§ 14. Fifthly it is asked, whether Antichrist will have a guardian Angel or not? § 15. Now it seems that he will not have one: because § 16. 1. Upon that text, Neither shall he regard any of the gods, for he shall rise up against all things: but he shall venerate the god Maozim in his place: the Gloss says, namely the devil, in himself and wherever Antichrist shall be. [179] If therefore he will have the devil in himself, it seems that he will in no way have the protection of Angels.

§ 1. 2. Also, another gloss in the same place seems to say, that even in his mother's womb he is to be nourished by the ministry of a demon, and after birth to be fed and educated. § 2. 3. Also, according to the Apostle, with the devil instigating and operating who will entirely possess him, the coming of Antichrist will be according to the operation of Satan. [180] § 3. 4. Also, Damascene says that Antichrist will lack the protection of Angels. § 4. 5. Also, Damascene: That man will be generated from fornication, and will take up every act of Satan. For God, foreknowing the iniquity of his future will, concedes the devil to dwell in him. Therefore it seems, that a good Angel would do nothing with him. § 5. 6. Also, by reason the same seems true, that a good Angel intends to harm no one: but contempt for his protection would harm that man and aggravate his sin: therefore it seems, that one will not be given to him.

§ 6. Further it is asked concerning this, whether Christ had an Angel assigned to him? § 7. It seems that he did: because § 8. 1. In the Psalm: To his Angels, etc. The Gloss: It can be taken concerning the whole Christ. [181] Therefore as much concerning the head, as concerning the members. § 9. 2. Also: An Angel from heaven appeared to him, strengthening him. [182] Therefore much more did he have an Angel guarding him: because it is less to guard, than to strengthen. § 10. 3. Also: And behold Angels approached, and ministered to him. [183] § 11. 4. Also, his dignity was not less than that of others: if therefore it is the dignity of the human soul that Angels are assigned to it for guardianship, it seems that much more were they assigned to Christ. § 12. 5. Also, he himself had an evil Angel exercising him: therefore much more ought he to have had a good one guarding him. § 13. 6. Also, an Angel does not only guard in spiritual things, but also in the body: but Christ was passible in the body: therefore he needed guardianship in that part, as it seems. § 14. 7. Also, Bede says upon that text, Angels approached, that Angels are described as having ministered to Christ and strengthened him as a testimony of both natures. If therefore ministry was a sign of divine nature, and strengthening a sign of human nature, it seems that he needed the guardianship of Angels. § 15. 8. Also, upon Tobit the Gloss says, that the evil Angel never left him, and stood on the arm of the cross when he died. Therefore from opposites neither did the good Angel. § 16. 9. Also, the lesser ought to be guarded by the greater, as was established above: but of Christ it is said, Thou hast made him a little less than the Angels: therefore he ought to have had the guardianship of Angels.

170. Isa. 62:6.

§ 17. If this be conceded, a great misery follows, namely that being conjoined to deity he would still need another guardian: for his persecutors could never do anything against him, except when deity exhibited him to the passion: therefore he never had a guardian.

§ 18. Solution. To the first there are opinions: for some say, that Antichrist will have a good Angel who will be assigned to him: but he will withdraw from him, from the moment he exalts himself above all that is called God. But this opinion has today expired. The opinion of others is, that he will have a good guardian Angel, who will never withdraw from him even until death: and this for three reasons, namely so that his condemnation may appear more just: and so that the order of wisdom may stand, which on account of him ought not to be broken, so that what is done for others is not done for him. The third and principal cause is: because it seems impossible, that an Angel should not impede him from many sins, especially because he will not permit the occasions of certain sins to come to the presence of his senses: and divine goodness is so great, that it procures impediments to sin even for the most wicked, and therefore the guardianship of the Angel is not entirely frustrated in him.

§ 2. To the authorities therefore first adduced it must be said, that this is said with respect to the principal effect of guardianship, which is to withdraw from sins: for this Antichrist will never do. But as to what is said about his being nourished by the devil, this is understood as to the dispositions by which the demon operates for the incitement of the bodily constitution or of foods, as was said above.

§ 3. To all the others the solution is clear through the things which are objected to the contrary.

§ 4. To that which is further asked concerning Christ, it must be said that it is the opinion of all, that Christ never had a guardian Angel: because without doubt this would be the greatest impiety to opine concerning the redeemer.

§ 5. To those things therefore which are objected, it must be said to the first, that God gave command to the Angels concerning the whole Christ, but not equally, but that they should guard the members, and minister to the head.

§ 6. To another it must be said, that in the same place it is solved by the Expositors, that it was nothing but the exterior strengthening of congratulation to a strong Christ, and not of interior disposition: and therefore the Doctors have been accustomed to say, that his comforting was to bear himself in the manner of one comforting.

§ 7. To another it must be said, that he did not have an evil Angel tempting him interiorly. But this solution belongs to certain thinkers, and it is not valid: because even Adam did not have him inside in the first state. Whence it must be said, that it is not similar concerning an evil Angel, and concerning a good Angel: because the evil one is given for the trial of fidelity and constancy: and in Christ there was a temptation of dispensation, namely because wisdom so dispensed, that he who had conquered by tempting, might be conquered by being tempted:

171. Sirach 33:15; 42:25.

whence the temptation of Christ is referred to our salvation, and not to an exercise, which would have brought some good to himself. But a good Angel is given on account of need, which was none in Christ: and therefore he could not have a good guardian Angel.

§ 8. To another it must be said, that the strengthening of the Angel is a sign of human nature, not through any fortitude which the Angel had given him, but because he was congratulating the strong sufferer: and thus through sadness and passion it is ordered to the proof of human nature, and not from need.

§ 9. To another the solution is clear through what has been said: because it is not similar concerning a good Angel, and an evil Angel.

§ 10. To another it must be said, that in the argument there is the fallacy of taking what is qualified as absolute: because Christ is not lesser except very improperly and in a qualified sense, namely in that he was passible in the flesh, not in that he was needy or flexible [in will].

Articulus 6 — Whether Man Would Have Had a Guardian Angel If He Had Not Fallen

Would man have had a guardian Angel if he had not fallen?

§ 11. Sixthly it is asked, whether man would have had a guardian Angel if he had not fallen? § 12. Now it seems that he would not: because § 13. 1. He would not have been inclining to sin: therefore he would not have needed one comforting him in the good. § 14. 2. Also, Man would have been confirmed if he had stood firm, just as the standing Angel: therefore he would not have needed a guardian Angel then. § 15. 3. Also, on account of the body he did not need one, because he could not die unless he sinned: therefore in no way did he need one, as it seems.

§ 16. But on the contrary: it is established that he had an evil Angel as an exerciser: therefore he ought also to have had a good one as a guardian.

§ 17. Solution. It must be said, that he had a good guardian Angel in the first state.

§ 1. But to the first objections there is one solution, that guardianship is more a preservative medicine than a sanative one: and therefore the Angel was operating toward this, that man should not fall.

§ 2. To another it must be said, that after confirmation he would not have had a guarding Angel.

§ 3. But whether he would still have received illuminations through an Angel in the state of an animal body, until he should be transferred into the paradise of Angels, and the body be clothed with heavenly clarity, I do not determine: but indeed this seems to me more probable, than the opposite.

Articulus 7 — Whether Angels Advance in Merit

Do Angels advance in merit?

172. Sirach 17:14 (Vulgate).

Do Angels advance in merit?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, D, Furthermore that ought to be considered, etc. § 2. And it is asked, whether Angels advance in merit?

§ 3. But because this was disputed above, where it is asked concerning the merit of Angels, therefore certain things can briefly be touched upon here thus: § 4. Out of charity they minister around us: but an act informed by charity is meritorious: therefore Angels merit by ministering.

§ 5. Further it is asked concerning the contradiction which seems to be among them, as in Daniel, where it is said: The prince of the kingdom of the Persians resisted me for twenty-one days. And in Job: Who maketh peace in his high places.

§ 6. Also, concerning the sadness with which they are said to be saddened, as in Isaiah: The Angels of peace shall weep bitterly.

§ 7. Also, concerning what Bernard says, that although Angels are impassible, they are nevertheless not incompassible [i.e., incapable of compassion].

§ 8. Solution. The Masters pass briefly over this here: but elsewhere it is diligently treated concerning these things. § 9. And it must be said, that the common opinion is, that Angels do not merit: because their charity informing their acts is in them a reward, not a merit, as was said above.

§ 10. To another it must be said, that the contradiction is nothing but a dissent in the object willed by one and the other, and it is reduced to concord through the illumination of that which God wills: because in this they all agree.

§ 11. To another it must be said, that Angels do not weep: but signs of sadness in effect, not in affect, are called their weeping, when sinners are not converted.

§ 12. To another it must be said, that the affect of compassion is there taken improperly for congratulation in the good, and displeasure in our evil, which we do, or suffer.

DISTINCTIO XII

Divisio Textus

§ 13. These things concerning the condition of the Angelic nature, etc. Here begins that part which is concerning corporeal creature, and it is divided into two parts. § 14. In the first the Master treats of the work of creation. But in the second concerning the work of disposition and adornment: and this begins in the following distinction XIII, there, A, Now the first of distinction, etc.

§ 15. Now this distinction is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master recites diverse sentences of the Fathers concerning the manner of creation. But in the second he explains the work of creation, there, C, Therefore according to this tradition, etc. In the third, he moves two questions concerning the work of creation, namely whether unformed matter was created entirely, or under some form, and where was the matter of the sensible world created? there, E, Concerning which thing before we treat, etc. In the fourth and last, he says certain things to be foretasted concerning the mode of the distinction of divine operation, there, G, Now it remains that the disposition, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether All Things Were Made at Once, as Augustine Says, or Were Disposed Through the Number of Six Days

Were all things made at once, as Augustine says, or distributed through the sixfold number of days?

§ 16. The first question occurs concerning the first part about the opinion of Augustine who says, that all things were made at once in matter and form. And to the opinion of others who feel otherwise, Augustine objects thus: § 17. 1. He that liveth forever, created all things together. [184] And he who says all things, excepts nothing: therefore all things were created at once, and not through a sixfold number. § 18. 2. Also, the Gloss of Gregory, in the same place: When heaven and earth are described as made at once, at once spiritual and corporeal things, at once whatever arises from heaven, at once whatever is produced from the earth is indicated as made. But it is established, that stars are from heaven, and plants, and animals from the earth. Therefore heaven and earth, and stars and plants and animals were made at once, and not successively through six days.

§ 1. 3. Also, Augustine objects through that which is held: These are the generations of heaven and earth, when they were created, in the day that the Lord made heaven and earth: and every shrub of the field before it sprang up in the earth, and every herb of the region before it grew. [185] Therefore in the day in which the Lord made heaven and earth, he made the shrub of the field and the herb of the region. Therefore the third day was with the first day: and the same reasoning holds for the others: therefore the works of the six days were made at once. § 2. 4. Also, this seems more expressed through another translation, which Augustine introduces: and it says thus: This is the book of the creature of heaven and earth, when the day was made, God made heaven and earth and the herb for fodder. Therefore when the day was made, God made heaven and earth and the herb. Now the day made cannot be understood as that which is from the bearing of the sun: therefore it is another day which God made when he made all other things: but that day before corporeal light cannot be except the Angelic nature: therefore with the Angelic nature God made all things: therefore all things at once. § 3. 5. Also, through that text of Job: Behold Behemoth whom I made with thee. [186] But Behemoth is an Angel, who first when he was made, the day was made: but man is commemorated as made on the sixth day: therefore the work of the sixth day is made with the work of the first day: therefore also the rest were much more made [at once]. § 4. 6. Also, Augustine leads the one saying the opposite to an inconvenience.

174. 1 John 2:27.

For if all things were made in confused matter only, then nothing was distinct: therefore neither was there a circle in which light might be rotated: therefore since a day is not made except by the circular rotation of light, even day was not then, neither the first, nor the second, nor the third: but it first began in the fourth. § 5. 7. Also, Day is made for the solace of those dwelling on the earth: but then no one inhabited the earth: therefore day would have been in vain, unless all things were made at once: but there is nothing in vain and empty and useless in the works of God: therefore it seems, that all things were made at once. § 6. 8. Also, if someone should say, that day was then made by the emission and contraction of light. Augustine objects to the contrary: since a luminous body does not illuminate by contracting and emitting rays, like the eye, since it does not have anything covering it, and acts by the necessity of nature. § 7. 9. Furthermore, that emission and contraction is neither proved by reason, nor by the authority of Sacred Scripture: therefore it is condemned with the same facility with which it is asserted. § 8. 10. Also, it is established, that God produced the work of the first day in a moment: it is asked therefore, why did he rest for twenty-four hours, since an artificer who is not wearied in his work, does not know how to cease from work, as long as something remains of the work to be perfected? but the cause of this is not easy to find. And Augustine hints at all these reasons in diverse places of his books on Genesis literally.

§ 9. Furthermore, for the same opinion it can be objected thus: § 10. 1. Of the most perfect agent the work is most perfect: but the most perfect work is completed in form and matter: therefore it seems, that all things were created by the supreme artificer perfect in form and matter. § 11. 2. Also, Aristotle often uses this argument, if something is better done by one than by many, and suddenly and at once than successively, that nature so operates which expedites itself by the shorter means it can: therefore much more the supremely potent God: but it is better to make at once than successively, and by one than by many: therefore it seems, that God made all things at once. § 12. 3. Also, the terminus of every operation is a composite and not matter alone: and the truth of this is clear by induction in art and nature: therefore the terminus of divine operation is also a composite: but a composite is perfect from matter and form: therefore creatures were made at once perfect in matter and form. § 2. 4. Also, if prime matter was made: either therefore it was made naked without all form, or under the form of a mixture. If naked, this cannot be: because even the Master in the third part of this reading will say below, that it cannot subsist without all form: because thus it is in potency and intellect only. If however it was made under the form of a mixture. On the contrary: miscible things are distinct in time and substance before the mixture, as the Philosopher proves: therefore before that mixture there must have been distinct things in their forms. § 3. 5. Also, miscible things would not be mixed unless by something moving to the mixture: but there was nothing moving to that mixture: therefore it seems, that all things were not made at once in the form of mixture and confusion. § 4. To these and similar reasons Augustine consents: and also certain Philosophers positing the world to have begun through creation, hold the way of Augustine, and Rabbi Moses, and certain others.

175. Matt. 19:14; Matt. 18:10.

§ 5. BUT ON THE CONTRARY it is objected through the opinion of other Saints: § 6. 1. For Chrysostom says upon John: It was fitting that creatures be generated, but not at once: and man with woman, but neither these at once: therefore not all things were made at once. § 7. 2. Also, Gregory in book XXXII of the Moralia: The substance of things was created at once, but was not formed at once according to species: and what stood forth at once through the substance of matter, did not appear at once through the species of form. § 8. 3. But because the authorities of Gregory, Jerome, Basil, Bede, Ambrose, Dionysius, Damascene, Alcuin, Strabo, and of very many other Fathers besides Augustine, abundantly overflow to this. § 9. 4. Let the authority of Augustine also be introduced. For he says in the book of Confessions: Didst thou not teach me, that before thou didst form that unformed matter, there was not anything, neither color, nor body, nor figure, nor spirit, yet not entirely nothing: for there was a certain formlessness without any species. Therefore it seems, that God created unformed matter first, and afterwards formed it. But if anyone wishes to accept it, he will find many authorities similar to this in books XII and XIII of the Confessions. § 10. 5. Also, Augustine says upon Genesis: Greater is the authority of this scripture, namely Genesis, than the perspicacity of all human ingenuity. Since therefore Scripture pronounces six days, it seems that it is a temerity of ingenuity and presumption to say that all things were made at once. § 11. 6. Also, this opinion seems also agreeable to Philosophers, that first things were made in the confusion of a mixture. Whence Ovid: Before the sea, and lands, and the heaven which covers all things, There was one countenance of nature in the whole orb, Which they called Chaos, a rude and indigested mass. § 12. 7. Also, Boethius in the book on the Consolation of Philosophy: Whom no external causes compelled to fashion The work of floating matter. § 13. 8. Also, Aristotle in the first of the Physics: Some segregate inherent contrarieties from one mixture, just as Anaximander said: and whoever others say that there is one and many, as Empedocles and Anaxagoras. § 14. 9. Also, Plato in the last part of the Timaeus says thus: For the mixed generation of the sensi-

§ 1. -ble world consists from the act of necessity and intelligence, with intellect dominating, and by salutary persuasion drawing the rigor of necessity to the best acts. Therefore it seems, that this opinion is truer. § 2. 10. Also, by reason it can be objected thus: nature in all its work is regulated by some exemplar of divine work: but it is established, that in the work of nature potency precedes act in time: therefore this is prefigured in the divine work: but the work preceding nature is none other than the work of creation, and disposition, and adornment: therefore it seems, that in it too potency preceded act: therefore matter was made before, and afterwards distinguished through forms. § 3. 11. Also, the sudden and the successive cannot be simultaneous: but the work of creation is sudden, because between being and nothing there is no medium: but the work of distinction is in motion to form and to place, both of which are successively in time: therefore the work of distinction and of creation are not simultaneous. Since therefore all the works of the six days besides part of the work of the first day, are of the work of distinction and adornment, they could not have been made at once with the work of adornment. § 4. 12. Also, there are four termini of diverse mutations, namely being, nothing, potency, and act: but it is established, that these termini are ordered, such that nothing is before potency, and being absolutely is before being in act through form: therefore in the same order the mutations which are between those termini stand to each other: therefore the mutation of creation which is between being and nothing, will be before the mutation of distinction and adornment which is between potency and act: therefore not all things were made at once.

§ 5. Solution. Speaking without prejudice, nothing seems to me truer than that which Augustine says: nevertheless I will solve the reasons for both opinions, and let him prevail who can prevail.

§ 6. Solving therefore first for Augustine, his word upon which his solution is founded must be accepted. Therefore he says thus in the book on Genesis literally: § 7. Just as voice is the matter of words, but words indicate formed voice: and yet he who speaks does not first emit an unformed voice, which he might afterwards collect, and form into words: so God the creator did not make matter prior in time, and afterwards form it through the order of whatsoever things as if by a second consideration: for he created formed matter: but because that from which something is made, although not in time, is nevertheless by a certain origin prior to that which is made from it, Scripture could divide by times of speaking, what God did not divide by times of making.

§ 8. According to this therefore we will say to the first that is objected, that it was fitting that they not be made at once by the order of nature, but by the order of time: and this mode of solving applies to all authorities of all the Saints.

§ 9. To that which is objected from his words in the book of Confessions, it must be said that he himself takes there "before" and "after" to be made according to the order of nature, by which the foundation of nature is before all things founded in it. But the foundation, as the Philosopher says, is neither qualified, nor quantified, nor having any form: and therefore it is in potency alone, and according to reason: and this reason Augustine pursues there.

§ 10. To another it must be said, that Augustine does not derogate Scripture: because he does not contradict it, but expounds it: but he derogates the authority of Scripture, who says that what is contained in it is false.

§ 11. To that which is objected through the Philosophers, it must be said that they plainly erred: because positing a mixture, as Empedocles, they posited nothing to be in the mixture except what are called elements: and they said this is done many times in any generated thing, and that friendship and strife move to the exit of things into being through generation, as was noted above. And of that opinion Ovid seems to have been. Others following Anaxagoras and Anaximander, said that that mixture is from infinite similar parts, remaining there under their proper forms, such as flesh, and bone, and nerve, and blood, and the like: and they posited elements to be infinite, and all things to be in all things, and the latency of forms: all of which are erroneous, and expounded above. And therefore the holy Fathers did not posit a mixture of this kind, but rather the confused matter of the four elements, with God alone making the distinction in it. And so is understood the authority of Boethius. And according to Augustine, that mixture precedes in nature only, and not in time: just as also the mixture of humors in man is the cause of complexion, and does not precede it in time: and the shining sun [is the cause of] the emitted ray, and yet does not precede it in time.

§ 2. To that which is objected through reason, it must be said that nature is regulated by the divine work, which however it cannot imitate in whole, as is clear, because it cannot make anything out of nothing: but it imitates it as much as it can by having potency in place of nothing, and in place of that which God makes suddenly and at once, it operates in time and successively.

§ 3. To another it must be said, that distinction is not made successively except by nature, and not by God: and therefore it could be simultaneous with the work of creation.

§ 4. To another it must be said, that those things, on account of the perfection of the agent, did not have their mutations simultaneously in time: but in nature which is an imperfect agent, it is otherwise.

§ 5. But because there are Doctors who opine also for the other side: therefore it must be solved also for them.

§ 6. To what therefore is first and second objected, it must be solved through Gregory himself, because that Gloss is taken from book XXXII of the Moralia, chap. 10: and there below the Gloss there follows in the original: For the sun, moon and stars are held to be made in heaven on the fourth day: but what proceeded in species on the fourth day, stood forth in the substance of heaven on the first day by condition. On the first day the earth is said to be created, and on the third day the shrubs are described as established, and all green things: but what brought itself forth in species on the third day, was undoubtedly on the first day in that substance of the earth from which it arose.

§ 7. To that which is thirdly and fourthly objected through the text of Genesis, Gregory responds in the same place thus: He who had named heaven and earth, and shrub and herb created on diverse days, now manifests them made in one day, so that he might clearly show that every creature stood forth at once by substance, although it did not proceed at once by species.

§ 8. To another it must be said, that man was made with the Angel as to the body in the prime matter of the elements, and as to the soul in likeness: because the Angel was created in the image of God in three powers, just as man.

§ 9. To the other things which Augustine objects, it must be said that for the rotation of that light it was not necessary that there be a special circle: because that of matter which yielded into a quantified body, was then more moved, and by its nature was borne circularly just as it also does now.

§ 10. To another it must be said, that the cause of day is not that inhabitants on the earth might see the light: but rather then the local motion itself and the deiform immutation through the rotation of light moved the liquid matter to an easier distinction: because the motion by distracting, and inducing heat, worked toward this that fire should be made near the circumference, and similarly light through immutation: but the gross matter by that very fact

§ 1. ...they fled more by distancing from the circumference: and therefore that motion was ordered to the easier distinction of the parts of matter, not because God needed this instrument, but because the nature of the thing required this.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that Damascene says that by emission and contraction night and day came to be in the first three days: and if we wish to maintain this, then we will say that there is emission through rising and setting: and thus what he says is true. And there is emission through drawing in and covering: and thus what he says cannot be true, unless we posit that it is animate, and has closing and opening [parts], just as eyes have.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that a created thing is not immediately perfect. For the perfection of a thing is twofold: one is in being, and this it received from the divine work in the first state; and the other is in acting and in relation to other things, and a thing does not have this unless a circulation is completed over it: because thus in every direct and oblique aspect it is proportioned and moved by the higher [bodies]: and therefore it does not receive the impressions and motions of all [at once]: and therefore appropriately another day was always awaited in a new work.

§ 4. To what is objected by common arguments, it must be said that the action of the agent is not only according to the power of the agent, but also according to the power of the patient, and according to what is more fitting to the patient and to that which is made: and therefore, since God intended to establish nature in the first works of the six days, he made them according to what was more fitting to those works, and this was so that, just as one was the cause of another according to nature, so also it would precede it in time.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that it was not better, as has already been shown.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that this also was resolved above, in the first distinction: and it is true only of an agent that does not act upon the whole substance of a thing, but upon a part of the substance: but God is not such an agent.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that there is a mixed thing [directed] to the act of the mixed thing removing each of the miscible elements from its proper act: and the objection proceeds concerning this. There is also a mixed thing which has act in the miscible elements, but is not determined to a place, which place contributes to the generation and conservation of the species: and concerning this it is not true. Rather, what is undetermined in place is determined according to the first generation of the world: and therefore it is clear that the order of wisdom does not contradict the order of nature.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that it is not necessary that anything move toward a mixed thing undetermined in place besides the will of the maker determining from his own will, but toward a mixed thing that makes a new complexion from the miscible elements of the mixed thing, it is necessary to posit a mover according to place, and according to active and passive qualities.

Articulus 2 — Why Prime Matter Is Rather Called by These Names, Earth, Water, Abyss, Than by Others

Why is prime matter rather called by these names, earth, water, abyss, than by others?

§ 9. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, He also calls the same an abyss, etc.

§ 10. Here it is asked, 1. Why is prime matter rather called by these three names, earth, water, abyss, than by others?

§ 11. 2. Also, since Aristotle reproves Hesiod, because he said that the receptibility of place and of matter are the same, why does Scripture say this, that matter is void and empty, which are properties of place?

§ 12. 3. Also, why does he here sometimes call matter confused, and sometimes mixed, since according to the Philosopher there is a difference between the confused and the mixed?

§ 13. To the first, however, it must be said that there are three properties by reason of which it is called by three names, of which the first is to receive form. But the receptive power is chiefly perfected by aqueous humidity: and therefore it is called by the name of water: because water receives every figure to which it flows, just as matter receives every form. Also, in matter there is the property of holding the received form: and by reason of this it is called earth: because the retentive power is perfected by the cold and dry, which are properties of earth. Also, matter does not have being except through form, and therefore the being of matter is through form, and therefore without it it is base and indefinite: and as to this it is called an abyss, being without a base, and without the brightness of beauty, and indefinite.

§ 1. The others must be resolved by a distinction: because matter has certain things in which it agrees with place, namely because the advent of form is into it already existing, and the departure [is] from it remaining one and the same in number: just as a thing is moved to a place, and from it remaining unmoved: and as to this the properties of place are attributed to it in comparison to form. Whence also the Philosopher in Physics IV sometimes calls a vacuum that in which there is no 'this somewhat', nor corporeal substance: as some say that a vacuum is the matter of a body.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that mixture is the union of altered miscible elements, as the Philosopher says: and this belongs to the matter of the four elements: but confused things are conjoined, not removed from their forms, nor united in a middle act: and this belongs to that chaos by reason of the matter of heaven which is not the same as the matter of the four elements, according as matter is taken which is judged by its potency to motion, because there is not a single potency to place and to form: and because both were then conjoined in that first chaos, therefore he posited mixed and confused.

179. Daniel 11:37.

§ 3. The other things in this reading are evident.

DISTINCTIO XIII

Divisio Textus

§ 4. The first operation of distinction, etc. Here he begins to treat of the work of distinction and adornment. And according to this it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he posits the work of distinction. In the second he posits the work of adornment: and this begins in the Work of the fourth day, there, Dist. XV, A, It follows, God said: Let there be luminaries, etc.

§ 5. The first of these is divided into three parts: in the first of which he treats of the distinction of extreme from extreme, that is, of the luminous from the opaque: and this is the work of the first day. In the second, he treats of the distinction of the middle from the extreme which is higher: and this is the work of the second day, there, Dist. XIV, A, God also said: Let there be a firmament, etc. In the third, he treats of the distinction of the middle from the extreme which is lower, there, Dist. XIV, E, It follows, God said: Let the waters be gathered, etc., and this is the work of the third day.

§ 6. But this reading is divided into three parts: In the first of which he touches upon those things which were distinguished on the second day. In the second, however, [he treats] certain doubts concerning them, there, D, Here it must be noted that days, etc.

§ 1. In the third he posits two doubts on the part of the worker, namely how he spoke, and how the Father works [through] the Son, there, G, Furthermore it is to be investigated how, etc.

Articulus 1 — What the Work of Distinction Is; And How It Is Multiplied Through the Sixfold Number of the First Days

What is the work of distinction? And, how is it multiplied through the triad of the first days?

§ 2. A question arises concerning the work of distinction, What is it, and how is the work of distinction multiplied through the triad of the first days?

§ 3. 1. To the first thus: the Master in the preceding distinction, in the penultimate chapter, said that in six days God distinguished, and reduced into their proper forms, all things which he had made materially together: therefore distinction is every work besides creation, whether it be adornment or distinction: therefore it is not divided from the work of adornment.

§ 4. 2. Also, in the last chapter, in the word of Alcuin it is said that God works in four ways. First in the Word, disposing all things. Second in matter, creating. Third, distinguishing through forms. Fourth, propagating. And again no mention is made of adornment. Therefore it seems that adornment and distinction are not works having diversity.

180. 2 Thessalonians 2:9.

§ 5. 3. Also, every distinction is through form: and whatever is informed is distinguished in being, and adornment is nothing but the reception of form: therefore it seems that to adorn a thing is to distinguish it.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: Augustine and the Master say below that certain things pertain to distinction, and not to adornment, such as the works of the first days: therefore the work of distinction is not the work of adornment.

§ 7. Further it is asked, According to what is the number of distinctions taken?

§ 8. For if distinction is taken according to the number of forms, since there are four primary qualities, and besides the properties of heaven, the distinction ought to be of a larger number. But if according to the nature of the distinguished things, since there are four elements, and in addition the fifth body, it seems that there ought to be five distinctions, and not only three.

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that, in my judgment, three things are required for the establishment of nature, namely the substance of principles, and their determination to forms according to which they act and are acted upon, and move and are moved: and their determination to the univocal action of this and that species. For example, nature does not act, as the Philosopher says, if there are only contraries: because there will be no common subject. But if there be a subject without contraries it will be neither active nor passive: because as the Philosopher says, fire and air and earth do not act except according as they are contraries.

§ 10. Also, if there be a subject, and contraries, and also the places of contraries, because contraries cannot be together, and there be no mover to a determined species univocally and universally, nature will not be complete: since then there will be nothing but the mixture of contraries, and a man will not be generated, nor a horse, and the like. Therefore there must be a third thing which acts toward a determined work in species universally, such as the stars: and which acts toward the same work univocally, such as a man generating, and an ass, and an ox, and the like: and therefore Damascene says that the first hypostases of any animals whatsoever were created.

§ 11. I say therefore that the substance of principles is given through the work of creation, which presupposes nothing to itself according to the intellect. But distinction towards universally acting and moving forms toward mixture-

§ 1. [mixture], which is required in all generation, is had through the work of distinction: and the determination of motion to a species, whether it move universally, as the stars: or univocally, as a generator that sheds seed, is had through the work of adornment: and through this also the sufficiency of the works is evident. Now this is drawn from a certain word of Augustine, who seems to say that the work of the first six days is to establish and institute nature: and I will adduce his authority below in this distinction.

§ 2. To the first three objections, therefore, it must be said that distinction is spoken of in two ways, namely broadly, and strictly. Broadly it is the distinction of matter through any specific form whatsoever: and in this way it comprehends under itself the work of adornment. In another way distinction through form is called an inclination to a place in which there is a universal mover, or an agent, or a patient, just as the Philosopher says, higher things moving and lower things moved, and higher things acting and lower things acted upon: and thus it does not comprehend the work of adornment. It must be known, however, that Alcuin needs a pious interpreter: because the Father does not properly work in the Word: because to generate is not to work: whence he spoke improperly.

§ 3. To that which is further asked concerning the number of distinctions, it must be said that, as was determined above, prime matter is not called merely a mixed thing, but also confused: because the matter of the fifth body is not mixed with the elements: and therefore the distinction of the parts of that matter cannot be multiplied through the properties which are found in the elements alone: but there are certain common properties in the elements and the fifth body, and according to them it is taken. Therefore there is the luminous per se, and the opaque per se: and the moving per se, and the moved per se: and the moving, and the luminous from another. Therefore what is moving and luminous per se, is by nature the higher extreme: and their distinction from each other is the work of the first day, as will be shown below: because I think the light which is distinguished from darkness to be nothing other than the nature of the luminous moving [body] from the nature of the opaque moved [body], that is, the nature of the fifth body from the nature of earth: this therefore makes one distinction. But the middle has a distinction with respect to both of the extremes: for according as it agrees with the luminous moving [body], because it is itself a transparent moving [body], it is necessary to distinguish it from the higher extreme: and this is done on the second day, when the waters which are under the firmament are distinguished from those which are above the firmament: and this will be evident in the distinction of the following reading. Also, it agrees with the opaque, because it can also become a dark moved [body]: and therefore it needs a third distinction which is made on the third day, when the waters which are under heaven are gathered into one place, and the dry land appears: for in the distinction of water, as the Saints say, the other elements are understood to be distinguished, such as air and fire. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 2 — Whether That Light of Which It Is Said, And He Divided the Light from the Darkness, Was a Bright Cloud, or a Body, or the Form of a Body

Whether that light of which it is said, And he divided the light from the darkness, was a lucid little cloud, or a body, or the form of a body?

§ 4. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, If it is asked, What kind of light that was, etc.

§ 5. For it is asked here concerning the light. For what the Master says does not seem true, that it was a lucid little cloud: since vapor is twofold, as Aristotle says, namely of earth or of water, and every cloud is from vapor: but from earth and water nothing is made luminous per se: therefore neither was that light a little cloud, as the Master seems to say.

§ 6. Further it is asked, whether that light was or is a body, or the form of a body?

§ 7. But it seems that it is the form of a body: because 1. Aristotle says in De Anima II: 'Light is neither fire, nor altogether a body, nor an emanation of a body; for it would be some body, and thus it would be fire, or the presence of something of this sort in the lucid; for it is not possible for two bodies to be in the same place.'

§ 8. 2. Also, in the same place, 'But light seems to be contrary to darkness: darkness is the privation of this habit from the lucid': but a habit is not a body: therefore neither is light.

§ 9. 3. Also, the Commentator in the same place above, 'From this it is evident that light is the habit of the diaphanous, and not a body.'

§ 10. 4. Also, in the book On Sight and the Nature of the Eye the Philosopher says, 'Light is not a body, but an accident of air.'

§ 11. 5. Also, in the same place, 'Light is not a body, but an affection of a body.'

§ 12. 6. Also, Avicenna in the sixth book of his Naturalia (Sufficientia), in the chapter on sight: 'Light is an affection of a body having light, when it is opposed to it directly without the interposition of an opaque body.'

§ 13. 7. Also, in the same place, 'Light is a quality which is the perfection of a translucent body according as it is translucent.'

§ 14. 8. Also, in the same place, 'Light is a quality which a translucent body borrows from a lucid body, and the translucent body is made by it actually translucent.'

§ 15. To the contrary: 1. There seem to be certain words of Augustine. For he says to Volusianus thus, 'This is the sense of men who are able to think of nothing but bodies: whether these'

§ 1. 'thicker ones, such as moisture and soil: or more subtle ones, such as of air and light.'

§ 2. 2. Also, in the same place, 'Two liquids are mixed, so that neither preserves its integrity, although in the bodies themselves light is mixed uncorrupted.'

§ 3. 3. Also, in book III of De Libero Arbitrio: 'in bodies light holds the first place.'

§ 4. 4. Also, in book VII On Genesis: 'How is the soul something of that genus (of bodies), since the highest of that same genus is nothing but light.'

§ 5. 5. Also, in the same place, 'The soul administers the matter of its thicker body, that is, a certain moist earth, which is turned into the quality of flesh, through a more subtle nature of body, that is, through light and air.'

§ 6. 6. To this same point some object thus: Because light in the air is either per se or per accidens. If it is per accidens: therefore it is in it through another which is its first subject, since everything per accidens is reduced to what is per se, as they say: but it will not be possible to find a mediating thing through which it is in the air: therefore it is in it per se. If it is an accident: therefore it is demonstrable of air through the form of air: and this is not true: therefore it is not an accident of air: therefore it is a body.

§ 7. 7. Also, either the same light is in the East and the West: or another generated by it. If the same: this does not seem possible to be, that the same thing be in different subjects and places, since an accident does not exceed its proper subject. But if another generated by it: therefore an accident in one subject generates a likeness to itself in another subject: therefore it touches another subject: therefore it exceeds its own.

§ 8. 8. Also, nothing reflects light except an opaque body: let us suppose, therefore, that there is a vacuum between heaven and earth: therefore light will pass through that vacuum and fill it: if therefore it were an accident, it would be necessary that it be in that vacuum without a subject, which cannot be: therefore it is a body.

§ 9. 9. Also, two accidents of the same species are not in the same subject: but two lights of the same species are unconfused in the same subject: therefore light is not an accident. Proof. The first premise is evident per se. The second is evident from Dionysius and experience: because when two candles are lit, light is multiplied from both, and when one is extinguished, it is diminished.

§ 10. These are the arguments, some of which seem to them insoluble. But we have already disputed in our treatise On the Soul, introducing all the opinions on this matter: and also whether sight occurs by emitting outward, or only by receiving inward? And there are posited very many arguments of Aristotle and Avicenna and Jacob Alkindi and the perspectivists, and Gregory of Nyssa: and therefore we will not labor further here: since here principles have been laid down by which the statements of Aristotle and Avicenna and the natural philosophers may be resolved, and it has been shown that certain false things were supposed by the perspectivists, which being changed and others posited, all the conclusions of the book of Perspectives, and On Sight, and on the fallacy of sight are maintained, without contradicting Aristotle in anything, by saying that light is an accidental form.

§ 11. To that which is objected through the first authority of Augustine, it must be said that if there is force in the words of Augustine, then from the same authority it follows that moisture is a body, which nevertheless names a quality of water. But it is clear that it shines by a received property of a body through which the body is understood: whence those words compel nothing.

§ 12. Also, the same mode of solving applies to the other things he says: for because light is a positional form in a body: therefore we imagine a body and the quantity of a body through it: and this occurs to carnal men wishing to imagine something noble: because among bodies none are found more noble than those which are luminous. Whence it must be known that Augustine is to be believed more than the Philosophers in those things which are of faith and morals, if they disagree. But if he were to speak about medicine, I would believe Galen or Hippocrates more; and if he speaks about the natures of things, I believe Aristotle more, or another expert in the natures of things.

§ 2. To that which is objected by argument, it must be said that that argument is sophistical, and this is certain among those who expound the art of the Posterior Analytics. But an accident is twofold, namely of the individual, and it happens to be present: and nothing is demonstrated of it, nor can it be demonstrated of anything: and this is light in the air. There is also an accident of the species: and this can be present per se, or be present through another: and if it is present through another, it is reducible to what is per se: just as having three angles equal to two right angles is per se in a rectilinear triangle, [but] per accidens, that is, through another, in a triangle accepted absolutely, and per accidens also in an isosceles: otherwise the redness of that woman in her cheek would have to be reduced to something per se, and this is frivolous. Whence it is clear that that argument compels nothing.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that light is a form of the air, which always comes to be when the illuminating [body] is present, and multiplies itself in the medium, and alters it when there is no direct opposition to the primary illuminating [body]: as is evident in a ray passing through a window: for from the base of the wall inside the house a straight line cannot be drawn to the sun, and yet the air is illuminated by a large ray entering through the window, and this is on account of the alteration of the neighboring air: but it is multiplied through reflection against a solid body, especially if it is polished on a flat surface: but its generation per se is from the opposition of the illuminating [body]. Whence simultaneously and at once it is generated in the East and the West, and in every part of the diaphanous from which a straight line can be drawn to the sun, and to the illuminating [body] which is its proper generating [cause]: and therefore the Commentator says on Physics IV, that illumination is the end of local motion

§ 4. just as generation is the end of alteration: and therefore both happen suddenly: because the end of motion is indivisible: but that motion is the ascent of the sun above the horizon according to circles of altitude: because according to them the declination of the ascent of horizons in which light is generated varies: and this form is always finding the diaphanous in the ultimate disposition of its susceptibility, and demanding nothing for its generation except the presence of the illuminating [body]. And all these things have been proven elsewhere: and the whole philosophy of the Arabs bears witness to these.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that if a vacuum were posited between heaven and earth, there will be no diffusion of light there, as Aristotle expressly implies, contradicting him who said that, positing a vacuum, an ant could be seen if it moved in heaven. And Aristotle says that, positing a vacuum, nothing would be seen at all: and that argument proceeds from a false supposition.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that that is invalid: because every cause generating a certain quality, when it itself is multiplied, intensifies it: and when it is diminished, remits it: and therefore there is one light in the air from two candles, but more intense than when there is only one.

§ 7. But to what could be objected against me here by someone from the Author of perspective, which is of little reputation among us, I say that insofar as what is there is about natures, he is not to be believed against the Natural philosophers: for he has no business speaking about this, whether a ray or light is a body or not, as Avaricus says in his commentary on the geometry of Euclid: and therefore he acted foolishly by inserting such things into his book. Furthermore, we are not lacking the perspectives of other Philosophers: such as of Aristotle and others who posit entirely different principles.

