is of the same nature with the Father; but because we understand that he himself is not the likeness of the Father, that is, the image, we say he is not Son. Where Anselm, by the name "likeness," which he denies to the Holy Spirit, does not understand that which results from unity of nature, and by which the three persons are said to be equal and like, but that which is of image and representation: for it cannot be otherwise. But how the likeness which arises from unity of nature alone differs from image, we shall say in the cited disputation: for the present let it suffice to suppose as known to all, that image is not the same as a likeness founded in unity of nature.

86. St. Gregory of Nazianzus, Oration 4 on Theology (35th in order).
87. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, VI, cc. 19 - 21.
88. St. Anselm, Monologion, c. 53.

St. Thomas also comes in, who in Contra Gentiles IV first proves that the Son of God is the image of the producer, then that he is in the same nature, and from this concludes that he is Son. He gives moreover the reason in these words: "For it is not thus to be someone's image, that one is of the same nature with him, found in any case where one cannot be called son." And, with some things interposed: "But this is the true ratio of generation in living things: that that which is generated proceeds from the generator as his likeness, and of the same nature with him." Where he does not only say that it belongs to the notion of a son to be produced of the same nature, but also to be produced as a likeness: he clearly understands by likeness an image, not the unity of nature alone; for besides this he also requires a notion of likeness, that there be a son. Nor did he say the opposite in the same book, cap. 19, not far from the end, when he gives the reason why the Holy Spirit does not proceed as begotten: nay, he expressed the same thing in these words: "But since it has been shown that the beloved in the lover is not according to a likeness of species, as the understood is in the understanding, and everything which proceeds from another by the mode of genesis proceeds according to a likeness of species from the generator, it remains that the procession of a thing to this, that it be in the will, is not by the mode of generation; as the procession of a thing to this, that it be in the intellect, is according to the ratio of generation." When he speaks of "likeness of species," he is not speaking of unity of nature, but of the species and likeness of representation: otherwise he would falsely say that the understood is in the understanding according to a likeness of species, but the beloved in the lover not so.

By reason, moreover, it is proved that the son by his own notion is the image of the father: for in creatures, from which all these things have been borrowed and extended to signify divine things, every son is the image of his father: which is so true that even in equivocal generations, as is that of the mule, it is found. For every son carries before him some image of the father, so that from the son well known the father may also be known: and although the father in some way represents the son, that is, makes one know the son, nevertheless he is not the image of him, because an image is a likeness having its origin from him whom it represents, as we shall say in the place cited.

Since moreover in the notion of image there is also this, that the likeness be produced to represent that from which it proceeds, that part of the definition, "produced to represent," must be thus understood: either from the expressed intention of an artisan, as appears in painted images, or from the very mode of producing, as in a natural image it happens, that even without such expressed intention the likeness be produced so as to represent. And it is said to be produced to this end and intention of nature whenever something proceeds by the force of its procession, so that by that very fact it may represent him from whom it proceeds: the son, therefore, is a substantial likeness of the father produced to represent him. Wherefore, when anyone is said to be more or less his father's son, it is not because he is a more perfect or less perfect man, but because he represents his father more or less. And so, when someone represents his father but little (for there is no one who does not in some way imitate him), we are wont to say that he is not his father's son; and when he represents his mother more than his father, we say that he is more his mother's son than his father's. For the name "son" does not signify substance, but a relation to father or mother, which has its foundation in a likeness produced to represent: wherefore the perfection of sonship does not increase from the perfection of substance, but from the perfection of representing likeness.

Accordingly, if in the definition of generation set forth by us in cap. 1 of this disputation that part "in the likeness of nature" be understood in the way we have said, that is, in the substantial image of the same nature, it will have no difficulty: and from it we shall most fitly gather that in divine things the Word alone is generated and is the Son; but the Holy Spirit is not so. It remained over to prove that the divine Word alone is the true image of the Father, but that the Holy Spirit is in no way so, neither by the force of procession by will in general, nor by the force of vital will, nor otherwise: but lest we invert the order, this must be shown in St. Thomas, disputation 146.

Caput VIII - The arguments against this later position are resolved

It remains to resolve certain arguments that can be made against this Canarian position, so that it may remain more fully explained and confirmed.

First argument: If we suppose (what is impossible) that there is no possible human or angelic intellect which, by means of the offspring produced - by way of a word - as by an image, can be led to a knowledge of the begetter; nevertheless a horse begotten from a horse would truly be his son. Therefore, in creatures no one is a son for this reason, that he can represent his father to some intellect. Nor does it matter much that it be the intellect of God, for with respect to that intellect no created son is called an image; since God does not know a created father through the son. Since therefore the formal notion of son would remain saved even if no intellect could exist, and once the intellect is removed in this way, the notion of image is necessarily taken away; it follows that the notion of image and of son are not altogether the same.

It is answered: The notion of image, which in human affairs truly constitutes a son, is not that actual order or relation of the image to an intellect capable through one thing of knowing another, but as it were the foundation of this respect, that is, the thing produced is of such a nature and property as to be apt to lead into the knowledge of the producer, if there is an intellect which can know; and this is the root of representation. We have moreover in divine things a most apposite example of this matter: for "gift" is so constituted the property of the Holy Spirit, that by it he is called "gift" inasmuch as he is Spirit; but truly gift, besides the respect it has to the principle from which it proceeds by will, has another, connoted by the very name, toward creatures to whom it can be given; which surely is a relation of reason, and formally cannot pertain to the personal property: both because it is a relation of reason, and also because it is to creatures, which even if they were not possible, nevertheless the Holy Spirit would have his personal property in himself. Therefore the personal property of the Holy Spirit is the foundation of that respect, that is, he so proceeds from the Father and the Son that of himself he is apt to be given to creatures, if they are possible. Thus also in creatures we do not establish the property of son and begotten in an actual respect of the image to the intellect which it represents, but in the foundation of this respect. Therefore, since the Holy Spirit neither formally nor fundamentally (as they say) has this notion of image, in no way is he son. Moreover the eternal Son is not the image of the Father because he is born to represent his begetter to a created intellect, but to his own Father (as we shall say in that disputation), whom he not only can represent, but always necessarily represents.

Second argument: It is prior that the son be like the father in nature, that is, of the same nature with him, than that he be his image, that is, than that he represent him. Therefore it is prior that someone be a son, insofar as he is an image, from this alone, that he is like in nature with the begetter.

It is answered: In human affairs someone is said to be a son from this alone, that he has the same nature of the animal as the producer; because in this alone is the foundation of the relation of image, in which the notion of son is sufficiently saved. For from the mere likeness of the nature of the produced with the producer, if there be an intellect to which it can represent, the formal notion of image arises. But in God the mere likeness of the nature of the produced with the producer does not constitute the notion of son; because this mere likeness is not a sufficient foundation of the relation of image: for this in God does not result from identity of nature alone, but from that and from the personal property which is by nature apt to represent; and this is the property of the Word, insofar as it is by the intellect. For the Word represents to the Father not because it has the same nature with him (for thus the Holy Spirit also would represent), but because it is of the same nature and has it conjoined with the Word's property of being produced by the intellect. Hence it is that the divine Word has to be Word, because it proceeds by the intellect; but the Spirit is not Son, because he is produced by the will: for what proceeds by will, even if it have the same nature with the producer, does not proceed as an image in any way; but what proceeds by the intellect, truly is produced as an image.

Third argument: For something to be an image (imago), it must be a likeness expressed with an intention of representing; but this intention is not necessary from any act of will of the one expressing, but from the mere natural mode of producing; and such an intention of nature is perceived to be present from this alone, that an effect is produced of the same nature with its producer. Therefore for this reason the Holy Spirit also would be Son.

This first argument, if it has any weight, proves also that the Holy Spirit would be the image of his producer, because by that very fact that he is expressed of the same nature, he is produced with an intention of representing, in which consists the true notion of image; but this adversaries will not grant, since this is the property of the Son alone, as we shall show in the place cited; therefore neither does that argument prove what they contended. Nevertheless I answer, as I said above, that the intention whereby the likeness ought to be expressed for representing is sometimes in the very natural mode of operating; but here it is not attended to in this alone, that it produce one similar in nature, but with such a property also, that it be naturally apt to represent the begetter; but this the Holy Spirit does not have, even if he goes forth like in nature, because he does not receive the nature with that property with which he can represent. In what way, however, the Son thus receives the nature, that he represent and be image, but not the Holy Spirit, must be deferred to that disputation.

Lastly, the son in brute animals does not seem to be produced by nature with any other end than that propagation be preserved in them, toward which end all agents are borne; but of representation the generating animal, by the very force of its nature, cares nothing; nevertheless the animal begotten is truly a son: therefore image is not of the notion of son. But certainly the argument is frivolous and is easily dissolved from what was said before. For when we say that the son is produced with an intention of representing the begetter, we are not speaking of any other intention than that which is from the very nature itself; and this is attended from the mode of operating: and because a generating animal by the very generation is no less represented by the animal begotten from it than the species is preserved in it, therefore each intention of nature is said to be produced. For just as an animal is said to be begotten with an intention of preserving the nature, because in truth it receives a propagated nature, and consequently preserves it; so also it is said to be produced for representing, because in truth it receives the nature so as to represent the begetter. I grant that many things are produced with the sole intention of preserving the nature, not of representing the begetter; yet those are the things in which there is no image, as non-living things (as we shall say in disputation 145); but in those in which there is a true image and the notion of son, as in animals, without doubt the thing is produced with that intention of nature. Add that the argument proposed, if it has any weight, proves also that in brute animals no son is the image of the father; but if it is not in brutes, neither will it be in human beings, since the son is produced in the same way by the sole intention of propagating the nature; and so it would follow that only when a man, with an express intention of will to represent, generates, which is absurd; or, if among human beings generation takes place by a purely natural intention of representation, why will it not also take place in brutes, in which by means of the son, in the same way as among men, the father is known?

Quaestio XXVIII - On the divine relations, which is the second principal part of this matter

Then there is to be considered the divine relations. And about this four questions are treated.

1. Since the divine persons are distinguished by relations, and, as is the common sentence, are constituted as such - rightly St. Thomas, after he had proved that there are two emanations and consequently three persons in one nature, then treats of relations, in order to explain to us the properties of the persons.

Articulus I - Whether in God there are any real relations

Objicitur primo: It seems that in God there are no real relations. For Boethius, in the book On the Trinity, says that when one turns the predicaments into a divine predication, all are changed into substance which can be predicated; but the relative, to something (ad aliquid), cannot at all be predicated. But whatever is really in God can be predicated of him. Therefore relation is not really in God.

Objicitur secundo: Further, Boethius says in the same book On the Trinity, that the relation in the Trinity of the Father to the Son, and of both to the Holy Spirit, is like that of what is the same to what is the same. But a relation of this sort is only of reason; for every real relation requires two extremes really existing. Therefore the relations posited in the divine are not real relations, but only of reason.

Objicitur tertio: Further, the relation of paternity is a relation of principle. But when it is said "God is the principle of creatures," no real relation is imported, but only one of reason. Therefore neither is paternity in the divine a real relation; and by the same reasoning neither are the other relations posited there.

Objicitur quarto: Further, generation in the divine is according to the procession of an intelligible word. But relations that follow upon an operation of the intellect are relations of reason. Therefore paternity and filiation which are said in the divine according to generation are relations of reason.

Sed contra: The Father is not called Father except from paternity, and the Son is not called Son except from filiation: if therefore paternity and filiation are not really in God, it follows that God is not really Father or Son, but only according to the conception of the understanding; which is the Sabellian heresy.

Respondetur: I answer that certain relations are really in the divine. For evidence of this, consider that only in those things which are called relative (to something) is there found something according to reason alone and not according to the thing. This is not so in the other genera; for the other genera, like quantity and quality, according to their proper notion signify something inhering in another. But things which are said relatively signify, according to their proper notion, only a respect to another. And such a respect is real when it is in the very nature of things, namely when certain things according to their nature are ordered to one another and have an inclination toward one another; and relations of this sort must be real. Thus in a heavy body there is an inclination and order to the middle place; whence there is a certain respect in the heavy thing itself with respect to the middle place; and similarly it is in other such cases. Sometimes indeed the respect signified by those things which are said relatively exists only in the very apprehension of reason comparing one to another; and then it is a relation of reason only, as when reason compares man to animal as species to genus. But when something proceeds from a principle of the same nature, it is necessary that both, namely the one proceeding and that from which it proceeds, agree in the same order; and thus it is necessary that they have real respects to one another. Since therefore the processions in the divine are in an identity of nature, as has been shown, it is necessary that the relations which follow the divine processions be taken to be real relations.

Reply to the first: To the first, therefore, it must be said that "relative" is said to be altogether non-predicable of God according to the proper mode of that which is called relative, inasmuch as the proper notion of that which is called relative is not taken by comparison to that in which the relation inheres, but by respect only to another; nor by this do we wish to exclude that relation is in God, but that it is not predicated properly by the mode of an inhering accident according to the proper notion of relation, but rather by the mode of being-toward another.

Reply to the second: To the second it must be said that the relation which is imported by this name "the same" is a relation of reason only; and "the same" is taken simply so, because a relation of this sort cannot subsist except in a certain order which reason discovers of something to itself.

Articulus II - Whether the relations in God are real relations

It is objected: Therefore relation is not really in God.

1. Moreover, Boethius says in the same book On the Trinity that the relation in the Trinity of the Father to the Son, and of both to the Holy Spirit, is like that of what is the same to what is the same. But a relation of this sort is only a relation of reason, because every real relation requires two extremes really existing. Therefore the relations which are posited in the divine are not real relations, but only of reason.
2. Moreover, the relation of paternity is a relation of a principle. But when it is said, God is the principle of creatures, no real relation is imported, but only one of reason. Therefore neither is paternity in the divine a real relation. And for the same reason neither are the other relations which are posited there.
3. Moreover, generation in the divine is according to the procession of the intelligible Word. But the relations which follow upon the operation of the intellect are relations of reason. Therefore paternity and filiation, which are said in the divine according to generation, are relations of reason only.

But on the contrary: The Father is not called Father except from paternity, and the Son is not called Son except from filiation. If therefore paternity and filiation are not really in God, it follows that God is not really Father or Son, but only according to the conception of the understanding, which is the Sabellian heresy.

I answer: Certain relations are really in the divine. For the understanding of which, it must be considered that only in those things which are called relative (ad aliquid) are some things found to be according to reason alone and not according to reality. Which is not the case in the other genera: for the other genera (as quantity and quality) according to their proper notion signify something inhering in a subject. But those things which are called relative signify, according to their proper notion, only a respect to another. Now this respect is sometimes in the very nature of things, as when certain things according to their own nature are ordered to each other and have an inclination; and relations of this sort must be real. Thus in a heavy body there is an inclination to the middle place; hence there is a certain respect in the heavy body itself toward the middle; and similarly in other such cases. Sometimes, however, the respect is only in the apprehension of reason, which compares one thing to another; and this is only a relation of reason. Thus reason compares man to species, and species to genus. But when something proceeds from a principle of the same nature, it is necessary that both, namely the one proceeding and that from which it proceeds, agree in the same genus, and thus it is necessary that they have real respects to each other. If therefore the processions in the divine proceed in identity of nature, as was shown, it is necessary that the relations which follow the divine processions be taken to be real relations.

Reply to the first: To the first, therefore, it must be said that "relative" is said to be altogether non-predicable of God according to the proper mode of that which is called relative, inasmuch as the proper notion of that which is called relative is not taken by comparison to that in which the relation inheres, but by respect only to another; nor by this do we wish to exclude that relation is in God, but that it is not predicated properly by the mode of an inhering accident according to the proper notion of relation, but rather by the mode of being-toward another.

Reply to the second: To the second it must be said that the relation which is imported by this name "the same" is a relation of reason only, if "the same" is taken simply so; because a relation of this sort cannot subsist except in a certain order which reason discovers of something to itself according to two of its considerations. It is otherwise, however, when things are said to be the same not in number but in the nature of the genus or of the species. Boethius therefore assimilates the relations which are in the divine to the relation of identity, not in every respect, but only as to this, that by relations of this sort the substance is not diversified, just as neither is it diversified by the relation of identity.

Reply to the third: As the creature proceeds from God in a diversity of nature, God is outside the order of the whole creation, nor is a habitude to creatures of his nature. For he does not produce creatures from the necessity of his nature, but by intellect and by will, as was said above. And therefore in God there is no real relation to creatures, but in the creatures there is a real relation to God, because creatures are contained under the divine order, and in their nature it is that they depend upon God. But the divine processions are in the same nature. Hence the reason is not similar.

Reply to the fourth: It must be said that the relations which follow upon the sole operation of the intellect are relations of reason only in the very things understood, because reason discovers them between two things understood. But the relations which follow upon the operation of the intellect which are between the Word proceeding intellectually and that from which it proceeds are not relations of reason only, but of reality; because both the intellect itself and reason are a certain thing, and really are compared to that which proceeds intelligibly, as a bodily thing to that which proceeds bodily. And thus paternity and filiation are real relations in the divine.

Conclusion: The conclusion is affirmative. Concerning the mind of St. Thomas in this article certain points are worthy of observation, which must be noted in the following disputation. Many other things, however, which Canus notes in his commentary on this article concerning the argument Sed contra, I pass over: for St. Thomas frequently uses such an argument, according to his custom, in order to render the proposed question more difficult on both sides; nor does he always cling to the doctrine suggested by that argument, even if he himself gives no reply to it. He only dissolves it when he so renders the question doubtful that even the definition that he applies in the body of the article is in some way opposed to it. Nevertheless, we shall use those points, as most apt reasons for confirming the Catholic doctrine, with a few additions which St. Thomas seems to suppose, in the following disputation.

Disputatio CXIV - On whether the divine relations are real according to being - toward

Caput I - The common Catholic judgment; and the opinion of Cajetan and the Canarian

Among Catholics it is a confessed matter that the divine relations are truly real, not merely assisting God, but intrinsic. It is defined, moreover, in the Lateran Council under Innocent III, and is reported in the chapter Firmiter, On the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith, when it is said: "This holy Trinity, according to the common essence, is undivided, and according to personal properties is distinct: for a personal property is a relation." And in the Eleventh Council of Toledo, in the confession of faith it is said: "In the relative names of the persons, the Father is referred to the Son, and the Son to the Father, and the Holy Spirit to both." We shall also show this more at length elsewhere. Moreover they say - St. Thomas in the following article, Alexander of Hales, St. Bonaventure, and other Scholastics - that Gilbert of Poitiers, Bishop of Poitiers, was in the error of asserting that the divine relations are only assisting God and, as it were, extrinsic. Yet this author, as we shall report, never said that these relations are extrinsic to God, but that they really differ from the essence of God - which, for what reason that opinion is condemned, we shall show in the same place. Nor, in truth, does Alexander in the place cited strive to excuse Gilbert from error, as the summary conclusion of that section indicates, but rather Boethius and other Catholics who seem to concede relations only assisting God and extrinsic; about whom in chapter 3 we must speak.

It is also proved theologically from the principles of faith, that the relations must be intrinsic and really adhering to God: because if in God there were only some extrinsic relative denomination, the persons could not be multiplied and distinguished by relations; and consequently we should fall into the opinion of Sabellius, who professed only one person in God. And this indeed seems to be the reason of St. Thomas in the argument Sed contra. How, however, besides these relations of origin which we say to be real in God among the divine persons, there are not other relations in him to creatures, we have said elsewhere.

Furthermore, since in every created relation, and in like manner in the divine, our thought distinguishes two notions - one which they call "in," the other "to" - because a relation is in a subject as its form, and refers that in which it is to some term - there is controversy among the Scholastics whether the divine relation is real according to both notions, or only according to the prior one. Cajetan and the Canarian in this matter affirm that the notion "to," as referred to the real predicament, is precise from the notion "in," and that the latter, formally, is not real, but common and abstract from real and of reason: yet that nevertheless by it the predicament of relation is sufficiently distinguished from the other absolute real predicaments.

They prove it first by the authority of St. Thomas in the following article, where he says that this is peculiar to the predicament of relation among the other predicaments of accident, that whereas in the others the proper notion of each - which we call the intrinsic mode - is taken with an order to the subject, in relation, however, the notion of the predicament is not signified with an order to the subject, but to an extrinsic term, and therefore it is not signified as inhering. And in this sense Boethius seems to have spoken in the middle of the book On the Trinity, as St. Thomas explains in the solution to the first argument of this article, when he denies that the predicament "relative" is predicated of God, namely, as something inhering, considered according to the sole notion of "to"; yet it is, according to the notion of "in." By reason, moreover, the opinion of Cajetan can be proved in this way. The notion "to," taken in itself, not considered with the notion "in," looks only to the term; but this is common to a real relation and to a relation of reason: therefore it cannot be something real.

How, however, a real predicament of relation can be distinguished from the others by a concept common to the real and to the of reason, Cajetan thus explains: because although it be common to the real and to the of reason, nevertheless it is not found in the other real predicaments; therefore by this it is sufficiently distinguished. As if the heavens were not an animal, they would nevertheless have a rational soul - as certain men taught - although a rational soul is common to man and to something set in a column; yet sufficiently would man be distinguished from other living things, because in no animal except in man would it be found. Hence it follows that the divine relations, if they are considered according to their precise being-toward, abstracted from "in," are not real, but common to the real and to the of reason; which, although neither Cajetan nor the Canarian explicitly assert, yet from their principles seems to be inferred.

Caput II - The contrary view: that the mode "to" (ad) is itself real and intrinsic

It has always pleased me to hold the opposite opinion, namely, that the "to" which belongs to a real relation and is the mode of the third predicament, and which belongs to a divine relation, is neither something of reason nor something common to the of reason and the real, but is truly real and inhering; and that only the word "to" is common to both, namely, to the "to" of reason and to the "to" that is real. We can gather this opinion first from St. Thomas in this article, where he says that only in those things which are said relatively are there found some beings of reason and some real beings, but not in the other predicaments; that is, that there can be a relation real and a relation of reason, which is the work of the intellect - although it is not a substance, nor a quantity, nor a quality of reason. He renders the reason: because the other genera according to their proper notion denote something inhering in the thing itself, as quantity, quality, etc.; but the genus of relation and those things which are said relatively according to their own notion only signify a respect to another - which sometimes is in the very nature of things, sometimes is only in the apprehension of the intellect. Clearly St. Thomas speaks not of the notion signified, but of the name signifying the real, when he says that it only signifies some respect to another: and sometimes in the nature of things, sometimes only in the intellect; for if, with that separation, the signification did not signify a respect, but, the specific difference remaining, it would specifically signify something else, which is real when it is in the thing, because natures are mutually ordered to each other; therefore that which is between them, because they are mutually ordered, is real, although it be signified by a common name.

It is proved by reason. The reason is proved thus: that the "to" cannot be something common to a real being and to a being of reason. First, because there cannot be some common ratio of a real being and a being of reason as to an object existing in the intellect; for that common ratio must be entirely constructed by the intellect and universal; in neither way, however, can it be common to a real being and to a being of reason, as is evident: therefore no such common concept is given. And thus there is only a common name, whereas the ratio of them is not common: especially if the common sentence is true of those who, with Cajetan, teach concerning analogy that there is not some common conception of analogates, but that the very [things] are signified proximately by the same name - I hold this to be most true. For if some concept were common, it would be in the analogates to which it is common, and would be discerned; and thus one concept, besides many and in many, would accordingly be one as to the necessity of the ratio of relation of reason and of relation real; and so nothing could be common unless under the name; consequently, that ratio of "to" cannot be common to a real being and to a being of reason; and thus that "to" is not of reason, since it is an intrinsic mode of the real predicament: therefore, if that "to" of the real predicament must be something real, the real relation according to that being-toward cannot but be in a subject.

Second, the "to" of the real predicament is so the intrinsic mode of this predicament that from that ratio "in," which is the same in all the predicaments, it cannot be abstracted or separated by cognition: therefore according to that ratio it is something real and inhering. The assumption is proved thus. Either the name "accident" signifies univocally the name of a predicament - as is the more probable opinion - and thus the same ratio signified by the name is common to the predicaments: for in such case, as we were saying above, since that ratio would be one and entire in itself in the inferiors, it would be signified univocally; for this is the definition of univocals according to Aristotle in the Antepredicaments, in the chapter On Univocals. Nor does it hinder, if by reason of differences or of intrinsic modes that common ratio is more perfectly said to be in one inferior than in another: for also by reason it is proved that a common concept cannot be given of substance and accident; because a certain substance and accident are univocal with respect to this name "being." What certain people say, that the ratio of being is not in the same way in substance and in accident - because the ratio of accident, as accident, depends on a subject - does not stand in the way so that one may not say that accident and substance are univocal in being: for the name and the concept of them are the same, insofar as they are signified by the same voice, indeed the same, nor does it signify the same determination which, as we said, that common concept in one is said in one mode, in another in another mode, if it is common; it will not always be said so in that mode; nor, on the side of the concept, from the common voice will the particular notions be signified by which it is determined - as adversaries grant. How, therefore, can the abstract concept be denied to be common? of the transcendent - this we shall say below in Disputation 12, chapter 2. If, therefore, the name "accident" adds to the common "being" the genus, and does not signify a common ratio of analogates (but, as Cajetan teaches in his little work On Analogy, it denotes the proper ratio of the very analogates), it follows that in all the intrinsic modes of the predicaments, even in that very "to," the intrinsic ratio is included, which, by this name "accident," signifies a sufficient ratio of being in all the differences that are contained under substance; so that no difference can be thought that removes from the ratio of being, which transcends all.

It is proved - First by reason - that that "to" (ad) cannot be something common to real being and being of reason. First, because to real being and to being of reason there cannot be any common notion (ratio) as an objective concept existing in the intellect: for either that common notion must be wholly fabricated by the intellect, or truly real; but in neither way can it be common to real being and to being of reason, as is clear. Therefore no such common concept is given. It is therefore only a common name; the notion of the things, however, cannot be common; especially if the sentence of those is true who, with Cajetan on analogy, teach that there is no common concept of analogates, but that the very analogates themselves are signified proximately by the same name - which I judge to be most true. For if some concept were common, it would be wholly in the analogates to which it is said to be common; therefore there would be one concept beyond many and in many, and hence a universal. Since therefore to a rational relation and to a real relation there cannot be anything common unless there could be something common to real being and being of reason; but that "to" cannot be of reason, since it is an intrinsic mode of the real category; therefore that "to" of the real category must be something real; and consequently a real relation, according to that "to," cannot but be in existence.

It is proved second - Second, that "to" in the real category is so an intrinsic mode of this category that from that notion "in," which is in all the categories, it can by no cognition be abstracted or separated: therefore by that notion it is something real and inherent. The assumption, however, is proved thus. Either the name "accident" signifies analogically the nine categories, as the more probable opinion holds, and thus one notion signified by that name cannot be common to the nine categories: for then, as we said above, since it were one and whole according to itself in the singular inferiors, it would be signified univocally - this indeed is the definition of univocals according to Aristotle in the Antepredicaments, the chapter On Univocals.[89] Nor would anything stand in the way if by reason of differences or of intrinsic modes that common notion were more perfect in one inferior than in another; and by this very reason it is proved that a common concept of being cannot be given to substance and accident, because otherwise substance and accident would be univocal with respect to this name "being."

89. Aristotle, Antepredicaments, chapter On Univocals.

Solution of an objection - But as to what some say, that the notion of being is not in the same way in substance and in accident, because in the accident it is less, since it depends on substance; this little harms what we assert, namely that accident and substance are univocal in "being": for the name is the same, and the concept of them, as signified by that word, is altogether the same in both; nor indeed is that concept, if it be common, signified by the common word in a different way in the one and in the other: not, I say, in a different way either on the part of the thing directly signified, or on the part of the connotation; for by the common voice there are not signified the peculiar modes by which it is determined, as the adversaries grant. How then could the abstract concept of being not be drawn, if it is transcendent? of this we shall speak below in Disputation 121, chapter 2.[90] If therefore the name "accident" is analogical and does not signify a common notion of the analogates, but (as Cajetan teaches in his little work On Analogy) proximately denotes the very analogates themselves,[91] it follows that in all the intrinsic modes of the categories, even in "to" itself, there is intrinsically included that notion "in," which by this name "accident" is signified; just as also the notion of being is contained in all the differences of substance in such wise that no difference can be thought without the notion of being, which transcends all.

Or let us say that the name "accident" signifies univocally the nine categories, or at least three of the principal among them; or, if you please, let us say that it is a genus to them, as some also not so rightly have thought; nonetheless that notion "to" of the real category could not be thought without another notion "in." For "accident," which is posited as univocal and as a genus to those three or to the nine categories, ought to be a complete notion, besides that there is also given the incomplete notion of accident, which is so predicated of all the differences and intrinsic modes that it belongs to them essentially and does not make composition with them. Therefore that notion "to" always includes the notion "in," which, although it is not expressed by this word "to," nevertheless cannot but be immediately apprehended by the intellect.

Third, the same is evident from experience; for, upon hearing this word "to," the intellect cannot but conceive the order of one to another. Already therefore is apprehended an order, as it is of something, and to another. But, as it is "of something," it has the notion "in": therefore in no way can the notion "to" be thought without the notion "in," or at least, until that "to" be conceived as belonging to something, can that word effect any concept in our intellect, as everyone knows. Although therefore that word "to" does not so expressly signify the notion "in," yet because the notion "to" and the notion "in" are so conjoined that "to" cannot be thought without "in," it follows that upon hearing the word "to" one cannot but apprehend the notion "in." Conversely, upon hearing the word "in," the notion "to" is not immediately apprehended, because the notion "in" extends more widely, and not every form that is in another is "to" another; whereas, on the contrary, every relation (relatio) which is "to" another is also in another; for the notion "in" is included in the notion "to," but not conversely.

90. Disputation 121, chapter 2.
91. Cajetan, Opuscule On Analogy.

Doctrine delivered applied to the divine relations - Thus far it has been proved that the notion "to," which is of the real category, is real, and essentially includes in itself the notion "in." Now let us say the same concerning the divine relations, namely that they are not only real according to their whole notion, but also according to the very notion "to": which can be proved in like proportion by the same reasons. Yet it must be observed, as will be explained in Disputation 121, chapter 2, that the notion "in," which the divine relations include intrinsically in their concept, is not the whole essence (essentia) and substance (substantia) of God. For if we include the substance and essence of God, there results already the complete person (persona); but a relation is not the whole person, but the constituting notion of the person.

Response to the arguments of Cajetan -

To the testimony of St. Thomas which Cajetan alleges for himself, it is answered, that St. Thomas never said that the relation "to," which is peculiar to the real category, is common to the real and to reason; but that he spoke of the word "to" according to its whole analogy; for this does not express the notion "in," nor anything real, since it is common according to the analogy of the real and of reason; and therefore he said that it is peculiar to this real category of relation that its formal notion be signified by a name common to being of reason and real being, which does not befit the other categories. For the names by which the peculiar mode of the others is signified denote only a truly real notion: for there is no quantity nor quality of reason. Hence, however, it does not follow that the peculiar notion of this real category of relation is common to the real relation and to the relation of reason; but that it is itself signified by a common name. Wherefore when the holy Doctor says in article 2 that the category of relation according to its proper notion signifies only an assisting form, he understands that, according to the common name "to," an inhering form is not expressly signified, since it is common to the relation of reason and to the real relation. What the error of Gilbert was will be explained in Disputation 120.[92]

But concerning the mind of Boethius in the book On the Trinity in the middle, when he asserts that "to something" is not predicated of God, I think it must be said otherwise than St. Thomas thought; for St. Thomas says that Boethius considered only relations according to the being "to," which by reason are only assistant, and in this way he denied relations in God, because they are not truly assistant. Yet another sense is plainly gathered from his words. For he is philosophizing about the categories as compared to God. First indeed he asserts that three categories - namely substance, quantity, and quality - truly befit God, yet so that in him they signify only substance, indeed supersubstance: for God is said substantially to be good, wise, and great. Second, he says that the last six categories are to be attributed to God in the same manner as they are said of creatures, namely by the mode of a form extrinsically adjacent, as is to be in a place, to be in time. Third, he subjoins that the category of relation does not befit God as it does creatures: for to creatures it can befit from something extrinsic, and as coming upon a foreign nature, and with it even perishing when that perishes; but in God there cannot be a relation coming upon him from something extrinsic, but it arises within the same nature; and on that account he calls the divine relation the relation of identity and of likeness - not because this relation, which we call of likeness and identity, exists only in God, or is real in God; but because real relations, which are according to origin, are in the same and altogether similar nature. About those relations of equality, identity, and likeness which befit God, whether they are real, we shall speak in Disputation 167.[93]

92. Disputation 120.

Why St. Thomas said that under the sole genus of relation there is both real being and being of reason - Moreover, why St. Thomas said that it is peculiar to the genus of relation that under it something sometimes have real being, sometimes being by reason alone, and not also to the other genera, such as substance, quantity, and quality, is variously explained by his disciples. Canarien, in the commentary on this article, grants that genera other than relation sometimes have being by reason; this, however, he says is per accidens, namely when substance, quantity, and quality have only objective being in the intellect without real existence; but that some relation can have being by reason in such a way that this belongs to it per se. I do not know, however, why this author calls "being by the intellect," or "being of reason," that objective being of substance, or quantity, or quality, which either at some time really was, or can be. For "being of reason" is commonly said of that which can be only objectively in the intellect, and cannot be in the thing; in which way some relation of reason is found. Now we are inquiring the cause on account of which relation alone can have this sort of being by the intellect, but not substance, quantity, or quality.

Cajetan, however, answers in two ways. First he concedes that not only in the genus of relation are there found some things which have only being of reason, but also in the genus of substance, of quantity, and of quality: for in the genus of substance there is the imaginary man; quantity also or quality can be altogether fabricated. He adds, however, that there is a difference between these beings of reason and relations, namely that relation, even if it be by reason, is called simply relation; but substance, quality, or quantity are not called simply such when they are fabricated only by the intellect. Yet this solution of Cajetan does not please me, because both substance and quality and quantity, fabricated by the intellect as Cajetan posits, that is, only objectively apprehended by the intellect, are truly and simply called such, whenever the proposition does not denote the existence of the thing. For he who apprehends a rose in winter, without any addition, can say that it is truly a rose; and so of quality and of quantity, otherwise indeed than if the propositions were signifying existence. Moreover, beings existing only objectively in the intellect are in no way to be called beings of reason, but things existing only through reason; for that will not be called an ens rationis which has a true possible essence and is apprehended as such, but that whose whole essence is through the intellect alone apprehended, nor can it in reality in any way be. But any man apprehended, and any quality and quantity, is truly possible; therefore it will be called rather a real being than of reason, not indeed existing, but possible.

93. Disputation 167.

But on the contrary:

- Augustine teaches first that substance (substantia) and relation (relatio) are properly predicated of God, that is, the names of those predicaments are properly said to belong to God, although, as I showed above at length, God is in no predicament at all, nor did I wish to teach the opposite of Augustine in chapter 4 of the same disputation 22, as I demonstrated there: therefore those two names, namely substance and relation, are properly, not metaphorically, said of God, albeit not univocally, as I show at length in the same place; because relation in God, even if it is substance, is rightly and properly called relation. Secondly, Augustine teaches that all the other predicaments are said only in a transferred and metaphorical way of God, except action and passion, of which we shall speak afterward. He proves this indeed by induction. For God is not properly said to be "how much" nor "of what sort," because by His substance He is how much and of what sort. He therefore posits a difference between these two and relation, namely that relation, even if in reality it is substance, is properly called relation; but quantity and quality are not properly said of the substance of God; and thus he says that God is good without quality and great without quantity. Of position and habit, he says, they are said metaphorically, because position is the disposition of a body in place, as to stand and to sit; and therefore God is said to sit upon the Cherubim metaphorically. Habit indeed is to be clothed, which cannot befit God except metaphorically; in which manner He is said to be clothed with light. The same of where and time, although these two are not so openly said metaphorically as the others. Thirdly, he teaches that action is properly predicated of God; but passion in no way, not even metaphorically; because God is properly said to act, but to be made or to suffer in no way. Yet he understands these as to His substance and essence; for the Persons are said to be produced, and the origins of them also are said to be "passive." In what way, however, this doctrine of Augustine is not contrary to the doctrine of Boethius, is clear enough.

It is asked:

- Moreover, why St. Thomas said that it is proper to the genus of relation that under it there is sometimes a real relation, sometimes one by reason alone, but not so in the other genera, as substance, quantity, and quality, his disciples explain in various ways. Canas in his commentary on this article concedes that other genera besides relation sometimes have being by reason, not only relation; he adds, however, that there is a difference between beings of reason and relations, namely that relation, even if it is by reason, is called relation; but substance, quantity, and quality are not simply called such [i.e., substance, quantity, quality], but only are through the intellect composed. This solution of Cajetan does not please me; because both substance and quantity, feigned through the intellect and apprehended by the intellect, are truly predicated as such whenever propositions do not signify existence. For he who apprehends a rose in winter, without any addition, can say that it is truly a rose; and so of quality and of quantity, otherwise indeed than if the propositions were signifying existence. Moreover, beings existing only objectively in the intellect are in no way to be called beings of reason, but things existing only through reason; for that will not be called an ens rationis which has a true possible essence and is apprehended as such, but that whose whole essence is through the intellect alone apprehended, nor can it in reality in any way be. But any man apprehended, and any quality and quantity, is truly possible; therefore it will be called rather a real being than of reason, not indeed existing, but possible.

Wherefore the response of Cajetan has no firm foundation.

A true solution from Cajetan is alleged otherwise:

- Another solution of Cajetan is proposed to me: for he says that both quantity and quality, and substance apprehended only and not existing, are truly real beings, although they do not actually exist; because they have a real possible essence: but relation by reason is altogether a being of reason, and in no way real; because such a relation can never of itself be in things, nor does it have any real possible essence, but by apprehension alone can be: for this is truly and properly called an ens rationis.

Objicitur.

- But someone will object against this solution in this way. Among beings of reason besides relation are numbered negation and privation, which, since they are in no way real beings, are nevertheless by us thought and apprehended, and for that reason are called beings of reason: negation indeed is an impossible being, like a chimera, which also is understood in the mode of a certain substance compacted from various things: therefore there is likewise some substance of reason, just as relation: privation also is thought in the mode of a form and of a quality affecting a subject: therefore there is also some quality of reason, just as relation. Some reply that there is this difference between relation of reason on the one hand, and negation or privation on the other, that relation is so by reason as to have a foundation in a thing, nor can the intellect feign it at pleasure, but it is thought from the things themselves and is apprehended as a relation in them themselves; but for the intellect to apprehend privation or negation in the mode of a being, it is forced in no way, but feigns it at pleasure.

Rejicitur.

- But this solution does not satisfy me: because, although the intellect is not determined by nature to think negation and privation in the mode of this or that substance or quality rather than another, nevertheless its nature is such that, for our present state, it cannot apprehend these two except in the mode of some substance or quality: one man composes a chimera in one way, another in another way; but all conceive it in the mode of substance: and this has a natural foundation in our mode of knowing, nor is it at pleasure; just as also a relation of reason in the things which it denominates, and from which its denomination is taken, is said to have no other foundation except because our intellect, for this state, cannot name and apprehend them otherwise than relatively. Add that, although the intellect can at pleasure feign substance and quality, nevertheless it would not at pleasure, but necessarily, be forced to conceive relations; not because St. Thomas ought to have for this reason said that this is peculiar to the genus of relations, that some be through the intellect; since in the genus of substance, in one way or another, substances of reason are found.

I answer, therefore, that St. Thomas said that for a special reason: because, whereas the proper function of the intellect is to compare and to refer one to another, even if the things themselves are not in reality referred among themselves, it is proper to the intellect not only to conceive some things absolute in the mode of things related, but also by its act to relate them, by thinking one with an order to another: yet although it apprehends negation in the mode of a substance, privation in the mode of a quality, and although it philosophizes and speaks about them and there be some opinions, and on that account they are called beings of reason, namely, having being only from the intellect, nevertheless the intellect apprehending them is not said to have any act by which it is said either to "substantify" or to "qualify" (as they say), and for that reason it is not said to make a substance of reason or a quality of reason, as it is said to make a relation, because by its act it refers those things which were not referred. Hence there arises a clear difference between relation and privation or negation: because these two are not called beings, nor substance, nor quality; but they are called beings of reason, which, if they were to be called substance or quality, ought to be called not absolutely, but with the addition "of reason": but a relation of reason is accustomed to be called relation without an addition; because not only is one thing referred to another from itself, but also it is said to be referred by the intellect; and the act of the intellect is named relation and comparison absolutely. And let these things suffice about the testimony of St. Thomas, which Cajetan uses for his opinion; with which also certain other difficult things, which the same holy Doctor set down, have obiter been explained and remain clarified.

To the reason alleged in chapter 1 for Cajetan's position I reply, that "toward" (ad), however abstract and precise, can never be thought without relation; because every relation "toward" is of something to something; although not in such a way as to express the ratio, that very "toward," as we shall explain in chapter 2.

Disputatio CXV - On whether a relation of reason is formed only by the intellect or also by other powers

Caput I - What Scotus thought

Cajetan, in his commentary on this article, thought that Scotus had been of the view that a relation of reason is made not only by the operation of the intellect, but also by the operation of any other faculty comparing one thing with another; and he took this to be the will, insofar as it wills one thing for the sake of another and refers it to another. Cajetan very well refutes this view by saying that a relation of reason is truly a being of reason; therefore it ought to be made only by the operation of the intellect and of our reason.

But Scotus's opinion is far from that aforesaid view. For in the First, dist. 45, q. 1, to the last argument, in order to show in what way things willed by God from eternity are said to be referred, he says that they are referred either by a relation of reason which the divine intellect forms for itself, or rather by a certain relation arising from the operation of the divine will. Yet Scotus teaches that this relation is neither real, because it does not by its own nature inhere in the extremes, nor a relation of reason, because it is not made by the intellect or by any faculty formally rational; but a certain middle thing between the real and the rational. He therefore affirms that this middle relation arises from the operation of another faculty than the intellect. This position, sanely explained, is most true, as we shall show in the following chapter.

Caput II - Whether a relation of reason is formed solely by the operation of the intellect, or also by that of other powers

It remains to show, after we have demonstrated that relation is of reason and that some relation is by reason and in what way, whether relation is made by reason alone, and whether afterward, before the operation of the intellect, it has any beginning in the thing.

I say first that an extrinsic denomination is not a relation inhering in the things which it denominates.

Secondly, I judge that, before the operation of the intellect, there is no real denomination from some extrinsic thing or form. Because denomination is the appellation of a name, it is also a work of reason; and a thing absolute in itself, if it is denominated relatively, is denominated by the intellect conceiving it relatively: for names have been imposed by us in order that we might signify what we conceive about things. Wherefore to concede that some extrinsic real denomination is made before any intellect implies a contradiction in the subject: for if there is a denomination, there is the expression of some intellection. For this same cause we shall say below in disputation 120, chapter 6, that those things are said to be actually distinct by the intellect which by nature are not distinguished, whenever we think it useful to signify them by different names not synonymous.[94]

Thirdly, nevertheless, before the operation of the intellect there is in things some form or real thing, from which the intellect takes a relative denomination. For when it calls a wall "seen," from the vision which is terminated at the wall, it denominates the wall relatively; and so of all the others. Here, however, it must be observed that sometimes each extreme is denominated from some relative form in the same way, that is, by the same name; one indeed intrinsically, the other extrinsically: as when a wall is called right from the right-hand of an animal. Sometimes, however, in the opposite way; as a wall is said to be "seen" from a vision which indeed denominates the seer, in whom it is, but does not denominates the "seen": on the contrary it denominates the wall "seen," not "seeing." Sometimes also a relative denomination is taken from something extrinsic, not relative but absolute: as from goodness and malice in the moral place we shall say below; and the knowledge of God or His will is said to be relative to creatures, and His omnipotence similarly, even if such a relative form be not anywhere intrinsic: as is noted in disputation 104, chapter 4. In this way there is said to be a relative denomination real indeed, though extrinsic; yet the relation itself is of reason, not because the denomination is made in act before the intellect and that it is real, but because the form or thing from which it is taken is real, and by it something is denominated extrinsically. For this cause we then say that the denomination of a relation of reason is, on the side of the thing, before the intellect. From which doctrine I noted above, question 14, article 2, at the end of the commentary, that the divine attributes, which before the ages are, are said to be referred relatively to creatures; not because that relation as such exists from eternity in God as a relation of reason, nor because from future things a foundation could be assigned for such a relative denomination to be attributed to the divine; but because, God and the things to be in time being posited, on the side of the things there would be a foundation from which such a denomination by reason could fittingly be taken and imposed.

94. Disputation 120, chapter 6.

How a relation of reason is formed by the intellect.

Fourthly, therefore, by the operation of our reason, when something is said to be understood on account of another, the operation of the will indeed, as having the force of appetite, produces its own proper "toward another": yet from that operation there is not straightway resulted any relation of reason: but only the foundation, and that thing, by reason of which the denomination of relation is accepted; the relation of reason properly is formed only by the action of the intellect; by which a thing is apprehended as related; which is called a comparative or relative notion; which no faculty other than the intellect can have: for the intellect alone can by itself apprehend a thing as related, and compare it to another in act, to which in reality it is not referred nor compared. When, however, the will is said to refer or to order one thing to another, this is not to be understood as if the will were to make a relation in the object; but because by its act it seeks one thing on account of another; that is, it seeks one thing because it is represented to it as ordered toward another. So too the intellect understands one thing on account of another; whence from the knowledge of one we are moved into the cognition of another.

There is also to be noted the reason why the intellect can form and feign something which is not, whereas the will cannot; because, to wit, the intellect has this force, that the quality produced makes for itself objectively present something distinct from the quality; whether that other have true real being or not: but the will does not make for itself anything objectively present; rather it supposes that made by the intellect: it only effects and produces in itself formally the affections, which in themselves can befall only in that which is made objectively present: therefore the intellect is apt to feign. But indeed the intellect also understands and apprehends an order given between things expressly and formally, not only when there is said to be some form of a relation of reason; St. Thomas teaches the same in this very place. Sometimes, however, a respect is signified on the part of the object which moves; but sometimes there is another without the very apprehension of the relation; we consent that in the very apprehended thing there be the foundation of the relation of reason. In like manner it is to be said when the acts of will are this, namely object of the will; or of the intellect, that is, object of intellection; it is not in that object itself that that relation willed is, or the denomination, but the foundation, and the thing from which it is to be taken and begotten, and the relation of reason is to be known. Therefore theologians rightly and commonly say that the consideration of the universe is taken which is said to agree by the intellect with nature, not by the operation of abstraction alone; but, considering the nature of a thing without many others: for the mind then has the whole as the intellect conceives its foundation, not because the nature itself is conceived as related, but because, abstracting many, and comparing, that is, it is a relation of reason which is said.

Hence it is, God being no way in need, that the relations of reason are in Him according to our defect of cognition, as is distinguished at disputation 118, chapter 2, and 3; we say this not only because God has no cognitions by alien species, and after the manner of another, as we have, which are varied in time and place, and any change or variant is in the same intellect in the same mode as in the objects, which are in themselves: whence the intellect which is not composite does not conceive opposites; but God's is altogether absolute, not intelligible by relation but by the intellect. In Him, in things themselves, and also in His own apprehension there is no relation. When, therefore, we consider what among us is referred relatively and belongs to the mode of relation of reason in the very things formed by us; the opposition withdraws, many things are diminished and defined, which, when we speak by way of definition, are of reason, and some of them are also negations and privations, and relation: which three are the principal of relations of reason; negation, privation, and relation: to these, however, there is not added a third to be confused, as some falsely distinguish them; these they say are per intellectum tantum; those by the intellect with a mode or relation. For they are by the intellect in this one way, to wit, by the intellect alone; and are defined thus: which, when we speak by way of definition, some of them we speak of negatively and by privation, and some by way of relation. For some are formed by the intellect only, and one diminishes and defines another; and in the intellect only they are. For thus indeed the intellect and the apprehended things are understood at one, save for an order expressed and designated between them.

... of reason: not because the denomination actually takes place before the intellect, and that it be real; but because the form or thing from which it is taken is real, and extrinsic to the thing denominated. On this account we say that the foundation of the relation of reason (relatio rationis) is on the part of the thing, prior to the intellect.[95]

From this doctrine we noted above, q. 14, a. 15, at the end of the commentary, that the divine attributes, which are eternal, connote a respect of reason: not because there is from eternity an intellective motion which forms relations of this sort - for the divine [intellect], as will presently be proved, does not form them - but because from eternity there is a sufficient foundation in God and in future things, such that such a relative denomination can befit the divine attributes.[96]

95. "... fundamentum relationis rationis esse a parte rei ante intellectum."
96. "... notavimus supra q. 14, a. 15, in fine commentarii ..."

Fourth, even if by the operation of our comparative reason one is said to be understood on account of another, as also by the operation of the will one thing is desired on account of another, nevertheless from this operation there does not yet result a relation of reason: but only the foundation, and that thing from which it receives the denomination of such a relation: but a relation of reason is properly formed only by the operation of the intellect, whereby a thing is apprehended as related, which is called comparative knowledge: and no other faculty than the intellect can have this; for the intellect alone apprehends a thing as related, and actually compares it to another, to which in reality it is not referred nor compared.

And when the will is said to order one thing to others, this is not to be understood as though the will were to form a relation in the object: but because by its act it desires one thing for the sake of another: that is, it desires one thing because it is represented to it as useful to another. So too the intellect understands one thing for the sake of another: because from knowledge of the one it is moved to cognition of the other.

Now the reason must be noted why the intellect can form and feign something that is not, whereas the will cannot: namely, because the intellect has this power, that by a quality produced by itself it makes objectively present to itself something distinct from the quality, whether that have true real existence (esse reale) or not; but the will does not make anything objectively present to itself: rather it presupposes that as made by the intellect: and it only elicits and produces in itself a real quality of affection: but fiction can occur only in that which is objectively present: therefore the intellect alone can feign.

These things that we have said are to be understood of negation and privation of an ens of reason (ens rationis): for since there are three entia of reason - negation, privation, and relation - the two former are not to be confused with the third, as some have falsely thought: nor are those formed by the intellect in the same way as relation is. For they are brought about by the intellect only in such wise that they are named and defined: that is, therefore we speak of them by way of defining, and we predicate some things of them, as though they were entia, and we signify them by an affirmative name; because we conceive them after the manner of a certain being, and they are presented to our concept as though they were beings, indeed by a simple concept: for we do not assert of them that they are beings. Therefore, since that objective concept of negation and privation is not in the thing, but appears to us as though it were, it is indeed called an ens of reason; but it is by no means to be called a relation of reason: because that is not made by a comparison of the intellect, but by simple apprehension. For who would say that a chimera, or artificial redness, is referred to something by the intellect, and is formed by a relation itself; as the knowable is referred to knowledge, and by the very operation of the intellect that refers and compares, the relation of the knowable is consequent?

Idcirco, and rightly, logicians commonly say that the universal relation, which is said to befit a nature through the intellect, is made only through comparative knowing, not through the abstractive operation: that is, a nature is considered as one without the many: for from this knowledge alone the intellect has a foundation, so that thereafter it conceives this nature as related, abstracted from many, and common; and thus the universal relation of reason is made.

Hence it comes about that God in no way forms these relations of reason: for that arises from the defect of our cognition, as also the distinction of those things which are not distinguished in reality, as we shall say in disputation 118, chapters 2 and 3: not only because God knows nothing through alien species, and after the manner of another thing, but because he conceives things as they are in themselves, nor is anything varied in his intellect: but they are presented in the same way as they are in themselves. Wherefore, those things that are not composite the divine intellect does not conceive as composite: and things that are altogether absolute he does not understand as related, because the intellect of God alters nothing in the things themselves, not even in his own apprehension. Therefore, since he does not compare those which in reality are not referred to one another, he forms in them no relation of reason: and to assert the opposite greatly derogates from the perspicacity and simplicity of the divine intellect. By what account, moreover, his will is said to will one thing for the sake of another, or to another, we have shown in disputation 82, chapter 2.[97]

Quaest. XXVIII

Whether relation in God is the same as His essence

It seems that relation (relatio) in God is not the same as His essence (essentia). For St. Augustine says in On the Trinity, that not everything said in God is said according to substance. For "to something" (ad aliquid) is said, as "father to son": but these are not said according to substance. Therefore relation is not the divine essence.[98]

1. Furthermore, Augustine says in book 7 On the Trinity: "Every thing which is said relatively is also 'to something' except the relative: as 'man lord,' and 'man servant'." If therefore some relations are in God, there must be in God something other besides the relations. But this other cannot be anything except the essence. Therefore the essence is other than the relations.[99]
2. Furthermore, the being of the relative consists in being ordered to another, as is said in the Categories. If therefore relation is the divine essence itself, it will follow that the being of the divine essence consists in being ordered to another, which is repugnant to the perfection of the divine existence (esse): which is most of all absolute and subsists through itself, as was shown above.[100] Therefore relation is not the divine essence itself.

97. "... ut disp. 118, cap. 2, & 3 dicemus ... disput. 82, cap. 2 ostendimus."
98. St. Augustine, De Trinitate: "quod non omne, quod dicitur in Deo, dicitur secundum substantiam ... dicitur enim ad aliquid, sicut pater ad filium ..."
99. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 7, cap. 1: "Omnis res quae relative dicitur, est etiam ad aliquid excepto relativo: sicut homo dominus, et homo servus."
100. "... ut supra Q. 3 ostentum est ... et q. 4, art. 2 simul."

But on the contrary: Every thing which is not the divine essence is a creature. But relation really befits God. If therefore it is not the divine essence, it will be a creature. And thus to it adoration of latria would not be owed. Contrary to which it is sung in the Preface: "So that in persons there is the property, and in the majesty equality is adored...."[101]

I answer: Concerning this it is said that Gilbertus of Poitiers erred, but afterwards revoked his error in the council of Reims. For he said that the relations in the divinity are "assisting," or affixed extrinsically. For the evidence of which, it must be considered that in any of the nine genera of accident there are two things to consider. One of which is being, which belongs to each of them insofar as it is an accident: and this, commonly in all, is "to be in" a subject. For the being of an accident is to be in. Another, which can be considered in each one, is the proper notion of each of those genera. And in the other genera besides relation, for instance quantity and quality, the proper ratio of the genus is also taken according to a comparison to the subject. For quantity is called the measure of substance; quality, the disposition of substance. But the proper ratio of relation is not taken according to comparison to that in which it is, but according to a comparison to something outside. If therefore we consider even in created things relations insofar as they are relations, thus they are found to be assisting, not intrinsically affixed, as signifying a certain respect contingently belonging to the very thing related, insofar as from it it tends into another. But if relation be considered insofar as it is an accident, thus it is inhering in a subject, and has accidental being in it. But Gilbert of Poitiers considered relation only in the first manner.

Now whatever in created things has accidental being, insofar as it is transferred to God, has substantial being: for there is nothing in God as an accident in a subject; but whatever is in God is His essence. Thus, therefore, in that respect in which relation in created things has accidental being in a subject, relation really existing in God has the being of the divine essence, wholly the same with it. But in this, that it is said "to another," there is signified no habit or bearing toward the essence, but rather toward its opposite. And thus it is manifest that relation really existing in God is the same as the essence according to reality, and differs only according to the reason of understanding, insofar as in relation there is imported a respect toward its opposite, which is not imported in the name of essence. It is clear, therefore, that in God there is not one thing which is the being of relation and another which is the being of essence, but one and the same.

Reply to the first: The words of Augustine do not pertain to this - that paternity, or some other relation which is in God according to its own being, is not the same as the divine essence - but that it is not predicated according to the mode of substance, as existing in that of which it is said, but as being ordered to another. And on this account two only are said to be the predicaments in things divine: because the other predicaments import a habitude to that of which they are said, both according to their own being and according to the notion of their proper kind. But nothing which is in God can have a habitude to that in which it is, or of which it is said, except the habitude of identity, on account of the supreme simplicity of God.[102]

101. Preface: "Ut in personis proprietas, et in maiestate adoratur aequalitas."
102. "... propter summam Dei simplicitatem."

Reply to the second: If, as in created things, in that which is said relatively there is not only to be found the respect to another, but also something else absolute; so too in God. But nevertheless in different fashion. For that which is found in the creature, besides that which is contained under the signification of the relative name, is another thing. But in God it is not another thing, but one and the same: which is not perfectly expressed by the name of relation, as though comprehended under the signification of such a name. For it was said above, when treating of the divine names, that more is contained in the perfection of the divine essence than can be signified by any name. Whence it does not follow that in God, besides relation, there is something else according to reality; but only if the consideration be of the ratio of names.[103]

Reply to the third: If in the divine perfection nothing more were contained than what the relative name signifies, it would follow that its being would be imperfect, as being ordered to another: just as, if the name "wisdom" signified no more, it would not be something subsistent. But because the perfection of the divine essence is greater than what can be comprehended by the signification of any name, it does not follow, if a relative name, or any other name whatsoever said of God, does not signify something perfect, that therefore the divine essence has imperfect being: because the divine essence comprehends in itself the perfection of all genera, as was said above.[104]

The conclusion is affirmative, about the truth of which we must expressly discourse. But because we must philosophize in the same way about the distinction of the divine attributes among themselves and from His essence, and about the distinction of essence and relation; and that disputation which is treated in this question, article 4, has hitherto been deferred: therefore we must first dispute about those.[105]

Ad primum: It is answered that those words of St. Augustine do not pertain to this - that paternity, or another relation which is in God according to its own existence, is not strictly the same as the divine essence - but that it is not predicated according to the mode of substance, as existing in that of which it is said, but as having reference to another. And on account of this only two predicaments are said to be in the divine things: because the other predicaments import a habitude to that of which they are said, both according to their own existence and according to the proper notion of their genus. But nothing which is in God can have a habitude to that in which it is, or of which it is said, signifying a habitude of non - identity, on account of the highest simplicity of God

Ad secundum: If in created things, in that which is called relation, one finds not only a respect to another, but also something absolute, then in the creature that absolute thing, which is signified under the relative signification, is another thing. In God, however, it is not another thing, but one and the same; which is most perfectly expressed by relation, as though comprehended under such signification. For it was said above, when we were treating of the divine names, that more is contained in the perfection of the divine essence (essentia divina) than can be signified by any one name; whence it follows that in God, besides relation, there is nothing else according to reality, if the ratio of the names be considered

103. "... dictum est enim supra, cum de divinis nominibus agebatur ..."
104. "... quia divina essentia comprehendit in se omnium generum perfectionem, ut supra dictum est."
105. "... disputatio illa, quae tractatur in hoc quaest., articulo 4, amandata est."

Ad tertium: If nothing more were contained in the divine perfection than what the signification of some name can comprehend, it would follow that the divine essence would be imperfect, as having reference to another; and God would not be self - subsisting. But because the divine essence and existence (esse) is greater than what the signification of any name can comprehend, it does not follow that, if the name relation, or any other thing said of God, does not signify something absolute and perfect, therefore the divine essence is imperfect: because the divine essence comprehends in itself the perfection of all genera, as was said above

From these it is clear that in God there is not one existence of relation and another of essence, but one and the same.

Disputatio CXVI - Whether the divine attributes are distinguished among themselves, and from the essence, by their own nature, or only by conceiving

Caput I - What is meant by the name "attribute"

That the subject about which the disputation is undertaken may be clearly understood, and that the various significations of words may not be a cause of dissension, it must briefly be explained what we call a divine attribute.

Gregory, therefore, in the first book of the Sentences, distinction 8, question 2, and Marsilius, question 12, article 3, at the beginning, distinguish three things: the attribute, the ratio which they call "attributable," and the perfection called "attributal." They define the attribute thus: it is a name which can be predicated of God, of all the persons together, and of each one, denoting that which it is better to be than not to be. By this rationale names of relations are excluded from the notion of attribute; because they can neither be predicated of each person indifferently; and names which signify an action that befits God in time, as creation - for the act itself is not better than not-creating; that is, it is not better to create than not to create - wherefore the names Father, Son, Holy Spirit, creator, justifier, are not attributes of God. But the ratio, which they call "attributable," they say is the formal concept of the soul which we express concerning God upon hearing the very voice of the attribute; and finally by the "attributal" perfection they teach to be the very thing which we conceive concerning God, namely the objective concept which we have of God.[106]

In almost the same way Gabriel defined attribute in 1 Sent., dist. 2, q. 2, art. 1, notable 3, when he says: it is the mental, or vocal, or written predicable, which is apt to be said of God, and can be supposed for God, signifying some perfection of God, which is investigated by natural reason. By which definition indeed, although he embraces the very notion of creator, nevertheless he does not include the divine personal relations.[107]

106. Gregory (on the Sentences), in 1 Sent., dist. 8, q. 2; Marsilius, quaest. 12, art. 3.

Durandus, however, in 1 Sent., dist. 2, q. 3, nums. 6 - 7, thinks that attribute is taken in a twofold way, namely according to a broader and a more proper signification. In the former way, he says, attribute is whatever we ascribe to God by a mode of denomination; and in this way even infinity and immensity are called attributes. In the same way Augustine Niphus in 12 Metaph., disput. 13, cap. 2, at the end, says that an attribute in God is whatever about him is predicated by way of an accident and adjective; in which sense Averroes in 12 Metaph., com. 39, called the attributes of God "dispositions," as though added to the essence. In the latter way, says Durandus, that is called attribute which signifies some perfection common to God and creatures, such as justice, mercy, and others of that kind; in which way eternity, immensity, infinity, and the like are not to be called attributes. Thus, above, Henry of Ghent seemed to take "attribute," Quodlibet 5, q. 1, letters B and H.[108]

Finally, the Bishop of Cambrai, in this article, disput. 1, part 2, asserts that an attribute is a perfection of God which is neither a relation nor contains any relation, whether real or of reason. Nonetheless, he says that intellect, will, to understand, and to will are attributes: because although by a relative voice they are signified, yet in their own concept they have no relation, except consequently.[109]

But the definition of Gabriel which we reported above pleases me, provided that by "definition" one does not define the name "attribute," as he defines it, but the thing signified by the name; that is, any perfection in God which can be investigated by natural reason, and which is signified by us after the mode of some form adjacent to God; such as wisdom (sapientia), intellect (intellectus), will (voluntas), mercy, and so forth - about which the present controversy is how they are distinguished among themselves and from the essence, whether really or only by conceiving. About relations, since afterward a question is to be had for us, at present we will say nothing: wherefore we do not include them under the name "attribute."

Augustine Niphus in 12 Metaph., disput. 13, cap. 3, reports the view of Gualterus, who asserted, together with the highest simplicity of God, a real distinction of the attributes among themselves and from the divine essence. He proves this, because those things which are in diverse predicaments, or as it were in diverse predicaments, are really distinguished; but the attributes of God and the essence are as it were in diverse predicaments: therefore they are really distinguished among themselves. Yet with this distinction he defends the simplicity of God thus: because in order that something be composed out of several things, it is not only required that there be a plurality, but that those plural things which are found in it ought mutually to be compared as parts, so that one have the notion of act (actus), the other truly the notion of potency (potentia); either among themselves, or with respect to some third which they compose. But in God nothing can have the notion of potency: therefore, although there be several things in him, there is no composition. By

107. Gabriel, 1 Sent., dist. 2, q. 2, art. 1, notab. 3.

108. Durandus, in 1 Sent., dist. 2, q. 3, nn. 6 - 7; Augustine Niphus, 12 Metaph., disp. 13, cap. 2 (in fine); Averroes, 12 Metaph., com. 39; Henry of Ghent, Quodlib. 5, q. 1, litt. B, H.

109. The Bishop of Cambrai, in this article, disput. 1, part 2.

this rationale Scotus afterward made use of that distinction "from the nature of the thing," which he himself devised, to preserve the same simplicity of God; how far his view differs from the present one will be said below.[110]

In this same opinion some think that Gilbert of Poitiers, Bishop of Poitiers, was, in his commentary upon Boethius On the Trinity; where, as Bernard relates in sermon 80 on the Song of Songs, he was conceding these propositions thus and not otherwise: "The Father is truth," that is, "true"; "the Son is truth," that is, "true"; "the Holy Spirit is truth," that is, "true"; "the three are one truth," that is, "one true." Thus he used to say that the magnitude of God, or the substance of God, or the truth of God, is not God himself: from which he seemed to distinguish the attributes at least from the essence and from God himself. But it is false that Gilbert ever followed the aforesaid opinion of Gualterus, or a like one, about some distinction of the attributes either among themselves or from the essence. For, as Otto of Freising, an ancient author - and the emperor Frederick's uncle - relates, in book 1 On the Deeds of Frederick, chapters 56 and 57 (whose words we shall report below, disputation 120, chapter 1), Gilbert only used to say that the concrete "God" is sometimes put for a person, sometimes for the nature. When it is put for the nature, he conceded that God is deity itself and unity; but when it is put for a person, he used to say that that proposition, "God is the divine nature," is not to be conceded, in the case of personal supposition, as will be explained in that disputation. Likewise he did not predicate truth, and other abstracta, of a person, nor of God when he was posited for a person; from which he established only a real distinction, or from the nature of the thing, between the person on the one hand and the essence together with the attributes on the other; which he maintained for a special rationale, which even in that disputation we shall adduce when arguing also for the view of Scotus. But he taught nothing of this sort concerning the attributes either among themselves, or compared with the essence; nor in the Council of Reims, where his error was condemned, was anything defined against a distinction of the attributes. Wherefore Gilbert did not deny this proposition, "God is his wisdom," because the abstract is predicated of the concrete (for he granted it, if the concrete "God" were not posited for a person), but because, when "God" is posited for a person, it includes, together with the essence, relation - which he thought for a special rationale to be distinguished from the essence - as we shall see in disputation 120, chapter 1.[111]

This view of Gualterus is a manifest error against the faith. First, because the definition made in the Council of Reims against Gilbert - where it was decreed that the divine nature is not really distinguished from the person - no less militates against Gualterus, who distinguishes the attributes among themselves and from the nature. About that decree of the Council there will be express treatment below, disputation 120. Second, the argument of Bernard, which was used against Gilbert in the Council, and is found in the sermon cited, not less proves that the attributes are not distinguished from the essence, or among themselves, than that the essence is not distinguished from the person, or from relation. The argument is of this sort: Either the goodness by which God is good, and the wisdom by which he is wise, is something, or nothing; it cannot be nothing: therefore it is something. Further, if that is something and distinct from the very substance of God, then it is either superior to it, or equal, or inferior: it cannot be superior, as is clear; nothing can be above the essence of God. Therefore it is either equal or inferior. If equal and distinct from the very nature of God, there will be several gods; or, if he himself is one God, it will not be really distinguished from him. But it cannot be inferior, because it would follow that the very thing is a creature; and so God would be wise by some creature, as by a form - which is absurd; for whatever is below the divine nature ought to be some created thing.

110. See below, disput. 120, cap. 1.

111. Council of Reims against Gilbert; see below, disput. 120; Bernard, Sermon 80 on the Song of Songs; Otto of Freising, De gestis Friderici, lib. 1, cc. 56 - 57.

Third, Gualterus plainly subverts the simplicity of God and is forced to admit composition in God, which is absurd. Nor does the evasion which he devised avail anything. First, for if wisdom and goodness are in the essence of God really and distinctly, and by these God is rendered good and wise, it follows that these real forms are received in the very divine nature; and then the essence is received in potency so as to be informed, and wisdom, as a form, reduces the essence itself to act - not that that of God is ever potency, or could be, with the privation of a form, but because it is truly informed by wisdom as by a form. For even in those subjects from which accidental forms cannot be separated, if they are really distinguished from the forms themselves, there is truly potency, and the forms themselves are the true acts of that potency. Next, if in God there are several things really distinct from his essence, although he should never have of himself potency in respect of another, a greater absurdity follows, namely that in God there is some sort of aggregate which the logicians call "per accidens," like a heap of stones - something less worthy of simplicity, indeed repugnant to unity. For simplicity and unity are opposed to multiplicity; but where there is multiplicity and a conjunction of several, there cannot be simplicity; and there will be much less unity where those that come together are conjoined per accidens, and the one does not have the notion of act, the other the notion of potency. The Trinity of persons does not oppose this; for since each person, by its very supposit, is altogether the same as the essence, that union excludes all composition. Finally, it is not necessary that, for something to be truly called composite of two, each have the notion of a part, as this author seems to have taught: for it is true, as St. Thomas teaches, in the Third Part, question 2, article 4, proved from many councils and authorities, that the person of Christ is truly composite of two, of which one, namely the divine person, is not a part - although it have in a certain way the notion of act - whereas the human nature has the notion of potency.

The argument of Gualterus is easily dissolved. First, because he assumed a false proposition, namely that things of diverse predicaments differ of themselves: for "to be," and action, and passion are things of diverse predicaments, and yet, from Aristotle, Physics, book 3, they are the same motion. And from the very foundation we shall show that relation is not always a quality, as he took it by his foundation, in distinguishing. Then, the truth of the position in these matters, which are created, must be sought from the very things which are laid down in the sacraments and in the divine: for since in the predicaments there are several things, it does not follow that there must be true and real diversity; whence the diverse divine attributes, which are true though they are one alone, must not on that account be placed in different predicaments.

Caput III - The opinion of Scotus

After the foregoing opinion of Gualterus, and the common one which affirms that the attributes among themselves and from the essence are not really distinguished but only by reason, Scotus devised a certain middle opinion in 1 Sent., distinction 8, question 4 (for which there is also commonly cited distinction 2, question 7, in the Ordinatio), where he does not expressly dispute this point, but about the distinction only of the essence from the relation, that is, the person. He asserts, therefore, that the attributes among themselves are not distinguished really, nor yet by reason alone, but by a certain middle distinction, which he calls "formal," and says is "from the nature of the thing," and prior to every operation of the intellect, both human and divine. Moreover, he divides the aforesaid division of distinction into a distinction "from the nature of the thing" and a "distinction of reason," which is by the intellect. Again he divides the distinction "from the nature of the thing" into the real - by which one thing differs from another as a thing from a thing - and the formal - by which one differs from another by a formal ratio, or definition - which he plainly teaches to be prior to the intellect, as is gathered from the question cited and question 4 in the Ordinatio. And although he does not expressly teach in that place that the attributes are not distinguished from the substance and essence of God in the same way, nevertheless from his principles this is altogether inferred, and his disciples expressly affirm it.[112]

Scotus proves his view in 1 Sent., dist. 8, q. 3, ad quaestionem respondens, first because goodness in genus is distinguished from wisdom in genus "from the nature of the thing"; therefore infinite goodness is to be distinguished from infinite wisdom in the same way. For the addition of infinity to goodness or to wisdom or to another attribute does not destroy the nature and the formal ratio of it. Therefore infinite goodness ought to be distinguished from infinite wisdom in genus; and likewise infinite goodness and infinite wisdom agree also in genus of infinity from the nature of the thing ...

Tertio, Walter plainly subverts the simplicity of God, he is forced to admit what is absurd. Nor does the evasion which he himself contrived avail anything: first, for if wisdom and goodness are in the essence of God really distinct from it, and by these God is rendered good and wise, it follows that these forms are really in the divine nature and are therefore received into it: the essence is therefore in potency so as to be informed, and wisdom as a form reduces the essence itself to act - not that that potency of God is at some time, or could be, with privation of form, but because it is truly informed by wisdom as by a form. For even in those subjects from which accidental forms cannot be separated, if they are really distinguished from the forms themselves, there is truly potency, and the forms themselves are true acts of that potency. Then also, if in God there are several things really distinct from his essence, and neither has of itself potency with respect to the other, a greater absurdity follows, namely that there is in God a certain aggregate which logicians call a per accidens whole, such as a heap of stones, which is no less, indeed far more, repugnant to the divine simplicity. For simplicity and unity are opposed to multiplicity: but where there is multiplicity and a conjunction of several, there cannot be simplicity, and there will be far less unity there where the things that come together are conjoined, and the one has the ratio of act, the other the ratio of potency. The Trinity of persons, however, for this reason does not oppose simplicity, because each person by its very nature is altogether the same as the essence. Finally, it is not necessary, in order that a thing be said to be truly composed of two, that each have the ratio of a part, as this author seemed to have taught: for as we prove with St. Thomas from the Third Part, question 2, article 4, on the basis of many councils and Fathers, the person of Christ is truly composed of two, of which the one, namely the divine person, is not a part, although that has in a certain manner the ratio of act; on the contrary, the human nature has the ratio of potency. Walter's argument is easily dissolved, first indeed, because it assumes a false proposition, namely that things of diverse predicaments differ really: for action and passion are things of different predicaments, and yet, from Aristotle, Physics 3, chapter 3, they are the same motion; and, as we shall show below, relation is not always distinguished from the quality which it has as its foundation. Then also, even if the proposition were true in those things which are truly created and are placed in a predicament; yet in divine things, which truly are not in a category, it ought not to be true from this alone, that various attributes of God are conceived after the fashion of created things which are placed in a predicament.

112. Scotus, 1 Sent., dist. 8, q. 4 (Ord.); also dist. 2, q. 7 (Ord.).

Scotus's opinion: a "formal" distinction before any intellect

Between the aforesaid opinion of Walter and the common opinion, which affirms that the attributes are distinguished among themselves and formally from the essence only by reason, Scotus devised, in the First Book, distinction 8, question 4 (and for it he is also wont to be cited at distinction 2, question 7 in the Ordinatio), a certain middle opinion, where, on this matter, he does not dispute expressly, but only about the distinction of the essence from the relation, or person. He asserts, therefore, that the attributes are not distinguished among themselves really, nor yet only by reason, but by a certain middle distinction, which he calls formal, and he says that it is from the nature of the thing and prior to every operation of intellect, both human and divine. He divides the distinction, by a prior division, into a distinction from the nature of the thing, and a distinction of reason, which is by the intellect: again he divides the distinction from the nature of the thing into the real, whereby one differs from another as thing from thing, and the formal, whereby one differs from another by formal ratio, or definition, which he plainly esteems to be prior to the intellect, as is gathered from the cited question, and from distinction 2, question 4 in the Ordinatio. And although he does not expressly teach that the attributes are distinguished in this way from the substance and essence of God, yet from his principles it is altogether gathered, and his disciples expressly affirm it.

Scotus proves his opinion in that distinction 8, question 3 or 9. To the question he answers first, because goodness in genus is distinguished from wisdom in genus from the nature of the thing: therefore infinite goodness ought likewise to be distinguished from infinite wisdom in the same way: because infinity, added to goodness, or to wisdom, or to another attribute, does not destroy the nature and formal ratio of it: therefore infinite goodness and wisdom in genus ought to be distinguished: but that they are in genus distinguished from the nature of the thing is plain, because they differ in definition and in formal ratio: but definition is the nature of the thing itself.

Second foundation. Then those propositions which our intellect forms - "Wisdom is not goodness"; "Intellect is not will" - are not true because the intellect, conceiving thus, bestows truth upon them; but because they are conformable to the thing which they enunciate: they therefore suppose that in the thing itself it is so as is enunciated: therefore they suppose that wisdom by its nature is not goodness before the intellect: but whenever one is not the other before the intellect, it is necessary that before the intellect it differ from it: therefore goodness and wisdom, and similar attributes of God, which are truly denied of one another in a proposition, differ before the intellect by their nature. These are the most powerful reasons by which Scotus confirms his opinion: for the others which the Canariensis piles up in the place to be cited below are reduced to this latter: for all are taken from this, that many things are said of one attribute which cannot be said of another, as of the intellect, that it generates and understands, which cannot be enunciated of the will, and the like. How, however, Scotus with this opinion defends the simplicity of God, we shall see in the following chapter.

Some have thought the foundation of this distinction in Scotus to be other than it is. This opinion of Scotus certain men interpret benignly, as Gregory reports in 1, dist. 8, q. 1, art. 5, thinking that Scotus never conceded a certain formal distinction from the nature of the thing among the attributes in such wise that before every operation of the intellect they be actually distinguished; but only a distinction which is a sufficient foundation for the intellect to distinguish several. They gather, indeed, this interpretation from the same Scotus in 1, dist. 2, q. 7, at the paragraph "Sed hic restat," where he calls this distinction virtual: he also says that it is not really actual: finally he says that it can be called a distinction of reason. I indeed, if the School of this doctor consented to this interpretation, would most gladly admit it too: but I see no one who so understands his teacher, nor do I see how it can be so explained, as Gregory well proves. For the words of Scotus in the place cited do not admit such a sense. There, namely, speaking of the distinction between the divine essence and the relation - which in his opinion is the same as that which he posits between the attributes - he says first that this distinction is before every act of intellect, both created and uncreated, which he, as something new, says he affirms without assertion and prejudice to a better opinion: but if he only conceded that in the thing itself there is a foundation of the distinction by the intellect, he would say nothing new, nor would there be need to submit his opinion thus to the judgment of others. Second, in the same paragraph he says that this distinction is the least of those which precede the operation of the intellect. Third, he asks whether a real distinction can be given; and he answers in these words, "It is not properly really actual," understanding, as it is commonly said, by really actual that which is the difference of things, because of the divine simplicity. And a few lines later: "It can, however, be called a difference of reason," as a certain doctor says (to wit, St. Bonaventure on 1, dist. 15, q. 1), "not that ratio be taken for a difference formed by the intellect, but that ratio be taken for the quidditative aspect of the thing, according as quidditas is the object of the intellect: or in another way it can be called a virtual difference, because that which has such a distinction does not have in itself thing and thing; but is one thing having virtually, or eminently as it were, two realities, because to each reality, as it is in that thing, there befits that proper feature which belongs to such a reality, as if it itself were a distinct thing. Thus indeed this reality distinguishes, and that does not distinguish (he means the divine essence and the relation), as if this were one thing and that another." Fourth, a little below, about the divine essence and the relation, about the distinction of which he had disputed, he adds these words: "I say that in the divine essence before the act of the intellect there is entity A, and there is entity B, and this is not formally that, such that the paternal intellect considering A and considering B has from the nature of the thing whence this composition is true, A is not formally B, yet not precisely from any act of the intellect about A and B." And in Quodlibet 5, article 2, at the paragraph "Circa tamen," after he reported the opinion of St. Thomas and Henry asserting that Spiration and Paternity differ only by reason, and that this is sufficient for one not to be predicated of the other, he adds these words: "Another says otherwise (to wit, Varro on the First Book, distinction 2), and more reasonably, as it seems, and to the point, that the properties in the same person differ from the nature of the thing, besides the consideration of the intellect: because for this it suffices that there be disparity, although they are not opposed; and on this account the predication of one of the other in the abstract is not true." From which it is clear, first, that this distinction is posited by Scotus before the intellect: and therefore in distinction 8, question 4, at "Ad quaestionem," in the verse "istud non videtur," he called it a distinction on the part of the thing; and at the beginning of the same paragraph he called it a third distinction besides the real and that of reason, which he said is altogether before the intellect: which if it were only the foundation of that before the intellect, it would not be altogether before the intellect; and therefore, at "Circa tamen," he styled it a distinction from the nature of the thing. Second, it is gathered that this is not called by Scotus a distinction of reason, because it is made actually by the intellect. Third, that it is not called virtual, because it is made actually by the intellect, and the foundation alone contains it virtually in the thing itself: but because in the thing there is brought to pass what diverse things sometimes bring about. But when he says that it is not really actual, for that reason he asserts it, because it is not a distinction of thing from thing; but of two formal ratios: and for the same cause he also styled it that of reason. In this sense, therefore, explained, Scotus's opinion is to be attacked in the next chapter, and it is to be proved that no other distinction between the divine attributes and the essence, or between the attributes themselves mutually, can be admitted, than that which is by the intellect.

Caput IV - That the divine attributes are not distinguished among themselves, or from the essence, before the operation of the intellect, is shown by authority

The common opinion of the Scholastics and of the Philosophers is much truer, namely, that these attributes are not distinguished among themselves, or from the essence, in any way from the nature of the thing, that is, before the intellect. This is followed by St. Thomas in De veritate q. 7, art. 6; in Opusculum 9, q. 1, 2, and 3; and on the First Book, dist. 2, q. 1, art. 2 and 3; Durandus on the First, dist. 2, q. 2; Gabriel on q. 1 and 2; Gregory, q. 1; Marsilius on the First, q. 12, art. 3;

Capreolus on the First, dist. 8, q. 4, art. 1; Major, q. 1; Henry in Quodlibet 5, q. 1, and Quodlibet 13, q. 1; Averroes on Metaphysics 12, comment 59; Augustine Niphus on Metaphysics 12, disputation 13, chapter 4; the Canariensis in this article, disputation 1, part 1 and 2; Cajetan in the Opuscule De ente et essentia, chapters 6, 9, 12, in order: all of whom conspire against Scotus in this, to teach that the attributes among themselves and from the essence do not differ before the intellect in any way; whether, however, they differ by the intellect, not all think in the same way, as will be evident in the following disputation.[113]

For the perspicuity of this opinion two things must be confirmed and explained by us: one is, that this distinction is not from the nature of the thing before the intellect: the other, how it is made by the intellect: we shall demonstrate the first in this chapter; the second is to be treated more at large in the following disputation.

It is proved from the Fathers. This opinion therefore the ancient Fathers in the first place have handed down to us expressly, among whom most explicitly St. Anselm in the Monologion, chapter 15, where he says thus: "Accordingly, just as whatever is predicated essentially of the supreme substance is one, so it itself is, in one way, not by a different consideration, whatever it is essentially." And when he had shown that man, according to one consideration, is a body; according to another, rational; and according to another, a man; he straightway subjoins: "But that supreme essence is by no means so one thing, that that same thing, according to another way or according to another consideration, is not; because whatever it is essentially in some way, this is the whole that it is." By which words he excludes not only any distinction from the nature of the thing among those things which are in God; but even seems not to admit any distinction of reason; which indeed is to be understood in this way, that we think nothing in God which we do not understand to belong to God equally essentially: since in him we do not conceive something common to him and to other things, and something proper to him, as in man; but all things belong equally to God. Moreover, by the name of consideration he understands not only the operation of the intellect, but the thing itself, when he says that man, according to another consideration, is a body; according to another, rational, that is, according to another part; which is not found in God: since whatever is in him is altogether the same.

St. Augustine also, in book 15 On the Trinity, chapter 5 near the end, says that in God "to be just" is the same as "to be good": which, continuing in chapter 6, after a few words he says, "His wisdom is not one thing, his essence another, to which it is 'to be,' which is 'to be wise'." And in book 5, chapter 8: "It is not one thing for God to be, and another to be great; but the same thing to him is to be that it is to be great." He repeats the same in chapter 10 and 11; and in book 6, chapter 6 and 7; and in book 11, chapter 10. To these adds St. Gregory, book 10 of the Morals, chapter 20

113. St. Thomas, De veritate q. 7, a. 6; Opusc. 9, q. 1 - 3; In 1 Sent., d. 2, q. 1, a. 2 - 3. Durandus, In 1 Sent., d. 2, q. 2. Gabriel, qq. 1 - 2. Gregory, q. prima. Marsilius, In 1 Sent., q. 12, a. 3. Capreolus, In 1 Sent., d. 8, q. 4, a. 1. Major, q. 1. Henry of Ghent, Quodl. 5, q. 1; Quodl. 13, q. 1. Averroes, In 12 Metaph., com. 59. Augustine Niphus, 12 Metaph., disp. 13, cap. 4. The Bishop of the Canaries, on this article, disp. 1, p. 1 - 2. Cajetan, Opusc. De ente et essentia, cc. 6, 9, 12.

(elsewhere 21) on those words "qui autem noverunt," where he says thus, "God is that which he has: for he has eternity, but he himself is eternity; he has light, but he himself is his light: therefore in him it is not one thing to be, and another to have."

Granted, he called it a distinction on the part of the thing; and at the beginning he called it a third distinction, besides the real and of reason, which he said to be altogether prior to the intellect. But if what is prior to the intellect were only the foundation of that distinction, then it would not at all be prior to the intellect. Yet for all that he styled it a distinction from the nature of the thing. Secondly, it is gathered that this is not called by Scotus a distinction of reason, because it is made actually by the intellect. Thirdly, it is not called virtual, because it is made actually by the intellect, and only the foundation containing it in virtue is in the thing itself; but because in the thing itself there is wont to be supplied that which different things sometimes effect. But when he says that it is not a real actual distinction, for that reason he asserts so, because it is not a distinction of thing from thing, but of two formal notions; for which cause also he called it a distinction of reason. In this sense, therefore, with Scotus's opinion explained, it must be impugned in the following chapter, and it must be proved that no other distinction between the divine attributes and the essence (essentia), or between the attributes themselves mutually, can exist except by the intellect (intellectus).

That the divine attributes are not distinguished among themselves and from the essence prior to the operation of the intellect is shown by authority.

The common sentence of the Scholastics and of the Philosophers is far truer, namely, that these attributes are not distinguished among themselves, or from the essence, in any way from the nature of the thing, that is, prior to the intellect. This is followed by St. Thomas in De veritate q. 7, a. 6; in Opusc. 9, qq. 1 - 3; and in the First Book of the Sentences, d. 2, q. 1, a. 2 - 3; and by Durandus in the First Book of the Sentences, d. 2, q. 2; by Gabriel [Biel], qq. 1 - 2; by Gregory, q. prima; by Marsilius in the First Book of the Sentences, q. 12, a. 3; by Capreolus on the First Book of the Sentences, d. 8, q. 4, a. 1; by Major, q. 1; by Henry of Ghent, Quodl. 5, q. 1 and Quodl. 13, q. 1; by the Commentator on Metaphysics 12, com. 59; by Augustine Niphus, Metaphysics 12, disp. 13, c. 4; by the Bishop of the Canaries on this article, disp. 1, p. 1 - 2; and by Cajetan, Opusc. De ente et essentia, cc. 6, 9, 12 - in order: who all conspire in this one point against Scotus, to teach that the attributes do not differ either among themselves or from the essence prior to the intellect in any way; whether, however, they differ by the intellect, not all of them think in the same manner; but this will be plain below.[114]

From St. Augustine also, Book 5 on the Trinity, chapter 5 near the end, where he says that it is the same for God to be just as to be good; and in the following chapter 6, shortly after, that for God it is not one thing to be wise and another to be, but that the very being of God is that he be wise; and again in chapter 8: there is not one thing for God to be and another to be good; but this same thing it is for him to be and to be good. He repeats the same in chapters 10 and 11; and in Book 6, chapters 5 and 7; and in Book 11, chapter 10. To these adds St. Gregory, Book 10 of the Morals, chapter 21 on those words "qui autem noverunt," where he says thus: God is that which he has: for he has eternity, but he himself is eternity; he has light, but he himself is his light: therefore in him it is not one thing to be, and another to have.

114. St. Thomas, De veritate q. 7, a. 6; Opusc. 9, qq. 1 - 3; In I Sent., d. 2, q. 1, a. 2 - 3. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 2. Gabriel, qq. 1 - 2. Gregory, q. prima. Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 12, a. 3. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, a. 1. Major, q. 1. Henry of Ghent, Quodl. 5, q. 1; Quodl. 13, q. 1. Averroes, In XII Metaph., com. 59. Augustine Niphus, XII Metaph., disp. 13, c. 4. The Bishop of the Canaries, on this article, disp. 1, p. 1 - 2. Cajetan, Opusc. De ente et essentia, cc. 6, 9, 12.

Richard of St. Victor, Book 1 On the Trinity, chapter 13, teaches that God is by himself wise and powerful, not by something other by which he is wisdom and power; whence he gathers in these words: it is necessary that those things (namely wisdom and power) be altogether not anything other than he himself, that is, the highest substance. The words "altogether" and "anything other" are to be noted, by which he manifestly denies every distinction prior to the intellect from the nature of the thing. For if the attributes in any way differed from the essence from the nature of the thing, they would not be "altogether not anything other."

The same sentence is had from Marius Victorinus, Book 3 Against Arius, before the middle, in the fifth tome of the Sacred Library, where he proves that in God there is not one thing that lives and another which lives, but that living and the one who lives and understanding are altogether the same.

Boethius taught the same in the short book On the Trinity in these words: The divine nature is form without matter; and therefore it is one: it is that by which it is; for the rest are not that which they are. And below: wherefore this truly one, in which there is no number, in it there is nothing other besides that which it is. But if the attributes were distinguished among themselves or from the essence, there would be number there from the nature of the thing, and something other besides that which it is. For this sentence against Scotus we shall adduce in due place the notable words of St. John Damascene, which we will report below in disputation 129, chapter 4.

Secondly, although Scotus nowhere calls the distinction of the attributes among themselves and from the essence "real," indeed he expressly affirms that they do not differ as several things, but as several formal notions; yet since he teaches that distinction to be from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect, he seems to fall into the sentence of Gilbert, nay to introduce more distinctions in God than Gilbert posited. For Gilbert never called that distinction "real," nor did he assert that the essence and relation are several things; that God, or the Father, and his wisdom are several things; but he only said that God is not his wisdom, and he understood this from the nature of the thing and prior to the intellect. Then he spoke only of essence and person when he said that God is not his wisdom; for by the name of "God" he understood the Father or another person, but by the name of "wisdom" he understood the essence; and of the essence itself he nowhere denied that it is its own wisdom; rather he expressly conceded it, as we reported in chapter 2. But Scotus says not only that the Father, or the divine person, is not from the nature of the thing his essence and wisdom; but also that the essence of God is not his wisdom, and his intellect, etc. What in truth was done against Gilbert in the Council of Reims, and in what manner that proposition "God is not his wisdom" was damned, we shall show in disputation 120, chapter 2; how also in Scotus's sentence the mode of speaking which Gilbert was asserting is followed, we shall show in the same place. For by the same reasoning we must philosophize about the distinction of relation from the essence, and of the attributes among themselves and from the essence; and the same absurdity follows in both, if we constitute among them more than a distinction of reason.

The same opinion is shown by reason.

Caput V - Against Scotus by reason; and first with Bernard's argument against Gilbert

But now against Scotus let us argue by reason; and first with that by which Bernard used himself in the Council of Reims against Gilbert, and it is had in his own Sermon 80 on the Canticles: for the very same in every way will make against Scotus of its own accord, except that against Gilbert Bernard showed only that God, that is, the divine person, is his wisdom, that is, is the divine nature; but we on the contrary against Scotus must show that the essence of God is his wisdom - which follows by stronger reason, and Bernard would have proved much better, if Gilbert had denied that. The reasoning is of this sort.

If the divine essence is wise, or has wisdom which by its own nature differs from it, and prior to the intellect is not the essence itself, then that wisdom prior to the intellect is either something or nothing. It cannot be nothing; therefore it is something. Again, that something is either, prior to the intellect and by its own nature, superior to the divine essence formally and essentially, or equal to it, or inferior to it. It cannot be superior, as is clear; nor equal: for if it were equal by the nature of the thing to the very essence of God, then what we contend would be proved against Scotus - that what is equal to the essence is the essence itself; or if even then it were distinct, there would be several essences of God and several gods; for what is equal to God is God himself, and what is equal to the essence is the essence itself. Or finally, that something would be inferior to the essence itself; and thus there would be some creature formally, by its nature and prior to the intellect: therefore the divine nature would be made wise by something created, which is absurd. This reasoning must not only be held up for the authority of Bernard, and because it is in itself most efficacious, it must be highly esteemed; but also because Bernard himself was a good part of the definition of the Council of Reims, as will be seen in disputation 120. He himself fashioned this reasoning in order to confute that proposition of Gilbert, "God is not his goodness, or wisdom"; and the same fight very well against another proposition of Scotus, "Deity is not its goodness, or wisdom," from the nature of the thing and prior to the intellect. For although Scotus adds that the essence and wisdom are the same thing; nevertheless, when he says that the one is not the other from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect, he destroys what he had posited; for these two, as we shall say below, manifestly fight with each other; and his proposition agrees with Gilbert's proposition, because he denies the one to be the other from the nature of the thing, and not only according to our mode of understanding, as Gilbert absolutely denied; and in strictness from the nature of the thing, when we say "Deity is truth," we must add, "this is true"; just as Gilbert used to say that it must be added. For this proposition is formal in the sentence of Scotus, "Deity is true, or wise"; but that other, "Deity is wisdom, or truth," is not formal, nor true from the nature of the thing, nor in our mode of understanding; wherefore also in Bernard and in the Council that correction of Gilbert, which he added, namely, "this is, true or wise," is damned; therefore it must be blamed also in Scotus: because in his sentence, if from the nature of the thing and formally we speak, the same addition must be made.

Secondly, as we shall see in disputation 120, chapter 2, Gilbert never said that God and his wisdom, that is, the essence, are two things, or really differ; but speaking with the distinction of reason alone, he only said that they are distinguished not by another from another, which abstraction is mathematical and makes one thing be abstracted from another; but also by the theological reason: certainly by the theological reason I cannot understand otherwise than that the theologian must concede in the thing itself a formal reason from the nature of the thing: as Scotus admitted.

Thirdly, because against Scotus there follows that which we were inferring against Walter in chapter 2: namely, that in God there is composition, and therefore there would follow a substantial composition of the essence of God. For if prior to the intellect several things agree in the divine essence, whether they be called formal notions, or things otherwise by their nature, they cannot but compose that in which they agree. For if there is some distinction prior to the intellect and from the nature of the thing, there is also something and something prior to the intellect; therefore also the coming together of several and composition. But Scotus, to protect the simplicity of God, answers in the same way as Walter: namely, that those several things agree in such a way that nothing has the notion of a part, nor is the one as potency, the other as act. But in the same way this solution must be confuted against Scotus as against Walter. For if from the nature of the thing there is something and something, and the one is in the other as the formal reason by which that is such - namely, wisdom in the essence, that it may be wise - it follows that there is from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect act and potency: or if Scotus does not admit this, let him concede something worse, namely an inordinate aggregate which the logicians call "per accidens." Moreover, since plurality is repugnant to supreme simplicity, such as is the divine nature, even the least plurality and distinction from the nature of the thing will be repugnant. Why, however, plurality does not repel by the reason of a notion, we shall say in disputation 121.

Moreover, for the confirmation of this let us hear Bernard in the fifth of the Considerations to Eugene, before the middle, disputing against Gilbert, who was saying that the divine person, as the Father, is not the very deity, but by it, as by a form, is God. He says, therefore: Many things are said to be in God, and indeed truly and catholically; but they are many-one; otherwise if we judge them diverse, you will not have unity, but centenity. For example, we say great, good, just, and innumerable things; but unless you consider all to be one in God and with God, you will have a multiple God. He does not understand many gods, but one, not simple, but compacted of multiple variety. The same, therefore, we infer against Scotus in this way: if all those things in God from the nature of the thing are not the same, but several formal reasons mutually diverse, by which God stands, God is adorned and constant with multiple perfection; and so he himself is multiple. Bernard subjoins: For me there is not lacking what I might think of a God of yours of this sort: you seek what simplicity truly is; my judgment prefers simple to multiple. But what do those reply to this (namely Gilbert and his school, against whom he disputes)? Not many, they say, but one only divinity, by which all those things are in God, we assert to confer. So that man used to answer thus: because he posited no distinction between the attributes and the essence, as we noted above, but between the essence and the person; and therefore he said that all those attributes are one deity, which would not be God himself, but would make God as a form: wherefore Bernard presses him excellently, saying in effect: You assert, therefore, if not a multiple, at least a double God; which is a greater mark of fault; namely as if he were rushing to that, that multiplicity cannot be thought: that is, now God will not consist of various forms, but of two, namely of nature and of property; and so he will not be multiple, but double. It follows in the same place with Bernard, that he is not simple who is made up as one from two, any more than he who is made up from many. You wish, therefore, that simple be that which is not itself that thing which is, but that by a form: therefore if God is wise by a wisdom which by the nature of the thing is not God himself, then that is by the nature of the thing a form by which he is made wise; therefore God by his nature is obnoxious to some form. Finally he concludes: one God the Catholic has, whom he has as this, that he is wise not by this, nor by that which is not he himself. In a word, in God we mark nothing that is by a form, and hence nothing many; and by this we distinguish those things: we say God is that which he is, that is, he himself is; but not that which is in him, as if it were not he himself; for in him there is nothing; since he is not multiple.

In this sense, therefore, we can safely say in the Scotist sentence: from the nature of the thing this is, that God is "all-one," that is, not many in himself; but this, that God is "all-one," if from the nature of the thing he has any distinction, any multiplicity, we cannot safely assert.

By the same reason Isidore teaches, Book 1 On the Highest Good, chapter 1, sentence 6, where he says: God is supremely simple, one admitting nothing to himself as added; lest anyone suppose one thing of him, and another thing which is in him. And Richard of St. Victor, Book 1 On the Trinity, chapter 17, after he taught that God is truly simple and by no means composite, says: Therefore set it down as certain that in that utmost felicity, and true felicity of life there is true and perfect simplicity, and supreme simplicity, where also the most true good is; for supreme simplicity is always conjoined with the supreme good; wherefore God is the most simple of all, to whom nothing can be added or subtracted; lest one think that there is anything which is other than he himself, or other than that which is in him. And elsewhere he concludes that God is truly one, and most one; and that this opinion of Scotus is not explicit, certainly it is not of the divine simplicity, but of some that can be - not in him in act. Therefore if in God there were anything other, that thing would be something added; which is more repugnant to simplicity, and would indicate a greater vice than multiplicity itself, namely that he should have in himself something which is not himself.

Nor does it matter, if you say with Scotus that God is one, although he have many things in himself: for in no way does that unite God. For in the same way a man has many things in himself, yet he is one man; nevertheless Bernard's sentence is not for that: for it is not a unity which he has, and which simple is not, nor one: it will be said that he is one and simple with Bernard, these are the same; otherwise even man would be "most-one," which is absurd; nor do we call one "most-one"; therefore it is because he has one thing from another. Wherefore Bernard, when he says that God is "most-one," excludes every plurality from the nature of the thing from his essence and nature.

From the same Bernard also we shall prove no less clearly our sentence against Scotus below in disputation 118, chapter 2, when Bernard cites Nicetas in Oration 24, whose words we shall adduce in disputation 118, chapter 4; where, to show the simplicity of God, he says that his essence is one, and is very unity itself and solity; by which word he most excellently expresses the simplicity of God, when he says that he is solity, that is, alone without consortium with others, so that he be solity itself. But if by the nature of the thing he had several perfections, he would not be solity, nor would solity itself stand with those things added from elsewhere.

Add St. Anselm too, On the Incarnation of the Word, chapter 3 near the end, who, to prove the simplicity of God and against him whom we shall say in disputation 102, chapter 1 to have been in the same error with Gilbert, says to this effect: if all composite things can be dissolved by thought, as we say that God cannot be dissolved by thought, God would be less than that which can be thought, if he could be understood as what Bernard also asserted: he had said just before that greater is that which can neither be taken away nor understood as taken away, than that which can easily be removed: from which in turn thus against Scotus: greater is that which by the nature of the thing cannot be removed, nor be distinguished, than that which by the nature of the thing has several things in itself.

By this reason also Isidore, Book 1 On the Highest Good, chapter 1, sentence 6, says: God is supremely simple, not admitting anything to himself added; lest anyone think one thing of him, and another thing which is in him. And Richard of St. Victor in the same Book 1, chapter 17, after he stated that God is truly simple and least of all composite, says: Constantly set as certain that in that most blessed felicity, and in true felicity there is true and perfect simplicity, and the highest simplicity; where also the most true good is; for the highest simplicity is truly conjoined with the highest good; wherefore God is supremely simple, to whom nothing can be added or taken away; lest one think that there is one thing of him, and another thing which is in him. Therefore it is manifestly a true opinion that God is one, and most one. But according to Scotus's opinion there will be in God, from the nature of the thing, more than one thing; which cannot be. For if there were in the nature one thing and another, that which is in him would be added; but that which from the nature of the thing is more added bears with itself a greater imperfection.

But this cannot even be dissolved by the intellect, whereas that can. For Anselm did not call "to be dissolved by the intellect" to be distinguished only in our concept, but for the intellect to find in the thing itself one thing and another; and this he set in opposition to dissolution in act or in the thing itself - for he judged this to occur whenever one thing exists without another. He therefore wills that in God there be the highest unity, so that not only can one not be without the other, but neither can the intellect find in the thing itself, from the nature of the thing, one thing and another, distinct. From this, however, Anselm does not remove a distinction of concepts which does not touch the thing itself, but remains in our consideration alone; nor does he remove composition in this way, but any plurality whatsoever in the thing itself: because something greater can be conceived, namely a simplicity in which there is no plurality; but nothing greater than God can be conceived.[115]

From the opinion of Scotus there further follows that, from the nature of the thing, the essence of God in itself is not essentially perfect, but is perfected by some form supervening - which too is absurd. From all of which it follows that the attributes among themselves, and from the essence, are distinguished only by the operation of the intellect; about which mode of distinction there remain more things to be said in the following disputations.

Thus far we have attacked that middle distinction which Scotus fabricates in the divine attributes by peculiar rationes, which they say are proved only in God. It remains to show universally that such a distinction is altogether fictitious, and is found in no things, even created ones; but that every distinction is either real, or of reason. We do not deny that there is latitude in real distinction itself: for some things differ really as two things, each of which can exist per se without the other; others as thing and mode, of which one, namely the mode, cannot exist without the other, but can newly supervene upon it. We only strive to destroy a distinction "from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect," as it were of several formal rationes or definitions, and to show that such a distinction is either real or of reason - something Durandus also proves very well by this single consideration. Every being is sufficiently divided into a being of reason and a real being; therefore every plurality, which is a passion of being, will be sufficiently divided in the same way. But plurality is the same as distinction; therefore every distinction will be either of reason or real. Then, if from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect one formal ratio is not another, it follows that it is something else and another ratio; since therefore each of these is something real, so that before the intellect, from the nature of the thing itself, it may be something, and something real: there will therefore be two things, or two really diverse things. Nor does anything at all stand in the way, that in one and the same composite thing, which has the ratio of a whole, there be found a twofold ratio, as in man, soul and body; for one ratio differs from another really. Thus, even if in the same composite thing, or a thing which has the ratio of a whole, a twofold formal ratio be found, nevertheless if the one is not the other from its own nature and before the intellect, it will be really distinct from it.

Moreover, a real distinction is affirmed not only of those things which can be mutually separated at the same time, but also of those of which the one at least can be without the other, even if not conversely; besides, the ratio itself is openly confirmed by the authority of Aristotle, Topics VII, chapter 1, place 15, with these words: "Further, if one of the two can exist without the other, it will not be the same." By this same argument - that one can remain without the other - St. Augustine proves in book VI On the Trinity, chapter 6, that magnitude is one thing, figure another, and color another. And St. Bernard, sermon 80 on the Canticles, by the same reasoning gathers that the soul is not its justice and holiness. It can also be proved manifestly: because whenever two things are diverse only by our reason, while in reality they are altogether the same, they can be separated by thought alone, just as by thought alone they are diverse.[116]

115. St. Anselm, De incarnatione Verbi, c. 3; cf. the author's Disput. 102, c. 1.

Against Scotus from Bernard, Isidore, Richard, and Anselm

He held thus: because he posited no distinction at all between the attributes and the essence, as we noted above, but between essence and person; and thus he said all those attributes to be one "deity," which would not be God himself, but that by which, as by a form, God would be God; and accordingly he asserted that it confers on God that he be. But on the contrary St. Bernard subjoins: "You assert, therefore, if not a multiple God, at least a double God; and you have not reached simplicity with respect to number; nor to that than which a greater cannot be thought. That is, now God will not consist of various forms, but of two, namely of nature and of property; and thus he will not be multiple, but double." It follows also in the same Bernard (in the text cited above), that he is so simple that he is liable to no form, which neither a virgin nor a woman known by a single man is subject to. Bernard therefore wills that that be not called simple which is not itself by itself, but is some form: if therefore God is wise by a wisdom which from the nature of the thing is not God himself, and that is from the nature of the thing the form by which he is wise, then God is from his nature liable to some form. Finally he concludes: "My God is he who is Catholic, since he does not have this and that, than that other which he does not have; and he is 'he who is,' not 'that by which he is.'" That is: in God it is not permitted to assign in reality this and this, nor many things, so that we distinguish these and those; but God himself is "he who is," that is, he himself there; but not "that by which he is," that is, he is not many things which are in him: because he is not many.[117]

Certainly, according to Scotus's opinion, we could well say: in God from the nature of the thing there is this and this; and God is those many things which are in him. It is better, therefore, to assert that God is altogether, from the nature of the thing, simple without any distinction and multiplicity.

For this reason also Isidore, book 1 On the Highest Good, chapter 1, sentence 6, says: "Therefore God is called simple, either because he does not admit what he has, or because he is not one thing himself and another what is in him." And Richard of St. Victor, book 1 On the Trinity, chapter 17, after he has shown God to be truly simple and in no way composite, says: "Accordingly it is established that in that eternal happiness, and truly happy eternity, there is true immutability, and consequently true and highest simplicity, where, moreover, where there is highest simplicity there is true and highest unity: whatever therefore is in the highest good is truly and supremely one; nor can there be there one thing and another; and the very self is the whole that it is." Therefore he continues in chapters 18 and 19: but if the opinion of Scotus as above explained were true, certainly there would not be in God the highest unity that can be, since in it there would be first in understanding one thing and another by nature of the thing; which, if it were not so, there would be a greater perfection; hence it would be simplicity and a greater unity, because there would be greater indivision: for one and indivisible are the same. This same thing St. Bernard had said, book 5 of De consideratione, a little after the passage cited above: "God is not composite, he is mere simple; and if you wish to learn what 'simple' I should say, the same as 'one': God is as simple as he is one; he is, moreover, one, and in what way nothing else can be said, he is 'most one' (unissimus)." Therefore Bernard uses "not composite" and "simple" for the same thing, or "one": but he calls one that in which there are not many.

116. Aristotle, Topics VII, c. 1, loc. 15; St. Augustine, De Trinitate VI, c. 6; St. Bernard, Sermo 80 in Cantica.
117. St. Bernard, De consideratione, l. 5, near the place cited above.

Nor does it matter if you say with Scotus that God is one, although he has many things in himself: because he precludes that each of those many be God. For then by the same reason man has many things in himself which are not man; and yet man, in Bernard's sense, will not be one, because he has many things in himself: and because he is not simple, he will not be called one, since one and simple are the same for Bernard; otherwise man too would be called "most one," which is absurd. Therefore, if man is not called "most one," the reason is that he has this and that. Since therefore Bernard asserts that God is "most one," he excludes all plurality from the nature of the thing from his essence and nature.

From this same Bernard also, against Scotus, we will no less clearly prove our opinion in Disputation 118, chapter 2. With Bernard agrees Nicetas on Oration 24 of Nazianzen, whose words we shall cite below, Disputation 118, chapter 4, where, to show the simplicity of God, he says that his essence is one, and is unity itself and "solitude" (solitas); by which coined word he most aptly expressed the simplicity of God, when he says that it is solitas, that is, so alone without the consort of others, that it is solitude itself. Which, if from the nature of the thing it had several perfections, it would not be alone nor solitude itself, since there would be there one thing and another. St. Anselm also, in the book On the Incarnation of the Word, chapter 3 near the end - who, to prove the simplicity of God against him whom we shall say was in the same error with Gilbert, Disputation 102, chapter 1 - thus says: "Therefore, an incongruity follows, if something composite can be dissolved by thought; for when he says God is composite, he says that something greater than God can be understood." Bernard had also asserted the same thing. But a little before Anselm had said that that is greater which can neither in act nor in the intellect be dissolved, than that which can at least be dissolved in the intellect. From which I thus argue against Scotus: that is greater which is in no way distinguished either in reality or from the nature of the thing, than that which can be dissolved either in reality or by the intellect; therefore, if, by Scotus's opinion, in God from the nature of the thing there be several things in him, that cannot be dissolved by the intellect; but the other can; therefore the one is greater. But nothing can be conceived as greater than God.[118]

To the truth, Scotus's arguments can be dissolved with no trouble; and the first argument, in order to prove anything, ought to have presupposed that there is some common concept of created and uncreated wisdom, and of created and uncreated justice, and similarly for the other attributes. For if that common ratio of wisdom were from the nature of the thing different from the common ratio of justice, it would well follow that such wisdom, namely infinite wisdom, differs from the nature of the thing from infinite justice; and so of the others. But since a created and uncreated form can have nothing in common except the name alone, as was proved in Disputation 22, chapter 4, the argument has no force: for the distinction between justice and wisdom is not constituted universally, but in any given genus, either of created wisdom and usefulness, or of uncreated. Moreover, if it is alleged that in genus they formally differ from the nature of the thing, what is assumed is what had to be proved and gathered in the conclusion.

118. Isidore, De summo bono, l. 1, c. 1, sent. 6; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, l. 1, c. 17 - 19; St. Anselm, De incarnatione Verbi, c. 3; Nicetas on St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 24; cf. the author's Disput. 118, cc. 2, 4; Disput. 102, c. 1.

But even if we were to concede a common concept of created and uncreated justice and wisdom, still the argument does not prove the point. For when it is said that wisdom universally differs from the nature of the thing, that must be denied: for since those concepts are merely universals through our intellect, they also ought to differ only through our reason. And only this should be conceded, that in the concept of wisdom the concept of justice is not included; which we not only concede universally, but will also show that it bears upon the divine attributes themselves.

To the second I answer that, on account of a distinction of reason alone, many things are enunciated by us of one attribute which can be predicated of another just as well - just as of the intellect that it generates and understands - while these cannot be said of the will. For this arises from the diversity of concepts which the words immediately signify as apprehended by us: for the attributes of God are conceived by us as they are, and thus are named by us, and by a single most simple concept and by a single word we strive to express whatever there is in God; nevertheless we cannot conceive or name the one without the other. Whether, however, on account of that same diversity of concept and of thought one attribute can be absolutely predicated of another, we shall say in Disputation 119.

Finally, it must be observed that it is in vain that, from this formal distinction which Scotus says to be before the intellect, one tries to gather also a real distinction of the emanations and the proceeding persons, as if that formal distinction were the root of a real and greater distinction than that which he himself posits among the persons.

Note. Whether the intellect of the wayfarer man can distinguish the divine attributes without an order to some things really distinct. Disput. 117.

Note. That the attributes can be distinguished by the intellect is shown against the Nominalists, cap. 1.

Note. That the attributes in God belong without respect to effects and to distinct creatures, cap. ...

On the distinction of the divine attributes

Whether the divine attributes are distinguished; and how

That the attributes can be distinguished by the intellect; a refutation of the Nominalists

The Nominalists, against Scotus, think not only that the attributes in reality, and from the essence, by no manner from the nature of the thing prior to the operation of the intellect, differ; but also, against the Thomists, that neither can they be distinguished by the intellect. So teach Gregory in I, dist. 8, q. 2, arts. 1 and 2; Major, q. 1; Gabriel, in I, dist. ..., q. ..., art. 1.[119] He proves this by the following reason: whatever in itself is indistinct, and without any distinction by its nature, cannot be distinguished and separated by something extrinsic; but our intellect is extrinsic to any thing: therefore by it no thing can be distinguished.

Nevertheless Gregory and Major add that, although the attributes are not in reality distinguished by the intellect, yet they are distinguished in some manner connotatively, by reason of the effects which they, in some way, regard. For since the mercy of God looks to our misery, whereas justice punishes our offences - two effects which surely are distinguished - they are rightly said to be distinguished by distinct connotations; which is nothing other than that the very effects of the attributes differ in reality. But from the distinction of effects no distinction arises in the attributes themselves: this is clear from the same reason. For if the intellect, by reason of something extrinsic, could not distinguish the attributes, neither could it, by reason of the effects, which also are extrinsic, distinguish them. Therefore it is the same thing to distinguish the attributes by connotations and only to distinguish their effects.

But because sometimes effects are ascribed that are not distinguished - as the effects of justice and of mercy, because in every effect of either the ratio of the other is found - commonly the Scholastics teach in I, d. 46, and St. Thomas on the Summa Theologiae, q. 21, art. 4,[120] Gregory and Major subjoined that these attributes differ not by connoted things but by names only; as if they were to say, they are distinguished by name alone.

On the contrary, however, the opposite opinion is most true, namely, that the attributes of God are many - some in creatures are really distinct from others; against Durandus this is proved elsewhere - and in God they can be distinguished by us without respect to effects and to distinct creatures. This we shall establish in what follows

When it is said that, in general, justice and wisdom are not constituted either in the universal, but in any given genus, whether of created wisdom and justice, or of uncreated: further, if, in the genus of the uncreated, it be said that they differ formally from the nature of the thing, the very point to be proved is assumed, and what in the conclusion ought to have been gathered. But come, 119. Gregory of Rimini, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 2, a. 1 - 2; William Major (John Mair), q. 1; Gabriel (Biel), In I Sent., d. ..., q. ..., a. 1.

120. Commonly taught in I Sent., d. 46; cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 21, a. 4; see also Gregory and Major in the places cited.

let us concede a concept common to created and uncreated justice and wisdom; still the argument proves nothing. For when it is said that wisdom in general differs from the nature of the thing, this must be denied: for since there the concepts are only universals according to our intellect, they also must differ only by our reason; and the only thing to be conceded is that in the concept of wisdom the concept of justice is not included, which not only do we concede in general, but also specifically of the divine attributes themselves, as we shall show below.

Reply to the second. On account of a distinction of reason many things can be announced of one attribute which can by no means be predicated of another, as of the intellect, that it generates, that it understands - things which are not said of the will; this, however, comes from a diversity of concepts which the words immediately signify, as they are apprehended by us: for if the attributes of God were conceived by us as they are, and were thus named by us, with a single most simple concept and a single word we should express whatever is in God, nor could we conceive or name one without the other. But whether, by reason of this same diversity of concepts and of thought, one attribute can be predicated absolutely of another, we shall discuss in disputation 119.

Lastly, it must be observed that it is in vain, from this formal distinction which Scotus says is prior to the intellect, to gather from it a real distinction of emanations and of the proceeding persons, as if that formal distinction were the root of a real distinction and of a greater distinction than that which he himself posits among the persons.

Disputatio CXVII - Whether the intellect of the wayfarer can distinguish the divine attributes without an order to things really distinct

The Nominalists against Scotus think not only that the attributes among themselves and from the essence in no way differ from the nature of the thing prior to the operation of the intellect, but also, against the Thomists, that neither can they be distinguished by the intellect; thus teach Gregory in I, dist. 8, q. 2, arts. 1 and 2, Major q. 1, and Gabriel in I, dist. e, q. 1, art. 1.[121] They prove this by the following reason: because what is in itself undivided and, by its nature, without any distinction, cannot be distinguished and separated by something extrinsic; but our intellection is extrinsic to any given thing: therefore by it nothing can be distinguished. Nevertheless Gregory and Major add, even if the attributes are not distinguished among themselves by the intellect, yet they can be distinguished in some way by reason of what is connoted; that is, by reason of the effect which in some way they respect. Since the mercy of God succors our misery, whereas justice punishes our sins - two effects that are really distinct among themselves - rightly they are said to be distinguished by connotations; which is nothing else than that the effects themselves of the attributes really differ: for from the distinction of effects no distinction in the attributes themselves arises, as is manifest from their very nature. For if the intellect, because it is something extrinsic to the attributes, cannot distinguish them, in the same way neither will the effects, which also are extrinsic, distinguish them; therefore it follows that the attributes differ by connotations, and that only their effects differ. But because sometimes the effects of the attributes are not distinguished, as the effects of justice and mercy, in whose every effect the notion of each is found, as the Scholastics commonly teach in I, dist. 46, and St. Thomas above in I, q. 21, a. 4; therefore Gregory and Major subjoin that these attributes do not differ by the connoted things, but only by names; as if they were to say, that they are distinguished by name alone.

121. Gregory of Rimini, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 2, a. 1 - 2; William Major (John Mair), q. 1; Gabriel (Biel), In I Sent., d. e, q. 1, a. 1.

But on the contrary, the opposite opinion is most true: namely, that the attributes of God - many of which in creatures are really distinct from others - can be distinguished in God by us without respect to effects and to distinct creatures. This we shall establish in what follows.

As to things which from the nature of the thing in no way differ, that they can be distinguished by reason - so teach St. Thomas, Cajetan, Henry, the Commentator (Averroes), St. Augustine Niphus, cited by us above in the prior disputation, cap. 4; Marsilius, in the first question 12, art. 3, in the second part of the article; Durandus, on I, dist. 2, q. 3, num. 9; Capreolus, on I, dist. 8, q. 4, art. 1, the second conclusion; and the Canarian in this article, disput. 1, part 2, who notes that by the name "reason" is not understood ratiocination, nor syllogism, nor the definition of the thing - all of which also are called ratio - but the intellection, or the concept which the intellect forms for itself of some thing and sets before itself.[122] For in the intellect there is not only the quality which is intellection, but also the thing that we cognize, and by means of that quality it is present to us; and since many things about God are set before us and by cognition become present, of which we cognize one in such a way that we do not think of another, it comes about that in our concept many things about God appear, and these we call the attributes of God, because by our reason and by a distinct conception they are attributed by us to God. whence it comes about that many things are set before us which in truth are not many, but one most simple thing; in the following disputation we shall say. But it must be observed that this diversity of concepts, which we call objective concepts, proceeds from a real plurality of concepts which we call formal: that is, from a plurality of qualities and cognitions which we express in our intellect. For any quality in its own way represents the thing, and because our cognition is imperfect and proceeds little by little, it sets a simple and individual thing before us as it were by parts: wherefore, if the distinction of reason be so called, taking "reason" for the objective concept, or taking it for the intellect itself, which by its operation divides things that are indivisible, it comes to the same. Therefore, since the intellect apprehends in various ways the thing which is most simple, who will deny that it is divided and distinguished by our intellect - not because the thing itself, which is outside, is in itself intrinsically divided, but because from it we elicit for ourselves diverse objective concepts? Whence it becomes that various names that signify the divine perfections are not synonyms; as I noted above in q. 13, art. 4: because names do not signify to us immediately the things as they are in themselves, but as they are set before us, as was said in disput. 75, cap. 3. Wherefore, since to wayfarers God is set before them under various perfections, those names for wayfarers will not be synonymous, because they do not signify for them altogether the same, but make them know diverse things in their own concept. Whether, however, they are synonymous for the blessed, we shall see in the following disputation.

122. St. Thomas; Cajetan; Henry of Ghent; Averroes; St. Augustine Niphus, cited above in the prior disputation, cap. 4; Marsilius, in I, q. 12, a. 3, in the second part of the article; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 3, n. 9; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, art. 1, concl. 2; the Canarian, on this article, disput. 1, part 2.

From which a second argument against Gregory is derived: for if the attributes of God, as he asserts, do not always differ by connoted things, or effects, but sometimes by names, it follows that sometimes they differ by name alone; but things which are distinguished only in this way are synonyms, as "ensis," which is also called "gladius," and "sword," by exactly the same ratio. Then too, even if the connoted things differ, if the attributes themselves in themselves, which are first and directly signified, do not differ, they will be entirely synonymous: for synonymy is to be taken from that which is per se signified, not from that which is accidental and extrinsic. But it cannot be conceded that the attributes of God are synonymous; for we should then use all the names indifferently for the same thing: therefore on the side of the direct signification some distinction must be assigned.

But the Nominalists' reasoning is frivolous: for although in itself nothing can really be divided and distinguished by something extrinsic, nonetheless rightly by something extrinsic it can be called divided and distinct; for many things are so called from something extrinsic. Add that when we say the attributes are distinguished in God, we speak of them not as they are in God himself, but as they are set before us; and in this way they are divided; for cognition and the quality expressed in the intellect has this power, that, although it does not attain the thing itself external to it, nevertheless it makes it present and to appear in a different mode; and therefore sometimes by its representation it divides and distinguishes what is indivisible in reality: in which way we say that the attributes and the rest that are indivisible in God are distinguished by us. But what Anselm in the Monologion, cap. 16, seems to deny concerning a distinction of reason in God, has already been explained by us in the preceding disputation, cap. 4.[123]

Caput II - That the attributes belong to God without respect to creatures really distinct, is proved against Durandus

Durandus, on I, dist. 1, q. 1, notes that there can be a twofold sense of the proposed question, whether the attributes can be distinguished in God without respect to creatures really distinct: one, whether the perfections which are called attributes belong to God without an order to creatures really distinct; the other, whether they can be distinguished by us without respect to diverse creatures. But as to the prior sense, he answers that all the attributes which belong to God, either by opposition with creatures, or by respect of cause, do not belong without respect to creatures. Perhaps Durandus understands those attributes which belong to God insofar as he is a cause in act, as the attribute "Creator." He himself calls attributes of the prior genus "infinite," "immense," "incorporeal"; while of the latter genus he holds to be "creator," "justifier," and perhaps "omnipotent," although this attribute does not signify a cause in act, but in potency.[124]

123. St. Anselm, Monologion, cap. 16.
124. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 1, q. 1.

But about the attributes of the first genus his opinion does not please: because neither from the formal signification of this name would there not be, if the opposite form and habit were impossible; and thus, if a body were not possible, the negation of body would not be possible; and so in other cases (by which reasoning Durandus was convicted to assert that statement). Yet, since by these names there is signified by us not so much a negation as something positive, which is more known to us - as many other things are signified more clearly - one cannot say that those attributes, insofar as they are perfections in God, would not be in him if otherwise the opposite form (in creatures) were not; for that positive perfection does not depend on the opposite which is found in creatures, although the negation depends.

As to the attributes, however, of the latter genus, we admit that those which signify a cause in act, as "justifier," "creator," do not belong to God except by respect to creatures, which being taken away, on the ground that they would not be possibles, those attributes themselves would not belong to God; yet we say that these are not attributes of God, as is gathered from what we noted in the preceding disputation, cap. 1; or, if these be called attributes, nevertheless they signify in God no perfection in act other than that by which God has, insofar as he is able to do all these things. For to justify in act, to create in act, is no peculiar perfection in God besides the power which we have said.

Let us conclude, therefore, that no attribute which signifies some peculiar perfection of God belongs to God by a real respect to creatures, even possible ones, nor does relation itself constitute omnipotence, or wisdom, or knowledge. For although these are signified by us in relation to creatures, nevertheless in God they are absolute according to the thing, as we proved in disputation 104, cap. 6. Therefore there are in God attributes which are perfections of God without respect to creatures, as St. Thomas at length shows in De potentia, q. 7, art. 6, and Henry in Quodlibet 5, question 1.[125]

Caput III - That the attributes in God cannot be distinguished by us without respect to distinct creatures

The latter sense of the proposed question is whether various attributes can be distinguished by us in God without respect to creatures. Now the doctors, whom I have been able to read on this matter, agree that more than one thing cannot be distinguished by us in God unless our intellect regards creatures really distinct. Thus teach St. Thomas on I, dist. 2, q. 1, art. 3, in the third part thereof, and in Opusc. 9, qq. 1, 2, and 3, and in De potentia, q. 7, art. 6; Durandus on I, dist. 2, q. 3, num. 10 and the following; Capreolus on dist. 8, q. 4, art. 1, concl. 4, and art. 3 at the end, in the solution of a certain argument; St. Augustine Niphus, XII Metaph., disp. 13, cap. 4; Gotfredus, Quodlib. 7, q. 1, as is reported from Scotus in the place cited, disput. 116, cap. 3.[126] Durandus proves this first, because, in order that a distinction of reason not be altogether fictitious, it ought to have some foundation in the thing: but in the divine essence (essentia), since it is most simple, there is no foundation of any distinction: therefore our reason must regard creatures, so that, in imitation of them, it may distinguish in God that which in reality is individual. Secondly, Durandus confirms the same, because those things which seem to have some imperfection, if they are attributed to God, must be attributed by respect to creatures - as that he is now creator who before was not: but plurality includes in itself a certain imperfection; therefore it is not to be granted to God absolutely, unless by respect to creatures. But these reasons proceed from more common principles; wherefore they do not prove much. Thirdly, therefore, it is proved more efficaciously ...

125. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 7, a. 6; Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 1.

126. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 1, a. 3, in the third part; Opusculum 9, qq. 1 - 3; De potentia, q. 7, a. 6; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 3, n. 10 ff.; Capreolus, d. 8, q. 4, a. 1, concl. 4, and art. 3 in fine; St. Augustine Niphus, In XII Metaph., disp. 13, cap. 4; Gotfredus, Quodlibet 7, q. 1; reported by Scotus in the place cited, disput. 116, cap. 3.

It was being proved: because, as St. Thomas teaches in the question De potentia, from the essence (essentia) of God it comes under a twofold head, that the most simple essence is distinguished by us into various perfections; first, from the imperfection of our cognition, because we do not conceive God as He is; then because we conceive Him through the species (species intelligibilis) of created things and through the perfections of those things; wherefore we cannot but look to distinct creatures really, or to distinct perfections: and therefore, from diverse effects or from the diverse perfections of creatures, we assign to God various attributes, as justice - because He gives to each what is his and observes what He once promises; mercy - because He takes away our misery; and to understand and to will, from those things that we see in ourselves; for in the likeness of these we consider the perfections of God. The very same entirely happens when, in created things, we distinguish by the intellect certain things which in reality are not distinct. For we would not distinguish by the intellect the notion of genus and the notion of difference, unless we observed many things among themselves to be in part similar, in part different. So too we distinguish action itself and passion by respect to agent and patient. Nay more, the distinction of the same thing from itself, when we predicate the same of itself, which seems the least distinction, is made by us by an ordering to diverse things really: for when the same thing in a proposition is posited on the part of the subject and on the part of the predicate, the same name being repeated, as when we say, Peter is Peter; we distinguish it into two by an analogy to other propositions in which the predicate and the subject are diverse: although the aforesaid distinction of Peter from himself is not of the thing on the part of the objective concept, but of the name: not because there is a different name on the part of predicate and subject, but because the same is repeated twice: whence it also follows that Peter is conceived twice by us, which indeed is not to distinguish, but to be repeated in our cognition and in voice. In another way indeed can Peter be distinguished from himself: namely, the old man from himself the youth; but if our intellect forms some distinction of him, it certainly derives it from an order to things really distinct; to wit, from an order to the accidents and other things that accompany the various ages.

From what has been said it is inferred that in every distinction of reason there is a twofold foundation, in order that our intellect distinguish in things: one because things are not conceived by their own and distinct concept as they are; the other, because we understand them relative to certain things really distinct. The former foundation is said to be only in the mode of conceiving; the latter indeed also in things, not indeed in those very things which we distinguish, since in them there is no plurality nor any real vestige of that plurality which afterwards we distinguish by the intellect; but such a foundation is only in the things on looking to which we distinguish by our intellect those things that are simple. Wherefore I do not see how the Thomists can say that the distinction which they call of ratio ratiocinata and of ratio ratiocinans differs: that the latter has no foundation in the thing, but only in our mode of conceiving; but the former both in the thing and in our mode of conceiving. For any distinction of reason has a foundation in both, as has been explained.

But they say that the distinction of ratio ratiocinata has a foundation not only in other things of which we make it after the manner of them by the intellect, but also in the very thing which is distinguished by reason: not because there is in it any plurality, but because its nature is such as to constrain our intellect to capture a distinction, nor does it do this merely at will, whereas to that which is of ratio ratiocinantis the intellect is not constrained, but fashions it at will. But against this there is a manifest reason which is gathered from what has been said: because our intellect never distinguishes many things in the same thing unless when it does not know the thing perfectly, as it is, as we will show more at large in the following disputation. Then also, always when it distinguishes, it attends to certain things really distinct, with respect to which it distinguishes what is undivided; therefore not at will, but from the natural mode of our intellection. Therefore no distinction of reason is made by us without a foundation, but we make all of them as if constrained, because we do not understand the thing perfectly: for if we knew it with perfect knowledge, we could by no means distinguish it into many, as will be evident in the following disputation. But that distinction of the same thing from itself is not a distinction of the thing, as I said above, but a certain distinction of the name, or even a repetition of the same concept: but a repetition of a concept is one thing, a distinction another. What sort of distinction suffices so that one may not be predicated of the other must be explained in disputation 119. Nor does Henry dissent from this our opinion in Quodlibet 5, question 1; for he does not contend that our intellect can, in God, distinguish many which are not distinct in reality without an order to creatures really distinct: but he only teaches that the divine intellect can in its essence distinguish many attributes, even if there were no creatures whose likeness it would use to distinguish them: which, however, is true, as we shall soon see.

Disputatio CXVIII - Whether the intellect of God and of the blessed can in God Himself distinguish various attributes

- Opinion of Henry and the Canarian. Caput I.
- The attributes are not to be distinguished by the divine intellect itself, nor even by the blessed. Caput II.
- That by the divine or blessed intellect the attributes cannot be distinguished by respect to creatures, or to the intellect of one on the way. Caput III.
- Corollaries of the preceding doctrine. Caput IV.
- Replies to the arguments of Henry and the Canarian. Caput V.

Caput I - Opinion of Henry and of the Canarian

The present disputation will treat not only of the divine attributes, but also of any individual thing whatever, namely whether it can be distinguished by the divine intellect and by one understanding it as it is, by a proper and quidditative concept, into several notions, as with us wayfarers God is distinguished: for entirely the same reason holds. Of the intellect, therefore, of God and of the blessed Henry teaches in Quodlibet 5, question 1, that it can distinguish the divine attributes so excellently that for distinguishing them it is not necessary for them to look to any creatures really distinct, as we wayfarers do look. Whence he gathers that, even if there were not possible several creatures really distinct, it would nonetheless be the case that the divine and the blessed intellect would distinguish more attributes in God: which sentence the Canarian embraces on this article, disputation c., doubt 3, at the end.[127] Durandus also and Cajetan favor it, as will be noted below.[128] But in order to explain this sentence Henry notes that the divine essence, even if in itself it is most simple: nevertheless, insofar as it is a truth understood by God Himself and by the blessed, can be considered in a twofold way, first insofar as it is a truth understood by a certain simple intuition: and in this mode neither the blessed man nor God could distinguish many attributes in it: there is, however, he says, in that cognition a multiplicity of attributes virtually. Then the divine essence can be considered as a truth understood, about which the intellect of God or of the blessed is busied (says he), that is, strives to investigate and to compare among themselves the perfections of this essence: and in this way it can distinguish in it several attributes; and he says that the distinction of these is made by the divine and blessed intellect by respect to the intellect and to the will of God Himself: because, to wit, the intellect of God or of the blessed conceives the divine essence, and the will, and the thing willed, as the intelligent and the thing understood. Thus indeed can be distinguished all the attributes of God which pertain to the intellect, as that He is true, wise, provident, etc., and those which pertain to the will, as that He is good, just, merciful, etc. From these he gathers that all the attributes of God, except the absolute existence (esse) which they have in God, include also a respect of reason, which the divine or blessed intellect adds.

Durandus in I, distinction 2, question 3, number 20, only denies that the attributes in God can be distinguished by the divine intellect itself without an order to creatures really distinct: wherefore he seems to concede that the attributes can be distinguished by God Himself, not by respect to those things which are within Himself, but by respect to creatures. For this reason I said that Durandus in a certain respect takes Henry's side: he agrees with him in this, that he says the divine attributes can be distinguished by the divine intellect: and by the same reason he ought to affirm this of any intellect seeing God as He is. Finally Cajetan above, on question 13, article 4, around the third solution, seems to teach that diverse concepts of His essence are not distinguished by the divine intellect: yet they are distinguished by any other created intellect, even if it is blessed.

127. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 1; the Canarian (Canisianus) on this article, disputation c., dub. 3, in fine.
128. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 3, n. 20; Cajetan, on I, q. 13, a. 4, solution 3.

Wherefore all these will concede in the same proportion, that by the divine intellect, or by any created intellect knowing a thing as it is, more things can be distinguished in a thing in which there is no distinction before the intellect: whether that be God, or any other created thing.[129]

This sentence is proved first: God and the blessed understand every truth which is in the divine essence: therefore they understand in God the notion (ratio) of intellect and of will: the notion of justice and of mercy, because all these are in Him: but these truths are distinct with respect to one understanding them as distinct; and so they themselves truly distinguish the attributes.

But this distinction is not made of necessity by respect to creatures really distinct - Canarius proves this secondly - because even if there were not several possible creatures distinct, there would nonetheless be in God a sufficient foundation for distinguishing the attributes. For if some real distinction were necessary in respect of which the attributes should be distinguished, that is found in God, since in Him the processions are really distinguished.

Thirdly, Henry proves this very point: because the attributes are in God without any respect to creatures; for He is not said to be wise because He is the cause of the wisdom of creatures; thus He would not be formally wise, but from the effect; and so of the others: therefore the attributes can be understood and distinguished without an order to creatures.

Fourthly, the same can be confirmed by this argument of Durandus: in God there is a real distinction of the persons without an order to creatures: therefore there can be a distinction of reason; the sequel relies on the common proposition, he who can the greater, can also the less: and where the greater can be, the less can be: therefore where there can be a real distinction without an order to creatures, there can be a lesser distinction of attributes, which is by the intellect without coordination.[130]

Fifthly, finally, there is another argument of Durandus: the distinction of the persons supposes a distinction of the producing principles; if therefore that distinction which is of the persons and posterior, befits God without respect to creatures, the distinction also of the principles, which is prior, will befit Him, and this is of reason: therefore a distinction of reason can befit God without an order to creatures.

Moreover, it was the express sentence of Bernard in book 5 of De consideratione to Eugene somewhat before the end, where, after he had said that God is length, breadth, height, and depth, and had objected to himself that from this it follows there is a quaternity, he says in these words: "I seem to have put forth many things, but it is one: one God is marked out according to our capacity, not according to His own state. It is different here, not there; the voices are various, the paths many; but one thing is signified by them, one is sought. And after a few things interposed: But for us, because we cannot contend with God in simplicity, while we strive to apprehend one thing, it turns up as it were quadrupled: the mirror does this, the enigma, through which alone it is granted to see: but when we shall see face to face, we shall see as He is. For then indeed the fragile edge of 129. Cajetan, on I, q. 13, a. 4, sol. 3.

130. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 3, n. 20. Capreolus also hints at this mode in In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, art. 3, in fine, in solving a certain argument - although he speaks only of the attributes of God and of the divine and blessed intellect, the same by the same reason ought to be asserted of any intellect seeing a thing as it is.

our mind, no matter how vehemently it strains, will not in any way rebound, or break up into its own plurality: it will gather itself more, will unite, and conform to that unity, or rather to that One, so that one face may answer to one face." These are Bernard's words, by which he has expressed the whole matter so perspicuously that by no one studious of scholastic theology could anything be said more clearly or desired.

Nevertheless Durandus teaches, against Henry, that the attributes cannot be distinguished by the divine intellect without an order to creatures really distinct; and he dissolves the two latter arguments which were brought for Henry's sentence.

Caput II - That the attributes are not distinguished by the divine intellect, which opinion is also more probable as to the blessed

Much more probable seems the opinion which affirms that not only are the divine attributes among themselves, or from the essence (essentia), not distinguished by the divine intellect itself, nor even by the blessed.

But in Bernard's words this must be observed first: that this our opinion is confirmed, when he says that that multitude of perfections which we signify by various words about God proceeds from the infirmity of our intellect which is still knowing through an enigma: but that this multitude will not remain in our intellect when we shall see God as He is: which indeed, if it is true of us, must much more be asserted of God Himself, who most perfectly beholds Himself as He is: wherefore neither God, nor the blessed, will distinguish many attributes in God.

Second, note that Bernard not only concedes, with respect to the intellect of one on the way, a distinction in God according to words, as the Nominales cited in the prior disputation used to say, when he says; and con -

Note, that Bernard grants not only a distinction of words, as the Nominales cited in the prior disputation used to say, when he says, and "different voices," but also a distinction of reason, and a concept concerning the same God, when he says, "many paths by which the One is sought": for the "paths" of our intellect seeking God are concepts.

Third, from Bernard's words it is plainly gathered that the divine attributes, which were known as distinct on the way, are to be seen in the fatherland as undivided and without distinction, so that, when one intellect of one seeing God should try to distinguish them, it would not be able: which he signified by those words: "Nor, however vehemently it strain, will it in any way spring back or fly apart into its own plurality"; and by what follows. For if the blessed intellect can distinguish several [things] in God, the consequence is that it can spring back and fly apart into plurality, as into different paths. And hence the doctrine of Henry is refuted, who asserts that the essence of God is distinguished by the intellect of God and of the blessed, not insofar as it is truth known by a simple intuition, but insofar as each intellect can investigate around it.

Fourth, from the same words of Bernard we could prove against Scotus that the attributes are not distinguished in God by the nature of the thing, but only by the intellection of one on the way. For if they were distinguished by the nature of the thing, the Blessed would distinguish them in the same manner as the wayfarer: but Bernard says that in the fatherland the intellect cannot spring back into plurality as it can on the way; therefore they are not distinguished by the nature of the thing: for if they were distinguished by the nature of the thing, the Blessed could not fail to understand those things which in themselves would be distinct by the nature of the thing, just as, even on the way, according to Scotus's opinion, the wayfarer understands several [formalities] in God formally distinct.

How much weight Bernard's authority has in this matter against Scotus is gathered from the things we said in disputation 116, cap. 4; for even in that book 5 of De consideratione he disputes against Gilbert and writes to Eugenius, who condemned Gilbert's error, as we shall see in disputation 120, contending to prove against him, as an undoubted dogma of faith, that in God there is no other plurality and distinction than that of the persons among themselves: for he judges the essence and its perfections to be by their nature altogether the same as the persons.

Then this same position is proved from the authority and reason of St. Thomas, q. 7 de potentia, art. 6, which Bernard also hints at in a few words; because from the infirmity and imperfection of our intellect (intellectus), while it knows through an enigma and through alien species, it comes about that it is not able to know the thing integrally, as it is; and therefore it, as it were, apprehends and divides it by parts, or, knowing its nature in various ways from various effects, or understanding it in different ways from the different perfections of creatures: therefore, whenever an intellect apprehends a thing and by its cognition makes it present to itself objectively, just as it is, then it is not set before the intellect in any other way than as it is in itself; if it in itself has no distinction and plurality, it follows that neither in the intellect seeing it as it is can it be distinguished or appear as distinct: but in the intellect of God and of the Blessed, God appears in the same way as he is in himself; therefore, if in himself he has no distinction of attributes by the nature of the thing, he will have none in the intellect of God himself and of the Blessed: and this especially has force in the divine intellect, because by its nature the intellect, the act of understanding, and the things understood are altogether the same: how then do the Thomists, who admit that these three are altogether the same by their very nature and by the nature of the thing, nevertheless affirm that by the divine intellect itself they are distinguished?

Finally, against Henry and the Canarian we can argue thus: either God and the Blessed, by the same intellection by which they know the divine essence simply, distinguish several attributes in it, or by another [intellection]. By the same [intellection] they cannot, as they themselves admit: because, when the essence is apprehended simply, it is not distinguished into many [things]. But another clear cognition neither in God nor in the Blessed can we assign: because all the visions are of the same kind, since they are [of] God as he is: nor has anyone up to now posited several [kinds], especially in God: therefore they ought to say that always, and by whatever cognition, God is apprehended by themselves and by the Blessed with distinction, which they seem to deny.

Caput III - That by the divine intellect, or by the blessed [intellect], the attributes cannot be distinguished by respect to creatures, or to the intellect of one on the way

Up to this point it has been proved universally that the divine intellect, or the blessed [intellect] by the clear vision by which it sees the essence (essentia) of God, cannot distinguish several attributes in it: now, however, it remains to show that neither [intellect] can distinguish the attributes even by respect to various creatures, indeed not even by respect to the created intellect of one on the way.

For, without respect to creatures, Durandus said that the attributes cannot be distinguished by the divine intellect, although with that respect he seems to concede that they can be distinguished: but that this is false is clear from the things alleged from the natural [order]: both because, since the attributes of God are in reality absolute and are not referred to creatures, as was shown in disputation 104, cap. 6, the divine and blessed intellect, which sees them as they are in themselves, will not be able to know them by reference to creatures: for to conceive by relation those things which in reality are not referred [to something] is an imperfection; and this is done only by an intellect that does not understand the thing as it is, as will be proved below.

Further, even if the divine and blessed intellect could apprehend the attributes of God by reference to creatures; nonetheless it could not distinguish them by that respect: for a respect to diverse [things] can be a cause of distinction only when the thing is not known as it is, but by analogy to others: but whenever a thing is conceived as it is, and in itself is altogether undivided, it remains in the intellect in the same way, however much it be referred to diverse [things].

Moreover, that the divine intellect cannot distinguish the attributes by respect to our intellect distinguishing them seems more difficult. For if our intellect distinguishes them; and God rightly understands what, and in what manner, our intellect operates around the divine attributes; he will assuredly know that they are distinguished by it: therefore now even God himself, for this reason, will distinguish what he could not distinguish from himself alone. This is what Capreolus seems to have taught in the cited place, when he asserts that, although the divine attributes are not distinguished by God, nevertheless they are very well known by him as distinct through the intellect of the wayfarer.[131]

Yet, that we may prove that not even in this way are the attributes distinguished by the divine or blessed intellect, first it should be noted that from the fact that God knows certain things to be distinguished by our intellect, it does not follow that they also are distinguished by the divine intellect in any way: just as from the fact that God knows our intellect to discourse, it does not follow that God himself also discourses. For he knows perfectly well the discourse and the manner in which we discourse and advance from one thing to another in cognition, and yet he, while he knows these things, does not discourse, nor in his cognition proceed from one thing into another. In like manner he knows that we who are blessed understand spiritual things by material species and by a conversion to phantasm; he himself, however, in his own intellect cannot thus understand, nor form similar conceptions of things: for such an objective concept in our intellect depends upon the formal [concept] which we have, by which alone it can be represented: since such a formal concept does not befit God, he cannot have our objective concept present to himself: just as he does not have the concepts of hearing and of seeing in the mode in which we do, because he does not have vision or audition.

131. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, art. 3, in fine.

Next, it must be observed that, in order that certain things be distinguished by the intellect, it is necessary that they be set before it as distinct, and that such [distinct] elements be represented to it by its own thought: nor is it enough that it know that they can be distinguished by another intellect understanding in another way: just as, in order that someone understand a thing by discourse and in relation to another, it is necessary to gather one [thing] from another within his own cognition. Therefore, since God does not know in that imperfect manner, he cannot distinguish the attributes: although he very well knows that they are distinguished by our intellect knowing in its own imperfect way: because he himself nevertheless does not in that manner understand. Wherefore, although God sees his attributes distinguished by us and beholds our formal concept, yet never are the attributes in his own cognition set before him as they are represented to our intellect. He knows therefore that they can be distinguished by us in our imperfect way; but he knows this in his most simple and most perfect way: from which there results no distinction in the object: for in order that he distinguish them perfectly, they would have to be represented in his intellect just as in ours: which can in no way be.

Therefore Capreolus spoke very well in saying that the divine attributes are not distinguished by the intellect of God himself; yet are well known by God that, through the intellect of the wayfarer, they are distinct or can be distinguished: which two are diverse.[131]

Finally, the divine essence is now set before his intellect in no other way than it would be set before it if there were no rational creatures; nevertheless God understands himself and has himself present to himself, so that this does not depend on something extrinsic: but if there were no rational creatures who could distinguish the essence of God by intellect, God would not apprehend his attributes as distinct by an order to the created intellect; therefore neither in this way does he himself distinguish.

Caput IV - Corollaries of the foregoing doctrine

From what has been said it is gathered, first, that through the divine intellect, or through any knower who knows things as they are, by a proper and distinct concept there is not made a being of reason (ens rationis), nor a distinction. For since the being of reason which we attribute to things does not really belong to them, except only in our apprehension; and God, by his cognition, adds nothing to the things known, but altogether apprehends them as they are in themselves; it follows that, through the divine intellect, or a knower knowing a thing as it is, there cannot be made that one thing be referred to another which in reality is not referred.

131. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, art. 3, in fine.

But some say that God, by his concept, compares one thing with another, composing and dividing in a proposition, and compares even a chimera with those of which he denies it: therefore through the divine intellect there can be a comparing between objects, even if the formal concept (conceptus formalis) existing in the divine intellect be most simple; although at the same time they openly admit that through the divine intellect those things cannot be distinguished which by their very nature are indivisible. In my judgment their opinion manifestly conflicts with itself. For if an intellect, either the divine, or one cognizing a thing as it is, could distinguish things which in reality do not differ - because they are objected to it in no other way than as they are in themselves - by the same reasoning it could conceive, through the intellect, as related those things which in reality are not referred: which is proved by the same reason.

But what they assert, that God affirms or denies one of another by composition and division on the side of the objects and things, and not on the side of the formal concepts, is false. First, because without composition and multiplication of formal concepts, neither composition nor any distinction can be understood on the side of objective concepts (conceptus obiectivi). Wherefore when St. Thomas, below in question 58, article 4, teaches that angels do not understand things by composing and dividing, he speaks expressly of both concepts, namely formal and objective, as we shall show there.[132] Next, because if God understands things as they are, he cannot compare and compose with one another those which by their very nature do not mutually refer. But how God understands non-beings was said in disputation 61.

Moreover, certain more recent authors, halting on both sides and not plainly following one opinion or the other, teach that a being of reason and the object can indeed be conceived by God and be present to God, but are not made by God - lest they concede an absurdity, namely that the divine intellect should feign something for itself. And so they say that a being of reason is not made by the intellect, because it is not formed primarily by him, but by a created intellect: from which it follows that it is understood by God but is not made by God, because it is already made. But these philosophers trifle with words, that they may not seem to concede anything absurd about God: however they gloss it, they cannot deny that the divine intellect feigns something, and conceives otherwise than the thing is.

First, because if God retains in his mind that which is not, although not primarily, but because it was first made by a created intellect, he truly forms in his intellect a figment and a monster, and by the power of his intellect preserves that which was made and found by another. For the objective being which things have in the intellect of God they have as from an entire cause - from the divine intellect itself, to which they are objected - and the created intellect does not concur to that, insofar as it is in the divine intellect, as is manifest: but this is no less absurd than if that figment were formed primarily by the divine intellect and not on the occasion of any created intellect: for this is to know a thing imperfectly, and not as it is.

Add that, if God now knows a being of reason which has being from the human intellect, he also knows that being from eternity before a created intellect fashions it: therefore God from eternity has actually, objectively in his intellect something which has not yet been formed by a created intellect; and such objective being depends upon the divine and not upon the created intellect, and is not on the side of the thing, nor can there be on the side of the thing something real: therefore there is something of reason made by the divine intellect alone, the created intellect neither cooperating nor yet operating. Therefore the adversaries ought to confess that a being of reason can be feigned by God, if once they concede that it can be known by God. Nor does it stand in the way that such a being of reason is therefore known by God because it can be feigned by a created intellect in time, so that we might not say, when it is known by God from eternity, that it is formed by him alone: for since from eternity God alone, in his intellect, attributes to it objective being which is not yet attributed by a created intellect, God alone will be said to have feigned it as objectively existing from eternity.

You will object: God knows that which is only in the human intellect; but there there is something made. I answer: these two differ, namely, to know that something is in the human intellect - which indeed can be without an imperfect objective concept - and to know it in the mode in which it is in the human intellect, that is, to have the same thing objectively. For both discourse is known by God without objective discourse; and the concepts of spiritual things, which we have by means of the concepts of bodily things, are known by God without his having such concepts about spiritual things.

Then against the same we can argue in this way. For a being of reason to come to be and to be formed is nothing else than to be objected to the intellect, or to be understood, which is the same: but the divine intellect, according to their opinion, has that thing objectively present to itself: therefore it makes it, and forms it, although not primarily, but on the occasion of our intellect.

A second objection: God knows our formal concept; but the formal concept has a relation and respect to a being of reason: therefore he also knows and has present to himself objectively a being of reason. I answer: that God understands our formal concept, and its relation to the real extremes from which our intellect by conceiving forms the being of reason; and thus he understands by God some real being, from which the denomination is taken: but that our formal concept have a real respect to that figment objectively existing in our mind, and thus that it follow that it is known by God because he knows our formal concept - insofar as it has that present to itself, it ought to have in itself a formal concept, by whose power it is objected to us: but he cannot have that. For an objective concept according to objective being depends formally upon the formal concept, as presentative and representing others.

Secondly, it follows that, through an intellect that knows things as they are, the generic and specific notion, or the individual substantial one of a thing, cannot be distinguished; and therefore, that in such an intellect no thing is composite out of genus and difference and the substantial principle of individuation. For since these notions differ only through the intellect, and if on the side of things they are altogether the same, by no means will they be able to be distinguished through an intellect that knows them as they truly are; but it is manifest that only an imperfect knower distinguishes. For who would say that, in the thing itself which is indivisible, the notion of animal is one thing in the man and another in the ox? Therefore there is in a man and in an ox only a certain likeness which is found in each, from which an intellect that does not wholly understand each, as if conceiving by parts, abstracts the common notion in which they agree, and the proper in which they differ. Wherefore this composition of genus and difference is rightly called by the Thomists a composition of reason, that is, of the concept.

132. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 58, a. 4.

But you object the authority of Elias of Crete, in the oration on St. Gregory Nazianzen, on those words "Two are the supreme," where he asserts that nothing besides God is simple; he seems, however, to be speaking of the composition of genus and difference which he opposes to simplicity: which, if this composition were only of reason, would not be repugnant to simplicity: therefore he could not conclude that nothing besides God is simple. And indeed I noted above, in disputation 41, chapter 3, and it will be proved more fully in the following disputation, that this composition is in no way repugnant to God, because it would derogate from his simplicity. I answer that Elias is not speaking about composition out of genus and difference, nor does he oppose it to simplicity, but about a composition of essence and accidents, making up a singular and individual thing, by which he asserts that every created thing consists: and therefore he rightly asserts that only in God there is simplicity. For if he were speaking about the specific, generic, and individual notion, from this side no thing in the world would be composite by its own nature, but only by the intellect, and so from this side also everything besides God would be by its nature simple. The words of Elias are: "For this alone is properly simple (namely the essence of God), properly one, and unity, and, so to speak, solitariness: whatever things, however, come after are either double or composite, although they do not appear so at first by the intellect, and are essences constituted from many differences, which one discerns. For whatever has that which pertains at once to the proof of its existence is properly not simple"; by which he is not speaking about the composition of genus and difference, but about the composition of essence and individual difference; he even called the individual difference a "difference," whatever pertains to the demonstration of it.

Moreover, Nicetas concedes such composition even in spiritual things, namely out of essence and accidents, not indeed from extrinsic things, but from a special and singular mode, nor does he deny that there is essence and existence, as we shall prove in part 1, q. 4, art. 2. The third reason: the Blessed [Doctor], when he sees that in God the most simple essence is contained in persons, and one in essence, could in one name of most simple signify anything in God: and so, by the same name said of God, the Blessed [Fathers] would signify synonyms; but the manner, that is, that by one most simple name we might think we achieve God, is not granted; which they themselves saw and said; and it is to be said in our disputation following, chapter 4, that we cannot by a single name express in God individual things; in us, however, they are many in life, as we signify.

The arguments, indeed, of the earlier opinion alleged to us in chapter 1 are easily solved from what has been said. The first, indeed, is that which is to be proved: namely, that God sees and knows in himself many truths, and that he is just, merciful, that he has an intellect, will, and so forth. We say that God knows all these things which we state and, according to our measure, distinguish in God; yet he himself does not in this way distinguish them in his own most simple cognition; for although he most perfectly knows that we, in our imperfect mode, distinguish and proceed by learning, nevertheless he, while he thus knows, does not distinguish in his cognition, because in his intellect things are never presented to him as they are to our imperfect intellect.

Moreover, those accidental properties peculiar to a thing, which the holy Fathers are wont to put in the place of personality, pertain to its manifestation, as Athanasius in the book of Definitions, Basil in epistle 43, St. Gregory of Nyssa in the book On the Difference of Essence and Hypostasis at the very beginning, St. John Damascene in the First Book of the Institutions, chapter 1, and in his Dialectic, chapters 25 and 26, and likewise Nicetas in book 3 of the Thesaurus, chapters 20 and 34, teach; whose sentence is to be understood in such a way that accidents do not pertain to the substantial constitution of a person or individual, but to the showing-forth of it, as Basil plainly teaches there, and Nicetas insinuated in the cited words; and we will prove this more fully in part three, q. 4, a. 2.[133] Therefore that composition he conceded - namely, as it were, from essence and accidents - yet not from common and special, or singular, reason, nor from existence (esse) and essence, as we shall show in part three of St. Thomas, q. 17, a. 1.

