COMMENTARIA IN IV LIB - ROS SENTENTIARUM

Commentary on the Four Books of the Sentences of Peter Lombard

Albert the Great (c. 1200–1280), Doctor Universalis

Albert's commentary on the four books of the Sentences of Peter Lombard, composed at Paris c. 1243–1249, is the foundation upon which the entire scholastic enterprise of the high thirteenth century rests. Within these articles Albert lays the program that his pupil Thomas Aquinas would inherit and extend.

English edition dated April 27, 2026.

Translated from the Latin (Paris: Vivès & Borgnet, 1894, vols. 25–30, with the LombardPress critical apparatus).

- Articulus 5 — Whether Every Known Truth Is Inspired By The Holy Spirit
- Articulus 6 — Whether One Errs More Dangerously In The Matter Concerning The Trinity
- Articulus 7 — Whether Nothing More Fruitful Is Found Than In The Matter Concerning The Trinity
- Articulus 8 — What Is Better Said Of The Father, Son, And Holy Spirit: That They Are One, Or That He Is One
- Articulus 9 — Whether It Is Better To Say, "The One, The Father; The Other, The Son," Or "One And Another"
- Articulus 10 — Whether In This Science One Ought First To Proceed By Authorities
- Articulus 11 — Whether "God" Is A Name Of Nature
- Articulus 12 — Who Said To Moses, "I Am Who Am," The Nature Or A Divine Person
- Articulus 13 — Whether "He Who Is" Is A Proper Name Of God
- Articulus 14 — Whether "He Who Is" Is First Among The Divine Names
- Articulus 15 — Whether "Lord" Is A Name Of Power
- Articulus 16 — Whether God Is Nameable By Us
- Articulus 17 — By What Is God Named, Whether By Everything Which It Is Better To Be Than Not To Be
- Articulus 18 — Whether The Image Supposits For The Essence Or The Persons
- Articulus 19 — Whether Numerical Terms In Divine Matters Posit Anything

Articulus 20 — Why In Other Beings The Number Of Nature Follows The Number Of Hypostases, And Does Not Follow In The Divine

Articulus 21 — Whether All Things Were Made In One Principle, Or In Diverse Principles, As The Manichees Say

Articulus 22 — Whether This Name, "God," Has A Plural

Articulus 23 — Whether David Is The Greatest Of The Prophets

Articulus 24 — Whether Possession, Conception, Parturition, Etc., Are Fittingly Attributed To Divine Wisdom, Which The Wise Man Attributes To It

Articulus 25 — How Is This Understood Which Is Said, "You, Bethlehem"

Articulus 26 — How The Four Authorities Concerning The Holy Spirit Differ

Articulus 27 — When It Is Said, "In The Name Of The Father, And Of The Son, And Of The Holy Spirit," What Does "In The Name" There Mean, Essence Or Person

Articulus 28 — Whether These Pronouns Mark Some Distinction When It Is Said, "From Him, And Through Him, And In Him"

Distinctio III

Articulus 1 — Whether The Philosophers Knew That God Is One

Articulus 2 — What It Is That They Have Known About God

Articulus 3 — Whether This Natural Knowledge Differs From The Knowledge Of Faith

Articulus 4 — Whether The Attributes In God Are One Or Many

Articulus 5 — Whether By The Creature Of The World Man Ought To Be Understood

Articulus 6 — That A First Cause Is Granted

Articulus 7 — That A Creature Cannot Create

Articulus 8 — That God Is Incorporeal And Immutable

Articulus 9

Articulus 10 — On Another Mode Of Knowing God

Articulus 11 — Whether Prime Matter Is Nothing

Articulus 12 — Whether Eternity Is Argued From Perpetuity, And Infinity From The Magnitude Of Power

Articulus 13 — To Whom Properly Belongs Knowledge Through The Trace, Whether To Man Only

Articulus 14 — What The Trace Is, And Whether Knowledge Through The Trace Is Useful

Articulus 15 — On The Parts Of The Trace, Which Are Unity, Form, And Order: Whether They Are Fittingly Assigned

Articulus 16 — What Is The Rationale For The Enumeration Of The Diverse Traces

Articulus 17 — On The Attributes Of The Persons Which Are Attributed To Them By The Master

Articulus 18 — Whether The Philosophers Were Able To Know The Trinity

Articulus 19 — What The Image Is

Articulus 20 — What Things Constitute The Image

Articulus 21 — In What, As In A Subject, The Image Is Contained

Articulus 22 — With Respect To Which Object Or Knowable The Image Is

Articulus 23 — To Know Whether It Is Understood Of Natural Knowledge Or Of The Knowledge Of Grace

Articulus 25 — Whether The Image Can Be Lost

Articulus 26 — Whether The Parts Of The Image Are Imprinted By The Whole Trinity Or By The Distinct Persons

Articulus 27 — How These Five Differ In Order, To Know Oneself, To Understand Oneself, To Will Oneself, To Discern Oneself, And To Think Oneself

Articulus 28 — Whether Memory And Intelligence Are Relatives, As Is Said In The Text

Articulus 29 — Whether Memory Is Always In The Intellect And Will, And The Intellect In Memory And Will, And The Will In Memory And Intellect

Articulus 30 — He Shows The Equality Of These Powers, Memory, Will, And Intellect

Articulus 31 — Whether These Three, Memory, Intelligence, Will, Can Be Called Wholes

Articulus 32 — Whether It Is True What The Master Says, "Whatever I Remember And Understand, This I Will"; And Whether The Evils Which We Understand, We Will

Articulus 33 — Whether The Soul According To Substance Is Composite

Articulus 34 — Whether The Soul Is Its Own Power

Articulus 35 — Why It Is Not Granted That The Three Persons Are Of One God, As It Is Granted That They Are Of One Substance Or Essence

Articulus 36 — How These Three In Which The Image Is Differ From The Three Assigned Above

Articulus 37 — Whether It Is Thus In These As In The Divine Persons, That One Proceeds From Another, For Instance, Intelligence From Memory, And

Will From Both, Just As The Son From The Father, And The Spirit From Both

Articulus 38 — Whether One Of The Powers Necessarily Presupposes Another For Itself, And One Of The Habits Presupposes Another For Itself, And One Of The Acts Is Before Another

Articulus 39 — Whether These Three, Mind, Knowledge, Love, Together With The Knowing Being, Are One Substance And Essence

Distinctio IV

Articulus 1 — Whether God Begot Himself As God, Or Another God

Articulus 2 — What Generation Is

Articulus 3 — Whether It Befits God To Beget

Articulus 4 — Whether To Beget Befits The Heavenly Father Primarily, And Inferiors Secondarily, Or Conversely

Articulus 5 — Whether God Begot God Himself, Or Another God

Articulus 6 — How Those Terms Supposit When It Is Said, God From God, Light From Light, Light From Light

Articulus 7

Articulus 8 — Whether A Proposition Can Be Formed About God

Articulus 9 — Whether In Divine Things Essence Ought To Be Subjected Or Predicated, Or Whether Both Can Rightly Be Done

Articulus 10 — Whether This Is True, One God Is Three Persons, And Three Persons Is One God, God Is Trinity; And Whether The Name Trinity Is An Essential Name

Articulus 11 — Whether This Article Of Faith Alone Is Sufficient For The Christian

Distinctio V

Articulus 1 — How Essence Is Related To The Generation Of The Son, Whether By Way Of Being Communicable Through Generation And Procession

Articulus 2 — Whether Essence Is Begotten By The Father, And Whether In Divine Things There Are Two Things, The Relative And The Non-Relative, Namely Essence And Person

Articulus 3 — Whether In Divine Things Essence Is Prior To Generation, Or Subsequent, Or Concomitant According To The Intellect

Articulus 4 — Whether In Divine Things It Can Be Said That The Father Is The Cause Of The Son

Articulus 5 — Whether, If The Son Were Begotten By The Divine Essence, The Son Would Be Some Thing By Which He Would Be Begotten

Articulus 6 — In Which Names By Which The Divine Persons Are Named There Is Greater Propriety, And In Which Less

Articulus 7 — Whether The Son Is Well Said To Be Counsel From Counsel, And Will From Will

Articulus 8 — Which Act The Verb "He Received" Connects, Whether Notional Or Essential

Articulus 9 — Whether, When The Master Says, "He Transferred Into The Kingdom Of Charity," The Word "Charity" Joins Notional Love Or Essential Love

Articulus 10 — Whether It Can Be Said, "The Son Is From Nothing"; And Similarly, "The Father Is From Nothing"

Distinctio VI

Articulus 1 — Whether God Begot The Son From Necessity And Will

Articulus 2 — Whether God, Willing Or Unwilling, Begot The Son

Articulus 3 — Whether These Authorities Of The Saints Are True, Who Say That He Begot The Son By Will

Distinctio VII

Articulus 1 — Whether The Father Could Have Or Willed To Beget The Son

Articulus 2 — Whether The Power To Beget Is To Something, Or Something

Articulus 3 — On The Things And With Respect To Which The Divine Power Is, Whether With Respect To Subjects Only

Articulus 4 — Whether The Power Is Univocal To The Ability To Beget And The Ability To Create

Articulus 5 — Whether The Son Can From Himself Beget Another Son, A Grandson Of The Father, And Whether The Father Can Beget Many Sons

Articulus 6 — Whether The Three Hypostases Can Be The Father Of Some Fourth

Articulus 7 — Whether Because The Son Could Be Born, He Could Also Be Changed

Articulus 8 — How "Non Enim Non Potuit" Is Understood

Articulus 9 — Whether The Father By Nature Is Able To Beget The Son

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same Power By Which The Father Could Beget, And By Which The Son Be Begotten

Articulus 11 — Whether That Is True, The Son Has The Power Of Generating Which The Father Has

Distinctio VIII

Articulus 1 — What Truth Is, What Property, And What Incommutability

Articulus 2 — According To What Are Truth, Incommunicability, And Simplicity Taken

Articulus 3 — Whether The Names Said Of God, Such As Essence, Substance, Knowledge, Wisdom, Goodness, Signify The Same Or Different Things; And Whether They Ought To Be Called Synonyms Or Not

Articulus 4 — How The Composition Of These Names With God, Who Is Not Composite, Can Be Verified

Articulus 5 — What The Difference Is Between The Attributes Of The Names Divine Nature, Substance, And Essence

Articulus 6 — Whether Wisdom Is Said From Sapere

Articulus 7 — Whether Being Is Said Of God And His Creatures Univocally; And Whether According To Intension And Remission Being Is Said Of God And Creatures

Articulus 8 — Whether The Definitions Of Eternity Given By The Authors Are Good

Articulus 9 — What Is Eternal, And Whether The Pains Of Hell Can Be Called Eternal, And Whether Years And Times Can Be Called Eternal

Articulus 10 — What It Is To Be In Eternity

Articulus 11 — Whether Creatures Compared To The Creator Are Said To Be As It Were Not To Be

Articulus 12 — Whether Words Co-Signifying Differences Of Time, Such As "Was" And "Will Be," Can Be Said Of God, And Of All Creatures; Afterwards It Is Asked About What Is Said: Of That Of Which It Is Said "Was," It Is Not, Etc

Articulus 13 — Whether The Now Of Eternity And The Now Of Time Are The Same; And Whether The Now Of Eternity And Eternity Differ

Articulus 14 — Whether These Words, "Is," "Was," And "Will Be," Befit God Separately Or Together, And Which Difference Of Time Most Especially Befits The Eternal God

Articulus 15 — Whether Being Is Proper To God Alone, And Accidental To Others; And What Subsisting Truth Is, And Enduring Cause, And The Property Of The Natural Kind

Articulus 16 — What Incommutability Is, And Whether Any Change Occurs In God

Articulus 17 — Whether God Moves Himself

Articulus 18 — Whether The Divine Substance, And Universally Every Form, Can Be The Subject Of No Accident

Articulus 19 — Whether God Alone Has Immortality, What Immortality Is, And What Are Said To Live And To Die

Articulus 20 — What Is Called Shadowed Vicissitude, And Whether It Befits Every Creature

Articulus 21 — Whether To Be Moved Through Times Is To Be Changed Through Affections, Or Through Apprehensions Of The Speculative Intellect

Articulus 22 — Whether The Divine Nature Is Simple, Or Composed Of That By Which It Is And That Which It Is

Articulus 23 — It Is Asked, Since Composition Is Manifold, Why The Master Touches Only The Threefold, Namely Of Parts, Of Accidents, And Of Forms

Articulus 24 — Whether The Nature Of God Alone Is Simple

Articulus 25 — Whether The Rational Soul Is Simple Or Composite

Articulus 26 — Whether The Soul Is Whole In The Whole Body, And Whole In Each Part

Articulus 27 — Whether The Soul Is Well Demonstrated To Be Composite On Account Of Its Accidents

Articulus 28 — Whether It Follows Well: The Divine Essence Is Simple, Therefore Immutable

Articulus 29 — How God Is Named Something Symbolically

Articulus 30 — Whether There Can Be Accidents In God, And Whether He Causes Them

Articulus 31 — Whether The Nine Predicaments Of Accidents, Both According To Genera And According To Species, Can Be Attributed To God; And Whether God Can Be Understood As Good Without A Quality

Articulus 32 — Whether The Predicament Of Substance Can Be Attributed To God, Such That God Is In The Predicament Of Substance

Articulus 33 — Whether Hilary Well Touches Upon Every Mode Of Composition By The Four Which Are Set Forth In The Text

Articulus 34 — Whether Relation Can Be In God With His Simplicity Preserved

Articulus 35 — Why, Since There Are Many Attributes Of The Divine Essence, Does The Master Determine Only Concerning Three, Simplicity, Identity, And Unity

Distinctio IX

Articulus 1 — Whether Eternity Is The Divine Essence

Articulus 2 — How Eternity Is Understood To Be Adjacent To The Procession Of The Persons

Articulus 3 — How Eternity Is Distinguished From Aevum And Time, And Whether Some Non-Living Things Are Measured By Aevum, And Whether Aevum Is In One As Eternity And Time Are

Articulus 4 — Whether The Son Is Other Than The Father

Articulus 5 — Whether The Father Is Before The Son

Articulus 6 — Whether It Is Rightly Said, The Son Began Because He Has A Principle

Articulus 7 — Whether It Can Be Said That The Son Is Coeternal With The Father, And Whether In Divine Things There Is Anything Adjectival, And Whether, As We Say, The Father And The Son Are Two Persons, So We Can Say That The Father And The Son Are Two Gods, Two Wise Ones

Articulus 8 — What The Difference Is Between Lumen, Lux, Splendor, Ray, Reflection Of The Ray, Of The Splendor, And Of The Light; And Whether The Example Of The Splendor Is Fitting, Etc

Articulus 9 — Whether The Father Is Wise By Begotten Wisdom, Namely, The Son As Object

Articulus 10 — Whether The Argument Of Augustine Which The Master Brings Forward Treats Of Begotten Or Unbegotten Wisdom

Articulus 11 — On The Word Of Ambrose: First He Was, And Afterwards He Became Father

Articulus 12 — Whether The Divine Generation Can Be Known Or Signified

Articulus 13 — Whether Angels Speak

Articulus 14 — Whether Angels Speak All Things

Articulus 15 — Whether All Angels Speak To All, Or Certain Ones To Certain Ones, And Whether Distance Can Make For Them An Impediment To Speech As With Us

Articulus 16 — Whether Angels In Their Speakings And Hearings Use Tongues, Ears, Or Certain Organs

Articulus 17 — Whether It Is Permitted To Scrutinize The Supernal Mysteries

Articulus 18 — Whether The Generation Of The Son From The Father Is Finite Or Infinite

Articulus 19 — Whether The Son Can Always Be Said Born And Begotten; And What The Three Tenses Denote In The Participle, The Verb, And The Adverb, When It Is Said, The Son Is Always Born

Articulus 20 — Whether The Generation Of The Son From Mary The Virgin Is From The Father Or From The Whole Trinity

Articulus 21 — Whether The Son Is Always Begotten By The Father, As Splendor From Light

Articulus 22 — Whether Only The Living Is Born From The Living

Articulus 23 — Whether What The Master Says Is Truer, Not From Derivation But From Power

Articulus 24 — How It Is Understood When He Says, That It Is The Image Of Innascibility

Distinctio X

Articulus 1 — How The Names Which Are Attributed To The Holy Spirit Differ, Love, Dilection, Charity

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds As Love, And Whether Charity In Man And Angel Is A Habit Of The Will

Articulus 3 — Whether The Word Properly Belongs To The Son

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Properly Named Charity

Articulus 5 — Whether Wisdom Is Not Proper, But Only Appropriable

Articulus 6 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is The Love By Which The Father And The Son Love Themselves And Us, And Also By Which We Love God

Articulus 7 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Father Into The Son, And Is Reflected From The Son Into The Father, So That He Is The Love Of The Son For The Father, And Of The Father For The Son; And Whether This Is A True Locution: The Father And The Son Love Themselves By The Holy Spirit, And The Father Loves Himself By The Holy Spirit, And The Father And The Son Love Themselves With The Love Which Is The Holy Spirit

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is The Unity Of The Father And The Son, And How The Holiness Of Each

Articulus 9 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Called The Middle Person

Articulus 10 — How The Father And The Son Are United In A Twofold Way

Articulus 11 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Something Common To The Father And The Son

Articulus 12 — Whether There Can Be More Divine Persons Than Three

Articulus 13 — How This Name Spirit Specially Suits The Holy Spirit, And How Holy Is Said

Distinctio XI

Articulus 1 — What It Is To Proceed

Articulus 2 — Whether Proceeding Belongs Univocally To The Son And To The Holy Spirit, And Why Procession Is Added To Spiration Rather Than To Generation

Articulus 3 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Father And The Son Insofar As They Are One Or Many

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father And The Son Are United Insofar As They Are The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, By Essence, Or By Notion, Or By Person

Articulus 5 — How The Spirative Power Is In The Father And The Son, And Whether It Is One In The Three, And How The Spirative Power And The Generative Power Differ

Articulus 6 — It Is Asked Concerning The Controversy Of The Greeks And The Latins On The Procession Of The Holy Spirit, Whether He Proceeds From The Father Only, As The Greeks Say, Or From The Father And The Son, As The Latins Say

Articulus 7 — What It Is To Be Contrary To Sacred Scripture

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is The Same To Say The Spirit Is Of The Son, And The Spirit Is From The Son

Articulus 9 — Why The Latins Dared To Add To The Creed Issued In The Council, Who Proceeds From The Father And The Son, Since The Greeks Were Not Called To This, Nor Was A Council Convened

Articulus 10 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Son As Word, Or As Love

Distinctio XII

Articulus 1 — Whether The Holy Spirit Immediately Proceeds From Both

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds First From The Father Rather Than From The Son

Articulus 3 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds More Fully From The Father Than From The Son

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds More Principally From The Father Than From The Son

Articulus 5 — How The Holy Spirit Is Said To Proceed From The Father In Different Ways: Principally, Properly, And Per Se

Articulus 7 — Whether Whatever The Son Has, He Has From The Father Through Generation

Distinctio XIII

Articulus 1 — What Is The Difference Between Generation And Procession In The Divine

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be The Son Of Both From Whom He Proceeds

Articulus 3 — Whether Procession Is Of The Notion Of Generation And Spiration, And Why The Name Procession Pertains More To The Holy Spirit Than To The Son

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is From The Father Not As Born, But As Given Or As A Gift, And Whether The Son Proceeds As A Gift

Articulus 5 — Whether The Twelve Modes Of Generation Posited By The Heretic Arius Are Sufficiently Posited, And Whether Others Are Also To Be Added

Articulus 6 — Whether This Is To Be Granted, That The Father Is The Author That The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Son, And That The Father Is The Author Of The Son's Filiation, And That He Is The Author Of The Essence In The Son

Articulus 7 — Whether The Inference Is Valid: The Spirit Proceeds Temporally From The Son; Therefore From Eternity

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Unbegotten

Articulus 9 — Whether Not To Be From Another Is A Notion Of The Father, And Whether The Father And The Son Can Be Said To Be The Same Principle Of The Holy Spirit

Articulus 10 — What 'Unbegotten' Predicates When It Is Said, 'The Holy Spirit Is Unbegotten': Essence, Person, Or Notion; And By What Community, Namely Either Of Reason Or Of Thing, It Is Said Of The Father And The Son

Articulus 11 — Why 'To Be From Another' And 'For Another Not To Be From Him' Are Not Said To Be A Notion Of The Holy Spirit, And Why There Is No Emanation Of Essence

Distinctio XIV

Articulus 1 — What Temporal Procession Is

Articulus 2 — What Temporal Apparition Is

Articulus 3 — What It Is To Be Sent, And What Mission Is

Articulus 4 — What Giving Or Donation Is, And How They Differ

Articulus 5 — How Temporal Mission, Procession, Apparition, And Temporal Giving Differ From One Another

Articulus 6 — In How Many Ways Procession Or Mission Takes Place

Articulus 7 — What The Temporal Procession Adds Over And Above The Eternal

Articulus 8 — Whether The Master Here Determines Well Concerning The Temporal Mission

Articulus 9 — Whether The Procession Of The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Twofold, And Whether There Are Two

Articulus 10 — Whether The Procession Of The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Temporal

Articulus 11 — Whether Power Ought To Be Attributed To The Father Or To The Holy Spirit

Articulus 12 — How Often The Lord Sent The Holy Spirit, Whether Twice Or Thrice

Articulus 13 — Whether It Befits The Holy Spirit To Be Sent Or Given, And Why More Befittingly To The Holy Spirit Than To Another Person, And Why It Does Not Befit The Father To Be Sent As The Son And The Holy Spirit

Articulus 14 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Food And Drink

Articulus 15 — Whether, The Holy Spirit Not Being Present, The Father Can Infuse His Love

Articulus 16 — Whether Holy Men Can Give The Holy Spirit

Distinctio XV

Articulus 1 — Whether Mission And Giving Are Temporal And Eternal As Procession Is

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is God, And Also A Gift Or A Thing Given, And Whether The Holy Spirit Is Given By Himself

Articulus 3 — Whether No Gift Is Given Except The Holy Spirit, And Whether The Body Of Flesh Is Other Than Flesh

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father Can Do Something That The Holy Spirit Cannot

Articulus 5 — It Is Asked Whether Those Three Propositions Are True, Namely, 'The Spirit Sends Himself', 'The Spirit Is Sent By Himself', And 'The Spirit Proceeds From Himself'

Articulus 6 — Whether The Mission Of The Son Is More Manifest Than The Mission Of The Holy Spirit

Articulus 7 — Whether Each Divine Person Can Be Sent, And What These Words Mean, 'To Send' And 'To Be Sent'

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Said To Be Sent By The Very Fact That He Was Made

Articulus 9 — Whether It Befits The Holy Spirit To Send Or To Give The Son

Articulus 10 — Whether The Spirit Can Be Called The Spirit Of Christ, And In Christ

Articulus 11 — Whether This Is To Be Granted, 'The Trinity Sends Itself Or Gives Itself'; And Whether The Father Sends The Son, And The Son Sends Himself And The Spirit; And The Spirit Sends Himself And The Son; And Whether The Father, Son, And Holy Spirit Send The Son And The Holy Spirit

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is True That The Father Sanctified Christ

Articulus 13 — Whether The Son Can Be Said To Have Come From Himself

Articulus 14 — Why The Son Is Sent In Two Ways Rather Than The Holy Spirit

Articulus 15 — Whether The Eternal Generation Is Also A Mission

Articulus 16 — Whether The Son Is Sent Into Pious Souls, Or Only The Holy Spirit, And This With Grace Making One Pleasing, Or Without It

Articulus 17 — Whether Our Knowledge Is Of The Substance Of The Mission, Such That Knowledge Is Required For The Mission, And Whether Someone Without It Can Be Worthy Of Hatred Or Love

Articulus 18 — Whether The Holy Spirit Was Sent More Fully After The Incarnation Than Before, And Whether The Celibacy Of John Is To Be Preferred To The Marriage Of Abraham

Articulus 19 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Sent To The Angels

Articulus 20 — Whether The Soul, By The Mind Grasping What Is Eternal, Is Essentially In Heaven And Outside This World

Articulus 21 — Whether The Father Gives Himself, Or Is Given By Himself

Distinctio XVI

Articulus 1 — What It Is To Be Sent Visibly, And Whether There Was A Visible Mission In The Old Testament As In The New, And Whether The Father Can Be Sent As The Son

Articulus 2 — Whether Visible Mission Ought To Be Toward All Who Are Of The New Testament

Articulus 3 — Whether Mission Belongs To Grace Making One Pleasing, Or To Gratuitously Given Grace

Articulus 4 — Whether The Visible Mission Ought To Have Been Performed More Through The Son Than Through The Holy Spirit, Or Conversely

Articulus 5 — Why There Are Two Modes Of The Mission Of The Son And Of The Holy Spirit

Articulus 6 — Why The Son Appeared In A Creature United To Himself, And The Holy Spirit Did Not Appear In One United To Himself, And Whether That Dove In Which He Appeared Was A Natural Animal, And Concerning The Motion Of The Dove, What It Was Like

Articulus 7 — Why The Holy Spirit Is Sent To The Son, And Never The Son To The Holy Spirit

Articulus 8 — Why The Father Appeared Only In An Audible Sound, And Not In Another Bodily Species

Articulus 9 — Why The Holy Spirit Appeared Only In These Three Species: Of Tongues, Of A Dove, And Of Breath

Articulus 10 — Whether, Besides The Interior Invisible Mission, An Exterior Mission Was Necessary

Articulus 11 — Whether Christ, Insofar As He Is Man, Is Less Than The Father, And The Holy Spirit, And Himself

Articulus 12 — Whether An Angel Is Better Than Man Or Conversely

Articulus 13 — Whether The Father Can Be Said To Be Greater Than The Son, And The Son To Be Less Than The Father

Distinctio XVII

Articulus 1 — Whether The Charity By Which We Love God Is The Holy Spirit Or Some Created Habitual Gift

Articulus 2 — Whether The Son Could Be Sent In Such A Way That The Holy Spirit Is Not Sent

Articulus 3 — Whether One Who Loves His Neighbor Also Loves Love, And What Things Are To Be Loved Out Of Charity

Articulus 4 — Whether The Neighbor Whom We Love Is Less Known To Us Than Love Itself

Articulus 5 — Whether Someone Can Know In This Life That He Has Charity

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Be Seen By Us In This Life Through Himself Or Through A Species

Articulus 7 — Whether Charity Is The Greatest Of All The Gifts

Articulus 8 — Whether Patience Is The Substance Of God, And Whether Faith, Hope, Salvation, Patience Have Exemplars In God

Articulus 9 — Whether Charity Alone Divides Between The Sons Of The Kingdom And Of Perdition, And Whether With Every Increase Of Charity The Holy Spirit Is Said To Be Sent, And Whether He Is Sent In Gifts Other Than Charity

Articulus 10 — Whether Charity Can Be Increased Or Diminished

Articulus 11 — Whether The Spirit Was Given To Christ Not By Measure, So That His Grace Is Infinite

Articulus 12 — What Is Meant By This Which Is Said By Elisha, Let Your Spirit Be Double In Me

Distinctio XVIII

Articulus 1 — Whether Through The Gift Which Is The Holy Spirit All Other Gifts Are Given

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is One Notion Of Gift And Of The Given

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is Proper To The Holy Spirit To Be A Gift

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Called Holy Spirit In That He Is Gift, And Gift In That He Proceeds

Articulus 5 — Whether Gift Also Implies A Relation, Like Father And Son, Distinguishing The Holy Spirit From Both

Articulus 6 — Whether The Son Can Be Said To Be Given From Eternity

Articulus 7 — Whether This Is True: That The Son Received By Being Born, Or Has By Being Born, That He Is God, Or The Divine Essence

Articulus 8 — Whether This Is True: The Son Is God By Nativity

Articulus 9 — Whether These Three Are The Only Modes Of Generation: By Defection, Procession, And Derivation

Articulus 10 — With Which Divine Names This Pronoun, Our Or My, Can Be Conjoined

Distinctio XIX

Articulus 1 — Whether In The Divine There Can Be Equality

Articulus 2 — Since In The Divine There Is Likeness And Identity, Why Does The Master Not Treat Those As He Does Equality

Articulus 3 — In Respect Of What Equality Is Taken In The Divine

Articulus 4 — Whether Equality Belongs To The Three Persons, Such That Each Is Said To Be Equal To The Other

Articulus 5 — What These Names Signify, Equality And Equal, Likeness And Like; And Whether The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Can Be Called One Equality

Articulus 6 — Whether In Eternity There Are Years From Generation To Generation

Articulus 7 — Whether Three Persons Are Something Greater Than Two, And Two Than One

Articulus 8 — Whether The Father Can Be Said To Be In The Son, And One Person In Another

Articulus 9 — Whether The Son Adds Anything Beyond That Which He Received From The Father

Articulus 10 — Whether Everything That Is Born Is Born From A Double Kind, Namely Male And Female

Articulus 11 — Whence It Happens That Something Degenerates, And What Its Causes Are

Articulus 12 — Whether The Essence Is Predicated Of The Persons As A Certain Whole

Articulus 13 — Whether Faith Precedes The Intellect, Such That Nothing Is Understood Unless It Is First Believed

Articulus 14 — Whether In The Divine There Is A Communicable Notion Or An Incommunicable One

Articulus 15 — Whether In The Divine There Is The Universal And The Particular, As The Communicable And The Incommunicable

Articulus 16 — Whether In The Divine The Essence Is A Genus

Articulus 17 — Whether The Three Persons Differ Numerically In The Divine

Articulus 18 — Whether It Can Be Conceded That God Is Threefold

Articulus 19 — Whether In Corporeal Things One Can Be As Much As Three

Distinctio XX

Articulus 1 — Whether Power According To Every Kind Of Cause Is In God, Or Only According To Some Kind

Articulus 2 — Whether The Power Of Operating In The Divine Is Univocal With The Power Of Generating And Spirating

Articulus 3 — Whether In God The Power Of Spirating Is Prior To The Power Of Operating

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Alone Can As Much As The Father And The Son

Articulus 5 — Whether The Father, The Son, And The Holy Spirit Are Equal In Power

Articulus 6 — Whether God Willed But Could Not, Or Could But Did Not Will, To Make Creatures Better

Articulus 7 — Whether There Is Order In The Divine

Distinctio XXI

Articulus 1 — Whether Exclusive Terms Can Be Posited In The Divine

Articulus 2 — Whether This Is True, That The Father Alone Is God

Articulus 3 — Whether This Is True, The Father Is God Alone, And This, The Father Is One God Alone

Articulus 4 — Whether This Is True, The Trinity Is God Alone

Articulus 5 — Whether An Exclusive Term Added To The Father Excludes The Son, Etc

Articulus 6 — Whether This Is True, No One Knows The Father Except The Son

Distinctio XXII

Articulus 1 — Whether Every Name Said Of God Signifies A Property, Or The Essence, Or Is Said Of God By Transference

Articulus 2 — Whether Some Names Belong To God From Time, And Whether They Belong At Once To All, Or To Some And Not To Others, Etc

Articulus 3 — Whether In The Divine This Name "Trinity" Denotes A Plurality Of Persons And Is A Divine Name

Articulus 5 — Whether Negative And Privative Names Fall Under The Six Differences Of Names Which The Master Puts In The Text

Articulus 6 — Whether The Four Rules Concerning The Divine Names Are Well Assigned By The Master

Articulus 7 — Whether Augustine Says Well, One Great, Not Three Great Ones

Articulus 8 — Whether What Is Participated In The Divine Can Be Greater Than The Participant

Distinctio XXIII

Articulus 1 — Whether In The Divine There Is Or Can Be A Person

Articulus 2 — Whether Person In The Divine Signifies Substance Or Property

Articulus 3 — Why In The Divine We Say Three Persons, Not Three Substances

Articulus 4 — What These Names Signify According To The Greeks, nmodowmoy, ovalware, Srdotacic; And These According To The Latins, Essence, Subsistence, Substance, And Person

Articulus 5 — Whether This Name, Person, Is Common To Several, Namely To The Father, The Son, And The Holy Spirit

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Divine There Are Three Substances As There Are Three Persons

Articulus 7 — Whether In The Divine There Are Three Hypostases And One Essence

Articulus 8 — Whether In The Divine There Is Diversity, Singularity, And Solitude

Distinctio XXIV

Articulus 1 — Whether There Is Number In The Divine

Articulus 2 — Whether Number Is Univocally In The Divine And In Created Things, And Whether God Is More One Than Unity Itself

Articulus 3 — Whether Unity Or The One Posits Something Or Nothing, And How It Is Opposed To The Many; And How The One Which Is Convertible

With Being Differs From The One Which Is The Principle Of Number

Articulus 4 — Whether Numerical Terms In The Divine Predicate The Essence Or The Person

Articulus 5 — Whether Unity Or Numerical Terms Are Predicated Univocally Of Essence, Person, And Notion

Articulus 6 — Whether The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Can In Some Way Be Said To Be One

Articulus 7 — What It Is To Be Distinguished In The Divine

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is Well Said That God Is Triune And One; And Whether The Trinity Is The Unity Of Three

Distinctio XXV

Articulus 1 — What A Person Is According To The Definition

Articulus 2 — Whether Person Is Univocal In The Divine And In Creatures

Articulus 3 — Whether In The Divine There Is Any Other Commonness Than That Of The Divine Nature Or Essence

Articulus 4 — Whether In The Divine It Can Be Admitted That There Are Three Beings

Articulus 5 — Why It Is Well Said, Of The Same Essence, And Not Of The Same God; Why Each Person, And Not Each God; And Why It Cannot Be Said, Three Persons Of The Same Essence

Articulus 6 — It Is Asked Concerning This Question, What Three, And What Three Things

Articulus 7 — Whether We Can Concede There To Be Three Substances, Or Three Hypostases, As Three Persons

Distinctio XXVI

Articulus 1 — What Hypostasis Is

Articulus 2 — Whether Hypostasis Is In The Divine In The Same Respect As In Lower Things, And Whether It Is More Truly In Lower Than In Higher Things

Articulus 3 — How Hypostasis Relates To Essence

Articulus 4 — In What Way Hypostasis Relates To Person

Articulus 5 — Whether By The Intellect Hypostasis Remains With The Property Subtracted

Articulus 6 — Whether There Is Relation In The Divine

Articulus 7 — Whether Relation Alone Multiplies The Trinity

Articulus 8 — What Notion Is, And In What It Differs From Relation

Articulus 9 — What The True Properties Are In The Divine, And How They Differ From Relations And Notions

Articulus 10 — Whether In The Divine There Are Finite Or Infinite Relations, And All Are Assisting

Articulus 11 — How And With Respect To What The Notions In The Divine Differ, And Whether The Several Properties Which Are In One Person Differ In That Person

Articulus 12 — Whether, The Person Being Supposed, The Notion Is Presupposed

Articulus 13 — Whether There Are Only Three Notions In The Divine

Articulus 14 — Whether It Is Lawful In Divine Matters Without Sin To Hold Different Opinions And To Speak About The Notions, Since Some Posit More, Others Fewer

Articulus 15 — What Is Required For Gratuitous Filiation

Distinctio XXVII

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is The Same To Have Begotten The Son And To Be Father

Articulus 2 — Whether The Father Is Father Because He Begot, Or He Begot Because He Is Father, And Whether The Properties Determine The Persons, And Whence The Determination Comes

Articulus 3 — What Word Is

Articulus 4 — What Are The Things That The Saints Attribute To The Word, And With Respect To What They Are Taken

Articulus 5 — What It Is For The Supreme Spirit To Say

Articulus 6 — Whether Word Is Sometimes Said Essentially, As Saying Is

Articulus 7 — According To The Likeness Of Which Word Among Lower Things Word Is Said In The Divine

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Called The Image Of The Father

Articulus 9 — Whether The Son Alone Is Said God From God

Distinctio XXVIII

Articulus 1 — Whether, If Unbegotten Is A Notion, There Are More Notions Than Five

Articulus 2 — Whether Innascibility Is A Notion Of The Father

Articulus 3 — Whether Innascibility And Paternity Are One Notion Or Two

Articulus 4 — Whether, With Paternity Not Understood, The Father Would Be A Who, Because He Is Unbegotten

Articulus 5 — Whether Begotten And Unbegotten Signify A Being In The Same Predicamental Genus

Articulus 6 — Whether Innascibility Can Be Predicated Of Paternity; And Whether Paternity Is Innascible; And Whether The Essence Is Innascible

Articulus 7 — Whether Origin Also Can Be Called A Notion

Articulus 8 — Whether An Accident Can Be Separated From Its Subject

Articulus 9 — Whether Image Is Said Relatively; And Whether The Son Alone Is Said To Be Image

Articulus 10 — Whether The Word And Native Wisdom Are The Same; And Whether In The Word There Is Always Understood A Reference To The Creature; And What Saying Adds Over Understanding

Articulus 11 — Whether, As It Is Said, The Word Is The Same As Native Wisdom, So It Can Be Said That The Holy Spirit Is Proceeding Goodness

Distinctio XXIX

Articulus 1 — Whether Principle Is Univocal In Its Three Accounts, Namely Notional, Personal, And Essential; And Whether The Father Is Said To Be The Principle Of The Son, And The Father And The Son The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, Univocally

Articulus 2 — Whether, According To The Notion Of Understanding, A Principle Said According To Essence Is Before A Principle Said Notionally, Or Conversely

Articulus 3 — According To What Account Principle Is Taken When It Is Said, The Father Is A Principle Without Principle, Either Essentially Or Notionally

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father And The Son Are One Principle Of The Holy Spirit, Or Several

Articulus 5 — Whether Just As The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Are Called One Creator, So The Father And The Son Can Be Called One Spirator

Articulus 6 — Whether The Father And The Son Are The Same Principle Of The Holy Spirit

Articulus 7 — Whether For The Notion By Which The Father And The Son Are Called The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, We Do Not Have A Proper Name

Articulus 8 — Whether, If "Principle" Signifies A Notion, We Can Say "Principle" Of A Principle

Articulus 9 — Why From The Quinary Of Notions God Is Not Called Quinary

Distinctio XXX

Articulus 1 — Whether Something Is Said Of God Temporally

Articulus 2 — Whether These Names, Creator, Lord, King, Etc., Predicate Some Accident In God

Articulus 3 — Whether The Aforementioned Names Signify The Essence Or Something Else

Articulus 4 — Whether Time Can Be Said To Have Begun

Articulus 5 — Since These Names, Servant, Creature, And The Like, State A Real Relation, Whether In The Creator Some Real Relation Corresponds To Them

Articulus 6 — Whether These Names, Lord, King, Etc., Belong To God From Eternity

Articulus 7 — Whether God Is Called Lord Of Time From Time

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Related To Himself, Since What Is Given Is Related To The Giver

Distinctio XXXI

Articulus 1 — Whether The Master Here Determines Well Concerning Appropriations

Articulus 2 — By What The Rationale Is Considered In Appropriations, And Whether, With No Proper Term, Something Can Be Appropriated

Articulus 3 — Whether Likeness And Equality Are Said Relatively Or Of Themselves

Articulus 4 — Whether The Name Of Likeness Posits Something In The Divine

Articulus 5 — Why Eternity Is Appropriated To The Father

Articulus 6 — Why Image Is Appropriated To The Son, And Why The Son Is Called The Species Of The Father

Articulus 7 — Why Use Is Attributed To The Gift Or To The Holy Spirit

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Rightly Called The Father's Art

Articulus 9 — Why Unity Is Attributed To The Father

Articulus 10 — Why Equality Is Attributed To The Son, And Also Likeness

Articulus 11 — Whether To The Holy Spirit Ought To Be Attributed The Concord Or Connection Of Unity And Equality

Articulus 12 — Whether The Father And The Son Can Be Called One

Articulus 13 — Whether Paul And Apollos, And The One Who Plants And The One Who Waters, Can Be Called One

Articulus 14 — Whether, Given Two Unbegottens, It Would Follow That There Are Two Gods; And, Whether The Son Is The Head Of All, And The Head Of Christ Is God; And, Whether All Creatures Are Referred To God

Distinctio XXXII

Articulus 1 — Whether These Are True, The Father Loves The Son With The Holy Spirit, And The Father And The Son Love Themselves With The Holy Spirit

Articulus 2 — Which Of These Are More Proper, The Father And The Son Love In The Holy Spirit, Or Through The Holy Spirit, Or With The Love Which Is The Holy Spirit, Or With The Love Which Proceeds From Him

Articulus 3 — Whether The Father Is Wise With Begotten Wisdom, And Whether The Father Knows Himself In The Son Or In The Word

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father Is Wise With Begotten Wisdom, And Whether It Can Be Granted That The Father Is Wise In The Son Or Is Wise Through The Son, Just As It Is Granted That The Father Knows In The Son

Articulus 5 — Whether The Son Is Wise With Unbegotten Wisdom

Articulus 6 — Whether The Son Is Wise Of Himself, Or Through Himself

Articulus 7 — Whether We Can Grant That The Son Operates Through The Father, And One Person Through Another, And Every Agent Short Of God Is Weak

Articulus 8 — Whether There Is Only One Wisdom Of The Father

Distinctio XXXIII

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is Lawful For The Properties To Be Signified By An Abstract Name, As Paternity

Articulus 2 — Whether A Notion Is Something In The Person, And Whether It Is The Person Itself

Articulus 3 — Whether The Properties Are The Divine Essence

Articulus 4 — Whether In The Divine, Essentials Signified In Whatever Way Are Predicated Of The Notions

Articulus 5 — Whether The Divine Relations Are Attendant, As Gilbert Of Poitiers Said

Articulus 6 — In What Manner The Properties Are In The Essence

Articulus 7 — Whether The Notional Terms, According To The Mode Of Understanding, Stand More Closely Toward The Hypostases Or Persons Than Toward The Essence Itself, And Whether By Reason Of This Nearness Personal Adjectives Are Said Of The Notions

Articulus 8 — Whether Personal Adjectives Are In Some Way More Closely Related To The Notions Which Agree With Them Than To Others

Articulus 9 — How These Words Of Augustine Are To Be Taken, "Not That By Which The Father Is, He Is Substance"

Distinctio XXXIV

Articulus 1 — Whether Person Is Essence, Or Not, As Gilbert Of Poitiers Said

Articulus 2

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is Lawful To Say, "Three Persons Are Of One Essence"; And "Three Persons Are The Essence," As "Of One Essence," And "One Essence Of Three Persons"

Articulus 4 — Whether Power, Wisdom, And Goodness Make The Highest Good

Articulus 5 — Whether The Appropriation By Which Appropriated Things Are Attributed To God Is Made Only Through Us And By Us

Articulus 6 — Whether By Transference All The Names Of Creatures Can Be Attributed To God; And Conversely, Whether The Names Of God Can Be Attributed To Creatures

Distinctio XXXV

Articulus 1 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Univocal With Our Knowledge, Or With The Knowledge Of Angels

Articulus 2 — Whether Divine Knowledge Is Universal Or Particular; In Act, Or In Potency, Or In Habit

Articulus 3 — Whether There Ought To Be A Proper Treatise On Knowledge, Power, And Will; And, In Virtue Of What Those Three Are Taken

Articulus 4 — Whether The Master Well And Sufficiently Enumerates The Parts Of Knowledge, And In Virtue Of What They Are Taken

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Eternal And Immutable

Articulus 6 — Whether This Name, Creator, Signifies The Divine Essence

Articulus 7 — Whether There Are Ideas In The Divine Mind

Articulus 8 — Whether The Ideas Are In The Divine Mind In The Notion Of The Speculative Knowable Or Of The Practical

Articulus 9 — Whether In God There Is One Idea Or Many

Articulus 10 — Whether In God There Are Ideas Of All Things, And Especially Of Prime Matter

Articulus 11 — Whether Creatures, Once Made, Became Known To God In Another Way Than They Were Known As To Be Made

Articulus 12 — Whether All Things Are In God Life And Light; And If So, Whether In The Notion Of The Speculative Or Of The Practical

Articulus 13 — Whether Creatures Are Called Beautiful According As They Are In The Act Of Existing, Or According As They Are In The Divine Mind

Articulus 14 — Whether To Be In God Is To Be In The Knowledge Of God; And, Why, Just As Ideas Or Reasons Are Said To Be Many, Are Sciences Or Wisdoms Not Said To Be Many, Or Words Many; And, How Paradigms, Exemplars, Ideas, And Reasons Differ

Distinctio XXXVI

Articulus 1 — Whether The Being Of All Things In God Belongs To Power Or To Wisdom Or To Will, Or To All Of These

Articulus 2 — Whether To Be In God As Knowing Is The Same As His Knowledge

Articulus 3 — Whether God Knows And Cognizes By One Or By Many

Articulus 4 — Whether God Understands Only One, Or Several, Or All Things

Articulus 5 — Whether The Intellect Of God Has Any Transition Over Things From One To Another

Articulus 6 — Whether Evils Have In God A Species Or An Idea, Or Are Known Insofar As They Are Discordant From Art; And, Whether They Are Known By God According To The Speculative Or The Practical Intellect; And, Whether Evil Is In God Life And Light

Articulus 7 — Whether God Knows Diverse, Composite, Material, Contingent, And Temporal Things

Articulus 8 — Whether God Knows What He Will Do, What He Has Done, What He Can Do And Will Never Do, And Finally Things Actually Infinite

Articulus 9 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Well Divided Into Knowledge Of Approval And Simple Knowledge

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In God, And From God, And Through Him; And To Be, Live, And Move In Him

Articulus 11 — Whether Things Are In God By Reason Of Person And Not Of Essence Or Notion

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is The Same To Say "From Him" And "Of Him"

Distinctio XXXVII

Articulus 1 — Whether God Is Everywhere And In Every Thing

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is The Same For God To Be Everywhere And To Be In Every Thing

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is The Same For God To Be In Every Place, And Everywhere, And Wheresoever

Articulus 4 — Whether It Belongs To God From Eternity To Be Everywhere And In Every Thing

Articulus 5 — Whether God Is Well Said To Be In Things In Five Modes

Articulus 6 — Whether God Is In Things In Many Modes, As One Way In The Temple, Another In Heaven, Another In The Soul

Articulus 7 — Whether God Is Everywhere And In All Time; And, Whether It Must Be Granted That God Is Here, Or There, Or Elsewhere Than Here

Articulus 8 — Whether It Belongs To God Alone To Be Everywhere; Then It Is Asked About That Which Is Said There

Articulus 9 — Whether To Be In By Grace Is To Be In Simply, Or Only In A Certain Respect

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In Essentially, By Presence, And By Power

Articulus 11 — Whether God And The Holy Spirit Are In The Devil And The Damned, And Can Be With The Wicked And The Just

Articulus 12 — Whether God Is In Himself And Dwells In Himself; And, Whether It Can Be Conceded That God Is Nowhere, And That He Is Elsewhere Than In Himself

Articulus 13 — Whether God Is Well Said To Dwell With Himself And To Be With Himself

Articulus 14 — Whether A Spirit, Both Created And Uncreated, Can Be Said To Be In A Place; And, Whether Two Spirits Can Be In The Same Place

Articulus 15 — Whether Little Children Pertain To The Temple Of God

Articulus 16 — Whether God Can Be Said To Be In A Place

Articulus 17 — How God Is In All Things And Is Not Defiled

Articulus 18 — Whether It Is The Same To Be In A Place And To Be Local; And, How They Belong To God, To The Created Spirit, And To The Body

Articulus 19 — Whether The Divine Essence Is Entirely Non-Local And Incircumscriptible And Immovable

Articulus 20 — Whether Every Change Happens In Place Or Time

Articulus 21 — Whether God Is In All Things Not Enclosed, And Outside All Things Not Excluded; And, How God Is Said To Be New And Old

Articulus 22 — Whether An Angel Is Moved According To Place

Articulus 23 — Whether An Angel Is Moved According To Place By Passing Through Space

Articulus 24 — Whether The Motion Of An Angel Is In Time Or In The Now

Articulus 25 — Whether In One Spiritual Place Two Spirits Can Be Without Constriction Of Themselves

Articulus 26 — Whether Angels Are Circumscriptible

Articulus 27 — Whether One Wisdom In Number Can Be In The Minds Of Different Persons

Articulus 28 — Whether It Should Rather Be Said That God Is Somewhere, Or That Other Things Are In Him

Articulus 29 — Whether God, In Doing Something Which He Did Not Do Before, Is Changed

Articulus 30 — Whether A Thing Is Conceived To Be Filled By God Before Matter By Form, And Place By The Thing Located

Distinctio XXXVIII

Articulus 1 — Whether The Foreknowledge Of God Is The Cause Of Things

Articulus 2 — Whether Any Truth Was From Eternity Besides God

Articulus 3 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Caused By Things

Articulus 4 — Whether The Foreknowledge Of God Imposes Necessity Upon Things

Distinctio XXXIX

Articulus 1 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Can Be Increased

Articulus 2 — Whether God At The Same Time And By The Same Knows And Understands Many Things

Articulus 3 — Whether God Knows Changeable Things Immutably, And Knows Opposites In The Same Way

Articulus 4 — Whether God Knows Actually Infinite Things

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Of Enunciables

Articulus 6 — Whether Now God Can Know Or Foreknow, As He Could Have Known Or Foreknown From Eternity

Articulus 7 — Whether It Must Be Granted That God Can Know What He Previously Did Not Know

Articulus 8 — Whether God Can Know More Things Than He Knows

Articulus 9 — Whether God Has Knowledge Of Singulars

Distinctio XL

Articulus 1 — To Which Attribute Predestination Ought To Be Reduced, Namely To Power, Wisdom, Or Will

Articulus 2 — What Predestination Is In Reality

Articulus 3 — What Predestination Is By Definition

Articulus 4 — Whether Predestination Is Of Being Or Of Non-Being

Articulus 5 — Whether Predestination Is Eternal Or Temporal; And, Whether It Puts Something In Time In The Predestined

Articulus 6 — Whether Predestination Belongs to the Rational Creature Alone, or Also to Another

Articulus 7 — Whether Predestination Is of Every Rational Creature, or of Man Only; And, Whether Christ Is Predestined

Articulus 8 — Whether Predestination Is of All Men, or Only of Certain Ones

Articulus 9 — Whether Predestination Is Multiplied According to Individual Predestined Persons, or All the Predestined Are in One

Articulus 10 — Whether Predestination Can Be without Foreknowledge; And, Why Reprobation Is Rather Called Foreknowledge than Predestination

Articulus 11 — Whether Both the Counting Number and the Counted Number of the Elect Are Certain; And, Whether One Written in the Book of Life Can Be Blotted Out from It

Articulus 12 — With What Certainty the Number of the Elect Is Certain

Articulus 13 — How This Authority Ought To Be Understood Where It Is Said, "Hold What You Have, Lest Another Take Your Crown"

Articulus 14 — Whether One Predestined Can Be Damned, and One Foreknown Saved

Articulus 15 — What Is Understood by the Implicit Condition When It Is Said, "The Predestined Must Necessarily Be Saved"

Articulus 16 — Whether It Is Necessary That the Predestined Be Saved

Articulus 17 — Whether It Befits God To Choose

Articulus 18 — What Is Election

Articulus 19 — Whether Election According to the Notion of Intelligence Is Before Predestination or After

Articulus 20 — For What Is Election

Articulus 21 — Whose Is Election

Articulus 22 — Whether Predestination Is the Cause of the Bestowal of Grace; And, Whether It Is a Necessary, Contingent, Common, or Proper Cause

Articulus 23 — Whether Hardening Is an Effect of Eternal Reprobation; And, Whether God Is the Cause of Reprobation

Distinctio XLI

Articulus 1 — Whether Predestination Can Be Helped by the Prayers of the Saints

Articulus 2 — Whether Predestination Falls Under the Merit of the Predestined, So That Someone Merits Predestination for Himself

Articulus 3 — Whether the Foreknowledge of Merits Is the Cause of Predestination

Articulus 4 — Whether, Just as the Will of God Is as a Cause in Predestination, So Also It Is in Reprobation

Articulus 5 — Whether The Knowledge Of God Is Changeable

Articulus 6 — Whether God Knows All Complexes, Such as Propositions and Enuntiabilia That He Once Knew

Articulus 7 — Whether Enuntiabilia Are Always True

Articulus 8 — Whether All Things That Are True Are True by the First Truth

Distinctio XLII

Articulus 1 — Whether Omnipotence Belongs to God; And, Whether He Acts with His Whole Power in His Omnipotence

Articulus 2 — Whether Omnipotence Is Proper to God Alone

Articulus 3 — It Is Asked, Since Every Proper Attribute Is Among the Things That Follow the Essence, as Boethius Says, by Reason of That Which Is in the Divine Essence or Substance, Whether This Omnipotence Follows the Divine Essence; And, Whether Immutability or Omnipotence More Immediately Follows the Divine Essence

Articulus 4 — What Corresponds to the Divine Omnipotence on the Part of the Thing

Articulus 5 — Whether the Divine Power Is Equal to the Divine Knowledge

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Do Every Impossible Thing, Both Per Accidens and Per Se

Articulus 7 — Whether and How God Can Do All Things

Articulus 8 — Whether God Can Walk, Speak, Sin, Die, Be Deceived, Become Wretched, and Be Conquered

Articulus 9 — Whether the Simply Possible Is Said According to Inferior Causes or Superior

Articulus 10 — Whether Omnipotence Can Belong to Others Than God; And, Whether It Is Common to the Three Persons; And, Whether It Can Belong to the Blessed

Distinctio XLIII

Articulus 1 — Whether the Power of God Is Infinite

Articulus 2 — Whether the Power of God Can Be Limited with Respect to Acts or Not

Articulus 3 — Whether God Has Done or Can Do Things That It Is Neither Good Nor Just To Do; And, Whether He Can Do What Is Unjust, Either Beside or Against Justice; And, Whether He Can Damn Peter and Save Judas

Articulus 4 — Why God Did Not Work Miracles Among Certain People

Distinctio XLIV

Articulus 1 — Whether God Could Make Things from Eternity; And, Whether He Could Have Made the World Earlier Than He Made It

Articulus 2 — Whether God Could Have Made the Things That He Made Better

Articulus 3 — Whether God Could Have Made Better the Goodness That Results from the Order of the Universe Than He Made

Articulus 4 — Whether God Could and Did Not Will, or Willed and Could Not, To Make a Better World

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ, the Blessed Virgin, an Angel, and Adam Could Have Become Better Than They Were Made; And, Whether Christ Belongs to the Universality of the Works of God; And, How It Is Understood That the Blessed Virgin Is Exalted above the Choirs of Angels

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Always Do What He Could

Distinctio XLV

Articulus 1 — Whether There Is Will in God

Articulus 2 — What Is the Divine Will; And, Whether It Is the Same as the Essence of God

Articulus 3 — Whether in This Place the Treatise on the Will of God Is Well Situated

Articulus 4 — Whether the Divine Will Is a Cause

Articulus 5 — Whether the Will of God Is the Cause of All Things That Are Subject to His Power; And, Why God Is Not Called Omniwilling, as Omnipotent and Omniscient

Articulus 6 — Whether the Divine Will Is the Common or Proper, Necessary or Contingent Cause of All Things

Articulus 7 — Whether the Will of God Has a Cause

Articulus 8 — Whether the Divine Will Is the First Cause of All Things

Articulus 3 — In What This Goodness Is Placed When It Is Said, "It Is Good That Evil Be Done"; And, Whether It Is Good To Do Evil; And, Whether It Can Be Conceded, "It Is Good That Malice Be Done"

Articulus 4 — Into What, as into the Willed Object, Is the Will Noted To Pass, When It Is Said, "God Wills Evil To Be Done or To Be"

Articulus 5 — What Difference There Is Between These Propositions, To Be Unwilling For This, And Not To Will This, And To Will That This Not Be Done

Articulus 6 — Whether Evil Is Expedient For The Universe, And Contributes To The Completion Of The Universe

Articulus 7 — With Respect To What The Division Of The Goods And Defects Which The Master Enumerates In The Text Is Taken

Articulus 8 — Whether A Good Can Come From Evil To Someone Doing Evil

Articulus 9 — Why God Permits Evil To Be Done, If He Is Not The Author Of Evil

Articulus 10 — Whether One Doing Evil Tends Toward Non-Being

Articulus 11 — What Truth Is

Articulus 12 — In How Many Ways Truth Is Said

Articulus 13 — Whether The True Is Convertible With Being, The One, And The Good, And Whether The Intellect Of Negative Enunciations Can Be Reduced To Being

Articulus 14 — According To What Order The One, The True, The Good, And Being Relate To One Another

Articulus 15 — Whether Truth Is Eternal

Articulus 16 — Whether Truth Is Simple And Immutable

Articulus 17 — Whether All True Things Are True From The First Truth Formally

Articulus 18 — Whether Every Truth Is From The First Truth Efficiently

Articulus 19 — Whether Every Truth, By Whomsoever It Is Said, Is From The Holy Spirit

Distinctio XLVII

Articulus 1 — Whether The Will Of God Is Always Efficacious

Articulus 2 — Whether Evil Is Ordered Or Disordered

Articulus 3 — Why Nothing Can Be Done Against Permission, And Yet Something Is Done Against Precept And Counsel And Prohibition

Distinctio XLVIII

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is Possible For Us To Conform Our Will To The Divine Will

Articulus 2 — In What The Conformity Of The Divine Will And Ours Consists

Articulus 3 — Whether, If In Several Things There Is Conformity Of The Divine Will And Ours, One Excludes Another By Repugnance

Articulus 4 — Whether All Are Bound To Conform Their Will To The Divine Will

Articulus 5 — Whether We Are Bound To Conform In The Object Willed Which We Know God Wills, Yet It Does Not Befit Us To Will This

Articulus 6 — Whether All The Saints, And Especially The Blessed Virgin And The Apostles, Willed The Passion Of Christ

Articulus 7 — Whether The Demons Persuaded The Jews Who Were Crucifying Christ Concerning His Passion

LIBER II

Prologus

Distinctio I

Articulus 8 — Whether The Number Of Men To Be Saved Is According To The Number Of The Fallen Angels, Namely Whether The Number Of Men To Be Saved Makes The Tenth Order

Articulus 1 — In How Many Ways That Authority, In The Beginning God Created Heaven And Earth, Is Expounded

Articulus 2 — Whether The Error Of The Manichaean Who Posited Many Principles Is Well Refuted By The Master In The Text

Articulus 3 — Whether The Error Of Plato, Who Posited Three Principles, Is Well Refuted By The Master, And Whether Matter Is Eternal

Articulus 4 — Whether It Is True What Plato Supposed, That There Is One Matter Of All Things

Articulus 5 — Whether Plato Well Posited The Exemplar To Be One Principle, And In What Plato Erred

Articulus 6 — Whether The Definition Of Creation Which Says, To Create Is To Make Something From Nothing, Is Good

Articulus 7 — Whether Creation Is Communicable To Another

Articulus 8 — Whether To Create Is A Work Of Miracle

Articulus 9 — Whether To Make And To Create Are The Same, Or Whether One Extends Further Than The Other

Articulus 10 — Whether Aristotle Determined Sufficiently That The World Is Eternal, As Is Imputed To Him

Articulus 11 — Why It Is Imputed To Aristotle That He Said Two Things Were From Eternity, Namely Prime Matter And The First Mover, And What Are Those Three Things That Are Imputed To Him

Articulus 12 — What Is The Cause Of The Being Of The Whole Universe

Articulus 13 — Whether The Soul And The Angel Agree In Species Or Differ In Species

Articulus 14 — Why The Soul Is United To The Body, Since It Would Have Been Of Greater Perfection For The Soul To Have Been Without The Body

Distinctio II

Articulus 1 — Whether The Angel Was Created Before Or After The Ages, Or Is One With The Other Four Coevals

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is One Matter Of All Spiritual And Corporeal Things

Articulus 3 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Is A Body, And Why The Philosophers Did Not Know It

Articulus 4 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Is Immobile And Uniform Or Not

Articulus 5 — Whether The Empyrean Heaven Has An Order Of Influencing Over The Other Spheres, And Whether The Sun Illuminates The Empyrean Heaven

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Empyrean Heaven There Is Any Vocal Praise, By Which The Morning Stars Are Said To Have Praised God

Articulus 7 — What The Heaven Of The Trinity Is

Articulus 8 — What There Is In The Heaven Of The Trinity

Distinctio III

Articulus 1 — Whether The Angel Exists, And Has An Order In The Universe

Articulus 2 — What An Angel Is By Definition

Articulus 3 — Whether Theologians Call Angels Those Separate Substances Which Philosophers Call Intelligences

Articulus 4 — Whether An Angel Is A Simple Substance

Articulus 5 — Whether A Personal Distinction Belongs To The Angels, So That Each One Is A Person

Articulus 6 — Whether A Naturally Inborn Reason Belongs To The Angels, On Account Of Which There Are In Them Memory, Intelligence, Will

PRAEFATIO

Preface

OF LORD ALBERT THE GREAT, BISHOP OF REGENSBURG, OF THE ORDER OF PREACHERS, COMMENTARIES ON THE FIRST BOOK OF THE SENTENCES. PREFACE

§ 53. I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, the firstborn before all creatures: I made that in the heavens there should arise light that never faileth, and as a cloud I covered all the earth.

§ 54. Here according to order four things are touched upon: from which according to the series of this Book the matter of the four Books is drawn.

§ 55. For in the first is noted the distinction of the persons, and the procession of one from another, when he says: I came forth from the mouth of the Most High. By the word I the speaking wisdom is supposed: but by the word mouth the Father insofar as he himself through generation is the principle of the Son as he is the Word. But neither the mouth whence the Word proceeds, nor the Word itself is without the Spirit: and therefore in the mouth and in the Word the procession of the Holy Spirit from both is signified. Which is proved from this which Damascene says in book I of On the Orthodox Faith: "In the simple and uncompounded divine nature it is piously to be confessed that the Spirit of God is indeed: because the Word of God is not more deficient than our word. But it is not pious to think that some alien spirit is poured out outside God, as happens in us composite beings." This is also what Augustine says in book IX of On the Trinity: "The Word which we strive to intimate, is knowledge with love." But by the word Most High the Father is supposed, who although he is not higher than the Son or the Holy Spirit, because there is one height of the three, just as one dignity and one honor, nevertheless by appropriation it belongs to the Father to be the Most High, because he himself is the principle of the whole divinity, as Augustine says, because he himself is a principle not from a principle: but the Son is a principle from a principle: the Holy Spirit however is not a principle with respect to any person, but with respect to the creature only, and is from both principles, namely, the Father and the Son.

§ 56. The second is that which he says: The firstborn before all creatures: in which the matter of the second Book is noted, in which creatures are treated. And by that word the creature is signified in two ways, namely, according to its going forth through creation from the first cause which is God, when he says: The firstborn, etc., and according to what is in its proper nature and universality, when he says: All creatures. For just as he says, Psalm 32:9: He spoke, and they were made. And Augustine says, that is, he generated the Word in which it was that it should be made. It was, I say, in the Word insofar as the Word is the art of the Father full of all living reasons, that is, which all live in him and are life. Now the creature was in this Word in two ways, namely, as in a medium of knowing according to reason, and as in an operative and productive cause: and therefore, John 1:3 and 4, it is said: Without him was made nothing that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. Light, I say, radiating over all known things: just as he says, Psalm 109:3: From the womb before the daystar I begot thee, in the brightness of the saints, that is, of eternal holiness and purity. But it was life according to the fact that it is the operative Word: for what with respect to some things is attributed by the Philosophers to the motion of the heaven, saying that it is immortal and without rest in the things that are, as a certain life to all existing things by nature: this primarily belongs to the Word with respect to all creatures: because all things are in him as in a cause, and are carried by him lest they perish. Hence, the Apostle to the Hebrews 1:3: Upholding all things by the word of his power. For these two (as Augustine and Anselm say) signify a twofold motion of the efflux of the creature from the Creator: for insofar as they are life in him, they flow forth from the Word, so that they may subsist in their proper nature: and insofar as they are light, by flowing forth they are manifested in the angelic intelligence. And that the Word is a principle, is clear through Augustine in book I On Genesis, thus: "Before all things let us remember that God does not work by temporal motions, as it were of his mind or body, as a man or an Angel works: but by the eternal and immutable and stable reasons of his coeternal Word." But concerning the second the same author says, in the same place, book IV, where he speaks thus: "First the light was created in which the knowledge of the Word of God by which it was created might be made, and that very knowledge would be for it to be converted from its formlessness to the forming God."

§ 57. But an objection is raised concerning this which he says: The firstborn, etc. Because this seems to posit an order of himself to the creature: and since every order is according to something common to the ordered things themselves, the Creator seems to have something in common with the creature: which is not true. SOLUTION. It must be said that the order of cause to caused is noted there, and of eternity to time: and nothing prohibits something being common, not existing univocally in both, but by prior and posterior. But that this is true is clear through Basil in a certain sermon On the Faith of the Divinity, where he speaks thus: "To receive a nature is common to the Son with every creature: but to have it naturally is proper to him, because he is from the nature of the Father." But by the other part the creature is supposed in its proper genus, namely, in itself by the name of creature, and in universality by the sign of distribution according to what is held, Genesis 1:31: God saw all the things that he had made, and they were very good: where the Gloss says that everything created was good in itself: but the universality was very good.

§ 58. It follows: I made that in the heavens there should arise light that never faileth. By this however is had the matter of the third Book. For the arising of light is the arising of the sun of justice Christ our God, when through the bowels of the mercy of his, in which the orient from on high has visited us: to illuminate those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death: in which is accepted the sacrament of the incarnation and passion. But the unfailing light from itself, although it sometimes fails from us, is the grace of virtues, of gifts, and of precepts, concerning which it is treated in the second part of the third Book. Hence. James 1:17: Every best gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no change, nor shadow of alteration. But this light he made in the heavens literally, because he led captivity captive, and gave gifts to men. Or, in the heavens, that is, in the Saints.

§ 59. It follows: And as a cloud, etc. By this is had the matter of the fourth Book. For a cloud is obscure, and the remains of rain, and a sign of serenity, as the Philosopher says: and by obscurity it signifies the grace of the sacraments obscured by corporeal elements. The remains of rain: because the tempest of sin and obnubilation causes the sacraments, as is held in book IV, so that man may return by the same path, by which he withdrew from God. But insofar as it is a sign of serenity, it signifies the reality of all the sacraments signified, and not contained, which is the glory of those rising again, concerning which it is treated in the second part of the fourth. This is the cloud of which it is said, Sirach 43:24: The medicine of all is in the hastening of a cloud: because by the sacraments it medicates guilt, by the glory of the resurrection it medicates misery.

EXPOSITION ON THE PROLOGUE OF THE MASTER.

§ 60. Desiring something, etc. This proem is divided into three parts, the first of which is taken from the part of the writing or work, of which he assigns the moving causes: final, material, and formal. The second is taken from the part of those to whom the writing is written, or for whom this work is made, which begins, at Therefore it ought not. The third is taken from the part of the writer, in which the Author determines his own disposition in writing, saying that he seeks a pious reader and a free corrector in this writing, and this begins, at But in this tractate not only, etc.

§ 61. The first of these parts is divided into two, in the first of which he touches upon the moving causes on the part of God and the neighbor. In the second, however, from the moving causes he concludes also other causes of this work, at Therefore of these and hateful to God, etc.

§ 62. But the first which contains the moving causes to write, is divided into two parts according to the two branches of charity. For in the first he states the moving [causes]...

§ 1. "...on the part of the love of God." In the second place, however, he states the moving causes on the part of the love of neighbor: and this begins at the place: Not being able to resist the desires of the studious, etc.

§ 2. Furthermore, the first part, which contains the moving causes on the part of the love of God, is subdivided into four. In the first, he touches upon the moving cause on the part of the reward promised to those who write. In the second, he mixes two moving causes: one per se, the other through another, along with two retracting causes, at the place: The truth of the one promising delights us, etc. In the third, he posits one prevailing cause, and two retracting ones, at the place: Which zeal overcomes, etc. In the fourth of these, drawn from these causes sufficient to move on the part of the love of God, he touches succinctly upon what he intends to write: next to which he disposed to execute this more prolixly below after all the other causes; and this begins at the place: In which, our faith burning, etc.

§ 3. The letter is expounded thus:

§ 4. Desiring something, etc. He offers humility, and difficulty: because "something" sounds like "a little". Hence it is written: "Lo, these are part of his ways: and seeing we have heard scarce a little drop of his word, who shall be able to behold the thunder of his greatness?"[1] The "little drop" is discourse concerning creatures. The overwhelming thunder flashing from the cloud of obscurity is discourse concerning the Trinity and unity. Now, this occurs because of the difficulty of the matter, as is held: "All things are hard: man cannot explain them by word."[2]

§ 5. Into the treasury [gazophylacium], etc. Gaza sounds like "riches" in Persian, phylassein means "to keep" in Greek: hence a gazophylacium is a repository or chest of riches. Here in this Book, however, it signifies the study of holy Church, in which the holy Doctors have deposited their books.

§ 6. Now among the ancients there was a threefold treasury. Namely, the musach, which was for the offerings of kings, concerning which it is written that "Ahaz turned the musach for the sabbath, which he had built in the temple, and the king's entry from without, into the temple of the Lord, because of the king of the Assyrians."[3] The corban or corbona was for the gifts of the priests, concerning which we read: "It is not lawful to put them into the corbona, etc."[4] The third is commonly called the gazophylacium, which was for the offerings of the people, concerning which it is written: "And looking on," namely Jesus, "he saw the rich men cast their gifts into the treasury [gazophylacium], etc."[5] Others say differently: for because we read of the musach of the sabbath, they say that in it were deposited festival offerings; and because corban in Hebrew is the same as a vow, they say that in it were deposited votive offerings, whereas spontaneous offerings were placed in the gazophylacium.

§ 8. From poverty, etc. "Poverty" speaks of a lack of acquired goods, and according to a transfer to spiritual things, it speaks of a lack of an acquired habit in the intellect, which is science. "Slenderness," on the other hand, speaks of a diminution of due quantity, and transferred, it speaks of the meagerness of natural genius for the act of inventing science. Now, what follows: To climb steep things, etc., corresponds to poverty: because divine things are called steep with respect to the objects of knowledge with which science is concerned. But when he says: A work beyond our powers, this corresponds to the second, which is slenderness: because this spoke of the dullness of the natural force, which is genius.

§ 9. To climb steep things, etc. He notes that steep things are certain high things, but not elevated above the power of our intellect. A "work beyond our powers," however, is that which is elevated above our power. Now, steep things are climbed by a threefold degree: for some approach our soul by sense, imagination, and intellect; some by imagination and intellect only; and some by intellect only. The first are merely high, the second higher, the third highest. Hence, Augustine says: "Three kinds of visions occur. One through the eyes, by which corporeal things are seen; another through the spirit, by which absent corporeal things are thought of; the third through the intuition of the mind, by which the understood species of things is beheld."[6] And these correspond to three [sciences] in Philosophy, namely, those joined according to their definitional concept with motion and matter, which are natural things; those separated according to their concept from motion and matter, but nevertheless joined in being, and these are mathematical things; and those separated in being and in definition from motion and matter, and these are divine things, from which natural reasons are drawn to know the Creator, just as he does below in Distinctions III and IV.

§ 10. A work beyond our powers, etc., is the knowledge of the Trinity and unity.

§ 11. But it seems to be contrary to what Ecclesiasticus says: "Seek not the things that are too high for thee, and search not into things above thy ability."[7] Again, in Proverbs: "Lift not up thy eyes to riches which thou canst not have: because they shall make themselves wings like those of an eagle, and shall fly towards heaven."[8] The response is that it is beyond our powers according to itself; but when reason is helped by faith, it avails for that for which it formerly did not avail. Hence, it is written: "Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things that appear not."[9] And: "Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as of ourselves: but our sufficiency is from God."[10]

§ 12. Which the zeal of the house of God overcomes, etc. "The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up."[11] And this is introduced in John,[12] and there the Gloss says: "Good zeal is that by which the mind, having cast aside human fear, is inflamed and consumed by this, that whatever wicked things it sees, it bustles to correct; if it cannot, it tolerates and groans."

§ 13. Against the errors of carnal men, etc. "The animal man perceiveth not these things that are of the Spirit of God; for it is foolishness to him, and he cannot understand, because it is spiritually examined,"[13] that is, an examination of spiritual things is made. And those whom the Master here distinguishably calls "carnal" and "animal," the Apostle commonly calls "animal." Hence the Gloss in the same place: "An animal man is so called either by life or by sense. By life, a man is called animal who is carried away by the dissolute wantonness of his soul, which the ruling spirit does not contain within the bounds of the natural order, because it does not subject itself to God, who rules it. But by sense, a man is called animal who judges of God according to the phantasm of bodies, or the letter of the law, or physical reasoning."

§ 14. With the shields of the Davidic tower, etc. "Thy neck is as the tower of David, which is built with bulwarks: a thousand bucklers hang upon it, etc."[14] Now, the neck is that by which the body is joined to the head, and in which words are formed, and it signifies the faith that joins the Church to God. The shields are the authorities of truth discovered by the Saints, bearing the signs of our leaders, namely, Augustine, Jerome, and other Doctors. The armor of the strong is the syllogism and fitting similitude by which we progress in this science.

§ 15. Not being able to resist the desires of the studious, etc. Here he touches upon the moving cause on the part of the love of neighbor, and just as before, he mixes with this cause also a retracting cause, and thus there are two here. First, the moving cause is the love of neighbor. Second, the retracting cause is the detraction of the envious, at the place: Although we do not doubt, etc.

§ 16. The first has two [aspects], namely, the urgent request of the studious, because it incites the study of the listeners; secondly, also the charity of Christ in the members. The second is divided into two parts, in the first of which he describes the detractors. But because open malice cannot do harm, therefore in the second he touches upon the mode of their simulation, at the place: They have a show of wisdom in superstition, etc.

tion of them from the proximate cause of obstinacy. Secondly, from the extrinsic suggesting cause, there: Which the God of this world. Thirdly, from the perversity of order in the soul, there: Whom an unjust will. Fourthly, from their pursuit, there: Whose profession is by tongue and style: by the first of which science is taught, by the second it is perpetuated. Or, he says "by tongue," because somewhere, although sparsely, their voice has sounded out; but "by style," on account of this, that he places his writings under the style of the Fathers.

§ 18. The charity of Christ urges, etc. To the contrary: "Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love, or hatred."[15] Solution. Charity can be taken according to the force of the name, namely, as it is a love highly prizing the beloved, and thus we can be certain of charity through conjectures of experience; or it can be taken for the habit distinguishing between the sons of the kingdom and of perdition, and thus no one is certain on the way.

§ 19. An objection is raised concerning what he says: To truth not understood or offending, etc. For Jerome seems to say this, saying that truth breeds hatred. But to the contrary: "All the earth calleth upon truth, and the heaven blesseth it, and all works shake and tremble at it."[16] Again, in the same place: "And all men do well in its works," namely of truth, "and there is no iniquity in its judgment."[17]

§ 20. Furthermore, the Philosopher says that the end of speculative intelligence is truth; but nothing hates its end, but rather desires it. But to the contrary: "For every one that doth evil hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be reproved."[18] Solution. Truth per se is delightful to every man, and to every intellective and rational nature; but per accidens it offends, or has contradictors. And this accident is frequently threefold: namely, because it is contrary to what is willed (and thus the Master speaks here, as is clear in the Letter); or because it is discovered by someone who is envied; or because it reproves malice in the listener, as is held: "There is one man left, by whom we may ask the Lord: but I hate him, for he doth not prophesy good to me, but evil, Micheas the son of Jemla."[19]

§ 21. Which the God of this world works, etc. "The god of this world hath blinded the minds of unbelievers, that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God," namely the invisible God, "should not shine unto them."[20] And it is expounded there by the Gloss in four ways: namely, for the just God who rules the good, and as a desert of impiety allows the wicked to be cast down into unbelief. Secondly, for the devil, who is the god and prince of this world. "For the prince of this world cometh, etc."[21] Thirdly, for pride, which is the cause of blinding. Fourthly, for the belly. Hence: "Whose god is their belly."[22]

§ 22. But an objection is raised against what he says: In the sons of unbelief, etc. Because Jerome says that no one is to be despaired of, while he is on the way. Solution. Insofar as it pertains to the mercy of God and the nature of the way, one must not despair; but insofar as it pertains to the nature of the disease, [one might]: because the sin of unbelief is scarcely abandoned, owing to the fact that it seems to allude to reason.

§ 23. They do not subject their will to reason, etc. This, according to Avicenna, is the principle of evil; as the verse also says: Thus I will, thus I command; let my will stand as reason.[23]

§ 24. For this is the perversity of right order: concerning whom it is said, "The perverse are hard to be corrected, and the number of fools is infinite."[24]

§ 25. But to those things which they have dreamed, etc. He rightly calls heresy a dream: because in a dream, images from the imagination are moved to the organ of the common sense; and a conversion of the soul upon the image occurs just as upon a thing. Thus heretics bring forth images out of their phantastic heart and are converted to them, as to the truth of things.

§ 26. To fables, etc. They seek to say wonderful things: because the Philosopher says in the first book of the Metaphysics that a fable is composed of wonderful things.[25] "And will indeed turn away their hearing from the truth, but will be turned unto fables."[26]

§ 27. Things more pleasing, etc. "Who say to the seers: See not: and to them that behold: Behold not for us those things that are right: speak unto us pleasant things, see errors for us."[27]

§ 28. They have a show of wisdom, etc. This part, which is about the mode of their simulation, has three parts. The first contains simulations of piety; the second, the falsity and lie of the simulation, there: And this simulated piety itself. Thirdly, he posits the proof of this lie and falsity, there: By the institutions of false doctrine.

§ 29. In superstition, etc. Augustine says: "Religion observed beyond measure is called superstition."

§ 30. It follows: Because a defection of faith, etc. "Now the Spirit manifestly saith, that in the last times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to spirits of error, and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, and having their conscience seared."[28]

3. Augustine, De Trinitate, II, Prooemium, 1.

§ 31. It follows: So that there may be piety in words, etc. "Having an appearance indeed of godliness, but denying the power thereof. Now these avoid."[29]

§ 32. But an objection is raised concerning what he says: By every lie of words, etc. To the contrary: Upon that passage "There met him ten men that were lepers,"[30] the Gloss of Bede says there: "Lepers are heretics, who, as if having various colors in the same body, mix various sects now of falsity, now of truth in the same preaching." Solution. Although they do not always lie with respect to the things said, nevertheless with respect to the end they always lie: and this is how the Master understands it.

§ 34. By the institutions of false doctrine, etc. In this part he posits three reasons manifesting the lie of heretics. The first is drawn from fallacious institutions, that is, principles and articles. The second is drawn from the mode of things said by them: that they say novel things. Now, a "novel" thing is that which is near with respect to its beginning, there: Under a novel, etc. Against which it is said: "For by it," namely faith, "the ancients obtained a testimony."[31] And: "Pass not beyond the ancient bounds which thy fathers have set."[32] The third is drawn from the mode of disputing, which is with contention and clamors, there: Who, studying contention, etc.

§ 35. And an itching of the ears, etc. "For there shall be a time, when they will not endure sound doctrine; but, according to their own desires, they will heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears."[33] Now, an itch is from a corrupt evaporation touching the sensible organs, and heresy is similar to it.

§ 37. Who, to contention, etc. Ambrose, in the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans 1:29: "Contention is the impugning of truth with the confidence of a clamor." And Cicero in the second book of his Rhetoric says that contention is an acute speech, suited both for confirming and for confuting.[34]

§ 38. While truth holds itself, etc. "The truth of the Lord remaineth for ever."[35] "Truth overcometh all things."[36] And it adds: "Truth endureth, and grows strong for ever, and liveth and conquereth for ever and ever."[37]

§ 39. Therefore, [the assembly] of these, hateful to God, etc. "I have hated the assembly of the malignant."[38]

§ 40. In this part, from the moving causes he concludes also the other causes of this work. And it has six parts: in the first of which he briefly repeats the two moving causes, namely the overthrowing of heretics, and the exaltation of the lamp of truth, which is taken according to the twofold work of the wise man determined by the Philosopher: which is that he does not lie about what he knows, and is able to manifest someone who is lying.[39]

§ 41. In the second, he touches upon the Author, there: In much labor, etc. And he says three things, namely, the labor of compilation so as to render [the readers] attentive; the mode of composition through what he says: We have compiled, etc. For what is compiled [compactum] is joined together from diverse things, just as the questions and authorities in this work are diverse. He also speaks by supposing the Author, when he says We have compiled, because in a verb of the first person a determinate acting person is understood.

§ 42. In the third, he touches upon the matter, when he says: The light established in eternity upon the testimonies of truth, etc., that is, in eternity: because the faith that is expressed in them concerns the first and eternal truth. Hence Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: "Faith is the unique foundation of believers, placing them in the truth, and the truth in them, with believers possessing the simple science of truth in incredible immutability."[40] And the Apostle: "For other foundation no man can lay, but that which is laid; which is Christ Jesus,"[41] that is, the faith of Jesus Christ.

§ 43. In the fourth, he touches upon the twofold form: namely, of the distinction of matter according to that act of form by which it distinguishes what is formed from others, when he says: In four books, etc. And the mode of his proofs which he uses according to the act of form by which it acts and is the principle of actions, when he says: In which the examples of the ancestors, etc. And "examples" refer to the similitudes he uses; but "doctrine" refers to authorities and other arguments.

§ 44. In the fifth, he touches upon the end, when he says: In which by the Lord's, etc. And a sincere profession of faith is the end per se; but the betrayal of heresy is the end per accidens: and it happens that these ends are attained by one and the same act, because the manifestation of truth is the destruction of falsity. Hence, Dionysius in his Epistle to Polycarp the Bishop: "Whatever this is according to the law of truth, when it has been rightly demonstrated and stands pure, everything that holds otherwise, and simulates the truth, will be reprehended, etc."[42]

§ 45. In the sixth and last, he touches upon the threefold mode of acting: namely, of attaining to the access of truth through reasons of faith, and by excluding errors, and this, there: The access of demonstrating. Secondly, he touches upon the mode between the subtle and the gross, when he says: Having tempered between both. Thirdly, he touches upon the mode between one's own invention and another's, there: But if anywhere too little, etc.

§ 46. And the lamp of truth, etc. "Neither do men light a candle [lamp] and put it under a bushel, etc."[43] Now, a lamp is a light in an earthen vessel; and here it is placed for the understanding of reason within the letter: because, as the Commentator on the first chapter of On the Divine Names says: "Authority is nothing else than the truth discovered by reason, committed to writing for the utility of posterity."

§ 48. He has not departed from the paternal bounds. The Master acted just as Dionysius teaches, in the book On the Divine Names: "Universally, one must not dare to say, nor even to think, anything else concerning the supersubstantial and hidden divinity, beyond those things which have been divinely expressed to us from the sacred oracles."[44]

§ 49. Therefore, this labor ought not, etc. This is the second part of the entire prologue, in which the utilities of this volume on the part of the listener or reader are determined. And he touches upon three things, namely, to whom it is useful, namely to the industrious unlearned [man]: and first he notes study, which implies some difficulty in the work; but secondly he notes a lack of science, which produces inquiry, because nothing is sought unless it is not possessed. Secondly, he touches upon the reason for its utility from brevity, when he says: In a brief volume, etc. Thirdly, he touches upon the reason for its utility from the matter, when he says: The sentences of the Fathers. And note that Avicenna says that a "sentence" is a definite and most certain conception. Isaac, moreover, in the Book of Definitions says almost the same thing thus: "A sentence is the conception of one part of a contradiction." And from the certitude of these sentences which are collected here, it is called the Book of Sentences.

§ 50. Now in this treatise, etc. Here the last part of the entire prologue is touched upon, in which the Author touches upon his habitude toward his readers. And he touches upon three things, namely, what kind of reader he desires: that is, pious, faithful, and benevolent out of charity. Hence Bernard on the Canticles: "Before the flesh has been tamed by the studies of discipline and enslaved to the spirit, before the pomp and burden of the world have been spurned and cast away, holy reading is unworthily presumed upon by the impure."[45]

§ 51. Secondly, he touches upon what kind of corrector he wishes to have, and where: namely, a free one. Now, a corrector is free, just as a man is free. But the Philosopher says that we call a man free when he is for his own sake, and not for another's;[46] so too a corrector is free, when he corrects solely for the sake of correction, and not for the sake of mockery or envy. And concerning this, Augustine speaks well thus: "I shall love more to be examined by the upright, than I shall fear to be bitten by the perverse. For most beautiful and modest charity gratefully receives the kiss of the dove; but most cautious humility either avoids the tooth of the dog, or most solid truth blunts it: and I shall desire rather to be reprehended by anyone, than to be praised either by one who errs or by one who flatters."[47]

§ 52. Thirdly, he terminates the prologue in this, that he adjoins titles for easier finding.

DISTINCTIO I

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text.

§ 53. The letter is expounded thus:

6. Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermones in Cantica Canticorum.

§ 54. By the preceding grace of God, because the intellect of sacred Scripture requires revelation; hence: "Open thou my eyes, and I will consider the wondrous things of thy law."

§ 55. With diligent investigation, that is, with diligent inquiry.

§ 56. Again and again, because [it is done] through reading and meditation, or reason and revelation, or literally and mystically.

§ 57. Studious speculation, regarding the exercise.

§ 59. First concerning things, in the first three books: and afterwards concerning signs, we shall discourse, in the fourth book.

§ 60. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. He already said above that things are learned through signs. But the principle of knowing something is prior to it. Therefore, one must treat of signs before things.

§ 61. 2. Furthermore, a sign causes the knowledge of a thing; therefore it is prior to it.

§ 62. Solution. This would be true if the sign and the thing were taken in the same order, namely, that the sign were the sign of that thing concerning which there is speech. But this is not true, because "things" are the enjoyable and the usable, the ones enjoying and the ones using, which are not per se signified by those signs that are treated in the fourth book. And therefore that objection does not proceed.

Divisio Textus

§ 63. Of the Old and New Law, etc. The doctrine of this book, which proceeds in the mode of disputation and is ordered toward the perfection of the intellect according to the science of Theology, is divided into three total parts. In the first of these, in a prooemial mode, he proposes the things concerning which, as parts of a subject, this doctrine is about. In the second, however, he executes the queries concerning the subject and its parts, so that science may be had of the subject and its properties [passions]. But because the matter is diffusely treated through four parts in the book, and certain parts of it are hidden, while others are more manifest (as those concerning eternal things, and those concerning the things that will be after the end of the world, are hidden; but those concerning created things are more manifest), therefore in the Epilogue at the end of the book he repeats the things concerning which he has spoken.

§ 64. Now the second part begins at the beginning of the second Distinction of the first book, there: This therefore by a true and pious faith, etc. But the third begins at the end of the fourth book, there: These concerning the feet.

§ 65. The first of these parts is contained in this present Distinction, and is divided into two parts. For in the first part, by dividing and defining through the authorities of the Saints, he investigates those things concerning which he will treat as a subject. Secondly, about to execute them, he summarily collects them and touches upon the order in which he executes them: and this is in the last chapter of this Distinction, there: Of all those things therefore which have been said, etc.

§ 66. The first of these is further divided into two: in the first of which, through authorities and divisions and distinctions, he inquires: Concerning what, as its subject, is the whole of Theology? But secondly he touches upon the surrounding doubts of what he has determined, there: C, But it is to be noted that the same Augustine, etc.

§ 67. The first of these is further subdivided into two, according to the fact that two things are required for a science: namely, that it be known what it is about as its subject, and that it be known what is sought concerning it (that is, which properties [passions] of that subject and its parts, or which of its properties, are to be investigated). The first of these contains the first chapter, where the Master proves that the treatise of Theology deals with things and signs. The second, however, begins in the second chapter, there: B, Therefore, that [is to be considered] in things, etc. And this is introduced because both things and signs are of a more common signification than is intended in this science; and therefore not all properties of things, nor all properties of signs, are inquired into here. Thus, it is necessary to determine according to which properties things and signs are to be inquired into.

Articulus 1 — How The Subject Of Theology Is Investigated

How does he investigate the subject of Theology?

§ 68. But an objection is raised against this definition, just as the Philosopher says:

§ 69. 1. Because concerning a subject, it is necessary to leave and suppose that it is. Therefore, if it is necessary to presuppose it, the Author does badly by investigating the subject of this science.

§ 70. 2. Again, Avicenna says in the first book of his First Philosophy that in no science is the subject and what is sought in it the same. But, as the Author says, the speculation of Theology is concerned with things and signs. Therefore, things and signs ought not to be sought in it. But the Author seeks them; therefore, he errs.

§ 71. The response to this is that one may consider a science in two ways. In one way, in comparison to the matter of which it is a science, and thus it is properly called a science, and it does not seek its own subject, but supposes it. In another way, insofar as it is a doctrine which has to proceed by a more facile mode of learning (as the Philosopher says), and thus certain sciences investigate their subjects: especially when they are hidden, as in the high sciences, of which the highest is Theology. And through this the solution to both is clear.

§ 72. In the first chapter, therefore, the Master touches upon five things. The first of which is the proof of the subject, through what leads into it, which is the preceding grace of God. The second is the proof of it through authority, there: For as the egregious Doctor Augustine, etc. The third is the exemplification of things and signs, there: Now properly here, etc. The fourth is the conclusion toward the other, namely that anyone notices this to be the form of Scripture, there: And when he has directed his intention to these, etc. The fifth and last is concerning the order of proceeding in the parts, there: Therefore, concerning these by us, etc. The letter is clear from the definition.

Articulus 2 — What The Subject Of Theology Is

What is the subject of Theology?

§ 73. But an objection is raised concerning what he says, that sacred Scripture is about things and signs.

§ 74. And four things are asked: of which the first is, what is the subject of Theology? The second, whether it is one science, or many? The third, whether it is speculative, or practical? The fourth concerns the modes of its expositions and proofs.

§ 75. Concerning the first it is proceeded thus: 1. Augustine says here that it is concerned with things and signs. And those things with which a science is concerned, by inquiring into their properties [passions] and differences, are its subjects. Therefore, things and signs are the subject of Theology.

§ 76. 2. But to the contrary: Master Hugh says in the first book On the Sacraments that the works of restoration are the matter of sacred Scripture, whereas the works of foundation are the matter of the other sciences.[48] But not all things pertain to the works of restoration. Therefore, things universally are not the subject, or a part of the subject, of this science.

§ 77. 3. Furthermore, Theology is named from Theos which is God, and logos, speech. Therefore, it is primarily about God. And the speech of a science is about its subject. Therefore, it seems that it is a science concerning God as its subject.

§ 78. 4. Again, sciences differ in nobility according to the difference and nobility of their subjects, as Priscian says. Since therefore Theology is the most noble science, it will be of the most noble subject; and this is none other than God. Therefore, God is its subject.

§ 79. 5. But further, it seems that the literal and the spiritual are the subject, because they are universally treated in it. Now, that is the subject with which a science is universally concerned. Therefore, the literal and the spiritual are the subject of Theology.

§ 80. Solution. It must be said that the "subject" of a science is spoken of in multiple ways: namely, generally and specially. Generally, in such a way that everything that is treated in a science is said to be the subject or a part of the subject. And in this way what Augustine says is true, that things and signs are the subject. Nevertheless, not absolutely insofar as they are things, nor absolutely insofar as they are signs; but insofar as they contribute in some way to the participation of beatitude. And Augustine notes this when he subjoins below, saying: But this is to be considered in things, that some things are those which are to be enjoyed, etc. As if to say:

9. Matt 5:15.

Theology does not speculate upon things absolutely insofar as they are things, but as they are ordered to the perfection of beatitude and fruition—toward which some are ordered as beatifying, but others as assisting and disposing toward beatitude, like useful things. It must similarly be said of signs, that they are not considered in the general acceptation of signs, but insofar as they demonstrate without containing, or demonstrate by containing, grace, which is the proper disposition to beatitude.

§ 81. In another way, a "subject" is spoken of specially, as that with which a science negotiates by proving properties (which are called passions) and differences concerning it through principles, namely proper ones. And in this way certain ancients said that the "credible" generally accepted is the subject of Theology. I call the "credible generally accepted" the preamble to an article [of faith], such as that God is truthful, that God is, that sacred Scripture was made by the Holy Spirit, that Scripture cannot fail, and things of this sort. And likewise the articles, which according to the division of those who published the I believe in God, are twelve; but according to another division, which is according to the things to be believed posited in the I believe in one God, are fourteen. And also that which follows upon those two on the part of good morals, such as that fornication is a mortal sin, and things of this sort. For concerning these, everything that is proven in sacred Scripture is proven. But a "special" subject is called that which is more worthy among the things considered in a science; and thus the subject of this science is God, from whom it is denominated. Yet He is not its subject merely absolutely, but according as He is the Alpha and the Omega, the principle and the end. Because thus those things which are in Him are considered in this science as principles from Him, which represent the marks of their maker: just as Augustine says, that all things cry out, "He made us, and not we ourselves."[49] But according as He is the end, thus are considered things ordered on account of Him to that end, as ordering dispositions, such as virtues, gifts, sacraments, and things of this sort.

Therefore, it must be said to the first [objection] that Augustine touches upon the subject according to its general acceptation, as has been said.

To another it must be said that the works of restoration are taken broadly by Hugh, insofar as they attain to restoration in any mode whatsoever, namely, as restoring effectively, such as God the Trinity; or by way of a mediator, such as the Word incarnate and having suffered; or by way of disposing, such as the differences of graces; or by way of showing, such as the signs of the old and new law.

To another it must be said that that objection proceeds well concerning the subject most specially spoken of, as is evident from what was previously established. Through the same also the solution to the following [objection] is evident.

To the last it must be said that the literal and the spiritual do not touch upon that which is the subject in this science, but rather a certain mode of its exposition, insofar as it is a doctrine, as will be said below.

10. Pseudo-Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus, c. 1, § 1.

Articulus 3 — Whether Theology Is One Science Or Several Whether Theology is one science, or many?

Secondly it is asked, whether it is one science? And it seems that it is not: because

§ 1. The Philosopher says that a science is one which is of one genus of subject but things and signs are not of one genus of subject: therefore there is not one science concerning them.

§ 2. Moreover, in this science it is treated of the life of the Patriarchs, of the state of the Angels, of the creation of the universe of things, and of morals, and of divine things, which are treated by the Philosophers in diverse sciences: therefore it seems that this science is not one science.

§ 3. Furthermore, the Philosopher says that there is one science which speculates on being as being, and those things which belong to being insofar as it is being and this is not one of the particular sciences, but is a universal science: therefore since thing and being are convertible, the science considering things as things, and those things which belong to a thing, will not be one particular science, but universal. Then thus: A universal science, although it is not united by one genus, is nevertheless united by proportion to one thing, just as first Philosophy which considers the parts of being, insofar as they look back to substance by analogy: therefore it seems that this science ought to do likewise: but it is evident that the things which are sought and treated in it cannot thus be reduced to one thing: therefore it seems that it is one neither by genus nor by proportion: thus it is in no way one.

Solution. It must be said that this science is one by proportion not to one thing that is the subject of others, just as substance is the subject of accidents: but by proportion to one thing that is the beatifying end: because in this way the beatifiable thing will be considered as participating in it, and the beatifying dispositions as removing [us] from its contrary: and the things of this world as aiding and supporting: as is plainly evident in the Letter from the authorities of Augustine.

To the first it must be said that although the things treated in this science are not one in supposit and subject, they are nonetheless one in the rationale of the said proportion.

To another it must be said that the created things in the world, and the life of the Patriarchs, and the like, are not considered in this science according to themselves, but according to a determinate rationale: for if this science were to consider the elements of the world and the things composed of elements, it would have to inquire about the principles of their actions and passions, and the other properties which are inquired into in natural Philosophy. But it receives them insofar as they come into the use of him who progresses towards beatitude: into use, I say, according to my intellect in thinking through them upon the Creator, or according to work in aiding toward beatitude, according to what is said in Canticles 2:6: His left hand is under my head, etc. Similarly, it receives the acts of the Fathers not as particular acts, because in this way there is no science of them: but as certain examples which have the force of principles in morals or in faith: for in the science which is [given] so that we may become good, that mode is more proper which is through examples, because they are more apt for works than universals: and thus it is evident how all the acts of the Fathers fall into one useful rationale, and in this mode they belong to this science.

To another it must be said that this science is not universal by the universality of being, or of a subject, as first Philosophy is: because it does not receive things insofar as they are things, but rather (as was established above from the authority of Augustine) where he determines what the treatise of this science considers in things.

Articulus 4 — Whether Theology Is A Speculative Science Or A Practical Science

Whether Theology is a speculative science, or a practical one?

Thirdly it is asked, whether it is a speculative science, or a practical one? And it seems that it is not practical: because

§ 1. Thus says the Philosopher: All practical [sciences] are sought for the sake of another, because [they are] for the sake of work: and therefore none of them is worthy to be called by the name of a free wisdom but this science is most worthy: therefore it is not sought for the sake of another, and is principally called by the name of wisdom, and among all it is the most free: therefore it is not practical.

§ 2. Moreover, the perfect in a science and the imperfect do not differ in genus: but the perfection of this science is the contemplation of God in the homeland: therefore the science which is on the way, although more imperfect, is towards the same thing: but the contemplation of truth, especially of the first and highest truth, is the perfection of the speculative intellect: therefore it seems that this science is speculative.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 3. The life of the Fathers, prophecy, and the Gospels, and the law, and the epistles, and all the things singly which are in it, are precepts tending toward the observation of the commandments in work: therefore it will be moral, or subalternated to it.

§ 4. Moreover, James 1:25: He who looks into the perfect law of liberty, and continues therein, not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed: therefore it seems that it is for work, and not for speculation.

Solution. It must be said that this science is to be determined from its end: but the end is stated, to Titus 1:1 and 2, where it is said: Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the acknowledgment of the truth which is according to piety, unto the hope of life everlasting. And there the Gloss says, according to piety, that is, the religion of Christ. And he says this for the reason that there is truth in the liberal arts, but which pertains not at all to the Christian religion. But of the truth which is according to piety, there are two things: one, namely, according to piety is the worship of God in oneself and in one's members, to which pertain all things promoting that worship. But the other is the end of the intention, and this is to be conjoined in intellect, in affection, and in substance with Him who is worshipped, insofar as He is the beatifying end: and therefore this science is properly affective, that is, [it is] of a truth which is not separated from the rationale of the good, and therefore it perfects both the intellect and the affection. But such an end is not found in created things: and therefore the Philosophers did not treat of such a science: but they divided one toward the true which is in things, and another toward the good which is in them.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that this science is most principally called wisdom, because it is of the highest things, and in the highest mode: because it is of God through the principles of faith: but the other sciences which were invented by the Philosophers, even if they are called wisdoms because they are of high things, are nevertheless not in the highest mode, but rather through principles which are under reason. Thus I also say, that it either alone is free, or freer than the others: for a science is called free (as the Philosopher says) just as a free man, namely, because it is for its own sake, and not for the sake of another: and this is on account of the known thing which is sought in it, which is desired for its own sake: but this is principally God, whom all desire to know by a beatifying science: and therefore it is free, because this known thing is not sought for the sake of another, but for its own sake.

To that which is further objected, it must be said that cognition towards truth is not sought through the intellect alone, but through the affection and substance: and therefore it is not intellective, but affective: because the intellect is ordered to the affection as to an end.

To another thing which is objected against this, it must be said that the end of that doctrine is determined by the Apostle, to Titus 1:9, where it is said: Embracing that faithful word which is according to doctrine, that he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine, and to convince the gainsayers. But the end of the science is twofold, namely the ultimate, and that which is ordered to it. That which by some is called the ultimate end, is the beatifying affective truth: but the end short of that is, that we may become good. Nor yet does it follow that it is moral Philosophy, or subalternated to it: it is not moral, because morals are not the ultimate end in it, as has been established: it is not subalternated, because a subalternated science receives the principles and causes of the subalternating one: but this science does not receive from any [other], but has its own principles of faith and its own causes according to the intention of merit, and therefore it does not receive from others, but the others are handmaids to it.

Articulus 5 — On The Modes Of Expounding Sacred Scripture

Concerning the modes of expounding sacred Scripture.

Fourthly and lastly, it is asked concerning the mode of its expositions and probations.

And it is objected thus: Every science distinct from others has its own governing habit and its own instrument, by which it proceeds to use and to work, just as rational Philosophy has opinion, and the syllogism, or argument: this science is distinct from others: therefore it has its own governing habit in it, and an instrument.

13. Prov 22:28.

Which we concede, saying that its habit is the light of faith: but the instrument is twofold according to the twofold end of the doctrine and art, which twofold end is promised in the authority of the Apostle, namely, to exhort in sound doctrine, and to convince the gainsayers.

And with respect to exhortation it has a fourfold exposition, namely the historical, allegorical, moral, and anagogical: the number of which modes can be taken in a twofold way, namely with respect to the expositor, and with respect to the things expounded.

With respect to the expositor thus: First there occurs the sense showing the history, and therefore the historical sense is in the intellect insofar as it reflects upon sense. But there surround the intellect three things still, namely the illuminating habit which is faith, and thus in it there is the allegorical sense which builds up faith, as Gregory says. Practical intellect also surrounds it, and thus in it through reflection upon praxis or work, there is the moral sense. The third thing which surrounds it, is the beatifying end, and thus in it through conversion to it, there is the anagogical sense. But since no more things surround the intellect, there are no more senses of Scripture.

With respect to the things expounded this number is taken thus: Scripture can be considered with respect to what is intended by the writer, or with respect to what is intended by the Spirit inspiring and illuminating. If in the first mode, thus is the historical sense: if in the second mode, the intent by the Spirit is either with respect to the way, or with respect to the homeland: if with respect to the way, either according to the truth of faith, and thus is the allegorical sense: or according to the good of works, and thus is the moral: but if the intent is with respect to the homeland, then it is anagogical.

But insofar as it is the end, namely to convince the gainsayers, it has another mode. For a contradictor is not refuted except by two means, namely by the probation of truth, and by the manifestation of error. But this does not occur except through an appropriate argumentation taken from the rationale of authority, or of natural reason, or of an appropriate similitude: and thus in this mode such an argumentation will be its instrument, and (as is evident in the proemium) this mode belongs to the science of this book, but the other modes are observed in the Bible.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Division Into Things And Signs Is Good

Whether the division into things and signs is a good one?

But we must return again to the Letter, to that which Augustine says: All doctrine is either of things, or of signs, etc.

§ 1. For this division does not seem to be by opposites: because, as he says below: Every sign is also some thing: therefore one of the dividing parts is predicated of the other, and thus it is not by opposites.

§ 2. Moreover, when Augustine says, All doctrine, such is either understood of universal doctrine, or of the doctrine of sacred Scripture. If universally, then it seems to be false: because

14. 2 Tim 4:3.

Avicenna says that some sciences are of the things of nature: but some are of those things which are done by us: but some are of those things which are done by the intellect, such as to know concerning speech: but some are of those things which are done by mere will, as the moral sciences: and thus it seems that things and signs do not universally comprehend all doctrine, especially insofar as sign here is taken for a sacrament demonstrating and causing grace. But if it is understood of this doctrine only, then it still seems to be false: because some things are things and signs, like the baptismal character, and the true body of Christ, and the like.

§ 3. Furthermore, whatever is in sacred Scripture is received as a sign. PROOF: For to the ancients all things happened in a figure. But all the things of the world are received in the rationale of signifying the Creator: therefore it is the same doctrine concerning things and concerning signs: therefore not either of things, or of signs under opposition, as Augustine says.

TO THIS IT MUST BE SAID, that this division is not by opposite things, but by opposite rationales. But these rationales are the absolute, or the related to another according to the rationale of signifying. But a thing is called here absolute: because the intention of the name thing does not state a relation to something, just as a sign states the relation of a sign to the signified: which is proven by the rationale of a sign posited in the beginning of the fourth book: A sign is that which, besides the species which it brings to the senses, causes something else to come into knowledge. But a thing in an absolute understanding is taken apart from the rationale of a sign, and although it is sometimes taken in the rationale of the useful, and thus is related to something, then even that relation does not have the rationale of the relation of a sign: and thus it is evident, that it is by opposite rationales, although the supposits may sometimes be the same.

To another it must be said that just as in the original in the first book, namely, of Christian Doctrine, Augustine understands [it] universally of all doctrine: but then thing is received, whether it be caused by nature, or by our work. But sign is taken broadly for that which is instituted to signify: and thus it is evident how it comprehends the division of the Philosopher. But if we say that it is taken specially for the doctrine of sacred Scripture, then the whole is of things and signs, just as was set forth above in the question concerning the subject of Theology.

To that which is objected, that the thing and the sign are the same, it must be said that they are not according to the same respect, nor according to the same rationale: just as the character is a sign of grace, and the thing of the exterior washing: and the true body of Christ is a thing with respect to the visible species, and a sign with respect to the subsequent grace.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Sacraments Of The Old Law Conferred Grace

Whether the sacraments of the old law conferred grace?

15. Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermones in Cantica Canticorum.

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, that Of these, namely signs, there are some, of which the whole use is in signifying, not in justifying, etc. For from this it seems that the sacraments of the old law conferred grace.

§ 1. For the Apostle, to Galatians 3:12, says of the Fathers of the law: He who does them, shall live in them: but life is not except through grace: therefore the works of the sacraments of the old law conferred grace.

§ 2. Moreover, Hugh of St. Victor in the book on the Sacraments, in the eighth part of the first book, says thus: From the time that man, having fallen from the state of first incorruption, began to be sick in the body through mortality, and in the soul through iniquity, immediately God, by way of repairing man, prepared medicine in His sacraments: but He did not prepare [them] then except through the sacraments of the old law: therefore they were medicine, and not except through grace: therefore, etc.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. The Apostle, to Galatians 3:21: If there had been a law given which could justify, truly justice should have been by the law: but by the law there is not justice: therefore the law from its legal sacraments could not justify.

§ 2. Moreover, to Hebrews 9:10, it is said that they were justifications of the flesh imposed until the time of correction: therefore they were not justifications of the spirit.

§ 3. Moreover, in the same place, v. 13: The ashes of an heifer sprinkled sanctifieth the defiled to the cleansing of the flesh.

§ 4. Moreover, in the same place, v. 9: They could never make the comer perfect: therefore they did not justify.

§ 5. Moreover, to Hebrews 10:1: The law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image, etc.

FURTHERMORE it is asked additionally, why the Master says, that some legal sacraments [did not confer grace], as though some had conferred grace, and some not?

And it is commonly said that he says this on account of circumcision which conferred grace, as Bede and Gregory say, thus: Circumcision provided in the law the same help of a salutary cure against the wound of original sin, which baptism has been accustomed to do in the time of revealed grace, except that it did not open the door of the heavenly kingdom.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. A sacrament does not cause except through the mode by which it signifies: but circumcision does not signify except through removal: therefore it does not cause except that which is removed: but grace is not removed, but sin is: therefore it did not cause the conferring of grace.

§ 2. Moreover, a removal in part is not a sign of removal in whole: but in circumcision only a part was removed: therefore it did not cause the removal of that which is removed in whole, but the removal of that which was removed in part: but this is the penalty of concupiscence, and not the sin: because the sin was removed in whole, but the proneness in part: therefore circumcision did not cause anything except the diminution of the proneness of concupiscence, and not the removal of sin.

SOLUTION. It must be said that there was a threefold difference between the sacraments of the old and the new law: of which the first and principal is taken on the part of the sacrament by which it causes that which it designates. For the former only signified grace: but ours signify, and cause. The second is according to Hugh of St. Victor, which is taken on the part of the mode of signifying, namely, that the former signified our sacraments, and thus were signs of signs: but ours signify grace, and are signs of things. The third is that by the former (as Hugh says) the ancient just were imbued, who did not enter the door of the heavenly kingdom: but by ours the unjust are imbued, or those who wish to lay aside injustice, and they have opened the door of the heavenly kingdom. Whence the Master speaks the truth.

To that which is objected against this, it must be said that the Apostle, to Galatians 3:12, speaks of the decalogue, and not of the works of the sacraments. Or it may be said (as the ancient Masters said, and well) that there is the work of the worker (opus operantis), and there is the operation itself (opus operatum), and this is considered according to the root from which it proceeds, which in the ancient saints was the charity of God instituting the sacraments, and the obedience of the law, and with respect to this they conferred life. But there is the worked work (opus operatum) such as a sacrificed goat or calf, and this conferred nothing: but in the sacraments of the new law it confers both.

To another it must be said that there is a preparation according to the rationale of signifying, and this God made from the beginning of the world from when man sinned, both in the law of nature, and to Moses. There is also a preparation of medicine according to the rationale of causing, and this He did not exhibit until the inception of the New Testament.

But the authorities which are adduced to the contrary, speak of the worked works.

To that which is further objected concerning circumcision, it must be said that as the objection proves, circumcision did not delete sin except indirectly. How this was is evident thus: Original fault and that guilt which is the lack of the vision of God, were annexed, and similarly annexed to these is the burning of the fomes [of sin]: and if the sin ought to be removed directly, it would be necessary that something per se would remove the sin, and consequently would diminish the burning of the fomes: but now circumcision in the person diminishes the burning which is removed in part: but because this cannot be diminished unless the guilt of lack and the fault be removed, which cannot be removed in part but [only] in whole: therefore as a consequence circumcision removes the fault. And this is what the ancient Masters said, that circumcision not per se, but through the merit of faith deleted the fault: and it did not signify this directly, but indirectly, positing its signified thing upon that which is posterior according to nature in the deletion of sin. But because a man cannot be in a middle state between fault and grace: therefore the conferring of grace follows the deletion of fault, and thus indirectly, by accident, it conferred grace, and on account of this it is excepted by the

17. Augustine, De Trinitate, II, Prooemium, 1.

Master from the other sacraments of the old law, which in no way according to themselves conferred grace: not for the reason that circumcision is from the law, but from the fathers.

To the authority of Bede it must be said that it did confer, but not in the same mode: because baptism [by] a direct operation, but circumcision indirect.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

The letter of this part is expounded thus:

To arrive, through faith and hope.

And to adhere to them, through charity.

If nevertheless it ought to be called a thing. This happens for the reason that names of this kind, according to how they fall into our intellect, signify created things or modes of creatures which do not pertain to God, just as (he says here) the very thing I speak of, res (thing) draws its signification from reor, reris (I think, you think), and thus it seems to say sometimes a being in opinion: and these do not pertain to God.

If nevertheless also a cause, because a cause is that which something follows of necessity, and God does not cause anything of necessity. Also: because a cause is proportioned to the caused thing: but God is not proportioned to any of His caused things.

A name cannot be found, etc. Anselm renders the cause of this in the Monologion, saying, that although the highest essence is named from all things which it is better to be than not to be, nevertheless if these names be accepted according to what they sound [like] among us, according to the rationales of the names they do not pertain to God, although according to the thing itself they pertain to God prior to the creature: according to the name it sounds among us that it is a subject to accidents, and thus it does not pertain to God. Similarly, essence among us is that which causes being in a composite, and thus again it does not pertain to God. And Dionysius says the same, that affirmations regarding God are disjointed [loose], but negations are true.

That the invisible things of God might be clearly seen, being understood through the things that are made, [happens] in two ways, namely through aspect, and through the relation of the useful they may be acquired to them.

And this he intimates through the following when he says: That is, as of temporal things, etc.: We enjoy known things, in which very things the delighted will rests for their own sake, that is, it rests together with the other powers because it has been said that to enjoy is an act of the will, according as the will is conjoined to the intellect, and to the other powers.

18. Matt 5:15.

Articulus 8 — Whether Things Are Well Divided Into Things To Be Enjoyed And Things To Be Used

Whether things are well divided into enjoyable things, and useful things?

It follows: Therefore that in things, etc.

In this part the Master determines what is to be sought in things, because things according to their generality, in that they are things, are not sought here: and he posits the division of things according as they come into this speculation, namely, that they are enjoyable things, or useful things, or those enjoying and using.

And he manifests this division in four modes, namely, from the effect, when he says: Those things which are to be enjoyed, etc. Secondly, from the act which is of the enjoyer upon the enjoyable thing, and of the user upon the useful thing, there, But to enjoy, etc. Thirdly, from the supposits, there, Therefore the things which are to be enjoyed, etc. Fourthly, from property, there, In the same in all things, etc. And through these the sentence of this part is evident.

But a doubt arises concerning the first division which he posits saying, that of things some are to be enjoyed,

§ 1. In every division the divided thing is simpler than the dividing parts, and it is by participation in each one of them: therefore this divided thing is also simpler than the things, and is in them by participation. But if this is granted, AGAINST THIS: The enjoyable thing is God: therefore God participates in something simpler than Himself, and thus He will be composite.

§ 2. Moreover, in every division the divided thing is common to the dividing parts: but the dividing parts are Creator and creature: therefore something is univocal to Creator and creature, which is false. The PROOF consists in this, that this division is not of an equivocal [term] in its significations: because the divided thing would not be permitted plurally, just as we do not say: Of dogs (canes), one is capable of barking, another is a heavenly star, etc.

Solution. It must be said that nothing is common to Creator and creature univocally: nor even by such an analogy that the same thing is participated in prior and posterior ways by Creator and creature: because the Creator has nothing by participation, but by essence and substance. But there is a community of proportion to one thing, which substantially convenes first to the Creator: but from Him, and posteriorly under Him, and to Him, it convenes to the creature: just as life, wisdom, and the good convene to the Creator, and to the creature.

THEREFORE IT MUST BE SAID to the first argument, that it does not proceed unless the divided thing were to convene univocally to the dividing parts, which is not true, as is evident from what has been said.

Through the same the solution to the others is evident which are concerning a divided thing univocally convening to dividing parts: nor do I say, however, that it convenes to the dividing parts altogether equivocally, but it convenes by prior and posterior according to a determinate mode of prior and posterior.

Articulus 9 — Whether Beatitude Is To Be Enjoyed

Whether happiness is to be enjoyed?

Then it is objected against this which he says: Those which are to be enjoyed, etc.

§ 1. For happiness makes us happy: therefore happiness is to be enjoyed. If perhaps it should be said, as it is commonly solved, that when Augustine says that the things which are to be enjoyed make us happy, it is understood effectively: but happiness makes us happy formally: just as whiteness makes [a thing] white formally, and a painter makes it white effectively: and therefore happiness is not to be enjoyed: because it does not make us happy effectively. If, I say, it should be said thus, AGAINST THIS: Happiness is that after which nothing else is desired. PROOF: Happiness (as Boethius says) is the state made perfect by the aggregation of all goods therefore after happiness nothing else of desirable things remains: but the ultimate is that which we enjoy, because this quiets desire: therefore we enjoy happiness.

§ 2. Furthermore, all useful things are to be referred to happiness, as Augustine says: therefore happiness is not referred to another: therefore we enjoy happiness: because we enjoy that which we desire for its own sake and not for the sake of another.

§ 3. Furthermore, either happiness is referred to another, or not: if so, AGAINST THIS: Whatever is referred to another, this is outside that to which it is referred: happiness is referred to another: therefore some of the goods is outside the referred happiness: therefore it is not the state made perfect by the aggregation of all goods, which is false. But if it is not referred to anything: therefore we adhere to it for its own sake: therefore not except by love: therefore we enjoy happiness: because we enjoy that to which we adhere by love for its own sake.

SOLUTION. It must be said that happiness is twofold, namely, created, which is put together from the goods of grace crossing over into glory, and this is the formal perfection of the blessed, elevating them to the point that they may be immediately conjoined to God. But the other happiness is uncreated, and this is substantial happiness, and is considered in two modes, namely as participated by the Saints, and thus it is God as the highest good in the Saints and the blessed: or as in itself, and thus it is happiness as in the object of happiness. I say therefore, that we enjoy uncreated happiness in both modes: but we use created happiness with the taste of the joy of fruition, because it unites us to the enjoyable thing. But we concede the common solution, that created happiness formally beatifies us, while uncreated [beatifies us] effectively as in an object, and as parti-

20. Luke 17:12.

§ 1. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that after formal beatitude, something else is desired: because the uncreated good is beatifying, as has been said. And to the definition of Boethius, it must be said that it is understood concerning participated uncreated beatitude: because otherwise not all goods will be in it, since the greatest of goods would be lacking without which nothing is good.

§ 2. To the other, it must be said that created beatitude is referred to uncreated beatitude: but nevertheless it is itself useful, in relation to which the fruit of uncreated beatitude is already tasted.

§ 3. To the other, it must be said in the same way.

Articulus 10 — Whether Creatures Help Man Toward Beatitude

Do creatures help human beings toward beatitude?

Next, it is inquired concerning that which he says: Those things which are to be used, tending toward beatitude, etc.

§ 1. For to the contrary seems to be what is said in Wisdom 14:11: The creatures of God have been made into a hatred, and a temptation for the souls of men, and a snare for the feet of the unwise: therefore it seems that they rather impede from beatitude than promote it.

§ 2. Again, Augustine in the book Of Confessions: "Woe to those who love your nods in place of you" .

§ 3. Solution. The force is in what he says, tending: for he implies that those who do not tend are not helped. Or better it may be said, that every creature, insofar as it shows a sign of the Creator and offers a use, helps toward beatitude, but insofar as there is a corrupted affection concerning it on the part of the one who ought to use it, it impedes and draws back, and this is by accident. And note that it promotes in three ways, namely by showing the way through a trace, and this is general to every creature: or by helping nature toward necessity and solace, like food, clothes, and the like: or thirdly, by bringing a human being back into a cognition of his own infirmity and misery, as do those things which exercise a human being.

Articulus 11 — Whether Men Are Intermediate Between Things To Be Used And Things To Be Enjoyed

Are human beings intermediaries between things to be used and things to be enjoyed?

Next, it is inquired concerning that which he says: Things indeed which enjoy and use, etc.

To the contrary: § 1. Below he says that we use human beings whom we love, and also Angels: therefore human beings and Angels are contained under things to be used: therefore they do not make a third member in the division.

§ 2. Again, everything that is, is either an end, or for the end: but just as the end and that which is for the end differ, so do the useable and the enjoyable differ: therefore everything that is, is either useable or enjoyable: and thus he errs by appending a third member.

§ 3. Moreover, it is inquired further concerning that which he says: Constituted between both, etc. For from this it seems that useable things are below the human being, and enjoyable things above him. But to the contrary: Augustine in the book On Free Choice: "Virtues without which it cannot be lived rightly, and by which it is lived rightly, are maximum goods: but the powers of the soul without which it cannot be lived rightly, and by which it is not necessarily lived rightly, are intermediate goods: but the species of any bodies whatsoever, without which it is lived rightly, are minimal goods" therefore it seems a human being is not among intermediate goods.

§ 4. Moreover, we use virtues, as he will say below: and yet Augustine says they themselves are great goods.

§ 5. Again, a greater good is that by which it is lived well and no one uses badly, than that which someone can use badly: but no one uses virtues badly, as is held through Augustine in the second distinction of this volume, dist. 28: therefore virtues are a greater good than the human being.

§ 6. Moreover, that is an intermediary which conjoins the extremes: but the extremes are the beatifying and the beatificable: therefore that which conjoins them is the intermediary: but the useable conjoins them: therefore it itself is the intermediary: therefore we are not the intermediary between useable things and enjoyable things.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that this division is given according to those things which are required for the progress of the rational creature into God: for three things are required, namely the one progressing, the way, and the terminus. The one progressing is the human being, the way is the useable, and the terminus is the enjoyable.

§ 8. To the first objection to the contrary, therefore, it must be said that according to a broad acceptance of the useable, a human being and an Angel are contained under the useable: but nevertheless they also have another relation to the way into the enjoyable, namely as using and enjoying, and according to this which a human being and an Angel add over and above the useable, they thus constitute a third member in the division.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that the useable, considered in a passive acceptance, does not denote the one using, and thus it does not suppose everything that is for the end, but only that which is as a way to the end, and not that which is as progressing on it: and therefore the end, and that which is for the end, do not altogether relate as the useable and the enjoyable, unless the useable is taken very broadly insofar as it comprehends the one using who is toward the end as progressing, and the useable which is toward the end as a way.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that "good" is taken in one way by Augustine in the book On Free Choice, and in another way here. For there the comparison of the good is attended to according to the order of a cause to making certitude in life and work: whence a greater good is that which holds itself as an immediate and perfect cause to a good life, such as virtue, than that which holds itself as an insufficient and remote cause, such as the powers of the rational soul, the will, and the intellect, and others, without which indeed life is not right, and yet they do not make it. But the species of bodies, like beauty, health, and the like, only have a slight cause by accident and occasionally toward it. But here the comparison is attended to between the progress toward beatitude and those things which perfect it: and therefore the maximum is the beatifying: the intermediary is that which participates in beatitude: the minimal is that which does not participate, and yet helps toward the participation of it. And it is not unfitting that there be diverse comparisons according to diverse accounts of goods.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that virtues are maximum goods formed according to the perfection of life: but they are lesser in the order toward the participation of beatitude than the rational nature which participates in it according to life and taste. And through this the solution to the following is also evident.

§ 12. To the last it must be said that virtue is an intermediary, and the rational nature is an intermediary in diverse respects: for virtue is intermediate as a conjoining disposition, and similarly created beatitude. But the rational nature is intermediate through the participation of both extremes. For it itself participates in the use of the useable, and the fruit of the beatifying, and thus Augustine speaks here.

Articulus 12 — Whether The First Definition Of The Word To Enjoy Is Good

Is the first definition of the verb "to enjoy" good?

Next, it is inquired concerning that which he says: To enjoy is to inhere by love to a thing for its own sake, etc. For by this that he says, by love, to enjoy seems to be an act of the motive power.

But to the contrary: § 1. To enjoy is the highest act of the homeland according to which a human being inheres in God: therefore it will be of the highest power: but this is the intellective: therefore it seems that to enjoy is an act of intelligence or intellect.

§ 2. Moreover, there is no motion in the motive [power] unless an intellective apprehension first takes place: therefore an inherence (which is a motion) does not take place unless it is first conceived through the intellect: therefore the conception of the enjoyable belongs to the intellect before the will: therefore it ought rather to be defined through a habit of the intellect than of the will.

§ 3. It seems to the contrary, however, that it is not an act of any power: for the proper acts of the powers are denominated from them, as to see from sight, to understand from intellect: but to enjoy is not denominated from any of the powers simply: therefore it seems that it is not singularly an act of any power.

§ 4. If on account of this it is said that it is an act composed from the acts of several powers. To the contrary: As a power relates to a power, so an act to an act: but a power is not composed with a power to perfect a third: therefore neither is an act with an act; therefore to enjoy is not a composite act, nor even simple, as was proved earlier: therefore it is not an act of any power of the soul.

§ 5. Again, if it were a composite act, then it ought to be defined through the habits of several powers: but it is defined only through the habit of one power, namely love: therefore it seems that it is not a composite act of some powers.

Further it is inquired: § 1. Why is it defined through love: for there are three things pertaining to the perfection of inherence, namely vision through faith, comprehension through hope, and inherence through love; therefore to enjoy ought to be defined through all of those.

§ 2. Moreover, every sin separates from God: therefore by opposites every virtue conjoins to God: therefore by any virtue we inhere in God, and not only by love.

Further it is inquired concerning that which he says: To a thing. For by this he seems to signify that we can inhere by love to something other than God for its own sake.

BUT TO THE CONTRARY: § 1. We do not enjoy properly and perfectly and for its own sake, except God, as will be said below: but a thing is defined from that which per se and properly and perfectly belongs to it: therefore to enjoy ought not to be defined through inhering to a thing in general, but to God.

§ 2. Moreover, nothing is natively apt to quiet desire except God alone. Whence Augustine in the first of the Confessions: "You have made us, O Lord, toward you, and our heart is unquiet until it rests in you" . But the inherence of fruition totally quiets desire; therefore it ought not to be defined through just any thing, but through God alone.

But to the contrary: Augustine: "Every human perversity is to enjoy things to be used, and to use things to be enjoyed": therefore it happens also to enjoy other things, therefore not God alone.

Further it is also inquired concerning that which he says: For its own sake.

§ 1. For that to which we inhere on account of love, we do not inhere for its own sake: but we inhere to the enjoyable on account of love: therefore not for its own sake.

§ 2. Moreover, some object thus: To enjoy is to inhere by love, etc., but love is a creature: therefore we inhere to a creature.

§ 3. Moreover, any creature is infinitely distant from the Creator: therefore that which conjoins us through inherence, namely love, is of infinite distance to Him: but it cannot be, because that which conjoins two things must attain to both of the conjoined things.

§ 4. Again, to enjoy, according to Augustine, is to inhere by love to a thing for its own sake: but love itself is loved for its own sake: therefore by love we inhere to love for its own sake: and of that love there is the same account: therefore this will go on to infinity.

24. Cicero, De Inventione (sometimes referred to as Rhetorica), II. Wait, usually refers to Rhetorica ad Herennium, III, 13, 23.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said to the first, that to enjoy is an act of the affect following an act of the intellect insofar as it is of this sort, and not an act of the affect simply. And I call the affect the will, and this is the highest power of the soul: because in it as in a completive its joy is perfected, and the whole affect is quieted. To enjoy is also not taken as something that remains only in speculation: because speculation of itself does not posit inherence, but can be through the distance of the thing from the speculator: but fruit posits a union and a taste of substantial sweetness more intimately founded in the complexion and nature of the thing: and therefore although the intellect is in a higher part of the soul, nevertheless it is not alone there, but also the will; and the perfection of inherence in the fruit belongs to the act of the will.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that habitually or actually, according to the nature of the intellect, it first conceives and contemplates: yet the perfection of inherence and joy does not belong to the conceiving of it, but belongs to the act of the will: and therefore to enjoy is defined through the habit of the will, because the act of the will also completes it.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that the acts of the powers are twofold: for some are of them according to themselves, that is, according as they are referred to their objects absolutely, and those are denominated from them, such as to see, to understand, to will: but some are in them according as one is ordered to another, and then something of the preceding remains in the account of the act of the following power: and there are five such acts in the order of the cognitive powers to each other only, such as to know (scientifically), to believe, to opine, and the like. For to know is not named by the name of any one power: for it is not called intellect, nor reason simply, but reason formed from the principles of which there is intellect: but there are five in the order of the motive [powers] to the cognitive, such as to elect, to use, to enjoy, and the like; and those cannot be denominated from one power: because they are not of one absolutely, but according as it is ordered to the others.

§ 8. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that a power is not composed with a power to perfect a third power, but is well ordered to it to perfect an act of another account than the one which is its own absolutely.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that in the definition of another thing it is not necessary to posit those things which are by way of preceding dispositions: but it suffices that the completive form be posited, and thus love is posited in the definition of to enjoy, for the reason that in it it is completed and perfected.

§ 10. TO THAT WHICH IS FURTHER INQUIRED, some say that love in the definition of that which is to enjoy, is not posited with the special understanding of charity, but rather generally, according as it is a certain form of every virtue, according to what Augustine says in the book On the Morals of the Catholic Church, that virtue is nothing other than the order of love: and therefore the objection does not hold concerning that which succeeds faith, and hope: because that is not thus formal in every virtue. And according to them it must be said that fruit is confected from all the virtues. But it seems better to us, that love supposes the love of charity: because that love alone causes a perfect inherence: for because it is completive of fruition, therefore it is posited in its definition: whereas the other virtues, although they dispose on the part of the subject, nevertheless do not complete. And this is evident thus: For vision denotes a conversion upon a presence only: but comprehension, which succeeds hope, denotes an adherence: but love, because it is a binding power, and an acute mobile, penetrating the beloved, as Dionysius says, denotes an inherence.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that it does not suffice that a virtue conjoin to God absolutely in order that it be posited in the definition of fruition. For the conjunction is twofold, namely through merit, and through a certain quasi-contact. For through merit every virtue conjoins to God: but through contact the conjunction occurs in three ways, namely according to presence, and this is when the intellect attains the thing in its essence, but does not necessarily hold and have it: whence it is assimilated to a mathematical quasi-contact, in which the ultimate tangentials are only together. The second is quasi through adherence and holding and having, and this is the contact of that which succeeds hope, and it is assimilated to a quasi-contact of compacted things. The third is through inherence, when one as it were enters the other, and contracts impressions and affections from its nature: and this is the contact of love, and is assimilated to a natural contact, in which the tangentials act and suffer mutually, and impress their properties upon one another. And the first mode of conjunction is as a material disposition toward fruition. But the second and third hold themselves near: but the third is completive: and this is evident from the name of that which is fruit, because this is the taste of a quieting sweetness, and that taste is elicited only from the interiors of the thing which are of the nature and complexion of that which we enjoy.

§ 12. To the other that is further inquired, concerning this that he says: To a thing, It must be said that Augustine notes the commonality of that which is to enjoy: because this happens in as many ways as it happens to posit the end of dilection in something: and this happens in one way according to sense, as brute animals enjoy foods, as Augustine says, but improperly, for the reason that although delight is in them as in an end, nevertheless they do not sufficiently apprehend the account of an end: but in those who are naturally apt to discern an end to be sought per se, or by seeking per se, it happens to enjoy whatever thing more properly: but in those who are naturally apt to discern the end of delight, and actually discern it according to right reason, it is most proper: and therefore we do not enjoy except God properly: but commonly it happens also to enjoy other things, and things other than the rational creature.

§ 13. To the other it must be said that nothing is naturally apt to quiet the rational appetite except God, according as it progresses according to right reason: but when it is averted, it takes the non-quieting as quieting, on account of a "good as of now" which it apprehends in it.

§ 14. To that which is further inquired, concerning that which he says: For its own sake, It must be said that it does not follow, if we inhere by love, that it is not for its own sake: because the word propter in the definition of that which is to enjoy denotes a twofold cause, namely efficient and final: while the word rei [of a thing] also posits the matter in which we enjoy, which is the object of the act of fruition: but the word amore [by love] denotes the moving and inciting cause on the part of the enjoying affect, just as a habit has [the capacity] to excite and move a power to an act: and this is a motion of the form rather than of the efficient [cause].

26. Aristotle, Metaphysics, I, 2, 982b25.

§ 15. To the other it must be said that when it is said, "We enjoy a creature," the ablative can be construed with the verb in the account of a form, or in the account of an efficient and an object. And in the first way the locution is true, in the second way false.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that a creature, insofar as it is from nothing, is infinitely distant, and does not perfect a conjunction with God: but there are some creatures which on account of a likeness of the divine goodness by which they were created, are never separated from God, but whenever they are had, God is always had, such as grace making pleasing, and the chief among those is the love of charity, and those can conjoin.

§ 17. To the last it must be said that when it is said, "Love is loved by love," there is not a diverse love in the act of the verb, and in the matter of the act, and in the habit from which that act goes forth: but it is one and the same signified in different ways. Whence, just as there is no diverse vision by which I see a wall, and see myself seeing: and just as there is no diverse intellect by which I understand a man, and understand myself understanding: so there is no diverse love by which I love God, and I love loving myself, or my love. And indeed many say this: but many do not understand it. But the cause of this is: because when I say, "I understand a man," the intellective power passes over to the man through the act of understanding which is from the intellect: therefore according to reason, the same power is prior in act, as well as the acceptance of it: and so on the part of the motive [powers], when I say, "I love God": for the power of love passes over into God through the act of love, and so it is left that the same power in act passes over into the object. Since therefore the love is not diverse, it is evident that it does not go to infinity.

Articulus 13 — Whether The First Definition Of The Word To Use Is Good

Is the first definition of the verb "to use" good?

Next, it is inquired concerning that which he says: But to use is to refer that which has come into use, etc.

§ 1. For he seems to err by defining "to use" [uti] by "use" [usus]: since they signify the same thing, although in a different way. But if it is said that that mode of signifying contributes to the manifestation of the defined thing, To the contrary: Preambulatory acts are to powers according to reason: therefore also to habits. Since therefore "use" denotes a habit, but "to use" an act, rather "use" ought to be defined by "to use", than conversely.

§ 2. Further it is objected concerning that which he says: To refer, toward obtaining, etc.

For from this it seems that everything that is referable we ought to refer to an enjoyable thing: but everything that is in the will except sin, is referable: therefore every voluntary thing except sin is to be referred. Thence it is further argued thus: Everything that is referred receives the account of merit from the end: therefore it seems that in all our works nothing is indifferent: because indifferent is that which is neither evil, nor good. This same thing seems to be taken from the Apostle when he says: Whether you eat, or whether you drink,... do all to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31).

§ 3. Further it is inquired concerning that which he says: Otherwise it is to abuse, not to use, etc.

For it is inquired: Why is it not called "abfruit" [abfructus] when someone enjoys what is not to be enjoyed, just as it is called "abuse" [abusus] when someone uses what is not to be used?

§ 4. Solution. We reply to the first in three ways: namely, either that this whole that which has come into use, has the force of one simple diction, and is a useful circumlocution: and thus the definition is good, because habits and acts are well defined through objects. Or also that the defining word use is not taken absolutely, but referred to an end, and thus it becomes a principle of cognizing that which is "to use" taken simply. Or also thirdly, that "use" posited in the definition is a superordinate and genus to its defined term, and thus it is then taken according to the definition of Victorinus, who says that "use is an act frequently elicited from a power, when someone does something," just as we say that he uses it: for thus it is superordinate to "to use," when we act by something in such a way that we refer it to another. But inferior things ought to be defined by their superordinates.

§ 5. To the other that is further inquired, whether anything is indifferent? It must be said without prejudice, that of the works of the deliberative will as it is deliberative, nothing is indifferent according to Theology. Because if it does not refer those things which can be referred, they are vain: for from the fact that they are referable, they are natively apt to have an end: and if they do not have it, therefore they are vain: because a vain thing is (as the Philosopher says) what is toward some end which it does not include. And this is called "idle" [otiosum] in the sacred page, concerning which human beings will render an account on the day of judgment, although a moderate one. But if they are referred, then they are good. But if they are not naturally apt for referring, then they are oblique from the end, either by venial, or by mortal [sin]. There are nevertheless works done beyond deliberation which do not come into the use of the will as it is deliberative, and these can well be indifferent.

§ 6. To the other that is further inquired, why is it called "abuse" and not "abfruit"? It must be said that use encloses within itself an act of reason, which is a relation to another, and therefore it can be right and not right, and this it signifies in the composition of the word: but fruit encloses in itself only a quieted will, and therefore it does not look to right and not right of itself, but from an antecedent power: and therefore it is called a perverse fruit, but the account of perversity cannot be conjoined to it in the same term, so that it might be called "abfruit".

28. Matt 5:15.

Articulus 14 — Whether There Are Three Things Which Are To Be Enjoyed

Are there three things which are to be enjoyed?

Next, it is inquired concerning that which he says: The things which are to be enjoyed are, etc.

§ 1. For to the contrary is what Damascene says, book 1, chap. 11, that the three persons agree in thing, but are distinguished by reason and cognition: therefore there are not three things.

§ 2. Again, immediately in the Text it follows: Yet the same Trinity is a certain supreme thing: therefore it seems that he says things in the plural badly.

§ 3. Again, Augustine says that in everything that is toward itself, the three persons are one: in that which is toward another, they are distinguished: but a thing is toward itself: therefore it in the singular befits the three persons in sum.

§ 4. Further it is inquired concerning that which the Master supposes in this saying: for he seems to mean that we enjoy the persons.

BUT TO THE CONTRARY: § 1. Either we enjoy a person in general, in that it is a person, or as it is determined as this or that: not in the first way, because affect does not follow the conception of something in general, or in universal: because general things do not move, because there is no act in them: therefore under a determined account: therefore we enjoy the Father as He is Father, and the Son as He is Son, and the Holy Spirit as He is Holy Spirit. Thence thus: As cognition holds itself, so does the affect following cognition. Since therefore a definite cognition of the Father passes over into the Son, because he who knows definitely one of the relatives, knows the rest, the fruition of the Father will seem to pass over into the Son, and conversely.

§ 2. If perhaps it is said that the three persons are cognized by one cognition, as some say, and therefore they have one fruition which is of them, To the contrary: Either they are cognized by one cognition in that they are one, or in that they are distinct. If in that they are distinct: therefore in that they are distinct they are cognized as one: but this is the principle of the cognition of distinct things, which is the principle of their distinction: therefore there is one principle of distinction and of union, which is impossible. But if they are cognized in that they are one: therefore fruition is of the essence per se, and not of the persons.

§ 3. Again, fruition denotes a refection in the highest good seen, had, and loved: but the truth and goodness of the three is one: therefore the fruition of the three is one: but this is by grace of the essence, and not of the person: therefore we enjoy the essence, and not the person.

SED CONTRA: § 4. In the cognition of the way it is thus, that a thing is not cognized perfectly through this that only its nature in common is cognized: but it is necessary that it be cognized in particular, and according to all its properties: therefore similarly and much more this will be in the homeland: therefore the cognition of the substance does not suffice for the cognition of glory, unless there is also present a determined cognition of the persons and their properties, and we enjoy those cognized: therefore we enjoy the persons.

§ 5. Again, will we not love the distinct persons, and their distinction? It is constant that we will. Either therefore by a love of use, or by a love of fruit: if by a love of use: therefore we will refer it to another which is better, which is false, because the essence is not worthier than the persons; therefore by a love of fruit, and thus the proposition is had.

§ 6. BUT THEN IT IS FURTHER INQUIRED, whether we will enjoy one person more than another? And it seems that we will: because just as in the order of the essence there is had one which is the first and principle of the others, and when we refer the essence to another, we stand in it: so it seems that there is in the order of nature which is in the persons, one who is the principle of the whole Trinity, because of the Son through generation, of the Holy Spirit through spiration: therefore it seems that the relation stands in Him. This also seems through what the Apostle says, I to the Corinth. 11:3: The head of every man is Christ:... but the head of Christ is God, that is, the Father, and so it seems that the Son should be referred to the Father. And this He Himself seems to do in the Gospel, saying: My doctrine is not mine, but His who sent me (John 7:16). I seek not my own will, but the will of Him who sent me (John 5:30).

§ 7. Solution. Some say to the first, that there are three things in divine matters: substance, person, and notion. But substance is a thing absolutely: while notion is an account: but person is an intermediate between substance and notion according to reason, and therefore person is a thing with respect to notion, and an account with respect to essence. And in this sense it can be said that there are three things: but in another, one single thing. But this solution does not seem safe to me: because a person is simply a thing, and never an account alone: because this sounds like something near to the Sabellians. Whence without prejudice I say, that (as a certain Philosopher says in the First Philosophy), being and thing are among the transcendentals, and the first according to the ambit of their signification, and they are those in which resolution stands, and therefore they are sayable in divine matters concerning absolute and relative things: and according as they are adjoined to these or those, they can be plural, or singular: yet on account of the absolute mode of understanding, they hold themselves more on the part of the essence.

§ 8. TO THE AUTHORITY of Damascene, however, it must be said that the persons are not distinguished by reason or cogitation alone: because this would be Sabellian. Whence the authority is to be understood cautiously, namely, so that he calls "reason" the personal relation which is really a person, and "cogitation" the intellect distinguishing the persons through personal relations of this sort.

§ 9. And to the other the solution is evident through the aforesaid.

§ 10. To that which is further inquired: Whether we will enjoy the persons in that they are persons? It must be said that if the word in that denotes the account of the object of fruit, we will not enjoy the persons in that they are persons. But if it denotes the indifference and identity of the person to the object of fruit, then we enjoy the persons in that they are persons.

30. Luke 17:12.

For although fruit per se is of God insofar as He is the highest good, nevertheless it is not of God consequently, and of the person by accident: because in God there is no consequent from universal to particular, but the same. Similarly in God there is nothing accidental, but the same. And therefore we will enjoy God, and the persons, insofar as they are the same as the good.

§ 2. To the first objection to the contrary, it must be said that we shall enjoy the Father determinately, not indeed according to how He is related to the Son, but insofar as He, related to the Son, is the same as the highest good through His essence. And therefore the enjoyment does not pass over into the Son on account of the concept of the relation: nor does it follow that there are three enjoyments, just as there are three distinct persons.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that by a single cognition we can actually apprehend the three persons insofar as they are one, or even insofar as they are distinct according to the accounts of relation, which does not possess an absolute concept. But by cognition of this kind we apprehend them by understanding the highest good, and thus there will be enjoyment [fruit]; and we readily concede that for perfect cognition of God, it is required that He be known in the distinct persons which are the same as the highest good.

§ 4. To that which is further asked: Whether we shall enjoy one person more than another? It must be said that we shall not. Nor is it similar regarding the order of essences and the order of nature in the persons: because the order of essences posits inequality and diversity from the object of enjoyment in the lower essences. However, the order of nature in the persons posits their equality and identity in the highest good, which is the object of enjoyment: and therefore there is one enjoyment of the three, just as there is one goodness of the three.

Articulus 15 — Whether God Can Be Known By Any Created Intellect

Can God be known by any created intellect?

§ 6. Next it is asked concerning what he says: We enjoy known things, in which the delighted will rests for their own sake, etc. From this, indeed, this definition is derived: To enjoy is for the delighted will to rest in known things for their own sake. But an objection is raised concerning what he says: "in known things."

§ 7. 1. For it seems that God is neither known nor seen by any created intellect, and thus the Saints do not enjoy God as known and seen. Proof of the first point. No one has ever seen God; therefore no one has seen God face to face. If perhaps it is said that this is understood of man on the way [in via], and therefore Angels and the blessed are not excluded. On the contrary: Chrysostom on the same passage in the original: "But not even the celestial essences: the Cherubim and Seraphim themselves, I say, will ever be able to see God as He is."

§ 8. 2. Also, in the same place he posits two reasons for this, one of which he intimates with these words: How shall the creatable see the increatable? And this is founded upon the fact that the created cannot reach into the increated, since they are of an infinite distance. The second he intimates thus: Because the divine nature is simple, and disposed in one way: if therefore they saw, they would see equally: how then does one praise it as glory, another as majesty, another as holiness?

§ 9. 3. Also, in the same place treating that of the Apostle, Colossians 1:15: Who is the invisible image of God, he speaks thus: "He is the invisible image of God, because He is invisible: because otherwise He would by no means be an image. But if Paul introduced elsewhere saying, that He appeared in the flesh; you should remember, that this appearance which was through the flesh, was not made according to His substance: because since He Himself is invisible not only to men, but also to superior powers, Paul shows, saying that He appeared in the flesh, when He was seen. And so He was seen by the Angels then, when He clothed Himself with flesh: but before this they did not see Him thus, because to them as well His substance was invisible." From these it seems that God is not seen in Himself as He is, but in theophanies, that is, in illuminations, in which God appears.

§ 10. 4. Hence, Dionysius to Gaius the monk: "If someone seeing God understood what he saw, he did not see Him, but something of His that exists and is known."

§ 11. 5. Also, at the beginning of the fifth chapter of the Divine Names: "The intention of our discourse is not to manifest the supersubstantial substance, but that it is supersubstantial: for this is ineffable, and unknown, and not perfectly manifestable."

§ 12. 6. Furthermore, the same, in the Celestial Hierarchy, ch. 3: "The hierarchy makes its praisers into divine statues [agalmata], and clearest mirrors, and pure receptacles of the principal light." From these it seems to be accepted that He is not seen as He is, but by illuminations descending from Him and by statues [agalmatibus], by certain likenesses of His light.

§ 13. 7. To the same it is objected through reason: there must be a proportion of the perfection to the perfectible: but God is intelligible if He is seen through His essence: therefore God through His essence, and the created intellect have a proportion: therefore also a commensuration, which is a heresy: therefore that from which it follows is false, namely that God is seen through His essence.

§ 14. 8. Also, there is no proportion of the infinite to the finite: God in His substance is infinite in place, time, and comprehension, as Damascene says; therefore He has no proportion to the capacity of the intellect: therefore neither is He seen according to the intellect.

§ 15. 9. To this some have wanted to say that He is seen according to one attribute, or two, which are like parts of Him with respect to our intellect: and He is not seen according to the whole. But on the contrary: In any attribute He Himself is infinite: therefore it is the same for one, and for all alike.

§ 16. 10. Also, God is simple: therefore if He is seen, He is seen as a whole, because He has no part: but He is not seen as a whole: therefore nothing of Him is seen, and thus we return to the first point, namely that God, according to what He is, is not seen.

32. Prov 22:28.

§ 17. On the contrary: 1. In the first canonical epistle of John 3:2: We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, because we shall see Him as He is.

§ 18. 2. Also, Chrysostom in Homily 15 on John: "Angels, because of their sleepless and pure nature, imagine nothing other than God."

§ 19. Further it is asked, whether He is also seen in theophanies, and apprehended by means of a theophany, which Dionysius posits in the Celestial Hierarchy, saying thus: The most wise Theology has therefore revealed that divine vision which is described within it, like a similitude in the form of the formless, properly called a theophany from the reduction of those seeing into the divine. The sense is, that Theology has revealed to us first through doctrine, that that illumination is appropriately, that is, aptly, called a theophany, which is in a certain form of signs that are formless to the hidden light which is in God: because it proceeds from the hidden to the outside, according to which, namely the illumination, there occurs a reduction of those seeing Him into divine things; therefore since all illuminations proceed from the hidden to the open for the one seeing, it seems that all see in theophanies only.

§ 20. Solution. To this we say without prejudice, affirming indeed most certainly, that the divine substance is seen by all the blessed. However, regarding how it is seen, we say without prejudice thus, that it is seen immediately through conjunction; such that God offers Himself to our intellect through His substance, just as the intellect does to itself; and this is what the Apostle says, I Cor. 13:12: I shall know even as I am known.

§ 21. BUT the authority of Chrysostom is to be solved by the word of the same Chrysostom, in the same place, where he says thus: "We all know God: for we have a notion of Him. But no one knows His substance and what He is, except alone He who is begotten of Him." Here the Evangelist speaks of a most certain consideration and comprehension, and as great as the Father has of the Son. And therefore it is clear that Chrysostom does not deny that the substance of God is seen, but he denies that it is so perfectly seen by any created intellect as it is seen by Himself.

§ 22. TO THE first reason of Chrysostom, it must be said that the created, assisted by the uncreated, is capable of reaching to it: although not above it. There are however those who say that the created intellect relates differently to inferior things and to superior things: because upon inferior things it pours some of its own light, especially the agent intellect, and thus it can act actively upon them: but toward superior things it behaves as receiving only, and therefore it is not properly said to have power into them, but rather they into it.

§ 23. TO THE second reason of Chrysostom, it must be said that although there are many divine attributes, nevertheless each is nothing other than the divine substance itself: and therefore in any of them the substance is immediately seen. And as to what Chrysostom says, that the substance is not seen, it must be said that just as he himself says below in the induced authority, he calls "substance" the what it is, that is, the differentiation of it through terms of essence: and because it does not have such terms, therefore its substance and what it is in this manner are not seen. He Himself also alone is adequate to Himself according to the intellect:

33. 2 Tim 4:3.

because as great as He is, so great is His intellect: but the created intellect is not as great as He is.

§ 25. To that which is objected concerning Dionysius, it must be said that he is either speaking of the vision of the wayfarer [in via], or by "not seeing Him" he means not seeing Him wholly and perfectly: but he says that something which is His is seen: and this is to see Him: because He is substantially that thing.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that God is simply incomprehensible, and this is insofar as He is infinite: because in this way He cannot be attained, except in a qualified sense, namely by knowing Him to be infinite.

§ 27. AS TO how there are statues [agalmata] and mirrors, will be clear below at the end of the solution.

§ 28. To that which is objected through the reasons, it must be said that a sufficient proportion cannot be had toward Him from the nature of the intellect, but from the assistance of God.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that the infinite can indeed be attained, but something of it always remains outside the one attaining it: and therefore in that it is infinite it is said not to be attained. And this can be made clear thus: The infinite in quantity is (as the Philosopher says) that of which, for the one taking parts, there is always something outside to take. But in a spiritual uncreated nature there is no infinity in the quantity of bulk, but rather the quantity of power is divided outward, according to those things upon which it has power: and therefore the intellect attaining God attains Him, in such a way that much, and an infinity, of His power always remains outside it: and because His power is His essence, therefore also the immensity of His essence is outside the intellect.

§ 30. To that which is objected against the induced solution, I well concede: because in any attribute He is infinite, and thus He always remains outside the intellect: because although substance or wisdom is apprehended, nevertheless His immensity cannot be enclosed: although some apprehended thing can be attained which is His substance, even if it is not a boundary enclosing the whole, which is God.

§ 31. To the next it must be said that God is simple, and is infinite: for these are not repugnant insofar as infinite signifies the immensity of power and essence, but nevertheless He is attained by the intellect insofar as He is simple, but not insofar as He is infinite: because the infinite posits its account with respect to that which is outside the one understanding. And note that when God is said to be infinite, "infinite" ought not to be expounded privatively, so that the sense would be that He is naturally apt to have a limit, and does not have one: because thus He would be imperfect, since something would be lacking to Him which He was naturally apt to have: but it ought to be expounded negatively, so that the sense is "infinite," that is, not finite in place, or time, or the comprehension of the intellect: because Damascene expounds it thus.

§ 32. To that which is further asked concerning Theophanies, we say that just as in sense perception there are two things, namely, the light under which the visible thing is perfected so that it can be seen, and the visible thing itself, like a stone or something else that is seen: and the light indeed causes the act of vision, but does not distinguish it, nor determine it to this visible thing or to that one: and just as in the natural intellect there is the light of the agent intellect which makes the possible intellect actual, yet does not determinately perfect and move it to this intelligible thing, or that one: but afterward it is determined by the intellect of the man, or the Angel, or another: and just as faith is illuminating toward what is believed, yet does not determinately lead to this article, or that one: so it is in Theophanies, that there is a descending light elevating the intellect, and not distinguishing and determining it to this or that: but that which distinguishes the intellect as an object, is the divine substance itself: and this is what the Psalmist says, Ps. 35:10: In Your light we shall see light. Hence God is seen without a medium that would be a similitude and account of the thing seen, or through which the thing seen is conjoined to the seer, and not through its substance: but nevertheless there is a medium there, disposing and bringing powers to the intellect, by which it may better attain God: and this medium is the light of divine goodness, or appearance, which is called a theophany by the saints. And thus it is clear to be true what Master Hugh says, that nothing halts us until we reach Him. And through this the solution to what is objected concerning Theophanies is clear.

§ 33. To that, however, which could be asked, Whether God is comprehensible? It must be said that comprehension is twofold, namely, that which is the touch of the intellect upon the boundaries of a thing: and in this way He is not comprehended. Hence Augustine to Paulina: We can attain God with the mind, but we can by no means comprehend Him. There is also a comprehension that is sometimes the perfect attainment of something as an end, which attainment primarily occurs by affection: and in this way God is comprehended, as the Apostle says, Eph. 3:18: That you may be able to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth, and length, and height, and depth, etc.

Divisio Textus

§ 34. DIVISION OF THE TEXT. It is to be noted indeed, that the same Augustine, etc. In this part the Author objects against the determinations made about enjoying [frui] and using [uti]. And it has two parts according to the fact that an objection can be made in two ways, namely, against the very definition of the act of enjoying and using, and he does this in the first part: or against [the things] to be enjoyed and used, and he does this in the second part, there, F, But when men who enjoy, etc.

§ 35. The first of these has two parts, namely the objection which begins there, D, These things therefore which seem to contradict each other, etc. And according to two solutions it has two parts: and the second solution begins there, E, It can also be said, etc.

35. Ps 116:2 (Vulgate).

Articulus 16 — Whether The Second Definition Of To Use Is Good

Whether the second definition of "to use" [uti] is good?

§ 37. He introduces a doubt concerning what he says: To use is to take something up into the faculty of the will, etc.

§ 38. 1. For this definition also belongs to that which is to enjoy: for we do not enjoy anything unless it is in the faculty of our will: therefore to enjoy is to use.

§ 39. 2. Moreover, it is asked what is called the "faculty of the will"? If it is said that it is an easy power, On the contrary: According to this we would not use those things which hold difficulty in the will, such as tribulations and anguishes, which is false, because the Saints make the greatest use of these.

§ 40. 3. Moreover, Since of one thing there is one essence [esse], and a definition states the essence, it seems that of that which is to use there should be a single definition: and Augustine gives two: for above one was held, when he says: To use is that which has come into use, etc. But here another is held.

§ 41. Solution. It must be said that to use [uti] as it is defined here (as some say) is spoken of equivocally with respect to to use as defined above; to use is also taken here according to the definition of Victorinus who says that use is an act frequently elicited from a power, and thus it is superior to to use and to enjoy as defined above: and the Master seems to have sensed this, because he premises by saying that Augustine here takes to use and to enjoy differently than above. It could, however, be said otherwise, namely, that things which are directed to an end exist in two ways, namely, not including or touching the end, and touching or conjoined and proximate to the end: and concerning those which have an order to the end, if they are not conjoined to it, the first definition is given. The second, however, is given concerning those which are conjoined to the end, and those do not need the relation of order, because something of the end is possessed in them: and such are certain things of the way [viae], and certain things of the homeland [patriae]: those of the way are, for instance, the foretaste of eternal things in internal joy and affection: those of the homeland are created beatitude, which touches upon the uncreated in some manner: and therefore because the end is in some way in them, he did not say that they are to be referred to something else. How this occurs is clear thus. When it is said, To use is that which has come into use, etc., it is understood to refer to that as to the terminus of the work: and thus it leads to the end of the intention, which is truly the end. But those things in which there is such a use as is defined here, are indeed referred to another which is the end of the intention: which end, however, according to some taste, is present in them: but they are not referred to another that would be the terminus of the work, that is, in which the work ceases, because whatever the worker wills is possessed.

§ 42. To this, however, which is asked, What is the faculty of the will? It must be said that just as in the usage of speaking, a faculty is called that which makes a man able to have [something] at his command [ad nutum]: just as sciences are called faculties, because by them the power of the intellect is had at command: and the goods of fortune are called faculties, because they make a man suffice for himself and his own: so the faculty of the will is that by which the will has an easy power to will at command: and this is especially that which brings rest from work: and it is the useful thing in which the intended end is held and tasted in some way, as has been said.

§ 43. To the last the solution is clear: because of one thing there is a single essence taken with respect to one and the same cause: and with respect to different causes different definitions can be taken. Hence the first is given with respect to the proper act of the useful thing: but this one is given with respect to the effect of the useful thing touching the end.

Articulus 17 — Whether The Second Definition Of To Enjoy Is Good

Whether the second definition of "to enjoy" [frui] is good?

§ 45. Next it is asked concerning what he says: To enjoy is to use with joy, etc.

§ 46. 1. For as the useful and the enjoyable are related: so are to use and to enjoy related. Proof: Because acts are defined by their objects: but the useful and the enjoyable are the objects of these acts, to use and to enjoy: but no useful thing is an enjoyable thing: therefore no using is enjoying.

§ 47. 2. Moreover, in the Letter he says that everyone who enjoys, uses, but not conversely: therefore to use is superior to to enjoy: but from whatever the superior is removed, the inferior is also removed: therefore to whatever to use does not apply, to enjoy does not apply: but to use does not apply to irrational beings: therefore neither does to enjoy, which is false, since Augustine says that beasts enjoy their food.

§ 48. 1. Moreover, it is asked why to enjoy according to the rationale of its name is extended to irrational beings, and not to use?

§ 49. 2. Moreover, it is asked concerning the distinction of the Master: Why does he say that in the homeland we enjoy truly and properly, and fully: but here truly and properly, but not fully.

§ 50. 3. Further it is also asked, With respect to what do the three definitions given of to enjoy differ?

§ 51. Solution. It must be said to the first, that to use according to the first definition is removed from that which is to enjoy taken according to its proper rationale: but not to use according to the second definition, as is clear from what was previously said.

§ 52. To the next it must be said that to use, in the understanding of its name, includes an act of reason which is a relation to another: and therefore it cannot belong to brute animals: but it is not so concerning to enjoy, which signifies a delight of taste quieting desire, and therefore by transference it can belong to brute animals.

§ 53. To the next it must be said that three things are required for the complement of enjoying, namely an act of the will related to reason, and as to this he says properly: because those devoid of reason do not properly enjoy. The second is that there be a reason ordering a right will, determining that which is truly enjoyment and enjoyable, and thus it is said truly, because creatures enjoying do not truly enjoy, since that by which they enjoy is not truly good and sweet. The third that is required is that the enjoyable thing be possessed through species and in abundance, and therefore he says fully: and thus in the way [in via] the Saints do not fully enjoy, but they can truly and properly enjoy.

§ 54. To the last it must be said that the first definition of that which is to enjoy looks to the form and the act. The form, I say, the completive one, which is love, as was said before: and therefore the form and the act are posited in it, namely, by the love of inherence. The second, however, touches upon the matter, and the end: the matter, when it says, We enjoy known things: the end, however, when it says, In which the delighted will rests. But the third looks to the effect of enjoyment in the one enjoying, when it says, To use with joy, etc.

§ 55. The other doubts that remain are sufficiently solved by the Master in the Letter.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

§ 56. Exposition of the Text. The Letter is thus expounded:

§ 57. How much in this life, etc. Augustine in book IX of the Confessions: Sometimes you admit me into a very unusual inward affection to I know not what sweetness: which if it were perfected in me, I know not what that would be which this life will not be: but I fall back into these things by sorrowful weights, and I am swallowed up by customary things, and I am held, and I weep much: but I am held much, so much does the burden of custom weigh me down. Here I am able to be, but do not wish to be: there I wish to be, but am not able, wretched in both ways.

§ 58. Through a glass [mirror] in a dark manner [enigma], etc. I Cor. 13:12. The Gloss, in the same place: A mirror is a vestige or image of creatures: but an enigma is an obscure allegory. And according to this, the species is posited for the genus: because according to Donatus an enigma is a question wrapped in obscurities of words: like my mother bore me, soon the same is born of me. And it is a species of allegory. But here it is posited for the allegory itself. We could however say that a mirror is twofold, namely, painted in some way with a face, and not painted, namely representing obscurely: and in the first way the image in man is a mirror, in the second way the vestige in other creatures. There are also four things that cause the obscurity of an enigma, namely because the created intellect is from nothing, on account of which it retains something of obscuration. Also secondly, from the weight of the flesh. And also, from the turbulence of sin. Fourthly also, from foreign speech: because an allegory is foreign speech: just as Uriah, devout and faithful, signifies the devil, and David, a murderer and adulterer, signifies Christ, while Bathsheba, an adulteress, signifies the Church.

38. Ps 25:5 (Vulgate).

§ 65. But when men who enjoy and use, etc. Here begins that part in which the Master posits doubts concerning the useful and the enjoyable. And it has three parts: in the first of which he asks, Whether man sometimes enjoys man, or only God? In the second he asks, Whether God enjoys us, or uses us, there, G, But since God loves us. In the third he asks, Whether we enjoy or use virtues, there, H, Here it is to be considered, etc.

§ 66. In the first chapter he does three things. First he proves that man uses man. Secondly, he objects to the contrary, there, But the contrary to this, etc. Thirdly, he solves it, there, Which Augustine thus determines, etc.

Expositio Textus

§ 59. Exposition of the Text.

§ 60. It can also be said, etc. But on the contrary: Proverbs 13:12: Hope that is deferred afflicts the soul.

§ 61. Solution. It is true insofar as it is deferred: but insofar as it already penetrates through taste to the interior of the veil, it delights from the foretaste of the thing hoped for. Hence, Hebrews 6:18 and 19: Hope which we have as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm, and entering even to the interior of the veil, where the forerunner Jesus has entered for us.

§ 62. Which is not to be done, etc. Hence, Jeremiah 17:5: Cursed is the man that trusts in man, and makes flesh his arm. But on the contrary: Jonah 1:6: The pilot came to him: The Gloss, there: It is natural for man in danger to trust in another more than in himself.

§ 63. Solution. It must be said that in danger, where human counsel and aid can be had, trust can be placed in man, provided the invocation of God is not excluded, because otherwise it would be to tempt God: but to place total trust in man with the exclusion of divine assistance is prohibited.

Articulus 18 — Whether Man Is To Be Enjoyed

Whether man is to be enjoyed?

§ 68. It is asked, Whether man is to be enjoyed in any way?

§ 69. 1. And it seems that he is: The Apostle to Philemon, v. 20: Yea, brother, may I enjoy thee in the Lord.

§ 71. 3. Also, Deut. 28:41: Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, and shalt not enjoy them.

§ 72. 4. Moreover, The same seems true by reason: because an image is directed to another: therefore the cognition of an image leads into that of which it is primarily [an image]: but this is God, to whose image man was made: therefore cognition comes to rest in God as in an end,

39. Aristotle, Sophistical Refutations, 1, 165a24.

§ 73. Moreover, if it is conceded in some way, may I enjoy thee in the Lord, it is asked, Whether it can similarly be conceded concerning an irrational creature, that we enjoy it in the Lord? And it seems so; because it is a vestige leading to God: therefore God can be apprehended and loved in it: since therefore we love God with the love of enjoyment, it happens that we enjoy God in an irrational creature.

§ 74. Also it is asked, Whether we may enjoy a sinner in God? And it seems so: because the image of God is not destroyed in him, as is said in Psalm 38:7: Man passes in an image: since therefore God is apprehended and loved in His image, and not except by the love of enjoyment, we can enjoy a sinner in God.

§ 75. Solution. It must be said that when it is said, brother, may I enjoy thee in the Lord, the pronoun is constructed locally with the verb, and otherwise the ablative with the preposition: for the pronoun names the matter which is like an occasion for the joy that is in the verb enjoy; but the ablative with the preposition notes the end in which rest is taken: and this is plain if one looks at the exposition of Augustine who says, that because he added, in the Lord, he signified that he had placed his end in the Lord: hence this enjoyment begins from a rational [creature] on the part of the representation of the highest good through grace, but it terminates in the Lord as in the end.

§ 77. To the next and to the third it must be said, that to enjoy is taken there communally for to use with joy: or it may be said what some have said, that to enjoy the great ones or one's sons is the same as to perceive fruit from them through merit: and thus there is use in the work, but fruit in the hope of reward.

§ 78. To that which is objected by reason, it must be said that a vestige and an image, unless something else is added, do not suffice for us to enjoy them in the Lord. Because although God is represented in them according to the fact that He is three and one, or according to the fact that He is powerful, wise, and willing: yet not according to the fact that He is the highest goodness: for in this way He does not shine forth except in the effect of grace or glory: therefore we cannot enjoy any but Saints in the Lord, and therefore not irrational [creatures] nor sinners.

§ 79. And through this the solution to the whole is clear. The Letter, moreover, is clear of itself.

Articulus 19 — Whether God Enjoys Himself

Whether God enjoys Himself?

§ 81. But since God loves us, etc.

4. Matt 5:15.

§ 82. In this chapter it is asked concerning what he says: If He enjoys, us namely, He needs our good. OBJECTION. God enjoys Himself: therefore He needs His own good: therefore there is some indigence in God, which is false. But that God enjoys Himself is clear through what Gregory says on that verse of Job 40:4: If thou hast an arm like God, etc.: where he speaks thus: He is glorious who, while He thoroughly enjoys Himself, has no need of approaching praise.

§ 83. TO THIS, it must be conceded that God enjoys Himself more perfectly than any creature could enjoy Him.

§ 84. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that where the one enjoying and the enjoyable thing are in diversity of essence, it follows that the one enjoying needs the good of the enjoyable thing: but where the one enjoying and the enjoyable thing are the same through substance, the argument does not hold.

§ 85. To another thing that could be asked, Whether He enjoys Himself in the rationale of essence, or of person? This was dispatched above: because He enjoys Himself by the same rationale of the object by which we enjoy Him.

§ 86. Next, concerning what he says: But God refers our use to His own goodness, etc. Attention must be paid to the authority of Gregory who, upon that verse of Job 40:5: Clothe thyself with glorious garments, says thus: He clothes Himself with glorious things, who assumed the choirs of the holy Angels whom He created, into the use of His own decorum.

§ 87. Next it is objected against what he says: But this is the highest reward, that we may thoroughly enjoy Him. ON THE CONTRARY: John 17:3: This is...

§ 1. Now this is eternal life: That they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent: therefore it seems that knowledge or vision is the total reward.

§ 2. Solution. The vision which is the total reward is the vision of what is loved and possessed, and this is perfected in love, and is a nourishing vision; hence, this does not differ from enjoyment, but is the same thing, differing only in its concept.

Divisio Textus

§ 19. The text itself is clear.

Here it must be considered, Whether virtues, etc. This is the last chapter of this part, in which he asks, Whether virtues are to be enjoyed?

§ 20. And this chapter is divided into two parts. In the first, he determines that virtues are not to be enjoyed, but that one acts through virtues. In the second, he says the same concerning the will and the other powers of the soul, there, So also concerning a good will, etc.

§ 21. The first part has five parts. In the first, he proves that virtues are not to be enjoyed. In the second, an objection is raised against this, there, But to others on the contrary, etc. In the third, he solves it, there, But we, etc. In the fourth, he objects against the solution, there, But someone will say, etc. In the fifth, he solves it, there, To which we say, etc.

40. Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermones in Cantica Canticorum.

Articulus 20 — In Everything That Is, Insofar As It Is, There Is Good

Is everything that is, insofar as it is, good?

§ 3. Next, an objection is raised concerning what he says:

Because God is good, we are: and insofar as we are, we are good, etc.

§ 4. 1. For Augustine says: Being is from the first being therefore he ought to say: Because God is, we are.

§ 5. 2. Also, Everything that is, insofar as it is, is good: therefore everything that is has goodness, and goodness is the same as its very being.

§ 6. 3. Also, If there were one effect of a twofold cause, the one mediate, the other immediate, by removing the mediate cause the mediate effect is not removed: as is clear with a white painting, and whiteness, and the painter. Being in God is the immediate cause of created being, while the good in God is the mediate cause of the same being: therefore, positing that God is not good, created being will still remain, which is the effect of the good that is a mediate cause.

§ 7. If you say that this is true: Everything that is, insofar as it is, is good.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 8. Even if it is understood that God is not good, created being still remains: therefore, even if it is understood that God is not good, created good still remains, which is against Boethius: therefore the first proposition is false, namely, that everything that is, insofar as it is, is good.