§ 8. But what some object, that if the ray were mixed, all things would seem to be thoroughly mixed: but it would be thoroughly mixed if light were a quality: therefore all things ought to be seen thoroughly mixed: is invalid: because even if we posit that we see by inward reception, we do not posit that colors are mixed according to the being which they have in the air: because things whose being is always in a state of becoming, are not distracted by the motion of the subject, but rather they are always becoming according to direct opposition: and this is especially the case in light and colors, as the Commentator says on the books De Anima: because they are in the medium more according to a spiritual being than other sensibles: and this is so because they are in act from the generation of light which is according to nature in the diaphanous prior to the hot and cold, and the moist and dry: because it is in it according as it agrees with the perpetual higher body: but other sensibles do not have the same generating [cause].

§ 2. But to what is first objected concerning the little cloud, it must be said that the Saints spoke by similitude: because a thin cloud elevated on high, touched by the light of the sun, receives brightness: thus that first created light did not have so great a brilliance, as is said in the Letter [Lombard's text], as the sun: and therefore it is likened to a lucid cloud, and through this similitude is called a little cloud: whence also it is said afterwards that the sun was made from it.

§ 3. But nevertheless it must be known that there are three opinions concerning that little cloud. One is that it passed into the sun: and this is true for the greatest part. Another is that it is around the sun: and this is not probable: because since the sun does not stick to the same parts of the circle, when the sun would have a distance beyond thirty degrees, it could be seen at sunrise and sunset. The third opinion is: and this I think to be truest, supposing that not all things were created together, that that little cloud was not one, but rather many; because the light which is gathered in all the stars, was then dispersed in different parts of the matter of heaven, as we see in the galaxy: and afterwards it was conglobated in the stars.

185. Genesis 2:4-5.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Six Days in Which All Things Are Said to Have Been Distinguished and Adorned Are Called Six in Several Ways

Whether the six days in which all things are said to be distinguished, and adorned, are called six in multiple ways?

§ 4. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, D, Here it must be noted that days in different ways, etc.

§ 5. For here it seems that day is not spoken of in different ways: because even in the first three days each day had a span of twenty-four hours: therefore it is spoken of in the same way before and after.

§ 6. Furthermore it is asked concerning that order of day and night, which the Master touches upon in the following chapter.

§ 7. 1. For he touches upon three orders, namely of the night following upon the preceding day, so that the day begins from morning and terminates in the morning, and of the preceding night with the following day, and the computation is made from evening to evening [and] of the third preceding night to the following day; what is the reason for this?

§ 8. 2. Furthermore, in fastings the Church does not seem to observe this: because she does not fast the preceding night, but the following: and thus her work seems to tend from light into darkness.

§ 9. Solution. To the first it must be said that day, as regards the efficient cause, is diversified in the first days and in the following ones: because in the first three days the efficient cause was one or several lights rotated around in the beginning: but in the following three it was the sun.

§ 10. Also, if it is taken in the span of a circuit according to time, it is still spoken of equivocally: because when light was made, one revolution of one or several lights was called a day: but after the sun was made, the revolution of the sun is not called a day, but rather the revolution of the equinoctial [equator] with as much of an arc of the same equinoctial as rises with as much a part of the ecliptic as the sun traverses by its proper or natural motion in the span of one revolution of the equinoctial: therefore it is evident that the span is not spoken of in the same way.

§ 11. Also, for another reason I think the Master distinguishes between those days and the following ones: because the motion of that light was not in a determined circle and therefore had only one revolution of twenty-four equal hours: but the sun makes one natural day unequal to another; because that part of the ecliptic which it describes in the span of one revolution, existing equal, rises in unequal times, and with unequal arcs of the equinoctial: which happens for two reasons, namely on account of the obliquity of the zodiac from the equinoctial circle: and on account of the obliquity of horizons from the circle of signs. Therefore the first three natural days were equal: but the following were unequal: and this is the cause of the distinction.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that the Master renders a sufficiently fitting reason for those orders: because the work of the first six days is of God who has nothing of darkness admixed: and for this reason it was to be terminated from light to light: and this is also the reason why in the works of the six days mention is nowhere made of night. But afterwards we fell from light into sin: and therefore it happened to us that day was converted into night, and the preceding day would be finished in the following night: so that the preceding night is computed as the beginning, and the beginning of the following night as the end.

§ 2. But after Christ rose in the dawn, we keep the feast as if from midday of the preceding day even to midday of the following: and we add that part on account of veneration: and this especially accords with the prophecy concerning the Savior which says, His going out is from the highest heaven, and his course even to the highest thereof because the Astronomers call the highest of heaven the middle of heaven [midheaven].

§ 3. But to what is objected concerning the fast of the Church, it must be said that fasting is satisfactory for sin: and therefore it corresponds to the order of sin, and not to the order of grace.

Articulus 4 — Whether God Created The World From Eternity, Since He Begot The Son From Eternity

Whether God created the world from eternity, since he generated the Son from eternity? And, why is it not conceded, the Father is through the Son?

§ 4. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, G, Furthermore it is to be investigated, etc.

§ 5. It is asked, I say, How did he speak, that is, generate the Word?

§ 6. For since he generated thus from eternity, it seems that he created the world from eternity.

§ 7. Also, if it is conceded that the Father works through the Son: why is it not conceded that he is through the Son, and is wise or knows through the Son?

§ 8. Because very many things have been disputed concerning this in the first book of the Sentences, let these suffice.

§ 9. Therefore it must be said to the first that it does not follow: because the generation of the Word is according as he is the Son: and therefore the creature cannot be produced with the Son from eternity: but from eternity he generated the Word in whom it was that it should be made, that is, in whom was the reason of every creature from eternity, by which rea-it would be made in time, whenever He wished, and just as God wished.

§ 1. To the other it must be said, that the supposit of the verb gives person to the verb: and that person is related in different ways to the nature of the verb, and to the determination of the verb: because when it posits a subject for the verb, the verb does not signify something whose principle is the person, but rather it signifies that which the person is: and the determination of the verb will denote the cause and principle of that essence. Hence if it were said, 'The Father is through the Son', it would be understood that the Son is the principle of the Father so that He might be, which cannot be. Similarly when it is said, 'knows', or 'is wise': although it is in the active voice, nevertheless in signification it is passive: because it signifies to receive or to have, and therefore again the determination would signify the principle of something that would be in the Father; and this cannot be: for the whole is the converse: because the Father is the principle of the Son: and all that are in the Son, He has from the Father: but with verbs signifying a work that is from the Father, the principle and cause of that work is posited there in the supposit of the verb: because the supposit is that from which the act and work proceed: and therefore the determination then cannot denote the principle: but it will denote in its oblique case a cause existing as if from another, which is called by the Masters a mediate cause: and therefore this is accepted, 'The Father operates through the Son', and not this, 'The Father is or knows through the Son'. And in this sense the Master expounds it.

181. Psalm 90:11 (Vulgate).

DISTINCTIO XIV

Divisio Textus

§ 1. And God said: Let there be a firmament, etc. Here is posited the work of the second day, in which the intermediate nature is distinguished from the higher extreme. And concerning this work the Master raises five questions: of which the first is concerning the waters above the firmament. The second, concerning the nature of heaven, there, B, But certain people [say] heaven, etc. The third, concerning the shape of heaven, there, C, It is also customarily asked, etc. The fourth, concerning the motion of heaven, there, in the middle of cap. C, It is also asked, if it stands, etc. The fifth, why the work of this day lacks a blessing, there, D, After this it is customarily asked, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Waters Are Above the Heaven or the Firmament

Whether waters are above heaven, or the firmament?

§ 1. Concerning this question we shall ask three things, namely: Are waters above heaven or the firmament? Second, According to what properties are they transferred [metaphorically]? Third, Whether that aqueous heaven has any motion, or not, and what is that motion?

§ 2. To the first one proceeds thus: It seems moreover, that waters are above heaven: because 1. Scripture says this here, which it is not permitted to contradict: because Augustine says, treating the same question, that greater is the authority of this scripture, than all the perspicacity of human ingenuity. 2. Likewise, In the hymn of the three children, Bless the Lord, all waters that are above the heavens. And, Ps. 148:4, Let all the waters that are above the heavens praise the name of the Lord. 3. Likewise, Basil says, that waters are there literally to restrain the malice of Saturn: and certain people strive to prove this: because by as much as a circle is larger, by so much more swiftly it is moved in the diurnal motion: but Saturn has the largest circle among the planets: therefore it moves most swiftly: but from motion there is heat: therefore it ought to be of maximum heat according to nature: and yet it is of maximum frigidity: therefore it seems, that this is on account of the waters which are nearer to it. 4. Likewise, Bede says that dew descends from those waters: therefore it seems, that there are not only waters there, but also resolvable ones descending to us. 5. Likewise, in the lesser world we see the cold-humid posited above the hot and the fount of heat, just as the brain above the heart: therefore since it is an exemplar of the greater world, it seems a similar thing ought to be in the greater world: therefore the cold-humid ought to be above the fount of heat which is the sun: therefore it ought to be above the heavens. 6. Likewise, the Philosophers of Egypt said, that the retrogradation of the planets is caused by vapor elevated from the Ocean, which is attracted by the planets: and after the humor is attracted they are weighed down, and by descending they recede backward: therefore if the humor of the Ocean ascends all the way there, also in the beginning of the world waters could be suspended there in vaporizable drops. 7. Likewise, Augustine in book II On Genesis says against the Philosophers, that if every body is divisible to infinity, and water is divided by rarefaction, such that it ascends to the middle interstice of the air, more divided it will ascend higher: therefore it can be divided so much, that it remains there and is diffused above the heavens: therefore also in the first condition of the world it could be suspended there.

§ 3. To this also can be adduced many authorities of the Saints: because they are found copiously.

§ 4. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. According to nature, there is one place and one nature for what is movable circularly, and another for what is movable by a straight motion: water is movable by a straight motion, whereas heaven circularly: therefore they must be ordered by distinction in one place and in another place. If therefore heaven is ordered upwards towards the empyrean, water must be ordered downwards. 2. Likewise, the heavy is not above the light: but water is heavy: therefore it is not above fire: therefore much less above heaven. 3. Likewise, the corruptible by nature is not above the incorruptible: but water is corruptible by nature: therefore it is not to be ordered by determination to a place above heaven which is incorruptible by nature. 4. Likewise, the boundless by its own boundary, is not contained in a place, unless determined to the boundable by its own boundary: but the boundable by its own boundary is the dry, and the boundless by its own boundary is the humid: therefore the humid must be located next to the dry: therefore not above heaven: because heaven is not dry. 5. Likewise, As the spiritual humid is related to the spiritual dry, so the corporeal humid to the corporeal dry: but the spiritual humid which is air, is ordered next to the spiritual dry, that is, next to fire: therefore the commiscible corporeal humid which is water, will be ordered next to the commiscible corporeal dry, which is earth: therefore not above the heavens. 6. Likewise, the Philosopher says, that the nature of a clod, and of the whole earth is the same: and the motion of a clod, and of the whole earth is the same: and the place of a clod, and of the whole earth is the same: therefore it is similar in water: therefore if the natural place of water is here next to the earth, the natural place of all water will be the same, and the natural motion to that place: therefore that which is above the heavens, if it is univocal to this water, is contained there violently, and upon the cessation of violence it descends to the place of this one. If you say, that the reason of nature is not to be sought here, but the power of a miracle, because God does whatever He wishes: this is absurd: because Augustine treating the same question in book II On Genesis, adduces the same response, and says thus: Nor let anyone say that this is done by the omnipotence of God. For it is asked how God made the natures of things, not what He may operate concerning them through a miracle of His power! 7. Furthermore, This which Basil says that they are there to restrain the malice of Saturn, seems to be false: because certain fixed stars in the firmament are most hot: yet they are more immediately conjoined to the waters than Saturn is. 8. Furthermore, If heaven is igneous, as some say, and fire especially in its own place has heat in the highest degree, and heat is consumptive of the contrary element: it seems, that of necessity such waters are consumed. If you say, that they persevere there with glacial solidity, like crystal: this again seems false, because although crystal is indissoluble, as the Philosopher seems to intend: nevertheless it is not inconsumptible by fire, whence it still follows, that it would be consumed by fire. 9. Furthermore, Demonstrations are had concerning this that vapors can ascend, and no further than into the region where they are consumed by heat: therefore it seems, that it is nothing, that there are waters there according to the letter. 10. Furthermore, What compels us to posit the element water there, since in all places above water is posited for prime matter, and not for the element? 11. Likewise, the Master said above, as it seems to some, that beyond the place of the firmament that mass was extended, which in its lower part was thicker and grosser, but in its higher part existed as rarer and lighter and more subtle, of which rarer substance certain people think were the waters which are said to be above the firmament: therefore there is already an ancient opinion, that the element water is not there, but rather a rarer, lighter, and more subtle part of prime matter.

§ 5. SOLUTION. Without prejudice, that way pleases me more, that the element water is not there, but rather a part of prime matter, which is called water: and to understand this, it must be known that when the distinction of confused matter had to be made from the higher and the lower, and of the middle from both, it could not be made through active and passive elemental qualities: because according to those, matter belongs only to the elements, as was shown above, and there is not one matter of the whole confusion: nor could it be made according to the nature of heaven alone, because thus again there would be no agreement with the elements: but it is necessary that it be distinguished according to that which agrees with both: and this is the perspicuous and luminous in itself, or by accident: and thus on the first day the luminous nature which is heaven, was distinguished from darkness, that is, the opaque nature which is the earth, and according to the opinion of Augustine, who says that all things were made simultaneously, heaven is called day by cause, and the earth night by cause. But on the second day, the nature of the middle elements between heaven and earth, and the higher nature of heaven has a distinction, and on account of its receptibility of form and mobility to a place determined by the Creator it is called water: hence the waters which are above heaven, is the crystalline heaven, which is called thus not from the nature of crystal, but from similarity, and is called vaporizable water, because as the Philosophers say, it is of such subtlety, that it is not even subjected to sight, but is comprehended by reason alone: and this will be proved below: and this exposition pleases me, on account of what Augustine says, that the beginning of Genesis is to be expounded thus, so that it may not be mocked and cast away by the Philosophers.

§ 6. But according to what properties water is there, will be clear in the following article.

§ 7. To the first therefore it must be said, that the authority of sacred Scripture is not contradicted, when it is expounded, otherwise even Augustine himself would contradict it, who found many senses of how waters could be there: one of which is, that this air is there called heaven, above whose middle zone they are suspended vaporizably. He gives another in the book of Confessions, saying that the waters which are above the heavens, are incorruptible and immortal: and this understanding which we follow here, is also that of the ancients, as is evident from the sayings above.

§ 8. To the two following authorities, it must be said that he does not speak of the element, but rather of those things concerning which it has been spoken.

§ 9. To that which is of Basil, it must be said, that he speaks from the hypothesis of certain Philosophers, who said that literally waters descend there vaporizably, and cool certain stars, and that certain others are kindled on account of the dryness of having drunk less humor: and if such a thing happens to be done, it follows that it is not unfitting, if water was above the heavens for this same purpose.

§ 10. To the saying of Bede it must be said, that he calls heaven there the middle interstice of this air, concerning which it is said, The birds of heaven ate them.

§ 11. The fifth argument is solved in the solution of the first argument.

§ 12. To the other it must be said, that those Philosophers plainly lied. But if it is objected, that also Ptolemy seems to feel this in the [Tetrabiblos]: it must be said, that he himself does not feel this except according to the effect only: nevertheless Albumasar reproves him concerning this, saying that on account of that he was not the great Ptolemy who made the Almagest: but nevertheless I do not care much about their sayings, since certain of them have lied about many other things.

§ 13. To the saying of Augustine it must be said, that he himself speaks, founding a reason against them upon the hypothesis of the Philosophers, just as Basil also does: because if their position is true, it follows that there is nothing unfitting for waters to be above the heavens.

Articulus 2 — It Is Asked According to What Property the Waters Are Above the Heaven or the Firmament

It is asked according to what property waters are above heaven or the firmament?

§ 1. Secondly it is asked, According to what properties are there waters there?

§ 2. For waters have a perspicuous [nature] receiving and holding light more than air, as the Philosopher says, and they have a fluxible humid miscible with earth, and a heavy descending downwards: but it is fitting, that according to the heavy they are not determined to this that they be above the heavens: because since the first distinction is, as Augustine says, to the natural place of each thing, it cannot be that that place is the natural place of water insofar as it is heavy: similarly neither insofar as it is commiscible with earth, because the nature of heaven is not commiscible with the elements, for otherwise it would be generated and corrupted circularly: therefore it is necessary, that it be determined upwards as to the perspicuous holding light.

§ 3. Likewise, This seems to consent to nature, that the perspicuous is in a body, as the Philosopher says, insofar as it agrees with the perpetual body above: therefore especially the perspicuous holding light, which the perspicuous of air or of fire does not do, but rather of water. Moreover, the proof of this is not only through the saying of the Philosopher: but that fire is not shining in its own sphere, except in opposition to some illuminating celestial body, Alexander the Philosopher proves by one natural reason, and another demonstrative. The natural one is this: because the rare in ultimate rarity does not shine: but fire in its own sphere, is rare in the ultimate of rarity: therefore it does not shine. The sign of this is, that fire in wood, or in oil next to a lamp where it is hotter, does not shine, but is perspicuous, and does not cover there that which is behind it: but posteriorly where it is condensed by the frigidity of the circumstanding air, it shines, and there it covers bodies which are behind it: as he himself and Avicenna say is the proper characteristic of every shining body. But the demonstrative one leading to the impossible is thus. Let it be given, that fire shines in its own sphere: therefore it illuminates the shadow which is from the interposition of the earth to the sun through all parts in circuit: therefore after the fire there would be nothing of the shadow of the earth: which is false, since it is extended all the way to the sphere of Mercury. Likewise, since the moon is after the fire, it would follow that the moon would never be eclipsed, which is after the fire: therefore fire does not hold light except in opposition to an illuminating [body]. But that air does not hold it, this is evident to sense. But that water holds it, is proved in the book On Vision through a supposition: because with some metal or white stone posited in the bottom of a vessel, and in darkness clear water poured over it, it will be seen under the light held by the water: and thus also rubies are tested which do not shine by themselves in darkness, for in water they immediately begin to shine: but this cannot be unless some light retained in the water resolves the color of the ruby, and in act makes it shine and immutate the sight.

§ 4. But against this it seems to be, that 1. Fire on account of the rarity of its substance does not shine in its own sphere, since aether is incomparably rarer than fire, aether also ought not to shine. 2. Likewise, Since the ninth heaven which is called crystalline, is more mobile than that of the stars or of the planets and more subtle, it ought not to shine: therefore it is badly said that water is transferred there according to the property of the perspicuous holding light.

§ 5. Likewise, What is the necessity of positing that aqueous heaven? For it is certain, that it is not subjected to sight, as Alpetragius says: how then is it apprehended to be? For we cannot collect the number of movables in the heavens except through instruments and sight: therefore where sight fails, there no movable will be posited. If you say, that only the Saints posited it, and not the Philosophers: this is nothing: because even Damascene says, that the Philosophers apprehended this heaven: and upon this the Astronomy of Alpetragius is adduced who objects thus: From one simple immobile immediate motor by nature there can be only one motion: the first movable is immediate to the first motor: therefore in it from the first motor there is only one motion: but the sphere of the fixed stars has two motions: therefore it is not the first movable. But that there are two motions in the sphere of the fixed stars, is evident, because in it is the diurnal motion, and furthermore there is there the motion of the stars upon the poles of the circle of signs according to Ptolemy and Aristotle in the book On the Causes of the Properties of the Elements, by one degree in a hundred years, and according to al-Battani in a somewhat lesser time, and according to Thabit according to the access and recess of the head of Aries and Libra: therefore it is necessary to posit another first movable before that one: for just as the Philosopher says, the first cause moves the first caused thing, and the first motor whoever he is, is only one: therefore it is necessary to posit a ninth heaven to which the diurnal motion is referred, which revolves upon circles equally distant from the equinoctial, and upon the poles of the equinoctial.

§ 6. SOLUTION. It seems to me it must be conceded, that water above the heavens is transferred [metaphorically] according to the perspicuous retaining light.

§ 7. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that to have light is spoken of in two ways, namely as to hold inseparably the nature of light, and in this way the empyrean and the ninth heaven are luminous: and as to shine, and this does not happen except in parts more condensed and compacted, as Avicenna says in the book On the Sufficiency of Heaven and Earth.

§ 8. To that which is asked, what necessity there is that that body be posited? It must be said, that although it cannot be apprehended by sight, nevertheless it is convinced to be by reason, which reason Alpetragius explains: although he also speaks of two heavens, to one of which the diurnal motion is referred, and to the other the motion of the oblique circle: and according to the commentary of Nicholas upon the same place, he does not understand this of the circle of signs, but rather of the eighth heaven, and the first of the ninth.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Crystalline Heaven Has Any Motion, and What That Motion Is; And How Right and Left Are Understood

Whether the crystalline heaven has any motion, and what is that motion? and, How are right and left accepted?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked concerning this body by the Masters of theology, Whether it is moved or not?

§ 2. It seems moreover, that it is not moved: because 1. It itself is uniform: therefore there is not something whence motion begins: but that in which there is not whence motion begins, that is immobile: therefore it seems to be immobile. 2. If you say, that circular motion is without beginning, and without end, just as a circle. Against this is, what the Philosopher says in II On Heaven and Earth thus: There is to an orb without doubt a diverse power, namely a right, and a left: since there are to it places of inception and standing from the work of its making. Therefore it is evident that if there is not whence motion begins from the work of its making, it will not be moved. Likewise, the Philosopher, in the same place, And again it is necessary that we estimate this in the principle of motion of an orb: for if its motion is finite in time (but its motion is infinite) it is necessarily required that of its motion there be a place where it begins: therefore since any one circulation is finite, it is necessarily required that it begin somewhere: but what is uniform on all sides, is in one ratio: therefore either it begins everywhere, or nowhere: but it is certain, that not everywhere, since this is impossible: therefore nowhere: therefore it is not moved, just as neither is the empyrean.

§ 3. ON THE CONTRARY are the reasons previously adduced.

§ 4. SOLUTION. All say, that that heaven is moved, and that it is uniform in a certain way, and not uniform in another way: uniform as to this because everywhere it is of the nature of light, but it is not uniform as to this because in one part it is more noble than in another, and there the power of the motor abides in it abundantly, and there is the place whence motion is made, and the opposite is the place of return. But what is right and left in heaven, and whether they are accepted in position only (as the Astronomers say) or in the nature of the body, is a matter of another business. Nevertheless on account of some demanding it, it must be known briefly, that if the cause of the motion of heaven and of its mobility is considered, it is necessary to give to it a right and a left in its own nature: and then the East or right will not be called [that] under which the sun rises, because under every degree of the oblique circle the sun rises: but the more noble part of heaven will be called [so], and concerning this the Masters of the Latins have said many abusive things. But the opinion of the Arabs is twofold, namely that either according to the number of movables in one circle there will be many motors: and then the motor influxes motion into the more noble place of that movable, as to the circle of signs in the head of Aries and Libra, and to the first movable in the more noble place equally distant from both poles, and to other orbs otherwise and otherwise many. Or one motor or star influxes diverse motions into the parts of the movable: and then the right or East will be the place of the star: and according to this we find Rabbi Moses [Maimonides] saying, that in the starry sphere there are many motors, and in the others one. But if we consider the effect of the stars according to relation to us, then the right of heaven will be twofold, and in the same way the left, and it will be according to immobile position only: and again the right aspect is from the East into the middle of heaven, and the left from the middle of heaven into the angle of the West, and again the right from the angle of the West into the angle of the middle of the earth beneath: therefore because with respect to opposition that quarter relates to that which is from the East into the middle of heaven, and each is looked back upon by the other and their powers are communicated: and the second left aspect is from the angle of the middle of the earth into the Eastern sign for the same cause, because through opposition the powers of the first left quarter are communicated to it: and in this way the Philosopher seems to intend in II On Heaven and Earth, and the Commentator upon the same:

because the letter says thus: From those things which we ought to estimate, is a man having a right and a left alike in figure: then he has above himself an orb. And the Commentator says, that one ought to imagine, that his head is in the higher antarctic pole hidden to us, and his feet in the arctic pole manifest to us; and his face turned to our hemisphere. For then above the right will be the first quarter ascending, and above the left descending to the West: and if he is revolved once, then above the right will be the quarter from the East into the angle of the earth, and above the left the ultimate quarter from the angle of the earth emerging into a sign above the horizon; and in this sense all Astronomers use the right and left of heaven in the division of every aspect.

Articulus 4 — Why the Heaven Is Called Fiery; And Whether It Is of the Nature of Fire

Why is heaven called igneous? and, Whether from the nature of fire?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning the second question of the Master in the letter which he touches upon, there, But certain people [say] the heaven which exceeds the spaces of the air, etc. For that this is false, is proved through all Philosophy in the book On Heaven and Earth: 1. For it is impossible, that the motion of a body of one nature be diverse according to nature. But it is certain, that the natural motion of heaven is circular, whereas the motion of fire is upwards and straight. Therefore fire and heaven and star are not of one ratio. 2. Likewise, A body perpetually remaining according to one mode and quantity, cannot be generable and corruptible in its parts: a star and the orbs of the heavens from the beginning persevere according to one motion: therefore they are not generable and corruptible by nature: but fire by nature is a generable and corruptible body: therefore those bodies are not of fire. 3. If you say, that God contains them: this is nothing: because, as Augustine says, in the first works it is asked, In what natures did God constitute the parts of the world, not what He may operate from them or in them through the power of a miracle? 4. Likewise, This does not seem to concord with the sayings of Rabanus, who in his book upon Genesis, posits a division of the heavens saying, that there are seven heavens, namely empyrean, aqueous, firmament, igneous, olympum, aethereal, aerial: therefore it seems, that the aqueous and the firmament are of another nature, than the igneous.

§ 2. Furthermore concerning this same division it is asked, Whether it is given according to something common to every heaven? 1. For heaven, as Damascene says, is the continent of visible and invisible creatures. But it is certain, that this does not apply to every heaven. Therefore by this heaven cannot be divided as commonly said. 2. Furthermore, the Philosopher says, that aether is not named except as a celestial body: therefore aethereal does not express anything but a diverse matter from the firmament and the empyrean. 3. Likewise, whence is Olympum said? For it cannot be said from mount Olympus. According to what therefore is this number of heavens taken?

§ 3. Solution. It must be said to the first thing asked, that heaven is not called igneous from the nature of fire: but because it is similar to fire in the nature of light and of shining in the stars: and in this way the Saints speak: and through this the solution of those things which are objected is evident.

§ 4. To the division of Rabanus it must be said, that he himself takes heaven commonly according as it contains and has a perspicuous [nature] susceptive of light: and he does not take it according as it contains all things, but according to containing alone: and therefore the division of Rabanus is accepted thus, that heaven either contains having light inseparably, or separably. But if it contains and has light inseparably: either therefore it has it from itself as the first cause of light, or it has it from another. If from itself: either moved, or not moved. And according to these combinations of dividing parts the whole number of the heavens is accepted. For if it contains unmoving having from itself a luminous nature inseparably, then it is the empyrean heaven. But if it contains moving having light or a luminous nature inseparably: either it has it everywhere and equally, or in some part more and in some less, because in some part according to the act of shining, in some not. If in the first way it is the crystalline or aqueous heaven. If in the second way, it is the heaven of stars, under which are comprehended the orbs of the seven planets according to Rabanus. But if it has a luminous nature from another inseparably, then this can be in two ways, namely according to the convex, or according to the concave. If according to the convex, then according to Rabanus it is called the igneous heaven. But if according to the concave, it is called Olympum: because Olympum is said here not from Olympus, but from this that Olympus is said to approach to it. But if it contains having the nature of the luminous separably: this again is according to the convex, or according to the concave, that is, according to the exterior or interior surface. If in the first way it is aethereal: because aether is taken otherwise by Rabanus, than by Aristotle, namely for the higher part of the air, which by certain Philosophers is called the region of heat: and through this the solution of the objection made to the contrary is evident. But if it is according to the concave, it is the aerial here among us.

§ 5. And if it is objected that it was proved above, that fire does not shine in its own sphere. It must be said, that nevertheless it has the nature of the luminous: because if its parts are compacted in something and thickened, they themselves will shine in it: and this air does not do, and water: but nevertheless they make the nature of the perspicuous without light, as is evident in glass, crystal, beryl.

Articulus 5 — Why a Spherical Figure Is Attributed to the Heaven; And Whether It Is the Figure of the Heaven

Why is a spherical shape attributed to heaven? and, Whether it is the shape of heaven?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning the third thing which is said, there, It is also customarily asked, Of what shape is heaven?

§ 2. This seems false what the Master says, and Augustine, and Damascene, and many other Saints, who say that heaven is of a spherical form.

§ 3. It is also asked further, Why is a spherical shape attributed to heaven?

§ 4. Solution. It must be said, that Scripture did not narrate this in the Canon, although the holy Fathers wrote this.

§ 5. To the other it must be said, that a spherical figure is in a body, just as circular in a surface. But the circular and the spherical have two properties: because they are the simplest of all figures, and because they are the most capacious: and on account of the first they are given to the body surrounding the whole.

But that it is most capacious is thus proved: For it is not understood concerning every angular figure, because a circle of such capacity can never be given, without a mathematical figure of greater capacity being able to be inscribed in it, if it is given conversely: but it is understood concerning an angular figure inscribed in a circle, whose all angles extend to the circumference. Therefore, with this noted, if it is possible that an angular figure is of the capacity of a circle, this cannot be except due to the multiplication of angles more distant from the center than the sides make: therefore the angles grow infinitely: therefore if polygonal figures reach the capacity of the circle, then they will reach it. On the contrary: Even with infinite angles existing, it is always angular: but an angle is the alternate contact of two lines: therefore that line which touches another at an angle is the chord of some portion of the circle: therefore it does not recede from the center as much as the portion of the circumference to which it is subtended: therefore it does not reach the capacity of the circle: therefore the circle is the most capacious of figures: therefore it most fittingly pertains to the first body surrounding all.

Articulus 6 — Whether the Heaven Is Moved; And Whether the Principle of the Motion of the Heaven Is the Same According to the Philosophers and the Theologians

Whether the heaven is moved? and, Whether the principle of the motion of heaven is the same according to Philosophers and Theologians?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, § 2: It is also accustomed to be asked, If it stands, whether the heaven is moved? etc.

Concerning this which he says here, it is not necessary to dispute here. But it is to be noted, that according to Aristotle, no body is moved in its place, whose mover is not a spiritual substance: for fire is moved to a place, and other elements by those generating them per se, and they rest in their places: but heaven is moved in its place: therefore its mover is a spiritual substance.

Likewise, Avicenna objects, that nothing is moved according to nature unless to some position, and from that one motion in number; and the truth is obtained through induction: but stars are moved to any position, and from that one motion in number: therefore they are not moved by a mover who is nature alone: but by a mover who is a spiritual substance. And this seems to be what Jerome wants in the Gloss on the beginning of Ecclesiastes, on that, "The spirit goes around surveying all things." He called the sun itself a spirit, which animates, and breathes, and sees, and completes the annual orbits by its course.

Likewise, the objection of Aristotle is to this: because every mover moving a body diversified through virtues ordered to the inception of local motion in one place rather than in another, is a spiritual substance: but the mover of heaven moves a body disposed right and left, which are the virtues disposing to the inception of motion and return. And therefore all the Arab Philosophers said and proved in many ways, that heaven is moved by a soul joined to it: and this Aristotle says, and Avicenna, and Averroes, and Al, and gazelAlpharabius, and Maurus Albu, and masarRabbi Moses, and that it has a triple mover, namely the first cause which is the desired of the first intelligence which is full of forms explicable through the motion of its orb: but because intelligence is simple, therefore it cannot intend particular motion in this and that position, and therefore the third mover joined to heaven is the soul according to them, and the nature of heaven is a disposition to motion: because it is naturally carried circularly, and in the circuit the spirit goes, in composition there is no contrariety: and therefore that motion is without labor and pain, as they say, and does not induce weariness as the motion of the soul by which it moves our body. Therefore in this all agree, and that the virtue of the first mover is in all lower things, and of the second in the lower things to it, and thus the descent. But that this whole thing is a cursed error, is clear through Damascene saying thus: No one therefore truly thinks to say, however many heavens or luminaries exist: for they are inanimate and insensible. that they are not moved except by divine command, and will: and that the reasons above mentioned do not prove, except that they are not moved by a nature which is the form of a moving body: and this also other Philosophers say like Astronomers, and Ptolemy, and Albategni, and Albumasar, and Geber, and many others.

Therefore concerning the opinion of Jerome, it is to be said, that he takes this from the opinions of Philosophers. Augustine, however, touches upon this question on Genesis, and leaves it discussed. Elsewhere also it is much disputed concerning this Matter and prolixly: and there we followed the sayings of certain Masters of theology, who wished to reduce the opinions of natural things to theology by saying that Angels serve God in the motions of the heavens, which they are called souls by them: but nothing is said so securely, as that they are moved by the will of God alone, and their own nature not opposing the motion.

Concerning the manner also of the motion by which they are moved, there is a dispute among the wise: but this will be determined below in the adornment of the fourth day.

Articulus 7 — Why In The Work Of This Day It Is Not Said, God Saw That It Was Good

Why in the work of this day is it not said, "God saw that it was good"?

Then it is asked fifthly, there, After this it is usually asked, Why is it not said here, "God saw that it was good," as in the works of the other days?

And the Master assigns an allegorical cause for this. However, in the histories, the literal and true cause is touched upon, namely that the work of distinction of the middle nature is not completed unless the middle is distinguished from both extremes: and therefore this distinction is not completed except on the third day: and then it is blessed when the waters are distinguished, and the other two elements from the earth, as the Master will say below. Because in the distinction of the water is understood the distinction of fire and air when they are freed from the waters and are cleared: then, therefore, with the distinction perfected, they receive a blessing just as the other works.

Articulus 8 — What the Sufficiency of the Works of Distinction Is, and With Respect to What It Is Taken

What is the sufficiency of the works of distinction, and according to what is it taken?

Concerning the first, thus it is proceeded: 1. Fire and air are elements: therefore they require distinction just as water and earth: therefore the work of distinction is not sufficiently determined in three days.

1. Likewise, just as the firmament and the aqueous heaven are heavens: so also the sphere of Saturn, and Jupiter, and Mars, the Sun, and Venus, Mercury, and the Moon: therefore they require distinction just as the firmament and the aqueous: therefore the work of distinction is insufficiently posited.

Solution. The work of distinction, as was said before, is nothing other than the determination of the general principles of the world to form and to place, from which are the moving, or moved, or both in those things which are generated and corrupted: but this can be, either that they are moving to generation and to the mixable, or that they are moving entering into the constitution of the generated through substance. If in the first way: then the nature of the heaven is universally in all spheres and stars, and these are distinguished in two ways, from the extreme, and from the middle, as was evident above. But if the moving to generation and commixture is entering into the substance of the generated: this is in two ways: because either active spiritually moist and dry: just as with the active simply which is hot, it is spiritually dry in fire, and spiritually moist in air: or active in a certain respect, which is: cold which is said to be active in a certain respect, and it stops motion by its action, and induces immobility: and with that is corporeal moist in water, and corporeal dry in earth: and therefore the Philosopher says, that the matter of all generated things is more from water and earth[187].

Therefore it must be said to the first, that fire and air are understood as distinct, when they are serene, free from others.

To the second it must be said, that the spiritual spheres of the planets and stars are of the adornment: because they are ordered per se to the diversity of figures according to the species of the generated with respect to the mixture of complexion which is common to all.

Articulus 9 — Whether Plants Pertain to Ornament or to Distinction

Whether plants pertain to adornment or to distinction?

Secondly, it is asked concerning plants, about which it is treated here, whether they pertain to adornment.

And it seems that they do:

1. For it does not seem that the cause commonly touched upon, that they pertain to disposition because they adhere to the earth by their roots, is valid: because according to this, since stars are not moved except by the motion of their sphere, because they adhere to the spheres as parts to a whole, even stars would not pertain to adornment, which is false.
2. Likewise, stars are inanimate, as the Saints say: but plants at least have a part of the soul's part: therefore, they pertain much more to adornment than stars, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said according to Augustine, that plants are produced here not by the seminal power: and therefore he explains in the third book on Genesis, "Let the earth bring forth grass," etc., that is, let it receive the power of producing: and this is hinted at in the second chapter, where it is said that he made the shrub of the field before it arose on the earth.

The reason for this according to Augustine can be that for the production of plants the motion of the stars with the seminal power suffices, and a generating cause equivocally suffices for them because of the similarity of the matter of their bodies in their parts: and therefore they do not pertain to adornment, since adornment is properly the form given to the world at its beginning for univocal generation which otherwise could not occur: for man and horse could not be generated by the power of the stars through any mixture, unless there were a seed cut off from something of the same species, although some philosophers have said the contrary: yet the better ones say that complete animals having great diversity in organs, like man, horse, and donkey, and the like, could not be made except from something of their species: and therefore plants do not pertain to the adornment of the world: and this reason holds, even if it is said according to other Saints that plants were produced on the third day.

To the objection, it must be said that it is true that planets and stars are not moved except by the motion of some sphere: but it is not proven whether they always stand in the same part of the sphere. For many contradict this opinion: but this is not the present intention: but whatever it may be, they are movers towards the special forms and figures in which the world is ordered: and therefore they pertain to adornment.

To the other, it must be said that according to Gregory, it is rather greenness than soul by which plants live: and therefore the Philosopher says that they have a part of the soul's part: because although they have the works of the vegetative, they have them more by the mode of nature than of soul: and therefore a certain Philosopher said that the generation of plants was for an imperfect world, but animals for a world already perfected.

Articulus 10 — Whether Harmful Plants Were Then Made Like the Others

Whether harmful plants were then made like others?

Whether harmful plants were then made like others?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning harmful plants, whether they were then made?

And it seems that they were not: because
1. Punishment is not prepared before sin: but the harmfulness of plants is for punishment: therefore they were not made harmful before sin.

1. Likewise, all things obeyed Adam in the first state at his command: therefore then nothing was harmful to him.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Poisonous moisture is natural to certain plants, and the shape of sharp angles is natural: since therefore each thing was made then in its nature, it seems that the poisonous moisture with the shape of the sharp angle of thorns was then made: therefore harmful things were then made.

Solution. The common opinion is that they were then made: but they could not harm except through sin: for Isidore says that if Adam had not sinned, neither would fire burn, nor thorn prick, nor sword cut, nor could any other harm be inflicted upon him.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 11 — Whether the Waters Were Gathered into One Place

Whether the waters are gathered into one place?

Next, it is asked concerning the second point that the Master touches upon, there E, § 2: If, however, it is asked, Where are they gathered, etc.

For what the Master says does not seem to be fitting: because it is determined that the more an element is of a rarer substance, the more space it occupies: since therefore water is of a rarer substance than earth, it could not be that the earth, subsiding, received it.

187. Aristotle, Meteorology 4.12.

Solution. It must be said that water is considered in two ways, namely according to the nature of the unbounded gross moist, it is not terminated everywhere by the earth through a circle: for because it is a gross element, it does not complete a spherical figure, but a circular one: because it does not occupy as much space as air and fire: and therefore the earth also has a smaller place: because it is located in the middle around the center. Insofar as it is an unbounded moist with its own boundary, it flows to the earth through a circle from the North to the South: because in the North there is more cold than even in the South in the uninhabitable part of the earth towards the pole: and this happens because of the shortness of the sun's diameter in the southern signs. Since therefore cold induces aqueous moisture, it is clear that water abounds more towards the North than towards the South. And this is the cause: because the Philosopher says in the book of Meteorology that the sea flows from the North to the South. Insofar as it has a commiscible incorporable moist, it flows through the mouth of the earth and mixes with the earth for the generation of elements.

To that which is objected, it must be said that the Master calls the subsidence of the earth, when first expanded by vapors and the mixture of moisture, dried, it is contracted to the center: because then it freely left the circle to the Ocean which is called Amphitrite, because it flows circularly around the earth, as has been said.

Articulus 12 — It Is Asked With Respect to What the Division of the Earth into Asia, Africa, and Europe Is Taken

It is asked, By what is the division of the earth into Asia, Africa, and Europe taken?

Then it is asked concerning the third thing which it touches upon, there, E, towards the end: Since many things are agreed to be seas, etc.

For that place, as it is held in the beginning of Ecclesiastes, is the Ocean Sea. Whence it is said there: All rivers run into the sea, and the sea does not overflow: to the place from which the rivers come, they return, etc.