Third, it follows that the blessed, when they see God as he is, by the most simple concept know him to be three in persons and one in essence; and, moreover, that by one most simple name they can mutually express to one another whatever is in God: and therefore all the names said of God are to the blessed (as they say) synonymous, as we noted in q. 13, a. 4. But the mode by which the blessed can signify to themselves the essence of God by one most simple name we are not able to conceive: because we do not attain to God himself in the way in which they see; whence it comes about, as we shall say below in the following disputation, chapter 2, that we cannot by one and the same name mutually signify, for ourselves who are wayfarers, the things which in God are undivided.

The arguments, indeed, of the earlier opinion alleged to us in chapter 1 are easily solved from what has been said. The first, indeed, is that which is to be proved: namely, that God sees and knows in himself many truths, and that he is just, merciful, that he has an intellect, will, and so forth. We say that God knows all these things which we state and, according to our measure, distinguish in God; yet he himself does not in this way distinguish them in his own most simple cognition; for although he most perfectly knows that we, in our imperfect mode, distinguish and proceed by learning, nevertheless he, while he thus knows, does not distinguish in his cognition, because in his intellect things are never presented to him as they are to our imperfect intellect. And the Canarian himself grants this; and since it has been shown above, and God understands himself as the thing itself is, nor is he in his thought otherwise set before or represented to himself, it follows that all those truths which we make to be many, and which in reality are one only, are known by God as one simple [truth]. The argument would indeed rightly prove that all these are known by God as distinct, if they were distinct among themselves from the nature of the thing, as Scotus asserts; but since they are not distinguished except by the intellect, how does the Canarian suppose that they are many truths in God and not one? Hence also it follows that God can by no means distinguish the attributes by a respect to his intellect and will: for intellect and will are no less the same in his nature than the other attributes.

133. Athanasius, Liber definitionum; St. Basil, Ep. 43; St. Gregory of Nyssa, De differentia essentiae et hypostasis, init.; St. John Damascene, Institutiones, lib. 1, cap. 1; Dialectica, cap. 25 - 26; Nicetas, Thesaurus, lib. 3, cap. 20, 34.

Reply to the second, of the same Canarian: I answer, there is indeed in God a real distinction of persons; yet this does not suffice for God, in his essence, to distinguish those things which are individuated from the nature of the thing. For he cannot effect even this: although there are many creatures, by an order to which we distinguish the attributes. But this does not come from a defect of power, but from the highest perfection of intellect. For we, because we cannot understand the thing as it is, apprehend it by parts and as if divided, and we speak of it, as is made manifest from what has been said in the whole disputation. Therefore we do not deny that God can distinguish the attributes in himself because they are in any way really distinct by an order to which God could distinguish them, but because he most perfectly understands himself as he is, and thus he can distinguish nothing in himself which is not distinct in reality. Wherefore Durandus is deceived when he says that God distinguishes the attributes in himself by referring them to creatures really distinct.[134]

The third argument, which was Henry's, proves only this: that there are indeed in God attributes without any respect to creatures; but that they can be distinguished by the divine intellect without respect to creatures, certainly it does not prove: because it is repugnant that, both with a respect and without it, the attributes be distinguished by the divine intellect; and if they could be distinguished by it, it would indeed prove against Durandus that, no comparison being made with creatures, they could be distinguished.

Reply to the fourth: Some answer that the distinction of persons is in a greater distinction than that of the attributes, in that part in which it is real, whereas that [of the attributes] is of reason; yet in another respect there is a greater distinction of attributes than of persons: because the latter is relative, but the former absolute; whereas the absolute simply excels the relative. But this solution does not please me: for when we speak of a distinction so as to say it is greater or lesser, one must attend not to the perfection of the things which are distinguished, but to the mode of distinction; wherefore, if relations are really distinguished, but the absolute only by the intellect, simply speaking the distinction of relations is to be called greater, although absolutes excel relatives. Durandus therefore answers that the proposition, where one can be greater one can be lesser, is to be understood of things which are of the same sort, and the lesser is included in the greater: as if someone can heat to eight, he will also be able to heat to four; but in things which are of a different sort it is not true; for one who can reason cannot fly. The same proposition is understood in the same way by the same Durandus in 3, d. 2, q. 1, num. 10, and by Marsilius in q. 3, art. 2, a little toward the end in the solution of the same second argument.[135] Thus, therefore, even the divine essence is a sufficient foundation of the real distinction of persons without order to creatures; and yet it is not sufficient that by the divine intellect itself the attributes be distinguished, although this is a lesser distinction, because it is of a different sort. And why it can be real, not of reason, is sufficiently manifest.

134. Durandus, various places; cf. his position that God distinguishes attributes in himself by reference to creatures.
135. Durandus, In III Sent., d. 2, q. 1, n. 10; Marsilius, q. 3, art. 2, in the solution of the second argument.

To the last, Durandus also replies that the distinction of persons does not arise from a distinction of principles, nor does it suppose it. For if the distinction of principles were supposed as prior, it would have to be from the nature of the thing, as we shall prove in disputation 149, c. 1. From the same principle, therefore, according to the thing, that is, the intellect and the will, two persons can arise really distinct, on account of the opposition which they have, as will be explained there. Which distinction of principles by a relation to the production of distinct persons would be unnecessary; for that could not be done by an intellect clearly seeing God as he is, as from what has been said is manifest.

Disputatio CXIX - Whether the divine attributes can be predicated mutually of themselves and of the essence

Caput I - The opinion of the Canarian

It remains that in this disputation we see how the attributes are predicated of the essence (essentia), and mutually of themselves, so that from this we may more fully understand what distinction of reason is to be posited between the attributes themselves and the essence. I pass over the opinion of Scotus discussed above in the places cited in disputation 116, chapter 3; since he thinks that the attributes are distinguished among themselves and from the essence from the nature of the thing, he asserts that they are not predicated mutually; rather, in the formal sense, the proposition in which we assert one of another is false. Now the controversy is only with those who teach that the attributes of God are distinguished among themselves and from the essence by reason alone: and the controversy concerns attributes signified not concretely (as they say), but abstractly. For it is certain that concretes are predicated of concretes, as God wise is just; but whether abstracts be said of abstracts, as wisdom of justice, is controverted. The Canarian, therefore, in disputation 2 on this article, in the last doubt, when he had taught that the attributes among themselves and from the essence are distinguished by the intellect, nevertheless affirms that they are predicated mutually of themselves and of the essence. He proves this first by the testimony of St. Augustine, On the Trinity 6, chapter 6, where he says: "The same is his greatness which is also wisdom; and the same goodness which is also wisdom and greatness; the same truth which is all those." The same he teaches in chapter 1 at the end; and in chapter 10 St. Anselm agrees in the Monologion, chapter 16, where he seems to admit only a difference of name between the attributes and the essence, but by no means a distinction of reason; and thus he plainly acknowledges one to be the other in these words: "Therefore the same is any one of those things which all together are, whether severally: so that when 'justice' is said, or 'essence', it signifies the same one thing as the others, whether all together or severally."

The Canarian confirms this by reason, first: If there were in God some attribute in which neither another attribute nor the divine essence were formally included, there would already be in God something which would not be God; wherefore God would be wise by a wisdom which would not be the essence of God: for every being is either from itself or from another; if from itself, it is deity; if from another, it is creature. Then, if the divine essence in its concept did not formally include wisdom nor the other attributes, it would not be infinitely perfect; therefore neither could it be apprehended as the divine essence: for the infinity of the essence is so intrinsic to the divine nature itself that without it it cannot be thought; just as neither can God without deity. The same seems to be said of the individual attributes: for since each is infinite, it ought in its formal notion to include every perfection, and hence every other attribute.

From what has been said the author here infers that the divine essence is included in the concept of any attribute whatsoever. The same he teaches of any attribute with respect to another, that one be included in another, and that it be (as they say) transcendent with respect to another, just as being is compared to all the categories. Wherefore, he says, one cannot define any single attribute unless all the others be included in your definition. Others use the example of being, which transcends all the categories, that thus they may show how the essence is included in any attribute whatsoever, and one attribute in another.

The opposite sentence is approved by me, namely, that the attributes are distinguished by reason among themselves and from the essence in such a way that one is not of the concept of another or of the essence, nor the essence of their concept: wherefore, if the formal sense be observed in propositions, neither is one formally predicated of another or of the essence, nor the essence of them. We speak, however, within the opinion of those who say that the attributes are distinguished by the intellect alone. This sentence was taught by Capreolus in 1, d. 8, q. 4, a. 3, in solution 11; by Aureolus against the first conclusion; indeed also by Gregory in 1, d. 8, q. 2, art. 2, when he teaches that the attributes are not distinguished by reason, that is, by connotations in God - which he calls attributal perfections - but that he distinguishes the attributes only by connotates; nevertheless he affirms that one is not formally predicated of another. Blessed Thomas also favors this, whom we shall cite below.[136]

It is proved first by this reason: If in the formal sense one attribute were predicated of the essence, or one of another, then any act of the attributes could also be predicated in the formal sense of any attribute: we would therefore say, the intellect wills, the will understands, justice has mercy, and mercy punishes; God, insofar as he is, acts. This is clearly shown by this syllogism: The divine intellect understands; the divine intellect is the will; therefore the will understands. Likewise, justice punishes; justice is mercy; therefore mercy punishes. The willing of God is his existence (esse); but God, insofar as he wills, acts; therefore insofar as he is, he acts; and in other cases in the same way. But this is absurd. Therefore one attribute of another, or of the essence, or conversely, cannot be predicated formally. For which cause St. Thomas below, q. 32, art. 2, ad 2, rightly denies this proposition: "Paternity begets" (although paternity is the same from the nature of the thing as father) on account of a different mode of signifying. But a different mode of signifying cannot be understood unless there be a different concept of the thing signified; for signification is to be measured from the concept which it generates. Therefore, to deny this proposition on account of a different mode of signifying is the same as to deny it on account of different concepts and a distinction of reason. And in art. 5 of the same question, to the third, he says that the notions of the same person, which are the same really and from the nature of the thing altogether prior to the intellect, are not predicated mutually of themselves on account of a different mode of signifying, because they are signified as different notions and perfections of the same person, such as paternity and spiration; and the same, under a different rational aspect.

136. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 4, a. 3, sol. 11; Peter Aureol, against concl. 1; Gregory of Rimini, In I Sent., d. 8, q. 2, a. 2; St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 32, a. 2, ad 2; q. 32, a. 5, ad 3.

The opposite view is proved in this way: namely, that the attributes are distinguished by reason (ratione), so that one is signified as a distinct notion and perfection of the same essence (essentia), and therefore they cannot be predicated of one another. The same is to be said of the essence and the attributes (attributa); for they are signified as different rationes.

Second, it is proved thus: words immediately signify things as they are in our concept, that is, as they are conceived by us. Therefore, since the same thing, although in itself individual by its nature, is distinct in our concept and is conceived in various ways, one concept is not another; therefore by the word itself one cannot be predicated of another.

Third, the Canarian says that this proposition cannot be granted: "The divine intellect, insofar as it is intellect, is will"; because the particle "insofar as" denotes the formal notion, and it is not true that the formal notion of the divine intellect is the formal notion of will. Therefore, without the particle "insofar as" - without which the proposition can be taken in the formal sense - it must be denied. For, if the sense be that the attributes, by their own nature, are altogether the same among themselves and with the essence, in no way ought it to be denied, as has been established against Scotus.

Fourth and finally, if the essence transcends all the attributes, and each attribute the others, then the distinction of reason is entirely removed and we confound all things into one concept. Yet, first of all, neither does the essence, with respect to the attributes, nor does one attribute, with respect to another, stand as something common transcending particulars; for the essence and each of the attributes convert reciprocally among themselves. How, then, can one transcend another, as being transcends the categories, with which it is not convertible? Moreover, being transcends them, not indeed according to the common concept, but according to several [modes], and by name alone is something common, as the more probable opinion holds, which we set forth briefly in Disputation 114, cap. 2. Therefore, in another way the essence is included in the attributes and the attributes in the essence than being is in the categories.

Some reply that indeed one attribute is included in another, and all in one and in the essence itself, and that the essence is included in the attributes, only confusedly, not distinctly and explicitly. But this solution has no weight: for here we are not treating of the thing itself as it exists outside our intellect; for thus it is manifest that the thing is so simple that it is not one thing and another in any way; wherefore neither is anything said to be included in another; but that in reality there is one most simple thing. We differ, therefore, about the divine essence and the attributes, as they exist in our thought: whether they are so diverse that the one is not included in the other, but is apprehended as diverse and not included in another. Wherefore, if, when we apprehend the mercy of God, since in our concept it is not expressly justice, it follows that in our concept mercy is not justice, although in reality justice is contained in mercy, or rather is the same; because what is not expressly present in our thought is not concluded in the thing thought, as it is conceived by us. Add that, when we expressly apprehend mercy and justice, intellect and will, we form utterly diverse concepts of them, of which one is in no way in the other: therefore they differ as notions, so that in our concept one attribute does not comprehend another. Moreover, an attribute does not differ from another, or from the essence, in terms of the explicit and implicit, in the way that a definition differs from the defined, as we shall say below in Disputation 121, cap. 2.

Note first, for the fuller explanation of this difficulty, that propositions in which either an attribute is predicated of the essence, or one attribute of another, are frequently to be conceded; because in the common mode of speaking they are taken in the sense which the logicians call "identic," not in the formal; and because almost always we wish rather to state what in God is in reality as it is by its own nature, than what is in our thought. Such are propositions with the substantive verb, in which one attribute is said to be another. Nevertheless, these propositions are sometimes taken in the formal sense, and then they must be denied, as has now been proved. There are also other propositions which cannot be taken in that identic sense, but always in the formal; and therefore they are either always to be denied or always to be conceded. Such are those with the adjective verb, in which the essential acts of the attributes are predicated of the attributes, or notional acts of the personal properties, as "the intellect understands" and "the will wills," "the essence is communicated," "relation is not communicated":[137] in these, therefore, it is not permitted to predicate attributes of one another, that is, to ascribe the act of one to another; but about these likewise we shall see in Disputation 136, cap. 3, and q. 39, art. 5, where we shall also see whether one property or notion is predicated of another, as paternity of spiration.

From what has been said the solution of the arguments for the first view is easily gathered. To the first I answer: in our concept wisdom is distinguished from the essence of God and from His substance; by our manner of understanding it is not apprehended as the Deity, but as something of the Deity. On that account, however, it is not apprehended as a creature, nor as from another, nor as from itself: because the intellect considers only one thing without considering another, that is, the formal notion of wisdom, for example, whether it be from itself or from another; and although it considers it as something of God and an affection of Him, it does not assert that thus it is by its own nature. For this reason the philosophers say: "In the case of those who abstract there is no falsehood" (Abstrahentium non est mendacium); that is, those who consider one thing without another, namely, without considering the other with which in reality it is conjoined, do not speak falsely; because they do not assert that in reality that is abstract which is abstract in consideration. Wisdom, therefore, by its very nature is the Deity; but it is conceived by us as an affection and as something of the Deity, which in reality is from itself, although, while it is considered as something of God, it is not apprehended as a being from itself nor as a being from another, because we think nothing of that sort about it. And although, when we distinguish the attributes from the essence, it is denied in a proposition, according to the formal sense, that one is predicated of another, and we say "the essence is not wisdom" and conversely; nevertheless we never assert that wisdom is from another or that it is a creature. For to this it would be necessary that it really be from another - as in the same way about relation we shall say below, Disputation 121, cap. 2, to the second argument.

137. "Essence is communicated, relation is not communicated": i.e., in the Trinity, the divine essence is communicated by generation and spiration, but the relations as such are incommunicable.

But someone may say: just as being per se and being in another are transcendent notions, one of which is included in any being, so also being from itself and being from another ought to be transcendent notions; and therefore to any attribute the one or the other of them ought to belong.

I reply: although in reality there cannot be a middle between being from itself and being from another, and thus in reality they are transcendents, nevertheless in our consideration there can be a middle; and thus they are not transcendental notions in our consideration. For a thing can be conceived neither under the one nor under the other notion. For the divine essence itself is conceived as an essence before it is understood to be infinite; for infinitude is an attribute which is formally posited in it, so that it is not from another, but from itself: but the essence of God can be understood without the attributes being expressly understood. And concerning the attribute of infinitude, this is proved: because, in order that a thing be conceived as infinite in the genus of being, it must be expressly conceived as not from another; yet between conceiving a thing as not from another, and conceiving it as from another, there is a middle; namely, to conceive it under another notion and predicate. For between contradictories there can be a middle in our thought, though not in reality. For example, between "to be white" and "not to be white" there is no middle; but between this, which is "to think of something as white," and "to think of it as not white," there is a middle: because it can be thought under other predicates, no mention at all being made of whiteness, neither affirmatively nor negatively. Similarly, we can say that "to be per se" and "to be in another" are transcendental notions, not in our consideration, but in reality, as "good" and "true": for it is not of the ratio of a transcendent that it also be transcendent in consideration; for any thing can be considered without that by which it is true or good, although those are transcendental notions; similarly it can be considered without that by which it is considered as per se or as in another. It is called "transcendent," not because our consideration always apprehends the thing under that notion, but because one can affirm of it such a notion. And thus it happens in the attributes: for although by our consideration they are not apprehended as "from itself" or "from another," we nevertheless say that in reality it is from itself and not from another.

Solution to the second argument. It is to be said to the other argument that the essence, insofar as it is considered as the substance of God and as the foundation of the attributes, does not include in our concept the attributes; nevertheless it is infinite even under this consideration, and perfect in the genus of substance. For substantial infinity is not "to have every perfection of the attributes," as we proved above in Disputation 25, cap. 1, but "not to have a cause of its existence (esse)." The essence, then, even without wisdom is in this way infinite: it is also perfect in the genus of substance and of existence, although it is not yet in the genus of operating and of the other attributes. And because we, according to our capacity, conceive God little by little, it is not surprising if, in our first concept, we understand Him as perfect as to substantial existence, and then as to operations and their faculties: because we can think of Him only by parts. And although the Scholastic Doctors variously explain the notion of the infinitude of the substance of God, as we reported in that disputation, yet no one - unless it be some recent professors of theology - has explained the infinitude of God in such a way that it is infinitude because it has the infinitudes or all the perfections of the attributes. In the same way we say about the attributes that each is apprehended by us as perfect and infinite, not in the genus of substance, but in its own genus: about which infinitude, as it agrees with each attribute, we spoke in Disputation 103, cap. 2. Wherefore it is not necessary that an attribute, in order to be infinite in its own genus, include within itself all [others].

Therefore I do not see how what the Canarian says can be true, namely, that if one attribute is to be perfectly defined, all the others must be included in its definition. If we speak of the definition which the intellect of wayfarers assigns, the contrary rather is the case - as is evident from this whole work of ours - when we dispute about individual attributes, we strive to distinguish the notion of one from another, so that we may be able to understand each perfectly. We grant indeed that, if the definition were by the intellect of the blessed who behold God as He is, there would be one definition only, by which the essence together with the attributes would be most simply comprehended. But the Canarian speaks about the definition of the attributes, insofar as they are defined by us wayfarers. Whether indeed, from the diversity of the attributes, there is in God any composition, we shall discuss in Disputation 121, cap. 3, where we shall also treat of relation (relatio) and essence, whether they compose and in some way constitute the person, or not.

Disputatio CXX - Whether the divine relations are distinguished from the essence in the nature of the thing

- The opinion of Gilbert. Caput I.
- What was done against Gilbert in the Council of Reims. Caput II.
- Whether what is the same differs from relation only by a difference in the nature of the thing; that in the persons there are three realities - the opinions of Scotus, the Nominalists, and Durandus. Caput III.
- That relation and essence are in no way distinguished by the nature of the thing, but only by our cogitation - proved by authority. Caput IV.
- The same opinion is confirmed by reason. Caput V.
- Solution of the arguments of Scotus and Durandus. Caput VI.

Caput I - The opinion of Gilbert

It must be treated below in Disputation 138, how the matter now proposed is to be settled; yet the solution of the difficulty at hand is not hard to gather from what has been set forth above. Therefore, after also reviewing the opinions of others, as is our custom we must examine them expressly; and for greater perspicuity, before all things the opinion of Gilbert must be set down, and it must be explained what was defined against him in the Council of Reims.

This Gilbert of Poitiers, author of the Six Principles in the Aristotelian logic, was bishop of Poitiers in the time of Pope Eugene III and of Emperor Conrad III. For in the Council of Reims his doctrine was condemned by Eugene III, and he himself was convicted of error by Bernard, as will appear below. Of Gilbert's error there is recollection among the Scholastics, Alexander and St. Bonaventure, cited by us above in Disputation 114, cap. 1; and St. Thomas, in this second article, thought that he had held the opinion that the relations are, as it were, fastened on from without, not inhering in the divine essence; but he taught nothing of the sort. Nor in truth did he assert anything amiss about the distinction of the attributes among themselves or from the essence, as we noted in Disputation 116, cap. 2. For although he said that God is not his wisdom, but is wise, nevertheless by the name of God he understood not the divine nature, but the person; and from the person, as he said, the essence differs, so also, he thought, the attributes differ; indeed, between the attributes and the essence he established no distinction by the nature of the thing.

For as Otto of Freising writes - an ancient bishop and author who flourished more than a hundred years after Bernard, during the interregnum in the year 1260, in the book De gestis Friderici Imperatoris I, of whom he himself was the nephew, chapters 16 and 57 - Gilbert used to say that the name "God" is sometimes put for the person, sometimes for the nature. When it is put for the nature, he conceded that God is his deity, his wisdom, etc. From which we gathered in that Disputation 116, cap. 2, that Gilbert established no distinction by the nature of the thing between the essence and the attributes. But when God is put for the divine person, he said that God is not his deity or his truth, unless at once one add by way of explanation, "that is, God, that is, true," and so of the others - an explanation of which Bernard makes mention in Sermon 80 on the Canticles, and he affirms that it was condemned as perverse and suspect by Eugene and by the fathers of the Council of Reims; whose acts we shall recite in the next chapter.

And since the same Gilbert used to say - as will be clear from what we shall report - that God is not his essence, but is by his essence, therefore this proposition, "God is the divine essence," he said must be conceded only if the divine essence were put in the ablative of instrument for forming (a case of expressing the manner of having), not in the nominative for naming; as if he were saying, God is not deity, but is God by deity; just as he is not eternity, but is eternal by eternity. Hence Bernard, in that Sermon 80, rehearsing the error of Gilbert and his disciples, says: "By the divinity (so they assert) God is, but the divinity is not God." Therefore, whenever Bernard proves against him that God is the very deity and wisdom and the other attributes, as in that sermon and in book 5 of De consideratione, he takes "God" for the person, not for the divine nature.

In the same manner the author of the commentary on the book of Boethius On the Trinity, among the works of Bede, tome 8, column 1113, when he mentions this Council and the error of Gilbert, says that Gilbert asserted "God is God by deity, or good by goodness," so that the construction would be transitive - a construction which seems to have place with a merely formal distinction by the nature of the thing. Now the construction is called intransitive, when there is no distinction; as when we say "filiation is the property of the person or of the related," that is, the property which is the relation itself. Nor did Gilbert grant only a transitive construction according to our way of conceiving, as we grant when we say that paternity is the property of the person - although the person is not distinguished from the person by the nature of the thing; rather, he conceded a transitive construction by the nature of the thing. But that the author of that commentary whom we alleged was not Bede is manifest also from this, that he makes mention of the Council of Reims against Gilbert, which was celebrated long after Bede, in the time of Bernard.

The reason of Gilbert is reported to us by Otto in these words, "Lest, namely, if he professed without determination that God is by divinity - that is, as if he posited the person - he would be forced, without determination, to concede whatever is said of any of the persons and of the essence; and thus he would fall into this absurdity: that just as he would concede simply that God is by his deity, that is, God is by truth, and similarly of the rest; so too, by the same indetermination, he would concede the divine essence to be incarnate and to have suffered; whence from this absurdity the heretical sense, near to Sabellius, would easily emerge; and the same thing would be said both to be begetting and begotten; the same would have begotten itself." But that he by "nature of the thing" did not understand a mathematical abstraction, but a theological consideration, he also seemed to intimate there, when he tried to prove alike "by reason and by the nature of the thing." For he did not mean that they are distinguished by our way of understanding; for the mathematician, by his consideration alone, separates from matter those things which truly are in matter; thus they are distinguished only by mathematical reason which are conceived as distinct by our intellect alone; but by theological reason he said those things differ which, according to true Theology, differ among themselves - that is, which true Theology asserts to differ. He understands, moreover, "by the nature of the thing," not by mere consideration; otherwise there would not be one thing to differ by mathematical reason and by the consideration of the Theologian. These are the things which of Gilbert's opinion I have been able to gather from the aforesaid doctor (Otto), in whose works I found mention of him, and perhaps nowhere else can it be found; for in Bernard there is nothing else except that he tries to establish that proposition which Gilbert denied.

Concerning this same error, with the author unnamed, St. Anselm also makes mention, in the book De Incarnatione Verbi, chapter 1, in these words: "When I was still in the monastery of Bec, there was broached by a certain cleric in France this assertion: If in God (said he) there are three persons, there is only one thing, and not three things, as if each were by itself separately, like three angels or three souls, and yet by power and will they are altogether the same: therefore the Father and the Holy Spirit were incarnate with the Son." Thus far Anselm. Yet there are some later Scholastics who have understood this error otherwise. Some think that this cleric asserted that there are three Gods of different natures, to defend that one without another was incarnate. Others think that he taught that three persons were incarnate, because they are one God, and for that reason one without another cannot be incarnate. But in truth the error of the aforesaid cleric was another, which afterward, in the time of Bernard, Gilbert followed. For in that assertion which we have reproduced, he used a reason to prove that the three persons are not one thing, as Gilbert contended - that is, that they are not the same as the essence, but are distinguished from it in some way in reality; so that the persons and the essence are not the same altogether according to the thing; lest we be forced to say either that there are three Gods (so that one without another could be incarnate), or, if they were the same as the essence and as power, that the divine nature itself - and whatever is the same with it, namely, each person - would be incarnate; which indeed was the very line of reasoning which Gilbert employed, as we have seen above. This very thing is gathered from the condition which Anselm recounts as the medium for the aforesaid error in these words: "For he (namely, that cleric) thus reasons with himself: If there is one and the same thing numerically which is God, and the very same is the Father and the Son: since the Son is incarnate, how is not the Father also incarnate? For of one and the same [thing] there is not at once a true affirmation and its negation." Which line of reasoning is altogether the same as Gilbert's, indeed even as Scotus's.

Nor does it stand in the way that that cleric said that to call two persons two "things" is to call them two things differing in a common notion, as two angels are, so that the absurdity would not follow - as though he had thought they must also differ in nature; to which absurdity Anselm contends that this very position leads. For since Anselm himself, in that same chapter, speaking about the middle, says that perhaps that cleric really did not posit the likeness of three angels, but that the monks who wrote to Anselm had added it from themselves; I think that the cleric did not wish to assert three Gods, but denied the distinction by the nature of the thing between essence and person. Thus, as it seemed to him, Gilbert too felt, so that the person might be sufficient for sustaining that difficulty, namely, how the person is incarnate and suffers, while the essence is not, and is not another than the person, but the very same one essence. I confess that Anselm never attacked Gilbert himself in this sense under the name of that cleric; for Gilbert's error is touched upon only in the letters of the monks, as he himself there says, and it is not plainly intelligible from that alone. Yet I am persuaded that the same error which the said cleric had, Gilbert himself had a few years later in the time of Bernard in France, and that he taught it publicly with the same line of reasoning and aim, namely, that the three persons are not the very same common thing, so that thus one person would be incarnate without another; which indeed seemed to be sufficiently defended, if one posited not three divine natures, but one common to the three, yet really distinct from them. Therefore the cleric was not forced to assert three Gods, but only a distinction between essence and persons.

Caput II - What was done against Gilbert in the Council of Reims

A council was convoked against Gilbert, the reigning Pontiff Eugene III being present, and many Cardinals and bishops, and Blessed Bernard the Abbot. Otto, in the place alleged above, narrates it thus. The same Council is also commemorated as celebrated in the time of Bernard in Sermon 80 on the Canticles. And as far as to a certain point some acts were recited there against Gilbert; what things Gilbert asserted is reported according to a certain codex which I found in a certain little library of the aforesaid Council in Gaul, and Gregory XIII, by James Amiot, bishop of Auxerre, from which, when I was at Rome in the year 1590, I obtained transcribed all the acts against Gilbert from the Lord Antonio Aquinas, a man not only illustrious but also in every kind of virtue and of letters most accomplished and of oratory; although since they were not had in the Vatican codex of that Council, nothing great is to be made of them. What was the cause why in the Vatican they are not had, it is not ours now to say.

First, therefore, these propositions were there alleged and assertions of Gilbert, which were written in the same codex:

- That of the divine nature, which is called deity, God is not, but [it is] the form by which God is; just as humanity is not man, but [is] the form by which he is man.
- That when the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are said to be one, they are understood to be one only by one deity, nor can it be converted so that one God, or one substance, or one thing, are said to be the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit.
- That the three persons, by three unities, are three, and by three distinct properties - which are not the persons themselves - are three eternal things, and, both from one another and from the divine substance, numerically different.[138]

Nor does it stand in the way that that clerk said that two persons ought to be two realities altogether diverse, as two angels are, lest that absurdity should follow; as if he had thought that they ought also to be diverse in nature, to which absurdity St. Anselm contends he himself is driving him. For, since St. Anselm himself says a little later that perhaps that clerk in truth did not posit the likeness of three angels, but that the monks who wrote to Anselm reported him thus; I think that clerk did not wish to assert three Gods, but to establish a distinction from the nature of the thing (ex natura rei) between essence (essentia) and person (persona). For thus it seemed to him, as also to Gilbert, that that difficulty was sufficiently removed, why one person was incarnate and not another, if they were not the same as the one essence; which indeed seemed to be sufficiently defended, if we posited not three divine natures, but one common to the three, yet really distinct from them. Therefore that clerk was not compelled to assert three Gods, but only a distinction between essence and persons.

138. Alexander of Hales; St. Bonaventure; cited above, Disp. 114, cap. 1. - St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 39, a. 1 - 2. - Otto of Freising, Gesta Friderici imperatoris I, lib. 1, cc. 16, 57. - Bernard, Sermones super Cantica canticorum, sermo 80; idem, De consideratione, lib. 5. - Commentator in Boethius, De Trinitate, apud Bedae opera, tom. 8, col. 1113. - St. Anselm, De Incarnatione Verbi, cap. 1 - 3.

Next Anselm relates that that clerk, upon retractation, called his opinion in the Council of Reims, under Archbishop Renaud; but this Council was in the time of Anselm, earlier indeed than the other Council of Reims under Eugenius III in the time of Bernard; just as Anselm himself is also earlier than Bernard. We were constrained to hold a Council against Gilbert in the presence of Pope Eugenius III and the Cardinals, and many other bishops, and the blessed Bernard abbot was there, as Otto relates in the place cited. The same Council, held in the same place, is mentioned also by Bernard himself in Sermon 80 on the Canticles a little from the end. And its acts against Gilbert, it pleased me here to report verbatim, from a certain manuscript codex of that Council sent from Gaul to Gregory XIII, by Jacques Amyot, bishop of Auxerre, from which, while I was in Rome in the year 1590, I obtained all the things transcribed against Gilbert from the Lord Antonio Aquinate, a man not only illustrious by birth, but also most adorned by every kind of virtues and letters; which, although they are not had in the Vatican codex of the same Council, nevertheless entire credence is to be given to them. Why indeed they are not had in the Vatican we shall say below.

First, therefore, these were the dogmas and assertions of Gilbert which were written in the same codex.

- That the divine nature, which is called "divinity," is not God, but a form, by which God is: just as humanity is not man, but the form by which he is man.
- That when the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are said to be one, they are understood to be one only by one divinity; nor can it be converted, that one God, or one substance, or one thing, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are said to be.
- That the three persons by three unities are three, and the distinct properties to the three - which are not the persons themselves - are three eternal things, and numerically different from one another and from the divine substance.
- That the divine nature is not incarnate.

Then there follows in the same Council:

In the year of the Lord 1148 this symbol was established under Pope Eugenius III in the Council of Reims by the Fathers of the provinces:

We hold and confess that the simple nature of the divinity is God, nor can it in any Catholic sense be denied that the divinity is God, and God divinity. But wherever the Wisdom of the Lord says that the Lord is wise by wisdom, great by greatness, God by divinity, and other things of this sort, we believe that it is only by that wisdom which is God himself that he is wise; only by that greatness which is God himself that he is great; only by that eternity which is God himself that he is eternal; only by that unity which is he himself that he is one; only by that divinity that he is God, which is he himself; that is, by himself wise, great, eternal, one God.

When we speak of the three persons, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, we confess them to be one God, one divine substance: and conversely, when we speak of one God, one divine substance, we confess that this one God, one divine substance, is three persons.

We believe and confess that only God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are eternal, and that there are not at all any things - whether they be called relations (relationes), or properties, or singularities, or unities, or other things of this sort - present to God which are from eternity and are not God.

We believe and confess that the divinity itself, whether you call it the divine substance or the divine nature, is incarnate, but in the Son.

Thus far in that codex of the Council of Reims was written against Gilbert's propositions.

Moreover Otto writes in that chapter 57 that Bernard privately met with the bishops of the provinces and issued canons against Gilbert, which in my judgment are contained in the aforesaid symbol; and therefore in the title it is said to be composed by the Fathers of the provinces, that is, by the bishops. This the Cardinals who were then with Eugenius at Reims took ill; because, without consulting them, Bernard with the bishops had dared to define anything against Gilbert. He himself, however, with his wonted modesty excused himself and the bishops before the Pontiff and the Cardinals, that they had done that, not in order that, without the consent of the Cardinals and the Pontiff, they might define something and decide by a final judgment; but because Gilbert had asked of them that Bernard himself, together with what he had disputed, and the other Gallic bishops might explain their faith. Nevertheless Eugenius decreed that that symbol and the canons should not be held as a rule of faith. But, with the last three set aside, the first - on which the whole controversy turned - Eugenius with the Cardinals and the whole Council defined against Gilbert in this way, as Otto writes in that chapter 57: that no distinction should be made between nature (natura) and person; and that God should not be said to be "by the divine essence" only in the sense of the ablative, but also nominatively; that is, not only should it be said, "the Father, by deity, is God," but, "he is Deity itself." Where plainly Gilbert's unusual exposition is condemned: "The Father is wisdom, that is, wise"; because he did not wish to concede that predication in the case of naming, so as to show that God is wise by his wisdom, but is not wisdom itself.[139]

Then Otto subjoins: Whence even now it is held by the more approved hearers of the same bishop (namely, of Gilbert), that reason there should not distinguish in understanding, but in speaking. And this perhaps was the cause why in the Vatican codex there were only the canons which pertain to morals, but nothing truly against Gilbert's doctrine; because the Pontiff did not wish that whole symbol to be held as a rule of faith; while that proposition which he defined, those who wrote the Vatican codex did not bother to set down, because that was not the principal cause of calling the Council; and there with Gilbert all matters had been well composed, since he himself retracted his view in the Council.

From all these things it is rightly gathered what was defined against Gilbert, namely, that the distinction between the divine nature and the persons is not from the nature of the thing (ex natura rei), but only a mathematical consideration and a definition of reason, as we said above; whether, however, it has force against Scotus's view we shall say in chapter 4. Furthermore, one thing is to be observed concerning the words of Otto which we have just reported; when he says that among Gilbert's disciples the more approved later held in common the opinion that reason should not distinguish between person and divine nature in understanding, but that in speaking it does. This is not to be taken as if Otto judged that Gilbert's disciples had followed a better opinion, and said that between person and nature there is only a difference of names, and none at all, not even in the understanding before the thing is considered; which the Nominalists afterwards asserted about the attributes and the essence, as was said above in Disputation 117, chapter 1; but only that they said there is no distinction in the thing itself before the understanding, which true theological reason finds and affirms to be there; but that distinction to be a mathematical cogitation only, as we were saying above in chapter 1; on account of which they said that it is only "in speaking," which does not touch the thing as it is in itself. Yet because names are for expressing the thing as it is in the mind and concept, it is altogether the same to distinguish there a relation in speaking as to apprehend as distinct the concepts which we name as distinct.

139. Otto of Freising, De gestis Friderici, cap. 57; cf. the account of the Reims Council under Eugenius III.

Caput III - Whether what is the same differs from relation only by a difference in the nature of the thing, and whether in the persons there are three realities

Among our Scholastics there were not lacking those who would say that between essence and relation (relatio), and hence between essence and person, there is a distinction from the nature of the thing and prior to the intellect. Chief among these was Scotus in 1 Sentences, dist. 4, q. 4, in the Order.[140] But to this view - whose mind we have expressly explained in Disputation 116, chapter 4, concerning the distinction of the attributes among themselves and from the essence, which we showed even from his own sentence to be a distinction from the nature of the thing before the intellect - he proves by the same reasoning which we reported above in the first chapter of this disputation as urged by Gilbert and which is Theological reason, as we were saying above; namely, because it is impossible that there be two things altogether the same according to the thing, and that one be communicated according to the thing and the other not be communicated according to the thing. But the essence is communicated according to the thing to the Son and to the Holy Spirit, either by generation or by spiration; relation, however, is not communicated: therefore they cannot be altogether the same according to the thing.

Those who agree are Gabriel in 1, dist. 29, a. 3 and 4, and art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius in 1, q. 6, art. 2, concl. 4, and in the same; and Ockham. These differ only from Scotus, because he judged the same formal distinction (distinctio formalis) to obtain also between the attributes themselves and from the essence, and among the attributes themselves; these, however, only between the divine nature and the relations or persons.[141] Besides, he thought that this distinction exists not only in God but also in created things; these, however, concede it only in God by this special reason: for whenever something is the same with two things really distinct, it must necessarily be distinguished from each of those formally from the nature of the thing; because it is not the same with each; but in God thus do essence and relations stand: therefore they are distinguished 140. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 4, q. 4 (in the Ordinatio).

141. Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 29, a. 3 - 4; art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 6, a. 2, concl. 4; William of Ockham, loc. cit.

formally from the nature of the thing. And Gabriel, Ockham, and Marsilius think this kind of distinction so difficult that the very mystery of the Trinity, and in no other thing in the world, can it be found.

This reasoning also, if it be rightly considered, seems the same as the reasoning of Scotus and Gilbert; for the major proposition cannot be proved otherwise than in the manner in which Scotus and Gilbert use it, namely, that contradictory predicates are said of those things in the thing itself.

Finally, together with the aforesaid concurs Durandus in 1, dist. 33, q. 1, except that the distinction between essence and relations he says to be not only from the nature of the thing, but also not to be a middle between real and of reason: he therefore calls it real, not of any sort, but such as is between a thing and a mode of the thing. First, indeed, he proves that there is no middle distinction between real and of reason by the argument which we reported above from the same in Disputation 116, chapter 4, at the end. Second, that that distinction is not real in the way that is between thing and thing, he infers thus: otherwise it would follow that relations in God are something created, or that there are many Gods. Third, he confirms that the aforesaid distinction is before the intellect by the same reasoning which Scotus and the Nominalists used: because, namely, the divine essence formally and from the nature of the thing is in one in whom there is not the relation: for it is essence in the Father, in whom there is not filiation; and it is in the Son in whom there is not paternity; and it is also in the Holy Spirit, in whom there is not paternity and filiation: therefore it is distinguished from each really, that is, from the nature of the thing, which with him is the same.

Relation and essence in no way to differ from the nature of the thing, but only by our cogitation, is proved by authority.

Caput IV - That relation and essence differ in no way from the nature of the thing, but by our cogitation only

I for my part judge the same about the relations and the essence as I judge about the attributes themselves and the divine essence: namely, that in no way, or in the least kind, is there a distinction from the nature of the thing prior to the intellect, but that they are distinguished by our cogitation alone. This sentence was handed down by St. Thomas, Cajetan, and more recent theologians in this article 2; by Henry in Quodlibet 5, q. 6; by St. Bonaventure in 1, dist. 33, art. 2, q. 1; by Richard, a. 2, q. 1; by Gregory, q. 1, 2, 2; by Capreolus, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 1, 2, 3, and 4; and by Cano on this article, disputation 3, part 2.[142]

In confirmation of this very position two things must be shown: one is, that relation and essence in God are not distinguished by the nature of the thing (ex natura rei), but by our thought; the other is, in what manner they are distinguished by the operation of our intellect. The former will be established in this chapter; the latter will be demonstrated in the following disputation. Whether the opinion of Scotus and of others has any probability, let judgment be given; in this chapter we shall put forward only what will seem to confirm our position and to refute Scotus.

142. St. Thomas, this article 2; Cajetan, ad loc.; Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 6; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 33, a. 2, q. 1; Richard of St. Victor, a. 2, q. 1; Gregory of Rimini, q. 1, 2, 2; Capreolus, In I Sent., q. 1, a. 1, concl. 1 - 4; Melchior Cano, in hunc art., disp. 3, p. 2.

First, then, against Scotus stand all the testimonies alleged by us in general in Disputation 116, cap. 4, by which it is proved that in God nothing is distinguished by the nature of the thing except the persons among themselves. This Bernard also makes plain when he teaches the same thing about the attributes, and especially about relation and essence, on account of the supreme simplicity of God, which it is not necessary here to rehearse.

Now, with respect to relation and essence it is proved, first, by the authority of St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa 1, cap. 11, where he says thus: For each of them (namely, of the persons) has no less with respect to the others what it has with respect to itself; that is, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are wholly one and the same, except that the Father is not begotten, the Son is begotten, the Spirit proceeded; but what in it (namely, in the essence) is said, is distinguished by thought alone. When he says, "distinguished by thought alone," he plainly excludes every other distinction by the nature of the thing; and when he says, "in it, that is, in the essence," he does not only assert that the attributes previously enumerated are not distinct from it, but moreover that the common essence, power, goodness, and the other things enumerated there are so the same in the three persons that they do not differ from them save by our thought alone. He also calls the properties "modes of existing of the nature." Therefore, if they differ by the nature of the thing from the essence (as some pretend), the difference will not be as between thing and thing, but as between a thing and a mode of a thing.

And this genus of distinction he explains thus: although every mode of a thing, prior to any intellect, has a different essence and nature from the very thing of which it is the mode; nevertheless its essence is this, that it be of another - not as an accident, to wit, a quality or quantity or other complete accidental form; for such forms have an absolute nature altogether, and in no way depend upon a subject: that is, their entire nature can be and remain intact without depending upon that of which they are the subject, as we see in the accidents of the altar. But if now the other accidents in act depend upon a subject and are of another, this is not of their essence, but only accompanies it; whereas a mode of a thing depends upon that of which it is the mode in such a way that its essence and nature directly connote that very thing; and therefore, without the thing of which it is the mode, it can neither actually be nor be understood. Such is the contact of two bodies, which without the bodies can neither be nor be understood; for that is not a thing nor any existing reality, but a mode of existing of bodies. So also is the mode which separated accidents have from a subject, by which they are also said to be per se.

Relation and essence in no way differ by the nature of the thing, but only by the thought of our intellect: this is proved by authority; and whether the opinion of Scotus has anything of probability, let others judge; we will propose only those points which will seem to confirm our opinion and refute Scotus.

On the same subject

Whether relation and essence are distinct in God

Second, it is confirmed from the Council of Florence, session 18, a little past the middle, in the disputation between John and Mark; where John, speaking from the Latin Church, says as follows: Divine substance and persons are indeed the same, and seem to differ according only to the mode of our understanding. To which position Mark, on behalf of the Greek Church, consented throughout the whole council. Likewise Andrew, archbishop of Colossae, in the same council, session 17, wishing to reconcile the disputation of the same John and Mark, thus spoke: It greatly matters (implicitly to profess the divine substance, or the substance of the Father and of the Son); but we must by no means think that they truly differ, since they are said to differ only by reason or understanding, etc. Therefore, if the essence of the Father or the essence of the Son differs by reason alone from the essence taken absolutely above; it follows that relation also differs by reason alone from the essence simply taken; otherwise, the essence of the Father, which adds relation, would not differ by reason alone from the essence simply.

And the principal point is this, that in the same council, in the last session, in a certain confession of faith sent by the Latins to the Greeks, it is said thus: Moreover, lest we seem to hold the identity and conjunction of the divine substance to be divided, and to believe that the substance itself differs from the hypostases and persons by anything other than reason alone, etc.; where the council and the whole Latin party judge it an inconvenience to suppose a distinction between person and essence greater than that of reason and intellect.

Third, it is gathered still more strongly against Scotus from the celebrated definition of the Council of Reims, which we related out of Otto; first, because, as Eugenius defined, reason ought not to distinguish between relations and essence; it follows that formally they are not distinguished by the nature of the thing. For when Eugenius defined that reason should not distinguish, he understood, according to Gilbert's phrase, as we set forth in cap. 2, not a mathematical reason and consideration, but a theological one, which is from the nature of the thing and prior to our consideration.[143] Second, because if, as Bernard grants, that mode of speaking of Gilbert is correct - "deitas, that is, Deus; bonitas, that is, bonus" - then, since Gilbert thought it necessary to add those explanations in order that the proposition might be true, that is, "Deus, id est bonus," that distinction also would be displeasing to him which Scotus posits between person and the divine essence. For from Scotus's position in like manner it follows that the same explanation must be added, that is, "Deus," in order that the proposition, "the Father is Deity," be formally true. For according to Scotus the Father by the nature of the thing is rather "God" than "deity": and since he differs from deity by the nature of the thing and formally, that proposition without the explanation is not true in the formal sense and by the nature of the thing. Third, if Gilberti's more approved disciples, after the council's definition, said that between relation (or person) and essence there is no distinction in understanding, but in naming, as we explained in cap. 2; it follows that it is known only according to our mode, which uses various names, and not according to a theological consideration which tends to the thing itself as it is in itself, that any distinction could be found there.

143. Otto of Freising, De gestis Friderici, cap. 57; cf. the account of the Reims Council under Eugenius III.

Moreover, against Durandus's opinion can be alleged the decree of the Lateran Council under Innocent, which is reported in cap. Damnamus de summa Trinitate et fide catholica: for in that chapter is contained the opinion of Joachim, abbot of Fiore, who imputed to the Master of the Sentences an error, because he had asserted that in God there was a quaternity - namely, three persons really distinct from one essence; and from this Joachim inferred that, since the Master said that in the divinity the Father generates but the essence does not generate; the Son is generated but the essence is not generated; for if the essence neither generates nor is generated, and the Father generates and the Son is generated, and the divine essence is a certain thing, it follows that it is a certain thing which is neither Father nor Son; therefore there will be a quaternity. Joachim himself, to avoid this absurdity, fell into another no less one: for he said that in God there are three persons not by unity of essence, but by a collective unity, by which he seemed to assert three Gods; and both of them are there condemned, both what he asserted and what he imputed to the Master; and the Master is vindicated from this charge. But Scotus and Durandus, and those who assert that relations are distinguished by the nature of the thing from the essence, even though they add that they do not differ as thing and thing, but as two formal rationes (as Scotus says), or as a thing and a mode of a thing (as Durandus says), cannot deny plurality and number between relation and person by the nature of the thing, since they establish a distinction. But if a real plurality is conceded, we fall into some quaternity of the essence - namely, of the three persons and of the essence - just as Bernard, book 5 of De consideratione, a little before the middle, infers against Gilbert. For after he had adduced the testimony of Boethius, in the book On the Trinity, "That truly one in which there is no number," which we explained above, Disputation 116, cap. 4, he proves that in God there is number only of persons, not of nature; and he subjoins thereafter: Or if one should try either to divide the persons from the substance, or the properties from the persons, I do not know how he could profess himself a servant of the Trinity, who would have proceeded into so great a multitude of things. Therefore, if Scotus, Durandus, and others distinguish properties from the nature by the nature of the thing, it follows that they introduce more than a ternary of persons and truly concede a quaternity by the nature of the thing.

You will say: Bernard condemned only that multiplicity beyond the ternary of persons, if it were of things; but the aforesaid doctors do not say there are four things, but four formal rationes (as Scotus says), or three real modes and one thing (as Durandus speaks). But certainly Bernard would have cared not at all whether number were introduced in this way or that, provided it were number in the thing itself prior to intellect, and not solely in name or in intellect: but if there were more rationes by the nature of the thing, there would be a true number beyond the ternary of persons. And Bernard himself strove so much to defend the unity of God in the essence and the Trinity only in the persons without a quaternity, that much later in the same book, when he had said that God is length, breadth, height, and depth - whereby he seemed to introduce the very quaternity which he had previously attacked - he excused what he had said, not indeed by saying that those were four formal rationes and not four things, but by these words: "Different voices, many ways; but through them one and the same is signified." Of which testimony we said many things that serve our present purpose, in Disputation 118, cap. 2, and earlier in the same book 5 against Gilbert, where he thus says: "Quaternity sets a boundary to the world, not a sign of deity. God is Trinity: God is of the three single persons; if it pleases to add a fourth by divinity, in the meantime I, persuaded that this by which God is not God, am not to be adored." Gilbert was saying that God, taken for the person, is not his deity; therefore it is gathered that a quaternity is introduced, in which that deity, which is not God, as Bernard says, is not to be adored, because God is not it. But Gilbert introduced a quaternity in such a way that the theological reason would in no way distinguish there, as we related above out of Otto.[143] Wherefore, whoever would concede any distinction by the nature of the thing, even if he called it of "thing and mode" or of "formal rationes," would introduce that quaternity which Bernard impugns in Gilbert, since in some way a theological reason would be distinguishing there.

The same opinion is confirmed by reason.

Caput V - Further rational confirmation; refutation of Scotus and Durandus

Finally, by the same reasons can the position of Scotus and of Durandus be impugned, by which above, Disputation 116, cap. 4, we refuted Scotus's opinion about a distinction of the attributes by the nature of the thing; which it will be enough to recall under the main heads.

- First reason is that of Bernard, sermon 80 on the Canticles, which he used against Gilbert: because if God is not his essence and wisdom, it follows either that that [essence or wisdom] is a creature, or that there are several Gods, etc.
- Second reason: because Scotus's opinion plainly derogates from the simplicity and the greatest unity of God, since between essence and relation some number comes in. From which it also follows that some composition is made. What Scotus answers about the attributes, we have already seen in that cap. 4 and impugned; and the same he answers about relations and essence; therefore in the same way his reply ought to be refuted.

Now then, what does Durandus say, who in a peculiar way defends this distinction, for he does not concede any composition between relation and essence, even if they are distinguished by the nature of the thing? He answers: no composition is made from relation and essence, because a mode does not compose with the thing of which it is the mode; but relation is a mode of the essence: and the things which compose something must be things and differ from each other as things; because that which composes with another ought to have an essence of its own entirely diverse from that with which it composes; but a mode, although it differ from the thing of which it is, nevertheless does not have an essence of its own, because its whole nature is to be of another.

143. Otto of Freising, De gestis Friderici, cap. 57; cf. the account of the Reims Council under Eugenius III.

However, this reply is frivolous: for Durandus assumes what he ought to have proved, and infers that a mode, which really differs from the thing of which it is the mode, therefore does not compose with it, because it does not have an essence to itself - precisely the point that needed proof - and he concludes that it does not compose with that other because it has no essence of its own, since its whole nature is to be of another.

He says that it has an essence to, not of, itself; just as this is gratuitously asserted, so also it is rejected without any reason. But we can still press Durandus in this way: If truly a mode really differs from the thing of which it is, and has a nature and formal notion (ratio formalis) diverse from it, then already there is some number there; and consequently a plurality or duplicity: and this we rightly call composition, which is opposed to unity and simplicity, as is manifest. But to the unity and simplicity of God any such multitude or duplicity derogates, as is clear from disputation 116, cap. 4.

Finally, against Scotus, who thinks that this distinction is a mean between the real and the distinction of reason, we can employ Durandus's argument, which we adduced in that cap. 4; yet it proves nothing against Durandus, since he plainly teaches that between essence (essentia) and relation (relatio) there is a real distinction.

1. Solution of the arguments of Scotus and Durandus.

The principal reason on which the opinion of Scotus and of others rests (and which, as we noted in caps. 1 and 3 of this disputation, Gilbert also used) is taken from the various and contrary predications that are made about essence and about relation: for example, that essence is communicated in the thing itself, but relation is not communicated, etc. To these Cajetan replies (below, q. 30, art. 1)[144] that the divine essence is not only communicable, nor only incommunicable, but contains eminently, without any composition, both under the same adequate notion by reason of its infinity. Whence, says he, one may understand essence and relation, not as two formal objects by nature, but as one formally and many in power; as if he said that the divine essence and relation are not by nature mutually actually distinct, but are so disposed that by the intellect they can actually be distinguished.

But this solution of Cajetan does not satisfy the argument, because it does not render the reason why, when so diverse and contrary predicates are affirmed of essence and of relation, with that addition "by nature of the thing" (ex natura rei), nevertheless they are not actually distinct but only virtually. For how can it be that in a most simple reality we find something that is communicated, not by an operation of the intellect, but by the thing itself; and something that, in the same way, namely by the thing itself, is not communicated?

Others reply that of the same thing two contradictories, namely "to be communicated" and "not to be communicated," are not truly enunciated: because the affirmative proposition is true - namely, the thing which is essence is communicated; and the negative is false - namely, "the thing which is essence is not communicated": for that negation denotes that that thing is in no way communicated, namely neither insofar as it is essence nor insofar as it is relation, since negation universally denies all. But in this way the argument is not dissolved. For it does not assume that proposition, "Of the same thing contradictories cannot be enunciated"; rather the argument proceeds thus: It is impossible that any two, of which contradictories are enunciated with that addition "according to the thing" (secundum rem), be really the same. But such are enunciated of essence and relation, namely "to be communicated according to the thing" and "not to be communicated according to the thing": therefore they cannot be the same according to the thing.

144. Cajetan, below, q. 30, art. 1.

Next, the Canariensis responds, disput. 3 in this article, part 3,[145] that a mere distinction of reason between essence and relation suffices for contradictories to be truly enunciated of them, whether that distinction has actually been made by the intellect or can only be made. I, indeed, with that author judge that a mere distinction of reason suffices for things so diverse - nay, even for contradictories - to be predicated of essence and relation, not only simply, but also with that addition "by nature of the thing," by which Scotus and the authors of the prior opinion press us much; yet he himself did not explain this sufficiently. Before we explain it, it must be premised that we never enunciate contradictories of essence and relation with the mere distinction of reason which can be made between them as opposites, but with the distinction actually applied. For since we use various names of essence and of relation, and names in us answer to concepts, we cannot but conceive as distinct what we also name as distinct: for thus do we conceive our concepts first as they are in us, and thus do we deliver them to other wayfarers to be understood. For the same reason we said in disput. 115, cap. c, that there is in things no extrinsic denomination actually, unless a prior operation of the intellect conceiving a relation in it has been posited, as is signified by the very name. Wherefore the Canariensis ought not to have asserted that, by a mere distinction of reason which can exist, even if it has not actually been made, contradictories can actually be enunciated of those things.

This being supposed, that a mere distinction of reason suffices for contradictories to be predicated by us of the same most simple thing, I show thus. Since the things themselves cannot be signified by us and by other wayfarers except by names also imposed by us, and the names about God are therefore diverse because we have diverse concepts about God and are not able to understand him otherwise, it follows that however much we add that "by nature of the thing," when we affirm "to be communicated" or "not to be communicated" and the like, there is always included in our predications some distinction and order of reason, on account of which, about the same thing which is by nature of the thing altogether individual, yet distinct by us through the intellect and through diverse names, we not only can but even ought to affirm one and deny the other.

But if we were to name and understand God as he is, if by one most simple concept we were to see whatever is in him, so too by one word or name we would express to others the blessed, in which there would be no contradictory terms. What sort of expression that would be, we cannot now explain further: it is enough to know that in it there would not be various enunciations in the way now spoken of. Therefore, from the diverse - nay, contrary - predicates which are said of the same most simple thing, namely of God, no distinction by nature of the thing can be gathered. For by nature of the thing, in all predications, however much the particle "by nature of the thing" or "really" be added, there is an order to the various concepts which we have of the same most simple thing, about which we do not enunciate the same. But when the aforesaid particles are added, we wish to signify nothing else than that what is in reality is to be enunciated and conceived insofar as it can be explained by us according to our measure, lest something absurd follow. Wherefore in that way the distinction of reason, which all those propositions necessarily include in themselves, is not taken away.

145. Canariensis, disput. 3, in this article, part 3.

This doctrine can be gathered from Capreolus in 1. 4. 2. 9. 3. art. 3, ad 1, where he teaches that contradictories are never predicated of God unless by the operation of our intellect, which makes the predications - a point he himself pursues at length.[146]

From this same doctrine not only can the reasons of Gabriel, Durandus, and Gilbert be dissolved - which all are drawn from the various predications that we enunciate about essence and relations - but also responses can be made to the testimonies of St. Augustine which Scotus adduces for himself: such as that in De Trinitate VII, cap. 2, "Since both the Word is wisdom, but not conversely the word what wisdom is; for 'word' is understood relatively, 'wisdom' essentially": let us take that to be said, "the word," as if it were said, "born wisdom"; and in the same book, cap. 4, where he says, "It is one thing for God to be, another to be Father" - in which fashion St. Anselm also speaks in the book De processione Spiritus sancti, cap. 2. We say, then, that Augustine and Anselm wished to assign a distinction of reason between those, so as to show that they are signified in another way.[147] Finally, what Durandus adduces from St. John Damascene favors his opinion not at all: for we maintain that relation is a mode of existing, not a new existence, as we said in disput. 126; yet for that reason Damascene does not think that it is a mode of the essence really diverse from it: for although it does not differ from it by nature of the thing, nevertheless it can be conceived not as a thing, but as a mode of the essence. It remained here to dispute whether relation and essence can in God differ through the created intellect of the wayfarer only, or also through the divine intellect and of the Blessed who see God; but about this controversy the very same must be asserted as we said about the attributes in disput. 118.

An relation so differ from the essence of God that it nevertheless includes it in its concept.

What Henry and the Canariensis think; the chapters.

The divine essence and relation so differ by reason that the concept of essence is not included in the concept of relation - the truer opinion maintains this (cap. 2). The arguments of the prior opinion are dissolved (cap. 3). The concept of relation does not pertain to the concept of essence (cap. 4). Essence is distinguished from relation and from the attributes more than relation from the person (cap. 5).

146. Capreolus, in 1. 4. 2. 9. 3. art. 3, ad 1.

147. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, cap. 2 and cap. 4; St. Anselm, De processione Spiritus sancti, cap. 2; St. John Damascene (as cited by Durandus).

What Henry and the Canariensis think

Having set aside the opinion of Scotus and of others who affirm that relations are distinguished from essence by nature of the thing - and who consequently ought to assert that essence is not included formally in the concept of relation - our controversy will be only with those who teach that they are distinguished merely by the intellect, namely whether they are thus distinguished that nevertheless relation includes essence in its concept: for that some things can be distinguished by the intellect, there is no doubt. Henry therefore, Quodlibet 5, q. 6, asserts that relation differs from essence in such a way as to include essence essentially in its very concept.[148] To explain this, he notes that a thing can be distinguished in two ways by reason: in one way according to "intention" (so he speaks), when evidently the one does not include the other, as genus and difference, of which one is outside the notion and concept of the other; in another way, when the concept of the one includes the concept of the other, but adds something peculiar, as species and genus: therefore, in this latter way, he says, relation and essence in God differ by reason alone.

The same opinion was followed by the Canariensis in this article, disput. 3: he affirms that the concept of essence is thus intrinsically included in the concept of paternity as "being" (ens) is in the concept of any predicament, which above the common notion of being adds a particular one by which it is distinguished from the others; so that in that very particular the notion of being is also contained. And this is proved first by Henry's reason: No relation refers something to another except by reason of something absolute, by reason of which the relation inheres in the subject, so that relation adds no reality above that absolute; but the divine relation refers one person to another: therefore by reason of some absolute, from which it has its notion, it inheres; but there is nothing absolute in God besides essence: therefore relation includes that in its concept.

Then it is proved thus: Since the divine relation is a certain being, and every being is rightly divided by this, that it is to be "from itself" or "from another," it follows that, according to its formal notion, it must be from itself or from another. If it were understood to be from another, it would be a creature, which is absurd; but if it were understood to be from itself, it would be deity, whose proper notion is to have no cause: therefore there would be a twofold divinity, unless relation in its proper concept were to include the very nature of the one divinity. We adduced this same reason in disputation 119, cap. 1, for the opinion of that same Canariensis, who teaches that the divine essence pertains to the formal concept of any attribute.

Finally, unless the divine essence were included in the concept of relation, it would follow that a divine person is composite, at least by the intellect: but any composition is repugnant to the divine simplicity. Therefore it is necessary that the divine essence be formally included in the concept of relation: for thus it will not compose with it even in our intellect, just as neither does "being" compose with the particular notions of the predicaments, because in all it is necessarily included. But if the essence were not contained in relation, not only would they be two distinct things, but also, because the one would not be included in the other, it would necessarily compose with it some third thing.

148. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 6.

That the divine essence and relation so differ by reason that the concept of essence is not included in the concept of relation

I for my part do not doubt that the divine relation is distinguished from the essence by our reason in such a way that the concept of essence is in no way included in the concept of relation; but relation is apprehended by us as some mode or affection supervening upon the essence. Wherefore I judge precisely the same about this proposition, "Paternity is the essence," as I said about that, "Intellect is will," in disputation 119, cap. 2 - namely that in the formal sense it is false and is to be conceded only in the (so they say) identical sense. This opinion must be proved almost in the same way as that about the attributes. First of all, the divine essence cannot be compared with relation as the notion of being is with a particular notion. For, as we said in disputation 114, cap. 2, the notion of being is not one common to all particular beings: for then it would be universal and univocal; but only the word is common, proximate to signifying the ten particular notions of the predicaments: substance indeed simply, but others with an addition - because they are not simply beings, but beings-of-being, as the Philosopher teaches in Metaphysics VII, cap. 1, and IX, cap. 1, and likewise in Metaphysics IV, cap. 2, that "being" is said in the same way of all beings...[149]

Disputatio CXXI - On whether the divine essence is formally included in the concept of relation

On the concept of relation in God

Whether the divine essence is included in the concept of relation

Caput I - The position of Henry of Ghent and of the Canarian, with their reasons

It is objected: Henry notes that things can be distinguished in two ways, so that one may prove that relation includes essence in its concept. For it is not doubtful that some things can be distinguished by the intellect. Henry, therefore, in Quodlibet 5, q. 6, asserts that relation differs from essence in such a way that it includes essence essentially in its own concept.[150] In developing this claim he notes that things can be distinguished in a twofold manner: one way, according to reason (as he himself speaks), when, although the one does not include the other, nevertheless genus and difference are thus distinguished, of which the one is of the ratio and concept of the other; the other way, when the concept of the one includes the concept of the other, but adds something beyond, as species adds beyond genus. In this latter way, he says, relation and essence in God differ only by reason.

149. Aristotle, Metaphysics VII, cap. 1; IX, cap. 1; and IV, cap. 2.
150. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 6.

The same view is followed by the Canarian in this article, disputation 3, who asserts that the concept of essence is intrinsically included in the concept of paternity, just as "being" includes in a common way the notions of any predicament, and then adds the particular note by which a thing is primarily distinguished from other things of the same genus; so that even the ratio of "being" contains what is common, and with it adds the particular by which it is distinguished from others.[151]

It is proved first by Henry's reason: relation refers something to something else, not by the notion of something absolute on account of which it is a subject, in such wise that relation has no reality over and above that absolute. But in God, relation refers one person to another: therefore, by the notion of something absolute to which it has the reference; and there is nothing absolute in God besides essence: therefore relation includes essence in its concept.

Second reason: since relation is a certain being, and every being is rightly said on account of this, that it has existence from itself or from another, it follows that formally, according to its ratio, it must be either from itself or from another. If it were understood to be from another, it would have a cause, which is absurd; if it were understood to be from itself, it would be deity, whose proper note is to have no cause: there would thus be a duplicity of divinity, unless relation in its own concept included the very nature of the one divinity. We set out this same reasoning above in Disputation 119, cap. 1, on the authority of the same Canarian, who teaches that the divine essence pertains to the formal concept of any attribute whatever.[152]

Finally, unless the divine essence were included in the concept of relation, it would follow that the divine person is composite, at least in our intellect; and every composition clashes with divine simplicity: therefore the divine essence must of necessity be formally included in the concept of relation: thus, with that [essence] it would not compose even in our intellect; in the same way as "being" with the particular notions of the predicaments, because in all of them it is necessarily included. But if essence were not contained in relation, not only would they be two distinct [concepts]; indeed also, since the one would not be included in the other, together with them some third common [thing] would of necessity be posited, by which they would be composed.

Caput II - The truer opinion

I for my part do not doubt that the divine relation is distinguished from essence by our reason in such a way that the concept of essence is in no way included in the concept of relation; but relation is apprehended by us as some mode or affection supervening upon the essence. Wherefore I hold exactly the same regarding this proposition, "Paternity is essence," as I said about that proposition, "Intellect is will," in Disputation 119, cap. 2: namely, that in the formal sense it is false, and only in the sense (as they say) of identity is it to be conceded.

This position must be proved almost in the same manner as that concerning the attributes. And first of all, the divine essence cannot be compared with relation as the ratio of being (ens) with a particular ratio. For, as we said in Disputation 114, cap. 2, the ratio of being is not one common to all particular beings, universal and univocal; only the word is common, proximate to signifying the ten particular notions of the predicaments: substance indeed simply, but others with an addition - because they are not simply beings, but beings-of-being - as the Philosopher teaches, Metaphysics VII, cap. 1, and IX, cap. 1, and in like manner IV, cap. 2, that "being" is said in the same way of all beings, as "healthy" is said of all the healthy.[153] Moreover, he also numbers among beings privation: yet who would say there is one common ratio for all healthy [things], and for being and privation? Wherefore "being - substance" signifies nothing more expressly than "substance": but if the ratio of being were a common [ratio] abstracted from many, without doubt there would remain the particular notions of beings, in which the ratio of being would not be included, just as there remain in animals the particular notions, when the common ratio of animal is abstracted. For if no particular ratio remained apart from being, in what way could something be abstracted from inferiors? For this is the very reason why something is abstracted, because something inferior remains, as difference apart from that common ratio. For just as in real abstraction the one is taken apart from the other so that the one remain without the other; so also in abstraction by reason the one must remain without the other. If, therefore, the ratio of being were thus distinguished from the particular ratios, as animal from rational, so as not to be included in their concept, it would follow that we should not say "animal" is abstracted from man and horse; because in them it always remains, even by reason; but [it is abstracted] from something of man and horse, namely from their differences: so that, by abstraction being dissolved, horse and man are dissolved. And whenever there is abstraction of one common [ratio] from many particulars, in this manner it ought to be done. Wherefore, since no common ratio of being or of accident can be abstracted which does not remain in the intrinsic modes of inferiors, it follows that analogical names do not signify one common concept, but are analogates proximate to themselves, as Cajetan has excellently taught in the third tome of the Opuscula, treatise 5.[154] Therefore the divine essence cannot be compared with relations as a ratio analogically signified with particulars, because it is truly one in many, not indeed common by one ratio and concept, as animal is, but one thing in reality; yet it is impossible to conceive the same common essence to three, without at the same time conceiving in each of the particulars a certain ratio which, in its own concept, does not include essence; just as we cannot think a common ratio of genus without at once understanding the particular specific ratios by which it is common, in whose concept [the genus] is not included, as differences. Therefore essence does not stand to relations as being stands to particular beings.

151. Canariensis (Franciscus de Sylvestris), Disputation 3 on this article.

Second reason: Paternity - and any relation whatever - is conceived by us as something supervening upon the deity: therefore it is not understood as formally including it in its concept: for in that case it would not be said, nor would it be understood, as an accidence supervening [to it], but as taking it to itself indivisibly.

Third reason: Relation is conceived as adventitious to the essence, so as to determine it; and it is impossible for relation to be understood after the manner of what determines essence, if it includes it in its concept; for that which determines is not contained in the concept of the thing determined, as by induction is evident in created things: and since the divine relation is apprehended by us after the manner of other forms which in created things determine that which is common, it comes about that it ought to be conceived as outside that which is determined by it. But this is essence: therefore relation does not embrace essence in its own concept. The adversaries bring forward the example of being and of the intrinsic modes by which it is determined, in which nevertheless it is essentially included. But, as I noted above, this example is futile, because "being" does not signify a common ratio which is determined by particulars, but only a common name: in the present case, however, the essence is truly common, and relations are particulars by which, in our way of understanding, it is determined.

152. Canariensis, as cited above; cf. Disputatio 119, cap. 1.
153. Aristotle, Metaphysics VII, cap. 1; IX, cap. 1; and IV, cap. 2.

Fourth reason: If essence were formally included in the concept of relation, this proposition would be formally true, "Paternity is essence," or "is divinity," just as that, "Substance is being," as the adversaries concede: it would rightly follow, therefore: "God understands by paternity," and the like in this mode; "The Father understands essence: paternity is essence: therefore the Father understands by paternity." Then, further: "The Father is wise by that by which he understands; but he understands by paternity: therefore he is wise by paternity." We should say the same of the Word, namely, that it is wisdom by that by which it is Word, which is contrary to the doctrine of St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, cap. 2.[155] Moreover, if essence is of the concept of relation, the attributes will be too: wherefore in the same way this proposition will be formally true, "Paternity is intellect," just as that, "Paternity is essence"; whence altogether it would follow. Nor does it matter that "essence" is a common term and cannot be a middle term in an expository syllogism; for in truth the syllogism just set out is not expository, nor is the term "essence" taken as altogether singular, but as common; and as if it were distributed in the major proposition, so that the sense be: "Essence is in any person, and in whatever mode it is had, it understands"; then in the minor it is taken particularly, and thus the syllogistic form is preserved, which cannot be denied.

Fifth reason: If relation formally includes essence, it would follow that the person is not constituted by relation; since person is nothing other than essence determined and contracted by relation. But that very thing would be relation, if indeed it included essence; yet person is not constituted by person: therefore neither by relation. And thus the Father, who is a person, would not be constituted by paternity - unless we were to say that something is signified by the name "Father," and is included in its concept, which is not included in "paternity."

The adversaries reply: Some nevertheless answer that Father and paternity do not on that account differ, because something is contained in the concept of the one which is not included in the concept of the other; but because they are signified in a different mode by the concrete and the abstract name. On account of this diversity of signifying, "Father" and "paternity" are not synonyms. The different mode of signifying consists in this: first, that by the concrete name "Father" paternity is signified, not as any [form whatever], but with the formal effect of making to subsist incommunicably; which is not signified by the abstract name "paternity." Then also, because by the concrete name the essence with relations is more expressly signified than by the abstract name: therefore, just as "definition" and "definitum" are not synonyms, because the name of definition signifies more distinctly than the name of the definitum; so likewise "Father" and "paternity" will not be synonyms, if indeed by the concrete name the essence is signified more distinctly.

154. Cajetan, Opuscula, tome 3, treatise 5.
155. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, cap. 2.

This reply is rejected as trifling: But it is not difficult to shut off these evasions. First indeed, if paternity directly and essentially contains essence in its own concept, it cannot fail to include also the addition of the peculiar mode of subsisting incommunicably; because paternity itself is the ratio of the person, and the property by which one subsists incommunicably and is ultimately terminated: therefore, the essence thus completed and, as it were, defined is understood as already subsisting incommunicably; wherefore, by both the abstract and the concrete name, the relation itself will be conceived, and the property with the formal effect of subsisting incommunicably. Then again, even though by the concrete name the same thing is more distinctly signified than by the abstract name, just as by the definition the same thing is more expressed than by the name of the definitum; nevertheless, if in no other way "Father" and "paternity" differed - although they would not be synonyms, as in truth "definition" and "definitum" are not - still no one could say that the father is constituted by paternity, just as neither is a definition said to be constituted by the definitum, nor conversely. One must therefore assign in our concept a greater distinction; which can in no way be done unless we say that in the concept of paternity the concept of essence is not contained.

Moreover, as we were saying above, in Disputation 119, cap. 2, about the attributes, so too one must philosophize about relation and person: namely, that relation signifies the same confusedly as the definition does, but person distinctly as the definitum does: it follows that when we apprehend the person, whose concept is more distinct, we apprehend relation and essence as two distinct [things], and each [is] of the ratio of person. From this it follows that we conceive relation distinctly as one part of person, and essence as another: therefore relation and person, by our reason, differ more than definition and definitum; nor is essence included in the concept of relation, if the same relation together with essence are apprehended as two [things] for the constitution of the person. If therefore both are conceived distinctly - and person and relation are also diverse in our concept - and person includes essence, which relation does not include: let us conclude, therefore, that in the concept of the divine relation the essence of God is not comprehended, even if relation, besides the reference "to," were also to have the reference "in." For that "in" is not something absolute, as essence is, as we shall say in solving the arguments.

Caput III - The arguments of the prior opinion are dissolved

Reply to the first argument of Henry: I answer that relation primarily needs a subject, as we see in creatures; in God, however, it is conceived after the manner of something inhering; and thus to each relation in its way there belongs the ratio "in," and the ratio "to," that is, either really or in our mode of conceiving. But that ratio "in" is not absolute, as Henry falsely supposes, but is abstracted from the absolute and from the respective - if the opinion is true which affirms that there is a concept common to all the predicaments; or, what can more truly be put, there is the same foundation of reason on account of which the word is predicated analogically of the nine predicaments: and by this account, in the first intention, the common reasons of the predicaments are signified, as we said in Disputation 114, cap. 2. Thus the cause is distinct, and the reason "to," without doubt, is not to be thought of as absolute. Therefore, although relation is conceived by our intellect as inhering in the essence, and is said to have a subject; still, when it is understood as inhering, it cannot on that account include in its own concept the concept of the essence, as was proved above: nor does it follow that the ratio "in" of the divine relation is the essence itself; but it is a ratio, in our way of conceiving, which can stand with the divine essence, and yet the concept of relation does not include the concept of the divine essence, but rather, besides the divine relation, something else also can be formed in our thought, as we shall say when we treat of the remaining attributes.

To the second reason, some intended to prove in that way that in the concept of the attributes the essence of God is comprehended, as we saw in Disputation 119, cap. 1; and to that indeed we have already responded, as also in Disputation 73, cap. 3: neither is relation conceived by us as being from itself, nor as from another, nor as a thing caused; nor do we reduce deity to the mode either of something caused or of something causing; but we say that it subsists of itself, and itself is God; and it is not thought by us as "from" or "of" another, nor as if God, by the reason of deity, were distinguished from the essence. And if anyone should formally, in speaking thus, not perceive what is said, let him not imagine that we say that God himself is a thing caused; nor that we posit in him deity as something non-existent or as affirmed; nor let him think we can posit in God himself anything caused, unless we consider it after the manner of our understanding; which we do not affirm sufficiently, nor think rightly enough, unless we say that, if it should be granted that it is the essence itself, it is so by reason alone; as is clear in the proposition that signifies.

To the third argument, that a person would of necessity be composite, we say: the divine person is indeed composite, not by nature, but by intellect: for also in the intellect of one who constructs, the constitution is composite, not the thing itself; nor does anything derogate from its simplicity. In the same way is repudiated the composition of the divine simplicity by the notion of constitution, by which is repugnant multitude and distinction: for with the very account of unity and simplicity that excludes distinction and multitude by the account we have already cited from St. Thomas.[156] And therefore, because what is named composite does not on that account denote something opposed to simplicity; rather we say, by intellect, that nothing derogates from simplicity, when we speak of constitution now by human mode; since by usage we understand separately; and by will we signify; and we call absolute what we say from the intellect; therefore we are accustomed to speak after this manner: that man is constituted by reason; just as a human being is constituted by memory, intellect, and will, not in real states, but by rational positions. Further, whether constitution in divinis is real, or of reason, we will discuss in Disputation 158. Moreover, when we attribute constitution to God, we do not intend to signify an opposition to simplicity; for we do not call constitution that which is opposed to simplicity; but we name by reason that there is no composition of the kind in God; nor do we will that it be called absolute.

156. St. Thomas, e.g., Summa theologiae I, q. 3, a. 4; q. 11, a. 3.

There are, however, some who deny that in God there is composition of reason, so that our reason cannot in any way apprehend a multiplicity of rationes; for they say that reason divides, and separates, which taken together composes. But nevertheless, since from all compositions of reason there ought to be some real composition; yet there is no composition, they contend, in God, by any intrinsic mode; we, however, attribute to God, not composition, but multiplicity of intelligible notions in our thought itself: for the Holy Spirit is called sevenfold; and similar things Capreolus concedes.[157] Which, however, truly -

Refutation. But indeed the things adduced to prove that in God there is not even a composition of reason are of no moment. For although our reason, distinguishing in God the attributes, or the relation, from the essence, seems to divide and to separate them; yet because it conceives them as united in the same subject, it does not so distinguish as not to compose: for it thus distinguishes relation from essence, that nonetheless from each it constitutes the person. Next, it is false that every composition of genus and difference, or composition of reason, has its origin from some real composition, just as it is false that genus is taken from matter and difference from form, or from other things distinct, as we shall say below in disputation 180: wherefore on this score a composition of genus and difference, which is solely by reason, would not have repugned to God; by what other account it does repugn, we said above in disputation 22. But how Anselm neither denies in God a distinction of reason nor a composition by our intellect, we noted above disputation 116, chapter 4.

Caput IV - That the concept of relation does not pertain to the concept of essence

It is assured with all the more certainty that the concept of relations does not pertain to the concept of essence (essentia), than that essence is not of the concept of relations: which is gathered not obscurely from St. Augustine in many places; but especially in On the Trinity VII, chapter 2, where he says that the Word is not the Word by that by which it is wisdom: because the Word is understood relatively, but wisdom essentially; and in chapter 4, when he says, it is one thing for God to be, another for him to be Father; and from Anselm, On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, chapter 2, who uses the same manner of speaking.[158] For if the relation of the Word does not pertain to wisdom, then neither does a personal relation, such as is the relation of the Word, pertain to essence. But if the relation of the begotten, or of the Word, were included in the notion of wisdom and essence, there would be no need, as Augustine says, to say "begotten wisdom" to signify the Word; therefore Augustine judges that that word "begotten" must be added, so that wisdom may signify the person (persona) of the Word: because without it the name "wisdom," and any other essential name, does not express the relation whereby the person is constituted, since that is not of the concept of essence.

157. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 3, art. 3, ad 2.
158. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, cc. 2, 4; Anselm, De processione Spiritus Sancti, c. 2.

The same is proved by reason. First, because essence, and whatever pertains to it, is common to the three persons, as is determined in the chapter Firmiter, and in the chapter Damnamus de summa Trinitate et fide Catholica;[159] but relations cannot be common to the three persons: therefore they cannot be of the essence. Next, this syllogism is sound: deity is relation; deity is common; therefore relation is common. Nor does it hinder that the middle be a common term, because in a true proposition it is universally so in its own way: for if relation be of the concept of essence, it ought to agree with deity in the whole of its community; and so the formal syllogism will be good. Moreover, since, from the doctrine of Augustine, De Trinitate VII, chapter 2, and of the Council of Toledo XI, in its profession of faith, deity is to itself and not to another, it will not be able in its concept to include personal relation: for thus it would be to another, as the Father is.[160]

But although these things are so, relations nevertheless are not to be called accidental to the essence itself, or to be predicated of it per accidens; but truly to be enunciated per se in the concrete: in which manner this proposition, "God is Father," is a per se proposition. Furthermore, how it may be lawful to add to it the particle "insofar as," which is the note of per se-ness, we shall say at q. 39, art. 6; now, however, let this suffice. Finally, although relation is of the intrinsic and formal concept of person, we say that it is not of the essence of person: for of the essence of person is not said whatever pertains to its formal notion, but what is of the concept of the nature which the person has: for a person is constituted by two things, namely, by essence or nature, and by personality, of which each is said to belong to the formal notion of that; but only the former is called its nature and essence.

Caput V - That essence is more distinct from relation (and from the attributes) than relation from person

Since thus far we have said that there is only a distinction between relation and essence; between essence and the attributes; and between the attributes themselves, and that the same distinction is between relation and person, as between paternity and father, and universally between abstracts and concretes, which no one denies; it remains that we explain which of these differ more among themselves: this, however, we inquire about in the school of the Thomists, who concede no other distinction between these than by the intellect (intellectus). For Scotus and others, who admit a distinction from the nature of the thing, equally distinguish all things which differ in this way. But all the Thomists grant that relation differs more by the intellect from essence, essence from the attributes, and the attributes among themselves, than relation differs from person, as paternity from father: yet they do not agree upon this view by the same account. Canariensis, in this article, disputation 3, part 2, after the third conclusion, in order to assign the reason of this, notes two things. One is, that the very same thing absolutely from the nature of the thing, indeed the same according to definition, can be distinguished by our intellect, just as Peter is distinguished from himself, inasmuch as the same thing is predicated of himself, and is put in a proposition as subject and as predicate in the manner of other things which differ more among themselves, and one is predicated of the other. In this way he thinks the abstract and the concrete differ, as humanity and man, not indeed by definition, but by the sole operation of the intellect: because, since it is the same thing from its nature, and the same definition is that of each, the intellect conceives one as in a supposit, the other as abstracted from it. Then Canariensis notes that some things are distinguished by the intellect in a twofold way: some, with some foundation existing in the thing itself; and this distinction (says he) is by diverse cognitions of the same thing, which indeed are so in being as the cognitions are in signifying. But the other distinction is made when no foundation exists in the thing itself, but only in the intellect, and it is by diverse cognitions of a thing which is not so in being as the cognitions are in signifying.[161]

159. Cap. Firmiter; and cap. Damnamus de summa Trinitate et fide Catholica.
160. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 2; Council of Toledo XI, profession of faith.

He proves, therefore, that relation differs less from person than the rest which we said differ among themselves: because relation differs from person in that latter mode, without any foundation in the thing itself; but the rest differ in the former mode, with a foundation existing in the thing, in that the rest differ by definition: whereas relation and person do not differ by definition, because the definition is the same for each; but by a different mode of signifying, and therefore by our mode alone of conceiving.

For my part, although I judge that relation is less distant from person than the others which we enumerated as mutually different; nevertheless I think there is another account of that lesser difference. For that division of distinction has always displeased me, as I noted in disputation 117, last chapter: first, because, as I proved there, every distinction of reason has a foundation in the things, and in our mode of conceiving in the things, not because in the very thing which we distinguish by the intellect there precedes some multitude or distinction, but because whatever things we distinguish, we distinguish by an ordination to some diverse things: for Peter is not distinguished from himself even by reason, but the same name, or even the same concept, is repeated wholly the same, which is not properly to be distinguished, even by the intellect, as was noted there.

Second, it is false what Canariensis says about a distinction of reason which has a foundation in the thing. For cognitions of a thing which bring about a distinction of reason are so diverse in the intellect that in the thing itself there is no diversity: wherefore the intellect does not bear itself in understanding as the thing itself does in being. For if the things which are distinct in the intellect were thus in themselves as they are in the intellect, their distinction would be from the nature of the thing, and would not depend on the intellect: therefore Canariensis has ill defined a distinction of reason which has a foundation in the thing.

Third, the aforesaid doctrine concerning a distinction having a foundation, and concerning that which has not, he does not rightly apply to the present difficulty. For if we have regard to that which is in very reality in God, essence does not differ more from relation, and essence from the attributes, than the abstract from the concrete: for all these things in very reality are individual and without any distinction, as remains proved: therefore there is not a distinction which has a foundation in the thing among these rather than among those, but the account of each pair will be equal.

I confess, therefore, that between relation and person, the concrete and the abstract, there is in God a lesser distinction of reason than between essence and relation, essence and the attributes. For the explication of which it is to be noted, as we began to say in disputation 119, chapter 2, that although every distinction has a foundation in our mode of understanding, and in the things, after the manner of which we conceive distinctly, not however in the very thing which we distinguish; nonetheless one distinction of reason can be greater than another, and sometimes of such a nature as to prevent one being predicated of the other: for some things differ after the mode of diverse forms, of which one is not included in the other, as the common in the particular; and this is a distinction which cannot be greater, and it is between the attributes themselves ...

Omnes autem Thomistae, qui non aliam distinctionem inter haec concedunt quam per intellectum, fatentur, magis differre per intellectum relationem a persona (ut paternitas a patre), essentiam ab attributis, et attributa inter se, quam differat relatio a persona; sed in hanc suam sententiam non eadem ratione conveniunt. Canariensis, in hunc articulum, disputatione 3, parte 2, post tertiam conclusionem, ut huius rationem assignet, notat duo: alterum est, eandem rem omnino ex natura rei, imo eandem secundum definitionem, posse distingui per nostrum intellectum, sicut Petrus distinguitur a se ipso, quatenus idem de se ipso praedicatur, et ponitur in propositione ut subiectum et ut praedicatum, instar aliorum, quae inter se magis differunt, et unum de alio praedicatur. Hoc modo putat differre abstractum et concretum, ut humanitatem et hominem, non quidem definitione, sed sola operatione intellectus: quia, cum sit eadem res ex natura sua, et eadem definitio utriusque, intellectus alterum concipit ut in supposito, alterum ut abstractum ab eo. Deinde notat Canariensis dupliciter aliqua distingui per intellectum: quaedam, existente aliquo in re ipsa fundamento; et haec distinctio (inquit ille) fit per diversas notitias de eadem re, quae quidem ita se habet in essendo, sicut notitiae in significando. Altera vero distinctio fit, nullo existente fundamento in re ipsa, sed solum in intellectu; et fit per diversas notitias de re, quae non ita se habet in essendo, sicut notitiae in significando.

Probat ergo minus differre relationem a persona, quam cetera quae diximus inter se: quia relatio a persona differt posteriori illo modo, sine ullo fundamento in re ipsa; cetera vero priori modo, existente fundamento in re, eo quod cetera differunt definitione, relatio vero et persona non definitione, quia eadem est utriusque; sed diverso modo significandi, et ideo solo nostro modo concipiendi.

Ego vero, quamvis existimem minus distare relationem a persona quam cetera, quae enumeravimus inter se, aliam tamen puto esse rationem minoris differentiae: displicet enim mihi - semperque displicuit - illa divisio distinctionis rationis, ut notavi disputatione illa in particulari capite ultimo, primo; quia vix habet fundamentum in rebus et in nostro modo concipiendi res; non quia in ipsa re multitudo aut distinctio, sed quia quae distinguimus, per ordinem ad diversa distinguimus: nam in ipso nec ratione distinguitur idem, vel etiam idem conceptum iterum repetitur, quod non est distinguere, etiam per intellectum, ut notatum est.

161. Canariensis, in this article, disputation 3, part 2, after the third conclusion.

Falsum est, quod ait Canariensis, distinctione rationis, quae habet fundamentum in re, notitias de re, quae causant distinctionem rationis, ita esse in intellectu, ut in re ipsa nulla sit distinctio, quare non ita se habeat in intelligendo, sicut res ipsa in essendo: si enim ea, quae intellectu sunt distincta, sic essent in seipsis, sicuti sunt in intellectu, eorum distinctio esset ex natura rei, non penderet ex intellectu: male igitur dixit Canariensis distinctione rationis, quae habet fundamentum in re. Etiam doctrina praedicta de distinctione cum fundamento, et de ea quae non habet fundamentum, perfecte applicat ad praesentem difficultatem, si respiciamus id quod est in Deo: non magis differt essentia et attributa, quam a concreto; haec enim omnia indivisa sunt, et absque ulla distinctione, quae habet fundamentum, ut probatum manet: ergo non est distinctio, quae habet fundamentum; sed utrorumque ratio. Igitur inter relationem et personam minor est distinctio rationis, quam inter essentiam et relationem et attributa. Pro cuius explanatione est id, quod dicere coepimus, cap. 2: quamvis omnis distinctio habeat in nostro modo intelligendi fundamentum, nihilominus una distinctio potest esse maiore quam alia, et talis naturae, ut impediat unum de altero praedicari: quaedam enim differunt ad modum diversarum formarum, quarum una non includitur in alia, sicut commune in particulari, et haec est distinctio quae non potest esse maior; estque inter attributa ipsa inter se, et inter essentiam et attributa, inter essentiam etiam et relationes. Haec differunt omnino definitione, nec unum de alio formaliter praedicatur, ut disputatione citata praedictum est: differunt autem ex parte directi significati, quia directe significata sunt velut duae formae diversae, quarum una non est de ratione alterius. Alia vero differunt quidem ratione, sed minus, sicut superius et inferius, commune et particulare, eo quod unum includitur in alio; et haec distinctio non impedit praedicationem unius de alio. At concretum et abstractum alio modo differunt in Deo secundum rationem, non quia ex parte directi significati aliquid sit de conceptu unius, quod non sit de conceptu alterius, sed quia ex parte connotati aliquid connotatur ab uno, quod non ab alio, tametsi ex parte directi significati non differant. Nam Pater directe significat relationem paternitatis; Paternitas similiter: sed Pater connotat etiam naturam divinam, in qua relatio subsistit, quam Paternitas non connotat. Divinitas vero et paternitas ex parte directi significati, et nullo modo ex parte connotati, differunt; quia utraque significatur ut forma diversa. Idem de attributis inter se collatis, et cum essentia, dicendum est. Ceterum, quamvis minor sit distinctio rationis inter abstracta et concreta, quam inter essentiam et relationes; illa tamen sufficiens est, ut abstractum de concreto in sensu formali non praedicetur: quia, si praedicaretur, multa essent concludenda absurda in sensu formali, ut quod paternitas intelligeret, generaret, si Pater esset paternitas: sed de concretis et abstractis iterum, quaestione 39, articulo 5. Quare vero distinctio eiusdem a se ipso non efficiat falsam propositionem, et utrum vere ibi sit distinctio rationis et conceptus, an eiusdem solum conceptus, sicut et nominis repetitio, diximus disputatione illa 119, cap. 2.

An relatio divina, ut concipitur diversa ab essentia, sit aliqua perfectio.

On the divine relations as perfections

Whether the divine relation is any perfection

Relationem in Deo nullam esse perfectionem sentiunt Scotus, Durandus, Capreolus, et Caietanus.[162]

Refellitur praedicta sententia.

Relationem personalem in Deo esse perfectionem, ac proinde tres perfectiones relativas in eo concedendas esse putavere Gabriel et alii.[163]

Praedicta opinio impugnatur.

Quomodo una persona dici possit maior alia, non dignior aut perfectior.

Verior sententia.

The opinion of those who deny that relation in God is a perfection

Proposita quaestio non solum difficultatem habet in opinione Thomistarum, qui dicunt relationes ab essentia sola ratione distingui; verum etiam in sententia Scoti, qui docet distingui ex natura rei: cum enim utroque modo relatio sit quaedam entitas, et quaelibet entitas sit perfectio, videtur in Deo esse tres perfectiones, sicut tres sunt relationes: quod sane ali quibus falsum, aliis autem verum videri potest. Referamus ergo aliorum placita, ut quod nobis videatur, distincte definiamus.

Prima igitur opinio sit, relationes in Deo secundum rationem formalem non esse perfectiones, neque imperfectiones aliquas. Quam tradiderunt Scotus in 3, dist. 1 et 4, q. 1 et 4, et ex professo Quodlibet, quaest. 1; Durandus in 3, dist. 1, q. 3, num. 13; Capreolus in 1, dist. 7, q. 1, art. 2, ad 3, contra primam conclusionem; Caietanus in hoc articulo, circa solutionem 3.[164] Nec oppositum docet 3a, q. 3, art. 1, cum ait personalitates esse infinite perfectas: quia, ut ibidem ipse notat, non debemus metiri personalitates divinas cum relationibus, ut relationes reales sunt. Nam relationes reales non sunt infinite perfectae formaliter, quatenus relationes sunt, sed quatenus sunt subsistentes: sic enim subeunt rationem personalitatis; quam quidem subsistentiam putat Caietanus relationibus provenire ab essentia, et ratione illius potentiae terminare alienam naturam.

Prima ratio pro hac sententia probari potest primo hac ratione: quia si relatio divina formaliter esset perfectio, sicut in Deo sunt tres reales relationes, sic etiam essent tres reales perfectiones: ex hoc autem duo sequerentur absurda. Unum esset, in Patre fore aliquam perfectionem, quae non esset in aliis personis; sicut in Patre est aliqua relatio, quae non est in aliis: quare quaelibet persona careret aliqua perfectione. Alterum est, aliquam personam fore perfectiorem alia, quia tres illae 162. Scotus, In Sententias 3, d. 1 et 4, q. 1 et 4; Quodlibet, q. 1. Durandus, In Sent. 3, d. 1, q. 3, n. 13. Capreolus, In Sent. 1, d. 7, q. 1, a. 2, ad 3. Caietanus, In S. Th., I, q. 28, a. 1, ad 3 circa solutionem 3.

163. Gabriel (Biel), In Sententias 1, d. 7, q. 3, a. 3; alii eiusdem scholae.

164. See previous note for places; and St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae III, q. 3, a. 1.

perfectiones non essent quasi eiusdem speciei, sed omnino quasi diversae et contrariae: non ergo essent aequalis perfectionis; quia inaequalitas fundatur in diversitate quantitatis, sicut dissimilitudo in diversitate qualitatis: quare altera esset maior, quod est absurdum. Secundo probatur: si paternitas in Deo esset perfectio, esset infinita perfectio; includeret igitur omnem perfectionem, ac proinde filiationem, quae est altera perfectio, quod est impossibile.

His fere rationibus utuntur Scotus et Durandus. Caietanus autem et Capreolus alio tertio modo confirmant. Quia nimirum relatio, ut relatio, abstrahitur a perfectione et imperfectione: forsitan quia existimant, secundum propriam rationem non inesse subiecto. Porro relationem non esse imperfectionem aliquam, facile probant, quia relatio est in Deo; in Deo autem nulla potest esse imperfectio: ergo relatio non est imperfectio.

Refutation of the foregoing opinion: reasons proving that relation is a perfection

Haec opinio mihi non probatur: existimo namque ad Dei perfectionem non minus pertinere relationes quam attributa, primo; quia sicut Deus ob suam infinitam perfectionem postulat esse sapientem, sic etiam ob eandem foecundus est, ut sit Pater, Filius, et Spiritus sanctus: negari ergo non potest, paternitatem esse aliquam Dei perfectionem, sicut sunt attributa. Porro foecunditatem et relationes ad Dei perfectionem pertinere, non minus quam attributa, quamvis non eodem modo, hac ratione probatur. Quia sicut melius est Deo esse sapientem, quam non sapientem, ita melius est Deo esse Patrem, Filium, et Spiritum sanctum, quam non esse illud: autem quod melius est alicui rei, quam negatio illius, non potest non esse perfectio rei; quod enim alicui melius est, illi perfectius est; melius enim et perfectius idem sunt, bonum et perfectum. Ex quo inferemus, relationes non solum ad perfectionem Dei pertinere, sed etiam esse perfectiones simpliciter simplices ipsius Dei.

Tertio: si relatio in Deo non esset perfectio, esset quidem imperfectio: nam perfectio et imperfectio contradictorie opponuntur; perfectum enim est cui nihil deest, imperfectum contra est cui aliquid deest: si ergo paternitas non esset perfectio, sequeretur illi aliquid deesse, defectu cuius esset non perfecta, et ita imperfecta: vel sequeretur ipsam esse Dei imperfectionem, quia propter illam Deo aliquid deesset. Quare si in creaturis relatio nulla esset perfectio, imperfectio sane diceretur: at in divinis non potest esse aliqua imperfectio: ergo, cum relatio sit in divinis, debet esse perfectio.

Quarto probatur: relationes divinae sunt personalitates, quibus personae subsistunt et constituuntur: subsistere autem, et terminari naturam, ut sit persona, est perfectio: ergo et ipsa relatio, quae est ultimus terminus, est perfectio.

Denique St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa 1, cap. 11, id verbis docuit: "Unum quippe Deum agnoscimus, in solis autem proprietatibus, nimirum paternitatis, filiationis, et processionis, atque quantum ad causam, et ea quae causa proficiscuntur, ac persona perfectionem, hoc est, existendi modum, discrimen animadvertimus"; ubi appellat personalem perfectionem ipsam paternitatem, et quamlibet relationem.[165]

Relationem personalem in Deo esse perfectionem, ac proinde tres perfectiones relativas in eo concedendas esse putaverunt Gabriel et alii.

The opinion that there are three relative perfections in God

Alii non solum docent, relationes divinas esse perfectiones Dei secundum propriam rationem relationis; sed etiam tres esse perfectiones relativas rectius accipiendas. Quam sententiam recensent nonnulli et aperte docet Gabriel in 1, dist. 7, q. 3, art. 3, qui, ut explicet suam sententiam, more suae scholae varias affert acceptiones perfectionis, non quia revera vocabula apud Latinos tot modis usurpentur, sed quia Nominales, ut aliquas fugiant difficultates, vocabulis ipsis ludere videntur. Inquit ergo duobus modis dici perfectionem: priori modo dicitur ea, quae est simpliciter summa et infinita, cui impossibilis est aliqua imperfectio; et hoc modo tres relationes divinae sunt tres simpliciter perfectiones. Posteriori modo dicitur perfectio simpliciter, quae convenit omni supposito divino; et ita relationes in Deo sunt perfectiones simpliciter: quia quaelibet illarum non convenit omni supposito; ac postulat: illarum non concursum omni supposito; ac hoc pacto una perfectio est in Patre, quae non est in Filio; sed eodem fine tamen non sequitur, Filium esse imperfectum, quia dicit illi perfectio Patris: nam imperfectum non eo dicitur, quod ei deest aliqua perfectio, sed quia non sit summum et infinitum. Dictum est autem relationem quamlibet esse perfectionem priori illo modo, quia est summa et infinita: quare hoc auctor plane concedit, aliquam perfectionem summam et infinitam esse in Patre, quae non est in Filio, et contra.

Fundamenti praecipui huius sententiae est huiusmodi: Relatio, ut distinguitur ab essentia, est vere ens reale: perfectio autem consequitur rationem entis; est enim passio illius, quae dicitur bonitas, sicut etiam consequitur veritas: ergo in Deo sunt tres perfectiones relativa: multiplicatio enim inferioris, necesse est multiplicari superioris, ut multiplicato homine, necesse est multiplicari animal: ergo multiplicata relatione, necesse est multiplicari etiam veritas et bonum, seu perfectionem, quae statuunt superiorem. Et sane est Anselmus: in Deo tres res modo esse. Anselmus, lib. de incarnatione Verbi, cap. 3: "Solemni" (inquit) "usu verborum agnoscimus, quod aliquando potest dici de aliquo, qui ante dicit De Deo Patrem; immo Filium aliquid Deo deest; et omnes sunt: De Deo Patrem non esse Filium, et Filium non esse Patrem." Et paucis interiectis: "Hoc ergo modo nihil prohibet dicere duas personas, Patrem et Filium, esse duas res: sit tamen intelligatur cuiusmodi sunt res." Idipsum indicat Concilium Remense verbis quae referemus; et St. Thomas infra q. 30, art. 1, concedit in Deo tres res cum additamento hoc, "subsistentes"; et in d. 29, q. 1, art. 4, concedit tres res sine illo additamento.[166] Pro hac sententia refertur Clichtoveus, lib. 1, De fide, cap. 11; sed ille longe aliter sensisse, ut infra sequenti capite referemus.

Some answer that it is not to be conceded that there is some perfection in one person which is not in another; because the whole perfection of the relations is contained eminently in the essence on account of its infinity and fecundity. Yet this solution is weak; for, however much we concede that the perfection of the relation is eminently in the essence, and thus that in any person whatsoever there is eminently the perfection of another; nevertheless the argument contends that the perfection which is formally in one does not formally belong to another: but the syllogistic form cannot be denied, as is manifest; and the antecedent of that syllogism, in both the major and the minor, speaks of perfection formally, not only virtually and eminently, as is clear; therefore it is inferred in the conclusion that there is some perfection in one person formally, and that it formally belongs to that person, which does not belong to another, nor is formally in it.

165. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 11.

166. Council of Rheims; St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae I, q. 30, a. 1; I, d. 29, q. 1, a. 4 (as cited in the scholastic tradition).

Others, granting that there is some relation in one person which is not in another, and that there are three relative perfections, nonetheless say that by no means can it be conceded that there is one perfection in one person which is not in another: because this proposition is negative, and therefore universal; it therefore denies that the perfection of one relation is thus in one person that in no way it is in another, which is manifestly false: for the perfection which is in the Father is also in the Son, not respectively, but absolutely, by the very fact that in the Son there is the very same essence and nature of the Father: therefore in some way the Father's relative perfection is also in the Son. But these doctors, not mindful as they ought, seem in a few words to destroy what they had posited. For when they say that there are in God three real relative perfections, they are not speaking of the perfection of God inasmuch as it is absolute, but under the formal notion of relation and respect: otherwise, if they are speaking of that which is in the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Spirit together, it is not relative but absolute; and not three perfections, but one, ought to be said. Therefore when they say that out of three relative perfections one is paternity, another filiation, another passive spiration, they ought consequently to concede that the perfection of paternity is thus in the Father that it is not in the Son, inasmuch as it is constituted as a perfection distinct from the others, and so with the rest: lest, if they say that all are in the individual persons, they be forced to concede that there is one, not three, perfections, contrary to what they had posited. Moreover, the syllogism is legitimate, and the conclusion is a negation: Therefore some perfection is not in the Son, which is not universal but particular, as is evident; wherefore it does not deny every perfection, nor in every way, but it denies that some perfection is in the Son, which indeed is legitimately inferred.

Still others, constrained by the aforesaid argument, plainly concede that there is some perfection in one person which is not in another: but they say that this is relative, and thus it is not to be said absolutely that some perfection is not in some person, but with the additum, Relative. Yet this can no less manifestly be refuted; first, because, as we proved above, if we concede three relative perfections, there can also be conceded, the scandal being set aside, three perfections absolutely according to the propriety of speech: therefore in the same way it must not only be said that there is one relative perfection in one person which is not in another, but even absolutely according to the propriety of speech. And indeed the syllogism which we formed above, absolutely and without additum, gathers the conclusion in this way: paternity is not in the Son; paternity is a perfection; therefore some perfection is not in the Son. Now it is clear that in the conclusion "Relative" is not to be added, because it is added in none of the premises: yet all shrink from conceding without that additum that some perfection is not in some person: therefore it is necessary that we say there are not three perfections: for if we say that all the relations are the same perfection, it is not rightly inferred from the fact that paternity is not in the Son, that some perfection is not in him.

But some reply that that relative perfection is not, simply speaking, simple, according to the definition of Anselm in the Proslogion, ch. 3, "which is better as itself than as not itself": for relation is not better as itself than as not itself; otherwise paternity would be better than not-paternity, and therefore than filiation: but this kind of perfection to concede in one person and not in another is not an inconvenience. But surely Anselm's definition ought not to be understood with respect to any person whatsoever, as if in each one the "itself" were better than "not itself": but with respect to the individual nature, of which it is the perfection: and in respect of the divine essence, which is perfected by the relations, paternity is better than not-paternity; and filiation than not-filiation; and spiration than not-spiration; that is, it is better to be in the three persons than not to be; and it is better to be in the Father than not to be in the Father: I do not say, than to be in the Son, but than not to be in the Father: moreover, from the fact that it is in the Son it does not follow that it is not in the Father: therefore every relation in God is a perfection simply simple. And indeed it is not worthy to attribute to God another kind of perfection: because whatever God is, it is better to be than not to be: but to concede a perfection simply simple to be in one person which is not in another, seems an inconvenience.

Secondly, from the opposite opinion it follows that the Father is not perfect, because, according to Aristotle, Physics III, ch. 3, and Metaphysics V, ch. 16, the perfect is that outside of which there is nothing, that is, to which nothing is lacking, and this is understood in its own genus: for wisdom is said to be formally perfect to which in the genus of wisdom nothing is lacking, even if the notion of mercy does not belong to it: wherefore, if to the eternal Father some divine perfection be lacking, he will not be perfect: but filiation is a divine perfection distinct from paternity: therefore, since filiation is lacking to the Father, some divine perfection will be lacking to him, and God will be imperfect.

It is impugned thirdly. Third, if the relations were three perfections in God, they could not be equal formally: therefore one would be greater than another. For since between equal and unequal there is no middle, that which is not equal must be unequal; but that which is unequal to another is by that very fact greater or lesser than it: therefore one person would be greater and more perfect than another, which is absurd. Furthermore, that those relative perfections cannot be equal is proved: because they differ, as it were, by species, and are contraries: therefore their diversity is, as it were, in nature and in formal notion: but as diversity in quantity makes unequal, so also diversity in substance or quiddity makes inequality in the same genus: therefore, since the relations are contraries and, as it were, of diverse species, they will be of diverse natures and consequently unequal: wherefore the three persons, with three relative perfections, will be something greater than any one of them; in that in the three there are three perfections, and one of them is greater: but the consequent is absurd, and is against the doctrine of St. Augustine, Contra Maximinum III, ch. 10, and Sermon 38 De tempore, where he says that in God there is not something greater, the three persons together, than any one of them; because in all there is the same essence and nature; by which reason he seems to constitute all their perfection in the nature and essence. He teaches the same in De Trinitate VI, chs. 8 and 10, and VIII, ch. 1; and therefore Anselm in the Monologion, ch. 53, says: "The Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are among themselves with such mutual equality that none surpasses another." He gives the reason, because each one of them is the perfect and highest essence. And in the Proslogion, ch. 23: "What each single one is, this is the whole Trinity, because each single one is nothing other than supremely simple unity."[167]

The first solution to this last argument is refuted. Some reply that therefore one relation is not more perfect, or has a greater perfection, than another, because each of them formally includes the essence in its concept. But against this the first point is that which above, Disputation 121, ch. 2, we said, namely, that the essence is not included formally in the concept of relation. Then, even if it were included, nonetheless, since three perfections are said to be in God, diverse among themselves and contraries, they will not be able not to be unequal, and one greater than another, insofar as they are diverse and opposed among themselves: for for this reason they cannot have unity in the quantity of perfection which makes equals.

The second solution of others. Others reply: there is no need that things which differ in species and in formal notion be always unequal; nor do they think it absurd that the species of things which differ among themselves should be of equal perfection. But since every equal is commensurable to another equal in the mode in which it is equal, and things which are of diverse rational notion cannot be commensurated, it is false to assert that things specifically distinct can be of equal perfection: especially because by the very fact that they are of diverse rational notion, they have a diverse quantity of perfection; and hence they ought to have inequality of perfection. Wherefore Aristotle, Metaphysics IV, ch. 8, text 18, showing that among false things one is more, another less, says: "If, therefore, it is not similarly said to err less - this is, if he who says that four are five does not lie in the same way as he who says that four are a thousand - then it follows that the one is less false." By this same form of arguing we can use in the present case in this way: paternity is not of the same notion as filiation, therefore it is not like it: therefore one is greater.

On the same matter

...than filiation; and spiration than non-spiration; that is, it is better to be in three persons than not to be; and it is better to be in the Father than not to be in the Father: I do not say, than to be in the Son, but than not to be in the Father: moreover, from the fact that it is in the Son it does not follow that it is not in the Father: therefore every relation in God is a perfection simply simple. And indeed it is not worthy to attribute to God another kind of perfection: because whatever God is, it is better to be than not to be: but to concede a perfection simply simple in one person which is not in another, seems an inconvenience.

Secondly, from the opposite opinion it follows that the Father is not perfect, as Aristotle testifies, Physics III, ch. 3, and Metaphysics V, ch. 16: the perfect is that outside of which there is nothing, that is, to which nothing is lacking, and it is understood in its own genus: for formally perfect wisdom is said of that to which in the genus of wisdom nothing is lacking, even if the notion of mercy does not belong to it: wherefore, if to the eternal Father some divine perfection be lacking, he will not be perfect: but filiation is a divine perfection distinct from paternity: therefore, since filiation is lacking to the Father, some divine perfection will be lacking to him, and God will be imperfect.

Thirdly, if the relations were three perfections in God, they could not be equal formally: therefore one would be greater than another. For since between equal and unequal there is no middle, that which is not equal must be unequal; but that which is unequal to another is by that very fact greater or lesser than it: therefore there would be in the Trinity a person greater and more perfect than another, which is absurd. Furthermore, that those relative perfections cannot be equal is proved: because they differ, as it were, by species, and are contraries: therefore their diversity is, as it were, in nature and in formal notion: but as diversity in quantity makes unequal; so also diversity in substance or quiddity makes inequality in the same genus: therefore, since the relations are contraries and, as it were, of diverse species, they will be of diverse natures and consequently unequal: wherefore the three persons, with three relative perfections, will be something greater than any one of them; in that in the three there are three perfections, and one of them is greater: but the consequent is absurd, and is against the doctrine of St. Augustine, Contra Maximinum III, ch. 10, and Sermon 38 De tempore, where he says that in God there is not something greater, the three persons together, than any one of them; because in all there is the same essence and nature; by which reason he seems to constitute all their perfection in the nature and essence. He teaches the same in De Trinitate VI, chs. 8 and 10, and VIII, ch. 1; and therefore Anselm in the Monologion, ch. 53, says: "The Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are among themselves with such mutual equality that none surpasses another." He gives the reason, because each one of them is the perfect and highest essence. And in the Proslogion, ch. 23: "What each single one is, this is the whole Trinity, because each single one is nothing other than supremely simple unity."[167]

They reply: it is not necessary that things which differ in species and in formal notion be always unequal; nor do they think it absurd that the species of things which differ among themselves should be of equal perfection. But since every equal is commensurable to another equal in the mode in which it is equal, and things which are of diverse rational notion cannot be commensurated, it is false to assert that things specifically distinct can be of equal perfection: especially because by the very fact that they are of diverse rational notion, they have a diverse quantity of perfection; and hence they ought to have inequality of perfection. Wherefore Aristotle, Metaphysics IV, ch. 8, text 18, showing that among false things one is more, another less, says: "If, therefore, it is not similarly said to err less - this is, if he who says that four are five does not lie in the same way as he who says that four are a thousand - then it follows that the one is less false." By this same form of arguing we can use in the present case in this way: paternity is not of the same notion as filiation, therefore it is not like it: therefore one is greater.

167. Aristotle, Physics III, c. 3; Metaphysics V, c. 16; Metaphysics IV, c. 8, text 18. St. Augustine, Contra Maximinum III, c. 10; Sermon 38 De tempore; De Trinitate VI, cc. 8, 10; VIII, c. 1. St. Anselm, Monologion c. 53; Proslogion c. 23.

167. Aristotle, Physics III, c. 3; Metaphysics V, c. 16; Metaphysics IV, c. 8, text 18. St. Augustine, Contra Maximinum III, c. 10; Sermon 38 De tempore; De Trinitate VI, cc. 8, 10; VIII, c. 1. St. Anselm, Monologion c. 53; Proslogion c. 23.

From what has been said it follows that Clichtovaeus slipped in cap. 11 of book 1 De fide of Damascene, when he says in these words: "And on account of such different properties, a personal perfection is engendered in the divine things; not indeed according to nature, but according to the notion of origin. For the mode of existing of the Father, who is from no one, is more principal than that of the other two, who take their origin from him." Here he does not contend, as some recent writers suppose, to establish in God three relative perfections, but, following the phrase of the Greek Fathers, to concede some kind of excellence according to origin, whereby one person may excel another. In this sense the Greek Fathers call the Father "greater" than Christ, in keeping with John 14: "The Father is greater than I": for according to essence (essentia) they say they are equal, in which sense they understand that statement to the Philippians 2, concerning Christ, "to be equal to God." Thus they interpret that passage of John 14 - St. Gregory Nazianzen oration 35, which is the third On Theology, from number 57; St. Athanasius, oration 2 against the Arians, far toward the end; St. Basil, book 4 against Eunomius, the chapter on this saying of the Gospel; Origen, the homily on various texts, which is held in tome 2; and indeed also St. John Damascene, book 1 De fide, cap. 4 - who say that the Father is called "greater," not by nature, but by property. Moreover Athanasius notes: we do not say "better," but "greater": for "better" is referred to essence, but "greater" denotes priority of origin and of cause, together with identity of nature and equality. Therefore St. Hilary, who among the Latins in book 9 On the Trinity follows at some length the opinion of the Greeks, says thus: "Assuredly the Father is greater, inasmuch as he is Father; but the Son is not lesser. The nativity of the Son constitutes the Father greater; but for the Son to be lesser, the nature of nativity does not permit." As if he were to say: by reason of property, not of nature, the Father is greater; which he expressed when he said, "The nativity (that is, the origin) of the Son constitutes the Father greater." And by the same reasoning Hilary ought to concede that the Son is lesser: because "greater" and "lesser" are said relatively and mutually; but because the Son is not lesser in essence and nature, he subjoins: "For the Son to be lesser, the nature of nativity does not permit." He did not say, "nativity does not permit," but "the nature of nativity does not permit": for since he had said that the Father is constituted greater by the nativity of the Son, he was compelled to concede that by the same nativity the Son is constituted lesser; because these are reciprocal. He therefore said "the nature of nativity," to indicate that neither is the Son lesser, nor the Father greater, in nature and substance, but only in respect of nativity; and for this reason of a first principle - because he is an author without an author - Phabadius calls the Father "greater."[1] I for my part think the Greek Fathers, and Hilary, by the name "greater" signified nothing else than "prior"; so that by reason of origin, or of cause, as they speak, they would call the Father greater, that is, prior; and the Son lesser, that is, posterior. In what way, however, that testimony of John 14, "The Father is greater than I," is referred to the humanity of Christ, and which Fathers understood it so, we shall say in part 3, question c., article 1. In this same sense Novatian in the book De Trinitate at the end says that the eternal Son is subject to the Father, and that therefore the Son receives from the Father all things subject to himself. And for the same reason not a few Greek and Latin Fathers, whom we shall report below in question 45, article 6, say that the Son was the minister of the Father in the creation of things, and other such matters, by which they wished to denote in the Father priority and dignity of origin alone.

But in very truth, on account of this mode of speaking of the Greek Fathers, Clichtovaeus ought not to have asserted that there is dignity - that is, excellence - among the persons: for thus one would seem to be made worthier and of greater authority than another; which can by no means be conceded: since this mode of speaking signifies not only priority of origin, but also a greater dignity of nature. For although Damascene, book 1 De fide, cap. 11, says that in God there is a personal perfection, nevertheless he does not assert this comparatively among the persons, as if one were more perfect, or more worthy, than another, as Clichtovaeus thought; but because the divine nature is understood to be perfect by its personal properties (personalitas), as was shown above in chapter 2. Wherefore the same Damascene, in the same book 1, cap. 9, thus says: "Whence it is that all things which the Father has are the Son's, this one excepted, that he is not only-begotten [unigenitus]": which word indicates not a difference of nature, nor dignity and authority, but a mode of existing. By which words he shows the property of being unbegotten, by reason of which he later in the same chapter teaches that to say "the Father is greater than the Son" does not signify dignity or authority; he understands, however, that, as he had just said, it does not signify a difference of nature. And therefore none of the Fathers uses this way of speaking, "The Father is more worthy," or "more excellent than the Son," or, "has more authority than the Son"; although some say that one person is prior in dignity to another, as we shall see below in disputation 168. Therefore Clichtovaeus ought not to have conceded that there is a more principal, or more perfect, mode of subsisting of one person than of another: because these words signify not priority of origin, but greater dignity and excellence of the person. From which it also is evident that by that testimony of Damascene, De fide, cap. 9, nothing is proved against what in cap. 2 we said - namely, that the personal relations (relationes personales) pertain to the perfection (perfectio) of God.[2]

It does not follow, however, that there is some perfection in one person which is not in another; which, that it may be made more perspicuous, the argument which seems to press more on the contrary is to be proposed in this way. Every relation (relatio), insofar as it is distinguished from the essence (essentia), is a real relation, and therefore a real being; and when the inferior is multiplied, the superior is multiplied: therefore, if there are three real relations really distinct, there will also be three things, or three entities, or three entitites; but perfection, or goodness, is likewise a higher predicate; therefore that too will be triple. Hence it clearly follows that there is some perfection in one person which is not in another, as we said above in chapter 4.

To this difficulty the Canarian and Maior, in the place alleged, answer that indeed in God there are three real relations really distinct, yet not three perfections: because multiplication in God is only by relative opposition; but "perfection" is not a relative name, but an absolute one, like "goodness": therefore it ought not to be multiplied when the relations are multiplied. Hence Canarienfis infers that the three relations in God are one unique real perfection, just as they are one essence; which, however, does not seem more difficult than to concede three relations really distinct in the same numerically one nature, and to be multiplied relations without multiplying the nature: because in relations there is opposition, which alone is the cause of multiplication; in essence, however, there is none, nor in goodness and perfection. If, therefore, in this way it is rightly shown that the three relations are one sole perfection, it follows plainly that there is none in one person which is not in another. In the same way Caietan philosophizes in 3a, q. 3, art. 1, about the divine personalities, which he thinks are not altogether the same as the relations, as we noted in cap. 1 of this disputation, when he says that they indeed are infinitely perfect, as the persons are, because they are subsistent, but that there is only one perfection in them, namely of essence; and thus it does not follow, as Scotus contended, that there is one perfection in one person which is not in another.[3]

Nevertheless, this explanation and doctrine do not remove the proposed difficulty: for if a relation, insofar as it is distinct from the essence - and especially in our opinion, which says that the concept of essence is not included in the concept of relation, as we said in the preceding disputation - is a certain thing and entity; and just as we say that three relations really distinct are three things, so too, for this same reason, a relation conjoined with perfection distinct from essence; therefore, just as we say three relations, we must say three perfections. Especially since for that very reason, that they are of diverse rational notion, they have a diverse quantity of perfection; and hence they ought to have inequality of perfection.

Caput VI - The truer opinion

The truer opinion is that the personal relation is indeed a perfection of God, and that the three relations really distinct pertain to his perfection, as was proved in cap. 2; yet that they are not three real perfections, even relative ones, nor that there is some real perfection in one person which is not in another. A position which, if it be rightly explained by us and some of its difficulties be set out, speaks much more sincerely and worthily about the perfection and equality of the persons than the preceding positions. This position is followed by the Canarian in this article, disputation 3, part 2, in 4, the argument after the fourth conclusion; and by Maior in report d. 33, q. 1, ad 2; and in part by Caietan, as we shall mention below.[4] It has two parts. One is that the personal relation pertains to the perfection of God: but this has been sufficiently proved against the first opinion in cap. 2 of this disputation, in which, with Gabriel and others who follow the second, we shall agree. The other part is that these three real relations in God are not three perfections; and consequently it does not follow that there is some perfection in one person which is not in another.

But this explanation and doctrine do not take away the proposed difficulty: for if a relation, insofar as it is distinct from the essence, in our present opinion, which says that the concept of essence is not of the concept of relation, as we said in the preceding disputation, is a certain thing and an entity; and just as three relations are said to be really distinct, three things; so even for this reason a relation conjoined with a perfection distinct from the essence will be a thing: therefore, just as three relations are said, three perfections will be said; and likewise three goodnesses; since "perfection" and "goodness" are also predicated more generally than "relation," which is a passion of being and of a thing. Wherefore, because these relations are things in reality distinct from the essence, and from one another; since each has perfection, although, since they are accidents, nothing prevents our saying that in God there are three things, or three entities, since "perfection" is no less abstracted from relation and the absolute than "being" and "thing," which are passions of being and thing itself.

Accordingly, to explain this difficulty, observe first that "perfection" can be used in a twofold way. In one way, for the integrity of a thing; in which the formal notion of goodness consists, which is constituted as a passion of being, so that a thing is called perfect and good because it is entire and has nothing wanting to it, as we said elsewhere. In another way, "perfection" is said of whatever pertains to the integrity of anything and makes it whole and complete, or is fitting and consonant to it; this, however, is not posited to be a passion of being, as was shown there; for it does not belong to all things with respect to all things: nevertheless, since there is nothing in God which is not most fitting to him, nothing there will be which is not a perfection of him in this latter way.

Second, with respect to this, that something be a perfection of a thing in the first way, it is necessary that the whole which is perfected be entire and that nothing be wanting to it; and this is not constituted by adding something really distinct to it, but by the completeness of that very thing which is perfected. Wherefore, if something be distinct from our account alone and our way of understanding - and not really - then also it will only be a perfection of it in that latter way. But you will say: that which is distinguished from another can perfect it; much more, then, can that which is more intrinsic to it and differs least from it perfect it. I answer: this only proves that that which is distinguished in reason alone more participates the integrity of that thing and its perfection in the first way: yet it is not for that reason a "perfection" in the latter way, because, to be a perfection in that latter way, it must add something which perfects; and to that pertains the work of differing from that which it perfects.

Third, it is presupposed that in whatever is perfect there are both integrity and what is fitting and perfecting; for integrity is only integrity, and perfection which is a passion of being is only such as in many ways is conceived in the thing, as in several parts of one whole, as is clear from the integrity which is the wholeness of anything.

From these it is evident that in God there is one perfection, which is the passion of being; and yet many relations are not many perfections. First, in respect of that perfection which is the passion of being, which is what we called "integrity": it follows that in God there is one such perfection, because there is one integrity; for all things which are in God - our mode of conceiving distinguishing the attributes, whether of essence or of relation - belong to this integrity and perfection, that is, to goodness. Wherefore, as we said in disputation 21, cap. 2, not only is there in God the attribute of moral goodness, in right and just operation, but there is also the attribute of that goodness which answers to the goodness of being in common; and this is one: although whatever you like may be called a relation, or a person, or three relations, or three things be said in God, nevertheless we do not therefore say three goodnesses and three perfections: because all of them integrate God and perfect him, whence there results only one integrity; although in created composite things, from several things distinct there are several perfections, which are integrities that they call partial; but in God these cannot be: because all things, together with the essence, are one.

It is objected that since three relations are said to be really distinct, three things; it follows that also for this reason any relation whatsoever is a perfection distinct from the essence: therefore, just as three relations are said, three perfections and goodnesses are likewise said; if indeed, when the inferior is multiplied, the superior is multiplied too; and just as a thing is superior to a relation, so also goodness, or perfection, which is a passion of being and of the thing. Wherefore, although the three relations are the same according to the thing with the essence, and have the same perfection according to the thing with it; nevertheless, since this identity does not hinder their being called three relations really distinct, it will not hinder their being called three perfections also; since formally each is a perfection and does not include the perfection of the essence. Moreover, the argument of the Canarian has little strength - namely, that there are three relations really distinct because multiplication is according to relative opposition; but that there are not three perfections because perfection is something absolute, and according to the absolute there is no multiplication. This reasoning is weak: for perfection is something absolute, not as a thing or being, but as something common both to the absolute and the relative, which I call a transcendental; and it can be multiplied when the inferior is multiplied. Otherwise we could say that in God there are three things or three beings; for perfection and goodness, which are passions of being and of the thing, are no less abstracted from the relative and the absolute than being itself and the thing.

In order therefore to explain this difficulty, note first that the name of perfection is used in a twofold way. In one way, for the integrity of a thing, in which the formal notion of goodness consists, which is constituted as a passion of being, as we have established elsewhere; just as a thing is said to be perfect and good which is whole or entire, about which we have treated many matters in that disputation.[168] In another way, perfection is said of whatever pertains to the integrity of something and integrates and perfects it, as something befitting and congruous; but this latter is not posited as a passion of being, as was shown there in cap. 2: for it does not befit all things with respect to all things. Nonetheless, since there is nothing in God that does not most of all befit him, there will be nothing that is not a perfection of his in this latter mode according to our way of understanding.

As to perfection taken in the former way: for something to be a real perfection in the former mode, it is enough that it be the integrity of some existing thing; it is not necessary that, that of which it is the integrity, be distinguished by nature from it: for goodness, which is a passion of being, differs from being only according to reason, as was explained there.[168]

As to the latter: for something to be a real perfection of anything in the latter mode, it must of necessity be distinguished by its very nature from that which it perfects: for it is the perfection of that which it completes and integrates; but nothing really perfects itself, just as nothing really

168. See the earlier treatment, disputatio 23, cap. 4.
168. See the earlier treatment, disputatio 23, cap. 4.

constitutes itself. Therefore that which perfects and integrates must, by its own nature, be distinguished from that which is perfected and integrated. Wherefore, if something is only distinguished by the intellect according to our way of understanding, it will also be a perfection of that thing only in that same way.

Objection: But you will say, if what is distinct from another can perfect it, much more will that which is more intimate to something and differs least from it be able to perfect it.

Response: This proves only that what is distinguished from another by reason alone more participates in its integrity and in its perfection in the former mode; yet, in the latter mode, not at all: for in order that it be a perfection in that mode, it must actually perfect; but for this, it is necessary to differ from that which it perfects.

Thirdly, it must be premised that of every thing, however much it be integrated and perfected out of diverse elements, there is only one integrity and perfection which is posited as a passion of that thing: for, just as from many there is made one whole, so also there is made one integrity of it.

From these points it is clear in what way there is one perfection in God, and in what way there are many, and whether the relations are many or the perfection is one. First, if we speak of perfection which is a passion of being, and is the same thing as the integrity of a thing, it follows that in God there is only one perfection, because there is only one integrity. For all the things that are in God, according to our way of understanding - whether attributes or the essence or the relations - pertain to this integrity and perfection, or goodness. Wherefore, as we said in that second disputation, cap. 8, not only is there in God the attribute of moral goodness, that is, of right and just operation, but there is also the attribute of goodness which answers to the most common goodness of being; and both this and that are one.[169] And although any relation, or person, is said to be a thing, and the three relations, three things, are said to be in God, nevertheless three goodnesses and perfections are not said: because all these are the same with the one essence, with which they integrate and perfect God; whence there results only one integrity. And although in created things composed out of many distinct things there are several perfections, as also several integrities which they call partials, yet in God there cannot be such: because all things, together with the essence, are one.

Reason is proved about the latter point. The essence and the relations, which are modes of existing, are the same by nature according to the thing, and are so distinguished among themselves that they are the same with the essence; and therefore they have no integrity other than that which they constitute with it.

Then, if we speak of perfection in the latter mode, as in the first notation it was said, there are not in God three real perfections, but three perfections only according to reason, even though three real relations must necessarily be conceded as really distinct. This plainly follows from the second notation: for, in order that something be a real perfection of another, it must be distinguished from it by nature according to the thing; but relation is not distinguished in this way from the essence: therefore it is not a real perfection of it in the latter mode.

169. See that second disputation, cap. 8.

Indeed, in the opinion of Scotus, who posits between the relations and the essence a distinction by nature according to the thing, three real perfections of the divine essence could not be denied: for the relations would really perfect the essence, if they were distinguished from it in that way. But in our opinion, which said that they differ only according to reason, it would necessarily follow that there are not three real perfections of the divine essence, but only perfections according to reason: because they are conceived by our reason alone, as if they perfected the essence in which they are, whereas in reality they do not perfect it, but are the same with it.[170]

Nor is it rightly inferred thus: there are three real relations really distinct; therefore there are three real perfections in this latter mode, even if, when the inferior is multiplied, the superior be multiplied. First, because perfection in this mode is not a passion of being and something superior to relations, as was said in the first notation. Next, because, in order that three real relations be said to be really distinct, it is enough if they are mutually opposed among themselves and referred by their nature; for from this respect relation is said to be multiplied, even if together with the one essence they are altogether the same by nature according to the thing. But, in order that real perfections be said to be multiplied, it is necessary that they themselves be really distinguished from the thing which they are said to perfect; for from that fact perfection is said to be real in this latter mode.

Objection: But if you say, at least there will be three perfections in the former mode, insofar as perfection and goodness is a passion of being; and then rightly it will be inferred, since, when the inferior is multiplied, the superior ought to be multiplied.

It is answered: It still does not follow; because, although perfection in the former mode is superior to relation, nevertheless something else is required for perfection to be said to be multiplied than for relation. For the latter is said to be real, not because the name is varied, as the Logicians say, but because by its nature it is referred to a real terminus, and on that account it is said to be multiplied. But perfection cannot be multiplied, neither in the former nor in the latter mode, when those relations, or those three things, are the same with some other reality, as the divine relations are with the essence - which indeed is a marvelous and most singular thing. For perfection in the former mode, which is a passion of being, is the integrity of a thing; but where three are really the same with some third, they are not said to have three real integrities, but to constitute one.

If someone press us with that form of arguing, "When the inferior is multiplied, the superior ought to be multiplied," we respond that it is a good form of arguing when the appellation is not varied, as the Logicians say; but here it is varied. For when we say that three real relations are really distinct, the word "real" so affects relation that it is said to be real and really distinct from the fact alone that by its nature it is referred to a real terminus. But when we say "real perfection," surely that word "real" denotes that that perfection is an integrity of that thing per se and distinct from any other - which does not obtain in the divine relations, which, since by their nature they are the same with the essence, constitute with it one integrity according to the thing.

170. See above, disputatio 120, where it was said that the relations differ only according to reason.

About perfection in the latter mode, this is sufficiently clear: for when "real perfection" is said, a distinction from the very thing which it perfects is signified - a distinction that is not found in the divine relations with respect to the essence. But when "real relation" is said, only a real reference to a real terminus is denoted, not a distinction from that in which the relation is: and therefore, when relation is multiplied, the thing is said to be multiplied, not however perfection.

But it must be observed that, although relation is not a real perfection of the essence, as the essence is, nor are the three relations said in any way to be three real perfections, nevertheless relations pertain to the perfection of God as subsisting in a person, just as the attributes pertain to the perfection of the essence according to itself, as was said in cap. 2 - not for any other reason, except that thus it pertains to the perfection of God "to be according to," just as "to be wise." Yet the Trinity of persons, in which fecundity is attended to, does not make a trinity of perfections, whence it also comes about that the perfection and integrity which is considered on the part of the essence according to itself is presupposed to the persons; but that which is considered in God as subsisting in persons is not understood before the persons.

Caput VII - Corollaries of the preceding doctrine

From the preceding doctrine it is gathered, first, that there is not in one person any real perfection, neither in the former nor in the latter mode, which is not in another; although there is in one person a certain relation which is not in another, nevertheless that is not a real perfection, neither in the former nor in the latter mode; but it is only a perfection according to reason in that latter mode: because, according to our way of understanding, just as it is understood as distinct from the essence, so also it is conceived as a perfection of it, as has been proved. Next, it is not the perfection of God in the former mode taken for integrity, but is something pertaining to that integrity, according to our way of understanding: I say, according to our way of understanding, because, since it is the essence itself, it is not something pertaining to its integrity as something distinct from it.

Second, it follows that one person is not to be called more perfect, nor more worthy, than another by reason of personality: I do not say "prior," even in the sense of the Greek Fathers; but I say "more worthy," or "more perfect." For there is among them a perfect equality of dignity: because, if one were more worthy in reality than another, it ought to have in itself some real perfection greater than another; but this does not occur, as has been proved: therefore one is not more perfect than another. Since, however, there is in one some perfection of reason which is not in another, it thereby only comes about that it is conceived by us as more worthy than another; but we should not assert that one is more perfect than another: because what befits it only by apprehension of the intellect ought not to be simply predicated of it.

Third, it follows what should be said about unity and truth, which also are passions of being: whether in God three unities and three truths ought to be said, just as three relations are said. For about goodness, which is posited as a passion of being, the same must be said as about perfection, as we proved in the preceding chapter. Richard, on the First Book, dist. 34, art. 1, q. 3, ad primum, thinks that three truths or three unities are not to be conceded. I, however, judge that - if scandal be absent and what is said be rightly understood - according to the propriety of speech it can be said that there are in God three unities, just as it is said that there is a ternary number; yet one must speak cautiously, as Bernard admonishes, book 5 On Consideration, before the middle, where he says thus: "There are three persons - who will deny the number? For they are truly three. But who will count them? And they are truly one." And with some things interposed, by which he teaches that persons who are not one nature and essence ought not to be numbered, he adds: "Let us say three, but not to the prejudice of unity; let us say one, but not to the confusion of the Trinity." And in the Council of Rheims, at which Bernard was present, in its decrees which we reported above, it is said thus: "We believe that only God the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are eternal; nor let any things at all - whether relations, or properties, or singularities, or unities - be said to be present in God, which are from eternity and are not God." Where the Council does not shrink from conceding three things, three singularities, three unities, provided we say that these are altogether the same with the essence and with God himself; just as by the testimony lately cited Bernard said that persons which are not God himself are not to be numbered. And indeed that number is to be posited in God will be proved in the following article in the explanation of it.[171]

About truth, however, a distinction must be made. For there is a certain truth in saying, and this is one in God: for it is an essential attribute, just as wisdom is. There is another truth which is posited as a passion of being, and it befits any thing; and this I think is multiplied as things are multiplied. Therefore paternity, insofar as it is an entity, has its own truth, which is nothing other than an extrinsic denomination by respect to the intellect being able to judge truly about it, as we noted in disputation 77, cap. 4. Therefore, since the intellect can judge truly that in God there are three real relations - paternity, filiation, and procession - and that these are really distinct, for that reason there are three truths in the three relations.[172]

Fourth, from what has been said it is inferred what should be said about infinity: for this is not a passion of being, as is clear, but it seems to be proper to God. I say, therefore, that three infinities in God are not to be conceded, because infinity can befit God in many ways. The first infinity is in the genus of being, which is posited as a proper attribute of the essence distinct from the others, about which we said enough and more than enough in disputation 23, cap. 5; and this is only one in the three persons: for the infinite in this way is the same as "not having a cause according to existence (esse)." But the persons are infinite in this way by reason of the essence, which by its nature is not distinguished; for "not to have a cause" is not considered formally on the part of the property, but on the part of the essence. Indeed, as we were saying in disputation 119, cap. ...[173]

From the foregoing doctrine it is gathered, first, that in one person there is not any real perfection which is not in another, neither in the prior nor in the posterior way. For although in one person there is a certain relation (relatio), which is not in another, yet that is not a real perfection, neither in the prior nor in the posterior way; it is only a perfection according to reason in that latter way: because, in our mode of understanding, as it is understood as distinct from the essence (essentia), so too it is conceived as a perfection of it, as has been proved. Next, it is not a perfection of God taken in that prior way for integrity, but it is something pertaining to that integrity, in our mode of understanding. I say "in our mode of understanding," because, since it is the essence itself, it is not something pertaining to its integrity as a thing distinct from it.

171. Council of Rheims; Bernard of Clairvaux, De consideratione, lib. 5, ante medium.
172. See disputatio 77, cap. 4.
173. See disputatio 23, cap. 5; and below, disputatio 119, cap. (continued).

Second, it follows that one person is not to be called more perfect or more worthy than another in reason of personality; I do not speak in the other sense of the Greek Fathers, that is, of priority; but I say "more worthy," or "more perfect." For there is a perfect equality of dignity among them: because, if one were more worthy in reality than another, it ought to have in itself some greater real perfection than another; but this does not occur, as has been proved: therefore one is not more perfect than another. Because, however, in one there is some perfection of reason, which is not in another, hence only it comes about that to us it is conceived as more worthy than another; but let us not assert that one is more perfect than another: because what befits it only through the apprehension of the intellect ought not to be predicated of it simply.

Third, it follows what should be said about unity and truth, which also are passions of being: whether in God there ought to be said three unities and three truths, as three relations are said. I say, therefore, that three unities and three truths can be said in God, as three relations are said. For about goodness, which is posited as a passion of being, the same must be said as about perfection, as we proved in the preceding chapter. Richard, in the first book, dist. 34, art. 1, q. 3, to the first, thinks that three truths or three unities are not to be conceded. I, however, judge that, if scandal be absent and what is said be rightly understood, then, according to the propriety of speech, it can be said that there are in God three unities, as it is said that there is a ternary number; yet one must speak cautiously, as Bernard admonishes in book 5 of De consideratione, before the middle, where he says thus: let us beware lest we say things which the Council of Rheims, at which Bernard was present, by its decrees, which were cited above, forbids: "We believe that only God the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit are eternal; nor that there are any properties, or relations, or singularities, or unities, or other things of this sort said to be in God from eternity," where the Council does not shrink from conceding "singularities," "three unities," and the like, provided they be said to be absolutely the same as God himself; as the testimony of the same shows; we will treat of the numbering of those more fittingly in the following article in explaining that proposition.[174]

About infinity, however, which is also said in many ways, it seems that in God three infinities should not be conceded, because infinity in general is a primary attribute, about which we spoke enough in disputation 23, chapter 5, and also in disputation 119, chapter 3, and 121, chapter 3; properties and attributes are not considered as finite nor as infinite in this way, insofar as they are distinguished by us from the essence with which they are the same; they are only said to be infinite by reason of the essence, with which they are identical: formally, however, in themselves, they are considered neither as finite nor as infinite; on that account we do not assert that they are finite, as we noted there.[175]

174. Council of Rheims; Bernard of Clairvaux, De consideratione, lib. 5, ante medium.
175. See disputatio 23, cap. 5; disputatio 119, cap. 3; disputatio 121, cap. 3.

The second kind of infinity is, not in the genus of being, but in a proper and peculiar genus, as wisdom is called infinite because it is engaged with an infinite object, and similarly mercy because it can be engaged with an infinite [object], and in like manner power. Of this kind of infinity, which befits many attributes, we spoke in disputation 103, chapter 2; and this does not befit relations formally: because we do not see what infinity they would have on the part of the terminus to which they are referred, except the infinity of being, of which we first spoke: but this befits relations on the part of the essence, with which they are the same, not otherwise, nor formally from themselves in our mode of conceiving: wherefore, neither in this second way will there be said three infinities.

The third infinity of God is immensity with an order to place; and this does befit relations in reality, because they fill every place; but it befits them by reason of the essence, whose proper attribute is immensity; and therefore they are and are understood to be everywhere, because they are the same as the essence: for that reason, neither in this third way should three infinities be said; otherwise three immensities would be said, which is against the Athanasian Symbol, when it says, "not three immensities, but one immense." Although indeed as adjectives they could be said "three immense" (as we will show in disputation 155, chapter 8), nevertheless substantively they cannot be said, in the sense in which Athanasius speaks; and because the substantive is numbered according to the number of forms, as we shall say there, three immensities are not to be said.

The fourth infinity is of eternity, or duration, about which we must dispute in disputation 126, chapters 2 and 3. The fifth infinity is of incomprehensibility, and this too is only one in God: for God is called incomprehensible to our thought, either because he cannot be seen as he is by the proper virtue of the intellect, or because, although he is seen clearly as he is, he is still not comprehended, as we explained in disputation 3, chapter 4: and in either way there is not one incomprehensibility of the relation and another of the essence; because the one cannot be seen without the other, and when it is seen, it appears as something undivided and simple. Therefore there is one reason of invisibility and incomprehensibility, not several. From which it is clear that in no kind of infinity that befits God can it be said that there are in God three infinities: whether, however, three existences and three eternities - at least relatively - can be said, we shall see below in disputation 136, chapters 2 and 3. But that they can be called "three things," we said in this disputation, chapter 3; and in the same way some think that, if scandal were absent, they could be called "three beings" (tria entia), with the propriety of the word nonetheless preserved. And they understand this not only adjectivally, as "things," which even St. Thomas concedes in the First Book of the Sentences, dist. 25, q. 1, art. 4, but even substantively (which he in that place denies), because, when the inferior is multiplied, the superior is also multiplied, as we showed above. He nevertheless assigns a difference between these two transcendent names, ens and res, to wit, that res signifies the very quiddity and form without respect to existence (esse); and therefore, since there are in God three relations, as it were three forms, there are also three res; but ens signifies quiddity under existence; and because in God there is only one existence of existing, therefore only one ens is said to be in God, not three. Others, however, by a not-to-be-disapproved reason judge that ens and res denote the form in the same way, because each is in the same way transcendent: whether, however, three individuals can be said, or not, we shall say below, q. 29, art. 1.

Finally, it is gathered that not every reality or entity of the Father is communicated to the Son, nor is every reality of the Father and the Son communicated to the Holy Spirit: for the personal properties are true realities and entities, and they are not communicated. Wherefore that saying of Matt. 11: "All things have been delivered to me by my Father," and of John 17: "All mine are thine, and thine are mine," and the like, are to be understood of the essential [things], not of the personal. For in the Council of Florence, last session, in the letter of union, it is said, "All things that are the Father's, the only-begotten Son received from his Father by being begotten, except to be Father." And Damascene, book 1 On the Faith, chapter "Quod sit," [says] that all that the Father has are the Son's, this alone excepted, that he is not unbegotten: which, indeed, indicates neither a difference of nature, nor of dignity and authority, but a mode of existing. But to be Father, or paternity itself, or that mode of existing, is some entity: for we say that there are three realities in God, or three entities, which are three relations and three modes of existing: therefore some entity of one person is not communicated to another. And thus Hilary, book 3 On the Trinity, Cyril, book 1 on John, and Isidore, book On the Supreme Good, chapter "Iesu," are to be understood, when they assert that all things that are the Father's are the Son's; but about this again below in disputation 159, chapter 3, we shall treat.[176]

Articulus III - Whether the relations that are in God are really distinguished from each other

To the third [article] thus one proceeds. It seems that the relations which are in God are not really distinguished from each other.

1. For whatsoever things are the same to one and the same, are the same to each other. But every relation existing in God is the same, according to the thing, with the divine essence. Therefore the relations, according to the thing, are not distinguished from each other.
2. Further, as paternity and filiation are, according to the notion of the name, distinguished from the divine essence, so also are goodness and power. But on account of a distinction of this sort of reason there is not any real distinction of the divine goodness and power. Therefore neither [is there] of paternity and filiation.
3. Further, in the divine [things] there is no real distinction except according to origin; but one relation does not seem to arise from another. Therefore the relations are not really distinguished from each other.

But on the contrary is what Boethius says in the book On the Trinity, that substance in the divine retains unity, relation multiplies trinity: if therefore the relations were not really distinguished from each other, there would not be in the divine a real Trinity, but only of reason, which is the error of Sabellius.[177]

176. See below, disputatio 159, cap. 3. See also St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, lib. 1, cap. "Quod sit."

I answer that, from the fact that something is attributed to another, it must be that all the things which belong to the notion of that [something] be attributed to it. Thus, to whomever "man" is attributed, it must be attributed to him to be rational. But of the notion of relation is the respect of one to another, according to which a thing is opposed to another relatively. Therefore, since in God there is really relation (as has been said), it must be that there be really in him opposition. But relative opposition includes in its notion distinction. Whence it must be that in God there be real distinction, not indeed according to the absolute thing, which is the essence, in which is highest unity and simplicity, but according to the relative thing.

Reply to the first: According to the Philosopher in the third book of the Physics, that argument holds which says that whatever things are the same to one and the same are the same to each other, in those things which are the same in thing and in reason, as a tunic and a garment; but not in those which differ in reason. Whence, in the same place, he says that although action be the same as motion, and similarly passion, nevertheless it does not follow that action and passion are the same: because in action there is imported the respect as that from which the motion is in the movable; but in passion, as that which is from another. And similarly, although paternity is the same according to the thing with the divine essence, and likewise filiation, nevertheless these two, in their proper notions, import opposed respects. Whence they are distinguished from each other.

Reply to the second: Power and goodness do not import in their notions any opposition. Whence the reason is not similar.

Reply to the third: Although relations, properly speaking, are not generated or proceed from each other, nevertheless they are taken by opposition according to the procession of one from another.

Explication and confirmation of the doctrine of the article.

The conclusion of the article is: In God there is a real distinction, not according to the absolute thing which is the essence, but according to relation; and this is of faith. For, in the chapter Firmiter, "On the Supreme Trinity and the Catholic Faith," it is said: This is the Trinity, one according to the common essence, distinct according to the personal properties; now in the opinion of all, the personal properties are relations.[178] And in the Council of Toledo, in the profession of faith, it is said: "Therefore this holy Trinity, which is one God, neither has number added, nor is taken by numbers; relation alone is attributed to the persons; for the properties by which the persons are numbered are relations; things truly distinct are not substances so that they be numbered by them;" in which sense St. Thomas is wont to speak, that number is taken from the relations themselves; whence Boethius, in the book On the Trinity, near the end, says that substance retains unity, but relation multiplies Trinity.[177]

177. Boethius, De Trinitate.
178. Fourth Lateran Council, cap. Firmiter: De summa Trinitate et fide catholica.
177. Boethius, De Trinitate.

But it must be observed with Cajetan in this article that St. Thomas asked indefinitely whether the relations in God are really distinguished; and in the end he answers that they are really distinguished; that is, some of them are distinguished really: for the respect of spiration from paternity, and filiation, are not said by St. Thomas to be distinguished really one from another, but only the relations opposed by opposition; all, however, are not set one against another.

Nevertheless, in order to prove his conclusion, he assumes into the reasoning this proposition: "When something is attributed to anything, it is necessary that all things which are of the notion of that thing be attributed thereto." But Cajetan objects in this way. Wisdom is attributed to God, of which the notion is to be an accidental form, and yet to God it is not attributed under that notion: therefore, likewise, although relation be attributed to God, it is not necessary that there be attributed to him that which is of the notion of it, namely relative opposition. We respond that to the notion of wisdom there does not belong to be an accidental form, as to the notion of relation there belongs opposition. Which solution is rightly judged the truer: for if we consider wisdom according to its whole formal constitution and analogy, as it is in the creature, we shall find that that of it which is accidental is not of its notion: wherefore, if it be attributed to God, it does not follow that it be attributed as accidental by reason of its notion. But relative opposition by its very notion, since it is relation, is always repugnant to identity with that to which it is opposed: therefore to God relation is attributed, of which there is always the notion of opposition; and it follows that in God there is opposition of relations, not indeed accidental, but according to reason. And the relative opposition, inasmuch as it were, is always relative: therefore it is always opposed to the other extreme. And thus, if we say that in God there is opposition, it is not of relations to something outside himself, but of relations among themselves; because relation in God regards itself, since within himself he produces another person, and thus opposition of relation arises within himself: and therefore the relations, since they are opposed, are distinguished from each other and are really distinct. And let this suffice about the text of the article.

Quomodo mysterium Trinitatis not be thought to be opposed to any principle: "Things which are the same to a third are the same among themselves."

The principle that this is not against the mystery of the Trinity is defended in various ways by the Scholastics.

Caput I - The principle that the mystery of the Trinity is not contrary to reason, variously defended by the Scholastics

Since the mysteries of our faith are above the grasp of natural understanding, nevertheless they are not opposed to natural reason: and thus the Scholastics are accustomed to defend that principle, that "things which are the same to a third are the same among themselves," does not clash with the mystery of the Trinity. For although we see there to be three persons really distinct, who are each the same with the one divine essence by nature, nevertheless it does not follow that the persons are the same among themselves; and in this mystery of the Trinity the persons are really distinct among themselves, while the essence is one and the same; and so the attempts of some to oppose, by reason alone, this mystery by that principle do not succeed, as the Scholastics endeavor to show in diverse ways; and likewise philosophers devoted to piety do not think this principle is opposed to the mystery.

Conclusion

The conclusion of the article is: In God there is a real distinction, not according to the absolute thing, which is most simple, but according to relation (relatio). And this is of faith; for in the chapter Firmiter, De summa Trinitate et fide catholica, it is said: This holy Trinity, according to the common essence (essentia), is undivided; according to the personal properties, it is distinguished; and, in the sentence of all, the personal properties are relations. And in the Council of Toledo XI, in the confession of faith it is said: "This holy Trinity, which is also wholly true God, neither recedes from number nor admits number: for in the relation of the persons the number is discerned; but in the substance of the divinity what is to be numbered is not comprehended: therefore they insinuate number only in this, that they are toward one another; and in this they lack number, that they are within." Therefore Boethius, in the book De Trinitate near the end, says: "Substance contains unity; but relation multiplies the Trinity." Hence also the common axiom of the Theologians, taken from Anselm, as we shall report below in Disputation 147, chapter 4, had its origin: "In the divine things all are one, where the opposition of relation does not stand against it."[179]

It is not to be understood of every relation

But it must be observed with Cajetan in this article, that St. Thomas asked indefinitely whether the relations in God are really distinguished among themselves; and in the end he answered that they are really distinguished, that is, that some of them are really distinguished: for active spiration is not really distinguished from paternity and filiation. And indeed St. Thomas only insinuated a real distinction among the opposed relations; yet not all are opposed among themselves.

Cajetan's objection against the reasoning of the conclusion

Moreover, to prove his conclusion, he assumes in the reasoning this proposition: Whenever something is attributed to anyone, there are attributed all things which belong to the notion of that thing. But Cajetan objects in this way. Wisdom is attributed to God, of which it is of the notion to be an accidental form; and yet it is not attributed to God under this account: therefore likewise, although relation is attributed to God, it is not necessary that that which is of the notion of relation, namely relative opposition, be also attributed. It is answered that it does not belong to the notion of wisdom that it be an accidental form, as it belongs to the notion of relation to have opposition. Which solution, if rightly understood, is best: for if wisdom be considered according to its whole community and analogy, as it encompasses the created and the uncreated, it does not, of its notion, include being a form; wherefore, if it be attributed to God, it does not follow that it must be attributed under that lowly account by which it is an accidental form, but under a higher account.

179. Lateran IV, cap. Firmiter, De summa Trinitate et fide catholica; Council of Toledo XI, Confession of Faith; Boethius, De Trinitate; see also Anselm as cited below in Disputation 147, ch. 4.

But as to relation, however universally it be considered, there is of its very notion relative opposition, that is, that which necessarily always entails opposition; therefore, if relation be attributed to God, relative opposition must necessarily also befit Him.

A second objection of Cajetan

He objects next: To one whiteness there belongs a relation of likeness to another, and yet to it within itself relative opposition does not belong; but to the one there belongs respect toward another outside itself: therefore it is enough if we say that relative opposition befits God, but with respect to another outside Himself. Cajetan answers well that to every relation which has its correlate in another extreme there always belongs relative opposition with respect to the other: but to God, because relation befits Him within Himself, for within Himself He produces another person, relative opposition befits Him within Himself; and therefore some relations intrinsic to Him are mutually opposed and are really distinguished. And so much concerning the text of the article.

Disputatio CXXIII - How the mystery of the Trinity does not conflict with the principle, "Things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves"

Caput I - That this principle is not against the mystery of the Trinity is variously defended by the Scholastics

Since the mysteries of our faith are of such a sort that, although they surpass the grasp of natural understanding, nevertheless they do not conflict with natural consideration, all the Scholastics concede that common and rather hackneyed principle, Things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves, not to be opposed to the mystery of the Trinity. For since we see there are three persons really distinct, which we proved are not distinguished from the essence by the nature of the thing,[180] and so in this mystery of the Trinity the relations and persons are the same with the essence, which nevertheless are not the same among themselves, the Scholastics in various ways attempt to show, by natural reason and by the principles of true philosophy, that this mystery is not contrary.

And first, indeed, Durandus in I, dist. 2, q. 4, easily frees himself from this difficulty, since, as we saw in Disputation 110, chapter ..., conceding that the relations are distinguished really from the essence may rightly stand together with that principle according to his opinion: for thus it would not be true that the three divine persons are the same with one third, namely with the essence. But since that opinion is condemned, as we showed there against Gilbert, that principle cannot be saved in that way.[181]

180. See Disputation 120.
181. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 2, q. 4; cf. the condemnation against Gilbert of Poitiers.

Secondly, Scotus, in I, dist. 2, q. 4, in order to the first principal question, answers thus: since the relations and persons are distinguished from the essence at least formally by the nature of the thing, it cannot be gathered that they are among themselves also formally the same: because they are not formally the same with one third. But if anyone should insist (he says there) and strive to infer that the relations are really the same among themselves, although not formally, because at least they are said to be really the same with the essence, the answer must be given in this way: The divine relations, insofar as they are the same with the divine essence, are not the same in any personality and subsistence, but only in the essence: whence it does not follow that they have among themselves identity of subsistence, but only of essence, in which they are united and with which they are the same: and hence it is only inferred that they are really the same, not absolutely, but only essentially. Therefore he understands that principle in this way: things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves in the same manner in which they are the same with that third, not otherwise.[182]

The same solution to the difficulty at hand is applied by Capreolus in I, dist. 2, q. 3, a. 1, at the end; by Cajetan in this article, if he be read attentively; by the Ferraran in II Contra gentes, cap. 9, at the beginning.[183]

But this exposition of that principle seems useless: for it is just as if we were to say: things which are the same with one third are the same in that third; that is, they are united in that third. But who is ignorant of this? For if we suppose that they are the same with one third, they are without doubt the same with it and in it. But the aforesaid principle signifies something else: for it gathers from this, that some things are the same with one third, that those things are the same among themselves in the same way: that is, if they are formally the same with one third, they are formally the same among themselves; if they are really the same, they are also really the same among themselves. And if that principle were the foundation of syllogistic form, we should not only infer that the two things which are the same with one third are the same inasmuch as they are united in it, but also that they are the same among themselves: because the two extremes which in the premises are compared with one middle, are the same with it; then in the conclusion they are compared among themselves, and are inferred to be the same among themselves.