§ 9. Also, If there are two effects of one cause, one mediate, the other immediate, by removing the mediate cause the effect which is caused through the medium is not removed: but being is from God immediately, while the good is only in being: therefore, if it is understood that God is not good, everything that is, insofar as it is, will still be good: but this is false, as Boethius says in the book De Hebdomadibus: therefore it is not the case that everything that is, insofar as it is, is good.

§ 10. 4. Furthermore, mathematical objects are those in which there is no end (as the Philosopher says): but those things that lack an end lack the ratio of the good: therefore mathematical objects, insofar as they are, are not good: therefore not everything that is, insofar as it is, is good.

§ 11. FURTHER it is asked, Whether the good is separable from being by the intellect? It seems that it is: because Boethius expressly states this, that if the first good is understood for a moment not to be good, and yet is understood to be a being, then the things that are from it will be beings, and will not be good: but whatever things are separable according to the intellect do not accompany one another as such: therefore it is not true that everything that is, insofar as it is, is good.

§ 12. Solution. It must be said that the good and being can be considered in two ways, namely according to their intentions [concepts], or according to their supposita [subjects]. If they are considered according to their intentions, then they are not convertible, nor will it be true that everything that is, insofar as it is, is good. That this is true is clear from Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, where he speaks thus about being: Before other participations of God, being is set before them, and being itself according to itself is [prior], because through itself it is life, and through itself it is wisdom, and through itself it is the divine likeness: and whatever other existents and participants there are, they participate in being prior to all those . The same is written in the fourth proposition of the book De Causis, where it is said: The first of created things is being, and there is no other creature before it. And the commentary in the same place: Being is through creation, while the good is through information: and that which flows forth from the First, that is, God, without presupposing anything else in which it is founded, is called being by creation; whereas that which flows forth only upon the supposition of another in which it comes to be, is by information. Also, the good adds to being a relation to an end: however, the relation to an end is twofold, namely according as the end is the terminus of the motion of the efficient cause, or according as the end is by intention in the efficient cause: and in the first way things are called good which are from the good: in the second way, those which are directed to the good which the efficient cause intends, that is, which moves it to act. If, however, the good and being are considered according to their supposita [subjects], in this way they are convertible: because although the good relates to the efficient cause as it is good, and being relates to the efficient cause as it is being, nevertheless, because the efficient cause does not act except through the good of intention, therefore the good always accompanies being itself, and is not separated from it according to the suppositum, although it is separated according to the intention [concept]: and the expression insofar as indicates this identity of supposita.

§ 13. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that if the good is taken in distinct things together with being, namely in the cause and in the caused, the good in the cause will be prior to being in the caused: because it only causes by the good, which makes it diffuse being: hence Maximus: This name 'good' does not derive its origin from elsewhere than the Greek word which is 'boao, bo', that is, I call: for 'bo', 'kaleo', 'bo', and 'I cry out', and 'I call' possess one meaning: for indeed he who calls very often breaks out into a cry: God therefore is not unsuitably called good, because by an intelligible cry He calls all things to come from nothingness into essence: and therefore it is better said that because He is good we are, than because He is we are.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that the word insofar as notes the inseparability of the good and being according to supposita, and not according to intentions [concepts]: and therefore it does not follow that goodness is the entity of that which is.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that God is not the mediate cause of anything: and therefore He is the immediate cause of both the good and being, although not according to the same rationale, as has been said: because being is related to the good as the primary cause and the subject. Nevertheless, because being is inseparable from a relation to the efficient cause diffusing being, and that cause does not diffuse except insofar as it is good: therefore it is not separated from the good except by the intellect making an impossible supposition, namely, that the first cause is not good: because then its relation to the efficient cause does not remain: because it does not move except by supposing goodness, as has been said.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that mathematical objects do not have an end which is acquired through physical motion, because they are separated according to their definitive concept from both motion and matter: but they do not lack the intention of the good which is from the good and ordered to the first good.

§ 17. To what is further asked, Whether the good is separable from being by the intellect? the solution is already clear: because it is separated by intention [concept], but not by suppositum.

Articulus 21 — Whether The Virtues Are To Be Enjoyed

Are virtues to be enjoyed?

§ 22. Now a doubt arises here, Whether virtues are to be enjoyed? And it seems that they are.

§ 23. 1. For Augustine says in the book 83 Questions, that just as the useful and the honorable differ, so do enjoying and using: but everything useful is to be used: therefore everything honorable is to be enjoyed: but virtues (according to Cicero) belong to the genus of the honorable: therefore virtues are to be enjoyed.

§ 24. 2. Also, Everything which is to be desired for its own sake (as was said above) is to be enjoyed, not used: but virtues are to be desired, as is said: therefore virtues are to be enjoyed, not used.

§ 25. 3. Furthermore, the good is divided by the Philosophers into the pleasurable, the useful, and the honorable: but dividing members have opposed rationales in species: therefore the useful and the honorable are opposed by special rationales: but the useful is what we refer to something else: therefore the honorable will be what we desire for its own sake: but this is to be enjoyed: therefore the honorable is to be enjoyed: but virtues are species of the honorable: therefore virtues are to be enjoyed.

§ 26. 4. [On the contrary] The things to be enjoyed are eternal and immutable: virtues are not eternal nor immutable: therefore virtues are not to be enjoyed.

§ 27. 5. Also, Augustine says in the book City of God that if virtues persuade us to love them for their own sake, they are proud.

§ 28. Solution. It must be said that virtues can be considered in two ways, namely, according to how they are habits rectifying in action, and in this way they are all desired for the sake of something else, and thus they are in no way to be enjoyed either on the way [in this life] or in the homeland [in heaven]. They can also be considered insofar as they are the disposition of the perfected subject toward the best: because in this way they essentially or substantially remain in beatitude, either in those things succeeding them, or in themselves: and thus they conjoin us to uncreated beatitude: and thus some say that through them as proximate dispositions we enjoy: yet we do not enjoy them. But it must be said slightly differently, that as Augustine says: When I love my neighbor, or God, I love him by loving, not by another love, but by the same, as was said above. Thus this enjoyment is one of God and of the virtues: because God is in the virtues: and in this way the virtues attain God: but the enjoyment will not be by reason of both [equally], but will be of the virtues as those things which remove the contrary flavor from the palate of the soul, and of God as refreshing with His own proper flavor: and thus it can also be on the way [in this life] in the enjoyment of foretaste and of hope.

§ 29. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that if stress is laid on Augustine's word, the useful and the honorable are called the created and the uncreated: because nothing at all draws by its own power and attracts by its own dignity, except the supreme good. Cicero, however, says that the honorable is that which draws us by its own power and attracts us by its own dignity.

§ 30. To the next it must be said that for its own sake sometimes means the same as through itself (per se): and this is sometimes opposed to by accident: and thus virtue is desired through itself: because by its nature it has that whence it moves the appetite and delights its possessors with a sincere and holy delight. But this does not exclude that it is also sought for the sake of something else: which nevertheless is not without it, because the virtues, in respect to the things succeeding them, remain in beatitude, and beatitude is in God. And thus that for the sake of which they are desired is not simply separated from them, as it is from other things. Sometimes, however, for its own sake is opposed to that which is for the sake of another: and then they are not desired absolutely for their own sake, but for the sake of another in which and with which the virtues remain essentially, or in the things succeeding them.

§ 31. To the next it must be said that the useful does not have a different rationale from that which is honorable in such a way that it cannot be preserved in it: but in such a way that it does not primarily move the appetite in it: just as Cicero says in the book On Friendship, that although friendship is sought for its own sake, it nevertheless has very many utilities adjoined to it. Nor is the division of the good into the pleasurable, the useful, and the honorable a division of a genus into species, but rather it is given by prior and posterior participations in the divided whole: just as being is divided into potency and act: and yet potency is through act and act is in potency. There are, however, some who say that for the sake of is said in two ways, namely, simply, and by reason of the end of the work which is called the terminus: and therefore virtues are desired for their own sake with respect to the work, but not with respect to beatitude: and similarly created beatitude with respect to uncreated beatitude is desired for the sake of another, but with respect to virtue through itself: but this is inadequate to say.

44. Pseudo-Dionysius, De Divinis Nominibus, c. 1, § 1.

Articulus 22 — Whether A Good Will Without The Virtues Is To Be Enjoyed

Is a good will to be enjoyed without virtues?

§ 32. Next it is asked concerning what he says:

So we say concerning a good will, etc. It is asked, I say, Whether it happens that one enjoys a good will without virtues? And it seems that it does.

§ 33. 1. Because Adam in the first state, and the Angels if they are posited to be created in sheerly natural endowments, loved God for His own sake and above all things: therefore with the love of enjoyment: therefore virtues are not necessary dispositions for enjoying.

§ 34. 2. Furthermore, Secondly from that word it seems that enjoyment is an act of the will alone: although above he made mention of the intellect, where he says that we enjoy the things known, etc.

§ 35. TO THIS it must be said that without grace and virtue there is no enjoyment.

§ 36. TO THAT which is objected, it must be said that by natural love God can be loved for His own sake and above all things: such that the word for the sake of denotes only the end, and not the efficient cause: since reason, knowing God above all things, produces that love: but when He is loved with charity and grace for His own sake and above all things, three causes are denoted, namely the efficient, material, and final: and it is signified that He Himself is especially the efficient cause, and the one disposing toward enjoyment. Some say otherwise, and not so well by distinguishing love, namely that of friendship and that of concupiscence; and they say that by the love of friendship God could be loved for His own sake and above all things, but not by the love of concupiscence: hence, since fruit posits the love of concupiscence, it does not follow that in that state man and Angel would enjoy.

§ 37. TO THE NEXT it must be said that the will is the completion of the act of enjoying: while the others are as it were material within it, as was sufficiently set forth above.

Divisio Textus

Of all things therefore which have been said, etc. Here he posits an epilogue: and secondly, he divides: and thirdly, he states the order in which he wishes to proceed concerning things and signs: and in this the present distinction is concluded.

The text is self-evident.

Articulus 23 — Whether We Shall Enjoy Through All The Powers Of The Soul

Shall we enjoy through all the powers of the soul?

Here a difficult doubt arises concerning what he says: Among those things indeed which are to be used, etc. For it seems from this that we enjoy the natural powers, that is, through them: and it is asked, whether through all of them, or through certain ones? And it seems that it is through certain ones from the aforementioned.

45. Bernard of Clairvaux, Sermones in Cantica Canticorum.

But ON THE CONTRARY: 1. John 10:9: If any man shall enter in by me, etc. Augustine: He shall find pastures, going forth in the humanity of the Savior, and within in the divinity of the Savior: and it is the sense which is fed in the humanity: therefore the senses will enjoy, because to be fed by this vision is to enjoy.

1. The same seems to be gathered from the book On the Spirit and the Soul, where it is said that sense will be turned into reason, and reason into intellect, and that [intellect] will enjoy God.

4 [3]. Moreover, the whole soul will be glorified, and will be rewarded: therefore it ought to enjoy according to all its powers.

Furthermore it is asked: Will there be revolving thoughts there? It seems not: because Augustine expressly denies this .

But on the contrary: Because we will understand this and that successively: therefore thought will revolve from one thing to another.

Solution. Act properly belongs to persons and individuals, but power belongs to nature: whence if force is applied, then the Saints will enjoy, but according to the powers of the soul which were spoken of above. There is, however, a twofold way: one is from the sensible to imagination and phantasy, and from those to reason and intellect, which is the way of the abstraction of the true. The other is the way from the higher powers to the lower: just as reason in certain matters extends itself by moving the imagination, and the imagination the common sense, as happens in a dream, and sometimes even looses particular organs for something, as in those who do the works of waking life in their sleep. Thus I say without prejudice, that through the overflow of divine sweetness from the intellect the pasture of enjoyment will descend into the imagination and sense: in such a way, nevertheless, that the sense does not lose its nature, such that it apprehends nothing but the corporeal.

And through this the solution to the first is clear: because the sense does not receive the divinity in the flesh of the Savior, but the body only: and the sweetness is by overflow from reason.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said: Sense will be turned into reason, it is to be glossed: it will be converted to reason, and from it will receive enjoyment, according as it is bent back upon it, ministering sweetness to it: nevertheless that book is not Augustine's, but a certain Cistercian authored it, and there are many false things in it.

To the last it must be said, that the whole soul will be rewarded, whence the act of enjoyment belongs to the whole soul: but it is not necessary that it receive all the differences of its rewards according to every power of itself: just as it is not necessary that one possessing riches store them in every chest of his, but some in one, and some in another. Others, however, say what they can scarcely or never prove: and therefore one should not care about their words.

46. Aristotle, Metaphysics, I, 2, 982b25.

To that which is further asked, whether there will be revolving thoughts there? It must be said, that no: but revolving thoughts are not spoken of from the fact that this is to understand this and that successively: rather, they are called revolving for three other reasons denoting imperfection, of which one is on account of the inquiry of one finding or learning: because reason does not see the whole according to causes, and effects, and properties: but then there will not be one inquiring. The second is a loathing of the understood thing in which imperfection is found: and therefore the intellect crosses over to another thing in which it may delight more, and this happens from the vileness of the thing, and the privations found in it, and its mutability, and materiality. The third cause is: because the principle of understanding here is not one for every thing, but belongs to diverse things: and therefore neither in themselves, nor in their principles can things be received here simultaneously: there, however, they are received in that which is the highest and infinite good, which is the most full light in which nothing of a thing is hidden, against the first: and in that which is the life supremely refreshing, against the second: and in that in which all things are simultaneously, against the third. Nevertheless I well concede, that if intelligible things were considered in their proper essences, the intellect would not receive two simultaneously; because it is impossible to understand how one act would be terminated upon two things, just as upon ends terminating equally. And there is no counter-instance in the intellect's understanding of composite things, since those are united in the composition, nor are they received as equally terminating: but one is received in order to the other: whence one is as subject, the other as form: whence the Philosopher says that we can know many things simultaneously, but understand them scarcely at all.

DISTINCTIO II

Divisio Textus

This therefore by a true and pious faith, etc. Here the Master begins the tract of this doctrine, the prooemial part having been finished, in which he investigated concerning what is to be treated.

And it is divided according to the character of the subject of this science into two parts, namely into the tract on things, and the tract on signs. The tract on things contains the three preceding books: while the tract on signs occupies the fourth.

Now the tract on things has a division according to the character of those things according to which they come into the speculation of the Theologian. For there are things which are to be enjoyed or beatifying, about which it is treated in the first book. And there are things which are to be used, under which are also contained the things which enjoy and use: and those are to be loved with the love of use, just as was proved in the preceding distinction: and about those it is treated in the second book. There are also things ordering the one enjoying to the enjoyable, which according to something of themselves are to be enjoyed, and according to something are to be used: and about those it is treated in the third.

The first book is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Author touches upon the possible way for us of arriving at the knowledge of those things which are to be enjoyed, which are the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit. But in the second he posits the tract concerning them, namely in the fourth distinction, below, there, Here a sufficiently necessary question arises, etc.

But if it is asked, Why is the first way of arriving at the science of them not touched upon in the other books, as it is here? It must be said that this happens on account of the difficulty of this matter, which although it is the highest light and the most manifest, is nevertheless hidden to us on account of the imperfection of our eye. Whence, Psalm 138:6: Thy knowledge is become wonderful to me: it is high, etc. And, in the second book of the Metaphysics: As is the disposition of the eyes of bats to the light of the sun, so is the disposition of our intellect to the most manifest things of nature.

But the first of these parts contains four parts. For in every way of coming to the knowledge of something difficult four things are required: namely, that it be known what is to be supposed: because unless the principles of the science are supposed, the science is not acquired: and this he touches upon in the first chapter. Secondly, a foreknowledge of the intention is required: because when the end is unknown the attainment of the end is ignored, and the inquiry will be uncertain and vague: and this the Master does in the second chapter, there at B, All Catholic commentators, etc. The third thing which is required is order, as the Philosopher says in the second book of First Philosophy: The beginning of a science is not always from the things prior according to the reality, but sometimes from the things easier to the hearer, through which instruction is lighter: but sometimes conversely, and this order of proceeding the Master touches upon in the second chapter, there at G, But, as in the first book, etc. The fourth and last is the process of investigation by which the science is acquired, and this the Master posits in the fourth chapter, up to the beginning of the fourth distinction, there at D, Let us therefore propose in our midst, etc.

The sentence of the first chapter is therefore to give us the suppositions which we ought to hold, and from which as principles we can proceed in the whole science of this first book.

And the Text is easy.

Articulus 1 — Whether These Three, To Speak, To Believe, And To Understand, Are Fittingly Ordered

Are these three suitably ordered: to say, to believe, and to understand?

It is asked concerning this which he himself says: This Trinity is said, believed, and understood [to be] of one and the same substance or essence.

48. Hugh of St. Victor, De Sacramentis Christianae Fidei, I, Prol., c. 2.

1. For he seems to pervert the order: For an Angel, as Damascene says, is the messenger of intelligence: therefore to understand is prior to saying.

1. Again, to believe means to assent: but no one assents to that which he does not understand: therefore to understand also seems to be before believing, and believing before saying: as it is said, in Romans 10:10: With the heart we believe unto justice, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. And, Psalm 115:10: I have believed, therefore have I spoken. Therefore he perverts the order.
2. If perchance it be said, that these are ordered according to what we are more able [to do] in divine matters through them: but because we say less, than we believe, or even understand: therefore this precedes. On the contrary: We understand less than we believe: therefore understanding according to this would be before believing.
3. Moreover, Augustine says, that certain things are understood before they are believed: but certain things are not understood unless they are first believed: but certain things are always believed, and are never understood: therefore it seems to be insufficiently divided.

Solution. It must be said, that these three are enumerated here according to how they are generative of the doctrine of faith in the hearer: for faith (as the Apostle says) is by hearing: but hearing by the word of Christ. And moreover on the part of the teacher, first it is required to say: because the true doctrine of faith cannot be penetrated by reason: therefore it is necessary first to assent to the things said and to believe, so that through the light of faith one may come to the intellect: and this is what is said, Isaiah 7:9: If you will not believe, you shall not understand. And it is the text of another translation: because the other says: If you will not believe, you shall not continue . Whence Anselm says, that faith seeks understanding: thus therefore the solution to the things which are asked about the order is clear.

Now to the division of believable things which Augustine posits, it must be said that he himself takes believing broadly according to how it names an act of reason, which is from an opinion aided by reasons: for the Philosopher says that an opinion aided by reasons is faith: and then it is a believable thing which is understood before it is believed: and it is a believable thing into which reason cannot enter of itself, but with a light infused into it through faith it can enter into it, such as are the articles of faith: but a believable thing which is always believed, and never understood, is what receives faith from sense alone, such as the histories of any times.

Articulus 2 — Whether "Supreme" Adds Something To "Good" When "Supreme Good" Is Said

Whether "highest" adds anything to "good", when it is said "the highest good"?

49. Augustine, Confessions, X, 6, 9 (citing Ps 99:3).

Next it is asked concerning what he himself says: which is the highest good, etc. Does highest add anything over and above that which is good? And if it is said, that it adds an excess of superabundance, a twofold absurdity seems to follow from this:

1. One is, that then a good exceeding by superabundance will be comparable to a created or uncreated good: it is clear that not to an uncreated one, because the uncreated is not exceeded by the highest good: therefore to a created one. Now the Philosopher says that every comparison is according to something univocal: if therefore the highest good is comparable, it will be univocal with a created good, which is false.
2. Another absurdity is, that the highest does not have comparison except by approach to a term, or withdrawal from a contrary: and if it is compared in the first way, there seems to be some term of the highest good, and thus it would be finite: because everything of which there is some term is finite, which seems to be against the Creed: Immense Father, immense Son, etc. But if the comparison is by withdrawal from a contrary, then it seems that there is something supremely evil from which it withdraws, which again is false: because the supremely evil is indeed that which has nothing of good: but since among goods to be is optimal, the supremely evil will not have being: and what does not have being, is not: therefore the supremely evil is not.

Furthermore it is asked, whether the highest good is simple, or composite? But it seems that it is composite: because the highest is that to which no goodness is lacking: but goodnesses are of many notions: therefore it seems to be composite from them.

But on the contrary: Among the most noble goodnesses is simplicity: therefore either it will have that or not: if not, it will not be the highest good: if yes, therefore it is not composite.

Moreover, the Philosopher calls it goodness, and being at the limit of simplicity. And it is asked in what do these differ concerning the highest good?

Furthermore it is asked, whether there can be two, or more highest goods? And it seems not.

1. Because what is spoken of by superabundance belongs to one alone: but the highest is spoken of by superabundance: therefore it belongs to one alone.
2. Moreover, Boethius and Damascene object thus: Given that there are two highest goods: either whatever of goodness one has in number, the other has, or not. If in the first way: therefore they do not differ, because the goodnesses of the one and of the other are the same in number. If in the second way: therefore what one has of goodness, the other does not have: therefore it is not the highest good, since to each is lacking what can be added to it.

Solution. It must be said, that the highest good is substantially and essentially good, to which an addition in goodness is impossible. And the word highest does not add above the intention of good, except a respect according to name to other created goods, and does not add according to reality.

Now to this which is objected, that there is a comparison by approach, etc. It must be said, that approach and withdrawal is in qualities: which can be intensified and remitted: and those are qualities participated accidentally: and thus goodness is not in the highest good, because it is its own goodness essentially: if however comparison is taken broadly, then it must be said, that it does not approach, but is the term of every good.

To this which is objected, that according to this it would be finite, we could say with the Philosopher, that a term is neither finite nor infinite, but rather finishing that which is finished. If however we apply force to this, we will say that infinite is spoken of in a twofold way, namely, privatively what is apt by nature to have a limit, and does not have it: and thus the infinite is imperfect, since every perfection is from an end: or negatively, and thus the infinite is again twofold, namely that to which a limit can absolutely be removed and denied, namely that which neither in itself is an end or has an end, nor towards anything outside: and thus again the infinite is imperfect, or even non-being. But if infinite is said in the genus of the extrinsic, that is, that there is nothing outside it which may limit it: thus God is infinite: because He is limited neither by place, nor time, nor by the comprehension of an intellect. But on account of cavilers I say, that properly speaking every finite thing is limited by a limit which is its ultimate, or the ultimate of that which contains it, or in both ways its ultimate: just as a body to a surface, and time to the now as defining it: on account of which also a definition containing neither more nor less than the essential elements of the defined thing, is called a term. But outwardly it is limited as to a corporeal or spiritual place in which a thing is contained circumscriptively or definitively.

And in neither of those ways can we say that God or the highest good is finite, but rather non-finite. But since nothing of Him is outside Himself and His intellect; in this way we can say that He limits Himself: because He is (so to speak) equal to Himself. But in comparison to lower things He Himself is the end to which all things are limited, and He exceeds each one of them: and therefore He is limiting them, not limited in them.

But to that which is objected, that a comparison is according to something univocal, it must be said that it is taken broadly by the Philosopher: and this is clear because substance is more a being than an accident is: and yet being is not said altogether univocally of substance and of accident. Or it must be understood here, that comparison is in equivocal terms, or in analogous terms, not according as they attain the ratio of equivocal terms, but according as they relate to one thing which is in them: and thus it is concerning the good which is by analogy in the highest, and in created things: but how that analogy is understood, has been said above. But we well concede, that evil is not compared by withdrawal from the term of the contrary, namely, from the good: because, as the objection says, the supremely evil cannot be as regards potency, that is, that it be so evil that it cannot be worse.

To that which is further asked, whether the highest good is simple or composite? It must be said, that it is simple: for one good in it does not add over another according to reality, although it is saved in it according to reason. But this happens on account of the identity of what it is and being in the highest good: for where the ratio of the subject is not in a reality diverse from that to which it is subjected, nothing can be in it which makes diversity: which will be proved below, when it will be asked about simplicity. And therefore it must be said, that although all goodnesses of nobility are there, nevertheless they do not have aggregation and diversity in it, and therefore they do not take away simplicity.

To the other it must be said, that it is called highest, pure, and a good at the limit of simplicity: but highest is said in respect of the containment of goodnesses according to the differences of noble goodnesses: but pure is said on account of the unmixed nature from privation which always plots for mischief: but the limit of simplicity in the good is said on account of the non-difference of the one having goodness and the goodness had: and this is what Boethius calls that which is and being.

To that which is further asked, whether there can be two highest goods? It must be said, that no, as has been proved. And if it is objected, that two, or three, or infinite highest goods are thought to be greater than one: and since the highest good is that than which a greater cannot be thought, as Anselm says, it seems there ought to be several or infinite ones, it must be said that this is false. Several or infinite highest goods are thought, or are greater than one: for what cannot be thought to be cannot be thought to be greater than anything: but several or infinite highest goods cannot be thought to be, as the objection of Boethius introduced above proves: therefore they cannot be.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Is Seen Only By The Most Purified Minds

Are only the most purged minds able to discern God?

Next it is objected concerning this which is said: Which is discerned by the most purged minds, etc.

For the most purged soul is not except that which is purged from fault, and from misery: and those purged in such a way are only the blessed: therefore in vain is this doctrine handed down to us mortals still.

To this it must be said, that purgation is named according to the nature of those things from which the mind is purged according to the possibility of the way [of this life]: but these are on the part of the affection, and on the part of the intellect. On the part of the affection indeed first sin, secondly the proneness left over from sin, thirdly the kindling of the fomes, fourthly the occasions of sin from the outside are removed. But on the part of the intellect the presence of the body which is for sense is removed, and secondly the presence of the corporeal image from the imagination, thirdly the act of the intellect receiving from the phantasm, fourthly the act of the intellect proceeding from principles known to it according to Philosophy. For upon these four it follows that it elevates itself above itself to the light of faith: and then it discerns God to be triune and one.

37. 1 Esdras (3 Esdras) 4:38.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Divine Light Exceeds The Capacity Of Our Intellect

Does the divine light exceed the capacity of our intellect?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: For the invalid sight of the human mind, etc.

For whatever is exceeding the power of that whose act is above it, in this way in which it is exceeding it corrupts the power: but the divine light is exceeding: therefore it corrupts the intellect: therefore it does not beatify, which is false. The first is proved through the senses which are corrupted by the excellences of sensible things. The second, moreover, is written in the Text.

Moreover it is asked, what does he call to be fixed? For in an excellent thing according as it excels, that which is exceeded is not fixed: therefore it seems, since the sight of our mind is exceeded by the divine light, that it is not fixed in it. If this be granted, On the contrary: What cannot be understood, cannot be signified: the excellent according as it is such, cannot be understood: therefore it cannot be signified, which is false: because it has been signified to us in many ways.

Next it is asked concerning this which he says through the justice of faith. For why is justice said to belong more to faith, than to another virtue?

Solution. It must be said, that an excellent thing is twofold, namely excellent in the harmony of commixture, and excellent in virtue according as it is taken abstractly from a corporeal organ: and an excellent thing spoken of in the first way corrupts the organ per se, and the power which is in the organ by consequence. An excellent thing spoken of in the second way does not corrupt, but perfects most nobly.

To the other it must be said, that to be fixed in an excellent thing happens in two ways, namely, in that which is excellent, or according to that which is excellent. In the first way it happens that the sight of the mind is fixed in an excellent thing. In the second way no: because thus it is outside that which is exceeded.

But if it is asked, how is the excellent thing signified, since according as it excels it is outside the sight of the mind which it excels? I say without prejudice, that it is not signified by any name which is thus given to it, except in a certain respect and not perfectly. And to this let us posit a simile. Let us posit by impossibility that some light is infinite, or a line: and a finite circle touches something of the light, or of that line: and let the circle be having an intellective and interpretative power, namely that it itself understands what it apprehends, and knows also how to signify it to others: the circle will signify that what it touches is indeed within it and is light, or a line: but that not the whole of the line, or of the light is contained within it, rather infinite things are outside it and this is not divided from that which it itself apprehends: whence it will signify that which it receives as if in the universal, namely to be of the nature of light, or of a line: but because it is seen not to be wholly enclosed in it, but to exceed it, it cannot itself signify it according to all the differences of its nature, and according to the whole, except in a certain respect, namely, according to how it is infinitely exceeding it: and it will say: Apprehended by me is a light, or a line infinitely exceeding me. Similarly it is concerning the created sight to the uncreated substance; because that which it receives is the divine substance, and God, and the first truth, and light: but according as it is exceeding the sight, it is not known except in a certain respect, namely according to an infinite signification.

To this which is further asked concerning the justice of faith, it must be said that justice stands for general justice, whose first act according to reason belongs to faith: because he who wishes to be justified, it is necessary that first he convert himself to God through faith: because otherwise fear will not be made in him, nor hope which move to penance: and concerning this it will be set forth elsewhere.

Is every truth that is known inspired by the Holy Spirit?

Next it is asked concerning this which is said in the incidental note: I do not approve what is said in the prayer, etc.

1. For it seems, that every truth is known and said by the Holy Spirit: for upon that which the Apostle says, 1 Cor 12:3: No man can say: Lord Jesus, but by the Holy Spirit, the Gloss of Ambrose says: Every truth by whomever it is said, is from the Holy Spirit.
2. Again, it is clear, that Caiaphas was not prophesying from intention: and yet the Evangelist says , that on account of the dignity of his office the Spirit gave him to speak the truth, because Jesus was to die for the nation.
3. Again, Augustine in the book On the Teacher, proves by many reasons, that the external teacher labors in vain unless the one teaching interiorly is present: therefore it seems, that every truth is from the Holy Spirit.

But on the contrary: There is truth in first propositions and in the liberal arts for which man is sufficient from the teaching of man, and his own invention: therefore it is not necessary that a new teaching grace arrive there.

Solution. It must be said, that this disputation is not against the note: because Augustine says, that the wicked see no truth: and this he retracted, because the wicked have many things from God. If however force is not applied in this, we say that in the soul, in order that it receive the knowledge of truth, four things are required: the possible intellect which may be prepared to receive: and secondly, the agent intellect by the light of which the abstraction of species is made in which the truth is, or that true thing: and thirdly, the object thing through an image, or itself, about which that truth is: and fourthly, the principles and maxims which are as it were certain instruments proportioning the possible and impossible and necessary compositions and divisions from which the true is received. Among these four, the first is receiving only: the second however is giving its light only: the third is receiving from the agent intellect, and giving the light of truth distinctly to the possible: but the fourth is moved as an instrument, and moving the composition and division of that in which the true known or sought is. Whence certain Philosophers said, that these would suffice for the cognition of the true which is under reason. But it must be said otherwise, namely, that the light of the agent intellect does not suffice per se, except through the application of the light of the uncreated intellect, just as the ray of the sun is applied to the ray of a star. And this happens in a twofold way, namely, according to a light merely doubled, or even tripled: doubled as if a conjunction to the light of the uncreated intellect is made, and that light is the interior teacher. But sometimes it is made to the conjunction of the angelic and divine intellect: because certain Philosophers posited the soul as an instrument of intelligence, because the intelligence impresses its illuminations into it. And this Dionysius calls the reduction of our hierarchy through the hierarchy of Angels, and Augustine says this happens in many ways. And certain Philosophers call this the continuation of intellects: because even they said that nothing is seen except through the first light.

To this therefore which is asked, whether the apposition of a new grace is required, it must be said that if grace is called any gift freely given by God, then this does not happen without grace: rather a certain Philosopher says, that even if something is known in habit, a conversion to act will not be made except through a conversion to the light of the uncreated intellect.

Is it more dangerous to err in the matter concerning the Trinity?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: Because nowhere is it more dangerous, etc.

For this seems false: since we see many opinions handed down by the Masters in the science concerning the Trinity: and they say that the difficulty of the matter excuses.

To this it must be said, that he says more dangerous here, therefore because it is in the foundation, which being overthrown, the whole is overthrown, and not as to the magnitude of the sin: or force can be applied in this that he says, one errs, and not one opines: because to err is to defend an error: but it happens to opine concerning the contradictory of a science without danger.

Is nothing more fruitful found than in the matter concerning the Trinity?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: Nor is anything more fruitful found, etc. For the moralities of sermons are more fruitful: because they convert men from sin.

Solution. Force can be applied in this that he says, more fruitful: because fruit is the refreshment in the end which is the highest good, and this is none other than God the Trinity: but moralities can be more useful. Or let it be said, that the science of the Trinity is the fruit of every science: because every science and every conversion of souls is so that that may be had in which is beatitude: and thus preachings do not have anything of usefulness, except from this, according as they are ordered to it.

Articulus 8 — What Is Better Said Of The Father, Son, And Holy Spirit: That They Are One, Or That He Is One

Which is better said of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit: that they are one [plural], or that they are one [singular]?

Next it is asked concerning those things which are said in the second part which begins, there, All Catholics however. For there is a certain note there which says: Where they spoke of the Father and the Son: he who begets, and he whom he begets, are one [singular]. For it is asked there concerning the reason for Augustine's retraction. For since the word is [singular] is a substantive verb, and signifies substance: it seems rather to follow the number of the essence, than the number of the persons: and thus it was to be said, that the Father and the Son is one.

Solution. It must be said, that although the word is signifies substance, nevertheless it signifies it as act, and by consequence as in some suppositum which renders it a person to itself: and since the verb receives number from the substance standing under it, that suppositum being numbered, it is necessary to be understood that the act is numbered: and thus it is necessary that the verb be posited in the plural number: and therefore it is better said, they are one, than, it is one. But the objection proceeds concerning substance signified as at rest, as it is signified nominally.

Articulus 9 — Whether It Is Better To Say, "The One, The Father; The Other, The Son," Or "One And Another"

Is it better to say, "The Father is one [alter], the Son is another [alter]": or "one [alius], and another [alius]"?

Next it is objected upon this which is had at the end of the same chapter: In which the Father is not one thing [aliud], the Son another [aliud], etc.

For it is asked, whether it is better to say, The Father is one [alter], the Son is another [alter], or one [alius]? And it seems that it is alter: because alius names diversity of substance: but alter names diversity of accident, or of property according to Porphyry. Since therefore the Father and the Son differ by their properties, and not by substance, it seems better to be said, Al-

...one Father and another [alter] Son, than one [alius] Father, another [alius] Son.

Further it is asked, why in the neuter gender it is not conceded that it be said, "The Father is one thing [aliud], the Son another," etc.

§ Solution. To this it must be said that alter is not as congruously said, because although property is in the divine, still property is the person, and the person is a subsisting hypostasis or substance; how this is the case will be shown below, and therefore let this be supposed. Hence since alter [another/the other] speaks only of a variation of an accident, it is not fitting in the divine.

§ To the other [question], some say that there are three things in the divine: essence, person, and notion; and to the essence the neuter gender is transferred, to the person the masculine, and to the notion the feminine. And it is already quite clear concerning the first and the second, because, as the Grammarians say, the neuter is an unformed gender, and signifies the essence of a thing simply; and therefore when one asks by quid [what] in the neuter gender, it is answered by an essential, like "wood" or "animal." The masculine gender is formed and perfect, and similarly in a nature hypostasis and person have the perfection of distinguishing things; and therefore when one asks by quis [who], the name of a distinct person is answered, like Socrates or Plato. How the feminine belongs to a notion is not as evident, since it itself is also a formed gender, belonging to an individual and a person, which by a question made through quae [who, fem.], to which is answered a determinate hypostasis in the female sex. But they say to this that the feminine is a more imperfect gender; and therefore it is attributed to the notion, which according to the account of understanding does not signify something subsisting through itself and complete in the way a person does.

Divisio Textus

Next we must pass to the fourth part of this part, which begins there: Let us propose therefore in the midst, etc.

§ And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he teaches how to come to a knowledge of the Trinity and unity through the canonical authorities of the Bible. But in the second he teaches the same through congruous reasons and similitudes, there, For the Apostle says, etc. And there begins the third distinction.

§ The first is subdivided into two according to the two testaments from which the authorities are drawn. For in the first he posits the authorities of the Old Testament. But in the second concerning the New Testament, there, chapter H, But now after the testimonies of the Old.

§ In the first of these there are three parts: in the first of which he principally proves the unity of essence in itself, and in the persons. But in the second principally the distinction of persons, and consequently the one essence; which begins there, chapter F, But now let us return to the proposition. In the third part he posits specially the testimonies concerning the Holy Spirit, there, chapter G, Also concerning the Holy Spirit, etc.

§ In the first of these there are three chapters: in the first of which he adduces four authorities, the first three of which prove the unity of essence considered in itself; but the fourth proves it to be one in three persons, and he applies the exposition of the fourth according to Augustine. But in the second [chapter] of the same fourth [part] he posits the twofold explanation of Hilary, who intuits it more subtly, there, chapter E, near the beginning, Likewise, the same in the fourth book, etc. But in the third [chapter] he states summarily what follows from the words of Hilary, there, chapter E, near the end, In these words Hilary, etc.

§ But first a doubt arises concerning this which he says: The very exordia of the law. For the law begins in Genesis. But this authority is taken from the twentieth chapter of Exodus, verses 2 and 3.

§ Solution. The "law" here is said to be the Decalogue; and there he begins to posit the commandments of the Decalogue.

Articulus 10 — Whether In This Science One Ought First To Proceed By Authorities

Whether in this science one must first proceed by authorities?

Whether in this science one must first proceed by authorities?

Next it is asked concerning this which is had in the third chapter, where the Author says, that according to the authorities of the holy Scriptures, etc.

§ 1. For it seems to be the converse, because: he who does not believe the faith, does not believe the authority either; therefore one must first deal with him by reasons, rather than by authorities.

§ Solution. This is true regarding an infidel, but the Master intends to say this to the faithful; and therefore since faith in this science precedes the intellect (as has been held), one must first proceed by authorities, rather than by reasons. Hence Augustine and Bernard say, that what we believe we owe to authority, what we understand to reason, and what we opine to error.

Articulus 11 — Whether "God" Is A Name Of Nature

Whether "God" is a name of nature?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: God is a name of nature, etc.

§ 1. For this seems to be false through Damascene, where he says thus: "God [Theos] is so called from that which is thein [θεῖν], that is, to encircle and foster all things; or from aithein [αἴθειν], that is, burning, for God is a fire consuming all malice; or from theasthai [θεᾶσθαι], that is, considering all things, for nothing is hidden from him; indeed he is the contemplator of all things."

But all these derivations signify a work. Therefore "God" is a name of operation, and not of nature.

§ 2. Likewise, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: "Divinity is said to be that which sees all things with perfect providence and goodness, circumspecting all things, and containing them, and filling them in itself, and exceeding all things that use this providence itself." But to provide, to fill, and to contain are operations. Therefore "God" is a name of operation.

§ 3. Likewise, Maximus: This name Theos [θεὸς] is derived from the Greek verb theoro [θεωρῶ], that is, I see, or I contemplate, or I consider; or from the verb theo [θέω], that is, I encircle: because he circumspects, and providing for all things encircles them. But to circumspect and to encircle are operations; therefore it is a name of operation.

§ 4. The same is proved by reason: for he does not have a name unless given by us who name him; but we do not know him except through his works; therefore it seems that we only name him from his works. Therefore, since we call him God, it seems that "God" is a name of operation, and not of nature.

Further it is asked in relation to this: Whether divinity is communicable to a creature.

§ 1. It seems that it is: because upon that [word] of the Apostle For although there are those who are called gods, the Gloss says: "by participation in divinity." Therefore it seems that divinity is an attribute in God which is participable by a creature, and communicable.

§ 2. Likewise, it is sung of Christ: He has bestowed deity upon us; therefore the name of deity is communicable.

§ 3. Likewise, in the Psalm I have said: You are gods. And to Moses I have established you as the God of Pharaoh. Likewise, You shall not detract from the gods. Therefore it seems that this name is communicable.

§ 4. Likewise, whether it signifies providence, as Damascene says, or encirclement and containing, or even the fire of charity consuming sin: all those are communicable to a creature, because creatures provide, care for, and attend to things; therefore deity seems to be communicable.

§ 5. Likewise, the acts which Dionysius posits, to provide, to encircle, to fill, to contain, are all communicable; therefore it seems that deity is also communicable.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Those who posit many gods err; therefore it seems that deity is a form incommunicable to creatures; therefore it seems that those who are created cannot be gods.

§ 2. Likewise, Anselm: God is greater than can be thought; but that which is greater than can be thought cannot be communicable to many; therefore it cannot be communicated; and thus divinity will be an incommunicable attribute.

Further it is asked, On what basis is the number of the derivations of Damascene and of the acts of Dionysius taken?

Still further it is asked, for the Gloss on the First Epistle to the Corinthians says [50] that "God" is said in three ways, namely, substantively, adoptively, and nuncupatively; for it is doubted, whether it is said of them equivocally.

§ 1. And it seems that it is: because equivocals are those of which only the name is common, and the account of substance is diverse; but here only the name is common, and the account of substance is diverse; therefore it is said of them equivocally.

§ 2. The same seems to be gathered from the text there, where it says, Although there are those who are called gods; it does not say, who are.

§ 3. The same [is gathered] from the Gloss's manner of speaking, which says that it is said "in three ways," because it seems to distinguish the signified of the spoken word, and not of the supposits; but such a distinction is fitting for an equivocal term; therefore it itself is said of them equivocally.

ON THE CONTRARY: Although there are those who are called gods: the Gloss adds, "by participation in divinity."

§ 1. But whatever have one name by participation in the same common nature, are univocal; therefore "God" is univocal to God said substantively, and adoptively, and nuncupatively.

§ 2. Likewise, an equivocal term does not posit a respect of diverse things to one nature through the intention of the name; for he who named the celestial star "dog" did not look to any property of the nature of the dog, and similarly he who named the fish "dog." Therefore the intention of the one instituting the equivocal term did not look to that same thing when he instituted the second, to which he looked when he instituted it to be the name of the prior thing. And therefore Boethius calls such equivocals "by chance and fortune." But he who imposes the name on an idol has a respect to one thing, which is to provide and to contain, from which account also God substantively is called God. Therefore it seems that God is not equivocally called God.

§ Solution. It must be said that two things are to be attended to in a name, namely the form or account from which it is imposed, and that upon which it is imposed; and these are called by some the signified [significatum] and the supposit; but by the Grammarians they are called quality and substance. And if we attend to that from which it is imposed, that is, the attribute, or the form (if it is permitted to speak thus, since in God there is no form), then it is a name of operation. But if we attend to the supposit, namely, that upon which it is imposed and for which it supposits, it is a name of nature. And thus the solution to the four authorities of the Saints is clear: because Ambrose is speaking with respect to that upon which it is imposed, while the other three with respect to that from which it is imposed.

§ But if it is asked: Since that name is imposed from an operation, just as certain others are, why is that one rather called a name of nature than the others, since the others are also imposed upon the nature of God, just as that one is? It must be said that that name, God, is imposed from works which through themselves belong only to God: such as the works of universal providence, and of the containing and filling of things. And because these according to themselves belong only to God, therefore the divine nature is rather named by that one than by the others.

§ To the other it must be said that although we name him from operations, nevertheless the operations are not of the same account: because certain ones through themselves belong only to him; but certain ones through themselves and naturally belong also to a creature, although subsequently, because they are from him and directed to him: such as life, wisdom.

§ To that which is further asked, Whether divinity is a communicable attribute? It must be said that if providence, and containing, and encirclement are taken in respect to the universe, in that account it will not be communicable. For although those pre-existing others, whether in degree of dignity, or power of miracles, or merit of life, have some providence and containing in respect to others, nevertheless they fall short in at least two things, namely in universality, and in this that they do not penetrate and fill the interiors of the thing, but are as it were extrinsic. And therefore with respect to this it is incommunicable; but with respect to the acts in their genus it is communicable; and then it is said participatively, as the aforementioned Gloss says.

§ To that which is further asked, From what is the number of the derivations according to Damascene drawn? It must be said that according to the order to creatures there are three things in God, namely wisdom, power, and goodness, or good will. And although power is first according to the account of understanding, if these three are taken absolutely without an order to actually existing creatures, nevertheless according as they are referred to the governance of a created thing, prior is the act of seeing wisdom, and secondly is the act of power encircling and containing in being, and thirdly is the act of goodness ordering to perfection: from this that he loves all things that are, and hates nothing of those which he made. And Dionysius posits these same acts, except for the fact that he adds "filling", which posits perfection in the thing. For from this that God is in it essentially, presentially, and potentially, he orders it to perfection and holds it in being, because all things would flow away into nothingness, unless the hand of the omnipotent God contained them.

§ To that which is further asked concerning the definition of the name, it must be said that in truth it is said equivocally thus, although it is not equivocal by chance and fortune; but rather by holding itself as prior and posterior to some one thing, which is substantially and naturally in the true God, but in the Saints by a certain participation which is according to a part and imperfect; but in gods nuncupatively only through a respect of opinion, and this has the least amount of deity; because to be in opinion, is to be in a qualified sense [secundum quid], and not simply. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — Who Said To Moses, "I Am Who Am," The Nature Or A Divine Person

Whether nature, or a divine person, said to Moses, "I am who am"?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: I am who am, and He who is sent me, etc. And three things are asked, namely: Who is it who said this to Moses, whether nature or person? The second is, whether this is a proper name in God, and what it names in him? The third is, concerning the order of this name to other names.

§ To the first one proceeds thus: 1. It does not belong to essence according to the intellect of essence to speak, but to a person; but here is a certain speech; therefore it does not belong to the essence, but to a person.

§ 2. Besides, the Saints expound this concerning the Son: because through the descent the incarnation is signified; through the fire of the bush is signified the taking up of the tribulation of nature, in which however he did not lose the greenness of divinity. Hence he says: Seeing I have seen, etc. Through the liberation from Egypt is signified the liberation from sin and the devil, who is signified through Pharaoh. Therefore it seems that this belongs to a person.

§ 3. Likewise, some also wish to take this from this pronoun, I [ego], which is a demonstrative signifying a determinate person. Who [qui] also is a name having in itself a subjunctive article, by reason of which articulation it has to signify a person determinate by his property. And thus it seems that the person of the Son said that.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The works of the Trinity are undivided; therefore the saying of one is the saying of the other.

§ 2. Some also wish to draw this from the modes of signifying of the terms which are posited there: because I [ego] is a demonstrative of the first person, and thus has to signify the Father, who in the Trinity is not from another person, but is the principle of the whole divinity, and a principle is not from a principle. But who [qui] is a name with a subjunctive article, which demonstrates a second knowledge, and has to stand for the Son, who is as it were second, because he is from the Father. But am [sum] signifies substance as the act by which he proceeds from both, and has to signify the Holy Spirit who is from both. And therefore it is also repeated with both, when it is said, I am who am; and thus it will be a word of the three persons.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Damascene says that it signifies an infinite sea of substance, not what he is; therefore it seems that it is a saying of the essence.

§ 2. Likewise, Jerome says that in comparison to him who is, who is immutable, the rest which are mutable are not.

§ 3. Besides, let us understand, by an impossibility, that the persons are not in that account by which they are distinguished, that is, that the Father is not in the account of the Father, nor the Son in the account of the Son, nor the Holy Spirit in the account of the Holy Spirit: still God will be undivided in himself, and a subsisting hypostasis of a rational nature divided from others. Therefore he can speak; therefore to speak is not proper to a person in the account of the Father, or the Son, or the Holy Spirit, but in the account of God; and this is what belongs to the nature. Therefore that saying is of the substance.

§ Response. To this it must be said that, just as the last objection proves, this name, He who is, without doubt belongs to the three persons, in this that they are of one substance: because this is given from the simplicity and property of the divine nature in being.

§ But to this which is objected, that to speak belongs to a person, it must be said that it is true, but not to a person distinct in this way. Rather, if there were not three persons in the accounts by which they are distinct in faith, God would still be a certain person distinct by himself from other essences and natures of things, and to him in this way it would belong to speak through a subjected creature: just as Jerome says that he spoke that word to Moses through an Angel. Nevertheless, because the Son is the word and mouth of the Father, who spoke him in the world, therefore by appropriation it is attributed to the Son.

§ To the other two, it must be said that such a demonstration and articulation does not compel it to stand for a person distinct by such a personal property, as faith distinguishes; but rather for a person which through itself is one subsisting hypostasis of a rational nature: as God is here, if it is permitted to speak thus.

Articulus 13 — Whether "He Who Is" Is A Proper Name Of God

Whether "He who is" is a proper name of God?

Secondly it is asked concerning this, Whether it is proper to God, and what it names in him?

But it seems that it is not proper: because to be belongs to all created things, and belongs to them primarily; therefore it seems that it is not proper to God alone.

Besides, what does it name in him? And Damascene says that it names an infinite sea of substance, and not what he is.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The infinite as such cannot be named by what it is, or that it is; therefore it seems that it cannot be named by this name, He who is, or being.

§ 2. Besides, we name God by that through which we understand him; but we understand him through his works; therefore we name him through his works. Therefore it seems that we do not name him by any name which is designative of substance; therefore not by this name, He who is.

Besides, what is it that Damascene says, that it does not signify what he is? For this seems to be false: for it signifies the essence, and this is God; therefore it signifies what God is.

§ Solution. To this it must be said that the being of essence, in the pure and simple intellect of being, is proper to God. For every other being is something more than simple essence. This is proved thus: Let created being itself be taken in the absolute intellect of being, of which the Philosopher says: The first of created things is being, and there is no other created thing before it. It is true that this being does not have anything in itself besides being; nevertheless, because it is created, it necessarily posits a habitude to the creator, and this habitude is something in it, although it is in respect of another. Hence this habitude together with the created being makes a concreativity and a composition, and thus to be simply is not proper to it. But if it is objected, that this is also in the first being, because it posits a respect to created beings, it must be said that that respect according to the thing adds nothing to it; but in a created being it is otherwise, and its respect is added upon its being.

§ Besides, in a created being there is further taken composability with another, and determinability through forms and differences of the most general genera and of other parts of being. This composability, by the very fact that it is not in being, is not in the first being. And thus it is clear how being names the divine essence, or God according to the divine essence, and not properly a created [essence].

§ To the other it must be said that the infinite according as it is infinite is not named, because according to this it is outside the one naming and understanding; but that which is infinite according as it is attained by the intellect, can be named, and signified by that very name, as was shown above.

§ To the other it must be said that it is true that our cognition begins from creatures, but it is not terminated in creatures, but in God. For we come through the effect of power to power, and through power to essence. And therefore we can name the essence, not through any creature, but from that in which our cognition stands as in its end; for otherwise we could never signify anything concerning God, except in the account of a cause to creatures.

§ To that which Damascene says that it does not signify what he is, it must be said that this is understood in two ways: for "what it is" [quid esse] is to be something [aliquid esse]; and to be something is to be a being not simply, but determinate by some species, or genus, or difference: just as to be a substance is to be something, and to be an animal is to be something, and to be good. And this is what Boethius says in the first book of De Hebdomadibus: Everything that is participates in that which is being so that it may be, but participates in another so that it may be something. And therefore he says that it is an infinite sea of substance. But if it is objected, that there is an opposition in the word of Damascene, because substance according to this does not name "to be," but rather "to be something," it must be said that he himself does not place force on the name of substance according to the account of the name, but only takes it according to the thing, according as it is convertible with simple essence. Others have said otherwise, namely, that "what it is" is the proper definition of a thing, which no divine name touches either explicitly or implicitly. But this is nothing: because God is not definable, although "what he is" can be said in him, such as substance, wisdom, goodness, and the rest of this kind. Nevertheless, it must be attended to, that none of these names which also say "what he is," produces in us a determinate notion of its signification in God, such that nothing is outside the intellect concerning the reality of the same signified. Because God is infinite according to any attribute; and therefore his profundity, and the height of nobility signified by the same, is not totally included by the intellect. For otherwise God would be comprehended, and would be rendered finite by our intellect according to this attribute, which is false: because neither simply nor according to any attribute is he renderable finite by our intellect, or by any created intellect. Nevertheless, when I say that substance, or wisdom, or goodness signify what God is, but "to be" or "what he is" signifies being, or entity, or infinite essence, or an infinite sea of substance: I do not mean to say that substance by adding something to being draws it to a part. But because such a determination is made according to the account of understanding through this name, in reality there is no addition, but equal simplicity. Nor is that account of understanding therefore false, because according to the mode of understanding it is false: because its mode of understanding which it receives from the name, it does not posit in the reality itself. But concerning this there will be a question below.

Articulus 14 — Whether "He Who Is" Is First Among The Divine Names

Whether "He who is" is the first among the divine names.

Whether "He who is" is the first among the divine names.

Thirdly it is asked concerning the order of this name to other names.

§ 1. And it seems that it itself is prior to all other names: because Dionysius says so in the book On the Divine Names: "Being itself according to itself is older than that which is life through itself, and that which is wisdom through itself; and whatever other existing things participating, before all those they participate in being." Therefore it seems that He who is is the first among the names of God.

§ 2. Likewise, Boethius in the book De Hebdomadibus says thus that being itself in no way participates in anything; therefore it seems that it itself is simpler than all things participating in something. But substance, the good, and life, and wisdom participate in something; therefore being itself is prior to them.

§ 3. Likewise, the Philosopher in the Book of Causes: "The first of created things is being," etc.; therefore being according to the intellect is first.

§ 4. Likewise, the Commentator in the same place says that being comes to be through creation, because according to the intellect there is nothing before it in which the good comes to be; and other things come to be through information, because according to the intellect being is before them, and they are in being, like things informing it. Therefore He who is, is first.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Damascene says that Dionysius says that the first name is the good.

§ 2. Likewise, in the order of names Dionysius executes concerning the good prior to being, in which he makes mention of the true, and the beautiful; therefore it seems that the good is prior.

§ 3. Likewise, whatever holds itself to being and to non-being according to cause, is prior to that which holds itself to being only; the good holds itself to being and to non-being, in the first cause; but being [holds itself] to being only; therefore the good is prior to being. PROOF OF THE MIDDLE PREMISE through Dionysius and through the Commentary: because boao [βοάω] and kaleo [καλέω] are the same, etc. For boao in Greek is "I call, you call," from which bonum is drawn in Latin; but kaleo is the same as "I cry out," from which kalon [καλόν] is drawn in Greek, which signifies bonum [good] in Latin, for the reason that God by his goodness calls those things which are not, as those things which are.

§ Solution. Those names can be considered in three ways, namely, according to their simple intentions: and thus being is older, and prior to all; because in the order of the primary cause according to the Philosopher in the Book of Causes, and in the order of the subject it holds itself to all others, namely, the true, the good, life, and wisdom, etc. And thus speaks Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names in the adduced authority, and the Philosopher in the Book of Causes. And thus the reason which was adduced proceeds.

§ Furthermore, those can be considered also according to the supposits in which they are, and which they do not abandon except according to a certain intellect, as Boethius wishes in the book De Hebdomadibus. And thus the true, the good, being, and the one are converted among themselves; but not life, and wisdom with these. Hence according to this mode four will be equally first, but they do not antecede the others.

§ In a third mode those can be considered in the first cause according as it is a cause, that is, according as it produces caused things. And thus being in a creature is produced by the good in the Creator. And in this mode created being is posterior to the uncreated good. And this is what Dionysius says, that the good is diffusive of its being. And that solution is according to the intellect of Dionysius, as is clear from the authorities adduced above. And through this the solution to all the questions is clear.

And note that on account of the simple intellect of uncreated being, as was said, Rabbi Moses says in the book Guide of the Perplexed [Dux neutrorum], that He who is is the ineffable name of God, and the chief among all names, by which he names this, that he himself most truly is simply without any addition.

Whether "Lord" is a name of power?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, that Lord is a name of power. And it is asked what power it signifies?

§ 1. It seems to say several things according to Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, where he says thus: "Domination is not only an excess over worse things, that is, subjects; but a perfect and all-encompassing possession of all beautiful and good things, and a true fortitude valid against falling." Therefore it seems that Lord signifies a superposition over worse things, that is, an excess over subjects, and an abundance of possession of beautiful and good things, and fortitude. And here no mention is made of power in that it is power, unless perhaps according as fortitude is a certain power.

§ 2. Likewise, Ambrose says that lord is so called from the power of ruling, and of containing the creature subject to him.

§ 3. But Augustine says that a lord is called one who has a servant; and according to this last exposition Lord does not seem to be from eternity.

§ Solution. It must be said that in the intellect of that which is Lord, one thing is principal, and another is according to the account of understanding only consequent to it, and another is like an antecedent. For superposition over worse things, that is, inferior created things, is said by the intellect of the name principally. But the containing and regimen of those to which he is superposed, is said consequently. But those things which are the cause of superposition, according to the account of understanding are said in the name like an antecedent. But the cause of superposition is the all-encompassing possession of beautiful and good things incomparably more than may be in all created things to which he is superposed. Concerning the intellect also of that antecedent is firmness, which Dionysius calls fortitude; hence another translation has firmness: so that, namely, such possession is through itself from nature; because then the beautiful and the good in him will not be able to fall. And Dionysius touches upon these four in his definition. But others touch upon that which is enclosed in the name according to a part. And through this the solution to the whole except the last is clear.

§ And it is commonly said to the other, that dominion can mean the habit of dominating, or the act: if the habit, then he is Lord from eternity; if the act, then he is Lord from time.

Articulus 16 — Whether God Is Nameable By Us

Whether God is nameable by us?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: The Lord omnipotent is his name.

§ 1. For from this it is taken, that he is named; therefore he is nameable by us, which seems to be against Dionysius, in the book On the Divine Names where he says thus, that it is an unspeakable word, and irrationality, and unintelligibility. And another translation has: unnameability.

inscrutable at once, and not investigable: just as there is no trace of them by which they have passed to the hidden infinity of it: therefore, if it is unknowable, it seems that it is unnameable: because naming does not occur except of the known.

1. Likewise, In the same, neither is there opinion of it, nor name, nor serious.
2. Likewise, In chapter 7, he says ineffable and unnameable: and below, It is not understood, nor said, nor named.
3. And in the last of the Mystical Theology: Neither is there reason of it, nor name, nor knowledge: therefore it seems that it is unnameable.
4. Likewise, the Philosopher in the book on Causes; The first cause is superior to narration, and tongues do not fail in narrating it except because of the nobility of its being: because it is above every cause, and it is not narrated except through secondary causes, which are illuminated by the light of the first cause.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 4. Dionysius in the book on Divine Names: The scriptures call the invisible, the most clear light: and much laudable and much nameable, ineffable and unnameable.

1. Likewise, In the same chapter and first: Theologians praise the deity, as both unnameable, and from every name.
2. Likewise, He says that it is its reason, intellect, and name.
3. Likewise, Exodus 3:15: this is my name forever: therefore it seems that it is nameable.

Solution. It must be said to this according to Augustine in the first of On Christian Doctrine, where he says thus: Since nothing worthy can be said of God, he admitted the service of human voice, and wished us to rejoice in his words. Hence it must be said that God is unnameable by a name perfectly representing what he is, or perfectly signifying it. But because of the poverty of names, he condescended to us that we might name him with a word imperfectly signifying, provided that we do not place that imperfection in him, but understand him to surpass: and thus all things brought from Dionysius to this that he is nameable are understood. And that this is true is evident through Dionysius thus saying in the book on Divine Names, last chapter: And neither do we bring the name of goodness as agreeing with it: but with the desire of understanding something and saying about that ineffable nature, we sanctify the most worthy of names to it first. And we will indeed agree with the Theologians in this, but we fall short of the truth of things.

As to what is objected from the proposition of the Philosopher, it must be said that he speaks truly, and according to the Commentary the reason is such: because the first imports two things of itself, namely, that it is perfect in itself, and bestowing perfection on all others: but the diminished, insofar as it is diminished, has two things contrary to its reason, namely, that because it is deficient in itself from perfection, therefore it bestows no perfection on any. And therefore, because every name says what God is in a diminished way, therefore it is more unsuitable than suitable: because insofar as it is diminished, it places contraries to the two things that everyone who places God, says to be in God. But it is most truly said to be above name, and above narration: because since it is not bounded by intellect, it is signified to exceed every name, and every reason.

Articulus 17 — By What Is God Named, Whether By Everything Which It Is Better To Be Than Not To Be

By what is God named, whether by everything which it is better to be than not to be?

Further, it is asked, by what is He named?

And Anselm says that He is named by everything which it is better to be than not to be simply: but to everything which is, it is better to be a being than not to be: therefore God is named being.

Likewise, it is better to live for everything which is, than not to live: therefore He is named life: and so with others. But not for everything which is, is it better to be gold than not to be gold: because for an angel it is better not to be gold than to be gold: therefore gold does not pertain to God. Anselm uses this rule for naming God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It is better for everything which is, to be sensitive than not sensitive: therefore it seems that God is sensitive, which is false.

1. Likewise, others say that God is named from all things which do not pertain to privation and matter: but there are many such things for which it is better to be than not to be: just as it is better for me to be a man than not to be, etc.: therefore it seems that the preceding statement is not true.
2. Furthermore, Dionysius makes Theology of mystical names, and another of symbolic ones: therefore it seems that He is named from symbolic ones: therefore from material ones, which is against what is commonly said, that He is not named from material ones.
3. Likewise, Dionysius says that in Him it is necessary to affirm the positions of all: therefore it seems that He is named by the names of all.

Solution. It must be said that divine names are formed in two ways, namely, either from those things which according to reality are primarily in God and secondarily in creatures, and these names are called mystical by blessed Dionysius, such as being, life, intellect, wisdom, goodness, and the like: for "mystical" in Greek is the same as "secret" in Latin: and this is because that name according to its property which it has from institution signifies imperfectly and in part that which in God is perfection and in whole: and it sometimes signifies accidentally that which is substantially in God and the divine substance: and therefore the divine thing which it names remains hidden to us: because we know it to be above the name, and the tongue fails in narrating it. And therefore Dionysius explains that it is life, and not life, but above life: for it is life in reality primarily, and not life according to what the name posits: above life, because He is His own life, and inserted in us: and therefore Dionysius also says that in God affirmations are uncompounded, and negations true: because by negations it is said what He is not, like incorruptible, incorporeal, and the like: and these are simply true. But affirmation is uncompounded: because the mode of signifying in the name is repugnant to the divine thing, as has been said, especially for three reasons, namely, because it signifies composite what is of infinite simplicity, and imperfect what is most perfect, and accidentally sometimes what is substance. Hence Anselm says that father, and life, and the like, although they descend to us from God according to reality, yet the name of father sounds more familiarly to us as a carnal human father than as God. But from symbolic names according to the translation of corporeal property to spiritual it is denominated. Like stone, because solid and solidly founding what is built upon: so spiritually His solid truth is the foundation of the spiritual edifice. And in these two ways He is named by all.

According to Anselm's rule, it must be said that it is true of mystical names which name that which according to reality is primarily in God, although they do not name Him as He is in Himself.

To what is objected against, it must be said that sense is taken in two ways, namely, for the material power joined to an organ, and thus it does not pertain to God, nor even to angels: or it can be taken for the receptive or cognitive power of sensibles, and in this way it pertains to God, and to an angel, and thus it is a condition of nobility.

To what is asked about the rule of the Masters, it must be said that it is good: because material things are called corporeal, whether they are bodies themselves, or substantial or accidental forms, which are determined by bodies, and are in bodies. Privative things, however, which pertain to defect because all those are caused by privation: like to suffer, to be changed, to be moved, to be unjust, to lie, to sin, and the like. Besides these, however, all pertain to nobility, by which it is better to be for everything which is, than not to be. And from these the solution to the whole is clear.

ARTICULUS XVUQUL.

For which the image is supposed, when it is said: Let us make man to our image?

Then it is asked about this which says:

Let us make man to the image, And two things are asked, namely, for what the image stands, either for the essence, or for the persons, or for both? And concerning the reason for the diversity of the expositions of Augustine and Hilary.

First, therefore, it is asked, Whether the image supposes the essence, or the persons? If it supposes the essence, then it seems possible to say, Let us make man to our essence, or to the essence in three; but this is not true: therefore it seems that it does not suppose the essence in itself, nor the essence in three persons.

But if it supposes for the three persons, then it seems that it ought to say, To the images, and not to the image.

If it is said (as some have said) that the image stands there for the Son. Against: The text says to our image; but the Son is not the image except of the Father: whence then the Father ought to say, To my image: and it would not be a word common to the three persons, as the Saints say.

For this reason, some have said that the image does not stand there for the uncreated image, but the created: and they wish to have this from the connotation of the preposition to, which seems to denote assimilation with the reason of some distance: because it seems to signify motion towards something, for it signifies towards a place. But if it is asked, What is that created thing to which man is made, they say that this is the reason of the image abstracting from the exemplified image in man. But against this is, that still this reason of the image will be the reason of some other uncreated thing, and concerning this the same question returns as before, Whether it says the essence, or the person? and if the person, Whether the person of the Son, or all in common?

Furthermore, that reason of the image cannot be posited except in the mind of God making man: and thus this reason of the image will be the idea to which man is made to the image of God: and thus nothing is created, but rather the creative essence, as Anselm wishes. Whence this seems to be said in vain.

There are others who say that the image stands there for the Son, and the likeness for the Holy Spirit. But then it seems the Father ought to say this word, and not commonly the whole Trinity. Likewise, the Father ought to say to my image, and to our likeness: and not commonly to say to the Son and the Holy Spirit, as the Saints expound, but to the Son only.

Solution. To these I say without prejudice, that image and likeness here say the divine essence directly, and the three persons indirectly. Whence the image is one essence in three persons imitating themselves in the same essence: and likeness is one essence by the mode of quality which according to Damascene, follows the substance: like goodness, wisdom, and such in three persons similar to themselves in goodness, and wisdom, and virtue, and such: whence both image and likeness are relative indirectly, and intrinsically. I say indirectly: because those things which are referred to themselves, are implied indirectly. I say intrinsically: because they have in themselves the relation, and also that to which it is referred: so that they do not seek to be determined externally: as it is said, These are similar, that is, this one is similar to that one, and this one is similar to this one.

Therefore to what was first objected, it must be said that they say the essence in persons imitating themselves in it: as it has been held, they say imitating, and that in which they imitate themselves. Nor is it valid that it could be said there, Let us make man to the image, that is, to the essence in three persons: because although the essence in three persons is the same as the image, yet the mode of signifying in the name is different: and therefore the argument does not proceed: and there is there a sin of accident, or even according to some a figure of speech due to the changed mode of predicating in divine things. But we concede the other reasons which proceed against other opinions without prejudice.

Further it is asked about the reason for the diverse exposition of Augustine and Hilary. And it must be said, that Hilary in this term, image, considers two things, namely that which is implied directly, and that which is implied indirectly: and therefore he says in it can be taken the unity of essence, and the plurality of persons: and therefore he says, The image alone is not, that is, it is not of one, because it supposes many imitating themselves in one: and similarly he considers in this term, likeness, besides this alone that the image is in essence, likeness however in those things which according to the mode of signifying in the name imply quality. Augustine however considers in these terms only that which is implied directly.

Similarly these two terms: Let us make, and our, they consider diversely. For Hilary considers a double mode of signifying in them, namely, the connotation of the plural number, and in this he takes the plurality of persons: and again the mode of signifying by which they say consortium, one of them to one act in number, and the other to one form in number: for when it is said, let us make, one act in number of the word is understood to proceed from diverse supposed persons: and this cannot be unless they are one in the acting essence. Similarly when it is said, our, it is noted that of many there is one number of the reason of the image and nature: and this is what he says, that the profession of consortium by our, and let us make, removed the understanding of the singular: and thus he posits many persons. But when it is said: Neither does anyone say, let us make, this is because thus not unless by one which is nature they are referred to one act in number which is implied by let us make, and by one which is image and nature they are said to have consortium which is implied by our. Augustine however does not take in these terms except the signified plainly. But Hilary calls diversity the division of nature which is in matter by substantial forms: like man from man, and lion from man.

He calls singularity individuation: by accidents, which are not compelled in divine things: he calls solitude negation by place.

Do numerical terms in the divine place something?

Then it is asked about what the Master says in the same chapter, where he summarizes the sayings of Hilary, and says:

(which he signified by the name of consort, or plurality, not placing something, but removing it, elo.

1. And from this it seems to be taken, that according to the Master, numerical terms in the divine place nothing, but rather deny and remove something, as when it is said one person, nothing is placed around the person, but it is removed thus, that is, not two, not three: and when two persons are said, that is, not one only, or three: and when three are said, it is understood not one, or two only, or more than three.
2. And this also seems through Isidore, who says, that number is said from nod: but nod is of sense: therefore it seems there is no number except in sensibles.
3. Likewise, Boethius: Diverse in number are those in which diversity is found in numbering: but in divine persons there is no diversity: therefore neither number. But that there is no diversity in the divine, is clear in the same authority of Hilary.
4. Likewise the Philosopher: In those in which there is no matter, there is no number, except according to cause and caused: but in the divine there is no matter: therefore if there is number in them, it is according to cause and caused, which again does not fit: because it is not conceded that one person is the cause of another.
5. Likewise, Damascene says, that difference is the cause of number: but every difference is either according to matter, or according to form: according to matter it is not in the divine: therefore if it is, it is according to form. Either therefore according to the form of genus, or species; and it is clear, that in neither way: therefore it seems, that in the divine the ratio of numerical terms is not preserved.
6. Likewise, the Philosopher says, that the infinite in number is caused by the infinite in the continuous: because as much as is divided in the continuous, so much is added in number: for we know number by the division of the continuous: therefore it seems, that number is not properly except in naturals.
7. Furthermore, Number is a species of discrete quantity: therefore numerical terms place something around their subject. But in the divine there is all manner of simplicity: therefore they place nothing in them, as the Master says.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 4. The Philosopher says, that the ratio of man and of one man is the same: therefore it seems that one adds nothing above that which is one, except the indivision of the undivided form in itself, and distinguishing from others: and thus it seems to fit and place in the divine.

1. Likewise, Boethius says in the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ, that one and being are convertible.
2. Likewise, Each thing is one from its form. Therefore, since the property of the person makes it undivided in itself, and divided from others, and thus is as it were a form, it seems that one places in persons the property.

Solution. It must be said, that the unity of essence is the essence itself: but by another reason it is essence, and another one. For essence is that whose act is to be. For Anselm says, that essence, being, and being differ: as light, to shine, and shining. But one is inasmuch as existing one in itself it is distinguished from others by its (so to speak) natural properties, which are the essence itself. And the unity of persons is the property which is the person, and the unity of notion is notion, although it is signified otherwise in the numerical term. And similarly I say of two, and three, according to which they say the iteration of the unity of person, or notions. Therefore the Master intends, that above that which the thing is, one adds nothing except indivision: and therefore he says to place nothing. But if it is attended to by which the person is one, or two, or three, then it places the property under another mode of signifying.

To the other it must be said, that number is not preserved in the divine as it is said nod of sense, but as it is said nod of intellect in whatever way distinguishing: and therefore even if this is admitted, that in the divine there is the number of persons, it is not admitted that in the divine there is simply number: because simply number is of diverse things in essence and being, which is not in the divine.

To another it must be said, that there is not in the divine diversity in number, but rather distinction; and that which Boethius says, is understood in those in which there is simply number. And I do not say this that the number of persons is number absolutely speaking.

To another it must be said, that in the divine there is not cause and caused, but principle and principled, and this suffices for the number of persons: yet that which that Philosopher says, is not altogether sufficient: because in the Angel there is much number, as Dionysius wills, even beyond this that one is the cause of another.

To another it must be said, that if difference is taken largely, then it comprehends the distinction of personal properties, and that in the divine will cause such a number as is there.

To another it must be said, that the infinite is a passion of matter: and therefore it is not necessary if the infinite in number is not caused by the division of the continuous, that on account of this number is simply caused by that. because number is found in non-materials, Or it may be said (as some have said) that number and multitude are opposed to unity: whence in as many ways as one is said, in so many ways by opposition number and multitude are made. But one is said by continuity, and one by form, and one by equality of nature and one by respect to one. In continuity, as a line is one, and a body one: by form however as a man is one, or Socrates is one. By equality of nature, as that whose attributes of natural essence are the same. By respect to one, as univocals are one by respect of one ratio to that in which they are univocal. By opposition however by privation of one number and multitude is made. For by privation of the continuous number is made by division. Similarly by division of form by matter, as in the number of individuals, or by forms or differences, as in the number of species number is made. Similarly in equality of nature according to attributes degrees, and orders in nature, and multitude are made, as the number of Angels is made. Similarly also multitude of ratios simply, and by prior and posterior makes number in equivocals, and analogicals: of another number the Philosopher speaks of numbered.

To another it must be said, that one is taken in two ways, namely, as it is converted with being: and thus it is not the principle of discrete quantity which is number and multitude: and number thus resulting is not in the species of discrete quantity, but places the form by which a thing is one or many. and thus in some way it is taken in the divine. Otherwise it is the principle of discrete quantity, and thus it is being in part, and places an accident signified around its subject: and similarly number arising from it, and thus it does not fit in the divine.

Articulus 20 — Why In Other Beings The Number Of Nature Follows The Number Of Hypostases, And Does Not Follow In The Divine

It is asked, Why in other beings does the number of hypostases follow the number of natures, and not in divine things?

But further it is asked, Why does this happen that in other beings the number of hypostases follows the number of natures, and this does not follow in divine things? For it does not follow that the Father is one God, and the Son is one God, and the Holy Spirit is one God: therefore they are three gods. For this seems to be against the common conception of the mind which is known to the intellect by itself, namely, that the number of multiple hypostases cannot be one nature in number.

Solution. It must be said that this happens because of the identity of nature and hypostasis in divine things. For hypostasis, or substance, or that which is, is found in four ways in beings. In some, hypostasis and nature, or that which is from which it is, differ: yet in such a way that nature or that by which it is, is communicable to many, and is actually communicated through the division of that which is, or hypostasis, by the act of generation: as it happens in all generable and corruptible things: like man, donkey, and other such things. However, in some, that by which it is, or nature, is communicable: and it differs from that which is, or from the suppositum, or hypostasis: but it is not communicated, because it has all its matter within itself, in which it is possible for it to be, and nothing of it is outside itself, neither by potentiality nor by act: as in the sun, and moon, and other stars: in which also the form, or that by which it is, although it is communicable, and differs from that which is, or from the suppositum, or hypostasis, and the hypostasis itself is quantifiable: yet it is never divided by act, because it has all that matter within itself in which it is possible for its form to be: and therefore the species in them is preserved in one: because this is a principle in general nature, that of all those whose matter is not entirely terminated within the form, there is an act of generation by which the form is multiplied in several numbers in different supposita. Likewise, in some, nature indeed or that by which it is, differs from the suppositum itself, or hypostasis, or that which is: yet it is simple, that which is indivisible not being from any matter: because, as Boethius says, there is no matter of spiritual things: and therefore in such things the species is also preserved in one suppositum, and is not communicated: rather it contracts individuality from the properties of the suppositum according to personal attributes accepted: and thus it is in Angels. But in divine things, that by which it is and nature is entirely indifferent from the suppositum: and therefore, with the suppositum being numbered, the nature is not divided: but it remains indifferent in all supposita of the same nature: and therefore it does not hold, the Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God: therefore three gods: because the numerical term places its thing only around the suppositum, and not around the nature, or that by which it is.

Articulus 21 — Whether All Things Were Made In One Principle, Or In Diverse Principles, As The Manichees Say

Whether all things were made in one principle, or in diverse, as the Manicheans say?

Whether all things were made in one principle,
or in diverse, as the Manicheans say?

Then it must be passed to that chapter, in which he principally intends to prove the distinction of persons, and consequently the unity of essence: and because he had made a digression by explaining the words of Hilary, therefore he says: Now indeed to the proposed, etc.

However, a doubt arises concerning what he says: In the beginning God created heaven and earth. For it seems to the Manicheans that he did not make heaven and earth in one principle: but in one heaven, that is, the region of light, and spirits: and in another earth, that is, the region of darkness, and the struggle of flesh against spirit: which they strive to prove thus:

1. Nothing the same in the same way makes diverse things: therefore much less contraries: but God is most the same in the same way: therefore he does not make contraries: but incorruptible and corruptible things are contraries: therefore they are not from the same principle.
2. Likewise, it is not of the most wise artificer to make something repugnant to his work: but since the soul created in the image of God is the incorruptible work of God, therefore God did not make something repugnant to it: but flesh is repugnant to it, and weighs it down: therefore the creator of the soul is not the fashioner of the body. Wisdom 9:15: For the corruptible body weighs down the soul, and the earthly habitation depresses the mind that thinks many things. And the Apostle, to the Galatians 5:17: The flesh lusts against the spirit, etc.
3. Furthermore, evil is made in the world: but everything that is made, is made by something: therefore evil is made by something. Let it be granted that it is free will, as the Catholics say: either therefore it is made by free will alone, or by free will insofar as God operates in it and moves it, just as the first cause is in the second and moves it. If in the first way: therefore free will is the first principle of evil, and consequently there are two principles: one of good which is God, the other of evil which is free will. If in the second way: therefore the good God is the author of evil: not...

...therefore, there must be a punisher of it: because no just person is the punisher of that thing of which he himself is the author.

§ 4. Similarly, Augustine says that God does not make anything by which His work would become worse: but by evil a man is made worse: therefore the good God does not make it neither in Himself, nor in another: therefore it must be that it is from another principle which is the God of darkness: because evil, as Damascene says, is intelligible darkness. If perhaps it is said, that evil is nothing: and therefore it does not need to have an existing principle. Against this: God does not punish for nothing with eternal punishments: but evil is punished with eternal punishment: therefore evil is not nothing, but something, and thus the first returns: or if force is applied in evil, the same reasoning will seem to proceed concerning sin which was made concerning evil.

To solve this it must be said, that there is only one principle, because there cannot be a principle of evil: because that would either be the highest evil, such that it could not be worse: or it would have something of good. If in the first way, then it would be non-being, as was held above: because being is one of the best things which all desire. If in the second way, then it would already be composite, and not a principle, and something would be in it of things caused by a good principle, which cannot be: and therefore an efficient principle of evil, which by its own substance is the cause of evil, cannot exist.

To the first it must be said, that this is understood concerning causes causing through motion, just as heaven, and star, and the other physical bodies: because in one way motion is not effected except by one form whatever that is: but by diverse motion in approaching and receding to the stars and diverse motions in the oblique circle in which the circles of the planets intersect each other, in which in some way are all the stars, diverse conjunctions happen, and respects and preventions, and ascents, and descents: and therefore then diverse things are caused. But God does not operate through this mode: for He remaining stable gives all things to be moved. And therefore existing in one way through diverse ideal ratios existing in His operative wisdom, He can cause diverse things, and even contraries in those contraries of which each is being: just as are contrary forms, as white, and black: but corruptible and incorruptible, and just and unjust, good and evil are not thus contrary: because one is from form, the other from a privation which is in matter, which is nothing but a defect, as Anselm and Augustine say: and therefore it does not have an acting cause: but rather the cause acting the habit which is opposed to such privation, if it fails from any of the principles of the habit, then in its action privation will fall in beside the intention of the agent, and beside this that it acts something toward it, but rather from this that it did not have in the work of the habit a sufficiency of principles which were required for the habit: just as it is to be seen in blindness in the pupil: for this is not from the intention of the formative power of the eye that there is no light in the eye, but rather because the matter or some disposition of matter fails which was required for sight, when the formative power formed the eye. And thus the corruptible is caused: because the receptive virtue of incorruption on the part of the matter in which the form is induced fails, because it is not removable from the fighting contrariety.

To the other it must be said, that the fight of flesh against spirit is considered in three ways, namely, in the cause which is the original tinder of sin, and the appetite of the contrary: and this cause sin induced, and not God. If however it is considered as a punishment, then it is from God justly inflicting it for sin, and thus it is entirely good, because it is just: and everything that is just, is good, as Augustine says. Thirdly, it is considered in the cause of the dissolution of the body, and thus it is made from fighting principles in the body, which induces corruption from the defect of matter, and thus from the privation which is in matter it falls in beside the intention of the agent and of nature. And this is what Dionysius says, that nothing of existing things is corrupted according as it is existing: but around the existing thing the modes, commensurations, and harmonies are corrupted from the weakness of their own habit.

To that which is objected concerning evil, it must be said that evil does not have a cause whence it is, but it has a cause whence it falls in beside the intention of the cause, and beside this that it acts toward it: because toward that which is nothing, it cannot act. For free choice is an active potency, and according as it is conjoined to those things which inform acts, thus its acts are made: and if it is conjoined in deliberating with a conversion to the good of nature, its act becomes inductive of that good, and has this good for an end: if however it is conjoined with the good of political virtue, its act will be informed by that good: and if its act is conjoined with the good of grace, it will again be having that good for form and end: if however it is not conjoined to any of these, but rather is deflected from all these, then sin will fall in from the weakness and privation of those things which were required for a right work.

If however it is asked, what is the cause of that deflection? It must be said with Augustine, that it is a conversion to a mutable good, not according as it is good, nor according as it is mutable, but according as it is posited as the ultimate end of the appetite of free choice: for thus it abstracts from that which is truly the end: and therefore also this conversion does not cause evil according as it is being, that is, according as the conversion is to a mutable good, but rather according as it is abstracting from the end of immutable good, and this is a privation: and therefore evil does not have a principle except a deficient one. And of this more will be said in the second book.

But to this which is objected, that according to this evil is nothing, and God punishing sin or evil, punishes for nothing. It must be said, that although it is no essence, nevertheless it posits some essence: for privation which is no essence, nevertheless supposes a deformed matter in the lack of a due habit. Thus evil and sin although in that they are of this kind, they are no essence, nevertheless they suppose an act deformed by the privation of habit and due end: and therefore for that, since it is in our power, the sinner is deservedly punished.

Articulus 22 — Whether This Name, "God," Has A Plural

Whether this name, God, has a plural?

Then it is objected concerning this that is said: You shall be like gods, knowing good, etc. For it seems, that the name, God, does not have a plural.

§ 1. For God speaks of an immutable form: but an immutable form does not have plurality: therefore said in the plural it does not have signification.

§ 2. Also, God names the first principle: but first principles cannot be plural: therefore, etc.

§ 3. Also, Anselm: God is greater than anything that can be thought: but such things cannot be plural: therefore the intellect of this name, God, is repugnant to plurality.

§ 4. Also, when "Socrates" is said, the form of Socrates is signified in the name with individuating principles, which it is impossible to be found numerically the same in another, and therefore it lacks a plural: therefore similarly, since by the intellect of this name, God, those things are closed in which it is impossible to belong to another, it seems this name, God, does not have in the plural: but these are omnipotence, universal providence of the world: as Augustine says in the book on the City of God, that the Philosophers defined God, that He is a soul governing the world by motion and reason.

BUT AGAINST § 1. Genesis 3:5: You shall be like gods. And, Exodus 20:3: You shall not have strange gods before me. And, Psalm 49:1: The God of gods, the Lord has spoken. And, Deuteronomy 32:37: Where are their gods, in whom they had trust? And, 1 Corinthians 8:5: For although there be that are called gods, either in heaven or on earth (for there be gods many, and lords many).

§ 2. And if it is said as some respond, that the Saints sometimes wish rather to speak ungrammatically so that they may bring forth more significantly, than grammatically and bring forth less significantly: what will be said of the Philosophers who said and worshipped many gods: as Plato says: Gods of gods of whom I am the maker and father, etc.: therefore it seems, that it has in the plural.

§ 3. Moreover, it was held above, that it is imposed from an act communicable in some way: therefore it seems, that it has in the plural, or that it can have.

§ 4. Moreover, a certain Philosopher says, that a universal is spoken of in four ways, namely, because it actually agrees to many as man: or, because although not in act, nevertheless in potency, as a heptagonal house although there be none, nevertheless there can be many. Also, that neither in act nor in potency: but by the reason of the form it is communicable, as sun, moon, earth. Also, that it is communicable by opinion, as a chimera. Therefore it seems, that since this name, God, is communicable by opinion, that it can have a plural.

§ 5. Also, the Master expounds, dii, that is, divine persons. Since therefore divine, which is imposed from the same form in Latin, receives a plural, it seems also in Latin dii is said in the plural.

SOLUTION. It must be said, that the sentence of all the Masters is, that according to the property of Grammar this name, God, does not have a plural, as the first induced reasons prove: because although it is imposed from some communicable act, nevertheless it is not communicable except relatively, as providence, and circuiting, as was determined above: and therefore neither as to this why the name is imposed is it communicable, nor even as to this from which it is imposed can it have a plural.

TO THE AUTHORITIES therefore of those it must be responded, as the Masters say, that on account of greater significance they spoke improperly: because for a name to have in the plural simply, it does not suffice that it have a plurality of supposits, but also it is necessary that the essence and form imported by the name be divided and multiplied in them: just as Socrates, and Plato, and Cicero are three supposits of man, and three men, and three animals, and three substances: whence since the form imported by the term God, or quasi form or nature is not multiplied in its supposits, it cannot properly speaking have in the plural.

TO THAT which is objected concerning the Philosophers, it must be said that God according to opinion, is a god who has one particular just as Aesculapius or Neptune, and the like: and thus the terms are not taken in their proper signification, and therefore thus they themselves spoke plurally: nevertheless the same men when they properly considered divinity, said that there is only one God, whom they can scarcely touch with a pure mind.

To the next following the solution is clear through the things said before.

To the other it must be said, that in no way is this name, God, a universal: because opinion is called there by the Philosopher that which is concerning a being that is in opinion only, and to whose form in opinion plurality is not repugnant: but God is according to reality, to whose nature plurality is repugnant, as was held.

To the other it must be said, that "divine" is derivative not on account of the signified, but on account of the mode of signifying: because it is a possessive name, and if it itself has a plural, it is not necessary on account of this that its primitive has a plural: just as Socratic has in the plural, but not Socrates: and this happens on account of a diverse mode of signifying.

Articulus 23 — Whether David Is The Greatest Of The Prophets

Whether David is the greatest of the Prophets? Whether David is the greatest of the Prophets?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says: He also the greatest of the Prophets and kings, etc.

For Moses seems to have been greater, to whom the Lord spoke mouth to mouth, and Elias who made fire descend from heaven, and Eliseus who raised the dead.

Solution. David is called the greatest from the mode of inspiration, and the promise of the seed to be born from him. Of the first you have: I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me. But to others He spoke through visions, and Angels, and enigmas. Of the second you have: Of the fruit of thy womb I will set upon thy throne. But Moses was greatest in the mode of apparitions, and Elias greatest in zeal, and Eliseus greatest in the working of miracles.

Articulus 24 — Whether Possession, Conception, Parturition, Etc., Are Fittingly Attributed To Divine Wisdom, Which The Wise Man Attributes To It

Whether to divine wisdom are fittingly attributed possession, conception, parturition, etc., which the wise one attributes to himself?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says: Holy, holy, holy, etc.

For upon this is to be taken the definition of holiness posited in the book on the Divine Names, where he says thus: Holiness is that according to us it is said to be free from all uncleanness, and perfect, and entirely immaculate cleanness or purity. Then let the exposition of the induced authority of Proverbs be taken: The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his ways, etc.

§ 1. For it seems not to be fitting: because possession is of extrinsic things, and this does not fit wisdom.

§ 2. Moreover, how could it fit him to be ordained from eternity: for order posits prior and posterior in dignity, or cause, or place, or time: and none of these fits the Son in comparison to the Father.

§ 3. Moreover, to what is his conception referred, and parturition? For these are properties of carnal generation, which do not fit in divine generation.

§ 4. Moreover, what does he call the hinges of the earth?

§ 5. Also, what is it to weigh the foundations of the earth?

§ 6. Moreover, what is it for wisdom to delight playing before the Father every single day?

Response to the first, that possession is transferred to the Son according as He is the art of the Father full of the ratios of all living things: for possession is had towards one born. In this therefore he notes the distinction of God from other artificers, who not having art to hand must meditate upon the parts of matter, and think upon instruments: which divine wisdom does not require.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that the term ordained says two things, namely the order of nature which is in divine things, by which one is from the other, not by which one is prior to the other: and it posits also the causality of wisdom as art to the artifact in time, just as an eternal cause is ordained to a caused thing in time: and thus the objection ceases.

But conception of wisdom says the enclosing of the Son in the same substance with the Father. But parturition says the mode of going out from the eternal ratios into created things which go out from that art.

But hinges are those in which the conservation of the world revolves: so that the action of the primary qualities is reduced to diverse motion in heaven, and diverse motion is reduced to the one motion of the first movable thing, and that motion is further reduced to the first moving thing, which in itself remaining stable gives all things to be moved. For in these principles as in certain hinges the whole world revolves, as much in the local motion of the supercelestial things, as in the motion of generation and alteration and augmentation and diminution of the generable and corruptible things.

To the other it must be said, that to weigh is to balance by nature to the center of the first movable thing. But to found is for the species of earth to be generated and conserved by nature in the middle place, and to be moved to it by nature.

But to delight before the Father is to rest from all work in Himself. But to play is to produce the reasons of wondrous wisdom in the illustration of any creature: because it is day, when through the light of wisdom a known thing is produced: because although certain things in nature are mixed with the darkness of privation, nevertheless in wisdom itself they are in the reason of full light and day.

Articulus 25 — How Is This Understood Which Is Said, "You, Bethlehem"

How is this understood which is said, Thou, Bethlehem?

Then it is asked concerning the exposition of the authority of Micheas: Thou, Bethlehem, etc.

It must be said, that the sense is: You are indeed very small in space and number of inhabitants among the thousands of Juda, that is, in Juda in which there are so many thousands of inhabitants or villages: nevertheless you are a great village in dignity: because out of thee, etc.

And his going forth, through eternal generation.

From the beginning of eternity, or from the Father.

From the days. It is said plurally, not that eternity has a part, as will be proved below: but it is said in comparison to temporal things, so that the sense is: From the days, that is, from eternity, with respect to which in a temporal thing many days are taken.

Also note, that the authorities induced in this chapter, hint at the Trinity in nine ways. First, from the consignified of plural number, as, Elohim or dii. Second, from the proper names of the persons, as, By the Word of the Lord, etc.: in which the Word, and the Spirit are named. Third, from the order of the words, as that, May God, our God bless us, where God is immediately conjoined twice: because the Son God is from the Father God alone. And afterwards it is subjoined a third time, God, so that the Holy Spirit is noted to be God from both. Fourth, from the number of terms, or dictions posited to praise God. Thus it says: Holy, holy, holy. For there could not be another reason why he would say it three times, and not more times, than the Trinity of persons. Fifth, from a personal act, as, The Lord said to me: Thou art my Son, etc. For to generate says a proper act, by which a person is a person. Sixth, from a personal property, when it is said, Who shall declare his generation? For passive generation is a personal property of the Son. Seventh, through appropriata, as that, The Lord possessed me, etc., where the appropriata of the Son are posited. Eighth, from the order of eternal generation to the creation of the creature in time, as in that, I came out of the mouth of the Most High, etc. Ninth and last, from the order of eternal generation to the temporal generation of the same Son, as in that, Thou, Bethlehem, etc.

How do the four authorities concerning the Holy Spirit differ?

Then note concerning that chapter: Concerning the Holy Spirit, etc., that it has four authorities concerning the Holy Spirit, of which the first is concerning the Spirit causing all things. The second, concerning the Spirit containing and governing all things. The third, concerning the Spirit ordaining in the goods of grace which He distributes. The fourth and last is concerning the Spirit perfecting by His operation the mystery of the incarnation of the Son. And this is full to consider in the authorities themselves.

Articulus 27 — When It Is Said, "In The Name Of The Father, And Of The Son, And Of The Holy Spirit," What Does "In The Name" There Mean, Essence Or Person

When it is said, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, what does it say there, In the name, whether essence, or person?

Now indeed after the testimonies, etc. It is objected concerning this which he says: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. For either by in the name he says essence, or person: if essence, then it seems false, because the essence is not the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit: but if it says person, then it ought to say, in the names, just as the three names of the persons follow.

And to this it must be said that it says essence: and name is taken here according to that from which a name is called: for every single name is called from the noting which it makes concerning the thing whose name it is: and because the power of the essence makes the persons noted in the sanctification of baptism and in the works of miracles: therefore it itself is the name, that is, the noting of the persons. Whence it is equivalent to this much: In the name, etc., as much as, in the virtuous essence whose power notifies the Trinity of persons.

Articulus 28 — Whether These Pronouns Mark Some Distinction When It Is Said, "From Him, And Through Him, And In Him"

Whether these pronouns note any distinction when it is said, Of him, and by him, and in him?

Then it is objected concerning this which he says: For of him, and by him, and in him are all things, etc.

For the prepositions indeed seem to note diversity, because they are transitive. But because there is one pronoun which is taken with them, it seems that they pertain to the same, and thus they seem to note nothing but the identity of the essence: and thus it does not avail for confirming the proposition of the Master.

Solution. To this it must be said, that as the objection proves, the prepositions are transitive, and from the fact that they are prepositions they have to note the distinction of the persons: insofar however as they are considered as these prepositions, they pertain to the persons distinctly: for the preposition ex notes the cause of origin, and therefore it is noted to be attributed to the Father who is a principle not from a principle: also the term ex notes the essential cause which is matter which remains one in the materiate thing, and thus it is transferred to signifying the identity of essence in the Father who is origin, and the Son who is from Him. But per notes as it were a mediate cause, and signifies the Son who is from the Father, and by Him the Father operates. But in notes containment, and is attributed to the Holy Spirit, by whose goodness all things are contained.

DISTINCTIO III

Divisio Textus

For the Apostle says, that the invisible things of God, etc. In this third distinction the Master touches that part of coming into the knowledge of the Trinity and unity, which is through reasons and similitudes. But there are two into which we are led, and two by which we are led: into which we are led are unity, and Trinity: by which we are led, reason, and similitude. And therefore it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he touches the mode of coming into the knowledge of unity by the leading of reason. In the second he touches the mode of coming into some knowledge of the Trinity by the leading of similitude, there, E, Now it remains to show, etc.

The first of these parts is divided into four according to the four reasons which the Master adduces to prove that God is, and is one: which reasons many have varied in many ways, as can plainly be extracted from the Letter. In the first the Master proves through effect that God is by the mode of a first cause. In the second through dispositions found in effects he proves that God is incorporeal, and immutable, and this begins there, C, Also in another way the truth, etc. In the third again through a disposition found in effects he proves that God is the highest good, there, D, They considered also, etc. In the fourth and last he proves that God is the species of all created species, and this through the consideration of species found in effects, there, E, They understood also the species of a body, etc. In the first reason there are three. For first the authority of the Apostle is induced which proves this way, namely, that through the caused thing to come into the knowledge of the cause is possible. Second, he shows by what man is helped in this way, namely, by two things: by rational nature, and exterior creature, there, Man therefore the invisible things of God, etc. Third, he posits the process of ratiocination, there, B, For as Ambrose says.

Whether the Philosophers knew that God is one?

But here a doubt falls in before we arrive at the Letter, Whether the Philosophers could know unity, or that God is, by the leading of reason? Second, if they knew, what is it that they knew, or what did they not? Third, how is this knowledge of theirs distinguished from the knowledge of faith?

Concerning the first it is proceeded thus: § 1. The Apostle says concerning the Philosophers: Because, when they knew God, they did not glorify him as God,... but became vain in their thoughts: therefore it seems, that they knew both that God is, and His glory.[51]

§ 2. Also, in the same place: God has revealed it to them: therefore it seems, that they had the knowledge of one God.[52]

§ 3. Also, Augustine in book VIII of the City of God: The Platonists consent to us concerning one God the author of the universe, who is not only incorporeal above all bodies, but also incorruptible above all souls, our principle, our light, our good. In this we prefer them to the rest. Therefore it seems, that the Platonists knew the true God.

§ 4. Also, in the same place: And thus this is the cause why we prefer them to the rest: because while other Philosophers wore out their natural talents and their studies in inquiring into the causes of things, and what is the mode of speaking, and of living: these, with God known, found where the cause of the constituted universe would be, and the light of perceiving truth, and the fountain of drinking felicity: therefore it seems, that such men knew God.

§ 5. Also: By the greatness of the beauty, and of the creature, the Creator of them may be seen, so as to be known thereby.[53]

§ 6. Also, we see this in their books. For Plato in the Timaeus induces the maker of the world making the world, and committing it to the motors of the supercelestial spheres to be explicated through propagation.

§ 7. Also, Apuleius in the book on the God of Socrates, whom Augustine induces in the book on the City of God posits one Creator of all others. Whence Augustine in book IX of the City of God: Apuleius asserts that the highest God Creator of all whom we call true, is so preached by Plato, that He alone is the one who cannot be comprehended by any reason or even slightly because of the poverty of human speech: but scarcely by wise men when they have removed themselves by the vigor of mind as much as was permitted from the body, an understanding of this God, and that also sometimes as if in the deepest darkness, a bright light inter-shines with a most rapid flashing: therefore they had knowledge of Him.

§ 8. Also, we read in the books of Aristotle, that he proves the principle of the universe is one, whose science and will and action is His substance: therefore it seems, that they not only knew that God is one, but also that He Himself is simple, because He is whatever He has.

BUT AGAINST: § 1. That God is one is an article of faith: therefore it does not fall under reason: therefore through Philosophy and reason it cannot be investigated: and the Philosophers knew nothing, except what can be investigated through reason: therefore they did not know that God is one. If perhaps it is said, that God is one is not an article. Against this: I believe in one God: there in the symbol it is posited for an article.

§ 2. Also, the Philosopher does not investigate Him in Philosophy, except through creatures, as a cause through an effect: but in Philosophy every cause is proportioned to the effect: therefore they did not investigate God, except as a cause proportioned to the effect: but such a cause is not God: therefore through an effect in this mode they do not know God, nor can they know.

§ 3. Also, in the investigation of a name through the resolution of the caused into the cause, or of the posterior into the prior, and of the composite into the simple, reason stands in the intellect of being and one: but whatever it is in which resolution stands, from the same composition begins: therefore being itself and one in which resolution stood, is composable in those things which are resolved into it. But God and divine being are not composable: therefore the intellect resolving thus, will not come into divine being, or into the true by which God is called one: therefore through this it cannot accept that God is, or that God is one.

§ 4. Also, if there is something which being posited another is not of necessity posited, that cannot be accepted with the other being posited: as it seems if with some intellect of an Angel posited the creation of some thing or a created thing is not of necessity posited, then through the created thing it cannot be investigated concerning the intellect of the Angel: therefore by a similarity since with God posited a creature is not of necessity posited, because otherwise the creature would be from eternity, it seems that from the creature the Creator cannot be inferred: and thus through the creature the Creator cannot be known.

Solution. It must be said, that in truth (as the Saints say) the Philosophers could have knowledge of God through natural reasons.

But to this which is objected first, it must be said that that God is, and is one, in one mode are articles, and in another mode known through reasons, just as conclusions. For it can be accepted that God is through science, because He is only, and similarly that God is one: and thus they can be known things, as a conclusion through natural reason. It can also be accepted according as they in some way approach the science of what it is, on account of this that they apprehend the properties of divine being and of unity according as faith determines the attributes to be of God and of the unity of God: and thus it does not fall under reason, but rather is an article of faith.

To the other it must be said, that in Philosophy the physical cause is proportioned to the caused thing, and the motor to the movable thing: but because the proportioned thing in the virtue of causing cannot be the first thing which has influence to all things, therefore reason extends itself to proving that it is, although it may not prove except because it is only, and cannot determine its properties. Whence the Philosopher in the first book of On the Heavens and the Earth says: We have applied ourselves to magnify the glorious God creator of all things, eminent in the properties of those things which are created. Whence it is clear, that he knew that He is eminent above created things; but the reason of the eminence, and the difference, and the property of His being no one can investigate through reason. Whence also concerning such attributes the Philosophers are found to have said many errors: but concerning that God is, or because He is, and that He is one, few Philosophers who were truly Philosophers, erred.

To the other it must be said, that the resolving intellect stands in the being which is ultimate in resolution, and first in composition: but because it itself is miscible to composition, therefore it itself cannot be first. This reason knows from this that it apprehends the habitudes of being to things posterior to being. And just as it is of being, similarly it is of one. And thus it is clear, that reason proceeds further; but it is true, that not

52. Rom. 1:19.

He proceeds further by inquiring into the passions and differences, because he cannot investigate those through effect. And therefore being indeed is the first subject of Philosophy, because the subject of Philosophy is that of which the passions and differences are predicated. However, it is not simply the first, because that is not subjectible to passions, and also its passions and properties are unknown, unless they are received through faith illuminating the intellect.

To the last, it must be said that the first is false. And although with God posited, the creature is not necessarily posited, yet with the creature posited as the effect of God, it is necessary that God the creator be posited: and thus a posteriori from the creature, God can be known.

Articulus 2 — What It Is That They Have Known About God

What did the Philosophers know about God, whether only that He is?

Secondly, it is asked what is it that they knew about God? And it seems according to what was previously held, that they knew only that He is, and that He is one.

1. This also seems for another reason: because a cause infinitely distant from the caused can only be known as existing, and even that is held through the caused: but God is infinitely distant from any caused thing: therefore He is known only as existing.
2. Likewise, some object that there is no knowledge except through the abstraction of the species from the known: but from the most simple there is no abstraction: therefore of the most simple there is no knowledge: but God is most simple: therefore He is not known.
3. Furthermore, with God posited, the creature is not necessarily posited: therefore it seems that the creature manifests nothing about the Creator.
4. Furthermore, the caused does not necessarily posit the cause as existing: because with the house posited, the artisan is not necessarily posited: therefore it seems that through the creature the Creator is not necessarily apprehended.
5. Furthermore, there are many things in the creature which were even a cause of error for some, so that they posited two gods, such as the corruptible and the incorruptible: therefore it seems that the creature deceives reason as much as it aids it.

But on the contrary: In the books of the Gentiles we read that they not only prove that God is, but that He is the first, that He is a necessary being which does not fall into a category, a simple being whose substance is intellect and will and His action: therefore it seems that they knew not only that He is, but also His properties or attributes, and what He is.

Solution. It must be said that they knew only that He is and what He is not, not what He is, as was previously held. For although they knew certain attributes of Him, they did not have certain knowledge of them: just as we find some knowing His wisdom, and with this saying that He does not have knowledge of particulars: and so it is also with others. And thus to know the attributes of God in such a way does not make knowledge of what He is, especially since the defined terms of those attributes are not known by any created intellect. And through this the solution to the last is clear.

But because the prior reasons seem to prove that there is no knowledge of God, therefore it must be responded to the first, that a cause in one way is infinitely distant, and in another way is not: if the proportion of properties between the first cause which is God and its caused is considered, there is no proportion: and therefore from that side nothing of the cause is known. But if the relation in which the caused stands to the cause according to which it proceeds from it by idea, and is contained lest it fall into nothing by perishing, and is governed so that it seeks the good, is considered, thus the cause shines forth in the caused, and is in it essentially, presently, and potentially: and thus it can be known in the caused.

To the other it must be said that that objection is vain: because that abstraction of the intellect is not the abstraction of form from matter, but rather of the species from that of which it is the species. And the most simple, just as the species itself, do not oppose this abstraction: because it does not require composition, but rather the acceptance of the intention of the thing only. In all things, however, the thing is one thing, and the intention of it in the soul is another.

Furthermore, it is not true that there is no knowledge through the proper species of the thing: for we know the cause in the species of its effects, just as the mover in the species of motion: and thus natural knowledge of the Creator can be made through the species of the creature.

To the other it must be said that although it does not follow that the creature exists if God exists: yet conversely it follows that the Creator exists if the creature exists.

Nor is it similar concerning the woodworker and the house, and God: because the woodworker is separated from the house, and his work similarly, and it passes away. Hence it also follows: If the house is, the woodworker is, or was. But in God the work is not universally separated from the creature: because after it is created, it would still fall into nothing unless it were contained by Him: and its order in the universe would be corrupted unless it were governed by Him. Yet I do not say that it follows that God was: but it follows that He is because of the reason of eternity by which He is wholly simultaneous and perfect.

To the other it must be said that in the creature mutability and corruption are measured, and are not properly caused by anything, but occur from this that the creature is from nothing, as was noted above in the question concerning the two principles: and therefore as far as it is of itself, it does not induce error.

Articulus 3 — Whether This Natural Knowledge Differs From The Knowledge Of Faith

Does this natural cognition differ from the cognition of faith?

Thirdly, it is asked, In what does this cognition obtained through natural reasons differ from the cognition of faith? And it seems that in nothing.

1. Each is through the posterior: because to know the cause through the caused is cognition through the posterior. Similarly, to receive the first truth in the light of infused faith is through the posterior: because the first truth is more powerful and more knowable than that: and whatever is in the infused habit is from the first truth according to the thing: therefore.
2. Furthermore, a thing in itself is not known except under the mixture of privation consequent to the creature from the fact that it is from nothing: and therefore Augustine calls this cognition vespertine. Similarly, the cognition of faith is in a mirror and in an enigma: therefore it seems that these cognitions agree.
3. If perhaps someone says that faith knows what is, and natural reason only knows that it is. On the contrary: Faith does not comprehend determinately according to nature what God is: therefore neither does faith know except that it is: therefore in this they do not differ, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that these cognitions differ in at least five ways, etc.: in many other differences can be assigned. The first difference is in the comparison of science to the knower: because the natural process is subject to reason, but the process of faith is above reason. The second difference is in the principles in which the cognition itself is received: because those in natural cognition are principles known per se, such as those which are of the nature of the first principle, such as not being from another and others being from it, and not having begun because thus it would be caused, and not being moved by another, and the like; but in faith, there is an infused light which, by informing the conscience, convinces reason more by a certain love of the will than by the proof of reason: for this is the argument of things not appearing which illuminates to accept the credible. The third difference is in the efficient cause of cognition: because reason makes this by the objected creature's natural reason, as the Master says: but in faith, the first truth makes it: for if it is asked of someone, What made faith for him, he says that it is the first truth which is the efficient cause of his faith and its end. The fourth is in the known: because through natural cognition one does not approach as closely to the knowledge of what it is, as through the cognition of faith. The fifth and last difference is on the part of the subjects: because faith is in the affective intellect, even unformed, although some contradict: but the natural science of reason is in the speculative intellect. For although faith is unformed, yet it is more voluntary than rational, and it is allied with servile fear, as Gregory says: but those things which are in the speculative intellect (as the Philosopher says) say nothing about fleeing or imitating: therefore, etc.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Attributes In God Are One Or Many

Whether the attributes in God are one, or many?

Then it is inquired concerning those things which are contained in the Letter of the first chapter.

And it is objected first concerning this which it says:

The invisibles of God, etc.

For it seems not to be fitting: since attributes signify the essence, and thus are one, not many: whence they ought to be signified singularly, not plurally. Nor does the solution of the Master, which he places around the end of the fourth reasoning, seem fitting, that he says it plurally because they are signified in many ways: for according to this we could say, God is substance, and God is power, and God is wisdom: therefore God is many, or three, which is false.

Solution. It must be said that attributes have a twofold comparison, namely, to the substance of the cause in which they are, and to the effects which they connote. And in the first way, they are signified as one because of simplicity: whence I cannot infer, if God is goodness and wisdom, that He is two: because thus the comparison is made to the cause in which the attributes are. They have another comparison to the connoted things, and thus they are in a certain respect as many, although not simply many: because they are signified as the reasons of many. And therefore also the Apostle did not say many invisibles, but invisibles, consignifying the plural number, not signifying. For the plural consignified is less than the plural signified, that is, of lesser reason: for the term "many," or "two," or "three," and other numerical terms signify plurality: and therefore simply there are many around which those terms denote to place plurality: but the plurality consignified is plurality in a certain respect. And it is similar with a point in the center, which is one alone, according to which it is considered as the center by substance: yet it can be in the reason of many principles, according to which infinite lines are drawn from it to the circumference.

Whether by the creature of the world man ought to be understood?

Whether by the creature of the world man ought to be understood?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

By the creature of the world man is understood, etc.

1. For it seems that the Angel is more excellent than man: both on account of separation from the body, because the body which is corrupted burdens the soul, and earthly habitation depresses the sense thinking many things; and also because the Angel is the seal of the likeness of God, but man is only to the image. And Gregory says that the seal signifies a greater likeness than the image. If perhaps it is said that the rational soul is accidentally in the body, namely, that in it it may receive sciences and virtues. This is nothing: because an accident is not the substantial form of the composite: but the rational soul is the substantial form of man, of which the material part is the body. Moreover, this would be a marvelous accident on account of which it is embodied, since without the body it can receive sciences and virtues in a nobler way.

2. Likewise, the second reason also does not seem to apply solely to man: because it also applies to Angels, since the Angel is with simple and mixed things like minerals, and lives with trees, and has knowledge of sensibles with brutes, and understands with men: and thus both reasons seem to apply to him.

Solution. It must be said that man is considered in three ways, namely, in divine estimation, in his own nature, and in the end which is eternal beatitude. In divine estimation, he is the most worthy of creatures, because God so esteemed his nature that He assumed it: whence, Psalm 8:5: "What is man, that you are mindful of him?" And it follows, verse 6: "You have made him a little lower than the Angels, with glory and honor," etc. However, in his own nature, without prejudice, I say that he is inferior to the Angel, as the objection proves. But considered in the end, namely, in beatitude, he is equal to the Angel: because He has set the boundaries of the peoples according to the number of the Angels of God. For men are assumed to the dignities of the Angels. Whence, 1 Samuel 2:8: "He raises the needy from the dust, and lifts the poor from the dung, to sit with princes," etc.

To what is objected concerning the other reason, it must be said that the Angel does not have agreement with every creature in essentials: because with corporeal things he does not have agreement. But in man, simple things are preserved in humors, and mixed and complexed through the likeness of matter.

Articulus 6 — That A First Cause Is Granted

That a first cause is given.

Then it is asked how the reasoning is formed which he adduces, there, "For as Ambrose says," etc.

Solution. And it must be said that it proceeds thus: It is caused: this is evident to the senses: it has some cause: therefore that is either the first, or it has another: if it is the first, then I have the proposition: because we call that God, which is such a cause that it is not caused, and this is the first cause. However, if it has another cause, I again inquire whether it has a cause or not: however, it is evident that this does not proceed to infinity: therefore it is necessary to stop at something which is such a cause that it is not caused: but that which is not caused is uncreated: therefore that cause is not created, and this we call God.

Articulus 7 — That A Creature Cannot Create

That a creature cannot create.

Next, inquiry is made concerning the reason of what he says: But because no creature is able to do such a thing, etc.

And the reason for this is: because every creature is of finite power; therefore, it does not operate by an action of infinite power; but to bring forth something from nothing into something else is of infinite power; therefore, it will not operate by that operation, and thus nothing will be creatable: for nothing and something differ infinitely: for the Philosopher says that between four and two, and four and three, and four and one, there can be proportion: but between something and nothing there can be no proportion: and therefore, of all natural things (as the Philosopher says) the supposition was that from nothing, nothing comes to be according to nature.

Articulus 8 — That God Is Incorporeal And Immutable

That God is incorporeal and immutable.

In another way, the truth of God, etc. This is the second reasoning in which, by the guidance of reason through dispositions found in creatures, it is proven that God is incorporeal and immutable. And this reasoning is more physical than the preceding, and is founded upon two propositions which are not proven here, but are taken as self-evident.

The first proposition is that no body is God, and this is proven thus: No body moves unless moved; every moved mover is a secondary mover; therefore, a body that moves is a secondary mover, and not a primary one. The first proof is that every moving body is composed of a mover and a mobile, like the heavens and all moving things, as the Philosophers prove: since therefore God is the first unmoved mover (as Boethius says: "And remaining stable, gives all things to be moved"), God cannot be a body.

The second proposition is that God is not a mutable spirit, and this is proven thus: Every mutable spirit is changed per se, or per accidens; the first mover is not changed per se, nor per accidens; therefore, the first mover is not a mutable spirit. The middle proof: The first mover is in no way moved; therefore, neither per se, nor per accidens. For let it be granted that the first mover is changed per accidens, namely by the motion of another, as the soul by the motion of the body, it follows that the first is receptive of accidental change, and thus it will not be in the nature of the first, because the first is always in the same way altogether. From this reasoning, it is necessarily concluded further that God is not any power in a body, like a soul, or the intellect of the heavens, as some Philosophers have said: because if it were so, it would be changed per accidens, which cannot be.

That God is the highest good.

They also considered, etc. Here begins the third reasoning in which again through the properties found in the creature, it proves God to be the highest good, and consequently one: because the highest good cannot be except one, as was proven above. And the reasoning is founded upon two divisions, one of which is omitted, because it is evident by itself, namely, the division of being into substance and accident: for it is evident that substance is better than accident, because accident is only according to something; but nothing is so simply as God. The other division is that of substances, some are corporeal, others incorporeal which is an incorporeal spirit, and this is that which is not the act and perfection of any body: and it is evident that spiritual substance is better than corporeal: but since both are caused, the cause will be infinitely better than the spirit.

Articulus 10 — On Another Mode Of Knowing God

On another way of knowing God.

1. But with these reasons set forth, a doubt arises; because Dionysius teaches another way to come into the knowledge of God, saying thus: From the ordering of all existing things, as from the very proposition and having certain images and assimilations of the divine exemplars themselves, we ascend to that which is above all by way and order according to virtue in every offering, and excess, and in the cause of all! However, the Master does not teach to ascend except in the cause only.
2. Furthermore, it seems that by removal one does not ascend to God: because negation posits nothing; but positing nothing certifies nothing about anything: therefore, by negation nothing is certified and known about God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Against this, however, is what Dionysius says in the Celestial Hierarchy: "Negations in God are true, but affirmations are indeed incomplete."

1. And Augustine says that it is more truly known what He is not, than what He is. And the same says that he greatly advanced in divine knowledge: because although he could not apprehend what God is, yet he apprehended what He is not.

Further, it is asked about the other two ways, namely eminence and cause: because they seem to be one and the same: for when we proceed from the caused to the cause, we elevate the cause above the properties of the caused, as was said above.

Solution. It must be said that those three ways are taken according to those things in which the Creator shines forth: for either they are symbolically or figuratively fitting only, and in those is the proper way of negation or removal, as stone, lion, and the like: or according to the thing primarily in God, although according to the name they cannot be signified so perfectly, and thus they are to be expounded by eminence, as life, essence, intellect, and other such things, and these are called mystical, as Dionysius says: or as to both they agree, according to what they are from Him, and thus the way is from the caused to the cause.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Master does not touch here all the ways by which it is possible to come into the knowledge of God, but certain ones: to show us that we ought to seek such and similar ones.

To the other, it must be said that negation as negation certifies nothing: but negation of opposite predicaments concerning some subject, by the very fact that it removes opposites, makes it approach that which per se agrees with the subject. And an example of this is put forth by a certain Philosopher: as if it is asked what man is, and it is said that he is not a stone, and not an inanimate thing, by this negation a great inquiry is narrowed, because now man is sought among animate things only; and if it is said, he is not vegetable, now consequently he is sought among sensible things: and if it is said further, he is not brute, it will be known that he is a rational animal: and this is the definition of man found by accident through negations made concerning man. And this is the way of division in Philosophy, as it is said, God is either corporeal or incorporeal: not corporeal: therefore incorporeal. And so further. Therefore, negation certifies inasmuch as it removes the opposite from the proposed subject: because by this it infers that which according to nature agrees.

However, affirmations are said to be incomplete, because they do not perfectly say what God is: and the cause of this is stated above.

To the other, it must be said that eminence is not the same as cause: because eminence is properly in the mystical things which always agree with God more eminently than the name expresses: but the way from effect to cause is indifferently in any caused thing, as is evident in all those here introduced by the Master.

Articulus 11 — Whether Prime Matter Is Nothing

Whether prime matter is nothing?

Whether prime matter is nothing?

They also understood the form of the body, etc.

Here begins the fourth and last reason in which the Master does three things. First, he deduces the reason that God is the form of forms. Second, he returns to the first and explains why the Apostle said: Invisible things, etc. Third, he suggests several other reasons to be taken from the dispositions of creatures.

Concerning the first, note that form here is called the form, or the reason of the thing, according to which it is ordered to the knower or knowledge, and manifests the thing in natural beauty.

But it is objected concerning this which he says -

If, however, they could lack every form, for prime matter has no form at all: therefore it is altogether nothing. Hence Augustine in the book of Confessions: It is true that formlessness, which is almost nothing, cannot have the vicissitudes of times.

The solution of this is held from Augustine, in the same place, who thus speaks of prime matter: Just as we say that what is created and formed is more good, so we confess that what is creatable and formable is less good, but still good. Hence prime matter, through the very privation it has, has an order to form, because that privation makes it desire form: and thus it has in some way a form in the appetite for form and order to it: and therefore it is almost nothing, but yet not nothing, as Augustine says.

Divisio Textus

Now it remains to show, etc. Here begins that part in which, by the guidance of similitude, one arrives in some manner at the knowledge of the Trinity. And it is divided into two parts according to a double guiding similitude: of which the first is the vestige, and about this he first deals in this chapter. The second is the image found in spiritual and rational nature, and about this he subsequently deals, there, G, Now indeed let us come to it, etc.

In the prior chapter the Master does three things. First, he shows the vestige in creatures through number, species, and order. Second, he shows how these pertain to the persons, there, In that Trinity, Third, he shows how the philosophers, etc., progressing through these, failed in the third sign, and that they saw from afar and in shadow, there, Behold it has been shown where And through this division and by the following disputation the knowledge of the chapter is made clear.

Whether from perpetuity eternity is argued, and from the greatness of power infinity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

From perpetuity indeed, etc. For this seems false: because

1. The perpetuity of creatures is the lack of an end, and not of a beginning: whence it seems from this that it cannot be argued that which lacks a beginning and an end. Similarly, the greatness of creatures is not infinite: therefore from it the infinite power of God, which is omnipotence and is called such, cannot be inferred.
2. Furthermore, since order is the relation of a thing to an end, and from the end is perfection: it seems rather from order and disposition that one is good than wise.
3. Governance also directly seems to be the work of wisdom: and therefore from governance it can be understood more that one is wise, than good.

Solution. It must be said that everything which begins in some way was in potentiality to be made before it was made: but whatever is in potentiality to be made, is made by another, not by itself. Let it be granted, that it is made by itself: therefore it makes itself: but whatever makes, acts: therefore it acts: and whatever acts, is in act: therefore it is in act: therefore it is in act, and is made simultaneously: but whatever is made, is not: therefore it is in act, and is not simultaneously, which is impossible: therefore it is necessary that everything which is made and begins, is made by that which is not made, nor began: but the perpetual is made: therefore by that which did not begin: and this is eternal: therefore it is made by the eternal: and thus from perpetuity the eternal is argued, from greatness however infinity is argued: although indeed not all infinite power shines forth in the great, nevertheless because it brings forth the great without the need of pre-existing matter and instrument, thus in the mode of acting it is known to be infinite in power and omnipotence.

To the other it must be said, that there is the order of parts in the whole continuous, which is the position of parts: and there is the universal order in the world, like the uniform mobile under the first mover, and the non-uniform mobile under the first mobile, and the motion of generable and corruptible matter under the motion of the mobile circularly and non-uniformly: and all these to complete the number of the elect, and this order is of wisdom. There is another order of each in the perfection of its end and participation of the goods possible to it from the first cause, that is, God, and this order is of goodness. Disposition, however, differs from order: because disposition is through the forms of a thing in itself, order however is towards another.

To the last it must be said, that governance here has in itself the containment of things so that they can remain: and this is of goodness, as Augustine says on Genesis.

Whose is the proper cognition through the vestige, is it of man alone?

Here arises a threefold doubt. For it is asked, Whose is the proper cognition through the vestige? Secondly, What is the vestige? Thirdly, How is it applied to the Trinity by which it is known through it?

Concerning the FIRST, it proceeds thus: The vestige is the cognition of the Trinity through those things in which it shines forth in irrational creature: but the Angel, knowing things in their proper kind, knows the Trinity mirrored in irrational creature: therefore the Angel uses cognition through the vestige.

But ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The Apostle says that God is known from the creation of the world through the vestige: but the creation of the world is man: therefore it seems that this does not pertain to the Angel.

1. Likewise, Bernard in the book of Consideration: What need is there for steps to one already holding the throne? and he speaks of Angels who do not need the ladder of vestige and image to know God.
2. Likewise, Whosever cognition of the creature begins in God and ends in the creature's proper kind, it is not properly to know God through the creature, but rather conversely: the cognition of Angels (as Augustine says in IV on Genesis) of the creature to be known begins in God in whom they received the cognition of the creature to be made, and afterwards known in its proper kind: therefore it is not theirs to know God through the vestige.

Further it is asked according to this, Whether brute animals know God through the vestige?

1. It seems that they do, by that of Jeremiah 8:7: The stork in the heaven knows her appointed times; the turtle, and the swallow, and the crane observe the time of their coming, etc.: and, Isaiah 1:3: The ox knows his owner, and the ass his master's crib.
2. Likewise, Jonah 4:7, The Lord commanded a worm to smite the gourd: but a command does not reach him who does not know the command: therefore that worm first conceived that it should smite the gourd.
3. Likewise, Augustine on Genesis says that every soul is moved by things seen, and he introduces the example of the worm smiting the gourd of Jonah at the command of the Lord.

But On the Contrary; It is not for him to use the vestige who does not come to the cognition of the uncreated Trinity, which cognition is the end of the vestige: but such do not have such cognition: therefore they do not know through the vestige.

1. Likewise, the vestige requires a power conferring: but such do not have such a conferring and ordering power: therefore they do not have the cognition of the vestige. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved by this that the conferring and ordering power is only reason, and brutes do not have reason.
2. Solution. It must be said that cognition through the vestige has three essentials to itself: of which the first is that the vestige be known in the reason of the vestige. The second is that from it the inquisitive cognition of the Creator begins. The third is that the user of the vestige be in some way capable of the cognition of the Creator. And thus cognition through the vestige pertains only to man.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that it does not pertain to Angels for two reasons, namely, because Angels do not need collative cognition which is quasi conjectural, because they see with a deiform intellect. Another is because the cognition of Angels does not begin from the creature, so that it comes to the Creator: but rather the contrary, as the objection proves. Hence the first reason proceeds from the insufficient.

To that which is further asked concerning brutes, it must be said that they do not have the cognition of the vestige for two reasons: one of which is, because they do not know the vestige as a vestige, because they do not confer. The second, because such an animal is not capable of the cognition of the Creator.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that (as Damascene says) such animals are rather acted upon by nature, than act through apprehension. Although indeed the kite apprehends the coming of its time, yet...

nevertheless it is incited to this by the qualities of the body, such as the heat of the season and things of this sort. A sign of this is that all animals of one species operate in a similar way, and each swallow builds a nest like another: and when one comes, another comes. But if they followed apprehension as if by a sort of reason, since apprehension would be dissimilar, their works would be most dissimilar, just as in the mechanical arts, where one does not work like another.

§ 1. To that which is objected concerning the little worm striking Jonah's ivy, it must be said that the little worm did not apprehend the command of the Lord, but struck the ivy as food: for the Lord uses the motions of animals of this sort for whatever He wills: and in this respect they are said to obey a command.

§ 2. To that which is objected concerning Augustine, that every soul is moved by things seen, it must be said that it is indeed moved by things seen, but it is not ruled according to the rational principles [rationes] of the things seen, but rather it is ruled by nature: and the fact that it is said to be moved by things seen, this is because it is moved toward the things seen.

What is a vestige, and is knowledge through a vestige useful?

Next it is asked, what is a vestige? And three things are asked, namely: What is a vestige? Secondly, concerning the parts of a vestige. Thirdly, concerning the division of the enumeration of diverse vestiges.

§ 1. To the first one proceeds thus: A vestige is the detection of someone through the figure of a foot impressed on a road, for thus sight receives a vestige: but God is not known thus: therefore knowledge of a vestige is useless. Job 11:7: Peradventure you will comprehend the vestiges of God, and find out the Almighty perfectly? As if to say: No. Psalm 76:20: Your way is in the sea, and your paths in many waters, and your vestiges will not be known.

ON THE CONTRARY: Augustine: Through all his works he has scattered indications of his signification. Job 12:7: Ask the beasts, and they will teach you: and the birds of the air, and they will tell you. Psalm 18:2: The heavens declare the glory of God, etc.

§ 2. Further it is asked next to this, Whether the vestige is prior to the creature, or the creature according to its rational principle [ratio] is prior to the vestige? And it seems that the creature is prior according to its ratio: because a subject is prior to its property: but the creature underlies the vestige: therefore the creature is prior.

ON THE CONTRARY: Basil in a certain sermon on the beginning of Proverbs, treating that passage, The heavens declare, speaks thus: "There are certain discourses and rational principles of wisdom which before all things were inserted into creatures, that is, that very ratio is that by which each thing was procreated by wisdom, and by which even keeping silent it cries out, and professes God its creator. First of all the ratio and wisdom of things was produced, then at length their very subsistences, since already their ratio and the subsistence by which they can subsist had preceded, through which the intention of mortals is also directed to the intellect of the subsisting God." From this it is gathered that the ratio of the vestige is prior to the subsistences of creatures themselves.

SOLUTION. It must be said that a vestige is a likeness that is doubly deficient in the representation of that of which it is a vestige. In one way it is deficient: because it is a likeness of a part: because of a foot, and not of the whole. In another way: because the likeness of the part is confused, inasmuch as it also confusedly represents the foot: because it is only the lower surface, and not whether the foot is thick, or well colored, or well related to the leg and to the other parts. Here, however, "vestige" is transferred to the confused likeness of an artisan in his work, in which he does not expressly shine forth: and therefore at the end of this chapter the Master says, that seeing through a vestige, they saw the truth through a shadow and from afar, failing in the gaze of the truth: nevertheless something is seen in the vestige, such as some distinction through appropriated attributes, although not through proper ones.

§ 3. To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that those authorities are understood [in this way], so that God is not sufficiently comprehended through a vestige: whence Job also says: Will you find out the Almighty perfectly?

§ 4. To that which is further asked, Whether the vestige is prior, etc. It must be said that "prior" is said in two ways, namely, beginning on the part of matter, either according to being, or according to time, which are all the same, and thus the creature is prior according to its subsistence than the ratio of wisdom which it represents, as the objection proves. "Prior" can also be said according to ratio by beginning on the part of the artisan from whom the work issues forth. Thus the ratio of wisdom is prior to the vestige: just as every artisan operating through intellect first has the ratio of the work, and produces it in his mind, before he indicates it in the material work.

Concerning the parts of a vestige which are unity, species, and order: are they suitably assigned?

Secondly it is asked concerning the parts of a vestige which are posited as three in the Text, namely unity, species, and order.

But it seems that there ought to be only two: because there are only two principles of composite things, namely matter and form: but a multitude of consequent properties arises from the primary multitude of component parts according to substance and according to being: therefore it seems that there ought to be only two of the essence of a vestige.

§ 1. Further it is asked about that vestige which is enumerated, Wisdom 11:21: But you have disposed all things in measure, and number, and weight.

1. For this seems false, since not all things have number: because there is no number of simple things.
2. Besides, in book IV On Genesis, Augustine says that number furnishes species to every thing: but that which furnishes species is form: therefore number is form.
3. Besides, in the same place Augustine says that weight leads every thing to rest and stability: but rest and stability belong only to located things: since therefore not all things are located, because place is not located, it seems not all things were made in weight.
4. Besides, what diversity do these names, rest and stability, signify?
5. In the same way it is asked concerning measure, about which Augustine says, in the same place, that it pre-fixes a mode for every thing. Since therefore measure is some one of beings, it seems there is a measure of a measure, and a weight of a weight, and a number of a number: and this will go on to infinity, as it seems.

6. Besides it is asked, What is that mode which measure pre-fixes, since it is said that the mode of charity is to have no mode? Whence Bernard in the book On the Love of God: The cause for loving God is God, the mode is to love without mode.

7. Besides, many beings are deprived of mode: for since according to Cicero in book I of the Rhetoric, mode is one of the circumstances of a work, and sin corrupts circumstances, it seems this mode can be corrupted and annihilated, which is against Augustine who says, that where these are nothing, there is absolutely nothing: but sin is not absolutely nothing, since it posits an act of the will.

§ 2. Further it is asked about that division of the vestige which Augustine posits elsewhere, which is of mode, species, and order. For it seems this vestige is not in all things: for nothing diminishable by sin is in those things which cannot sin: mode, species, and order (as Augustine says) are diminishable by sin: therefore they are not in those things which cannot sin: and thus they are only in man and Angel, as it seems.

§ 3. Further it is asked concerning that division of the vestige which is posited by Augustine and Bernard, one, true, good: for one of the dividing members is said of another: because the one is true, and good: and the true is one, and good: and the good is one, and true: but this ought to happen in no good division.

SOLUTION. Without prejudice I say that the trinity of the created vestige (as Basil seemed to say above) is taken from that ratio by which the creature issues from the Creator, and according to the habitude of the creature to the Creator it shines forth in it: and therefore it is tripled through three things which are in it, so that a certain thing corresponds to power, such as unity which as it were founds the thing: and a certain thing to wisdom, such as species through which it is known: and a certain thing to goodness, such as order toward the perfect.

Yet they are also founded in the principles of the thing, as will be clear later, which although they are two, namely that which is (quod est) and that by which it is (quo est): or matter and form: nevertheless the habitudes of those principles are several: and according to their habitudes those three are taken.

§ 4. To the other it must be said, that God created all things in number: for there is no created being which does not have plurality in itself in some way, as is clear concerning being itself which is most simple to the intellect; for if it is taken as created, it will have a habitude to the Creator, as to what is prior, and it has many habitudes to posterior things, according as the word itself [ipsum] is in them by priority and posteriority: and those habitudes although they do not constitute being insofar as it is being, nevertheless they belong to the intellect of created being insofar as it is such.

And therefore it must be said that number is in any being substantially and accidentally by nature, which number is nothing else than the plurality of principles constituting it in the ratio of a created being: and this Boethius seems to mean in the prologue of book I of Arithmetic, where he says thus: "God, the founder of this worldly mass, had number as the principal exemplar of his reasoning, and according to this he constituted all whatever things [he made] so that by fabricating reason he might find harmony through the numbers of the assigned order." Now this number, in my judgment, is nothing but the proportion of habitudes in the number of principles constituting the essence of the created thing, insofar as it is a created and determinate being in nature. Hence it is also that Boethius in the book On the Trinity says that in God alone there is no number, and in all others there is number. Thus that which truly is, is not in part, that is, it cannot be a part, nor have a part: because otherwise it would be imperfect. And it similarly follows that only this is, that is, that one truly is, and is most beautiful and firm: because it leans on nothing. Wherefore this truly one is that in which there is no number, nothing in it other than that which it is. For since according to Damascene, difference is the cause of number, and a difference of principles of this sort is found in every created thing, in every created thing there will be number, which is as a distinct being in nature, whether it be substance, or accident.

§ 5. TO THE OTHER it must be said, that number in one way is form, and in another way is not: however in every way number somewhat furnishes species: and it is the act of number to posit the numbered thing into a number with others: and a thing receives this insofar as it is terminated and divided from others: and this is done through the act of form which divides and terminates the being of matter: and thus number gives being, and is form: but then number is posited for that by which a thing is numbered, and it falls into a number: whence it does not follow then that it is even or odd: or two, or three, and the like. In another way number is the numbered principles sufficient for the being of the thing: and thus it is taken when it is said that God made all things in number. And those principles furnish species just as in the first potency to the being of a thing there is species.

§ 6. To the other it must be said, that weight is taken broadly and strictly. Strictly, weight is the inclination of a mobile body by a straight motion to its where [place]; but broadly it is the inclination of any reality of a thing into that in which the coming-to-be of its being and of its essence rests: but its coming-to-be does not rest except in having been made, and having been made is only when the thing is perfect in being: therefore weight will be the inclination of the principles constituting the thing into the being of the thing, that is, the proper being of the thing according to the nature of this or that created thing.

§ 7. To the other it must be said, that location or stability halts motion, and therefore by an extension of the name it is in having been made: but rest expresses a certain perfection in the constitution of that for the sake of which the motion was, and therefore it expresses perfection in the form and being of the thing.

§ 8. To the other it must be said, that measure pre-fixes a mode: but mode is that beyond which nothing of the essence of the thing proceeds, as Augustine says. Whence according to this I say that mode is the termination of the principles constituting the thing under the being of the thing: so that thus there are three, namely the number of principles, and their inclination to being, and their termination or perfection under the being of the thing.

§ 9. To the same it must be said, that of every determinate created being in nature there are these three: but it is not necessary that of those three there be another three which are in them as dispositions, but that these three have three corresponding [realities] in the ideas by which they are created and inserted into creatures. Whence Augustine in book IV On Genesis: "Measure is without measure, to which what is from it is equated, nor is it itself from elsewhere. Number is without number, by which all things are formed, nor is it itself formed. Weight is without weight, to which they are referred so that they may rest, whose rest is pure joy, nor is it itself referred to another." And further below he concludes thus: "Therefore it must not be doubted that those things are outside those things which are disposed, in which all things are disposed." And thus it is clear that one will not go on to infinity there.

§ 10. To the other it must be said, that love and charity in truth according to their being have a mode, and this mode is the commensuration of the act to the lovable object: but in God the lovable object is elevated in goodness beyond what we can [reach] through affection toward Him: therefore it is said to have no mode, because it does not have a mode within our power.

§ 11. TO THE OTHER it must be said, that in truth sins are deprived of these three, but not altogether: because an act remains in them with privation and with a potential order to these: and therefore there is also deformity in the act: because if there were no act of free choice ordinable to these, then the lack of them would not induce deformity. But how a defect of this sort occurs, has been noted above in the question concerning the two principles.

§ 12. TO THE OTHER it must be said, that mode, species, and order are in all things, but not in one way: for they are in some things in two ways, as in a foot, or another organ: for if the foot is considered in itself, thus the species of the foot is the form of the foot, and its mode is its limitation to a figure, and its order is to its place in the body. But if it is considered as an organ of the walking power, thus its species will be a disposition which can be suitably moved by the walking power, and its mode the proportion of the mobile to the moving power, and its order to walking. Whence I say that mode, order, and species are diminishable in a rational creature, not considered absolutely in the being of nature, but rather according as it is considered according to the order which it has to the good of grace: for thus that ordinability is corrupted by sin: but otherwise they can be in others.

§ 13. To the last it must be said, that the one, the true, and the good, although they are convertible according to their supposits, nevertheless are not convertible according to the intentions of their names, and thus they are co-divided.

What is the rationale of the enumeration of diverse vestiges?

What is the rationale of the enumeration of diverse vestiges?

Thirdly, it is asked about the rationale of the enumeration of diverse vestiges: for almost everyone speaks of this, and no one assigns a rationale for what is said.

Let the vestiges found by the Saints be enumerated, thus:

1. In Wisdom 11:21, this is posited: Number, weight, measure.
2. Augustine in book IV On Genesis, posits this: Mode, species, and order.
3. Bernard, this: One, true, good.
4. In the Gloss on that Psalm 91, It is good to give praise, on that verse (v. 7): A fool will not understand these things, this is posited: Substance, species, virtue [power].
5. In the Celestial Hierarchy this is posited: Essence, virtue, and operation.
6. Elsewhere Augustine gives this: Substance, species, reason.
7. The same Augustine in book VIII of The City of God posits this: The cause of subsisting, the reason of understanding, the order of living.
8. In 83 Questions he posits this: That it consists, that it harmonizes, that it is discerned.
9. From the book Soliloquies this is gathered: The true, the beautiful, the good.
10. From the book On the Divine Names this is gathered: Light, the beautiful, the good.

There are also very many other ways of enumerating, all of which will be clear, if the rationale of their enumeration is well attended to.

§ 1. It must be noted that a thing is considered in three ways, namely in itself, and in its operation, and in comparison to man, for whose erudition the thing itself was made.

Now in itself it is further considered in three ways, namely in its coming-to-be (fieri), and in its ultimate perfection. Now in its coming-to-be are those enumerated first, namely number, weight, and measure. For number is referred (as was said before) to the substance of the constituting principles, according as one with another makes a number in constituting the whole being: but weight is referred to their inclinations to being: and measure to the proportion of the very being terminating the principles inclined to it. And thus it is also clear that the prior is always in the posterior: but it is not converted, because number is in weight, and not conversely: and number and weight are in measure, and not conversely.

§ 2. Those enumerated SECONDLY, namely mode, species, and order, are referred to the thing according as it is in being: which is clear thus: Mode is (as Augustine says) that which pre-fixes for each thing the measure of its being beyond which there is nothing of its essence: and therefore it is clear that it is from form, and where the preceding trinity is terminated, namely in measure, there this one begins, just as being is after coming-to-be. But species, since it is that by which the thing is, and the proper nature of the thing, and gives being to that in which it is, again it is clear that it does not belong to the thing except according as it is in being. But the first order of the thing is that which is to permanence and rest in that being, and to the proper place of its nature whether corporeal or spiritual, which follows from such being which is from the form of the thing. Whence the Philosopher in book VIII of the Physics says that motion to place and to form is the same, in things mobile by a straight motion. Whence it is clear how these three are in the thing according as it is. In these also the previously obtained three are supposed: for since every motion is from measure, as Augustine says, and measure supposes number and weight, as was held, number, weight, and measure will be in mode: but since there is no species except of a modified thing in being, species supposes mode: since therefore there is no order except of collocation and rest in the being which is from species, order supposes species. And from the Text it is clear that the labor of certain people is useless, who want to reduce all these to number: because if they are asked why the Saints enumerate them in such diverse ways, they cannot assign a reason.

§ 3. Thirdly indeed the three enumerated, namely the one, the true, and the good, are taken in the thing according as it is perfected with its ultimate perfection: which is clear thus: The one (as the Philosopher says) is undivided in itself, and divided from others: but nothing is undivided in itself, except what is contained within itself by its boundaries: and this is what is enclosed to the limits of its defining principles: but this is what is located in nature in an ordered being: whence it is clear that the one has order in itself, and consequently has all things preceding order: but since the true is that which is, by the true the proper substance of the thing is supposed: and this is taken from the nature of the pronoun and the subjunctive article, which is in the noun, both of which denote the determination of the supposit: but by the verb, is, substance is imported as an act, which substance does not belong except to an already perfected thing: and therefore the true supposes the one: but the good expresses indivision from the end, and the end is the ultimate complement, and therefore the good supposes the true and the one. And thus it is clear that these three belong to the thing according as it is in its ultimate complement.

§ 4. The SECOND consideration of a thing is according as it is in operation: and thus again it is considered in three ways, namely, according to things disposing to a work, or in the act of the work, or in the end intended by the work.

Now according to the first consideration are taken the three enumerated fourthly in the Gloss on the Psalm, namely substance, species, and virtue: for substance posits a being perfect in itself, and therefore it supposes the good, and consequently all things preceding the good: substance is also that from which act and operation proceed, because acts belong to particulars and composites: but every substance acts through form, and therefore species posits the first disposing principle to the work: but species does not elicit works except through virtue, and therefore virtue is the immediate disposing principle to the work, and therefore in it are species and substance: whence by these three it is sufficiently disposed to the work: substance from which the act proceeds, species according to which the operation is, and active virtue by which the immediate principle of the work is.

§ 5. Now the fifth three are in the book On the Celestial Hierarchy, these namely, essence, virtue, and operation, and they are in the thing according as it is in the work: for essence is posited here for nature, according as it is the principle of motion and rest: and virtue is the ultimate issuing forth of potency into the work: but operation posits the act of the work. And again it is easily clear how in these all the preceding are enclosed.

§ 6. In the sixth place indeed are enumerated substance, species, and reason, and they are in the thing according as it is in the end intended by the work: and according to this substance supposes the acting substance in act: and species posits its determination in act in this or that, which is according to the nature of its form, or being: but reason expresses the intended end: and then again the posterior always posits before itself the preceding.

§ 7. Those indeed which are enumerated seventhly, do not express something in the creature, but rather in God according to the division of the three sciences, as Augustine says, in the same place, namely natural, rational, and moral: because these show in God, that He is the cause of subsisting for natural things, and the reason of understanding for rational things which consist in pure and bare intellects, and the order of living which is sought in moral things which are not for the sake of contemplation, but so that we may become good.

§ 8. The THIRD consideration of a thing is according as it is ordered to the intellect and to the affection of man, whom created things instruct: and thus again there is a threefold consideration of a thing, namely, as the thing is disposed to the intellect and affection, or as it is in the intellect and affection, or as it is in the effect following it according as it is in the intellect and in the affection.

And in the first way are taken those three which are enumerated in the eighth place, namely that it consists, and that it harmonizes, and that it is discerned: for nothing consists according to nature unless it consists in the perfection of power and nature: for then it consists, that is, stands similarly: but the perfection of nature is in the first three ternaries: and the perfection of power in the second three, as was held: therefore that it consists supposes all the preceding: but that it harmonizes posits an order to another, and especially to man for whom it harmonizes in the use of life: but that it is discerned posits a respect to the intellect.

§ 9. Those IN TRUTH which are enumerated ninthly are in the thing existing in the affection and the intellect; and they are these: the true, the good, the beautiful: for the true is the end of speculative intelligence, as the Philosopher says: and the good is the end of the affection: but the beautiful expresses its beautification and decency according to the rational principle of the honorable.

§ 10. Tenthly indeed the three enumerated are light, the beautiful, and the good: and they are taken according to the effect which they make in the affection and intellect, which are to illuminate, and to make beautiful, and good.

And note, that in all these and others which are posited by the Saints, the first always expresses the substance of the thing: because unless that is first supposed, nothing could be taken concerning it. But the last always expresses the complement with respect to the two preceding.

Concerning the attributes of the persons which are attributed to them by the Master.

Next, in order to have a fuller understanding of the Text, it must be seen how the Master through the words of Augustine attributes these three to the uncreated Trinity, there, where he says: For in that Trinity is the supreme origin, etc.

For if all the diversities which he posits in this chapter are gathered together, then he attributes seven to the Father, and an eighth which is proper to Him, namely, that He is the Father: for he calls Him firstly the origin of all things, and secondly the principle, and thirdly from whom, and fourthly to whom we recur, fifthly one, sixthly that He is the author of the founding, and seventhly that it is His to say let it be made.

§ 1. For the FATHER is considered in three ways, namely, as a principle not from a principle, both with respect to the persons and with respect to creatures: because although the Son and the Holy Spirit create, nevertheless they have this from the Father. The Father is also taken in His property: and the Father is taken as the end to whom all things are referred, both by creatures and by the persons: because the Son refers what He is to Him, from whom He has it that He is, as Hilary says. And similarly the Holy Spirit. But if He is considered as a principle not from a principle, He can be taken in three ways, namely in habit, or in inclination to act, or in the act itself: and these are said only according to the ratio of understanding, which ratio is imported through the names, and not that there is a distinction of this sort in reality: for the Saints were accustomed to speak of the persons in this way. Now if He is taken as in habit, then origin belongs to Him: but if as in inclination to act, then principle belongs to Him: but if in the act itself, then that which is said, from whom all things, belongs to Him: and this plainly offers itself to one considering the rationes of the names. But if He is considered in His personal property, then it belongs to Him by appropriation to be one: because the one is undivided in itself, and undivided is extended to not being distinguished by this that it is not from another, just as the one from which every number comes is not from another. But if He is considered as an end, then to which all things are reduced or revert belongs to Him. But the two which the Master touches upon, namely author of the founding and He said let it be made, belong to Him according as the creature is from Him in act: but from whom belongs to Him through the act itself: while authority belongs to Him insofar as He operates through Himself: and to say let it be made insofar as His appropriated attribute shines forth in the work.

§ 2. But to the SON the Master also gives seven, namely truth, beauty, form, through whom the work is made, the form which we follow, the likeness of reformation, and the word: and these are adapted to the Son according to four considerations of Him. For He is compared to the speaking Father, and thus He Himself is the Word: He is also compared to the issue of creatures from God, and this in two ways, namely as the idea of the thing, and thus He Himself is called form: and as a being outside the shadows of privations of those things of which He is the idea, and thus He Himself is beauty: and as a whole containing whatever will be in the thing, both immaterially and immutably, and thus He Himself is truth: because truth is immobile and immaterial. But if His comparison is made to the creature according as it issues from the operator, thus through whom the work is made is attributed to Him. The third consideration of the Son is according as He Himself is reducing us to the Father, as the Apostle says, Romans 5:2, because through Him we have access to the Father then He is considered in two ways, namely as an image to which we image ourselves, that is so that we imitate Him according to the mode possible to us, just as He imitates the Father through all things, and thus He is the form which we follow: and according as He recreates, as the mediator of God and men, and thus He is the likeness of recreation.

§ 3. To the Holy SPIRIT the Master also attributes six in this chapter, namely, that He Himself is delight, the goodness in which all things are contained, the grace by which we are reconciled, the peace by which we adhere to unity, and the gift of benignity, which belong to the Holy Spirit according to a threefold consideration of Him. For if He is considered in comparison to the Father and the Son from whom He proceeds, this is done in two ways, namely, according to the ratio of His procession, and this ratio is because He proceeds as goodness and love: then goodness belongs to Him. But if He is considered according to the mode by which He is related to the Father and the Son, then delight belongs to Him: because He Himself is the delight of the two according to appropriation. But if He is considered in comparison to the creature universally, then it belongs to Him to be that in which all things are contained. The third consideration is in comparison to the rational creature into which He proceeds, so as to sanctify it: and then He is considered in three ways, namely in Himself, just as He is the very first gift in which all things are given, and thus the gift of benignity belongs to Him: and in the presents of graces, and thus it belongs to Him to be the grace in which we are reconciled: and in the effect following the collation of Himself and of graces, and thus it belongs to Him to be the peace by which we adhere to unity.

§ 4. From what has been previously held, the explanation of the whole chapter is clear up to that point: The Word through whom everything that substantially and naturally is was made. He says all these things on account of sin, which neither naturally nor substantially is, but is an incidental defect from a defect of the good: whence it does not have perfect being, according to how Boethius defines being, when he says: Being is that which retains order and preserves nature.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Philosophers Were Able To Know The Trinity

Whether the Philosophers could know the Trinity?

Could the Philosophers know the Trinity?

§ 1. Next, an objection is raised concerning what he says: For it is not sufficient through the contemplation of creatures, etc. For from this it is understood that the Philosophers did not know the Trinity.

§ 2. 1. Against this seems to be what Aristotle says in Book I On the Heavens and the Earth thus: "And this indeed, namely, the ternary, is of every thing, and signifies the trinity of things; but we did not extract this number except from the nature of things, and retained it as a law: because it is similar to natural things, and therefore in the law of Pythagoras in which he taught to worship God, we have applied ourselves to magnify the one God with sacrifices and worship according to this number: since we magnify God the Creator who is eminent by the properties of those things which are created." For here he seems expressly to name the triune God.

§ 3. 2. Moreover, Plato speaks of the Father and the Son under proper names, and of the paternal mind and paternal intellect: therefore he seems to have understood the Father and the Son.

§ 4. 3. Moreover, Augustine says that in a certain book of Plato he read the Gospel: In the beginning was the word: up to that place: The Word was made flesh.

§ 5. 4. Moreover, Trismegistus: "The monad begets a monad, and reflects its ardor into itself": therefore it seems that he knew the Father begetting, and the Son begotten, and the Love which is from both as ardor.

§ 6. 5. If perchance it is said that the Philosophers did not know the persons under the proper names of the persons, but under appropriated ones, namely power, wisdom, and goodness. Against this: An appropriated attribute is not fitting except through the intellect understanding it as agreeing with the proper attribute: therefore if the proper is not understood first, the appropriated is not understood: and so it seems that they understood the properties of the persons before the appropriated attributes.

§ 7. It is further asked: If they knew the Father and the Son in some way, did the Father approach their knowledge more under the notion of 'speaking through the intellect' than under the notion of 'Father', and the Son under the notion of 'word' than of 'Son'?

§ 8. It is further asked: Why did they fail more in the knowledge of the Holy Spirit than of the Son?

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that without doubt the Philosophers, by the guidance of natural reason, could not have determinate knowledge of the Trinity according to the proper names of the persons: and this happens on account of three things. One of which is that that knowledge has opposition to the principles by which the intellect receives science, such as that there cannot be several supposits of one nature indivisible by number; that everything which is distinguished according to subsistence, by the fact that it is related to another, is first distinct in the substance receiving that relation; that the begetter from his own substance and the begotten are not simultaneous in being; that every begotten thing is first in potency than in act, and such like, which are the principles of receiving science according to natural reason. And to all these things the opposite is the case in the distinction of persons in the Trinity: and therefore for the knowledge of the Trinity another principle higher than these is required, which is faith, or the illumination of revelation coming from above. The second is that the science of God is wonderful and fortified, and we cannot attain to it: because it exceeds and conquers us, as was proved above. The third is that the likeness in the creature representing God is not perfect, and is deficient in representing, as the Master says below: because every likeness in many more ways is deficient than it agrees.

§ 2. To the first, therefore, it must be said that Aristotle does not understand the Trinity except perhaps through appropriated attributes: but there he intends, according to the commentary, that on account of three perfections of a thing, namely, in itself according as a body is perfect in triple dimension, and a line and surface are imperfect, in that one dimension can be added; and secondly according to the order of the circle in the generation and motion of the heaven and the figure of the world, in that a straight line receives addition, but a circle does not, in that it is without beginning and end; and thirdly the perfection of universality which is from the fact that it is impossible to add to the world, since it is totally from its own matter, and nothing of its matter is outside the world: on account, I say, of these three perfections of things the ancients magnified God with three sacrifices: and they did not confess Him to be triune and one.

§ 3. To the next it must be said according to Augustine in the book On Christian Doctrine, that Plato, curious in the inspection of books, descended into Egypt and Judea, to see the books of Moses and the Prophets: and there he learned of the Father and the Son, and not by the guidance of natural reason. Or perhaps if someone inspects the mind of Plato, he intends to call God 'father', and this world 'son': and therefore also there he speaks of a mother and nurse which is the matter from which the world is made.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that he calls the paternal mind the intellect of God without the distinction of the Trinity: and he calls the paternal intellect the archetypal world, just as Boethius says of God: Bearing the beautiful world in mind, He Himself most beautiful.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, as is clear before from Augustine On Christian Doctrine: but presently below we will give another answer.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that I do not know who this Trismegistus was: and I believe that the book is fabricated: for all the things which Trismegistus is said to have spoken, I found in a certain book of Master Alan of Lille which was composed concerning certain general propositions, and a commentary of the same is subjoined: yet if he was a Philosopher before the incarnation, and did not learn in the books of the Old Testament, nor through revelation, then I say that he is speaking of one God generating, that is, producing His intellect in the world, and loving all the things He made for His own sake.

§ 7. To what is objected, that an appropriated attribute is not known except by means of the proper, it must be said that this is true insofar as it is appropriated: but this appropriation to the proper properties was made by the faithful.

§ 8. To what is further asked, it must be said that they approached the Father and the Son more under the notion of 'speaking through the intellect', and under the notion of 'word', than under the notion of Father and Son: and this is because 'to speak' is equivocated into essential speaking which belongs to the three, and personal speaking which belongs only to the Father.

And in the first way it is investigable by reason. In the second way, no. Similarly, 'word' is equivocal with respect to the uncreated word which appropriately belongs to the Son: but 'Son' signifies a subsistent person, which 'word' does not do according to the notion of word in common.

§ 9. To the last it must be said that the expression of 'word' and 'speaker' offer themselves sufficiently in the divine intellect, and have some relation to one another: but the expression of 'love' does not offer itself thus: and therefore the procession of the Holy Spirit is more removed from reason.

§ 10. But now we have already arrived at it, etc. Here begins that part in which he teaches to come to the eternal distinction of the Trinity through the image. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he shows the distinction of the twofold image in the soul. In the second he teaches how one ascends through these images to the distinction of the uncreated Trinity, there, Y, And so the rational mind considering, etc. And this is the penultimate chapter of this distinction. In the third he says that it is grasped almost by way of conclusion in these likenesses, there, Z, Wherefore according to that consideration, etc. And it is the last chapter of this distinction.

§ 2. The first of these is subdivided into two, according to the two images which he posits: one of which is in the natural powers of the mind, but the other is in its natural habits, there, B, It can also in another way, etc.

§ 3. The former among these is further divided into three: in the first of which he posits those things which are required for an image. In the second, he determines certain doubts arisen concerning the determination of what was said, there, M, Here again it must be attended to diligently, etc. In the third, he touches upon the dissimilarity of this image, there, P, Nevertheless let him beware, etc.

§ 4. The former among these is still subdivided into two: in the first of which he touches upon the powers in which the integrity of the image consists, and how they are distinct, and one in substance, life, and mind. But in the second he demonstrates their equality to one another, there, H, such also are not only individual, etc.

§ 5. And because this passage is difficult, it must therefore be noted that the first part contains only one chapter, in which there are five paragraphs. In the first of these the Master determines that the image of God is to be sought in our mind, because our nature has nothing better than that part. In the second, he shows that the ratio of the image is in the mind: because it is capable of God, or because it grasps Him, there, Even in the mind itself before it is a partaker of God, etc. But in the third he shows the distinction and order of the three powers constituting the image, there, For behold the mind remembers, etc. In the fourth he shows how these are one in the substance of the mind, there, These three therefore, as Augustine says, etc.

Fifthly and lastly, he shows in what these are relative to one another, and in what they are not, there, But memory is said relative to something, etc.

What is an image?

§ 7. However, a fourfold doubt occurs here before the exposition of the Letter. For in the first way it must be asked, what is an image? Secondly, what are the things constituting an image? Thirdly, in what as in a subject is the image? Fourthly, with respect to what object or knowable thing is the image, whether with respect to all things, or with respect to something specially?

§ 8. Regarding the first one proceeds thus: Hilary says: "An image is the unique and indiscrete likeness of a thing to a thing to be coequated." Also, Hilary: "An image is the likeness and unity of a thing to a thing to be coequated." But since Augustine says on that passage of Psalm 4:7: The light of thy countenance is signed upon us, etc., that there is an image of creation, and of recreation, and of similitude, let it be asked whether it is defined in common for all those images?

§ 9. 1. It seems that it is not: because the image of creation is reason: and that has a great discretion [separation] from that of which it is the image.

§ 11. 3. Moreover, the created image does not coequate the uncreated Trinity: therefore the definition does not fit.

§ 12. 4. Moreover, the second definition says, likeness and unity: and this does not seem to fit the image: because Augustine says in the book On the Ten Strings, that the image of a king in his son is one way, and in a gold coin another way: because in the son it is as in the same in nature passed down from the father's nature: but in the gold coin it is as in a diverse nature, and it is imprinted by an artificer. And he says that it is in us as in the gold coin: but in the Only-Begotten it is as in the son: therefore it seems that our image is not a likeness and unity to the uncreated image, but much diversity.

§ 2. 5. Moreover, since Augustine says that three things are consequent upon one another, namely equality, likeness, and image: for where there is equality, there is likeness, but not conversely: and where there is image, there is equality and likeness, but not conversely: why does he not define the image by equality, just as by likeness, since equality approaches more to the notion of an image than likeness?

§ 3. 6. Moreover, Hilary seems to be contrary to himself: because above it was held (dist. 2) where he says that an image is not solitary: but here he defines it by unity when he says, likeness and unity.

§ 4. 7. Moreover, since there is a vestige in the creature through which also some knowledge of the Trinity is received, can it be called likeness and unity?

§ 5. 8. Also, what is the difference between a vestige and an image? For if a vestige does not represent in totality, and an image similarly does not represent in totality, as the Master says, there seems to be no difference between them.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that in truth those definitions given by Hilary are about the uncreated image which is the Son: but if they are extended to the created image (as some wish), then it must be granted that nothing prohibits that definition from fitting all three images (so to speak) by priority and posteriority; and by priority it fits the image of similitude which is in the three powers, namely memory, intelligence, and will: but by posteriority as to a subject it fits reason which is put there for the part of the mind which is in reason, that is, in the rational soul, the more excellent part: but it fits the image of recreation by effect, because it makes one actually imitate.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that the created image is indeed discrete [distinct], as it is considered in itself as a certain thing: but in the notion of an image it is not taken alone, but that of which it is the image is taken in it in one acceptation with it: because considered thus it leads the intellect into the exemplar, and therefore in one act of understanding both are grasped, because one is in the other, and thus it touches the exemplar, and is indiscrete [inseparable] from it.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the dissimilarity which is in it is not in it as it is an image: because nothing is an image according to what is dissimilar in itself; and therefore that does not impede indiscretion.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that it is true that it does not coequate the exemplar in totality, but according to what it attains in some way, thus it strives to coequate, whence it is coequated in a qualified sense.

§ 10. To what is objected concerning the second definition, it must be said that if we wish to extend it to the created image, then there will be unity not substantially, but the unity of imitation and of leading into another through equality and likeness: and then there is unity well enough in the image of the king in the gold coin.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that likeness in one way signifies a greater agreement than equality: for likeness is the same quality of differing things: if therefore it is taken in the definition, it will express in the notion of image every equality, especially exterior: and so it will also express agreement in form, or in a figure constant regarding something: and that most of all perfects the notion of an image more than equality in quantity alone.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that Hilary is not contrary to himself: because above he willed that the image should posit multiple supposits either in the direct case or in the oblique, as was said above. But here he understands not of the unity of singularity, but rather of the unity by which, ordered to itself, they are united in this, that one is in the other by the fact that it is grasped in it.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that vestige and image differ in four ways. One is that a vestige is a confused likeness over a part of a part only, but an image is an expressed likeness in exterior things over the whole. Another is that a vestige does not signify the agreement of exterior things according as they are caused by interior things, such as of old age, fatness, color, beauty, and the like: but an image posits such an agreement in exterior things, through which something in interior things is comprehended. The third difference is: because a vestige is in all things, but an image is only in the more worthy creature, and according to its more worthy part. The fourth is that a vestige does not lead except obscurely into the attributes of the persons: but an image equally into the procession of the persons from one another, and their consubstantiality, and also equality, as will be said presently below, when the order of those powers is shown, and equality, and consubstantiality: and therefore also a vestige cannot properly be called a likeness and unity.

What are the things constituting the image?

§ 2. Secondly it is asked, what are the things constituting the image? And it is said by Augustine that they are memory, and intelligence, and will.

§ 3. Let it be asked therefore: What is memory according as it constitutes the image? And Gregory of Nyssa says that the memorative faculty is memory and the cause and storehouse of remembering. But Origen says that it is a phantasm left behind by some sense appearing in act. But Damascene says that memory is the conservation of sense and intelligence. But Augustine in Book XII of the Confessions: Memory is the present of past things. But Tully says that memory is of past things.

§ 4. Let it be asked therefore: According to which notion of these definitions does it fall into the notion of an image? And it seems that according to none.

§ 5. 1. For all these definitions suppose memory not to be a part of the rational soul, but of the sensible: therefore it seems that memory is in no way a part of the image.

§ 6. 2. Moreover, whatever considers time under a determinate difference of time is not removed from the conditions of matter, since time is one of the principal conditions of matter: but memory so considers time: therefore it is not removed from the conditions of matter. The first is evident through itself. The second is proved by what Gregory of Nyssa says thus: We are said to remember what we previously knew, or heard, or otherwise cognized: but 'previously' has a relation to past time. Thence thus: Whatever does not abstract from the conditions of matter is a part of the sensible soul, and not of the rational: memory does not abstract: therefore it is a part of the sensible soul, and not of the rational: therefore it ought not to be a part of the image.

§ 7. 3. This same thing Gregory of Nyssa seems to say expressly thus: Sensible things indeed are themselves remembered according to themselves, but intellectual things according to accident, because the memory of thinkable things also comes to be from an assumed phantasm.

§ 8. 4. Also, Damascene: Sensible things indeed according to themselves are committed to memory.

§ 9. 5. Also, Aristotle: Memory is indeed of the intellect according to accident, but per se of the primary sensitive faculty.

§ 10. 6. Also, Aristotle: If memory were of the intellective parts, it would not be in many other animals, perhaps but in no mortal beings at all.

§ 11. From all these it is clear that memory cannot be a part of the image.

§ 12. In the same way it is asked concerning intelligence, whether it is a part of the image? And it seems that it is not: for intelligence is either the agent intellect, or the possible, or the speculative or formal, or the intellect which is called by the Philosophers acquired: it is certain that it is not the agent: because that is universally active, as the Philosopher says, by which it is to make all intelligible things: and the image is not taken according to it: because in this it does not imitate the Trinity, but rather the act of light to color, and of art to matter, as the Philosopher says. Similarly it seems that it is not the possible intellect by which it is to become all intelligible things, and has all things in potency, but nothing in act: but Augustine says that the intellect which is a part of the image always knows itself. But that it is not the speculative intellect is clear: because that habit of principles, or another, if it were to imitate, would not be from itself, but rather from the part of the thing of which it is the intellect. But Augustine says that the intellect imitates of itself. Similarly it is not the acquired intellect: because that is science acquired through discovery or teaching: and then it does not imitate the Trinity in one essence of the persons.

§ 2. In the same way it seems that neither is the will a part of the image; because the will (as Anselm says) is only in two ways, namely, as the mover of the powers according as it is converted upon other powers and moves them to act, according to which it is said: I will to understand, and I will to remember: but thus it does not imitate the Trinity: because thus it is not from the intellect and memory: but rather conversely those are from the will. In another way there is the will which is converted to the willed object, and thus again it does not imitate the Trinity, but rather commands concerning imitating or fleeing the delectable or sad in works: and so it seems that none of those three is of the image which are posited in it.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said that in truth (as Augustine says) the integrity of the created image is in these three: but memory is not taken according to any of those assignments which were made: because as the Master says below from the word of Augustine, memory as it is taken here is with respect to past, present, and future things: which could not be unless it were abstracted from every difference of time, just like the intellect. And if it is asked, What is this memory, and what is its act? It must be said that this memory is nothing else than the power of the rational soul according to its higher part holding within itself the habit of the true and the good which it is according to its own nature, and the habit of the true and the good which God is: or perhaps what is truer according to Augustine, holding within itself knowledge through the presence of essence, and not the habit of the true and the good which the soul itself is according to nature. Whence Augustine says that nothing is more present to the soul than itself to itself: but this will be treated below. But its act is not in acting, but in holding (as was already said) the presence of knowledge in essence, or in some innate habit. Whence I well concede what is objected concerning memory, that it is not taken thus here: nor do I approve what some say, that it is the conservation of species under the notion of the previously seen, or received, or possessed: because this notion concerns time, and according to all Philosophers, it belongs to that power to consider time whose it is to consider quantity, and this is the primary sensitive faculty. But if it is said that the notion of time is simple, and therefore can belong to the intellect: this is true: but the notion of time relates equally to all time, just as the notion of man equally to all men, and therefore then it does not determine this intelligible thing and that: and therefore it must be said that it simply respects no time, but is abstracted from time of which memory itself is the conservator.

§ 4. To what is asked concerning intellect or intelligence, it must be said that intelligence is called here the formal intellective power not simply, but informed with respect to a certain intelligible object, which namely is always present in the soul, just as the soul is present to itself, and God is in it essentially, presentially, and potentially: for the knowledge of God is naturally innate in us: and therefore the objection does not proceed which was made concerning the speculation of other intellectual things: because although it does not imitate in others, yet in a certain one it imitates through relation to memory and will.

§ 2. In the same way must be solved what is asked concerning the will, that it is the will taken with respect to the willed object, not every one, but a certain one: and not in whatever way, but according as memory and intelligence are of the same thing, just as it is willed that the soul is, and willed that God is: the knowledge of both of which is innate to the soul naturally, as Augustine says: and through this also the solution to the whole is clear.

In what as in a subject is the image contained?

§ 3. Thirdly it is asked, In what as in a proximate subject is the image?

§ 4. 1. And Augustine says that it is to be sought and found there than which our nature has nothing better, that is, in the mind: therefore it seems that the first subject of the image is the mind.

§ 5. 2. Also, Augustine says that the mind has the image in the power of knowing, and the likeness in the power of loving: therefore the mind has the image.

§ 6. 1. But against this seems to be Augustine in Book XIV On the Trinity, who posits an image in exterior vision: as the species of the seen thing, and its image in the eye which is called vision, as he himself says, and the intention of the will conjoining both.

§ 7. 2. Similarly in the same book he posits an image in the phantasy: for there the image of the body is in the memory of the sensible soul, and the same image in the cogitation of the one imagining: but the intention of the will is conjoining both: therefore it seems that it is not in the mind alone, as the Master seems to say here.

§ 8. 3. Also, Damascene says the image is according to free choice: although nevertheless free choice is not a part of the mind.

§ 9. 4. Also, The image seems to be in the higher part of reason: because that (as Augustine says in Book XII On the Trinity) cleaves to the contemplation of higher things: since therefore the image is principally engaged in the contemplation of the higher, the image seems to be according to the higher portion of reason.

§ 10. It is further asked, Why is the image not assigned in some way to belong to the powers of the vegetative soul, just as it is assigned by Augustine to the powers of the sensible soul?

§ 11. Still it is asked concerning the Gloss on Psalm 4:7: The light of thy countenance is signed upon us, etc., where there is distinguished the image of creation which is reason, of recreation, and of similitude: for it is asked for what 'reason' stands there. If it is said, that for the rational nature. Against this:

§ 12. 1. An angel is a rational nature: and yet is not said to be made to the image. However, the contrary of this seems to be through Gregory, who says on that passage of Ezekiel 28:12: Thou wast the seal of resemblance, etc., that an angel has a more express image of God than man.

§ 13. 2. Also, Damascene: "God is the maker and creator of the Angels, leading them from non-being to being, creating them according to His own image, and giving them an incorporeal nature."

§ 14. 3. Also, On that passage of Ezekiel 28:12: Thou wast the seal, etc., the Gloss says: "The King of Tyre resigned, that is, destroyed, the image of God to which he was made." And it speaks of the devil: therefore an angel is to the image of God.

§ 15. Moreover, 1. It is asked concerning the image of recreation: for either that is grace, or virtue. If grace. Against this: Grace makes its possessor pleasing, and does not respect this power or that one: but the image consists in determinate powers: therefore the image is not grace. If on account of this it is said that it is a virtue, then it is asked, What is that virtue, or those virtues? If it is said what is commonly said, that they are faith, hope, and charity. Against this: None of those is in the memory: therefore this part of the image which is memory is not recreated.