According to this, the reason for the division of the lands into Asia, Africa, and Europe is asked. For that division is not from rivers, but from seas, as it seems: therefore it seems that the seas are not contained.

To this it must be said that the division of the earth is twofold: one of which is according to the great circles of the heavens by which the surfaces are understood to extend from semicircle to semicircle: and thus Boethius divides in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy into four quarters. One semicircle makes the surface of the horizon of the world, and the other cutting it in the surface of the center of the earth makes the equinoctial. But our habitable quarter is divided into Asia, Africa, and Europe.

And Augustine places the reason for the division and the solution of the objection in book XVI of the City of God, saying thus: Those which seem to call half the world Asia, from the South through the East to the North it reaches, but Europe from the North to the West, and Africa from the West to the South. Two hold, Europe and Africa: but the other half Asia alone. But therefore those two parts are made, because between each the Ocean enters whatever waters wash the lands, and this makes the great sea for us. Wherefore if you divide the world into two parts, of the East and of the West, Asia will be in one, but in the other Europe.

From these things the solution to the questions is clear.

But if it is objected that the sea does not seem to be the proper place of waters, because the proper place of water is the place of the element: but the element of water is simple and tasteless: the sea, however, is salty and composite: therefore it is not the proper place of waters,

It must be said that the sea is mixed with burnt earth by accident, where it touches the land, but in retreat from the land it is tasteless: and this is taken from the saying of the Philosopher in I of the Animals where he says thus: Some marine animal is greater than a blooded animal: although it lacks blood, and this is rare, like certain fishes called malachie. For this kind increases in hot places, and is more in the open sea than near the shores, and especially in places where tasteless waters multiply. And this is clear, that tasteless water is in the open sea far from the shores or coasts, for

The sea has shores, but the other rivers have banks.

DISTINCTIO XV

Divisio Textus

It follows, God said: Let there be great lights, etc. In this distinction, two things are said, namely the origin of three days: and at the end, the opinions of the Saints are explained, whether all things were made simultaneously, or not. There, G, § 2: for in this matter, etc.

In the first, there are three parts according to the threefold adornment of the three days: and the division is evident in the Letter.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Stars Pertain to Ornament

Whether the stars pertain to adornment?

Whether the stars pertain to adornment?

A doubt arises concerning the adornment of the fourth day from what is said on the fourth day, "Let there be lights."

And five questions are asked concerning the stars:
The first of which is, Whether they pertain to adornment?
The second, Why are the sun and moon called great lights?
The third, What is here called the firmament?
The fourth, How are they for times and signs?
The fifth, Whether they have any causality over free will?

To the first, it is objected thus:
Of whatever body the whole does not pertain to adornment, neither is a part of it appointed for adornment: but the circles of the spheres according to themselves do not pertain to adornment: therefore neither do the parts. The first is evident from the foregoing in which the whole and the parts are disposed by one disposition of any body. The second is evident from this, that a star is said by all Philosophers to be a part of the orb.

If you say that some things pertain to adornment, insofar as adornment signifies beauty, but some to the determination of species: and because the stars are luminous and the lights of the world, therefore they pertain to adornment, as the Master seems to say: because in their light other things are seen. That is very doubtful which is supposed: because many Philosophers say that none of the stars has light except from the sun: and to name some, Aristotle says this at the beginning of book III on the Properties of planets and elements. And Avicenna says that all have color, but not light except from the sun. And Messehalach in the book on the Moz of the orb, and he presents several figures for this: Therefore this statement is nothing.

If you say that they lie, because Scripture says, "lights." Against this—Even the moon is called a light, and yet we clearly see in a solar eclipse that it is black and not luminous: therefore it is doubtful what is supposed as certain, and the better Philosophers say the contrary.

Solution. It must be said, as pertains to this passage, that the stars therefore pertain to adornment, as we said above, because their formation is such that they move to determinate species. However, how they are moved in their orbs is another matter: since this cannot be proven without demonstration. Hence I well concede that there is no cause which is posited as a cause: but this is true, that whether under their own light or under another's, they contribute to the appearance of the beauty of the lower things.

Articulus 2 — Why the Sun and the Moon Are Called the Great Luminaries; And Whether the Moon Was Made Full, or First, Namely at Its Kindling

Why are the Sun and Moon called great luminaries? And, whether the Moon was made full, or first, namely in its ignition.

Secondly, it is asked, Why are the Sun and Moon called great luminaries?

For that the Sun is called great, this does not have a question: because the Sun is great in quantity and light: but the Moon is small in quantity, although it is near, and therefore seems greater than some other stars, and it is small in light: therefore it seems that it is wrongly called great.

Again, it is asked about the Moon, Whether it was made full or first, namely in its ignition.

But if first: then it is imperfect: therefore God made something imperfect. If full: then another translation seems to deceive, which says that He made the moon in the beginning of the night: for it does not first appear in the beginning of the night, since it is new.

Solution. Concerning the quantities of the luminaries, different things are written by the Philosophers: but in this they agree, that the sun is much greater than the earth: which is proven by the shadow of the earth which extends into a point or cone, which would not be if the earth were equal to or greater than the sun. That the shadow of the earth extends into a cone is evident from this: because otherwise it would eclipse many fixed stars every night: for if it were equal to or greater than the sun, the shadow would never end, but would be projected infinitely, or up to the fixed stars. However, the Moon is called great in effect, although it is not great in quantity, and therefore it is called the second sun by the Philosopher: it has especially the power to move earthly things, and especially human things, because it is nearer.

To the other, it must be said that some have said both. But if it is said to be made new: then what is objected does not follow: because its natural perfection is to receive increments of light according to its distance from the sun: hence it is not called imperfect when it has that which it ought to have by substance.

Articulus 3 — What Is Here Called the Firmament

What is here called the firmament?

Thirdly, it is asked what is here called the firmament?

For if the firmament is called the heaven of the fixed stars, this is not fitting: because the sun, and the moon, and certain other stars, namely the five planets, are not placed in the heaven of the fixed stars.

But it must be said that if we were to follow Ptolemy and Nicholas in the commentary on the Almagest, and Messehalach, we would posit, besides the empyrean heaven which the Philosophers did not know, ten heavens: of which the first is that which revolves over the equinoctial poles, and revolves every star with a diurnal motion. The second, however, is the non-starry heaven which revolves over the poles of the oblique circle, that is, the ecliptic, and revolves every star from the West to the East according to the quantity of its circle: because it moves with equal speed according to the said Philosophers, and also according to Thebit, the Moon, Saturn, and the fixed star: but that the Moon completes its circle in twenty-eight days, Saturn in almost thirty years, and the fixed star in thirty-six thousand years, this happens because in such a proportion of quantity, the quantity of one circle surpasses the circle of another, although the spaces they traverse every natural day are equal. The third orbit is of the fixed stars existing on one surface: not fixed because they do not move, but fixed because they do not change the images and distances of their positions relative to each other, as is proven in the Almagest. The fourth is the orbit of Saturn. The fifth is the orbit of Jupiter. The sixth of Mars. The seventh of the Sun according to the said Philosophers. The eighth of Venus. The ninth of Mercury. The tenth of the Moon. However, Geber in a certain commentary on the Almagest holds a singular way concerning Mercury and Venus: because he places them above the Sun: and then according to him, the order is changed concerning those two, but not the number: and therefore it must be said that according to sacred Scripture, the whole nature of the fifth body is called the firmament: but among the Philosophers, the firmament is called the eighth sphere ascending upwards.

Whether, however, the whole is a continuous body and one, or diverse, and of longer length and more proper, requires a long discourse and many demonstrations: and this pertains to another business.

Articulus 4 — How the Sun and the Moon Are for Signs and for Times

How are the Sun and Moon signs and times?

Fourthly, it is asked, How are they signs and times?

1. For either as a sign which is a cause, or not. If so: therefore since motion is necessary, it seems that sign is necessarily the cause of things, which is not said by any of the Catholics. But if it is a sign, not a cause: therefore that which is signified will be reduced to another which is the cause of that signified: but this cannot be unless it is immortal and perpetual and the first body: therefore some such body is before the heaven, which is false: therefore it seems that it is a sign and a cause.
2. Likewise, even Augustine seems to say that they are causes. For he says thus in Book V of the City of God: It cannot be said altogether absurdly that certain sidereal influences avail for the differences of bodies alone, just as in the solar accesses and recesses we see even the times of the year vary, and in the lunar increases and decreases certain kinds of things are increased and diminished, such as sea urchins, shells, and the wondrous tides of the Ocean.
3. Likewise, among the causes of the restless generation and corruption in II of Generation and Corruption, the continuous carrying of the sun in the oblique circle is posited: therefore it seems that they are signs and causes.
4. Likewise, of a body having one mode in motion and being, it is to rule a body having a different mode in motion and being; but the heaven and stars have one mode in motion and being, and they are not elemented elements: therefore it seems that these lower things are ruled by those.
5. Likewise, the Philosopher in the book On Animals says that the impregnation and birth of all things occur according to the carrying of the stars: therefore it seems that they rule and signify as causes.
6. Likewise, in the Letter here we have that they are signs of rains and fair weather: and the same says Damascene: but by the elevation of vapors rains are made: therefore they are also causes of the elevation of vapor: but the elevation of the lower is the cause of the mixture of elements: therefore they are also causes of mixtures: therefore also of their generation consequently.

I help. I think that it must be conceded that they are signs and moving causes of corruptible lower things.

To this, however, which is objected, that they are necessary causes, it must be said that it is of no value: because although the stars are moved in one way, they do not regard the lower things in one way: but also the lower things are not moved in one way: and therefore the effects of the stars can be impeded by contrary dispositions. And this is what Ptolemy says in the Centiloquium, that a wise man rules the stars, namely by disposing bodies with contrary dispositions to which the star moves.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Stars Have Dominion over Free Will

Whether the stars have dominion over free will?

Whether the stars have dominion over free will?

Fifthly, it is asked whether the stars have power over the free will of man?

It seems that they do not: because
1. Damascene says that they are in no way causes of our actions.

1. Likewise, Augustine in Book V of The City of God labors in many ways against this, saying that the wills of souls are not subjected to the positions of the stars.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The will greatly depends on the complexions of bodies: therefore, if they have powers over the complexions of bodies, they also seem to have power over the intellect of the soul and free will.

1. Likewise, we see astronomers respond concerning those things which are subject to free will, such as peace and war, the depopulation of lands and construction, and the like, and this according to the considerations of the stars. Therefore, since they frequently pronounce the truth, it seems that they are causes of those things.
2. Likewise, Aristotle in the book On Causes says that the properties of the elements are empty and lands are depopulated at the conjunction of two stars, namely Jupiter and Saturn: therefore, it seems that they have causality over free will.

Solution. It must be said that they have no causality over free will according to the sayings of the Saints: and even the Philosophers do not say that they have causality over free will except as was proven first, namely by consequence, insofar as free will is drawn by complexion to the inclination of certain acts. To all other things Augustine says that such revelations are made rather by demons than by the motion of the superiors. However, we can say that nothing prohibits the weakness of the process of the whole life according to strength from being signified, aided, and impeded by the stars, but not free will: yet in such a way that it is understood only in bodily acts, and that causality begins from the body, and is in the soul only by inclination.

Articulus 6 — Why the Ornament of the Air and of the Water Is Made in One Day; And Why Creeping Thing Is Said; And Why Fire Does Not Pertain to Ornament

Why is the adornment of air and water made in one day? and, Why is it called reptile? and, Why does fire not pertain to adornment?

Why is the adornment of the air and the water done on one day? And, Why is it called a creeping thing (reptile)? And, Why does fire not pertain to the adornment?

§ 1. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says there, Then God also said: Let the waters produce the creeping thing, etc.

§ 2. And two things are inquired here, namely, why is the adornment of the air and water done on one day? And, Why is it called a creeping thing?

§ 3. As to the first, one proceeds thus: 1. Two divided elements ought to have distinct days in the adornment: air and water are divided elements: therefore they ought to be adorned on two days.

§ 4. 2. Also, birds and fishes rest on the earth: therefore it seems that they pertain to the adornment of the earth.

§ 5. Also, Why does fire not have a special adornment?

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that water and air agree in a passive quality which is moisture, and similarly in the property of transparency: and birds and fishes are also near to one another in matter: for birds are, as they say, from vaporizable moisture, which approaches the nature of air: while fishes are from waters growing fat underneath, and subsisting by coagulation: and for this reason they have their adornment on a single day.

§ 7. To the other argument it must be said that the place of immobility is never assigned for the adornment, but rather the place of motion: but the places of motion of fishes and birds are the air and the water.

§ 8. To that which is inquired secondly concerning creeping things, it is said that creeping thing (reptile) is spoken of in many ways, as is gathered from the book On Animals, namely because it snatches itself by the force of fins, as fishes: or because by the force of the mouth, as certain worms: or because by the force of ribs, as certain serpents: or because by the force of rings which it contracts and extends, as those having ringed bodies: but in the first way a creeping thing is taken here.

§ 9. To the other argument it must be said that fire has a consumptive quality: and therefore nothing animated lives in it: for it is false what some say concerning the salamander.

Articulus 7 — What Difference There Is Between Beasts And Cattle And Animals

What is the difference between beasts (bestiae), beasts of burden (jumenta), and animals (animalia)? And, Why does he not make mention of amphibious animals, that is, of doubtful life, namely partly terrestrial and partly aquatic, and why does he also not make mention of minerals?

§ 10. Thirdly, Why is there no mention of minerals among the adornment of the elements?

§ 11. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, It follows: God said: Let the earth produce, etc.

§ 12. Concerning the adornment of the earth three things are inquired here: and the first is, What is the difference between beasts of burden, beasts, and animals?

§ 13. Second, Since there are many genera of animals, because Aristotle says that nature does not proceed from the marine to the terrestrial except through a mean, why does he himself not make mention of the intermediate animals between the aquatic and the terrestrial?

§ 14. TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said that beasts of burden (jumenta) are called in histories as it were helps (juva-menta), which were created for the help of labor: for it is a genus of animals. But beast (bestia) is called as it were vast (vastia), which harms with teeth or claws. But cattle (pecora) are called, as Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, because by such things the ancients acquired money (pecunia).

§ 15. TO THE SECOND it must be said that Moses does not intend to speak here except of the general differences of animals, which are the aquatic, the flying, and the walking.

§ 16. TO THE THIRD it must be said that minerals do not have any form except one following upon the commingling of the elements: and therefore they do not pertain to the adornment, but to the disposition: nor yet is mention made of them there, because they are hidden in the earth, and only manifest things were expounded to an uninstructed people.

§ 17. But concerning harmful animals, and those which can be born by equivocal generation by the power of the stars or by putrefaction, he determines suitably enough in the Letter of the text.

§ 18. But concerning this which follows about the opinion of Augustine, it has been disputed above.

§ 19. Also concerning the rest of the Sabbath, as much as pertains to this place, what is said in the Letter of the text is sufficient, and the remainder is had upon the third precept in the third book of the Sentences.

§ 20. But concerning all these things there exist other questions compiled by us more prolixly, in which there are certain things which are not contained here.

DISTINCTIO XVI

DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 21. Having traversed these things which above concerning the creation of man, etc. Here begins the third part of this tractate on creatures: in which the Master treats of the creature which is composed of the spiritual and the corporeal.

§ 22. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he sets forth his state before sin. But in the second his fall into sin, and his state in sin, which begins below, Distinction XXII, there, A, Seeing therefore the devil, etc.

§ 23. The first of these is divided into three: in the first of which the formation of the man is treated. In the second, concerning the formation of the woman, Distinction XVIII, there, A, In the same paradise also, etc. In the third, concerning the generation which would have been from both, if they had not sinned, Distinction XX, there, A, After this it must be seen, etc.

§ 24. The first of these has two distinctions, in the first of which he treats of the formation of man as to the conformity of the image, which a work receives from the worker. In the second, concerning the material origin according to the soul and the body, there, Distinction XVII, A, Here concerning the origin of the soul, etc.

§ 25. In this distinction four things are contained: in the first of which he says that man was made to the image. In the second chapter, what is called and in how many ways image and likeness? there, B, But the image, etc. In the third, he excludes certain false expositions concerning the conformity of the image, and posits the true one, there, C, around the beginning: Whence there were some, etc. In the fourth and last, he states the difference between the image which is the Son, and the image which is man, there, H, Wherefore man is also called an image, etc.

§ 26. And through this the sentence concerning this matter is evident as to the created image, concerning which very many things have been said in the first book of the Sentences, Distinction III: and concerning the uncreated image in the same book, Distinction XXXI: and,

§ 27. Whether an Angel is to the image? above, in this second book of the Sentences, Distinction VI, and I do not wish to repeat this.

Articulus 1 — Whether Any Creature Is Conformed to God According to the Image

Whether any creature is conformed to God according to the image?

§ 28. But four things are inquired here around this first point, namely, Whether any creature is or can be conformed to God according to the image? Second, Whether every creature is conformed to God according to the image? Third, Whether every rational creature is equally to the image? Fourth, Whether man and woman equally?

§ 29. As to the first, one proceeds thus: 1. Hilary says, An image is an indifferent species of that which is imitated. But man is not an indifferent species of the same thing which he imitates. Therefore he is not the image of God, nor can he be.

§ 30. 2. Still further, Hilary says that an image is an imaged and indiscernible likeness of one thing to a thing to be equaled. But man or any creature does not equal God. Therefore it cannot be an image.

§ 31. 3. Also, There is no creature but that it is infinitely distant: therefore there is no creature which can be an indiscernible likeness.

§ 32. 4. Also, Augustine in a sermon On the Image, makes a distinction between equality, and image, and likeness, saying that where there is a likeness, there is not continuously an equality: but conversely where there is an equality, there is continuously a likeness. Also, Where there is a likeness and equality, there is not continuously an image: but conversely where there is an image, there is an equality and likeness: therefore an image presupposes equality to itself. But no creature is equal to God: therefore no creature can be an image of God.

§ 33. 5. Also, Isaiah 40:18: What image will you set up for Him, namely for God? Therefore He can have no image.

§ 34. 6. Also, Of those distant to infinity, one is not the image of another. God and the creature are distant to infinity: therefore no creature can be the image of God.

§ 35. ON THE CONTRARY: Let us make man to our image, etc. And very many other authorities concerning this are found.

§ 36. Solution. To this it must be said that there is an image of equiparance (absolute equality), and an image of likeness through imitation. It must be said therefore that the creature cannot be an image of equiparance, but an image of likeness through imitation in this way which was said above, that a hierarchy is in the likeness of God ascending proportionally, and to God there is likeness and unity. And through this the solution to almost the whole is evident.

§ 37. But to the first it must be said that an indifferent species is spoken of in two ways, namely indifferent in the contact of the imitator to that which it imitates: and thus man is an indifferent species: because by leading into the exemplar, he attains it by imitating proportionally to himself. A species is also called indifferent through substance and essence: and thus only the Son is an indifferent species with the Father.

§ 38. To another argument it must be said that there is a co-equation of sufficiency for leading into another: and there is a co-equation of the fulfillment of equiparance. The co-equation of the sufficiency of leading into another is in a thing, when it has those things by which it sufficiently leads into the other. Thus an image of likeness is co-equated to the exemplar: because there is in it something responding to the distinction of the persons, and something to the order of nature, and something to equality, and something to the identity of essence, as was held in the first book of the Sentences: but the co-equation of equiparance no image has except the one which is the Son.

§ 39. To another argument it must be said that an indiscernible likeness is that which by representing proportionally shows the exemplar: and this is the created image; or indiscernible through substance: and thus only the Son. Whence some say that the definitions of Hilary are not understood of the created image, but only of the uncreated. And this is true if they are taken strictly and properly. But if the words are taken broadly, nothing prohibits them from being understood even of the created.

§ 40. To another argument it must be said that there is an equality of configuration, and an equality of nature. The equality of configuration outwardly suffices for the notion of an image. For that a statue be the image of Hercules, it is not necessary that it be of the same nature and that it live: but that, existing smaller and of an inferior nature, it be similarly figured to him. And thus man is said to have an equality which is imitated in the spiritual configuration of the powers of the soul. But the Son has the figure and nature of the substance.

§ 41. To another argument it must be said that Isaiah is speaking of a corporeal image.

§ 42. To another argument it must be said that God and the creature, as Creator and creature, are distant to infinity: but in the ratio of an exemplar he says approaching to us, and drawing near to us.

Articulus 2 — Whether Every Creature Is Conformed to God According to the Image, or Is to the Image of God

Whether every creature is conformed to God according to the image, or is to the image of God?

§ 43. Secondly it is inquired, Whether every creature is to the image of God?

§ 44. And it seems that it is: 1. For to an image of likeness (as was held) only four things are required, namely the distinction of some three things, and their unity according to substance, and order, and equality: but in every thing it is possible to find the one, the true, and the good: and these three are distinct, and the same in the substance of the suppositum: and they are ordered, because according to the ratio of intention the one is prior to the true, and prior to the good: and they are equal, because they are converted upon each other according to supposita: therefore it seems, since these are in every thing, that every thing was made to the image of God.

§ 45. 2. Also, Boethius seems to say this in the book On the Consolation of Philosophy, in those words: O Thou who governest the world by perpetual reason. And below: Thou bringest forth all things from a supernal Exemplar. Thyself most beautiful, bearing the beautiful World in mind, and forming it in a similar image, And commanding the perfect parts to complete a perfect whole.

§ 46. 3. Also, A confused likeness does not lead into a thing except confusedly: but by the mediation of creatures the Philosophers came to God not confusedly: therefore in all creatures there is also not a confused likeness, but a distinct one. If it be said that the Philosophers did not know the Trinity, but the divinity: this seems to be against Augustine, who said that they knew the Father and the Son.

§ 47. Solution. In the first book of the Sentences it was shown what is called a vestige, and in what it differs from an image. Whence I say that in the irrational creature there is nothing but a confused likeness of the persons, but an express notion of the divinity.

§ 48. To the first therefore it must be said that the one, the true, and the good, insofar as they are among the first things (just as was noted at the end of the first book of the Sentences), do not differ except by relation to the efficient, or formal exemplar, or final, disposing, efficient causes: and therefore the one does not add upon the other except the notion of respect, and therefore they are not truly those three: as are memory, intelligence, and will.

§ 49. Also, The one does not add upon being except in division, and not any form: but memory adds upon the mind a certain property, by which it is made a determinate power: and therefore it is evident that there is confusion in the distinction of these three.

§ 50. Furthermore, The soul is called an image, because it is capable of God through beatitude, and can be united in the acts of grace: and these things are not found in the irrational creature.

§ 51. Also, Augustine says that the image is in the soul insofar as it is immortal: and if it were not immortal, it would not be an image: and this again is not found in those three. It is evident therefore that they express a confused likeness.

§ 52. Also, The one in order does not proceed from another, but rather adds to another: and the one relates to another as a subject, and the one is in the true and the good, and the true in the good, as a subject: and such an order is not in the divine persons according to the order of nature which is there. Whence it is evident also that there is confusion in the order of these three.

§ 53. To another argument it must be said that Boethius, by an extension of the name, takes the image for the ideated thing brought over from the idea.

§ 54. To another argument it must be said (as was first proved) that the Philosophers never knew the persons except confusedly, and not under their proper notion.

Articulus 3 — Whether Every Rational Creature Is Equally to the Image of God

Whether every rational creature is equally to the image of God?

§ 55. Thirdly it is inquired, Whether every rational creature is equally to the image?

§ 56. But it seems that it is not: because 1. Gregory said above: By as much as the nature is more subtle in an Angel, by so much more is the image of God at the same time insinuated as impressed in him: therefore it seems that an Angel is more to the image of God, than man.

§ 57. 2. Also, To hold the knowledge of God and of oneself in oneself belongs to memory according to Augustine, and to intuit oneself in God belongs to intelligence, and never to not love God in oneself through a natural love belongs to the will: but all these things the Angel has deiformly, and this without inquiry and study: therefore it seems the Angel is more to the image, than man.

§ 58. ON THE CONTRARY is what is held below, where the Master says, that he formed the woman from the side of the man for this reason, so that the image of God might appear in this in man, that just as God is the principle from which are all things, so man would be the principle from which are all things of his genus: but this is found in no Angel: therefore it seems that the Angel is not so to the image as man.

§ 59. Solution. It must be said that this whole question is determined from the things said above in Distinction VI: because if the image of likeness alone is considered, then the Angel, according to the saying of Gregory, is an image even more express than man: and it is false what some say, that the Angel is a seal instead of a more express image. But if it is considered not only in the natural powers, in which the spiritual substance is capable of God, but in conformity to the ratio of a principle which is God according as He is and is one, then man is more an image than an Angel: because man is that from which are all things of his genus, and through whom are all things according to a certain mode: and thus the objections proceed: whence the solution is already given for the whole.

Articulus 4 — Whether Man and Woman Are Equally to the Image of God

Whether man and woman are equally to the image of God?

§ 60. Fourthly it is inquired, Whether man and woman are equally to the image of God?

§ 61. And it seems that they are not: because 1. In 1 Corinthians 11:7, it is said that the man is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man: therefore it seems that they are not distant by one degree from the notion of the image.

§ 62. 2. Also, The woman does not rule the man, but is ruled by him: since therefore it belongs to the image to rule, it seems the woman is not so to the image as the man.

§ 63. 3. Also, Below she herself is not posited as the principle of the whole human nature, but the man: since therefore conformity in the ratio of a principle with God is of the ratio of the image (as will be held below), it seems she is not equally to the image as the man.

§ 64. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The woman is capable of God just as the man: since therefore the image is present according to the mind which is capable of God, it seems the woman is to the image just as the man.

§ 65. 2. Also, In Genesis 1:27, it is said that God created man to His own image and likeness: and it is subjoined, Male and female He created them. Therefore it is understood of the woman just as of the man.

§ 66. Solution. This question is light. It must be said that the image is considered in two ways: namely in the interior powers of the mind, or in the agreement in the ratio of a principle of nature. In the interior powers again in two ways, namely in the distinction, and order, and equality, and consubstantiality of the powers: and thus the woman is equally an image as is the man. Or in the vigor and nobility of the powers compared to act according to the nature of the sex: and thus the man is more to the image than the woman. But if it is considered in the ratio of a principle with respect to the universal nature: this happens in four ways, namely universally and effectively and materially: and thus only Adam is to the image. Or effectively and materially only: and thus all men are to the image only. Or materially and universally with respect to all propagated things, and not effectively: and thus Eve alone is to the image.

Or materially and not universally with respect to propagated things: and thus every woman is to the image.

§ 67. To the first therefore it must be said that this is said on account of the subjection of the sex, and the vigor of natural endowments.

§ 68. To another argument it must be said that rule is considered according to the facility of turning aside into vice from the weakness of natural endowments.

§ 69. To another argument the solution is evident through the distinction posited.

Articulus 5 — Whether Those Things in Which Image and Likeness Are Said to Be Are Well Assigned

Whether those things in which the image and likeness are said to be, are well assigned?

§ 70. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says: Nevertheless this distinction, although probable, etc.

§ 71. For in that place he expounds image and likeness in three ways, namely that the image is according to the three powers of the mind, and the likeness according to innocence and justice. In the second way, that the image is in the cognition of truth, and the likeness in the love of goodness or virtue. The third is, that the image is in all other things besides the essence, by which the soul is immortal and indissoluble or indivisible, and in these is the likeness.

§ 72. For it seems that those expositions are not fitting: because according to the Master below and many Doctors, man was not made in grace: therefore he did not have justice: therefore he did not have the likeness in innocence and grace.

§ 73. AGAINST THE SECOND it is similarly objected: 1. For if the image is in the cognition of truth, since the cognition of truth is a certain quality just as is the love of virtue, it seems both pertain to the ratio of likeness: because likeness, as Boethius says, is the same quality of differing things.

§ 74. 2. Furthermore, Since the ratio of the image is in the configuration of some things, it seems that it is necessary to posit many things in which it is: but the cognition of truth does not express but one thing.

§ 75. 3. Also, Since the image is in some quantity, it is necessary to posit the ratio of a spiritual quantity in which the image is: and since Bernard says that love is the quantity of the soul, it seems rather that the image is in the love of virtue than in the cognition of truth.

§ 76. Furthermore, It is objected concerning the third exposition. For the image seems to be closer to the essence than the likeness: therefore it says nothing, that the image is in the things other than the essence, and the likeness in the essential things.

§ 77. Furthermore, With respect to what are those three expositions taken?

§ 78. Solution. It must be said to the first that the Master expounds well: because either it is understood of natural innocence and justice, if man is posited not to have been made in gratuitous gifts: and then natural innocence is nothing else than the state which did not harm from this, that through sin he did not merit that God should harm him through punishment: but punishment, as Augustine says, is not an evil, except because it harms. But natural justice is called the right order of the lower powers to the higher, and of the higher into God, and of the body to the soul, and of the world to the body: and in this order man was created: and then the first objection avails nothing. But if justice and innocence are taken for gratuitous gifts: then according to that opinion, that he was created in grace, the objection concludes nothing inconvenient: however below there will be a disputation concerning this. But according to the other opinion we will say that the likeness is in innocence and justice in gratuitous gifts: not which he would have, but which he would have had, if he had stood firm: and then there is a likeness in potency and in the order of the potency to the habit.

§ 79. To another argument it must be said that the cognition of truth is not completed by one power: for there must be one holding the notion, and this is memory: and another intuiting, and this is intelligence: and a natural love of the known thing accompanies these, which continues the intuition lest it be turned away: and as to that distinction which the cognition of truth supposes, a discrete spiritual quantity is hinted at, which is required for those things which are of the image. And thus it does not consist in the sole quality of cognition. And through this the solution to the following is also evident: because love is not the quantity which the image requires, but is the quantity of the value of the soul when it is gratuitous: and concerning that quantity Bernard speaks.

§ 80. To that which is further inquired, it must be said that the image expresses agreement in exterior things: and therefore intrinsic substantial things are not competent to it: but the likeness is in quality, and quantity: but every form whether substantial or accidental predicates what sort: and as to this Boethius says that a species is the essential likeness of individuals: and therefore nothing prohibits the likeness from being in the essence and the image from being in the consequent properties, as are memory, intelligence, and will.

Articulus 6 — Whether Image Is Said of Man and of the Son of God Univocally, Equivocally, or Analogically

Whether the image is said of man and of the Son of God univocally, equivocally, or analogically?

§ 81. Next it is inquired concerning the last chapter, there, Wherefore man is also called an image, etc.

§ 82. For from this the question arises, Whether the image is said of man and of the Son of God univocally, or equivocally?

§ 83. It seems that it is equivocally: because 1. Nothing is univocal to the creature and the Creator: therefore neither is the image.

§ 84. 2. Also, The natural and the artificial are not univocal, as an ass which is a vessel, and an ass which is an animal, and the animal which is man, and that which is painted: since therefore the image of God, as Augustine says in the book On the Ten Strings, is in man as the image of Caesar in a gold solidus (coin): but in the Son as the image of Caesar in his natural son: it seems to differ in man and in the Son, just as the artificial and the natural: therefore it is surely present equivocally.

§ 85. 3. Also, Artificial things are those whose principle is the will, as the Philosopher says: but the principle of the created image is the will of God, and of the Son it is not the will, as was held in the first book of the Sentences: therefore in man it is as in art, and in the Son as in a natural thing: therefore equivocally.

§ 86. ON THE CONTRARY: Equivocals are neither of one ratio, nor do they attain unity in ratio: the image in man attains the unity of essence in three (persons), and the ratio of a principle in the Father: because just as the Father is the principle of the whole deity, so man is the principle of the whole humanity: and the Son imitating the same is one in essence with the Father: therefore man and the Son of God are not called an image equivocally.

§ 87. Solution. It must be said that it is said by analogy, neither properly equivocally, nor properly univocally: such an analogy, I say, which posits nothing as one in both, but rather posits the whole in one, and in the other posits being from that and to that: and thus man is an image.

§ 88. It must be said therefore to the first, that nothing is common in genus or species: but through such an analogy there is something in man from God, which by priority is found in God.

§ 89. To another argument it must be said that that argumentation is deceptive: because Augustine does not mean to say that man is a work of art, but that the ratio of imitation is in him in a diversity of essence: but not in the Son.

§ 90. To another argument it must be said that there is a will transmuting matter and inducing form through natural principles, and such a will does not induce a work of art, but of nature, as the divine will. But there is a will not transmuting matter, but making a figure of incision by the taking away or transposition of parts: and such is a principle of art, as the will of man. However I well concede that it is not said univocally, but not just as the artificial and the natural.

§ 91. And if it is objected, that all natural things are works of the first art. I say the same concerning that art as concerning that will: for that art does not remove the ratio of a work of nature, but posits a diversity of substance in the created and creating nature.

DISTINCTIO XVII

DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 92. Here concerning the origin of the soul, etc. Here the formation of man according to relation to a material principle is treated: and this in two ways, namely according to the soul, and according to the body: and therefore there are two parts here, in the first of which he touches upon it according to the soul. In the second, according to the body, there, D, It is also customarily inquired, Whether God, etc.

§ 93. Around the first the Master touches upon two questions, of which one is, Whether the soul was created from the substance of God? The second, Whether in the body or outside the body? there, C, But whether in the body, etc.

§ 94. In this part I pass over briefly by objecting: since this question, Whether the soul was made from the substance of God, or from some matter preceding it: or whether before bodies souls were created in comparable stars, or simply, just as Pythagoras and certain others said, have been diligently investigated elsewhere.

Articulus 1 — Whether God Breathed into Man the Breath of Life, Such That the Soul Is a Part of God or of the Divine Substance

Whether God inspired into man the breath of life, so that the soul is a part of God or of the divine substance?

Whether God inspired into man the breath of life, such that the soul is a part of God or of the divine substance?

Concerning the first part, however, we can present the arguments of the heretics as follows: 1. God is not a breathing of another substance than His own: therefore, if He inspired into man the breath of life, He also breathes this to him from His own proper substance: therefore the soul is a part of God.

1. Likewise, inspiration or breathing into another is a movement of the spirit from the interior: therefore, since God inspires, there was a movement of the spirit of God's substance: but the interior things are substance: therefore the soul is taken from His substance.
2. Likewise, John 20:22: "He breathed on them, and said to them: Receive the Holy Spirit." And Augustine says that the breathing shows the Holy Spirit proceeds from His substance. Therefore, similarly here by breathing, He shows that the breath of man's life proceeds from His substance.
3. Likewise, the form of the exemplar and the image is the same: therefore it is necessary that the receptacle of that form be the same according to nature, and according to the diversity of form, the matter and subject are diversified: since therefore man is the image of God, it is necessary that in him there is a substance in which that form is impressed: and this will not be receptive of that form unless it is divine: therefore the soul is of the divine substance, as it seems.

However, there are other arguments of the Philosophers which seem stronger, but they are collected and solved elsewhere.

On the contrary, it can be objected thus:
1. Everything that is made from something is more perfect than that: the soul is made from the divine substance: therefore it is more perfect than it, which is absurd.

1. Likewise, whatever is potentially material to many things which are made from it, is imperfect with respect to any of them: the divine substance is material according to the heretic to every soul: therefore it is more imperfect.
2. Likewise, the divine substance is indivisible: but what is indivisible cannot be the matter of diverse things unless it is through its diverse parts in them: therefore the divine substance cannot be that from which all souls are made.
3. Likewise, the divine substance is not changeable by the choice of will: but the soul is changeable: therefore the soul is not from the divine substance.

And many other things can be objected to this.

Solution. It must be said that Pythagoras was the first author of this heresy, as Chrysostom says on Job. Then some others increased it, saying that God, matter, and the soul are the same: and they added some fantastical arguments which are solved elsewhere. Josephus seems to have agreed with this; because he says the soul is a particle of divinity placed in the body.

To the arguments, however, which are introduced here, it must be said that when it is said, "He inspired," effectively, that is, He made the spirit: and that it must necessarily be understood thus is proven by the arguments introduced on the contrary.

To the other, it must be said that this is not true if it speaks of the effect of the efficient cause: for then it operates upon foreign matter and induces the form of a created spirit, not from the interior of His own substance or essential: because the term of God is the same as consubstantial.

To the other, it must be said that the form of the exemplar and the image is not one except according to the reason of leading into another: for the image leads into the exemplar, and is not equal: but changing, as was previously held: and therefore that reasoning is not valid.

Articulus 2 — Whether the Soul Is Created in the Body or Outside the Body

Whether the soul is created in the body, or outside the body?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there,
But whether in the body, or outside the body, etc.

For it seems that the soul is created outside the body: because Plato, Macrobius, and Gregory of Nyssa also seem to prove this: because he says that otherwise it would be mortal: and their words and reasons are sought elsewhere.

However, by reason it seems the same thus:

1. For a spiritual substance not depending on the body according to being, ought to be made before the body according to the order of dignity: the rational soul is such a substance: therefore it ought to be made before.
2. Likewise, everything that is this something, and a perfect being, is first in itself before it is in another: the soul is this something, and a perfect being according to itself: therefore it is first in itself than in the body. That the soul is this something is evident by this because it is a composite substance, and a composite substance is this something, as the Philosopher says.
3. Likewise, it is evident that according to being it does not depend on the body: therefore it is united to it by accident: therefore it has being substantially in itself: but the substantial is prior to the accidental: therefore it is prior in itself than in the body.
4. Likewise, just as the eternal is related to time, so the everlasting to the temporal: but the eternal is before time: therefore also the everlasting: since therefore the soul has a beginning and not an end, and is everlasting, but the body is generable and corruptible, it seems that it is created before the body.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The soul is the substance of a physical body according to reason, as the Philosopher says in II De Anima, giving substance and reason to the physical body: none of such precedes that of which it is the substance: therefore neither does the soul.

1. Likewise, where was the incorporation before? For it cannot be placed in the star: because this is disproved and heretical: therefore it must have been among the Angels: therefore either it was compelled to be incarnated, or it chose by will. If it was compelled, since every compulsion has a punishment, the soul is punished before fault. Likewise, if it were compelled: then it would seek the dissolution of the body to be freed: and this we all clearly experience to be false. But if it chose: this was foolish, since it comes from a God-like intellect into that which shadows and obscures and infects it.

If you say that it was not thus in the body of Adam: because this was not infected. ON THE CONTRARY: The body of Adam did not have the vision of God with a God-like intellect: therefore the body of Adam also obscured the intellect, although less than our body.

Likewise, no form according to nature precedes its subject, but is the end of the generation of the composite: the rational soul is the ultimate form according to nature: therefore it does not precede its subject, but is the end of the generation of man.

Solution. It must be said that the souls of men are created by infusion, and by creating they are infused. Concerning the soul of Adam, Augustine and Gregory of Nyssa doubted, because of the work of creation from which God rested on the seventh day: and to their doubt it must be responded that there is creation for the restoration of nature, and from this God rested on the seventh day: and there is creation for the propagation of nature, and from this He never rested, to such an extent that some even say He gives every substantial form by creation, as was shown above. Hence I think that even the soul of Adam was created in the body: and what Genesis says at the end of the first chapter, that God created man in His image: and afterwards in the second chapter it adds concerning the formation of him according to the body, I say that it is said by anticipation, as often happens in Scripture.

To what is objected against, it must be said to the first that this is false, that a spiritual substance, according to being not depending on the body, ought to be made before the body, if it is proposed generally. For there is a certain spiritual substance, according to being not depending on the body, which is the form and perfection of the body: and that ought not to be made according to the order of nature except with an organized body.

To the other it must be said, that the soul is this something, this is said by the Masters, not by the Philosophers, nor by the Saints: and I think that it is said falsely: because in the beginning of the book II De Anima it is held that matter is not this something, nor even form, and that the soul is not this something: but I well concede that the soul is a composite substance: but it is not composite as this something: because according to nature it has dependence on the body, although it could be without it. But I well concede that its perfection is not entirely complete without it.

To the other it must be said, that according to being not to depend on the body is said in two ways, namely that it is a form and corporeal power: as is heat, and cold, or the harmony of composition, or stoniness. Thus it is true that according to being it does not depend on the body: because it can be without it, although it is not in ultimate perfection without it. Or, it can be understood that dependence on the body is not of its being and definition. Thus it is false: because it is substantially determined to the body.

To the other it must be said, that the eternal does not precede time except in the order of dignity, nor does the soul as it is the form of the body, nor is it entirely outside of time, but rather on the horizon of time and eternity, as the Philosophers say: because according to substance it is outside; and according to the act of animation and works it is under time.

Articulus 3 — Whether a Body of Such a Kind Is Owed to the Soul, One That Is Composed of Contraries, or It Ought to Have Had a Celestial Body

Whether a body composed of contraries is owed to the soul, or whether it ought to have a celestial body?