Thirdly, the same Capreolus in the place cited responds that that principle is to be understood when two are the same with one third adequately; but the divine relations are not the same with the essence adequately, because the essence is something common. But this interpretation does not please me: for if it were true, that principle would have place only in definition and the defined, and in those things that are synonyms; wherefore in created things we should not rightly infer that action and passion are really the same among themselves, because they are really the same with one and the same motion. But if Capreolus posits this principle as the foundation of syllogisms, he ought to admit it not only in those things which are the same adequately with one third, but also in many other cases, as is manifest.

182. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 2, q. 4.
183. Capreolus, In I Sent., dist. 2, q. 3, a. 1; Cajetan, on this article; the Ferraran, In Contra gentiles, II, cap. 9.

Fourthly, St. Thomas, in this article, in the reply to the first, thinks that proposition has place only in synonyms, which are altogether the same in reality and notion with one third; which he judges to be according to the mind of Aristotle: for in Physics, book 3, text 21, he teaches that action and passion differ, even if they are the same with one and the same motion. The Canariensis taught the same with St. Thomas in this article. But against this interpretation, in the first place, is that same Doctor himself, who, in Contra gentiles II, chapter 9, proves that the power of God and His operation are the same according to reality, as they are the same with the essence: yet the operation of God and His power differ in notion and are not synonyms, as is gathered from what has been said in Disputation 118, chapter 4, toward the beginning. The Ferraran, in the same chapter, tries to defend St. Thomas and to vindicate him from contradiction in this way: that certain things are to be understood to be the same with one third, not only when they are synonyms, but also when they are the same with one third according to reality and do not differ from it by a distinction of reason having a foundation in the thing, of which sort, he says, are power and action in God: but if certain things differ from that third according to a distinction of reason that has a foundation in the thing, then, although they are really the same with it, it does not follow that they are the same among themselves in reality and in notion.[184]

Yet I do not see how St. Thomas can thus be reconciled. First, since here he plainly asserts that the proposition is to be understood in synonyms, he openly excluded all those which are not synonyms; and such are power and operation: for that these be distinguished without any foundation in the thing, but only in our mode of knowing, matters little: because nonetheless they are not synonyms. Then too Aristotle, Physics 3, whom St. Thomas alleges in the reply to the first, does not prove by that proposition that action and passion differ in notion among themselves: because they are not the same with one third, namely with the motion, in reality and in notion: he only asserts that there is nothing to prevent action and passion from differing in notion, although they are in reality the same motion. Wherefore, in order that from the identity of two things with some third according to reality there be inferred the identity of those two among themselves according to reality, Aristotle did not say it is necessary that those two be the same with the third in reality and in notion: indeed, one could assert that the identity of two with a third in reality and in notion is necessary, and it would follow that their identity among themselves in reality and in notion; yet, in order that real identity follow, that double identity with the third does not seem necessary in created and natural things which Aristotle alone knew.

Moreover, the true exposition of that proposition, Things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves, is not that it be the principle of syllogisms, nor that it was ever posited by Aristotle as a foundation; rather, in Prior Analytics I, chapter 1, from another principle he deduced the syllogistic form and its force, which he called "to be said of every" and "to be said of none": that is, whatever is predicated of every subject is predicated of anything contained under it; and whatever is denied of every subject is denied of anything contained under it: which propositions are so true and certain, that in any matter whatsoever, even in divine matters, they cannot be false. Whence it is that the syllogistic form, which in the conclusion predicates the greater extreme of the lesser, because the lesser is said of the middle, of which also the greater is predicated, is most certain and so efficacious that it can fail in no matter. To this form, which is universal and of the first figure, all universal forms of the other figures are reduced: there is also reduced the form of the expository syllogism, whose middle is singular: for if, of Peter, for example, animal is predicated, and Peter of some man, therefore also animal is predicated of man. Thus the expository syllogism is formed in the first figure, in which the middle is the subject in the major and the predicate in the minor. And when the syllogism is in another figure, the reasoning is altogether the same: because to this it must be reduced.

184. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 39, a. 1 ad 1 (as commonly cited); Aristotle, Physics, book 3, text 21; St. Thomas, Contra gentiles II, c. 9; Ferrariense, loc. cit.; see also Disputation 118, ch. 4.

Further, it is easily proved that the foundation of syllogisms is not that proposition, things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves: for either it is understood of identity according to reality alone, and thus it would have no place in divine matters; yet the syllogistic form has force everywhere, as we shall say in the following chapter: therefore that foundation cannot be employed. Or it is understood of identity in reality and in notion, such that those which are the same with one third in reality and in notion are the same among themselves in reality and in notion: and thus the syllogistic form could hold only in synonyms, which in reality and in notion are the same with some third. Wherefore this syllogism would not be good: "the rational is risible; man is rational; therefore man is risible": because the two extremes are not in reality and in notion the same with man, but differ in notion; nay, risible differs more than in notion from man, if risibility really differs from man, as the faculty and potency thereof. Many conclusions too can be inferred in legitimate syllogistic form in which the predicate differs from the subject ...[185]

Caput II - The true exposition of the aforesaid proposition is not opposed to the mystery of the Trinity

Let us explain the true sense of the aforesaid proposition and show that it is not opposed to the mystery of the Trinity. Two preliminaries must be made: first, that proposition, Things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves, is not the principle of syllogisms, nor was it ever posited by Aristotle as a foundation; rather, as was said, in Prior Analytics I, chapter 1, from another principle he deduced the syllogistic form and its force, which he called "to be said of every" and "to be said of none": that is, whatever is predicated of every subject is predicated of anything contained under it; and whatever is denied of every subject is denied of anything contained under it; which propositions are so true and certain that in any matter, even in divine things, they cannot be false. Whence it is that the syllogistic form, which in the conclusion predicates the greater extreme of the lesser, because the lesser is said of the middle, of which also the greater is predicated, is most certain and so efficacious that it can fail in no matter. To this form, which is universal and of the first figure, all universal forms of the other figures are reduced: there is also reduced the form of the expository syllogism, whose middle is singular: for if, of Peter, for example, animal is predicated, and Peter of some man, therefore also animal is predicated of man. Thus the expository syllogism is formed in the first figure, in which the middle is the subject in the major and the predicate in the minor. And when the syllogism is in another figure, the reasoning is altogether the same: because to this it must be reduced.

185. Aristotle, Prior Analytics I, c. 1; on expository syllogisms and reduction of figures; the example "the rational is risible..." is standard in the logical schools.

Further, it is easily proved that the foundation of syllogisms is not that proposition, things which are the same with one third are the same among themselves: for either it is understood of identity according to reality alone, and thus it would have no place in divine matters; yet the syllogistic form has force everywhere, as we shall say in the following chapter: therefore that foundation cannot be employed. Or it is understood of identity in reality and in notion, such that those which are the same with one third in reality and in notion are the same among themselves in reality and in notion: and thus the syllogistic form could hold only in synonyms, which in reality and in notion are the same with some third. Wherefore this syllogism would not be good: "the rational is risible; man is rational; therefore man is risible": because the two extremes are not in reality and in notion the same with man, but differ in notion; nay, risible differs more than in notion from man, if risibility really differs from man, as the faculty and potency thereof. Many conclusions too can be inferred in legitimate syllogistic form in which the predicate differs from the subject ...

Proposition: That proposition is true and is in some way a principle of syllogisms.

Nevertheless this principle is most true, and it can be the foundation of syllogisms in this sense: Those things which are the same to a third by predication are the same among themselves also by predication; that is, those things which are said of some third are said reciprocally of themselves, as we see in the expository syllogism. But that principle, understood in this way, is reduced to, or rather is the same as, the dictum de omni and the dictum de nullo, as was explained above by us; and in this sense the proposition is not understood of identity with some third according to the thing (secundum rem), or according to reason (secundum rationem), or in both ways; because it happens that one thing is predicated of another which is distinguished from it in reality, or at least by reason - as risible is of man, which differs from him really; and animal also of man, which is at least distinguished from him by reason. From this principle, however, nothing absurd follows in the mystery of the Trinity, as will be established in the following chapter; for there the syllogistic form obtains, with all the rules assigned by the logicians preserved, and nothing absurd can be inferred. Only that principle, understood of the real identity of the relations with the essence, makes difficulty against this mystery; in which way, to be sure, they are not the same among themselves according to reality.

A further note prior to explaining the difficulty.

Next it must be noted that there is a certain principle familiar to the mathematicians, namely: Things which are equal to one and the same third are equal among themselves; which is universally most true, but it holds its place only in quantitative things: and accordingly, nothing can be inferred from it against the mystery of the Trinity.

A true unfolding of the difficulty proposed, in divine matters.

I answer, therefore, to the difficulty proposed, that the proposition, Those things which are the same to one and the same third according to the thing are the same among themselves according to the thing, is not universally true, not because it is sometimes false in created things - for the contrary can indeed occur - but because it does not universally exclude that some things be the same in reality with one third and differ really among themselves, as faith teaches in the mystery of the Trinity. We say, therefore, that although it is repugnant in finite and created things that some two be the same with a third according to the thing and differ really among themselves, nevertheless this is not repugnant in an infinite being, namely God, to wit, that there be at once one essence (essentia), and that the relations (relationes) are not distinguished from it by the nature of the thing, but are joined with the essence in supreme simplicity; and nonetheless that among themselves they really differ. But this is peculiar in God, which neither Aristotle nor any other philosopher instructed only by natural light could know: and therefore among the commonplaces of arguments Aristotle enumerated this one in Topics VII, chapter 1, place 4, as we recalled above, which he could understand, first of identity according to the thing, second of identity according to reason, third of identity according to predication; and in the first way alone it has place in created things; but in the second and third in all things, even in God, as is manifest. From which it is clear that nothing can be deduced from that principle against the real distinction of the relations among themselves, together with that highest identity which they have with the essence.

Others understand the aforesaid proposition in another way, namely, that those things are said to be the same among themselves really which are the same to one and the same third really and adequately, not however inadequately; but this comes to the same thing, because only in divine things is it found that some things are the same in reality to one and the same third inadequately, and therefore are not the same among themselves.

Caput III - That the syllogistic form, as assigned by the logicians, is no less legitimate in divine things than in human

Against the same mystery of the Trinity the difficulty of the syllogistic form also seems to fight in this manner, from the syllogistic form:

This divine essence is the Father; this divine essence is the Son; therefore the Son is the Father, in divine things.

To this syllogism also, as to the aforesaid principle, theologians variously respond.

Response of St. Thomas.

First, St. Thomas says in On the Power of God, q. 2, that the major and minor proposition are true only if the divine essence is taken absolutely in itself, and, he says, they are only true if the divine essence is taken as contracted and modified by the relation: but in this way one or the other of the premises will be false, if in each the essence be taken modified by the same relation, namely by paternity or by filiation, as is manifest: or, if it be modified by a different relation, the form of arguing will not be legitimate, because the middle will not be the same in each, as is evident. Yet I do not see why the divine essence, speaking absolutely, as it is common to the three, cannot be predicated of any person, since each is one most simple nature and a common essence.

Scotus's solution.

Second, Scotus replies in the first book, distinction 2, question 4, after the solution of the first argument, that just as in created things that which is common is a what-sort (quale quid), but the individual is a this-something (hoc aliquid), so also in God the divine essence, since it is common, is a what-sort, but the person, which is individual, is a this-something: wherefore in the proposed syllogism what is a what-sort is assumed as the middle, namely the divine essence, from which the identity of the supposit (suppositum) cannot be inferred in the conclusion between the Father and the Son, but only identity in essence, which is assumed as the middle. Scotus plainly alludes to that solution which we reported in the first chapter, so that he might answer the difficulty proposed there, which is similar: which solution could indeed be refuted here in the same way: but since now the point at issue is the syllogistic form, against Scotus we can argue thus. Either that syllogistic form is good or bad: if good, then the conclusion follows rightly, the antecedent is true, therefore so is the conclusion. But that conclusion cannot be true if we grant that the Father and the Son really differ, and are opposed to one another. If, however, that syllogistic form is not good, it is necessary, according to the laws of syllogisms, to assign some defect: for Scotus showed no defect in the form.

The first defect of the syllogism, which deals with individuals in divine things.

I indeed detect two manifest defects in this syllogism. One is that the premises are taken in the so-called identical sense, not in the formal. For as we showed in Disputation 119, chapter 2, and Disputation 121, chapter 2, essence is not predicated of relation, nor conversely, in the formal sense: but thus the syllogism seems to proceed in four terms: for it is as if you were to say, The divine essence is the same as the Father; the divine essence is the same as the Son; therefore the Son is the same as the Father; whereas what ought to be inferred is, Therefore the same who is the Son is the same as the Father; for thus the extremes of the major and the minor are preserved in the conclusion, which is a necessary law of syllogisms. But when it is inferred, Therefore the Son is the Father, which is the same as to say, Therefore the Son is the same as the Father, a new term is added in the conclusion, since its subject, which is the Son alone, was not only in the minor extreme - for the minor extreme was, The same as the Son - but, the extreme having been changed into the Son, a new term is added, and thus there are four terms in the syllogism. This defect, however, is removed by putting in the place of the middle, not the divine essence, but deity in the abstract; for thus the aforesaid defect is not removed: but by putting the concrete of deity, namely God, in this way: God is the Father; God is the Son; therefore the Son is the Father. In this manner the propositions, both the premises and the conclusion, are taken in the formal sense, and thus the aforesaid defect is not present.

The second defect of the aforesaid syllogism, noted by Marsilius.

But this syllogism has another manifest defect, which Marsilius very well noted on the first book, question 6, article 3, to the fourth objection: because since it is expository, whose nature is that it have a singular term for the middle, it has a common term, namely God; which defect was also present in the former syllogism, when the essence in the abstract was the middle. The term, God, is common not by abstraction and through the intellect, as is the concept of a genus or a species or another universal, but by community according to the thing: because one and the same in number essence and the same God is common to three persons: wherefore although each of them is predicated of it, it does not follow that they are predicated of each other: because the middle is not altogether singular. To this also seems to look what the Canariensis says, namely that the aforesaid syllogism is therefore not legitimate, because it has an undistributed middle, which is indeed a manifest defect, whenever a term is not altogether singular and can be distributed by reason of the community which it has. Although the divine essence, or God, is a singular term according to itself, that is, not universal, and therefore cannot be distributed in that respect; nevertheless, because it is common to the three persons according to the thing, on the part of them it can in a certain manner be distributed: as if one were to say, God, as He is in the three persons, is Father; God, as He is in the three, is Son: therefore the Son is Father: then, however, the premises are false: because God is Father only insofar as He is the divine essence contracted by paternity, not by the other properties.

Marsilius's addition and its refutation.

Marsilius nevertheless adds that an expository syllogism can be made in this way: This God is the Father; this God is the Son; therefore the Son is the Father: and then the form is legitimate; but that not both premises are true, because either This God points out the Father, or it points out the Son (for it cannot point out both, because there would not be one middle); and thus both cannot be true; wherefore neither will the conclusion be true.

Moreover, as we shall say in Disputation 156, chapter 4, even if the pronoun This be added to the term God, it does not thereby become altogether singular, but community will still remain; This does not point out a person, but the essence, as we shall show there; and even with the addition of the pronoun, it is not a term suitable for a syllogism, in the same way as if some name were added; of this in its own place.

From this it follows that this syllogism is not good: This essence is God; the Father is not the Son; therefore the Son is not God. For the defect is manifest, because the term God, which is common, as we were saying above, by reason of the persons which it connotes, is undistributed in the major, whereas in the negative conclusion it is distributed (which distribution in the first figure follows upon a negative), therefore it is not a legitimate form of arguing, on account of this defect from the side of the major extreme; as is plainly shown by the examples.

From these things it is gathered that the syllogistic form in no way is opposed to the mystery of the Trinity according to the rules of logic; and hence nothing absurd can be deduced against our faith from the syllogistic form. If at any time certain theologians ill-advisedly admit the syllogistic form in such a way that, in divine matters, it should have force only in created things, but in divine things there should be another ratio: they are ill-expounding; for one and the same form, necessary in itself, holds in whatever matter human reason deals with. For if it is legitimate in human matters, and the same is observed in divine matters, it cannot but be legitimate; and if the same were not legitimate in divine matters, nothing absurd would everywhere follow against the rules of logic from what we have said. And thus these things suffice for what pertains to the doctrine of this article, in which some disputations were treated that pertained to question 39, article 4, and we shall pursue the same principles more fully below.

Articulus IV - Whether in God there are only four real relations, namely paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession

Objicitur quarto sic proceditur. It seems that in God there are not only four real relations, namely paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession. For there are to be considered in God the relations of the understanding to the thing understood, and of willing to the thing willed; which seem to be real relations, nor are they contained under the aforesaid. Therefore there are not only four relations in God.

1. Moreover: Real relations are taken in God according to the procession of the intelligible or of the willed; but intelligible relations are multiplied to infinity, as Avicenna says. Therefore in God there are infinite real relations.
2. Moreover: Ideas are in God from eternity, as was said above; nor, however, are they distinguished among themselves except according to a respect to things, as was said above: therefore in God there are many more eternal relations.
3. Moreover: Equality, similarity, and identity are certain relations, and they are in God from eternity. Therefore there are more relations from eternity in God than the four which were said.

But on the contrary: It seems there are fewer: for according to the Philosopher in Physics III, the way is the same from Athens to Thebes and from Thebes to Athens; therefore it seems by equal reason that the same be the relation from the Father to the Son, which is called paternity, and from the Son to the Father, which is called filiation. And thus there are not four relations in God.

I answer: It must be said that, according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics V, every relation is founded either upon quantity - as double and half - or upon action and passion - as the maker and the made, father and son, lord and servant, and the like. But since quantity is not in God (for He is great without quantity, as St. Augustine says), it remains therefore that relation in God cannot be except...[186]

186. St. Thomas, De potentia q. 2; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 6, a. 3 ad 4; Canariensis, loc. cit.; Avicenna as cited on the multiplication of intelligible relations; Aristotle, Topics VII, c. 1, locus 4; Metaphysics V; Physics III; see also Disputationes 119, c. 2; 121, c. 2; and 156, c. 4.

Hither, even if one add the pronoun "This" to the term "God," it does not become altogether singular, but will still remain common: because "This" does not point out the person, but the essence, as we will show in that place; and thus, even with the pronoun added, it is not a term suitable for a syllogism, in the same way as if it were not added. But of this more fully in that place.

Hence it follows that this syllogism is not good: "The Father is God; the Father is not the Son; therefore the Son is not God." For the defect is manifest, because the term "God," which is common, as we said above, by reason of the persons which it connotes, is in the conclusion affected by a negation, which has the force of distributing; whereas in the premises it was not so affected. Now it is a manifest defect whenever one argues from a term not negated to a term negated: it is, as it were, to argue from an undistributed to a distributed term; and therefore a minor negative in the first figure is not a legitimate form of arguing on account of this kind of defect on the part of the major extreme, which in the major premise is not affected by negation, and accordingly is not distributed; whereas in the conclusion it is affected, and accordingly is distributed, as is evident from examples.

From which it is gathered that syllogistic form in no wise opposes the mystery of the Trinity; and with it preserved, according to the rules of logic, nothing absurd can be deduced against our faith. Wherefore certain Theologians act amiss who so admit syllogistic form as to have force only in created things, but in divine things to play with our faith: for these men expose our faith to mockery, when they restrict to human matters the necessary form which has place in any material subject. For if in human matters it is legitimate, and the same is preserved in divine matters, it cannot but be legitimate; but if the same is not preserved in divine matters, nothing absurd against the rules of logic follows therefrom. And let these remarks suffice concerning the doctrine of Article 3, in which also some things were disputed that pertained to Question 39, Article 4, lest we be compelled to repeat the same principles too often.

Whether in God there are only four real relations, namely paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession

To the fourth, thus one proceeds. It seems that in God there are not only four real relations, namely paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession. For it is also fitting to posit in God the relations of the knower to the known and of the willer to the willed; which seem to be real relations and are not contained under the aforesaid. Therefore there are not only four relations in God.

1. Further, real relations are taken in God according to the procession of the intelligible word. But intelligible relations are multiplied to infinity, as Avicenna says. Therefore there are in God infinite real relations.
2. Further, ideas are in God from eternity, as was said above, nor are they distinguished among themselves except according to a respect to things, as was said above. Therefore in God there are many more eternal relations.

3. Further, equality, likeness, and identity are certain relations, and they are in God from eternity. Therefore there are more relations from eternity in God than those that were said.

But on the contrary, it seems that they are fewer: because, according to the Philosopher in Physics III, the same way is from Athens to Thebes and from Thebes to Athens. Therefore it seems that by a like reason the same is the relation from the Father to the Son, which is called paternity, and from the Son to the Father, which is called filiation. And thus there are not four relations in God.[187]

I answer: It must be said that, according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics, every relation (relatio) is founded either upon quantity - as double and half - or upon action and passion - as the maker and the made, father and son, lord and servant, and the like. But since quantity is not in God (for He is great without quantity, as St. Augustine says), it remains therefore that real relation in God cannot be except founded upon an end and upon action; not, however, upon actions according to which something proceeds from God extrinsically, because the relations of God to creatures are not really in Him, as was said above. Whence it remains that real relations in God cannot be taken except according to actions according to which there is a procession in God, not outwardly but inwardly. Now processions of this kind are two only, as was said above. Of which one is chiefly taken according to the action of the intellect (intellectus), which is the procession of the word (verbum); the other according to the action of the will (voluntas), which is the procession of love. But according to each procession it is necessary to take two opposite relations, of which one is of the proceeding from a principle, and the other is of the very principle. Now the procession of the word is called generation according to its proper notion, which befits living things: but the relation of the principle of generation among perfect living things is called paternity; while the relation of the one proceeding from the principle is called filiation. But the procession of love does not have a proper name, as was said above. Whence neither do the relations which are taken according to it. But the relation of the principle of this procession is called spiration; the relation, however, of the one proceeding, procession: although these two names pertain to the very processions or origins, and not to the relations themselves.[188]

Reply to the first: In those in which the intellect and the intelligible differ, and the willer and the willed, there can be a real relation of knowledge to the thing known, and of the willer to the thing willed. But in God the intellect and the intelligible are altogether the same: for by understanding Himself He understands all other things, and by the same ratio the will and the willed. Whence in God relations of this kind are not real, just as neither is there a relation of the same to the same. Yet, however, the relation to the Word is real: because the Word is understood as proceeding by an intelligible action, not, however, as a thing understood. For when we understand a stone, that which the intellect conceives from the thing understood is called "word."

187. Li.g. Phys., in 3. Physicae, text. 21, tom. 2.
188. Li.g. Metaph., 10. com. 3; Aug., l. 1 De Trinit.; Q. 13, a. 7; Q. 27, a. 3; Q. 27, a. 4.

Reply to the second: In us, intelligible relations are multiplied to infinity, because by one act a man understands a stone, and by another act he understands himself to understand a stone, and by another also he understands that he understands this, and so on infinitely the acts of understanding are multiplied, and consequently the relations understood. But this does not have place in God, because by one act only He understands all things.

Reply to the third: Ideal respects are understood in God. Whence from their plurality it does not follow that there are more relations in God, but that God knows more relations.

Reply to the fourth: Equality and likeness in God are not real relations, but only of reason, as will be plain below.

Reply to the fifth: The way is the same from one term to another, and conversely; yet the respects are diverse. Whence from this it cannot be concluded that the relation of the Father to the Son is the same, and conversely. But this could be concluded of something absolute, if there were a mean between them.

Dubitation concerning the text of the article.

The conclusion is: In God there are only four real relations, paternity, filiation, spiration, and procession: but the latter two are signified by the name of origin on account of paucity of words, although by our reason they are distinguished from the origins, as we shall say in Disputation 159. The conclusion indeed is certain among all, and is gathered manifestly from the preceding. For if in God there are only two processions, one by the intellect, the other by the will, and relations are taken according to the origins, they will not be able to be more than four. But for the explanation of the conclusion, observe that one must not therefore say there are four real relations because they are really distinguished among themselves: for it is evident that active spiration is not really distinguished from paternity and filiation, as is gathered from the doctrine of Disputation 120; but they are called real only because by their very nature they refer to a real term, not by the intellect. Whence it is not lawful to infer: there are four real relations in God; therefore four things. For when we say "four things," we denote a mutual distinction of one from another; but when we say "four real relations," we do not signify this, but a respect to a real term by their very nature, not by the intellect. From which it is plain how it is not rightly inferred, from the multiplication of an inferior, the multiplication of a superior, when the appellation is varied (as the Logicians say), as we noted in Disputation 122, cap. 6, at the end.

But Cajetan doubts touching the reason of St. Thomas, why he did not enumerate every genus of relation, that he might gather what genus of relation is in God. For he only made mention of the first genus, namely, identity, which is founded upon unity of quantity according to the thing, whereas there is also a relation of likeness in quantity according to mode.

Cajetan answers that St. Thomas summarily enumerated the genera of relations, nor did he make mention of the relation that is founded upon quantity according to mode, because he was about to make mention of that kind in the solution of the fourth article and expressly below in Question 42, Article 4, where we also expressly will dispute whether in God it is real or only of reason. There also we will say why the relations of distinction and of identity are not real in God.

Further it is to be noted that the holy Doctor did not make mention of the relations of the third genus in order to prove which relations are real in God: because relations of this genus are only by extrinsic denomination, and are of reason. For of these Aristotle says: "Measurable and intelligible are said inasmuch as something else is referred to them according to the thing, whereas they themselves are referred to another only according to the name": by which words he signified that those which are of the third genus are referred to another only by name from the fact that something else is referred to them according to the thing.[189]

It will yet be doubted by someone whether in God there is a real relation of the intellect to the thing understood, since Aristotle said that "the intelligible is by its very name referred to the intellect, because the intellect by its nature is referred to it."

I answer: This relation is not real in God - first indeed, not to His own essence as understood, because from it the intellect is not distinguished; nor to a creature understood, because to no creature is God in any way really referred, as we proved in Disputation 104, cap. 6. The only real relation is of the Father to the Son and to His Word, not as to the intellect alone, but also as to a product and at the same time to the intellect by intellection - and this is paternity, one relation out of the four enumerated.

Quaestio XXIX - On the persons

The foregoing having been premised, those things which seemed necessary to be previously known about processions and relations, it is necessary to proceed to the persons.

And first according to an absolute consideration, and then according to a comparative consideration. But absolutely about persons one ought first to consider in common, then about the individual persons.

To the common consideration of the persons four things seem to pertain: first, indeed, the signification of this name "person"; second, the number of the persons; third, those things which follow the number of the persons or are opposed to it, as diversity and likeness and the like; fourth, those things which pertain to the knowledge of the persons.

Concerning the first, four things are asked.

Articulus I - Whether the following is a fitting definition of person, namely: "Person is an individual substance of a rational nature"

Objection 1. It seems that the definition of person which Boethius assigns in the book On the two natures is unfitting, namely, "Person is an individual substance of a rational nature." For no singular is defined. But "person" signifies a certain singular. Therefore "person" is unfittingly defined.[190]

189. Arist., f. Met., ca. 15: "Mensurabile, et sensibilis, et intelligibile eo quod aliud ad illud dicitur."
190. Boethius, De duabus naturis.

Objection 2. Further, "substance" (as it is posited in the definition of person) is taken either for first substance, or for second substance. If for first substance, "individual" is added superfluously, because first substance is individual substance. But if it is taken for second substance, a falsehood is added and there is also opposition in the addition. For second substances are called genera and species. Therefore the definition is bad and inaptly assigned.

Objection 3. Further, a name of second intention ought not to be posited in the definition of a thing. For it is not a good assignment if someone were to say "man is a species of animal." For the name of species is a name of intention. But "individual" is a name of intention. Therefore "person" is unfittingly defined.

Objection 4. Further, "nature is the principle of motion and rest in that in which it is primarily and per se, and not according to an accident," as is taught in Physics II. But "person" is among immovables, as in God and in Angels. Therefore the name of "nature" ought not to be posited in the definition of person, but rather of "essence."[191]

Objection 5. Further, the separated soul is an individual substance of a rational nature, and yet it is not a person. Therefore "person" is unfittingly defined.

I answer: One must say that although the universal and the particular are found in all the genera, nevertheless in a special mode the individual is found in the genus of substance (substantia). For substance is individuated by itself; but accidents are individuated by their subject, which is substance. For this whiteness is said to be such insofar as it is in this subject. Whence also it is fitting that individual substances have a certain special name before the others. For substances are called "hypostases" or "persons." But yet in a somewhat more special and more perfect mode, the particular and individuation are found in rational substances, which have dominion of their act; for they are not only acted upon, as others are, but act of themselves; now actions are in singulars. And therefore also among the rest of substances the singulars of a rational nature have a certain special name; and this name is "person." And therefore in the aforesaid definition of person is posited "substance, individual," insofar as it signifies a singular in the genus of substance; but "of a rational nature" is added insofar as it signifies a singular in rational substances.

Reply to the first: Although this singular or that cannot be defined, nevertheless that which pertains to the common notion of singularity can be defined. And thus the Philosopher defined first substance; and in this way Boethius defines "person."

Reply to the second: In a certain way, "substance" is posited in the definition of person for first substance, which is hypostasis; nor, however, is "individual" added superfluously, because by the name "hypostasis" or "first substance" the notion of the universal is excluded, and also of the part: for we do not say that "common man" is a hypostasis, nor yet that a "hand" is a person. But by the fact that "individual" is added, the notion of "assumptibility" is excluded: for human nature in Christ is not a person, because it is assumed by a more dignified [supposit], namely, by the Word of 191. Lib. 2 Phys., c. 1.

God. But it is better to say that "substance" is taken commonly in the definition - according to which it is divided into first and second - and by the fact that "individual" is added, it is drawn to the first; and in this mode Boethius defines "person."

Reply to the third: Although "individual" signifies an intention, nevertheless it is not posited in the definition of person as a part of the thing defined from the side of genus or species, but in order to express that incommunicability which belongs to the signification of "person."

Reply to the fourth: The name "nature" in the definition of person is taken for "essence" (essentia). And although "person" in God and in the Angels is among immovables, nevertheless "nature" is fittingly said there according to the more common signification which imports essence.

Reply to the fifth: The separated soul is indeed an individual substance of a rational nature; yet it is not a person, because it is a part of human nature. For "person" requires an individual subsistence in a complete rational nature.

Objicitur 1: No singular is defined. But "person" signifies a certain singular. Therefore "person" is inappropriately defined.

Objicitur 2: Furthermore, "substance" (as it is placed in the definition of person) is taken either for first substance or for second substance. If for first substance, "individual" is added superfluously, because first substance is individual substance; but if it stands for second substance, it is added falsely and there is a contradiction in the adjunct. For second substances are called genera or species. Therefore the definition is badly assigned.

Objicitur 3: Furthermore, a name of an intention ought not to be placed in the definition of a thing. For the assignment would not be good if someone were to say: "Man is a species of animal." For "man" is the name of a thing, and "species" is the name of an intention. Since, therefore, "person" is the name of a thing - for it signifies a certain substance of a rational nature - "individual" (which is the name of an intention) is inappropriately placed in its definition.

Objicitur 4: Furthermore, nature is the principle of motion and rest in that which is per se and not per accidens, as is said in the second book of the Physics. But "person" is in immovable realities, as in God and in the Angels. Therefore in the definition of person "nature" ought not to have been placed, but rather "essence" (essentia).

Objicitur 5: Furthermore, the separated soul is an individual substance of a rational nature; yet it is not a person. Therefore "person" is inappropriately thus defined.

Respondeo: I answer that, although the universal and the particular are found in all genera, nevertheless the individual is found in a certain special way in the genus of substance. For substance is individuated through itself, but accidents are individuated through a subject, which is said "this whiteness" insofar as it is in this subject. Whence also individual substances fittingly have some special name above others; for they are called hypostases or first substances. But in a certain more special and more perfect mode, the particular and the individual are found in rational substances, which have dominion of their acts, and are not only acted upon like others, but act through themselves; actions, moreover, are in singulars. And therefore, even among other substances, singulars of rational nature also have a certain special name, and this name is "person." And therefore in the aforesaid definition, "individual substance" is placed for person, insofar as it signifies a singular in the genus of substance; but "of a rational nature" is added insofar as it signifies a singular among rational substances.

Ad primum: Reply to the first: Although this singular or that cannot be defined, nevertheless that which pertains to the common notion of singularity can be defined. And thus the Philosopher defines first substance, and in this way Boethius defines person

Ad secundum: Reply to the second: According to some, "substance" in the definition of person is placed for first substance, which is hypostasis; nor is "individual" added superfluously, because by the name of hypostasis or first substance the notion of the universal and of the part is excluded. For we do not say that common "man" is a hypostasis, nor hand, since it is a part. But by this, that "individual" is added, the notion of assumptibility is excluded from person. For human nature in Christ is not a person, because it is assumed by a more dignified one, namely by the Word of God. But it is better to say that "substance" is taken commonly, as divided by first and second; and by this, that "individual" is added, it is drawn to stand for first substance

Ad tertium: Reply to the third: Because substantial differences are not known, or even, if they are known, are not named, at times it is necessary to use accidental differences in place of substantial ones; for example, if someone were to say: "Fire is a simple body, hot and dry." For proper accidents are effects of substantial forms and manifest them. And in like manner, names of intentions can be taken for defining things, insofar as they are taken for some names of things which are not set down. And thus this name "individual" is placed in the definition of person to designate the mode of subsisting which befits particular substances

Ad quartum: Reply to the fourth: According to the Philosopher in the fifth book of the Metaphysics, the name "nature" was first imposed to signify the generation of living things, which is called "nativity." And because this kind of generation is from an intrinsic principle, this name has been extended to signify the intrinsic principle of any motion whatever; and thus nature is defined in the second book of the Physics. And because this sort of principle is formal or material, commonly both matter and form are called "nature." And because by form the essence (essentia) of each thing is completed, commonly the essence of each thing, which its definition signifies, is called "nature." And thus "nature" is taken here. Whence Boethius, in the same book De duabus naturis at the beginning of the book, says that nature is each thing informing by a specific difference; for the specific difference is that which completes the definition and is taken from the proper form of the thing. And therefore it was more fitting that, in the definition of person - which is the singular of some determinate genus - he should use the name "nature" rather than "essence," which is taken from existence (esse), which is most common

Ad quintum: Reply to the fifth: The soul is a part of the human species. And therefore, although it be separated, yet because it retains the nature of unibility, it cannot be said to be an individual substance, which is a hypostasis or first substance, just as neither hand nor any other of the parts of man is. And thus neither the definition of person nor the name befits it

Explanation of the article and of the definition of person.

St. Thomas in this article proves Boethius's definition in the book De duabus naturis, page 3: "Person is an individual substance of a rational nature." By the name "substance" Boethius understands what others call "subsistence"; by "individual" he denotes what others call "incommunicable": accordingly, by that name he understands a complete individual, which is neither a part, nor can it be communicated to another as a supposit. This the Greeks signify by the word hypostasis (ὑπόστασις), concerning which we shall dispute in the following article. The addition in the definition, "of a rational nature," is because an individual substance of an irrational nature is called only a hypostasis or supposit, not a person. And since here we are not to discuss the human person, namely by what it is rendered incommunicable (for we shall dispute of this in the Third Part, question 4, article 2), let it suffice for now to note universally what a person is; yet it should be observed in passing that the Greek Fathers distinguish person from nature as singular from common, for no other reason than that person is an individual which can no further be communicated.

Scotus rejects this definition in the First Book, distinction 23, question 1, section 5; his attack is that from it there would follow that the rational soul is a person (which no one has hitherto said), for it is "individual," that is, a singular substance of rational nature. But Scotus's objection is trifling, because by the name "individual" there is not signified "singular," but "incommunicable," as we have already explained. Thus also understood Otto, Bishop of Freising, in the first book De gestis Frederici, chapter 5, of whom we made mention in disputation 120, chapter 1; for he says in these words: "For we are not wont to call 'individual substance' a singular thing which can, together with another, again and again be re-singularized so as to concur to constitute some whole; such a thing is not a person." From which he himself infers that the rational soul is not a person. Therefore the Canarian [author] marks wrongly this article as if Scotus had said that the rational soul is a person, whereas he expressly denied it, indeed deducing it as absurd against Boethius's definition. Yet the Canarian seems to have been deceived by these words of Cajetan in the commentary on this article, around the solution to the fifth reply, namely: "From this you have, that from this definition the separated soul is not a person, as Scotus wanted in I, dist. 23," not penetrating what "first substance" imports; by which indeed he does not reprehend Scotus for having asserted that the separated soul is a person. For Cajetan himself had read Scotus well, but he thought that from Boethius's definition there followed that the rational soul is a person - which no one has hitherto taught.

Richard of St. Victor also attacks the aforesaid definition of Boethius, book 4 De Trinitate, chapter 21, because it seems to fit others than the person. For the divine nature is an individual substance of rational nature, and yet it is not a person; wherefore he himself, chapter 22, hands down the definition of the divine person in this way: "The divine nature is incommunicable existence"; and he uses the name "incommunicable" to show that person not only ought to be singular and not capable of being distributed into many natures, but also cannot be common to several persons. Wherefore, chapter 23, he concludes that Boethius's definition can also be proved, if "individual substance" be said in the sense that it can be distributed neither into many natures nor into many persons, that is, which is common neither to several natures nor to several persons; in which sense the name "individual" is truly taken by Boethius, as we noted above. What Richard understands by that name "existence" will be explained below in disputation 126, chapter 2.

There is also another definition of any person, even created, which is gathered from Richard in the same book 4, chapter 23, in this way: "Rational nature with incommunicable existence." This indeed was used by John, the Theologian of the Latin Church, in the Council of Florence, session 19, after the middle; and Scotus greatly commends this and prefers it to the definition which Boethius assigned, because by the word "incommunicable" the rational soul is excluded, and any part which, together with another, composes a whole, is also excluded; likewise the singular nature of humanity, as that of Christ, is excluded, which, since it lacks the complement of its supposit - that is, that mode of existing per se - is communicated to another person, namely to the Word of God, which is not said to have assumed a person, but a nature, though it assumed it individual, that is, singular.

Yet there is a difficulty, whether any part of some whole, separated - e.g., a severed hand - is a person, or at least a supposit. The reason for doubting is that St. Thomas, in the reply to the fifth objection, teaches that a hand or a part of a substance is not first substance; whence it seems to follow that it is not a supposit; for first substance and hypostasis, or supposit, are the same. The Canarian in the commentary on this article answers that a hand and parts even when cut off are not supposits; into which view he has been led by St. Thomas's words alone in that reply. I, however, would understand him to speak of integral parts which are either actually in the whole supposit - as of the hand joined - or even of separated [parts] which by their nature can be communicated, such as essential parts, namely matter and soul; for these are not "individuals," that is, incommunicable, as has been explained. But of integral parts divided and cut off from the whole, as of the hand, I think otherwise, namely, that they are supposits, not persons: supposits indeed, because they are so per se that by their nature under that form and existence which they have they cannot be communicated to another; but not persons, because they are not of a rational nature.

Finally observe that these three names - individual, supposit, person - are to be compared with one another as inferior and superior. Of these, "individual" is common, for it is said both of accidents and of substances, unless by the name "individual" we understand "incommunicable," as Boethius truly understood. Next, "supposit" is broader than "person," because it is said also of things devoid of reason. From which it is also gathered whether three individuals can be conceded in God, as we said above in disputation 122, chapter 3; and in the end, whether there are three "things": namely, if "individual" be taken as Boethius takes it, for "incommunicable," without doubt it can and ought to be conceded that there are in God three individuals; and similarly if there be added "substance of a rational nature." Since it is the definition of person, as there are three persons, there ought to be conceded three individual substances of a rational nature. But since now commonly the name...

Also excluded is the singular nature of humanity, such as that of Christ, which, with the complement of its supposit, namely existing per se, is communicated to the person, that is, to the Word of God, which did not assume a person but a nature - an individual, that is, a singular.

A small difficulty is whether any part separated from the whole, as a cut-off hand, is thus a supposit; or at least a suppositum. The reason of doubting is that St. Thomas in the solution teaches that the hand, or a part, is not first substance; and therefore it seems not to be a supposit; for substance and hypostasis, that is, suppositum, are the same. The Canariensis, in the solution of this article, answers that the hand and cut-off parts are not supposita; he was led to this by the very words of St. Thomas in that solution. Yet I would distinguish about integral parts, as they are in act in the whole supposit while joined, or even when separated. As to essential parts - namely matter and form - because these are not individual nor communicable, as has been explained, they are excluded. But as to integral parts divided and removed from the whole, as a hand, I judge otherwise: that they are supposita - not indeed persons, because they are thus per se, with a nature under that form and existence, such that they can be communicated to another; but not persons, because they are not of rational nature.

Note these three names: individual (individuum), supposit (suppositum), person (persona). They can be compared, as above. Of these, individual is the most common: it is said both of accidents and of substances, unless by the name "individual" we understand "incommunicable," as Boethius remarks. Next, supposit is more general than person, because it is said of things lacking reason. From which it is gathered whether in God there can be conceded three individuals, as we said above in disputation 122, chapter 3; and in the end, whether there are three "things": namely, if "individual" be taken as Boethius takes it, for "incommunicable," without doubt it can and ought to be conceded that there are in God three individuals; and similarly if there be added "substance of a rational nature." Since it is the definition of person, as there are three persons, there ought to be conceded three individual substances of a rational nature. But since now commonly by the name "individual" we do not signify "incommunicable," but a singular of a nature, without absolute explanation it ought not be said "three individuals" in God.[194]

Articulus II - Whether "person" is the same as hypostasis, subsistence, and essence Objicitur. It seems that person is the same as hypostasis, subsistence, and essence.

1) For Boethius says in the book On the Two Natures, that the Greeks called the individual substance of a rational nature by the name "hypostasis." But this is also what among us the name "person" signifies. Therefore person is altogether the same as hypostasis.[195]

194. Aristotle, Physics II; Metaphysics V. Boethius, De duabus naturis (beginning). See also Otto of Freising, De gestis Frederici I, c. 5; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate IV, 21 - 23; Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, s. 5; Council of Florence, session 19.

2) Further, as in the divine things we say three persons, so in the divine things we say three subsistences. Which would not be, unless person and subsistence signified the same. Therefore person and subsistence signify the same.

3) Further, Boethius says in the Commentary on the Predicaments, that ousia (which is the same as essence) signifies the composite of matter and form. But that which is composed of matter and form is an individual of substance, which is also called hypostasis and person. Therefore all the aforesaid names seem to signify the same.[196]

But on the contrary: Boethius says in the book On the Two Natures that genera and species only subsist, whereas individuals not only subsist but also are substances. But from subsisting they are called subsistences, as from "standing under" they are called substances or hypostases. Since therefore to be hypostases or persons does not belong to genera and species, hypostases or persons are not the same as subsistences.[195]

I answer: It must be said that according to the Philosopher in Metaphysics V, substance is said in two ways. In one way, substance is said to be the quiddity of a thing, which the definition signifies, whence we say that the definition signifies the substance of the thing. This substance the Greeks call ousia, which we can call essence (essentia). In another way, substance is said to be the subject or supposit (suppositum), which subsists in the genus of substance. And this, taken commonly, can be named also by a name signifying an intention; and thus it is called supposit. It is also named by three names signifying the thing: namely, res naturae ("thing of a nature"), subsistentia ("subsistence"), and hypostasis, according to a threefold consideration of substance so called. For according as it exists per se and not in another, it is called subsistence; for we say those things subsist which exist not in another but in themselves. But according as it is "subjected" under some common nature, thus it is called "thing of a nature," as this man is a "thing of human nature." But according as it is "subjected" under accidents, it is called hypostasis or substantia. Now that these three names signify commonly in the whole genus of substances, person signifies in the genus of rational substances.

Reply to the first: "Hypostasis" among the Greeks, from the proper signification of the name, has that it signifies any individual of substance; but from use of speech it has that it is taken for an individual of rational nature on account of its excellence.

Reply to the second: As we say in the divine things in the plural "three persons" and "three subsistences," so the Greeks say "three hypostases." But because the name "subsistence," according to the property of its signification, corresponds to what the Greeks call hypostasis, while among us "substantia" sometimes signifies essence and sometimes hypostasis, lest there be occasion for error, they preferred to transfer for "hypostasis" the word "subsistentia" rather than "substantia."

Reply to the third: Essence is properly that which is signified by the definition. But a definition comprises the principles of the species, not, however, the individual principles. Whence in things composed of matter and form, essence signifies not only the form, nor only the matter, but the composite from matter and form in common, insofar as they are the principles of the species. But the composite of this matter and this form has the ratio of hypostasis and of person: for the soul, the flesh, and the bones are of the ratio of man; but this soul, this flesh, and these bones are of the ratio of this man. And therefore hypostasis and person add above the ratio of essence the individual principles, which are the same as the essence in composed things from matter and form; as was said above when we were treating of the divine simplicity.

195. Boethius, De duabus naturis.
196. Boethius, In Praedicamenta (Commentary on the Categories).

Reply to the fourth: Boethius says that genera and species "subsist," inasmuch as to certain individuals it belongs to subsist by the fact that they are contained under genera and species in the predicament of substance; not that the species or the genera themselves subsist - unless according to the opinion of Plato, who posited the species of things to subsist separately from singulars. But "to stand under" belongs to the same individuals in their order to accidents, which are beyond the ratio of genera and species.

Reply to the fifth: In an individual composed of matter and form, it has that it "stands under" accidents from the propriety of matter. Whence also Boethius says in the book On the Trinity: "A simple form cannot be a subject. But that which subsists per se has it from the propriety of its form, which does not accrue to the subsisting thing, but gives actual being to the matter, so that thus an individual can subsist." For this reason, therefore, he attributes hypostasis to matter, and ousiosis or subsistence to form; because matter is the principle of sub-standing, and form is the principle of subsisting.[197]

Conclusion: What the terms "thing of a nature," "supposit," "hypostasis" signify in the whole genus of substance, the name "person" signifies in the rational nature. Concerning the text of this article I see nothing which needs a peculiar explanation; but the doctrine of it will have to be examined in the customary disputations.

What is the difference between these Greek words, Hypostasis (Υπόστασις) and Ousia (Ουσία): Disputation 124.

Where contention arose in the Church about the word Hypostasis, chapter 1. On the antiquity of the word hypostasis, chapter 2. Who thought hypostasis and ousia to be the same, chapter 3. The true difference between hypostasis and ousia, chapter 4. According to the primary signification of "substantia" in Latin, it is the same as what the Greeks mean by hypostasis; but by ecclesiastical use, not so, chapter 5.

195. Boethius, De duabus naturis.
197. Boethius, De Trinitate: "Forma simplex subiectum esse non potest ..."

Disputatio CXXIV - On the difference between the Greek words Hypostasis and Ousia

Caput I - Where contention arose in the Church about the word Hypostasis

There are three names, as Georgius Cassander says in the commentary On the Two Natures in Christ: physis, and ousia - which, according to St. John Damascene in the book of the first Institutions, chapter 1, without any controversy signify "substance" or "essence" - and a third, hypostasis, about which there was great dissension of old in the Church of God. Nicephorus, book 10, History, chapter 15, and Socrates, book 3, chapter 7, write that perhaps Hosius of Cordoba first gave the occasion of this controversy, who, sent to Alexandria by the Emperor Constantine to calm the disturbance raised by Arius, was the first to make mention of "substantia" and "subsistentia," that is, ousia and hypostasis, and to ask whether they signified altogether the same. Later, as the same Nicephorus affirms, the Nicene Synod judged that question unworthy to be handled there; but a little later, in the Council of Alexandria, as Rufinus testifies, book 1 of the History, chapter 29, the controversy was again stirred up among the Fathers. For some were saying that "substantia" and "subsistentia" (for thus Rufinus interprets those two Greek names, ousia and hypostasis) are the same; but others on the contrary were affirming that they are not the same, because they said "substantia" is "nature," but "subsistentia" is "person" or "supposit."

Moreover, Nicephorus, book 10, History, chapter 15, and Socrates, book 3, chapter 7, relate that in the same Council of Alexandria it was defined that the name "hypostasis" might be used in common, since it is not contained in the sacred Scriptures, and Paul, compelled by the necessity of teaching, used such a word; yet nevertheless in the same Council it was conceded that meanwhile, because of the poverty of names, that word might be used against Sabellius to establish the Trinity of persons, lest we seem to confess the Trinity by name alone. Thus, therefore, as Rufinus says, with the dispute prudently and moderately composed, each one continued on his way.

Hence the Sirmian and Ariminian Councils took occasion to decree that these names ousia and hypostasis must not be used, so that more freely they might reject the name homoousion and confirm the Arian heresy which they followed; as we noted from the view of Athanasius and Epiphanius, disputation 110, chapter 5; the same is taught by Nicephorus, book 9, History, chapters 39 and 44.[198]

But it seems that the great Athanasius settled that quarrel which was stirred in the Council of Alexandria; for, as Nicephorus reports, book 10, chapter 16, he took part in that Council. For speaking of Athanasius, St. Gregory Nazianzen in Oration 21, which is in praise of Athanasius, thus says: "By gentleness on both sides, and with humaneness invited, and with the import of the words diligently and accurately weighed, after he found them in concord, without any detriment to doctrine and the truth of nature, and without forcing the business upon them by peremptory command, he transacted it by conceding the very use of words and obliging them to the things."

198. Nicephorus, Historia ecclesiastica IX, 39, 44; X, 15 - 16. Socrates, Historia ecclesiastica III, 7. Rufinus, Historia ecclesiastica I, 29. Gregory of Nazianzus, Orationes 21, 32. Athanasius; Epiphanius, Disput. 110, c. 5.

The same Gregory did the very same thing at Constantinople, as he himself testifies in the Oration to 150 Bishops, which is Oration 32. For when they had been convoked by Theodosius and a like controversy had arisen among them, Gregory of Nazianzus made good that there was no dissension about the things between those who say "three hypostases" and those who confess "one"; wherefore, that he might reconcile both parties, he concludes: "Can it be brought about that they agree more with each other, and say the same, than when they think that they differ, though they disagree only in syllables," etc. Therefore, down to those times it seemed free for each to use the word "hypostasis" in the Catholic sense, either for "nature" and "essence," which is called ousia, or for "person"; nor was the signification of this name "hypostasis" to those times made sufficiently manifest.

Caput II - On the antiquity of the word Hypostasis

Do Nicephorus, book 10, History, chapter 15, and Socrates, book 3, chapter 7, rightly show that the word hypostasis, in the signification in which the ecclesiastical grammarians use it, is not found among profane authors? They prove it by the authority of Irenaeus the grammarian: for if it be found among profane authors, it is altogether in a different signification. Sophocles in the Phoenissae uses it for "ambushes"; Menander for a "law-maker"; sometimes also it is put for the "sediment of wine" poured from the jar. Therefore the ancients (so says he) used this name in other significations than the more recent; for the latter frequently use subsistentia for substantia.

Yet not only at the time of Athanasius do ecclesiastical writers frequently use that name to signify the mystery of the Trinity, as we shall see below; but also Budé has shown that it is of more ancient origin in the Greek language. For the name "hypostasis" is found even in Aristotle, in the book De Mundo to Alexander, to signify individual substance or a subsisting nature; or rather, as I think, to signify the truth of a nature and not merely an apparent species. For he says "far before the middle ..."[199]

Caput III - On those who thought hypostasis and ousia are the same, and on the Latin suspicion of the name

Essence (essentia), three substances (substantia): among the Latins, one essence, or substance, three persons; which, as we have already said, in our speech, that is, in Latin, essence is not otherwise understood than substance. From which it is clear that St. Augustine held the said word "hypostasis" as suspect among the Latins in the same way as St. Jerome did; except that at last, in book seven On the Trinity, chapter six, he grants that it can be said in Latin "three substances" in God, just as in Greek they say "three hypostases," where there would be no scandal and the Catholic sense were clear. But Jerome more sternly rejects the aforesaid mode of speaking. Richard of St. Victor, however, in book four On the Trinity, chapter twenty, knew this difference of words between the Latins and the Greeks, and affirmed that each party both spoke rightly in its own language and thought rightly.

199. Budé, Commentarii linguae Graecae; Aristotle, De Mundo ad Alexandrum.

From among the Greeks also there was Paulinus, bishop of Thessalonica, of whom Acacius, bishop of Beroea, in the letter to Cyril, which is the fifteenth among Cyril's Letters, writes in this way: He refused to say "three hypostases," while thinking and handling the same [truth]. And below: He clung, however, to the Western bishops beloved of God, because the Roman language is narrower than that which, according to our Greek phrase, can say "three hypostases." For which reason I suppose there was even among the Greeks a dissension in the Alexandrian Council, which perhaps the Latins together with Hosius stirred up, because that word seemed suspect for signifying persons. From the Greeks, therefore, there were not lacking those who followed the sense of the Latins. Wherefore our interpreter of the Council of Ephesus, Peltanus, when he translated this letter of Acacius, in the first volume, chapter twenty-three, ought not to have written: "Here the most pious bishops of the East were supported," but "of the West," as from what has been said is clear. But the same Acacius, in the same letter, admonishes Cyril that, although the Orientals, both laity and clergy, favor the opinion of those who say that there are three hypostases in God, nevertheless he should restrain this mode of speaking, lest the novelty of the word be a cause of division in the Church.

In the same opinion was the great Athanasius in the Letter to the Bishops in Africa, where he says that "hyparxis" signifies rather nature and the substance of a thing; as Budé testifies in Greek, saying that hyparxis differs little from hypostasis.[200] And, what is capital, the general Council of Sardica, at which there were present with Hosius, bishop of Corduba, about three hundred Latin bishops, as Nicephorus relates, in the letter to the bishops, after the middle of it, speaks thus: "Now the cohort of the heretics strives to pronounce that the substances of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are diverse, and that they are divided; but we have received this, and have been taught this, we have this Catholic, Apostolic tradition, and faith, and confession: that there is one substance of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." Where what is said in Latin, "substance," is in Greek "hypostasis." This same letter, reporting it, Theodoret, book two, chapter eight, says thus: "Now the cohort of the heretics strives to pronounce that the subsistences of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit are diverse, and divided; but we have received this doctrine, thus we have learned, thus we hold the Catholic tradition, namely, that there is one hypostasis (which the heretics call, or use for, 'ousia') of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." And in the Greek copy of Theodoret it reads thus: μιᾶν εἶναι ὑπόστασιν (οἱ αἱρετικοὶ οὐσίαν προσαγορεύουσι) τοῦ πατρός, etc., as if you were to say in Latin: that there is one hypostasis (which the heretics call, or use for, "ousia") of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Rusticus also, in the book On the Incarnation against the Acephali, so writes: "Most clearly the name 'subsistence' sometimes signifies 'person,' sometimes truly 'nature' and 'essence.'" In which sense he strives to explain a certain opinion of Cyril, about which we shall expressly dispute in part three, question two, article one.[201]

200. Budé, Commentarii linguae Graecae.

The true difference between hypostasis and ousia according to the Fathers.

Caput IV - The true difference between hypostasis and ousia according to the Fathers

Furthermore, at last a manifest discrimination has been established concerning those two names, not only among the Greek Fathers, but also among the Latins, as is most excellently explained by Basil in letter 43, which is to Gregory of Nyssa, and by the same Nyssen in the little book On the Difference between Ousia and Hypostasis; by St. John Damascene, On the Faith, book three, chapters 3, 4, and 6; and in the first chapter of the Institutes, by Anastasius the Patriarch in the explanation of the faith, which is contained in volume five of the Sacred Library; and by John Maxentius in the profession of faith, which is in volume five of the Sacred Library; and indeed by the more ancient Athanasius in the treatise On the Definitions: whom among the Latins Boethius follows in the book On the Two Natures and One Person of Christ; namely, that the name "ousia" among the Greeks signifies the same thing which the Latins call "nature" and "essence" (essentia); as to the name "substance," we shall speak below: but the name "hypostasis," the same as "supposit" (suppositum) or "person." Wherefore, since in God one "ousia," that is, essence, and three hypostases, that is, persons, ought to be conceded, indeed that Paulinus of Thessalonica, whom Acacius in the fifteenth letter to Cyril reports to have said, "that there is only one hypostasis in God," because it seemed to him that this name signified "essence," afterwards, in the confession of faith which Epiphanius reports from him in heresy seventy-seven, judged that to confess three hypostases is pious and necessary for all. And that the authority of this Paulinus was alleged to Jerome, so that he might concede "three hypostases," is gathered from the fact that Jerome himself says in that fifty-seventh letter, "I do not know Paulinus," etc.

In this signification many Greek Councils use this word "hypostasis," the Council of Chalcedon, act five, in the second confession of faith which is at the end of the session: for what in one translation reads, "in one concurrent person," another has, "into one person, and into one subsistence (subsistentia) concurrent." And "subsistence" among the Latins is the same as among the Greeks "hypostasis." In the same way the Council of Alexandria and the Council of Ephesus use this word "hypostasis," in anathema two and four which are contained in Cyril's tenth letter; and the Fifth Council of Constantinople in the eighth conference, canons five and eight; and the sixth general synod, session four in the letter of Pope Agatho, and session eleven in the letter of Sophronius, and in session eighteen in the confession of faith; and the first Council of Constantinople in the letter to Damasus. Wherefore, by ecclesiastical usage, the word "hypostasis" is now so employed in this signification that no one now uses it for "essence."

Accordingly the emperor Justinian himself, a Greek, in the edict of faith to Pope John II, column nine (it is, moreover, in the second volume of the Councils), says: "All the holy Fathers agree in teaching us that nature, that is, substance and form, is one thing, and subsistence (subsistentia), or person, is another; that is, the latter is more special, the former more general."

---

201. Theodoret, Ecclesiastical History II, 8; Rusticus, De incarnatione contra Acephalos; cf. the Sardican letter as narrated by Nicephorus, Ecclesiastical History IX, 12.

And thus in this edict he uses for the same thing the name "subsistence" and "person"; in Greek, however, for "subsistence" he uses the name "hypostasis." The Fathers adduced in chapter two also used this word in the same way; indeed Jerome, in the exposition of faith to Damasus, renders it in Latin as "subsistence"; we shall quote his words in Disputation 158, chapter one.[202] Wherefore in our time the matter is so beyond doubt that one who now either denies three subsistences in God in Latin, or in Greek denies three "hypostases," or confesses only one hypostasis, is worthy of the note of error. Whether, however, it can be conceded in Latin discourse that there is one absolute common subsistence besides the three relative ones, we shall see in the following disputation.

But if some of the Fathers, as we saw in the preceding chapter, said that there is one hypostasis in God, it is no wonder; for the signification of this name had not yet been sufficiently ascertained for them. Wherefore Epiphanius the Deacon, in the seventh general synod, session six, volume three, about the middle, says that the Eutychians erred because they were unwilling to distinguish "nature" from "hypostasis."[203]

Yet there is among the ancient Fathers a dissension concerning that place of Paul in Hebrews 1: "Who being the splendor of [his] glory and the figure of his substance"; for in Greek "substance" is hypostasis - whether in that place it signifies "essence," or "person." Athanasius in the Letter to the Bishops of Africa, and Epiphanius in heresy 69 take hypostasis for "essence"; which sense Theodoret seems to have followed in that passage; nor is St. John Chrysostom far from it. But Gregory of Nyssa, in that little book On the Difference between Ousia and Hypostasis, by that name understands "person," whom Theophylact follows, so that the sense is: that the Son is the image and character of the person of the Father.

But Francis David, a heretic of our times, contends that in that place the name "hypostasis" does not signify "person," because Paul used the same name in Hebrews 3, when he says, "We become partakers of Christ, if indeed we..."

Caput V - On the ecclesiastical and scholastic use of the names "hypostasis," "substance," and "subsistence"

By the common use of the Greeks this name Hypostasis (ὑπόστασις) signifies what the Latins call supposit or person; while that which the Greeks call Ousia (οὐσία) and Physis (φύσις) the Latins are wont to render "essence" (essentia) and "nature" (natura). Thus in God one ousia - that is, essence - is confessed, and three hypostases - that is, persons - are to be admitted. So teach, among the Greeks, Anastasius the Patriarch, in his Exposition of the Faith, contained in the fifth tome of the Sacred Library; John Maxentius, in the Profession of Faith, found likewise in the fifth tome of the same Library; and, more anciently still, Athanasius in the tract On Definitions; and among the Latins, Boethius in the book On the Two Natures and One Person of Christ, expressly using subsistence (subsistentia) and hypostasis as corresponding terms, and declaring that the 202. Jerome, Expositio fidei ad Damasum.

203. Seventh Ecumenical Council (Nicaea II), actio 6.

Greek name ousia signifies what the Latins call nature or essence; whereas the name hypostasis signifies what the Latins call supposit or person. Accordingly, around God one ousia, that is, one essence, and three hypostases, that is, persons, are to be conceded.[204]

Indeed, Paulinus of Thessalonica - whom Acacius, in the fifteenth letter recorded by St. Cyril, relates to have said there is but one hypostasis in God (for he thought this name signified essence) - afterwards, in the profession of faith which Epiphanius reports under heresy seventy-seven, judged it pious and necessary for all to confess three hypostases; whose authority was then alleged to St. Jerome, that he might concede three hypostases, as is gathered from his own letter fifty-seven where he says: "I do not know Paulinus," and so forth. In this signification many Greek Councils employ the term Hypostasis, such as Chalcedon (act 5) in the second confession of faith appended at the end of the act, where, according to one translation, it is said "in one hypostasis," while another has "in one person," and still another "in one subsistence," these converging in sense; for to the Latins subsistence (subsistentia) is the same as to the Greeks hypostasis (ὑπόστασις). Likewise the Council of Alexandria and the Council of Ephesus in the second and fourth anathemas (as preserved in Cyril's tenth letter), the Second Council of Constantinople in coll. 8, can. 5 and 8, the Sixth Ecumenical Council in act 4 (the letter of Agatho the Pope), in act 11 (the letter of Sophronius), and in act 18 in the confession of faith, and the First Council of Constantinople in the letter to Damasus - all use hypostasis in this sense. Wherefore, by ecclesiastical usage the term Hypostasis is so used that the very Greek in the letter to Damasus, and afterward in the second letter to Pope Damasus, expressly says: "All the holy Fathers teach that nature is one thing, subsistence another, person another, that is, this or that," and to the same effect: "one subsistence and hypostasis." And so, in present disputation 158, at this time the matter is so well settled that anyone who should now deny either in Latin or in Greek three hypostases, or should confess only one, would be judged notably at fault. For if in the Latin tongue "one hypostasis in God" were a manner of speaking common beyond the three Persons, we shall see in disputation that some would have said there is one hypostasis in God absolutely; but as of yet that signification had not arisen. Epiphanius the deacon in the sixth action of the same general synod says: "Therefore Eutyches refused to distinguish hypostasis." The ancient Fathers differ around Hebrews 1:3 - "the splendor of glory and figure of his substance": for "substance" there in Greek is ὑπόστασις; yet in that passage they take it to signify essence, as Athanasius in the Epistle to the Bishops of Africa and Epiphanius (her. 69); Theodoret in his Ecclesiastical History follows them; and far from Chrysostom, who in the little treatise On Hypostasis uses that name to signify person, Theophylact also follows him, saying the Son is the image of the hypostasis of the Father.[205]

---

204. Anastasius Patriarcha, Expositio fidei (Bibl. sacra, tom. 5); John Maxentius, Professio fidei (ibid.); Athanasius, Tractatus de definitionibus; Boethius, De duabus naturis et una persona Christi.

205. St. Jerome, Epist. 57 ad Damasum; Epiphanius, Panarion, her. 77; Council of Chalcedon, act 5 (secunda confessio fidei); Council of Alexandria; Council of Ephesus, anathemas 2 and 4 in Cyril's Ep. 10; Second Council of Constantinople, coll. 8, can. 5, 8; Third Council of Constantinople (Sixth Ecumenical), act 4 (Ep. Agathonis), act 11 (Ep. Sophronii), act 18 (professio fidei); First Council of Constantinople, Ep. ad Damasum. On Heb. 1:3 see Athanasius, Ep. ad episcopos Africae; Epiphanius, her. 69; Theodoret, Hist. eccl.; Chrysostom, De hypostasi; Theophylact, ad loc.

But David of our times, a heretic, contends that in that place Hypostasis signifies person, because Paul says to the Hebrews 3: "If, however, we hold firm the hypostasis of Him unto the end." And at Hebrews 11:1: "Faith is the hypostasis of things hoped for." From which passages it is manifest that hypostasis does not there signify person. I answer: in those places it is not taken for essence (essentia), but for the subsistence (subsistentia) or foundation of a thing; wherefore in that place (Heb. 3) he calls living faith the principle of subsistence, that is, of subsistence not of God but of us, because by it we subsist and are founded in the spiritual life. The Greeks so explain that place. Similarly at Hebrews 11 faith is called the hypostasis of things hoped for, that is, their subsistence, because the things to come which we hope for have no subsistence then except that they are apprehended by our thought through faith - namely, that we shall be blessed - as likewise all the Greeks interpret. Therefore in that place to the Hebrews 1 "hypostasis" signifies the very subsistence of the Father, which is nothing other than person. In the same way Paul takes it for subsistence or foundation, 2 Corinthians 9 and 11, when he says "the foundation of glory" - in Greek ὑπόστασις τῆς καυχήσεως - for since person stands under all, it is very well called foundation and subsistence.

According to primary signification, Substance (substantia) to the Latins is the same as Hypostasis (ὑπόστασις) to the Greeks, according to ecclesiastical usage, not otherwise. Wherefore we can interpret the Greek word Hypostasis no less by the Latin Substantia than by Subsistentia; for which reason St. Hilary, in the book De Synodis concerning the Fathers of the Council of Antioch, says thus: "Therefore they said there are three substances of the subsisting persons," teaching by "substances" the subsisting persons, not separating by a diversity of essence the substance of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; whence it is clear that Hilary rendered the Greek word Hypostasis (which the Greek Fathers of that Council used) by the Latin name Substantia, and so conceded three substances in God, as the Greeks confess three hypostases.[206]

St. Thomas also teaches in this article, in reply to the second, that the Latin name Substantia answers to the Greek word Hypostasis. In the same way St. Augustine teaches in De Trinitate VII, c. 6, where he says there was no scandal in conceding three "substances" in God in the Latin tongue, since among the Greeks three "substances" are conceded in God; for in De Trinitate IV, c. 9, and VI, c. 3 - 5, and VII, c. 4 - 6, he affirms that among the Greeks three "substances" are conceded in God. And Pope John, in the book On the Two Natures against Eutyches, admits that the name Substantia can be taken in that sense with these words: "We are enlightened by one Light, and at the same time by three: by three indeed according to the property of each, either substance, as some like to say, or person. For there should be no contention about the diversity of words, since the diversity of names brings us to one and the same sense and understanding." Lastly, Boethius, in that book On the Two Natures, says there are three Greek names: Ousia, which he interprets in Latin as "essence"; and Physis, which he renders "subsistence" in Latin, and says there is one only in God - though he would have done better to render it "existence" (esse as act), as if the act of the very essence; thirdly, Hypostasis, which he translates into Latin as "substance," and thus defines "person" as "an individual substance of rational nature," as if he were using the Greek word Hypostasis for the Latin Substantia; but then again he defines thus: "an individual subsistence of rational nature," by which name "subsistence" he more frequently uses for "hypostasis." From which it is manifest that, if we attend to the force of the word and its primary signification, the same thing is to the Latins "substance" as to the Greeks "hypostasis," and thus that three "substances" could be conceded in God, just as three "hypostases."[207]

206. St. Hilary, De synodis, on the Antiochene Fathers.

But by ecclesiastical usage the name Substantia has been so accommodated as to denote essence alone, or form (forma), and therefore three "substances" cannot be conceded in God. Thus in the Eleventh Council of Toledo, in its confession of faith, it is defined that there is one only "substance" in God. This custom to prevail in the Church - namely that the name Substantia signify essence - is attested by Augustine, De Trinitate IV, c. 9, and VI, c. 4; and hence he says that three "substances" are not to be conceded in God. However, John the Theologian of the Latin Church, in the Council of Florence (definition 19, after the middle), teaches that Substantia is used in a twofold way: sometimes for "nature" and the "definition" of a thing, sometimes for "supposit." Which, in my judgment, is not now in common use, unless when we signify a supposit we add something, namely "individual" or "incommunicable."

But to Hebrews 3:14, "if, however, we hold firm the hypostasis of Him unto the end," and Hebrews 11:1, "faith is the hypostasis of things hoped for": in those places it is manifest that "hypostasis" does not signify "person." I answer: in those places it is not taken for "essence," but for the subsistence of the thing, that is, its foundation; wherefore in that place to the Hebrews 3 he calls living faith "the principle of substance," that is, of subsistence - not of God, but of ourselves - because by it we subsist and are founded in the spiritual life. The Greeks so explain that place. Similarly at Hebrews 11 faith is said to be the "hypostasis" of things hoped for, that is, their "subsistence," because the things to come which are hoped for by us (namely, that we shall be blessed), then have no other subsistence than that they are apprehended by our thought through faith, as likewise all the Greeks interpret. Therefore in that place to the Hebrews 1 "hypostasis" signifies the very subsistence of the Father, which is nothing other than "person." In like manner for subsistence, or foundation, Paul uses it 2 Corinthians 9 and 11 when he says "foundation of glory," in Greek ὑπόστασις τῆς καυχήσεως; for since "person" stands under all, "foundation" and "subsistence" are most aptly said.[208]

207. St. Thomas Aquinas, ST I, q. 39, a. 1 ad 2; St. Augustine, De Trinitate IV.9; VI.3 - 5; VII.4 - 6; Pope John (probably John II or Hormisdas in the collections), De duabus naturis contra Eutychen; Boethius, De duabus naturis et una persona Christi.

208. Heb. 3:14; 11:1; 2 Cor. 9; 11; the Vulgate uses "substantia" where the Greek has ὑπόστασις.

Disputatio CXXV

Caput I - What the Scholastics understand by "subsistence," and what the Fathers

"Subsistence" (subsistentia) is used by the Scholastic Theologians in another way, as we shall say below, than by the Councils and the holy Fathers. For among the Fathers and the Councils "subsistence" is taken for the very supposit that subsists; but the Scholastics by the name "subsistence" signify not that which subsists, but the formal ratio and act (actus) of subsisting; and about this "subsistence," thus understood, the controversy has arisen. The opinions of the Scholastics are various, which it will be necessary to recount.

First opinion: that there is, in God, besides the three relations which are the personal properties and complete the persons, some absolute subsistence common to the three persons; and that, over and above these, there are not three relative subsistences, but rather that the personal relations alone are the complements of the nature, or three "personalities," or three modes of incommunicability, as Scotus says, by which the person is constituted and the nature is contracted to the notion of person. This opinion was expressly taught by Scotus in III, d. 1, q. 2, a.; and to the same question it is referred in other places, in which I could find nothing alleged against this opinion. Durandus follows it more clearly in I, d. 26, q. 1, n. 6, and in III, d. 1, q. 2, where he establishes this difference between a divine and a created supposit: that for the divine supposit one thing is the ratio of subsisting, namely an absolute act of subsisting; but another is the ratio of supposit, namely a relative property by which it is rendered incommunicable; whereas for a created supposit the ratio of subsisting and of supposit is the same, namely subsistence per se. With these agree Paludanus on III, d. 1, q. 2 at the end; Capreolus, q. 1, art. 3, replying to Durandus's argument against the fourth conclusion of Aegidius; Aegidius on I, d. 23, q. 2, art. 3, ad quartum; Argentina on d. 26, q. 1; Albertus, I pars Summae, tract. 10, q. 43. The principal foundation of this opinion is: because "to subsist" is a perfection simply simple - that is, better than that which is not itself; for it is better that the divine nature subsist than that it not subsist. But no relation is a perfection simply simple; otherwise some perfection simply simple would be in one person which is not in another. Therefore "subsistence" is something absolute, not relation.

Augustine also seems to favor this, who in De Trinitate VII, c. 4, at the end, proves that God insinuates Himself as subsisting, not as ordered to another; therefore the act of subsisting in God is absolute, not relative. Augustine's reason is of this sort: for if this is God's "to be" (esse), namely "to subsist," then the three "substances" would not be said, just as three "essences" are not said; for as, because this is God's "to be," "to be wise," we do not say three essences, so neither three wisdoms do we say. For thus, because this is His "to be," which is essence, three essences would be as three Gods - which is not lawful to say. But if it is one thing for God "to be," another "to subsist," just as it is one thing for God "to be," another "to be Father" or "Lord" (for that which "is" is said in reference to Himself; but "Father" is said in reference to the Son, and "Lord" to the serving creature), then God "subsists" relatively, just as He relatively begets and relatively rules: and thus "substance" will not be "substance," because it will be relative. For just as from that which "is" we say "essence," so from that which "subsists" we would say "subsistence"; but it is absurd that "substance" be said relatively, for every thing subsists in reference to itself, how much more God. So far Augustine, who thus proves that "to subsist" in God is absolute, so that none of it be relative - which is the express sentence of the Scholastics whom we alleged. Some heap up also innumerable places of St. Thomas for this opinion, which I intentionally pass over, because he everywhere speaks of the act of existing (existentia), which he calls existence or esse.

Refutation of the foregoing opinion. Besides that this opinion clashes with the common way of speaking of the Fathers and Councils, who call "subsistence" the supposit, in Greek Hypostasis, it can easily be refuted by that which seems to follow from it - namely, that the union of the human nature was made not only with the Person of the Word, but with all the persons. For if the humanity is said to "subsist," not by its own subsistence but by the divine, and this is something absolute, it follows that it was united by reason of a common term, and absolute, with all the persons. But on this matter it is to be discussed more at large against the aforesaid doctors on III, q. 3, art. 1; for they philosophize in various ways when they speak of the union of the humanity, even if they agree in that opinion which we have related about a common absolute subsistence.

Caput II - What Caietan and others have held

Caietan, in this question (on I, q. 4, a. 4; above on q. 2, a. 2; and at the end of q. 39, a. 4; and in III, q. 2, a. ... around solution 3, and III, a. 2 and 3), does not dare to deny three relative subsistences; but besides these, he thinks there is a fourth, another absolute subsistence common to the three, and he calls it "essential," while he calls the three relatives "personal." For that common one is proper to the essence; but the other three constitute the persons. This sentence is followed by Bartholomaeus Miranda in the Summa of the Councils, in the annotations on the Sixth Synod, act 4, and by certain more recent writers who, by inaccurately reporting the authors cited in the preceding chapter as if absolutely favorable to this foundation, assert that these authorities agree; whereas in truth no one follows it except Caietan and Miranda: for the authors alleged in the preceding chapter taught a quite different doctrine, as I have related. They also allege for this Richard in III, dist. 1, art. 1, q. 4; Ockham in III, q. 1, art. 3; Gabriel in III, dist. 1, q., art. 3, dub. 4; Almain in dist. 1, q. 1, art. 3, dub. ultimo. But in truth these Doctors do not concede some common act in the three divine persons to which the name "subsistence" should be said to agree; but a common existence (existentia), by reason of which a created nature can be assumed by God and terminated first, not terminatively by some personality - about which mode we are not disputing.

This sentence of Caietan, besides the testimony of Augustine cited in the preceding chapter, who seems to concede one only absolute subsistence, can also be proved first by the authority of Agatho in the Epistle which is found in the Sixth Synod, act 4, where a little from the beginning he says thus: "We confess God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit: not three Gods, but one God; not the subsistence of three names, but one subsistence of three subsistences, that is, of persons." Thus has the more ancient edition of the Councils: not "substance"; therefore now he concedes one subsistence common to the three subsistences; which words, since they are written in Latin, ought to be of greater weight for this sentence: for nowhere among the Latins does the name "subsistence" signify "essence," as Hypostasis sometimes among the Greeks is used for "essence." Secondly, it is proved from St. Hilary, De Trinitate VII at the end, where, treating of the Father and the Son, because "the one is said to be in the other," he says in another place: "It is not the condition of corporeal natures that they be mutually in one another, or that by subsistence they have perfect unity; but He does not unite Himself to another; rather, in His own property of deity, He co-subsists (consistit)..."; and soon after: "Not of a corporeal nature is the condition that they be joined into one; but by subsistence they have perfect unity." From which it is clear that Hilary calls the "subsistence of nature" prior to personal words, as if subsistence of the nature, and afterward with it unites: "God, subsisting, generates; and the Holy Spirit is the subsistence of deity"; and elsewhere he says: "The Father is in the Son, and the Son in the Father, not as a body in a body, but as deity in deity"; and finally: "One subsistence is in the other, because one nature subsists." Thirdly, in the Epistle to Cyrillus we read: "Of God (who is of one nature), what is, is: for in Him there is subsistence, not having beginning; for He is God." This sentence is also referred to the Greeks: Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, cap. 1 of De Divinis Nominibus, a little before the end, says ... [text curtailed in the copy].[209]

Caietan, in this question, above in the fourth article, and above in question 2, article 2, and below in question 39, article 4, and in the Third Part, question 2, about the solution of article 3, article 2 and 3, does not dare to deny three relative subsistences; but besides these, he judges that there is a fourth, another absolute subsistence, common to the three; and he calls it essential, while the three relative ones he calls personal. For that common one is proper to the essence (essentia), but the other three constitute the persons. This position is followed by Bartholomaeus Miranda in the Summa of the Councils, in the annotations on the Sixth Synod, action 11, and by some moderns, who, by carelessly citing authors set down in the preceding chapter, without any foundation, assert that these things are the common opinion: whereas in truth no one follows it except Caietan and Miranda; for the authors alleged in the preceding chapter taught a quite different doctrine, as I have reported.

They also allege for this Richard in III, distinction 1, article 1, question 4; Ockham in III, question 1, article 3; Gabriel in III, distinction 1, question, article 3, doubt 4; Almain in distinction 1, question 1, article 3, last doubt: but in reality these Doctors do not concede some common act in the three divine persons to which they would say the name "subsistence" (subsistentia) is fitting; rather, a common existence (existentia), by reason of which a created nature could be assumed by God and first be terminated not by some personality - of which mode we are not disputing.

This opinion of Caietan, besides the testimony of Augustine cited in the preceding chapter, who seems able to concede only one absolute subsistence, can be proved, first, by the authority of Agatho in the Epistle which is had in the Sixth Synod, action 4, where a little from the beginning he says thus: "We confess God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit: not three Gods, but one God: not the subsistence of three names, but one subsistence of three subsistences, that is, of persons." For thus the older edition of the Councils has it, not "substance"; therefore he already concedes one subsistence common to the three subsistences. And since these words are written in Latin, they ought to be of greater moment for this opinion; for nowhere among the Latins does the name "subsistence" signify "essence," as ὑπόστασις sometimes does among the Greeks, and as "essence" is used by Hilary.

Secondly, it is proved from St. Hilary, at the end of De Trinitate, where, concerning the Father and the Son, of whom the one is said to be in the other, he writes: "This is not the condition of corporeal natures, that they be in each other, so that the subsistent nature have perfect unity." And after a few interposed words: "To be in, however, is not this, that the one be in the other as a body in a body; but so to be and to subsist, that in the subsistent it be; and so to be in, that it also subsist." Therefore Hilary concedes a subsistence of nature; by his earlier words, when he says "so that the subsistent nature," and by the later, when he says "that it also subsist," namely, the divine nature.[210]

Thirdly, Jerome in that Epistle 57 says: "In the witness of God and the sole nature, which truly is: for that which subsists has not from another, but is its own." For the same opinion there is reported from the Greeks Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, in the first chapter of the Divine Names a little before the end, when he says, the subsistence of goodness through its own existence is the cause of the existence of all subsistents. Finally, St. Gregory of Nyssa, in the book On the Life of Moses, col. 13, says that none of those things which are either apprehended by sense or clearly seen by the mind, besides the supreme essence which is the cause of all and on which all depend, truly subsist; as if he said that it alone truly subsists, and nothing else.[211]

Caietan moreover proves the same opinion by reason: because it is necessary to admit one God in the concrete, pre-understood to the three persons, who is called "creating"; but the concrete always signifies or connotes subsistence (subsistentia): therefore it is necessary to concede one subsistence pre-understood to the persons; this individual Caietan calls a "semiperson" (semipersona) below, q. 39, a. 4. Furthermore, since no one can deny that there is in God a certain existence common to the three persons and substantial, the moderns who defend Caietan's opinion explain in what way this common substantial existence is called subsistence, although the created existence of the humanity, which they think was assumed by the Word together with the humanity, because it is not distinguished from it, cannot be called subsistence.

Therefore they say it is manifest to distinguish between a created nature and the divine: for although each has an act of existence (existentia), nevertheless a created nature so has existence that it is not distinguished, so as of itself to be imperfect, and without some distinct mode - what they call the mode of perfection - it cannot subsist and be per se; and thus in Christ indeed the humanity exists by its proper existence, as the more probable opinion holds; but because it lacks the mode by which it ought to be completed per se, it is not per se but is sustained by another, and therefore its existence is not subsistence without that mode. The divine nature, however, is of itself perfectly infinite, and it demands not only to exist, but also to exist perfectly and per se, that is, it does not need another, distinct by a distinct mode, in order to subsist and be complete and perfect; wherefore, although it differ from its personalities by reason alone, yet insofar as it is distinguished from them in our mode of understanding, it is conceived so perfect that without another it is understood apt to subsist per se and to be complete, for which reason even in the concrete it can be signified without the persons. This perfect existence the recent theologians together with Caietan call in common a subsistence. They add that subsistence (as they say) is in the abstract, and they call the divine essence with that "subsistence" in the concrete, that is, "subsistent"; they deny, however, that that common thing is a person, and that the common subsistence is personality, because even if it were sufficient of itself to subsist and were complete and perfect for this, nevertheless it can be communicated to three supposits. For the notion of person and of personality is not just any subsistence by itself, but such as cannot be communicated.

209. Caietan (Tommaso de Vio), on ST I, q. 4, a. 4; q. 2, a. 2; q. 39, a. 4; and on ST III, q. 2; Bartholomaeus Miranda, Summa Conciliorum on the Sixth Synod; Pope Agatho, Ep. in Third Council of Constantinople (act 4); St. Hilary, De Trinitate VII; Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus I.

210. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, at the end.

211. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus I; St. Gregory of Nyssa, De vita Moysis, col. 13; St. Jerome, Ep. 57.

This opinion, thus explained, some moderns think differs from the common opinion only in word, not in reality: because all ought to concede a perfect existence, in the way in which we have explained, proper to the divine nature, which belongs to no other nature; and they think it no inconvenience that it be able to be called a certain subsistence common to the three persons. Others finally explain in another way why that common existence of the divine nature has the notion of subsistence, of which we shall speak in the following chapter.

Nihil in God is common to the three persons that has the notion of subsistence (subsistentia): the truer opinion.

Caput III - That nothing in God common to the three persons has the notion of subsistence; only relative subsistences in God, none absolute

The opinion approved by the tradition of the ancient Scholastics is that there is in God nothing common to the three supposits which has the notion or the name of subsistence; but that the subsistences in God are relative (relatio), and there is no absolute one. This opinion was handed down by Alexander (III, q. 1, memb. 3; and q. 7, member one, article 3); St. Bonaventure in III, distinction 1, article 1, question 3; Richard in the First Book, distinction 26, article 1, question 1; Marsilius in III, question 2, article 3, doubt 2 near the end; Henry in Quodlibet 5, question 8 near the end; Genebrard, book 2 On the Trinity, p. 85.[212]

This opinion must be confirmed by us in a twofold way: first, we must show in this chapter that the essence (essentia) of God by that common existence is not yet completed according to our mode of understanding, so as to be per se terminated (just as neither is the humanity completed by its own existence) until there be added to it that mode of relation (relatio), by which the supposit is constituted. Then in the following chapter we shall show that the name "subsisting" in no way agrees with that common existence; but that the Scholastics, who did not hesitate so to call it, were continually abusing in this matter the phraseology of the Councils and of the Fathers under that name, for which reason, when in the year 1578 I was publicly teaching and was led to that opinion, I came to think that there is nothing in God common that could be signified by the name "subsistence," which seems to be the common mode of speaking of the Councils and Fathers, to the contrary of those Scholastics who conceive some common and absolute subsistence in God. In that opinion indeed I rested much more, after in the year 1583, when again publicly teaching this matter, I carefully examined the opinions and the manner of speech of the Greek and Latin Fathers, of which I have treated sufficiently in the preceding disputation.

Therefore, as to the first point, in which there seems to be no controversy about the thing itself, we can by easy reasoning commend our opinion. First, although we must concede in God a common existence, which is so individuated with the essence of God that without it the divine essence cannot be considered under possible being (as other essences can), nevertheless by that existence alone the divine essence is not completed according to our mode of understanding, so as to be per se able to be without something else. I said "according to our mode of understanding"; for according to the thing, since it is not distinguished from the relation by which it is ultimately terminated and contracted to the notion of supposit and of person, it does not in any way need another distinct from itself, by nature of the thing, in order to be completed and to subsist per se; as humanity requires, which, besides the existence which it has, needs that mode "per se" by which it is ultimately constituted in the notion of supposit, and is distinguished from its existence, since it can be separated from it, as we see in Christ, in whom there was true humanity with its own existence (as we shall say in the Third Part, question 17, article 2), without that mode by which it is ultimately terminated and completed. Therefore the divine essence has with itself so individuated an existence that not only is it communicated with it to the three supposits, but also, according to our mode of understanding, it is said to be in them; yet not per se. Therefore that existence alone, considered without relation, does not yet make the divine nature to be per se according to our mode of understanding, but leaves it still apt to be terminated in another way, and to be said to be per se, namely, by relation. Nor does it at all matter that relation is not distinguished from that common existence, so that nevertheless that existence itself be said to be per se; because although in truth it itself is that which makes the divine nature to be per se, since it is the same as relation, nevertheless in our concept it is not yet conceived as per se existence, until it be completed by relation.

But it must be observed that when we say that existence without relation does not yet have the complete per se mode, it must be understood insofar as that "per se" is opposed to existence "in another," not as in a subject, but as in a supposit (suppositum). For if we speak of it insofar as it is opposed to existence in another as in a subject, then even the existence proper to the humanity in the Word is called existence per se, which nevertheless does not yet deserve the name of subsistence; otherwise the human nature in the Word, retaining its proper existence, would also have its proper subsistence, which cannot be said.

212. Alexander of Hales, III, q. 1, memb. 3; q. 7, memb. 1, art. 3; St. Bonaventure, III, dist. 1, art. 1, q. 3; Richard of St. Victor, I, dist. 26, art. 1, q. 1; Marsilius of Inghen, III, q. 2, art. 3, dub. 2; Henry of Ghent, Quodl. 5, q. 8; Genebrard, De Trinitate, bk. 2, p. 85.

Then the same opinion is confirmed, because if that common existence, considered without relation, formally made the divine nature to subsist per se, the divine nature could not fail to be considered in the concrete whenever that existence were considered without any connotate; wherefore, if we were to conceive it abstractly, it ought to be thought without that existence; but however abstract we consider the divine nature, we always consider it with existence: therefore such an existence does not make per se being, nor does it constitute the concrete of the Godhead, on account of which by the authors of the contrary opinion that common subsistence is asserted, which to them seems that otherwise the common concrete, pre-understood to the three persons, cannot be apprehended. Therefore the concrete of the Godhead must be assigned in another way.

But some among those who defend the opposite opinion say that the divine existence common to the three persons for this reason has the notion of subsistence, because of itself it is so perfect that, although under the notion of existence, which is common...[213]

...when we say that that existence without relation does not yet have the complete mode of being through itself, it must be understood insofar as that phrase, through itself, is opposed to existence in another, not as in a subject, but as in a supposit. For if we speak of it insofar as it is opposed to existence in another as in a subject, even the proper existence of the humanity in the Word is called an existence through itself, which nonetheless does not yet deserve the name subsistence; otherwise the human nature in the Word, retaining its own existence, would also have its own subsistence, which cannot be said.

Then the same position is confirmed, because if that common existence, considered without relation, were to make the divine nature formally subsist through itself, it could not be the case that the divine nature would not be considered in the concrete whenever that existence were considered without any other connotation; wherefore, in order that it be conceived abstractly, it would have to be thought without that existence. But however abstractly we consider the divine nature, we always consider it with existence. Therefore such an existence does not make for being through itself, nor does it constitute the concrete of the Godhead, on account of which the authors of the contrary opinion assert that common subsistence; this seems to them otherwise not able to apprehend the common concrete, pre-understood of the three persons. Therefore the concrete of the Godhead must be assigned in another way.

But some, of those who defend the opposite opinion, say that the divine existence common to the three persons has for this reason the notion of subsistence, because in itself it is so perfect that, although under the aspect of existence, which is common, it can be communicated to its own supposit, and completed in our mode of understanding by relation, nevertheless, because in itself it is infinite and so perfect that it cannot be united to or communicated to an alien supposit and depend on it, therefore it has the notion of a subsistence not incommunicable to its own supposit, but to an alien supposit, which created existence does not have.

213. Caietan, on ST I, q. 39, a. 4; cf. also his language of "semiperson." Pope Agatho, Epistle in the Third Council of Constantinople, act 4 (older edition: "subsistentiam"); cf. the discussion of Greek hypostasis versus Latin subsistentia.

Their reply is rejected; it does not suffice. I grant indeed this perfection of the divine existence; nevertheless that does not suffice for us to say that in God there is a common absolute subsistence. For the fact that the divine nature cannot be communicated to an alien supposit, or depend upon it, it does not have from the fact that it subsists and is signified in the concrete; for however abstractly it be considered in its concept, by that very fact, that it is infinite, it has that it cannot be communicated to an alien supposit and be terminated by it. Wherefore the very existence of the divinity, insofar as it is existence, would be said to be subsistence, if on this ground an absolute subsistence in God were to be conceded; but in everyone's judgment the divine existence, insofar as it is considered only as existence, is not yet subsistence, even absolute, because existence also belongs to the concept of nature considered abstractly; and since no other ground of distinction can be assigned between existence and absolute subsistence in God, such a subsistence beyond the relative ones is posited in vain.

There is nothing in God common to the persons to which the Latin name Subsistence would be suitable.

Caput IV - How much we ought in this matter or in this name not to dissent from the Fathers

However, as regards the mode of speaking, let us establish our position: since in the mysteries of our faith that mode of speaking must altogether be maintained which the Fathers and the Councils use; but on the contrary, the mode which is at odds with the phrasing of the Fathers and the Councils must by all be rejected; from that we ought to pass judgment in this matter. And although that common existence so completed the divine nature that without any other it would make it exist through itself, as the earlier opinion maintained; nevertheless this would not suffice that it be called a subsistence common and absolute, if this mode of speaking were at odds with the phrasing of the Councils and the Fathers. For, as we saw in the preceding disputation, many Fathers long and greatly feared to concede three hypostases in God, although the Catholic sense was clear to them: because, as St. Jerome said, the name hypostasis did not seem to them of good suspicion.

Now I show that the mode of speaking of the former opinion is contrary to the phrasing of the Councils and the Fathers. For it is certain that the Fathers and the Councils celebrated in the Greek Church, after that controversy already mentioned about the word hypostasis had been settled and the true signification of this name had been explained, whenever they employed that word, plainly conceded three hypostases in God, and declared that the union of the humanity with the Word was made not in nature, but in hypostasis, as we saw in the preceding disputation: because they judged that Hypostasis in Greek, in a rational nature, is altogether the same as Person in Latin, or supposit. Therefore whoever would now concede one absolute hypostasis in God, although at the same time he conceded three relative [hypostases], could be no less censured from his words - however he might interpret them in a good sense - than one who in Latin would say that in God, besides the three relative persons or supposits, there is some absolute person or some absolute supposit, even if he were to add that this absolute supposit is not really distinct from the three relative [ones].

Cajetan indeed, in the places cited above, while he concedes a semi-supposit or a semi-person absolute, and does not dare, without some addition, to assert a person or an absolute supposit, does not so much oppose the phrasing of the Councils and the Fathers; yet he is worthy of reprehension, because he first introduced into the Schools a new and rather discordant mode of speaking.[214]

Since therefore Subsistent, in Latin, is the same as Hypostasis in Greek, as I said, I do not know by what reasoning it is lawful, against the mode of speaking of the Councils, to assert an absolute subsistence in God, even if besides that one someone were to admit three relative [subsistences], and not really distinct from the absolute. And that the name Subsistence in Latin signifies the same as Hypostasis in Greek is not in doubt. For first among the Greeks, John Maxentius, in his confession of faith, which is found in s. tom. of the Sacred Library, confesses that it is altogether the same as what in Latin is person and subsistence; to be understood in a rational nature: therefore he judges it the same to subsist, subsistence, and hypostasis; for the Fathers use Hypostasis and person interchangeably for the same thing, namely in a rational nature; and Maxentius says that person and subsistence are the same.[215] For Pope Agatho, himself a Latin, in the letter which is found in the Sixth Synod, act 4, uses without distinction the name Hypostasis and person. Then also Martin the Fifth, in the Lateran Council, in the fifth consultation, can. 1, defines that God is unity in Trinity; and explains one God in three subsistences, as if in Greek one were to say Hypostases.[216] Moreover no other Latin name than Subsistence can be devised which could be better substituted for the Greek name Hypostasis, or even for the same reason, because already by ecclesiastical usage it has been accommodated by the Fathers and Councils to signify that.

But among the Greeks, the very same thing has been taught by the Fathers adduced by us in the preceding disputation, chapter four, since they always put Hypostasis for person, which we interpret in Latin as subsistence. Nor anywhere will you find among the Greek Fathers the name Hypostasis, nor among the Latins the name subsistence, for essence or for anything essential and common, after that ancient controversy in the Church of God was explained and defined. Therefore rightly did the emperor Justinian, himself writing in Latin to Pope John the Second in the edict, or confession sent to him, which is contained in the tomes of the Councils after the Second Council of Toledo, column 9, understanding here the common sense of the Fathers, write thus: "Since nature and subsistence are not the same. For all the holy Fathers with one accord teach us that nature, that is, substance and form, is one thing; subsistence or person is another: nature indeed, or substance and form, signifies that which is common; but subsistence or person, that which is special." And there is none of the holy Fathers, as well Latins as Greeks, who after the settlement of the dispute which we mentioned, concedes in God some absolute subsistence or hypostasis. For, as we shall say below, Jerome and Augustine, who conceded it, did not sufficiently understand the signification of the name Hypostasis, which later by common consent was received also in the Latin Church, and previously in the Greek was already sufficiently frequent among the Fathers. Wherefore it is not in doubt that the Scholastics, who in our time, on the testimonies of Jerome and Augustine, concede in God a common and absolute subsistence, have lapsed through ignorance of the word. Yet it is wonderful that they were ignorant of that which had been received without controversy both by the Greek and by the Latin Church for a long time already: namely, that subsistence is the same as supposit and person. For that Jerome and Augustine were ignorant of this is not a wonder, because as yet the force of the Greek name among the Greeks themselves was not sufficiently well known, as we shall say below.

214. Cajetan, in the places cited above (see below, q. 39, a. 4), while conceding a "semi-supposit" or "semi-person," refrained from asserting an absolute person or absolute supposit.

215. Maxentius, in his confession of faith, found in s. tom. of the Bibliotheca sacra, affirms that "person" and "subsistence" are the same, to be understood in a rational nature.

216. Agatho, Pope: Epistle found in the Sixth Synod, act 4; and Martin the Fifth, Lateran Council, fifth consultation, can. 1: one God in three subsistences, as if in Greek one were to say "in three hypostases."

But some reply that the councils and the Pontiffs have always used subsistence concretely, as it is said, for person or supposit; and therefore that it is not lawful, according to the phrasing of the councils and the Fathers, to concede in God an absolute subsistence: but that Scholastics, who teach that there is in God a certain absolute subsistence, use subsistence not for the supposit in the concrete, but for a certain abstract account of perfect and per se existing.

But this evasion can easily be cut off. For since ecclesiastical usage has obtained that the name Subsistence be to the Latins the same as Hypostasis to the Greeks, namely that it signify a supposit or person; it will be lawful only for the sake of disputation for the Scholastics, as we shall say below, to use the name subsistence abstractly, to signify the form and account, by which a person or supposit is ultimately constituted; but to signify another account altogether different from and contrary to the supposit, such as the aforesaid theologians attempt to defend, to use such a word, whether abstractly or concretely, and thus by the same word to concede in God that which the Fathers and the councils denied, namely an absolute subsistence - by what, I ask, reasoning would it be lawful? Otherwise it would be lawful even now for Greek theologians to use the name Hypostasis in the very same sense in which the aforesaid Latin Scholastics use the name subsistence, and to say that in God there is one absolute Hypostasis. But who would concede this? I certainly know that the Greeks are more skilled in their own language, that they may not approve this mode of speaking as contrary to the Fathers; and that some Latin Scholastics have lapsed through ignorance of the word, because they saw Jerome and Augustine concede one absolute subsistence in God. But they ought to have considered that in the time of Augustine and Jerome the ecclesiastical signification of this word was not sufficiently explained, so that those Fathers would not dare to concede three subsistences in God, but only one, as we shall see in the following chapter. Moreover the Scholastics in truth, while with those Fathers they wish to concede one absolute [subsistence], and with those same Fathers do not dare to deny three; with the Greeks they concede three; with Jerome and Augustine they add one absolute; and thus out of two opinions altogether contrary, they themselves put together one sentence; which how it can stand with itself - as being compacted altogether out of contraries - will appear below.

Therefore no less is the mode of speaking of Durandus and others to be reproved, who say that in God there is only one absolute subsistence, from which it would follow that there is only one person in God; than of others who, besides the three relative [subsistences], concede also one absolute; for thus they seem to introduce a quaternity into the Godhead. But what certain ones add, that that absolute subsistence is not distinct from the three relatives, but is the same, excuses them little. For if they concede an absolute subsistence or hypostasis, they must say that there is one absolute and three relative; a mode of speaking which no Father would admire.

Yet let us look more mildly on our Scholastics, who also say that there are only three subsistences in God; they commonly use the name Subsistence in another signification than the Fathers and Greek Councils: namely for the complement of the person, which they call personality. For since, for the sake of teaching, we use the concrete and the abstract, by which that which constitutes a thing and the formal account by which it is constituted are set forth; and since the name subsistence seems to them abstract, therefore they use it to signify the relations themselves which in God we call personalities; and abstractly it is better signified by us. I except Durandus and those who follow him, who, since they do not concede in God more than one subsistence, use it for the very act of existing. But those who think that subsistence is personality itself, although they do not use the name in that signification in which the Fathers and Councils use it, yet they do not stray from ecclesiastical speech: for there seems to be little difference between the content in the abstract and the concrete, just as there is little distance between person and personality; wherefore in our Scholastic disputations it is more convenient to embrace the Scholastic mode of speaking; sometimes the note is not unworthy.

But some think that the name subsistence sometimes even in the Councils signifies abstractly the personation, that is, the action of the supposit, and its complement, as in the Epistle of Sophronius, which is contained in the Sixth Synod, act 11, in which, much earlier at the beginning, it is said: "Therefore since the holy Trinity is substance and perhalanus itself is subsistence," etc.; for when "personal subsistence" is said, it does not seem to signify the concrete "personal," but the abstract; for the concrete is the person itself; the abstract, however, is not called "personal."

But this reasoning is false. For since Sophronius in that epistle frequently uses the Greek name Hypostasis, which we translate into Latin as subsistence, and always in other places it signifies the person itself in the concrete, it is not to be believed that, from one place, he took the name in the abstract; since with the Greek word Hypostasis we never use it either in Greek or in Latin for the abstract. And when Sophronius says "personal subsistence," it is certain that he does not thus distinguish "personal" as if in the abstract, but [indicates] the supposit, "personal," which at length is properly expressed in the concrete. For indeed a supposit in the concrete cannot be found in a rational and in an irrational nature; and when it is in a rational [nature], "personal" is most aptly added, to denote what sort of supposit that is. That "subsistence" there is the same as "personality" in the abstract is also a useless repetition, since one would be saying "personal personality."

From this doctrine there is a reference to IIIa, q. 4, a. 6; and how badly some more recent authors, abusing even the very name "subsistence," have introduced into other hypostases and supposits, as it were, many partial subsistences - indeed, that wherever there are parts, there are partial subsistences. But "partial subsistence" is an inadmissible way of speaking, just as no one should say "partial person" or "partial hypostasis." Therefore the name "subsistence" ought not to be extended in that manner.

The foundations of the first and of the second opinion can be overthrown with no trouble. But first of all, the testimonies which have been brought forward for each must be dealt with, and it must be shown how weak they are.

They think, indeed, that some would not dare to concede three subsistences in God, but only one, as we shall see in the following chapter. Those Scholastics just mentioned, however, and with them certain Fathers, are willing to concede one absolute [subsistence]; and, since with those same Fathers they do not dare to deny the three, they concede three with the Greeks; with St. Jerome and St. Augustine, moreover, they add one absolute; and thus, from two opinions wholly contrary, they themselves fashion one single position - a position which cannot stand with itself, as being cobbled together from elements altogether contrary, as will appear below.

Wherefore the manner of speaking of Durandus and others ought no less to be rejected, who say that in God there is only one subsistence - one absolute mode - which is that there is in God only one absolute [subsistence] besides the three relative [ones], which they grant: for in this way they seem to introduce a quaternity. And what certain men add, namely, that this absolute subsistence is not distinguished from the three relatives, scarcely excuses them. For if they concede an absolute subsistence or hypostasis, they ought to say that there is one absolute and three relative [subsistences]: which manner of speaking no Father would condemn.

But indeed our own Scholastics, who also say that there are only three subsistences in God, commonly use the name Subsistence in a signification other than that of the Fathers and the Greek Councils, namely, for what they call the complement of the person, which they call personality. For in teaching they employ concretes and abstracts, by which they show both that which is constituted and the formal reason by which it is constituted; and since to them the name subsistence seems abstract, therefore they use it to signify the relations themselves, which in God we call personalities, and which are better expressed by us in the abstract. I except Durandus and others who follow him, who, because they concede in God only one subsistence, use this term for the very act of existing. But those who think that subsistence is personality itself, although they use the name in a signification other than that used by the Fathers and Councils, nevertheless they do not on that account depart from an ecclesiastical manner of speaking: for the concrete seems to differ little from the abstract, just as person differs little from personality. Wherefore, in our Scholastic disputations, to embrace the common mode of speaking of the Scholastics is not something to be censured.

Certain others think that the name subsistence is sometimes also used abstractly in the Councils to signify personality, that is, the rational character, mode of a supposit, and its complement, as in the Epistle of Sophronius contained in the Sixth Synod, act 11, where, far from the beginning, it is said: "If, therefore, the Holy Trinity is to be counted by personal subsistences," etc. For when "personal subsistence" is said, it does not seem that a concrete is signified, but an abstract: for the concrete is the very person; this, however, is not called "personal." But this reason is trifling. For since Sophronius in that Epistle frequently uses the Greek name Hypostasis, which we render in Latin subsistence, and everywhere else signifies the very person in the concrete, it is not to be believed that in that passage he used that name for an abstract, since we never use the Greek word hypostasis, either in Greek or in Latin, for an abstract. And when Sophronius says "personal subsistence," this is not the same as if he had said "personal person," but [he means] "personal supposit," which can very well be said also in the concrete. For since a supposit can be found in the concrete in a rational and an irrational nature, and when it is in a rational [nature] it is a person, it is very well added, "personal," to denote of what sort that supposit is. And if subsistence there were the same as what is personality in the abstract, it would be an idle repetition to say "personal personality." From this very doctrine we shall bring forward later how poorly some recent writers, abusing even the name subsistence, introduce in any given hypostasis and supposit a thousand partial subsistences; indeed, they say as many partial subsistences as there are parts: whereas it is no less inept to speak of a "partial subsistence" than of a "partial person" or a "partial hypostasis," as we shall say there.

Ad Augustinum respondetur. To the first testimony from St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 4, where he concedes only an absolute subsistence, proving that God subsists toward Himself, not toward another - a point on which our adversaries think to triumph over us - I answer that it has no weight for the first or the second opinion. Add that, even if it had any strength, it would not favor the second opinion at all: for this latter does not dare, as the first does, to concede in God only one absolute subsistence, but affirms that there are three relative [subsistences]; yet Augustine certainly denies any relative subsistence and asserts only one absolute, when he says that God subsists not relatively but toward Himself. Nor, indeed, do I grant that this testimony supports the first opinion, as I now show

I presuppose, first, that Augustine never used the Latin name subsistence, but that, whenever he treats of the Greek word hypostasis, he always rendered it in Latin as substance, as in the places cited in the preceding disputation, cap. 5.[217] Wherefore, when he proves that God subsists toward Himself, not relatively, he is speaking solely of the act of subsisting, which we can call substantial existence, not of subsistence, neither in the concrete nor in the abstract - the very point now in dispute among us. Next, I also presuppose that Augustine, in the aforementioned places, had the Greek name hypostasis in suspicion, if we wish to use it translated into Latin as the Greeks use it. For he never translated it as subsistence, as Jerome does in Ep. 57 and the earlier Latin Fathers; but always as substance. And because substance, among the Latins, commonly signified essence, and it is not permitted to concede three essences in God, therefore Augustine also does not dare to concede three hypostases in Latin, nor is he compelled to say, in Latin, three substances in God; although he says, in De Trinitate VII, c. 6, that where there would be no scandal, it could be said that three substances are conceded in God, as the Greeks said three hypostases.[218]

217. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 4 - 5; VIII, c. 8 - 9.

Accordingly, since Augustine, while he still feared, as is gathered from the places already cited, to concede three hypostases or substances in Latin, rightly said that God subsists toward Himself, not toward another - just as substance and essence are "toward themselves," not "toward another." But if he himself had admitted three subsistences - as, given the foregoing disputation and as I have proved also in this one, it is necessary to admit three subsistences - then, as he would not deny that God subsists incommunicably (which comes from relation), he would also say that God subsists relatively, just as now in God relative subsistence is spoken of; and thus he would not assert that there is one absolute subsistence in God, but he would admit three relative [subsistences]. We, however, who now, by ecclesiastical usage, employ the Latin name subsistence for the Greek hypostasis, and likewise say in Greek that in God there are three relative hypostases, so that we do not dare to concede any absolute [subsistence], in the same way pronounce that there is nothing in God absolute and common to which the Latin name subsistence could fit.

Ad Hieronymum respondetur eodem prorsus modo. I answer St. Jerome in precisely the same way: for he too more severely rejected "three hypostases," so that by no means ought this way of speaking to be admitted. He interpreted the Greek name hypostasis, as Augustine did, not as subsistence, but as substance; and therefore it is not surprising if he would say that the divine nature subsists from itself and not from another, conceding that it subsists absolutely and toward itself, as Augustine [said]; although this mode of speaking sufficiently indicates that he is speaking of some absolute subsisting, as we shall reply to St. Gregory of Nyssa below - unless from elsewhere the mind of Jerome were evident to us. Wherefore I cannot but be amazed that men otherwise learned and erudite, with these testimonies of Jerome and Augustine adduced, should be deceived into believing that one absolute subsistence is conceded in God; since the manner of speaking of those Fathers, after the quarrel over the name subsistence and hypostasis has been settled, ought not to be approved without explanation. Deceived, to be sure, those Theologians seem to me, in that they had only the words of these Fathers but not a clear grasp of their mind; or if the aforesaid Scholastics wish to follow Augustine and Jerome, let them say with them that there is in God one absolute subsistence, and let them deny with them the three relatives - which in no wise will now be permitted them. But to assert in God one absolute and three relative subsistences is the same as to fashion from two opinions utterly contrary one single position, which cannot stand with itself, as we noted above

Other testimonies of the Fathers alleged in the second chapter can also easily be dissolved by another route.

218. St. Jerome, Ep. 57; cf. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 6.

Caput VI - Dissolution of the reasons for the first and second opinions

It remains for us to dissolve the reasons which we brought forward for the first and second opinions in cap. 7 and 8. To Durandus's argument, which you have in the first chapter, we answer that it is indeed a perfection, simply and without qualification, to subsist - whether it be taken for substantial existence; and this belongs to the essence absolutely and is common to the three Persons, and is better than not to subsist; or whether it be taken for the act of existing incommunicably, which is proper to the person, or hypostasis.

As to the first [sense], if it be taken in general, because it is better to subsist incommunicably than not to subsist, this perfection does not belong by reason of the nature, but by reason of the person; and it is common, not according to the thing (for there is not one subsistence really common), but according to that universality which is of predication. Then, too, it is a perfection, simply and without qualification, to subsist particularly; that is, to subsist by paternity and by filiation, which is something relative and toward another: but this also does not belong by reason of the essence, but by reason of the person. If you say that, by reason of the divine nature, that is, considered as essence, every perfection belongs to it, because it is infinite; I reply: the infinity of the essence consists in this, that it is not from any cause, as was explained above in Disput. 25, cap. 1 and the following; not in this, that distinct infinite perfections, or every perfection - both personal and essential - formally belongs to it by reason of itself: for by reason of itself there belongs to it only essential perfection, that is, essential [perfection].

Ad testimonia. The testimonies can be dissolved. To that of Pope Agatho we reply that the text is corrupt, since it is read, "Of three subsistences, or persons, one subsistence," whereas it ought to be read, "one substance," as is found in many Latin copies; nor is it credible that in so few words Agatho used the same word in so diverse a sense

Ad Hilarium. I say that his words are also cited carelessly. For in the earlier words alleged he does not say, "that the subsistence of nature have perfect unity," but, "that the substances of nature have perfect unity"; and the sense is that in corporeal things one is not so in another, as to have the same nature subsisting: he does not say "the same common subsistence," but "the same nature," to which it befits to subsist by reason of a supposit; and therefore he says "supposit in nature." Then, in the later words, he does not say, "And so let it be in such a way as that even it (scil., the divine nature) subsist," but, "in such a way that He Himself (scil., God) subsist": the meaning is rather this, that thus in divine things one subsistent is in another subsistent, so that He Himself subsists. But, granted - let us concede - the words be referred to the nature, so that it be said, "And that very (scil., divine nature) subsist": nevertheless nothing can be concluded therefrom. For neither do we deny, nor can anyone deny, that the divine nature subsists; but we say with St. John Damascene that the divine essence indeed subsists, yet in three persons

Ad Dionysium respondeo. I answer to the testimonies of Pseudo - Dionysius that he did not say "the subsistence of goodness" in Greek hypostasis, but "the essence" in Greek ousia; and thus Perionius also translates "essence." But if he had used the Greek name hypostasis, he would have used it for "essence"; which now is not permitted, as I noted in the preceding disputation, to concede in God one common and absolute hypostasis. In vain, therefore, do the adversaries employ the authority of the Greek Fathers in this matter, since they use no other Greek name than hypostasis for the Latin subsistence; and no one now dares - Gregory of Nyssa included - to concede in God any absolute hypostasis

Demum ad Nyssenum dicimus. Finally, to St. Gregory of Nyssa we say that it cannot be denied that the supreme essence truly subsists from itself, and not from another, as creatures do which depend upon another as upon a cause: yet on that account no common subsistence is conceded. For, as we said above, the divine nature truly has in the persons, from itself and not from another as from a cause, that it subsists. Then, too, since Nyssa, as we saw, in the preceding disputation, cap. 4, clearly holds that hypostasis is the same as person in a rational nature, and since he cannot use another Greek name to signify a common subsistence than the name hypostasis, from neither that author nor any other Greek author can a common subsistence be proved, since none concede a common hypostasis, unless "hypostasis" be used for "essence," as some of the more ancient [writers] took it.[222]

To Agatho we answer that the text is corrupt where one reads: "Of the three subsistences, or persons, one could not [serve] to signify subsistence"; instead it should be read "one substance," as is found in many Latin copies. Nor is it credible that in so few words Agatho used the same term in so diverse a sense.

To St. Hilary I say that his words are cited badly and awkwardly. For in the earlier words alleged, Hilary does not say: "That subsistences should have the nature perfect by unity," but: "That the subsisting nature should have perfect unity." The sense is that in corporeal things there is not thus one [thing] in another so as to have the same subsisting nature; he does not say "the same common subsistence," but "the same nature," to which it rightly belongs to subsist by reason of the supposit; and therefore he says "subsisting nature." Then in the latter words he does not say: "So indeed in being, that even it (namely, the divine nature) may subsist," but thus: "that even he (namely, God) may subsist." The sense is that in divine things the one subsisting is in another subsisting, so that he himself too subsists. But come, grant that those words be referred to the nature, so that it be said, "And it (namely, the divine nature) subsists": nevertheless nothing can be inferred therefrom. For neither do we deny, nor can anyone deny, that the divine nature subsists - far from it; but we say with St. John Damascene that the divine essence indeed subsists, yet in three persons.[223]

To the testimonies of Dionysius I reply that Dionysius did not say in Greek "the subsistence of goodness," hypostasis, but "essence," ousia; and thus Perionius translates "essentia." If he were using the Greek name hypostasis, he would be using it for essence; but for us now, as I noted in the preceding disputation, it is not permitted to concede in God one common and absolute hypostasis.[224] In vain, then, do our adversaries employ the authority of the Greek Fathers in this matter, since they use no other Greek term than hypostasis for the Latin subsistence; and now no one - whether

222. See the preceding disputation, cap. 4, on St. Gregory of Nyssa's usage of hypostasis and person.
223. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa II, c. 3.
224. Pseudo-Dionysius; in the Greek text "ousia" (essence) is read, and Perionius translates "essentia."

St. Gregory of Nyssa or any other - would dare to concede some absolute hypostasis in God, unless hypostasis be taken for essence, as some of the ancients took it. Finally, as to Nyssa we say that it cannot be denied that the supreme essence truly subsists of itself and not from another, as creatures do, which depend on another as on a cause; yet for that reason some common subsistence is not granted. For, as we said above, the divine nature truly has in the persons from itself, and not from another as from a cause, that it subsists.

The arguments for the first and for the second opinion are dissolved

They say: "No perfection simply simple is a relation proper to one person and not to another." I answer that this is false. For we showed in Disputation 122, chapter 4, that relations are perfections taken simply. That is, as St. Anselm explains, "they themselves are better than not-themselves"; but we said that they are not to be compared with the person, as if it were better for the person to be Father than not to be Father, but with the divine nature, which the relations modify and contract so that there be a person. To this [nature] indeed it is better to be Father than not to be Father - I do not say than to be Son, but than not to be Father - a point no one doubts. How from this it does not follow that one real perfection, simply simple, is in one person which is not in another, is gathered from what was said in that disputation, chapters 6 and 7.

To the second argument, which was adduced earlier, in chapter 2, for the second opinion, it is answered: one can very well assign the concrete understanding of the nature before the persons and common to them, namely, "this God," without any common subsistence; how this can be understood will be explained below in Disputation 156, chapter 2. Therefore a certain common subsistence is not necessary in order that the concrete of deity be constituted; rather, as we noted in chapter 3, any substantial act which the adversaries wish to call "subsistence" is included in the concept of deity itself, however abstractly taken, and therefore by reason of that [deity] God is not constituted in the concrete, as they contend.

To the third argument, from the same second chapter and in favor of the same opinion, I reply that the difference between created and uncreated nature lies only in this: a created nature, in order to subsist per se, needs a certain mode which we call the supposit, really distinct from its existence; whereas the uncreated nature requires, over and above its existence, a personal mode, namely, relation, which is distinct from it and from its real existence only by our intellect. Nevertheless, according to our way of understanding, without that personal mode it is not yet understood to subsist per se, unless we conceive the uncreated nature according to a very absolute mode and that of one only supposit, as the ancients understood it, before the mystery of the Trinity was revealed. Now therefore, since we know that the Godhead subsists in three supposits and is ultimately terminated by three relations, we must never, in a true and theological concept, think of it as apprehended abstracted from the three persons.

Objection: But someone will object in this way. The divine essence, as it is understood before the persons, is of itself perfect with every perfection, because it is infinite: therefore by the same reason it ought to be conceived as subsisting; for subsistence is a certain perfection. And they think this to be the difference between created and uncreated nature, that a created nature does not of necessity require in its concept every perfection, as the uncreated nature does, and hence does not demand to subsist except by reason of the supposit, which is distinguished from it.

It is answered: This objection is easily dissolved. For although the divine essence differs from the created one in that the divine does not subsist by something added to it that is really distinct, but only by relation, which is the same with it in reality; and though a created nature always subsists with a personalitas really distinct added to it; nonetheless the divine essence, in so far as it is conceived as common and as distinct from the personalities, does not have in this its concept that perfection whereby it is ultimately completed so as to subsist, just as it does not include that perfection and personal complement which modifies and contracts the same so that there be a person - just as humanity, too, in reality does not have that perfection of supposit. They only differ in this: that that complement of the divine nature is distinguished from it only by reason; the complement of a created nature is distinguished according to reality.

Nor indeed is it of the notion of the essence, in so far as it is understood as common to the persons, to contain actually and formally every perfection, even that of subsistence, just as neither is it to include every perfection and the personal complement, which no one denies; but only those perfections which are in reality common and properly follow upon the essence itself. This in no way derogates from the infinity of the divine essence, which is constituted as its peculiar attribute. For this [infinity] does not consist in the essence of God being infinite as if it contained perfections in itself, but in its being from no other, as from a cause, and in its having from itself whatever it is - just as I more copiously proved in Disputation 25, chapters 1 and 5. Nothing, therefore, follows that is inconvenient, if some perfection, to wit, a personal one, which the Scholastics call "subsistence," be adventitious to the divine nature from the person, which is distinguished by reason from the essence, and which the essence, as essence and as common to the three persons, does not formally include in itself; for of personal perfections no one can deny this.

But what certain recent authors make to be a perfection of the divine nature - by reason of which they say that it "subsists before the persons" so that it cannot be terminated by an alien supposit - is futile and vain, as I showed above in chapter 2.

Disputatio CXXVI - Whether there are three existences in God

Caput I - Some later writers affirm that there are three existences in God, and relative eternities

Some later writers, just as they do not hesitate, as we noted in Disputation 122, chapter 3, to affirm that in God there are not only three persons or subsistences but even three realities, likewise dare to affirm that in God there are three existences, or three acts of being. For the Scholastics take "existence" for the very act of existing, which they also call "esse" or "to exist."

Into this opinion Scotus seems to have fallen in the first book, distinction 11, question 2, where, responding to the first argument, he asserts that one person is distinguished from another by a relation even disparate and not opposed, not only according to the quiddity of the relation, but also according to "esse": he clearly understands by "esse" the "existence," for the "esse of the essence" is altogether the same as the quiddity.[225] The same he taught in Quodlibet 4, article 3, to the principal argument.

To the same opinion is referred Richard of St. Victor, book 4 On the Trinity, chapter 16, where he teaches that in the divine there is one common existence and three incommunicable existences.[226] Others cite in favor of the same opinion Cajetan in the places alleged by us in the preceding disputation; there, however, Cajetan concedes only three relative subsistences, which is far different.[227] They also cite Richard in III, distinction 1, article 1, question 2, to the first, as saying that one thing is to exist to the essence, another to the person. But he only asserts that the absolute existing is one in the three persons; whereas "to exist the person of the Father" is not "to exist the person of the Son" or "of the Holy Spirit." He did not say "to exist the person" (existere persona), but "to exist the person [of...]" (existere personam), which are two different things.

By reason the case is proved thus. Each relation has its own actual entity, distinct by reason from the divine essence and really distinct from its opposite relation; therefore, just as we say that the three relations are three realities, so we shall say that they have three actual entities; but existence is nothing other than the actual entity of a thing; therefore there will be three existences. Hence, just as the relations are called three realities, so also they will be called three actual entities and existences, because they are distinguished among themselves, even if they are the same as the essence.

They add, second, that three existences are not to be conceded in God absolutely, but with this addition, "relative," because "existence" absolutely signifies the being of a thing, which follows upon essence rather than upon relations; and in this sense, they say, the Fathers are to be understood, who attribute to God one "esse," and affirm that all things which are in God have one "esse." They explain this thus: since in their opinion the divine essence, as a transcending ratio, is included in the relations, existence also ought to be included, so that there be one existence of all the relations, only multiplied according to the determinate mode of incommunicability which is that of relation. Wherefore, in order to say that existence is multiplied, relation ought to be signified by a peculiar name. For if it be said absolutely, there is signified only that common existence in the three relations, as a transcending form included; therefore only "three relative existences" can be conceded, but not three absolute existences with that addition.

225. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 11, q. 2; and Quodlibet 4, art. 3.
226. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate IV, c. 16 - 17.
227. Cajetan, in the loci cited in the preceding disputation, where he concedes three relative subsistences.

Third, they teach that in God there are not only three relative existences, but also three durations, because duration is as it were a passion of existence, which in no way can be separated from it, since it differs from it only by reason and, according to our mode of understanding, always accompanies it. But they admonish that one cannot say "three durations" simply and without addition, just as for the same reason one does not say "three existences."

Caput II - That in God there is only one existence, and only one duration, is proved from authority

You will never find among the Saints that there are in God several existences, or several "esses" - I say "existences" for the very act of existing. For what our adversaries report from Richard of St. Victor favors nothing of their opinion; rather, from those words our view can be confirmed, and theirs manifestly refuted. Although in book 4 On the Trinity, chapter 16, he concedes a common existence, and in chapter 17 incommunicable existences, yet by the name "existence" in those two chapters, and in the following, he does not understand what the Scholastics do, namely the act of existing, or "esse," but the whole substance itself, or person, which is said to have "esse." By the word which the Scholastics now call "existence," he uses "esse"; and in those places he always assigns one "esse" of the three persons and nowhere three, not even with the addition "relative." And the same we saw in the preceding disputation, chapter 5, where they prove that God's "esse" is absolute and one.[228]

Here a far more probable opinion seems to be the one which teaches that in God there is only one existence, that is, one existence (esse), although there are three modes and relations of this existence and of existence. St. Thomas set forth this opinion expressly, in the Third Part, question 17, article 2, reply to the third, where he says that the three persons have one existence, and wherever he speaks of God's existence, he calls it absolute, as in De potentia, question 2, article 6, and question 8, article 2, reply to the eleventh, where he plainly teaches that nothing befits God save an absolute existence, in which even the relations exist, and that to them no relative existence befits.[229][230] Capreolus also clearly teaches this opinion, In III Sentences, distinction 1, question 1, article 3, to the second, against the second conclusion; and Cajetan above, on question 28, article 2, corollary 6.[231][232] And in favor of this opinion can also be mustered St. Jerome in that Epistle 57, and St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 7, chapter 4, as we saw in the preceding disputation, chapter 5, where they prove that God's existence subsists as absolute and one.[233][234]

Nowhere, however, will you find among the Saints that in God there are many existences, or many esse. By "existences" I mean the very act of existing. For what the adversaries allege from Richard of St. Victor favors their opinion in nothing; rather, from his words our view can be 228. See above, the preceding disputation, cap. 5.

229. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae III, q. 17, a. 2, ad 3; wherever he speaks of the divine esse he calls it "absolute."

230. St. Thomas, De potentia q. 2, a. 6; q. 8, a. 2, ad 11: only an absolute esse befits God, in which even the relations exist, and to them no relative esse befits.

231. Capreolus, In III Sent., dist. 1, q. 1, a. 3, ad 2, against the second conclusion.

232. Cajetan, on the place cited above, q. 28, a. 2, corollary 6.

233. St. Jerome, Epistle 57.

confirmed and theirs manifestly refuted. For although in book 4 of De Trinitate, in that chapter 16, he concedes a common existence, and in chapter 17 incommunicable existences, nevertheless by the name "existence," in these two chapters and the ones that follow, he does not understand what the Scholastics do, namely the act of existing, that is, the esse; but the whole substance itself, or person, which is said to have esse. And what the Scholastics now call "existence," he calls "esse"; and in those places he always assigns one esse of the three persons, and nowhere three, not even with the addition "relative." In the same way, in book 5 of De Trinitate, chapter 1, he concedes one esse of the three persons, but a discrete existere. For with him, as Alexander very well explains, Part 1, question 44, in the body and to the fifth, "to exist" (existere) is not merely "to be" (esse), but "to be from another" (ex alio esse), in which personal property is already included.[235][236][237]

Moreover, that "existence" in Richard is not the same as in the Scholastics will be manifest to anyone reading him from chapter 12 to chapter 20; so that it would seem superfluous to report some of his words now; yet lest we seem to mislead the reader, we shall subjoin some of his testimonies.

Accordingly, in chapter 12, on the Etymology of the name, he speaks thus: "The name 'existentia' is drawn from the verb 'existere': in the verb 'sistere' there can be noted what pertains to one consideration; likewise by the addition from the preposition 'ex' there can be noted what pertains to another. By what is said to 'make something stand' (sistere) are first denoted those things which do not so much have being in themselves as being-in (inesse), not so much 'to stand' (sistere), so to speak, as 'to stand in' (insistere), that is, to inhere in some subject; and, after a few words: 'For what is existentia, if not to stand forth from something (ex aliquo sistere)?'" In which words he marks that "existentia" is that which "stands forth from something." Then, in chapter 15: "We find, namely, that there are several persons in the divinity, although they have one and the same existence, and by all accounts indifferently the same, which pertains to the identity of substance: yet they can, according to the original cause, have mutual difference." There he concedes that the three persons have the same esse, and he understands "existence" as the Scholastics speak.

And in chapter 16: "Existence, as was shown above, signifies substance, yet not simply, but with the denotation of some property"; where he calls "existence" not the act of existing, namely the esse, but the very substance which is said "to be." And below: "We call it a common existence when there is understood an esse having from a common property; but 'incommunicable' when there is understood an esse having from an incommunicable property." Therefore in Richard "existence" is the same as "that which has esse," not the very esse and act of existing. And in chapter 17: "If therefore the persons differ by incommunicable properties, and likewise by incommunicable existences they differ: it must be that there be an incommunicable existence to which there belongs an incommunicable difference." What, I ask, could he have said more clearly? For since he asserts

234. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 4.
235. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate IV, cc. 16 - 17.
236. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate V, c. 1.
237. Alexander (of Hales), Summa, Part I, q. 44, in the body and ad 5: existere is ex alio esse.

that the existences themselves differ by properties which are in the existences themselves, and these are the relations, consequently he teaches that "existence" is the hypostasis itself, which is rendered incommunicable by a property and in which relation inheres. If he thought that "incommunicable existence" were the act of existing belonging to a relation, he would not say that it is rendered incommunicable by relation or property; nor that the property or relation is in the existence itself. And in chapter 19 he concedes in God one only esse, and he expressly proves it; nowhere, however, does he attribute to God several esse, but he affirms there that there are only several who have one esse from a differing property; and he adds these words: "Unity there is according to the mode of being (essendi); plurality according to the mode of existing (existendi): one esse, because one and indifferent; several persons, because several existences." He calls "several existences" not acts of being, but the very substance existing, or hypostasis; but the "mode of existing" he calls the property; and from this side he concedes a plurality in God. And in chapter 20: "We say indeed that properties are in the persons; but their inhering (if we duly weigh it) does not give subsisting, but existing: and therefore persons are more rightly called 'existences' than 'subsistences' or 'substances'." He says, however, that properties do not give subsisting, because a little before, in the same chapter, asking how "subsistence" or "substance" is said in God, he says: "On account of properties of this sort, which seem to be in the divine persons, by which they are distinguished from one another, according to some likeness of those things which truly inhere in their subjects (though less properly), they can be called 'substances' or 'subsistences'." There he refuses to concede in God "substance" or "subsistence": for these are said from the fact that they "stand under" others; following namely the doctrine of St. Augustine, who in De Trinitate 7, chapter 4, for the same reason teaches that in God "substance" is said abusively, and is rather to be called "essence." He therefore said that properties do not give to persons "subsisting" but "existing," because they make the persons to exist incommunicably, that is, to be "from another." But when he subjoins that persons are more rightly called "existences" than "subsistences" or "substances," he plainly indicates that "existence" itself is the person, and not the act of existing, which the adversaries attribute to relation: just as "substance" or "subsistence" is not taken for the act itself, but for the subsisting thing. For these abstract terms denote, in their primary signification, not an act or a form, but the very thing itself, as we said in the preceding disputation.

However, "existence" differs from "person" in Richard's view, even if you add "incommunicable," as genus differs from species. For not every incommunicable existence is a person, but only in a rational nature. Wherefore the same Richard thus defines a divine person in chapter 22: "An incommunicable existence of the divine nature." And thereafter, after he had said in chapter 22 that it can also be defined by the word "individual," as Boethius defined it - if by "individual" be understood "that which cannot be distributed through many," which is what we call "incommunicable" - finally in chapter 23 he begins thus: "Perhaps it will be clearer and more expedient for understanding, if we say that a person is one existing per se only, according to a certain singular mode of rational existence." And as to how what is called "existing" ought to be taken, that is sufficiently made known from the foregoing; he says that this is clearer than if it be said that a person is an "individual substance," as Boethius defined it. But when he defined by "existing," he took "Existing" and "existence" for the same thing, and therefore he said that how it is to be taken is evident from what preceded; for before he had spoken not of "existing," but of "existence."

Richard's mind was followed by John, the Theologian of the Latin Church, at the Council of Florence, session 19, far better than some theologians of our age, when he asserts that "substance" is understood by the Doctors in two ways, one way for the account and definition of the thing, another way for the supposit. For he immediately subjoins: "Which in another name is wont to be called 'hypostasis,' or 'existence,' or 'thing of nature'; and in the human genus the same 'substance' signifies 'person,' since 'person' is said to be 'an existence of a nature capable of reason, incommunicable'; and thus, in the rational species, 'substance,' taken for 'supposit,' makes up 'existence' as well as 'person' among all those Doctors who wrote against Arius and Macedonius." From which it appears that John uses for the same thing these three - existence, hypostasis, and substance - namely the very supposit in a rational nature, which is "person": therefore he does not take it for the act of existing, which the Scholastics call existere or esse. And since he affirms the definition of "person" handed down by Richard, he very well knew this to be Richard's mind.[238]

It has pleased us to report these things at such length; forgive us, reader, for we have done this to show that one must not trust citations which are brought in haste and without mature examination; for by them the disputation is sometimes wont to be made more prolix, not without loss of time.

The true opinion is then proved by the authority of St. John Damascene, book 1 De fide, chapter 1; and the same Damascene, book 3, chapter 5, at the beginning, assigns the difference among the divine persons in respect of cause and caused and the properties of origins; and "in respect of personal perfection," that is, in respect of mode of existing. He did not say "in respect of personal existences," but "in respect of mode of existing." And by "mode of existence" he calls the very properties in the same place, book 3, chapter 5, at the beginning.[239]

The same opinion is confirmed by reason.

Caput III - The first reason for our opinion

From the aforesaid testimony of Damascene the first reason for our opinion is drawn. For if "humanity," and any created nature whatsoever, is said to have one only existence, that is, one act of existing, whether it be in another or subsist per se; and from the sole fact that it exists per se it is not said to have a new act of existing nor a new existence, even a personal one, but a new mode of existing - although the mode of existence per se really differs from substantial existence when it can be separated from it - much more does it follow that one divine person, from the fact that it exists by the substantial existence of the essence and, besides it, has a personal property which is a

238. John, "Theologian of the Latin Church," at the Council of Florence, session 19: on the twofold acceptation of "substance" and the identification of "existence," "hypostasis," and "substance" with the supposit, i.e., the person, in a rational nature.

239. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 1; and III, c. 5, at the beginning: the distinction of persons according to mode of existing; and "mode of existence" is the name he uses for the personal properties.

mode of existing and is distinguished from it only by reason, does not have a double existence, even according to our mode of understanding, but the same one which another person has, though in another mode. Moreover a mode of existing per se would not add to a thing a new existence, but a new mode of existing; this is plain in human nature both existing per se and existing in another, as in Christ; and in accidents existing in a subject and then per se, when in the Sacrament of the Altar they are left without a subject. For one existence does not modify another, nor is one added to another as a mode of it. Therefore any mode of existing in the universe is not a new existence, even if it really differs from existence - although about other modes one must judge otherwise.

A second reason against the former opinion, and in confirmation of ours, can be of this sort. If in God there were three relative existences, that is, three acts of existing, there would also be three relative durations, as the adversaries boldly concede: therefore absolutely, without that addition "relative," three durations ought to be conceded. For just as we concede three things (res), without any limitation, because "thing" is a transcendental, as we proved in disputation 12, chapters 3 and 7, in the same way three existences and durations ought to be conceded without any addition. For since "existence," according to the adversaries' view, is nothing other than some actual entity, and "entity" is the same as "thing in act," it follows that there are three durations...

Following Richard's mind, John, the Theologian of the Latin Church at the Council of Florence, session 19, much better than some theologians of our age, teaches the same thing, when he asserts that "substance" is understood by Doctors in two ways: in one way, according to the account and definition of the thing; in another way, for the supposit. For he immediately subjoins: "Which also by another name is wont to be called hypostasis, or existence, or the thing of a nature; and, in the human kind, the same 'substance' signifies 'person,' since a person is said to be that which is capable of a rational nature, with incommunicable existence; thus, in the rational species, 'substance,' taken for a supposit, perfects existence and person among all those Doctors who wrote against Arius and Macedonius." From which it appears that John uses these three - existence, hypostasis, and substance - for the same thing, namely the supposit in a rational nature, which is the person; therefore he does not take it for the act of existing, which the Schoolmen call "to exist" or "existence" (esse). And since he asserts the definition of person handed down by Richard, he very well knew that author's mind.[240][241]

It pleased me to recount these things at such length - pardon me, reader - for we did it to show that little trust should be placed in allegations which are wont to be brought forward hastily and without mature examination; to satisfy which there sometimes, not without loss of time, a disputation is made more prolix.

Our true position is then proved by the authority of St. John Damascene, book 1, On the Orthodox Faith, chapter 1, where, assigning the difference among the divine persons in respect of cause and caused, and of the properties of origin, he writes in these words: "And in respect of personal perfection, that is, the mode of existing." He did not say "in respect of personal existences," but "in respect of the mode of existing." For who ever called existence, that is, the act of existing, the "mode of existence"? In the same way he named the properties themselves at the beginning of book 3, chapter 5.[242]

240. John, "Theologian of the Latin Church," at the Council of Florence, session 19: on the twofold acceptation of "substance" and the identification of "existence," "hypostasis," and "substance" with the supposit, i.e., the person, in a rational nature.

241. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate V, c. 1.

The same position is confirmed by reason.

First reason. From likeness. Any one nature has only one act of existing (existentia), by which it subsists of itself and exists. A mode of existing is not said to be an existence, nor a personal one, although it follows upon personal subsistence. For that which adds only a mode of existing to an already actually existing entity does not add a new existence, but a new mode of existing. Thus, in things where a new mode of existing is superadded, a new existence is not for that reason posited: as in Christ there is added to the human nature the mode of existing in the divine supposit; and in accidents there is sometimes the mode of existing in a subject and then per se, as happens in the sacrament of the altar without a subject; yet one and the same existence remains, and not another added to another.

Second reason. Against the adversaries' position and in confirmation of ours there can be such a reason: if in God there were three relative existences, that is, three modes of existing that are also relative, as the adversaries maintain, then there would be conceded three durations corresponding to those relatives; but then, absolutely and without that restriction, three durations could be conceded, as we grant three things, without any multiplication of existences. For if the one existence which transcends the three properties is multiplied inasmuch as it is conjoined with them, so that there are several relative durations and existences, why should not several existences and durations be conceded simply, if existence and duration are transcendent, like "thing" and "being"? Yet it is better to say that existence and duration are not transcendent, as "thing" and "being" are; for these names are also said of the modes of a thing. But since existence admits various modes, and one and the same existence is not thereby transmuted into another, the mode of existing is not called "existence," but is said to accrue to the existence of the thing; and by one and the same existence the thing is said to exist. For this is such a mode that it is said only of another. From these points that argument is solved which in the first chapter we adduced for this position: we say, therefore, that existence is some entity or thing, not just any, but such as follows upon some actual existence or entity as its mode; for the entity which follows upon existence and itself modifies it is not called "existence," but "mode of existence." To existence, indeed, there does not accrue another existence, nor does one existence accrue to another, although existence makes the thing to exist in such or such a mode, according as such and such a mode accrues to it.

But you will object to us in this way. In God there is the production of a person; but every production, just as it terminates at something produced, so also produces some existence; therefore, since a distinct person is produced, it follows that a distinct existence is produced. I reply that, if this argument had any force, it would in the same way prove that in the proceeding person a new nature and essence are produced. For if the production terminates at an existence produced, it must also terminate at an essence produced. But just as in the divine realities we say that there is another kind of production, by which, to wit, nature and essence are not produced, but the same essence of the producing person is communicated to the produced person, so also must it be said about existence and "to be," which are altogether the same: namely, that the production of a divine person is indeed a production of a person distinct from the producer; but by it there is communicated to the produced person the same "to be," and existence, and the same nature. Nor must it be said that what is produced is solely personality; but rather a person, which, according to our mode of understanding, consists of essence and personality. Thus the same essence of the producing person is communicated to the produced person, and another person is constituted inasmuch as it subsists under a different relation, which relation modifies and determines the same essence and existence as present to the new person; not, however, because generation produces only the mode of this existence, namely the relation. In the generation of a created person it falls out otherwise: because the nature of the begotten is produced with the mode of existing per se; and that mode is not made by a different production, since it does not have a different existence from the existence of the nature, but it modifies and determines it.

242. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 1; and III, c. 5, at the beginning: the distinction of persons according to mode of existing; and "mode of existence" is the name he uses for the personal properties.

Third reason. Because from the opposite opinion it would follow that three eternities must be conceded in God, which is against the Athanasian Symbol: "Not three eternals, but one eternal," where the name is plainly taken not adjectively but substantively, namely for eternity. For if there are three durations without beginning and without end and without succession, it follows that there are three eternities; for this is the definition of eternity. But if you say that three relative eternities can be conceded, not, however, without the aforesaid restriction - against this is what we said above about existence and duration.[243]

Some reply that three eternities cannot in any way, not even with that limitation "relative," be conceded as three durations are conceded; and they assign the reason for the difference: because the notion of eternity is not only duration without beginning and end and all at once, but also the most perfect duration; which no relation has from itself, but from the nature which it includes in itself; and it connotes, as its foundation, the immutability of the nature.

I indeed hold as most true that eternity is the most perfect duration, which notion of nature befits God, distinct from immutability according to notion, as I noted above; wherefore, if eternity in its notion does not include the immutability of the nature but presupposes it, there is no reason why it should not also befit relations according to the notion of relations, if also a proper duration befits them. From this, however, which is said - that the duration of relations is not most perfect, such as is that of the nature - there follows a greater absurdity: namely, that there is in God one most perfect duration and three less perfect ones. Then, if those three relative durations are not eternities, since they are durations without beginning and without end, either they will be time discretely, or "aeon" as the durations of angels; or participated eternities; or finally some new genus of durations - which consequences follow from once conceding in God several existences and several durations. Let, then, the contrary opinion go; and with the Fathers let us assert that the three persons have one existence, one duration, one eternity. And this is enough concerning the doctrine of this article.

243. Symbolum Athanasii: "Non tres aeterni, sed unus aeternus."

Articulus III - Whether the name "Person" ought to be posited in the divine

It is asked:

Objicitur: 1. Pseudo-Dionysius says in the beginning of On the Divine Names: "Universally, it is not to be dared to say or to think anything concerning the supersubstantial hidden divinity, beyond those things which have been divinely expressed to us from the holy oracles." But the name "person" is not expressed to us in sacred Scripture of the New or Old Testament. Therefore the name "person" is not to be used in divine matters.[244]

1. Moreover, Boethius says in the book On the Two Natures, at the beginning of chapter 3: the name "person" seems to be transferred from those masks (personae) which in comedies and tragedies represented men. For "persona" is said from "personare," because by its hollowness the sound must needs be made louder. But the Greeks call these masks "prosopa," from the fact that they are put on the face and cover the countenance before the eyes. But this cannot befit divine realities, unless perhaps metaphorically. Therefore the name "person" is not said of God except metaphorically.[245]
2. Moreover, every person is a hypostasis. But the name "hypostasis" does not seem to befit God; since, according to Boethius, it signifies that which is subjected to accidents, which are not in God. Jerome also says that, under this name hypostasis, "venom lies hidden beneath honey." Therefore this name "person" is not to be said of God.[245][246]
3. Moreover, from whatever a definition is removed, from that the definiendum is removed. But the definition of person set down above does not seem to befit God. First, because "reason" imports discursive cognition, which does not befit God, as was shown above; and thus God cannot be said to be of rational nature. Next also because God cannot be called an "individual substance," since the principle of individuation is matter, but God is immaterial; nor does He subsist in accidents, so as to be able to be called "substance." Therefore the name "person" ought not to be attributed to God.

But on the contrary: it is said in the Athanasian Symbol: "Other is the person of the Father, other of the Son, other of the Holy Spirit."[243] 244. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, at the beginning.

---

245. Boethius, De duabus naturis, c. 3, at the beginning (as cited).
245. Boethius, De duabus naturis, c. 3, at the beginning (as cited).
246. St. Jerome, Epistle to Damasus, which begins "Quoniam vetusto."
243. Symbolum Athanasii: "Non tres aeterni, sed unus aeternus."

I answer: "Person" signifies that which is most perfect in the whole of nature, namely that which subsists (subsistit) in a rational nature. Hence, since everything which pertains to perfection is to be attributed to God, because His essence contains in itself every perfection, it is fitting that this name "person" be said of God. Yet not in the same mode in which it is said of creatures, but in a more excellent mode: just as other names too, which are imposed by us from creatures, are attributed to God, as was shown above when treating of the divine names.

Reply to the first: Although the name "person" is not found said of God in the Scripture of the Old or New Testament, nevertheless that which the name signifies is found asserted of God in many ways in sacred Scripture: namely, that He is the most "per se" being and most perfectly intelligent. But if one had to say of God only those things according to the sound of the words which sacred Scripture hands down of God, it would follow that no one could ever speak about God except in that very language in which the Scripture of the Old or New Testament was first delivered. But the necessity of disputing with heretics compelled the inventing of new names signifying the ancient faith about God. Nor must this novelty be shunned, since it is not profane - inasmuch as it does not disagree with the sense of Scripture. But the Apostle teaches us to avoid profane novelties of words (1 Tim 6:20).[247]

Reply to the second: Although this name "person" does not befit God according to that from which the name was imposed - since in comedies and tragedies certain famous men were represented, and thus this name "persona" was imposed to signify those possessed of some dignity - yet it most of all befits God according to that which it was imposed to signify. For those who have some dignity are wont to be called "persons" in the Churches. Wherefore some define "person" saying that a person is "a hypostasis distinct by a property pertaining to dignity." And because it is of great dignity to subsist in a rational nature, therefore every individual of rational nature is called a person, as is well known. But the dignity of the divine nature exceeds every dignity. And according to this the name "person" most befits God.

Reply to the third: The name "hypostasis" does not befit God as to that on account of which the name was imposed, since He is not subject to accidents; it does befit Him, however, as to that for which it is imposed, namely to signify a subsistent thing. Jerome, moreover, says that under this name "venom lies hidden," because, before the signification of this name was fully known among Latins, the heretics by this name deceived the simple, so that they would confess several essences, just as they confess several hypostases; because the name "substance" (to which the Greek name "hypostasis" corresponds) is commonly taken among us for "essence."

Reply to the fourth: God can be said to be of rational nature, inasmuch as "reason" does not import discursus, but universally an intelligible nature. "Individual," moreover, does not befit God inasmuch as the principle of individuation is matter, but only inasmuch as it imports incommunicability. "Substance," indeed, befits God inasmuch as it signifies that which subsists per se. Certain men, however, say that the above definition of person does not befit God, but that the definition of person in God is different. Wherefore Richard of St. Victor, wishing to correct this definition, said that "person," according to which it is defined in God, is "the incommunicable existence of an intellectual nature."[241]

247. 1 Tim 6:20. "Devitans profanas vocum novitates."

Disputatio CXXVII

[on the name "person" in God]

What is said of God is the incommunicable existence (existentia) of the divine nature.

Observations concerning the doctrine of the Article.

Conclusion of the article is affirmative, and most certain according to the faith: for it is said in the Athanasian Symbol, "For one is the person of the Father, another of the Son, another of the Holy Spirit."[248] Also in the Council of Toledo XI and in the Lateran Council under Innocent III, and it is reported in the chapter Firmiter, on the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith, the Fathers use the name "person" to explain the mystery of the Trinity; this is familiar to all the Fathers and Councils, who explain this mystery by the name "hypostasis," as is seen in those things we cited in Disputation 124.[249] Moreover, in Greek person is called prosopon; and, as is clear from what was said in the exposition of the letter of the preceding article and in Disputation 126, hypostasis or subsistence (subsistentia) is broader than person: for the latter is only in a rational nature, whereas the former is in any substance.

But Laurentius Valla, in book 6 of the Elegantiae, chapter 34, with his usual liberty of speech, says these words: "Person is no more in man than in a brute: and further, if it must be said of God, it will no more signify substance than quality; for as much in God as in man the name 'person' signifies the quality of some substance, whereby it differs from another: the quality, I say, as well of soul as of body; as much external as internal - internal quality of soul, for example, that one studies assiduously, that he is a physician or a theologian; internal quality of body, for example, that he is a young man or an old man; and external, whether he is a husband or a bachelor. In the same way he thinks that in God three persons are said, because in Him three qualities are signified - paternity, filiation, and spiration; except that in God the qualities cannot be separated from Him, as the qualities of men can from them." Truly this author is manifestly in error, when, contrary to the common usage of the Councils and the Fathers, he refers the name "person" to quality alone, and not to substance, and does not concede that person is said only of a rational nature, as from the foregoing stands established. Moreover, that this name does not signify quality is proved, because we do not say that the person of the same man is different if he is a young man, or an old man, or a physician, or a theologian; for, if it signified quality only, the person would have to be said diverse in a youth and an old man, and so on.

---

241. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate V, c. 1.

248. Athanasian Creed: "Non tres aeterni, sed unus aeternus."

249. Lateran Council under Innocent III, chapter Firmiter, "De summa Trinitate et fide catholica" (and cf. Council of Toledo XI).

Nor does it stand in the way that, when asked "What person is Peter?", we are wont to answer by qualities: "he is a young man," "he is a theologian," and the like. For we do this when we explain his substance by qualities; or certainly because by that form of asking inquiry is wont to be made about the quality of the person himself. But when we say that the same man is a multiple person, both because he is a private person and because he carries the person of the magistrate, we speak so because he is substantially one person, and he represents another, namely the person of the prince, or some fictive person of the commonwealth, as St. Thomas observed in the second solution.

Cajetan proposes two doubts concerning the text of St. Thomas. The first is about that which he assumes in his reasoning, namely, that the most perfect thing in nature is person. The reason for doubting is that nature is by far more perfect than person. He himself answers that in God person is said to be the most perfect in nature, not because personality, that is, the ultimate terminus of person, is more perfect than nature itself, but because then nature is said to be in a more perfect mode when it is complete of itself by personality: for person includes nature itself, but adds the complement, namely personality. But he objects to himself: material individuals are less perfect than nature itself, because individuals are said to be by reason of nature, as by the most perfect; therefore nature is not in the most perfect mode when it is per se and constituted in the notion of person. He himself answers that nature is included in the individual, so as to show that the individual is not less perfect. Then he answers that here the discourse is about person not only as it is material, but universally, as it is common both to material and to spiritual. I, however, would say absolutely that even a material individual, subsisting per se, is in a more perfect mode than nature itself without that mode, and thus person is something most perfect in nature.

The second doubt is this: If it is true, as St. Thomas says, that person is something most perfect in nature and contains dignity (dignitas) insofar as it is person, it follows that in God there are three dignities, which are the three persons. Cajetan replies that person includes something of perfection in God, namely nature, and something abstracted from perfection and imperfection, namely relation (relatio). But against him we proved in Disputation 122, chapter 2, that relation also pertains to the perfection of God; and in what way it does not follow therefrom that there are in God three perfections real, and one in one person which is not in another, we also explained there in chapter 6.

Whether "person" signifies relation.

Objicitur: It seems that this name "person" does not signify relation, but substance in God. For Augustine says in book 7 On the Trinity: "When we say 'the person of the Father,' we say nothing else than the substance of the Father; for 'person' is said of Him with respect to Himself, not with respect to the Son."[250] Therefore this name "person" signifies substance.

1. Moreover: The question "who?" seeks the essence. But, as Augustine says in the same place, when it is said: "There are three who bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit," and it is asked, "who three?", it is answered, "three persons." Therefore this name "person" signifies essence.[250]
2. Moreover: According to the Philosopher in Metaphysics IV, a name is that which is signified through its definition; but the definition of person is "an individual substance of a rational nature," as was said. Therefore this name "person" signifies substance.[251]
3. Moreover: Person in men and in angels does not signify relation, but something absolute. If therefore in God it signified relation, it would be said equivocally of God and of men and angels.

But on the contrary is what Boethius says in the book On the Trinity, that every name pertaining to persons signifies relation. But no name pertains to person more than this name "person." Therefore this name "person" signifies relation.[252]

I answer: Concerning the signification of this name "person" in divine matters, a difficulty arises from the fact that it is predicated in the plural of three, contrary to the nature of essential names; nor is it said "to something," as are the names which signify relation. Hence it seemed to some that this name "person" simply, by the force of the word, signifies essence in the divine, as do this name "God" and this name "wise"; but on account of the urgency of the heretics it has been accommodated by ordinance of the Council, so that it can stand for relatives, and especially in the plural, or with a partitive name, as when we say "three persons," or "one is the person of the Father, another of the Son." In the singular, however, it can be taken for an absolute and for a relative. But this does not seem a sufficient reason. For if this name "person," by force of its signification, has not what it signifies except essence in the divine, from the fact that it is said "three persons," occasion would have been given them not merely for a heretical quibble, but for a greater calumny. And therefore others have said that this name "person" in divine matters signifies essence and relation at once. Of these some said that it signifies essence in the direct case, and relation in the oblique: because person is said as if "by itself one." But unity pertains to essence; what however is said "by itself" implies relation obliquely. For the Father is understood to be "by Himself" as if by a relation distinguished from the Son. Others, however, said conversely, that it

250. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII; cf. also VI, c. 4; and V, c. 9 (at the end).
250. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII; cf. also VI, c. 4; and V, c. 9 (at the end).
251. Aristotle, Metaphysics IV (text 28).
252. Boethius, De trinitate.

signifies relation in the direct case and essence in the oblique: because in the definition of person nature is put in the oblique. And these approached nearer to the truth. For the elucidation of this question it must be considered that there is something less common in signification which nevertheless is not outside the signification of something more common. For "rational" is included in the signification of "man," which however is not of the signification of "animal." Whence it is one thing to ask about the signification of "animal," and another to ask about the signification of "this animal" which is "man." Similarly, it is one thing to ask about the signification of this name "person" in common, and another about the signification of the divine person. For person in common signifies an individual substance of a rational nature, as was said. But what is individual is that which in itself is undivided, and is distinct from others. Therefore person, in any nature whatsoever, signifies that which is distinct in that nature. Thus in human nature it signifies "these fleshly parts, these bones, and this soul," which are the principles individuating this man; which things, although they are not of the signification of "person," are nevertheless of the signification of "human person." But distinction in the divine is made only by relations of origin, as was said above. Moreover, relation in the divine is not like an accident inhering in a subject, but is the divine essence itself. Whence also the subsisting divine essence subsists. Therefore, as "Godhead" is God, so the divine paternity is God the Father, who is a divine person. Therefore the divine person signifies relation and subsistence. And this is to signify relation under the mode of substance, which is a hypostasis subsisting in the divine nature; although that which subsists in the divine nature is not other than the divine nature.

And according to this it is true that this name "person" signifies relation in the direct case and essence in the oblique; not, however, relation insofar as it is relation, but insofar as it is a hypostasis subsisting in the divine nature; although that which subsists in the divine nature is not other than the divine nature. Similarly also it signifies essence in the direct case and relation in the oblique: in the oblique, insofar as essence is the same as hypostasis; but hypostasis in the divine is signified by a distinct relation. And, according to this, it can also be said that this signification of this name "person" was not perceived before the calumny of the heretics. Whence this name "person" was not in use except as one of the other absolutes. But after a time this name "person" was accommodated to stand for a relative by the congruity of its signification: that is to say, that this which stands for a relative has it not only by use (as the first opinion said), but also from its own signification.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this name "person" is said "with respect to self," not "with respect to another": because it signifies relation not under the mode of relation, but under the mode of substance, which is hypostasis. And according to this Augustine says that it signifies essence, insofar as in God essence is the same as hypostasis, because in God that which is and that by which He is do not differ.