§ 2. 2. Moreover, Bernard says that God is going to be for reason the beauty of light, for the will the multitude of peace, and for the memory the continuation of eternity: therefore it seems that light, peace, and eternity are the image of recreation.

§ 3. Moreover it is asked, Why is the image not posited in political virtues, just as in theoretical ones?

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that the image in truth is only according to the higher part of the soul, which is called mind or spirit by Augustine.

§ 5. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in exterior vision there is not an image, but a certain likeness of an image in this, that three certain things are united: yet it is not the true ratio of an image, because they are not of one substance, like those which are in the mind.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that Damascene calls any agreement from nature an image: and because free choice is spiritual, therefore he says it is an image.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that higher reason respects operable things, albeit through the reasons of divine right: but the powers of the image are simpler, in that they are ordered only to the knowledge of the true and the good which God is, and of that in which God is grasped as His image: and because sometimes Augustine is found to say that the image is the soul according to the higher part of reason, it must be said that he then takes the higher part broadly insofar as it comprehends the powers of the image, and synderesis, and also that part which is specially called the higher part.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that in the image specially one of the powers ought to be cognitive, because the image appropriately belongs to the Son who is the image of the Father: but none of the powers of the vegetative soul is cognitive: and therefore it in no way befits it to be an image.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that in that Gloss reason is posited for the higher part, which is called mind or spirit: and the image is in it in potency, as in a subject in which imitation can be distinguished in its powers.

§ 11. To what is asked, Whether an angel is to the image? it must be said that 'image' can note agreement in interior things only, or simultaneously in interior and exterior things. If in the first way, then I do not see why it should not be said with the Saints that an angel is to the image, just like man: since in it three powers are in one essence, just as also in man. But if it notes both agreements, then it is not to the image: for agreement in exterior things is in three ways: in that all are from one man, just as the Father is the principle of the whole deity: and in that the soul is whole everywhere in its body, as is contained below (dist. 8), just as God is whole everywhere in the world, which does not belong to an angel. But the third is in that man is unible [capable of being united] to God, but not an angel.

§ 12. To what is asked concerning the image of recreation, it must be said that it is properly speaking according to the three theological virtues, namely faith, hope, and charity. For hope, in that it expects indefectibility, expresses that which appropriately belongs to memory, because it is retentive of the divine likeness or presence: although in itself it is in the irascible faculty.

To that which is objected concerning Bernard, it must be responded that he enumerates glorifying rather than creating.

To the other it must be said, that the powers of the image are immediately in God, but the political virtues are not: and therefore in those there is not the image of recreation.

Articulus 22 — With Respect To Which Object Or Knowable The Image Is

In respect to which object or knowable thing is there an image?

Fourthly, it is asked, In respect to which object or knowable thing is an image said?

1. And it seems that it is in respect to all: because in all there is this, that the intellect can be informed from memory, and the will from both.
2. Furthermore, this seems to be what Augustine wants when he says that the whole memory is in the intellect and will, and conversely: however, these powers do not have totality except in respect to objects: therefore it seems that the image is distinguished in respect to all objects.

But ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine above enumerates thus:

The mind remembers itself, understands itself, loves itself: therefore it seems that it is taken only in respect to itself.

1. Furthermore, the knower and the known have similarity with the Father and the Son: therefore the known should be as much as the knower: but when the soul knows lower things, the known is not as much as the knower: therefore in these there is no image.
2. Furthermore, in those there is not as much will as there is intellect frequently: therefore it seems that in such objects there is no image in the soul.
3. If perhaps it is said that this is true: but it is only in respect to itself, and not in respect to God. On the contrary, when it is in respect to itself, the soul itself is the object of cognition, and in the object the cognition of the intellect stands: therefore the reason stands in itself: therefore it does not lead to God: but it is of the image to lead to God: therefore in respect to itself as object there is no image.
4. If it is said against this, that it is only in respect to God: this will be against Augustine who says: The mind remembers itself, understands itself, etc. Furthermore, when it remembers God and understands, the intellect and the understood are not proportionate, but distant: therefore then the knower does not equal the known, which seems to be against the nature of the image.

Solution. To this without prejudice I say, that it is in respect to the true and good which the soul itself is, which is always present to itself, and nothing is so present to the soul, as Augustine says, as it is to itself in respect to the true and good naturally in it, which is God: how this is can be thus evident. Someone sees Hercules in the face, and then determinately knows Hercules, and his eye is formed according to the species of Hercules. Someone also does not see Hercules in the face, but sees him in a mirror, or in a stature very similar to him: and then his vision in the sense takes one, and through that another comes into reason: and in both acts he sees Hercules, but in the first vision he sees more certainly. Thus I say, that the soul through intellect, memory, and will can be immediately carried into God: and then in act it imitates and is formed to the Trinity and unity. Someone also can turn to the powers themselves as they are from each other, and they equal themselves: and thus again it tends to the Creator, but it begins from the creature: and if sometimes by knowing itself it does not notice that from this it is led into God, then habitually or potentially it imitates. However, in respect to other knowables there is no image, in my judgment, but the intellect of lower things. However, some here say very differently, of whose opinions it would be very long to dispute.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that not in all is the intellect informed from memory: but in some the Generative intellect is memory, as in acquired habits: although conversely it is in the final.

To the other it must be said, that the whole memory is not taken there according to the multitude of all objects, but according to many reasons of knowing in respect to only two objects: and this can be seen: because if it were taken in respect to others, then the mind and knowledge would not be substance, but two diverse things.

To another it must be said, that cognition does not stand in its object, but rather is actually or potentially referred to God, as to an exemplar.

To another it must be said, that two things are attended to in the image, namely substantiality, and equality: and secondly, the beauty and charm of color: and as to the first, namely consubstantiality and equality, the image is more truly in the soul, when it remembers, understands, and wills itself, than when it remembers, understands, and wills God who is not equated to it. But if it is taken in the second way: because no charm can be without God, therefore then it more truly imitates, when the true and good which is God is taken.

And let these things said before the Letter suffice.

Articulus 23 — To Know Whether It Is Understood Of Natural Knowledge Or Of The Knowledge Of Grace

To know whether it is understood concerning natural knowledge, or concerning the knowledge of grace?

Then let the text of the first part of the chapter be taken upon this: Where in the mind. And let it be asked, Whether it is understood of human knowledge which knows God, or can know, etc., concerning the knowledge of nature according to which to know is to hold knowledge within oneself, or concerning the knowledge of grace? If in the first way, then superfluously is added this which says, or can know: because it is the same to be able to know from the power of habit, which is to hold the knowledge of God within oneself. But if in the second way, then it does not seem that the image always remains in the soul: because it is not always in grace which causes imitation.

Solution. It must be said that it can be understood in both ways: and if it is understood concerning natural knowledge, then to know is referred to the habit, and to be able to know to the power: because in these two ways the Trinity is distinguished in this distinction, as has been held above: and thus it is clear, that although to know and to be able to know are together, yet not always according to the same: because to know from habit, which is the knowledge preserved within the mind, is not the same as to be able to know from power alone. But if it is understood concerning the knowledge of grace, then to know is referred to the external imitation of the image, which is not substantial to it, but is for well-being, like color and beauty: but to be able to know is referred to the power, and to grace.

Why the image is not according to the lower powers?

ARTICULUS XXIV, Why the image is not according to the lower powers?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Nevertheless, the image of that than which nothing better exists, etc. Why cannot it be the image of God according to the lower powers?

Soturio. This happens on account of the simplicity of the object which is God, and the mind itself. For these are most simply in the mind: because by essence, and therefore it cannot be in it except according to its most simple part.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Image Can Be Lost

Whether the image can be lost?

Whether the image can be lost?

Then it is asked about this: For even if the participation of God is lost, etc.

Against this, it seems to be what is said in Psalm 20: "In your city, you will reduce their image to nothing." And elsewhere, Isaiah 40:8: "The face of their countenance is burned;" therefore, the image can be lost.

Solution. It must be said that the image can be considered in its substantial aspects, which are form and figure: and that image is in the three powers, namely memory, intelligence, and will, which cannot be lost: because according to Dionysius, natural gifts are not lost. However, in these, it is according to what by knowledge naturally inserted and co-created in itself, they are turned towards the true and good which God is, and towards the true and good which the mind is. In another way, the image is considered in the beauty which is for well-being: and in place of that beauty which color and gilding and such things bring, there is in spiritual things the participation of God through grace: and with respect to this external beauty of divine rather than the distinction of persons in one essence image, the image can be lost: and thus the authorities introduced are understood, and thus it is sometimes burned by the fire of concupiscence.

Whether the parts of the image are impressed by the whole Trinity, or by distinct persons?

Then it is asked concerning this which he himself says, "For indeed the image of God is the mind which is capable," etc.

1. For if it is the image of the three persons, it seems that it is sealed in the mind in the manner in which the figure of a seal is sealed in wax: but in the figure, the head seals the head, and the hand the hand, and the chest the chest, and so on for the others: therefore, by similarity, the Father seems to seal the memory, and the Son the intelligence, and the Holy Spirit the will: therefore now the works of the Trinity in the creation of the image will be diverse, which is false.
2. Furthermore, the image does not seem to pertain to the interior, but only to the exterior, namely in the figure and composition of the members and quantity: but to remember, to understand, to will, are intimate to the mind: therefore it seems the mind should rather be called the son of the Trinity than the image: because the son is the image in the interior and exterior.
3. Furthermore, Augustine says that man is the image and likeness, having the image in the power of understanding, and the likeness in the power of loving: but the power of loving is the will: therefore the will is rather of the likeness of God than of the image.
4. Likewise, the power of understanding is only intelligence: therefore memory and also will seem to be superfluous.

Solution. It must be said that it is not so in the creation of the image, as in the impression of the figure of the seal in wax: and this is because the figure which is in the seal does not have a head in the foot, and in the hand, and in other members, but has distinct members: but in the uncreated Trinity the Father has all the essential attributes which belong to the Son, and conversely: and similarly for the Holy Spirit. Hence, although memory is attributed to the Father, nevertheless he has both intelligence, and the Holy Spirit similarly: and therefore they impress memory indivisibly, and they impress intelligence indivisibly, and will indivisibly: although by attribution of some fitting thing memory belongs to the Father, and in- telligence to the Son, and will to the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said that although to remember and to understand and to will are interior to God, and interior to the rational soul, nevertheless because they are not in a nature which is of one reason in God and in the soul, it cannot be said to be the son: because the father and the son are always in one nature, or at least in a nature which is according to reason one in both: this, however, is not here: and therefore the nature of the soul receives these as if certain extrinsic things: because what is quantity in material things, this is power in potentative or spiritual virtues: and what is the configuration of external lines in figure in material things, this is the fittingness of powers to act and object in potentative things: and therefore the mind is called the image of God, and not the son.

To the other it must be said that when it is said that man has the image in the power of understanding, the power of understanding is taken generally for the power ordered to understanding and for its effect: ordered to understanding is memory by holding knowledge with itself, and similarly intelligence by intuiting itself, or God in the knowledge held with itself: but when from such knowledge love always arises, the effect of those two according to their order to act is will. But when it is said having likeness in the power of loving, the power of loving is taken from the habit of charity and grace: because that habit colors the image, as was said above. Hence certain Saints say that man lost the likeness of God through sin, and withdrew into the region of unlikeness: but he was wounded in the image: and thus it is clear that the power of loving is not that will which is part of the image according to the nature of the mind.

To the last it must be said that the power of understanding is not only intelligence: but also memory, and will, as has already been said.

Articulus 27 — How These Five Differ In Order, To Know Oneself, To Understand Oneself, To Will Oneself, To Discern Oneself, And To Think Oneself

How do these five differ in order: knowing oneself, understanding oneself, willing oneself, discerning oneself, and thinking oneself?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Behold, indeed, the mind remembers itself, understands itself, loves itself, etc.

1. For it seems that remembering and understanding are the same: for if memory here is taken for past, present, and future things, and understanding is of the same and in the same way, it seems that understanding and remembering are the same. But that understanding is of the same and in the same way is proven: because understanding is of the simple nature or species of a thing: these, however, abstract from all temporal difference, and in one way agree with past, present, and future, as is clear in the species or nature of man, which, insofar as it is understood, agrees with men existing under any temporal difference according to the same nature: therefore it seems that understanding is of the same, and in the same way, of which memory is: therefore remembering is the same as understanding.
2. Likewise, Augustine says that the mind knows itself: but knowing oneself is understanding oneself, since it is clear that he does not speak of sensible cognition: therefore the act of the intellect agrees with memory: but powers are distinguished by acts: therefore memory is understanding.
3. Likewise, Augustine in book X of the Trinity: It is difficult in the mind to distinguish its memory from its understanding: as if these are not two, but one called by two names, as is apparent in that matter where these are very much joined, and one is not preceded by the other in time, and love itself is not felt to be, since it is not brought forth by need, because what is loved is always present. From this two things are held, namely, that these three are always together, and that it is difficult to distinguish between them.

Solution. It must be said according to Augustine in the last authority, that although it is difficult to discern between these when they are taken with respect to those things which are always present in the soul, like the substance of the mind and God, nevertheless they have a distinction. Hence according to Augustine, to know is nothing other than to hold the knowledge of a thing with oneself: therefore, since it is clear from the above that this agrees with memory, it is evident that memory knows itself and God with this knowledge. However, to understand oneself according to Augustine is nothing other than to behold and see oneself or God in that knowledge: for it is not the same to hold the knowledge of a thing with oneself, and to behold the thing of which that species or knowledge is: and therefore it is different to understand oneself, and to know oneself: but will is the approval, or love proceeding from such a word of intellect and memory: and therefore Augustine says in book IX of the Trinity: The word which we now intend to indicate is knowledge with love: but nevertheless it is different to discern oneself, and to think oneself, than to know oneself or to understand: because Augustine says that to discern oneself is the same as to show oneself to differ from other things, and this the soul does not always do: but to think oneself is as if to co-agitate oneself, that is, to turn upon oneself, comparing the nature of the mind to its parts and powers and passions, and thus the mind does not always do: and thus the difference of these five is clear, namely, knowing oneself, understanding oneself, willing oneself, discerning oneself, thinking oneself.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that understanding is indeed of the same with the abstraction of time of which memory is, but not in the same way, because memory only knows by retaining the knowledge of the thing according to species, or according to substance, if the thing is present in the soul by itself, but the intellect beholds the thing in the knowledge which is the species of the thing or its substance if it is present in the soul by itself.

To the other, it must be said that as is clear, knowing oneself, as taken by Augustine, is not the same as understanding: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the third, it must be said that in truth it is difficult to distinguish between these three, which are above that which is naturally in the soul by itself: and this because then in some way they are always in act. And because the intellect always beholds, it does not seem to differ from knowing by memory: similarly because love does not proceed from the need of a thing, that is, which is sometimes not had, and then there is appetite for it: and sometimes it is had, and then there is love of it. But because it proceeds from that which is always naturally in the mind, it always proceeds: and therefore the love of oneself and of God is not perceived as the love of neighbor or another, which is sometimes in the absence of the mind, sometimes in presence: because Augustine says that the appetite of the sought thing is the same as the love of the possessed: and therefore when the mind seeks itself, when it seeks not to know, but to discern, the same appetite is greater of the thing discerned when it has had discernment of itself. Since therefore the judgment is the same concerning similar things, and since it has itself according to knowledge always, and never seeks to know itself, because what is had is not sought, it will always love itself known: but how this is, will be in the question below.

Articulus 28 — Whether Memory And Intelligence Are Relatives, As Is Said In The Text

Whether memory and intelligence are relative as it is said in the text?

Whether memory and intelligence are relative as it is said in the text?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Memory indeed is said to be towards something, and intelligence, etc.

1. For this does not seem so: because relatives are those whose very being is to be towards something, as father and son, and the like: but memory, according to the act of being which is imported in the name, is not towards something: therefore it seems that he speaks falsely.
2. Furthermore, it cannot be understood that memory is memorable memory because thus Augustine would say nothing, since he wishes that these are distinguished by their relations to each other, like Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit: therefore memory is said towards intelligence, and will: and conversely those towards each other, and towards memory: but this in no way seems so: because memory is not said towards conversion with the intellect: for memory is not said intellect memory, and intellect memory intellect: and similarly will is not said towards conversion with those two.
3. Furthermore, one of the relatives is defined by the other: but one of these powers is not defined by the other: therefore they are not relative to each other.

Solution. It must be said that these are relative not simply, but in a certain respect; for there are certain things which according to the whole being that is imported in the name, are relative, like Father, and Son, and Lord, and Servant, because such names are imposed from respect, and the quality of them which they signify with substance is respect: but some are not simply signifying respect, but it is understood together in them, because they are imposed from something other than respect, which nevertheless is in no way separable from respect, like knowledge which is not separated from respect to the knowable, yet is imposed from something other than that respect. Similarly, it is with memory, which is imposed from something else, but nevertheless this is not separated from respect to the memorable: and similarly intellect places respect to the intelligible and will to the willed.

To the other, it must be said that intelligence is referred to memory, not under the notion of intelligence, but under the notion of the memorable, because thus it is grasped by memory: and conversely memory to intellect under the notion of the intelligible, and will to these two under the notion of the memorable and intelligible: but these two conversely to will under the notion of the willed. Others say otherwise, namely, that memory as memory is not towards something, but as it is parent: and similarly intellect in that it is of this kind, is not towards something, but in that it is son, or offspring: in the same way will is not towards something as will, but in that it proceeds from these two, as from one principle of itself. But this is nothing: because Augustine says memory in that it is memory, is towards something: but not in that it is life, or mind, or essence: and therefore that solution which is against Augustine seems to be nothing.

Articulus 29 — Whether Memory Is Always In The Intellect And Will, And The Intellect In Memory And Will, And The Will In Memory And Intellect

Whether memory is always in the intellect and will, and the intellect in memory and will, and the will in memory and intellect?

Equal are also not only singular to singular, etc.

Here begins that part in which he touches upon the equality of the said powers. And it is divided into two parts: the first of which contains their equality in themselves; the second contains their equality according to their totality, and begins there, "And my whole memory," etc.

In the first chapter, he proves equality in two ways, namely, because all things are grasped by each, and each by each: just as memory grasps the intellect by itself, and is grasped by it by itself without conjunction to the will: and the will is grasped by itself by memory, and by itself by the intellect, and conversely: but all things by each, because memory grasps itself and the intellect and the will conjointly and simultaneously, and similarly the intellect with the other two conjointly, and in the same way the will grasps itself in conjunction with the other two. And this is the sentence of the first chapter.

But here arises a rather grave doubt: because according to what is said here, memory is always in the intellect and will: and the intellect is always in memory and will: because all things are in each, and this always, as Augustine proves. Prosario. That is in memory, which is present in memory, and does not stand apart: but the intellect and will do not stand apart from any part of the mind: therefore all things are in memory and all things in intelligence, and all things in will.

But on the contrary: 1. The Philosopher proves that when one power is in act, another is abstracted from act: therefore, when memory is in act, another is abstracted from act, and conversely: and when the will is in act, the other two are abstracted from act: therefore they cannot be together, as it seems.

1. Furthermore, what is it that Augustine says, that the mind understands itself, and this always, because it is always present to itself? For Augustine seems to be contrary to himself: because it was stated above, that in book XI of the Trinity he says, that for vision three things are required, namely, the seen, and the seer, and the intention of the will joining both: therefore also for understanding three things are required, namely, the understanding, and the understood, and the intention of the will joining both: however, although when the intellect understands itself, the intellect is always present to the understood, and conversely, yet the will of understanding is not always present: therefore it does not always understand itself.

2. Likewise, Augustine in book XI of the Trinity. Therefore, when the mind knows itself, it is the sole parent of its knowledge, for it is both the known and the knower: but it was knowable to itself even before it knew itself, but the knowledge of itself was not in it when it did not know itself: therefore it does not always know itself: therefore much more strongly it does not always understand itself.

3. Likewise, either to know itself is to know itself in its own nature, or to have demonstrative and natural knowledge of itself, or to behold itself according to act: for we do not say we know something in many ways. If in the first way, then the soul of anyone knows itself in its own nature according to act: but to know a thing in its own nature according to act is the most perfect consideration of the thing: therefore anyone would at all times consider the soul with the most perfect consideration, which is clearly false. If to know itself is to have natural and demonstrative knowledge of itself which teaches what a thing is in itself, and in its passions, or properties, then there is no man who does not have the whole knowledge of the soul with him: and we see this to be false, because we acquire all things with labor, study, even a little of it: but if to know itself is to behold itself through the intellect, then anyone always beholds himself through the intellect; and since we can know many things, but understand very little, we could never behold anything else through the intellect, which again is false: therefore it seems that the intellect does not always understand or see itself.

If this be conceded, on the contrary: 1. Every passive or receptive power is in act when the act is in it: and it is in act as long as the form is in it: and this is proved by induction in singulars. However, the intellect is a receptive power of the intelligible: therefore it is in act, with the intelligible act existing in it: but when the intellect understands itself, the intelligible is the same as the understanding: therefore just as the intellect is not absent from itself, so neither is the intelligible absent from it: therefore it is always in act according to this intelligible: and this is to be in act which is to understand: therefore it always understands itself.

1. Likewise, Aristotle in book III of the Soul says that the agent intellect is always in act: and since it is agent with respect to some intelligible, there will be some intelligible always terminating its action: but this is nothing other than what is always present to the intellect, and this is the intelligible which is the intellect itself: therefore the possible intellect is always illuminated by the light of the agent intellect: and this makes the possible intellect understand according to act: therefore the intellect always understands itself.

Solution. It must be said that a certain Philosopher, explaining Aristotle concerning the Intellect and the Intelligible, says that the intellect always sees itself, or always understands itself: and he says that it is the same to say that the intellect understands itself in every intelligible. For just as light is seen in every color, because color is the motive of sight according to the act of the lucid: so he says that the intellect is seen in every intelligible, because it is that which makes something intelligible in act, because its light abstracts the universal from the moving phantasm, and thus in the intelligible made according to act the agent intellect is seen. But because the possible intellect is not a receptive power of only one thing, like the particular sense, but is receptive of all, and composes and divides the received: therefore also when it receives the intelligible in itself, it receives the subject of the intelligible with the intelligible simultaneously, although it does not receive it as a subject. And the root of this Philosopher consists in this that the agent intellect is understood in two ways, namely, as distinct in its own nature, and thus not...

It is understood in every intelligible thing: either as the act and perfection of intelligible things according as they are intelligible, and thus it is understood in every intelligible thing: just as light is also seen in two ways, namely as a determinate object in itself, and as the perfection of colors, according to what Aristotle says in the book De Sensu et sensato, that color is the extremity of the transparent in a bounded body. In the same way, the possible intellect is understood in two ways: namely, in its proper nature according as it has being distinct from other intelligible things, and thus it is not always understood in act: or according as an intelligible thing is intelligible through this, that it is in the possible intellect itself, and thus it itself is understood in all intelligible things, and thus it always understands itself. But although this solution is sufficiently suitable for saving the statement of the Philosopher, nevertheless it in no way satisfies the statement of Augustine, who intends that beneath every other intelligible thing the intellect always understands itself, and the other two: and memory always remembers itself, and the other two: and the will always wills itself, and the other two. Hence without prejudice I say according to the aforementioned things, that to remember is nothing other than to retain the notion of a thing with oneself. But to understand is nothing other than to simply intuit oneself by the species of a notion or by the essence of a notion, without consideration of oneself and discernment of one's own nature, because this Augustine calls understanding oneself: and to discern oneself and to think of oneself say more, according to him, than to understand oneself. Since therefore understanding oneself does not posit a discernment of oneself, but a simple intuition without discernment and thinking, I say that it does not posit a conversion of the intellect to something that is outside itself to which it posits an agreement or difference of itself, nor to some property of its own which is thought to be in it or not to be in it. But this intuition is perfected by two things, namely an emitted intelligible light, and an object: and to intuit oneself is nothing other than to be presented as an object to oneself in that light. Since therefore the light of the agent intellect always shines upon the possible [intellect], because the agent is the form and act of the possible, the possible intellect is always presented as an object to itself in that light: and since this is to understand oneself according to Augustine, it always understands itself. And I say the same of memory and of will: because from the notion itself love always evaporates [or breathes forth], although not distinctly: just as neither the notion itself nor the intellect are taken as distinct from other things.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that sometimes one power abstracts another from act, and sometimes helps it toward act. For sometimes acts are ordered, such that one receives from another upon the same object, and then one does not impede the other, just as the sight of a man [does not impede] the phantasy of the same man, and the intellect concerning that same thing: but when they are not ordered upon the same thing, then one strongly existing in act impedes another from acting: just as when thinking about some intelligible thing with a strong and intense intellect, we do not notice those things which are before our eyes. But these three powers are ordered upon the same intelligible thing or object, as Augustine says: and therefore one does not destroy, nor impede the other in acting.

To the other it must be said, that for that understanding which is only being presented to oneself in the light of the agent intellect, the will is not required except as naturally following, and not according to act: but for that which is to discern one of the intelligible things from another, or to consider it in its proper nature, and parts and differences, for this an actual will conjoining both is required.

To the other it must be said, that that authority speaks of investigative memory, when it inquires about itself in comparison to another and discerns itself: because that is inquired into, and before this it was not possessed: and this is clear to one inspecting the original: because he speaks of inquiry there, when the mind seeks itself and finds itself.

To the other it must be said, that to know oneself is to have a notion with oneself, either by species or by presence, and to understand oneself is for oneself to be presented as an object in that notion and light of the agent intellect: and the division which that argument posits, holds in discretive knowledge, and not in this which according to nature is such, as we said.

But those things which are objected to the contrary we concede in this way, that the intellect is toward itself according to act, not that it is always converted upon itself by discerning, but that it is always presented as an object to itself in the aforesaid light.

I. How does memory contain all those three?

And I remember my whole memory, and intelligence, and will together. For what I do not remember by my memory, that is not in my memory: but nothing is so much in memory, as memory itself: therefore I remember the whole. Also, whatever I understand, I know that I understand: and I know that I will whatever I will: but whatever I know I remember. Therefore I remember my whole intelligence, and my whole will.

K. How does intelligence contain all those three?

Similarly when I understand these three, I understand them all together: for neither is there anything of intelligible things which I do not understand, except what I am ignorant of. But what I am ignorant of, I neither remember, nor will. Therefore whatever of intelligible things I do not understand, consequently I also neither remember, nor will. Therefore whatever of intelligible things I remember and will, consequently I understand.

Articulus 30 — He Shows The Equality Of These Powers, Memory, Will, And Intellect

§ 30. He shows the equality of these powers, memory, will, and intellect?

And my whole memory, etc.

Here begins the second [part] of this part in which he proves the equality of these powers according to their totality: and first concerning memory, and he reasons thus:

1. Whatever is in memory I remember: the whole memory is in memory: therefore I remember the whole.
2. Also, Whatever I understand I know, and whatever I know I remember, because I hold the notion of it with me, and this is to remember: therefore whatever I understand I remember, and whatever I will I remember: therefore these three whole things are in memory.

Consequently he proves that these three whole things are in the intellect, there, Similarly when I understand these three, etc. And his argument is such: Let it be supposed that whatever I am ignorant of, I neither remember, nor will, because I do not have a notion of it with me: therefore I do not remember it: and there is no will of that of which there is no notion with me: therefore of that which is ignored, there is no will.

Having this, one proceeds thus:

Whatever of intelligible things I remember and will, this is presented as an object to me in my notion: and to be presented as an object to me in my notion is nothing other than to understand: therefore whatever of intelligible things I remember and will, I understand all these: but I remember and will all intelligible things which are in my notion: therefore I understand all things: therefore memory according to all memorable things, and will according to all willed things is in my intellect.

Consequently he proves, that the will encloses the whole memory and intelligence thus:

Whatever whole I use, the whole is enclosed in the will through the definition of that which is to use posited above which is, To use is to assume something into the faculty of the will: but I use all intelligible and memorable things: therefore I will all intelligible and memorable things: therefore the whole memorable and intelligible things are enclosed in the will.

From this it is further concluded in the same chapter, that these three are equal and one according to life, and mind, and essence: and by distinguishing he touches upon, how mind is taken: and further it is shown, how memory is taken here according as it is a part of the image.

And this is the sentence of this Letter [text].

§ 31. Whether these three: memory, intelligence, will, can be called wholes?

But a doubt arises from this that he says these are whole and equal:

1. For since these are simple, such that they do not have part and part, they seem not to have totality: therefore he incorrectly says whole.
2. Moreover, let it be granted that these are parts of the mind: but a supposition is that a whole is greater than its part: therefore it seems, that memory alone is not as great as intelligence and will together, which he already proved in the Letter.

1. The same objection is concerning equality: because equality is the same in quantity, as the Philosopher says: and these do not have quantity.

Solution. It must be said to this, that there is a potestative whole, and a whole in quantity. A potestative whole has potestative parts, and such a whole is the soul to its parts, which are the powers: and such a whole is also one power with respect to those things over which it has power as objects: and therefore we say, the whole power of Hercules can be divided into sixty, or into thirty, and a third is in twenty, and so on: and thus these powers are called a potestative whole with respect to their objects, and parts with respect to the soul.

To the other it must be said, that that supposition is understood of the quantity of dimension, and therefore it is posited in geometry: but in potestative things often one part is greater than many: but not greater than the whole: for in potestative things always what the inferior can do, the superior can also do and more: and therefore it is not converted: and therefore one of these, namely, constituting the image, is capable of as much as the other two with respect to objects, because in those they are equal, and one to one, and one to two, and one to all three: but it is true that one cannot act in as many ways upon those objects, as two or three can: because two can act in two ways, and three can act in three ways upon them.

To that which is objected concerning equality, the solution is clear: because they have a quantity of virtue, although they do not have a quantity of dimension.

Articulus 32 — Whether It Is True What The Master Says, "Whatever I Remember And Understand, This I Will"; And Whether The Evils Which We Understand, We Will

§ 32. Whether it is true what the Master says, Whatever I remember and understand, this I will: and, Whether we will the evil things which we understand?

But still further it is asked concerning this which he says: Whatever I remember and understand, this I also will, etc. For this is expressly taken in this which he says, that my will contains my whole intelligence and my whole mind.

1. For this seems false: because we understand and remember evil things: which nevertheless we do not will.
2. If perhaps someone wishes to say, as some say, that this is understood, as Augustine seems to determine here, namely while I use all that which I understand and remember: this is nothing: because thus it proves nothing: because according to this the will will not be equal to the others except in a qualified sense, namely in useful things which are loved by the love of use.
3. Therefore some have said otherwise, that it is understood of those things which are always in the intellect through themselves, just as those which have proper species in which they are known: but evil does not have a species, but rather a privation of species, mode, and order: and therefore the objection concerning evil things does not hold. Against this is what Augustine says in book IX of De Trinitate, where he speaks of this same objection having been made, and says thus: Nevertheless since even those things which we hate rightly displease us, and are rightly disapproved, their disapproval is approved, and pleases, and this is a word: therefore it seems that this equality also holds in the notion of vices.

4. Also, Augustine, in the same place: Neither does the notion of vices displease us, but the vices themselves.

For it pleases me that I know and the definition of what intemperance is, and this is its word. From this the same is held.

1. Because of this there are others who say that this equality is not taken according to the notions of those things which we remember and which we understand and will: because we understand many things according to the notion of evil, but nevertheless we do not will them: but it is taken according to the acts of these powers upon the objects: for we will to remember evil things and to understand evil things: and this seems to be taken by Augustine in the induced authorities. But against this is what Augustine in the same book, a little later says thus: Better is the imagination of a body in the mind than that species of a body, insofar as this is in a better nature, that is, in a vital substance just as the mind is. And from this it is taken, that in the notion of inferior things there is no equality: because the notion is better than the thing known: and so since equality is required for an image, there will not be an image in the notion of such things.
2. Also, Augustine, in the same place: When we know God, although we are made better than we were before we knew, and most of all the same pleasing and worthily loved notion is also a word, and that notion of ours becomes some likeness of God: nevertheless it is inferior, because it is in an inferior nature. For the mind is a creature, but God the Creator. From this it is taken, that neither is this equality in the memory and intellect and will of God: which nevertheless seems to be against the things determined above.
3. Also, Augustine, in the same place: When the mind itself knows and approves itself, thus the same notion is its word, such that it is completely on a par and equal to it, and identical: because neither is it a notion of an inferior essence, like a body, nor of a superior one, like God. And since a notion has a likeness to that thing which it knows, that is, of which it is a notion, this has a perfect and equal one, by which the mind itself which knows is known. And therefore it is both an image and a word, because it is expressed from it, when by knowing it is co-equated to the same, and what is begotten is equal to the begetter. From this it is expressly held, that this equality is not attended to except in the notion and memory and will, by which it knows itself, and understands itself, and wills itself, and that the image also is not except by this consideration.

4. Also, Augustine, in the same book: The word which we intend to insinuate, is knowledge with love: therefore since no knowledge necessarily has love with it except when the mind knows itself, this equality is only attended to, when the mind knows itself.
5. Moreover, Not every love suffices for the ratio of an image, but it must be equal to the knowledge: but this is not except in the knowledge of the mind by itself: therefore it ought not to be taken with respect to other knowable things.

Solution. It must be said, that two things perfect an image, namely the act of imitating the exemplar, and equality: and as for the act of imitating the image is more in the knowledge of the true and good which is God, than in the knowledge of the true and good which is the mind: because in the knowledge of that [i.e., God] the act of the intellect is conjoined, but in this [the mind] it does not have God except as in a mirror. But if the equality of the image is attended to which is principally proved here, then according to Augustine, it must be said, that it can still be attended to in two ways: for either equality is taken according to the acts proceeding from the powers upon the objects only, or according to the object and the power. If in the first way, then there is equality in the cognition of God and of oneself: because as much as one cognizes about God or about oneself by that cognition, so much one loves: and as much as one loves, so much one cognizes by another cognition in natural reason of which we are speaking. But if equality is attended to according to the objects and the powers, then it will not be, except in the knowable thing which is the mind itself, as Augustine says.

To that which is objected first, it seems well to me that that solution cannot stand: because it does not accord with the words of Augustine. And what the Master says, While I use all that, etc., it must be said, that he takes use according to the definition of Victorinus for the act of any power, according as we say, that to use is to act by some power: and the sense is: While I use, etc., that is, while by an act of the will I am converted upon all memorable and intelligible things.

But to that which is objected concerning the other solution, we say that that solution is not according to the mind of Augustine, as was proved.

To the other it must be said, that Augustine does not mean, that in such knowable things there is the ratio of an image: but rather that in every cognition there is in some way a loved notion, although that notion and that love do not suffice for the ratio of an image, for the reason that equality is lacking.

To all the others the solution is clear through the distinction posited at the beginning of the solution.

Here one must attend diligently, etc.

In this part the Master determines the doubtful things arising from the preceding determination. And it has two principal parts, in the first of which he forms an objection against the determined things, and in the second he applies a solution, there, O, But now it must be seen how these three, etc.

But the objection is formed in two ways, namely from the statement of Augustine who said, that they are the essence of the soul, although nevertheless they are properties: and this in the prior chapter, M. And from the statement of Augustine, by which he says, that in a wondrous way they are inseparable, since they are referred to one another, there, N,

And these three also are referred to themselves, etc. Through this division the sentence of the Letter is clear.

Articulus 33 — Whether The Soul According To Substance Is Composite

§ 33. Whether the soul according to its substance is composite?

Here arises the question, Whether the soul is its own powers?

And because this question cannot be conveniently determined according to the intellect, unless it is first known, whether the soul itself in its substance is composite: therefore it is first necessary to ask, Whether the soul itself is composite ? And having had this that it is composite, consequently it must be determined, how its powers are related to it.

It seems concerning the first, that the soul is simple.

1. Every composite in itself is a this something [hoc aliquid] in nature: the soul is not a this something in nature: therefore it itself is not composite. The proof of the first and second is written in the second book of De Anima, where the Philosopher says thus: Let us say therefore that there is a certain genus of those things which are substance: but of this one [part] is indeed as matter, which according to itself is not a this something: but another is form and species, according to which it is now called a this something: and a third is what is from these, which is a this something. And below he concludes the second, saying that the soul is the first act of a physical body having life in potency: therefore since species and act are not a this something, the soul is not a composite substance.
2. Also, Every substance composite according to essential parts, is perfect in itself: no substance perfect in itself is the species and form of another: therefore no composite substance can be the species and form of another. But the first is proved from this that a composite by essence is not except that a thing be perfected in its proper being in itself. But the second is proved from this that having being in itself does not seek another in which it may be. Thence it is further objected from the destruction of the consequent: The soul is the species and form of another, because of a physical body having life in potency: therefore the soul is not composite in itself.
3. Also, Every essential composite, has the first parts of substance: but the first parts of substance are matter and form: therefore every composite in its being, is composed of matter and form; but the soul is not composed of matter and form: therefore it is not composite. The first is proved from the authority induced above, in which the Philosopher says, that substance is a certain genus, of which this indeed is potency, but this is species and act: therefore whatever things are composite in the genus of substance, are composed of potency and act. The second is proved in the first book of De Anima, where the Philosopher says, that the intellect has nothing prior to itself, out of which it is, like from matter.

4. Also, Augustine in the book De Spiritu et anima: The soul is a simple substance, and is whatever it has.

5. Also, Damascene: The soul does not have another intellect besides itself: but whatever is that which it has, is simple: therefore the soul is simple. And because we have posited many things concerning this elsewhere, let these suffice here.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. According to the Philosopher something is corruptible in two ways, namely, because it is from contraries: or because it is brought down through being upon a composite from contraries, or conjoined to it essentially, and that is corrupted by accident: but the soul is thus brought down upon a composite from contraries: therefore it is corruptible: therefore it is composite: for nothing of simple things is corrupted.

1. Also, Everything which moves another, is a being perfect in itself: but the soul moves the body: therefore the soul is a being perfect in itself. The proof of the first is, that everything which moves, acts: but nothing acts unless it is perfect in act. But the second is clear through this that the rational soul is compared to the body, like a sailor to a ship.

2. Also, A simple form does not have being except in the matter in which it is, or in reason: if therefore the soul is a simple form, it will not have being except in the matter in which it is, or in reason. On the contrary: Let the body be destroyed: therefore then the soul will not be except in reason: and this is an error.

3. Also, Everything which is a this and this, is composite in essence: the soul is a this and this: therefore it is composite in essence. The first is self-evident. The second is written in the third book of De Anima consequently: because in the soul there is an intellect by which it is to become all things, and an intellect by which it is to make all things: and this is to act, and to suffer: and since every acting is from act, and suffering from potency, it itself will be composed of act and potency, as it seems.

1. Moreover, The first composition is from act and potency, but the second composition is from subject and accident: therefore where there is a second composition, of necessity the first is presupposed: but in the soul there is a second composition, because all posit that sciences and virtues are in the soul: therefore in it there is a first composition, which is in the essence. If perhaps it be said, that these two compositions are not ordered as cause and caused. On the contrary: To substand, and to be perfected, and to receive acts, belong to matter and are substantial properties: therefore in whatever they are found, in that there is matter, or another thing which is like matter: but they are found in every composite with the second composition: therefore they are found for the sake of the first composition: and thus the first composition is the cause of the second. This same thing is taken from the definition of accidental form, of which it is said, that it is contingent to the composition. Also, that it happens to be in the same, and not to be in it, besides this that it is part of its being.

2. Also, Boethius in book I of De Trinitate: A simple form can be a subject to nothing. And many other things concerning this can be adduced, which are found handed down by us elsewhere.

Solution. I consent to this part, that the soul is essentially composite, but not of matter and form: and this is because, the Philosopher says in the ninth book of the First Philosophy, that matter is known through its potency to motion, and mutation: to motion, as in the heaven: to mutation, as in generable and corruptible things, according to which matter is also defined in book I of De Generatione et Corruptione, that it indeed is through itself, and primarily the subject of generation and corruption, and consequently also of the others. But in the soul a potency of this kind is not found: and therefore Boethius at the end of the book De Duabus naturis in una persona Christi, says that spiritual things do not have matter. But the Doctors say, that it is composed of that which is [quod est], and that by which it is [quo est]: and then that which is differs from matter, just as a supposit differs from the potency to the form to which it is supponated. For that which is, is a this something which is predicable of that which it is: but that by which it is is not found posited by the Author: but Boethius posits being [esse]: and this is the essence according to the act which it has in that very thing which is, that is, in a this something, or in this supposit: hence in such things the individuation of being itself is from the properties which follow the that which is itself, according to which it is a this something demonstrative to the intellect to here and now. From these things I say that the soul is composite, and an Angel similarly. Hence that by which it is differs from form: because form is separable, and is the form of a part which is matter: but that by which it is or being is not separated from that which is, and is the form of the whole, which expresses the whole being of that which it is by way of formal being, and just like the being of the species in this individual, according to what Boethius says, that the species is the whole being of individuals: because whatever is after the species itself, is from individuating principles: and in this way I say that the soul is a composite substance.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that this proposition, Whatever is composite, etc., is understood of those things which are only composite substances, and not also forms: but the rational soul is a substance and a form on account of a twofold comparison of itself to the body, to which it is compared as act and form, and as a mover: and therefore also the Philosopher does not define it there except as it is a form or species, not as it is a mover: and therefore he says that it is an act: but it is not only an act, as he himself proves below, but also a mover, like the sailor of a ship, who is in himself a certain being and separable from the ship.

To the other it must be said, that no substance wholly perfect in itself is a species: but the soul according to one consideration of itself is a species, by which namely it confers being to a body of this kind having life in potency: but in another way it is a substance, namely as it is a mover: and therefore it is separable from it: and this is clear from this that whatever is a perfection of something in such a way that neither according to itself nor according to its parts is it an act mixed with it, that is separable from it: but the rational soul is not the act of any body, as the Philosopher says: therefore it itself is separable from it.

To the other it must be said, that the first parts of substance are diversified according to the diversity of substances: for corruptible substances with incorruptible ones (as the Philosopher says) do not have a potency of the same ratio. Similarly spiritual and corporeal things are not of the same genus. And therefore it is not necessary that the principles be of the same genus: but in incorruptible things form is taken from the intellect of the species according to being, and that which is substantiating that in which the form itself is substantiated, is taken through the intellect of that which is the supposit: just as the Philosopher says in book II of De Caelo et Mundo: When I say, heaven, I say form: when I say, this heaven, I say matter. But in spiritual things there is even less of the ratio of matter: and therefore it is taken through demonstration, when it is said, this soul, or this Angel: but this is that which the thing is. And if it be said, that the Philosopher says that the same in number is the same in matter, it must be said, that matter is taken for the property of matter which is to divide and individuate the form according to the being which it has in this subject.

To the other it must be said, that the soul is simple by a certain simplicity, namely that it is present to any power of its own through its essence and substance, which could not be if those powers were divisively distant among themselves.

To the other it must be said, that Damascene takes besides or outside against certain people who said that the intellect is not a part of the soul, but an illustration of intelligence upon it: and he does not mean that the intellect properly speaking is a part of it.

The other arguments adduced to the opposite we concede, except this alone that we do not say that it is from matter and form. For the intellect by which it is to become all things is not matter, or from matter: although it has some material potency, and this is called matter by certain Philosophers.

§ 34. Whether the soul is its own powers?

Next it is asked, Whether the soul is its own powers? But it seems that it is not.

1. Nothing is that which it has except God: the soul is not God: therefore it is not that which it has: but it has powers: therefore it itself is not its own powers.
2. Also, In everything which is below the first, to be able [posse] and to be [esse] differ more than that which is [quod est] and to be [esse]. Proof. To be able is in the genus of quality, and to be is in substance: but that which is and to be are both in substance: if therefore in the soul that which is and that by which it is or to be differ, much more strongly do to be and to be able differ in it.

3. Also, If by essence the intellect of the soul and the will of the soul are the same: and whatever things are the same to one and the same, they themselves are the same: then the intellect will be the will.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Against this is what Augustine says, that they are one life, one mind, and one essence. [54]

1. Also, Augustine in the book De Spiritu...

§ 1. [so] too the soul: God is all of His own things: and the soul is some of its own things: it has natural things, such as intellect, memory, and the like, and it is all those things: it also has accidental things, and it is not those things. And there are many other things in that book concerning this.

§ 2. 3. Also, Bernard on the Canticles: I intuit three things in the soul: memory, intelligence, and will: and these three are the soul itself.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said that in truth the powers of the soul are properties, as the Master says, and in one way they are substantial, in another way they are consequent upon being. For if the soul is considered in its being according as it is a certain spiritual substance, thus they are consequent upon being, and are principled by being itself, and by what it is, just as the agent intellect would be from being itself, and the possible intellect from what it is, and the like. But if the soul is considered as a substance acting upon external things and upon the body, thus the soul is taken as a potestative whole, whose power is completed in its powers: and then its complete power is composed of the particular powers of the faculties, and thus they are substantial to it, without which it is not completed in the perfection of its ability to act.

§ 4. Therefore, to the first it must be said that the soul is not essentially whatever it has: but when it is said, the soul is its own power, it is a predication of a potestative whole concerning a substantial part of its power, which is present to it according to a complete or incomplete notion: for according to the incomplete notion there is power in the lower things, but according to the complete in the higher: because the higher part of a potestative whole always posits the power of the lower part: and because these are of the higher things, namely the powers of the image, therefore predication concerning them is more fitting: but nevertheless it is still somewhat improper.

§ 5. To the other it must be said, that those three are the soul according to a predication of a whole concerning its potestative parts taken simultaneously, but not through essence. And so that this may be better understood, it must be said that one thing is essential, and another is substantial, and [another is] an accidental accident. Essential is what is a part of the essence, in which a thing simply is in its primary composition: just as body and soul are essential to man, and 'that which is' and 'that by which it is' of the soul. Substantial, however, is what confers being out of a certain composition upon the composite, and it is impossible for it to be lacking to the thing, as reason, and intellect, and such things which are parts completing the power of the soul according as it is the mover of the body, and which complete the being of the body, according as it is moved by the soul. Hence the Philosopher says that just as the soul is the perfection of the whole, so the parts of the soul are the perfections of the parts, and therefore they are substantial, that is, completing the substance of the soul according as it itself is the substance of the body which it moves, not in itself alone, but also in the parts: or according to itself, as reason is of the substance of its power according to itself, but sense according to a part of the power which it flows into the body in which it is. Accidental, however, is what arrives after being is complete, and does not confer being on the composite, since it is possible for the composite to be without it. Although it was said above in the objection that a natural power is in the genus of quality: it must nevertheless be said that a power is naturally considered in two ways, namely insofar as it is ordered to act and consequent upon the being of the composite, or is a principle of acting in that in which it is: and thus it is in the genus of quality. It can also be considered insofar as it is referred to constituting the power of a substance which is a form and a mover in that it is not only the perfection of the whole, but also of the parts according to its parts: and thus it is prior to being and [is among] substantial things: just as on another side one can see in the body, in which there are commixtion, complexion, composition, distinction, organization: which although they are properties of the body, nevertheless insofar as they make the matter of the soul by which it can be moved and perfected, they are prior to being: but insofar as they are ordered to subsequent operations in which the powers of the soul operate, they are subsequent to being. And thus it is clear, that although according to the mode of predicating they are in the quality of such a power of the soul: nevertheless insofar as all of them complete this whole which is the perfect soul in its power to perfect the body and move it in whole and in parts, thus they are of the substance itself. And this is drawn from the second book of On the Soul, where the Philosopher says thus: "But it is necessary to consider in the parts what was said, namely, that the soul is the perfection of a physical body potentially having life, for if an eye were an animal, the soul would certainly be its sight, that is, the substance of the eye according to its notion: but the eye is matter, which being deficient it is not indeed an eye except equivocally, like one of stone, or painted. Therefore it is necessary to accept the likeness which is in a part, in the whole living body, such that as part is to part, so also the whole sense is to the whole body which is sensitive according as it is such."

§ 7. Here it is to be noted that 'mind' is said in four ways, namely sometimes memory: as Augustine says, that 'the mind remembers itself'; sometimes it is called the intellect examining a thing, and it is thus taken by John Damascene, and thus it is said from 'metior, metiris' (I measure, you measure), because by measuring the notions of a thing, it examines the thing: and sometimes it is called the higher part of the rational soul, in which there are the three powers of the image of the soul: sometimes it is called the whole rational soul, or intellectual nature, just as the blessed Dionysius often calls the Angels divine minds.

§ 8. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 9. "Nevertheless let him beware lest this, etc." Here begins the third part of that part which is about the first image: and here the Master assigns the difference between the image and the exemplar: and upon this he posits three small chapters, in the first of which he says that in many respects the dissimilarity of the created image to the uncreated one is greater than their agreement. In the second, he touches upon a certain similarity, namely that man has these three, and is not these three: but he has them in a part of himself, and therefore that part is called the image, and the whole man by grace of that part, just as a board is called an image by grace of the picture: and this begins there, at Q, "Which can briefly be shown, etc." In the third, he shows another dissimilarity: because those three in the image are in one person: but in the exemplar the three persons are one God, and not of one God: and this begins there, at R, "Again, etc."

§ 14. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 15. "It can also in another way, etc." Here begins that part in which he distinguishes the Trinity with respect to habit. And it has four parts: in the first of which he says in which things as in parts this image is, because in mind, knowledge, and love. Secondly, he shows how one of the parts of the image proceeds from another: and this begins there, at T, "And the mind itself is like a parent." In the third, he shows their equality, there, at V, "Nor is the offspring less than the parent." In the fourth and last, he touches upon how those three are in themselves, and how they comprehend each other, there, at X, "Also each of these are, etc."

Articulus 35 — Why It Is Not Granted That The Three Persons Are Of One God, As It Is Granted That They Are Of One Substance Or Essence

§ 10. Why is it not granted that the three persons are of one God, just as it is granted that they are of one substance or essence?

§ 11. Why is it not granted that the three persons are of one God, just as it is granted that they are of one substance or essence?

§ 12. A doubt arises, Why is it not granted here that the three persons are of one God, just as it is granted that they are of one essence or substance?

§ 13. Solution. It must be said that oblique cases [e.g., genitives] note diversity either in the mode of the terms, or in the reality. But when 'God' is said, this name, God, signifies as it were contractedly, and thus it has the mode of a supposit, on account of which it also receives notional acts, and prepositions: as when it is said, God begot God, and God from God: and therefore it does not receive the signification of diversity with respect to the persons. But essence, wisdom, and the like, signify the divine essence as a form, or a habit: and therefore they can signify through that mode, as in some diversity.

§ 18. A threefold doubt arises here, namely, First, how do these three in which the image consists, differ from those three which were assigned above for the image? Second, whether it is so in these, as in the divine persons, that one proceeds from another, that is, intelligence from memory, and will from both: just as the Son from the Father, and the Holy Spirit from both? Third concerning the order, whether one of these necessarily presupposes another to itself, and one of the habits presupposes the other to itself, and similarly one of the acts is prior to another.

§ 20. 1. Mind (as the Master says) is taken here not for the soul, but for that which is more excellent in the soul: but what is more excellent in it is a power: therefore mind is taken with respect to a power, and not with respect to a habit.

§ 21. 2. Also, the Master says that these three are one, because they exist substantially in the soul: but nothing exists substantially except a power, as was held above: therefore these three are taken with respect to powers, and not with respect to habits, as many say.

§ 22. 3. Also, he uses such a manner of speaking, "The mind knows itself, and loves itself": a habit is not to know oneself, and love oneself, but rather it belongs to the one having the habit according to the habit itself or through the habit itself to know oneself, and love oneself: therefore mind is not taken for any habit.

§ 23. 4. If perhaps it is said, as some have said, that although mind is not taken for a habit, nevertheless knowledge bespeaks a habit, and similarly love: Against this is, that when memory knows itself (as Augustine says) it knows itself present to itself, and does not seek itself as absent: therefore it is present to itself through its essence: therefore not through a habit, or through some species: therefore neither does knowledge which sounds as a known thing (as Augustine says) bespeak a habit: and thus what they say seems false. Similarly it seems concerning love: because love here is taken for the loved thing, as Augustine says, that the word is 'loved knowledge': since therefore nothing loved is in the mind, except what is known: and what is known is the substance of the mind, as it seems: love also will be a substance and not a habit, as it seems.

§ 24. Further it is asked next to this, Whether mind is taken here for memory, as some say? And it seems that it is: because to know (as Augustine says) is to hold knowledge within oneself: but this was attributed above to memory: since therefore he says here, that the mind knows itself, he attributes the act of memory to the mind: since therefore a power is defined by acts, the mind will be memory. But against this seems to be that here defining the mind, he posits the same definition which he posited above, namely, that the mind is taken here not for the soul, but for that which is more excellent in it: and thus he defined above all that part, which contains in itself as in a proximate subject memory, intelligence, and will.

§ 25. Solution. Some say that this trinity differs from the preceding one, in this that that one is taken with respect to powers absolutely, but this one with respect to powers according as they are converted to objects which by essence are the same as themselves. But this is nothing: because the same was held above, that memory remembers itself, understands itself, etc. Therefore others say, that this whole trinity is taken with respect to habits, and that the individuals correspond to individuals, and that mind here is posited for the habit of the mind, and knowledge for the habit of the intellect, and love for the habit of the will: and they expound, "The mind knows itself" through a cause, that is, the mind makes as a habit that someone knows himself according to the mind.

§ 26. But because this opinion also has many other distorted expositions, and the habits are not united substantially, as this says: on account of this it must be said otherwise, namely, that this trinity is taken with respect to the mind, and the habits consubstantial with the mind. But how indeed habits are called consubstantial to the mind, will be in a question afterwards. I say therefore without prejudice with the Master, that mind is taken here commonly as above for the part which has the power of knowing, and the power of loving. But the power of knowing is united in two ways to one act, namely the power of memory, and the power of intellect: for here to know through a habit is the same as to have knowledge of oneself by seeing in oneself, so that the habit of knowledge speaks of that which belongs to memory, and the intuition of oneself speaks of the act of the intellect. And if it is objected that according to this there will be a quaternity, it must be said that it is not true: because the intellect and memory according to what was held above, have but one habit: for to know is to have the knowledge of a thing within oneself: and to understand is to see oneself in that likeness, or habit, or knowledge, according as to see is nothing other than to be cast before oneself in the knowledge which one has within oneself: hence those two powers have but one habit: and therefore there will not be a quaternity, but a trinity.

§ 28. To those things therefore which are first objected concerning the mind, that it is not a habit, I readily concede.

§ 29. To that however which is objected afterwards, that knowledge too is not a habit, it must be said that it is a habit, as will be proved below: and yet according to Augustine, it is consubstantial with the power perfected by it: and similarly it is concerning love: for these things are not repugnant, that something is a habit according to some notion according to which it perfects a power for an act, and that it is of the things consubstantial to the same power.

§ 30. To that however which is further asked, Whether mind is taken for memory? Certain Masters say, that it is, and they assign the reason why it is taken for memory rather than for intellect and will: because since there are three powers, memory, intelligence, and will: memory is the first among them, and therefore closest to the substance of the mind, because it arises from the mind alone: but the intellect from the mind mediated by memory, and the will from the mind mediated by memory and intellect. Since therefore memory is closest to the mind, they say that for this reason mind is posited for memory: but nevertheless this seems to be against the intention of Augustine in book IX of On the Trinity, where there are these words which are posited here. And therefore I say with the Master, that mind is taken here for that whole in which there are three powers, as was said above.

§ 31. To the argument however proving this opinion, it must be said that to know is taken here for seeing oneself in knowledge: because love follows upon this knowledge: yet in such a way that to see oneself is to be cast before oneself in the light of knowledge and of the agent intellect: because otherwise it would not always know itself.

Articulus 37 — Whether It Is Thus In These As In The Divine Persons, That One Proceeds From Another, For Instance, Intelligence From Memory, And Will From Both, Just As The Son From The Father, And The Spirit From Both

§ 32. Whether it is so in these as in the divine persons, that one proceeds from another, for instance, intelligence from memory, and will from both: just as the Son from the Father, and the Spirit from both?

§ 33. Whether it is so in these as in the divine persons, that one proceeds from another, for instance, intelligence from memory, and will from both: just as the Son from the Father, and the Spirit from both?

§ 34. Then it is asked, Whether there is such a procession in these powers as there is in the divine persons, and similarly in those habits? And it seems that there is: because § 35. 1. Whatever is in the exemplar, ought to be in some way in the exemplificate: but in the exemplar there is the procession of a person from a person: therefore there ought also to be the procession of a power from a power in the exemplificate, as it seems.

§ 36. 2. Also, Augustine expressly says, that from memory is intelligence, and from memory and intelligence is the will: therefore it seems, that one of these powers proceeds from another.

§ 37. 3. Moreover, it was held above, where the difference between a vestige and an image was assigned, that a vestige leads more confusedly, and an image more discretely not only into distinct persons, but also into the distinction of persons: but this cannot be done unless the powers are distinguished in the manner of persons: therefore, etc.

§ 39. 4. Moreover, Powers are known through acts: but in the acts of these powers one is caused by another, for the will is only of what is known, nor is knowledge except of that of which there is knowledge in the mind: since therefore it is thus in the acts, it will be in the same way in the powers. If perhaps it is said, that this order of acts is on account of the notions of the object and of the powers, namely that the good which is the object of the will has before it the true of which is the intellect, and therefore that true makes the cognition of the true precede: this is nothing: because according to this even the true ought to have something before itself which would correspond to memory which is first according to Augustine.

§ 40. 5. Moreover, If it is granted that this is on account of the objects: yet because acts are defined by objects, and powers by acts, this will return again to the order of the powers.

§ 41. 6. Moreover, the objects of the powers of the soul according to the Philosopher are born to inflict a passion upon the powers themselves: and the powers themselves are born to suffer from them: since therefore the agent impresses on the patient that species which the patient can receive from the agent, it seems that the perfection of these powers is from the species of the objects: therefore just as the species are ordered in the objects, so necessarily will the powers be ordered in the soul: therefore by a necessary order one proceeds from another, as Augustine seems to say.

§ 42. BUT AGAINST: § 43. 1. These powers are possessed simultaneously from the creation of the soul: therefore one does not proceed from another.

§ 44. 2. Moreover, Will even in act does not necessarily follow what is known: because there are some who know excellently, and act to the contrary: therefore it seems, that the will does not necessarily arise from the intellect.

§ 45. Solution. Without prejudice I say, that there is an order naturally between these powers. But there is one order according to nature, another according to generation, and another according to act. I call an order according to nature, when some thing in its notion posits one thing to be after another, just as reason posits sense, and sense posits the vegetative, and it is not converted. And according to this mode Augustine means that the will posits the intellect, and the intellect posits memory. Hence if someone defines the will, he will say that it is the appetite for a known good: and thus the intellect falls into the definition of the will: and it is not converted. Similarly if someone defines the intellect of which Augustine speaks, he will say that it is the intuition of oneself in the knowledge of the mind: and thus memory falls into the definition: but memory has nothing before itself except the mind as a subject. And this procession of natural order corresponds to the distinction of the persons. Therefore as to this order we concede the reasons first adduced, which without doubt are adduced according to the intention of Augustine in book IX of On the Trinity. However, the order according to generation is an order according to time, and such an order is not there. But the order of acts can be in two ways, namely from a preceding to a consequent, and that is not necessary: for it does not follow if it has the knowledge of a thing within itself, that on account of this it necessarily understands: nor does it follow if it understands, that on account of this it necessarily wills, except in one case, namely when memory remembers itself, understands itself, and wills itself: but this does not follow generally. But conversely the order is necessary, namely, if it wills, that it necessarily knows: and if it knows, that it necessarily holds the knowledge within itself: and this consequence proves the order of nature in the powers which we have stated.

§ 46. But if it is objected that Augustine says in book IX of On the Trinity, that the unknown can be loved provided it is believed, it must be said that he takes 'unknown' for what is not known by created reason, not for that which is in no way known: for what is believed is in some way known.

§ 47. And through this the solution to everything is clear.

§ 50. Third, it is asked about the order which Augustine posits here, that from memory is the intellect, and from both is the will: and from the mind is knowledge, and from both is love, regarding another mode of the image.

§ 51. For to this seems to be contrary what the Gloss on Ecclesiasticus 18:1 et seq. says, that from intelligence is the will, and from both is memory: therefore it seems, that memory is appropriable to the Holy Spirit, and not to the Father.

§ 52. To this the common response of all is, that the Gloss on Ecclesiasticus distinguishes the Trinity of the image of the powers, insofar as they are disposed to acquired acts: because the intellect in those first receives knowledge, and through the intention of the will stores it in memory: and in those there is not an image except in a qualified sense, since knowledge is not substantial to the mind, and the known things are frequently lower than the knower. But in the book On the Trinity, he takes these according to the capacity of the mind for itself, and for God: because those naturally by essence are always present to the mind in the soul: and in those it is prior to have knowledge which belongs to memory, and afterwards to see oneself in it which belongs to the intellect, and afterwards to love which belongs to the will.

§ 53. But if it is objected, that Augustine says in the book On the Spirit and the Soul, that the Trinity is in the rational, irascible, and concupiscible, it must be said that it is not a Trinity simply, but in a qualified sense: for the irascible and concupiscible (as Gregory Nyssen and Damascene say) are parts of the sensitive soul: but reason is a part of the rational soul: and therefore there is not a sufficient union there, but a certain one, as was said above concerning sight and imagination, in which Augustine also posits a Trinity.

§ 54. From the aforesaid the solution is clear to all the things which are asked and determined in the Text in the first two chapters, namely S and T, up to the following text.

Articulus 39 — Whether These Three, Mind, Knowledge, Love, Together With The Knowing Being, Are One Substance And Essence

§ 55. Whether these three, mind, knowledge, love, together with the knowing entity are one substance and essence?

§ 56. Whether these three, mind, knowledge, love, together with the knowing entity are one substance and essence?

§ 57. These three since they are distinct from one another, are nevertheless said to be one, etc.

§ 58. And here arises a doubt which the words of Augustine make grave: How do these exist substantially in the soul?

§ 59. 1. And let the words of Augustine be taken in book IX of On the Trinity, where he says thus: We are admonished, if in any way we can see these things existing in the soul, and as if involved to be evolved, so that they may be sensed, and numbered substantially, or (so to speak) essentially, not as in a subject, like color, or figure in a body, or any other quality, or quantity. For whatever is such, does not exceed the subject in which it is. For this color or figure of this body cannot also belong to another body. But the mind by the love with which it loves itself, can also love something else besides itself. Also, the mind does not know itself alone, but also many other things. For this reason love and cognition do not inhere in the mind as in a subject, but these are also substantially just like the mind itself: because even if they are spoken of relatively to one another, they are nevertheless each in its own right a substance. From this authority it is taken, that these are one substance and one essence. And Augustine also posits Plato's reason for this: because no accident in acting extends itself outside its subject in which it is: but those extend themselves outside their subject: therefore they are the substance of the mind, and not accidents.

§ 61. 2. Also, in the same place: Although the lover or the knower is a substance, knowledge is a substance, love is a substance, but the lover and love, or the knower and knowledge are spoken of relatively to each other like friends: but mind or spirit are not relative, just as neither are men relative: yet not as friends who are men can be apart from one another, thus the lover and love, or the knower and knowledge. From this it is again taken, that knowledge itself is a substance, and love itself is a substance.

§ 62. 3. Also, he himself in the same place: A part is spoken of relatively to a whole, because every part is a part of some whole: and a whole is spoken of relatively to a part, because a whole is a whole to all the parts. But since both the part is a body and the whole is, not only are these spoken of relatively, but they are also substantially. Perhaps therefore the mind is a whole, and its parts as it were are the love by which it loves itself, and the knowledge by which it knew and knows itself, of which two parts that whole consists. From this it is again taken, that these are substantial parts of the mind.

§ 63. But against this it is objected thus: Knowledge is a habit: every habit is a quality: therefore knowledge is a quality, therefore not a substance. The same is the objection concerning love. If it is said, that it is not a quality when the mind knows itself. Against this: To know oneself is to hold the knowledge of oneself within oneself: but this is done through the habit of the true and the good which the mind is: therefore it still seems, that that habit is an accident of quality.

§ 64. Further it is asked, § 65. 1. How are these three, and the higher three which are memory, intelligence, and will, one essence, one life, and one mind?

§ 66. 2. Moreover, Augustine's reason which he induces does not seem to be valid: for there are many accidents which by acting extend themselves beyond their subject, such as the hot, the cold, etc.: for these alter the bodies neighboring them.

§ 67. 3. Moreover, It seems that Augustine's reason is against his own intention: because Philosophers say that substantial forms are not active, but rather certain accidental forms are. Hence if these extend themselves by acting outside the subject in which they are, they seem to be accidental forms.

§ 68. Solution. Without prejudice I say, that these are not the substance of the mind nor substances, unless considered in one way only, namely when the mind knows itself, and loves itself: and this is taken from Augustine in the same book, namely in book IX of On the Trinity, because after he said all the above words, he thus subjoins in the Text: But how those three are not of the same substance I do not see, since the mind itself loves itself and knows itself: and these three are such, that the mind is not loved or known to any other of things. Therefore it is necessary that these three be of one and the same essence: and therefore if they were as if confused in a commixtion, they would in no way be three, nor could they be referred to one another. And he gives the example of three rings out of gold, and a potion out of wine, and water, and honey, which are not distinct as one substance in those. Hence I say, that when Augustine says that knowledge is a substance, he understands this of the knowledge which arises from the mind, when the mind knows itself: and of the love which arises from these two, when the mind loves itself. But still it must be distinguished here, that knowledge is not taken here for the act which is from the knower upon the known: because that is not knowledge: but it is taken for a habit. But habit is twofold: one is that which is a perfection by way of a quality removing difficulty from an operative power, and such a habit is not this one. The other is that which from the fact that a present thing indi-

§ 1. [con]stantly held by the mind, it gives the faculty of operating always, and such a habit is the mind present to itself, as present: for Augustine says, that a habit is that by which someone acts when he wishes: and by taking habit in this way here, this habit will be the knowledge of the mind by which it is known to itself: but this is nothing else than its presence to itself: and then knowledge taken materially, will be the same as the mind known. But the known mind and the knowing mind are the same in substance, related to each other according to the relation of the knower and the known. But love follows according to nature such knowledge which is the mind known, and it is taken materially, that is, the mind loved: and this again will be the same in substance with the knowing and loving mind, related however by the fact that it is loved and loving. But that such knowledge and love are called habits by the Masters, this is not because there is some mediate quality in which the known mind is seen and loved, but only on account of the mode of signifying which the relations of the knower and known, and of the lover and loved import: for they supposit as it were certain habits, knowledge and love. By the fact that knowledge and love are not relative properly, but only by the fact that they signify according to the name, that is, certain habits, they have a conjoined respect to another: just as science also speaks a respect to the knowable, which is conjoined to a habit: which it signifies according to reality: but in this it is dissimilar, that the knowledge of the mind is nothing else than the known mind, although it is another according to reason. And thus it is clear how knowledge is taken, and love, when it is said that it is the same in substance with the knowing mind. And thus Augustine understands it. And by this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 2. To the other it must be said, that in truth these three and the preceding three are one essence, one life, one mind, by a certain way of speaking: by the fact that, as the Master says, they consist substantially in life, mind, and essence. And for understanding this it must be noted, that according to Aristotle and other Philosophers, a certain potency is before the being of a thing, and a certain is after it. Aristotle also says, that the vegetative is in the sensitive, and the sensitive in the rational, just as a triangle in a quadrangle. But a triangle composes a quadrangle: because (as Boethius says) two composed triangles make a quadrangle, but three a pentagon, and so of others: therefore a triangle is in a quadrangle, as a potency in act: and a quadrangle in a triangle, as act in potency: therefore the vegetative is in the sensitive, just as the potency of a prior difference is said to be in the act of a subsequent: but the potency of the prior difference is not destroyed by the act of the subsequent, but rather it is perfected to a greater capability: for the sensitive is capable of more than the vegetative, and the rational more than these two. If therefore the substance of the soul is considered insofar as it is perfecting the body in itself and in its parts, it is necessary that it have in itself the capability of all the potencies, as constituting that universal capability of the soul, according as it confers animated being to the body both in itself and in its parts: therefore in this way its potencies are before it according to reason, and of its substance, and they confer to it the complement of being in such a capability. In this way the Master says, that they are substantially in the soul: because just as the substantial is a part of being, so the potencies are a part of the being of the soul: and thus it must not be conceded, that they are qualities or proper passions of it, except according to that mode by which every form denotes a "such" (quale), although they do not denote a "such", but a "what" (quid) in that of which they are a form, just as substantial forms and differences: and thus by such a predication they are called one essence, one life, and one mind. For as was said above, the soul can be taken either in being, or in capability: for it is compared to the body, as to its matter absolutely, according to the being which it confers to the body: and thus it is the essence of the body: and the Philosopher calls it a substance according to the definition of this body, that is, the substance of the form from which the definition of the animated body is taken. It is also compared to the body, as it is organic: and since the organic is an instrument of potency, it itself will not be the perfection of the organic body except according to its universal capability which it has from the potencies: and because the first perfection of a body having life in potency is life, therefore it itself in that comparison is called life. It has a third comparison to that according to which it can be separated from the body, and thus it is called mind. I say therefore, that when it is said that these three are one essence, or one substance, it is a predication of the whole potestative according to the most remote definition of parts to the whole, because the soul receives least from the capability of the potencies according as it is the essence of the body: nevertheless they are of its essence and its substance: and because that essence is not divided in parts, but is whole in any part whatever, therefore they are said to be the essence. But according as the soul is the life of such a body as organic, thus it has in itself the capability of the potencies, and as mind it substantially has the potencies in a genus: and therefore it is a less remote predication, when these are called life: because the potencies confer to such living, and therefore also living is said in many ways, namely to generate, and to use food, and to move, and to sense, and to understand, because in such living is the being of an organic body, either in itself, or in its parts. But nevertheless because these three potencies in the image are not the acts of any part of the body, therefore the predication is still remote: yet less than before: because although they do not constitute the capability of the soul in this that it perfects the organs, nevertheless they approach in the definition of a genus, that is, insofar as they are potencies: but when it is said, that they are one mind, the predication of the act of these which are in it is most proximate, as potencies preceding and constituting it: just as if I were to say, The sensible soul is substantially the power of vegetating, and sensing: for from these two ordered consequently, so that the power of sensing is after the power of vegetating, the sensible soul is constituted. In another way a potency can be considered as it is to an act which is an operation of the animated thing: and thus it is a potency after being, flowing nevertheless from the essentials of the animated thing: and thus it is a natural potency which is in a quality, rooted nevertheless according to origin in the parts constituting the soul: and thus these three are called substantial parts: because they are rooted in the parts which constitute and precede being.

§ 4. To the argument of Augustine, it must be said, that it is good, but difficult to understand: for he proves that which is prior according to nature by that which is posterior; because accidents do not have being except from a subject, although forms have a certain definition from themselves, as Avicenna says: and this is clear from the fact that the being of an accident is an 'in-being' (esse in), and accidents are not when they are not in a subject, nor do they have the virtue of acting by themselves: and therefore as to being and as to acting they follow the subject in which they are: and this he calls not extending themselves outside it: for he does not mean that they cannot alter another subject, but that they cannot do this except by the virtue of the subject in which they are. But these parts are not such, rather they are rooted in the parts preceding being, and therefore as to this they do not have this acting from a subject, but rather the subject from them, and thus by themselves without a multiplication of themselves in a medium they extend themselves to another: for when I understand a distant thing, it is not necessary that the intellect multiply itself in a medium: but an accidental form, by the fact that it follows being, in every thing into which it acts is as in a subject, and otherwise it would not act into it: and this some say belongs to every substantial form from the virtue of heaven which is in it: but whatever may be of this, this belongs to that form which is a complete substance, just as the soul, and is completed by its powers, as was said. But others have assigned diverse reasons about which it would be a waste of time to dispute.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text § 5. Exposition of the Text. "And so the rational mind, etc." Here begins that part in which he applies the created image to the uncreated exemplar, and shows what can be had through the consideration of it.

§ 6. But it is objected about this that he says that he has wisdom which is from himself: but wisdom is essence: therefore the essence is begotten, which is false.

§ 7. Solution. Here I pass over briefly (because below there will be a question about this) saying, that wisdom is taken here as an appropriated attribute in which the proper is understood: because the image leads in this way into wisdom, and therefore wisdom is the Son, and the sense is: that is, the Son whose appropriated attribute is wisdom.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text § 8. Exposition of the text. "Wherefore next to that consideration, etc." This is the last part in which namely, as if by concluding he determines what must be held concerning the Trinity and unity into which the image leads. Which whole is clear except this that he says, that he seems to have essentially begotten one Son from himself. For through this generation seems to be an act of the essence. If this were said, then it is objected to the contrary: because of whichever is the act, that acts by that act: the act is of the essence: therefore the essence acts by that act: but that act is the generation of the Son: therefore the essence begets the Son: and the begotten is not the begetter, as will be held below: therefore the Son is not the essence, which is false.

§ 9. Solution. "Essentially begot," that is, begot the Son having the same essence with him: and thus the objection will cease: and in the other matters the Letter is clear.

DISTINCTIO IV

Divisio Textus

§ 10. DIVISION OF THE TEXT. "Here arises a quite necessary question, etc." Here the Master begins to hand down the knowledge of the Trinity and unity according to the ways which he pre-determined. And this part of the book is divided into two parts, according as the Trinity is known in two ways, namely in itself, this is, as it is a cause through creation: and in appropriated attributes which belong to it according as it creates things, and is the universal cause of the being of all creatures: thus wisdom, omnipotence, and will belong to it, about which he treats in the second part which begins below, dist. 35, namely, "Since above we discoursed and said many things, etc."

§ 11. The first part, which is about these things which belong to the divine persons in comparison to the act of creating things which flow from them, is divided into three parts, according to three things which are required for the distinction of persons. The first of these three is, that the mode and act be determined by which a person flows from a person, by the fact that there is a person from whom this flux is, and there is a flowing person, and again by another flux according to reason he flows from the Father, and by another the Holy Spirit flows from both: and these modes of flux of a person from a person are determined in the first part. The second which is required, is that equality and communicability remain in the nature of which the persons are, and equality of the predication of all common things concerning them: and this is determined in the second part which begins below, dist. 19, there namely, "Now after the coeternity of the three persons, etc."

§ 13. But the third is, that there be properties according to which one person is distinguished from another: and this is determined below, dist. 26, there namely, "Now concerning properties, etc."

§ 14. The first of these parts is divided into two: in the first of which he touches upon the generation of the Son from the Father. In the second, he touches upon the procession of the Holy Spirit from both, namely from the Father and the Son: and this begins below, dist. 10, there namely, "Now after the eternity of the Son, etc."

§ 15. The first of these is divided into four which circumstance the act of generation. For to every act of generation four things are required, namely the terms of the act between which it is, as from whom and into whom it is: second, a potency inclining to the act in the begetter: and third, a nature communicated through the act of generation, which is either spoken of in the begetter and the begotten, or simply remains the same in both: and the fourth is that which accrues to generation by way of an extrinsic measure, just as time measures in the generation of corruptible things, as Dionysius says, but eternity in eternal generation: and concerning these four it is treated here in four parts following one another: for concerning the terms of generation it is treated in the first: concerning the potency inclining to the act on the part of the begetter it is treated in the second, where dist. 6 begins, there, "Besides it is accustomed to be asked, Whether the Father begot the Son, etc." But concerning the communicability of nature which simply truly and incommutably remains in the begetter and the begotten, it is treated in the third which begins in dist. 8, there, "Now concerning the truth or property, etc." But concerning that which is by way of an extrinsic measure, namely coeternity, it is treated in the fourth which begins in dist. 9, there, "Now the distinction of persons, etc."

§ 16. But because furthermore there is a begetting person and a begotten person, it will not be doubted, Whether a person was in some way a term of generation? but the doubt is, whether the essence is? which is signified by two names, namely as by a concrete name, and an abstract one: and therefore this part is divided into two distinctions: so that in the first it is asked, How it stands toward generation, namely eternal generation signified under this name God, when it is said, "God begot God?" And in the second, Whether signified abstractly it can be a term of generation? and this begins in dist. 5, there, "After these things it is asked, Whether it must be conceded, etc."

§ 17. The first distinction contains the dissolution of two sophistic arguments. For in the first chapter A the Master determines, Whether God begets himself God, or another God? But in the second he moves another doubt, Whether he begets himself God who is God the Father, or a God who is not God the Father? there, B, "But still the babblers object, etc."

Articulus 1 — Whether God Begot Himself As God, Or Another God

Whether God begot himself God, or another God?

§ 19. The first argumentation is this: God begot God: therefore he begot either himself God, or another God: if himself God: therefore the same in person begets, and is begotten: if another God: therefore there is another God than the begetting God: therefore the begetter and the begotten are not the same God, which is false.

§ 21. To solve this the Master says, that neither is to be conceded. And his reason seems to be: because since this pronoun 'himself' (se) is a reciprocal relative, it supposits and refers back to the supposit of the verb: but the supposit of the verb is the person of the Father: and this name, God, through a verb copulating a notional act, is drawn to supposit for the person of the Father, and that [person] is not begotten: but this relative, 'another', is a relative of diversity, and regards the term adjoined to itself for the sake of form: and when it is adjoined to this name, God, for the sake of divinity it will note diversity: and since there is no diversity of deity between the Father and the Son, the Master says this must not be received: God begot another God.

What is generation?

§ 23. But here a multiplex question falls in. For it is asked first, what is generation? Second, whether generation belongs to God? because if it does not belong, then the Master's question is nothing. Third, whether it belongs by priority to God or to a creature? Fourth concerning the argumentation which the Master posits and solves here, whether it has a process [i.e., whether it is valid] or not?

§ 24. Concerning the first it is proceeded thus: Damascene says: "Generation is, to produce from the substance of the begetter that which is begotten similar according to substance." The same gives another definition of divine generation thus: "Generation indeed without beginning and eternal is a work of nature, and proceeding from his substance: so that he who begets, does not undergo any mutation, and so that he is not a first God and a posterior God, and does not receive an addition."

§ 25. But it is objected against the first thus: 1. When it is said, "from the substance of the begetter," the preposition "from" notes some habitude of a cause: therefore either material, or essential: not material, because Damascene says, in the same place: "For since God is impassible and influxible, as simple and not composite, he is not natively apt to sustain passion, neither in begetting, nor in creating, nor in any operation does he need another": but every material cause is passible: therefore the preposition does not note a material cause on the part of the substance of the Father. But if it notes an essential cause, as almost all say. Against this:

An essential cause is in generation: but an essential cause is an essence: therefore essence in some way is a cause of generation: but not as an efficient, or begetting [cause], nor as an end, nor as a form, because thus it would be a term of generation induced in the begotten through generation, and this is not conceded, because thus at least it would be distinguished in the begotten, just as the essence of a born Socrates is distinguished in him, insofar as it is received through generation: therefore it will be subjectable to generation: but every subject of generation is distinguished in the begotten through the form of the begotten: therefore the essence is distinguished in the Son by the property of the Son, which is false: therefore it seems that the word 'from', can note no habitude of a cause.

§ 26. 2. Besides, it is asked, for what does "substance" supposit there? for either it stands there for nature, or for person: if for nature and it receives the preposition, and the notional verb which is "to beget," then it seems that nature is begetting and begotten. But if for person. Against this: When I say, "The Father is begetting the Son from his substance," substance speaks that which is in both, namely the begetter, and the begotten: but this is not the person of the Father: because in person the Father and the Son are not one:

therefore substance does not supposit there for the person of the Father.

§ 28. 3. Besides, it is asked concerning this that he says, "to be produced": for this seems to say an act of generation: but to be produced is to be led into the open from the hidden: and thus it seems that the Son was sometimes in the hiddenness of potency, and thus drawn out into the open.

§ 29. 4. Besides, "To be produced" says an act, either in becoming (in fieri), or in complete being (in facto esse). If in becoming, either finishable, or not finishable. If in the first way, it follows that the Son at some time was not: because what is in becoming is not, but will be when it has been completed: and I say this, if it itself is of permanent things. If in the second way, then it follows that the Son never was, but is always on the way to being. But if it speaks generation in complete being, then it follows that before this he was in becoming: because to be completed is always the term of becoming.

§ 30. 5. Item, That act which is imported through "to be produced", is intermediate between the producer and the produced: therefore it has a distinction from both, and thus there is something between the Father and the Son, having a distinction from both, which is false. If it is said, that that act is not there except according to the reason of understanding. Against this: A reason of understanding is empty and vain, which neither arises from a thing, and can in some way be posited concerning a thing: just as the reasons of mathematicians, although they cannot be posited concerning a thing according to their being which they have in nature, nevertheless they can be posited concerning the intellect of quantity which is in the thing. But this intellect of producing, as it seems, is in no way applicable to the thing itself.

§ 31. 6. Furthermore it is asked concerning this that he says, "That which is begotten similar according to substance": for this seems inconvenient: for in the divine it is not a "what" that is begotten, but a "who".

§ 32. IN THE SAME WAY it is asked concerning the second definition of Damascene. 1. For he says: "It is a work of nature": but the Master says below, that nature neither begets, nor is begotten.

§ 33. 2. Besides, Nothing seems to be said, existing as a work of nature, and producing from substance: because nature is substance, and thus generation will be a work of substance, and from substance, all of which are disproved in the following distinction.

§ 34. 3. Besides, This seems to be impossible which he says, "so that he is not a first God and a posterior God": because a common conception of the mind is, that that which gives substance and being to another, is prior to that in duration which received substance and being from it: nor is it similar concerning splendor and light, because light does not give its whole being to splendor in the luminous body, just as a father to a son: whence we do not call splendor a son of light.

§ 35. Solution. It must be said, that both definitions are good enough: and the first defines univocal generation in a genus: and I call univocal generation, that which is into a similar form and species with the begetter, just as a man begets a man: but I call generation in a genus, because the definition according to some mode belongs to divine generation, and of man, and of other creatures, for it belongs by priority and by posteriority, as will be clear below.

§ 36. It must be said therefore to the first, that the preposition "from" notes there an identity of essence. For just as in material things we say, A knife is from iron, signifying not only the matter, but also that the being of iron is being in the knife, by the fact that the matter remains in the materiated thing: so we transfer into the divine, casting off what is imperfect, and we attribute what is perfect to God. Since therefore three things are noted in such a locution, namely that iron was the subject of the operation and of its becoming by which the knife was becoming, and that the knife was in potency in the iron, and that it has the essence of iron in itself: the first two are of imperfection, and therefore they do not belong to God: but the third is of perfection, and this belongs to God, namely to have the same substance of the begetter. And if it is asked, § 37. Whether it notes a habitude of cause with respect to the essence? I say that no, but rather it posits such a habitude with respect to him who has the essence, and that is the Father, with respect to whom it notes a reason of origin, which reason although it is not properly a cause, nevertheless has in a certain way a similar habitude. But the objection proceeds in these substances of generated things which come to be, where the act is educed from potency: and this in no way belongs in divine generation.

§ 38. To that which is asked concerning substance, it must be said that substance stands for nature according as it stands under and subsists, that is, according as it is in the one having it, just as is signified in this name, God. For although the Father begets, and not the divine substance: nevertheless the Father does not beget except according to substance: for to beget is from the potency of nature according as it is nature: and therefore it is not necessary, that the substance be distinguished either in the Father, or in the Son: because just as the Father begets according to substance, so the Son is begotten according to substance and nature: because the same power of nature which is in the Father to this that he beget, is in the Son to this that he be begotten, as the Master will say below: and therefore it is clear that it remains indistinct in the begetter and the begotten, but it is in both as the same.

§ 39. To this that is asked concerning the act of generation, it must be said that there is not there a becoming or an intermediate act between the begetter and the begotten, and the act does not say anything except a notion under another mode of signifying: because a notion names a property according as through it a person is known, but an act names it according to the reason of receiving or giving the essence: for this is true, that the Father gives the essence to the Son, and the Son receives the essence from the Father: but the reason of this giving and receiving through a mode of understanding a notional act names: for the Son through generation receives the essence from the Father, yet neither is the essence begotten, neither per accidens, but nor consequently.

§ 40. But to that which is objected, that the intellect is empty, it must be said that this is true, if by no reason could it be posited in the thing: but although it is not in the divine as becoming, or as a medium between the agent and that into which it acts, nevertheless they are in this that a person is not only a person, but also is the origin of another person who is from it, and notional acts express this very reason of originating. To the other it must be said, that the substance of the Son is not begotten, nor is the substance in the Son begotten, but nevertheless the substance of the Son is received through generation. For the rule is, that whatever a person originated from another has and whatever it is, it has and is and receives from that from which it is: and Damascene signifies this reason of having the essence when he says, that the similar according to substance is begotten.

§ 41. To that which is asked concerning the other definition. It must be said that Damascenus takes it there by reason of nature: for although nature and substance are the same in the divine, nevertheless they do not have the same reason of signifying in a name according to the definition which Boethius gives of nature: for nature is spoken of according as it is a principle of producing a similar from itself, and this principle is the Father, but according to the virtue of nature which is communicable to another supposit without its division. And thus it is clear that in this reason of nature something is attributed to nature which is not attributed to substance, although they are the same. And through this the solution to the following is also clear: because substance does not have this mode of signifying which nature has: and therefore generation is better called a work of nature, than a work of substance.

§ 42. TO THE OTHER it must be said, that by virtue of that generation it follows that one is not posterior to the other in this way: because in a nature in which nothing is in potency before the act, the Father is not before being than the Father or the begetter: for this generation posits an order of nature by which one is from another, not by which one is prior to another, as is held below; and therefore by virtue of this generation insofar as it is this in the divine, and not insofar as it is generation simply, it has that one is not prior to another, and that the Father is not subjected to change, because he is not commuted, since he never exited from potency to act, or from idleness into operation.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Befits God To Beget

Whether to beget belongs to God?

§ 45. Then having what generation is in common, it is asked, Whether to beget belongs to God? But it seems that it does not:

§ 46. 1. For generation is for this that being is perpetuated through succession, which cannot be perpetuated through itself: but divine eternal being is in one alone: therefore generation does not belong to it, as it seems.

§ 47. 2. Item, Every generation is multiplying one essence in diverse supposits of the same nature: but the divine essence cannot be multiplied, as was proved above in the question concerning this name, God: therefore to beget does not belong to God.

§ 48. 3. Item, The Philosopher says, that every generable thing is corruptible: God is most incorruptible: therefore, etc.

§ 50. 5. If it is said, that it is true in those things which are generated according to a part of their nature, and not by giving the whole nature to the begotten: but the Father gives the whole essence to the Son. Against this: The Father is a simple person by the same simplicity by which the divine nature also is simple: why therefore does he beget the Son from himself, if on account of the simplicity of the essence he gives him the whole essence, much more since the person is closer to generation than the essence according to the reason of understanding, the Father gives him his own person indistinct in the Father and the Son: but on account of the indivisibility of the essence the Father and the Son are one essence: therefore much more on account of the indivisibility of the person the Father and the Son are one person: but this is false: therefore generation does not belong to God neither by grace of nature, nor by grace of person.

§ 51. 6. Besides, it is asked, to what purpose is begetting a Son attributed to God? either this happens because a nature is something better in many than in one, or because it cannot be saved in one: not because it cannot be saved in one: therefore because it is something better in many than in one, which again is false: therefore it seems generation does not belong to God.

§ 52. Solution. It must be said, that to God existing above all things and within all things generation most worthily belongs, and by this reason nothing being in potency is in him. Since therefore every nature as much as is of itself is communicable, that aptitude will not be in God except in act: therefore his nature will be communicated to multiple hypostases of the same nature. It must be said therefore, that to beget belongs diversely to diverse things: but a certain one thing is in all generations. For certain ones beget by the fact that they induce their species in the matter of a body which is outside themselves, just as simple homogeneous bodies, as fire: for by the fact that they are homogeneous in the whole and in parts, there is nothing in them which does not stand in act under form of the species: and therefore there is nothing in potentiality in themselves: and therefore it is necessary that they generate their species in foreign matter. However, there are some which generate by the separation of a part from their own matter, which is in potentiality under the form of the species, such as certain complex and mixed things, like vegetables and sensibles, like man. However, some multiply their forms by their presence in foreign matter, like luminous things. In all these generations, what is common is the communication of essence or form: and this happens because every form, as far as it is of itself, is communicable, and especially substantial: hence if it is not communicated, this happens from that in which it is: and this can be in three ways. One and properly: because whatever is receptive of that form has the whole within itself, as is in the species of the sun or moon. In another way: because that in which it is, is not divisible, so that it separates from itself a part in which its form is in potentiality, as is in the Angel in which that which is, is indivisible not having a part which is potentially an Angel, and a part which is actually under the form of an Angel. Thirdly: because it is not generative of itself through potentiality in another, like light, because it is not a form that changes and acts in this way. However, in divine things, essence indeed is communicable, like every essence, but not divisible: because divisibility is of imperfection, and that created essence is divided in those in which it is communicated, is of its imperfection, namely that it is not altogether simple: for if it were so simple in being, as it is simple in the notion of essence, the singulars to which it is communicated would be one in being as in notion; but the divine essence is altogether and perfectly simple and communicable: therefore it will be communicated according to being simple, unless something else impedes: however, it cannot be impeded by what is or who is, since it is indifferent from essence: therefore it will be communicated by itself: and since the act of communication of essence is only generation, there will be generation in divine things.

Hence it must be said to the first, that generation is not only for this that it perpetuates in succession what cannot remain in itself, but only for this reason is it in those essences which cannot in whole complete that which is or the suppositum in which they are: for if they completed in whole, they would not be in potentiality to another form: however, such is not the divine essence: and therefore in divine things there is not generation for this reason.

To the other it must be said, that the divine essence cannot be multiplied, so that it is divided, or given to an extraneous nature: but it can be communicated to supposits of the same nature which are the same in it by essence and being.

To the other it must be said, that that which is generable is corruptible, which through generation goes from potentiality to act, because its being precedes non-being: but that which is generated not generable which is coeternal and coexistent with the generator, is not of this kind: and therefore it is not necessary that it is corruptible.

To the objection it must be said, that that proposition is false, if it is taken generally: but nevertheless it is true in those which through generation go from non-being to being, because in those the recipient of the form is different from the form itself by the substance of matter, and from the generator itself: but it is not necessary that every generation is of this kind, as is clear from the aforesaid.

To what is objected against the response, namely that the Father gives the whole substance to the Son, etc., it must be said that he does not give him the person: for the person is what consists in its own property: however, the property according to its notion is, because it belongs to one and not to another: but whatever is of itself or absolute, he gives it all to him. And if it is objected, that the person is substance: therefore he gives the person to him. It falls into the fallacy of accident: because although the person is substance, nevertheless many things are attributed to substance which are not attributed to the person and nothing is attributed to the person which is not attributed to substance: as distinction belongs to the person, and not to substance: and to be communicated through generation, and such things, belong to substance which do not belong to the person: for the person is what is distinguished, and therefore is not communicated through generation.

To what is further asked, Why is it attributed to the Son to generate? It must be said that it is because of the communicability of essence whose communicability is not impeded by what is, because it is indifferent from it: these are not the causes which in objecting are placed as causes.

Articulus 4 — Whether To Beget Befits The Heavenly Father Primarily, And Inferiors Secondarily, Or Conversely

Whether to generate belongs primarily to the heavenly Father, and secondarily to the lower beings, or vice versa?

Then it is asked, whether to generate belongs primarily to the heavenly Father, and secondarily to the lower beings, or conversely? And it seems that it belongs primarily to the heavenly Father:

1. The Apostle says, to the Ephesians iii, 14 and following: For this cause I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom all paternity in heaven and on earth is named: therefore it seems that the name of paternity descends from Him.
2. Likewise, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: All divine paternity and filiation is given both to us and to the supercelestial powers from the patriarchy separated from all, and the filiation from which both gods and sons of gods and fathers of gods become and are named minds: therefore it seems that the name of paternity descends to us and to the Angels in spiritual paternity: therefore much more in natural paternity which is proper: therefore generation belongs primarily to God.
3. Likewise, Damascene says: And this must be known, that the name of paternity and filiation and procession is not transferred from us to the blessed divinity: but on the contrary, it is handed down to us from there.

4. The same, this same thing seems by reason: for it most truly belongs to generate, to whom it most truly belongs to communicate essence: but he most truly communicates who communicates the same indivisibly: but this is done only by the heavenly Father: therefore it most truly belongs to Him to generate.

5. Likewise, Generation is in similar nature and form: but nothing generated is so similar in nature to the generator as the Son according to eternal generation: therefore nothing is so truly generated as He: therefore it belongs to none so properly as to God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Generation implies change in itself which does not belong to God: therefore according to the perfect notion of generation it does not belong to God to generate.

1. Likewise, Generation seems of itself to be of an imperfect being which is in potentiality: but such a being does not belong to God: therefore it does not belong to God to generate perfectly: therefore it belongs to Him secondarily.

Solution. It must be said that to generate, like other names and verbs, is taken in two ways, namely according to the usual notion in the name, and thus all things belong primarily to creatures, and secondarily to the divine: they can also be taken according to the nature of the thing itself, and thus generation and paternity belong primarily to God, rather than to man or other creature.

To the first objection, it must be said that it is not true that generation implies change in itself, but rather accidentally, namely insofar as it is in a nature which is in potentiality and divisible: but without change it is in a nature which remains indivisible and is communicated to multiple hypostases without its own change.

To the other, it must be said that generation is not of an imperfect being except accidentally as of a subject. In corruptible things, however, an imperfect being which is matter is subject to generation: but this happens to generation according to its nature: but in another nature there is generation which is the notion of the generator, according to which it demonstrates a son having the same nature and essence with the generator, as was said above.

Articulus 5 — Whether God Begot God Himself, Or Another God

Whether God begot God Himself, or another God?

Consequently, it is inquired about the argumentation which the Master places here, namely, if God begot God: therefore, did He beget Himself as God, or another God, etc.

However, it seems that He begot another God: 1. For since this term, God, is the name of one having deity, it can be drawn to supposing for a person through the term denoting distinction: but "another" denotes distinction, since it is a relative of masculine diversity: therefore, "God," when it is said, "begot another God," stands for a person: but this is true, God begot another person from Himself: therefore, this will also be true, He begot another God, which the Master denies in the Text.

1. Furthermore, it seems that "God" on the part of the supposit does not suppose for a person: for God according to Himself signifies only essence: but the predicate or verb does not restrict the supposit except only by reason of the time signified, namely, that it stands for present things if the verb is of the present tense: therefore, this verb, "begot," since it is a predicate, does not extract God from the supposit of substance to stand for a person: and therefore this is not true, God begot God, as it seems, which the Master nevertheless concedes in the Text.
2. Furthermore, it is inquired about the solution of some, who say that "another" on the part of the supposit can make an appositive construction with this name, God, and thus it is true: or intransitive, and thus it is false. For this seems to be nothing: because appositive construction is between the more common and the less common: but "another" is not such with respect to this name, God.
3. Furthermore, since "another" is signified in the masculine gender, it seems not to be substantivized, and thus remains an adjective, and it places otherness around the thing signified in this name, God: therefore, it will place diversity for the sake of form: therefore, the expression is simply false: since in form the generator and the begotten are the same.
4. Likewise, an adjective draws number from the substantive, but it is not fittingly said, God begot another God, or other Gods, or other God, or another God: therefore, since "another" follows the connoted number or gender of this name, God, it will be its adjective placing its otherness around itself for the sake of form, and thus the expression is false: therefore, it will be simply false.
5. But on the contrary: Otherness can be noted with respect to the supposit: for Socrates is another man from Plato: therefore, it seems that this is at least distinguishable, He begot another God.
6. Furthermore, it seems to follow the other. Himself as God, or another God: for the same and different divide being as being: therefore, it seems that they follow any being: therefore, when it is said, God begot God, it seems that either the same or another.
7. Likewise, of contradictories, one must be verified of anything. If therefore God begot God: either He begot Himself, or He begot not Himself. If Himself, then the same in person is the generator and the begotten. If not Himself, then He begot God: therefore, He begot another God, which the Master denies.

Solution. This is customarily solved in three ways by the Masters. Some say that "another" on the part of the predicate can be substantive or adjective. If it is an adjective, then they say this is false, He begot another God: because then "another" places diversity with respect to the form of this name, God: because adjectives place the form which they signify around their substantives. But if it is substantive, they say it is true thus, He begot another who is God.

Others say that it can make an appositive construction, or adjective: if appositive, it is true: if adjective, it is false. The third opinion is the Master's in the text: and we follow that, saying that neither does it follow, therefore Himself as God: nor does it follow, therefore another God, because of the reason assigned above.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that although "another" is relative, it does not by itself denote personal distinction: and this is clear: because it is fitting to essence and person: for essence is other than created essence, and person is other than another person: and therefore it is not by itself notional, like generating, and the like. Hence, it cannot compel a substantial term to stand for a person: indeed, since it denotes otherness, and every otherness which is simply otherness, is for the sake of form, it will regard this term, God, for the sake of form: and thus the expression is false.

To the other, it must be said that there are certain acts fitting to one alone in the supposits of some nature: and when a common term in that nature supposes for words signifying such an act, it is understood that it supposes for the sake of the supposit to which that act is fitting: as when it is said, "Jove thunders, flashes," among the Gentiles it is understood as Jupiter: and such an act is generating which is fitting to the Father alone: and therefore God calls the Father, when it is said, God begot God: and it is not restricted by the verb itself, but rather calls this supposit to which that act is fitting alone.

To what is objected about the solution, it must be said that some have said thus, although it is improbable: nevertheless, to the argument against, they solved that although "another" does not have itself in the reason of the common to "God," nevertheless it can denote distinction in the person, to which person it is fitting to be God: and thus it is constructed appositively or quasi-appositively.

To what is objected about another solution, it must be said that if "another" is substantivized, then the participle "being" is understood, so that the sense is, He begot another being God: and thus "another" does not necessarily draw number and gender from the substantive: for it is fittingly said, He begot another being God, although it is falsely said.

To the other, it must be said that the same and different divide created being: and the same is said from which it does not differ by difference, but different is different in essence: hence these do not divide uncreated being which is distinct according to supposit, but indistinct according to essence.

To the other, it must be said that these are not contradictory, He begot Himself, He begot not Himself: but He did not beget Himself, and this is true: but from that it does not follow: therefore, He begot another: because that which is said, He did not beget Himself, is true: but it cannot be inferred: therefore, He begot not Himself: because those are not equivalent, as is clear from the aforesaid.

Articulus 6 — How Those Terms Supposit When It Is Said, God From God, Light From Light, Light From Light

How do those terms suppose, when it is said, God from God, light from light, light from light?

Consequently, it is asked about what is said in the symbol: God from God, light from light, etc.

1. For it seems that when it is said, God from God, the term "God" should not be restricted to stand for a person: for prepositions do not restrict the terms to which they are joined: therefore, since "God" is a substantival term, it will stand for substance: but substance is not from substance: therefore the expression is false, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, a preposition denotes distinction, as some say, and because of this it compels the term to which it is joined to stand for a person: therefore it also seems that when it is said, God is distinguished from God, the expression is true, which is false.
3. Furthermore, prepositions imply relation: therefore it seems that we can say, God is related to God, which again is false.
4. Furthermore, it is asked about this, light from light: for this seems only to signify essence, because light is not of properties, but of essential commonalities. Therefore, just as this is false, essence from essence: so also this would be false, light from light.
5. Furthermore, those things which receive distinction are not predicated of all in the highest singularity; but when it is said, God from God, light from light, each receives distinction through the notional preposition: therefore they are not predicated of all in the highest singularity: therefore the Father and the Son are not one God, nor one light.

Solution: It must be said that the preposition is notional, and it has this from the fact that it denotes essential origin: and therefore the preposition joined with this term, God, draws it to suppose for the one having deity, and this in divine things is a person, whence it renders the expression true for a person.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that in truth in such expressions the term "God" is not restricted, nor is it necessary, because although it of itself supposes for essence in a person, nevertheless it renders the expression true according to the requirement of those things to which it is joined, just as when it is said, man runs, with only Socrates running: although the term "man" equally supposes for both those running and those not running, nevertheless it renders the expression true only for Socrates, and this suffices for the truth of that expression, and this is called "appellation" among sophists. Similarly, this term, God, as far as it is of itself supposes for any divine supposit: yet because of the adjunct on the part of the antecedent it appellates the Son, and on the part of the consequent it appellates the Father.

To the other, it must be said that distinction is imported differently when it is signified in its proper signification, and differently when it is signified in the notion of a special or certain distinction, just as generating signifies a certain distinction, but not simply: and similarly the notional preposition signifies a certain distinction, because of origin, whence more is imported by notional words and notional prepositions than distinction: because although they say by their virtue distinction in the supposit, nevertheless also with this they say agreement in essence: because the begotten and the begetter communicate in one essence. Similarly, that which is from something as from origin communicates in one essence: but these words, distinguished, and separated, only import disagreement, and they denote that to be placed around the thing of the term to which they are joined: and since God is not distinguished from God thus, because the Father and the Son are one God, this is not received. God is distinguished from God.

To the other, it must be said that this is not true, God is related to God: for although the preposition is relative, nevertheless it has another mode of signifying: but when it is said, is related, the relation signified in the verb seeks its proper notion of relation to be signified by those things which are said to be related. But that proper relation is not signified in this term, God, but in this term, Father and Son: and therefore this is true, the Father is related to God.

To the other, it must be said that this term, light, signifies light in the one having it, and thus it imports concretion: because of which it stands for the one having deity, and this is the supposit or person: and therefore it is fittingly said, Light from light. And if it is objected, that according to this it should not be, Light from light, because light signifies in an abstract mode, it must be said: This is found, Light from light, in a certain antiphon on Epiphany: but it has less propriety than this, Light from light, nevertheless light although it signifies in a mode of abstraction from the subject, it does not signify in a mode of abstraction from act: and since acts are of supposits, it is properly placed by the Saints for a person sometimes: but nevertheless such expressions must be glossed, and not extended.

To the last, it must be said that although God generates God, and God is generated by God, nevertheless God is not distinguished from God, as was said above: and therefore it must be said that through the notional act distinction is not posited except in the supposit of this name God, and unity remains in form or quasi-form: and therefore when it is proved, it stands for the sake of form: and therefore it is proved singularly of all in the highest. And what is said, that those things which receive distinction, etc., must be understood that those things which receive for the sake of their quasi-form, as Father, and person, and such: because in these the quasi-form is property, and another is the property of the Father and the Son, just as another is the supposit and another person is the Father, and another the Son.

Whether this is to be conceded, God begot God who is Father, or God the Father.

But still the talkative ones oppose, etc. In this part, the Master touches upon a further reasoning of the sophists objecting against divine generation. And this part is divided into three parts. In the first, he presents the sophistic reasoning and solves it. Because in the solution he had said that the Father and the Son are one God, and conversely: therefore, in the following chapter C, it is asked whether this name, God, or another essential name, can equally supposit and apposit with respect to the three persons, there, C, Some however of the truth adversaries, etc. made a digression, with the solution of the sophistic argumentation added, therefore in the third he returns to the proposed, there, D, Now to the aforementioned question, etc.

In the prior chapter, therefore, the Master presents this reasoning: God begot God: either therefore God who is God the Father, or God who is not God the Father. If God who is not God the Father: therefore God is who is not God the Father, and God is who is Father: therefore there are multiple gods, which is false. But if God who is God the Father: therefore he begot God who is himself the Father: therefore the same in person is generating and generated, which is heresy.

And the Master solves it by introducing two reasons which can be elicited from these. For when it is said, God begot God, they can infer: therefore God who is himself the Father, or God who is not himself the Father. And the Master presents these two propositions, which show one sense of these: either God who is not God the Father, or God who is God the Father: and he says the negative is true, and the affirmative is false. He presents two others such that the sense is: God who is God the Father, that is, the Son who is God, who God is Father. He says this is true, and the negative is false, namely, God who is not God the Father, that is, the Son who is not God, who God is Father: because the Father and the Son are one and the same God.

And for the understanding of this expression, it must be distinguished in the construction of these two terms, God, Father, both in the affirmative and in the negative. For if when it is said, God begot God who is God the Father, both terms are constructed as if by apposition on the same side whether before the "who is," or after by understanding, then the affirmative will be false, and the negative true: because then the sense is: he begot God who is God the Father, that is, himself the Father. For the term God, which notes the term of the act imported by the verb, begot, because of the notional act passing over itself, supposes for the Son when therefore the begot is a name having a subjunctive article, and makes the second knowledge of supposits, it refers this term, God, by the grace of the supposit, just as it supposed when it preceded: and thus the sense is, that God generating and God generated in supposit are the same whether in person, which is false: therefore its negative will be true under the same sense. But if the terms are not constructed as if on the same side, but rather one is understood to be another: not apposed, but as if joined by a middle composition, then God will stand for the essence. and if Father then supposes to be composed under understanding between them, the sense will be, the Father begot God the Son who is not Father being God: and this is true, and the Master presents this, and the affirmative is false. But if God supposes, and Father apposes, the sense will be, he begot God the Son, who the Son is not God being, or who is Father: and this is false, and the affirmative responding to it in the same sense is true; and this is the intention of the Master's solution.

However, there were some ancients saying otherwise, because they said that in affirmatives the articulate name, who, refers the antecedent differently than in negatives. For in affirmatives they said, it refers by the grace of the person, as it finds the proper notional act to which it is joined, or the matter of the act over which it is: and therefore they said, that this is false, God begot God who is God the Father. But in negatives the who is not referred thus, but by the grace of the supposit, and by the grace of the essence: and therefore they also said this is false, he begot God who is not God the Father: and this happens not so much from the force of the name which it has in affirmatives and negatives, but also from the negation which regards the terms following formally: and therefore although the who refers by the grace of the supposit, yet the negation denies from this supposit both the form and the supposit: and therefore the expression is false: and this was the solution of Prepositivus and the reasoning. Others say, that even if in the negative these two terms, God, Father, are constructed immediately as if by apposition, then the negative expression is true: whence they concede this, he begot God who is not God the Father, just as this, he begot God who is not himself the Father: and they do this because of the article of this name who, which determines and refers the God by the grace of the supposit, and not by the grace of the form, as has been said.

But it will be said, that the affirmative is to be conceded, namely this, he begot God who is Father or God the Father: because

1. Anselm says, that he begot the same from the same itself.
2. Likewise, Augustine - God begot another self from himself.
3. Likewise, Augustine in book XV on the Trinity; Saying himself, the Father begot the Son: for he would not have said himself entirely perfectly, but either more or less would be in the word than in himself.
4. Likewise, Origen: The Father sending the Son, sent another self.

From the second authority it must be said, that if the self which is on the part after in the expression, is of the ablative case, then the expression is plainly true: because then the sense is, from himself he begot another self, that is, another from himself. But if it is of the accusative case, then another self, has the force of one term, and not of two: and then the self has as it were one part of the signification, and another the other part: so that another touches the disjunction in person, and the self the agreement in essence. However, some gloss another self, that is, most similar to himself: so that the self makes as it were a simple relation. Just as also sometimes it is simple of similar nature and not the same in number, upon which the nod of demonstration falls, as when it is said: This herb grows in my garden.

From the first which says, that he begot the same from the same itself, it is not to be understood with precision, but adding the same in essence from the same itself in essence.

To the third it must be said, that saying is not taken there for the act of generation simply: but saying is there manifesting in the similar: whence the sense is, the Father saying himself, that is, manifesting himself, begot the Son: for he would not have perfectly manifested himself, etc.: for this is well conceded, the Father manifests himself in the Son.

To the last it must be said in the same way as to the second: because another self is the same as another similar to himself in essence.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Certain adversaries of the truth, etc.

In this chapter, which is introduced incidentally, he refutes certain ones who were saying that names signifying essence ought to be placed only in the predicate, and personal names should be subjected to them, and not conversely according to the order of correct predication in divine matters: and they were the Porretans, namely Gilbert and his followers. And here the Master introduces many authorities of Augustine, in which essence is subjected, and person is predicated. And this is the sentence of the chapter.

Articulus 8 — Whether A Proposition Can Be Formed About God

Whether a proposition can be formed about God?

Here, however, a twofold doubt arises.
One is, whether a proposition can be formed about God?
The second, if it can be formed in some way, whether the essence ought to be subjected, or only predicated, or whether both can rightly be done in divine matters?

Concerning the first, it is objected thus:
1. The most simple does not have composition: therefore, if it is signified as composite, it is signified falsely: but every composition signifies as composite.

therefore a proposition having composition cannot be formed concerning God: but every proposition has composition: therefore no proposition is true concerning God if it is affirmative.

§ 2. Item, Dionysius says that affirmations in divine matters are false, and negative ones are all true; therefore it seems that all affirmative propositions concerning God are false.

§ 3. If perhaps it is said that composition is in God according to the mode of signifying on account of the infirmity of our intellect. On the contrary: The intellect does not cure its infirmity through an error: but when it composes something in divine matters, it errs: therefore by such propositions its infirmity is not cured: therefore it ought not to use them.

§ 4. Item, vain is the understanding which in no way can be attributed to a thing: therefore it seems that the understanding of such propositions is vain.

Solution. As Augustine says: God has admitted the service of the human voice, of whom nevertheless nothing can be said worthily. Hence, just as when speaking of God in temporal terms, we use words of any tense; so when speaking of the most simple God, we use the mode of composition and the mode of division in our expressions: but when in such matters the mark of composition which is signified in the verb is occurs, it signifies identity according to the thing, and not a mode of inherence, like something inherent per se, or substantially, or accidentally.

It must therefore be said to the first, that although God is most simple, nevertheless He is signified in many ways, as was held above, in the third distinction: and from those a composition can be formed denoting the identity of the thing.

To the next it must be said that Dionysius understands it concerning the affirmative signification of incomplex terms, which do not fully show by the name what belong to God, and he does not understand it of the affirmation of a composition which is a mark of the identity of the predicate with the subject.

To the next it must be said that our intellect is saved (or, signified) in the thing insofar as God is signified in many ways. Hence it finds in God those things which are many in the concepts of the names, although they are one in the things: and because the concept of the names is true, for He is truly wise, and powerful, and the like: and therefore it is not vain, and it is cured from ignorance, by the fact that it does not refer those compositions to God by way of inherence, but rather by way of identity.

Articulus 9 — Whether In Divine Things Essence Ought To Be Subjected Or Predicated, Or Whether Both Can Rightly Be Done

Whether in divine matters the essence ought to be subjected, or predicated, or whether both can rightly be done?

Secondly it is asked, If names signifying the essence in divine matters can be subject terms? It seems, however, that they cannot.

§ 1. For in divine matters the person is the supposit, and the essence is as it were the form and nature: since therefore in a proposition the predicate behaves in the mode of a form, while the subject behaves in the mode of a supposit, the divine essence ought not to be subjected, but predicated.

§ 2. Item, the subject is that in which a thing is, while the predicate is that which is in it: since however the essence is in the person, and not conversely, it seems again that it ought to be predicated, and not subjected.

§ 3. Item, Boethius in the book De Trinitate says that a simple form cannot become a subject.

§ 4. The same, in the book De Hebdomadibus: That which is can have something besides that very thing which it is, but to be (esse) has nothing admixed to it: but that which is in divine matters by the mode of "that which is", is the person: therefore the person can have something as inherent to it, and thus can be subjected to itself: but the divine essence is simple esse; therefore it can have nothing: therefore it can be subjected to nothing, as it seems.

Articulus 10 — Whether This Is True, One God Is Three Persons, And Three Persons Is One God, God Is Trinity; And Whether The Name Trinity Is An Essential Name

BUT AGAINST: § 1. Whatever are of equal simplicity are of equal order in being subjected and being predicated: the person and the essence are of equal simplicity: therefore they are of equal order in being subjected and being predicated.

§ 2. Furthermore, whatever things are not related to each other as higher and lower, and are not essential and substantial to each other, can equally be subjected to each other, and equally be predicated of each other: the divine essence and the person are thus related: therefore they can equally be subjected to each other, and predicated of each other. The proof of the first is: because higher essential terms are predicated of lower ones according to the order of nature: but the essence is not higher to the person nor conversely, because otherwise there would be composition in God. The second is proved through the simplicity of the person and the essence.

Solution. It must be said that in truth in divine matters either can be subjected to the other, and predicated of the other, as the Master proves. For although the predicate takes the place of a form in predications which are made through inherence and participation, nevertheless in propositions denoting identity it is otherwise, because there either is the same as the other, and therefore either is subjected to either, and either is predicated of either. Through this therefore the solution to the first two is clear, which correctly conclude concerning a predication which is made by mode of inherence.

To the next it must be said that Boethius understands it of the subject of a thing, not of a mode of predicating, as a surface is subjected to whiteness, or as matter is subjected to form. In the same way also the following authority is understood: because that which is can have something: but in divine matters there is no such thing that can be a subject to anything besides itself. Hence this is understood in those things in which that which is differs from to be or that by which it is.

Whether this is true, One God is three persons, and three persons is one God, God is a Trinity: and whether the name Trinity is an essential name.

Then it is asked concerning this which he says: One God is three persons, etc.

For this seems false: for the term "God" stands either for the person, or for the essence: if for the essence, then this seems to be true: the essence is three persons, the like of which is not found in created things, in which the essence is not a person, nor persons: but if it stands for the person, then a person would be three persons: therefore some person is three persons, which is false.

Alongside this, it is further asked concerning this which he posits, that God is a Trinity: for since that term, "God", is supposed singularly, it seems that it ought to render the locution true for some one thing: therefore it seems that something having deity is the Trinity: therefore the Father, or the Son, or the Holy Spirit, which is false.

Item it is asked concerning this name, Trinity; for this seems to be predicated singularly of one: therefore it is essential.

But AGAINST: § 1. Essential names are predicated of single persons: therefore if the term "Trinity" is essential, this ought to be conceded: The Father is the Trinity, or a person is the Trinity, which is false.

§ 2. Item, according to the reason of understanding, the person is less distant from the supposit of the Trinity than the essence is: but this is not conceded, "a person is the Trinity": therefore much less ought this to be conceded, "the essence is the Trinity."

§ 3. If perhaps it is said that this name,

Articulus 11 — Whether This Article Of Faith Alone Is Sufficient For The Christian

Trinity, is an intrinsic relative and includes within itself relatives and their determinations: and therefore just as those relatives are predicated of a person, so also it itself is predicated of a person and of persons. On the contrary: If an intrinsic relative is explicated, it has relatives related to each other: for when I say, "they are similar," I can explicitly infer, "therefore this one is similar to that one, and that one is similar to this one": but it is not so in this name, "Trinity": therefore it seems that it is not an intrinsic relative.

Solution. It must be said in truth that this is to be conceded: One God is three persons. For since this term "one" is an adjective, it posits the unity signified around the subject of this term, "God", and the term "God" expresses unity of substance, and this is one in three persons: and therefore this is true, One God is three persons, and conversely. And this is likewise true: The essence is three persons, and conversely.

To the next it must be said that likewise this is true, God is a Trinity: and this likewise, one God is a Trinity, for the same reason. For a term in the predicate or in the subject does not restrict a term posited in the other part, but permits it to stand freely for that which renders the locution true: and therefore the term "God" stands for the essence, and not for the person: nor is it similar in created things in which the essence is divided: because in divine matters it is not so, nor is the essence there anything other than the hypostasis.

To the next it must be said that although "Trinity" signifies singularly, nevertheless it includes within itself several supposits: and therefore also the Master will say below that it is a collective name: but because in those supposits the essence is one and the same, therefore it is predicated of essential names and not of one person.

To the next it must be said that in the collection of supposits which the term "Trinity" has in itself, one person is more distant than the essence: because a person is only this or that one, which is not one in number in the collected things insofar as they are collected: but the essence is one in them even insofar as they are collected: and therefore the term "Trinity" is predicated more of the essence than of the person.

To the next [to the objection] it must be said that in truth this name, "Trinity", is a collective name of the persons and an intrinsic relative, yet it does not follow that it can be explicated in this way: and this happens because the relatives which it has in itself are not relatives of equality and equiparance, like similarity, but rather of origin: but such cannot be explicated like others, as is clear when it is said, "They are fathers": "therefore this one is the father of that one, and that one of this one" [does not follow].

Whether this article of faith alone is enough for a Christian?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says It is enough for a Christian, etc.

For there are many other articles which are to be believed: therefore this is not enough.

To this it must be said that Augustine means that in believing or investigating the causes of things, as regards the sufficiency of faith in this article, it is enough, and one need not seek the natural and proximate causes which philosophers inquire into.

Now however, as to the question itself, it can also be said that this is twofold, "He begot another God" (genuit alium Deum), from the fact that the term "another" can be taken adjectivally, and thus it is false: or substantively, and thus it is true, because then the sense is, "He begot another who is God," just as we read in John: I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Paraclete,[55] that is, another who is the Paraclete: because "Paraclete" is a substantial name, and therefore the Father is not another Paraclete than the Son, or the Holy Spirit.

And let these suffice for this distinction.

Articulus 1 — How Essence Is Related To The Generation Of The Son, Whether By Way Of Being Communicable Through Generation And Procession

After this it is asked, Whether it ought to be conceded that the Father begot the divine essence? etc. Here begins that part in which it is inquired whether the divine essence signified abstractly can be the term of generation: and because this question can be formed in a twofold way according to a twofold understanding, therefore it has two parts. For in the first it is asked, Whether the essence generates, or is generated: such that the act of generation belongs to it immediately as to a term? In the second it is inquired, If it does not belong to it as to a term, whether it belongs to it as that from which there is generation by mode of a material principle, and this part begins there, It is also said, and frequently read in Scripture, etc.

In the first of these the Master raises a question having four problems, namely whether the Father begot the essence, or the divine essence begot the Son, or the essence begot the essence, or the essence neither begot nor is begotten? Hence the first of these is divided into two parts, in the first of which he destroys the first problem: but in the second he destroys the second and the third, and constructs the fourth, and it begins there, It is also not to be said that the divine essence, etc.

The former is further divided into two: in the first of which he manifests the truth through reasons. In the second, he objects against it, and solves it, there, However, contrary to this seems to be, etc.

First therefore, to [show] that the Father did not beget the essence, he adduces three reasons: the first of which is, because if the essence were begotten, it would be spoken of relatively, which is not true. The second is, because according to this the Father would have begotten that which He Himself is, which again is not true, and it begins there, Item, since God the Father is the divine essence, etc. The third is, because since God the Father is as it were formally the divine essence, it is as it were the cause for Him to be: therefore if He had begotten it, He would be by the fact that He begot, and would be God [by the fact that He begot], which is false. And he proves that this process is valid through Augustine, there, Item, if the Father is a begetter, etc.

In the others however the text of this part is manifest.

How the essence relates to the generation of the Son, whether by mode of something communicable through generation and procession?

Before the text, however, a doubt arises here: How does the essence relate to the generation of the Son?

§ 1. For that which is of nobility must be restored to divine generation: but the communicability of the essence is of nobility in every nature: therefore that must be given especially to the divine essence: therefore it relates to generation as something communicable through generation.

§ 2. Item, let us understand in divine matters that there is no generation, nor any procession: it is evident that the divine essence will not be communicated to multiple persons or supposits. But if we understand generation and procession, immediately the communication of the essence follows: therefore generation and procession are the cause of the communication of the essence: because a cause is that which being posited, something else is posited, and which being destroyed, it is destroyed.

§ 3. Item, this is taken from the reason of generation: because generation speaks of a flux of the communication of nature: therefore generation makes that communication, as it seems.

But AGAINST: § 1. Every essence which according to esse is in a hypostasis having it, if the hypostasis itself having it is incommunicable, the essence itself is incommunicable through the same esse which is in that [hypostasis]. The truth of this is evident in singulars. But the divine essence is in the hypostasis of the Father: therefore through the esse which is in the Father, on account of the incommunicability of the hypostasis of the Father, it is made incommunicable: therefore the Father and the Son do not have the same esse of the essence through generation, but only of reason: but this is false: therefore generation does not communicate the essence.

§ 2. Item, in all other things I see this, that if some things are distinguished from each other by nothing, whatever belongs to one according to the thing, belongs also to the other: but the essence and the person are distinguished from each other by nothing: therefore whatever belongs to the essence according to the thing, belongs also to the person. The first is evident through the saying of the Philosopher who says that the same is that from which a difference does not differ. The second is evident through this, that relations do not distinguish the person from the essence, and nothing else distinguishes in divine matters: therefore nothing distinguishes. From this I proceed thus: Whatever really belongs to the essence, belongs to the person: but it really belongs to the essence to be communicated to many: therefore that same thing belongs to the person: but this is false: therefore it is false that the essence is communicable.

§ 3. Item, in every nature I see that it is determined and individuated through the incommunicability of that in which it is: therefore similarly it will be in the divine nature: but no nature individuated in one, has the same esse of nature with that in another, but the same from eternity He predestined certain ones who would be good and blessed, that is, He elected them that they might be good and blessed: and He predestined goods for them, that is, prepared them. But providence is of things to be governed: which indeed seems to be taken in the same way as disposition. Sometimes however providence is taken for foreknowledge. But wisdom or knowledge is of all things, namely of goods and evils: and of present, past, and future things: and not only of temporal things, but also of eternal ones. For God does not so know these temporal things that He does not know Himself: but He alone knows Himself perfectly: in comparison with whose knowledge all knowledge of a creature is imperfect.

And since we have discussed above, etc. Here begins that part which is about the cognition of the Trinity and unity, insofar as it is considered in those things which make for the sufficiency of a cause for the procession of creatures from it, which are knowledge, power, and will: for to operate nothing more is required than to know, and to will, and to be able.

It is divided however into three parts according to the three aforesaid things. In the first he treats of knowledge. In the second, of power, which begins in distinction XLII, there, Now concerning omnipotence, etc. In the third, he treats of the will, which begins in distinction XLV, there, Now concerning the will, etc.

The first of these is divided into two parts. In the first he treats of knowledge in general. But in the second he descends to the species of divine knowledge, which are predestination and reprobation: and this begins in distinction XL, there, But predestination is of salutary goods, etc.

But the first which is about knowledge in general, is subdivided into three. In the first knowledge is shown both according to the distinction and property of the names, and as to those things which are in it, as of what it is. In the second however it is shown conversely, how God is in all things made and created by Him: and this begins in distinction XXXVII, there, And since it has been demonstrated in part, etc. In the third however the Master shows the dispositions of knowledge rather than knowledge itself, namely whether it imposes necessity on things, or can be deceived, or increased, and the like? and it begins in distinction XXXVIII, there, Now therefore returning to the proposition, etc.

Further, the first is further divided into two. In the first he shows the intentions of the names, and in general, how it is concerning objects, because it is of all eternal and temporal things. In the second however he shows how it is one thing to be in the knowledge of God, and another to be in nature, and how it is differently of good and evil objects: and this begins in the following distinction XXXVI, there, It is customary to ask here, etc.

But this distinction is divided into three parts. In the first he determines generally of all names by which divine knowledge is accustomed to be signified. In the second however he moves a question which arises from the determination and distinction of the names, namely whether the knowledge of God would be in God, if there had been no future things? there, Here it ought to be considered, Whether knowledge, etc. In the third, he principally shows the objects of knowledge according to a general declaration, there, But knowledge or wisdom not only, etc.

From these the meaning is sufficiently clear: they will become clear in the disputation.

Articulus 2 — Whether Essence Is Begotten By The Father, And Whether In Divine Things There Are Two Things, The Relative And The Non-Relative, Namely Essence And Person esse of the essence: and this is so because the properties are not posited around the esse of the essence: but they determine nothing to the individual and incommunicability, except that around which they are posited: but in creatures where the essence falls short of simplicity, by the fact that the essence is simple in reason, but not in esse, therefore it is determined and contracted to the esse of this one, and that this esse of this one is not the esse of another.

To the next it must be said that this argument proceeds in lower things, by the fact that in them there is universal and particular: and therefore it is not similar: because in divine matters there is no universal and particular, as will be proved below: but if we posit that the essence of Socrates does not differ from Socrates, then the esse of the essence in Socrates, even without individuating principles, will be the esse of Socrates: and so it is in divine matters: hence the esse of the essence in the Father is the esse of the Father: and because neither the essence nor the esse is determined by the properties, therefore both remain communicable to the Son through the same essence, and the same esse through that essence.

Whether the essence is begotten by the Father, and whether in divine matters there are two things, related and not related, namely the essence and the person?

Then it is asked concerning this which the Master says in the first reason, why the essence is not begotten there by the Father, there, If the Father were said to have begotten the divine essence, etc.

But against: § 1. According to this in divine matters there is a related thing, and an unrelated thing: but a related thing and an unrelated thing are two things: therefore the essence and the person are two things.

§ 2. Item, a person is a distinct thing, and the essence is a non-distinct thing: therefore they cannot be the same things: therefore the essence and the person are two.

§ 3. Item, on account of the opposition of relation one person is not another person: since therefore the opposition of affirmation and negation is greater on account of the opposition of contradiction, when it is said, "the person is a distinct thing, the essence a non-distinct thing," the essence ought not to be the person.

§ 4. Furthermore, notable are the sophisms of Praepositinus, who objects thus: The essence is the Father, and the Father is the essence: but the Father is the Father of the Son: therefore the essence is the Father of the Son.

§ 5. Item, this is simply true, The essence is the Son of the Father, because between the Son of the Father and the essence the distinction of relation does not fall: but whatever is the Son of the Father is begotten by the Father: therefore the essence is begotten by the Father, which is false: therefore the essence is not the Son of the Father, which again is false, because the essence is the Son, and is not the Son except of the Father, therefore the essence is the Son of the Father.

§ 6. Item, the essence is one [and the same] as he who is begotten: but he who is begotten is the Son; therefore the essence is the Son.

§ 8. Item, the essence is the term of generation. Proof. The essence is that which is begotten, or he who is begotten by the Father: and this is the term of generation: therefore the essence is the term of generation: but the term of generation is from the Father: therefore the essence is from the Father, which the Author denies in the text in the third reason. And because it is easy to adduce many such things, let these suffice.

Solution. It must be said to the first and the second, that it does not follow, "A person is related, or distinct: and the essence is not related, nor distinct: therefore they are two things." For it ought to add: "and this thing is not that one": and thus it would follow that they are two things: and therefore it proceeds from insufficiency.

To the next it must be said that the opposition of affirmation and negation is greater than of relation: but when the modes of those oppositions are signified concerning the same thing, then opposite respects, namely of relatives, do not permit those to be the same in which those respects are signified: but nothing prohibits diverse things from being affirmed and denied of the same thing according to the thing, from the fact that it is taken in a diverse reason of signifying: but modes of contradiction are only signified, when it is said, "a distinct thing," and "a non-distinct thing": which is evident, because the propositions are not contradictory, but the modes of contradiction are signified in the predicate. Otherwise it can also be said, that contradiction is not noted concerning the same thing taken in the same way: for when he says, "the essence is a non-distinct thing," the word "thing" is held essentially: but when he says, "the person is a distinct thing," the word "thing" is held personally: and therefore because it is not taken as the same, there is no opposition of contradiction.

To the next it must be said that this is true, The essence is the Father: and this is true, The Father is the Father of the Son: but when he infers, therefore the essence is the Father of the Son, that conclusion is twofold, and in one sense it follows, in another it does not. For if the term "Father" is an adjective, that is, if it expresses the form of the predicate predicated of the essence, the locution is false: because thus it would posit its reality around the essence, and the essence would be noted to beget. But if it is the subject, the locution is true, and it follows from the premises: and then it does not follow that the essence is generating.

To the next it must be said that this is twofold by the same twofoldness, The essence is the Son of the Father, namely from the fact that the term "Son" can be taken adjectivally, and thus it is false: or substantively, and thus it is true: and in the first sense a distinction would fall between the Father and the essence, and not in the second sense. But in the first sense it follows that it is begotten by the Father, and not in the second.

To the next it must be said that this is twofold: The essence is a begotten thing: from the fact that the term "thing" can be taken for the person, and thus it is true: or for the essence, and thus it is false. For it can be taken in either way, as is clear from the preceding, and in one sense an inconvenience follows, as is evident per se.

To the next it must be said that there is the fallacy of accident in the process: for although he who is begotten is the term of generation, nevertheless the essence is not the term: because not whatever belongs to one, belongs also to the other, even though they are the same in reality.

Whether in divine matters the essence is preceding generation, or consequent to it, or accompanying it through the intellect?

Whether in divine matters the essence is preceding generation, or consequent to it, or accompanying it through the intellect?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says: Since God the Father is the divine essence, etc.

§ 1. The essence in divine matters is either preceding generation according to the intellect, or consequent, or accompanying, and I say this according as it is in the Son? Not preceding. Proof. Nothing received through another is preceding that through which it is received according to the intellect: the divine essence received by the Son is through generation: therefore it does not precede generation according to the intellect. The first is evident per se. The second is written below, where it is said that the Son has nothing except what He receives through generation.

§ 2. In the same way it is evident that it is not accompanying, that is, concurrent with generation, or running simultaneously, just as the accompanying will is said to concur with the work, as is had through the following distinction according to the intellect of generation itself: therefore it seems that it is consequent: but concerning every consequent to generation I can say that it is begotten per se or consequently: therefore the divine essence is begotten either per se or consequently, which is false.

§ 3. Item, in lower things I see that this one begets this one, and consequently this one begets a man, and per accidens this one begets a son: can I thus say in divine generation that this one begets this one, and consequently God, and per accidens the Son? It seems that I can:

because the essence is consequent to generation, as has been proved: therefore it is begotten consequently. Similarly Augustine says that the Son is, because He is born: therefore nativity is the cause why He is the Son in some way.

§ 4. Item, the received and the unreceived are not the same: but the essence in the Son is received, while in the Father it is unreceived: therefore it seems that the essence in the Father and in the Son is not the same.

Solution. It must be said that the essence does not relate to generation as preceding, nor as accompanying, nor as consequent, but as the same as the begetter and the begotten.

TO THE OBJECTION however it must be said that that which is received through generation, so that its inductor into esse is the act of generation either per se or consequently or accidentally, that relates to generation as a consequent: but thus the essence is not in the Son.

To that however which is objected, that the Son has nothing except what He has received through generation. It must be said that this is true, but nevertheless He did not receive it as consequent to the act of generation, but rather as it is the same as the begetter, who nevertheless is from Him. And through this the solution to the second is evident.

To the next it must be said that this cannot be said in divine generation: for the essence is not consequent to the begotten, but the same as Him: nor yet is it begotten as the same, nor is it begotten in Him: and this is because it is the same to which another attribute belongs on account of the mode of signifying another thing which is in reality the essence and the persons: for it belongs to the essence in no way to be begotten: but it belongs to the person to beget, or to be begotten, or to proceed. And similarly also it must not be said that the Son is begotten per accidens: because the Son by the same property is this one, by which He is the Son, although considered in another way: because by that property insofar as it is a property, He is this one or someone: but in that property by which He is relative to another, by the same property He is the Son: and therefore He is not this one or someone per se through generation, and the Son per accidens: but the same, and from the same property considered differently, as will be clear below, where it will be asked, in what reason the Father begets the Son?

To the last it must be said that the received and the unreceived can be the same, but not considered in the same way: because the essence in the Father is not received, and in the Son it is received.

Whether in divine matters it can be said that the Father is the cause of the Son?

Whether in divine matters it can be said that the Father is the cause of the Son?

Next, it is inquired concerning what is said in the third reasoning: But to the begetter, the begotten is a cause, etc.

For cause is not in divine matters: for Chrysostom says upon John, that it is not to be said that the Father is the cause of the Son.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. In the Gloss upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, Chrysostom says that the Father is the cause of the Son.

1. Furthermore, why is this received, the Father is the principle of the Son, and not this, the Father is the cause of the Son?
2. Likewise, in the Letter it is intended that the Father is essence, and wisdom is wise, as if essence and wisdom formally relate to the Father: which Porretanus said, which was reprehended, because thus composition is noted in God.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that he is not simply a cause, but as it were a cause.

To the other, it must be said that cause posits that which as it were follows another by necessity, and with effect, especially the efficient cause posits diversity of substance and essence: because the same cannot be effect and efficient: but not so the principle: for it says that which is in reality, and yet originating it inasmuch as before it nothing is, and others are from it.

To the other, it must be said that in such matters only the formal cause is noted in name, and not in reality. Porretanus, however, posited it in the reality itself.

Divisio Textus

However, this seems contrary, etc. This is the part in which an objection is made against what was previously determined, and it resolves, and the text is plain.

Divisio Textus

Thus also it is not to be said, etc. Here begins the part which is about the other two parts of the problem, which parts the Master here intends to destroy. And it is divided into two parts. In the first, the Master shows that the divine essence neither begot the Son, nor was begotten by itself. In the second part, however, the Master objects to the contrary through authorities, there, F,

However, the aforementioned seems to be contrary, etc.

In the first, there are two parts according to two problems which he pursues. In the first, he determines that the divine essence did not beget the Son. In the second, however, that the divine essence did not beget itself, there, in the middle of chapter E, Thus also we say that the divine essence did not beget, etc.

Articulus 5 — Whether, If The Son Were Begotten By The Divine Essence, The Son Would Be Some Thing By Which He Would Be Begotten

Whether if the Son were begotten from the divine essence, the Son would be some thing from which he is generated?

A doubt arises concerning the reasoning which the Master presents for the first problem, saying that if the Son were begotten from the divine essence, then the Son would already be a thing from which he is generated. For this seems inconvenient there. Proof: The Son is the essence, and the essence is the Father: therefore the Son is a thing which is the Father: and from the Father is the Son: therefore the Son is a thing from which he himself is the Son.

Solution. The first is simply false, as the Master says, namely, the Son is a thing from which he is generated. And when it is said, the Son is the essence, this is true: and similarly that, the Essence is the Father: but when it is further inferred: therefore the Son is a thing which is the Father, there is a double expression from the equivocation of this term, "thing": because if essential, it is true: if personal, it is false: and in this sense the conclusion follows, therefore the Son is a thing from which he himself is.

Divisio Textus

However, the aforementioned seems contrary, etc. Here it is objected to the contrary: and it has four parts. In the first, he objects and resolves through the words of Augustine. In the second, however, he proves the solution, namely, That. In the third, however, thus to be understood, etc., he objects through the words of Hilary, which have a special difficulty, there, G, However here. In the fourth, he resolves the contrary, etc., through the words of the same, there, H, But because these words he wishes to understand soundly, etc.

Articulus 6 — In Which Names By Which The Divine Persons Are Named There Is Greater Propriety, And In Which Less

In which names by which the divine persons are named, is there greater property, and in which lesser?

A doubt arises here first concerning what is said: "Support from wisdom," etc.

For it is asked in which names there is greater property, and in which lesser?

Furthermore, the Master said above in the first reasoning he brought to the first problem, that if the Father had begotten the divine essence, the divine essence would be said relatively to the Father. Therefore, it is asked if in these in any way it is said that they are said relatively: and if in any way this should be conceded?

1. Likewise, it does not seem that anything inconvenient follows from what the Master says: for God begot God: and yet God is not said relatively: therefore it seems similarly that wisdom begot wisdom, and essence essence: and yet it is not said relatively.

2. Likewise, God begot God: and yet the begetter and the begotten are one and the same God, as was held in the preceding distinction: therefore it seems that if also essence begot essence, and wisdom wisdom, it would not follow because of this that there would be two wisdoms, or two essences.
3. Likewise, what the Master says about the cause does not seem to impede: because by deity God the Father is God: and yet we have this from Augustine, that deity is born.
4. Likewise, when it is said, God begot God, it is not said because of this that he who begot, and is, and is God, although he is the same God with him whom he begot: therefore by similarity this inconvenience would not follow here, that if essence were begotten, that God who begot, and was, and was God.

Solution. It must be said that there is greater and lesser property in such terms, insofar as they are more and less removed from supposits which are per se signified by their properties: whence this is most proper, "The Father begot the Son." However, this is less proper, "God begot God": yet because "God" says having deity, it includes in itself the supposit according to that mode of signifying by which it stands under nature, and therefore it has in itself what is distinguished in generation, and also what is the same in the begetter and the begotten: and therefore this is admitted in the usage of speakers. However, if in similar cases it were extended thus, "The wise begot the wise, and the powerful the powerful," etc., all would be received under the same mode: although divine nature is signified differently in those and under this name "God," because all such names say nature in the supposit which receives distinction in generation: but if names are taken signified in an abstract mode, like essence, wisdom, etc., it must be understood that there is a double abstraction, namely from the subject, and from the act: for from the subject all equally say abstraction, but not from the act: for wisdom is to a special act, and justice, and suchlike, but not essence: because acts are of particular composites and supposits, therefore such names saying order to act, consequently say relation to the supposit: and therefore because of this order these have less property, "Wisdom from wisdom, power from power," than these, "Substance from substance, essence from essence." However, in those which name substance there is also order: because the simplest according to the reason of understanding is essence: substance, however, less, because the name is imposed from the act of standing under: similarly existence from the act of going out from others, or from another.

Some say that names which say in the divine what follows nature, like good, wise, etc., name a certain influence over created things: and since only a perfect supposit influences, because it is fitting for only the perfect to act, they say that such names are fitting to the causing cause: and therefore they have a certain concretion to the supposit. But this is nothing: because granted that it never influences, still most truly it is wise, and good, and all suchlike: however, their reasoning is founded upon the authority previously held, where Augustine said in the book "On Faith to Peter": "God the Father who most truly wished and was able to indicate himself to knowing minds, begot this to indicate himself, which was he who begot." But this is not the understanding of the authority: because according to this the knowledge of the creature would be the cause of the generation of the Son, which is false: but in that authority the term which is consequent is noted: for in itself it is wise by formal wisdom, and consequently it influences in us: yet if it did not influence, still it would be wise.

To what is further asked, it must be said that to be said relatively in the divine is said in four ways: for to be said relatively principally, is to be relative and according to its being to be referred to another, as Father and Son are said. In the second way it is said to be said relatively, to say the relation by which the relatives themselves are said to another, as paternity, filiation, and suchlike are said relatively. In the third way it is said to be said relatively, which says the property found in the relative from this that it is relative: as innascibility is relative, because it is found in the relative from this that it is so relative that it is the principle of the whole divinity: from this it is necessary that the Father is not from another. In the fourth way something is said to be said relatively, because it according to the reason of understanding causes relation: as to generate, and to be generated, and to proceed, and procession, and suchlike are said relatively: because from this that it generates, according to the reason of understanding it is the Father, from this that it is generated it is the Son: as however it is easy to see, generation is not relation according to its signification, nor even to generate, and suchlike. And in these four ways relations are signified in the divine with the greatest property: because in all these ways they are distinguishable: and in this last way also relations are signified in prepositions noting the habit of origin, as when it is said, "God from God."

In three other ways it is said to be said relatively less properly, of which one is, to be placed for the relative with an accommodated signification, although it says the substance itself, and thus personal relatives are among the Latins, and hypostasis among the Greeks, and they only suppose the relative: and therefore they are predicated plurally of the persons in the sum: for the Father and the Son are two persons, and two hypostases. In the second way it is said to be relative, which signifies collected persons, as trinity, for it includes in itself those which are said relatively. In the third way it is said relatively, which is placed in the place of the relative, because it names the divine essence by the mode of the supposit, as God: and this is the least proper mode among all that have been said. However, essence cannot be said relatively in any of these modes; and therefore it is inconvenient that it is begotten, or begetting.

To the other it must be said that God begot God, and they are one God, because "God" includes in itself the divinity of the supposit and the unity of essence: and therefore it does not follow that there are many gods: but when it is said, essence begot essence, it does not have in itself the supposit: therefore it would be necessary that it satisfies the distinction of generation by the distinction of essence: and thus it follows, as the Master says, that there would be many essences: and therefore Abbot Joachim erred, who did not see this cause, and said that essence generates essence, and yet there is one essence: just as God begot God, and yet they are one God.

To the other it must be said that this is improper, "Divinity is born," and it should be explained, this is, it is accepted through generation, not through the generation of deity, but through the generation of the one having it.

To the other it must be said that this happens because of the concretion of this name, God, which is not in essence, as has been said.

Divisio Textus

Here indeed also that contrary, etc. Here he objects through the words of Hilary, and in the following he resolves.

And there can be doubt concerning this which he says in resolving, The Son has nothing except, that is, he has nothing according to the nature, which is God, except what he received by being born.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Son Is Well Said To Be Counsel From Counsel, And Will From Will

Whether the Son is rightly called counsel from counsel, and will from will?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

The Son is called counsel from counsel, and will from will, etc.

1. For Damascene says that counsel does not pertain to God, because it belongs to the ignorant: therefore the Son is not counsel from counsel.
2. Furthermore, it has been held above that will is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore the Son is not will from will, but rather the Holy Spirit, as it seems.

Sotunio. Counsel is said in two ways, just as to counsel: for there is counsel on the part of the seeker, and that is of the ignorant: there is also counsel on the part of the giver, and this signifies abundance and fullness of knowledge concerning those things which are doubtful to others, and thus counsel in God is called the eternal disposition of His wisdom concerning things to be done, and in this way the Son is called counsel from counsel, because in Him from the principal part counsel is fulfilled through incarnation and passion. Whence also according to another translation, Isaiah 9:6, He is called the Angel of great counsel. And, Isaiah 11:2, it is said the Spirit of counsel rested upon Him.

To the other it must be said, that although will is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, it is not proper to Him: because there is one will of the three: and therefore it is fitting for the Son to have will through this that He received it from the Father.

Divisio Textus

It is also frequently said, etc. Here begins that part in which it is asked, Whether essence in a person is, or can be, the terminus of generation from which or into which?

And it is divided into three parts: into objection, and solution, and into a chapter in which is elicited that which follows with further conclusion from the authorities introduced. The second begins there, K, With these words before the third begins there, L, omitted, etc. It is also shown, etc.

Articulus 8 — Which Act The Verb "He Received" Connects, Whether Notional Or Essential

Which act does the word "accepit" connect, whether notional or essential?

For it is asked which act this word "accepit" connects, whether notional or essential? If notional, since the Son himself in being born received essence, it seems to be a notional act over essence: therefore it is distinguished, as it seems. If essential, then it equally pertains to the Father and the Son to receive, which is false.

Likewise, it is further asked, whether this is true, "The Son is by divine generation"? Proof that it is so: The Son by divine generation has whatever he is: but this is true, "The Son is": therefore the Son is by divine generation. On the contrary: Essence is, not by divine generation.

Solution. This, "The Son is by generation," speaking without prejudice, has a calumny: for if it is understood thus, as if the being of the Son is the terminus of generation per se and in the Son, it is false. But if it is understood that indeed the terminus of generation is the Son, and he has being through generation, then it is true, and in this way it is proven: moreover, this is true: "The Son is by divine generation the Son," and the divine essence is as if formally.

To that which is first asked, which act does this word "accepit" connect? I say, that it is notional which is generation: yet I do not say that the act is terminated according to the reason of understanding first, or consequently over essence: but it is terminated in the Son in whom the essence is the same on account of two things, namely the community of essence, and also indivision. Hence, for essence to be communicated, generation makes it so: yet it is not over it per se, or consequently: which is thus proven. If it were over it first, then essence would be begotten, which is false: but if it were over it consequently, then essence would be related consequently to the Son: and thus in the Son there would be something proximate to generation, and something remote: and thus two heresies would follow, one of which is that the Son would have in himself the universal and the particular; the second is that essence would be generated consequently: and thus also consequently it would be distinguished according to the being it has in the Son, from the being it has in the Father.

Articulus 9 — Whether, When The Master Says, "He Transferred Into The Kingdom Of Charity," The Word "Charity" Joins Notional Love Or Essential Love

Whether when the Master says, "He has transferred into the kingdom of charity," the term "charity" conjoins notional or essential love?

A doubt arises here concerning what is said in the first chapter: Whether the term "charity" conjoins notional or essential love? If it is said, notional. On the contrary:

1. Notional charity is the Holy Spirit: therefore, it seems to follow that he has transferred into the kingdom of the Son of the Holy Spirit.
2. Furthermore, Augustine would inconveniently explain, who says that he has transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of his substance.

If for this reason it is said that it conjoins essential love. On the contrary?

1. Augustine explains thus: "of his beloved Son," in another exposition: "beloved" however denotes the love by which the Father loves the Son, and by which the Son loves the Father: that however is notional, because it proceeds from them insofar as they are one in loving: therefore, it seems that it conjoins notional love.
2. Furthermore, if it purely said essential, the sense would be of the Apostle's word, that it would be of the essence of the Son.

It seems further that it conjoins both.

1. For when the Apostle says, to the Colossians 1:13, from where this word is drawn, "He has transferred us," etc., it signifies us being transferred into the kingdom: but transfer is not made except of those loved by the lover: therefore, transfer is not made except through the common love of the lover and the loved: charity however is common in which the Holy Spirit proceeds to sanctify the creature to be transferred: therefore, since temporal procession in its understanding encloses the eternal, in common love is enclosed the proper notional: and thus it imports both loves.
2. Likewise, this is taken from the mode of speaking when it is said, "He has transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of charity": for only the sons of adoption are transferred into the kingdom of the Son by nature: therefore, the act of charity is noted to pass into the Son by nature, and into us: but into the Son by nature passes the notional act, because the Father loves the Son by the Holy Spirit, and conversely into us however passes the essential love appropriable to the Holy Spirit in whom it rests: therefore, it seems that it stands for both essential and notional love. This also seems from the conjunction of the two expositions of Augustine: for he explains by saying that "Son of charity" is the same as "Son of his essence," and "beloved Son": and from one exposition is taken substantial love, from the other however notional: therefore, it stands for both.

But on the contrary: A term once taken should not be used equivocally: but this term "charity" is once taken: therefore, it does not stand in a double signification.

Solution. Without prejudice, I agree in this part, that the term "charity" here conjoins both loves, namely both notional and essential, as the expositions of Augustine seem to suggest if they are joined: but it conjoins the essential in the direct, and the notional in the oblique. For the sense is: He has transferred us through common charity into the kingdom of his Son, in whom and from whom proceeds the love, in which the love of charity is given to us. And according to this intention, it does not follow that the Son is the Son of the Holy Spirit; because it does not say that charity in the direct, but it is understood in this. Nor does it follow that the Son is properly the Son of essence: because due to the notion it is understood that charity is of the Son, as of him who is bound with the Father by the bond which is from both.

To the last it must be said, that charity is not taken entirely equivocally, when it is taken for essential and notional; because one is included in the other, as the proper in the appropriated:

one understanding according to the act well receives the proper in the appropriated, because one encloses in itself the other: but it is not so with purely equivocal terms, for in those one is not enclosed in the other according to understanding.

L. That neither the Son nor the Holy Spirit is from nothing, but from something, yet not from matter.

It is also shown from those words that the Son and the Holy Spirit are not from nothing, but from something: yet not from any matter. Hence also Hilary in book XII on the Trinity says: The only-begotten God, since he is born, testifies the Father as author: since he is born from the abiding, he is not born from nothing: and since he is born before time, he surpasses all sense by being born. Here it is openly said that the Son is not born from nothing. Similarly, the Holy Spirit is not to be said to be, or to proceed from nothing: because the Son is born from the substance of the Father, that is, he is from the Father, with whom he is of the same substance, and the same substance. From which sense also is to be taken that: The Father begot what he himself is, that is, the Son who is what the Father is. And this is to be understood as Augustine opens, saying in the first book against Maximinus: the Father begot what he is: otherwise he is not a true Son, if what the Father is, is not the Son. Likewise, the substance of God begot the Son, that is, the Father substance begot the Son, who is the same substance and of the same substance. That this is to be understood thus Augustine shows, saying to Maximinus: As you say, the Spirit begot the Spirit: so say, the Spirit of the same nature: or substance begot the Spirit. Likewise, as you say, God begot God: so say, God of the same nature or substance begot God. If you believe and say this, you will not be accused further about this matter. For by these words he opens how the aforesaid ought to be understood. Similarly, the Son is born from the substance of the Father, or the Father begot the Son from his nature or essence, that is, from himself by nature and essence he begot the Son of the same essence and nature, and who is the same essence and nature. Similarly, explain that, the Son of the substance of the Father, and the Son of the Father's substance, that is, who is substance, with whom and the Son is the same substance, because the Son is consubstantial with the Father. And this sense is aided by these words of Augustine, who in book V on the Trinity says: We say three persons of the same essence, or three persons one essence. But we do not say three persons from the same essence, as if there is something there which is essence, something else which is person. By these words it is shown that it is not to be said that a person is from essence, except from the aforesaid sense: which sense is also confirmed from what in the book on the Trinity the same says: As our knowledge is to the knowledge of God, so also our word which is born from our knowledge, is unlike that Word of God, which is born from the essence of the Father. It is as if he would say, from the knowledge of the Father, from the wisdom of the Father: or, which is more express, from the Father essence, from the Father knowledge, from the Father wisdom. From this same understanding, the Word of God the Father, the only-begotten Son, in all things similar and equal to the Father, is rightly said to be God from God, light from light, wisdom from wisdom, essence from essence: because he is entirely what the Father is, yet not the Father: because this is the Son, that is the Father.

M. Why the Word of the Father is called the Son by nature?

Hence it is, that only the only-begotten of God is called the Son by nature, because he is of the same nature, and is the same nature with the Father. Hence Hilary in book XIV on the Trinity, speaking of Christ, says: He is the Son by nature, because he has the same nature as he who begot him.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Can Be Said, "The Son Is From Nothing"; And Similarly, "The Father Is From Nothing"

Whether it can be said, the Son is from nothing: and similarly, the Father is from nothing?

Whether it can be said, the Son is from nothing: and similarly, the Father is from nothing?

Then it is inquired concerning those things which are said in that chapter. It is also shown from those words, etc., whether the Son is from nothing, or not? However, it seems that yes:

1. For that which is from no pre-existing matter is from nothing: the Son is from no pre-existing matter: therefore the Son is from nothing.
2. Likewise, the Son is not from anything, such that "anything" is of neither gender: but not anything and nothing are equipollent: therefore the Son is from nothing.

Furthermore, it is inquired concerning the Father, whether he is from nothing? And it seems that yes by the authority of Augustine above mentioned:

1. If the Son is from no substance: therefore the Son is from nothing: therefore since the Father is from no substance, the Father is from nothing.
2. Likewise, the Father is from nothing: therefore he is from nothing.
3. Likewise, the Father is not from anything neutrally: therefore from nothing.

On the contrary: Everything that is from nothing is created and changeable, as Damascene says: therefore if the Father is from nothing, he is created and changeable.

Solution. To such sophisms it must be said that none of the divine persons is from nothing: because when it is said, from nothing, by negation the principle is removed from the part before: but by the preposition "from" preceding the negation which remains not extinguished by the negation, because it precedes, an order of being to nothing preceding is posited, that is, that the being of that which is said to be from nothing follows non-being: and this indeed is fitting for all created things, but it is not fitting for the divine persons.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that this is true, the Son is from no matter: because there the negation of the material principle is noted: but it does not follow, therefore from nothing, because of the relation of the preposition which remains.

To the other it must be said that these two are not equipollent: the Son is not from anything: therefore from nothing. Because in the first the negation precedes the preposition: and therefore it extinguishes its relation. In the second however it follows: and therefore the relation of the preposition remains. But if it is inferred from the equipollent, It is not from nothing: therefore from something neutrally: it is not valid again because of the relation of the preposition.

To what is further inquired concerning the Father, it must be said that he is not from nothing.

To the objection against, it must be said that in the Son it follows, because he has a relation to the principle before: and not the Father, and therefore in the Father it does not hold.

To the other it must be said that it does not follow, the Father is from nothing, etc., because this expression, nothing, stands for a person: afterwards however it is inferred neutrally, depriving the principle of existence with the order to nothing which the preposition posits.

To the other it must be said that it does not follow, It is not from anything: therefore from nothing: because in the first the relation of the preposition is deprived, in the second however it is not deprived: therefore, etc.

DISTINCTIO VI

Divisio Textus

Furthermore, it is customarily asked whether the Father begot the Son, etc. Here begins the second part of this treatise on the generation of the Son, in which it is inquired concerning the power inclining to generation on the part of the generator, whether it is necessity, or will, or nature? However, it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is discussed concerning the power inclining in the Father to generate. But because in lower beings the power of generating is in the begotten son, just as in the father, therefore it is inquired in the second part, whether such is also in the Son? And this begins in the following distinction VII, namely there, Here it is customarily asked by some, etc.

The first is divided into three. In the first, the Master raises the question and resolves it by the negation of both parts. In the second, an objection is made against the solution: and he resolves it, there, B, But against this it is opposed, etc. In the third, he returns to the part which he had negated, and resolves it under another sense, there, C, However, the aforementioned words, etc.

In the first of these, he does three things. First, he presents the question of the heretic under division. Second, he negates both parts of the division, there, Neither by will, nor by necessity.

In the third, he presents an instance against the division of the heretic, there, Indeed, some acutely.

Articulus 1 — Whether God Begot The Son From Necessity And Will

Whether God begot the Son out of necessity and will?

Here arises the question concerning this division:

1. It seems, however, that He begot the Son out of necessity: for what is impossible not to be, must be: it is impossible for God not to have a Son: therefore it must be.
2. Likewise, whatever in no part of itself is contingent and possible, in its entirety in essence and act is necessary: God the Father is subject to nothing contingent and possible: therefore in entirety He is necessary: therefore He is the necessary principle of the generation of the Son.
3. Likewise, in eternal things, to be able and to be are the same: but it is necessary for God to be able to beget the Son: therefore it is necessary for God to have begotten the Son: and in eternal things, to have begotten and to beget are the same: therefore God the Father necessarily begets or begot the Son.
4. Furthermore, it is impossible to detract the greatest power from the Omnipotent: but the greatest power is to generate another like Himself: therefore it is impossible to detract this power from God: therefore it is necessary to posit it in Him: therefore He begot the Son out of necessity.
5. Likewise, with nature being communicable, and nothing prohibiting it from being communicated, it is impossible to remove its communication: but the divine nature is communicable, and nothing prohibits the communication from occurring, as was said and proven above: therefore it is impossible for the communication not to occur: therefore it was necessary to generate the Son: because through generation the communication of nature occurs.
6. Likewise, the Philosopher says that things which occur: either always, like necessary things, or frequently, or rarely: but natural things occur always, or frequently, but in necessary things they occur always: it will be held below that God the Father always begot the Son: therefore He necessarily begot the Son.
7. Likewise, Dionysius in the book on Divine Names: The only supersubstantial source of Deity is the Father, neither is the Son the Father, nor the Father the Son, with hymns preserving the proper religion of each of the thearchic persons. Since therefore it is necessary for the source to flow, the Father begot the Son out of necessity.
8. Likewise, in the same, below: The Father indeed is the fountain deity: but the Son and the Holy Spirit are divine offshoots of the deity, if it is proper to say so, and like flowers, and supersubstantial lights we have received from the holy writings. From this it is held that since the Father is the fountain deity, it is impossible for Him not to pour forth and generate the Son.

In the same way, the other part seems able to be proven, namely that He begot the Son by will thus:

1. God wills every good: therefore He wills the greatest good most: but the best is to produce the Son, and to produce the Holy Spirit; therefore He wills this most: therefore He begot Him by will.
2. Likewise, in the Omnipotent every work is subject to will: therefore since to generate (as Damascene says) is a work of nature, this will be subject to will in Him: therefore He begot Him by will.
3. Likewise, either He begot Him by will, or He begot Him not by will: if by will, I have the proposition: if He did not beget Him by will, and He begot: therefore He begot against will, or beyond will; both of which are absurd: therefore He begot the Son by will.
4. Likewise, in all generating beings in which there is purpose, the first inclination to generation is will: therefore also in God: therefore also He begot by will.
5. Likewise, whatever is done not by the will of one who has will, is not praiseworthy: therefore if the Father did not beget the Son by will, the Father is not praiseworthy in the generation of the Son, which is absurd: therefore, etc.
6. Likewise, Augustine says below: If He could beget the Son, and did not will: therefore He is envious: but He was not envious: therefore He could, and willed: therefore He begot by will.
7. Likewise, the Father saying the Word, begot the Son: but to say is always in the will of the one saying: therefore to generate is always in the will of the one generating: therefore He always begot by will.

On the contrary, it is objected thus first that it is against not out of necessity.

1. Every necessity to some act is from the power of a stronger intrinsic or extrinsic: God the Father has nothing stronger than Himself: therefore He does not generate out of necessity. The second is supposed by faith. The first is proven from this that if it is a necessity of nature, it is from the form, which is stronger in the acting thing by necessity than the matter. But if it is a necessity from the extrinsic, then it is a compelling stronger: as it takes in coercion by violence.
2. Likewise, in all those in which there is nature and will, according to due order nature is subject to will: but in God there is nature and will: therefore also in Him nature is subject to will: but what is subject to will, Augustine says is not necessary: therefore in God nothing is necessary: therefore neither the generation of the Son nor any other work, as it seems. The first is proven from the perverse order in us: because through sin it happens that natural powers are not subject to will and reason. The second is proven by this that the highest order is in God.

Against the other part it is objected thus, namely that He did not beget by will:

1. Damascene in two places says that creation is a work of will, but generation is a work of nature: therefore He did not beget by will.
2. Likewise, things are said to be done by will in which the principal mover is will: but in every generation the principal mover is nature: therefore generation is not done by will.
3. Likewise, will is towards willed things: but willed things are external about which there is apprehension in the reason of good: the generation of the Son is not thus about externals: therefore it is not done by will.
4. Furthermore, in humans it is so that the generation of humans does not denote a work of will, but rather mechanical works which are upon other matter: therefore neither in divine things should it be said so.
5. Solution. It must be said according to Hilary in the authorities cited above, that the understanding of the sayings is from causes and therefore must be assumed in speaking: because it is not the word of the thing, but the thing's word that is subject: not every necessity is denied here, nor every will: but necessity and will according to the intention of heretics, which is necessity of violence, and coercion by an agent against will intrinsically or extrinsically: as will be clear when necessity is distinguished: for such necessity is not received by divine generation, nor by God: because the Philosopher says in the fourth book of the Metaphysics: If there were simple and eternal and immobile things, none of them would be by violence, nor against nature. It is clear therefore that such necessity of violence does not fall upon God. But they said will in God is acceding, as Augustine says, or antecedent, which is about a thing before the thing itself is, and which sometimes is with the willing one, and sometimes not: hence if such will were in God, the Father would be mutable who sometimes would will one thing, and sometimes another: and the Son would not be eternal, whose generation the paternal will would have preceded, as it preceded the creation of things. Therefore it must be said according to the Philosopher in the fourth book of the Metaphysics, that necessary is said respectively, and absolutely. Respectively it is said with respect to the intended end, or with respect to the compelling efficient. With respect to the end in two ways, namely with respect to being, and with respect to well-being: as it is necessary for being, without which it is impossible to have or preserve being, like breath and nourishment in animals: with respect to well-being, without which the intended end in well-being is not had, like the acceptance of a debt from an Athenian citizen is not had unless one sails to Athens: therefore sailing to Athens is necessary for the acceptance of the debt. With respect to the efficient, similarly it is in two ways, namely with respect to the agent outside, and with respect to the agent inside. With respect to the agent outside, as Dionysius said, that necessary is distressing, and violence is some necessity: and a certain Philosopher Ariotas said, Violence by necessity compels me to do these things. With respect to the compelling inside, as it is said in 3 Esdras, iii, 12, that above all truth conquers: because it compels consent: and in this way the Philosopher says that necessity does not allow the one opining to return to the truth, and to be changed from his opinion. Absolutely, however, necessary is (as the Philosopher says) what is impossible to be otherwise and this is in three ways, namely per se, and per aliud, and composed of both: per se, like principles: per aliud, like a determined conclusion: from both, like a syllogism. And similarly it is in an incomplex being. Hence the Philosopher says that necessary absolutely and per se is only one simple first: for all other things composed from their components draw necessity, and the components from the first efficient: and therefore they are possible according to those from which they have necessity: because first by intellect in them they are in potency than in necessity. According to this division, we will say that only God is the necessary first. There are, however, many other ways in which the reason of necessity is not preserved except equivocally, as we are accustomed to say useful necessary, and expedient necessary.

Having these, it is easy to respond to that part of the objections which are about the necessary: for all those reasons and the authorities of Dionysius brought forward, plainly speak of the simple and absolute necessary, which is especially God: and by this necessity He generates the Son: nor does any inconvenience follow in Him.

In the same way, we distinguish multiple will in the second way. For there is will as a willing power, and it is the mover of other powers which are in the willing one, like the will of the willed outside, like food, or drink, or another, and in this way the work of will is creation: because that is outside God. But according to which will is as it were the mover of other powers, as when it is said, I will to understand, I will to walk, it can be understood according to the Master in three ways, namely antecedent as it is as it were disposing the willing one: and this is the will of premeditation about the work how it ought to be done, as the carpenter premeditates in which part of the material he will make the bottom of the ark, and in which the cover, and in which the wall. There is also the acceding will: and this in two ways, namely acceding to the work, and acceding to the willing one: acceding to the work is that which immediately precedes the work, as it is the will to work, like striking with an axe, and the like: acceding to the willing one is that which he did not always have, but it accedes to him from a new apprehension of something apprehended moving the will. The third is the will concurrent with the work, which is called concomitant: and by this will the Father begot the Son, because He willed the generation: and from this last proceed the reasons induced for this that He begot the Son by will, as is clear to one inspecting each.

But the reasons which are induced to prove that He did not necessarily beget the Son, follow from necessity by coercion: and this necessary cannot fall upon God, as has been said.

Similarly, the other reasons which are induced for this that He did not beget by will, are taken from the will of externals: the first and second and third from the preceding will, according to which the divine generation is not a work of will, as has been said.

And thus the solution to all other objections is clear at once.

Articulus 2 — Whether God, Willing Or Unwilling, Begot The Son

Whether God willingly or unwillingly begot the Son?

Then it is inquired concerning what the heretic says: God begot the Son willingly or unwillingly, etc.

For it seems necessary that one part be given, since parts are distinguished by affirmation and negation: therefore it is necessary that one be verified of anything.

Furthermore, it is inquired, Since it could in some sense be given that God willingly begot the Son, why did the Catholic doctors not give it under distinction, but simply denied it?

It must be said that these, willingly and unwillingly, are not opposed by affirmation and negation: for when negation is intrinsic with will, in one expression the will remains affirmed, but the willed thing of which there is speech is denied: whence the same is "I do not want," as "I want the contrary." And if it is objected that in the subjunctive mood the will seems to be denied, when it is said, "I want not," "you do not want," "he does not want," etc., it must be said that it is frivolous, indeed in the subjunctive mood the will also remains affirmed, according to which it is the subjunctive of this verb, "I do not want"; because then it has the force of one expression, this which is said, "you do not want," and "he does not want." But if it were divided thus, either willingly or not willingly: then it would be by affirmation and negation: and then according to the intention of the heretic to be avoided, this would have to be given, not willingly: for from this does not follow coercion, but the will approaching the willing and the willed is denied, as was said above.

To the other it must be said that the holy Doctors wished more to restrain and confound the heretic by insisting, than to dispute with him before the simple: because insistence causes silence and induces confusion, and this was expedient for the simple, that they might see him unable to succeed: but afterwards they treated the truth of the solution separately with the gentle, as the Master said above.

Articulus 3 — Whether These Authorities Of The Saints Are True, Who Say That He Begot The Son By Will

Are these authorities of the Saints true, who say that He begot the Son by will?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the second part, B, This, however, is easy to refute, etc.

1. For certain Saints seem to expressly say that He begot by will: hence Hilary in book III on the Trinity: He begot the incomprehensible and ineffable only-begotten before all time and before the ages from those things which were unbegotten in Him, imparting all that God is through His charity and power: but charity is a disposition of the will: therefore He begot by will.

2. Likewise, Hilary: From the whole Father the whole Son is born: not from elsewhere, because nothing before the Son: not in part, because the fullness of deity is in the Son: nor in some things, because in all things: but as He willed who was able, and as He knew who begot.
3. Likewise, Origen: The Father of the Word was made a sprout bringing forth by will.
4. Likewise, To the same is the reason: for Augustine says in book IX on the Trinity, that the birth of the mind is preceded by the desire of the thing to be sought, which afterwards becomes the love of the known: therefore, since the divine birth is the birth of the mind, because it is the word, it seems that the preceding will preceded the birth of the Son.
5. Likewise, In all things in which nature and will concur in the same work, will precedes the work as inclining and moving first: and this happens because of the freedom of will; therefore it also seems that in God the work of nature, which is generation, will precedes at least according to reason.
6. Furthermore, As movers differ, so do the moved: but nature and will are two movers: therefore according to their difference is the difference of works and motions: but will is nobler than nature: therefore its work is nobler: therefore since the work of divine generation is most noble, it ought to be the preceding work.

But against this is what Hilary says in the book on Synods: If anyone says that the Son was made by the will of God as if from creatures, let him be anathema.

Solution. It must be said that the will approaching and preceding does not fall in God with respect to the generation of the Son: and the two authorities of Hilary first introduced are understood of the will concurring with the work or accompanying the work, as we said above.

To the other, it must be said that the sprout of will is called by Origen in which the pleasure of the Father rested, as He Himself said, Matthew 3:17: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

To the other, it must be said that the love precedes the birth of the mind, not the birth, but of giving birth: and this is while the mind seeks what it may bring forth: but the love of the birth, which is perfect love, follows the birth according to reason: but the highest perfection is in God: and therefore there is not in Him the desire of a thing not had, or not made. Hence Augustine speaks there of the created mind seeking because of the imperfection of its knowledge.

To the other, it must be said that that reasoning holds in created rational nature, of which one part is better than another, and one commanding and one commanded. But it is not so in divine nature: and therefore in God will does not precede nature.

To the other, it must be said that if this proposition is generally understood, as the operators differ so do the works, it is false: because the works of nature of many are better than the works of will: in God, however, will and nature are the same according to the thing: yet not of whatever there is one, of the same there is also the other: because they differ in subjects, and in reason, as the Master says in the Sentence.