Whether a body composed of contraries is owed to the soul, or whether it ought to have a celestial body?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, "It is also customary to ask, Whether God made man, etc."

For some here ask, Whether a body composed of contraries is owed to the soul?

It seems that it ought to have a celestial body, because

1. Just as the form of a body relates to form, so a body ought to relate to a body: but the rational soul is proximate to intelligence, which according to some Philosophers is the form of the heavens: therefore its body ought to be proximate to the nature of the heavens: therefore it ought to be made from some star, as it seems.
2. Likewise, to the most noble forms in the genus of forms is owed the most noble matter in the genus of bodies: but the soul is rational and the most noble form, as the Philosopher says in I De Anima. For he says that the soul has a rational and most noble being according to nature: therefore the most noble matter in the genus of bodies is owed to it: therefore it seems that a celestial body is owed to it.
3. Likewise, the mover and the mobile, as the Philosopher suggests in the book De Caelo et Mundo, are proportional: but the soul is a perpetual mover: therefore a perpetual mobile is owed to it: but this is only a celestial body: therefore, etc.
4. Likewise, it seems that it ought to have a simple body: for to a simple mover is owed a simple mobile: but the soul is a simple mover: therefore a simple mobile is owed to it.
5. Likewise, the union of those having a symbol is easier: but the spiritual has a greater symbol to the simple than to the composite: therefore the soul will be more easily and better united to a simple body than to a composite one, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. To a mover having diversity in powers, a mobile diversified in parts is owed: such a mover is the soul: therefore a mobile diverse in parts is owed to it: but this is not simple: therefore a composite is owed to it.

1. Likewise, every mover which is the form of a body according to itself and according to parts, ought to have a body diversely capable of receiving and preserving its powers: the soul is such a mover: therefore such a body is owed to it: but a homogeneous body is not naturally capable of receiving diverse powers: therefore a homogeneous body is not owed to it.
2. Likewise, a rare spiritual body like air does not retain what it receives: therefore it is not owed to it, but a dense, mixed, and complexioned body for receiving and retaining diverse powers.
3. Likewise, just as there is a distinction of forms and movers, so there is a distinction of mobiles and matters: but a homogeneous rare spiritual body does not retain a distinguishing figure: therefore such a body is owed to the soul that has a member distinct from a member, and is distinguished by figure from the body of another animal.

Solution. It must be said that the latter reasons are proper and proceed from proper physical principles, and the former are vain.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that that comparison is none: because no one ever said that intelligence was the form of any body, either celestial or otherwise. But some Philosophers are found to have posited the souls of the heavens, that the heaven is composed of a mover and a mobile, and a soul and a body: but they say that the soul there is of a different nature than the soul of lower animals and humans. Hence there is no comparison, if it is according to the proportion to move, because intelligence moves through the forms it has, just as the desired moves desire, and the soul moves as a mover joined to a substantial mobile. But if a comparison is made by the nature of the intellectual operation which is in the soul and intelligence, then the reason is of no value: because neither is determined by a mobile body with respect to that operation. However, I say this, not asserting that intelligences are in such an order as the Philosophers say, but rather to show that the argument would be vain even according to the position of the Philosophers, that no soul is assigned a body insofar as it is a spiritual substance, whether intellectual or incorruptible, but rather insofar as there are moving powers in it: and since these are in the rational soul, nutritive, generative, and sensitive, and the like, it is necessary that the moved body has diversity according to those.

From this it must be said that the rational soul is the most noble form because it completes all the operations of the soul, namely natural, intellectual, and divine, as the Philosopher says. And therefore it does not follow that the most noble body is simply owed to it, but that the most noble in which it could fulfill such operations: and this is true, because this is complexioned and composed by the composition and complexions of man.

To the other it must be said that they are most proportionate: because as many moving powers as the soul has, so many diverse organs does the body have receiving those powers: nor is it valid that therefore a perpetual body is owed to it, because it itself is perpetual, unless it needs a perpetual mover: and this is not true: because it is perpetual in substance, and not in the reason of moving.

To the other it must be said that it is false that the soul is a simple mover. For I well concede that it is a simple substance, but the mover itself is composed by the universality of its moving and perfecting powers of the body: because (as the Philosopher says) the same must be taken in the parts as in the whole soul: so that just as it is in itself the perfection of the whole, so the parts are perfections and acts of the parts.

To the other it must be said that the symbol can be considered with respect to the substance of the soul insofar as it is a spiritual substance, and thus a body is not owed to it: because thus a body would be owed to every spiritual substance, which is clearly false. Or, the symbol can be considered according to the suitability of mobiles to movers, and thus the first is true: but what is further induced does not follow: because since the soul is a multiform mover in powers, it is not proportioned to a simple or uniform, but to a multiform complexioned and composed.

And thus it is clear that such reasons are vain, and cause error in natural science.

Articulus 4 — Whether Paradise Reaches to the Lunar Globe; And in What Place It Is Situated, Whether under the Equinoctial; And Why It Is Hidden

Whether paradise extends to the lunar globe? And, in what place is it situated, whether under the equinoctial? And, why is it hidden?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, "For the general airs from paradise," etc.

It is asked, if it is true what is said, that paradise reaches up to the lunar globe?

It seems false: because

1. Avicenna says and it is necessarily proven, that fire touches the orb of the moon from all sides: since the moon is the lowest body among the celestial, and its orb is the lowest orb: therefore, either fire is located in it or another body, or there is something empty between the last celestial body and the first body of the element. It is clear that there is no vacuum, nor anything from the five bodies, namely the celestial body, and the four elements: therefore it remains that fire is there: therefore trees and the pleasantness of water from a great fountain cannot be there, etc.

1. Likewise, Damascenus says that that fountain is the Ocean: therefore it seems that paradise was the world, and not a special place.
2. Furthermore, if it were a special place, why is there no habitation of men there? For a place is in vain where no one dwells. If you say that the first man deserved this because of sin: then it is asked, why do not men dwell nearby?

Furthermore, the rivers which flow from there are known: therefore it seems to be in our habitable world. However, these do not vary except by the latitude of the seven climates, and not by more: therefore since many cities are known in those, the place ought to be known, especially to the Philosophers who have written much about wonders.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that to reach the lunar globe is said in two ways. In one way, according to the dimension of the place: and thus it is not true what Bede says in the Letter. In another way, according to property, and thus it is true: because in the lunar circle the state and nature of incorruption begins: and paradise was the place of immortality and incorruption of men in the first state.

To the other, it must be said, namely to the saying of Damascenus, that that fountain is the Ocean according to origin, and not according to substance: because it is infused from the Ocean, and more noble, and more inexhaustible than other waters.

To the other, it must be said that that place is more secret from our habitable world: not that it is not in our habitable world, but that the Lord has closed it from us. And speaking without prejudice, it seems to me that it is on the equinoctial line towards the East in comparison to our habitation: however, there are opinions about the equinoctial line. For Avicenna and Nicholas in the commentary on the Almagest, and some others seem to want that place to be the best and most prepared. But some others say that it is an intemperate place. And it is proven by demonstration to be temperate thus:

The declination of the sun from the equinoctial is to each latitude almost to twenty-four degrees: however, it is clear that whatever is outside the latitude is regarded by the sun with an oblique ray only: however, an oblique ray is never perfect in the tempering of heat, but inclines to cold.

Likewise, a perpendicular ray is twofold according to the division of the sphere, namely staying and near one to another, and quickly passing and remote one from another: a perpendicular is reflected into itself: therefore it is very hot. If therefore it is staying and near one to another, there is an excess in heat: therefore by the opposite, if it is perpendicular not staying nor near one to another, it will be temperate.

Having this, it is inevitably proven that the place under the equinoctial line is most temperate. The equinoctial circle is one of the great circles of the sphere: therefore it divides the sphere into two halves: therefore the equidistant circles in which the sun revolves between the equinoctial line and the summer tropic will all be smaller than it: and the smaller, the more they approach the tropic of Cancer: therefore near the equinoctial the latitude between circle and circle will be greater, the more ample the sphere is: and near Cancer, the greater the proximity, the more narrow the sphere is: therefore the sun going from the equinoctial passes through circles more distant than near Cancer: therefore it passes more quickly through the latitude of the place.

However, that it does not stay so long over the earth is proven: because with the sun coming from the equinoctial, the greater the latitude, the longer the day: therefore the longer the stay of the sun's ray on the earth. And this is the cause that the land of Ethiopia which is under Cancer is very hot and intemperate: and temperate, that which is under the equinoctial: and that which is under the winter tropic, that is, under Capricorn, has these causes of heat: and besides these, one other beyond these, that is, the brevity of the sun's diameter: and therefore that is uninhabitable.

And by these reasons it seems to me to be acquiesced that that place is paradise.

However, there are reasons of others to the contrary not having the firmness of demonstration, namely that a place thrice regarded by the sun ought to be hotter than that which is regarded in two ways only: the equinoctial line is regarded thrice by the sun, and the place under the tropic in two ways: therefore it ought to be hotter. The proof of the middle is that twice in the year it is moved by a perpendicular ray over the heads of those dwelling under the equinoctial, namely in the head of Aries and Libra: and it regards it also with an oblique ray from each tropic, and the intermediate places: but the tropic is not touched except by the sun with a perpendicular ray, and it is elongated by an oblique ray from it by a latitude of forty-seven degrees and more: therefore if that is hot, so that men become black there, the place from which it is not so much elongated, but is immediately and twice touched by a perpendicular ray, will seem to be intemperate.

Likewise, we see that even cities which are of greater latitude than the tropic of Cancer are of excellent heat: how much more a place of no latitude.

But in my judgment these reasons do not have force as the first, and are sophistical. Because the cause of intemperate heat is not that it is touched twice by a perpendicular ray, or is less elongated: but rather the unequal stay of the ray over the earth, and the constriction of the equidistant circles in which the sun revolves, which makes the ray fall as if in the same place more often, is the cause of intemperate heat.

However, that paradise is there, we can estimate by another reason: because the Nile according to the sayings of the Saints exits from paradise: however, it is clear that it comes from Ethiopia into Egypt: however, Ethiopia is towards the equinoctial, since it is under Cancer: therefore it comes from the equinoctial or near.

Likewise, a sign of this is that it is said to flood twice in the year, and those who have come from that land report that with the sun being in Cancer and Capricorn it floods: however, with the sun being in those tropics, it is winter for those dwelling under the equinoctial, and it is their winter according to the elongation of the sun by only three signs: therefore the sun raises vapors, and does not consume them in that line: therefore rains fall there then. Therefore, since the Nile always floods then, it receives an increase of water from the rains falling under the equinoctial line: and this could not be unless it passed through that line: therefore it comes from under the equinoctial, and from paradise, as Scripture says: therefore it seems that paradise is there.

Therefore, this having been said by opinion, not by assertion, about the place of paradise.

However, what is objected, why is it hidden? It must be said that it is so that man might not grieve too much over the deprivation of such pleasantness, it was regenerated as a testimony of the first innocence.

Articulus 5 — Why One Tree In Paradise Was Called The Tree Of Life, And Another The Tree Of The Knowledge Of Good And Evil

Why is one tree in paradise called the tree of life, and another the tree of the knowledge of good and evil?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, In this paradise, however, there were trees, etc.

For either these trees are named from their effect, or not. Thus: then the tree of the knowledge of good and evil causes the knowledge of good and evil, just as the tree of life, which is false, because the contrary of this is said in the Text. If not: therefore, since there is one reason for the imposition of names, neither does the tree of life cause immortality: the contrary of which is held below.

Solution. The Master determines this quite suitably: because the tree of life is thus called from its effect and this is to be understood from the effect of the disposition of matter towards immortality but it did not cause the habit of immortality, as is proven below; but the other is called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil from the event which God foresaw.

To this, however, which is objected, it must be said that this is false, that there is one reason for the imposition of names.

DISTINCTIO XVIII

Divisio Textus

In the same paradise also he formed the woman, etc. Here it is treated concerning the formation of the woman. And there are here two things, namely concerning her formation, and concerning the questions following the formation and location and life of the first state in both: and concerning this is the following distinction, XIX, there, A, "Many things are accustomed to be asked," etc.

However, four things are determined here concerning the formation of the woman, namely in comparison to Adam from whom she was formed, and in comparison to the efficient cause of the formation, there, E, "It is also accustomed to be asked," Thirdly, concerning the formation in comparison to the causal reason of the works of the six days, there, F, "But it is asked, Whether," In the fourth, it treats of the formation of her according to the soul, there, H,

"Just as the body of the woman," etc.

Through this division the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Rib from Which the Woman Was Formed Was of the Reality of Human Nature in Adam Himself or Not

Whether the rib from which the woman was formed was of the truth of human nature in Adam himself, or not?

Concerning the first part, it is asked whether the rib from which the woman was formed was of the truth of human nature, or not?

If not: then God created something superfluous in Adam, which is inconvenient to say: because if nature does not lack in necessities, and does not abound in superfluities, much less do these works of God have. But if it was of the truth of human nature in Adam: then it will rise again in Adam: since therefore the whole woman was made from that rib, nothing of the first woman will rise again.

If you say that the soul still remains which was not made from the rib. On the contrary: this is nothing, because the soul does not rise again. For Damascene says that resurrection is the second rising of that which fell; but the soul never fell through death: therefore it will never rise again.

Solution. It must be said that just as the superfluity of the nutritive moisture from which there is a decision in generation is called superfluous with respect to the need of the individual, yet it is necessary for the conservation of the species, and nature prepares both because it intends to save both: so God, the author of nature, did not make in Adam only what was necessary for this man, but what was necessary for the beginning of universal nature: for Adam was indeed a man; and the beginning of men: and that rib was superfluous for this man, and necessary for the beginning of nature: because it was necessary that a helper similar to him be formed from that rib: and from this it is clear that it will rise again in Eve in whom it was necessary for this man, and not only for the species: just as also the seed rises again in the son or offspring, and not in the parent from whom it is descended: and through this the solution of the objections is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether the Angels Ought to Have Formed the Body of Man, or God; And Whether It Belongs to God or to the Angels or to Good Men or Even to Evil Men to Work Miracles

Whether Angels ought to have formed the body of man, or God? And, whether it is of God or of Angels or of good men or even of evil men to perform miracles?

Then it is asked concerning the second part, there, "It is also accustomed to be asked," etc.

For it seems that Angels ought to have formed the body of man: because

1. There are two parts of man, body and soul. Similarly, there are two spiritual natures superior to man, God and Angel. If therefore the more dignified part is created by God, it remains that the less dignified part is formed by an Angel.
2. Likewise, among miracles Augustine assigns, as it is held in the Letter, that the woman was formed from a rib: but it is of the Angels who are called Virtues to perform miracles: therefore this ought to have been done by Angels.

For the sake of this, it is asked, whether it is of God, or of Angels, or of good men or of evil men to perform miracles?

For it seems that it is of God alone:
1. For in miracles, nothing is subjected in the elements of the world except the obedient power of matter: this is only with respect to divine power: therefore it seems that miracles are only with respect to divine power, and not of Angels, or of any men.

1. Likewise, in the natural course, the work of nature cannot be perfect unless God is operating in nature, as the Saints say: therefore much less in the course which is above nature: therefore it seems that miracles are not performed except by divine power operating.

But on the contrary, it seems that
1. It is attributed to Angels by the Saints.

1. Also, from this a special order is denominated.
2. Likewise, it is attributed to men. Whence, 1 Corinthians 12:10: "To another the working of miracles," that is, the operation of miracles.

3. Likewise, it seems that not only the good perform miracles, but also the evil: because it is said, Matthew 7:22: "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils?"

4. Likewise, the disciples said to the Lord: "Master, we saw someone casting out devils in your name, who does not..."

follows us, and we forbade him. Therefore it seems that both the good and the wicked perform miracles.

§ 2. By reason of this, it is asked: By reason of which virtue are miracles performed?

§ 3. It seems that they are by reason of hope: because 1. It [hope] is of the arduous: and a miracle, as Augustine says, is an arduous and unusual thing. 2. Also, hope is the expectation of future beatitude: miracles are performed for the sake of beatitude: therefore it seems that they are performed by the merit of hope.

§ 4. BUT against this it seems that they are by the merit of charity: because 1. Charity is the most perfect virtue: therefore the most perfect works are owed to it: but such is this operation of miracles: therefore the operation of miracles is owed to charity. 2. Also, the Angels who perform miracles do not have faith, nor hope, but charity: since therefore there is one habit for one operation, it seems that in men too the operation of miracles should not be owed to hope, or faith, but to charity.

§ 5. BUT against this it seems that it should be attributed to faith: because 1. The Lord says so: If you had faith like a mustard seed, you would say to this mulberry tree: Be uprooted, and transplanted into the sea: and it would obey you. Therefore it is owed to faith. 2. Also, If you can believe, all things are possible to the believer. 3. Also, 1 Corinthians 13:2 If I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, etc.: therefore as above.

§ 6. But if this is granted, it is further asked: By reason of which article [of faith]?

§ 7. And it seems that it is by reason of the Incarnation. Because Augustine says that every miracle is to show that [Incarnation]: therefore it seems that every miracle is by virtue of that; and this is the article of the Incarnation: therefore by virtue of this article. This also seems to be drawn from the Letter, where he says: Therefore of all things which were done not by the natural motion of things, but miraculously, to signify grace, the hidden causes were in God. And it is established that it notes the grace of the Incarnation: therefore all miracles are done by virtue of the article of the Incarnation; and yet more could be adduced from the third and fourth book of Augustine's On the Trinity.

§ 8. But against this it seems that they are done by reason of wisdom: because miracles show the reason of divine wisdom. For an artisan displays wisdom by acting in such a way that all are cured: but such are the works of miracles: therefore it seems that they show wisdom.

§ 9. But it seems again that they are done by reason of omnipotence: because 1. Also, the Angels to Sarah, Genesis 18:14 Is anything difficult for God? Therefore it seems that it is by reason of omnipotence. 2. Also, omnipotence means to oppose the laws of natural power: but this occurs in a miracle: therefore they are done by reason of omnipotence.

§ 10. Solution. It should be said to the first that God, an Angel, and a man perform a miracle in different ways. For God does it by authority and by His primary operative power: while an Angel does it through ministry and by preparing the matter: and man through invocation. Hence it is well conceded that the Angels did something in the rib of Adam, namely by separating it from Adam, and preparing it through dispositions: but they could not form it, because to form the rib is to animate the woman, and this could not be except by creating for her a rational soul: and this is implied in the text, where it is said that only God could form the rib, but Angels act like farmers toward the crops: and by this the solution to the first two arguments, and to the following question, is clear.

§ 11. To the next it should be said that wicked men perform miracles in the holiness of the Church, although not in the holiness of the person: because God performs them at their invocation to comfort the faith of the Church: and sometimes to test the faith of the Church, as will happen in the times of the Antichrist.

§ 12. But if it is objected that his operation will be according to the working of Satan, as the Apostle says, in all power, and lying signs, and wonders. It should be said that they can be lies with respect to intention, because through them he intends to subvert: although they are true with respect to operation: and perhaps some will be illusory, concerning which it was treated above.

§ 13. To the next it should be said that those two reasons which are induced to show that it belongs to God alone to perform miracles, only prove that it is His to do so by authority and by a power perfect for the work from itself: and this is well conceded: but an Angel operates under Him by disposing through ministry, and man through invocation.

§ 14. TO THIS which is further asked: To which virtue does it belong to perform miracles? It should be said that it properly belongs to faith, although it belongs to the others by way of merit in common: and the reason for this is: because faith is primarily about those things that are above reason, and therefore it confirms in others through those things that are according to reason.

§ 15. Also, just as faith causes one to deny the proper power of reason, so it is fitting that the divine power should operate in it: and therefore even the Philosophers said that a Prophet rising up has no way to prove the truth of his words except through miracles: and therefore even the Prophets gave signs, as in Isaiah 7:11 Ask a sign for yourself.

§ 16. TO THIS therefore which is objected concerning hope, it should be said that the arduousness of hope is not an arduousness of operation, but rather that it should be comprehended in beatitude: but miracles are rather done to show the way of beatitude.

§ 17. TO THE NEXT it should be said that all things are done for the sake of beatitude, as for an ultimate end: but the proximate end is the confirmation of faith, as is held in Hebrews

2:4 God bearing witness by signs, and wonders: and Mark 16:17 And these signs will follow those who believe: In my name, etc.

§ 18. To that which is objected concerning charity, it should be said that according to the perfection of the informing of merit, charity is the perfection of the virtues: but not according to the fittingness of the operation of miracles.

§ 19. To the next it should be said that Angels operate in ministry: but we are asking about the merit of fittingness on the part of the one invoking: and therefore that objection proves nothing.

§ 20. To that which is further asked: By reason of which article? I say that it is primarily by reason of omnipotence: because a miracle primarily bespeaks an elevation above all power except the divine.

§ 21. TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it should be said that miracles show the work of the Incarnation, or the grace of faith of the Incarnation as an end, but not as the operating power, but rather the omnipotence of God which does these things and faith: for he who believes in the power, merits that miracles be done at the invocation of the believer: through this the solution to the following is also clear.

§ 22. To that which is objected concerning wisdom, it should be said that they are not done by wisdom, nor do they primarily show wisdom, nor do men marvel at wisdom, but rather at power. For admiration of wisdom arouses one to inquire into the work and the mode of the work: as the Philosopher says in the first book of the Metaphysics: From wondering both then and now they began to philosophize. But admiration of power ceases from inquiry, and is astounded in itself: and that is the admiration of divine miracles, as was said of the Lord: What kind of man is this, that the winds and the sea obey him?

Articulus 3 — What a Miracle Is by Definition; Then It Is Asked about What He Says There

What is a miracle by definition? Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there,

What is a miracle by definition? Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, F, But it is asked, whether the reason which God, etc.

§ 25. And four things are asked, namely, what is a miracle? because without knowledge of that, the things handed down here cannot be well determined. Secondly, what things are called miracles? Thirdly, what is the difference between a miracle, and a marvel, a sign, a prodigy, a portent, and a monster? Fourthly, whether every miracle is against nature, or above nature, or outside nature?

§ 26. To the first, one proceeds by two definitions, the first of which is Augustine's in the book On the Advantage of Believing, namely this: A miracle is something arduous and unusual appearing beyond the expectation and faculty of the one admiring. The other is that of the Masters, namely this: A miracle is a manifestation of divine power.

§ 27. Against the first definition, namely Augustine's, it is objected as follows: 1. Those things that are called miracles are not always arduous, but sometimes concern small things, as that the blessed Benedict returned a sieve whole to his nurse, that when Elisha threw wood upon the water, the iron swam, and the like: therefore a miracle is badly defined by "arduous." 2. Also, it is not always "unusual": because apparitions of Angels frequently occurred to the Fathers: and yet they were wonderful. 3. Also, let us posit that they occur frequently, then they will not be unusual: and yet they will be no less miracles than if they occurred rarely: therefore a miracle is not unusual, or to be unusual will not be substantial to a miracle. 4. Also, it does not seem to be "beyond expectation": because the greatest of all miracles, namely that a Virgin would conceive and give birth, and God would become man, all the ancients expected: and yet it was a miracle. 5. Also, we all expect the resurrection: and yet it will be miraculous: therefore it is not beyond expectation. 6. Also, against what he says, And faculty: it is either understood of the faculty of cognition, or of operation. If of cognition: then all works of nature will be miraculous in this respect: because Solomon says that a man cannot find the reason for those things that are done under the sun. But if of the faculty of operation: then they are much more miracles: because although art imitates nature, yet it cannot follow it in operating: and therefore the Philosopher says that art does not induce a specific form by itself as nature does: therefore it seems that a miracle is badly defined by Augustine.

§ 28. Against the second it is objected as follows: Every work of divine power is declarative: therefore every work is miraculous, which is to say nothing.

§ 29. SOLUTION. It should be said that Augustine's definition is good, and the Masters' is not as good, but nevertheless it can be sustained.

§ 30. To the first, therefore, it should be said that the first two differences posited in the definition of a miracle define it in comparison to other things which are not done miraculously, such as those that are done by nature, and by human will. But the first, which is "arduous," is said in comparison to the efficient cause, which is elevated above the causes of natural and voluntary things: and therefore the solution to the first is already clear: because although the thing in which the miracle is done is small, yet the power doing it is elevated and arduous.

§ 31. To the next it should be said similarly, that even if a miracle occurred all day long, it would still be unusual: because it does not happen in the usual course according to inferior causes, but rather according to a reason hidden in God from the ages, as is said in the Letter. Yet there are those who solve these and the following otherwise: but this is not much to be cared about: because the question is not very laborious.

§ 32. To the next it should be said that according to the intention of Augustine, "expectation of nature" is meant there: as is held in Romans 4:18 , upon that, Who against hope believed in hope, the Gloss says: Against the hope of nature in the hope of grace: and this is true: because although there was a hope of grace concerning such things, there was never a hope of nature: and this solution is according to the intention of Augustine. But others concede the objection, and say that such things are marvels and not miracles: and I think that they do not speak well.

§ 33. To the next it should be said that "faculty" is called there the power of knowing and operating: because neither by knowing nor by operating can we attain to a miracle.

§ 34. To that which is objected to the contrary, it should be said that we have the power of knowing the works of nature through causes, although not sufficient ones: but in miracles we do not attain the mode of the cause. Similarly, we imitate natural things, and operate some things in the work: but we can admire marvels, but cannot imitate them.

§ 35. Through this it is clear that the last two differences are posited in the definition of a miracle in comparison to the one admiring.

§ 36. TO THAT which is objected concerning the definition of the Masters, it should be said that it must be understood with precision, so that a miracle is only a manifestation of divine power: just as the magicians said to Pharaoh: This is the finger of God, that is, a demonstration of divine virtue and power. But other works show other proximate powers, although they show divine power as the primary one.

Articulus 4 — What Are Called Miraculous: Whether the Work of Creation, Distinction, Ornament, Justification, Incarnation, Resurrection, and Also the Work of Nature

What things are called miraculous: Whether the work of creation, distinction, adornment, justification, incarnation, resurrection, and even the work of nature?

§ 39. Secondly it is asked, What things are miracles? And it is asked concerning the work of creation, whether it is miraculous? And it seems that it is: because 1. Anselm and Chrysostom distinguish a threefold course of things, namely that which happens by divine will alone, and that which by divine will and nature, and that which happens by the will of a rational creature: and the first they call a marvel, the second natural, the third voluntary: but the work of creation is done by divine will alone: therefore it is miraculous. 2. Also, it cannot be the work of a man, or of an Angel. Also, neither of nature: because then nature did not exist. Therefore it is left that it is miraculous, or natural, or voluntary.

§ 40. If it is asked concerning the work of recreation through justification. It seems that it is a work of miracle: because 1. Augustine says: It is a greater thing to make a pious man out of an impious one, than to create heaven and earth: therefore it is the work most manifesting power: but this is a miracle: therefore it is a miracle. 2. Also, Gregory in the book of Dialogues says that it is a greater thing to raise a man in mind, than in body: and he proves this by Paul raised in mind, and Lazarus raised in body: of one of whom wondrous things are read after his raising in mind, but of the other nothing great is read after his raising in body.

§ 41. Also, in the same place he implies another reason for this: because it is a greater thing to give life to souls that will live forever, than to bodies that will die again: therefore it is a work of miracle.

§ 42. BUT IF this is conceded, it seems to the contrary, because 1. A miraculous work is by divine power alone operating, and man not cooperating, but perhaps an Angel cooperating, as was held before: but Augustine says: He who created you without you, will not justify you without you: therefore it seems that man cooperates with God here: therefore it is not miraculous. 2. Also, it is not beyond expectation, nor unusual: therefore it is not a miracle.

§ 43. FURTHER it is asked concerning the works of nature, whether they are marvels? It seems that they are: because Augustine says that it is a greater thing to multiply the harvest of the whole world from a few grains, than to multiply five loaves to the satiety of five thousand men: therefore it seems that while the latter is a miracle, the former is much more a miracle. And many Glosses upon John 6:1 and seq. , can be adduced for this, and upon John 2:1 and seq. , where it is read concerning the changing of water into wine.

§ 44. BUT AGAINST THIS: Augustine upon Genesis, and this part is posited in the Letter, distinguishes between those things which were in the account of causes of the first works, as whence they should be made: and those which were in them, so that from thence they could nevertheless be made: and among the former he enumerates the works of nature, as that moisture is drawn into the vine, and digested there is turned into wine. But among the latter he enumerates the changing of water into wine: which nature cannot do.

§ 45. Since therefore the latter are miraculous, the former are not miracles.

§ 46. FURTHER, some object concerning the Incarnation and Resurrection, wishing to prove that they are not miracles, because they do not occur beyond expectation: but this objection is worth nothing to me.

§ 47. Solution. It should be said that every work, and only that, is called miraculous which does not happen according to the law of nature, nor according to the law of a created purpose or created will: and therefore the work of creation, and of disposition, and of adornment I repute among miracles: although some say that it is a marvel, and not a miracle: the reason for which distinction will be clear below. But the work of justification, although it is above us, yet does not happen except according to the law of the will: because not unless we consent: and therefore I do not call it miraculous or a marvel: but the work of nature is in no way miraculous or a marvel, since it is entirely subject to the laws of nature. But the work of incarnation and resurrection I think must be entirely placed under the number of miracles.

§ 48. TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it should be said that the work of justification is in a certain respect a manifestation of greater power, and not simply: because in the creation of heaven and earth there was no contrary disposition inclining to the opposite: but in the justification of man there is the contrary disposition of sin:

§ 49. Also, creating heaven and earth, He only spoke, and they were made: in justification He did many things, said infinite things, endured very many things. In this respect, therefore, it shows greater power, but simply it shows greater goodness. Nor does it follow, "this work shows greater power: therefore it is a greater miracle than that": because a miracle is not enunciated from that alone, but from that and also other differences, defining it.

§ 50. TO THE REASONING of Gregory in the book of Dialogues, it should be said that he does not intend to prove that it is a miracle, but that it is a more useful and better thing: and therefore more marvelous in goodness, and not more miraculous.

§ 51. To the next it should be said that the work of nature is not miraculous: and I well concede that carrying nature shows a greater power than multiplying loaves: and the solution to those things which are induced is clear from what has been said.

§ 52. To the next it should be said that, in my judgment, those are miracles: but that it is said in the definition "beyond expectation," is understood of the expectation of nature, and not the expectation of grace which is a virtue.

Articulus 5 — How Miracle, Marvel, Sign, Portent, Prodigy, Monster, And Power Differ

How do a miracle, a marvel, a sign, a portent, a prodigy, and a monster, and a virtue differ?

§ 54. Thirdly it is asked, what is the difference between a miracle, a marvel, a sign, a portent, a prodigy, and a monster?

§ 55. The Gloss upon 1 Corinthians 12:10 seems to say that signs are lesser, and prodigies are greater.

§ 56. Also, a marvel and a miracle do not seem to differ except as potency and act: therefore they are of the same kind.

§ 57. Solution. It should be said that according to the Masters a marvel and a miracle differ as genus and species: because every miracle is a marvel, but it is not converted: hence they say that the works of creation, and justification, and glorification are marvels, which are not beyond expectation, and therefore with respect to some difference fall away from the definition of a miracle: but they say miracles are like the illumination of the blind, the making straight of the lame, and the raising of the dead, and the like, concerning which there is no expectation. But according to the name they do not differ except as potency and act: and through this the solution to the object is clear.

§ 58. Some also distinguish between a wonder [mirum] and a marvel [mirabile]: because a wonder is having an unknown cause, and a marvel, and a miracle, are dependent on divine power alone, as has been said. But I have not found these definitions, nor do I remember finding them proven. But if we wished to speak according to the Philosophers, then a marvel is called that which has a high cause which is beautiful to investigate, but difficult to find, like the eclipse of the moon or the sun, and like the knowledge of the passions of the soul and of nature and of spiritual substances: but this usage is not found among the Saints.

§ 59. But a sign, and a prodigy, and a virtue differ. For a sign is said insofar as it is an indication of divine power, but a prodigy insofar as it provokes the gaze of men unto itself since it is far from the indication of human knowledge: and therefore it is called a prodigy [prodigium] as if far from the finger [procul a digito], that is, the power of indicating the cause: and therefore the Gloss says that a sign is in lesser things, and a prodigy in greater things. Some also say that because the future is far off, a prodigy is a sign promised for the future, which is indicated far in advance by the finger of pre-announcement: but I do not believe that this can be proven by example or authority. But a virtue is said in comparison to the operating power: because that is ultimate above nature and the faculty of nature: but virtue is called the ultimate of power concerning a thing.

§ 60. But a monster is that which exceeds the measure of nature: and this happens in multiple ways, namely from a defect, as a hand at the shoulder: or from an abundance: and this in three ways, namely of power to the form of one member, like many mouths, or noses, or ears on one head: or from an abundance of matter in one member, like six or more fingers: or with respect to quantity only, as the sons of Anakim are called monsters, because others compared to them seemed like locusts: and sometimes it happens from the motion of the womb dividing the seed in part and leaving it continuous in part, as when it diffuses through the length of the womb, and spreads apart in one part, for then two bodies divided for a part are generated continuous with each other in the undivided part: but sometimes this happens from the rupture of the afterbirth when the humor is still liquid, as Aristotle seems to say. But to inquire about these is the business of another discipline.

Articulus 6 — Whether Miracles or Marvels Are Against Nature; And What the Difference Is between Being Able to Be Done and Being Done of Necessity

Whether miracles or marvels are against nature? and, What is the difference between being able to happen, and happening from necessity?

§ 63. Fourthly it is asked, whether those things which are called miracles and marvels, are against nature, or not?

§ 64. But it seems that they are not: because 1. Augustine says: Who does not know that water co-created with the earth, when it comes to the roots of the vine, is drawn into the nourishment of that wood: and in it assumes a quality by which it proceeds little by little erupting into the grape, and as it grows larger, becomes wine and sweetens as it matures, which while still fermenting is pressed, and strengthened by some aging, arrives more useful and pleasant for the use of drinking? Did God therefore seek wood or earth, or these delays of time, when by a wondrous shortcut He converted water into wine, and such wine that even a drunk guest would praise? Did the founder of time need the help of time? Does not the whole nature of serpents coalesce, take form, get born, and grow strong by certain numbers of days accommodated to each of its kind? Were these days awaited, so that the rod would be converted into a serpent from the hand of Moses and Aaron? Nor when these things happen, do they happen against nature, except to us to whom the course of nature has become known otherwise, but not to God, to whom whatever He has made is nature. Therefore it seems that none of these things is against nature.

§ 65. 2. If you say that there is natura naturans which is God, and against this nothing is: and natura naturata which is created nature in the contexture of causal reasons of nature, and against this miracles are done: and by this distinction you wish to solve the statement of Augustine. To the contrary: Augustine, in the same place: But it can rightly be asked, those causal reasons which He implanted in the world when He first created all things together, how were they instituted? And below: It remains that they were created apt for both modes, whether for that by which temporal things most usually run their course, or for that by which rare and marvelous things happen, just as it pleased God to do. Therefore miracles are according to the causal reasons implanted in created nature: therefore they do not happen against it.

§ 66. This is also openly said in the Letter.

§ 67. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. 1 Corinthians 12:10, upon that, The operation of miracles [virtutum], the Gloss says thus: Signs and prodigies are in those things which happen against nature. 2. Also, Romans 11:24 You were grafted against nature into a good olive tree.

§ 68. FURTHER it is asked here, what difference is noted in these ways of speaking which are had here and are drawn from Book IX on Genesis, that God implanted some things in the first works so that they could happen, and some so that it was necessary for them to happen? 1. For none of the inferior generable things is generated of necessity, as the Philosophers prove: therefore it seems that it is not necessary to happen. 2. Also, whatever can happen, if it is posited to happen, is nothing marvelous. 3. Also, whatever is necessary to happen, can happen: therefore it seems that these are related as superior and inferior: therefore they are wrongly divided against each other: for if He implanted those things which usually happen into that first condition of things, so that thus it would be necessary for them to happen, it would behoove that He also implanted that they could thus happen.

§ 69. Solution. It should be said according to Augustine, that if we consider the primordial causes of the first condition and the causal reasons only, nothing seems to happen against the nature first implanted in things: because God implanted in them even the causal and primordial reasons of miracles: and Augustine says that just as He cannot act against Himself: so He cannot act against those reasons, and against His work wisely disposed.

§ 70. Hence upon that of the Apostle to Romans 11:24, which was adduced, the Gloss of Augustine says: God the creator and founder of all natures does nothing against nature: but by human custom it is said to be against nature, which is against the use of nature known to mortals.

§ 71. Also, Augustine, City of God: Those which are portents, we say are against nature, but they are not: for how is it against nature, that which happens by the will of God?

§ 72. To the other Gloss which says that they happen against nature, it should be said that this is true with respect to the other two genera of causes, namely natural and seminal: because they were not according to natural or seminal causes.

§ 73. TO THAT which is further asked, it should be said that as the Commentator says upon Book XI of the Metaphysics, nothing is in potency in anything unless it is drawn out of it by one mover according to nature: and this the Philosopher also implies, saying that white is made from non-white: and not from just any non-white, because not from the non-white which is a line: but from the non-white which is black, or a medium, that is, which is a principle in the proper matter of white: and therefore when Augustine says that some things were implanted in the first condition so that it is necessary for them to happen, he does not mean of the necessity of existing, but of the necessity which is in the sufficiency of natural principles, namely that they have in natural causes a mover and a moved and dispositions, and all things which are required for their happening: and therefore that which is objected to the contrary is not valid: because this is true of the necessity of existing in being: but when he says that He implanted some things so that they can happen, he means that the word can denotes a potency of obedience on the part of nature only, which has no mover in all the principles of nature, but outside, because they happen by the working of God's will alone.

§ 74. TO THE OBJECTION to the contrary, it should be said that there is an equivocation of potency: because there it is understood of a potency having a mover in nature: but here of a potency of obedience only: just as we say that in a tree trunk there is a potency, that from it a calf could be made by God: yet it is not in it so that it is made from it [naturally]: because for it to happen in act an acting principle is also required: and this is not in the tree trunk.

Articulus 7 — What Are Called, and How They Differ, Primordial Causes, Causal Reasons, Natural Causes, and Seminal Causes

What are they called, and how do primordial causes, causal reasons, natural causes, and seminal causes differ?

What are they called, and how do primordial causes, causal reasons, natural causes, and seminal causes differ?

§ 79. But it seems that primordial causes are natural: because 1. He says below, that even seminal causes are primordial with respect to those things which are made from them. 2. Also, causal reasons seem to be the same as natural ones: because nothing of natural things happens which does not have the reason of an end: since therefore a reason primarily bespeaks an end, it seems that a natural cause and a rational one are the same. 3. Also, seminal causes and natural causes seem to be the same: because a seed is the appropriated nature of a species: therefore it has a natural cause, and a natural cause is that from which a species is made and conserved.

§ 80. SOLUTION. It should be said that Augustine posits all these names without distinction, and many have made a manifold distinction here, nor does the distinction of one agree with another: and therefore I will not posit their sentences, but according to the accounts of the names I will posit one. A primordial cause, therefore, is so called in two ways, namely simply first, and first in a certain respect. The simply first is the idea in the divine mind, which is related to all ideated things whether they be marvels or natural things: and this is called hidden in God from eternity. But it is called primordial in a certain respect in two ways, namely universally, and particularly. Universally, like the causes of essence or natural causes, which are implanted in the first condition of things with respect to all things which are in it, whether so that it is necessary for them to happen, or so that they can happen. And thus primordial causes have under them causal reasons, and natural causes, and seminal causes. But particularly, any causes which precede the origin of that which is made from them are called primordial: and this sense the Master touches upon in the Letter: and thus sometimes natural and seminal causes are primordial, and they differ according to the accounts of the name.

§ 81. But causes which are called causal reasons, are properly with respect to those things which are so implanted that the first condition of things has nothing but a potency of obedience to them, namely by which they can be made from it: but they do not have the necessity of principles in nature: and I say this by this reason, because a reason looks to the end: and such things are always done to indicate that which is simply the end, namely the state of grace and glory.

§ 82. Also, a reason bespeaks something simpler than the thing, because it is drawn from the thing: a cause also does not always bespeak an intrinsic principle: and therefore causal reasons according to the name denote a potency implanted in the first condition with respect to works which are drawn out from it miraculously and not naturally.