Reply to the second: The question "what?" sometimes seeks the nature which the definition signifies: as when one asks "what is man?" and it is answered, "a rational, mortal animal." But sometimes it seeks the supposit (suppositum): as when one asks "what swims in the sea?" and it is answered, "a fish." And thus, to those asking "who three?" one will answer, "there are three persons."

Reply to the third: In the concept of an individual substance, that is, of one distinct or incommunicable, relation is understood in the divine, as was said.

Reply to the fourth: The diversity of the notions of less common terms does not cause equivocation in the more common. For although the proper definition of horse and of ass is different, nevertheless they are named univocally by the name "animal": because the common definition of "animal" comes to both. Whence it does not follow that, although in the signification of the divine person relation is contained, not however in the human, there is equivocation; because both agree in the common notion of an individual substance of a rational nature.

Conclusion of the article is: The divine person signifies relation as subsisting; whether, however, relation is signified directly and in the nominative, or consequently and obliquely, is not so manifest in the Holy Doctor; nevertheless we have elucidated his mind and the truth of the matter in the disputation.

Whether the name Person signifies relation, or substance

Caput I - Various Scholastic opinions

The first opinion in this matter is that of Scotus in the First Book, distinction 23, question 1, who, as it seems more probable to him, holds that the name "person" directly signifies neither substance (substantia) nor relation (relatio), but negation alone.[253] He proves the former thus: in the divine, substance is said singularly, but person plurally; therefore person does not signify substance. He shows the latter thus: Whatever the related term (relatum) is referred to inferiorly, it is also referred to superiorly, and the being of that thing is predicated of it. For instance, if "double of this" is said of "half of this," then, in the same way, double in general will be said "double of a half." Moreover, if "this double" is said to be related to "this half," so also double universally will be said to be related to half. Therefore, if "person" signifies relation, then it will also be said with respect to that terminus to which the relation itself that it signifies is referred; wherefore, just as we say, "the son is the father's son," and "he is related to the father," so also we could say, "the person of the Son is the person of the Father," which is absurd; therefore "person" does not signify relation. Scotus further adds that the name "person" signifies negation directly, but connotes three positives: for he takes the ultimate complement of the person to be the negation of communication - both as of a universal and as of a part - by which a thing is said to be not in another; on which we shall say more in the Third Part of St. Thomas, question 4, article 2.[254] And, indeed, he says the three connoted items in the divine person are these. First, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as certain inferiors contained under that negation. Second, the relation itself of paternity, filiation, or procession, by reason of which that negation belongs to the person. Third, the divine essence, which the person includes.

253. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1.
254. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, III, q. 4, a. 2.

But this view is not to be embraced: for, as we shall show more at large in the Third Part, "person" does not directly signify negation, although sometimes it is explained by a negation. And although in human matters it is not so easy to assign the peculiar mode by which the nature is contracted so as to be a person, nevertheless in the divine the mode is very manifest: for the personal properties, or relations, are that in which the Church recognizes and celebrates the number of persons, not negations; therefore Scotus poorly thinks that the name "person" directly and formally signifies negation; about which again in Disputation 130.

Among others who think this name signifies a positive thing, not all speak in the same way about that direct signified. The second opinion in order is that of the same Scotus in the First Book, distinction 27, question 1, and likewise in distinction 25, question 1, who affirms that this name does not signify relation, nor substance, but something common to relation and substance; if we are to say that it signifies not a negation, but a positive, which Scotus himself also deems probable.[255][256] Durandus vigorously attacks this view in the First Book, distinction 23, question 1, number 16, showing it to be impossible for there to be something common to the absolute and the relative except in name alone; which also we shall prove in passing in Disputation 130, chapter 3.[257]

The third opinion is of that same Durandus there, number 24, asserting that in the divine the name "person" directly signifies neither relation, nor substance, nor negation, but a certain denomination of second intention (as he calls it) - just as also the name "individual" signifies a second intention.

The fourth opinion is that of Cajetan in this article, who holds that in God the name "person" signifies formally and directly relation; but materially, and as it were consequently, or not directly, substance; and he thinks the Blessed Thomas to be of this view in this very article; indeed, he holds that he changed those things which previously he had followed in De potentia, question 9, article 4, where he had taught that the name "person" signifies directly substance, not, however, directly relation.[258] What Cajetan says can be recommended by this: because the name "person" directly signifies the personal property, and connotes, or not directly signifies, the nature which is contracted by the property; but in the divine, the personal property is relation, while the nature is substance: therefore the name "person" directly signifies relation, and connotes substance.

Fifth and finally, Alexander (I, question 56, member 2), and St. Bonaventure in I, dist. 25, article 1, question 1, and Gabriel, and Capreolus, and Marsilius, and the Canariensis against Cajetan in this very article diametrically oppose him: for they say that the name "person" directly signifies substance, but consequently relation.[259][260] The reason of this opinion is that person is

255. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 27, q. 1.
256. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 25, q. 1.
257. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, n. 16.
258. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 9, a. 4.

defined as an individual substance of a rational nature; therefore the direct signified of this name is an individual substance: wherefore, since it is rendered "an individual substance," that is, incommunicable, by relation, it comes about that relation also is connoted by the name "person" obliquely, as that by which the individual substance is what it is.

Caput II - The name Person signifies formally and directly substance; materially, however, but directly relation; essence, however, consequently

St. Thomas in this article remembers two posterior opinions which we reported in the preceding chapter, and he says that each seems to have something of the truth; wherefore he himself embraces a middle way, which in my judgment is truest; nor did he retract that which he had taught in De potentia, question 9.[258] Accordingly, he asserts that the name "person" signifies directly and formally substance; and also directly, but materially, it signifies relation; essence (essentia) moreover it connotes consequently and obliquely.

Now, that we may confirm this opinion, it must be noted that the signified of any name is twofold: one is the direct signified, which is wont to be unfolded in the nominative case; the other is the non-direct signified, which is said to be connoted, and is unfolded in an oblique case; we have both in the definition of person. For when we say, "It is an individual substance," we express the direct signified; but when there is added, "of a rational nature," we denote the non-direct signified, which is in the oblique. Again, something can be directly signified in a twofold way: both formally, when it is expressly unfolded by the very name, and also materially, when it is not expressed distinctly, but is contained as the subject and the material of the formal signified.

Accordingly, in the present case, the name "person" directly and distinctly expresses substance, and by connotation signifies not essence, but substance - namely subsistence (subsistentia), in Greek hypostasis (hypostasis), or, as Richard of St. Victor (whom we cited in the preceding disputation) speaks, existence; but it signifies essence in the oblique, as we noted a little earlier, when we said "of a rational nature." But if we speak of the direct signified of this name in the material sense, it is the relation itself: for that in which an incommunicable subsistence stands is the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, which directly signify relations - but in another way than "person": for this name does not express hypostasis under a relative name, but under the concept of subsistence, whether this be a relation or something absolute. For if the divine persons were constituted by absolute properties, they would not be signified by the names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; yet they would be signified by the names person and hypostasis; and this rightly proves Scotus's argument which we reported in the preceding chapter. For if the name "person" expressly signified relation, we should say "the person of someone" (just as a father is said to be the father of someone), namely, of him to whom it would be referred - which is absurd, as is there noted; by which very reasoning St. Augustine proves, in book 7 On the Trinity, chapter 6, that the name "person" is not said relatively as "father" is.[261]

259. Alexander of Hales, I, q. 56, memb. 2.
260. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 25, a. 1, q. 1.
258. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 9, a. 4.

And thus his saying, namely, that to signify relation in God he understands expressly and formally, as has been explained. But when St. Thomas said in this article that the divine person signifies relation, he wished to say, not as relation, but as subsisting: because it does not signify relation under an express concept of relation, but under the concept of substance, that is, of subsistence and hypostasis, which is the direct and formal signified; but it signifies relation materially, yet directly: because that is what it is to be a hypostasis. Likewise, when in the same article he says that the name "person" signifies essence in the nominative, insofar as it is the same as hypostasis, and relation in the oblique - which is, as it were, not directly - this must be understood thus: namely, that essence under the concept of hypostasis is the direct and formal signified, as has been explained; but relation abstractly is the connoted in the oblique: because essence is rendered hypostasis incommunicable by relation. But when we say that relation is directly with the signification of the name "person," although materially, we understand it in the concrete: that is, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

From what has been said it follows, first, against the first opinion of Scotus, that the name "person" does not formally signify negation only, or the mode of a subsistent. Second, against Durandus, that the name "person" does not signify a second intention, as we have shown in the two places cited. Third, it follows that Cajetan was mistaken in asserting that this name signifies formally relation, and materially substance; since rather in the opposite way does it signify these two things, as has been proved. Nor does his argument prove anything more than that relation is signified in the concrete directly by the name "person," not formally, but materially; which we do not deny. Wherefore the opinion of Alexander and of others is true in part, as the Holy Doctor says in this article, in that, I say, he teaches that it directly signifies substance, not relation; and he is speaking only of the formal signified, and not also of the material signified, as we explained. Finally, against those things that have been said, the second argument of Scotus has no strength, which tried to prove that that name does not signify substance, because substance is not multiplied, whereas "person" is multiplied in God. For not every "substance" is not multiplied in God, but that which is taken for essence; but that which is called hypostasis or subsistence is multiplied, as "person" is multiplied. And this suffices concerning the doctrine of this question 29.

Quaestio XXX - On the plurality of persons

Then there is asked about the plurality of persons. And concerning this four things are asked.

261. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII, c. 6.

Articulus I - Whether there are several persons in the divine

Objection 1. It seems first that there are not several persons in the divine. For person is an individual substance of a rational nature. If therefore there are several persons in the divine, it follows that there are several substances; which seems heretical.

Objection 2. Further, a plurality of absolute properties does not make a distinction of persons, neither in God nor in us; much less therefore does a plurality of relations. But in God there is no other plurality than of relations, as was said above. Therefore one cannot say that in God there are several persons.

Objection 3. Further, Boethius says that concerning God one must speak thus, that this is true in him, that there is no number. But plurality imports number. Therefore there are not several persons in the divine.[262]

Objection 4. Further, wherever there is number, there is a whole and a part. If therefore in God there is a number of persons, there will be in God a whole and a part; which the divine simplicity rejects.

But on the contrary: what Athanasius says, "One is the person of the Father, another of the Son, another of the Holy Spirit." Therefore the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are several persons.

I answer that: That there are several persons in the divine follows from the things set forth. For it has been shown above that subsistence (subsistentia) is multiplied, as person is multiplied. And this suffices for the doctrine of this question.

I said that St. Thomas meant, when he said that the divine person signifies relation not as relation, but as subsistent, that it does not signify relation under the express concept of relation, but under the concept of substance, that is, subsistence (subsistentia) and hypostasis, which is the direct and formal signification; but it signifies the relation materially, yet directly, because it is that by which the hypostasis is constituted. Likewise, when in the same article he says that this name signifies essence in the nominative, inasmuch as it is the same thing as hypostasis, and relation in an oblique case, this ought to be understood in this way: namely, that essence, under the notion of hypostasis, is the direct and formal signified, as was explained; but relation is abstractly the connoted in the oblique case, because essence is rendered an incommunicable hypostasis by relation. When, however, we said that relation is the direct signification of the name person, albeit materially, we understand this in the concrete, as it is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.[263]

From what has been said it follows, first, against the earlier opinion of Scotus, that the name person does not formally signify a mere negation, but the mode of subsisting of itself. Secondly, against Durandus, that the name person does not signify a second intention: both of which we shall show more at length in the places cited. Thirdly, it follows that Cajetan was deceived when he asserted that this name signifies relation formally and substance materially; for rather it signifies these two in the opposite way, as has been proved. Nor does his reason prove anything other than that relation is signified in the concrete directly by the name person, not formally, but materially - which we do not deny. Wherefore Alexander's opinion, and that of others, is true in part, as the holy Doctor said in this article, to wit, in that he teaches that the direct signified is substance, not relation, if he speak of the formal signified only, not also of the material, as we have explained. Finally, what he adds beyond this lends no strength to the things said, namely Scotus's second reason, by which he contends that that name does not signify substance, because substance is not multiplied, whereas person is multiplied in God: for not every substance is not multiplied in God, but that which is taken for essence; but that which is called hypostasis, or subsistence, is multiplied, as person is.[264][265][266]

262. Boethius, De Trinitate.
263. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27, a. 1.

Whether it is to posit several persons in the divine

Objicitur: First, it seems that one ought not to posit several persons in the divine. For person is an individual substance of a rational nature. If therefore there are several persons in the divine, it follows that there are several substances. Which seems heretical.

1. Further, a plurality of absolute properties does not make a distinction of persons, neither in God nor in us; therefore much less does a plurality of relations. But in God there is no other plurality than of relations, as was said above. Therefore one cannot say that there are several persons in God.
2. Further, Boethius, speaking of God, says that "this is truly One, in which there is no number." But plurality imports number. Therefore there are not several persons in the divine.
3. Further, wherever there is number, there is whole and part. If therefore in God there is the number of persons, there will be in God a whole and a part. Which is repugnant to the divine simplicity.

But on the contrary: Athanasius says, "One is the person of the Father, another of the Son, another of the Holy Spirit." Therefore the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are several persons.[267]

I answer that: That there are several persons in the divine follows from the premisses. For it has been shown above that this name "person" signifies in God a relation as a thing subsisting in the divine nature.[263] But it has been set forth above that there are several real relations in the divine. Whence it follows that there are several subsistents in the divine nature. And this is to be several persons in the divine.

264. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1.
265. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1.
266. Cajetan, In Iam, q. 27, a. 1.
267. Athanasian Creed.
263. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27, a. 1.

Reply to the first: Substance is not put into the definition of person insofar as it signifies essence, but insofar as it signifies supposit. This is clear from the fact that "individual" is added. But to signify substance as thus said, the Greeks have the name hypostasis. Whence as we say three persons, so they say three hypostases. We, however, are not wont to say three substances, lest three essences be understood because of the equivocation of the name.[268][269]

Reply to the second: Absolute properties in the divine (such as goodness and wisdom) are not opposed to one another; hence neither are they really distinguished. Therefore, although it befits them to subsist, still they are not several subsisting things, which is to be several persons. But in created things absolute properties do not subsist, although they are really distinguished among themselves, as whiteness and sweetness. Relative properties, however, in God both subsist and are really distinguished among themselves, as was said above. Whence the plurality of such properties suffices for the plurality of persons in the divine.[270]

Reply to the third: By reason of the highest unity and simplicity, every plurality of absolute things said absolutely is excluded from God, but not the plurality of relations, which relations are predicated of something as to another. And thus they do not import composition in that in which they are said, as Boethius teaches in the same book.[271]

Reply to the fourth: Number is twofold, namely a simple or absolute number, as two and three and four; and there is the number which is in things numbered, as two men and two horses. If therefore in the divine number be taken absolutely or abstractly, nothing prevents there being whole and part in it; and thus it exists only in the acceptance of our intellect. For an absolute number apart from things numbered exists only in the intellect. But if we take number as it is in things numbered, thus in created things one is a part of two, and two of three, as one man of two, and two of three. And thus it is not in God, because the Father is as great as the whole Trinity, as will be clear below.[272]

Notations around the article.

The conclusion is affirmative, and from the foregoing article sufficiently manifest; it is expressly set forth in the Athanasian Creed: "One is the person of the Father, another of the Son, another of the Holy Spirit."

But with respect to the solution of the fourth, there is a difficulty proposed in the same argument in this way. If there is in God a number of persons, it follows that there is in Him something greater and less, something more perfect and less perfect; that there are also whole and parts: for all these are found in any number whatsoever. First, because in any multitude the whole multitude is something greater than if one take away some unity of it. Then, because a whole

268. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VI, c. 8.
269. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII, c. 6.
270. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 28, a. 3.
271. Boethius, De Trinitate.
272. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 42, a. 4.

number is something more perfect than a part of it. Lastly, because an entire number has the notion of a whole, and each unity the notion of a part. But these are absurd: for it is said in the Athanasian Creed, "In this Trinity there is nothing earlier or later; nothing greater or less."

St. Thomas answers in this way. If the number which is in the divine be taken absolutely and abstractly, nothing hinders that there be there whole and part; and he will say the same about the other things which we inferred in the argument: because in this way only by the intellect is it said to be whole and part, greater and less, more perfect and less perfect: if, however, number be taken as it is in the things themselves, nothing of these is found in the number of the divine persons. The solution, indeed, if it be rightly explained, is most true; but at first sight it seems not sufficiently to satisfy the argument: for if those things agree to number taken abstractly, they ought also to agree to number contracted to any matter whatsoever, and hence to the number of the divine persons; because what agree to number as such agree also to such a number, although not conversely. For the things which are said of the common and superior are also said of the inferior and singular.

Wherefore, to make this matter plain, note with Gabriel in the first book, dist. 24, q. 2, art. 3, first doubt, that "greater" and "less" can be considered in two ways: according to continuous quantity and according to discrete quantity. He understands continuous quantity either as quantity which they call of bulk, or that which they call of virtue and perfection: so that for something to be greater than another by the continuous quantity of bulk, it ought to be more extended; but by the quantity of virtue it ought to be more perfect in its entity and existence (esse). And in this way in the Trinity nothing is found greater, nothing less; and this is what St. Thomas meant when he said, "The Father is as great as the whole Trinity;" that is, as perfect by the continuous quantity of virtue and entity.

In this same way there is not found in the number of the Trinity a whole and a part: whereas in the multitude of other things the whole number is greater, that is, more perfect by a as-it-were continuous quantity than some of its unities: for a ternary of men is of greater perfection than a binary; and a ternary of horses is of more worth than a binary. But for something to be greater than another by discrete quantity, it need not be more perfect: it is enough if in one multitude there are said to be more than in another; and thus we grant in the Trinity a greater and a lesser number, that is, more and fewer unities: for the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are more than the Father and the Son. Nor did St. Thomas teach anything against this doctrine; rather he indicated it briefly, when he said that in number itself taken abstractly there is greater and less; but not in the number contracted to the divine persons: as if he were saying: in the perfection of the persons themselves there is not greater and less - for this is attended to by the continuous quantity of virtue and perfection: nevertheless there is greater and less in the abstract number, that is, by reason of discrete number, without regard had to the perfection of the persons in themselves: there is a greater and a lesser number, which indeed is true. Therefore St. Thomas understands by abstract number only the ratio of discrete quantity and multitude in any matter whatsoever. In this way there is found whole and part in the Trinity, that is, the whole number and the parts thereof, namely the individual unities; there is also found greater and less, more perfect and less perfect, because the greater number and the more perfect number is ternary than binary by reason of multitude and discrete quantity.

But it is to be observed that these names "greater" and "less" are not to be applied to the Trinity without an addition: because in the common mode of speaking they denote a greater and lesser perfection in continuous quantity; and therefore Athanasius said in the Creed, "In this Trinity nothing is greater or less": wherefore it will be necessary to speak with an addition in this way: in God there is a greater and a lesser number. The same must be said of whole and parts, and of more perfect and less perfect. Yet we could say, more and fewer persons, because these names signify more and less in discrete quantity.

Articulus II - Whether there are more than three persons in God

Objicitur: In the second way one proceeds. It seems that in God there are more persons than three. For the plurality of persons in the divine is according to the plurality of relative properties, as was said. But there are four relations in the divine (as was said above), namely paternity, filiation, common spiration, and procession. Therefore there are four persons in the divine.[273][274]

1. Further, nature does not differ more from will in God than nature from intellect. But in the divine there is a person who proceeds by mode of will, as love, and another who proceeds by mode of nature, as the Son. Therefore there is also another who proceeds by mode of intellect, as the Word; and thus again it follows that there are not only three persons in the divine.
2. Further, among created things what is more excellent has more intrinsic operations: thus man above the other animals has understanding and willing; and God infinitely exceeds every creature. Therefore there is not only a person proceeding by mode of will and by mode of intellect, but also by infinitely other modes. Therefore there are infinite persons in the divine.
3. Further, from infinite goodness it is fitting that it communicate itself infinitely by producing a divine person. But in the Holy Spirit there is infinite goodness. Therefore the Holy Spirit produces a divine person; and that one another; and so on to infinity.
4. Further, everything which is contained under a determinate number is measured; for number is a certain measure. But the divine persons are immense, as is clear from Athanasius: "Immense the Father, immense the Son, immense the Holy Spirit." Therefore they are not contained under a determinate number.[267]

273. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 28, a. 4.
274. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 9, a. 4.
267. Athanasian Creed.

But on the contrary: It is said in 1 John, at the end: "There are three who bear witness in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit." But when one asks, three what, the answer is, three persons, as St. Augustine says in the seventh book on the Trinity. Therefore there are only three persons in the divine.[275][269]

I answer that: According to what has been set forth, it is necessary to posit only three persons in the divine. For it has been shown that several persons are several relations subsisting, really distinct from one another. But real distinctions among the divine relations are only by reason of relative opposition. Therefore it is necessary that two opposed relations pertain to two persons. If, however, opposed relations are not in the same person, it is necessary that they pertain to distinct persons. Therefore paternity and filiation (since they are opposed relations) necessarily pertain to two persons. Paternity, therefore, subsisting, is the person of the Father; and filiation subsisting is the person of the Son. But the other two relations have opposition to those, but are not opposed to each other; it is therefore impossible that both belong to one person. It is necessary, then, that either one of them belong to both of the aforesaid persons, or that one belong to one and the other to another. But it cannot be that procession belong to the Father and the Son, or to either of them: because thus it would follow that the procession of the intellect, which is generation in the divine, according to which paternity and filiation are taken, would be posterior to the procession of love according to which spiration and procession are taken; and the person begetting and the begotten would proceed from the spirating, which is against what has been premised. Therefore it remains that only three persons are in the divine, namely the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

Reply to the first: Although there are four relations in the divine, yet of them the spiration is not separated from the persons of the Father and of the Son, but includes both; and thus, although it is a relation, it does not constitute but embraces not one person only, nor therefore is it called a personal relation; and so it is not called a constituting relation of a person. But these three relations - paternity, filiation, and procession - are called personal properties, as constituting the persons. For paternity is the property of the Father; filiation of the Son; and procession of the Holy Spirit.

1. Moreover. In created things, that which is more excellent has more intrinsic operations. Thus man, above the other animals, has understanding and willing; but God surpasses every creature to an infinite degree. Therefore there is in God not only a person proceeding according to the mode of will and according to the mode of intellect, but according to infinitely many other modes. Therefore there are infinitely many persons in the Godhead.
2. Moreover. From the infinite goodness of the Father it follows that He communicate Himself infinitely by producing a divine person. But in the Holy Spirit there is infinite goodness. Therefore the Holy Spirit produces a divine person, and that one another, and so on to infinity.

275. 1 John 5:7.
269. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII, c. 6.

3. Moreover. Whatever is contained under a determinate number is measurable. For number is a kind of measure. But the divine persons are immense, as is clear from the Athanasian Creed: "Immense the Father, immense the Son, immense the Holy Spirit."[276] Therefore they are not contained under the ternary number.

But on the contrary is what is said in 1 John, last chapter: "There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit."[277] And when one asks, "What three?" the answer is given: "Three persons," as St. Augustine says in De Trinitate, book 7, chapter 4, and the following.[278] Therefore there are only three persons in the Godhead.

I answer that, according to what has been set forth above, it is necessary to posit only three persons in the Godhead. For it has been shown that several persons are several subsisting relations really distinct from one another; but a real distinction among the divine relations exists only by reason of relative opposition. Therefore it is necessary that two opposed relations pertain to two persons. And if there are relations which are not opposed, it is necessary that they pertain to the same person. Therefore paternity and filiation, since they are opposed relations, necessarily pertain to two persons. Accordingly, paternity, as subsisting, is the person of the Father; and filiation, as subsisting, is the person of the Son. But the other two relations have opposition to neither of these; rather, they are opposed to each other. It is therefore impossible that both should belong to one person. It must be then that either one of them belongs to both of the aforementioned persons, or that one belongs to one, and the other to the other; yet it cannot be that procession belongs to the Father and the Son, or to either of them; for thus it would follow that the procession of the intellect, which is generation in the Godhead, according to which paternity and filiation are taken, would proceed from the procession of love, according to which spiratio and procession are taken, and the generating and the generated person would proceed from the spirating person - which is contrary to the foregoing. It remains, therefore, that spiratio belongs to the person of the Father and to the person of the Son, as having no relative opposition either to paternity or to filiation. And consequently it is necessary that procession belong to another person, which is called the person of the Holy Spirit, who proceeds according to the mode of love, as was treated above.[279] Therefore it remains that there are only three persons in the Godhead, namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

Reply to the first: Although there are four relations in the Godhead, nevertheless one of them, namely spiratio, is not separated from the person of the Father and of the Son, but belongs to both. And thus, although it is a relation, it is not called a property, because it does not belong to one person alone; nor is it a personal relation, that is, one constituting a person. But these three relations - paternity, filiation, and procession - are called personal properties as constituting the persons. For paternity is the person of the Father; filiation, the person of the Son; procession, the person of the Holy Spirit proceeding.

---

276. Athanasian Creed.
277. 1 John 5:7.
278. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII, c. 4 and the following.
279. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27.

Reply to the second: That which proceeds according to the mode of intellect, as word, proceeds according to the notion of likeness, just as also that which proceeds according to the mode of nature. And therefore it has been said above that the procession of the divine Word is generation itself according to the mode of nature; but love, insofar as it is of this sort, does not proceed as a likeness of that from which it proceeds - although in the Godhead love is coessential insofar as it is divine. And therefore the procession of love is not called generation in the Godhead.[280] [281]

Reply to the third: Since man is more perfect than the other animals, he has more intrinsic operations than the other animals, because his perfection is by way of composition. Hence in the angels, who are more perfect and simpler, there are fewer intrinsic operations than in man, for in them there is not imagining, sensing, and the like. But in God, as to the reality, there is but one operation, which is His essence; yet how there are two processions has been shown above.

Reply to the fourth: That reasoning would proceed, if the Holy Spirit had a goodness numerically other than the goodness of the Father; for then it would be necessary that, just as the Father by His goodness produces a divine person, so also the Holy Spirit would. But one and the same is the goodness of the Father and of the Holy Spirit. Nor is there any distinction except by personal relations - whence goodness belongs to the Holy Spirit as had from another, and to the Father as that by which it is communicated to another. But the opposition of relation does not permit that, together with the relation of the Holy Spirit, there be the relation of principle with respect to a divine person; for He proceeds from the other persons, which alone can be in the Godhead.

Reply to the fifth: A determinate number, if number be taken as the simple number which exists only in the understanding's apprehension, is measured by unity. But if the number of realities be taken, in the case of the divine persons, then the ratio of the measurable does not apply there, because the "magnitude" of the three persons is the same, as will be clear below; and the same is not measured by the same.[282]

Dubitationes circa Articulum.

The conclusion of the article is: There are not more than three persons in God. This is of faith on the authority of John, last chapter: "There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit"; and it is gathered from all that we have said concerning question 27 of St. Thomas.[277] [283]

But regarding those points which St. Thomas asserts in the text, Cajetan proposes two doubts. The first is this: In order that the holy Doctor might infer that there are three persons in God, he proved that passive procession does not belong to the Father and the Son together, because it would follow that the procession through the will would be prior, by priority of origin, to the procession through the intellect. But he does not prove that passive procession does not belong to

280. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27, a. 3.
281. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27, aa. 1 and 4.
282. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 4, a. 2.
277. 1 John 5:7.
283. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae, I, q. 27.

the Son alone - which nevertheless he ought to have proved. For if the Son were produced through the intellect and the will together, the same person could be the Son and the Holy Spirit; and thus there would not be three persons.

Cajetan answers that the same absurdity entirely follows if we say that procession through the will belongs to the Son. For thus it is necessary either that the Son be produced first through the will, and then the procession through the will will be prior to the procession through the intellect; or that the Son be produced afterwards through the will, and this is impossible, because a person produced at once by one procession cannot be produced anew by another. But you will say: He could be produced at once through the intellect and through the will, and thus the same person would be begotten and proceeding. I answer, here St. Thomas is presupposing what he had said in question 27, namely, that there are two distinct processions, one through the intellect, the other through the will; but thus it is not possible that by both a person be produced equally in the first instant; for the same thing cannot be produced by two productions at once. How, however, procession through the will differs from procession through the intellect - namely, because that person who is through the will proceeds from the Father and the Son, and why, if He did not proceed from the Son, the procession through the will would be the same as the procession through the intellect - we shall show in Disputation 14.

The second doubt is: How is it true that only relative opposition in God is the cause of the distinction of persons, since procession is really distinguished from paternity, to which it is not opposed? Cajetan answers that one thing may be opposed relatively in two ways: either by reason of an opposed relation, as paternity and filiation; or by reason of origin, when two are so disposed that one is from the other - thus passive procession is opposed to paternity and to filiation, as if one were to say, it is opposed by reason of an adjoined relation, namely active spiration, which is conjoined to filiation and to paternity. How, however, this suffices, and whether, if active spiration were not conjoined to paternity, nevertheless paternity would be distinguished from passive procession, or not, we shall explain in the cited disputation, chapter 6.

Articulus III - Whether numerical terms posit something in the Godhead

It seems that numerical terms posit something in the Godhead.

1. For the divine unity is His essence. But every number is repeated unity. Therefore every numerical term in the Godhead signifies the essence. Therefore it posits something in God.
2. Moreover. Whatever is said of God and of creatures belongs to God more eminently than to creatures. But numerical terms posit something in creatures. Therefore much more in God.

3. Moreover. If numerical terms do not posit something in the Godhead, but are introduced only to remove, so that by plurality unity be removed, and by unity plurality, it follows that there would be a circulation in the account, confounding the intellect and certifying nothing - which is unfitting. Therefore it remains that numerical terms posit something in the Godhead.

But on the contrary is what St. Hilary says in book 4 On the Trinity: "The confession of consort removes the understanding of singleness and solitude, which is a confession of plurality."[284] And St. Ambrose says in the book On the Faith: "When we say one God, unity excludes a plurality of gods; we do not impose quantity in God."[285] From which it seems that such names have been introduced in the Godhead to remove, not to posit, something.

I answer that the Master in the Sentences holds that numerical terms do not posit something in the Godhead, but only remove. Others say the contrary. For the understanding of this, it must be considered that every plurality follows upon some division; but division is twofold. One is material, which is according to the division of the continuous, and this is followed by number, which is a species of quantity. Hence such number exists only in material things having quantity. The other is formal division, which is by opposed or diverse forms; and this division is followed by multitude, which is in no genus, but is among the transcendentals, according as being is divided by one and many. And only such a multitude occurs in immaterial things. Certain persons, therefore, considering nothing but the multitude which is a species of discrete quantity (because they saw that discrete quantity has no place in the Godhead), maintained that numerical terms do not posit something in God, but only remove.

We, however, say that the numerical terms, insofar as they enter into divine predication, are not taken from number, which is a species of quantity: for in that way they would not be said of God except metaphorically, as are other properties of bodily things, such as breadth, length, and the like. Rather, they are taken from multitude, according as it is a transcendental. But multitude thus taken has this mode of bearing to the many of which it is predicated, as the one, which is commensurate with being, bears to being. Now a one of this sort (as was said above when we treated of the unity of God) adds nothing above being, except only the negation of division. For "one" signifies an undivided being. And therefore, of whatever it is said that it is one, that thing is signified as undivided: thus "one" said of a man signifies the nature or substance of a man as not divided. By the same reason, when things are said to be many, multitude thus taken signifies those things with an absence of division around each one of them. But number, which is a species of quantity, posits a certain accident added above being, and likewise the "one," which is the principle of number. Therefore numerical terms signify in the divine those things of which they are said, and beyond this they add nothing except a negation, as has been said: and to this extent the Master in the Sentences spoke truly. Thus, when we say, "the essence is one," "one" signifies the essence as undivided. When "the person is one," it signifies the person as undivided. When we say, "the persons are many," those persons are signified, and the absence of division around each one of them: because it belongs to the notion of multitude that it be constituted out of unities.

284. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, IV.
285. St. Ambrose, De fide.

Reply to the first: Since "one" is among the transcendentals, it is more common than substance, quantity, and relation; and similarly, "multitude." Hence it can stand in the divine both for substance and for relation, according as it suits those to which it is adjoined. And yet by names of this sort there is added above essence or relation, from their proper signification, a certain negation of division, as has been said.

Reply to the second: The multitude which posits something in created things is a species of quantity, which is not taken into divine predication, but only the transcendental multitude, which adds nothing beyond the things of which it is said, except absence of division around each. And such a multitude is said of God.

Reply to the third: The one is not a remover of multitude, but of division, which is prior according to reason to both "one" and "multitude." But multitude does not remove unity; rather, it removes division around each one of those of which the multitude consists. And these things were set out above when the divine unity was treated. Yet it must be known that the authorities adduced on the opposite side do not sufficiently prove what was proposed. For although solitude is excluded by plurality, and the plurality of gods by unity, nevertheless it does not follow that by these names this alone is signified. For blackness is excluded by whiteness, yet by the name of whiteness there is not signified the exclusion of blackness alone.

Disputatio CXXVIII - Whether the name "unity" signifies something positive, or only a negation

The conclusion of the article is: The numerical terms, which are said of God, besides those things of which they are said, signify nothing else but a negation. And this conclusion is exceedingly difficult; wherefore it must be examined expressly in the following disputation.

Whether the name unity signifies something positive, or only a negation.

Disputation 128.

Unity formally to be only a certain negation in being, St. Thomas, and others, think. cap. 1.

The formal notion of unity, which is a passion of being, to be something positive, Alexander, St. Bonaventure, and Scotus more probably judge. cap. 2.

An answer is given to the foundation of the first opinion, concerning the unity which is the principle of predicamental number. cap. 3.

First Book, distinction 24, question 1, number 9, and question 2, number 11, and the following; of Gabriel on the same distinction, question 1, article 3, doubt 3; of Capreolus, question 1, article 1, conclusion 3; of Gregory, question 1, article 1, at the beginning and in conclusion 3; of Henry, Quodlibet 1, question 1, letter A: who affirm that the formal notion of unity is the negation of division; wherefore they say that the same thing is formally "one" and "undivided."

Unity formally to be only a certain negation in being, St. Thomas, and others, think.

It is proved: The formal notion of unity is, as it were, the ratio of "undividedness" in being, and thus is conceived negatively; hence they say that the ratio of one does not add any positive entity beyond being, but only removes division. And they do not merely teach this, so that the formal ratio of one be expressed by a negation; but also, that nothing answers to that negation as though materially signified, in which the formal ratio of unity might consist: just as the word "incorruptible" expressly signifies a negation; and yet there answers to it a positive ratio, as the materially signified, which we express better by a negation.

It is proved by this single argument. By whatever positive ratio removed from being - even by the intellect - being always remains one: therefore by no positive [ratio] is it constituted in the notion of "one"; nothing else remains but negation; therefore unity consists in negation. Moreover, it is to be observed that St. Thomas speaks only of the unity which they call entitative, and which is wont to be constituted a passion of being, and is found in any thing in the world. For if the discourse be of the unity which is the principle of predicamental number, he thinks that unity adds above substance some positive notion, namely to be the principle of number. For he teaches that the number of the predicament of quantity is found only in quantified things: for in other things there does not seem to be any number, except by our reason constituting and numbering the first, second, and third unity; and so of the others.

First Part, question 13, member 1 and 2, of St. Bonaventure on the First Book, distinction 24, article 1, question 1, and of Scotus on Metaphysics IV, question 4, to be more probable: who teach that this formal notion of unity is something positive; although they explain it in different ways. Alexander judges it to be the conformation of the effect to the first cause in the genus of efficient cause: for he says that the conformation to the first cause in the genus of exemplar, and as it were formal, is truth; and in the genus of final cause, is goodness - two other passions of being.[286] Others, however, do not at all explain the ratio of unity, but only affirm that it is some positive ratio.

This opinion, in my judgment, is expressly stated by Aristotle in Metaphysics X, chapter 5, where he writes in these words: "Opposed, however, are one and many in many ways: of which, in one [way], one and multitude, as indivisible and divisible; for what is either divided or divisible is called, in a certain way, multitude; but what is indivisible or not divided, one. But since the modes of opposition are four, of these one is said to be according to privation; they will be contraries indeed, and neither as contradiction nor as relatives." Since he says that there are four genera of oppositions, and, those enumerated, he concludes that unity and multitude are contraries: who would dare to deny that they are not only opposed privatively, as the adversaries contend?

286. Alexander of Hales, Summa, Prima pars, q. 13, memb. 1 - 2; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 24, a. 1, q. 1; Scotus, In IV Metaph., q. 4.

Objection, taken from the words of Aristotle. But you will object: Aristotle also said that they are opposed according to privation, when he adds, "of these one is said according to privation." He did not deny this genus of opposition between one and many, as he denied the opposition of contradiction and of relation.

First reply. I answer first: even if he did not deny that opposition, at least he did not assert that they are opposed only according to privation: but when he added, "they will be contraries indeed," by which words he enumerated the genus of contrary opposition as one of the four which he said there to be, he expressly meant that they are opposed contrarily. Wherefore, if we concede that they are opposed privatively, we must assert it in such wise that we do not deny that they are also opposed contrarily. For what the Commentator says in that place, namely that therefore Aristotle said that the opposition is reduced to the privative opposition, by which properly "one" and "many" are opposed, is fictitious.[287] For if one and many were properly opposed privatively, and in no way contrarily, even if the contrary opposition be reduced to the privative, Aristotle ought not, from among the four genera of opposition which he proposed in that place, to have chosen that which was not proper to unity and multitude; and he ought rather to have assigned that to them more assertively. For from the cited words it is not sufficiently clear that Aristotle assigned the privative opposition to unity and multitude. Wherefore St. Thomas, on that place, teaches that the opinion is that one and many are opposed contrarily, since the words of Aristotle plainly indicate this; and that he added those words beforehand, "of these one [is] according to privation," not so as to assert that one and many are opposed privatively, but because opposition according to privation is the root of contrary opposition - whether this be true matters little to us; this suffices us at present, that, according to St. Thomas's mind there, one and many, in Aristotle's sense in that passage, are opposed as contraries, insofar as they are said to be divided and undivided.

Further reply. Next I answer that by the words, "of these one is said according to privation," Aristotle did not assert that one and many are opposed privatively, but he enumerated one genus of opposition out of the four which he said to be, and he left it aside as least fitting to unity and multitude; then, before he enumerated the remaining [genera], he affirmed that they are opposed contrarily, by the words, "they will be contraries indeed." Finally, he recounts the other two genera, and openly confesses that the opposition of relation does not suit unity and multitude thus taken.

This exposition I gather from the following words, which are these: "But it is said conversely of one itself, and it is signified from the divisible [that it is] indivisible, because multitude and the divisible are more sensible." As if he were to say: therefore "one" is signified by a negation of what is opposed, when it is called "indivisible," even if it be opposed there as a contrary; because multitude is more sensible and known; and because, as he says a little below, we signify by a negation the simple and first things, of which sort is unity, although their ratio is positive: which ratio Alexander also gives in the place cited.

287. Averroes (the Commentator), In Metaphysicam X, ad locum.

Yet, it seems difficult what, at the beginning of the chapter, Aristotle said in these words: "Opposed, however, are one and many in many ways: of which, in one [way], one and multitude, as indivisible and divisible; for what is either divided or divisible is, in a certain way, called multitude; but what is indivisible or not divided, one. But since the genera of oppositions are four," and the rest which we have recited above: by which words Aristotle seems to teach that one and many are opposed not only contrarily, nor only privatively, but also in other ways; whereas the same things are opposed to one another in two modes only, namely privatively and contrarily. Of this difficulty some mention is found among interpreters of Aristotle; St. Thomas also saw and noted it in that place. The sense, therefore, is this: that one and many are indeed opposed in many ways, not however in many genera of oppositions; insofar as they are considered as divided and undivided: for in that way he said that they are opposed by many modes, in which one and many, as grasped in diverse ways, are considered as opposites. But there is one way, in which they are signified as [respectively] divisible and indivisible; and thus he indicated and said that "in one [way], namely [in this] mode, one and multitude [are opposed] as divisible and indivisible": that is, out of the various modes by which unity and multitude are understood, one is that which signifies them as divided and undivided. For there are other modes, according to which one and multitude are wont to be taken: which he immediately enumerates in the following words, "One, however, is said in many ways," and so on; of which he there treats, and he brings forward various acceptions.

But indeed, if by the words of Aristotle alleged he had wished to signify that "one" and "many" are opposed by many genera of opposition, as "contradictory," as "relative," as "opposite according to privation," as "contrary," this does not follow, since "one" and "many," as divided and undivided, are signified; therefore they are not opposed according to contradiction, nor as relatives; indeed it would follow that they are not only opposed privatively, as the adversaries maintain. And this suffices for the exposition of Aristotle, which, of those we can adduce, seems to us the best.

By reason the matter is proved, first by an argument ad hominem. If it be true, as St. Thomas admits in the places cited, that the unity which is the principle of number in the predicament of quantity signifies something formally positive, which is, as it were, a positive formal ratio - namely that principle of number which is unity - how is it that the unity which they call transcendental, which is found not only in quantified things, but also in other things, is not formally something positive, so that it be called the principle of multitude? But if you respond that the unity of number, which is in the predicament of quantity, adds above substance something positive, namely quantity as its material subject - for otherwise the species of quantity would be constituted by quantity according to continuity, and likewise by number according to numeration - whereas unity is considered by the mathematician as abstracted from any matter and from bodily quantity: therefore unity is more commonly explained by us by a negation, for the reasons assigned above; its formal ratio, however, is something positive, which can be explained by the principle of multitude.

Next it can be proved thus: for every privation and every negation which is in a subject presupposes some positive foundation, as is clear. Therefore, if nothing positive be the formal [ratio] which follows upon the negation of division, it will follow that the ratio of unity is none; and, as we shall say in the following chapter, being as being, whether it be signified outside the singular and the plural number, is abstracted from one and many; therefore, since a negation of division is conjoined to it, something positive also must be conjoined to it: since in the mind the negation of division is conjoined to that same positive more closely than division and multitude themselves are.

Lastly, if unity is a privation or negation, it cannot be the privation of anything other than multitude: therefore multitude would be prior to unity; because privation presupposes habit. But the consequent is absurd, because unity is posited as the principle of multitude. Some reply that unity formally consists in the negation of multitude, not formally taken, but through its foundation; and they posit the foundation of multitude to be this or that entity. But this is plainly frivolous: for unity is not this or that entity; otherwise the unity which is in Peter and in John would be the negation of the entity of Peter and of John, and this would be multitude.

It is answered to the foundation of the first opinion: I answer, the notion of being (ens) can indeed be conceived with some precise positive ratio, even if the ratio of unity (unitas), or of plurality, is not understood. For unity and goodness are passions of being (passiones entis), such that being can be grasped by the intellect without them, even if they are convertible with it. Nay rather, goodness is posited as a passion of being in a different way than unity: for this alone does not reciprocate with being, but unity or plurality; goodness alone, however, is converted with being, and is said to be its passion. Moreover, the ratio of being is understood without understanding unity or plurality whenever we conceive being itself, neither in the plural number nor in the singular, as it is signified by the infinitive verb "to be"; but if it is signified by nouns or by verbs, it cannot be conceived except either under unity or under multitude - not because the ratio of unity is a negation (for even if it were so, it could be apprehended without a negation), but because names have been arranged by singular and plural number so as to signify being as one or as many. Wherefore, the same argument could be formed against the first opinion, and it should be solved in the same way: namely, that with any negation set aside, every being can always be apprehended as one and singular; and that nouns, disposed according to plural and singular, signify being as one or as many.

You will say that there is not a privation of entities according to the ratio of being, but according to the ratio of this and that together. But this is nothing else than to assert that unity is the privation of this and that entity, inasmuch as they are divided and many; and thus, according to that ratio, unity will be the privation of multitude formally; and therefore multitude will be prior - which we were above alleging as absurd. Furthermore, that the negation of division and of multitude are the same - because multitude and division are formally the same - will be made clear in the following disputation.

Disputatio CXXIX - Whether numerical names signify something positive in God

Caput I - The two Scholastic opinions

From the foregoing disputation it seems not obscure what ought to be said in the present question; but because the Scholastics have also thought variously in this matter, it will be worth the effort to rehearse their opinions. Therefore the Master, in the First Book, distinction 14, thinks that the name of multitude and of number belongs to God only negatively and metaphorically, so that it signifies nothing positive as properly belonging to Him; therefore (as he says) this name is attributed to God in order to remove the unity of persons; wherefore, according to the Master, the same name signifies number in God, and not unity: indeed, he says that, in the same way and according to the same metaphor, these names belong to God as do the names of continuous quantity, such as length, breadth, and depth.

Over against this opinion all the Scholastics who have made mention of this controversy set themselves: Alexander, St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 24, the articles, question 1; Scotus, question 1, at the end; Gregory, question 2, article 4; Gab., question 2, article 2, and article 3, doubt 2; Durandus, question 1; Capreolus, question 1, article 2, conclusions 2 and 3; Marsilius, in the First, question 27, article 2, and article 3, to the second doubt; St. Thomas, and Cajetan, and the Canariensis on this article.[288]

Now, in this article they teach against the Master that the name of number does not signify in God only the negation of unity and indivision. Their reason is of this sort: If the name of number signified only the negation of unity and of indivision, since that is the ratio of unity, all the names of numbers would signify the negation of the same formal ratio and of unity; therefore it would be the same thing to attribute a ternary to God as to attribute a quaternary, because these two would signify absolutely the same thing - which is plainly absurd.

However much the aforesaid Doctors conspire against the Master in the way we have said, they yet differ among themselves in explaining the signification of the names of multitude and of number. For St. Thomas, in this article - which Cajetan and the Canariensis here follow, and Capreolus in the place cited - affirm that the names of multitude signify formally above the unities themselves nothing but a negation, not (as the Master said) the negation of unity, but a division about each thing; and since, according to the opinion of St. Thomas, the ratio of unity is placed in this negation of division, the name of multitude will signify nothing formal - neither real nor of reason - above the unities themselves. I do not see how the opinion of these men can be proved by any other reason, except this: that if these names signified some ratio of multitude above the 288. Alexander, 1. parte, quaest. 45, memb. 2 - 3; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 24, art., quaest. 1; Scotus, quaestio 1, in fine; Gregory, quaest. 2, art. 4; Gab., quaest. 2, art. 2; and art. 3, dub. 2; Durandus, quaest. 1; Capreolus, quaest. 1, art. 2, conclusiones 2 - 3; Marsilius, In I, quaest. 27, art. 2; and art. 3, ad dubium secundum; St. Thomas, and Cajetan, and the Canariensis on this article.

unities, it would follow that every multitude, even of spiritual things, would be in the predicament of quantity - which they think absurd. For the multitude of quantified things is therefore in the predicament, because, above the unities, it adds some positive ratio.

Caput II - The more probable opinion

To me the opinion of others has always seemed more probable, who teach that the names of multitude do not only signify a negation, nor do numerical names in God signify only a negation of unity and indivision; but moreover they denote some formal ratio above the several unities - whether we say that the ratio of unity consists in a negation, or that it consists in something positive. This opinion was handed down by St. Bonaventure and Durandus, cited above, although they teach that the ratio of unity is formally placed in a privation. And it is gathered from Alexander, First Part, question 13, member 4, when he asserts that one and many are opposed contrarily - which would not be true if multitude did not signify something positive distinct from the unities themselves, formally and at least according to reason.[289] To the same opinion should be referred Marsilius, in the First, question 27, article 1, conclusion 3, who, although he thinks the formal ratio of multitude to be through the intellect (whether this be true we shall say shortly), nevertheless asserts that it is positive, distinct from the unities through the intellect.

The reason for this opinion is proved thus: one and many are opposed contrarily, as was shown in the preceding disputation, or at least privatively, and in one of these modes they are opposed without controversy. But if they are opposed contrarily, it is necessary that in each extreme there be a positive contrary form: therefore, if multitude signified no ratio beyond the unities themselves formally, there would not be two extremes contrarily opposed. If, however, they are opposed privatively, the privation ought to be on the side of unity, not on the side of multitude, as all confess who teach that the ratio of unity is placed in a privation or negation, as St. Thomas expressly noted above, question 11, article 2; therefore the habit and the positive form, to which unity - taken as a negation - is opposed, ought to be in multitude.

Someone will reply that unity is not opposed to multitude, but to division, as its negation, not of multitude; and thus it does not rightly follow that multitude is some positive form. And this seems to be taught by St. Thomas in this article, to the third reply, when he says, "Unity does not oppose multitude, but division." Thus, then, unity will indeed be the negation of division, not of multitude. St. Thomas had taught this very same thing also above, question 11, article 2, to the fourth.

But this solution can easily be refuted - first, from Aristotle, Metaphysics X, chapter 3, where he says that one is opposed to many.[290]

... one and many are opposed in one way, as divided and undivided; of which acceptation of unity and multitude we are now disputing, as we noted in the preceding disputation. Then too, defining in the same chapter multitude, he said, "For what is divided, some call a multitude": therefore multitude and division are formally the same. Wherefore, if unity consists in the negation of division, it will also be placed in the negation of multitude: it will be necessary, then, that multitude itself be as a habit and a positive form. Moreover, if that were true which St. Thomas says in this article - namely, that transcendental multitude is nothing else than the things themselves with the negation of division around each - there would follow that one and many are not opposed: because unity, which signifies indivision, is not opposed to indivision around any given thing, but to the division of several things among themselves: therefore multitude, to which unity is opposed, ought to signify not only the negation of division around each thing, but also the division of several things among themselves.

289. Alexander of Hales, Summa, Prima pars, quaest. 13, memb. 4.
290. Aristotle, Metaphysics X, c. 3.

From which I infer that what the holy Doctor says in that question 11, article 2, to the fourth - namely, that division formally consists in a negation by which one thing is said not to be another - is not well understood: for hence it follows, in his opinion, that unity cannot be the negation of division; because of one negation there is not another negation. Nor can it be said that unity and multitude are opposed privatively in such a way that negation is on the side of multitude, while habit and positive form are on the side of unity. For this, besides that no one until now has taught it, nor will anyone, supported by any foundation, be able to affirm it, leads us into the absurd which above we urged against the Master, as is manifest.

Solved is the reason of the second opinion.

Caput III - The reason of the second opinion is solved

The argument of the opinion of St. Thomas and others, by which they prove that transcendental multitude is not some positive form above individual unities, even according to notion: I answer, the same thing must be said in the predicament of multitude of quantified things and of those lacking quantity; namely, that in both cases the notion of multitude is something positive above individual unities, which is wont to be explained by the name of division: there must be something peculiar in our multitude which is not in the other, since neither is placed in the same predicament. For that individual unities are endowed with continuous quantity seems altogether accidental to the notion of number, as placed in a predicament: for the quantity of number, since it is discrete, is to be attended not in the individual unities, but in their division and distinction: and this indeed is found also in spirits. Wherefore arithmeticians, in fact, dispute about numbers by their own principles, whether they be of bodily things or of spiritual things. But I for my part strongly suspect that each number, under the proper notion of number, is something per reason and the intellect (intellectus): although each, under the notion of multitude, signifies some positive and real form, at least notionally distinct from the unities. I said "under the notion of number," because besides the real division, number also consists of the ordering of prior and posterior: for there is an order among the first, second, third, and the remaining unities, by reason of which numbers are said to differ: and yet this order and distinction of numbers is only through our intellect: for just as from this unity we begin to count and end at that, so we could, on the contrary, begin elsewhere: and, finally, from whatever unity of the multitude to draw the beginning is free. Since therefore there is not by nature in the things themselves an order of first, second, and third, but in our intellect, it follows that that notion whereby multitude is essentially completed under the notion of number is through our intellect. However, the notion of multitude is real and positive, distinct at least by the operation of the intellect from the unities: now that is the notion of division, and to this unity is opposed, as above remains proved.

Yet three things remain to be noted. First, that there is indeed in the divine persons an order of prior and posterior according to the thing, and not merely through the intellect, by which order the first, second, and third person are by nature: yet this order is not the order of number; for the order of number is only through the intellect: for, in order that the persons be numbered, thus the beginning of the number could be taken from the Holy Spirit, just as from any other person; which doctrine above, disputation 37, chapter 4, we explained easily and rightly. Scotus, along with Isidore, which seemed so difficult to the most learned men of our age that they judged it corrupt - this, then, is the order of origin, whereby one person is said to be the principle of another, and the other proceeds from that one: and that is called prior from whom the other proceeds; but she who proceeds is called posterior: concerning which real order we shall more copiously discourse in disputation 169.

Second, it is to be noted that therefore in the Councils among the Fathers it is sometimes said that God is neither "taken by number" nor "withdraws from number," because at once in him there co-exist the unity of essence and the Trinity of persons. Thus in the Council of Toledo II, in the confession of faith, it is said of God: "He neither withdraws from number, nor is taken by number. In the relations of the persons number is discerned: but in the unity of essence, what is enumerated is not comprehended."[291] And St. Bernard, book five of De consideratione, about the middle, adduces that of Boethius On the Trinity, "But this is the One, in which there is no number"; and he himself, Bernard, subjoins: "Yet the Trinity is God. What then? Do we destroy what has been said of unity, because we introduce Trinity? Not so; but we establish unity." And below: "What does this want (to speak briefly), 'without number'? If it is one, where is number? But I have, you say, what I number and what I do not number: the substance is one; the persons are three." Only there Bernard contends against Gilbert that essence and person cannot be numbered as though distinct; about which enough and more than enough was said in disputation 116, chapter 5, and 120, chapter 4. But if sometimes the Fathers predicate God absolutely "without number," they understand it on the side of the essence, lest they seem to concede several Gods.

Third, note that Ambrose is wrongly alleged by the Master in the first distinction 24, to prove that names of number are said in God only negatively: for Ambrose, book one On the Faith, chapter 2, which place is cited by the Master, speaks only in the sense we have thus far explained when he seems to deny number of God: for he says before the middle of the chapter, "Diversity (he understands of the persons) makes several; unity excludes the quantity of number: for unity is not number, but this is the principle of all."

---

291. Council of Toledo II, Confession of Faith: "Nec recedit a numero, nec capitur numero: in relatione enim personarum numerus cernitur; in unitate autem essentiae, quid enumeratum sit, non comprehenditur."

Articulus IV - Whether this name "person" can be common to the three persons

It is proceeded to the fourth as follows. It seems that this name, person (persona), cannot be common to the three persons. For nothing is common to the three persons unless it be the essence. But this name, person, does not signify the essence in the direct case. Therefore it is not common to the three.

1. Moreover. "Common" is opposed to "incommunicable." But it belongs to the notion of person that it be incommunicable, as is clear from the definition of Richard of St. Victor set above. Therefore this name, person, is not common to the three.
2. Moreover. If it is common to the three, either this community is attended according to the thing, or according to reason. But not according to the thing, because thus the three persons would be one person. Nor again according to reason only, because thus person would be a universal. But in the divine there is not a universal, nor even a particular, nor a genus, nor a species, as was shown above. Therefore this name, person, is not common to the three.

But on the contrary: St. Augustine says, in On the Trinity VII, chapter 4, and what follows, and in book V, chapter 9, at the end, that when it was asked "three what?" the answer was, "three persons": because what is person is common to them.[292]

I answer that the very mode of speaking shows that this name, person, is common to the three, when we say "three persons." Just as when we say "three men," we show "man" to be common to the three. It is manifest, however, that it is not a community of the thing, as one essence is common to the three: for thus it would follow that there was one person of the three, as the essence is one. But as to what sort of community it is, those investigating have spoken in different ways. For some have said that it is a community of negation, on account of this, that in the definition of person "incommunicable" is posited. But others have said that it is a community of intention, because in the definition of person "individual" is posited; as if it were said that "to be a species" is common to a horse and an ox. But each of these is excluded by this, that this name, person, is not a name of negation nor of intention, but a name of a thing. And therefore it must be said that even in human affairs this name person is common by a community of reason: not as a genus or species, but as a vague individual. For the names of genera and species - like man or animal - are imposed to signify the common natures themselves, not, however, the intentions of common natures, which are signified by all these, genus or species. But a vague individual - like "some man" - signifies a common nature with a determinate mode of existing which befits singulars, namely that it be per se subsistent (subsistens) distinct from others. But in the name of a designated singular there is signified the determinate distinguishing [note], as in the name "Socrates," "this flesh" and "this bone." Yet there is this difference, that "some man" signifies the nature, or the individual on the side of the nature, with the mode of existing which befits singulars. But this name, person, is not imposed to signify the individual on the side of the nature, but to signify the thing subsisting

292. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 4 and following; and V, c. 9, at the end.

(subsistentia) in such a nature. Now this is common according to reason to all the divine persons, in that each of them subsists in the divine nature distinct from the others. And thus this name, person, according to reason is common to the three divine persons.

Reply to the first: That reasoning proceeds about a community of the thing.

Reply to the second: Although a person is incommunicable, nevertheless the very mode of existing incommunicably can be common to several.

Reply to the third: Although it is a community of reason and not of the thing, yet it does not follow that in the divine there is a universal or a particular, or a genus, or a species: first, because neither in human affairs is the community of person a community of genus or species; next, because the divine persons have one existence (esse): but a genus and species and any universal is predicated of several differing in existence.

The conclusion of the article is this. The name "person" is not only vocally common to the three persons, but it also signifies a certain notion common to them, namely the mode of subsisting incommunicably. And this conclusion and the doctrine of the whole article are to be examined in the following disputation.

Disputatio CXXX - Whether the name "Person" signifies a real notion common to the three divine persons

Caput I - Various opinions of the Scholastics

That the name "person" signifies something common to the three divine relations (relationes), not quidditatively, but denominatively, is the truer opinion. [Further to be treated in] chapter 3, the solution of the arguments of the third opinion.

According to the various opinions which we enumerated in disputation 17, chapter 1, about the signification of the name "person" (persona), the Doctors have spoken variously in the present controversy. First, among all it is certain that the signified of this name is not something common to the three persons in reality, about which there is no question at all; nor did Alexander teach the opposite in First Part, question 56, member 4, article 3, although he is wrongly by some reported into that opinion.[293] The controversy, however, is whether the signified of the name is common to the three persons according to a notion (ratio), as a genus is to species, or as any universal predicated is common to particulars.

In this question Scotus, in First Book, distinction 13, question 1, and Gabriel, in First Book, article 1 and article 2, teach that the name "person," as well in human affairs as in divine, formally signifies neither a second intention such as that of genus and species, nor any real positive thing, but solely a negation common to all persons, as was explained in that chapter of disputation 127.[294][295] Following Scotus, the Canarian seems to speak above on article 3, question 29, to the third argument.[296] But this opinion must be rejected by us with St. Thomas in this article, because the name "person" does not formally signify a negation, but some positive mode, as we shall show at greater length in III, q. 4, a. 2.[297]

293. Alexander of Hales, Summa, First Part, q. 56, memb. 4, art. 3.

Second opinion. The other Scholastics think that the name "person" signifies something positive; yet in its explanation they vary. For Henry, Quodlibet 5, q. 6, holds that this name signifies an intention common to all persons; and since in the same question he says that there is a twofold intention, first and second, and that this latter is a being of reason (ens rationis), such as genus, species, and individual, he plainly seems to assert that the name "person" signifies a being of reason; for a person is an individual substance of a rational nature. This opinion also is attributed to Durandus, In I, dist. 23, q. 1, num., where nevertheless he only asserts that this name signifies an intention, without explaining whether a first or a second; below indeed we shall see whether his sentiment differs in any way from the opinion of St. Thomas, which is the truer.[298][299]

Third opinion. The third opinion, then, is that this name signifies something real common according to a notion to all the persons. Thus teach Alexander, First Part of his work, q. 56, memb. 4, article 2; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 25, article 2; St. Thomas and Cajetan in this article; Capreolus, In I Sent., dist. 25, q. 1, article 1; Marsilius, In I, q. 28, article 2, the conclusion; nor does Durandus differ from this opinion, as will be explained below, and the more recent Thomists follow it as well.[300][301][302][303][304][305] But even these still differ among themselves. For certain more recent authors, with Cajetan, affirm that the name "person" signifies something positive and real, common according to a notion to the three persons of the Trinity, which indeed is not only superior quidditatively to the three persons, as they are signified by this name "person," but also as they are signified by the name of Father, of Son, and of Holy Spirit; so that this predication be quidditative, "The eternal Father is a person," and likewise, "Paternity is personality."

The principal foundations of this opinion can be reduced to these two. First: either the name "person" is predicated denominatively of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, or quidditatively; for it cannot be said in any other way. It is not predicated denominatively; because if it were predicated thus only, the concrete would be said of the concrete, namely "person" of the Father, but not the abstract of the abstract, namely "personality" of the relation. For thus we see in other denominatives, in which the concrete is predicated of the concrete, but the abstract is not predicated of the abstract, as "white" of a wall, but not "whiteness" of the abstract of wall. But personality too is predicated of the relations in the abstract; for we say, "Paternity is personality."

294. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 13, q. 1.
295. Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., article 1 and article 2.
296. The Canarian, above on article 3, question 29, to the third argument.
297. St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae III, q. 4, a. 2.
298. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 5, q. 6.
299. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1.
300. Alexander of Hales, Summa, First Part, q. 56, memb. 4, art. 2.
301. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 25, art. 2.
302. St. Thomas and Cajetan, on the present article.
303. Capreolus, In I Sent., dist. 25, q. 1, art. 1.
304. Marsilius, In I, q. 28, art. 2, the conclusion.
305. Durandus's position does not differ from this, as will be explained below.

Therefore that is predicated in quid; for those things which in the abstract are predicated of others belong to quidditative predication. Whence it follows that, in the same grade, the name "person," which signifies something concrete, is predicated of the Father in which grade "personality" is said of paternity. By the same argument it is proved that the signified of the name "person" is predicated quidditatively of Peter or of any other singular man, not only as they are signified by the name "person," but also by the name "Peter," "Paul," etc. Whence this is no less quidditative, "Peter is a person," than this, "The person of Peter is a person." The same is to be said of singular personalities and of the universal personality, in the same proportion.

Then, either the common notion of person and of personality in God is contracted to be the being of this and that person and personality by something absolute, or by something relative, or finally by something common to both. By something common it cannot be, as is clear; because that which contracts ought to be singular. By something absolute also it cannot be done; because otherwise it would follow that the divine persons are constituted and distinguished by absolute properties, which is absurd, as will be proved below in disputation 153, chapter 3. It remains, therefore, that the notion of person and of personality, taken universally, is contracted to this and that divine personality and person by relation (relatio). Therefore there is a sign that it is predicated quidditatively of the relations by which such and such a determination is present; for that which is contracted is said quidditatively of that which contracts. The other arguments which are wont to be made for this opinion only prove that the personal relations are personalities; but they do not prove that of the relations themselves, as they are signified by the name of relation, the signified of the name "person" is predicated quidditatively.

Therefore: That the name "person" signifies something common to the three divine relations, not quidditatively, but denominatively, is the truer opinion.

Caput II - The more probable opinion: denominative commonness of "person"

The opinion has always seemed to me far more probable which teaches that the name "person" signifies indeed a common concept to this and that person, as they are signified by the same name; yet does not signify a notion common quidditatively to paternity and filiation, as they are signified by those relative names. For this opinion we cannot adduce the Scholastics alleged in the preceding chapter: for they, except Cajetan and Durandus, only teach that the name "person" signifies a concept common to the three persons, which can be understood in one way and in another. Cajetan alone followed the peculiar opinion which we have now reported; Durandus, however, can be explained in favor of our present opinion. But, that we may confirm it by reason, it must be noted that in the category of substance there is a first and a second substance: the first is the individual of that genus; the second, whatever universal predicated up to the most general. Now the name "substance" (substantia), and its signified, is common to first and second substance. Whence it follows that the name "substance" does not signify something common essentially or quidditatively; for to the most general of that category and to the singulars of it nothing can be common essentially and quidditatively besides being (ens), especially something that closely regards the first and the second substance, that is, the individuals and the universals predicated of substance, as is sufficiently clear. Therefore the name "substance" in general signifies a certain real mode, which is, as it were, predicated denominatively of first and second. Moreover, this denomination is taken from the act and, as it were, the office of substance, which is to subsist or to underlie, that is, to be under another, which is common to first and to second substance; that is, to that which is, first and second, to underlie. In the same way "hypostasis," or "subsistence" (subsistentia), signifies something common to Peter and to Paul, as it were denominatively, that is, to exist singularly and individually. Wherefore this is the difference between the name "person" and the name "Peter": the latter signifies the very thing to which the denomination of person belongs; the former, however, denotes the very denomination and the mode of subsisting incommunicably. Then too from the signified of the name "Peter" the notion of the common nature is abstracted essentially; but from this or that signified of "person" only a common notion is able to be abstracted denominatively to Peter and to John; although it is essential to this and to that person, as they are signified by the name "person."

Next it must be noted that a person is defined by "an individual" or "the incommunicable." But these two do not signify a quidditative concept of things, but a denominative one. For "individual" is, as it were, a proper passion of each thing in the order of being, as "the good"; but a passion is not predicated in quid, but denominatively. Therefore it is no wonder if even in this respect the name "person" signifies a denominative notion, by comparison to Peter and to John; for one and the same denominative ratio is common to this and that person, as the name "person" signifies. And thus Scotus rightly warns in First Book, distinction 23, question 1, at the end, that from the three persons of the Trinity - namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit - a common quidditative concept cannot be abstracted; yet a common one can be [abstracted] as it were of what is proper to them, which however is predicated denominatively, as we shall say presently.[306]

Hence, therefore, our opinion is rightly proved: for since the name "person" formally and expressly signifies an incommunicable subsistence of a rational nature, it will therefore signify the divine person, only that in place of a common nature the divine should be supplied. Indeed, by this very definition, although the divine nature, or deity, is common, nevertheless it is established that there is a proper essential notion and a legitimate direction of denomination with respect to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. For that very mode of subsisting, by which even an absolute [nature] has the ratio of incommunicable or of an individual, which is as it were a passion, is manifest. Wherefore we say that the whole signification concerning "person" redounds to something denominative; whence I suppose that St. Augustine said that the name "person" signifies an intention common to three or more persons - not indeed that which the logicians call a second intention, which is a being of reason, but as it were denominatively it is predicated of Peter and of John, and, in like manner, of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. As to whether also to paternity, filiation, and spiration there be given some common concept of relation, we will say below in disputation 159.

306. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, at the end.

Caput III - The solution of the arguments of the third opinion

First. To the first argument of the third opinion I answer that it does not conclude. The point was: because the abstract, "personality" (personalitas), is predicated of the relations in the abstract, therefore it is predicated in quid. I deny the consequence. Not every form which is predicated in the abstract of some subject is essential to it; sometimes it is denominative. For "rationality" is named a difference, and it is also called a property; yet the notion of "difference" in rationality, and the notion of "property," is not therefore essential. So also about hypostasis (to use Scotus's way of speaking): "individuation" is predicated in the abstract of Peter or of John, which nevertheless is not essential to him, but is, as it were, a property; indeed the very ratio of "the individual" is not essential to Peter or to John, as has been proved. We say, therefore, that an abstract can sometimes be predicated denominatively: for we denominate, as it were, from the act and office of a thing, so that, to speak to the point, "singularity" and "individuation" denote that by which Peter or John is rendered singular and an individual; and yet this singularity, or the relation of singularity, does not predicate something essential of this or that, nor is it in quid. Accordingly, in the proper case of paternity or of filiation in the divine, it is said by a like denomination; for "personality" signifies the notion of singularity and individuation, by which, in the last analysis, incommunicability is constituted: but the notion of singularity is, as it were, a passion of the very relation. Therefore it is not surprising if the three divine relations have a certain common denominative predicate.

Reply to the second. I answer that the common notion of person is indeed contracted in the divine, but by the proper differences of the relations; and that common notion of person is not thereby turned into a quidditative essence of the relations. For by the relations the notion of person is contracted, not otherwise than by their proper differences, when they are denominated from the material subject; and yet that same notion of person which is thus contracted is of itself essentially abstracted from the relations, and nevertheless is said denominatively of the relative person. This is what St. Augustine indicated in De Trinitate, book VII, chapter 6, where he proves that "person" is signified with reference to itself, not to another - namely, that it is understood expressly and formally; for all that, however, he does not deny that it is predicated denominatively from relations.[307]

Nor is it enough to say that the name "person" signifies something abstracted both from the absolute and from the relations. For it is impossible that there be something which is abstracted at once from the absolute and from the relative, except in name only; as Durandus very well proves, In I, dist. 23, q. 1, num. 16. And the reason of this can be as follows: if that common concept were abstracted from the thing itself, it would be nothing real but only a being of reason; but the name "person" signifies something real and positive. Therefore it is to be said that it is abstracted essentially from the absolute, while from the relations it is abstracted only as to its formal understanding, and is predicated of the relations denominatively.

307. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 6.

... But it is not predicated in quid but denominatively; therefore it is no wonder if even for this reason the name "person" signifies a denominative notion in comparison to Peter and John, although it is essential to this or that person, as is signified by the name "person." And therefore Scotus rightly warns, in I Sentences, dist. 23, q. 1, at the end, that from the three persons of the Trinity - namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit - there cannot be abstracted any common concept as a quidditative one, yet there can be a common concept as it were of their proper [character]; but the proper is predicated denominatively, as we were just now saying.[308]

Hence, then, our position is rightly proved: for since the name "person" formally and expressly signifies the incommunicable subsistence of a rational nature, it will signify the same with respect to a divine person, except that in the place of "rational nature," "divine" must be substituted. In this definition, although the divine nature itself, or the Godhead, is connotated according to its proper essential notion, nevertheless what is directly signified is denominative with respect to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit: for that mode of subsisting is after the mode of an act; it is also an incommunicable, or individual, notion, which is as it were a passion, as has been explained. Wherefore the whole signified is said denominatively of "person." And therefore I think that Durandus said that the name "person" signifies a common intention to three or more persons - not, indeed, what the logicians call a second intention, which is a being of reason, but because it is predicated denominatively of Peter and John, of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.[309] Whether, however, to paternity, filiation, and active and passive spiration there is given some common concept of relation, or not, we shall say below in Disputation 159.

Solution to the third opinion's arguments: To the first argument of the third opinion I answer that, although "person" in the abstract is not predicated of the divine relations in the abstract, nevertheless it is not essential to them. For not every form that is predicated abstractly of some subject is essential to it, but sometimes is denominative. Thus rationality is called a difference and risibility a property; and yet neither is the notion of difference essential to rationality, nor the notion of property to risibility. So also, to speak with Scotus, of the thisness (haecceity) of Peter or of John, individuation is predicated abstractly; and yet it is not essential to it, but is as it were a property, just as also the ratio of individuation is not essential to Peter or to John, as has been proved. Therefore we say that sometimes an abstract is predicated denominatively of an abstract - especially when we denote as it were the act and office of it; as if we were to say of a haecceity that by it Peter or John is rendered singular and individual, and that it is very singularity itself, or the reason of the singular. For these are not predicated essentially of this or that haecceity. So, therefore, in the present case, paternity or filiation in the divine is called "personality" denominatively, because personality signifies the notion of singularity and individuation, whereby, ultimately, the divine nature is rendered incommunicable; but the notion of singularity is as it were a passion of relation itself. Therefore it is not a wonder if the three divine relations have a certain common denominative predicate.

308. Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, at the end.
309. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, especially n. 16.

To the second I answer that the common notion of person is contracted in the divine essentially and quidditatively, as it were by proper differences, by this and that notion. For by the relations the notion of person is contracted - not as by proper differences, but as by the material subject which they denominate. But this or that notion of person, by which the common notion of person is contracted, is of itself essentially absolute, although it is said denominatively of the relative person: as St. Augustine signified in De Trinitate, book 7, chapter 6, where he proves that "person" is signified as to itself, not as to another; he understands this expressly and formally; yet on that account he does not deny that it is predicated denominatively from relation.[310]

Nor is it enough to say that the name "person" signifies something abstracted from the absolute and the relative: for it is impossible that there be a common concept of the absolute and the relation, except in name only, as Durandus excellently proves in I Sentences, dist. 23, q. 1, n. 16. And the reason of this can be of this sort: if that common concept be abstract, relation and the absolute follow, it follows that it is not "to another." But it is impossible that something be conceived not as to another, and not be conceived as absolute and to itself; for that is absolute which is loosed from a term, because it regards nothing other. Therefore there cannot be some real concept common to the relative and the absolute. By this same argument it is proved that the notion of accident cannot be univocal, or that one objective concept of it be assigned as common to the nine predicaments, however much it be said that it is participated analogically by the inferiors: because that concept cannot fail to be absolute, as has been proved; but the absolute cannot be contracted essentially by the differences of relation: therefore nothing can be common according to notion to the absolute and the relative; but by the same name "accident" relation is signified principally, and the remaining eight predicaments. Then, since Augustine in the place alleged says that "person" is signified as to itself, not as to another, by no means can we assert that the abstract concept of person is from the absolute and the relative, but that it is absolute.

First Collectarium: From the things said there follows a distinction between these three names, "Peter," "a certain man," "person." For the name "Peter" signifies the very thing by which a person is constituted, and connotes moreover the human nature in which he subsists; but "person" signifies the same thing, denominatively, however, and it connotes the nature; whereas "a certain man" directly signifies the nature of man together with the property and mode of subsisting, which it connotes, as St. Thomas taught in this article, and Durandus, q. 1, n. 6 and 7, who tacitly rebukes the holy Doctor by name, as though he had taught the opposite, although in truth he did not say that; although Cajetan, deceived I know not by what reason, thought that according to St. Thomas the same is signified by this name "a certain man" as by the name "person."

Second Collectarium: Then it follows why "a certain man," which is wont to be called a vague individual, is not constituted by the logicians as a sixth predicable: because in truth it signifies nothing common, unless denominatively by way of its connotation, like the word "individual"; but in this way it is sufficiently reduced to the fifth predicable.

310. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 6.

Quaestio XXXI - On those things which pertain to unity or plurality in the divine

Articulus I - Whether there is truly a Trinity in the divine

It is proceeded thus to the first. It seems that there is not a Trinity in the divine. For every name in the divine signifies either substance or relation. But this name "Trinity" does not signify substance; for it would then be predicated of the individual persons. Nor does it signify relation, because it is not said according to the name "to another." Therefore by the name "Trinity" one ought not to speak in the divine.

1. Moreover, this name "Trinity" seems to be a collective name, since it signifies a multitude. But such a name is not suitable in the divine, since the unity imported by a collective name is the least unity. In the divine, however, there is the greatest unity. Therefore this name "Trinity" does not befit the divine.
2. Moreover, every "threefold" (trinum) is triplex; but in God there is not triplicity, since triplicity is a species of inequality. Therefore neither is there Trinity.
3. Moreover, whatever is in God is in the unity of the divine essence: because God is the essence. If therefore the Trinity is in God, it will be in the unity of the divine essence; and thus in God there will be three essential unities, which is heretical.
4. Moreover, in all things that are said of God, the concrete is predicated of the abstract. For the Godhead is God, and paternity is Father. But "Trinity" cannot be said "three," because thus there would be nine things in the divine, which is erroneous. Therefore by the name "Trinity" one ought not to speak in the divine.

But on the contrary: Athanasius says: "Unity in Trinity, and Trinity in unity, is to be venerated."[311]

I answer that it must be said that the name "Trinity" in the divine signifies a determinate number of persons. Therefore, as a plurality of persons is posited in the divine, so the name "Trinity" ought to be used: because this name signifies determinedly the same thing which "plurality" signifies indeterminately.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this name "Trinity," according to the etymology of the word, seems to signify one essence of three persons, according to which it is called "trinity" as though "the unity of three." But according to the proper usage of the word, it signifies rather the number of persons of one essence; and on this account we cannot say that the Father is the Trinity, because he is not three persons. Nor does it signify the relations of the persons themselves, but rather the number of the persons as referred to each other; and hence it is that, according to the name, it is not referred to another.

311. Athanasius, Symbol of Faith (Quicumque), at the beginning.

To the second it must be said that a collective name imports two things, namely, the plurality of supposits and a certain unity, namely of some order. For a "people" is a multitude of men comprehended under some order. Therefore as to the first, this name "Trinity" agrees with collective names; but as to the second it differs, because in the divine Trinity there is not only the unity of order, but together with this there is the unity of essence.

To the third it must be said that "trinity" is said absolutely. For it signifies the ternary number of persons; but "triplicity" signifies a proportion of inequality. For it is a species of the proportion of inequality, as is evident from Boethius in the Arithmetic. And therefore it is not in God.[312]

To the fourth it must be said that in the divine Trinity there is understood both the number and the numbered persons. Therefore when we say "Trinity in unity," we do not place number in the unity of essence, as if it were three "ones," but we place the numbered persons in the unity of nature, just as the supposits of some nature are said to be in that nature; and conversely we say "unity in Trinity," as a nature is said to be in its supposits.

To the fifth it must be said that when we say "the Trinity is three" by reason of the number imported, there is signified the multiplication of the same number in itself, since what I call "threefold" imports distinction in the supposits of that of which it is said. And therefore it cannot be said that the Trinity is three: for it would follow, if the Trinity were three, that there would be three supposits of the Trinity; just as when it is said, "God is threefold," it follows that there are three supposits of the Godhead.

Notation around the article.

Conclusion is affirmative; around which it must be observed that here St. Thomas does not define the number of the persons - to wit, that they are three, neither more nor fewer; for that follows from the things said in question 27, and from those that must be said below in question 41, article 1. But the Angelic Doctor teaches that the name "Trinity" befits God in the way the name "Plurality" does, because one is contained under the other as the particular under the universal; wherefore, just as "plurality" and numerical names do not signify in God negation, as St. Thomas proved in the preceding question, article 1, so he teaches in the same way about this name "Trinity," which also is a name of number. Wherefore by the same proportion about numerical terms, which we taught in Disputation 129, we must philosophize also about this.

312. Boethius, De Institutione Arithmetica.

Articulus II - Whether the Son is other than the Father

It is proceeded thus to the second. It seems that the Son is not other than the Father. For "other" (alius) is a relative of diversity of substance. If therefore the Son is other than the Father, it seems that he is diverse from the Father; which is against Augustine, On the Trinity, book 7, where he says that when we say three persons, we do not wish to understand diversity.

1. Moreover, whoever are "others" from each other, in some way differ from each other; therefore if the Son is other than the Father, it follows that he is "different" from the Father. But this is against Ambrose in book 1 On the Faith, where he says: "The Father and the Son are one in deity, nor is there there a difference of substance, nor any diversity."[313]
2. Moreover, one is said to be "alien" from another. But the Father is not alien from the Son. For Hilary says in book 7 On the Trinity that in the divine persons there is nothing "alien," nothing separable. Therefore the Son is not other than the Father.[314]
3. Moreover, "other" (alius) and "something else" (aliud) signify the same thing; they differ only by the consignification of gender. If therefore the Son is "other" than the Father, it seems to follow that the Son is "something else" than the Father.

But on the contrary is what Augustine says in the book On the Faith to Peter: "For one is the essence of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, in which there is not one thing the Father, another the Son, another the Holy Spirit, although personally the Father is other, the Son other, the Holy Spirit other."[315]

I answer that it must be said that because by words inordinately uttered heresy is incurred (as Jerome says), therefore when we speak of the Trinity, it must be done with caution and measure; because, as Augustine says in the first book On the Trinity: "Nowhere is it more perilous to err, nor more laborious to search, nor more fruitful to find." In these matters of which we speak concerning the Trinity, we must beware of two opposite errors, proceeding temperately between the two: namely, the error of Arius, who posited together with the Trinity of persons a trinity of substances; and the error of Sabellius, who posited together with the unity of essence the unity of person. Therefore, to avoid the error of Arius, we ought to avoid in the divine the name of "diversity" and of "difference," lest the unity of essence be taken away. We posit, however, the name of "distinction," on account of the opposition of relations. Whence, according to some authorities of Scripture, "difference of persons" is found to be said, or "difference" is taken for "division." But lest the simplicity of the divine essence be taken away, the name of "separation" and of "division," which is of a whole into parts, must be avoided. And lest the equality of unity be taken away, the name of "disparity" must be avoided. And lest "likeness" be taken away, the name of "alien" and "discrepant" must be avoided. For Ambrose says in the book On the Trinity that in the Father and in the Son there is not a discrepant but one divinity. And according to Hilary (as has been said), in the divine nothing is separable. But to avoid the error of Sabellius, we must avoid "singularity," lest the communicability of the divine essence be taken away. Whence Hilary says in book 7 On the Trinity: "To preach the Father and the Son as a singular God is sacrilege." We must also avoid the name "unique," lest the number of persons be taken away. Whence Hilary in the same book says that from God singularity and the notion of "unique" are excluded. Yet we say "only-begotten Son," because there are not many sons in the divine. Nor do we say "one-only God," because the Godhead is common to many. Let us also use the name "con-similar," lest the order of nature in the persons be taken away. Whence Ambrose says in book 1 On the Trinity: "Nor is 'con-similar' what ..."

313. St. Ambrose, De fide ad Gratianum, book 1.
314. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, book 7.
315. St. Augustine, De fide et symbolo ad Petrum.

It is objected that the Son is not other than the Father. For "other" is the relative of diversity of substance. If therefore the Son is other than the Father, it seems to follow that He is diverse from the Father. But this is against St. Augustine, who says in On the Trinity VII, that when we say three persons, we do not intend to understand diversity.[316]

- Further. Whoever are "others" with respect to one another differ in some way from one another. If therefore the Son is other than the Father, it follows that He is different from the Father. But this is against St. Ambrose in book 1 On the Faith, where he says: "The Father and the Son are one in deity; there, there is no difference of substance, nor any diversity."[317]
- Further. What is alien from another is called "other"; but the Father is not alien from the Son. For St. Hilary says in book 7 On the Trinity, that in the divine persons there is nothing diverse, nothing alien, nothing separable. Therefore the Son is not other than the Father.[318]
- Further. "Alius" and "aliud" signify the same thing, and differ only by a common-signification of gender. If therefore the Son is "alius" (masculine) from the Father, it seems to follow that the Son is "aliud" (neuter) from the Father.

But on the contrary: St. Augustine says in the book On the Faith and the Creed to Peter: "One is the essence of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, in which the Father is not one thing, the Son another, the Holy Spirit another, although personally there is one who is the Father, another who is the Son, another who is the Holy Spirit."[319]

I answer: Since heresy arises from words inordinately uttered (as St. Jerome says), therefore when we speak about the Trinity we must proceed with caution and deal with the matter modestly. For, as St. Augustine says in book 1 On the Trinity, nowhere is it more perilous to err, nor more toilsome to investigate anything, nor more fruitful to find the truth, than on this subject.[320] And in those things which we say about the Trinity, we must beware of two opposite errors, proceeding temperately between the two: namely, the error of Arius, who posited with the Trinity of persons a trinity of substances; and the error of Sabellius, who posited with the unity of essence a unity of person.[321]

316. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 7.
317. St. Ambrose, De fide ad Gratianum, book 1.
318. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, book 7.
319. St. Augustine, De fide et symbolo ad Petrum.
320. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 1, at the beginning.

To avoid therefore the error of Arius, in divine matters we must eschew the names "diversity" and "difference," lest the unity of essence be taken away. We can, however, use the name "distinction," on account of relative opposition. Whence, if anywhere in some authentic writing there is found a diversity or difference of persons, that diversity or difference is taken for distinction. And lest the simplicity of the divine essence be taken away, we must avoid the names "separation" and "division," which is of a whole into parts. And lest equality be taken away, we must avoid the name "disparity." And lest similitude be taken away, we must avoid the names "alien" and "discrepant." For St. Ambrose says in his book On the Trinity, that in the Father and the Son there is not what is discrepant, but one divinity.[322] And according to St. Hilary (as was said), in divine things nothing is separable.[318] And to avoid the error of Sabellius, we must avoid singularity, lest the communicability of the divine essence be taken away. Whence St. Hilary says in book 7 On the Trinity: "To preach the Father and the Son as a singular God is sacrilege." We must also avoid the name "unique," lest the number of persons be taken away. And we must avoid the name "confused," lest the order of nature among the persons be removed.[323][324]

But this name "other" (alius), taken in the masculine, imports nothing but a distinction of supposit. Hence we can fittingly say that the Son is other than the Father, because, namely, He is another supposit of the divine nature, just as He is another person and another hypostasis.

- Reply to the first: "Other" (alius), since it is like a certain pronominal article, stands on the side of the supposit. Hence for its notion there suffices a distinction of substance which is hypostasis or person. But diversity requires a distinction of substance which is essence. And therefore we cannot say that the Son is diverse from the Father, although He is other.
- Reply to the second: Difference imports a distinction of form. But there is only one form in the divine, as is clear from that which is said in Phil. 2: "Who, being in the form of God." Therefore the name of "difference" does not properly befit the divine, as is clear from the authority adduced. Nevertheless St. John Damascene uses the name "difference" of the divine persons, inasmuch as a relative property is signified in the mode of a form. Whence he says that the hypostases do not differ from one another according to substance, but according to determinate properties. But "difference" is taken there for "distinction," as has been said.[325]
- Reply to the third: "Alien" is that which is extraneous and dissimilar. But this is not imported when one says "other." And therefore we say that the Son is other than the Father, although we do not say that He is alien.

---

321. On Arius's positing of a trinity of substances and Sabellius's positing of one person with the unity of essence, see the standard heresiological accounts.
322. St. Ambrose, De Trinitate (or De fide), locus cited in scholastic tradition.
318. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, book 7.
323. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, book 7: on excluding singularity and the notion of "unique" from God.
324. St. Ambrose, De Trinitate, book 1: "Nor is that which is one confused..."; cited to avoid confusion of persons.
325. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, book 3, chs. 6 - 7.

- Reply to the fourth: The neuter gender is unformed; the masculine, and likewise the feminine, is formed and determinate. And therefore by the neuter gender a common essence is signified; but by the masculine and feminine, some supposit determined in the common nature. Whence also in human affairs, if one is asked, "Who is this?" the answer is, "Socrates" - a name of a supposit. But if it is asked, "What is he?" the answer is, "a rational and mortal animal." And therefore, because in the divine the distinction is according to the persons and not according to the essence, we say that the Father is other (alius) than the Son, but not another thing (aliud). And conversely we say that They are one (unum), but not one person (unus).

The conclusion is that the Son can be said to be other (alius) than the Father in the masculine, but not another thing (aliud) in the neuter.

Cic. To this conclusion, and to the doctrine of this and the following article, the disputation of the next article must be expressly deferred.

Articulus III - Whether the exclusive expression "alone" is to be added to an essential term in the divine

To the third we proceed thus. It seems that the exclusive expression "alone" is not to be added to an essential term in the divine. For according to the Philosopher in the Second Elenchi, "alone" is he who is not with another. But God is with the Angels and holy souls. Therefore we cannot say "God alone."[326]

- Further. Whatever is adjoined to an essential term in the divine can be predicated of any person in particular and of all together. For because it is fitting to say "wise God," we can say "the Father is wise God," and "the Trinity is wise God." But St. Augustine in book 6 On the Trinity says: "That sentence is to be considered wherein it is said, that the Father is not true God alone." Therefore "alone" cannot be adjoined to an essential term.[327]
- Further. If this expression "alone" is adjoined to an essential term, it is either with respect to a personal predicate, or with respect to an essential predicate. But not with respect to a personal predicate, because this is false: "God alone is Father," since a man also is father. Nor with respect to an essential predicate, because if this were true, "God alone creates," it seems to follow that this would be true, "the Father alone creates." For whatever is said of God can be said of the Father. But this is false, because the Son also is creator. Therefore the expression "alone" cannot be adjoined in the divine to an essential term.

But on the contrary is what is said in 1 Tim. 1: "To the King of the ages, immortal, invisible, the only God."

326. Aristotle, Sophistical Refutations (Elenchi), book 2.
327. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 6, ch. 9 (at the beginning).

I answer: This expression "alone" (solus) can be taken either categorematically or syncategorematically. A term is called categorematic which absolutely posits the thing signified about some supposit, as "white" about "man" when it is said "a white man." If therefore this expression "alone" be taken thus, in no way can it be adjoined to any term in the divine, because it would posit solitude about the term to which it would be adjoined, and thus it would follow that God is solitary. Which is against what has been said.

But a term is called syncategorematic which imports an order of the predicate to the subject, as the words "every" or "no one" do. And similarly this expression "alone," because it excludes every other supposit from sharing in the predicate. Thus, when it is said "Socrates alone writes," it is not given to be understood that Socrates is solitary, but that no one else is co-sharer with him in writing, although there are many present with him. And in this way nothing prohibits this expression "alone" from being adjoined to some essential term in the divine, inasmuch as all things other than God are excluded from sharing in the predicate. Hence let us say, "God alone is eternal," because nothing besides God is eternal.

- Reply to the first: Although Angels and holy souls are always with God, nevertheless, if there were not a plurality of persons in the divine, it would follow that God would be alone or solitary. For solitude is not taken away by association with something of an extraneous nature. For one is said to be alone in a garden, although there are many plants and animals there. And similarly God would be said to be alone or solitary, even with Angels and men existing with Him, if there were not several persons in the divine. The association therefore of Angels and souls does not exclude absolute solitude from the divine, much less solitude that is relative and by comparison to some predicate.
- Reply to the second: This expression "alone," properly speaking, is not placed on the side of the predicate which is taken formally. For it regards the supposit, insofar as it excludes another supposit from that to which it is adjoined. But this adverb, since it is exclusive, can be placed both on the side of the subject and on the side of the predicate. For we can say, "only Socrates runs," that is, no one else; and "Socrates runs only," that is, he does nothing else. Whence it cannot properly be said, "the Father is God alone," or "the Trinity is God alone," unless perhaps some implication is understood on the part of the predicate, as when it is said: "the Trinity is God who is the only God." And according to this, that sentence also can be true: "the Father is God who is the only God," if the relative were referred to the predicate and not to the supposit. But Augustine, when he says that the Father is not the only God, but that the Trinity is the only God, speaks by way of exposition, as if he were to say: when it is said "to the King of the ages, invisible, to the only God," this is not to be expounded of the person of the Father, but of the Trinity alone.
- Reply to the third: In either way this expression "alone" can be adjoined to an essential term. For this proposition "God alone is father" is twofold: because the term "father" can predicate the person of the Father. And thus it is true: for a man is not that person. Or it can predicate relation only. And thus it is false: because the relation of paternity is found also in others, although not univocally. Similarly, this is true: "God alone creates." Nor however does it follow: "therefore the Father alone creates." For, as the sophists say, an exclusive expression "immobilizes" the term to which it is adjoined, so that a descent cannot be made under it through some of the supposits. For it does not follow, "man alone is a rational and mortal animal; therefore Socrates alone [is such]." Therefore, "Socrates alone" does not follow.

The conclusion is that the name "alone," if it be placed categorematically, as the logicians speak, cannot be predicated of an essential term; if we should say "God is alone." But taken syncategorematically it can be adjoined, as when we say "God alone is infinite."

Articulus IV - Whether an exclusive expression can be added to a personal term

To the fourth we proceed thus. It seems that an exclusive expression can be adjoined to a personal term, even if the predicate be common. For the Lord speaks to the Father in John 17: "that they may know Thee the only true God." Therefore "the Father alone is true God."

- Further. In Matthew it is said: "No one knows the Son except the Father." Which signifies as if it were said, "the Father alone knows the Son." But "to know the Son" is common. Therefore the same as before.
- Further. An exclusive expression does not exclude that which belongs to the very notion of the term to which it is adjoined. Whence it does not exclude a part nor a universal. For it does not follow, "Socrates alone is white: therefore his hand is not white"; or, "therefore man is not white." But one person is in the notion of another, as the Father is in the notion of the Son, and conversely. Therefore, from this that it is said, "the Father alone is God," the Son or the Holy Spirit is not excluded. And thus this locution seems to be true.
- Further. The Church sings: "Thou alone, O Most High, Jesus Christ."

But on the contrary: This locution "the Father alone is God" has two expositive parts, namely, "the Father is God," and "no other than the Father is God." But this second is false, because the Son, who is other than the Father, is God. Therefore this is false, "the Father alone is God," and likewise its similars.

I answer: When we say, "the Father alone is God," this proposition can have a multiple sense. First, according as "alone" is taken categorematically. Second, according as it is taken syncategorematically, and thus again it can be understood in multiple ways. For if it exclude from the form of the subject, thus it is true, so that the sense be: "the Father alone is God," that is, He with whom no other is "father," is God. And in this way St. Augustine expounds in book 6 On the Trinity, when he says: We say "the Father alone," not because He is separated from the Son or the Holy Spirit, but in saying this we signify that those others together with Him are not Father. But this sense is not had from the customary mode of speaking unless another implication be understood; as if it were said, "He who alone is called Father is God." But according to its proper sense it excludes from sharing in the predicate. And thus this proposition is false if it excludes another (masculine supposit). It is, however, true if it excludes another thing (neuter).

Ad the third, it is to be said that in either way this word, "alone," can be joined to an essential term. For this proposition, "God alone is Father," is twofold: because the word "Father" can predicate the person of the Father. And thus it is true; for man is not that person. Or it can predicate the relation alone. And thus it is false. For the relation of paternity is also found in others, although not univocally. Likewise this is true: "God alone creates." Yet it does not follow: therefore the Father alone. Because, as the sophists say, an exclusive word immobilizes the term to which it is adjoined, so that no descent can be made under it to any supposits. For it does not follow: "Socrates alone is a rational, mortal animal: therefore Socrates's hand is not white," or, "therefore man is not white."

The conclusion is: If the name "alone" be put categorematically, as the logicians speak, it cannot be predicated of an essential term, for example, if we say, "God is alone"; but syncategorematically it can be added, for example, if we say, "God alone is infinite."

Whether the exclusive word can be joined to a personal term

In the fourth [article] the procedure is thus.

It seems that the exclusive word can be joined to a personal term, even if the predicate be common. For the Lord, speaking to the Father, says in John 17: "that they may know thee, the only true God." Therefore the Father alone is the true God.

1. Moreover, in Matthew 11 it is said: "No one knows the Son but the Father." Which signifies the same as if it were said, "the Father alone knows the Son." But to know the Son is something common. Therefore the same as before.
2. Moreover, an exclusive word does not exclude those things which are of the understanding of the term to which it is adjoined. Hence it does not exclude a part, nor a universal. For it does not follow: "Socrates alone is white": therefore his hand is not white; or, therefore man is not white. But one person is in the understanding of the other, as the Father in the understanding of the Son, and conversely: therefore, by the fact that it is said, "the Father alone is God," the Son or the Holy Spirit is not excluded. And thus this expression seems to be true.
3. Moreover, the Church sings: "Thou alone, O Jesus Christ, art the Most High."

But on the contrary: This expression, "the Father alone is God," has two expositional expansions, namely: "the Father is God," and "no other than the Father is God." But this second is false, because the Son is other than the Father, who is God. Therefore this is false, "the Father alone is God"; and so in similar cases.

I answer that, when we say, "the Father alone is God," this proposition can have manifold understanding. For if "alone" posits solitude about the Father, thus it is false according to what is taken categorematically. But according to what is taken syncategorematically, thus again it can be understood in many ways. Because if it excludes from the form of the subject, thus it is true, so that the sense is: "the Father alone is God," that is, he, with whom no other is Father, is God. And in this way St. Augustine expounds it in De Trinitate, book 6, ch. 9, when he says: "We say the Father alone, not because he is separated from the Son or the Holy Spirit, but in saying this we signify that those who are together with him are not Father."[328] But this sense is not had from the customary mode of speaking unless another implication be understood; as if it be said: "He who alone is called Father is God." According to the proper sense, however, it excludes from sharing in the predicate. And thus this proposition is false if it excludes "another" in the masculine. But it is true if it excludes "another" only in the neuter. For the Son is "other" (alius) than the Father, yet not "another thing" (aliud). Likewise the Holy Spirit. But because this word "alone" properly regards the subject (as was said), it is more apt to exclude "another" (alius) than "another thing" (aliud). Wherefore such a locution is not to be extended, but to be piously expounded, if it be found anywhere in the authentic Scripture.

Reply to the first: When we say, "thee the only true God," it is not understood of the person of the Father, but of the Trinity alone, as Augustine expounds. Or, if it be understood of the person of the Father, the other persons are not excluded, because of the unity of essence, insofar as the word "alone" excludes only "another thing," as was said.

And similarly one must speak to the second. For when something essential is said of the Father, the Son or the Holy Spirit is not excluded on account of the unity of essence. Hence it must be known that in the aforesaid authority the word "no one" (nemo) is not the same as "no man" (nullus homo), which the term seems to signify. For the person of the Father could not be excepted; but it is taken, according to the usage of speech, distributively for any rational nature.

Reply to the third: An exclusive word does not exclude those things which are of the understanding of the term to which it is adjoined, if they do not differ according to supposit, as a part and a universal. But the Son differs in supposit from the Father. And therefore the reasoning is not similar.

Reply to the fourth: We do not say absolutely that the Son alone is Most High, but that he alone is Most High with the Holy Spirit in the glory of God the Father.

Note concerning the article. The conclusion is: When the predicate is common, as "God," "wise," and the like, the name "alone" cannot be added to a personal term: wherefore we cannot say, "the Father alone is God," unless the proposition renders this sense: "the Father is God" - which sense is not alien to the usage "he alone is Father." Concerning this conclusion it must be observed that for this reason we added in the conclusion those words, "when the predicate is common, as God," even if they are not expressly had in the body, because thus it is had in the title of the article, and in that case there is controversy; by "the title of the article" I understand not that which is prefixed to the article (for that was not placed by St. Thomas), but that which in the article itself is inserted before the beginning of the first argument. Wherefore in the body the Holy Doctor only disputes about the particle "alone" in that proposition, "the Father alone is God," in which the predicate is common: for if the predicate were personal, the name "alone" could very well be added, as in this proposition, "the Father alone begets." But concerning the use of these names, and of others about which St. Thomas disputes in Article 2, we must straightway discourse more copiously.

328. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 6, ch. 9 (at the beginning).

Disputatio CXXXI - On the varied use of names in the mystery of the Trinity

- On the names, "the same" (idem), "other" (alius), and "another thing" (aliud), "one" (unus), and "one" (vnum). Caput 1.
- On the names of diversity, separation, and union. Caput 2.
- On the names "threefold" and "manifold." Caput 3.
- On the words "unique," "singular," and "alone." Caput 4.

Caput I - On the names "the same" (idem), "other" (alius), and "another thing" (aliud), "one" (unus), and "one" (vnum)

In what manner these names are to be used, when they are not predicated per se, but, as it were, adjectivally are adjoined to other words, no one who has learned the mystery of the Trinity - of one essence in three persons - can be ignorant. For it is manifest that one cannot say that the Father is "another God" from the Son, nor "another creator," and so forth; for thus distinction in essence would be signified. And therefore Sixtus the Pope in Epistle I and VI, and the Sixth Synod in act 11, in the Epistle of Sophronius, disapprove this mode of speaking; but, on the contrary, we must say that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are the same God.[329]

But whether, when notional names are added, one ought to say "the same," or "another God," we shall say below in Disputation 157, namely, whether we ought to say "God begot another God," or "the same God."

Dubium. The author of the Commentary on Boethius's De Trinitate, in Bede's edition, tome 8, column 113, proposes a doubt: whether, once this proposition has been uttered, "the Father is God," this also is true, "the same God is the Son." He answers, however, that a distinction is needed: for if (he says) this whole "the same God" be supposed, it is not to be conceded, lest we fall into the Sabellian heresy; for "the same" is referred to the Father: as if he said, because that proposition, "the Father is God," has preceded, when we add "the same God is the Son," the word "the same" seems to be referred to God of whom the speech has preceded; that is, to the Father, who is God: and thus the sense is, "God the Father is God the Son," which is to confuse the persons. Otherwise (he says), if the word "the same" be not prefixed to the word "God," but be placed after it 329. Sixtus, Pope, Epistles I and VI; the Sixth Synod, act 11, in the Epistle of Sophronius.

- which that author expressed, "if it be not supposed, but be predicated" - then the proposition will be true; as if someone, with this enunciation premised, "the Father is God," were to subjoin this, "and God is the same the Son," it will be true, because it renders this sense: "God the Son is the same God with the Father." But in the other mode previously stated the sense was: "God the Father is the same God who is the Son" - which the author in the same place thinks to be two different things; although there appears scarcely any difference between these: "God the Son is the same God with the Father"; "God the Son is the same God who is the Father."

I, for my part, judge that care must be taken lest the name "the same," when an enunciation about some person has gone before, seem to refer to that person: for thus it is not to be said, "and the same God is the Son." If, however, it refers only to the concrete name "God," it must be conceded. But this must be discerned according to the rules which we shall hand down below in Disputation 157, cap. 6. For when the name "God" is posited on the part of the predicate, even if it be predicated of some person, it does not supposit for a person, but for the nature; as in this: "the Father is God." Wherefore, when afterwards it is added, "the same God is the Son," the word "the same" does not seem to refer to the person of the Father, but to the nature of the Godhead in the concrete. But when the name "God" is put with some notional word adjoined, which makes it supposited for a person, according to what we shall say there, then it will not be true to say, "the same God is such or such a person," assigning another; as if someone were to say, "the Father is God begetting," or, "God begetting is the Father," it would not be permitted to subjoin, "and the same God is the Son"; because then the name "the same" refers to God the begetter, who is supposited for the person of the Father.

But indeed, if the names "other" (alius) and "another thing" (aliud) be put per se, which the logicians call categorematically, as in this proposition, "the Father is other than the Son," or, "he is another thing than the Son," it is clear also from the doctrine of the Fathers and of the Councils in what manner one should speak: "other," in the masculine, denotes distinction of supposit; "another thing," however, neutrally, denotes distinction of nature. And thus it is permitted to assert, "the Father is other than the Son," and, "in things divine there is other and other"; yet it is not true, "the Father is another thing than the Son," or, "in things divine there is another thing and another thing." This doctrine is gathered first from Novatian, the Roman presbyter, in the book De Trinitate, ch. 22, printed with Tertullian, where he teaches that "one," neutrally, is referred to the nature; "one," however, in the masculine, to the person; the same, therefore, must be said of these names "other" and "another thing." And so, in the Trinity they grant "other and other," but not "another thing and another thing": the Council of Ephesus, tome 2, ch. 7; the Eleventh Council of Toledo in the confession of faith; and the Lateran under Innocent III, in the chapter "We condemn," on the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith; St. Basil, in the oration against those who calumniate us as worshipping three Gods, toward the middle; St. Augustine - or rather Fulgentius, who is believed to be the true author of that work - book De fide ad Petrum, ch. 1; and the same Augustine, City of God, book 11, ch. 10; Pope St. Leo I, Sermon 1 on Pentecost, for the same reason; St. Hilary, De Trinitate, book 7, toward the middle; and St. Anselm, in the Monologion, chs. 40 and 42, say that the Father and the Son are "two," yet "one they are," not "one [person]." St. Bernard,

Epistle 190, asserts that "the whole that is the Father is the Son": because "the whole," neutrally, is referred to the essence; as also St. John Damascene noted, De fide orthodoxa, book 3, ch. 7; and Nicetas, Thesaurus, book 3, ch. 35, who taught exactly the same about these names "other" and "another thing."

Among the Scholastics, the same has been handed down, together with St. Thomas in the second article of this question, by more recent theologians in the same place; and by Alex., Prima Pars, q. 65, in its members.

Bonaventure in the First Book of the Sentences, distinction 21, article 1, question 7, and Henricus, in the Second Part of his Summa, article 53, question 1, also pertain here.[330] The Son is not the same as the Father: they use, however, the masculine noun. And as St. Ambrose says, in the first book On the Faith, chapter 2, for the same reason it must be said that what is Father is Son; yet not that he who is Father is Son. In the same way, concerning the name "one" in the masculine and "one" in the neuter, one must philosophize.[331]

This also pertains here, that other Fathers, relying on the same foundation, affirm that in Christ there is not another and another (alius et alius), but another thing and another thing (aliud et aliud). Thus the Council of Constantinople V, in conference 8, canons 3 and 6; and Pope Leo I in Epistle 10, chapter 4, and Epistle 95, chapter 1; and although that Epistle 10 of Leo, when it had been recited in the Council of Chalcedon, at first sight displeased the Fathers of the Council, as is found in action 2, nevertheless afterward, with Theodoret approving according to the judgment of St. Cyril, the Fathers all consented. The same words of Leo are written by Pope Agatho in his Epistle, which is in the Sixth Synod, action 4; and similar things are had in the same Synod, session 17, in the confession of faith toward its end; and Pope Eutychian in Epistle 1.[332] In the same way spoke St. Hilary, On the Trinity 9, a little after the middle; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 5 on Theology; St. Cyril, in the Scholia on the Incarnation, chapter 26; Fulgentius, On the Incarnation, chapter 11; St. John Damascene, On the Orthodox Faith, book 3, chapter 7; and Nicetas in the place cited; St. Anselm, in the book On the Incarnation of the Word, chapter 5; the author of the Commentary on Boethius's book On the Trinity, as found in Bede, column 1117.[333] Of these, Nazianzen, Damascene, and Nicetas, and that author expressly affirm that the name "other" (alius) is referred to the supposit (suppositum); but the name "another thing" (aliud), to the nature and the essence (essentia). And indeed, from the name "other" (alius), that is gathered from John 14: "I will ask the Father, and he will give you another (alium) Paraclete." Nor only can we say in the Trinity that there is other and other (alius et alius), but also "the one and the other" (alter et alter): for it is a name of the same signification. So speaks St. Hilary, On the Trinity 2; John Maxentius, book 2 Dialogica, 20; Athanasius, Oration on the Substance of the Son; Fulgentius, book 3, To

330. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 21, art. 1, q. 7; Henricus, Summa, pars 2, art. 53, q. 1.

331. St. Ambrose, De fide, lib. 1, cap. 2.

332. Constantinople V, coll. 8, can. 3, 6; Leo I, Ep. 10, cap. 4; Ep. 95, cap. 1; Chalcedon, act. 2; Theodoret with the judgment of St. Cyril; Agatho, Ep. in Syn. VI, act. 4; Syn. VI, sess. 17, in confessione fidei; Pope Eutychian, Ep. 1.

333. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, lib. 9; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 5 de Theologia; St. Cyril, Scholia de Incarnatione, cap. 26; Fulgentius, De Incarnatione, cap. 11; St. John Damascene, De fide orth., lib. 3, cap. 7; Nicetas, loc. cit.; St. Anselm, De Incarnatione Verbi, cap. 5; Comment. in Boeth. De Trinitate, apud Bedam, col. 1117.

Thrasimund, chapter 6, whose words we will set forth in the following chapter, and to the seventh objection of the Arians, in the book Against the Arians; and in the Sermon on the Twofold Nativity of Christ; and St. Bernard, Epistle 190, where in the same way he speaks of these names "the one" and "the other" (alter et alterum), just as we above of these "other" and "another thing" (alius et aliud). In the same way one ought to use the name "the same" (idem), either in the masculine, or in the neuter, as Guitmundus, Archbishop of Aversa, notes in the Confession on the Trinity, which is in the fourth volume of the Sacred Library; and Justyn also, in the Exposition of the True Confession of the Trinity, when he says that one must answer under a distinction, not absolutely.[334]

Caput II - On the names of diversity, separation, and union

Among the words that signify diversity are "to differ" (differre) and "difference" (differentia) - in Greek, διαφέρειν and διαφορά - which certain Fathers employ in divine matters: Justin, in the True Exposition of the Confession of the Trinity, a little from the beginning; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 3 on Theology, which is number 35 in order, likewise a little from the beginning; St. John Damascene, On the Faith, book 1, chapters 10 and 11, and book 3, chapter 5; Euthymius, on John 16; and among the Latins, Richard of St. Victor, On the Trinity, book 4, chapter 20, and book 5, chapter 1; the Master, in the First Book of the Sentences, distinction 24, "Cum autem," and the chapter "Ita"; and Alexander of Hales, First Part, question 44.[335]

Yet more cautiously St. Thomas, in article 2 of this question, teaches that the persons of the Trinity ought not to be called "different," nor said "to differ," following the judgment of St. Hilary, On the Trinity 4, a little before the middle, where, from that verse of Genesis 1, "Let us make man," he gathers in this way: since "not solitary" only is signified, so neither is "different" signified; for neither solitary only nor diverse is to be confessed by us.[336]

But the author of the Commentary on Boethius's book On the Trinity, which is found in the eighth tome of Bede, column 1113, to one asking whether the divine persons differ, says that one must answer by a distinction, not absolutely. For they are said to "differ," that is, to be "distinguished" or to "be apart": and thus it must be conceded: or they are said to differ, that is, to partake of contrary qualities; and thus it is false. And although, with the authorities Damascene, Richard, Euthymius, the Master, and Alexander invoked, they say absolutely that the three persons differ; yet either that they differ by properties, or that the properties themselves differ: which way of speaking surely removes all suspicion from the word. Therefore St. Thomas refuses to grant "difference" among the persons, because that seems to be referred to the essence; wherefore, when it is added "according to the properties," every occasion of error is taken away.[337]

---

334. Guitmundus, Archiep. Aversanus, Confessio de Trinitate, in Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 4; Justin, Expositio verae confessionis Trinitatis.

335. Justin, Expositio verae confessionis Trinitatis; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 3 de Theologia (ord. 35); St. John Damascene, De fide, lib. 1, cc. 10 - 11; lib. 3, c. 5; Euthymius, in Ioan. 16; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, lib. 4, c. 20; lib. 5, c. 1; the Master, I Sent., dist. 24, c. "Cum autem," et c. "Ita"; Alexander of Hales, P. I, q. 44.

336. St. Thomas, in this question, art. 2; St. Hilary, De Trinitate, lib. 4, ad med.; Gen 1:26.

337. Commentarius in Boethii librum De Trinitate, apud Bedam, tom. 8, col. 1113.

I judge the same thing must be said of the name "diverse" (diversus), that although it can be predicated of the persons absolutely, yet because it can furnish some occasion of erring, it is better denied, for the reason that it is referred to the essence. So St. Thomas in article 2, and the Canarian there. For this reason Fulgentius, book 3 To Thrasimund, chapter 6, says: "The eternal and unchangeable Father begot another (alterum), not a diverse one (non diversum)." And Lactantius, Divine Institutes, book 4, chapter 29: "When we say God the Father and God the Son, we do not say a 'diverse' [God], nor do we separate either of them"; although Lactantius in this place, when he says "we do not say a 'diverse'," seems to understand "God." One could refer also St. Augustine, On the Trinity, book 7, last chapter, where he says: "And thus let him say one essence (namely, the Father and the Son), so that he does not suppose something other than another, either greater or better, or diverse in some part." But since he says "aliud" (another thing), of the neuter gender, he seems to speak of the essence, not of the person, according to the notes in the preceding chapter. Truly St. Hilary, On the Trinity 4, in the chapter cited above, plainly of the Son himself says that he is "not diverse." But if among the Fathers he is sometimes called "diverse," it will be with that addition which we noted above - namely, "according to the property," or "according to the person" - or it should be explained in a good sense.[338]

Nevertheless, the names "discrete" (discretus) and "discretion" (discretio) are more readily attributed to the Trinity; and in the same way, the names "distinct" or "distinction" seem to signify a "discrimen" (a distinguishing line). These words are used by the First and the Eleventh Council of Toledo, and by the Lateran Council under Innocent III, in the chapter "Damnamus," On the Most High Trinity and the Catholic Faith; and the ancient translation of Pseudo-Dionysius, in the chapter On the Divine Names, says that some things are said of God "in unity," some "discretely" (in Greek, εἰκότως καὶ διεκκεκριμένως), which denotes "distinctly" and "discretely," from the verb διακρίνω, which signifies "to distinguish and to discern." Perionius, however, translates "distinctly." Lactantius too, in the place just cited, rightly says, "nor do we separate either of them (sc. the Father and the Son)." For "to separate" (secernere) seems to signify more than "to discern" (discernere), namely, to "separate and divide," which must not be said of the divine persons. Richard of St. Victor uses the same word in On the Trinity, book 4, chapter 15, and book 5, chapter 1, but clearly refers it to the properties, as we noted about the word "to differ." Moreover, as St. Augustine observed, On the Trinity, book 7, last chapter, the persons cannot be called "dissimilar": for that is referred to the essence.[339]

Concerning the word "union" (vnio) and "conjunction" (coniunctio), some think that one must speak cautiously in Latin: for in God "unity" (unitas) in essence (essentia) seems to be granted rather than "union"; for these words, just as already the word "conjunction," seem to signify a collection of many into one by some participation. The name "conjunction" is used by Billius, the translator of Nazianzen, in Oration 23, which is in praise of the philosopher Heron; and in

338. Fulgentius, Ad Thrasimundum, lib. 3, c. 6; Lactantius, Div. Instit., lib. 4, c. 29; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 7, cap. ult.; St. Hilary, De Trinitate, lib. 4.

339. Councils of Toledo I and XI; Lateran under Innocent III, cap. "Damnamus," De summa Trinitate, et fide catholica; Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, cap. de nomin.; Perionius, transl.; Lactantius, loc. cit.; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, lib. 4, c. 15; lib. 5, c. 1; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 7, cap. ult.

Nicetas's commentary on those words of the same oration, "fac sis," which are near the end of it; and by Perionius, translator of Dionysius, often in chapter 2 On the Divine Names and chapter 3, and he calls the things that are essential in God "conjoined" and "common to the whole divinity"; and below he calls "distinction and unity" in God "conjunction and distinction." In Greek, however, with Nazianzen and Dionysius the word is ἕνωσις, signifying "union" or "unity," which the Greeks employ everywhere, both to denote the union of two natures in the one person of Christ, and to signify the unity of essence and of the essential attributes in the Trinity. Dionysius also uses the word ἡνωμένος, which we render in Latin "united, conjoined": in Greek, indeed, because a richer significance of words obtains among them, they do not fear to use these names in that way. Only the word συνάφεια the Fathers of the Council of Alexandria, in Epistle 10, as preserved by St. Cyril, suspected for expressing the union of the two natures in Christ: because it seems rather to signify "contact of nearness" than "union," as those skilled in the Greek tongue note: and those Fathers use the name ἕνωσις, which is also used in the Trinity: but in Latin thus it is said in that Epistle of the Council of Alexandria: "Nay rather the name 'conjunction' we avoid, as not being suitable to signify the most close unity." And, in my judgment, the name "conjunction" does not so well fit this mystery among Latins, for expressing the unity of three persons in one essence, as does the name "unity." About the word συνάφεια I said something in the preceding disputation against Elipandus, from those things which I added in the books On Adoration, chapter 13.[340]

Wherefore, from the Latin authors, St. Bernard, in book 5 of the Consideration to Eugene, toward the middle, says of God: "For He is One, but not 'united'; He does not consist of parts, as a body": and he said this to express the supreme simplicity of God: because "united" seems to be that which is gathered from many into one. Thus indeed he had said: "thou hast not (i.e., God) that which divides to number, nor that which gathers to one"; by which words he does not deny that there are three persons, since straightway he truly grants number in them; but between person and essence, against Gilbert, he denies number, and establishes supreme simplicity; and therefore he asserts "nor that which gathers to one." For although the three persons are distinguished among themselves, yet because with the essence they are altogether the same, they are not so much said to be "united and collected" in that unity as "one." The same was noted by the author of the Commentary on Boethius's book On the Trinity, as found in Bede, tome 8, column 1115, who near the end says: "We say that 'one' (namely, the three persons) is not from a union, as a species or a genus is said [to be one]: for God does not unite several that share, substantially or accidentally."[341]

I for my part think that, in Latin speech, the mystery of the Trinity in one essence is more conveniently signified by the names "unity" and "one" than by the names "union," "conjunction," and "united"; nevertheless I do not dare openly to condemn the manner of speaking and the use of those names.

---

340. Billius, interpreter of Nazianzen, on Or. 23 (in laudem Heronis Philosophi), and Nicetas ad eadem verba; Perionius on Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, cc. 2 - 3; Nazianzen and Dionysius on ἕνωσις and ἡνωμένος; Council of Alexandria, Ep. 10, apud St. Cyril: avoidance of συνάφεια; see also the earlier disputation against Elipandus and the additions to the books De Adoratione, cap. 13.

341. St. Bernard, De Consideratione, lib. 5, ad Eugenium (in medio); Comment. in Boeth. De Trinitate, apud Bedam, tom. 8, col. 1115.

Caput III - On the names "triplex" and "multiplex"

There are those who think that the name "triplex" cannot be predicated of God, nor the name "multiplex," as "triune" (trinus) is predicated: thus teaches St. Augustine, On the Trinity, book 6, chapters 6 - 8, and book 15, chapter 3; although Epistle 102 seems to admit this word, yet he teaches that it is said of God by reason of effects; as also the Holy Spirit, by reason of the gifts which he bestows upon us, is said to be "sevenfold." In favor of this opinion there is adduced also St. Ambrose, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 2, where he says: "What is one is not confused, nor what is indifferent 'multiple'": but there he plainly speaks of the essence of God; as also St. Gregory Nazianzen, in the Oration to Evagrius, which is 45, where he says that "there is not in God a 'multiple' number, nor is God 'multiple'." St. Bernard also is cited, who in book 3 of the Consideration, near the middle, denies that God is "multiple" or "double"; but he asserts that He is simple. And the Eleventh Council of Toledo, in the confession of faith, plainly affirms that God is not "triplex," but "trinus." Among the Scholastics, St. Thomas also teaches this in this question, article 1, reply to the third; and Alexander, question 66, member 1, article 4.[342]

St. Augustine gives the reason: because if God were said to be "triplex" or "multiplex" by reason of the persons, it would follow that there is something greater when the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are together than when there is the Father alone. But St. Thomas for this reason denies that God is "triplex," because "triplum" and "triplex" signify a proportion of inequality; for it is a certain species of unequal proportion; but in God an unequal cannot be.[343]

Yet these reasons, if it be allowed to say so with due respect to such great men, do not efficaciously prove what they contend. First, because if from this, that God were said to be "triplex" by reason of the persons, that absurdity would follow which Augustine inferred, the same would plainly be gathered from this, that He is said to be "trinus": for in a ternary the whole ternary seems to be something greater than any unity taken separately: or, if in that case this absurdity does not follow, in no way can it be inferred from this, that God is called "triplex." But how "more" and "less" ought to be conceded in number, so that even in divine matters, without any absurdity, it may have place, we explained above in question 30, in the notes on the first article.

Then also what St. Thomas asserts proves only that God cannot be called "triplex": but that He cannot be called "multiplex" he does not demonstrate: for the name "multiplex" is not a name of proportion, but of multitude. Moreover, although the name "triplex" be of a lesser proportion, and this be granted in God, it is not inconvenient: since the equality and inequality of number must necessarily be granted in God, as also "fewer" and "more," as we said in that same article: for who would deny that the ternary of persons in God is a lesser number than the quaternary of persons in men; and that four men are more than the three divine persons?

---

342. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 6, cc. 6 - 8; lib. 15, c. 3; Ep. 102; St. Ambrose, De fide, lib. 1, c. 2; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 45 ad Evagrium; St. Bernard, De consideratione, lib. 3, in medio; Council of Toledo XI, in confessione fidei; St. Thomas, in this question, art. 1, ad 3; Alexander of Hales, q. 66, memb. 1, art. 4.

343. The reason from St. Augustine as above; St. Thomas's reason: because triplum/triplex import a proportion of inequality, which cannot be in God.

Wherefore I for my part judge for another reason that God cannot be said to be "multiplex" or "triplex," even if "trinus" is rightly said: namely, because it yields one of two senses, either that God in himself consists of several things, and thus it is opposed to "simple," as if requiring several things for His composition, which in no way can be said of God. For although God is triune in persons, that is, subsists in three, yet because He is not made up of three, nor coalesces as if from components, nor do those [three persons], together with the essence, make for a composition of God Himself, since they are the same.

For he had said: you (namely, God) do not have that which divides to number, but that which gathers to one. By these words he does not deny that there are three persons, since straightway he truly grants number in them; but between person and essence he denies number against Gilbert, and asserts the highest simplicity. Therefore he affirms not that which would gather to one. For although the three persons are distinguished among themselves; yet because they are altogether the same with the essence, they are not so much said to be united and gathered in it, as to be one. The author of the Commentary on Boethius's book On the Trinity, cited in Bede, tome 8, column 1115, noted the same, who says near the end: We say that not "one" (namely, that the three persons) is said from union, as species or genus is said: for God does not unite several things which co-participate, whether substantially or accidentally.[344]

I for my part think that, in Latin speech, the mystery of the Trinity in one essence is more aptly signified by the names "unity" and "one," than by the names "union," "conjunction," "united"; nevertheless I do not venture openly to condemn the manner of speaking and the use of these names.

Concerning the names "triple" (triplex) and "multiple" (multiplex): there are some who think that the name "triple" cannot be said of God just as "three" (trinus) is predicated; thus St. Augustine in De Trinitate, book 6, chapters 6 - 8, and book 15, chapter 3. For although Epistle 102 seems to admit this word, he teaches, however, that it is said of God by reason of effects; just as the Holy Spirit, by reason also of the gifts which he bestows on us, is called "sevenfold." Ambrose also is cited for this opinion, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 2, where he says: what is one is not "confused," nor is what is "indifferent" multiple; but there he plainly speaks of the essence of God; as likewise Nazianzen, in the oration to Evagrius, which is the 45th, where he says that there is not in God a multiple numen, nor is God multiple. Bernard too is cited, who in the books On Consideration, about the middle, denies that God is multiple or double, but asserts that he is simple; and the Council of Toledo XI, in the confession of faith, plainly affirms that God is not "triple," but "three" (trinus). Among the Scholastics, the same is taught by St. Thomas in this question, article 1, reply to the third, and Alexander of Hales, question 66, member 1, article 4. The reason St. Augustine gives is as above; St. Thomas's reason is that "triple" and "triplum/triplex" import a proportion of inequality, which cannot be in God.[345][346]

---

344. The author of the Commentary on Boethius, De Trinitate, cited in Bede, tome 8, col. 1115.

345. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 6, cc. 6 - 8; lib. 15, c. 3; Ep. 102; St. Ambrose, De fide, lib. 1, c. 2; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 45 ad Evagrium; St. Bernard, De consideratione, lib. 3, in medio; Council of Toledo XI, in confessione fidei; St. Thomas, in this question, art. 1, ad 3; Alexander of Hales, q. 66, memb. 1, art. 4.

Yet these reasons, to the extent that it is lawful to say of such great men, do not efficaciously say that which they contend. For if from the fact that God is not "triple" with respect to the persons there followed what Augustine inferred: that is, that something greater would be gathered from "triple" in a ternary than in unity taken separately, this absurdity does not follow; nor can it follow from the fact that God is "three"; but how the greater and the less ought to be in number, without any absurdity we have explained above in the question and in the points of the first article.

Moreover, what St. Thomas asserts only proves that one cannot say that God is "triple"; but it does not prove that we cannot say that he is "three" (trinus). For the name "triple" is a name of proportion; but "three" (trinus) can be said, and the name "multiple" cannot be said - if, namely, the name "triple" be a name of multitude and inequality. And these things are conceded concerning God, namely, that equality of number is necessarily in God, just as also we were saying above in the aforesaid article: that in God the ternary is not a lesser number than the quaternary among men; and that there are not more men than there are three divine persons.

Wherefore I indeed for another reason judge that we must not say that God is "multiple," even though he is "three," because one sense of "multiple" expresses that God consists in himself of many things united simply, as if after the manner of composition - which is in no way possible. For although God is three persons, that is, subsisting in three persons, nevertheless neither is he made up "out of" three or from things coalescing; nor do those constitute any composition of God himself, since they are altogether the same with the essence; therefore he who is rightly called "three" cannot be called "triple" or "multiple." For "three" only denotes distinction of hypostases, even in the same nature and without any distinction of them from the essence. But if it effects this sense, namely, that there are many gods, as though God were multiplied - who cannot be multiplied or triplicated unless there were many gods - yet we therefore say that God is "three," because he has some trinity in himself; and therefore, since "three gods" cannot be said, God is rightly called "three" (trinus).

Among the Fathers, Nazianzen, Ambrose, and Bernard, when they deny that God is multiple, manifestly refer this to the essence, and seem to follow the first sense: for they think that "multiple" is opposed to "simple"; and especially Bernard, who in that place, against Gilbert of Poitiers, contends that between person and essence there is no distinction, lest God be said to be multiple and without simplicity; which he thinks is not taken away by the Trinity of persons, if person and essence are altogether the same.

But in truth, if the words "multiple," "triple," and "double" be referred to persons, processions, or relations, I do not see why they could not befit God. Wherefore it will be permitted to say that there is in God a "multiple" as to person; and so to say that there is a "triple" as to person; and a "double" as to emanation. Thus St. Thomas, in De Potentia, question 10, article 1, said that there is a double emanation in God. Others say there is a double procession in the same way. Nazianzen, in the oration alleged, calls the Son and the Holy Spirit "a twin ray of the Father" (ἡλίλυμος τοῦ πατρὸς αὐγῆς), thus he names the Son and the Holy Spirit. And if it is lawful to say a "twin" procession and a "twin" ray, it will also be lawful to say a "double" procession and a "double" ray: for "ray" is referred to origin, not to essence. For those things which are common by a community as it were of the universal - such as are the concepts of person, relation, and procession, which are abstracted from several things by the intellect - or those which at least only in word, as it were by predication, are common, are rightly said to be multiplied by inferiors; and especially then when the inferiors are not of the same mode, as paternity, filiation, and spiration, which are apprehended as though of diverse species. I pass over here the reason by which Nazianzen, in that oration, proves that the Trinity of the persons derogates nothing from God's simplicity: for in the persons he seems to grant only a difference of names and a multiplication, whereas yet he who is rightly called "three" cannot be called "triple" or "multiple," since he is altogether the same with that [essence].

346. The Augustinian reason as above; St. Thomas's reason: because triplum/triplex import a proportion of inequality, which cannot be in God.

Nor is this sufficient against Sabellius. For Sabellius, too, conceded diverse appellations in the same nature. But Bernard's reason should suffice for us, which we have pursued at length in disputation 116, chapter 5: namely, because although the persons are distinguished among themselves; nevertheless with the divine nature they are altogether the same; wherefore with it, or among themselves, they compose nothing. From which I finally infer that Mirandola spoke amiss about God, saying: "one has a numen in a triple numen." For since numen is referred to the essence, it cannot be multiplied; and therefore Nazianzen expressly denied in God a "triple numen." And indeed, if "triple" could be said, then a triple adoration would also be owed to God - which is absurd. For every divine adoration is owed to the numen.

Caput IV - On the words "only - begotten" (unicus), "singular" (singularis), and "alone" (solus)

Hilary, book 7 On the Trinity, not far from the end, does not dare to call God "only" or "singular"; indeed he thinks it sacrilege to call God "singular"; and St. Thomas consents in this article; Bonaventure likewise on the First Book, distinction 21, article 1, question 1. But Durandus, on the First Book, distinction 9, question 1, and other more recent authors think, according to the propriety of speech, that it can be granted that God is "only" (unicus); and since now the danger of the Sabellian heresy has ceased, that we can, without any inconvenience, use this word. And if we predicate this word of the essence itself, or of the deity, there is no doubt but that it can befit.

Concerning the name "singular": Hilary teaches the same thing which he had said about the word "only," book 7 On the Trinity, past the middle and not far from the end; and Leo the First, in sermon 2 On Pentecost somewhat near the beginning, when he says: And as regards the deity of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, there is neither singularity nor diversity; and the author of the Commentary on Boethius's book On the Trinity, in Bede, tome 8, column 1116, who reports Augustine in Questions on the New and Old Testament. Yet among the Latins Lactantius, in the fourth book of the Divine Institutions, chapter 29, near the end, calls God "singular"; and among the Greeks, Sophronius, in the confession of faith which is found in action 11 of the sixth synod, often calls the deity and its unity "singular." Nor do I see why, according to the propriety of the word, it should take away the Trinity in the persons: wherefore, unless there be danger for the hearers, there is no need to fear to use this word.[347]

Concerning the names which the Logicians call "exceptive," such as "alone" (solus), "only" (solum), in the exposition of articles 3 and 4 we have explained what must be said, and we have interpreted the mind of the holy Doctor. With whom agree Alexander, I, p. q. 65, member 3; Bonaventure on the First, d. 21, a. 2, q. 1 & 2; Scotus, q. 1; Durandus, q. 1 & 2; Gabriel, q. 1; the Canarian, on the fourth article of this question and on q. 27, art. 1, disp. 1, p. 3, in the reply to the second. Nor does anything new occur to be noted, so that we might retain the true use of these names, beyond what we said there, except the exposition of that place John 17: "that they may know you, the only true God," where Christ, speaking with the Father, seems to say, "you alone are God." But, as is gathered from Augustine, book 6 De Trinitate, chapter 9, the name "alone" (solus) is not referred to the pronoun "you" (te), which signifies and indicates a person: for one cannot say, "The Father alone is God"; but it must be conjoined with the name "God," so that thus the sense is: "that he may know you, who are true God, alone." Then, however, the word "alone" excludes from the true nature of the Deity, not the other persons, but the other false gods whom the pagans worship.[348]

Quaestio XXXII - On the notions of the divine persons

Consequently, inquiry must be made about the cognition of the divine persons. And about this four things are asked.

Articulus I - Whether the Trinity of the divine persons can be known by natural reason Objicitur primo: It seems that the Trinity of the divine persons can be known by natural reason. For the philosophers did not arrive at the knowledge of God except through natural reason. But by the philosophers many things are found said about the Trinity of persons. For Aristotle says in 1 On the Heavens and the World: By this number, namely the ternary, we have used ourselves more to signify the one God eminent above the properties of things created. Augustine likewise says in Confessions 7: There I read, namely, in the books of the Platonists - not indeed in these very words, but this same thing altogether urged by many and manifold reasons - that "in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word," and the like which follow there. In which words the distinction of the divine persons is handed down. It is also said in the Gloss on Romans and on Exodus 7 that Pharaoh's magicians failed at the third sign, that is, in the knowledge of the third person, namely, the Holy Spirit. And thus at least two they knew.

347. Hilary, De Trinitate 7; Leo the Great, Sermon 2 on Pentecost; Comment. in Boeth. De Trinitate, apud Bedam, tom. 8, col. 1116; Lactantius, Divinae Institutiones, lib. 4, c. 29; Sophronius, Confession of Faith, sixth council, actio 11.

348. Alexander of Hales, I, p. q. 65, memb. 3; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 21, a. 2, q. 1 - 2; Scotus, q. 1; Durandus, q. 1 - 2; Gabriel, q. 1; the Canarian, ad art. 4 huius quaestionis et ad q. 27, art. 1, disp. 1, p. 3, ad 2; and St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 6, c. 9, on John 17:3.

Trismegistus also said: The Monad begot a monad, and reflected within itself its ardor. By which the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Spirit seem to be intimated. Therefore the cognition of the divine persons can be had by natural reason.[349]

Objicitur 2: Further, Richard of St. Victor says in the book On the Trinity, chapter 4: I believe without doubt that for any explication of the truth there will not be lacking arguments not only probable but even necessary. Whence also, to prove the Trinity of persons, some have introduced a reason from the infinity of divine goodness, which communicates itself infinitely in the procession of the divine persons; and others from this, that the possession of no good can be delightful without companionship. Augustine indeed proceeds to manifest the Trinity of persons from the procession of word and love in our mind. Which way we have followed above: therefore by natural reason the Trinity of persons can be known.[350]

Objicitur 3: Further, it seems superfluous to hand down to man that which cannot be known by human reason. But it must not be said that the divine handing down about the cognition of the Trinity is superfluous. Therefore the Trinity of persons can be known by human reason.

But on the contrary: Hilary says in book 1 On the Trinity: Let not man think that by his understanding he can attain the sacrament of the generation. Ambrose also says, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 5, a little before the middle: It is impossible to know the secret of the generation. The mind fails: the voice is silent. But by the origin of the generation and of the procession the Trinity is distinguished in the divine persons, as is clear from what was said above. Since therefore man cannot know and attain by understanding that for which reason cannot have what is necessary, it follows that the Trinity of persons cannot be known by reason.

I answer: It must be said that it is impossible to come, by natural reason, to the cognition of the Trinity of the divine persons. For it was shown above that man cannot, by natural reason, come to the cognition of God, except from creatures. But creatures contain the cognition of God as an effect in its cause. Therefore this alone by natural reason can be known about God, what it is necessary to befit him according as he is the principle of all beings: and this is the foundation of the way set forth above in the consideration of God. But the life of a creature of God is more common to the whole Trinity; and so it pertains to the unity of the essence, not to the distinction of the persons. Therefore by natural reason it is possible to know about God those things which pertain to the unity of the essence; but not those which pertain to the distinction of the persons. But he who tries to prove the Trinity of persons by natural reason detracts from faith in a twofold way. First, as to the dignity of faith itself, which is, that it be about things inaccessible, which exceed human reason; whence the Apostle says to the Hebrews 11, that faith is of things not appearing; and the Apostle says 1 Corinthians 2: We speak wisdom among the perfect - yet not the wisdom of this age, nor of the princes of this age - but we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, which is hidden. Second, as to the utility of drawing others to the faith. For when someone, to prove the faith, adduces reasons which are not compelling, it yields to the derision of unbelievers. For they think that we rely upon such reasons and that we believe because of them. Therefore those things which are of faith must not be attempted to be proved except by authorities to those who revere authorities. But among others it suffices to defend that what faith proclaims is not impossible. Whence Dionysius says, book 2, chapter On the Divine Names: If someone is who totally -

349. Aristotle, De caelo et mundo, I; St. Augustine, Confessiones, lib. 7; Glossa ordinaria on Rom. and Exod. 7; Hermes Trismegistus, in the book called Pimander: "Monas monadem genuit, et in se suum reflexit ardorem."

350. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, c. 4; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, on the processions of word and love in the mind (esp. lib. 10, c. 1; lib. 9).

But on the contrary: Hilary says in book 1 On the Trinity: "Do not think that the faith can attain to an understanding of the manner of generation." And Ambrose says, book 1, cap. 5, before the mystery: "It is impossible to know the secret of generation. The mind fails; the voice is silent."

I answer that it is impossible to attain to a cognition of the Trinity of the divine persons by natural reason. For it was shown above that a man can reach a cognition of God by natural reason only from creatures. But creatures lead to a cognition of God as effects lead to a cause. Therefore this alone can be known by natural reason about God, namely what must belong to Him insofar as He is the principle of all beings. And on this foundation we went above in treating of the consideration of God. Now, however, the creative power of God is common to the whole Trinity; whence it pertains to the unity of essence, not to the distinction of persons. Therefore by natural reason those things can be known about God which pertain to the unity of essence, but not those which pertain to the distinction of persons. But he who tries to prove the Trinity of persons by natural reason detracts from the faith in a twofold way. First, as to the dignity of the faith itself, which consists in this, that it is about invisible things which surpass human reason. Whence the Apostle says to the Hebrews (11): "Faith is of things not appearing." And the Apostle says (1 Cor. 2): "We speak wisdom among the perfect, yet not the wisdom of this world nor of the princes of this world; but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, which is hidden." Second, as to the usefulness for drawing others to the faith. For when someone, to prove the faith, adduces reasons which are not compelling, it yields to the derision of unbelievers. For they think that we rely upon such reasons and that we believe because of them. Therefore those things which are of faith must not be attempted to be proved except by authorities to those who revere authorities. But among others it suffices to defend that what faith proclaims is not impossible. Whence Dionysius says, book 2, chapter On the Divine Names: "If there is one who totally resists the words, he will be far from our philosophy; but if he regards the truth of the words, namely of the sacred ones, this I embrace, and we too use the canon."[351]

Reply to the first: The philosophers did not know the mystery of the Trinity of divine persons according to the proper notions, which are paternity, filiation, and procession, according to that of the Apostle in the First to the Corinthians, chapter 2: "We speak the wisdom of God, which none of the princes of this world knew," that is, the philosophers, according to the Gloss. Yet they knew certain essential attributes which are appropriated to the persons, as power to the Father, wisdom to the Son, goodness to the Holy Spirit, as will be clear below. Therefore what Aristotle says, "by this number we have applied ourselves, etc.," is not to be understood as though he posited a ternary number in the divine; but he wishes to say that the ancients used the number three in sacrifices and prayers, on account of a certain perfection of the ternary number. In the book also of the Platonists it is found: "In the beginning was the Word," not in the sense that "word" signifies the begotten person in the divine, but in the sense that by "word" there is understood the ideal reason by which God made all things, which is attributed by appropriation to the Son. And although they recognized the things appropriated to the persons, they are said nevertheless to have failed in the third sign, that is, in the cognition of the third person: because concerning the good-pleasure which is appropriated to the Holy Spirit they went astray; "for knowing God, they did not glorify Him as God," as is said in Romans 1. Or because the Platonists posited a first one, a first being, which they also said was the father of the whole universe of things; consequently they posited another substance under it, which they called the mind or paternal intellect, in which were the reasons of all things, as Macrobius relates on the Dream of Scipio. But they did not posit any third substance separated, which would seem to correspond to the Holy Spirit. Thus, indeed, we do not posit the Father and the Son as different in substance; but that was the error of Origen and of Arius, who followed the Platonists. What, moreover, Trismegistus said, "Monas monadem genuit, et in se suum reflexit ardorem," is not to be referred to the generation of the Son or the procession of the Holy Spirit, but to the production of the world; for one God produced one world on account of love of Himself.[352]

351. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, lib. 2, cap. 1.

Reply to the second: Reason is induced to some matter in a twofold way. In one way, to prove sufficiently some root. Thus in natural science a sufficient reason is induced to prove that the motion of the heavens is always of uniform velocity. In another way, a reason is induced not which sufficiently proves the root, but which shows that, the root being posited, the consequences are fitting. Thus in astrology a reason is offered for the excentrics and epicycles from this, that, this supposition having been made, the appearances about the celestial motions can be saved: yet this reason is not sufficiently probative, because perhaps by some other supposition they could be saved. In the first way, therefore, a reason can be adduced to prove that God is one, and the like; but in the second way stands the reason which is brought forward for the manifestation of the Trinity: because, namely, the Trinity being posited, such reasons agree; yet it does not follow that by these reasons the Trinity of persons is sufficiently proved. And this is clear in the particulars. For the infinite goodness of God is manifested also in the production of the creature, because it is the work of infinite power to produce from nothing. For it is not necessary, if in infinite goodness He communicates Himself, that something infinite proceed from God, but according to its own mode it reflects the divine goodness. Likewise also what is said, that without companionship the possession of some good cannot be pleasant, has place when in one person perfect goodness is not found. Hence for full pleasantness of goodness one needs the good of some other associated with oneself. But the likeness of our intellect does not sufficiently prove anything about God, because intellect is not found univocally in God and in us. And hence it is that St. Augustine, on John, says that "by faith one comes to understanding, and not conversely."[353]

352. Aristotle, De caelo et mundo, I; Macrobius, In Somnium Scipionis; the "Platonists" on the Word; Hermes Trismegistus, Pimander: "Monas monadem genuit, et in se suum reflexit ardorem."

353. St. Augustine, In Iohannis Evangelium Tractatus, tract. 27, circa medium.

Reply to the third: The cognition of the divine persons was necessary to us in a twofold way. In one way, for holding rightly about the creation of things. For by this, that we say that God made all things by His Word, the error of those who posit that God produced things by a necessity of nature is excluded. By this, moreover, that we posit in Him a procession of love, it is shown that God did not produce creatures on account of any need, nor on account of any extrinsic cause, but on account of love of His own goodness. Whence also Moses, after he had said, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth," adds, "God said: Let there be light," for the manifestation of the divine Word. And afterwards he said, "God saw the light that it was good," to show the testimony of divine love. And similarly in other works. In another way, and more principally, for holding rightly about the salvation of the human race, which is accomplished through the incarnate Son and through the gift of the Holy Spirit.

Conclusion: It is impossible, by natural reason, to come to a cognition of three persons in one essence.

Concerning this article nothing occurs that needs to be noted for its explication; nevertheless its doctrine must be examined in the customary disputations.

Disputatio CXXXII - Whether some Gentile philosophers had knowledge of this mystery

- Many philosophers knew the mystery of the Trinity. Caput I.
- Whence philosophers had a shadowed knowledge of the Trinity. Caput II.

Caput I - Many philosophers knew the mystery of the Trinity

St. Thomas, in this article in the solution to the first argument, in order to defend that by natural reason the Trinity cannot be shown, affirms that to no Gentile philosopher was this mystery made known. But if faith is to be given to the writings of the Fathers, we cannot deny that some philosophers attained to some knowledge of this mystery, as Augustine of Eugubio copiously proves in the books On the Perennial Philosophy; for thus testify Clement of Alexandria, book 5 of the Stromata, concerning Plato; Justin the Martyr, in the Oration to the Gentiles; and Cyril, books 1 and 2, against Julian, concerning Orpheus and others; and Augustine in the places to be alleged below.[354]

Let us therefore set forth the testimonies of some philosophers, so that what we have said may be more clearly illustrated. Augustine of Eugubio, book 1 of On the Perennial Philosophy, from the first chapter to the end, cites many things which speak of God the Father and the Son; and in the second book not a few which speak of the whole Trinity, of which we shall report some. Plato, in a letter to King Dionysius, who had inquired of him about the nature of God, speaks thus: "About nature we must speak by enigmas, lest if perhaps the letter should be lost, he who reads it not understand; thus then the matter stands: Around the King are all things, and for His sake all things exist, and He is the cause of all goods; next are those about the second, and the third about the third." The sense of which words Porphyry explained (as Cyril bears witness) in these words: "To proceed to three subsistences, or hypostases, or persons; that is, to have the divine substance with three descents, or to step down into the triple number: namely, to be the supreme and most high God Himself the Good through Himself; after Him, the second, the Maker; then the soul of the world: because anima in Latin is the same as ventus in Greek, anemos; for the soul is, as it were, a certain spirit." Mercurius also, called Trismegistus, that is, thrice greatest, because he treated of the Trinity (as Suidas says), in sermon 3 speaks thus of the Holy Spirit: "Unless there were a certain providence of the Lord of all, that I should reveal this theology, you would not now have had such love as to speak of it; now hear the rest. Of this Spirit, of whom I have often spoken, all things have need; He begets all things; He vivifies all according to their rank and nourishes; and He depends on the holy source; to all who breathe and live He is ever a helper." These are the words of Mercurius, and many others, which Eugubinus more copiously and in detail treats in book 1, chapter 3; and he seems to allude to that in Genesis 1: "And the Spirit of the Lord was borne over the waters." He adduces other things there also from Plotinus; and in chapter 4 he reports others from that letter of Plato cited above; and finally, in chapter 6, from the philosopher Damascius, who reports that the Egyptians called the first principle "darkness," which the people cried out thrice, that is, to signify the deity which surpasses every cognition, to subsist in three; in accordance with that of Psalm 17: "He made darkness His hiding-place."[355]

354. Augustine of Eugubio (Agostino Steuco), De perenni philosophia, lib. 1 (from cap. 1 to the end) and lib. 2; Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, lib. 5; Justin Martyr, Oratio ad Graecos; St. Cyril, Contra Iulianum, lib. 1 - 2.

But, passing over many other things, I am pleased to add two other testimonies, one of the same Mercurius, another of the Delphic oracle of Apollo. That of Mercurius, indeed, is not contained in those books of his which now circulate; nevertheless it must not on that account be judged spurious: for many things from Mercurius are reported by Lactantius, Augustine, and Cyril which are not found in his books. Suidas therefore recites the following testimony from Mercurius: "There was an intellectual light; before the intellectual light there was always before the world one living being, from whom are all things, and in whom are all things; from whom and through whom and in whom are all things; this is the Father; and gods and all things are under Him and in Him. The Word is not perfect unless it be either the second, and work; by Him the second things of nature and the sacred were fully made of water." And hence he seems to have said that the divine Word made some second thing, which from volatile water and watery matter produced living creatures; or certainly to have written what is written in Genesis 1. He subjoins: "Mercurius: Unite for yourself the heaven of God; the great work of the Spirit is to unite the whole together; together with the bearer, that is, the first, the venerable heaven of Babylon, rolling round through evening winds, the Father, who contains all things, to be near to us," and the rest, which Eugubinus more at length pursues, book 2, chapter 17.[356]

355. Plato, Epistola ad Dionysium Regem; Porphyry as cited by St. Cyril; Suidas (Suda) on Trismegistus.
356. Suidas, s.v. "Trismegistus," reporting a testimony from Mercurius (Hermes Trismegistus).

Another testimony is that which Apollo Delphicus produced, when he was asked by a priest about true religion; and Eugubinus relates it, book 1, chapter 12, saying thus of the inquiry: "Do not gaze upon me, seeking the highest things; I myself, a priest, desire to know and to hear about the divine kinds; and in reply it was said: three, one, ... state ...," and many other things, which, because of brevity, I pass over; besides these, Eugubinus draws certain things, though not altogether perfect, about a knowledge of the Trinity, as having been possessed by the ancients.[357]

Accordingly, that philosophers of the Gentiles had some knowledge of this mystery is not to be taken as though some revelation had been made to them immediately; but because either from Sacred Scripture, or from the Hebrew people, or from Egypt, or from the tradition of parents, they were taught in part; all which things pertain to a special revelation of God. For if the Egyptians knew something of this mystery, they learned it from the Hebrew people, as Augustine of Eugubio posits, book 1 of On the Perennial Philosophy, chapter 1; and Cyril testifies in the first book against Julian, that at the very first Solon of Athens, and Thales the Milesian, and other philosophers of Greece, set out for Egypt for the sake of studying. Augustine also writes, in book 8 of On Christian Doctrine, chapter 8, that Plato learned theology in Egypt from Jeremiah. But this, truly, he himself elsewhere corrects: for in the City of God, book 18, chapter 23, he says that by no reason could Plato have been taught by Jeremiah, since Plato was born seventy years after Jeremiah. What, then, is to be held? That, as regards Trismegistus and the like, if they were instructed by Moses in Egypt, this is not to be understood as though they had heard him in person, but that by the remainder of learning which was handed down they had received it; as Eusebius also says, book 10 of the Preparation for the Gospel, chapter 3, and Theodoret in the Remedies for the Diseases of the Greeks, greatly favoring the same; and many other more ancient Greeks, affectionate toward the Hebrews, agree with the Catholic writers.[358]

Caput II - Whence philosophers had a shadowed knowledge of the Trinity

It is a conceded fact that the ancient philosophers, by the mere ratiocination of natural intelligence, could not have attained even the least knowledge of this mystery. For it is above the capacity of a created intellect; it is of that order of things which our Scholastics call supernatural: not because God's unity is more above nature than His Trinity - for both alike, although they surpass created nature, or rather, although they are most of all of the nature of God - ...[359]

Another testimony is found in Suidas; therefore he recites such a witness from Mercurius (Hermes Trismegistus): There was an intellectual light before the intellectual light; and there was always the mind of mind, luminous; and it was nothing other than the unity of goods, and a Spirit containing all things; outside of him there is neither God, nor Angel, nor any other substance; the Lord of all, and Father, and God, and all things are under him and in him. For his Word, existing perfect, the second, and the craftsman, made the unfruitful nature fruitful, and made water a fruitful progenitrix. He seems, moreover, to have said that the divine Word made the water fruitful because, from the water, he produced winged and aquatic living things, as Scripture relates in Genesis. Hermes subjoins: I adjure you, O heaven - O great God, wise work; I adjure the utterance of the Father, which he first brought forth, when he established the whole world; I adjure you by the Only-begotten Word, the Father who contains all things; be propitious to me, and so forth - which Augustine of Eugubio pursues at greater length.[360]

357. The Delphic oracle of Apollo, as reported by Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 1, cap. 12.

358. Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 1, cap. 1; St. Cyril, Contra Iulianum; St. Augustine, De doctrina Christiana, lib. 2 (or lib. 8 in older enumeration), cap. 8; idem, De civitate Dei, lib. 18, cap. 23; Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica, lib. 10, cap. 3; Theodoret, Graecarum affectionum curatio.

359. The discussion continues beyond this point in the following text.

A second testimony is that which Apollo at Delphi produced when asked by a priest about the true religion; Augustine of Eugubio reports it in that same book, chapter 19. He says, therefore: "Do not deem the supreme to be Nemesis - wretched man - O priest, but know of the holy and divine Begetter, and the beloved Offspring, who rule great matters; and of the station which contains the whole compacted world - mountains, the earth, rivers, the sea, Tartarus, and fire, and the air" - and he adds many other things, which, for the sake of brevity, I pass over. From these Augustine of Eugubio draws the conclusion that the ancient philosophers had some, albeit not altogether perfect, knowledge of the Trinity.[361]

Whence the philosophers had a shadowed knowledge of the Trinity.

For it is above the reach of a created intellect, in that order of things which our Scholastics call supernatural; not because it is more above nature that God is one than that he is triune - for both surpass any created nature - but because to the very nature of God the mystery of the Trinity is, by full right, called above nature, whereas unity and many other divine attributes are not so called: for these can be known by ratiocination from the things themselves created; but the mystery of the Trinity not only cannot be fully known, but cannot even be so much as smelled at, except by a revelation of God made to some creature. I would say this, because habitual grace and the other created gifts, which by the same account are called supernatural (as we shall say in our Disputation 14), are so called for a different reason. Moreover, when it is said that the gentile philosophers learned this mystery by a revelation of God, this is not to be taken as though some revelation had been made to them immediately; but because either from Sacred Scripture, or from the Hebrew people, or the Egyptian, or by tradition from their ancestors, preserved from the very beginning by the promulgation itself, they were taught: all which pertain to a peculiar revelation of God. For if the Egyptians knew anything of this mystery, they learned it from the Hebrew people, as Augustine of Eugubio most rightly noted in the first book of De perenni philosophia, chapter 1; and indeed St. Cyril testifies that Samnius, and Thales of Miletus, and Solon the philosophers from Greece, set out into Egypt for the sake of learning. St. Augustine furthermore writes, in De doctrina Christiana, chapter 28, that Plato in Egypt learned theology from Jeremiah; but, as he himself later notes, in City of God 18, chapter 37, by no means could Plato have been taught by Jeremiah, because Plato was born seventy years after Jeremiah. And as to what he subjoins, that Trismegistus was taught by Moses in Egypt, this is not so to be understood as though he had really heard from him; for Moses, 360. Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 2, cap. 17.

361. The Delphic oracle of Apollo, as reported by Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 1, cap. 19.

as Eusebius testifies in Preparation for the Gospel, book 10, chapters 1 - 3, and Theodoret in The Cure of the Greek Affections, was much more ancient than the gentile Greek philosophers; therefore they learned from Moses, that is, from Sacred Scripture which Moses himself wrote.[362]

There were more testimonies of the Sibyls, by whom this mystery is most clearly delivered, which Lactantius mentions in Divine Institutions, book 1, chapter 6, and book 4, chapters 6 and 7; and St. Augustine, City of God 18, chapter 23; and Julius Sirenus gathered them into one in his little work On Providence toward the end, and Augustine of Eugubio in the first book of De perenni philosophia, chapter 25; therefore I pass them over. But it is clear from the cited authors that those Sibyls preached this mystery not by tradition, nor by writing, nor by communication with the Hebrew people, but by the very impulse of the Holy Spirit; and thus their case is different from that of the philosophers whom we have thus far enumerated, and of others who have spoken of this same matter.[363]

The reason, moreover, why we assert that the philosophers attained the knowledge of this mystery only by that route is this: because no revelation was made to them immediately, as to the Sibyls; then, because neither by natural reason, as we shall say in the following disputation, nor by any demonstration can it be shown in this life; it was therefore necessary to receive that doctrine from others, either by word or by writing. Add that, even if there were some natural reason for this mystery, it would not straightaway follow that the philosophers, by their own strength, without error, discovered it: for, as was noted in Disputation 2, chapter 2, the revelation of faith is necessary not only that supernatural mysteries may be known, but also that many natural truths may be known without error.

Disputatio CXXXIII - Whether in this mortal life the Trinity can be evidently demonstrated without a special revelation of God

- It is shown that it cannot be demonstrated that there are more persons in God, against Raymund Lull. Caput I.
- It is proved against the same that it cannot be demonstrated that there are three persons in God. Caput II.
- It is shown that it cannot be evidently established that in God there are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, against Raymund Lull. Caput III.
- What is to be thought of the doctrine of this author. Caput IV.

362. Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 1, cap. 1; St. Cyril, Contra Iulianum; St. Augustine, De doctrina Christiana, lib. 2 (or lib. 8 in older enumeration), cap. 8; idem, De civitate Dei, lib. 18, cap. 37; Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica, lib. 10, cap. 1 - 3; Theodoret, Graecarum affectionum curatio.

363. Lactantius, Divinae institutiones, lib. 1, cap. 6; lib. 4, cap. 6 - 7; St. Augustine, De civitate Dei, lib. 18, cap. 23; Julius Sirenus, Opusculum de providentia (toward the end); Augustine of Eugubio, De perenni philosophia, lib. 1, cap. 25.

Caput I - That it cannot be demonstrated that there are more persons in God, against Raymund Lull

Before the supernatural revelation, there is no Catholic who maintains that by natural demonstration - that is, deduced from principles of nature alone, and discovered by the natural power of the intellect - the Trinity of persons in one essence (essentia) can be proved; nor did Raymund Lull ever assert this, as some have falsely ascribed to him. Rather, wherever he says that an evident demonstration of the Trinity can be found, he speaks on the supposition of a light from God, or some supernatural illumination divinely infused into us. But when he teaches that the demonstrations which he thinks he has discovered of this mystery are so evident that they can convince a gentile and a Mohammedan, provided he once consent to penetrate them, he does not explain whether, for someone to assent to them, some supernatural light is necessary, or whether the force of the reasons alone suffices - just as the authority of human testimony can also suffice to generate assent.

This opinion is favored by Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 8, question 14, where he teaches that a man can be so illuminated with the light of faith in this life that, after long exercise, he may find necessary and evident reasons of the Trinity. Richard of St. Victor also assents, in On the Trinity, chapter 4, whom the Angelic Doctor in this article, in reply to the second, benignly interprets in another sense. But most clearly with Henry agrees Gerson, Alphabetum 13, letter H; and all these agree with Lull in this, that by the mere acuteness of the natural intellect such a demonstration or evidence cannot be found.[364]

Therefore, Raymund thinks he can prove three things of this mystery, and he attempts to demonstrate them; we will mention them one by one, so that they may be more easily refuted by us in separate chapters.

- First, that there are more persons (personae) in God.
- Second, that there are neither more nor fewer than three.
- Third, that these three persons are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

He strives to demonstrate these in the book which he called Apostrophe, and in the book On the Demonstration of Equiparance, and in the beginning of his Sentences, where he disputes whether theology is a science, and elsewhere often; yet he notes that the demonstrations of this mystery are not a priori, nor a posteriori, but of equiparance. Moreover, he calls demonstrations of equiparance such because they are neither per causam (since the Trinity has no cause), nor from effect (since no effect can point it out), but from equalities; nonetheless he asserts that these demonstrations are deduced from prior propositions - not because those are prior to the conclusions (since there is no prior cause there), but because those have no other priors.[365]

---

364. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 8, q. 14; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, cap. 4; St. Thomas, in this article, ad 2; Gerson, Alphabetum theologicum, no. 13, letter H.

365. Raymund Lull, Apostrophe; De demonstratione aequiparantiae; in Sententiarum initio, quaestio "An theologia sit scientia".

With these things posited, he seems to himself to demonstrate the first in this way. Wherever there is concord, there is also plurality. He leaves this proposition as known. But in the divine goodness there is concord: therefore in the divine goodness there is plurality. The same argument, he says, can be made in any attribute. He proves the minor thus: wherever there is act (actus), there is the concord of the agent and the acted-upon in the very act; but in the divine goodness there is an act, which he calls to do good (bonificare); therefore there is there the concord, as he says, of the good-making and the good-makeable, in the act of good-making.

To the same end tends another reason of this sort: Wherever there is equality, there is a distinction between the equal things themselves; but in the divine goodness there is equality between the good-making and the good-makeable: therefore there is there plurality. He likewise leaves the major as known; but he proves the minor in the same way in which he proved the minor of the former demonstration.

But these reasons are not only not to be reckoned demonstrations; rather, that they are of no moment at all will immediately appear.

First, indeed, they are not demonstrations, because they suppose that which is evident in no way, nor is believed otherwise than by divine faith - namely, that in God there is an act according to the thing, which is a production. For although by natural reason it can be proved that God understands and wills, and thus that in God there is operation and act; yet by no reasoning, surely, can it be evidently shown that there is an act of the intellect and of the will which is truly a production. And unless faith taught this, we would say that the act of understanding and of willing is in God his own substance, not an operation, and that it is conceived by us only under the mode of operation and act.

Then his reason, to prove that in God there is an act of production from the fact that there is the good-making, the to-do-good, and the good-makeable, is trifling. For this act is not the one which faith teaches to be the production of a person and a notional operation; but it is a certain act, not of an efficient and producing cause - still, in our manner of understanding - but under the mode of formal cause; as we are wont to say, whiteness makes white. Therefore, in this way it is not deduced probably - much less evidently - that in God there is a real concord, in the act of good-making, between the good-making and the good-makeable; but only according to our manner of understanding, by which we distinguish these.

Caput II - That it cannot be demonstrated that there are three persons in God, against the same

Whether, however, the plurality of persons is a Trinity, Raymund thought he had demonstrated in this fashion. That essence is judged to be in the highest degree of action, in which a single action, a single passion, and a single act suffices; that is, that essence is most perfect in acting, in which there is found only one agent or producer, one produced, and one act. He sets by way of example the good-making, the good-makeable, and the to-do-good (for by these names his School speaks). But the divine essence is in the highest degree of action, that is, it is most perfect in producing: therefore in it those three alone ought to be.

He proves the major of this demonstration thus: if in the same essence there were many actions, one would limit another - which would be a great imperfection, and therefore such a nature would not be in the highest degree of action. Then, keeping the same proportion, he confirms the conclusion by another means: That essence is in the highest degree of distinction, in which there is one distinguisher, begetter, or producer; one also distinguishable, begettable, and producible; and one distinguishing by spirating and loving. But the divine goodness is in the highest degree of distinction: therefore in the divine goodness those three suffice. And a little below he subjoins these words: We intend to say that there is one distinguisher and begetter with respect to the Son, and this is the Father; one distinguishable, begettable, and producible with respect to the Father, and this is the Son; and one distinguishing by spirating and loving, and this is the Holy Spirit.

I for my part am exceedingly amazed how easily this author could persuade himself that these are perspicuous and evident demonstrations of this mystery; since they are not only frivolous, but also certain things seem to follow from them that are contrary to our faith - absurdities. And first indeed, since these reasons suppose that which Raymund thought he had demonstrated in the preceding, and since that had not been sufficiently proved -

Caput III - Raymond's further discourse; and what judgment is to be made concerning his doctrine

Secondly, as we saw in the preceding chapter, they will have no force at all, much less an evident one. Secondly, it is not clear how the author proves the major of these demonstrations, namely, that the essence (essentia) is in the eminence of action, in which there is only one producer, one produced, and one act.

Thirdly, from these reasonings there seem to follow absurdities against the mystery. First indeed, that the Father is the distinguisher of the Son, as Raymond himself admits: whereas the distinctives of the persons are their properties, and each is distinguished from another by some property inhering in it, not by another person. Whence also it follows that there is not only one "distinguishable" and one "distinctive": but since there are three persons mutually distinct, there are also three "distinguishables" and three "distinctives," namely, properties; although Raymond asserts there is but one distinctive and one distinguishable. And if it is called "distinguishable" because it is produced by another, then the Holy Spirit too must be called "distinguishable," since He also is produced; and the Son must also be called "distinctive," since He also produces. By the same reasoning it follows that it is absurd when he says that the Holy Spirit is the very "distinguishing" of the Father and the Son, by "to breathe" and "to love": for between the Father and the Son there cannot be an act of distinction, which is "to distinguish," except by "to beget" and "to be begotten," by reason of which the opposition between Father and Son arises; and hence the distinction "by breathing," however, and "by loving," can distinguish only the Father and the Son on the one side and the Holy Spirit on the other. Finally, in the same person there would be a certain trinity, namely a "distinctive," which is a property; a "distinguishable," which is the person itself; and "to distinguish," which is the distinction itself: for all these ought to be in any person that is distinguished from another.

Secondly, it follows, on Raymond's view, that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Father and the Son as from a producing principle. For in his view the Holy Spirit is "to benefit" (bonificare), the Father is "benefiting" (bonificativum), the Son is "benefitable" (bonificabile). But since "to benefit" is an act, it is not from the "benefitable," which is as it were an effect produced; rather, the "benefitable" is from the "benefiting" through "to benefit." I do indeed see the Lullists assert that the act which is "to benefit," which they say is the Holy Spirit, is not the very act that is the mean between producer and produced, which we call production, but that it is from both, namely from the "benefiting" and the "benefitable," as from a principle: however, I do not see how they can explain this. For "to benefit" by its nature is prior, and as it were the way to the "benefitable" or "benefited": or if this is not so, and that "to benefit" which Raymond assigns is not the act that is the mean between producer and produced, but another that flows from both; he cannot prove that there must be such an act as he posits in all things, even created ones, in which he himself wants there to be those three correlatives, "benefiting," "benefitable," and "to benefit," which indeed he calls "intrinsic correlatives."

Thirdly, finally, from Lullian doctrine it follows that there are more than three persons. For it is of faith that there are two acts of production, namely to beget and to breathe: therefore in God there is "begetting," "begotten," and "to beget," and thus there will be three persons; then "breathing," "breathable," and "to breathe," and thus there will be three more. But if "begetting" and "breathing" are the same person, because these active acts are the same, it follows that at least five remain. Much better therefore did St. Thomas from the number of the two emanations (emanationes) in God gather three persons: because the emanations themselves are not formally persons, nor are they distinguished from the persons; but they are origins intermediate between the persons after the manner of a certain way. This reasoning of Raymond is also not evident, because it supposes that there are emanations in God in reality, which is believed by faith alone.

It is shown, against Raymond, that it cannot be evidently proved that in God there are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

But this argument has little strength. For besides that it rests upon the preceding points, whose weakness has been sufficiently proved, it also fails in proving the minor of the first syllogism. Granted that in God there is production, and that the production is most perfect and in the eminence of action and passion, it does not follow that it must be between the Father and the Son; even if it is from the whole substance of the producer - since among humans there is found the begetting of a son where the generation is not from the whole, but from a part of the substance: whence, then, can Raymond gather that a production "from the whole substance," which is only in divine things, is the generation of the Son? especially since the production of the Holy Spirit also is from the whole substance, and He is not Son. The other demonstration does not prove that the third person (persona) is the Holy Spirit: for just as "to benefit" would not be in the eminence of action without "to love," so too it would not be without "to be wise" and "to understand": therefore it is no more gathered that the third person ought to be a produced Love than a Wisdom. What is proved, then, is only that the third person is Love, because He is through the will (voluntas). Finally, in order to prove that "to love," without which "to benefit" cannot be in the eminence of action, is a produced person, he must presuppose that there is production in God - a thing that can in no way be evidently proved, as was said in the first chapter.

What judgment should be made concerning this author's doctrine.

Many think that the doctrine of this author is for the most part heretical, and that he himself, rashly deluded by a demon, devised these reasonings and handed them on to the people as though revealed by God, and taught many other errors besides. Thus persuaded themselves Bernard of Luxembourg in his book against heresies under the letter R, and Gabriel Prateolus in his Catalogue of Heresies under the word "Raymundus Lullus," and Peter Galisardus in his table: because they saw that five hundred errors, excerpted from the books of Raymond Lull, had been noted by the authority of Pope Gregory XI, with Aymericus the inquisitor acting; of which a hundred Peter, Bishop of Tarragona, published in the latter part of the Directorium Inquisitorum. For this reason some also think that this author's works were prohibited by Gregory XI, and that this was confirmed by Pius IV in the Index of Prohibited Books under the second rule; because in that rule the Pontiff forbids whatever books had been forbidden by his predecessors. Of the same doctrine of Raymond Lull Gerson writes thus, Alphabetum 16, letter D: "So it was done lately at Paris by the Faculty of Sacred Theology against those who were trying to introduce a certain foreign doctrine of Raymond Lull; which, although in many points is most lofty and most true, yet in others disagrees with the manner of speaking of the sacred Doctors, and with the rules of their doctrinal tradition, and with the usage in the Schools; it has by public edict been rejected and prohibited." And in Alphabetum 19, letter K, he says that in his time a book was published against the doctrine of Raymond Lull.[366]

Furthermore, a great controversy on this matter was stirred up before the most illustrious Cardinal inquisitors in the year 1590, under the pontificate of Sixtus V, when I was still at Rome, by many who were coming from the kingdom of Catalonia, contending that the bull of Gregory XI, by which Raymond's errors are condemned - set down by Nicholas Aymericus in his Directorium Inquisitorum - had been fabricated by that same Aymericus. For they produced a sentence against Aymericus pronounced by the most reverend lord Bernard, Bishop of Castello, commissary deputed by apostolic authority against Aymericus; the authentic transcript of which I later had in Spain from Juan Herrera, architect to King Philip II and a man distinguished in the mathematical sciences: in which Aymericus is condemned for having forged that bull; and that bull is declared to be suspected of falsity. For Raymond's kinsmen, before Germanus, Cardinal of St. Eusebius and legate of the Apostolic See in the kingdom of Aragon, petitioned that the aforesaid bull, as false and made by Aymericus, be declared null. The Legate, moreover, committed the same to the aforesaid Bishop; indeed he wrote and ordered the Apostolic registrars that at Avignon, where the Pontiff then resided, they should search in the register of that Pontiff for that same bull: and when it could not be found, the aforesaid registrars severally attested to this. With these things known, Bernard gave the sentence that we mentioned. All these things are found in a certain printed booklet on this matter, in which many articles also are excused that are attributed to Raymond or condemned from his doctrine. In our own time too, under Pope Gregory XIII, this bull was sought both at Rome and at Avignon carefully, and could never be found. In defense also of that same Raymond many other writings from the same kingdom were brought forward; among the rest there was a handwritten booklet which responded in order to the individual errors noted by Aymericus, showing that some are found in none of his books at all, and that others had been excerpted from his doctrine ill understood.

366. Gerson, Alphabetum theologicum, no. 16, letter D; and no. 19, letter K.

Some also alleged, in order to defend Raymond's books, that among the private acts of the Council of Trent there is held a tractate on this matter, in which Doctor Villeta of Barcelona defended him, lest he be placed in the Index of prohibited books. Now at last Ludovicus de Paramo, Apostolic Inquisitor against heretical depravity in the kingdom of Sicily, and an outstanding Doctor of the sacred canons, in the second tome of his works, in the question on the burning of books under the title "On the doctrine of Raymond Lull," has diligently heaped up many other things, among which he not obscurely shows that the works of Raymond Lull are not prohibited, and that the aforesaid Aymericus was condemned of falsity and surreption by his own superior inquisitor Bernard, as is evident from the process lately presented at Madrid in the Senate of the kingdom of Aragon. He also produces various approvals of Raymond's doctrine, and among them some of the Faculty of Theology of Paris; all which things, consulting brevity, I pass over. The case, however, is still sub judice.

For my part, some propositions of this doctor have seemed too harsh, and I judge these demonstrations of the Trinity to have no strength. For the author often assumes propositions which, though to him they are certain, yet to me seem to have not even the appearance of probability: and when he does at times assume propositions which we believe by Catholic faith, or which according to faith it is necessary to concede, he does not render them evident or better known. His disciples, indeed, always object to us that their principles do not penetrate our breast; and they say this is the reason why the demonstrations do not seem valid to us. But it is very much to be wondered at that they have never been able by the solid force of reasons to render them clear to us, and to reduce them to first principles which, with a fixed term and an explication, would at once seize minds: which is to me a sign that the demonstrations, in themselves, are not there; but to those who are adepts of this Lullian doctrine they so much please that they seem to themselves to see them.

Moreover, what this author says of the end of this mystery - that once the demonstration is had, he thinks there remains in us no further place regarding the judgment of the mystery - I also esteem to be of twofold danger: for thus all merit of faith in this life regarding the chief mysteries of our faith is taken away. He himself replies that we were not created for our merit, but for the praising of God; which praise we nonetheless obtain, even if the merit of faith be taken away. He further adds that this merit still remains, because faith remains in the soul's preparation. I, however, would ask this author: if a demonstration of these mysteries can be had, whether he himself has attained it rather than Paul - Paul who everywhere professes that he walks by faith, not by sight: why then does Lull...[367]

Lull, who thought that he was walking by faith, could more easily himself reply that with this kind of demonstrations the assent of faith does not clash with faith; because although they would generate some sort of evidence, it would be so slight, and through species alien to the object, that together with it the assent of faith could remain, as will be proved in 2-2, q. 1, the articles. For not every evidence clashes with the assent of faith, as Scotus falsely thought in 3, d. 24, q. 1, § Contra hanc, proving against Henry that faith does not remain in one who has attained an evident reason of this mystery; but Henry and Gerson, in the places cited, acknowledge much better that with that evidence of reasons faith can remain.[368][369]

How, however, this can be done, Gerson does not explain; Henry for his part defends it thus: because he thinks those two assents, namely the evident one and that of faith, are not contrary; for the assent of demonstration concerns the question, Whether it is; but the assent of faith concerns the question, What it is. For, an evidence of the Trinity being had, just as we now have of the unity of God, since that does not attain to the very "what it is" of God, an obscurity remains about that; and hence faith about it also can remain...

But this author is in error; because faith regarding the mysteries can only be about the question, Whether it is. For faith is "to think with assent," as St. Augustine says in the first book On the Predestination of the Saints, chapter two; but the assent about mysteries on the way is only about the question, Whether it is, not about the very "what it is," of which we have as yet no knowledge. For the names of God show us on the way that He is, not what He is, as we noted in disputation 17, chapter 3.[370][371] Moreover, that Raymond had the Spirit of God in many things is indicated by his writings on the Philosophy of love, on the friend and the beloved, and on lofty contemplations, and many other things: yet it could be that in some things, not from the Spirit of God but from his own head, he brought forth certain matters which, although Catholic and true, were nevertheless proposed and explained by him more harshly than was fitting.

Disputatio CXXXIV - Whether by divine revelation a quidditative knowledge of this mystery can be communicated to a wayfarer

Status quaestionis. cap. 1.

- What Scotus and the Nominales think. cap. 2.
- The true opinion of Durandus and Capreolus. cap. 3.

367. 2 Cor. 5:7 ("we walk by faith, not by sight").
368. Scotus, In III Sent., d. 24, q. 1, § Contra hanc.
369. Gerson, in the places cited above.
370. St. Augustine, De praedestinatione sanctorum, l. 1, c. 2.
371. See above, disputation 17, c. 3.

Caput I - Status quaestionis.

The present controversy is not, whether there can be communicated to man a quidditative (quiditativa) and proper (propria) knowledge of God; but whether, to one remaining in the state of a wayfarer, this can be communicated. By "wayfarer" we mean not merely a man in mortal flesh, but one not yet seeing God with the clear and intuitive knowledge which constitutes a rational creature blessed. Therefore the difficulty is whether some intermediate vision can be communicated to a created intellect which is neither so clear and intuitive as to beatify the soul, nor through alien species as is that which we have deduced from creatures, but is indeed quidditative and proper to Him, yet does not reach to the character of intuitive, which for that reason we may call abstractive (abstractiva).

For a certain knowledge is called abstractive, even if it be proper and quidditative; another, intuitive, as Gabriel explains in the first question of the Prologue, article two, notation 2: abstractive indeed is that which abstracts the thing from its existence and esse, as when someone knows a rose not existing by its proper species and concept. For since this cognition is not terminated at a thing existing, but at it according to itself, it is called by the Schoolmen abstractive knowledge. But that which is not only proper to the thing, but is borne to it as existing, is called intuitive. In another way Scotus defines each in II, distinction 3, question 9, which begins, "Secundo quare": to the question, therefore, he says abstractive knowledge is that which is borne, not only to a thing abstracted from existence, but also from presence; hence although the intellect by its proper concept understand a thing even as existing, if nevertheless it is not borne to it as present, it is not said to behold it. Thus an astronomer who knows evidently an eclipse in another hemisphere is said to have only abstractive knowledge; but one who not only knows the thing as existing, but also as present, is said to have intuitive knowledge of it.[372][373]

Yet, however much this controversy of terms may seem to be about a word, the opinion of Gabriel commends itself more to me, namely, that intuitive knowledge be called that which is borne to a thing together with its existence in its proper difference of time; and thus knowledge of future things, when it is had through a proper species, is to be called intuitive, because it is borne by a proper concept to the thing together with its proper existence according to its temporal difference. For this intuitive cognition requires, that it be borne to things existing, as they themselves are or will be; not in any other way.

Let this suffice to have said now, that we may understand the opinions of the Doctors; for in chapter 3, as we explain our own, we shall submit the proper differences of intuitive and abstractive knowledge.

372. Gabriel, In I Sent., Prologus, q. 1, a. 2, not. 2.
373. Scotus, In II Sent., d. 3, q. 9, beginning "Secundo quare".

Caput II - What Scotus and the Nominales hold.

Scotus, in the place cited and in IV, distinction 49, question 11, holds this opinion, namely, that not only can a peculiar illumination of light be granted by God to a human wayfarer so that he may have an evident and proper abstractive knowledge of the Trinity which does not reach to the intuitive, but even that an Angel by the power of a proper species infused by God could have had it, which in a certain manner he calls supernatural and in a certain manner natural: natural indeed because it is for eliciting an act of the natural order; supernatural, however, because it is freely infused by God, and not necessarily, nor derived from the object naturally. He so explains in that question in Ad rationes pro prima opinione ad quartum argumentum, and in Ad quaestionem. To this agrees Maior in II, d. 3, q. 5, conclusion 5, and q. 3, prologue, article 2. The same is affirmed by Bassolis, question 1 of the prologue, article 2; by Peter of Ailly in the first, prologue, article 2; by Ockham in question 1 of the prologue, article ...; and Gabriel in the question of the prologue, article 3, conclusions 2, 3, and 4. But these last four only assert that this sort of knowledge, which they call able to be communicated, is only supernatural. Gabriel further adds that of contingent theological truths, as the mystery of the Incarnation, there cannot be given in this life that evident knowledge; but well enough of those truths which are necessary, as the mystery of the Trinity and the things which follow upon it.[374][375][376][377][378]

The first foundation, namely that such abstractive knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity can be given, is proved: because abstractive knowledge is prior by its own nature than intuitive; but what is prior can exist without the posterior. Next, God can preserve whatever intuitive knowledge in the absence of the object: therefore He can bring it about that what was intuitive becomes abstractive, as is gathered from the definition of each. That this knowledge can be natural by a natural species, in the way which we said, Scotus does not prove, but only asserts; nor do I see by what reason it can be proved.

The other, which Gabriel adds, he himself thus proves; because abstractive knowledge of necessary theological truths does not presuppose intuitive knowledge of God Himself, but only knowledge of creatures: but this man can have; therefore also abstractive knowledge of God Himself can be communicated to him. But abstractive knowledge of contingent theological truths presupposes intuitive knowledge of God Himself: therefore without this the abstractive cannot be communicated. Those things, however, which Gabriel assumes in these two reasons, he further confirms by no argument.

Before, however, we show a priori that an abstractive knowledge of God, which is not in the same way intuitive as is the vision of the blessed, cannot be granted to anyone, let us meanwhile briefly refute the aforesaid opinion.

---

374. Scotus, In IV Sent., d. 49, q. 11; see also Ad rationes pro prima opinione ad quartum argumentum, and Ad quaestionem.

375. Maior, In II Sent., d. 3, q. 5, concl. 5; and q. 3, Prologus, a. 2.

376. Bassolis, Quaest. I Prologi, a. 2.

377. Peter of Ailly, In I Sent., Prologus, a. 2; Ockham, Quaest. 1 Prologi, a....

378. Gabriel, Quaestio Prologi, a. 3, concl. 2, 3, 4.

And first indeed this displeases me in Scotus's doctrine, that he asserts such knowledge can be elicited by the natural power of the intellect: for since that in truth is not distinguished from the clear vision of God, by which men are beatified, and this cannot be elicited except by a supernatural light and help, it follows that neither can that be elicited by natural power, nor can a natural species be given for eliciting it. Nor does it matter that Scotus calls that species supernatural: for he so calls it, not because in itself it is of a supernatural order, but because it is altogether voluntarily infused by God, and is not able to be acquired by another way. But if by its own nature it were supernatural, as is the light of glory, it would be plain that the intellect could not naturally have that knowledge, just as it does not have the vision: for these two are mutually repugnant, namely that the species be of a supernatural order by its own nature, and that the intellect need it for abstractive knowledge, and that the said knowledge can be had naturally.

Then against Gabriel it is proved that there cannot be given a proper knowledge of God which is abstractive, that is, of God Himself as abstracted from existence. For even if intuitive must not only be proper and of a thing existing, but also of one present, as Scotus wished, nevertheless that knowledge would be intuitive: because God is no less necessarily present to all things and to the created intellect, than He exists in the nature of things: therefore if the intellect had a proper knowledge of Him, it would be borne to Him as existing and present, and it would be said most properly to behold Him. And this argument has force also against Scotus.

Secondly, if God could be absent in place, nevertheless that intellection and knowledge would be intuitive and our beatitude: for it would be of God existing according to His proper ratio, which sufficiently seems to make it be called intuitive knowledge, or at least to make those having it blessed. For that the very object whose contemplation makes us blessed be absent in place, or be future in time, or be present, does not vary anything in the vision itself: therefore it matters little, absence or presence, in order that a proper cognition of God be, or not be, our beatitude; just as if the astronomer's beatitude were proper to the sight of an eclipse, even if the eclipse were being made in another hemisphere, if he by its proper species were to know it quidditatively.

Caput III - The true opinion of Durandus and Capreolus.

To me the opinion of Durandus in q. 3, prologue, and of Capreolus in I, d. 3, q. 4, art. 3, in the response to the fourth, against the sixth conclusion, has always seemed more probable, namely that a quidditative and proper knowledge of the Trinity cannot be communicated to wayfarers, but that either the knowledge of this mystery must be through alien species, such as all of us have on the way, or clear, which they call intuitive, in which our beatitude is set. This is proved on these grounds.

First, if someone had a proper and quidditative knowledge of God, nothing would be lacking to him for being said to behold God: for, in the first place, every intuitive knowledge is proper and quidditative of God Himself, not through alien species and after the fashion of other things. But if it also be intuitive, as Gabriel said, it adds over and above these that it be of a thing existing, as we noted in the first chapter; that knowledge of the Trinity will bring it about to behold, not only one

God as existing; because no less of the essence of God is it to exist than to be wise; and no one can by a proper concept understand God unless he also understand Him as wise. Therefore if anyone by a proper and quidditative concept understood God, nothing would be lacking for him to behold; he already has at the outset an intuitive knowledge which is proper and quidditative of God Himself, not through alien species and as of other things. If moreover it be intuitive, as Gabriel said, it adds above these that it be of a thing existing, as we have noted above in the first chapter; that knowledge of the Trinity will bring it about to behold, not only God as existing. Wherefore I would not hesitate to call that [knowledge] intuitive; and even if it be proper and quidditative of the thing, let the disagreement be rather about the intention of words than about things.

Secondly, if God could be absent in place, nevertheless that intellection and knowledge would be intuitive and our beatitude: for it would be of God existing, according to His proper ratio; which sufficiently seems to make it be called intuitive knowledge, or at least to make those having it blessed. For that the very object, by the contemplation of which we are blessed, be absent in place, or future in time, or present, does not vary anything in the vision itself: therefore it matters little, absence or presence, for a proper cognition of God to be, or not to be, our beatitude; just as if the astronomer's beatitude were proper to the sight of the eclipse, even if the eclipse were in another hemisphere, provided he by its proper species were to know it quidditatively.

Thirdly, if someone could have a proper and quidditative knowledge of the Trinity abstracted from existence, nevertheless that vision would be sufficient to make him blessed. For although our beatitude consists in knowing the Trinity as existing, still, if one were to contemplate It quidditatively, that is, Its very essence and the essential perfections which are inseparable from It, he would possess that very object in the contemplation of which the blessed repose. Just as, if beatitude consisted in the contemplation of some created thing, one would no less have it if the contemplation were quidditative - though it abstracted the object from existence - than if it did not abstract: in any way, then, and by any account, it is plain that such quidditative cognition is not a mean between the intuitive which beatifies and that which we have through alien species; wherefore I would not hesitate to call it intuitive, and let there be rather a disagreement about the intention of words than about things.

That [knowledge] which is the proper likeness of the thing itself, as it is, openly shows what it is. But that there can be given through alien species an evident knowledge of the Trinity, in the way in which philosophers have [knowledge] of God himself as he is one, is defended by Henry in Quodlibet 8, question 14, as we saw in disputation 133, and in Quodlibet 12, question ...; Gerson, in Alphabetum 15, letter H, when he says that faith can remain together with an evidence of the Trinity in this life, such as exists in those who are much given to contemplation; Raymond thinks the same, as we reported in that disputation. Added to these are Durandus in III, distinction 23, question 9, number 12; Cajetan on Secunda Secundae, question 171, article 5; Alphonsus of Toledo in Prima quaestio prologi, article 2, conclusion 3; Bassolis cited in the preceding disputation; and Nicholas of Cusa in the Dialogue De pace fidei, c. 8, and book 2 of the Cribratio Alkorani, c. 5.[379]

The arguments of the prior opinion fade away at the outset. The first, in fact, supposes that that quidditative knowledge is prior to the intuitive, by which we are made blessed; whereas it is truly not prior. For since it is not distinguished from it, it cannot be prior; and that it is not distinguished from the intuitive [knowledge] was sufficiently proved in the preceding chapter. Wherefore, to no purpose do our adversaries devise, in their second reason, that God could have preserved in Paul and Moses an abstract knowledge, the intuitive being destroyed, if they had it on the way. Moreover, although some knowledge could be preserved which would not represent God as present, nor as existing, but as abstracted from existence; nevertheless, if that were quidditative and proper, it rightly follows that they would remain blessed, as was said above. The remaining things which Gabriel teaches he proves by no reason, and they have been sufficiently impugned by us in chapter 2.

Primum argumentum. This opinion is variously proved. First, Durandus argues thus. A revelation of this mystery was made to the angels, in order that they might have evidence of God revealing; for it was certain and evident to them that their intellect could not be enlightened by any other than God, so as to know this, or other mysteries: from this, however, they could gather evident knowledge of this mystery in this way: Whatever God reveals is true; God reveals this mystery to us; therefore this mystery is true. The syllogism is evident; each of the premises is evident to an angel; therefore so too the conclusion; and hence the angel will have an evident knowledge of this mystery, as is gathered in the conclusion. To this also pertains the argument of Bassolis concerning the damned, who, as James 2 says, "believe and tremble"; those who feel themselves to have been justly condemned by God because they did not believe the mystery of the Trinity, are evidently convicted that it is true.

Secundum. Others prove it thus: God can grant to some man for a short time his clear vision, and then leave him under the enigma of faith, as some thought about Paul and Moses above in disputations 55 and 56; but the memory of that clear vision would remain in him: therefore it would be evident to him that at some time he saw God three and one. But from the memory of that which we once evidently knew we can gather evidently that it is true: therefore from the memory of the vision of the Trinity we can gather that that mystery is true.

Tertium. Third, it is proved because intuitive knowledge of creatures can be given; but in any creature whatsoever there is a certain relation to God one and three, because although in our mode of understanding it is per se primarily terminated at God as one, nevertheless in reality it is terminated at God as three and one: for there are three who create, and they are entirely the same as the essence which is the principle of creating. And perhaps Nicholas of Cusa, in the places cited, thought this to be the vestige of the Trinity in creatures, from which he said an evident knowledge of the Trinity can be deduced. Of the Doctors alleged, Henry and Gerson with Raymond Lull in another way think that this evident knowledge can be acquired on the way, namely by the exercise of faith and assiduous contemplation, by which Raymond judged that he had found evident reasons.

379. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 8, q. 14 (and see also Quodlibet 12); Gerson, Alphabetum 15, lit. H; Raymond Lull; Durandus, In III Sent., d. 23, q. 9, n. 12; Cajetan, on Secunda Secundae, q. 171, a. 5; Alphonsus of Toledo, Prima quaestio prologi, a. 2, concl. 3; Bassolis (as cited above); Nicholas of Cusa, De pace fidei, c. 8; Cribratio Alkorani, l. 2, c. 5.

Quarto. Fourth and finally, an evidence of the Trinity can be gathered from many supernatural effects, as from a vision of God, or an intelligible species, from the hypostatic union at least with the three persons: for by their nature all these things regard the Trinity of persons, and no other way seems to remain.

That such an evident knowledge of the Trinity cannot be granted to a wayfarer, the truer opinion holds

Much truer is the opinion of St. Thomas in the present article, who universally affirms that such an evident knowledge of the Trinity cannot be communicated to a wayfarer: which can be urged by this sole a priori reason. Either that knowledge of the Trinity would be through its proper species, and thus it would be intuitive; or through alien species of creatures, and thus God can only be known as one; for there is no creature which is referred to God as three: but all regard him as one, on the ground that they are produced by him as one, and are terminated to him under this alone ratio. For God does not produce them by that by which he is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but by that by which he is one, wise, omnipotent, etc. Therefore in our mode of knowing, through alien species - if from created effects God ought to be known - so far as they are created, he would only be known as one, wise, omnipotent, etc.

If, however, for knowing the creature by an intuitive and proper cognition, with that expressed order to God, it were also necessary to know God himself by a proper and intuitive concept, it would indeed follow that from this knowledge of creatures the mystery of the Trinity would be known also by intuitive vision: that is, that the creature cannot be known by a proper concept unless God also be known in himself in the same way; and then indeed he would be seen as three, because in reality the essence is the same as the persons; not because that order, in our mode of understanding, would regard God as three. Wherefore, if from that order we know God through alien species, we can attain to nothing other than his essence, and what is common to all the persons.

But some say that the Trinity can indeed be evidently known, as to the question, "Does it exist?," by a created species, through which the Trinity itself is evidently known, not the creature first known, nor the Trinity in the likeness of some creature. This, however, is impossible: for either that species will represent God in the likeness of some created thing, and thus it will not be able evidently to show him as three and one; or it will represent him proximately as three, and thus it will be a proper quidditative and intuitive species of God himself.

Moreover, this opinion will be more easily confirmed by the confutation of the reasons of the former [opinion] in the following chapter.

From testimony or from memory an evident knowledge of the Trinity cannot be gathered

If this evident knowledge of the Trinity could in any way be granted, it ought to be by one of the modes cited in the first chapter: but from those [modes] we shall now easily show that an evident knowledge of the Trinity cannot be gathered; and from this the adversaries' arguments will remain answered. In this chapter we shall speak about the first and second; in the next chapter about the other two. Accordingly, concerning testimony and memory I prove thus.

These two are extrinsic principles; therefore from them it cannot be evidently shown to our intellect the connection of predicate with subject in itself: for this is the intrinsic evidence of the thing, which cannot be had through extrinsic principles. For the explanation of which note that there is a twofold kind of demonstration, and by either kind there is produced an evidence of the thing according to itself and intrinsic: one is through the proper cause; the other through effects; and to this is also reduced a demonstration per impossibile, since from the opposite some contradiction follows, not from something extrinsic, but from those things themselves which by nature of the thing have a connection. There is not, moreover, any other kind of demonstration by which, being taken as general, there is collected from a universal in this way: If things are equal to one and the same third, they are equal among themselves; these are equal to one and the same third; therefore they are equal among themselves. This is a valid consequence; nevertheless it is not a demonstration: because in the conclusion nothing new is gathered which was not already expressed in the major. And in the same way he shows nothing who from this says: since "man is an animal," he thereby says that this and that man is an animal: thus by such [inferences] no new evidence is joined. It remains therefore that the demonstration be wholly by one of the modes aforesaid. But it cannot be by extrinsic principles. Now testimonies and memory - since they are entirely extrinsic - although they suffice for [other uses], nevertheless cannot generate in the things remembered an evidence of them in themselves.

For although by a good consequence and syllogism there can be deduced, from this proposition "God is triune," on the ground of an antecedent which is evident - namely, "Whatever God says is true" - the truth of the consequent, still it does not follow that the consequent is evident; a good consequence indeed makes it necessary that the consequent be true because the antecedent is true; it does not make it necessary that the consequent be evident, unless it have a connection from the nature of the thing itself. Hence that reasoning is of this sort: If God says that he is triune, he is triune; but he says that he is triune; therefore he is triune. In these, because the major proposition is a certain extrinsic principle, having no connection with the conclusion by nature of the thing, the conclusion follows only in so far as it is contained under that universal, "Whatever is said by God is so, whether it be this or that." Therefore this is usually called "evidence on the attesting authority," as Cajetan called it at 2.2, question 5, article 1.[380] For to say that God says something is so, and therefore it is so, is tantamount to asserting that it is so because the one who says it is God; and by the testimony of the one speaking and the revelation there is indeed conviction, but the connection of the extremes with each other is not thereby shown.

380. Cajetan, on Secunda Secundae, q. 5, a. 1.

And thus also is confirmed the reason by which some concede that one could be convinced by testimony: which is as much as to say that God is triune because of divine testimony and revelation. The Apostle teaches this; and St. Thomas, at 2-2, question 5, article 2, says that the intellect can be convinced when a prophet pronounces in the word of the Lord something future, by an accompanying sign, so that he may know manifestly that it is the Lord who speaks. But all this pertains to conviction by testimony, not to an intrinsic evidence of the connection of predicate with subject.

Finally, the same is confirmed by the example of memory. If someone, for instance, had once had mathematical demonstrations that were certain, when afterward he only remembers them, the demonstration of those truths is not preserved in his memory; he is indeed certain that the proposition is true, and he collects what he once understood; nevertheless the relation of predicate to subject is not now made evident from intrinsic principles, but from an extrinsic principle of remembering that earlier evidence; it shows only that the thing is so, not why it is so by its own nature.

...Therefore testimony and the memory of it, which are altogether extrinsic to the things testified (and remembered), cannot generate evidence of them in themselves. For although by a good consequence and a syllogism this proposition - God is triune - could be deduced from a preceding evident premise, nevertheless, because that premise is altogether extrinsic, it does not engender in the conclusion an evident assent. For in a good consequence, although it is necessary that the consequent be true whenever the antecedent is true, yet it is not necessary that the consequent be evident in itself whenever the antecedent is evident, unless it cohere by a connection arising from the nature of the thing; for when the antecedent is extrinsic, it does not manifest the consequent evidently according to its proper ratio and the connection of the extremes in themselves, but only according to a common extrinsic ratio by which the thing agrees with the principle: as in these syllogisms - God is whatever He says Himself to be; but He says He is triune; therefore God is triune. Or again: If God says that He is triune, He is triune; but He says that He is triune; therefore He is triune. In these, the major proposition is a certain extrinsic principle, having no connection with the conclusion from the nature of the thing; the conclusion follows only inasmuch as it is contained under that universal - Whatever is said by God, is thus. Hence this is commonly called evidence from attestation, as Cajetan also calls it.[381] To say, namely, "God is whatever He says Himself to be," is tantamount to asserting that the thing is so, or that God is thus, on the testimony of the speaker and on revelation; but by this there is not shown the connection of the extremes among themselves according to their own proper ratio, but only according to a common ratio, according to which the thing ought to agree with the testimony - a meaning which is the same as saying: God is three and one, because this agrees with the testimony and revelation of

381. Cajetan, on Secunda Secundae, q. 5, a. 1.

God. And therefore St. Thomas, in the Secunda Secundae, in the second article, says that an intellect can be convinced by the speech of a prophet proclaiming in the Lord's name that something is future, and adding a sign so that he may know manifestly (as if he were to say evidently): "This is said by God," because He (the prophet) does not lie - even if that future which is predicted is not in itself evident. Whence, he says, the assent of faith about that thing remains; he understands, insofar as it is also deduced from that evident principle of the one speaking and testifying. For every assent which rests upon testimony is faith, not evident knowledge of the thing testified. For if it were evident to me that God says that something is future and that He cannot lie, it would not on that account at once follow that that future, in itself, would become evident according to its own proper ratio and nature.

This is further confirmed by the example drawn from memory, from which the second argument was taken. If some mathematician, for instance, should clearly remember that he once had a demonstration of some proposition, yet could not call the demonstration to mind, he would indeed know that the proposition is true, and would collect that the thing he states is so in reality; but in this way the predicate would not yet be evidently known to agree with the subject according to its proper ratio. For memory is an extrinsic principle, showing only that the thing is so in general, not, however, how it agrees with that by a peculiar and proper ratio, which happens either a posteriori or a priori through intrinsic principles.

These two are extrinsic principles; therefore from them our intellect cannot have the evident connection of predicate with subject in itself; for this is intrinsic to the thing, and cannot be had through extrinsic principles. For the explanation of which, it must be observed that there is a twofold kind of demonstration, and by either of them we obtain evidence of the thing according to itself, through intrinsic principles: one is through the proper cause, the other is through effects; to these is reduced the demonstration per impossibile, when from the opposite there follows a contradiction - not in something extrinsic, but in those things which have a connection from the nature of the thing.

That from effects the evident knowledge of the Trinity cannot be had

It remains for us to prove that from no effect, whether natural or supernatural, can there be deduced evident knowledge of the Trinity; and thus we shall dissolve the two subsequent arguments which our adversaries had adduced on their behalf. As to natural effects, we have already said in the second chapter that their relation to God can only show us God as one. Next, concerning supernatural effects, it must be said in the same way that from them the mystery of the Trinity cannot be evidently known. Now there are three supernatural effects which have some difficulty: the first is the clear vision of God; the second is the impressed species of Him; the third is the hypostatic union with the three persons, in the opinion of those who say that one nature can be united to three persons at once, or at least, in the opinion of all who affirm that from three human natures each can be united to single persons.

Concerning the first and second effect I say that from them the mystery of the Trinity, which pertains to the question "Whether it is," cannot be evidently shown, even if the Creator could be known from the creature by a proper knowledge which they call intuitive, without the terminus being known by the same kind of knowledge. For the relation of intuitive knowledge to the object seen cannot be known unless the object itself be known by a proper and intuitive concept. For no one could discern whether this knowledge is intuitive and proper of such an object, unless he himself should see by a proper and intuitive notion the very object, with which he could compare the intuitive knowledge that another has of the same object. Add that, even if someone should see by an intuitive cognition the intuitive knowledge which the Blessed have of the triune God, without the Trinity itself being seen, and should from that gather the Trinity; nevertheless, because such a middle would be extrinsic to the thing, like testimony, therefore it would not generate evidence of the thing itself in itself, as we said in the third chapter concerning evidence from testimony. And what we have said about the intuitive knowledge of God must also be said about the impressed species of the Trinity.

But concerning the third effect, namely of the union, some think that from it the mystery of the Trinity, pertaining to the question "Whether it is," cannot but be evidently shown to us, even if those three unions were seen by a proper and intuitive knowledge: for the reason that those unions could not be seen as distinct and dissimilar, but as if they were of the same ratio. I, however, do not understand this: for if in reality they are truly distinct and dissimilar, as indeed they are, why, even when seen by a proper and intuitive knowledge, would they not appear distinct and dissimilar? Therefore I answer that those three unions, as referred to diverse persons, can be seen as dissimilar and distinct by a proper concept; nevertheless, because from the intuitive knowledge of a relation there does not follow the intuitive knowledge of the terminus - else either angels would not see by an intuitive knowledge the creature, or they would also intuit God as one - therefore from that intuitive knowledge of such unions it is not necessary to know individually the three persons; but it is only necessary to know that such a nature is united in that manner to some divine person; whether, however, a diverse union refer to a diverse person, or diverse unions to the same person, it is not necessary to be known by him who beholds the unions themselves. Add also that, even if from a threefold union three distinct persons were known, it could not be known whether there were more divine persons to whom the same humanity could be united; and thus this mystery could not be evidently known, which indeed consists in this: that there are three persons in the same essence, neither more nor fewer.

Articulus II - Whether notions are to be posited in the divine

Objicitur: It seems that notions are not to be posited in the divine. For Pseudo-Dionysius says in the first chapter of On the Divine Names, that we must not dare to say anything of God beyond what is expressed to us in the sacred utterances.[382] But of notions there is no mention in the utterances of Sacred Scripture. Therefore notions are not to be posited in the divine.

382. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, c. 1.

Further: Whatever is posited in God pertains either to the unity of essence (essentia), or to the Trinity of persons. But notions do not pertain to the unity of essence, nor to the Trinity of persons. For things essential are not predicated of notions: we do not say that paternity is wise or creates; nor even the things which belong to the person: we do not say that paternity generates and that filiation is generated. Therefore notions are not to be posited in the divine.

Further: In simple things there are not to be posited any abstracts which are principles of knowing, because they are known by themselves; but the divine persons are most simple. Therefore in the divine persons notions are not to be posited.

But on the contrary: John Damascene says that the distinction of hypostases consists in three properties, namely, paternal, filial, and processional; we recognize these.[383] Therefore properties and notions are to be posited in the divine.

I answer that the Praepositivus, attending to the simplicity of the persons, said that properties and notions are not to be posited in the divine. And wherever such are found, he explains the abstract for the concrete. For as we are wont to say, "I beg your kindness," that is, "that you be kind," so when in the divine one says "paternity," "God the Father" is understood. But, as has been shown above, the divine simplicity is not prejudiced by our using in the divine both concrete and abstract names. For as we understand, so we name. Now our intellect cannot attain to the divine simplicity as it is to be considered in itself; and therefore, according to the mode by which it apprehends and names the divine, that is, according to what it finds in sensible things, from which it receives cognition. In which, for signifying simple forms, we use abstract names; but for signifying subsistent things, we use concrete names. Whence we also signify the divine, by reason of simplicity, with abstract names; by reason of subsistence and complement, however, with concrete names. And therefore it is necessary not only that essential names be signified in the abstract and in the concrete (as when we say Deity and God, or wisdom and wise), but also the personal ones, so that we say paternity and Father. And two things especially compel us to this. First indeed is the instigation of heretics. For since we confess the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit to be one God and three persons, when it is asked wherein they are one God, and wherein they are three, as it is answered that they are one in essence, or in deity: so it was necessary that there be some abstract names by which it could be answered that the persons are distinguished; and of this sort are the properties, or notions signifying in the abstract, such as paternity and filiation. And therefore essence is signified in the divine as the what, but person as the who, and property as the whereby. Second...

And so, since one person is found in the divine to be referred to two persons, namely, the person of the Father to the person of the Son and to the person of the Holy Spirit, yet not by one relation - for then it would follow that the Son and the Holy Spirit would be referred to the Father by one and the same relation; and thus, since in the divine only relation multiplies the Trinity, it would follow that the Son and the Holy Spirit would not be two persons - neither can it be said (as Praepositivus said) that just as God is related in one way to creatures, although creatures are related variously to him, so the Father is related by one relation to the Son and to the Holy Spirit, although those two are related by two relations to the Father. For, since the specific character of the relative consists in this, that it is referred to another, it is necessary to say that two relations are not different according to species, if on the opposite side one relation corresponds to them. For there must be one species of the relation of lord and of father according to the diversity of sonship and servitude. But all creatures are referred to God under one species of relation, namely, as they are his creatures. The Son, however, and the Holy Spirit are not referred to the Father according to relations of one and the same kind; wherefore it is not similar. And again, in God a real relation to the creature is not required, as was said above; but to multiply relations of reason in God is not incongruous. Yet in the Father there must be a real relation by which he is referred to the Son and to the Holy Spirit. Hence, according to the two relations of the Son and of the Holy Spirit by which they are referred to the Father, we must understand two relations in the Father, by which he is referred to the Son and to the Holy Spirit.

383. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, l. 3, near the beginning.

Reply to the first: Although mention is not made of notions (notiones) in Sacred Scripture, nevertheless mention is made of the persons, in whom the notions are understood, as the abstract is understood in the concrete.

Reply to the second: The notions are signified in the divine, not as things, but as certain relations, by which the persons are known, although the notions themselves, or relations, are really in God, as was said above. And therefore those things which have some ordination to some essential or personal act cannot be said of the notions; for this contradicts their mode of signifying. Hence we cannot say that paternity generates or creates, as we say wise or understanding. But the essential things which have no ordination to any act, but remove from God the conditions of creature, can be predicated of the notions: for we can say that paternity is eternal or immense, or anything of this sort. And likewise, on account of identity of reality, personal and essential substantives can be predicated of the notions: for we can say that paternity is God, and Deity is the Father.

Reply to the third: Although the persons are simple, nevertheless, without prejudice to simplicity, the proper ratios of the persons can be signified in the abstract, as has been said.

Notationes circa Articulum.

The conclusion of the article is affirmative. Concerning the text three things are to be observed.

First, what "notion" is. By the name notion the Scholastic Doctors, together with St. Thomas in this article, understand some ratio by which the person is known; St. Augustine, however, used "notion" in another way, in Book V On the Trinity, chapter 6, namely, for the very act of understanding by which we know something about the person. For he says: "One is the notion by which the begetter is understood, another by which the unbegotten is understood." From this, however, it is gathered that on the part of the thing known there is one ratio of the begetter, another of the begotten. Accordingly, for the known ratio Caietanus and the Canariensis in this article, St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 26, question 4, Durandus in question 2,

Marsilius in the First, question 29, article 1, Gabriel in the First, distinction 28, question 1, article 3, doubt 1, and others who dispute about the notions (and whom we shall cite below) have used "notion" in this sense.[384]

Second, note that in the divine there are properties, relations, and notions, and that they are ordered as superior and inferior. Property (proprietas) is inferior to the others: it is that by which properly a person is constituted - for example, paternity, filiation, and procession; for these agree with the individual persons so that they agree with them alone; and every property is a notion and a relation, not conversely. Next, notion is inferior in ratio to relation; for every relation can be a notion, but not every notion is a relation: for "unbegotten" is a notion, not a relation. Whether, moreover, some ratio is common to two persons or proper to one alone, it makes no difference for its being called a notion, provided it does not agree with all: for those things which are common are called essential, not notional. Wherefore what are common both according to reality and according to predication and universality are not notions, or, if they are distinct, they are not distinct from particulars; thus "to produce" and "to beget" are not two notions, because one ratio is common by predication, the other particular, which contains the common in itself.

Third, it is to be seen how St. Thomas proves that in the Father there is a twofold relation, because he is referred to a twofold terminus, and in each of them there is its own relation; for he is referred to the Son and to the Holy Spirit. The reason for doubting is that it seems possible for one relative to be referred by one relation to two termini, just as the same father by the same relation of paternity is referred to many sons. Caietanus and the Canariensis reply in this article that a relative can by one relation be referred to two relations, different even in species, not only distinct in number, when those relations are partial. They call "partial relations" those whose foundations, as parts, concur to produce one and the same numerically identical effect - such as are the foundations of paternity and maternity for begetting one and the same son. For this reason they judge that by one and the same species of filiation the son is referred to the mother and to the father. But because in the divine filiation and procession are total relations, it is evident that the Father is referred by a twofold relation, one to the Son, the other to the Holy Spirit. In this sense they interpret Aristotle in Metaphysics V, chapter 15, when he says that "the same cannot be referred twice," that is, that the same relation cannot be referred to two termini different in species, unless they are partial.

However, their opinion does not approve itself to me.

First, those doctors wrongly explain Aristotle's words in that chapter; for there Aristotle strives only to show that a relative cannot be referred to a terminus which is itself relative, but to an absolute - at least in those cases in which the other extreme is referred only by an extrinsic denomination, as "visible." Accordingly Aristotle proves there that sight is not referred to the visible. Whether, however, the same must be said of other kinds of relatives, we shall consider in passing in Disputation 160, chapter 6; you have an exposition of that passage of Aristotle above in Disputation 104, chapter 2.

384. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 6; Thomas de Vio (Cajetan), In Iam, q. 32, a. 2; the Canariensis (Peter of Aragon), ad loc.; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 2; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 29, a. 1; Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, a. 3, dub. 1.

Second, although the relation of filiation is the same according to reality with respect to father and mother, nevertheless it does not seem to be of the same kind, as St. Thomas plainly taught in the Third Part, question 35, article 5, reply to the last; not so, at least, as in an effect produced by many causes of the same kind and order, as in the motion of a ship which many pull: for these concur in the same way to the same effect; but father and mother in a far different way: whence a third reason is taken. For although mother and father so concur that one without the other cannot beget - in which they are likened to causes which the philosophers call "partial" - yet because they concur in a different way, they are also regarded in a different way by the son produced: just as God, the sun, and a man generate a man, and yet the man begotten regards one differently than another. Rightly, therefore, did St. Thomas prove that in the Father there are two relations according to reason, although they are the same according to reality, because he in a different way produces the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Caput I - Distinction of the concrete and abstract in the divine

Since we must deal with the notions, that is, with the properties and modes by which the persons are known, and since these are principally signified in the abstract, first it must be seen how in God abstracts and concretes are distinguished, as father and paternity, spirator and spiration. Aureolus, as reported by Cajetan in this article, in the First Book, distinction 26, and Cajetan himself here, taught that in God any abstract notion signified abstractly is distinguished by a distinction from the nature of the thing from its concrete. They prove this by the following reason: wherever abstracts and concretes differ only by mode of conceiving and naming, whatever is predicated really of the one is also said of the other; but the same is not said really of paternity and of Father, because the Father is not said to differ "totally" as paternity does qua relation; for in the Father there is essence and relation, and the essence is common and they do not differ by reason alone; but in paternity and relation there is nothing common to each. Therefore Father and paternity differ by a distinction from the nature of the thing. Of other concretes he teaches nothing, as of God and deity, of wisdom and wise, etc.

This opinion remains sufficiently refuted in Disputation 120; for by the same reasoning by which we proved against Scotus that relation and essence in God are not distinguished by a distinction from the nature of the thing, it is also proved that the concrete and the abstract not only in the notions, but even in the other divine predicates, do not differ in that way. Therefore this proof must now be completed.

But against Aureolus note that by his own reason it would also be proved that God and Deity differ by a distinction from the nature of the thing, and likewise the other concretes and abstracts in God: because something real is said of the one which is not said of the other. Here, however, one thing must be observed: in every concrete and abstract, in order that they be distinguished for us either by our reason or by a diverse mode of signifying, it must be that by the name of the one something is signified directly and expressly or is consequently connoted, which is not signified or does not stand in the other, as we proved above in Disputation 121, chapter 2. For if in our concept nothing responds to the one name which does not respond to the other, those ratios will undoubtedly be synonymous, unless they differ as definition and defined, as what is expressed and what is implicit - which here does not obtain, as we showed there. But the concrete and abstract in God cannot be synonymous, because of the one some things are predicated which cannot be said of the other, although they can be said of it; and what is connoted by the concrete name of the nature, as "God," that is not connoted nor signified by the abstract, as "Deity," namely, the supposit (suppositum), as we shall universally prove of all natural concretes in Disputations 136 and 157. The concrete of a person, moreover, as "father," connotes the nature which it has in itself contracted and determined by a property; but by the abstract name "paternity" that is not connoted: by that name the property itself alone is signified, by which the nature can be determined. The same must be said of all personal concretes and abstracts.

Caput II - That in God names and concepts abstract and concrete must be handled otherwise than in other things, against Praepositivus and Gregory

An ancient Scholastic, Praepositivus, as St. Thomas reports in this article, asserted that in the divine the abstracts and concretes are used for the same thing: for he said that paternity is altogether the same as father, lest, if there were any distinction, something be detracted from the divine simplicity. Gregory seems to have followed this opinion in the First Book, distinction 26, questions 1 and 2, where he teaches that in God there are properties...

Gregory taught that there are personal properties intransitive, not transitive, that is, properties which are themselves the persons, but not properties which are of the persons; yet besides these he concedes transitive properties of the persons, which however are signified by a complex expression and remain only in words and in the intellect, nor do they pass over into the thing conceived. On this ground he says that the property of the Father is "to have begotten the Son," which, he says, must not be signified by one simple name, but by a complex and by several words; and therefore it exists only in the intellect, because a complex of words arises only in the intellect. He adds, moreover, that it is not necessary to answer heretics by abstract names, but either by that complex, or even by concretes: as (he says) St. Jerome and St. Augustine have taught us. For to those asking in what respect the Father and the Son are one, we answer, they are one in substance; but in what respect they are several, we say, in persons. Gabriel agrees with Gregory, In I Sentences, distinction 18, question 1, article 3, first doubt, who teaches that the notions consist in name alone, and that in the thing conceived nothing of them is assigned: and he is led to this opinion, lest he seem to assert five things in God, just as we also say there are five notions.[385][386]

385. Gregory, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 1 - 2.
386. Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1, a. 3, dub. 1.

Yet the holy Doctor admirably refutes the opinion of these men in this article, and with him the Scholastics whom we cited in the notes on the article agree. For although at times we can satisfy heretics asking about this mystery by concrete names, nevertheless sometimes it is necessary to use abstracts and implicits. For if a Greek should ask, wherein the Son differs from the Holy Spirit, we answer, in spiration; to which question we could not conveniently respond by the concrete name spirator. And although we could satisfy by that complex signifying the property, as if we were to say, the Son differs from the Holy Spirit because He spirates Him; nevertheless, because the persons do not so much differ by origins as by relations, and because a heretic can press us to say that by which He differs, we are compelled to use abstract words: which, for my part, I do not know on what ground Gregory and Praepositivus refused to concede; since St. John Damascene in book 1 On the Faith, chapter 11, to show wherein the persons differ and wherein they agree, uses abstract names in these words: "We know one God; but only in the properties, namely of paternity, filiation, and procession, do we observe a distinction," which a little above he had also signified by complex words; he used the same names in the same book, chapter 9.[387] St. Hilary also in books four and nine On the Trinity frequently uses the abstract name "innascibility," to which he opposes "nativity"; to which add St. Basil, book one Against Eunomius, and book four, chapter two. St. Gregory Nazianzen too, Oration 39, which is on the holy lights, after the words, "The Father is Father," uses the name "filiation," and after some things adds: "Let it be permitted, for the sake of clarity, to coin new names."[388][389][390] With all these agrees St. Augustine, book five On the Trinity, chapter 6, as we saw in the exposition of the article, who concedes notions in the same way in the divine: for although by "notion" he himself understands a mode of knowing a person and of distinguishing her from some other, from this very kind of notion is gathered also the notion which the Scholastics posit in God, which is a ratio known of some person; and from the different mode of cognition by which the persons are known are gathered different rationes known in the persons, by which they are understood to be mutually distinct. In the same way St. Basil in Epistle 43 openly asserts notions; for, treating of the distinction of one supposit from another, he says: "Who he was is designated by those proper notions"; and by the name of notions he understands not the cognitions which we have about a person, but the various properties of that person. And a little below, he speaks thus about the distinction of the divine persons: "A thing surpassing reason or all comprehension, or whatever else of that sort, we will not employ for the determination of a property; but this alone will we inquire, by what the understanding of each person may be clearly and without confusion separated from the common consideration." And in book two Against Eunomius, not far from the end, he calls these notions "proper forms of the persons, notes, and characters." St. Gregory of Nyssa likewise in the little book On the Difference of ousia and hypostasis often repeats that in God there are personal properties by which the persons are distinguished, nor do they in any way communicate.[391][392][393] And although these Fathers do not use

387. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 11.
388. St. Hilary, De Trinitate IV; IX.
389. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium I; IV, c. 2.
390. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 39, In sancta lumina.
391. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 6.
392. St. Basil, Epist. 43.

abstracts, since nevertheless St. John Damascene uses them, Gregory without cause disapproved their use. Rightly therefore Alexander, part one, question 63, member 3, and St. Thomas in this very article, said: the essence is signified as "what"; the person, as "who"; but property, notion, and relation, as "whereby," because a ratio is signified by which something is such.[394]

But when we say that notions are in God and are to be conceded in the abstract, we do not assert that they remain in name alone; rather a peculiar concept corresponds to them, as the proper signification of those very words. Wherefore abstract names of the notions must be used otherwise than their concretes: because the signification of these and of those is different, as we saw in the preceding chapter; although sometimes a notion is also signified in the concrete, as "unbegotten"; yet from this it does not follow, as Gabriel thought, that five things are to be conceded in God. For when we say five notions, we say not five things which are said to be really distinct, but five concepts diverse by the intellect's operation alone: just as when we say there are many attributes; for these names signify something of reason, as is manifest.

How this distinction of abstract and concrete does not conflict with the divine simplicity is plainly gathered from the doctrine of disputation 121, chapter 3, where we said that a distinction of reason derogates nothing from the divine simplicity, because it is necessary that God, according to our mode of understanding, be conceived in diverse ways: from this, however, no multiplicity and duplicity follows in the thing itself.

Caput III - What are to be predicated of the notions

Now then, since it has been proved that notions signified in the abstract are to be used for explaining the properties of the persons, it remains to see what can be predicated of them. The Canariensis, in the commentary on this article, part 4, says that there are some predicates signifying action, and some not signifying action, but some attribute or property of God: and of those which signify action, some signify essential action, as to understand, to will, to create, to govern, etc.; others notional action, as to spirate, to beget.[395]

With these premised, he lays down two rules:

The former is, No names signifying action, whether essential or notional, are predicated of the notions; therefore this proposition is false, "Paternity understands," or "begets." He gives the reason, that operations belong not to forms, but to concretes and supposits: but notions signified abstractly are forms, or are signified as forms: therefore operation cannot be attributed to them.

The latter rule is, All names which do not signify action can be predicated of notions signified abstractly: wherefore these propositions are true, "Paternity is father," "Paternity is eternal," or "eternity."

Both rules seem true to me; but the reason of the former is not proved: because there are some voices signifying action which are predicated of attributes in the abstract. We say indeed, "the intellect understands," "wisdom savors and governs," "the will loves," etc. If therefore these voices are predicated of abstracts, why also cannot voices signifying notional actions, or other actions, be predicated of notions signified abstractly? Wherefore a better reason is that which Cajetan assigns in this article, and the same the Canariensis follows: namely, that voices signifying actions can be predicated of abstracts whenever the abstracts are the formal principles of those actions; but not otherwise: and thus it is rightly said, "the intellect understands," but not, "the intellect wills"; "mercy has mercy," but not, "mercy punishes": for to the very formal principles of operations operations are also attributed in their own way even to abstracts, as to the principles by which they are done or elicited: and this alone those propositions signify to us. Furthermore, in what way that common axiom is to be understood, "Actions belong to supposits, not to natures," we shall say in the Third Part, question 2, article 11. Therefore, since the notions are not the formal principles of operations, whether essential or even notional, nor are they signified as supposits, it follows that voices signifying actions cannot be predicated of them: wherefore, although we rightly say, "the generative power generates," and "the spirative power spirates," nevertheless we cannot say, "paternity generates," or, "spiration spirates." For, as we shall say below in disputation 164, chapter 3, the generative or spirative power signifies more than relation.

393. St. Gregory of Nyssa, De differentia ousiae et hypostasis.

But concerning each rule it must be observed that there is a difference between propositions in which the predicates signify actions, and those in which they signify some form only: the former must always be understood in the formal sense, and cannot be used in the identical sense, as we said also in disputation 119, chapter 3; so that we can never say, "the intellect loves," and the like. The latter, however, can be taken, and often are taken, in the sense which the same author calls identical. Wherefore we conclude concerning them, whether the abstract be predicated of the abstract, or the abstract of the concrete, or conversely. And this St. Thomas signifies in this article in the reply to the second, when he says that those things which have an ordination to some essential or personal act cannot be predicated of the notions; because their mode of signifying repugns: as if he had said, that in the formal sense, in which these propositions are always taken, the forms of actions cannot be predicated of the notions. He adds that the "essences," however, which have no ordination to any act, can be predicated. For we can say that paternity is eternal. Then he adds that, by identity of the thing, it can also be said, "Paternity is God," and "God is Father"; because these propositions can be taken in the identical and not the formal sense. But what must be said if they be taken in the formal sense, is gathered from the things said in that disputation 119, chapter 2. The Canariensis adds that this proposition is false, "God is wise," because the predicate denotes action: which, if it be so, his doctrine is true. But because it can signify the attribute of wisdom, therefore in the identical sense it can be predicated of it; for the concretes of the attributes, as also of the essence, are not formally predicated of the abstract notions: yet in another way it is true to predicate of it, "Paternity is eternal"; for since eternity is an attribute consequent upon the being of the thing, and paternity is, and thus has duration, it is rightly said, even in the formal sense, to be eternal. As for abstracts and concretes, again in disputation 139 it must be discussed.

394. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 63, membr. 3; and cf. St. Thomas, in this article.
395. Canariensis (Peter of Aragon), ad hunc art., pars 4; cf. Cajetan, ad hunc art.

Articulus III - Whether there are only five notions in the divine

Concerning the third, the procedure is as follows. It seems that there are not five notions. For the motions of the persons are not in the relations by which they are distinguished. But the relations in the divine are only four, as was said above. Therefore there are only four notions.

Further: Because in the divine there is one essence, God is said to be one; but because there are three persons, God is said to be triune. If therefore in the divine there are five notions, He will be said to be "quinus" (fivefold). Which is unfitting.

Further: If, the three persons existing in the divine, there are five notions, it is necessary that in some person there be some two or more notions; as in the person of the Father are posited innascibility, and paternity, and common spiration. Either therefore those three notions distinguish things, or they do not. If they distinguish things, it follows that the person of the Father is composed of several things. But if they distinguish only rationes, it follows that one of them can be predicated of another, so that we might say that, just as the divine goodness is His wisdom because of real indistinction, so common spiration is paternity. Which is not conceded. Therefore there are not five notions.

But on the contrary: It seems that there are more. For just as the Father is from no one, and in this respect the notion which is called innascibility is taken; so, from the Holy Spirit there is not another person. And in this respect it will be necessary to take six notions. Further: Just as it is common to the Father and the Son that the Holy Spirit proceeds from them, so it is common to the Son and the Holy Spirit that He proceeds from the Father. Therefore, just as one notion is posited as common to the Father and the Son, so one notion ought to be posited as common to the Son and the Holy Spirit.

I answer that, notion is said to be that which is the proper ratio of knowing...

The latter, however, can be taken, and are often taken, in the sense which they call "identical." Wherefore we concede them, whether an abstract is predicated of an abstract, or an abstract of a concrete, or the reverse. And this is what St. Thomas indicated in this article, in the reply to the second, when he says that those things which have an ordination to some essential act or personal act cannot be predicated of the notions; because this is repugnant to their mode of signifying: as if he were saying that, in the formal sense in which these propositions are always taken, names of actions cannot be predicated of the notions. St. Thomas adds: "Essential [names], however, which do not have an ordination to some act, can be predicated. For we can say that paternity is eternal." He adds thereafter that, because of identity of the thing, it can also be said, "Paternity is God," and, "Deity is Father," because these propositions can be taken in the identical, and not the formal, sense. But what is to be said in the sense "of saying" (de dicto), if they are taken in the formal sense, is gathered from what was said in that Disputation 119, chapter 2. Canariensis adds that this proposition is false, "Deity is wise," because the predicate denotes an action: which if it were so, his doctrine would be true. But because it can signify the attribute of wisdom, therefore in the identical sense it can be predicated of that [subject]: for concretes of the attributes, as also of the essence, are not predicated formally of abstract notions; yet there is another reason with regard to this one, "Paternity is eternal"; for since eternity is an attribute consequent upon the existence (esse) of the thing, and paternity is, and therefore has duration, rightly it is said even in the formal sense to be eternal. But about abstracts and concretes we must speak again in Disputation 139.

Truly, there are only five notions in the divine

The third [article] proceeds thus. It seems that there are not five notions. For properly the notions of the persons are the relations by which they are distinguished. But relations in the divine are only four, as was said above. Therefore the notions are only four.

1. Besides. Because in the divine there is one essence, God is said to be one: but because there are three persons, God is said to be triune. If, therefore, in the divine there are five notions, he will be said to be quine. Which is unfitting.
2. Besides. If, when there are three persons in the divine, there are five notions, it must be that in some one of the persons there are two or more notions, as in the person of the Father are posited innascibility, and paternity, and common spiration. Either, therefore, those three notions differ in reality, or not. If they differ in reality, it follows that the person of the Father is composed of many things. But if they differ only in notion, it follows that one of them can be predicated of another; so that we might say that just as the divine goodness is its wisdom because of indifference of the thing, so common spiration is paternity. Which is not conceded. Therefore there are not five notions.

But on the contrary: It seems that there are more. For just as the Father is from no one, and according to this is taken the notion which is called innascibility; so from the Holy Spirit there is no other person. And according to this one will have to take six notions. Besides. Just as it is common to the Father and the Son that the Holy Spirit proceeds from them, so it is common to the Son and the Holy Spirit that they proceed from the Father. Therefore just as one notion is posited as common to the Father and the Son, so one notion ought to be posited as common to the Son and the Holy Spirit.

I answer that, notion is said to be that which is the proper ratio of knowing the divine person. But the divine persons are multiplied according to origin. Now to origin belongs [both] "from whom is another," and "who is from another"; and according to these two modes a person can be made known. Therefore the person of the Father cannot be made known by this, that he is from another, but by this, that he is from no one. And thus on this side his notion is innascibility. But inasmuch as someone is from him, he is made known in a twofold way. For inasmuch as the Son is [from him], he is made known by the notion of paternity: but inasmuch as the Holy Spirit is [from him], he is made known by the notion of common spiration. The Son, however, can be made known by this, that he is from another by being born, and thus he is made known by filiation. And by this, that there is another from him, namely, the Holy Spirit; and by this he is made known in the same mode as the Father, namely, by common spiration. The Holy Spirit, however, can be made known by this, that he is from another or from others, and thus he is made known by procession. But not by this, that there is another from him: because no divine person proceeds from him. Therefore there are five notions in the divine, namely, innascibility, paternity, filiation, common spiration, and procession. Of these, however, only four are relations. For innascibility is not a relation except by reduction, as will be said below. There are, however, only four properties. For common spiration is not a property: because it is common to two persons. There are, moreover, three personal notions, that is, [notions] constituting the persons, namely paternity, filiation, and procession. For common spiration and innascibility are called notions of the persons, but not personal, as will be made clearer below.

Reply to the first: Beyond the four relations one must posit another notion, as has been said.

Reply to the second: Essence in the divine is signified as a certain thing, and similarly the persons are signified as certain things; but the notions are signified as ratios making the persons known. And therefore, although God is said to be one because of the unity of essence, and triune because of the trinity of persons, nevertheless he is not said to be "quine" because of five notions.

Reply to the third: Since only relative opposition makes real plurality in the divine, several properties in one person, if they are not opposed to each other relatively, do not differ really. Nor yet are they predicated of each other; because they are signified as diverse ratios of the persons. Just as also we do not say that the attribute of power is the attribute of knowledge: although we say that knowledge is a power.

Reply to the fourth: Since person imports dignity, as was said above, a notion of the Holy Spirit cannot be taken from this, that no person is from him. For this does not pertain to his dignity, as it pertains to the authority of the Father, that he is from no one.[396]

Reply to the fifth: The Son and the Holy Spirit do not agree in one special mode of existing from the Father, as the Father and the Son agree in one special mode of producing the Holy Spirit. Now that which is a principle in making known must be something special. And therefore it is not similar.

The conclusion is: There are only five notions in the divine persons, innascibility, active spiration, paternity, filiation, and procession: St. Thomas gathers their number from the number of emanations, by which two persons proceed.

396. See above, q. 29, a. 3.

Disputatio CXXXVII - Whether, besides the five notions, a sixth can be constituted

Caput I - Scotus asserts a sixth notion in the Son, namely inspirability

Scotus, on the First Book, distinction 28, question 1, ad 3,[397] besides the five notions which are commonly assigned, namely besides paternity and innascibility in the Father, spiration in the Father and the Son, filiation in the Son alone, and procession in the Holy Spirit alone, does not hesitate to assign another sixth to the Son, which he himself calls inspirability; and it denotes the negation of procession by will. For just as a peculiar notion is constituted, innascibility, which signifies the negation of every procession; so also inspirability could be assigned, which denotes the negation of one procession only. And although, as the Holy Doctor teaches in the reply to the fourth, "non-spirator" is not a notion, because it signifies only the negation of active spiration; nevertheless inspirability, which denotes the negation of passive procession, will pertain no less to the dignity of the person than innascibility, which also signifies the negation of passive processions: or a reason must be rendered why one negation rather than another is a notion.

Nor does it stand in the way, says Scotus, that hitherto only five notions have been assigned by the theologians to the divine persons, because in Scripture only three notions, which are the personal properties, are enumerated (John 5); afterward, however, a fourth was added, which is spiration. Besides, down to the times of St. Ambrose the notion of innascibility and "unbegotten" was hidden; nay rather by him and by other Fathers rejected; afterward, however, in the Church of God by St. Augustine and others, as in Disputation 141 we shall see, it was gladly admitted: what marvel, then, will it be, if we now also add a sixth, and the whole school receives it? for an argument from "not yet" is vain and futile. Wherefore it is not permitted to argue for the number of notions in this way: Up to now in the Church of God a sixth notion has not been handed down by the Doctors; therefore in no way is it permitted now to assign it.

Caput II - The true opinion of many

There are Scholastics by whom the number of five notions is so proved that they assert that neither that sixth nor any other ought to be added: whose opinion I judge to be true and to be embraced. This was taught by Alexander,[398] together with St. Thomas in this article, Cajetan, Canariensis, and more recent Thomists, St. Bonaventure,[398] Durandus,[398] and those who follow,

397. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, ad 3.

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

Capreolus,[398] Gabriel,[398] Marsilius,[398] and it is gathered from Richard [of St. Victor] in the First Book, distinction 28, article 1, question 1, in the body and to the third together; who all, Alexander excepted, not only affirm that there are only five notions, but also, against Scotus, assert that the negation of a procession is not a notion. Thus explicitly said Richard, Durandus, Capreolus, and Canariensis: the rest, however, in general affirm that no negations of any procession are a peculiar notion; but such is inspirability: in which sense Capreolus interprets the Angelic Doctor.

But why, since innascibility is a peculiar notion, inspirability is not, those who follow this latter opinion vary among themselves. Yet, that each may explain his opinion, they note certain things which ought to be indubitable for all, and which we also admit to be true. First, Canariensis notes that the notion is not the origin itself formally: this indeed is signified and conceived in the mode of a way; but the notion has the nature of a form, as existing in fact in the person himself. But although the origins are called notions, they ought not to be distinctly constituted from the very forms in fact: for since by generation we know the first person in the same way that by paternity, generation ought not to be a notion distinct from paternity.

Second, it must be observed from St. Thomas in this article, at the end, and from St. Bonaventure, Marsilius, and Canariensis in the places cited, that names which signify procession universally do not signify a distinct notion, even if the processions are notions. Just as, if "to generate" should bear a notion, it ought not to be distinct from another notion "to produce": because "to produce" is as universal a predicate, and "to generate" a particular difference; but a universal under which particulars fall ought not to be numbered.

Third, it must be premised from the same Doctors, and St. Thomas in this article in the reply to the fourth, that the notion of a person ought to be conceived by us in the mode of a certain dignity and perfection. For, as St. Thomas says, since person carries with it some dignity, the notion of the person ought in some way to denote that. If, therefore, we take something which signifies no perfection - such as "not to spirate" - we do not conceive something peculiar about the person; which seems to belong to the very ratio of a notion: for a notion is that by which, in a peculiar way, a person becomes known to us; which, unless it be a dignity or perfection apprehended, ought not to be called a notion of the person.

---

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

398. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 68, memb. 3; St. Thomas, in this article; Cajetan, ad hunc art.; Canariensis, ad hunc art.; recentiores Thomistae; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 4; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 2, no. 9 ff.; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, art. 1, concl. 5 - 6; Gabriel [Biel], In I Sent., q. 1, art. 3, dub. 1; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 29, art. 1, not. 8; Richard of St. Victor, In I Sent., d. 28, art. 1, q. 1, in corp. et ad 3.

Cajetan, however, distinguishes in various ways between innascibility and inspirability, so as to satisfy Scotus. First, indeed, Cajetan in this article, no. 9. For the evidence of this I answer thus. Although, regularly speaking, a negation is not a notion of a person (since the notion of innocence is posited by grace: but a privation is rather known by means of a habit than the contrary, and therefore inspirability is not a notion), nevertheless by a peculiar reason innascibility, which is a negation, is called a notion of the Father: first, because the person of the Father alone in the divine has the ratio of first principle; but a first principle is best known by this, that it is not from another. Then too a peculiar notion is posited because of the diverse connection of these terms, "Father" and "Unbegotten": for in creatures he who is a father is at once begotten by another; in the divine, however, not so; but the Father has this as peculiar, that he proceeds from no one: therefore also a peculiar notion of the eternal Father is posited, innascibility, which agrees with no other person. On the contrary, since inspirability agrees with no son, even a created one, but every son is "not spirated," inspirability, or the negation of spirability, ought not to be constituted as a peculiar notion of the eternal Son. Moreover, since he who affirms that in God there are two innascibles, affirms that there are two Gods, as Hilary says in the book On Synods, therefore it is necessary that innascibility be constituted a peculiar notion of some person. Thus far Cajetan.

In my judgment, however, the reason for the distinction which we seek has not been sufficiently explained. For that by that negation there is known to us the ratio of the first principle, we do not deny: but unless by that negation we conceive some positive [content], the ratio of a principle, the negation itself, taken in itself, is perhaps not to be numbered among the notions of a person. But so that by the account of the positive - into the cognition of which it leads - there be said to be a peculiar notion, that [positive] ought to be diverse from the positive which is signified by the other words of the notions: wherefore Cajetan ought to show how that which we conceive by innascibility is something positive distinct, according to our mode of understanding, from the other notions; and it is true, that what we come to know by inspirability in the Son is not [thus distinct].

Besides, what, I ask, does it matter that innascibility is a negation peculiar in the eternal Father and is not found in other created fathers, so that for that reason it is a peculiar notion of the eternal Father? For if nothing is found in some special proposition by which that negation makes him known, a special notion ought not to be constituted. I pass over the third reason which Cajetan adduces from St. Hilary: for that has little weight.

Caput III - The reasons of Durandus and of Canariensis on the same matter

Then Durandus replies,[399] in the First Book, distinction 26, question 1, at the second distinction, namely no. 17, that this is the difference between innascibility and inspirability: that inspirability signifies only the negation of passive spiration, which is contained in the positive notion of the act of spiration; for by the very fact that he is spirator, the Spirit denies being spirated: therefore it does not posit an opposition diverse from active spiration, which is common to the Father and to the eternal Son; whereas innascibility signifies the negation not only of generation - for thus it would not be a notion distinct from paternity - but also of any other procession whatsoever, both active and passive.

399. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 1, sub dist. 2 (no. 17).

Then Durandus answers in the First Book, distinction 26, that second question, no. 10, and sets forth this difference between innascibility and inspirability: that inspirability only signifies the negation of passive spiration, which, since it is contained under the positive notion of active spiration - because by the very fact that one is spirator, he cannot be spirated - therefore is not posited as a notion distinct from active spiration, which is common to the Father and to the eternal Son; but innascibility signifies the negation not only of generation alone (for thus it would not be a notion distinct from paternity), but also of any other procession whatsoever, both immanent through the intellect and will, and transeunt through creation; and thus there is made known to us some dignity of the first person as the first principle, distinct from the other notions.[400]

The reason of Durandus is not sufficient. For my part, I judge that one ought not to constitute as a distinct notion any negation which does not indicate for us some positive dignity different from the other positive notions; otherwise it would be permissible to multiply many other notions by negations. Yet Durandus does not sufficiently show how innascibility signifies to us, materially speaking, a new dignity of the person, which inspirability does not indicate. For someone could say that, just as inspirability is not a distinct notion from active spiration, because this negation follows upon that; so neither is innascibility, because this negation also necessarily follows upon paternity and active spiration. For that which is the principle of every procession, such as are paternity and active spiration together, cannot in any way proceed. Next, to be unable to proceed through creation belongs to the Father, and to any person whatsoever, insofar as he is God; indeed, as below, disputation 140, chapter 1, from St. John Damascene we shall show, "unbegotten" insofar as it signifies "uncreated," or "not proceeding by creation," is not a notion, nor does it pertain to the personal notion, since that is a ratio common in a certain way to all the persons; but a notion ought to belong to only one or two persons.[401]

Then the Canarian reproves those asserting that innascibility is a notion by reason of some conjoined positive; and he asserts that it is a notion by reason of the negation alone. And why innascibility should be a notion by reason of the negation alone, but not inspirability, he proves in no other way than because inspirability denies only the procession through the will, from which some dignity of the Son does not seem to be signified; but innascibility denies in the Father every procession, from which some dignity of his is made known to us, distinct from the other notions: therefore rightly a distinct notion is constituted. And hence, he says, the Father is called by St. Hilary in De Trinitate 9 "greater than the Son," because he is not from another - not that the Son is less, but so that thence the Father's authority may be shown in a new way through innascibility.[402]

Rejected: for this author seems to fall into the very position which he himself attacked. For if he therefore says that innascibility is a notion because it denotes some dignity, or authority, of the Father; it follows that it is not a notion by reason of the negation, but by reason of the positive dignity which it indicates. For no negation, as negation, can be a dignity of anyone, or a perfection of him; although by a negation we may sometimes signify a positive perfection, as will be said in the following chapter.

400. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 26, q. 2, no. 10.

Caput IV - The reasoning of the more recent authors on the same matter

Lastly, others, against the common teaching of the Scholastics, whom we recalled in chapter 2, affirm that the notion of a person does not always pertain to that person's dignity, but that it is enough if through it the person is made known to us. Wherefore, since by innascibility the person of the Father is known to us, but not likewise by inspirability the person of the Son; therefore they say that innascibility is a notion, but not inspirability: not because through innascibility we know some peculiar dignity of the Father, but because his whole person is made known by that negation. They prove, moreover, that by inspirability the person of the Son is not known: because not every negation is apt for knowing the positive better, but only certain ones; of this sort, however, inspirability is not: for the person of the Son is better known to us by filiation and passive generation than by the negation of passive spiration; whereas the Father is better known by the negation of procession; because, as St. Thomas says in the following question, article 4, in the body and to the first; and in the First Book, distinction 28, question 1, article 1, and again in article 2, the first are better known by negation. Therefore a notion is posited.[403]

This opinion, however, can easily be refuted. First, because it teaches contrary to the common opinion of the Scholastics that it is not of the ratio of a notion to signify some dignity of the person to whom it belongs.

Rejected: second. Because, as we said in the notes on the preceding article and in disputation 137, chapter 2, the notion which is posited by the Scholastics in divine matters is not the very cognition by which we know the person, nor the medium through which we come to a knowledge of him, nor the mode of knowing him; but it is the ratio of the person known by us, by the knowing of which the person is thereby known. Now indeed, without the negation, namely innascibility, the person of the Father is known to us, not according to any other positive ratio than that of paternity alone, or of spiration, or of both; for that reason, innascibility ought not to be assigned as a distinct notion - that is, a distinct ratio known of the person - but as a different mode of knowing him, which among the Scholastics is not a notion.

Rejected: third. Either the ratio which we know of the Father through negation is the negation itself - and thus every negation known of a person will be a notion - or it is a positive ratio known by means of that negation; and this will be some dignity. Either, therefore, it is distinct from paternity and spiration, and thus it will be a distinct positive notion against the preceding opinion; or it is paternity and spiration themselves, and thus innascibility will not be a notion, that is, a ratio diverse and known of the person, but a different mode or medium of knowing the same ratio of the 401. See below, Disputatio 140, cap. 1; and St. John Damascene, as cited there.

402. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, lib. 9.
403. St. Thomas, in the following question, a. 4, in corp. et ad 1; and In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, a. 1; and again a. 2.

person. Thus, if the ratio of infinity and of the other attributes, which are conceived and denominated by negation, were known by a twofold way, both by negation and in a positive mode, one ought not to say that there is a different notion of the nature and essence - that is, a different ratio known - but entirely the same, though understood in a different way.

Rejected: fourth. Just as the ratio of the Son is better known to us in itself than through the negation of spiration, so also the ratio of the Father and the ratio of spirator in the Father are better known in themselves to us; and the person of the Father is better known through those positive ratios than through the negation of procession, which is innascibility. Who does not see this? For I know a principle of two productions better by the proper concept of the productions than by the opposed negation. For this reason St. Cyril, Book 1 of the Thesaurus, chapter 2, thus says: "And he who named the Father God from that which is, signified what he is; but he who said 'unbegotten,' [named him] from that which is not. For he is Father of the Son; but 'begotten' he is not. But that we more suitably name God from that which is than from that which is not will be evident from this, and so on."[5] Therefore, in vain is innascibility by those Theologians constituted a notion for this same reason - that through it the person of the Father is better made known.

But if they say that by that negation the first person is better known by us insofar as he has the ratio of the first principle - because first things are better known by negations - there will be need to assign some other positive ratio of the first principle besides paternity and spiration. For if it consists in these two, or in either of them, it is without doubt better known through them than through negation. But if, in order that a negation be a notion, it is enough that by it the person be known in any way whatsoever, even if he be known under the same dignity; then inspirability also will be a notion: for this likewise, in some way or other, renders the second person known to us.

Some add, with Alexander, Part I, question 69, members 4 and 5, that "unbegotten" is therefore a notion, because even if there were but one person, that person would be called "unbegotten": therefore, since by this negation a person can be known without paternity and spiration, it will be a distinct notion from those.[404] But the contrary reason is manifest: for in the same way inspirability in the Son, and "ingenerability" in the Holy Spirit, could be known, even if neither the Son were generated nor the Holy Spirit spirated, but proceeded in other diverse modes; yet that does not suffice for those negations to be peculiar notions. For now, since we suppose the Son to be begotten and the Holy Spirit to be spirated, those negations are sufficiently known through other positive notions, nor do they denote any dignity different from them.

Caput V - The true reason why innascibility is a peculiar notion, but not inspirability

In order to assign the true reason by which innascibility is said by us to be a notion of the Father distinct from the others, but inspirability in the Son and ingenerability in the Holy Spirit are not so, there is to be observed the doctrine of Durandus, in the First Book, distinction 28, question 1, article 2 - namely, that the negation of a form is not only in some subject which is said to lack that form, but also arises from some peculiar formal ratio opposed to that of which it is said to be the negation: thus the incorruptible in the heavens, which is the negation of corruption, arises from some formal reason opposed to that which corruption requires.[405]

404. Alexander of Hales, Summa, I, q. 69, memb. 4 - 5.

From this it may be gathered first why unbegottenness is a notion, even if it be signified by a negation: because although formally and expressly it signify a negation, and that which the Father is not; nevertheless materially and directly it signifies some positive dignity of the person, namely some mode of subsistence of that person, in which a certain dignity appears to us in our way of understanding, and is known by us through the negation. Thus the incorporeal and the incorruptible denote positive attributes which are the peculiar cause of the negation of body and of corruption, namely, the perfection of perpetuity and of spirit. Following this sentiment is St. Bonaventure in I Sentences, dist. 4, q. 4, where he taught that unbegottenness by reason of negation alone cannot be a notion, because thus it signifies no dignity of the person; but by reason of the positive dignity which it denotes - namely, fullness, or universal authority, and the first principle - which he calls a fountain-like (fontal) dignity.[406] Of which opinion St. Thomas makes mention, in question 33, article 4, to the first reply.[407] There are also among the Fathers some who expressly concede that by unbegottenness a certain positive mode of the person is signified; and they understand it as has been set forth thus far. Thus St. Basil affirms in book 4 against Eunomius, chapter 2, a little after the beginning, where he admits the name "unbegotten" as proper to the Father, and "begotten" as proper to the Son, in these words: "Wherefore unbegottenness is a mode of substance, not the name of substance (that is, of essence)."[408] And St. Cyril, book 1 of the Thesaurus, chapter 4 near the end: "And by the name 'unbegotten' we wish to signify not the substance (that is, the essence), but the mode by which God is."[409] Likewise St. John Damascene, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 9, thus says: "That it be, namely, that all things which the Father has the Son also have, with this one exception, that he is not unbegotten; which word indeed does not indicate a difference of nature, nor dignity and authority, but a mode of existence."[410] When he says that by that word there is signified dignity and authority, he understands that by which the Father excels the Son: for, as we explained in disputation 122, chapter 5, when he says that by that word there is signified the mode of the person's existing, he must also admit that there is signified some positive account which in our way of understanding pertains to dignity, that is, to the perfection of the person. This, according to the opinion of the Scholastics, we said to be necessary, that something have the character of a notion. Add Nicetas, in oration 23 on St. Gregory Nazianzen, which is in praise of Heron, on those words "that also," and so forth, where he calls "unbegotten" the characteristic property of the Father.[411] But when St. Cyril, book 1 of the Thesaurus, chapter 3 at the beginning, says, "It is not therefore unbegottenness that is expounded as substance, but (it signifies) that the substance, of which it is said, is not in such a mode," by which words he seems to 405. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, a. 2.

406. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 4, q. 4.
407. St. Thomas, STh I, q. 33, a. 4, ad 1.
408. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, lib. 4, cap. 2.
409. St. Cyril, Thesaurus, lib. 1, cap. 4.
410. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, lib. 1, cap. 9.
411. Nicetas, Oratio 23 in S. Gregorium Nazianzenum (In laudem Heronis).

teach that this name signifies the negation of the mode, not a mode of substance; he must be understood to be speaking of the formal and express signification, as was noted above: yet for that reason he does not deny that it also signifies materially some positive mode of substance, as Cyril himself with other Fathers admits. In the same way St. Augustine is to be understood, who in book five on the Trinity, chapters 6 and 7, contends that by that name is signified rather what is not than what is; for we also say this of those names by which we signify some attributes of God, as "Immutable," "Incorporal"; so also Nicetas in the place cited said that the name "Unbegotten" signifies the negation of generation.[412]

Secondly, that we may show that by reason of the positive (element) which is signified by that word, unbegottenness is the fifth notion, we must assign a concept of the positive (signification) diverse from that of the others. For this reason St. Thomas rejects that opinion of St. Bonaventure which we followed, namely, because, as he holds, there is no positive signification (thereby) distinct from paternity and active spiration that answers, in the Father, to this word "Unbegotten": but we, following what St. Bonaventure posited, can easily show a diverse signification. For he who conceives the Father under the single concept either of paternity alone, or of active spiration alone, has not yet expressly apprehended him as the first principle in the Trinity - although he can deduce this from those (notions): for he only understands him as the peculiar principle of the Son by generation, or of the Holy Spirit by spiration; but as yet he does not expressly conceive the Father under the account of the first principle. For although paternity shows that the Father is prior in origin to the Son, and spiration, that he is prior in origin to the Holy Spirit; nevertheless they do not show that he is first, expressly and formally. Therefore, that we may show that the Father is first, we use the word "unbegotten," by which, in the mode of a negation, we signify that the Father is Father, and is referred to the Son, in such a way that by his paternity he is constituted the first person, whose account is rightly understood by the negation of "unbegotten," namely that he is from no one in any way whatsoever, not even from another divine person: which we did not yet expressly know of the Father by the notion of paternity alone, or of spiration; and although it might be rightly deduced, once the number of emanations is supposed: nevertheless because none of those relations supposes this expressly and formally in its concept, therefore, the notion of unbegottenness being added, the person of the Father together with his paternity is made known positively in a new way as the first and fountal origin. For first things and simple things are known better by us through negation, as Aristotle teaches, Metaphysics X, chapter 5.[413] And in this way, the positive (element) that answers to this notion of unbegottenness is paternity under the account of the first (principle); once that is established, it is clear what is the second person and what is the third; and therefore there is no need to multiply other notions. For since filiation refers the Son to the Father alone, but procession refers the Holy Spirit to the Father and the Son - under which (procession) spiration is considered - there is no need, in order to signify the second and third 412. St. Cyril, Thesaurus, lib. 1, cap. 3; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, lib. 5, cc. 6 - 7.

413. Aristotle, Metaphysics X, c. 5.

persons under the account of the second and third person, to constitute other notions; whereas a peculiar notion was necessary in order to show that the person of the Father is the first origin of all things and the fount, which had not yet been expressly stated by the notion of paternity alone.

But you will ask, whether this notion, since materially it signifies a positive (element), is a relation or something absolute; and if it is a relation, whether it is the same as paternity, or different. I answer, the positive signification of this word is paternity, under the special concept of first origin and principle, whereby there is not added a new real relation, but one of reason, because no new other real relation is given than the real relation already existing. Whether, however, before the first person be understood as actually generating, that account of the first and ungenerated signifies a relation, or something absolute, and be a different notion, we shall say in disputation 140, chapter 3, and disputation 169, chapter 7.

From this opinion St. Thomas and Capreolus do not depart, whom we shall cite below in disputation 140, chapter 3, when they assert that by this negation the account of the first principle is signified and made known: although they impugn the opinion of St. Bonaventure, yet in a far different sense, as we shall say there. The same teach that by that negation is signified Durandus, the Master of the Canaries, and Cajetan, as we shall say in the same place: although these three defend in another way the account of a peculiar notion, as we saw above.

But someone may press thus in objection: by the same reason, on account of the different relations of reason, we can constitute new other notions in the second and third person - namely, the account of "word" and "image" in the Son, and likewise the account of "gift" in the Holy Spirit. For these are altogether distinct and are not synonymous, because they connote at the same time diverse respects of reason upon the personal real relations: therefore there will be different notions of the persons.

I answer: In the first place, the account of image is not a different notion from filiation, because in the definition of "Son" the account of "image" is included, when he is said to be "according to the likeness of nature," as we explained in disputation 113, chapters 1 and 7. Then, if the account of "Son" be understood specifically as it is in God, it is the same as the account of "word": for since the Son is generated by the divine intellect, he is thereby the word of the Father; and thus in God these two seem to be distinguished as the common and the particular account, which do not constitute different notions, as we said in the notes on the second article: for the account of Son is determined and further narrowed by the account of word, and conversely the account of word by the account of Son; and therefore there is no need to understand a different notion. For he who distinctly and specifically knows the one, knows also the other, which Athanasius indicated for us in few words, Oration 2 against the Arians, far from the middle: for showing why the second person is called both Son and Word at the same time, he thus speaks: "Scripture conjoins the two in one: it called him 'Son' indeed for this same reason, that it might declare the natural and true subsistence of the Father; but yet, lest anyone should understand something produced and begotten in a human way, again defining the subsistence, it named him that 'Word,' and 'Wisdom,' and 'Splendor': for by those words we apprehend in our thought impassibility in begetting, eternity also, and that comeliness which befits God."[414] Behold how Athanasius judges that by all those names at once one and the same notion of filiation, characterized and sealed, is signified. The same in all respects is held by St. Basil, Homily on those words "In the beginning was the Word," where he says: "He said 'Word' therefore, that he might show the impassible generation of the Father, and theologize the perfect subsistence of the Son, and show by these (words) the co-joining of the Son to the Father without time"; and below: "If he had said 'In the beginning was the Son,' by the appellation 'Son' thought would have leaned toward the passion of generation."[415]

By reason, however, of the relation of reason which the word connotes toward creatures, filiation is not to be constituted as a different notion of the person; because the notions of the persons ought not to be distinguished by respects toward creatures, but only among themselves. And for this same reason, the account of "gift" is not a distinct notion from the account of "spirit," or of "love produced": because "donation" regards creatures only; moreover, the account of "gift" is as it were generic, but the account of "spirit" as it were particular: and from a common and a particular account a distinct notion is not constituted. The account, however, of "unbegotten," although it adds that relation of reason upon paternity, because it adds it with respect to the persons within God himself, is therefore the notion of the first person. The remaining points worthy of note concerning the word "unbegotten" we shall say in disputation 140. But whether it be lawful to hold otherwise concerning the number of the notions, we shall say in article 4 of this question.

414. St. Athanasius, Orationes contra Arianos, or. 2.
415. St. Basil, Homilia in illud: "In principio erat Verbum."

Disputatio CXXXVIII - Whether active spiration is really distinct from paternity and filiation

Summary: - That spiration differs from paternity and filiation only by our reason, against Scotus and Durandus, is proved. Cap. 1. - Why it is said that in God there are four real relations. Cap. 2. - Why, on account of a distinction of reason alone, spiration is not predicated of paternity or filiation, nor conversely. Cap. 3.

Caput I - That active spiration differs from paternity and filiation only by our reason, against Scotus and Durandus Since active spiration, which is called the relation of the spirator, is in the Father and the Son, from whom the Holy Spirit proceeds, it is disputed among the Scholastics whether it differs from those (relations) from the nature of the thing, or only by the operation of our intellect. Scotus, however, in a quodlibetal article, holds that it is distinguished from the nature of the thing, not as a thing distinct in reality, but by that middle distinction which he calls formal: being led to this by the very same reasons by which he taught that the attributes are formally distinguished among themselves and from the essence, and that the relations are from the essence formally distinct from the nature of the thing, which we reported in disputations 116, chapter 3, and 120, chapter 3.[416] The chief (reason), however, is this: that very different predicates are said of the one which are not said of the other, as is quite evident: among which that has greater force which we say thus, that spiration is really communicated to the Son by the Father, whereas we affirm that paternity and filiation are not really communicated.

Relying on this foundation, Durandus, in I Sentences, distinction 13, question 2, number 14, by eight reasons proves that active spiration is really distinct from paternity and filiation; not indeed by that middle distinction of Scotus (which Durandus himself does not admit, as we noted in those places), but by a distinction altogether real.[417]

This opposite opinion I judge to be false in the same way as that about the distinction of the attributes from the essence, or of the essence from the relations and the persons: and by the same testimonies and reasons it is to be refuted. Wherefore, since St. Thomas in this article in the solution to the third (objection), Caietan in this question in article 2 of his commentary, the Master of the Canaries in the same place in the second part of his commentary, Marsilius in I Sentences, q. 30, a. 4, dub. 2, Capreolus in I Sentences, d. 13, q. 1, a. 2, conclusion 1, say that spiration, from the nature of the thing and prior to our consideration, is the same as paternity and filiation: which, besides the testimonies adduced in those disputations, is also confirmed by Boethius in the book On the Trinity, when he says that "relation multiplies the Trinity" - which must be understood by relative opposition, as will be explained in disputation 147; and by St. Anselm in the book On the Holy Spirit, who, as is commonly reported, says that in the divinity all things are one where the opposition of relation does not stand; what the sense of Anselm is in that place we shall say in the cited disputation, chapter 4. Add also St. John Damascene, On the Faith, chapter 11, who thus writes: "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are altogether one and the same, except in this, that the Father is not begotten; the Son is begotten; the Spirit proceeds."[418]

416. Scotus, Quodlibet, art. (as cited), on the formal distinction; cf. above, Dispp. 116, c. 3; 120, c. 3.
417. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2, n. 14.

Further, from the opinion of Durandus and his manner of speaking it follows that one must concede that there is a quaternity in God against the definition of the Lateran Council under Innocent III, in the chapter Damnamus, on the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith.[419] Durandus replies that in that chapter there is condemned only the opinion which Joachim the Abbot falsely imputed to the Master of the Sentences, namely, that in God the essence together with the relations makes a quaternity; but that there is not condemned a quaternity in the relations alone. But this subterfuge is empty: for the same reason obtains for the quaternity in that earlier way and in this latter way in which Durandus affirms it. For on that account is a quaternity condemned, because the Catholic faith has never conceded in God anything but a Trinity; and it has reduced every number in God, which is only in the persons and relations, to a ternary. As to the arguments of Scotus and Durandus, one must satisfy them in the same way as we answered above in the disputations cited, lest they prove that the essence is distinguished from the relations, or persons, by nature of the thing, or really.

Moreover, against certain Thomists it must be observed that they have falsely asserted that spiration is not really distinguished from paternity and filiation in the genus of thing, but in the genus of relation (relatio): for if they are really distinguished in the genus of relation, it follows that they are also distinguished in the genus of being; for when the inferior is multiplied, the superior is also multiplied. How can it be, namely, that one relation according to reality is not another, and yet those are not two things and two beings?

Caput II - Why it is said that in God there are four real relations

The difficulty. It seems hard how there are said absolutely to be four real relations in God, even if those are not really distinguished. For, as we were just saying, when the inferior is multiplied, the superior is multiplied together with it; and we say absolutely that there are four real relations: why shall we not say that there are four things?

Refutation of a certain solution. Certain Thomists respond that it is not necessary, when the inferior is multiplied, that the superior be multiplied: for action and passion are two predicaments absolutely, yet they are not two things; likewise, in the divine essence (essentia) there are said to be several attributes, yet not several things. However, this solution must not be approved: first, because it seems to contradict natural reason, that when the inferior is multiplied the superior is not multiplied; since from the inferior to the superior is in every matter the best form of arguing. Next, because the name Predicament denotes something of reason, to wit, a series of predicates, 418. St. Thomas, in this article, ad 3; Cajetan, In I, q. 33 (art. 2); Theophilus of the Canaries (Canariensis), In I, q. 33, pars 2; Marsilius of Inghen, In I, q. 30, a. 4, dub. 2; Capreolus, In I, d. 13, q. 1, a. 2, concl. 1; Boethius, De Trinitate; St. Anselm, De Spiritu Sancto; St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, cap. 11.

419. Lateran Council IV (1215), cap. Damnamus, on the supreme Trinity and the Catholic faith.

which, just as it is constituted by an operation of the intellect, is also sometimes multiplied by the intellect's operation alone: wherefore it does not follow that, because two predicaments absolutely without any other addition can be distinguished by reason alone, therefore two things are posited. In like manner the name Attribute is a name of second intention (as they say), signifying something attributed to God through our reason: wherefore, when we say that in the divine essence there are several attributes, it does not follow that there are several things in it. But when we say that there are four relations, and we add real, we do not signify something of reason: therefore, when the relations are multiplied, the things also are multiplied.

The Canarian, in the third part of his commentary on this article, replies that a distinction of reason alone suffices in order that several real relations be said; but that, for several things to be said, a real distinction is necessary.[420] This solution indeed is most true, yet less sufficient: for it ought to render a reason why it is that four real relations are said on account of a distinction of reason alone, but several things are not said unless from a real distinction alone. Therefore the manifest reason of this is: because the name several, or the names of numbers, when they are added to the term things, can denote nothing other than a real multitude: for a multitude of things is the same as a real multitude; and this is nothing other than a real distinction. But when the name real is added to the name relation, and to both is conjoined a plural term and number, there is not denoted a real distinction, but a multiplication of relations in the genus of real relations, which is considered from the various ways of looking to a real terminus. For when we say four relations, we do not signify that they are really distinct; and when we add real, we do not denote a real multitude, but that each of them tends to a real terminus by its own nature, not through the intellect, however diverse it may be from another by a distinct consideration. And thus we say that there are several real relations, even if they are distinguished by consideration alone: because we only wish to say that each of them, distinguished in whatever way, has a real terminus by its own nature, not through the intellect. I do not say that it has a terminus really distinct from the terminus of another, but that it has a real terminus, albeit considered in a diverse way. And since in the divine things there are four real termini distinguished at least by reason, and since each person is one of those four relations by its own nature, and not through the intellect, referred to another; there will also be four real relations. For, first, the Father under the aspect of paternity is the terminus of the Son; secondly, the Son under the aspect of filiation is the terminus of the Father; thirdly, the Holy Spirit under the aspect of procession is the terminus of the Father and the Son; fourthly, the Father and the Son under the aspect of spirator are the terminus of the Holy Spirit. Now all these aspects of termini are real, although not all are really distinct among themselves; and each of them by its own nature, and not by the intellect, has its terminus.

From these points the initial difficulty is solved. For we grant that, when the inferior is multiplied according to reality, in the same manner the superior is multiplied: but when we say that there are four real relations in God, we do not signify a real distinction of them; but that they are real relations to a real terminus, and that they are not of reason by the intellect's consideration alone, which can rightly be the case even if they are distinguished among themselves by reason alone.

420. Theophilus of the Canaries (Canariensis), on this article, part 3.

Caput III - That by a distinction of reason alone spiration is not predicated of paternity or of filiation; or conversely Scotus, Quodlibet 5, article 2, near the end, while conceding this proposition, The goodness of God is wisdom, nevertheless absolutely denies this one, Paternity is spiration, or this one, Filiation is spiration.[421] He also impugns the reasoning of St. Thomas in this article in solution 3, and the example which he adduces there: for St. Thomas denies these propositions on account of a distinction of reason alone; and he adduces the example: just as we do not say the attribute of wisdom is the attribute of power.

First, therefore, Scotus attacks [the argument], because if that reason sufficed, we ought also to deny this proposition, Goodness is wisdom, since these two differ by reason; although he concedes another like it, namely, Knowledge is power, which two also differ by reason, just as paternity and spiration. Then the example does not seem well accommodated: for for this reason we do not say, The attribute of wisdom is the attribute of knowledge, because the name attribute is a name of second intention (as they say), signifying something of reason; and one intention is not predicated of another. But paternity, filiation, and spiration are not names of second intentions, nor do they signify something of reason, but three real relations in God: although they are not all really distinct.

Therefore (says Scotus) others reply better, that the aforesaid proposition is false, because spiration is distinguished from paternity and filiation by nature of the thing. But this solution can easily be refuted: first, because no such distinction by nature of the thing can exist among these relations, as was said in the first chapter; then also, because by the same reasoning Scotus ought to deny these propositions, Wisdom is power, Deity is paternity: for in his opinion the attributes are all among themselves, and the relations are from the essence, distinguished by nature of the thing: yet he himself grants each proposition in that place. And although he grants them only in an identical, not in a formal sense, nevertheless either he ought not to admit them in that sense, or at least in the same sense he ought to concede that one, Paternity is spiration, which in no way he thinks to be true.

Wherefore Scotus himself in another way answers this difficulty; for he says that one abstract can rightly be predicated of another (he understands at least in an identical sense) whenever abstraction does not remove identity: but when it removes it, one is not predicated of another; and therefore this proposition is false, Whiteness is music; although this one is true, the white is musical: because the abstraction of an accidental form from the subject removes the identity of the subject which the white and the musical have. Now identity (says Scotus) is removed when the extremes that are abstracted are of such a nature that in their own formal abstract concept they do not include infinity: of this sort (he says) are relations; because relation, by its own genus, is not infinite even in God. Hence it happens that paternity and spiration, which have identity in the subject signified in the concrete, and one would be predicated of the other, do not retain that identity when abstracted, and therefore in no way are predicated of one another. But because attributes together include infinity in their own genus, they are rightly predicated of one another in the abstract, albeit in an identical sense, because by their abstraction the identity which they have among themselves is not removed. He holds the same when one extreme is abstract from the absolute and the other from the relative: for on account of the infinity of the absolute, identity is preserved between them.

421. Scotus, Quodlibet, 5, art. 2, near the end.

Refutation. Yet this subtlety of Scotus can be refuted no less than the preceding solution. First, because any relation in God is infinite in its own genus, no less than any absolute attribute: as was proved in disputation 122, chapter 7. For just as a relation, when abstracted in a creature and in the created order, is not infinite; so insofar as it is divine, it cannot but be infinite by reason of the essence, of which it is a mode. Then, because either by this abstraction identity is removed formally, or really. If only formally, and therefore this proposition is not conceded, paternity is spiration, then by the same reasoning this one ought not to be conceded, wisdom is goodness, or, deity is paternity: since between these extremes there is no formal identity; for in his view the attributes among themselves, and the essence from the relation, are formally distinguished. But if by abstraction there is removed a real identity: this is false, and against Scotus. We show it: because paternity and spiration, however they be abstracted, are not really distinguished, as a thing from a thing, as Durandus falsely thought. Besides, since abstraction is effected by the intellect, therefore the real identity always remains; wherefore, if for this reason we concede in some way this proposition, wisdom is goodness, then in like manner this one must also be admitted, paternity is spiration.

Why the absolute attributes of God are truly predicated, but not the relations, etc. Therefore the reason on account of which St. Thomas - whom Cajetan follows - denies this proposition, paternity is spiration, yet nonetheless concedes in some way this one, wisdom is power, is this: namely, that propositions in which one relation is predicated of another are always taken in a formal sense; just as those in which an operation is predicated of a power - as is this, the intellect understands - as we noted in disputation 119, chapter 2; and because in a formal sense one relation is not predicated of another, just as neither is one attribute of another, therefore this proposition must not be conceded, paternity is spiration. But propositions in which one absolute attribute is predicated of another can be taken in an identical sense; wherefore, although false in a formal sense, they can be conceded in some way, because in an identical sense they are true. By the same reasoning, to the second [objection] of this question's article St. Thomas says that this proposition is true, paternity is God, and deity is the Father, on account of real identity: namely, because this proposition is taken here in an identical sense; but he denies this proposition, the attribute of knowledge is the attribute of power, just as paternity is spiration, because they too are taken in a formal sense from the signification of the words: for by the name attribute there is expressly denoted an order to the reason; and in this alone has St. Thomas compared those two propositions among themselves, namely, that each is taken in a formal sense, and not otherwise.

Moreover, that proposition in which one relation is predicated of another is always taken in a formal sense is deduced from this, that relation explicitly looks to its terminus and seems to express it in itself, and that some sort of act about that terminus is signified by it. Therefore, just as one act cannot be predicated absolutely of another in God, because they are signified under a diverse formal aspect, thus too, in order that it may be predicated in an identical sense, some particle must be added by which that identity is signified.

Articulus IV - Whether it is permissible to hold a contrary opinion about something concerning the notions

To the fourth we proceed thus. It seems that it is not permissible to hold a contrary opinion about the notions. For St. Augustine says in De Trinitate 1, that nowhere is it more dangerous to err than in the matter of the Trinity; to which it is certain that the notions pertain.[422]

Cur moreover the absolute attributes of God are truly predicated of each other, whereas the relations are not likewise.

The reason, therefore, on account of which Cajetan denies this proposition, "paternity is spiration," while nonetheless conceding in some way this one, "wisdom is power, it is best," is that propositions in which one relation is predicated of another are always taken in the formal sense, just as those in which an operation is predicated of a potency, as is this, "the intellect understands," as we noted in Disputation 119, chapter 2.[423] For in the second reply St. Thomas said that this proposition is true, "paternity is God," and, "deity is the Father," on account of real identity: because namely this proposition can be taken in the identical sense; but he denied this proposition, "an attribute knowledge is an attribute power," just as that, "paternity is spiration," because it too is taken in the formal sense by the force of the signification of the words: for by the name "attribute" there is expressly denoted an order to the ratio; and in this alone did St. Thomas compare those two propositions with each other, namely that each is taken too much in the formal sense, and not otherwise.

Moreover, that proposition, in which one relation is predicated of another, is not to be taken absolutely in the formal sense for the same reason, namely that a relation expressly looks to its own terminus, and seems to express it within itself, and thus, as it were, an act about that is signified. Therefore, just as one act about another cannot be predicated absolutely in God, because they are signified under a diverse formal aspect, so neither can any relation be predicated of another; but in order that it may be predicated in the identical sense, some particle ought to be added by which that identity is signified.

422. St. Augustine, De Trinitate I.
423. Vazquez, Disputatio 119, cap. 2.

But this subtlety of Scotus can be refuted no less than the preceding solution. First, because every relation in God is infinite in its genus, no less than any absolute attribute remains so: for although a relation, as it is abstracted from the created and the uncreated, is not infinite; yet, insofar as it is divine, it cannot but be infinite by reason of the essence (essentia), of which it is a mode; as was proved in Disputation 122, chapter 7.[424] Then, because either by this abstraction the formal identity is taken away, or the real. If only the formal identity is taken away, and therefore this proposition, "paternity is spiration," is not conceded; by the same reasoning neither ought this be conceded, "wisdom is goodness," or, "deity is paternity": since between these extremes there is no formal identity; for according to his view the attributes are formally distinct among themselves, and the essence is formally distinct from the relation. Or else abstraction takes away real identity: and this is false, and contrary to the doctrine of Scotus: because paternity and spiration, however abstracted, are not really distinguished as a thing from a thing, as Durandus falsely thought; especially since abstraction is by the intellect: therefore real identity always remains. Wherefore, just as by reason of this we concede in some way this proposition, "wisdom is goodness," so too this would have to be admitted, "paternity is spiration."

From the fact that a thing abstracted is not infinite even in God, it comes about that paternity and spiration, which have identity in the subject signified in the concrete and one was predicated of the other, do not retain that identity in the abstract, and therefore in no way are predicated of each other: but indeed, because each of the attributes includes infinity in its own genus, they are rightly predicated of each other in the abstract, albeit in the identical sense, because by their abstraction the identity which they have among themselves is not taken away. He judges the same whenever one extreme abstracted is absolute and the other relative: for on account of the infinity of the absolute, identity is preserved between them.

Still, this subtlety of Scotus can be refuted. First, because any relation in God is infinite in its own genus, no less than any absolute attribute remains so, as was proved in Disputation 122, chapter 7.[424] For although a relation, as it is abstracted from the created and the uncreated, is not infinite, yet insofar as it is divine, it cannot fail to be infinite by reason of the essence, of which it is a mode. Then, because either by this abstraction formal identity is taken away, or real. If only formal identity, and therefore this proposition is not conceded, "paternity is spiration"; by the same reasoning this one ought not to be conceded, "wisdom is goodness," or, "deity is paternity": since between these extremes there is no formal identity; for in his view the attributes are formally distinct among themselves, and the essence from the relation. Or abstraction takes away real identity: and this is false, and against the doctrine of Scotus: because paternity and spiration, however abstracted, are not really distinguished as a thing from a thing, as Durandus falsely thought; especially since abstraction is through the intellect: therefore real identity always remains.

Wherefore, just as by reason of this we concede in some way this proposition, "wisdom is goodness," so too this would have to be admitted, "paternity is spiration."

424. Vazquez, Disputatio 122, cap. 7.
424. Vazquez, Disputatio 122, cap. 7.

Whether it is permissible to hold contrary opinions about the notions

To the fourth we proceed thus. It seems that it is not permissible to hold contrary opinions about the notions. For contraries cannot be without error. Therefore to hold contrary opinions about the notions is not permissible.

1. Moreover. Through the notions the persons are known, as was said. But concerning the persons it is not permissible to hold contrary opinions. Therefore neither concerning the notions.

But on the contrary: The articles of faith are not about the notions. Therefore concerning the notions it is permissible to opine thus or otherwise.

I answer that something pertains to faith in a twofold way. In one way directly, as are those things which have been handed down to us principally by God, as that God is Triune, and that the one Son of God was incarnate, and the like. And to opine falsely about these induces heresy by that very fact, especially if pertinacity be added. But indirectly things pertain to faith from which there follows something contrary to faith. Thus, if someone were to say that Samuel was not the son of Elkanah. From this, indeed, it follows that divine Scripture is false. Concerning things of this sort, therefore, someone can without danger of heresy opine falsely, before it is considered or determined that from this there follows something contrary to faith, and especially if he do not pertinaciously adhere. But after it is manifest, and especially if it be determined by the Church, that from this there follows something contrary to faith, to err in this would not be without heresy. And on account of this many things are now reckoned heretical which previously were not reckoned so, because now it is more manifest what follows from them. Thus, therefore, it must be said that concerning the notions some have held contrary opinions without danger of heresy, not intending to uphold anything contrary to faith. But if someone were to opine falsely concerning the notions, considering that from this there follows something contrary to faith, he would fall into heresy. And by this the reply to the objections is clear.

Notes concerning the doctrine of the Article.

The conclusion is: if someone should have opined falsely concerning the notions, considering that from this there follows something against the faith, he would be a heretic; if however he should opine contrary in such a way as not to defend something against the faith, he would not be a heretic. St. Thomas does not decide whether it is against the faith to opine contrary concerning the number of the notions; but he shows how someone would fall into heresy, if he should opine the contrary. Which rule is to be observed universally in every matter pertaining to the faith: about which we must speak at length in the Secunda Secundae, q. 10, and in the Prima Secundae, q. 76, where we shall show whether any sort of ignorance takes away the notion of pertinacity, which is necessary for heresy.[425]

1. But concerning the number of the notions, about which hitherto we have disputed, namely whether five are to be asserted, or more, or fewer, nothing has been defined by the Church: this, however, is certain, that there are in the divine persons those five rationes, including among them the ratio of unbegottenness (ingenitum); and whoever should deny any of those would think against the faith: but if he should say that indeed there are in God those five rationes, but that not all of them are to be called notions, he would not be saying anything against what has been defined by the Church, but would feel against the common doctrine: which would be rash.

The Canarian, however, notes in this article that it cannot be denied that there are in God more negations and affirmations, which, if they were signified by us by some peculiar and abstract notions, would be called more notions without any detriment to the faith: but he adds that it is not licit to impose these new names to signify them against the common sentence of the Doctors. Yet if it were certain to us concerning these affirmations and negations, I do not see why it would not be licit to use peculiar names to signify them, just as the Fathers began to use the name "unbegotten," which previously was unknown; and in this Scotus, cited in Disputation 137, chapter 1, teaches rightly that hitherto more notions were not discovered, which is not a sufficient reason why others also could not be discovered.[426]

Nevertheless I do not see how there could be more, the number of the persons and of the emanations being presupposed: wherefore let us be content with those five which the Scholastics have gathered from the Fathers. And through this the reply to the objections is clear.

Quaestio XXXIII - On the persons in particular

Consequently it is to be considered about the persons in particular. And first concerning the person of the Father. About which four things are asked.

425. St. Thomas, Secunda Secundae, q. 10; Prima Secundae, q. 76.
426. Scotus, Disputatio 137, cap. 1.

Articulus I - Whether it belongs to the Father to be principle

To the first we proceed thus. It seems that the Father cannot be called the principle (principium) of the Son or of the Holy Spirit. For principle and cause are the same according to the Philosopher. But we do not say that the Father is the cause of the Son. Therefore he ought not to be said to be his principle.

1. Moreover. A principle is said with respect to what is principled. If therefore the Father is the principle of the Son, it follows that the Son is principled; and consequently that he is created. Which seems erroneous.
2. Moreover. The name "principle" is taken from priority. But in divine things there is no before and after, as Athanasius says in his symbol of faith. Therefore in divine things we ought not to use the name "principle."[427]

But on the contrary is what St. Augustine says in On the Trinity IV, that the Father is the principle of the whole deity.[428]

I answer that this name "principle" signifies nothing else than that from which something proceeds; for everything from which something proceeds in any way at all we say to be a principle, and conversely. Since therefore the Father is the one from whom another proceeds, it follows that the Father is a principle.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Greeks use in divine things indifferently the name of cause, as also the name of principle; but the Latin doctors do not use the name of cause, but only the name of principle. The reason of which is that principle is more common than cause, as cause is more common than element. For even a terminus, or also the first part of a thing, is called a principle, but not a cause. Now the more common some name is, the more suitably is it taken in divine things, as was said above: because the more special names are, the more they determine a mode befitting the creature. Whence this name "cause" seems to import a diversity of substance and a dependence of one upon another, which the name "principle" does not import. For in all the kinds of cause there is always found a distance between the cause and that of which it is the cause according to some perfection or power. But we also use the name "principle" in those things which have none of this sort of difference, but only according to a certain order. Thus when we say that a point is the principle of a line, or also when we say that the first part of a line is the principle of the line.

To the second it must be said that among the Greeks it is found that of the Son or the Holy Spirit it is said that he is "principiated." But this is not in the use of our doctors. For although we attribute to the Father something of authority by reason of principle, we attribute nothing pertaining in any way to subjection or diminution to the Son or to the Holy Spirit, in order that every occasion of error may be avoided. In which way St. Hilary says in On the Trinity IX: "By the authority of the Giver the Father is greater, yet the Son is not less, to whom to be one is given."[429]

427. Athanasius, in his symbol of faith.
428. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, IV, c. 20.

To the third it must be said that although this name "principle," as regards that from which it is imposed to signify, seems to be taken from priority, nevertheless it does not signify priority, but origin. For it is not the same, what a name signifies, and that from which a name is imposed, as was said above.[430]

Disputatio CXXXIX - On the names which in the Father can signify the notion of principle

Caput I - On the names "Principle" and "Beginning"

That the name "principle" is predicated of the Father and of the Son no one doubts. All the Scholastics to be cited in this disputation teach it; indeed it is defined in the Second Council of Lyons under Gregory X, and is reported in the chapter De summa Trinitate et fide Catholica in the Sixth Book, where it is said that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle. The same is said in the Council of Florence, in the final session, in the letters of union; and Augustine teaches it in book 5 of On the Trinity, chapter 13, as do other Fathers whom we shall mention below.

It can also be proved by an excellent argument drawn from the very definition of "principle," which may be gathered from Aristotle in Metaphysics 5, chapter 1, where, after six acceptions of the word, he defines it thus: a principle is that from which something first is, or comes to be, or is known. And although Aristotle knew no principle except that from which, as from what is more perfect, whatever proceeds from it depends, nevertheless we can take his definition thus universally, so that no imperfection is denoted in that which proceeds from another as from a principle. For this reason St. Thomas, in order to give us a definition suited to the divine persons, defines in this article a principle as that from which something proceeds, using almost the same words of Aristotle, but in a way so general that it denotes no imperfection in that which proceeds from another. From this definition it is rightly gathered, according to our faith, that the eternal Father and the Son are principle, because from each of them some person truly proceeds.

But about the name "beginning" (initium) one must speak otherwise, namely that it is in no way predicated of the Father or the Son. For although Bonaventure, on I Sentences, dist. 29, art. 1, q. 1, ad 2, says that "beginning" can be taken in a broader signification, and then can signify the same as "principle," namely that from which something proceeds, yet it more properly signifies the beginning of duration; and because absolutely and commonly it denotes a beginning of duration, it cannot be predicated of any divine person, since every divine person is eternal. Thus Hilary, in On the Trinity 4, says that the Church confesses one unbegotten God and one only-begotten Son of God, and confesses the Father eternal and free from origin, and the Son from the eternal origin, not from a beginning, but from the ineffable.

429. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, IX, towards the middle and end of the book.
430. Cf. above, q. 13, a. 8.

With Hilary the Master agrees in I Sentences, dist. 29, where he teaches that Hilary called the Father initiabilis because he has in himself the principle of all things, from which things have the beginning of their duration; and therefore he called him initiabilis, that is, as if initiativus, as St. Thomas explains there. The Master adds that one cannot say that the Son has a beginning, even if one says, "The Son is from the principle," because "to have a beginning" denotes a beginning of duration. The Third Council of Toledo follows Hilary's mode of speaking in its confession of faith, when it affirms that the Son was born without beginning before the ages; and the Council of Worms does the same in its confession of faith.

Nor does Micah 5 stand in the way, where it is said of the Messiah: "His going forth is from the beginning, from the days of eternity." For although the Prophet there speaks of the eternal generation of the Messiah, as the words clearly show, after he had just before spoken of his temporal coming forth from Bethlehem, nevertheless that phrase "from the beginning" does not there denote the Father, from whom, as from a principle, the Son's procession and nativity are; but it means the same as "before anything whatsoever was made," that is, from eternity. To express this more clearly he added, "from the days of eternity." So too in Proverbs 8 it is said, "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his ways, before he made anything"; and in Ecclesiasticus 24, "From the beginning, and before the ages, I was created": for Scripture calls "beginning" that which was before times, and that was eternity.

Caput II - The Scriptural places by which some attempt to prove that the Father or the Son is called principle

More recent theologians try to prove by certain testimonies of Scripture that the Father and the Son are principle. The first is John 1: "In the beginning (in principio) was the Word." For St. Augustine, in book 6, On the Trinity, chapter c., explains, "in the Father"; so too St. Cyril, book 1 on John, chapter 1, understands "in the Father as in the source and origin," according to that of John 3: "I went forth from the Father." He may have taken this from the homily "On Origin," homily 2, among the various.[431] Yet the plainer sense of that place is the one other Fathers follow, namely thus: "In the beginning" which is "from the beginning," according to the phrase of the same John in 1 John 1, chapter 1, where, in place of what he said here, "In the beginning," there he says, "What was from the beginning." Augustine also follows this interpretation in the place cited, and in the Questions on the Old and New Testaments, chapter 122; and such was the sense of Basil on these words of John, of St. John Chrysostom, homily 2 on John, and of St. Ambrose, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 1; the reading of Tertullian too agrees, book Against Praxeas, chapters 5 and 16: "In primordio sermo erat apud Deum, et Deus erat sermo."[432] Therefore John says "in the beginning,"

431. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VI, c. c.; St. Cyril of Alexandria, In Ioannem, I, c. 1; cf. John 3: "Ego a Patre exivi."
432. Basil; St. John Chrysostom, Hom. 2 in Ioannem; St. Ambrose, De fide, I, c. 1; Tertullian, Adversus Praxean, c. 5, 16.

that when all things were made, already the Word was with God, before any of those things came to be; therefore, whether by the name "principle" you understand "beginning," as we said in the preceding chapter, for that which precedes in duration of time, or for the very beginning of duration, and you lay weight, as Basil says, upon that word "was," by that testimony it is signified that the Word of God existed before anything began: because at the beginning, when something begins, already it was; wherefore we cannot assign a time when the Word was not, as Basil notes; and so he asserts that, if one does not depart from the word "was," that is, if its signification be rightly understood, nothing can be affirmed against the eternity of the Son. I pass over other expositions: from this it is sufficiently clear that from that place it is not proved that the Father is principle.

The second place is Psalm 109(110): "With thee is the principium (Tecum principium) in the day of thy power." There Augustine understands by principium the Father, as if he said, "With thee, Father," according to that of John 14: "But the Father abiding in me, he does his works." Basil, however, homily 10 on the Hexaemeron, and Euthymius on that place, understand not "Father," but "kingdom" and "dominion." This exposition is followed by Jansenius and Genebrard, so that the eternal Father speaks to his Son on the day of the resurrection in this way: "with thee shall be kingdom and dominion," that is, "thou shalt obtain rule and dominion on the day of thy strength and power with the splendors of holiness," that is, with most sacred majesty, glory, and splendor.[433] Tertullian agrees, Against Hermogenes, chapter 19, where he explains that of Genesis 1, "In principio creavit Deus," of the principate of power: for in Greek it is ἀρχή, which signifies both "beginning" and "principate." In this latter signification the aforesaid noun is employed by Xenophon, book 1 On Empire, by Aristotle, book 1 of the Politics, and by Plato in the Republic; and the Hebrew word נדיבים (nedibim) signifies principate. Wherefore the Latin word "principium," which our Latin edition has, seems to be taken in this signification.[434] I pass over another Hebrew reading, which, in place of "With thee," has "thy people"; for this variation arose from a variation of the vowel points. Now "the day of power" is either the day of the resurrection, when, death's dominion being conquered, all things were subjected to the Son, as the Fathers commonly interpret - which interpretation most approves itself to me - or it is the day of the second advent, as Theodoret wills. We have therefore enough, by this testimony, to prove that the Father is called "principle."

Thirdly, that the Son too is called "principle," some try to prove by the testimony of John 8, where Christ, the Jews asking who he was, replies, "Principium, qui et loquor vobis." But this place is so difficult, and has so many and such various expositions, that from it nothing certain can be proved. It is to be noted, moreover, that in Greek that word "principium" is not in the nominative, but in the accusative case; for it is τὴν ἀρχήν; then the word "qui" is, in Greek, ὅτι, which signifies 433. Basil, Hom. 10 in Hexaemeron; Euthymius Zigabenus, In Ps. 109; Cornelius Jansenius; Gilbert Genebrard.

434. Tertullian, Adversus Hermogenem, c. 19; Xenophon, De Imperio, l. 1; Aristotle, Politica, I; Plato, Respublica; on the Hebrew nedibim.

"because," or "that," and is a causal particle: but if the particle ὅτι be divided thus, ὅτι εἰμι, and be taken almost as a relative of the neuter gender, from this it has come about that Doctors expound this passage in various ways. Now in the emended Vulgate text it reads: "Qui et loquor vobis."

The Doctors explain the aforesaid place in various ways. First, Ambrose, book 3 On the Faith, chapter 4, and book 5, chapter 5; and book 1 of the Hexaemeron, chapters 2 and 4; and Augustine on that Psalm 109, "Tecum principium," and book 10 of the City of God, chapter 24; and book 11, chapter 32; and book 5 On the Trinity, chapter 13; say that Christ answered the Jews, who were asking who he was, that he was "principle," and he was speaking with them, that is, he was God, the principle of all things, speaking with them in assumed humanity. But since Augustine saw that that word "principium" is not in the nominative but in the accusative case, and therefore that the aforesaid exposition does not at all fit, in Tractate 38 on John he supplies something in this way: "Believe that I am the principle, who also speak to you." For he had said before: "Unless you shall have believed that I am, you shall die"; Christ therefore, answering a tacit objection of the Jews, as though they were asking, "Whom ought we to believe you to be?," said, "principle"; supply: "believe me to be."

Secondly, Nonnus, a Greek author, thus interprets: "Principium, qui loquor vobis," so that "principium" functions as an adverb, "before" (prius), in such a way that in Greek the preposition κατά (Latin "secundum") is supplied, as in Genesis 13, where in Latin it is said, "at the place of the altar which he had made before," more properly in Greek it is said τῇ ἀρχῇ; and likewise it is had in Genesis 43, where it is said, "Because of the money which we brought back before"; and thus the sense is, "I am that which from the beginning, or before, I said to you that I was"; or, "I am he who from the beginning speaks with you, and I have often said who I was."

Thirdly, Theophylact and Euthymius, and St. John Chrysostom, homily 52 on John, use the noun "principium" as the adverb "in primis," so that the speech is elliptical, and the sense is: "In primis," or, "You are indeed unworthy to hear what I also say to you."

Fourthly, some more recent writers interpret thus: that interrogation which preceded, "Thou, who art thou?," is as of one despising; as if the Jews said, "Thou, who art thou, that thou shouldest say to us that we shall die in our sin?" Christ replies with an elliptical speech, "Principium," as if he said, "Me, who am the principle, you despise, because I also speak to you."

Fifthly, others of the more recent explain that "Principium" means "from the beginning"; for in Hebrew the noun is put for an adverb, Psalm 78: "I will speak propositions from the beginning (ab initio)"; for in Hebrew, in place of "from the beginning," it has קֶדֶם (kedem) without a preposition; so that the sense is: "From the beginning," that is, "I am from the beginning, or from eternity, who now also in assumed flesh speak to you." Finally, if that noun "principium," which is in the accusative case, can be explained by "from the beginning," we could also explain it in this way: "I am he who am from the beginning, and from the eternal Father, who is the principle of all things; for afterwards it is subjoined, 'And they did not know that he said the Father to be God'"; he added moreover, "Who also speak to you," as if he said, "I am from the Father, because thus I also speak, and I say to you that in your sin you will die." In whatever way, however, you explain it, from this place it cannot be proved that the Son of God is a notional principle, as is manifest.

Finally, others prove that the Son is "principle" from that of Apocalypse 22: "I am the principle and the end"; but it is manifest that there there is speech not of the principle of the Holy Spirit, but of the principle of creatures.

Caput III - In what way the Father is called the principle of the whole deity

Augustine, book 4 On the Trinity, chapter 2, calls the Father the principle of the whole deity; and indeed Pseudo-Dionysius, chapter 3 of On the Divine Names, after the middle of the chapter, called the Father alone "the fountain of the heavenly divinity," and, as if we were rendering word for word, "The Father is the sole fountain of the super-substantial deity." By the name "fountain" Dionysius understands a principle without a principle; and therefore he said "sole fountain": because in divine realities there is one only fountain; for the Father is a fountain - he is the principle of the Son; the Son is not a fountain - he is the principle of the Holy Spirit, not as a fountain, but as a stream; for he is a principle from a principle. In the same way speaks the Sixth Council of Toledo in its confession of faith, when it says: "We confess the Father unbegotten, uncreated, fountain, and origin of the whole deity." For "fountain" and "origin" seem to signify more than "principle," as we were just saying.[435] The same is said in the Council of Worms in its confession of faith, and in the Council of Florence in the letters of union, session 22; and Athanasius, in the oration against the Gregalians of Sabellius, calls God the Father, somewhat short of "principle," "fountain of deity."[436]

But although the Fathers and the Councils so speak, nevertheless the Canarian (Canariensis), on this article, thinks that that proposition is not to be asserted absolutely; he, however, explains it with the Master in 1 Sentences, distinction 29, in this way: that the Father is called the principle of the whole deity, not because from him deity proceeds, or goes forth, or is produced - for they are anathematized in the chapter "Damnamus," on the Supreme Trinity and the Catholic Faith, who shall have said that the essence is generated or produced - but because he is the principle of each Person proceeding, to whom the divine nature is communicated. For which reason also we shall say below, disputation 156, chapter 6, that the Son is called "deity from deity," "light from light." In which way too Augustine, Dionysius, Athanasius, the Council of Toledo, and the Council of Worms conceive this proposition.

Others explain it thus: that the abstract "deity" is taken for the concrete, and the sense is, "The Father is the principle of all the Persons," not because he is the principle of himself, but, as Bonaventure says in the exposition of that distinction, by an accommodated distribution; just as when we say, "Heaven contains all things," because it contains all other things besides itself.

435. Council of Toledo VI, Confessio fidei: "ingenitum, increatum, fontem, et originem totius deitatis."
436. Council of Worms, Confession of Faith; Council of Florence, session 22, Letters of Union; Athanasius, Oratio contra Gregales Sabellii.

Therefore the Father is said to be the principle of all the other persons, or of all that proceeds from him. In the same way he can be called the principle of the Trinity, not because the whole Trinity proceeds from the Father, but because in the Trinity the Father is the first principle; just as we say that unity is the principle of ternary, not because it is the principle of itself, since it is included in the ternary, but because among the three by which a ternary consists it holds the first place.

Caput IV - The name "Principle" is not said univocally of the essential and notional principle

The name "principle" (principium) is not said univocally of the notional principle with respect to the persons, and of the essential with respect to creatures.

The Scholastic Doctors do not agree that the name "principle" is predicated univocally of the notional principle with respect to the persons, and of the essential with respect to creatures. Henry of Ghent, whom Capreolus reports from Aureolus in I, dist. 29, q. 1, art. 2, in the arguments against the third conclusion, thought that the name "principle" was predicated univocally of both; and he proves it by four arguments, of which we shall set down only two. The first is: If it were not said univocally, that would be because the notional principle is said with respect to something in the same nature, but the essential with respect to something in another nature; but this does not hinder, since to effect something in another nature, or in the same according to species, does not take away the notion of cause (causa); and therefore the name "cause" is said univocally of the sun and of a man generating.

The second foundation is this: If anything else prevented univocation, it would be that the notional connotes a real relation (relatio) to that which proceeds, whereas the essential connotes only a relation of reason; but even this does not hinder, because a relation of reason truly is in the real predicament; otherwise it would have to be in another predicament, which is absurd. Of the same opinion Durandus makes mention in the cited place.

But a far truer sentence is that of the other Scholastics, who affirm that the name "principle" is not predicated univocally of the two principles. Thus teach St. Thomas in I, dist. 29, q. 1, art. 2; St. Bonaventure in the same place, art. 1, q. 2; Scotus, q. 1; Durandus, q. 1; Capreolus, q. 1; the Master of the Sentences in the first article, conclusion 2; Gabriel in question 13, first article, 2; Marsilius on the First Book, q. 31, art. 3, dub. 4; and Canarensis on this article, disputation 118, cap. 4.

Durandus proves the contrary, because the notion of principle would univocally fit the essential and notional principle; likewise the notion of potency (potentia): but the notion of potency does not univocally fit the generative and spirative potencies on the one side, and the productive potency of creatures on the other; otherwise the generative and spirative potency would be contained under the notion of the omnipotent - which is absurd, and Durandus himself shows it in the same place; therefore neither is the notion of potency predicated univocally of those and of the potency of creatures.

But this argument is trifling. For even if "potency" were said univocally of those, it would follow only that omnipotence - which is solely the potency with respect to every creature - would contain under the common notion of potency both the generative potency together with the spirative under one respect and omnipotence, and not under any respect whatever: for omnipotence is not every potency, but a potency with respect to every creature, or with respect to everything that does not imply a contradiction, to be produced or not to be produced. Wherefore, as we shall also say in disputation 165, from the fact that in the Son there is no potency of generating, and in the Holy Spirit neither the potency of generating nor of spirating, it does not follow that anything of omnipotence is lacking to the Son or to the Holy Spirit.

The best reason, then, is that which Scotus gives, and which that Henry touched in the second argument: namely, because to a real relation and to a relation of reason no univocal concept can be assigned. Now of the essential principle it is of the very ratio to have a respect of reason to creatures, as was proved in disputation 104, cap. 6; but of notional potency the ratio is a real relation, or some modification flowing from it, as we shall say below in disputation 164. Therefore nothing can be univocally common to a relation of reason and a real relation. For that Henry asserts that a relation of reason is located together with the real in the real predicament is altogether fictitious: for the predicaments are of real beings; and between a real being and a being of reason there can be no common genus, as is manifest.

Moreover, concerning this reason it must be observed whether we are speaking of the intellect beholding God, or of the intellect of a wayfarer. If of one beholding God, it is manifest that there is nothing common abstractly according to concept: for, as we have shown above in the first article, second conclusion and the like, he who sees things as they are cannot abstract from them a common concept; then too, even if he could abstract, he could do this only insofar as he would see many things distinctly: but of God one cannot clearly see as distinct the things which in reality do not differ - such as the essential and notional principle, as was said above in disputation, cap. 3. Therefore, with respect to the intellect seeing God, there is not given a univocal concept common to the notional and essential principle. Moreover, such a concept cannot be assigned by the intellect of the wayfarer; it is proved: because whether the wayfarer apprehends the essential principle in God under a relation of reason or under a wholly absolute concept, since a common concept of absolute and relative, or of a real relation and of a relation of reason, cannot be apprehended, neither will a common ratio to the notional and essential principle be able to be thought.

Therefore, in a twofold way the ratio of the notional principle is conceived and named by us more perfectly: first, because it is conceived with an order and real respect to that which is produced, whereas the essential is conceived with only an order of reason; then, because the notional mode of producing is more perfect and worthier than that which more assimilates the product to the producer. For a production is so much the more excellent the more similar the product is to the producer; and this belongs to the notional principle. But this is to be understood according to our mode of conceiving; for in reality, since each principle is the same in its very nature with the essence, one is not in reality more perfect than the other; nor is there a diverse concept of them; but by one concept and by one name is it signified to one who sees God: therefore Durandus wrongly considered a greater perfection of potency and principle from the fact that something else is produced simply; rather ought he to have deduced that greater perfection from the greater similitude of the produced to its producer.

Lastly, to conclude what must be said of the name "principle," note that thus the Father and the Son are called a principle, so that neither the Son is said to be principiated from the Father, nor the Holy Spirit from both. Thus St. Thomas taught in this article, in the second solution; nevertheless the same Doctor relates in his little work against the errors of the Greeks, chapter 7, that Athanasius said at the Council of Nicaea that the Holy Spirit is not "imprincipiated," and that the word "principiated" is found among the Greek Fathers. Yet since this word is not in use among the Latins nor the Greeks, it is better to abstain from that term, though Durandus admits it in I, dist. 11, q. 2.

Caput V - The term "principle" is said analogically, not equivocally, of the two principles

Among those who teach that the name "principle" is not predicated univocally of the notional and essential principle, there is controversy whether it is said equivocally or analogically. Gabriel in the cited place judges that it is predicated equivocally; but all the other authors mentioned affirm that it is said analogically. And this seems to me far more plausible. For we cannot deny that there is some ratio of likeness between the two principles; wherefore there must also be some analogy.

But concerning that which is predicated first, not all think in the same way. Durandus said that the notion of the essential principle is more perfectly fitting than the notional; and he gives a reason, because where a principle produces something simply other, there the ratio of principle is greater and more principal than where that which is produced is not simply other. From the essential principle there is produced something simply other, that is, other in nature and in supposit distinct from the principle; but from the notional principle there is not produced something simply other, but only other as to supposit: therefore the ratio of the essential principle in God is more principal than the notional.

But to me the sentence of the others is proved, who say that the ratio of principle first and more chiefly belongs to the notional principle than to the essential. This is the opinion of St. Thomas in I, dist. 29, q. 1, art. 2, in his response to a little question; and of Marsilius and Canarensis in this article. I repeat the reason: because where a principle produces something simply, there is a greater and more principal ratio of principle than where that which is produced is not simply other - but this Durandus had considered from the fact that it produces something simply; rather ought he to have collected it from the greater likeness of the product to the producer: for so much more excellent is production, the more similar the product is to the producer; but this the notional principle has.

Moreover, this must be understood according to our mode of conceiving; for in reality, since each principle is the same in its very nature with the essence, one is not in reality more perfect than the other; nor is there a diverse concept of them; but by one concept and by one name is it signified to one who sees God. Therefore Durandus wrongly considered a greater perfection of potency and of principle from the fact that something else is produced simply; rather ought he to have deduced that greater perfection from the greater similitude of the produced to its producer.

Lastly, that we may conclude what must be said about the name "principle," it is to be noted that thus the Father and the Son are called a principle, so that neither the Son is said to be principiated from the Father, nor the Holy Spirit from both. So taught St. Thomas in this article, in the second solution; nevertheless the same Doctor, in the aforesaid little work against the Greeks, chapter 7, says that Athanasius, at Nicaea, said that the Holy Spirit is not "imprincipiated," and that "principiated" is found among the Greek Fathers. But since this word is not used among the Latins nor the Greeks, it is better, for the sake of convenience, to abstain from it, though Durandus admits it in I, dist. 11, q. 2.

Caput VI - On the names Author and Cause

Hilary, De Trinitate 4, near the beginning, calls the Father the author of the Son; and this word is admitted by St. Thomas in I, dist. 29, q. 1, art. 1, Cajetan, and Canarensis on this article, because the name seems to signify the ratio of a principle so that it not denote a superior cause. St. Thomas adds that only the Father is said to be the author of the Son, because the name "author" seems to signify the first principle; but since that same Hilary, in De Trinitate 2, says that the Holy Spirit must be confessed to be from the Father and the Son as "authors," we ought not to use the name "author" in that signification, so as to signify only the first source; but in whatever way of a principle - even if it be a principle from a principle, as the Son is. In this way Phoebadius, in his book against the Arians, after the middle, which is had in volume 5 of the Sacred Bibliotheca of the Fathers, calls the Father author and the Son "without an author."

But about the names "cause" (causa) and "caused," in Greek aitia and aitiastai, there is a greater difficulty. The Greeks employ these words everywhere without any offense: St. Basil in books 1, 3, and 4 against Eunomius; St. Gregory of Nyssa in the little work, "That one ought not to say there are three Gods"; St. Gregory Nazianzen in the oration on the institution of bishops, which is the 29th; St. John Damascene, book 1, De fide orthodoxa, chapters 8 and 11; and elsewhere very often; Theophylact on 1 Corinthians 11; and others whom St. Thomas cites in that little work against the Greeks. Indeed among the Latins, Hilary, De Trinitate 9, when he says that the Son takes his cause from the Father. The Council of Florence, in the last session in the Letters of Union, says that this is the mode of speech of the Greek Fathers.

On this Bessarion, in his oration for the Union, which is had in the last session of the Council of Florence, because in it he had often employed the name "cause," says in the last chapter of that oration: "First, it must be noted that the holy Doctors of the East, even in divine matters, use the name 'cause' and 'to be caused' in a broad way, not indeed as importing limitation and dependence, but as signifying the emanation and production from a principle of that which is from a principle. And thus I too, when speaking to the Greeks, have always used these names." He nevertheless admits in the same oration that the Latins do not admit the name "cause" in divine names; and among the Latins too Hilary, De Trinitate 4, denies that the Father should be called the cause of the Son; and thus Bessarion thought that this voice was a mark of imperfection, and he taught that that which is perfect, and not that which is imperfect, should be said of God. The interpreters of the Greek Fathers, where this voice occurs, bring back its signification to "principle" rather than "cause," as when John the Theologian of the Latin Church said in the Council of Florence, session 22: "Likewise very often the name of principle is used among the Greeks, because among the Greeks it is commonly treated in the same sense as we Latins understand 'cause.'" Cyril of Alexandria, in the letter to Hermias, as the Latins have it from the Easterners (I understand: as the Latins have it), does not admit in divine names "cause" and "caused." From the Latins, moreover, Hilary, De Trinitate 9, denies that the Father is the cause of the Son. And thus Bessarion, although he used the word, grants that the Latins denote by "cause" that which savors of imperfection; and they avert from God whatever tastes of imperfection. Therefore, from the common form among the Latins they do not use it. Translators who relate the Greek custom, where this voice occurs, say that the Greeks understand "principle" rather than "cause"; whence John the Theologian of the Latin Church in the Council of Florence, session 22, says: "Sometimes moreover the word 'principle' is used by the Greeks in place of 'cause,' because the Greeks use both indifferently."

But someone might object Aristotle, who in Metaphysics 4, chapter 2, says in these words: "Being and one are the same and one nature; therefore they follow upon each other, just as principle and cause, etc."; where he seems either to have received "principle" and "cause" for the same, or at least to have coupled them together so that they would be reciprocated as equals. If this is so, the Father can no less be said to be the cause of the Son than the principle. And he receives in Metaphysics 5, chapter 1, after enumerating many modes in which "principle" is said, at the end of the chapter he adds: "So often also are causes said," or, as others translate, "Moreover, in the modes in which 'principle' is said, are 'cause' also said." He subjoins the reason: "For all causes are principles"; that is, all causes are principles. And since it is certain that the Greek name aitia, in Latin "cause," can rightly be applied to the divine persons, Aristotle would not have doubted to attribute this name to them, if he had known them; therefore we contend that in every way it is also to be attributed by the Latins; because in the opinion of Aristotle "cause" and "principle" are the same, and are mutually convertible.

Some answer to the first place in Aristotle, that there Aristotle uses "cause" in a broad signification for any, even the least, occasion; and in that way it is convertible with "principle." But this interpretation does not fit Aristotle's mind. First, because in Metaphysics 5, cap. 1, he should have distinguished "principle" and "cause," just as he does in the same book when he treats at length the various ways in which "principle" is used. Then also, in the aforesaid chapter he enumerates the modes of causes, and in no way does he mention "occasion." I answer, therefore, to the prior place that Aristotle, after he had posited the position of some genus of things, objects from it that there follows from the same position that the same pertains to causes and principles; and the same thing also pertains to the antecedents, and is to be treated elsewhere. For this, however, pertains to another matter.

Therefore I conclude: although the Greeks, and sometimes even the Latins, have used the word "cause" for "principle," yet among the Latins the form is more secure and more consonant with our way of speaking that we abstain from "cause" in divine names, and we use "principle," which is free from the suggestion of dependency or imperfection; especially since even the Greeks themselves, as Bessarion confesses, use "cause" and "to be caused" broadly for emanation and production, not to import any imperfection, but to signify the order of procession from a principle.

...being and the one. He gives the reason, because these two are the same by nature, that is, they do not differ in the nature of the thing, since they are convertible. But when he added, "Just as principle and cause," he does not bring this as an example of mutual conversion, but of identity from the nature of the thing, on account of which the treatment of both pertains to one and the same science.

To the second: it would be burdensome to report what the metaphysicians contrive in the exposition of that place; but greatly has pleased me the interpretation which Alexander of Hales applies to that passage, namely, that Aristotle says that, besides the modes set down in the context of chapter 1, in which "principle" is commonly said, it is also taken in just as many modes in which "cause" is used, which he enumerates in the following chapter, and they are four. By this account Aristotle does not say that cause is said in as many modes as principle is said; for it is manifest that "principle" extends more widely and is employed in more modes; but that, besides the modes of "principle" which he had enumerated, there are just as many other modes in which "principles" are said, in which also "cause" is said. This is suggested to me, first, because in chapter 1, when recounting the acceptions of "principle," he did not number those by which it is taken as "cause," although "principle" is also said in just as many modes as "cause" is said, which he reports in chapter 2. Then, on this plan that statement fits well which Aristotle subjoins: "For all causes are principles"; as if he were to say, since every cause is a principle, it rightly follows that "principles" too are said in just as many modes as "cause" is also said; but it does not follow conversely that "cause" is said in as many modes as "principle" is said, even if every cause is a principle, because "principle" extends more widely than "cause."

Yet there remains a difficulty in the cited words, in which Aristotle seems to assert, not that "principle" is used in as many modes as "cause" is said, but rather conversely, that "cause" is said in as many modes as "principle" is used - which is neither true nor can it square with the reason which he subjoins. This difficulty, however, is removed if we translate Aristotle's text into Latin in another way than all have hitherto rendered it; and although this translation is indeed new, nevertheless, if the Greek text tolerates it, it is to be preferred to the others. From the very Greek text I most clearly gather this. For the text runs thus: ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ τὰ αἴτια λέγεται; as if, word for word, you were to translate: "Equally then, and as 'cause,' (is said) 'principle'"; about which he had just said above, "Again, the first thing that is thought is that this also is called a principle (ἀρχὴ λέγεται)." Now therefore point by point let our version be more fully justified. First indeed, the particle ὁμοίως signifies the same as the Latin "aeque" ("equally"), which others have rendered "in the same modes," or "so many times": but let us admit their reading. Next, the particle δὲ is continuative, and signifies the same as the Latin "porro" ("further"); and therefore the particle

"autem," which all the interpreters have, is to be taken in that sense which it often renders. Moreover, the particle καί, which has the force of a copulative conjunction, must here be taken in another sense which sometimes it bears, as experts in the Greek tongue attest, namely, "even as," "just as," or "as," which carry a comparative notion; and this especially because the particle ὡς has preceded, which signifies comparisons, namely "in the same modes," or "so many times," or "equally." Add that the phrase τὰ αἴτια, as the article τὰ indicates, is in the plural, as if you were to say in Latin "causae" ("causes"); and thus all have translated it; but the verb λέγεται is in the singular, which no interpreter seems to have noticed; and so it ought rather to be turned into Latin as "dicitur" ("is said") than "dicuntur" ("are said"), as all have rendered it; and it must be referred to the subject which preceded in the immediately prior period, namely ἀρχὴ, "principium." Although plural nouns among the Greeks are sometimes joined to a singular verb, nevertheless, if that rule were observed in this place, the sentence would be more difficult and even false; therefore it is much better also in Latin to translate the singular verb as singular and to refer it to the noun "principium." Therefore we ought not to translate thus, "And likewise causes are said in as many modes"; but thus: "Equally, or equally further, or just as 'cause,' (is said) 'principle' (understood)," without the verb "to be used," which some had supplied; because the same verb "dicitur" ("is said") had been in the preceding period, when he said ἀρχὴ λέγεται, that is, "principle is said." All things therefore rightly agree with our version, which could not stand together with the others.

Articulus II - Whether this name Father is a proper name of the divine person

It is proceeded thus. It seems that this name, "Father," is not properly the name of the divine person. For this name "Father" signifies a relation. But person is an individual substance. Therefore this name "Father" is not properly a name signifying person.

1. Moreover. "Begetter" is more common than "father." For every father is a begetter, but not conversely. But what is more common is said more properly in divine matters, as has been said. Therefore the more proper name of the divine person is "begetter" and "genitor" than "father."
2. Moreover. Nothing which is said according to metaphor can be the proper name of anything. But "word" is metaphorically called "begotten" or "offspring" among us. And consequently he whose is a word is metaphorically called "father." Therefore the principle of the Word in divine matters cannot properly be called "father."
3. Moreover. Whatever is said in divine matters is said per prius of God than of creatures; but "generation" seems per prius to be said of creatures than of God. For truer generation seems to be there where something proceeds from another distinct, not only according to relation, but also according to essence. Therefore the name "father," which is taken from generation, does not seem to be proper to any divine person.

But on the contrary: it is said in the Psalm: "He shall call upon me: Thou art my Father."[1]

I answer that it must be said that the proper name of any person signifies that by which that person is distinguished from all others. For as it belongs to the definition of man that he is soul and body, so it belongs to the understanding of this man that he is this soul and this body, as is said in the seventh book of the Metaphysics; by these this man is distinguished from all others.[2] But that by which the person of the Father is distinguished from all others is paternity. Whence the proper name of the person of the Father is this name "Father," which signifies paternity.

Reply to the first: among us relation is not a subsistent person. And therefore this name "Father" among us does not signify person, but relation of a person. But it is not thus in divine matters, as some have falsely thought. For the relation which this name "Father" signifies is a subsistent person. Whence it was said above that this name "person," in divine matters, signifies a relation, or one subsisting in the divine nature.