But the other things that are said here are manifest by themselves.

DISTINCTIO VII

Divisio Textus

Here it is customary to inquire by some, etc. Here begins that part in which the Master asks, Whether the same power of generating is in the Son as is in the Father? It is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master asks, Whether the Father generating the Son is something possible that pertains to the Son, or not? In the second he asks, Whether the Father by nature being able to generate the Son is a power pertaining to the Son or not? and this begins there, F, Likewise, it is asked by some, etc.

The first of these is subdivided into three. In the first, he touches upon the question and solves it. In the second, he objects through the words of Augustine against the manner of his solution, there, B, But In the third, it greatly moves us, etc. he applies the solution, there, E, Therefore it can be understood thus, etc.

The first of these is contained entirely in the first chapter, which contains in itself three things, namely the question, Whether the Father could or willed to generate the Son? and the solution of this question, there, To which cunning, And thirdly, the confirmation of this solution by a likeness, there, By a likeness also we can see this, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Father Could Have Or Willed To Beget The Son

Whether the Father could or willed to generate the Son?

Here arises a threefold doubt. The first is, Whether the Father could or willed to generate the Son? The second is, Whether this is to be able to do something? The third is, Whether to be able and to will are said only with respect to those things which are subject to power and will, or also with respect to others?

Concerning the first, it is proceeded thus: 1. In the preceding distinction, it was denied that the Son is the Son by the will of the Father: therefore, it seems that this part of the distinction is not true, that the Father willed to generate the Son: for whatever someone willed, he willed by will.

1. Likewise, when it is said, he willed to generate, it follows from the manner of speaking that the will preceded the act of generation: but this does not agree in divine matters: therefore, this is not true, he willed to generate.

Similarly, the other part seems false: 1. He could generate, because it is signified that power precedes the act.

1. Furthermore, in the Father there are not distinct powers, as in us, that one according to reason is a generative power by the mode of nature, and another is of reason by the mode of will commanding the act: therefore, the power of generation and the will of generating are the same: and since he did not generate by will, neither did he generate by power, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, he could generate, either by active power or passive power: because there are no more. If active, against: Active power is the principle of changing into another according to what it is another, as the Philosopher says in the fifth book of Metaphysics: therefore, there must be something that receives the action of such a transmutation: and this would be the patient from it; therefore, divine generation would be upon matter, which is absurd. But if by passive power, this is more absurd: because passive power (as the Philosopher says in the same place) is the principle of transmutation from another according to what it is another: therefore, the Father would have generated from another being transmuted, and thus he would rather be called mother than father.

For the sake of THIS, it is further inquired, Why he is rather called father by reason of his generation than mother?

And why the begotten is rather called Son than Daughter?

1. For if he is called father by reason of the fact that he is the principle not receptive of generation from elsewhere, this does not seem sufficient: because fire generates its species in the matter of air, and does not have another principle of its generation: and yet fire in the matter of air is not called the son of another fire: therefore, by reason of that principle, he cannot be called father.
2. If it is said, that by reason of this he is called father because he is the principle of generation, and because he gives substance. Against: Either he gives substance as in which the form is impressed by generation, or he gives substance as which is impressed in another recipient, or he gives the whole substance which he himself is. If in the first way, then he gives matter: because that is what is given thus, that the form which is received by generation is impressed in it: and this is absurd in divine generation: and yet he who we call father in lower things gives this substance with active power: therefore, since the superior father does not give such, either he should not be called father, or he will be called father equivocally. But if the substance which is impressed is given: since that substance is nothing but form, it would be necessary that it be other than that substance in which it is impressed, and divine generation would again be composite and material, which is frivolous. But if he gives the whole substance: since the whole substance of the Father is the hypostasis of the Father, the Father gives to the Son the same hypostasis which he himself is: therefore, the Father and the Son are one hypostasis, and one thing of nature, and one person, which is absurd: therefore, it seems that in no way can he be called Father: nor can he who is begotten be fittingly called Son, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that the Father both could and willed to generate or beget the Son.

To what is objected about the will, it must be said that it is not the same to say, the Son of the will, and the Son by will, and he willed to generate: for the first is absolutely false: because the work of the will is what is brought forth upon external matter to the worker, as are the mechanical works of the will of man, and the works of the will of the divine creature. And if it is objected that the will in God is the divine nature, and the Son is of nature: therefore, in some way he must be called the Son of the will. There falls the fallacy of the accident: because although nature and will are the same in reality, yet they differ greatly in the mode of signifying and attributing, as the Master proved above. However, the Son by will is in some way conceded as accompanying or concurring with the act by will. But when it is said, he willed to generate, the will is signified concerning the act of generation: and therefore it is true: because God with a concurrent act had will in divine generation.

To the other, it must be said that this is not signified by the mode of speaking in divine matters, as they are divine: because thus the word must be abstracted from time: and if this is done, then the will and the act of generation are similar: and thus the expression is true: because the Father does not have the act of generation except concurrent with will, and conversely.

To what is objected about the power which is signified in the word, could, it must be said that such arguments proceed from a wrong understanding, namely from this that what is in God is understood in the manner of creatures, in which to be able precedes to act. Hence in divine matters such things must be abstracted from time and composition: and then it will be seen that the power of generating does not precede the act of generation, nor does it make composition with it, because for God to act and to be able are the same.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that in the heavenly Father there are not distinct powers: because otherwise he would be composite. But although they are not distinct according to reality and composition, yet they are distinct in the mode of signifying and attributing, because many things are subject to power which are not subject to will: and God can do many things which he does not will: and so it is with the power of generating and the will of generating.

To the other, it must be said that if we wish to make the greatest force in acting and suffering, then in God there is neither active power nor passive power: but rather there is in him a superactive power. However, that division of the Philosopher holds in physically acting or suffering powers. Hence that active physical power seeks a subject which receives its action, this is from its imperfection: for if its action were perfect, it would produce the whole at once: and if it were perfectly noble, it would produce without composition most similar to the agent. Hence time, motion, composition, subject, all arise from the imperfection of the agent or recipient. Hence in divine matters there is a superactive power of the Father for producing the whole Son in the same essence coeternal and simple.

To what is further inquired, Whether for this reason he should rather be called father than mother? It must be said, that yes, inasmuch as nothing is so truly called father as he, as was proved above. However, he can in no way be called mother: because mother is she who generates in herself from another: this, however, in no way befits the Father: and therefore he is only father, nor is he such a father that he needs the help of a similar one in generation, for three reasons: one of which is, because the help of a wife is given to a man on account of his imperfection which does not fall into God. The second is, that generation is received in the help from the man: and therefore it needs time of conception and impregnation and birth: in which time the son existing in potency cannot be coeternal or coeval with the parents. The third reason is, because every such born is composed of the double substance of father and mother. The first of these, however, is repugnant to the perfection of power, the second to the coeternity of the born itself, the third, however, to simplicity.

To what is objected, that only the active principle does not suffice for the reason of father, it must be said that this is true, nor is the heavenly father only an active principle: indeed he gives his substance: and I well concede, that the whole.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that hypostasis and person are substance: yet they do not suppose as substance, but as to something: and therefore there is in the argument a change of category: for that the Father is substance, is because there is no composition in divine matters, not from the reason of father, because he is father, indeed thus he is other. Hence the Master here in the Letter promises to prove that to be father is not to be something, but to be to something.

To what is inquired, Whether the begotten should rather be called Son than Daughter? It must be said, that yes: because that most perfect generation cannot be except in one entirely similar: however, a daughter is not entirely similar to the father, neither in truth nor in figure, and therefore the born in eternal generation cannot be called daughter.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Power To Beget Is To Something, Or Something

Whether the ability to generate is towards something, or something?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether the ability to generate is the ability for something?

1. And it seems that it is not: because the Master says in the Text, that the ability or will to generate the Son is not the ability or will for something.
2. Furthermore, powers are distinguished by acts: therefore, the power of that which is something will be the power by which it is able for something: and the power of that which is towards something will be the power by which it is able towards something, and not something: since therefore to generate is towards something, the ability to generate will be towards something, and not something.

3. Furthermore, the ability to generate is said to be fitting to the Father, and not to the Son, or the Holy Spirit: but the Father and the Son are distinguished in nothing except in that which is towards something: therefore the ability to generate is not something, but towards something.

4. Furthermore, in lower things it is thus, that active powers are according to properties disposing towards act, as to heat is of fire according to the property of the hot, and to shine according to the property which is light, and so of others: therefore since to generate is the act of the Father, whence he is Father, and not whence the divine substance is, the property which constitutes the power towards that act will be of the Father in that he is Father, and not whence the divine substance is: but in that he is Father, it is towards something: therefore the property making according to the reason of understanding, the power of generating in him, is towards something, and not something: therefore the power which is from that property according to the reason of understanding, will be towards something, and not something absolutely.

5. If perhaps someone might say, that this property which according to the reason of understanding...

§ 1. [...of understanding] makes the power of generating, is in the Father not only according to what makes the Father the Father, but according to what makes Him be. On the contrary: Augustine says that the Father is not by paternity, but by substance, and the Son and Holy Spirit are the same: therefore that property which makes the power of generating in the Father, is found in the same way in the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore it will also do the same in them, because it would be absurd to say that the essence is otherwise in the Father than in the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore the first point returns, that the power of generating is not a something (aliquid), but a toward-something (ad aliquid).

§ 2. 6. If perhaps it is said (as some have said) that when it is said, "The power of generating is in the Father," it can be understood as a disposed power, or an undisposed one: if in the first way, then it is a toward-something: if in the second way, then it is a something: and in the first way it belongs only to the person of the Father, in the second way it belongs to the nature. On the contrary: The Philosopher says that an undisposed power is indifferently related to being and non-being: but it is impossible to posit such a power to generate and not generate in God, neither in him inasmuch as he is father, nor in him inasmuch as he is nature: because Hilary says that he generates in himself by the power of a generating nature: therefore this solution cannot stand.

§ 3. 7. Moreover, When I say, "Disposed power," the disposition belongs to the same thing to which the power previously belonged: for dispositions are not given to powers so that they become something further than they previously were, but so that they are perfected for acts: therefore if a disposed power belongs to the person, and is toward-something, then the undisposed power will also belong to the same thing and also be toward-something.

§ 4. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. To the act of nature there is only the power of nature: generation is an act of nature: therefore the power of generating is a power of nature: therefore the power of generating is a power of the substance of the generator.

§ 5. 2. Moreover, Every power is rooted in something according to the account of understanding: but this is the nature, as Hilary says: therefore the power of generating will be a power of the nature and not of the person: therefore it will be a something, and not only a toward-something.

§ 6. 3. Moreover, Damascene says that generation is from the substance of the generator: therefore the power of generating is a power of the substance of the generator, and not a toward-something.

§ 7. 4. Moreover, The Philosopher says that generation is called nature, in that it is a way into nature: therefore the power of generating will be in the nature.

§ 8. 5. Moreover, The Master says here, that the power of generating is some power: but some power is a something: therefore, etc.

§ 9. Solution. Speaking without prejudice (because many have said many things here) I say, that the power of generating, according to the account of understanding, is a mean between the purely essential and the purely personal: and this is clear if it is divided: for every power is essential, but every generation is personal: hence the power of generating, taken conjointly insofar as the power is in act, is a mean between the essential and the notional or personal: and of that mean, what belongs to the power holds itself on the side of nature: but what belongs to the act holds itself on the side of the notion and the person. And if it is said that between essence and person there is no mean. The response is that this is true according to the thing: but according to the account of understanding nothing prohibits there being a mean: according to this, therefore, properly speaking, the power of generating will belong to the nature insofar as it is in this person: hence according to some account of itself it is a what (quid), according to some account of itself it is a toward-something: for many things are so essential that through their conjunction with notional things they belong to that person whose notion it is, and not to another: and if they are divided from that notional thing, they belong equally to all persons, as an example is when I say, "God generating," so that the word "generating" is placed adjectivally and joined transitively with the word "God": for then "God generating" will not be the Son or the Holy Spirit: and if the word "God" is divided by the intellect from the word "generating," so namely that the word "generating" is understood substantivally, or a composition intercedes between the word "generating" and the word "God," then the Son will be generating, that is, he will be God who is God generating, and similarly the Holy Spirit: because the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one and the same God, as was held above. Having established these things, one must respond to the objections.

§ 11. It must therefore be said to the first, that the Master considers the ability to generate from that part by which it is united to the notional according to the intellect, and not from the other part: and therefore he says it is a toward-something, and not a what.

§ 12. To the other it must be said, that this is true, that powers are distinguished and defined by acts: but nevertheless they are not necessarily placed in the genus of acts, because acts in divine things are in the genus of relation: and therefore it is not necessary that the power be in the same genus: for to be distinguished and to be placed in a genus are not the same: because distinction is made for the sake of cognition, but genus pertains to the nature of the thing. And if it is objected, that they are defined by acts, and a definition is given through those things which are of the same nature: it must be said that active powers, whatever may also be the case concerning passive ones, do not have to be defined by acts, except as the prior is defined by the posterior: and such definitions are not of the thing, but are relative to us: and therefore since the power of generating is active, that objection does not compel.

§ 13. TO THE OTHER it must be said, that the ability to generate does not signify something belonging to the Father, except on account of this, because it is a mean not between the nature and just any person, but between the nature and the person of the Father: hence that it does not belong to the Son, is from nothing else except from that which it has of the notional of the Father, and not on account of this which it has of the essential, by grace of which it itself is called a what: hence because it belongs to the nature in the Father, if we properly wished to assign a genus to it according to the whole that is in it, we would say that it itself is a what toward-something (quid ad aliquid).

§ 14. To the other it must be said, that some powers are for producing the whole being, and others for consequent works: hence those which are for producing the whole being must necessarily be rooted in the very nature of the thing in some way, as is the power of generating, according to what Boethius defines nature, that nature is a force implanted in things procreating like things from like things. But powers for works consequent upon being are rooted in the properties of the composite, as the power of heating is rooted in the heat of fire, which is a property consequent to the being of fire: hence in divine things, according to the mode of understanding which we can have, the power of generating is rooted in the nature insofar as it is a person.

§ 15. TO THAT which is further objected, that the nature is the same in the Father and the Son, it must be said in the same way, that this is true: but the comparison of the nature to the Son and to the Holy Spirit is not the same: because in the person of the Father it is compared to the person of the Father, and has in this comparison some mean according to the account of understanding, which it does not have from the comparison of itself to the Son and to the Holy Spirit: and therefore it is not necessary that the power of generating, taken conjointly, as was said, should be in the Son and the Holy Spirit.

§ 16. TO THAT which is objected against the solution saying [that there is a] disposed power and an undisposed power, I readily concede that it is an incautious solution, and does not have proper words in divine things: and if it were true, yet still it would not contribute to the proposition: because a disposition does not make a power to be of a certain genus, as the objection proves.

§ 17. BUT TO THOSE ARGUMENTS which are introduced for this, that the power of generating belongs to the nature, this must be conceded in the manner in which it was stated.

§ 18. To that which is finally objected from this which the Master says, that the power of generating is some power, it must be said that this is true: for to be some power is common to toward-something and to § 19. something: for we have said above, that the power of generating names a something and a toward-something conjointly: and through this the solution to all the objections is clear.

Articulus 3 — On The Things And With Respect To Which The Divine Power Is, Whether With Respect To Subjects Only

Concerning what things and with respect to what things is the divine ability, whether with respect to subjected things only?

§ 22. Thirdly it is asked, Whether ability and will in God are spoken of only with respect to those things which are subjected to His power and will, or also with respect to other things?

§ 23. And concerning this two things are to be asked, namely, concerning what things is the divine ability? And whether there is a single power for the ability to generate and for the ability to create?

§ 24. 1. Now it seems that it is spoken of with respect to subjected things only: because the Author says so in the Text, that therefore the Son is not less powerful than the Father: "because the ability and will to generate the Son is not one of those things which are subjected to divine power": but this would be nothing if the power were of anything other than subjected things: because from this the Son would not be proved equal to the Father in power.

§ 25. 2. Also, Power according to its account follows the being of the powerful one: therefore omnipotence also follows the being of the omnipotent one: but the generation of the Son does not follow according to its account the being of the omnipotent one: therefore it seems that the omnipotence of the Father is not spoken of with respect to generation. This also seems to be held from the Text: because he says, "For he did not previously will, or have the ability, before he generated: just as he did not previously exist before he generated: because he existed from eternity, and from eternity he generated: therefore the power of the three persons is one, just as their essence is one." Since therefore the power of the Son, according to the account of understanding, is consequent to the Son, but the power of generating, according to the account of understanding, is prior to the Son, it seems the power of God is only with respect to things subjected to power, and not with respect to generation.

§ 26. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It is a greater thing to generate the Son than all the things which are subjected to divine power: therefore the strength of power is maximally considered with respect to that: therefore it seems that if such power is not in the Son, he would fall short of the Father in the maximum strength of power, and thus will not be omnipotent.

§ 27. 2. Also, The account of a principle is reduced to the account of power: since therefore the Father is a principle not from a principle, but the Son is a principle from a principle, it seems that the Father has some power which the Son does not have.

§ 28. Solution. It must be said that the omnipotence of God is considered with respect to those things which are outside, and follow upon the common ability of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, as the Master says in the Text.

§ 29. To this, however, which is objected, it must be said that to generate is not a something (majus aliquid), but a toward-something (ad aliquid), as the Master says. Nor is the Father shown by this to be something, or powerful to be something, but rather toward-something: nevertheless I readily concede, that the generation of the Son is infinitely greater than the whole world: although in creation power appears, but in generation property: because according to this which is the account of power, the Son is not distinguished from the Father, nor the Holy Spirit, nor conversely.

§ 30. To the other it must be said, that the account of principle is twofold, namely for making, and this is reduced to the account of power: and there is the account of principle not for making, but for distinguishing and being distinguished, and this is not reduced, nay rather in that part it is only a toward-something, and not a something. But on that part which holds itself with the essence, it has the account of power, and thus is common to the three persons.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Power Is Univocal To The Ability To Beget And The Ability To Create

Whether the power for the ability to generate and the ability to create is univocal?

Whether the power for the ability to generate and the ability to create is univocal?

§ 33. Secondly it is asked, Whether the power for the ability to generate and the ability to create is univocal?

§ 34. 1. It seems that it is not: because one speaks of a something, the other speaks of a toward-something: but something and toward-something are not of one genus: therefore neither of one account: therefore it is spoken of equivocally concerning them.

§ 35. 2. Also, Powers are defined by acts: but the act of creating and of generating is not one: therefore power is not spoken of in one way concerning them.

§ 36. 3. Also, That cannot be taken according to one account which in a certain account belongs to the three in common, and in a certain account only to one of the three: but the power of generating belongs only to one of the three, but the power of creating belongs to all three in common: therefore it seems that power is not spoken of univocally.

§ 37. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Every equivocal thing is in some way of a diverse nature to which a diverse account corresponds: but in God there is no diversity of nature: therefore in God nothing is equivocal to another: but the power of creating is in God, similarly the power of generating: therefore power spoken of them will not be spoken of equivocally.

§ 38. 2. Also, The power of creating is really identical with the one creating, and the one creating with the one generating: therefore the power of creating is the power of generating: but things which are spoken of equivocally are distinct and not predicated of one another reciprocally, because the barking dog is not the marine dog: therefore power will not be spoken of equivocally concerning the power of generating and the power of creating.

§ 39. 3. Also, When omnipotence is said, the word "all" (omnis) which is in composition with the word "power" distributes for all things which God is able to do: therefore as much for generating as for creating, and thus for other things: but if they were equivocal, it would not be distributed for them: therefore it seems that it is not spoken of equivocally.

§ 40. Solution. It must be said that power is not spoken of equivocally concerning them insofar as power is taken abstracting from both: for otherwise it is not predicated of both, except as it abstracts from both: and according to this there remains the power which is rooted in the essence of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

§ 41. TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said, that according as power abstracts both from generating and from creating, it does not signify a toward-something, but nay rather it signifies a something which belongs to the substance.

§ 42. To the other it must be said, that this is not true of active powers: since they are not perfected by their acts, but are previously perfected: because nothing acts unless it is perfect in being. In passive powers, however, in which there are the acts of active powers, as in a disposed patient, it is true that they are perfected and defined by acts: and in such a sense the Philosopher says that proposition in II De Anima , where he deals with passive apprehending powers, as he himself says in the same place: but in God there is no passive power: and therefore that objection is null.

§ 43. To the other it must be said, that power is taken according to one common account, according as it abstracts both from the act of creating and from the act of generating, and is in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit: but according as it is conjoined to the act of generating and creating, although it is not made other than it previously was, nevertheless it will then have another mode of signifying, by reason of which the power of generating does not belong to the Son nor to the Holy Spirit: but the power of creating belongs to the three: and the reason for this is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Son Can From Himself Beget Another Son, A Grandson Of The Father, And Whether The Father Can Beget Many Sons

Whether the Son can beget from himself another Son, a grandson of the Father, and whether the Father can beget several Sons?

§ 47. "But it strongly moves us, etc." By reason of this chapter it is asked, Whether the Son can beget from himself another Son who would be a grandson of the Father?

§ 48. 1. Now it seems that he can: for in lower things we see that the same force of fecundity is in the son which is in the father: since therefore the Son of God is not less perfect than a son of man, he will seem to himself have the same power of generating which the Father also has.

§ 49. 2. Also, Augustine says in the Text, not that he could not, but that it was not fitting: therefore it does not seem that it is from a defect of generative power that he did not produce a Son.

§ 50. 3. Moreover, on account of this the Son is called the image of the Father: because he agrees with him in all things: therefore also in generative power, and thus it seems that he can produce another Son.

§ 51. Moreover, it is asked next to this further,

§ 52. Whether the Father could have produced more sons than one?

§ 53. 1. And it seems that he could: because in lower things in which there is imperfect power, a father by the same power produces several sons: therefore much more can the superior Father produce several.

§ 54. 2. Moreover, the Son having been begotten, either the power of generating remained in the Father, or not: if so, since in eternal things to be and to be able are the same, the Father begot Sons: if not, then it seems that the Father failed in something once the Son was begotten, which is absurd.

§ 55. 3. Moreover, what inconvenience would there be if the progression of divine generation were unmeasured [immoderata], which Augustine posits as an inconvenience? It seems none: because the multiplication of a good makes a greater good: therefore much more the multiplication of the best: but through many divine generations there would be a multiplication of the best: therefore it seems that it ought to be.

§ 56. 4. Also, just as was held in the preceding, a nature of itself is communicable: therefore as far as it is of itself, it is just as communicable to many, as to two, or three: and thus as communicable in the Son, as in the Father: since therefore it is not contracted by distinguishing features, owing to the fact that they do not fall into it, it will be communicated: and thus it seems that the progression of divine generation ought to be unmeasured.

§ 57. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Of no nature can there be multiplication and communication without a receiver of that nature through the mode by which a supposit receives a nature: but there cannot be a plurality of supposits, unless there is a plurality of distinguishing features distinguishing the supposits from one another. Let us see therefore in what ways supposits can be distinguished in one nature, and let us apply all the ways to the divine nature, and see how much the plurality of its supposits can be extended. Now there is one way through the matter in which the nature is in the supposit: and it is established that this way cannot be in divine things for three causes: one of which is that every communication of nature which occurs through matter occurs through the transmutation of matter: but in God there is no transmutation. The second is, since every such communication divides the nature, such that it itself is not one in number in the supposits, but one in account only. The third is, since every such multiplication is first in potency before in act: all of which are removed from the divine nature: therefore it is clear that there is not there a communication through the particulation of matter, that is, through this, that matter particulates the nature over a supposit. Now there is another way which is through properties making and constituting and distinguishing a supposit, although what it is from which it is is indifferent: and this sole way is possible in divine things: and let the properties of origin between the Father and the Son be taken (because concerning the Holy Spirit it will be clear below) nothing will be found except paternity and filiation: but these cannot be numbered through matter, as was proved: therefore they will not be numbered except through specific differences: but every paternity is the same in species as every paternity which is of a supposit of the same nature: similarly every filiation to every filiation: since therefore several sons either of one father or of their own sons do not differ in essence, if they have a difference, that will be taken according to properties: but their filiations do not differ in species or in matter: therefore their filiation will be one only: therefore they all will be one son differing neither in essence nor in property: therefore there cannot in any way be in divine things several sons, nor several fathers by the same reasoning.

§ 58. Also, Although communication is of the perfection of a simple nature, nevertheless multiplication is of its imperfection. PROOF. Multiplication in the supposits of one nature cannot be except for one of three causes, namely the multiple desire of matter, owing to the fact that matter does not desire to be perfected only in one part, but in all parts: or owing to the fact that it cannot be saved perpetually in a few, and therefore desires to have the form in many, so that, some being destroyed, it may remain in many: or from the fact that there are many acts or motions which it cannot fulfill with a few. In the first and second way it is in human beings, and other generable and corruptible things. In the third way it is in Angels and stars. Now it is established that in none of these ways can multiplication be in divine things. For the first and second are through the parts of matter which is not in God. But the third is on account of the imperfection of the agent and mover which cannot cause diverse things by one motor: therefore such a multiplication of supposits is not in the divine nature: therefore it will not be except according to the species of the properties of origin: and thence it follows as before.

§ 59. Also, The intellect of a speaker within himself is well able according to its own nature to bring forth a word to himself: but he cannot bring forth two such words, nor does one word bring forth another word: since therefore the highest spirit generates a word through this mode, he neither can bring forth two words, nor will a word produce another word: and thus there will be only one father and one son.

§ 60. Moreover, For the communication of nature and the joyousness of society one is sufficient: therefore others, even if they could be generated, would be superfluous.

§ 61. Solution. One must consent to these last arguments, by saying that there cannot be except one God the Father, and one Son: because they all conclude of necessity. For although the last argument is or seems to be of fittingness, if nevertheless the argument of Anselm is conjoined to it, it will be necessary, namely that whatever minimum inconvenience in God is impossible.

§ 62. It must therefore be said to the first, that the same power is in the Son which is in the Father, but not to the same thing, as is easily clear from the preceding: nor from this is there an imperfection in the Son that he does not bring forth another Son, but rather a perfection, since he himself so contains the whole being of the Son, that if there were another, in no way could he differ from him.

§ 63. To the other the Master responds below saying: "For he did not lack the ability (non enim non potuit)," that is, he was not impotent from this: but what Augustine says, "it was not fitting," conjoined to the statement of Anselm, makes an impossibility: for if it was not fitting, it was inconvenient: therefore impossible for God: if therefore the vain and the frustrated are removed from lower nature, much more so from the superior nature.

§ 64. To the other it must be said, that he himself could not be an image in the property of the Father: because thus the account of the Father would cease, since the father and the son would differ neither in essence nor in property: hence an image according to its account always saves in something the account of distinction, in which it neither agrees nor can agree with him of whom it is the image: for by this very fact that it is an image, it is from another, but this is not to be dissimilar in something, but rather in that it is not a something, but a toward-something.

§ 65. To that which is further asked, Whether he could have produced several sons? it is clear through the preceding that he could not: because those sons would differ neither in essence nor in property: and thus they would be the same in all things, and not several: and therefore it is not similar concerning a lower father, in whom several sons are distinguished through matter, and through form according to the being which they have in this matter.

§ 66. To the other it must be said, that the power of generating does not fail in the Father, nor is this to ask something, Whether it also fails for the begotten Son, as if the generation of the Son were past? because in eternity and in the eternal nothing has passed, and nothing arrives: and therefore the Son is neither before nor after the power of generation, but in the standing 'now' is always begotten, as will be held below. For he is said to be always begotten: not because his generation has passed, but because it is perfect and always [present]: because it never fails in the standing 'now' of eternity: hence that objection proceeds concerning God as if concerning a temporal thing, and therefore is not valid.

§ 68. To the other it must be said, that divine generation cannot be unmeasured: owing to the fact that hypostases cannot be multiplied beyond three: and it would be the inconvenience which was stated above, namely that either from the fact that it could not be saved in a few, or that a few supposits would not suffice for many modes of acts if it were made unmeasured: and therefore the unmeasured cannot happen in God.

§ 69. To the other it must be said, that a nature of itself is communicable: but communication demands a distinction taken according to properties diverse in species and not in matter: and these cannot be beyond three in divine things, as is clear from the preceding.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Three Hypostases Can Be The Father Of Some Fourth

Whether three hypostases can be the father of some fourth?

§ 72. Next it is asked concerning this which he says by objecting to the contrary: "If the Son could beget, he could be a father, etc."

§ 73. For it seems that the argument of the Master is not valid: because if he were a father according to the heretics, then the same heresy could say that paternity is, and that the son is the father of that fourth, and thus he would be father and son by diverse respects, as often happens.

§ 74. To this it must be said, that this could not be: because as Anselm says, in all things unity remains in divine things where the opposition of relation does not distinguish: but in the generation of that fourth, the Son would be opposed neither to the Father nor to the Holy Spirit: therefore by one paternity all three would be the fathers of that son, just as the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, owing to the fact that in spirating the Holy Spirit, the Father does not have a relative opposition to the Son. Now the like of this is found neither in corporal nor in spiritual nature, that by one property of a father three hypostases are the father, or the fathers of one: hence there cannot be a father of some fourth.

Articulus 7 — Whether Because The Son Could Be Born, He Could Also Be Changed

Whether because the son could be born, could he also be changed?

§ 77. Next it is objected concerning this: "For if he could be born, to be the Son, and thus he could be changeable, etc."

§ 78. 1. For this does not seem to be true: because to be a son is not something with respect to which or towards which there is motion: for motion and change are not in a relation: and therefore it does not seem to follow, that he could be changed.

§ 79. 2. Moreover, The Father could be incarnated, and also the Holy Spirit, as is held below: but he who is incarnated is born: therefore he is changed according to this text, which is false.

§ 80. Solution. It must be said, that although in a toward-something and toward a toward-something there is no motion per se, nevertheless toward it there is motion per accidens, which is in all the predicaments, as the Philosopher says: but per se and per accidens motion do not fall upon God.

§ 81. To the other it must be said, that incarnation does not signify an immutation of God or of the divine nature: but rather that another, namely the human nature, holds itself in another way to it, because [it is] according to union, as is to be determined in Book III of the Sentences: but here the Holy Spirit would be changed from his property, which change would fall into the divine person: and therefore the Master speaks well.

§ 88. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 89. "Likewise it is asked by some, If the powerful Father, etc." Here begins the second part of this distinction in which he asks, when it is said, "Is the powerful Father able by nature to beget the Son, etc.?" in which question on account of the Text the power is drawn to the essence, and is further removed from the notional act: hence there can be some reason for doubt, whether this is some power which is in the Son? And this part contains two chapters. In the first, it is distinguished thus: the Father has the power of begetting the Son. In the second, however, it is distinguished thus: the Father has the power of generating which the Son has, there, G, also when it is said, etc.

Articulus 8 — How "Non Enim Non Potuit" Is Understood

"For he did not lack the ability," how is it understood?

"For he did not lack the ability," how is it understood?

§ 84. Next it is asked concerning this: "For he did not lack the ability, etc."

§ 85. It seems to be an unfitting exposition when it is said: "Did not lack the ability to" (Non non potuisse): because he was not impotent from this: for this cannot be extracted from the meaning of the word.

§ 86. Solution. The Master wishes that "he did not lack the ability" (non non potuit), the negation there is like a privative term: and then "for he did not lack the ability" (non enim non potuit) is worth only as much (as the ancients say) as, "for he was not powerless/unable" (non enim impotuit), so to speak: and then further it follows, he was not impotent from this.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Father By Nature Is Able To Beget The Son

Whether the Father by nature is able to generate the Son?

It is objected, however, concerning this which the Text says: To which we say, because the Father is not able except by nature, etc.

AGAINST:
1. The Philosopher says that to whom belongs the power, to him also belongs the act: if therefore the power of generating is of nature, the act will also be of nature: and thus nature generates, which was denied above.

1. Furthermore, if the Father is able by nature to beget the Son, since the same nature is in the Son and the Holy Spirit, in these there will be the same power: either therefore possible to act, or impossible. If in the first way: let us then suppose that the Son generates and the Holy Spirit, then from this does not follow the impossible which was disproved above: because a great impossible follows, namely that the series of divine generation is not fulfilled, as Augustine says. But if it is impossible to act, then it will be empty and vain, which is absurd.

Solution. It must be said that in truth the Father is not able except by nature, as the Master says: but power is signified differently when it is said, the power of nature generating, and the power of generating absolutely: because the power of generating by nature in that which is of this kind, does not denote power in comparison to act, but in comparison to the nature in which it is rooted, yet with some inclination to act: but when it is said, the power of generating, it is said power in act, as was said before: hence nothing prohibits conceding of the first power, that it is in the Son under such distinction, that generating can be the gerundive of an active personal verb: and then it should not be conceded that the power of nature generating is in the Son: because the sense would be that the power is in the Son which by nature could generate, even if it does not generate: because he who generates from the power of nature does not generate from necessity. But if it is the gerundive of an impersonal verb or of a passive personal verb, then it can well be conceded: because if it is the gerundive of an impersonal verb, then the sense is that the power from nature is in the Son by which someone can generate. But if it is of a passive personal verb, the sense is that the power from nature is in the Son by which he is generated: and this last sense the Master places in the Text: for all acts are of particulars and of power: but nevertheless powers are rooted in nature: and therefore according to Damascene, although power is of nature, as in which it is founded, nevertheless it does not denominate nature, but hypostasis: hence Damascene says that although in Christ there are two wills, nevertheless there is only one willing, and not two willing: and therefore it is not necessary that the act is of nature immediately, so that it is not of hypostasis. Or it may be said that this is generally true, to whom belongs the power, to him belongs the act: but it is not necessary that in the same way: because power is of someone according to nature, and act is of the same according to hypostasis, and thus it is of nature in hypostasis or suppositum.

To the other it must be said that one nature is in three persons, but the comparison of nature is not the same in them: because by relation one is distinguished from another: and therefore inasmuch as nature is in one, it is compared by the reason of power to one, according to some act according to which the same power remaining in nature cannot be compared in another: because it is not the same act, as we said above, because the power of generating by the term generating is joined to the notion of the Father, which conjunction it cannot have in the Son or the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is The Same Power By Which The Father Could Beget, And By Which The Son Be Begotten

Whether the power by which the Father could generate is the same as that by which the Son could be generated?

Then it is inquired concerning what the Master says: For the same power is in the Son, by which he could be begotten, which is in the Father, by which he could generate, etc.

1. For this does not seem true: because the power of the active and the passive is not the same: but to generate is active, and to be generated is passive.
2. Furthermore, the active and the passive differ, just as the efficient and the material: but the efficient with the material can never be the same in essence, as the Philosopher proves: therefore neither is the power to generate the same as the power to be generated.
3. Furthermore, even in names we see that there is not one notion by which the Father is generating, and by which the Son is begotten: therefore neither will there be one power, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that there is one power in the notion of natural power, but not one in the notion of power to act: because power according to the notion of understanding is a mean between the nature in which it is rooted, and the act which proceeds from it, and the Master speaks according to that comparison in which it is compared to the nature in which it is rooted.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that in divine things nothing is passive: but the principiant and the principiate are scarcely admitted there: and indeed one power of nature as such can be something principiant and principiate, although this cannot be one power related to act.

To the second, it must be said that that proposition is true in those things in which there is an efficient and active, and a passive and physical matter: but the mode of the active is one thing, and the active itself is another: the mode of the passive is one thing, and the passive itself is another. For to generate in divine things is not to act, although it has the mode of the active which the Grammarian attends to. Similarly, to be generated is not to suffer except according to the grammatical mode: but for such suffering which is in the mode of signifying only, it suffices that the principiate be in any way.

To the other, it must be said that the notion compares power to act, and joins it to the act: and therefore it is not surprising if it then belongs distinctly to persons: but nature, which has power as if indistinct, does not do so: for power is not distinct except through act.

Articulus 11 — Whether That Is True, The Son Has The Power Of Generating Which The Father Has

Whether this is true, the Son has the power of generating which the Father has?

Then it is asked about that which is posited in the second chapter: and it distinguishes it, namely this, the Son has the power of generating which the Father has, etc.

For this seems not to be distinguishable, but absolutely false: because in no way does the power seem to be joined to the act, and to the relation opposed to that act: however, when it is said, the power of generating, the power is joined to the act: and when it is said, the Son has this power which the Father, it is joined to the relation of the Son and to the property, which is repugnant to the act: therefore it seems to be absolutely false.

Solution. It must be said that in truth it is twofold, as the Author says: for when it is said, the Son has, by the term "has" this determination is understood according to nature, because he has it only through nature: and thus the comparison of power to nature and to act is made: and according to the first comparison it is true, but according to the second it is false, as the Master says.

DISTINCTIO VIII

Divisio Textus

Now concerning truth or property and immutability, etc. Here begins the third part of that treatise on the generation of the Son. For since in every generation the essence is in some way joined to the begotten by the begetter, it could be believed to be divided by the communication of eternal generation: and then it would not be immutable, nor simple: and therefore it is introduced here concerning these, so that we know it is not divided, and yet communicated in the begetter and the begotten. However, this distinction is divided into three parts, in the first of which it treats of the truth and property of the divine essence. In the second, however, it treats of the immutability of the same, there, C, of God. In the third, however, of the essence alone, etc., it treats of the simplicity of the same there, D, Likewise also alone properly and truly,

The first of these is divided into two parts. In the first, it determines the truth of the divine essence. In the second, however, it objects and solves, there, B, Here diligently consider, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Truth Is, What Property, And What Incommutability

What is truth, what is property, and what is immutability?

Here, however, many doubts arise concerning the first part. But before the Letter, three things must be determined: the first of which is, What is truth, and property, and immutability, and simplicity? The second is, according to what is the number of them considered? The third is about the signification of these names, nature, substance, essence, being, which the Master places at the beginning of this chapter.

First, what is truth? 1. Augustine says that truth is the entity of a thing: therefore it seems that the truth of the divine nature is the same as its entity.

1. Likewise, some define the true by saying that the true is the indivision of act from potency: but in divine things there is no act and potency: therefore there is not there the indivision of act from potency: therefore truth does not pertain to the divine nature, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, truth is rectitude perceptible only by the mind, as Anselm says: but this truth does not pertain only to the divine nature, but to many others, therefore this is not the truth which is sought here.
3. Furthermore, the Philosopher says that the true and the false are in the soul, according to which truth is the adequation of the intellect or mind with the thing: thus again truth will not be proper to the divine nature: or if there will be truth there, it will be in its ideas, and not in nature according to which it is nature, as it seems.

Moreover, it is asked about the reason of the exposition which the Master says, truth or property.

1. For it is evident that truth pertains to many: therefore it is not proper to the divine nature alone.
2. Furthermore, where the Master ought to proceed concerning the quantity of truth or property of the divine nature, he proceeds concerning the property of its entity: therefore it seems that truth and entity are the same.

Solution. It must be said that although the true is taken in many ways, as the objections prove, yet here the true is said to be the same as unmixed with foreign nature. For there are three foreign things especially, namely privation which is foreign to entity, and potency, and diverse or diversity in the being itself: for what is in privation is not, but has aptitude to be: but what is in potency can be: and what is from diverse things does not have its own being, because it has the entity of diverse things: hence truth is said here to be the unmixedness of the foreign to being, in the way we say true gold is not mixed with copper: and thus there will not be true being except the divine nature, which is neither subject to privation, nor in potency, nor consists of diverse things, as the Master will prove below, when it will be asked about the quantity of this truth.

Therefore, to the first, it is said that the definition of Augustine concerning the true is well fitting: because nothing is so properly that which is, as the divine nature, because it is wholly and solely that which is, and not mixed with those things which according to something are not, or are from diverse things.

To the other it must be said that even that definition is sufficiently fitting: because no act is so indivisible from potency as that which is the same: but it must be that potency is not taken for material potency: because the divine essence is neither the same as material potency, nor even indivisible from it: and this because since the divine essence is the universal mover of all, remaining stable in itself, it cannot be moved: but matter is always moved and changeable. Likewise, because the divine essence governs all things without being mixed with them, as the Philosopher says: but matter is mixed with material things: therefore it must be that active potency is taken: and then it is the same as its potency: and therefore truer, because it has being more truly as acting than as suffering: and thus the divine essence well has act and potency, and has them indivisible: because it is precisely the same according to which act is in the agent, as are interior acts, such as understanding, willing, and the like: for there are certain things outside it which hold themselves on the part of act, such as creation, recreation, governance also in some way: and those are not the same as it according to which they are in created, recreated, governed, and the like.

To what is objected from Anselm, it must be said that antonomastically and truly it pertains to it alone: because it alone is straight by itself, and all other things straight, by curvature according to potency at least are mixed, and therefore do not have complete truth, as the divine nature.

To the other it must be said that the true and false which are in the soul are from the act of the soul which is to compose or divide: and of such truth it is not asked here because that truth is in the sign, and caused by this truth.

To the other it must be said that property is the same as the disposition of truth which pertains to the divine entity alone according to that complete unmixedness, of which it has been said: for thus it pertains to no other.

To the other it must be said that in truth entity is the subject of truth according to reason, but in divine things in which there is no composition, it is the same otherwise signified in one and otherwise in another. For in entity it is signified as in a simple concept, before which nothing is conceived of the thing: because being is the first falling into our intellect: but truth touches the property of unmixedness: and therefore the Master calls entity, property, truth, the same, although not signified in the same way: because entity is the first, and older, as Dionysius says: but truth is its disposition of which it has been said: but property is according to which it follows divine being, and inasmuch as it is divine, and does not follow another being: just as we also say the property of a rectilinear triangle to have three equal to two right angles, because it follows the triangle, inasmuch as it is rectilinear and triangle.

Articulus 2 — According To What Are Truth, Incommunicability, And Simplicity Taken

Concerning what are truth, incommunicability, and simplicity received?

Secondly, it is asked, concerning what are these received?

1. For in divine things there are three, namely essence, person, notion; therefore it seems that these three ought to be reduced to those three.

But against this is that all these are of the divine nature in that the divine nature is: therefore they will not be reduced to person and notion. But according to this, since in the divine nature there is nothing to be received except the divinity possessed and possessing it, that is, nature and suppositum, it seems that these ought to be only two and not three.

1. Furthermore, we have seen that those things which are opposed contrarily, and as privation and habit, and contradictorily, are the same subject around which they are; but communicability and incommunicability are opposed contrarily, or as privation and habit: therefore they ought to be considered around the same according to the reason of the subject: but in lower things incommunicability is not around what it is, but around what it is, or the matter: therefore it seems that in divine things according to the reason of understanding incommunicability is around the same. Since therefore in divine things there is no suppositum except person, it seems that incommunicability is of the things suitable to the person according to itself, and not to nature.
2. Likewise, truth and entity according to act, which is true entity, in lower things is only by the grace of being or what it is: therefore it seems that in divine things truth pertains to essence: but simplicity is said from the privation of composite parts: therefore it seems that simplicity is from the privation of the first composite parts of being: these, however, are what it is, and being according to Boethius: therefore simplicity in divine things will be from the indifference of what it is and being in divine things.

Solution. Agreeing with the last objection, we say that these three are received in such a way that truth is taken from the being of essence, incommunicability, however, from what it is, and simplicity, however, from the indifference of both. And what is objected in the second place, that there is nothing that is in divine things or suppositum except in person, it must be said that this is true according to the thing, but from the mode of understanding, when it is said, God, divinity is signified in the possessor, and that possessor is called suppositum not in the reason of person: and by the grace of that, divine substance follows incommunicability.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that I well concede that these three are not taken from those three, because they are consequent to essence in that essence is. For although there are only those three in divine things, yet those three are not three there, because they do not make number: essence, however, although it is only one, yet it is to be considered in many ways, namely in the possessor, and outside the possessor, or according to both, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that there is nothing to be received in nature except the possessor and the possessed:

but from this itself results a third consideration from the comparison of one to the other through indifference. To the others, the solution is clear from what was said at the beginning of the solution.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Names Said Of God, Such As Essence, Substance, Knowledge, Wisdom, Goodness, Signify The Same Or Different Things; And Whether They Ought To Be Called Synonyms Or Not

Whether the names said of God as essence; substance, knowledge, wisdom, goodness signify the same or different things: and whether they ought to be called synonyms or not?

Then it is asked about the difference of those names which the Master touches upon in the beginning, namely nature, substance, being, etc.: and for the sake of those, it is also asked about others which are wisdom, knowledge, goodness, and all that are said of God. And we will inquire two things, namely whether these signify entirely the same thing? And secondly about their composition with God, whether any composition is noted to occur there, or none?

1. It seems, however, that all things said of God essentially are synonyms: for synonyms are those which signify the same thing, although they may have different interpretations according to the name, like stone and rock: therefore, since all that multitude of essential names signify the same thing, although they may have different interpretations according to the name, yet they seem to be synonyms.
2. Likewise, synonyms are those which have only a multitude according to voice, just as homonyms have unity according to voice, and multitude according to being: but in these, nothing is found in essence or person that corresponds to that multitude, because neither substance nor accident: therefore it seems that these are most truly synonyms.
3. Likewise, Augustine says, and it was held above as authority, that in God, to be is the same as to be wise, and God is by that by which He is wise, and He is wise by that by which He is: but this could not be unless wisdom and essence named the same thing and according to the same: therefore it seems that they are only synonyms: and the same reasoning applies to others: therefore it seems that all are only synonyms.

But on the contrary: Whatever names most truly make known those from which they are imposed, if those from which they are imposed are not of one reason, the names themselves are not synonyms: but essence and wisdom in God most truly make known those from which they are imposed, and they are not of one reason: therefore they are not synonyms. The first is evident of itself. The second is proved thus: Here it is held in the Letter, that only God is truly essence. Similarly, Augustine says that only God is truly wise: but the reason of essence in that which is such is not the reason of wisdom in that which is such: because otherwise in all things to be and to be wise would be the same, which is false: therefore these names are not synonyms.

To this, some have wished to say that these names said of God differ by connotations in the creature, and do not have any difference if they are taken absolutely in God. But on the contrary: A connotation is an effect in the creature: but an effect is only from a cause as a cause: therefore these names would not be said of God except as of a cause as a cause: which is plainly false, because wisdom or wise names no cause as a cause. Furthermore, let us suppose by the intellect that there are no connotations in the creature, I ask whether God is still wise, good, being, and suchlike? It is evident that He is: therefore that solution is null.

Furthermore, what is posterior is not the cause of diversity or identity in that which is prior: but connotations are posterior in time: therefore they are not the cause of identity or diversity of those things which are from eternity.

Therefore there were others who said that in truth God does not have a proper name, but we have given Him names: and therefore these names are transferred to Him from those things we find in creatures: and according to those, they take diversity. But on the contrary: Either these name what is properly in God, or what is figuratively in Him. If in the first way, the solution is of no value: because the question still remains, how they have a difference in signifying according to those things they name in God. If in the second way, then God is not truly life, but figuratively, nor is He truly wisdom, which is an absurd heresy. Furthermore, it was held above that such things are said of God according to the thing primarily, and secondarily of the creature.

Finally. Without prejudice, it must be said that in all such names two things must be considered, namely what they name, and in what is signified to place what they name: for when I say, sense, this name, sense, I take according to what it names only: and therefore I take it in one common reason. But if I say the sense of man, and the sense of a brute: now I take it in another and another reason, according to which I take it in that in which the signified of it is noted to be placed. Thus I say of such divine names. For if they are considered according to what they name only, then all those names have a diversity of reason of themselves: for the reason of essence is one by itself, and the reason of wisdom is another by itself, and so of others. But if I consider them according to that in which their signified is placed, this is such that it has indifference which is to be and to be something. For these three differ according to Boethius: because what is, is that which the thing truly is, and the suppositum: but to be is its essence or the act of essence: but to be something is by something drawing it to part or species: and all these are the same in the divine: because in God what is and to be are the same, and God Himself is also whatever He has: and thus in Him to be and to be something are the same. If therefore it is asked, Why is wisdom goodness, and these two the essence itself? whence is it? it will not be said that this is from wisdom insofar as it is wisdom, or from essence insofar as it is essence: but it will be said that this is because in that in which these are, there is such simplicity, that it itself is that which is its being, and its being is that which it is. From the first, therefore, is the diversity of attributes, from the second, however, the identity of things: and thus it is evident by a plain solution, that these are not synonyms even understood from eternity by God, and abstracted from all causality.

To the first, it must be said that these are not synonyms, because they do not have the same reason of the thing they signify, but they are the same in the thing, not because of that from which they are imposed, but because of that in which their significates are placed: this, however, is not in rock and stone: because those do not have the diversity of any thing, but only of the name, according to etymology, not of the thing, but of the name.

To the other, it must be said that these do not have only a multitude according to voice, but as far as the nature of their significates is concerned, they have a multitude of the reason of the thing. But that this thing is that, this does not belong to them per se, but through another in which they are.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine considers the identity of the thing which is from that these are in such a subject, and he does not consider to be wise and to be according to the intentions they name.

To what is objected against the solutions introduced, I think well that those solutions do not hold well.

Articulus 4 — How The Composition Of These Names With God, Who Is Not Composite, Can Be Verified

How can the composition of these names be verified with God who is not composite?

Further, it is asked, since these are signified to be composed concerning that in which they are, since they have complete identity from that in which they are, how can their composition be signified?

1. For every note of composition signifies that a composite is composed from diverse things: but when I say, God is eternal, or immutable, or wise, here the note of composition intervenes: therefore it signifies God to be composed from diverse things.
2. Likewise, in the first book of Physics, the Philosopher says that those who say all things are one are disturbed by the signification of composition, and they removed the note of composition signified in this verb, is, saying that it is not necessary to say that the wall is white, but the wall whitens: and they did this only because the word is signifies a certain composition, which cannot be understood without diverse composites: therefore in such cases the signification always seems false, when it is said, God is wise, God is good.
3. If perhaps it is said that in certain compositions the same is predicated of itself, as when I say, man is man, donkey is donkey. This is nothing: because in such cases the word man is subjected for the sake of what it is, and is predicated for the sake of that by which it is: and between those a composition intervenes well: but in God there is no composition.
4. Likewise, the predicate in every proposition is placed as the cause of making known the subject: and they are not the same by which something is made known, and that which is made known by it: therefore in all things a composition intervenes.

If perhaps it is said that such a composition is on the part of our intellect, which does not take the simple signified in many ways, except by composing one with another and dividing, although the composed and divided are the same. Then it is objected that according to this, all our intellect is false about God, since it does not take the thing as it is, but rather as it is not. If perhaps it is said that it is as in mathematics, that there is no falsehood in abstractions, because they do not posit the mode of abstraction in the thing: thus here the composing intellect does not posit its mode in the thing. This is nothing: because although mathematics according to being are in natural things, and not separate from them: yet by the being of quantity they do not have a definitive reason from natural things because otherwise a wooden line and a stone line would be defined equivocally by the being of quantity, which is false: hence mathematics have something on the part of the thing, namely the nature of quantity, upon which they place such an abstraction, otherwise the intellect would be false: but in divine things there seems to be nothing from which such a composition arises.

Solution. To this, without prejudice, it must be said that the solutions of certain great Masters are very insufficient: hence it must be said that in truth in divine things there is no composition in the thing itself: however, as Damascene says, some things in divine matters signify the nature, some what follows the nature, like just and wise. Hence our intellect in such a composition is in a triple act: for if each of these names is taken according to that from which it is imposed, or according to that which it signifies, which is the same, there will be one intellect of substance, and another of wisdom, and so of others, as was said before. But if these are taken by our intellect, not as from that which they signify, but in that in which they are, they will be taken all as one and the same because of the double simplicity of it, namely the indifference of what is and being and something being, or of the having and the habit. The third act of the intellect arises from the comparison of one mode of understanding with another, as we compare that which follows the nature in the reason of following, not in the reason of identity, to the nature which it follows: and thus arises the intellect composing one with another, and forming compositions: which nevertheless the note of composition is not in God, except in the reason of the properties of those which are composed: but the note of composition is mediated by our intellect, which does not join those which according to themselves have diverse reasons without a mediating note of composition: on the part of the thing, however, this composition will only note identity. And thus it is clear how the composing intellect has something in divine matters upon which it is founded on the part of those things which it composes, if they are taken according to their proper reasons.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that when it is said, God is eternal, and such like, the composition notes identity among those things which have diversity according to their proper reasons, although they have identity from the subject: and therefore in some way the composing intellect is deceived over the diversity of reasons so that it may have composables, and over the identity of things on the part of the subject: and therefore it composes them with a composition noting the same according to the thing, in which in the same way there is diversity of reason according to the attributes to it.

To the second, it must be said that they removed the note of composition: because they said that only one thing exists in every way, namely in reality, and in reason, and in such things no composition can be posited, because in such things the intellect finds no composables in reality or reason. But it is not so in divine attributes, in which the diversity of the reason of the attributes is preserved, although not the diversity of things.

To the other, it must be said that when it is said, man is man, that this is true: because among those composed things the diversity of things is noted, namely what is and being: and therefore there is greater diversity in this composition, man is man, than in this, God is.

wise, or just. Nevertheless, when it is said, "God is wise," there is a diversity in the concept of the nature and of that which follows upon the nature: and that diversity is sufficient for the intellect making a combination by a composition that denotes identity.

To the other it must be said that there is a becoming known with respect to us, and a becoming known with respect to the nature of the thing. And nothing prevents a predicate in divine things from serving to make the subject become known with respect to us, although in the nature of the thing the subject and the predicate are the same.

But regarding what is objected against the solution of certain people, it seems that it must be conceded.

Articulus 5 — What The Difference Is Between The Attributes Of The Names Divine Nature, Substance, And Essence

What is the diversity between the attributes of the names of the divine nature, and of substance, and of essence?

Having held these things, we must look at what is said in the text.

And first, it is asked about the diversity of these names, divine nature, and substance or essence.

And it must be said that these are the same, but they differ in concept. But "nature" is taken in two ways according to its two significations, namely as it is an internal power, according to which it is defined as the principle and cause of motion and rest in that in which it is essentially and not accidentally. For thus also that force is taken which Boethius defines, that "nature is a force innate to things, procreating like from like."[56] And thus it is sometimes said that the Father generates by power. For in this sense, nature in the person is some principle of natural acts, like generating, spirating, etc. And therefore Augustine says that the Father generates the Son from his nature. And Anselm says that the Father and the Son spirate the Holy Spirit from their nature. "Nature" is also taken for form, according to how Boethius defines nature, that "nature is the specific difference informing each thing,"[57] and thus it is taken here: not that I mean to say that the divine nature is the specific difference of anything, nor that it is a genus or species (because it is neither a genus, nor a species, nor an individual, as will be clear below), but rather that according to that understanding it is taken formally, as when it is said, "the Father is the divine nature," and in this way it is frequently taken by the Saints.

But "substance" can be taken in two ways, namely from the act of standing under (substandi), or from the difference of substance which is divided against accident. And if it is taken in the first way, since in divine things there are properties under which the persons stand according to some mode of understanding, "substance" then signifies the "whatness" of the person, in the way that Augustine says that person signifies a subsistent through itself and a substance: and thus the Greeks concede that there are three substances in divine things. But if it is taken from the difference by which it is divided against accident, then substance will be called being through itself, just as accident is called being through another. And thus substance is closer to standing for the divine essence, than for the persons: and in this sense the Latins deny that there are three substances in the Trinity.

But "essence" taken abstractly is said as formally simple, and making to be, and not making this being or that being which is specified and drawn to a part. For just as deity formally signifies God, so essence signifies being (esse) indistinctly. And thus Anselm says in the Monologion that just as light (lux), to shine (lucere), and shining (lucens) differ, so do essence (essentia), being (esse), and being (ens) differ.[58] And thus essence is that by which a thing formally is, and being (esse) is its act which it has in that which is. But that which is, is the concrete being (ens) itself. And according to this it is clear that being (ens) does not signify a simple concept before which there is nothing according to the intellect. In another way being (ens) is spoken of, according as being is the primary cause for all other things: and according to this being is first, and before it there is nothing, and thus being is closer to the divine essence. But in the first way it is closer to the person. And therefore in the first sense it is conceded by some that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are three beings (entes). But not in the second understanding: because according to that mode the word being (ens) signifies the primary cause for all things. And thus it signifies the simple first nature according to the intellect: whence if there were a plurality in this way, it would follow that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit would be three beings (entia), which is false.

Articulus 6 — Whether Wisdom Is Said From Sapere

Whether wisdom (sapientia) is named from being wise (sapere)?

Whether wisdom is named from being wise?

Next it is asked about what he says: For just as from that which is to be wise (sapere) wisdom is named, etc.

For rather it seems to be the converse: because being wise is the act of wisdom, and the effect is rather named from the cause, than conversely.

Solution. It must be said that Augustine is speaking according to the abstracting intellect: and then it is true that the abstract is taken from the concrete, and the concrete becomes known through the act. And therefore the first abstraction is taken from the act: and thus wisdom is named from being wise.

56. Boethius, Contra Eutychen et Nestorium, ch. 1.

Articulus 7 — Whether Being Is Said Of God And His Creatures Univocally; And Whether According To Intension And Remission Being Is Said Of God And Creatures

Whether being (esse) is said of God and his creatures univocally? and, Whether being (esse) is said of God and creatures according to intension and remission?

Next it is asked about what is said: And who is more, than he who said, etc.

For from this a twofold inconvenience is concluded: § 1. Whatever things are said according to more and less, receive intension and remission: but being is said according to more and less: therefore it receives intension and remission. But if this is conceded, it follows that being itself is in the genus of accident: because essentials and substantials are not intended and remitted.

§ 2. Similarly it follows further, that everything which is, is intended and remitted. For if everything which is, is founded upon being (ens), and if being is intended and remitted, it seems that everything which is would also be intended and remitted.

§ 3. Furthermore, whatever is said according to more and less of some things, is in them according to one concept. But being (ens) is said according to more and less of the Creator and creatures: therefore it is in the Creator and creatures according to one concept: which is false, because Creator and creature are univocalized according to nothing.

Solution. It must be said that there is intension properly speaking, and there is intension in a certain respect (secundum aliquid). Properly intense is what is intense according to intrinsic causes, according to approach or withdrawal from some terminus such as from the true imposition of the name, or towards something that has it in the highest degree, as the good in the best is in God. But intension in a certain respect is when something, from extrinsic causes, or what is more true, from its order to extrinsic causes, is said to be less or more in a certain respect, or even from participating in it by a stronger difference than another. In the first way white, and hot, and the like are intended. Secondly, that is said to be more good which does not have a cause of its goodness, but is itself substantially good, than that which is good from another. And in this way that is said to be more being which is through itself, than that which is through another. In the third way substance is said to be more being than accident, and act more being than potency. And in the second way God is said to be more being (ens) and more to be (esse) than anything created. Whence the solution to the first is clear: because it is not inconvenient in this way for being to belong to some things more and less: and this is not absolutely to be intended and remitted.

§ To the second it must be said that that objection would proceed if it were simply intended and remitted. For it does not follow: "This is in this one according to more, and in that one according to less: therefore it is intended and remitted": because where there is properly intension and remission, the quality can be intended and remitted in the same subject. If, however, it is conceded improperly, as was said, that it is intended, and is in diverse things according to more and less, then it must be solved by the said distinction.

§ To the other it must be said that, as has been said many times, there is not anything univocal to the creature and the Creator, as existing in both according to one concept: but something can agree according to prior and posterior. But since prior and posterior are said in three ways, as the Philosopher seems to say in book IV of the First Philosophy [Metaphysics], namely either what is participated by a stronger and weaker difference, as being (ens) of substance and accident: or as in order to the act of an efficient cause which essentially belongs to one, and other things through another approaching the mode of efficient causality, just as a doctor is called a doctor essentially, and an old woman by imitating, or medicinal instruments as those through which the act is exercised: or through a diverse respect to one end, which in one way is essentially induced in the univocal, and other things operate diversely towards its induction, just as healthy in complexions essentially, and urine healthy because indicating, and diet healthy as preserving, and medicine as helping nature. Since, I say, this is so, the analogy is in God and the creature in none of these ways. But rather in this way, that being and the like are essentially substantially in God, and in creatures through another and participatively: and not in such a way that God is diversely related to created things, or to some one thing to which the Creator and creature are related through prior and posterior, as is clear in the examples given beforehand. But because inferior things are diversely related to the Creator: for although the First relates in one way to all things according to Dionysius and the Philosopher, yet they do not relate to Him in one way. Thus therefore, according to this analogy it can be said that something is common to the Creator and the creature: however, from "more and less" said in that way which we predicted, it does not follow that they agree univocally: but it would follow, if "more and less" were taken properly, and with proper intension.

Whether the definitions of eternity given by the Authors are good?

Next it is asked about what he says: He is truly and properly called essence, whose essence does not know past or future, etc. For what he says here, is said by reason of eternity. Whence something must briefly be touched upon concerning eternity, because it has been treated more broadly elsewhere. Therefore it is asked, What is eternity? and what is eternal? and what things are in eternity?

§ To the first we proceed thus: Boethius says that eternity is the whole, simultaneous and perfect possession of interminable life.[59]

§ 1. But it seems inconvenient that he defines by a privation when he says, Interminable: for a privation does not certify anything except through the species opposed to it: and no mention is made of that species.

58. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 6.

§ 2. Furthermore, it seems inconvenient that since eternity is said from being (esse)—for eternity is said to be outside the limits of end and beginning—he defines it through life.

§ 3. Furthermore, the first measure according to the intellect seems to belong first according to the intellect: but being is prior to life: therefore it seems that eternity, which is the first measure, ought more to be defined by being than by life.

§ 4. Furthermore, a measure is only of what is measured: but the first measured thing is a quantum either dimensionally, or potentially, or virtually: since therefore being and life do not signify something somewhat distended virtually, it ought not to be defined by being nor by life.

§ 5. Also, eternity is in the genus of duration: but possession of life does not signify something enduring, or a duration: therefore it is poorly defined by that.

§ 6. Furthermore, "possession" is said as if a positioning of the feet (pedum positio): and it is transferred to matters of fortune: therefore it is not properly with respect to life.

§ 7. Also, every duration is protracted: no protracted thing is whole simultaneously: therefore eternity which is a duration, is not whole simultaneously.

§ 8. Furthermore, below it will be held, But he was, who never was lacking, he is who always is, he will be who never will be lacking: and "is," and "will be," do not signify whole simultaneously: therefore what is with them, is not whole simultaneously. But eternity is with them, as it seems: therefore it is not whole simultaneously.

§ 9. Furthermore, "whole" and "simultaneous" seem to say the same thing: for the whole is that of which no parts are outside itself, and simultaneous is that whose parts stand together in itself: therefore the other is superfluous, as it seems.

§ 10. Furthermore, every whole has parts: but eternity does not have parts: therefore eternity is not well said to be "whole."

§ 11. Furthermore, Isaac in the book On Definitions says, Eternity is a continuous unintersected space: but a space seems to have parts, and not all simultaneously: therefore it seems that he speaks poorly when he says that it is whole simultaneously.[60]

§ 12. Also, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: Eternity is ancient, and immutable, and universal by measuring.[61] But here neither of the Authors defines by life: therefore Boethius seems to define poorly.

Solution. It must be said that in truth Boethius defines eternity according as it is in that which is truly eternal: and this is taken up by Anselm in the Monologion, where he says thus: Since the divine substance is nothing else but its life and its eternity, nor is it terminable in any way, nor except simultaneously and perfectly whole: what else is true eternity which belongs to him alone, than interminable life, existing simultaneously and perfectly whole?[62] Whence it is clear that he does not define eternity according as it is taken abstractly and formally: but rather materially, 59. Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae, V, pr. 6.

according as it is to consider it in an enduring thing, which is the cause of the duration of other things, whence enduring life is called here eternity, as it seems to me. But since life is manifold, namely according to being, and according to well-being: and living according to well-being according to sense, as in pleasure: and according to the intellect, as in morals: and this according to the state of morals in civil affairs, or in grace: and further according to the state of the way (via) and the homeland (patria): and further according to Creator and creature: life is not taken here properly according to Anselm's explanation except according to the intellect, and in the Creator who alone is properly eternal. But here life is taken as participated, or in itself. If as participated, thus it is in those participating in eternity, as in the Blessed who are not eternal things. But if it is taken in itself, again it is in two ways, namely as it is the act of the spirit according to the reason of understanding and the first, and thus it is not taken in the concept of a measure, except perhaps exemplarily as other things approximate to it. It is also taken as it is formally considered for duration itself: and thus it is in the concept of a measure, and it relates to other measures as cause, and measure: and as exemplary measure, and excelling measure. As cause: because Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: God the eternal is to be praised, according as he himself is the maker of aevum and time, existing before the ages.[63] But as an exemplary measure: because other things imitate it insofar as they are able. For it itself is simultaneously in being (esse) and potency and act according to its comparison to the truly eternal. And the aevum goes forth from it, and imitates it simultaneously in being and to be able, but not in act which is operation: for the potency of an Angel is perfectly whole, nor does it expect an act, nor go out into it: but according to the vicissitude of understandings and affections it is not simultaneous: nay rather, as Augustine says, God moves the spiritual creature through time, and not through place. Time indeed, although perhaps it is simultaneous in its temporal being in some way, nevertheless its potency is not simultaneous, nor even its act: for by as much as the elongation of creatures from the first is made, by so much the less do they participate in its goodnesses: and this is what the Philosopher says in the book On Causes: But what is eternal to the eternal, this is also aeviternal to the aeviternal, and time to the temporal.[64] And he touches upon the imitation of the two to the third as much as they are able in the concept of measuring. But according as it is an excelling measure standing in the whole aevum and time, the present of eternity encloses the aevum by excelling it on the part of the principle, and encloses time by excelling it on the part of the principle and the end: and this is what Anselm says, that just as the present time encloses in itself every place, and whatever is in it, so every time is enclosed by the eternal present, and whatever is in it.[65]

§ To the first therefore it must be said, that what is said, interminable, is a negation following upon a positive difference, which on account of the simplicity of eternity cannot be named by us affirmatively: and thus it is clear that the negation, interminable, certifies from a presupposed positive difference.

§ To the other it must be said that eternity is in the concept of a duration, and thus it properly refers to potency: whence since the first potency of the eternal in itself is manifested in life, therefore it is defined by life, and not by being. Or it may be said that eternity is defined in the eternal according to its best state, according to which also the participated thing itself makes one participate in the immobility of eternity: but this happens only in those participating in it as it is blessed life, and not through being. Whence Augustine in book XII of the Confessions: Certainly the heaven of heaven which you made in the beginning, is some intellectual creature: although by no means coeternal with you the eternity, yet a participant in your eternity, it strongly restrains its own mutability before the sweetness of your most happy contemplation, and without any lapse since it was made, it surpasses every revolving vicissitude of times by clinging to you.[66] Since therefore he defines eternity according as it is a part of beatitude, and communicating the incommutability of eternity, he defines it by life, because through being it would be incommunicable: because thus it is being without limits, which cannot belong to creatures.

§ Through this the solution to the following is also clear: because in truth the first measure is the being of an enduring thing simultaneously existing in potency: but thus it is not communicable to those which are eternal by participation in it, but rather through life.

§ To the other it must be said that a measure formally taken is of a quantum virtually, or dimensionally: but here, as I think, it is taken materially, as it is in the eternal: and therefore it does not measure except as an exemplar, to which other blessedly living things approximate as much as they are able: yet it does not measure as an exemplar of duration insofar as it is duration, but rather as an exemplar of blessed life. But to this some have said that it is defined by life to the exclusion of living things, which are not measured by eternity: but the first is more probable.

§ To the other it must be said that possession of life is said here, because the whole potency of life in act is had at one's beck and call, such that nothing of it is expected outside: and thus it is the potency of life standing in the whole duration: whence the word possession intimates standing virtually simultaneously.

§ But to this that is objected, that every duration is a certain distension, it must be said that it is not necessary that it be distended in itself: because everything which is distended in itself, has a part remote from a part: but the distension is in another, because it is from it, and under it: and thus it will be standing in itself, having under it what is distended in the temporal and the time which it excels: and it itself is not called a duration because it is distended, but because the distension under it does not fail, as Augustine says in the Text.

§ To that which is objected concerning the concept of possession, it must be said that it is transferred to another, namely to that which is had at one's beck and call, as the whole life subsisting simultaneously, in whose power of living nothing is outside itself.

§ To the other the solution is already clear: because this is false, that no protracted thing is whole simultaneously: for a protracted thing which is so protracted that no protraction under it fails, is whole simultaneously: and this is therefore because it does not protract part from part, but stands one in the whole duration.

§ To the other it must be said that it never fails by the fact that it is present whole simultaneously.

§ To the other it must be said that whole means here the same as perfect, of which nothing is expected outside itself, or lost in the past: but simultaneous removes succession: whence whole is said by opposition to diverse parts composing an enduring thing: but simultaneous is opposed not to parts, but to the succession of parts.

§ To the other it must be said that whole is taken here according to what the Philosopher says in III Physics: But the whole and the perfect I call the same: for it is not entirely perfect, which has a part of its potency or act in the expectation of the future.

§ To the other it must be said that Isaac defines eternity formally, as it is in the concept of a measure: because thus it is taken as outside the eternal: for nothing is properly measured by something internal to it, but an internal quantity is measured by an exterior quantity, except in this way by which a number of parts measures: for thus the numbered parts in some way measure the whole. But eternity in the definition of Isaac is signified as an extrinsic adjacent measure: and he does not call it a space because it is distended by parts: because thus either the parts would remain, and then it would not differ from a continuum having position, as a line, or a surface: or they would not remain, and thus it would not differ from time: but he therefore says space, because by not failing it includes and excels all things, but by not failing it is not distended, but stands in the whole space running under it: and therefore he calls it continuous from its standing, and unintersected: because it is not intercepted by prior and posterior in the manner of time.

§ To the other it must be said that Dionysius calls it ancient from the lack of an end: and it is the manner of speaking of the Greeks, just as also certain Philosophers called the eternity of motion and of the world antiquity, although they spoke falsely. But he says immutable because it does not have prior and posterior: but he says universal by measuring, and another translation has, whole according to the whole to be measured: because on the part of the eternal it essentially measures being and to be able and act by one indivisible standing now: such that just as on the part of the eternal nothing of its potency is protracted outside itself, so the now of eternity standing, and not moving itself, as Boethius says, has nothing in the future: as the present time has, of which the first part has passed, and a part is in the instant, and a part is expected in the future.

Articulus 9 — What Is Eternal, And Whether The Pains Of Hell Can Be Called Eternal, And Whether Years And Times Can Be Called Eternal

What is the eternal, and whether the punishments of hell can be called eternal, and whether years and times can be called eternal.

62. Anselm, Monologion, ch. 24.

Secondly it is asked, What is the eternal?

§ 1. But it seems that it is God alone, through Anselm in the Monologion. Or by this alone it is openly perceived that true eternity is in that substance alone which alone is found to be not made, but maker: since it is understood to lack the bounds of a true beginning and end of eternity, which is proven to belong to none of the created things by the very fact that they are made from nothing: therefore it seems that nothing is eternal except God alone.

§ 2. Also, Anselm: Eternity is of those things which are nothing other than itself: therefore it seems that nothing is eternal except God.

§ 3. Also, through reason: Every enduring being has its own measure by which it is measured: but the divine enduring being is a certain being: therefore it will have its own measure: but this is nothing but eternity: therefore God alone is eternal.

But against this: The Saints call the punishments of hell eternal. And the Apostle says kept secret from eternal times: and he speaks of the predestination of Christ. And Augustine in XII Confessions calls the Angels eternal by participation in eternity, yet not coeternal with God: therefore it seems that many things are eternal.

Solution. It must be said that eternal is that of which the proper measure is eternity. But the measuring thing can be considered in three ways, namely as adequate to the virtual quantity of the measured, and thus God alone is eternal: or as an excelling measure, and thus all aeviternal and spiritual things are included in eternity, because it does not fail for any of them: and yet none of them is eternal. In a third way it is considered as an exemplar participated by others, as much as each is able: and thus it itself is adjacent in some way to aeviternal and temporal things by its now, and by its when: as when it is said, when God is, the Angel is, and motion is: and when it is said, God now is, and the angel, and what is carried in motion. And in all these ways something is in eternity, although it is not eternal except in the first way: and eternity is taken not as it is in the eternal, but formally for duration itself. But if it is taken as participated through life, then something will be called eternal, because it participates in it through one property of it, or two, or more, according as it has greater or lesser approximation to God who most truly is eternal: whence the contemplating Angels, and the blessed, whose potency although it is defluxible by nature, yet because it stands simultaneously that it is invariable through glory, are called eternal according to Augustine. But the punishments of hell are called eternal from the participation of duration without limit. But eternal times are the years of God, which do not fail: which are not called times and years, except according to distinction to the inferior measure which is time. Or it may be said that times through the word eternal are drawn outside their own concept, and stand for the duration of eternity from which time flows.

And through this the solution to the objections is clear: because I well concede that eternity is God, and nothing is properly called eternal except God alone. But certain other things are enclosed in eternity, not eternal, nor participating in eternity, as time and temporal things: but certain things are in eternity, and participating in eternity, and not eternal, as Angels: but certain things are in eternity and are eternal and eternity itself, as God the Trinity: but certain things participate in something similar to eternity, yet they are neither in eternity, nor eternal, nor eternity: as eternal punishments. But times are not called eternal, unless they are taken improperly just as eternity is called eternal time, or eternal times, because although it is not distinguished in itself, yet it is distinguished in relation to temporal things accidentally, as "God has endured more than six thousand years," or the like.

Articulus 10 — What It Is To Be In Eternity

What it is to be in eternity?

What it is to be in eternity?

Thirdly it is asked, What is it to be in eternity? For if eternity is the possession of interminable life, to be in eternity seems to be the same as to be in the interminable life of glory. This also seems so: because of those who are in eternal punishments, it is not said that they are in eternity, but rather their time will be into ages. And because very many things have been said about this elsewhere, let these suffice.

Solution. It must be said to the aforesaid, that to be in eternity is said in three ways, namely as measured in an adequate measure, and thus God alone is in eternity. In the second way it is said to be in eternity, as measured in an excelling measure, and thus aeviternal and temporal things are in eternity as if enclosed, as Anselm says. In the third way it is said to be in eternity as participating in the eternal itself through life, and thus the blessed are said to be in eternity: but the evil damned are not, nor are they to be called eternal: although it is conceded with a determination, namely that they are eternal in punishments.

Articulus 11 — Whether Creatures Compared To The Creator Are Said To Be As It Were Not To Be

Whether creatures compared to the Creator are said as if not to be?

Next it is asked about what is said in the Text: Because in comparison to him who truly is, they are as if they were not, etc.

Against this is: because § 1. Whatever simply belongs to anything, this is taken away from it by no comparison: but to be (esse) substantially and simply belongs to everything that is: therefore by no comparison is it taken away from it.

§ 2. Furthermore, it seems that in comparison to him they are more beings, than they are in themselves: for since created being is compared to two things according to order, namely to nothing, and to the being creating entity, it does not receive entity according as it is compared to nothing, but rather defect and mutability: therefore it receives entity from the other comparison, namely to the creating being: and thus compared to their essence they more are, and not less are, as it seems.

64. Liber de Causis, prop. 2.

§ 3. Also, Gregory: All things would fall into nothing, unless the hand of the Omnipotent contained them:[67] therefore from comparison to him they receive a stronger entity: and thus what he says is not true, that they are as if they were not, when they are compared to him.

§ 4. Also, it was held above: Because he is good, we are: therefore from comparison to him we better are, than without comparison.

Solution. To all these there is one solution, that there is a twofold comparison there, namely as to the cause of our being: and thus we are not except by comparison to him: because whatever we are, is from him, and to him, and in him containing. The second comparison is of the equiparance or similitude of proportion: and thus compared to him, we are as if nothing: because without the ratio of proportion we are distant from him: and similarly every created being: and this happens on account of three things which are of necessity belonging to our being, and of everything created insofar as it is created, namely potency according to some cause which precedes our being, and privation after we are, and matter to be receiving: and through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 12 — Whether Words Co-Signifying Differences Of Time, Such As "Was" And "Will Be," Can Be Said Of God, And Of All Creatures; Afterwards It Is Asked About What Is Said: Of That Of Which It Is Said "Was," It Is Not, Etc

Whether words consignifying differences of time, such as "was" and "will be," can be said of God and of all creatures.

Afterwards, it is inquired concerning what is said: Of what it is said "was," it is not, etc.

Whether words consignifying differences of time, such as "was" and "will be," can be said of God and of all creatures.

Afterwards, it is inquired concerning what is said:

Of what it is said "was," it is not, etc.

For it is doubtful how those words consignifying differences of time are said of eternal, aeviternal, and temporal things. They do not seem to be said of eternal things: because such words express differences of time, which are caused by motion or mutability: but such motion or mutability is not in God: therefore, they cannot be said of God or the eternal.

Similarly, it seems that they cannot be said of aeviternal things: because their being is all at once, similarly their potentiality does not precede their being, and nothing of their potentiality is outside their being: therefore, their potentiality is also all at once: therefore, it seems that all is a standing now, and nothing past in them, nor future, nor present, in the way that the present is of which part has passed, part is in the instant, and part is future.

Similarly, it seems that neither can they be said of the being of temporal things, and let being be taken according to substance: for it is the same being according to substance throughout the entire duration of the thing: therefore, it seems that it does not take past and future according to this determination, whereby it is determined here, that what is past is not, and what is future is not yet.

To this last, some say that the being of a thing is considered in two ways, especially the being of a mobile thing, namely in itself, or as it is in the potentiality of the mobile, according to which it is mobile. In the first way, they say that it is not measured by time: and thus past and future do not pertain to it per se. In the second way, it has an order to time: because the potentiality of the mobile as it is mobile is not all at once. But this solution does not solve: because this Letter intends that past and future pertain to every created being: and therefore it is proper to the uncreated being not to know past and future. This also seems by what Augustine says in VIII on Genesis, that God, neither moved by place nor time, moves the spiritual creature through time, and not through place: but the corporeal through place and time: therefore, it seems that every creature is to be changed through time: and thus past and future pertain to it. Likewise, Augustine at the beginning on John says that this word "is," when said of creatures, signifies temporal motions, but not when said of the Creator: therefore, it seems that the gloss of those is not according to the intention of Augustine.

Solution. Without prejudice, it must be said that in truth the opinion of Jerome and Augustine is that everything that is, is in some way temporal, except the Creator, and that "was" and "will be" are said in some way of all except Him. Hence, it seems to be said that when it is said of God "was" or "will be," that "was" and "will be" signify the now of eternity standing in the entire duration of aeviternal and temporal things: and therefore that duration which is made from that now is not interrupted by anything, as Isaac says, that it has not departed from the power of the eternal, so that something is awaited: but the variation which is signified in "was" and "will be" is in the lower measure which is time: just as a superior measure is understood to be distinguished when it is distinguished from the lesser measure itself: and therefore such expressions are resolved by the Doctors thus: God "was," that is, God is with respect to whose now something temporal is taken which preceded the duration of God. God "will be," that is, God is with respect to which something temporal is taken which follows the duration of God, or God enduring. Just as it is in two lines: one infinite, and the other finite: and one standing, and the other moved under it. For the infinite standing cannot be distinguished into part and part, but is distinguished in relation to the motion or distinction of the inferior. However, it is not entirely similar because time does not have permanent parts, but eternity does not have any part.

Others say that the difference of time consignified is in our intellect, and not in the thing signified: because our intellect does not take the enduring always, but with a part passing and coming. But this is to say nothing: because duration is well taken by our intellect according to the nature of the enduring: and thus it is taken as standing, or as not standing, according to how it is diversely related to the enduring things themselves.

Moreover, to what is objected, that of all creatures these words are said properly according to Augustine and Jerome, it seems to be said without prejudice, that this is their understanding. However, how in the duration of angels or the potentiality to be there is time, it will be difficult or impossible to find, if time is said in one way. Hence, it seems this way should be chosen, that time is said in many ways. In one way, time is properly said to be the measure of the motion of the first mobile: which motion is the cause of all other motions: and that time according to the whole measures the motion of the first mobile: but according to part it measures the motions caused by it, according to what the Philosopher says, that to be in time is to be measured by a certain part of time: for thus everything that is in time is excelled by it. The proof of which is: because it is caused by motion whose first measure is time: but the cause is before the caused: therefore, the measure of the cause is before the measure of the caused: therefore, time excels it from the part before. Similarly, since everything caused by motion is measured by the period, the motion which is taken in the parts or minutes of the respects of the stars and signs and figures of the circle causing the thing, will be measured by the period. And since the number of the period is finite, of necessity the motion will be after it, and thus time: therefore, everything which according to being and motion is caused by the subject of time, is excelled by time both from the part before and from the part after: and those are properly said to be in time according to the Philosophers. And if we only say that time is in this way, time will not be one of the coequals, nor will God move angels through time in the number and succession of the affections and intellects of angels, because nothing of these is ordered to the motion of the heaven. We say, therefore, that time is said in another way to be the measure of any change, whether having a middle or not having a middle, not ordered to the motion of the heaven: and this time differs and is numbered according to temporal things, and there will not be one time of all temporal things. In the third way, time is said to be the measure of simple changes, such as willing, and understanding, and the like: and in this way, again, it will not be the same time.

66. Augustine, Confessions, XII, ch. 9.

If, however, it is objected that it still seems to be the same time because time is a number, and by the same number dogs and sheep are numbered, the objection is not valid: because time is not only a numbering number: rather, it is also a numbered number: for it is the number of the prior and posterior in motion: and therefore in those in which the prior and posterior of the motion of which it is the measure is in some way preserved, there will be the same time, and this is only in those which are in some way ordered to the cause of the motion of the heaven: but here it is not so: hence the number by which it is numbered, in part agrees with time, in part differs from it: hence it is clear that it is not the same time, in the second and third signification of time being accepted. Further, since time does not have continuity from itself, but from motion, and motion from space, as the Philosopher says, it is not necessary that time in the third signification be continuous, since motions are indivisible, and not continuous: and that time is only the number of those now, or the vicissitudes of affections and intellects: and thus time being taken broadly, every creature is temporal both in being, and in potentiality, and in acting. In being indeed: because it falls into nothing from itself: and what is contained, this it has from another, and not from itself, and therefore the continuous flux of being is by the nature of the temporal, and something in that continuous would pass unless it were contained by another. Similarly, its potentiality consequently does not stand all at once as far as it is from itself. The operation, however, is evident, that it has vicissitude: and thus it is solved what is in the Letter, that the past also has the perpetual creature as far as it is from itself and the future.

If, however, it is asked, How according to the time which the Philosophers considered, it is said that an angel was, or the substance of the heaven, or even the being of a generable and corruptible thing? We can say without prejudice, that in angels the entire duration is all at once, and there is not properly a potentiality of enduring, as the potentiality of enduring has something less than the act of duration itself: but the potentiality of enduring is in them the necessity of the continuation of being: and therefore they are not temporal, but aeviternal: and then "was" is explained, that it says now, or when of the aeviternal: but the aevum or aeviternal excels time: and therefore it is not distinguished in itself, but in comparison to it: thus an angel was, that is, some temporal creature is, with respect to which the being of the angel enduring preceded. An angel will be, that is, some creature is which if it ceased, the being of the angel enduring would be after it: just as we also said of the eternal. And similarly of the substance of the heaven: although it is not so of the substance (otherwise, the potentiality) of its motion, which continuously goes out into act, and therefore is measured by time, as a measure coequal to it.

But concerning the being of a generable thing which seems to remain the same in the whole time of its duration, it can be said, if it pleases, as was said before in the solution of others: hence although it remains the same, it is not entirely the same except according to habit due to continuous loss and restoration. Or, it can be said otherwise, that the being of a generable thing is the same remaining: yet that being is in what it is: and what it is, has enduring being, which duration is not all at once: and therefore the potentiality of its duration which is now, is always in being, and with respect to this potentiality it has prior and posterior, and past and future.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Now Of Eternity And The Now Of Time Are The Same; And Whether The Now Of Eternity And Eternity Differ

Whether the now of eternity is the same as the now of time: and whether the now of eternity and eternity differ?

Here it must be diligently noted, etc. Here begins the part in which he objects against the aforementioned and resolves. And the Master does four things in it: he objects, concedes the objection, confirms it to be so through Augustine, and fourthly explains the understanding of Jerome's words.

But here arises a doubt, whether the now of eternity, and of the age, and of time is the same?

1. And it seems that it is so: because if I say, God is now, and the angel, and that which is carried in motion or the motion itself, by the power of the expression only one measuring is posited: since therefore one of them is eternal, and another temporal, it seems that there is one now of eternity, and of the age, and of time.

1. Likewise, the now of time and the now of eternity, as taken from the words of Boethius in the book on the Trinity, differ in this, that the now of eternity is standing, and not moving itself: but the now of time is flowing from prior to posterior continuously, and by this flow makes the being of time: therefore, with the differences in which they differ abstracted, one substance remains in the three: therefore let prior and posterior between which the now is be abstracted, it seems that the substance of the indivisible itself remains: the substance of indivisible duration is the now of eternity: therefore the now of eternity and of the age and of time is the same by substance.

Furthermore, it is asked, whether in any way the now of eternity and eternity differ, and the now of the age and the age itself?

1. However, it seems that they differ: because Boethius says, that the now of eternity by standing makes eternity: but the same is not the maker and the made: therefore eternity is not the now of eternity. In the same way, it is objected about the now of the age, which makes the age.
2. Furthermore, the state of the now itself is not the now itself in substance, just as on the other side the flow of the now itself in time is not the now itself by substance: therefore since eternity is the state and permanence of the now itself, the now of eternity is not eternity itself.

Moreover, when it is said, the age is standing and all at once, and the eternal is standing and all at once, it is asked whether standing and being all at once are taken in one notion? And it seems not: because if they are taken in one notion, it seems then, that eternity and the age are the same, which is false.

Moreover, it does not seem that the now of time differs from the age and eternity, except accidentally: for the now of time is the measure of the existence of the mobile nature in celestial bodies, and of the same bodies the measure is the age. Therefore the now of time is the age. The first proof, the existence of the mobile body in heaven is that which is carried in motion, and to this corresponds the now in time, as the Philosopher says: but to the renewal of its position in motion corresponds time: therefore the first is true. The second is taken from Boethius, who calls those bodies immortal, because nothing is varied in their existence: but the measure of those which are invariable is the age, if they are created. If perhaps it is said, that the conclusion does not follow: because the same can have diverse measures. Against: Adequate measures differ according to the measured, if they are in the first measured: for grains of wheat are measured by one, and liquids by another: as wheat by the bushel, oil by the jar, cloth by the ell, and so with others: therefore it seems, that since this is true, that proper measures differ according to the measured, that the conclusion follows.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that according to the opinion of certain Masters, the now of time is considered in two ways, namely according to that which is the subject of prior and posterior, and according to this prior and posterior happen to the now itself, and it is separable from them, and then it is a standing substance in itself: and according to this they say, that the now of time can be the same with the now of eternity and of the age: because according to this there is only one now of eternity, which is numbered in the whole time by prior and posterior which happen to it, and stands in eternity and the age: and according to this they understand that word of Boethius in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy: "Who orders time to go from the age," they say in this sense, that from the now of the age or the eternal by the number of prior and posterior time flows, which number however happens to the now itself, and is separable from it. Otherwise, however, the now itself is considered, as it is adjacent to the mobile, as it is in motion, or is referred to motion: for since the mobile is the same in the whole motion, the now will be the same in the whole time: but when the mobile, or that which is carried, is continuously removed from posterior to prior, or from first to last in space, the now itself is essentially joined to prior and posterior in time itself: and thus prior and posterior will be essential differences of the now itself: and thus considered it differs from the now of eternity and the age. But it seems to be said otherwise, that neither as subject, nor as substance is the now of eternity and the age and of time the same. Because the now of eternity is uncreated, but the now of the age is standing: but of time it is not standing, but flowing, as has been said: for it is considered in the whole time by prior and posterior continuously: just as also that which is carried is renewed and iterated by the renewal of position in the whole motion.

To the objection it must be said, that when it is said, God is now, and the Angel, and that which is carried, the now of eternity alone is meant there: but it is the excellent measure of the Angel, and of that which is carried: and just as the exemplar measures the exemplified, so it measures the being of the Angel, and of that which is moved: and then it does not follow, that it is the same now of the age and of time.

To the other it must be said, that the now of eternity and of the age and of time do not only differ by specific differences themselves, but they differ by themselves: because the now of time is the substance of destructible time, and similarly is the now of the age, although it is not destroyed: but the now of eternity is not destructible: and therefore by intellect with differences removed, they still differ substantially.

To what is further asked, whether the now of eternity and eternity differ? It must be said, that in nothing except according to reason.

To what is objected against, it must be said that the state of the now itself, is the now standing in some way signified: because in divine things there is no composition. Nor is it similar with time: because this is caused really on the part of the mobile in its differences: just as it is true, that the mobile is one in the whole motion, and therefore the now is one: so it is really true, that the mobile is renewed in position, and renewed from prior to posterior, or conversely: and therefore prior and posterior really differ from the now itself. But the state of eternity does not differ from the eternal itself, except according to the reason of signifying: and therefore eternity and its now do not differ except by reason.

To what is objected, that the made is not the maker, it must be said that eternity is not made by the now itself, except according to the reason of understanding only: for according to that eternity is understood as externally adjacent, the now is referred to the substance of the eternal, and eternity to the indeficient power of it, and this power with God in God is the same, and also the duration itself: hence all these are God. And it is not signified that one makes another, except in the mode of understanding which is taken in the name. But if this question is made about the age, it will be stronger, whether namely the now of the age is the age: and according to what I can understand here, in eternal things the enduring substance is not the same, and its duration itself: but one is with the other and in the other. In eternal things, as we said above, nothing else is the duration itself, than the necessity of its immutable permanence, and that is wholly within the enduring, differing however from it. Thus it seems, that the now of the age has a difference from the age: and that the age however is wholly in it: and therefore it is indivisible, just as its now.

And if it is asked, how one indivisible can be understood in another? It must be said, that in the same way with two indivisibles taken, this is not intelligible: but if one is taken as substance, or subject, the other however as form, or specific difference specifying it, then it will be well intelligible: just as also in eternal things the necessity of the continuation of immutable being is taken in the standing and enduring itself.

To what is further asked, whether the now of time is the age? It must be said, that in no way: for the now of time is not adjacent to the existence of the mobile thing according to that the existence is invariable, but rather according to that it is the same reiterated in the whole motion. And thus its existence is not measured by the age, but rather according to that it is immobile and unmoved to form: and thus those bodies are called immortal and invariable.

To what is objected, that one thing has one measure, it must be answered, that this is true according to that it is one: but according to that it is in diverse genera of power compared to act, then nothing prohibits it from being measured by diverse measures: just as the power of the celestial body to the act which is local motion will be measured by the measure of time, and its existence thus accepted will be measured by the now of time: but its power to form, which is always joined to act, and is immutably continued in it, will be measured by the age: and its enduring existence will be measured by the now of the age.

Divisio Textus

The essence of God alone is properly said to be unchangeable, etc. Here the Master shows that the nature of God alone is unchangeable: and this in two ways, namely that it is not changed, and because it cannot be changed. But every created nature is changed by its nature, or can be changed. And from this, in this chapter, he further concludes that the divine nature alone is immortal, because the variation of the creature is death. And finally, at the end of the chapter, it is inferred that when the predicaments are referred in divine predication, they do not predicate their own essences, but substance. And this is what he says in this chapter.

Articulus 14 — Whether These Words, "Is," "Was," And "Will Be," Befit God Separately Or Together, And Which Difference Of Time Most Especially Befits The Eternal God

Whether these words, is, was, and will be, apply to God separately or conjointly, and which difference of time most fittingly applies to the eternal God?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Therefore, it is said, because it always was, is, and will be, etc.

For it is asked, whether these words apply to God separately or conjointly?

However, it seems that they apply only conjointly: because if separately, then it is signified that a defect of temporal thing is present in God: therefore, it seems that conjointly, so that one may supply the defect of the other.

Likewise, it is asked, which difference of time most fittingly applies to God?

However, it seems that the present: because that alone is to be taken from time. Since therefore eternity is wholly present, it seems that the present most fittingly applies to it. But it seems that the past because this alone is necessary and immobile. Since therefore eternity is of necessary and immobile things, it seems that the past most fittingly applies to it. On the contrary, it seems that the imperfect past especially applies to it: because this time signifies the past including the present itself, and not terminated at it. Since therefore eternity in itself has perfection and necessity, and in this it is likened to the past: and it includes the present, and in this it agrees with the present: it seems that the imperfect past places agreement with respect to both.

Solution. It must be said that these words can apply to God separately according to the intention previously explained, namely that they denote distinction in the lower exemplified measure, and not in eternity: and thus they do not denote temporal defects in the eternal itself.

To the other, it must be said that among them the future applies less, because this whole is in privation and potentiality, but the present applies most: and in some respect the past especially applies: but in no way or least does the imperfect past apply because of the imperfection of the act which it signifies: however, the present applies most to it by reason of that which alone is among the differences of time, but not by reason of that which immediately will not be. And therefore what is of perfection is to be attributed to God. The perfect past applies by reason of immobility and necessity: because only that is necessary which is past: but by reason of cessation it is not to be attributed to God. The future, however, applies least among the times: yet it is properly attributed to him, as Augustine says, that he will be who will never be absent. The imperfect past, since it speaks of the imperfection of acts, applies least: yet considering the reason which the objection touches, namely the necessity of the past with the inclusion of that which is in time, that is, the present, we read in the Scriptures that the imperfect past is sometimes attributed to God according to eternity, as in John 1:1: In the beginning was the Word, etc.

Articulus 15 — Whether Being Is Proper To God Alone, And Accidental To Others; And What Subsisting Truth Is, And Enduring Cause, And The Property Of The Natural Kind

Whether existence is proper to God alone, and happens to others: and what is subsisting truth, and remaining cause, and the property of natural kind?

Then it is asked concerning what Hilary says: Existence is not an accident to God, but subsisting, etc.

For it seems that existence happens to none: therefore it seems that this is not proper to God.

Furthermore, what is subsisting truth, and remaining cause, and the property of natural kind?

Solution. It must be said that an accident is said to be what happens to be present, and not to be present, and the cause of this contingency is on the part of the subject which causes the accident. By similarity to it and not properly is an accident said here which happens to something because it is in potency not from an intrinsic cause, but from an extrinsic one which is efficient: for every created existence was in potency, and could not be as to the potency of the efficient cause: and therefore it is called an accident.

To the other it must be said, that truth is here called pure and unmixed being: and this belongs only to God: for every created existence is mixed with relations at least to external causes, and to consequences: just as this very being, although it is simple in itself, nevertheless posits a relation to the creator, and a relation to those with which it is composable: and these relations are not nothing in being: and therefore it is mixed, and not pure truth. For every created thing has mixed potency, and privation, as we said above: and therefore it is not pure: and therefore it properly belongs to God, that He is subsisting truth as to His first existence considered in itself. However, He is a remaining cause not in Himself, but compared to the caused things: for natural causes, whether they are proximate or remote, do not cause while remaining, but rather moved, and moving, and changed in themselves: and therefore they cannot be called remaining causes: but God in Himself unmoved, and in one way disposed, causes all things: and therefore it properly belongs to Him to be a remaining cause. The second comparison of God to things is, according to which He is distinguished by His properties from all things by nature: in which, however, He is essentially, presently, and potentially: and this is the property of His kind, that is, of His nature connatural, that He always has a distinct proper existence because it is not borrowed from another.

Articulus 16 — What Incommutability Is, And Whether Any Change Occurs In God

What is immutability, and whether any change falls upon God?

There can be a doubt here. What is the immutability of which he speaks here? And secondly, whether any change falls upon God, or not?

To the first, it proceeds thus: 1. From the text, it is drawn that immutability is preserving the very being, which is from the fact that it does not receive another from itself. But it seems that this does not remove every mode of change: because one having a habit, and going forth from leisure into act, preserves the very being which it is, nor does it receive something alien from itself: and yet it is changed in some mode of change: therefore it seems that this does not suffice for the proof of true immutability.

1. Furthermore, we see in creatures many modes of change per se, and per accidens: per se, either to a substantial form, or from it: or to an accidental form, or to the perfection of quantity, or from it: as there is generation, corruption, alteration, augmentation, diminution: and there is change to position or place: which changes nothing in the mobile, but the very thing which is moved is transferred to another place: therefore it seems that that last change can be in God: because it places no variation in the substance of that which is moved. And if you say that this cannot befit Him, because He is everywhere: and what is everywhere cannot be transferred to any place: then it seems that this motion is not repugnant to the nature of immutability: but rather it is attributed to Him that He is immensity: because He is not included in place: and this is against the text which wishes that by nature motion cannot happen to Him.
2. Furthermore, it is said of the Holy Spirit that He is mobile: and of wisdom, that it is more mobile than all mobiles: therefore it seems that not every mutability is repugnant to His nature.
3. Furthermore, we see an artisan being changed by the application of forms to matter, and a carpenter who, by working, brings forth forms conceived in the mind into wood, first one way, then another: and it seems that such commutability befits God: because Augustine says in

...in the book of Eighty-Two Questions, that He creates a man by one reason [idea], and a donkey by another.

§ 5. Also, the Philosopher says that the first cause moves the first caused thing, that is, God moves the heaven: and He moves it from right to left, because His power is there, and the motion according to the moving power begins there, and it turns back by accident. But when the mobile is moved, that which is in it is also moved: therefore it seems that His power is moved. But He Himself is His power: therefore He Himself is moved by accident. And thus it seems that His nature is not repugnant to every motion.

§ 6. Besides, what absurdity would there be if He were posited to be mutated by accident? For this motion is in everything, and even in Him, as it seems: because from not creating He became creating, and from not moving the creature He became moving, and from not governing, governing. And if you say that He does this just as the desired moves the desire, and the desire moves the desiring subject, as the Philosopher seems to say: this is nothing. Because we do not posit Him only as being the desired, and thus holding Himself in one way; but we also say that He creates everything that desires Him, and carries and contains it. Therefore He seems to hold Himself otherwise than He did from eternity: therefore He is not entirely immutable.

Solution. It must be said that the nature of God alone is immutable both per se and per accidens: not only according to the faith, but also according to all philosophers who have understood anything about Him.

Therefore it must be said to the first that the cause of immutability is that it preserves the very being which it is per se, and which is in it. But this in God is not an accident which preserves its being-in, but is His substance. Now, one who has a habit and goes out to the exercise of an action does not preserve the whole being: for the act is something in the agent; and therefore this holds itself otherwise, since its act is not itself. For this reason the Philosopher also says that this is another kind of alteration: because, although it does not receive another habit than it had, yet it holds itself in another way in act. And this does not belong to God: because if the act of God is taken, such as to understand and to will, He is His own operation, holding Himself in the same way. But if His operations are taken, such as to create, and to infuse grace, and to become incarnate, He is not mutated by them, but something is mutated towards Him, by holding itself otherwise towards Him than it did before. Because creation holds itself according to reality on the part of the creature, and it posits nothing in God except the will and the idea determined to this, that this creature be made now; and this determination of the will and of the idea to the prefixed time of this work held themselves in God in one way from eternity.

To the next it must be said that local motion cannot happen to God. For although it mutates nothing in the mobile subject, yet from some mutation that happens concerning it, it is toward obtaining something which was not possessed before the motion. This is clear: because every change of place is either from the soul or from nature. If it is from nature, then it is moved to its own place, in which is the preservation of its form and of its species, and outside is corruption: therefore it finds a safety in the place which it did not have outside. If however it is moved outside its place, this will be by violence; and the force of violence is something in it which was not there: and therefore a violent motion is a disposition to corruption. But if it is from the soul: a progressive motion does not occur unless it was first from the principle of having something pleasurable through motion, and that is obtained through it. And if it is asked concerning the motion of the heaven, it is clear that it induces many things which are not possessed: for whether we say that that motion is from the desire of assimilating itself in something to the first cause, or on account of the generation and corruption of inferior things, there is always the attainment of that intent through motion, when it was possessed, or was not possessed in this way. And in no way can it belong...

...to God. Because He is immutable, lacking nothing that might be sought outside Himself; and because He is everywhere; and because He is spiritual; and an entirely simple spiritual nature cannot be moved locally per se. But concerning the motion of Angels it is to be inquired elsewhere: because an Angel is neither entirely simple, nor entirely spiritual, as Gregory says.

To the next it must be said that the Holy Spirit and wisdom are called mobile, not in themselves, but by reason of their effects and gifts.

To the next it must be said that it is one thing concerning an artisan, and another concerning God. For although an artisan perhaps holds himself in one way in his habit toward the whole house, yet when his will and apprehension approach the work, he does not hold himself in one way toward the parts of the work: because now he apprehends and wills the foundations and its parts; and afterwards in that apprehension [he wills] those things which are required for the wall and the roof. But it is not so in God: because He holds Himself in one way from eternity in the apprehension of the whole world and its parts, and in one way in the will of each thing to the prefixed space in which each would be drawn forth. And what Augustine says, "By another reason [idea]," etc., is understood by the comparison of the idea to the exemplar, and not by the comparison of the idea to itself.

To the next it must be said that if the Philosopher intends God by the first cause, then he intends only one mode of His motion, by which He moves as the desired moves the desire. Because since God is not an intrinsic and conjoined mover according to the proportion of a mover and a mobile with some mobile, it is necessary to posit another mover which is conjoined to the heaven, whoever he may be; and therefore it is not necessary that He Himself be moved, but that the mover of the heaven be moved in diverse ways by perceiving the goodnesses flowing from God, which, having been perceived, are further more perceived in the mobile according to East and West. But if he does not intend God, but calls the "first cause" the first mover among the causes of nature which move according to the proportion of the mobile —that is, that they can move only as much as the mobile itself is naturally mobile—then there is no objection. But whatever the case may be regarding this, it must not be said that God is a mover intrinsic to the heaven in which He is included, except in this way by which we posit God to be within all things but not included; and therefore the power of the rising sign [East] is not the substantial power which God is, but is a power created by Him.

To the next it must be said that an absurdity would follow, namely that He would not be the first moving [principle], and that He would not be simple. For that He would not be the first moving [principle] is clear: because the first moving [principle] is that which is moved by no mode of motion, neither per se nor per accidens. It is not moved per se, as is clear from what was previously held. But it cannot be moved per accidens, because the per accidens is not, nor does it pre-exist anything moving and moved per se, since the per accidens is reduced to the per se, as to a cause and a subject. Whence if He were moved per accidens, He would not be the first mover, but there would be something before Him.

And through this the solution concerning the first and second article is clear.

Articulus 17 — Whether God Moves Himself

Whether God moves Himself?

Thirdly it is inquired, Whether He moves Himself? § 1. It seems that He does not. Because Augustine proves in book VIII of The Literal Meaning of Genesis [68] that every motion is from an immobile [principle]; whence if a finger is moved, the hand stands still; and if the hand, the arm stands still; and so of others. And it is also necessary that that immobile [principle] be stronger than the moved, as a certain Philosopher says:

because otherwise that which is moved would extrude the mover by its motion, such that the mover would be moved by it, or it would recede from its state or place. Therefore, since God moves all things, He Himself will not be moved in any way: therefore neither is He moved by Himself.

§ 2. Also, Boethius: And remaining stable, gives all things to be moved. [69]

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine says in book VIII of The Literal Meaning of Genesis [70], that the creator spirit moves Himself, neither through time, nor through place; but the created spirit through time, but not through place; and a created body both through time and through place: therefore it seems that He is moved by Himself.

§ 2. Also, at the beginning of the book On the Celestial Hierarchy of Dionysius: But every procession of manifesting lights, the Father being moved, proceeding optimally and largely into us, fills us. [71]

Solution. It must be said that although it may be conceded in some improper way that God moves Himself, I do not think it should be conceded that He is moved by Himself, or that He is moved simply. For He is not properly said to move Himself, because He does not move Himself in Himself, but in His gifts and effects: and He is said to move Himself when He moves a creature to this, that He may indwell it in certain gifts. This motion does not posit an alterity in Him, but rather in those things which now hold themselves otherwise toward Him than they did before. For He Himself, as Dionysius says, holds Himself in one and the same way to everything that is, but not all things hold themselves to Him in one way. Since therefore He does not move Himself except in moving the creature to Himself, it cannot be inferred that He is moved.

But it is objected that according to this solution Augustine seems to say nothing when he says that God moves Himself neither through time nor through place: for that motion by which He moves the creature is frequently in time and place. To this it must be said that Augustine speaks well: for he intends that God's motion, by which He so moves Himself that He is in the creature insofar as it is from Him, is outside of time: although the creature is in time and in place. For God's being in the creature does not make God temporal or local: and this is what Augustine intends.

To the next it must be said that the procession of lights is said to be made "the Father being moved": not that there is motion in Himself, but in the lights and gifts, as has already been said.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Divine Substance, And Universally Every Form, Can Be The Subject Of No Accident

Whether the divine substance, and universally every form, can be the subject of no accident?

68. Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram, VIII.

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says in the Text: Other essences or substances take on accidents, etc.

For this does not seem universally true.

§ 1. For Boethius says that a form cannot be a subject therefore it does not take on accidents. If perhaps it is said that this is understood of that which is absolutely form, and this is God alone. On the contrary: He gives an example there concerning humanity: therefore it seems that this belongs to every form.

§ 2. Besides, he himself says in the same place that everything which is subjected is subjected by grace of matter. Since therefore every simple form is not subjected, it is clear that form is invariable.

§ 3. Besides, the Author of the Six Principles seems to say this: that form is contingent to composition, consisting in a simple and invariable essence. [72] Therefore it seems that this does not belong to the divine essence alone.

§ 4. Besides, it seems to belong to prime matter: for Augustine says in book XI of the Confessions It is true that the first formlessness, which is almost nothing, does not have the successions of times; because where there is no form, there cannot be successions of times. Therefore prime matter does not receive any form: therefore it seems that it was not mutated by accidents; and thus it seems to have been immutable in its state, just like the divine essence.

§ 5. Also, an accident does not have an accident, because otherwise it would be necessary to go on into infinity: therefore it does not belong to an accident to receive accidents: and thus it belongs to an accident that it be immutable, like the divine substance.

Solution. It must be said that it belongs to nothing to receive nothing at all, except to the divine substance alone.

To the first, therefore, which is objected concerning form, it must be said that "subject" is twofold, namely that which is a subject that is [subjected] to an accident of nature and of the individual, such as whiteness and blackness: and to this nothing is a subject except a composite of matter and form, and of quod est [that which is] and quo est [that by which it is], and such a subject cannot be a form. And there is a subject which is subjected to its own property and power, or to another of its own proper passions, and thus a form is well a subject: but that passion or property is not by essence the same as that whose property it is. And according to the first mode form is called invariable, and not according to the second mode.

But if this saying of the Author of the Six Principles is taken generally of every form, it can be said better that although a form is simple in itself, yet it is not so simple that it cannot be a part of a composite, and therefore it is composable with another, and thus mutable and variable; although it is not varied like that which is subjected to mutation. Because "mobile" is said in multiple ways (as the Philosopher says), namely as the subject of motion, and as that which is cast away by motion, and also as that which is acquired through motion. And by none of these motions is God or the divine essence mobile.

But to this which is objected concerning matter, it must be said that if prime matter is called the substance of matter, according to what it is separated by the intellect from privation and from the potency of the form that is to be subjected: then what Augustine says is true, that it is outside of time, and then also it is not receptive of form, because its order to form has been removed from it by the intellect. But nevertheless it still has an aptitude to the Creator according as it went out into being from nothing: and that exit is a certain variation, which does not belong to God.

Besides, although matter is not a part, yet it can be a part: and thus it is susceptible of another, that is, its substance is composable with a potency to form, and also with form: and thus it is variable in potency. For if the order to potency is abstracted from matter, it itself will not be matter: because according to what it is, it is subjected to potency and privation: therefore by the intellect separating before it is subjected, it is subjectible to potency. If perhaps you say that it is not subjectible to privation and potency according to what it is, then it will go into infinity: because the subjectibility which is between potency and matter is also a certain potency, and to this again it will not be subjectible by itself by the same reason: but this is impossible. Therefore it is by itself subjectible to privation, and thus it is by itself variable. And this does not belong to God. Whence the objection concerning matter does not hold.

To that which is objected concerning an accident, it can be said that it is mutable, as that which is cast away and added by mutation: but God in no way.

Articulus 19 — Whether God Alone Has Immortality, What Immortality Is, And What Are Said To Live And To Die

Whether God alone has immortality, what is immortality, and what things are said to live and die?

Whether God alone has immortality, what is immortality, and what things are said to live and die?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says: Who alone has immortality, etc. [73]

What is called immortality? For immortality is a natural potency for not dying, or for resisting those things which induce death. And this seems to be only in living things: but not all variable things live: therefore it seems that they do not die.

To this it must be said that to live and to die are taken here from life commonly accepted, by which we speak of "living water," and "living stone," and the like. And this is nothing other than the complete act of a potency which is according to the nature of the thing. For when it can do that act, it is said to live, such as living water when it is in the impetus of cooling, living wine when it perfectly penetrates in taste, living rock in the solidity of its hardness: and the effect according to the species of its consequence, such as a living sapphire when it expels poison. And since life of this sort is from the properties of things, when they are mutated in those, they are mutated in acts of this sort: and therefore they are said to die.

Articulus 20 — What Is Called Shadowed Vicissitude, And Whether It Befits Every Creature

What is called overshadowed vicissitude [change], and whether it belongs to every creature?

What is called overshadowed vicissitude, and whether it belongs to every creature?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says: Nor is there a shadow of vicissitude [alteration], etc. [74]

What is called here "overshadowed vicissitude"?

And it must be said that vicissitude is the number of a turn [change], and belongs to every creature, even a spiritual one, in the renewal of the vicissitude of affections and apprehensions. And it is called "overshadowed" because it is from privation, by the fact that the creature is after nothing, and from this that the creature is not simple: for those two things draw towards a shadow, because that which is in a spiritual nature is not as it is in the first creating light.

Articulus 21 — Whether To Be Moved Through Times Is To Be Changed Through Affections, Or Through Apprehensions Of The Speculative Intellect

Whether to be moved through times is to be mutated through affections, or through the apprehensions of the speculative intellect?

Further it is inquired concerning this which he says: And to be moved through times is to be commuted through affections, etc.

Why does he not say "to be commuted through the apprehensions of the speculative intellect"?

Also it is inquired, Whether they are varied through times when they are affected in God according to multiple reasons, namely as in the highest substance, as in goodness, as in the Creator, as in wisdom, and the like? It seems that they are. Because such things do not seem to fall simultaneously into the affection: therefore they are in one after another: therefore there is vicissitude there.

ON THE CONTRARY: Augustine says in book XI of the Confessions [75] that Angels participate in eternity by the participation of the most felicitous contemplation: therefore they are not subjected to vicissitude in it. Also, we had it above from Augustine in the book On the Trinity [76], that insofar as we foretaste the fruible here, in so much are we not in time: therefore much less are the Angels in time regarding this.

Solution. It must be said that he said "through affections" regarding the affective work which they do around us: because although Angels according to substance are outside time, yet according to their operations around us they are in time. And therefore he posited affections, because it sounds in the practical intellect, which is properly exercised around us in works, and not in speculation, because that is principally in the Word outside time, as Augustine says.

To the next it must be said that in the contemplation of God in diverse reasons [ideas/attributes] there is no vicissitude, because they do not receive them as diverse, since thus it would not be a matter of joy; but they receive them all as in one and into one which is God. For if wisdom were diverse from goodness, it would not gladden much; and conversely. But when they are received as one which is the highest essence in which contemplation begins, then there is no vicissitude, but rather a state and immobility in one, in which are found the things which are sought for knowing and for willing.

Divisio Textus

§ Division of the Text

And the same alone is properly and truly simple, etc. Here begins the third part of this distinction, in which the simplicity of the divine nature is treated: and it is divided into two parts. In the first, he shows that simplicity is proper to the divine nature in comparison to corporeal nature and to spiritual nature. In the second, he concludes from this that it does not fall into the predicament [category] of substance, there, H, Whence it is not properly called a substance.

The first is subdivided into five: of which the first is that it is simple, such that it is whatever it has. The second excludes corporeal nature from this simplicity, there, Notice first, why every, etc. And the third excludes spiritual nature from this, there, E, The spiritual creature also alone, etc. In the fourth, he solves the objection which could be made from the fact that God is spoken of in multiple ways, there, F, Here it is to be diligently noted, etc. In the fifth, he removes the accidental predicament from it, there, But what in nature, etc.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Divine Nature Is Simple, Or Composed Of That By Which It Is And That Which It Is

Whether the divine nature is simple, or composite of quo est [that by which it is] and quod est [that which is]?

Whether the divine nature is simple, or composite of quo est and quod est?

Here, however, it is first inquired concerning the simplicity of the divine nature, and two things are inquired [three are listed]. The first is, whether it is simple? The second is concerning the modes of composition, which the Master posits here. The third, why does he not posit more?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Everything that is has its being by one thing, and by another has that it is this thing. God is: therefore either He is being itself according to what is being, or He is this "something". If in the first way, then He Himself is the intention [concept] of being which belongs to all things, which is frivolous: because then He would be the being which is in every particular, and general, and special difference of being, which is frivolous. Therefore He Himself is this "something": therefore by one thing He has being, and by another that He is this: therefore He is composite. And it seems that this reason compels according to our intellect, that everything which is this "something" is composite.

§ 2. Besides, God is a being, and is the first being, and God is: therefore either by the same thing He is all these, or by a diverse thing. If by the same: therefore by that by which He is a being He is first, and conversely: therefore to whatever being belongs, being first also belongs, which is false. Therefore He does not have being by the same thing: therefore by another: and thus He will be composite.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Let it be granted that by one thing He is a being, and by another this being: therefore He is composite. But prior to every composite are its components by nature: therefore God is not first.

§ 2. Also, since every composite has its components as the principles of its being, it follows that God is not the principle of the universe.

§ 3. Also, since every composite is not necessary per se, but through its components, it follows that God is not a necessary being, and that He is not the necessary being per se.

§ 4. Also, since every composite according to its components is in potency: it follows from this that God would be a being in potency in some way. Because all these things are most absurd, it is necessary to say that God is a simple being at the limit of simplicity.

Solution. It must be conceded that God is simple.

But to this which is objected, that everything that is has being by one thing, and that it is this by another, it must be said that that proposition is of Boethius and of Avicenna in [book] VIII of First Philosophy and it is understood, just as they themselves gloss themselves, of beings after the first, which are creatures, and second beings. For God has by the same thing that He is, and that He is this or God: and this belongs to Him on account of the non-difference of that which He is with His essence or with His being. For unless we posited Him to be "this being," nothing could be denied of Him, just as neither of being according to what it is: whence the negation of other things concerning Him follows Him, because He is "this being"; but simplicity follows Him, because "this being" does not posit a number and a difference with absolute being in Him.

To the next it must be said that when it is said "first" and "God": all these say His essence adding nothing according to reality, but only according to the mode of signifying, as has been said quite often.

73. 1 Timothy 6:16.

Articulus 23 — It Is Asked, Since Composition Is Manifold, Why The Master Touches Only The Threefold, Namely Of Parts, Of Accidents, And Of Forms

It is inquired, since composition is multiplex, why does the Master touch upon only a triple one, namely of parts, of accidents, and of forms?

Secondly it is inquired, since composition is multiplex, why is only a triple one touched upon here, namely of parts, of accidents, and of forms?

And to this it must be said that a triple composition includes every composition: for either it is a composition of that which is a part; or of that which is not a part, but adheres concretively. If of that which is a part: either it is an essential part from which this "something" and the essence of the thing is constituted, and then it is a composition of form with matter; or of that which is the quo est [that by which it is] with that which is the quod est [that which is], and he touches upon that lastly through the diversity of forms: because that form or quo est makes a diversity of number and species in things, of number through the being of the form in this matter, but of species through special differences, as a man and a donkey differ: and this composition is also in a species and subalternate genus. But what composition is in the most general genera will be had below. If, however, it is an integral part, or a virtual part which in a spiritual thing is reduced to an integral part, then it is the composition which he touches upon first, when he says, "from parts." But if it is of that which is not a part, then it is of an accident with a subject, which is not a part of being.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Nature Of God Alone Is Simple

Whether the nature of God alone is simple?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says: And the same alone is properly and truly simple, etc. For it seems false.

§ 1. For being, and true, and one are converted. And being seems to mean that in which all our intellect stands, resolving the composite into the simple. But that in which the resolving intellect stands is simple: therefore being, one, something, true, good are simple.

§ 2. Besides, the most general genera are simple on account of this, that they are the most general. PROOF. For let it be granted that they are composite: therefore their components will be simpler than them. But the simpler is the more general: therefore they will be more general than them: therefore these are not the most general genera, which is false. Therefore they themselves are simple: therefore the nature of God alone is not simple.

§ 3. If perhaps it is said that the first simple things have composition in this, that they are from another through creation. On the contrary: An efficient cause is not something of the thing, but is entirely outside the thing: therefore it makes neither simplicity in the thing, nor composition. Therefore created being, from this that it is created, is not composite.

§ 4. Besides, if no creature is simple, it seems that the resolving intellect would go into infinity. For "this something" is composite of quod est and quo est: therefore either the quo est itself is simple, or composite. If simple, I have the proposition, that not God alone is simple. If composite, I inquire concerning its components: either they are simple, or composite. For either there will be a standing in a simple, or the intellect will resolve into infinity. If you say that it is not absurd for the dividing intellect to go into infinity, because the potency of division is into infinity: this is ridiculous. Because this is concerning the potency of the division of a continuum according to the nature of a continuum: but we are speaking here of the division and resolution of a thing into its form.

74. James 1:17.

BUT STILL further it is inquired, Why does he say, truly and properly, as if there were other things which could be simple, not truly and properly.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY to this is that any second thing is after the first monad: therefore according to Dionysius, it is two: therefore not simple.

§ 2. Besides, it itself is "this" and "it is": therefore according to Boethius, it has that it is by one thing, and that it is this by another.

§ 3. Besides, all things are created in number, weight, and measure: therefore nothing simply [is simple].

Solution. It must be said that God alone is truly simple, as was concluded of necessity in the first article of the question.

To the first which is objected concerning being, it must be said that that in which the resolution of our intellect stands is simple in a certain respect, and composite simply. For the resolving intellect abstracts the universal from the particular; and further the more universal from the less universal: and therefore it removes nothing but the coarcting [restricting] differences. And it is true that according to the removal of those differences being is simple: and therefore the resolution stands in it. But further it is composite and concrete with potential aptitudes, namely that it itself is after nothing, and therefore variable into nothing: and therefore privation and a potency of falling away are in it unless it is contained: and also it has an aptitude to those things with which it is composable, which aptitude is not nothing in it, as we said above: but nevertheless those aptitudes can be abstracted from it according to the intellect. But that which is of the potency of privation cannot be abstracted from created being: because it is in its definition by the fact that it itself is created.

But if it is objected that being abstracts from created and uncreated being, it must be said that this is frivolous: because from this it follows that uncreated being would be composite. For if being belonged to it and to the created through one common reason, it would be necessary that common being be coarcted in it by some difference: and thus it would have being by one thing, and this being by another: and this was disproved above. Therefore the being in which the resolving intellect stands is not uncreated being: but uncreated being is prior to it as a cause.

But to this which is objected, that one, true, and good, and something are among the first simple things, it must be said that this is frivolous: because they are not converted with being according to their intentions [concepts], but according to their supposita [subjects]: and therefore there is no doubt that they are composite.

To the next it must be said that the most general genera are simple in the order of a most general genus, that is, that no genus is simpler than them. But genus does not mean the most simple simply. This is clear: because being is simpler than any most general genus, although a most general genus is called the most simple among univocal predicates: and therefore the most general genera have in themselves being, and a difference by which being is coarcted in them: and therefore they are composite.

To the next it must be said that the mere relation to an efficient cause does not make a composition in them, but rather this which is left in them from such an exit into being. This can be seen through a simile: for that which goes out into being through generation is from matter...

§ 1. [the matter] which is potency and under privation: and although through generation there is not a potency in the matter which was toward that form which was received through generation, nevertheless there remains a potency toward another form from the very fact that it has thus come forth into being. Similarly, from the very fact that a thing comes forth into being after nothingness, there remains a potency of tending into nothingness unless it is contained by another.

§ 2. To that which is objected concerning the resolution of the intellect, the solution is already clear through the aforementioned.

§ 3. To the last point it must be said, that there is a qualified simplicity [simplicitas secundum quid] in the creature, as was said: and this is manifold according to many modes, out of which I shall briefly set down some by touching upon them. I say therefore, that there is a certain simplicity of the first component principles, such as by which it is [quo est] and that which is [quod est], and of matter and form, which does not belong to composites from that which is and by which it is. In a spiritual nature there is a certain simplicity, such as the Angels without dependence upon corporeal matter: and this is greater than that of the rational nature in the soul: which although it lacks quantity, nevertheless has a dependence upon the body. After these simplicities there is the simplicity of those things which are in some way in a quantity, and of these some are the principles of quantity, while others themselves are quantified things [quanta] in nature. But since quantity is discrete, and continuous, and that which is as it were both in some way, the principle of the discrete will be most simple, on the grounds that it does not have a position in a continuum, such as unity is: after this will be the point, on the grounds that it has a position in a continuum, although it lacks quantity: and after this will be the indivisible which is the principle of time which is the now, on the grounds that time has in its definition the continuous and the discrete, since it is called the number of motion according to prior and posterior. Now quantified things are not simple, in such a way that they do not have parts: but those are called simple which have quantity without contrariety, such as celestial bodies. And after these, those are called simple which have contrariety, although they do not have both contraries mixed together, such as the elements in which there are simple contrary qualities. And further, a mixed thing from contraries which is similar in the whole or homogeneous is called simple, such as a stone which is a stone in all its parts, although it is mixed: because the Philosopher says, that pure earth is not a stone, because it does not make for continuation, but comminution [crumbling]: and thus metallic minerals are called simple. Further, sometimes things are called simple: because they have little difference in the mixture of contraries in their parts, such as the bodies of plants, which although they have a certain part which is the root, a certain which is the trunk, and a certain which is the twig and branch, nevertheless there is little difference in the mixture of these parts: and therefore they are sometimes called simple. After those are complexioned bodies which are almost similar, such as animals with a ringed [segmented] body, and certain bodies of fishes. Then there are composites from dissimilar organic parts, which also although they are very much compounded, nevertheless are sometimes called simple with respect to the subsequent composition from a body and a rational soul. Therefore God is called truly simple: because all other things are in some way composed: but properly because this belongs to Him alone.

§ 4. And note, that simplicity is twofold, namely in being which is according to the non-difference of that which is and by which it is or being, and secondly in those things which are adventitious to the nature in lower things, as accidents: and that simplicity is that He Himself is whatever He has of absolute things: for the Father has a Son, and He Himself is not the Son.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Rational Soul Is Simple Or Composite

Whether the rational soul is simple or composed?

§ 6. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: A spiritual creature too, such as the soul is, in comparison indeed to the body is simple, etc.

§ 7. 1. For it seems, that what is composed in itself cannot by any comparison become simple: but the soul is composed in itself: therefore it is not simple in any comparison. Now that it is composed, is proved by many reasons: as Boethius says in the book De Trinitate, that everything which is below the First, is a this and that: the soul is below the First: therefore it is a this and that: therefore it is composed.

§ 8. 2. Likewise, Avicenna says: Every simple thing has its being from itself: but the soul does not have its being from itself: therefore, etc.

§ 9. 3. Likewise, Boethius in the book De Hebdomadibus: Everything that is, participates in that which is being in order that it may be, but it participates in another in order that it may be something: since therefore the soul is a this something, it itself participates in being and in another: but everything that participates in being and in another, is composed: therefore the soul is composed.

§ 10. 4. Likewise, Boethius in the book De Trinitate says, that in God there is no universal and particular: because it follows from this, that there would be composition in God: but in the soul it is possible to receive [conceive] the soul through abstraction from this soul: therefore there is in it a universal and a particular nature: therefore it is composed.

§ 11. 5. Likewise, the Philosopher says in III De Anima: In the soul one thing is that by which it becomes all things, and another is that by which it makes all things: therefore also in an Angel: therefore in the soul there is a potency underlying intelligibles, and an agent of intellect: but the agent, and the underlying thing or subject are not of the same essence in any nature: therefore the soul is composed of diverse essences.

§ 12. 6. Likewise, Avicenna in I of the First Philosophy: Everything from which something is denied, has in its nature something other than simple being: but many things are denied of the soul: therefore, etc.

§ 13. 7. Likewise, the entirely incommunicable and the communicable are not rooted in the same thing: in the soul it is possible to find the entirely incommunicable, and the communicable: therefore they are not rooted essentially in the same thing. Proof of the minor premise. The soul is this individual soul: but the principle of individuation is the principle of incommunicability: but when I say, This soul is a soul, a communicable nature is predicated: therefore in this soul there is a communicable, and an incommunicable nature: therefore it is composed through its essence.

§ 14. 8. Likewise, Boethius and Costa ben Luca say, that a simple thing cannot be a subject: therefore since the soul is the subject of sciences and virtues, it itself will be a composed substance.

§ 15. 9. Likewise, every composition of secondary things flows from a prior and essential composition: but the soul has a composition of secondary things, namely of its powers: since therefore those do not flow from something behaving in the same way as a simple thing, it is evident that it itself is composed in its nature. And because it is easy to bring forth many arguments concerning this, and these are among the stronger ones, therefore let these suffice. Therefore Augustine wrongly says that it is simple in comparison to the body.

§ 16. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever is that which it has, is itself simple, by the authority of Augustine posited here in the Text: the soul is that which it has: therefore it is simple. Proof of the minor premise. Bernard on the Canticles: In the soul, I gaze upon three things, memory, understanding, and will: and these are the soul itself.

§ 17. 2. Likewise, Augustine in the book On the Spirit and the Soul says very often, that the simple substance is sight in the eye, hearing in the ear, and thus of others: therefore it itself is all the powers which it has: therefore it is simple.

§ 18. 3. Likewise, nothing composed in itself is in potency for composing another: therefore if the soul is composed in itself, it will not be in potency for constituting something. The proof of the first premise is, that nature composes simple things to the end that they may be in composites: but it does not further conjoin composites.

72. Liber de sex principiis, 1.

§ 19. 4. Likewise, the soul (as Aristotle says in II De Anima) is not a this something, but the entelechy of a physical body having life in potency: but every composite is a this something: therefore the soul is not composed.

§ 20. 5. Likewise, the soul is a form: but every form is simple: therefore, etc.

§ 22. Solution. I consent to this part, that the soul is composed of essential principles which are that which is and being [quod est et esse], but not of matter and form: although certain ones seem to say this: and this is because according to the Philosopher matter is determined through a potency toward a motion varying something in substance, or toward local motion: and since a potency of this sort is not except in bodies, there will be no matter except in bodies: yet matter will not be univocal in all corporeal things: because of corruptible and incorruptible things there is not one matter, just as there is not one potency toward motion.

§ 23. To the first therefore it must be said, that the soul is not that which it itself has: and what Bernard says is to be glossed, that it is a predication of a virtual whole concerning its part, and it is an improper predication. But if force is placed on what he says, that these three are nothing else than the soul itself, it ought to be glossed according to the sense which was noted above, that the soul is taken by him as a potential whole, all parts of which taken together are its power: thus memory, understanding, and will taken together, express the whole of the power of the soul according to its higher part.

§ 24. To that which is said from the book On the Spirit and the Soul, it can be denied because it is not by Augustine, but by a certain William the Cistercian who said many false things. But if anyone wishes to maintain it, it can be said that the soul is sight in the eye, as a virtual whole predicated of a part in which there is something of its power, on the grounds that the whole itself is essentially present to that part and to any other: although it is not present to them according to all its power.

§ 25. To the next it must be said, that this is false, Nothing composed in itself, etc., and there is a counter-instance in an organic body. But this is true that nothing composed with an ultimate composition can constitute another: and then it does not hold of the soul, which although it is composed, nevertheless can compose another: because it is not composed as a constituted this something, but it is composed as a form which is a substance perfected by the perfection of a mover, on the grounds that nothing moves unless it is perfect in itself.

75. Augustine, Confessiones, XII, 15 (Albert's text cites XI).

§ 26. To the next it must be said, that the Philosopher says this, that the soul is not one by itself, as a singular thing in nature: but it itself is a form and a first substance potent to be without a body.

§ 27. To the next it must be said, that the first composition of bodies is from matter and form, but not of spiritual things, but rather from that by which it is and that which is, or from that which is and being, as Boethius says.

Articulus 26 — Whether The Soul Is Whole In The Whole Body, And Whole In Each Part

Whether the soul is whole in the whole body, and whole in any part?

§ 29. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: And the soul is whole in the whole, and is whole in any part of it, etc.

§ 30. 1. For it seems, that the soul is not in the whole: for the totality of the soul can only be referred to the totality of powers, on the grounds that it does not have other parts of its quantity: since therefore it is not in the body with respect to all its powers, it will not itself be whole in the whole.

§ 31. 2. Likewise, it is said by certain Philosophers that the spirit is the instrument of the soul through which it works life; since therefore the spirit (as Isaac says) arises wholly from the heart, the whole soul seems to be in the heart.

§ 32. 3. Besides, if it is whole in the whole, and in any part: therefore it is whole in the hand: therefore since it itself existing whole in some body makes that an animal, the hand will be an animal, as it seems.

§ 33. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The soul works and senses everywhere in the body: therefore it works and senses through a power: therefore either this power is in it, or not. If not: therefore it is not continuous with it: therefore it does not sense immediately through it, which is false: therefore it does not sense except through its own power: but a power is not without a subject: therefore the substance of the soul is where its power is: but its powers are everywhere in the body: therefore it itself is essentially in the whole body.

§ 34. 2. Likewise, the form of fire is not referred to a part of the nature of fire, but to the whole: because the form everywhere perfects the matter: therefore similarly since the soul is the form of the body, it refers whole to the whole.

§ 35. But then it is further inquired whether it itself is divisible by the division of the body?

§ 36. It seems that it is: because when that in which something is is divided, it seems that it is necessary that what is in it be divided: but the soul is in the body: therefore, etc.

§ 37. But on the contrary: What is whole in the whole and whole in any part, when any part is divided, is whole in it: but what is whole in any part, is not divided by the division of the parts: therefore it seems, that the soul is not divided by the division of the body.

§ 38. Further it is inquired, Whether the rational soul is whole in the whole?

§ 39. It seems that it is not: because the Philosopher says, that the intellect is the act of no body: therefore it is not in the whole, nor in a part as an act: therefore it is also not divided by its division.

§ 40. But on the contrary: Something perfects man insofar as he is man: not the vegetative soul, not the sensitive: therefore the rational: therefore the rational soul is the act of the body of man.

§ 41. Further it is inquired, Whether the soul is in the body as in a place?

§ 42. 1. It seems that it is: because to be in a place definitively is to operate in a place, as Damascene says: but the operations of the soul are in the body: therefore it itself is in the body as in a place.

§ 43. 2. Likewise, Ambrose: Local is that which is defined by a place, so that it is here, and not elsewhere: but if the soul is in the body: therefore it is in it as in a place and is local, as it seems.

§ 44. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The Philosopher says, that the soul is compared to the body as the container to the contained: therefore the soul is the container: therefore it itself is rather the place of the body, than conversely: because it properly belongs to a place to contain.

§ 45. 2. Likewise, the Philosopher says, that the containing of a place and of matter are not the same: since therefore the body is the matter of the soul, it will not be its place.

§ 46. 3. Likewise, place and the placed are distinct through essence: but the soul and body are united: therefore one is not the place of the other.

§ 47. 4. Likewise, every placed thing in something as in a place, is movable outside of it, with the subject and definition remaining the same: the soul is not movable outside the body thus: therefore it itself is not in the body as in a place.

§ 48. Solution. Certain ones have said, that the soul is united to the body of man by a double medium: for since the body is a gross corporeal composite, and the rational soul is incorporeal, non-bodily, and spiritual, they are distant in all properties: therefore it is necessary to have a double medium, namely an incorporeal spiritual and a corporeal one, and a corporeal bodily (otherwise, corruptible) spiritual medium: and this agrees in two respects with the body, and in one with the soul: and thus they say, that the rational soul in its conjunction to the body has the vegetative and sensitive soul in place of the first medium: and the corporeal spirit which they say is of the nature of the fifth body it has as a medium in the second ratio of a medium. But from this position it follows, that the vegetative and sensitive soul in man would be dispositions to the rational soul: therefore they will be accidents, which is absurd. For it is against the Philosophers, namely Avicenna in VI of the First Philosophy, that the vegetative and sensitive soul are not in man as a substance, but as a potency, in which the rational soul is founded: and thus the rational soul is the act of man insofar as he is man: and the sensitive and vegetative are its potential parts. This is also against Aristotle in book XVI On Animals, where he says, that just as the body is one, so also the soul is one. Besides, it could not easily be proved, how that spirit is of the nature of the fifth body, since the Philosophers say that it is air by nature, or a medium between fire and air.

§ 49. And therefore, feeling otherwise, we say that the soul is considered in three ways, namely as the form of the body, and according to its essence, and as a mover insofar as it is the efficient cause of all the works of the animated body. If it is taken in the first way, I say that it is whole in the whole, and is united immediately, unless you wish to say, that the dependence of one to the other is a medium: but that potency is imported in the name of form, and in the name of matter, on the grounds that we say that the soul is the substantial form of such a body, namely a physical one having life in potency: and in this way I well suppose, that it is whole in the whole. According to another consideration of its essence, I say that it is an indivisible essence, and its whole essence is present to any part of it, namely to the intellect, and to sense, and thus of others: and since its powers are divided throughout the body, and it itself is essentially present to each one, it itself through its essence only is whole in the whole. But if it is considered as it is a mover, thus it is the efficient cause of works, and it is not the efficient cause of works except through all its potential parts: whence thus it is as it were constituted from its powers as parts, and thus it is in the whole wholly, in such a way that it is not whole in any part.

§ 50. It must be said therefore to the first, that the soul has totality by many considerations, namely one with respect to its powers, and another which Augustine touches upon in book IX of De Trinitate, with respect to its essential attributes, such as are life, essence, substance, and spirit: for with respect to these it can be whole in the whole body: because in any part there is life, and substance, and spirit, and soul, and principle, and form: and according to all these in being it is in the ratio of a certain totality in being. A whole is also said to be the same as perfect: and thus again it is whole in the whole, and in any part. But if totality is said from the universality of powers, it will be whole in the whole, but not whole in any part.

§ 51. To the next it must be said, that the spirit is the instrument of the soul with respect to its first operations, which are vital, natural, and animal: for through the vital spirit it flows in life, and pulse: but through the natural one natural works, such as to nourish, augment, and generate: but through the animal one animal works, such as are sense, and motion: and these belong to it, according as it is the mover of the body: but according to this that it gives being, it does not have a medium.

§ 52. And if it is objected, that according to the Philosopher for living things to live is to be: therefore living whose instrument is the vital spirit, is being: and thus it uses it in order to give being. It must be said, that this is impossible: because it does not use an instrument unless it is: therefore the soul using the instrument is already in the body before the instrument by reason of form: and therefore, when it is said, that for living things to live is to be, it is understood of the act of life which is the soul, the effect of which gives animal being, and this is to be life and to live: but it is not understood of living which is through spirit and pulse.

§ 53. To the next it must be said, that it does not make the parts to be animals, because it is not in them as a soul, but as a potency of the soul: but a potency does not make an animal, because the potency itself is not through a proper being, but through the being of that whose potency it is: just as any part is through the being of its whole which it has in it. But it is true, that if the part were divided, then the potency itself would be the soul, and the member would be the animal: whence the Philosopher says, that if the eye were an animal, sight would be its soul.

§ 54. To the next it must be said, that the rational soul itself is not divisible by the division of the body: for something is said to be divisible by the division of the matter in which it is, namely because when the matter is divided it itself is greater in the greater part, and lesser in the lesser, and equal in the equal: and thus by the division of matter only forms having a position in a body are divided: and positional things per se or by accident, such as whiteness, color. In a second way something is said to be divided by the division of the body, which remains according to one ratio in any divided part, but not greater in the greater, and lesser in the lesser, and equal in the equal: and thus substantial form is divided in homogeneous things, or things close to the nature of homogeneous things, such as stone, and wood: for in a plant when a part is divided each part convalesces through grafting: and this is also the case in certain animals having almost similar members throughout the whole body. But the rational soul is divided in none of those ways: and it does not have this insofar as it is a form, nor insofar as it is a substantial form: because thus any substantial form would have this: but it has it insofar as it is a substance having parts distant in work, and from this seeking a great diversity of organs in the body in which it is: and this is the statement of the Commentator above the beginning of book II of De Caelo et Mundo.

§ 55. To the next it must be said, that the rational soul expresses two things, namely that it is a soul, and that it is rational: if it is taken as a soul, then it is the act of the body, and it has flowing from itself powers, of which certain ones are affixed to organs, and certain ones are not: and by that man is man: and I concede well, that by the sensitive or vegetative man is not man, since in man they are not except as potencies, and not as acts of the body. But if it is taken only as it is of reason, then it is the act of no body, that is, of no part of the body: because those powers of its are not affixed to organs, although they receive through apprehension from a potency affixed to an organ, as is the phantasy, or memory, or estimation.

§ 56. To the next it must be said, that the soul is not in the body as in a place: because thus the soul would not be in the body except by accident.

§ 57. But to the objection on the contrary, it must be said that it is not defined in the body as a placed thing in a place: because that which operates in something distinct through essence from it, is said to be defined [confined], and not that which operates as united to it, as the objections made to the contrary prove.

Articulus 27 — Whether The Soul Is Well Demonstrated To Be Composite On Account Of Its Accidents

Whether the soul is well proved to be composed on account of its accidents?

§ 59. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: For since it is one thing to be artful, etc.

§ 60. For it seems, that this does not induce composition: because an accident is not in it as a part of the thing, as the Philosopher says: but nothing composes except a part: therefore from this it is not proved that the soul is composed.

§ 61. To this it must be said, that Augustine proves it well: because from this it is taken, that it is composed in two ways, namely in its essence, and by the composition of concretion. In its substance indeed: because nothing can be the subject of an accident except what is in itself composed: and this is proved by Boethius in the book De Trinitate, where he says thus: A simple form cannot be a subject. From this therefore that the soul is the subject of accidents, as of arts, sciences, and virtues, it is left that it is composed.

§ 62. It must be said therefore to the objection, that Augustine intends, that the accidents demonstrate that essential composition: and moreover they make a composition of concretion, in which it is not required that the component be a part.

Articulus 28 — Whether It Follows Well: The Divine Essence Is Simple, Therefore Immutable

Whether it follows well, The Divine essence is simple: therefore immutable?

§ 64. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: For nothing simple is mutable, etc.

§ 65. This is now the third ratio of simplicity which is extracted from the Text. For the first was according to the non-difference of that which is and being, on the grounds that there is no part there. But the second, that it was not a subject of accidents. But the third is this: because the divine essence is immutable: and this is proved thus:

§ 66. Everything that is mutated, is mutated either according to the whole in position, or toward a form. If it is mutated in position or in place, it is composed of a mover and a movable, as was noted above. But if it is mutated toward a form, it will be the subject of that form, and thus again composed. Therefore it is evident, that what is entirely simple cannot be mutated. What therefore is thus entirely immutable, is also called simple.

§ 67. Besides, what is mutated, is mutated through a privation which is in it: but a privation is not except in a composite of that having the privation and the privation or potency: therefore what is entirely immutable, will be entirely simple: and this is the intention of Augustine.

Articulus 29 — How God Is Named Something Symbolically

How is God symbolically named something?

How is God symbolically named something?

§ 69. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: And whatever else seems not unworthily to be said, etc.

§ 70. For it seems that God is named something symbolically or through similitude, as lion, and stone: which nevertheless befits Him unworthily.

§ 71. Solution. Augustine understands this of those things which according to the reality are found first in God, although by name they imperfectly represent them: and this Augustine calls 'to be said worthily', because it is better simply for any thing to be than not to be, in the way which was said above.

Articulus 30 — Whether There Can Be Accidents In God, And Whether He Causes Them

Whether there can be accidents in God, and whether He causes them?

§ 73. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: But what in the divine nature, etc. On the contrary: It seems that an accident is in God. God creates an accident; either therefore by univocal generation, or equivocal. Not equivocal: because equivocal generation is, when the ratio of the generated is not in the generator, as the sun generates a plant or man: but univocal, when the ratio of the generated is in the generator or creator. But there is not anything created by God, whose proper ratio is not in Him, as Augustine says: therefore it seems, that the ratio of all accidents is in God: and where the ratio of an accident is, there is an accident: therefore an accident is in God, as it seems.

§ 74. Solution. It must be said, that every species of motion is reduced to an immobile mover according to that species of motion, as the motion of a lower thing to the motion of the heaven, and the motion of the heaven to the mover of the heaven: and if that is a motion, it is reduced further to the first mover simply, as the motion of a hot thing is reduced to the motion of fire, and the motion of fire to the motion of the star of Mars, or of another which in itself is not disposed by that quality, and thus of others. So it is concerning the variation of accidents and temporal things, that they are reduced according to themselves to the first causing them, which is disposed by none of them.

§ 75. But to this that is objected, it must be said that if the ratio of hot is in God, nevertheless He is not hot, or white on account of the ratio of white: for this ratio is not the definition of white, but is like a ratio in the first cause, from whose power not quality such things proceed.

Articulus 31 — Whether The Nine Predicaments Of Accidents, Both According To Genera And According To Species, Can Be Attributed To God; And Whether God Can Be Understood As Good Without A Quality

Whether the nine categories of accidents as much according to genera as according to species can be attributed to God: and whether God can be understood as good without quality?

§ 77. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: Let us understand God, as much as we can, as good without quality, etc.

§ 78. 1. For against this it seems to be, that from whatever the genus is removed, the species is also removed: therefore if He Himself is without quality, He Himself is also without goodness, as it seems.

§ 79. 2. Likewise, when it is said, great without quantity, it does not seem that quantity is removed from Him by reason of genus only, but also by reason of species: because He is in no species of the discrete or of the continuous.

§ 80. 3. Likewise, creator without need of Himself: Creator expresses a relation: therefore he ought to say creator without relation, just as he said in the others.

§ 81. 4. If perhaps it should be said, that this ought not to have been said: because relation does not change the mode of predicating in divine things. This is against Boethius, who says in the book De Trinitate, thus: But when someone applies these, that is, other categories besides relation, into divine predication, all things which can be predicated are changed: but relative to something is not predicated at all: therefore it seems from this that relation is most of all removed from divine things.

§ 82. 5. Likewise, he seems to speak badly, Presiding without position [situs]: because Boethius says concerning position and posture thus, that position and posture cannot be required in God: therefore it seems, that position is removed both by grace of the genus, and by grace of the species.

§ 83. 6. Likewise, since position is the ordering of parts in a whole or in a place, or in the universe, it is evident that it does not befit any spiritual creature: therefore much less God.

§ 84. 7. Likewise, it is objected concerning this which he says, Whole everywhere without place: for where and when predicate nothing in that of which they are said, as Boethius says: therefore since these predicate nothing in that of which they are said, it is not necessary to remove them from divine predication: because they do not make a composition.

§ 85. 8. Likewise, concerning when it seems frivolous that it predicates nothing: because if I say, God is always, the when of eternity is predicated: but God is His own eternity: therefore it seems that it predicates something in Him which is He Himself.

§ 86. 9. Likewise, it is objected concerning this which he says, Making mutable things without mutation of Himself: because Augustine says in the book LXXXIII Questions, that to make befits God even more properly than others: therefore by reason of its genus it ought not to be removed from God.

§ 87. 10. Likewise, it is objected concerning this, And suffering nothing: because God seems to suffer, as the Creed says, Crucified, died, and was buried.

Solution. To this it must be said that all the most general from the genera of accident have two things in themselves, namely that they are accidents, and the difference by which they are distinguished from each other: for that quantity is quantity, it does not have from that which is accident, but from that which is dimension or measure of substance within or without. Similarly, that quality is quality, it does not have from that which is accident, but from that which is disposition of natural substance or adventitious within or without: and so it is with others. However, from that which they are accidents, all say order to substance. Whence the Philosopher in the beginning of book XI of the First Philosophy: It has been said about being to which other categories of being are attributed, where it has been said about substance: for many things are called beings according to which they regard the definition of substance, as quantity, quality, and others which are said in this way. Similarly, by the difference by which they participate in the nature of accident, they also regard the category of substance: as is clear through the same authority, as quantity in the reason of measure, quality in the reason of disposition, etc.: therefore, since in this way it is imperfect being, and being in another, all which predicate something in that of which they are predicated, by reason of genus are removed from the divine. And to this again to be understood it must be noted that Boethius says that some of the categories predicate something to be in that of which they are predicated: but some assist extrinsically: but some predicate the thing to have relation to that which is extrinsically adjacent, as place, and time. Whence quality, and quantity, and acting, and being acted upon, and position, and habit, predicate something to be in. But relation assists extrinsically, as right, and left: for the same can be right and left without its change. But when and where predicate that which from the adjacency of the external measuring is left. Therefore, those which predicate something to be in because of the genus which places order to substance, are removed in the genus:

but that which by reason of difference agrees in the species, because through difference it says order to act or to end, and not subject, therefore in the species it is predicated: especially if that species is constituted by difference of dignity, as good, wise, etc. But those which are extrinsically assisting to another, by reason of that which is the nature of accident in them, are not predicated, but are changed into substance: but by reason of that which they add in the most general, they do not say order to substance, and therefore they remain.

And through this now the solution to the first is clear, and to that which is objected, why it is not said without relation related. But those which predicate that which is left from the adjacency of the external measuring, are removed: indeed in place according to which it implies circumscription, and this is in particular: as if it were said to be somewhere, not somewhere, and of this kind: and if it were said, it was, and will not be. Whence in such it is not necessary to exclude except that which is of part and imperfection: and therefore it excludes time: because this is imperfect, as was held before. And through this the solution about where, and when is clear. But some are also imperfect in the genus of accident, and also by that which they add, as position which is of corporeal things, and being acted upon which is of the imperfect, and habit which is of corporeal things: and therefore those are simply removed, unless by translation they agree to God. And through this again the solution to those which are objected about them is clear.

To the second it must be said that quantity properly is only of corporeal things: but nevertheless it is taken here for the quantity of power.

To another it must be said that change causes relation, as the Philosopher says: but change is of the needy, and therefore that which sounds imperfection, especially removes.

To another it must be said that the understanding of Boethius is that formally the negation regards the distribution of the sign, so that the sense is: It is not altogether predicated, that is, it is not altogether predicated: because it is changed by reason of the nature of accident which is in it: although it retains the predication of the difference which it superadds: because that makes it to be to another: and this Boethius intends when he says that it is not altogether predicated in the divine.

To another it must be said that position says the ordering of parts, and it is not in spiritual things except by reason of order which is preserved there: because that which is there of corporeal nature, or local, this does not agree to God: and therefore position is preserved there according to the part of its reason which is order.

To another it must be said as above it was determined about where.

To another it must be said that in truth when it is said, God is always, eternity is signified, and the adjacency of it according to reason, which is nothing other than God: because otherwise there would have been many from eternity: but Augustine removes time which is the exemplar of eternity, and it is imperfect which by always can be understood.

To another it must be said that acting is taken in two ways, namely physically, and thus nothing acts unless it is acted upon and changed: and this is the agent in our use accepted: and this Augustine attends here. It is also said that the agent which without change of itself brings forth the species of the act, and this does not agree except to God - and this is the perfect agent, and this is the agent of which Augustine intends, when he says that acting agrees only to God: because namely every perfect agent is with respect to the act: but the perfect is especially that which is never acted upon, but universally acts all things.

To the last it must be said that God is acted upon by reason of the suppositum of man, and not by reason of the divine nature: and therefore that objection is sophistical.

Articulus 32 — Whether The Predicament Of Substance Can Be Attributed To God, Such That God Is In The Predicament Of Substance

Whether the predicament of substance can be attributed to God, such that God is in the predicament of substance?

Whether the predicament of substance can be attributed to God, such that God is in the predicament of substance?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says;

Whence neither is He properly called substance, etc.

1. The reasons of the Master which he uses, saying that God is not in the predicament of substance, can be these: Whatever is in the genus of substance, is either by way of principle, or by way of genus, or by way of being contained in the genus. If by way of principle, since the principles of substance are only two, namely matter and form, if God were in the genus in this way, He would be matter or form. But if by way of genus, then God would be the most general predicable univocally of all contained in the genus of substance. But if by way of being contained, then He would be either subalternate, or most specific, or individual: and none of these is God: therefore He is not in a genus.

2. Likewise, the genus of substance in itself has being, and another by which substance is substance: therefore it has two in itself: therefore it is composite: but God is not composite: therefore substance is not said of Him univocally with others: therefore He is not in the same genus with others.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. God is substance: either it is true, or false. If true, either substance is predicated there as a substantial predicate not converted, or not. If not: therefore it is predicated as an accident, which is false. If so: therefore since every substantial predicate not converted is predicated of something as a genus, it seems that God is substance as in a genus. If it is said that this is false, God is substance. But on the contrary: Whatever is, is substance, or accident: therefore God is accident, which is false: therefore He is substance.

1. Likewise, God is per se existing, such that nothing exists per se as much as God: but substance is a thing per se existing, therefore God is substance, and substance is God.

Solution. It must be said that in truth God or the divine essence is not in any genus as the first reasons for the Master prove: and when it is said substance, it is not said substance from the act of standing under second substance or accidents: but it is said substance being not through another, which is divided against being from another, and being in another: and Boethius and Dionysius call that substance to be above every substance: because this causes all substances, and they imitate it.

To what is objected, whether it is an essential predicate? etc. It must be said that when it is said, God is substance, the same is signified in the subject and predicate, although in another way, because in God there is not what is and by which it is: and therefore it is not an essential predicate unless converted: because substance is not predicated except as the same under another mode of signifying: for those arguments are in created things, not in divine things.

But if it is objected, By conversion substance is God: therefore every substance. It must be said that it does not follow, for although it is essential, yet it is predicated as the same to the subject: and that should not be converted, nor distributed, because the sign does not regard those which are of diverse nature. Whence when it is said, every substance, substance is not distributed for the substance of God, but only for the creature, and for those that expression is false.

To the other it must be said, that in the way which was said before, speaking of per se existing, God is most excellently per se existing: otherwise not.

Whether Hilary touches upon every mode of composition well through the four things that are set forth in the Letter?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

God is not from composites, etc.

Namely, whether Hilary touches upon every mode of composition through these four? For the first composition which is in the thing is from essential parts, which are that which is and that by which it is, which are in the thing from which the universal and particular are taken: and he touches upon that first, when he says, God is not from composites, etc. The second composition is of the first things, which are from matter and form, in which composition matter is subject to privation, which is weak and imperfect. The third is the composition from the influence of the celestial body over the lower things, because every mixture and generation of lower things is reduced to the motion of the heaven as a cause: but the higher body moves through the influence of light over the darkness especially of the two elements, which are earth and water. For these abound more in the bodies of mixtures: for the dry terrestrial is the terminative of this kind of aqueous, and the moist aqueous is the continuative of the dry, and thus the mixture is made by the moving light of the higher bodies through presence, or through aspect, or through some application to a star regarding, or conjunction, or opposition, or other properties, which are determined in the science of the stars. To this mixture follows the composition of complexioned and organic things to the spiritual nature which is the soul.

The first is of the celestial body and the angel and the rational soul. The second is of the prime matter to the form of the element. The third is of the elements to the form of minerals. The fourth is of the complexioned to the form which is the soul.

To the first is opposed life in the whole: because in the composite life is of the active essence, and that which is has life participatively. But to the second is opposed virtue because of the defect of privation which is weak. To the third is opposed light in the whole because of the opaque and dark of the lower elements. To the fourth is opposed being spirit in the whole because of the disparity of the gross and earthly body to the spiritual nature of the soul which is composed with it.

Articulus 34 — Whether Relation Can Be In God With His Simplicity Preserved

Whether relation can exist in God without compromising His simplicity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

And with such simplicity and certainty, etc.

1. For since relation is a being, and does not turn into substance, it seems in divine things to be substance and accident. Therefore, at least a composition of concretion.

2. If perhaps it is said that relation does not signify something as inhering, but as assisting, as Boethius seems to want, and the Porretanians said. To this it seems to follow the heresy of Sabellius: for if relation signifies nothing in reality, it seems that it does not constitute the thing in which it is. But in divine things we have nothing that can constitute persons except relations. Therefore, it seems that if they are nothing in reality, there is no distinction of persons, but only a trinity of names, as Sabellius says.

3. Furthermore, relation seems in divine things to change the mode of predication, just as other things do: because the Father is something in Himself, even if He does not have the Son: for He is most truly a subsisting substance: therefore, it seems that the relative signifies substance: therefore, it changes the mode of predication.

4. Likewise, the Father is most truly the suppositum and hypostasis of the divine nature: but every suppositum of substance is substance, as is evident by inducing each suppositum of man, angel, dog, donkey, and so on: since therefore the divine nature is substance, its suppositum will be substance; therefore, the relative changes the mode of predication in divine things.

Solution. It must be briefly said, because it will be discussed below, that relation has in itself, namely the nature of an accident, and that it is a certain property, and from this it has to inhere solely, and it has in itself that it is opposed to another relatively, and from this it has to be determined externally, as when it is said, Father of the son, and son of the father. And as to the first, it changes the mode of predication, because regarding that, its mode of predication is the mode of an accident making a composition of concretion with the subject in which it is, and it is predicated denominatively of it: and such predication cannot be in God: and therefore in divine things it loses the nature of an accident, and the nature of a property remains inasmuch as it is a property, namely that it is fitting to one alone: and further, the understanding of relation to another remains to it, as has been said: and therefore some have said that in divine things relation is nothing in the person, but is the person itself, and that by which the person is to another, wishing by this to say that it loses the nature of an accident, and thus does not inhere, and retains the nature of property and relation.

But what Boethius says, that relation is assisting, he understands regarding the second, namely regarding the nature of relation, as relation, and not regarding the nature of property which is in relation. From this it is clear that it does not take away simplicity: because it would not take away except by the nature of an accident as it is an accident, which by introducing a diverse being, that is, a being of a diverse nature from substance, would make a multiple being, and a composition of concretion between them: for the person does not have any accident, but is most truly substance and suppositum. And this opinion will be more discussed below.

Articulus 35 — Why, Since There Are Many Attributes Of The Divine Essence, Does The Master Determine Only Concerning Three, Simplicity, Identity, And Unity

Why, since there are many attributes of the divine essence, does the Master determine only concerning three, simplicity, identity, and unity?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Behold how great is identity, how great is unity, etc.

For it is doubtful, since there are many attributes of the divine nature, why does the Master treat here only of these three?

And to this it must be said, that the Master, as is evident, treats here of simplicity, and the others as they relate to the generation of the Son, about which he principally intends here: and because in lower things generation follows, so that the begotten, or generated, is first in potency, and does not receive the unity of the essence of the Father according to act, due to the imperfection of the lower nature: and it follows secondly, that the essence itself is changed from potency into act: and thirdly, that it is divided according to one being in the Father, and according to another being in the begotten. Therefore, concerning these three by opposition, the Master treats in divine generation in which the begotten receives the true essence without changeability, and in simplicity, because it is one in the Father and the Son, etc.

DISTINCTIO IX

Divisio Textus

Now let us approach the distinction of persons, etc.

Here begins the fourth and last part of the treatise on the generation of the Son: in which it is discussed concerning itself with respect to the measurer outside according to reason. For as the Philosopher says, what is external to the eternal, this is coeternal to the coeternal, and time to the temporal, on account of one reason of measure in common. Hence it is proven in this distinction that the Son is coeternal with the Father. However, it is divided into three parts. In the first, it is proven that the Son is coeternal with the Father against the Arian heretics. In the second, it is inquired with what fitting words the eternity of the generation of the Son is expressed, there, K, Here it can be asked, When. In the third, the objection of Arius is resolved from the words of Hilary, there, P,

But the heretic will say, etc.

The first of these is subdivided into two. In the first, it is proven that the generation is coeternal with the generating Father. In the second, it is shown to be ineffable, there, H, But you ask of me, he says, etc.

The first of these is further divided into four. First, indeed, he manifests the coeternity of the Father and the Son. Second, he sets against it the objection of the heretics, there, CG, But against this says the heretic. In the third, he sets the response of Augustine to the objection of the heretic, there, D, Who. And he adds what Augustine says against the objection of the heretic, there, E, If the Son of God, etc. In the fourth, against the same heretic, he sets the response of Ambrose, there, F, And he also joins to the Arian question the rational invective of Ambrose against the heretic, there, G, Tell me, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Eternity Is The Divine Essence

Whether eternity is the divine essence?

Whether eternity is the divine essence?

Here before the Letter it is necessary to inquire, if eternity is the divine essence: and if it is, in what manner it is understood to be adjacent to the procession of persons: and thirdly, in what mode it is distinguished from age and time: so that it may be known that the generation of the Son is not eternal or temporal, as the heretics said.

From the first it proceeds thus:
1. Anselm says in the Monologion, that eternity is of those things which are not other than itself: therefore eternity is the same as the divine essence.

1. Likewise, Eternity is without beginning and without end: but nothing of this sort is except God: therefore eternity is God Himself.
2. Likewise, Everything that is, is either creature or creator. If creature: but every creature is mutable, as Augustine says, and it has been held in the preceding distinction: therefore eternity itself is mutable, which is against the definition of Dionysius set above, that eternity is ancient and invariable, etc.: therefore, etc.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. If eternity is nothing other than God: therefore to be in eternity is to be in God: but all things in a certain way, namely as in an excellent measure, are in eternity: therefore all things are in God as in a measure, which is false.

1. Likewise, Eternity is a duration extrinsically adjacent: but nothing extrinsically adjacent is that to which it is adjacent: therefore eternity is not God, since it is adjacent to the duration of God.
2. Likewise, Measure and measured are not the same: but eternity is a measure, the being of God is the measured: therefore, etc.

Solution. It must be said that eternity according to the thing is the same as the divine essence enduring, and the duration itself, because whatever is in God is God: but it has another mode of signifying. Just as the knowledge of God and any other divine attribute, although it is the essence of God, yet it does not follow that whatever is in knowledge is in the essence of God or will. Similarly, although the enduring essence of God is the same as eternity, it does not follow that whatever is in eternity is in the enduring essence of God. And in such matters the mode of predicating is changed, which induces a fallacy of figure of speech, or what is more true, of accident. Because although they are the same in reality, it does not follow that whatever is fitting to one is fitting to the other. For it is not inconvenient that the divine essence is not in the reason of essence, but in the reason of duration is the measure of enduring things.

To the other it must be said that eternity does not extrinsically adjacently to objects, except according to reason: for according to the thing it is within, because God is His duration.

To the third it must be said that this holds in lower things, that the measure is not the measured itself essentially. But in the higher nature in which there is nothing that is not itself, it does not hold, except according to reason: because measure and measured are the same in reality, although they differ in reason.

Articulus 2 — How Eternity Is Understood To Be Adjacent To The Procession Of The Persons

How is eternity understood to be adjacent to the procession of persons?

Then it is asked, How is it understood to be adjacent to the procession of persons?

1. For that which is immense neither certifies the quantity of anything, nor is certified by any quantity: but eternity is immense, the procession of persons is also immense, and the divine essence is immense: therefore it seems that none of these is adjacent to the other as a measure.
2. Likewise, the indivisible measures nothing, nor is it measured. Prosario. Every measure is for the sake of having certainty of quantity: but the indivisible does not have quantity: therefore it is not measured. Similarly, it does not measure quantity when taken multiple times: therefore it cannot be a measure: therefore it seems that it is not adjacent as a measure.

Solution. It must be said that eternity is in a certain way infinite, and in a certain way not infinite, and similarly God or the enduring divine being. For if the divine being is taken as infinite privatively, namely that it is naturally apt to have an end and does not have one: thus neither God nor eternity are infinite. But if it is taken negatively, that is, not finite: again it can be taken in two ways, namely that it is not finite because it is extended in parts without end: and in this way God or his eternity is not said to be infinite. But God and his eternity are said to be infinite because both, existing wholly at once, neither lacked, nor lack, nor will lack, and this is the infinite which is constituted in the state of the most perfect, which rejects nothing from itself, nor accepts anything: and this infinite does not contradict the reason of measure and measured, but the infinite accepted in the first and second way.

To the other it must be said that the indivisible in the reason of the indivisible does not measure because it is certain, not according to quantity, but in itself: but eternity is an indivisible having extension, not indeed in parts according to succession or potentiality, but rather as not deficient to something that stands or runs under it: and thus although it is indivisible, it is not taken as indivisible, rather in the reason of duration extended in this way, and thus it measures. And the divine being accepted in this way as enduring is measured by its duration, which is the same as its being or divine essence.

Articulus 3 — How Eternity Is Distinguished From Aevum And Time, And Whether Some Non-Living Things Are Measured By Aevum, And Whether Aevum Is In One As Eternity And Time Are

How eternity is distinguished from the age, and time, and whether some non-living things are measured by the age, and whether the age is in one as eternity and time?

How eternity is distinguished from the age, and time, and whether some non-living things are measured by the age, and whether the age is in one as eternity and time?

Thirdly, it is asked about the distinction of eternity from the age, and time. For the age is the measure of those things which are altogether at once: therefore it seems that it is the same as eternity.

Proof that the age is altogether at once. 1. Just as we see that the prior and posterior in time are caused by the prior and posterior in motion, and the whole being at once in eternity is caused by the simplicity of the eternal, so it is necessary to derive the properties of the age from the property of the everlasting: but the being of the everlasting does not have the potential to be before being, nor power without act in any way: therefore, since not being at once is caused by power rejecting and receiving act, those things will be altogether at once, whose potential is always in act or in being.

1. Likewise, every succession of time is caused by motion: therefore in whose being there is no motion, they have no succession: but the being of the everlasting has no motion: therefore they cause no succession in their measure: therefore the age, which is their measure, is altogether at once, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever things are altogether at once, are truly immutable: but true immutability is true eternity, as Augustine says: therefore whatever things are altogether at once, are eternal: therefore the everlasting are eternal, which is false: therefore the everlasting are not altogether at once.

1. Likewise, the enduring being of an Angel is not its duration: since therefore duration is nothing but the extension of being indeficient, it seems that the Angel does not have that part of its duration which it will have after a thousand years: therefore its whole duration is not at once: therefore the everlasting is not altogether at once, since it is that duration or adjacent to it.

According to this, it is further asked, Whether some non-living things are measured by the age?

1. For thus Boethius says in the book on the Trinity, that the philosophers gave being at once to immortal bodies. Therefore it seems that it is not only the measure of Angels.

2. Furthermore, the Philosopher says that necessary and impossible things are not in time: but many necessary things are not God himself, like immutable things: therefore it seems that since they are not eternal, nor temporal, they are measured by the age.

On the contrary, it is asked, If the age is in one, just as eternity and time?

It seems so: because the Philosopher says that each thing is measured by the smallest of its kind: but the everlasting in as much as they are of one kind: therefore they are measured by some smallest of that kind: therefore it will be in that as in subject and cause.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 4. Eternity is in one: because, as Anselm says, there cannot be more than one without beginning and without end: time however is in one, because all moved things are reduced to one, as to a cause: but this is not so in the everlasting: for they are neither one only, nor are they reduced to each other as to a cause: therefore it seems that they are not in one.

1. Likewise, of spiritual and corporeal things there is not one kind: since therefore the age is of spiritual things, it does not seem that it can be of corporeal and celestial things: and thus it seems that there will be two ages, by one of which spiritual substances are measured, and by the other corporeal ones.
2. Furthermore, the reason of quantity is not the same in both: therefore neither is the same measure: therefore the age of the Angel, and of the bodies which Boethius calls immortal, is of a different reason: therefore not all the everlasting can be reduced to one age, as it seems.
3. Furthermore, the substantial being of generable and corruptible things seems to be the same in the whole duration of time: but time is not the measure of that which is the same in the whole duration, but rather the measure of that from which something is rejected and received: therefore it seems that it is necessary to find a third thing, which measures the substantial being of those things which are generated and corrupted.

In conclusion. It must be said without prejudice, that the age is altogether at once, just as the everlasting. For in the everlasting there is not the reason of indeficiency, that power continuously receives act: but rather the necessity of continuation and indeficiency is, namely that they are so complete, that there is nothing from potential to being that is not complete: and therefore their power stands in being with immobile duration. But nevertheless the being at once of eternity and of the age is equivocal for two reasons: one of which is, because in the eternal the standing immobile power is the same as act: or what is more proper, because there is no perfect or perfectible power in it, but simple enduring being: but in the everlasting there is perfect power, although not perfectible, and not simple enduring being. The second is, because the eternal has from itself that it is standing being, and not moving itself in enduring being: but the everlasting has this from the hand of the all-containing God: but in this it abounds over others, because in itself it does not have the cause of the struggle why its being in itself should begin to differ, as the mobile has in as much as it is mobile. And from this it is clear, that it does not follow if the age is at once, that it is eternity: because being is not of the same reason in both, nor is the everlasting by its nature immutable in being as the eternal: and therefore it does not have true eternity as the eternal.

To the other it must be said, that the enduring being

The eviternal does not have its own duration, nor does its duration have parts: because duration cannot have parts unless they are successive, and then something on the part of the enduring would be the cause of the duration, which is not the case with the eviternal: because the necessity of being in them is immobile, with nothing causing the essential principles to be distant from themselves: but their duration, in the manner of indeficient standing and immobile, falls under the notion of being extended and measured: which necessity of being, however, is alien in them than from themselves, as has been said: whence they already have the cause of indeficient duration after a thousand years.