§ 83. But when he says natural causes, he means an intrinsic principle, but not necessarily a proper one: because the Philosopher says that nature is the cause of the order of the universe: and therefore natural causes are properly the universal contexture of causes in created things disposed and ordered, as was said above. Yet there are those who say, because nature is principally form, that the formal cause is called here the natural cause: but this is not true...

according to the usage of Augustine, as is easily evident to one examining the intention of Litzere.

However, seminal causes add a property over natural ones to this or that species.

From this, therefore, the reason is evident for what was said in the preceding question, that miracles occur against natural and seminal causes, but not against causal reasons and primordial causes.

It must be noted here that some miracles seem to be against natural causes, some above, some beyond these: the reason for which is this: because some miracles have something in which nature can also act, but not in that manner: as a blind man seeing, after he had eyes: and a dead man living after the return of the soul, and the like: for living, seeing, walking, are natural acts: but the return to such things through a miracle is beyond nature. However, it seems to be against natural causes when an act indeed exists while the contrary disposition remains through nature: as if someone remaining blind were to see: and thus is the singular miracle of the glorious Virgin in childbirth: because while virginity, which is a contrary property to childbirth, remained, she gave birth. However, it is above nature when it is terminated in an act into which nature cannot: such as the glory of bodies, and the miracle of the incarnation in the unity of deity and humanity.

And let these things said about the miracle suffice.

Articulus 8 — Whether the Soul Is from Propagation, namely the Vegetative, the Sensitive, and the Rational

Whether the soul is from transmission, namely vegetative, sensitive, rational?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "Just as the body of a woman," etc.

For here the question arises, Whether the soul is from transmission? and, because it is treated elsewhere at length, therefore here I briefly pass over it by objecting theologically thus:

1. Genesis 46:26 says: "All the souls that went with Jacob into Egypt, and came out of his thigh": therefore the soul is sown with the body, therefore it is from transmission like the body.
2. Likewise, the soul contracts original sin: but in the body there is no original sin, as will be clear below, because the body is not susceptible to sin and guilt: therefore it does not contract from the body: therefore it is necessary that it is from the soul of the parent: therefore it is from transmission from the soul of the parent.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the soul is in the seed like an artisan in the artifact: therefore it seems that it is sown there: therefore from transmission.
4. Likewise, he says that embryos live the life of a plant: but they do not live except through the soul: therefore they have a soul: and not unless it is sown: therefore the soul is from transmission.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
The soul is the act of a physical body having the potential for life: and this does not pertain only to the rational soul, but also to the vegetative, as the Philosopher says, and the sensitive: therefore it is not in the seed, nor can it be.

Solution. It must be said that according to Catholic faith, and according to the Philosophers, no soul is from transmission, neither of a plant, nor of a brute, nor of a human: and through the error of natural science contrary opinions have been induced: for some say that spiritual matter is divided with the seed, from which the soul of a brute and a vegetative is made: and no Philosopher ever felt this, as is evident in their books, Aristotle in books XV and XVI of the Animals, and Avicenna who explains Aristotle's words entirely in another way. And similarly Averroes in a certain book on the Virtue of the formative power.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the whole is put for the part: because the body exists from the thigh.

To the other, it must be said that the soul contracts original sin from the flesh: and therefore it is not valid, it is not in the flesh: therefore it is not contracted from the flesh: just as if it were said, liquefaction and heating are not in the sun: therefore they are not contracted from it: for this reasoning does not hold except in univocal agents, and not in equivocal agents. However, it could be said that it is in the flesh as in a cause, and not as in a subject.

To the other, it must be said that Aristotle explains himself in book XVII of the Animals, and Avicenna and Averroes expound that the power of the soul is called there the soul: and this is the formative power, which is given to the seed by the power of the genitals completely, also dispositively by the heart, and liver, and brain, and materially by the whole body: and this is called the soul because of the act of the soul.

If you say that power is not without a subject: and therefore if there is power there, there is a subject: I say that the argument arises from a bad understanding of natural things: because the power of the soul is twofold, namely effective or efflux from the soul into the body: and its subject in the seed is the corporeal spirit of the seed, which relies on heat, as Aristotle says, namely the first, of the element which is directing, and the second, of the heaven which is moving towards substance and species, and the third, of the soul which is forming and shaping the organs.

And this power is indeed without a subject. However, there is another part of the power of the soul, and this cannot be without a subject.

To the other, it must be said that the seed is said to live, just as the egg of the wind is said to live by the Philosopher in the same book: and this is from the act of nourishment and potential: because the seed is likened to a son going out of the father's house, who carries a part of the substance with him, and multiplies it by trading: thus the seed brings with it a part of the substance from which the roots are made, and attracts a part from elsewhere from the seed of the mother or menstrual blood: and that nourishment is for the formation of the organs: and therefore it is equivocal to the nourishment of the vegetative soul.

However, how no soul is from transmission and none in the seed, is shown elsewhere diligently: through these, however, the solution of the objections is sufficiently clear.

DISTINCTIO XIX

Divisio Textus

Here, several questions are usually asked about the state of the first man, etc.

Here, he determines certain consequent questions concerning the state of both, namely Adam and Eve.

And there are three questions. The first is about their immortality according to the difference from that which we will have in the homeland after the resurrection. The second, Whether that immortality was from nature or from grace? there, B, It is usually asked here, When The third, Whether the first man, etc., had immortality from the tree of life? there, C,

But it is still asked, If not, etc.

From these, in the following disputation, the opinion is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether Man Is Immortal According to the Soul

Whether man according to the soul is immortal?

Whether man according to the soul is immortal?

Concerning the first, two questions arise which are both diligently treated elsewhere. The first is, Whether man according to the soul is immortal? The second, Whether the first man in the body could be immortal?

To the first, it proceeds thus: It seems that the soul dies with the body, because

1. Solomon says, "The fate of humans and animals is the same."
2. Also, Wisdom 2:1: "There is no one who has been recognized to have returned from the dead."
3. Also, by physical reasons thus: Whatever things are defined to each other by essential definition, neither of them can exist without the other: body and soul are defined to each other by essential definition: therefore neither of them can exist without the other. This is evident in itself. The second is proved by the definition that the soul is the act of a physical body having the potential for life. And that it is essential is evident because otherwise the soul would be united to the body accidentally: and thus there would not be one substance from body and soul, which is false.
4. Also, no form has existence except in a subject and in matter: the soul is a form, as the Philosopher says: therefore it does not have existence except in a subject and matter: therefore, with the body not existing, the soul does not exist.
5. Also, according to the Philosopher, something is corporeal in two ways, namely because it is from contraries, or because it is carried over by being upon a composite from contraries, or essentially joined to it. And those are corrupted accidentally: the soul, however, thus carried or joined, is upon a composite from contraries: therefore it is corporeal.

But on the contrary, the Masters object with probable reasons, taking entirely proven authorities from the Philosopher, namely,

1. The intellect is the act of no body: therefore it is not corrupted by the corruption of any body.
2. Also, the soul relates to the body as a sailor to a ship: but the sailor is separable: therefore the intellect and soul.
3. Also, they object from certain conveniences thus: Since where there is to find extremes, there must be a medium: but we find an incorruptible spiritual substance not joined to a body, like Angels: and a corruptible spiritual substance joined to a body, like the sensitive and vegetative soul: therefore there will be a middle substance, namely an incorruptible spiritual substance joined to a body: and this cannot be corruptible: because if it is corruptible, it is either corruptible per se, or per accidens: not per se: because nothing is corruptible per se except what is composed of contraries, which cannot pertain to a spiritual substance: per accidens, however, it cannot be corruptible, since it is joined to what is corruptible per se: therefore one medium remains, namely an incorruptible spiritual substance joined to a body. And many other similar things I have placed elsewhere.

One is the reasoning of Avicenna, which is better than all others: for it is doubtful what others who follow Philosophy would respond to such propositions if they were proposed to them. The reasoning of Avicenna is physical, and it is this: If the soul is corrupted with the corrupted body, it is either corrupted per se, or per accidens. If per se, since according to Philosophy nothing is corrupted per se, except what has potential from the composition of contraries to non-being, it is necessary for the soul to have simultaneously the act of existing as now, and the potential of not existing: either according to the same, or according to different things. Not according to the same: because the same is never the principle of existence: because existence is from form, and the principle of corruption is the composition from contraries: therefore it will have this from different things: therefore it has in itself a composite from contraries, namely hot, cold, moist, dry, and form: therefore it is a body, or the harmony of a body: and both of these are disproved by the Philosopher in the first book of On the Soul. If, however, it is corrupted per accidens: this cannot be, unless because according to being it depends on the body. Either therefore it depends on it as on what is simultaneous according to nature and being, or as on a prior, or as on a posterior. If as on what is simultaneous, then it would be necessary that they are relative to each other: because only those are simultaneous by intellect: but all correlatives are opposites, from which one is never made: therefore from body and soul one is never made. If as from a prior: either as from a prior in time, or as from a prior cause. If the first: therefore now the rational soul will be in matter as in potential: but every such form is drawn out from matter and is its act, and does not have operation except in matter: therefore the rational soul is the act of the body, and does not have operation except in the body, which was disproved above, since its principal operation is not perfected except by abstracting from the body and the appendages of matter, as is understanding. If, however, it depends as from a prior cause: this cannot be as from matter, since this has already been disproved: therefore as from an efficient, or final cause: and each of those is evidently false: because in the causality of the efficient, and form, and end, the soul relates more to the body, than conversely. Moreover, the efficient and matter do not coincide in the same, and the body, as proved by all Philosophers, is the matter of the soul: therefore it is not the efficient cause, or end. If, however, it depends on it as from a posterior. On the contrary: the prior can exist without the posterior: therefore the soul can exist without the body.

You should know, however, that this disposition depends on two others: one of which is, that the soul is a substance: and the other, that it is not a corporeal power which is divided when the body is divided: and all these reasons with the preambular questions according to the physical order are placed elsewhere.

Solution. There is no doubt that the soul is immortal, nor is there anyone who doubts, except one who diligently seeks the life of beasts.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Solomon speaks there in the manner of a preacher, but not in the manner of one asserting: whence he also says many other foolish things there by collecting.

To the other, it must be said that the impious erring ones said that, who do not judge the honor of the souls of the saints.

To the other, it must be said that the soul is the entelechy of a physical body: but from this it does not follow that it is not separable: but rather that it has substantial dependence, because it is not perfect, as exercising all operations in the body, but some: and therefore it is proved to be separable.

To the other, it must be said that if it were joined to the body as a form drawn out from it, which fulfills all its operations in it, then the argument would proceed: but it is not so, and therefore even the sensitive and vegetative soul, in brutes and plants, are corruptible: and they are not in the image of God: but the rational soul is immortal in the image of God. Whence upon that, "In the image man passes," the Gloss says: The soul is made immortal, and Gregory in the book of Dialogues: Man, as he is created in the middle, so he communicates with the higher and lower nature, immortal in spirit with the Angel, mortal and corruptible in body with the beast.

Articulus 2 — Whether the First Man Could Have Been Immortal in Body; And Whether Adam in the First State Received a Passible Soul or a Passible Body

Whether the first man could have been immortal in body? And, whether Adam in the first state received a passible soul or a passible body?

ARTICULUS HW.

Whether the first man could have been immortal in body? And, whether Adam in the first state received a passible soul or a passible body?

Secondly, it is asked, whether man could have been immortal according to the body in the first state.

And it seems that he could: because

1. Punishment does not precede guilt: but death is the greatest of punishments: therefore, before the sin of man, it could not have occurred: therefore, before sin, man was immortal.

1. Likewise, Wisdom 1:13-16: God did not make death... But the impious by hands and words summoned it. Therefore, it seems that death would never have been acquired, except by the words and hands of the impious, namely the speaking serpent, and the extending hand of Eve: therefore, before that impiety, man was immortal.
2. Likewise, according to the justice of God, it would be for the soul to always remain under the one governing it through obedience, and for the body to remain under its governance at its command: therefore, the body would never have been separated from the soul: but it would have always remained under the obedience of God, if it had not sinned: therefore, the body would never have been dissolved by death.
3. Likewise, Isidore says that if man had not sinned, neither fire would burn, nor thorn prick, nor sword cut: therefore, it seems that he would have truly been immortal. And this same is said in the Book, and is held by Augustine, as is evident.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Man had in the first state a body composed of contraries: therefore, there was conflict in his body: therefore, the body could become infirm and dissolve when composed.

1. Likewise, everything composed of heavy and light elements is composed of those whose motions according to place are contrary: but these will sometimes separate and stand apart, as the Philosopher says in IV De Caelo et Mundo: therefore, it seems that man, since he was composed in the first state, was corruptible.
2. Likewise, he had a soft body: therefore, it was cuttable and divisible.
3. Likewise, the Philosopher says that everything generated will be corrupted in a determined time: Adam's body was something similar to what was generated: therefore, it would have been corrupted in a determined time.

But because these reasons are worth nothing, since the Philosophers never knew anything about this state of nature,

It is further asked, whether he received a passible soul in the first state, or a passible body?

It seems not: because the soul does not properly suffer except from the passion of the body: therefore, it seems if then the body could not suffer, neither could the soul suffer with it.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. He could know: but he does not know except through the reception of the known, and to receive is a kind of suffering: therefore, he had a passible soul.

1. Likewise, he could desire: and desire does not occur except something suffering in the appetitive power: therefore, he could suffer.
2. Likewise, contraries are naturally made around the same: and he could rejoice: therefore, also be sad: therefore, feel pain: because sadness is from the sense of pain.

Therefore, this disputation through these reasons is worth nothing. It seems to me that when it is asked, whether man was mortal or immortal in the first state? it must be distinguished. Therefore, when it is said immortal, it can be the privation of the act of death: and thus it is conceded by all that he was immortal, remaining in the first state. However, it can be the privation of the power of dying: and this in two ways, namely, the power disposed to dying through the habit of immortality: and it is still conceded that he was immortal, because he did not have such a power for dying, but rather a disposition contrary to death: or it can deprive the power alone which is called material, and is only in material and natural principles: and in this way, he does not seem to have been immortal, but rather mortal: because he had the material and natural power of dying, although it was bound by the contrary habit: and it is like the power of opening in a door indeed revolving on a hinge, but closed by a very firm bolt so that it may not be opened. On this, infinite authorities can be adduced.

TO THE REASONS, therefore, which seem to prove that he was corruptible and mortal: it must be said first, that the Philosophers knew nothing about this immortality, nor did they speak anything: then it can be said that those reasons hold concerning the natural principles of Adam: but they could not go into the act of dying, because they were bound by the habit of immortality through grace, as will be evident below.

As for what is further asked, whether he was passible? It must be said that the passibility of the soul was disputed in III Sentences, in the treatise on the Passion of the soul of Christ only: however, it can be said here that to suffer is said from the Greek πάσχειν, which is to receive in Latin: and thus he was passible both in body and in soul: because in the soul he received species, and in the body food. It is also said to suffer from a contrary affecting the sufferer and transmuting: and thus he could not suffer either in soul because of the habit of grace of the first state, which was contrary to this passion, nor did it allow it to fall into it. It is also said to suffer from a contrary altering and casting out from substance: and thus in no way was he passible, neither in body nor in soul.

To what is objected, that contraries are naturally made around the same, it must be said that it is not valid: for if one is present by nature as heat to fire, then it does not hold. Likewise, if one is present by confirmation, again it does not hold: because joy is present to the blessed, and sadness cannot be present: and sadness to the damned, and joy cannot be present to them. Thus to Adam through experience good and joy were present: and evil and saddening could not be present, unless he first sinned, because of the habit of innocence preserving him from all saddening and harmful.

However, concerning impassibility, such a distinction can be made as was held in immortality.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Immortality of the Resurrection Will Be One and the Same with That Which Was in the First State

Whether the immortality of the resurrection will be one and the same with that which was in the first state?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, around the beginning: In the third state, it will have the ability not to die, and not the ability to die, etc.

And it is asked here, Whether the immortality of the resurrection and the first state is one and the same?

And it seems that it is so: because
1. Of one power, there is one act and complement: but the power of immortality is one in man and not two: therefore it seems that the act is one: since therefore that and this immortality are acts of that power, it seems that those immortalities are one.

1. Likewise, Augustine in the book On True Religion says that through Christ we have recovered what we lost in Adam: but in Adam we lost the immortality of the first state, and through Christ we have recovered the immortality of the third state: therefore the immortality of the first state and the third are one.

2. Likewise, Immortality signifies a natural power of resisting death, just as mortality signifies a natural impotence: but every natural power is from the victory of form over matter: since therefore there is one form, it seems there is one immortality.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. That of the first state was to be sustained by food: that which is of the resurrection does not need food: therefore it is not one immortality.

1. Likewise, They do not have one reason for the ability not to run, and the inability to run: therefore they do not have one reason for the ability not to die, and the inability to die: the immortality of the first state was according to the ability not to die, but the immortality of the third state will be the inability to die: therefore they are not of the same reason.

Solution. It must be said that immortality in man follows the state of free will just as every disposition of the human body according to the order of divine justice proceeds from free will: and therefore when the free will of man was able to sin and able not to sin, then the state of the body was able to die and able not to die: and just as one indisposed power of the soul is that which can sin, and that which can not sin: so one indisposed power of the body was that which could die, and not die: but in the first state free will was not disposed to sin, but was disposed by the grace of innocence and the will of the first condition not to sin, but it was not confirmed.

Likewise, In the first state there was not a disposition of the power to die: but there was a disposition not to die, but not confirmation. In the second state, however, the same power of free will was made under the necessity to sin, and the disposition not to sin was taken away: and therefore that power which was disposed not to die, was made under the necessity of death. In the third state, however, free will will be confirmed in the good in the blessed, and confirmation of immortality follows on the part of the body: and in the damned, it is confirmed or rather obstinate in evil, and the obstinacy of death follows, so that according to the saying of Bernard, they always die, and never completely die.

From this, therefore, it is clear that if it is asked about the power of dying and not dying, and the necessity of dying, and the impossibility of dying, one indisposed power is. If, however, it is asked about the disposed, it must be said that the disposed and disposition and habit is not one.

To that which is objected, it must be said that of one power there can be many acts ordered, complete and less complete, according to which the power progresses to perfection: but of one power according to true substantial being, it is true that there is only one substantial act: because of one matter there is one substantial form, but in well-being it is not so.

To the other, it must be said that this argument is made by Augustine, and he says that immortality habitually renders little, but a better recompense is given to us.

To the other, it must be said that although natural power is from form, nevertheless it is not entirely natural power from form in the same way: and therefore diverse natural powers are not made: when they are considered habitually or formally, although in the root of the indisposed power it was one.

Articulus 4 — Whether Immortality in the First State Was from Nature or from Grace

Whether immortality in the first state was from nature, or from grace?

Then it is inquired concerning the third part, there,

It is usually asked here, Since the first man, etc.

For it seems that that immortality was through nature:

1. For especially those things are called natural in which we are born: therefore it was especially natural for Adam that in which he was established.
2. Likewise, the same is the principle of life and the continuation of life. But the soul by nature is the principle of life: therefore of continuation: therefore it can continue life by nature: but immortality is nothing other than the continuation of life: therefore Adam was immortal by nature.
3. Likewise, if it were given to us having the effect of the continuation of life, and we by natural power could eat, and thus continue life, we would be said to live from natural things alone, and not from grace, since we would have in natural power to continue life for ourselves: therefore if the tree of life had the power of continuing life, and man the natural power of eating it, he continued life by nature, and not by grace: but it is said in Scripture, that he was immortal from the eating of the tree of life: therefore he was immortal by nature.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A nature composed of contraries does not have in itself the principle of incorruption: but Adam had a nature composed of contraries: therefore from nature he did not have the principle of his immortality.

1. Likewise, in Scripture it is said, that he was immortal from the benefit of grace: and all the authorities of Augustine say this, that he says, that just as it was ordained for the children of Israel that in forty years their garments would not grow old, so it was ordained for Adam that he would not die. But it is evident, that by nature there was no preservation of garments from aging: therefore neither was the immortality of Adam by nature.

Solution. It must be said, that immortality was by grace, and not by nature. And note, that just as in us, so for the immortality of Adam five things were required: of which the first is the continuation of order to the perpetual cause of life: and this was in that the soul was subjected to God, and the body to the soul, and the world to the body. For thus it was here: for it drew from the perpetual fountain of life, and thus poured perpetual life into the body. The second is a certain created habit which preserved the proportion of the body in the first composition and complexion, so that remaining in the same habit it would always live: and this habit was the created grace which he lost when the first order was interrupted. The third was the tree of life which disposed from the part of matter, removing from the body the causes of old age, and the hardening of the members, and the putrefaction of the humors: and therefore Augustine says, that the tree of life strengthened his body with stable health, because it always renewed the tenderness of the best complexion. The fourth was the food of other trees, which preserved that nothing would perish in the matter of the body, or of the radical moisture. The fifth was God protecting externally by this that all harmful things were subjected to him, and could not be against him, but for him. And therefore it is clear, that since immortality properly regards the first and second for a cause: the first as the efficient cause, and the second as the habitual and formal cause, that it was from grace, and not from nature: but the other three did not make immortality except as natural dispositions.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that those things in which we are born as in the principles constituting nature, are natural: but if we were born in grace, or in glory, it would be otherwise: and so it was also with the first man.

To the other it must be said, that this is doubtful and not proven, that by the same nature something constitutes life, and influences it: and perhaps the proposition is false, because no power of the soul nor of the plant nor of the brute ages and weakens, except accidentally. And the Philosopher says, If it is so and it is true of the eye, if it took the eye of a young person, it would see like a young person: of a donkey, like of the eye of a human: whence I think it must be said, that it is substantial to the soul to influence life to such a body, as composed and complexioned: but it is not natural to continue: because if this were natural, its perfection would not be complete, unless it had such a body; and this is not true according to natural Philosophy.

To the other it must be said, that the food of the tree...

§ 1. ...is nothing but a material disposition, and not the habit by which he was formally called immortal. And this is evident, because Elijah and Enoch are mortal, in that such a habit of immortality is deprived in them; although through the eating of the tree of life the disposition to death is removed in them from the body up to the time that God shall will.

Articulus 5 — Whether Adam Could Die without Sin

Whether Adam could have died without sin?

§ 5. Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, But it is still asked, if there had not been a precept that he should eat of the tree of life, etc.

§ 6. And two things are asked here, namely: whether Adam could have died without sin? and, Whether, having become mortal through the necessity of dying, he could have recovered immortality if he had had these two things, namely, penance and the eating of the tree of life?

§ 7. TO THE FIRST, one proceeds thus: It seems that he could have died without sin. Let us posit, as is posited in the Letter, that he had no precept to eat: then he would not have sinned if he had not eaten, and yet he would have had an animal body needing the nourishment of food: therefore, if he had not eaten, he would have been dissolved: therefore he would have died without sin.

§ 8. If you then say that he would have sinned by laying hands upon himself [i.e., starving himself]. On the contrary: Hunger is a penalty: therefore he would not have incurred hunger without fault: but he was not bound [to eat] unless he hungered: therefore, if he never hungered, he would never have laid hands upon himself: but if he had not sinned, he would never have hungered: therefore he was never bound to eat: therefore he would have died without sin.

§ 9. Item, let us separate sin from this: for let us posit that he was not bound to provide for himself by eating: then he would not have sinned in not eating, and yet he would have been dissolved by not eating, since he had an animal body: therefore he would have died without sin.

§ 10. ON THE CONTRARY: To everything that lives naturally, nothing is so contrary and penal as death: but Adam lived most naturally: therefore he would have died most penally: therefore the penalty of matter would have been without fault.

§ 11. Solution. To this some say that Adam, if that posit were made, would have been naturally dissolved without penalty. But this solution does not seem to be true: because death is at least a defect: and it is not to be thought that man would be subject even to a defect if he had not sinned.

§ 12. Moreover, it seems to be a fable that he would die in the best disposition of the body without lesion: since the soul naturally desires conjunction.

§ 13. Therefore others say, and I think more truly, that just as in us there is natural and violent death, and preservation from violent death is the prohibition of extrinsically harming things, while preservation from natural death is preservation from those things which corrupt intrinsically: for thus was the preservation of all interior things in the first man by the custody of free choice from sin: hence if there were no precept, I think that he would have sinned by not eating: because it was natural for him that he ought to eat: and reason dictated this.

-mal and in need of food, since with that posited, it would follow that he is bound to eat in a time of necessity. But if both of those are circumscribed: then it is true that he does not need eating, and he will not sin by not eating. But if he should say that he posits through an impossibility that he is an animal and does not need food: then nothing prevents an impossibility from following, namely, that he is immortal and not needing food: just as if I posit you to be an ass, it is not absurd for you to have four feet.

§ 2. TO THIS, however, which is objected concerning the sensation of hunger, it must be said that the first man had his entire body under the dominion of reason: and therefore he foreknew the hour of eating without hunger: and since he was bound to eat, if he sinned by not eating, it was not absurd for him to afterward feel hunger.

Articulus 6 — Whether Adam, Made Mortal by the Necessity of Dying, Could Have Recovered Immortality through Penance and the Eating of the Tree of Life

Whether Adam, having become mortal through the necessity of dying, could have recovered immortality through penance and the eating of the tree of life?

§ 6. Secondly it is asked, Whether through penance, and through the tree of life, he could have recovered the state of immortality?

§ 7. It seems that he could: because 1. Penance continues him to the fount of life from which unfailing life flows, and the tree removes the contrary disposition: therefore it seems that immortality would have been recovered.

§ 8. 2. Item, This seems from the letter of Genesis, where it is said: Now therefore lest perhaps he put forth his hand, and take of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever.

§ 9. Item, Enoch and Elijah continue life through the eating of the tree of life: therefore Adam too could have done this.

§ 10. ON THE CONTRARY: The prohibition and threat of the Lord was: In whatever day you eat of it, you shall die the death: therefore he incurred the necessity of death.

§ 11. Item, In the Letter is adduced what the Apostle says to the Romans 8:10: The body indeed is dead because of sin, that is, addicted to the necessity of death: therefore he could no longer become capable of not dying.

§ 12. Solution. It must be said that immortality could not be recovered through those two things.

§ 13. To that which is objected, it must be said that it does not belong to just any grace conjoining to God to bestow immortality: but rather to pure, uninterrupted grace: and this is not the grace of penance, but of first innocence.

§ 14. To the other it must be said that, as was previously held, from the tree of life there is nothing but a material disposition towards not dying: and if he had continued life from such eating, like Elijah and Enoch, he would nevertheless have had the habit of the necessity of dying at some point: and the tree of life does not remove that habit, just as it did not confer the first habit of the immortality of innocence, but it only impedes the act of death as long as it is consumed: and therefore he would not die: yet, eating of the tree of life after sin, he would have had the necessity of dying: and this would be rather a prolongation of misery than of grace: and therefore he was forbidden.

DISTINCTIO XX

§ 18. After these things it must be seen, how the first parents, etc. Here he treats of the generation of the first parents which would have been if they had not sinned. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he determines the mode of generation on the part of the act: in the second, on the part of the offspring born, there, D, But if it is asked, What kind, etc.

§ 19. In the first part there are two things, namely, how they would have united through sexual intercourse, and how long they would have remained in such a state, there, C, But concerning the term of time, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether the First Parents Would Also Have Begotten by Intercourse in the State of Innocence

Whether the first parents would have generated even through sexual union in the state of innocence?

§ 24. Concerning the first there are five doubts, namely, Whether they would have generated through sexual union? Secondly, Whether in the union there would have been any shameful concupiscence? Thirdly, Whether they would have generated with virginity remaining or corrupted? Fourthly, Whether they would have united for a cause other than the hope of offspring? Fifthly, Whether there would have been any resolution of foul superfluities in them?

§ 25. And concerning all these there is little doubt.

§ 26. To the first one objects thus: 1. Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, that nuptials are the good of mortals: therefore it seems that, with first immortality remaining, they would not have been carnally united.

§ 27. 2. Item, Damascene says, If they had not sinned, God would have multiplied the human race in another way than through coitus: therefore they would not have united.

§ 28. 3. Item, Generation is respectively opposed to corruption in the same nature: therefore if there had been no corruption, there would not have been such generation.

§ 29. 4. Item, Generation is for saving the same thing in species which cannot remain in the individual: but given that they had not sinned, they would have remained in the individual forever: therefore there would have been no generation for them through union.

§ 30. 5. Item, Generation is from the superfluity of nourishment: but if they had not sinned, there would have been nothing superfluous in them: therefore they would not have generated.

§ 31. 6. Item, Severance only occurs from a body: but that which can lose something is corruptible: therefore, gene-ration cannot occur except from a mortal body: therefore if they were not mortal, they would not have generated through a severance made from the body of the generator: therefore neither through natural carnal union.

§ 2. But against this: 1. Is what is said in the Letter.

§ 3. 2. Item, God formed sex in them: but sex is defined such that the male is generating in another of his own kind from his seed, while the female is generating in herself from another of her own kind: therefore either sex would be superfluous, or they would have generated in paradise.

§ 4. Solution. Without a doubt it is true to say that they would not have generated unless they had been united: however, some say that if they had not sinned, the multiplication of the human race would have been just as Eve was formed from the rib; and that God, foreknowing the fall, formed sex in them: and therefore He did not form in them only what was fitting for the first state, but also what was fitting for the second. But this is a fable, since Scripture says, Let us make him a helper like unto himself; and a woman could not be called a helper of man except for generation.

§ 5. Therefore it must be said to the first, that the first man was mortal through the nature of the principles from which he was composed, but immortal through the grace of innocence, as has been held: and therefore, since coitus is an act of nature, he would have generated through coitus.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that "another mode" can refer to concupiscence conjoined to the act and the foulness of infirmity: and thus the saying of Damascene is true. It can also refer to the act of union: and thus it is false.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that indeed the generated and the corrupted, or the generable and the corruptible, are not relatively opposed: but they accompany one another, namely in this way, that if one is present, the other is present: because what is generable by nature is corruptible by nature: and this is well conceded concerning the first man, as was held.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that this must be referred to nature, and not to the state of grace.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that there would have been a severance and a superfluity: but such a severance and superfluity would not have induced corruption, with grace and the eating of the tree of life prohibiting it: and physically speaking, this would be per accidens: hence those arguments are not compelling.

Articulus 2 — Whether in the State of Innocence, in Intercourse, There Would Have Been Any Shameful Concupiscence or Titillation

Whether in the state of innocence there would have been any shameful concupiscence, or titillation, in the union?

§ 13. Secondly it is asked, Whether there would have been any titillation in the union?

§ 14. It seems that there would: 1. For divine being is maximally desired by nature: but divine being is permanence: therefore permanence is maximally desired: but by coitus nature acts toward divine being: therefore it will maximally desire coitus: therefore in the act of coitus it will maximally delight: because then it is conjoined to the desired thing according to act: therefore there would have been maximal delight in coitus in paradise.

§ 15. 2. Item, Adam was sensible: but sensation is in the nerves, especially according to nature: therefore touching the nerves lightly and fittingly would maximally induce delight: but this is the seed in coitus: therefore in the descent of the seed he would have had maximal delight.

§ 16. 3. Item, Heat subserves generation, making the seed run, and distending the genital members: but with such a disposition existing in the body, delight arises: therefore it seems that it would have been necessary to have delight.

§ 1. 4. If you say that there would not have been pleasure binding reason. On the contrary: It is connatural to man that when one potency is fortified in act, another is abstracted: therefore, with the delight of touch being fortified inasmuch as it can be, reason will be abstracted: therefore since this is in coitus, reason would also have been absorbed in the first state.

§ 2. But against this is [what is found] in the Letter: because 1. Such a bed would not be with lethal concupiscence which binds reason, but immaculate.

§ 3. 2. Item, In the Letter it is said that they would have used those members solely at the command of reason: therefore they would not have grown into concupiscence beyond the command of reason.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that they would have had delight in coitus in the first state, but subjected to reason, just as in eating and drinking, and not commotioning the body nor binding reason: nor would the members have been excited, except as much, and as long, and when reason would have willed.

§ 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that that desire and the desired thing would not have exceeded the bounds prefixed to it by reason.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that the touch of the nerves in the genital places could not have occurred except by the command of reason, and the effect not except under reason.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that that heat would then have been the servant of reason, and therefore would not have extended itself above reason, which would have been the cause of the first motion, and ordering all the acts of the human body to the decency of the state of first justice.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that binding concupiscence does not exist without preceding or concomitant sin: hence the fact that reason suffers this violence that it is abstracted, is an effect of sin: and the Philosophers who said this knew only the state of corrupted nature, and not of first innocence.

Articulus 3 — Whether the First Parents Would Have Come Together with Virginity Remaining or Corrupted

Whether the first parents would have united with virginity remaining or corrupted?

§ 12. Thirdly it is asked, Whether they would have united with virginity remaining or corrupted?

§ 13. It seems that it would be corrupted: because 1. Generation does not occur unless there is a mixture of seeds: but such an act in the man, and such a reception in the woman do not occur unless the pathways of the man are opened for inseminating, and of the woman for receiving, and also for inseminating: but this opening is the corruption of virginity: therefore the corruption of virginity would have been in the first state.

§ 14. 2. Item, If they had united with virginity remaining in the first state: then giving birth in virginity would not have been miraculous in the Blessed Virgin, which is absurd: therefore virginity would have been lost.

§ 15. 3. Item, Natural things are not removed by sin, but wounded: if therefore this were natural to them then, they would still have it now, albeit with greater difficulty.

§ 16. ON THE CONTRARY: A virtue or a state of virtue is not corrupted except through vice, or that which is from vice: but then there would have been no vice, or libidinous act from vice: therefore there would have been no corruption of virtue or of the state of virtue: virginity is a virtue, or a state of virtue: therefore then it would not have been corrupted.

§ 17. Solution. Such questions are rather foolish than that one should labor long in them: nevertheless they are introduced here by some.

§ 18. Therefore it must be said that the corruption of virginity can mean violence or the interruption of the meditation of perpetual integrity: and thus it would not have been in the first state: because neither could violence be there, nor could suffocating pleasure interrupt the habitual meditation of perpetual vir-

-ginity: but if corruption means the simple opening of the gates of propagation, then in the first state virginity would have been corrupted: and therefore in the first state marriage was of greater glory than virginity: because coitus brought no ignominy, and it brought the utility of offspring; and therefore also because they had it as a precept to unite, when it was said to them: Increase and multiply.

§ 2. And if it is asked: When was this precept relaxed? It must be said that it was given from a cause: and therefore while that cause existed it held, and would still hold, and it held before sin: now this cause was the paucity of humans: but once a multitude was made, and with many hastening to marriage, they are absolved, flying to the fruit of a better life for the sake of a better good which is against the foulness that is conjoined to coitus from sin.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 4 — Whether in the First State They Would Have Come Together for a Cause Other Than the Hope of Offspring

Whether in the first state they would have united for a cause other than the hope of offspring?

§ 7. Fourthly it is asked, Whether they would have united for a cause other than the hope of offspring?

§ 8. And it seems that they would: because 1. Coitus in itself was delectable: therefore it provoked appetite in itself, even when no other cause existed.

§ 9. 2. Item, Marriage is not only for the hope of offspring, but also for the good of faith, and for the good of the sacrament: therefore, invited by these goods, the man could be moved to coitus beyond the hope of offspring.

§ 10. But against this is that in the first state (as the Saints say) marriage was only for the office of nature: but according to what is for the office of nature, it is only in the hope of offspring: therefore they would not have united except in the hope of offspring.

§ 11. FURTHERMORE it is asked, Whether each would have had his own [wife], or one would have indifferently known any one or many?

§ 12. It seems that many: because many can be fecundated by one: therefore since no libido prohibited it, he could have had many.

§ 13. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Bigamy is vituperated in the first bigamist: therefore it would be much more vituperable in the first state.

§ 14. 2. Item, Adam said: They shall be two in one flesh: and he did not say, three or four, or one in the flesh of two or three.

§ 15. Solution. It must be said that they would never have known one another without the hope and certainty of offspring: because every coitus would have fecundated the woman.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that those goods do not cause marriage through the act: but it causes the good of faith through consent, and through conjunction with God and through an undivided life: and therefore those would not have invited to coitus then, as they do now.

§ 17. To the other it must be said that one would have had only one.

§ 18. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this was not necessary then, since there was nothing inciting and drawing back from the worship of God: but all the seed, just as it would have received the propagation of the flesh, so it would have received original justice: and then the fulfillment of the number of the elect could be awaited gradually, especially since there was not even a dwelling in misery causing tedium in life. But after sin, since the senses were prone to evil, and the devil was everywhere instigating to idolatry, it was permitted to some to have many, so that the multiplication of the number of the elect might be retained in them up to the time when the fullness of the Gentiles should en-ter through spiritual fecundity in Christ: when again spiritual generation would have place through the word of preaching.

Articulus 5 — Whether There Would Have Been in Them the Dissolutions of Superfluities, Such as Pollutions, Menses, Evacuations, and Urine

Whether there would have been in them resolutions of superfluities, such as pollutions, menses, egestions, and urine?

§ 5. Fifthly it is asked, Whether there would have been in them resolutions of superfluities, such as pollutions, menses, and egestions, and urine, and sweats, and the like?

§ 6. And it seems that there would not: because these imply a certain foulness, which foulness signifies a penalty: but a penalty could not exist before sin.

§ 7. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. It is certain that God made in them members receptive of humid superfluity, like the bladder: and receptive of dry superfluity, like the stomach, and intestines.

§ 8. 2. Item, He made open pores in them through which sweats might be emitted. Now these would have been idle if there were no superfluity.

§ 9. 3. If you say that nourishment which is not very suitable is emitted: but then it would have been entirely suitable, and thus nothing would be emitted: this is impossible: because then digestion would not have been necessary, but it would have been consumed before it was eaten.

§ 10. Moreover, it is fabulous to say such things.

§ 11. Solution. It must be said that certain resolutions attest to a corrupting superfluity or to a debilitating of the retentive virtue: and those would not have been in the first parents, such as pollution, menses, and sweats, and the like. But some are natural, like feces, and urine, and spit, and the like: and those would have been, as I think, yet without shame and the stench of foulness.

Articulus 6 — Whether the Marital Act Is and Ought to Be Called a Sin

Whether the matrimonial act is and ought to be called a sin?

§ 16. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, towards the end: For infirmity prone to ruin, etc.

§ 17. For from this it seems that the matrimonial act is a sin: because nothing is ordained unless it is inordinate: but nothing is inordinate unless it is with fault.

§ 18. Solution. The matrimonial act sometimes proceeds from reason as the first mover, as when it is in the hope of offspring, and with a view to the justice of rendering the debt: and then it is not a sin, neither venial nor mortal, but a merit. Or, as the annexed concupiscence is ordained not so that one may fall, but because one would fall if there were no marriage: and then some say that it is a venial sin, but a small one: and there is a place to inquire about this in the treatise on marriage.

Articulus 7 — Whether the First Parents Would Have Begotten Offspring Strong, Perfect in Due Quantity, and Knowing

Whether the first parents would have generated offspring that were strong, perfect in proper quantity, and possessing knowledge?

§ 22. Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, D, But if it is asked, What kind, etc.

§ 23. For the opinion of the Master seems to be false: because 1. The nature of man is more worthy than that of a brute: therefore it is irrational that this would have been granted to a brute, that it should walk and eat, and not to man.

§ 24. 2. Item, in the last part, H, the Master says the same thing even on the part of the soul: therefore the children would have been ignorant: but ignorance is a penalty of sin? Therefore they would have felt a penalty before fault.

§ 25. Solution. Concerning all these things many inquiries have been made elsewhere. Hence here it must be said briefly concerning this, that the softness of the limbs is contrary to walking, and the softness of the limbs attests to the most noble complexion according to the qualities of touch, which constitute the subject and the body, and therefore they are of nobility rather than ignobility: and therefore it was not a defect. But other terrestrial animals have an earthy complexion, and therefore hard and rigid limbs, and hairy skin: and all this belongs to ignobility: and this moved the Master.

§ 26. To that which is objected concerning perfection according to the soul, it must be said that it is not natural that, with the complexion of the brain being soft and fluid, there should be a strong impression of species and a strong conversion upon them: but such a flux is in children: and therefore the Philosopher says in Physics VII, that by sitting and resting the soul becomes knowing and prudent: and he refers rest and sitting to the motion of a fluid complexion in diverse directions. Hence I think that just as the Master says, that children in infantile age would not have had knowledge according to act because of the humidity of the organ, but nevertheless they would have had the habit of all knowable things by nature innate to them in the soul: just as we now say concerning baptized infants, that they have virtues as a gift, and not in use: and this would not have been a penalty, but nature.