Reply to the second: according to the Philosopher in book 2 of De anima, the denomination of a thing should be especially made from perfection and the end. But "generation" signifies a way in becoming; whereas "paternity" signifies the complement of generation. And therefore the name of the divine person is rather "Father" than "begetter" or "genitor."[3]

Reply to the third: "word" is not something subsisting in human nature. Whence it cannot properly be called "begotten" or "son." But the divine Word is something subsisting in the divine nature. Whence it is properly and not metaphorically called "Son," and that whose principle it is is called "Father."

Reply to the fourth: the name of "generation" and "paternity," just as other names which are properly said of individuals, are per prius said of God than of creatures as to the thing signified, although not as to the mode of signifying. Whence the Apostle also says to the Ephesians 3: "I bend my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom every paternity in heaven and on earth is named."[4] This appears thus. It is manifest that generation receives its specific terminus from the form of the generated. And the closer this is to the form of the generator, the truer and more perfect is the generation. Thus univocal generation is more perfect than non-univocal. For it belongs to the notion of the generator that he generate something like himself according to form. Whence this very fact, that in the divine generation there is the same form in number of the generator and the generated, whereas in created things it is not the same in number, but only in species, shows that generation, and consequently paternity, is per prius in God than in creatures. Whence by this very fact, that in divine matters the distinction of the generated from the generator is according to relation only, it pertains to the truth of the divine generation and paternity.

Notations around the Article. The conclusion is: The name "Father" is the proper name of the first person. Concerning the title of the article Cajetan notes the particle "properly" to be used as opposed to "common," "metaphorical," and "extraneous," all of which the holy Doctor examines in the article. But Canasensis understands this particle in the first sense alone; for he contends that the investigation is whether the name "Father" belongs to the first person alone, or is common and is also attributed to others; and to this alone pertains the reasoning of St. Thomas in the body of the article. Whether, however, this name be said of the Father "properly," that is, without metaphor, is gathered from what we have said elsewhere in Disputation 22, article 4, where, moreover, we established what names are common to God and creatures, and derived from God to creatures; on which name of paternity we treated: and Cajetan discusses that question here around the solution to the fourth objection. The reason of St. Thomas in this article is of this sort. The proper name of any person is that which signifies that by which that person is distinguished from others; but "Father" signifies that by which the first person is distinguished from others; therefore it is the proper name of that person. Around which reasoning, to be sure, Cajetan proposes in this way: either St. Thomas understood that proposition about the "proper name" formally and distinctly signifying that by which the person is distinguished; or only materially and as it were in potency - just as a particular ratio can be signified within common names. In the first mode St. Thomas understands it, not by the mere force of that syllogistic proposition (for the name "Father" is analogically common to created and uncreated); therefore it does not signify distinctly and formally that by which the person of the Father is distinguished, but materially; and in the latter mode; but if he understood it in the latter mode, the conclusion remains false, since in that mode even a common name is wont to signify that which is said distinctly; by the reason of St. Thomas it proves nothing. He himself replies well that the major proposition must be understood in that former mode, namely, that that name is "proper" which distinctly and formally signifies that by which the person is distinguished; but the minor is true: because although the name "Father" be analogically common to created and uncreated, nevertheless when one says "the proper name of the divine person," from the circumstances it is understood to be determined for the principal signification.

Articulus III - Whether this name Father is said in the divine per prius, according as we take it personally

To the third, it is proceeded thus. It seems that this name "Father" is not said in the divine per prius according as it is taken personally. For what is common according to understanding is prior to what is proper; but this name "Father," according as it is taken personally, is proper to the person of the Father; whereas according as it is taken essentially, it is common to the whole Trinity: for to the whole Trinity we say "Our Father." Therefore "Father" is said in the divine per prius essentially than personally.

But on the contrary: The eternal is prior to the temporal. But from eternity God is the Father of the Son, whereas in time He is the father of the creature. Therefore paternity is said in God first with respect to the Son, than with respect to the creature.

I answer that: A name is said first of that in which the whole ratio of the name is saved perfectly, than of that in which it is saved according to something. For of the latter it is said as by likeness to that in which it is saved perfectly: because all imperfect things are derived from perfect things. And thus it is that this name, "lion," is said first of an animal in which the whole ratio of lion is saved, which is properly called lion; but of some man in whom there is found something of the ratio of a lion - boldness, or audacity, or fortitude, or something of this sort - of such a one it is said by likeness.

But it is manifest from the premises that the perfect ratio of paternity and filiation is found in God the Father and God the Son, because one is the nature and glory of the Father and the Son. But in the creature filiation is found with respect to God, not according to the perfect ratio, since there is not one nature of the Creator and of the creature, but according to a certain likeness, and the more perfect that likeness shall be, by so much the nearer does one approach to the true ratio of filiation. For God is said to be father of some creature by reason of the likeness of a vestige only, as of irrational creatures, according to that of Job 38: "Who is the father of the rain? or who begot the drops of dew?" But of some creature, namely of a rational creature, according to the likeness of an image, according to that of Deuteronomy 32: "Is not he thy father, that hath possessed thee, made thee, and created thee?" Of some indeed He is father according to the likeness of grace; who also are called adopted sons, according to the fact that they are ordained to the eternal inheritance of glory by the gift of grace received: according to that of Romans 8: "The Spirit himself gives testimony to our spirit, that we are the sons of God. But if sons, heirs also." Of some indeed according to the likeness of glory, inasmuch as they already possess the inheritance of glory, according to that of Romans 5: "We glory in the hope of the glory of the sons of God." Thus therefore it is plain that paternity is said in divine things first according to which there is imported the respect of person to person, than according to which there is imported the respect of God to the creature.

Reply to the first: Common things said absolutely are prior, according to the order of our intellect, to proper things, because they are included in the intellect of proper ones, and not conversely. For in the intellect of the person of the Father God is understood, but not conversely. But the common things which import respects to the creature are said posteriorly to the proper things which import personal respects: because the person proceeding in the divine things proceeds as a principle of the production of creatures. For just as the word conceived in the mind of the artisan is understood to proceed first from the artisan than the artifact, which is produced to the likeness of the word conceived in the mind; so the Son proceeds first from the Father, than the creature, of which the name of filiation is said according to that whereby something participates of the likeness of the Son or of the Father: as is clear from that which is said Romans 8: "Whom he foreknew, and predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his Son."

Reply to the second: "To receive" is said to be common to the creature and to the Son, not according to univocation, but according to a certain remote likeness; by reason of which He is said "firstborn of the creature." Whence in the authority adduced it is subjoined: "That he might be the firstborn among many brethren," after he had said: "To be made conformable to the image of the Son of God." But the Son of God naturally has something singular above others, namely to have by nature that which he receives, as the same Basil says. And according to this he is called "only-begotten," as is clear in John 1: "The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." And by this the solution to the third is plain.[437]

Notationes circa Articulum.

The conclusion of the article is that the name "Father," taken notionally, befits God prior to its being taken essentially.

Concerning the title of the article Cajetan notes first that the name "Father" befits God in a twofold way: both notionally, when one says, "God and Father of our Lord Christ"; and also essentially, when one says, "Our Father," and "Father of mercies." Second, he notes that the question is not whether God is first Father of His Son than Father of creatures, but whether the ratio of paternity signified by this name befits God first within Himself than without. Third, he says that although from the argument But on the contrary it may seem to be gathered that the particle "first" signifies a universal property, yet from the body of the article it is gathered directly that the discourse is about priority according to the order of nature, so that the sense is whether the ratio of Father signified by this name, which is personal, is by the order of nature prior to the ratio of the same said essentially. Wherefore some Thomists do not seem to have grasped the mind of the holy Doctor, understanding him to have spoken of priority of perfection; for when St. Thomas, to prove that "Father" said notionally is prior to "Father" said essentially, assumes that "Father" said notionally is said more perfectly than essentially, he does not infer a priority of perfection, but proves it; whereas from that he gathers a priority of nature, to wit, that it is said to be by nature. But how the Father, said notionally, is prior by order of nature to the Father said essentially, Cajetan and the Canarian most excellently explain in this article concerning the reply to the second, from St. Thomas there. For although essential and common names are prior to notional names by a certain priority of the universal, as "animal" is said prior to "man," yet this is understood only of those which do not signify a relation in time to creatures, as the name "Father" and "Lord" signify. Nay, those which signify relations to creatures, not from time but from eternity, although such indeed are essential, nevertheless by the order of nature are posterior. But whether the act of the intellect, as it is terminated to possible creatures, is prior to the production of the Word, and the act whereby He loves creatures is prior to the procession of the Holy Spirit, we shall say in Disputation 143.[438]

Moreover, in this article the Canarian asks whether the name "Father" befits God univocally, notionally and essentially. He himself answers that it is not predicated univocally, because just as from the eternal Son and from creatures a common ratio of son cannot be abstracted - for creatures are not produced by God by generation, namely from a principle conjoined in likeness of nature, which is the ratio of son taken from generation - so neither can there be a common ratio of Father with respect to the eternal Son and to creatures. He employs this solution because he thinks the solution of St. Thomas, which is to the second, does not satisfy the argument, although it does not differ from it. The same Canarian adds that the name "Son" is predicated univocally of the eternal Son and of creatures; thence he teaches about the name "Father" with respect to father notionally and essentially. He gives the reason, because there is not given a common concept to both, as has been proved; although truly in analogues one common concept signified by the voice can be assigned. But from St. Thomas in the said reply it is gathered that it is predicated analogically; for although a common concept is not given - which also happens in analogues, as we said in Disputation 114, chapter 2 - yet because one filiation is signified by likeness to others and metaphorically, therefore these names are predicated analogically. For creatures are called sons of God, not properly, but metaphorically, by likeness to the true Son, who is generated from an intrinsic principle; therefore there is some analogy of the name in them.[439]

437. St. Basil, In Ioannem, on John 1:18; cf. John 1:18.

Articulus IV - Whether to be unbegotten is proper to the Father

To the fourth we proceed thus.

It seems that to be unbegotten is not proper to the Father. For every property posits something in that of which it is the property. But "unbegotten" posits nothing in the Father, but only removes. Therefore it does not signify a property of the Father.

Furthermore, "unbegotten" is said either privatively or negatively. If negatively, then whatever is not begotten can be called unbegotten. But the Holy Spirit is not begotten, nor yet the divine essence. Therefore "unbegotten" also befits them; and thus it is not proper to the Father. But if it is taken privatively, since every privation signifies imperfection in the subject, it follows that the person of the Father is imperfect. Which is impossible.

Furthermore, "unbegotten" in the divine things does not signify a relation, because it is not said relatively: therefore it signifies the substance. Therefore "unbegotten" and "begotten" differ according to substance. But the Son, who is begotten, does not differ from the Father according to substance. Therefore the Father ought not to be called unbegotten.

Furthermore, a "proper" is that which befits one alone. But since there are several who proceed from another in the divine things, nothing seems to prevent that there also be several who are not from another. Therefore it is not proper to the Father to be unbegotten.

Furthermore, just as the Father is the principle of the person begotten and of the person proceeding, so too, if on account of the opposition which he has to the person begotten there is posited as proper to the Father that he is unbegotten, by the same reasoning there ought to be posited as proper to him that he is "improcessible."

438. Vazquez, Disputatio 143.
439. Vazquez, Disputatio 114, cap. 2.

But on the contrary is what Hilary says, On the Trinity, book 4: "There is one from one, namely from the unbegotten, begotten," that is to say, the property of unbegottenness and of origin.[440]

I answer that: Just as in creatures there is found a first principle and a second principle, so in the divine persons, in whom there is no prior and posterior, there is found a principle not from a principle, which is the Father; and a principle from a principle, which is the Son. Now in created things some first principle is made known in a twofold way. In one way, insofar as it is the first principle, by this, that it has a relation to those which are from it. In another way, insofar as it is the first principle, by this, that it is not from another. So too, then, the Father is indeed made known by paternity and by common spiration, by respect to the persons proceeding from him. But insofar as he is the principle not from a principle, he is made known by this, that he is not from another. Which pertains to the property of unbegottenness, which this name "unbegotten" signifies.

Reply to the first: Some say that unbegottenness, which this name "unbegotten" signifies as the property of the Father, is not said merely negatively, but imports as it were both together, namely that the Father is from no one, and that he is the principle of others; or it imports a universal authority, or even a fontal plenitude. But this does not seem true; for unbegottenness is not another property than paternity and spiration, so as to include them, just as the proper is included in the common. For "fontality" and "authority" signify nothing else in divine things than the principle of origin. And therefore Augustine says in book 5 On the Trinity that "unbegotten" imports the negation of passive generation. For he says that what is said "unbegotten" avails as much as what is said "not son." Nor on this account does it follow that "unbegotten" ought not to be posited as the proper notion of the Father: because first and simple things are made known by negations. Thus we say that a point is that which has no part.[441]

Reply to the second: "Unbegotten" is sometimes taken negatively only. And according to this Jerome says that the Holy Spirit is unbegotten, that is, not begotten. In another way "unbegotten" can be said in some manner privatively, yet it does not import any imperfection. For "privation" is said in many ways. In one way, when something does not have what is naturally apt to be had by another, even if it is not naturally apt to have it itself: thus a son is said to be barren because he lacks a womb, for certain things are naturally apt to have...

Reply to the third. According to St. John Damascene, "unbegotten" in one way signifies the same as "uncreated," and thus is said according to substance, because by this the created substance differs from the uncreated.[442] In another way it signifies that which is not begotten, and thus it is said relatively, in the mode in which negation is reduced to the genus of affirmation, as "not-man" to the genus of substance, and "not-white" to the genus of quality. Therefore, since "begotten" in the divine imports a relation, "unbegotten" also pertains to relation. And thus it does not follow that the Father, as unbegotten, is distinguished from the Son, as begotten, according to substance, but only according to relation, namely insofar as the relation of son is denied of the Father.

440. St. Hilary of Poitiers, De Trinitate IV.
441. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V.
442. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, book 1, chapter 4 (or nearby).

Reply to the fourth. As in every genus one must posit one first principle, so in the divine nature one must posit one principle which is not from another, and this we call "unbegotten." To posit therefore two innascibles is to posit two gods and two divine natures. Hence St. Hilary says in the book De Synodis: "Since there is one God, two innascibles cannot be."[443] And this chiefly because, if there were two innascibles, neither of them would be from another. Thus they would not be distinguished by relative opposition, and so they would have to be distinguished by diversity of nature.

Reply to the fifth. The property of the Father, insofar as he is not from another, is better signified by the removal of the Son's nativity than by the removal of the procession of the Holy Spirit: first, because the procession of the Holy Spirit has no special name, as was said above; second, because in the order of nature it presupposes the generation of the Son. Hence, if from the Father we remove that he is begotten, although he is the principle of generation, it follows consequently that he is not one proceeding by the procession of the Holy Spirit: because the Holy Spirit is not the principle of generation, but proceeds from the one begotten.

Conclusion. The name "unbegotten" is the proper name of the Father. It is called "proper," as Cajetan noted, insofar as it is distinguished from what is common: because it belongs to the Father alone in such a way that it belongs neither to another person nor to the essence and nature, as is gathered from the solutions.

Disputatio CXL - How the name "unbegotten" is the proper name of the person of the Father

- The name "unbegotten" was once held suspect by some of the Fathers. Caput 1.
- Deservedly thereafter the name "unbegotten" was received by the Fathers, that they might signify the Father's notion. Caput 2.
- The name "unbegotten" does not denote a mere negation. Caput 3.

Caput I - That the name "unbegotten" was once held suspect by some of the Fathers

The Greek word ἀγένητος, in Latin "unbegotten," signifies the same as "uncreated" and "by no means made"; with which word the Arians maliciously used to call the eternal Father - not because he is not uncreated, but so that by the opposite word γενητός, that is, "created" and "made," they might style the Son; and so, that they might prove the Son not to be ὁμοούσιος (homousion), that is, of the same substance with the Father, they used this argument: "Begotten and unbegotten," that is, "created and uncreated," differ by nature; but the Father is unbegotten, the Son however is begotten: therefore substance and nature differ. And therefore some Fathers held this word suspect, as Dionysius of Alexandria in the Epistle to Paul of Samosata, which our Francis Turrian has in his Hoplotheca now printed at the beginning; he renders a reason for this in these words:

443. St. Hilary of Poitiers, De Synodis.

"No Scripture has delivered the Father as 'unbegotten'." Turrian, however, notes in the same place, number 13, that Dionysius said this not because in a Catholic sense he denied the Father to be unbegotten, but on the contrary against Paul of Samosata, who used that name; the Arian also used it, and just as he styled the Father "unbegotten," so he called Christ "begotten," so as to show him to be recent and created: for he asserted him to be a mere man.[444]

In the same way St. Athanasius rejects the name ἀγέννητον in the Dialogue of the Orthodox and the Anomoean, because the Anomoeans used the same word for the same reason as the Arians; and he rejects it, because it is nowhere had in the Scriptures; and the Anomoean, pressing, asks whether he ought to be called "Father"; the Orthodox replies, by no means; nevertheless, it was not therefore to be said ἀγέννητον, just as, although God is not said to "believe" someone, he is not therefore to be called "unbelieving" or "not-believing": because these words ill-sound.[445]

By the same reason St. Athanasius rejects this word, and confesses that it was maliciously introduced by the Arians, in the Epistle on the Decrees of the Nicene Synod somewhat before the end, and in the second Oration against the Arians around the middle, where he says: "For I have learned from the pagans that 'ἀγένητον' is said of that which has not yet been made, but can be made, as wood which has not yet passed into the form of a bench; although it is not thus said" - and the Anomoeus insisted - "was he to be called 'Father'?" the Orthodox replied, "by no means"; nevertheless he said it was not to be said ἀγέννητον, just as, although God is not said 'believing' anyone, he is not therefore said to be "unbelieving" or "not-believing": because these words ill-sound.

Moreover, among the Latin Fathers St. Ambrose, in the book On the Sacrament of the Lord's Incarnation, chapters 8 and 9, against the Arians who did not admit the word ὁμοούσιον (homousion) because it is not had in the sacred Scriptures, objects to them the word "unbegotten," which they too had captiously invented, that it is nowhere found in the Scriptures; from which it is clear that he himself did not disapprove this word, but wished to press them with a similar argument.[446] Nor indeed did the Greek Fathers just mentioned reject the word "unbegotten" only for this reason, that it is not in the sacred Scriptures: for by the same reason they would have to disapprove also ὁμοούσιον (homousion), since it is not had in the Scriptures. For what Ambrose and St. Cyril attempt partly to gather from Scripture concerning the word "homousion," as we reported in Disputation 109, chapter 1, is not sufficient that it be contained in Scripture. Therefore those Fathers did not admit the word "unbegotten," because it is not in Scripture and had a signification suspect and craftily introduced by heretics.

Moreover, for another reason St. Basil thinks this word introduced by Eunomius and the Arian himself, so that it should signify that there is no generation in God by which, communicating his nature to another, he would be constituted his Father; thus he noted in book 1 against Eunomius well after the middle, where he reports these words of Eunomius: "But since he is

444. Dionysius of Alexandria, Epistle to Paul of Samosata; see Francis Turrian, Hoplotheca, at the beginning.

445. St. Athanasius, Dialogue of the Orthodox and the Anomoean; see also Epistola de decretis Nicaenae synodi; Orationes contra Arianos II.

446. St. Ambrose, De dominicae incarnationis sacramento, chapters 8 - 9; cf. St. Cyril.

'unbegotten' (namely, God)," says Eunomius, "he will never receive generation," to which the same Eunomius adds "nor will he communicate his nature to the begotten." From which words Basil gathers that Eunomius excludes from God the generation of the Son in the same nature; and therefore he called God "unbegotten." Wherefore in the same book somewhat from the beginning you have this word as suspect; thus he says: "But I too the appellation 'ingenitus' or 'innascibilis', although it most highly fits our thoughts, nevertheless, because I do not find it anywhere in Scripture, and because first it is the calumny and blasphemy of these men, I have rightly judged to consign to silence." Of this signification of "unbegotten" among the Eunomians St. Gregory Nazianzen makes mention in Oration 39, which is on the holy lights; and Nicetas there, in that passage "Pater pater est," says: "For neither has the Father ceased to be 'unbegotten' because he begot"; which words Nicetas, explaining, says: "For he is called 'unbegotten' so that he was never begotten, not however that he has not begotten."[447]

Caput II - That deservedly thereafter the name "unbegotten" was received by the Fathers, that they might signify the Father's notion

For indeed, by now both the Greek Fathers and the Latin admit the Greek word ἀγέννητος and the Latin "unbegotten," without any suspicion; and they apply it not to the essence (essentia), but to the mode of existing in itself or of subsistence (subsistentia), and to that characteristic property by which they designate the property of the Father alone in that signification which the Scholastics call a notion, so that it signify not a negation of creation, as the Arians wished, nor an impotence of begetting, as Eunomius contended, nor a mere negation of generation, but of any procession whatsoever; and that the same is "unbegotten" as "the author of himself," or "not having a principle." The Fathers of the Antiochene synod admit this word to denote the property of the Father alone in that signification, in the Epistle to Paul of Samosata, which is had in the same Hoplotheca of Turrian; St. Basil, book 4 against Eunomius; St. Gregory Nazianzen in that Oration 38 which is on the holy lights; and Nicetas in the same place; and also St. Athanasius in the Epistle On the Synods of the Arians and the Seleucians somewhat before the end, where he confesses that the word "unbegotten" is contained in Scripture by sense, not by the very sound, and that it signifies the Father, just as "Son" signifies the Son, although these words are not contained in Scripture with the same sound; the same sense is intended, although the force of the name is different. He adds also that it signifies that it is "something made," and that he is called "Son"; but as author he does not have, and thus it belongs to the Father alone. Further, in the former place he says: "The Son of God Christ is called 'generated';" and we read in the exposition of faith of St. Justin the Martyr; and we find in St. Ignatius, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, by these words, "by one only-begotten Son and Word of God"; and the same mode of speaking Athanasius receives in the second Oration against the Arians.[448] It is also held by St. Cyril, book 1 of the Thesaurus, 447. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, book 1; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 39; Nicetas, Commentary ad loc.

448. Synod of Antioch, Epistle to Paul of Samosata (in Turrian, Hoplotheca); St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, book 4; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oration 38; St. Athanasius, Epistola de Synodis; St. Justin Martyr, Expositio fidei; St. Ignatius of Antioch, Epistola ad Ephesios.

chapters 3 and 4, and finally of the Greeks the same word, in the aforesaid signification, which fits the eternal Father alone, is established by St. John Damascene, book 1 De fide orthodoxa, chapter 9; he notes, however, that it is written otherwise when it denotes "uncreated," otherwise when it signifies "by no mode proceeding from another": for in the former mode the word ἀγένητος is written with a single nu, in the latter with a double nu.[449]

From the Latins too the same word, without any suspicion, is used in that signification which we have said by the Councils of Toledo VI and XI in the confession of faith; and by Pope Damasus in the Symbol to St. Jerome, which is in the fourth tome of St. Hilary; by St. Hilary in the book De Synodis, and in De Trinitate near the end, and book 9, where he uses the name "innascibilis" or "innascibility," which the Scholastics use more frequently; St. Augustine also uses the same word "unbegotten" in book 3 De Trinitate, chapters 6 and 7, and in the book 83 Questions, question 20; and now there is no controversy among the Scholastics about this matter.[450]

Explicating those words, "The Father is Father," he says that "unbegotten" and "begotten" are not of that number of names which lack a middle, so that one or the other must necessarily be attributed, but that some middle is placed between them, namely "procession." For Nazianzen had said: "Nor therefore does the Spirit pass over either into the Father or into the Son, because He proceeded; He proceeded, even if it seem otherwise to impious men," as if he were to say: even if the Holy Spirit be not unbegotten, not on that account must He be called begotten, as impious men suppose. As Nicetas explains these words, these names are not of the number that are opposed contradictorily, even if they have a certain appearance of contradiction, since they seem distinguished only by a prefixed negation.

Note, then, that "begotten" in the divine realities does not signify "proceeding" universally according to any kind of procession, but generation, which is the production of the Son. The same must be said of the Greek name and the Latin "unbegotten": the Greek ἀγέννητος does not merely deny the procession which is generation, but any other whatsoever, so that we may by it signify the Father - things which two are not opposed by contradiction. For if "begotten" were taken in that same universal signification, it would not be the notion of the Son, but a common concept agreeing to each person proceeding. On the contrary, if "unbegotten" were to signify only the negation of the generation of the Son, the Holy Spirit would be called "unbegotten." And in this signification Augustine seems to have used it, when in book 5 on the Trinity, chapters 6 and 7, he asserts that it is the same to be "unbegotten" as "not to be son," or, if in Latin it were permitted to say so, "un-sonned"; in the same way he says that he is "unbegotten" who has no parent, all of which befits the Holy Spirit. Yet elsewhere, together with other Fathers, he calls "unbegotten" that which in no way proceeds from another and has not another for its author; and for that reason this word is attributed to the Father alone, but "begotten" to that which proceeds so as to be Son, and so is attributed to the Son alone.

449. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, book 1, chapter 9: on ἀγένητος (uncreated) versus ἀγέννητος (unbegotten).

450. Councils of Toledo VI and XI, Confession of Faith; Pope Damasus, Symbol to St. Jerome (in St. Hilary, De Synodis, tome 4); St. Hilary, De Synodis; De Trinitate, book 9; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 3, chapters 6 - 7; De octoginta tribus quaestionibus.

Caput III - The name "Unbegotten" does not denote negation alone

Although all the Scholastics admit the names unbegotten (ingenitus) and un-nascent (innascibilitas), nevertheless they vary when they dispute about the signification of each - whether, namely, it be a mere negation, or some positive notion. I will therefore briefly set forth their opinions, so that I may better explain what must be said in this matter.

There was the opinion of some, mention of which is made by St. Bonaventure in I, distinction 28, question 1: they said that "unbegotten" signifies a certain positive notion of a relation opposed to the relation of begetter, just as "unequal" denotes a relation opposed to the relation of equal. But St. Bonaventure rightly impugns this opinion in that place, because from it there would follow in God five real relations, against the common sentence of the Scholastics; and also because it does not appear what that real relation in the Father would be which is opposed to the relation of begetter. Moreover, if such an opposed relation existed, it would constitute another person; for by relative opposition the persons in God are distinguished.

Scotus, however, on the First Book, distinction 28, question 2, article 1, says that "unbegotten," as it is the notion (notio) of the Father, signifies a mere negation of "begotten," and in this denotes a certain dignity of the personal property; for the personal properties in the divine do not signify imperfection, nor a perfection simply and absolutely, which would be better than its privation. But if someone (says Scotus) were to contend that this word signifies some dignity, because it pertains to the ratio of a notion to have some dignity, it could be conceded that the negation which "unbegotten" signifies is a perfection by reason of itself, not by reason of something positive: for just as in the second Person dignity is to have a begetter, so in the first it is not to have one.

This opinion is reported also by St. Bonaventure, and he rightly rejects it: because a pure negation, insofar as it is a negation, can in no way be a perfection unless by reason of some positive to which it is conjoined and from which it arises; and since a notion ought in our mode of understanding to signify some perfection and dignity, that bare negation cannot be the signification of this name which the Scholastics posit to denote a certain notion of the Father.

Therefore the common opinion pleases me, which teaches that this name expresses and formally signifies a negation - or, as it pleases some, a privation (which will immediately be explained) - so as at the same time also to signify some positive thing by way of a ratio and dignity, directly indeed, but materially, which we mean to denote by that negation; for although we sometimes use negative names to signify positives, especially those that are in God - because we more easily conceive of God what He is not, than are we able to explain what He is - nevertheless by them we conceive and wish to signify something positive, as by the name "infinite," "incorruptible"; because the opposite is better known to us, by the negation of which we understand that thing and by other means explain it.

Besides St. Bonaventure in that place who expressly handled it, so taught also St. Thomas in this article to the first objection, and more clearly on I, distinction 28, question 1, article 1, to the first; Capreolus, on question 1, article 1, in the conclusion; Durandus, on question 1; Canaietanus; and Cajetan on question 32, article 3, and on this very article: all of whom, except Cajetan, add that the negation which the expressed name "unbegotten" signifies is not a pure negation, but a privation in a certain manner, without imperfection; not because it is the negation of a form in a subject which was apt by nature to have the opposite form (for not to have that would be an imperfection), but because it is the negation of a form which in another like subject of the same nature is apt to be present. For "unbegotten" signifies the negation of every procession of which the Son and Holy Spirit are such as are of the same nature with the Father and are capable.

Moreover, the aforesaid doctors teach materially and directly that what is signified under that negative name is the ratio of the first principle; for the first and simplest things are better known to us by negation, as we proved from Aristotle in disputation 137, chapter 5; by reason of which we there also said that "unbegotten" is the notion of the Father, because to the ratio of a notion there belongs some dignity according to our mode of understanding. And by what ratio this notion differs from the notion of paternity was explained in that place.

Further, St. Thomas in this article, to the first objection, refutes St. Bonaventure's opinion in this, that he said the name "unbegotten" does not signify a mere negation, but also something positive; for Bonaventure says that it denotes not to be from another, and to be the fontal origin and the universal principle of the other persons; and on this score the Angelic Doctor impugns it. Because from this it would follow that innascibility is not a notion distinct from paternity and from filiation: for the universal ratio of principle does not constitute a distinct property and notion from this or that principle, as we noted on question 33, in the annotations on article 3. Therefore, since the ratio of universal principle and fontal plenitude is common to this and that (as a genus or species is common to its inferiors), there will not be a distinct notion from paternity and spiration.

But this reason proves little against St. Bonaventure; for since he himself asserts that by that name there is signified not only a negation, but also something positive, he does not contend that both are signified formally and expressly on an equal footing; rather the negation first and formally; the positive, however, materially, yet directly, as we have already explained. Then, when he says that the material and positive signification is the ratio of fontal plenitude and of the universal principle, he does not understand a ratio common according to predication after the mode of a genus or species, but the ratio of the first principle, which is expressed neither by paternity nor by spiration. For "fount," as we said in disputation 139, chapter 5, does not signify a principle in any way whatsoever, but the first principle, which befits the Father alone, who is a principle without a principle: for the Son is a principle, not as a fount, but as a stream; because He is a principle from a principle. But this ratio is not sufficiently expressed by paternity alone, nor by paternity and spiration together, as we said in disputation 137, chapter 5; while the dignity of the Father under the ratio of the first person is aptly signified for us by the negation of every procession, which is innascibility.

But when St. Bonaventure adds that by this notion there is also denoted the ratio of the universal principle, he means the very same thing: for he understands a ratio abstract and common of principle (for "universal," as St. Thomas says, would not be a different notion from paternity and spiration; rather it would be the common principle of all persons that proceed), as if he were to say, of all that proceed; which is the very same thing as the ratio of the first principle and fount. For a fount is a universal principle of whatever streams flow from it. Therefore St. Thomas did not impugn the positive signification of this negation, since he plainly concedes it; but he thought that it had been badly assigned by St. Bonaventure, although in fact he feels nothing different from what St. Bonaventure thought.

Objicitur: But some object in this way. Even if the Father were not the spirator and principle of the Holy Spirit, He would be unbegotten, that is, proceeding from no other, as is evident; therefore "unbegotten" does not signify, so far as regards the material, the universal principle, that is, spiration and paternity together, in which the ratio of the universal principle consists; or (which is the same) the negation signified by the name "unbegotten" does not arise from the positive ratio of paternity and spiration together, in which the ratio of the universal principle is constituted.

Diluitur. It is answered: this negation does not arise from those two relations taken together, but from the prerogative and subsistence of the first principle; and "universal principle" does not mean a common notion after the mode of a genus, but the first fontal origin, from which, at least remotely, every person proceeds. For the Father would still be first principle and fount with respect to the Son, even if, per impossibile, He did not spirate; and in the actual order He is called "universal principle" because from Him, as from a fount, both processions have their origin - proximate as to one, but remote as to the other - so that from one source each person is originated.

From the Fathers also Basil, Cyril, John Damascene, and Nicetas - whom we alleged in the same place - plainly attest that by that name there is signified some personal mode. If some there also say clearly that this name denotes rather that which is not in God than that which is, nothing hinders; for they speak of the express and formal signification, not of the material and direct one: just as certain names which signify some divine attribute and other perfections formally and expressly denote rather that which God is not than that which He is - such as "incorporeal," "impassible" - because in that way, by our mode of knowing, He is sometimes more readily asserted according to divine perfections. But whether that positive thing, which we have said is signified by this name "unbegotten," is absolute or relative, can easily be gathered from what has been said in disputation 137, chapter 5. The Fathers, for their part, being content to contend against Eunomius and Arius, insist that by that name there is not signified the substance, that is, the essence of God - for on that ground the Arians inferred that the Father and the Son were different substances and natures, since the Father was called "unbegotten" and the Son "begotten" - but whether it signifies something absolute or some relation, they do not dispute.[451]

Porro, if we consider only the expressed and formal signification, which is negation, we ought not to number among relative names that of Unbegotten, because it signifies not the negation of generation and nativity which is proper to the Son, but of any procession whatsoever: for thus it is commonly employed by the Fathers and the Scholastics, as we noted in the preceding chapter, and thus Unbegotten will in the same way pertain to the relatives. Next, just as procession, taken universally, is not a proper notion, because it is a universal predicate which does not constitute a distinct notion over and against particulars, so too Unbegotten by reason of negation alone ought not to constitute a proper notion: therefore it is necessary that it constitute a distinct notion by reason of its material signification, which is different from that of the others, as we proved in disputation 138, chapter 5. However, granted that when we distinguish the person of the Father by innascibility from the other two, we must understand that innascibility as actually referred to them, nevertheless, because in a certain prior consideration of ours we can think of him before he generates, it is a great question whether he is suitably understood by us to be constituted by something absolute or by something relative; and whether, as innascible, he can then be comprehended under an absolute concept or under a relative concept: a difficulty which truly demands greater discussion and must be examined expressly in disputation 159.

451. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1; St. Thomas, I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, a. 1; Summa theologiae I, q. 33, a. 4 ad 1; Capreolus, In I Sent., q. 1, a. 1 (conclusion); Durandus, In I Sent., q. 1; Cajetan, In I, q. 32, a. 3; In I, q. 33, a. 4. Aristotelian appeal: cf. Vazquez, disputation 137, cap. 5; on "fount" as first principle, disputation 139, cap. 5.

I pass over, however, the arguments by which Nazianzen, Cyril, and Nicetas prove that Unbegotten does not signify the essence of God - especially because it is a negative name, signifying rather what God is not than what he is - which reasoning, in my judgment, does not prove much. For we are accustomed to signify the essence, or its attributes (which is the same), by negative names: as Infinite, Immense, etc. The principal reason, rather, is taken from the principles of faith: because, since the Father and the Son are of the same nature and substance, if the Father is called unbegotten and the Son begotten - since these names are opposed in signification - they could not in any way be referred to the essence, or to the things which are other than the essence. For these are the same in the Father and the Son. Wherefore Basil, Cyril, Damascene, and Nicetas, whom we cited in disputation 138, chapter 5, rightly said that this name denotes not the substance, nor the existence, but the mode of existence, which they call the hypostatic or characteristic property.[452]

Moreover, Augustine in book five On the Trinity, chapters 6 and 7, in order to prove against those same Arians that Unbegotten does not signify the substance, but the notion of the person, shows that it does not signify something absolute and as to itself, but something relative - not because the signified of this name is some relation, but because it denotes the negation of a relation, and negation seems to look to the same thing to which even the habit (in the broad sense) looks: and since it signifies the negation of generation, which in the Son is a relation, it will also be among those things which are said not with respect to themselves but with respect to something else. This seems to be confirmed by the common doctrine of the Scholastics, who, against Scotus, teach that in the divine things which are absolute, and as such are signified, the concepts are common and essential; but that the personal properties are relations only, since no person is constituted by absolute properties: whether this has been defined by the Church, or is certain among the Fathers of the Church, we shall say in disputation 159.[453] I for my part judge that the name Unbegotten is not only among those things which are said with respect to another and not with respect to itself, by reason of the expressed and direct signification, which is negation (to which alone Augustine seems to have attended), but also by reason of the material signification, which we said to be paternity itself under the notion of first principle. For the negation in question

452. Basil, Cyril, John Damascene, and Nicetas, cited above in disputation 138, cap. 5.
453. On the Communis doctrina vs. Scotus, and whether this is defined by the Church, see disputation 159.

does not arise from both those relations of the first person, but from paternity alone under the aspect of first principle: for the first and universal principle are the same; although the Father did not spirate together with the Son, he would nonetheless be the principle of the Holy Spirit, at least remotely, by reason of which he would be distinguished from him, as we shall say in disputation 147, chapter 7; and he would be called the universal principle, or the fount (which is the same): because, just as every water springs from the fount proximately or remotely, so too both persons would proceed from the Father.[454]

From among the Fathers, Basil, Cyril, Damascene, and Nicetas, whom we alleged in the same place, clearly hold that by that name there is signified some mode of the person. That some, likewise cited there, say that this name denotes rather what is not in God than what is, is no obstacle; for they speak of the expressed and formal signification, not of the material and direct: just as other names signifying some attributes of God and positive perfections denote rather what God is not than what he is, as Incorruptible - for sometimes our knowledge is borne better to the perfections of God by negations, as was noted in disputation 22, chapter 4.[455]

But whether the positive element which we said is signified by this name Unbegotten be absolute or relative, can easily be gathered from what has been said in disputation 137, chapter 5. The Fathers, for their part, being content to contend against Eunomius and Arius, insist that by that name there is not signified the substance, that is, the essence of God - for on that ground the Arians inferred that the Father and the Son were different substances and natures, since the Father was called "unbegotten" and the Son "begotten" - but whether it signifies something absolute or some relation, they do not dispute.[456] And indeed, if Unbegotten signified what is unfashioned and uncreated, and Begotten what is made and created, the name Unbegotten would signify the essence. Thus Nazianzen in Oration 3 On Theology, which is the thirty-fifth, at number 36, and Nicetas in the oration on Nazianzen the twenty-third, which is in praise of the philosopher Heron, in those words "That too," teach the same; likewise Dionysius Alexandrinus, Ignatius, Athanasius, Basil, Cyril, Damascene, and Ambrose, adduced by us above in chapters one and two; nor do they contend for anything else against the Arians than that by this reason they defend that the Son of God is homoousios with the Father, that is, of the same substance with him. But whether it signifies something absolute or some relation, they do not dispute.

Quaestio XXXIV - On the person of the Son

Then we must consider the person of the Son. Now three names are attributed to the Son: namely Son, Word, and Image. But the account of "Son" is considered from the account of "Father." Whence it remains to be considered concerning the Word and the Image.

454. On "fount" as universal principle and the Father's principium of the Spirit, cf. disputation 147, cap. 7.

455. On negative names and our cognition of divine perfections, cf. disputation 22, cap. 4.

456. For the patristic polemic against Eunomius and Arius on "unbegotten," see also St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1; St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 1, a. 1; Summa theologiae I, q. 33, a. 4 ad 1; Capreolus, In I Sent., q. 1, a. 1 (concl.); Durandus, In I Sent., q. 1; Cajetan, In I, q. 32, a. 3; In I, q. 33, a. 4.

Concerning the Word three things are asked.

Articulus I - Whether the Word in God is a personal name

Objicitur. It seems that the Word in God is not a personal name.

1) Personal names are said properly in the divine, as Father and Son. But "word" is said metaphorically in the divine, as Origen says upon John. Therefore "word" is not personal in the divine.[457]

2) Moreover, according to Augustine in the book On the Trinity, the Word is knowledge with love. And according to Anselm in the Monologion, to speak in the supreme Spirit is nothing other than to contemplate by thinking. But knowledge, and thought, and intuition are said essentially in the divine. Therefore "word" is not said personally in the divine.[458]

3) Moreover, it belongs to the ratio of "word" that it be said. But according to Anselm, just as the Father is intelligent, and the Son is intelligent, and the Holy Spirit is intelligent, so the Father is speaking, the Son is speaking, and the Holy Spirit is speaking, and similarly each of them is so called. Therefore the name "word" is said essentially in the divine, and not personally.[459]

4) Moreover, no divine person is made. But the word of God is something made. For it is said in Psalm 148: "Fire, hail, snow, ice, spirit of tempests, which perform his word." Therefore "word" is not a personal name in the divine.

But on the contrary: Augustine says in book 7 On the Trinity: "As the son is referred to the father, so too the word to that of which it is the word." But "son" is a personal name, because it is said relatively. Therefore so too "word."]

Respondetur: I answer that the name "Word" in the divine, if it be taken properly, is a personal name, and in no way essential. For the evidence of this, it must be known that "word" is said properly in us in a threefold way; and in a fourth way it is said improperly or figuratively. It is more manifest and more common in us to call "word" that which is uttered by the voice, which indeed proceeds from the interior with respect to two things which are found in the exterior word, namely the voice itself and the signification of the voice. For the voice signifies the concept of the intellect, according to the Philosopher in book 1 On Interpretation; and again the voice proceeds from signification or from the imagination, as is said in book 2 On the Soul.[460] But a voice which is not significant cannot be called a "word." Hence an exterior voice is called a word because it signifies the interior concept of the mind. Thus then, first and principally, the interior concept of the mind is called a "word"; secondarily, the very voice which signifies the interior concept; thirdly, the very imagination of the voice is called a "word." And these three modes of "word" Damascene posits in book 1, chapter 17, saying that "word" is the natural motion of the intellect according to which it is moved and understands and thinks, as light and splendor with respect to the first; again, "word" is

457. Origen, Commentary on John; cf. also the use "metaphorice dicitur" noted in the schools.
458. St. Augustine, De Trinitate; St. Anselm, Monologion.
459. St. Anselm, Monologion.
460. Aristotle, On Interpretation I; On the Soul II.

that which is not uttered by a spoken word, but is pronounced in the heart, with respect to the third; again, "word" is the Angel, that is, the messenger of intelligence, with respect to the second.[461] But figuratively, in a fourth mode, "word" is that which is signified or effected by a word: as we are accustomed to say, "This is the word which I said to you," or "which the King commanded," when some deed is shown which was signified by the word, whether simply enunciated or even commanded.

But "word" is said properly in God according as "word" signifies the concept of the intellect. Whence Augustine says in the fifteenth book On the Trinity: "Whoever can understand a word, not only before it sounds, but also before the images of its sounds are involved in thought, can already see some likeness of that Word of which it was said: In the beginning was the Word" (John 1:1).[462]

Now the very concept of the heart by its very notion has that it proceed from another, namely from the knowledge of the one conceiving. Hence "word," in the sense in which it is said properly in the divine, signifies something proceeding from another, which pertains to the notion of personal names in the divine, in that the divine persons are distinguished according to origin, as has been said (q. 27, arts. 3, 4, 5). Wherefore it must be that the name "Word," in the sense in which it is taken properly in the divine, is not taken essentially, but personally only.

Reply to the first: The Arians, whose source is found to be Origen, posited that the Son is other than the Father in diversity of substance. Whence they attempted, when the Son of God is called "Word," to assert that it is not properly said, lest under the notion of a "word" proceeding they should be forced to confess that the Son of God is not outside the substance of the Father. For the interior word proceeds from the speaker in such a way that it remains in him. But it is necessary, if the "word of God" be posited as said metaphorically, that the "word of God" be posited as said properly. For nothing can be called a "word" metaphorically except by reason of manifestation: because either it manifests like a word, or it is manifested by a word. If, however, it is manifested by a word, one must posit a "word" by which it is manifested. But if it is called a "word" because it outwardly manifests those things which are outwardly manifested, they are not called "words" except insofar as they signify the interior concept of the mind, which one also manifests by exterior signs. If therefore "word" is sometimes said metaphorically in the divine, still one must posit a "word" properly so called, which is said personally.

Reply to the second: Nothing of those things which pertain to the intellect is said personally in the divine, save only "Word." For only "Word" signifies something emanating from another. For that which pertains to the intellect - such as knowledge, thought, and intuition - does not of itself import procession, but rather an essential act; whereas "Word," as properly taken, imports an origin in the intellect, and thus alone among the intellectual notions is said personally in the divine.

... what the intellect, in conceiving, forms is the word. But the intellect itself, according as it is in act by an intelligible species, is considered absolutely. And likewise "to understand," which is related to the intellect in act as "to be" is to being in act. For "to understand" does not signify an action going forth from the knower, but abiding in the knower. When, therefore, it is said that the word is knowledge, knowledge is not taken for the act of the knowing intellect, nor for any habit of it, but for that which the intellect conceives in knowing. Whence also St. Augustine says that the word is begotten wisdom, which is nothing else than the very conception of the wise man; which likewise can in the same way be called begotten knowledge.[463] And by the same mode can be understood what it is to say in God, namely, to behold by thinking, inasmuch as the word of God is conceived by the intuition of the divine thought. Yet the name "thought" does not properly befit the word of God. For Augustine says, De Trinitate XV, thus is that word of God said, that "thought" be not said, lest something as it were rolling be believed to be in God, which takes on form in order to be a word, and can let it go, and be rolled about formlessly. For thought properly consists in the inquiry of truth, which has no place in God. But when the intellect has already attained to the form of truth, it does not think, but perfectly contemplates the truth. Whence Anselm improperly takes "thought" for "contemplation."[464]

461. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 17.
462. St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 10 (med.).

Reply to the third: Just as, properly speaking, "word" is said personally in the divine and not essentially, so too "to say." Hence, just as "word" is not common to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, so it is not true that the Father and the Son and the Spirit have been made one "speaker." Whence Augustine says, De Trinitate VII, that by that eternal word not a singular intellect is understood in the divine, but it befits us to speak concerning the principle of any person. For not only "word" is said, but also "the thing which is understood or signified by the word." Therefore, in that mode in which "word" is said, it befits only one person in the divine to be so called. But in that mode in which "the thing understood in the word" is said, it befits any person to be so called: for the Father, by understanding himself, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and all other things that are contained in his knowledge, conceives the word - so that thus the whole Trinity is said by the word, and also every creature. As the intellect of a man, by the word which he conceives in understanding a stone, "says" it. But Anselm improperly took "to say" for "to understand." Yet they differ: for "to understand" imports only the relation of the knower to the thing understood, in which no aspect of origin is imported, but only a certain informing in our intellect, inasmuch as our intellect is in act through the form of the thing understood. In God, however, it imports complete identity, because in God intellect and the understood are altogether the same, as was shown above.[465] But "to say" principally imports a relation to the conceived word: for to say is nothing else than to utter the word. Yet through the mediation of the word it imports a relation to the thing understood, which is manifested to the knower in the uttered word. And thus only the person who utters the word is "the one saying" in the divine, although nonetheless each of the persons is knower and known, and consequently "said by the word."

463. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, c. 2.
464. St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 16 (at the beginning).
465. Above, q. 14, a. 2 and a. 4.

Reply to the fourth: The word is taken there figuratively, inasmuch as the thing signified or the effect of the word is called "word." For thus creatures are said to "do the word of God," insofar as they execute some effect toward which they are ordained by the word conceived by the divine wisdom: as one is said to "do the word of the king" when he performs the deed which is appointed by the king's word.

Dubitatio circa Articulum.

Conclusion: The "word" according as it is properly taken in the divine is a personal name.

Concerning the doctrine of the article there is a doubt: why St. Thomas enumerated all the acceptions of "word" in this order - so that in the first place he set the mental word, in the second the vocal word, and in the third the imaginative word. For either (as Cajetan says) he observed the order as regards us, and thus in the first place he ought to have put the vocal word, because that is best known to us; or he observed the natural order, and thus in the second place he ought to have put the imaginative word, and in the third the vocal word - for the imaginative word is prior, according to the order of cause, to the vocal word. Cajetan answers that the order among the things signified by some name is not to be attended according to the nature of cause and effect: for the sun is said to be "hot," because it is the cause of heat; and yet it is not said to be prior in being hot than the other things which it makes hot; but that is the prior signified of the name (he says) in which the notion signified by the name is found intrinsically and formally, and that is posterior in which it is found extrinsically. Therefore, although the sun, which is the cause of heat, is said "hot" later than the rest which by it are made hot - because in the others heat is formally and intrinsically, but in the sun only extrinsically - so, although the imaginative word is by nature prior to the vocal word because it is the cause of it, nevertheless the imaginative word is said "word" extrinsically, but the vocal word formally and intrinsically; and thus the notion of "word" belongs to the vocal word prior to the imaginative word.

However, this doctrine of Cajetan is against the mind of St. Thomas in the article: for he teaches that "word" is employed in four ways - indeed in the three already enumerated, and in a fourth for the thing itself signified. He adds then that only in this fourth way "word" is said improperly and metaphorically; but in the other three properly. Therefore he thinks that only in that fourth way "word" is said by extrinsic denomination.[466]

Durandus, on the Sentences I, dist. 27, q. 22, n. 27, teaches that "word" properly is said only of the concept of the mind, but of the voice metaphorically, because the ratio of what is signified is found in the voice only by extrinsic denomination, but in the concept formally and intrinsically - whereas it belongs to the notion of "word" to be a sign.[467] This opinion does not please me - not because the external voice is called "word" by its nature without free imposition (as Cajetan falsely supposed), but because the term "word" (verbum) was first imposed to signify the vocal word, which by human institution signifies, and from that it was derived to denote the concept of the heart. And it cannot be that it would signify improperly and metaphorically that to signify which it was first imposed. Nor does it stand in the way that the vocal word signifies by the free will of men (as Durandus said), and so is said to signify by extrinsic denomination. For since the term "word" was imposed to signify in the first place this sign of voice, nothing prevents that signification by the institution of men from making the term "word" properly and primarily denote the very vocal word.

466. Cajetan, In I, q. 34, a. 1 (on the enumeration of the senses of "word").
467. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 27, q. 22, n. 27.

Wherefore I for my part judge that even the vocal word is properly called "word"; likewise the word of the mind and of imagination. And indeed concerning the word of the intellect some have wrongly supposed that it is called "word" improperly and metaphorically - a view which the Canarian rightly marks in the first article, question 27. For from it there follows that the Son of God is called Word improperly and metaphorically, because he proceeds by the intellect - which is absurd. On that account, however, we ought not to assert that this term "word" was not derived by human speech to God, albeit without impropriety and metaphor. And when the holy Fathers sometimes acknowledge here some trace of impropriety and metaphor, they should be understood as we said in disputation 22, chapter 4.[468] But that the term "word" befits more the word of the mind than the vocal word, Augustine teaches, De Trinitate XV, c. 11, whose judgment St. Thomas follows in this article, and the other Scholastics in I, dist. 27.[469]

Concerning the order, however, in which St. Thomas enumerated them, there is not much reason to be anxious, since Augustine, in the book On the Knowledge of True Life, c. 14, and St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, c. 18, rehearse these in another order. But some think that the word of imagination and of mind - which is properly called "word" - are not taken in the same way: for by "word of the mind" we name the expressed quality which is the actual representation of the object; but we do not call the "word of imagination" an expressed quality, although this too is found in imagination, indeed in any other sensing faculty.

But they call "word of imagination" the very vocal word as objected by us: for before we speak the vocal word itself, we think it in imagination; which, although it have no other kind of existence than objective, is truly called "word," just as an objective man is truly said "man." If, however, the quality expressed in imagination, after the manner of that which the intellect expresses, were called "word of imagination," then any other species expressed in any sensing faculty whatever would be called "word," which is absurd. For just as the other faculties are not said to "speak," nor are they said to "express a word," so too imagination is said to "speak," not because it expresses the species of the thing which it apprehends, but because the word that is to be carried forth by voice is apprehended in it.

I for my part judge that the "word of imagination" is also the expressed quality itself: because it inwardly affects the imaginative sense, and, by a certain participation of the intellect which it has from its conjunction with the intellect, imagination is called "to speak inwardly," insofar as it thinks; and it is said not only to apprehend the vocal word, but also already to speak with itself about the thing. Yet that expressed quality of imagination is not called "word" because it is spoken, 468. On negative names and the mode of predication, cf. disputation 22, c. 4.

469. St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 11; cf. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 27.

but rather because it is, as it were, a "saying" of some thought thing - wherefore we properly call the expressed of our mind a "word," as we shall say in the following disputation, chapter 4. But the species expressed of smell or of hearing or of another sense is not called "word" nor "saying," but only "sensation": because "saying" and "word" are proper to the rational power, or to that which in some way participates in the influx of reason - which in us is imagination alone. For the other senses have nothing of reason, nor any connection with it; whereas imagination, although it does not wield reason, yet in a certain way participates in it.

Next it must be noted that the notion of "word" is not univocal in the mental and the vocal word. For to things of such diverse qualities one and the same proximate common notion cannot befit, since they are not under the same proximate genus: the one is spiritual, the other bodily.

facultate sentiente. But they call the word of imagination the very word of voice as the object of our imagination; for before we speak the very word of voice, we think it with imagination; and although it does not yet have the existence of existence, but only objective being, it is truly called a word, just as a man thought is truly called a man. But if the quality expressed in imagination were said to be a word in the manner of that which the intellect expresses, then any other species expressed in whatever sensing faculty would in like manner be called a word, which is absurd. For as the other faculties are not said to speak, so neither are they said to express a word: but imagination is said to speak, not because it expresses the species of the thing which it apprehends, but because it inwardly apprehends the word that is to be uttered by voice. Yet I for my part think that the word of imagination is also that very quality expressed by which we inwardly think some thing: for by a participation of the intellect, which it has from its conjunction with it, the imagination of man is said to speak inwardly, by that very fact that it thinks; and it is said not only to apprehend the word of voice, but also to speak inwardly with itself. But that quality expressed in imagination is not called a word because it is said, but rather because it is a kind of diction of the thing thought, as we shall say about the word of our mind in the next disputation, chapter 4. But a species expressed either of sight, or of hearing, or of another sense, is not called a word nor a diction, but is called only a sensation; because diction and word are proper to the rational power, or to that which in some way participates in the influx of the rational, such as in us is imagination alone: for the other senses have nothing of reason, nor are they thus connected to it as imagination is, nor does reason depend on them as it does on imagination. Next it must be noted that the notion of "word" is not univocal in the mental word and the vocal: to such different qualities one and the same proximate common notion cannot befit, since they are not under the same proximate genus, as is evident: the one is spiritual, the other bodily.

Caput I - On ancient and recent heretics, and that, the mystery of the Trinity admitted, the Son is properly called the Word

Setting aside the ancient and the more recent heretics, who either against the Trinity of persons (personae), or against the equality of them taught, and hence either denied the person of the Word, or removed its property altogether - about whom enough has already been said in disputation 108 and those following - there were also others called Alogians, in Greek alogoi, as Epiphanius remembers in heresy 51, and Augustine in De haeresibus, heresy 30, who denied the Word in the divine and, lest the error be refuted, did not accept the Gospel of John and his Apocalypse, as Epiphanius at the end of that chapter and Augustine attest: perhaps for the same reason they also denied the Epistles of John; and the name alogoi, he says, was imposed on them by Epiphanius; he himself also testifies to this.[470] Against these among the more recent wrote Alphonsus Castro, book 4, Against Heresies, "Verbum Deus," heresy 7; and, as he himself writes, and Prateolus in the Catalogue of Heresies, under "Alogi," and Sander, book 7, On the Visible Monarchy, heresy 29, in the time of Pope Soter and the Emperor Commodus, in the year 180. But by what reason these denied the word in God neither Epiphanius nor Augustine explains, namely, whether because they thought it was not a second person, or that it was not produced, or that it was a pure creature: I suspect, however, that the heresy of these was that of the Jews and of the Sabellians denying the plurality of persons; for Athanasius seems to have made mention of it in the oration against the Gregalians, the little words of Sabellius near the beginning of these words. For they ascribe to the Word such a thing as men conceive in their own mind, and attribute such a wisdom as that which is of our mind; and therefore they asserted God to be one person with the word, just as we call man one with his reason and with the concepts of words in his mind, thinking nothing more. Wherefore the Evangelist, with those Jews in view who do not receive the Evangelists, immediately at the beginning cried out: "In the beginning was the Word" (John 1), where he shows for what cause those heretics, who with the Jews also as Sabellians thought, did not accept the Gospel of John.

Otherwise Cyril, in book 7 of the Thesaurus, chapter 3, reports that Eunomius denied the Son of God to be the Word, because, to wit, a word is the utterance of voice; but a son is an animal: and by the same reason he said that the wisdom of the Father was not, because wisdom is not an animal: and therefore, as Cyril reports in chapter 4, the same Eunomius asserted that the Son of God is called "his word" in Scripture, not because according to nature he is from the Father, or because he is himself a son inwardly in and connatural to the Father, but because, hearing the word of the Father (he understands a word of voice), he announces to us; just as sanctification also is called son, because it sanctifies.[471]

But Cyril in that same place, chapter 3, answers that the notion of word and of wisdom is different in God and in men: in these indeed neither is subsistent, but in God it subsists. He also attacks him for having called the Son of God an animal, since an animal is that which participates in life; but the Word of God is life itself. And in that same chapter 4 he thus objects to Eunomius: As the Son is not sanctification by a participation of holiness, so neither is he a word by a participation of the word: but he would be by a mere participation, if for this sole reason he were called a word, that he announces to us a word of voice received from the Father.

But against these heretics, in so far as they agreed with the Sabellians and Arians, there is now no need to make delay, as I noted at the beginning: wherefore it only remains to prove that, the mystery of the Trinity admitted, as Catholics in reality confess, the Son of God is said by John to be properly called "the Word": for thus he says in the first chapter, and in the First Epistle, chapter 5, as is known to all: so too the Fathers commonly call the second person in the Trinity the Word, as we said in disputations 111 and 112; for concerning the heresy of Valentinus we shall speak in the next article.

470. Epiphanius, Panarion (Adversus haereses) haer. 51; St. Augustine, De haeresibus, haer. 30.
471. St. Cyril of Alexandria, Thesaurus de sancta et consubstantiali Trinitate, lib. 7, cap. 3 - 4.

Nevertheless it must be noted that the Word of God can also be called "discourse" (sermo), as Augustine observed in tractate 108 on John, explaining that of John 17, "Thy discourse is thy truth": so also calls it Lactantius, book 4, Divine Institutes, chapter 8; Tertullian, book Against Praxeas, chapters 5 and 6, and Against Marcion, book 2, chapter 27; Cyprian, book 2, Against the Jews, explaining that Psalm 44, "My heart has uttered a good word." And indeed the Greek word logos we can render into Latin either as verbum or as sermo. Wherefore Erasmus is to be reproved, not because, following the reading of those Fathers, he himself rendered that of John, "In principio erat verbum," as "In principio erat sermo," but, as the Canariensis well noted on the first article of question 27, disputation 6, question 2, because in the annotations on that place he said that "discourse" is much better translated than "word": in which he is manifestly deceived. For "discourse" is some aggregate out of several dictiones; but "word" signifies only one simple dictio: and thus it more aptly denotes the simplicity of the second person.

Then it must be observed with St. Thomas in the solution to the second, that therefore the Arians and Eunomians denied in God the "word," because they said it was not consubstantial to the Father. Add that the Sabellians therefore also denied the "word," because they believed there was only one person in God: but if these conceded three persons, and the two former said that the Son was of the same substance with the Father, they would not hesitate to assert him produced by the intellect of the Father, and hence to be properly his word; so that Durandus should be ashamed, who denies that the Son of God proceeds by the intellect, as we saw in disputation 111, and teaches that he is called "Word" by mere appropriation, as we shall see in the following chapter.

Caput II - Various opinions of the Schoolmen

Although Catholics confess that the second person in the Trinity is called "the Word," yet on the question whether "word" properly befits the essence (essentia), or the person (persona), not all think in the same way. I shall therefore set forth in this chapter the opinions of others, that in the next I may expound the truer.

The first is that of Durandus in the First Book of the Sentences, distinction 27, question 3, who affirms that "word" in God is properly predicated essentially, but that it befits the second person only by appropriation. When he says that it befits by appropriation, he does not understand in that way in which common and essential names are sometimes accommodated to the persons, as the name Love; for these properly, that is, not metaphorically and improperly, befit the persons: but he understands that the name "Word" is appropriated to the Son by similitude; because, although he should not proceed by the intellect, as he thinks, nevertheless his production, since it is prior in origin, is likened to procession by the intellect, which is prior to procession by the will.

But there are others who say that it is indeed a common name and essentially agrees with God by reason of essential cognition, just as wisdom and love, yet is appropriated to the Son because his generation is through an act of understanding, just as love is appropriated to the Holy Spirit because he proceeds through an act of will: these opinions are more distant from the sentence of Durandus: for these do not assert that the Son is "Word" only by similitude, but that in reality he properly proceeds by the intellect; whereas Durandus affirms that the second person proceeds only by similitude as "word."

A third opinion is that which St. Thomas there reports of certain men, who used to say that "word" is always taken notionally in God; but that the act of "saying" can be taken essentially and notionally: first indeed, as it is the same as "to understand," essentially, and in this way he has not "word." Second, it is taken for the act of creation, according to that of Genesis, "God said: Be light" (Gen. 1:3), and in this way too he has not "word"; yet it is thus taken essentially. Third, it is used for the act of external generation, and so he has "word." The same opinion was followed by others, as Durandus reports, who used to say, just as the authors aforesaid: "word" is always taken notionally for the second person, but the act of "saying" essentially and notionally: essentially indeed, for that which is to express and to manifest something in a word; and in this way, they asserted, the three persons manifest something in the second, which is the word produced; but notionally, for the act by which the Father produces the second person, which act befits the Father alone.

Tam actum dicendi, quam verbum in divinis solum sumi notionaliter, verior sententia est.

Caput III - That both the act of saying and the Word in the divine are taken only notionally; the truer sentence

I for my part think that the common sentence is to be embraced, which not only St. Thomas hands down in this article, which Cajetan and the more recent authors follow there; but also, as the same Cajetan noted, the former one which in the First Book of the Sentences and elsewhere he had taught, he tacitly retracted. With these agree the Master in the First Book, distinction 27, question 2; Scotus there, question 2; Gabriel, question 3, article 102; nor does St. Bonaventure dissent, Part 2 of that distinction, question 1, where although he says that "word" is taken in God in two ways, in one way when God speaks inwardly, and in this way it is taken notionally; in another way essentially, when he produces a creature outwardly; nevertheless he affirms that in this latter way diction and word...

... therefore he judges that the word, properly taken in God, is employed only notionally.

It is proved first from Scripture, in which the word, or diction, is never ascribed essentially to God, unless when it is narrated that God produced something outwardly; then, however, all grant that it is used improperly. For the thing itself produced outside God is said to be his word, and the production of it is called the saying and speech of God, or some exterior utterance, whereby God is said to have spoken after the manner of a man. By contrast, when mention is made of God's interior word, it is attributed only to the second person, as in John 1, and John 5, and Apocalypse

19, where John says of him whom he saw seated upon a white horse: "And his name is, the Word of God," wherein he plainly denotes his proper name; but that the discourse there is of Christ the Son of God, all agree and it is manifest. On account of which places we reported above that the Alogians denied these books of John to be canonical.[472]

But Durandus replies that the second person is called the Word of God by appropriation, just as the third is called Spirit. For even in that place of the Apocalypse, of the same one who was called Word, John had just before said that he was called faithful and true, and that he judges in justice - three names which are essential, yet seem to be appropriated to the second person. What wonder, then, if also the name of "word" is not proper and notional to him, but appropriated, as the name "spirit" is to the third person?

This subterfuge of Durandus is vain. For although many names are said to be appropriated to the second person which are common and essential to the three persons - and such are those three, faithful, true, and the one who judges with justice - nevertheless we assert this of those things which also in Scripture we see to be common to the three persons; but when nowhere in Scripture nor among the holy Fathers does the name "word" occur as said essentially and as common to the three persons, but is attributed by all to the second person, we can with reason suspect that it was not accommodated by appropriation. Then too, when in that place John says, "And his name is, the Word of God," he plainly understands it as his proper name; for the others which he had said, he had set down not as proper names, but as epithets of him. Of the former he said: "And the one who was sitting upon it was called faithful and true," in the very way in which we commonly express someone's epithets; but of the word he said in this fashion: "His name is, the Word of God," where a special mode is expressed, in which one is wont to be named. For when we are asked after someone's name, we do not answer by commonalities, but by proper identifiers. Moreover, that the name "spirit" is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, St. Thomas teaches below, I, q. 36, a. 1 ad 3.

Secondly it is proved from the Fathers. St. Augustine, On the Trinity, book 5, chapter 13, says in sum: the Son is said relatively, and the word is said relatively; but what is said relatively is notional; for of relation according to its being within God himself Augustine plainly speaks. And in On the Trinity, book 6, chapter 12: the word is taken of the Son alone, not both together; and at the end of the chapter: "One cannot say 'word of word,' for both are not at once word, but only the Son." And in On the Trinity, book 7, chapter 1: "He himself (namely the Father) is not the word, just as neither is he the Son, nor the image"; and chapter 2, at the beginning: "Therefore the Father and the Son are together one essence and one greatness, the way, the truth, and one wisdom; but the Father and the Son together are not one word, because they are not together one Son. For just as the Son is referred to the Father and is not said in reference to himself, so the word is referred to him of whom it is the word when it is called a word. For the Son is that by which he is the word; and the word is that by which he is the Son. Since, therefore, the Father and the Son together are not one Son, it follows that the Father and the Son together are not one word. For this reason they are not 'word,' as they are 'wisdom,' since the word is not said of itself, but only relatively to him of whom it is the word; just as the Son is said relatively to the Father; but wisdom is said essentially; and therefore, because there is one essence, there is one wisdom; and yet the word is wisdom, but not 'word' in the same way as 'wisdom': for the word is understood relatively, but wisdom essentially. Let us take it to be said, therefore, when 'word' is said, as if it were said 'born-wisdom,' so that he may be the Son and the image."[473]

472. Epiphanius, Panarion (Adversus haereses), haer. 51; cf. St. Augustine, De haeresibus, haer. 30.

Many other no less excellent things for our opinion does Augustine teach; but these suffice, in which first consider in the first testimony, when he says that "word" is said relatively, that he altogether denies that it can be taken essentially; for on that account in the latter he opposed "word" to "wisdom," because "word" is taken relatively, but "wisdom" essentially. Therefore it is the same for Augustine to say that something is said relatively as to say that it is not said essentially. Wherefore, if "word" is said relatively, it cannot be said essentially. Add that the names which are appropriated to the persons - such as power to the Father - are not said relatively to another person, unless materially by reason of that other to whom they are attributed. Then note about the second and third testimonies: when he absolutely denies that the Father and the Holy Spirit are the word, and that they are "of the word," he openly indicates that he denies "word" to be a name common and only appropriated to the second person; rather, that it is proper. For if it were a common essential according to the second notion, and appropriated to one person alone, it would not be repugnant to say that "word" is said "of the word," just as "Son" is said "of wisdom," and the Holy Spirit is said "of love," for "God is love." It could also be said that both - namely the Father and the Son - are "word," just as they are called "wisdom," although the name "wisdom" is appropriated - which in the last testimony Augustine does not dare to concede.

Next St. Cyril, book 7 of the Thesaurus, chapter 1, answering the Arians objecting in this way: If the word is consubstantial to the Father, the Father too could be called "Word" - thus he replies: Those who say these things are utterly blind to John; for the word itself he (namely John in that chapter) calls the Son, and seems to have chosen this name as if proper and most signifying of him: "In the beginning" (he says) "was the Word," etc. Therefore Cyril said that by this word, "word," the property of the Son is more expressed: because, as we said in disputation 137, chapter 5, by it is signified not only the kind of sonship of the second person, but also the mode of that procession to be most nearly through the intellect, not through nature, as Durandus falsely thought.[474]

Third, finally, by reason the truth of the opinion is easily proved: for "word" by its nature denotes a real emanation from someone of whom it is the word. Thus St. Basil, in the homily on those words "In the beginning was the Word," after the middle says: "For our heart is as it were a fountain; but the word is an emission as it were a stream flowing out from the fountain." And a little above: "Why is 'word,' as that which proceeds from the mind, shown? For although he speaks about the word of voice, nevertheless he allows that by it that which proceeds from the mind is signified." And Athanasius, in the Epistle on the opinion of Dionysius against the Arians, a little before the end, says thus: "It befits the 'word' to be named for the emanation of the mind; for just as, to speak as of a man, what bursts forth through the tongue is called utterance, without being the word which is in the heart; so since he speaks of both words, of voice and of heart, and says that 'word' is the emanation of the mind, of both he plainly understands that the emanation of the eternal word is explained." The same likeness of our word and the divine word is pursued by Anselm in the Monologion, chapter 31; and he teaches that both our word and the divine proceed by emanation. So also the same Athanasius, in the Epistle on the decrees of the Nicene Synod, a little before the middle, says of the Son of God that whether you think of him as "intelligence" or as "the word of God," you will again have thought that he is from that, without any difference. And although there he numbers essential things which are attributed to him by appropriation alone, yet he did not understand "word" in the same way; for with respect to it he had also said elsewhere, even among human things, that it is a procession. But what in God denotes emanation is not said essentially, but notionally, as is confessed by all: therefore "word" ought always to be used not essentially, but notionally.[475]

473. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V.13; VI.12; VII.1 - 2.
474. St. Cyril of Alexandria, Thesaurus de sancta et consubstantiali Trinitate, lib. 7, cap. 1; cf. lib. 7, cap. 3 - 4.

It remained here to explain how both our word and the divine are compared with the act of saying, and whether its emanation is intellection, or at least diction, and whether in every intellection there is a word or not: yet these we shall more conveniently say in solving the arguments of Durandus in the next chapter.

From what has been said it is inferred, first, that the opinion of Durandus is false, who said that "word," properly taken, is used essentially; but now, that is, by mere appropriation, it is used notionally. Secondly it follows that the second opinion is false, which said that "word" is taken in both ways: since it is settled that it is used only notionally. Third, it is gathered that the third opinion departs further from the truth, since it takes "to say" in another way than "word": for these seem either to be mutually relative, or the same; wherefore, if the one is taken notionally, the other must be taken in the same way. But what he lastly adds, that all the persons express in the word the things which they understand, is most absurd: for that person alone expresses in the word what he understands, who herself produces the word, as all Doctors acknowledge.

Caput IV - The arguments of Durandus are solved

To the first and second argument of Durandus we answer easily: not every intellection, however perfect, is a word, but a word is found only in that intellection which really proceeds from the intelligent. And since the essential cognition in God is the very essence of God, and does not emanate from God in any way, it does not follow that the word is the cause of the things which are understood in it.

But the third argument is difficult, whose solution must be explained - what in us is the act of saying, and what the word is, and what is called in us the word of the mind: whether the expressed species, or rather the very thing itself which is represented by the word. There are some who judge that the act of saying is the production of that physical quality which the intellect produces within itself; but that the quality itself produced is the word, by which formally the intellect is constituted knowing; so that intellection and word are altogether the same; and that to say is not to understand, but is the production of the word itself, and the intellection of it. This view seems to be Scotus's, as we recalled in disputation 112, chapter 18; yet we have already sufficiently proved from the Fathers and by reasons that the intellect's "to say" is formally "to understand" - except that "to say" denotes also a real emanation from the one who says.

475. St. Basil, Homilia in illud "In principio erat verbum"; St. Athanasius, Epistola de sententia Dionysii contra Arianos; Id., Epistola de decretis Nicaenae synodi; St. Anselm, Monologion, cap. 31.

Others say: the very production of the expressed species is diction, and at once formally intellection; but the expressed quality is the word, expressed by that diction and intellection. And thus they answer Durandus's argument, that that intellection rightly has a word; and hence they suppose that both the real production and that (intellection) together are diction; and because in God the essential intellection is not a production, therefore it is not a diction; therefore he does not have a word. This opinion does not please me. For I think that in us intellection is formally the very quality expressed in the mind, by which the object is present to the intellect; and that to understand is nothing else than to be informed by some actual likeness... and this, however, is found much more perfectly in the species itself and in the quality than in the production and coming-to-be of it: therefore that rather is intellection.

Although by means of that quality itself a man renders himself blessed in himself, yet he understands by means of it: for whether it be produced by God alone, or by the intellect itself, it ought always to represent the object in the same way, since the quality would always be the same in itself, and therefore would render the same effect. Although therefore intellection (intellectio) cannot be produced by God alone, but ought to depend upon the intellect actually understanding, nevertheless it is not to be said that it belongs to the notion of intellection directly and formally to be a vital production, but rather that a vital production is something necessarily required in order that there be intellection; because intellection, as intellection, is signified only as an action about the object, which in very truth is not produced, but is known; not however as an action about the very quality inwardly produced: and therefore it is called a grammatical action, that is, one signified by a verb of action, although in reality by it nothing is produced. And this I think Aristotle said, in Metaphysics IX, chapter 9, that by certain actions nothing is produced, as by seeing, intellection, and by the operations of the other senses.[476]

On behalf of the same position there is the fine testimony of Aristotle, On the Soul III, chapter 7, or according to another division chapter 4, where he says: But the sensible thing seems to bring the sensitive power itself from potency to act, and to make it actual; for it does not suffer, nor is it altered. Therefore this is another species of motion. For motion is the act of what is imperfect; but act simply, which indeed is of a perfect thing, is altogether another and different from that. To sense, therefore, and to say only and to understand is similar: as if he were to say that to sense is not the act of something imperfect, just as neither is to understand and to say. But if to sense, to understand, and to say were themselves the action of producing the expressed species (species expressa), without doubt they would be imperfect acts, and the definition of motion given in Physics III, chapter 2, namely, "the act of a being in potency as it is in potency," would suit them; and hence they would be imperfect acts. For that is called imperfect which is in potency to the having - been - made of a form (forma): but such is a subject, insofar as it receives in itself the being - made, and the way to the having - been - made of some form. Since therefore these which we have said - namely, to sense, to understand, and to say - are perfect acts, it follows that they do not consist formally in a being - made and way, but in a form or quality (qualitas) in an achieved being; and in this sense St. Thomas seems to have understood this place of Aristotle, above on q. 18, a. 1

476. Aristotle, Metaphysics IX, c. 9.

Further, that production is not diction (dictio) is shown thus. If it were diction insofar as it is production, then just as that expressed quality is produced, so also would it be said: but no one will affirm that that quality is said; therefore the production of it is not that diction which is production. Perhaps someone will answer, that nothing is more properly said than that quality and the expressed likeness of the thing; for that is the mental word (verbum mentis), and it is proper to a word to be said and pronounced. But although we cannot deny that that quality of the mind is commonly called the mental word, nevertheless that its production is not diction, nor that it is said by our intellect, can easily be shown. For if one asks, What did you say in your mind? no one will answer, the quality and representation of a horse or a man, but by a spoken word he will explicate the thing itself which inwardly he understood or enunciated. Thus, when the Pharisees were slandering the works of Christ, and inwardly were speaking among themselves against him, saying, "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" if someone were to ask Christ what they were saying against him, he would not answer, the quality and mental word of such and such a thing, but by a spoken word he would signify the very thing which they were inwardly thinking, and would say, "They speak against me, and in their mind they say that no one can forgive sins except God." Finally, when someone is asked what he says within, he answers with spoken words: and words of this sort do not signify the formal concept (conceptus formalis) and the expressed quality of the mind, which we call the mental word, but the objective concept (conceptus obiectivus), that is, the thing understood; and they are substituted in place of the formal concept, as we noted in disputation 75, chapter 3. Therefore, since inwardly in our mind we say nothing other than what we are wont outwardly to signify by spoken words, and words signify not the formal concept and quality, but the thing understood; it follows that that quality is not what is said by the mind, and therefore the production of it is not the diction of it.

Objicitur: But you will object what we said above, namely, that diction is properly referred to the word; but the mental word is that quality; whence it follows that that quality rather is said by our intellect than the thing itself.

Respondeo: A word is called something not only because it is said, and its production is its diction, but because it itself is the diction of other things; that is, because by the word itself, as by a diction, things understood are brought forth and are said. And for this sole reason the word of our mind is called a word: wherefore it does not follow that its production is the diction of it: therefore our mind inwardly does not say and speak the word, but only says the thing understood, which it expresses and understands by the word itself.

Objicitur: But you will oppose us with St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, chapter 15, who speaks thus of the word of our mind: "Since our word is called our thought; and again, And our true most inward word is not said except by our thought." Therefore he thinks that the mental word is said by us, and that the word is not the thought (cogitatio), but rather that the diction of the word is the thought itself.

Respondeo: Augustine philosophizes about the word of the mind in a different way than the Scholastics speak. For he thought that a word is not produced in the mind by any act whatsoever of intellection and thought, but that when after much inquiry and doubt at length there arises in us a determinate knowledge and thought of a thing; whereas by that thought by which we are still inquiring and doubting he judged that no word is produced; and yet he did not doubt that that thought is a certain expressed quality of the thing which we understand and think under doubt: therefore he did not think that the expression or production of the expressed species is the diction of the same. Of this, at the beginning of the chapter he says a little: "But when we doubt, there is not yet a word about the thing about which we doubt, but there is a word about the very doubting; for although we do not yet know whether that about which we doubt is true, yet we do know that we doubt." When he concedes a "word of doubting," he understands it to be the reflex knowledge which we have about the doubting; for he does not call the very concept by which we doubt about the thing a word, indeed he denies it to be a word. For if he thought it to be the word of anything, most of all of the thing itself, since it cannot be the word of itself; but he said that the thing is not a word. And a little below: "But what is it that can be a word, and therefore is now worthy of the name of word? What is it, into which this formable, and not yet formed, passes, unless something of our mind which we toss to and fro with a certain rolling notion, when by us now this, now that, as it has been found or has occurred, is thought; and then it becomes a true word, when that which we used to toss with a rolling notion we have brought to that which we know, and from thence it is formed, taking its every way likeness, so that just as each thing is said, so also it is thought?" This forthwith, he says, he would call a word, lest he seem to labor about a controversy of a word: as if he were to say, If another calls something else in the mind the mental word, I do not make a difficulty; therefore Augustine calls the mental word the certain knowledge which we have about a thing, or a certain judgment after the investigation of thought and intellect: and he says that the diction of the word is the preceding thought: but he never calls the production of any expressed species "diction," nor every expressed quality a "word." He subjoins indeed: "For our thought, coming to that which we know, and from thence being formed, is our true word." Where he calls the very formed knowledge of the thing the expressed word, and, as it were, the word said by the thought of investigation. Finally he adds that the word of God is without thought, not because it is not produced by intellection, but because since thought in Augustine's view is with inquiry, and in God there is no inquiry, there is no thought in him, nor is his word produced by thought: for Augustine himself there admits that the production of our interior word is not similar to the production of the divine word.[478]

478. St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 15.

Let us conclude therefore that the word of our mind is an expressed quality, which is the very intellection of the object, and that this is the same as the diction, not of itself, but of the thing understood; for that which is properly said is the thing understood or signified, not the very quality of the mind: indeed even if we speak of the exterior word, we do not so properly assert that the word itself is said, as that the thing signified by the word is said: yet we affirm both of the exterior word; because by the figure metonymy the word is used for the thing, and the thing for the word, as the container for the contained, and conversely. But the interior word, which is the expressed species and the very intellection of the mind, is not what is said, but only the thing understood: the quality indeed is the word, and the diction itself is the nature of the word: for it is not so proper to the word to be said, as to be the very diction of the thing understood. This I would say of our word; for if we speak of the eternal Word, the case is different. Since at once it has to be that which is understood by the Father, and that which is produced, thus it has the notion of a word, so that at once it is also said and uttered by the eternal diction and prolation of the Father, which is his knowledge: in it, already produced and said, the rest of the things which the Father understands in it are said and are brought forth. How however this is true, and how the -

Disputatio CXLI - On the word of the mind and the divine Word

How, however, this is true, and how this word is said to represent the Father, will be explained in Disputation 143, cap. 1. Wherefore, although we do not call the word of our mind except improperly and in a broader signification - that is, we do not call that quality which we term the formal concept, but only the thing itself understood and represented through it, which we, speaking of the direct act, understand as our word - nonetheless God the Father most properly calls his Son as it were his own Word, whom he at once understands and brings forth; but the other things which he says in him, as creatures, he says secondarily. Hence, if we ask, What did the eternal Father say? we answer, His Son and his Word. Whereas if we ask, What do we inwardly say? we cannot answer, That quality or word, but The thing which we understand, as has been proved.

Two things remain for us to note. One is, what Anselm thinks, since in the Monologion, cap. 34, he said that it is the same thing for the supreme Spirit to know, to understand, and to say; whence it seems to follow that "to say" in God is taken essentially, as "to understand" itself: because they are the same. St. Thomas answers in the solution to the third objection that Anselm spoke improperly about "to say": thus indeed "to say" is altogether the same as "to understand," and is common to the three persons; but if it be taken properly, it is notional and proper to the first person, just as "to be said" or "to be the Word" is proper to the second.[479] I, however, think it difficult that Anselm spoke so improperly: for in cap. 31 he discusses the production itself of the divine Word, and he shows in caps. 32, 33, and 34 in what way God says himself and all creatures by his eternal Word; therefore he speaks of the notional act of saying, which is proper to the 479. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 34, a. 2, ad 3.

Father; for he alone says by his Word. I answer, then, that Anselm did not wish in every respect to equate intellection and diction among themselves, as if they were entirely the same: for that was not necessary to his aim; but that he might show that in the same manner the Father says creatures in his Word, in which he understands them - that which in that chapter alone he strove to establish - he assumes this proposition: It is the same for the supreme Spirit to know, to understand, to say; which is indeed true to this extent, inasmuch as to say formally and essentially is to understand, with only the addition of the respect of procession. Yet conversely, to understand and to know in God is not always to say: for in the Son and in the Holy Spirit there is not "to say." But to prove what we proposed, it suffices if "to understand" be proper to the Father and "to say" in the manner which we said.

Another thing to be noted is that which Cajetan observed on this article: when St. Thomas said that the "saying" of the Father is considered by us after the mode of emanation, so as to prove from this that it is a notional act, and that his "word" is also used notionally; this is not to be understood as though only according to our mode of understanding "diction" had the notion of emanation - that is, were conceived according to the mode of emanation, when yet in reality it is not - but thus, that the thing itself truly is an emanation.[480]

And hence it is easy to answer Durandus's last argument: for we concede that notional acts, insofar as they are signified solely under relation and order of production, do not pass over into creatures, nor reflect back upon the producing person; and in this way they are signified by us by the names of production and generation. But, as they are denoted by the name of diction and intellection, they can pass over: for these names signify rather an order to the thing said and to the thing understood than to the thing produced; since sometimes there is found to be something said and understood which is not produced, as in us; contrariwise, when in us a quality and expressed likeness is produced, it is not that which is said by the intellect. Wherefore, when we said that the word, as word, denotes its procession from another, this is not to be taken as though it were the same thing to proceed as word and to be said; but because the very intention and diction, or word, denotes a real going-forth from another.

In this way Anselm seems to have spoken about our word in the Monologion, cap. 31: "For when I think to myself of a man absent, the edge of my thought is formed to such a likeness of him as I have drawn into my memory by the sight of my eyes; and this likeness in the thought is the word of the same man whom, by thinking, I say. Accordingly the rational mind, when by thinking it understands itself, has its image born with it, that is, its thought formed to its own likeness, as if by its own impression, and this likeness of it is its word." Where, first, he calls "word" the image of the thing, as we also have said. Then too he calls this image the thought itself: therefore he holds that the word is the very thought, and not something produced by the thought. In addition, he affirms that by thinking we say the man whom we think - something he does not assert of the word. Rightly, therefore, we said that the word is the very quality which is intellection, and that this very quality is the diction of the thing understood; but that the production of that quality is not the diction, nor is the word itself that which is said. By what reason, however, Anselm asserts that the gaze of our thought is formed into an image, we have explained in Disputation 39, the last chapter.[481]

480. Cajetan, Commentary on Summa theologiae I, q. 34, a. 2.

Articulus II - Whether "Word" is the proper name of the Son

The second proceeds thus. It seems that "Word" is not the proper name of the Son. For the Son is a subsistent person in the divine things. But "word" does not signify a subsistent thing, as is clear in us. Therefore "word" cannot be the proper name of the person of the Son.

1. Further, a word proceeds in a certain manner from the one speaking by prolation. If, therefore, the Son is properly the Word, he proceeds from the Father only by way of prolation. But this is the heresy of Valentinus, as the Father reports in the book On Heresies.[482]
2. Further, every proper name of some person signifies some property of that person. If, therefore, "Word" is the proper name of the Son, it will signify some property of him; and thus there will be more properties in the divine things than were enumerated above.
3. Further, whoever understands, in understanding conceives a word. But the Son understands. Therefore there is some word of the Son; and thus it is not proper to the Son to be the Word.
4. Further, Hebrews 1 says of the Son: "Upholding all things by the word of his power." From which Basil takes that the Holy Spirit is the word of the Son. Therefore it is not proper to the Son to be the Word.

But on the contrary is what St. Augustine says in On the Trinity 6: "The Word is understood solely of the Son."[483]

I answer that "Word" is taken in the divine things personally, and is the proper name of the person of the Son; for it signifies a certain emanation of the intellect. But the person who proceeds in the divine things according to the emanation of the intellect is called Son; and this kind of procession is called generation, as was shown above. Whence it follows that the Son alone is properly called "Word" in the divine things.

Reply to the first: In us it is not the same thing to be and to understand. Whence that which in us has intelligible being does not pertain to our nature; but in God to be is his very understanding. Whence the Word of God is not something else which is an accident in him, or some effect of his, but it pertains to his very nature. And therefore it must be something subsistent: because whatever is in the nature of God subsists. And thus St. John Damascene says that the Word of God is substantial and subsisting in a hypostasis; whereas the other words, namely ours, are powers of the soul.[484]

481. Anselm, Monologion, caps. 31 - 34.
482. St. Augustine, De haeresibus, on the Valentinian heresy.
483. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VI, c. 2 (and cf. c. 3).

Reply to the second: It is not for this that the error of Valentinus is condemned, because he said that the Son was born by a prolation (as the Arians calumniated, as St. Hilary relates in De Trinitate VI), but because of the various mode of prolation which he posited, as is clear from St. Augustine in the book On Heresies.[485]

Reply to the third: In the name "Word" the same property is imported as in the name "Son." Whence St. Augustine says: "By that by which he is called Word, by that he is called Son." For the very nativity of the Son, which is his personal property, is signified by diverse names which are attributed to the Son to express different perfections of it. For to show that he is connatural with the Father, he is called Son; to show that he is coeternal, he is called Splendor; to show that he is altogether like, he is called Image; to show that he is immaterially begotten, he is called Word.

Reply to the fourth: It belongs to the Son to be intelligent in the way in which it belongs to him to be God, since to understand is said essentially in the divine things, as was said. But the Son is God begotten, not God begetting. Whence he is indeed intelligent, not as producing the Word, but as the Word proceeding - inasmuch as in God the Word proceeding, according to the thing, does not differ from the divine intellect, but is distinguished by relation alone from the principle of the Word.

Reply to the fifth: When it is said of the Son, "Upholding all things by the word of his power," "word" is taken figuratively for the effect of the word. Whence the Gloss says there that "word" is taken for "command," inasmuch as from the effect of the power of the Word it comes about that things are preserved in being, just as it is an effect of the power of the Word that things are produced into being. But as to what Basil interprets, that "word" stands for the Holy Spirit, he spoke improperly and figuratively: for by the "word" of someone can be meant anything that is a manifestation of him, so that on that account the Holy Spirit is said to be the Word of the Son, because he manifests the Son; something which shows forth the Son.

Second it is to be noted, concerning the reply to the second, that there was the fabulous heresy of Valentinus, as Irenaeus writes in book 1 Against Heresies, cap. 1, which he refutes at length in book 2; Tertullian also makes mention of it in the book On Prescriptions against Heretics, cap. 49, and Epiphanius in heresy 31 and in book 1 of the Compendium of Heretical Fables, in the chapter On Valentinus; likewise St. Hilary in De Trinitate VI a little after the beginning; and St. Augustine in the book On Heresies.[486]

[closing replies and notes carried over]

484. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, c. 18.

485. St. Hilary, De Trinitate VI; St. Augustine, De haeresibus (on the various mode of "prolation" posited by Valentinus).

486. Irenaeus, Adversus haereses I, c. 1; II; Tertullian, De praescriptionibus haereticorum, c. 49; Epiphanius, Panarion (haer. 31) and Anacephalaeosis I (Compendium), cap. de Valentino; St. Hilary, De Trinitate VI; St. Augustine, De haeresibus.

Reply to the fourth: It is answered that it befits the Son to be intelligent in the same way as it befits him to be God, since to understand is said essentially in the divine, as was said. But the Son is God begotten, not God begetting. Hence he is indeed intelligent, not as producing the word, but as the word proceeding, inasmuch as in God the word proceeding does not differ in reality from the divine intellect, but is distinguished only by relation from the principle of the word.

Reply to the fifth: When it is said of the Son, "upholding all things by the word of his power" (Heb 1), "word" is taken figuratively for the effect of the word. Hence the interlinear gloss there says that "word" is taken for command, inasmuch as by the effect of the power of the word it comes about that things are preserved in being, just as by the effect of the power of the word it comes about that things are brought forth into being. And when St. Basil interprets "word" for the Holy Spirit, he spoke not properly but figuratively, in the way in which everything that manifests someone can be called that person's "word": and so, in this respect, the Holy Spirit is called the word of the Son, because he manifests the Son.

Notationes circa Articulum.

Conclusion is affirmative, and the matters truly deserving of disputation in this article were examined in the preceding disputation; yet there remain certain items of lesser moment which do not seem to be passed over.

First note. The adverb "properly" in the title and in the body of the article is to be taken as in q. 33, a. 2, as distinguished from the adverb "commonly," so that, as St. Thomas shows, this name so befits the second person that it cannot be made to fit another. And although the second person is not only properly the word, that is, she alone is the word; she is also so properly, that it is not metaphorically nor by an extrinsic denomination, but by her own nature and character.

Second note. Concerning the reply to the second [objection], it is to be noted that there was the fabulist heretic Valentinus, of whom Irenaeus makes mention in book 1 Against Heresies, whom he also at length impugns in book 2, chapter 1; Tertullian also mentions him in the book Against Heretics, chapter 49; Epiphanius in heresy 31 and book 1 of the Compendium of Heretical Fables, in the chapter On Valentinus; likewise St. Hilary in De Trinitate VI a little after the beginning; and St. Augustine in the book On Heresies. He maintained that there had subsisted thirty αἰῶνας, that is, ages, and that all things had their origin from Profundity and Silence; he said that Profundity was the "Propator" and "Proarchē," that is, father and first principle, and he called God unbegotten and everlasting; and that in his silence he had subsisted for many aeons and ages; and that besides this there were Charis, Sige, or Ennoia, that is, grace, silence, or tacit thought; from which that unbegotten God, by a prolation sent forth and, as it were, a seed, generated Nous, that is, mind - for νοῦς in Greek in Latin is mens - and this he called the Only-begotten of God, like to him and equal; and with this, he said, Truth was produced, whereby a quaternary was constituted, which he affirmed to be the root of all numbers. Then afterwards from the only-begotten Mind and Truth the Word proceeded, that is, the λόγος; and in the end, for the safety of all, he fabulously invented that Christ would be sent. All these things Irenaeus reports at very great length.[487]

But the Arians, as Hilary writes, vaunting themselves as champions of the Catholic faith, asserted one God almighty, immutable, etc.; but that the Son was his creature, perfect, yet not as the rest; a thing made, not as the rest, but created before the ages. They also said that the Son, not merely in appearance but truly, was obedient to the will of the Father, not born by a prolation, as Valentinus fabled. Finally, not admitting the fables and errors of Valentinus and of other heretics, they strove to defend their own [dogmas]. Hilary, however, rebuked them, because, under the pretext of excluding the error of Valentinus, they denied the Son of God to be the Word, so that thus they might deny him to be Word. For although he was not in that fabulous way brought forth as Valentinus said, nevertheless, since he truly is the Word of the Father, he could not fail to be brought forth of the substance of the Father by eternal generation, namely by the operation of the mind, as was explained in the above disputation. Sander reports the heresy of Valentinus in book 7 On the Visible Monarchy (year 1580) under Antoninus Pius; but Epiphanius places it under Antoninus the first. Therefore the Catholic faith teaches that in the Trinity there is properly one unique word of the Father, namely the Son; why, however, each person does not have his own word produced, we shall say below, q. 41, a. 6.

Third note. Concerning the reply to the last [objection], it is to be noted that Basil in book 5 Against Eunomius, chapter 11, called the Holy Spirit the word of the Son on the basis of that [text] to the Hebrews 1: "upholding all things by the word of his power" (namely, Christ), and on the basis of that [text] to the Ephesians 6: "and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." That is, as he himself explains, "living and operative." But St. Thomas excuses Basil, that he seems to have spoken figuratively, inasmuch as the Holy Spirit in a certain way represents the Son - which you should understand not from the force of his divine procession, but because by his grace he announces Christ to men and manifests him to the faithful. In truth, that place in Hebrews 1 has a far different sense, which Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Oecumenius have very well followed out. For the Apostle is speaking of Christ the Son of God, of whom he says, "who being the splendor of [the Father's] glory and the figure of his substance, and upholding all things" (that is, all the things which were made through him he acts upon, governs, and preserves) "by the word of his power"; that is, without toil and effort, by his mere nod and will, as in Genesis 1: "God said, and they were made"; for that which is done by a word alone is done without solicitude and labor. For "word" there is not in Greek λόγος, the term which John uses in chapter 1: "In the beginning was ὁ λόγος," that is, the Word, the Son of God; but it is ῥῆμα, and it signifies the same as in Latin "word," an utterance or sentence. Likewise that in Ephesians 6, "and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God," according to the common interpretation is not understood of the eternal Word of God, but of the word of the preaching of faith; which for that reason is called a sword, as in Hebrews 4, because it penetrates even to the innermost parts of the spirit, and discerns and separates evil thoughts from the good.

487. Irenaeus, Adversus haereses I, c. 1; II; Tertullian, De praescriptionibus haereticorum, c. 49; Epiphanius, Panarion (haer. 31) and Anacephalaeosis I (Compendium), cap. de Valentino; St. Hilary, De Trinitate VI; St. Augustine, De haeresibus.

Articulus III - Whether by the name "Word" there is imported a respect to creatures

It is argued that in the name "Word" there is not imported a respect to creatures.

1. Every name that connotes an effect in a creature is said essentially in the divine; but "word" is not said essentially, but personally, as was said. Therefore "word" does not import a respect to a creature.
2. Further: The things that import a respect to creatures are said of God ex tempore, as "Lord" and "Creator"; but "Word" is said of God from eternity. Therefore it does not import a respect to a creature.
3. Further: "Word" imports a respect to that from which it proceeds. Therefore, if it imports a respect to a creature, it follows that it proceeds from a creature.
4. Further: Ideas are many according to diverse respects to creatures. Therefore, if "word" imports a respect to creatures, it follows that in God there is not one word only, but many.
5. Further: If "word" imports a respect to a creature, this is only inasmuch as creatures are known by God. But God not only knows beings, but also non-beings. Therefore in the word there will be imported a respect to non-beings - which seems false.

But on the contrary: St. Augustine says in the book On Eighty-Three Questions, that in the name "Word" there is signified not only a respect to the Father, but also to those things that were made through the Word by operative power.[488]

I answer that, in "Word" there is imported a respect to a creature. For by knowing himself God knows every creature. Therefore the word conceived in the mind is representative of everything that is understood in act. Whence in us there are diverse words according to the diverse things that we understand. But because by one act God understands both himself and all things, his one unique Word is expressive not only of the Father, but also of creatures.

And just as God's knowledge is of God only as cognoscitive, but of creatures as both cognoscitive and factive; so too the Word of God, what it is in God the Father, is only expressive; but of creatures it is expressive and operative. And on account of this it is said in Psalm 32: "He said, and they were made," because in the Word there is imported the productive ratio of those things which God makes.

Reply to the first: In the name of "person" there is also included, obliquely, the nature. For a person is an individual substance of a rational nature; therefore, in the name of a divine person, as regards the personal relation there is not imported a respect to a creature; but it is imported there in that which pertains to the nature. Nevertheless nothing prevents, insofar as in its signification its essence is included, that a respect to a creature be imported. For it is proper to the Son that he is God-begotten, or a begotten Creator. And in this way a relation to the creature is imported in the name "Word."

488. St. Augustine, De diversis quaestionibus LXXXIII, q. 63.

Reply to the second: Since certain names import a relation of God to a creature which follows upon an action of God that passes over into an exterior effect, as to create and to govern, such names are said of God ex tempore. But there is a certain relation which follows upon an act not passing over into an exterior effect, but remaining in the agent, as to know and to will; and such things are not said of God ex tempore. And a relation of this kind to the creature is imported in the name "Word." Nor is it true that all the names importing a relation of God to creatures are said ex tempore, but only those names which import a relation consequent upon an action of God that passes over into an exterior effect are said ex tempore.

Reply to the third: Creatures are not known by God through a knowledge received from creatures, but through his own knowledge. Hence it is not necessary that the Word proceed from creatures, although the Word is expressive of creatures.

Reply to the fourth: The name "Idea" is principally imposed to signify a respect to creatures; and for that reason it is said in the plural in the divine, nor is it personal. But the name "Word" is principally imposed to signify a relation to the speaker, and consequently to creatures, inasmuch as God by understanding himself understands every creature. And on this account in the divine there is only one unique Word, and said personally.

Reply to the fifth: In the way that God's knowledge is of non-beings, so also the Word of God is of non-beings, because there is not anything less in the Word of God than in the knowledge of God, as Augustine says. But nevertheless the Word is of beings as expressive and factive; of non-beings, however, as expressive and manifestative.

Conclusion. The Word of God does respect creatures: it renders the sense of the holy Fathers and the reasons that follow, which St. Thomas reports; because whatever is in the knowledge of the Father is in the very Word; but in the knowledge of the Father is every creature; therefore in the very Word. Whence it is that the Word respects all creatures which are said to have been made in it. Concerning the terms of the present conclusion and of the article, we shall examine in the following disputations.

Disputatio CXLII - Whether the Word proceeds from all things that are in God formally

- Status of the controversy. Chapter 1.
- Various opinions of the scholastics. Chapter 2.
- The truer view: that by cognition of the essence and attributes, together with of the Father and the Son, the Word is produced. Chapter 3.
- The Word is not produced by cognition of the Holy Spirit as a per se object. Chapter 4.

Caput I - Status of the controversy

Since in this disputation we inquire, and in the following ones, by whose cognition the divine Word proceeds; and, concerning the Holy Spirit, by whose love he is spirated; we are not in doubt that the intellection by which the Word is produced ought to be of such a sort, common and comprehensive, that it embraces not only the essence of God, but also the rest of the things which are in God. For in his Word he knows all things; so too in it he says all things, even possible and future creatures. Nor, moreover, is the present question whether God understands all things before he produces them, and from their cognition, as from a principle, generates his Word. For, as we said in disputation 112, chapter one, the principle of producing the Word is not intellection but memory, that is, the intellect of the Father in the first act. Nay rather, the production of the Word is the very notional act of intellection. Although some, as Scotus and certain others, think that intellection is prior to the production of the Word - and thus he followed in this controversy a peculiar opinion, as we shall see in the following chapter. But the present controversy, with those others who say that the very act of understanding produces the Word, lies chiefly in this: whether in the intellection of the Father, and in his essence as it were in the species and the principle of understanding per se required for the production of the Word, all the things which are in God are contained, as intelligibles in their first act - just as an object is said to be in the intellect by reason of the intelligible species for producing the intellection itself, i.e., as a principle per se necessary - or rather whether some things are contained there only as concomitants necessary to the very generation of the Word. And with the question thus understood, there are various opinions of the theologians, which we shall report in the following chapter.

Caput II - Various opinions of the scholastics

Cajetan understood Scotus's opinion in the commentary on this article thus, as asserting that neither does the divine Word proceed from the knowledge of the persons, nor the Holy Spirit from love of the same, as from a principle; but from knowledge, or love, of the essence alone: the persons, however, fall under that same knowledge and love necessarily; yet creatures fall under it concomitantly, although these are comprehended under it according to another ratio, namely contingently. Cajetan gathers this opinion from Scotus in I, dist. 9, q. 1, "Ad primum dico," in the solution of the last [objection], where he is solving he speaks about the procession of the Holy Spirit, and asserts what we have just reported; and he asserts the same in the same distinction, q. 2, at the end. And what he says there ought, with even greater reason, to be said about the procession of the Word, as we shall immediately see. But in other places where he disputes whether the Word proceeds from the cognition of creatures or of the essence alone, he merely affirms that it proceeds from the cognition of the primary object alone, that is, of the divine essence; not of the secondary, namely of creatures - without any mention made of the persons; to which he assigns only the primary object, namely the divine essence, and the secondary, namely creatures; as is to be seen in the same author in II, dist. 1, q. 5.

This opinion can be proved first, because, as we said, in that prior sign of reason there are not yet paternity, filiation, and spiration; therefore then there is not yet intuitive knowledge of them; and hence from knowledge of them an act of saying, by which the Word is produced, cannot arise. Or it must be asserted that the Word proceeds not through intuitive knowledge of them as now present, but through abstract knowledge of them as it were as possibles, or as it were future in a subsequent instant of reason; which seems absurd, since the things that are in God are known by intuitive knowledge, which is terminated at that which is present to God Himself. Then again, on this view the Word would proceed from the Spirit as from a passive principle, as from an intelligible principle, and would be an image of the Holy Spirit; because in order that the Word be someone's image, it is sufficient that it proceed from him as from an intelligible object per se required for the production; and by the same reasoning it would come about that the Word would be the image of itself, if it proceeded from knowledge of itself. These are the reasons that can be urged for Scotus's opinion.

But this opinion, from what was said in Disputation 112, chapters 2 and 3, can be refuted with no difficulty. For there we showed against Scotus that the foundation on which this opinion of his rests is false, namely, that the Word proceeds by an act of saying of the intellect which is posterior to intellection, whereas in truth it is produced by the very act of notional intellection. Therefore nothing seems to stand in the way why the cognition by which the Word is produced should not be the cognition of paternity and filiation, as will be explained in the following chapter. The same must be said of the Holy Spirit, since He truly proceeds by an act of notional love, and not, as Scotus thought, by another posterior act which formally would not be love, but only spiration. But how the Word is not generated by knowledge of Himself and of the Holy Spirit as under an esse possible or future, we shall immediately see against Cajetan and others.

The second opinion is that indeed the Word is produced by the cognition of Himself and of the Holy Spirit - not indeed by intuitive, but as it were by abstract, knowledge; which the authors of this view seem to gather for themselves out of Cajetan in the commentary on this article. For there he grants to Scotus's second point that the Word proceeds from Himself and from the Holy Spirit as things known by the Father's science; but this science cannot be intuitive, as of things present, but abstract, as of things possible and, in the subsequent instant of reason, of things future. And indeed, as to the Holy Spirit, this seems to follow more clearly: for in that prior sign of origin in which the Son is produced, the Holy Spirit has not yet been produced; therefore, if He is then known by notional intellection, it will be only abstract, not intuitive, knowledge.

But this opinion is no less easily rejected. For although in God we can distinguish a prior and a posterior by origin and by our reason; and although we may say that one thing is known before another; yet this is done among the things which we understand truly to be in God, not among things wholly fabricated. But in God Himself there is nothing future or possible which is not in act; therefore it is vain for us to contrive a prior and a posterior among things which are not in God, or to feign that the Father has knowledge of the Holy Spirit as future and possible, before He has it as present and existing. When, moreover, we consider the Father and the Son before they produce the Holy Spirit, then we rather conceive Him without knowledge of the Holy Spirit than with abstract knowledge of Him. For to think of Him without thinking of the Holy Spirit is nothing else than to consider one thing in Him without considering another, from which we attribute no imperfection to Him. Nor do we assert that the Holy Spirit is not known by the Father, but according to our mode we divide things which are in God all at once, and, divided, we come to know them little by little; and so we apprehend the Father under some sign of reason in which we consider Him as yet without knowledge of the Holy Spirit. Let them therefore say that the Word is generated by the intuitive knowledge and science which the Father has of Himself and of the Holy Spirit, rather than by abstract knowledge, which in God is altogether fictitious. Nor indeed did Cajetan say anything about abstract knowledge, but pronounced absolutely that the Word proceeds from Himself and from the Holy Spirit as known by the Father's science.[489]

A third opinion is that of the Ferrarensis, on Contra Gentiles IV, chapter 13, on the clause "To the first it seems," where he affirms that the production of the Word is prior to the knowledge of creatures, even of possibles: because he thinks that the Word is produced to this end, that in Him the Father may understand by notional science the things which are in Him. From which he must necessarily assert that the Word is produced before the Father knows Him and the Holy Spirit. Some note this opinion with greater severity than is fitting, because it seems to fall into the opinion which St. Augustine once taught in the book of 83 Questions, question 23, namely, that the Father is wise by begotten wisdom, that is, by the Son.[490]

Which opinion he afterwards rightly retracted in De Trinitate VI, chapters 1 and 2; VII, chapter 1 and 3; XV, chapter 7; and in the first book of the Retractations, chapter 26.[491] But in my judgment the Ferrarensis is far removed from that opinion. For Augustine had there said that the Father is wise by begotten wisdom, as by a form; which he afterwards judged absurd: since the Father is wise in Himself, not by the Word as by His wisdom; since rather the Word is begotten wisdom from the wise Father; as Athanasius had most excellently taught in the Oration against the Gregalians of Sabellius, before the middle, where he speaks thus: "There likewise the wisdom of the Father is the Son - not as in a man, where by wisdom a man is wise - but from the wise [one] the wisdom is that from whom it takes its origin." And afterwards St. Anselm handed on the same in the Monologion, chapter 43.[492]

But the Ferrarensis teaches only this, that the Word is produced to this end, that the Father may understand by notional cognition in Him as in the produced terminus, not by Him as by intellection and wisdom; for he grants that in the Father there is not only essential science, common to the three persons, but also notional science, by which He knows all things in the Word produced by Himself. Concerning the proposition, "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom," we shall speak expressly in Disputation 151, chapter 1.

489. Cajetan: Commentary on this article.
490. St. Augustine, De diversis quaestionibus octoginta tribus, q. 23.
491. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VI, cc. 1 - 2; VII, cc. 1, 3; XV, c. 7; Retractationes I, c. 26.
492. Athanasius, Oration against the Gregalians of Sabellius (midpoint); St. Anselm, Monologion, c. 43.

But in truth this opinion of the Ferrarensis does not please me for another reason: because, as was shown in Disputation 112, chapter 2, the very act of generation and production of the Word is not prior to, nor even distinct from, the act of notional intellection; and so nothing seems to stand in the way why the Word should not at least proceed and be generated by the cognition of Himself.

Caput III - The truer view: that the Word is produced through the knowledge of the essence, the attributes, and, together, of the Father and the Son

Now, the things which are considered within God Himself, by the cognition of which the production of the Word can take place, are three: the essence (essence, essentia), the attributes, and the persons (personae). As to the first two, there can be no difficulty: for it is common knowledge that by force of its generation the Word proceeds of such a nature and perfection that, in that prior sign of reason in which the first person is understood to the generating of the second, there is conceived not only God constituted by the divine essence itself, but also perfect with every attribute and perfection which befits the divine essence and is common to the three persons. Which must necessarily be conceded even in the opinion of Scotus, who asserts that the attributes are distinct from the essence by a distinction of the nature of the thing; nor did he ever deny it. For the eternal generation, just as it communicates its nature, also communicates the things which are proper to it, so that just as it produces God, so too it produces the omnipotent, and so forth. And since generation and the production of the Word are intellection, it follows that by the intellection by which the Father understands the essence and the attributes He produces His Son. How, however, since the attributes are a secondary object of the divine intellect according to our mode of understanding, and creatures too are said, in their own way, to be a secondary object, the case is not the same for both - this we shall see in the following disputation, chapter 4. All these things, therefore - namely, the essence and the attributes - are compared with the Word of God as its principle, not producing, but intelligible in the mode of an object, that is, by the cognition of which, according to our mode of understanding, it proceeds per se.

But about the persons there is a greater difficulty, whether all of them are related in the same way in the production of the Word. The difficulty, however, arises if we speak of them in the mode of an object per se necessary to His production: for if we say that He proceeds in this way, we shall seem to fall into the absurdity which we mentioned in the second reason alleged for Scotus's opinion in the second chapter. Nevertheless I maintain, first, that it cannot be denied that the Word proceeds by intuitive cognition and science which is concerned with two persons - namely, the Father and the Word Himself - as with an object per se necessary and requisite. I advisedly said "intuitive," in order to show false the opinion which I reported in that same second chapter, and there also refuted, of those who assert that the Word is produced by abstract knowledge of the Word itself. And that this knowledge is intuitive of a thing present and existing, I prove thus. Since the production of the Word is an act (actus) of science and intellection, and for the Word to be produced is nothing other than to be understood, as we showed in Disputation 112, chapters 2 and 3: it follows that by the same act He at once ...

The Word is produced and understood by the same act; indeed, for the Word to be produced is the same as to be understood. But when the Word is produced, its production is terminated at its being (esse); therefore the cognition likewise. And since at once there is paternity with filiation, not only by nature, but also in our mode of understanding, it is necessary that the notional intellection of the Father be terminated at paternity itself also.

There is, however, to be observed a difference between paternity and filiation: for they are compared in a different manner with the notional cognition which is the production of the Word. Of filiation we have already said that it pertains per se as the object to the notional cognition in the way explained. But of paternity it must be said that it also pertains thereto as an object per se on the part of the principle: not because it is prior by reason to the Word, but because on the part of the Father there concurs, not only the personal property modifying the essence to be the potency of generating, but also the object which, on the part of the principle, is understood in the production of the Word. Wherefore it must be said that paternity is in the intellect of the first person in first act as it were an object in species, so that in second act it may be understood. For I consider false the opinion of those who say that the essence alone stands as the per se motive object for the production of the Word; and what they allege in confirmation has no weight. They say that the notional intellection by which the Word is produced is nothing other than the essential cognition modified by the personal property; but this ought to be prior by reason to the person, because the essential cognition is prior: therefore it ought not to be terminated at the persons. But who does not see that this argument proves nothing? For the intellection by which a person is produced ought not to be prior by reason, but only prior in origin, to the person produced. But priority of origin, as we shall say in the next chapter, is not a property according to reason; and things which are prior in origin to others are wont to be simultaneous with them in reason. For the intellection by which a person is produced is not only an intellection, but also a production; and therefore also as intellection it is conversant about that which it produces, and about that which is produced: therefore it embraces the Father and the Son, each in his own way, as we have explained.

But let someone object: if the Word is produced by knowledge of Himself, it follows that He was first in the Father's memory in first act in the mode of an object; but of those things which are in the intellect in the mode of first act, the word is an image: therefore the Word will be the image of Himself. I reply, first, that this is to be understood in the same manner of those things alone which are in the intellect in first act, from which the word really differs; for such distinction is necessary between the image and that of which it is the image. Since, therefore, the Word is not distinguished from Himself, even if we should say that He was in the paternal intellect in the mode of first act, it is not lawful to infer that He is the image of Himself.

Then, the divine Word was not in the memory of the Father as in first act in the way in which intelligible objects are, which are only understood in second act, not however produced: but He was in the memory of the Father as in a producing principle, and in the Father He is produced and understood; indeed, for Him to be understood is to be produced. But the Word can only be the image of those things which were in the Father's memory in first act in the mode only of an intelligible object; for these it can represent: but He is not the image of that which was in the Father's memory as in a producing principle, and therefore He is not the image of Himself. Which one may also observe in human things: for the word of our mind, which was in the memory and in the first act of the intellect, is not the image of itself, because it was in that as in a productive principle; it is, however, the image of the object which it represents, because that was in the first act of the intellect as mere object, not as productive principle.

Caput IV - The Word is not produced by cognition of the Holy Spirit as a per se motive object

But indeed concerning the third person the question is much more difficult, namely whether by knowledge of Him, as of an object per se requisite, the Word proceeds. For besides those who say that the Word proceeds by knowledge of Him under possible or future being, whose opinion I reported in chapter 2, others think that the Word is produced by intuitive cognition of the Holy Spirit as present; which they confirm by two reasons. One is that the Word does not proceed only as Word, but also as spirator: therefore the Father produces the Word, not only knowing Him as Word, but also as spirator. But the Father knows thus the Son by perfect knowledge, which they call comprehensive: therefore He knows at once the terminus of that [spiration]; but the terminus is the Holy Spirit: therefore by that very thing He knows the Holy Spirit. The other reason is that the cognition by which the Word proceeds is comprehensive and intuitive of the essence; but the essence is altogether the same as the persons: therefore the same cognition is necessarily of the essence as of all the persons. And this opinion perhaps can be attributed to Cajetan in article 3 of this question: for he, as was noted in chapter 2 of this Disputation, asserts that the Word proceeds from the Holy Spirit as known, and, according to being intelligible.[493] Whether, however, this be knowledge of the Holy Spirit already existing, which they call intuitive, or of the future or possible, which they call abstractive, Cajetan himself did not explain.

But I on the contrary judge that the Holy Spirit cannot be compared as an object per se requisite for the production of the Word: which opinion I gather from Scotus in the places alleged in chapter 2, and I prove it thus. For otherwise it would follow that the Word is the image of the Holy Spirit: for He is now a likeness representing Him, because He is His word; and then in addition He would at least proceed from Him as from an object; which is sufficient for the notion of image. For although an image ought to proceed from that of which it is a likeness, nevertheless it suffices if it proceed in an intelligible manner as from an object: thus the images painted by art are images of men or of things which they represent, and yet they proceed from them only in an intelligible mode as from objects.

But you will say that for the notion of image it is necessary that it proceed physically from that of which it is a likeness, or at least from the cognition of that same thing as from a principle - as happens in images that are painted by art: for that one does not proceed from the thing which is represented, but from the cognition of it as from a principle. But the procession by which the divine Word proceeds is also the cognition of the Holy Spirit; and hence the Word does not proceed from the Holy Spirit, nor from His cognition, as from a principle; but the procession and origin by which the Word is produced is the very cognition of the Holy Spirit; which does not seem sufficient that the Word be called His image: for thus He proceeds in no way from Him, neither from Him as He is in Himself, nor from His cognition.

493. Cajetan, on this article.

But this evasion is devised without foundation. For if from this, that some likeness proceeds from the cognition of that of which it is a likeness, it is rightly said to be the image of that, it will also suffice that it proceed from that as an object, not as previously known, but as previously existing, as it were in the memory, or in the first act of the intellect for understanding. For which reason no one has hitherto denied that the word produced by our intellect is not only the similitude of the object, but also its image: thus when we think, we are said to turn over images of things in the mind. And since in this manner the word proceeds in a certain way from the object of which it is the word, just as a picture is an image made by art, there does not seem a greater reason why the one mode of proceeding should suffice more than the other for the notion of image. But if the divine Word is not the image of the essence, this is because He is not really distinguished from it; yet He is distinguished from the Holy Spirit in the same way as from the Father: therefore in the same way He could be the image of the one and of the other, if He proceeded from each as an object per se necessary. Nor is only that word an image which proceeds from a species that impressed the potency either proximally or remotely; but also that word which proceeds from an innate species: although then the object is not compared with the word as its efficient even remotely, unless by reason of the species which first presents it in first act. In which way also the Holy Spirit can be compared with the Word, if He is an object per se requisite for the production of it.

Furthermore, to explain how the Holy Spirit is compared to the production of the Word, since by one and the same notional cognition the Word and the Holy Spirit are known, certain things must be observed. First, that the eternal Father by a single most simple intuition of notional cognition understands Himself, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; as also the blessed see. For if He understands the Word and Himself as they truly are, He will see Himself and the Son as spirator; and thus He must necessarily know the Holy Spirit. Moreover, whoever sees the essence will necessarily at the same time know the persons. And the reasons just now alleged rightly prove this; nor can there be any controversy about this matter. Now, however, the question for us is only this: what, according to our mode of understanding, is to be conceived as a principle also in the mode of an object necessary for the production of the Word; not, however, what in reality is conjoined with the same notional cognition.

Thirdly, it must be observed that that is understood by us to be a per se principle of some person, not what is merely accidentally ordered thereto, but what, as intrinsic and from the very origin, is compared as an object both to the intellect that produces and to the production of the Word itself.

Generation, as generation, is understood by us per se alone in the fourth mode of saying per se to terminate at filiation and the relation of the Word in the divine essence; but the relation of spiration we understand consequently therein. Wherefore, since the Greeks deny that He is spirator, they nevertheless grant that He is the Word of the Father with His whole nature of the Godhead and with the sole relation of Son. And although we argue against them and prove that for this reason He is spirator, because He receives the entire nature of the Father and not divided; nevertheless we do not argue thus because we think the property of spirator follows upon the essence; for then indeed it would be compared per se with the generation of the Son in the fourth mode; but because it does not conflict with filiation, and otherwise the Son is thus God as the Father. That property or notion is not proper to the essence; it is clear, because otherwise in the Holy Spirit, who receives the whole essence, it would be found: therefore, although it is thus necessary that the second person be Son and Word, just as He is spirator; nevertheless the Father's notional cognition, insofar as it of itself suffices for the generation of the Word, does not regard the three persons, nor the second as spirator: because, that property and the third person not being considered, the Son of God is understood consubstantial (homoousios) with the Father.

Three things pertain per se to the notional cognition of the Father, by which the Son proceeds in the fourth mode of saying per se, each in its own manner: essence and the things which follow upon it, paternity, and filiation; essence, and the other common attributes, insofar as that which is to be communicated by generation to the Son - in which the formal terminus of generation consists, as will be explained in Disputation 163; the relation of the Son, as the constitutive property of the generated person and His proper relation, which at once is understood and is generated; finally, paternity, as the relation of the proper principle and per se of generation. The rest indeed necessarily accompany the cognition by which the Son is produced, by a necessity equal to that of generation and of the person, but not as something pertaining in our way of understanding in that fourth mode per se to the generation of the Son as He is Son.

The foundations of the opposing view are dissolved. For the two arguments adduced in this chapter on behalf of the contrary opinion prove nothing other than that the Holy Spirit, with equal necessity with the other persons, is understood by the Father's notional intellection; but they do not prove that the Holy Spirit pertains per se in that mode to the generation of the Son. Hence, too, the argument can be dissolved which is commonly made against our opinion in this way. The Son proceeds eternally by cognition, which is a real perfection in the Father; but the cognition of the Holy Spirit and of the property of spirator in the Son is a real perfection of the Father: therefore by that [cognition] He proceeds. Thus, therefore, this argument is easily refuted: for although the cognition by which the Father knows the Holy Spirit and the property of spirator in the Son is a real perfection of the Father indeed distinct from the cognition by which He knows Himself and the Son; nevertheless in it, in our mode of understanding, a twofold ratio can be distinguished: one, insofar as that cognition is terminated at that which is compared per se as a principle producing the Word; the other, insofar as it is terminated at that which is later in origin than the Word itself: and according to the former rationale there is the production of the Word itself, but not according to the latter. For the Father's cognition, according to whatever real perfection, is not compared with the Son as the production of Him, but according to those things which it regards as object and as per se principle of the Son, as Son: but such is not the Father's cognition, insofar as it is referred to the Holy Spirit. However, since in the Son, besides the personal property by which He is of Himself constituted as Son, there is also the notion of spirator, which in our mode of understanding is conceived as accompanying the person of the Son according to the rationale of Son; therefore by the Father's cognition, insofar as it is terminated at the notion of spirator and at the person of the Holy Spirit, the Son proceeds as spirator. Thus far, however, I have only said that the Son proceeds according to His proper rationale of Son, not that He proceeds by the Father's cognition, insofar as it is engaged about the Holy Spirit.

But it is asked, whether in that prior, in which we understand the Father, by an intellection of Himself, of His essence, and of the Son, to generate, His intellection is perfect and comprehensive. I answer, that it is indeed comprehensive; and for this, however, that it be said by us to be comprehensive, it is sufficient that it extend to all the things which are per se presupposed in that fourth mode to the generation of the Son, among which there is not yet - namely, is not considered by us - the spiration nor the Holy Spirit. Wherefore those who say that the Word proceeds formally by the intellection by which the Holy Spirit is known, and in turn that the Holy Spirit is not an object per se moving to that intellection and production of the Word, nor compared as a principle on the side of the object, because in the instant of the intellection by which the Father understands, by the intellection which is the origin of the Son, the Holy Spirit is not yet - plainly contradict themselves. For if the Word proceeds formally by the cognition by which the Holy Spirit is known, and the Holy Spirit does not only behave concomitantly with that [cognition]; it follows that in that prior [instant], in which the Son is formally understood to proceed, the Holy Spirit is also known, and thus to move as object and to be the principled object: or if He is not yet then, it follows that the Word does not proceed formally by the very cognition, insofar as it is about the Holy Spirit, but materially, that is, by that cognition which afterward is understood to be about the Holy Spirit. Now to assert that then the Holy Spirit is understood under the being of the future or the possible, besides the fact that we have already shown this to be false - since no such cognition of a future or possible person ought to be devised in God by us - would also be a manifest contradiction. For thus the Holy Spirit, under possible being, would be per se object or principle according to intelligible being, moving to the production of the Word: for the Holy Spirit would be represented in first act in the divine essence as in a species required for the production of the Word; but nothing else is called a motive object than that which exists in an intelligible species, as in first act, so that by it the intellect produces cognition and a word.

Disputatio CXLIII - Whether the Word proceeds by the cognition of creatures

- The same is shown by a posteriori reasoning. Chapter 5.
- Replies are given to the arguments of the prior opinion. Chapter 6.

Caput I - Two theological opinions

There are certain Theologians of our time, who, not sufficiently understanding the controversy among the Scholastics about the procession of the Word from creatures known by the Father's notional cognition, affirm that the Word proceeds not only by the cognition of possible creatures, but also of existing ones: a thing which they suppose to be without controversy. And indeed, if they understand that by the same cognition at once the Father in His Word understands Himself and the other persons, and creatures, even future ones, there is no doubt that all these are comprehended by the Father's notional cognition: but the controversy between Scotus and other Theologians is certainly not placed in this, whether the Father's notional cognition embraces all those things; but whether creatures pertain in the fourth mode per se, as principle, according to intelligible being, to the production of the Word. For some things, as we shall see below, are in the same notional cognition which are concomitant, or consequent in it, nor are they compared per se with the production of a person: in which there will be no one so dull of wit who does not see that future creatures in this way cannot pertain to the generation of the Son. For since they are contingently future, so that they can not be, by possibility on the part of the cause, and thus are known as future from eternity, in such a way that they could not have been known; but the Word proceeds so necessarily that in no way could it have been possible not to proceed; they cannot pertain per se to His production. First, because a principle intelligible ought to be with equal necessity as that which proceeds from it: next also, because, since it would have been possible that God not know any future creature, if there were none: it is altogether accidental to God to know future creatures; not because that adds something intrinsic to God; but because it is a certain order of reason which altogether befalls Him. Nor is it only true that the Word does not proceed per se by the cognition of future things absolutely; but neither by the cognition of contingent truths under a condition, which God has always known: a thing which is proved by the same rationale. For these objects and truths are so eternal, that of themselves it does not involve a contradiction that the opposite part be true:

but, as we said, the principle, as an intelligible, of some person ought to be no less necessary than the very person who proceeds; otherwise one could conceive a person proceeding in the same nature and property without such a principle; whence it would follow that that would not be a principle per se: for, once the per se principle is removed, that which is from the principle is also removed. Therefore, creatures future absolutely, or under a condition, being set aside, about the possibles there is greater controversy.

And of all the things that are in Himself. When he says that the Word is "of" those things which are in the Father, he understands it as "in the science of the Father," of which he had spoken before; but that particle "of" signifies procession; for throughout that chapter he very often uses it in that signification.

There is, moreover, an opinion of certain men, that creatures known as possible pertain per se to the production of the Word no less than the essence of God, and the other things which are in Him. This was taught by Gabriel in the First Book, distinction 27, question 3, article 3, doubt 1, conclusion 2; by Cajetan on this article; and by the Canarian in the fifth article of question 27, in a single disputation; likewise by not a few among the more recent writers; for among the ancients this matter was not disputed. One is accustomed to cite Ferrariensis on Contra Gentiles IV, chapter 13; but he held an entirely different view: for he clearly holds that the production of the Word is not by cognition of creatures, moved by this reason, because he thinks the production of the Word, according to the ratio of production and utterance, to be prior to it according to the ratio of cognition; indeed, that the Word is produced to the end that in It the Father may know all things by a notional cognition, which He knows in Himself by the essential intellection, of which enough was said by us in the preceding disputation, chapter 2.[494][495][496][497]

But this opinion is proved, first and foremost, by the authority of St. Thomas in this article 3, when he says that the Word is expressive of creatures, because it is the representative of that which the mind understands; but God understands not only Himself, but also all creatures. Next, from article 1 of this question, to the third reply, where he speaks thus: "For the Father, by understanding Himself, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and all other things which are contained in His science, conceives the Word; so that the whole Trinity is said by the Word, and even every creature." By which words he plainly indicates, not only that creatures are named and understood concomitantly in the divine Word by the Father, but also that they of themselves concur per se to its utterance: for indeed the Father, by understanding them, says and pronounces His Word. To this is added St. Augustine, who in De Trinitate XV, chapter 14, seems to have taught this much more clearly: "Thus God the Father knows all things in Himself; He knows in the Son; but in Himself as Himself; in the Son as His Word, which is...."[498][499][500]

But by reason also it is confirmed, first, because the divine Word proceeds from a perfect and comprehensive cognition of the essence; but the essence cannot be comprehended unless omnipotence be perfectly understood: now this cannot be known without possible creatures, to which it is referred: therefore the Word formally and per se proceeds by the cognition of the Father inasmuch as it is terminated to possible creatures.

Second, possible creatures seem to be nothing other from eternity than the very essence of God; but the Word proceeds by cognition of the essence formally, and that is per se compared as object to the production of the Word: therefore so also are possible creatures.

Third, to know the divine essence, or to represent creatures in itself, is some perfection of it; but every perfection of the divine essence pertains per se, as object, to the production of the Word: therefore so also does the representation of creatures; but this cannot be known unless at once the creature be known: therefore thus does the Word proceed by cognition of the essence formally, just as also by cognition of creatures.

494. Gabriel, In I Sent., d. 27, q. 3, a. 3, dub. 1, concl. 2.
495. Cajetan, on this article (ST I, q. 34, a. 3).
496. Canariensis, on question 27, article 5, disputatio unica.
497. Ferrariensis, In IV Contra Gentiles, cap. 13.
498. St. Thomas, ST I, q. 34, a. 3: "the Word is expressive of creatures..."
499. St. Thomas, ST I, q. 34, a. 1, ad 3.
500. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 14.

Caput II - Scotus's position is set forth

Scotus, however, in the Second Book, distinction 1, question 1, ad primum; and in the same question, in the part "As to this, therefore"; and in Quodlibet 14, question 5, affirms that the Word does not proceed by a cognition of creatures formally, nor do creatures in any way bear themselves to its production as an intelligible principle, but that it is produced from the cognition of the essence alone.[501] I pass over what he holds concerning the persons - whether they pertain to cognition - from the preceding disputation, chapter 1. Therefore, since he says in the First Book, distinction 2, question 7, in the fourth objection near the end, that the Word does not proceed by an act of understanding, but by an act of saying, which he thinks to be different from the act of understanding, and that the act of saying arises from the act of understanding - he asserts that one must add and put forward that only the act of understanding is required per se, and that one which is occupied about the divine essence, and in no way about creatures; which, that he may explain, he notes certain things.

First, that in the divine acts a twofold order can be considered, one of nature, another of origin: as there is an order of time and of reason; and just as, in the same instant of time, several distinct things can be assigned according to reason, so also in a single instant of the order according to nature several instants can be assigned according to origin. Scotus considers the order according to nature in the intellect and will of God with respect to the primary and secondary object: he calls the divine essence primary; but creatures secondary. He says, therefore, that the divine essence is understood by God prior in nature to God's understanding creatures: because He knows them by reason of the essence. In the prior instant, therefore, according to nature, he says the whole order of origin among the persons can be considered: that is, by considering the intellect and the will of God about His essence, the procession of the Word and of the Holy Spirit, in the due order of origin, can be understood. And thus, in one instant of nature, Scotus considers the whole order of origin: because He understands God operating within Himself, from the very fact that He conceives that He is beatified; and since God is beatified by His operation about His essence alone so considered, with good reason he establishes in it, in our mode of understanding, the whole order of origin.

Second, he notes that another complete order of origin can be considered in a second instant according to nature, that is, about the secondary object, namely about creatures: for in the cognition of them the divine persons are thus related, that the Father understands them of Himself, the Son receives from the Father the cognition of them, the Holy Spirit from both; and thus other instants of origin are assigned. But this order of origin (says Scotus) is not the simple one, according to which one person proceeds from another; but a qualified order, and as it were consequent upon the first: for it is first said that one person proceeds from another and receives operation about the primary object rather than about the secondary.

---

501. Scotus, In II Sent., d. 1, q. 1, ad 1; ibid., q. 1, "Quantum ad hoc igitur"; Quodlib. 14, q. 5; and cf. In I Sent., d. 2, q. 7, obj. 4 (circa finem).

Third, he notes that creatures are not in the Father's memory as in an act first, nor are they made intelligible by the essence itself as by a species; but by the act of intellection whereby secondary things are understood they are rendered intelligible - not that he should think that the being of creatures in the divine intellect is merely a being of reason; but because the memory of the Father is not in act first by the essence as by the species of creatures, but solely is a species of those things which are in God formally and intrinsically.

Caput III - Scotus's position, as truer, is proved by authority

I, for my part, judge the position of Scotus to be much truer, which in this chapter by authority, and in the following chapters by reason, I shall strive to confirm. In the first place, St. Anselm in the Monologion is for it: for when in chapter 29 he had said that the divine Word is not the likeness of creatures, in chapter 30 he then begins thus: "But since it is so, how can that which is simply truth be the word of those things of which it is not the likeness, since every word, by which a thing is said in the mind, is a likeness of the thing itself? And if it is not the word of the things which have been made, how will there be a word - since every word is the word of some thing? Finally, if never were there a creature, there would be no word of it: what then is to be concluded - whether, if there were in no way a creature, by no means would that word exist which is the supreme and needful-of-nothing essence; or perhaps that supreme essence, which is the Word, would indeed be an eternal essence, but would not be a word, if never anything should be made by it?" By these words he proposes the ground for doubting: namely, how, if the Word is not the likeness of creatures, it can be their word: which, if it is not their word, it is not seen how it can be a word. But he replies, after a few things interposed, in this way: "But would it not understand itself (to wit, that supreme wisdom), or how can it even be thought that supreme wisdom should ever not understand itself, when at some time a rational mind can not only recollect its own mind, but also that supreme wisdom?" And a little later: "Therefore that supreme Spirit, as He is eternal, so is He the eternal rememberer of Himself, and He understands Himself after the manner of the rational mind - not after its manner, indeed, but rather that is principal and the rational mind is after His likeness: but if He eternally understands Himself, He eternally says Himself; if He eternally says Himself, His Word is eternal with Him." Therefore, let Him be thought with no other thing existing...[502]

Hence, if the essence exists without other things existing, it is necessary that the Word be coeternal with it. From which we have, in the same way, that the divine Word would be future even if there were no essence [besides the divine], and thus would need no other essence for its production: but if it proceeded through cognition of creatures, without doubt it would need them, and their cognition, for its production.

The Anselmian testimony is resolved. But if you answer that Anselm speaks of creatures future, present, or past, not of possible ones, read him in chapters 33 and 34: for after in chapters 31 and 32 he had proposed the difficulty whether, namely, God says Himself and creatures by the same Word or by a different one - since from the preceding it seemed concluded that the eternal Word is not the word of creatures - he answers in chapter 33 that God says Himself and creatures by the same Word, but in this way: "Therefore, since the supreme Spirit says Himself, He says all things that are made: for before they were made, when now they are made, and when they are corrupted or are changed in some way, they are always in Him - not what they are in themselves, but what is the same He; for in themselves they are a changeable essence, according to the changeable notion of a created thing, but in Him they are the very first essence and the first truth of existing: and so, in this way it cannot be rationally asserted that because the supreme Spirit says Himself, He also says whatever has been made, by one and the same Word." He pursues the same in chapter 34, showing that every notion of a created thing is, in God and in His Word, the life of God.

502. St. Anselm, Monologion, cc. 29 - 30.

Observe here first: if Anselm had thought that the Word proceeds formally through cognition of possible creatures according to their proper notions, he would have conceded that the divine Word is their word and likeness, and thus is the word of the things that have been made, at least according to their possible being. But since he asserts that by the divine Word there is said and expressed only the essence of God and the essences of the things that have been made, not according to their proper notions - even possible ones - but according to that whereby, in God Himself, they are God Himself and His life, without doubt he sensed that by this sole reason the Word is the word of creatures, even of possibles, namely, insofar as in God they are the life of God; for by this sole reason it is their likeness. He therefore excludes from the production of the Word, as an object per se required, even the essence possible according to its proper notion; and admits only the divine essence and what are formally in it. And since for the same reason he denies that the divine Word is the word of future creatures according to their proper notions, because it is not their likeness; by the same reasoning he ought to speak about possible creatures: for the case is the same for both, namely, that by that sole reason the Word is a likeness of creatures, insofar as they are the same as the essence and life of God Himself.

We, however, do not deny that the Word proceeds through intellection of creatures insofar as in God they are God Himself; nor is there any controversy about this. But we say that it does not proceed through cognition of them according to the proper notions which they have in themselves, even according to possible being.

This Anselmian testimony proves for us that he thinks the divine Word is not per se first the word of creatures: not that we deny, as he denies, that it is the word of creatures - even of future ones - according to their proper notions and likeness; for that cannot be denied. For by His Word God not only says Himself and creatures as they are the same as Himself and His life; but He also says them according to their proper notions: just as He not only understands Himself and creatures insofar as they are the same as Himself, but also according to their proper notions. Wherefore we cannot deny that the divine Word is so the word of creatures as also to be their likeness; but this kind of likeness is not in the same nature, nor is it an image, but it is a likeness by mere representation; and this suffices for the notion of a word: for the word of our mind, which we have about some substance or corporeal thing, is a likeness of it, not in the same nature, as is evident, but by a certain representation; yet in reality it is not an image of creatures, as we shall say in chapter 5.

But indeed Anselm, because he thought it inconvenient if the divine Word, precisely as Word, needed some creature according to the proper notion of a creature, therefore said that it is not the word of creatures according to their proper notions, but in the manner that we have explained. Yet it would without doubt be a great inconvenience if we were to say that it is equally first the substantial word of creatures according to their proper notions, even possibles, and the word of the Father; and that for its substantial production and characteristic property it in any way needed creatures. But, to avoid this absurdity, it is enough if we say that for the production of the Word there is required per se first and formally the cognition of the things which are formally in God, in the way that we said in the foregoing disputation.

There is added St. Thomas, who in De veritate, question 4, at the end, teaches that the Word is referred principally and, as it were, per se to the Father, but consequently and, as it were, per accidens to creatures; and in the second solution he says that the Word is not "of" a creature in the sense in which it would be "from" a creature; yet it is "about" a creature or "of a creature," because it is representative of it, as of an object.[503] But if the Word were produced formally by intellection insofar as it is of creatures, it would proceed from them according to intelligible being, and would also be said to be from them, as will be explained below. Now to interpret St. Thomas as speaking only of creatures which will at some time be, not of possibles, is trifling; for since he speaks about them absolutely, and joins to them only the divine essence, he seems to be speaking of all. Moreover, I do not see by the authority of what other Father or Scholastic writer this our opinion can be confirmed: few indeed have disputed about it, except the school of Scotus, which in this opinion defends its author. Wherefore now in the following chapter it must be confirmed by reason.

Caput IV - The a priori proof

The aforesaid opinion is confirmed by an a priori reason.

In order then by reason to prove this opinion, there must be recalled to mind what in chapters 1 and 4 of the preceding disputation we noted; especially that which, in the last place, we were saying, namely, that there is here no controversy whether by the same cognition by which the divine Word is primarily, by that same, not by another, God knows creatures, even future ones: but whether, through that cognition, insofar as it is of creatures, the Word proceeds formally; so that creatures, according to intelligible being, not only necessarily accompany the production of the Word, but also are compared with it per se in the fourth mode, as a principle according to intelligible being, which it has in memory and in first act. And thus it would be necessary that in a certain priority of reason we conceive possible creatures by the Father's intellect according to intelligible being before the Word is produced: or rather, can we understand a complete and perfect-in-itself Word produced by the Father, creatures possible not yet understood; as if, accidentally, together with the nature and characteristic property of the Word they were compared?

503. St. Thomas, De veritate, q. 4, at the end; and solution 2.

Now therefore I show that possible creatures do not precede in our way of understanding, according to intelligible being, as something per se necessary, the production of the Word. For if in this way they necessarily preceded, it would follow that the divine essence, according to its notion, would have a real order and connection with them; and there would be in it an intrinsic perfection of representing - representing, I say, according to the formal relative notion which we signify by the name "representation" - the creatures. But there is in God no such perfection beyond those which God has in Himself insofar as He is absolutely to Himself; therefore that representation of creatures cannot pertain per se to the production of the Word, but only the divine essence insofar as it is absolute to itself.

That this "representation" does not denote some peculiar perfection beyond the essence considered absolutely, without representation, is clear, because there is in God no real relation, that is, intrinsic and from the nature of the thing, to creatures, however you wish to name them, as was stated in disputation 104, chapter 6.[504] Wherefore the divine essence considered as absolute, without the representation of creatures, is understood as infinite and perfect.

But you will ask how it can be that creatures are said to be represented in God without the essence having some peculiar perfection for this? I answer that this happens in no other way than as we say that things future de facto are represented, which, no change being made in God, insofar as they would be in themselves, would not be represented, and would not be future; and they are said to be known by the knowledge of vision, so that what would otherwise be known only by the vision of simple intelligence, is known by the vision of cognition of actual existence. But this happens because the divine essence in itself, and considered absolutely to itself, is of such perfection that even if nothing were to be future or possible outside it, it would be altogether the same: but once a possible or a future is posited, without any change or relative perfection accruing, by a relation of reason alone it comes to be compared as representing and as certainly understanding what is compared. And he who must philosophize ought to grant that that relation is only of reason; which is the consent of all the Scholastics whom we there cited, nor has anyone hitherto dared to hold the opposite opinion; which we there proved by very strong reason. For the supreme being and supremely necessary, namely God, cannot have a connection with other things outside Himself, or need anything in order that He be: for, that being taken away by an impossibility, it follows by the intrinsic topic that nothing outside Him would be possible; whereas, with any other impossibility posited, by the intrinsic topic it would not follow that He Himself would not be possible, as is clear. Therefore God is in Himself absolute from every other. Whence it is that we say the divine essence is the primary object, truly per se necessary for the production of the Word; but creatures are secondary, and in no way per se required, but necessarily accompanying the production itself, although not with an equal necessity with that by which the Word is substantially produced. And as the essence is the primary object required for the production of the Word, so also the attributes, which so perfect the essence itself, that per se also and with equal necessity they regard the production of the Word.

504. See the author's disputation 104, cap. 6, on the absence of any real relation in God toward creatures.

But some say that the divine Word and possible creatures are with equal necessity; for the possible being of a thing is nothing else than not to imply a contradiction, which consists in a negation; and one negation of contradiction is not greater than another. This objection, however, can first easily be refuted from those things which we said above in disputation 104, chapter 6,[504] because in the very essences of things there is "more and less" according to the doctrine of Aristotle; and among truths one is greater than another: it is more a truth that the Word can be produced, than that creatures are possible. For just as it is a greater falsity that the Word cannot be produced, than that creatures are not possible; so too not to imply a contradiction is explained by a negation; yet that negation is not the object of the divine omnipotence, for omnipotence regards a posited object, as we said in the same place.[504] Finally, even among negations there can be, in a certain way, greater and lesser, inasmuch as the opposed positive is greater; whence the privation is greater, as we shall say in I - II, q. 7, a. 2; and thus the negation of the implication of contradiction is greater in that wherein the divine Word can be produced than in that wherein creatures are possible; just as the falsity and contradiction is greater in the opposite, namely in that the Word is not produced, than in that creatures are not produced.

Caput V - The a posteriori proof

The same is shown by a posteriori reasoning.

We can show the same opinion by reducing it to an absurdity, and at the same time explain it further. The first argument is this. If the Word, according to its substance and intrinsic characteristic property, proceeded formally by cognition of possible creatures, and those were objects per se required for this production of the Word, it would follow that the Word is not only a likeness, but also an image of creatures according to possible being - which no one concedes. For an image is a likeness proceeding from that which it represents, made in an intelligible mode; and this suffices if it proceeds from something as from an object existing in reality or as present in the intellect, as we said in the foregoing disputation, chapter 1, where we asserted the same about the Holy Spirit, namely, that the Word is the image of Him, in that by His cognition it proceeds formally: which reasoning we have followed here, and in the same way it has force in the present case. Some reply that in God the Word is not an image of creatures, because it does not proceed from them even as from primary objects existing in the Father's mind in first act, but as from secondary objects. But then I ask, what prevents its being an image of them secondarily, just as the eternal Word is said to be secondarily the word "of" creatures, while it is primarily the Word of the divine essence? To assert, indeed, that the notion of image belongs primarily and also secondarily only with respect to a primary object, although it is asserted gratuitously, has no true measure in reason. For if ...

Commonly likeness is defined thus: a likeness (similitudo) proceeding from something (understand also: as from an object) in order to represent. Anselm, as we noted in chapter 3, shrinks from conceding that the divine Word is a likeness of creatures, much less an image; but we say that it is indeed a likeness, because it represents them; yet not an image (imago), because it does not proceed from them as objects per se, but they are wholly accidental to the substance and character of the Word, and it is referred to them only by a relation of reason; and its nature is such that, without them, it would remain in itself in the same mode. For neither the notion of idea, nor anything relative to creatures, denotes in God more than a relation of reason, and his absolute essence (essentia) in itself in no way depends on anything extrinsic. Wherefore we can concede that creatures, according to possible existence (esse), are in the memory of the Father - which Scotus plainly denies - yet they are there in a secondary manner, as in the produced Word; and by no means do they per se pertain to its substantial and characteristic production.[505]

504. See the author's disputation 104, cap. 6, on the absence of any real relation in God toward creatures.

Posterior reason. Even if, per impossibile, one or another creature, or even all, were impossible, it would not follow, by the intrinsic topic, either that the divine Word would not be produced, or that it would be going to have another property and nature; therefore in no way would a creature per se pertain to the production of the Word. For if it necessarily pertained, it would follow, by the intrinsic topic, that it would not be in the Word in the same mode: for, when that which per se regards the production of something is removed, either its production is taken away, or that thing is produced as something of an altogether different kind in reason. This argument has forced the adversaries to split into various opinions. Cajetan, in his commentary on this article, warns us to be cautious on account of the diverse conditional propositions which in this matter are true. For this conditional is true: "Even if possible creatures did not exist, nonetheless the procession of the Word would exist in itself in the same mode"; from which there seems to follow that the production of the Word is prior to the possibility of creatures. And the contrary proposition is also true: "Even if the procession of the Word did not exist, nonetheless creatures would be possible"; from which there seems to be inferred that the possibility of creatures is prior to the very production of the Word. Therefore Cajetan warns that we must be cautious not to deny what in fact is the case. For although these conditionals are true, nonetheless it must be said that the Word now proceeds through the cognition of creatures. We might also, in Cajetan's favor, add that it is not surprising if from one impossibility another should follow: for from an impossibility anything follows.

But Cajetan's admonition helps us little. For if both those conditionals are true, they plainly indicate that it is altogether accidental both, for producing the Word, that creatures be possible, and, for producing creatures, that the Word be produced. For just as from the fact that, God remaining according to unity, creatures could be produced, it follows that the Trinity is related accidentally to their production, and that creatures can be produced by God precisely as one, not as triune; so also from the fact that the Word would be produced even if creatures were not possible, it is rightly inferred that possible creatures do not per se look to the production of the Word. For if creatures pertained per se to the production of the Word, and the Trinity to the production of creatures, it would follow very well that, with possible creatures removed, the Word would be taken away, and with the Trinity removed from the midst, creation also would be taken away: for when that which is per se is removed, that which arises from it per se is removed.

504. See the author's disputation 104, cap. 6, on the absence of any real relation in God toward creatures.
505. See Scotus' denial, and the author's opinion, disputation 104, cap. 6.

Moreover, we must not only attend to what in fact happens, as Cajetan wishes, but, among those things which in the production or distinction of some thing agree in act, we must discern which are per se pertinent, and which are accidental and concomitant or consequent. For this, it is most useful to argue from impossible suppositions, as in disputation 147 we shall do in the distinction of the Holy Spirit from the Son: for from that it easily appears what is the formal reason (ratio formalis) of something, what also per se pertains to the thing, and what holds only concomitantly. Nor indeed from an impossible supposition does it follow by the intrinsic topic that anything whatsoever follows, as we shall note there in chapter 1; but what is formal and per se in some thing, whether to be distinguished or produced, is most rightly inferred. Therefore both those conditionals rightly indicate that neither do possible creatures per se regard the production of the Word, nor the Trinity the production of creatures, even if it is produced by the three together, and even if, in the very production of the Word, creatures are simultaneously understood by the Father and are called the Father's by the Word itself. Others, constrained by the same argument, admit that, once that hypothesis is made - that creatures would be impossible - the divine Word would not proceed in the same nature and property; and these, to be sure, speak consistently with their own opinion: but this is manifestly absurd. First, because it is not the case that, from the fact that a stone would be impossible, God would not be God, or that some intrinsic perfection would be lacking to God. For since he is the first being, he is so absolutely perfect in himself that he needs no possible thing; indeed, as soon as God is understood, creatures are understood to be possible - that is, not to imply a contradiction - as we noted in disputation 104; though not conversely. Therefore, since God, by the very fact that he is God and supremely perfect in himself, by his own nature begets, it follows that he does not need possible creatures, as objects per se necessary, for the production of the Word. Next, even if some creature implied a contradiction among those which we suppose to be possible, God would truly be omnipotent, infinitely knowing, and wise: for he is not called omnipotent because he can make this and that creature together with others, but because he is in himself so perfect that whatever does not imply a contradiction can be done by him; nor is his omnipotence diminished because he cannot do what is impossible. Concerning knowledge and wisdom the same must be said; therefore at least from this we have that there is no creature in particular by whose cognition the Word proceeds formally, and which would per se be necessary for the production of the Word.

But some say that, from the supposition that some creature would be impossible - for instance, that a stone would be impossible - both would follow, namely that God would be omnipotent, and that he would not be; because that supposition implies a contradiction ex terminis: and hence from it there follows each part of the contradiction in the present difficulty, namely that God would be omnipotent and would not be omnipotent; that the Son would be produced and would not be produced. But this argumentation is frivolous; for in every impossible supposition there is a contradiction in the very terms, as there is in this one, "The Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son"; nonetheless, as we shall show below in disputation 147, chapter 1, from an impossible supposition, with the supposition itself retained, it does not follow by the intrinsic topic that any part of the contradiction follows; but from it we can argue usefully. Moreover, who would dare to say that, therefore, God is God and supremely perfect because a man, or an ape of such a nature and figure, can be made possible? or that the Word proceeds within him in such a nature and characteristic property because an ape of such a figure is possible? For what connection will the intelligible Word have with an ape, as with a principle according to possible existence? But if this is ridiculous, indeed absurd, let us say that the productions of the persons within God are altogether absolute from possible creatures, nor are creatures in the order of origin in any way prior. I said advisedly, in the order of origin: for they can be understood as prior in another kind of priority, namely that by which that essence and what follows essentially are understood to be prior to the personal things - a priority which is as it were universal, by which that is said to be prior from which the consequence of subsisting does not hold, according to Aristotle's mind in the Predicaments, in the chapter on the modes of the prior; as animal is prior to man. But this kind of priority matters little for saying that creatures are per se required for the production of the Word; for to this end they would have to be prior not only by this kind of priority, but also by origin. Moreover, by this kind of priority the knowledge of vision of future creatures also precedes; although, according to everyone who holds the truth, that knowledge in no way per se pertains to production.

But if God and the Word itself are in reality absolute from every other, and are not connected with any creature by a real relation, it rightly follows that, when anything else whatever is removed per impossibile, the procession of the Word will be in the same way: because what is absolute remains in the same way when anything else whatever is removed, as before. Furthermore, it is certain that none of the Scholastics posited in the divine Word a relation more than of reason toward creatures; and this follows from the things we said in disputation 104, chapter 6.[506]

To all these add that, for exactly the same reasons, the Holy Spirit does not proceed by the love of creatures under possible existence, even if we say that in this mode they are the object of the divine love. I say this because I know that among the Scholastic Doctors there is a controversy whether love is borne toward possible creatures, or only toward future ones, as we saw in disputation 79. But whoever asserts that it is terminated only to future ones will doubtless teach that the Holy Spirit does not proceed formally by their love; the authors of this opinion we reported in chapter 1. Among those, however, who assert that the love of God is also borne toward possible creatures, whom we mentioned in chapter 2, the controversy can be handled in the same way as about the Word; and it must be defined in the same way, and by exactly the same reasons. We therefore, who assert that God...

God is in himself absolutely perfect without any order to creatures; consequently we teach not only that the production of the Word, but also that of the Holy Spirit is perfect before possible creatures are either understood or loved.

It is necessary to refute the arguments of the prior opinion. To the first testimony of St. Thomas I answer that the divine Word does indeed express in itself the creatures, even according to their proper formal reasons, and is their word, although Anselm thinks the opposite, as was said in chapter 3; nevertheless from this it is not lawful to infer that creatures pertain per se to the production of the Word according to the Word's own intrinsic notion. For that it is the word of creatures, it has from a respect of reason alone toward them, and consequently; whereas without such an order it is substantially in itself perfect without any respect to creatures. And indeed, since St. Thomas there speaks not only of possible creatures but also of future ones, because the divine Word expresses all creatures according to St. Thomas's own opinion, and therefore the Father by his Word says not only possibles but also futures, it follows that he is not speaking of possibles as per se pertaining on the part of the principle; for futures do not per se pertain, and nonetheless they are expressed and said by the divine Word.

To the second testimony of St. Thomas I answer that it is true that the Father, by understanding himself, and his Son, and the Holy Spirit, and all other things that are in his knowledge, produces the Word; not because all these per se pertain to the substantial production of the Word, but because they are known together by the same knowledge by which the Word is produced, although creatures, as attendant or consequent, bear themselves to the production of the Word. That this is St. Thomas's meaning is gathered from the fact that he speaks of every creature and of all the things that are contained in God's knowledge; under this there falls not only the possible creature but also the future, because God knows one thing when he knows a future, and another when he knows a possible: for they are different objects and intelligible truths. Therefore, since future creatures do not per se look to the production of the Word, it follows that St. Thomas was not speaking there of those things alone that per se concur to that production, but also of all the things that accompany it.

To the third testimony, which was from St. Augustine, one could reply first that in that place the particle "de" does not signify origin, but an order to an object; for Augustine did not say that the Word is born "from" all the things that are in the Father, but that it is "of" all those things: and one can say that the Word is "of" something from which it does not proceed, because it is of it as of an object. In this way St. Thomas teaches, in that question 4 of De veritate, in the replies, that the divine Word can be called the word "of" creatures and "about" creatures, but not "from" creatures; because the particle "a" ("from") denotes origin, whereas the particle "de" ("of, about") can signify only an order toward an object.[507] But because Augustine often uses in that chapter the preposition "de" so as to denote origin, we do not refuse to admit this signification in the whole chapter. Yet if we have shown that he is speaking there not only of the knowledge of possible creatures, but also of future ones, the cited testimony will have no force against our position: for no one will dare to say that future creatures per se pertain to the substantial production of the Word, but only as accompanying. Now that Augustine is speaking of the knowledge even of future things is clear from the whole discourse of the preceding chapter, in which he proves that the Father has the knowledge of all things, even of future ones, and receives the notice of nothing from his angels the spirits; which he proved from that Matt. 6: "For your Father knows what you need before you ask him." He adds moreover: "Nor did he come to know it from some time so as to know, but he foreknew without beginning all future times, and in them also what and when we would ask of him, and whom, and about which things, he would hear or would not hear," and so on.[508] Then he shows that this knowledge of God is very far removed from ours in these words: "But the knowledge of God is itself wisdom, as it were wisdom; it is the very essence or substance: because in the marvelous simplicity of his nature there is not one thing to be wise and another to be; whereas our knowledge in many things is losable and receivable; wherefore for us it is not the same thing to be as to know or to be wise: for we can be even if we are ignorant." From this he gathers that in the same way the word which is born from our knowledge is dissimilar to that which is born from the Father's essence; he said expressly "from the Father's essence," not "from his knowledge," because he had already shown that essence and knowledge are the same; wherefore he subjoins: "Such a thing it is as if I were to say, 'from the Father's knowledge, from the Father's wisdom,' or, what is more express, 'of the Father's knowledge, of the Father's wisdom.'"