To the question, Whether they are not alive in the eviternal, as in a measure? it must be said that they are: for the being of celestial bodies is not mutable, and is not measured by the now of time according to which man is considered as immobile to the substantial or accidental form: but the now is adjacent to it according to that which is carried as one in the whole motion, which according to something is in the terminus from which the motion is, and according to something in the terminus to which the motion is: and therefore Boethius calls those bodies immortal bodies: because nothing in their substance comes or goes.

To what is further asked, Whether the eviternal is in one? there are those who, induced by reasons, say that it is not: but I do not see what prohibits it from being in the most simple eviternal, and others being measured by comparison to it.

To what is objected against, it must be said that the whole cause of reduction to one is not that the same is the cause of others, but because that motion is the most simple of other motions: and therefore by the quantity of the circle, or part of its motion, it certifies other motions: and in this respect the eviternal is reduced to one which is of simpler essence: because in that the potency is in act, so to speak, more standing, or more stable than others.

To another it must be said, that corporeal things as corporeal are not in the same genus with spiritual things, nor are they measured by the same measure: for corporeal things as dimensioned are ordered to local motion which has before and after: but the being of corporeal things as they are necessary essence, in which nothing departs or recedes, are reduced to the same genus of potency with spiritual things, which potency is not the potency of matter ordered to motion, but a potency standing in complete act immovably.

To another it must be said, as has already been said, that corporeal things, as has already been said, are not reduced to the eviternal by dimensional quantity, but rather by the potency which is the necessity of continuous being.

To another it must be said, that the being of temporal things, or essence, or by whatever other name it is called, is not measured by the eviternal, but by the now of time as it is of time: and this for two reasons: one of which is, because it is one in which there is variation due to continuous loss, just as the now of time is not one in substance joined to the prior and posterior and according to being. Another reason is: because although it is simple and remaining in itself, yet according to the being it has in the subject which is matter mixed with contraries, it has an order to motion and change, and does not stand in its complete potency to which nothing comes, as the potency of the eviternal stands.

There are, however, some saying otherwise in this question, namely that eternity has neither before nor after: time, however, has before, not after: the eviternal, however, has before, and does not have after. And this is not well intelligible, if we ought to cause the eviternal from the potency of the eviternal, as the Philosopher teaches to cause time from the mobile which is in motion, and eternity from the eternal. Since the eviternal is the property of the eviternal, just as time is of motion, and eternity of the eternal, it must be caused by the principles of the eviternal. And then it cannot be understood what they say, because how the potency to enduring being has something before and nothing after in the eviternal, cannot even be well imagined.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Son Is Other Than The Father

Whether the Son is other than the Father?

Whether the Son is other than the Father?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said in the Text: In which the Father is not one thing, the Son another, the Holy Spirit another; although personally He is other, etc.

For if the Son is other than the Father, this happens by reason of principle: because the Father is indeed the principle of the Son: therefore, since it is conceded that the Father is the principle of the whole divinity, and is the principle of divinity in Himself, it seems that the Father is other than the whole divinity, and other than Himself.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that the Father is not from another than from Himself: therefore the Father is from Himself: and yet He is not distinguished from Himself: therefore by this that the Son is from the Father, it does not seem by this to be distinguished from the Father.
2. Furthermore, if "other" denotes distinction: therefore it posits distinction in that in which it denotes diversity: but it is a relative of the diversity of substance: therefore it seems that it denotes distinction of substance in the Father and the Son: since therefore there is not diverse substance in them, it does not seem that the Father is other than the Son.
3. Furthermore, we do not say, Socrates white is other than Socrates black: rather he is the same, but different: therefore it seems that "other" seeks diversity of substance: if therefore the Father is other than the Son, it seems there is diversity of substance between them.
4. Furthermore, since in inferiors concerning all of which we can say, these are others from each other, we can infer: therefore that one is one, and that one is another: therefore it seems that also in divines we can say, the Son is other than the Father: therefore the Father is one, and the Son is another: and this the Master denies in the Text.

5. If it is said that this happens because of different gender, namely masculine and neuter. On the contrary; gender only opposes mode: therefore it does not change the true signification: if therefore otherness denotes in itself diversity of substance, it will denote it in the masculine just as in the neuter, as it seems.

Furthermore, we well concede concerning something, that it is its own cause, as concerning the free: for he who is free is his own cause, as the Philosopher says: can we in the same way concede concerning the Father, that He is His own cause? It seems so: because Augustine says that He is from Himself: therefore He is His own cause.

Furthermore, if He is from Himself, can it be conceded that the Father is the principle of Himself? It seems so: because the preposition denotes the relation of some principle: therefore the principle can be placed in the place of itself.

But on the contrary; it was held above that no thing generates itself so that it is. Furthermore, no person in divines is distinguished from itself: therefore neither is any from itself, nor is generated from itself, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that this is improper, the Father is from Himself, and by the preposition no relation of cause to itself is posited: and therefore it does not have any affirmation by which the relation of the preposition is expounded, but is expounded only negatively, the Father is from Himself, that is, He is not from another.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that when it is said, the Father is the principle of the whole divinity, "whole" does not have distribution for the sake of some parts: because the persons are not parts of divinity, but the whole there and the perfect are the same: and therefore the Master expounds below, because the principle of divinity in the Son through generation, and of divinity in the Holy Spirit through procession: whence when it is said, that He is the principle of divinity, divinity does not fall under the relation or act of principle, as over that which is the terminus of the act, but as over that which is in Himself, who is the terminus of the act: because He is the principle of the Son in whom is the whole divinity, and of the Holy Spirit in whom is the whole divinity: however, the relation of principle to itself is not expounded except negatively, namely that it is not from another: and it does not follow that He is distinguished from Himself, or from divinity.

Or, more subtly it can be said, that just as in inferiors the generating father is the principle of the born, and to this it follows that he is the principle of the communication of his nature, because the born receives the nature of the father from the father himself: so according to the mode of understanding it is in divines, whence when it is said, the Father is the principle of divinity, the sense can be, as that by which divinity is communicated, and thus it is true, because the Father by His generation communicating His divinity gives to the Son, and by His procession gives it to the Holy Spirit: although indeed divinity is not distinct, yet to the act of distinction according to the intellect follows the actual communication of divinity: and in this way it does not follow that the Father Himself is distinguished from divinity, but rather, that in divinity He unites and communicates who is from Him, and is distinguished from Him.

To the other the solution is clear from what was said before.

To the other it must be said, that "other" is a relative of diversity: yet because it is an adjective, it receives substance from its subject, and around that it places its form, and since that is the substance which is hypostasis, and not nature, it denotes only the distinction of person and not of nature.

Furthermore, although it is an essential name taken by itself, yet by a personal adjunct it is drawn to stand for a person, and again according to this reason it denotes otherness only of person.

To the other it must be said, that it is otherwise concerning Socrates white, and Socrates black, because there are not supposed there different subsistents: but the Father and the Son do not differ by any accident, but rather by their subsisting persons they are distinguished.

To the other it must be said, that it is otherwise in inferiors in which the common nature is multiplied, and divided according to being. But in divines this does not happen: but rather one in number remains in three: neither gender, because it is formless, is referred to substance which is taken as indistinct: but masculine and feminine, because they speak of formed essence, are referred to person: and therefore what follows in humans does not follow in divines: but "who" would be changed into "what," and a fallacy of figure of speech would occur.

But to what is objected concerning mode, it must be said that in translative signification mode makes much: although in proper signification, with terms retained, it does not vary signification: and this is done because translation is made for the sake of mode principally: and therefore since these are in divine predications from translation, for the sake of formed gender distinction is placed, and for the sake of formless divine nature is placed, because that is in no way distinguished.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, that the free is its own cause, it is understood of the final cause, namely that it is not for another: and in this way any person is its own cause, because it is for itself, and not for another end. But when it is said, its own cause, absolutely it ought not to be conceded, in my judgment: because it denotes the relation of efficient cause principally: and therefore said by itself it would denote, that the same is the efficient cause of itself, which is false.

To the other it must be said, that I do not think this should be conceded, the Father is the principle of Himself: although this is in some way conceded, the Father is from Himself, therefore not from another: because principle not only says the order of privation to before, but also the relation of act to following: and therefore it is not the same to be from Himself, and to be the principle of Himself. Whence this is improper, the Father is from Himself: but this is false, the Father is the principle of Himself: but this is still more false, the Father is the cause of Himself, so that cause says efficient cause. Whence from that, the Father is from Himself, it cannot be inferred: therefore He generates Himself, or proceeds from Himself, or is distinguished from Himself, or is other than Himself: but according to the said sense it can be concluded, He is from Himself, therefore He is not from another.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Father Is Before The Son

Whether the Father is before the Son?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the first argument: "Nor yet was the Father before the Son," etc.

1. For the Father is the substance from which the act of generation proceeds: therefore, according to reason, He is before that act, and according to reason, generation is before the begotten: because Augustine says that whatever the Son has, He has through generation: therefore the Father, at least according to the reason of understanding, is before the Son.
2. Furthermore, this seems according to the order which the Church places in naming the persons, when it is said, "Father and Son and Holy Spirit": in which order the Father is named first.
3. Likewise, the Father is a principle not from a principle: but the Son is a principle from a principle: therefore the Father is prior to the Son at least according to reason, for a principle not from a principle, according to the reason of understanding, is before a principle from a principle.
4. Furthermore, as Augustine says in the book on the Trinity: It is heresy to attribute to God what cannot be found in either spiritual or corporeal creatures: but in no creature is it found that one substance proceeds from another and is coeternal with the one from which it proceeds.
5. And if you object concerning the splendor proceeding from a luminous body, there is no objection: because this procession is not substantial: but it would be similar if one luminous body proceeded from another; therefore it seems that it should not be attributed to God.

If perhaps you say that in lower things cause and effect are correlatives: and the Philosopher says that correlatives are simultaneous: this again is nothing: because although the cause, insofar as it is a cause, is with the effect, yet the substance of the cause is necessarily before that which is caused, and thus again it is evident that it is contrary.

Furthermore, the similarity that is brought forth is none: because even when splendor proceeds from fire or from the sun, according to reason the objection of the luminous body is prior to the splendor. For if the luminous body is not objected, there will not be splendor in that to which it is objected: therefore it follows, if there is splendor, the luminous body is objected: and not conversely, because it can be impeded: therefore the objection of the body is prior by nature: because that from which the consequence does not convert is prior by nature: and if it still converts, because nothing impedes, still the direct objection of the luminous body is the cause of the splendor: and the Philosopher says that the cause is prior by nature: therefore the Father is before the Son by nature, and thus then the objection of the heretic holds as to this.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The nature of eternity is, as was held above, that it is all at once: therefore those things that are eternal and in eternity, and eternity itself, none of them even according to the reason of understanding precedes another: but generation, and the generator, and the begotten are eternal and in eternity and eternity: therefore none of them even according to nature precedes another, nor even according to reason.

1. Likewise, in temporal things, those are said to be simultaneous which are in the same place or in the same time: therefore much more are those which are in the same now of time. But the now of time, because of the relation it has to before and after, is more variable and diverse in itself than the standing and unmoving now, which is the now of eternity: but in that are the generator, generation, and the begotten: therefore it is impossible even to understand how one precedes another.
2. Likewise, in those things in which there is a before and after, this will necessarily be caused by the intellect, or by time, or by place, or by dignity according to morals or nature. But that in divine things they cannot be caused by before and after according to time and place is clear: because divine things are neither defined nor circumscribed by place or time: therefore if there is a before and after there, this will be according to intellect, or cause, or dignity of nature or morals; but not according to the dignity of morals, because there is nothing to say in degrees of honor in morals that is in the Father, which does not also pertain to the Son: therefore this will be according to the dignity of nature if it is according to dignity.

But on the contrary: Because they are of one nature in number, to which nothing happens neither in the Father nor in the Son: therefore they will be equal according to this, and not one prior to the other: therefore two modes remain according to intellect and cause. According to intellect, however, that is prior from which the consequence does not convert: but this prior is simpler and more general than its posterior: but between the Father and the Son there is the same simplicity: therefore in this way they do not differ by prior and posterior: therefore no mode remains unless the prior is the cause, which even the heretics posited.

But on the contrary: In whatever things the cause is prior to the caused, that cause has from another that it subsists, and from another that it is a cause. For let it be granted that it has from the same that it subsists, and this is signified or this something, and that it is a cause: since from causality it has that it is a cause, from the same it will have that it is this something: and since causality is simultaneous by nature with the caused, it will be simultaneous with the caused in that it subsists and is this something, and thus in no way is it prior, which is contrary to what is posited: therefore if it is prior, it has from another that it is this something, and from another that it is a cause: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, if it has from the same, it is simultaneous according to being and according to intellect: but the Father has from the same that He is the suppositum of the divine nature or hypostasis or person, and that He is Father: therefore if He in that He is Father, according to nature and intellect is simultaneous with the Son, He also in that He is hypostasis and person, is simultaneous with Him. The first is sufficiently proven. Nothing distinguishes in divine things except relation: but with the distinguishing ceasing, the distinction and the distinct cease: therefore with the relation removed from divine things, there will not be anything distinct there: therefore there will not be supposita or hypostases there: therefore that the Father is the hypostasis of the divine nature He has from paternity: therefore the minor is proven, namely that from the same is hypostasis and Father: therefore He in every way by nature and intellect is simultaneous with the Son, and can never be understood to be before Him. And this reasoning is very good and notable: because it makes many things understood about the distinction of persons.

1. Likewise, I see in lower things certain degrees of simultaneity of cause and caused: for some act as if by the action of matter, that is, that in their action producing species similar to themselves, they need matter which receives, and from which the species itself is drawn out from potency to act, like the elements: and all those need time in their action, so that the act itself cannot be simultaneous with its agent in time. I see others which act only by the action of their form, like light in the luminous, and similarly those things which proceed by the act of light, like colors to the eye or to a mirror: and I see that those do not need time, because their presence suffices for generation, and those generated by them are simultaneous in time with them: therefore since the divine essence is incomparably more formal than these, in the divine essence the generating principle and the begotten will not only be simultaneous in time or space of eternity, but also by nature according to intellect.
2. Likewise, in intellectual nature there are degrees: for the intellect of man is seeking and finding knowledge of itself, as Augustine says, in the way that to understand oneself is to discern oneself, and to think about oneself: there is also the angelic intellect knowing itself without inquiry, so that knowing in it is not after the intellect knowing in time: therefore since God is incomparably simpler and more perfect in His intellect, He will be simultaneous in eternity and nature, the intellect itself, and to say Himself through intellect: but to say Himself through intellect is to generate the Son: therefore the Father and the Son are simultaneous in intellect and nature.

Solution. To the last arguments, assent must be given, because they are necessary: for it is not to be said that even the Father is before the Son in intellect: because then the reasons here introduced by the Saints would not be valid, like that. If there was a time when He was, and the Father was not, He was changed from not being Father to being Father, and the like. Hence the Catholic faith confesses that the Father neither according to being nor according to intellect precedes the Son in any way of priority, namely order, time, place, dignity, cause, or intellect.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that as it was proven in objecting, the Father has from the same that He is the hypostasis from which is generation, and that He is Father: and therefore according to intellect neither as agent nor as Father is He before the Son: but in lower things it is otherwise, as Ambrose says, because the carnal father does not have from the same that he is the generating hypostasis, and that he is father: and therefore the father in lower things, the substance which is hypostasis, is before the son.

To the other, it must be said that a principle not from a principle and a principle from a principle does not posit prior and posterior, as has already been proven, but rather simultaneity from the reason of relation: and if they posit order, it will not be order simply, but the order of nature which will be treated below: and that is the order by which one is from another, not by which one is prior to another.

To the other, it must be said that the Church cannot express what is without the order of prior and posterior without the order of words: and this happens here, as Gregory says in this distinction, that we stammer the high things of God. Because the voice is silent not only of men, but also of Angels in the expression of the procession of persons, as Ambrose says. Hence as simple things with complex and composite words, and eternal things with temporal, so also do we announce those things which are simultaneous with ordered words, of which one precedes and another follows. However, the Church intends by its order which it holds in pronouncing the three persons, to teach the order of nature, by which one is from another, not by which one is prior to another.

To the other, it must be said that creatures are imperfect to represent the Creator: and therefore when something similar to both is found, it must be exalted by the intellect and attributed to God more eminently, as the Psalm teaches, "Man will approach to the heart of the high," etc. Hence the coeternity of creatures, although it is not similar there according to intellect: yet it indicates in the Creator coeternity according to intellect and the thing itself.

To what is objected, that it is not similar concerning the ray or splendor, it must be said that this happens because of the imperfection of the creature.

And from these and the objections, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether It Is Rightly Said, The Son Began Because He Has A Principle

Whether it is rightly said, the Son began because he has a principle?

Then it is asked concerning this which is held in the objection of the heretic, where he infers: Everything that is born has a principle, further he concludes: The Son is born: Therefore he has a principle, etc. does it not follow?

1. For it seems to follow: because it is new, which as to its principle is near: but everything new began: therefore everything that has a principle, began.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says, that principle and beginning are the same: therefore what has a principle has a beginning: but what has a beginning began: therefore from the first, what has a principle began. But the Son has a principle: therefore he began: and thus it seems, that the conclusion of the heretic follows, which God forbid.

But on the contrary: Psalm 80:9-10: Israel, if you will hear me, there will be no new god in you: but new is what began: therefore there will not be for us a God who began.

Solution. The heretic is deceived by the equivocation of principle: for there is a principle of essence, and there is a principle of the order of nature. The principle of essence posits the inception of that which is principled by it: but the principle of the order of nature does not posit, rather it posits co-eternity, as has been proven.

To the first objection, it must be said that it is true, that the new is now first being, and that it is near as to the principle of essence: but it is not new to which the principle is near according to the order of nature by which one is from another, and not one prior to another.

To the other it must be said, that there is a principle within, and a principle without. The principle within is before which nothing is of the thing, and it is the first part of the thing, and this is converted with the beginning, if beginning is properly taken, because the beginning of a thing is in which the thing begins: and this is within all things which have a beginning: and of this principle, we do not speak, when we say, that the Father is the principle of the Son.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Can Be Said That The Son Is Coeternal With The Father, And Whether In Divine Things There Is Anything Adjectival, And Whether, As We Say, The Father And The Son Are Two Persons, So We Can Say That The Father And The Son Are Two Gods, Two Wise Ones

Whether it can be said that the Son is coeternal with the Father, and whether in divine things there is something adjectival, and whether, just as we say, the Father and the Son are two persons, we can thus say that the Father and the Son are two gods, two wise ones?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

That the Son is coeternal with the Father, etc.

1. For from this it follows that the Father and the Son are two coeternal persons: therefore they are two coeternals: and this seems to be against the Athanasian Creed: Not three eternals, but one eternal.
2. Furthermore, there is one eternity of the three: therefore it seems that the three are one eternal, yet not one simply.
3. Likewise, in other adjectives which predicate that which follows the nature, as Damascene says, we cannot predicate in the highest degree of the three except in the singular number: for if I say, the Father is wise, the Son is wise, I cannot infer: therefore the Father and the Son are two wise ones: therefore it seems, neither in this case.
4. If it is said that adjectives take number and substance from their substantives, and thus since persons are substantives of such adjectives, they take number and substance from them, and around them they place their force, and thus they can be predicated in the plural, so that it is said, the Father and the Son are two wise ones. On the contrary: Wise ones or wise is a name: therefore it signifies not only substance, but also quality: but that quality is wisdom: since therefore there is one wisdom of the three and eternity, even if the substance which is hypostasis falls into the plural, the adjective cannot fall into the plural.

5. Likewise, if I say, Socrates and Plato are white, although the term "white" takes a pluralized substance, yet this does not suffice for plurality: but also it is necessary that there be multiple whitenesses there, as it seems: therefore similarly in divine things, although both the Father and the Son are multiple and person, yet since their wisdom and eternity is one, such adjectival names cannot be predicated of them in the plural.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It seems less that a substance signifying because of the mode of the adjective imported into the verb falls into plurality, than that which does not signify substance by itself, and falls into plurality if it is verbally signified, as is held in John 10:30: I and the Father are one: therefore much more adjectives.

1. Furthermore, a thing is closer according to the reason of signification than adjectives: and yet above we had, that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are three things: therefore also adjectives can be predicated of multiple persons.

According to this, it is further asked, if there is something adjectival in divine things?

1. For we had in the preceding distinction...

...that those categories of the dialectical art do not apply to God: because God Himself is whatever He has that is said of Him, and there it is the same to be wise as to be: but what signifies substance is substantive, and not adjectival or not retained adjectivally: therefore in divine predication nothing is adjectival or retained adjectivally.

1. Likewise, Boethius says that the other categories besides relation, when one refers them to divine predication, all are changed into substance: therefore they can be held adjectivally.

Further, it is asked according to that, Why can I say, the Father and the Son are two persons, and the Father and the Son are two: and I cannot say, the Father and the Son are two gods, or two wise ones according to some? For it seems that I can say: because "two" is a numerical term, denoting the notions by which persons are numbered: therefore the term joined to it is understood to stand for a person: therefore when it is said, the Father and the Son are two gods, two divine persons are understood: therefore when the Father and the Son are two divine persons, the Father and the Son are two gods, as it seems.

Solution. Without prejudice I say, because here there are many opinions of many, that three diversities are found concerning adjectives. For sometimes they have three things drawing to adjectivity, and only one to substance, and this in divine matters: because we speak only of those: and sometimes they have only two: and sometimes they have one which is joined to two or three, denoting the plurality of persons, although it does not act in the manner of an adjective, yet it greatly contributes to the relation of the adjective to this or that: for from it is known whether it places the adjective itself concerning the person, or concerning the substance. For example, the adjective verb is adjectival, and similarly the participle and the noun: but the adjective verb and participle have three things from the nature of the adjective, namely the mode of signifying inherence, and that mode by which they signify acting, and also that mode by which the verb signifies with time, and also the participle, although less inasmuch as it is nearer to the noun: but the noun has only two, namely signification, and mode: signification, because it signifies an adjacent thing, and what is inherent: and if it is not in divine matters, and not from the reason of its signified, as we say there are certain adjectives by signification and not by mode. However, by mode, because they also have the mode of the adjective: because they signify by the mode of concretion, as when it is said, wise, good, and the like. To these also is joined by composition a preposition denoting the correlations of person to person, as when it is said, coeternal, coequal, or equipotent, and such prepositions, or adverbs contribute to the fact that such adjectives in the nominative case speak of the supposita of persons, and essence in the oblique case. I say therefore, that verbs and participles having three or four of these, according to understanding are nearer to persons than to essence: and therefore they are predicated of many in the plural, as the Father and the Son are wise, know, can, are, will, and all such: and participles similarly, as the Father and the Son are knowing, wise, being, powerful: so that each of those is a participle principally retained. However, in nouns when there are only two, of which one has only the mode of the adjective, the ancients said that they should not be said in the plural: but the moderns considering that because of that alone it takes substance and number from the person, when it is joined to it, said that they can be predicated in the plural. I believe that they can, but less properly: and therefore such expressions should not be extended, but interpreted, when they are found. However, if a preposition or adverb denoting the correlation of persons to each other is joined to any adjective, then without doubt they should not be said except in the plural of many in the highest, as the Father and the Son are coeternal, and not coeternal, and equipotent, and not equipotent.

According to this distinction therefore it must be said to the first, that Athanasius attends to the predication of the term in divine matters, because in divine matters: and he takes it from the signification of eternal, and not from the mode of signifying: nevertheless, however, attending to the mode of the adjective, it could be conceded: two or three eternals: and from this it does not follow, that there would be multiple eternities, as will be clear below.

To the other it must be said, that although there is one eternity, yet this excludes the plurality of supposita, and that plurality suffices for the plural number in the adjective.

To the other it must be said, that those things which follow nature, considering according to their significates, are not predicated of many in the plural: but according to the mode of concretion nothing prohibits, as has already been clear.

To what is objected, that such names signify substance with quality, it must be said that it is true: but they signify their quality inherently: and therefore from that mode their plurality suffices in supposita, and it is not necessary that the thing signified be multiple: and if this is in lower things, it must be said that this does not require the adjective name to signify the plural number, but this happens accidentally from the plurality of supposita differing by substance and essence, which is not in divine matters.

To the other it must be said, that it falsely posits in the argument, namely that for the plural number of the adjective the plurality of the thing it signifies is required, for this is not true: but this happens in lower things accidentally, namely because the supposita in which the thing signified by the adjective is differ substantially. Hence if we suppose the impossible, that Socrates and Plato have one whiteness, it is still true, that Socrates and Plato are white by reason of the plurality of supposita.

To what is further asked, If there is anything adjectival in divine matters? It must be said that yes as to mode, but not as to inherence by composition. And this Augustine understood above, where by this he wished to remove the composition of accident, not the mode of signifying from divine simplicity. And by this also the solution to what is objected concerning Boethius is clear.

To what is further asked, it must be said that numerical terms are adjectives, and in divine matters they signify the notions by which persons are distinguished and numbered: but when they are placed with a verb signifying substance, they place their things concerning the form of that, and signify it to be numbered: and therefore placed by themselves concerning persons they are true, and also similarly joined with personal terms, as the Father and the Son are two, the Father and the Son are two persons: but when they are placed with essential terms, they number the forms of essentials: and because there is one essence, therefore the expressions are false: yet it is otherwise with participles and nouns, and it is otherwise with adjectival nouns than with substantive nouns, as is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 8 — What The Difference Is Between Lumen, Lux, Splendor, Ray, Reflection Of The Ray, Of The Splendor, And Of The Light; And Whether The Example Of The Splendor Is Fitting, Etc

What is the difference between light, illumination, splendor, ray, reflection of the ray, splendor and illumination: and whether the example of splendor is suitable, etc.?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Just as the splendor which is generated by fire and diffused, etc.

1. What is the difference between light, illumination, splendor, ray, reflection of the ray, splendor and illumination?
2. Furthermore, the example does not seem to be suitable: because splendor is not of the essence of fire, so that it is the same in number with it in essence, that is, that it has the same essence in number.
3. Furthermore, it is asked whether a more suitable example could be found? For splendor is in another matter and nature than fire: however, the matter which has properties is one in them; hence it would have been a more suitable example in matter, as it seems.

Sotorio. To the first, it must be said according to Damascene and Avicenna, that a luminary is a shining body having light in its composition: just as the greater luminary is called the sun, and the lesser luminary is called the moon. However, illumination signifies that which has already flowed from the luminous and is received in the transparent medium, which has received it in its depth, not only on the surface: just as air is more transparent and fire, and water less, and also the fifth body as far as it is apart from the stars is transparent. For the Philosopher says that air is transparent or lucid, according to how it communicates with the perpetual superior body. However, a ray is a luminous visual line proceeding from the luminous body to direct opposition. Splendor, however, is properly the diffusion of rays through reflection to a polished plane, such as to metal or polished stone, or to a mirror, or to water: however, reflection also occurs to high bodies although not as much. However, the reflection of the ray is the refraction of the ray incident on the reflecting body at equal angles: for it has been proven in Perspective that the reflection of the ray always occurs at an angle equal to the angle of the incident ray: and therefore when the ray falls perpendicularly, it is reflected into itself: because otherwise it would follow that not all right angles would be equal. However, the reflection of illumination is the alteration of the transparent or terminated body to more illumination from the reflected rays, just as we see that nearby places in which the reflected rays do not fall are more illuminated from the diffusion of illumination occurring from the reflected rays.

To the second, it must be said that of earthly things, as Hilary says, the comparison to God is none. And if we sometimes bring forth examples of comparison against us, let no one think that they contain the reason of perfection in themselves. For splendor is neither a person, nor is it the same in essence with the luminous or light: but in this a likeness is taken, that it is coeval.

To the third, it must be said that as blessed Bernard says in the fifth book of Consideration, there is no unity which is as great as the unity of the three persons in one essence: which is thus proven. For among the unities of natural things there is a threefold unity, namely of form, matter, and subject. However, of form there is a threefold, namely of genus, species, and the indivision of form in that which is this something and the same in number. However, of matter as of parts in the whole: because they are from the same matter, especially if it is homogeneous. However, the unity of the subject is more that which is of the subject and passion. However, among these unities, the unity of species is greater than that of genus, and the unity of the indivision of form in the individual is greater than that of species, and this same is greater than that of matter: because matter, although it is one through the subject, nevertheless has many properties which are not it, by which, however, it is not numbered, and therefore its unity admits an alien nature: which the indivision of form in that which is this something does not do. This also is greater than that of the subject and property: because the property is not of the same essence with the subject: but the indivision of form does not admit an alien essence: and that which is the greatest, differs much from the unity of persons, in which neither an alien essence is admitted, nor is there a difference of universal and particular, nor a difference of what is and being: all of which are found in that which is this something. And therefore on the part of matter an example could not be set, nor on the part of the form of the individual because of the diversity of universal and particular, and what is and being: but light and splendor are of the same form, although on the part of the recipients there is some diversity: and therefore with respect to coeternity especially the example is more suitable: because in other unities of form and matter there is no coeternity: for to the position of matter form is not posited, nor to the position of genus is species posited, nor to the position of species is the individual posited: but to the position of the luminous object splendor is posited, and conversely.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Father Is Wise By Begotten Wisdom, Namely, The Son As Object

Whether the Father is wise by the begotten wisdom, namely the Son as object.

Whether the Father is wise by the begotten wisdom, namely the Son as object.

Then it is inquired concerning this which says:

If the Son of God is the power and wisdom of God, etc.

And here two things are inquired: of which one is, whether the Father is wise by the begotten wisdom as object, although He is not wise by it as if formally: and this must be inquired because some have said and written this.

The second is, if this is neither true nor catholic, whether Augustine's reasoning avails anything against the heretic, which is posited here?

To the first, it is objected thus: If I say thus, my intellect understands itself, there the intellect falls into a double notion, namely in the notion of understanding and in the notion of the understood. Let us suppose, therefore, that the intellect in the notion of the understood is a sufficient reason and species of all knowables, then it is not necessary for me to have anything in my intellect to understand things, except the intellect as it is objected to the understanding intellect: but thus the Son is generated by the Father: because it is the same, as Anselm says in the Monologion, for the highest spirit to understand and to say itself: therefore, when saying itself, it generates its word and the reason and art of all things, it understands whatever it understands by this word and not by another.

From this it follows further, that it can understand nothing except by the Son, because it does not receive species from things, and species are not with it except as the ideal reasons of the word.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Let us suppose the Son does not exist, per impossibile, still He who is the Father understands Himself and all things: therefore He does not require the Son for His understanding.
2. Furthermore, this is the abuse which Augustine reprehends above, because although in the created image it is so, that the whole does not understand except by understanding, the whole does not remember except by memory, it does not will except by will: yet who would dare to say, that in that highest Trinity the Father does not understand except by the Son, etc.

Solution. It must be said to this, as will be proven below, that the Father is in no way wise by the Son: yet it is not the same to not be wise by the Son, and to not understand by the Son. For to understand by the Son can be, as if to understand from the Son, and to understand in the Son. In the first way, it does not pertain to the Father, but in the second way, it pertains to Him in some way, although not in the way in which the objection is made. And to this it must be known, that the Father receives nothing from the Son, neither understanding, nor to understand, nor by which He is made understanding, nor the object: but all that the Son has, He receives from the Father. To understand and to say in the highest spirit is equivocal: because it can be essential, and personal: for when the Father says Himself, it cannot be that to say is the same as to generate, but it is essential, and the Holy Spirit says Himself in this way and the Son: and one is the saying of the three, just as one is the essence of the three. But when the Father says the Word which is the Son, then to say is the same as to generate: and this saying does not pertain to the Son, nor to the Holy Spirit, just as neither does generating pertain to them. But when it is said, the Father understands all things in the Son, the sense is that the Father understands the Son as the Son is the art and reason of all living things: but the Son is understood in this way as He understands Himself to be the principle of the Son in this reason: because the Son has nothing which He has not received from the Father.

And thus it is clear, that the Father by understanding Himself thus understands all things in the Son, and receives nothing from the Son, rather He gives to the Son.

But if you ask, Whether this is simultaneous or successive?

It must be said that it is not only simultaneous, but simple and one: because nothing is multiple in the knowledge and understanding of the Father. But it is true, that in lower material things, the intellect in us proceeds from the reason of the principle to that which is from the principle, and from that to that further, of which that principled is the further reason.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that the Son is not the object of the intellect, or the reason of the intellect of the Father, or the medium, or the species, or by whatever name it is named: because thus the intellect of the Father would be something receiving from the Son for the purpose of understanding: but the Father by Himself understands the Son, and all things of which the reason is the Son or the Word.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Argument Of Augustine Which The Master Brings Forward Treats Of Begotten Or Unbegotten Wisdom

Whether the reasoning of Augustine, which the Master adduces, proceeds concerning begotten or unbegotten wisdom?

Secondly, this being supposed, it is asked, What is the value of Augustine's reasoning?

It seems that it is nothing: for either he argues concerning begotten wisdom, or concerning unbegotten wisdom. If concerning begotten wisdom, then it seems that the Son is the wisdom of the Father by which He is wise, which the Master will disprove below. But if he argues concerning unbegotten wisdom, then from this the co-eternity of the Son cannot be inferred: for it does not follow, if the essence is co-eternal with the Father, that on account of this the Son is co-eternal with the Father.

Solution. It must be said that Augustine argues concerning unbegotten wisdom, as it is appropriable to begotten wisdom, that is, to the Son: for the appropriated supposes the proper, nor can appropriation be made unless according to the intellect with the proper pre-existing: and thus unbegotten eternal wisdom infers begotten co-eternal wisdom.

Articulus 11 — On The Word Of Ambrose: First He Was, And Afterwards He Became Father

On the word of Ambrose: First he was, and afterwards he became Father.

On the word of Ambrose: First he was, and afterwards he became Father.

Then it is inquired concerning what is held in the second reasoning of Ambrose against the heretic: Therefore God first was, and afterwards he became Father.

1. For this does not seem to hold: because relations occur in something without its change. Let there be here a three-cubit wood, and in Rome a two-cubit wood, and let this wood here be cut so that it becomes one cubit, then it becomes equal to the wood in Rome: therefore equality is made in the wood in Rome, which relation is made without any change in the wood in Rome: therefore it does not hold, if the Father is relative, and before he was not relative, let him be changed.
2. Likewise, whatever predicates nothing to be in that of which it is predicated, coming or departing from that of which it is predicated does not cause change in it: but relation predicates nothing to be in that of which it is predicated: therefore coming or departing from the relative shows no change in it. The first is proved: because every change is either per se or per accidens, either in that the whole mobile is transferred in place or to a place, or that it receives another form which it did not have before, which now is in it. The second is written by Boethius in the book on the Trinity.

Solution. It is one thing concerning relatives of origin, either according to cause and caused, or according to principle and principled as said: and it is another thing concerning other lower relatives which are founded upon something else. For the first relations are not caused without a substantial act which is generation: and therefore such suppose change in the subject if they newly occur.

Moreover, it is one thing concerning relatives in divine and lower things. For in divine things relation is also in the reason of property making a person in personal being: and therefore there the coming of relation follows personal change: although in lower things in some relations change does not follow in both of the relatives from the coming of relation, but in one it always follows.

To the other it must be said that Boethius does not consider relation according to that which is a certain property having as it were the force of a difference in the constitution of a person: but he takes the relative, and not the relation: and he considers the relative only according to the respect which it implies: and because according to that the whole is to another, and not to itself, as Augustine says, therefore he says that it predicates nothing in the relative: and this is true as to the respect of the relative, and not as to this that relation is a certain property which according to the reason of understanding is in the relative.

H. It is ineffable how the Son is, and does not have a prior Father: just as the mode of generation is unintelligible and ineffable.

But you ask me, says Ambrose, how if the Son is, he does not have a prior Father? I also ask you, when or how do you think the Son to be generated? For to me it is impossible to know the secret of generation:

the mind fails, the voice is silent, not only mine, but also of the Angels: above Powers, and above Angels, and above Cherubim, and above Seraphim, and above all sense it is: because it is written, The peace of Christ is above all sense. And if the peace of Christ is above all sense, how is not such a generation above all sense? Therefore put your hand to your mouth: it is not permitted to scrutinize the heavenly mysteries. It is permitted to know that he is born, it is not permitted to discuss how he is born. It is not permitted for me to deny that, to inquire this is fear. For that generation is ineffable. Whence, Isaiah 53:8: Who shall declare his generation?

Articulus 12 — Whether The Divine Generation Can Be Known Or Signified

Whether divine generation can be known or signified?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says in the following chapter H: For to me it is impossible, etc.

1. For what is not known is not signified: but divine generation is signified to us in many ways: therefore it is known in some way.
2. If you say that it is not signified except in a certain respect, according to which it is ineffable. On the contrary: We have many statements concerning things fitting to generation, namely that it is in the same essence, that it is coeternal, and such things which signify something stated about divine generation.
3. If perhaps you say that we know and signify that it is, but not what divine generation is. On the contrary: Knowledge that it is exists in two ways, namely through effect or through remote cause: but generation is not signified to us through remote cause, nor even through effect alone: therefore it seems that it is signified to us what divine generation is: and thus it is known and signified.

1. Furthermore, to know a thing in its own proper nature is to know it according to the differences by which it is distinguished from others which are in the same genus with it: but we have such differences handed down to us by the Saints, namely that it is without conversion of the generator, that it is not from potency to act, that it is immaterial, that it does not divide being or essence, such as we have from Augustine, and Damascene, and Boethius: therefore it seems that generation is known in its proper nature: but the knowledge of a simple thing incomplexly in its proper nature is the knowledge of what the thing is in its proper nature: therefore it seems that we know what divine generation is: therefore it is not true what Ambrose says here.

But on the contrary: To know what it is, is to know the proper terms of the thing within which the whole nature of the thing is enclosed: but thus it does not happen to know God: because thus He would be comprehended or enclosed in our intellect, which was disproved above: since therefore divine generation is God, it does not happen to know or signify what it is.

In summary. It must be said, as the Philosopher says in I De Anima, all understanding which is of what it is, is of terms: for the terms of practical understandings are: for all are for the sake of another, namely for the sake of that which is considered: but speculative reasons are terminated: and every reason or definition is, or demonstration in which understanding stands, and all definitions are defined to the defining.

And therefore I say that it does not happen to know what God or anything divine is, because it cannot be defined by us: but it will always be according to something of itself outside us, as we said above in the question concerning the knowledge of God: and this Ambrose understands when he says that divine generation is not known by us, nor even by Angels: because through what it is, it is known only by Him who is God the Trinity: but we have knowledge of divine things as there is knowledge that it is: and I well concede that we know more about it than that it is ineffable.

To what is objected against, it must be said that it is true that concerning the knowledge that it is in demonstrations, which is the knowledge of the conclusion, it is held in those two ways: but thus divine generation is not known, but rather as incomplex, whose knowledge is not perfectly held through defining it: and this is knowledge similar to that which is knowledge that it is, and it is to know in the universal, and not in its proper nature according to what it is.

To what is objected concerning its differences, it must be said that it is not signified to us by differences except in two ways, namely negative or privative: as that it is impassible, immaterial, inconvertible, and such things. These differences do not certify, except because the constituting differences are positive. Other differences which are positive are remote: as that it is in the same substance, or consubstantial: for those are not proximate: whence in such things it still remains hidden, according to what mode it is in the same substance: and therefore although it is distinguished by those differences by some, yet because they are not converted with it by constituting, they do not specify generation: and therefore it is still unknown what generation is: and therefore Ambrose does not say that it is simply impossible to know generation, but that it is impossible to know the secret of generation, because its secret is what it is: but it is not secret what it is not: and this is known and stated: whence it is effable in a certain respect, and not simply.

Articulus 13 — Whether Angels Speak

Do Angels speak?

Do Angels speak?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

The voice is silent, not only mine, but also And four are inquired, of the Angels, etc., namely, how do Angels speak? and whether they can speak all things? and whether all to all, or some to some? and concerning the hearing of others the speech.

Concerning the first, it is proceeded thus: 1. Basil says in a certain homily upon that Deuteronomy xxvii, 9: Attend, and hear, etc.: God, who created us, granted us the use of speech, so that we might reveal the secrets of the heart to each other through the ministry of the word, so that with mutual affection of nature each of us might bring forth to his neighbor the secrets of counsel as if from certain hidden dwellings: for if we lived with the soul only naked and uncovered, we would be known to each other only from the movements of the mind and the intentions of thoughts. From this it is understood that Angels, since they are stripped of the body, become known to each other without speech: therefore they do not need speech: and nothing is vain in them: therefore they do not speak.

1. Likewise, Job xxv, 17, upon that, Gold or glass shall not equal it, Gregory says that in the resurrection the mind of each one will not be hidden from the eyes of another by corporeality. Therefore much more, since the nature of the Angel is more spiritual, what is in one Angel will not be hidden from another: and thus they do not need speech.
2. Likewise, Basil: Since the vigor of the soul is covered by the veil of the flesh to indicate and bring into public view those things which are moved in the depth of the heart either by thoughts or senses, we need names and words. From this it is understood that where there is no veil of flesh, the use of speaking is not necessary. But in Angels there is no veil of flesh: therefore they do not speak.
3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians iv, 5, upon that, Do not judge before the time, the Gloss says, that deeds and thoughts, good or evil, will then be open: and because all things will then be known, then all will be able to judge concerning themselves and others. From this it is understood that even the wicked will then see the thoughts of all: therefore much more strongly do Angels now see: and from this it follows again that they do not speak.

4. Likewise, Augustine: In the homeland there will not be thoughts wandering from here to there, or from there to here: but we will see all things at once. Therefore, since Angels are now blessed, they do not need speech, but all things are seen at once.
5. Likewise, Gregory in book IV of the Dialogues: What is it that they do not see, who see all things seeing? and he speaks of Angels. If therefore they see all things, they see also those things which are in each other: and thus they do not need speech.
6. Likewise, Augustine in the book on the Good of Marriage: After this pilgrimage there will be a time when the thoughts of all will be open to each other, nor will they oppose each other. Therefore, since in the future we will be like Angels, as the Lord says, Matthew xxii, 30; therefore Angels now see each other's thoughts, etc.
7. But against this is what the Gloss says, 1 Corinthians xiii, 1, that the higher ones signify to the lower ones what they have perceived of God's will by nods and signs.
8. Likewise, Boethius: Whatever a lower power can do, a higher power can also do: since therefore man, who is lower in power, can speak, an Angel can also speak.
9. Likewise, Isaiah vi, 3: They cried out one to another...

To the second. In Zechariah one speaks to another, and in Daniel.

According to this, it is further inquired, if it is conceded that they speak, how do they speak? And it seems the Gloss, on Corinthians viii, 1, says that they speak by nods and signs. But this seems not to be able to stand: because,

1. A nod serves more for the demonstration of the thing itself than for speech.
2. Likewise, those signs are either from nature or from agreement. If from nature, then they will be the same among all. But if by agreement, then before speech, the discipline of language is required, which is also frivolous to posit in Angels.
3. Likewise, Damascene says that they transmit their intelligences to each other without a voice by spoken word. But because elsewhere many things have been said about this, let these suffice.

Solution. I concede that Angels speak, and as to how they speak, according to what I think, to see this it is necessary to presuppose a certain likeness. Let us posit two lights distant from each other: for one of those lights to penetrate the other, only three things are required, one of which is that one is directly ordered against the other in position, and that no medium prohibiting and closing one from the other is interposed, and that there is a distance proportionate to the power of changing, because a light existing in Paris will not change up to a light that is in Rome. But if we posit that one of those lights is cognitive of the other, and conversely, and that they have freedom of will: then it follows that they will know each other, if they wish: and they will not know, if they do not wish. For Augustine says that light and species of intelligibles are always in the soul, yet the soul does not always understand, because it does not wish: hence if the will closes the intellect to itself, namely that it does not understand in act, much more does it have the power of closing itself from another: thus therefore I say, that it is in Angels, that they are intelligible lights, as Dionysius says: and therefore for them to speak to each other, nothing is required except the will of communicating their intelligence to another, and conversion to it in order, and conception of their intelligence by way of expression to another: for we understand differently, and we think differently in order of expression to another. For we understand when we have knowledge: but we think when we confer among ourselves, and we order to expression when we take our thought in some sign to another. And no more is required in my judgment for the speech of Angels. But this sign is nothing other than the intelligible species with order to another, and the will of communicating, as it seems to me.

To the first, therefore, that is objected, it must be said that Basil intends that we do not need speech uttered by the attraction of air: but he does not intend that we do not need spiritual speech in the way determined in the said.

To the other it must be said, that there is a certain mind created by that which causally beatifies: just as the mind of beatitude in which are the gifts of the soul, from the overflow of which there are also gifts in the body: and of that it is true, that it is not hidden from the eyes of any of the blessed: because this is nothing other than that each blessed sees in another the quantity of glory of soul and body which he has from God: but something is in the mind caused by free will, in which the power of the will can: and that is called the proper concept of the heart of each, and that one will not see in another without speech: and the first likeness is in wine moistening glass: because through the glass the color of the wine is seen: thus in the glory of the body the glory of the mind is seen and considered.

To the other the solution is clear from what has been said: because Basil speaks of the need for speech that sounds in the air.

To the other it must be said, that that Gloss speaks of the causes of condemnation or salvation: because those each will see in another, so that the condemnation of the wicked and the salvation of the blessed may appear more just: but yet from this it is not removed that speech is still necessary both for the good and the wicked, for those concepts which are subject to free will to be expressed to another.

To the other it must be said, that fleeting thoughts are called thoughts running from the obscurity of a trace or image or enigma and mirror of faith, to have knowledge of God, which here begins from creatures. But then it will not be so: because we will see God in Himself, and other things ordered to beatitude in God at once: because there they are at once, where they are as one simple thing, which is the cause and idea of all. But yet for that knowledge it is not removed that which each has of the concept of his heart: and that is not shown by the word, because it is not beatifying: but speech is required for it.

To the other it must be said, that Gregory speaks of those substantial to beatitude, and not of others. Or it is said, that he speaks of the sufficiency of the subject, not of knowledge according to act: this is to say, that God in whom all things can be sufficiently seen without a medium, is presented to them: and in this respect there is nothing that they do not see, that is, can see: yet it is not true, that all actually see all things in Him: because then each would have as many things seen and known in Him as another: and thus they would be equal in the number of things known.

To the other it must be said, that Augustine does not speak of things known which are subject to free will, but of things known in which beatitude is substantially, that is, in which God beatifying as beatifying results in the mind and in the body consequently.

To that which is objected against, I well concede that they speak,

To this, however, which is inquired, How do they speak? I say with the Gloss that by nods and signs: and a nod is called there the order and conversion to another with the will of being made known; and with the determination of the likeness which he has with himself to the thing. But a sign is called the form which is in the Angel, which is a sign and likeness of the thing, because intelligence is full of forms from its creation, which forms are likenesses of things not indeed received from things, but from creation: and they are likenesses of the whole order of universal or particular causes to the things made, which are, and to future things: and under their determination to this thing or that Angels express whatever they wish to speak.

To the first, however, that is objected against, it must be said that a nod here is an intelligible demonstration, for which the order of one to another with the will of being made known suffices.

To the other it must be said, that a sign is from nature, but the determination is at the will of the Angel: and therefore the discipline of language is not required: and it is similarly as if I have the likeness of a man with me, and by will I convert it to express and signify this one or that one: and let us posit, that this suffices for speech to you: for it is clear then, that then you would not receive anything from me: but by determining the natural likeness of the thing, to this the community of the likeness of man would be restricted to you; so that in that which you have with you, you would understand my concept: and this Damascene calls transmitting intelligences to each other without a voice by spoken word.

But it is objected: because it is necessary, that something excites the listener to perceive: and that exciting thing he must receive from the speaker: therefore he receives something from him: and thus something goes out from one to another, and one is in potency to another.

To this it must be said, that he receives nothing at all which he does not have from natural things, as is speech: because as we said before, conversion alone suffices for excitation: hence by this very thing that he sees him turned to himself, since each is an intelligible light, and the will is not closing, knowledge in the listener is determined to what the other wishes to express.

Articulus 14 — Whether Angels Speak All Things

Whether Angels speak all things?

Whether Angels can speak all things?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether they can speak all things?

And it seems that they cannot: because no one can express what they do not have in cognition; but contingencies dependent on free will are not in their cognition. Therefore, they cannot express those things. The first is clear. The second is proven by the fact that they only know those things whose forms they received in creation; however, they then received only those things which occur according to the course of nature, as is clear from Augustine on Genesis, that they received the cognition of each thing to be made through the work of disposition and adornment and propagation before it was, in the Word or from the Word: therefore, it seems that concerning those things which purely fall under free will, they do not have the power to express.

But on the contrary: Boethius says that whatever a lower power can do, a higher power can also do; but we can speak all things that are in our heart, whether dependent on nature or on free will: therefore, so can they.

Solution. To this it must be said that Angels can express all the concepts of their heart just as we can, and they have this from nature, so that they do not need a word: because even demons speak in this way. Just as in us, as long as the concept of the mind is in the sole power of free will, it is then known only by us and God: so it is in them; but just as in us the pronouncement orders the concept to the natural instruments of pronouncing or hearing, and then it is naturally heard: so in Angels the order of conversion to another with the will of expressing causes hearing in one, and it is speech in another: and by that conversion, the concept which was subject to free will is drawn out beyond itself to the natural in some way, and then it is intelligible by another, as was said before.

And what is objected, that they do not have cognition of those things which purely fall under free will, is true as long as they are only in free will: but when they are ordered to the order of pronouncement, they are now natural: because just as it is natural for us to hear someone speaking, whether they wish it or not, as long as they speak: so it is natural for an Angel to hear, or to receive one turned towards them with the will of expressing, and the likeness of the thing to the thing determined by the intention of making that thing known to another: and this Basil calls the motions of intentions by which we would make ourselves known to each other, if only we lived with a naked and uncovered soul.

Articulus 15 — Whether All Angels Speak To All, Or Certain Ones To Certain Ones, And Whether Distance Can Make For Them An Impediment To Speech As With Us

Whether all Angels speak to all or some to some, and whether distance can cause an impediment to speech for them as it does for us?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether all speak to all or to some?

1. It seems, however, that only some speak to some, according to the Gloss on the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13:1, which says that superiors signify to inferiors what they have understood of the will of God by gestures and signs, which are called tongues.
2. Furthermore, to speak is to illuminate concerning the concept of the heart: therefore, since illuminations descend from superiors to inferiors, and not conversely, it seems that only superiors speak to inferiors, and not conversely.

But on the contrary: Among us, we can all speak to all indifferently by nature; therefore, since Angels are not of lesser power than us, it seems that they can all speak to all.

Likewise, it is asked, If distance can cause an impediment to speech for them, as among us one does not hear us who is more or less distant beyond what we can break the air? It seems so: because we read that Angels cry out to one another. But a cry is not necessary except because of deafness or because of distance: however, deafness does not occur in Angels: therefore, the cry is because of distance, as it seems.

Solution. I say without prejudice, that there is a twofold speech among Angels: one which is called illumination by Dionysius: and that is concerning those things which are manifested in the Word, and are not of the substance of beatitude in particular, but are of the dispensation of the future world and sacraments and the Church: and it is true that that speech descends from superiors to inferiors: because by that illumination superiors purify, illuminate, and perfect inferiors themselves. However, there is another speech concerning what is conceived in the heart itself: and by that speech both good and evil speak, and all to all.

To what is asked concerning distance, it must be said that distance makes nothing in them, but only the order of conversion to another by the intention of making oneself known.

To what is objected concerning the cry, it must be said that the cry of an Angel signifies the greatness of expression, not the necessity of the hearer, or the space of distance between the hearer and the speaker.

Divisio Textus

Here it can be asked, Since generation is made by the Father, etc.

Here begins the second part of that distinction, in which the Master teaches with which words the eternity of divine generation is to be expressed.

And it is divided into four parts: of which the first proves that it is more fittingly expressed with words of past and present time taken together. In the second, he objects against this through the words of Origen, there, L, Origen indeed upon Jeremiah. In the third, he solves, there, M, he says, etc. But in the fourth, from the solution of such Authors, he draws out how and with which words one must speak about divine generation, there, O, Let us therefore say the Son, etc.

Articulus 16 — Whether Angels In Their Speakings And Hearings Use Tongues, Ears, Or Certain Organs

Whether Angels in their speaking and hearing use tongues, ears, or certain organs?

Lastly, it is inquired concerning the organs of those hearing and speaking.

For since an Angel is a separate substance, it seems not to have organs, nor even powers determined to such organs: just as souls separated from bodies have, as is read concerning the tongue of the damned rich man and the finger of Lazarus.

But if this be conceded, then it seems that their speaking and hearing add nothing beyond understanding according to act, which is false: because this does not have the nature of speech.

To this it must be said without prejudice, that Angels have spiritual tongues: and these are nothing other than the power of communicating their counsels and concepts to one another.

To what is objected, that their speaking does not seem to be anything but understanding according to act, it must be said that three things concur to speaking, namely understanding according to act, and conversion to another under the will of making known, and the intention directing likenesses to the things about which there is speech. Similarly, to hearing these concur, namely conversion to the speaker, and the will of receiving the concept, and the direction of likeness to the same thing.

And if you ask, How can it be that when one is converted to another, and conversely that one is converted to this one? It must be said that this happens because of the light of the intelligence of one directly to another: for just as the ray of corporeal light is applied to another, so also the ray of spiritual light of one intelligence in one Angel is applied to the ray of the intelligence of another Angel: and in this way they are also applied to souls in revelation. Hence it is also clear that neither does the commonality of forms impede understanding, since it is always determined by direction to the thing: nor are they deceived by equivocal and amphibological things: because the determined thing excludes all those.

Is it permissible to scrutinize the heavenly mysteries?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

It is not permissible to scrutinize the heavenly mysteries, etc.

For all the holy Doctors have scrutinized the mysteries of the Trinity and have discussed them: therefore it seems that all have sinned.

To this it must be responded by what Bernard says on the Song of Songs: The Spirit scrutinizes not only the hearts and reins of men, but also the depths of God: and whether to our matters or to others, I securely follow Him wherever He may lead; only let Him guard our hearts and our understandings, lest perhaps when He is not present, we think He is present, and we follow our own sense deviating instead of Him. Hence those scrutinizing the scrutinies by their own sense, wishing by the force of reason to break into the secrets of God rather than to be introduced by the teaching of the Spirit, are here reproved, just as the infidels who do not keep the boundaries of the articles of faith: but those studying and inquiring with piety are not reproved.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Generation Of The Son From The Father Is Finite Or Infinite

Whether the generation of the Son by the Father is finite or infinite?

This question arises at the beginning, whether the generation of the Son by the Father is finite or infinite?

1. It seems, however, that it is infinite; because in eternity nothing is otherwise: therefore, if the Father begot, it is true that He is still generating: but a generation which is always in the act of generating is never finished: therefore it seems that the generation of the Son by the Father is infinite.
2. Likewise, whatever is in God is not limited by duration, or place, or intellect: divine generation is in God: therefore it is limited by none of these: therefore it seems that He is always being generated.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Whatever is always in the process of being generated is never in the state of having been generated: therefore, if the Son is always in the process of being generated, He is never in the state of having been generated, which is false, because He would not be the Son unless He were generated.

1. Likewise, whatever is always in the process of being generated is never completed by generation: therefore, if the Son is always in the process of being generated, the Son is never perfect and completed by generation, which again is false: therefore His generation is not infinite.

If you say that to be in the process of being generated and to be in the state of having been generated are the same. On the contrary: Either they are simultaneous in duration, being generated and being in the state of having been generated, but not by nature: or simultaneous by nature and time. If in the first way: therefore, to be in the process of being generated is prior by nature to being in the state of having been generated: but in all such cases the prior implies the posterior, and not vice versa: for it does not follow in the thousandth year, if it is generated, therefore it is being generated: but it follows well, if it is being generated, therefore it is generated: therefore, since it is now true that the Son is generated, it is not true that He is being generated: which is false, since faith accepts such expressions, the Son is always being generated: as the Master here proves.

If you say that the generation of the Son is finite to the state of having been generated. It seems to be false: because then it was at some time incomplete, and in the state of having been generated it became complete.

Furthermore, at some time it was in the process of being generated, at some time in the state of having been generated, and thus there is variation in eternity, which cannot stand with the aforementioned.

Likewise, is it to be conceded at least according to the intellect, that to be in the process of being generated is before being in the state of having been generated? It seems so: since the Son does not receive the being which He is, except through generation: therefore generation, as it seems, is before. If this is granted: it is contrary to the intellect of eternity, which posits the whole eternal being simultaneously.

Solution, it must be said that this question has no place in divine matters: because there is neither finite nor infinite there. It is not infinite: because that is most imperfect, of which the parts to the receiver there is always something outside to receive: and therefore even in natural mathematics the infinite is only in that which is finite in act, and in potentiality in that and not in act: for the infinite which is by iteration or regeneration of the same circular motion without the interposition of rest is infinite, cannot be there: because the same generation is not always repeated without rest, as the infinite motion of the circle is said to be by regeneration with respect to natural principles: hence in no way is there the infinite thus accepted, except in the way which was said above, that the infinite is not finite, or measured by time, place, or the power of the comprehending intellect. Nor is the finite there: because the finite is said, either that which attains completion after motion, when namely after moving it is in the state of being moved: and thus it cannot be in the utterly immutable divine matters. In another way, the finite is said to be contained within boundaries terminating it within or without: as a thing is terminated to its form and figure, or to its essence, outside of which there is nothing of the thing. But outside as a thing is terminated to place. And neither of those applies to divine matters: because no boundary is constituted for God's essence: although He is finite to Himself, yet He is not finite to anything created: since He is always not enclosed, but incomparably outside. Hence we say that divine generation is neither finite nor infinite, but simple. For the simple, as the Philosopher says, is neither finite nor infinite.

Nor should it be said that to be in the process of being generated differs from being in the state of having been generated: because it has already been proven above, that there is no becoming preceding the Son, nor any action between the Father and the Son, through which the Son proceeds from the Father: but generation expresses the reason through which the Son is from the Father: hence generation actively understood is the same as paternity or Father, although they differ in the mode of signifying. Similarly, generation passively accepted is the same as the Son differing only in the mode of understanding. And therefore there is nothing to inquire, whether to be in the process of being generated and to be in the state of having been generated are simultaneous in time and nature: or one is prior to the other by nature, but not by time? Because they are in neither way. For the same is not simultaneous with itself, because simultaneity is of diverse things, which are in one place or time: but to be generated and generation and the Son in divine matters and to be in the state of having been generated are the same, yet signified differently: and therefore there is neither prior by nature, nor by eternity, nor by space. But when it is said, the Son is generated by the Father, the mode is signified by which the Son is from the Father. When it is said generation, the reason of that existence by which He is from the Father is signified. When it is said, the Son is generated, the mode is signified by which that which is of the Father is in the Son. When it is said, Son, the determination of having a principle in comparison to that principle is signified. And because all these modes are of the same in signifying it diversely, therefore faith has admitted all words of time expressing the mode of such existence. And through this the solution to the whole is clear: for I do not posit there becoming, or act, between the Father and the Son: but the word importing the act of generation in human matters, when transferred to divine matters, is abstracted from acting or suffering and time, and retains only the reason of its act, which reason in divine matters expresses the notion signified in this or that way: and therefore all that is there is perfect, nothing in becoming, nothing in having been made: but the Son is a demonstration from the Father, perfect from perfect, and one from one.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Son Can Always Be Said Born And Begotten; And What The Three Tenses Denote In The Participle, The Verb, And The Adverb, When It Is Said, The Son Is Always Born

Whether the Son can always be said to be born and begotten? And what do the three tenses signify in the participle, verb, and adverb, when it is said, the Son is always born?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there: Let us say more truly, always born, etc.

In such expressions where two tenses are signified, only one determines the comparison: and the other is with respect to which the other is taken: as when it is said, he is loved, the present tense which is taken by the word "is," is not the measure of the act or passion which is imported by the word "loved," but rather the past tense which is signified in what I say, loved: and the tense is taken with respect to the present to which that past is terminated: therefore it seems, that similarly when it is said, the Son is always born, that the past refers to the generation, and the present is now to which the past is terminated.

Furthermore, when it is said, Always born, three tenses are implied: and it is asked, What do those three signify concerning the divine generation?

Furthermore, it is asked, Which of these tenses is more fitting to the divine generation?

Solution. It must be said, that such participles, born, and begotten, must be abstracted from the connotation of time, and similarly verbs: and it must be understood to retain only that which is of nobility in them as to the differences of time connoted: just as the past must be abstracted from pastness, and it must retain necessity. because the past is necessary only among temporals: and therefore the verb or participle of the past tense signifies concerning the divine generation only by necessity. Similarly the present is only in times as entity: therefore it must be referred in divine matters, and mutability and temporality must be abstracted. But the future is closer to being than the past, because the future will be at some time, but the past has already ceased: therefore the future must be taken by reason of being which does not cease from time, and then it is fitting to divine matters: but the future moreover signifies being in potentiality, and not in act: and this does not fit divine matters.

From this it is clear that the first objection is none: because verbs or participles do not signify temporal motions in divine matters, but are referred to divine matters by reason of what they have of perfection.

To what is asked, What do the three tenses signify in the verb imported, participle, and adverb? It must be said, that the adverb signifies the indeficiency of eternity, the participle however signifies the necessity of generation, and the verb signifies the entity of it.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Generation Of The Son From Mary The Virgin Is From The Father Or From The Whole Trinity

Whether the generation of the Son from the Virgin Mary is from the Father or from the whole Trinity?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Although by this which he says today, it can also be understood as day, etc.

1. For this seems false: because neither the Father nor the Holy Spirit begot him from the Virgin Mary. For he is by temporal generation on earth without a father: just as by eternal generation in heaven he is without a mother.
2. Furthermore, since the three commonly made his incarnation, according to this which is said, the three were commonly fathers, and begot him: therefore the Son begot himself, which is false.

Solution. It must be said that Augustine spoke improperly, and according to temporal generation if it is said that the Father begot, it must be explained as begot, that is, made that he be generated: and it is a similar mode of speaking, Matthew 3:9, upon that, "God is able from these stones," etc., where the Gloss says: In testimony of this matter God begot a daughter from Sarah, that is, made that she be generated from Sarah.

Articulus 21 — Whether The Son Is Always Begotten By The Father, As Splendor From Light

Whether the Son is always begotten by the Father, like brightness from light?

Whether the Son is always begotten by the Father, like brightness from light?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

As often as light has arisen from which brightness arises, etc.

For this seems false: because according to this the Son would be begotten many times, which is heretical.

Response. It must be said that divine generation is not repeated, as brightness is repeated: but because generation only signifies the reason by which the Son is from the Father: and that is continuously demonstrated, and not once and ceases: therefore faith receives that the Son is always begotten; and from this then it does not follow that his generation is never completed, but that the reason of the existence of the Son from the Father is continuously demonstrated in the Father and the Son.

However, how brightness is continuously generated from light, Augustine proves in book VI on Genesis, thus: What has been illuminated is not illuminated further: but the air is continuously illuminated by the sun when the sun is present: therefore it can never be said that it has been illuminated: and in such cases to be illuminated and to have been illuminated are simultaneous: but nevertheless usage has it that it is said to be illuminated, because now for the first time it receives light: however, it is said to have been illuminated, when it already receives.

Articulus 22 — Whether Only The Living Is Born From The Living

Whether only the living is born from the living?

Then it is inquired concerning what Hilary says there, N, "But that which is born living from the living has the perfection of nativity," etc.

For this seems false: because a child is born from the living: and yet does not have the perfection of nativity: for it is born from a living father and mother.

To this it must be said that nothing is born from the entirely living, except that which is born from the very first life: and therefore only the Son is born from the living. And this is proven thus: In the generation of simple minerals, nothing is living: because those do not live: just as if the luminous brings forth light, or an element its species, or from the mixture of elements stones or metals are made. However, in the generation of living things, there is a twofold mode, namely from one generating, and from the dead: as in those which are born from putrefied things, whose mode of generation we touched upon above: and in those it is clear that it is not generation from the living. But from the living generating, neither in plants, nor in animals, nor in humans is generation made except from seed, which does not live in the act of the soul: and from that from which, as essentially remaining in the born, generation is not made from the living. But in divine things, if the preposition denotes identity of essence, because nothing except the living is in the Father, generation is made from the very life and the living, and this Hilary attends to when he says that it cannot be except living that which is born from the living. Hence, John 5:26: "As the Father has life in Himself, so He has given to the Son to have life in Himself."

Articulus 23 — Whether What The Master Says Is Truer, Not From Derivation But From Power

Whether it is more true what the Master says, neither from derivation, but from virtue?

Whether it is more true what the Master says, neither from derivation, but from virtue?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says, there, N, Neither from derivation, but from virtue, etc.

1. It seems that things in the Father are derived into the Son: because generation is a certain derivation.
2. Furthermore, Dionysius and Anselm compare the Father to a fountain, and the Son and the Holy Spirit to streams.

Solution. It must be said that there is not properly derivation in generation except that which is sometimes in becoming: but this does not pertain to divine generation: and this Hilary calls being from virtue: because whatever is in becoming, is in the potentiality of infirmity.

However, Dionysius and Anselm say that in the Father is the fountainhead deity on account of the generative and processive virtues: yet it is not necessary that all things which are in the fountain and streams be transferred to divine generation or procession: because in symbolics not all things are considered, but only those which proclaim nobility: hence from the stream is transferred no more to the Son than that he is from another, just as a stream is from a fountain.

Articulus 24 — How It Is Understood When He Says, That It Is The Image Of Innascibility

How it is to be understood when it is said, "To be the image of unbegottenness?"

Next, it is asked concerning what is said there, "N, To be the image of unbegottenness," etc.

For this seems false: because an image is, as will be evident below, a certain imagined and indistinct likeness of one thing to another. However, the Son is not indistinct from the Father with respect to unbegottenness, but rather the Father is unbegotten, and the Son is begotten.

Solution. It must be said that the abstract is to be reduced to the concrete: and the sense is, "of unbegottenness," etc., that is, of his unbegotten, it gives him to be the image.

Other things that are said up to the end of this distinction are easily evident from what has been said before.

DISTINCTIO X

Divisio Textus

Now indeed after the eternity of the Son, etc. Here begins the part which is about the procession of the Holy Spirit, and it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it treats of his eternal procession. In the second, however, it treats of his temporal procession which begins in distinction XIV, there, A,

Furthermore, it must be diligently noted, that the procession is twofold, etc.

The first is further divided into three: in the first of which it is treated of the mode of his procession in name. In the second, of his procession in comparison to the terminus from which, which begins in distinction XI, there, A, Here it must be said that the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son. In the third, of the difference of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the generation of the Son, which begins in distinction XIII, there, A, After this it must be considered, such as we, etc.

The first of these parts is contained entirely in this distinction, which is divided into three parts: of which the first contains, how it is attributed to the Holy Spirit, that he is charity or love. The second contains, that as love he proceeds from the Father and the Son, which begins there, F, Now indeed what I began In the third it is assigned to show, etc. the reason of this name, that he is called the Holy Spirit by proper name, there, H,

Here it must be noted, that the Holy Spirit in the Trinity is specially called, etc.

In the first of these are contained five: of which the first has, that just as the Holy Spirit is of the Father and the Son commonly, so he insinuates the love of both. The second has the proof of this through the Canonical of John, there, B, John The third, however, has the proof in the Epistle, that charity in the divine is said essentially and personally, there, in the middle B, I do not know why as wisdom and Father, etc. The fourth has the proof through example, there, D, For by many examples. The fifth has the proof, that the Holy Spirit is charity of which John says, that God is from God, there, under the beginning E, However, the Holy Spirit where he is said to be charity we find, etc.

From these the sentence of Lifiere is clear through the whole distinction.

Articulus 1 — How The Names Which Are Attributed To The Holy Spirit Differ, Love, Dilection, Charity

How do the names differ which are attributed to the Holy Spirit, love, affection, charity?

A question arises first concerning this which says: The Holy Spirit is love, and two things are asked: first, whether charity or affection of the Father and the Son. The first is about the difference of these names which it touches. And secondly, whether the Holy Spirit proceeds as love?

1. It seems, however, that there is no difference: because Augustine says on that of John, 21:16 and 17: Simon son of John, do you love me? and he adds at the end saying, Do you love me? that love and affection are the same: therefore it seems that they do not differ.
2. Likewise, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: It seems to me that the theologians take the name of affection and love as common.

Likewise, in the same place, Dionysius reproves those distinguishing between affection and love, saying that they make force with light sounds, as if we could not signify four by twice two, and native land by birthplace: therefore it seems that love and affection and charity are the same.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Isidore says that love is of rational and irrational beings, but affection is only of rational beings: therefore it seems that they are not the same.

1. Likewise, we say that we love many things which we do not love out of charity: therefore love and charity are not the same.
2. Likewise, even in base love we well introduce the name of love, but not the name of charity: therefore these are not the same. Similarly, we place order in those things which we love out of charity: but in affection there are many things: because we love food, drink, and such things: yet we do not have charity towards those: therefore it seems there is a difference in them.

Solution. It must be said that love and affection and charity in gratuitous gifts name the same, yet according to different considerations: yet considered in themselves they relate as superior and inferior: for if these are placed around gratuitous love only, then they name the same habit according to different consideration of its act. For love signifies the adhesion of affection to the good itself which is loved. However, affection signifies the same affection, according to which it is from the choice of reason preferring it over other goods which are loved, as it is said in the Song of Songs, 5:10: My beloved is chosen from thousands. But charity names the same affection, according to which it places the loved under inestimable price: for dear is said what is esteemed of great price, as it is held in Song of Songs 8:7: If a man gives all the substance of his house for love, he will despise it as nothing. However, if these three are not considered around gratuitous love, but in themselves, then they differ as genus and species. For every affection is love, but it is not converted: and every charity is affection and love, but it is not converted: because then love is in things loved sensibly and rationally, but affection is in things loved rationally only, charity however in gratuitous things only.

To that which is first objected, it must be said that the Lord there asked three times to receive the confession of Peter, not about love, but about the circumstances of love, according to blessed Bernard, which are to love sweetly which is of love insofar as it is love, and to love wisely which is of affection insofar as it is affection, and to love fervently which is of charity insofar as it is charity: and Augustine does not intend to say there that these do not differ in reason, but that they do not differ in reality.

To that which is objected concerning Dionysius, it must be said that Dionysius does not reprove those distinguishing in the reason of names: but rather speaks against some who said that love should not be taken in a good signification, and therefore should not be placed in divine things: against whom he also adduces that of Wisdom 8:2: I became a lover of her form. And that which the holy Ignatius martyr said of the Lord Jesus Christ: My love is crucified. Hence the same names love, which is affection, although under another reason of the name.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds As Love, And Whether Charity In Man And Angel Is A Habit Of The Will

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds as love, and whether charity in man and angel is a habit of the will?

Secondly, it is asked, whether the Holy Spirit proceeds as love? And it seems for multiple reasons that it does not.

1. First thus: Every name that does not name as a distinct being, but as in another, does not pertain to a person existing by itself: however, love, that which it names, says to exist in something: therefore, it does not perfectly pertain to a person existing by itself: the Holy Spirit is a person perfectly by itself, therefore it does not pertain to it to proceed as love.
2. Likewise, love is of that in which the affection rests: therefore, it is always taken as proceeding into another: however, the Holy Spirit does not proceed into another, rather it remains in itself distinct: therefore, it does not proceed as love.
3. Likewise, the divine persons are perfect hypostases, like the Son and the Father; however, no love according to the reason of love says hypostasis, but habit, and accident of hypostasis: therefore, the Holy Spirit does not proceed as love.
4. Likewise, the Spirit is loved by the Father as much as the Son: therefore, love is the middle bond of the Father and the Holy Spirit: if therefore the Holy Spirit is love, it will be love of love, which is in nothing, because thus it would go into infinity: therefore, the Holy Spirit does not proceed as love.
5. If perhaps you say that love says something distinct from the lover: and therefore that distinction makes personality and person. On the contrary: the divine essence is its love by which God loves himself and others: yet when it says distinction according to the name, it is not distinguished from the Father: therefore, such distinction is not sufficient to make a person. Furthermore, the Father names a distinct substance, and similarly the Son, and generation says the act of nature in the communication of nature from the Father to the Son: however, love neither says substance according to the name, nor does it say the reason of substantial procession: therefore, it seems not to pertain to personal distinction.
6. Furthermore, since in intellectual nature there are other powers and other habits than will and love, it seems that the procession of any power into habit or act should make a personal distinction, just as the power which is towards the arduous, which is called irascible, is divided against the concupiscible, whose habit love is attributed to the Holy Spirit.
7. Likewise, the apprehension of good is before the love of good: and thus it seems according to nature that the apprehension of good proceeds in God before love: and thus that procession should more cause a person than this one.

8. If perhaps you say that the apprehension of good pertains to the Son, because he is the art and reason of the Father. On the contrary: truth is ascribed to the Son: therefore, the apprehension of good, since it differs according to reason, like speculative and practical intellect, seems to pertain to the distinction of another person.
9. Likewise, since there are many motions and passions of the concupiscible, like to desire, to wish, why is no distinct person taken according to these acts or habits?
10. Furthermore, in the mind love proceeds from the mind as an act, not as a distinct power: therefore, it seems that no person in the divine should be distinguished according to this procession.

If perhaps for this reason it is said that the Holy Spirit does not proceed as love.

On the contrary: 1. A certain Philosopher says that separate spiritual substances are divided by the power of intellect and will, and no more: therefore, just as in God we have one personal procession on the part of the intellect, so we should have one on the part of the affection: but that is only of love: therefore, love will denote a personal distinction in the divine.

1. Likewise, well-living men do not agree in nature only, but rather seek the consent of friendship: because the Philosopher says that friendship is happiness, or not without happiness: therefore, the Father and the Son, since they do not agree in fewer things than we do, also agree in the consent of friendship: but friendship always breathes love, therefore the spirated itself is love, and proceeds as love.
2. Likewise, Hilary in the book on Synods: What is written, that they are indeed three by substance, but one by consonance, has no calumny: because with the Spirit named, that is, the Paraclete, it is more fitting to predicate unity by consonance than by essence, through the similitude of essence. From this it is taken that the Father and the Son do not only agree in the similitude or identity of essence, but also in the consonance of love: therefore, since that love existing in God cannot be anything but God, that consonance will be the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, when our mind loves itself, there is something in it which is the love of itself, just as the knowledge of itself: but the knowledge in the divine corresponds to the person of the Son: therefore, to love will correspond another person, and we call that the person of the Holy Spirit.

Solution. We say that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as the love by which they love each other: and this reason especially compels: because it is absurd to posit that the Father and the Son agree in nothing insofar as they are distinct: however, they agree in essence insofar as they are one: but we see that in every rational and non-rational nature all delights and joys which they can have in life insofar as they are different persons, are all founded upon mutual love: for which reason also certain Philosophers posited the principles of all nature as strife and friendship, as if one by nature from the very principle of the universe would take something divine, namely friendship, which gathers and unites: but the other would have, namely strife, from the very privation of matter conjoined to itself: whence the Father and the Son in that they are distinct persons, agree in this love which proceeds from them by which they love each other: and that is the Holy Spirit.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that love can be considered in two ways, namely according to that which it names, and thus it does not name a complete hypostasis, just as neither does the word: for the word of our intellect is knowledge, which is accidental to the intellect. In another way it is considered according to the proportion to the nature in which it is, namely divine or human: and according to this it will be perfect or imperfect, just as the word: whence since in the divine nature nothing is imperfect, it is necessary that the Spirit proceeding from the persons as they are persons be a perfect person in substance.

To the other it must be said that the Holy Spirit proceeds as into another, and remains in itself distinct: for these are not opposed; for insofar as it is referred to the Father and the Son as to one principle of itself, thus it remains in itself distinct from both by relative opposition, but insofar as it proceeds in the reason of personal love, nothing prohibits that it proceeds from the Father into the Son, and conversely from the Son into the Father, especially since this is true, the Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit, and the Father loves the Son by the Holy Spirit, and the Son loves the Father by the Holy Spirit: in all of which it is taken what is of procession, and what is of love which specifies the mode of proceeding: and if the procession is taken in itself, it will only cause the distinction of the one proceeding from those from whom it proceeds: if the mode by which it is specified is taken, thus the bond of the Father and the Son in the bond of love which is the Holy Spirit is caused.

To the other it must be said that this is false, no love according to the reason of love, etc.: because the love of the divine persons to whom only the perfection of substance pertains, and not accident, is perfect love in hypostasis.

To the other it must be said that the Holy Spirit is loved by the Father and the Son with essential love, and not with love which is distinguished from the Holy Spirit: and this is clear in a similar case: because whether we attend in an image, or in distinct men, love never causes another love by which that is loved. In the image indeed, because we clearly see that from the knower and knowledge love is caused of that which is known: but further love is not caused, but the love itself is loved with the same love. Similarly among different men consensus causes love by which men conspire and agree: but from this love another is not caused by which that is loved. If you say that it is not similar: because love in lower things is not a distinct person lovable: according to this I more easily have the proposition, that there is not another love: for that person is in no way distinguished from other persons except in relative opposition: that second love either is distinguished by relative opposition from the first, or not. If so: therefore they differ by a special property from it: therefore just as the Father and the Son insofar as they are one principle of the Holy Spirit, are not called personal love: so that second love should not be called love, but be denominated by another opposed property, as is done in the Father and the Son, which is false. If however it does not differ, I have the proposition that it is the same as this, and they are not two, but one love.

To the other it must be said that the divine essence is the love of the Father and the Son, but otherwise than personal love. For as we have said, to posit the agreement of the Father and the Son in essence only, this is little: indeed if we posit, though impossible, that the Father and the Son are not one God, as they are, but two and perfect, they would still agree in the love which proceeds from them even as distinct, and insofar as they are persons: and that love which thus proceeds from them as distinct is not whence they are one in essence, is personal and notional: whence that the essence is love and is said, this is not of the Father and the Son insofar as they are distinct persons, but rather insofar as they are one God: and therefore it is not of them as from them, but rather it is of them as he is; therefore it is not distinct; but the personal which is of them, not whence they are one God, but insofar as they are conspiring persons, that is of them as from them: and therefore that is distinguished from both.

To the other it must be said that spiritual nature is manifold: for some is that which is referred to a body of many and dissimilar parts, like the rational soul to an organic body: and that has the variety of many parts according to the proportion to the parts of the body, which it perfects and moves by its parts: but some does not have such a relation to the body: and therefore it is not necessary that it has parts of this kind: whence the Commentator says on the metaphysics, that in separate substances no powers are manifested except of intellect and will: and whatever may be of this, whether it is true or not, it must be said that those substances do not have many of the various powers which are of the soul in the body, and especially of the vegetative, and also they do not have certain of the sensitive soul: for although they know particular sensibles, and thus are said to have sense, sense will be said equivocally to our sense, because our sensitive cognition is not in act unless varied by the alteration of those sensibles, which would be absurd to posit in such substances. Similarly, however, in God according to this it will not be to posit according to nature virtues except of intellect and will: because they will be of greater power in him than in us: because intellect will be with respect to sensibles and universals, and will with respect to all goods: and thus it is not necessary that there are more persons proceeding according to more powers.

Regarding the habits, however, which that objection also inquires, it must be said that according to reason there are many habits of rational substance, but none is demonstrative of intimate affection except charity: for all others are either imperfect, or towards something external, and not towards that which is in the same nature: but love is especially intimate, and towards that which pertains to the society and union of the same nature: and therefore according to it the procession of a person is taken, and not according to other habits.

The same objection, however, raises the question about the irascible, namely that according to it a person should be taken just as according to the concupiscible: and this objection is made by some supposing that in the nature of the rational soul as it is rational, and in the nature of the angel, and in the divine nature, according to reason there should be concupiscible and irascible: and this is not held by any Author at all, except by that book which is falsely ascribed to Augustine, which is called On Spirit and Soul. For the Philosopher at the end of the first Ethics, Damascene, Gregory of Nyssa, and Avicenna, say the contrary. Similarly, the Gloss on the beginning of Ezekiel which recounts the opinion of Plato, who placed the concupiscible in the liver, but the irascible in the gall: and the reason for this is because those powers are named from the passions which are anger and concupiscence: but to all (even those who know little) it is clear that passions are not of rational nature, but are inferent or inflicted in sense: whence we can plainly say that the question supposes falsely, namely that in a wholly spiritual nature there is the concupiscible and irascible, in which properly there is will: because as the Philosopher says, in the rational there is will, in the irrational desire and spirit.

If, however, according to this it is asked, Whose power then is charity which is posited in God and in the angel? It must be said, of the will. If it is objected that love also names a passion, and thus is of some part of the sensitive soul, and not of God or the angel. It must be said that it is not true generally: but through bodily act, and having a contrary, it is true that it names a passion, but not love which says the affection of rational will. If, however, no force is made in this, but we wish to concede a double irascible, and a double concupiscible, namely human and sensible, then we say that it is not similar concerning the habit of the irascible, and the concupiscible: because the irascible is with respect to that which is external, which is to be repelled through victory over it: but the concupiscible is with respect to those things which are to be united within, and with respect to the uniting: and therefore according to the habit of the concupiscible there is the procession of a person, and not according to the habit of the irascible.

To the other it must be said that apprehension of all is attributed to the Son, and especially the apprehension of good: because that causes love to be breathed, and is operative as art operates: for speculative is in the universal, and is not of things except in potential existence. Although speculative and practical differ, yet according to speculative the word which is the Son is not taken, because that word (as Augustine says in book VIII of On the Trinity) is knowledge loved, and therefore is in the reason of the best: but according to speculative by appropriation it is not so fitting to take a person for two reasons, one of which is: because it is from the thing proceeding inwardly into speculation: and therefore it has the opposite mode to the procession of person from person: but practical is proceeding from the intelligent into work, and therefore that is more similar to the procession of persons. The second reason is that speculative is not of the thing in its proper nature, but rather in the universal reason in which the thing is only in potentiality: but practical is of the proper nature of the thing: and therefore again it more fittingly pertains to the procession of persons, who take their proper nature from the person from whom they proceed.

To the other it must be said that to the Son speculative is not attributed except by a less proper attribution: because the ideal intellect in the divine is operative of all ideated things which proceed into work: and that according to Augustine in the book of LXXXIII Questions, is attributed to the Son.

To the other it must be said that supposing that charity or love are of the concupiscible in spiritual nature, none of the other acts says complete and intimate inclination of affection to the beloved: and this is thus proved: To will says the act of the will by itself, which is common to the intimate and complete, and not to the intimate and incomplete. The rest, however, are evident through Psalm 118, 20, where it says: My soul has longed to desire your justifications. Whence to long is less than to desire, to desire however is still less than to will, and to will is less than to love from charity.

To the last it must be said that it is otherwise concerning the image created by God: because the image in many things is dissimilar, especially in the simplicity of nature and perfection: and therefore what is accident in it, the divine hypostasis is distinct in God, as is clear from the things said before: yet if anyone considers the things noted by Augustine above, love and knowledge are not altogether accidental to the mind, but according to some mode they are substantial.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Word Properly Belongs To The Son

Whether the word properly belongs to the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Just as properly the word of God is also wisdom, etc.

For from this it is taken that the word properly belongs to the Son.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The Father says himself, the Son says himself, and the Holy Spirit says himself: therefore either what is said by them is a word, or it is not. If it is a word, and the word proceeds from the one speaking: therefore the Son proceeds not only from the Father, but also from himself, and from the Holy Spirit. But if it is not a word. On the contrary: When a word is not said by the one speaking, nothing is said: therefore the Son saying himself and the Holy Spirit saying himself, say nothing, which is absurd.

1. Furthermore, as Anselm says in the Monologion: Each one says himself in another or in the other two: therefore it seems that not only the Son is called the word.
2. Furthermore, it is said of all creatures, as it is said in the beginning of Genesis 1, 3: God said: Let there be light, etc., and Psalm 32, 9, and 148, 5: He said, and they were made - he commanded, and they were created. But this saying is creating; therefore, since this saying belongs equally to all, it will belong to all that the word proceeds from them.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Augustine: In that is the Word by which the Son is: but the Son is by generation by which he is distinguished from the Father, and from the Holy Spirit; therefore the word is by the same distinguishing generation.

1. Likewise, Anselm: Indeed I see a wondrous and ineffable thing, namely three speaking, of whom each one says himself and the other two: and yet one sole word, and to be the word of only one, because of the Father: therefore it seems that the word is taken only notionally.

Solution. It must be said, the question of the Word is long and difficult: and it will be treated in its place below: but here it suffices, in my judgment, that the word is said in two ways, namely essentially, and personally: and the word said essentially appropriately belongs to the Son, but personally it belongs to him only properly. For just as we have two names on the part of the Holy Spirit, of which one belongs properly, as the Holy Spirit: but the other said in one way belongs properly, and in another way belongs appropriately, namely love, or charity: so it is on the part of the Son that he has one name belonging only properly, namely Son: but the other said in one way belongs properly, in another way belongs appropriately, and this is the word.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that to say is equivocal to essential saying by which each one says himself and another, and to notional saying by which only the Father by saying generates the Son. But there are those who say that to say is said in three ways, namely essentially in the way each one says himself: and essentially connoting an effect in the creature, by which each one says the creature: and notionally, by which only the Father says the word, and in this third signification alone the word responds: and this is true that the personal word responds: but that in the other two significations no word responds, is absurd: because he who by saying does not say a word, says nothing, because nothing is said except a word.

To the other it must be said, that Anselm wishes to say, that from the plurality of those speaking the reason of the word is not multiplied by appropriation: for the word, by whomever it is said, or even by all, or by two, is always more appropriable to the Son than to another.

To what is objected concerning Augustine it must be said that by that the Word is by which the Son is, that is, by that relation it is called the Word, although not by that reason of the name: and this he understands of the word said personally.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Properly Named Charity

Whether the Holy Spirit is properly called charity?

Whether the Holy Spirit is properly called charity?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

And yet the Holy Spirit is properly called charity, etc.

1. For this seems to be false: because whatever is common to the three cannot be proper to one: but charity is common to the three: therefore it cannot be proper to the Holy Spirit.
2. Furthermore, charity seems more to be appropriated to the Father: because in a certain antiphon concerning the Trinity the Church sings:

Charity is the Father, grace is Christ, communication is the Holy Spirit.

1. Likewise, charity is the form of virtues, and thus all virtues receive something from charity: therefore it is more similar and appropriable to the person from whom others receive, than to that which receives from others what none receives from itself: but this is the Holy Spirit: therefore it does not belong to the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, charity is the end of the commandment, as the Apostle says, to Timothy 1, 5. But the end belongs to that to which we ultimately return according to the order of nature. But this is the Father, as was held above: therefore it seems charity is not proper to the Holy Spirit.

Furthermore, essence is called charity in the divine. Similarly, the Holy Spirit is called charity. And similarly, a certain charity is implied when it is said, the Father and the Son love each other: for in the word love a certain charity is implied. And it is asked, How do those charities differ in the divine?

Solution. It must be said, as was held before, that charity is twofold: for it is personal and essential: and the personal is properly called the Holy Spirit, so that no other is: but the essential is called itself appropriately, but commonly any other.

To the first, it must be said that properly is implied in the authority of Augustine by appropriately.

To the other, it must be said that charity is taken in two ways, namely in itself, or to its proper act: and according to how it relates to other virtues. In itself, it is itself in the genus of love, and pertains to the Holy Spirit: and this is its proper consideration. But if it is taken as it is compared to other virtues, thus it has the nature of a certain principle to other virtues, and thus it is fitted to the Father.

And through this the solution to the two following which proceed in that consideration of charity is clear.

To the last, it must be said that in the divine there is essential charity, and notional, and personal. And this is clear by reason, and example. By reason thus: the Father and the Son love each other inasmuch as they are one in nature: and in this love necessarily also the Holy Spirit is included who is of the same essence with the Father and the Son: whence the word love says the act of essential charity. But when I say thus, the Father loves the Son with the love which is the Holy Spirit, a twofold love is implied, namely notional in the word by which the Father and the Son are one by inspiring love: and another love is implied by the name which is, with the love which is the Holy Spirit. By example, however, the same is shown: for the bridegroom and bride love each other in the agreement of nature and society which is among men well agreeing: and from such love other good companions pertaining to the same life are not excluded: and this love as much as it can, corresponds to essential love. The bridegroom and bride also love each other to the act of communication of nature through generation: and from this love even the begotten offspring is excluded: and this corresponds, as much as it can, to notional love inasmuch as the Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit: which love is not the Holy Spirit, because the Holy Spirit is not the principle by which the Father and the Son breathe the Spirit, just as neither is the Son the paternity by which the Father generates the Son. The third love is by which they are pleased in the begotten offspring: and this would be more similar if the offspring were love: because then they would love each other in that love: and this love corresponds to personal love. Another more fitting example is in the mind. For let us suppose memory does not generate understanding, yet it loves it inasmuch as it pertains to the same nature of the mind with itself: but if we suppose, as it is true, the concord of memory and understanding in producing its will, the concord of producing itself will say a love similar to notional love in the divine: but with the will now produced, by the will binding memory and understanding they love each other again: and it will be love as personal.

Then it is inquired concerning that which he says

As by the name of the Law sometimes together Where thus in Scripture are all things, etc. sought?

And it must be said, that in John 15:25, the Law is put for the whole Old Testament, where the Lord says: That the word might be fulfilled which is written in their law: They hated me without cause: for this is written in Psalm 118:161: which is not called the Law, except because it is of the Old Testament, which is also an instrument, because it instructs, and just as an instrument shows the harmony of the letter to the spirit, and types to the truth. Similarly there, 118:4: Blessed are the undefiled in the way who walk in the law of the Lord: for there the whole Scripture can be called the Law. And there, Psalm 1:2: In the law of the Lord is his will, and in his law he shall meditate day and night. Concerning the law given through Moses is this John 1:17: The law was given through Moses, grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. Also, Ecclesiasticus 24:33: Moses commanded us a law in the precepts of righteousness. And, Deuteronomy 33:2: In his right hand a fiery law.

Articulus 5 — Whether Wisdom Is Not Proper, But Only Appropriable

Whether wisdom is not proper, but only appropriable?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

Just as therefore we properly call the only Word of God by the name of wisdom, etc.

1. Here indeed a doubt can be: that wisdom is appropriable, and not proper: but charity is appropriable and proper, what is the cause of this?
2. Likewise, since the Word is appropriable and proper, as was shown before: why not similarly wisdom?

3. If you say that wisdom in the wise is as a perfection of him according to knowing:

and therefore it cannot be proper: because then the Father would know as if formally by the wisdom which is from him. On the contrary: In the same way I see that love is in the lover as a perfection, either to love or to cherish: therefore it ought not to be proper, but appropriated.

I answer. It must be said without prejudice, that the reason of this saying depends on the reason of the names: because thus charity says what it says as proceeding into another, or towards another: whence Augustine says that charity cannot be had less than between two. But wisdom says what it says as inhering in the wise himself, as if from another about which there is wisdom, because wisdom is about things: and although in God it is the cause of things, and not caused by things, yet it does not say this by its name: and therefore it could not fittingly be proper to the procession of persons: and through this the solution to the first and last is clear.

To the middle it must be said, that the Word says as proceeding from another, of which it is the intention and likeness, especially when someone speaks of himself: and therefore it encloses in itself the reason of that which is to be from another, just as charity or love: and therefore since by being from another the proceeding persons in the divine are distinguished, those names were apt to represent more than others.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is The Love By Which The Father And The Son Love Themselves And Us, And Also By Which We Love God

Whether the Holy Spirit is the love by which the Father and the Son love each other and us, and also by which we love God?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

The Holy Spirit is not only the love of the Father and the Son, by which they love each other and us, but also the love by which we love God, etc.

1. For this seems false for the first part: because the love by which the Father and the Son love us denotes an effect in the rational creature: but every such name is essential, because that effect is commonly of the whole Trinity: therefore that love is not specifically the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, there is one operation of the three: but to love us is the same as to make in us the grace by which we love God: therefore it is indivisibly of the three: therefore it does not specifically denote the love which is the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: Love is a simple virtue by itself motivating towards a certain unitive concretion from the good to the extremity of beings, and from that again consequently through all to the good, reflecting itself from the same, and through the same, and in the same, and always revolving in the same way. Therefore, since this procession of love and reflection into the first good loving is commonly of all persons, it does not seem that the Holy Spirit is specifically that charity by which God loves Himself and us.

4. Likewise, this seems to be against Augustine here in the last chapter of this distinction, where he introduces that of the Apostle to the Colossians 1:13: He has transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of His love, thus saying: therefore there is not in that Trinity the charity of God unless the Holy Spirit, the Son is also the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said, as was said above, that there is a threefold charity in the divine, and that threefold charity is signified in four ways, and sometimes even in five ways. For charity is signified essentially sometimes by itself alone: as when it is said, God is charity. Sometimes it is also signified notionally alone: as when it is said the Father loves the Son, insofar as distinct persons existing agree in spirating. It also signifies personally alone: as when it is said, charity is God from God: as Augustine says here in the preceding chapter, by the context and consequence which he takes from the epistle of John. It is also sometimes signified simultaneously essentially and notionally: as when it is said, He has transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of His love: and this was proven above. It is signified in the fifth way sometimes essentially and notionally and personally simultaneously: as when it is said, the Father and the Son send, or give the Holy Spirit. For there in the connoted effect essential charity is understood, and in the notion of mission notional, and in the gift itself which is given personal charity is understood. And the Master takes it in this last way here.

Therefore, it must be said to the first that although by the connoted effect essential charity is understood, yet not only the effect is there: indeed in that effect which is appropriable to the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit is understood to be sent: and thus notional with that, and personal is understood: whence essential is understood in such in the direct, and notional, and personal in the oblique: and this will be more clearly declared below when it will be disputed about mission.

To the other it must be said, that there is one operation of the three: but the appropriation of that operation does not equally belong to the three, but sometimes the operation is appropriable to one person, but separable from the mission of that person: as political virtue or the goodness of gratuitous grace is appropriable to the Holy Spirit, yet the Holy Spirit is not necessarily sent in the conferring of this grace. However, sometimes the operation of the three persons is appropriable to one among the persons, and inseparable from the mission of one person: as created charity given to the rational creature, which is appropriable to the Holy Spirit, and inseparable from the mission of the Holy Spirit in him to whom the gift of charity is conferred: and then by reason of appropriation and inseparability in such the notional and personal is understood in the essential.

To the other it must be said that Dionysius defines love universally, not as it is of this or that. But universally I say, as proceeding from the first good effecting in all beings something either to be or to live or to sense or to understand or something of natural or superadded good. And it returns into the source whence it emanated, reordering all beings to it according to the appetite of good, according to which we say, that good is what all things desire: and he does not speak specifically of the love which is charity: yet even that love is appropriable to the Holy Spirit, although the mission of the Holy Spirit is separable from it.

But the solution of Augustine's difficulty is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Father Into The Son, And Is Reflected From The Son Into The Father, So That He Is The Love Of The Son For The Father, And Of The Father For The Son; And Whether This Is A True Locution: The Father And The Son Love Themselves By The Holy Spirit, And The Father Loves Himself By The Holy Spirit, And The Father And The Son Love Themselves With The Love Which Is The Holy Spirit

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father into the Son, and is reflected from the Son into the Father: so that it is the love of the Son for the Father, and of the Father for the Son: and whether this is a true expression, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, and the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit, and the Father and the Son love themselves with the love which is the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the penultimate chapter F, concerning the word of Jerome: The Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but the love which the Father has for the Son, and the Son for the Father, etc.

For it seems from this that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father into the Son, and does not rest there, but is reflected from the Son into the Father: and this seems false.

1. For whatever proceeds from someone into someone or something else, is either received by that into which it proceeds, or not. If it is received; therefore it seems that the Son receives the Holy Spirit from the Father: and this implies a need for the Spirit to be in the Son, which is absurd.
2. Furthermore, either the Son receives what he has, or what he does not have. If what he has: therefore the reception is of what is had, which is not intelligible. If perhaps you say that he does not have it in this way: therefore a variation is posited concerning the Son: because he is in a different way by receiving what he has from the Father, than he was before he had it, or than by not receiving it: and this is heretical.
3. Furthermore, it is asked concerning the converse when it is said that it is the love of the Son for the Father: therefore the Father also receives from the Son, either what he does not have, or what he does not have in this way as he receives: and this is absurd: therefore it seems the Holy Spirit is not the love of the Father for the Son, and of the Son for the Father.

Alongside this, it is further asked concerning the ancient question, when it is said, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, whether this is a true expression, and in what relation the ablative is constructed with the verb?

1. But it seems false: because this is false, the Father is wise with the wisdom which he begot: therefore by a similar reasoning this is false, the Father and the Son love themselves with the love which proceeds from them: but this is the Holy Spirit: therefore this is false, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, in divine matters there is no other loving than being: therefore if the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, they are the Holy Spirit. And it is proven that the argument holds above, where the Master and also Augustine argue similarly, that the Father is not wise with the wisdom which he begot: because there is no other knowing than being: hence if he were wise with the wisdom which he begot, he would also be the wisdom which he begot.
3. Likewise, let us suppose, by impossibility, that the Holy Spirit does not exist, it will still be true that the Father and the Son love themselves with some love, which is the truest love: therefore it seems that they do not love themselves with the Holy Spirit: because with the Holy Spirit posited, that love is not taken away from them.
4. Likewise, it is objected more strongly thus: Whatever has equal opposition to two, is not referred to them, except as to opposites relatively. The Holy Spirit has such an opposition of relation to the Father and the Son insofar as they are one principle of the Holy Spirit: therefore it is not referred to them, except as one of the relatives to the other opposite: therefore it is not referred to them, as the form of love uniting and connecting them.
5. Likewise, one of the relatives cannot be understood to be the form disposing the other: therefore since the Holy Spirit is relative to the Father and the Son, the intellect does not even grasp that it can be the form uniting and connecting the Father and the Son: but such a form or quasi-form is implied in the word loving: therefore the expression is simply false.
6. Likewise, nothing is the same principle of opposition and of union or connection: the procession of the Holy Spirit is the principle of relative opposition: therefore it cannot be the principle as a form uniting or connecting.

Furthermore, it is asked: 1. When it is said, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, what kind of act does the word love signify? For it either signifies an essential act, or a notional act. If essential: then it follows that they are the Holy Spirit: because according to this, being is the same as loving there: but this is false: therefore it does not signify an essential act. But if it signifies a notional act. On the contrary: According to this, in its place could be put a verb that denotes that act, and according to this we could say, the Father and the Son breathe with the Holy Spirit: but this is false, because they do not breathe with the Holy Spirit, but rather the Holy Spirit.

1. Furthermore, if it signifies a notion: either the notion by which the Father and the Son are distinguished from each other, or that in which they are one. If in the first way: then it would signify paternity or filiation, which is clearly false. But if in the second way it signifies a notion: then it seems that it signifies that notion which is a principle: therefore I can say, the Father and the Son originate the Holy Spirit with the Holy Spirit: and this again is false.

Furthermore, it is asked, why is this admitted, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit: but not this, they breathe with the Holy Spirit: since breathe and love signify the same notion?

Furthermore, it is asked concerning the relation of the pronoun to the verb: for it seems to be reciprocal, or retransitive. If it is reciprocal, then the love which is implied in the act of loving is noted to pass into the same from which it proceeded: for the sense is, the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit, and the Son loves himself with the Holy Spirit.

But on the contrary: A verb denoting a notion, denotes it in the reason of distinction to the person in which the opposite notion is: therefore there should not be a transition of the act from the same to the same, but rather the distinct should be noted to proceed from the distinct. But if it is transitive so that the sense is, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, that is, the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit, and the Son loves the Father with the Holy Spirit, as the authority of Jerome suggests. On the contrary, because according to this it is noted that the Son has an act of love from the Holy Spirit towards the Father, and conversely the Father towards the Son: therefore the Holy Spirit does not have from them, but rather they from him.

Alongside this, it is further asked, whether this should be conceded, the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit, and the Son loves himself with the Holy Spirit?

But it seems not: because the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, and one not without the other: therefore when they are signified separately, they are signified as multiple principles, and not as one: therefore this is false, the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit.

But on the contrary: For if the Father cannot love himself with the Holy Spirit: either this is because he is unable to breathe the Holy Spirit without a helper, or because he does not wish to, and both are absurd: therefore this is true, the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit: and similarly this, the Son loves himself with the Holy Spirit.

Further, it is asked concerning the relation of the ablative to the verb: for it cannot be constructed in the reason of an efficient cause: because the Holy Spirit is not the efficient cause, that the Father and the Son love themselves.

If perhaps you say that in divine matters there is no cause, but a principle. On the contrary: But this is false, the Holy Spirit is the principle of that which the Father and the Son love themselves: therefore neither in the reason of a cause, nor in the reason of a principle can that ablative be constructed. Nor is it constructed in the reason of matter: because the Holy Spirit is not the matter concerning which alone is love, nor in which alone, nor from which, nor even a material disposition: therefore since matter is not taken in multiple ways, it seems that it is not constructed in the reason of material cause. Nor can it be constructed in the reason of final principle: because the Father and the Son do not love themselves for the sake of the Holy Spirit, but for their own sake. Furthermore, the end moves: and according to this the sense would be that the Holy Spirit moves the intention of the Father and the Son to love themselves: which again is false, because thus the Holy Spirit according to reason would be before the love which is implied in the verb, just as the end in intention is before the work of the efficient. Nor does it seem that it could be constructed in the reason of formal cause: because form is the disposition of the agent to the act: therefore the sense would be that the Holy Spirit is the form disposing the Father and the Son to love themselves: and according to this the Father and the Son would have from the Holy Spirit as from a form, that they love each other: which is absurd: because they do not have from him, but he has all that he has from them.

Because of these and similar things, Master Simon of Tournai says that that ablative is not constructed in the relation of any cause, but is placed in the designation of a sign: and therefore this is the sense, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, that is, the Holy Spirit, one in person spirated commonly from the Father and the Son, is a sign that the Father and the Son love themselves.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. According to this, the divisions which Jerome posits would not be true, namely, the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit, and the Son loves the Father with the Holy Spirit: because the Holy Spirit is not a necessary sign that the Father loves the Son, and conversely: because without this it can be understood that the Father loves the Son.

1. Furthermore, a sign is a sign to someone who knows by that sign: but it was not necessary for the Father and the Son to make a sign of their love to themselves: therefore this sign will be with respect to the created: therefore if we suppose no created thing exists, then this will be false or nugatory, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit.
2. Furthermore, the begotten wisdom and created wisdom is a sign that the Father is wise: therefore it seems that the Father is wise with the begotten or created wisdom.
3. Likewise, created love is a sign that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit love themselves: therefore it seems that according to this we can say that the Father and the Son love themselves with created love: because created love is a sign that they love themselves.

Likewise, it is asked alongside this if this is conceded, the Father and the Son love themselves with the love which is the Holy Spirit, and which is more proper?

Solution. It must be said without prejudice to the first, preserving Jerome, that the Holy Spirit is the love by which the Father and the Son love themselves: but to understand how such expressions are true, and how they are denied by some and conceded by others, it must be noted beforehand that when it is said, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, the verb love is notional, and implies the active procession of the Holy Spirit, and moreover implies the mode of his procession: just as the verb is begotten, not only says the procession of the Son from the Father, but also says the mode of the procession of the Son. But because the mode of the procession of the Holy Spirit is that he proceeds as love: therefore it says the mode in the principal signification, but says the procession consequently according to the intellect. However, some attending only to the procession signified in the verb, denied this, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, because of the objections made: and they said that Augustine retracted it in its similar, namely when he retracted this, the Father is wise with the begotten wisdom. But because it is not the custom of Augustine, unless he makes mention specifically of this, therefore it must be said otherwise, because when it is said, the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, the ablative has a double relation to the verb, according to which there are two in the verb: for there is in it active procession, and to this the ablative cannot be in the relation of any cause: but it will be as in the reason of principle or sign, as Tournai says. But because this is not the principal signification in the verb, but rather the mode of procession: therefore the ablative can be in the reason of a quasi-formal cause to the verb: as some others said. How the ablative should be understood in the reason of a quasi-formal cause is explained below: and thus consequently to the end of the doubts.

To what is first objected, it must be said that from that expression it is not taken that the Son receives the Holy Spirit from the Father as not had: but rather receives from him that the Holy Spirit proceeds from him: because this is the Father loving the Son with the Holy Spirit, the Son receiving from him that love proceeds from him in which they are united and concord. But when it is said, the Son loves the Father with the Holy Spirit, there is no other sense, except that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, in which he is united with the Father: and therefore it is clear that from the false understanding of the verb those arguments proceed.

To what is further asked concerning this, the Father loves the Son with the Holy Spirit, and the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit, I say without prejudice that all are true.

To what is objected against, it must be said that it is not similar concerning wisdom and love, as we said above: because wisdom says a comparison to the wise only: but love says as from the lover, and thus it is more fitting to the distinct person, and moreover loving implies a notional act, since it says an act preceding and passing from the lover: knowing, however, does not say this: rather it passes to the wise than from him, and is more receiving than giving or acting.

To the other it must be said that if the Holy Spirit is supposed not to be, there will be in divine matters only loving said essentially: and this loving is where the Father and the Son are one according to essence: and therefore from that it does not follow that the person is: but then there will not be complete perfection in divine matters, since the communication of the divine nature by the mode of love is lacking: for if there are no persons, some perfection will be lacking in God, namely the communication of nature, not that one person needs another, but because the power of nature is not demonstrated in communicability unless there are multiple hypostases in it, as will be proven below.

To the other it must be said that the Holy Spirit says two things, namely being from another, and the mode by which he is from another: and as to this that he is being from another, he implies only relative opposition: but as to the mode which he adds, he says connection: and this is not inconvenient, as is found in many relatives, as here: the genus and species themselves, which as to relation are opposed, yet if what is genus is considered, it is part of the species, and is rather a principle of agreement than of difference and opposition.

To the other it must be said that it is true as the relative is taken in the reason of its opposition: but if something is added to the relative for the sake of which it is not opposed, it can be unitive and quasi-formal, as is seen when I say, formal cause: for if I attend to the reason of causality and the reason of the caused, they are opposed, and one is not the form of the other: but if I attend to the reason of the form which the formal cause places above the intention of causality, it is that which is the unitive relative, and the form of its correlative which is the caused.

To the other the same solution applies, that on the part where it is the principle of opposition, it is not the principle of connection and form.

To the other it must be said that this verb love says a notion, yet in a different way than this verb breathe: because breathe does not say anything but the act of procession absolutely and in itself, and for the sake of that act the verb cannot be determined by the ablative, except as Tournai said, in the designation of a sign: but in this sense the Saints did not write this authority: but love adds over the act of procession the mode of proceeding by which the Holy Spirit as love and as gift proceeded or proceeds: and therefore since here there is a certain form, as will be clear later, it receives the determination of the ablative in the relation of a quasi-form of some kind.

To the other it must be said that principle, even if it says the same notion, yet it says only as the act of procession from which, and does not specify the mode, as love does.

To the other the solution is already clear from what has been said.

To what is asked concerning the pronoun, it must be said that in my judgment both are true, namely that it is reciprocal, and noting retransition. And if it is said to be reciprocal, to the argument made the response has already been given. because love does not say only the act of distinction and procession, but also adds the mode, and that agrees with the form or quasi-form which is in it in some way from which it is: and this will be clear at the end where the objections concerning the relation of the ablative are solved. But if it is retransitive: then again it is true, as Jerome says. And it has been solved above what is objected, that from this it does not follow that the Father receives something, or that the Son needs something, but that from them is the love by which they concord inasmuch as they are distinct persons.

Indeed, I concede that the Father loves himself with the Holy Spirit under this sense which I place in the verb thus, From the Father is the Holy Spirit by the mode of love, which love

The personal unity itself and binds to those things which it loves as if a certain form.

To that which is further inquired concerning the relation of the ablative, it must be said that by considering the mode of the notional act which is implied in the verb, the ablative is constructed with the verb in the relation as if of a form. But there is a twofold form, namely according to being, and according to well-being. In the notion of form according to being, the ablative is not constructed with the verb. However, the form according to well-being is still taken in two ways, namely absolutely which rests in that of which it is the form, and regarding another proceeding from that of which it is the form: just as when I say, "he is wise with wisdom," the ablative indicates a form resting in that of which it is the form, and not in the notion of proceeding from the wise one, as was said before. But when I say, "these love themselves with friendship," friendship is the form, and the form depends on the verb to the verb. But this form encloses three things in itself, namely that it is proceeding from those who love themselves, and that it is not in them absolutely, and that friendship is as if a medium binding. Similarly, according to the notion of understanding, it is taken in divine matters, when it is said, "the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit," the Holy Spirit is not taken there as the Holy Spirit, that is, according to which it is only a person in itself one and distinct from others, according to what is signified in this name, Holy Spirit: but it is taken as the bond and love: and therefore it is as if a form proceeding from both loving, and in respect of both loving, because they love each other: and it is in itself the bond of both.

To what is further inquired concerning the position of Master Simon, it must be said that it can be sustained, if "they love" says nothing but the act of spirating: and then it is taken in aptitude with respect to the spirated person.

To that which is further inquired, Whether the Father and the Son love themselves with the love which is the Holy Spirit, it must be said that this is true, and more proper than that, "the Father and the Son love themselves with the Holy Spirit."

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is The Unity Of The Father And The Son, And How The Holiness Of Each

Whether the Holy Spirit is the unity of the Father and the Son, and in what manner the sanctity of both?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

For whether it is the unity of both, or sanctity, or charity, etc.

For it is understood either of the unity of essence, or of person. It is evident that it is not of essence: because although the Holy Spirit is essence, yet He is not either of the two, as Augustine says here: but the unity of essence is both of them. If, however, it is the unity of person. On the contrary: the Father and the Son are not one person: therefore the Holy Spirit is not the unity of their person.

If perhaps it is said that it is the unity of notion. On the contrary: That notion will be only the common active spiration: but the Holy Spirit is not that notion: therefore it seems that in no way is He the unity of the Father and the Son.

Further it is inquired, In what manner is the sanctity of the two said? For in what manner it is charity, has already been established.

Solution. The unity is personal, which person is the Holy Spirit, not as the Holy Spirit, but as love: and let the unity be understood as a form with respect to this act which is in any way living by the union of consent and love, which union proceeds from the united, and is neither of the united, as two stones are sometimes united by some moisture proceeding from both: although that example does not suit so great a matter. Hence also, just as in physics it does not follow that everything which has the act of one makes simply one, and everything which has the act of form is simply the form of that in which it is: thus it seems to me truly to be said of the Holy Spirit as He is signified by personal love: for He is the unity of the Father and the Son, not that He is indistinct and one with the Father and the Son personally: but because He unites them in that they are distinct persons, in the consent of love: and thus also when it is said, the Father and the Son love each other by the Holy Spirit, it has the act of a certain form: just as friendship or love is a form: yet not in such a way that He disposes the Father and the Son as a form the formed, but because He unites, and to unite is the act of form: and thus it is clear that it does not follow that the Father and the Son are made one person in Him: but it follows that they agree, and He is their concord.

To this which is inquired, In what manner is sanctity said? It must be said that this has according to another name of His which is spirit: because spirit is free from material impurities and obscurities: and therefore He who is the spirit of others by appropriation, is called the purity of both and sanctity.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Called The Middle Person

Whether the Holy Spirit can be called the middle person?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

It is manifest that not any of the two is that by which each is joined.

1. For from this it seems that the Holy Spirit is the middle person in the Trinity: which is against the order of the Church which thus pronounces, Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, according to the order of nature, a principle not from a principle is before a principle from a principle, and a principle from a principle is before not a principle with respect to the person from a principle which is a person or persons: but the Father is a principle not from a principle, the Son however is a principle from a principle, the Holy Spirit however is not a principle with respect to any person, but from a principle: therefore it seems not to be a middle joining, but rather the last originated.

If perhaps you say, that the Spirit as it is love is the middle, as it is the Holy Spirit it is the third. On the contrary: As it is love, it proceeds from both, but that which proceeds from both according to the order of nature is posterior to both: therefore that solution is not true.

To this without prejudice it ought to be responded, that no order which is simply order, is among the persons: for the order of nature is not simply order: which is evident, because every order posits prior and posterior according to some mode: but when the order of nature is defined, it is defined by the negation of prior and posterior thus: The order of nature is that by which one is from another, not by which one is prior to another; which however without prior and posterior is in the divine, cannot be enunciated without prior and posterior: and therefore in the enunciation of the persons one is placed before another, so that the order of nature may be signified: and through this the solution to the two objections is evident.

According to the second which is asked, How then is the Holy Spirit both a middle and in some way the last? It must be said that according to the order of nature it is the third person: but because it proceeds as love, and the act of love is to unite and join, through this act it is called the middle.

To the first objection, it must be said that it is well conceded, that it proceeds from both, and many middles are, which however proceed from both extremes, especially among friends whose consensus of each tends into the other: and that middle has the act of living through the mode of concord: and it is customary to place something similar in the composition of a proposition, which because without the composed it is not understood, in some way it proceeds from the composed: and yet the middle joining is the composed itself: and although it is the middle in position, yet it is said to be the note of it that it is the third adjacent, but yet it is not entirely similar.

Articulus 10 — How The Father And The Son Are United In A Twofold Way

How are the Father and the Son united in two ways?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

And they are not by participation of something, but by their essence: nor by the gift of a superior, etc.

From this indeed it seems that essence proceeds from essence: but whatever proceeds is distinguished: therefore essence is distinguished from essence or from person, both of which are disproved above.

Soturio. Augustine intends to say that the Father and the Son are united in two ways in essence, which is not participative in them: but each is the whole essence, and the essence is the whole Father and the whole Son: for that is had participatively which is had according to a part of its essence, or according to a part of its power, as animal from man, because it is not had according to its whole power, because its power is to be predicated of many and to be in them. Similarly, man from man is had participatively: and briefly speaking, anything superior from its inferior: because the superior is particularized and contracted in the inferior. But in this way essence is not particularized nor contracted in the Father and the Son: but because the Father and the Son are not only one in essence, but also in that they are distinct persons they have a commonality proceeding from them in that they are persons, thus also they agree in the gift of their love, which neither of them is. Nor does nature permit, nor does intellect grasp, that what proceeds from a distinct person is the same in person with that from which it proceeds: yet it has the reason of uniting by the mode of distinct from the united as love and friendship, as was said above: and this is what he says, that by their gift they maintain unity as in the bond of peace.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Something Common To The Father And The Son

Whether the Holy Spirit is something common to the Father and the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which says:

The Holy Spirit is something common, etc.

In what manner is it common?

Response. In two ways, namely according to the notion of principle, because it is from both: and according to the notion of mediator, and the act of love and form, because it joins and unites: but dissimilarity is posited to the friendship of inferiors: because that which unites two friends is not a substance, nor a hypostasis distinct from them participating in such a nature of man with them: but in divine things, on account of perfection, it is a distinct hypostasis, and is a supposit of the same nature: whence just as the word there has the proper act of the word, and yet is a hypostasis: so love there has the proper act of love, and yet is a distinct hypostasis and one person in the Trinity: and this is intended.

Articulus 12 — Whether There Can Be More Divine Persons Than Three

Whether there can be more divine persons than three?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

Therefore there are three, and no more, etc.

And here is the question, Whether there can be divine persons more than three? And secondly, Whether it is necessary that there be these three, and not others?

However, it seems that there can be more, and there ought to be.

1. For Boethius says that essence contains unity, but relation multiplies the Trinity: but relation is not without the extremes of relation: therefore according to what the number of relations requires, there will be a multitude of persons: since therefore one relation seeks two extremes, two relations will require four extremes, and thus there will be four persons, and not two.
2. Likewise, Behold from another, and not being from another suffice in the genus for the distinctions of persons, or it is necessary to add the species: if they suffice in the genus: therefore since there are only two, namely being from another, and not being from another, it seems that there are only two persons. But if it is necessary to add the mode in species, it seems that many persons are made. For just as there is being from another through generation, so there is being from another through spiration, and from another through the communication of life, and so concerning other divine attributes: therefore according to this already there will be many persons.

3. Furthermore, Just as we have one person according to being from another through generation, and one according to being from another through spiration: so it seems that we ought to have one according to not being from another through generation, and another according to not being from him through spiration: therefore already we have at least four, two according to not being from another, and two according to being from another.

4. Likewise, In the genus I see that these differ: not being from another, not being from another from whom another, not being from another from whom none, not being from another from whom others in diverse modes of procession, not being from another from whom others in one mode of procession. Therefore it seems that we ought to have five persons, who are not from another. Similarly, it is easy to find many modes according to being from another: therefore it seems that we ought to have very many persons.

5. Likewise, On the contrary, it seems that there are only two: for no relation multiplies the Trinity except the relation of origin: but that is constituted by one simple act, which is generation: therefore there ought not to be persons, as it seems, except determined by generation: but those are only the begetter and the begotten. Therefore it seems that there ought not to be divine persons except the Father and the Son.

6. Likewise, There are objections similar to those which we noted above concerning the Son. Either the Holy Spirit has spirative power, or not. If so: therefore he spirates another spirit, or the power in him would be idle, and that another, and so on to infinity. Similarly, either this power fails in the Son and the Father, the Holy Spirit having already been spirated, or not. If not, it will be in vain, or they will spirate many other spirits. If it fails: therefore they have changed and have become impotent to effect what they could once effect. Concerning the generation of the Son, it has been explained above.

But because all infidels chatter against the faith concerning the number of persons, let us propose effective reasons to prove, as much as human ingenuity can, that the number is sufficient to be three.

Unity either according to genus, or according to species. Not according to genus: because in the genus nothing is referred, and nothing is in the genus that is not with some species: therefore it distinguishes according to species: and let it be supposed here that relation is of origin, and not another, because this will necessarily be proved below: since therefore being from another and not being from another are relations in the genus, they do not distinguish the Trinity: therefore it is necessary to add upon being from another, and not being from another: and let us inquire by what added this can be specified? For if I say thus, not being from another through generation, negation does not specify unless it is understood to be from another in a mode other than through generation: but in that which is in no way from another, it does not specify if it says part of the community which is in negation in the genus: for that which is in no way from another, is not from another through generation, but it is not converted: therefore not being from another through generation is part of that which is not being from another simply, and thus it does not posit anything upon it: therefore it is necessary, that it be determined on the part after by affirmation thus, who is not from another from whom another. Then indeed something affirmative is added: but since this is still in the genus, it does not specify: therefore it is necessary further to specify thus, who is not from another from whom another in this mode or that, which determines origin in the species of person, just as through generation, or spiration.

Now I will show that there cannot be except these two specifying modes.

1. In the simple divine spiritual nature there is nothing to understand on the part of what is, except nature, and intellect, and will: but nature is indivisible, and this has been proved above: therefore if it were to be multiplied, this would be on the part of intellect and will. The intellect says itself, and says another: but when it says another, that is outside its essence: and therefore it cannot be a hypostasis: because every hypostasis is within the nature of which it is a hypostasis: therefore by saying itself, it says that which is within the nature: but the said is distinct from the sayer: therefore there is there a distinction in hypostasis, and one in nature: and it has been shown above, that to say for the highest spirit is to generate: therefore we have one mode which produces two persons, namely the begetter and the begotten: and that mode has been proved above: and it has been proved there that there cannot be except one begetter, and one begotten. On the part of communication through will, that which proceeds already remaining within the nature of that from which it proceeds, is nothing but love: and since it does not have diverse opposition to the Father and the Son, it is necessary to proceed from both, as will be proved in the following distinction. Since however in the divine there is not a multitude of properties through matter, but only species, there cannot be love of love, or another love, just as it has been proved above that there cannot be a Son: therefore there cannot be except three persons.
2. Likewise, In the image the word does not produce a word, nor does the sayer say another word than one: nor does love another love, nor word: because it is the love of the word, not that the word is said or begotten by love: but thus it will also be in the divine: therefore there are only three persons.
3. Likewise, Nothing is manifested except in two distinct modes, namely by the mode of true word and by the mode of good: for if nature is manifested, the mode of manifestation is not distinct: therefore since the Father who is the principle not from a principle, manifests himself in the procession of persons, he will not manifest himself except in these two modes: but good is after true, and thus the Holy Spirit will be from the Son to whom true is fitting.

4. Likewise, Perfect joy is in three, not in two: for two are not united except by nature and natural things, and this does not complete perfect joy unless they are also united in that which is one in them distinct, as is love or friendship: therefore since that in the divine cannot be except perfect, there will be a person in the divine, and thus there will be three persons.

Solution. We say that there are only three persons.

To all things, however, which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that according to being from another, and not being from another, no person is taken unless more is added: just as the objection made also proves. Hence three things must be considered in that which makes a person, namely that it is a property in a determined species, and that it is a property of origin, and that it has relative opposition to everything from which it is distinguished: hence since not being from another is not a property determined in species, and similarly being from another, no distinction is taken according to those. But not being from another from whom another through generation, and not being from another from whom another through spiration, are indeed properties determined in species, but they do not have opposition: and therefore they do not constitute diverse persons, but only one. Similarly being from another when it is in the genus, makes none: but being from another through generation, and being from another through spiration, do not have opposition among themselves and therefore necessarily belong to one person just as the preceding: or it is necessary that some opposition be sought between them: and this is the opposition, that being from another through spiration says being from the Father and the Son, and therefore being from another through generation, and being from another through spiration, do not belong to one.

And from this the solution to all objections that were objected concerning relations, and concerning what is being from another, and not being from another, is clear: for it is necessary that each relation posits two extremes that are diverse persons: because one relation does not have one opposition to another: and therefore two respects can belong to the same.

From what is objected concerning the power of spirating, it has been solved above in its similar concerning the generation of the Son: because if another were spirated, it has been shown that it would have no difference to this one, and thus it would not make a number.

Articulus 13 — How This Name Spirit Specially Suits The Holy Spirit, And How Holy Is Said

How this name Spirit specially pertains to the Holy Spirit, and how it is called holy?

How this name Spirit specially pertains to the Holy Spirit, and how it is called holy?

Then it is asked concerning what is contained in the last chapter there, "Here it is to be noted, that the Holy Spirit," etc.

And it is asked concerning this name which is the Holy Spirit, how it specially pertains to the Holy Spirit?

For Spirit is accustomed to be put in Sacred Scripture for the principle of life, as in John 6:64: "It is the Spirit that gives life; the flesh profits nothing." And in Genesis 1:2: "The Spirit of God moved over the waters," because in the waters first appeared the soul of life.

Since therefore there is one life of the three, Spirit ought not properly to be referred to one person.

If perhaps it is said that it is called from spirituality, this again is nothing, because this properly pertains to the divine nature. If it is said that Spirit is called from breathing, this again is nothing, because to breathe pertains to all.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that it is called from breathing; but to breathe is said from emitting spirit: for spirit is from the innermost affections, whence the emission of love is the emission of spirit: both because the warm makes to breathe, and love is the divine fire which makes the affection to breathe: and also because men agreeing conspire in a kiss in which there is the conjunction of the breathing mouth to the breathing mouth, so that the conjunction of spirits inwardly may be noted. In this way, since the truest conjunction is between the Father and the Son in the Spirit, the conjunction itself is called spirit. Holy, however, is added, because it signifies sincerity towards the act of breathing. For there are certain names which, said absolutely, denote general habits, like good, holy, and the like: and joined with others ordered to some act, they denote goodness towards that act, as when it is said good-citharist, and the like. Thus it is called Holy Spirit on account of the purity of holiness and immateriality of conspiring love in the Father and the Son: and because it proceeds as love: therefore it has congruence from the name which is Holy Spirit.

And through this the solution to the objections is easily apparent.

DISTINCTIO XI

Divisio Textus

Here it must be said that the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son, etc.

Here begins that part in which it is discussed concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit by comparison to the terminus from which, or to the principle from which it proceeds. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he proves that it proceeds from both the Father and the Son.

In the second, however, he proves that it does not proceed more fully from one than from the other, and this begins in distinction XII, there, A, It is asked, Since the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, etc.

This distinction, which contains the first part, is divided into four parts: in the first of which he shows that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. In the second, he presents the oppositions of the Greeks to the contrary, there, B, The Greeks, however, say the Spirit In the third, he resolves, there, C, etc. We In however determine those words thus. The fourth and last reduces the confession of the Greeks to ours, there, D, It must be known, however, that the Greeks confess, etc.

The text, however, is clear by itself.

Articulus 1 — What It Is To Proceed

What is to proceed?

Before the Letter, five things are to be inquired: of which the first is, What is to proceed?

Second, Whether to proceed according to one reason is fitting for each person proceeding, and in how many ways it happens that procession occurs in the divine?

Third, Whether the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son insofar as they are one, or insofar as they are many?

Fourth, If it proceeds from them insofar as they are one, whether the uniting is essence or notion or person?

Fifth and last, concerning the spirative power, how it is in the Father and the Son, and whether it is one in the three?

To the first, it is proceeded thus: 1. To proceed signifies the exit of something from something: therefore, if there is procession in the divine, there will be an exit from something there. But on the contrary: Of those not distant by identity, there is no recession from one another: the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are not distant by identity of nature: therefore, there is no recession of them from one another: but every procession is a certain recession: therefore, procession is not fitting in the divine.

1. Furthermore, Procession is taken from a processive motion: but that motion is caused by need, as the Philosophers say, therefore it seems that it is not fitting for the divine.
2. Likewise, Every procession is from something into another: but no person is thus from something that it is into another, but rather that it is in itself: therefore, procession is not fitting for the divine.
3. Furthermore, The motion of procession is enclosed in a certain circle, as the Philosopher says: for desire is first moved by the desirable, and afterwards the desirer is joined to the desirable by processive motion: and thus the circle is enclosed in the external thing, because the desirable is the first mover from which is the motion, and into which the processive motion ultimately returns.
4. Likewise, Desire moves into the thing, and having been accepted, it returns into itself, and thus the circle is enclosed in the desirer: can I say that procession is taken in the divine by the likeness of that motion? For it seems so by Trismegistus who says that the monad generates the monad, and reflects the ardor into itself.
5. Likewise, By Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, where he thus says: Sometimes indeed the words say love and affection, sometimes the lovable and the beloved.

For of this indeed is the cause, and as an emitter, and as a progenitor: but he himself is, and this indeed is moved: but that moves, or because he is of himself, and to himself he is inductive and motive. The sense is that God the Father is the cause and principle of love and affection, and is the ultimate beloved and loved, and moves by love, and is moved as beloved: therefore, it seems that he leads himself in love as to himself and into himself: therefore, there is there as it were a circular procession.

6. Likewise, This seems by the authority of Jerome in the preceding distinction, which says that the Holy Spirit is the love by which the Father loves the Son, and the Son the Father. But if this is conceded: On the contrary: because according to this something the Father receives from the Son: therefore, it seems that the Spirit does not have a procession which is in the divine from the Son into the Father.

7. Likewise, Gratuitous love proceeds from liberality alone, as Richard of Saint Victor says: but due love more from the debt of justice: since therefore the Father owes nothing to the Son, but all things the Son to the Father, it seems that the Son does not exhibit gratuitous love to the Father: but this is the Holy Spirit: therefore, there is no procession from the Son into the Father. But if anyone would wish to say this, it follows from this that the Son does not love the Father with gratuitous love, and that he does not love him with the Holy Spirit: all of which are against the authorities of the Saints.

8. Furthermore, In circular motion one is the principle from which the motion, like the right: but another is from which the return, but not from which the motion, because there is no motion except from the right. Thus it seems to be in this procession: for that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, this he has from the Father, and thus it seems still to save the likeness of processive motion.

9. If perhaps you say, as some have said, that there is not there a likeness of procession to local processive motion, because the Son is not as to whom as to the terminus the Holy Spirit proceeds, so that there is a likeness of procession in straight motion: nor is the Son as through whom he returns into the Father, because thus the Son would have a deficient power to breathe the Spirit, as the left is deficient with respect to the right: but there is there procession as the caused proceeds from the cause. If, I say, it is thus said, all things seem false which were above determined concerning the exit as nexus and as unity and as conjunction of both: for the caused does not join another with the cause: therefore, it seems that it still returns that there is a circular exit, as in processive motion love proceeds from the lover into the beloved and returns into the lover.

10. But on the contrary: Damascene: Therefore, we believe in one Holy Spirit God and life-giving proceeding from the Father, and resting in the Son. that it proceeds from the Father, and does not return: and thus it seems processive either to the likeness of the caused from the cause, or to the likeness of straight motion from one to another.

Likewise, the procession of the Holy Spirit is according to origin: because to proceed from another is to be from another: but according to origin, nothing proceeds except the caused from the cause: therefore, it seems that in this way it is taken in the divine.

Solution. It must be said that no likeness according to truth can demonstrate eternal procession, just as neither the generation of the Son: yet according to something, taken by a distant likeness, the reason of procession is taken from the procession of the caused, and according to another from the procession of processive motion. For the Holy Spirit proceeds by reason of the person distinct from the Father and the Son, as from one principle: and in this respect, the likeness is more taken from the procession of the caused from the cause, which by its procession exits from it and is distinguished from it: and in a certain way, the efficient cause, and the caused is the effect of the efficient cause. But according to what is attended to the mode of procession, because namely it proceeds as love: thus it has likeness to another which is in processive motion, as to love which moves in processive motion: for the lover in a certain way goes out into the beloved thing, and the beloved in returning love in a certain way returns, and the love itself is the medium going out from them. And in this respect, there is a likeness, although slight, to processive motion. But in this respect that the Holy Spirit is in the same essence with the Father and the Son, there is dissimilarity to the procession of the caused from the cause: because the caused of the efficient cause is not of the same essence with the cause. But in this respect that there is no procession distant by place and motion, there is dissimilarity to processive motion.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that although there is no distinction there by nature and being, there is nevertheless a distinction there by local distance, a distinction (I say) of the person proceeding from those from whom it proceeds.

To the other, it must be said that procession, insofar as it is a movement to another place in which there is desire, indicates need: but there is a certain procession of self-communication, about which Dionysius says that the good proceeds into all participating in the good: and that procession happens from largesse, and that most fittingly pertains to the procession of persons, which does not show need, but communication of nature by the mode of love.

To the other, it must be said that the mode of procession on the part where it is local and needy, is from one into another: but the likeness is not taken from that, but rather as love proceeds from someone whom it unites with the one whom it loves: just as the love of appetite in the processive movement proceeds into the desired, and if the desired could love, conversely its love would proceed into the lover: but still this is not similar in all respects, unless one love proceeded from the lover and the beloved, and those two loved each other with that love.

To the other, it must be said that in truth the Father loves the Son with the love which is the Holy Spirit, and conversely the Son loves the Father with the love which is the Holy Spirit: yet it does not seem to be conceded that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father into the Son, and conversely: because when it is said, it proceeds into the Son or into the Father, by the preposition "in" the relation of the principle is not noted, but rather of the recipient. Hence, since the Father and the Son relate to the Holy Spirit as a principle, it is not conceded that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father into the Son, and less is it conceded conversely: and in this respect it does not have similarity with a circle in which the motion of procession is enclosed: but in this respect that the power of spirating and the processive power of the Spirit is from the Father in the Son through generation: and this is referred to the Father: for by the denotation of authority in the Father, it has some similarity with a circle, although remote, as it is in all similar earthly things when they are referred to the divine.

To the other, it must be said that the Father reflects the ardor upon himself through the recognition of the authority of spirating, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that Dionysius speaks there of essential love, which moves itself to the outpouring of gifts into rational nature, angelic and human, and even into all natural things, and moves them to be reordered into God: so that they may love either by natural appetite, or rationally, or by grace, or glory.

To the other, it must be said that the authority of Jerome does not intend that it proceeds from the Father into the Son, and conversely: but that it unites in some way not properly the Father and the Son: and about that mode of union it has been said.

To the other, it must be said that there is no debt in the divine: for debt sounds obligation: although in one person there is authority and principle to another, yet they are of one honor: and of equal dignity because of the unity of substance: and therefore the Son pours out gratuitous love, just as the Father does.

To the other, it must be said that with respect to this, that in the circular processive motion and also of the heavens there is right and left, the likeness is not taken: because this without doubt does not agree: because although the Son has from the Father that it proceeds from him, yet he is with the Father one principle of the Holy Spirit, so that in the Son the spirative power is in no way deficient.

To the other, it must be said, as was said above, that in part the procession of the caused has similarity, and in part it does not.

To what is lastly objected from Damascene, it must be said that he does not intend to say that the Spirit is not of the Son: because he says below that we say the Spirit is of the Son, but we do not say from the Son: and this is true that it is not from the Son as the author of spiration: and he wishes to say this by saying that it rests in the Son: because neither does the Son render the spiritual power, nor does he transfuse it into another who would breathe with the Father and the Son, just as he received the power of spirating from the Father. Yet there are those who simply say that Damascene here savored the opinion or error of the Greeks. Whatever, however, may be of this, the gloss we have placed is true: and thus it can be sustained especially since his sayings in the Sentences and by the Masters are very venerably received: and the Master in the Sentences says of him that the book is catholic, and that Pope Eugenius had it translated.

Articulus 2 — Whether Proceeding Belongs Univocally To The Son And To The Holy Spirit, And Why Procession Is Added To Spiration Rather Than To Generation

Whether to proceed univocally is fitting for the Son and the Holy Spirit, and why procession is more attributed to spiration than generation?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether to proceed by one reason is fitting for the Son and the Holy Spirit?

For the Son says of Himself, "I proceeded from God": and it is said of the Holy Spirit, "The Spirit proceeds from the Father": either therefore univocally, or equivocally. If univocally: then there is only one mode of procession in the divine, which is false, because the Son proceeds by generation, the Holy Spirit by spiration not by generation. But if equivocally: then they have nothing in common: and thus if one is from another, the other will not be from another, which is false.

Further, it is asked, Since to proceed is common to generation and spiration, why does spiration retain it more than generation? For it seems it ought to be the reverse: because to proceed by being born is to proceed by the procession of nature: but to proceed as love from consent does not seem to be to proceed except in a certain way: and thus it seems that the Son proceeds more properly than the Holy Spirit.

Solution. Some say that it is said univocally both in reason and in the name of the genus: and this reason is to go forth from others or from another personally. But this is nothing: because in the divine there is no reason of genus, or species, or of anything common as common, except of that which is common in reality and nature. Hence I say, that when it is said of the Son that He proceeds, the same is signified in the subject and predicate under another mode of signifying. Similarly, when it is said of the Holy Spirit that He proceeds. This mode of signifying is a certain intention of the commonality of procession to the act of procession of both the Son and the Holy Spirit, and in the reason of procession it has one reason.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that a different mode occurs because of another signification of generation, and of procession, and of spiration, and it ought not to be said that generation and procession are species and genus in the divine, and similarly neither spiration and procession.

To what is further asked, it must be said that generation according to intellect, although not according to reality, adds upon procession in which the reason of proceeding is signified, namely filiation: because it is of the Son to be born and generated. But the spiration of the Holy Spirit, I do not dare to say, adds nothing or less than the generation of the Son: but yet it is by the mode of love, and love according to its name does not sound in someone distinct like the Son: therefore it retains the name of procession, which indicates at least the distance of distinction. There are however those who say that spiration adds less to its procession than generation: because spiration according to its name does not indicate the substantial flow of person from person: and therefore it retains the name of the genus: just as the proper is said to be a convertible predicate: yet since there is a double convertible predicate, namely essential as definition, and accidental convertible, the accidental name of the proper retains: and thus it happens in many things.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Father And The Son Insofar As They Are One Or Many

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son insofar as they are one or multiple?

Thirdly, a difficult question is asked, namely, whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son insofar as they are one or one, or insofar as they are multiple?

It seems that He proceeds from them insofar as they are multiple.

1. For either the Father and the Son are one breathing the Holy Spirit, or multiple. If you say that they are multiple, on the contrary: to the plurality of supposits follows the plurality of acts even in divine matters: because it is not said, "I and the Father are one am," but it is said, "I and the Father are one are": but when it is said "breathing," the participle signifies an act: therefore it receives plurality from the plurality of supposits: but the Father and the Son are multiple supposits: therefore the Father and the Son are breathing, and not one breathing.

2. Likewise, active spiration is a property: therefore it does not belong to the essence to determine it, because no property determines the essence: therefore it belongs to the Father and the Son insofar as they are persons: however, the Father and the Son are not one person: therefore it belongs to them insofar as they are multiple: but they breathe insofar as they have the property of breathing: therefore they breathe the Spirit insofar as they are multiple, and not insofar as they are one.

3. Furthermore, when this word "one" is joined to personal or notional terms, it signifies the unity of person: but the Father and the Son are not one person: therefore they are not one something: but one breathing is one something by equivalence: therefore the Father and the Son are not breathing.

4. Likewise, two persons cannot be understood to be united in a personal act. Proof: Two persons cannot be understood to be united where they are diversified and distinguished: but in personal acts they are distinguished from each other: therefore two persons are not one in a personal act: but to breathe is a personal act: therefore the Father and the Son are not even one, much less one in any personal act.

5. If it were said that they are united like an aggregated power from multiple powers is united to an act, as in the pulling of a ship, and in the lifting of a stone - this is nothing: because according to this it would follow that neither of them could breathe by themselves, which is an absurd heresy: therefore it seems that they breathe it by themselves insofar as they are multiple.

6. Likewise, is not the Holy Spirit the love by which the Father loves the Son, and conversely the Son the Father? It is clear that it is so. But love is theirs insofar as they are distinct persons, because otherwise it would be essential love: therefore insofar as they are multiple: but this is to be the spirit of their love, which is to be love from them:

therefore He proceeds from them insofar as they are multiple, and not insofar as they are one.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing one as a simple one is caused by two immediate to it according to one mode of causing, because otherwise the caused would be simpler than the cause, which cannot be: therefore neither in divine matters can this be by reason of principle: since therefore the Holy Spirit is one simple, He cannot proceed from two according to one principle reason, unless it were said that He is a principle as Father in one way, and as mother in another, which is absurd: because from this it would follow that the Spirit is begotten, and materially from one, and actively from another, and it would follow that He is from the mixed divinity of two, and it would follow that He came forth from potentiality to act, and many other absurdities: therefore such cannot be posited.

1. Likewise, in numbers it is so that a more composite number always follows a simpler one proceeding from it, as Dionysius says: After the monad the dyad, and after the dyad the triad, and so on with others. Therefore it seems that in divine matters one as one cannot be from two according to one principle reason, since this example cannot be found in creatures.
2. If you say that an example is found: because natural heat in the seed (as the Philosopher says) is one, and acts in triple power, namely of fire, and of heaven, and of soul: this is nothing: because that thus united does not produce a simple, but rather a composite: for that heat in the power of the element prepares the matter by attracting the homogeneous to itself, and separating the heterogeneous gross not apt for generation. In the power of heaven or stars it acts towards the specific form, and operations following the composition of the species. In the power of the soul it acts towards the influence of life. But the Holy Spirit is one simple, and to the same in Him is the principle of spiration of the Father and the Son: therefore it seems that this is not intelligible, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from two as they are two.

Solution. Without scruple of ambiguity it must be said that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, as they are one, and not as they are multiple: yet He proceeds from them as multiple. Hence, saying one, He proceeds from two, as two are one in breathing: and therefore it is necessary to respond to almost all the reasons induced both for one part and for the other.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Father and the Son are not one breathing because of the reason of the objection: yet they are one in breathing: because breathing says the act of supposits, and does not say so principally a comparison to the Spirit, or to the spirative power in the Father and the Son: but yet they are one principle: because principle names a notion according to comparison to the spirated and principled, and in comparison to the spirative power. Breathing, however, has no comparison except to the supposits of those who breathe: and because those are two, the Father and the Son are two breathing, not one: but one principle of spiration.

To the other it must be said that active spiration is a property, which does not determine the essence, but the persons of the Father and the Son. And to what is objected, that one property is not of two subjects, it must be said that this is true in those supposits which are divided from each other by essence and substance: for in those what is in one, the same in number is not in another: but to two supposits which are in no way diverse, except between them the opposition of relation, the same can be in insofar as they are not relatively opposed: but the Father and the Son are such supposits of divine nature, and according to which they are compared to the spirative power and to the Holy Spirit, they do not have relative opposition between themselves: therefore according to this they remain the same, and thus one in number will be, what in this comparison is in them: this, however, is the property of breathing: and thus they are one principle of breathing the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said that I concede that the Father and the Son are not one who is the principle, nor one breathing: because the "one" would be an adjective, or a substantive: and in either sense the expression would be false: because the "one" would always say the unity of the person breathing: but as it is said, they are one principle, or one in breathing.

To the other it must be said that in a personal act importing the reason of opposition and distinction of persons, one cannot be united to another according to the thing nor according to the intellect: as the Father and the Son are not united in generating: because generating says the reason of opposition between the Father and the Son: but in an act not importing the reason of opposition between them, of necessity they are united, since in all things they are the same except where the opposition of relation divides them.

To the other I well concede that they are not thus united: but as one in breathing.

To the other it must be said that although personal love is of those distinct, as was proven in the preceding distinction, yet it does not proceed from them as they are distinct: but as one, and therefore that objection is not valid.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that in lower things to cause a composite it is necessary to construct a multiple mode of causing because one mode of causing would not produce except one: but in higher things there is not a cause, but a reason of principle, and the Father and the Son together do not make a composition of principle: rather because of their indivisibility, which is between them in all things in which they are not distinguished by the opposition of relation, there is in them one principle from which they breathe.

And by this also the solution to the following is clear: because namely the aggregation of the prior number with an added unity constitutes the subsequent, and the following is more composite than the preceding: but not so are the Father and the Son aggregated by something added, or they alone existing together constitute the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said that concerning natural heat it is not similar: because the simple is not that which consists of diverse powers. But the Father and the Son as one principle accepted do not make a composition: and therefore with one and the same and in the same way having and according to the same spirative power they breathe the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father And The Son Are United Insofar As They Are The Principle Of The Holy Spirit, By Essence, Or By Notion, Or By Person

Whether the Father and the Son are united inasmuch as they are the principle of the Holy Spirit, through essence, or through notion, or through person?

Fourthly, it is asked whether the Father and the Son are united inasmuch as they are the principle of the Holy Spirit, through essence, or through notion, or through person?

It seems, however, that they are united in essence, because Anselm says that through the essence of the Father and the Son, the whole deity is in the Holy Spirit.

Likewise, it is ridiculous to believe that on account of the relation of the Father, the whole deity is in the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that they breathe the Holy Spirit inasmuch as they are one in essence and nature.

Likewise, this seems because in divine things there are only three, namely essence, notion, and persons: but the persons are distinct, the notions indeed distinguish: therefore they do not unite: therefore if the persons are united by something, this will be essence: but the Father and the Son are the principle of the Holy Spirit as they are one: therefore it seems that this one is one of essence.

Likewise, to breathe is to give the divine essence to the Holy Spirit: therefore the procession of the Holy Spirit is substantial, because in proceeding it receives substance, just as the Son: therefore it seems that just as generation is an act of nature and substance, as Damascene says, so also to proceed: and thus it is reduced to the unity of the substance of the Father and the Son.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The same unity of essence which is in the Father and the Son is also in the Holy Spirit: if therefore this unity in the Father and the Son is a sufficient cause of breathing the Holy Spirit, it will also be sufficient in the Holy Spirit that it breathes the Holy Spirit, which is false.

1. If perhaps you say that in the Holy Spirit the relation has opposition to breathing, and in the Father and the Son it has relation of opposition to being breathed, and the Father and the Son breathe through the unity of essence: the Holy Spirit, however, does not breathe through the unity of essence, but is breathed. On the contrary: According to this, the inconvenience returns which was disproved above, namely that the divine essence is distinguished in person, and thus the divine essence in one person is other than the divine essence in another person, and according to this also the properties determine the essence in person: all of which the Catholic faith rejects: therefore it does not seem that they breathe it through being one in essence.
2. If for this reason it is said that they breathe it through being one in the notion which is spiration. On the contrary: Notion is a property which according to the reason of understanding is principled from the act of breathing; for Augustine says that the Father is father because he begot: therefore both the Father and the Son are one principle because they breathed the Holy Spirit: therefore spiration is not the cause of breathing, but rather caused by breathing. Furthermore, it follows what Anselm says is ridiculous, namely that relation or notion would be the cause that the whole divinity is in the Holy Spirit, nor can it be said that they breathe it inasmuch as they are one perfect.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that the Father and the Son breathe the Holy Spirit inasmuch as they are one in the spirative power: just as the Father generates the Son inasmuch as in him is the generative power, which is not in the Son nor in the Holy Spirit, as was proven above: but the unity of the spirative power encompasses the unity of essence, and the unity of notion, because it is a medium between person and essence according to the mode of understanding, as was proven above concerning the power of generating. And if it is asked, what is this spirative power? it will be determined in the following article of the question.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Anselm speaks truly, that essence is the cause as in which as in a root is that power: but nevertheless essence alone is not a sufficient cause.

To what is objected against it, it must be said as above concerning the generative power, that although the essence of the three is one, yet the comparison of essence to notions and relations in the three is not the same: especially because power signifies essence in the powerful, and not in itself. I say, however, that there is not one comparison, because it is not compared to the same reason in the three.

To what is objected, that essence according to this is determined by property, it must be said that it is false: for it is not the same to compare essence to property by identity with this person or that which is to be determined: because to be determined is to be distinguished by property: but to compare to this is to show essence in this or that person as identical to it, and to cause natural operations in it as power is the cause.

To what is objected, that notion is after the act of breathing according to the reason of understanding, it must be said that in divine things it is not true: for it cannot act unless it is a distinct person: but it is not distinguished except by property: therefore the distinguishing and the distinguished, that is, person and property according to the reason of understanding are before the notional act: but in lower things in which relations are caused by motion and change, what is objected is true.

Articulus 5 — How The Spirative Power Is In The Father And The Son, And Whether It Is One In The Three, And How The Spirative Power And The Generative Power Differ

How the spirative power is in the Father and the Son, and whether it is one in the three, and how the spirative and generative power differ?

How the spirative power is in the Father and the Son, and whether it is one in the three, and how the spirative and generative power differ?

Fifthly and lastly, it is asked concerning the spirative power, how it is in the Father and the Son, and whether it is one in the three?

And it proceeds thus: 1. To breathe in lower things is said in two ways, namely, to emit a spiritual substance, in the way we say moisture breathes, because it is vaporized in the air: and in this way we are accustomed to call rare bodies spirit, like wind or air, as there according to the exposition of Chrysostom: "The Spirit breathes where it wills: and you hear its voice," etc. and there, according to the exposition of Basil in Hexaemeron: "The Spirit of God was moving over the waters"[77]; where spirit is called air according to Basil.

In another way, we say certain living things or all breathe, like those which have life or life support from the drawing of the spiritual substance which is air, directing and subtilizing it, inspiring and expiring in retained spirit, like those breathing and inspiring, like those which have lungs and a windpipe.

However, we say all breathe according to the spirit generated from the evaporation of moisture in nourishment to the heart or to the member which is in place of the heart, and there it is digested, so that natural, vital, and animal operations occur in it, according to how it is directed to different things: for according to nature, spirits arise from the heart, as humors from the liver. If therefore in the divine there is a spirative power, it seems it should be in some of these.

However, it seems that none is fitting. For the first is not fitting, since evaporation, whether corporeal or spiritual, is to a more subtle nature than the evaporating and breathing: but the Holy Spirit is not of a more subtle nature than the Father and the Son. The second also is not fitting: because thus the Holy Spirit would be something extrinsic coming to the Father and the Son, which was the heresy of a most impious Theodoric, who said the Spirit was an alien power from the Father and the Son: and this was also the heresy of Nestorius and Sabellius, who posited only one person in the divine, as there was one substance, and said the Spirit was the servant of all liberty of the Father and the Son, as an alien power supervening upon us serves us. The third again does not seem fitting: because that evaporation is from something extrinsic ingested into us through the operation of natural heat: but nothing of such things falls into God: therefore it seems that in God there is no spirative power.

1. Furthermore, that power would either be essence or person: if essence, it would belong to all: but if person, then it would be this person or that and not another, which again is false. If you say it is a notion, this is false: because notions are not separated from divine persons according to reality. Hence what is not in some person is not a notion: but whatever is in a person, it is itself: hence since it is not some person, it will not be in some person as a notion in it.

But if for this reason it is said that there is no spirative power in God. On the contrary: Whose is the act, his is the power: but the act of breathing is in God: therefore there is power in him for breathing.

Solution. We say that in truth the power of breathing is in the Father and the Son, and it is a medium between essence purely and person purely taken in every same way as the generative power is a medium. And if you ask, by what similitude? I say, that to emit spirit there is in it a spirative power: for what in lower things is the attraction of spirit, this is from need for the cooling of the chest: but if from superabundance a man could emit his spirit, so that in it he would communicate the nature of a spiritual mind, this would be in some way similar: for thus it is in the Father and the Son that they agree not only in unity of essence, but also in the consent of spirit in will. Hence just as the Father communicates nature through generation, so also the Father and the Son communicate nature through the emission of such a spirit: and from this spirit which is a spiritual nature, the spirative power is said to be in the Father and the Son. However, I concede well that the similitude is not taken from corporeal spirits except very remotely: although some say that the similitude is taken from corporeal spirit: but I fear to say this, because according to this the spirit would metaphorically agree with the divine, and similarly the power of breathing in God would be said symbolically. Hence I believe better that it is said from the power of emitting the Spirit to whom the divine nature is communicated, as it is communicated through generation to the Son.

To what is asked, Whether it is essence or person? It must be said that whatever is in the divine is essence, because nothing is distinguished from essence, nor is essence distinguished from anything: yet it is not the same because of this mode of signifying: and according to the mode I say it is a medium between essence and person: and because the root is essence, and the act is of the person. Hence power taken with act and in act is a medium, according to something of it holding the reason of one, and according to something the reason of the other.

And note that if it is asked, how do the generative power and the spirative power differ? It must be said that it is clear to respond to this through comparison to acts: because then they differ as to breathe and to generate. But if they are taken in the root, it must be said that they do not differ in reality, but in reason: because the generative is rooted in the root according to what is nature: but the spirative is rooted in it according to what is will, not indeed will compared to the outside as to the caused, but will of love communicating as much being as is the communicator himself.

Articulus 6 — It Is Asked Concerning The Controversy Of The Greeks And The Latins On The Procession Of The Holy Spirit, Whether He Proceeds From The Father Only, As The Greeks Say, Or From The Father And The Son, As The Latins Say

It is asked concerning the controversy of the Greeks and Latins about the procession of the Holy Spirit, whether He proceeds from the Father only as the Greeks say, or from the Father and the Son as the Latins say?

Then it is asked concerning what is said:

Greet however, etc.

77. Genesis 1:2

And it is asked here concerning the controversy of the Greeks and Latins about the procession of the Holy Spirit. And we will first present the reasons and authorities for the Greeks, afterwards for the Latins we will solve the reasons and authorities of the Greeks.

§1. Dionysius, however, says that the Father is the fountainhead deity: therefore it seems that the Son and the Holy Spirit are streams: but no stream arises simultaneously from a fountain and a stream: therefore neither does the Holy Spirit proceed from the Son, nor conversely the Son from the Holy Spirit.

§2. Likewise, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: The Father indeed is the fountainhead deity. But the Son and the Holy Spirit are the offspring of the deity, thus it must be said, the offshoots of the divine nature, and as flowers, and as supersubstantial lights we have received from the holy writings. But neither the offshoots of the same root, nor the flowers of one branch, nor the lights of one light or luminous thing are reduced to each other according to the principles of origin. Therefore it seems that neither is the Son from the Holy Spirit, nor conversely the Holy Spirit from the Son.

§3. Likewise, Dionysius, in the book On Mystical Theology: In the theological outlines we praised the most principal affirmative theologies, how the divine and good nature is said to be unique, how certain things are said to be triune according to it, paternity and filiation, whatever this is or what the theology of the spirit wishes to show, how from the immaterial and indivisible good in the heart the lights of goodness have sprung forth, and from that which in itself and in themselves and in each other remained in eternal sprouting and abiding inseparable. And according to the commentary, it calls the heart the Father according to that of Psalm 14:2: "My heart has uttered a good word." Therefore, the sproutings of the Son and the Holy Spirit are from the heart which is the Father: therefore, it seems that although they are in Him as in the principle of origin, and in themselves in personal existence, and in each other according to the identity of nature, yet according to the origin of nature, the Spirit is not reduced to the Son, nor conversely. Hypotyposes, however, is the same as divine persons. The other words of authority are plain.

1. Likewise, Damascene: "Taught by the Spirit of God following with the Word, and manifesting its operation, we understand not a subsistence deprived of expiration." From this it is taken that the Spirit follows the Word and manifests its work: therefore, it does not proceed from the Word.
2. Furthermore, Damascene: "We believe in one Holy Spirit, God, and life-giving, proceeding from the Father, and resting in the Son."
3. Likewise, the same, chapter 11: "We say the Holy Spirit is from the Father, and we name Him the Spirit of the Father: but we do not say the Spirit is from the Son, yet we name Him the Spirit of the Son." John 1:33: "Upon whom you shall see the Spirit descending and remaining upon Him, He it is who baptizes." Since the temporal descent manifests the eternal procession, as will be proven below, it seems that He proceeds from the Father and rests and remains in the Son, as the Greeks say.

4. Likewise, in the legend of Saint Andrew it is said: "Peace to you and to all who believe in one Father, and in one Son, His Lord Jesus Christ, and in one Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father and remaining in the Son."
5. Likewise, Gregory Nazianzen, who is called the Theologian: "Just as the rays of solar light proceeding from it are neither always cut off from the light nor from each other, and they shine or emit the grace of light to us: in the same way, the Son and the Holy Spirit, the twin ray of the Father, have sent the light of charity to us, and are joined to the Father. And just as from a certain fountain of waters two streams flow, divided in position, yet possessing one and the same quality: in the same way, the Father, the fountain of life, through a certain river of the Son and the Holy Spirit sends grace to us: and they have proceeded to us, and nevertheless have existed inseparable from the Father. From this the same is taken.
6. The reasons also of the Greeks are above that of Dionysius in the book of Divine Names, chapter 1, that universally we should not dare to say anything about the substantial deity except those things which are expressed to us from the holy scriptures: and since it is nowhere read in the Gospel that the Spirit proceeds from the Son, it should not be said: or the reasons which the Master places in the Letter concerning councils and anathema.
7. Likewise, we see this in similitudes: for splendor and ray arise from the sun, so that neither through the other,
8. Likewise, in mind and knowledge and love there is the conversion of the mind to love except that knowledge precedes.
9. Likewise, love sometimes precedes knowledge, as Augustine says, just as the ardor of seeking before it is known: therefore, that ardor proceeds from the mind alone.
10. Likewise, in the external spirit when the word is pronounced, we see that before the sound of the word the spirit is drawn in which the word is formed, and it proceeds from the speaker into the work of the word which is manifestation: therefore, it seems that the Spirit is of the Word as in which it is manifested, but of the Father as from whom it proceeds.

But on the contrary: There are many reasons and authorities, both in the Gospel and in the originals of the Saints, whose sufficiency the Master adduces in the Letter.

The reasons, however, are these:

1. The Spirit is posited by us and them to be distinguished from the Son: therefore, the distinguishing property is between the Son and the Holy Spirit: but distinguishing in the divine is only the opposition of relation: therefore, between the Son and the Holy Spirit there is the opposition of relation: but no relatives are opposed to each other from this that they are referred relatively to some third, but rather they agree: therefore, the Son and the Holy Spirit are not opposed from this relatively to each other, but they agree and are united, that both are from the Father: therefore, it is necessary that one is from the other: but no one says the Son is from the Holy Spirit: therefore, it is necessary to say the Holy Spirit is from the Son.

2. Likewise, between the Father and the Son remains complete identity except for that which is to the other: therefore, similarly from the same cause between the Son and the Holy Spirit remains complete identity except for that which is to the other: either therefore that which is to the other is distinguished in that which is to the other, or not: if not, this is false: because thus they would be distinguished absolutely: therefore, it is distinguished inasmuch as it is to the other: but if neither the Son is from the Spirit, nor conversely, in no way is one referred to the other: therefore, in no way is one distinguished from the other, which is absurd: therefore, it is necessary that one is from the other.

3. Likewise, if something of the absolutes were in one which is not in the other, not whatever one would have, the other would have: but the Son and the Holy Spirit, if one is not from the other, are not distinguished except by absolutes: because they have no relation to each other: therefore, not whatever one has, the other has, which is false. Perhaps if it is said, that in this they are distinguished from each other, because they proceed diversely from the same. Against: That mode either says an absolute being, or a relative. If absolute: then it necessarily follows, that they are divided in essence and substance: because every absolute being supposes substance in the divine.

If, however, it says relative. Against: Relative or to something is, whose very being is to another. I ask therefore, what is that other to which the being of the relative is: if any other: therefore, the Father would not be only the Father of the Son, but also of any other, which is absurd: if, however, that other to which the being of the relative is, is the relative opposite: therefore, from this that the Son is to the Father, he does not have being which distinguishes him from the Holy Spirit: because the relative neither is a being nor has being, except to that to which it is by opposition: therefore, it returns to the first that from this the Son and the Holy Spirit are not distinguished from each other, that both are referred diversely to the Father.

1. Likewise, in all things between the Father and the Son remains identity except for that which is to the other: therefore, in whatever the Father is not opposed to the Son, he is the same to him: but in spirating he has no opposition to him: therefore, in spirating he is one with him.

2. Likewise, it is evident that every communication of nature posits an order to one from which that communication is, as in men, and in all others: therefore, if in the divine nature there is communication of nature to the persons themselves, an order of nature is posited to one: but there is no order if two are from one immediately, because then neither is ordered by nature to the other: therefore, it is necessary that of two one is from the other.

If perhaps someone is so insane as to say that not in all things are the persons one except for the opposition of relation, he is convinced by the nature of divine simplicity: because from this it follows, that neither one nature nor one simple thing are the persons, but something of the absolutes makes number with another: or something of the absolutes is in one which is not in the other. He is also convinced by the authority of Dionysius in the book of Divine Names, where he says all other things are united: and by many authorities of Boethius in the book of the Trinity who proves here, that if relation were to say something absolute, it could not be in God, unless it made composition or agreed with all persons.

Solution. We say in truth, that it is an error to say the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son, and it is to defend heresy: since both the Saints say this who were the fathers of the councils, as is proven in the Letter, and reason compels it, and the canon of the Gospel intimates this, as will be clear below. However, the reasons of the Greeks and authorities are not difficult to solve.

From that which Dionysius speaks, it must be said that the likeness is not taken from earthly things to God, except as that which is in part signifies that which is in the whole: for when he compares to sprouting branches, or flowing streams, or germinating flowers, it is evident that in all these there is not one essence in number, nor is whatever is in one of the essence also in another. Hence, since in this no one says that likeness can stand, it is clear that in more things it is dissimilar than similar.

Regarding other authorities, it must be said that Damascene would speak truly if he compared the Holy Spirit to the incarnation of the Word: because Augustine says that the word of the heart is like the Word begotten from eternity, and this is the word of the mind: but the word in voice is like the Word in flesh: and just as the spirit manifests the word in voice, not however in the heart: so the Spirit sent by the Father worked the flesh of the Word in which it would be manifested to us. But if he speaks to the inner word, the comparison is false: because that word is conceived by the mind alone, and from it and the mind the spirit of love, not of sound or voice, is diffused or emitted.

Regarding what is objected from Gregory Nazianzen, and the life of blessed Andrew, and from John, it must be said that they speak of the mission of the persons of the Son and the Holy Spirit, who were sent by the Father, so that the Father is not read to be sent: they do not, however, deny that the Spirit is sent by the Son: because this is read in the Gospel. And according to humanity, the Spirit descended in Him and remained in His soul and rested in Him, because He did not find in others where His foot could rest delightfully, like the dove sent from the ark: hence the authorities do not compel.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that it is of no value: because those reasons suppose falsely: for splendor proceeds from rays, although it also proceeds from the luminous body. And this is for the Latins who say the spirit proceeds from both. Another is similarly false: because Augustine says that indeed we can love the unknown, and we believe that it exists: hence, concerning that of which there is no knowledge nor science, nor belief, there is no love: and so it is necessary that knowledge is first from the mind either in act or in habit.

Articulus 7 — What It Is To Be Contrary To Sacred Scripture

What is contrary to Sacred Scripture?

Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says:

If anyone preaches something else or in another way, that is, contrary, etc.

For that exposition does not seem suitable: because not just anything else is contrary.

To this it must be said that in expositions such a principle holds, that nothing else is except contrary: for everything that pertains to declaration is within; and that which is not within is contrary. Hence Anselm: Every truth of Sacred Scripture is truth, which does not contradict Sacred Scripture.

It is also inquired what is the rule of faith which he touches upon, there, which however goes beyond the rule, etc.

And it must be said that the rule of faith is the concordant sense of the Scriptures with the articles of faith: because by those two regular precepts the Theologian is governed.

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is The Same To Say The Spirit Is Of The Son, And The Spirit Is From The Son

Whether it is the same to say that the Spirit is of the Son, and that the Spirit is from the Son?

Whether it is the same to say that the Spirit is of the Son, and that the Spirit is from the Son?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

Since it is not otherwise for the Holy Spirit
For although it may be held for this to be of the Father and the Son, than to be from the Father and the Son, the reason is from the nature of the genitive which according to its name denotes origin: yet there are many other relations which it denotes, as when I say, the cloak of Socrates, or the form of an image, or the nature of man: in none of which does it denote the origin of a principle.

Solution. It must be said that in truth in divine matters it cannot be otherwise: but in creatures it is not necessary that the genitive always denotes the relation of origin, although it principally denotes it: and therefore it is named from it. However, the reason why in divine matters it must be the same, was said above:

because divine things cannot have diversity and distinction which oblique constructions denote, except only according to relations of origin. If therefore in this expression, Spirit of the Son, the oblique denotes a distinction between the Spirit and the Son, that will be according to the relation of origin:
and thus it follows, that it is the same for the Spirit to be of the Son, and from the Son.

Articulus 9 — Why The Latins Dared To Add To The Creed Issued In The Council, Who Proceeds From The Father And The Son, Since The Greeks Were Not Called To This, Nor Was A Council Convened

Why the Latins dared to add to the creed issued in the council, "Who proceeds from the Father and the Son," when the Greeks were not called to this, nor was a council convened?

But the Greeks ask, How we dared to append to the creed issued in the council, and why in the addition their bishops were not called, or why a council was not convened?

To all these Augustine responds that nothing was added that was not understood in it: because what is understood and included in another, if this is expressed, ought not to be said to be added: but what lay hidden included, is manifested: just as concerning the descent into hell nothing is contained in the second creed, and it is permitted to add both for us and for them. However, it was necessary to add the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son: as the doubt of the Greeks themselves still proves.

Moreover, it was not necessary to call them to this, since the authority of publishing was with the Roman Church: especially since it is permitted to any particular Church to promulgate what is Catholic, on account of some necessity through chant and public readings.

And note, that eight general councils were celebrated in the primitive Church: four by the Apostles, and four by the Fathers. By the Apostles, the first for the election of Matthias in the place of Judas. The second, concerning the election of the seven deacons. The third, concerning the imposition of circumcision not being imposed on those who believed. The fourth, concerning not prohibiting lawful things to the Jews at that time on account of scandal, lest it be believed that the Old Testament ought to be rejected as sacrilegious. And these four are enumerated in a certain Gloss on Acts chapter one. There were also four of the Fathers, namely the Nicene, Ephesine, Chalcedonian, and Constantinopolitan.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Son As Word, Or As Love

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as word, or as love?

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as word, or as love?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

The Spirit of wisdom cannot hear from the Son speaking what he does not know, since this very thing is what is uttered by the Son, etc.

For from this it follows, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as word, and not as love.

To this it must be said, that to speak is to manifest oneself: moreover, the intellect manifests itself by the word: and such speaking taken notionally is fitting only to the Father: and to be uttered thus is fitting only to the Son. However, speaking taken essentially is fitting to the three. Moreover, speaking is also a manifestation of affection or will: and this manifestation does not occur in the word, but in love proceeding from affection or will: and thus the Holy Spirit is uttered by the Son or by the word.

DISTINCTIO XII

Divisio Textus

Likewise, it is asked, since the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Son, etc.

Here begins the part in which the Master proves that He does not proceed first and more fully from one than from the other.

And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows that He does not proceed from the Father before the Son. In the second, however, he proves that He does not proceed more fully or principally from one than from the other, and resolves the authorities which seem to be against this, there, C, Now it must be discussed what was secondly asked.

In the first part there are two things, namely, the objection, and the solution which begins there, B, These and questions of this kind more laborious than fruitful.

From this the sentence of the first chapter is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Holy Spirit Immediately Proceeds From Both

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds immediately from both?

A doubt arises here first in the text, whether the Holy Spirit proceeds immediately from both?

It seems that it does not: because 1. In divine things there is an order of nature by which one is from another, and according to this order the Church ordains the Son before the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that He proceeds more immediately from the Son than from the Father.

1. Likewise, in the mind it is such that love proceeds immediately from knowledge: since therefore the mind is the image of the Trinity, it seems similarly in the Trinity that the Holy Spirit proceeds immediately from the Word, and thus is immediately from the Son.

2. Likewise, in the vestige it is such that the good is immediately after the true: since therefore the true is attributed to the Son, and the good to the Holy Spirit, it seems the Holy Spirit is more immediately from the Son than from the Father.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever belongs to someone principally, and not principally to another, will be more immediately from the principal than from the non-principal: the Holy Spirit proceeds principally from the Father (as the Saints say), but not principally from the Son: therefore He proceeds more immediately from the Father than from the Son.