Articulus 8 — What and How Many Precepts God Gave to the First Parents; And Why He Expressed Two of Nature and One of Discipline

What and how many precepts did God give to the first parents? and, Why did He express two of nature, and one of discipline?

§ 30. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, K, at the end: He added a precept of obedience, etc.

§ 31. For here the Master intimates that He imparted some precept through natural reason, and outwardly impressed another. And it is asked, How many and what are they?

§ 32. Item, it is asked, Why did He express two of nature, namely eat, and increase, etc., and gave only one of discipline, namely of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil do not eat?

§ 34. Solution. It must be said that there are two things in man: reason, and body; or soul, and body: now according to the soul He impressed the law of nature which is universally in these: What you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another; and what you wish to be done to you, do to others: and these precepts regard the conversation of life in human society. But on the part of the body, he was an animal, and multipliable through the severance of seed:

and therefore for the custody of the individual he received one, namely, Of every tree of paradise eat: but another for multiplication in species, such as, Increase and multiply. Now there were only these three things in the life of man: two within himself, and one toward another: and therefore he did not receive more precepts of nature. But he received one of discipline so that obedience might be easier, and the transgressor more accusable: but they are called precepts of nature because nature inclined toward them according to the first state of animality.

§ 4. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 5. The devil also seeing, etc. Here therefore concerning the fall of man. And it is divided according to those things which are in every fall, namely the cause of the fall, and from what he falls. And this is treated in distinction 24, there, A, Now to be diligently investigated, etc. But in distinction 30 he determines into what he fell, there, A, In the superior things it was insinuated, etc.

§ 1. This distinction has four parts: in the first of which he describes the advent and species of the tempter; in the second, the mode and progress of the temptation, there, C, But the temptation, etc. In the third, he touches upon the cause why the sin of man is remediable, and not that of the angel, there, F, Furthermore the angelic nature, etc. In the fourth, he touches incidentally that by the saying of the woman it is proved that the mandate was given not to the man alone, but also to the woman, there, G, That also is to be noted, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Temptation Is By Definition

What is temptation by definition?

§ 6. Five doubts occur concerning the first: of which the first is, What is temptation? Second, Who is the tempter? Third, Whether temptation is to be desired? Fourth, Whether every temptation is a sin, or necessarily with sin? Fifth, Whether every temptation is from the devil?

§ 7. TO THE FIRST, one proceeds thus: Cassiodorus in his Commentary on the Psalms says, "Temptation is the assimilation of good for the sake of deceiving."

§ 8. Master Hugh of St. Victor defines it thus: "To tempt is to experience craftily, and before a violent impulsion, to test as it were by certain flattering attempts."

§ 9. But an objection is raised against the first definition: because 1. Genesis 22:1: God tempted Abraham:[188] but it is certain that it was not for the sake of deceiving: therefore that definition does not apply to every temptation.

§ 10. 2. Item, the Gloss, in the same place: "We say to tempt for that which is to prove": hence it is written, The Lord your God tempts you, that it may be made manifest whether you love Him or not.[189] For man ignores the strengths of his own love unless he knows it by experience: therefore it seems that temptation is not always for deceiving.

§ 11. 3. If you say that Cassiodorus understands this of the temptation of the devil. On the contrary: The devil does not always tempt in the assimilation of good, but rather sometimes concerning open evil: therefore that definition still does not apply, as it seems.

§ 12. 4. Item, temptation is for the acquisition of an experiment, as the Gloss seems to say on Genesis. But the tempter (as the Philosopher says) never takes the experiment of knowledge, but always of ignorance: therefore it seems that the devil in tempting never takes the experiment of our sin, but will remain ignorant of the sin.

§ 13. If you say that this is not to be understood of the temptation of the devil, concerning which the Master treats here, but of the temptation of a tempter in knowable things, because the tempter imitates the dialectician. On the contrary: Augustine says in the book of Questions of the Old and New Testament, on that question, Let not temptation apprehend you, etc.: "Everything which is not proved, is tempted, and comes into doubt." Therefore this is the same thing that the Philosopher says: therefore the tempter never acquires the experiment of knowledge.

§ 14. AGAINST THE SECOND DEFINITION, one proceeds thus: For what he says seems false, To tempt is to experience craftily: because 1. Augustine says in the memorated book: "In temptation we ought to be altogether robust, knowing not to the diminu-

...[profit] for our probation, but rather for an increase [in merit], provided we endure it with an even mind on account of Christ. [To the other argument it must be said regarding that] part, that this is not a cunning interrogation, nor a cunning way of testing.

§ 2. It also seems that the subsequent part does not fit, because there is never a violent impulse in temptation. For Gregory and Bernard say that the enemy is weak, who cannot conquer unless someone is willing: therefore, he can cause a violent impulse to no one.

§ 3. Also, what follows does not always fit, namely, to test by flattering efforts: because, as will be maintained below in the question, sometimes in tempting he terrifies by threatening, while at other times he breaks by despairing, and at other times he snatches by oppressing: and then he does not test by flattering efforts, as it seems.

Solution. It seems it must be said that these definitions are not understood of the temptation by which God and man tempt: but of that which is a motion and instinct toward the illicit, proceeding from the devil, or from the flesh, or from the world.

And to understand this, it must be known that temptation is spoken of in many ways: for sometimes it is an interrogation of testing in knowable things according to the speculative intellect: and this can occur in two ways, namely, regarding the universal principles of an art, which being known the art is not necessarily known, yet being ignored it is necessarily ignored: and in this way the tempter imitates the dialectician who proceeds from common things which are found in particulars, and he never acquires the experience of knowledge, but of ignorance. But sometimes he tempts regarding proper principles, which being known the conclusions proper to the art are necessarily known, and that tempter acquires the experience both of ignorance and of knowledge: and in this way temptation is not dealt with here.

Also, temptation is a proving through an experience of work, so that there may be certainty about the quantity of virtue which is present within, the experience of which is useful, either for humiliation if it is small and is believed to be great: or for presuming upon God if it is great and is believed to be small: or for exercise in the quantity of merit: and in this way God tempts the Saints, as Augustine says in the book of Questions of the Old and New Testament. There is also another temptation by which Abraham, and Tobias, and Job, the servants of God, were tempted: as Abraham through the tribulation of offering his only and most beloved son, so that he might have a more abundant fruit of justice for eternal glory. And Job by the loss of his entire substance, so that enriched in wealth he might be increased in heaven and on earth. And Tobias indeed, having suffered blindness of his eyes, became so advanced that in the present he was made glorious by receiving his eyes back, and perpetual clarity would be preserved for him in the future: because the just are proven for this, that they may advance: and in this way God tempts.

Also, in a third way, temptation is an interrogation through scourges: and this occurs in two ways, namely, whether one is faithful, so that man, not God, might know this: and in this way it is said: God tempted them, and found them worthy of Himself. The interrogation of the wicked is that they may recognize themselves: because, as Gregory says, "The eyes which guilt closed, punishment opens": and concerning this Augustine says in the aforementioned book: "The Jews are tempted on account of their lack of faith, so that, anguished, they may return to the way as penitents: for when they lacked faith in God's providence, they were tempted by serpents, so that, seized by pain, they might be amended." For God tempts in this way, so that He may correct such men.

In a fourth way, temptation is said to be a proving of divine providence or of the divine word, whether it is as Scripture says: and this happens in two ways, namely, by a contrary act provoking God: and this occurs when there is a lack of trust in God's power, and it is believed that the power is absent, as the Jews did, as it is said in the Psalm They tempted God in the desert. And elsewhere, Your fathers tempted me, and proved me, and saw my works and Augustine calls this temptation "divine," for the reason that it is to tempt God, and that is the most grave. In another way, it is to seek an experiment from God, regarding how much estimation the one who tempts holds, whether He wishes to perform a miracle for him rather than let him perish: and in this way God said to the devil You shall not tempt the Lord your God. Concerning the first, Augustine says in the same book that was mentioned: "Not without providence, as I judge, does the Apostle, the teacher of the Gentiles, wish not that temptation should not overtake us, but that it be only human: because a divine temptation produces destruction. For the Jews, overtaken by this, perished by the serpents: for acting under the law of God, they doubted His providence: and on this account he exhorts that not a divine, but a human temptation should overtake us. For he is said to be tempted by God, who acting under His name, hopes for salvation from idols: because he does not have a proven God." And Augustine understands that such a one is said to tempt God. But concerning the second mode of divine temptation, it is said in the Gloss on Deuteronomy[190], that he tempts God who, having something he can do, without reason commits himself to dangers, testing whether he can be delivered by God.

In a fifth way, temptation is called an interrogation through pondering about the help that a human can provide: and when man is found weak, to despair of human help: and the Apostle wishes this temptation for us (as Augustine says)[191], when he says: Let no temptation overtake you but such as is human. And these are Augustine's words: "But human temptation is salutary: because just as to tempt concerning God is destructive, so to despair of man on account of God's law is most salutary." Moreover, a human temptation is also spoken of by the same Augustine in the same place: by which we are tempted by man according to human sense: and there is despair concerning us acting under the law of God: and therefore we are tribulated by man: and these are his words: "Let no temptation," he says, "overtake you except human: so that, tempted by men on account of the law of God, we may be found strong by carnal men who doubt concerning us: but let us be proven to God, because those who are not proven are tempted so that they may be amended."

Temptation as it is defined in the previous definitions is taken in none of these ways. But it is spoken of in a fifth way [i.e., a further distinct way], when under the simulation of an apparent good the tempter devises evil, in order that he may incline the consent of the will to the illicit: and this temptation is sometimes from the enemy, sometimes from the flesh, and sometimes from the world, as will be clear below.

According to this, therefore, it must be answered to the objections, saying to the first and second, that they are not understood of those temptations by which God or man tempts.

To the next it must be said, that evil as evil does not move the appetite: but it must be that it is under the rationale of a good for the present time: and this is called the assimilation of the good: and it may well be that he tempts concerning that which is openly a sin, and then it is under the rationale of a good not simply, but for the present time: just as fornication is openly an evil, yet it has a delight for the present time, from the species of which it moves temptation.

To the next it must be said, that the devil does not tempt in order to test, but rather to incline consent: hence those arguments do not hold. And what Augustine says is understood of the temptation of man by which he tempts God: for the divine temptation is called by him that by which God is tempted, as was maintained earlier.

To that which is objected concerning the second definition , it must be said that the devil does not cunningly test the knowledge of sin: but rather he cunningly considers the inclinability of consent, and to what vice one is more easily inclined, so that he may prepare a snare for him.

To the next it must be said, that a violent impulse is spoken of in two ways, namely from violence inflicting force, or from violence drawing and instigating: and it is taken in this latter way in the definition.

To the next it must be said, that those temptations by which he terrifies by threatening, and the like, also proceed from the flattering of a proper good: for nothing is feared except on account of an excessive love of a proper good, as Augustine says. As to what is said, he snatches by oppressing, and breaks by despairing, those two do not state the first movement of temptation, but rather the effect following consent and the work of sin: and therefore they are not properly the machinations of temptation, but the effects which he causes in the sinner who has given the demon a place in himself through the merit of sin.

Articulus 2 — Who The Tempter Is

Who is the tempter?

Secondly it is asked, Who is the tempter? Now it seems that it is the devil: because

§ 1. The Apostle says Lest perhaps he who tempts has tempted you. And there the Gloss says: "Only the devil, whose office is to tempt."

§ 2. Also, Jerome on Jeremiah in the Original: "Whatever we sin, whatever we do day and night, and perpetrate of evil works, is the dominion of demons, who never give us rest, and always impel us to increase our offenses by our faults, and to make a heap of sins." And there are many other authorities on this.

ON THE CONTRARY: God tempted Abraham, etc., and God tempted them.

Furthermore it seems that neither the devil tempts, nor God, but concupiscence.

§ 1. Let no one when he is tempted, say that he is tempted by God: for God is not a tempter of evils, and He Himself tempts no man. But each one is tempted by his own concupiscence, etc.

§ 2. Also, it is said that the world, the flesh, and demons stir up diverse battles: therefore it seems that there are three tempters.

Solution. It must be said that if temptation is taken generally, then there are multiple tempters, but in different ways, as Augustine says: because God tempts to prove, that is, so that He may render one proven or amended, or may instruct. Man tempts, so that he may test. The devil tempts, so that he may seduce. And according to this distinction the adduced arguments are to be conceded.

To the first, however, it must be said that it is not the intention of the Apostle that every temptation is from the devil as the immediate mover, but that it is originally so: because he was the first to tempt, and made us temptable in evil.

To the next it must be said, that it is understood in the same way: for because the devil introduced sin, therefore from whatever proximate mover it may be, sin is always from him, as from the first mover.

190. Genesis 1:28.

To the next the solution is already clear, regarding how God tempts.

To the next it must be said, that concupiscence tempts as inclining from within, while the devil does so as suggesting from without.

To the next it must be said, that the division of those tempters is taken according to the things which can move the powers of the soul to evil. For this is either conjoined, or separated. If conjoined: then it is the flesh, that is, carnal concupiscence dispersed in the interior powers of the soul. If however it is separated, it is either by way of one suggesting from without, or by way of a mover and object. And in the first way the demons tempt: but in the second way the world, through the three things which are in it, namely riches, delights, and honors.

Articulus 3 — Whether Temptation Which Is Toward The Illicit Is To Be Desired

Whether temptation which is an inclination toward the illicit is to be desired?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether temptation which is an inclination toward the illicit, is to be desired?

It seems that it is: § 1. Prove me, O Lord, and tempt me, etc. Therefore, since the Prophet asks to be tempted, he also gives us an example of asking.

§ 2. Also, Count it all joy, my brothers, when you fall into various temptations. Now everything concerning which one must rejoice, is to be desired on account of merit. Therefore temptation is to be desired.

§ 3. Also, upon that text, There was given to me a thorn, the Gloss says: "He was not heard, because that temptation is the repression of pride." But this is good: therefore it is to be desired.

§ 4. Also, Gregory: "The holy man desires himself to be tempted after his virtues, lest by confidence in his virtues he rush into sin." But this is supremely to be desired: therefore it is also to be asked for.

§ 5. Also, by reason: for whatever is not a sin, but the material for exercising virtue, this is to be desired: a temptation to which consent is not given by sin (as the authority says) is not a sin, but the material for exercising virtue: therefore it is to be desired.

§ 6. Also, whatever is ordered to the advancement of merit without the fear of falling through sin, that is to be desired: such is temptation: therefore it is to be desired. The proof of the minor premise is through the preceding points regarding the fact that it is ordered to the increase of merit: but that there is no fear of falling is proven where the Apostle says God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able: but will make, etc.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. And lead us not into temptation.

§ 2. Also, Watch and pray, that you enter not into temptation. The spirit indeed is willing, etc.

191. Genesis 2:24.

§ 3. Also, the same thing is not to be desired by man which is sought by a demon: but the demon seeks us to tempt us: therefore this is not to be desired by man. Proof of the minor premise Simon, Simon, behold Satan has desired to have you, etc.

Solution. It must be said that temptation is not to be desired: because on the intention of the tempter, it is so that the act is ordered to the illicit, and on the part of the one tempted there is a weakness of standing firm, although on the part of God permitting it, it is ordered to advancement: hence it does not regard advancement in itself, but accidentally.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that David asked to be tempted by scourges, so that thus he might be freed from hidden sins: concerning which Ambrose says, that even if faith is lacking, that is, the conscience of sin, yet the punishment of the scourge satisfies: and this is not a temptation verging on the illicit, like that which stimulates toward the consent of sin.

To the next it must be said, that one must not rejoice concerning temptation in itself, but accidentally, when through victory one arrives at being proven purer than gold.

To the next it must be said, that it is medicine accidentally, namely through the recognition of fragility: but in itself it is toward the illicit.

To the next it must be said, that that desire is accidental, namely concerning the effect of temptation, and not concerning the temptation itself.

To the next it must be said, that if it were the material for exercising virtue in itself, like a meritorious act, it would be desirable: but because it is the material for exercising virtue accidentally, such as by drawing virtue to the illicit, it does not have to be desired. Through the same thing the response to the first proposition of the objection is clear.

To that by which the minor premise is proven, it must be said that God, as far as is on His part, does not suffer it: but we, out of excessive weakness, sometimes cast away grace, and fail away from God: and therefore, conscious of our weakness, we ought not to desire it.

Moreover, as for that which is objected to the contrary, although we concede it, yet it must be noted that it is not the same thing to be tempted and to be led into temptation according to a certain Gloss on Matthew, because to be tempted is to be tested: but to be led into temptation is to be abandoned in temptation, and to fall, as the Gloss says.

Articulus 4 — Whether Every Temptation Is Sin, Or Necessarily Accompanied By Sin

Whether every temptation is a sin, or necessarily accompanied by sin?

Fourthly it is asked, Whether every temptation is a sin, or necessarily accompanied by sin?

Now it seems that it is always a sin: § 1. For every motion toward the illicit is a sin: but temptation is a motion toward the illicit: therefore it is a sin.

§ 2. If you say that this is true of interior temptation, and not of exterior. On the contrary: let us speak only of the interior: therefore that is always toward the illicit: therefore it is always a sin.

§ 3. Also, Augustine in Book XIX of The City of God: "It is no small vice when the flesh lusts against the spirit": therefore it seems that it is also essentially a sin.

§ 4. Also, upon that text, There was given to me a thorn, etc., the Gloss says: "Temptation to which consent is not given by sin, is not a sin, but the material for exercising virtue." And it subjoins, "Understand this of temptation aside from that which is from the flesh." Therefore all that which is interior seems to be essentially a sin.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Upon that text, And lead us not, etc., the Gloss says: "Temptation orders toward the crown": but this is not to be essentially a sin: therefore interior temptation is not essentially a sin.

§ 2. Also, motion is one thing, and the terminus of motion is another according to essence: but the terminus of temptation is sin: therefore temptation, which denotes the preceding motion, is not a sin.

Furthermore it is asked next to this, Whether it is always accompanied by sin?

It seems that it is not: because § 1. Since the devil can agitate the flesh whenever he wishes, he would make us sin incessantly: because Job says The earth is given into the hand of the wicked.

§ 2. Also, every sin (as Augustine says) is so voluntary that if it is not voluntary, it is not a sin: therefore since those temptations are not voluntary, it seems that they are not a sin.

§ 3. Also, no one sins in that which he cannot avoid: therefore since we cannot avoid the devil tempting the flesh, there will be no fault there.

§ 4. Also, suppose that reason does not consent: therefore it happens in sensuality alone: therefore either it is a sin, or not. If so, since that is common to us with brute animals, there could also be sin in brute animals. If not, then the proposition will be had, that it is not always a sin.

Solution. It must be said, in my judgment, that there is an interior temptation, an exterior one, and a mixed temptation from both. Exterior temptation, as in the first parents, and in Christ: and that was no sin, nor was it accompanied by sin: interior temptation is that which has its origin in the concupiscence of the flesh: nor is the flesh said to lust (as Augustine says) except because the soul lusts in the flesh: and I think this is always a sin, but a very light one, and also accompanied by sin, because it proceeds from the evil which dwells in the flesh, as the Apostle says. The third temptation which is mixed, is sometimes a sin, and sometimes not. For if the flesh is contained so that it does not lust, it is not a sin, because then it is more exterior than interior; nevertheless it is interior to the extent that the flesh is moved. But if the flesh lusts, then it is a sin, because it has been made interior: but such a sin is the first movement which is very light, as will be said below.

To that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that temptation does not lead to the crown except accidentally, namely by the resistance of the battle, and victory.

To the next it must be said, that essentially speaking, a motion according to the Philosopher is in the same genus as the terminus of the motion: because it does not differ from it except as the way and the terminus, and as an act mixed with potency [differs] from a pure act: and therefore it is clear, that temptation has something of the rationale of sin.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that it is a sin, and accompanied by sin, as has been said.

To that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that he cannot agitate whenever he wishes, although he can bring about occasions: because by the will preceding we can hold the flesh back so that it does not lust.

To the next it must be said, that that authority takes "voluntary" broadly, for antecedent, or consequent, or conjoined: just as original sin is antecedently voluntary: and something previously unknown, and later known, if it pleases and does not bring repentance, is consequently voluntary: while a conjoined [voluntary act] is a willed work. But those movements are voluntary, for the reason that the will can prevent them, and does not do so.

To the next it must be said, that with the will preceding we can avoid any given movement, although speaking universally, it is necessary to fall into some.

To the next it must be said, that the first movement is in sensuality on account of its colligation to reason: and this colligation is not in the brute animal: and therefore the objection does not hold.

Articulus 5 — Whether Every Temptation Is From The Devil

Whether every temptation is from the devil?

Fifthly it is asked, Whether every temptation is from the devil?

And it seems that it is, through the Gloss on the text introduced above which Gloss seems to say that only the devil has the office of tempting.

Also, in the Apocalypse The accuser of our brothers has been cast out, who accused them before the sight of our God day and night. And this speaks of the devil: therefore he alone renders the Saints accusable by his temptations.

Also, in Hosea it is said: All night he slept baking them, in the morning, etc.: where Gregory says that the devil is the baker.

Also, upon that text, Set on fire by hell, Bede says: "The devil, agitated by hell, always burns, and suggests the flame of vices to everyone."

Also, upon that text of the Psalm Turn away from evil, and do good: the Gloss of Jerome says: "All evils proceed from the instinct of the devil, just as good things from the instinct of God." The authority of Jerome introduced above also contributes much to this.

Also, upon that text, Let everyone fear his mother, Gregory says: "Concupiscence is the mother of all sin, and the devil the father."

ON THE CONTRARY: Upon that text, With the flesh I serve the law of sin, the Gloss says: "By the name of sin he calls concupiscence, from which all vices arise": therefore they are not from a demon.

Also, to the Galatians Manifest are the works of the flesh, which are fornication, etc. And it also enumerates there certain spiritual vices. If therefore all proceed from the flesh, then it seems that none proceeds from a demon.

But against this again is the Gloss on the same passage saying, "To believe that all things happen from the flesh, is an error: for not all the vices of life are to be attributed to the flesh."

Solution. To this it is light to respond according to what has been said: because to say that all things are from the devil is true, as from the first mover and tempter, but not always the proximate one: and through this the solution is clear to all those things which were introduced for that side.

Now the corruption of the flesh is twofold, namely that of which the flesh is the subject, or that which is from the flesh as from a cause, and that is subjectively in the soul: and taking flesh commonly in this way, every sin proceeds from the corruption of the flesh, as from a habit inclining the power from within: and through this again the solution is clear to those things which are introduced for that side.

Also, in the second way, certain things are from the world, as was said above. Taking the corruption of the flesh also in this way, nothing prohibits all spiritual things from also being from the corruption of the flesh. But if it is taken strictly for that which is subjectively in the flesh, then it will not be from the corruption of the flesh, except that it has a proper delight in the flesh: and the Gloss intends it in this way, which says that it is an error that all sins are from the corruption of the flesh.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Serpent Who Tempted Eve Was A True Serpent, And How The Intentions Of Expressed Voices Could Reach The Words Formed In The Air

Whether the serpent which tempted Eve was a true serpent? And, how could the intentions of expressed voices arrive at words formed in the air?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, around the middle: And therefore the serpent was said to be more cunning, etc.

For the Master determines well that it was not a rational serpent: and it was not moved by the intrinsic power of its substance, that is, which was a part of its substance, although the power of the demon was intrinsic as to place.

But it is still asked: How could the intentions of expressed voices arrive at words formed and figured in the air?

For in us the way is: because species which are simple in the intellect, are clothed with corporeal images in the imagination, and through the motive nerves they are carried to the breath which the tongue strikes, and they are imprinted on it. But the imagination of the serpent was not susceptible to such conceptions, as You shall be as gods, knowing good and evil:

therefore through its imagination it could not continue the species to a voice: for what purpose therefore did he move the tongue of the serpent?

Solution. It must be said that, just as was determined above concerning magical works, because demons are spiritual substances, inferior matter obeys them by divine command and order: and therefore I say that they were imprinted immediately by the intellect of the Angel in the aerial breath: and there they received corporeal images: and the tongue of the serpent by its motion made nothing other than shapes.

Articulus 7 — Whether Eve Sinned By One Sin Or By Several Sins

Whether Eve sinned by one sin, or by several sins?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there: Where he tempted man in three ways, etc.

For it seems from this that Eve sinned by three sins: and this is not said.

Solution. In the following question it will be determined whether she sinned by one sin or several: but here it must be said that the Master speaks materially: because formally there was only one sin there: because all things were ordered in a composite work to obtain one appetite, namely that she might be like God in the knowledge of good and evil: and on account of that she ate, and did all the other things, and therefore formally she sinned only by that one.

Articulus 8 — Which And How Many Are The Modes Of Tempting, And How They Are To Be Understood

What and how many are the modes of tempting, and according to what are they taken?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at E: Furthermore it must be known that there are two species of temptation, namely interior, and exterior, etc.

For on account of this it is asked concerning the modes of tempting. And the Master says that § 1. There is an interior and exterior mode.

§ 2. But John says, that all that is in the world, is the concupiscence of the flesh, and the concupiscence of the eyes, and the pride of life.

§ 3. The Gloss on the Psalm He who dwells, says that one temptation is light and hidden; another is grave and hidden; and another is grave and manifest.

§ 4. Also, Upon that text of the Psalm Their soul abhorred all meat, etc., the Gloss says: Temptation is multiplex: first, ignorance of the way and truth; second, difficulty of conquering temptations; third, weariness of the good; fourth, the storm of the world.

§ 5. Also, Augustine in On Christian Doctrine: "He tempts by vexing the flesh, wounding natural goods, despoiling gratuitous goods."

§ 7. Also, upon that text[192], Let no temptation overtake you, etc., the Gloss distinguishes between angelic perfection, diabolical presumption, and human temptation. For to savor [or think] in no way otherwise than the thing is, is angelic perfection. But diabolical presumption is by excessively loving one's own opinion, or by envying those who are better, to arrive even at the sacrilege of cutting off communion and founding a schism or heresy. But human temptation is in five ways, as the Gloss says, namely in those things without which this life is not conducted. Or, that in necessity or pressure a man does not lose faith, by seeking human help from God. Or, human temptation is that through which one advances before God, to suffer dangers on account of Christ. Or, to savor otherwise than the thing is and with a good mind, is human temptation. Or, human temptation is when one is irritated at a brother out of a zeal for correcting him, yet more than Christian tranquility demands. It was also maintained above by Augustine in the first article of the question, what is human temptation, and divine temptation.

§ 8. Also, divine temptation is threefold: by which God is tempted: and this in two ways, namely either from a lack of faith in providence, as He is tempted through idolatry: and from the presumption of a miracle, as by those who placed in necessity commit themselves or their faith to hazard by demanding a miracle, when there is no lack of human counsel for them to escape otherwise. Also, secondly the divine temptation by which God tempts: and this in two ways, namely those whom He does not have as proven, like the wicked, by scourging or killing them: and those whom He has proven, but He shows them His probation, as He tempts the good. But human temptation is twofold, namely that by which men proving, we despair of placing our hope in man, which is most salutary: and that by which men prove us lacking faith in us, because we act under the law of God: and this is also good.

§ 9. Also, on Job[193], and in Book XXXIII of the Morals, Gregory says: "To His faithful servant the Lord insinuates all the machinations of the cunning enemy: everything that he snatches by oppressing, everything that he flies around by insinuating, everything that he terrifies by threatening, everything that he flatters by persuading, everything that he breaks by despairing, everything that he deceives by promising."

§ 1. Concerning all these modes it is asked: According to what are they taken? § 2. Solution. It must be said that here nine genera of temptations are touched upon. The first of these is taken on the part of the one tempted: for the temptation either has something dragging from within, such as corruption, as in us; or not, as in the uncorrupted, as in the first parents, and in Christ. § 3. The second is taken on the part of the object moving from without, according to the three things that are in the world, namely riches, delights, and honors, as was said above. § 4. The third is taken on the part of the mode in comparison to the trial through the dispositions of the rational and the irascible power rising up: for what is called hidden and open is in comparison to reason; what is called light or heavy is in comparison to the irascible attacking and expelling. § 5. The fourth is taken from the dispositions of the tempted, which make for his ease of being conquered: and this in comparison to the three powers divisively, or conjunctively to all. For to the rational power, ignorance, etc. To the irascible, difficulty, etc. To the concupiscible, weariness of the good. To all however, according as they are in a work, the storm of the world [tempestas saeculi]. § 6. The fifth is taken according to the harm it intends to inflict on the part of the body, and the soul, and grace: and the division is clear. § 7. The sixth is taken according to the degrees by which it coalesces in us: in which first there is a messaging by suggesting; second, the soul applies itself to it by experiencing delight; and third, it hands itself over to it through consent. § 8. The seventh is taken according to the quantity taken in the degrees of sin: and the division is sufficiently clear: because it is either in morals, and then it is diabolical, and especially in those things that separate from the Church. Or in human affairs which pertain to the infirmity of this life: and then in suffering, or in acting. In suffering in two ways: for either with hope of evasion, and then it is the second, when in necessity one hopes in God, and human counsel is not neglected; or without hope of evasion, and then one ought to commit oneself to God, and suffer for the sake of Christ, and this is the third mode. Or in acting, and this according to the concupiscible by loving more than is fitting those things without which this life is not lived, and this is the first mode; or according to the act of the rational, and this is to savor otherwise [aliter sapere], etc., and this is the fourth mode; or according to the act of the irascible, by the zeal of correcting another, and this is the fifth mode. § 9. Concerning the eighth mode enough was said in the first article: and the whole reason of the division is laid out in the solution. § 10. Here concerning the last mode it must be said, that it is taken on the part of the modes of the devil's machination: for it is either through adverse things, or through prosperous things. If through adverse things, either in the future, or according to the present: if from a future evil, then it is everything that terrifies by threatening; but if from a present evil, either this is the evil of punishment, and then it is everything that seizes by oppressing; or according to the evil of fault, and then it is everything that breaks by despairing. But if it is according to prosperous things, again it is either from a future good, or from a present one. If it is from the future, then it is everything that deceives by promising; but if from the present, either he exhibits universally now this, now that, so as to find something through which to attract, and then it is "he flies around ambushing"; or particularly, and then he flatters by persuading, because then he persuades by the blandishments of the fruit of mutable things, so as thus to turn away from the Creator. § 11. Other modes also are found very many in the sayings of the Saints: but let these suffice here, because elsewhere very many things have been asked concerning this question. § 12.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Temptation Of The Flesh Is More Difficult Than Any Temptation Of The Demon

§ 13. Article 9 § 14. Whether the temptation of the flesh is more difficult than any temptation of a demon?

§ 1. ARTICLE IX. Whether the temptation of the flesh is more difficult than any temptation of a demon? § 2. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, around the middle: But the temptation of the flesh, etc. § 3. For this seems false: because § 4. 1. Job says There is no power on earth that can be compared to him, who was made to fear no one: therefore the temptation of a demon is more difficult than that of the flesh. § 5. 2. Besides, the demon has power in the flesh, and not conversely: therefore it seems that his attack is more difficult, because it is in two [powers], than that of the flesh which is in one only. § 6. Solution. To this it is easy to respond: because the temptation of the flesh is more difficult on account of three causes, namely because it is through things connatural to us, and this is more deeply rooted; and because it is in our part of substance, and this draws more; and because it is continuous. § 7. It must be said therefore to the first, that the demon is strong in himself, but not in man: because Gregory and Bernard say, that the enemy is weak who cannot conquer except the willing: and although he can tempt, yet he cannot harm, as the Gloss hints upon that, Send us into the herd of swine, which says: Unless one lives in the manner of a swine, the devil does not receive power over him. And this is understood as to the harming of the good of grace, or the natural good which is diminishable through sin: because although he tempts, this very thing is ordered to the profit of man. § 8. To the other it must be said, that in many ways and in many things the devil has power, as is clear in the preceding distinction: but this whole is little, since it is posited to be conquered in our power, and not in his. § 9.

Articulus 10 — Whether Man In The First State Could Sin Venially

§ 10. Article 10. Whether man in the first state could have sinned venially? § 11. ARTICLE X. Whether man in the first state could have sinned venially? § 12. Next it is asked about what he says, there, F, around the middle: So much the more grievously was he to be punished, etc. § 13. And it is asked here, Whether man in the first state could have sinned venially? § 14. But it seems that he could: because § 15. 1. He could love his wife more than he ought, short of God [citra Deum]: therefore he would have sinned venially. § 16. 2. If you say that this could not be. Against: He loved his wife, and that love could grow: let it grow therefore, and be intensified up to this that it is before it ought to be and short of God: therefore the proposition will be had. § 17. 3. Item, There is a state in which sin cannot be committed, neither mortal nor venial: and there is a state in which they are always in mortal sin, as those who are in the state of the damned. § 18. Item, There is a state in which one sins venially and mortally, as is the state of the militant Church. Therefore in order that the division be completed, it is required that there be some state in which one sins venially and not mortally: and that cannot be except the state of first innocence: therefore Adam could have sinned venially. § 19. 4. Item, Everything that is made curved from the straight, is first in a small obliquity rather than in a great one: but free choice in the first state was straight, in the second however curved in a great curvature, namely in

§ 1. mortal [sin]: therefore in the middle state it ought to have been deflectable into venial [sin], and not into mortal: therefore it seems that he could have sinned venially. § 2. ON THE CONTRARY: § 3. 1. The first man in the first state had all inferior things subjected to reason: therefore inordination could not happen except on the part of reason going off track: but in reason, as will be held below, there is mortal sin: therefore he could not sin venially, but only mortally. § 4. 2. Item, In venial sin the delectable thing which moves is small: but a small

delectable thing cannot turn away the powers conjoined under the order of reason: therefore what turns away from the first order must have been great: therefore it had to be a mortal sin: because in that a mutable good moves to fruition. § 5. 3. Item, It is hinted in the cunning of the serpent, who promised not a small thing, but a great thing, namely, You shall be like gods, knowing, etc. § 6. Solution. It must be said, that in my judgment one must consent to the last reasons, that he could not sin venially, and two causes were touched upon in objecting. The third however is touched upon in the Text: namely because he had no inciter: and so the sin had to be imputed to him unto death. § 7. It must be said therefore to the first, that against this it is objected, that he would not love outside reason: because reason was subjected to God containing it: and therefore nothing inordinate, neither small nor great, could exist, unless it began from it. § 8. To the other it must be said, that love could not grow outside the order of reason, such a state remaining. Whence its increase was impeded by accident. And this would well happen in many things which would grow as much as is in them, except that they are impeded by accident. § 9. To the other it must be said, that such argumentations have no necessity, and especially in that division: because here the ability to sin venially is caused from the ability to sin mortally, and therefore follows it. Whence there can be no state in which one sins venially, and not mortally. § 10. To the other it must be said, that in the curvature of wood or another body that objection proceeds, but not in the curvature of the will: because that is not curved except by a great curvature first: because it does not come into a great curvature through a small one, but conversely into a small through a great one, as was said. § 11.

Articulus 11 — Why The Sin Of The Angel Is Not Remediable, And Why Human Nature Could Be Assumed And Not Angelic Nature

§ 12. Article 11. Why the sin of the Angel is not remediable? and, Why human nature could be assumed, and not angelic? § 13. ARTICLE XI. Why the sin of the Angel is not remediable? and, Why human nature could be assumed, and not angelic? § 14. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, towards the end: And therefore his sin stood as irremediable, etc. § 15. For it is asked, Why is the sin of the Angel not remediable? § 16. And because this was disputed much above, therefore here I will posit only three reasons which seem to be better: of which one is to this that he is not unifiable. The second however, that he is not redeemable. The third, that his fall is not according to the state of a penitent, but of a damned one. § 17. The first is founded upon three propositions, of which one is proved in the third book of the Sentences, that nothing singularly one discrete in personality is unifiable to another, for the reason that it is not transmissible into the singularity of another which would unite this to itself. § 18. The second, that personal discretion and

§ 1. singularity is inseparable from the angelic nature: and this is proved through this that in the angelic nature potency never precedes being: but from the moment it is a "this something", it is distinct by its singularity and personality. § 2. The third is, that divine personality is not consumed nor consumes anything of the nature and dignity of that which it assumes. § 3. From these therefore it is necessarily concluded, that an Angel cannot be assumed to a union thus: For let it be given, that it is united, if it is possible: therefore either it is united with its singularity remaining, and the singularity of the divine person [remaining]; or with one of them passing away, or with both. If with both singularities remaining: therefore two personal singularities are in that single one: therefore necessarily two singulars, and two persons, and two natures, because natures are never united: therefore there are two in every part: therefore united in no part: and this is against the hypothesis, that they are united. If with one passing away: either that one passes away in such a way that when it was in potency, before the act it was assumed into the singularity of a higher one: and therefore it was not susceptible properly: as was done in the assumed nature of man: and then it follows, that in the nature of the Angel potency precedes act: and this is against the first proposition. Or it is thus, that the divine personality consumes the found angelic [personality]: and this is against the third. Or both are confounded into a third: and this again is against the third. § 4. The second reason is taken from the nature of the assumed: because that which does not have a nature ordered to one in number is not assumable to make a cure in one in number: just as human nature originally and naturally is one species handed down from one through one act of nature which is generation: but the nature of an Angel is not one in number, nor in species, nor in origin: therefore it cannot be cured in one assumed number: but it would be necessary, that each one individually be assumed. And Augustine seems to hint at this reason in the Text, when he says, that the whole nature of man perished, but not the whole angelic [nature]. But the cause why the whole perished, is because it had one order of nature and origin, and the angelic did not: because otherwise the angelic would have wholly perished in the first Angel, just as the human in the first man. § 5. The third reason is taken from the fall: because he sinned against a deiform intellect: and man against reason, as Dionysius says: and this was expounded above in the question about the cause of the confirmation of the Angels, and also in III Sentences: and therefore it suffices here.

DISTINCTIO XXII

Divisio Textus

§ 2. Division of the Text § 3. DIVISION OF THE TEXT. § 4. Here it seems it must be diligently investigated, etc. Here the Master treats of the cause of the fall of man, which is sin. And it has three parts: in the first of which the Master inquires, what was the first sin of Eve? In the second however, What was the first sin of Adam? there, D, It is usually asked, Whether that, etc. In the third, he makes a comparison of both, there, E, From which it can manifestly be, etc. § 5. From this and the disputation the meaning is sufficiently clear. § 6.