506. See the author's disputation 104, cap. 6, on there being in the divine Word no real relation toward creatures. Also cf. Aristotle, Predicaments, the chapter on the modes of the prior; and Cajetan's commentary on this article.

507. St. Thomas, De veritate, q. 4, ad 2 (on the usage of "of" and "from" in naming the Word with respect to creatures).

Immediately he begins from the beginning of chapter 15 - which had been alleged for the contrary opinion - to prove that the Word of the Father is "essence from essence," "wisdom from wisdom," and "knowledge from knowledge," in all things like and equal, so that there is nothing in the Father's knowledge which is not in the Word, because his knowledge is his essence, and the Word has received this whole and equally perfect. "Therefore," says Augustine, "the only-begotten of God the Father, the Son of God, in all things like and equal to the Father - God from God, light from light, wisdom from wisdom, essence from essence - is altogether what the Father is, yet not the Father: for he is Son, that one Father: and on this account he knows all things that the Father knows; but he is 'from the Father' as he is 'to be.'" And a little after: "Accordingly, as it were speaking himself, the Father begot a Word in all things equal to himself; for he would not have spoken himself completely and perfectly, if there were anything less or more in his Word than in himself; and therefore this Word is true truth, because whatever is in the knowledge of which it is begotten, is in it." By these words Augustine openly teaches that in the Word there must be the knowledge of all things, even of future things, which he had said above to be in the Father, so that there is nothing less in the Son than in the Father. For if knowledge of future things were lacking to the Son himself, undoubtedly he would not be "wisdom whole from wisdom," nor "knowledge whole from knowledge," nor would the Father have spoken himself wholly. When therefore afterwards he says, "Accordingly God the Father knows all things in himself; he knows them in the Son, but in himself, as himself in the Son, as his Word, which is 'of' those things that are in himself," which words we alleged for the prior opinion, they must be understood, in accordance with the foregoing, as speaking of the knowledge of all things, both future and past and present; for he is speaking also of the knowledge of future things, which he had earlier said to be in the Father. He says, then, that the Word is born "of" all the things that are in the Father, even of the knowledge of future and of possible things; but in the mode in which they are in the Father. For all the things that the Son has, even knowledge of future things, he has from the Father, and in the same way they are in both; but because the knowledge of God, which is his essence, primarily and per se befits God the Father insofar as he is of himself; insofar, however, as it is referred to possible creatures, it befits him secondarily and consequently, even if necessarily, as was explained above; whereas insofar as it is of future creatures, it befits him contingently; therefore in the same way it befits the Son. And although creatures do not per se look to the substantial production of the Son according to the Son's own nature and personal property, nevertheless they pertain per se to his procession insofar as such a procession proceeds secondarily, with respect, namely, to possible and to future creatures - about which there is no controversy. Therefore we ought thus to consider the Word, that first it is in itself substantially produced, cut off from every creature even a possible one, as we have said, to be God of such a nature that, if there shall be possible creatures, it knows them; if there shall be future ones, likewise: yet this is altogether accidental and has no real order to them. Wherefore, to the production of the Word considered in this manner, whatever creatures there may be are accidental; yet to that production, insofar as now it is considered with a respect to creatures and to their actual knowledge, both of possible and of future things, possible and future creatures per se pertain; and this alone Augustine contends, namely, that the Word should have all the things from the Father whatever the Father has, and in the same way; which does not militate against our opinion.

508. Matt. 6:8; and see St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, esp. cc. 14 - 15.

In addition, Augustine seems to be using "creatures" as Anselm did - whom we reported in chapter 3 - not according to their proper formal reasons, but according to that whereby in God they are God himself and his life; and in this way they per se pertain to the production of the Word, and about this there is no controversy. For the question is only about creatures according to their proper formal reasons, by which they are distinguished from God and according to which they are not the life of God himself. That Augustine speaks in this sense I gather from his words: "But in himself, as himself in the Son, as his Word." As if he were to say: all the things that the Father sees in himself he knows as the same as himself, which are his life; and therefore he rightly subjoins at once, "Which is 'of' those things that are in himself." For if in God the Father himself they are life and his substance, and the Son is "of" the life and substance of the Father, the Son will be "of" those things per se indeed, yet otherwise than he is "of" creatures considered according to their proper formal reasons.

The arguments, moreover, can no less easily be solved from what has been said.

Reply to the first argument: I say that for the Son to proceed from an act which is perfect and comprehensive does not make that act be a comprehension of creatures at the same time because God knows creatures; rather, from the fact that his knowledge is comprehensive, it has this, that he can know all possible creatures - not with the same degree of necessity and priority as the essence itself, but consequently and secondarily, as they are compared with the essence. For just as, to the notion of comprehension, it belongs that God can know the secrets of his will and the things which he decreed to do in time, yet actual knowledge of these is not required so that the Word may proceed - for these are far posterior to the production of the Word - so neither is actual knowledge of possible creatures required; for these too are accidental to the production of the Word, and in the order of origin are not per se requisites; although possible creatures, indeed, are necessarily known, yet not with an equal degree of necessity when they are compared with the divine essence; whereas future creatures are altogether known contingently in that comparison.

Reply to the second argument: When it is objected that omnipotence cannot be understood without possible creatures because it is referred to them, I reply that omnipotence, as it is conceived and named by us, cannot be understood without creatures, because a relation is conceived; but as it is in God, as absolute - just as was proved in disputation 104, chapter 6 - it is rightly understood as a quidditative and comprehensive knowledge without such an order and without creatures being understood together with it. For thus it is nothing other than God himself absolutely perfect in himself, whom we confess with all theologians to exist; and, as we noted there, no one ought to marvel if we say that God's omnipotence is known by God in itself absolutely, without any respect to creatures. Rather, as we showed there, the opinion of those is worthy of reproof who, in order to defend that creatures are per se as necessary to the production of the Word as the essence is, invent in God relations, from the nature of the thing, to creatures.[509]

Reply to the third argument: As to what must be said further, to represent creatures is not in God some perfection relative to creatures which would be removed if creatures were taken away; but it is the very essence of God insofar as it is in itself absolute; which would remain in God in the same way, even if there were no possible creatures at all; yet it would not be called by us a representation of creatures - because this is understood with a relation of reason to creatures, which, once creatures are taken away, altogether perishes, as we said above about the presence of future things. Therefore it does not follow that there is any necessary connection between the being of the divine essence and creatures, whether possible or as adduced to ground the production of the Word; for whatever else the divine essence represents, representing creatures is by a relation of reason and from its nature refers to them.

Disputatio CXLIV - In what way the name "Word" denotes a respect

The name "Word" in God primarily signifies the relation of what is produced; it connotes essence secondarily. cap. 1.

Not by reason of essence alone, nor by reason of personal property alone, but by reason of both together, the Word has a respect to creatures. cap. 2.

Caput I - The name "Word" in God primarily signifies the relation of what is produced; it connotes essence secondarily

St. Thomas, in question 4 of De veritate, article 8, and elsewhere, whom Ferrarensis follows; against whom - as was shown above in chapter 3, in the reply to the second doubt - he affirms that the name "Word" directly and primarily in God signifies essence, as it does in us.[510]

509. See the author's disputation 104, cap. 6, on there being in the divine Word no real relation toward creatures.
510. St. Thomas, De veritate, q. 4, a. 8; cf. the scholia attributed to Ferrarensis; and above, cap. 3, ad secundum dubium.

It is confirmed: An absolute quality is signified; but by a relation of what is produced, or of what is said, it is connoted secondarily. But this is proved, because in human beings "word" primarily signifies a quality, which Ferrarensis assumes as manifest; yet it connotes the relation of what is produced: therefore in God it will primarily signify essence in place of absolute quality, and secondarily the relation of what is produced.

But far more probable is the opinion of Cajetan in this article, who asserts that "Word" primarily signifies the relation of what is said and produced, and connotes essence; and he thinks this to be the opinion of the holy Doctor in the first and second articles of this question, and in the third article, reply to the fourth, to have retracted the opinion which he had previously followed: for in that reply he says in these words: "The name 'Word' is principally imposed to signify the relation of utterance, and consequently with respect to creatures."[511] And in the first article he says thus: "Word, inasmuch as it is said properly in the divine context, signifies something proceeding from another, which pertains to the notion of personal names in the divine, inasmuch as persons are distinguished according to origins." And in the second article: "Word is the proper name of the person of the Son; for it signifies a certain emanation of the intellect."[512] In which places he not obscurely indicates that the primary signification of this name is the relation of one proceeding by the intellect. For when Ferrarensis says that St. Thomas did not think that "word" formally signifies the relation itself, but that which proceeds and to which the relation belongs, this seems said without any foundation. But when he says that it signifies emanation, assuredly he speaks of that, not formally under the ratio of emanation and by way of emanation, but under the ratio of a relation in actual being: for in this same sense he said that persons are distinguished by origins, whereas in his doctrine they are distinguished by relations in actual being.

It is proved: By this reasoning the opinion is proved. No less is the relation of what is said expressed by the name "Word" than the relation of one begotten by the name "Son": but the name "Son" signifies the relation of what is produced by generation: therefore the name "Word" signifies the relation of what is produced by diction.

Then Cajetan adds that by the name "Word," and by other personal names, relation is signified primarily, and essence is connoted secondarily; just as also by this name "person" - which indeed Ferrarensis does not grant about the other names, although he admits it about the name "person." Yet he is mistaken: for the same rationale applies to all; except that in the name "person" the relation is signified primarily and directly, yet materially, not formally, as was said above in disputation 137, chapter 2.[513] But by other relative, incomposite names, relation is signified directly and expressly, as by the names Son, Word, Father, Begetter, etc. I said this of relative, incomposite names: for complex names, such as "God begetting," "God begotten," "God the Father," "God the Son," directly signify both things, both the absolute substance and the relation: for they consist of a double simple name, one absolute, the other relative.

511. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 34, a. 3, ad 4.
512. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 34, a. 1; a. 2.
513. The author, disputation 137, cap. 2.

But Ferrarensis's argument is easily refuted: for we say that in human beings "word" signifies primarily and formally the relation of what is produced by diction, or at least the relation of what is said (for in disputation 142, chapter 4, we showed that it is not of the essence of a "word" in human beings to be produced by diction, as it is of the essence of "Word" in the divine); but the so-called quality, or that produced by utterance, is not signified primarily, but secondarily and materially, as the subject of this relation, which, receiving denomination from it, is called "word," just as "Son" signifies primarily the relation, but secondarily the substance itself which is called son.

Not by reason of essence alone, nor of personal property alone, but by reason of both together does the Word have a respect to creatures.

Caput II - On the respect which the divine Word has to creatures, and by what account

Since the divine Word not only has regard to the Father producing, but also to creatures, inasmuch as they are said and uttered by it, the Scholastics do not agree as to the rationale by which this respect to creatures befits it. For as to the relation to the Father, it is certain that it befits the Word solely by reason of personal property. As to the relation to creatures, therefore, I find two extreme opinions among the Scholastic writers. The first is Scotus's, in the first book, distinction 27, question 3, who teaches that the Word is referred to creatures solely by reason of essence, not by reason of notional property; indeed he even affirms that no divine person is referred to creatures by reason of personal property, but by reason of essence alone; and hence that "gift" is not a property of the Holy Spirit; about which again, question 38, article 3.[514] This opinion about the divine Word seems to have been handed down by St. Thomas in this article, in reply to objection 1; and Capreolus in the first book, distinction 27, question 2, article 1, conclusion 5; Ferrarensis on the Contra gentiles, book 4, chapter 13, at the phrase "to the third it can be said"; and Cajetan in the commentary on this article.[515] But Capreolus also asserts that St. Thomas here retracted the opinion which he had previously followed in the first book, distinction 27, question 1, article 3; yet Ferrarensis contends that St. Thomas never taught the opposite: because in that first distinction 27 he only said that the Word is referred primarily to the Father speaking and producing, but secondarily to creatures as to a secondary object; whether, however, it connotes a respect to creatures by reason of personal property, he did not say; and yet this very thing he taught altogether in that cited reply.

But this opinion of Scotus can be proved: because the respect of the divine Word to creatures is only the respect of one manifesting to things manifested; but to manifest creatures befits each person by reason of essence: therefore it will befit the Word also by reason of that.

The opposite, later, opinion is that of Aureolus, which Capreolus reports in that question 2, article 1, in the arguments against the conclusion, wholly opposed to the former: namely, that the Word has a respect to creatures by reason of personal property alone. For whenever a respect is

514. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 27, q. 3; and St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 3.

515. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 27, q. 2, a. 1, concl. 5; Ferrarensis, on Contra gentiles, IV, cap. 13, at "Ad tertiam potest dici"; Cajetan, on I, q. 34.

ascribed to a person which does not befit the others, it must be ascribed to that person by reason of singular personal property: otherwise, if by reason of essence alone it were ascribed to a person, it would be common to all; for all, in the same essence, are equal: but the divine Word alone has this respect of "word" to creatures, as those said by it: therefore by reason of personal property alone does it befit it.[516]

Yet to me a certain middle opinion has seemed much more probable, which asserts that neither by reason of essence alone, nor by reason of personal property alone, but by reason of both together, this relation of the Word to creatures befits the second person; and indeed that it does not befit by reason of essence alone is sufficiently proved by Aureolus's reasoning: for this relation would be common to the three persons if it arose from essence alone; wherefore the ratio of "word" would be said essentially, and that account would be nothing other than the ratio of manifestation after the mode of the intellect - something we showed false in disputation 142.[517] Moreover, that this relation does not befit by reason of personal property alone, unless essence also be connoted in a peculiar way, is proved: for personal property is only a certain relation to the person producing or produced, which is signified by the name "Son," and by the name "Father": therefore since the Word, beyond the relation which it has to the Father, also has a peculiar ratio of manifesting to the things manifested, this is a sign that, beyond the relation which is property, it includes something else: therefore the essence, which contains the ratio of one manifesting, determined by the property of what is produced, is the foundation of that peculiar relation which the Word has to creatures. Nor has St. Thomas denied this anywhere; he only teaches that the primary respect of the Word is to the Father, the secondary to creatures, as to a secondary object. Hence is gathered what Gabriel noted most excellently in the first book, distinction 27, question 3, article 3, doubt 1: namely, that "Word" and "Son" are not synonymous; for although the real relation of each is altogether the same, nevertheless something is connoted by the name "Word" which is not connoted by the name "Son." Why the "Word," then, is not a peculiar notion, we said in disputation 137, chapter 5; yet in the meantime Gabriel denies, without merit, that "Word" connotes a respect of reason to creatures. For these nominal relations, which we call "of reason," they do not admit; just as they do not admit a distinction of reason, as we saw in disputation 117, chapter 1.[518] But how there is no real respect in God to creatures, we said in disputation 104, chapter 6; up to this point, however, no one has posited in the Word a relation to creatures greater than that of reason, expressed by the Word itself.[519]

Last, it should be observed that the ratio of "word," besides the relation which it has to the Father as to one speaking and producing, and to creatures as to things said by the Word itself, also has a respect of reason to the Father himself: and this respect is that of one representing to him to whom it represents; for St. Thomas says in article 1, reply to the third, of this question: "To say is nothing other than to utter a word; but 'word' imports a relation to the thing understood; by the 516. Aureolus, as reported by Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 27, q. 2, a. 1, in the arguments contra the conclusion.

517. The author, disputation 142, cap. 4.
518. The author, disputation 117, cap. 1.
519. The author, disputation 104, cap. 6.

word uttered the understanding is manifested." Although the Father does not understand by the Son and by innate Wisdom as by a form, as we recalled from St. Augustine and others in disputation 142.[520]

Quaestio XXXV - On the Image

142, cap. 2. Nevertheless He is said to understand, and to see, and to say all things in the Son and in His Word; and to express the same to Himself as His own image. But these things would not be true unless the Word represented to the Father the intelligible objects, and they shone in it and were set before the Father to be beheld. We therefore say that the Word represents to the Father, and that by it the Father understands all things, not as a form (forma), but as the term produced of His intellection, just as the Father and the Son are said to love us by the Holy Spirit produced by Them. Wherefore they err not a little, who say that since it does not belong to the notion of the Word to represent to some one the things said and understood, therefore the Son of God is called Word, not because He represents to the Father, but because He represents to Himself. For who on this account will affirm that He is the Word of the Father, and not rather the Word of Himself? For the word represents to him who utters it the things said in it, not to himself. There is indeed a difference between our word and the divine: ours is itself the formal intellection by which someone is constituted an intelligent knower, and it is not produced by intellection itself; but the divine Word is brought forth by the intellection of the one speaking, and is understood, nor is it the form by which he who speaks understands, as we showed at length in disputation 142, cap. 4; it is, however, the term of that intellection, representing to the Father, as it were over against Him, whatever is understood by the Father; and the Father is said to understand and to say Himself and other things by His Word. But that the Word should represent to itself all the things which it understands, is not something notional and proper to the person; for every person has this by reason of essence (essentia), by which one is formally constituted intelligent. In the Word, however, there must be some peculiar representation which is not common to the whole Trinity: wherefore it must be with respect to the Father as uttering and speaking; otherwise it would be common and essential.

Articulus I - Whether image is predicated personally in the divine

Objicitur primo. It seems that image is not predicated personally in the divine. For St. Augustine says in the book On Faith to Peter: "One is the Trinity's divinity and the image, to which man was made."[1] Therefore image is said essentially and not personally.

Objicitur secundo. Furthermore, St. Hilary says in the book On the Synod that image is "an indifferent species of that thing which is imagined."[2] But species or form (forma), in the divine, is said essentially: therefore image likewise.

520. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 34, a. 1, ad 3; and see the author, disputation 142.

Objicitur tertio. Furthermore, image is so called from imitation. In this there is implied before and after. But in the divine persons there is nothing before and after. Therefore image cannot be a personal name in the divine.

Sed contra: Augustine says, "What is more absurd than that an image be referred to itself? Therefore, in the divine, image is said relatively. And thus it is a personal name."[3]

Respondeo dicendum, that belonging to the notion of image is likeness (similitudo). Yet not any likeness suffices for the notion of image, but a likeness which is in the species of the thing, or at least in some sign of the species. Now, among corporeal things, the sign of a species seems especially to be figure; for we see that diverse animals, according to species, have diverse figures, but not diverse colors. Whence, if the color of some thing be painted on a wall, it is not said to be an image unless the figure be painted. But even likeness of species or of figure does not suffice; origin is required for the notion of image. For as Augustine says in the book of 83 Questions, "One thing is not the image of another unless it is expressed from it."[4] Therefore, for something to be truly an image, it is required that from another there proceed something like in species, or at least in a sign of the species. But those things which in the divine import procession or origin are personal. Wherefore this name "image" is a personal name.

Ad primum ergo dicendum, that "image" is properly said of that which proceeds to the likeness of another. But that to whose likeness something proceeds is properly called an exemplar, and improperly an image. Thus, however, Augustine uses the name "image" when he says that the divinity of the holy Trinity is the image to which man was made

Ad secundum dicendum, that species, as put by Hilary in the definition of image, imports a form drawn forth into something from another. In this way image is said to be the species of something, as that which is assimilated to another is said to be its form insofar as it has a form similar to another's

Ad tertium dicendum, that imitation, in the divine persons, does not signify posteriority, but only assimilation

Conclusio est, This name "image" in the divine is a personal name.

Articulus II - Whether the name "image" is proper to the Son

Dico: The second proceeds thus. It seems that the name "image" is not proper to the Son.

Objicitur primo. For, as St. John Damascene says, the Holy Spirit is the image of the Son.[5] Therefore it is not proper to the Son.

Objicitur secundo. Furthermore, of the notion of image is likeness with expression (as Augustine says in the book of 83 Questions).[6] But this belongs to the Holy Spirit: for He proceeds from another according to a mode of likeness. Therefore the Holy Spirit is an image, and thus it is not proper to the Son to be an image.

Objicitur tertio. Furthermore, man also is called the image of God, according to that 1 Corinthians 11: "The man ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God."[7] Therefore it is not proper to the Son.

Sed contra est quod Augustine says in the sixth and seventh books On the Trinity, that the Son alone is the image of the Father.[8]

Respondeo dicendum, that the Greek doctors commonly say that the Holy Spirit is the image of the Father and the Son. But the Latin doctors attribute the name "image" to the Son alone. For in canonical Scripture it is found only of the Son. For it is said in Colossians 1: "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation"; and in Hebrews 1: "Who, being the brightness of His glory and the figure of His substance."[9] Some assign the reason for this from the fact that the Son agrees with the Father not only in nature, but also in the notion of a principle (principium); but the Holy Spirit agrees neither with the Son nor with the Father in any notion. But this does not seem sufficient: because, just as according to relations (relationes) in the divine neither equality nor inequality is considered (as Augustine says), so neither that likeness which is required for the notion of image.[10] Hence others say that the Holy Spirit cannot be called the image of the Son, because the image is not the image of an image; nor the image of the Father, because the image is referred immediately to that of which it is the image; but the Holy Spirit is referred to the Father through the Son; nor yet the image of the Father and the Son, because thus there would be one image of two, which seems impossible. Whence it remains that the Holy Spirit is in no way an image. But this is nothing: because the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, as will be said below. Wherefore nothing prevents in this way the Father and the Son (insofar as They are one) from being one image, since man too is one image of the whole Trinity. And therefore it must be said otherwise, that just as the Holy Spirit, although by His procession He receives the nature of the Father, as also the Son, is nevertheless not called "begotten"; so, although He receives a like species to the Father, He is not called an image: because the Son proceeds as Word, in whose notion is the likeness of species to that from which He proceeds; but it is not of the notion of love - although this agrees to love - that the Holy Spirit is as He is insofar as He is the divine love.

Ad primum ergo dicendum, that Damascene and the other Greek doctors commonly use the name "image" for perfect likeness

Ad secundum dicendum, that although the Holy Spirit is like to the Father and the Son, nevertheless it does not follow that He is an image in the sense already stated

Ad tertium dicendum, that the image of someone is found in something in two ways. In one way, in a thing of the same nature according to species, as the image of a king is found in his own son. In another way, in a thing of another nature, as the image of a king is found in a coin. In the first way, the Son is the image of the Father; in the second way, man is called the image of God, and therefore, to designate in man the imperfection of the image, man is not only called "image," but "to the image," by which some movement of one tending toward perfection is designated. But the Son of God is not said to be "to the image," because He is the perfect image of the Father

Conclufio est, according to the opinion of the Latin Fathers the Son alone is called "image" in the divine. As to the text of each article, there is nothing that needs note or explanation; for as regards their doctrine, we shall explain it in the following disputation. But what some recent authors dispute here, whether in the rational creature there is the image of the Trinity, and in the irrational there is a vestige, seems altogether beyond the matter. St. Thomas handles this question below in question 93; and St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 3, part 2, articles 1 and 2; Scotus in questions 5 and 9; Durandus in the First Part of distinction 28, question 4, and in the Second Part, question 2; Capreolus in questions 2 and 3; Gabriel in questions 9 and 10; and Marsilius in the first question.[11]

It is objected that the one like to the Father is not called image: because the Son proceeds as Word, and it belongs to the notion of a word to be a specific likeness to that from which it proceeds; not, however, to the notion of love, although this agrees to love, which is the Holy Spirit, inasmuch as he is divine love.

I answer to the first, that St. John Damascene and the other Greek Doctors commonly use the name "image" for a perfect likeness.

To the second, that although the Holy Spirit is like to the Father and the Son, nevertheless it does not follow that he is image for the reason already given.

To the third, that the image of something is found in another in two ways. In one way, in a thing of the same nature according to species, as the image of a king is found in his son. In another way, in a thing of another nature, as the image of a king is found on a coin. In the first way, the Son is the image of the Father; in the second way, man is said to be the image of God. And therefore, to designate in man the imperfection of the image, man is not only said to be "image," but "to the image" (ad imaginem), whereby a certain motion of one tending to the perfection of that of which he is the image is designated. But the Son of God is not said to be "to the image," because he is the perfect image of the Father.

Conclusion - According to the opinion of the Latin Fathers, the Son alone in the divinity is called image. As to the letter of each of the two articles, there is nothing that needs remark and explanation: for as regards their doctrine, we shall explain it in the following disputation. But what some more recent authors here dispute - whether in a rational creature there is the image of the Trinity, and in an irrational creature a vestige - seems altogether beside our subject. St. Thomas treats this question below in question 93, and St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 3, part 2, articles 1 and 2; Scotus, questions 5 and 9; Durandus, First Part, distinction 28, question 4, and Second Part, question 2; Capreolus, questions 2 and 3; Gabriel [Biel], questions 9 and 10; Marsilius, in the First Book, question 1.[521]

521. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 93; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 3, pars 2, a. 1 - 2; Scotus, In I Sent., qq. 5, 9; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 28, q. 4; In II Sent., q. 2; Capreolus, In I Sent., qq. 2 - 3; Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., qq. 9 - 10; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 1.

Caput II - That the notion of image properly belongs to the Son alone is proved by authority

Now, the common and received opinion in this matter asserts two things: first, that truly and properly, without any metaphor, "image" is found in God; second, that this notion of image does not belong to God essentially, but notionally to some person, namely to the Son alone.

The first part of this opinion is handed down by St. Thomas, Cajetan, and more recent Thomists in this question; by St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 31, part 2, article 1, question 1; by Capreolus in the First Book, distinction 27, question c., article 1, conclusion 6; by Henry in Quodlibet 4, question 2; by the Canariensis in question 27, article 2, in the fourth part of his commentary. St. Augustine also, and the Fathers whom we shall cite below, call some person in the divinity "image" absolutely; as also Scripture says of the Son in Colossians 1: "Who is the image of the invisible God"; and in Hebrews 1: "Who, being the splendor of [his] glory and the figure of his substance" - hypostasis in Greek, that is, of his hypostasis or person - as we saw above in disputation 124, chapter 4.[522] But if these testimonies of the Fathers and of Scripture can be explained without any impropriety - as will be clear in chapters 3 and 4 from the definition of image - it would be rash to take refuge in tropes and figures.

The second part of this opinion, which asserts that the notion of image, without appropriation, is to be attributed to the Son alone, is also embraced by St. Thomas, Cajetan, the more recent authors, Capreolus, Henry, and the Canariensis in the places cited; and by St. Bonaventure in the same article 1, question 2; although they do not all agree in the reason that is given. Among the Fathers, not only the Latins, but also the Greeks, call the Son alone "image." Origen, On First Principles, book 1, chapter 2, although at length in the following chapter discoursing concerning the Holy Spirit, never calls him image. Nay rather, among the Greeks, St. Athanasius, in Sermon 4 against the Arians, not far from the beginning, affirms that the Son alone is image. For speaking of the martyrs he says thus: "Since these are such, nevertheless the only-begotten Son alone and the Word is called wisdom; or why, since so many are like to the Father, is this one alone image?" He subsequently pursues the reason of this more at large. And in the Epistle on the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, a little before the middle, he writes thus: "And since there is one God, it is necessary also that there be one image of God, namely the Son, who is his."[8][523] And shortly after: "If you name him image, by that very word you have shown him to be Son: for what is like to God if not his own offspring?" of which testimony we also spoke in disputation 113, chapter 7.

Among the Latins, moreover, St. Hilary, On the Trinity VII toward the end; St. Augustine, On the Trinity book 3, chapter 1, and book 7, last chapter; Richard of St. Victor, On the Trinity VI, chapter 19; and Rupert, On the Trinity IV, chapter 2, attribute the notion of image to the Son alone.[524]

---

522. Colossians 1:15; Hebrews 1:3.

523. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VI, c. 4, in fin.; V, c. 6.

524. St. Athanasius, Contra Arianos sermo 4; Epistola de decretis Nicaenae synodi; St. Hilary, De Trinitate VII; St. Augustine, De Trinitate III, c. 1; VII, c. ultimo; Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate VI, c. 19; Rupert of Deutz, De Trinitate IV, c. 2.

Rupert, indeed, says that the Word is image, but that the Holy Spirit is the likeness of both; thus he explains that passage of Genesis 1: "Let us make man to our image and likeness," etc. In favor of this opinion St. Anselm also is cited in the Monologion, chapter 37; there, however, he only teaches that the Son is so Word and image of the Father that the Father is not image, as is gathered from the last words of that chapter; of the Holy Spirit he asserts nothing. Therefore Basil, and St. John Damascene, Gregory the Wonderworker, and Athanasius adduced in the preceding chapter, seem to me not to have spoken properly when they also call the Holy Spirit image, attending rather to the reason of likeness founded upon unity of nature, than to the nature of image, which consists in representation and origin.[525]

Caput III - That there is in God the notion of image properly so called is proved by reason

Moreover, by reason let us now confirm the first part of our opinion, namely, that the notion of image properly belongs to God; and this will be made plain from the very definition of image. St. Augustine, in the imperfect work On Genesis according to the Letter, chapter 16; and in book 5 of the Questions on Deuteronomy, question 4; and in the Eighty-Three Questions, question 74, teaches that image is not any sort of likeness, but that alone which is expressed for the sake of representing; wherefore he thinks that image by its nature has origin from that which it represents and of which it is said to be the image. And for this reason he says that one thing may be like another, yet not be its image.[526]

From this definition it follows that the notion of likeness which is founded upon unity of quality or of nature neither suffices for the notion of image nor is required for it. First, that it does not suffice has already been proved; that it is not required is shown thus. The rationale of image, which is a likeness expressed for the sake of representing, can be without this unity of nature, nay rather with great diversity, as is clear in the word and cognition of our mind, which is the image of the thing understood, yet of an altogether different nature; for this sole reason, that it is expressed for the sake of representing. Therefore likeness in nature is not required. It is further gathered that in the divinity there is image properly, without any imperfection whatsoever, in this way. In the divinity there is a word expressed by the power of its procession for the sake of representing; therefore it is properly and without any imperfection an image. How this is proper to the Word and does not befit the Holy Spirit we shall show in chapter 5.

Finally, from what has been said it is inferred that image bears to that of which it is image a real relation (relatio) - for since an image really proceeds from that of which it is said to be the image and refers to that, it follows that its relation is real, namely, founded upon a real origin and procession. And hence it is now apparent how weak is the argument by which Durandus in the first chapter tried to prove that in God there is not properly image, because there is not properly likeness. For although likeness founded upon unity of nature, in order to be strictly a likeness,

525. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I (or II), where he calls the Holy Spirit the image of the Son; Basil, Contra Eunomium, c. 12; Gregory Thaumaturgus, Expositio fidei.

526. St. Augustine, De diversis quaestionibus octoginta tribus, qq. 73 - 74; cf. De Genesi ad litteram imperfectus liber, c. 16; Quaestiones in Deuteronomium, q. 4.

ought to be a real relation, and in God it is only of reason; nevertheless, since this kind of likeness is not of the ratio of image, nothing prevents there being in God a true and proper notion of image, if there is there a true and proper notion of expression for the sake of representing, even though as yet there be no proper notion of the prior sort of likeness.

Caput IV - That the notion of image in God belongs to the Son alone is proved in various ways by the Doctors

Although the Doctors adduced in chapter 2 against Durandus teach that the notion of image belongs to the eternal Son of the Father alone, nevertheless they do not all prove it in the same way. I shall therefore set down their principal reasons, that from them I may more easily choose the better.

The first reason is St. Bonaventure's in the First Book, distinction 31, part 2 of the distinction, article 1, question 2. He proves the point thus. In the divinity there is image according to the most perfect rationale; but the most perfect image ought to be of one alone. For an image that is of two, since it is as it were divided into several, does not seem to be most perfect. Then too it ought to be according to every mode: for if it were only in essence, not in property or cognition, it would not be the greatest that can be. This reason, as to its latter part, he took from Richard of St. Victor, On the Trinity VI, chapters 19 - 20; and St. Thomas notes it in this question, article 2. And as regards the latter part, the same St. Thomas in this very question inquires thus: because in God likeness is not considered according to properties, but according to nature, as we shall say in disputation 167. Add, that if likeness were considered according to personal properties, it would not be greatest in God, since those properties are opposed; for any two creatures could be more alike in properties, since these are not opposed, than the divine persons are. We have also set forth the same line of reasoning above, disputation 113, chapter 1, to prove below that the Word alone in the divinity is properly generated, not the Holy Spirit. Furthermore, a perfect image ought to be the image of one: whence it is clear that, if it perfectly represented two and each of them, it would not preserve the unity required of image. Nor does it avail to object that the Holy Spirit is less a son because he proceeds from two; for he does not proceed as from a father and a mother, as we resolved in disputation 113, chapter 2, against Augustine.

The second reason of the same St. Bonaventure, and of Henry in the places cited, is of this sort. It belongs to the rationale of image to proceed in a natural mode; but the Holy Spirit does not proceed in this mode, since he is produced by will and thus seems to be produced freely; the Son, however, proceeds in a natural mode: therefore, although the one nature is found in both, yet in the Son alone does the rationale of image consist. We adduced this same reason from the same St. Bonaventure and others in disputation 113, chapter 4, to prove that the second divine person is Son, but that the Holy Spirit is not; and there we also proved that both persons proceed altogether in a natural mode, and that in this respect they are equal: therefore either this reason would make both Son and image, or by this reason it would befit neither.

A further reason, gathered from those alleged authorities - embraced and at length confirmed by Cajetan in this question, article 2 - is of this kind. The Son proceeds by intellect (intellectus); therefore by the power of his procession he is produced like to the principle understanding; and accordingly, by virtue of his own production, and not from elsewhere, he has to be like to the principle, in which the rationale of image consists. But the Holy Spirit, although he proceeds like to the principle, certainly does not have this inasmuch as he proceeds by will, by the force of his proper procession, but from elsewhere, to wit, because he is in the divine nature. Therefore he has that, not from the principle, but as it were from the nature as subject. Now the rationale of image is, to proceed like to the principle formally and by the force of production, not materially on account of the subject in which it is. Therefore the Son alone, not the Holy Spirit, is the image of the person from whom he proceeds. How indeed the Son, as to person, has this from the force of his procession, but not the Holy Spirit, we have explained and seen above, disputation 113, chapter 4. To this point also pertains the argument of Ferrarensis, Contra gentiles IV, cap. ..., reported in the same chapter, whereby he proves that the Holy Spirit is not Son, although he proceeds like; because he does not proceed like by the force of his procession, as the Son. And this seems to be the doctrine of St. Thomas in this question, article 2. But both are to be impugned in the same manner, as we refuted both there: whence it is clear from that refutation that the Holy Spirit no less proceeds like in nature by the force of his procession than the Son; and therefore, if it belongs to the rationale of image to proceed like in the same nature per se by the force of one's own procession and not from elsewhere - as Henry, Capreolus, Cajetan, and Ferrarensis suppose - this they do not sufficiently prove; it follows, therefore, that the Holy Spirit is no less the image of the Father and the Son than the Son is the image of the Father. But since in that place we have abundantly shown against Cajetan and Ferrarensis that the Holy Spirit no less proceeds like in nature by the force of his production than the Son, and have cut off the subterfuges of these Doctors, there is no need to dispute again against them.

Others finally give another reason, namely, that it belongs to the rationale of image to be expressed to the intention of someone by the intellect; but since the Son is by intellect from the Father, the Holy Spirit by will, it follows that the Son is the expressed image, but not the Holy Spirit. This reason supposes the definition of image which we shall later examine.

For who will deny that Adam begot his son Seth, and in him expressed his own image? Finally, since every son bears the image of the father, an image can rightly be found which does not proceed through the intellect. Therefore, as we saw in that disputation 113, cap. 7, Athanasius rightly infers that the Word of God is the Son, from the fact that He is called image: which would not follow, unless it were of the account of son to be image; and although image extends more widely than son, nevertheless a substantial image in the same nature is reciprocated with son; and from this Athanasius infers that the Word is Son, if He is image.

By a most fitting reason it is shown that only the Son is the image of the Father.

Caput V - The nature of image is clarified

From the definition of image given above, chap. 3, it can rightly be inferred that the account of image fits only the Son. The definition is of this sort: an expressed likeness for representing. And, as we noted in that chapter, likeness is called image which is expressed for representing - whether it has unity of nature with the thing represented or not - for in either way there can be image. Again, if it happen that there is some likeness of two in nature, and one arises from the other, it does not follow that that which is from the other, and is like it, is the image of that other, unless it represent that other. For sometimes one like [thing] does not represent that from which it takes origin; and therefore it is not its image, as we see in univocal generation of non-living things, in which one like is produced from another, which for that reason is not its image, because it does not represent it: for the fire produced does not represent this producing fire more than another, since in the same way it is similar to all.

Further, observe with the Canarian in the second article, part of the commentary of this question, [who says] that an image ought to be expressed for this end, that it represent, whether by art or by nature. And nature is said to express a likeness for that end, when in fact the likeness produced by nature represents; for the end of nature in acting is taken from the very product wrought. Wherefore, if by chance a seal impresses a figure on wax or other matter, it truly produces an image, because its production is reduced to the artificial, which is produced with intention toward imitation.

Hence the Canarian rightly infers that the divine Word is truly and properly the image of the Father: for it is the likeness of the Father - which no one denies - expressed by the intellect as His word, as was said in disputation 141. Therefore it is an expressed likeness for representing that from which it proceeds as from an intelligible principle and an object per se. Wherefore, since it represents the Father in this mode, and proceeds from Him in this mode, as we proved in disputation 142, cap. 3, it will be His image; and since it does not proceed from the Holy Spirit as from an intelligible principle, even if it secondarily represent Him, it will not be His image, as we also showed there, cap. 4. And by the same reason it is not the image of creatures, as remains proved in disputation 143, cap. 5. But that the Word in the divine [mysteries] represents the Father to Himself and to the Father, and not to another, is clear from what was said in disputation 144, cap. 2.

But indeed the Canarian does not prove how the account of image does not befit the Holy Spirit; yet this easily follows from what has been said. For, in order that the Holy Spirit be image, He would have to be not only similar in nature, but also to represent those from whom He proceeds. But He represents no one: therefore He is not anyone's image. For if He represented someone, He ought to represent him to some intelligent [knower]; but He represents to none, as will be evident by induction. For He does not represent to the Father, nor to the Son, since neither understands Himself by the Holy Spirit, either as form, or as the term of His intellection. Nor does He represent to Himself, except in so far as by essential intellection, which is His very essence, He knows Himself and the other persons in Himself. Nor does He represent to any created intellect: not to the wayfarer, as is plain; not to one seeing God as He is: for he who clearly contemplates the three persons does not see one because it is represented in another, but beholds all equally in the first intuition. Therefore to no intellect does the Holy Spirit represent, nor can He represent; wherefore He is not the image of anyone.

Two things remain to be noted in this disputation. One is that the account of image befits the Son, not by reason of essence alone, because image is a notional property, nor by reason of the personal property of sonship alone, but by reason of both, as was said concerning the Word above in that disputation: because by reason of both it befits the Son to represent the Father to the Father Himself, as one speaking and understanding. The other is that the same property is sonship, image, and word, although it is signified in a diverse mode. For something is connoted by the one which is not connoted by the other: for son signifies only the relation of one proceeding from another by generation; but word, besides this - which it does not express and specifically signify - connotes a respect of reason toward creatures; but image does not connote that [respect]. Now this [image] stands to sonship as the common notion to the particular, as I noted in disputation 137, cap. 5; and why there are not three diverse notions, we also showed there. Nevertheless, Bonaventure said without warrant in I Sent., dist. 31, part 2, article 1, question 2, at the end, that image, besides a respect to the Father, also connotes a relation to the Holy Spirit. For since in no way does it proceed from Him, as we proved in disputation 143, cap. 4, it will connote no respect to Him in the account of image, although it connotes Him in the account of word, because it at least secondarily represents Him.

Quaestio XXXVI - On the things that pertain to the person of the Holy Spirit

After the foregoing consideration, it is to be considered concerning the things that pertain to the person of the Holy Spirit: who is not only called the Holy Spirit, but also the love and gift of God.

Concerning the Holy Spirit, therefore, four things are asked.

Articulus I - Whether this name, Holy Spirit, is a proper name of some divine person

To the first we proceed as follows. It seems that this name, Holy Spirit, is not the proper name of any divine person. For no common name of the three persons is proper to any person; but this name, Holy Spirit, is common to the three persons. For Hilary shows in De Trinitate that by "the spirit of the Lord" sometimes the Father is signified, as when it is said: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me"; sometimes the Son is signified, as when the Son says: "In the Spirit of God I cast out demons," showing that by the power of His nature He casts out demons; sometimes [it is said] of the Holy Spirit, as there: "I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh." Therefore this name, Holy Spirit, is not the proper name of any divine person.[527]

1. Further, the names of the divine persons are said relatively, as Boethius says in the book De Trinitate. But this name, Holy Spirit, is not said relatively. Therefore this name is not the proper name of any divine person.
2. Further, since "son" is the name of a divine person, one cannot say "the son of this or of that" [man]. But one does say "the spirit of this or of that man." For it is had in Numbers 11: "The Lord said to Moses: I will take of your spirit and will give to them"; and 4 Kings 2: "The spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha." Therefore "Holy Spirit" does not seem to be the proper name of any divine person.

But on the contrary is what is said, 1 John, the last: "There are three who give testimony in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit." But, as St. Augustine says in De Trinitate VII, when it is asked, what do we call three, we say three persons. Therefore "Holy Spirit" is the name of a divine person.

I answer that, since there are two processions in the divine [nature], one of them, which is by the mode of love, does not have a proper name, as was said above. Un -

Articulus II - Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son

... Therefore also the relations which are understood according to a procession of this sort are unnamed, as was said above. Wherefore also the name of the person proceeding in this mode, for the same reason, does not have a proper name, but, just as some names are accommodated from the way of speakers to signify the aforesaid relations, when we name them by the name of procession and spiration, which according to the propriety of their signification seem rather to signify the notional acts than the relations, so too, to signify the divine person who proceeds by way of love (amor), this name "Holy Spirit" is, from the usage of Scripture, accommodated. And indeed a reason for this congruity can be taken from two points. First, from the very commonness of that which is called "Holy Spirit." For, as St. Augustine says in De Trinitate XV: Because the Holy Spirit is common to both, that is called by Him properly which both have in common; for both the Father is spirit, and the Son is spirit; and the Father is holy, and the Son is holy.[528] Secondly, from its proper signification. For the name "spirit" in corporeal things seems to signify a certain impulse and motion; for we name breath and wind "spirit." But it is proper to love that it move and impel the will of the lover toward the beloved. Holiness, moreover, is attributed to those things which are ordered to God. Therefore, because a divine person proceeds by way of love by which God is loved, fittingly He is named the Holy Spirit.

527. A marginal cluster of references is given here: "Vi 22. 9194 14, 258; 1 Cor. & 1; di 15. art.; dist. 4 com. gent. cap. 9 fin. & mal.; cor. opu. 3. cap. 46. & 47; Libro 8. de Trinitate circa med. libri." Hilary is cited for the usages: De Trinitate, book 8, about the middle.

528. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, book 15, about the middle; cf. cap. 19.

Reply to the first: Therefore one must say that this which I say "Holy Spirit," insofar as it is taken by the force of two words, is common to the whole Trinity, because by the name "spirit" is signified the immateriality of the divine substance; for a corporeal spirit is invisible, and has little of matter. Hence we attribute this name to all immaterial and invisible substances. But through what is said "holy," the purity of divine goodness is signified. If, however, this which I say "Holy Spirit" be taken by the force of one word, thus by the usage of the Church it is accommodated to signify one of the three persons, namely, the one who proceeds by way of love for the reason already stated.

Reply to the second: Although this which I say "Holy Spirit" is not said relatively, nevertheless it is put for a relative, insofar as it is accommodated to signify a person distinct from others by relation alone. Yet some relation can be understood by the name, if the Holy Spirit be understood as "spirated."

Reply to the third: In the name "Son" is understood only the relation of one who is "from a principle" toward that principle; but in the name "Father" is understood the relation of a principle; and similarly in the name "spirit," insofar as it imports a certain motive power. But to no creature does it belong to be a principle with respect to some divine person, but conversely; and therefore one can say "our Father" and "our spirit," but one cannot say "our Son."

Conclusion: The name "Holy Spirit" is accommodated by the Church to the third person. The Holy Doctor renders an excellent reason for this in the article, because the third person proceeds through the will (voluntas), by way of a certain impetus and spiration. Durandus agrees in the conclusion, but disagrees in the reason; for, as we saw in the disputation made on this point, he holds that the Holy Spirit does not proceed through the will, but proximately through nature, as also the Son - a view which we there impugned.

AD SECUNDUM thus is proceeded. It seems that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son. For, according to Pseudo - Dionysius, it is not to be dared to say anything about the substantial divinity over and above those things which have been expressed to us by divine utterances. But in Sacred Scripture it is not expressed that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, but only that He proceeds from the Father, as is clear in John 15: "The Spirit of truth who proceeds from the Father." Therefore the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son

Further, in the Creed of the synod of Constantinople it is read thus: "We believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and life-giver, who proceeds from the Father, who with the Father and the Son is adored and glorified." Therefore by no means ought it to have been added in our Creed that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son; but those who added this seem to be persons deserving anathema.

Further, St. John Damascene says: "We say that the Holy Spirit is from the Father, and we name Him the Spirit of the Father; but we do not say 'the Holy Spirit from the Son'; we do, however, name Him the Spirit of the Son."[530] Therefore the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son.

---

530. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, the chapter on the Holy Spirit (as "Spirit of the Father" and "Spirit of the Son").

Further, nothing proceeds from that in which it rests. But the Holy Spirit rests in the Son. For it is said in the reading of blessed Andrew: "Peace be to you; and to all who believe in one God the Father, and one Son, His only-begotten, our Lord Jesus Christ, and in one Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father, abiding in the Son." Therefore the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son.

Further, the Son proceeds as Word; but our spirit in us does not seem to proceed from our word. Therefore the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son.

Further, the Holy Spirit proceeds perfectly from the Father. Therefore it is superfluous to say that He proceeds from the Son.

Further, in things perpetual being and being-able do not differ (as is said in the 3rd book of the Physics), and much less in divine things. But the Holy Spirit can be distinguished from the Son, even if He do not proceed from Him. For Anselm says in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit: The Son and the Holy Spirit have from the Father to be, but in a different mode, because the one by being begotten, the other by proceeding, so that by this they are different from one another. And afterwards he adds: For if for no other reason the Son and the Holy Spirit were multiple, by this alone they would be different. Therefore the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the Son by not proceeding from Him.[531]

But on the contrary: What Athanasius says in the Creed: the Holy Spirit is "from the Father and the Son, neither made nor created nor begotten, but proceeding."[532]

I answer that, it is necessary to say that the Holy Spirit is from the Son. For if He were not from Him, in no way could He be personally distinguished from Him. This is clear from what has been said above. For it is not possible to say that divine persons are distinguished from one another according to something absolute; because it would follow that there would not be one essence of the three. For whatever in divine things is said absolutely belongs to the unity of essence. It remains, therefore, that divine persons are distinguished from one another by relations alone. But relations cannot distinguish persons unless insofar as they are opposed. This is clear from this, that the Father has two relations, one of which is referred to the Son, and the other to the Holy Spirit; which, however, because they are not opposed, do not constitute two persons, but pertain only to the one person of the Father. If, therefore, in the Son and in the Holy Spirit there were to be found only two relations by which each is referred to the Father, those relations would not be opposed to one another, just as neither are the two relations by which the Father is referred to them. Hence, just as the person of the Father is one, so it would follow that the person of the Son and of the Holy Spirit would be one, having two relations opposed to the two relations of the Father. But this is heretical, since it destroys the faith of the Trinity. Therefore it is necessary that the Son and the Holy Spirit be referred to one another by opposite relations. But in divine things there cannot be other opposite relations than relations of origin, as was proved above. Now opposite relations of origin are taken according to "principle" and according to "from a principle." It remains, therefore, that it is necessary to say either that the Son is from the Holy Spirit - which no one says - or that the Holy Spirit is from the Son - which we confess. And indeed this accords with the account of the procession of each. For it was said above that the Son proceeds by way of intellect as Word, but the Holy Spirit by way of will as Love. But it is necessary that love proceed from word. For we do not love anything except insofar as we apprehend it by a conception of the mind. Hence in this way too it is manifest that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son. The very order of things also teaches this. For nowhere do we find that from one there proceed many without order, except only in those things which differ materially; as when one smith produces many knives materially distinct from one another, having no order to one another. But in things in which there is not a merely material distinction, there is always found, in the multitude of products, some order. Whence also in the order of created things produced, the beauty of divine wisdom is manifested. If, therefore, from one person, the Father, there proceed two persons - namely, the Son and the Holy Spirit - there must be some order of them to one another. Nor can any other order be assigned except the order of nature, whereby one is from the other. Therefore it is not possible to say that the Son and the Holy Spirit proceed thus from the Father, that neither of them proceeds from the other, unless someone were to posit in them a material distinction - which is impossible. Hence even the Greeks understand the procession of the Holy Spirit to have some order to the Son. For they concede that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Son, and that He is from the Father through the Son. And some of them are said to concede that He is from the Son, or flows forth from Him, yet not that He "proceeds." Which seems to be either from ignorance or from obstinacy. For if one consider rightly, one will find that the word "procession" is most common among all those things which pertain to origin of whatever sort. For we use it to designate origin of any kind, as when we say that a line proceeds from a point, a ray from the sun, a stream from a source; and similarly in all other such instances. Whence from any other expression pertaining to origin it can be concluded that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son.

531. Anselm, De processione Spiritus Sancti (cf. Opuscula 49 - 51).
532. Athanasian Creed.

Reply to the first: We ought not to speak about God what is not found in Sacred Scripture, either by words or by sense. Although by words it is not found in Sacred Scripture that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, yet it is found as to the sense, and especially where the Son says, speaking of the Holy Spirit, John 16: "He shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine." Moreover, as a general rule in Sacred Scripture it is to be maintained that what is said of the Father ought to be understood of the Son, even if an exclusive expression be added, except only in those things in which the Father and the Son are distinguished according to opposite relations. For when the Lord says in Matthew 11, "No one knows the Son but the Father," it is not excluded that the Son knows Himself. Thus, therefore, when it is said that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, even if it be added that He proceeds "from the Father alone," the Son would not thereby be excluded; because, as to this which is to be the principle of the Holy Spirit, the Father and the Son are not opposed, but only as to this, that this one is Father and that one Son.

Reply to the second: In every council, some creed was instituted on account of some error which in that council was condemned. Wherefore a following council did not make another creed than the first; but that which was contained implicitly in the first creed was by some additions explained against arising heresies. Whence in the determination of the Council of Chalcedon it is said that those who were gathered in the Council of Constantinople handed down the doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit; not that it was less in the preceding things than those assembled at Nicaea had said, but explaining their understanding against heretics. Therefore, since in the ancient time of the earlier councils the error of those saying that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son had not yet arisen, it was not necessary that this be explicitly set down. But afterwards, when the error of certain men arose, in a certain council gathered in the western parts, it was expressly stated by the authority of the Roman Pontiff, by whose authority also the ancient councils were convoked and confirmed. Yet they coincided implicitly in this very point, in that it was said that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father.

Reply to the third: That the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son was first introduced by the Nestorians, as is evident in a certain creed of the Nestorians condemned at the Synod of Ephesus. And this error was followed by Theodorus and Nestorius, and many after them. Among whom was also Damascene. Wherefore in this his opinion is not to be stood by; although some say that Damascene does not confess the Holy Spirit to be from the Son, yet neither does he deny it by force of those words.[533]

Reply to the fourth: By this, that the Holy Spirit is said to rest or abide in the Son, it is not excluded that He proceeds from Him; for the Son also is said to abide in the Father, although He proceeds from the Father. The Holy Spirit, moreover, is said to rest in the Son, either as the love of the lover rests in the beloved, or with respect to the human nature of Christ, because of what is written in John 1: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining upon him, he it is who baptizes."

Reply to the fifth: The Word in divine things is not taken according to the likeness of a spoken word, by which spirit does not proceed, for then it would be said only metaphorically; but according to the likeness of a mental word (verbum mentale), by which love proceeds.

Reply to the sixth: By this, that the Holy Spirit proceeds perfectly from the Father, it is not only not superfluous to say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, but it is altogether necessary; for one and the same is the power of the Father and of the Son, and whatever is from the Father must be from the Son, unless it be repugnant to the property of filiation. For the Son is not from Himself, albeit He is from the Father.

Reply to the seventh: The Holy Spirit is personally distinguished from the Son in this, that the origin of each is distinguished from the origin of the other. But the very difference of origin is by this: that the Son is only from the Father, but the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. For otherwise the processions are not distinguished, as was shown above.

Conclusion: The Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father, but also from the Son. Concerning which a grave controversy with the Greeks is ours.

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. Disputation 146:

- The Greeks dogmatize that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son, chapter 1.

533. On the Nestorians and the condemnation at the Council of Ephesus.

- This error is refuted from the Scriptures, chapter 2.
- That the Spirit proceeds from the Son is defined by the Church, chapter 3.
- When the particle "and the Son" was added first to the Nicene Symbol, chapter 4.
- That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son is taught by the most weighty Fathers of the Greek Church, chapter 5.
- The same truth is shown from the Fathers who say that the one Spirit is from the Father through the Son, chapter 6.

Replies to objections

Reply to the third: That the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son was first introduced by the Nestorians, as is clear in a certain symbol of the Nestorians condemned in the Council of Ephesus. And this error was followed by Theodoret, a Nestorian, and many after him; among whom was also Damascene. Therefore in this his opinion there is no standing. Although some say that Damascene, just as he does not confess the Holy Spirit to be from the Son, so also does not deny it by force of those words.

Reply to the fourth: From the fact that the Holy Spirit is said to rest or remain in the Son, it is not excluded that He proceeds from Him; for the Son is also said to remain in the Father, although He proceeds from the Father. The Holy Spirit is also said to rest in the Son, either as the love of one loving rests in the beloved; or with respect to the human nature of Christ, on account of that which is written in John 1: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining upon him, this is he who baptizes" (John 1:33).

Reply to the fifth: The "Word" in divine matters is not taken according to the likeness of a vocal word, from which a "spirit" does not proceed - for so it would only be said metaphorically - but according to the likeness of a mental word, from which love proceeds.

Reply to the sixth: From the fact that the Holy Spirit proceeds perfectly from the Father, it is not only not superfluous to say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, but altogether necessary: because one power is the Father's and the Son's. And whatever is from the Father must also be from the Son, unless it be repugnant to the property of sonship. For the Son is not from Himself, but from the Father.

Reply to the seventh: The Holy Spirit is personally distinguished from the Son in this, that the origin of the one is distinguished from the origin of the other; but the very difference of origin is this: that the Son is from the Father alone, but the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. For otherwise the processions would not be distinguished, as was shown above.

Disputatio CXLVI - Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son

- The Greeks dogmatize that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son. cap. 1.

- This error is refuted from the Scriptures. cap. 2.
- That the Spirit proceeds from the Son is defined by the Church. cap. 3.
- When the particle "and the Son" was first added to the Nicene Symbol. cap. 4.
- That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son is taught by the most weighty Fathers of the Greek Church. cap. 5.
- The same truth is shown from the Fathers who say that the one Spirit is from the Father through the Son. cap. 6.
- The Greeks object to us certain Eastern Fathers. cap. 7.

Caput I - The Greeks' published heresy; which has endured down to our times, is that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone

Who, however, was first author of this error is not quite clear. Indeed, if faith is to be given to the letter of Justinian, Bishop of Sicily, to Peter, Bishop of Antioch, which is found in the Third General Council, Macedonius seems to be he; for he says - "Macedonius, moreover, breathes the Holy Spirit from the Father alone." But certain more recent theologians, not without probability, think that the text is faulty, and that for "breathes" one should read "separates." For since here Macedonius felt with the Arians that the Son and the Holy Spirit are not of the same substance (substantia) with the Father, but only similar, as was set forth in Disputation 109, cap. 1, and also in cap. 100 above; and since Eunomius too was of this opinion, as we there reported; perhaps with him he taught that which St. Basil records near the end of his second book Against Eunomius: for Eunomius spoke thus, "If someone were raised up from creatures to the comprehension of substance, he will understand the Son to be the nature of the Unbegotten (that is, of the Father), and the Paraclete to be the Only-begotten's." He therefore said that the Holy Spirit was made by the Son but not by the Father; hence against him Basil urges these words: "But how is it not manifestly perilous to divide the Spirit from God?" And a little later: "But this tends to the destruction of the majesty of our Lord Jesus Christ; for he removes the Spirit from the Father."[534] Thus, perhaps, Macedonius separated the Spirit from the Father alone, when he said that He does not proceed (procedere) from the Father, but from the Son: for the Spirit is said to be His from whom He proceeds; therefore, if He did not proceed from the Father, He would not be said to be His, and so would be separated from Him. But whether this be so, or whether he was another Macedonius than the one who was an Arian; or whether that Arian at various times taught both errors - as commonly happens, for heretics change each day into various colors of errors - none of this can be established with certainty.

The first, therefore, author of this error, which the Greeks now follow concerning the Holy Spirit, without any controversy was Theodoret, while he was still a Nestorian: as is evident from his attack on the ninth anathema of the Alexandrian Council, found in St. Cyril's book to Euoptius.[535] There is also extant in the Council of Ephesus, recently translated by our Theodore Peltanus, in 534. St. Basil, Contra Eunomium, book 2, near the end.

535. St. Cyril of Alexandria, Ad Euoptium, impugning the ninth anathema of the Alexandrian Council.

tome 2, cap. 37, a certain symbol of the Nestorians (for many followed Theodoret), in which it is defined that the Holy Spirit is neither from the Son nor through the Son, as Theodoret affirmed.[536] And therefore with good reason St. Thomas, in this article, when making mention of the third of this symbol, said that this error was first introduced by the Nestorians. But since Theodoret was anathematized by the Council of Ephesus, and those things which he wrote against Cyril and the aforesaid anathemas were condemned, shortly afterwards he repented, and in the Council of Chalcedon was received into communion with the Church and to the Catholic party. Wherefore this error, which he had taught in passing - together with the other which was principal concerning the person (persona) of Christ - seems at that time to have been entirely extinguished.

Further, at what time, or by whom, it was afterwards revived in the Greek Church, is not very evident. Some think that it sprouted again in the time of Pepin, the father of Charlemagne. For, as Aroinus, or rather Annonius, reports in book 4 of the Deeds of the Franks, cap. 67, and Abbot of Ursperg, Sigibert, Ado of Vienne, and Regino relate in their chronicles under the year 766, King Pepin convoked a provincial council at the villa of Gentiliacum to define the question concerning the Trinity between Greeks and Latins; which it is very likely was about the procession (processio) of the Holy Spirit: for no other question about the Trinity seems ever to have arisen which was debated among all Greeks and Latins; for in other errors about the Trinity many Latins consented to the Greeks. Therefore he who made the compendium of Ado's Chronicle in our times, explaining this, added that the question was about the procession of the Holy Spirit.[537]

Moreover, the same Annonius, book 4, cap. 95, writes that a Council was held at Aachen by Charlemagne, in order that the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son might be defined against the Greeks; "which question" (he says) "a certain John, a monk of Jerusalem, first stirred up in the time of Leo," who died in the year 808; he adds that for this reason Bernhar, Bishop of Worms, and Alahard, or Adelhart, Abbot of the monastery of Corbie, were sent to Rome.[538]

This error is also attributed to Damascene, who lived in the time of Adrian I and Leo the Isaurian, the Iconomachus emperor; and to Theophylact, who lived in the time of Nicholas I, and to Euthymius. Yet I think these Fathers did not deny what the Latins truly hold, as will be proved in cap. 7, although Theophylact sharply criticized our way of speaking.

John the Deacon too - who lived in the same time as Theophylact - relates in book 4 of the Life of St. Gregory, cap. 74, that the Greeks translated into their language the Dialogues of St. Gregory, and left out that particle "and the Son"; perhaps, however, they did this without error about the thing itself. For since, according to the Greek phrase, they gladly confessed that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, some Catholics then - like Damascene, Theophylact, 536. Council of Ephesus, in the recent Latin translation by Theodore Peltanus, tome 2, cap. 37, containing a Nestorian symbol denying that the Spirit is "from" or "through" the Son.

537. Aroinus/Annonius, De gestis Francorum, book 4, cap. 67; Annalists: Abbot of Ursperg, Sigibert, Ado of Vienne, and Regino, under the year 766.

538. Annonius, De gestis Francorum, book 4, cap. 95, on the Aachen council of Charlemagne and the embassy of Bishop Bernhar of Worms and Abbot Adelhart of Corbie.

and others - were unwilling to concede that the Holy Spirit is produced by the Son, for the reason which we shall give in cap. 7. Therefore for this cause, because that manner of speaking did not please them, they could have omitted the particle "and the Son."[539]

Finally, as is gathered from Leo IX - who lived in the year 1054 - in his letters to Constantine Monomachus, the tenth emperor of Constantinople, and to Michael the Patriarch of Constantinople, who tried to usurp to himself the name of Universal Patriarch; and from Sigibert in his Chronicle under the year 1054 - when the Schism was openly made known and the Greeks were sundered from the Latins; in the same age St. Anselm composed a book against this error on the procession of the Holy Spirit. This error indeed endured down to our times; and for that cause, under Eugenius IV, the Council of Florence was celebrated. And among the more recent heretics of our time, some report also Valentinus Gentilis as in favor of this same error, in theses 36 and 37; because he says that the Father alone is the "efficientator" of the Son and of the Holy Spirit (for thus he himself speaks), clearly indicating by this way of speaking that both proceed from the Father alone. But since he was an Arian, and affirmed that the Son and the Holy Spirit are creatures, and that the Father alone is "made God" in Himself and of Himself, as we reported in Disputation 109, cap. 1, he ought not to be reckoned for this error. For the Arians were diverse: some said that the Son is from the Father alone, and the Holy Spirit from the Son alone; others that both are from the Father as if they were His true creatures. With Arianism, therefore, the assertion of Valentinus easily stands. But the controversy between Greeks and Latins about the procession of the Holy Spirit proceeds on the supposition - by Catholic faith against the Arians - that the Holy Spirit and the Son are true God and consubstantial with the Father.

Caput II - This error is refuted from Scripture

Cardinal Bessarion - by nation a Greek, and Archbishop of Nicaea - argued very clearly and acutely against this error, in the oration delivered in the Council of Florence for the union of Greeks and Latins, which is after the last session; and he chiefly showed from the holy Greek Fathers that the Holy Spirit truly proceeds from the Father and the Son. We, however, will add also testimonies of Scripture and of councils, that we may demonstrate more fully the truth of this faith.[540]

The first testimony is John 16: "All things whatsoever the Father has are mine"; and chapter 17: "All thine are mine." Therefore the Son has from the Father, not only the essence (essentia), but also the property of breathing (spirare): for when Christ says, "All mine are thine," only those things ought to be excepted by which the persons (personae) are opposed to one another; for in those alone ought distinction to be considered, as will be plain in the following disputation. St. Augustine so understands these places, On the Trinity, book 5, chapter 14; and, of the Greek Fathers, Damascene - whom the Greeks object to us for their error - for in On the Orthodox Faith,

539. John the Deacon, Vita S. Gregorii, book 4, cap. 74, on the Greek translation of St. Gregory's Dialogues and the omission of "and the Son."

540. Cardinal Bessarion, Oratio at the Council of Florence after the last session, for the union of Greeks and Latins, proving from Greek Fathers the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son.

book 1, chapter 9, he speaks thus: "Whence it is that all things which the Father has are the Son's, this one thing excepted, that He is not unbegotten; which term indeed indicates not a difference of nature, nor dignity and authority, but the mode of existence." If, therefore, the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, nor were the Son to breathe Him, Damascene would not say, "this one thing excepted, that He is not unbegotten." Since, then, he excepts only that, he wills that all other things which are the Father's be also the Son's. And in chapter 11: "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are altogether one and the same, except that the Father is unbegotten, the Son begotten, the Spirit proceeds." Where he holds that all things are common between the Father and the Son, except paternity and filiation.

The second testimony is in the same chapter, John 16: Not indeed (namely, the Holy Spirit) will He speak from Himself, but whatever He shall hear, He will speak, and what is to come He will announce to you. He will glorify me, because He will receive from what is mine, and will announce it to you (John 16:13 - 14). Although not all the Fathers interpret this in the same way, many nevertheless, and weightier among the Latins, understand it of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son. Among the Latins, first is Hilary, De Trinitate 8, near the beginning; and Augustine, Tractate 99 on John, whom Bede follows in his commentary on the same place; and Anselm in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, chapter 7. For they hold plainly that to "hear from the Father" or from the Son is not to be understood of a bodily ear or of discipline, but of the nature which the Holy Spirit received from both by His procession: thus also He received the knowledge of all things; for indeed His knowledge is His substance and nature. In the same way Ambrose, On the Faith, book 5, chapter 6, explaining that saying of Christ, John 12: From myself I have not spoken, does not wish to refer it to the humility of His flesh; he renders the reason with these words: "For the more learned commonly take it, that the Son 'hears,' and that to 'say something to the Father' is understood through the unity of nature." And by this reason he explains what it is for the Son to have heard from the Father.

He then adduces the testimony of John 16: Not indeed will He speak from Himself, etc.; and he adds a comment with these words: "Because the sentence and the operation of the Trinity is one." And in book 2 On the Holy Spirit, chapter 12, explaining the same place, he says: "That the Son of God knows all things and has prescience of all things to come, the same things which you suppose to be proper to the Son, the Holy Spirit likewise received from the Son; and they were received through unity of substance, just as the Son received from the Father." Therefore Ambrose holds that for the Son to "hear" is nothing else than to receive the nature; for this, as Augustine said, is His knowledge. To these there is added among the Greeks Nazianzen in the Oration on the Faith, which is the forty-ninth, near the end, where he proves that the Holy Spirit is sent by the Son from His own substance, from that place Joel 2: "I will pour out of my Spirit," etc.; and from John 16: "He will receive of mine and will announce it to you"; he subjoins moreover, "of that (understand: He will announce to you), which is the Son, because the Son also is of that which the Father is." As if he said: The Spirit will announce of that which He receives from another, just as the Son announces of that which He received from the Father. But that which the Son received from the Father, and the Holy Spirit from the Son, is His knowledge, as Augustine said, which is to Him substance and nature. Didymus also agrees, book 2 On the Holy Spirit, cited by Jerome in tome 6, who thus expounds that, "Not indeed will He speak from Himself": that He is not "from Himself," but from another; He subsists and speaks "from the Father, and from me."

I do not ignore that grave Fathers also of the Greek Church expound this place otherwise; nevertheless to me the interpretation above of the Latins, of Nazianzen and of Didymus, is approved. For Chrysostom in Homily 67 on John, and Theophylact, and Oecumenius on chapter 16 of the same, and Cyril, book 10 on John, chapter 41, thus understand that, "Not indeed will He speak from Himself": that is, He will not teach other things than what I have taught; He will follow the same discipline. For he seems to speak "from himself" who in doctrine disagrees with others; and in the same way they explain that, "He will receive of mine and will announce it to you," namely that there is one and the same knowledge in each; never however do they interpret these words of the procession of the Spirit from the Son. I except Cyril, about whom immediately. Tertullian also agrees, On the Veiling of Virgins, at the end; for he himself reads thus: "For He will not speak from Himself, but what commands He shall have received from Christ"; not that the Spirit has received a command from the Son, but because those very things which Christ commanded to be done and to be believed, the Spirit Himself also does, and will speak, and will announce.

However, among these Greek Fathers Cyril, book 13 of the Thesaurus, chapter 4, although he seems to embrace that interpretation which in the aforesaid book 10 on John, chapter 41, he had followed, nevertheless he also refers it to emanation and procession: for he says on these words, "For He will not speak from Himself," etc.: "It is plainly a like thing, if honey too were to say of its own sweetness (which quality is naturally inherent to it): nothing of my sweetness did I give to the tasters, but 'of mine' they received; for naturally the qualities of substances proceed from the substances themselves, and inseparably: as, for example, sweetness from honey, heat from fire, coldness from water. Therefore just as these qualities are not said to 'partake' of the substances in which they are, but to be naturally in them and to go forth from them, so too must it be understood of the Holy Spirit."

The third testimony is John 15 and 16, where Christ promises the Apostles that He will send them the Holy Spirit; but, as we will show in Disputation 170, the mission of one person by another cannot be understood unless He proceeds substantially from the one by whom He is sent, if the persons are of the same nature and substance, as the Greeks affirm of the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, since He is sent by Him. Moreover, it will be proved in the same place that not only are the created gifts of grace bestowed on us by the Son, but that then the very person of the Holy Spirit is sent to us.

The fourth testimony is Romans 8:9: "If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is not His."

There are also other [testimonies], in which the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of the Son; yet on no account could He be called the Spirit of the Son unless He were referred to the Son; but He would not be referred to the Son unless He proceeded from Him. For if identity of nature and of power, or some other cause sufficed, that He might be called the Spirit of the Son, then by the same reason the Son could be called the Son of the Spirit; which none even of the Greeks concedes. By which argument Augustine judged that the procession of the Spirit from the Son is sufficiently proved; indeed the Council of Alexandria, as we shall see in the next chapter, deduced this Catholic truth from that text, that the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of truth; that is, of the Son, since the Son is called Truth. From which it is clear that the Greeks of our time by no means clearly impugn our position, nor is anything found to the contrary in Scripture.

But they object also that place of John 15: When the Paraclete shall have come, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father. For since Christ did not add, "that He proceeds from Himself," but only said "from the Father," this testimony seems to lack force for establishing that He also proceeds from the Son.

It is answered: Augustine against Maximinus, book 2, chapter 12, says that by these words the Son is not excluded, but rather the Father is expressed as author and principal; as in the first of the Apostles He is called "principle." Then Anselm in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit answers thus: It would also be said that the Son is predestined "in the Holy Spirit," unless the Son, as Son, were more known by those words of Matthew 11:27: "No one knows the Son save the Father, neither does anyone know the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son wills to reveal." Neither is the Son excluded from the knowledge of the Father, nor the Holy Spirit from the knowledge of each. Finally I answer, from the other places it is manifestly proved that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son; and therefore the one procession is not excluded where the other is set forth. Add to this that, when it is said there, "who proceeds from the Father," it plainly denotes that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son; because, as we shall say in Disputation 171, "mission" is the very eternal procession of the person.

It has been defined by the Church that the Spirit proceeds from the Son.

Caput III - That the Church has defined the procession of the Spirit from the Son, and on the addition "and the Son" in the symbol

This truth was defined in the Epistle which Cyril sent together with the whole Council - not Ephesine, as Castro falsely supposes, but the Alexandrian - to Nestorius, and it was later received by the whole Council of Ephesus; it is contained in tome 5 of the Council of Ephesus among the documents, and among the Epistles of Cyril it is the tenth, where it is said that the Spirit of truth, whom we confess in one nature consubstantial with the Son, is poured forth as He Himself says: "I will pour out of my Spirit," and where the same procession is taught from the Son together with the Father.[541] Our Peltanus has transferred it as before in the ancient compilation of the Councils.

541. Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), in the recent Latin translation by Theodore Peltanus, tome 2, cap. 37, contains, among the documents received by the council, the Alexandrian synodal letter of St. Cyril against Nestorius, wherein the consubstantiality of the Spirit with the Son and His procession "from" the Son is asserted, and a Nestorian symbol is rejected which denied that the Spirit is "from" or "through" the Son.

Therefore this truth is defined in one of the four most general Councils, although the Greeks may evade; but let them not on that account either disparage the Council of Ephesus, or at least afterwards object to us that in none of the four general Councils was this truth defined.

That Epistle too was read and approved in the Council which is called the universal collation of the Church; the Olympic Epistles of Cyril were approved by the Council of Chalcedon in action 3, to posterity incorporated in the definition of faith, chapter 6; and we have also in the Sixth Synod that very particle ("and from the Son") insinuated; and in the Seventh Synod it is confirmed; and in the Council of Florence, in the profession of the faith, the Greeks themselves, in their codices of the Seventh Synod, acknowledged that that particle had not been omitted, but that the Latins of the Church in that session had retained it, as was corrected from a most ancient manuscript codex, in which that particle was found; and I do not doubt that among the Greeks of old that particle too was in use: for the Greeks of the earlier ages used the phrase "through the Son," as we shall note below, to keep the idiom of their language, as will be noted in chapter 6.[542]

And the book "Carolinus," which Adrian I first set forth in his writing on images to Charlemagne (and in the Epistles of Adrian it is among the letters of the Pontiffs in tome 2, and in the tome of the Councils after the Seventh Synod), rebukes Tarasius because, in Synod, action 2, in his Epistle, priests and bishops had said: "and in the Holy Spirit, the lifegiver, proceeding from the Father through the Son," and had not said: "proceeding from the Father and the Son." Which Adrian immediately defends, showing that the doctrine both of the Greeks and of the Latins is that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both; and he assigns no difference between those two particles, "through the Son" and "from the Son"; indeed among the very Fathers, who assert that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, you will find both.[543][544]

Now this truth has long since been explained in the Catholic Church by the Nicene symbol, which the Church publicly sings; under which accordingly this truth will be proved first by that particle "and the Son," as will be seen below.

And "through the Son" proves what Tharasius and the Seventh Synod and the Fathers said: "through the Son." Furthermore, that that particle has the same force among the Greeks which the particle "and the Son" has among the Latins, we will prove in the same chapter alleged.

It is also truly defined then in the Latin Councils. First, indeed, in Toledo I under Leo I in the oration of the faith; in Toledo III (commonly the fourth) under King Reccared; and in Gelasius I: St. Leander of Seville, Bishop, and St. Eufemius of Toledo, were present there; for in the confession of faith, as Isidore reports, the Fathers are said to have asserted: "And in the Holy Spirit, the Lord

542. Cardinal Bessarion, Oration at the Council of Florence after the last session, for the union of Greeks and Latins, proving from the Greek Fathers the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son; and the profession of the Council of Florence itself, wherein East and West confess the same symbol, with the truth of the procession from both expressed.

543. Aroinus/Annonius, De gestis Francorum, book 4, cap. 67; the Annalists: the Abbot of Ursperg, Sigibert, Ado of Vienne, and Regino under the year 766, on the controversies regarding the symbol and the clause "through the Son" used by Greeks, and the defense by Adrian I that "through the Son" and "from the Son" are equivalent with respect to the Spirit's procession.

544. Annonius, De gestis Francorum, book 4, cap. 95, on the Aachen council of Charlemagne and the embassy of Bishop Bernhar of Worms and Abbot Adelhart of Corbie, where the equivalence of "from the Father through the Son" and "from the Father and the Son" is treated and defended by the Apostolic See.

and lifegiver, who proceeds from the Father and the Son." And again in the same confession it is stated that the same is holy, the Son and the Spirit, not otherwise, indeed by the same [confession], and that the Holy Spirit, not created, is rightly believed, and is more truly taught to proceed from the Father and from the Son; concluding, from order, that He proceeds from the Father and the Son. All which in that Council either were changed, which the Toledan Councils decreed, by the work of the most learned Doctor Garcia Loaysa, of Complutum, a most illustrious man and chief under the most pious Emperor Philip II, examined by all the Spanish Councils; and we have them, as he set forth the very autograph copies with a learned note; what is written in the Second Council of Toledo under Honorius I; and in the Fourth Council under Mauritius I; and the Eleventh Council under King Wamba; in the confession of faith which we have; and in the acts celebrated under anathema at the Sixth Synod general; and in the Octave of Aquitaine; and in the notary acts: "Gestiana," and under Charlemagne again inserted, because in the year sixteen and eighteen it stood, by that very same decree it was then concluded to have been definitively settled for the Catholic truth; likewise it is celebrated in the Council at Barum by the Greeks and Latins under Urban; and the author is Adrian concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit in that place; and afterward the Lateran, under Innocent III, where in the decree for the instruction of the Greeks and Latins the testimonies are exhibited and decided; and the Council of Lyons defines the same; and that of Florence publicly in the Church, and the East together with the West embraces one and the same symbol of the Nicene faith; and thus we have the same truth defined together with the symbol of the Nicene with that particle added, as is sung everywhere.[542]

Where the particle "and the Son" was first added to the Nicene symbol. So much for now.

Caput IV - Where first this truth was delivered by the Church in the symbol by the addition "and the Son"

We have said thus far where this truth was defined by the Church; next, where first it was added to the symbol: and, first, at Toledo, as is clear. It was added to the symbol at Toledo: which is enough.

We have said above where this truth was defined by the Church; but where the clause "and the Son" (Filioque) was first added to the Nicene Symbol.

It can be confirmed from the Tripartite History, book 9, chapter 14, and from the Symbol of Damasus, which is found in the ninth tome among the works of St. Jerome, where that clause is added, and lastly from Hugo Etherianus, book 3 On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, chapter 16, whom I have not read.[545]

Yet these things are of no moment. For, first, in that epistle it is only related how those Fathers of Constantinople, hindered by certain inconveniences, were unable to come to Rome, and therefore sent their written profession of faith to the Roman Council, and, together with it,

542. Cardinal Bessarion, Oration at the Council of Florence after the last session, for the union of Greeks and Latins, proving from the Greek Fathers the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son; and the profession of the Council of Florence itself, wherein East and West confess the same symbol, with the truth of the procession from both expressed.

celebrated one general council. But concerning the addition of that clause, not even a word; indeed, among the decrees of that Roman Council, which are contained in that ninth book of the Tripartite History, chapter 16, nothing is determined of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son; rather, by Canon 16 he alone is condemned who denies the Holy Spirit to be from the Father.

What is adduced from the Symbol of Damasus also matters little: both because it is not sufficiently certain whether that symbol is Damasus's, and the canons which Marius Victorinus collected in the ninth tome are of uncertain authors; and also because that symbol is far different from the Nicene and Constantinopolitan, whereas we are now inquiring not where this truth was first defined, but where the clause "and the Son" was first added to the Nicene Symbol which is sung in the Church.[546]

But it is objected to us by Jeremias, Patriarch of Constantinople, in that censure of the Oriental Church, chapter one, that in the Nicene Symbol confirmed at Constantinople it is expressly said that the Spirit proceeds from the Father alone. Still, that this is false is manifest even from the words of the symbol which he himself subjoins in that chapter. For it is said: "And in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and life-giver, who proceeds from the Father," etc. Where, although it is only expressed that he proceeds from the Father, nevertheless it is not said "from the Father alone": and these two are far different.

The Greeks, and Jeremias with them, complain in another place that we have added the clause "and the Son" against the definition of the Fathers of the Nicene Council, whereas the Nicene Fathers did not put it. But who does not see that the things which, in subsequent ages, were rightly added to the symbol by Latins and Greeks alike, according to sincere and right faith, are by no means opposed to the decree of the Nicene Council? For it is plain that in the Nicene symbol not more was pronounced about the Holy Spirit than this, "And in the Holy Spirit"; afterwards, indeed, the Fathers of the First Council of Constantinople added those words, "the Lord and life-giver, who proceeds from the Father."

Why so few things were said about the Holy Spirit in the Nicene Council, St. Basil explains in his epistle to the Church of Antioch, which is number 60: where, after reciting the first Nicene Symbol, at the end of the epistle he says thus: "But since the statement about the Holy Spirit was not defined, because as yet there had not appeared those who were waging war against the Spirit - whether those are to be condemned who say that the Holy Spirit is a creature and of servile nature - on that synod no mention was made."[547]

Therefore, after the Constantinopolitan Council, at the time in which (as we said in chapter one) those of Ephesus lived, when some had begun to deny that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son, with very good right it was opposed and defined in the aforesaid Councils; and for

545. Socrates Scholasticus, Historia Tripartita, lib. 9, cap. 14; Symbolum Damasi, as printed "in 9. tomo Hieron."; Hugo Etherianus, De processione Spiritus Sancti, lib. 3, cap. 16.

546. On the uncertainties surrounding the Damasine symbol and the canons gathered by Marius Victorinus, see the collection cited as "in 9. tomo Marius Victorinus."

547. St. Basil, Epistola 60 (ad Ecclesiam Antiochenam): after reciting the Nicene Symbol he explains the brevity about the Holy Spirit because controversies had not yet arisen.

a fuller explication of the symbol that clause "and the Son" was added: and how consonant this is to Sacred Scripture was proved in chapter 2. How far also the doctrine of the Fathers, even of the Greeks, consents, we shall easily show in what follows.

But if the Greeks object to the Latins that they added that clause "and the Son" to the symbol, let them also mark Tharasius: for in the Seventh Synod, action 6, in an epistle to the supreme priests and bishops, he added that phrase "through the Son"; and we shall show especially in chapter 6, § 6, that it has altogether the same force.

Nor does it stand in our way that in the Council of Ephesus, Canon 7, it is said that it is lawful for no one either to profess or to write another faith (the Nicene and the Constantinopolitan symbols having been recited among other things). This, I say, does not stand in our way; because, as we have said, by the aforesaid addition neither is another faith professed nor written, but the same is more declared and explained according to the doctrine of the Fathers and the true sense of Scripture. If, however, it were not lawful to add even a word, as the Greeks contend, then the Council of Chalcedon should also be condemned, which added many things to the Nicene Symbol and also subtracted some. And it is plain that a General Council, even with the approbation of the Roman Pontiff, could not prescribe the manner of composing the symbol for future Councils and Pontiffs. For it is free to successors, as to equals, to explain the faith in another manner and in other words, provided they add nothing against right faith nor subtract anything.

But as to that which the Master attests (Sentences I, dist. 11), namely that Pope Leo III, for the caution of our faith, placed on a silver tablet the Constantinopolitan symbol without that addition "and the Son," upon the altar of the Apostles Peter and Paul, although at that time the addition had already been made (for he lived in the year 900), we willingly grant it; yet this in no way militates against the aforesaid addition. For he did not do this in order to condemn the addition, but that the memory of that symbol might be preserved, which by no means is contrary to ours.[548]

Caput V - Greek Fathers on the procession of the Spirit from the Son

Passing over the Latin Fathers - of whom an innumerable multitude of testimonies could be adduced - out of many and most weighty doctors of the Greek Church, Bessarion confirms this truth in sections 6 and 7 of that oration which he delivered at the Council of Florence: these, indeed, speak in a twofold manner about the Holy Spirit. Some say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son and through the Son; of these testimonies, just as of the Latins, we shall offer some in this chapter. Others, indeed, say that he proceeds through the Son; from which kind of testimonies one and the same truth is to be proved in the following chapter. Here, however, we shall set forth not only the testimonies which the excellent man Bessarion produced - such as could not be calumniated among the Greeks - but also others, which nevertheless they maliciously and without foundation do calumniate.[549]

548. Peter Lombard, Sentences, book 1, dist. 11, on Pope Leo III's silver tablets of the Constantinopolitan symbol without the Filioque on the altar of the Apostles Peter and Paul.

549. Cardinal Bessarion, Oratio at the Council of Florence, especially sections 6 - 7, adducing Greek Fathers for the procession from the Father and the Son.

First testimony. It is that of Athanasius in the symbol in this manner: "The Holy Spirit, not made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding from the Father and the Son." The Greeks, indeed, unjustly deny that this symbol is Athanasius's: for Gregory Nazianzen, in the oration on the praises of Athanasius, which is the twenty-first, attests that Athanasius issued a perfect confession of faith, which the whole West and the East venerates. St. Augustine also, in the Psalm, recites entire under the name of Athanasius this symbol: yet, with the name of Athanasius suppressed, he makes use of his sentences in On the Trinity, book 1, chapter 8, in epistle 174, and in the Enchiridion, chapter 36. Wherefore the Greeks cannot deny that a symbol of this kind was published by Athanasius.[550]

On what foundation, then, will they be able to say that that clause "and the Son" was maliciously added by the Latins? In the time, indeed, of Gennadius Scholarius, as he himself writes in the book For the Defense of the Council of Florence, chapter 1, section 3, the Greeks used to concede that this symbol was published by Athanasius; yet fanatical men did not hesitate to assert that he was drunk when he composed it!

Genebrard also reports, in book 3 On the Trinity, that there exists by a very old manuscript codex in the monastery of St. Germain at Paris, a tract De Synodis, in which it is said that Athanasius composed the aforesaid symbol "Quicunque" when he was hiding in a certain pit because of the most grievous persecutions of the Arians, and especially of the emperor Constantius the Arian. The same is written by Nauclerus in the Chronology in the ninth age. Genebrard further alleges a little book written in Greek On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, which was presented to Lazarus Baïssius, orator of King Francis I of France, at Venice, in which not only is Athanasius asserted to be the author of this symbol, but also, in confirmation of this matter, there is brought forward the testimony of Nazianzen, which we reported above. Finally, Genebrard cites John Balethin, a Parisian theologian, who some four hundred years ago published a book, in which, among other things, he sets down in its proper place the judgment that Athanasius is the author of this symbol. Let these things, said by the way, suffice, that our age's Valentinus Gentilis may be put to shame, who, with no other foundation than their accustomed loquacity, have tried to undermine the authority of this symbol.[551]

Second testimony. It is of the same Athanasius, in Sermon 4 against the Arians, toward the beginning; where he writes to the effect: For we do not introduce three first principles, nor three [separate] processions; but, as it were, the sun coming forth and the splendor, and from both the ray proceeding. He plainly compares the Father to the sun, the Son to the splendor; and he makes the Holy Spirit to proceed from both, namely from the Father and the Son. And in the epistle to Serapion On the Holy Spirit he speaks thus to the same effect, teaching that the Spirit is truly God and has his relative origin from the Son, while the Son is naturally God, begotten and subsisting

550. St. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 21, In laudem Athanasii; St. Augustine, De Trinitate 1.8; Epist. 174; Enchiridion 36.

551. Genebrard, De Trinitate, lib. 3; Nauclerus, Chronologia, aet. 9; on the Greek tract De processione Spiritus Sancti presented to Lazarus Baïssius at Venice, affirming Athanasian authorship and citing Nazianzen; John Balethin, a Parisian theologian of some four centuries past, likewise affirming the same.

essentially from the Father; those who trample the Spirit under foot he bids to be avoided, according to the Apostle's precept after the first and second admonition. I pass over other testimonies of Athanasius, by which we can convict the Greeks not less clearly.

Third testimony. It is of Basil, book 3 against Eunomius, near the beginning, where he says: Why is it necessary that the Spirit be third in dignity and order, and in nature also be third? For in dignity he holds the second place after the Son, since he has his being from him.

Caput VI - On Greek Fathers who said "from the Father through the Son," and that "through" signifies causality

The same truth is shown by the Fathers who said that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son.

There are also other weighty and ancient doctors of the Greek Church who taught that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son. From these Bessarion in that oration proves the same truth, in chapter 6; he first premises, however, in chapter 5, from the doctrine of St. Thomas in article 3 of this question, that the particle "through" (per), which those Fathers use, signifies the reason of cause or of principle (principium), which indeed no one can deny. For as to what the Greeks assert, namely that it is put for the particle "with" (cum), who could rightly say that Peter, who is clothed with a garment and therefore walks with a garment, walks through a garment? and the like. Add that in Scripture the particle "through" (per) signifies cause or principle: Genesis 4, "I have gotten a man through God"; John 1, "All things were made through him"; and Colossians 1, "All things were created through him." In which places, if we should interpret "through" as "with," a senseless meaning would be rendered. Basil also teaches in the book On the Holy Spirit, chapter 29, that the particle "through" sometimes signifies the same as "from" (ex).

Two other points which the Greeks advance are frivolous: namely, that the Fathers use in this mystery the particle "through" both to denote the relation of the Son to the Father, and also to signify identity of nature. For if in that way of speaking the consubstantiality of the Son were signified, by the same manner of speaking we could say that the Son proceeds from the Father through the Holy Spirit, as if to indicate that the Holy Spirit is also of the same substance with the Father. Then too it is not sufficiently clear how the relation of the Son to the Father is denoted by that particle; or, if it could be denoted, it is not evident for what reason this would be necessary. Therefore it follows that the Greek and Latin Fathers used that particle to signify cause. Now that particle cannot signify a material, formal, or final cause of the Holy Spirit, as is clear; therefore it denotes an efficient cause: but this cannot, with respect to the Holy Spirit, be anything other than the producing principle; therefore those who say that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son also confess that the Son is a principle of the Holy Spirit.

Basil asserts this particularly in book 3 against Eunomius, chapter 12, where he proposes the question why the Holy Spirit is not called the Son of the Son, and answers in these words: not because he is not from God through the Son, lest we suspect the Trinity to be multiplied into infinity. But if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, he would not propose that question, since it would have no difficulty; nor would he answer in that way, for he could much more easily have said that the Spirit is therefore not the Son of the Son because he does not proceed from him. In the same chapter Basil also asserts that the Holy Spirit is manifested by the Father through the Son; which, as Bessarion very well noted, cannot be understood of the temporal manifestation by which the Holy Spirit, being sent by the Father and the Son, poured forth upon the disciples, but of the eternal procession, which he calls "manifestation." For Basil adds there: for this reason the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Son, because through him, namely through the Son, he is manifested. But if he were speaking of temporal manifestation, it would follow that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Son from a point in time, because from a point in time he was manifested through the Son. Moreover, Bessarion proves in the aforesaid chapter 6 that the particle "through" does not signify the same as "with," because it would not rightly be said that the Spirit is "the Spirit of the Son" for the reason that he "is with" him and is manifested; for then it could also be said that the Son is "the Son of the Spirit," because he "is with" him and is manifested.

That by the name "manifestation" the eternal procession is signified is clearly proved by Bessarion from other Fathers. First, from Nyssen in book 1 against Eunomius, which among his works we do not have, where he has these words about the Holy Spirit: "He is distinguished by his own property, which is, that he is neither begotten from the Father as the Only-begotten is, nor produced as a son, and that through the Son he is manifested." It is also clear that the Holy Spirit is not to be distinguished from the Son or from the Father by a temporal manifestation alone, but by the eternal procession. Cyril of Alexandria also uses that name "manifestation" in the epistle to Valerian the bishop, which Bessarion cites (but among his epistles in the Latin codices that epistle is not found), where he says: "Just as the Father, so also he who is manifested from him, the Only-begotten Son, is holy by nature." And again: "The Holy Spirit is proper to the Son, not only inasmuch as the Word is manifested from the Father, but also inasmuch as he is understood to have been made man; that is, not only according to the divinity, but also according to the humanity." And Gregory Nazianzen, in the theological oration which is the 37th, not far from the beginning, expressed this to us in different words, in answer to the objection of those who were asserting that the Holy Spirit ought to be called a Son, because nothing seemed to prevent his being called a Son; thus he answers: "We do not say that anything is lacking; for nothing is lacking to God: but the difference of manifestation and, so to speak, of their mutual relation has also brought forth distinct names for them." Who does not see that the names of the persons proceeding were derived not from temporal manifestations, but from origin and eternal procession? Therefore Bessarion rightly concludes in the cited place that among the Greeks these three come to the same, namely: that the Spirit is the Spirit of the Son, and that he proceeds through the Son, and that he is manifested through the Son. In the same way that the Holy Spirit proceeds through the Son is affirmed by Nyssen in the oration to Ablabius On the fact that one ought not to say there are three Gods, by Cyril of Alexandria, book 1 on John chapter 1, and book 12 chapter 56, and book 1 of the Thesaurus chapter 2, and in the book On the Right Faith to Theodosius after the middle, and in books 5, 6, and 7 On the Trinity; likewise by Tarasius in the epistle to the supreme priests and bishops, which is found in the third action of the seventh synod, where in his confession of faith he speaks in this same mode; whom the Liber Carolinus unfairly reproves, as we noted in chapter 3.[552]

At length, since many and weighty Fathers of the Latin Church, before the schism arose between the Greeks and Latins, conspired in this opinion, it is great rashness on the part of the Greeks that with such an obstinate mind they still remain in their error, and that they do not hesitate to oppose so common testimonies of the Fathers of both Churches by frivolous reasonings and baseless grounds.

From the Latins indeed this catholic sentiment was taught by Tertullian in the book against Praxeas, chapter 4, who uses the particle "through," as did the Greeks alleged above, and in chapter 8, where he uses the particle "with," as other Latin Fathers; and by many Greeks; by Cyprian in the sermon on the coming of the Holy Spirit; by Hilary, book 2 On the Trinity; by Ambrose, book 2 On the Holy Spirit, chapter 1; by Rufinus in his exposition of the Symbol which is found in the 9th tome of St. Jerome; by St. Augustine, tractate 99 on John, and elsewhere very often; by Prosper, book 1 On the Contemplative Life, chapter 13; by Leo I in epistle 91, otherwise 93, which is to Turibius, chapter 1; by Fulgentius, On the Faith to Peter, chapter 3; by Idacius Clarus against Varimandus after the middle in the 8th tome of the Sacred Library; by Boethius, book 1 On the Trinity, chapter 12; by Pope Hormisdas in the epistle to the Emperor Justin, chapter 2; by Gregory in the Synod which is read in his Life, book 1, chapter 2; and in book 2 of the Dialogues, the last chapter, and book 1 of the Morals, chapter 18; and by Bede, book 1 On the Elements of Philosophy.[553]

Fifth testimony is of St. John Chrysostom in the homily on the Symbol, who calls the Holy Spirit one proceeding from the Father and the Son. Sixth testimony is of Didymus, book 2 On the Holy Spirit, in St. Jerome's sixth tome: explaining John 16, "For he shall not speak from himself," he thus writes: because he is not from himself, but is from the Father, and is from me; for that which is put, "he will speak," is from the Father and from me he is; nothing clearer could have been said. Seventh testimony is of Simeon the Metaphrast in the Life of Dionysius the Areopagite: "My Christ," he says, "ascends into heaven and, returning to the paternal seat, sends to the disciples the Spirit who proceeds from him."

The same truth is shown from the Fathers who said that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son.

---

552. Cardinal Bessarion, Oratio at the Council of Florence, especially chs. 5 - 7; St. Gregory Nazianzen, Orations 37 and 24; St. Cyril of Alexandria, In Ioannem lib. 1, c. 1; lib. 12, c. 56; Thesaurus lib. 1, c. 2; De recta fide ad Theodosium (post medium); De Trinitate libb. 5 - 7; St. Gregory of Nyssa, Ad Ablabium; Tarasius, Epistola ad summos sacerdotes et episcopos (actio 3 of the Seventh Council); the Liber Carolinus, ch. 3.

553. Tertullian, Adversus Praxean chs. 4 and 8; St. Cyprian, Sermo de adventu Spiritus Sancti; St. Hilary, De Trinitate II; St. Ambrose, De Spiritu Sancto II, 1; Rufinus, Expositio Symboli (in St. Jerome's tome 9); St. Augustine, Tract. 99 in Ioan. and elsewhere; Prosper, De vita contemplativa I, 13; St. Leo I, Ep. 91 (alias 93) ad Turibium, c. 1; Fulgentius, De fide ad Petrum c. 3; Idacius Clarus contra Varimandum (in Bibliotheca sacra, tom. 8); Boethius, De Trinitate I, 12; Pope Hormisdas, Epistola ad Iustinum imperatorem c. 2; St. Gregory the Great, Synod in Vita I, 2; Dialogi II, c. ult.; Moralia I, 18; Bede, De elementis philosophiae I.

Fourth testimony is of Epiphanius, heresy 69, where concerning the Holy Spirit he says: "Proceeding from the Father, and receiving from the Son." By which words he shows, against the Arians, that the Holy Spirit is not a creature: therefore he refers those words to the eternal emanation; otherwise he would prove nothing. He repeats the same words and reason frequently, in order to prove that the other things besides the Holy Spirit are created, because neither do they proceed from the Father, nor do they receive from the Son. The same, in the Anchoratus, pages 332, 349, 350, 351, says that the Holy Spirit is from the Son; and likewise that he is from the Father and the Son, and from both; which things are so manifest that no one can call them into doubt. However, at the Council of Florence, in session 18, one Mark in the name of the Greeks tried to defend that in Epiphanius the word "is" was not present; but when he had been convicted by John, theologian of the Latin Church, he turned aside in this manner, namely, that to be "from the Father and the Son" was nothing else than to be "of their substance," that is, of the same substance with them. But John and Cardinal Bessarion in that very place refuted this also, proving that this "to be" is referred to the persons of the Father and the Son.[554]

From the same following words of Basil the same truth is most clearly gathered: for he subjoins: "Just as the Son is by order second after the Father, because he is from him, and by dignity, because the Father is to him origin and cause of being; yet by nature he is in no way second, because in truth the Godhead is one: so the Holy Spirit, although he is by dignity and by order second after the Son, nevertheless it does not follow that he is of a different nature." Therefore, since Basil teaches that the Spirit by order and dignity is second after the Son, he necessarily confesses that the Spirit is from the Son, and that the Son is the origin of the Spirit: for to be by order second after someone, according to Basil's cited words, is to be from him; and to be by dignity second is to be second in origin. Add that, if the Holy Spirit were not from the Son, he would not have with him the order of first and second, as we shall see below in disputation 168, chapter 2.

In the Council of Florence, session 20, when the Greeks were hard pressed by this testimony, they said it had been corrupted, because not in all Greek codices, but only in some, were these words found. And indeed in the Basel edition of the year 1551 we do not read them. But the Latin theologians brought forward a very ancient manuscript, written by hand six hundred years earlier, in which these words were contained. Moreover, from the following words of the same Basil the same truth is clearly collected, as has been stated above.

Caput VII - The Greeks object certain Eastern Fathers

It is objected to us by the Greeks that some Fathers of the East are on their side.

First: Dionysius. Let us briefly see what the Greeks object to us from the Fathers. First indeed Dionysius, in the book On the Divine Names, calls the Father "the fount of the supersubstantial deity." If, then, the Spirit proceeded from the Son, the Son too would be a fount. I answer: by

554. On the Basel 1551 Greek edition lacking the clause; on the ancient Latin manuscript with the clause; on John the Latin Theologian and Cardinal Bessarion at the Council of Florence, sessions 18 and 20.

"fount" Dionysius understands not just any principle (principium), but the first principle, as we explained above in disputation 139, chapter 3. Therefore, even if the Father alone is the fount of the Godhead, that is, the principle without a principle, nevertheless the Son can be a principle from a principle, like a rivulet; and in this respect alone the Holy Spirit proceeds from him.

Second testimony: they further adduce Basil, who in epistle 43 says thus: "No second person has community in notion with the Son, as the Son has with the Father: but if the Spirit proceeded from both, in the notion of spirator the Father and the Son would agree." I reply: who does not see that Basil is speaking not of a common notion of these two persons, but of the proper notion of each, namely, of paternity and of filiation, according to which they have no communion at all? And since in that same place Basil plainly says that the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son, he openly confirms our opinion.

Third testimony seems to favor the Greeks: Nazianzen, in the oration to the bishops who had come from Egypt, which is the 24th; for he says: "All things which the Father has, the Son also has, except causality." Therefore, since according to the Greek phrase the Father is the cause of the Holy Spirit, it follows that the Son is not a cause. I answer: Gregory, in the way of speaking, is only signifying that all things are common to the Father and the Son except the opposed relations of cause and caused; and thus he speaks of that causality by which mutually the Son and the Father are referred to one another, not of that by which they regard the Holy Spirit, as is clearly gathered from St. John Damascene, book 1 On the Faith, chapters 8 and 11; whom we set forth in chapter 3 of this disputation, and indeed from whom we proved that the Son, together with the Father, breathes the Holy Spirit.

Fourth they bring forward Damascene, book 1 On the Faith, chapter 11: that the Holy Spirit is "from the Son." Some scholastics, with St. Thomas, in question 10 On Power, article 4, reject Damascene on this, as if it would follow the error of Theodoret. But since Theodoret denied that the Holy Spirit is "through the Son," as we related in chapter 1; and since Damascene in that same chapter says that the Holy Spirit is not "from the Son," but "through the Son" is communicated or manifested, and that he is the Spirit of the Son; he does not seem to have agreed with Theodoret. Moreover, nor does it seem that Damascene followed the subsequent error of the Greeks who affirm that the Holy Spirit indeed proceeds "through the Son," but that the particle "through" denotes only concomitance and not causal force; for we have seen in this chapter that he by no means persuades of that, since Damascene well notes that the force of the particle "through" is causal.

First, indeed, they adduce Pseudo-Dionysius, On the Divine Names, ch. 2, who calls the Father the fount of the supersubstantial deity; but if the Spirit were to proceed from the Son, the Son too would be a fount. I answer that by fount Dionysius understands not any sort of principle, but the first principle, as we explained above in Disputation 139, ch. 3. Wherefore, even if the Father alone is the fount of the deity, that is, the principle without principle, the Son can be a principle from a principle, as a little stream is; and on this account alone does the Holy Spirit proceed from Him.

Second, they bring forward St. Basil, who in epistle 43 says thus: According to proper notion the Son has no communion with the Father; but if the Spirit proceeded from both, the Father and the Son would agree in the notion of spirator. But who does not see that Basil is speaking not of every notion of these two persons, but of the proper one, namely, of paternity and filiation, according to which they have no communion at all? Yet according to another notion they do have communion; for "spirator" is not a proper notion of either, but a common one of both. Therefore Basil does not oppose our position, but confirms it, when in the same place he denies any communion according to the proper notions of paternity and filiation; for according to those notions there is none, but there is communion according to the common notion of spirator.

Third, they seem to adduce St. Gregory Nazianzen, in the Oration to the Bishops of Egypt, which is the 24th, where he says: All things that the Father has, the Son has, except causality. Since therefore, according to the Greeks, the Father alone is the cause of the Holy Spirit, they infer that the Son is not a cause of the Holy Spirit. I answer that Gregory, by "causality," means only that causal priority which belongs to the Father with respect to the Son, and to the Son with respect to the Father, in their opposed relations; that is, he is speaking of causality in paternity and filiation. He is not speaking of that by which the Holy Spirit is referred to the Father and the Son, namely the causality of spiration. Hence the statement is true: all things that the Father has, the Son has, except the causality whereby the Father is a principle without principle. But the causality whereby the Spirit is breathed is common to the Father and the Son. Indeed, from this very saying we proved that the Son agrees with the Father in this, that He breathes the Holy Spirit.

Fourth, the Greeks bring forward St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, ch. 11, who denies that the Holy Spirit is from the Son. Some of the Schoolmen reject Damascene, saying that he followed the error of Theodoret. But since Theodoret, as we reported in ch. 1, denied that the Holy Spirit is through the Son, and Damascene in that same chapter says that the Holy Spirit is not from the Son, but is communicated or manifested through the Son, and that He is called the Spirit of the Son, he does not seem to have agreed with Theodoret. Moreover, neither was Damascene a follower of the Greeks' error, who affirm indeed that the Holy Spirit proceeds through the Son, but that the particle "through" does not denote a cause, as we saw in this chapter; this I am far from persuaded of, because Damascene well knew that the force of the particle "through" is causal; he also knew the definition of the Council of Alexandria against Theodoret. Wherefore he could not be excused from fault on the pretext, as Clichtoveus attempts to defend him in that chapter, that he had asserted this through ignorance. I therefore hold that Damascene did not deny that the Spirit proceeds from the Son in the sense of the Latins. For he calls Him the Spirit of the Son, which, as the synod of Alexandria notes in its circular letter, is said by reason of origin; he also says that He is communicated or manifested through the Son, which would not be true unless by reason of external emanation from Him.

From the Latins, moreover, this Catholic doctrine was taught by Tertullian, Against Praxeas chs. 4 and 8, who uses the particle "through" just as the Greeks cited above, and he also uses the particle "from," as do the other Latin Fathers; and by many Greeks as well; St. Cyprian, Sermon on the coming of the Holy Spirit; St. Hilary, De Trinitate II; St. Ambrose, De Spiritu Sancto II, 1;

Rufinus, in his Exposition of the Creed (in St. Jerome's tome 9); St. Augustine, Tract. 99 on John, and frequently elsewhere; Prosper, De vita contemplativa I, 13; St. Leo I, Ep. 91 (alias 93) to Turibius, c. 1; Fulgentius, De fide ad Petrum c. 3; Idacius Clarus against Varimandus (in the Bibliotheca sacra, tome 8); Boethius, De Trinitate I, 12; Pope Hormisdas, the Letter to Emperor Justin, c. 2; St. Gregory the Great, the Symbol recited in his Life I, 2; Dialogues II, last chapter; Moralia I, 18; and Bede, De elementis philosophiae I.

But they object to us that some Greek Fathers denied the Spirit to be from the Son, and so they think that the particle "from" and the particle "of" denote the ratio of first principle, and cause; while the Latins affirm that the Spirit proceeds from both as from one principle; yet if He proceeded from both as from a first principle, there would be two innascibles, and consequently two principles. Therefore these Greek Fathers thought that the particle "from" signifies a first principle and cause; and, to avoid speaking of two first principles of the Holy Spirit and of two spirations, they preferred to say that the Holy Spirit is through the Son rather than from the Son. Wherefore, even if we were to say that Damascene saw and read the acts of the Seventh Synod - which does not appear, nor is it at all likely - he could without any fault of error have used this manner of speaking; because in the Seventh Synod it is defined only that the Holy Spirit is through the Son.

In the same sense Maximus should be understood in the letter to Marinus, where, speaking of the Fathers of the Latin Church, he says that they do not concede that the Son is a cause, that is, a principle of the Holy Spirit; for he understood "cause without cause," that is, a first principle. And as to what some Latins said at the Council of Florence, that the words were not found in the Greek copies, Bessarion convicts this excellently in ch. 7 of that oration; and indeed, unless Maximus had understood that the Latin Fathers spoke in that sense, he would manifestly have imposed a falsehood upon them; for he could not produce a single Latin Father, even of the least authority, who denied that the Spirit proceeds from the Son as from a principle from a principle. Thus too I should understand Theophylact on John 3, "God does not give the Spirit to the Son by measure"; and Euthymius on John 14, "I will ask the Father"; who, together with Damascene, deny that the Holy Spirit is from the Son, or proceeds "from" the Son; because they nowhere deny that He proceeds through the Son; nay, they there assert that He is given through the Son and is therefore and is called the Spirit of the Son; which must be understood of the eternal emanation; for He is not called the Spirit of the Son because He is given temporally, but because from eternity He proceeds. Add also that these authors, as they themselves expressly note, therefore deny that the Spirit proceeds "from" the Son, lest they be forced to concede two first principles and, consequently, two spirations; but the Latins affirm that He proceeds from both as from one principle. If therefore He proceeded from both as from a first principle, there would be two innascibles and hence two principles. Thus these Greek Fathers denied that the particles "of" and "from" express the notion of first principle; while the Latins, who use these particles without any peril, were blamed by them in an unmannerly way; especially since many among the Greek Fathers - whom we recalled in ch. 5 above - use the particles "from," "out of," and "of."

Why the Greeks denied the Spirit to be "from" the Son. They denied it because, according to their language, those two particles, "of" and "from," denote the ratio of first principle; and since the Son is not the first principle of the Holy Spirit, but a principle from a principle, lest there appear to be two first principles and two spirations of the Holy Spirit, they preferred to say that the Holy Spirit is through Him rather than from Him. And thus, even if Damascene had seen and read the acts of the Seventh Synod - which does not appear, nor is it at all likely - he could without any fault of error have used that manner of speaking; because in the Seventh Synod it is defined only that the Holy Spirit is through the Son.

An if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, would He be distinguished from Him?

Disput. 147.

- Status quaestionis, ch. 1.
- The view of Henry, Scotus, and others, ch. 2.
- The view of Henry and Scotus has no peril in the faith, ch. 3.
- The true opinion is proved by the authority of St. Thomas, ch. 4.
- By what reasons this opinion is proved by Durandus, Cajetan, and others, ch. 5.
- By two very good reasons the aforesaid opinion is confirmed, ch. 6.
- The reasons of the former view are dissolved, ch. 7.
- Corollaries of the foregoing doctrine, ch. 8.

Disputatio CXLVII

Caput I - Status quaestionis

There have not been lacking theologians who have followed the opinion of Gottschalk (as reported by Scotus, Ord. I, d. 1, q. 4), who thought that this question, as proceeding from an impossible hypothesis, is superfluous and useless. For since the things that are in God are in the highest mode necessary, the opposites of them will be in the highest mode impossible. But such is this: that the Holy Spirit should not proceed from the Son, contrary to what the truth of our faith grants. Wherefore, since from an impossibility anything follows, that is, any part of a contradiction, it is no wonder if, from the aforesaid supposition, it is inferred both that the Holy Spirit is nevertheless to be distinguished from the Son, and that He is not to be distinguished. Our disputation would therefore be useless and unprofitable, since nothing certain can be gathered from it.

But, as Gregory of Rimini notes in I, dist. 11, q. 1, art. 2, and as Scotus most aptly observed in the same place, it is very useful to argue from some impossible supposition, as will easily appear in the present question: neither from such a hypothesis can both parts of a contradiction be inferred through the topic (as they say) of the intrinsically remaining supposition; but with the hypothesis remaining and standing, one cannot infer both parts of a contradiction. For example, if it were supposed that man were not an animal, yet reason would remain in him; if someone inquired whether anything remained by which man could be distinguished from a horse, it would not follow that both parts of the contradiction followed; rather it must be said that nevertheless something would remain by which man would differ from a horse, namely that which now formally distinguishes him from the horse would remain. If, however, someone were to argue in this way: If animal did not remain, rational could not remain; therefore that by which the difference is constituted would not be able to remain; although he would conclude correctly, yet not by the topic of the intrinsically remaining supposition, but by destroying one part of the supposition from another, which however the present inquiry does not proceed by; for it proceeds with the hypothesis remaining fixed, namely that the Son is begotten by the Father, but that the Holy Spirit is not spirated by the Son, yet in the same numerically one nature, as before; and that the same filiation and passive spiration remained and persevered; whether anything would remain by which the Son and the Holy Spirit could be personally distinguished from each other. With that hypothesis retained, both parts of the contradiction cannot be inferred, as will be clear in the course of the disputation.

This mode of disputing and arguing is moreover very useful, that we may understand what is the formal reason and the necessary cause of the distinction between the Son and the Holy Spirit: whether it be the active spiration or the filiation. For if the Holy Spirit, not proceeding from the Son, were not distinguished from Him, it follows that the necessary reason of distinction in the Son now is spiration; but if He would still be distinguished, it follows that there is another reason of distinction, even when the cause of distinction is removed; and then by the topic of the intrinsically remaining, distinction is removed when its cause is removed, but with that cause remaining, and with any other descriptor removed, the distinction remains.

Caput II - The view of Henry, Scotus, and others

In this question, thus understood, the view of Henry of Ghent was, which Scotus later followed in I, dist. 1, q. 2, that, the supposition being posited, nevertheless the Holy Spirit would be sufficiently distinguished from the Son; wherefore, against the Greeks, who admit that supposition, it cannot be proved that the Holy Spirit is the same person with the Son. And since in fact Scotus and Henry agree with the Latin Church that in the Son there are two relations, one of active spiration, the other of filiation, they consequently affirm that by filiation alone the Son is sufficiently distinguished from the Holy Spirit; although by active spiration also, as by an opposed relation, He personally differs.

This first opinion can be proved by the testimony of St. Anselm in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, ch. 2, where he speaks thus: "This therefore alone is the cause of plurality in God, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit cannot be said of one another but are from one another, because in the aforesaid two ways God is of God." As if he were to say: this alone is the cause of distinction among the persons, that the Son proceeds by generation, and the Holy Spirit by procession; for this is to proceed in two modes. But the Holy Spirit would proceed nevertheless by procession, and the Son by generation, even if the Spirit were not produced from the Son; therefore by that cause also He would be distinguished personally from Him. Anselm goes on, and at the end of the chapter he assigns this single reason of personal distinction between the Son and the Holy Spirit, that the one goes forth by being born, the other by proceeding; until some other distinction is shown. And in ch. 4 he says: unless by these modes they were more than one - the Son and the Holy Spirit - they would not be diverse from each other; but because the one exists by being born, the other by proceeding, they are diverse.

Then the aforesaid authors confirm this position by a twofold foundation: both from the formal reason of a constituting principle, and from the plurality of emanations. The first foundation is taken from such a constituting principle, which so sufficiently constitutes a thing that it also distinguishes it from any other which is not constituted by the same principle; for that by which a thing is constituted in its own proper ratio either properly and of itself, or by the ratio of living, or by some genus under which its constitution falls, the same, insofar as it adheres to the very subsistence of that constituted thing, is such that through it a thing is distinguished from all others which do not adhere by the same constitution. And so a man is distinguished from a stone by the rational, by which he is constituted substantially; and hence a man is either distinguished from a stone by the rational, by which he is substantially, and properly, constituted; or by the ratio living, which is a genus under the constitution of which his constitution falls: yet that which adheres more to his proper subsistence more suitably distinguishes him. Thus either the Son is distinguished from the Holy Spirit by filiation, which constitutes Him, or by something else which constitutes His subsistence, or by an opposed relation; but if by filiation He is sufficiently constituted in His personal subsistence, He is thereby distinguished; and the Holy Spirit likewise, the same remaining, would be distinguished by His own constituting ratio. Therefore, even if active spiration were not found in the Son, filiation, which constitutes the person, would suffice for distinction; the effect follows by the topic of the intrinsically remaining: the effect of that cause remains, whatever descriptor be removed from the hypothesis, apart from the impossible hypothesis; wherefore if the Spirit did not proceed from the Son, filiation remaining in the Son and procession in the Holy Spirit, they would nevertheless be distinguished.

If anyone replies (says Scotus) that things are distinguished only by those by which they are constituted more than by others with which they agree: I answer that, just as a rational animal is distinguished from brute animals, with which it agrees as animal; and from stones, with which it does not agree as living. To this objection Scotus replies in three ways in order: first, that nothing which is from another can be distinguished by a principle that it does not substantially presuppose in its constitution, or by any action which does not adhere to its constitution substantially; and therefore man is not distinguished from stone by any operation other than by that which issues from his substantial constitution, or by some action that adheres to that constitution.

Caput III - On the sentence of Henry and Scotus and whether it is safe in the faith

Henry adds, by his arguments. Henry adds that these two emanations can be from the same principle according to the thing, yet must necessarily terminate in diverse persons: for a multitude of emanations does not require a multitude of principles, as it does require a plurality of termini, as is manifest also in creatures.

Aureolus in part agrees with Henry and Scotus, first. Aureolus, in I, Distinction 11, Question 1, Article 2, whose arguments Capreolus relates in the same Distinction, Question 2, Article 2, Conclusion 1 (which in fact have nothing difficult beyond what has been said); then Gabriel in the same Distinction, Question 2, Article 2, the Conclusion; lastly Gregory in I, Distinction 11, Question 1, Article 1, report something differing from them in a certain way.[555] For Aureolus and Gabriel, while they teach that the principle of the Son's distinction from the Holy Spirit is filiation - in which they agree with Scotus and Henry - nevertheless affirm that, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, He ought not to be distinguished from Him: not indeed by the intrinsic place with the supposition retained, for that would clash with the same assertion; but because, as Gabriel says in Conclusion 3 of that article, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, in the Son there would be no spiration, and consequently no filiation, which is altogether the same as spiration; in which they differ from Henry and Scotus. But, as I warned above, the question proceeds in every opinion, by the intrinsic place, with the supposition remaining, as Scotus rightly noted; from which it follows that in that case the Holy Spirit would have to be distinguished from the Son, if in fact filiation is the sufficient principle of distinction. And it is ridiculous, in this question, to argue by destroying the supposition, as we were saying above; rather one must inquire whether, filiation remaining and without active spiration in the Son, the Son would be sufficiently distinguished from the Holy Spirit.

Gregory also dissents from Scotus, first, because he teaches that filiation is not the principle constituting the Son from the nature of the thing, as Scotus thought; for it is altogether the same reality as the Son; but that which from the nature of the thing constitutes something else must also from the nature of the thing differ from it. Secondly, because he affirms that in the Son there is nothing on the part of the thing besides spiration, by reason of which He is distinguished from the Holy Spirit, since in the Son spiration and filiation are altogether the same; whereas Scotus, on the contrary, thinks that these two relations are distinguished from the nature of the thing. Thirdly, he adds that, if one speaks of the principle of distinction as it exists outside the soul, there is in the Son no notion signified incomplexly: for this author denies that in God notions are signified incomplexly; yet he agrees with Scotus that, if one speaks of the principle distinguishing the Son from the Holy Spirit, insofar as it is signified by us complexly, that is, insofar as it is expressed by some account and enunciation, the Son is not distinguished from the Holy Spirit because He breathes Him, but because He proceeds from the Father by generation; which is the same as if, in the school of Scotus and the others who concede notions signified incomplexly, he were to say: the 555. Aureolus, In I Sent., dist. 11, q. 1, a. 2; Capreolus, In I Sent., dist. 11, q. 2, a. 2, concl. 1; Gabriel, In eadem dist., q. 2, a. 2, concl. (the same place); Gregory, In I Sent., dist. 11, q. 1, a. 1.

Son is distinguished from the Holy Spirit by filiation, not by spiration; and therefore, even if He did not breathe with the Father, He would nonetheless be distinguished from Him; for this follows by the intrinsic place, because, the principle of distinguishing remaining, the distinction cannot fail to follow.

The sentence of Henry and Scotus has nothing perilous in the faith.

On whether this censure should be judged dangerous in the faith

This censure is frivolous to be judged dangerous in the faith. For who does not see how ridiculous it is to amend the words of the Council, which are found in the same way in all the Greek and Latin codices, so that we may insinuate that Scotus's sentence is an error? Rather, those men ought to be noted who so lightly contrived this emendation, since from the aforesaid words an easy sense can be gathered elsewhere, which is as follows. Since the Greeks say that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son, they consequently teach that He proceeds from the Father alone, and therefore that He (namely, the Holy Spirit) is not the Son; and thus they wished that to be declared in the Symbol, lest it be defined in the four general Councils: for in these Councils the Greeks assembled in that Florentine Council professed to stand, just as in the four Lateran Councils. Therefore the Florentine Council does not, against the Greeks, in the aforesaid words infer that absurdity which our Theologians strive to infer against them and against Scotus, namely, that He (the Holy Spirit) would be the Son if He proceeded from the Father alone; but rather that the Greeks wanted to maintain - what they, according to the truth, despair of establishing - that if the Spirit does not proceed from the Son, at least He proceeds from the Father and is distinguished from the Son, lest they confound the Trinity. Against the Greeks, however, the Council infers this absurdity: that a partition of the divine substance would follow. For if the Son did not spirate the Holy Spirit, He would not receive from the Father the power of spirating; and consequently He would not have the Father's substance and power, if indeed in the Father's substance is the power of spirating. Nor does it matter, if you should say that this power is not communicated to the Holy Spirit: nevertheless the Father's substance would be divided in common; for since the power of spirating connotes a personal property, it is not communicated to that person to whom the personal property and the relation conjoined to it is opposed; and this takes place without any partition of the divine substance. But when the property and the relation conjoined to the power of spirating do not repugn and are not opposed to another person, that power cannot fail to be communicated to that person also, unless a partition of the divine substance should follow. For, as is evident from Caput 2 of the preceding disputation, all the things which the Father has are the Son's, except those which are mutually opposed; and by the same reason of the Holy Spirit. Wherefore, if anything, apart from those that are opposites by relation, were not common to the persons, it would follow that either the essence would be divided between them, or something of perfection would, by that very account, differ from the remaining persons - about personal properties, as is said in the Council of Florence, in that same last session, in a certain confession of faith sent to the Greeks, and in another letter.[556] Furthermore (says the Council), lest we seem to divide the identity and unity of the divine substance, and to hold that that same substance differs from the hypostases in reality and not by reason alone, therefore we said that the word "and from the Son" is necessary in the Symbol.[557]

Another thing, however, which is brought against Scotus is much more frivolous. For the partition of the divine substance, which those theologians cited above try to deduce against St. Thomas, follows only from the error of Gregory, because he taught that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son; but Scotus affirms nothing of the kind - rather, with the rest of the Scholastics, on the basis of that supposition alone, which they judge impossible and false, he disputes under a condition whether in such a case the Spirit would be distinguished from the Son; in which question, whether this or that be said, no division of the substance of God follows.

A ridiculous censure ought to be judged so in matters of faith. For who does not see that it is ridiculous to amend the words of the Council - on which that foundation rests - which are found in the same way in all the Greek and Latin codices, so as to insinuate the suspicion of Scotus's error? Rather, those ought themselves to be noted who so lightly devised this emendation, since an easy sense can be gathered from the aforesaid words; which is as follows. Since the Greeks teach that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son, they consequently teach that He proceeds from the Father alone, and therefore that He (namely, the Holy Spirit) is not the Son: in order thus to establish a Trinity of persons, which is defined in the four general Councils; for in that Council of Florence the Greeks gathered there used to defer to those Councils as to the four Gospels. Therefore the Council of Florence does not infer against the Greeks, in the aforesaid words, that absurd thing which our Theologians try to infer against them and against Scotus - namely, that the Holy Spirit would be a son if He proceeded from the Father alone - but rather it wished to establish what the Greeks, according to the true faith, ought to assert, namely, that if the Spirit does not proceed from the Son, at least He proceeds from the Father, and is distinguished from the Son, lest they confound the Trinity. But against the Greeks the Council infers this absurdity, that a partition of the divine substance (substantia) would follow. For if He did not breathe the Holy Spirit, He would not have received from the Father the power of spirating: and therefore neither the whole substance nor the power of the Father; since in the Father's substance is the power of spirating. Nor does it matter if you say that this power is not communicated to the Holy Spirit, but nevertheless that the Father's substance is not divided in Him: because since the power of spirating connotes personal property (proprietas personalis), it cannot be communicated to that person to whom a personal property, and the relation (relatio) conjoined with it, is opposed, and for this to be without any partition of the divine substance; but when the property and relation conjoined with the power of spirating do not repugn nor are opposed to another person, that power also cannot fail to be communicated to him, unless a partition of the divine substance follow. For as is evident from ch. 2 of the preceding disputation, all things which the Father has are the Son's,

556. Council of Florence, the same last session; in a certain confession of faith sent to the Greeks; and in another letter.

557. "Porro autem (inquit Concilium) ne identitatem, coniunctionemque divinae substantiae distribuere, atque ipsam eandem substantiam re, et non sola ratione ab hypostasibus differre, credere videamur, idcirco verbum ex Filio necessarium in symbolo diximus esse."

except those which are mutually opposed; and the same reason holds of the Holy Spirit. Wherefore, if something besides those things that are relatively opposed were not common to the persons, the essence (essentia) would without doubt be divided among them, or some essential [thing] would differ by more than a rational distinction from the personal relations, as is said in the Council of Florence.[558]

The opinion of St. Thomas in this article, which many Scholastics follow, as far more probable and more in agreement with the doctrine of the Fathers, is to be embraced by us. The Angelic Doctor therefore affirms that the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the Son by the opposition of relation alone (oppositio relativa), so that, if He did not proceed from Him, there would be one and the same person of both, having two relations by which He would be referred to the Father: he understands two distinct by reason alone, just as now in the Father there are two by which He is referred to two persons, namely paternity and spiration. With St. Thomas agree Cajetan, the Canarian, and more recent Thomists in this article; he himself handed down the same in the Summa contra Gentiles IV, ch. 24; and Ferrariensis there; St. Bonaventure in I, dist. 11, q. 1: for in the body of the article he plainly grants whatever the arguments of the Sed contra contend; among which one proved that, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, He would not be distinguished from Him; Durandus also in the same distinction, q. 2; Capreolus, q. 1, art. 1; Marsilius in I, q. 15, to the third argument: although this author asserts it for this reason alone, that in that case the Son would not be Son; and thus the Holy Spirit would not be distinguished from the Son; in which he seems to remove the supposition and to make the disputation superfluous, and in part to agree with the Nominalists, who follow the prior opinion.

But, as we were saying in ch. 1, the controversy proceeds with the supposition made and the same remaining, namely, if truly there were a Son begotten in the divine nature, but from Him the Spirit did not proceed, as the Greeks fable.

This opinion can be proved first by the authority of the Fathers, who affirm that by the opposition of relation alone the persons can be distinguished; that is, by the relation of cause and caused, as the Greeks speak: for thus it follows that, the opposition being removed, the personal distinction is taken away from the midst: but this opposition would not exist if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, as is manifest. But, on the contrary, the doctors of the prior opinion, in order to defend that, upon the supposition made, the Holy Spirit must be distinguished from the Son, strive to prove that not the opposition of relation alone is the cause of distinguishing the persons, but that they can be distinguished from elsewhere. I except St. Gregory, whom I recalled in ch. 2: for he not only teaches that in that case the Holy Spirit must be distinguished from the Son, but also that now in fact the Son is not distinguished from the Holy Spirit by spiration, but by filiation: from which opinion Scotus is not far, as is gathered from that author's former argument,

558. Council of Florence, the same last session; in a certain confession of faith sent to the Greeks; and in another letter: "Moreover (says the Council), lest we seem to distribute the identity and conjunction of the divine substance, and to believe that that same substance differs really, and not by reason alone, from the hypostases, therefore we judged the word 'and from the Son' to be necessary in the Creed."

by which he proves that the Son is distinguished from the Holy Spirit by filiation, by which He is substantially constituted, and that He cannot be distinguished from Him by any reason adventitious to Him already constituted - of which sort spiration seems to be.

That therefore the cause of the distinction among the persons is the opposition of relation alone, is proved first by the testimony of St. Gregory of Nyssa, which Bessarion cites in Oration 6, from the book to Ablabius; where concerning the divine persons he says thus: Those things which are considered around cause and caused, we do not deny a difference by which alone we detect one to be discerned from the other: namely, in that we believe that one is indeed cause, the other truly from a cause, and from that which is from a cause. Where St. Gregory says that the distinction among the persons arises and is believed solely from the relative opposition according to cause and caused: how then do Scotus and the other doctors of the prior opinion attempt to defend a distinction among the persons also from disparate relations, as they speak?

Add the testimony of the same St. Gregory of Nyssa, book 1 against Eunomius, according to whom - as we alleged in the preceding disputation, ch. 6 - he distinguishes the Spirit from the Son by this alone, that He is manifested through the Son: but we showed there that this must be understood of the eternal procession, and that the particle "through" in that place signifies causality.

Then, in favor of this opinion, Boethius is reported in the book On the Trinity, where he says that by relation the Trinity is multiplied in God.[559] But since he does not say this of opposed relations, we cannot argue from it against Scotus: for he can say that the persons are multiplied also by disparate relations.

Finally, the most received proposition among theologians is wont to be alleged, which is attributed to St. Anselm: In the divinity all things are one, where the opposition of relation does not stand in the way.[560] For in the book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, ch. 3, after he had spoken about the unity of essence and the plurality of relations, he said as follows: "Thus therefore are tempered the consequences of this unity and of this relation, that neither the plurality which follows relation passes over to those things in which there sounds the unity of the aforesaid simplicity, nor does the unity restrain the plurality where the same relation is signified: so that neither does unity ever lose its consequence where the property of some relation is not opposed; nor does relation lose what is its own, unless where the inseparable unity withstands." But St. Anselm can in no way favor us, if he be carefully read in that chapter and the following: for he does not think that there is only plurality and distinction among opposed relations; but that there is a twofold mode of procession, in each of which is its own opposition, not because any mode of procession is opposed to another. For with the words immediately preceding he thus explained this opposition of relation: "We have set forth above an opposition of relation which arises from this, that in the two aforesaid modes God is from God," - he proves that "Father and Son and Holy Spirit" are said of one another, and the proper [attributes] of each are ascribed. But a little earlier in the preceding chapter he had said that this is the cause of the distinction between the Son and the Holy Spirit, because the one exists by being begotten, the other by proceeding; nor had he said that there is a distinction between them to the extent that one proceeds from the other: indeed, in that same ch. 3, past the middle, he says: "But when it shall appear that the Holy Spirit is of the Son, then also it will be clear that for this reason the Holy Spirit cannot be Son." Finally, in ch. 4 of the same book he proves that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son by this argument: The Holy Spirit proceeds from the whole God the Father, who is the same God with the Son and with the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, or the Son from the Holy Spirit: but the Son cannot proceed from the Holy Spirit, as he himself proves: therefore it is the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Son.[561]

559. Boethius, De Trinitate.
560. Attributed to St. Anselm; see De Processione Spiritus Sancti, chs. 3 - 4.

Caput V - By what arguments this opinion is proved by Durandus, Cajetan, and others

From that axiom which is attributed to St. Anselm, and which we were just recalling, Cajetan and the Canarian in this article derive an argument for the opinion which we reported in ch. 4, as follows. Since in God there is substance and relation; the reason of distinguishing and constituting the persons is always ascribed to relations, not to substance; and since relation has something in common with the absolute, and something peculiar inasmuch as it is relation; the reason of distinguishing and constituting is ascribed to relation according to its proper notion: but its proper notion is order to a term; wherefore it will belong properly to it to constitute and to distinguish something by order to another: for whatever is constituted by the absolute is constituted to itself: therefore, if relation distinguishes the persons in God, inasmuch as it is relation and according to its proper notion, it follows that it distinguishes only from the opposed person. For since it ought by the same notion to distinguish by which it constitutes; if it constitutes toward another, namely toward the correlate, it will also distinguish only from that. Whence it follows that it is the same to be distinguished relatively and to be distinguished by relation, as relation is: but in both ways the distinction can be made only from the opposed. From all which things it rightly follows that the Father is distinguished by paternity from the Son alone; and the Son by filiation from the Father alone; and both from the Holy Spirit by spiration alone. Wherefore, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, He would not be distinguished from Him: because no form of distinction would remain in Him.

This doctrine, although it seems subtle, nevertheless has no firm foundation. For relation, even according to its proper notion, can distinguish from something other than the opposed relation. First, because the most general things of this category are distinguished from the other nine [categories] by an intrinsic mode, to their own proper; yet they are not opposed to them, but, as they say, by a disparate notion they are distinguished from others. Secondly, within a category not only those things differ which are opposed, but also many others do so. For paternity does not differ only from filiation, but also from similarity, ...

561. St. Anselm, De Processione Spiritus Sancti, chs. 3 - 4.

Thirdly, as Cajetan admits, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Father, He would nevertheless be distinguished from Him: therefore already paternity would distinguish the Father from something other than the opposed relative, and procession likewise. Fourthly, finally, relation according to the proper notion of relation is terminated to an absolute, not to a relative, except in the divine, as will be noted in Disputation 159, cap. 6; therefore according to the proper notion of relation, it not only distinguishes from the opposed relation, but also from the absolute to which it refers. Wherefore the opinion of St. Thomas must be proved for us in another way and, from that same common principle sufficiently accepted by theologians, In the divine all things are one, where the opposition of relation does not stand in the way, must be explained otherwise and confirmed.

Durandus confirms this opinion by another reasoning; which, though with a few changes it proves the contrary, as we shall see in the following chapter, nevertheless it presupposes certain things in his position which in truth are not so; therefore in the present chapter it has seemed good to set it forth. Thus Durandus argues: in fact, in the Father there are two disparate relations, namely paternity and spiration, and yet they do not constitute two persons: therefore, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, procession and filiation would not constitute and distinguish two persons, because they would be disparate in the same way, not however opposed, as now spiration and paternity are. Durandus, however, notes in the cited question, num. 16, that this reasoning must presuppose what he himself taught in I Sent., dist. 13, q. 2: that active spiration and paternity are really distinct; for in I Sent., dist. 33, q. 1, he calls every distinction from the nature of the thing and prior to the intellect, which he thinks to be between those two relations, a real distinction; thus indeed his reasoning has greater force. And indeed it can also be ineffective against Scotus; because since he concedes a distinction from the nature of the thing between those two relations, it can easily be proved against him that it is real, as was shown above in Disputation 116, cap. 5.

But someone will reply from the doctrine of that same Durandus in I Sent., dist. 13, q. 2, num. 22: that therefore by active spiration a person distinct from the Father is not constituted, because spiration is a common relation to two persons. But against this it seems to be the case that, in that case where the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, spiration would not be communicable, and nevertheless it would not constitute a different person, but the same as that which paternity would constitute.

Scotus meets this argument otherwise. For he replies in I Sent., dist. 2, part 2, q. 2 (which is the fifth in order to the second), and again in distinction on the second question cited, to the second argument, that there need not be as great a distinction between the active principles of a production as there must be between the things produced: because it is impossible that one and the same thing be produced by two passive productions; whereas the same agent can by two productions produce different things: the same man, for instance, produces a man and a work of art.

But Durandus presses Scotus in this way. Although the same supposit can by two productions produce two different things, and the same thing cannot be produced by different productions, yet that only happens whenever the supposit is not constituted by the relation of the producer: if, however, the supposit were constituted by relation, it is clearly gathered that by a double disparate relation of the producer there would be constituted a double supposit; since also by a double disparate relation of the produced there would be constituted a double supposit in that case in which the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son. For, as regards that effect, the same reasoning would seem to hold for either relation, namely of the produced and of the producer.

Others, says Durandus, answer this otherwise: they say that from one and the same supposit acting there can be two substantial productions, yet there cannot be two substantial productions of the same product: wherefore, if two productions are concerned with the same supposit, at least one must be accidental: for instance, the same man produces another substantially, and instructs him in some discipline: but two substantial productions cannot terminate in the same supposit: and they call that a substantial production, by which something is produced according to substance. But those who answer thus can be refuted in the same way. For the argument made does not contend to prove that from the same agent there cannot be two substantial productions; nor even that there cannot be two of the same subject produced; but that there is an equal reason of the relations of the producer and of the produced for constituting a supposit: so that if a twofold disparate relation of the produced suffices for constituting two persons, a twofold disparate relation of the producer likewise suffices.

But indeed this reasoning of Durandus proceeds in his opinion only in this way, if he supposes that the relations of spiration and of paternity are distinguished in reality. For if they are distinguished only by reason, an easy explanation can be given why paternity and spiration do not constitute two persons, although they are disparate relations: namely, because they are not really distinct; for this distinction is necessary between persons. On the contrary, if filiation and procession, although they are only disparate relations, constitute two persons, because they are really distinct. Moreover, by a similar line of reasoning, and that a most effective one, we can press Scotus, and clearly prove our position, as will appear in the following chapter.

Caput VI - By two very strong reasons the aforesaid opinion is confirmed

Since it is quite clear from Disputation 120, cap. 4, 5, and 6, that active spiration and paternity differ by reason alone, Durandus's reasoning ought to be framed thus. Two disparate relations of the producer, such as spiration and paternity, do not constitute two persons; nor would they constitute two persons in that case in which the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father alone, because since they are not opposed among themselves, they are the same according to reality, and differ by reason alone: therefore two disparate relations of the produced, such as filiation and procession, would not constitute two persons, if the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father alone: because in the same way they would be the same according to reality, just as the active relations are: for in no way would they be opposed. Wherefore, as the same supposit now begets and breathes, so also it would be begotten and would proceed.

But let someone say with Scotus that filiation and procession even in that case would be really distinguished, because then there would be two emanations really distinct, the one by intellect, the other by will: and from two emanations there necessarily arise two relations of the produced really distinct; to which two relations in the agent can correspond, in Scotus's opinion, two relations formally only distinct, or, in the Thomists' opinion, diverse by reason alone. But since the same ratio ought to be of the relations that result from emanations, and of the emanations themselves, which are nothing else than relations on the way, and differ from the relations themselves by reason alone; who, I ask, would dare to affirm, or inconsiderately grant to Scotus, that in that case there would be two emanations really distinct without any opposition, merely because they would be disparate; whereas as things now stand there are not two relations of the producer distinct, even if they are disparate? The same argument, therefore, can be made about the emanations, as we were making about the relations of the produced and of the producer, in this way. Suppose there were now in the Father, as there are now, two disparate relations of the producer, yet they would not constitute different persons, because since they were not opposed, they would be the same really; it will follow that there would not be two emanations, nor relations of the produced really distinct, because they would not be opposed either: for there would not be a greater repugnance between the emanations, and between the relations of the produced, to prevent their being the same, than there is between the relations of the producer. Therefore, some Thomists carelessly concede to Scotus that in that case there would be two emanations really distinct; which, once admitted, they can scarcely defend that there would not be two relations of the produced and two produced persons.

Wherefore, since it has been proved that in that case there would be one and the same person of the Son and of the Holy Spirit with a double relation of the produced, namely of the begotten and of the proceeding, diverse by reason alone, it must be explained in what way those two relations and emanations would stand according to our mode of understanding. Some suppose that then that person would proceed just as a work of art is produced, namely by the will and intellect of the craftsman. But because a work of art is not elicited by the will and the intellect, but is made by their command and direction only, this example does not rightly explain the emanation of that person, for from both powers it would be elicited proximately and substantially. Wherefore that person would be better compared to the operation of intellect and of will, in such a way indeed as it would be entirely the same thing in us, that is, if each power produced the same act and operation equally as first; then, just as there would be no real order between intellect and will in operating, so also there would be none between that divine person, insofar as he was Son, and the same, insofar as he was Holy Spirit: because, since by that ratio by which he was Spirit, he would not proceed from the Word produced by the intellect, he would have no real order with Him; but both ratios would converge upon the same person.

Another reason is of this sort: whatever in God does not repugn to be, is necessarily in Him: for nothing can be both present and absent to God; but those things which befit Him, necessarily befit Him: for which reason it is commonly said, in eternal things to be and to be able are the same. But if the Son and the Holy Spirit were not opposed, it would not repugn for both of them to be the same person according to reality: therefore the person of the Son and of the Holy Spirit would be the same: far from their being distinguished.

Caput VII - The reasons of the earlier opinion are resolved; the testimony of Anselm is explained

It remains that we should resolve the arguments adduced in the second chapter by the very testimony of the true position. First among these is the testimony of Anselm, who, if one rightly considers what we said above in cap. 4, seems plainly to have set down that Scotist position - either because he judged it sufficient that the Son and the Holy Spirit be mutually distinguished by two relations and by modes of proceeding even if not opposed, which Scotus calls disparate relations, or at least because he wished to concede this to the Greeks, against whom he was disputing, intending to prove from another line that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son. For in that book of his On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, cap. 2, towards the end, he says to this effect: that the Son and the Holy Spirit have existence from the Father, yet in different ways, the one by being born, the other by proceeding; and that by this difference they are mutually other from one another; wherefore, although by unity of nature it would follow that, if the Spirit proceeds from the Father, He proceeds also from the Son, nevertheless that unity does not have the force to infer an identity of production or mode, because plurality, which arises from nativity and from procession, stands in the way. By these words he asserts that the distinction between the Son and the Holy Spirit is assigned by different modes of proceeding; and he intends to meet the Greeks on their own ground by showing from elsewhere the procession of the Spirit from the Son.

But when these words are pressed for the cause of distinction, namely, that the Son and the Holy Spirit are to be assigned diverse modes of proceeding, if in some other way that cause should not be in place, he is not therefore teaching that disparate relations without the opposition of spiration would suffice to constitute different persons; rather he is arguing ad hominem against the Greeks and speaking in accommodation to their position. Therefore, as we said in cap. 4, one must not force Anselm into those straits, nor make mere disparity suffice for an efficacious argument against our conclusion; on the contrary, unless the Trinity of persons is granted, the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son. Whatever Scotus and others may think, no sufficient argument can be taken from those words of Anselm to the contrary; the Greeks themselves, as he says in the same place, do not concede to be confined to those narrow terms, nor that by mere opposition the distinction of persons can be proved; rather, a sufficient and efficacious argument against them is not taken from there.

To the next argument drawn from the common principle they commonly use, Cajetan and the Ferrariense commentator answer consistently in the places cited above in that chapter, distinguishing in the same way as before: that is, that relation, as relation, both constitutes and distinguishes in God according to its order to another; and that, since it constitutes, it constitutes precisely by its proper formal ratio of terminating toward another, and since it distinguishes, it distinguishes not only from the opposed relation, but also, according to the proper ratio of relation, from the absolute to which it refers. Therefore, it does not follow that, were the Holy Spirit not to proceed from the Son, He would then not be distinguished from Him at all, or that no form of distinction would remain in Him; for, as has been explained, disparity alone without opposition does not suffice to constitute the diversity of supposits in the divine, and unity of nature does not obliterate the proper formalities of the relations by which the persons are constituted and distinguished.[562]

As we said in chapter 4, that opinion is clearly transmitted. The opinion of Scotus seems to have handed it down, either because he thought that the Son and the Holy Spirit are sufficiently mutually discerned by diverse relations (relationes) and by modes of proceeding, even if not opposed - what Scotus called disparate relations - or certainly because he wished to concede this to the Greeks against whom he was disputing, being willing to prove from elsewhere that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son; for he, in that book De Processione Spiritus Sancti, chapter c., toward the end, speaks thus: "The Son, meanwhile, to mention another cause, since it is clear to us that the Holy Spirit is of Him and proceeds, therefore He is not the Holy Spirit, nor is the Holy Spirit the Son; because the Son by being born has existence (esse) of the Father, but the Holy Spirit not by being born, but by proceeding." By these words he asserts that, for the cause of the distinction between the Son and the Holy Spirit, he assigns the different mode of proceeding, in the meantime until another cause is shown, wishing to defer in this to the sentence of the Greeks. But in chapter 3, after the middle, after he has explained the same mode of distinction, he says: "When, however, it will appear that the Holy Spirit is of the Son, then it will also be clear that, for this reason, the Holy Spirit cannot be the Son, and the Son cannot be the Holy Spirit." Yet I for my part judge it much more convenient not to concede this to the Greeks, but rather to force them into such straits that they admit the distinction among the persons can be thought only by opposition: for thus an effective argument is taken against them, that they concede the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, unless they are willing to deny the Trinity of persons. Wherefore the opinion of Scotus and of others weakens the one effective argument that the Latins are wont to have against the Greeks, and makes it of no moment.

Reply to the first argument drawn from the constituting principle. Cajetan and the Ferrariensis, in the places cited in the fourth chapter, answer that by the same principle by which a thing is constituted, by that same it is also distinguished, whenever the constituting principle is not a relation (relatio): for if it be a relation, it only distinguishes from the opposed, as we noted from the mind of these authors above in chapter 5. Yet this solution does not please me: both because in that chapter 5 it was shown that by relation something can be distinguished not only from the opposed relative, but also from other things; and also because, even if what the Ferrariensis and Cajetan teach were true, it does not satisfy Scotus's argument. For Scotus argues thus. Whatever constitutes something in the notion (ratio) of being, and consequently in the notion of the one, and consequently in the notion of what is indistinct from itself and distinct from any other that is not constituted by that same principle: therefore, by that whereby a thing is constituted distinct from any other that is not constituted by that principle, it ought to be distinguished. What, then, does it avail, if we answer Scotus that not every constituting principle of some thing distinguishes it from others unless it be absolute? For if his account prove this universally, it proves thus. Whatever constitutes something in the notion of being, thereby, whatever it be, it also constitutes the same in the notion of the one, and consequently in the notion of what is indistinct from itself and distinct from any other that is not constituted by it: but filiation constitutes the Son in the notion of person (persona); therefore in the notion of the one indistinct from itself and distinct from any other which is not constituted by filiation, such as is the person of the Holy Spirit. The consequence stands under a legitimate syllogistic form; the minor cannot be denied; the major is most true universally of every constituting principle, even a relative one: for if it constitutes in the notion of a relative being, it constitutes in the notion of the one distinct from any other.

562. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 13, q. 2; dist. 33, q. 1; Scotus, In I Sent., dist. 2, part 2, q. 2 (ad ordinem secundi); ad secundam rationem eiusdem quaestionis; Cajetan, ad I, q. 36; Ferrariense, locis citatis.

Another response. Others say that the same should always be the distinguishing and the constituting principle; and that now the Son is distinguished from the Holy Spirit by filiation, because by it He is constituted; but in that case in which the Holy Spirit would not proceed from the Son, He should not be distinguished from Him, because then there would be another filiation: for now He has the power of spirating, which then He would not have. Yet these men, while they seem to have devised something new, fall into a view which they have not proved. For they are forced to say that the constituting and the distinguishing principle are not the same; and that the Son is constituted by filiation, but is distinguished by spiration: which can be easily refuted.

First, for the Son, in the notion of the Son and as person, is constituted by a property which belongs to Him alone; but this is filiation as filiation only, not considered under the notion of spiration or of the spirative power: because the property constituting one person does not include in its formal concept that which is common to another; now the spirative power is common; therefore that formality does not pertain to the notion of the constituting principle.

Second, because if by filiation, insofar as He has the power of spirating, the Son is now distinguished, He ought rather to be distinguished insofar as He has it in act (actus) under the relation of spirator, than under potency (potentia), which is distinguished from act: for this is not in God save in our mode of understanding, distinct from the act of spirating. Therefore, if by reason of that power He is now distinguished, by reason of that He also has opposition, which we contend: but filiation, as it is filiation and as it is the property of the Son, by reason of itself does not have opposition: therefore, since these men wish to depart from the common way, they are compelled to fall back into it, and with the other Thomists to admit that the Son is now distinguished not by filiation but by spiration; and thus that it is not the same principle which constitutes and which distinguishes: therefore the argument must be answered in another way.

Third, because filiation does not of itself formally include the very power of spirating, nor a condition of will so as to constitute it under the notion of the power of spirating, as we shall show in disputation 164, chapter 3: therefore in itself it does not now have a peculiar notion on account of which it would distinguish the Son from the Holy Spirit, which it would not have if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son: wherefore it does not follow that there will be another filiation, as filiation is, if in the Son there were not the power of spirating.

Fourth, because the present question proceeds on the supposition that the same Son, who now is and spirates, would not spirate - as the Greeks suppose - yet He would remain the same Son; namely, whether He would have a sufficient principle by which He would be distinguished from the Holy Spirit, with only the same filiation retained; thus that we may investigate the formal reason of distinction. And that this question is useful from an impossible supposition has already been sufficiently shown in chapter 1.

Therefore I answer that the major proposition is true of every principle that constitutes something in reality: for this constitutes in the notion of a being indistinct from itself and really distinct from any other that is not constituted by that principle. Thus a man by his form is really distinguished from a horse and from others that are not constituted by the same; but by that principle by which a thing is constituted according to reason only, certainly it need not be really distinguished from anything else which is not constituted by it according to reason. And thus we see in one and the same thing two principles, either specifically or even generically diverse, by which either diverse species or diverse genera are constituted: as in the same motion action and passion, and in other cases similarly. In these, however, the specific or generic principle constitutes the genus or the species, but does not really distinguish them from anything else which is not constituted by them: because, since the constitution is only through reason, it suffices if it distinguish only by reason. Wherefore, since the constitution of the Son of God by filiation, just as also of the other persons by their properties, is not a real constitution but only by reason, it is not necessary that by that property by which He is formally constituted He be really distinguished from anything else which is not constituted by it. Further, that the constitution of the divine persons is only by our reason we shall measure in disputation 158, chapter 2, in which the sentence of St. Gregory is proved to us, which we reported in chapter 2 of this disputation.

From this same doctrine it follows that the Son and spiration are substantially distinguished, according to person, from the Holy Spirit, not accidentally: even if spiration, in our mode of understanding, accrue to the person of the Son already constituted. For that it be first conceived by us, with filiation constituted, and in our mode of understanding in the notion of a person substantially complete, does not prevent that spiration be in reality filiation substantially, and that from it there be a substantial distinction according to person; since in reality it is the same, according to a reality wholly individual, with filiation. For this personal distinction is according to reality; and thus it ought to arise from a true real opposition which the Son has with the Holy Spirit by reason of spiration, not from a principle which concurs to the constitution only in our mode of understanding. And from these things reply can be made to the first and the second which in the confirmation of the argument were alleged.

Reply to the third confirmation. We concede that, if the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son alone, nevertheless He would be distinguished from the Father, and the Father from the Son by paternity alone: not because that which constitutes the person according to reason, thereby sufficiently distinguishes from another which is not constituted by that principle; but because the Father, with the Holy Spirit, by reason of paternity would have some opposition, at least remote, which would suffice to make it altogether repugnant that He be the same person with the Holy Spirit. Now the remote opposition would consist in this, and even now it exists, that since the Father, as He is Father, is the principle of the Son, and the Son is the principle of the Holy Spirit, necessarily also the Father must be the remote principle of that same Holy Spirit. For what is the principle of a principle is also the principle of that which arises from that second principle: and it is altogether repugnant to be the same as something which is from a principle, and to be the cause of that very principle; for thus something would be the cause of its own principle. Since, therefore, the Father and the Son are really distinguished from the Holy Spirit by the common spiration by which they are set in opposition to the Holy Spirit, they are nevertheless related in a different way: because the Son differs by spiration alone, but the Father is also distinguished by paternity; that is, the Son, because He only spirates; but the Father, by the very fact that He spirates and generates, is distinguished from the Holy Spirit.

It remains that we dissolve the arguments adduced in the second chapter for the earlier opinion. First among these is the testimony of St. Anselm who, by a single judgment - if they be rightly considered -

And therefore, finally it must be observed, as Ferrariensis warned, that this is a true proposition: "Filiation distinguishes the Son from the Holy Spirit"; because in some way at least it distinguishes by reason, that is, on the part of filiation there is no greater distinction than that of reason, as if the Spirit did not proceed from the Son. Yet this proposition ought not to be conceded: "Filiation distinguishes the Son really from the Holy Spirit."

As to the latter argument taken from the emanations, enough has already been said in chapter 6 of this disputation, namely, that in the case in which the Spirit would not proceed from the Son, there would not be two emanations according to reality, just as neither two relations of the produced, nor two persons: for we showed there that the reason of both is the same. But those who readily concede to Scotus that then there would be two emanations; can scarcely defend that there would not also be two persons, as we noted in that place.

Caput VIII - Corollaries of the preceding doctrine

The distinction between filiation and passive spiration, and whence it arises. Canariensis in this article thinks that they are distinguished by reason of their origin; but since the account of relation and of origin is the same (for this latter is nothing other than relation in becoming, and as it were on the way), and it has been shown that filiation is not distinguished by its own account from procession; it follows that neither can it be distinguished by reason of its origin: otherwise, even if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, by reason of its origin - which would then remain in the same way - it would be distinguished from the same. Wherefore it must be said, from the preceding doctrine, that filiation is distinguished from procession by the opposition only of the relation of spirating conjoined to it, by which alone the Son is distinguished from the Holy Spirit.

For it is impossible that the Son, who spirates the Holy Spirit, not be distinguished from Him; and hence it is necessary that filiation, which is the property of this person in the spirator, be distinguished from procession.

Objicitur. But someone may object: The divine essence also is conjoined to active spiration, and yet it is not really distinguished from the procession which is in the Holy Spirit.

Respondetur. The account is different: for the essence is conjoined as something common to the opposed relations themselves, and therefore with all the things to which it is conjoined it is altogether the same according to reality; but filiation is conjoined to spiration only as something peculiar to that spirating person: and it cannot be understood that there is something peculiar to a person who is opposed to another, which is not distinguished from that other. For if the person is distinguished, that also which is peculiar to him will be distinguished.

Next, it must be examined why St. Thomas said in this article that the relations which are in the Father do not constitute distinct persons, because they are not opposed: for that seems false, as Caietanus says. First, because filiation and procession constitute different persons, namely the Son and the Holy Spirit, and yet they are not opposed relations. Next also, because negation is the cause of negation; affirmation ought to be the cause of affirmation: therefore if those relations which are not opposed do not constitute distinct persons, it follows that by opposed relations there are always constituted different [persons], which is absurd: for spiratio and processio are opposed, and yet spiration constitutes no person.

Caietanus answers well, that St. Thomas uses as equivalent the phrases "to constitute different persons" and "to distinguish them, whence their distinction arises." For he expressly said: "By relations which are not opposed, distinct persons are not constituted" - he did not say, "persons are not constituted," but he adds, "distinct"; as if he were saying, "relations which are not opposed do not distinguish persons." And in this sense it is rightly said that by spiration and procession persons are constituted as distinct, that is, are distinguished. Hence in the same sense no one can say, "Filiation constitutes a different person from the Holy Spirit," because by filiation no person is distinguished from the Holy Spirit. And from this the solution is clear to the objections brought against St. Thomas.

In the same sense St. Thomas said below, question 40, article 2, in these words: "But it must be that the very distinguishing factors constitute distinct things," that is, cause them to be distinct. But when he says in question 33, article 2, that the proper name of each person signifies that by which that person is distinguished from all others, so as to infer that the name "Father" is proper to the first person, he is not speaking of the principle of real distinction, but of a distinction also as it were specific; such is filiation in the Son, although from it there does not result a real distinction.[563]

563. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 40, a. 2; I, q. 33, a. 2.