1. Likewise, what belongs properly to someone, and not properly to another, is more immediately to the one to whom it belongs properly than to the one to whom it belongs not properly: but the Saints say that the Holy Spirit proceeds properly from the Father, but not so properly from the Son: therefore He proceeds more immediately from the Father than from the Son.
2. Likewise, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, the Father has from Himself: but that He proceeds from the Son, the Son has from the Father: and what belongs from oneself, belongs more immediately than what is had from another: therefore He proceeds more immediately from the Father than from the Son.
3. Likewise, whatever the Son has even of absolutes, He refers to the Father, as my doctrine is not mine: therefore similarly it is in the power of breathing the Holy Spirit. Therefore it belongs more immediately to the Father than to the Son.

But on the contrary to both it seems that equally: because

1. Whatever proceeds from two, not as two, but as one, is simple and indivisible, this proceeds equally from both, the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, as was proven in the preceding distinction: therefore He proceeds equally from both.
2. Likewise, let it be granted that He proceeds unequally: therefore the Father and the Son are not equally referred to the act of breathing: but whatever are not equally referred, are not referred to the act by one numerical property: therefore the Father and the Son do not have one numerical property in breathing, which is false.

The rest that could be objected have been resolved in the preceding distinction.

Solution. It must be said that the Holy Spirit proceeds equally immediately from both: although some say otherwise: but their opinion is now abolished: and this because the Saints commonly say that He proceeds from them inasmuch as they, being distinct in their persons, are one in substance: and this is understood, as was explained above, that substance and essence are not taken here absolutely: but as it is in the relation of power which, joined to the act, is made as a medium according to the intellect between the purely essential and the purely personal: and thus in such a comparison nature is one in the Father and the Son being distinct, because in this no relation of opposition divides them: and according to this, that He proceeds from them as they are one, He proceeds equally immediately from both.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that order in divine things does not posit prior and posterior, nor mediate and immediate: because the order of nature is not an order simply, but in a certain respect, namely by which one is from another, not that one is prior to another according to the intellect, as was proven above: for in divine things to be a person is not other than to be relative. And since relatives are simultaneous by nature, the persons will also be simultaneous by nature, and according to the intellect.

To the other, it must be said that the created image in many ways falls short in representing the exemplar: yet it can be said that the word and love proceed equally from the mind, although love is from both: especially if we posit the word as coeternal with the mind, as Augustine seems to say.

To the other, it must be said that in the vestige there is order, and in this it does not correspond to the Trinity: but only in some union of three in one substance.

To what is objected in the opposite, it must be said that the Saints say that it belongs principally to the Father: not to designate that He is more immediate to the procession than the Son, but to note that authority is with the Father, according to which He, being the principle not from a principle, is the principle of the whole divinity in the Son and the Holy Spirit.

To the other, it must be said that it is said to belong properly to the Father, from the fact that He does not receive from another as the Son does: and not therefore because He is more immediate: hence it is referred principally to authority, and properly to the mode of having the power of breathing.

To the other, it must be said that to have from another, or not to have from another, does not cause mediate and immediate, but authority and subauthority.

To both it must be said that it refers to the author: not as to one who is more immediate in breathing, or more powerful, or more efficacious.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds First From The Father Rather Than From The Son

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds first from the Father than from the Son?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the Text, that if the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, etc., it seems that it proceeds first from the Father: because

1. The Philosopher says: I say the first and the principle are the same: but the Father is the principle not from a principle: therefore it proceeds first from the Father.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the first cause is that in which there is stability: therefore the first principle is that in which there is stability: since therefore in the order of nature which is in the divine, there is no stability except in the Father, the Father seems to be the first principle of the spiration of the Holy Spirit.

1. Likewise, the first cause, according to the Philosopher, is that which causes without another being supposed: therefore similarly the first principle is that which begins without another being supposed. But the Son begins the Holy Spirit with the principle of himself being supposed, because the Father is supposed: but the Father is not supposed by another: therefore it seems that the Father is the first principle of the Holy Spirit, and the Son is the second principle.
2. Likewise, it is conceded by the Saints that it proceeds principally from the Father: why is it not so conceded that it proceeds first from the Father?
3. Likewise, it seems that the objection of the heretic holds: because born or not born are opposed as affirmation and negation concerning the same: therefore one must necessarily be granted: because there is no medium of affirmation and negation.

Solution. We say that it must not be conceded that it proceeds first from the Father; because since the first implies order, and every order posits prior and posterior, it must be said that it proceeds posteriorly from the Son.

Therefore, first it must be said that the first and the principle are converted in the reason of cause: but although we say that there is a principle in the divine, we do not say cause because of the reason assigned above: and therefore the principle and the first are not converted in the divine.

To the other it must be said that the first cause is that in which there is stability in the resolution of caused things into the cause: but such a resolution is not in the divine: because the caused is not in the same simplicity with the cause: and therefore it does not so simply receive the being of the first cause, as it is in itself: because of which the resolution of the caused to the cause has place by abstraction of that which it has from the first cause, and by addition: but in the divine it has no place because of the uniform simplicity in all persons: for in the same simplicity the Son has the essence, in which it is in the Father: and therefore there is no first or second cause with respect to another.

To the other it must be said that the first cause causes without another being supposed, because the first does not add over the second, but rather abstracts: but the second cause therefore does not cause unless the first is supposed, because the second adds over the first, and does not abstract on the contrary, namely of the first cause: but because in the divine persons there is no such abstraction, and such addition, therefore there is no first cause, and no second, nor first or second principle.

To the other it must be said that principally according to the understanding by which it is accepted by the Saints, it does not posit the first, but authority in the Father: as was said in the preceding question.

To the other it must be said that although born and not born have the mode of opposition of contradictories: nevertheless the propositions in which they are posited are not contradictory, namely this, either it proceeded when born, or it proceeded when not born: because negation is not carried to composition, and therefore both are affirmative. There is an instance: Let it be that Socrates is not a musician, this is false, Socrates is a musical man, and similarly this, Socrates is a musical non-man: although man and non-man have the mode of opposition of contradictories. But if according to this mode it is inferred, the Spirit proceeded from the Son when born, or did not proceed from the Son when born: then it seems it must be said that both are double: for when I say, it proceeded from the Son when born, two times can be signified: one by the adverb which signifies now close to the present, as the Philosopher says: but the participle signifies past time: and then those two times are ordered, that the adverb says now signified next to which the act or passion imported in the participle is terminated, and thus the expression is false under this sense, the Son was first born, and afterwards the Holy Spirit proceeded: and in the same sense the contradictory is true. But if the participle is abstracted from time, and signifies the perfection of nativity, and the adverb says the present of eternity, as was noted above, the affirmative is true and the contradictory false under this sense, the Holy Spirit proceeded while the Son was born with perfect nativity: for from this neither priority of one nor the other is signified, but rather simultaneity according to the mode of eternity.

But then there can be a doubt, if the proposition is distinguishable, why Augustine denies it simply. And to this it must be said that he denies it by occasion of calumny: because the simplicity of faith flees calumny: or perhaps because the heretic took it in the first sense only.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds More Fully From The Father Than From The Son

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds more fully from the Father than from the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Now it must be treated that secondly it seems indeed to proceed more fully from the Father: because

1. On account of which each thing is such, that is more such: but the Son does not spirate except on account of the Father who gives him to spirate: therefore the Father spirates more.
2. Likewise, that which principally belongs, belongs more than that which does not principally: therefore the Father spirates more,
3. Likewise, every primary cause more

It influences more upon causality than the secondary: but the Father is a principle not from a principle: therefore, He influences spiration more than the Son.

Soturio. All arguments of this kind are easily solved by the aforementioned: because the Father does not spirate more than the Son: and what the Philosopher says, he understands concerning causes in which there is not equal influence: for if from principles influencing upon the conclusion we know the conclusion, it is necessary that we know the principles more: however, such diversity is not between the Father and the Son: because although the Father gives, and the Son receives, nevertheless He receives the same, and according to equal simplicity and power as it is in the Father, and through what is received, He is equally powerful with the Father giving, except that in the Father there is authority.

To the other, it must be said that principally it does not posit more, but authority, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that the Father is not the first cause of the Son, nor even the primary principle, on account of the reasons stated in the preceding question.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Proceeds More Principally From The Father Than From The Son

Whether the Holy Spirit proceeds more principally from the Father than from the Son?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

From whom does the Holy Spirit principally proceed, etc.

For it seems false: because

1. If I give you a horse, the right in my things, from then you also have authority over the horse: therefore, since the Father has given the Son equal right in His own, so that He can breathe with the same authority, it seems the Son breathes as the Father, and thus principally, neither authority nor priority nor fullness can be noted: therefore the statement simply seems false.
2. Furthermore, if this is conceded, the Holy Spirit is from the Father principally, can it similarly be conceded by opposition, the Holy Spirit is from the Son secondarily? It seems so: because it is said principally with respect to secondarily.

Response. It must be said that the Holy Spirit is said to proceed principally from the Father on account of the authority which is in the Father.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that if you give me a horse, the right in your things, I can use your things equally as you: but unless I am ungrateful, I always refer the bestowal itself to you: and thus it is between the Father and the Son: because the Son refers to the Father what is truly His, because from Him.

To the other it must be said that it cannot be conceded, the Spirit is from the Father principally, and from the Son secondarily, and the cause of this is: because the authority of the principle does not imply the notion of prior or first in the Father, as was shown above: and therefore it is not opposed to secondarily, but to that which has from another that the Holy Spirit proceeds from Him: and this is conceded and true.

Articulus 5 — How The Holy Spirit Is Said To Proceed From The Father In Different Ways: Principally, Properly, And Per Se

How is the Holy Spirit said to proceed differently from the Father principally, properly, and per se?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

From the same sense it is said to proceed properly from the Father.

What different thing does it say principally, properly, and per se, which are here attributed to the Father? For none of those apply except by reason of authority: therefore it seems that these three are the same.

Solution. I say that they say the same thing, namely that the authority of procession is in the Father, but by different reason: because in authority there are three things: one which first originates whatever is originated in the divine; and by reason of this it applies to Him principally. Another is that He does not have this from another, and by reason of this it applies to Him per se. The third is that this applies to Him alone, and by reason of this it applies properly: because proper is what applies to one alone.

Articulus 6

Concerning the word of Hilary where it is said, "May I merit your Holy Spirit, who is from you through the Only-begotten."

Then it is inquired concerning this word of Hilary: "May I merit your Holy Spirit, who is from you through your Only-begotten," etc.

From this it seems to follow that the principle is in the Son through authority: just as a prefect does this through the king: for by the virtue of the preposition authority is denoted in the accusative matter.

Soturio. The preposition is placed equivocally with different cases: for sometimes it denotes authority in the case to which it is joined; sometimes sub-authority, as some say: however, the word sub-authority is not found placed by the Saints. But it must be said that it sometimes denotes authority, if authority is placed in another, as when it is said, "The king acts through his prefect." Thus Hilary says here, and intends that the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son, and because the Son has this from the Father: as is also explained here.

Articulus 7 — Whether Whatever The Son Has, He Has From The Father Through Generation

Whether whatever the Son has, He has from the Father through generation?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Whatever He has, the Son has from the Father, etc.

1. But He does not have except through generation: therefore, through generation He has whatever He has: but He has the procession of the Holy Spirit from Himself: therefore, through generation He has that: therefore, the procession is through generation, which is false, since they say there are different emanations.
2. Likewise, if whatever the Son has, He has from the Father: therefore, whatever the Holy Spirit has, He has from both: therefore, what proceeds from both, He has from both: therefore, what proceeds from the Father, He has from both: therefore, what proceeds from the Father, He has from the Son, which is false.

To avoid such sophisms, it must be said that whatever the Son has, He has from the Father through generation: but it does not follow that everything He has is by nature, as was determined above: because the Son is born, and is by generation, and other things are in Him through identity with the begotten: and thus the processive power is in Him, or active spiration.

To the other, it must be said that whatever the Holy Spirit has, He has from both separately and conjointly: because He has everything from the Son, and everything from the Father: but what is inferred: therefore, what proceeds from both, etc., we can say as it is commonly resolved, that it is a change of category: because to proceed is not a what, but a relation.

But because it could be objected that according to this, Augustine's reasoning proving that the Son has from the Father that the Spirit proceeds from Him would not hold: because whatever He has, He has from the Father. Let this be conceded, that whatever He has, He has from both, and let it be conceded conjointly only: and if it is later inferred: therefore, He has from the Son that which proceeds from the Father, it is clear that it does not follow: because it proceeds from an immobile supposition to a mobile one.

If, however, it is objected that this is contrary to what was said, namely, whatever He has, He has from both separately and conjointly, it must be said that it is not: because the first supposition is only for substantial things: but when the second is assumed, in the distribution of the term it is enclosed, even notionally fitting: and because the notional is in both conjointly, therefore it is not surprising if the mode of supposition varies. Or it can be said that even Augustine's reasoning does not hold concerning the Son except by the grace of the matter: for in form it errs by changing what into a relation.

DISTINCTIO XIII

Divisio Textus

After these things, it must be considered, as much as from such as we are, etc.

Here begins that part, in which the Master determines the difference between generation and procession. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows that the Holy Spirit cannot be said to be begotten, because he is not born as the Son. In the second, however, he determines that he cannot be said to be unbegotten, because he is not from no other, as the Father, there, E, Now it must be considered, since the Holy Spirit.

The first of these has three parts: in the first of which he touches upon why the Holy Spirit is not said to be born or son, but only to proceed. In the second, he touches conversely, why the Son is said to be born and to proceed, there, B, But when the Holy Spirit is not said to be born, etc. Thirdly, he shows that the distinction between being born and proceeding is ineffable while we live here, there, C, Between the generation of the Son, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Is The Difference Between Generation And Procession In The Divine

What is the difference between generation and procession in the divine?

What is the difference between generation and procession in the divine?

A doubt arises concerning the first, about the difference between generation and procession. It seems, however, that there is no difference for many reasons, some of which are universal and probable, and some are proper.

The universal ones are these: 1. A difference is not assigned between species and genus, but between species and species of the same genus: therefore, since everything that is born proceeds, and not conversely, as Augustine says in this reading, there is no difference between generation and procession, as it seems.

1. Likewise, those things which distinguish hypostases of the same nature either differ in number or in species. If in number: this cannot be, because to differ in number is to differ in matter: therefore, if divine hypostases are distinguished by things that differ in species, they must be distinguished: but to proceed and to be born do not differ in species: therefore, there is no such difference between them that constitutes different persons.
2. Likewise, whatever according to one reason of its name is common to many, does not distinguish between them: therefore, similarly, whatever according to one reason of its name is common to the Son and the Holy Spirit, does not distinguish between the Son and the Holy Spirit: but to proceed according to one reason of its name is common to the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore, it does not distinguish between them.
3. Furthermore, it seems to be proven from the properties that there is no difference: for every emanation or flow of something from something is either distinguished by the term from which, or by the term to which, or by the emanation itself, or by any two of these together, or by all three: but in the divine there are two emanations of the Son and the Holy Spirit, each from the substance of the Father, and each in substance, and each in a substantial manner of emanation, because nothing of accident is mixed, and neither receives less of the substance of the Father than the other: therefore, it seems that they differ in nothing.

4. If perhaps you say that the Holy Spirit is from two: this does not solve it: because even if it is posited that He is from one, still the Holy Spirit will not be the Son, as the Greeks say. But if you say that the Son is the image of the Father, and not the Holy Spirit: this again does not solve it: because not being similar in those things which are as if externally convenient does not dissolve the reason of generation and filiation, as long as such emanation is there substantially similar: but the Holy Spirit is in all substantial things similar to the Father, therefore there is no distinction between the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Spirit.
5. If perhaps you wish to say that there is a difference in the mode of emanation thus: because generation is into a likeness in species and form and reason, but procession is not: this is nothing: for we do not dispute about the name, but about the thing itself: therefore, since the Spirit is similar to the Father in form, in species, in nature, in substance, and in all absolutes, it seems that the Spirit will be born like the Son.

If perhaps you say that generation is a work of nature, but procession is a work of will, because the Spirit proceeds by way of love. On the contrary: the work of will, as Damascene says, is creation, therefore according to this the Spirit would be created, which is false: therefore, the procession of the Spirit will not be a work of will according to that reason by which the work of will is divided against the work of nature: it returns, therefore, again, that the procession of the Spirit is a work of nature: and thus the Spirit is born like the Son.

1. Likewise, in lower things there is motion and change, and motion and change together: and philosophers determine that motion is from subject to subject, because nothing can be moved by any species of motion unless it is actually being and subsisting: but change is made simply between substance and non-substance: but change joined to motion is in matter subject to forms having contrariety: which, I say, matter proceeds and goes forth to the act of some form. But all such motions and changes are determined and drawn into species according to the term to which they are. Therefore, although in the divine there is lacking that which is of motion and change, because there is no exit from potency to act: yet since the terms between which divine emanations are do not lack, it seems that they ought to be distinguished according to the terms: but this term in both cases is nothing but substance and suppositum: therefore, it seems that both emanations, namely of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, are of one reason: therefore, there is no difference between one and the other.
2. Likewise, in every nature in which there is communication according to the flow of origin of hypostases, there is one reason for the exit of all hypostases of that nature. This is proven by induction in individuals, man, donkey, lion, and so on: therefore, since in the divine there is no communication of nature to multiple hypostases except according to the flow of origin, it will seem that there is one reason for the communication of nature in the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore, it seems that there is no difference in the emanations of one and the other.

3. Likewise, in every nature thus I see, that where there is the same reason of nature in species, in those there is also the same reason of supposita: for because Socrates and Plato are of one reason in this common which is man, they are also of one reason in this following common which is suppositum: for Socrates is not a suppositum of man by another reason than Plato: because then suppositum would be said equivocally of them: therefore, since the divine nature is not only of one reason, but also in number in the Son and the Holy Spirit, it seems that the same reason of suppositum is in them: therefore, if one is the Son, so is the other: or if one is not the Son, neither is the other.

4. Likewise, everything that is distinguished from another is either distinguished by substantial difference or accidental: but there is no accidental difference in the divine: therefore, if the Son and the Holy Spirit differ, they differ by substance: and this is false: therefore, it seems that if one is said to be born, and the other is said to be born: or if one is said to proceed, and the other is similarly said to proceed.

5. Likewise, it has been held above that there is only one relation of origin in the divine: but there is one relation of origin in all originated in one nature, as is proven by induction in individuals: therefore, it seems since both, namely the Son and the Holy Spirit, are originated, that they have one reason of origin.

6. Furthermore, the similarities that are introduced do not seem to hold: for when it is said that from the sun proceeds light and heat, of which one is attributed to the Son, the other to the Holy Spirit: it is not a true similarity: because although both are from the sun, yet one is only from that which is natural to the sun, and disposes it, namely light: but heat is not: because the sun is neither hot nor cold in its nature, as is proven in natural philosophy: therefore, according to this, the Holy Spirit would be an effect of the Father in an alien nature, and would not proceed in the divine nature, which is false.

Furthermore, if the sun emits rays by looking at Saturn or another star, it will never heat it: therefore, if the divine sun emits light into that which is of the divine nature, from this no heat proceeds, as it seems: therefore, the similarity by which generation and procession are distinguished is of no value.

If perhaps you say that from the sun proceeds a ray and light: and so two are distinct: then still the similarity does not hold, because light is a quality disposing the ray and the sun, and is not of diverse property: therefore, it seems according to this, that still it cannot be distinguished between the generation of the Son and the procession of the Holy Spirit.

But if you say that in fire a true similarity of distinction is found: because from fire proceeds light and heat, and both come from fire. Again, this does not hold for two reasons: one of which is that light is not natural to fire, as Alexander the Philosopher says: because it does not shine in its sphere: otherwise it would cover the stars from us, because luminous bodies cover those things which are behind them: just as one star eclipses another when it is subjected to it between our sight and that which is higher. The other reason is: because even if we grant that fire shines by its nature, yet heat and light are not reduced to the same nature in fire: but one to light, and the other to heat: from this, therefore, it then follows that the Son and the Holy Spirit would not be from the same nature of the Father, which is heresy.

1. Furthermore, if these are distinguished from each other, just as the distinguisher relates to the distinguished, so distinction relates to distinction, and the distinct to the distinct: but the distinguisher differs substantially from the distinguished, because there is no accidental distinction in the divine: therefore, distinction from distinction, and the distinct from the distinct differ substantially: but the distinct are the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore, the Son and the Holy Spirit differ substantially: whatever things differ substantially, one of them has some substance which the other does not have: therefore, there is some substance in the Son which is not in the Holy Spirit, which is false and heretical: therefore, the two emanations do not differ among themselves.
2. Likewise, in all things in which there is univocation of one common nature, there is one univocal act by which one nature is propagated from one. This is proven in individuals. Therefore, if there is univocation of the divine nature in the Son and the Holy Spirit, there will be an univocal act by which that nature is received from one Father: therefore, if the Son receives by generation, the Holy Spirit also receives by generation: or if the Holy Spirit receives by proceeding, the Son will receive in the same way.

If perhaps someone wishes to insist on the first proof in stars, in which there is one nature, and yet they are not propagated from one star: the instance is ridiculous: because stars are not of one nature which is the form of the species: because if this were true, since it is determined that they are also of one matter not diversified by foreign impressions, but only having potency for circular motion, every star with every star would be of the same effect, which is absurd, and against the experts of the stars.

But if perhaps someone wishes to insist by angels: the instance is even less doubtful: because it is not proven that angels are of the same species: or if they are, as some say, it is not an instance: because in them there is no communicable nature, as was proven above: but the first proposition is about those in which nature is communicable by the act of origin or property.

1. Likewise, there does not seem to be a difference which some have newly found here, namely that there are two things in the divine nature, namely being or essence, and its spirituality: and therefore according to these two there are two acts of communication of nature, namely generation which communicates being and essence, and procession which communicates spirituality. Either spirituality is called a divine attribute, by which the divine nature is distinguished from the corporeal nature; or spirituality is called the spirative power, about which it was held above. If in the first way: then what they say is nothing:

because this is in no communicable nature, that by one act of origin the essence of it is communicated, and by another according to reason the property of its differences from other natures of other things: for in the generation of man this man is born, and by the same generation consequently has, that he is rational, that he is biped, that he is an animal capable of discipline, and all other such things: therefore, it seems that the communication of such spirituality does not admit a different act of its communication from the act of communication of essence or nature. Furthermore, the same inconvenience will return as before: because by generation the Son receives both nature and spirituality, and by procession the Holy Spirit receives both nature and spirituality of nature: therefore, it seems that to generate and to proceed are the same.

If perhaps you say that the Son according to the prior receives nature, and according to the posterior receives spirituality, or by this that spirituality is the same to him: but the Holy Spirit according to the prior receives conversely, namely spirituality, and receives nature by this that it is posterior to that, or by this that it is the same to him, because in the divine there is no prior and posterior. On the contrary: everything that receives some nature and the substantial property of that nature, according to the prior and per se receives nature rather than the property which is consequent, or the same to it: therefore, there is no reason that you say the Spirit per se receives spirituality, because this is against all understanding.

Likewise, every hypostasis per se is subject to nature, and consequently to the property of nature: therefore, since the Spirit is a hypostasis of the divine nature, it will per se be subject to nature and consequently according to understanding to the property of the same or attributes.

Likewise, since in the divine nature there are many attributes equally notional as spirituality, such as eternity, immutability, simplicity, goodness, power, and such: why would there not be some communication of nature according to hypostases according to all? If you say that this is because those regard act, but spirituality regards nature: this is plainly frivolous: because immutability, simplicity, eternity, determine no act, but nature alone.

But if it is said that spirituality is not taken here from the spirituality of nature, but from the spirative power, this is another matter: because the spirative power (as was proven above) is per se, or in person: then I ask if that spirative power produces perfect in the reason of spirit, and not nature: or perfect in the reason of nature, and not in the reason of spirit: or perfect in both: and then either the production is first of nature, and because of identity of the reason of spirit: or conversely per se the production is of spirit, and because of identity of spirituality to nature it is also the production of nature: because it cannot be varied in multiple ways, unless you say that it is equally of both, or of neither: but what is said here because of identity, therefore it is because in the divine because of all simplicity there is no prior and posterior, but the same: yet the reason is different.

If in the first way, namely that procession says the production of spirit, and not of nature, it follows the heresy of Sabellius, that the Holy Spirit does not receive nature from the Father by proceeding: and it is also against the authorities of Augustine introduced here. If in the second way, namely that procession says the production of nature, and not of spirit, it follows that the Holy Spirit should not be called spirit, but Son, which again is false. If in the third way, namely that procession says the production of perfection in nature, which production is also spirit because of the identity of spirituality to nature: then it follows that the Spirit will proceed in the same way as the Son: for divine generation is the production of perfect in nature, who is also perfect spirit, because spirituality has identity with nature: and this again is false. If in the fourth way, namely that procession says the production conversely of spirit, and by identity says perfect in nature. Against this is that every production of that is per se which is immediate to the producing act: but this in every communication of nature is the suppositum of nature: therefore, it is not prior of the attribute, than of him who is perfect in nature. If in the fifth way you say, this example is found neither in spiritual nature, nor in corporeal nature, that two are in one equally ordered to one act as its terms according to reason. If in the sixth way you say, then it follows that the Spirit in the divine is produced by no production, which is frivolous: therefore, the new opinion cannot stand.

But perhaps because of these reasons, unless other stronger ones were introduced to the opposite, heresy would be confirmed. Hence, thus it proceeds to the opposite:

1. Every possible communication of the divine nature is to be given to it: therefore, since communication of distinct persons in love is possible to it, that is necessarily to be given to it: therefore, there will not be to it only communication of nature by the act of nature, but there will also be communication of love by the act of love: therefore, that love which is from distinct persons, is either something, or nothing. If it is nothing: therefore, it is not love. But if it is something, either distinct, or not distinct. If not distinct: therefore, this is not a distinct person, but rather it is from nature. But if it is distinct, it is either a property, or a person. Not a property: because a property is in a person, not from a person: and distinguishing, not distinguished: therefore, it remains that it is a person: and thus I have the proposition in two conclusions of the intent: one of which is that the Holy Spirit is a person. The second is that the mode of His procession is not the mode of the procession of the Son.

because they are one in nature. And if I ask you, Why is the Son of the same nature with the Father? you will say because He is begotten from the Father: and what is born, by being born receives the nature of Him from whom He is born. Now I ask further, If the Father and the Son can have any communication besides nature? Prove that they can: because it is so among those who are of the same nature, that in the society of life each gives to the other of his own in love and friendship: therefore, the Father distinct from His own can give to the Son, and conversely: but that is love: therefore, love is distinct between the Father and the Son, and as they are distinct, not however as they are one in nature: but that which the Father thus gives, is either from the Father distinct, or from Him as He communicates in nature with the Son. If in the first way: then I have the proposition: because then love is from the Father and the Son, and is distinguished from their persons more than the Son from the Father. If in the second way: therefore, that love does not proceed from the proper of the Father, and from the proper of the Son: and thus the Father and the Son will be less deficient in loving than I and you: because I can bestow love on you from my own, and you on me. If perhaps you say that that love is not a person: this is nothing, because this was proven above. But if you say that that love is in the Father by the virtue of the divine essence, and thus is not proper: this again is nothing: because even the power of generating is in the Father by the virtue of the essence: and yet to generate is proper to the Father, and not to the essence: therefore, although the spirative power of love is in the Father and the Son by reason of the essence, nevertheless to love which says the exit of this love from both, will be proper and distinctive: so also in me and you the power of loving each other is in us by the virtue of the common nature to me and you: and yet to love each other is proper to me and you.

1. Likewise, in the lower noble nature I see a double mode of procession: na-

For nature proceeds into communication through the act of generation, which, due to imperfection, is from potentiality to act: but the will of one proceeds into another through love, which process, due to the imperfection of nature, is accidental: since, therefore, the inferior nature is exemplified by the superior, it seems that these two processes are more noble in the superior nature: therefore, there will be generation there without the transition from potentiality to act, and there will be the procession of love without accidental nature: and thus, just as the Son is generated according to substance from the Father, so the Spirit proceeds according to substance from both: and yet one mode is not the other.

1. Likewise, of whatever processes the proper principles are different, they themselves are different: but the principle of love is the will, the principle of generation is nature: therefore, the procession of the Holy Spirit differs from the generation of the Son, just as will and nature differ. If perhaps you say that in God the will is the same as nature, it is not an instance: because it was proven above that although such attributes are the same in God, yet they are not synonymous, and they differ in relation to acts: but here I take nature as nature is the principle of generation, and the will as the principle is love, therefore the induced reasoning proceeds without the impediment of an instance.
2. Likewise, since there are two communions in a noble nature, one to being, the other to well-being, both will have something corresponding in God, since both are of nobility: but that which is to well-being in a noble creature differs from that which is to being in the communicated thing, and in the mode of communication: because the thing communicated in one is the essence of nature, but the thing communicated in the other is love: since therefore there is complete simplicity in the superior, if those communications are inferred in the divine, it is necessary that they do not differ in the nature of the thing, but in mode: because otherwise they would not be two: therefore, in the divine, the mode of the procession of the Son differs from the mode of the procession of the Holy Spirit: and yet that which is communicated in both modes will be substantially one, which is nature or substance: and this is true.

3. Likewise, it is objected by similitudes: for we see a likeness in the human and angelic mind, which is the image of the Trinity, that one is the process of knowledge from the mind, and another is the process of love: and yet the same thing is loved and known, as the substance of the mind: therefore, similarly it will be in the divine.
4. Likewise, we see from the sun proceed light and a ray, and in the ray from the same sun proceed a vivifying power: since therefore the Spirit gives life, and the Son infuses the light of knowledge, it is clear that both these arise in a different way, yet together from the divine sun.
5. Likewise, the mode of proceeding as the nexus of distinct things is not the same as the mode of proceeding as distinct: but every Son, whether in God or in nature, proceeds from the Father as distinct, but every love proceeds as connecting the distinct: therefore, the mode of procession of these two is not the same.

Solution. It must be said that in truth the procession of the Holy Spirit differs from the generation of the Son: and the middle of these last reasons shows the number and reason of the differences: and there are in total seven differences that can be collected.

The first is on the part of the principle from which: because one is from the power of generating in the Father, but the other from the spirative power: which, although they do not differ according to the thing, yet they are truly and not synonymously in God.

The second is what Augustine touches on here, that the Son is from one, but the Holy Spirit is from two: not as from a father and a mother, but as from one and the same reason of power spirating him.

The third is because the procession of the Holy Spirit is from the communion of the consensus of the Father and the Son as distinct: but the Son is according to the communication of nature: which, although again in God they are the same in thing and subject, yet this identity does not impede the diversity of mode in proceeding: because identity is caused by the attribute of simplicity and does not take away the proper reason from each communication.

The fourth is according to those proceeding: because the Son proceeds as distinct in being, but the Holy Spirit in the mode of well-being of the distinct: which, however, does not take away the perfection of nature from him: because in the divine whatever is through well-being or being, is all perfect in substance and hypostasis: and therefore Augustine also says that the Spirit is the joy and delight of the two.

The fifth is again taken from the part of those who proceed: because the Son signifies the reason of receiving nature, but the Holy Spirit signifies the reason of receiving and connecting those from whom he receives, as was determined above.

The sixth is taken according to the aptitude of those proceeding: because the Son, by the fact that he is a son, signifies nothing but a relation to the Father: and therefore does not posit an aptitude for being given, since he is from nature, but an aptitude for being bestowed upon: but the Holy Spirit, by the fact that he proceeds as love from the liberality of the Father, posits an aptitude for being given: and therefore Augustine says that from eternity he proceeds as donable: for the gift is of the Father and the Son which they bestow upon each other with gratuitous love: it is also further donable to us although it is never given.

The seventh difference is what Augustine also touches on in book XIV of the Trinity, that love is in the mind, not as born, but as spirated: because its appetite is indeed tenuous in the mind, even before it generates its knowledge: which appetite, however, becomes love of the already born knowledge: and therefore it is rather the union of parent and offspring than born: and this difference of Augustine is founded on this, that uniting some two, it is necessarily distinguished from both: and therefore love, which is the union of parent and offspring, will necessarily not have the name and reason of parent, nor will it have the name and reason of offspring.

Having these, it must be responded to the objections in order.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that between genus taken as genus and species no difference is assigned: because genus and species are according to the thing more reasons of agreement than differences, although according to these names species and genus, which are names of second intention, are opposed relatively, as Porphyry says: but between species and genus placed for species and in place of species, a difference is assigned: and so it is here: because procession expresses the special mode of the emanation of the Holy Spirit. Nor is there force here from species and genus: but whatever community of those things which are not converted to each other, is called the habit of genus and species: because in the divine there is not species and genus, as will be shown below.

To the other it must be said that in this way taken to proceed, as has been said, to proceed and to be born differ in species: and this objection is founded on a falsehood.

Moreover, it is also false that numerical differences always differ by matter: because the Philosopher says that number is also made by the difference of cause and caused without matter, just as there is number also in intelligent agents according to ten orders, which according to the Philosophers are caused by the first intelligence which is God. Or, if this seems extraneous, then let us rely on the word of Damascene saying that difference is the cause of number, and the number of persons will be the cause of the distinction of persons: and just as we say numbered things differ, so we say the cause of number differs and therefore just as distinct persons differ by the number of persons, so the distinguishing properties differ by the number of properties. However, I concede well that in no one person or in two or three are there two different properties only in number, and not in species of properties: because there are not two paternities, nor two filiations, nor two innascibilities, and so of others.

To the objection it must be said that that which is the principle of agreement is not the principle of distinction: just as that which is proven of many is the principle of agreement of many concerning that: but this way is not taken here, when the difference between generation and procession is sought, but rather the word proceeding specially expresses the emanation of the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said that if we speak from the proper, as it is necessary in the divine, then the emanation of the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the emanation of the Son, both as to the principle from which, and as to the terminus into which, and as to the emanation itself. For the principle from which is the procession of the Holy Spirit, is the spirative power, or the consensus of the Father and the Son: but the principle from which generation is per se from the Father, is the generative power as generative. Similarly, the terminus into which, as it can be taken in the divine, in one part is the Son, and in the other is personal love, or the gift of the Father and the Son. The mode of emanation of one is generation, of the other is notional love or spiration.

To what is objected concerning the reason of the image, it must be said that it is well conceded that this does not operate much for distinction.

To what is further objected against, that the flow of the Spirit is substantial and from substance and into substance, it must be said that it does not impede the assigned difference: because that which in the divine is by the grace of the simplicity of nature, does not take away the proper from the persons: but if it did take away, then the objection would proceed. For although the Father is truly the divine nature, and the Son is truly the divine nature, yet the Father is not the Son: and although generation is truly the divine nature, and procession is truly the divine nature, yet generation is not spiration or procession in this way said, nor is the mode of generation the mode of procession: and this happens because from the substance from which the Son proceeds, the Holy Spirit does not proceed in the same mode of signifying; but the Son is from it according to what is the generative power in the Father, but the Holy Spirit is from it according to what is the spirative power in the Father and the Son: and this is what Dionysius says in the book on Divine Names, where he says thus: There is also a distinction in the supersubstantial theologian: not which I said only that according to the very union immixed and unconfused each of the principal persons is placed: but that also those things which are of the supersubstantial fecundity of God, are not converted to each other. From this it is taken that in the unity and simplicity of nature there are distinctions of persons and properties immixed and unconfused, and they are not converted to each other because of the simplicity of nature: because, as Dionysius says there, the only substantial fountain of deity is the Father, nor is the Son the Father, nor the Father the Son, preserving the hymns the proper religiously of the thearchic persons. Therefore, the proper are not converted over themselves from the simplicity of essence: and therefore although substance is love, substance is the Son, and substance is the power of spirating, and substance is the power of generating, and substance is generation, substance is also spiration: it does not follow that generation and spiration do not differ from each other: just as it does not follow, Substance is the Father, and the same substance is the Son: therefore, the Father and the Son are not distinguished from each other.

To what is objected, whether they differ in this way, that the Son signifies according to the reason of generation a flow in similar species and nature, but the Spirit does not: it must be said that the Holy Spirit is not in similar nature and substance and reason as the Son, although they differ in mode of signifying and property, as is clear from the prehabited.

To the other it must be said that in inferiors there is potentiality and its exit to act which is motion or change or both: and the terminus is in which motion is in motion to be, or changed to be: and such is not to be posited in the divine. And if you say that according to the reason of understanding spiration is the Spirit, just as generation is the Son: although it is not generation producing the Son from non-Son, nor spiration producing the Spirit from non-Spirit: then I say well that the Spirit and the Son are distinguished, because one proceeds as love, but the other as son: and thus their emanations are denominated from them, namely spiration from the Spirit, and generation from the Son. And if you object that in both there is the acceptance of substance, this has already been solved: because this does not impede distinction.

To the other it must be said that in inferior nature there is not communication in whole and perfect: for the generating communicates nature through generation, and divides a part, nor does it give the whole: and it gives the very thing it gives, in material potentiality, from which, however, a similar in species can be made, and not having the same nature in number with the giver: and this is of great imperfection: for every nature which can communicate itself the same in number and species, does this much more willingly than it communicates itself in species only. And the proof of this is: because if in communication the safety and permanence of nature which is instilled through appetite in each one is sought, permanence is sought much more intensely in the same nature in number than in the same species: and this experiment teaches everyone, as the Apostle says to the Romans, viii, 22. And further, I to the Corinthians, v, 4: For we who are in this tabernacle, that is, body, groan being burdened, because we do not wish to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon, that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life. Similarly, if the joy of society in multiple hypostases is sought, it is greater in those joined in the same nature in number, because those hypostases cannot dissent from themselves, than in the same species and not in number: and therefore since in inferiors this best communication of nature cannot be, that is sought which is possible after it for inferior nature, namely that it be communicated in species. Similarly, inferior nature when it communicates intimate affection, would willingly in affection wish that its substance proceeds into the one whom it loves as itself, and in the love itself the substance would be: but because of materiality and ignobility this cannot be: and therefore the two imperfect modes of communicating in inferiors are in the superior nature according to perfect reason, namely the communication of nature, so that the begotten and the begetter are in the same nature: and the communication of consensus, so that the consensus itself is substance and suppositum: hence that in inferior nature there is only one mode of communication of nature, this is from imperfection, as has been shown.

To the other it must be said that although of one reason is the communication of suppositum, it is not necessary that the same is distinguishing supposita: for this is in no nature, that the same property which by conferring singularity supposes this nature, is also conferring singularity to another which underlies the same nature: and therefore that objection was sophistical, as if from the reason of suppositum one reason of distinguishing supposita could be had.

To the other it must be said that this is nothing to ask, whether these modes differ by substantial or accidental difference: just as it is not anything to say in the divine, whether persons differ by substantial or accidental differences: because discourses are to be inquired according to matter: hence it must be said that they differ by properties which are not accidents, but because of complete simplicity they are substance: yet they are not substantial differences, because they do not make differ according to substance and essence, which is one in number in the divine, but they make persons be distinguished by their properties: and the properties themselves are distinguished by themselves, because otherwise it would go into infinity.

To the other it must be said that this is true, that there is no distinction in the divine except through relations of origin: but it has already been shown that the reason of origin in the divine is not one, but double: for the Father is the origin of the Son through generation, and the Father and the Son are the origin of the Holy Spirit through procession: and it has been shown that in a nature of complete perfection the communication of love has joined to it the communication of nature in the love itself and gift.

To what is objected against the similitudes introduced, it must be said that each similitude is quite good, provided it is understood properly: for as we said above from the authority of Hilary, the comparison of earthly things to God is none: and if we sometimes bring examples, let no one think they contain in themselves the perfection of reason. Hence we say that from the sun is light, and heat: but heat is said equivocally to the heat of the element, and the heat of the sun: for unless there were heat from the sun, the Philosopher would not say in book XVI of Animals, that seed moves by the heat of the sky, and the heat of the element, and the heat of the soul: but it is true that that heat, as I said, is not of one reason with the heat of inferiors: for just as motion according to place is referred to the first immobile, so it is necessary that all altering is referred to the first altering, not moved according to altering quality: for every true alteration is reduced to the alteration of the primary qualities, and the alteration of the primary qualities to the elements, and these further to the virtues of the stars which alter and are not altered, as the Philosopher says in the book on the Nature of the World. But it is true that in this the similitude fails, that to one simple essence of the sun light and heat cannot be reduced: because as Dionysius says, the caused receive the goodness of the cause in an inferior mode than it is in the cause itself. And therefore one in number which is in the sun operating these two signifies as much as it can also one simple in the divine nature.

In the same way I say to what is objected against the similitude taken from fire: because at least in inferior fire one species of fire is light, as the Philosopher says, and one fire is shining and heating, although not with simple virtue. But because by eminence we rise from the caused to the cause, we understand the procession of persons to be in a simple nature in the Creator.

To the other it must be said that this is not true, If generation and spiration in the divine differ, that they differ substantially, nor even accidentally: for it has been shown above that in the divine there are not those proper differences: but there is there a property which is substance: hence generation which is substance, differs from procession which is substance, and yet they do not differ substantially: and the reason for this was clear above.

To the other it must be said that the first proposition is true, although some bring instances which we have posited, and some wishing to evade it bring an instance in Eve, who did not receive human nature through generation. But the instance is none: because the miracles of God do not vary anything in the natural habits of predicates to their subjects in propositions. Therefore conceding the first, we say that this which in inferiors is only one mode of communication of nature, and not communication of nature through love and whom we love, this is of imperfection, as has been shown above: which if it is removed, and another which is of nobility is attributed to God, the proposition will be true: and yet in God there will be a double mode of communication of nature through the consensus of wills, and through generation.

To what is objected, that this communication is not according to the spirituality which is an attribute of the divine nature, as much as I can understand, it seems to be conceded. But I concede well that it is according to the spirituality which is the spirative power, as has been determined above.

To what is asked, Whether it is primarily and per se of nature or spirituality, or spirit, it must be said that in the divine nothing is prior, and nothing is posterior: but according to the intentions of names by which emanation is signified, the spirative power per se posits reason to spirit in that it is spirit or love: but everything that proceeds in the divine from a distinct person, is perfect in substance and distinct, therefore by the identity of hypostasis with such a reason of love, that love which proceeds is a perfect and distinct hypostasis: and this seems to be the intention of Augustine in book VI of the Trinity, where he says thus: The Spirit is something common of the Father and the Son, whatever it is: but the very communion, consubstantial and coeternal is: which if it can be conveniently called friendship, let it be called, but more aptly it is called charity: and this also is substance, because God is substance, and God is charity!, Here he intimates that by the intention of the name of the spirative power per se the procession of love is posited: but because everything is perfect which is in the divine, therefore love is substance and a perfect hypostasis: and therefore it seems to be conceded that production per se is spirit, and because of the perfection of the divine nature and the identity of substance with love, the spirit produced is a perfect person: and this is the fourth of the six modes which the objection touches.

To what is objected against, it must be said that immediate and mediate is not in the divine: but I concede well that according to the reason of understanding by the name, the spirative power per se is to the spirit: and this is act not terminus, but as terminus: and this can well be in the divine, where there is a double communication of nature, as we have said: just as when I say, I love that which proceeds per se from me, in the act of the word love is signified.

And what is objected, that to the act of communication of nature the hypostasis is immediate as it is this substance, it must be said that this is true in the act in which nature is communicated in nature, that is, in generation: but in the other mode of communication it is not true: but rather it is the converse.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be The Son Of Both From Whom He Proceeds

Whether the Holy Spirit can be called the Son of both from whom He proceeds?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the first chapter, there, "And the Holy Spirit would be called the Son, He would certainly be called the Son of both," etc.

For this reasoning does not seem to hold: because although He does not proceed from both, there will still be a difference between generation and procession: and Augustine ought to have assigned that.

If you say that even if He does not proceed from both, nevertheless the Spirit would be called of both, just as the Greeks say He is the Spirit of the Son, but not from the Son: and thus it would follow that if He were the Son, He would be the Spirit of the Son. On the contrary: Because this would be true when it is said, "Spirit of the Son," the genitive would be construed in the relation of efficient cause or principle, and it could not have another construction.

To this it must be said that Augustine's objection is founded upon necessary reasoning and upon the authority of the canon. However, the necessary reasoning is placed above, where it was proven that the Holy Spirit proceeds from two. That authority is held in Romans 9, where the Apostle says in the relation of efficient cause: and this was proven above, where it was asked if it is the same for the Spirit to be of the Son and from the Son.

The Apostle says the Spirit is the Spirit of the Son. And I well concede that according to truth it cannot have construction except in...

Articulus 3 — Whether Procession Is Of The Notion Of Generation And Spiration, And Why The Name Procession Pertains More To The Holy Spirit Than To The Son

Whether procession is of the nature of generation and spiration? And why the name of procession remains more with the Holy Spirit than with the Son?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the second chapter B, there, "But when the Spirit is not said to be begotten," etc.

For from what Augustine says there, it seems that procession is of the nature of generation and spiration: for it is predicated of them, and not convertibly:

either therefore as being of their nature, or as not being of their nature. If you say as being of their nature, I have the proposition, that it is said univocally. But if you say, that as not being of their nature, then it agrees with them accidentally: and this is false: because accident is not in the divine.

But if it is granted, that it is predicated as a genus, it is asked why the name remains more with the Holy Spirit than with the Son?

Likewise, if it is a genus, it follows that the universal and particular are in the divine, which is repugnant to the supremely simple, as Boethius says.

Solution. As determined above

I say, that neither as a genus, nor as an accident, is anything predicated in the divine neither of essence nor of person nor of notion: but indeed something is predicated in the divine as signified with a more common intention than that of which it is predicated: for although in the divine the same thing is always in the predicate and subject, yet there is another mode of signifying: and therefore the distinction thus made does not hold, if it is predicated, that it is predicated as being of the nature of the subject, or it is predicated as not being of the nature of the subject: because those two are not opposed as contraries: but thus it is to be divided, it is predicated as being, etc., or it is not predicated as being, etc. I concede this, it is not predicated as being, etc. In that sense which is denied, it includes the whole predicate and the determination of the predicate.

But if it is asked, How is it predicated? It must be said that it is predicated as the same under another intention of signifying.

To that which is asked, Why does the Holy Spirit retain the name? it has been answered above, and it has been asked. But this can be said, that it retains it because when procession is said in inferiors in two ways, namely in a processive motion, and in the egress of the caused from the cause, the emanation of the Holy Spirit places some similarity to both, as has been proven above: but the emanation of the Son places similarity only to one, namely to the exit of the caused from the cause.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is From The Father Not As Born, But As Given Or As A Gift, And Whether The Son Proceeds As A Gift

Whether the Holy Spirit is from the Father not as born, but as given, or as a gift: and whether the Son proceeds as a gift?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

He proceeds from the Father not as born, but as given or as a gift, etc.

For this does not seem true.

1. For the nature of what is given and of a gift does not seem to be immediate to the procession or to the one proceeding: but rather it seems to be consequent according to the understanding of the one who proceeds: for each thing is first in itself, than in comparison to another: therefore the proceeding Holy Spirit is first Spirit in itself, than it is compared to another: but given and gift imply a comparison to the giver and to the one to whom it is given: therefore it seems that these follow the one proceeding, and thus Augustine says nothing:

1. Likewise, Given and gift is the Holy Spirit in time: but the temporal is not the nature of the eternal: therefore since the procession is eternal by which the Holy Spirit proceeds, it does not seem to proceed as given or as a gift.

Solution. It must be said that he proceeds as a gift: for it has been proven that he proceeds as gratuitous love: but the nature of gratuitous love in that which is gratuitous, is the primary nature of the gift which is given: because whatever is given mutually by those who love, gratuitous love is prior to that and the cause of that: and therefore Augustine says that the love which is the Holy Spirit, is the gift in which all gifts are given.

But it must be said from the perspective that in this procession there is something other than in that.

which is of nature as nature is: because what is first there, this here is added by identity: whence the gift of love proceeds here by itself, which nevertheless is a perfect person on account of the perfection of the divine nature and the identity of simplicity: and this was proven above in the first question of this reading.

Ap unico dicendum, that the gift said from the act of giving is fitting to the Spirit in time, but said from aptitude it is fitting to Him from eternity.

But it does not seem that Augustine's distinction holds: because even the Son proceeds as a gift. As Isaiah 9:6 says: "For a child is born to us, and a son is given to us." But nothing is given in time unless it was giftable from eternity.

Therefore, the Son proceeded from eternity as giftable.

Solution. It must be said that the Son does not proceed as a gift: because the notion of generation does not express the notion of the first gift, like gratuitous love, but expresses the notion of the first existing: and therefore the Master says below, that the Son proceeded from eternity, not as a gift, but as one who could be given, because He is from another: and therefore He could have the one giving and sending Him. And therefore the objection holds concerning the Son which was first made, and concerning the Holy Spirit, that the notion of gift follows the being of the Son according to understanding: but the notion of gift is of the very notion of the procession of the Holy Spirit, as love is, and proceeds from those who love.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Twelve Modes Of Generation Posited By The Heretic Arius Are Sufficiently Posited, And Whether Others Are Also To Be Added

Whether the twelve modes of generation posited by Arius the heretic are sufficiently posited: whether also others are to be added?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "Among the true generation of the Son," etc.

I take the twelve modes of generation which Arius, disputing against Victorinus, introduced, who although he was a heretic, nevertheless the modes are notable and good.

The first is according to the flow of a line from a point, if by its motion it could make a line.

The second is according to the emission of a ray from the sun or another luminous body.

The third is according to the sealing of a character, as a figure is made in wax by a seal.

The fourth is according to the infusion, as when from God a good will is infused into a man.

The fifth is according to the exit of a property or accident from the principle of the subject.

The sixth is according to the abstraction of an intention from this particular, as the species of things are generated in the soul.

The seventh is according to the excitation, as free will excited by grace or another proceeds into the generation of acts.

The eighth is according to the transfiguration, as from bronze a statue is made, and as a figure in the figure of an incision.

The ninth is according to the production: as motion proceeds from the first immobile.

The tenth is according to the exit of a species from generation through the exit of differences dividing the genus and constituting the species.

The eleventh is according to ideation, as the external ark is from the ark which is in the mind of the ark-maker, and the health of this cured one is from the health which is in the soul of the physician.

The twelfth is according to birth, as a human son is born from a human father.

However, it is clear that that heretic does not enumerate all modes of generation: because many are born from putrefaction, and from vegetables, especially from the power of the stars which he did not touch upon: and therefore it was insufficient: and therefore he is reproved by Victorinus, and it is shown that none of these generations has a full likeness to the divine generation.

Articulus 6 — Whether This Is To Be Granted, That The Father Is The Author That The Holy Spirit Proceeds From The Son, And That The Father Is The Author Of The Son's Filiation, And That He Is The Author Of The Essence In The Son

Whether it should be conceded that the Father is the author of the fact that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, and that the Father is the author of the filiation of the Son, and that He is the author of the essence in the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there,
Since the Father is the author of the procession, who begot such a Son, etc.

1. Therefore, that the Spirit proceeds from the Son, the Father is the author: but He is not the author except by generating: therefore it seems that the Father, by generating, is the author of the procession of the Holy Spirit: but of whatever the Father is the author by generating, that is the Son:

therefore it seems that the Holy Spirit is the Son, which is false.

1. Likewise, of whatever the Father is the author by generating, He begot that: He is the author of the procession by generating: therefore He begot the procession, or at least begot it in the Son.
2. Likewise, can this also be conceded, that the Father is the author of the filiation of the Son? It seems so: because if filiation is in the Son, this is through the generation of the Father: therefore it seems that He is the author of the filiation of the Son.
3. Likewise, can this also be conceded, that the Father is the author of the essence in the Son? It seems so: because He is the author that the essence is in the Son: therefore He is the author of the essence of the Son.
4. But, of whatever the Father is the author, He is distinguished from that: but the Father is the author of the essence of the Son: therefore He is distinguished from the essence of the Son: but from whatever He is distinguished, this is not predicated affirmatively of Him: therefore the Father is not the essence of the Son, which is false.
5. By the same reasoning, it is proven that the Father is not the processive power or procession by which the Spirit proceeds from the Son: for if He is the author of that (as Augustine says), then He is distinguished from it: and from whatever He is distinguished, this is not predicated affirmatively of Him: because the distinct and that from which it is distinguished are opposed relatively in the divine: therefore the Father is not the principle of spiration which is in the Son. Which is false: because the person is its property: whence since the same property in number is in the Father and the Son for spirating the Holy Spirit, the Father is the principle of the Holy Spirit which is in the Son: and from this it seems further to follow a conclusion which seems most absurd in the divine, that of whatever the Father is the author, this is from Him: and if He Himself is that of which He is the author, He Himself is that which is from Him: which above was considered heresy.

Solution. It must be said that the Father is the author of the Son, and of all those things which are in the Son as they are in the Son: and I well concede that of all those things which are in the Son, the Father is the author through generation or by generating.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that argument does not follow: for if I grant this, the Father by generating is the author of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son: it does not follow that He Himself is the author by generating the Holy Spirit: but it follows that He by generating is the author that the Spirit proceeds from the Son, and this is true.

To the other, it must be said that this is false, of whatever the Father is the author by generating, He begot that: nor does it hold in human matters: because the father is the author of the heart of the son by generating, yet he did not beget the heart, but the son: for the act of generation of the person is only of the hypostasis, and other things are made in the hypostasis: but authority regards all things whatsoever either per se and primarily, or per accidens and consequently are had through generation: whence He neither begot the procession per se, nor begot the procession in the Son: but He begot the Son who by being born received the procession, as all other things in which it is not opposed relatively to the Father.

To the other, it must be said that the Father is the author of the filiation of the Son, and this by generating: yet He did not beget the filiation, as has already been said.

To the other, it must be said that the Father is not the author of the essence in the Son: but I well concede this, that the Father is the author, that and because, or why the essence is in the Son: because although authority is with respect to all things which are in the begotten, yet it is not with respect to those things which in some way relate to generation as terms, whether per se or through another, whether primarily or consequently: but the essence, neither in itself, nor in another person, relates in any way as being from another: but the essence in the Son is not essence according to the mode of understanding, but rather the reception of essence, and the mode of having it: and therefore that can in some way be referred to the authority of generation.

To the other, it must be said that authority is the cause of distinction, in the way it is referred to the generated or to the begotten: but it is referred to the begotten universally, not primarily, nor per se: whence it is not the cause of distinction simply, but in a certain respect: for example, when it is said, the Father is the author that the essence is in the Son, it does not follow that the Father is distinct from the essence, or from the essence in the Son: because in neither way is He the author of the essence: but it follows from this, that the essence is in the Son, this has from the Father: and in one way the Father has the essence, and in another way the Son: because the Father has it not from another, but the Son has it from another.

To the last, it must be said that the Father is the author of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son as it is from the Son: but from this, as has already been held, it does not follow that the same active procession is not in the Father, but that the Father does not have it in the same way as the Son has it: and this is true: because the Father has it from Himself, and the Son has it from the Father: and this distinction is in the mode of having, not in that which is had.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then it is asked concerning those three things which he touches upon, namely, "I do not know," "I am not able," "I am not sufficient," etc.

How do they differ? For it seems to be a repetition of the same thing.

And it must be said to this, that "not to know" indicates a lack of habit in knowing; "I am not able," however, indicates a lack of reason for the understanding of divine things; "I am not sufficient," however, indicates the obscurity which remains even after the illumination of faith, on account of the obscurity of the mirror and enigma.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Inference Is Valid: The Spirit Proceeds Temporally From The Son; Therefore From Eternity

Whether it follows well, the Spirit proceeds temporally from the Son: therefore from eternity?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

To signify also proceeding from himself, he would openly show by breathing, etc.

For the argument does not seem to hold from temporal procession to eternal: because the Greeks concede that he is sent by the Son; yet they would not concede that he proceeds from the Son.

Solution. The argument is good: because as will be proven below, eternal procession is signified in the temporal: for to be sent is to be known that it is from another through an effect appropriable to the person: and therefore if it is signified to proceed temporally from the Son himself, of necessity also from eternity it proceeds from him: and this will be shown below.

Divisio Textus

Now it must be considered, etc. Here begins the second part of this distinction, in which it is shown that the Holy Spirit ought not to be called unbegotten. And it is divided into four parts; in the first of which it is shown through Augustine that the Spirit is not called unbegotten. Secondly, through Jerome it is shown that it is called unbegotten, at the place, F, "Jerome, however," etc. In the third, he resolves the contradiction of these, at the place, G, "But to this which seems," etc. In the fourth, he proves the solution, at the place, H, "That Jerome understood it thus," etc.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Unbegotten

Whether the Holy Spirit can be said to be unbegotten?

A doubt arises concerning the first chapter, whether the Holy Spirit can be said to be unbegotten?

It seems that it can.

1. For the Sophists give as a rule, that a proposition with an infinite predicate is equivalent to a negative, as "this is not a man" and "this is a non-man": therefore, since this is true, "the Holy Spirit is not begotten," it also seems that this is true, "the Holy Spirit is unbegotten."
2. Likewise, the Holy Spirit is either unbegotten or not unbegotten. If it is unbegotten, I have the proposition. But if it is not unbegotten, then it is not non-begotten: but this is equivalent to "is begotten": therefore, since this is false, "is not non-begotten" will also be false: therefore, this too, "is not unbegotten": therefore, that was true, "is unbegotten": and Augustine denies this.
3. Furthermore, it is given as a rule, that if two terms relate as superior and inferior, and both are negated, or conjoined with negation, the inferior becomes superior, and vice versa: for example, man and animal relate such that man is inferior to animal: but non-man is superior to non-animal, since non-man can be said of more things than non-animal. Therefore, by similarity, since being from another and begotten relate as superior and inferior; if negation is conjoined to them, unbegotten will be verified of more things than not being from another. But not being from another is verified of one, namely the Father: therefore, unbegotten is verified of at least two: therefore, it will be said of the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said with Damascene, that what I say unbegotten is said in two ways: for he says thus: "It must be known that unbegotten, written with one 'n', signifies the same as not made. Unbegotten, written with two 'n's, shows that it is not generated: and he says that in the first sense, begotten and not begotten distinguish between natures, namely created and uncreated: because the divine nature is unbegotten, that is, uncreated, according to which begotten is said from genesis, that is, from creation. However, unbegotten in the second meaning is common to both created and uncreated nature: because someone in the divine nature is unbegotten, as the Father alone, as Damascene says, and some others even in created nature are said to be unbegotten, such as the first individuals of all animals, that is, individuals which are not born, but made by condition, like the first two donkeys, and the first two lions, and the first two humans, and so on.

However, note that according to the property of the Latin language, this distinction does not exist: because unbegotten with two 'n's signifies nothing in the Latin language: but what is not generated, we say unbegotten. And therefore it must be said otherwise, that unbegotten can receive the preposition in two ways, namely in the force of privation, and in the force of negation. If it receives it in the force of privation, then it will not be said except of the unborn, yet apt for this, that it be born or generated: and thus it can be said neither of the Father, nor of the Holy Spirit, nor even of the Son. But if it receives the preposition in the force of negation, then it can negate negation outside the genus, or in the genus. If outside the genus: then unbegotten is as much as non-begotten being, or non-being begotten simply: and thus it is universally verified of all not from others or existing from another: and also of those which are from another or from others, provided they are not by generation from another or from others. But if it negates in the genus of divine nature: it can still make a triple negation, namely that the negation only negates the genus of generation, or only the generation itself leaving the genus, or both together. For example, the genus of generation is being from another: therefore, the sense can be, unbegotten, that is, not being from another: so that the negation stops there: and in this sense Augustine takes it in the first chapter of this part: and thus it is fitting only to the Father. Or the sense can be, unbegotten, that is, being from another not by generation: and thus the negation does not end except at the species of the begotten, and not at the genus: and thus it is fitting only to the Holy Spirit: but in this sense none of the Saints used this expression. In the third way, the negation can be understood to end at the whole which is in the begotten, that is, at being from another by generation together and conjointly, so that unbegotten is the same as not being from another by generation: and it commonly fits the Father and the Holy Spirit: and in this sense Jerome takes it.

Therefore, having this distinction, it must be answered to the first, that when it is said that a proposition with an infinite predicate is equivalent to a negative, infinite and privative are not taken as the same. For non-begotten is not the same as unbegotten, nor conversely, except in a certain sense, as has already been said. Hence, although Augustine concedes that the Spirit is non-begotten, according to which the negation negates the whole that begotten posits: he would not concede, however, that it is unbegotten: because this properly fits the Father, and is a notion of the Father according to which the negation negates only the genus of the begotten, that is, being from another: because thus it fits only the Father.

To the other, it must be said that the Holy Spirit is unbegotten, and is not unbegotten in different senses, as has already been shown, and therefore the solution to that is also clear.

To the other, it must be said that unbegotten, according to which the understood negation negates the whole, becomes superior to not being from another: but in that sense Augustine does not use it, but Jerome, as has already been said.

Articulus 9 — Whether Not To Be From Another Is A Notion Of The Father, And Whether The Father And The Son Can Be Said To Be The Same Principle Of The Holy Spirit

Whether not being from another is a notion of the Father, and whether the Father and the Son can be said to be the same principle of the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

The Father, he says, alone is not from another, etc.

1. For if not being from another is a notion of the Father, it seems also by opposition, being from another is a notion of the Son and the Holy Spirit, which is false: therefore neither is not being from another a notion of the Father.
2. Likewise, just as the Father is unbegotten, so also He is unprocessible: therefore it seems that this ought to be His notion, just as unbegottenness.
3. Furthermore, just as to be unbegotten in one sense belongs to the Father and the Holy Spirit, so to be unprocessible belongs to the Father and the Son: why then is it not posited to be one of the properties of the Father and the Son in common, just as Jerome posits unbegotten to belong in common to the Father and the Holy Spirit? If you say that this is hindered by commonality: because what is common does not have the intention of the proper: because the proper is what belongs to one alone. This is nothing: because active spiration according to which the Father and the Son are one principle of the Holy Spirit, is common to the Father and the Son: and yet it is a notion: therefore the reason of commonality does not impede the understanding of the notion.

It is further asked, if we say the Father and the Son are a principle through one notion, whether we can concede that they are the same principle?

1. It seems that they are: because they are a principle: therefore they are either the same principle or a different one: because the same and different follow every being insofar as it is a being: but the Father and the Son are not a different principle of the Holy Spirit: therefore they are the same.

2. On the contrary: Above, the Master did not wish to concede concerning the Father and the Son, that they were the same God, or another God: yet he conceded that they were one God: therefore since the union of the Father and the Son in the common notion by which they breathe the Holy Spirit is not greater than in the divine essence, it seems that it should not be conceded that they are the same principle, or another or different.

Solution. It must be said to the first question, that three things are required for the being of a notion: one of which is principal from which also the term of the notion is derived, namely that through it the person is made known, or the person of whom it is a notion, or of whom it is a notion. The second is that it sounds some dignity: because the name of person sounds dignity, whether of nature or of office: but commonly it sounds the dignity of nature: hence we do not call individuals of other natures besides the rational persons, like this wood, or this stone, because they do not have the honor of the image in which is the likeness of the divine persons. The third is that it somehow has the nature of relation to another: because other properties in the divine cannot be, except relations of origin, as will be proven below.

With these things established, it is easy to respond to the objections.

To the first, it must be said that being from another does not pertain to dignity from itself: and therefore it cannot be a notion. I say from itself: because from some added mode, it could denote the dignity of being a being from another; which in lower things belongs to vile things, like to a hair worm, to a louse: these are examples of Augustine: therefore from itself it does not denote dignity in the person: but if it were added to be from another through generation, then generation would bring dignity to it which it does not have from itself: because the begotten (as Hilary says) is in the honor of the begetter: for the admiration of the honor of the begotten is in the honor of the begetter: and this was established above. But not being from another from itself denotes dignity, both in higher and lower things: because what is not from another, by that very fact is most perfect and most known: and therefore that is a notion of the Father.

To the other, it must be said that unbegottenness is a notion which includes in itself unprocessibility as a part of itself: and this is clear from the distinction placed above concerning what is unbegotten according to which the negation denies the genus of the begotten: because thus it is only a notion of the Father: then unbegottenness is the same as not being from another: and what is not from another, is neither generatively from another, nor even processively from another. Or it may be said, if it pleases, that begotten and processible are related as superior and inferior: therefore if negation or privation comes, what is inferior becomes superior, and conversely: therefore ingeneration or unbegottenness is superior to unprocessibility: and thus in unbegottenness unprocessibility is understood: and this is the solution of some, and it is not valid: because when it is said that through negation the less common becomes more common, it is not understood except of the supposits of which it is said, that this can be predicated of more than that: and not that it is placed in the understanding of that as a part: for although man is a part of animal, and with man posited animal is posited: and similarly with non-animal posited, non-man is posited: yet it is not a part which falls essentially under non-man: just as man under animal by which it is defined.

Furthermore, I pose an objection concerning inspirable, which was posed concerning unprocessible: and then their solution is not valid: but it is necessary to return to the first solution.

To the other, it must be said that unbegotten according to which it commonly belongs to the Father and the Holy Spirit, according to the understanding of Jerome, is not a notion: for thus it only avails as much as not being from another through generation, so that the negation regards the whole conjointly: and this is not dignity, because it is not from another through generation, but very unworthily is from another, as is clear in the examples of Augustine, as the worm is not from another through generation, but from another through putrefaction: and therefore there is no further question concerning processible or inspirable.

To that which is further asked, whether the Father and the Son can be said to be the same principle of the Holy Spirit? Without prejudice I say, that they cannot: and this because of the article which is enclosed in the understanding of what is the same, which denotes the identity of the supposit and person: but the Father and the Son, although they are one God, yet they are not the same God, taking "the same" in the masculine: and similarly although they are one principle, yet they are not the same principle: because they are not the same person, but they themselves two persons are one principle.

To that which is objected against, it must be responded as above, that they are neither the same principle nor different: because different requires the otherness of form which is not there: the same however requires the identity of person which again is not there: and what the Philosopher says, that the same and different follow every being insofar as it is a being, it must be said that he understands of created things, and not of uncreated persons.

Articulus 10 — What ‘Unbegotten’ Predicates When It Is Said, ‘The Holy Spirit Is Unbegotten’: Essence, Person, Or Notion; And By What Community, Namely Either Of Reason Or Of Thing, It Is Said Of The Father And The Son

What does "unbegotten" predicate when it is said, "The Holy Spirit is unbegotten," whether essence, person, or notion? And by what commonality, namely either of reason or of thing, is it said of the Father and the Son?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, in this chapter F, "The Holy Spirit is not the Father, but unbegotten," etc.

What indeed does "unbegotten" predicate when it is said of the Holy Spirit, either essence, or person, or notion? Because there are not multiple in divinity. It is evident that it does not predicate essence: because thus it would equally pertain to the three, which is false. Nor person, as is clear in individuals: for it is evident that it does not predicate the person of the Holy Spirit: because the Holy Spirit is not predicated of the Father, but unbegotten is predicated of him. But if it is said that it predicates notion. On the contrary: There are only five notions, three of the Father and one of them he has with the Son, one of the Son, and one of the Holy Spirit.

Furthermore, when it is commonly said of the Holy Spirit and of the Father, by what commonality is it said? Either of thing, or of reason? If of thing: therefore some one notion is in the Father and the Holy Spirit, just as some one is in the Father and the Son, which is false: since there are only five notions, as the Master will prove below. But if by commonality of reason: therefore there is a universal in the divine, which Boethius denies in the book on the Trinity.

Solution. When "unbegotten" is predicated of the Father and the Holy Spirit, it does not signify a notion, as was proven above, nor essence, nor person; but it is a negation consequent to the mode of existence of the Holy Spirit: just as from the very fact that someone is a man, it follows that he is not a donkey, nor a stone: so from the very fact that the Holy Spirit is spirated, it follows that he is not begotten: and from the very fact that the Father is not from another, it follows that he is not begotten.

To the other it must be said, that it is common of reason, as the consequent negation is common: but that does not posit a substantial or accidental universal: and therefore it does not follow that in the Trinity there is a universal and particular: for from the fact that a man is not a stone, he is not something per se, or per accidens: for affirmation can cause negation, but not conversely negation affirmation: whence from the fact that the Spirit is spirated, he is not begotten, or unbegotten: but it is not converted that from this he is spirated, or something, which is unbegotten, in that reason taking "unbegotten" in which Jerome takes it, as was said above.

Articulus 11 — Why ‘To Be From Another’ And ‘For Another Not To Be From Him’ Are Not Said To Be A Notion Of The Holy Spirit, And Why There Is No Emanation Of Essence

Why being from another and another not being from it is not called the notion of the Holy Spirit: and why there is no emanation of essence?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the last chapter, there, Everything that is, either Here indeed under the unbegotten according to the unbegotten, or begotten, or made, etc.

Jerome comprehends the Holy Spirit.

1. Therefore it is asked, Since being from another, and another not being from it, is fitting to the Holy Spirit, why is that not called the notion of the Holy Spirit?

It seems that it ought to be said: because 2. Not being from another and another being from it, and being from another and another being from it, and being from another and another not being from it, is fitting to the divine persons: and what is fitting to one is not fitting to another: therefore they are fitting as properties: because properties there are, which distinctly pertain to the divine persons; therefore these are properties.

It is asked, Why is there no emanation of essence, since Jerome here touches upon what is made, and what is not made?

1. For in lower things we see that something emanates from a created essence, which is not itself.
2. Further, It seems that essence according to this division of Jerome has a property that determines it: for it is either unbegotten, or begotten, or made: because Jerome comprehends all under these three. It is evident that it is not made, nor begotten: therefore it is unbegotten: therefore it is determined by the property of unbegottenness: but whatever is determined, is distinguished: therefore the divine essence is distinguished.
3. Furthermore, Jerome in this division places the same thing twice, namely that which is not made, nor begotten, but unbegotten: therefore it seems that the same is divided against itself, which cannot be, for man under animal is not divided against man.
4. Again, It seems false to say, when he says, What is made, and born, and reborn, is man: for many men are never reborn, like Gentiles and Jews.

Solution. To this it is easy to solve according to what was determined above.

To the first, it must be said that not being other than something does not imply any dignity; and therefore it cannot be a notion.

To the other, it must be said that concerning the divine persons, some things are said singularly as notions, and some also as negations which follow the mode of existence of notions or persons: and those negations do not imply special notions, as was shown before.

To the question, it must be said that from the divine essence there could not be an emanation of persons: because it is one in three, and that from which there is emanation is distinguished.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that the inferior essence is not simple: and that which it emits is not itself: and this due to complete simplicity cannot pertain to the divine essence.

To the other, it must be said that unbegotten according to the understanding of Jerome does not denote a notion, but a common negation following the mode of existence, as was said before.

To the other, it must be said that Jerome does not place the same thing twice in the division, but in the exemplification he shows that part which is unbegotten and not made, to be verified for two in common: and this can well happen in any division, that something of the dividing is verified for one, and another for two.

To the last, it must be said that Jerome takes rebirth according to aptitude, as is clear in examples: because man is apt to be reborn, but not a brute animal. Or it can be said that he does not speak universally for all, but for some who are Christians.

DISTINCTIO XIV

Divisio Textus

Furthermore, it is diligently to be noted, that it is twofold, etc.

Here begins that part in which it is treated of the temporal procession of the Holy Spirit.

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which this procession is determined according to the comparison to the sender, or to that from which it is. In the second, two modes are determined, namely visible and invisible of this procession: and this begins in distinction XVI, there, Now concerning the Holy Spirit it must be seen, etc. In the third, however, the name consequent to this procession on the part of the one proceeding, which is gift and given, is determined: and this begins in distinction XVII, B, there, Furthermore it is diligently to be considered, when the Holy Spirit is said, etc.

The first of these is subdivided into two: in the first of which it is proved that the Holy Spirit is sent and given by the Father and the Son, and not by men. In the second, however, it is asked, Whether He is sent and given by Himself, or not? and this begins in distinction XV, there, Here it is to be considered, when the Holy Spirit is given to men by the Father, etc.

This distinction which first occurs, is divided into two parts. In the first it is shown that the Spirit is sent by the Father and the Son. In the second it is shown that He is neither sent nor given by men, there, D, Here it is asked, Whether and the virtues of the saints give or can give, etc.

In the former there are three parts through three chapters: in the first of which it is shown, that the procession of the Holy Spirit is twofold, namely eternal and temporal. In the second, it is specially treated of the temporal procession of the Holy Spirit, there, B, Concerning the temporal procession, etc. In the third it is shown, that not only His gifts, but also the Spirit Himself proceeds in the temporal procession, there, C, There are some who say, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Temporal Procession Is

What is temporal procession?

Here before the Letter arises a doubt, What is temporal procession? what is temporal apparition? what is temporal mission? and what is temporal giving? and how does one of these differ from another? and in how many ways does procession occur? and what does temporal procession add over eternal?

Therefore, let it be asked first, What is temporal procession?

1. The Master says here at the beginning of the lesson, that the procession of the Holy Spirit is the bestowal of grace in time. However, this does not seem to be fitting: because grace is created: therefore, in the bestowal of grace, there is no procession of the Holy Spirit.

2. Furthermore, according to this, it seems to follow that the Holy Spirit would be the grace bestowed: because the Holy Spirit is His own procession.

3. Likewise, the procession of this grace, or proceeding in grace of this kind, seems equally to pertain to the whole Trinity. This is proven by Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, where he says thus: Divine action of itself in discretion is a procession fitting to the good of divine union and super-unity, multiplying itself in the plurality of gifts, equally pertaining to every person, it seems that this procession would be of any person. If you say that Dionysius speaks of eternal procession, it is proven false by what follows subsequently in the Letter thus: United indeed are according to divine discretion incomprehensible traditions, substantifications, vivifications, sapientifications, and other gifts of goodness which is the cause of all, according to which they are praised from participations and participants not participatively participated. He speaks of divine attributes, which through connoted many are, and cause them in us. Therefore, since this equally pertains to any person, it seems that proceeding is of any person. But on the contrary: Only he proceeds who is sent: only he is sent who is from another, as Augustine says: therefore, only he proceeds who is from another: therefore, it does not pertain to the Father to proceed.

Solution. It must be said that without doubt to proceed temporally pertains only to the Holy Spirit and the Son, and properly pertains to the Holy Spirit, if we take proceeding as it is divided against generation, as was explained above: and then procession is quite well said to be the manifestation of the Holy Spirit in the bestowal of the gift making pleasing to sanctify the creature: which definition can plainly be gathered here in the first chapter.

To the other, it must be said that although eternal procession as such does not denote something created, yet it can be manifested through something created; and according to which the proceeding Spirit is thus manifested, it is called temporal procession.

To the other, it must be said that Dionysius does not speak there of such a procession as is sought here by us. Hence it must be noted that there is a twofold procession of divine goodness into beings: for one is of the good, according to which the good is diffusive of itself and being through the act of creation, according to which mode he calls those things which are not as those which are: and thus the good proceeds into all things, according to which it is said, God saw all things which He had made, and they were very good. And although it is equally related to all things, yet other things are not equally related to it: and therefore Dionysius says that what is imparticipable is participated: in itself indeed imparticipable, because it is equally present: but in others which are not equally present to it, participated: because something receives according to being only: something according to being, and life: something according to being, living, and sensing: and something according to being, living, sensing, moving, and understanding: and so of others: and to this procession is not joined the procession of the Holy Spirit as in which it is manifested. But there is again a procession of the good in the effects of grace making pleasing the rational nature, such as charity, and the like: and because such things manifest gratuitous love towards us, therefore in these is manifested the bestowal of the first gift: and this is the Holy Spirit: therefore in these is manifested the procession of the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 2 — What Temporal Apparition Is

What is a temporal apparition?

Having considered this, it is necessary to inquire, What is a temporal apparition?

1. Cassian says: It is said to have appeared when it is suddenly shown. And, it is said to have appeared when it shines with unusual brightness. In every temporal procession, there is the unusual brightness of grace, it seems that apparition and mission are the same.
2. Furthermore, He does not come unless he is sent to us: but he who appears, comes: therefore he is sent to us.
3. Furthermore, This seems through what is held, to Titus, 1, 11 and 12: The grace of God, our savior, has appeared to all men, instructing us, that denying ungodliness, etc. Therefore, apparition is for sanctifying the creature. Since, therefore, as it is said here, mission is for the same, it seems apparition is the same as mission.

But on the contrary: Augustine: Let us not rashly say which person of the Trinity appeared to any of the Fathers or Prophets in any body or likeness of body, unless some probable indications surround it with the context of the reading. For the very nature or substance or essence, or whatever other name it is to be called, that which God is, whatever it is, cannot be seen corporeally. But through the subject creature, it is to be believed that not only the Son or the Holy Spirit, but also the Father could give a signification of himself in corporeal form or likeness to mortal senses. From this it is taken, that apparition is either of the divine essence through the subject creature: or if it pertains to the person, this will be by the grace of essence and not of the person. To confirm this, many things can be introduced from the same second book on the Trinity, but for this one suffices.

Sorurio. We say that apparition, as it is said of those manifestations which were made to the Fathers of the Old Testament, namely to Abraham and Lot and Jacob and others, was properly for the manifestation of the essence either in itself, or according to what is in the persons existing as one in number, and the person uniting.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Cassian defines apparition in the first signification according to the usage of speakers, according to which something is suddenly produced, which was not known, and whose investigation cannot be found: and that common ratio is both of the apparition which is the manifestation of the divine essence through the subject creature, and of the mission or procession of the person. However, if according to the ends apparition and procession are considered, they are defined by different definitions: because apparition is the manifestation of essence, and procession is the manifestation of person.

And through this, the solution to the following is also clear. For the manifestation of both, namely of essence and of person, shines as a new light to us: because by our reason we cannot enter into it.

Articulus 3 — What It Is To Be Sent, And What Mission Is

What it is to be sent, and what is mission?

Thirdly, it is asked, What it is to be sent, and mission?

And this definition is taken from Augustine, where he says: Just as to be born is to be from the Father for the Son, so to be sent is for the Son to be known to be from Him. And just as for the Holy Spirit to be the gift of God is to proceed from the Father, so to be sent is to be known to proceed from Him. Nor can we say that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Son: for indeed the same Spirit is not said in vain to be of the Father and of the Son. To be sent, in the common signification, is to be known to be from another.

BUT IT IS OBJECTED:

1. Everything that is known, is known through something else: therefore it ought to have been placed in the definition of what it is to be sent, that by which it is known.
2. Likewise, Knowledge is appropriated to the Son: therefore it seems that to be sent does not pertain except to the Son, which is against the Letter, because the Spirit is sent just as the Son. If you say that that by which it is known is not knowledge, but a created effect in a rational creature appropriable sometimes to the Son, sometimes to the Holy Spirit. On the contrary: That effect is commonly of the whole Trinity: therefore it manifests the whole Trinity, to which however it does not pertain to be from another.
3. Furthermore, If some effect appropriable were to the Son, and showed the Son to be from another, it would seem that it would be wisdom, and knowledge, and faith, and other gifts which pertain to the intellect: but these manifest the Holy Spirit, as is held by that of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 12:7 and following: To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for utility. To one indeed by the Spirit is given the word of wisdom, to another the word of knowledge according to the same Spirit, to another faith in the same Spirit, which manifests the Spirit also in the gifts of the intellect: therefore no grace manifests the Son to be sent from another: and thus according to this definition to be sent does not pertain to the Son, which is false.

Furthermore, If by effect it is manifested to be from another, this will not be except appropriately, because that effect properly is of the whole Trinity: but appropriated things do not lead to proper things, as was proven above: therefore it seems that from such effects it is not known that someone is from another, but rather power, wisdom, goodness which are appropriated.

Solution. It must be said that in truth Augustine most excellently determines mission, when he says that to be sent is to be well known to be from another: I concede that this is done through effect, but not any effect whatsoever: but two things are required, namely appropriability to the proper, and that it be an effect of grace making one pleasing, to which is always joined the procession of the person, and the person itself: for the person itself must be shown present in a new way with its effect, if it is to be said to proceed temporally, as will be clear below.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that effect is implied in the reason of knowledge: because invisible knowledge is not made except in something that is created.

To the other it must be said that knowledge in that it is knowledge is attributed to the Son: yet that by which knowledge is received is not attributed to the Son, as was said in the objection.

To what is objected, it must be said that wisdom is considered in two ways, namely compared to act: and thus it is appropriated to the Son, and manifests the mission of the Son. Or it can be considered in comparison to the end: because namely it is to lead to charity and merit: and thus it manifests the mission of the Holy Spirit: and this is not inconvenient: because often in the same gift the mission of both is manifested: just as also each is sent for the reduction and sanctification of the rational creature.

Articulus 4 — What Giving Or Donation Is, And How They Differ

What is giving or donation, and how do they differ?

Fourthly, it is asked, What is giving, or donation, which more truly pertains to God?

The Philosopher says, however, that a gift is something given irretrievably. From this it is understood that donation or giving is the conferral of an irretrievable gift.

But against this it is objected: In God's gift, whether of nature or of grace making one pleasing, something else is conferred by God which He does not take back, nor hopes to be returned: therefore it seems that giving is then present.

But on the contrary: Here it is asked about the giving with which or by which God gives Himself: but He does not give Himself in every gift, but with grace making one pleasing: therefore it seems that in that there is not donation or giving.

But if this is granted: then it seems that donation or giving is the same as mission: because when He gives such an effect, that effect will be appropriable to some person: and thus it shows that it is from another: therefore it seems that mission and giving are the same.

Solution. It must be said that donation or giving (since here they are taken for the same) is the conferral of some grace which makes one pleasing: and this irretrievably: because God's gift cannot be returned to Him. But because every gift is conferred in the first gift which is gratuitous love, therefore every gift of such grace is called the gift of the Holy Spirit.

To what is objected about natural gifts, it must be said that those are given and are called: and not according to the donation sought here, namely in which and with which the first gift is through the presence of some effect of an agent for the reduction of the erring rational nature to sanctification.

To the other it must be said that giving, or donation, and mission, do not differ in matter and end: because the matter of both is the effect of grace making one pleasing, and the end of both is to reduce the rational creature to sanctification: but they differ in the reason of the act imported in the name, when it is called mission, and when it is called donation. For mission imports a comparison to the sender, because it is not sent unless a messenger from the sender: and it imports a comparison to him to whom it is sent, because it is sent to the rational creature: and it also imports the reason of the business for which the mission is made. Donation, however, imports only the last two, namely to whom it is given, and the end of the giving.

If perhaps you object that every giving is from some giver, just as mission is from a sender. It must be said that mission imports a distinct person sent: for what the messenger brings is not properly said to be sent, nor the messenger, but this is given through him who is sent: donation, however, does not import the messenger or the sent one, because many things can be given without an intermediary messenger: and therefore donation does not import a person who is from another, as mission does: and in this way it does not express the comparison of personal distinction from the giver as mission does.

Articulus 5 — How Temporal Mission, Procession, Apparition, And Temporal Giving Differ From One Another

How do temporal mission, procession, apparition, and temporal giving differ from each other?

Fifthly, it is asked, How do these differ from each other?

And it seems according to what has been determined, that temporal mission and procession are related as convertible terms: because to whomever it is fitting to be sent, it is fitting to proceed, and conversely: for it is not fitting to be sent unless existing from another, and to proceed also is not fitting unless from another.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Procession is a property of the Holy Spirit, and not of the Son: I speak of passive procession: but it is fitting for the Son to be sent: therefore these three are not convertible.

1. Likewise, no one is sent unless a messenger: but he who is not a messenger also proceeds: therefore to be sent and to proceed are not the same, nor are they convertible.
2. Likewise, it has been stated above, that to proceed is said partly by similarity to a processive motion, and partly by similarity to a procession or exit caused by a cause: but neither of these is the reason of being sent: therefore it seems that these are not the same.

Likewise, apparition and temporal procession seem to be related as superior and inferior: because in every mission there is an apparition, but it is not convertible: for in every mission there is suddenly something shining and divine appearing through affection: therefore in every mission there is an apparition.

But against this is that 1. Apparition is not called by the Saints any manifestation made, unless it is through a subject creature, whether united to it or not united: but mission is not always so: therefore not every mission implies an apparition.

1. Furthermore, apparition is indeed made through Angels: as in the apparition of Abraham in the valley of Mamre: and in the apparition of Moses. But mission is never made except immediately through divine persons. Therefore mission is not an apparition nor a species of it.

Likewise, it seems that giving is none of these: because giving can be done without the manifestation of the giver through a subject creature, and thus it is not an apparition: and it can be done by one who does not proceed from another, and thus it is not a procession: and it can be done without an intervening messenger, and thus it is not a mission: therefore it seems that all these differ from each other.

Solution. It must be said that these have a difference from each other: because, as the object is, apparition as we use it here is not made except through a subject creature: and every apparition that was made to the ancients was made through the dispensation of Angels, and was ordered to the apparition of the Word made in flesh: and that this is true is taken from Augustine, where he says thus: All those things which were seen by the Fathers, when God presented Himself to them according to His dispensation at a time suitable, were manifestly made through a creature. And if it is hidden from us how He made them through the ministers of Angels, we nevertheless say from our sense that apparitions were made through Angels. But that they are ordered to the end of the apparition of Christ in the flesh, the same Augustine says thus: Whatever things were done before for the sake of making the faith by which we might be cleansed to contemplate the truth in things produced from eternity, and related to eternity temporally, were either testimonies of this mission (namely of the Son in the flesh), or the mission itself of the Son of God. Therefore, it is established that apparition is principally for manifesting the divine nature, either in itself or in persons: although indeed under some number Angels sometimes appeared, as three were seen by Abraham, and two by Lot: and in this there seems to be a manifestation of the number of persons: nevertheless, principally the unity of nature was manifested: and therefore it is said of Abraham, that he saw three and adored one: and therefore it is clear that apparition is not a procession or temporal mission, nor even its genus.

To the first objection, that where there is a mission, there is knowledge of the one existing from another through another, and thus an apparition. It must be said that there is equivocation in apparition: because apparition is called by the Saints a manifestation through an assumed creature to the sense: but the knowledge which is in the mission is to the intellect.

Likewise, in the New Testament persons appeared: as the Father in the voice, and the Spirit in fire, tongues, and breath, and the Son in flesh: but these are called visible missions about which there will be discourse below: but now we speak only of the apparition of the Old Testament.

However, procession and mission (as the objection also proves) do not differ except according to reason: because procession only signifies the comparison of the one proceeding to the one from whom it proceeds: and if it is called temporal procession, again it only adds the connotation of effect in the creature: but mission signifies that comparison, and further the comparison to the one to whom or in whom it is sent. However, giving does not signify the distinction of the person announcing. Hence these three differ: because procession principally signifies the distinction of the one proceeding from the one from whom it proceeds: but mission principally signifies the distinction of the messenger to the one announcing, and to the one to whom the announcement is made: however, giving principally connotes the effect.

Articulus 6 — In How Many Ways Procession Or Mission Takes Place

In how many ways does procession or mission occur?

Sixthly, it is asked, In how many ways does such a procession or mission occur?

For it seems that it cannot be reduced to an artificial number: for if it occurs to recall the rational creature, and that is recalled in many ways, it seems that procession and mission occur in as many ways.

If perhaps it is said that it does not occur to recall the rational creature. On the contrary: Augustine: Since we have been exiled from this immutable joy, yet we have not been cut off and severed from it, so that we do not even in these mutable and temporal things seek eternity, truth, and blessedness: for we do not wish to die, nor to be deceived, nor to be disturbed: divine visions suitable to our pilgrimage have been sent to us, by which we might be admonished that what we seek is not here, but that we must return from here to there: for unless we were dependent on it, we would not seek it here. Therefore, it is evident that the mission is for the purpose of recalling him who has gone astray: and thus it seems that it occurs in infinite ways, in which also the error occurs.

Solution. It must be said that materially it occurs in many ways, which cannot be reduced to an artificial number: but the formal ways do not extend beyond four: for when in the effect with which there is always a person being from another, it becomes known: and this is either internally to the intellect, and thus it is through the gift of intellect, or through the gift of affection, and behold two ways: or this is externally to the sense ordered to the intellect, and then it must occur in an assumed creature: and that is either united to the one assuming, as in the case of the Son who was sent into the world through the assumed human nature: or it is assumed not united, as is the sounding voice, and the tongue, and the dove, and such things, about which inquiry will be made in their proper place below. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 7 — What The Temporal Procession Adds Over And Above The Eternal

What does temporal procession add over the eternal?

Seventhly, it is asked, What does temporal procession add over the eternal?

It seems, however, that it adds nothing: because 1. Everything to which addition is possible is in potency to that which it does not have: but in eternals, nothing is in potency to that which it does not have: therefore the temporal cannot add over the eternal.

1. Furthermore, it does not seem that temporal procession signifies anything except eternal procession with an effect in the creature appropriable to the proceeding person: but that effect is only of the person on the part of the creature, and not on the part of the proceeding person: therefore it is not added to it: therefore it remains as simple as before: therefore it seems that nothing is added.

If this be said, On the contrary: Eternal procession does not in any way receive this denomination by its own grace that it is or is called temporal: if therefore it is called temporal, it seems that this is by the grace of something added: therefore the temporal adds something.

Solution, It must be said to this, that in truth nothing can be added to the eternal substantially and accidentally: but nevertheless something can relate to it differently than it did before: and thus I say here, that temporal procession includes in itself the understanding of eternal procession, and adds a relation which is caused by this, that the rational creature by the gift of God relates to it differently in grace than it did before. And although these cannot be added so as to make something numerically one, yet these can be signified together by one name, as is temporal procession: whence procession adds in the mode of understanding and signifying, although it does not add in reality, so that the temporal makes the eternal or an accident of the eternal.

And from this also the solution to both objections is clear.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Master Here Determines Well Concerning The Temporal Mission

Whether the Master here determines well concerning the temporal mission?

Having seen these things which are as it were an aid to this whole treatise, we must approach the Letter.

And first it is asked concerning this which he says:

Furthermore, it must be diligently noted, etc.

1. For it seems that this treatise on the temporal procession is poorly placed: since the Master here treats of those things which pertain to the eternal God, but these things pertain in time, it seems poorly introduced here.

2. Likewise, there are certain things pertaining to God temporally, concerning which the Master will determine below: therefore, among those this treatise ought to be placed, as it seems.

3. Furthermore, the mission into the flesh is treated in Book III of the Sentences: since therefore that principal of all missions, as it seems, the Master ought to have treated simultaneously there also of those missions which he touches upon here.

Solution. It must be said that it is not treated here of those inasmuch as they are temporal, but inasmuch as in the temporal the eternal enclosed is made known: and therefore because the distinction, namely the eternal emanation of persons, is known in the temporal, therefore this part is introduced.

To the other it must be said that other things which belong to God from time, as Creator and Lord when He is called from dominion, according to act do not show the distinction of persons: and therefore with those this could not be ordered.

To the other it must be said that in the Second Book of Sentences it is treated of those things which pertain to the incarnation according to the truth of the assumed nature and the assuming: and this is not of the nature of mission: because mission can be in a creature not united. But here something is touched upon, although little, as they are substantial to the mission showing the eternal exit of the Son from the Father, as it may be evident in the following distinction, in which it is touched upon the mission of the Son into flesh, not only in flesh.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Procession Of The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Twofold, And Whether There Are Two

Whether the procession of the Holy Spirit can be called twofold, and whether there are two?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, that the procession of the Holy Spirit is twofold: namely eternal, etc.

1. For it seems that this is false: for if the procession is twofold: either it is the same repeated, or there are two processions, and therefore it is called twofold. It is evident that it is not in the first way: because an eternal procession cannot be repeated. Nor does it seem to be true in the second way; because the temporal does not add upon the eternal except an effect connoted in time or temporal: therefore it seems that there are not two.

2. Likewise, a difference in accident does not make two, as long as the subject is one: for Socrates white and Socrates musical are not two, but one: therefore similarly, since the eternal procession is in the temporal, and nothing more except its comparison to this effect to which it was not previously compared, those processions seem to be one, and not two.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. One is external, and the other temporal: and the eternal is not temporal: therefore there are two.

1. Likewise, one is the Spirit in itself, the other in man sanctifying: therefore, since these are two, there will be two processions here.

Solution. To this it must be said that in truth according to substance there is here only one procession of the Holy Spirit: as the first reasons prove, nor does the Master say that there are two: but he says that one is twofold: however, because it receives an addition in time, therefore in this respect it is said to be doubled.

To that which is objected against this, it must be said that one is not removed from the other by reason of what is procession, but by reason of the added: hence the procession with the effect signified is not the procession without the effect signified: not indeed in subject, because in subject they are the same: but by the defining reason of each, one from the eternal, and the other from the temporal: for by reason of this opposition of reasons one is removed from the other.

To the other it must be said that this temporal addition is by comparison to man sanctifying, and does not diversify the subject, but only the reason from the added.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Procession Of The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Temporal

Whether the procession of the Holy Spirit can be called temporal?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said in the second chapter B, there, Concerning the temporal procession, etc.

1. For it seems that it is not rightly called temporal: because the work of the Spirit, and the work of the Trinity is above time: therefore, since that which is called temporal adds nothing beyond that except the effect with which the Spirit is, it seems it is not rightly called temporal.
2. Likewise, Augustine says thus: Therefore it seems, that according to which we grasp something eternal with the mind as much as we can, we are not in this world, that effect lifts above the world and time, that it itself is much more above time and the world: and thus incongruously it is called a temporal procession from that effect.

Solution. We say that temporal is said in many ways: for temporal is said which lies under and makes to lie under the variation of time: and thus time is said to be the cause of corruption, because through motion and change it makes to be distant what is: and thus procession into creature is not said to be temporal, because it makes to be nearer to true incorruption. It is also said to be temporal, whose origin is in time, even if it is not varied according to its being with time: just as the creation of this soul is in time, which nevertheless is not corrupted in time. It is also said to be temporal which as to its beginning is in time, although as to its act it is outside time: just as the temporal procession which makes us in some way according to our possibility to attain the eternal: and in this way grace is in time, and other things which elevate us to God which are given to us in time.

Articulus 11 — Whether Power Ought To Be Attributed To The Father Or To The Holy Spirit

Whether virtue ought to be attributed to the Father or to the Holy Spirit?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

He is the virtue which went out from him, etc.

1. Against this is what is said, 1 Corinthians 1:24: Christ the power of God. Therefore, it seems that virtue is appropriated to the Son: and thus it manifests the procession of the Son, and not of the Holy Spirit.
2. Furthermore, it seems that virtue is attributed to the Father. For the Philosopher says that virtue is the ultimate of power in a thing: but power is attributed to the Father: therefore also virtue: therefore much more it manifests the mission of the Father, if it can be sent, than of the Holy Spirit.

Solution. Virtue is twofold, namely natural power virtue, and operative virtue. Operative, however, is twofold, namely towards being, and towards well-being. But the virtue of natural power is ordered to the attribute of the Father, to whom is attributed the power of natural strength, because it has the nature of a principle not from a principle, but a principle has the nature of power: but the word and wisdom of the practical intellect also have the virtue of operating towards being, and since this virtue is towards being as an operative idea, this is attributed to the Son.

Furthermore, the strength of fortitude in battle is attributed to the Son, because he by fighting in the flesh conquered the strong.

However, there is a virtue operating towards well-being, according to what the Philosopher says, that virtue in the most difficult things is operative of the best: and according to what Augustine says, that virtue is a good quality of the mind by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly: and to this likeness is also called the virtue of healings and miracles: because it heals externally in testimony of the interior healing, as the Psalm says: Who forgives all your iniquities, who heals all your diseases.

And through this the solution to the objections is clear.

Articulus 12 — How Often The Lord Sent The Holy Spirit, Whether Twice Or Thrice

How many times did the Lord send the Holy Spirit, whether twice or thrice?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

After the resurrection, the Lord Jesus twice gave the Holy Spirit, etc.

1. For it seems that He gave it thrice: because even before the resurrection He sent them and gave them power over all demons, and to heal the sick: and after the resurrection, He gave it to them by breathing, saying: Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them. And thirdly, He gave the Holy Spirit from heaven, Acts 2:3-4: And it sat upon each of them: and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit.
2. Furthermore, what is it that through Him charity is diffused: for diffusion is of the humid, which does not pertain to charity.
3. Furthermore, why is this diffusion more attributed to charity than to any other virtue?

Solution. To the first, it must be said that to insinuate the two precepts of charity, He gave it twice, that is, in two places, because in heaven where the glory of God, who is to be loved by charity, shines more, and on earth where the neighbor converses with us. But that He gave the Holy Spirit before the passion, this was also ordained to the love of neighbor: and thus in this respect it does not make a number. However, if the acts of the Spirit, or of the mission, are considered, then He gave it thrice: because first before the passion for the operation of miracles, after the passion for the power of the keys of the ministers of the Church, after the ascension for the conversion of the Gentiles: and this is evident by the adjuncts to each bestowal of the Holy Spirit. For first it is said that He gave them power over all demons, and to heal the sick. Secondly, it is said: Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them. Thirdly, it is said: They began to speak with other tongues, as the Holy Spirit gave them to speak.

To the other, it must be said that diffusion is taken metaphorically from the humid which fertilizes divided through dry earthly parts: because thus charity waters dry earthly hearts to fertility.

To the other, it must be said that charity alone cannot be without form, and it makes every quantity of merit: and therefore it is in this respect spread and diffused in the power of God.

Articulus 13 — Whether It Befits The Holy Spirit To Be Sent Or Given, And Why More Befittingly To The Holy Spirit Than To Another Person, And Why It Does Not Befit The Father To Be Sent As The Son And The Holy Spirit

Whether it is fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent or given, and why more to the Holy Spirit than to another person, and why it is not fitting for the Father to be sent as the Son and the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning those things which are said in this chapter C, "There are some who say that the Holy Spirit, God Himself, is given," etc. For many reasons, the opinion of those seems to be true.

1. First: because what is whole everywhere is lacking nowhere: therefore it is sent nowhere: because what is sent passes from place to place: therefore it seems, since the Spirit is everywhere, as Ambrose says, that it is sent nowhere.
2. Likewise, if before the mission it is everywhere essentially, and presentially, and potentially, after the mission it does not seem that there is anything more in that to which it is said to be sent, except only a created gift: therefore it seems that it is not given itself otherwise than it was present before, but only its gift.
3. Likewise, the created effect is commonly of the whole Trinity, and not of one person more than another: therefore by reason of that effect, either any person is said to be sent, or none: but not any, therefore none.
4. Likewise, that is properly given which is had for use after it is conferred. But the Holy Spirit is never had for use, but for fruit by holy men: therefore the Holy Spirit is not given or sent, but only its gifts.

Further it is asked, Why is it more fitting for the person of the Holy Spirit to be sent or given than the Son?

1. The Son came for the chief mission when He came in the flesh: therefore it is more fitting for Him to be sent than the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, to whomsoever the highest in something is fitting principally, to that one it is also fitting principally to be what is from that one: but by the merit of the Son the Spirit is sent: by the merit, I say, by which He merited for us the Spirit in the passion: therefore it seems that it is principally fitting for Him to be sent.

Further it is asked, Why is it not fitting for the Father to be sent and given? For there are certain gifts appropriable to Him, as also to the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said that to be given in gifts is especially fitting to Him who proceeds from eternity as a gift, in whom other gifts are given: and this, as is clear from the aforesaid, is none other than the Holy Spirit.

To this, therefore, which is first objected, it must be said that the Spirit is everywhere as God, because He is God: but nevertheless by this effect by which He is manifested in the saints, He does not show Himself everywhere: and therefore with respect to this He is said to be sent: because He is personally and essentially present in a special way where He thus operates: but in every place He is in general ways, namely presentially, potentially, and essentially.

To the other it must be said that after the mission the Holy Spirit is especially in the saints: but this specialness refers to the work, not to a different mode of the Spirit, and with respect to this that the saints are related to Him differently than before, and differently than another thing.

To the other it must be said that the effect of holiness as an effect is commonly of the Trinity, but as it is of holiness, it is not equally appropriable to the Trinity, but rather by reason of holiness it places a fittingness to the proper of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift or love in which all gifts are given.

To the other it must be said that this is given which is had for use, and which helps for use: although grace effected is had for use, nevertheless the Spirit helps for use, because otherwise grace would not be able to effect anything unless the Holy Spirit were present by Himself, as will be clear below.

To that which is further asked, Why is it more fitting for the person of the Holy Spirit to be sent or given than the Father or the Son? It must be said that if the reason of giving is considered apart from the reason of mission, then it is clear to render the reason: because the Spirit proceeds as a gift, not the Father and the Son. But if the reason of mission is considered: then it can still be considered in two ways, namely with respect to that comparison that the sent is said to be from another: and thus it is fitting for the Son to be sent, as the Holy Spirit. It can also be considered the mission to the end of the mission, which is the sanctification of the rational creature: and that end is more appropriable to the Holy Spirit than to the Son: but concerning the Father it is clear, because it is in no way fitting for Him to be sent according to Augustine, because He is not from another.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that in the visible mission, namely the chief mission is fitting to the Son: because He united the visible creature to Himself: and it was more fitting for Him to be sent in that mission than the Holy Spirit, as is proved in the Second Sentences: but in the invisible mission the Holy Spirit is missible, as the Son: or more, because He has a greater appropriation in sanctifying gifts.

To the other it must be said that the mission in the flesh was the highest of missions in two ways, namely because others without it would not have availed for redemption, and because it was made by the union of the created effect by the Trinity: but in the interior personal sanctification it is equally or more fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent.

To that which is further asked, Why is it not fitting for the Father to be sent and given? It must be said that it is not fitting for the Father to be sent for the reason already said: because of what Augustine says, that to be sent is to be known to be from another: but the Father is not from another. Whether, however, the Father gives Himself, the Master will determine below, and it will be determined later.

To what is objected, that certain gifts are appropriable to the Father, it must be said that this is true: but those of themselves are not grace-making: for power does not make grace: and therefore since mission or giving is not made except in those things which sanctify, it does not follow that in those gifts the Father gives Himself; nevertheless the Son says of the Father: "We will come to him, and make our abode with him." But this happens, because the three persons inseparably inhabit holy souls, whence in that abode only the Spirit is sent, as is clear from what precedes: "If anyone loves me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come to him," etc. For in the bestowal of love only the Spirit is sent by reason of appropriation, yet not only the Spirit inhabits, but the inhabitation is of the three together.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Holy Spirit Can Be Said To Be Food And Drink

Whether the Holy Spirit can be called a cube, and a drink?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

We have drunk one Spirit, etc.

1. For it seems that the Spirit is not a drink: or by what likeness is it called a drink?
2. Furthermore, what is it to drink the Spirit? It seems that this is to be infused with His gifts.
3. Furthermore, on that Isaiah iv, 1: We will eat our own bread, etc., the Gloss says that the women are the gifts of the Holy Spirit: but the food of the women is the Father, as also of Christ: but our food is Christ who descended from heaven as the living bread. Therefore, it seems that the Spirit is refreshed by the Father as by bread: but we are drunk with the Spirit: and these do not seem to agree.
4. Furthermore, it is more fitting for the Son to be a drink: because it is thus said, Ecclesiasticus xv, 3: He will drink the water of saving wisdom. And, Proverbs ix, 5: Drink the wine which I have mixed for you, says Wisdom.

Solution. It must be said that in truth the Spirit can metaphorically be called food and drink. It is called a drink, as Augustine hints here, inasmuch as it restrains the ardor of secular thirst. Hence, John vii, 38: He who believes in me..., rivers will flow from his belly, etc. It is called bread inasmuch as it strengthens the heart in grace.

To the objection concerning the Gloss, it must be said that the Father is put there for the will of the Father: and the will of the Father is called the food of the women effectively, namely because they make us be refreshed in the will of the Father: as Christ said: My food is to do the will of Him who sent me. And note that the gifts of the Spirit refresh: but unless they have two things from the very substance of the Spirit, which is with the gifts in us, they do not satisfy: of which one is the taste to remove distaste, the other is the power of refreshing, because everything that is not the Creator does not satisfy the mind of man.

To the other, it must be said that to be a drink can be fittingly attributed to the Son and to the Spirit by different considerations: for if the effect is considered, which is the restriction of secular thirst, it is done only through the taste of the Spirit, of which Gregory says in the Moralia: Having tasted the Spirit, all flesh and carnal delight becomes insipid. But if the moisture of the drink is considered, whose act is to carry nourishment to the members, this is fitting to the attributes of wisdom and prudence, which have to moderate in the acts of the gifts how much should be given or indulged to each.

Articulus 15 — Whether, The Holy Spirit Not Being Present, The Father Can Infuse His Love

Whether, with the Holy Spirit not existing, the Father can impart His love?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

There is one Holy Spirit, who is given to all, although separately, etc.

1. For if the Holy Spirit does not exist, if this, namely, is posited as impossible, still God will love the rational creature, and will infuse His love into them: therefore it seems that the imparting of love is not the mission of the Spirit.
2. Furthermore, let us suppose there is no person in the way that faith distinguishes persons: I ask, whether it still befits God to be sent? It seems not: because to be sent is to be known to be from another: but then no one will be from another: therefore it seems that it does not befit Him then to be sent.

On the contrary: He will still be perfectly able to save: but salvation cannot be except through that which, by sanctifying, calls back those who stray: therefore it seems that with this being sent, He can still send and give, and be sent and given.

Solution. It must be said that if we posit the Holy Spirit not to exist, there will be no love in the divine except essentially only: and that would be infused into hearts, as has been said: but this will not be the mission of anyone, for it is not of the Son, this is clear, because it is not an effect appropriable to the Son: but that it is not of the Father, is clear, because the Father is not from another.

To the other it must be said, that if no person is posited to exist, there will not be any mission properly speaking: but still God can give Himself in the effect of grace.

Articulus 16 — Whether Holy Men Can Give The Holy Spirit

Whether holy men can give the Holy Spirit?

Whether holy men can give the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, Here it is asked, Whether also the holy men, etc.

For here begins that part in which it is determined whether holy men give the Holy Spirit, and it is shown that they do not. And it has three chapters, in the first of which he shows that they do not give. In the second, that they cannot give, there, E, and what is more, In the third, he objects to the contrary, and etc. solves, there, F, But this seems contrary, etc.

1. For it seems that holy men can give the Holy Spirit: because it was said to them: Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you forgive, they are forgiven them. But sin is not forgiven except through the Holy Spirit: therefore they give the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, He who gives occasion of harm in the judgment of men is judged to have inflicted harm: therefore if the ministers of the Church do that to which the Holy Spirit incessantly follows, it seems that they themselves confer the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, We see in material lights, that one kindled can further kindle others: therefore it seems in the interior spiritual light, that a man kindled in the grace of the Holy Spirit can further kindle others, and thus confer the Holy Spirit.
4. Likewise, Angels illuminate, purify, and perfect each other: therefore since the ecclesiastical hierarchy is according to the example of the heavenly hierarchy, it seems that also among holy men one can purify, illuminate, and perfect another: but they cannot do this except by conferring the Holy Spirit: therefore etc.

Solution. It must be said with the Master, that holy men, nor even the ministers of the Church, give, nor confer the Holy Spirit. And the reason for this is: because he who gives the Holy Spirit has authority and influence at least over the effect, in which the Holy Spirit is given: and this effect is grace making one pleasing, which is only from God alone through efficient cause and authority.

To the first, therefore, which is objected, it must be said that Christ gave them the ministry in which the Holy Spirit is had, that is, for the dispensation of the sacraments: but he did not give them authority and efficiency.

To the second, it must be said that he who gives occasion of harm is judged guilty, but is not judged to have efficiently inflicted harm, unless he acts with him who inflicts harm: but in the conferring of the Holy Spirit, the operative power of man cannot operate anything: but it can operate towards it and under it: and therefore it is not similar: because created power can be towards the infliction of harm, not towards the conferring of the Holy Spirit.

To another, it must be said that in lights the kindling of one to another happens because of material similarity: because through that it is one combustible and food of fire, like another: but there is not such similarity of operative power in God, and in ministers in the conferring of the Holy Spirit.

To another, it must be said that the purging of Angels is from the habit of dissimilarity in the cognitive power, that is, from the habit, or habitual ignorance, or unknowing of some hidden thing to be revealed: and to be illuminated is to receive light in that in which it is seen: but to be perfected is to be converted according to this light to the source of light, that is, to the eternal Word. Hence all these three are on the part of the intellect and by the mode of doctrine, and the effect of doctrine: and in this way the ministers of the Church can well do: hence by teaching another, to illuminate, and to purge from ignorance, and to perfect by showing the knowledge of the word of God to lead to God: but this sometimes follows grace, sometimes not: and that it sometimes follows, this is from the superior infusing cause and operating.

DISTINCTIO XV

Divisio Textus

Here it must be considered, when the Holy Spirit is given to men, etc.

Here begins the second part, in which the Master discusses the mission of the Holy Spirit according to the comparison to the principle of mission, inquiring, Whether He is sent by Himself?

And this distinction has three principal questions. The first of which is, whether the Holy Spirit is sent by Himself? and this is concluded in the first chapter A. The second is about the mission of the Son, through which the mission of the Holy Spirit is proven: and it begins there, B, "Lest you wonder." The third is, why the Father is not read, etc., to be sent? and it begins there, N, "Here it is asked, Why the Father," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Mission And Giving Are Temporal And Eternal As Procession Is

Whether mission and giving are temporal and eternal like procession?

Here arises a doubt before the Letter, whether mission and giving are temporal and eternal like procession?

It seems, however, that they are: because
1. To be sent is to be known to be from another: but to be known can be on the part of the aptitude of the known, or on the part of the knower according to act: as Augustine also says that the Spirit is a gift from eternity according to aptitude; therefore, since the Son and the Holy Spirit are from another from eternity, it is fitting for them from eternity that they are sent according to habit or aptitude.

1. Furthermore, in this same reading it is held that some said that according to eternal generation the Son is said to be sent, and they are not reproved: therefore, since this cannot be unless mission is eternal, it seems that to be sent according to mode is fitting from eternity: and thus there will be a double mission, eternal and temporal.
2. Likewise, to be given or a gift pertains more on the part of the creature than to be sent, as was proven above: but it is fitting for the Holy Spirit from eternity that He is a gift: therefore, much more that He is sent.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. To be sent is to be known to be from another in an effect appropriable to a person, by which the propriety of that person is understood: but the effect is only in time: therefore, mission and giving are not eternal.

1. Likewise, it was held above that mission implies a relation to him to whom it is sent: but he to whom the mission is made is not from eternity.

Solution. It must be said to this that mission and giving are said only temporally or from time.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that the knowledge which is implied in the notion of mission is the knowledge which is made in an effect appropriable to a person, as was objected in the contrary.

To the other it must be said that according to eternal generation, mission is not said according to the complete notion of mission: but there is congruity to this that the begotten can be sent: because from this very fact that he is from another, he can be sent: and this is what those who said this intended, and not that his mission was from eternity.

To the other it must be said that from eternity the Spirit is called a gift from the aptitude of giving: but mission, giving, and names of this kind are verbal, and they regard more the act of mission which is only in time: and therefore they are not said in a double way: like procession which of itself more implies a relation to the principle from which, than to him to whom it proceeds or can proceed.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is God, And Also A Gift Or A Thing Given, And Whether The Holy Spirit Is Given By Himself

Whether the Holy Spirit is God, and also a gift or given thing, and whether the Holy Spirit is given by Himself?

Whether the Holy Spirit is God, and also a gift or given, and whether the Holy Spirit is given by Himself?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in the Letter of the first chapter A, there, To which we say, that the Holy Spirit is both God and a gift or given, etc.

It seems this is false: because
1. The giver and the given have a substantial distinction: but the Holy Spirit, as He is God, and as He is a gift, does not have a substantial distinction: therefore it does not befit Him to give as He is God, and to be given as He is a gift.

1. If perhaps you say that the giver and the given in this place do not differ substantially. On the contrary: Immediately in the Letter assigning the reason why the Holy Spirit is the giver as God, it says: Since however the donation or giving of the Holy Spirit is the operation of God, and the operation of the three persons is common and indivisible, therefore the Holy Spirit is given not only by the Father and the Son, but also by Himself. However, the operation of the three persons is not to the substance which is the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit is not given: therefore here also the giver and the given differ substantially: and thus the proposition is held.

2. Likewise, whatever is given is separated from the giver, or from the dominion of the giver, or receives the communication of another dominion. For example, it is separated from the giver when I hand over something given to you: however, from dominion when, although it remains with me corporally, yet I no longer have dominion over the thing given to you: it receives another dominion if I give you the power of communication in my goods. In none of these ways does the Holy Spirit give Himself. Therefore it is simply false that the Holy Spirit as God is the giver, and as a gift is the given.
3. Furthermore, a gift is personally and from eternity: if therefore He is given as a gift, He is given according to His personal being which He has from eternity: but according to that which is from eternity, He is God the giver: therefore according to that which He has and is from eternity, He is both the giver and the given, which is false.
4. Likewise, in every giving there is authority of the giver over the given: but the Holy Spirit has no authority over Himself: therefore He does not give Himself.
5. Likewise, every given thing is from the giver, for the given is from the giver: since therefore the Holy Spirit is not from Himself, the Holy Spirit does not give Himself.

Further it is asked concerning this, the Holy Spirit is given by Himself. For in this proposition "by" denotes the relation of an efficient cause in the ablative: but the Holy Spirit does not have any relation of such a principle with respect to Himself: therefore this expression is false, the Holy Spirit is given by Himself: which Augustine places in the Letter.

If perhaps you say that the Holy Spirit as the eternal substance the same with the Father, can have a relation with respect to Himself, as He proceeds in time. On the contrary: This is not conceded, the Holy Spirit in time or today is from Himself eternally: therefore it seems that He has no relation of cause in the proposition: and thus the expression is false.

Solution. In this question there are many very diverse opinions: for some say that to give and to be given are said in two ways. In one way according to which the intention of the giver denotes authority with respect to the given, and the given under authority with respect to the giver: and thus the Holy Spirit does not give Himself, nor is He given by Himself. In another way it is said improperly that the giver is for influencing, and to be given is for being inspired or sent: and thus they concede that the Holy Spirit gives Himself, and is given by Himself: because He influences Himself, and is inspired by Himself into the minds of the faithful: and this opinion is founded on that of Augustine which is held here, If the Father and the Son give the Holy Spirit, and He does not give Himself: therefore the Father and the Son do something which the Holy Spirit does not do. For from this Augustine implies that when he says, the Holy Spirit gives Himself, he understands nothing but the work of inspiration into the minds of the faithful: and this is the opinion of the ancient Prepositivi and William.

Others say that to give in the accusative does not denote authority with respect to the given: but a difference according to reason suffices: and therefore they concede that the Holy Spirit as considered in Himself is the giver, and is given according to what is in this or that whose mind He inhabits: and they do not concede that to give is the same as to send, or to proceed: and they say that the same can be the giver and the given, and that the reasons introduced do not follow.

A third group says, with whom it seems to me more to be agreed, that there is a double giver and given: for they sometimes place these in dominion, and in which there is that dominion or quasi-dominion: because no one gives unless he is the master of it, and in which he has authority. In this way neither the Father gives, nor the Son, nor the Holy Spirit the Holy Spirit. But sometimes it is said the giver with respect to the given, not from the power of dominion, but from the force of love: as there is giving among friends, in which giving one gives well to another what he has, and what he himself is, as a friend says to a friend, I give myself to you: and in this way since the Holy Spirit is the gift in which all gifts are given, they concede that the Holy Spirit gives Himself. For if among inferiors, they say, a friend gives himself to a friend: and if the love which is between them were a perfect person, each of the friends would give himself entirely: thus since in the divine the Holy Spirit is love, they say that He gives Himself, and this seems more probable.

According to this therefore I respond to the first, that the giver and the given according to the first intention denote a substantial distinction of the giver and the given, but not according to the second.

To the other it must be said that in the giving of the Holy Spirit there are two things. One which is the principal gift, which is the Holy Spirit given: the other is the gift which is given in Him, and with Him. In Him, I say, because He according to Augustine is the gift in which all gifts are given: with Him however I say because grace is infused by the Holy Spirit, and with respect to that which is given in the gift of the Holy Spirit, and with Him, the operation of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit is placed: because this is an effect in the creature substantially differing from the Holy Spirit.

To the third it must be said that whatever is given according to which the giver has dominion over the given, and from the reason of authority and dominion has the authority of giving this: either it is separated from him in place, or use, or it passes into the community of another lord: but not in the giving where the reason of the giver is founded only in love: because there the giver remains whole, and is wholly given to another and from himself, as previously appeared in the example of friends and their love, if that love were a person, and could give itself.

To the fourth it must be said that personally it is a gift and from eternity by the aptitude of giving, as Augustine says: but although from eternity it is a gift, and a person, yet the reason of giving according to the mode of signifying is not the reason of the person: for a gift is said from the aptitude of passive donability, namely that it can be given: but a person is said in itself. And therefore inasmuch as it is a person and God, it has the power of giving actively: and inasmuch as it is a gift, it has the congruity to be given passively. And therefore in that argument there falls the fallacy of the accident. Because although the person and God and the gift is the Holy Spirit from eternity, yet it is not necessary that everything which befits it inasmuch as it is a gift, befits it by the same reason inasmuch as it is one person in the Trinity.

To the fifth it must be said that although the given according to act is not in time, yet it does not follow that nothing eternal befits it: for the eternal can be the reason of that which happens in time: just as every gift is the reason why it can be given in time.

To the sixth it must be said that this is false, that in every giving there is authority of the giver over the given: for this proposition is not true except in that giving where the reason of giving is power from dominion over the given, or from authority: but such is not here, as was evident.

To the other it must be said similarly, that to be given in the giving whose reason is founded in the power of dominion or authority, says as proceeding from the giver: but not that which is founded in the force of the love of friendship.

To what is further asked, Whether the Holy Spirit is given by Himself? the Doctors are found to be diversified. For some say the passive is less proper than the active, because of the reason which the objection touches. Others on the contrary say the active is less proper than the passive: because they say that the relation of the preposition "by" is referred to the connoted effect: of which the cause is the Holy Spirit, just as the Father. It seems to me that the passive is true, and less proper than the active, as the first say: and the relation of the preposition does not then denote the cause with respect to the effect, because the effect is not supposed in the thing of its cause, but rather the Holy Spirit: but the preposition denotes according to this not authority, but the power of giving from the force of love or virtue: and from this it cannot be inferred, He is given by Himself: therefore He is from Himself: or therefore He has authority with respect to Himself: or therefore He has the reason of a principle with respect to Himself: because that does not require such a giving, whose power consists wholly in the freedom of will and love. This sense seems to confirm the intention of the Letter: because when it ought to prove that He can give Himself, it introduces that it is of His power and freedom there where it says: For it cannot be said not to be of His power, of which it is written, The Spirit breathes where He wills: In the freedom of will He has, that He gives Himself: and this freedom does not place authority with respect to Himself, but consists there in the force of the love of those to whom He gives Himself.

Articulus 3 — Whether No Gift Is Given Except The Holy Spirit, And Whether The Body Of Flesh Is Other Than Flesh

Whether no gift is given except by the Holy Spirit, and whether the body of flesh is other than flesh?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Just as the body of flesh is nothing other than flesh, etc.

1. For from this it follows that no other gift is given except the Holy Spirit: and this is not true, because virtues and grace are also given to us, as is evident from the definition of virtue given by Augustine, which is a good quality of the mind. And, Wisdom 7:11: "All good things came to me along with her." And, Wisdom 8:6: "She teaches temperance and prudence, and justice, and virtue, than which nothing is more useful in life to men."

Therefore, it seems that the gift of the Holy Spirit is something other than the Holy Spirit.

2. Furthermore, the body of flesh seems to be something other than flesh: because a body signifies a composition from dissimilar members, such as a foot and a hand: but flesh does not signify this: therefore, the body of flesh is something other than flesh.

But he intends to say that in name and construction nothing else is signified than the Holy Spirit: for when it is said "the gift of the Holy Spirit," due to the transition of the oblique, someone might believe that divinity is between the oblique and the direct. Hence Augustine wishes that the oblique with the direct has an intransitive construction: just as when it is said, "the body of flesh" or "creature together."

To the last, it must be said that Augustine calls any body that has three dimensions: and thus the body of flesh is flesh, and the body of bone is bone: and he does not call a body animated which is composed of different dissimilar organs.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Father Can Do Something That The Holy Spirit Cannot

Whether the Father can do something that the Holy Spirit cannot?

Then it is inquired concerning this argument which is made, namely, that the Holy Spirit cannot give Himself, etc.

For it seems not to hold: because the Holy Spirit cannot breathe the Holy Spirit, and the Father can breathe Him; and yet from this it does not follow that the Father can or does something that the Holy Spirit cannot or does not do, since to breathe is not something, but towards something: therefore, similarly, this does not hold, since according to the Master, to give is the same as to proceed temporally.

Solution. It must be said that the argument holds here because of the connoted in the creature, which is enclosed in the understanding of what it is to give: for this operation belongs to those things which are subjected to power: and therefore, if the Holy Spirit were excluded from this, it would follow that the Father could do something that the Holy Spirit could not.

Articulus 5 — It Is Asked Whether Those Three Propositions Are True, Namely, 'The Spirit Sends Himself', 'The Spirit Is Sent By Himself', And 'The Spirit Proceeds From Himself'

It is asked whether those three propositions are truly, namely, the Spirit sends itself, and the Spirit is sent by itself, and the Spirit proceeds from itself?

Then it is asked about what is said:

But if it gives itself, then it also proceeds and is sent by itself, etc.

For there is doubt here, whether the Holy Spirit sends itself? And if this is conceded in some way, there will still be doubt about this, whether the Holy Spirit is sent by itself? And if these are conceded in some sense, this doubt remains, whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from itself?

For it seems here to be false, the Holy Spirit sends itself.

1. For it was held above, that to be sent is to be known to be from another. Therefore, from whom any of the persons is sent, it is known to be from that one: but the Holy Spirit sends itself, as you say: therefore the Holy Spirit is from itself, which is false: because Anselm says, that neither nature admits, nor the intellect comprehends, that the same is from itself.
2. Likewise, when it is said, it sends itself, the suppositum of the verb is in which authority is noted with respect to that which is supposed in the pronoun: but this is the same, when the relative refers to the same as is in the antecedent: therefore in the expression it is signified that the same has authority with respect to itself: therefore, since this is not true, the expression seems to be false.
3. Likewise, the sender and the sent require at least personal distinction: but this is not here, when it is said, the Holy Spirit sends itself: therefore the expression is false.
4. Likewise, the Father is not sent by anyone (as Augustine says) because he is from no one: therefore similarly neither does the Holy Spirit send itself, because it is not from itself.

If perhaps you say, as above, that it is the power of conferring by the force of love, and by the force of authority: and by the force of love the Holy Spirit sends itself, just as it also gives itself. On the contrary: To give by its intention does not imply a comparison to eternal procession, since below this is conceded, the Father gives himself: but to be sent includes in itself procession: therefore it is not similar: because neither by the force of love, nor by the reason of authority or dominion does the Holy Spirit have that it is from itself: therefore in no way does it send itself, as it seems.

If perhaps you say, that in truth this expression is false, nor does Augustine posit it but the Master. And that the Master in this says something false. On the contrary: Augustine says:

The Spirit sends itself, and gives itself. Therefore not only does the Master say this, but also Augustine.

Further, it is asked about this, the Holy Spirit is sent by itself.

1. For passion is always inflicted by another, although not action: therefore the passive more implies the reason of being from another than the active: therefore it seems that the passive has a greater reason for falsity than the active.
2. Likewise, the intellect does not comprehend that the same acts and suffers with respect to the same: therefore since this is signified by this expression, the Holy Spirit is sent by itself, it seems to be false.

But on the contrary: Augustine says. Then. And this is sent to each one, when it is known and perceived by someone, as much as it can be known and perceived, authority is placed below in this same distinction in the Letter. But such knowledge is made in us by the Holy Spirit: and it is truly said, that this knowledge is from the Holy Spirit and is sent by it: therefore it seems, if this is to be sent, that it is truly sent by itself.

Further, it is asked about this, the Holy Spirit proceeds from itself. For this seems false: because according to what was said above, to proceed does not imply a comparison except to the principle from which: therefore since the Holy Spirit itself is not its own principle, it seems that in no way does it proceed from itself.

If it is said, that it does not proceed from itself simply, but proceeds from itself into the creature.

On the contrary: 1. Procession into the creature shows the eternal, and adds nothing else: therefore if according to the eternal it does not proceed from itself, according to the temporal it should not be shown to proceed from itself: therefore it remains that this is false, the Holy Spirit proceeds temporally from itself.

1. Likewise, from whomever the genus is denied, any species of that genus is denied: but the Spirit does not proceed from itself: therefore neither by temporal procession, nor by eternal does it proceed from itself.
2. Likewise, from whomever the act of nature is denied, the mode of that act is also denied: but procession from itself is denied of the Holy Spirit: therefore the mode should also be denied, namely that it proceeds from itself temporally.
3. Likewise, because the Father is not from another, therefore it does not suit him to be shown to be temporally from an act: therefore similarly, because the Holy Spirit is not from itself, therefore it does not suit him to be shown to be temporally from itself: but it is shown, when it is said to proceed from itself: therefore that expression is false.

Solution. As we said at the beginning of this distinction, concerning the exposition and truth and propriety of these expressions, a discordant opinion of the Doctors is found. There are those who, by the reasons introduced above, say all these are false, the Spirit sends itself, the Spirit is sent by itself, the Spirit proceeds from itself: and they say that if they are found in authority, they should be explained thus, the Spirit sends itself, that is, from the Spirit is the effect in which it is known to be sent. But because they are found expressly in the authorities of the Saints, and here conceded by the Master, it seems difficult to me that they are said to be false. Hence others say, that to send and to proceed are said in two ways, namely properly, and improperly. Properly, when it implies the distinction of the messenger and the one sending: and thus it is not taken in these expressions. Sometimes, however, to send is the same as to give: and thus it is taken less properly: and in this sense they concede these, and they wish to draw this from the Letter, where the Master says, that the Holy Spirit gives itself, and is given by itself: which is itself to proceed temporally and to send. The opinion of others is, that it is not the intention of Augustine and the Master to say, that to give or to send are the same, except according to reason and suppositum, not however according to intention: and they say, that when it is said, the Holy Spirit sends itself, two things are implied in the verb. One from the principal signification of the verb; because to send signifies mission, just as to walk signifies walking. The other is what is in the verb, namely the effective act of that which is connoted, which is conferred in time to whom the mission is made: and therefore they say, when it is said, the Holy Spirit sends itself, that the Holy Spirit does not render the suppositum to the verb except for the sake of the second. But when it is added itself, the act of this verb, to send, passes into two: of which one is in the other: and therefore they are as one conjoined: for the effective act of the connoted passes over that which is effected in the mission itself: but because in that the Spirit is manifested, as existing in it in a special way, therefore it also passes over the Spirit not simply, but according to which it exists specially in that: so that by the temporal mission the Spirit is not made simply, but is made to exist there in this way in which it was not before, and this is shown by the reason of that effect: just as we also say that the Word is not made, but nevertheless is made according to the flesh, so here the Spirit is not made by the mission, but is made by the mission itself that it is in this otherwise than before: and this opinion more agrees with the sayings of the Saints: and therefore it pleases me more. Therefore the sense is, the Holy Spirit sends itself, that is, from the conferring of the Spirit by which it gives itself, there is an effect in which the Spirit is manifested to be from another, and in this it is sent: because the principal signification of the verb from the mission itself shows to be from another: because otherwise it would not suit it to send from itself.

To the objections, therefore, it must be said in order.

To the first, that the Spirit sends itself: and I well concede, that passive mission makes known that the sent is from another: but active, that the sent is from that which is sent: but it has already been said, that for the sake of the principal signification the act of mission does not go out from the suppositum of the expression, but for the sake of the act causing those effects in which it is known to be from another: and therefore the pronoun shows the passive mission to be in the Holy Spirit, but the suppositum does not show the active mission to be in it: and under this mode the sense is, the Spirit sends itself, that is, from the conferring of the Spirit in which it gives itself, there is an effect in which it is known to be from another: and this is true.

To the other it must be said, that the suppositum in that act of which it is the suppositum does not seek authority in the apposite: because this mission is from the power of love, not from the power of authority or dominion, as was said above in another question.

To the other it must be said, that it is true, that to send and to be sent for the sake of the principal signification require distinct persons: but not for the sake of the other act which is also common to the three persons, namely the effective conferring of that gift in which the Holy Spirit is made to be present: and therefore it is not necessary that the Holy Spirit be distinguished from itself.

To the other it must be said, that it is different in the Father: because in the Father the principal signification of the verb which is passive mission as it holds itself on the part of the apposite, can be saved neither with respect to itself, nor with respect to any other: because in no way is it from another so that it can be sent: and therefore it cannot be signified to be from another. But in the Son and the Holy Spirit the passive signification of the verb is saved according to which it passes into the reciprocal pronoun: although it is not saved with respect to that suppositum, but absolutely with respect to the suppositum which is understood to act with the suppositum the same act: because the act denoting the effect in the creature is common to the three persons: and all persons are supposed in the expression by the nature of the verb, although only one is signified in the expression: and therefore the verb as to the act of donation has all for suppositum: but as to the act which the mission adds, it has for suppositum the persons to whom the mission suits.

If, however, you ask, Why is one person more expressed there than another, if that act is common? The response is, that this is done, because that act is more by appropriation manifesting of one person than another: as wisdom conferred shows the Son, and grace the Holy Spirit.

To what is further asked about this, the Holy Spirit is sent by itself: I say without prejudice, that this is more improper than the active, for two reasons: because here passive mission is signified with respect to itself, and because a preposition is placed denoting the principle: nevertheless it must be conceded, because the Saints posit it: and then it is conceded under the same sense, that the verb is divided according to the acts imported, namely of conferring, and of mission: and it is referred according to one act to the suppositum of the Holy Spirit, and to other persons, although it suits it appropriately: and according to the other act it is referred to the persons according to the intellect acting with it. And by this the solution to all that was objected against that proposition is clear.

And note, that there are some who briefly and lightly extricate themselves here, and say, that properly the Father and the Son send the Holy Spirit, but the Holy Spirit does not properly send itself: and therefore it is said to send itself, because it approves its mission made by them as of something spontaneous it is said, it makes itself do this, because it does this from the freedom of its will and from love.

To what is further asked about this, the Holy Spirit proceeds from itself: I say, that in my judgment this has less propriety than any of the others: nevertheless because the Saint says it, I concede it under this sense, that it is understood of passive temporal procession: and then I explain it just as that other, the Holy Spirit sends itself. Because although procession does not say anything except comparison to the principle from which, nevertheless when temporal determination is added, comparison to the effect is also added, and to that into which it proceeds.

To what is objected against it, it must be said that temporal procession shows the eternal: but it does not show it to be from the same suppositum which is signified in the expression, as was said before.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said temporal, it is not placed by this in any species of procession of the Holy Spirit: for it does not come as a difference, but rather as an accident, not to the procession in itself, but it happens to it on the part of the term into which the temporal procession is: and therefore it also divides its reason: because temporal procession is procession in a certain respect.

And if you object, that according to this it should not infer it. It must be said, that it does not divide in the act of procession, but rather in the mode of signifying it: because temporal can be signified in a suppositum to which it does not suit, as when it is said, the Spirit proceeds from itself, the passive eternal procession does not suit this suppositum which is signified as acting it, except for the sake of the act of donation of the effect in which the Spirit is and is given, and not for the sake of the principal signification: and therefore also as to this it does not infer it. For I cannot infer, the Spirit proceeds from itself temporally, therefore it proceeds from itself: but thus, therefore it proceeds from whomever it proceeds.

To the other it must be said, that this is not the mode which regards the principal signification in the verb, as specifying it, but rather dividing it, as it is signified in such a suppositum, as was said.

To the last it must be said, that it is not similar concerning the Father: and the reason for this was said before: because the principal signification of the act does not have place in him with respect to any suppositum.

Divisio Textus

Then it is asked concerning the second part which begins there, "But do not wonder," etc. For the entire treatise on the mission of the Son is introduced, so that the mission of the Holy Spirit may be proven.

However, it is divided into two parts. In the first, he shows who sent the Son. In the second, he declares the modes of his mission.

Here it is asked, Whether only once, etc.

The first is subdivided into three parts. In the first, he shows that for God to be sent by God is possible. In the second, through the words of Ambrose and Augustine, he shows that the Son is sent by the Holy Spirit, there, D, AND. In the third, he shows that also by himself, that the Son was sent by the Holy Spirit, etc., he was sent, there, E, Then he shows that he was given also by himself, etc.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Mission Of The Son Is More Manifest Than The Mission Of The Holy Spirit

Whether the mission of the Son is more manifest than the mission of the Holy Spirit?

Whether the mission of the Son is more manifest than the mission of the Holy Spirit?

1. However, here arises a doubt concerning the first: because the reasoning of the Master in the text seems not to hold from the lesser as it does: because in Christ there are diverse natures, although not diverse persons: and thus, by the grace of diverse natures, it is more fitting for Him to send and be sent than for the Holy Spirit: therefore, his reasoning is not from the lesser.
2. Likewise, Augustine says that it is equally fitting for the Son and the Holy Spirit to be sent: therefore, one cannot be proven by the other.

Solution. It must be said that it is a reasoning from the similar confirmed by authority, because by the power of authority it takes the form of inferring its similar. Or it must be said that the mission of the Son is more manifest than that of the Spirit: and therefore that is proven by this. Or it may be said that it is from the lesser: because to the Son, as far as the nature of the principle is concerned, it is more fitting to send than to the Holy Spirit: according to which it is more fitting, that it is fitting for more reasons, than that which is fitting for fewer.

In opposition, it must be said that although in Christ there are diverse natures, nevertheless to send and to be sent is fitting only to the person: but it is true that it is fitting to Him by the grace of the natures which are in Him: and thus it is also fitting for the Holy Spirit to give and be given, as was said above, although it is not fitting for Him to make and be made, because He is not united to the affections in which He is given. Hence, although the Son was not made in the flesh, He was still given in the flesh, while He was in that flesh, just as the Spirit is essentially in the gifts in which He is given.

Articulus 7 — Whether Each Divine Person Can Be Sent, And What These Words Mean, 'To Send' And 'To Be Sent'

Whether any divine person can be sent, and what these words, to send and to be sent, signify?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, at the end of chapter B, "Therefore the Son and the Holy Spirit were sent where they were."

1. For this seems impossible: because on Ezekiel, xvi, the Gloss of Jerome says: "What is within cannot be sent." Therefore, since any person is in the divine nature within itself, it seems that it cannot be sent.
2. Likewise, in bodily sending it is such that the sent is naturally separated from the sender: therefore it seems that this also ought to be in spiritual sending; therefore it seems that it is not fitting for any of the persons to be sent.
3. Furthermore, it seems that the sender always comes with the sent: for that which is one and the same with the messenger always comes wherever the sent or messenger comes: but the Father is one and the same with the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that the Father comes wherever the Son and the Holy Spirit are sent: but wherever someone comes by himself, he does not need a messenger: the Father comes by himself to all to whom he sends the Son and the Holy Spirit: therefore the sending of the Son and the Holy Spirit is superfluous.

If perhaps you say that he comes by the unity of nature, but not by the effect connoted in the creature: this is false, because that effect is common and indivisible.

For the sake of this, it is further asked, what do these words, to send and to be sent, signify?

1. And it seems by Augustine in book IV on the Trinity, and here by the Master, that they signify the commendation of the principle: therefore they are notional. This same thing seems by this, that they do not pertain to all: because to be sent does not pertain to the Father: therefore it is distinct and notional.
2. Likewise, it will be had below, that by this that the Father sends, and the Son is sent and the Holy Spirit, it is not shown that the Father is greater than the Son or the Holy Spirit: but this cannot be if they were essential words: therefore they seem to predicate a notion or notional act.
3. Likewise, Augustine says, as was had above, that to be sent is to be known to be from another. But a person is not known to be from another by essence or by essential things. Therefore these words are notional and imply distinction.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Notional things pertain from eternity: but these pertain from time: therefore they are not notional.

1. Likewise, every word connoting an effect in the creature signifies the divine essence: for this rule has long been given: but these words connote an effect in the creature: therefore, etc.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that Jerome either speaks of bodily sending, or he understands that what is within by the indistinction of person and nature, that this cannot be sent: but the first seems to be the understanding of Jerome, because he says that what is associated in the body, this cannot be sent.

To the other it must be said, that in spiritual sending where sending is not a change of place, but the reception of a new effect in which the person is known, a change of place is not required: because a change of place is due to the imperfection of the sent, who cannot cause in every place that to which he is sent, because he is not everywhere.

To the other it must be said, that I well concede this, whether the sending of the Son is into the world, or the sending of the Son and the Holy Spirit is into the mind, that the sender is always with the sent. Of the first Christ says: "He who sent me is with me, and has not left me alone: because I always do what is pleasing to him." Of the second, he himself says: "We will come to him (namely I and the Father and the Holy Spirit), and we will make our abode with him." But yet in the argument it must be cautioned, that although the Father is one with the Son, yet he is not the same with the Son, unless the term "the same" is taken neutrally.

To what is objected against, it must be said that the sending is not superfluous, nor is the reason of the sent destroyed: because sending is (as was said above) showing faith according to the distinction of persons, which it shows in an effect appropriable to one more than to another: but it is true that it would be superfluous if it were for nothing else except that the Father (because otherwise he could not come through the Son sent, and through the Holy Spirit) would come to us. For this would be absurd and unfaithful to think. For the Father can come by himself, just as the Son and the Holy Spirit. But the sending is useful to us, as was said: because it shows us the faith of the distinction of persons.

To what is further asked, it is responded diversely by the Doctors. For some say that these words primarily signify distinction, and secondarily essence for the sake of the connoted effect. But some say conversely: and I think that they speak more truly. For there is something essentially essential like essence, substance, and suchlike: and something is personally personal, like the Father generating: and something is personally essential, like God from God: and something is essentially notional, or personal, like to send and to be sent: for by this the effect over which the act is imported by the word, they signify the divine essence, and they co-signify by the mode of their signification the distinction of persons.

And by this the solution to all objections is clear: because the notional co-signified makes it so that it does not pertain to all persons to send and to be sent: but the effect makes it so that they pertain from time, and that they are referred to the divine essence.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Son Is Said To Be Sent By The Very Fact That He Was Made

Whether the Son is said to be sent by the very fact that He was made?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

He shows that the Son was sent by the very fact that He was made, etc.

1. For this does not seem so: since His mission is referred to something other than His making: because He can be sent often, but not often be made flesh.
2. Likewise, it is fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent, but not to be incarnated: therefore, He was not sent by the very fact that He was made.

To this it must be said that Augustine says this because the mission of the Son into the world is known from the fact that He was made flesh: because that mission is united in reality with the incarnation, although the intention of one and the other is different.

To the objection, it must be said that the mission into the world cannot happen often: but the mission into the mind can happen often, as the Master will show below in the Letter.

To the other, it must be said that it is not fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent into the world: because this is united with being incarnated: and Augustine speaks here of that mission which is into the world.

Articulus 9 — Whether It Befits The Holy Spirit To Send Or To Give The Son

Whether it is fitting for the Holy Spirit to send or give the Son?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Now the Lord God has sent me, and the Spirit. From this indeed it is desired to infer that he was sent by the Holy Spirit: although it is said that this is fitting to him according to man, according to which he is also lesser than the Father and the Holy Spirit, and himself.

It is asked according to this, Whether it is fitting for the Holy Spirit to send the Son into the mind? It seems that it is:

1. Because the Son sends himself: therefore by the term "sends" authority is not implied with respect to the supposit which the verb supposes; therefore it seems that it can be conceded.
2. Likewise, Whoever is from another, it is fitting for him to be sent with respect to each one, as the Master seems to say here: but the Son is from another: therefore it is fitting for him to be sent by each of the persons: therefore it can be conceded that the Holy Spirit sends the Son.

But on the contrary: Neither is the Son from the Holy Spirit: nor does the Holy Spirit operate through the Son, because the preposition could not denote the relation of a principle with respect to the Son: since therefore there are not more in the expression than the signification of mission and effect in the creature, it does not seem to be conceded that the Holy Spirit sends the Son.

Furthermore, this does not seem to be conceded, that the Holy Spirit sends the Son into the flesh: for it is one thing to send into the flesh, and another to send one existing in the flesh. For to send into the flesh is not fitting except for one existing beyond the flesh. And thus it is not fitting to send the Son except as he is an eternal person: but thus the Spirit does not have authority with respect to him: therefore it seems that the Holy Spirit does not send him into the flesh nor into the mind.

Further it is asked, if the Holy Spirit gives the Son?

It seems that not: because the giver in the given either has the power of authority, or of love. But the first the Holy Spirit does not have in the Son: but it seems that neither the second, because the Son is not the gift of love, rather this is the Holy Spirit, and since the gift of love of this kind effects power, it does not seem to be fitting for the Holy Spirit with respect to the Son, but rather for the Son with respect to the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said that some distinguish here a threefold mission, namely into the mind, and into the flesh, and to preach: and they say that the Holy Spirit does not send the Son by the first two missions, but by the third: and they say this because of the reasons introduced: and this is the opinion of William of Auxerre: and it is drawn from the Letter, where Ambrose says:

Well does he say, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me: whence because as the son of man he is anointed, and sent to preach. It is implied that the Saints speak of that sole mission, when they say the Holy Spirit sends the Son.

Others are who say otherwise, agreeing that it is fitting for any person to send, but not for any to be sent: for it is not fitting for the Father to be sent, but for the Son and the Holy Spirit. Whence any person can send that one to whom it is fitting to be sent: and this because the term "send" does not denote authority in its supposit with respect to that over which the act of the verb passes, which is passive mission: but it receives the supposit for the sake of the common act which causes the connoted effect in which the sent person is known: and because this the Saints seem to feel who prove the mission by comparison of this effect, therefore this opinion pleases us more: let us agree therefore with the first two reasons proving this.

To that which is objected, that the Son is neither from the Holy Spirit: nor does the Holy Spirit operate through him: it must be said that it is true: but this is not required to be sent by the Spirit: but it suffices that the Holy Spirit operates the effect in which the Son is and is known as being from another, as we said above.

To what is asked, Whether he sends him into the flesh? It must be said according to this opinion, that yes: because he operates the flesh in which he is known: and the Son is being from another: and this does not require any authority in the supposit of the word with respect to the matter of the act, or with respect to the apposite.

To what is further asked, Whether the Holy Spirit gives the Son? I concede that yes in the same sense: and it is not necessary that there be any power or authority signified in the Holy Spirit with respect to the Son: because when it is said, the Holy Spirit gives the Son, the term "Spirit" does not suppose the verb except as to the effective act of the connoted effect, as was previously held: in which effect however the Son is taken as being from another: and thus it is plain to respond to all.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Spirit Can Be Called The Spirit Of Christ, And In Christ

Whether the Spirit can be called the Spirit of Christ, and in Christ?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

According to divinity, the Spirit is not above Christ, but in Christ.

For from this it seems to imply the opinion of the Greeks to be true, that the Spirit is of Christ, as also resting in Him, and proceeding indistinctly from the Father.

Solution. The term "in" has to denote many relations, namely the identity of nature, according to which each person is in the other: and it has to denote the simultaneity of nature, according to which one of the relatives has being together with the other, and in the intellect of it: and in this way, it understands the Spirit to be in Christ: and from this it follows that the Spirit is from Christ, as was proven above.

Articulus 11 — Whether This Is To Be Granted, 'The Trinity Sends Itself Or Gives Itself'; And Whether The Father Sends The Son, And The Son Sends Himself And The Spirit; And The Spirit Sends Himself And The Son; And Whether The Father, Son, And Holy Spirit Send The Son And The Holy Spirit

Whether this is to be conceded, that the Trinity sends itself or gives itself: and whether the Father sends the Son, and the Son sends himself and the Spirit: and the Spirit sends himself and the Son: and whether the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit send the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

The Trinity gave him, for it is asked according to this, if this is to be conceded, that the Trinity sends itself? And it seems that it is not,

1. Because the Trinity is not from another: since therefore to send is to be known to be from another, it seems that the Trinity does not send itself.
2. Likewise, if the Trinity sends itself, the Trinity would be sent by itself: therefore also the Father would be sent, which is against Augustine saying that the Father alone is not read to be sent.

On the contrary:
1. Augustine says that the Trinity will descend into the minds of the faithful: since therefore it does not descend unless sent, it seems that it sends itself.

1. Furthermore, the image of the Trinity is in the soul: therefore it seems that the Trinity is known in it; and to be known in effect causes mission: therefore it seems that the Trinity sends itself.

Further, I ask, if the Trinity gives itself? It seems that it does not: because it does not have any authority with respect to itself.

It is further asked, if the Father sends himself and the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit sends himself and the Son according to what was said above: whether I can infer in the plural: therefore the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit send the Son and the Holy Spirit?

It seems that it is so: because a singular doubled infers its plural: but in the premises singular missions are doubled: therefore it infers the plural.

But on the contrary: When I say, the Father sends the Son and the Holy Spirit, in the supposition of the verb authority is noted with respect to the apposite, and also the operation of the connoted effect: but when I say, the Son sends himself and the Holy Spirit, or conversely, authority cannot always be noted, therefore in another and another reason the term "to be sent" is taken: but many things said equivocally do not infer any plural: for it does not follow, this is a barking dog, and a celestial one: therefore these are dogs: therefore it seems that I cannot infer in the plural.

Solution. It must be said that, as I think, this is not to be conceded, that the Trinity sends itself, because the Trinity is not from another, as the first two reasons prove.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that it proceeds from the insufficient: for the operation of the effect in which it is known is not sufficient: but it is necessary that it be known to be from another and that it is from another by the very reason of passive mission: nor is the image such an effect as is required for mission, because that is an effect recalling and sanctifying the creature, which would stray unless it were sent to it, as was proven above by the words of Augustine.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that the Trinity gives itself, according to which to give signifies the power of giving from love alone: for this power anyone has with respect to himself in the bestowal of himself to him whom he loves: and by this also the solution to that which could be objected against is clear.

To what is further asked, whether the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit together send? Some, induced by reason, say that they do not: but I do not see why it cannot be conceded that they send together, especially since we have in the Scripture that the Son with the Father and the Holy Spirit sends himself.

To that therefore which is objected against, it must be said that the diverse relation of the supposition does not make an equivocation of mission: especially since by the grace of that act, which is to operate the connoted effect in him to whom it is sent, the three persons are equally referred to that word.

Divisio Textus

Here it is asked, Whether once only, etc.

Here the Master begins to distinguish the modes of the mission of the Son.

And this part has three parts. In the first, namely in the first two chapters, he raises the question concerning the modes of mission, and determines it. In the second, he shows that according to one of these modes the Son is sent, and according to the other once only, there, L, behold, etc. In the third, he shows that according to one mode he is sent into the world, and according to the other not, there, M, Furthermore it must be noted, that with these two modes, etc.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is True That The Father Sanctified Christ

Whether it is true that the Father sanctified Christ?

Whether it is true that the Father sanctified Christ?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

How the Father sanctified him, etc. itself.

For that is sanctified which from not holy is made holy: and this does not befit Christ who was never not holy.

To this it must be said that to sanctify is taken here for to make holy: not in such a way that he was not holy before and afterwards was made holy: but that the whole was made at once, namely the subject and holiness.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Son Can Be Said To Have Come From Himself

Whether the Son can be said to have come from Himself?

Next, it is inquired concerning this which is said:

But to this it is objected, if the Son from Himself, etc.

For it seems that it is also not fitting for Him according to the form of God: because even according to the form of God He is not from Himself: therefore neither does He come, nor does He do anything from Himself: because the rule is that whatever a proceeding person is, and whatever a proceeding person does, he has and does from the person from whom he proceeds.

Solution. Without doubt, the expression can be verified in one way, etc., according to the form of God, if the pronoun denotes distinction: because then the sense is, I did not come from Myself only. However, if the negation regards the pronoun according to the operation of coming only, it cannot be verified except according to the form of a servant: because He Himself according to the form of God was the cause of His coming, just as the Father.

Articulus 14 — Why The Son Is Sent In Two Ways Rather Than The Holy Spirit

Why is the Son sent in two ways rather than the Holy Spirit? And why did the Father not appear except in a voice, and the Son in flesh, the Spirit in a dove, fiery tongues, and in breath?

Here arises a doubt concerning the two modes of the mission of the Son, namely, why is He sent in two ways rather than the Holy Spirit?

For it seems that the Holy Spirit is also sent visibly and invisibly, namely when He is perceived by the mind, and when He descended upon Christ in the form of a dove.

Furthermore, the Father appeared in a creature not united to Himself, similarly the Holy Spirit: why is it not read that the Son ever appeared in a creature not united to Himself? And if you say that the three appeared to Abraham as a sign of the three persons: and thus the Son appeared in a creature subject not united to Himself: or that He appeared to Moses in the flame of the burning bush. This is nothing because it was shown above that all these things were done through the ministry of angels appearing in the person of God. But I inquire about the assumed creature, in which the divine person appeared by Himself, as the Spirit in the dove, and the Father in the voice, and the Spirit in tongues and in breath: for thus it is not read that the Son appeared, except when He assumed flesh.

Furthermore, why did the Father not appear except in a speaking voice, but the Son only in assumed flesh, and the Holy Spirit in a threefold assumed creature: as in a dove, fiery tongues, and the breath with which the Son breathed upon the disciples?

Solution. It must be said to the first, that the Son has two modes of mission visibly, namely in a creature united to Himself, and invisibly when He is sent into the heart: because He alone is unifiable with the assumed creature: and this will be proven below.

To the objection, it must be said that visibility is not so much considered here in the mode of the mission of the Son as unifiability: and that is lacking in the mission of the Holy Spirit.

To the other, it must be said that the Son ought not to appear in a creature not united: because He had congruence to union, but the other persons did not: and therefore other apparitions were made on account of His own: for what is unifiable with a creature, not united, is not congruent to appear.

To the other, it must be said that the Father is accustomed according to eternal generation by saying to generate: and therefore He has congruence to manifest Himself by speaking in a voice: because thus He is manifested in the personal act by which He relates to the Son: and especially in the voice which says, "This is my beloved Son," etc.: for inasmuch as it was a voice, it manifested the speaker: and by what was said, it showed the Father: so that in both ways the generator and the Word and the Son are shown: of which one signifies the manifestation of the intellect, the other of nature. But the Holy Spirit operates in three ways, namely in gifts ordered to acts of work, and in the remission of sin, and by removing from earthly to heavenly things: and as to the first, He is shown in the dove, as to the second in the fire which is of a consuming nature, and as to the third in the spirit of breath which is spiritual: as it is also sung of Him: "You inspire to make men spiritual."

Or it may be said that the Spirit has something from the name of gift, which is properly said: and something from the name of love, which is again properly said: and something from the name of the Holy Spirit, which is again properly said: and as to the first, He appears in the dove: as to the second in the fire, because love is fire: and as to the third in spiritual breath: and because there are not more proper names of the Holy Spirit, therefore there are not more visible missions of Him. But the Son has congruence to unite to Himself the assumed creature, and therefore He did not appear in the non-united: but human nature has congruence to be united, and therefore in it alone was the Son sent.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Eternal Generation Is Also A Mission

Whether eternal generation is also mission?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

According to which also he could be said to be sent, etc.

For this does not seem so: because eternal generation does not imply a relation to a terminus to which; but mission implies a relation to him to whom it is sent: therefore eternal generation is not mission.

It must be said to this, that it was not the intention of these, that eternal generation is mission, but that it makes a congruity to mission: for he who is begotten is from another; and he who is from another can fittingly be sent.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Son Is Sent Into Pious Souls, Or Only The Holy Spirit, And This With Grace Making One Pleasing, Or Without It

Whether the Son is sent into pious souls, or only the Holy Spirit: and this with grace making one pleasing, or without it?

Whether the Son is sent into pious souls, or only the Holy Spirit: and this with grace making one pleasing, or without it?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

When He thus transfers Himself into pious souls, etc.

For pious souls are the souls of the Saints: therefore it seems that the Son is not spiritually sent except into the Saints.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The Holy Spirit is sent to sanctify the creature: and two cannot be sent for the same purpose, unless each of them is insufficient by itself: therefore it seems that when wisdom transfers itself into holy souls, this is the mission of the Holy Spirit and not of the Son.

1. Likewise, all sanctification is of goodness: but goodness is an attribute of the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that the mission into souls is of the Holy Spirit and not of the Son.
2. Likewise, it has been held above that the mission is for sanctifying and recalling the rational creature, which had strayed: but this cannot be done except through grace making one pleasing: therefore, since the Holy Spirit is sent in that, it seems that the Son is not sent into pious souls.
3. Likewise, to constitute friends of God is properly of love: therefore, since (as it is held) the mission constitutes friends of God, it seems the Holy Spirit is sent, who is properly love in the Trinity.
4. Perhaps you might say that the mission of the Son is in that which constitutes Prophets, which pertains to the illumination of the intellect: and the mission of the Holy Spirit is for the perfection of the affection in constituting friends of God through love.

On the contrary: 1 Corinthians 12:4 and following, among the gifts of the Spirit, in which the Spirit is properly manifested, wisdom, knowledge, faith, the working of miracles, prophecy are placed: therefore it seems that both show the mission of the Holy Spirit, and not of the Son.

1. If perhaps you say that the Son is sent in the illumination of the intellect without grace making one pleasing, as some say.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Mission is not that He is present who was not present before, since each person is present everywhere: but that He is present otherwise, or for another purpose, who was previously present essentially, presentially, and potentially.

1. Similarly, mission is not such that only the gift of the person is present, and not the person: because thus the person itself would be falsely said to be sent: therefore, since He cannot be present otherwise or for another purpose except through grace making one pleasing, it is necessary that both the mission of the Son and the mission of the Holy Spirit are in grace making one pleasing.
2. Furthermore, concerning the mission of the Son, two things are said here, namely that He transfers Himself into holy souls, constitutes friends and Prophets: and another which says, "Send wisdom from your holy heavens, that it may be with me and labor with me, that I may know what is pleasing to you at all times." Neither of these is without grace making one pleasing. Therefore, since we cannot speak of mission except as we have received from the Saints, it seems that it should not be said that the Son is sent without grace making one pleasing.
3. Likewise, Wisdom 1:4: "Wisdom will not enter into a malevolent soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sins." Therefore, since wisdom entering into the mind is wisdom being sent, it seems that it is not sent except to the pious.
4. Likewise, the mission of wisdom into the world was in the bestowal of the greatest grace: therefore, since one mission corresponds to another: for it is sent into the mind, that the grace of the mission into the world may avail for us: it seems that the mission into the mind is in the bestowal of grace.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that just as the open missions of the Son and the Holy Spirit were ordered, so also are the hidden ones: and both are always for the same end, although not always for the same act. For as Bernard says:

First the Son came, and taught faith: and therefore I concede this, afterwards the Holy Spirit came, and...

ignites to love.

which according to the intentions of the Saints, neither the Son nor the Holy Spirit is sent except in grace making one pleasing: for the Holy Spirit is not called a gift, which the Father and the Son give to each other, but because they give to us: in this way the Son is also said to be given, not because something is given that is had without him, but because he himself is given in the gift ~ as it is said, James 1:5: If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all abundantly, and does not reproach. Hence I say, that in the end these missions are not distinguished, but in the proximate act because the Son illuminates the intellect, and the Spirit ignites the affection. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said, that the end of the mission is sanctification and return: and this is not only of the Holy Spirit: because return signifies the showing of the way, and in this respect it is of the Son: and it signifies the attainment of the good, and in this respect it is of the Holy Spirit. For they are sent together: yet neither is imperfect, nor is superfluous: because it is necessary on account of the double part of our soul, which is intellect and affection.

To the other it must be said, that although grace in general, and with respect to the act which is to make pleasing, is attributed and shown to the Holy Spirit, yet this grace or that is, or can be attributed to the Son: and therefore when the mission is in the conferring of particular grace to the intellect or affection, I say that then the Son is sent.

To the other it must be said, that to establish friends two things are required, namely the knowledge of friendship and of the friend, and of those things through which friendship is contracted and preserved, and this is of the Son: and the other is what is the love of the friend, and the foundation of love, which is honorable and part of the honorable, as the Philosopher says, and in this respect the Holy Spirit is sent.

To the other it must be said, that prophecy is said in four ways according to Augustine, namely by corporeal vision, spiritual, intellectual, and by the dignity or congruity of the perception of the secrets of God. As it is said of Abraham the Prophet, of whom, Genesis 17:17 and 18, it is said: Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do, since he is to become a great nation and in Psalm 104:15: Do not touch my anointed ones, and to my Prophets, etc. And with respect to this last, two things are required for prophecy, namely illumination, and grace making one pleasing: and in this alone prophecy is a complete mission, but not in the other three, except in a certain way: for to infuse revelation is one thing, and to transfer wisdom into the soul itself is another: for in the first wisdom is not sent except in a certain way, but in the second it is sent simply.

To the other it must be said, that the distribution of all spiritual gifts pertains to the Holy Spirit according to that property of the Spirit, which unites and vivifies the mystical body: because in that manner, just as our spirit divides to each member proportionally to itself, so the Holy Spirit uniting the Church, divides gifts as he wills: but yet the gifts themselves considered in themselves, sometimes show the Son: and in this manner the Apostle speaks, as is clear to one considering the circumstances of the Letter.

To the other it must be said, that as it has been proven, thus it is shown that such an opinion is false.

Articulus 17 — Whether Our Knowledge Is Of The Substance Of The Mission, Such That Knowledge Is Required For The Mission, And Whether Someone Without It Can Be Worthy Of Hatred Or Love

Whether our knowledge is substantial to mission, such that knowledge is required for mission? And whether someone can be worthy of hatred or love?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

And then to each is sent with whom he is known, etc. It seems, therefore, that our knowledge is substantial to mission.

1. But against this is that mission is especially made to the simpler ones, who have more grace in the office than in knowledge: for an old woman sometimes knows little or nothing, and yet it is sent to her more frequently than to a great theologian knowing much.
2. Furthermore, Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred. But to whom the Holy Spirit is sent, and to whom the Son is sent, if he knows the mission, he knows himself to be worthy of eternal life: therefore he knows himself to be worthy of love: and thus the word of Ecclesiastes is falsified.
3. If you say that no one knows as a man: but Augustine says that insofar as we perceive something of this mission in the mind, to that extent we are not in this world: and thus in this life something can be known, as the Apostle knew about himself, when he said: Do you seek proof of him who speaks in me, Christ?
4. And, to Romans 8:38: I am certain that neither death, nor life,... nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. If, I say, you say thus. Against: Job 3:23, concerning that, To a man whose way is hidden, and God has surrounded him with darkness: there Gregory says that the chief cause of weeping for a holy man is that he does not know whether he is worthy of hatred or love: because there is a way that seems right to a man, and its end leads to death.
5. Likewise, By what will a man know that the Holy Spirit is sent to him? For the acts of the Spirit are very similar to the acts of nature or the heart: as in this very act which is to love, it can be seen: for I can know that I love God for himself, and above all things: but whether this proceeds from charity, I cannot know, since the Philosopher determines that a truly brave man, by the grace of good, and for the sake of the good of virtue, even despises life: and yet that does not necessarily proceed from charity.

Similarly, the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 13:3: If I deliver my body so that I may burn, but have not charity, it profits me nothing: for the sake of God I can set aside life: and yet I may not know that I have charity: therefore I may not know that the Holy Spirit is sent to me.

Solution. Knowledge is required for mission, as it seems to me, but not all, but threefold, namely one which is on the part of the known, namely that I feel in myself the gift in which as in a sign the person sent can be known: but I call a sign that which has the act of grace making one pleasing, and is appropriable to the Son or the Holy Spirit. The second is habitual knowledge. The third is conjectural from signs, as if I see myself able to easily do what one not having grace either cannot do, or can do with great difficulty: if I see my spirit to be free from vain hope, and vain love, and vain joy, and fleeting sadness, and worldly fear, and the like. And I think that triple knowledge suffices according to habit for mission, and I say that it is not necessary for knowledge to be present according to act. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that Ecclesiastes does not exclude knowledge from a sign, and conjectural, and habitual: for to whom the Spirit is sent, he has the habit in which this can be known, if the eye is opened, or through revelation after death.

To the other it must be said that the Apostle speaks there of the indwelling of Christ through the operation of miracles, and the power of signs, which he had experienced in himself. And this is not to be sent wisdom except in a certain way, as was previously held.

To the other it must be said that the Apostle either speaks there from a revelation made to him beyond the common law, or he speaks from conjectures.

But to what they say, that certain knowledge is required, I believe it to be false what they say.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Holy Spirit Was Sent More Fully After The Incarnation Than Before, And Whether The Celibacy Of John Is To Be Preferred To The Marriage Of Abraham

Whether the Holy Spirit was sent more fully after the incarnation than before? And whether the celibacy of John is to be preferred to the marriage of Abraham?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

He was also sent before the incarnation, and to all the saints, etc.

For it can be a doubt, whether he was sent more fully before the incarnation than after? For it seems that he was sent more fully after: because the grace of the New Testament is fuller than that of the Old: since therefore the mission is for the sake of grace, it seems that the Son or the Holy Spirit is sent more fully in the New than in the Old.

Against this is what Augustine says in the book on the Good of Marriage, that the celibacy of John is not preferred to the marriage of Abraham: therefore neither are other gifts preferred, as it seems.

To this I respond with Augustine in the book IV on the Trinity, chapter 20, thus: What the Evangelist says, that, And below, the Spirit was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified: how is it understood except that certainly that giving or mission of the Spirit after the glorification of Christ was to be, such as never was before: for neither was it none before, but it was not such there: It was necessary for the coming of the Spirit to be shown by sensible signs, so that it might be shown that the whole world and all nations established in various tongues would believe in Christ through the gift of the Holy Spirit, so that what is sung in Psalm xvi, 4, might be fulfilled: There are no speeches nor words, whose voices are not heard.

According to this, it must be distinguished, that there is a mission in personal grace, and a mission ordered to the conversion of the world, and there is an invisible mission, and a mission in a visible sign. Therefore, personal and invisible missions are related before and after the advent, as exceeding and exceeded: because to certain persons there more grace was infused, and to certain persons more here. But the universal and visible mission was such after, as never was before.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that it is true what is objected concerning the condition of the state: but certain persons existing there in the Old Testament (as Augustine says) pertained to the New: and certain conversely.

To what is objected in opposition, it must be said that this is true what Augustine says concerning the habit of continence, which was greatest in the Patriarchs: but concerning the act of continence and the state, virginity is preferred to every marriage.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Sent To The Angels

Whether the Holy Spirit is sent to the Angels?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

As it also fills the holy Angels, etc.

For from this it seems that the Spirit is sent to the Angels.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Mission is not to the same one who is in the state of messenger: but the Angel is often the messenger of mission, as it seems: because when the Son was sent into the flesh, the Angel announced it: and when the mission ought to be made in the mind, the Angel assists in this by guarding and suggesting, as Bernard says: and by running between the soul and God, presenting the vows and desires of the soul to God, and bringing grace to the soul: therefore it seems that mission is not made to the Angels.

1. Likewise, Mission is not made except to one who is distant: but he who is always in the secret of the house is not distant: therefore mission is not made to the Angel.
2. Likewise, Mission is made (as Augustine says in the authority cited above) so that he who had wandered might be recalled: a good Angel never wandered: therefore mission is not made to the Angel.
3. Likewise, Mission is made to sanctify the creature, but to sanctify is to make holy from not holy: this cannot be done in an Angel, nor has it ever been done: therefore, etc.

But on the contrary: 1. Mission to one who is holy is not to be future according to this except once, namely in the first grace, which is false: because Augustine says that he is sent as many times as he perceives something of interior grace: but this happens often.

1. Likewise, Here it is said that the Son is often sent invisibly.

Solution. We say that mission is made in the perception of grace and in the increase of grace: because the Spirit is always felt to be present differently than it was before, and it is sent to the Angels, and is sent with regard to new revelations: although grace which is substantial as a reward is not increased in them.

To what is first objected, it must be said that the Angel is not a messenger in that mission, so that he himself with grace would enter the mind: but he is a messenger as one serving the Lord who is sent, and preparing the way by the removal of impediments, and this through an operation external to the mind, such as suggestion, and teaching, and exhortation, and the like: but not as inspiration which is intrinsic to the mind: and therefore to it mission is made, and is made.

To the other it must be said that the distance which this mission requires is not local: but as nature is distant from grace: because through nature and natural things it cannot be had, but from God alone: and therefore since the Angel is thus distant from grace, mission is necessary to him.

To the other it must be said that to recall the wandering is twofold, namely who has already wandered, or lest he who is on the way might wander: and in this second way mission is to the Angel and to the Saints, who already nevertheless have the Holy Spirit: although they are not confirmed like the Angel, and therefore they need more frequent mission.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that sanctification is made in the increase of grace, and in the first grace: because sanctification is said in three ways, namely to make substance and grace together as in Christ: or to make nature and add grace, as in the first man and good Angel: or to make from not holy, holy, as in converted sinners.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Soul, By The Mind Grasping What Is Eternal, Is Essentially In Heaven And Outside This World

Whether the soul, by understanding what is eternal, is essentially in heaven and outside this world?

Whether the soul, by understanding what is eternal, is essentially in heaven and outside this world?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says: For we also, insofar as we understand something eternal, are not in this world.

1. For from this it seems to be taken that the soul, by understanding something eternal, is essentially in heaven, although accidentally, namely because it perceives by the mind that which is in heaven.
2. Which also seems to be able to be proven by many reasons thus: The soul is not related to a place except accidentally: for it is not in this place in which I am with my soul, except because the body in which it is, is in this place: if therefore being in some place accidentally makes it substantially be there, since it is accidentally in heaven, it will be there substantially and essentially.
3. Likewise, a form does not determine a place for itself per se, even a corporeal one: because we see that the same form according to the reason of the form is in every position of the body above and below. Hence thus: No form determines a place for itself per se, but accidentally: but everything of this kind is in all places to which it is accidentally determined: therefore a form is in all places to which it is accidentally determined: but the soul is the most noble of forms: therefore the soul is in all places to which it is accidentally determined: but it is accidentally determined to that which it apprehends: therefore it is in the place of that which it apprehends by the mind: therefore since that which it apprehends by the mind is outside the world, it will be essentially as in a place outside the world.