Articulus 1 — What The First Sin Of Eve Was

§ 7. Article 1. What was the first sin of Eve? § 8. ARTICLE I. What was the first sin of Eve? § 9. First it is asked here, What was the first sin of Eve? § 10. Second, Whether she sinned by one or many sins, as some have said? § 11. Third, Whether this sin was against the Spirit, or against the Father, or against the Son? § 12. To the first it is objected thus: § 13. 1. Augustine says in the Text, that a pride [elatio] to be repressed or destroyed preceded the tasting of the forbidden: therefore that pride by which they want to be like God, was the first sin. § 14. 2. Item, Augustine in the book On Virginity: The devil who in heaven wanted to be like God, falling persuaded man to the likeness of his own will. But it is agreed, that the first sin of the Angel was pride. Since therefore things are not similar unless having one quality, the first sin of Eve also was pride. § 15. 3. Item, The beginning of all sin is pride. And elsewhere, The beginning of all pride is to apostatize from God. Therefore pride was the first sin. § 16. But against it seems, that it was infidelity: because § 17. 1. She did not believe the words of God: whence she said, Lest perhaps we die, even before the serpent named the likeness of God: but to doubt the words of God is infidelity: therefore her first sin was infidelity. § 18. 2. Item, Above the Master said, that she doubted, receded from the affirmer, and approached the denier: therefore she was an infidel. § 19. 3. Item, The order of recreation was according to the order of the first perdition: but in the recreation in the glorious Virgin the first way of life was faith: therefore in the perdition in Eve the first door of death was infidelity. § 20. 4. Item, In the justification of the ungodly the first is faith, as Augustine says: therefore in the first ungodliness the first was infidelity, from opposites, as it seems. § 21. BUT AGAIN it seems, that the first sin was gluttony: § 22. 1. For this was the first act of sin: and a sin is specified and numbered by the act: therefore it was the first. § 23. 2. Item, The order of temptation of the second Adam was by the mode of temptation of the first, as the Saints say: but Christ was tempted first concerning food therefore also Eve. Therefore also her first sin was the taste of the forbidden. § 24. 3. Item, He seems to say this in the hymn, He himself then marked the wood, etc. § 25. BUT IT SEEMS again, that disobedience is the first sin: because

§ 1. 1. The Apostle says this As by the disobedience of one, etc.: therefore, etc. § 2. 2. Item, Because Augustine says this, that Adam was cast out of paradise on account of disobedience. § 3. Item, Ambrose says, that every sin is a prevarication of the divine law, and a disobedience of the heavenly commandments. § 4. 3. Item, The Lord himself seems to say this: For who told you that you were naked, except that you ate of the tree of which I had commanded you that you should not eat? § 5. 4. Item, This seems from the words of the serpent, who made mention of the precept saying: Why did God command you? § 6. BUT IT SEEMS again, that the first sin was not of commission, but of omission only: because the woman hearing the words of the serpent ought to have conferred, whether they were likely true [viri similia (verisimilia)], and she did not confer: therefore she omitted. § 7. Solution. It must be said that it is easiest here to object infinite things. § 8. To the first it must be said, that "first" is taken in two ways as far as pertains to the present intention, namely in time, and in cause: and in both ways pride was the first sin in Eve. For first from free choice she consented to this that she would be like God in the perfection of the knowledge of good and evil: and the cause of this made whatever she did: and therefore she ate, as she saw the wood, and believed the serpent: and therefore the object of pride was the final cause of all the other acts, as Augustine says in the Text, and all the Doctors have always concordantly conceded: although some recently want to make opinions about this. § 9. To that therefore which is objected against this, it must be said that that doubt does not make infidelity, nor any sin, but a certain facility on the part of the ruling reason: because without sin she could believe, that God had brought forth those words in another sig-nification, as the Master says in the Text: yet because it was not hers to discuss this, when she hesitated, she approached the denier: nor was this an imperfection: because it was not of the nature of the first state to know all things, and immediately understand every signification of the Lord's speech, unless inquiry and merit preceded. And through this also the solution to the following is clear. § 10. To the other and to the fourth it must be said, that it is not valid: because it is not necessary, that the order correspond to the order in all things. Besides, Humility in the Blessed Virgin was found before the consent of faith. In the justification of the ungodly the virtues have a colligation and order: but the vices none, because from any particle and corruption one vice is born: and therefore that objection is worth nothing. § 11. To that however which is further objected about gluttony, it must be said that the act of gluttony was here material in this sin: because she did not act proudly so that she might eat, but she ate so that she might act proudly in the likeness of God. And therefore it does not specify the sin: because matter does not specify, but form and end. § 12. To the other it must be said, that that order corresponds to the whole transgression: because that was in pride and the taste of the forbidden. And therefore redemption was made in the humility of him hanging on the wood. § 13. But that which is objected about the temptation of the second Adam, it is clear that it is not valid: because the first man was tempted only by one temptation, and in one place, and in one act: and Christ by three, and in three places, and concerning three formally distinct things: and when the Saints adapt, a material multiplication of acts in the sin of Adam suffices for them. § 14. To this that is objected about disobedience; it must be said that disobedience is spoken of in two ways, namely contempt of the precept insofar as it is a precept: and thus it is a special sin: and in this way it was not

§ 1. in the sin of Adam and Eve. It is also called the non-observance of a precept, and thus it accompanies every sin, and in this way it is not a special sin of Adam. § 2. And through this distinction the solution to the whole is clear. § 3.

Articulus 2 — Whether Eve Sinned By One Sin Or By Several

§ 4. Article 2. Whether Eve sinned by one sin or by many? § 5. ARTICLE II. Whether Eve sinned by one sin or by many? § 6. Secondly it is asked, Whether she sinned by one sin or by many? § 7. But it seems that by many: because § 8. 1. Above, in the preceding distinction it was held, that there were three sins in the sin of the first man, namely vainglory, avarice, and gluttony. § 9. 2. Item, It is agreed, that she ate the forbidden, and again acted proudly: therefore she sinned by many. § 10. Solution. It must be said, that she did not sin by many sins: but if one wants to speak properly, one will say that she sinned by one multiple sin, namely that it was one according to the form and end of the will, but multiple in the material acts: and the reason for this has already been expounded often: and therefore it is not necessary to respond to the objects. § 11.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Sin Of Eve Was Sin In

§ 12. Article 3. Whether the sin of Eve was a sin against the Holy Spirit, or against the Father, or against the Son? § 13. ARTICLE III. Whether the sin of Eve was a sin against the Holy Spirit, or against the Father, or against the Son? § 14. Thirdly it is asked, Whether this sin is a sin against the Holy Spirit? § 15. For it seems, that it is: because she did not then have infirmity, nor ignorance, which are punishments of sin: therefore she must have sinned from malice: but this is a sin against the Holy Spirit: therefore she sinned against the Holy Spirit. § 16. ON THE CONTRARY: § 17. 1. Below the woman will allege, The serpent deceived me: therefore it proceeded from ignorance: therefore it is a sin against the Son. § 18. 2. Item, The Apostle says Adam was not seduced, but the woman was seduced in the prevarication. Therefore she was seduced: therefore she sinned from ignorance: therefore against the Son, and not against the Holy Spirit. § 19. Solution. This is not worthy of great doubt. For it must be said, that she sinned against the Son, just as the Master below by objecting from the words of Isidore says the woman sinned from ignorance: but ignorance is twofold, namely the punishment of sin, and from that she did not sin: and there is ignorance, the nescience of things to be done, as in what sense the words of the Lord were said: and from such proceeded her sin, and therefore it was against the Son. § 20. For she was not ignorant only according as every evil person is called ignorant, but also she was ignorant of the sense of the Lord's word: which ignorance was the occasion of the sin: and Adam also was ignorant that it was mortal, which he thought to be venial: and therefore he also sinned against the Son: and through this the solution to the object is clear. § 21.

Articulus 4 — Whether Pride Was The First Sin Of Adam, And What He Desired, And Whether He Believed The Serpent

§ 22. Article 4. Whether pride was the first sin of Adam? and, What did he desire? and, Whether he believed the serpent?

§ 1. ARTICLE IV. Whether pride was the first sin of Adam? and, What did he desire? and, Whether he believed the serpent? § 2. Next it is asked about what he says, there, It is usually asked, Whether such a pride, etc. § 3. For it seems, that pride was not the first sin of Adam: because § 4. 1. He did not believe the serpent: therefore he did not believe that he could become like God: therefore he did not desire this. § 5. 2. Besides, He was not seduced in what the woman was, but thought to be venial what was mortal: but whoever thinks this, is an infidel: therefore infidelity was his first sin. § 6. Solution. It must be said, that the sin of the woman and of the man with respect to the likeness of God in the knowledge of good and evil differ according to the Master, just as a sin of deed and of concupiscence alone, insofar however as it is a consent of reason: because the woman who believed this could be done, exhibited her members to iniquity for the deed, through which she would obtain this: but the man consented to the robbery of divine likeness: but he did not eat on account of this, but he ate so as to humor [morem gereret] his wife, which he did not believe to be a great evil. § 7. To the first therefore it must be said, that this argument does not proceed. He believed it could not be done: therefore he did not desire. For many covet the goods of a king, and would unjustly want to have them, and by consenting they covet: and yet they know they cannot have them, because the will covets more than it can acquire. § 8. To the other it must be said, that he well knew that it was worthy of death: but he also knew that God is merciful, and could punish not by death, what nevertheless was worthy of death: whence on the part of divine mercy and his excusability given through the love of his wife, he thought it to be pardonable. § 9. Whence the Masters distinguish here, that a sin is called venial in multiple ways: namely from its genus, as an idle word: or from a subsequent event, as a mortal sin deleted through contrition: or from a certain cause of pardon which is on the part of the sinner and of him against whom he sins, as here, because the occasion of the sin was the love of his wife, and the presumption of God's mercy: and therefore it is clear, that he was not an infidel. § 10.

Articulus 5 — Whether Adam Sinned More Than Eve

§ 11. Article 5. Whether Adam sinned more than Eve? § 12. ARTICLE V. Whether Adam sinned more than Eve? § 13. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, From which it can manifestly be observed, etc. § 14. For it seems, that Adam sinned more: because he was the head of the woman: therefore he sinned more. § 15. Item, Because he had more vigorous natural endowments. § 16. Item, Because he received the precept immediately. § 17. Item, Because it was more harmful: because from him the whole offspring was infected, and not from Eve, as will be said below: therefore it seems, that Adam sinned more. § 18. But contrary are the reasons in the Text, which need not be repeated here. § 19. Solution. In the substantials of the sin Eve was more guilty, but as to certain circumstances Adam more: for arrogance [fastus] and concupiscence are a greater cause of the act of sin, and as to those Eve sinned more: but the circumstances of the one sinning and of the harmfulness of the sin were greater in Adam, as the objections prove. § 20.

Articulus 6 — Whether, If One Had Not Sinned, The Human Race Would In No Way Have Been Corrupted By Sins

§ 21. Article 6. Whether if the man had not sinned, the human race would have been not at all corrupted by sins?

§ 1. ARTICLE VI. Whether if the man had not sinned, the human race would have been not at all corrupted by sins? § 2. Next it is asked about what he says, there, G, towards the end: If the man had not sinned, the human race, etc. § 3. Against: The woman would give the matter of the flesh: and from the flesh, as is held below, original sin is contracted: therefore the human race would still perish. § 4. Item, If the man had not sinned, it is asked, what would God have done with the woman? § 5. Solution. It must be said according to the Masters, that corruption is twofold, namely of passibility and of hunger, thirst, death, and men would have had this from Eve if she alone had sinned. And there is the corruption of vice through an efficient cause, according to which the flesh sown through coitus from the man can infect souls: and this corruption would not be had, as they say. § 6. TO THE ARGUMENT therefore it must be said, that this second corruption is not had from matter, except insofar as it is cut off from the man, in whom the whole nature is materially and effectively. § 7. To the other it must be said, that God would have permitted her to die in herself, or would have made another woman for the man. Which of these is true, is unknown. § 8.

Articulus 7 — Whether Ignorance Is Sin, And Whether Some Ignorance Is Affected And Voluntary

§ 9. Article 7. Whether ignorance is a sin? and, Whether some ignorance is affected and voluntary? § 10. ARTICLE VII. Whether ignorance is a sin? and, Whether some ignorance is affected and voluntary? § 11. Next it is asked about what he says, there, For there is an ignorance which excuses, etc. § 12. And three things are asked about ignorance, namely whether it is a sin? § 13. And secondly, What kind of sin? § 14. And thirdly, According to what mode, and what ignorance excuses, and what does not? § 15. But that it is not a sin, some strive to prove thus: § 16. 1. Ignorance is a pure privation: no sin is a pure privation: therefore ignorance according to itself is not a sin. § 17. 2. Item, Ignorance bespeaks a privation of knowledge: but no knowledge is a virtue: therefore its privation is not a vice.

§ 1. 3. Item, There is no vice that is not deleted through penance: but ignorance remains after penance just as before: therefore ignorance is not a sin. § 2. 4. Item, Ignorance is in the intellect: but no vice or virtue is in the intellect: therefore, etc. § 3. 5. Item, No vice is born in us except original sin: ignorance is born in us: therefore it is not a vice unless it be original, which is clearly not true. § 4. 6. Item, No punishment into which we fall from sin, is a sin: ignorance is a punishment into which we fall from sin: therefore it is not a sin. § 5. By these and very many other reasons some prove, that no ignorance is a sin. § 6. BUT ON THE CONTRARY are the authorities which are posited in the Text. § 7. Item, The Apostle, If anyone is ignorant, he shall be ignored. § 8. Item, Ambrose upon that of the Apostle You treasure up for yourself wrath in the day of wrath: You sin grievously, because you treasure up the wrath of God for yourself; more grievously, because you despise the goodness of God; most grievously, because you are ignorant. Therefore it seems, that it is a sin. § 9. 2. Item, A debt of doing something in a determinate time, if it not be done, a sin of omission is committed: therefore also a debt of knowing something in a determinate time, if it not be known, leaves a sin of omission: and since ignorance holds itself thus, it seems to be a sin of omission. § 10. But because it is said in the Text that affected ignorance is a sin, it is asked, Whether some ignorance is affected? § 11. But it seems that it is not: because § 12. 1. Ignorance bespeaks a privation: but a privation is nothing: therefore it does not have from whence it may move the appetite of the will: therefore no ignorance is affected or voluntary. § 13. 2. Item, The Philosopher says, that all men desire to know: therefore no man desires to be ignorant: therefore, etc. § 14. But if this be conceded, Against it the words of the Saints expressly speak, which are in the Text. § 15. Solution. It must be said, that concerning this question the opinions of diverse men are diverse. For some have said, that no ignorance of itself is a sin, but by reason of an annex some is said to be a sin, namely by reason of negligence of knowing that which one is bound to know, or by reason of contempt, or by reason of the will, which is the same: and therefore these men in this way solve the sayings of the Saints, that the Saints on account of these causes call some ignorance a sin, and not for its own sake, and they concede the induced reasons. § 16. And they say further to the second question, that by reason of an annex it is also called voluntary: because voluntary is that which makes one ignorant, such as not learning, and resting from the labor of study, or even the will for impunity if it not be known, because if he knew, he would be bound from knowledge to do it. § 17. But because this solution seems according to the surface to contradict the Saints: therefore others say otherwise, and I think better, distinguishing that ignorance is manifold. For there is an ignorance that is a privation of a habit in the speculative intellect, and this is not a sin: and there is an ignorance of things to be done by us, which is a privation of a ruling habit in morals necessary for salvation: and this is twofold, namely a certain one is the privation of a habit instructing toward those things which are necessary for life in common, such as ignorance of divine right ordaining morals in precepts, as that fornication is a mortal sin, and murder, and the like: and this is a sin in those having the use of reason. Another is the privation of a practical habit of the intellect ruling in those things pertaining to an office, as a Pontiff.

[one] is bound to know the established letters instructing toward faith and morals, and a priest those things without which a sacerdotal act cannot validly be exercised, and the like. And this ignorance, when the office is held, is also a sin, but when it is not held, it is not a sin. And because this is easier to maintain, let us answer the objections according to this.

§ 1. By saying to the first, that such ignorance is not absolutely nothing, just as evil is not when it is a sin: for it leaves the subject, and the debt toward the act to the one knowing, and this debt introduces guilt, when it is the time for paying it.

§ 2. And if it is asked, When is the debt due? I say, in any work necessary for salvation, when one does perversely what, from the knowledge of divine law, ought to be done otherwise. And similarly in other ignorance, as often as one perversely proceeds into an act of his office out of a defect of knowledge; for then the act of the knower owes the governing knowledge.

§ 3. And through this is solved that which is customarily objected, namely that if ignorance is a sin, the ignorant person sins continuously, because the ignorance remains continuously: it must be said that he does not, but he sins as often as he proceeds into a perverse act out of a defect of knowledge. And I readily concede that then he sins doubly, namely by the omission of knowing, and by the illicit act: because, since "to be obliged to know" is an affirmative precept, it does not oblige for always, although it always obliges: but it is exacted at that time when, without the act of knowledge, he cannot avoid sin.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that this is false: "No knowledge is a virtue." For the knowledge of things to be done, taken practically, is a virtue, such as prudence, the gift of understanding, wisdom, and knowledge, as is much disputed in the III Sentences[194].

§ 5. To the next it must be said that if penance is perfect, the guilt of the ignorance passes away, and there remains the act according to which it obliges: because if it is a privation of knowledge pertaining to an office, then if he dismisses the office, he is discharged of the obligation, and then there will not be in him an obliging ignorance. If, however, it is an ignorance of those things which are required for life, he does not do penance unless he inquires and learns, and then the ignorance passes away.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that there is an intellect antecedently ordered to the will to operate, and in that there is no virtue: and there is a voluntary intellect consequently ordered to the will, and in that there is virtue. And all these things have been discussed in the third of the Sentences.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that according as we are born in ignorance, it is not a sin, but a penalty, just like concupiscence, which is concupiscibility in a child: but when we are bound to know, ignorance is a sin: just like concupiscence, when we are bound not to concupisce. Because what in concupiscence is a sin of commission of a prohibited act, this in ignorance is a sin of omission of a due act.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that ignorance, insofar as it is a penalty, is not a sin, but insofar as it becomes the omission of an act to which someone is bound, and then he is bound.

§ 9. To that which is further asked, "In what way is ignorance voluntary?" Those who are of that opinion distinguish, saying that sin is not said to be voluntary in only one way. For if force is applied to the word, they say that no evil and no sin is voluntary, just as Dionysius[195] says that sin is uncaused, and involuntary, and outside intention, and barren, and sluggish. But some sin, like that of commission, is said to be voluntary because its act and pleasurable object are voluntary, when they ought not to be voluntary. Some [sin] is voluntary by a remote and antecedent will, although not by a proximate and consequent one, as original [sin] is voluntary by the will of Adam, and not by our will.

Some [sin] is voluntary, as that which the will ought to prevent, like the movement of concupiscence. Again, some is voluntary, as that into whose opposite act the will is bound to tend, and in this way the sin of omission and of ignorance is voluntary. And through this the solution to the first objection made concerning this is clear.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that all men desire to know, yet not all men desire to know this or that, but in itself they desire to know. Ignorance, moreover, is not said to be universally affected, but particularly, namely this or that: and this is not contrary to the Philosopher[196]; and therefore in the argument there is a figure of speech passing from simple supposition to determinate and mobile supposition, since the term to know stands immobily and simply in the Philosopher's proposition.

Articulus 8 — What Kind Of Sin Ignorance Is

What sort of sin is ignorance?

§ 11. Secondly it is asked, What sort of sin is ignorance?

§ 12. And it seems that it is original [sin]: because 1. It is born in us. 2. Again, Because through penance it passes away in guilt, and remains in act, just as the Master says below concerning original [sin].

§ 13. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Because original [sin] is only one: and this is not ignorance. 2. Again, Because original [sin] regards all men: but a certain ignorance is not a sin except in those holding an office. 3. Again, Original sin is before the time of discretion, but not ignorance: therefore it is not original.

§ 14. Solution. It must be said that on account of these and similar things, almost the whole multitude follows that opinion, because ignorance of itself and in itself is not a sin. But nevertheless, saving the other [opinion], we can say that ignorance is not a sin according as it is born in us, but according as at the time of discretion and of office it becomes an obligation to the act of knowing.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that ignorance, just like the sin of omission, does not have an act, but its act is a present privation: just as we say of someone that he is actually blind, signifying that at the present time he does not have the habit of sight, and thus privations are in act. And since the sin of ignorance is a sin of omission, it has no other act: and because privations remain unless the habit arrives, therefore ignorance is said to remain in act. Nevertheless, that act is equivocal to the act of original [sin]: because the act of that is the proneness of concupiscence, which is a habit inclining to act; but here it is the actual privation of the governing habit in an office, or in life, regarding those things which are necessary for salvation.

§ 16. And according to this solution one must suppose that the sin of omission does not speak of any act, neither exterior nor interior, but only the omission of a due act and in the time when it is due. And the other opinion does not say this, but rather that every sin of omission is a sin as regards the interior act, as one not restoring a poor person in a time of ultimate necessity, willing not to restore him, or avariciously reserving one's own things for oneself: but this will be treated below.

Articulus 9 — It Is Asked, According To What Mode, And Which Ignorance Excuses

It is asked, according to what mode, and what sort of ignorance excuses?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, According to what mode, and what sort of ignorance excuses?

§ 2. And it is objected thus: 1. An evil added to an evil makes the whole more evil: therefore if ignorance is a sin, whether of itself or through something else, if it is added to a sin, it makes the whole more of a sin. 2. Again, This seems evident from the Letter: because it says that affected ignorance excuses no one. 3. Again, From Ambrose above, who says that you sin most gravely because you are ignorant.

§ 3. But perhaps you will say that invincible [ignorance] excuses. On the contrary: The ignorance of a drunkard is invincible: and if he kills [someone], Damascene and Aristotle say that he deserves double curses: both because he kills, and because he gets drunk.

§ 4. Furthermore, according to the Philosopher, ignorance does not excuse except that which is called [ignorance] of fact, which makes an act involuntary: and this is recognized because one is ignorant of the circumstances, and has repentance in the act; but not all ignorance is of this kind: therefore not all ignorance excuses.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said that ignorance, according as it is a sin, whether of itself or from what is annexed to it, has something in the affection, according to which it is called affected: and it has something in the intellect, namely the privation of the governing habit in workable matters pertaining to life or office.

§ 6. It must be said, therefore, that as to the first, it is a sin. But as to the second, it is not a sin, and it excuses either from the whole, if it is particular and of fact; or from a part [i.e., a tanto], if it is of law or universal, which is the same thing: because from that part it causes one to be ignorant of the circumstances in which the act takes place, and so it is a cause of the involuntary which merits pardon and some mercy. And through this the solution to the first objection is clear.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that Augustine speaks of ignorance according to that which is affected, and as to this what he says is true.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that Ambrose does not take "most gravely" according to the quantity of the sin, but rather according to the aspect of danger. Hence "most gravely," that is, most dangerously: because the ignorant person does not see the way by which he might return, and does not recognize the medicine.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the division of ignorance will be clear below: but nevertheless some is vincible in itself: some vincible in its cause, and such is the case concerning the ignorance of a drunkard: for we are masters of drunkenness, as Damascene says: and therefore that ignorance is not entirely invincible: and therefore it does not excuse from the whole.

§ 10. And if it is objected concerning Lot, that he is excused from a part, and not from the whole: It must be said that it is well conceded that he is excused from a part, but not from the whole. Yet even this does not follow, that if he merits double curses, or if he sinned twice, that on account of this he sinned more [in magnitude]: because there is a progression there from the discrete, as it were, to the continuous, that is, from that which has the quantity of multiplicity, to that which is quantitative intensively: nor is it the same to be cursed and to sin: because some sins are of greater curse or infamy, and yet of lesser weight, as (Gregory says) carnal sins [compared] to spiritual ones.

Articulus 10 — How Manyfold Ignorance Is, And How It Is Divided

How manifold is ignorance, and how is it divided?

§ 11. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, K, Now ignorance is threefold, etc.

§ 12. For the understanding of this passage, note that the division of ignorance is manifold and very useful. For sometimes it is divided according to the efficient cause: as when it is divided into vincible and invincible: and this division is manifold.

§ 13. For there is invincible [ignorance] from nature, and this excuses in whole, such as it is in the naturally foolish, idiots, and melancholics. And there is invincible [ignorance] from an accident, which is twofold: since that accident is either separable, or inseparable. If separable: it is either from something obstructing the pathways of the animal spirit in the brain, and disturbing the organ from which reason receives species: or from an inseparable and incurable accident of infirmity. And in the first way it is in a drunkard, or one who drinks henbane, or opium, or something else. In the second way it is in the infirm: and thus it is distinguished in its cause: because either he himself applied effort [to bring it about], or not. If not, as if he was ignorant of the quality of the wine, or of what he consumed, then it excuses him in whole. But if he himself applied effort: either through a licit thing, or an illicit one. If in the first way, again he is excused in whole even if he acts badly afterward. But if through an illicit thing: either that was a venial sin, or a mortal one. If in the first way, it still excuses in whole. If in the second way, it does not excuse in whole, in my judgment, but in part: because then he deserves double curses.

§ 14. But if it is vincible: then it is further divided according to matter, into ignorance of law, and of fact: and this is the same as what Theologians call universal, and particular: because "law" is called here the universal rules governing life, or office. "Fact", however, is this or that particular thing, which it happens even a wise man to be ignorant of: just as Jacob was ignorant of Leah being substituted for Rachel and therefore he is excused in whole. But [ignorance] of law is twofold: because some is universal law, which is imposed on all to be known: and some is particular, which is not known except through study: and I think that the first is crass and supine, not excusing. The second, however, excuses, either from a part, or from the whole, if the case is very difficult.

§ 1. By this same division ignorance is called affected, or simply ignorance, according as it is conjoined with the form of the will, or separated from it: and when it is affected, then it is a sin on the part of the affection: but when it is simply ignorance, then it is excusing from a part, and not from the whole. These differences, however: excusing, and not excusing, are taken according to the final cause.

Articulus 11 — Whether A Sin From Ignorance Is More Grave Than From Weakness

Whether a sin out of ignorance is graver than one out of infirmity?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning this which is said in the Letter, that one sins more gravely out of infirmity than out of ignorance.

§ 3. But this does not seem so: because infirmity denotes a weakness in standing firm: and the greater the weakness is, the less the sin is imputed.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that Isidore makes the comparison according to that which the sin has of voluntariness. For since through ignorance the circumstances of the business, and the place, and the time, and the person, and the subsequent harm are not known, nothing of the voluntary remains with respect to the circumstances. But in infirmity it does remain: and therefore it has more of the voluntary, and consequently more of sin and contempt.

§ 5. And let these things said concerning ignorance suffice.

DISTINCTIO XXIII

Divisio Textus

§ 1. Moreover it is customarily asked, Why God [permitted] man, etc. Here, thirdly, he subjoins a question concerning the cause on the part of God permitting that man should fall.

§ 2. And it has two parts. In the first he raises a question about the permission of the fall. In the second he touches upon in what sort of knowledge man was created according to the soul, there, B, And indeed according to the soul, etc.

§ 3. Here two things are asked: Namely, whether man was made in natural or in gratuitous gifts? And, Whether God could have made man better than He made him? And the first of these has been determined above concerning the Angels: because it is the same thing to ask, Whether man and Angel were made in natural or gratuitous gifts? The other, however, is found widely disputed in the first book of the Sentences: and therefore here we must pass on to the second part of this lesson.

Articulus 1 — Whether Man In The First State Received All Knowledge Through Nature Or Through Grace

Whether man in the first state received the knowledge of all things through nature, or through grace?

§ 4. Therefore it is asked, Whether man in the first state naturally had the knowledge of all things?

§ 5. And it seems that he did: because 1. It was fitting that God's works be perfect: but man was the work of God: therefore he ought to have been left lacking in no perfection: therefore he was perfected according to the knowledge which can naturally be had by someone. 2. Again, He made him perfect in body: but the perfection of the soul is worthier than that of the body: therefore He also made him perfect in soul. 3. Again, Since it is very difficult to discover sciences, but easy to increase them through hearing from another: just as we find in the first philosophizers, that they said very foolish things, and the later ones understood better. It seems according to this, however, that Adam would have been most foolish, unless he himself had the knowledge of all things given to him from creation.

§ 6. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. There is a difference between the soul and an Angel: because the soul is placed in a body so that it may receive sciences and virtues: whereas an Angel has sciences from creation. Since therefore Adam was one having a human soul, it seems he ought not to have had knowledge except through discipline in the body. 2. Again, This is seen from what was held above, where the Master says that children would have been born in the imperfection of knowledge, just as also in the imperfection of stature: therefore it seems that it is not of the nature of man to immediately receive the habits of the sciences.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that Adam had the sciences of all things, and this through gratuitously given grace, and not through nature. An Angel, however, has this through nature: and therefore the difference between the soul and an Angel still remains: yet this is not a substantial difference, but another which was touched upon in part above.

§ 8. TO THE OTHER it was answered above, that infants would not have been born, in my judgment, imperfect in the habit of knowledge, but rather in the act of consideration, on account of the fluidity of the complexion of infants toward diverse things, which does not suffer a strong conversion upon one and the same thing.

Articulus 2 — Whether The First Man Had Knowledge Of The Creator, And Saw God Without A Medium, Or Through A Mirror And Enigma

Whether the first man had knowledge of the Creator, and saw God without a medium: or through a mirror and an enigma?

§ 9. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, The first man is also believed to have had knowledge of the Creator.

§ 10. For the Master seems to speak falsely: because 1. In the beginning of the fourth of the Sentences it is held that the first man saw God without a medium: therefore he did not see through a medium, as is said here. 2. Furthermore, If he saw through a medium: then his vision did not differ from ours: because even among us one sees more clearly than another: and this does not seem likely. 3. Furthermore, Augustine says on Genesis that he worked in order to receive experience: but by experience art and science are left behind: therefore it seems that he did not have the knowledge of all things, as was previously supposed to be assumed.

§ 11. Solution. It must be said that the vision of faith is through a mirror in an enigma but an enigma is manifold.

§ 12. For one enigma is from this very fact, that the intellect is created, from which it happens to it that, even if it is concerning the same knowable things which the intellect of God is about, nevertheless it cannot [penetrate] into them as limpidly as the divine intellect: and under such an enigma every rational creature is, even the soul of Christ.

§ 13. Another enigma, again, is from the fact that the intellect of man is inquisitive, whereas the angelic [intellect] is without inquiry, as we said above: and this enigma again man has inseparably on the way, although in the homeland he is made similar to the Angels.

§ 14. A third enigma is from the fact that the intellect is veiled by flesh: and this again is inseparable from man as long as he bears animal flesh. And under all of these Adam knew God.

§ 15. A fourth enigma is of the obscurity of the intellect, which occurs from the sin of the soul: and under this we see, for the reason that we can never be so recalled through penance in this life that nothing remains of the corruption of the sincerity of the powers.

§ 16. A fifth enigma is that proceeding not from the flesh, but from the corruption of the flesh: because the corruptible body is a load upon the soul, etc.. And in these last two ways Adam saw more limpidly than we do.

§ 17. Again, the mirror of creatures does not represent God except in some light. That light, therefore, is either divine alone and resting in the divine which is the light penetrating all things, and thus God knows creatures, and Himself to shine forth in creatures through the light which He Himself is, and He remains un-egressively in Himself.

§ 18. In a second way He is known in the creature through a light beginning from God and terminating in the creature: just as the Angels and the blessed from the morning vision come into the evening vision. And in neither of these ways did Adam know God in a mirror.

§ 1. In a third way He is known in a mirror through the vestige of uncreated light, which nevertheless is a created light, obscured in no part by the infection of sin: and thus Adam saw God in the mirror of the creature.

§ 2. In a fourth way God is known in the mirror of the creature through a created and obscured vestige: because when Adam sinned, all things which were made on account of him flowed down into a worse state, as the Gloss says on that of the Epistle to the Romans, 8:20: To vanity, etc.. And thus Adam did not see, but we do.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 4. For to what is first objected, it must be said that the Master in the fourth of the Sentences does not intend to remove every medium, but on the part of the interior enigma, the fourth and fifth; and on the part of the mirror, only the fourth.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that none of us can reach that clarity which has no obscurity from sin.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that Adam experienced for the sake of delight in the act of contemplation of the wisdom governing nature, and not for the acquisition of a habit: just as one who knows how to play the fiddle, fiddles, so that he may be delighted in the hearing.

DISTINCTIO XXIV

Divisio Textus

§ 7. Now it must be diligently investigated, etc. Here begins that part in which it is treated from what Adam fell through sin.

§ 8. And it has two parts: in the first of which he treats how he fell from the natural [gifts] in which he was wounded: and in the second, how he fell from gratuitous [gifts]: and this begins in distinction XXVI, there, A, This is operating grace, etc.

§ 10. This lesson, however, is subdivided into three: in the first of which he inquires, Whether man received any gratuitously given grace in the first state? Secondly he determines what that grace was, because it was of free choice, there, D, Here it is to be considered, etc. Thirdly, he determines the order of temptation in the powers of the soul, there, G, That also must not be passed over, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Adam Was Able To Stand By That Which He Received In Creation

Whether Adam could have stood firm through what he received in creation?

§ 11. Concerning the first, three doubts arise: namely, Whether Adam could have stood firm through what he received in creation? Secondly, Whether he could have progressed?

Thirdly, Whether his not progressing could then have been imputed to him?

§ 1. TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Damascene says that every creatable thing is vertible [i.e., changeable]: but it is certain, not for the better: therefore it will be turned for the worse. But the first man was created: therefore without the help of God he would be turned for the worse: therefore it was necessary that he would not stand firm unless he received some grace for standing. 2. Again, Augustine in the book On True Innocence "Human nature, even if it had remained in that integrity in which it was founded, could yet in no way preserve itself without the Creator aiding it." If therefore then, without the grace of God, he could not preserve his salvation which he had, how after the fall could he recover the grace which he lost? Therefore it seems that of himself he could not stand firm.

§ 2. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. That which is not in our power is not imputed to us: if therefore Adam could not stand firm in what he received without a new grace, if he did not receive that, it was not to be imputed to him that he fell: but he did not receive it: therefore the fall was not to be imputed to him. 2. Again, Nature gives being to no one without also giving to it virtues preserving the being which it gave, unless it be that its being is a continuous becoming: since therefore God is not more imperfect in operating than nature, when He gave natural being to man, He gave him the power of standing in it. 3. Again, God gave being to an ass, and the power of standing in it: therefore if He did not do this for man, he would be of a worse condition with Him than an ass. 4. Again, the Master says in the Letter that the grace by which he could stand in what he received was the faculty of free choice and of discerning good and evil: but it is certain that the first man received these powers or faculties in creation, from which he could stand.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said that man can be nothing, or do nothing without grace: but this is not always gratum faciens [i.e., grace making pleasing], but rather the preservation and influence of divine goodness for being and operating, just as He Himself says: Without me you can do nothing. And by this grace the first man could stand firm in what he had received: but he was not created in gratuitous gifts: which nevertheless I do not believe, although I maintain it on account of the Master.

§ 4. It must be said therefore to the first, that I well concede that man needs containing just like any other creature: but he would not need gratum faciens grace for this. And in this way the following authority of Augustine is also understood.

§ 5. To the other things, however, which are objected to the contrary, the solution is clear: because those do not remove the grace of divine influence and of things superadded in natural powers which God gives to each nature according to the proportion of its capacity: and such was also the grace which Adam received. But in man it is properly called grace, because it orders toward gratum faciens grace: whereas in other things it is not properly called by the name of grace, but of a given [gift], or of nature.

Articulus 2 — Whether Man Was Able To Make Progress In The First State From The Things Which He Received

Whether man could progress in the first state from those things which he received?

§ 6. Secondly it is asked, Whether man could progress in the first state from those things which he received?

§ 7. And it seems that he could: because 1. In Luke 10:30, it is said in the Gloss that he was wounded in natural [gifts], and despoiled of gratuitous ones: but no man is despoiled of that which he does not have: therefore he had gratuitous [gifts]: but one having gratuitous [gifts] can progress: therefore Adam could progress to merit.

1. Again, In natures we see thus, that everything which nature perfects in being, it also gives to it natural powers, by which it can progress into well-being and operating: since therefore God is not more imperfect than nature, He also gave to His work powers by which he could progress in well-being: therefore Adam also could progress.

§ 1. If it is conceded, Against this is what Augustine says in the Letter.

§ 2. FURTHERMORE it is asked here according to the other opinion, which says that Adam was created in gratuitous gifts, how is what Augustine says here understood, that he could not progress?

§ 3. Solution. It must be said to this, that Adam according to that opinion that he was not created in gratum faciens grace, could not progress to merit: because the progress of merit is not established within the power of natural forces or capacities, but it is necessary to have higher ones, like faith, charity, and the like: but he could progress in the well-being of nature, as in the advantages of life, and in works established within the power of natural capacities: and the second objection proves this and no more.

§ 4. To the first it must be said according to this opinion, that he was not despoiled of gratuitous gifts which he possessed, but which he was going to possess if he had stood firm.

§ 5. To that which is asked, How is it answered according to the other opinion to the words of Augustine in the Letter?

§ 6. It must be said that there is a progress to merit, and in this way Adam could progress: and there is a progress to confirmation according to the state of beatitude, and in this way he could not progress, unless God completed him.

Articulus 3 — Whether, Supposing That Man Did Not Have Grace, It Was Nevertheless To Be Imputed That He Fell

Whether assuming that man did not have grace, it was to be imputed to him that he fell?

§ 7. Thirdly it is asked, Since he did not have grace, whether it was to be imputed to him that he fell?

§ 8. And it seems that it was not: because 1. He had more things depressing into evil than elevating into good, because of the vertibility [changeability] of nature, and an Angel exhorting: therefore he could not resist. 2. Again, The devil is stronger than man; therefore man cannot resist him of himself: therefore that he succumbed was not to be imputed to him, as it seems.

§ 9. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: He had discretion of good and evil, and the faculty of choice, because he could dissent: therefore he fell by his own fault, since he could have stood firm, as it seems.

§ 10. Solution. From what was previously had in the question concerning temptation, this is easy to solve: because although nature is vertible, yet the influence of divine will holds itself more to standing firm, than that it should be turned.

§ 11. Again, although he has an Angel tempting from without, he also has a good Angel comforting him: and therefore he had more efficacious remedies elevating than depressing, and therefore it is to be imputed to him.

§ 12. To the next it must be said, as above, that although the devil is strong in himself, yet the temptation is not stronger than man himself wills: because he himself does not receive forces against us except from our permission or will: and therefore that objection does not compel.

Articulus 4 — Whether Man In The First State, By Resisting Evil And Not Consenting To Temptation, Would Have Merited For Himself

Whether man in the first state, by resisting evil and not consenting to temptation, would have made merit for himself?

Whether man in the first state, by resisting evil and not consenting to temptation, would have made merit for himself?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, around the middle: To which we say, that to resist evil, etc.

§ 2. For the reason of the Master seems to be none: because 1. It is a meritorious work from the fact that it proceeds from the root of charity. 2. Again, That he says, To decline from evil ... does not always merit the palm, seems false: because it is a part of justice, and justice according to its whole self merits the palm: therefore to decline from evil also.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said that the Master rather attends to the aspect of the act of virtue than of grace. And it is true: because virtue is about the difficult and the good: and the resistance of the first man would not have had this aspect, although otherwise it would have had the aspect of merit. Others say differently, namely that the merit of the remission of punishment consists in the difficulty of the work, and Adam would not have had this: but the merit of glory consists in the quantity of charity, and he would have had this if he had had grace. But this is not pleasing on this account, because he himself would not have needed that merit, since he was a debtor to no punishment: and therefore that distinction would be made in vain concerning his work.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that there is "to decline" which denotes nothing but a simple privation, just as one declines from an evil of which there was never a thought: and of this the Master speaks. There is also "to decline from evil" of which there was a thought, and there is an actual will tending to the contrary of that evil: and this is a part of justice, and merits the palm: and of this he does not speak.

Articulus 5 — What Free Choice Is: Whether A Habit, Or A Power, Or A Passion

What is free choice? Whether a habit, or a power, or a passion?

What is free decision? Is it a habit, or a power, or a passion?

§ 1. Thereafter, an inquiry is made concerning what is said there, at E, But free decision, etc. And three things are inquired here concerning free decision, of which the first is: What is it? The second: Whether its freedom can be lost or removed through anything? The third: concerning its act, of which mention is made in the Letter [Text of the Sentences].

§ 2. TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Everything that is capable of intensification and remission, out of those things that are in the soul, is a habit or a passion, and not a power. Free decision is capable of intensification and remission: therefore it is a habit, or a passion. The first premise is evident through what the Philosopher says, that there are three things in the soul: powers, passions, and habits; and powers do not receive more and less, since they are consequent upon the substance of the soul, but the other two are capable of more and less. The second premise is proved by Augustine, Bernard, and Anselm, who say that it is freer in the blessed than in wayfarers, and freer in wayfarers than in the damned.

§ 3. Likewise, freedom is divided into freedom from coercion, from sin, and from misery; and these bespeak a habit. Therefore, free decision bespeaks a habit, and not a power.

§ 5. Further, it is inquired in what way it is called the faculty of reason and of will. For it is either because it is in both, or because it is from both. If because it is in both: then free decision is a part of reason and of will. And since it is numerically one, one and the numerically same thing will be an essential part of two things, which is impossible. If, however, because it is from both: then free decision is a power composed from two powers, which is impossible. And according to this, reason and will would not remain in their proper act in the soul, but in that which they compose.

§ 6. Besides, two simple things do not compose a third, unless one is material relative to the other, and the other is formal. But reason and will are not disposed in this way. Therefore it seems that it is wrongly called the faculty of reason and of will.

§ 7. Further, it is inquired, how is reason taken in the definition of free decision? For it is clear that it is not taken for speculative reason. Therefore, for practical reason. Therefore, either for the higher, or the lower, or for both simultaneously. If for the higher: then lower things would not be disposed through free decision, as it seems. If, however, for the lower alone: then it would not happen that one inheres to higher things through free decision, which is also false. If, however, for both: this does not seem right, because according to this, free decision would not be a special power, but one encompassing many. In the same way, an objection can be made concerning the will.