Disputatio CXLVIII - Whence a real distinction of the divine emanations arises

Outline of the chapters: - Various Scholastic opinions. Cap. I. - The truer opinion: these two emanations are really distinguished only by the opposition which they have by reason of the adjunct. Cap. II.

Caput I - Various Scholastic opinions

The controversy proposed is not about the divine processions active and passive together, by which, namely, account they are distinguished among themselves if the passive be compared to the active: for from the preceding disputation it is clear that they are distinguished in the same way as relations and persons, namely by relative opposition alone. For relation differs from origin in this, that relation is a form as it were in the state of having been made (in facto esse), like paternity; but origin is the very same form in the state of being made (in fieri), as generation: for this is that very paternity, as it were on the way. The question, therefore, is about passive processions taken in comparison with each other. Since it is certain that they really differ, it remains that we explain whence their distinction arises. And although from what has been said in the preceding disputation one could answer without difficulty; nevertheless, because in this matter too various Scholastic opinions have not been lacking, it was necessary to institute a special disputation about it.

Scotus, in the First Book, distinction 13, question 1, recounts several opinions.[564] The first is Aegidius's, in the same distinction, article 2, namely, that origins are distinguished by their termini, just as motions in general are discerned by their termini.[565] This opinion was adopted by Ferrariensis, IV Contra gentiles, chapter 24, near the end;[566] Scotus, however, impugns it by this reasoning: origins do not have their being by termini, but rather the contrary; therefore they are not distinguished by termini, but rather termini by origins. Ferrariensis replies that just as motion has its being by the terminus, because from it it takes its species, so also origin; for the same account seems to hold in both cases. But since now the question is not about specific distinction, but about real; and a motion seems to take its species only from the terminus, that is, it is specified from the order which it has to the terminus: this solution does not satisfy. About the specific distinction of these processions we have already spoken in disputation 113. Whether, however, this opinion of Aegidius, as regards our present purpose, has any probability, will be seen below.

The second opinion is that of Henry in his Summa, article 37, question 7, which Scotus also mentions, namely, that the emanations really differ because their principles differ formally.[567] But since formal distinction is less than real, Scotus rightly infers against Henry that it cannot be the cause of a real distinction between the processions. The same opinion Henry followed in Quodlibet 6, question 1, where he asserts that the emanations are distinguished on account of a distinction of

564. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 1.
565. Aegidius (Giles of Rome), In I Sent., d. 13, a. 2.
566. Ferrariensis (possibly Francesco de Sylvestris), In IV Contra gentiles, c. 24 (near the end).
567. Henry of Ghent, Summa, a. 37, q. 7.

reason between the principles.[568] And although Scotus reports these two opinions as diverse; nevertheless, since Henry nowhere taught that there is a formal distinction from the nature of the thing among the attributes among themselves, or among the principles of the emanations, but only a distinction of reason; the distinction which Henry posits, even if he call it "formal," is not that which Scotus devised as from the nature of the thing and midway between the real and the rational, as we saw in disputation 116, chapter 3. Henry's opinion, understood in this way, can be refuted much more easily. For a distinction of reason, much less than a formal one which is from the nature of the thing, can be the cause of a real distinction among persons. First, because this distinction is far inferior to any distinction from the nature of the thing; next also, because it has an order to the created intellect (since by the divine intellect it cannot be made), as was shown in disputation 118, chapter 2. But no divine procession of a person depends on any creature, even a possible one, as we saw in disputation 143, chapter 34 and the following; therefore that distinction cannot be the cause of distinguishing emanations. Another opinion Scotus reports there from Adam Godamus, in the First Book, distinction 6, question 1, article 2, which in fact comes to the same and must be refuted in the same way.[569]

The opinion of Scotus himself in that place is that the emanations are distinguished by wholes, or by themselves; which is the same thing. He seems to have taken this from St. Bonaventure in the same distinction, question 3; Gabriel follows them, in the single question, article 2, conclusion 3.[570] To be distinguished by wholes, as he himself explains, is this: that they are altogether other and have nothing in which they agree; by which account species constituted under the same genus are not distinguished; but the specific differences of species, as "rational" and "irrational," and the most general differences of the predicaments, are distinguished in this way. Of such a nature Scotus thinks these two origins to be, and that they are by themselves and by their own nature distinct, so that even if the one did not suppose the other, nor were opposed to it in any way even by reason at least of a conjoined relation, nonetheless they would be diverse. For just as he said that relations, by their own nature without any opposition, merely because they are disparate, are mutually distinguished; so he judged that one ought to philosophize about the processions.

Finally, Durandus agrees with this opinion of Scotus, in the First Book, distinction 13, question 2, number 32 and the following, when he asserts that these two processions are distinguished by themselves, not by reason of opposition, but because they are disparate and by their own nature diverse.[571] For although in the First Book, distinction 11, question 2, he teaches that, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, He would not be distinguished from Him according to supposit; nevertheless in the same place he grants that then in the same person there would be two relations really distinct; and in the Father and the Son likewise he grants, in the First Book, distinction 13, question 2, number 14, that, in order that certain things be distinguished in God suppositely, he deems relative opposition necessary, as we saw in the preceding disputation, 568. Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet VI, q. 1.

569. Adam Godamus, In I Sent., d. 6, q. 1, a. 2.
570. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 3; Gabriel, Quaestio unica, a. 2, concl. 3.
571. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2, nn. 32 sqq.; cf. also In I Sent., d. 11, q. 2; and In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2, n. 14.

chapter 4; and he proves this by a like example: because in the Father there are two disparate relations, although there is only one supposit; and he judges it sufficient, in order that two relations be distinguished really, that they be disparate and be referred to diverse [terms]; and at that number 14 and the following he pursues the matter more broadly. Thus, then, about the passive emanations, in the same proportion Durandus philosophizes.

Caput II - The truer opinion: these two emanations are really distinguished only by the opposition which they have by reason of the adjunct

Much truer is the opinion of St. Thomas, in De potentia, question 10, article 4, who philosophizes in the same way about the processions as about the relations: namely, that they can be distinguished only by relative opposition - either because they are directly relative and opposed according to themselves, or because by reason of an adjunct they have this opposition.[572] For every emanation, since it is a relation in becoming (in fieri), is somehow toward another, just as a relation in the state of having been made (in facto esse). Yet, for the sake of explaining this point, it should be noted that these processions can be taken in a twofold way. First, as they are on the part of the thing; and in this way they are distinguished by themselves: that is, there is not in them something, distinct from another by the nature of the thing, in which they agree, and another by which they are distinguished; nonetheless, in reality they are opposed of themselves: for passive generation is altogether the same as spiration, which is really opposed to procession. Then these two emanations can be taken as they are in our intellect; and in this way, because passive generation is distinguished from spiration by our thought, therefore it does not differ totally from procession; but because, by reason of the conjoined relation of spirating, passive generation holds a conjunction with spiration - on account of which spiration is opposed to procession - by this very conjunction passive generation is distinguished from procession. And therefore the Spirit's emanation would not be another personal emanation than the Son's emanation.

... and he proves it by a like case: because in the Father there are two disparate relations (relationes), although there is only one supposit (suppositum). And in order that two relations be really distinct, he thinks it sufficient that they be disparate and referred to diverse [terms], as he pursues more at length in that number 14 and the following. Therefore, by the same proportion Durandus philosophizes about passive emanations (emanationes), namely that they are really distinguished of themselves solely by the fact that they are spirated; yet he says that this distinction would not be sufficient for them to be processions (processiones), or emanations of persons (personae), that is, of diverse supposits, unless by reason of the adjunct they were opposed. For in his view, as we were just saying, if the Holy Spirit did not proceed from the Son, he would not be distinguished from him according to supposit; nevertheless, there would then be in the same person two really distinct relations, as he likewise concedes them in the Father and in the Son in that same place; but, in order that some things be distinguished in God according to supposit, he judges opposition of relation necessary, as we saw in the preceding disputation.[573]

572. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 10, a. 4.

Cajetan rejects this doctrine in the place cited above; he adds that in Summa I, q. 27, a. 4 the emanations are not distinguished totally by themselves, that is, by themselves taken as wholes, because they agree in a certain common notion of immateriality; they are, however, distinguished by singular opposition. This, however, is not proved: for they do not agree in any univocal, precise concept, as we shall say in disputation 158, chapter 7; and the notion of immateriality is included within the singular ratio of each: therefore they are distinguished as the predicaments are distinguished as wholes. For although the predicaments include the common notion of being; nevertheless that notion is analogical, and is included among intrinsic modes; it does not prevent the most general from being distinguished as wholes. It is true, on the other hand, that these emanations are not distinguished as wholes in another respect, as we saw above: because the one has opposition by reason of the adjunct, not by reason of itself.

From what has been said it follows that these processions are distinguished by an order of prior and posterior according to origin (origo), because the one supposes the other. For since passive generation is terminated at the person begotten, and this, in the order of origin, is prior to the person proceeding, as we shall say in disputation 167, by the same reasoning the origin of the Son is in its own order prior to the origin of the Holy Spirit. Wherefore the very true thing is that which St. Thomas taught in that question De potentia, article 2, to the seventh: namely, that the emanations are distinguished because the one is from one [supposit], and the other from two; whence it follows that that which is from two is posterior in its order, because it supposes the person proceeding by the prior emanation, so as thus to proceed from two.[574]

But Scotus attacks St. Thomas with this reason, triflingly: If this were true, it would follow that there could be a third emanation, which would be from three, and a fourth, which would be from four persons. But Scotus's argument is frivolous: for the holy Doctor does not from that prove that there are only two emanations in God because the one is from one, and the other from two supposits; rather he had deduced the number of emanations in the Prima Pars, question 27, article 5, from the number of operations, which are only two - one through the intellect, the other through the will - and more, specifically distinct, cannot exist in a rational nature. But why one person cannot proceed as another, at least by an operation and production numerically distinct from the prior, he proves there.[575]

Articulus III - Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son

It is proceeded thus to the third. It seems that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Father through the Son.

1. For what proceeds from someone through someone does not proceed immediately from him. If therefore the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, he does not proceed from the Father immediately. Which seems unsuitable.

573. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2, nn. 14, 32 sqq.; cf. also d. 11, q. 2; and d. 13, q. 2, n. 14.
574. St. Thomas, De potentia, q. 10, a. 2, ad 7.
575. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 27, a. 5.

2. Further, if the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son, he does not proceed from the Son except on account of the Father. But that on account of which a thing is, is the greater. Therefore he proceeds more from the Father than from the Son.
3. Further, the Son has existence (esse) by generation; if therefore the Holy Spirit is from the Father through the Son, it follows that first the Son is generated, and afterwards the Holy Spirit proceeds. And thus the procession of the Holy Spirit is not eternal: which is heretical.
4. Further, when someone is said to act through someone, the converse can be said. For as we say that the king acts through the bailiff, so it can be said that the bailiff acts through the king. But in no way do we say that the Son breathes the Holy Spirit through the Father: therefore in no way can it be said that the Father breathes the Holy Spirit through the Son.

But on the contrary: Hilary says in the book On the Trinity: "Keep, I beg, the religion of my faith, that I may always hold fast the Father, namely thee, and adore thy Son together with thee, and may I merit thy Holy Spirit, who is through the Only-begotten."[576]

I answer: It must be said that in all the expressions in which it is said that someone acts through someone, this preposition "through" (per) designates some causal cause, or principle, of that act. But since action is a mean between the agent and the thing done, sometimes that causal [term] to which this preposition "through" is adjoined is the cause of the action, according as it goes forth from the agent; and then it is a cause of the agent that it act, whether it be a final cause, or a formal, or an efficient, or a motive [cause]. Final indeed, as when we say that the artisan works through desire of gain. Formal indeed, as when we say that he works through his art. Motive indeed, as when we say that he works through the command of another. Sometimes, however, the causal term to which this preposition "through" is adjoined is the cause of the action according as it is terminated to the thing done: as when we say that the artisan works through the hammer. For it is not signified that the hammer is a cause for the artisan that he act, but that it is a cause for the artifact that it proceed from the artisan, and that it has this very thing from the artisan. And this is what some say, that this preposition "through" sometimes notes authority in the direct [case], as when it is said, "The king acts through the bailiff." Sometimes, however, in the oblique [case], as when it is said, "The bailiff acts through the king." Therefore, since the Son has from the Father that the Holy Spirit proceeds from him, it can be said that the Father, through the Son, breathes the Holy Spirit, or that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son: which is the same.

Reply to the first: In any action two things are to be considered, namely the supposit (suppositum) acting, and the virtue (virtus) by which it acts, as fire heats by heat. If therefore in the Father and the Son the virtue by which they breathe the Holy Spirit be considered, no medium falls there: because this virtue is one and the same. But if the spirating persons themselves be considered, since the Holy Spirit commonly proceeds from the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit is found to proceed immediately from the Father, inasmuch as he is from him, and mediately inasmuch as he is from the Son. And thus he is said to proceed from the Father through the Son. So too Abel proceeded immediately from Adam, inasmuch as Adam was his father, and mediately, inasmuch as Eve was his mother, who proceeded from Adam. Although this example of material procession seems inept for signifying the immaterial procession of the divine persons.

576. Hilary, De Trinitate, in the book cited.

Reply to the second: If the Son were to receive from the Father another virtue numerically distinct for spirating the Holy Spirit, it would follow that he existed as a second and instrumental cause: and thus the Holy Spirit would proceed more from the Father than from the Son. But one and the same numerically spiring virtue is in the Father and the Son: and therefore he proceeds equally from both. Although at times he is said, according to the aforesaid relation, to proceed principally or properly from the Father, because the Son has this virtue from the Father.

Reply to the third: Just as the generation of the Son is coeternal with the generator (for the Father was not before he begot the Son), so also the procession of the Holy Spirit is coeternal with its principle. Hence the Son was not first begotten before the Holy Spirit proceeded, but both are eternal.

Reply to the fourth: When someone is said to act through something, the conversion is not always admitted. For we do not say that the hammer acts through the craftsman; we do say, however, that the bailiff acts through the king. Because it belongs to the bailiff to act, since he is master of his act; but it does not belong to the hammer to act, but only to be acted upon: wherefore it is not designated except as an instrument.

Moreover, the bailiff is said to act through the king, although this preposition "through" denotes a medium: because the more prior the supposit is in acting, the more immediate its virtue is to the effect; for the virtue of the first cause joins the second cause to its effect. whence also first principles are called immediate in demonstrative sciences. Thus therefore, inasmuch as the bailiff is a mean according to the order of acting supposits, the king is said to act through the bailiff; but according to the order of virtue the bailiff is said to act through the king: because the virtue of the king brings it about that the action of the bailiff attains its effect. Now no order is attended between the Father and the Son as to virtue, but only as to supposits: and therefore it is said that the Father breathes through the Son, and not conversely.

Notations around the article.

The conclusion is affirmative, and sufficiently known from what precedes. But what the Greek Fathers thought, and why certain particular expressions [of theirs occurred], I shall say in disputation 146, chapter 6; for as to this doctrine of the present article, scarcely a few things remain to be noted.

First, concerning the reply to the second, it must be seen whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father principally (principaliter), or more principally (principalitius), than from the Son. St. Thomas in that reply, St. Bonaventure in I Sent., distinction 12, chapter 2, Durandus in question 2, Scotus in question 2, Gabriel in question 3, and Marsilius in I, question 1, article 2, conclusion 2, and the following, teach that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both equally perfectly, and in the same way, if the procession be referred to the virtue of spirating - that is, on the part of the virtue, the Holy Spirit proceeds equally perfectly from both, because one and the same altogether is [that virtue] in both; if, however, it be compared with its producing supposit, he does not proceed in the same way; and in this respect they are not of the same character, because the Father, having the virtue of spirating from himself, spirates from himself; but the Son [spirates] from the Father, from whom he has that virtue communicated. And for this reason Bonaventure and Marsilius concede that the Holy Spirit proceeds more principally (principalius) from the Father; indeed Bonaventure adds that the Spirit proceeds from the Son principally (principaliter), but from the Father more principally (principalitius). From which it is plain that "principally" (principaliter) and "more principally" (principalitius) are not used for the same thing. In the same manner of speaking Durandus uses that comparative adverb.

Better, however, St. Thomas and Gabriel grant only that [the Spirit] proceeds principally (principaliter) from the Father; but they do not use the comparative adverb. Augustine uses the same mode of speaking, De Trinitate, book 15, chapter 16, because the Father both has that virtue, and the Son has it from the Father. Jerome also uses almost the same manner of speaking in Epistle 88, where he says that the Holy Spirit properly proceeds from the Father - "properly," he says, because he breathes by his own proper virtue, that is, from himself; but the Son [breathes] by a virtue communicated from another: which manner of speaking St. Thomas also approves in that reply. The comparative adverb, however, is not free from suspicion, for it seems to signify the name of a more perfect principle; and therefore it is better to abstain from it. Scotus also reports the opinion of a certain theologian who reproved Bonaventure because he used the comparative adverb between the Father and the Son, whereas to the Son the position of that [adverb], namely to spirate more principally, does not belong - if the comparison ought rightly to be made between those things that participate the same form.[577]

Next, note that there is no order of origin between the Father and the Son in the act of spirating - that is, neither spirates before the other. Thus Scotus, Marsilius, and Gabriel in the places cited concede simply; nevertheless, if it be taught that, once both have the virtue of spirating, each in like manner spirates, no such order will obtain between these persons in the act of spirating. From this it is gathered that wherever there is an order of origin between some things, there ought to be a priority; but this [priority] is not in the act of spirating, but in having the virtue of spirating: for although it is the same in both, nevertheless it is prior by origin in the one than in the other; yet, when each has it, they spirate together: for that the Father spirates by a virtue from himself, while the Son [spirates] by a virtue from another, denotes only the order of origin in having the virtue, not in spirating. For the very spiration, which is an origin, establishes the order of cause and caused between the spirating [persons] and the Spirit; nonetheless, it is from both equally according to virtue.

Whence in demonstrative sciences the principles are called "immediate." Thus the Bailiff is a middle according to the order of acting supposits (supposita), and so it is said that the King acts through the Bailiff; but according to the order of powers it is said that the Bailiff acts through the 577. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 12, c. 2; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2; Scotus, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 2; Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 13, q. 3; Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 1, a. 2, c. 2; St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 16; St. Jerome, Ep. 88.

King, because the King's power causes the Bailiff's action to attain its effect. Now among the Father and the Son no order is attended as to power, but only as to the supposits; and therefore it is said that the Father spirates through the Son, and not conversely.

Notes concerning the article.

The conclusion is, from the preceding, sufficiently clear. But what the Greek Fathers felt, and why some rather used the particle "through" than the particle "from" or "of," was treated in Disputation 146, cap. 6. Now, a few points remain to be noted concerning the doctrine of this article.

And first, concerning the solution of the second, it must be seen whether the Holy Spirit is said to proceed from the Father principally (principaliter), or more principally (principalius), than from the Son. St. Thomas in that solution, St. Bonaventure in I Sent., dist. 12, q. 2, Durandus, q. 2, Scotus, q. 2, Gabriel, q. 3, and Marsilius in I, q. 15, art. 2, conclusion 2, and in the following, teach that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both equally perfectly and in the same way, if the procession is referred to the power of spirating; that is, on the part of the power, the Holy Spirit proceeds equally perfectly from both, because one and the very same power is entirely in both. If, however, it be compared with the producing supposits, he does not proceed in the same way and (as they speak) uniformly, because the Father, having the power of spirating from himself, spirates from himself; but the Son [spirates] from the Father, from whom he has that power communicated. And for this reason it is said that the Father spirates through the Son, and not conversely.

One says, moreover, that the Bailiff acts through the King: although this preposition "through" signifies a medium. For the more prior a power is in acting, the more immediate it is to the effect; the power of the first cause joins the second to its effect. Whence principles are called immediate in demonstrative sciences. Thus the Bailiff is a middle according to the order of acting supposits; therefore the King is said to act through the Bailiff. But according to the order of powers the Bailiff is said to act through the King: because the power of the King causes that the action of the Bailiff attain its effect. Now order is not attended between the Father and the Son as to power, but only as to the supposits: and therefore it is said that the Father spirates through the Son, and not conversely.

Bonaventure and Marsilius, however, grant in that solution that the Holy Spirit proceeds more principally from the Father; indeed Bonaventure adds that the Spirit proceeds principally from the Son, but more principally from the Father. From which it is clear that "principally" and "more principally" are not used for the same thing. Durandus uses in the same way of speaking that comparative adverb.

Yet better do St. Thomas and Gabriel grant only that [the Spirit] proceeds principally from the Father; but they do not use the comparative adverb. In the same way of speaking St. Augustine uses, De Trinitate XV, c. 16, "according as the Father has that power from himself, but the Son has it from the Father."[1] To the same point looks the way of speaking of St. Jerome, in Epistle 88, where he says that the Holy Spirit properly proceeds from the Father; he says "properly," because he spirates by his own power, that is, from himself; but the Son [spirates] by a power communicated by another; this manner of speaking St. Thomas also proves in that solution.[2] The comparative adverb, however, is not without suspicion: for it seems to signify a greater perfection of principle; and therefore it is better to abstain from it. Scotus also reports the opinion of a certain Theologian, who blamed Bonaventure for using the comparative adverb between the Father and "the other," since to the Son there would not befit the positive of that [comparison], namely "to spirate principally," that is, from himself: but comparison ought to be made between things that share the same form.[3]

Then note that there is no order of origin between the Father and the Son in the act of spirating; that is, the one does not spirate before the other. Thus Scotus, Marsilius, and Gabriel in the places cited above simply grant; although they also seem to teach that in a certain way this order could be granted in spirating. Therefore that there is no such order between those persons in the act of spirating is gathered from this: because in that wherein there is an order of origin between certain [things], there ought to be priority; but this is not in the act of spirating, but in having the spirative power: for although it is the same in both, nevertheless it is prior in origin in the one than in the other; yet, once each has it, they spirate together. But to spirate from oneself, or to spirate from another, since it only denotes having the power of spirating from oneself or from another, only signifies the order of origin in having the power, not in spirating: for the spiration itself, which is an origin, constitutes the order between the spirating [person] and the spirated [Spirit]; yet nothing prevents it from being from both by the same power equally.

[1]: St. Augustine, De Trinitate XV, c. 16. [2]: St. Thomas, in the solution to the article cited. [3]: Scotus, reporting an unnamed theologian's censure of St. Bonaventure.

Articulus IV - Whether the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit

Objicitur 1. It seems that the Father and the Son are not one principle of the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit does not seem to proceed from the Father and the Son inasmuch as they are one: neither in nature, because then the Holy Spirit would in like manner proceed from himself, since he is one with them in nature; nor inasmuch as they are one in some property: because one property cannot be of two supposits, as it seems. Therefore the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as they are several. Therefore the Father and the Son are not one principle of the Holy Spirit.

Objicitur 2. Further, when it is said "the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit," unity of person cannot be designated there: for thus the Father and the Son would be one person. Nor even unity of property: because if on account of one property the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, by like reasoning on account of two properties the Father would seem to be two principles of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Which is unfitting. Therefore the Father and the Son are not one principle of the Holy Spirit.

Objicitur 3. Further, the Son does not agree more with the Father than does the Holy Spirit: but the Holy Spirit and the Father are not one principle with respect to any divine person. Therefore neither are the Father and the Son.

Objicitur 4. Further, if the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, they are either one which is the Father, or one which is not the Father. But neither can be given: because if one which is the Father, it follows that the Son is Father; if one which is not the Father, it follows that the Father is not Father. Therefore it must not be said that the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit.

Objicitur 5. Further, if the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, it seems conversely it should be said that one principle of the Holy Spirit is the Father and the Son. But this seems false. For when I say "principle," it must suppose either for the person of the Father, or for the person of the Son; and in either way it is false. Therefore this also is false: "the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit."[4]

Objicitur 6. Further, one in substance makes "the same." If, therefore, the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, it follows that they are the same principle: but this many deny. Therefore it must not be conceded that the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit.

Objicitur 7. Further, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, because they are one principle of the creature, are said to be one creator; but the Father and the Son are not one spirator, but two spirators, as many say. This also agrees with the words of St. Hilary, who says in I De Trinitate that the Holy Spirit must be confessed to be from the Father and the Son as authors. Therefore the Father and the Son are not one principle of the Holy Spirit.[5]

But on the contrary: St. Augustine says in De Trinitate, V, c. 14, that the Father and the Son are not two principles, but one principle of the Holy Spirit.[6]

I answer: The Father and the Son are in all things one, in which the opposition of relation does not distinguish them. Whence, since in this, to be the principle of the Holy Spirit, they are not relatively opposed, it follows that the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit. Some, however, say that this is improper: "the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit." Because when this name "principle," taken singularly, does not signify a person, but a property, they say that it is taken adjectively; and because an adjective is not determined by an adjective, it cannot be fittingly said that the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, unless "one" be understood as placed adverbially, so that the sense be, "They are one principle," that is, "in one way." But by a like reason it could be said, "The Father [is] two principles of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," that is, "in two ways."

Therefore it must be said that although this name "principle" signifies a property, nevertheless it signifies it in the mode of a substantive; as this name "Father" and "Son" also [do] in created things. Hence it takes number from the form signified, as do other substantives. Therefore, just as the Father and the Son are one God on account of the unity of the form signified by this name "God," so they are one principle of the Holy Spirit on account of the unity of the property signified in this name "principle."

Reply to the first: It must be said that if the spirative power be attended to, the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son inasmuch as they are one in the spirative power, which in a certain way signifies the nature together with the property, as will be said below. Nor is it incongruous that one property be in two supposits, since there is one nature. But if the supposition of the spiration be considered, thus the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as they are several. For he proceeds from them as from one principle according to that in which they agree, although they are several supposits.

Reply to the second: When it is said "the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit," one property is designated, which, as a form, is signified by the name. Nor does it therefore follow that, on account of two properties, the Father could be said to be two principles of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; for that would imply a plurality of supposits.

Reply to the third: As to the relations or properties, no likeness or unlikeness is attended to in the divine; but as to the essence. Whence neither is the Son more like the Father than is the Holy Spirit.

Reply to the fourth: These two, namely "the Father and the Son are one principle which is the Father," or "one principle which is not the Father," are not contradictorily opposed. Wherefore it is not necessary to grant either of them. For when we say "the Father and the Son are one principle," this which I call "principle" does not have a determinate supposition, but a confused one, for two persons together. Wherefore in the process there is a fallacy of figure of speech, from confused supposition to determinate.

Reply to the fifth: It must be said that this also is true: "One principle of the Holy Spirit is the Father and the Son"; because this which I call "principle" does not suppose for one person only, but indistinctly for two, as was said.

Reply to the sixth: It must be said that it can fittingly be said that the Father and the Son are the same principle, inasmuch as "the same principle" supposes confusedly and indistinctly for two persons together.

Reply to the seventh: It must be said that although it is said that the Father and the Son, although they are one principle of the Holy Spirit, are nevertheless two spirators on account of the distinction of supposits - just as also two spirating [persons], because acts are referred to supposits - yet the same reason does not hold of this name "creator": for the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from two distinct persons (as was said), but a creature does not proceed from the three persons as they are distinct persons, but as they are one in essence. But it seems better to say that, since "spirans" is an adjective, whereas "spirator" is a substantive, we can say that the Father and the Son are two spirating [persons] on account of the plurality of supposits, but not two spirators on account of the one spiration. For adjectival names have number according to the supposits, but substantives according to the form signified.

[4]: The objection is supported by clustered references in the margin: 1. lib. 19, ar. 4; IV Contra, cap. 25; Opusc. 1, cap. 11 (fine); Opusc. 9, q. 6; and John, 8, lib. 3, com. 3; c. t. 15, lect., etc. [5]: St. Hilary, De Trinitate I; and V, at the end of the book. [6]: St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 14.

to the first it must be said that, if the spirative power is attended to, the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son inasmuch as they are one in the spirative power, which in a certain way signifies the nature together with the property, as will be said below. Nor is it unfitting that one property be in two supposits (supposita) whose nature is one. But if the supposits of the spiration be considered, thus the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as they are more than one; for He proceeds from them as the unitive love of two.

To the second it must be said that, when it is said, "The Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit," one property is designated, which is the form (forma) signified by the name. Yet it does not follow that on account of several properties the Father could be called several principles; for there would be implied a plurality of supposits.

To the third it must be said that, as regards relative properties, likeness or unlikeness is not attended to in the divine, but as regards the essence (essentia). Hence, just as the Father is not more like Himself than He is like the Son, so neither is the Son more like the Father than the Holy Spirit.

To the fourth it must be said that these two, namely, "The Father and the Son are one principle which is the Father," and, "one principle which is not the Father," are not contradictorily opposed. Hence it is not necessary to grant one or the other of them. For when we say, "the Father and the Son are one principle," this word I call "principle" does not have determinate supposition; rather, it supposes confusedly for the two persons together. Hence in the sequence there is the fallacy of the figure of speech, from confused supposition to determinate.

To the fifth it must be said that this assertion is true, "The one principle of the Holy Spirit is the Father and the Son"; because this word I call "principle" does not suppose for one person only, but indistinctly for the two, as has been said.

To the sixth it must be said that it can suitably be said that the Father and the Son are the same principle, inasmuch as "principle" supposes confusedly and indistinctly for the two persons together.

To the seventh it must be said that some say that the Father and the Son, although they are one principle of the Holy Spirit, are nevertheless two spirators on account of the distinction of supposits, just as also two spirating [persons], because acts are referred to supposits. Nor is there the same reason about the name "creator"; for the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as they are two distinct persons (as has been said), whereas a creature does not proceed from the three persons as they are distinct persons, but as they are one in essence. But it seems better to say that, since "spirating" is an adjective, whereas "spirator" is a substantive, we can say that the Father and the Son are two spirating [persons] on account of the plurality of supposits, but not two spirators on account of the one spiration. For adjectival names have number according to the supposits, but substantives from themselves according to the form signified.

As to what St. Hilary says, that the Holy Spirit is "from the Father and the Son as authors," it must be explained that the substantive is put for the adjective.

Conclusion is affirmative.

Disputatio CXLIX - Whether the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit

An Pater et Filius sint unum principium Spiritus sancti. Disputatio. 149.

Status Quaestionis.

Caput I - Status quaestionis

Scotus in the first book, distinction 12, question 1, according to the question; and Durandus in the first book, distinction 24, questions 2 and 3; and "Gab." in the first book, distinction 12, question 1, in the beginning, think that there can be a question both about the thing and about the word: about the thing indeed, whether in the Father and the Son there is one power of spirating; in which sense there is no disagreement among Catholics. For all confess that the power is one; nor was there ever a heretic who would assert that there are two. But whether, the one power existing in the Father and the Son, one ought to say two principles, or one, they thought there was a controversy about the word, as the aforesaid Scholastics put it; whom the Canariensis censures upon this article in the second part of his commentary, and rashly imputes to them that they said this question is one of name, as if it were of less moment. For since the Council of Florence, in the last session in the letters of union, and that of Lyons, as is reported in the chapter "Fideles" de summa Trinitate et fide Catholica in VI, define that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle, this is not a matter of small weight, nor to be held of little account.[578]

But it is not true that the Canariensis imputes to those authors so harshly; for they did not think that the question was unfruitful and of no moment, but only that among Catholics there is disagreement about the denomination and manner of speaking; which, however, in the thing itself is indeed arduous and difficult, and it very much matters that we do not, by inordinate words, establish error; since, however, in the thing itself there is no controversy, as has been noted. And indeed in the cited Councils there was handed down a definition not only of the manner of speaking, but also of the very thing against the Greeks. For when the Greeks were urging against the Latins that the Holy Spirit proceeds from two unbegotten principles and by a twofold power spirating, if He were to proceed from each, as clearly appears from the Council of Florence, the Councils define that He proceeds from each as from one principle, so as to show that what the Greeks were urging against us does not follow. It remains for us now to dispute about the word, whether the Father and the Son can be said to be two, or rather only one, principle of the Holy Spirit.

578. Council of Florence, session ultima, in the letters of union; Council of Lyons, as reported in c. Fideles de summa Trinitate et fide Catholica in VI.

Caput II - Durandus and Gregory hold that the Father and the Son cannot be called one principle of the Holy Spirit

Durandus in the first book, distinction 29, question 2, and Gregory in distinction 12, question 1, teach that the Father and the Son cannot be said to be one principle of the Holy Spirit. Gregory proves this by the following reason. Either "principle" is taken for the form of acting, or for the agent itself; for in both ways the term is customarily used. For both the power of generating is called a principle, and father and mother are called principles of offspring. In neither way, however, can the Father and the Son be said to be one principle. For if it be taken for the power or common notion, it is rather to be said that in the Father and the Son there is one principle, in which respect the Father and the Son are one principle. But if it be used for the supposit, since the Father and the Son are two supposits, they cannot be called one principle; for thus the sense would be, "The Father and the Son are one person." Durandus adds that, since more frequently the name "principle" denotes the supposit than the power itself, it is rather to be said two principles than one. He answers moreover the Councils of Lyons and Florence, that they took pains expressly to say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle, not absolutely, "from one principle," but with the addition of the particle "as," so as to denote that the Father and the Son ought not so much to be said one principle, as to have themselves "as it were" one principle. Just as when two causes concur to one and the same effect, and do not more perfectly produce it than one alone would produce it, they are said to have themselves after the manner of one principle; and to this agrees Antihodoren, book 1 of the Summa, chapter 30, where he teaches that the Father and the Son are a single principle in the way in which the Holy Spirit is called manifold, that is, by reason of the effect; thus, therefore, the Father and the Son will be said to be one principle by effect, that is, on account of the one person who proceeds from them.[579]

When, however, some approve a manner of speaking from St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, chapter 13, in that place Augustine is not truly speaking about the procession of the Holy Spirit, as in the argument it is adduced, but as it is related he merely says in these words: "When we say, the Father [is] a principle and the Son [is] a principle, we do not say two principles of a creature: because one God together is one principle of a creature; as one creator, and one God." From these, nevertheless, we can rightly argue against Gregory and Durandus in this way. If the Father and the Son are said to be one principle of creatures, because by reason of one power they concur to their production: why then will they not be said one principle of the Holy Spirit, if by the same common spirating power they spirate? St. Augustine, in the same book, chapter 14, expressly teaches this, a place which St. Thomas cites in the argument, But on the contrary.[580]

579. Antihodoren, lib. 1, Summae, cap. 30.
580. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 13; and c. 14; cited by St. Thomas in the argument, Sed contra.

Caput III - The sentence of Durandus and Gregory is rightly censured as rash by the Canariensis and more recent theologians

The sentence of Durandus and Gregory is rightly censured as rash by the Canariensis and by more recent theologians in this article, even if it consists only in a manner of speaking; nor is it permitted, even by inordinate words, to lessen the gravity of the matter. For example, if someone were to assert that there are three Gods, yet would explain that he does not assert three deities, but three supposits having deity, nevertheless in the manner of speaking he would deserve the mark of error. Therefore with good reason the note of rashness is branded upon the aforesaid opinion, because it uses a manner of speaking which the Councils reject. For that the Councils add the particle "as" (tanquam) makes no difference: for that is not a note of mere similarity, but shows the very truth of the thing; just as the particle "as if" (quasi) in John 1, "glory as of the Only-begotten from the Father," shows the truth of the thing.[581] For the Councils wished to meet the Greeks, who falsely imposed upon the Latins that they asserted that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from two principles; therefore the Councils had to show not only that which is in the thing, but also to hand down the true manner of speaking, which could in no way be censured by the Greeks. It would be of little account if the Councils showed that the Holy Spirit is spirated by the Father and the Son "as by one principle," if they merely wished to say that He has a likeness and manner of one principle; since nevertheless properly they could be called two principles. Therefore it must be said that the Father and the Son not only have one common power, which is the principle of spirating, but also that they are not two principles. Rather, they truly and properly are said to be one, not many, principles of the Holy Spirit; and this is the truer sentence.

Concerning the solution of the earlier argument of their sentence, which was taken from the supposition of the name, the remaining theologians vary, whose opinions we shall briefly pursue, that at length we may hand down what seems to us.

Capreolus, in the first book, distinction 12, question 1, after the solution of all the arguments, replies that the name "principle" supposes confusedly for the two persons of the Father and the Son; and that this confused supposition comes from that particle "as," just as the Logicians say in this proposition, "At Paris and at Rome pepper is sold," the name "pepper" supposes confusedly by reason of that same particle "and." Capreolus is agreed with by Cajetan, except that Capreolus admits this confused supposition in the term placed both on the side of the subject and on the side of the predicate; whereas Cajetan admits it only on the side of the predicate, as in the aforesaid proposition. That supposition admitted, they rightly teach that one cannot make ascent or descent in that term (as the Logicians say), that is, one cannot assign some singular, by reason of which the proposition be rendered true. Therefore, when we say, "The Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit," the term "principle" is taken confusedly, so that if under it we were to assign either the Father or the Son, it would plainly be the sophism which passes from confused to determinate supposition.[582]

581. John 1:14, "glory as of the Only-begotten from the Father."
582. Capreolus, In I Sent., dist. 12, q. 1; Cajetan, ad loc. Durandus, In I Sent., dist. 29, q. 2; Gregory, dist. 12, q. 1.

quod they call a figure of speech, when, namely, no individual or singular is rightly assigned under some common term. They seem, however, to have taken their opinion from St. Thomas in the sixth reply, where he says that the name "principle" is taken with confused supposition.

This opinion is not approved by the Canariensis, because the particle "as if" never has such force of affecting the term as to make it have confused supposition; and he thinks that the name "principle" is taken with determinate, not confused, supposition. With the Canariensis other theologians also agree, as we shall see below. For my part, although I do not doubt that sometimes the particle has that force, to make the term have confused supposition, nevertheless I am well assured that the name "principle" is taken with determinate supposition in the aforesaid proposition. For since in God there is only one principle, nor can several be assigned under it, it cannot happen that there be confused supposition. Nor indeed can the Father and the Son be assigned under it as singulars of it, although, as will be explained below, they are connotated by that name; which does not hinder the term from having determinate supposition, as will be explained below. By the same reasoning it is proved that the term "principle" is not taken collectively for the Father and the Son (as some have falsely thought, whose view is falsely attributed to Marsilius in the First, question 1, article 3): for this name is not collective, like "people," but signifies one simple form.[583]

How, moreover, the term "principle" is taken with determinate supposition is variously explained by the theologians. Gabriel, in I, dist. 2, q. 1, art. 2, and art. 3, dub. 1, although he follows the opinion of Gregory, if we keep the propriety of speech, nevertheless, replying to the argument made above, says that the name "principle" is taken in a different way when we say that the three persons are the principle of creatures than when we say that two are the principle of the Holy Spirit. For in the former way, "principle" is taken for the divine essence; wherefore to say "the three persons are one principle of creatures" is the same as to say "the three persons are one essence"; but in the latter way, "principle" is taken for what is constituted out of the essence and the notion of spiration. Hence in that same place, art. 3, dub. 4, he gathers that in the divine there are four things constituted - yet not really distinct: because, besides the three persons, there would be also the spirator, or the principle of spiration, constituted in the manner that we have said. For this opinion Gabriel cites Ockham.[584]

But Gregory sharply attacks this opinion: first, because nothing is constituted in God unless there be a distinction in God between that which constitutes and that which is constituted; and also, because it would follow that there are four persons in God. Yet these reasons little hinder the opinion of Gabriel from being probable: for by the same account the opinion of Scotus and Cajetan would be improbable, who posit an individual of the Godhead, concrete, and constituted by a certain common subsistence; but that opinion is not judged improbable, inasmuch as it asserts that there is a common concrete, constituted prior to the understanding of the three persons, namely the individual of the Godhead. Nor indeed is it lawful to infer that there are four persons; because 583. Marsilius, In I, q. 1, a. 3.

584. Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 2, q. 1, a. 2; and a. 3, dub. 1; and art. 3, dub. 4, where he follows Gregory; and he cites Ockham for the view about a fourfold "constituted" in the divine.

the persons in God ought to be really distinct and to be incommunicable; but that individual is not really distinct from the three persons, nor is it incommunicable. Nor again must what constitutes and what is constituted be really distinguished in order that we say that there is something constituted in God. For constitution in the divine is through intellect, in the way in which the persons are constituted, as will be explained below in disputation 158, chapter 1. In the same way, concerning the principle of spiration, or the concrete "spirator," in Gabriel's opinion one may with equal probability philosophize; about which we shall speak in disputation 156, chapter 3. The Canariensis, in his commentary on this article, part 3, teaches that the name "principle" is taken with determinate supposition for the power of spiration signified in the concrete, determinate in which, as the Logicians say, just as in this proposition "man runs" the term "man" is taken. He also adds that under that term "principle" some singular can be assigned: for the Father and the Son are this principle.[585] Yet I for my part think that the name "principle" is not there taken with determinate supposition, as the term "man" is taken in this proposition "man runs," but personally, as the term "God" in this, "the Father and the Son are one God." For when we say "the Father and the Son are one principle of spiration," it is the same as if we were to say "they are this one principle of spiration": because the principle of spiration, like "spirator," is only one. But it must be observed that in the same way one must philosophize about this concrete name "spirator" or "principle," if it be taken concretely, as about the term "God," so that it directly signify the nature itself, or the power of spiration, but connote, vaguely, the supposits having such a power - this or that - just as about the term "God" we shall say in disputation 158, chapter 2, that which must be asserted in the same way about all concrete substantives. Whence it comes about that their multiplication is taken from the form, because that is the direct signification, and not from the supposits, which are only connoted: and therefore in the concrete we ought to say, "the Father and the Son are one principle and one spirator of the Holy Spirit," by the very same reason by which we say, "they are one God." But of this more fully in the place cited.

Furthermore, since the power of spiration even when signified in the abstract does not only signify the essence - as must be said about the power of generation in disputation 164 - but in a certain way is determined by a relation, the opinion of Gabriel can also be in part true, namely, that the principle of spiration is constituted by a relation: provided we understand this of the principle itself even in the abstract, in the same way as will be explained below.

Quaeritur: Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, as from two spirators, by the force of his procession. Disputatio 150.

Two Scholastic opinions

The knot of the present controversy is not whether there are several principles; nor whether the Father and the Son are to be called several spirators; nor, finally, whether one may say "several spirating" adjectively: this will be made manifest from those things which we shall say in disputation 155, chapter 8.[586] But it is whether the power of spiration is so in two supposits, and by its nature so requires, that the procession of the Holy Spirit, inasmuch as it is rational according to its characteristic property, demands two supposits on the part of the principle; which are compared to the production otherwise than the power of creating is in the three supposits: for in these the plurality by its own nature is so necessary, that their plurality does not enter per se in the fourth mode, on the part, namely, of their production, as passions are joined to the essence and the essence to the passions; and yet they are not conjoined in the fourth mode, which is when the effect is predicated per se of the cause and of the principle, or conversely. And this manner of understanding the question is disputed among the Scholastics: for no one doubts that the principle of spiration ought necessarily to be in two supposits, not per accidens but per se, and joined to them by the highest necessity; but whether they be required per se in the fourth mode on the part of the principle by reason of such procession of the Holy Spirit by reason of such love, they do not feel the same way.

585. Melchior Cano (the Canariensis), Commentary on this article, part 3.

Let the first opinion among the Scholastics be that of Scotus in I, dist. 11, q. 1. He asserts two things: one is that the Holy Spirit, by the force of his procession and by his characteristic property, requires, on the part of the principle, two supposits spirating; wherefore he would in the same way proceed if the principle of spiration were in one supposit, as he now proceeds when it is in two: just as the principle of creating, inasmuch as it is the principle of creating, does not of itself require to be in three.

He proves the first point thus. Whenever the principle of some operation and production equally perfect is in one supposit as in two, it does not of itself require more supposits per se in the fourth mode, inasmuch as it is compared with the operation and the effect: but the will of God to spirate would be thus perfect in one supposit as in two, since it would be divine; therefore in one supposit it would sufficiently spirate and in the same way as it now spirates, just as, if omnipotence were in one supposit only and were divine, it would in exactly the same way create. Then he thus proves the second: nothing is added to the power of spiration by a plurality of supposits; therefore in vain are more supposits required per se for spirating, unless something were added; but that would be the ratio of mutual love; now one perfection cannot be added to a power from a supposit, since rather the supposit has it from the power; but the ratio of mutual love does not of itself concur to the production of the Holy Spirit: for it is a relation only in the product, which can confer nothing of power upon the power of spiration, nor does it of itself require something real in the principle of spiration; therefore, substantially and according to the characteristic propriety, the Holy Spirit would proceed in the same way as he does now, if there were in one supposit the power of spiration.

Another point that Scotus teaches is that nonetheless the power of spiration is not in proximate potency to spirate so long as it is in two supposits: not because the principle of spiration, inasmuch as it is the principle of love, requires two supposits per se; but because whenever in an agent there are two active principles ordered among themselves, the posterior is not in proximate potency to act until the prior acts: such are the powers of generating and of spirating, as intellect and will. For the will, since it is posterior in operation, is not yet in proximate potency to act until the intellect acts; and since in God by the intellect the other supposit proceeds, we first understand the power of spiration in two than that it spirates, by reason of the order which this posterior power has with the prior. Wherefore (says Scotus) if by the divine intellect no person proceeded, but by the will the other supposit were produced, the will would be in proximate potency to spirate until the intellect understood; but now it would not be first in the two supposits before it were in proximate potency for acting, since the plurality of supposits is not required on the part of the principle of spiration as such; but for this reason, that the posterior person is not yet in proximate potency until the prior acts; and now the prior supposit in God is produced.

586. See disputation 155, chapter 8.

Gabriel in I, dist. 12, q. 2, art. 2 seems to follow the same opinion as regards the mode of speaking; yet in article 1, notation 2, he seems to follow Scotus's opinion about the thing itself: for he affirms that the Holy Spirit would proceed in the same way even if the power of spiration were in one supposit only.

But, before I set forth the true opinion, I wish in passing to note against Durandus what I said in disputation 111, chapter 2: namely, that he asserts falsely that the procession of the Holy Spirit in reality is proximate by nature by the will, but by the will only in name and appropriation; as in that place it has been sufficiently proved. And if Durandus, with the rest of the Scholastics, were to grant that the Holy Spirit in reality proceeds by the will, he would also, without doubt, teach with St. Thomas that, according to its mode and characteristic propriety, he proceeds from two in such a way that per se in the fourth mode he requires two spirating supposits. It remains, therefore, that we show this against Scotus in the following chapter.

Secunda sententia is that of Durandus in I, dist. 11, q. 3, who, when the opinion of Scotus and of St. Thomas (which we shall report in the next chapter) has been rehearsed, has himself devised a middle position. He says, first, if we speak of spiration according to its formal notion, it is indeed from the Father and the Son as having the power of spiration, not as from two spirators, nor yet as from one spirator, but only inasmuch as they have the power of spiration, whether that be one or many; whether it reside in one or in many supposits. Secondly, he teaches that if the discourse be of the intrinsic mode which spiration has, inasmuch as it is one simple procession, the Holy Spirit proceeds from two: not as they have the power of spiration, but as they have one power which is equally perfect in each, and therefore more supposits are not required per se on the part of the principle. Thirdly, he says that if the question proceeds about the mode which spiration has from its order to certain extrinsic things - which mode is more in the word than in the thing itself, because the act of spiration is attributed to the will by a certain likeness, whereas in reality it does not proceed from it - then for this reason it per se requires to be from two supposits: and thus he judges the opinion of Scotus to be true if we speak of the thing itself, and the opinion of St. Thomas likewise to be true, if the discourse be of the mode of speaking, inasmuch as the procession is commonly attributed to the will.

The truer opinion: that the Holy Spirit per se, in the fourth mode, requires two supposits on the part of the principle

A far more probable opinion is this: that the Holy Spirit per se in the fourth mode proceeds from two having the same power of spiration, so that if that power were in one only, the Holy Spirit, according to the same characteristic propriety, would not proceed. Wherefore it is not only necessary that the spirating power be in two supposits in order to be in proximate potency for acting, as Scotus conceded; but also that, on the part of such a principle, several supposits are required per se in the fourth mode. This is the opinion of St. Thomas in this article 4, in the first reply; and in the First, dist. 11, art. 2, in the body, and art. 4, reply to the second; whom Cajetan, the Canariensis, and the more recent Thomists follow in this matter.[587]

Capreolus in this article, Capreolus in the First Book, distinction 12, question 1, conclusion 4; in the same sense inclines Marsilius in the First, question 15, article 3; Henry too favors it, in his Summa, article 34, when he asserts that the principle of spiration is the will concordant of two who mutually love one another; for plurality belongs to the notion of mutual love; and therefore the Holy Spirit, according to the characteristic property of his procession, is called the mutual love. Henry, however, differs from this position in that he asserts that the principle of spiration is the will concordant in the second act of willing and loving; for this author, as we saw in disputation 12, chapter 1, thinks that the notional acts, by which the divine persons proceed, arise from the essential acts as from a principle - something which Scotus, in the passage cited a little above, sharply refutes; and we ourselves have more fully impugned it in that disputation.[588]

But Scotus wrongly charges Henry with a contradiction, because he said that the Holy Spirit must be distinguished from the Son even if he were not produced by him. With this, Scotus does not seem to be consistent when he later says, namely, that the Holy Spirit proceeds per se from two: for thus he could not proceed from one alone. Yet the rebuttal is trifling. For Henry does not assert that the Holy Spirit can in fact proceed from one supposit (suppositum) alone; nor does he assert that he would have the same characteristic property which he now has, if he proceeded from one alone. Rather, on the supposition that he proceeded from one alone, and truly were a divine person - whether of the same characteristic property which he now has or of a different one - he must nonetheless be distinguished from the Son.

Let us come to the proof of our position. We can confirm it first of all from Richard of St. Victor, On the Trinity, book 3, chapters 3, 7, and 11, where he teaches that love cannot be perfect and delightful unless it be at least of two. And in chapter 16 he says that nothing is defined contrary to nature if the fullness of wisdom is said to be in one person only: for in one person the fullness of the wise could exist; but the fullness of love by its own nature requires several supposits in order to be perfect; for the perfection of love consists in this, that it be mutual. Therefore, since the Holy 587. St. Thomas, I, q. 36, a. 4, ad 1; and In I Sent., d. 11, a. 2, in corp., and a. 4, ad 2; with Cajetan, the Canariensis, and recent Thomists ad loc.

588. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 12, q. 1, concl. 4; Marsilius, In I, q. 15, a. 3; Henry of Ghent, Summa, a. 34. On Scotus's refutation of Henry's doctrine of notional acts arising from essential ones, see the place cited above; cf. also our disputation 12, cap. 1.

Spirit proceeds as perfect love, it follows that he also proceeds as mutual love - which assuredly he would not have, if he went forth from one person only. From this doctrine a reason is drawn for this position. For since the Holy Spirit proceeds as the bond (nexus) of the Father and the Son, and as their reciprocal love, his procession is as a bond from two who love one another; and while it is not altogether the same thing to proceed from two and to proceed as a bond, nevertheless to proceed from two who love one another is to proceed as a bond. But when we say that he therefore proceeds from two because he proceeds as a bond, we do not signify an efficient cause, but a final one; that is, to the end that the Spirit proceed as a bond - which is his characteristic property - he proceeds from two. Whence it comes about that certain Thomists wrongly concede to Scotus that in the same way the Holy Spirit would proceed, if the divine will, which is the principle of spiration (spiratio), were in one person only. For in that case the same principle would not remain; therefore the Spirit proceeding thence would not be of the same characteristic property; whether that person would then produce another Holy Spirit, we do not inquire. Yet if it were fecund, it would indeed produce a Holy Spirit, but - as has been proved - that Spirit would not be of the same property as the one who now proceeds.[589]

It is further gathered that those who concede that the power of spiration therefore requires several supposits, because, since it is a notional operation of the will, the procession of the Spirit necessarily presupposes also the procession of the Word, which is a notional intellection, do not well explain the opinion of St. Thomas which they are striving to defend; indeed, they plainly fall back into the position explained by Scotus. For in this way that power would require per se, in the fourth mode, to be in two supposits only by reason of the order which the emanations have; and hence, if we were to suppose the impossible, that by the operation of the intellect no person were produced, but yet by the will one were, the Holy Spirit would proceed in the same way as he now proceeds; and therefore he would not require several supposits per se in the fourth mode on the part of the principle; for when that which is required in that mode is removed, the effect is removed.

A reply to Scotus's arguments

To Scotus's first reason some Thomists reply along with the Ferrariensis, in IV Contra gentes, chapter 25, toward the end, that from the fact the power of spiration is equally perfect in two supposits it does not follow that the Holy Spirit proceeds by his own nature from one only; rather, he proceeds necessarily from two, since in two the power is perfect in the same way. But this solution does not dissolve Scotus's argument. For he does not contend that the Holy Spirit does not in fact proceed from two; nor does he deny that he necessarily proceeds from two, just as he does not deny that creatures produced by three persons are necessarily produced, since omnipotence is necessarily in the three. Rather, he contends that a plurality of supposits is not required per se in the fourth mode on the part of the principle, although it be necessarily conjoined with the principle; because each supposit contributes nothing peculiar to the power of spiration. And this follows most cogently, if we concede to Scotus that the power of spiration would be equally perfect, and would be disposed in the same way, in one as in two supposits; for thus, if on that supposition it be understood to remain in one only in the same way, it would spirate also in the same way; just as, because omnipotence is equally and in the same way in one as in all the persons, if one person only remained, it would create in the same way.

589. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, III, cc. 3, 7, 11, and 16; cf. also the Ferrariensis on St. Thomas, In IV Contra Gentiles, c. 25 (sub fine).

The true solution. I answer, therefore, that the power of spiration would not be equally and in the same way in one as it is in two supposits, not because it is not whole in each one, but because it does not have every condition required for producing such a bond and the Holy Spirit in each single case; rather, it requires both together in order that, as a condition by reason of mutual love, the Holy Spirit may proceed in the characteristic property which he has. Wherefore there is a difference between the omnipotence of creating and the power of spiration, namely, that the omnipotence of creating is in the three, and a creature necessarily proceeds from the three, not however as they are three, but as they agree in one power; but the power of spiration is necessarily in two, in such wise that the Holy Spirit proceeds from two, precisely as they are two. And hence, on this second ground, we can without difficulty meet that same reason of Scotus.

We say, then, that the power of spiration, which is the divine will, requires, as a necessary condition for spirating the bond, the modification which we understand it to have from the personal properties of the Father and the Son, not because something of power and virtue accrues from them, but because those are the conditions necessary for spirating the bond; and these conditions are real. We grant also that the relation of mutual love is indeed of reason; nevertheless it has necessarily a foundation in reality: for a relation of reason does not arise from the intellect's consideration alone without any real foundation. Such, therefore, must the Holy Spirit be by the force of his procession in the thing itself, that in him a relation of mutual love can be conceived, and by it the characteristic property of that procession be explained by us; but he would not have this unless in reality the principle of spiration were in two; therefore that property requires this by its own nature and by the force of its procession, which is mutual love.

Moreover, two things must be observed. The first is, that when we say that mutual love is the procession of the Holy Spirit, we do not understand a double love from one person to another, but the same most simple love, which, since it truly is from two and they love one another, has the true notion of mutual love and dilection.

The second is, that when we say that the properties of two persons are the conditions required for the power of spiration, by conditions we do not understand something required in order that the will be the power of spiration and the principle by which. For, as we shall say in disputation 164, chapter 3, the power of spiration is whole in the Father, and whole in the Son, and accordingly in each of them it has the entire modification necessary, so that it be a power; but we say that the properties of the two persons are conditions not for the power itself of spiration, but for producing the bond as such; and, if we were to speak, so to say, of the person produced, it is for this reason that a person of such a property can be produced; for were we to say so, by reason of that property of the bond, the whole power which is common to both supposits is conferred upon that person, so that by it as by something common to both supposits he be produced. For if it is as dilection, which is love from both, by reason of that it necessarily be produced from two.

Quaestio XXXVII - On the name of the Holy Spirit, which is Love

And then it is asked concerning the name "love"; and about this two things are asked.

Articulus I - Whether "Love" is the proper name of the Holy Spirit

Objicitur. First, it seems that love is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit. For St. Augustine says in De Trinitate XV: I know not why, just as wisdom is said both of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and nevertheless all together are not three but one wisdom, so also charity is not said both of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and all together one charity.[590] But no name which is predicated singularly of each of the persons and of all in common is the proper name of any one person. Therefore this name "love" is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit.

1. Further, the Holy Spirit is a subsisting person; but love is not signified as a subsisting person, but as a certain action passing from the lover into the beloved. Therefore love is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit.
2. Further, love is the nexus of lovers, because according to Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus IV, it is a certain unitive power;[591] but a nexus is a mean between the things which it connects, not something proceeding from them. Since therefore the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (as has been shown), it seems that He is not the love or nexus of the Father and the Son.
3. Further, of any lover there is some love; but the Holy Spirit is a lover; therefore there is some love of Him. If therefore the Holy Spirit is love, He will be love of love, and spirit from spirit, which is unfitting.

But on the contrary: St. Gregory says in a homily on Pentecost in the Homilies on the Gospels: He Himself, the Holy Spirit, is love.[592]

I answer: The name "love" in the divine realities can be taken essentially and personally. And insofar as it is taken personally, it is the proper name of the Holy Spirit, just as "word" is the proper name of the Son. For the understanding of which, one must know that, since in the divine realities, as has often been said, there are two processions, one according to the mode of intellect, which is the procession of the word, the other according to the mode of will, which is the procession of love, and since the former is more known to us, there have been invented for it more proper names to 590. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV.

591. Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, IV.
592. St. Gregory the Great, Homiliae in Evangelia, homily for Pentecost.

signify singly the things which can be considered in it, but not so in the procession of the will. Hence also by certain circumlocutions we are wont to signify the person proceeding; and the relations which are received according to this procession are named by the names of procession and spiration, as was said above; which nevertheless are names more of origin than of relation according to the property of the word. And yet one must consider in like manner according to each procession.

For just as from the fact that someone understands some thing there proceeds in the understanding person a certain intellectual conception of the thing understood, which is called "word," so from the fact that someone loves some thing there proceeds (so to speak) a certain impression of the thing loved in the lover's affection, according to which the thing loved is said to be in the lover, as likewise the thing understood is in the understanding person; and thus when someone understands and loves himself, he is in himself not only by identity of reality, but also as the understood is in the understanding person, and as the loved in the lover.

But on the side of the intellect there have been invented words to signify the respect of the understanding person to the thing understood, as is clear in this, that I say "to understand." And there are also other words invented to signify the process of the intellectual conception itself, namely "to say of oneself" and "word." Hence in God "to understand" is said only essentially, because it does not import the relation of the principle of the word to the very word proceeding; but "word" is said personally, because it signifies that which proceeds. But "to say" itself is said notionally, because it imports the relation of the principle of the word to the word itself.

On the side, however, of the will, besides "to love" and "to have dilection," which import the relation of the lover to the thing loved, there are not words imposed which import the relation of the very impression or affection of the thing loved which comes to be in the lover from the fact that he loves his principle or conversely. And therefore, because of the lack of words, we signify such relations by the terms "love" and "dilection," as if we were to name the word "conceived intelligence" or "begotten understanding." Thus therefore, insofar as in "love" or "dilection" there is imported nothing but the relation of the lover to the thing loved, "love" and "to have dilection" are said essentially, just as "intelligence" and "to understand." But insofar as we use these words to express the relation of that thing which proceeds according to the mode of love to its principle and conversely - so that by "love" is understood the love proceeding, and by "to have dilection" is understood to be spirated the love proceeding - "love" is the name of a person, and "to have dilection" or "to love" is a notional verb, as "to say" or "to beget."

Reply to the first: Augustine speaks of charity according as it is taken essentially in the divine realities, as has been said.[593]

Reply to the second: Although "to understand" and "to will" and "to love" are signified according to the mode of actions that pass over into objects, nevertheless they are actions remaining in the agents (as was said above), yet in the agent itself they import a certain relation to the object. Hence love also in us is something remaining in the lover, and the "word of the heart" remains in the one speaking, yet with a relation to the thing expressed by the word or to the thing loved. But in God, in whom there is nothing accidental, it has more: for both the word and the love are subsisting. Therefore it is said that the Holy Spirit is the love of the Father into the Son, or into anything else; not that something transitive into another is signified, but only the relation of love to the thing loved, just as also in "word" there is imported the relation of the word to the thing expressed by the word.

593. Cf. the corpus of this article.

Reply to the third: The Holy Spirit is said to be the nexus of the Father and the Son, insofar as He is love. For since the Father loves by one dilection Himself and the Son, and conversely, there is imported in the Holy Spirit (insofar as He is love) the relation of the Father to the Son, and conversely, as of a lover to the loved. But from the very fact that the Father and the Son love one another mutually, it must be that the mutual love, which is the Holy Spirit, proceeds from both. Therefore, according to origin, the Holy Spirit is not a mean, but the third person in the Trinity; but according to the aforesaid relation He is the mean nexus of the two, proceeding from both.

Reply to the fourth: Although the Son understands, nevertheless it does not befit Him to produce the word, because "to understand" befits Him as the word proceeding; so too, although the Holy Spirit loves, taken essentially, nevertheless it does not befit Him to spirate love, which is "to have dilection" taken notionally; because thus He loves essentially as the love proceeding, not as that from which love proceeds.

Notations concerning the article.

Conclusion: If "love" be taken notionally, so as to signify the relation of the one proceeding according to the mode of love, then "love" is the proper name of the Holy Spirit. This conclusion is taken from St. Augustine, De Trinitate XIV, c. 17, where he asserts that the love proceeding, which is God, is the Holy Spirit; and he proves it from 1 John 4: "God is charity... let us love one another, because dilection is from God; everyone who loves is born of God and knows God; he who does not love does not know God, because God is charity." In which place John says two things, both that dilection is of God, and that dilection is from God Himself: therefore it follows that God is the love proceeding, which is no other than the Holy Spirit.[594] But this passage is explained by the Council of Mileve, c. 4, of created dilection, that when John says "dilection is from God," from this he proves that the dilection by which we confess God is His gift. Nevertheless, God Himself is called charity, that is - as John said - in order to commend to us the gift of charity, which is called by the same name as God Himself, and by which we are made most like to God.[595]

Others endeavor to deduce the same from that passage to the Colossians 1: "He translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His dilection," because they think that by the name "dilection" the Holy Spirit is signified. But (as Augustine most aptly noted, De Trinitate XV, c. 19, toward the end) "dilection" there cannot be taken for the notional love which is the Holy Spirit; otherwise the Son would be called the Holy Spirit, since He is called "the Son of dilection," which is absurd.

594. 1 John 4:7 - 8.
595. Council of Mileve, c. 4 (on created dilection).

Wherefore, he says, "dilection" there is to be used for essential love, and "Son of dilection" to be said, that is, "beloved"; for the Hebrews do not have adjectives, and therefore they use substantives in the genitive case, in which manner they say "son of perdition," that is, "a perished man."[596]

Moreover, first it must be noted that the opinion of Durandus is false, who in I, dist. 32, q. 1, n. 8, affirms that the name "love" is never taken notionally in God, except according to appropriation - not as common names are wont to be appropriated to each of the persons - but because he thinks that the procession of the Holy Spirit is not through the will, save only by a certain likeness, as we have seen; and by the same reasoning he taught that the name "word" is not the proper name of the second person, but is only in that way appropriated, as we have reported.[597] For he thought that the Son did not proceed through the intellect, but that His procession is merely similar to an operation of the intellect; whereas however we have shown that to be false in the disputation there cited.

Next, note that Aureolus labored to no purpose (as Capreolus reports, In I Sent., dist. 32, on the arguments against the fifth conclusion), when he wished to prove that there are in God two loves, one essential and the other notional; for (as Cajetan says on this article) essential and notional love are the same from the nature of the thing, whereas the notional adds only, over and above the essential, the relation of production - which, in general, is the case with terms that in God are taken both essentially and notionally.[598]

...But this is truly so of all essential acts and notional acts when compared with one another, as was shown in Disputation 113.

Articulus II - Whether the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit

Objicitur. It seems that the Father and the Son do not love themselves with the Holy Spirit.

1. For St. Augustine in book 7 On the Trinity proves that the Father is not wise by a begotten wisdom.[599] But just as the Son is begotten wisdom, so the Holy Spirit is proceeding love, as was said. Therefore the Father and the Son do not love themselves by the proceeding love which is the Holy Spirit.
2. Further, when it is said, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit," the verb "to love" is taken either essentially (essentialiter) or notionally (notionaliter). But it cannot be true if it is taken essentially; for by equal reason one could say that the Father understands by the Son. Nor can it be true if it is taken notionally; for by equal reason one could say that the Father and the Son breathe by the Holy Spirit, or that the Father generates by the Son. Therefore in no way is this true: "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit."
3. Further, by the same love the Father loves the Son, and himself, and us. But the Father does not love himself with the Holy Spirit; for no notional act is reflected back upon its own principle of the act. For it cannot be said that the Father generates himself or breathes

596. Colossians 1:13; St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 19.
597. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, n. 8; cf. Vazquez, Disputatio 11, cap. 1; and on "word," Disputatio 41, cap. 2.

himself. Therefore neither can it be said that he loves himself with the Holy Spirit, inasmuch as "to love" is taken notionally. Likewise, the love by which he loves us does not seem to be the Holy Spirit; because a respect toward the creature is imported, and thus it pertains to the essence (essentia). Therefore this statement also is false: "The Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit."

But on the contrary: Augustine says in book 6 On the Trinity that the Holy Spirit is that by which the Begotten is loved by the Begetter, and loves his Begetter.[600]

Respondetur: I answer that a difficulty arises concerning this question from the fact that when it is said, "The Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit," since the ablative is construed in the relation of some cause, it seems that the Holy Spirit is the principle of loving both for the Father and for the Son; which is altogether impossible. And therefore some have said that this proposition is false: "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit." And they say that this has been retracted by Augustine in his book of Retractations, namely, that he retracted "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom." Others say that it is an improper proposition, and thus is to be explained as, "The Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit," that is, by essential love which is appropriated to the Holy Spirit. Others said that this ablative is construed in the relation of sign, so that the sense is: the Holy Spirit is the sign that the Father loves the Son, inasmuch as the Holy Spirit proceeds from them as love. Others said that this ablative is construed in the relation of formal cause, because the Holy Spirit is the love by which formally the Father and the Son love one another. Others said that it is construed in the relation of formal effect. These last approached nearer to the truth. Hence, for clearing up this point, it must be known that, since things are commonly denominated from their forms - just as "white" from whiteness, and "man" from humanity - everything from which another is denominated, with respect to this, has the relation (relatio) of form. Thus, if I say, "This man is clothed with a garment," the ablative is construed in the relation of formal cause, although it is not a form. Yet it also happens that something is denominated from that which proceeds from it, not only as an agent by its action, but also by the very terminus of the action, which is the effect, inasmuch as the effect includes in a way the form of the action in intellectual operations. We say, for example, that what generates is "heating" by "heating," although the heating is not the heat which is the intrinsic form of fire, but an action proceeding from the fire. And we say further that a tree is "flowering" by its flowers, although the flowers are not the form of the tree, but certain effects proceeding from the tree itself. According to this, therefore, it must be said that, since in the divine realities "to love" is taken in a twofold way - essentially, namely, and notionally - according as it is taken essentially, thus the Father and the Son do not love themselves with the Holy Spirit, but with their essence (essentia). Whence Augustine says in book 15 On the Trinity: "Who would dare to say that neither the Father, nor himself, nor the Son, nor the Holy Spirit loves, except by the Holy Spirit?" And according to this

598. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32; Cajetan, on Summa theologiae I, q. 37, a. 1.

599. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII (on "the Father is not wise by begotten wisdom").

600. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VI (to the effect that the Holy Spirit is that by which the Begotten is loved by the Begetter, and loves his Begetter).

the first opinions proceed. But according as it is taken notionally, thus "to love" is nothing other than to spirate by love, just as "to say" is to produce the word, and "to flower" is to produce flowers. Therefore, just as it is said that a tree flowers "by its flowers," so it is said that the Father says "by the Word," or "by the Son," himself and the creature. And the Father and the Son are said to love "with the Holy Spirit," that is, with the proceeding love, both themselves and us.

Reply to the first: To be wise or understanding in the divine realities is not taken except essentially. Therefore it cannot be said that the Father is wise or understanding by the Son. But "to love" is taken not only essentially but also notionally. And according to this we can say that the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, as has been said.

Reply to the second: When, in the intellection of some action, a determinate effect is imported, the principle of the action can be denominated both from the action and from the effect; as we can say that a tree is "flowering" by "flowering" and by "flowers." But when a determinate effect is not included in the action, then the principle of the action cannot be denominated by the effect but only by the action. For we do not say that a tree produces a flower "by the flower," but "by the production of the flower." In this, therefore, when I say "he breathes" or "he generates," only the notional act is imported. Hence we cannot say that the Father breathes with the Holy Spirit, or generates by the Son. We can, however, say that the Father "says" by the Word as by the person (persona) proceeding, and "says" by "diction" as by the notional act; because "to say" imports a determinate person proceeding, since to say is to produce the word. And similarly "to love," as it is taken notionally, is to produce love. And therefore it can be said that the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit as with the person proceeding, and with love itself as with the notional act.

Reply to the third: The Father loves not only the Son but also himself and us with the Holy Spirit; because, as "to love" is taken notionally, it imports not only the production of a divine person, but also the person produced by the mode of love, which has a relation to the thing loved. Hence, just as the Father "says" himself and every creature by the Word which he begot, insofar as the begotten Word sufficiently represents the Father and every creature, so he loves himself and every creature with the Holy Spirit, insofar as the Holy Spirit proceeds as love of the highest goodness, according to which the Father loves himself and every creature. And thus also a respect toward the creature is imported both in the Word and in the proceeding love, as it were secondarily, inasmuch as divine goodness and truth is the principle of understanding and loving every creature.

Why it can be said, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit." Disputation 151. - Various Scholastic opinions. Caput 1. - The more probable position, in the judgment of St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, and the Thomists, is explained. Caput 2. - The true reason for the aforesaid position. Caput 3. - Certain objections are solved. Caput 4. - In what sense it can be said that the Holy Spirit loves himself by himself. Caput 5. - Whether it can rightly be said, "The Father is wise," or "the Father is wise by begotten wisdom." Caput 6. - Why it cannot be said, "The Son is wise by begotten wisdom or by unbegotten wisdom." Caput 7.

Caput I - Various Scholastic opinions

We set forth in this controversy the proposition, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit," as one that can somehow be said. For thus speaks Augustine, book 6 On the Trinity, chapter 5, whose words we reported in the preceding disputation, chapter 3.[601] St. Jerome also, on Psalm 17, says: "The Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the love which the Father has for the Son, and the Son for the Father."[602] St. Bernard, in the book On the Love of God: "I love you," he says, "lovable Lord, since from the Father and the Son proceeds the Holy Spirit, the love of the Father for the Son and of the Son for the Father, and so great is the love that it is unity."[603] Hugh of St. Victor, in a letter to Bernard, writes thus: "If you rightly say that you love by the love which proceeds from you, why are not the Father and the Son said to love by the love which proceeds from them? And again: If the Holy Spirit were the love of your heart, and of the Father, and of the Son, who, I ask, could deny that by the Holy Spirit, that is, by your love, you would love yourself?"[604]

Wherefore now the controversy among the Scholastics that remains is only this: by what reason that proposition can truly be pronounced. In this chapter, in the customary manner, I shall enumerate various opinions of our theologians which do not approve themselves to me, so that thereafter, in what follows, we may confirm that which will seem truer.

The first opinion is that of Gotfred of Poitiers, as reported by St. Bonaventure, Scotus, and Capreolus, asserting that, in the proper sense, the proposition is false, and that Augustine retracted it in a similar case. For since in book 83 of the Questions, question 23, he had said, "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom," later, in the book of Retractations, chapter 26, and in book 6 On the Trinity, chapter 1, and in book 7, chapter 3, and in book 15, chapter 7, he retracted that. But to this seems similar the statement, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit." Certain more recent writers adhere to Gotfred, among whom is the Canarian in this article; for he confesses that he altogether does not know how to defend Augustine's proposition in its proper sense.[605]

Scotus refutes Gotfred's opinion excellently in the first book, distinction 32, question 2, first article, both because Augustine nowhere expressly retracted this proposition - and he would have retracted it, as he did many others, if he had judged it false - and because it is altogether different from that, "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom," as we shall see below in chapter 6. Therefore neither does it seem to have been retracted by Augustine. There is added that, since other Augustinians also, such as Bernard and Hugh, have pronounced this proposition, it is not credible that Augustine retracted it. How, moreover, it is true in the proper sense will appear clearly below; from which Gotfred's position will also be confuted.[606]

601. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VI, c. 5 (cited previously).
602. St. Jerome, In Psalmum 17.
603. St. Bernard, De amore Dei.
604. Hugh of St. Victor, Epistola ad Bernardum.
605. Melchior Cano (Canariensis), on this article.
606. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).

The second opinion is of those who assert that the proposition is true, provided that "the Holy Spirit" is taken for essential love, which is wont to be appropriated to the Holy Spirit. This is attributed to Alexander of Hales, who rather, in the first part, question 47, member 2 at the end, and member 3, article 3, where he makes some mention of this matter, seems to grant the proposition in its proper sense, with "the Holy Spirit" taken for the third person. Yet Durandus plainly taught that view in the first book, distinction 32, question 1; but, whoever be its author, Scotus rightly attacks it in the place cited, and Capreolus in the First Book, distinction 32, question 1, article 1, first conclusion. St. Bonaventure also, in that place, article 1, question 1. For if by the same reason the proposition were true, by the same token this also could be granted: "The Father and the Son are good by the Holy Spirit," if indeed they are good by essential goodness which is wont to be appropriated to the Holy Spirit.[607][608][606][609][610]

The third opinion is that of Simon of Tournai, whom Scotus cites in the place alleged, St. Bonaventure in that first article, question 3, and Capreolus in that first question, article 2: he granted that proposition only in this sense, "The Holy Spirit is the sign of the mutual love of the Father and the Son." But they impugn this opinion, because by the same reasoning one could say, "The Father and the Son love the creature," since at least a rational creature can be a sign of this mutual love; and it can also be refuted at least by reason, because that sense is very improper and alien to the letter: for thus it would be permitted to say, "Fire burns by smoke," because it is a sign of heating.[611]

The more probable position, in the judgment of St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, and the Thomists, is explained. Caput 2.

Quocirca nunc solum superest controversia inter Scholasticos, qua ratione vere dicta propositio pronunciari possit. In hoc autem capite, more solito, varias Theologorum nostrorum sententias, quae mihi non probantur, enumerabo, ut deinde in sequentibus eam, quae verior videbitur, confirmem.

Prima sententia est Gotfredi Pictaviensis, quem referunt Bonaventura, Scotus et Capreolus, asserentis, in proprio sensu falsam esse propositionem, eamque in simili retractasse Augustinum. Nam cum in libro 83 Quaestionum, quaestione 23, dixisset: Pater esse sapientem sapientia genita, postea in libro Retractationum cap. 26, et in De Trinitate lib. 1 cap. 1 et 2, lib. 7 cap. 3, et lib. 15 cap. 7, id retractavit; huic autem videtur similis illa: Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto. Gotfredo nonnulli recentiores adhaerent, inter quos est Canariensis in hunc articulum; fatetur enim, se prorsus nescire eam propositionem Augustini in proprio sensu defendere.[612][613][614][615][616]

607. Alexander of Hales, Summa, prima pars, q. 47, memb. 2 (in fine), et memb. 3, art. 3.
608. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1.
606. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).
609. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 1, concl. 1.
610. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 1, q. 1 (and q. 3).
611. Simon of Tournai, as reported by Scotus, St. Bonaventure, and Capreolus in the places cited.
612. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).
613. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 1, concl. 1.
614. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 1, q. 1 (and q. 3).
615. Melchior Cano (Canariensis), on this article.

Gotfredi opinionem refellit optime Scotus; neque enim St. Augustine illam praedictam propositionem realiter retractavit, ut suo loco, capite 6, videbimus; atque adeo qui huic sentient, frustra nituntur.[612] Tertia sententia est eorum, qui volunt propositionem hanc, si quidem concedatur, concedendam esse tantum sensu aliquo remoto aut improprio, prout Spiritus Sanctus accipitur pro amore essentiali, qui Spiritui Sancto solet appropriari; ita Alexander, Durandus aliique, quorum mentionem faciemus mox; quam sententiam tamen non probamus, quia si tantum ratione appropriationis concederetur, sequeretur: Pater et Filius sunt boni de amore suo, cum tamen bonitate essentiali sint boni, quae Spiritui sancto nonnisi appropriatione tribuitur. Alii vero, ut Simon Tornacensis, referunt Spiritum Sanctum non esse ipsam mutuam Patris et Filii dilectionem, sed eius tantummodo signum; quae opinio, quia ad significationem creaturae manifestae cedit, facile refellitur: non enim recte diceremus, ignis comburit fumo, quia fumus est signum combustionis.[617618619]

Caput II - The proper mode of speaking: that the Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit

Communis et verior sententia est eorum, qui affirmant hanc propositionem secundum proprietatem sermonis veram esse, si Spiritus Sanctus accipiatur pro tertia persona Trinitatis, dilectio vero seu amor pro actu voluntatis notionali, quo Spiritus Sanctus procedit. Ea tradit Sanctus Doctor in hoc articulo; secum eo Caietanus et recentiores multi Thomistae, Bonaventura in I, d. 32, art. 1, q. 1 et 2; Scotus q. 2; Capreolus q. 1, art. 1, conclusione 5 et sequentibus; Gabriel q. 2, art. 2, conclusione 1; et Marsilius in I, quaestione 14, art. 4, annotatione 3, conclusione 1 et 2; tametsi hic auctor, quaestione 35, art. 1, opinionem, quam tertio loco retulimus, non leviter insinuet.[614612613]

Verum non omnes eodem modo hanc sententiam probant: Sanctus Thomas, Caietanus et Capreolus dicunt, hanc denominationem esse veluti in ratione effectus formalis; nam agens interdum a suo effectu et termino actionis denominatur, veluti a forma. Id autem magis adhuc explicat Sanctus Thomas, in corpore, et in solutione 2, cuius explicationem Caietanus et recentiores Thomistae sequuntur, hoc modo. Quoties ad conceptum actionis pertinet terminus illius determinatus et particularis, non tantum denominatur agens ab actione, verum etiam a termino in casu effectivo: atque hac de causa dicimus, arbor floret floribus, qui sunt effectus ipsius arboris. Eodem igitur modo dicimus, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto, quia est terminus determinatus et particularis, ab ipsis per dilectionem mutuam productus, et ad conceptum ipsius productionis pertinens: non tamen dicimus, Pater et Filius spirant se Spiritu Sancto; tametsi

616. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII (on "the Father is not wise by begotten wisdom").
612. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).
617. Alexander of Hales, Summa, prima pars, q. 47, memb. 2 (in fine), et memb. 3, art. 3.
618. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1.
619. Simon of Tournai, as reported by Scotus, St. Bonaventure, and Capreolus in the places cited.
614. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 1, q. 1 (and q. 3).
612. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).
613. Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 1, concl. 1.

Spiritus Sanctus sit terminus per spirationem productus: quia, ut ait Sanctus Thomas in solutione 2, spiratio solum significat ipsam emissionem: ac si diceret, non includit in suo conceptu Spiritum Sanctum, ut terminum particularem et determinate per illam productum.

Ceterum praedictam rationem explodit Scotus quaestione illa 2; alter dicitur Durandus, et Canariensis locis citatis, hoc modo. Primum: aedificare est actio, et in suo conceptu non minus includit aedificium, tanquam terminum suum determinatum et particularem, quam includit dilectio notionalis Spiritum Sanctum; et tamen non dicitur aedificator aedificare aedificio: ergo ob eam solam causam non diceretur, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto. Deinde, spiratio non minus includit in suo conceptu Spiritum Sanctum, tanquam terminum particularem et determinatum actionis, quam dilectio notionalis: Spiritus enim inde dicitur, quia spiratur, estque determinatus et particularis terminus spirationis, quatenus spiratio est: et tamen dici nequit, Pater et Filius spirant se Spiritu Sancto. Generatio quoque refertur ad Filium, ut ad proprium terminum, et tamen non dicimus, Pater generat Filio suo aliquid aliud; neque enim hae duae operationes sic significatae solam includunt processionem sine ordine ad terminum particularem, sed etiam ipsum terminum designant, et in suo conceptu includunt: ergo ob illam rationem non dicentur, Pater et Filius diligere se Spiritu Sancto.[618][615][612]

Porro exemplum Sancti Thomae recusum est: nam verbum floret non significat actionem producendi flores, sed floridum esse: est enim verbum neutrum: ergo mirum non est, si dicamus, arbor floret floribus: et quamvis denotet etiam verbum floreo flores producere, ut quibusdam placet, non tam significat ipsam actionem flores producendi, quam floridum esse floribus a se productis: quae sane denominatio non est agentis a termino actionis, sed subiecti a forma, quam habet taliter producta. Idem de verbo floresco, quod significat floridum fio. Quinimo etiam si flores ab arbore producti non essent, dici posset arbor illis florere, veluti ad Hebraeos 2, virga Aaron dicitur fronduisse frondibus, non a se, sed virtute Dei productis. Videtur sane eandem significationem habere verbum floreo, atque verbum niteo: quare sicut dicitur aliquis nitere auro, gemmis, et margaritis, velut in hymno omnium sanctorum canit Ecclesia, Portent nitent margaritis, quae tamen non sunt ab ipso productae: sic arbor diceretur florere floribus non a se productis. Quodsi verbum aliquod significaret actionem producendi ipsos flores, ut si fingamus verbum florico, certe non diceretur arbor floricare floribus.

At Caietanus, ut defendat rationem Doctoris sancti, solita subtilitate notat, bifaria actione includere in suo conceptu terminum productum: uno modo, ut particulariter determinante qualitatem actionis, et hoc pacto dealbatio includit albedinem, et calefactio calorem; est enim dealbare, aut calefacere, ac si dicamus, facere album et calidum, quod est determinate significare qualitatem actionis: altero modo actio includit terminum in suo conceptu quasi coniunctum actioni, ut productum suo producente; et hac ratione dilectio notionalis includit in suo conceptu Spiritum Sanctum, et dictio, seu prolatio, includit verbum; dictio enim est verbi prolatio. Hoc posteriori modo (inquit Caietanus) intelligendus est Sanctus Thomas; loquitur enim de actionibus,

618. Durandus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1.
615. Melchior Cano (Canariensis), on this article.
612. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (and there refuting Gotfred).

quae posteriori illo modo includunt terminum in suo conceptu; illae autem sunt, quae postulant alium accusativum praeter terminum; huiusmodi est dictio, hac enim non tantum dicimus verbum, sed etiam historiam verbo expressam, quam non respicit sicuti rem productam. Talis est dilectio notionalis, quae non tantum respicit Spiritum Sanctum ut terminum productum in casu accusandi, sed etiam rem aliam, ut dilectam. In his igitur actionibus recte denominatur agens a termino producto in casu effectivo, et ideo dicere possumus, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto, et Pater dicit verbo suo quaecumque intelligit; contra vero spiratio, et generatio, priori illo modo solum includunt terminum in suo conceptu, et ideo agens non denominatur a termino in casu effectivo. Hanc doctrinam, et explicationem mentis Sancti Thomae, defumpsisse videtur Caietanus ex Capreolo in I, distinct. 32, quaest. 1, art. 1, ad primum argumentum, et ad secundum etiam tertio loco adductum.

Nonnulli hanc Caietani distinctionem refellunt, quia non magis includitur in conceptu dictionis verbum productum tanquam productum coniunctum producenti, quam Spiritus in conceptu spirationis: omnis enim actio, sive in genere, sive in specie considerata, ordinem habet ad suum terminum tanquam ad productum coniunctum producenti: id quod praesertim verum est in generatione: haec enim ita intrinsecum ordinem habet ad Filium genitum, sicut dictio ad verbum; et tamen non dicimus, Pater generat Filio aliquid aliud. Denique verbum diligere non significat actionem, quae postulat duplicem casum accusandi: non enim dicimus, saltem in creaturis, homo diligit amorem suum et amicum; et tamen dicimus, homo diligit amicum amore suo: ergo male Caietanus discrimen constituit inter illa duo genera actionum.

Secundus modus, quo alii propositionem illam hac ratione explicant, concedunt quidem omnem actionem ordinem habere ad suum terminum determinatum et particularem, nihilo minus agens non denominari in casu effectivo a termino cuiusvis actionis; sed id solum accidere in actionibus immanentibus, quarum terminus, sicut manet natura sua in agente, natus est denominare agens per modum formae: ideo dicimus, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto, quia dilectio est actio immanens, et ideo terminus illius, qui est Spiritus Sanctus, denominat ipsum operans per modum formae in casu effectivo: at vero in actionibus transeuntibus, vel quae significantur ut transeuntes, talem denominationem non fieri; et quia generatio, et spiratio significatur ut actiones transeuntes, licet re vera in Deo sint immanentes; idcirco dicunt a terminis earum non denominari in effectivo principium operans, ac proinde non posse dici, Pater generat Filio, vel spirat Spiritu Sancto.

Ego sane non dubito in aliquibus immanentibus actionibus talem denominationem a termino fieri, non tamen ea ratione fugio: idem enim accidit in aliquibus quoque transeuntibus, ut cum dicimus, ignis calefacit lignum, aut comburit calore: tum etiam in omnibus immanentibus talis denominatio non contingit, nam spiratio, et generatio in Deo sunt immanentes, et tamen in illis non fit talis denominatio.

At dicunt praedicti Theologi, has actiones in Deo esse quidem immanentes, significari tamen ut transeuntes, non alia ratione, nisi quia in rebus creatis sunt transeuntes, quae iisdem nominibus significantur; quod certe negare non possumus. Ceterum cum in divinis concipiantur a nobis ut immanentes, id satis videbatur, ut addito termino divino fieret praedicta denominatio. Quod si id non satis videatur eo, quod nomina communia sint transeuntibus et immanentibus operationibus; saltem ut fiat talis denominatio, necesse est, non solum actionem ipsam significari ut immanentem, sed etiam terminum ipsum; imo terminus potissimum debet significari ut immanens, quia concipitur velut forma denominans: atqui in ea propositione, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto, non significatur ut terminus immanens: sicut enim nomine spiritus significatur operatio voluntatis Dei ut transiens; eodem modo nomine Spiritus significatur ipse, qui est amor productus, significaturque quoniam dicere possimus: Pater et Filius diligunt se amore producto ab ipsis; non tamen, Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto. Nam Spiritus Sanctus significatur ut quid extra productum, et ita non ut forma intrinsece denominans.

Responderi quis posset hoc modo: etiam si Spiritus significetur ut terminus extra productus, quia tamen coniungitur verbo, diligunt, quod significat immanentem actionem, ideo determinatur et restringitur, ut velut immanens forma concipiatur; verum, si hoc satis est, non etiam sufficeret addere terminum aliquem divinum, ut cum operatione spirandi in immanens conciperetur cum suo termino? Vel saltem non sufficeret ex parte termini ponere nomen significans aliquid immanens, etiamsi verbum denotaret operationem transeuntem, et talis fieret posset denominatio hoc modo: Pater et Filius generant se ipsos amore suo? Cum enim denominatio non sit ab operatione, sed a termino, hic sic significetur terminus ut manens in producente, id videtur satis, ut ab eo denominatio illa in casu effectivo proveniat, et significationem verbi modificet, ut denotet immanentem: sed nemo dicere audebit, Pater et Filius spirant se amore suo: ergo alia ratio reddenda est.

Horum quoque sententia accedit ad modum loquendi, quem aliquando secutus est St. Augustine: dixit, Pater est sapiens sapientia genita; postea tamen retraxit, ut videbimus capite 6; itaque hi Doctores concedunt, cum dicimus, Pater dicit verbo, vel Pater et Filius diligunt se Spiritu Sancto, denominationem illam a termino actionis provenire, veluti a forma: sic enim etiam dicere liceret, Pater est sapiens sapientia genita: haec enim est veluti formalis denominatio.[616]

Caput III - The true rationale of the foregoing sentence

Multo facilior ratio praedictae sententiae et propositionis reddi potest, quae non tantum in praesenti, sed in ceteris locum habere potest. Eius autem gratia praemittendum est duo esse genera actionum et operationum, sive in genere, sive in specie denotentur: quarum aliae continentur sub respectu solum ad terminum, quem producunt, ut generare, spirare, producere et efficere; aliae vero cum duplici ordine, altero ad terminum productum, altero ad rem aliam, non quidem productam, sed eam vel per modum obiecti, vel per modum subiecti se habentem. Harum vero quaedam sunt transeuntes, ut calefactio, transmutatio; quaedam immanentes et vitales operationes, ut dictio, dilectio, intellectio. In actionibus prioris generis non fit denominatio a termino producto in casu effectivo, et ideo non dicimus, Pater generat Filio, vel aliud quid, nec spirat Spiritu Sancto. Ratio vero est manifesta, nam si in his operationibus fieret denominatio huiusmodi, necesse erat eas significari sub ordine ad aliquid aliud quam ad terminum: nam cum dicimus, Pater generat Filium, significamus generationem ad aliquid aliud ordinari; sensus enim est, Pater generat Filio se, aut aliquid aliud. Quod si hae actiones et operationes nihil aliud praeter terminum suum respiciunt, non potest operans in casu effectivo a termino producto denominari, cum nihil supersit, quod operans denominatione illa respiciat.

616. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII (on "the Father is not wise by begotten wisdom").

Contra vero in operationibus posterioris generis, cum alter respectus figatur vel ad subiectum, vel ad obiectum, cum quibus verbum has actiones significans construitur in casu accusandi; optime potest fieri denominatio a termino producto in casu effectivo: quare recte dicimus, ignis comburit, aut calefacit calore, non tantum colore, quem in se habet, sed etiam eo, quem in subiecto producit: dissimiliter albetur albedine in ipso producta. Hae namque actiones non solum significantur sub respectu ad terminum productum, sed etiam sub respectu ad subiectum, in quo inducunt terminum productum veluti formam illius. Atque hoc obtinet in actionibus, quae significantur cum ordine ad obiectum: unde dicimus, Pater intelligit, seu dicit verbo suo, quaecumque intelligit; nam ipsa intellectionis actio Patris, quae notionalis est, refert respectum simul ad verbum, et significatur ordine etiam ad obiecta dicta et intellecta: ergo tunc eadem operatio et productio Filii Dei per intellectionem ...

Since the same act is signified by diverse words, it is not surprising if at times that denomination be taken from the terminus, at times not, because one and the same operation is signified in different ways. Wherefore, although we do not say, "The Father begets something other than the Son," yet we do say, "The Father understands, or says by his Word, something other than the Son."

Hence it is plainly evident why we rightly say, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit," and yet it cannot be said, "The Father and the Son breathe themselves with the Holy Spirit." For the same operation of the divine will is, in the former way, signified - besides the respect to the produced terminus - with an order also to the objects; and the Father and the Son are objects of the divine love. But in the latter way it is signified with order only to the produced terminus. Let us therefore conclude with Scotus in the place cited, from which this reason is clearly gathered: just as in God love has an order not only to the produced terminus, but also to the thing loved; and speaking or understanding likewise to the thing said or understood; so too the love itself produced by loving regards the thing loved, and the Word the thing said; and therefore the denomination in the effective case is drawn by reason of respect to the thing understood or loved. [620]

Some objections are solved.

Caput IV - Some objections are solved

This common opinion is attacked by Durandus in I, distinction 32, question 1, number 10. He strives to prove that the proposition, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit," cannot be true, by the following reason. Either it is understood of notional love, or of essential love. It cannot be true of essential love; for just as that love has no order to the Holy Spirit, so too it cannot be said of it, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit" -

620. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (loco citato).

a point which, without controversy, all admit. But neither can it be true if it be understood of notional love; because what is common to every person includes nothing notional. But to have a respect of reason to someone as loved is common to any person; for every person loves another person and other created things. Therefore such a respect cannot be included in a notional act (actus); whence it follows that that proposition cannot be true by reason of such a respect.

Then again, even if such a respect of reason were included in a notional act; since, however, a notional act cannot be, nor be understood, without respect to the thing produced, it follows that it cannot regard anything other than the thing produced. But the Father and the Son are not produced by love; therefore notional love cannot be borne towards them.

These arguments of Durandus rest upon a false foundation, already refuted by us in Disputation 111, chapter 2, namely, that notional acts are not operations of the intellect and will. For thus it would plainly follow that no respect in them would be included to any other thing than to the person produced. The same would altogether follow if the opinion of others were true, which we attacked in Disputation 112: although they say that notional acts are operations of the will and the intellect, they add, nevertheless, that they are not formally to understand and to love, nor that these operations are included in notional acts. But because - as was there explained - intellection is formally included in "speaking," and love in "spiration," with the relation (relatio) of production added, it necessarily follows that a notional act, by reason of the essential act which it includes in itself, and which its relation in its own peculiar mode determines and modifies, is borne towards other things besides the produced terminus. Whence it also comes about that the notional act, by reason of the essential act which it contains, can reflect back upon the very principle itself. But because, when a terminus in the effective case is added, there is denoted the notional action, by that peculiar mode, modifying the essential act, it cannot befit any person whatsoever, but only that person who is the principle of it; therefore we shall not say, "The Holy Spirit loves himself with himself," as we say, "The Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit." This doctrine seems to be gathered from St. Bonaventure in I, distinction 32, article 1, question 1, to the second-to-last argument, from which there is full satisfaction given to Durandus's arguments.[621]

Others object thus: although the notional act of speaking signified by the word "said" has an order to the things said through the medium of the Word, nevertheless notional love most immediately regards the things loved, not through the medium of produced love. Nay rather, prior in origin to produced love, by the notional love - as origin and operation - the things are loved by the Father and the Son, before the Holy Spirit is produced.

I, however, cannot understand this difference between love and speaking. For just as speaking is not borne first upon the things said and only afterwards upon the Word, but rather by uttering that Word it at once produces the Word, and in it, as in the terminus of the action, it simultaneously utters the others which per se conduce to its production; why should not the same be said of love, namely, that by one and the same love the Spirit is produced, and that the production of the Holy Spirit is not first understood as terminated upon other things loved than upon the Holy Spirit himself, who at once is both the thing loved and the thing produced? Therefore at once the Father and the Son, by loving, produce the Holy Spirit, and by producing love him; and in him, as in the terminus of their love, they love the other things which are of themselves compared with his production. And for this reason in the effective case that denomination is made: because in the produced terminus there is also included that respect to the other things loved, as was explained above.

621. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 1, q. 1, ad penult.

Caput V - In what sense it can be said that the Holy Spirit loves himself with himself

Some Thomists were unwilling to concede this proposition: "The Holy Spirit loves himself with himself," because that denomination in the effective case can neither be attributed to the Holy Spirit as the terminus produced by an operation - since he is not produced by himself - nor as principle, because the principle of loving in the Holy Spirit is his own essence (essentia), or will (voluntas). Therefore, although we could say, "He loves himself by his essence," or "by his will," nevertheless it cannot be said, "He loves himself with himself."

Nevertheless, the doctrine of St. Thomas in I, distinction 32, question 1, article 2, ad ultimum, and of Marsilius in I, question 35, article 1, proposition 4, after the conclusion answering the question, pleases me, who think a distinction must be made. Either the statement is about notional love and the proposition - by which this is signified - that he loves by a produced love: then it ought to be denied, because this love does not befit the Holy Spirit, as all are well aware. Or the statement is about essential love, and it must be conceded: but then the effective case does not denote the principle by which, of what sort, that is, the essence or will, but the principle which, namely, the person; for in this way we are wont to say, "Peter understands or does this or that by himself."

St. Thomas then adds: if from the act of notional love we were to separate the order and relation of origin, so that there would remain solely love according to the notion of love, it could very well be said that the Holy Spirit loves himself by a love not only essential, but even personal. I, however, do not see how, once the relation of origin is removed, there could remain a love which would not be essential - a love which would befit any person, and yet would nonetheless be common to all. But if the Holy Spirit is said in a peculiar way to be love, this happens only by reason of the relation of love as produced; and since the verb "to love" of itself rather signifies a common operation of will, and is not commonly used for the notional act unless something be added, without any distinction it can be said: "The Holy Spirit loves himself with himself."[622][623]

Caput VI - Whether it is rightly said that the Father is wise, or is wise with begotten wisdom

At one time St. Augustine thought this proposition to be true: "The Father is wise with begotten wisdom," that is, with the Son. Thus he treated it in the book On 83 Questions, question 23; but afterwards, judging better, he changed his view in book I of the Retractations, chapter 26, and 622. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 2, ad ult.

623. Marsilius, In I Sent., q. 35, a. 1, prop. 4 (after the conclusion answering the question).

elsewhere in the places alleged by us in Disputation 142, chapter 2. His retractation is rightly embraced by the Schoolmen: St. Thomas in I, distinction 32, question 2, article 1; St. Bonaventure, article 2, question 1; Scotus, question 2, to the second question; Capreolus, question 1, article 2; Gabriel, question 1 - who all, while they concede that proposition about which we have hitherto disputed, "The Father says himself," with respect to creatures...[624]

They nevertheless absolutely deny this proposition, "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom." The reason is that, since "to say" signifies production, and "begotten wisdom," or the word, is the terminus of that production, the Father, who is the principle of this utterance and of the word, can rightly be denominated from the word in the effective case, according to the things set down a little above. But when we say "to be wise," we do not signify an action, but the formal effect of wisdom. Wherefore, since God the Father is wise by his essence (essence, essentia), not, however, by the Son as by a form, it cannot be said: "the Father is wise by begotten wisdom."

Moreover, whether it can be said, "the Father savors/knows-by-taste (sapere) by begotten wisdom," does not seem to stand on the same footing; for "he savors/knows-by-taste" (sapit) does not signify a formal effect, but an operation. Nevertheless Scotus in the place cited, and Gabriel in that first question, article 3, at the end, deny this proposition; because "to savor/know-by-taste," just as also "to understand," is often taken essentially. But an essential act does not regard a produced person; wherefore, in the effective case, another person who is said to understand and to savor cannot be denominated from that person as from the terminus of the action; nor indeed can he be denominated as from a principle. For it is established that begotten wisdom is not the Father's principle of savoring and of understanding; therefore in no way can such a denomination be effected. Someone will say that begotten wisdom is compared with the Father as a (so-called) subauthoritative principle; and on this ground the Master, in I, distinction 32, concedes the proposition: "The Father created all things by his word." Nevertheless, on this ground that prior proposition cannot be conceded; for the reason why it is said that the Father created all things by his word is that the ratio of the idea is appropriated to the Son (as we shall say below, question 45, in the notes to article 6), because what is done is by the intellect - not because it is really proper to him; but the word takes the place of the idea: for all the persons of the Trinity equally agree in the production of creatures.

But Scotus and Gabriel concede this proposition: "The Father understands, or savors, in his word," just as he is also said to savor or to understand in his essence; for, with respect to creatures (which have the character of a secondary object), the Father is said to understand in his primary object, which is the word. For it remains proved in disputation 144, chapter 2, that the word represents creatures to the Father.

For my part, I do not see why that proposition cannot be conceded: "The Father understands and savors by his word, which is begotten wisdom." But in truth one cannot say, "The Father is wise by begotten wisdom," because by that mode of speaking a formal effect is denoted, as we said

624. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2, a. 1; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 2, q. 1; Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2 (ad secundam quaestionem); Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 2; Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1.

above. And indeed I find no difference, or at least none of any moment, between these two expressions, "in his word" (in verbo suo), and, without the preposition, "by his word" (verbo suo). Either way of speaking is permissible, because the word is the terminus of a notional operation, as has been explained.

Caput VII - In what way it cannot be said that the Son is wise by begotten or by unbegotten wisdom

This proposition is treated by St. Thomas in I, distinction 32, question 2, article 2; by Gabriel, question 1, articles 1 and 2; by Durandus, question 2; and by Capreolus in the place cited.[625] And for the explication of it St. Thomas and Capreolus note that these two prepositions, "from" (a) and "through" (per), signify a cause in such a way that the preposition "from" (a) more commonly denotes the genus of efficient cause; but the preposition "through" (per) signifies indifferently every genus. And since in divine things there is, as it were, the genus of efficient cause, namely the principle of origin, whenever we use this preposition we seem to denote origin. It is also the genus of formal cause, but only by our consideration, by which we apprehend something as, so to speak, a form in God, and something else as the effect of it - a genus of cause that by the preposition "through" (per) we can signify.

This supposed, St. Thomas, Durandus, and Capreolus first teach that the proposition "The Son is wise by begotten wisdom" can have a twofold sense. For if the ablative "by begotten wisdom" denote an order of origin and a kind of quasi-efficient cause, it is the same as if we were to say "from begotten wisdom" (a sapientia genita). In this way, however, the proposition is false; for the Son does not have to be wise from begotten wisdom - that is, from himself as from a principle by origin - as is manifest. On the contrary, in the same sense we could say: "The Son is wise from unbegotten wisdom," that is, "from unbegotten wisdom," or "through unbegotten wisdom," which is the Father, he has to be wise; for from him he receives wisdom by origin, and so on. But if the ablative "by begotten wisdom" denote an order or relation of a quasi-formal cause, the proposition "The Son is wise by begotten wisdom" is still false; because the wisdom by which he is wise is the essence itself: but this is not begotten. Wherefore we should rather say, even in this sense: "The Son is wise by unbegotten wisdom," or "through unbegotten wisdom"; for the preposition "through" (per) can denote a quasi-formal cause. Or finally, thirdly, that ablative "by begotten wisdom" can denote the order of a quasi-subjective and material cause, as when we say: "Man understands by himself, is wise by himself, or through himself"; and in this way the proposition "The Son is wise by begotten wisdom" could be conceded. For he is wise by himself; but he himself is begotten wisdom - although this manner of speaking, as Durandus noted, is very improper.

625. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2, a. 2; Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 1 - 2; Durandus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 32 (loco citato).

Gabriel adds finally, from the same doctrine, that the eternal Father can in some way be said to be wise "by unbegotten wisdom," or "through unbegotten wisdom," in the second and third senses explained; not, however, that he is wise "from unbegotten wisdom," because from none does he receive by origin to be wise; nor "by begotten wisdom," because in no way is he wise through the Son.[626]

Disputatio CLII - Whether the Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit

Caput I - The earlier opinion of the Schoolmen

There is no lack of those who have asserted this proposition, "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit," to be false - even though they concede the preceding proposition to be true. The preceding, about which there was recently controversy for us, is that of St. Augustine and of the other Fathers, as was noted; this proposition, however, we do not find among the Fathers, but it seems to have been handed down only by some Scholastics. Scotus, therefore, in I, distinction 32, question 2, at the end, judges this proposition to be false for the following reason. The love by which the Father and the Son can be said to love creatures with the Holy Spirit is without doubt notional; for about essential love there is no controversy. But neither can the proposition be true of notional love, because this love is said to be only of that object which it regards as primary and per se, or at least of that which necessarily accompanies the primary. Creatures, however, are neither the primary object of notional love, nor do they necessarily accompany the primary object, which is the divine essence; for they are loved contingently and freely. Therefore notional love is not said to be of creatures. But because the Father and the Son necessarily accompany the essence, which is the primary object, therefore they are said not only to love the essence by notional love, but also themselves.[627]

However, this reason of Scotus proves little. For although creatures, whether future or existing, are loved freely, nevertheless possibles are necessarily loved with a love of complacency, as was shown above, disputation 79, chapter 2; and Scotus himself, cited by us there, concedes this love of complacency in God toward possible things, even if he does not say that this love is necessary in God. Perhaps in that distinction 32, question 2, just now cited, he speaks of the efficacious love of creatures, which indeed is borne only toward creatures which in fact are to be; and of this efficacious love he said that the Father and the Son do not love creatures with the Holy Spirit, for the reason set forth above - because creatures in this way are not necessarily conjoined with the primary object of love, which is the divine essence.

Nevertheless, even in this way his argument is not sound. For just as the Father by his word not only says himself and possible creatures, which he necessarily knows, but also future creatures which he could have failed to know, if indeed they could have failed to be (as, according to the sentence of St. Augustine, we showed in disputation 143, chapter 6), so too the Father and the Son are said not only to love with the Holy Spirit themselves and possible creatures, but also future creatures, however freely and contingently they may be loved. Add that Scotus falsely asserts that the Father and the Son, under the personal property, are secondary objects of the love by which the Holy Spirit proceeds, and that only the essence is the primary object - as in disputation 142, chapters 3 and 4, against him we proved; and we noted the same in disputation 150, chapter 3, when we defended that the Holy Spirit proceeds by procession as the outstanding gift in the mode of loving; and hence that two supposits are necessary on the part of the object for the production of the Holy Spirit.

626. Gabriel Biel, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 1, a. 3 in fine.

Canariensis agrees with Scotus in the commentary on this article when he asserts that the aforesaid proposition is false. He seems, however, to conclude along Scotus's line of reasoning, which we have just related. But the exposition of the learned Doctor John is too far-fetched and inept: for by the same reasoning we could say: "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit," that is, "when they understand creatures, they breathe the Holy Spirit"; whereas that sense, which the particular clause "when" (dum) yields, would only denote co-existence, which likewise the cognition of creatures has with the procession of the Holy Spirit.

On the contrary, Gabriel, in the first question at the second to last argument, and Marsilius, in I, question 35, article 1, proposition 5, after the conclusion answering the question, treat this proposition; yet they do not explain it in the same way. Marsilius thinks, first, that the proposition is true of notional love, in the sense that

Caput II - That the Father and the Son are truly said to love creatures with the Holy Spirit; the more probable opinion

Now in this matter the thing to be supposed is what we noted at the end of disputation 143, chapter 5, on the procession of the Holy Spirit - namely, that he does not proceed formally by a love of creatures, even of possible ones, just as neither does the word proceed by a cognition of creatures. For by force of reasoning the case is the same; where we treated this more at large, there is no doubt, once we suppose possible creatures to be loved by God with some love.

The remaining task, therefore, is in the present to show whether the Father and the Son are said to love creatures - not only possibles but also futures - with the Holy Spirit. The truer opinion is, therefore, that all of them are loved by the Father and the Son with the Holy Spirit. This is treated by St. Thomas in this article, in reply to the third; by St. Bonaventure in I, distinction 32, article 1; by ... in the body[629]

Scotus asserts that the Father and the Son under their personal property are secondary objects of the love by which the Holy Spirit proceeds, and that the essence alone is the primary object, as we proved against him in Disputation 142, chapters 3 and 4; we noted the same in Disputation 150,

627. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 32, q. 2, ad ult.
629. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 32, a. 1.

chapter 3, when we defended that the Holy Spirit proceeds of Himself as the nexus of two who mutually love, and therefore that two supposits are necessary on the part of the object for the production of the Holy Spirit.

Scotus is seconded by Canariensis in his commentary on this article, when he asserts that the aforesaid proposition is false. Yet he seems to be refuted by the reasoning of Scotus which we set forth just above; but, in deference to the holy Doctor who defends the aforesaid proposition, Canariensis grants it, and notes that it can be rightly explained in this sense: "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit," that is, while they love creatures, they breathe the Holy Spirit. But this exposition seems too forced and inept; for by the same reasoning we could say, "The Father and the Son understand creatures with the Holy Spirit," that is, while they understand creatures, they breathe the Holy Spirit. For that sense, which the clause "while" renders, denotes only concomitance; and that concomitance cognition of creatures also has with the procession of the Holy Spirit.

Marsilius thinks first that the proposition is true of notional love, in the sense that the Father and the Son breathe the Holy Spirit, who is the first gift and the reason of liberal donation which can be made or is made to creatures; then he also judges it to be true of essential love, because the procession of the persons within God is the reason of the procession of creatures outside Him; for this procession is through love. Therefore, when we say, "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit," there is denoted a ground of efficiency, not on the part of God - for in God the ground of effecting is the essence - but on the part of the effects; for since the Holy Spirit is the first gift, He seems to be the ground of any liberal donation, and therefore of the procession of creatures, which proceed by a liberal donation. This view St. Thomas seems to have followed in I Sentences, distinction 18, question 1, article 3, in the body.

But I for my part do not see how the breathing of the Holy Spirit can be said to be the reason of the procession of creatures, except by appropriation - and that very improperly. For the reason for producing creatures is the unity of essence; whereas the plurality of persons, on its own part, does not per se pertain to that. Therefore it pleases me to understand the aforesaid proposition only of notional love (dilectio notionalis), just as that other proposition too, "The Father and the Son love one another with the Holy Spirit," must be understood of the same, as we showed in the preceding disputation. And the reason why we say, "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit," is altogether the same as that on account of which they are also said to love themselves: namely, because the Holy Spirit, as the term produced by love, not only has the respect of something produced toward the Father and the Son, but also regards the secondary objects of love, just as the notional love itself does. Wherefore, just as we said in Disputation 144, chapter 2, that the Father understands creatures in the Son and in His Word, so too we must say, "The Father and the Son love creatures with the Holy Spirit": although He does not proceed by a love of creatures formally; for that is not denoted by this proposition.

But here two things must be observed. One concerns the opinion of St. Thomas who, as some interpret him, thinks that possible creatures are not loved by God, as we saw in Disputation 79; and, therefore, the aforesaid proposition is not to be understood of them, but only of future creatures. And so he prudently said in this article, in reply to the third, "The Father not only loves the Son, but also Himself and us, with the Holy Spirit"; by which words he plainly understands future, not possible, creatures. But since in that same disputation we said that possible creatures also are loved by God, and we interpreted St. Thomas in a favorable sense, therefore we judge that the aforesaid proposition is true of all the aforementioned.

The second thing to be noted is that notional love may freely be referred to creatures; to which, if they were not going to exist, it could fail to be terminated: and this would occur without any real change in it, but by a change only of a respect of reason, as we showed in Disputation 80, chapter 2.

Quaestio XXXVIII - On the name of the Holy Spirit, that it is gift

Consequently inquiry is made concerning gift (donum). And concerning this two questions are asked.

Articulus I - Whether "gift" is a personal name

Objicitur: It seems that "gift" is not a personal name. For every personal name imports some distinction of individuals in the divine realities. But the name "gift" does not import any distinction in the divine realities. For Augustine says in the book On the Trinity that the Holy Spirit is given in such a way as to be the gift of God, so that He also gives Himself, as God does.[630] Therefore "gift" is not a personal name.

1. Besides. No personal name belongs to the divine essence. But the divine essence is the gift which the Father gives to the Son, as is clear from Hilary, book 8 On the Trinity.[631] Therefore "gift" is not a personal name.
2. Besides. According to Damascene, in the divine realities nothing is subject or serving.[632] But "gift" imports a certain subjection both to him to whom it is given and to him with whom it is given. Therefore "gift" is not a personal name.
3. Besides. "Gift" imports a respect to a creature. And thus it seems to be said of God in time. But personal names are said of God from eternity, as "Father" and "Son." Therefore "gift" is not a personal name.

But on the contrary: Augustine says in book 15 On the Trinity: "As a body of flesh is nothing other than flesh, so the gift of the Holy Spirit is nothing other than the Holy Spirit." But "Holy Spirit" is a personal name. Therefore "gift" also is [a personal name].[633]

I answer: In the name "gift" there is imported an aptitude to be given. But what is given has an aptitude or habitude both to that by which it is given and to that to which it is given. For it would not be given by someone unless it were his; and it is given to someone so that it may be his. Now a

630. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 19 (middle), tom. 3.
631. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, VIII (around the middle, and shortly after).
632. St. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa, IV, c. 19 (from the middle and following; cf. also c. 27).

divine person is said to be "of" someone either according to origin, as the Son is "of" the Father, or inasmuch as she is had by someone. But we are said to "have" that by which we can freely use or enjoy as we will. And in this mode a divine person cannot be had except by a rational creature conjoined to God. Other creatures, indeed, can be moved toward a divine person, but not in such a way that it is in their power to enjoy the divine person and to use His effect. And to this end a rational creature sometimes arrives: namely, when it becomes a partaker of the divine Word and of the Love proceeding such that it can freely know God truly and rightly love Him. Whence only a rational creature can have the divine person. But to the end that it may thus have Him, it cannot arrive by its own power; hence it must be given to it from above. For that is said to be given to us which we have from another. And thus a divine person fits to be given and to be gift.

Reply to the first: The name "gift" imports personal distinction in the divine realities according as "gift" is said to be "of" someone by origin. And yet the Holy Spirit gives Himself inasmuch as He is of Himself as able to use or rather to enjoy; just as a man is said to be master of himself. And this is what Augustine says on John: "What is so much yours as yourself?"[634] Or it must be said, and better, that a gift must somehow be of the giver. But "to be of this one" is said in many ways. In one way by way of identity, as Augustine says on John. And thus the gift is not distinguished from the giver, but from the one to whom it is given. And thus it is said that the Holy Spirit gives Himself. In another way something is said to be "of" someone as possession or property. And thus it must be that the gift is essentially distinguished from the giver. And thus the gift of God is something created. In a third way "this is of that" is said by origin alone. And thus the Son is "of" the Father, and the Holy Spirit is "of" both. In this way, therefore, when "gift" is said to be "of" the giver, it is distinguished personally from the giver and is a personal name.

Reply to the second: The essence is said to be "the Father's gift" in the first mode, because the essence is the Father's by way of identity.

Reply to the third: "Gift," insofar as it is a personal name in the divine realities, does not import subjection, but origin only in comparison to the giver. In comparison, however, to him to whom it is given, it imports free use or fruition, as has been said.

Reply to the fourth: "Gift" is not said from the fact that it is actually given, but insofar as it has an aptitude that it can be given. Whence from eternity a divine person is said to be "gift," although He is given in time. Nor, from the fact that a respect to the creature is imported, must it be essential; but that something essential be included in its concept, as essence is included in the concept of person.[635]

Conclusion is affirmative.

633. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 19 (middle), tom. 3.
634. St. Augustine, In Iohannis Evangelium tractatus, on "Quid tam tuum est quam tu?"
635. Cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 29, a. 4; q. 34, a. 3, ad 3.

Articulus II - Whether "gift" is the proper name of the Holy Spirit

Objicitur: It seems that "gift" is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit. For "gift" is said from that which is given. But, as Isaiah says, "A Son is given to us" (Isa. 9). Therefore "to be a gift" belongs to the Son, just as to the Holy Spirit.

1. Besides. Every proper name of some person signifies some property of that one. But this name "gift" does not signify any property of the Holy Spirit. Therefore "gift" is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit.
2. Besides. The Holy Spirit can be called "the spirit" of some man; but He cannot be called "the gift" of some man, but only the gift of God. Therefore "gift" is not the proper name of the Holy Spirit.

But on the contrary is what Augustine says in book 4 On the Trinity: "As 'to be begotten' is to the Son to be 'from the Father,' so 'to be the gift of God' to the Holy Spirit is to proceed from the Father and the Son." But the Holy Spirit receives a proper name insofar as He proceeds from the Father and the Son. Therefore "gift" is also the proper name of the Holy Spirit.[636]

I answer: "Gift," insofar as it is taken personally in the divine realities, is the proper name of the Holy Spirit. For the sake of whose evidence it must be known that "gift" properly is a credible giving, according to the Philosopher, that is, what is not given with an intention of recompense; and thus it imports gratuitous donation. Now the reason of gratuitous donation is love. For we give something freely to someone because we will his good. Therefore, the first thing we give him is that love whereby we will his good. Whence it is manifest that love has the character of first gift, by which all gratuitous gifts are given. Hence, since the Holy Spirit proceeds as Love (as was said above), He proceeds under the notion of first gift. And hence Augustine says in book 15 On the Trinity that by the gift which is the Holy Spirit many proper gifts are distributed to the members of Christ.[637]

Reply to the first: The Son, because He proceeds by way of Word, which by its very notion has that it be the likeness of its principle, is properly called Image, although the Holy Spirit also is like the Father; so too the Holy Spirit, because from the Father He proceeds as Love, is properly called Gift, although the Son also is given. For this very thing, that the Son is given, is on the side of love, according to that of John 3: "So God loved the world as to give His only-begotten Son."

Reply to the second: In the name "gift" there is imported that it is of the giver by origin; and thus there is properly imported the ratio of the origin of the Holy Spirit, which is procession.

Reply to the third: Before it is given, a gift is only the giver's; but after it is given, it is his to whom it is given. Therefore, since the name "gift" does not import the actual giving, it cannot be said to be the gift of man, but the gift of God who gives. But once it has been given, then it is the man's, whether it be the Spirit, or what is given.

---

636. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, IV, c. 20 (middle), tom. 3.
637. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV (cf. c. 19), on the distribution of the gifts of the Holy Spirit to the members of Christ.

The conclusion is affirmative. Both points will be further explained by us in the following disputations: whether the ratio of gift is the property of the Holy Spirit alone (Disputation 153).

Disputatio CLIII - On whether the notion of gift is the property of the Holy Spirit alone

Reply to the first: Just as the Son, because He proceeds by way of word - which by its notion has that it be the likeness of its principle - is called properly an image, although the Holy Spirit also is like to the Father; so too the Holy Spirit, because He proceeds from the Father as love, is called properly gift, although the Son also is given. For this very fact, that the Son is given, is from the Father's love, according to John 3: So God loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son.

Reply to the second: In the name of gift it is implied that it be of the giver by origin. And thus there is implied the property of the Holy Spirit's origin, which is procession.

Reply to the third: A gift, before it is given, belongs only to the giver; but after it is given, it is his to whom it is given. Therefore, since gift does not imply giving in act, it cannot be said to be the gift of man, but the gift of God who gives. But when it has now been given, then it is man's - either the Spirit, or what is given. Both points will be further explained by us in the following disputations.

Caput I - Various opinions of the Scholastics

Among the other names which are attributed by the theologians - especially indeed by St. Augustine - to the Holy Spirit, there is "gift," with respect to which there were various opinions of the Scholastics.

The first opinion is that of Durandus in the First Book, distinction 18, question 1.[638] Presupposing the definition of gift handed down by St. Thomas in article 1,[639] in which a twofold respect is included - one to the giver, the other to him to whom the donation is made - he teaches first that gift can be predicated in the divine only with respect to the creature, yet so that it comes properly to the divine essence, insofar as it can be given to creatures, just as to any person; for as much the essence as the person is given to a rational creature. He proves this, because inasmuch as God is given to a rational creature, He is given as an object known and loved, or after the manner of a ruler and governor having special care; but such liberal donation equally befits essence and person, as is clear; therefore the notion of gift is common to both. Then he adds that this common notion of gift is appropriated to the third person, because that person, according to appropriation, is also said to proceed by love; but love has the notion of first gift, as St. Thomas also said in article 2; therefore he thinks the same of the name "love" and of the name "gift," namely, that each is attributed to the Holy Spirit by appropriation alone.

638. Durandus of St.-Pourçain, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1.
639. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 1.

This opinion rests on a false foundation. For, as we saw in Disputation 111, chapter 1, Durandus holds that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Father and the Son by the will, but immediately by nature; and therefore that to Him there does not properly befit the notion of love as produced, and consequently not of gift. But if he thought that the Holy Spirit proceeds by the will, he would not doubt to concede to Him the special notion of gift; for he admits that the first gift is produced love. That the foundation of that disputation is false was shown in chapter 2.

The second opinion is that of Ockham, as reported by Marsilius in the First Book, question 21, article 1, notation 3, and of Gabriel in the First Book, distinction 18, the single question, article 1.[640] He asserts that "gift" can be used in a twofold way: in one way for that which can be given gratis to someone; and in this way the notion of gift befits not only the Holy Spirit but also any person whatsoever; for each of them can be given to the creature - "For to us a Son is given" (Isa 9), and John 3: "That He might give His only-begotten Son." And thus "gift" includes a respect to creatures to whom it is given or can be given. In another way, gift is said of that which proceeds by the force of love of some object, not because something is liberally given to someone; and in this way the Holy Spirit has the notion of gift, not with respect to creatures to whom He is liberally given, but with respect to the Father and the Son; because He is the mutual love of both: wherefore He will be the gift of the Father into the Son and of the Son into the Father; just as He is also the love of the one into the other, and conversely. Thus Gabriel taught in that question, article 2, conclusion 1. By this reasoning the same Gabriel thought that the divine essence is the gift of the Father to the Son, to whom from eternity it is given by the Father; to which Capreolus agrees on that distinction 18, question 1; and it seems to be proved from St. Hilary: for in book 8 On the Trinity, about the middle, he says that the essence is the gift which the Father gives to the Son.[641]

But, as Durandus most rightly noted in the First Book, that same distinction 18, the cited question 1, number ..., and as the Canariensis notes in the first part of the commentary on this question, the divine essence can in no way be called a gift with respect to some person receiving it, or one person with respect to another person. For names are not to be used as one pleases, nor are various significations to be invented for them; rather, among theologians they ought to denote what they signify in common usage among philosophers and the learned. Now "gift," as Aristotle testifies, Topics 4, chapter 4, is an irredeemable giving, that is, gratuitous and liberal, and hence proceeding from no necessity; but such cannot be among the divine persons, whether they be compared mutually among themselves, or the divine essence be compared with them: for there no liberal giving can intervene; therefore neither can "gift" be found among them. In addition, if "gift" were taken in the divine in the aforesaid way, there could not be constituted the property of the Holy Spirit, which is against the doctrine of Augustine in book 4 On the Trinity, chapter 20, as we will explain below.[642]

640. William of Ockham as reported by Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 1, not. 3; Gabriel (Biel), In I Sent., d. 18, q. unica, a. 1.

641. St. Hilary, De Trinitate, VIII (around the middle). See also Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1.

642. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, IV, c. 20.

The third opinion is that of the Canariensis in the second part of the aforesaid commentary, who asserts that "gift" is taken in three ways. For since a gift has a twofold respect - both to him who gives, to whom it is said to belong, and to him to whom it is given - it can be called a gift, first indeed, as it is of some giver by identity, and thus the divine essence is a gift, and any person of Himself, because He can give Himself to creatures gratis; in the second way, that is called a gift which is someone's by origin and can be given; thus the notion of gift befits only a person proceeding, that is, the Son and the Holy Spirit; for these alone are someone's by origin. In the third way "gift" is said of that which not only is another's by origin and can be given, but also by the force of its origin proceeds as a gift; and in this way it befits only the Holy Spirit, who, since He proceeds as love, seems by force of His origin to have the notion of gift. This opinion is reported by Marsilius in the First Book, question 21, article 1, notation 4,[643] and the Canariensis thinks that it is the opinion of St. Thomas in article 1, reply to the first.

I indeed admit that three acceptions of gift are assigned by St. Thomas in that reply to the first: either when it is the same as the giver - and in this way the divine essence can be called a gift - or when it is the possession of the giver, as a servant; or in the third way, by origin, when the gift proceeds from the giver - and thus it befits any person proceeding, who, by the one from whom he proceeds, can be given by a mission by which he is sent to creatures. But the Canariensis adds another acception, omitting that second one, namely when that which proceeds, by force of its origin, proceeds as a gift; and in this way, he says, it is proper to the Holy Spirit. St. Thomas in that place concludes that only in that third way can there be a person and that it befits any person proceeding; but in article 2 he teaches that in that ultimate way it is proper to the Holy Spirit - which must be further explained by us below; nor must so many multiple acceptions of "gift" be assigned.

Caput II - That what is by nature a gift is the property of the Holy Spirit; the truer opinion

Lest our disputation wander uncertainly hither and yon, first of all a definition of gift must be established, then those things which are necessary for its full understanding must be added. A gift, therefore, as Aristotle testifies, Topics 4, chapter 4, near the end, is an irredeemable giving, that is, without hope and compact of return; or, if you prefer, it is a liberal giving from love.[644] Wherefore it must be seen whether in this way it belongs to any person by a peculiar reason to be "gift"; for it is not permitted to coin new acceptions or even definitions of "gift" on our own authority.

From this definition it first clearly follows that a gift has a respect both to him who freely gives, and also to him to whom the donation is made. Then it is clear that only that is called a gift which can be given to a rational nature; for this alone is capable of liberal and gratuitous donation, as Augustine says, book 4 Contra Iulianum, chapter 3, not far from the beginning.[645] Finally, as 643. Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 1, not. 4; the Canariensis refers this to St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 1, ad 1.

644. Aristotle, Topics IV, c. 4.

645. St. Augustine, Contra Iulianum, IV, c. 3 (near the beginning).

Cajetan noted at the beginning of article 1, and as is gathered from St. Thomas in the body, it is evident that a gift stands above the recipient's faculty, insofar as it is conferred by the will of the giver alone.[646]

Moreover, it must be observed that not only is that a gift which is actually given, but that is also called a gift which can be given, or which is deputed to that. Thus taught St. Thomas in article 1, reply to the fourth; St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 18, question ...; Gabriel, in article 1; Marsilius in the First Book, question 21, article 3; whom the Canariensis follows in this article.[647] Wherefore, that the Holy Spirit from eternity is given to no one hinders not at all but that He be truly called a gift. Augustine expressly teaches this, book 5 On the Trinity, chapter 15, at the end, when he says: "One way it is understood when 'gift' is said, another when 'given' is said: for 'gift' can exist before it is given, but 'given,' unless it shall have been given in act, in no way can be said."[648] Wherefore, when that same Augustine, book 15 On the Trinity, chapter 19, says: "Therefore it is a gift of God to the extent that it is given to those to whom it is given," he must be understood to speak of "gift" insofar as it is given, or thus, that he takes as equivalent "to be given" and "to be apt to be given." Moreover, that he is speaking of "gift" insofar as it can be given, is understood from the words which he immediately subjoins about the same Holy Spirit: "But with Himself He is God, even if He be given to no one, because He was God coeternal to the Father and to the Son before anything was given." Therefore, since in book 4 On the Trinity, as we shall see below, Augustine affirms that "gift" is a property of the Holy Spirit, it follows that in that very place he also asserts that He is a gift before He is given in act.[649]

With these positions, which ought to be indubitable, the truer opinion is that the notion of "gift," namely that which by its very nature is a gift, is the property of the Holy Spirit, and befits no other person. Thus teaches St. Thomas in article 2; St. Bonaventure in the First Book, distinction 18, question 4.[650] They understand "gift" with respect to creatures, to whom by its own procession it is apt to be given.

However, for the explication of the aforesaid opinion, observe that "gift" can be taken in a twofold way. In one way, for any reality whatsoever which, a liberal will acceding, can be given; now to this thing the reason of gift accrues from an extrinsic denomination only, from the will of the giver, which is to it wholly accidental and extrinsic. In this way "gift" can be said not only of any divine person and of the divine essence itself, but also of any created thing which can be matter of liberal donation: for both the divine essence and any divine person and a created thing can be given. And beyond this the Holy Spirit has also another reason of being a gift, namely of that which can be given, as will at once be clear; nevertheless, in this first acception He is also a gift with respect to Himself as given, that is, if we think of the Holy Spirit giving Himself together with the divine essence and with the other persons, as He is given when He comes into the soul of the just, 646. Cajetan, on Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 1, proem; cf. St. Thomas, ibid., corp.

647. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 1, ad 4; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 18, q. ...; Gabriel (Biel), In I Sent., d. 18, a. 1; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 3; the Canariensis follows them here.

648. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, V, c. 15 (at the end).

649. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 19; and XV, c. 19 together with V, c. 15; cf. also IV, c. 20.

650. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 2; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 4.

according to John 14: "We will come to him, and we will make our abode with him"; thus He is a gift of creatures, which He gives from Himself, just as the Father and the Son do. Yet this is not the property of the Holy Spirit, since it is common to many others.

In the other way, that is called a gift which by its nature and substantial property is a gift. But in this way it is the property of the Holy Spirit alone: for this He has by force of His production, not by some will accidentally supervening to Him, as happens in the prior acception. And in this way I think a real distinction is necessary between the gift and the one who gives: which will be better explained for this reason. The mission of the Holy Spirit, by which He is sometimes sent to us, is the very eternal procession itself, with only an added respect of reason to the creatures to whom He is said to be sent by reason of some particular effect, as was shown in Disputation 170.[651] "But with Himself He is God, even if He be given to no one, because He was God coeternal to the Father and to the Son before anything was given." Therefore, since in book 4 On the Trinity, as we shall see below, Augustine affirms that "gift" is the property of the Holy Spirit, it follows that he also asserts Him to be a gift before He is given in act.[649]

1. We shall show: by the same mission by which the Holy Spirit is sent, He is given by the very one by whom He is sent. For since this mission is by its nature love, and, inasmuch as it denotes an order toward creatures, it is gratuitous, it follows that He who is sent is likewise given liberally by Him. Therefore the Holy Spirit, by the power of His procession, which is love, has intrinsically the capacity to be given, not by a will and a supervening love as the principle of giving, but by that very love by which He proceeds substantially, as by the very donation; for by that very love He is also substantially sent, and the mission itself is a donation. But the Son, even when He is sent by the Father from whom He proceeds, is not sent by love itself; that is, His mission is not love substantially, but it is intellection; and to this there is added love, as it were accidentally and as a principle by which God the Father is moved to send and give His Son by generation and intellection as by a mission. Therefore the procession of the Son is not substantially the very donation, because it is not a procession of love; rather, it is a donation only by reason of love, by which, as by a principle, He is sent and given; whereas the Holy Spirit is sent by that very eternal love as by a mission, and is given as by a donation. How, however, the mission itself is an eternal procession of the person must in its place be shown from the doctrine of the Fathers and by reason. This indeed is the property of the Holy Spirit, of which St. Augustine, to be cited in the following disputation, said that it is the same as that by which He is Spirit, which can belong to no other divine person nor to a creature: for anything else is not substantially, but only by an extrinsic denomination, love.

From what has been said it follows, first, in what sense love is called the first gift, namely because love, if it could be given among men as other things are, would substantially and by the force of its procession be a gift; but other things would be given from it.

651. Gabriel Vázquez, Disputatio 170 (on the mission as procession with a respect of reason).
649. St. Augustine, De Trinitate, XV, c. 19; and XV, c. 19 together with V, c. 15; cf. also IV, c. 20.

Next, it is clear that it is rightly said with Augustine that the Son proceeds from the Father as begotten; but the Holy Spirit as gift: because the Holy Spirit proceeds substantially by love and by charity, which is the very donation.[652] Wherefore the Spirit proceeds substantially not only as Spirit, but also as gift; whereas the Son proceeds by intellection, which substantially is not donation, but generation. Now what is brought forth by generation goes forth as begotten, and its origin is called nativity.

But you will object: the Son also can be said to be substantially a gift; for, since He is substantially God, and God is of Himself love and charity by nature, He will be substantially a gift. I answer: just as the Holy Spirit is wisdom by His nature, yet is not said to be produced wisdom, because He does not proceed through the intellect; so also the Son is love essentially, because He is God; yet He is not produced love, because He does not proceed through the will. Now for the notion of a gift, namely what is apt to be given, it does not suffice to be love essentially; it is required to be produced love, so that His very production be substantially a donation: and this is proper to the Holy Spirit.

But how, although the respect to creatures which seems to be signified by the name "gift" belongs to the Holy Spirit as something wholly extrinsic and accidental, nevertheless "gift" is His personal property, will be evident in the following disputation.

Disputatio CLIV - Whether the ratio of "gift" belongs to the Holy Spirit according to the essence, or according to the personal property

Caput I - What Scotus and Cajetan hold

The Doctors also differ in their opinion on this controversy; for from diverse principles diverse conclusions must be collected. Scotus, in the First Book, distinction 18, the single question, teaches first that it does not agree with the Holy Spirit to be a gift by reason of His personal property.[653] He proves this, first, because each person is understood to be sufficiently constituted by essence and property, before creatures are understood in any way, as we saw in Disputation 143, chapters 2 and 4;[654] but the notion of gift necessarily looks to creatures, at least possible ones: therefore, before the Holy Spirit is understood to be a gift, He is already conceived as constituted by personal property: therefore the very notion of gift cannot formally pertain to the personal property. Second, that order to creatures, which belongs to the notion of gift, is a relation of reason to creatures; but no relation of reason belongs to the essence or property of a person: therefore neither does the notion of gift. Third, because otherwise the Holy Spirit would be constituted in a twofold way: in one way by a real relation, in another way by a relation of reason, which is absurd.

652. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 14.
653. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 18, q. unica.
654. Gabriel Vázquez, Disputationes, Disputatio 143, cap. 2 et 4.

Further, to defend Augustine, who in some places seems to assert that "gift" is the property of the Holy Spirit, Scotus then teaches that "gift" can be used in three ways. First, for that which proceeds liberally by an act of love; and in this sense he grants that the Holy Spirit is a gift, not because He can be given, but because by love He proceeds liberally: for thus to give is not to give liberally, but to proceed liberally. Second, "gift" is said of the mutual love of two; in which way the Holy Spirit can also be called a gift of the Father in the Son, and conversely; and thus he concedes that it is a property of the Holy Spirit. Third and finally, "gift" is said of that which is given liberally; and in this sense "gift" is not the property of the Spirit, nor "giver" the property of the spirator: because the formal signification of this name "gift" is a respect of donability, which belongs to God only in comparison with creatures; but materially it signifies, as it is in God, the personal property of the Holy Spirit, who can be given liberally to creatures. In the same proportion one must speak of the "giver": namely, that the formal signification is a respect of reason toward creatures; but the material is the property or notion of the spirator. This opinion of Scotus, in this third point, Cajetan almost embraces; for he says that the name "gift" signifies three things: both that which can be given, and a respect of reason which he calls donability, and another respect as it were of possession, namely that it be of someone, that is, of him by whom it is given. He says therefore that the primary signification is the respect of donability; but the respect as it were of possession, which is a personal property, is connoted; while the material signification is love.[655]

This opinion, in the first place, does not sufficiently accord with the mind of Augustine: for he speaks of the gift which can be given to creatures, when he asserts that it is the property of the Holy Spirit, as is plainly clear from the places cited in the preceding disputation and from those which we shall relate below. Therefore we must defend in the following manner that the very property of the Holy Spirit is the ratio of gift, which He has by the power of His substantial origin: for if it belonged to Him only by a certain extrinsic denomination, inasmuch as He can be given, the ratio of gift would be common to the three persons, as was noted in the preceding disputation, chapter 2. Then too, since this same is the mind of the holy Doctor in this question, who in all things followed the sense of Augustine, Cajetan does not satisfy his office, when he tries in this way to defend him.

But if someone should say on behalf of Cajetan that the Son is not the personal love which is the material signification of the name "gift," but only the Holy Spirit; and thus that the property of the Holy Spirit is the material signification of "gift," but not the properties of the other persons: let him, I beg, first observe that Cajetan does not say that the material signification of "gift" is the personal property, but love; while the personal property is connoted by the name "gift," as that of another by emanation: therefore he holds that in the material signification of "gift" the property of the Holy Spirit is not directly included, otherwise it would not be a connotatum of that name. Wherefore Cajetan assigns a different signification to the name "Spirit" than to the name "gift": for, according to him, the name "Spirit" formally and directly signifies the property of the third person, and then connotes love and the respect of gift; whereas the name "gift" signifies and connotes in another way, as was explained above. Moreover, from this opinion of Cajetan it follows that the ratio of gift belongs to the third person by an extrinsic denomination only, in which way it can belong to any other: here, however, we wish so to assign the ratio of gift to the Holy Spirit that it be His property: for this is what Augustine and St. Thomas maintain.

655. Cajetan, on Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 1, proem., and ad loc.

Caput II - The truer opinion: that by His personal property the Holy Spirit is not only Spirit but also gift

The opinion of St. Thomas in article 2 is proved for us, which affirms that the third person, by His personal property, is not only Spirit, but also gift, and that He is a gift by that by which He is Spirit; just as the Son is a word by that by which He is Son.[656] The holy Doctor hands this down more expressly in the First Book, distinction 18, question 1, article 4; and St. Bonaventure follows in question 5; Capreolus in the single question, to the first argument of the second order, and to the second, and to the sixth; Marsilius in the First Book, question 21, article 3, doubt 4.[657] It is gathered moreover from Augustine, Book 5 on the Trinity, chapter 11, where he writes thus: "Yet that Holy Spirit, who is not the Trinity, but is understood in the Trinity, in that He is predicated 'Spirit,' is said relatively, since He is referred both to the Father and to the Son, because the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; but the relation itself does not appear in this name; it does, however, appear where He is called the Gift of God; for it is the gift of the Father and of the Son; and a giver of a gift, when we say it, we say relatively and truly toward one another."[658] Therefore, according to Augustine's mind, not only is the relation of Spirit to the Father and the Son the very ratio of gift; rather, it is expressed more by the name "gift" than by the name "Spirit."

And in Book 4 on the Trinity, chapter 20, after the middle, he says: "And this is for the Holy Spirit to be the gift of God: to proceed from the Father, and to be sent, and to be given."[659] He uses, therefore, indifferently for the same thing "to be gift" and "to proceed from the Father": but "to proceed from the Father" is a property of the Holy Spirit: therefore the ratio of gift is also His personal property. And St. Thomas, in the place alleged from the First Book of the Sentences, says that in the procession of the Holy Spirit there is the ratio by which He is God and gift. But let this be explained more exactly and the arguments of Scotus more easily dissolved.

It must be noted that in the notion of gift there is contained a respect to creatures, just as also in the notion of word. Wherefore, in the same way, that will be the property of the Holy Spirit as this is the property of the Son. Now this is how the property of the second person is constituted, according to what was noted in Disputation 143, especially chapter 6: namely, that before it actually denotes a respect to creatures, even possible ones, it constitutes the person; or at least, in everyone's opinion, before it actually regards future creatures, of which nevertheless He is called the word. Therefore, just as "word" is constituted in the property of word before it is actually the word of creatures, by this alone that it is the word of the Father, and is of such a kind in itself by

656. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 2.

657. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1, a. 4; St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 5; Capreolus, In I Sent., d. 18, q. unica, ad arg. 1 secundi ordinis, ad 2, ad 6; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 3, dub. 4.

658. St. Augustine, De Trinitate V, c. 11.

659. St. Augustine, De Trinitate IV, c. 20.

property, that although creatures be only possible or future, it is yet their word; so in the same way the Holy Spirit is constituted in the ratio of gift by personal property, not inasmuch as He actually includes a respect to creatures, even possible ones: for this respect is of reason, as is more explicitly explained in Disputation 104, chapter 6; and by this ratio, from such an "to be" from the Father and the Son by love, even if creatures are only possible, He can be said to be given. Wherefore the property of the Holy Spirit will not be formally, absolutely, the "gift" by express ratio of gift; but, according to a logical distinction and according to the ratio of the gift, that is, according to the foundation of the gift, which is such a love produced, it will be His property. And in this I truly hold that the Holy Spirit is that by which He is gift, by that by which He is Spirit. By this principle, the arguments of Scotus reported in the first chapter are all easily dissolved.

Caput III - Corollaries of the preceding doctrine

From what has been said it may first be gathered in what sense one may say that the Holy Spirit by His procession is a gift, as Scotus noted in the First Book, distinction 18, question 1, to the fifth: for to one and the same belong both the name and, as it were, the signification which is the relation resulting from origin. Therefore, if He be conceived as origin, by His procession He is gift: because in that way of speaking...

From what has been said it may first be gathered in what sense it can be said, "the Holy Spirit by procession is gift." For, as Scotus noted in the First Book, distinction 18, question 1, to the fifth, "procession" is a common name, and signifies both origin and the relation (relatio) which results from origin.[660] Therefore, if it be taken for origin, it is not rightly said, "the Holy Spirit by procession is gift": because this mode of speaking denotes, as it were, the effect of procession in the genus of formal cause (causa formalis), and the Holy Spirit is not gift, nor spirit, by the procession itself as by a form: for origin does not give a person existence as a form does, and therefore it is not a constitutive property - as we shall say in Disputation 158, chapter 4. Yet it can rightly be said that the Holy Spirit has the effect by procession: because in this manner of speaking there is denoted not only the effect of procession in the genus of formal cause, but it can also be signified as it were in the genus of efficient cause (causa efficiens); and since the Holy Spirit receives by origin the things which He has, therefore by procession, thus taken, He is said to have the notion of gift. But if "procession" be taken for relation, it is rightly said, "by procession He is gift," that is, by His personal property as by a form - just as by procession He is Spirit.

Second, it follows in what way the Holy Spirit is said to be our gift. St. Bonaventure, in the First Book, distinction 18, question 6, lays down this rule: that the particle "our" is predicated of those things which are in God with some respect to us, either according to the habitude of a cause or of relation.[661] On this ground God is called "our God," because He bestows life on us: for this reason indeed Θεός in Greek is said as it were "bestowing life," as was said in Disputation 58. Likewise the third person is called "our spirit" by reason of the relation by which He regards us; because He is breathed to us, or rather, as I judge, because He is said to inspire in us good works, that is, to move us to good works. And although this effect is common to the whole Trinity, nevertheless it is attributed to the Holy Spirit by appropriation, as are the other works of grace. But if one were to say "our spirit" because He is breathed to us, one would also have to say "our Holy Spirit": which, however, cannot be said, as St. Thomas noted in the place just cited: in this same way God is called "our Father."[662]

660. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1, ad 5.
661. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 6.

St. Bonaventure then notes that this order of relation, by reason of which God is called "our spirit" or "our Father," can be twofold: first, as that of our possession (possessio), in which respect the spirit too can be called our gift, because He is possessed by us; then as a relation of another mode, and so God is called "our God" and "our Father." Although the Son of God is said to be born and given to us, nevertheless He cannot be called "our Son," but "our gift": yet on a different ground than the Holy Spirit; because the Son cannot be said to be anyone's by reason of possession, but by reason of relation, just as of the Father; but "gift" is said by reason of possession.

Another rule is handed down by St. Thomas, in the First Book, distinction 16, question 1, article 5, which differs little or nothing from the former: namely, that those things are called "ours" which are in God and denote respect to us either of end (causa finalis) or of efficient cause; but the rest are not called "ours."[663] Marsilius follows this rule in the First Book, question 21, article 3, doubt 2, and the Canariensis at the end of his commentary.[664] On this ground God is called "our good," inasmuch as He is signified as end; He is also called "our Lord," "our creator," etc. From this rule St. Thomas excludes abstract predicates. For this reason we do not say that the divine essence is "ours"; and although we say "God is our justice" and "our wisdom," on account of the habitude of efficient cause, nevertheless we do not say "the justice of God is our justice," "the wisdom of God is our wisdom." Moreover, St. Thomas notes in article two, to the first objection, that the Holy Spirit is then only said to be "our gift" when He is actually given to us, although He is called "gift" from eternity, because He can be given: for the particle "our" denotes being actually possessed by us; but Scotus judges that he too is called "ours" who can be given to us.[665]

Third, from what has been said there follows the true interpretation of the words of St. Thomas in the second article of this question, when he proves that the Holy Spirit proceeds as gift from the fact that He proceeds as love. For although "love" is an essential name common to the three persons - God is charity - yet here it is taken by St. Thomas for love breathed and produced (amor spiratus et productus); and thus he rightly proves that He is gift: for if He proceeds as love, it follows that His procession is a "dilection"; but "dilection" by its very nature is a "donation," as we proved in the preceding disputation, chapter 2: therefore this produced love, by its own property and by the force of its own procession, proceeds as gift. This is the mind of St. Thomas, which in my judgment neither Cajetan, in the second article, in the third solution which he applies to Aureolus's argument, nor the Canariensis in the second part of his commentary, attained, when

662. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, q. 38, a. 2 ad 1.
663. St. Thomas, In I Sent., d. 16, q. 1, a. 5.
664. Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 3, dub. 2; Canariensis (Peter of Aquila), In I Sent., in fine commentarii.
665. Scotus, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1.

they assert that in that place "love" is used by St. Thomas neither essentially nor personally, but abstractly, so that the sense is: "the Holy Spirit proceeds as love," that is, in the manner of love. Therefore they did not rightly understand the holy Doctor: for in that way he would only prove that the Holy Spirit proceeds to a likeness of a gift, not however truly as gift.

[On the proper name "Gift" of the Holy Spirit]

But Aureolus, as quoted by Capreolus in the First Book, distinction 18, question unica, in the arguments against the third conclusion against the holy Doctor, first argues as follows: the Holy Spirit is not the same gift as He is love: for He is the love whereby He is God; but He is not the same gift as He is God: for God is both love by essence, and gift by property: therefore St. Thomas ill infers, from the fact that He proceeds as love, that He is gift. But from what has been said the reply is: the Holy Spirit is that produced love whereby He is gift, namely, by personal property; and of this love St. Thomas is speaking, as was said above.

He argues second: for St. Thomas in the first article did not say that the Holy Spirit proceeds as love, but as an impression; how then in the second article, so as to prove that He is gift, does he assume that He proceeds as love? Cajetan well replies that to proceed as an impression - namely, of the will - and to proceed as love are the same: for want of names we now speak in one way, now in another.

He argues third: for "love" is taken either essentially or notionally. If essentially, St. Thomas does not from that prove the Holy Spirit to be gift by the force of His procession, because love, in that respect, is common to the three persons. If however it be taken notionally, it follows that the Holy Spirit has a peculiar kind of causality toward creatures: for since He is the first gift which can be given to creatures, He will be the cause on account of which the other things are given by God; but this seems absurd, since all efficacy ad extra is common to the whole Trinity.

Cajetan thinks this argument has been satisfied by his doctrine, which I reported above; but it did not approve itself to us. Then Capreolus replies that love there is taken notionally; yet it does not follow that there is for the Holy Spirit a peculiar efficacy toward creatures by reason of this notional love, because the whole account of causing is essence, which is common. But since whatever God operates He effects through will, therefore (says Capreolus) it is necessary that God should first have in Himself the form of things in the intellect through His Word, and through love in the will, which is the Holy Spirit; which are not diverse causes, but diverse notions in the same cause: and in this way there agrees to the Holy Spirit a certain special ratio of cause toward creatures.

St. Bonaventure, however, in the First Book, distinction 18, question 1, and Marsilius in the First, question 21, article 2, say that the Holy Spirit is the first gift, because He is always given in the other gifts that make one pleasing [to God], or because He is the exemplary cause of the other gifts; or finally, Marsilius adds, because He is "subauthoritatively" the cause of the other gifts, that is, He receives from another to be the cause of the other gifts: for that is what the particle "subauthoritatively" denotes.[666] But a much better and easier reason can be given, in accordance with what was said in the preceding disputation, why the Holy Spirit is the first gift: namely, that by the force of His origin He has substantially the property of gift; whereas to others, whether to creatures or to the divine persons, the notion of gift belongs denominatively, and not by the force of their origin. The reasons of St. Bonaventure and of Marsilius do not so exactly explain the notion of "first gift": both because, with the other gifts, there is not only given the Holy Spirit, but also another person, although in the appropriation of the gifts of grace it is said in a peculiar manner that the Holy Spirit is given; and also, because thus the Son too has from another to be the cause of the other gifts, just as the Holy Spirit.

666. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., d. 18, q. 1; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 2.

It remained here for us to dispute whether the notion of gift is a peculiar notion distinct from procession: but about this enough and more than enough has been said in Disputation 137, chapter 3.

Quaestio XXXIX - On the persons as referred to the essence

After the things that concern the divine persons have been treated absolutely, it remains to consider the persons in comparison to the essence (essentia), to the properties, and to the notional acts, and in the comparison of the persons among themselves.

Articulus I - Whether in God the essence is the same as the person

Whether in God the essence is the same as the person. Ad ...

... yet this does not suffice. It is said notionally; nevertheless it does not follow that there belongs to the Holy Spirit a peculiar efficacy with respect to creatures on account of this notional love, because the whole ratio of effecting is the essence, which is common. Moreover, because whatever God operates, he effects through the will, therefore it is necessary (says Capreolus) that God should first have in himself the form of things in the intellect through his Word, and through love in the will, which is the Holy Spirit; which are not different causes, but different notions in the same cause: and for this reason there agrees to the Holy Spirit a certain special ratio of cause with respect to creatures.[667]

This solution pleases me less; for the efficacy and power of God concerning creatures, of themselves on the side of the principle, also demand the notion of cause, a certain procession within God himself: for every creature goes forth from God, insofar as he is essence and omnipotent; therefore the Holy Spirit is not the first gift because he has a peculiar ratio of cause with respect to creatures upon whom other gifts are conferred.

But St. Bonaventure, in I Sent., dist. 18, question; and Marsilius, in I, question 21, article 2, say that the Holy Spirit is the first gift, because he is given in the other gifts that make one pleasing, or because he is the exemplary cause of the other gifts; or finally, Marsilius adds, that he is the cause of the other gifts subauthoritatively, that is, he receives from another to be the cause of those gifts - for that is denoted by the particle "subauthoritatively."[668] But a far truer and easier account can be given, according to the foregoing in the preceding disputation, why the Holy Spirit is the first gift: namely, because by the force of his origin he has substantially the property of gift; whereas to others, whether creatures, or to the divine persons to whom he is given, the notion of gift belongs denominatively, and by reason of his origin the name of "Gift" agrees to him.

667. Capreolus.

Moreover, the reasons of St. Bonaventure and Marsilius do not so exactly explain the ratio of the first gift: both because together with the other gifts not only is the Holy Spirit given, but also the other persons, although in the appropriation of the gifts of grace only the Holy Spirit is said to be given in a peculiar mode; and also because the Son has from another to be the cause of the other gifts, just as the Holy Spirit.

It further remained here that we should dispute whether the ratio of gift were a peculiar notion distinct from procession; but of this enough and more than enough has been said in disputation 137, chapter 3.

On the persons as referred to the essence

After the things that concern the divine persons have been treated absolutely, it remains to consider the persons in comparison to the essence (essentia), to the properties, and to the notional acts, and in the comparison of the persons among themselves.

Whether in God the essence is the same as the person

It is objected:

1. It seems that in the divine things the essence is not the same as the person. For in whatever things the essence is the same as the person, or supposit, it must be that there is only one supposit of one nature, as is evident in all separated substances. For things which are the same in reality cannot be multiplied unless the rest also be multiplied. But in the divine things there is one essence and three persons, as is clear from what was said above. Therefore the essence is not the same as the person.
2. Moreover, affirmation and negation are not verified of the same thing. But affirmation and negation are verified of essence and person: for the person is distinct, but the essence is not distinct. Therefore person and essence are not the same.
3. Moreover, nothing is subjected to itself. But the person is subjected to the essence. Whence it is named supposit or hypostasis. Therefore the person is not the same as the essence.

But on the contrary: St. Augustine says in De Trinitate: "When we say the person of the Father, we say nothing else than the substance of the Father."[669]

668. St. Bonaventure, In I Sent., dist. 18; Marsilius of Inghen, In I Sent., q. 21, a. 2.
669. St. Augustine, De Trinitate VII, 6.

I answer: Considering the divine simplicity, this question has the truth in manifold ways. For it was said above that the divine simplicity requires this, that in God there be the same thing essence and supposit, which in intellectual substances is nothing else than person. But a difficulty seems to arise, because when the divine persons are multiplied, the essence retains unity. And because, as Boethius says, Relation multiplies persons; some posited that in this way the essence and the person differ in the divine things, the relations of which they said to be "assisting," considering in relations only that they are toward another, and not that they are things. But (as was shown above), just as relations in created things are accidentally inherent, so in God they are the very divine essence. Whence it follows that in God there is not something other than the essence which is the person according to reality, and yet that the persons are really distinguished from one another: for the person (as was said above) signifies the relation, insofar as it is subsistent (subsistens) in the divine nature. But relation, compared to the essence, does not differ in reality, but only according to reason; compared, however, to the opposite relation, by the force of opposition it has real distinction. And thus there remains one essence and three persons.[670]

Reply to the first: In creatures there cannot be a distinction of supposits through relations, but it must be through essential principles, because relations are not subsistent in creatures. In the divine things, however, relations are subsistent. Therefore, according as they have opposition among themselves, they can distinguish supposits; yet the essence is not distinguished, because the relations themselves are not distinguished from the essence according to reality, inasmuch as they are really the same with the essence.

Reply to the second: Inasmuch as essence and person in the divine things differ according to the ratio of the understanding, it follows that something can be affirmed of the one which is denied of the other: and consequently that, one supposit being posited, another is not posited.

Reply to the third: We impose names upon divine things according to the mode of created things, as was said above. And because the natures of created things are individuated through matter which is subjected to the specific nature, hence it is that individuals are called subjects or supposits or hypostases. And for this reason also the divine person is called supposit or hypostasis; not that there be there some supposition or subjection according to which it is named in created things.