4. Likewise, this seems to be said by Augustine, that the soul is more truly where it loves, than where it is. Likewise, the Apostle: Our conversation is in heaven.
5. Likewise, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names says that by the power of prayer we do not draw God, who is present everywhere, to ourselves, but we extend ourselves into God.

But on the contrary it seems that

1. A form does not have natural being except in matter: and natural being is the proper being of a form: therefore the soul by that which it is, is only in the matter of the body.
2. Likewise, it is the same in some things moving towards form and towards place, as the Philosopher says, because the mover gives to the mobile both its form and all natural consequences of it: and the Philosopher says that the natural consequence of the form of fire is the higher place: therefore it seems that a form in its being determines a place.
3. Likewise, if I say, a form is in matter: either it is in matter accidentally, or per se. It is evident that not accidentally: because thus no one thing would be constituted in nature: therefore it is per se in it: therefore it is more related to the place of the matter, than to the place of another to which it is not joined except accidentally.

Solution. It must be said that the soul according to that which it is and by essence, as long as man lives, is only in the body. But in whatever it thinks about or is affected by, it is as in an object, to whose place in its essence it is referred neither per se nor accidentally.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Augustine speaks, that we are not in this world as to the mode of knowing or living: because according to the way of the world we know through a mirror in an enigma: but insofar as we apprehend something eternal, we know by somewhat touching the species, and we are abstracted from the material things of this world.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that the soul is not in a corporeal place except accidentally: but that accident is joined to it by nature: for through the body it is in a place, and unless it were essentially in the body, it would not be in the place of the body: and therefore through that in which it is not essentially, but rather that is in it by essence and likeness, it does not have any place either per se or accidentally.

To the other, it must be said that a form per se, that is, without matter, does not determine a place for itself, because thus it is simple: but thus it is only by intention: but by its being in matter it determines a place for itself: so also, that it moves to that place, unless it is prohibited, as the Philosopher says. But being thus is not accidental, as accidental is that which can be present and absent to the same in a remaining nature: but it is accidental, as it is fitting through another, namely through that which is in matter: and this is natural, not accidental to the form, if accident is properly taken according to the nature of accident. Hence a form is to be considered in three ways, namely as it is understood, and thus it is a species in the soul of the one understanding, and the species which is in the soul of one is not the species which is in the soul of another: or as the reason of a common nature, abstracting from any particular, and thus it is in each of its particulars and always: or according to the being which it has in nature, and thus it is in that which is this something: and not accidentally, but naturally: for it is absurd to say that a form has being in matter accidentally, unless in this way taking accident which is fitting through another: but this accident does not oppose the substantial and natural: as it is evident, that by this accident Socrates is accidentally an animal, and yet to be an animal substantially and naturally is fitting to Socrates.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine calls more truly being, more nobly being, and not more truly in nature: because the soul and any form has more nobly being in a more noble cause, than in itself: because in the first cause it is not mixed with privations and material things, as in itself or in the body.

To the other, it must be said that by the power of prayer we draw ourselves into God: not by place, but by merit, so that we may be present to Him otherwise than we were before.

N. Why is the Father not said to be sent, when He is known by someone as the Son?

Here it is asked, Why is the Father not said to be sent, when He is known in time by someone, like the Son? To which we say, because in Him is the authority of the principle, which does not have from whom it is, from whom are the Son and the Holy Spirit. For the Father is (as Augustine says in the same book) the principle of the whole divinity: or, if it is better said, of the deity. For, as Augustine says in the same: If God the Father had also willed, He would appear visibly through a subject creature: yet most absurdly He would be said to be sent by the Son whom He begot, or by the Holy Spirit who proceeds from Him, but He is fittingly said to be sent, who appeared in the flesh: but He who did not appear in this way is not said to have sent.

Divisio Textus

Then it is asked concerning the third part of the distinction which begins there, "Here it is asked, Why is the Father not said to be sent?"

And it is divided into two. In the first, he shows that the Father is not sent. In the second, he shows that the Son and the Holy Spirit are not lesser because they are sent, there, "Therefore some heretics thought," etc.

Articulus 21 — Whether The Father Gives Himself, Or Is Given By Himself

Whether the Father gives Himself, or is given by Himself?

There is a doubt here, Whether the Father gives Himself, or is given by Himself? For it is sufficiently established from the aforesaid that He cannot be sent or proceed. However, it seems that He does not: because according to the Master, to give oneself is to proceed from oneself temporally and to be sent: but this does not befit the Father: therefore neither does giving.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. To give says nothing except to confer a gift: therefore, since the Father has power from the freedom of love, just as the Son and the Holy Spirit, the Father can give Himself just as the Son and the Holy Spirit.

1. Likewise, just as wisdom is appropriated to the Son, and grace to the Holy Spirit, so power to the Father: therefore, since hope confers ability, it seems that He gives Himself.

Solution. The Masters concede that the Father gives Himself, and is given by Himself: and that giving does not mean sending according to reason, nor proceeding: and this has been sufficiently determined above: yet they do not say that He has an effect so distinct as the Son and the Holy Spirit: because although ability is attributed to the Father, yet the ability of holy souls is in the gifts of intellect and affection: and therefore it is not manifested by giving Himself, as the Son and the Holy Spirit: and therefore it is not so posited by the Saints, that He gives Himself as the Son gives or the Holy Spirit.

But on the contrary: The Father is the principle of the whole divinity: therefore of Himself.

Solution. It does not follow: because the sense is, that He is the principle of the Son and the Holy Spirit in whom is the whole divinity: however, it is said that it is better said of deity than of divinity: because divine being is perpetual being: and this is communicable to creatures, according to what the Philosopher says, that all things desire divine being, and for that they do whatever they do: but deity is the form from which this name God is imposed, which is not communicable to creatures, as noted above.

DISTINCTIO XVI

Divisio Textus

Now concerning the Holy Spirit it must be seen, etc.

Here begins the part which is about the modes of the mission of the Holy Spirit: and there are two modes, namely visible and invisible. The Master treats of the visible first in this distinction: but of the invisible consequently in the following, there, Dist. XVIT, A,

Now let us approach, etc.

However, this distinction is divided into two parts. In the first, he determines how the Holy Spirit is said to be sent in a visible mode. In the second, how He is not said to be lesser than the Father on account of that visible mission, although the Son is said to be lesser than the Father on account of that mission, there, C,

But first it must be asked, since the Son is said, etc.

Articulus 1 — What It Is To Be Sent Visibly, And Whether There Was A Visible Mission In The Old Testament As In The New, And Whether The Father Can Be Sent As The Son

What it is to be sent visibly, and whether visible mission was in the Old Testament as in the New, and whether the Father can be sent as the Son?

In the first part, there is only one chapter, around which a doubt arises before the Letter, What it is to be sent visibly? and secondly, Whether this mission is fittingly made to all or to some? and thirdly, Whether it is for the grace making one pleasing or freely given? and fourthly, Whether it was fitting to be done through the Son or the Holy Spirit?

To the first, it proceeds thus: 1. If to be sent visibly is to appear as a person with a visible sign, as Augustine seems to say in the Letter, since in the Old Testament persons often appeared with visible signs, it seems that this mission was often made in the Old Testament.

1. Furthermore, this also seems for another reason: for visible mission is ordered to the invisible: but the invisible was often made in the Old Testament: therefore also the visible. For the first. In the Letter, Augustine says that in those visible creatures the Holy Spirit was present, so that through them it might be shown that the Holy Spirit was in those to whom those creatures came. The second is proved, Wisdom 9:10: Send her from your holy heavens, and from the throne of your greatness, that she may be with me and labor with me. For this was said in the Old Testament: therefore it seems that such a visible mission was then.
2. Likewise, If a visible creature is showing something divine, it suffices for the reason of visible mission: since, as we had above, the Father appeared in a visible creature, it seems the Father was sent. Genesis 16:2, He saw three, and worshiped one.
3. If you say that these visions of the Father were administered through Angels, and therefore mission is not understood in them: this does not excuse the objection for three reasons: the first of which is that Augustine says that it is most absurd to say that the Father, if He willed, could not appear in a visible creature: therefore, assuming that He appeared, nothing inconvenient should follow: but it follows that He was sent: therefore this does not seem inconvenient: and this was denied above. Therefore, etc.
4. The second reason: Because if an irrational and unintellectual creature (if it may be allowed to say so) suffices to demonstrate the mission of a person, like a dove or breath: much more an intellectual creature, and especially an Angel. For in that, something divine is known so much more, as it is nobler and more divine: since therefore such missions of Angels were often made in the Old Testament, it seems that persons were sent, and even the Father.

5. The third reason is from the authority of Daniel, where it is read that the Ancient of Days sat, and the books were opened before Him. And, Isaiah 6:1, I saw the Lord sitting upon a high and elevated throne, etc. Nor can you say that this was an Angel in the person of God: because the Seraphim do not cry out to an Angel, Holy, holy, holy, nor will an Angel judge in the person of God.

6. If perhaps you say that this was a revelation, and not an apparition, or mission. Against: Such a showing, whatever it may be, was constituting Prophets: because we call Prophets those to whom these things were done: but the proper effect of mission is to constitute Prophets and friends of God, as we had in the preceding distinction, from Wisdom 7:27: Through nations, it transfers itself into holy souls, constituting friends of God and Prophets. Likewise, let us make force in what it says, through nations: therefore not only in our nation, but also in the nation of the Fathers these things were done: therefore it seems that then a visible mission was made, and that the Father and individual persons were sent.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: To Galatians 3:19, The law was put in place by a mediator, ordained by Angels, until the seed should come to whom it was promised. Therefore it seems that all the visions of the Fathers were through the hands of Angels until the advent of Christ. Above, however, it was proved...

it was held that a person is not said to be sent, except in an effect, in which he himself is otherwise or for something else than according to how he is everywhere: and this is held in the Text by Augustine; therefore in such visions no person was ever sent.

§ 1. Also, Augustine in book IV of On the Trinity, says that it would be absurd for the Father to be said to be sent either by him whom he begot, or by him who proceeds from him, even if he is said to have appeared. Therefore, since everyone who is sent, is sent by someone, and the Father cannot be sent by anyone, it seems that he is not sent.

§ 2. Also, Augustine in book IV of On the Trinity, as was established above: To be sent is to be known that one is from another. But the Father is not known to be from another: therefore he is not sent.

But further, against this it can be objected: § 1. Because power is attributed to the Father: therefore, since he effects power in us, he comes into us, just as the Son through wisdom, and the Holy Spirit through charity.

§ 2. Also, this is conceded, and was established above: 'The Father is from himself'. But according to his being from himself, it seems that in the same relation of the preposition, this ought to be conceded: 'He is sent by himself', and 'The Father sends himself'.

§ 3. Also, Augustine, proving that the Holy Spirit sends himself and gives himself, proves it by this: that he is of his own power: and this was established above in the preceding distinction. But he would not be of his own power, if he could not send and give himself. Therefore, by a similar reasoning, the Father will not be of his own power, if he cannot send and give himself. Since therefore all the persons were always of their own power, all were always able to send and give themselves, both in the Old and in the New Testament.

Solution. Supposing what was determined above, it is easy to answer these objections. For we say that to appear and to be sent are not the same thing: and we well concede that the Father could appear in a subject creature through the ministry of an Angel and by himself, and still can: but he cannot be sent because of the causes assigned above: because passive sending supposes the fittingness of a messenger, and a formal reason in the subject: and that formal reason is 'to be from another', which is not fitting for the Father. Therefore he could appear, but he could not be sent.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although wherever there is a visible sending, an appearance of some person occurs by a visible sign, it is not convertible: because a visible sending adds two things over and above an appearance, namely, to exist from another, and to be present by himself otherwise or for something else than as he is everywhere. But this is not read in the Old Testament, as will be clear later: because the persons are not read to have been by themselves in those signs which appeared.

To the next, it must be said that a visible sending is not ordered to just any invisible sending, but is ordered to the invisible sending which founds and plants the Church. For the visible does not always precede the invisible, even in the New Testament: but it preceded it, so that the abundance of the copiousness of the Spirit might be signified as being with those to whom the visible sending was made, so that from their copiousness it might overflow into the founding and planting of the Church.

To the next, it must be said that the reason has already been stated why this does not suffice: and why the Father could not or cannot be sent.

To what is objected, that a sending of this sort ought to have been called an angelic appearance in the Old Testament: It must be said that in truth that solution which some posit does not suffice: but there is another reason which we have stated, because to be sent adds to appearing, as has been said.

To the next, it must be said that an intellectual creature better shows the unity of essence in the three persons: but it does not so show the effect of grace or the mode of the procession of a person from a person: because of its own nature it does not so express the properties of grace and of procession. For an Angel does not proceed from an Angel, as breath from one breathing: nor is innocence and aptitude for immolation for the redemption of the firstborn proper to an Angel, as it is to a dove: nor is it proper to an Angel from nature to have that whereby it convenes with the act of charity. And therefore an Angel in the number of persons appearing, and by the power of interpreting through speech, can produce faith in the Trinity and unity, although it does not have a fittingness to fulfill a sending through itself. And another reason is that a gift is given by the one sent, as by an efficient cause: but I mean the gift of sanctifying grace, which is in every sending. But an Angel cannot be the cause of grace, nor ought it to be understood to be the cause: therefore neither can it be sent in that sending: nor even if it were sent, would it be useful: because grace would be believed to be from him, and thus it would draw one into idolatry. A third reason is, because the one sent with grace is held to be gliding into the substance of the soul of the one to whom the sending is made, as was established above in the preceding distinction. But an Angel cannot glide into the substance of our mind: therefore a sending of this sort cannot be administered through him. A fourth reason is, because since grace is created, if it were separated from him by whom it is sent, either he would be a creature, or he would be wholly subject to vanity, just as every creature is. Therefore, in order for grace to be able to separate us from vanity, and join us to the divinity, it is necessary that the one sent, who is with grace, be God. And for these reasons, a sending of this sort cannot be fulfilled, except through a person proceeding from another. But others posit other reasons which do not prove anything, namely, that it was fitting for a sending to begin from afar, and afterwards by approaching to draw nearer to God: and therefore in the Old Testament it was fitting for it to be done through Angels, but in the New Testament through persons. But this is nothing: because according to this, even the invisible sending which was made to all the Saints in the Old Testament ought to have been done through Angels, which is false.

To the next, it must be said that the things seen by Isaiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel, were not, properly speaking, appearances, nor sendings, nor processions, but revelations in imaginary vision, which was made to many: because 'appearance', strictly taken, is said to be the showing of the unity of essence in some figure seen by the senses. But if 'appearance' is taken [broadly], then it will be a genus for revelation, sending, and the like.

To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that such things seen do not make Prophets: because thus Pharaoh would have been a Prophet, which is false: because he was not a Prophet except in a qualified sense: because, as Augustine says in book XII of The Literal Meaning of Genesis: Someone is not called a Prophet simply speaking except from an intellectual vision: and therefore Joseph was a Prophet of the things seen by Pharaoh, and Daniel was a Prophet of the things seen by Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. But I well concede that they were constituted Prophets from the invisible sending of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. But what, when, concerning what, and why they should prophesy, was shown to them by revelations of the three modes of vision, namely, corporeal, imaginary, and intellectual. However, there are those who say that the Spirit was then sent, not insofar as he is holy, but insofar as he is spirit: because a spirit reveals, but does not sanctify: and the gift of prophecy does not make one Holy, but a seer: whereas in the New Testament he was sent as holy, who sanctified in those visions. But this does not solve the issue: because no one was ever holy, unless the Spirit was sent to him: and therefore if it belonged to the state of the Old Testament that he not be sent as holy, neither would he be invisibly sent as holy. Hence the first solution is better.

To what is objected, that appearances were made through Angels, I well concede it: because Augustine holds this in book IV of On the Trinity, and Dionysius in The Celestial Hierarchy. But yet it is not thereby removed that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit could have appeared by themselves, as Augustine says in the same place.

To what is objected against this, that the Father is not said to be sent, it must be said that power is attributed to the Father: but, as has been said, a person is not said to be sent with respect to just any gift, but only in a gift in which he himself is, and is possessed: whence if the Father were given in that power, it would be sanctifying power. But that power is not distinct from the gifts of the intellect and the affect, because through gifts of this sort we are powerful in acts of grace: therefore the giving of the Father does not have a distinct gift from that in which the Son is given, and in which the Holy Spirit is given: and therefore it is not expressly found among the Saints that the Father gives himself, or is given by himself.

There are, however, concerning this doubt, three other opinions, of which one is, that the Father gives himself, and is given by himself: and this is not very common. Another says that he does not give himself, nor is he given by himself: because the power which is appropriated to him, is presupposed in the sending and giving of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: because no gift is given to us unless the capacity for that gift, as a power, is presupposed: and therefore, since this capacity is in us by nature (for we are created capable of receiving grace), it is not necessary for the Father to be given in that. The third opinion, which I approve more, is what was said earlier, that the Father well comes in the Son and the Holy Spirit, but he is not given, nor does he give himself: and even if it is conceded that he gives himself, nevertheless it is in no way conceded that he is sent by himself, or sends himself, as was said earlier.

To the next, it must be said that this is conceded: 'The Father is from himself', according as it is expounded by negation thus: The Father is from himself, that is, he is not from another. But to be sent imports affirmatively 'to be from another', as was established above: and therefore it is not fitting for him to be sent.

To the next, it must be said that the Father is of his own power, and always was, and will be, just like the Son and the Holy Spirit: but from that power nothing can be concluded except that he himself works with the Son and the Holy Spirit that effect which he gives in the sending. Because the word to be sent states two things, namely the act of operation, and the effect which is given in the sending. And according to this act, it is itself common to the three persons: and it consignifies from the mode of signifying of the principal signified thing, which is passive sending, 'to come from another', and as to this it does not state any power, but only the formal reason of origin, which does not belong to the Father. Therefore, Augustine's proof was regarding the first, that the Spirit gives himself, just as others give him, and not regarding the second.

To what he further wished to conclude, that this power is in the Old Testament just as in the New, it must be said that the invisible sending existed from the time man was created upon the earth: for no one could ever do any meritorious good without the invisible sending. But a visible sending could not exist in the Old Testament, that is, it ought not to have existed out of fittingness: because that sending is for demonstrating the copiousness of grace, and for the propagation of grace, which did not exist while the first tabernacle still had standing: because Jesus was not yet a man, and not yet glorified. But what the reason for this is, is determined in that question where it is asked, 'Why did he delay his advent, and why was it fitting for the observance of the letter to precede the spiritual sense?'

Articulus 2 — Whether Visible Mission Ought To Be Toward All Who Are Of The New Testament

Whether the visible sending ought to be to all who are of the New Testament?

Secondly it is asked: Whether this visible sending ought according to fittingness to be to all or to some?

And let us ask, Whether to all who are in the New Testament? Because it has already been established that it was not fitting for it to be done in the Old Testament.

It seems that it should be, because: § 1. It is said: I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, etc. And again: But even upon my menservants and maidservants in those days I will pour out my Spirit. Therefore it seems that it ought to visibly descend in this way to all.

§ 2. Also, when he first came in tongues of fire, no one was excepted, but [he came] upon all, namely a hundred and twenty men and women. Therefore it seems that neither afterwards ought a sending of this sort to be withdrawn from anyone.

§ 3. Also, afterwards while the Apostles were preaching, as Peter in the house of Cornelius, and others, the Holy Spirit fell upon all who heard the word: therefore, etc.

§ 4. Also, the fact that this is not done, can generate despair in us from the fact that it was then done commonly, [leading us to think] that we are not among those to be saved: therefore, etc.

§ 5. If it should be said that those were given to us as seed from which the crop of faith might grow and be multiplied: but now is the time of harvesting what has been sown, and not of sowing any further: this is false. Because it is said: Let him who hears, say: Come. And in the Gospel the lazy servant who hid his master's money is condemned. Therefore it seems that there still remains a time of sowing: therefore he still ought to descend in this way.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. It will be proved below in the following article of the question, that this sending indicates the fullness of the redundance and copiousness of the Spirit. But the Spirit is not given to all unto redundance. Therefore it is not fitting for this sending to be made to all.

§ 2. Also, in the works of farmers we prove this, that young saplings are treated with many fosterings which are not given to an already robust tree. Therefore it similarly ought to have been done in the planting of the Church. Since therefore this sending was for the planting of the Church, it was not fitting for it to be done in a Church already robust.

§ 3. Also, faith grows strong in one way, and has merit in another way: because it grows strong well and is made robust from the hearing of reason, and the sight of a miracle. Yet from these it does not have the formal reason of merit, but rather insofar as it recedes from reason and sight, and leans wholly upon the first truth. Since therefore a visible sending is for the growing strong of faith, it ought not to have been applied in the time of meriting through faith after faith has grown strong.

§ 4. Also, the sendings of the Holy Spirit correspond to the sendings of the Son. But in the sending of the Son that which was visible was first exhibited: so that while we know God visibly, through this we may be caught up into the love of invisible things. But afterwards it was expedient for the Apostles that the bodily presence be withdrawn, so that thus their affection might pass over to the love of the invisible deity. Therefore it similarly was fitting to be done in the sending of the Holy Spirit, that first a visible species be exhibited, through which the Spirit might be known to be present, and afterwards it might be withdrawn, so that we might rest in the invisible substance of the Spirit.

Solution. Consenting to these last arguments, each of which by its own middle term states one reason why it is not always and to all fitting for this mode of sending to be done, we say to the first that Joel speaks of the state of the primitive Church, when it was the time of the planting of the faith.

To the next and to the third it must be said in the same way, that it was then done for this reason, so that men, amazed by the visible miracle, might hasten to the end.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that this does not compel us to despair: because we are already built up unto faith: because from those who heard, the faith has been confirmed unto us, God testifying with signs, and miracles, and distributions of the Holy Spirit according to his will, as is said in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Moreover we perceive a better presence in the gifts: for as the Apostle says: The Spirit himself gives testimony to our spirit, that we are the sons of God.

To the next it must be said that although every man ought to call another to the faith and conversion of morals, yet it is not necessary that he call by miracles: because already the very multiplication of the faith is a witness to the truth of the faith: and because it suffices for showing the truth of the faith to have shown miracles and visible signs at one time. For if the faith was previously proved through these, it will be proved and true into eternity. Whence those things which were done then, are now to be reported to others, not exhibited again, as John says in his first canonical epistle: That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life,... we declare unto you.

Articulus 3 — Whether Mission Belongs To Grace Making One Pleasing, Or To Gratuitously Given Grace

Whether the sending is of sanctifying grace, or of gratuitously given grace?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether this is a sending of sanctifying grace or of gratuitously given grace?

§ 1. It seems that it is of gratuitously given grace, because it is exterior. But nothing exterior outside of man is sanctifying grace. Therefore it seems that this sending is not of sanctifying grace.

§ 2. Also, Aristotle says in Book IV of Meteorology, that through what is open we judge concerning the hidden. Therefore through the act of this sending we judge what grace it is the cause of. But its act is tongues, prophecy, and the like, all of which state nothing except an act of gratuitously given grace. Therefore that sending is toward the act of gratuitously given grace.

§ 3. Also, an invisible sending is toward the act of sanctifying grace, as was proved above. Since therefore it is superfluous to have two modes for perfecting the same thing, especially in the case of a perfect operator, a visible sending will not be toward the same grace. Therefore it will be toward gratuitously given grace.

§ 4. Also, the sending of the Son is toward gratuitously given grace, because it is toward the illumination of the intellect in revelation, and prophecy, knowledge, and the like. Therefore much more can the sending of the Holy Spirit be toward gratuitously given grace; and he is not interior toward that: therefore exterior.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. From an adequate enumeration of parts it is proved that this sending was never exhibited except to demonstrate the fullness of redundance in sanctifying grace: because it was exhibited in three modes: by breath, by fire, by a dove. And it is clear in each one, how the Spirit showed the redundance of grace, as will be shown below, when the sufficiency of the number of these sendings will be shown. Therefore it is manifest that it does not show gratuitously given grace.

§ 2. Also, the Spirit would not be said to be sent, if only his gift were given, as was established above. Therefore the Spirit is said to be sent then, when he is shown through the gift to indwell through grace. But he does not indwell through the gift of gratuitously given grace: for an authority says that he is in the Saints alone through indwelling grace. But he is in many who are not holy through an act of gratuitously given grace. Therefore he himself is not sent, neither visibly, nor invisibly, except through sanctifying grace.

§ 3. Also, in the Text we have from Augustine that through those visible creatures it was shown that the Holy Spirit was in those to whom those creatures were sent. And we see that an abundance of redundance was in all those to whom such a sending was made.

Solution. It must be said that in truth this sending is ostensive of redundant grace, and it is multiplied according to the mode of redundance, as will be clear later.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not exterior in such a way that it is not interior: because the mode of visible sending is ostensive of the invisible Spirit invisibly sent: and therefore the fruit of the sending is within, although the motion of the visible species is without.

To the next it must be said that to judge through a manifest thing is twofold, namely, so that a judgment of the immediate cause is had through an open effect, and as the cause of a cause or the formal reason of a cause is had through an effect. For example, by seeing the open act of prophecy or of tongues in act, the habit which is the cause of this act, as immediate to it, is immediately grasped, and this is the habit of gratuitously given grace. But further considering the time of the act, and the mode of the act, namely that it is for the propagation of the faith, and the time of the new Church, I know that in them is the Spirit overflowing into some through sanctifying grace. Just as also in natures, by seeing a motion, I know the mover and the formal reason of the mover then rather than at another time, and in this way rather than otherwise.

To the next it must be said that toward the same thing as the same thing, two modes would be superfluous; but toward the same thing as having itself otherwise, they are not superfluous. Because one is toward the inspiration or reception or augmentation of grace, but the other is toward showing the redundance of the same.

To the next it must be said that according to some the Son is not sent except in gratuitously given grace. For they say that if it is sanctifying, it is referred to the sending of the Holy Spirit. But this was disproved above. Whence I say that this is false, that the Son is sent in gratuitously given grace: because when one is sent, all three come and indwell, although through that effect all three are not said to be sent.

But if anyone should object against what was said, that the Spirit visibly fell upon the multitude of those hearing the word: but it is not read that he overflowed in all of them. It must be answered that the falling upon the multitude shows the redundance in the one preaching the new faith, and on the part of him upon whom he falls, it has the formal reason of a fostering of the new faith, as we said above: and therefore it is also not expressed by what sign the Spirit fell upon them, but only that he appeared in a visible sign, which indicated the redundance in the Apostles: but now it is not in the Church because of those causes which have been stated.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Visible Mission Ought To Have Been Performed More Through The Son Than Through The Holy Spirit, Or Conversely

Whether the visible sending ought to have been done more through the Son than through the Holy Spirit, or conversely?

Fourthly it is asked: Whether it was fitting for this sending to be done more through the Son, than through the Holy Spirit, or conversely?

It seems that through the Son: because § 1. The Son is the word indicative of the Father, and the mouth speaking the Father: as it is said: No man has seen God at any time: the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him. Therefore, since this sending is toward instruction unto the faith, it was fitting that it should be done through the Son.

§ 2. Also, that visible sending is toward planting the faith. But Bernard says that the Son came, and taught the faith: therefore it was fitting for the Son to be sent in such a sending.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The Lord said to his disciples: The Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring all things to your mind, whatsoever I shall have said to you. Therefore full instruction is through the Holy Spirit. Since therefore the truth ought to have been manifested to the world, it was fitting for it to be done through the sending of the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Also: It is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaks in you. Therefore for speaking in the conversion of the Gentiles the Holy Spirit is to be sent, not the Son.

Solution. It must be said that it was fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent in a non-united visible creature, but the Son in a united visible creature.

To what is first objected, it must be said that instruction pertains also to the Holy Spirit. For there is instruction through interpretation and speaking, and this is fitting to the Word and to him who is the mouth of the Father. And there is instruction not through a word, but through the inspiration of truth, and that is fitting to the Spirit of truth, that is, to the one proceeding from the truth, who announces those things which he receives from the truth: as was done in the sending of the Holy Spirit: for the Spirit illuminated unto the full understanding of those things which had been heard from the Son.

To the next it must be said in the same way that insofar as hearing causes faith which is through the word of Christ, thus it was fitting for the faith to be taught through the Word sent into flesh. But insofar as faith is the assent to the first truth, it cannot be had except through inspiration. Whence also the Apostles who before were flexible in their assent, although they had faith through the hearing of the word, were afterwards confirmed, when they had assent through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit sent into them. And this the same Lord notes at the end of Luke, saying: But you, sit in the city, until you be endued with power from on high.

Articulus 5 — Why There Are Two Modes Of The Mission Of The Son And Of The Holy Spirit

Why are there two modes of the sending of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the Text in the first chapter, there, at A, To which we say, that just as the Son is said to be sent in two modes, etc.

And there is a doubt, why there are two modes of sending of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

§ 1. For since there are two parts of man, namely body and soul, it seems that in neither mode is he said to be sent to the body, as some wish to render the reason. Therefore it seems that both modes ought to be taken according to the parts of the soul. But since we are the image of God, according to the three powers it seems that there ought to be three modes of sending.

§ 2. Also, a sending is for recalling the rational creature, as was established above. But it is recalled according to the rational, irascible, and concupiscible [powers]. Therefore there ought to be three modes of sending.

Solution. We say that there are only two: because since a sending shows the distinction of a person from a person, it could not be shown except through a thing perceptible in the intellect in itself, or through a thing received from sense: and therefore so that the distinction on the part of the proceeding persons might be sufficiently determined, he was sent by a sensible sign and by an intelligible species.

Also, since a sending brings grace, the grace could not be other than personal which is conferred in a visible sending, or universal which overflows into all, and that is effected by the visible sending of each person.

To those things which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that all the perfections of those powers, and the three habits of those virtues are reduced to the invisible sending. Which although it is done in one mode in genus, yet it is not done in one mode in species.

Articulus 6 — Why The Son Appeared In A Creature United To Himself, And The Holy Spirit Did Not Appear In One United To Himself, And Whether That Dove In Which He Appeared Was A Natural Animal, And Concerning The Motion Of The Dove, What It Was Like

Why did the Son appear in a creature united to him, and the Holy Spirit did not appear in one united to him? And whether that dove in which he appeared was a natural animal, and concerning the motion of the dove, of what sort it was?

Why did the Son appear in a creature united to him, and the Holy Spirit did not appear in one united to him? And whether that dove in which he appeared was a natural animal, and concerning the motion of the dove, of what sort it was?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, It is readily understood concerning the Holy Spirit, etc.

And here three things are asked: of which the first is, Why did the Son appear and was sent in a creature united to himself, and the Spirit in a non-united [creature]?

Secondly it is asked, Why the Holy Spirit, and for what purpose, was he sent to the Son, since the Son was never sent to the Holy Spirit?

Thirdly it is asked, Since the Father appeared in a sound, why did he only appear in an audible creature and upon the Son, and never upon any other man.

To the first one proceeds thus: The Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son: therefore he seems to have a greater formal reason of sending than the Son. Therefore it seems, since 'to be from another' is the formal reason of unibility, that the Holy Spirit is more unible to an assumed creature than the Son.

But because this was sufficiently noted above the beginning of the third [book], let it be asked: Whether the dove in which the Holy Spirit appeared was a true and natural animal or not?

It seems that it was an animal: because § 1. The Spirit of truth ought to feign nothing. But it would be fictitious, if it were only the figure of a dove, and not the truth. Therefore it seems that it was a true dove.

§ 2. Also, the tricks of demons are to delude the senses of men through certain figures. Therefore this does not befit the Spirit of truth.

§ 3. Also, he appeared in a dove because of the properties of a dove. But those properties do not befit anything except a true dove. Therefore it was a true dove, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The Saints say that that dove, having completed its office, reverted into its pristine matter. But this would not have been the case if it were a true dove. Therefore it was nothing but the figure of a dove.

§ 2. Also, if it had been a true dove, it would not have led to another thing. Therefore it seems that in order for it to lead to another thing, it was fitting that it not be a true dove. Just as the Doctors also say that the species of bread and wine in the sacrament of the Eucharist are in it so that they may lead to another thing.

But then it is asked: What moved it by local motion, if it was not alive? For nothing is moved by progressive local motion except a true animal. That dove was moved by local motion. Therefore it was a true animal.

Solution. It must be said that the Holy Spirit is not unible to any creature, because everything which in hypostasis is united to some nature, is one person in the Trinity; whence he could not be united to an irrational nature, because it would be unfitting that a dove be God, or some brute animal. But it was fitting for the Son to be united to a rational creature, which is man, the reason for which is assigned in the third book of the Sentences. And the reason is not that the Spirit is from two, but the Son from one, that he himself is more unible than the Son: because the formal reason of unibility is not attended to in this.

To the next it must be said that that dove was a species of a dove, and not a natural and true animal.

To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not feigned nor false that which shows this for the sake of which it is assumed. Whence that species was true, because it directly showed that for the sake of which it was assum[ed]...

To the other, it must be said that this was not the nature of an animal, but rather an act of grace, as will be evident later.

To the other, it must be said that the tricks of demons are for deceiving men, as Peter says in the Itinerary of Clement, but the miracles of Christ are for instructing men in those things which are useful to them: and thus are those apparitions: for we cannot say that the dove was an animal, just as neither are tongues a member of an animal.

To the other, it must be said that it is one thing to understand properties according to translation to spiritual things, and another to have properties connatural to oneself. According to translation in the intellect, properties are well received in the species of a dove, although in that species there are not natural properties.

To the last, it must be said that that which is moved by a mover united to itself and by a progressive motion, that is an animal: but the dove was not moved in this way, rather it was moved by a mover not united to itself: which motion was the will of God, to whom all things obey.

Articulus 7 — Why The Holy Spirit Is Sent To The Son, And Never The Son To The Holy Spirit

Why is the Holy Spirit sent to the Son, and never the Son to the Holy Spirit?

Secondly, it is asked, Why the Holy Spirit was sent to the Son, and never the Son to the Holy Spirit?

For it seems that He ought not to have been sent to the Son: because

1. Every mission, as was held above, is for the sanctification of the creature: but Christ did not need sanctification: therefore the Holy Spirit ought not to have been sent to Him.
2. Likewise, an external mission shows an internal one: therefore it seems that the Holy Spirit was also sent internally to Christ.
3. Likewise, it is never read that He was sent to the Father, nor is it read that the Son was sent to the Spirit: therefore, since mission signifies need in the one to whom the mission is made, it seems that neither ought the Holy Spirit to have been sent to the Son.

I answer, the Spirit was not sent to the Son per se, that is, on account of the need of the Son: but to show the abundance of that fullness, of which it is said, John 1:16: "Of His fullness we have all received, and grace for grace." For He was sent to Him in baptism, in which Christ received nothing: but baptism received from Him: because, as Bede says, by the touch of His most pure flesh He conferred regenerative power to the waters: and the visible mission of the Holy Spirit signified that abundance and copiousness.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear: for it is not similar concerning the Father and the Holy Spirit, from whom the sacraments did not flow, as in whose persons they were not performed, as they flowed from the person of Christ.

Articulus 8 — Why The Father Appeared Only In An Audible Sound, And Not In Another Bodily Species

Why did the Father appear only in an audible sound, and not in another bodily form?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why did the Father appear only in an audible sound, and not in another bodily form? For from the audible form it could not be known that it was the Father who appeared.

Solution. It must be said that the Father of the Word, who with one word which He begot, as Augustine said, spoke all things, and they were made, fittingly appeared in the sound and voice expressing the generation of the Son, even in the re-creation. And although sound in general does not manifest the Father, nevertheless, the articulated and literate sound naming the Son declares Him when it said: "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased: hear Him."

Articulus 9 — Why The Holy Spirit Appeared Only In These Three Species: Of Tongues, Of A Dove, And Of Breath

Why did the Holy Spirit appear only in these three forms: tongues, dove, and breath?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said:

Upon the Lord Himself, He descended in bodily form as a dove, etc.

For it is doubtful, why is it read that He was manifested only in these three forms, namely in the form of a dove, in the form of fiery tongues, and in the form of breath.

To this it must be said that in the Holy Spirit three things are considered, namely person, procession, and the nature of the gift. If the nature of His personality is considered, He is charity: and through this, He establishes a likeness to fire: the effect of this fire was then the abundance of grace in the conversion of the world: and therefore in tongues, the fire was figured, so that the session would signify the permanence in the Church of the fire which is charity and divine fire: the tongues, however, the knowledge of speech which the Apostles received: whence it is sung of Him:

The fire with quivering light
Brought the form of tongues,
That they might be fluent in words,
And fervent in charity.

But if it is considered in the gifts, thus it is signified in the dove, which is read to be fruitful, simple, and mourning, and without the gall of malice in the liver: because such things His gifts make in the Saints. But if the mode of His procession is considered, He proceeds from the Son as the spirit of life and holiness, conferring upon the whole Church sense and motion, because He proceeds from the head: and in this respect, He is manifested in breath.

Divisio Textus

But first, it must be asked, since the Son is said to be lesser than the Father, etc.

Here begins the second part of this distinction which has three chapters, and three parts: in the first of which it is shown that the Son is lesser than the Father according to humanity. In the second, it is shown that he is lesser than himself according to humanity, there, D, Note. In the third, however, it is shown that the Son, insofar as he was made man, etc., the Father is said to be greater than the Son: yet the Son is not lesser than the Father, insofar as he is God, there, E, Hilary, however, seems to say, etc.

Articulus 10 — Whether, Besides The Interior Invisible Mission, An Exterior Mission Was Necessary

Whether, besides the interior invisible mission, an exterior mission was necessary?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

That by external visions the hearts of men, etc.

1. For those visions either sufficed for the knowledge of the hidden divinity and the distinction of persons without the interior mission, or not: if so, then the interior mission was useless.
2. Furthermore, since the interior confers grace, it would seem then that the knowledge of the Trinity could be had without grace, which is false, as was shown above. But if it was necessary for the interior to be present, since it teaches through inspiration, it seems then that the exterior was useless.

Solution. It must be said that in truth the exterior is a testimony of the interior, as it is said in the Text: because it was signified that in those to whom such a mission was made, or to whose preaching and intercession it was made, there would be overflowing grace, as was said: and therefore the exterior procession was not useless for the state and time.

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

Who was not more in those creatures, etc.

For this does not seem so: because something is more known to be present through a greater effect: but it effected more in those than in others: therefore it was more in those.

Solution. This reasoning errs from the fact that it changes the discrete into the intensive: for it does not follow that if it was present in more ways, that it was more present, unless those ways caused intensity: hence the Master rightly says that it was present for another purpose.

Articulus 11 — Whether Christ, Insofar As He Is Man, Is Less Than The Father, And The Holy Spirit, And Himself

Whether Christ, insofar as he is man, is lesser than the Father, and the Holy Spirit, and himself?

Here, however, a doubt arises, whether Christ, insofar as he is man, is lesser than the Father, and himself, and the Holy Spirit? because this question returns to the same in those three ways.

1. It seems, however, that he is: because insofar as he is man, I can say that he is made, and a creature, and suchlike, all of which imply lessening: therefore, he, insofar as he is man, is lesser than the Father, and himself, and the Holy Spirit.
2. Likewise, all the Saints say this in agreement.

But ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Christ, insofar as he is man, is man: if therefore Christ, insofar as he is man, is lesser than himself: therefore Christ is lesser than himself: and this cannot be, because no thing is lesser than itself.

1. Likewise, Christ does not seem to be of more than one quantity: therefore it seems that according to that he is either greater only, or lesser only, or equal.
2. Likewise, Christ, insofar as he is man, is lesser than himself: therefore Christ, insofar as he is man, is not equal to himself: because lesser and greater are opposed to equal.

Solution. To respond to such things is easy: because when it is said, Christ insofar as he is man is lesser than the Father and the Holy Spirit, it is absolutely true. But if it is said, Christ insofar as he is man is lesser than himself, it can refer to the antecedent with determination, and it is false: or without determination, and it is true: because it then supposes only the person simply: and then it does not follow, therefore Christ is man: because when it is said, Christ is man, it is said Christ being man, and this says nothing but the person. In the person, however, the term "insofar as" indicated the condition of nature, as the Master says.

Similarly, when it is said, Christ insofar as he is man, is equal to himself, this is true, if "to himself" refers to the antecedent with determination: if without determination, it is false: and this whole solution is founded on the fact that the term "insofar as" says nothing but the cause according to the condition of nature: but if it were to say the unity of the person, then when it is said, Christ insofar as he is man, the sense would be, Christ as man personally is lesser than himself, and the expression would be false: and true, if it were said he is equal to himself.

Articulus 12 — Whether An Angel Is Better Than Man Or Conversely

Whether an Angel is better than a man or vice versa?

Whether an Angel is better than a man or vice versa?

Then it is asked concerning this which says:

"Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," etc.

1. For it seems this is false: because man even absolutely seems to be nobler than an angel: because if the best horse is better than the best donkey, then a horse is simply better than a donkey: but the best man is better than the best angel: therefore man is simply better. The first is written in the Topics of TL. The second is proven through Christ, who is the best among all creatures and above all.
2. Likewise, what the wise man chooses is more to be chosen: but the wisest, because the wisdom of the Father, chose human nature and not angelic: therefore human nature is better: for what is more to be chosen is better.
3. Likewise, what is in better things is more to be chosen: but human nature is in the best, because in the Son of God: therefore it is better than angelic.

4. Likewise, Augustine: Between our mind and God there is nothing intermediate. Therefore nothing is better this side of God: because what is closer to God is better. Therefore angelic nature is not better.

5. Again, 1 Corinthians 6:3: "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" The Gloss says that the judgment of comparison will be between men and angels, and some men will be found superior to some angels. Therefore it seems that we are either greater or equal.

Likewise, Deuteronomy 32:8, according to another translation: "He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the angels of God." But the bounds of man would not be set according to the bounds of angels by a just God, unless we could be equal in virtue and merit. Therefore it seems that angels are not superior to us.

1. Likewise, Augustine against Maximinus: Human nature, which the Son of God assumed, who could not be corrupted by sin, is nothing better except God alone.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Psalm 8:6: "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels." And, Hebrews 2:9: "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor."

Here some place and concede an error because of such objections: God is supremely liberal and supremely good: therefore He flows into each one as much of His goodness as he is capable of: if therefore an angel were more capable by nature than man, He would flow more into him: but He flowed more into man, because of the grace of union: therefore by nature man is more capable of divine nobility and goodness than an angel.

1. Likewise, among men, he who has better natural qualities will necessarily have greater grace: therefore from the effect, he who receives greater grace has better natural qualities: but man receives greater grace: therefore he has better natural qualities than an angel.

2. Likewise, if there are two things, one of which is for the sake of the other, that is better and more worthy for which the other is, than that which is for it: but man and angel are two such things, and the angel is for the sake of man. Proof: "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee," etc. And, Hebrews 1:14: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Therefore man is better and nobler than an angel.

3. But if this is conceded, it is against Dionysius, because he wants that according to the grades of beings there is proximity to God: hence intellectual nature is closer than rational. And against Augustine in the eleventh book of Confessions, where he says that the angel was created near to God.

4. Likewise, it will be against philosophy, which posits the rational soul as an instrument of intelligence or angel.

5. Likewise, it will be against reason: because illumination descends from the superior to the inferior: but illuminations are made by angels in the souls of men, as Augustine says in the eleventh book on Genesis.

Solution. Without prejudice, we say that angelic nature considered in nature is much nobler than human: and it is nobler even than the rational soul considered in its nature: because it is natural for the rational soul to be united to the body, and this unibility makes it more material and closer to matter than if it were an angel: yet human nature, insofar as it is referred to unity with God, and as it is referred to the state of beatitude, is equal or better than angels, and this is to be better or equal in a certain respect. It is referred to unity with God in two ways, namely according to that which is united to God from our nature in Christ: and according to that from which is taken that which is united, as in the Blessed Virgin, in whom the Holy Spirit came with the power of the Most High, purging her, and conferring the power of the Word of God to her together with generative power, as will be had below: hence she is also more worthy than any pure creature, and is exalted above the choirs of angels to the heavenly kingdoms. According to the relation to the state of contemplation, it is true that we will be equal to angels: because according to the grades of the lot of angels will be our assumption into the kingdom.

Therefore, to the three things first objected from the considerations of the Philosopher, it must be said that they hold in those things which are such per se and from nature, and not per accidens and in relation to another. Thus our nature is not in Christ, nor chosen by Him.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine speaks of the mode of contemplation, and not of nature. But if you object that Augustine says in the book on the Quantity of the Soul, that the nature of the soul has something inferior as the soul of a sinner, something superior as God, something equal as an angel. Again, I say that the equality is not referred to nature, as nature is, but to the state which is possible to nature through merit; because the nature of the soul as a soul is inferior to the nature of an angel.

To the other, it must be said that this again is referred to merit, which we attain by the gift of God, and not to nature.

To the other, it must be said, as was said above, that the assumptibility of man does not make his nature better than the nature of an angel: because it does not belong to him from his natural qualities.

To the other, it must be said that God pours out twofold gifts, namely natural, and these He pours out according to the capacity of nature: for example, to matter having only the potentiality for place, He infuses the form of heaven. But to prime simple matter having potentiality for place and form, He infuses the form of an element: but to mixed matter only, He infuses the form of a mineral: but to mixed and somewhat complexioned matter in similar parts, He infuses the form of a vegetable soul: but to mixed complexioned matter composed of dissimilar organs, He infuses the form of a sensitive soul: but to matter most approaching equality, and receding from contraries to some likeness of heaven, He infuses the form which He creates in His image, namely the rational soul. He pours out other gifts which are gifts of grace: and those He does not give according to the proportion of nature, but rather according to His liberality, and the effort of the one preparing himself to receive. For that He gives from liberality is evident in the Gospel, where He says: "I will give to this last even as to thee." That He also gives according to effort is evident where He says: "He gave... to each according to his own ability, and straightway took his journey." There indeed ability is taken for effort.

To the other, it must be said that it is false that he who has better natural qualities has greater grace: but it is true that if there are two who have equal grace, and not equal natural qualities: he who has better natural qualities will have better use in acts: but yet from this it does not follow that he has greater merit in easier use: because the difficulty of acting sometimes also contributes to some greater merit, or to some condition of greater merit.

To the other, it must be said that the fact that angels guard us and serve us does not show their nature to be less worthy, but their charity and obedience, and our need: but the true reason would be concerning those things which by the order of nature are so disposed that one is for the sake of the other, as the corporeal for the spiritual, and the brute for the rational.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Father Can Be Said To Be Greater Than The Son, And The Son To Be Less Than The Father

Whether the Father can be said to be greater than the Son, and the Son lesser than the Father?

Whether the Father can be said to be greater than the Son, and the Son lesser than the Father?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said: Hilary, however, seems to say, etc.

For it seems false: because greater either signifies relation or essence. If it signifies relation: then its correlative will be in the Son, and thus the Son will be lesser. But if it signifies essence: then it is simply false what is said.

To this some say that the Father is said to be greater because he has three notions, namely innascibility, paternity, and spiration: the third of these is in the Father and the Son, and therefore by that he is not said to be greater: but paternity has an opposite relation by which the Son is not said to be lesser: but the third is innascibility, by which namely the Father is said to be greater: because truly in that he has a nature corresponding to him in the Son, therefore the Son cannot be said to be lesser by the opposite respect. But this is nothing: because Hilary here in the text says that the greater is the giver: but the giver is by paternity: therefore the greater is by paternity.

Therefore it must be said that by the authority of generation he is greater, and the term "greater" signifies only the authority of the principle: but because by the reason of relation in the opposite it is placed by nature as equal in all things, therefore it does not follow that the Son is lesser, but equal to the greater: for he who is born does not proceed into less, but equal in nature and essence and in all things. And this is the intention of Hilary, as is clear to one considering the text of the chapter. However, it would be otherwise if the relation of the Father implied excess like lordship: because then it would follow that the Son would be lesser.

DISTINCTIO XVII

Divisio Textus

Now let us proceed to assign the mission of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Here begins to show the invisible mode of the mission of the Holy Spirit. And this distinction has two parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon what is the mode of the invisible mission. In the second, however, he objects certain things to the contrary and resolves them, there, G, Here it is asked, If charity is the Holy Spirit, etc.

The first is divided into three parts: in the first of which he prefaces certain things that are required to understand this mission in two small chapters. In the second, it is proven that the Holy Spirit is the charity by which we love one another and God, there, C, But lest in so great a matter. In the third, he concludes the proposition, which is said to be sent invisibly, when the charity by which we love God is infused into us, there, F, For then it is said to be sent or given to us, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Charity By Which We Love God Is The Holy Spirit Or Some Created Habitual Gift

Whether the charity by which we love God is the Holy Spirit, or some created habitual gift?

Here arises before the Letter a common question, whether the charity by which we love God is the Holy Spirit?

It seems, however, that it is so both by authorities and by reasons. But because the Master presents many which seem very express, therefore let us insist on the reasons thus:

1. Nothing more unworthy can the inferior join to the superior: but no creature not rational is more worthy than a rational creature: therefore it cannot join it to a superior nature: charity is created, as you say, and not rational, because neither man nor angel: therefore it cannot join man to a superior nature: but it joins: therefore from the destruction of the consequent it is not a creature.
2. Likewise, nothing of finite essence has infinite power or act: charity, if it is a creature, is of finite essence: therefore it does not have the power for an infinite act: but it has the power for an infinite act: therefore it is not of finite essence: therefore it is not created essence. For it has an infinite effect: Rational nature and God are infinitely distant: and yet they are joined by charity: therefore charity is uncreated.
3. Likewise, the heresy of Pelagius is that man from himself has that by which he pleases God: therefore that by which man pleases God is better than man: but no accident is better than man: therefore charity by which man pleases God is not an accident: therefore it is a substance: either created or uncreated: if created, which is better than man, it cannot be except a confirmed angel, which is absurd: because neither does he have from himself that by which he can please God: therefore it must be that it is an uncreated substance, and thus it will be God.

4. Likewise, every form, according to the opinion of Aristotle, is in some way drawn out of matter: if therefore charity is a form, charity is drawn out of matter: but it is not drawn out of matter: therefore it is not a form: therefore it seems that it is the divine substance in us.
5. Likewise, every creature is subject to vanity: but vanity does not befit truth, and especially uncreated truth: if therefore charity is created and an accident, it will be more subject to vanity than man who is a substance: therefore it cannot join to the first truth: but it joins: therefore it is not a creature: therefore the creator is the charity by which we love God and each other.
6. Likewise, the soul by itself without a medium gives life to the body: since therefore God is the life of the soul, by himself he is the life of the soul: but charity is life, as Augustine, the Master, and Hugh of Saint Victor say: therefore charity is God.
7. Likewise, nature accomplishes with the fewest: because where one agent suffices, it does not place two: since therefore the Holy Spirit is more perfect than nature, he will work with fewer additions: but he can move by himself to love God and neighbor: therefore he will not use a habitual medium in that motion.
8. Likewise, light by itself illuminates the air: since therefore charity is a certain light dispelling spiritual darkness, it seems that God by himself is that light without any habitual medium.
9. Likewise, every power of a mover, the closer it is to the mover, the simpler and nobler it is: but none is so close as that in which it moves in itself: therefore that is the noblest: but the Holy Spirit is the mover of the soul: therefore he will move in the noblest motion by himself: but the noblest motion is the act of charity: therefore he operates by himself in that act, and not by any habit.
10. Likewise, the work of recreation ought to correspond to the work of creation and beatification: but he created by himself, and he will beatify by himself without a medium: therefore he also recreates by himself without a medium.

Likewise, recreation chiefly consists in charity which divides between the children of the kingdom and of perdition, as it says below in the Letter: therefore the recreating charity is God himself.

1. Likewise, the Pelagian heresy seems to hold that some creature can be joined to God by itself: but nothing joins anything to God unless it is joined to God by itself: therefore it is Pelagian heresy to say that what joins us to God is created: but charity joins us to God: therefore it is Pelagian heresy to say that the charity by which we love God and ourselves is a created habit.

2. Likewise, nothing makes a man and his work worthy of eternal life unless it is better than eternal life or equivalent to it: charity makes a man and his work worthy of eternal life: therefore it is something better than eternal life or equivalent to it! but nothing created is better than eternal life or equivalent to it: therefore charity is not something created in us.

3. Likewise, every created being has mode, species, and order: therefore if charity is created, it has mode, species, and order: but mode, species, and order, in all those in which they are, can be diminished: therefore in charity they can be diminished: but diminished they deform: therefore charity can be deformed: therefore it can become formless, which is absurd: for a form cannot be formless: since therefore charity is a form, it cannot be formless: therefore it is not created, but creator.

4. Likewise, in every kind of work the subject is more powerful than the accident, because the accident is caused by the subject: if therefore charity is an accidental habit in the subject which is the soul, as you say, it seems that in the work of love the subject which is the soul is more powerful than charity, which is the heresy of Pelagius: because if it were more powerful, it could love without a habit: therefore charity is not an accident: and it is not a created substance, as is evident to anyone easily: therefore it is a divine substance, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. No power acts well unless it is perfected by a habit, either natural, acquired, or infused: therefore much less can it perform the highest and chief act: but the greatest and chief of all acts is to love God meritoriously: therefore for this a habit perfecting the power is especially required.

1. Likewise, in every work God operates in the operating power, as he himself says, "My Father works until now, and I work" Either therefore he operates in the willing will differently than in other powers, or in the same way. If differently, that other mode cannot be on its own part; therefore it will be on our part, not unless by something added to the power in this act, which is not added in others: therefore something is added to the power: but that which is added to the power ordered to the work is a habit: therefore he operates this act through a habit. If perhaps someone is so insane of mind that he says nothing is added, it follows that he does not operate differently in the will than in a stone, and thus he does not grace the worker, which is false and absurd.

2. Likewise, if because of these reasons which have been induced, charity is not some habit in us, it follows by the same reasons that grace is also nothing in us. But the Pelagian heresy did not exclude God from the soul operating in the way he is in all creatures operating: therefore from this position follows the Pelagian heresy, as it seems.

3. Likewise, of a man who is in charity, we say that he is holy: and let us suppose, by the impossible, that he has no virtue except charity, he is still holy: therefore either he is formally good and holy by some habit, or not. If by some habit: therefore that habit will be nothing other than charity: therefore charity is a created habit. If there is no habit by which he is holy and good: therefore God is the denominative goodness and holiness of this, which is absurd.

4. Likewise, according to the Master, the act of charity is created, but not the habit: let us therefore speak of someone sleeping who is in the state of salvation: either he has charity, or not. If not: therefore he is not worthy of eternal life while he sleeps, which is false. If so: it is clear that not by act: because while he does not act, the act is not: nor by habit: therefore there is no more in charity than in a stone in which also the Holy Spirit is potentially, present, and essentially.

5. Likewise, children according to this will not have charity, except as stones have it. If you say that it is not similar: because they have the aptitude to perform the act of charity. On the contrary: This aptitude does not...

§ 1. is in some habit: therefore it is in a material potency only, which is absurd.

§ 2. Solution. Here there are certain absurdities spoken by some: for they concede with the Master [Lombard] that the charity by which we love God and neighbor is uncreated: but because, as the reasons introduced above prove, it is the Holy Spirit, which the Master also strives to prove in the Text, they therefore say that the Holy Spirit is that charity. And just as light has a twofold being, namely in itself, and at the extremity of the transparent medium terminating at a body, and there it is the hypostasis and essence of colors, as the Philosopher says: so they say that the Holy Spirit in Himself illuminates the soul, and thus has the act of grace which they call the light of the soul: and He has being in a will conformed to Him, and there He has being by the ratio of charity. And they say that this union with a rational creature, although it is operatively of the three persons, because all operate it simultaneously, nevertheless unitively to Himself and in Himself it belongs only to the Holy Spirit, not to the Father, nor to the Son: just as also the Son united our nature to Himself, and the three persons commonly and indivisibly made this union: but only the Son united our nature to Himself and in Himself. And they say the Apostle felt this He who clings to God is one spirit: and not "is one Father". Moreover, they wish to add a reason to their error: because the Son proceeds as Son by the act of generation as by nature, and therefore He united a nature to Himself; whereas the Spirit as Spirit proceeds as love, because it is the perfection of the will, and therefore He united the will to Himself, although by a far inferior union than that by which the Son united flesh to Himself: because the Son united flesh to Himself in eternity, whereas the Holy Spirit united the will to Himself separably: and therefore they say that He Himself is the charity perfecting the will. But this is foolish: because in the third book of the Sentences it is proved that the Holy Spirit is in no way unible.

§ 3. Moreover, that union is either by grace or by nature. If by grace; therefore it is necessary to have an intermediary habit of grace: and thus the same inconveniences follow concerning grace as concerning charity, namely that an accident conjoins to God, that the created unites to the uncreated, and such things as were concluded above. But if it is by nature: since there is one nature in all of us, this union would be one with respect to all of us, which is false.

§ 4. Moreover, when it is said that light at the extremity of the transparent medium terminating at a body is the hypostasis of color, it is not the hypostasis of one color in a determinate body: but rather in this way it is the hypostasis and formal being of all colors which are actually visible in a non-transparent body, which is called by the Philosopher determinate by its effect, because it determines vision, such that vision does not pass through it: therefore if this similitude has any validity, it seems then that no virtue is anything in us, but that a virtue is a union or mixture of the Holy Spirit with the potency of our soul.

§ 5. Also, in their similitude a certain very gross falsehood is supposed, namely that the being of a color is nothing else than the extremity of the transparent medium in a determinate body: and this is against the Philosopher, who touches upon the generations of colors in many places of his books from the action of primary qualities and passions: whence it remains that the formal being by which a color actually is, it has from the extremity of the transparent medium in the determinate surface of the body in which the color itself is, and it does not have material being from the same extremity of the transparent: for when the extremity of the transparent body is not in act luminous, the colors are still according to material being in the surface of the determinate body. Whence it is clear that a falsehood is supposed in the adduced similitude.

§ 6. Therefore, just as commonly almost all the better [thinkers] agree, one must contradict the Master in this part, and say that the charity by which we habitually love God and neighbor is not the Holy Spirit: but the Holy Spirit appropriately

§ 6. (cont.) is not properly the charity by which we effectively love God and neighbor: for the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit commonly effect this in us, although appropriately the Holy Spirit, because He Himself is properly charity, and thus He is the exemplar of our charity, and He is the distributor of gifts in whom all things are given: for which reason in the book De Spiritu et Anima He is said to be closer to us. And this single solution is adapted to all the authorities adduced in the Text.

§ 7. To the arguments, however, one must respond in order. To the first, saying that "more unworthy" is said in two ways, namely more unworthy in genus, and more unworthy according to the ratio of the good. Charity, through the fact that it is an accident and in the genus of accident, is something more unworthy in genus than a substance. But if the ratio of the good is considered, then it is more worthy than any created good: because the ratio of the good is in it, because it is the effect most similar to the goodness of God, such that even God Himself is never separated from this effect, but is always given with it to him to whom charity is given: and therefore also insofar as it is a similitude of the goodness of God, and has God in itself for another purpose than other creatures, whence He Himself can conjoin a nature inferior in the ratio of goodness to a superior nature.

§ 8. To another, it must be said that charity considered in itself is of finite essence and virtue: but insofar as it acts through the ratio of a good similar to the goodness of God, having God operating within it, it can thus conjoin things infinitely distant, that is, without proportion.

§ 9. To another, it must be said as was said in the solution to the first.

§ 10. To another, it must be said that there are forms in the matter from which things are made, and those are educed from matter by a physical agent. There are also forms in the substance and potencies of the soul by order to God and the state of beatitude, and those are all from the giver of such forms, who is God, creating clean hearts in us, and renewing a right spirit within our bowels.

§ 11. To another, it must be said that charity does not join us [to God] through the fact that it is a creature, but according to what it is: a similitude and a certain emanation of the goodness of God, and God from the same goodness in it is joined to the soul.

§ 12. To another, it must be said that it is not similar concerning the soul: because the soul relates to the body as mover and form, and therefore it is immediate to it just as the form of matter: but the Holy Spirit relates to the soul as a mover not conjoined according to essence.

§ 13. Moreover, there is a proportion between the soul and the body: but between the soul and God there is none, but an infinite distance: and therefore it is necessary that it be conjoined by a medium.

§ 14. And perhaps this is also false, that the soul per se is the life of the body: for there is a twofold life by which a body is called living, of which one is life through an efficient cause, and this is the soul: the other is an influx into the body from the soul, and adheres to the body as form, and this second is similar to habitual charity, but the first to the Holy Spirit.

§ 15. To another, it must be said that that medium is not required on account of the imperfection of the operating Spirit, but rather on account of our imperfection: because our affect cannot proceed into act with the Spirit, unless it is perfected by a habit congruent to that act.

§ 16. To another, it must be said that the first shining thing moves through the influx of light which is not itself, but is a light flowing forth from it into that which is moved by the first shining thing. So it is here that charity is as it were a light flowing forth from the Holy Spirit into us: but the Holy Spirit is as it were the sun, the fount of light and heat in us.

§ 17. To another, it must be said that the virtue of the first mover is so simple that, as it is in Him, it cannot be received by anything created: whence just as it is in the first movable thing, that it must have a property disposing itself to receive the influx of the motion of the first mover, whatever that property may be: so it is on the part of our affect, that the influx § 17. (cont.) of the Holy Spirit to the most worthy act which is to love, it will not receive according to what is immediate to the Holy Spirit: but there must be a habit elevating the potency so that it is possible to receive the influx of the Spirit to the act.

§ 18. To another, it must be said that the work of recreation corresponds to the work of creation in some respect, and in some respect not. For the work of creation is factive of substance, but the work of recreation is of well-being: and therefore in the former there could not be a habit by which the work of creation would be received: because prior to substance there is no habit. But the work of recreation does not educe a substance to being, but to well-being only: and for that well-being which holds itself formally with us, we need a habit. But they agree in this, that each is from God operating through Himself: in creation giving a substantial form giving being, but here an habitual form giving well-being.

§ 19. To another, the solution is clear from what was said before.

§ 20. To another, it must be said that charity, according to the fact that it is conjoined to God through the similitude of His goodness, is availing for eternal life, not by condignity, because eternal life is God, to whom nothing is condign: but by divine estimation, because God does not exact from us for eternal life as much as it is worth, but as much as we are able to give from His gift: but the greatest price we can offer from His gift is charity and the act of charity.

§ 21. To another, it must be said that charity is species, measure [modus], and order of the will ordered to the good according to how it is diversely considered: for insofar as it is a form, it is species: but insofar as it has a certain power for act, it is measure: but order is with respect to the end, according to which it is the bond of perfection. But in itself it also has these things: because the ratio of form, and the ratio of its power, and the ratio of order to the end are something in it. Nor is it true that in all things these three are diminishable without the destruction of the substance. Whence this charity is not lost while the subject remains.

§ 22. To the last, it must be said that a subject is not more powerful than an accident, unless considering both according to the nature of its genus, namely the subject in the ratio of substance, and the accident in the ratio of accident. But grace and charity have other considerations: because even according to the Philosopher we do not say a man is altered when he attains virtue, but rather perfected. Whence habits of this kind have the ratio of perfecting according to well-being from the fact that they are a certain influx of divine largesse and goodness, etc.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Son Could Be Sent In Such A Way That The Holy Spirit Is Not Sent

§ 23. Article 2 Whether the Son could be sent, such that the Holy Spirit is not sent?

§ 24. Then it is asked concerning what he says in the Text in the second chapter of the first part, there: Which charity since it is so in us, that it makes us love God, etc.

§ 25. For there is still a doubt on account of some, whether the Son can be sent, such that the Holy Spirit is not sent? For it seems that He can:

§ 26. 1. For to be sent is to be known that He is from another: but the Son can be known to be from another, such that the Holy Spirit is not known to be from another: therefore the Son can be sent, such that the Holy Spirit is not sent.

§ 27. 2. Also, there are many revelations of hidden things in dreams and visions, just as in prophecies, in which grace making pleasing is not conjoined: therefore since the Son is said to be sent in the grace of the perfection of the intellect, the Son is sent such that grace making pleasing is not possessed.

§ 28. 3. Also, in the Psalm A good understanding to all that do it: therefore it seems that to those not doing it there is a bad one, and yet it is an understanding: therefore since the Son is sent in the grace of understanding, the Son is sent without grace making pleasing.

§ 29. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. First let it be asked of those who induce these reasons, where they have read from any of the saints that He is sent to non-saints? And not even one authority is to be found: and behold we will posit many, that [He is sent] in grace making pleasing. Augustine in book IV of De Trinitate: Wisdom is sent in one way that it may be with man, it was sent in another way that it may be man. For He transfers Himself into holy souls, and constitutes friends of God and Prophets, just as He also fills the holy Angels. But it is certain that He does not constitute friends of God except by grace making pleasing. Therefore from the words of Augustine it is gathered that the Son is sent in grace making pleasing.

§ 30. 2. Also, Augustine speaking of the spiritual mission of the Son says thus in book IV of De Trinitate: When He is perceived by anyone's mind in time, He is indeed said to be sent, but not into this world: for He does not appear sensibly, that is, He is not present to bodily senses. For we too, according to what eternal thing we grasp with the mind, are not in this world: and the spirits of all the just even living in this flesh, insofar as they savor divine things, are not in this world. Here again it is clear what he says, that the Son is sent in the gifts of grace making pleasing.

§ 31. 3. Also, Augustine in book II of De Trinitate says that the man assumed by the Word did not have the Word, as other holy wise men who had the Word sent to them. Behold, here too he says Saints.

§ 32. 4. Also, at the end of that book it is determined that God is not with the wicked: if therefore the Son is sent in a spiritual mission to be with man, as Augustine says, He is not sent to the wicked.

§ 33. Solution. It is easy to adduce many things to § 33. (cont.) this: because the Saints concordantly imply this: whence I say, as above, that the revelation of hidden things is one thing, and the mission of the Son is another. For the revelation of hidden things can be done even through Angels without the mission of the Son: for the Son is not said to be sent unless He Himself arrives with an effect. Whence just as the Holy Spirit is not said to be sent except in the gifts in which He Himself is: so I believe that by an absolute mission the Son is not said to be sent except in the gifts of grace making pleasing, in which He Himself is with man: and how this can well be in the mission of the Holy Spirit, has already been said above. But if the Son is said to be sent in other gifts, this will be in a qualified sense and not absolutely: just as the Holy Spirit too is sometimes said to be sent in a qualified sense and not absolutely. But how the same gifts belong to the Son and the Holy Spirit, has been diversely explained above.

§ 34. To the first, however, which is objected, it must be said that the Son, in the mission which is a mission absolutely, ought to be known to be from another and to be with us, as is said in Wisdom Send her from Thy holy heavens, and from the throne of Thy majesty, that she may be with me and may labor with me, that I may know what is acceptable with Thee at all times. For that is infused gratuitous knowledge. But if someone objects that charity alone makes us pleasing, he does not know what he objects: because although charity alone cannot be unformed, nevertheless it is not its act to make us pleasing, but rather of grace, and of each virtue according to something.

§ 35. To another, it must be said that the Son is not said to be sent in all revelations of hidden things, as has already been held.

§ 36. To another, it must be said that the Son is sent in gratuitous understanding, and not in another except in a qualified sense.

Articulus 3 — Whether One Who Loves His Neighbor Also Loves Love, And What Things Are To Be Loved Out Of Charity

§ 37. Article 3 Whether he who loves his neighbor, also loves the love itself, and the things that are to be loved out of charity?

§ 38. Then it is asked concerning what he says: But lest in so great a matter, etc.

§ 39. For here the division is first to be taken: because this part has three chapters: in the first of which it is proved that charity is God. In the second, that it is the Holy Spirit, there, D, But since fraternal love is God, etc. In the third, he excludes a response which could be made, namely that it was said by causality, there, E, But lest perhaps someone say, etc.

§ 40. Here a doubt arises first concerning what he says: He who loves his neighbor, it is a consequence that he especially loves the love itself, etc.

§ 41. For this seems false: 1. For if he loves the love, the love is lovable out of charity: therefore there are not only four things to be loved out of charity, as Augustine says, namely God, ourselves, and the body, and the soul of the neighbor.

§ 42. 2. Also, in natural potencies it is the case that the same potency is not over the object and the act: because when I say, I see § 42. (cont.) white, and I see myself seeing white, it is not the same potency by which I see white, and by which I perceive myself seeing white: but the first is by a particular or proper sense, and the second by the common sense. Therefore it seems that neither do we love the object and the act with the same habit.

§ 43. 3. Also, the same thing does not denominate itself: for it is not something to say, whiteness is white: or even that the denomination be made verbally, as if to say, whiteness is whitened: therefore by similarity it is nothing to say, love is loved.

§ 44. 4. Also, I love love: either with the same love, or with another: not the same, as has already been proved: therefore with another: and again I love with a love, and again that one, and thus it will go to infinity, which is false: therefore I do not love love.

§ 45. 5. Moreover, in Augustine's argument there seems to be a fallacy of equivocation: because when I say, I love God, the word love imports the act of loving: but when I say, I love love, it imports a habit, as it seems: therefore it does not proceed directly by arguing.

§ 46. Solution. Without prejudice I say that Augustine argues according to how an exemplary cause is received in the exemplated: whence the sense is, he who loves God loves the love in the exemplar, according to how it results in that [created love]: for uncreated charity results in the created, and thus in it as in its mirror it is loved.

§ 47. To the first, therefore, it must be said that there are four lovable things from the order of charity, which are referred to beatitude, as beatifying, and beatifiable, namely God, and ourselves, and the body, and the soul of the neighbor: and in the neighbor another order is included, that first those more conjoined, and after this those less conjoined, and so on even to enemies: nevertheless many other things are referred to charity, either as useful, or as enjoyable, or as dispositions, or perfections of the soul so that it may go out into meritorious acts: and thus love is loved, and other virtues.

§ 48. To another, it must be said that if this proposition, that it does not belong to the same potency to reflect upon its act and object, is proposed generally, it is false: because according to this we would not be able to know the ultimate act of the ultimate potency, or the potencies would have to be infinite. Whence we say that the proposition is understood of potencies situated in such organs, whose complexion from their components is not except for the perception of one genus of contrariety, or if it perceives other contraries, that those as proper effects are caused from one contrariety. For example, sight is a potency situated in the eye, whose composition is from a crystalline humor and an habitual humor: and because the crystalline humor from its transparency is receptive of color, and from the compression which air has, it is retentive better than air: and moreover because the humor of water is a corporeal humor: but the humor of air is a spiritual and incorporeal humor, as the Philosopher says. Moreover, because the habitual light which is in it somehow makes the species of color in act: therefore it does not receive except what is in the genus of color, and the act of color which is light, and so it is of the other senses besides touch which is not so much a sense as a difference of animal: because every animal has the sense of touch, and sometimes has no other except perhaps taste, according to which it is a certain touch, not according to which it is an indicator of flavor. In those, therefore, that proposition is true, and not in others: for I do not see myself seeing by sight, but by the common sense, whose necessity is, as Avicenna says, that I may perceive the acts of particular senses, and the compositions of proper sensibles, so that by the same potency it may be judged that this white thing is sweet, and that common sensibles in which the proper ones are can be apprehended. But in other potencies which can compose and divide § 48. (cont.) the proposition is false. Whence by the same potency I can love some object, and the love itself.

§ 49. To another, it must be said that in the book De Trinitate this is found: whiteness is white, and many others: but without doubt they are not proper: and therefore I say that there is not a denomination here, when I say, I love love, when I love a lovable thing: for I say that by numerically one act I love the love and the loved thing: but they differ: for love is the appetite of the will tending to the good or to the desired thing, and that appetite is primarily of its act, and consequently of the object: and the one is there on account of the other, because the act is on account of the object: and therefore it follows that I love the loved thing on account of itself, and the love pleases me on account of another: because I do not seek the act to go out of the potency on account of the act, but rather on account of the object: and thus both are in the appetite: and then the love of love is the appetite of the act, and the love of the loved thing is the love tending into it, and these are simultaneous: whence there the same thing does not denominate itself, as when it is said, whiteness is whitened.

§ 50. To another, it must be said that as is already clear, it will not go into infinity: because the act of love stands in the appetite, from which it proceeds: and that appetite does not have another appetite, but rather is moved by that which is loved, and that [loved thing] moves by itself what is in the ratio of the first mover in this order: but the loved thing stands in the love which is signified in the verb, when it is said, I love.

§ 51. To the last, it must be said that in truth love is taken in another ratio in the conclusion, and in the premise: but nevertheless it follows well by the mode which was said in the beginning of the solution: because no one loves a friend, unless he has love, and wills this with the appetite of the will: and in that love, as in a cause and exemplar, uncreated love results: and therefore he has with himself, where he may find and love God whom he ought to love.

§ 52. But if you object, that God results in any creature, and thus there would be the same reason concerning any creature. It must be said that it is not similar: because in this it results as in an exemplated thing, and it results as the innermost part of our affect which is love. But in others it results as in a vestige and in an image: or if it results in an exemplated thing as it does in life, and wisdom, and such gifts, nevertheless it does not result in them as the innermost part of our affect: and therefore in those our love is not thus borne into Him.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Neighbor Whom We Love Is Less Known To Us Than Love Itself

§ 53. Article 4 Whether the neighbor whom we love is less known to us than the love itself?

§ 54. Then it is asked concerning what he says: For he knows more the love by which he loves, than the brother whom he loves.

§ 55. 1. For this seems false: because we know a brother by sense, imagination, and intellect, but love only by intellect.

§ 56. 2. Also, if the love of which he speaks is uncreated charity, the regulative and exemplar of our charity, what he says seems entirely false: because the eye of our intellect towards the most manifest things of nature is similar to the disposition of the eyes of a bat towards the light of the sun: therefore much more towards those things which are supernatural.

§ 57. 3. Also, 1 Timothy Who inhabits inaccessible light: whom no man has seen, nor indeed can see.

§ 58. 4. Also, Exodus Man shall not see me and live: and, John No man has ever seen God. Therefore it seems that the neighbor is much more known to us than God: whom nevertheless he here calls charity on account of His presence in the soul.

§ 59. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever things are known by themselves, are more known than those which are known through others, just as § 59. (cont.) principles [are known] more than conclusions: the first things are known by themselves: therefore more than other things: but God is maximally first: therefore He is known by Himself.

§ 60. 2. Also, whatever things are more present in the intellect, are more known, because presence is the cause of knowledge: but things which are in the intellect by their essences according to what they are, are more present than those which are in the intellect only by their similitudes: therefore they are more known: but love, according to what it is in the intellectual soul, is [present by its essence], the neighbor only by similitude: therefore love is more known than the neighbor.

§ 61. 3. Thence it is objected further: Whatever things are so present that they are penetrating the substance and that which is the intellect in its totality, and there is nothing of the intellect which they do not penetrate: those are more present than those which are present to the intellect as an intrinsic presence: uncreated charity is present as penetrating the whole intellect, but created [charity] as only intrinsically present: therefore uncreated charity is more present than created: and the things which are more present, are more known, as Augustine says: therefore it seems that God is more known to us than whatever else is or can be.

§ 62. Solution. Speaking without prejudice I think here one must distinguish in the intellect: for there is a certain intellect in us receiving from a phantasm, and in that [intellect] knowledge perishes if sense perishes: whence one born blind does not demonstrate concerning colors. But there is another intellect not receiving from a phantasm, but in the light of the agent intellect only, and in those things in which it is illuminated even by a more ample light than is the light of the agent intellect, such as is the divine ray, or the ray of angelic revelation: nor do I understand this to mean that there are two intellects in number and subject, but two by mode of conversion to the superior and inferior: as Augustine says in the book City of God, bringing in Apuleius the Platonist in On the God of Socrates, who said that the Philosophers could not see God except by abstracting themselves from the flesh by the intellect, and even then only fleetingly as by a twinkling light. For the first mode is as it were general for us while we are on the way. But the second will be more in act after the way.

§ 63. If therefore it is asked, How is the intellect more potent for understanding? it must be distinguished: because from its own nature it holds itself more to the superior, but from the state of this life more to the inferior. Similarly I distinguish on the part of that which is known: for something is so known according to its own power, that it itself is the light and ratio for knowing other things: and if the power of knowledge or of the intellect is considered on the part of the object moving the intellect, what is known in its proper light and is the ratio of knowing other things will be more known than that which is only known in an alien light:

and in this way the Philosopher says in the beginning of De Anima, that the knowledge of the soul is more certain than the knowledge of the animated body: because the soul is the principle by which the accidents and works and passions of animals are known. Another knowledge is according to the power of the knower and of the intellect which is moved by that which is known, and according to that mode things which are posterior in nature are frequently more known, as an effect more than a cause: and in this way it is said that our intellect, like the sight of an owl to the light of the sun, holds itself towards those things which are most manifest in nature.

§ 64. This distinction being had, I say that God and uncreated charity and all things which are in the soul by potency, are more known in the first mode of the intellect, and according to the power of the intelligible object moving. But a brother and a neighbor and all things which approach the sense, are more known in the second mode of the intellect, and according to the power of the intelligent subject. And Augustine seems to feel this: because he plainly explains it thus: and more known because: more present, because

§ 1. ...interior, because more certain", now it is easy to respond to the objections.

§ 2. To the first, therefore, it must be said that this proceeds concerning the intellect in the second way, and according to the power of the one understanding: and Augustine is not speaking of this. And in the same way it must be said that the Philosopher is speaking of the intellect receiving from a phantasm.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that a human being is said to live a human life, and to understand in a human manner, and this is by receiving from a phantasm.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that not to live is called to die with respect to the act of the life of the intellect joined to the flesh and to phantasms; but if someone sees [God], he then lives the life of the homeland [i.e., heaven] with respect to the intellect.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that no one has ever seen God in substance as to what He is: because this is to comprehend Him, as was said above; nevertheless, many have seen the substance of God.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that all those things which are objected to the contrary proceed according to the first mode of intellect, and according to the power of that which is known: and not according to the phantastic intellect, nor according to the power of the one understanding in the way [of pilgrimage], in which a great frequency of sensibles and phantasms blinds the eye of the intellect considered according to the first mode.

Articulus 5 — Whether Someone Can Know In This Life That He Has Charity

Whether anyone in this life can know that he has charity?

§ 7. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: Because interior, because more certain, etc.

§ 8. 1. For from this it seems that charity is certain to us in ourselves: therefore someone in this life can know that he has charity.

§ 9. 2. This also seems to be the case through that text of the Apostle (Rom 8:38): I am certain that neither death, nor life... nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the charity of God, etc.[78]

§ 10. 3. Again, if charity is more certain to us than our neighbor: but we know our neighbor in such a way that we do not doubt about him: therefore it seems that we also know ourselves to be in charity in such a way that we doubt nothing about our charity.

§ 11. 4. Again, charity is a light (1 John 2:10): He who loves his brother remains in the light but light is manifested by itself: therefore it seems that none of the just has any doubt about his charity.

§ 12. On the contrary: Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred.[79]

§ 13. Solution. It must be said that no one, without a revelation made to him, can know that he is in charity, for two reasons, one of which has already been stated: because although charity is manifest of itself, nevertheless it is not manifested to us in this way on account of the tumult of concupiscence and of phantasms in our hearts. Another reason is: because natural love sometimes has an act most similar to the act of charity: and therefore one is seen in place of the other, namely, natural love in place of gratuitous love.

§ 14. To the first, therefore, it must be said, as was said in the preceding question, that this is true with respect to the first mode of intellect and of the intelligible, and not with respect to the second mode of both.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that either the Apostle is speaking from a revelation made to himself, or he calls it knowledge of charity from a sign of fervor, and the like.

§ 16. To the third, a response was given in the first solution and in the preceding question.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that charity is a light effectively, because it repels the darkness of sin: and even if it were a spiritual light essentially, which however more befits

§ 1. ...truth, it does not follow that it would be seen by itself on account of the causes previously stated, even though it were visible of itself.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Can Be Seen By Us In This Life Through Himself Or Through A Species

Whether God in this life can be seen by us through Himself or through a species?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: He who loves his brother remains in the light, etc.

§ 3. 1. For it seems from this that divine charity is a light: but light is seen by itself: therefore it seems to follow from this that God here in this life is seen by us through Himself: therefore He is seen through a species.

§ 4. 2. Furthermore, if He is seen in a species which is a likeness, what species will be assigned to Him? For no species can be abstracted from Him: and if He Himself creates something in our intellect, that will not be His species which is the formal ratio for knowing Him: therefore it seems that either He is not known, or He is known through Himself. If you say that He is seen through an effect. On the contrary: This vision also belongs to those who do not have charity, and even to those who do not have the Catholic faith: therefore it seems that since one having faith and charity, in whom God exists by His essence and inhabiting grace, sees with a more noble vision, that he sees Him who is God Himself through a species.

§ 5. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13:12: We see now through a mirror in an enigma: but then face to face. Now I know in part: but then I shall know, even as I am known.[80]

§ 6. 2. Again, 2 Corinthians 5:6-7: While we are in the body, we are pilgrims away from the Lord (for we walk by faith, and not by sight).[81]

§ 7. Solution. Certain people, moved by these arguments, say that God is seen here through a species: but the vision is so slight that it cannot be called a vision. But this does not seem to be the case unless perhaps in rapture, when a human being does not use the intellect abstracting from a phantasm. And therefore it seems to me that God, present in the soul, is discerned in His effect which is the grace given to us, and especially in charity, which is the best and most intimate of the virtues, and most similar to the homeland [heaven], because essentially and substantially it remains in the homeland, although its mode is different.

§ 8. To the first, therefore, it must be said that charity is a light through the effect of light, which is manifold: but there are only four more principal acts of it. The first of these is to repel darkness by illuminating. The second is to show those things that lay hidden, and this especially insofar as it is at the extremity of the transparent touching bounded bodies: because thus it brings color and colored things into act. The third is to dissolve and heat by the multiplication of rays, according as that which illuminates is opposed more perpendicularly, because according to that proportion reflection occurs at more acute or more obtuse angles. The fourth effect does not belong to all light, but to that of heaven, namely to move to species [form] through a vivifying power, as it were, of natural generable and corruptible things. I say, therefore, that charity and truth divide these acts between themselves: as to illuminating, it more befits truth, and as to the expulsion of the darkness of ignorance and infidelity; but as to the expulsion of sin which is born from corrupt affection, it more befits charity, because charity covers a multitude of sins.[82] But the second belongs entirely to truth. The third, however, belongs entirely to charity, speaking essentially. The fourth belongs to both: because both make fecund —truth the intellect, and charity the affection.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that God is seen here by us in the species of His likeness, which is the effect of His grace in us, and that effect of grace is not a common effect.

78. Romans 8:38-39.

Articulus 7 — Whether Charity Is The Greatest Of All The Gifts

Whether charity is the greatest of all gifts?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the second chapter of this part, where it is said: If among the gifts of God nothing is greater than charity, etc.

§ 3. 1. For wisdom seems to be the greatest of the gifts: because it is enumerated first among the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

§ 4. 2. Again, wisdom has charity within itself, and they are not convertible: because wisdom [sapientia] is spoken of from tasting [sapere] with savor [sapor], and savor is with charity: therefore it seems that wisdom is a greater gift.

§ 5. 3. Again, the Son is sent in wisdom: therefore it seems to be at least as great as charity, in which the Holy Spirit is sent: therefore it does not seem true that charity is the greatest of gifts.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that charity is

§ 1. ...the greatest of all gifts simply, just as Augustine says here.

§ 2. But to the first that is objected, it must be said that wisdom is called the first gift among the gifts enumerated there, which according to Gregory are given as an aid to the powers or faculties. Or it may be said better: That wisdom is placed first, it has this from the savor of charity conjoined to it: because wisdom is nothing other than the savor of God in His gifts or in Himself, which savor charity produces, and therefore wisdom will not be greater except by accident and not essentially: because the fact that it is the first gift, it has from charity: and therefore charity, which has this from itself, is greater.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that this causes greatness by accident: because, as Augustine says, in those things which are not great in bulk, to be greater is the same as to be better. Thus charity, which is the form of every good and the bond of perfection, is the best of gifts.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that the Son is sent in wisdom, this is true: but nevertheless wisdom does not assume equality from that order: because the intellect is further ordered in us to the affection. For the intellect is good for all those who do it . And therefore also the perfection of the affection, in the order of the end, is better than the perfection of the intellect: and since charity in the perfection of the affection is the ultimate and the best, charity is the greatest of gifts.

Articulus 8 — Whether Patience Is The Substance Of God, And Whether Faith, Hope, Salvation, Patience Have Exemplars In God

Whether patience is the substance of God? And whether faith, hope, salvation, and patience have exemplars in God?

79. Ecclesiastes 9:1.

§ 5. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: God's substance is our patience, but because it is from Him to us.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. According to the common opinion which is now held by almost everyone, our charity is not the substance of God, but is from Him to us: therefore it seems that it is similar.

§ 7. 2. If you say that our charity is an example of divine charity: but patience, and faith, and the like, do not have a corresponding exemplar in God: and therefore charity is called God, but not patience. On the contrary: Nothing is created by God without an exemplar: therefore neither is patience.

§ 8. 3. Furthermore, what shall be said of salvation, when it is said my salvation, is salvation not exemplarly in God?

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that some [virtues] imply an imperfection, such as faith, hope, and patience: faith on account of its form and act, hope on account of its genus which is expectation, patience on account of its subject, and salvation also looks to the evasion of a danger: thus patience and salvation are in a passible subject, and therefore do not have an exemplar in God.

§ 10. Therefore it must be said to the first, that charity is from God, as the ultimate and best, to which our affection is related in the genus of virtue: but the other gifts are not so: and therefore He shines forth more in charity than in the others.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that the exemplar of a virtue is not called the idea under which everything that is created is created: but that is called an exemplar which is primarily in God according to reality, such as life, wisdom, charity, and the like.

§ 12. To the next, the same must be said.

Divisio Textus

§ 4. Here it is asked, If charity is the Holy Spirit, etc. Here begins the second part of this distinction, in which the Master resolves objections against himself. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he objects by reason and resolves. In the second, he objects by authorities and resolves, there, L, It was said above, that the Holy Spirit, etc. In the third, he objects by one authority, by which he especially seems to be opposed, and resolves, there, Q, They also adduce other reasons, etc.

§ 5. In the first part there are three chapters, of which the first contains an objection: the second, the solution, there, H, Therefore we respond to these, etc. The third, a confirmation of the solution, as is clear in the Text, there, K, But so that it may be more certain, etc.

80. 1 Corinthians 13:12.

Articulus 9 — Whether Charity Alone Divides Between The Sons Of The Kingdom And Of Perdition, And Whether With Every Increase Of Charity The Holy Spirit Is Said To Be Sent, And Whether He Is Sent In Gifts Other Than Charity

Whether charity alone divides between the children of the kingdom and of perdition? And whether in any augmentation of charity the Holy Spirit is said to be sent? And whether He is sent in gifts other than charity?

§ 13. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: It is the only thing that divides between the children of the kingdom and the children of perdition.

§ 14. For this seems false: because any virtue is separated from the vice contrary to it: therefore not only charity.

§ 15. Furthermore it is asked, whether we ought to say that the Holy Spirit is sent in other gifts which are given through Him, as it says here?

§ 16. It seems not: because with those He is not present through inhabiting grace: but one who is sent is sent so that He may be present to us, just as His gift is: therefore it seems that the Spirit is not sent with them.

§ 17. Again it is asked, whether in any augmentation of charity the Holy Spirit is said to be sent?

§ 18. It seems not: [because] He is not present for anything else than before, but for a greater degree.

§ 19. Solution. It must be said that no virtue universally divides except charity: because it itself in one way is the form of all, and therefore it is had with no vice: but the other virtues only exclude one vice, and not all.

§ 20. To the second it must be said that, as I think, He is not said to be sent simply except in charity, but in a qualified sense in the others, namely that He is sent in the others as He is Spirit, and not as He is holy.

§ 21. To the next it must be said that there is a sensible augmentation through a sign, and an insensible augmentation. For example, incipient charity remaining in the state of beginners is augmented, but insensibly: but that which changes the state, so that one is now proficient, and becomes perfect, in that augmentation which is sensible through a sign, I say that the Holy Spirit is sent: and this is what Augustine says: The Spirit and charity are given to the one not having it so that he may have it, and to the one having it so that he may have it more: in the Text of the following part [83]. But He is not said to be sent by reason of an augmentation which is insensible, for the reason that in a mission there is cognition through an effect, as was said above.

G. Whether it must be conceded that the Holy Spirit is augmented in man, or had or given more or less?

81. 2 Corinthians 5:6-7.

§ 1. Here it is asked: If charity is the Holy Spirit, since it is augmented and diminished in man, and is had more and less through different times, whether it must be conceded that the Holy Spirit is augmented or diminished in man, or had more or less? For if He is augmented in man, and given and had more or less, He seems to be mutable: but God is entirely immutable. Therefore it seems that either the Holy Spirit is not charity, or charity is not augmented or diminished in man.

§ 2. Again, charity is given to the one not having it so that he may have it, and to the one having it so that he may have it more fully. If therefore the Holy Spirit is charity, He is given to the one not having Him so that he may have Him, and to the one having Him so that he may have Him more fully. But how is He given to the one not having Him, since He as God is everywhere, and whole in all creatures: and how is He given or had more fully without any mutation of Himself?

H. Response to the first question.

§ 3. Therefore we respond to these things, saying that the Holy Spirit or charity is entirely immutable, nor is He augmented or diminished in Himself, nor does He receive more or less in Himself: but in man or rather to man He is augmented and diminished, and given or had more or less, just as God is said to be magnified and exalted in us, who nevertheless in Himself is neither magnified nor exalted. Thus the Prophet: A man will approach a deep heart, and God will be exalted [84]. Upon which passage an authority says: God grows great not in Himself, but in the heart of man. Thus therefore the Holy Spirit is given to man, and having been given is given more amply, that is, He is augmented, and is had more and less: and yet He remains immutable.

Articulus 10 — Whether Charity Can Be Increased Or Diminished

Whether charity can be augmented, or diminished?

§ 6. Here arises a difficult question concerning this which is supposed here: Charity is augmented. And it is said by the Master that it is not augmented essentially, but to us, or in us. But almost all the moderns say the contrary.

§ 7. But it seems that it is not augmented:

§ 8. 1. For in those things which are simple, if one is added to another, nothing greater is produced: therefore if the essence of charity is added to the essence of charity, nothing greater is produced: therefore it cannot be augmented.

§ 9. 2. Again, if I add a point to a point, I have doubled the point, but extensively I have not made a line: therefore by similar reasoning, if I add the essence of charity, I have produced nothing greater as if by a continuous extension, but I have doubled the charity. But this is nothing: because even if charity is posited to be augmented, it is not always augmented in double.

§ 10. 3. Again, whatever things are augmented, are augmented either through something added, or through multiplication in themselves, as the Lord did with the five loaves; or through rarefaction, or through production [elongation], like those things which are hammered so that they become longer. Now it is clear that charity is posited by the Masters to be augmented in none of these ways, except by addition or by multiplication. But on the contrary: That which is augmented by addition has in itself a power whence it unites the added thing to itself. What then is that power in charity converting another part of charity into itself? Nor can it even be imagined, as it seems. If it is said that it is added like fire to fire. On the contrary: Fire passes into the place of fire, etc., as into that in which its species is preserved: therefore it seems that there would need to be present such a moving power

§ 1. ...for the added charity, which would move it to the end that it be united to it: and what is that? But if you say that it is multiplied in itself. On the contrary: What is simple is not multiplied in itself: just as if a point were multiplied a thousand times, it will not produce a magnitude: therefore charity is not augmented in this way.

§ 2. 4. Again, for what purpose is it augmented? Because the least charity is able to resist any temptation, as they say, and the least charity suffices for the merit of eternal life: therefore, since it is not had except for these two things, it seems that charity is augmented superfluously. If you say that it is augmented in power, and not in essence: this seems unable to stand: because a power is not except in an essence as in a subject: thus so much essence can do so much, and has so much power, and unless it is augmented it cannot do more.

§ 3. If on account of this it is said that charity is not augmented. On the contrary:

§ 4. 1. Upon that passage of Psalm 83:6 He disposed ascensions in his heart, etc. The Gloss: The steps by which he ascends, because he always progresses in his heart: for the more he has loved, the higher he ascends.

§ 5. 2. Again, upon that text of the Apostle, 2 Corinthians 12:15: I will most gladly spend and be spent myself for your souls, the Gloss: Perfect charity is that one be prepared to die for the brothers. But is it perfect as soon as charity is born? Indeed, it is born that it may be perfected: and when it has been born, it is nourished: and when it has been nourished, it is strengthened: and when it has been strengthened, it is perfected: and when it comes to perfection, it says: I desire to be dissolved.[85]

§ 6. 3. Again, a reward is due to charity: but a greater reward is due to one than to another: therefore there is a greater charity: therefore it can be augmented.

§ 7. 4. Again, John 15:13: No one has greater love than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

§ 8. Further it is asked in this part, whether it can be diminished? And it seems that it can: because contraries are about the same thing: but augmentation and diminution are contraries: therefore it seems that if charity is augmented, it could also be diminished.

83. Peter Lombard, Sentences, Book I, Dist. 17.

§ 9. On the contrary: Nothing is diminished except by something diminishing it: if therefore charity is diminished, there will be something diminishing it: either God, or the will in which it is, or sin. It is clear that neither God nor the will does so: because God gives and augments it, and the will possesses it. But if sin diminishes it: it is either venial or mortal. Not venial: because it does not attain to it, because it is not in the higher part of the soul: nor mortal, because it cannot stand with it in the same [subject]: but every diminishing thing is with the diminished thing in the same [subject]: therefore it is not diminished.

§ 10. If you say that it is augmented, and yet not diminished, for the reason that augmentation belongs to it by nature: this is nothing: because a contrary which is present by nature is always in one way, like heat in fire, and not greater, nor lesser except by accident: but augmentation is in charity in such a way that from a lesser it is made greater; and if it were to return to its prior quantity, charity would be said to be diminished.

§ 11. Solution. It must be said that this question is one and of the same nature regarding the augmentation of all the virtues: I concede, however, simply that charity is augmented by the addition of essence to essence: and it seems to me quite clear that the Master has spoken falsely in this part.

§ 12. To the first, therefore, it must be said that there is a simple in a continuum having position, and this added to another produces nothing greater: and there is a simple in the discrete having order, and this added to another makes a discrete plurality: an example of the first is the point, but of the second, unity. There is also a simple which does not have the extension of mass, but of power: and this added to another

§ 1. ...makes it greater in essence and power, and not in mass.

§ 2. To the next it must be said in the same way, that it is not similar concerning a point: because a point is equal to a point: but the essence added to charity, and that to which it is added, are not necessarily equal, but lesser.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, as I have already said, that it is augmented by addition.

§ 4. But to this which is asked about a unitive power, I say that they are united to each other by themselves in the will, which is the proper subject of both, just as fire to fire in the place of fire: and the very identity of species in the added thing and in that to which the addition is made, makes an easy transition of one into the other.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that although the least charity suffices to resist, it nevertheless does not suffice equally easily: thus, just as nature not only gives species to matter, but also a fortification of the species on account of subsequent alterations: so it is in grace: not that even a small grace is weak with respect to sin, but because its subject is weak: and therefore it is necessary that it be greatly fortified by the informing habit. Similarly, although the kingdom is due to the least charity, nevertheless a greater one merits an augmentation of reward.

84. Psalm 110:10 (Vulgate).

§ 6. To that which is further asked: Whether it can be diminished? It must be said that it cannot: and I fully concede that the solution which some give—that charity cannot be diminished because augmentation is natural to it—is not valid: but as the objection proves, it is not diminished for this reason, that there is nothing diminishing it: but something destroying it, or augmenting it, is found.

§ 7. Note however, that charity progresses in four ways: namely, as to its radication in the subject from duration; as to the facility of operating according to it, from the custom of the affections and works of charity; as to the number of merits from the multitude of works; and as to the mode of fervor from the actual consideration of the benefits of God: just as novices are sometimes more fervent than others, from the fact that they are actually and newly moved concerning the benefits of God: and that which moves newly provokes more fervor. Besides these four ways, there is its proper augmentation through addition, etc.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Spirit Was Given To Christ Not By Measure, So That His Grace Is Infinite

Whether the Spirit was given to Christ not by measure, such that his grace is infinite?

Whether the Spirit was given to Christ not by measure, such that his grace is infinite?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in chapter K, But to Christ who is the Son of God, the Spirit was given not by measure. Therefore it seems that his grace is infinite, which is false.

§ 2. Solution. Grace in itself is finite: but through union it attains to divinity in its work: because the agent in grace is God and man: and therefore by reason of the union it can be called infinite: and this is proven and exemplified below .

Articulus 12 — What Is Meant By This Which Is Said By Elisha, Let Your Spirit Be Double In Me

What is understood by what is said by Elisha, 'Let your double spirit be in me'?

§ 3. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the same chapter K, I beseech you that your double spirit may be in me? according to the understanding of the Text.

§ 4. It must be said that in Elijah the spirit was twofold, for prophecy and miracles: and Elisha asked for this, not that he might have double what Elijah had. But according as it is introduced here, then the Spirit was for one thing in Christ, that is, for virtues: but in us it is doubled not in quantity, but in effect: because it is in us for virtues, and for the repulsion of sin.

§ 5. However, in that solution by which the Master resolves the last authority, where he says in chapter S, around the middle, To which indeed it can be said, that some acts, etc., the Master openly begs the question: because the very same thing is in the question which he himself supposes in the solution.

82. 1 Peter 4:8; Proverbs 10:12.

DISTINCTIO XVIII

Divisio Textus

§ 6. Here it is asked, Since the Holy Spirit, etc.

§ 7. Having completed the treatise on the twofold procession of the Holy Spirit, the Master treats here of the relation determining the Holy Spirit according to the aspect of his procession. For just as filiation, from the aspect of procession which is generation, determines the Son: so to be a gift, from the aspect of procession which is the spiration of love, determines the Holy Spirit: and the Master treats of this here.

§ 8. And this whole part is contained in this distinction, which is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master determines the ratio of a gift, that is, how this name applies to the Holy Spirit. In the second, he touches upon the proof that He has this name from the aspect of procession, there, G, And it must be noted, that just as the Son by being born received, etc. In the third, he concludes from the ratio of the name, that through this name gift He is referred to the Father and to the Son: but through this name given [datum], He is not only compared to the Father and the Son who give, but also to us who have received, and He is called ours, there, L, And according to this that He is eternally a gift, He is referred to the Father and the Son, etc.

§ 9. In the first part of these parts there are three things, in the first of which it is asked: Whether through the gift gifts are given? In the second, why He is called a gift and something given, there, B,

§ 1. Moreover it must be diligently considered, etc. In the third he touches upon the fact that from an eternal property He has that He is a gift, but not that He is a given thing [datum], there, E, But it is called a gift not only from that, etc. Through this the meaning is evident.

Articulus 1 — Whether Through The Gift Which Is The Holy Spirit All Other Gifts Are Given

Whether through the gift which is the Holy Spirit, all other gifts are given?

§ 2. But here a doubt arises concerning the first chapter: Whether through the gift gifts are given?

§ 3. It seems not: because 1. Generally, motion does not occur through motion: because the Philosopher says that there is no alteration of an alteration, and universally there is no mutation of a mutation: therefore by similar reasoning a gift is not given through a gift.

85. Philippians 1:23.

§ 4. 2. Again, it seems that this would proceed to infinity: because if this is the reason that gifts are given, that they are given in a gift, it is necessary that that gift also be given in a gift, and so on for the others: therefore this will proceed to infinity.

§ 5. 3. Again, when I say, in a gift gifts are given: either all, or some. If all: therefore the gift in which all gifts are given, is given in a gift: therefore there is some gift besides all gifts, which is false. If some, and not all: therefore that gift in which those gifts are given does not have a general influence over the collation of gifts: therefore it does not have the ratio of causality with respect to all gifts, which is unfitting, because that gift is the Holy Spirit.

§ 6. 4. Again, the Son is one of the things given to us. Whence, Isaiah 9:6: For a child is born to us, and a son is given to us. Therefore this gift is given in the Holy Spirit. But to be given in a gift means that the gift has the influence of a cause over that which is given: therefore the Holy Spirit has the influence of a cause over the Son, which is false, as it seems, because the Spirit is from the Son, and not conversely.

§ 7. 5. Again, let us suppose, by an impossibility, that the Holy Spirit does not exist: either the Father and the Son would still be equally liberal as before, or not. If not: then they have their liberality from the Holy Spirit: which is false. If so: then they will still give gifts, and not in this gift: therefore it seems that this is not the reason that the Holy Spirit is the gift in which other gifts are given.

§ 8. Solution. It must be said that the Holy Spirit is the gift in which other gifts are given: and in this gift gifts are given. And the reason for this is that whatever anyone gives to someone gratuitously and liberally, he first before that gives him love, and in that he afterwards communicates to him of his goods, and gives to him both himself and whatever he gives.

§ 9. Therefore it must be said to the first, that there is no alteration of an alteration, that is, such that alteration is to alteration as to the terminus of a motion, because thus there would never be rest, and thus also there is no mutation of a mutation: but frequently one motion is the cause of another, and one alteration is the cause of another. Thus I say here, that the first gift is the cause of all the others, as was said: because in the first gift there is given to us the love of God, which is the Holy Spirit, who is called a gift from eternity.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that this will not proceed to infinity: because just as in the cause of motions one stops at the first motion which is the cause of all inferior ones, so in gifts one stops at the first gift which is the cause of all secondary ones.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that not all gifts are given in a gift other than themselves: because the first gift is given in itself: because it itself is gratuitous love, in which both it itself and all other secondary gifts are given.

§ 12. But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the first gift flows into itself by itself, yet it does not have causality with respect to itself: because the Holy Spirit Himself...

gives itself, and sends itself: but through this the generation or causality of influencing over all created gifts is not removed.

To the next, it must be said that the Son is given insofar as he is born and made: and insofar as he is thus given, he is given in this gift which by appropriation is the Holy Spirit, as the Master determines in book II of the Sentences. Hence, John 1:16 God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son. But the Son according to eternal generation does not have the nature of a gift, because thus he is not from the Holy Spirit: but his temporal generation is from the Spirit and in the Holy Spirit.

To the next, it must be said that, if by an impossibility it were posited that the Holy Spirit does not exist, it follows that the Father and the Son do not send and give a personal love, in which all other gifts might be given: but it follows that gifts would be given in essential love, to which it does not belong to be sent, nor to proceed temporally from them, just as it does not belong to the essence. Hence it does not follow that they receive something from the Holy Spirit, but that then they will not send love, nor does love proceed temporally: because the fact that a temporal procession includes in itself an eternal one is from the personal property of the Spirit, not from any defect of the divine essence.

Whether there is one concept of "gift" (donum) and of "the given" (datum)?

Then it is asked regarding the second chapter B, Moreover it must be diligently considered, etc.

Whether there is one concept of a gift, and of the given?

But it seems that this is so: because § 1. Of the movable and the moved there is one concept of substance, not differing except by act and potency; but a gift is called such by the fact that it is given: therefore they will have one concept.

§ 2. Furthermore, in all things act is nobler and better than potency: since therefore "the given" belongs according to the act of giving, but "gift" from potency, it seems that it more nobly belongs to the Holy Spirit, and is first "given" rather than "gift".

§ 3. Furthermore, James 1:17 makes a distinction between gifts and things given, when it says: Every best given thing and every perfect gift is from above, etc. According to the Gloss there, "given" refers to natural things, but "gift" to gratuitous things: but it is certain that both are given by the Holy Spirit, and in both the Spirit divides to individuals as he wills: therefore it seems that it belongs to the Holy Spirit to be "given" just as much as to be a "gift".

§ 4. Also, the Philosopher says that a gift is an unreturnable giving: therefore giving is related as superior to gift: therefore it is prior according to the intellect: therefore it more befits the general gift in which all things are given: therefore the Holy Spirit is more called a giving or a given, than a gift: the contrary of which is determined in the Text.

Solution. It must be said that "gift" properly belongs to the Holy Spirit, and not "the given", or "giving", or even "donation": and the cause of this is threefold. One is, because "gift" is a noun, and signifies substance with quality: but the quality of a gift is "donability" [the capacity to be given] which is posited concerning that which is the gift, that is, the Spirit proceeding as love: hence since donability, which is the quality that is the principle of understanding a gift, posits nothing but an order to giving, it more befits eternity, than "the given", which is a participle and cosignifies time. Similarly, "giving" and "donation" are verbal nouns, and thus cosignify temporal acts, although they do not cosignify times. Another cause is that a gift is an unreturnable giving, as the Philosopher says, and only the Holy Spirit is so given that he can never be repaid on account of his power. Hence, Psalm 115:12 What shall I return to the Lord, for all the things he has returned to me? The third cause is, because a gift refers to gratuitous things, whereas "the given" refers to natural things: and gratuitous things are better than natural things: and therefore the nature of a gift more befits the best of all gifts, than the nature of the given.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that "gift" and "the given" do not only differ by potency and act, but also by the aforementioned reasons.

Furthermore, that potency which is in a gift, as the Master says, is not a potency with respect to the gift, that is, such that it is somewhat deficient regarding the perfection of the gift, but it is only with respect to an act toward another, that is, toward the receiver of this relation: and therefore that act which is signified in "the given" is not as something coming to it, in which namely the gift itself is effected or perfected in act: but rather in which through the gift itself the one receiving it is perfected. Hence that objection does not proceed except concerning natural potencies which are perfected by their acts coming to them, toward which they are also defined.

To the next, it must be said that an act which is the perfection of a form, is nobler than the potency and the disposition of such a potency, and "gift" and "the given" are not related as such an act [and potency]: but rather the gift is itself the highest perfection, and the act of giving which is awaited, is an act with respect to another, that is, with respect to the one receiving that gift for their own perfection: for if that act came to the gift as to a potency, it would be necessary that it change something in it, which is absurd. Hence through it the gift rather comes to the receiver, and changes them for the better.

To the next, it must be said that although in us gratuitous things are distinguished from natural things, yet in God giving it is not so: for he gives all things in one gratuitous gift which is the Holy Spirit, just as he also makes all things by one word which is the Son.

To the next, it must be said that "giving" does not fall into the definition of "gift" according to which it is convertible with "the given", as it is taken here by the Master: but as it is a universal noun, and abstracts from the concept of a gift, and of the given: and thus it does not follow, that "the given" as signified here, priorly belongs to the Holy Spirit than "gift".

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is Proper To The Holy Spirit To Be A Gift

Whether it is proper to the Holy Spirit to be a gift?

Then an objection is raised against the first principle of the fourth chapter D, there, Because the Holy Spirit is called both a gift, and a given or donated, etc.

§ 1. For from this the Master seems to mean that it is proper to the Holy Spirit that he is a gift. But on the contrary: the nature of a gift seems to be a consequent of the nature of him who proceeded. Proof. From this he has the nature of a gift, because he proceeded as love: therefore it seems that it is a common consequent rather than a proper being.

§ 2. If you say, that it is a consequent, but proper, not common. On the contrary: the Son also proceeded as one who can be given, as is said in the Text in this same distinction: therefore the nature of a gift is a common consequent, and not proper.

§ 3. Also, those things which are proper to the persons are signified in personal acts, as when it is said, "The Father generates the Son," "generates" cosignifies paternity, and "to generate" filiation: therefore it seems that if to be a gift is proper to the Holy Spirit, I could say, "The Father and the Son eternally donate the Holy Spirit": either therefore they donate the Spirit to each other, or to others: not to each other, because this is denied here in the Text, and it would signify indigence: nor do they donate to others eternally, because there are no others: therefore the Spirit is not a gift properly, but by appropriation, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, I see in other proper things, that not only do they not belong to another person, but also that they can never belong: for the Son is neither the Father, nor can he ever be the Father, nor viceversa : therefore it seems that if the Holy Spirit is properly a gift, that the nature of a gift can never belong to another: but this is false: because what is given freely and unreturnably, is a gift, as was determined in the preceding question: the Son is given freely and unreturnably: therefore he is a gift.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The nature of a primary gift is the communion of love: but the communion of preceding love does not belong to anyone except the Holy Spirit: therefore the nature of a gift does not belong except to the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Also, the Son is either given out of love, or not. If not, this is absurd, because it is against the Gospel saying, God so loved the world, etc. If so: therefore that love, according to the concept of understanding, is given first: therefore the Son does not have the primary nature of a gift: therefore to be a gift does not belong to him properly.

Solution. It must be said that to be a gift belongs to the Holy Spirit properly: if the nature is taken from the primary gift proceeding from him who donates or has to donate. For the donor and the gift have a relative distinction: and the gift is going out from the donor: and is that which primarily has the nature of a gift: and this is nothing but love proceeding from the Father and the Son: for essential love does not have a distinct and distinguishing procession, and therefore falls short of the nature of a gift. But the Son does not proceed as love, but rather as Son, who could bestow gratuitous love, and upon whom gratuitous love could be bestowed.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that the nature of a gift is not a consequent of procession, or of a general intention, but is a consequent of procession in species, which is spiration: because spiration from spirative power (as we said above) immediately produces love: but if procession were taken according to a general intention, then it would be true, that it would be a consequent according to the intellect.

To the next, it must be said that to be a gift is proper to the Spirit, the cause of which was stated at the beginning of the solution.

To the next, it must be said that "proper" is multiplex, namely that which posits nothing but respect to the persons from whom it is distinguished in a personal act, and that proper in divine things has a personal act in which it is signified, such as Son and Father. There is a certain proper which does not posit respect through a personal act, but rather through privation, such as innascibility: and this is not signified in a personal act. Similarly there is a proper which is from the nature of an act in the proceeding person, and this is "gift": because that the Holy Spirit is a gift, this is from such a procession, because namely he proceeds as love: and because this posits the order of his communication in the nature of a gift also to others, by the simple personal act itself which only notes the distinction of one from another, it cannot be signified. And the reason for this will be more evident below in the following questions of this distinction.

To the next, it must be said that under the nature of a proceeding and primary gift this proper does not belong to others, nor can it belong. For the Son, even if he is given, nevertheless does not proceed as a gift: nor is he also in the nature of a primary gift, as was said before.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Is Called Holy Spirit In That He Is Gift, And Gift In That He Proceeds

Whether the Holy Spirit is thereby called the Holy Spirit, by which he is a gift: and thereby a gift, by which he is proceeding?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, E, For he is thereby called Spirit, by which he is a gift: and thereby a gift, by which he is proceeding, etc.

For this seems false by reason of the first part, and the second.

§ 1. For there is one concept of spirit, and another of gift. Proof. If he were never given, nor had the nature of a gift, he would still be spirit both essentially and personally: therefore he is not thereby called spirit, by which he is a gift.

§ 2. Also, Spirit is manifested in the act of spirating, which is an eternal act noting nothing but the distinction of an eternal person from an eternal person: but gift is spoken of according to relation to the act of donating, which is not an eternal act, but temporal, in that the Father and the Son do not give the Holy Spirit to each other, but to us: therefore it seems that he is not spirit by that by which he is a gift.

§ 3. From the other part it also seems false, namely that he is a gift by that by which he is proceeding: because if we posit that he never has the nature of a gift or is given, he would still proceed from the Father and the Son: therefore he is not a gift by that by which he is proceeding.

Furthermore. From the statement of Augustine here it seems to be accepted that "gift", "spirit", "proceeding", and "love" signify the same notion: and this does not seem to be true: because of one notion there is one concept by which it makes a person known or causes him to become known: but the spirit is not manifested by one concept under these names: therefore these do not signify one notion, as it seems.

On the contrary: § 1. There are five notions, of which three are in the Father, two in the Son, but one is numerically the same in the Father and the Son: therefore it is left that in the Holy Spirit there is only one: therefore by whatever proper name he is signified, nothing can be signified but one notion.

§ 3. Also, the Father and the Son have one notion, according to which they are related to the Holy Spirit: therefore there is only one in the Holy Spirit responding to that: therefore only one notion is signified in all the proper names of the Holy Spirit.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that when Augustine says that he is a gift by that by which he is spirit, or vice versa: it ought to be understood in the same property, not in the same concept of the name: because I readily concede that there is only one property in the Holy Spirit, but it can be signified in diverse modes: and therefore it has diverse names. Through this the solution to the following is clear.

To that which is further asked, it must be said in the same way: because in truth he would still proceed if he were not a gift: but this does not remove that he is not called a gift by the same proper- -ty by which he proceeds: but it forces the conclusion that in another mode that property is signified by both names.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that Spirit, proceeding, love, and gift signify the same property, which is a notion under a diverse mode of signifying. For Spirit signifies [him] as from the spirative power of the Father and the Son: but proceeding signifies [him] as the act by which the distinction is made: but love signifies the mode determining the procession. But gift adds to love the habitual disposition of communicating to another: and therefore according to the mode of understanding the order is thus, that he is the proceeding spirit, as love, who is a gift communicable to friends or to the rational creature.

But if you object, that a notion is named from "becoming known" [innotescendo], because it causes to become known: and since the Holy Spirit becomes known in many modes by these names, those names seem to signify many notions. It must be said that these many names follow from one, namely that the spirit thus proceeds: and therefore they really signify one notion, differing only in the mode of signifying.

Articulus 5 — Whether Gift Also Implies A Relation, Like Father And Son, Distinguishing The Holy Spirit From Both

Whether "gift" also imports a relation like "Father" and "Son", distinguishing the Holy Spirit from both?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, E, But this relation does not appear in this name. But it appears when it is called the gift of God, etc.

For from this it is accepted that "gift" is a relation distinguishing the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son: but this does not seem to be true: because

§ 1. Relatives are those whose very being that they are, is toward another: but a gift is something in being, although that something is from another, and is given to another: therefore it seems that "gift" is not relative.

§ 2. Also, if it is relative; then it has a correlative in divine things to which its respect is determined: but that will be nothing but the donor: but this does not seem to be true: because if the gift of the donor is a gift, then also the song of the singer is a song, and song would be a relative, and similarly the reading of the reader will be a reading: and this is nothing: therefore it seems that no relation appears in this name "gift".

§ 3. Also, through the nature of a gift he is compared to creatures: for the Holy Spirit is called our gift: but nothing having a relation to a creature is distinctive in divine things: therefore it seems that being a gift does not distinguish. PROOF OF THE MIDDLE PREMISE, because the first is evident. That which has a relation to created things, connotes an effect in potency or act, and every such thing signifies the divine essence, which distinguishes nothing in divine things.

§ 4. Furthermore, why is it more manifested in this name "gift", than in this name "spirit": for the spirit is as much called the spirit of the spirator, as a gift is called the gift of the donor.

§ 5. Also, "spirit" seems to relate more convertibly to the power of spirating, than "gift": therefore it seems that the eternal relation appears more in this name "spirit", than in the name "gift".

§ 6. Also, "Spirit" more names a hypostasis perfect in itself in being, than "gift": because a gift can be a thing which is not a person: therefore the distinguishing relation seems to appear more in the name "spirit", than in the name "gift".

§ 7. Also, that which belongs to another person neither through itself nor consequently manifests a relation through itself more than that which belongs to another consequently, but not through itself: but "gift" consequently belongs to the Son, whereas to be the Holy Spirit in no way belongs except to the Holy Spirit: therefore the distinguishing relation is more manifested by the name of the Holy Spirit, than by the name of gift.

Solution. It must be said that relation is considered in two modes: namely through itself, and as mixed with another being. Through itself, as servant, lord, master, disciple, and father, and son, and suchlike. But mixed with another being, as we say that action posits respect to passion, and agent, and patient, and suchlike: and therefore some Philosophers also said that relation was not a genus of being, but was a respect scattered across all genera of beings. Hence I say without prejudice, that in this second mode according to the concept of understanding it is signified in this name "gift": because without a doubt not the whole of what is imported by the name, is toward another: but it signifies something around which a respect is posited to the giver, and to him to whom it is given, or will be given. But it is not thus in this name "father", or "son": because "father" in what it is according to the signification of the name, is toward another, and similarly "son".

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is not proved that it is not relative, but that in its intention it is more than a relation: and I readily concede this according to the mode of understanding.

To the next, it must be said that donor is its correlative, as is said here in the Text: and then it is not similar: because other names which are imported from the habit of some act or office, do not signify the name of the first cause and origin, like donor: because the singer has this from a habit, or office, and thus from another: but the donor is a donor by himself by his own liberality.

Also, the donor donates from his own what proceeds from himself as from an origin: and this is not in the others. Hence those signify an order to exercising some act, and do not so import a relation of origin.

To the next, it must be said that through the nature of a gift he is not compared to creatures unless the gift is taken in act: and therefore this does not prevent it from signifying a relation: but this is true, that it adds something, as it seems to me: whereas "son" and "father" add nothing according to the mode of signifying.

To the next, it must be said that with respect to the connoted effect it posits a causality common to all persons: because that is the effect of all persons: but the nature of the gift in which other gifts are donated, is not common, nay it is proper: and that nature of a gift is signified by "gift" when it is said to be proper to the spirit: and this is notable on account of what follows.

To the next, it must be said that Augustine says that relation appears more in the word "gift", in so far as "spirit" more signifies the spirituality of the nature, than a being from another: whereas "gift" in its name determines a being from another.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although a gift could be a non-proceeding person, nevertheless in divine things the first gift can be nothing but a proceeding person: and Augustine attends to this.

To the next, it must be said that the Holy Spirit as he is signified in this name, is not signified as a person being from another: because those names rather signify a property of nature as an attribute, than a person. Hence it was said above, that this which belongs to both in common, is attributed to him properly, in that he proceeds from both: but the nature of a gift does not belong to both: but it so belongs to the Holy Spirit, that not to the Father, or to the Son.

To the next, it must be said that "gift" in the nature of the first proceeding gift does not belong to the Son, neither primarily, nor consequently: but the nature of "the given" can belong to him consequently and not through itself.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Son Can Be Said To Be Given From Eternity

Whether the Son can be called given from eternity?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, E, The Holy Spirit... proceeds from eternity. But because he so proceeded that he was donable, he was already a gift, etc.

§ 1. For it seems that by the same reason the Son is called given from eternity: because either he was so begotten that he could be given in time, or not. If not: therefore it seems that there is a repugnance of his giving in time to eternal generation: and this is false: but rather we had above, that some even called eternal generation a mission: because it gives the habitual disposition to the fact that the begotten could be sent, because he is begotten by another. If however he was so begotten from eternity that he could be given, then by the same reason the Son will be called given from eternity, just as the Holy Spirit a gift.

§ 2. Also, just as I see that created effects in a creature, some are concerning the perfection of affection, in which the Holy Spirit is said to be given, and by reason of his aptitude to this from eternity is called a gift: so there are certain gifts concerning the perfection of the intellect in which the Son is given, and by reason of his eternal aptitude to this he himself also seems to be called a gift or given: therefore it seems that not only "gift" but also "given" belongs to the Son from eternity.

§ 3. Also, if this is the cause that he is called a gift, that the Father or the Son was going to give him in time, the temporal seems to be the cause or reason of the eternal: which is evidently incongruous, since rather it is vice versa.

§ 4. Also, I posit, that creatures never exist, or will exist: it seems, that still the nature of the eternal is not removed; but "gift" has the nature of the eternal, because it belongs from eternity: therefore it seems that he is not called a gift by this, that he was going to be given in time. If you say, that then it posits an aptitude to a creature which could be, although it will not be: I posit then, that neither could a creature be: for there will still be the distinction of persons: and thus the spirit proceeds in the nature of a gift, if to be a gift belongs to him from eternity.

§ 5. Also some object, that if "gift" signifies an order to a creature, therefore it connotes an effect potentially in a creature: therefore it signifies the divine essence, because the rule is, that every diction connoting an effect in a creature signifies the divine essence. And they solve this by saying that it is true of those connoting an effect, not in potency, but in act.

But on the contrary: the one whose act of creation is the effect in the creature, the same one's is the potency: but the act belongs commonly to the three: therefore also the potency: therefore by reason of order or potency the word "gift" seems to signify the essence, and not the person.

Solution. Without prejudice I say, that the word "gift" signifies nothing but the nature of the Holy Spirit: and I say this simply assenting to Augustine.

But for solving the objections, such a distinction has been invented by many glossing this passage, that the word "gift" is spoken of in three ways. In one way, that it signifies nothing but a respect to the Father and the Son. In a second way, that it adds over that respect an order to the time in which it could be given. In a third way, that over the respect and the order it adds the act by which it is given. And they say that in the first way it belongs from eternity, even if nothing is ever going to be to which it could be given. In the second way it belongs from eternity, but cosignifies the essence on account of the objection lastly made: and it belongs on this condition, that something will be or could be to which it is given or to be given. In the third way they say that it does not belong except in time. But this is against the nature of a gift: because the first understanding is outside the nature of a gift: and therefore it cannot be accepted in the distinction of the term. Hence everywhere Augustine assigning the nature of a gift, says that it was to be given. And therefore I say that the latter two are of the nature of the term, but not the first sense: and I say nevertheless, that it is spoken of personally in the second sense. And in the third it is spoken of personally cosignifying the essence.

To the first therefore it must be said, that "given" does not belong from eternity: because it is a participle and cosignifies time: and therefore it does not belong except according to act: and therefore also the Son cannot be called "given" from eternity. To the next it is already solved above: because although the Son proceeds from the Father, and from this he could be sent and given, nevertheless by his procession itself he does not signify the nature of the first gift, as the Holy Spirit does, proceeding as love.

To the next, it must be said that effects in the intellect do not have the nature of the first gift on the part of the giver: but rather love which responds to the perfection of affection.

To the next, it must be said that the temporal is neither the cause nor the reason of the eternal: but rather vice versa. Hence it must be said that when it is said that the spirit is called a gift because he was to be given in time, the word "to be given" or "going to give", as when it is said the Father is going to give the Holy Spirit as he is a gift, they do not signify the cause or the reason, but rather the term, and the consequent of the nature of a gift. And the sense is: Because the gift was a gift, therefore giving followed. But if you wish to infer, that if he gives, he gives a gift: and thus the nature of a gift seems to be inferred from the given, and thus to be caused. It must be said that it is a causality of consequence, and not of the consequent: and thus the effect well infers the cause. And there is a causality of the consequent: and thus the effect does not infer the cause, but rather vice versa: and thus it is here. Hence when the eternal is inferred from the temporal, there is nothing but the reason of consequence, and not of the consequent.

To the next, it must be said that even if creatures could not be, the spirit is still a gift, and the reason is in this that he could give, if there could be a receiver: for from the fact that the reason for receiving is removed, the nature of the gift is not removed.

To the last, it must be said that when it is said, a diction connoting an effect signifies the essence, it is understood of potency and act. But that connotes an effect which by its name posits causality toward the effect: but the word "gift" does not do this, but rather posits the nature of that in which every effect is given: and that is the first love, which also is not effective; and therefore that is not essential. But when it is spoken of from the act of giving, then it posits causality toward the effect: and therefore then it cosignifies the essence, and the notion at the same time.

Then it is asked concerning what he says: And it must be noted, that just as the Son, etc.

For there begins the second part of the distinction. And it has two parts: in the first of which he shows, that the Son by being born receives that he is the Son, and God, and the divine essence, and the Holy Spirit by proceeding. In the second he shows, that from this it does not follow, that the Son by nativity is God, and the Spirit by procession is God, there, H, Here arises a question, If the Son, etc.

The first has only one chapter.

Articulus 7 — Whether This Is True: That The Son Received By Being Born, Or Has By Being Born, That He Is God, Or The Divine Essence

Whether this is true, the Son received by being born, or has by being born that he is God, or the divine essence?

Concerning which it is doubted, Whether this is true, "The Son by being born received that he is God", or "by being born is God, or the divine essence"?

It seems, that not: because § 1. Whatever he is by being born, this distinguishes him from the generator: if therefore he is God by being born, God or the divine essence is distinguished from the Father, which is false.

§ 2. Also, Whatever the Son is by being born, that is born: therefore if the Son is the essence by being born, it itself is born. The same objection precisely is concerning this, "The Spirit by proceeding is God, or the divine essence."

To this some say, that this is simply to be conceded, "The Son by being born receives", or "The Son by being born has that he is God and the divine essence": just as the Master says here in the Text: and this is because, in such a locution, the word "by being born" determines nothing but the suppositum: and the sense is, the Son who by being born is the Son, receives that he is God or the divine essence, or has this.

But when it is said, "The Son by being born is God, or the divine essence": they say, that the gerundive can signify the cause with respect to the predicate: and thus the locution is false, because nativity does not reach the divine essence, as was proved above.

Or it can be expounded by "while": so that the sense is, "The Son while he is born, has the essence", so that it notes concomitance: and thus they say it is true. And this does not seem to be of the intention of the Text: because in the Text we have, that nativity bestows the essence upon the Son, which seems to imply a cause. But to this it must be said that this distinction is to be supplied: because although the gerund expresses the ratio of an original principle, which can determine the composition of the verb on the part of the subject alone: so that the sense is, "The Son by being born," that is, he who by being born is the Son, receives, or has, or is God, or the divine essence. Or, the determination can be referred to the composition by signifying an act passing over into the predicate: and thus it is false, because it would follow that the essence was born in some way: and the objections proceed in this sense, and therefore the solution to them is clear.

Divisio Textus

§ 5. Next it is asked concerning the last part of this distinction which begins, at L, And according to this that he is eternally a gift, etc.

And it has three parts: in the first of which he touches upon how he is called spirit; in the second why he is not called our son, since he is given to us, at M, Here it is asked, whether also the Son, etc. In the third it is asked, from the fact that the Spirit gives himself to us, and from the fact that he is referred to us, whether he is also referred to himself, at N, After this it is asked, whether the Holy Spirit is referred to himself?

Articulus 8 — Whether This Is True: The Son Is God By Nativity

Whether this is true: "The Son by birth is God"?

§ 1. Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, at H, To which we briefly answer, that neither is the Son the essence by birth, etc.

For the same reason seems to apply to this, "The Son by birth is God": and to this, "The Son by being born is God": and if it is distinguished, that the word by birth determines the composition of the verb on the part of the supposit, it will be true.

§ 2. To this it must be said that indeed it is distinguishable. But because the ablative has an understood preposition, which properly has to determine the composition on the part of the predicate, and thus the causality of birth with respect to God or the essence seems to be noted: therefore the Master denies it.

Articulus 9 — Whether These Three Are The Only Modes Of Generation: By Defection, Procession, And Derivation

Whether these are the only three modes of generation: by defection, procession, and derivation?

§ 3. Next, it is asked concerning this which Hilary says: By defection, or protension, or derivation, etc.

For by these they state three modes of generation: and it is asked, In what do they differ?

§ 4. And it must be said, that everything that is born from something materially, either goes out from potency with the casting off of the form previously existing in the matter, or goes out retaining the substantial form of that thing. If in the first way, Hilary calls it being generated by defection, as a stalk from a grain. But if it is generated in such a way that it retains the specific form, then it receives nothing but a form of art, and that form is through the extension, or collection, or diffusion of matter: and in the first way something is produced from iron and metals which are produced by the extension of matter; in the second way a lake from a stream; and in the third way a stream from a spring: and he includes these latter modes under one.

Articulus 10 — With Which Divine Names This Pronoun, Our Or My, Can Be Conjoined

With which divine names can this pronoun, "our", or "my", be joined?

§ 6. But there is a general question here: With which divine names can this pronoun, our, or my, be joined?

§ 7. 1. For it is said, "our God," although the word God does not signify a relation to us: therefore it seems that it is not joinable only with those that posit a relation to an effect in the creature.

§ 8. 2. Also, it is said "our Father," although the word Father expresses an eternal relation by which a person is distinguished: therefore it seems that for the same reason it should be said "our Son," and "our Holy Spirit."

Also, Isaiah 9:6: A Son is given to us. And what is given to us, is ours: therefore he is our Son.

§ 9. 3. Also, of the Holy Spirit we properly say, "our Spirit": and we do not say, "our Holy Spirit": but this cannot be on account of the ratio of spirit, because it is said, "our spirit": therefore it will be on account of the ratio of holiness. ON THE CONTRARY: He himself works holiness in us just as spirituality: therefore by reason of both he ought to be called ours.

§ 10. 4. Also, why is he not called "our gift," since a gift expresses a relation to him to whom it is given? Now nothing is so truly ours as that which is given gratuitously: but the gift is given to us gratuitously: therefore it is our gift.

§ 11. 5. Also, in essential names that signify attributes, as wisdom, goodness, and the like: for it is not said, "our wisdom," nor "our essence": but it is said, "our salvation," "our patience," "our strength," and the like: what is the reason for this?

§ 12. SOLUTION. It must be said that four things are required in order that a term signifying the divine essence or a person can receive this pronoun, our, or my, or your, or his: the first of which is, that it signifies an effect in the creature. The second is, that it signifies the relation of the agent to that effect. The third is, that it does not signify a distinguishing relation in the divine [persons]. The fourth is, that it does not signify the relation of a form in comparison to that in which that form is. The divine essence, and deity, and the like, are lacking in three of these, namely in the first, second, and last. And certain others are lacking also in certain ones, as is easy to see.

§ 13. To the first, therefore, it must be said that God signifies as in one having deity, and is imposed from certain acts signifying an effect in the creature: and those are, to provide supremely, and the like, as was said above in the question concerning this name, God.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that when it is said, "our Father," the ratio of paternity is taken, either from creation or recreation: and therefore the whole Trinity is our father. But it is not so of the Son: because he cannot properly be called "our Son," because he is from us through an existence of grace or nature: although he himself says, that whoever does the will of the Father, he is his brother, and sister, and mother; and this is true under a determination, namely according to the fact that he simply is our Father.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that when "spirit" is said, the effect of spirituality is also noted, by reason of which he is called ours: but when "holy" is added, it is a circumlocution for the name of the eternal person: and therefore then it is referred to us.

§ 16. To that which is objected, by virtue of what is this so? It must be said that this is by virtue of both conjoined: because the conjoined is discrete, and the disjoined belongs to the whole Trinity, just as the connoted effect.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that gift [donum] expresses the eternal relation by which he is referred to the Father and the Son, and therefore he cannot be called "our gift". But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the given [datum] is ours, but not the gift, such that the word our and the word gift are construed from the same part of speech: because then the word our says that in that relation he relates to us which is imported in the name: and according to this if he were our gift, it would be necessary that he be a gift from us: and if he were our son, if the word our were construed immediately with the word son, he would be a son from us: which since it is false, he is not called our son, nor our gift. And it does not follow: He is given to us: therefore he is our son, or our gift: and it is the fallacy of accident, because it belongs to him to be ours under the ratio of a given thing [datum], but not under the ratio of a gift [donum] or son, unless the word our and the word son or gift are not construed from the same part of speech: so that it is said, the son is our given thing, and the gift is our given thing.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that wisdom expresses the order of a form to that of which it is the form, and therefore it is said to be its being: and therefore he himself is not our wisdom, because it would be signified that we are formally wise by him: but patience, hope, salvation, strength, firmament, all express an effect caused in the creature, and by God: and they import causality from the mode of signifying: and therefore with such things the word our is joined from the same part.

DISTINCTIO XIX

Divisio Textus

§ 19. Now after the coeternity of the three persons, etc. Here begins the second part of this tractate on the Trinity, in which the Master treats of the equality of the persons. For to the distinction of the persons in the divine, as was said above, it was required that there remain equality of essence in the nature under which they are distinguished, and equality of predication: and concerning these the Master determines up to distinction XXVI.

§ 20. It is divided into three parts: in the first of which he treats of those things in which is considered the equality of the persons. In the second, however, concerning the diversity of names spoken substantially and personally, so that the notional and personal ones may be taken, about which he intends: and this begins at distinction XXII, at After the aforesaid it seems to us that we must discuss the diversity of names, etc. In the third he treats of the numeral expressions which are to be joined both to the essential and personal and notional ones: and this begins at distinction XXIV, at This must be diligently inquired, since in the Trinity, etc.

§ 21. The first of these has two parts, namely that which is about those things in which the equality of the persons is considered, and that which is occasioned by this, namely what is meant when it is said, "the Father alone," since equality posits plurality: and concerning other significations of exclusive expressions, which begins at distinction XXI, at Here arises a question drawing its origin from the aforesaid.

§ 22. The former of these is further split into two: in the first of which, hunting for those things in which equality is considered, he proves that the three persons are equal in greatness. In the second, he proves that they are equal in power, at distinction XX, at Now it remains to show how any of these persons, etc.

§ 23. This distinction is divided into three parts: in the first of which he shows in what equality consists. In the second, he shows how they are equal in greatness, at C, Now therefore it remains to show, etc. In the third, he repeats in order to add certain things, at E, It must therefore be known that there is such equality in the Trinity, etc.

§ 24. The first of these has three chapters: in the first of which he hunts for those things in which there is equality. In the second he shows that they do not really differ from the essence, at B, Although these are enumerated as if diverse, etc. In the third he says that concerning the equality of eternity it has already been had: hence it remains to speak of greatness, at the end of chapter B, But because of eternity, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether In The Divine There Can Be Equality

Whether there can be equality in the divine [persons]?

§ 25. Here a doubt arises before the Letter. Whether equality is in the divine [persons]? And if it is, then it is asked, Since in the divine [persons] there is also identity and similitude, why does the Master not make a special tractate about them?

§ 26. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. From whatever cause and caused are removed, the unity of dimensive quantity is the cause of equality: and this is not in the divine [persons]: therefore it seems that neither is equality.

§ 27. 2. Also, From whatever genus and species are removed [so too its properties]: but the genus of equality is proportion, and this is not in the divine [persons]: therefore neither is equality. PROOF OF THE MINOR. For proportion is the commensurability of quantities: and this does not apply to the divine.

§ 28. 3. Also, equals are, as is said in Geometrics, those which when placed upon each other do not exceed, nor are exceeded: but one person is not placed upon another, neither in dignity, nor in application: therefore it does not belong to them to be equal.

§ 29. 4. If perhaps you say that these reasons have place in those things which are of great bulk: but the equality of the persons is considered in the quantity of power. ON THE CONTRARY: Nothing is equal to the infinite: but the power of any of the persons is infinite: therefore it does not have the ratio of equality.

§ 30. 5. Also, that which is altogether one and the same, is not equal, because equal posits many: but the power of the persons is altogether one and the same: therefore it seems that it does not have the ratio of equality.

§ 31. 6. Another way again it is objected to the contrary: for that which is altogether simple, has no quantity: but that which has no quantity, has no equality: therefore since in the divine there is absolute simplicity, there seems to be no equality.

§ 32. SOLUTION. I say that in the divine there is equality: and I well concede that in the divine there cannot be dimensive quantity, which Augustine calls the quantity of bulk: but there is the quantity of power.

§ 33. Hence it must be said to the first, that the cause of equality which is the identity of power in things, is not removed from the divine: and therefore there can be equality in them.

§ 34. To the next it must be said that proportion is of diverse things in substance: and therefore it is removed from the divine. Above it was shown, that if some genus is removed from the divine, it is not necessary that on account of this the species be removed: because a species sometimes is not transferred to the divine by reason of the genus, but by reason of the difference which it adds over the genus: and so it is here. PROOF. For equality is the proportion of some things to each other according to one quantity: and by reason of that which is to have one quantity of power it is transferred to the divine, and not by reason of the antecedent which is the proportion of diverse things.

§ 35. To the next it must be said that that definition is given of equals in dimensive quantity, which the geometer considers: but equality in some power is just to be able to do as much as that one, and this applies in the divine.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that when the power of the Father is said to be infinite, it is not understood as infinite in such a way that his power would exceed him: but it is understood as infinite because it is not limited by anything extrinsic: and the reason for this was explained above: and in this way the infinite which is most finite to itself, has an equal, although it does not have an equal outside its essence: hence thus the power of the Son is equated to the power of the Father, and conversely. Certain others solve this otherwise saying that the infinite is equal to the infinite. Hence and if the power of the Father is infinite, the power of the Son is also infinite: and thus it is equated. But this is nothing: because the infinite does not participate in the ratio of equality: because its quantity is not certain neither in itself nor toward another: and so it is not equated: because it is impossible even to understand it to be equated by something whose quantity is always being taken. Hence the first solution is truer.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that although the divine power is altogether the same, yet this power belongs to many persons, and is had by many persons, and for the sake of those it has a comparison, because they are many who are equated in one power. But this is true that if there were one in itself, and of one only in person, then the ratio of equality could not be assigned.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that the divine power in itself has no quantity: but the quantity of power is considered outwardly, namely according to objects and acts. For we say that Achilles and Hercules are of equal power, when one can conquer as many as the other: and when one can do every act which the other can do: and so we say in the divine, that such equality is not repugnant to simplicity: for whatever the Father can do, the Son and the Holy Spirit can do, and conversely.

Articulus 2 — Since In The Divine There Is Likeness And Identity, Why Does The Master Not Treat Those As He Does Equality

Since in the divine there is similitude and identity, why does the Master not touch upon them just as equality?

§ 39. Secondly it is asked, Since in the divine there is similitude and identity, why does the Master not touch upon them just as he touches upon equality?

§ 40. 1. It seems, however, that he ought to touch upon identity, because the Philosopher says that one in substance causes the same: but one in quantity causes the equal, and one in quality causes the similar: but Boethius says, and it was held above, that all predicates referred to divine predication except relation, are changed into substance: therefore it seems that those which express quantity of power, and those which express quality, in the divine predicate substance: therefore it seems that from one power or wisdom is caused the same, and not the equal or similar.

§ 41. 2. Also, things which are the same are more one, than those which are equal: but of the persons in the divine nature and its attributes there is the greatest unity, as Bernard says in book V of On Consideration: therefore it seems that there is identity of them in it, and not equality.

§ 42. 3. Also, those which are altogether the same, are equal, and not conversely: therefore it seems that it is more fitting for the persons to be united by the union of identity, than of equality.

§ 43. 4. Also, the three persons are distinguished by properties, and agree in substance: but agreement of substance makes the same: therefore it seems that in those things which he touches upon in the Letter, identity is caused, and not equality.

§ 44. Furthermore it is asked, Why does he not treat here of the similitude of the three persons, since similitude seems more properly to belong to the persons than equality?

§ 45. 1. Because there are certain things in the divine, as Damascene says, which predicate substance: and certain things which predicate that which follows upon it, as just, and good: therefore since of the three persons there is one justice, and one goodness, there will be one similitude of the three persons: and thus the similitude of the three persons is to be determined.

§ 46. 2. Also, those things which follow upon substance have a difference among themselves: for there are certain things which in respect to some of their species properly belong to spiritual substances, but certain things belong only to corporeal ones: just as quality in respect to disposition, and habit, and natural potency and impotency, properly belongs to spiritual ones: but quantity, especially continuous to which belongs the ratio of magnitude, does not belong except to corporeal ones: therefore it seems that quality is closer to divine predication than quantity: therefore also the unity of quality is more properly in the divine than the unity of quantity: but the unity of quality makes the similar, while the unity of quantity causes the equal: therefore in the divine the similitude of the persons is more to be determined than equality.

§ 47. SOLUTION. It must be said that in truth one in substance makes the same, and one in quantity makes the equal, and one in quality makes the similar, as the Philosopher says in V Metaphysics. But this was not to be determined concerning the same: because the same with that to which it is the same, does not express the distinction of a person. But here it is not determined except concerning those things which express the unity of distinct persons. Hence also it was proved above, that the Son is neither the same God as the Father, nor another God, but he is well equal: because the word same wishes to have the identity of a person, while another the diversity of essence: but since in this whole part of the book the Master determines concerning the distinction of the persons, he ought not to have touched upon identity in a principal tractate, nevertheless he touches upon it here incidentally, how one person is in another by the identity of essence. But similitude says far too little in the divine: because it does not follow, as Augustine says, if some two are similar, that they are continuously equal: but conversely if they are equal in quantity of power, it follows that they are similar, because the quantity of power is also according to the capability of those things which according to their name signify quality, as the capability of wisdom, and the capability of goodness, and the like: and therefore equality most of all belongs to the distinction of the divine persons.

§ 48. To the first therefore it must be said that although in the divine with respect to the thing all predicaments predicate substance or relation, nevertheless not with respect to the mode of signifying: because certain ones predicate by the mode of quality, and certain ones by the mode of virtual quantity. But if it is asked, What underlies this mode? this was expounded above.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that those things which are the same, are more one than equal things: nevertheless identity does not so apply to distinct persons insofar as they are distinct, as has already been said: and therefore this is not determined.

§ 50. To the next it must be said that this is false, that those which are altogether the same are equal: because they do not have the distinction which is required for equality: and therefore that reason does not proceed.

§ 51. To that which is further asked, it must be said that similitude does not suffice for the distinction of the persons, as was said before: because although of itself it has the distinction of similar things, because Boethius says that similitude is the same quality of differing things: nevertheless it does not express that one person has as much as another, as is required in the divine persons.

§ 52. To the next it must be said that although quantity intrinsically belongs to corporeal things, nevertheless it is not thus transferred into the divine, but rather for virtual quantity, as was said before: and therefore its one equates the distinct persons: but the one of quality does not equate one to another: and therefore quantity is more fitting than quality: but this is only drawn from the reason that quality is transferred into the divine in more species than quantity. Hence it must be said and better, that although quality in its species might better be transferred into the divine than quantity in its own: nevertheless nothing prohibits the one which is in quantity from being more fitting than the one which is in quality: because the one of quantity equates the persons, but the one of quality does not equate, as was said before.

Articulus 3 — In Respect Of What Equality Is Taken In The Divine

In respect to what is equality taken in the divine persons?

§ 38. Next it is asked concerning what he says:

None of these either precedes the other in eternity, or exceeds in magnitude, or surpasses in power, etc. For he means that equality consists in these things.

§ 39. But it is objected: 1. Since it is possible to take equality according to any species of quantity: and he posits one which corresponds to an extrinsically adjacent quantity, such as eternity which corresponds to time: while he posits another which corresponds to continuous quantity according to its species, which is magnitude: and he posits a third which corresponds to virtual quantity, which is power: it seems that something ought to correspond also to place and number, so that there would be perfect equality among them.

§ 40. 2. Also, Augustine says that in those things which are not great in bulk, it is the same thing to be greater and to be better: therefore it seems that in respect to what is magnitude, it is not equality that is denoted, but rather likeness: because good and better imply a comparison in quality, and not in quantity. If perhaps you say that great and small are qualities spoken of concerning quantity: this is nothing: because the rationale of equality is not considered in respect to those qualities, but rather in respect to their subject.

§ 41. 3. Also, Since Augustine says that in the divine persons there is no quality of bulk, but of power, it seems that magnitude is the same as power: and thus there are only two things in which equality is considered, and not three, as he enumerates in the Text.

§ 42. Solution. It must be said that the three things in which equality is considered all imply virtual quantity, for the reason that another kind of quantity is not compatible with the simplicity of the divine nature. Now this power is considered according to a threefold compass, namely of duration, and of place, and of work: by which three things everything that is limited is limited. For by a duration standing completely whole at once, the three persons include in the present 'now' all time and aevum, and whatever is in aevum and time; and by the compass of place they include every place, and whatever is in it, and are not included; and by the compass of power they include every operating power, whether according to nature, or according to the purpose of free will, or even above nature, and are not included. Since therefore in these three ways God includes everything that is, and is not included, in these three is found the perfect virtual quantity befitting the divine nature: and since the three persons agree in this mode of inclusion, this quantity is one in them, and causes equality.

§ 43. To better understand this, let us show that God in all these ways includes every created thing, and is not Himself included, but exceeds them. Anselm says that just as in the present 'now', which is the substance of time, there is every place, and everything that is in place; so in eternity is all time, and everything that is in time. Now it is established that there is still more in Him: because He is in that which had no beginning, and will have no end: therefore eternity is a measure including all time, and all aevum for the same reason, and excelling both, both in regard to the things measured and in regard to duration: in regard to the things measured indeed, because He measures the eternal, as the Philosopher says: What is eternal is to the eternal, this is the aeviternal to the aeviternal, and time to the temporal. Similarly, it is established that God is everywhere essentially, potentially, and presentially: therefore He is in all things through essence, and through the power of containing and operating, and through the presence of knowledge: therefore He is in place and the placed. Furthermore, He is in Himself, He who infinitely exceeds everything that is. Therefore His magnitude encompasses everything that is, and is not included in everything that is: but still remains outside as infinite: and this again belongs to all the persons: this therefore is magnitude.

§ 44. Also, Every capability is not a capability except through His capability and in His, and furthermore His capability brought forth every being and capability, and remains infinite in Himself with respect to Himself: therefore also in virtual power He includes everything that is, and is not included: and this is what we intended. Therefore, according to this threefold compass, the three things are taken in which the equality of the divine persons is considered.

§ 45. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that magnitude corresponds to place, in the way in which God by His compass places, that is, contains, and preserves, and encompasses everything that is, and is not included by it: and magnitude is not taken here from those things which intrinsically measure substance, like a line, surface, and solid: because those by their concept imply a quantity of bulk, and therefore cannot be fitted to the divine: but place implies containment, which is a matter of nobility, and therefore according to the property of containment it can be fitted to the divine. Number, however, exists in a plurality, and therefore the equality of individuals to individuals cannot be considered according to number, which is what is intended here: but rather the equality of many to many is considered according to number.

§ 46. To the next it must be said that Augustine understands this as a consequence, and not principally: because in truth virtual quantity differs in concept from its goodness: but a greater goodness always follows a greater quantity of power in spiritual things: and therefore equality is considered in respect to the principal of power, and not likeness.

§ 47. To the next it must be said that magnitude is taken here for the magnitude of power: but power is not spoken of according to a single rationale: and therefore power here is taken strictly, namely according as it signifies the compass of every work, which can demonstrate the perfection of the operative power: for God can do all that, and can do more: but magnitude refers to another compass, which is as it were according to the rationale of a placer including all things, and not included in all things nor in anything.

Articulus 4 — Whether Equality Belongs To The Three Persons, Such That Each Is Said To Be Equal To The Other

Does equality belong to the three persons such that each is said to be equal to the other?

§ 48. Next it is asked concerning what he says:

Neither to the Son, nor to the Holy Spirit... is the Father prior, or greater, nor the Son to the Holy Spirit.

For from this it seems that there is mutual equality among the persons. But ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 49. 1. This will seem to be contrary to what will be said later, that in the Father is unity, in the Son equality, in the Holy Spirit the connection of unity and equality: therefore it seems that the Father is not equal to the Son, but rather the converse.

§ 50. 2. Also, "Equal", by its very concept, seems to posit another prior to itself: as when it is said, "This one is equal," it is understood to whom he is equal: but the Father by His concept does not posit another prior to Himself: therefore it seems that equality does not belong to the Father.

§ 51. 3. Also, It seems also that it does not belong to the Holy Spirit: because the Holy Spirit does not proceed, as it seems, through an act of nature, but rather of the will, because He proceeds as love, and to love signifies an act of the will: but those things which proceed in this way do not proceed as equal to him from whom they proceed; therefore it seems that from the rationale of procession equality does not befit the Holy Spirit, but only the Son, who proceeds through an act of nature, which is generation.

§ 52. 4. Also, It does not follow: this is the love of that one, therefore it is equal to him: but it well follows: this is the son of that one, therefore he is equal to him, unless nature falls short: since therefore in the divine it does not fall short, it seems that only the Son has equality by His concept, and not the Father nor the Holy Spirit.

§ 53. 5. Also, Dionysius: In things equally powerful it is possible for things to be equal and similar among themselves and to be reciprocated: but in causes and the caused we do not admit reciprocation. Since therefore the Father is the principle of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, it seems that according to Dionysius's rationale the Son is not equal to the Father, nor the Holy Spirit equal to the Son or the Father.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 54. 1. As was established earlier, one in quantity is equality: hence equality is nothing else than one quantity of distinct things: since therefore the threefold compass of power is one in the three persons, as was proved earlier, it seems that all three persons are equal to one another.

§ 55. 2. Also, Athanasius in the Creed: The three persons are co-eternal and co-equal to one another.

§ 56. Solution. We say that the three persons are equal to one another, as was proved last.

§ 57. To what is objected first, it must be said that in the Son there is equality according to a certain rationale of something appropriated, not proper: and a certain one of the objections touches upon that rationale, namely, that insofar as the rationale of procession goes, He emanates from the Father in an equal nature. And because "equal" by its rationale always supposes one to whom it is equal: and this rationale is also touched upon in another objection: but although it can be appropriated to the Son in some way, it is nevertheless not proper, in such a way that it would not belong to the others.

§ 58. To the next it must be said that it does not posit one prior, but supposes one on account of the distinction which is signified in the word: and therefore it belongs to all the persons, but not to one person [alone]: rather to one in comparison to another in whom there is the same virtual quantity.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that although a procession of the will does not import equality by the rationale of emanation in general, nevertheless it does import it as it exists in the divine: because in the divine an emanating person cannot but be equal in all things: however, those who appropriated it to the Son considered that rationale which is posited in the objection.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that love as love is not equal to the lover, nor is a word as a word equal to the speaker: but love as it is in the divine, and the Word as the Word of God, necessarily have equality with the speaker and the lover, as has been said.

§ 61. To the last it must be said that Dionysius is speaking of the comparison of creatures to the Creator: because God is the cause of those things: and they cannot be equated to Him: but the persons are equally powerful, and one is not the cause of another, but rather the principle: and therefore they can be equal to one another.

Articulus 5 — What These Names Signify, Equality And Equal, Likeness And Like; And Whether The Father And The Son And The Holy Spirit Can Be Called One Equality

What do these names signify, 'equality' and 'equal', 'likeness' and 'like': and whether the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit can be called one equality?

§ 62. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there:

Behold, Augustine briefly assigned in what the equality of the three persons consists, etc.

For it can be a matter of doubt what these names signify, 'equality' and 'equal', and 'likeness' and 'like'?

For it seems that they signify notions: because § 63. 1. Whatever things in the divine note distinction, signify those things by which that distinction occurs: but these things in the divine signify those things by which that distinction occurs: but these are the notions: therefore these signify notions.

§ 64. 2. Also, Hilary says that a likeness is not to itself: therefore neither is an equality to itself: therefore these signify the persons who consist in plurality and relation.

§ 65. 3. Also, Essential terms are predicated in the singular concerning many collectively: but these are predicated of many collectively in the plural: for we say that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are not one equal, but plural equals: therefore these do not signify the essence, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 66. 1. The three persons are not one in personality, because the personality of one is not the personality of another: and oneness is required for being equal: therefore they are not equal in personality: therefore it is necessary, if they are equal, that they be equal in essence and in essential attributes.

§ 67. 2. Also, In terms of notions the persons are unequal, because the Father has three, the Son two, the Holy Spirit one: therefore if they are equal, this will be in essence and in essential attributes.

§ 68. 3. Also, The threefold compass of virtual quantity which was determined above belongs to a person on account of the essence, and not on account of any determinate person: therefore it seems that 'equal' and 'like' signify the essence, and not a notion, or person.

§ 69. FURTHER it is asked, Whether it can be said: The Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one equality?

§ 70. And it seems that it can: because they are one essence which is the equality of the three: therefore it seems that they are one equality.

§ 71. Solution. It must be said that these names 'equal', 'like', and 'likeness', and 'equality', in their concept include two things, namely the distinct persons, and the unity of essence. But when they are taken as concrete terms, then they signify the persons directly (in recto), and the essence indirectly (in obliquo): and when they are taken as abstract terms, the converse happens, namely that they signify the essence directly and the persons indirectly: but nevertheless they always retain both: and by

From this, the solution to almost all the objections is clear. That it is such, as was said, is clear if those expressions are expounded: for "equal" means persons having one quantity, and "similar" means persons having one quality; and it is clear that in this exposition the persons are in the nominative case, and the essence is in an oblique case. But if they are taken as abstracts, the contrary happens: because equality is the same quantity of distinct persons, and similarity is the same quality of differing things or persons, where the essence is in the nominative, and the persons are in the oblique.

Therefore, it must be said to the first arguments, that all things which conclude do not follow from the fact that they signify only notions or persons, but because they signify the persons in the nominative.

To those arguments, however, which are to the contrary, they compel nothing more than that the essence in those names is said in the oblique.

To the next, it must be said that, in my judgment, it should not be conceded that the three are one equality: because although the essence is there signified in the nominative, nevertheless the persons are also signified. And it is not valid: They are that in which equality is, such as essence and power; therefore they are equality. The sophistic topic of the accident falls in here, on account of the diverse mode of signifying in "equality" and in that in which that equality is noted, whether this be power or essence.

Note, therefore, that these things are intrinsically relative when they are uttered plurally. They are extrinsically relative when they are uttered in the singular, and they require an outward determination. For instance, "These are equal" is intrinsically relative, enclosing in itself those things which are referred to themselves, and they are determined by themselves intrinsically. But when it is said, "The Son is equal," it is necessary to add, "to the Father and to the Holy Spirit," or to both. They are, however, relative in such a way that they also consignify the essence in the oblique, as was said.

Divisio Textus

Next is to be taken up that part in which he shows the equality of the persons according to magnitude; which is divided into two parts. In the first of these he shows that on account of equality one person is in another, and this begins there, C, "Now in itself, therefore, it remains to show," etc. But the second proves that on account of equality the ratio of part and of universal and of matter and of compounding [contemperationis] is removed from God, there, F, "But let us now return to the proposition, and press on with what was begun," etc.

In the first there are three chapters: in the first of which there is nothing but a transition from what has been said to what is to be said. In the second, it is shown that the equality of magnitude is in the essence, there, D, "It is therefore to be known," etc. In the third, it is shown as a consequence of this that each of the persons is in another, there, E, "And thence it is, that the Father is said," etc.

Articulus 6 — Whether In Eternity There Are Years From Generation To Generation

Whether in eternity there are years from generation to generation?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: "Your years are unto generation and generation."

§ 1. For eternity is indivisible: therefore it seems that years do not apply to it. For a year is the return of the sun to some point of the zodiac, in which its motion is fixed, just as in Aries, or in another place: therefore it seems that a measure of this kind does not apply to eternity: therefore he speaks badly.

§ 2. Moreover, what is it that he says, "Unto generation and generation"? For if by this he means to say that God does not pass away in the passing of the succession of generations, this seems to be too little: because even the earth, as Ecclesiastes says, stands forever, while a generation passes away, and a generation comes.

§ 3. Similarly, if generation and generation are restless and do not stand still, for as long as God wills, namely up to the generation which is collected out of all generations, and this is said to be the generation of the Saints, it is necessary that it havein every succession of generations a restless mover. But this cannot be by nature except the motion of the celestial bodies: therefore it seems that the years of that motion are also in the generation of generations: and therefore it does not apply to God alone, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: Afterwards he premises in the same Psalm, verses 27 and 28: "They," that is, the heavens, "shall perish: but you remain, ... and your years shall not fail." Therefore it seems that it befits God alone.

Solution. As was said above, the years of God are said to be His eternity, not distinguishable in itself, but in relation to lower measures. And the year of God is called eternity exceeding the revolutions of years. For however many revolutions of years are taken, eternity exceeds them infinitely before and after, because the duration of eternity before and after is infinitely as great: whence it does not follow that eternity is divided or distinguished in itself. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the next, it must be said that the generation of generations is called the number of the elect collected out of every generation, as Augustine says here. But in that succession the earth does not stand still in such a way that it is not mutable according to disposition and part. For presently, through the circular generation of the elements and the mixture in the elements, the earth is transmuted according to a part, and not according to the whole. But at the end of the world, it will be altered in its active and passive qualities, and in the things caused from them. But it is true that it will stand forever according to substance: for Augustine says that the figure of this world passes away, but not its substance.

To the next, it must be said that the motion of heaven and heaven itself will stand as long as the succession of generation lasts. But nevertheless they are referred to time. For heaven is referred to the "now" of time, as to a measure: and motion itself according to its parts is in time, as in a number; but time is in it as in a cause, and in heaven as in a subject. But God is neither changed like the earth, nor referred to time like heaven and motion.

Articulus 7 — Whether Three Persons Are Something Greater Than Two, And Two Than One

Whether the three persons are something greater than two, and two greater than one?

It is a doubt here what he says in the fourth chapter, D, there, "Nor are two persons together anything greater than one," etc.

§ 1. For this seems to have a counter-instance in all discrete and collective things: for one is a part of two, and every part is less than the whole. Therefore it seems that two persons are something greater than one, and three greater than two.

§ 2. Similarly, we will hold below that this name, "Trinity," collectively signifies the persons. Therefore, since anyone of a people is a part of the people, it seems that one person is something less than the whole Trinity.

§ 3. Also, one person is related in some mode to the Trinity, either as the same, or as equal, or as greater, or as less. Not as the same, because otherwise it would be necessary that by supposing that person, the Trinity would be supposed, which cannot be. Nor as greater, nor as equal, as it seems, because equals which are of one essence are converted upon themselves: but the predication of the Trinity is not converted to any of the persons. Therefore it seems that it relates as less: therefore one person is not as much as two or three.

Solution. It must be said that "as much" [tantum] and "how much" [quantum] declare here an equality in that which is quantity, and not in the number of notions or persons. This [number] however is not simply a number, as will be shown below. For in the number of notions which the notions make, two persons are more than one, and three are more than two or one, but they are not something more, or greater. And the process in the first argument is from the discrete to the continuous; whence the fallacy of figure of speech occurs.

To the next, it must be said that "Trinity" is not a collective noun: because the form of a collection is simply "many," and "one" in a qualified sense. But the Trinity unites the persons simply in one nature. It is said to be like a collective noun, however, in that it collects all the persons in itself, not as parts, but as one in nature, which is not a whole to them, but the same to each one of them: which is not the case in a quantitative or integral whole.

To the next, it must be said that one person is related to the Trinity in two ways: because "Trinity" says two things, namely, a collection of persons, and a union. As to the discretion of the things collected, one person relates as in a lesser notional discretion than the collection of the three. But to the union, it relates as equal and the same: because it is the same as the unity of the essence and is equal through the essence to all three together. Whence in my judgment, no response is to be given to such [arguments] without a distinction of this kind.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Father Can Be Said To Be In The Son, And One Person In Another

Whether the Father can be said to be in the Son, and one person in another?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: "And thence it is, that the Father is said to be in the Son," etc.

For it seems that these things fit according to no mode of saying "in another".

§ 1. For the Philosopher says in Physics IV: "It must be apprehended in how many modes something is said to be in another. Therefore, in one mode, indeed, as a finger in a hand, and generally parts in a whole. But in another, as a whole in its parts: for the whole is not apart from the parts. In another, as man in animal, and generally species in a genus. In another, as a genus in a species: and generally in the ratio of the species, a part of the species. Furthermore, as health in hot and cold things, and generally form in matter. Furthermore, as the affairs of the Greeks in the king, and generally in a primary mover. In addition, as in a good, and generally in an end: and this is that for the sake of which the rest are, and are made. But the most proper of all is as in a vessel, and generally in a place." From this it is accepted that the mode of something being in another is said by these eight enumerated modes, or nine if the last is divided into two: because there is place as a vessel, and also place not as a vessel, but immobile, which is simply place. But it is established that in none of these modes is one person in another: therefore it seems that simply one is not in another.

§ 2. Also, when it is said, "The Father is in the Son," the preposition, since it is transitive, necessarily imports some distinction. But there is no distinction except according to a relation of origin. Therefore it seems that it notes the authority of the Father towards the Son. But when it is said conversely, "The Son is in the Father," by the same reasoning it will note a distinction, and not under the same ratio as first: therefore it seems that not by the same reasoning is the Father in the Son, and the Son in the Father, and the same reasoning goes for the Holy Spirit.

§ 3. Also, for those things of which one is to the other as distinct alongside distinct, neither of them is in the other. But the Word from eternity was alongside God, as distinct alongside distinct: therefore it seems that He was never in the Father, nor the Father in Him, and thus what is said here is nothing.

§ 4. Also, the word in seems to import a twofold habitude when it is said that the Father is in the Son, namely, the unity of essence which is touched upon here by Hilary and Augustine and Ambrose, and also the existence of relatives which Damascene touches upon: for one of the relatives is in the other through the intellect. Therefore it seems that once posited, it would be taken equivocally according to two habitudes.

§ 5. Also, three illustrious Doctors expound this concerning the unity of essence. And I ask, in what habitude is the word in taken there, and let us say, "The Father is in the divine essence, and the Son is in the same essence"? For either it is as in a whole, which is noted below, or it is as in a form, or as in a place: but it is established that it is in no way. Therefore the word in does not note the habitude of the essence, and thus it is badly expounded.

Solution. It must be said that in truth, as was said in objecting, the preposition notes a twofold habitude, namely of origin, or relation, and of the identity of essence. And as to that which is of relation, not in the same mode is the Father said to be in the Son, and the Son in the Father, and similarly concerning the Holy Spirit.

To the first, it must be said that it is taken here in none of those modes: because the Philosopher there does not touch upon the modes by which something is in something, except those which have some similarity with that mode by which something is in another as in a place, because he intends to treat only of that there. It could, however, though remotely, be reduced to that by which what is caused is in the cause: because although there is no cause in divine things, there is nevertheless the potency of a principle there.

To the next, the solution is already clear through what has been said before.

To the next, it must be said that the word "alongside" [apud] notes a distinction of perfect and equal according to the mode of signifying. For in corporeal things, this term notes lateral vicinity, and that vicinity posits equality. Nevertheless, in divine things it does not preclude that one of the distinct persons can be in the other, both through the intellect of the principle and of what exists from the principle, and also through the unity of the essence. But in corporeal things, which cannot be of one essence if they are distinct, it is true that the conclusion of that reasoning follows.

To the next, it must be said that although person and essence differ according to the mode of signifying, nevertheless they are really the same. And therefore both the personal distinction and the essential unity can sometimes be signified by one term. And it is not an equivocal sign, because one is taken in the other, just as was also explained above.

To the next, it must be said that it is not properly said, "The Father is in the divine essence," but it could be said, "The Son is in the nature or essence of the Father," or conversely. There, some distinction would be noted, not indeed of essence to person, but of person to person, which with Himself is one in essence. If, however, it is conceded, then it must be said that for the preposition a transition in the mode of signifying suffices, not in the thing. And that mode of signifying will be that the Father is in the essence as a "who" in a "by which it is," and the essence in the Father as a "by which it is" in a "who." And because in divine things there is indifference between the "who it is" and the "by which it is," therefore the preposition is expounded through the identity of the thing. And this cannot be reduced to any of the Philosopher's modes, because neither did he posit all of them, but those which had a similarity with the last one, which he intended to treat, as was said.

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: "The nature of human intelligence does not grasp the ratio of this saying," etc.

For this seems false: because above, similars, a vestige, and an image were given to represent this.

To this it must be said that no similar represents it sufficiently, and this is what Hilary intends.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Son Adds Anything Beyond That Which He Received From The Father

Whether the Son adds anything upon that which He received from the Father?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: "For if He received a part of the same one who begot, then neither is perfect," etc.

For this seems false. Because either the Son adds something upon that which He receives from the Father, or nothing. If He adds something, the Father does not have the whole of what the Son has, which is heretical. If He adds nothing, then either He has the whole and the same, or He does not have the whole, but something else. If in the first mode, then the Father and the Son are in whole the same, which is false, since it was denied above that they are even the same God. But if He does not receive the whole but something else, then He is not equal and the same in essence with the Father, which again is absurd. Therefore it seems that that speech which is said here is false.

If by chance you say that the Son adds a property which is not a "something" [aliquid], but a "towards something" [ad aliquid]. On the contrary: If the Son adds that, He adds it only to that which He receives from the Father; but He receives the essence. Therefore He adds it to the essence; therefore the property determines the essence, which is false: because thus the divine essence of the Son would not be the essence of the Father, just as the person of the Son is not the person of the Father. Therefore it seems that He adds neither a "something" nor a "towards something," and thus remains utterly the same.

Solution. It must be said that the Son adds nothing at all to that which He receives from the Father. Nor nevertheless does it follow that the Son is simply the same as the Father; but it follows that the Son in what is received is the same as the Father, and this is absolutely true.

But if you ask, In what then are the Father and the Son distinguished?

It must be said, in the fact that the one is receiving through generation, whereas the other is giving. And these things do not distinguish the received thing from him from whom He receives, but rather the receiver from the giver. And therefore it is clear that because He receives as much as He is, therefore it follows that the receiver and the giver are equal. But because that one is giving, this one receiving, therefore it follows that they are not the same, but one and another; and through this the solution is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether Everything That Is Born Is Born From A Double Kind, Namely Male And Female

Whether everything that is born is born from a double gender, namely male and female?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "Not through a double conjunction of agreeing genders," etc.

For not everything that is generated, is generated engrafted-ly [insitive] or through a double conjunction of agreeing genders.

And to this it must be said that Hilary is speaking here of the generation of a living thing, as is clear in the text itself. But a living thing is either sensitive or vegetative. In the sensitive, however, in every such thing that is perfect, that is, which has from itself to produce another such as itself is, it is necessary that there be a double commixed gender, namely male and female. Because in every animal, as the Philosopher says, there is male and female, except in the eel, in which male and female has never appeared: and therefore fishermen also say that eels are generated from the superfluity of other fishes. Certain ones are also imperfect, which cannot produce another such as they themselves are, such as those which are born from putrefaction. But a vegetative living thing grows strong through an engrafting virtue, that is, through a force engrafted into it: and therefore one plant is engrafted into another, because as the Philosopher says, a plant everywhere impregnates and is impregnated; and Hilary removes these two modes here in the divine generation, in which a living thing is born into a living thing.

Articulus 11 — Whence It Happens That Something Degenerates, And What Its Causes Are

From whence does it happen that something degenerates, and what are the causes of it?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: "While nativity does not degenerate the nature of God," etc.

For in what does nature degenerate?

And to this it must be said that it degenerates for many causes. One and the chief of which is that generation is from the superfluity of nourishment, in which the formative virtue is originated from the generative virtue which is in the father, as was noted above. And therefore our generation, which is from the assumption of nourishment, is useful in the assumption of what is alien, and thus it becomes degenerate, which does not apply to the divine. Similarly also, the same thing in heaven does not move toward the generation of all things: because heaven in its constellation does not hold itself in the same mode, but by continuously mutating the site and proportions of aspects, it moves otherwise and otherwise. A third is that matter is not mobile and commiscible in the same mode. And all these things he intends to remove from divine generation. But how ours is new and receiving a new thing, has been set forth above.

Divisio Textus

"But let us now return to the proposition," etc. Here he begins to show the equality of magnitude of the three persons through the removal of the ratio of part, of genus, of species, of matter, and of compounding from the divine things; and he does this in the first part of this part. In the second, he objects against it, there, N, "To these things it seems to be opposed," etc. In the third, he solves it, there, O, "But these things, which are said here," etc.

With respect to the first five, there are five chapters in the first part. And the first of them is that the divine essence is not said of the persons as an integral whole whose constituent parts are the persons.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Essence Is Predicated Of The Persons As A Certain Whole

Whether the essence is predicated of the persons as a certain whole?

And about this there happens here a doubt. First, whether the essence is predicated of the persons as a certain whole?

But it seems that it is: § 1. For the divine essence is predicated of the three and of each of them singly. Therefore it seems that it is a whole to them, and the persons are parts.

§ 2. Also, whatever is removed from something and does not differ from it in genus or species or number, seems to be a part of it. But any person is removed from the Trinity, not differing from it in genus, or species, or number: therefore any of the persons is a part of the Trinity.

§ 3. Also, two are more than one. Therefore they are a whole to one; and similarly three to two and to one. Therefore it seems that they are a whole to two and to one: and thus it seems that one person is a part of the Trinity, and similarly two.

§ 4. Also, in the Letter the "whole essence," the "whole Trinity" is often said. Therefore it seems that it is a whole, and thus in divine things there is the ratio of a part and the ratio of a whole.

§ 5. Also, let it be given that the Father is the whole deity and the whole God. Then either the Son is that same thing, or another. Not another: therefore the same. But whatever things are utterly the same according to reality as one and the same thing, they themselves are the same according to reality. But the Father and the Son are the same according to reality to one and the same deity or essence. Therefore they themselves are the same according to reality. But whatever things or persons are the same according to reality are distinguished by no reality. Therefore the Father and the Son are distinguished by no reality. And the heresy of Sabellius comes upon us, who posited the Trinity in names alone. Therefore it seems that the Father is not the whole divine essence: therefore He is a part.

§ 6. Also, by another way it seems to be proved that whole and part are in the Trinity: for in no nature is it such that a thing of nature is made from nature alone. For if nature alone made a thing of nature, since it has itself in one mode, it would make a thing of nature in only one mode. But this is false even in divine things, because the things of the divine nature are three. Therefore it seems that the nature is in a person with something else. Therefore the nature seems to be an essential part of the person.

§ 7. Also, Boethius: Everything that is participates in "to be" so that it may be, and it participates in some other thing so that it may be "this." But the Father is "this." Therefore He participates in two things, namely in "to be" so that He may be, and in paternity so that He may be this or that one. And thus again it returns that an essential part of the Father or of another person is the divine essence.

§ 8. Also, this seems so, because we have very often had it that Augustine says that the Father is not by that by which He is the Father: because He is the essence, and by paternity He is the Father. Therefore the essence seems to be an essential part of the Father.

Solution. It must be said that no ratio of a whole and no ratio of a part is in divine things. And this is so because every whole is composed of its parts, and I say this if it is truly a whole. But a part is imperfect in relation to its whole. And neither of these applies to divine things: because simplicity is repugnant to the first, and perfection is repugnant to the second.

Therefore it must be said to the first that the divine essence is predicated convertibly of a person. For this is true: "The Father is the divine essence," and "The divine essence is the Father." But if it is objected thus: "The Father is whatever is the divine essence," it is still true. And if one proceeds further, "The divine essence is the Son: therefore the Father is the Son," it is clear enough that the "what" is mutated into a "towards something" (relative). Whence the argument does not follow. Whence whatever is the divine essence is the Father, and conversely. But if this argument is made concerning this name, "Trinity," thus: "The Father is something [aliquid] of the Trinity, and not the whole Trinity: therefore He is a part of the Trinity." It must be said that this is false: "The Father is something [aliquid] of the Trinity"; because the word aliquid notes a partition. But if it is proposed thus: "The Father is someone [aliquis] of the Trinity," then it is true. If afterwards one proceeds further thus: "He is someone of the Trinity, and not the whole Trinity: therefore He is a part of the Trinity," it is already solved above. Because that the Father is not the whole Trinity, this is not impeded by the unity of the Trinity, but by the plurality of the persons signified in this name, "Trinity". Whence from this it does not follow that the Father is a part: but it follows that the Father is not as many as the three united together in one essence are, as we said above.

To the next, it must be said that this proposition, "Whatever is removed from something," etc., is understood thus, that that thing be in it as having act-being in it and not in itself: like a foot in Socrates, or another part in its whole. But the persons do not have themselves thus in the Trinity: because in the Trinity they do not have being in potency. Nor is the Trinity in them as a whole in its parts. But rather the persons are signified in this name, "Trinity," as taken together: and therefore any one taken per se is removed from the Trinity, and the Trinity from it. And the cause of this has already been said.

To the next, it must be said that this is true, that two are more than one: and thus I well concede that two persons in the number which the relations make, are more than one. But nevertheless one is not a part of two, nor is that unity a part of any binary. And this is clear thus: In inferior things there is the substantial form of each thing, whose act is to bound the thing in itself and to separate it from others in which the same form in number is not present through act. Therefore the act of that form, namely to bound in itself and to divide from others, makes the thing itself to be one, and is its unity. And therefore, because those unities which are in two things and follow from substantial forms are not one, nor unum, therefore it follows that the unity of this one and the unity of that one, aggregated, make a binary, and three a ternary, and so on, according as the Philosopher says that we know number by the division of a continuous whole. In divine things, however, the essence does not divide, but rather unites the persons. And therefore the unity of a person as a person is not the essence, but a notion or relation distinguishes in divine things, and this notion or that notion makes the unity of a person; for it makes the person to in-exist and be distinct from another. And therefore this person and that person are two persons in the number of notions. But because a notion does not divide a person from a person essentially, therefore it does not simply make a plurality. Therefore it neither simply makes a binary. Whence although there are two persons in divine things, there is nevertheless not a binary: and although there is a plurality of persons there, there is nevertheless not a multitude. And therefore I do not think it should be conceded that one in divine things is a part of two, even a discrete part, as unity is a part of a binary or a ternary. But I well concede that one person is not as many as two or three, and two are not as many as three, nor as few as one: because the number which a notion makes in divine things is not simply a number: and this will be more fully determined below.

To the next, it must be said that the holy ones call a whole the same as what is perfect: just as the Philosopher says in Physics III: "I say whole and perfect are the same."

To the next, it must be said that the Father is the whole deity and the whole God, and the Son similarly. But what is subjoined afterwards, "Whatever things are the same to one and the same," etc., it must be understood that this is true according as they are the same to it. But there is no predication or comparison of the persons to the essence there except in the ratio of the absolute concerning the absolute. For whatever is compared to the essence in divine things is compared as absolute to absolute. For a relative is not to another except to that to which it is opposed, and therefore compared to the essence it is not to another. Whence from that proposition it does not follow that the Father and the Son are the same, but that in all absolute things they are the same, and in those in which they are referred to one another, they have a distinction.

To the next, it must be said that the divine essence is not a part of the Father, nor as he says, of another person: and it is true that the essence has nothing added to itself in the Father by which it constitutes a person. Because it has already been said that nothing is compared to the essence in divine things except with respect to absolute identity on account of its ultimate simplicity. But although paternity does not differ in reality from the essence in the Father, nevertheless it differs in the mode of signifying: which, although in comparison to the essence it is a mode and not a reality, is nevertheless a reality in comparison to the opposed person. And therefore the persons do not differ only in the mode of names. But if on both sides it were a mode, namely on the part of the essence and on the part of the person, then the persons would differ only by a difference of names, as Sabellius said.

To the next, it must be said that even according to the Philosophers, the First participates in nothing except being, and neither does it participate in that so as to take a part of it, as was disputed above. But for someone to be a father, it suffices to have something differing from being in the mode of signifying, which mode is a reality not connumerable to the essence, but in comparison to another person which is a reality of the same nature.

To the next, it must be said that Augustine intends that He is not by that by which He is the Father, and He is the Father according to the mode of signifying which is a respective reality, although it is not a reality diverse from the nature.

Articulus 13 — Whether Faith Precedes The Intellect, Such That Nothing Is Understood Unless It Is First Believed

Whether faith precedes intellect, so that nothing is understood unless it is first believed?

Whether faith precedes understanding, such that nothing is understood unless it is first believed?

Next, it is asked concerning what is said in this chapter G, "Let him pray that he may understand what he believes," etc.

For from this it seems to follow that faith precedes understanding.

But on the contrary: Because Augustine says that to believe is to think with assent; but assent is only of one who understands to whom assent is to be given: therefore understanding is before faith.

They commonly resolve this by saying that there is understanding that something is, and this understanding precedes faith; and there is understanding what a thing is, or how it is, and this follows faith.

You will find another solution noted above.

Articulus 14 — Whether In The Divine There Is A Communicable Notion Or An Incommunicable One

Whether in the divine there is a communicable or incommunicable nature?

Next, inquiry is made concerning the second part, where from the divine it removes the predication of genus, there, H, here it must be added, that there is such equality, etc.

And two questions are asked here: the first of which is, Whether in the divine there is a communicable and incommunicable nature?

The second, however, Whether in the divine there is a universal and particular nature?

Concerning the first, it proceeds thus: 1. In whatever there is a uniting one, and another distinguishing in one nature, in these there is a communicable and incommunicable nature: in the divine there is a uniting of persons in one nature, because of essence: and in the divine there is a distinguishing of one person from another, because of property: therefore in the divine there is a communicable and incommunicable nature.

1. Likewise, In the divine there is that which is predicated of each hypostasis, and is that which is predicated of another: therefore in the divine there is communicable and incommunicable.
2. Likewise, Damascene says, that in the divine the common is considered in reality, but by reason that which is divided: therefore there is communicable and incommunicable.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Communicable and incommunicable are either caused by the same principle of essence, or by different ones. If by the same: therefore the same is the principle of community, and of singularity or distinction: but whatever is the principle of distinction, is opposed to community: therefore the same is the principle of community, and opposed to community, which is not intelligible: therefore they are caused by different ones. But to whatever different things belong, that is composite: therefore God is something composite: and thus it follows, that He is not the first being, nor supremely simple, which is false: therefore in Him there is not communicable and incommunicable.

1. Likewise, Communicable says that which one can be in many, incommunicable however that which cannot be in one alone: therefore these in the divine are the same, the same in number is in many, and is not in many at the same time and once: therefore contradictories are verified of the same. But if they are different, and are in one: then that one is composite in the divine, which is absurd: and this even the infidel Ethnics say.

Solution. It must be said, that in the divine there is communicable and incommunicable, or to speak more properly, common and proper: but they differ in the divine, and in humans or in created things: because in created things one is in many by reason of non-being, and the proper is constituted by individuating matter. In the divine, however, the common is in reality and being: because the same thing in number and being which is in the Father, is also in the Son and Holy Spirit: the proper however or distinct is not nature, but the property constituting, or existing hypostasis, which is distinguished by relation (otherwise, revelation).

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that the principle of communicability in the divine if we wish to force the power, there is none: because the divine essence is its own community. But if we take it according to the reason of understanding, then the principle of community is the common nature, and the principle of incommunicability is the personal property or relation: and the property is the divine nature in reality, but differs from it in the mode of signifying. And if you ask, Whether that mode can be placed in reality? I say, that in comparison to the essence it is only a mode, but in comparison to another person it is a thing distinguishing person from person: and this is not inconvenient. But if an example of this is sought in lower things, it must be said, that it cannot be found because of the excessive simplicity of God: just as in lower things it is not found, that the same is essentially substance, and goodness, and wisdom: but yet in God even the Philosophers have proven this to be so: and therefore the ancient Masters say, that although the essence is the same as the notion, yet the notion is not supposed by the essence, nor conversely.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that the common is in many, and the proper in one alone, if it is truly proper: and these indeed do not differ in reality in God because of simplicity, but yet they differ in act and supposition and mode of signifying: and the cause of this was noted above, because they do not have this by their own grace, that they are the same, but from that in which they are: and therefore they do not lose from this that which they properly have to effect, namely to agree with many, or with one alone.

Articulus 15 — Whether In The Divine There Is The Universal And The Particular, As The Communicable And The Incommunicable

Whether in divine things there is the universal and the particular, as the communicable and the incommunicable?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether in divine things there is the universal and the particular?

And it seems that there is.

1. For that which is predicated of many is universal: but essence and God in divine things are predicated of many: therefore it is universal.

1. Likewise, the universal is everywhere and always, as Aristotle says, that is, in every particular of its own, and always following it: thus the divine essence is in each person, and always follows the person: therefore it is predicated of the person as universal.
2. Likewise, the universal is that which is in many and of many: essence is of many and in many: therefore it is universal.

If perhaps you say, that it is being in many not divided from them: because it is in each of them through the being of that in which it is. Yet it seems to fit according to this reasoning even more to superiors than to inferiors: because the divine essence is in persons not divided from them, and is in individuals through the being of persons, for it does not have distinct being from persons: and it is also of many, because it is predicated of them: therefore it seems that it is in the notion of universal and the person in the notion of particular.

Likewise, it is already conceded, that the common and communicable is in divine things: but everything communicable causes the notion of universal: therefore the universal is in divine things, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Boethius says, that in divine things there is not the universal and the particular: therefore in God the essence is not universal.

1. Likewise, if in God there were the universal and the particular, since they say two things to be that in which they are, namely what is, and by which it is, it would seem that in God what is, and by which it is, differ, and thus he would be composite.

2. Likewise, if there is in God the universal, either genus, or species, or difference, or property, or accident. But genus and species are proven here in the Letter not to be in God. Concerning the others, it is also evident by themselves: because they are predicated in what sort: but essence is predicated of the person in what: therefore it is not universal in divine things.

But if this be conceded, it is asked, Why in divine things it is conceded to be communicable, and not universal and particular, since those two seem to be the same in these two?

Solution. It must be said, that in divine things, as the ultimate reasons prove, there is not the universal and the particular: and the cause is touched upon in objecting.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said, that persons are not simply many, as is clear from what was said before. But the universal requires a multitude in act or potency which is simply multitude, and thus essence is not predicated of persons as of many.

To the other, it must be said, that essence is not thus compared to persons according to being everywhere and always, as the universal to the particular: because the universal is compared to the particular which is under it, adding to it something which is not itself, by which it is made particular, and this the person does not do.

To the other, it must be said, that essence indeed is in persons and is predicated of them: but it is not predicated of them, nor is it in them as of many and in many: because persons are not absolutely many.

To the other, it must be said, that communicable is said in two ways, namely according to the community of thing and being, and this cannot be of one nature in those which are simply many: and this communicability is in divine things and does not cause the universal. There is another community not of being, but of reason, according to the intention of the thing abstracting from this and from that: and this community is of those which are simply many, in which there is one nature by reason, and this causes the notion of universal and particular: hence this is not in divine things.

And through this the solution to what was lastly asked is clear.

Articulus 16 — Whether In The Divine The Essence Is A Genus

Whether in divine things essence is a genus?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "If essence is a genus, the species however is person," etc.

For it seems not to hold: because
1. Many species are predicated of one alone, like the sun and the moon.

1. Furthermore, we have often above in the words of Hilary, that he called essence a genus: therefore it seems that it itself is a genus.

Solution. Augustine here speaks of those universals which have many supposits: and concerning those, it does not have an instance, when the form is multiplied according to the multiplication of supposits according to being:
but the divine nature has many supposits, and yet according to being it is not multiplied in them.

To the other it must be said, that the manner of speaking of Hilary, that he calls nature a genus, is not that it is matter, or the first subject, or the principle of generation: but because it generally agrees with persons not as a universal, but as the same and common according to thing and being, as was said before.

Articulus 17 — Whether The Three Persons Differ Numerically In The Divine

Whether the three persons differ in number in the divine?

Then the part is to be taken in which he solves the objections to the contrary, which begins there, O,

These things, however, which are said here, etc.

For there the question arises, Whether the three persons differ in number?

It seems that they do.

1. For those things differ in number which are not joined to each other in number: but the three persons are not joined to each other in number, but rather are distinguished from each other; therefore the three persons differ in number.
2. Likewise, Damascene says that difference is the cause of number: but the three persons differ: therefore number is caused in them: therefore they differ in number.
3. Likewise, Either they differ in number, or in genus, or in species, or they do not differ at all: but not in genus or species, as has been proven: therefore it remains that either they differ in number, or they do not differ at all: but they do not not differ at all, because this would be the error of Sabellius: therefore it remains that they differ in number.
4. Likewise, To whatever it is fitting to be distinguished from each other, to those it is fitting to be numbered: but it is fitting for the divine persons to be distinguished: therefore it is fitting for them to be numbered. Thus: To whatever it is fitting to be numbered, those differ in number: it is fitting for the divine persons to be numbered: therefore they differ in number.
5. Likewise, To whatever the number by which we count is applicable, those differ in number: the number by which we count is applicable to the divine persons: therefore they differ in number. Proof of the minor. For we say, one person, two persons, three persons: but one, two, three, are the number by which we count.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Isidore in the book of Etymologies says that number is called as if the nod of the member, that is, of division: but in the divine there is no division: therefore there is no nod of division there: therefore there is no number there: therefore neither do they differ in number.
2. Likewise, the Philosopher: In those not having matter there is no number, except according to cause and caused: but in the divine persons there is no cause and caused, nor matter: therefore there is no number there: therefore the three persons do not differ in number.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher says that we know number by the division of the continuous. But in the divine there is no such division: therefore there is no number there.
4. Likewise, Whatever differ in number, are simply many: but the divine persons are not simply many, as has been proven above: therefore the divine persons do not differ in number.
5. Likewise, If Socrates is musical, white, and a lyre-player, from this he is not said to be many in number, but rather one in number having many properties: therefore similarly, since the three persons are one God in number, distinguished however by the properties which are in the divine persons, they ought not to be said to differ in number.

Solution. It must be said that the three persons do not differ in number which is simply number, but they differ in the number of relations or in the number of persons: and this is not simply to differ in number: because, as we said above, the form dividing as dividing is the cause of number, and therefore the substantial form itself by cause speaking is the unity of the thing. I say, however, substantial form, because accidental form does not divide: which is evident from this because many can be in the same without division of the subject: but many substantial forms cannot be in the same: which is thus proven: Substantial form is said, because it makes the substance in act in being and reason: in act and reason being is to be through its own species and nature: but in nature there is only one being of one thing, and one thing which has one being: therefore, since each thing is only one, as Boethius says, each thing has only one being: therefore only one substantial form which gives that being.

And if you object about the form of the subordinate genus and up to the most general in species, it is a ridiculous objection: because it is determined in another science that all those are in potency to the last which is act. Therefore, this substantial form, because its first act is to terminate being in this of which it is the necessary form, consequently divides from others, and thus causes the unity which is the principle of number, by which this aggregate with another is found to differ by its own unity from another, and thus to differ in number. But now it has been shown above on this same distinction that such division and termination is not in the divine persons: therefore there will not be simply number there: but a certain number of persons, namely which is according to the distinction of relations, by which the persons are referred to each other.

Therefore, the solution of Damascene brought forward in the text is sufficiently fitting,

But to what was first objected, it must be said that from that it is obtained that the three persons simply differ in number, but that they are distinguished in such a way that they are not joined to each other: and this is in the number of persons or properties, and not simply: and these are not properly said to differ, because to differ is the act of difference: but they can be said to be distinguished, because distinction says less than to differ, and suffices for it the act of relation.

To the other it must be said that difference is the cause of number: but it must not be conceded that by any difference the three persons differ: but rather they are distinguished by properties.

To the third it must be said that the three persons differ in none of those ways: for that division has place in those which are divided from each other according to essence: but they are distinguished in the number of persons, as has been said: and therefore it does not follow that the persons are entirely the same.

To the other it must be said that this proposition is false, To whatever it is fitting to be distinguished from each other, etc., because to be distinguished says less than to differ: and therefore by what they are distinguished, they are not numbered except in a certain respect.

To the other it must be said that the number by which we count is abstracted from the numbered: and where the numbered are simply divided from each other by their essences, there the abstract number has complete distinction: but such a number is not applied to persons, but rather the number of properties or relations, because that alone is fitting for persons: and therefore the number by which we count is said primarily and secondarily, of the number of persons and the number of creatures, and is found primarily in lower things, but secondarily in persons.

Articulus 18 — Whether It Can Be Conceded That God Is Threefold

Can it be conceded that God is triplex?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says in the last part, in which he repeats to add in that chapter T, Furthermore, since God is said to be trinus, yet he ought not to be said triplex.

1. Against this, it seems to be what Isidore says, that God is multiplex.
2. Likewise, in Wisdom 7:22, it is said the Spirit is multiplex.

Likewise, God is signified in many ways in attributes.

1. Furthermore, why is it not conceded that God is triplex? For triplex can be where there is unity: for one cloth can be triplex: therefore, that does not seem to be the cause which is touched upon in the Letter.

To this, it is easy to respond: because triplex indicates multiplication by the excess of parts three times, and this in discrete things: in continuous things, it indicates the folding of part over part three times: and neither of these is fitting to the divine.

To the first objection, it must be said that Isidore spoke most improperly, and he calls multiplex or triplex the same as trinus.

To the second, it must be said that those refer to the Spirit in effects which are multiplex.

And if you object: therefore, with respect to effect, it can also be said triplex. It must be said that it cannot: because thus limitation would be posited to its effects, which cannot be placed in any determined number, due to the excessive largeness and goodness of the Spirit.

To the other, it must be said that the cause is good: because truly one is, as Boethius says, in which there is no number, and it is not this, and this: and this is because it is truly simple, and to this such a trinity cannot be fitting.

Articulus 19 — Whether In Corporeal Things One Can Be As Much As Three

Whether in corporeal things there can be one as much as three?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said in the last chapter U: In corporeal things, there is not as much one as three together, etc.

Against this, indeed, some bring an instance concerning light, which is with air in the same place without increasing: and concerning fire which is with glowing iron in the same place without increasing: therefore, there are as much two as three, or two as one.

To dispute about this is not of the present business: but here it suffices, that this is neither held from authority, that light is a body: nor is it true, that in glowing iron there is another body than the iron itself: whence both instances are absolutely false: and this would be easy to prove, if this were the intention here.

DISTINCTIO XX

Divisio Textus

Now it remains to show how some of the persons, etc.

In this distinction, the Master shows the equality of the three persons in divine power, which is substantial. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which, containing two chapters, namely A and B, he shows through authorities that the persons are equal.

In the second, containing four chapters, against the heretic he shows in four ways that the Son is equal to the Father. And the first proof is from the reason of generation; because the begetter and the begotten are equal by the power of nature. The second is in the second chapter, namely D, through the authority of John 16:15: "All things whatsoever the Father has, are mine." The third is in the third, namely KE, through reason, that otherwise he would have been impotent or envious. The fourth is in the fourth, namely F, through human likeness.

In the third part, he responds to the objections of the heretic in the last part of this distinction, there, G, "But perhaps you say, by that very thing," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Power According To Every Kind Of Cause Is In God, Or Only According To Some Kind

Whether power according to every kind of cause is in God, or according to some kind only?

Whether power according to every kind of cause is in God, or according to some kind only?

Here, however, before the Letter, three doubtful points arise, the first of which is, Whether power according to every kind of cause is in God, or according to some kind only?

The second is, Whether the power of one reason is to the power of creating and the procession of persons?

The third is, Whether that power has an order according to the reason of intelligence, and which of them is prior?

1. It seems, however, that all power is in God, by this that all power is of nobility: therefore every kind of power ought to be attributed to Him.
2. Likewise, it is established that He is efficient: but three coincide in one, as the Philosopher says: therefore He is also formal and final: therefore the power of formal and final cause is in Him: and this is commonly said, whence also the verse is said:

Efficient cause is God, formal idea,
Final goodness, material hyle.

1. Likewise, it is said in Apocalypse 22:13, that He is Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, but the end and form are the same.

But concerning the power of material cause, it seems it can be proven thus, and it is an objection of a certain Greek Alexander, and David of Dinant, a Latin:

1. Whatever things are, and in no way differ, are the same: God and prime matter are, and in no way differ: therefore they are the same. Proof of the minor (because the first is established): Things that are entirely simple have no difference: because what has difference is composite: but God and prime matter are simple: therefore they have no difference: therefore they are the same: therefore God is the material power of all, just as efficient and other causes.
2. Likewise, God abstracts from every being that is drawn into a part of being: but every actual being is drawn and determined into a part of being: therefore He abstracts from every actual being: therefore only being in potentiality remains: therefore being in potentiality is the first. But the first is that before which nothing can be understood: but that first before which nothing can be understood is God: therefore being in potentiality and God are the same: but being first in potentiality posits prime matter: therefore God and matter are the same.

3. Likewise, whatever must be presupposed before every becoming, and after every corruption, is without beginning and end: material power must be presupposed before every becoming, and after every corruption: therefore material power is without beginning and end. The first is evident by itself. The second is proven by this that in every becoming something must be presupposed as a subject, and after every corruption it is necessary to leave that into which things that are corrupted are corrupted, and this is material power: therefore it is without beginning and end: and nothing is without beginning and end except God: therefore in God is material power just as the power of other causes.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The Philosopher says that the efficient is never made: therefore universally the efficient is not universally made; universally the efficient is God, because He acts whatever is made: but universally made is matter: therefore God and matter or material power are not the same.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher: The first rules things except that it is mixed with them: but matter is mixed with all: therefore matter is not God, nor is material power divine power.
2. Likewise, nothing is so imperfect as that which is perfected by all things coming to it; prime matter is perfected by all things coming to it: therefore it is most imperfect.

Likewise, nothing is so perfect as that which gives to all and receives nothing: the first efficient gives to all and receives nothing: therefore God is most perfect. Hence thus: The most perfect and the most imperfect are most distant: God is supremely perfect, prime matter supremely imperfect according to nature: therefore they are most distant and different.

Solution. It must be said that in God is the power of universally efficient cause and the substance of matter, and forms in it. In nature, however, there is no power of effecting except form, and similarly in art. But the power of formal cause is understood in two ways: for it is an intrinsic form giving being, and existing as part of that to which it gives: and this is not God. It is also formal externally, and the formal exemplar is to the exemplified, as a wooden shoe is to a shoe: and thus God is a formal cause by idea. But the final power is He Himself: because for Him all things are, are made, and stand, they seek Him as they can. But the power of material cause in no way, as necessarily proven, agrees with Him.

To what is objected, it must be said that many things differ which differ by themselves, and it is an instance to the argument, man and donkey differ rational and irrational: but rational and irrational differ not by a difference which they include as part of themselves, but by themselves, otherwise it would be necessary to proceed to infinity in differences.

To the second, it must be said that uncreated being is not abstracted from being as simpler from less simple. And this was proven above: but it is abstracted as a common proportion which is truly and properly in God and simply, but in creature received and concreted with relations. Similarly, being in potentiality is not posited by being which is the first formal principle of being: which is evident from this that being which is first in the abstracting intellect is divided by potentiality and act. Hence even if the first reason would not impede, yet it is falsely supposed in the objection.

To the other, it must be said that matter is not presupposed before every becoming, unless becoming is strictly taken for motion, or change which is with motion. But if becoming is taken generally for being created, matter is not presupposed: for that becoming, since it only says now first to exist created before which nothing was of the created, does not require a subject: and by that becoming matter is brought into being. Similarly, although matter will never have an end, yet it could fall into nothing, if the hand of the Omnipotent did not sustain it.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Power Of Operating In The Divine Is Univocal With The Power Of Generating And Spirating

Whether the power of operating in God is univocal with the power of generating and spirating?

Secondly, it is asked, whether the power of operating in God is univocal with the power of generating and spirating?

It seems that it is so: because both are in God: and what are in God, are of one simple nature, therefore of one reason according to nature: therefore the power of operating, and that by which the persons proceed, are univocally in God.

§ 1. But on the contrary. Power is defined through act, and the acts are not of one ratio [i.e., conceptually the same]: therefore, neither are the powers.

§ 2. Solution. This was determined above, namely that power considered in the root of power, which is the essence, is of one ratio: but considered as it is conjoined to an act, it is of another ratio.

Articulus 3 — Whether In God The Power Of Spirating Is Prior To The Power Of Operating

Whether in God the power of spirating is prior to the power of operating?

§ 3. But then thirdly it is asked: Which is prior in God?

§ 4. It seems that it is the power of operating: because that is essential, and the essence, according to the order of reason, is prior to the person: therefore the essential power is prior to the personal power.

§ 5. But on the contrary: Anselm says that the procession of the persons is the cause of the procession of creatures: as is also evident in that verse: He spoke, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created and in the other, By the Word of the Lord the heavens were established, etc. . Expounding which, Augustine says: He begot the Word in whom it was [ordained] that it should be made since therefore the cause is prior to the caused, it seems that the power by which the persons proceed is prior to the power of creating and operating. The same is drawn from John 1:3: All things were made through him: therefore it is necessary to presuppose the Word and the power of the procession of the Word to all things.

§ 6. Solution. To this it must be solved in the same way as immediately before, that power is considered in two ways, namely, according to the root in which it is: and thus the power of begetting, spirating, and creating is one and the same: but the power of begetting and spirating is for one thing in the Father, and for another in the Son and the Holy Spirit, as was said above: yet it is one and the same in the three persons. But if it is considered as determined to an act, thus it is one power and another [i.e., distinct powers]: and the power of begetting and spirating, according to the order of understanding, is prior to the power of creating, as was proven in the objection: and through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Holy Spirit Alone Can As Much As The Father And The Son

Whether only the Holy Spirit can do as much as the Father and the Son?

§ 7. Next, it is asked concerning that which he says in the Letter in the first part, where he says that neither can the Father and the Son together do more than the Holy Spirit alone.

§ 8. For if only the Holy Spirit can do as much as the Father and the Son: then the Father cannot do as much as the Father and the Son, which is false.

§ 9. To this it must be said that this proposition is twofold, only the Holy Spirit can do as much as the Father and the Son: by reason of the fact that the exclusive diction, namely the word solus [alone/only], can stand in the subject, and thus the statement is true under this sense: only the Holy Spirit, etc., that is, he who alone is the Holy Spirit, such that another is not the Holy Spirit, can do as much, etc. But if it stands around the subject in comparison to the predicate, hence it excludes the other persons from the participation of the predicate, and thus it is false, and in this way proceeds the objection made to the contrary.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Father, The Son, And The Holy Spirit Are Equal In Power

Whether the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are equal in power?

§ 10. Next, it is asked concerning that which he says in the second part, there, B, Whether the Powerful could generate or beget the powerful, and the omnipotent not [beget] the omnipotent.

§ 11. For it seems that the reasoning of the heretic holds: 1. For either to be able to beget the Son is to be able to do something, or not. If not: then Augustine's reasoning made against the heretic does not hold, when he says, Either he could beget an equal, and would not: or he would, and could not: or he could, but would not. If he would, and could not, therefore he was impotent: for if to be able to beget is not to be able to do something, if the Father could not do this, it does not follow that he was impotent: but this does follow, as he says below:

therefore to be able to beget is to be able to do something: and this the Son cannot do: therefore the Father can do what the Son cannot do, and thus they are not equal in power.

§ 12. 2. Also, there is having from oneself essentially and personally: and there is having from another essentially and personally: and two middle ways, namely having from another personally and not essentially: and having from another essentially and not personally. But that last mode cannot exist, since whatever essence is from another, all its persons are from another: but I see that not to have from another essentially and personally belongs to the highest power; to have from another personally and essentially belongs to impotence: therefore, to have from another personally and not essentially will be partly of power, and partly of impotence: and this belongs to the Son and to the Holy Spirit: therefore their powers are mixed with impotence, and thus they are not equally powerful with the Father: therefore they are not equal in power.

§ 13. 3. Also, the Father operates through the Son, and not conversely: therefore there is something according to power that the Father can do, which the Son cannot, nor the Holy Spirit: therefore they are not equal.

§ 14. 4. Also, nothing received from someone is equally powerful to the giver: but the power of the Son and of the Holy Spirit is received, while the Father's is giving: therefore it is not as nobly in the Son and in the Holy Spirit as in the Father.

§ 15. 5. Furthermore, power is attributed to the Father on account of something special, and not to the Son, nor to the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that power belongs to him more according to something than to the other two.

§ 16. 6. Also, the notion of principle is a notion of power: but a principle not from a principle has a greater notion of principle than a principle from a principle, or than what is not a principle of a person, but [proceeds] from both principles: but [to be a] principle belongs to the Father: therefore the Father's power is not equal to the power of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and thus the objection of the heretic seems to proceed.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 17. 1. The begotten, unless the nature degenerates or the begetter is deficient, is produced into all things similar to the nature with the begetter: since therefore power is among the principal things of a nature, the Son is necessarily produced into a similar power with the Father.

§ 18. 2. Also, those whose nature is one and the same in number, of those there is one power of that nature: of the three persons there is one nature and the same in number: therefore their power or potency is one.

§ 19. 3. Also, whatever things are such that every work of theirs is indivisibly of all of them, the operating power is one in number: the three persons are thus in every work of theirs: therefore their power is one in number: therefore it is equal.

§ 20. 4. Also, let it be granted that the Father's is greater. On the contrary: the power of the Son and of the Holy Spirit is infinite, which can be evident in the act of creating; which by educing something from nothing (which are infinitely distant) is proven to be infinite: but the Son and the Holy Spirit create: but nothing is greater than the infinite: therefore the Father's power is not greater than the Son's power: and it was granted that it would be greater.

§ 21. Solution. It must be said that the three persons are entirely equal in power.

§ 22. And it must be said that to be able to beget the Son is to be able to do something [aliquid posse], and it is to be able to do towards something [ad aliquid posse], as was explained above. For if power is taken by comparison to that in which it is rooted, then it is to be able to do something, and it is one in the three persons, although not towards the same thing in all three. But if it is taken according to conjunction to the act, then it is not to be able to do something, but to be able to do towards something, and thus it belongs only to the Father. But the heretic denied that this belongs to the Son according to both modes at once: and therefore Augustine's reasoning proceeds, that this would belong to impotence, namely, not to have the fecund nature which is in the Father, because thus it is to be able to do something.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that to have from another personally, not essentially, is not a middle between those extremes: because those extremes are distant without proportion, and therefore they do not have a middle: but rather, to have from another personally and not essentially signifies the authority of a principle in one, and sub-authority in the other, and equality in what is had or that which is had by both.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that when it is said, "the Father operates through the Son," the preposition does not denote an instrumental cause, but only authority in the Father according to the notion of origin, and therefore they are equal in the work.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that that proposition is true in things receiving in a diversity of nature, such as a body from a spiritual nature, and an element from the heaven, and the like. But in those which are univocal agents and according to the same nature, even in creatures it is false, unless it is understood that with respect to this it is not equally noble: because the received, as it is received, is in potency, and afterwards becomes in act; and then it is false in God, because the Son is not receiving in potency and afterwards changed to act.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that power is attributed to the Father on account of the notion of principle, which is in him for the whole divinity: but a principle of itself posits power: yet a notion of principle of this sort does not make the Father more powerful, but the author, as has been said quite often.

§ 27. To the next it must be said that that notion of principle, although power is appropriated to it, nevertheless does not strictly signify power, but the property of origin: and therefore it does not take away equality in power from the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 6 — Whether God Willed But Could Not, Or Could But Did Not Will, To Make Creatures Better

Whether God willed, but could not: or could, but did not will to make creatures better?

Whether God willed, but could not: or could, but did not will to make creatures better?

§ 28. Next, it is asked concerning Augustine's progression which he posits, there, E, Either he could not, etc.

§ 29. For there seems to be an objection: because either he willed and could make me better: or he willed, but could not: or he could, and did not will. If in the first way: therefore I was made the best, and the same reasoning applies to any creature. If he willed, but could not: therefore he is impotent. If he could, and did not will: therefore he was envious.

§ 30. Solution. It must be said that an inferior nature cannot be equated to God, and is a work of his will, and not of his nature: but generation and procession are in the same essence: and therefore the Son and the Holy Spirit can participate in equality: whence it follows in that nature, and not in an inferior one.

§ 31. But if you object that according to this he ought to have made at least all creatures in the best possible way in that nobility of which they were perceptible. It must be said that it does not follow: because the inferior nature looks to its principle, which is the will and ordering wisdom: and therefore it goes forth in degrees competent to the beauty of the universe: but the superior nature is not subject to this, and therefore it is necessary that his emanations be according to equal persons.

Articulus 7 — Whether There Is Order In The Divine

Whether there is order in the divine [persons]?

Whether there is order in the divine [persons]?

§ 32. Next, it is asked concerning that which he says in the last chapter G, Of equality, however, of what sort and how great he is, etc.

§ 33. For this does not seem right: because of what sort [qualis] signifies similitude rather than equality: because, as was held in the preceding distinction, oneness in quality produces similitude.

§ 34. To this it must be said that in God there is only the quantity of virtue [i.e., power], and that is well rooted in that which according to the mode of signifying signifies quality: for Augustine says that in those things which are great not by bulk but by virtue, to be greater is the same as to be better.

§ 35. Next, it is asked concerning that which he says: Neither when the Son is said to be begotten by the Father, is inequality of substance shown, but the order of nature, etc.

§ 36. For from this it seems that there is order in the divine [persons]: which can also be proven by reason:

§ 37. 1. For a cause, in the order of nature, is prior to the caused: but Chrysostom says on the Epistle to the Hebrews, and Damascene, that the Father is the cause of the Son: therefore in the order of intelligence and nature he is prior to the Son.

§ 38. 2. Also, according to the order of understanding, a principle not from a principle is prior to a principle from a principle: therefore it seems that in the divine [persons] there is a prior and a posterior according to the intellect.

§ 39. 3. Also, when it is said, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are three persons: either there is an aggregation there without order, or with order. If without order: then there is a confused aggregation there, which is unfitting. But if with order: then there is a prior and a posterior person there: therefore a prior and a posterior.

§ 40. 4. Also, above we often held that the Holy Spirit is the third person in the Trinity: but it is not said of the Father that he is the third or the second person, but the first: therefore there is a first, second, third there: but these names are orderable: therefore there is an order there according to prior and posterior.

§ 41. But on the contrary: If there is a prior and posterior there, this will be according to some mode of priority. But it is established that priority in time or duration is not in the divine persons, nor priority in dignity: therefore there is priority in cause or in intellect there: but what is prior in nature and intelligence is simpler than what is posterior: therefore the Father would already be simpler than the Son, and the Son would add something to the Father, which is false, and a heresy. But if there were priority in nature there, in the same way in which what is prior in nature is prior in cause: then it follows (since the caused is of greater concretion or composition than the cause, or posterior to it) that the Son would be more composite than the Father or posterior in being, all of which is absurd: therefore there is no prior and posterior in the divine [persons]: therefore neither is there order, since every order signifies a prior and posterior.

§ 42. Furthermore, it is asked next to this, what the phrase order of nature signifies? Whether a person, or the substance, or a notion? If a person, then it would signify some person, and then the order of nature would be the same as the order of a person, which is not true, because it is not verified of any person in particular. If it signifies the substance, then the order of nature would be the same as the order of substance, which again is not true, because in the substance there is no order, nor is it ordered. But if it signifies a notion, then it would signify some [particular notion], and this again is unfitting, as is evident to one running through the individual notions. If you say that the word order does not signify order on the part of the things ordered, but signifies the notion of order. On the contrary: The notion of order is taken from the notion of prior and posterior: and there is no notion of prior and posterior in the divine [persons], as was proven: therefore there is no notion of order there. But if you say that the word order signifies the ordered things themselves, and the word nature signifies that in which the notion of order is attended to: this again does not seem right, because the divine persons are one in nature and not ordered [within it]: therefore it seems that Augustine spoke most improperly.

§ 43. Solution. To this it must be said that in the divine [persons] there is order in some way, not a prior and posterior, just as this is supposed in the Letter: and the order is not order absolutely, but order in a qualified sense. For since order of itself signifies two things, namely distinction, and prior and posterior, here it is abstracted from the latter, namely from prior and posterior, and only distinction remains to it. But when of nature is added: since nature is, as the Philosopher says, that from which the sprouting thing sprouts, it is understood that one of the distinct [persons] is from the other, and not that one is prior to the other. Whence I say that the phrase order of nature is to be taken as if having the force of a single term, so that from the first part distinction is had, and from the second the notion of one existing from the other.

§ 44. To the first, therefore, it must be said that in the divine [persons] there is no cause: because a cause is that to whose being another follows: whence cause and caused posit a prior and posterior. But the Greeks use this noun, "cause," for that which we use "principle," which signifies less than a cause.

§ 45. To the next it must be said that a principle not from a principle is not prior to a principle from a principle, but simultaneous, as was proven above: because in a principle not from a principle, a principle from a principle is understood: nor does it ever precede even by the intellect. And the things that can be objected to the contrary were objected and solved in distinction IX above.

§ 46. To the next it must be said that there is no confused plurality in the divine [persons]: because there is an order of nature there, and not order absolutely: and therefore there is neither confusion there, nor prior nor posterior.

§ 47. To the next it must be said that the Church, when ordering the persons, pronounces one first and another afterwards, and this happens on account of the defect of our material intellect: and the Church refers the order of pronunciation to the order of nature, and not to a prior and posterior according to order absolutely.

§ 48. To that which is further asked, it must be said that the phrase order of nature supposes the essence not according as it is essence, but according as it is nature, that is, according as by its virtue there is the power of the procession of one person from another: for although the essence does not beget, yet the Father begets by virtue of the essence as it is a nature. It therefore draws the essence into a person not absolutely, but as it is a nature taken in the aforesaid way: and therefore the order of nature and the order of substance or essence are not the same because of their diverse mode of signifying.

§ 49. And through this the solution of all the things that were objected concerning this is also evident.

DISTINCTIO XXI

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT,

§ 50. Here a question arises taking its origin from the aforesaid, etc. Here begins that part which is occasioned by the preceding: for since it was held that the three persons are distinct in the community of the essence, it seems that solitude cannot be multiplied concerning any one of them: and therefore in this part it is asked, How are exclusive dictions posited concerning the subject or predicate in the divine [persons], whether concerning the persons, or even concerning the essential terms?

§ 51. And this distinction is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon how exclusive dictions are adjoined to a proposition having personal terms on both sides, as when it is said, the Father alone is the Father. In the second, however, he touches upon how they are adjoined to propositions having personal terms on one side, but essential terms on the other, such as the Father alone is God, or the Father is the only God, or the Trinity is the only God: and this begins there, B, After these things it is asked, Whether just as it is said, the Father alone is the Father, etc. In the third, however, he objects against what has been determined, and solves it, there, C, But again it is asked how we call the Trinity itself the only God, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Exclusive Terms Can Be Posited In The Divine

Whether exclusive dictions can be posited in the divine [persons]?

§ 52. Now a question falls here before the Letter: Whether exclusive dictions can be posited in the divine [persons]?

§ 53. It seems that they cannot: 1. For above, in the words of Hilary, it is said that God is not to be confessed by us as solitary: therefore solitude is not fitting to the divine [persons]: since therefore exclusive dictions imply solitude concerning those things to which they are adjoined, it seems that those dictions are not competent to the divine [persons].

§ 54. 2. Also, above, in the words of Ambrose, it is said that the Father through the intellect is always in the Son, and the Son in the Father, and the Holy Spirit in both: if therefore a diction excluding the Son from the Father is appended to any of the persons, there will be an implication of a falsehood, and thus the statement will be false: but this is what an exclusive diction does: therefore it seems that those dictions are not competent in the divine [persons].

§ 55. 3. Also, an exclusive diction adjoined to something excludes other things which are not that thing: but every exclusion is with respect to something that is participated by that concerning which the exclusion is noted: but the Father has nothing which the Son and the Holy Spirit do not have: therefore it seems that a diction noting exclusion can never be posited concerning any of the persons in the divine [being].

§ 56. 4. Also, in the Letter Augustine says that this is true, the Father alone is the Father, and that solitude concerning the Father is not noted, but others are excluded from the fellowship of paternity. Let it be asked, therefore, Whether it can similarly be said, the Father is the only Father? And it seems that it can: because its expository [propositions] are true, namely, the Father is the Father, and no other than the Father is the Father: therefore the Father is the only Father. On the contrary: The Father is the only Father: therefore the Father is the Father alone: therefore he is not with the Son and the Holy Spirit, which is false.

§ 57. 5. Also, this is not true, not only the Father is the Father. Proof. The Father is the Father existing with the Son and with the Holy Spirit: therefore not only the Father is the Father: therefore its contradictory is false, namely this, the Father alone is the Father: which nevertheless Augustine concedes in the Letter.

§ 58. 6. Also. it is asked next to this, Whether this is true, the Father is the Father? It seems that it is: because the Father is the Father, and is not anything other than the Father, for the essence is not anything other than the Father: therefore the Father is only the Father.

§ 59. But on the contrary: Augustine says that to be the Father is not to be God: therefore the Father is not God, which is false: therefore also this [is false], the Father is only the Father. And the same objection applies to this, the Son is only the Son: and to this, the Holy Spirit is only the Holy Spirit.

§ 60. Solution. It must be said that according to what Augustine and the Master imply here, an exclusive diction can be posited concerning divine things, and especially in the subject, and concerning the name of a person which is as it were singular in the divine [persons], such as Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit: for since according to Aristotle, "alone" is the same as "not with another": the phrase not with another signifies a privation of association: and therefore it does not properly apply to a term which in its supposition and signification imports association, as every common term does, such as man, donkey, and the like: whence one does not properly say alone donkey or alone man, unless first there is adjoined to the common term (which is to be the subject of this diction "alone") something that draws it away from the association of community which it imports, so that it might be said one single man: but it is properly adjoined to a singular diction, as when it is said Plato alone, or the Father alone: for the names of the determinate persons in the divine [being] have a certain similitude with proper names: and therefore an exclusive diction can be adjoined so that it is said, the Father alone or the Son alone. But then, concerning what pertains to the preceding chapter, if a personal predicate follows so that it is said, the Father alone is the Father, it must be said that the statement is threefold: and in two senses it is true, and in the third it is false. For this diction "alone", since it is an adjective, can absolutely make an implication of its form concerning the subject which is its subject: and then it will note solitude concerning the subject, and thus the statement is false, as was proven through the words of Hilary: because the Father is neither to be confessed as solitary nor as singular. An exclusive diction can also stand in the subject, and deprive association with respect to the form in the subject: and then the sense is, the Father alone is the Father, that is, he who is the Father in such a way that another with him is not the Father, is the Father. Or it can be appended to the subject in comparison to the predicate, namely to exclude others from the participation of the predicate: and because the predicate and the form of the subject are the same in a statement in which the same is predicated of itself, this statement will be true in either sense: but the second sense is the one Augustine posits in the Letter: and through this distinction the solution to almost all that was objected is now evident.

§ 61. For to the first it must be said that Hilary takes the exclusive diction according as it notes the implication of solitude, and Augustine does not take it thus.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that although one of the relatives is understood in the other, nevertheless it is not so understood in it that it participates in the same form of relation with it as that to which it is determined: for there are two things in relatives: one by grace of relation, and the other by grace of opposition. By grace of relation one is understood in the other; by grace of opposition one is excluded from the form of the other: and therefore an exclusive diction, not excluding the first, but noting the second, namely that it does not participate in the form with another, can well be posited in the divine [persons], and will not note solitude.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that participation in the divine [persons] is taken broadly, namely for having something in whatever way, and thus one person participates in something which another does not participate in: because he has his own property by which the Father is the Father, and the Son [has] filiation.

§ 64. To the next it must be said that this can be conceded just like the first, the Father is the only Father, that is, under the same distinction, and then it does not hold [to infer]: therefore the Father is the Father alone. Because when an exclusive diction follows its subject or is predicated of it, it can note solitude predicated of it: and because in the predicate it arrives more on account of the form, it is inclined to that sense, as when it is said, man runs alone, or Socrates runs alone, it is noted that he runs solitary even if others run: whence since the Father is not solitary, it is not to be said that the Father is the Father alone: just as we do not say, the Father is the solitary or singular Father.

§ 65. To the next it must be said that this, Not only the Father is the Father, is not true except in that sense in which the word solus [alone] notes the implication of solitude concerning the Father, and in this sense its contradictory was denied above.

§ 66. But to the objection it must be said that this is absolutely true, the Father is only the Father: for if something is predicated of some subject with an exclusive diction, those things which are essentially signified in that predicate are not excluded from it, as when it is said, Socrates is only a man, it does not follow: therefore he is not an animal: but it follows that he himself is nothing other than a man. So here it does not follow, the Father is only the Father, therefore he is not God, or the divine essence.

§ 67. But to the objection to the contrary, it must be said that Augustine speaks of the ratio [concept] of the name, and not of the ratio of the thing: for thus it is true that he is not wise by that by which he is good: although according to reality wisdom and goodness are the same in God.

Articulus 2 — Whether This Is True, That The Father Alone Is God

Whether this is true, that the Father alone is God?

§ 68. Next, it is asked concerning that which he says, B, After these things it is asked, Whether just as it is said, etc. For here the Master denies this, the Father alone is God.

§ 69. 1. But it seems that it is true: for its expository [propositions] seem true, namely, the Father is God, and he who is not other than the Father is God: therefore the Father alone is God.

§ 70. 2. Also, if this is false, the Father alone is God: then its contradictory will be true, namely not only the Father is God:

§ 1. Therefore, either several Fathers are God, or the Father is not God: for if that is true, that the Father alone is not God, it is verified by grace of the other of them, namely because either several fathers are God, or the Father is not God: for a negation cannot regard the predicate by removing it from the subject, except by grace of an implication, or by grace of the predicate.

§ 2. Solution. It must be said that this proposition, "The Father alone is God" [solus Pater est Deus], is twofold, namely from the fact that the negation can stand in the subject, or in comparison to the predicate. If it is referred to the subject in comparison to the predicate, the expression is false: because thus it excludes the other persons from the participation of the predicate. But if it stands in the subject absolutely, it is still twofold, namely from the fact that it can denote the implication of solitude regarding the Father, and thus again it is false: or it can denote the exclusion of the other persons from the participation of the form of the subject, and thus it is true, and it is proved in this way.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether This Is True, The Father Is God Alone, And This, The Father Is One God Alone

Whether this is true: "The Father is alone God", and this: "The Father is one alone God"?

§ 4. Next, it is asked concerning this which he posits in the same place, B: The Father is alone God, etc. [86]

§ 5. And he says in the Letter, that if alone [solus] is on the part of the predicate, some concede that the Father is alone God.

§ 6. This seems unfitting: 1. For since the word alone [solus] signifies the privation of association, it does not seem proper to place it around a common term: therefore it is meaningless to say, "The Father is alone God": just as it is meaningless to say, "Socrates is alone man."

§ 7. 2. Also, if the word alone [solus] is in the predicate, it will be an adjective of this term, God [Deus], and thus it will denote similitude [or solitude] concerning Him. Therefore, "The Father is alone God" is the same as "The Father is a solitary God": but this is false, as Hilary determined above: therefore this too is false, "The Father is alone God."

§ 8. 3. Also, the exclusive word, alone [solus], is said to differ from this word only [tantum], which also denotes exclusion in two things, namely that only can be joined to a common term, but alone to a singular one: and that only denotes the adequation of the predicate with the subject, whereas alone denotes the privation of association. Therefore it seems that this cannot be accepted, "The Father is alone God," unless the word alone [solus] has the same force as alone taken adverbially [solum], so that the sense is: "The Father is alone God," that is, only God [solum Deus], that is, merely God [tantum Deus]: but this is true, "The Father is merely God": therefore this too is true, "The Father is alone God": and yet the Master denies it in the Letter.

§ 9. 4. Furthermore, the Master in the Letter seems to say that the exclusive word is an adjective of the predicate, and he expounds it by the mode in which it is an adjective of the subject thus: "The Father is alone God, and no one other than the Father is God." For thus it is clear that the exclusion is denoted as being made concerning the subject in comparison to the predicate. Therefore he expounds it badly: because Augustine intends that it should fall in the subject, as is clear in the exposition, and he himself says that it falls in the predicate.

§ 10. Furthermore it is asked concerning this proposition, "The Father is one alone God," whether the word God is taken essentially, or personally? If essentially, then the sense is, "The one alone God is he who is the Father": against this which Hilary says, that we must not confess a solitary God. But if personally: then the sense is, "The one alone person is he who is the Father": and this too is false, because there are several persons.

§ 11. Solution. To this it must be said that when it is said, "The Father is alone God," the expression is twofold from the fact that the word alone can be added to the subject: and then a distinction must be made, as was said immediately before. But if it is added to the predicate: then without doubt it is posited improperly and almost incongruously, because it is joined to a term which is a common expression in divine things. However, on account of the Master, it can be said that it can be taken adverbially, and thus it is true: or nominally, and then it will denote solitude concerning God, and then it is false: for although we confess one God, nevertheless we do not say a solitary God: and although we say one alone God, nevertheless we do not say that God is alone: and the reason for this is clear from what was said before.

§ 12. Therefore it must be said to the first, that the Master takes alone [solus] in place of this word only [tantum].

§ 13. To the other the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ 14. To the following it must be said that it is not posited properly: but, as was said, adverbially.

§ 15. To that which is further asked, it must be said that this is true: "The Father is one alone God": and the word God is taken essentially. Nor does it follow from this: "therefore God is solitary": for although he is one alone God, it does not however follow that he is alone God absolutely: because the word one denotes distinction concerning the form of God, and the exclusive word arriving excludes a plurality from the participation of that form, to which plurality or multitude the unity imported by the word one is opposed: but when alone is said absolutely, solitude would be denoted: because otherwise the word alone would not be congruously added to it, as was said.

§ 16. To that which is objected concerning the Master's exposition, it must be said that in truth Augustine intends that it should fall in the subject: but the Master takes the sense according to the order of the words, and not according to the intention of Augustine.

Articulus 4 — Whether This Is True, The Trinity Is God Alone

Whether this is true, "The Trinity is alone God"?

§ 17. Next it is asked concerning this which he posits in the same place, B: The Trinity together is properly said to be alone God, etc. [87]

§ 18. For this seems altogether false, or incongruous: because since the word alone cannot be an adjective of a common term posited in the predicate, nor of the subject, because it does not agree with the subject in gender: it seems meaningless to say, "The Trinity is alone God."

§ 19. If perhaps you say that the word God is not an altogether common term like man, because the essence in the divinity is incommunicable: this is nothing: because it has a community of supposits. But the word alone, by reason of the exclusion which it imports, signifies the privation of association in the supposits: and thus it seems to be incongruously added to it.

§ 20. To this it can be said, either that this word alone [solus] is posited adverbially for alone [solum], or only [tantum]: or that it is referred to the subject, not by grace of the gender, but by grace of the content: but this seems to be nothing, since the supposits are plural, and the word alone is of the singular number; and therefore it stands there for only [tantum].

§ 21. But against this solution it is objected thus, that according to this, this is true: "The Trinity is only God." I ask therefore, whether this is also true by a simple conversion, "Only God is the Trinity," or "Alone God is the Trinity"? It seems that it is: because God is the Trinity, and nothing which is not God is the Trinity: therefore alone God is the Trinity, or only God is the Trinity.

§ 22. But against: "Alone God is the Trinity": therefore the Father is the Trinity, and the Son is, etc., because I can descend in God. And if you say that it is immobilized by the exclusive word, then I take the same thus: "God is only the Trinity: therefore the Father is only the Trinity."

§ 23. Solution. It must be said that when it is said, "God is only the Trinity," the expression is true: but when it is said, "Alone God is the Trinity," in such a way that the word alone is posited for the word only, again it is true, because the supposition is immobile, and it excludes from the participation of the predicate those things which have opposition or otherness to the form of the subject: hence it does not exclude the persons. But when it is said, "God is only the Trinity," the expression can be twofold, namely that the word only denotes the adequation of the predicate to the subject with the privation of excess: and by reason of the adequation which regards the subject by grace of its form, a descent cannot be made in the subject, so as to say, "therefore the Father is only the Trinity." Or it can, according to the intellect of the word only, make an essential exclusion with respect to other things which have an essential opposition to the predicate: and in this sense it is true. Or it can denote exclusion with respect to the form of the predicate: and thus the expression is false: because then it follows, "God is only the Trinity: therefore God is not the Father, nor the Son": because since the signification of this noun, Trinity, is as it were collective, it will then exclude the singular persons from the subject through the predication. § 24. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether An Exclusive Term Added To The Father Excludes The Son, Etc

Whether an exclusive word added to the Father excludes the Son, etc.

Whether an exclusive word added to the Father excludes the Son, etc.

§ 25. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the last chapter, there: Nevertheless, as Augustine says, etc. [88]

§ 26. For this does not seem to be so: for since the Father has otherness from the Son, it seems that if the exclusive word is posited for the Father, it would exclude the Son.

§ 27. But against: The Father and the Son are more one and the same than Socrates and Socrates' foot: but when I say, "Socrates alone is in the house," Socrates' foot is not excluded: therefore by similarity, on account of a greater identity, when it is said, "The Father alone is wise," the Son is not excluded.

§ 28. Solution. It must be said that all such expressions are twofold by the same distinction which we stated above, namely that the exclusive word can denote the implication of its form concerning the subject, or be added to it denoting the privation of association: and this in two ways, namely in comparison to the form of the subject, or in the participation of the predicate. And in the first and last sense, the expression is false, but in the middle sense it is true.

§ 29. Therefore to the argument which was made, that another person is not excluded by the exclusive word: it must be said that although there is greater identity and less diversity between the Father and the Son, than between a whole and a part, nevertheless that distinction which is between the Father and the Son posits an otherness of persons, by grace of which there can be exclusion: but that which is between a whole and a part does not: and therefore an exclusion of the part from the whole does not occur there.

§ 30. And note that some distinguish this proposition, "The Father is alone God," from the fact that the word alone can be posited for only, and then they say it is true: or from the fact that it can denote the adequation of the predicate to the subject, and thus they say it is false: because although the Father is God, nevertheless he is not so God that God does not also belong to others: and thus the Master seems to wish in the Letter, and in this sense the word alone comes as it were for only, so that it denotes adequation: but that sense is very improper. And this is what the Sophists say in other words, that an exclusive word posited in the predicate can exclude from the participation of the form of the predicate, or from the participation of the subject: as when it is said, "this man alone runs" [iste solus currit], or "runs alone" [currit solus]. If it excludes from the participation of the predicate, the sense is that this man runs and no one else. But if from the coparticipation of the subject, the sense is that even if they run, nevertheless no one participates in the course with him in the same place: and according to this sense the exclusive word properly follows the term from whose participation it denotes exclusion: as when it is said, "the abbot alone eats" [solus abbas comedit], the sense is different from when it is said, "the abbot eats alone" [abbas comedit solus]: and thus the Master intends that it be accepted in the last way, so that the sense is, "The Father is alone God" [Pater est solus Deus], or "is God alone" [est Deus solus]: because thus it is false: and nevertheless by truly and subtly considering in every sense the exclusive word is retorted to the subject, unless it is posited for only [tantum].

Articulus 6 — Whether This Is True, No One Knows The Father Except The Son

Whether this is true, "No one knows the Father except the Son"?

§ 31. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: No one knows the Father, except the Son, etc. [89] For either the word except [nisi] makes an exception from the word no one [nemo] according to how it is taken for creatures, and thus it says nothing: or according to how it stands for the uncreated, and thus again it says nothing, because from one there is no exception.

§ 32. And to this it must be said that it makes an exception from it according to how it commonly stands for both: and thus the Holy Spirit is not excepted, because He participates in the predicate by the same reason as the Son: and this is what he intends to say in the Letter: for on account of the unity of knowledge in the three, one cannot be supposed for participating in an essential predicate, unless another is also supposed, since their essence is one.

DISTINCTIO XXII

Divisio Textus

§ 33. After the aforesaid it seems to us that we must discuss, etc. [90] Here begins that part which is about the diversity of names, which is wholly introduced to the end that this name, person, may be received, about which he most intends to treat.

88. Lombard, Sent. I, d. 21, c. 3.

§ 34. Hence this part is divided into two: in the first of which he treats of the division of names. But in the second, concerning this name, person, about which he principally intends: which begins at distinction XXIII, there, A: To the aforesaid must be added, since all names, etc. [91]

§ 35. That distinction is divided into three parts: in the first of which he posits a twofold or threefold division. In the second, he posits certain rules or principles about the mode of predication of those names which are received through the division, there, E: Therefore it must be known, that those which properly, etc. [92] In the third he posits the proof that those which seem to predicate quantity or quality, in divine things predicate substance, there, F: For God is not great, etc. [93]

§ 36. Here however some ask: Whether God is nameable, or not? If He is nameable, whether He is nameable by one name, or by several? And thirdly it could be asked: What do names name in God? And whether they are first of Him, or of lower things, and by what modes are they named? All of which have been determined, as much as we could, in distinction II of this volume: and therefore are not to be repeated here.

Articulus 1 — Whether Every Name Said Of God Signifies A Property, Or The Essence, Or Is Said Of God By Transference

Whether every name said of God signifies a property, or the essence, or is said of God by translation?

§ 37. Therefore here occurs first a question concerning the division of Ambrose which is touched upon, there: By which the faith may shine more purely, etc. [94]

§ 38. For according to this division every name said of God, either signifies a property, or the essence, or is said by translation.

§ 39. 1. But the division seems to be insufficient: first, through the fact that below he posits a division of six members. Secondly, because certain things belong to God from eternity, which signify none of those, such as person, Trinity, and the like: for these do not state a property: because a property is in a person determining it.

§ 40. 2. Also, certain essential names are said relatively, such as similar, equal: and certain ones relatively to creatures: therefore the division seems insufficient.

§ 41. Furthermore, essential names do not signify substance in one mode: because some signify substance as substance, but some as that which follows upon substance, such as virtue, and the like.

§ 42. 3. Also, Damascenus gives another division in the first book, chapter 12, where he seems to hint that some names signify an infinite ocean of substance, not what it is, like this name, He who is: but some the name of an operation, like God; but some as that which follows upon substance, like just, good, and the like; but some a habitude to those things from which He is distinguished: like Lord, King, Pastor, Creator. For of those which are subjected, He is Lord: and of those which are ruled, King: and of those which are pastured, Pastor. But some signify that which He is not, like immense, incorporeal: therefore it seems that the division of Ambrose is not sufficient.

89. Matt. 11:27.

§ 43. 4. Also, unbegotten signifies neither a relation, nor a substance, nor is it said by translation: therefore it does not fall into any of the parts of Ambrose's division.

§ 44. 5. Furthermore, Dionysius posits a great diversity of names by order in the book On the Divine Names, such as good, being, life, wisdom, justice, virtue, salvation, liberator, equality, inequality, great, small, other, similar, dissimilar, rest, motion, omnipotent, ancient of days, peace, per se life, per se virtue, holy, king, lord, perfect, one. But all these cannot, as it seems, be reduced to this division.

§ 45. 6. Furthermore, it seems that every name said of God falls under one member of Ambrose's division, namely that which is to be said translatively: for the Saints say that of God we can say nothing properly by human voice: therefore whatever is said of God by human voice, is said by translation, and nothing by property: and thus it seems that none states a divine property, nor majesty, but all are said by translation.

§ 46. Solution. It must be said that the divisions of all the saints are sufficient: but they are not taken in one mode. The division of Ambrose, although it is of three members, yet has to be reduced to two twofold divisions thus: Every name said of God, is either said properly by a property of the thing, or is said by a translation of the similitude of the thing. If it is said properly, either it states a property by which a person is distinguished from a person, or it states the essence: for into these two divisions falls every name said of God. And the reason for the first division is this, that a name states the thing from which it is imposed, and the thing to which it is imposed: that thing to which the name is imposed, is for the Grammarian the substance of the name: but that from which it is imposed, since it is the principle of understanding that which is said by the name, is the quality of the name. Therefore that from which it is imposed, is either priorly in God and posteriorly in the creature: and thus it is said properly, like eternal Father, essence, life, wisdom, and the like. But if that from which it is imposed is repugnant to the divine nature, then it is said of God translated by some similitude of corporeal things to divine things, like stone, lion, splendor, mirror, and the like. This therefore is the reason for Ambrose's division: hence his division is general, and comprehends the divisions of all the others.

§ 47. Therefore to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that person and Trinity signify a property indistinctly: because in divine things a property or relation is signified in many modes, as we said above: for some signify toward something as toward something, like Father: and some signify toward something as toward itself, like paternity, and the like: but some signify that which is toward itself, like good, substance, and the like: but some that which is toward itself as toward something, like similar, and equal: and there is no instance in Trinity and person: because they enclose relative things in themselves.

90. Lombard, Sent. I, d. 22, c. 1.

§ 48. To the other it must be said that Ambrose does not specially consider those modes, but rather generally: and therefore all such things fall under those which express the majesty of the divine essence, either in itself or in the persons, either eternally or temporally.

§ 49. To that which is objected concerning Damascene's division, it must be said that he divides only the essential names: but those either connote an effect in creatures, or they signify the essence without an effect. And if in the first mode: then they are like Creator, King, and the like. But if they signify the essence, either distinct or indistinct in itself, or as following upon, or that which is not. If in the first mode: thus it is He who is, essence, substance, etc., because He who is states something indistinct and not placing in number, as was noted concerning this name, He who is. Substance states something distinct, and similarly essence, and the like. But that which follows upon substance, is either as a habit, or following an operation: according to the intellect of a habit, like good, wise: following an operation, like God. But that which He is not is stated by immense, and the like, which notify God by negation: and according to what sort of negations can name and notify, has been expounded above.

§ 50. To the other it must be said that below it will be proved that unbegotten states a relation: because there Augustine will give as a rule, that in the same genus in which an affirmation affirms and posits, in that same the negation denies.

§ 51. To the other it must be said that Dionysius divided the divine names throughout the treatise of four books: for concerning some he treats in his book which he calls On Hypostases, that is, On Persons: in which he determines concerning one member of this division of Ambrose, namely concerning those which state properties in divine things. In another he touches upon those which are said of God according to translation, which he calls a symbol, and concerning this he made the Symbolic Theology: which two books we do not have. Others are names expressing the majesty of the divinity: and these can be attended to in two modes, namely according to the significates from which they are imposed, and according to the mode of predicating which they have in divine things. And concerning their significates Dionysius treats in the book On the Divine Names through thirteen chapters, in three of which he determines the mode of proceeding and receives the material: but in the ten remaining ones he touches upon the names themselves. But the mode of predicating them, according to how they sound in the names themselves, he determines in the book which he calls Mystical Theology from the Greek which means secret, because the thing itself remains secret, and cannot be named wholly as it is: and the cause of this was stated elsewhere.

§ 52. But if it is asked, From what is the number derived which Dionysius touches upon in the ten chapters of the book On the Divine Names?

§ 53. The response is that he touches upon them according to how they are manifested in the cause as the cause of such effects in creatures, especially rational ones. Therefore they are either according to a cause regarding being, or well-being, or perfection in both. If they are in the first mode, it is either according to the disposition of the cause inclined to the effusion of the caused thing: or according to those things which it diffuses by causing. If in the first mode, then it is good: hence he says that the good is diffusive of itself and of being, to which four others are necessarily conjoined, namely love, light, zeal, and to the good further is conjoined the beautiful: for these state as it were dispositions of the good in the first cause: for just as zeal follows upon love, so the beautiful follows upon light: for light states the irradiations of the eternal reasons by which everything is created, while the beautiful in the creating cause states the descent of the order of ordering wisdom, as Boethius says: "Bearing the beautiful world in His mind, Himself the most beautiful." [95] But love and zeal incline on the part of the will: love to effects generally, but zeal to more proximate effects, because zeal is an ignited love into something special: and therefore he touches upon all these with their privatively opposed evil in one chapter. But if they state an effect effluent into being, it is either with respect to being in a genus which is the foundation of beings, or in a species. If in a genus: then it is being [ens]. If in a species: then it is life: because, as the Philosopher says, the first of created things is being, and there is no other creature before it; and concerning life he says, that life for living things is being: and this is true of specified being. And both are taken generally: because it does not fall into divine predication except generally: for the being of an element or of an elemented thing is not predicated of God. Similarly vegetative, or sensible, or rational life, is not predicated of God: but rather being and life abstracting from every created thing. But if it is an effect according to well-being, it is either absolute in the rational creature, or in one in comparison to another. If absolute in one: then they state the perfection of rational nature according to nature, or according to the state into which it fell. If in the first mode, either according to the intellect, and thus it is wisdom: or according to the effect, and thus it is virtue: or according to reason or the ordering intellect ordering that which is in the affect toward another, and thus it is justice which is considerative of order. But if they regard the state of peril into which we fell, either a general one which is exhibited to all, and then it is salvation from fault and penalty: or a personal and special peril, and in that is noted the liberator. But if it is in one in comparison to another, either according to virtual quantity, or according to the quality of goodnesses. If in the first mode, either the comparison is according to proportion, or according to excess without proportion. If in the first mode, thus it is unequal: if in the second mode, thus it is great and small. But if it is a relation of one to another according to the participation of goodness which states quality: either it is as distinguishing in the degree of participants what is not the same, and thus it is other and same: or it is according to the comparison of one to another by way of proportion, and then it is similar and dissimilar.

§ 54. But in the third mode there are effects from which God or perfect being is named: and this in three modes, in which everything that is, has itself toward perfection, namely according to motion toward God, according to a moving virtue, and according to this that it receives from Him that which perfects. But according to motion in two ways, namely according to the fact that motion is from Him in being moved, and in attaining Him. If in the first mode, it is motion, and in the second mode rest. But according to the virtue moving all things to Himself it is in two ways, namely according to the virtue in itself, or the disposition of the virtue: in itself it is the omnipotent who can make and move all things: but according to the disposition of the virtue it is the ancient of days. But according to that which He flows in by perfecting, the consideration is threefold, namely according to perfect substance, and according to perfect virtue, and according to quietation in the end: and in the first mode it is perfect, and one: and in the second mode per se life toward nature, and per se virtue toward a superadded perfection: but the quietation in the end is peace. And the kingdom follows in all these, which befits Him not causing, but containing what is caused, and according to that He is holy, king, and Lord: and holy insofar as He rules unmixed, but exceeding all materially polluting things: Lord moreover toward supposits: but king toward the discretion of order and natural law.

§ 55. To the last it must be said that translation is twofold, namely according to the thing, and according to the name. Translation according to the thing in divine names is only in symbolic ones, in which signification is translated to signification: as "the meadow smiles," because a certain dilation is generated in the flowering of the meadows: and thus God is said to be crapulous or drunk: as it says, Psalm 77:65: And the Lord was awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that has been crapulous from wine. But the translation of a name is when the name does not sufficiently represent that which it is assumed to signify, as all names said of God.

Articulus 2 — Whether Some Names Belong To God From Time, And Whether They Belong At Once To All, Or To Some And Not To Others, Etc

Whether any names belong to God from time, and whether they belong simultaneously to all, or to some, and to some not, etc.

Whether any names belong to God from time, and whether they belong simultaneously to all, or to some, and to some not, etc.

§ 56. Next it is asked concerning another division which the Master adjoins, saying: To these must be added certain things, etc. [96]

§ 57. For here a twofold division is posited in one, namely that certain ones belong to God from time, and are said relatively to the creature: and these either belong to all the persons commonly, like Creator: or to some, like sent, given.

§ 58. And this does not seem to be able to stand: because: 1. To whatever something belongs from time, that is mutable: but God is not mutable: therefore nothing belongs to Him from time.

§ 59. 2. Also, every relative depends on its correlative: but God does not depend on any creature: therefore He is not said relatively to it.

§ 60. 3. Furthermore, sent and given state an effect in the creature: therefore they signify the divine essence commonly: therefore they can be said of all the persons.

§ 61. 4. Furthermore, given and donated (as was held above) do not state being from another: therefore it seems that they belong to all.

93. Lombard, Sent. I, d. 22, c. 3.

§ 62. Solution. This part of the division is reduced to the division of Ambrose, to that member, that certain ones intimate the majesty of the deity. That is to be further divided also: and then it includes this which is said here thus: those which signify the essence, either in itself, or with the connotation of an effect. For if in itself: then they belong from eternity. If with the connotation of an effect: then they belong from time. Therefore they either signify the essence as agent only, like creator: or as agent with the consignification of a person existing from another, like sent, given, as was held above.

§ 63. Therefore it must be said to the first, that to belong to God from time does not posit a mutation in Him, but rather in those things which are made, as was said elsewhere.

§ 64. To the other it must be said that the creature depends by a real respect on the Creator, and not conversely except according to the intellect: because the dependence of the respect of the creature cannot be understood without a correspect in the Creator, although it states nothing but a reason in Him, and not a thing which is diverse from Him.

§ 65. To the other it must be said as above, that sent and given enclose relations in themselves.

§ 66. To the other it must be said that the Master takes given and donated for sent.

Articulus 3 — Whether In The Divine This Name "Trinity" Denotes A Plurality Of Persons And Is A Divine Name

Whether in the divine matters this name, Trinity, signifies a plurality of persons, and whether it is a divine name?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says: Moreover, there is one name which is not said of any person individually, etc.

§ 1. For what he says seems false: because this name, Trinity, designates as it were a collective plurality of persons. But a collective plurality is simply plural, and one in a certain respect, namely according to the form of the collection, which has minimal unity: but the Trinity is the most simple and most true unity of essence: therefore it does not signify a collective plurality of persons.

§ 2. Moreover, Bernard in book V of De consideratione to Pope Eugenius says, that among all unities the unity of the Trinity holds the highest point: but among all unities a collective unity is inferior: therefore Trinity does not mean a collective unity.

§ 3. Likewise, if this name, Trinity, signifies a plurality of persons, it does so either with order, or without order. If without order: then there seems to be a confusion of persons: for when many are collected into one without order, confusion is generated, and not union. But if it signifies [them] with order: then there will be a prior and a posterior among the ordered [persons]: and thus it seems that in no way does it signify a collection of many.

§ 4. Likewise, when the Trinity is said to be the unity of three, the unity seems to be numbered in the three: but the unity is either the essence, or not. If not: then there is some unity in which they agree besides the essence. If it is the essence: then the essence is numbered in the three, which is false.

§ 5. Likewise, this name, Trinity, is either absolute, or relative. If absolute: then it ought to be predicated individually of the persons: and this is false: because this is not true, The Father is the Trinity. But if it is relative to another; then it seeks to be determined by something outside, which also does not befit it: therefore it seems that it is not a divine name.

§ 6. Moreover, Trinity seems to be repugnant to divine simplicity. For Boethius says, that the iteration of the same reality in unity does not introduce number: as when it is said, Tullius is one, Marcus is one, Cicero is one, I cannot infer: therefore Marcus Tullius Cicero are three: therefore by denying the consequent, where number is inferred, there is diversity: but in the Trinity number is signified: therefore diversity: but in one and the same most simple thing there is no number: therefore since God is entirely simple, He ought not to be signified by this name, Trinity, which imports number.

§ 7. Likewise, nothing having anything intelligible prior to itself is entirely simple, or at least it is not the most simple: this name, Trinity, posits prior to itself both the understanding of the numbered person, and of the unity of the essence: therefore the Trinity is not the most simple: therefore it is not a divine name, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said with the Master, that Trinity signifies all the persons at once as it were collectively: however, it does not signify a collection, but a quasi-collection. For it differs in two ways from the form of a collective name. One of these is that it unites the things it collects into what is simply one and most simple, because it unites them in the most simple unity of the essence (although the name is not imposed from this unity): but a collective [name] does not signify a union except in the form of a collection, which has unity in a certain respect, and plurality simply. Another difference is: that the things which they collect simply have a multitude without order, such as a heap, or a people, or a crowd. But that they [the divine persons] do not simply have multitude was proved above[97]. But that they are not en-tirely without order was also proved above because in the persons there is an order of nature. And through this the solution to the first three is evident.

To the fourth, it must be said that the unity is not numbered by the word of three (trium): because then it ought to say three unities: but the persons are numbered, and the unity falls there as uniting those which are numbered, according to the mode of number that exists in divine matters.

To the next, it must be said that this name, Trinity, is relative to another, as Boethius clearly says in the book De Trinitate, thus: Whence it happens that this very [name] Trinity is also said in relation to another. But it is intrinsically relative: because it encloses in itself those things to which their relations are determined.

And if you object, that the Trinity is the unity of three: and thus by reason of being a unity, it signifies the essence: and by reason of being of three, it signifies a relation (ad aliquid): and thus it will signify the essence, especially since unity falls in the nominative (in recto) in its definition, but the word of three in the oblique. It must be said, that this name, Trinity, is imposed from the collective distinction of the persons, and not from the unity: and therefore although, through the mode of signifying by a name which is said abstractively, the essence is signified in the nominative: nevertheless according to the rationale of its imposition and the reality, it is the converse, namely that the essence is signified in the oblique, and the persons collectively in the nominative: because Trinity has to be expounded as, three united in one essence.

But if you ask, Why on account of abstraction does it signify the essence more in the nominative, and the persons in the oblique, than conversely?

I say, that supposits can never be signified abstractly: because it is against the nature of a supposit that it be abstract: but a form is well abstracted: and therefore since the persons are supposits, they cannot be imported in the nominative in an abstract name.

But if you ask, Why then was a name not imposed concretively, which would signify the collective persons in the nominative?

To this it must be said, that this is contrary to collection and naming: because a name wants to be imposed from some one form: and since supposits as supposits do not signify one thing, there cannot be one name imposed from the supposits: but there could be a name of a supposit imposed both from the supposits and from the uniting form through the mode of collection: for no name is imposed except from a form.

Moreover, the form of a collection among all forms is the least uniting, and therefore that of which it is the form is only [signified] obliquely: as we say, a heap of stones (acervus lapidum): and we do not say, a heap stones (acervus lapides): and therefore since Trinity is imposed from such a collective form of distinction, it will regard the persons obliquely.

To the next, it must be said that the Trinity of persons is not repugnant to the simplicity of the essence: because the persons do not divide the essence, nor is the essence composed or divided in them. But this is the rationale regarding three diverse [things]: and therefore the number of persons does not posit diversity, but only a distinction of relation according to origin, which is the least of all distinctions: and yet in divine matters it suffices to constitute persons, although it does not vary the essence.

To the next, it must be said that although in the name's mode of signifying something is prior to the understanding of this name, Trinity, nevertheless in reality nothing is prior: and therefore it does not signify composition.

Articulus 4 — Whether This Name, Incarnate, Belongs To One Person Or To All

Whether this name, incarnate, belongs to one person, or to all?

Then it is asked about what he says: There are also certain names which in time, etc.

96. Lombard, Sent. I, d. 22, c. 1.

§ 1. For this seems false: because incarnate, if it only signifies the divine essence with an effect in a creature, then belongs simultaneously to all the persons, which is absurd.

§ 2. Likewise, every temporal name fitting God signifies the divine essence, and connotes an effect in a creature: but this name, incarnate, is of this sort: therefore it signifies the divine essence, and connotes an effect in a creature: and thus it belongs commonly to all, which is heresy.

Solution. It must be said that incarnate and humanized do not signify a relation according to the name, but enclose a relation in the supposit: because its supposit is the Son in Himself (per se): and the divine essence is not incarnate in itself, and through itself, but in the Son and through the Son: and this was proved in Book III of the Sentences.

To the next, it must be said that when it is said, that every name, etc., it is understood of those names which belong to God actively, such as creator, and the like: but incarnate, humanized, belong receptively and unitively: and this does not belong to all, but to one, namely the Son.

Articulus 5 — Whether Negative And Privative Names Fall Under The Six Differences Of Names Which The Master Puts In The Text

Whether negative and privative names fall within the six differences of names, which the Master posits in the text?

Then it is asked about what he says: Behold we have assigned six differences of names, etc.

§ 1. For it seems that negative or privative [names] do not fall into those six differences of names, such as immense, uncreated, and the like: which nevertheless especially belong to God.

§ 2. If perhaps you say, that the Master prefixes a division of those things which he intended to treat: and he does not intend to treat negative [names]: and therefore he does not touch upon them: because they predicate nothing in God: but rather, as Damascene says, they say what God is not. According to this, neither ought he to have prefixed concerning transferred [names]: because they also do not predicate anything in God, but are said by transference.

§ 3. Likewise, according to what is this divi-sion of six members taken, since it was shown above that the tripartite division of Ambrose sufficiently comprehends all names said of God?

Solution. To this it must be said, that privative [names] are not of the Master's intention, as the objection implies: because they do not predicate anything in God, but rather show what He is not: or if they are [included], they are reduced to the essence insofar as a negation in some way certifies and hints at what the thing is, as we showed above.

To the next, it must be said that the Master does not suppose symbolical [names] here, except only those which in some way show the proper [characteristics] of the persons, such as character, splendor, and the like: and he does not intend here the science of symbolical [names]: because that belongs rather to the science of allegories, than to the disputation which is treated in this book.

To the last it must be said that the three modes added to Ambrose's division are contained under the tripartite division: for those things which signify a property, either signify it as distinguishing, or as a distinct supposit. And in the first mode signifies paternity, in the second mode Father. But if as a distinct supposit, either from eternity, or in time. If from eternity, either properly, or commonly. If commonly, either as of individuals, or as collectively of all. In time indeed, as incarnate, humanized: but from eternity properly Father: commonly of individuals person: commonly collectively Trinity. But hypostasis, substance, and the like, signify as person. Similarly those which [signify] the essence, either from eternity, or in time. If from eternity, either affirmatively, or negatively. If affirmatively, either by way of substance, or by way of an adventitious substance. If by way of an adventitious [substance], either as virtual quantity, or as quality, and so of others. But if substance, either as abstract, or as concrete, or as substantiating in the concrete. Abstractly indeed substance, as essence, divinity, and the like: concretely however God: substantiating following the substance in the concrete, as powerful, or wise, great, and good, and the like: but negatively, as immense, uncreated, and the like. But if in time, either according to a cause actually causing, or containing, or governing, or according to a habitude to those things which are caused. In the first mode creator. In the second and third mode governor, provider, salvation, and liberator, and the like. In the third Lord, king, and the like. And thus it is clearly evident by what art these names are multiplied.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Four Rules Concerning The Divine Names Are Well Assigned By The Master

Whether the four rules concerning divine names are well assigned by the Master?

Then it is asked about the rules which he posits in that part where it begins, there, E, Therefore it is to be known, etc.

For there the four rules which he gives are gathered: the first of which is, that those things which properly pertain to the individual persons, are said relatively to one another. The second is, that those which signify unity, are said toward themselves and substantially. The third is, those which are said substantially, are predicated of all individually, and are predicated of all together singularly, and not plurally. The fourth is, those which are said relatively, are not said substantially.

§ 1. Against the first it is objected: This name, person, pertains to the individual persons, and yet is not said relatively: therefore that rule is not universal.

§ 2. The second is instanced by similar and equal and same, which are said relatively, and yet signify substance.

97. Footnote missing in source text.

§ 3. Likewise, the third is instanced by this name, person, which, as he will say below, signifies substance, and yet is predicated of them plurally in summary.

§ 4. The fourth is instanced by this, that everything that is predicated, is predicated through accident, or through substance: but in divine matters there is no accident: therefore substance: therefore a relation which is predicated in divine matters, is predicated through substance: and thus what he says is false.

Solution. It must be said that person does not signify a relation determined in itself, but in a certain community of proportion, as will be said below. Or it may be said, that person is said relatively in the supposit: although it does not signify a relation in the mode of signifying by the name.

To the next, it must be said that similar, and equal, enclose a relation in themselves, and that in which they are united and equalized: and therefore such things signify in the concrete the essence in the oblique, and the persons in the nominative: and when they are signified abstractly, the converse happens, as was determined above.

To the next, it must be said that person signifies a relation in the supposit, although in the mode of signifying it does not import it, but substance.

To the next it can be said, that in divine matters there is no accident, because as to the nature of the predicament of relation, relation does not retain in divine matters the mode of predicating [as an accident]: but as to the mode which it adds, namely to be toward another (ad alterum esse), and as to this it has an opposition to substantials, which are predicated not toward another but toward themselves.

Articulus 7 — Whether Augustine Says Well, One Great, Not Three Great Ones

Whether Augustine says well, One great, not three greats.

Then it is asked about this, Not three greats, but one great, etc.

For it was conceded above, that adjectives can be predicated substantially of the persons: and there nine reasons are assigned. And therefore here it must be said that if the word three (tres) is a substantive only, and the word greats (magni) an adjective, then they can be called three greats: because then it will take its number from its substantive: but Augustine takes the word magni here substantively, and the word tres adjectively: and the same reason applies to the others.

Articulus 8 — Whether What Is Participated In The Divine Can Be Greater Than The Participant

Whether the participated in divine matters can be greater than the participant?

Then it is asked about what he says in the last chapter at the beginning, there, So that he is as it were a participant of it: otherwise any magnitude would be greater, etc.

95. Boethius, De consolatione philosophiae, III, m. 9.

For this does not seem so, because he can participate in whiteness or humanity: and yet that whiteness or humanity is not greater than himself.

Solution. It must be said, that nothing is participated properly, unless a part of it is taken: but every form of itself is universal: and although it is entirely in this [subject] as to its being (quoad esse), nevertheless it is not entirely within the substance as to its potency (quoad posse), because it can be in another, for otherwise it would not be universal: although according to how it is in this one, it is not and cannot be in another: yet that which is in this one, can be in many others: and therefore it is taken in part of its power. But thus it follows, that every participated thing is greater in potency, than that which participates in it. But this does not apply in divine matters: since there is nothing outside God greater than Himself, neither according to being, nor according to potency: but the whole of what He is, where there is no universal and particular, as was proved above.

DISTINCTIO XXIII

Divisio Textus

To the aforesaid it must be added, that since all names, etc. Here it is treated of this name, person, which is excepted from the rule that is given in the preceding distinction concerning substantial names.

This part is divided into three parts, according as three things are considered in this name, person, namely the signified, concerning which it is asked first, Whether it signifies substance, or property? There is also considered in it the community of predication: and concerning that it is asked in the second part, there, C, Therefore here a difficult question arises, etc. There is also considered in this name, person, the distinction of singularity: and concerning this it is asked in the third, namely Whether diversity and singularity are in the divine, there, I, Now sufficiently, as I think, etc.

In the first of these parts there are two chapters: in the first of which the name of person is excepted from the generality of the previously held rule. In the second however it is proved, that it signifies substance, there, B, But that person is said according to substance, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether In The Divine There Is Or Can Be A Person

Whether there is or can be a person in the divine?

And because the major difficulty of the book consists around this treatise, therefore before the Littera two things are asked here, namely whether a person is in the divine, or can be? Secondly, given that it is, whether it signifies substance or property? For this it would be necessary to know before the definition of person.

But it seems that a person is not in the divine:

94. Ambrose, De Fide, II, c. 4.

§ 1. For in lower things we see nothing of such great composition as a person is: therefore nothing is so repugnant to maximal simplicity: but maximal simplicity is in the divine: therefore no personality can be there. But that person signifies the maximal composition, is proved thus: This somewhat (hoc aliquid) in a rational nature is the ultimate of natural composition, in which are the compositions of all the preceding: for the composition of an element from form and matter by determined contrariety, and the composition of a mixed [body], and the composition of a complexioned [body], and the composition of a heterogeneous [body] in dissimilar organic members, and the composition of body and vegetative, sensitive, and rational soul is posited in that which is this somewhat in a rational nature. But there is another composition of natural and individuating accidents which make a person: and this triple [composition] is also supposed in a person: therefore person encloses in itself every kind of composition, both substantial and accidental: and thus the first proposition is established.

§ 2. Likewise, there is no person which does not substand a common nature and a distinguishing property: but nothing substands thus except a subject: therefore what is not a subject nor substands a nature, is not a person. But Boethius says, that in the divine there cannot be a subject, since it is a simple form: therefore neither can a person be there.

§ 3. Likewise, that which is of maximal division according to nature, is maximally repugnant to the most simple unity: but person is of maximal division according to nature: therefore a plurality of persons is maximally repugnant to the most simple unity. The first is established. The second is proved by the fact that in nature there is only potency and act, and a composite from both: but those things which are plural in potency, are not plural except in a certain respect: but form in the same nature is according to reason at least one: but a composite differs from a composite by natural form and natural matter: therefore both are divided by it: therefore its plurality is maximally repugnant to the first simplicity.

§ 4. Likewise, a per se one is not distinct from another if it does not have a distinction of substance from which is all number of persons: but substance in the divine is not numbered: therefore it does not admit a plurality of persons: therefore in the divine at least there is not a person in this mode, in which we posit persons there.

§ 5. Likewise, this seems so through Augustine[98], and is posited here in the Littera, where he says, that it was not therefore answered three persons to the heretics asking what three, so that it might be said: but so that it might not be kept silent: therefore it seems that person ought not to be said to be in the divine.

§ 6. Likewise, Anselm in the Monologion: "Although I can say Trinity on account of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit who are three, nevertheless I cannot proffer by one name on account of what three, as if I should say, on account of three persons: just as I should say unity on account of one substance: for three persons are not to be thought, because all the persons so subsist separated from one another, that it is necessary that there be as many substances as there are persons."[99] Likewise, in the same place: "In sum and essence just as there are not many substances, so there are not many persons." From these it is accepted, that person does not befit the divine.

ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 1. Richard of St. Victor in his book De Trinitate says: "Fearing where there is no fear, they would rightly fear that the persons be said according to substance, if person signified only a substantial being, and did not consignify anything" therefore it seems that person is in the divine: and that those who fear to say it, fear where there is no fear.

§ 2. Likewise, in the Littera, we have that it is more fittingly said three persons, when it is asked, what three? than anything else.

§ 3. Likewise, person signifies a distinct thing of a nature, and a person is more signified by who, than by what: because what asks about an indistinct nature, but who about a distinct one: but in the divine there are several distinct someones: therefore since the divine nature is an intellectual nature, there are distinct someones of a rational nature there: therefore from differences there are persons in the divine.

§ 4. Likewise, a person is a per se one: but the Father is a per se one, and the Son is a per se one, and the Holy Spirit is a per se one: therefore there are several persons there: therefore, etc.

§ 5. Likewise, Richard: "A triple personal distinction is found, namely by property alone, by origin alone, by property and origin together. In Angels by property alone, in God by origin alone, in man however by property and origin together. Therefore person is in the divine."

§ 6. Likewise, the ultimate and most perfect of a rational nature is a person: therefore personality signifies the ultimate rationale of perfection: but whatever is of perfection, ought to be attributed to God: therefore the rationale of personality ought to be attributed to God, and maximally, as it seems.

§ 7. Likewise, it was proved above that the divine nature is communicable: but the communion of an intellectual nature cannot even be understood unless that which communicates it is understood: but everything communicating an intellectual nature is a person: therefore there are persons in the divine.

Solution. Without doubt and hesitation it must be conceded, that in the divine there are several communicating the divine intellectual nature: and because such communicating [ones] are necessarily distinct, therefore it is necessary to concede that there are persons in the divine, and that the rationale of personality belongs to them, although not in entirely the same rationale by which personality is found in human and angelic nature, as will be evident in what follows.

TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said, that maximal composition happens to a person from the nature by which it communicates with others in the genus of form and matter: for therefore it is necessary for it to be drawn by many things to perfection, to which alone the rationale of personality belongs. But if it found that perfection in the first [principle], it would not need to be drawn by so many compositions to it: whence if the nature of an element were intellectual, a composition would not be necessary, because this element having the nature of an element more commonly would be a person: and this is evident, because in Angels personality does not require a composition of this sort, and in the divine it does not require any composition.

To the next it must be said, that according to Richard, there is a difference between subsisting (subsistere) and existing (existere): for that subsists which is per se distinct by a property which is in it as in a subject: but that exists which is per se distinct from origin, that is, from the mode of origin, namely because from the rationale of origin it is distinguished from that which is from it, or from which it is: whence properly speaking in the angelic nature the persons are subsistences only: because one of them is not distinguished from another by the fact that one is from the other, or the other from it: but by the properties by which they subsist and substand, their personal distinction is found in them. But in the divine properly speaking the persons are existences: because they are distinguished by the mode of origin or relation which is not in the distinct as in a subject, but rather (as Augustine and Boethius say) predicates that which is toward another, and not what is toward itself according to the mode of origin by which the one is from the other. But in human matters distinction is accepted according to both, namely substanding the collation of individuating properties, and according to the mode of origin by which a person is educed from a person: and therefore the substanding or subsisting ones are called by essence. But other Doctors of Sacred Scripture take subsistences broadly for hypostases existing per se in whatever way: and therefore they call the divine persons subsistentes or subsistentiae.

To the next it must be said, that although a person in a created intellectual nature is of maximal division among those things which are the same, because it is of greater division than form according to itself: nevertheless this happens to it, namely insofar as it is in this nature: for the constitution of a person is from the fact that it is a per se one according to whatever mode of existence in an intellectual nature, and therefore this argument does not proceed.

To the next it must be said, that having a substance divided in persons happens from the ignobility of a formal nature, since the nature of a created form divided in many remains one in rationale through its being (per esse), and thus strives for unity, it is shown sufficiently in many: since if it could, even according to being and according to that which it is, it would remain one: but because it is not fully simple, therefore there accidents to it a division of this sort in the persons and hypostases in which it is. But in the divine in which there is full simplicity, the mode of existence according to origin induces a rationale of otherness and personality: and yet the substance, that which it is, remains undivided: and we well concede, and will prove below in the following distinction, that there is not simply number in the divine, and that the number of persons or notions is not simply number: and this is so, because in no way do we posit that substance is numbered in the divine, neither according to itself, nor according as it is in a person.

99. Reference to Anselm, Monologion.

To the next it must be said, that Augustine does not mean that one ought not to say three persons: but that it is not said by the rationale by which it is said in lower things, where by the substance of form and matter, or that which is and by which it is, the persons are divided from one another.

To the next it must be said in the same way, that Anselm means nothing else, except that the mode of existence in the divine does not make a person exactly as in human matters.

Articulus 2 — Whether Person In The Divine Signifies Substance Or Property

Whether person in the divine signifies substance, or property?

Secondly it is asked, What does person signify?

It seems that [it signifies] substance: and because almost the whole difficulty of this treatise consists around this article, let as many arguments be taken as can be elicited from the Littera.

And six are elicited, five from the second chapter of this distinction, extracted from the words of Augustine.

The first which he says: "It is not one thing for God to be, another to be a person, but entirely the same."

The second is what he says: "In this Trinity when we say the person of the Father, we say nothing else than the substance of the Father."

The third is what he says: "A person indeed is said toward itself, not toward the Son or the Holy Spirit: just as God is said toward Himself, and great, and good, and just."

The fourth is what he says: "Just as for Him to be is this, which is to be God, which is to be great, which is to be good: so for Him to be is this, which is to be a person."

The fifth is from the words of the Master, where he says: "When it is said, the Father is a person, let this be the sense: the Father is the divine essence."

The sixth is in the third chapter C of this distinction, where he says: "We wish to preserve at least one vocabulary for this signification, by which the Trinity is understood, lest we be entirely silent when asked what three they are, since we confess that there are three."

§ 1. Since therefore to what nothing is congruously answered except substance, it seems that this name, person, signifies substance. And this Augustine says in many places[100].

§ 2. Likewise, Anselm in the Monologion: "As many persons as there are, so many individual substances there are[101]." Therefore person signifies substance, although it consignifies property with substance: and the authority was had above.

§ 3. Likewise, Master Hugh of St. Victor: "There is only one substantial name, which is said of individuals in the singular: yet in sum it is pronounced not in the singular, but in the plural, although nevertheless it is said toward substance: and this is person[102]."

§ 4. Likewise, this is taken from the definition of person which Boethius gives in the book De Duabus naturis in una persona Christi, thus: "Person is an individual substance of a rational nature." For since in the definition...

through individuals: if substance falls in the direct case (in recto), it is necessary that 'person' be in the genus of substance.

§ 5. Also, through Boethius's reasoning by which he hunts down the definition of person: because person is either in the genus of accidents, or of substance: not of accidents: therefore of substance. Also, in the genus of substance there are first and second [substances]: and the first (otherwise, person) does not signify the second, because thus in one nature there would only be a person in species: therefore it means the first: and not of just any substance, but of a rational one: therefore person is a first substance in a rational nature.

§ 6. Also, whether 'person' is said as 'sounding by itself' (per se sonans), according to the etymology of the word, or 'one by itself' (per se una) according to the composition of the word, it belongs to nothing but substance: because nothing is one by itself, except this 'something' (hoc aliquid) in substance: for form is common of itself, while matter is in potency: therefore a being that is one by itself is nothing but this 'something' in substance: for accidents do not sound by themselves, nor are they one by themselves: therefore, etc.

§ 7. Also, whatever belongs to perfection ought to be attributed to God: but it belongs to highest perfection that those things which share a nature in lower beings are one by themselves and subsist by themselves: therefore this belongs all the more to higher beings: therefore the divine persons subsist by themselves: therefore they are substance, or subsistences: therefore 'person' in divine matters signifies substance.

§ 1. To the contrary is what Boethius says thus: that if the persons are divided, but the substance undivided, it is necessary that a word which takes its origin from the persons does not pertain to the substance: since therefore no word draws its origin from the persons themselves as much as 'person', it seems that it does not pertain to the substance.

§ 2. Also, Boethius: Essence contains unity, but relation alone multiplies the Trinity: since therefore this noun 'person' is spoken of the three in the plural, and is multiplied, it seems that it pertains to relation alone.

§ 3. Also, Augustine says: "When the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are called three persons, let no masses or intervals be thought of, no distance of any unlikeness whatsoever, so that one is understood to be slightly less than another, or in whatever way one can be less than another, so that there is neither a confusion of persons, nor such a distinction by which anything is unequal. But if it cannot be grasped by the intellect, let it be held by faith, until it shines in our hearts, as He says through the Prophet, Unless you believe, you will not understand." From this it is gathered, that nothing however small of substantial attributes is in one which is not in another: since therefore the personality of one is not in another, it seems that 'person' does not signify substance.

§ 4. Also, in no nature can the same thing be the principle of incommunicability and of communicability: but in divine matters (as Richard says) person is the principle of incommunicability, while substance is of communicability: therefore 'person' does not signify substance.

§ 5. Also, property is what makes number in divine matters, as was held before, and will be held again in the following distinction: but it makes a number of persons: therefore person is that which is constituted by property: but this is not substance, because properties do not determine substance: therefore it seems that 'person' does not mean substance.

§ 6. Also, in whatever category the inferior of some genus is contained according to its nature, into that same category the genus itself falls according to nature: but under 'person' as under a common intention we take the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, and these are in the category of 'towards something' (relation) according to their nature: therefore also 'person', which is common to them according to reason, [must fall into that same category].

§ 7. Also, when 'person' is said, this word is imposed from something: but it is said as if 'one by itself' (per se una): but 'by itself' sounds of singularity: therefore it seems that it is imposed from the singularity of a rational nature: but singularity in divine matters is only from property: therefore it seems that it signifies property.

§ 8. Also, Richard says, that 'person' is the same as 'existing by itself alone according to a certain singular mode of existence of a rational nature': therefore it seems to signify the singularity of notions.

Upon this, so that the question may shine forth more, eight opinions are to be received, which are diversified here by the Doctors, as is found in their writings.

For there are those who say that this noun, 'person', receives different significations according to different times, as will be held below in the text: for they say that before the questioning of the heretics it signified nothing but the divine substance distinct from other essences, just as this man and this angel are distinguished from others: and then it was said that the Father and the Son are one person, just as they are one substance and one essence. But after the questioning of the heretics, this noun 'person' was instituted so that in the plural it would signify property or relatives, but in the singular, substance: and therefore when it is said, 'The Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are persons', it signifies relatives: but when it is said, 'The Father is a person', it signifies substance. But it received a third institution from the usage of the moderns, according to whose usage since the time of Boethius it only signifies a relative, both in the singular and in the plural.

101. Reference to Anselm, Monologion.

There are a second group who say that this noun, 'person', has one signification when posited by itself, and another when adjoined to a numeral or a disjunctive or partitive term: so that when it is said, 'three persons', 'another person', 'a distinct person', it signifies notionally a relative and that which is towards another.

There are a third group who say that it absolutely signifies substance, not that which is the divine nature or essence, but that which is the hypostasis. For they say that just as 'essence' signifies essence, and 'man' signifies man, so 'person' signifies person: and by 'person' they understand a distinct substance, according as substance is named from 'substanding' (substando) to a property.

There are a fourth group who say that 'person' is an equivocal noun, and sometimes signifies the essence, sometimes the person, sometimes a property.

Also, there are a fifth group who say that 'person' signifies substance and property: but substance in the direct case (in recto), applying the reason of their statement: because person is said as if 'one by itself': and the word one there speaks of substance, which falls there in the direct case: and the word by itself speaks of property, which is somehow implied obliquely.

There are a sixth group who say conversely, that 'person' signifies property in the direct case, and substance in the oblique case (in obliquo) in divine matters: and they prove this through the definition of Boethius, who says that person is 'the individual substance of a rational nature', wherein 'of a rational nature' falls in the oblique case: and this opinion belongs to almost everyone, and its author is William of Auxerre. And immediately after him, Simon of Tournai defended this.

There are a seventh group who say that 'person' signifies a first substance, distinct by an incommunicable property: for substance is signified in one way when 'substance' is said: and in another way when 'man' is said: and in another way when 'Socrates' is said. For in the first way it is signified in the community of a genus. In the second way, with the specialty of a species. In the third way, with the singularity of socrateity or individuality. And this seems to be the opinion of Richard of St. Victor, and is also defended by some of the moderns.

The eighth is, that 'person' has the signification of substance and of property:

but concerning that substance which it imports, it posits neither a property, nor the number which property makes: and this opinion holds a sort of middle way among all, and this seems to me more to be true: and therefore let it be explained more fully. When it is said, 'The Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God', substance is signified in one way by the word God, which is the predicate: and in another way by this verb, are, when it is said, 'These three are one God': for when it is said, 'These', etc., the pronoun signifies the substance, which acts as a supposit and is distinguished: but the word are imports the same [substance] through a respect to the nature, and the word God imports the same as common. Hence I say that 'person' signifies substance as it is signified by the word these and by the word are, and not as it is signified by the word God: and therefore, because it cannot be understood that there are three unless such a substance falls into a plural signification, it is necessary that this noun, 'person', fall into plurality when it is spoken of all of them in sum. But by this substance thus acting as a supposit (sic supposita) there is imported into the intellect of 'person' not only the substance, but also the property constituting the persons indeterminately and in a common ratio.

And that it is so, is proved through three Authors, and through an analogy. For Augustine says at the beginning of Book VII of On the Trinity: "Every essence which is spoken of relatively, is also something except for the relative, just as a man who is a master, and a man who is a servant, and a horse which is a beast of burden, and a coin which is a pledge: and if he were not a man, that is, some substance, there would not be one who was spoken of relatively: and if the horse were not a certain essence, there would not be that which is spoken of relatively as a beast of burden. Therefore if a father is also not something to himself, there is no one at all who can be spoken of relatively to another or to something." From this it is gathered, that this and that person gives the understanding of a supposited substance, and also the understanding of a property: therefore also 'person', which speaks of a supposited substance in common, includes both in its understanding, namely the person [substance] and the property. The second author is Boethius in his book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ, who hunts down the definition of person from the supposited substance and the distinguishing property, and concludes it thus, that person is 'the individual substance of a rational nature'. The third is Richard in his book On the Trinity, saying: "Person signifies a substantial being from some singular property." Therefore we confidently confess that persons in the divinity are spoken of according to substance, and signify substance, and that there are multiple persons there, not multiple substances: because there are multiple there having one and indifferent being from a different property. And so the unity there is according to the mode of being, the plurality according to the mode of existing: unity of essence, because it is one and indifferent being: plurality of persons, because there are multiple existences.

This is also proved by an example: because in lower things 'person' signifies a substance supposited to a common nature: but it is supposited to the common nature through the individuation which it has from matter and its proper accidents: but it is from its ignobility that it is divided by the matter in which it is, such that that which is in this one, is not in that one: and thus in the two it is ignoble, namely because it is divided, and because it is compounded with that which individuates it, by a twofold composition, namely an essential one with matter, and an accidental one with individuating accidents. If therefore we give to God what belongs to nobility, and take away what belongs to ignobility, 'person' in divine matters will signify a supposited substance: yet not one divided, nor compounded in that into which it is supposited, or in which it is: and therefore the unity of the persons always remains in the substance, and the number is taken according to the mode of existing from another, just as Richard said. But that this is true, namely that nothing absolute signified in the person is numbered, is gathered from Augustine at the end of Book VII of On the Trinity, where he says thus:

"Or if it pleases, for the necessity of disputation, even with relative names excepted, to admit a plural number, so that it may be answered by one noun when it is asked, what the three are, and to say three substances or three persons, let no masses or intervals be thought of, no distance of any unlikeness whatsoever, so that one is understood to be slightly less than another, or in whatever way one can be less than another, so that there is neither a confusion of persons, nor such a distinction by which anything is unequal." From this it is gathered, that the plurality of persons or substances cannot be referred to something absolute signified in this noun, 'person', because then something of the substance would be in one person which would not be in another: and thus there would at least be an inequality, that two would have more of the essence than one alone, which is heretical to say: and therefore one must speak cautiously here, namely that 'person' signifies a supposited substance with a singular property in which number is admitted according to the mode of existence, and the separate substance is not numbered: and when it is said, 'There are two persons', or 'There are three persons', or 'There are multiple persons', the number is referred to the person according to the property of existence, and not according to a multitude of the signified substance.

These things being held, it must be said to the first argument, where Augustine says: "It is not one thing for God to be, and another to be a person, but entirely the same," that this is true: and he speaks of the supposited substance which is not other, nor does it have another being when supposited with a property of singular existence and when signified as a common nature, but it has another mode of signifying, and by reason of that mode it falls into plurality, whereas this noun, 'God', does not.

To another it must be said, that when we say the 'person of the Father', what is said is the supposited substance which is 'who it is' (quis est) in the Trinity, in which properly speaking there is no 'that which is' (quod est): but when we say the 'substance of the Father', we say 'by which it is' (quo est): and so that Augustine might note the indifference of 'who it is' and 'by which it is' in divine matters, he therefore says that we do not say one thing by the one and another by the other, although we speak with a diverse mode of signifying.

To another it must be said, that person is spoken of towards itself by reason of the signified substance: but nevertheless this is not the whole signification of this word, 'person', as is evident from what was said previously.

To another and the following and again the following, the solution is evident from what was said previously.

To that which is objected concerning Anselm, it must be said that Anselm does not intend to say that it does not signify substance, but that in divine matters it is not said in such a way that the substance is numbered, as happens in lower things: and that it does not make a composition of the personal property with the supposited substance which it imports.

To that which is objected concerning Richard and Hugh, the solution is evident: because this is straightforwardly conceded.

To that which is objected concerning the definition of Boethius, it must be said that 'individual substance' is taken broadly for what is incommunicable in whatever way, whether it is incommunicable according to substance, or according to the property of existence alone: for thus it applies to the divine: for the Father has all things common with the Son except the property of his existence: and so it is also in the other divine persons.

To that which is objected concerning the hunting of the definition, it is well conceded.

To another it must be said, that as Boethius says, and also the Master, 'Person' is named from 'sounding by itself' (per se sonando) according to etymology: or it is named 'one by itself' (per se una), as Simon of Tournai says, and the word by itself denotes the property of existence in divine matters. But one does not speak of the unity of the essence in my judgment, as he said, but rather the unity of the person which follows from the distinction of the property, as we said above, and as will be determined again in the following distinction. For a person is one by itself through its personal property.

But I well concede, that it signifies substance in the way that was said.

But to that which is objected to the contrary, to the first two which are of Boethius, it must be said that Boethius does not take the principal signification in 'person', which is the supposited substance spoken of absolutely: and this is because he does not intend to speak there of the signification of the noun, but rather of plurality: and because plurality does not fall by reason of the substance, but by reason of the property of existence which is a relation of origin, he therefore says that it does not signify substance but relation.

To another it must be said, that Augustine says this, so that plurality and number may not be twisted back to the substance which is signified in the noun, but to the mode of existence.

To another it must be said, that this is true, that in no nature is the principle of communicability and of incommunicability the same: but in the divine nature a diverse mode of understanding suffices: and this is because in lower things which are composite, 'that which is' (quod est) and 'by which it is' (quo est) are diverse, and 'who it is' (quis est) and 'by which it is' are diverse: but in divine matters properly speaking there is no 'that which is' and 'by which it is': but there is most truly 'who it is' and 'by which it is', but they are not diverse in reality, because otherwise there would be a universal composition there. Hence the nobility of divine simplicity removes the diversity between 'who it is' and 'by which it is', but it does not remove the truth, because most truly there is a 'who it is' there, and most truly there is a 'by which it is' there: and therefore from the mode of understanding 'who it is', personality and what is incommunicable are taken: and from the mode of understanding 'by which it is', nature is taken, and nevertheless 'who it is' signifies the supposited substance, although it consignifies with it the property of the mode of existence by which a person exists in the divine.

To another it must be said, that the person is numbered by reason of property: hence it is numbered as constituted by property, and not in substance: and this will be better explained in what follows in this distinction.

To another it must be said, that when 'Father' is said, substance is also signified with a singular property, as was expressly evident through the authority of Augustine taken from Book VII of On the Trinity, at the beginning of the book: and therefore it falls into the theological category of substance by reason of the substance, and into the category of relation by reason of what is consignified with the substance.

To another it must be said, that indeed singularity, using the word singularity broadly, is by reason of property: but that is not the entire signification of the word.

But to the opinions introduced I wish to contradict in no way: because the matter is difficult: and let each one follow what pleases him more.

Divisio Textus

Next, the second part of this distinction is to be taken up, where he says: Therefore a question arises here.

For in this the community of this noun which is 'person' is inquired into.

And it is divided into three parts. In the first, the reason for the community is inquired into. In the second, the question is solved as to why three gods are not spoken of by the same reason of community, there at F, But it is asked, When we say the Father and the Son, etc. In the third it is asked, Why do we not say three essences, there at G, But here another question emerges, etc.

The first part has three chapters: in the first of which the question is proposed. In the second, it is solved, there at Because we wish, etc. In the third, the universal reason for the necessity of this locution is explained, both among us and among the Greeks, there at D, By what necessity not only the Latin, etc.

From this the sentence of the Text is evident.

Articulus 3 — Why In The Divine We Say Three Persons, Not Three Substances

Why in divine matters do we say three persons, not three substances?

A question incidentally arises upon this which Augustine says, in the first chapter, there at C, Why do we not say that these three together are one person, just as one essence, and one God?

§ 1. For here Augustine says three (tria in the neuter): and since three in the neuter speaks of substance, it seems that substance is numbered and plurified when it is said, three persons.

§ 2. Also, Anselm in the Monologion says that they are more aptly said to be three substances: therefore substance is numbered. Also, Augustine at the end of Book VII of On the Trinity says that they are called three substances: therefore as before. This same thing is held here in the Text, and Damascene and Chrysostom say it often. Also, Hilary in the book On the Synod: They are indeed three through substance, but one through consonance: therefore it seems expressly that substance is numbered through three, and that they are one by consensus. Also, in the same place: They said there are three substances, teaching persons through substances, not separating the substance of the Father and of the Son by the diversity of a dissimilar essence: therefore it seems that the substances are diverse in number, and the essence is one.

§ 3. Also, nothing is individuated and made one in number, except through substance: the Father is one person in number, and similarly the Son: therefore multiple persons which have multiple unities, are multiple substances in number. Proof of the first point: every category other than substance speaks of nothing but an accidental form: but this is not made one in number, but rather that which has being as this form or that: but it does not have being as this form or that, except insofar as it is in this subject or that: therefore no other category has an individual except substance alone: therefore it is proved, that every one in number is one by the unity of substance, and multiple in number are multiple by the plurality of substance: since therefore the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are multiple persons, it seems that they are not multiple except by reason of numbered substance.

§ 4. Also, many things happen to a noun, namely gender, number, case, and the like: but all those accidents except number speak of a mode, while number wishes to have a proper signification with respect to the substance which the noun signifies as one or multiple, as is evident when it is said, 'man', and when it is said, 'men', the quality which the noun signifies in each man is one: but the substance signified in the same is not one: because we rightly say, 'Socrates is a man': and we do not say, 'Socrates is men': therefore it seems that every noun of plural number posits a diversity in the substance which it signifies: therefore when it is said, 'multiple persons', the substance will be numbered in this noun, 'person'.

§ 5. Also, if a noun has a plural by reason of property, any singular thing would have a plural, because many things happen to one, as the Philosopher says: and thus we would say 'two or multiple Socrateses' by reason of the grammar and music which are in Socrates, which is false: therefore number is posited concerning substance.

§ 6. Also, since the Father has multiple properties, namely innascibility, and paternity, and active spiration, we would say the Father is 'multiple fathers' or 'persons', which is false: therefore substance is numbered in the noun 'person' when it is spoken in the plural.

But to the contrary: Substance is one in number in the three: or else necessarily one has something which another does not have: and one is not in another, if the substance is diverse: and one works something which another does not, and again the three persons would not agree in substance any more than three men do: all of which the Catholic faith abhors: therefore it is necessary to say that the substance is not numbered. If perhaps you say that the substance is numbered, but not divided: this is not intelligible: because nothing is numbered, except what is distinguished.

Solution. We say without prejudice, that we expect these questions concerning 'person' to be better solved in the homeland (heaven), than we are able to do on the way (on earth): but nevertheless so that we do not seem to pass it by,

It must be said to the first, that it is commonly said that tria (three in the neuter) is posited there for tres (three in the masculine), for the reason that the hypostases are numbered, and not the substance. But why the masculine is attributed to the persons, and the neuter to the essence, has been expedited above.

To another it must be said, that in the statement of Augustine and Anselm and Hilary, 'substance' is posited for 'hypostasis', and is taken from the act of substanding to a property: just as will be determined in the following chapter, when it is asked concerning the four Greek nouns.

To another it must be said, that plurality which is simply multitude, is not in divine matters, as was proved above: and since there is no simple plurality in divine matters, a simple plurality is not signified by the personal nouns either, but only a certain kind.

To another it must be said, that a noun which signifies a substance with a quality, and a diverse one at that, is a noun of a composite: and therefore it is not a noun which worthily names God: because in God quality and substance are the same: and therefore in lower things in which there are simply multiple things, there is a plurality in the substance which speaks of 'that which is' (quod est): but in God, in whom 'who it is' (quis est) does not differ from 'by which it is' (quo est), plurality cannot be posited in anything substantial or absolute: but only, as Richard says, it is posited in the mode of existence: and therefore 'who' is plurified on the part of the mode of existence, but not on the part of the substance: and therefore also the plurality consignified in a divine noun is not of the same ratio as the plurality of a created noun: hence when it is said, 'three persons', the sense is, three distinct in the property of existence, and not distinct in substance or in any essential thing: but in lower things, three persons are different through being and substance, which speaks of that which is.

To another it must be said, that plurality cannot be taken from just any property, but from a property of origin according to the mode of existence, because many of these do not belong to one, nor do two belong to one according to the same mode: as it belongs to the Father not to be from another from whom another is, which does not belong to another: but it belongs to the Son to be from another through generation, and to the Holy Spirit to be from others through spiration: for nature does not admit such properties to be present in the same thing (as Anselm says), since they are opposed: nor does reason grasp how they could belong to one: and therefore a number of such properties suffices for the divine hypostases, especially since (as Hilary says) property is a subsisting and perfect person: because in divine matters nothing is accidental: but the property in the person, whose property it is, is the subsisting and perfect person himself, as Damascene says.

To another it must be said, that although there are multiple properties in the person of the Father and of the Son, nevertheless only one alone is personal, which makes the person to be a person according to the mode of understanding: and this will be determined below.

Articulus 4 — What These Names Signify According To The Greeks, nmodowmoy, ovalware, Srdotacic; And These According To The Latins, Essence, Subsistence, Substance, And Person

What do these nouns signify according to the Greeks, prosopon (πρόσωπον), ousiosis (οὐσίωσις), hypostasis (ὑπόστασις), and ousia (οὐσία), and these according to the Latins, essence, subsistence, substance, and person?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the fourth chapter, there at D, By what necessity not only the Latin, etc.

For a question arises here concerning the four words of the Greeks and Latins, which among the Greeks are ousia, ousiosis, hypostasis and prosopon: but among the Latins, Marcus Tullius (Cicero) posited four corresponding to them in order, namely essence, subsistence, substance, person.

§ 1. And it seems that they are badly taken by the Saints: because Boethius says in his commentary on the book of Categories, that ousia is composite from first matter and first form: but ousiosis is first form, and hypostasis first matter: therefore it seems that ousia does not signify a simple and divine essence, as Augustine seems to say here.

§ 2. Also, Augustine and Jerome posit 'subsistence' for a composite or individual: but according to Marcus Tullius, subsistence among us is the same as what is ousiosis among the Greeks: but among the Greeks that sounds of a substance signified in genus or species, as Boethius says: therefore it seems that subsistence ought to be posited more for a person which is common, than for a person which is singular.

§ 3. Also, Boethius says that the Greeks do not call anything hypostasis except individuals of a rational nature, and they do not call other individuals of a lower nature by that noun: therefore it seems that 'substance' is the same as prosopon or person: and thus there ought not to be anything but three words, and not four.

§ 4. Also, in no nature can there be anything but one primary subject, and one ultimate predicate: but Boethius says in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ (from which all these things are drawn) that person is nothing but a subject: therefore none of the others can name a subject: therefore since in a nature there is nothing but 'that which is' (quod est), on the part of which person is taken, and 'by which it is' (quo est) on the part of which essence is taken, it seems that the other two are superfluous.

§ 5. Also, in created nature there is nothing but the universal and the particular: therefore there ought not to be anything but two nouns distinguishing them.

§ 6. Also, since among those four there are two extremes, namely essence and person: and two middle terms, namely subsistence and substance: and substance is closer to essence according to the intellect: therefore it ought not to be posited for person, as he says...

Augustine, but rather for the common nature.

Solution. It must be said that according to different Doctors, and the different reasons for these names, the use of these terms is different: for in philosophy, hypostasis is called the first matter, and usiosis the first form, and usia the composite: the reason for this acceptance is as follows: because all causality according to any genus of cause must necessarily be reduced to the first cause in that genus, as the Philosopher says in the second book of the first philosophy, just as all heating is reduced to fire: therefore, since it is supposed that matter is first, everything that is supposed for the sake of material property is supposed and subsists: if therefore substance, or hypostasis (otherwise, usiosis) which is the same, is taken from the act of subsisting first, it will necessarily sound from that which is the first reason of subsisting, that is, the first matter: subsistence, however, sounds that which is subsisting in itself needing nothing, as Boethius says. However, form does not need matter, but rather is something divine and best which is desired by matter, and does not desire: and therefore, with the consideration prehabited, subsistence or usiosis is taken for the first form. Essence, however, is that from which being is, and whose act is to be, as Boethius and Tullius say: however, being is not the act of essence unless it is in matter, and therefore they called it the composite: and thus the mode of acceptance of the Philosophers appears sufficiently. Ipécwnoy, however, is rather a poetic name than a philosophical one, unless perhaps the Poet is called a philosopher: because he imitates the Philosopher, composing a fable from wonders, as the Philosopher says. However, xgdewndv is the same as a face in a mask, because actors in theaters represented different sex and property by sounding under the masks of different faces, either of Medex, or Simon, or another: and therefore because sound reflected in a hollow solid begins from the acute, therefore also the Latins call xpdcwnov a person, with the penultimate circumflexed: which although it is against the composition of the word, which is composed from pro and sono, nas, which has the first short: nevertheless because it is so according to the property of the instrument by which it sounds, it is produced, and in accent circumflexed: and because also they were accustomed to represent persons of great dignity in this way, to whom a short syllable does not suit, whence as another Poet speaking of such magnates said oldi for il: so also here the person produces and circumflexes the penultimate, because in this way it expresses the greatness of such more. Therefore, this is the acceptance of these terms among the Philosophers.

The Master Prepositivus places here another acceptance which is taken according to the tradition of Boethius in the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ, saying that in the category of substance two things are to be considered, namely the substance of the subject, and the substance which is the subject. The substance of the subject is that which is of the natural substance, which is the category: and this (as he says) is taken by the name oda!zc among the Greeks, and by the name essence among the Latins. However, the substance which is the subject is subsisting in itself needing nothing: and that is genera, and species of substance, to which accidents do not happen, as Boethius says, that is, accidents of nature, such as white, black, and the like: and this is called subsistence, and odctwas: or it is the substance of accidents, and this is the first substance which is most properly called, that is, Snéstastc, and substance among us. However, person and nodcwnov refer to the property which notes the authority of dignity in morals, or nature: and this is not so much of Preposit-ivus, as of Boethius, and Marcus Tullius: but the use of these among Augustine and Jerome, who concede that there are three subsistences, and not three substances, varies somewhat.

And therefore it must be noted that in substance, that is, in the nature of substance, there are two things, namely that by which it is, and that which it is. However, that by which it is is considered in two ways, namely as it is in itself simple, not commingled with any particulars: as when it is said, man is a species, and risible: and this is proper, and not common, since it cannot be predicated of anything according to that intention: and this some say is essence. Nature is also taken as common, as predicable of individuals: and thus man is an appellative name, if it is so taken in the nature of man: and thus among Boethius it is called usiosis or subsistence, among Augustine and Jerome it is called substance or usiosis: because according to them substance corresponds to usiosis and not to hypostasis. However, if nature is considered according to that which it is, it is considered in two ways: either by the respect which it places to the nature to which it subsists, and then it is called substance among Boethius, and éréctass, or subsistence according to Augustine and Jerome: or by respect to the property, and then it is called according to all person and tpdcwroyv. But this acceptance does not seem to agree with the Authors who say that the essence of a thing is said and predicated of that of which it is the essence: and therefore it must be said that only one thing according to the intellect of Augustine and Jerome is taken from the part by which it is, which is essence. However, others are taken from the part of that which it is: and substance indeed according to them places respect to that by which it is: for which reason also it is easily understood among the Latins, as sometimes it is placed for essence, sometimes for suppositum: and therefore the Latins did not want to concede three substances. However, subsistence according to them places respect to individuation: although in these two according to Anselm and others it is the converse. But person places a special respect to the distinction of the property pertaining to the dignity of morals or nature.

Therefore, consenting to this last opinion, we respond to the objections: and the solution to the first is already clear by the fact that these are taken differently among the Philosophers than among the use of the Saints.

To the other it must be said that Augustine and Jerome take subsistence differently than Tullius: and the reason for this has already been said because of the doubtful acceptance of the word substance among the Latins: which is sometimes taken for essence and common nature: and therefore also among the Latins it names the nature of the first category: but Tullius takes it according to what is said from the act of subsisting only.

But if you ask, Why did the Saints not take it in this way? It must be said that the Saints expressed faith to the simple: and therefore they did not want to use doubtful words, lest the simple could be seduced according to error, while they were ignorant of the multiplicity of the name.

To the other it must be said that the Greeks take hypostasis for that which is most distinct: and this is only the composite in the ultimate composition. However, the composite in the ultimate composition is that which is from the ultimate matter and from the ultimate form according to nature. However, the ultimate matter is the organized human body, for this is of greater composition than any body as to organization: and the ultimate form in nature is the rational soul. And therefore they call the individual of rational nature hypostasis. And from this the reason is clear for what is said in the letter, that they do not call three persons three zpécwna, but three hypostases: because according to the property of their language it sounds more: but among us the name of person is not superfluous: because that which corresponds to hypostasis among us is of doubtful signification, that is, substance.

To the other it must be said that although there is one first subject, and one ultimate predicate, nevertheless the subject is to be considered in many ways: and therefore it can be signified in as many ways as has been said.

To the other it must be said that the particular is the subject in three ways, and thus it takes three names according to the last opinion.

To the other it must be said that that objection proceeds according to the understanding of Marcus Tullius, and Anselm, and Boethius: but because of the doubtfulness of the name substance, Augustine and Jerome used subsistence in place of substance.

Articulus 5 — Whether This Name, Person, Is Common To Several, Namely To The Father, The Son, And The Holy Spirit

Whether this name, person, is common to several, namely to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning this which says:

If three persons are said to be, that which is person is common to them.

For from this it is held that person is common to these three.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. If it is a common predicate of the three: either as being of the nature of the three, or as not being of the nature of the three. If as not being of the nature of the three, this is accidental to the three, just as white is predicated of snow, and of a swan, and a pearl. But if it is predicated commonly, as being of the nature of the three, either convertibly or not convertibly. If convertibly: therefore person is converted with the Father: therefore of whatever person is predicated, and Father: which is false, because person is predicated of the Son, but not Father.

1. But if it is predicated as being of the nature of the three, and is not converted, it will necessarily be a genus, or a species: therefore in the divine there is a genus, or a species: which above was disproved.
2. Likewise, Whatever is predicated of several by one reason, is abstract and abstracted by the intellect: person is predicated of the three by one reason: therefore it abstracts from all and is abstracted by the intellect. But whatever is abstracting and abstracted by the intellect from those of which it is predicated, is universal; therefore person is universal: therefore universal is in the divine, which Boethius denies.

3. Likewise, Universal is that which is in many and of many: but person in the divine is in several and of several: therefore it is universal to them.

4. If perhaps you say, that it is common according to reason alone, and is common according to the thing: and person is common according to reason alone, and not according to the thing. On the contrary: Common according to the thing in the divine is common according to being: and no universal has real community, but has community according to reason, to which corresponds in the thing the community of person: because although it has being in this, it can nevertheless be in another, and multiply according to being in those in which it is: and this seems most rightly to agree with person: because person has being in the Father and the Son, and multiply according to being in them: because we say, that three are several, and not one person: therefore person as universal is predicated of the three. If perhaps you say, as almost all evade, that person is common according to negation: and this negation does not cause universal: because nothing is so distant that it does not well communicate in negation: just as God and a stone agree in not being a goat, or in another according to negation said: this is nothing because the individual is not such a negation that it places nothing, but rather a negation consequent to that which is per se one: therefore person although not by reason of individual substance, nevertheless by reason of that upon which individuation is founded, will cause universal.

Likewise, When it is said, Person is individual substance, substance falls directly in the intellect, and person as individual of that substance disposition and property: therefore it signifies substance more principally affirmatively, than it signifies the reason of disposition negatively: and thus that solution seems to avail nothing.

Likewise, Boethius says, that every person signifies substance ultimately subject and supposed: but this understanding is not negative: therefore it is nothing that some say, person is common according to negation,

Conclusion. It must be said without prejudice, that there is a twofold community, namely of being, and of reason. But community in being and essence the same in number, cannot be found except in the divine hypostases, and not in any created nature: because every created thing is composite, and therefore the same in number according to being cannot be in diverse and distinct subjects. But community of reason is manifold: for some is according to common nature by the same reason participated by several, which common nature is abstracted from each of them, and according to being in each of them having composition with that which contracts it to this and to that: and that nature makes universal, and according to the whole power which that nature has, it is not in one, although it is in it according to being: therefore that nature exceeds each of those, of which it is predicated as to power: and because it is in it according to its whole being, therefore it is the reason of each of them of which it is predicated, or part of its reason, or simply, as in genus, or species, and difference: or in a certain respect, as it is in property, and accident. There is also community resulting from the proportion of some to one, which agrees to each, yet according to diverse: just as there is community of proportion of the governance of a ship and of a school, to the governor and the scholar: which yet agrees to the ruler by nature according to the art of governing, and to the scholar according to the art of teaching letters: because yet the habit is similar, therefore the respect to the act of governance is common to them. And such a habit is also found in natural things: for when it is said, Socrates is a man, Plato is a man: it is common to Socrates and Plato this very thing which I say man: and this by the reason of universal nature. But when I say, these are men, Socrates and Plato are supposed by the demonstrative name: and thus it is common to them, that they are supposits of man, and the respect of the supposit and the habit to that which is according to nature common, is determined by the verb sunt: and this community of the supposit is nothing else than a similar habit of them to the nature which is common to them. And because in the divine person signifies substance, as above determined, and signifies it as supposit, therefore by such community person is common to the three. But the difference is in this that the reason of the supposit in inferiors is universal by accident: because it happens to Socrates and Plato to be supposits by this that man according to the same nature is predicated of them. But in the divine person is not universal: because in reality it is not exceeding the subject of which it is predicated, when it is said, Father is person: for it is the same in subject and predicate, differing yet according to the mode of signifying: and similarly when it is said, Son is person: and if it is abstracting from both, that abstraction is only according to our intellect, and not according to the nature of the thing: just as in all divine names some property is always found, as above determined. And in this way also I say concerning the community of relation, or distinction, or incommunicability, unless adding this, that when it is said, Father and Son are related, and relative, or Father and Son are two supposits, or Father and Son are incommunicable, or Father and Son are hypostases, or Father and Son are persons, or Father and Son are God: because the first of these communities is taken by one respect to the act of relation, the second by one respect to the act of property, the third by one respect to the negation consequent to the act of property, the fourth by one respect to the reason of the supposit ordered to property, the fifth by one reason of the supposit ordered to the act of property pertaining to dignity: but the sixth by one respect of the supposits to nature: therefore only that predicate, namely God, says common in reality and nature. It is also hinted by Augustine that he says, that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are three things to be enjoyed: and thing according to Hilary says thing by nature, that is, of which it is to generate, or to be generated, or to proceed: because these acts demonstrate the mode of existence, therefore the community of this name, thing, will be the seventh: and it posits only one habit of the three to nature alone. Hence none of these makes common in reality except one, namely the sixth: but all the others are communities of proportion or habit to one in common reason, which common is not abstract, as simpler from less simple: because nothing is there simpler than another: but there is there a common reason according to the mode of our intelligence, which in all names fails from God.

To the first therefore it must be said, that person is predicated of the three: not as being of the nature of the three, because of the most simple there is no definitive reason: nor is it predicated by accident, but it is predicated as the same in subject of which it is predicated, and exceeding it by the nature of the thing, but according to reason only, to which nothing in reality responds except the community of nature: because since the nature is common, the same similar proportion of them to it follows; and that similar proportion is really founded in those proportioned to nature and in nature: and the name which names that community, is common only of reason according to that proportion, not common really as said.

To the other it must be said, that although it does not exceed substance in reality and nature by any common which it imports, yet it leaves a similar proportion to the same in another: and from that similarity such relative names are imposed, person, hypostasis, and thing of nature, and incommunicable, and suchlike: and by reason of that proportion they exceed, although not in reality: and therefore according to predication they are not converted with their subjects.

To the other it must be said, that for universal it is required, that it abstracts from those of which it is predicated, as common nature abstracts from its inferiors which contract it by those by which it is composed: but here it is not so, but only the similarity of proportion is imported in these names: and the common abstract does not say one nature which is in both, but common which is in our reason only founded in the similarity of proportion or habit of the three persons to one.

To the other it must be said, that person is not said of many: because three are not many, as above proved: and even if they were many, person would not be said of them as universal, as already said: and therefore that reason does not proceed.

To the other it must be said, that although in universal there is not according to being community, there is yet community according to one nature which agrees to all: but in the divine it is not so: for person does not say any one nature which agrees to the three, and is contracted in them to this and that person: and therefore in them there is community according to the reason of proportion only.

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Divine There Are Three Substances As There Are Three Persons

Whether in divine things there are three substances just as there are three persons?

Whether in divine things there are three substances just as there are three persons?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the following part, there, F, But it is asked here, When we say Father, etc.

1. For it seems that we can say three substances, and three gods: because person signifies substance: therefore as many as there are persons, so many are substances.
2. Likewise, a person is an individual substance of a rational nature: therefore three persons are three individual substances of a rational nature.
3. Likewise, if the commonality of person is the cause that it is said plurally of three, where there will be the same cause, there will be the same effect: therefore we ought to say multiple gods. Nor can Scripture provide an impediment: because Scripture does not contradict anywhere.

4. Likewise, if the understanding of diversity impedes that we do not say multiple substances or multiple essences, since in the notion of person substance falls directly, it seems also the understanding of diversity impedes that person is not said plurally of three.

Solution. It must be said that in truth Augustine does not give the whole cause why we do not say three gods. Hence, although person signifies substance, nevertheless it also implies a distinguishing property on account of which it receives a plural number, as was said above: however, God and essence and substance imply no distinction of themselves. And through this the solution to the first and to the last two is clear.

To the second it must be said that a person is an individual substance which is a hypostasis. For since in the notion of person there is a threefold incommunicability, namely of the universal, of the part, and of the assumable: hence man in common is not a person, and the soul which is a part of man is not a person, and human nature in Christ is not a person: hypostasis does not say incommunicable except in opposition to the nature of the universal: and the other two incommunicabilities are implied by the term "individual." Hence, as was said above, concerning the substance which person signifies, number is not posited: because, as Richard says, it does not pertain to the notion of person, whether there is one substance, or multiple, as long as they are distinguished under a common nature according to the mode of existence.

Articulus 7 — Whether In The Divine There Are Three Hypostases And One Essence

Whether in the divine there are three hypostases and one essence.

Whether in the divine there are three hypostases and one essence.

Then it is asked concerning this which says

Three hypostases one essence, etc.

1. For hypostasis is the same as substance, but there are not three substances.
2. Furthermore, a contradiction seems in the text below, where Jerome says that this name hypostasis is not of good suspicion.
3. Furthermore, in what does hypostasis differ from person? For if you say that hypostasis signifies distinguishable not distinguished, this is nothing, because in the divine to be and to be able are the same. Furthermore, in the divine power is the same as act. Likewise, Boethius expressly says that the Greeks do not call an individual of rational nature by this name: therefore, as it seems, there is no difference.
4. Likewise, since hypostasis sounds the same as substance among us, and God signifies nature and substance and not as essence, Damascene says that it signifies having deity:

why do we not say three gods, just as three hypostases and three substances? For Anselm in the penultimate chapter of the Monologion, and Augustine at the end of book VIII on the Trinity, and it is held in the Gloss, concede that three substances can be said, provided it is understood sanely. Therefore, it seems that we can more say three gods, since God is a name of operation, as Damascene says, and the operation of God does not oppose plurality.

Solution. It must be said that in truth among the Greeks this name hypostasis has something different from the mode of signifying and something different from use: for from the mode of signifying (because it is imposed from the act of subsisting) it has that it is placed for first substance, that is, for an individual of the first category. Among us, however, substance is of doubtful signification, as was previously held: and therefore we do not use substance as they use hypostasis. From the use of the Greeks, however, it has that it is not placed except for an individual of rational nature: and in this way again it does not have our use: yet the reason for this use was assigned above: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that in the first times before its signification was determined by the Catholic Fathers, it was not of good suspicion: but afterwards it was determined.

To the other it must be said that although hypostasis signifies distinct according to the use of the Greeks, it does not, however, signify the reason of distinction in the name itself, and this reason the person expresses.

To the other it must be said that although God is imposed from operation, it is not imposed on operation, but on nature: but also that operation from which it is imposed is not communicable: for from three operating by the power of one essence, the operation does not receive plurality in the substance of operation, but perhaps in the mode of consignifying, as when it is said: Let us make man to our image and likeness.

Articulus 8 — Whether In The Divine There Is Diversity, Singularity, And Solitude

Whether in divine things there is diversity, singularity, and solitude?

Now sufficiently, as I think, etc.
Here begins the last part of the distinction, and it has two chapters: in the first of which he proves that in divine things there is no diversity, nor singularity, nor solitude. In the second, however, that God is not multiple, there, K, And as in the Trinity, etc.

1. However, it seems that in divine things there is diversity: because plurality is caused by diversity: but plurality is in divine things: therefore also diversity.
2. Likewise, whatever things are distinct, are diverse: the divine persons are distinct: therefore diverse.
3. Likewise, it seems there is solitude and singularity: because it was stated above, that we can say, only the Father, and only the Son: but "only" denotes singularity, and solitude: therefore there is singularity, and solitude.

Solution, It must be said that diversity, properly speaking, has opposition to identity: but identity is only from the substantial: and therefore diversity is only where there is division through substantial forms according to diverse being: but division is through the separation of matter: however, difference is properly through natural form, or accidental, according to which difference is commonly accepted: and therefore in divine things there is no separation, nor diversity, as it is said, because separation implies distance in place or nature: but for distinction it suffices that one is not the other through the relative property of origin. And through this the solution to the first two is clear.

To the other it must be said, that although the exclusive expression is received, yet not according to what is categorematic and makes implication of similarity, but according to what is syncategorematic and stands in the subject.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear: so that solitude in divine things refers to sequestration in place, but singularity to the privation of a consort, and individuation through accidents: because thus both are removed from divine things.

And this concerning this distinction.

DISTINCTIO XXIV

Divisio Textus

Here it is necessary to inquire diligently, etc. Here the Master begins to deal with numerical terms. And this part has two distinctions: in the first of which he determines concerning numerical names in themselves. In the second, concerning that about which it is posited, which is as if numbered in divine things: and this begins in distinction XXV, there, A,

Furthermore, it must be considered, etc.

The first part is subdivided into three: in the first of which the Master proves that in such numerical expressions quantity is not posited in divine things. In the second, he shows what the words signifying the distinction of number mean, such as distinct, discrete, there, G, When however we say, In the third, he shows what it is that certain saints say the Trinity is multiple, there, K, Here it must not be omitted, etc.

In the first of these there are six parts. In the first, he raises the question. In the second, he shows that such do not posit, but remove, there, B, If diligently, etc. In the third, he adds an example concerning the signification of one, there, C, When indeed it is said, In the fourth, he adds an example concerning the signification of many, there, at the beginning of chapter D, Likewise, when it is said In the fifth, there are many persons, etc.

In the fifth, he adds an example concerning the signification of three, there, E, also when we say there are three persons, etc. In the sixth, he adds an example concerning the signification of two, there, F, Similarly when it is said, there are two, the Father and the Son, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether There Is Number In The Divine

Whether there is number in the divine?

Here before the Letter it is necessary to inquire two things, namely whether there is number in the divine? And, whether it is univocally in the divine and in creatures?

Concerning the first, it is proceeded thus:
1. Isidore says that number is said to be as if it were the nod of a member, that is, of division: but there is no division in the divine, because the Father is in the Son, and conversely: the Holy Spirit is in both, and conversely: therefore there is no number.

1. Likewise, Boethius in the book on the Trinity: This is truly one which is not divided, and he understands concerning the divine of which there is no number: therefore in the divine there is no number.
2. Likewise, from whatever genus and species are removed: but in God there is no quantity: therefore neither is there the species of quantity which is number.
3. Likewise, Number, as the Philosopher says in the tenth book of the Metaphysics, is multitude measured by one: but God is simply immense: therefore in Him there is no number.
4. Likewise, whether we take number mathematically, or according to what is in the numbered thing, it seems number does not pertain to God: for mathematical number, or that by which we count, as Boethius says in the book on the Trinity, is made by the iteration of the same unit, its aggregation constituting the whole number: but in that aggregation the whole is greater than any part: but in God there is nothing of this sort: therefore such number does not pertain to God. But if number is taken in the numbered thing, it is the same to be in number as it is to be in the measure of its discrete quantity: but this again does not pertain to God, as the Master proves here: therefore in God there is no number.

But ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Unity is potentially every number: but God, as Boethius says, is most absolutely one, so that He seems to be the first one: therefore in Him is potentially every number.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher in the tenth book of the Metaphysics holds that the simplest in any genus is the first one measuring all others which are of the same genus: but God is the simplest in the genus of substance: therefore He is the first one by which all others are measured.

Likewise, the Philosopher, in the same place: In substance it is necessary that there be one at the same time: for this is similar in all things. And there the commentary says these words: One in substances is that which is the principle of their being, and the principle of their number which exists in substances: and he intends, when this is joined with what is declared in the book of Physics, namely that the first mover or first cause is indivisible and impartible not having magnitude at all, this is the first mover absolute from all matter: and it will be declared later, that this is not only the principle as mover, but as form and end: and then it will be declared, that this is the one of which it is proven, that it is the principle of substance: just as it is declared that it is the ultimate act to which no potentiality is mixed at all.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher, in the same place: For that which is not divided, is said to be one, according to that which is not divided: but God is most indivisible: therefore most one: therefore it pertains to Him to be one.

and this is the potential number, and the measure of the number is: therefore, etc.

1. Furthermore, we say that He is one, Deuteronomy 6:4: Hear, O Israel, etc.: and we say that there are three persons, 1 John 5:1: There are three who give testimony in heaven. Therefore, there is in Him a potential number, and an actual number, as it seems.

Sorvrio. Here it is necessary to distinguish that number is considered in many ways. For there is the number of discrete quantity which is an aggregation of units, so that it makes in it a distinction of the lack of continuation between unity and unity, as the Philosopher says: for if there were continuation between unity and unity, as between point and point in a line, it would not be a discrete quantity. And from that reason, the Master seems to proceed in the text: because without a doubt, no such distinction separating one from another is or can be in the divine, where the Father is in the Son, and the Son in the Father.

In another way, number is taken from the side of the thing numbered: because that according to which it takes the notion of one which is potentially a number, it takes the notion of number: however, it takes the notion of one from the form, not according to what the form is, but according to what it terminates that to which it gives being: for there are three acts of the form or of that by which a thing is what it is. The first is to give being. The second, however, is to give the notion of nature. And the third is to terminate: and from this last act of the form is the notion of one: because through this it is made undivided in itself, and divided from others: and this is its definition: and this the Philosopher intends when he says that that which is not divided is called one according to what it is not divided. In this way, we rightly say that this thing is one, this thing and that are two: and in this way, we rightly say that God is one: but we cannot personally say in this way that the Father is one, and the Father and the Son are two, since they are not divided from each other by being and form: in this way again the Master rightly says that in the persons there is no number.

In the third way, we say number, that which goes forth by the likeness of numbering the power of one: and this in two ways, namely according to matter, and according to form. According to matter: as we say ten ells to be the number of the quantity of cloth, because the ell is repeated ten times in the quantity of the cloth: and in this way, we say a line is ten aliquot parts. According to form, however, especially in the exemplar: as we say those things which have been made, and are, and will be, are the number of divine exemplars: and this one is called a measure by the mode of principle to being, and by the mode of exemplar form. as the first cause is one numbering the caused, not that it is repeated in them, or that its repetition is the quantity of them, as some have misunderstood, but that the form of each one through relation to it and the exemplar is one, and all exemplar forms make a multitude. In this way, we say God alone is one, who is the principle and exemplar of the whole multitude of creatures: and this one is not potentially many by its repetition, but potentially of many effects and exemplars: and this is the intention of the Philosopher in the authority placed above, and the intention of the Commentator. And this is what Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names:

Theology praises the whole thearchy as the cause of all by the name of one. And one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ, and one and the same Spirit because of the exceeding simplicity of the whole divinity, in which all are singularly gathered and super-united, and preside super-substantially. For which reason also all things rightly return and are placed back to it, from which, and through which, and in which, and to which, all things are, and are coordinated, and remain, and are contained and fulfilled and converted. Al- in his Metaphysics, in the third division of being, thus: In the first way, that one singular signified is most truly called one, in which there is no multitude, nor impotence, nor even in effect, as the essence of the Creator: since God is not divided in effect, nor is He receptive of division. Therefore, He is free from multitude in being and power and effect, whose name is exalted: He therefore is truly one.

In the fourth way, number is said from the side of the thing numbered according to something and not simply, namely the caused plurality by any distinguishing whatsoever as we also say a point continuing in the middle is two, because we use one as two, namely in the notion of end and principle, and we say the center in a circle is many in the notion of lines going out from it to the circumference: and in this way, we say a person is one distinct by its property of origin, and two persons are more distinct by such a property of origin: and in this way alone, number positively falls in the divine: and in this consideration of number, the Master is diminished: because this number is not simply number, but according to something, which the distinguishing and determining property effectively makes: however, the person is numbered by that number, as we said above.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that according to that reasoning of Isidore, number does not fall in the persons, unless division is largely taken for distinction: and one then does not say the distinction of sense or eye to the thing demonstrated, but rather the distinction of intellect.

To the other, it must be said that Boethius speaks of one according to the notion of the name: because that is one which is undivided in itself, and divided from another: especially, however, that is undivided which is neither actually nor potentially divisible, nor capable of multitude: and to this is added a third condition, that it is most one indivisible in power and act, and whose nature is not other in it than the nature of unity. And a fourth is added which makes it even more one, namely that it is not repeatable so that neither by its division nor by aggregation is it capable of multitude: and with these four conditions joined in one, nothing is one except God alone. For in the first way, it is one, which has one form terminating itself. In the second way, one is a point: but in it, the nature of the point is one thing, the nature of unity another; because a point is a substance having position in the continuum, since it is in the notion of first and last and middle. In the third way, unity itself is one: because unity by itself is one indivisible in power and act: but it is aggregable to another in the constitution of number. In the fourth way, however, God is indivisible in power and act, having no other nature of unity than Himself, and not aggregable to another for constituting multitude: but if He is the principle of multitude, this will be effectively and exemplarily, as has been said: and thus Boethius understands. However, in this way, we do not seek number in the persons.

To the other, it must be said that this argument does not follow: and the reason has been assigned above, because sometimes a species is referred in the divine not because of the nature of the genus which is in it, but because of the nature of the difference which it adds above the genus. Hence Augustine says that He is great without quantity, etc. And similarly, I say that persons are numbered and yet the quantity of number is not placed around them, because they are numbered by a certain number, and not by a number which is simply number.

From another, it must be said that according to that reasoning of number, number does not fall in the divine, as was previously held.

To the other, it must be said that in the number which places quantity around the numbered, it is true that the whole is greater than its part: but the number of persons places no quantity: and therefore it does not follow there that two are greater than one, or three something greater or something more than one: and this has also been proven above, namely in distinction XVIII.

To those which are objected to the other part, it must be said to the first, that God is most truly one essentially: but it does not befit Him to be a number in power, except effectively and formally, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that there is a double measure: one namely certifying quantity: and that begins either from the indivisible simply, or from the indivisible according to agreement, because that is of certain quantity. From the indivisible simply: as unity is indivisible, and its repetition certifies discrete quantity. From the indivisible according to agreement: as in weights or liquids or dry or continuous things, one mark, a bushel, a palm, and other things of this kind are said to certify by their own reason, in which we place the first known quantity. Another is the measure of the nature of some genus, and this is made by the relation of all those which are in that genus: therefore, it adds that it has that nature most simply, and is the cause of the being of that nature in others: and thus motions are measured by the first motion, and numbers by one number and not by unity, and creatures by the Creator, and all substances by one first substance: and more is one substance which more approaches the first substance, and less one which more distances itself. And in this way, the Philosopher says that intelligence is one, and is not divided by participating in the multitude of the goodnesses of the first cause, but is more united: because by participating in more goodnesses, it more approaches to one: and in this way, Dionysius says that the divine ray as a vivifying power fills us, and converts us to the unity of the aggregating Father and the divine super-simplicity.

To the other, it must be said that we rightly concede that God is most one, and in this way which we have said.

To the other, the solution is clear from what was said before.

Articulus 2 — Whether Number Is Univocally In The Divine And In Created Things, And Whether God Is More One Than Unity Itself

Whether number is univocally in the divine and in the created, and whether God is more one than unity itself?

Secondly, it is asked, whether number is univocally in the divine and in the created?

It seems that it is not: because
1. Nothing is univocally common to God and creature: therefore neither is number.

1. Likewise, it has been said that God is one with a unity constituted by a fourfold condition of unity: but no creature is thus one: therefore there is not one reason for His unity and that of inferiors: therefore neither is there number.

But ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Whatever things are said according to more and less, are comparable: God and creature are said to be one according to more and less: for God is said to be more one, and creature less: therefore they are comparable. Hence thus: Whatever things are comparable, are univocal, as the Philosopher says: Creator and creature are comparable in one: therefore they are univocal in the same: therefore one is said univocally of the Creator and of creatures: therefore also number.

1. Likewise, it follows well, this is, and that is: and this is not that, nor part of that, nor whole of it: therefore they are two: but God is, and stone is: and God is not stone, nor whole, nor part of it: therefore God and stone are two: but nothing is counted together unless in that in which they are univocal: for we do not say that an ass and a man are two men, but two animals, because they are univocated in animal: and stone and animal are two substances, or two bodies, and so of others: therefore God and creature are univocal in number.

But on the contrary it is objected:
1. Since one is part of two, it seems to follow from this that God is part of this number, which is false, because God is part of nothing.

1. Likewise, since all units in number are in potency to the last, whose addition completes the species of number, it follows that the unity of God would be in potency to another unity, by which it completes the binary, or ternary, or quaternary, and so of others, which can be counted together with God: and this is an abuse: therefore God cannot be counted together with creature.

According to this, it is further asked, whether God is more one than unity itself?

And it seems that He is not: because
1. In unity there is nothing but unity, and thus it is most simple: therefore God is not more one than unity.

1. Likewise, if unity were not most simple, then there would be something before unity according to nature: and this is false: therefore it is the first: therefore God also cannot be understood, as it seems, to be more one than unity itself.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. In everything that is below the first, there is this and that, as Boethius says: unity is below the first: therefore there is this and that.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher in the book of the Fountain of Life: The first thing that receives from the first, receives by receiving two: because the recipient and the received: therefore since created unity receives its being from the first, it will be two, and not one.
2. Likewise, all things are created in number, weight, and measure: therefore also unity is in a certain number essentially constituting itself.

But here again there seems to be a contradiction of intellects, that unity is undivided, and that it is number or two or three.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that number is not said univocally, nor even unity of the Creator and creature, as the first reasons prove: but it is said equivocally, not indeed equivocally by chance and fortune, as dog, and ass, vessel, and animal: but by equivocation of analogy to one and not according to which being is analogous to substance and accident, or healthy to animal and urine, or doctor to artisan and clyster: but according to the analogy of the caused and exemplified to the cause and exemplar as was previously determined.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that if we wish to force the matter, there is no comparison between Creator and creature: because according to the nature of comparison, those things which are compared according to more and less, are susceptible of equality: and therefore the comparison is abusive, when we say God is more one than creature, and it is as much as to say: God is more one, as God is first and per se as cause and exemplar one: and creature less one, that is, from Him and to Him exemplified and related, is one. However, there are those who say, equivocal analogues are comparable: but this could not be sustained, if those who dispute against it: because analogy in creature and Creator is not according to the analogy determined in creatures, which is touched upon by the Philosopher in III of first philosophy.

To the other it must be said, that the Creator cannot simply be counted together with creature: because they are not counted together to constitute any species of number, unless units univocally: and therefore the comparison is abusive, when it is said, God and stone are two: and it is resolved into these, God is one, and from Him is one stone, which is not Himself: and by this the solution to the following is clear. Or it may be said, as some say, that number is taken broadly according to the consideration of the common people for the aggregation constituting one number: and thus God can be counted together, but not properly.

To what is further asked, it must be said that God is more one with created unity: and I concede well, that in unity there is this and that. For unity is and is the principle of distinction, and it is evident by itself that it does not have being from the same, and to be the principle of distinction: whence Boethius, Everything that is, participates in another to be, that it may be, in another truly it participates that it may be this.

From this, however, what could be objected against this, that one is converted with being, will be solved below, because this does not impede: because it is not asked here about one, but about unity which is in no way converted with being, although one is converted. In this way also I concede, that unity itself receives as two being: and in this way I concede, that it has mode, species, and order, as was determined above.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that there is no contradiction of intellects: because the reason of unity and plurality are not posited concerning the same according to the same reason: for unity is said by the reason of indivisible in nature remaining discrete in parts, but it is said two or number by the reason of the caused and constituted in the species of creature. For unity differs from a point, and the nature of that difference is in unity: it is otherwise in the nature receiving that difference, as potency receives act: therefore it is this and that. And by this the solution to the two following is clear: for unity is not simply simple, nor simply first, but simple and first in the nature of the discrete having permanence in parts.

Articulus 3 — Whether Unity Or The One Posits Something Or Nothing, And How It Is Opposed To The Many; And How The One Which Is Convertible With Being Differs From The One Which Is The Principle Of Number

Does unity or the one posit something or nothing, and how is it opposed to the many? And how do the one that is convertible with being and the one that is the principle of number differ?

Then it is asked concerning what is said in chapter B of the first part, there, "The use of these words seems to have been introduced for the sake of removing," etc.

Here it seems to be held from the Letter that unity posits nothing: and this some also seem to prove thus:

1. The one is undivided in itself and divided from others: by the grace of the first part it is evident that it adds nothing upon being except a certain negation: and similarly by the grace of the second part, because each thing is divided from others by the fact that it is not another: since therefore negations posit nothing, it seems that the one posits nothing either in God or in creatures.

1. Likewise, in the authority placed above in the first doubt of this distinction, in the second acceptance of number, that which is not divided according to that which is not divided is called one: therefore the notion of non-division is the notion of the one: therefore its notion consists in negation or privation: therefore it posits nothing.
2. Likewise, the Commentator there says that the one and the many are opposed as privation and habit, and that the one is the privation of division which makes the many: therefore since privation posits nothing except the subject, it seems that the one posits nothing.
3. Likewise, the Commentator says that being and the one are synonymous: therefore the one adds nothing upon being: therefore the one adds nothing upon this being: therefore it leaves nothing positively.
4. Likewise, that which is related to something by addition is not convertible with it, but is drawn to less: the one is convertible with being, as the Philosopher says - therefore it is not related to it by addition: therefore nothing is posited by the one, when it is said, this thing is one.
5. Likewise, whatever is related to being by addition is not the first principle in likeness to being: but the one is the first principle in likeness to being: therefore it is not related to being by addition: therefore the dictum of the Master is verified, that it posits nothing not only in God, but also in no creature, as it seems.

If perhaps you would say that the one is not the first: this is against Aristotle in the first philosophy in many places. And if perhaps you do not consider this inconvenient, it will be against Dionysius in the book on Divine Names, where he thus speaks of the one: "The one is the inexpressible cause of all things: for nothing of existing things is not participating in the one." And this is against Boethius in the book on the Two Natures in one Person of Christ, where he says: "What is not one is altogether nothing": and thus it is proven that the one is first like being.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If the one signifies privation: and habit is before privation, then multitude is before the one, which is false: because the one is before all the many, as Dionysius says. If you say that in truth multitude is before the one, whence Aristotle in X Metaphysics says: "And the one which is not divided is known through the one which is divided: for multitude is more sensible: and what is divided is more sensible than what is not divided: therefore the discourse about the many is before the discourse about the indivisible with respect to sense." On the contrary: For this is a perverse understanding of the word of the Philosopher: for if with respect to sense the one is taken from the many, just as the intelligible is abstracted from the sensible, it does not follow from this that the many are before the one, unless as the particular singular is before the intelligible universal. But habit by nature precedes privation. And therefore that dictum does not oppose the induced reasoning.

1. Furthermore, what will be answered to the reasons of Avicenna in the first philosophy thus objecting: No privation constitutes its habit: every multitude is constituted by the one: therefore the one is not privation with respect to the many.
2. Likewise, all things posterior by nature have virtue from that which is prior by nature: multitude has virtue only from unity: therefore unity is prior by nature: therefore it is not related to the many as privation to habit.
3. Likewise, no privation is preserved in its habit by what it is: unity is preserved in the many by what it is: therefore, etc.
4. Likewise, no privation is an essential part of habit: unity and the one are always part of the many: therefore as before.
5. Likewise, no repeated privation induces habit, but rather deprives: the repeated one induces the many: therefore also as before:

and other infinite reasons can be induced for this.

1. Likewise, the one is reduced to form, but privation to matter: therefore the one and the many are not related as privation and habit.
2. Likewise, nothing is opposed to the same thing by two kinds of opposition: but the Philosopher says that the one and the many are opposed relatively; therefore they are not opposed as privation and habit.
3. Likewise, of whatever opposites both are posited as being in the species of those, there is no opposition as privation and habit: the one and the many both are posited as being in the species: therefore as before. The first is evident by the definition of habit and privation. The second is proven by what the Philosopher says, that the one is the measure of the many, and is opposed to it as being to being.
4. Likewise, according to the Master it seems here that they are opposed as two privations: because he says that neither does the one posit anything in the divine, nor even the many or the several.

Solution. It must be said that the intention of the Master is to remove the quantity of number from the divine, and not number, nor any notion of number, but only the position of numerical quantity. And to understand this, it is necessary to pre-note how the principle of number, namely unity, is posited in any thing: because any thing is countable with another by the fact that unity is in it: because aggregation constitutes number.

I say therefore that everything that is one is one from form: but form is the being and notion of the thing. And again its termination is from form, as was said before in the solution of the first doubt of this distinction. And from this last act the thing is called one. But that one is to be considered in two ways, namely as it is constituted by the act of form, and as it is the measure of that which is called the one form. And considered in the first way, it is convertible with form, and the terminating form is the unity of the thing. But in the second way, since nothing is measured except as much as in potency or act, that unity is the principle of number, and it is not convertible with being, but it follows each being: for each being is measured by unity discerning it from another being to which it is countable: and in this last way the one posits the principle of discrete quantity in the thing which is called one: and in this way it is not in God. But in another way we say with respect to us, and not according to nature, that we know number by the division of the one: and because division deprives the notion of unity with respect to the indivision which the one posits, therefore we say that number is the privation of the one in that in which there is number: and because the one is said by continuity, equality of nature, form, and unity with respect to one form: just as we say one line by continuity, we know number by the privation of the one in the line through division, as the Philosopher says that we know number by the privation of the continuous. We say by equality of nature one, just as we say one Angel, and many Angels by the privation of equality in the powers of nature to the angelic work, just as we distinguish that they differ by the subtlety of essence, and the perspicuity of intelligence, and consequently by the participation of gifts, as the Master says in II Sentences, that they differ by the degree of nature, and the order of gifts: for according to this inequality in my judgment not only orders are multiplied, but also Angels: and their multitude or number is known by the privation of this equality. But we say one by form, and we say many by the privation of the unity of form through the being of different things and differences. Thus we say Socrates and Plato are many men, and many animals. By respect to the one we say univocals are one, like man and donkey in animal: and we say many are in which this kind of unity is deprived, as in equivocal things which refer not to one, but to different things: and in anagogical things which although they refer to one, yet not by one and the same respect: and in this way considering the one according to formal reason, each excludes the other: and this the Master considered when he said that such things would note removal or exclusion: because by these considerations a smaller number well excludes a greater, and a greater excludes a smaller, by the formal opposition which they have to each other, as will be clear below in solving.

To that therefore which is first asked concerning the opposition which is between the one and the many: it must be said that some are diversified on this in three ways.

1. For some wish to say that they have opposition as privation and habit: and some, that as contraries: and some, that as relatives: and all these opinions are true according to something else, and also a fourth, that they have no opposition from themselves, which is Avicenna's. For the Commentator on Aristotle's Metaphysics seems more to say that they are opposed as privation and habit: and some refer this to the notion of the one which is given by privation: but many say that the notion is given by habit: and this is nothing: because the pure Philosopher seeks more about the nature of the thing itself, than about the intentions of names.

2. Furthermore, that the one is thus defined or explained, this happens to it insofar as it is first. For first things, since they have no prior to themselves, must be explained by negation. And note that some say that the one in substance is named by a privative name: but in quantity positively, like similar and equal. Similarly, multitude in substance positively, and in others privatively, like dissimilar and unequal. And they give the reason that this happens because substance is first, and therefore more unknown to us than others. But this is much: because if the one in others is known, also multitude is known: and thus each should be named in other categories by a positive name.

3. Furthermore, the Philosopher does not say that the one is one in substance, but rather that the same is one in substance: and this is said positively: because it is relative, as Boethius says. Hence the same, similar, and equal, say one related to different things: and the multitude of all these is named privatively, like different, dissimilar, and unequal, all of which are explained by negation.

Hence it must be said that there is one indivisible reduced to matter or the disposition of matter, and one reduced to the nature of form: just as we say one by continuity and one by form: and when we say one by continuity, we say one by matter: because continuity is a disposition of matter: but whatever is one by continuity is potentially many: but every potentiality is in the genus of privation, especially the potentiality of matter, which is the potentiality of the continuous: which is evident, because the continuous is potentially passively many, and not potentially actively. Therefore the one reduced to the unity of matter has opposition to the many as privation to habit: because such unity is susceptible of multitude: and this is the intention of the Philosopher and the comment saying this. But the one which is reduced to form has three considerations, namely according to the formal reason of the one, and according to what it is, and according to what is proximate and consequent to it. Considered in the first way, it has the opposition of contrariety to the many: because each is posited in the species, and mutually expel each other from the same susceptible: and this some attend saying in their comments on the same book, that the one and the many are opposed contrarily. But if the one is taken according to what it is, it has no opposition to the many, but rather is the principle of the many, and is preserved substantially in the many itself. And this Avicenna attends saying that it has no opposition: because neither does privation make habit, nor is it preserved in it; nor does the contrary make the contrary, nor is it preserved in it according to nature, nor is the relative preserved in the relative.

as a part, neither affirmation nor negation can be in such opposition. For if one is taken according to the reason closely following, which is the reason of measure, then the one which is certain is measuring the many which is uncertain: and thus they are opposed as measure and measured: and this is intended by Aristotle in the tenth book of the Metaphysics, and the Commentator there, and Avicenna in his Metaphysics, saying that one and many are opposed relatively. But it is distinguished there in relatives, that some are such that each depends on the other, and each posits the other, as father and son, and master and servant. However, some are such that one depends on the other, and not conversely: and therefore there one posits the other, and not conversely, as knowledge and knowable: and thus one and many are opposed relatively: because many posits one, and it is not converted. Hence Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names: Without one indeed there will not be multitude, but without multitude there will be one: just as unity is before every number and multiplication. And from this distinction almost all questions are solved.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that indivision is the reason of the one which is converted with being, but it is not the reason of it according to which it is the principle of discrete quantity: and that indivision is not absolutely privation, but is a negation following the act of form, as was said above: and therefore it is not proved by this that one is the privation of many: for this which is to be privative of many does not happen to every one, as was said, and through this the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said, that being and one coincide in the thing named by each, and in this respect they are synonymous, but not according to the reasons of those names: otherwise it would be tautology when it is said one being, joining both: for being in itself does not imply distinction; and therefore one, although it does not add any nature, yet adds distinction which follows from the act of form: and therefore the Doctors say that they are converted according to supposita, and not according to their intentions.

From the axiom it must be said, that one adds upon being, but adds nothing upon the suppositum of being: and therefore before the intention of one is the intention of being, and the intention of being is simpler than that of one: but that which is being, and that which is one, are converted: and through this the solution to the following is clear up to the end.

However, the objections which are made to the contrary conclude necessarily except the first: for that does not follow, even if it is granted, that one and being are opposed in some way as privation and habit: because the privation which is according to nature after the habit is that which posits nothing except the subject: but even when we say one is the privation of many, still one is reduced to being by continuity or form: and therefore it is not absolutely privation, and therefore one according to nature precedes many: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

There are some here saying marvelous things, which I do not know if anyone can understand. For they say that one and many are simply opposed as privation and habit, and that the Master takes one for unique, and that one adds nothing upon being even according to intention, because Aristotle says that the reason of the thing and of the one thing is the same: and therefore when God is said, one God is understood: and if one is added, this is done for the sake of signification or distinction. And all these things in my judgment are not true. For although God is one God, yet unity is not signified in the name, and therefore it can and should be added. However, the other things above have been proven to be false.

Articulus 4 — Whether Numerical Terms In The Divine Predicate The Essence Or The Person

Whether numerical terms in divine things predicate essence or person?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

For when it is said, one God, the multitude of gods is excluded.

Here three questions arise, namely, whether numerical terms in divine things predicate the divine essence or person? Second, whether they are predicated univocally of essence and person and notion? Third, whether the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit can in any way be called one?

To the first, it is proceeded thus:
1. It has been held above as a rule, that every name not said relatively, in God predicates essence: numerical terms are not said relatively: therefore they predicate essence.

1. Likewise, Boethius says all predicaments are turned into substance in predication except relation: such terms, however, signify being in the predicament of quantity: therefore they are turned into substance in predication.
2. Likewise, the reason of the thing and of one thing is the same, and the predication of essence and of one essence is the same: therefore since essence predicates nature and substance, in divine things one and two and suchlike will predicate essence.
3. Likewise, one is converted with being: therefore it predicates what being predicates in divine things: but being predicates substance: therefore also one.
4. Likewise, the consignified does not vary the reason of the signified, for white, white, white signifies the same: therefore also one signifies one, one, one but one in divine things predicates substance: therefore one and one.

ON THE CONTRARY
Whatever signifies essence, is said singularly of the three and of one: therefore if one and many or two or three predicate essence, we can say, the Father is two, and the Father is many, and the Father and the Son are one: which being false, it is clear that these do not predicate essence.

Solution. It must be said that in the masculine they do not predicate essence except from an adjunct substantive, around which they place their thing, and they take substance from it: as if I say, the Father and the Son are one God, or something of this sort; and this agrees for a threefold reason, namely the discretion which such names have in principal signification, and of the genus which says the discretion of person, because in rational nature there is no formed being unless distinct in person: and by reason of the article included in such names. However, in the neuter gender, although two of these remain, namely the discretion of the signified and the article, yet they do not have the third which especially draws to the person: because the genus does not happen to the name except on the part of the substance signified and determined according to the mode at least: and therefore then they predicate essence.

To what is first objected, it must be said that such names say relation: for they are consequent to the act of the distinguishing property: for relation is in many ways in divine things, as noted above.

To the other, it must be said that in God such names do not say quantity, nor are they taken in the species of quantity, as was said before.