§ 8. SOLUTION. It must be said, in my judgment, that free decision is a special power completed through a natural habit, which is its freedom: hence it has something of reason, and something of will, as its name shows. For its proper act is to will a decision for itself, and this means to choose, when two things are proposed, that is, to prefer and pre-elect. And to propose two things belongs to reason, but to prefer the one belongs to the will: but he names the freedom from the will.

§ 9. And that this may be understood, it must be known that, as the Philosopher says, "Free is he who is the cause of himself, and not the cause of another:" and that which is bound to another is not free. Hence powers affixed to organs are bound to them, not being able to act beyond the nature of the organ's receptivity: just as the visual power bound to the pupil cannot [act] beyond what the pupil is naturally apt to receive, and so it is also for the others. But from such an obligation all the powers of the rational soul are absolved, none of which is affixed to an organ. Another obligation to another is from the object, when it compels the power concerning consent to it, just as all the apprehensive powers of the rational soul, such as the intellect, reason, and the like, are compelled by arguments to consent to the true: and therefore they are not the cause of themselves, but of another. But the will is bound in neither way: because it is not a power affixed to an organ, nor does it even necessarily consent: because, while reason dictates that this must be done or not, it still holds itself toward whatever it wills, and can will the contrary of what has been judged by reason. And therefore the will is free, and the choice of free decision from that part has the same freedom. Hence it must be known that free decision is a power of the rational soul situated in the soul in the contact of the judging reason and the completely willing will: because to choose (which according to Augustine belongs to free decision) is after judgment, and before complete willing.

§ 10. Therefore, to the first, it must be said that freedom is threefold, namely, from coercion, from sin, and from misery. And only that which is from coercion is of the substance of free decision. And that, in turn, is considered in two ways, namely, in itself, and thus it cannot be intensified or remitted: or in comparison to an act, and thus it admits of more and less, just as the natural power itself does. And therefore, through this, it cannot be proved that it is not a power, but with respect to the other two freedoms, it designates a habit receiving intensification and remission.

§ 11. To the other, it must be said that although "faculty" is spoken of abstractly, it nevertheless names a power completed through the nature which is freedom from coercion, which it receives according as it attains the will.

§ 12. To the other, it must be said that it is called the faculty of reason and of will, as if from both, not materially, but according to order, because one in act puts itself before it, and the other follows from it.

§ 13. And this is clear from Damascene, who says that first one inquires, then disposes, thirdly orders, then judges and sentences, then chooses, then wills, then makes an impulse toward the work. And it is clear that to inquire, dispose and order, judge and sentence, are acts of reason: but to will and to make an impulse toward the work are acts of the will. But to choose (as we have it in the Letter) is an act of free decision. Therefore, free decision is a power situated in the contact of reason and will, having something from the fact that it is ordered to both, to one consequently, and to the other antecedently. And therefore both are posited in its definition: and it is not compacted, as some have said, from both, but by order it looks to both.

§ 14. To that which is further inquired, how reason is taken there? It must be said, for practical reason, which commonly holds itself toward both portions, because decision is in the service of both.

§ 15. Nor does the objection to the contrary follow: because reason and will do not enter into its composition, but are required for the order of the act which is to choose.

§ 16. Concerning all these and the following matters, many exceedingly exquisite disputed questions are found in our treatise On the Soul, in the question on the motive powers and on free decision.

Articulus 6 — Whether Free Choice Could Be Lost, And Its Freedom Taken Away By Something

Could free decision be lost, and its freedom removed through anything?

Could free decision be lost, and its freedom removed through anything?

§ 17. Secondly, it is inquired, whether it can be lost? For how it is preserved alongside foreknowledge was noted in the first book of the Sentences, in the treatise on foreknowledge.

§ 18. But it seems that it is lost through sin: because 1. Augustine says in the Enchiridion (and it will be held in the following distinction), "man, by using free decision badly, both loses himself and it." But what is lost is not possessed: therefore it seems that afterward it is not possessed by man.

§ 19. 2. Likewise, below he will say that after sin it is dragged and conquered: but what is dragged and conquered is coerced: therefore it is coerced after sin: therefore it is not free.

§ 20. 3. Likewise, Augustine in the book On Free Decision: "Man enjoys nothing with freedom, except what he enjoys with security." But man will never have security in this life: therefore neither freedom: therefore it seems that he has lost freedom.

§ 21. But against this is what Origen says on that verse of Deuteronomy 11:26: Behold, I set forth in your sight today, etc., as follows: "Those things that happen externally are not in our power. But to use well or badly those things that occur, by the reason within discerning and judging how one ought to use them, is in our power, as Moses says: Behold I set forth in your sight today, etc."

§ 22. Further, it is inquired, whether the ability to [do] evil is freedom or a part of freedom? And it seems that it is: because 1. It is posited in the previously held definition of Augustine.

§ 23. 2. Likewise, the Philosopher says that the power of the wicked is to be chosen: therefore it is good, and belongs to the power of free decision.

§ 24. But against this is what Anselm says, that to be able to sin is neither freedom, nor a part of freedom: therefore it is not of the essence of free decision.

§ 25. SOLUTION. It must be said that freedom, as the Master says in the following distinction, is threefold, namely, from necessity, and from sin, and from misery. And the first cannot be lost, but the second and third can.

§ 26. Likewise, the first is still considered in two ways, namely according to the terminus from which, that is, according as it is free or absolved from necessity: and thus it is never lost, or diminished: because a privation does not receive intensification or remission. Hence, according to this, it is equally in God and in the creature, and equally in the blessed and the miserable, and equally in the good and the bad. It can also be considered in comparison to the act of choosing: and in this way it is not lost, but is diminished from the defect of the habit of grace or [of another good].

§ 27. To that therefore which is objected first and third, it must be said that it is understood concerning the freedom of grace and of glory or beatitude, and not of nature which is from necessity.

§ 28. To the other, it must be said that it is dragged and conquered so as to be subject to sin: because by itself it cannot exit from sin, unless it has freedom from sin, which is through grace. But it is not dragged nor conquered such that it is coerced to a subsequent sin, because in that way it would have lost freedom from necessity.

§ 29. To that which is further inquired, it must be said that the power of sinning is not a part of freedom except accidentally, namely insofar as it is numerically and substantially one with the power of not sinning, and this is materially. But insofar as it is of sinning, it is a defect and an infirmity, and not a power: and in the first way Augustine takes it; in the second way Anselm.

§ 30. Through this also the solution to what the Philosopher says can be evident.

Articulus 7 — What The Act Of Free Choice Is, And Whether It Is Choosing

What is the act of free decision? and, Whether it is to choose?

§ 31. Thirdly, it is inquired concerning the act of free decision which is to choose, as is held from the definition which Augustine posits.

§ 32. But to the contrary, it seems to be the act of electiveness (eligentia): 1. Electiveness is not free decision: therefore to choose is not the act of free decision. But that electiveness is not of free decision is clear: because the Philosopher says that electiveness is always right, while free decision is right and not right.

§ 33. 2. Likewise, of one simple power there is one simple act: but free decision is one simple power: therefore it has a simple act. The first premise is evident per se. The second is taken from the premises. Hence thus: To choose is not a simple act: therefore to choose is not an act of free decision.

§ 34. The proof of the first is that Damascene, defining "to choose", posits many things in the definition, saying that to choose is, when two things are proposed, to prefer this one to that.

§ 35. SOLUTION. It must be said that "to choose" is twofold, namely, from spontaneous consent, as the Master says in the following distinction: and thus it is the choice of whatever the chooser wills, and consists in the freedom of decision. There is also choice which is the determination of the better eligible thing according to right reason, and thus it belongs to electiveness: and thus it is clear that the choice of free decision follows spontaneous consent without any governing rule: and therefore it is free. But the choice of electiveness follows the rules of reason taken from the nature of the eligible thing: and therefore that is not free, but is compelled by right reason, and falls into the considerations of the topical art, as is clear in Book II of the Topics: and it is made the efficient cause of virtue, as is clear in Book III of the Ethics.

§ 37. To the other, it must be said that although free decision is one power, nevertheless its rooting is not immediately upon the substance of the soul, as was said before, but rather it is upon it as already determined through other powers which it puts before itself: and therefore in act it also has something from the others, yet that is material, namely, to propose two things: but the complement of the act rests in preferring. And thus it is found in all acts which are not of one power according as it is alone, but in comparison of order to others, such as to enjoy, to use, to know, and many such things, concerning which it was noted in the first book of the Sentences: and in another work distinct from this, in the question concerning eternal life.

Articulus 8 — What Sensuality Is, And Whether It Names One Force Or One Power, Or Several

What is sensuality? and, Whether it names one force or power, or many?

What is sensuality? and, Whether it names one force or power, or many?

§ 38. Thereafter it is inquired concerning what he says, there, For sensuality is a certain power, etc. And two things are inquired concerning sensuality, namely, what is it? and, whether there can be sin in it?

§ 39. To the first one proceeds thus, having supposed the definition of Augustine which is posited here, namely that sensuality is a certain lower power of the soul, from which there is a movement that is directed into the bodily senses. And he posits another, that it is the appetite for things pertaining to the body.

§ 40. But against this: 1. The lower power of the soul from which there is such a movement, is not one power: because the phantasy, according to the Philosopher, moves in this way, and also the concupiscible, and the irascible: therefore he wrongly calls it a "power".

§ 41. Likewise, at the end of this distinction he says that sometimes sensuality is called the lower portion of reason which intends to the disposition of temporal things, namely lower things which are also sensible: therefore the movement intending into the senses is from the lower portion: and so it will be sensuality.

§ 42. 2. Likewise, those things of which there is appetite or flight by the sensible soul, are not always received from sense, as Avicenna says: but they are intentions of good or evil, of harmful or convenient, which the estimative power elicits, and does not receive them from sense: therefore it is wrongly said that it is directed into the senses.

§ 43. Likewise, against the second: For the appetite for things pertaining to the body is not of one power, but rather of the irascible and concupiscible: therefore he wrongly posits it in sensuality as in one power.

§ 44. SOLUTION. Without prejudice it seems to me that sensuality does not name one power and potency, but many, namely all those in which a movement is completed from a sensual apprehension. But that is completed in two ways: for it can begin from the receiving sense, and the common sense composing one sensible with another, just as it began in the woman, as is said: Therefore the woman saw that the tree was good for eating, and beautiful to the eyes, and delightful to look at. Namely, there was the common sense composing the visible with the gustable. Then follows the act of the practical phantasy composing and dividing what is received from the sense, according to a composition from which the intentions of good and evil, of convenient and non-convenient, or of harmful or friendly, can be elicited. And then the estimative power informed by those intentions, and instigating to movement or flight. And then follows the affluence of desire which is a common power: and it has two parts, namely the concupiscible and irascible, and it flows abundantly through concupiscence into the delightful, but through anger it rises up against the harmful. And then there is a delightful touch in the soul through delectation: and there the movement of sensuality is completed: whence also it is denominated from it, because it feels the conjunction of the delightful sensible thing.

§ 45. Another mode of beginning is from the memory which (as the Commentator says on the book On the Soul) makes the singular stand through reflection before the sense: and in the progress there is no variation.

§ 46. And it seems to me that sensuality names the sensible soul in all these motive powers. For it is necessary that in every movement a report be made through apprehension, which begins from sense, or from memory: and afterward it runs down that path which we have spoken of: but nevertheless principally the ultimate completion is the touch, or the conjunction of the sensible thing delightfully in the sense of interior delectation.

§ 47. To that therefore which is objected first, it must be said that Augustine in book XII of On the Trinity, whence those things are drawn, does not treat of the powers of the soul intentionally: and therefore he commonly calls a "power" that in which the whole force of that movement which is on the part of the beastly nature is completed: and from that nature it is called one power, and not from the ratio of one power.

§ 48. To the other, it must be said that "to be received from sense" is said in two ways, namely from the proper object: and thus intentions are not received from sense, as Avicenna says: because the intention of good or evil here and now is not the proper sensible of any sense. It can also be said to be received from sense, what is elicited from the composition or division of sensibles, and is not separated from the appendages of matter which makes a particular thing: and thus the intentions of good or evil here and now, are received from sense: and thus according to Augustine, sensuality is directed into the five bodily senses.

§ 49. To the other, the solution is clear through what has been said before.

§ 50. Moreover, you will find many things concerning this matter and the following article in the other Summa, in the question on temptations, and on the motive powers of the soul.

Articulus 9 — Whether There Can Be Sin In Sensuality

Whether there can be sin in sensuality?

§ 51. Secondly, it is inquired, Whether there can be sin in sensuality? And it seems that there cannot: because 1. Sin is not present in beasts: but sensuality is common to us with the beast: therefore sin cannot be in sensuality.

§ 52. 2. Likewise, Augustine says that every sin is in reason.

§ 53. Likewise, he says in the Letter, and it will be held below, that sensuality is secluded from the nature of reason: therefore sin is not in sensuality.

§ 54. 3. Likewise, of opposites there is one power: virtue and sin are opposites: therefore the power of them in which they have being, is one. But virtue never has being in sensuality: therefore neither does sin, as it seems.

§ 55. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. First movements are sins, as Augustine says there. And first movements are in sensuality: therefore sin is in sensuality.

§ 56. 2. Likewise, the first movement is called in the genus of sin with respect to the second: but the second in the woman is a sin: therefore also the first in the serpent: because what is not a sin is not first in the genus of sin.

§ 57. SOLUTION. Without prejudice it must be said that in sensuality there is a sin which is called the first movement, which according to Augustine, is the lightest sin.

§ 58. To the first therefore it must be said that although according to substance sensuality is common to us with the beast, nevertheless it has in man an order and composition to reason, which it does not have in the beast, and from that order it has the fact that it can be the subject of venial sin insofar as it is corrupted.

§ 59. To the other, it must be said that every sin is in reason, not as in a subject, but as in a cause: because what is even venial in sensuality, this itself is caused from the fact that it is ordered and united to reason.

§ 60. To the other, it must be said that the lightest venial sin does not have opposition to virtue, but rather mortal sin [does]: and therefore it remains with virtue, because it does not attain the same part. And therefore it is not necessary that sensuality be the subject of virtue, if it is the subject of this sin. Note, however, that in the sensible soul there are certain parts, according to the Philosopher at the end of the first book of the Ethics, which somehow participate in reason, [namely] the concupiscible, and the irascible: and these, according as they participate somehow in reason, are elevated above the capability of sensuality, and are made subjects of virtue and vice.

§ 61. Concerning this, again, seek elsewhere in the assigned places.

Articulus 10 — What Reason Divided Into Two Parts Is, Namely Whether It Is One Power Or Several

What is reason divided into two parts, namely whether it is one power, or many?

§ 62. Thereafter it is inquired concerning what he says, there, E, But reason is the higher power of the soul, etc. And five things are inquired. First, what is reason divided into two parts, namely whether it is one power, or many? Second, by what are the higher and lower distinguished? Third, concerning the lower. Fourth, concerning the higher. And fifth, how ought the higher to rule the lower?

§ 63. To the FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. Augustine says that there is a higher power of the soul: therefore it is one power, and not many.

§ 64. 2. Likewise, reason is posited in the definition of free decision along with the will: therefore, just as the will is one power, so also is reason, as it seems.

§ 65. AGAINST THIS: 1. That power, whatever it is, is called by Augustine by many names, namely intellect, and higher reason, and appetite. Likewise, the reason of wisdom. And he calls the lower by many names, namely action, the reason of science, the woman. But it is clear that not all these denote the act of one force or power: therefore it seems that it does not suppose one power.

§ 66. 2. Likewise, he himself says that the higher [portion] inheres in contemplating eternal things: but to contemplate belongs to practical speculation, and to inhere belongs to the will and to what is pleasing: therefore he names the higher not only reason, but also will.

§ 67. 3. Likewise it is held concerning the lower: because the lower reasons concerning lower things, and acts, as he says in the Letter: and these belong to reason, and to will.

§ 68. 4. Likewise, the woman and the man ate: therefore they tasted the illicit: but this is done through the consent of the will: therefore neither of those parts is separated from the will.

§ 69. SOLUTION. Without prejudice it seems to me it must be conceded that the reason which is here divided by Augustine denotes the whole by which movement is completed on the part of the rational soul according to practical reason and the appetite of the will, but nevertheless principally with respect to practical reason: just as was also said concerning sensuality.

§ 70. Nor does the first objection compel: because in that place Augustine does not intend to treat of the distinction of the powers of the soul: and therefore he commonly calls a "power" that in which there is the force for good or bad movement: and this is not one.

§ 71. To the other, it must be said that when it is posited in the definition of free decision, then it is posited with the will: and then it is divided from a different perspective: yet it is understood commonly regarding the higher and lower. But Augustine here does not seem to attend to this, unless perhaps principally: because the office of this twofold conversion is first in reason, and is in the will as following the decree of reason.

Articulus 11 — In Respect Of What The Two Portions, The Higher And The Lower, Differ

According to what are those two portions distinguished, the higher and lower?

§ 72. Secondly, it is inquired, according to what are those portions distinguished? And it seems that it is according to objects: because 1. The higher and the lower, the eternal and the temporal, do not have one ratio: therefore they do not move according to one ratio, but the higher is moved by eternal things, and the lower by temporal things; therefore they are not one power, but distinct through objects.

§ 73. 2. Likewise, temporal and temporal differ less than temporal and eternal: but temporal and temporal sometimes constitute many powers: therefore much more so temporal and eternal.

§ 74. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. The ruler and the executor must necessarily look to the same thing: because the ruler rules in nothing, except in the same thing that the executor executes: but the higher is the ruler, and the lower the executor: therefore it is necessary that both look to the same thing, namely the temporal act in which the higher rules, and the lower operates or disposes.

§ 75. 2. Likewise, in the Letter he says that when we discourse concerning both parts of the human mind, we discourse concerning one certain thing, nor do we double it except through its offices. Therefore they do not discourse according to a reality which is a power: therefore they are one power.

§ 76. SOLUTION. I think it must be said that they are one power, as is ultimately proved, and they are not distinguished except through habits and offices. For the habit of the higher is the rule of divine justice, which is attended to in operable things with respect to what is licit from the precept of God, or not licit, or expedient for the edification of morals or faith, or not expedient, or according as it makes a sincere conscience or not: because such reasons are divine. But the habit of the lower is attended to with respect to the base or beautiful, or what is honorable for citizens or not honorable, approaching the mean of virtue or not approaching: because such reasons are human. And both reasons, namely human and divine, are looking to the same operable things: and therefore they are disparted in the office of ruling and of the ruled through these habits: but they have the same work and object, although they do not attend to the same ratio of the work: because it happens that one and the same work has different rules, of which one is under another, and imitating another: just as even the Jurists say that the laws of the Emperors do not disdain to imitate the sacred canons.

§ 77. To the first therefore it must be said that the higher as higher in the ratio of the uncreated does not move the power, but rather in the ratio of the rule of the lower: and therefore the objection is not valid.

§ 78. To the other, it must be said that they differ less according to nature, but sometimes differ much more in the ratio of moving: because the eternal and the temporal can move to the same thing: and then they attain each other as ruler and ruled.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Happens That The Superior Portion Sins Venially Only, Or Venially And Mortally Together

Whether it happens that the higher portion sins venially only, or venially and mortally simultaneously?

§ 79. Thirdly it is inquired concerning the higher partition, whether it happens that it errs? And it seems that it does not: because 1. That whose proper office is always to inhere in eternal things, does not happen to err: but this is the office of the higher portion: therefore the higher portion does not happen to err.

§ 80. 2. Likewise, in the soul there is a part of perpetual perversity, such as sensuality, which is never so healed in this life that it does not desire the illicit: because it is the flesh which lusts against the spirit.

§ 81. 3. Likewise, there is a part in the soul which can err and be directed, such as the woman, or lower portion: therefore for the complement of the division it seems that there should be a higher part, which can never err.

§ 82. 4. Likewise, a rule does not happen to be curved, while the species of regimen remains: but the higher portion is the primary rule of the regimen of the woman: therefore if it is incurvated, no species of regimen remains. The proof of the first is, because there is no species of regimen except to the norm of the rule. But the second is supposed from the Letter, where it says that it belongs to the man to rule the woman.

§ 83. But against this is what is said in the Letter, that the man sometimes eats with the woman.

§ 84. But then it is further inquired: If this is granted, that the man sins, whether it happens that he sins venially and mortally, or mortally alone?

§ 85. It seems that mortally alone: because 1. In the serpent there is only venial sin, but in the woman venial and mortal: therefore since only the third member remains, in the man it will be mortal alone: for there cannot be a fourth, which is a sin, and which is neither venial, nor mortal.

§ 86. 2. Likewise, nothing is averting from eternal and immutable reasons, except mortal sin: but the man does not sin, except through aversion from them: therefore he does not sin except mortally.

§ 87. BUT AGAINST THIS: Let it be posited that someone is moved by a light movement of surreption of vainglory concerning science or sanctity: it is clear that this movement is not a mortal sin. But since it has no object in sense, nor is it conjoined to anything sensible, it cannot belong to sensuality: nor is it of the lower portion of reason, because its [office] is to dispose temporal things: therefore it is in the higher: therefore the higher portion can sin venially.

§ 88. SOLUTION. It must be said that the higher portion can sin venially, and mortally.

§ 89. To the first therefore it must be said that of opposites there is always one power: and therefore a power whose act and office is to be converted to eternal reasons in the above-mentioned mode, its [act] also is to be converted to the reasons contrary to them, such as sin, and demerit, and the illicit, and the like. But it is true that there is no sinning except against the optimum: because that is the end, and the denomination is given from the end, and the definition respects the name: and therefore the office also respects the end, because the definition is through the office and act. Hence although it is always for the higher portion to be converted to eternal reasons: nevertheless it is not always converted, but sometimes it is averted from them.

§ 90. To the other, it must be said that in the state of the way and of merit there cannot be such a corruption: because that would be contrary to the possibility of conversion to God: but corruption to venial sin is not contrary, and therefore that is in the soul. And through this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 91. To the other, it must be said that the higher portion is the ruler and not the rule: for the rule is the divine reason of justice: and that is not corrupted. And even when an aversion is made through reason, the possibility for grace and of conversion to the rule remains: and therefore with the higher part corrupted, the species of regimen still remains.

§ 92. To that which is further inquired, in my judgment it must be said that it can sin venially: and yet I well concede that the power of sinning venially is from corruption.

§ 1. ...of sensuality: but this corruption is twofold, namely that which belongs to sensuality as a subject and cause, such as that which is in the lower powers conjoined to the flesh; and that which belongs to sensuality as a cause and not as a subject, and this is diffused in all the powers of the rational soul on account of the corruption regarding its binding to the flesh. From that corruption proceeds an instinct in the higher portion, and in certain other parts of the soul, for spiritual sins, such as for a certain vainglory, pride, and infidelity, which do not proceed from habit nor from deliberation.

§ 2. And BY THIS the solution to the first objection is evident: because that sin is from the serpent as from a cause, yet it is not in it as in a subject.

§ 3. To the next objection it must be said that this is true, that nothing turns one away except mortal sin by an actual or habitual turning away: but something can dispose one toward a turning away, such as venial sin.

§ 4. To the next objection it must be said that the mortal sin of the man corrupts the entire order according to act, but venial sin does not.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Woman Can Eat Without The Man, And What Is Understood By The Man And What By The Woman, And Whether The Woman Has Any Consent Or Only The Man, And What Morose Delight Is

Whether the woman can eat without the man? and, What is understood by the man, and what by the woman? and, Whether the woman has any consent, or only the man? and, What is morose delectation?

§ 5. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the woman, or the lower part of reason. And it is asked, Whether she can eat without the man?

§ 6. And it seems that she can: because thought can take pleasure without consent: but consent belongs to the man: therefore the eating can be in the woman without the man.

§ 7. Also, the serpent takes pleasure in the illicit aspects of the flesh, and the woman in the same: what is the difference, or how is it known that the woman has eaten?

§ 8. It seems that there is none: because the pleasurable object is the same, and ordained to the same end, namely to the concupiscence of the flesh according to consent: therefore there is no difference in anything. If you say that the woman by reason composes and divides forms, which the sensuality common to us and the beasts does not do. On the contrary: Sensuality composes and divides, and elicits intentions of the friendly or the harmful even in beasts: because otherwise a sheep would never flee a wolf, and follow a shepherd or a dog.

§ 9. But if it is said that the woman sees under the aspect of the honorable or the shameful, and thus takes pleasure in it. On the contrary: That pleasure is after deliberation: therefore it would always be a mortal sin, which is false.

§ 10. Also, if you say that consent causes it to be in the woman: this is nothing, because according to the Master [Peter Lombard] consent pertains to the man. Moreover, consent makes a mortal sin: but it is not always mortal in the woman.

§ 11. It is further asked, Whether the woman has any consent?

§ 12. And it seems that she does not: because consent is the ultimate thing that occurs before the completion of the work: but the ultimate pertains to the ultimate part: and this is the man: therefore consent belongs only to the man.

§ 13. BUT AGAINST THIS is what is held in the Letter of the text in two places of this distinction, that the woman consented to the pleasure, and the man to the deed.

§ 14. Further it is asked here, When does it become morose delectation [i.e., a lingering pleasure]?

§ 15. For "morose" refers to time, and is named from time: therefore, he in whom pleasure lingers for a long time seems to take pleasure morosely, and thus sins mortally.

§ 16. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In the Lives of the Fathers it is read that the sting grew in a certain man for thirty years:

and yet he did not sin, as the Fathers say.

§ 17. 2. Also, Paul asked three times that the sting of the flesh might depart from him , according to one Gloss: and he did not obtain it: therefore it is not morose by reason of time.

§ 18. Solution. It seems it must be said that the woman can eat without the man, when she takes pleasure in something illicit without consent to the deed.

§ 19. Now to that which is asked, What is the difference between the pleasure of sensuality and that of the woman?

§ 20. It seems it must be said that, as was clear in the question concerning sensuality, as long as the pleasurable object is not actually or habitually apprehended separately from the apprehended sensible thing and its appendages, the pleasure is always in the serpent. But sometimes it is apprehended actually or habitually under the aspect of the shameful, according as those concerned with civil affairs determine what is shameful, such as under the aspect of what is shameful or of that which one wishes to be hidden: and because a brute animal does not notice such aspects, therefore then it is in the woman. And there can well be such a thought either by habit or by act before consent to the pleasure and to the deed: and then the woman eats venially.

§ 21. Now to that which is asked concerning consent, I say that consent is twofold, namely to interior pleasure, and to the exterior deed: and that which is to the exterior deed properly belongs to the man, because by it the members are presented as weapons of iniquity to sin .

But that which is to interior pleasure belongs indeed principally to the woman, yet through the sluggishness of dissimulation it is imputed also to the man, as is held in the Letter.

§ 22. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the ultimate thing which is before the completion of the deed is consent to the deed, and not consent to the interior pleasure, and that consent belongs to the man.

§ 23. To that which is further asked, it must be said without prejudice that morose delectation is not so called from the brevity or length of time, but rather from the sluggishness or vigilance of reason. Hence, to specify it more precisely, I think that even if pleasurable concupiscence should linger for many days with the resistance of reason, that is a merit of the battle, and not a sin, as is proven by objecting. But if reason does not resist, after it has seen it under the intention of the shameful, and the dishonorable, and the sinful, and the illicit, then I think that even in a short hour it is called morose: because reason is not turned away from the shameful and sinful thing seen, on account of an actual or habitual consent.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Higher Reason Ought To Rule The Lower, And Whether The Serpent Is Exempt From The Rule Of Reason

Whether the higher reason has to rule the lower? and, Whether the serpent is absolved from the rule of reason?

§ 24. Fifthly, it is asked concerning the rule of the lower by the higher.

§ 25. And it proceeds thus: 1. Whatever two things are related in such a way that one is the ruler and the other is the ruled, it is necessary that the ruler looks through certain rules to the acts of the ruled: the lower and higher portions are related in this way: therefore it is necessary that the higher looks to the acts of the lower through certain rules: therefore the man and the woman are diversely related to acts.

§ 26. Also, in bodies we see it thus, that a body which is sometimes moved and sometimes not, and sometimes generated and sometimes not, is ruled by a body always remaining in being, and which is of perpetual motion, just as generable and corruptible things are regulated by the heaven in motion: therefore it seems that since the serpent is more mutable than the woman, the serpent ought to be ruled more by the man than the woman is.

§ 27. 3. Also, between the ruler and the ruled in nature there is such a relationship that the ruler is the mover and the ruled is the moved: therefore it seems that no motion can arise in sensuality and the lower portion which does not proceed from the higher as from a prime mover: and this is false: therefore they are not related as ruler and ruled, as it seems.

§ 28. 4. Also, naturally it is thus, that everything which can behave formlessly in being is subordinated to another regulating it, which can in no way behave formlessly in being: but the higher portion can behave formlessly by sinning and not sinning: therefore it ought to be subordinated to another by which it may be regulated, and it ought not to regulate others, as it seems.

§ 29. Solution. I think the first argument to be necessary, although some say that the higher portion is synderesis, concerning whose opinion there is no place to dispute now, because this view has been disputed elsewhere.

§ 30. To the next objection it must be said that the serpent is not absolved from the rule of reason: but this is in the dissent forestalling it in its motions, in the same way in which we say the first motions are voluntary, because this and that can be forestalled by a contrary will, and thus sensuality is contained. But it is not subordinated to rule in such a way that the rectitude of the rule according to the principle of virtue could be imprinted upon it: nor is this necessary, because the things regulated do not relate in only one way to the norm of the rule.

§ 31. To the next objection it must be said that there is a regulating principle in nature universally, and there is a regulating principle particularly: universally like the motion of the prime movable [heaven], whose diversity responds to the diversity of the things regulated: a diversity, I say, proceeding from the diversity of the movable things, and the diverse situation of the stars; and to this in humanity corresponds the rectitude of divine justice described in synderesis which rules universally, not looking so much at particulars: because many things happen in particulars contrary to it. There is also a regulating principle particularly, like the directive power in the body of a generated thing: and this ruler is mutable, and is subordinated to another universal and immutable one, and to this in us corresponds the higher portion which is also subordinated in us to the rule of synderesis.

§ 32. Now to that which is objected, that there is no motion in the ruled except from the ruler. It must be said that it is false: because in nature there are active and passive qualities in matter, on account of which even when a motion is made by the higher, sometimes generation and corruption do not happen, because the bodies are disposed to the contrary, as Ptolemy says. And so it is in these spiritual matters; the disposition of corruption is abundant in the serpent and in the woman, after this it is less in the man, but nevertheless there is some: and therefore from such a corruption frequently arise inordinate motions, and even when a motion is made by the ruler according to the rectitude of the rule, sometimes the impetus of the corruption is so great that the motion of the regulating principle is excluded and conquered.

§ 34. Now for the easier understanding of the following and preceding points, the division of the motive powers of the rational soul must be noted, just as the division of the sensible soul was also presupposed.

§ 35. Therefore it must be said that the good moves, according to the Philosopher: therefore according to the division of the good there will be a division of the motive powers. Therefore the good can be taken as known, which makes an announcement concerning motion, or as touching the appetite: and in both ways it is motive, and first it moves practical cognition, which by the Philosopher is called the practical intellect, and secondly, by a proximate motion it touches the affection or will. These therefore taken jointly: are either with respect to the uncreated good alone, or the uncreated insofar as it regulates the created good, or with respect to the created alone, because a fourth member is null, for the reason that the created does not regulate the uncreated, but conversely, as we said above. If of the uncreated alone: then they are the powers of the image, concerning which it has been stated elsewhere how they are assumed, both in this work, and in another. But if it is objected that the image is also when the soul remembers itself, understands itself, loves itself: and thus it is not with respect to God alone: it has been solved above entirely: because there is no image in this except insofar as the power itself is an image: and thus the intellect and affection then begin from it, and are terminated in the uncreated good. But if it is with respect to the uncreated good insofar as it is the rule of the created good, it is not except according to the principles of the most upright divine law. This therefore is twofold, namely in universal principles in which there is no error, as that fornication is a mortal sin: and thus it is synderesis which does not err, as the Saints say. Or it is according to principles applicable to particulars in an action: and thus it is the higher portion which looks to the particular acts of the lower, and yet according to higher principles. Or it is from both, namely with synderesis proposing, and reason assuming: and then it is conscience, because conscience is properly of a conclusion which follows from the major premise of synderesis, and the minor premise of reason: as when the conscience of a heretic dictates that one must die before swearing an oath: conscience dictates this for this reason, because synderesis had proposed that one must die rather than that a precept be transgressed: and reason assumed that the precept of the Lord is not to swear: from which it follows that one must die before swearing. And concerning synderesis there will be no error, since that is in universal principles known through themselves, and in which there is no exception. But reason looking at particular actions in which very much error occurs, is deceived and errs: and therefore the error of conscience in the conclusion arises. But if it is of the created good: either it is by way of announcing motion: and then it is practical reason, and practical intellect: or by way of choosing, and thus issues free choice [liberum arbitrium]: or by way of completing and eliciting through command, and thus it is the will: and under these are the motive powers of the sensible soul, concerning which it was treated before.

§ 36. There are also many acts of reason, as also singular ones, concerning which enough has been treated in the question on free choice: but all these things have been expounded with study and diligent proof in another work from this one.

Articulus 15 — Whether Now In A Single Man There Is An Order Of Temptation And Progression Such As Preceded In The First Parents

Whether now in one human being there is an order and progression of temptation, such as preceded in the first parents?

§ 37. Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, It also must not be passed over, etc.

§ 38. For it still remains to be asked, Whether this progression is according to every sin?

§ 39. And it seems that it is not: because in an idle word morose delectation is not a mortal sin: and even if the man should eat, the whole soul is not damned on account of this.

§ 40. If this is granted, 1. It seems to be against the Letter where the Master says that it can be mortal if it is very often decided that it is to be done.

§ 41. 2. Also, in the Gospel it is held that an account will be rendered of it in judgment since therefore an account is not demanded of a small thing there, it seems that it could become mortal.

§ 42. BUT AGAINST THIS the Doctors object that: 1. Species are not changed: but venial and mortal are diverse species of sins: therefore they are not changed into each other: therefore a venial sin does not become a mortal one.

§ 43. 2. Also, whatever things are distant without proportion, of them there is no changing into each other: but venial and mortal are distant in this way: which is proven by the punishments due to them: therefore there is no changing of them into each other.

§ 44. 3. Also, no circumstance aggravates infinitely: but iteration or act or custom is a circumstance: therefore it does not aggravate infinitely: but it would aggravate infinitely if it effected a mortal sin: which is proven by the punishment: therefore it does not make it mortal.

§ 45. Further it is asked, Whether this process is in every mortal sin?

§ 46. And it seems that it is not: because there are certain mortal sins which have no aspect of reason in sensuality, such as many kinds of pride, infidelity, and vainglory, and the like: therefore in these those degrees cannot be preserved.

§ 47. Solution. It must be said that in all sins there are these degrees as to the first motion, and the second, and the third: but those motions are not of the same weight: because I do not think this, that in a venial sin, which from its genus is venial, even in the consent of the higher portion is it mortal, unless something else is added.

§ 48. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said according to the Doctors that the conversion to the mutable good in a venial sin is proportioned to the conversion to the same in a mortal sin: but the turning away is not proportioned to the turning away: and therefore on the part of the conversion pleasure can grow to such an extent that sometimes it is done in contempt of God, which previously was done out of weakness or levity: and then it is mortal not from iteration, but from the added contempt.

§ 49. To the next objection it must be said that an account will be rendered on the day of judgment of small and great, which has not been deleted through penance: and therefore the Saints then will render an account of nothing, because the combustible things are to be purged then by the fire by which the face of the world and of purgatory will be burned out. But for the wicked both venial and mortal sins are reserved: because in the damned they have not been deleted through penance: and therefore they will render an account of both: but nevertheless one account is held for a farthing, and another for a hundred marks, and for the account of a farthing the bailiff would not be thrust into prison if he had not carried off a hundred marks along with the farthing: and this is the meaning of the Gospel according to the letter.

§ 50. To that which is further asked, it must be said that in every mortal sin there can be these degrees: but, as we have said above, the first motion will be of the serpent not as a subject, but as originating the corruption from which that corruption exhales, as it were. And this I say in the present life [in via] in which the state of temptation has a place: because in the damned it is not so: because in them the motions proceed from a rooted and confirmed malice.

Articulus 16 — Why The Lower Portion Is Called Sensuality

Why is the lower portion called sensuality?

Why is the lower portion called sensuality?

§ 51. Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, Now it must not be passed over in silence, etc.

§ 52. 1. For there seems to be no reason why the lower portion should be called sensuality, since the Master from the words of Augustine says that it is not of a bestial [sheep-like] nature, for the reason that otherwise it could not be taken into the marriage of the man.

§ 53. 2. Also, he himself said that it was derived from him, like the lower from the higher, with which it is of the same nature.

§ 54. Solution. It must be said that sensuality can be named from the sensuality of nature, or from the sensuality of the object, or in both ways simultaneously. In the first way it does not apply to the lower portion of reason: because it itself is not of a sensible nature, but spiritual and rational. In the second way it does apply to it: because it operates around particular sensible things, in which is the life of nature, although it disposes them according to reasons that are not sensible, but abstract, which are the reasons of the honorable, and of the civil good, as was treated before. In the third way, again, it does not apply to it, but only to sensuality: and by this the solution to the whole is evident.

DISTINCTIO XXV

Divisio Textus

§ 55. Now indeed let us return to the proposition, etc. Here the Master treats of the freedom of choice [libertas arbitrii]. And it has three parts: in the first of which he touches upon what it is according to the Philosophers. In the second, what things are subject to it, there, B, Now this must be known, etc.

§ 56. In the third, he touches upon to whom it belongs as subjects, there, C, And indeed according to the aforesaid assignment, etc.

Articulus 1 — Why Free Choice Is Said By A Double Name, And Why Substantively And Adjectively, And Whether It Is Well Defined, And Whether It Is One Particular Power Or A Universal One Diffused In All Motive Powers

Why is free choice called by a double name? and, Why as a substantive and an adjective? and, Is it defined well? and, Is it one particular power, or a universal one diffused in all motive powers?

§ 57. A question arises concerning the first part on the name of free choice, why it is called by a double name?

§ 58. Also it is asked, What belongs to reason that choice falls into its name as a substantive , and that which is from the will falls there as an adjective, namely "free."

§ 59. Further it is asked concerning the definition which is given here, and is said to be physical, that it is "a free judgment concerning [or from] the will": for either it denotes the efficient cause, or it notes the matter. If the efficient cause: then the freedom of choice is from the will, as from a cause: therefore freedom is not primarily found in free choice.

§ 60. But if this is granted, on the contrary it seems to be that the powers of the soul ought to be denominated from that which is primarily and per se found in it. If therefore freedom is primarily found in the will, the will ought rather to be denominated from it, than free choice: and this is not done: therefore it is primarily in free choice, as it seems. But if it notes the matter: it cannot note the matter, except that which it is about: and this also seems to be false: because John Damascene says: With free power he desires, and freely he wills, and freely he inquires and considers, and freely he consults, freely he judges, freely he loves, freely he chooses, and freely he is moved, and freely he acts in those things which are according to nature. Therefore it is not only about the will.

§ 61. FROM THIS FURTHER it seems again that free choice is not one particular power, but one universal power diffused as it were in all the motive powers. Which also seems to be the case through Augustine, who in book V of Responses says thus: When we speak of free choice, we do not speak of a part of the soul, but of the whole: because the first man did not sin in a part of the soul, but failed in the whole nature in which he was established. If this is granted, entirely by the same reason the will will not be one particular power: because by willing we understand, and by willing we inquire, and we do all those things which Damascene said.

§ 62. Moreover, Damascene himself explains that it is not his intention that free choice should be a universal power, but that it moves the others in humans, while in beasts others are moved by natural instinct. Hence also immediately before he says thus, Irrational appetite belongs to irrational beings, and they are driven by natural appetite. Therefore neither is will called irrational appetite, nor is counsel. For the will is rational, and free choice is an appetite. But in human beings endowed with reason, the natural appetite is led rather than leading: for by free choice, and with reason, it is moved. But because cognitive and appetitive virtues are conjoined in the same: therefore he desires by free choice, they are led. Therefore he does not intend this, that it is universal, but that it is the motor of the others to act, just as also the will is.

§ 63. Solution. It must be said according to what has been previously established, that free choice is denominated from reason and will: because it itself is rooted in the essence of the soul according to an order to reason as preceding, and to the will as following, according as the will is in reason: because otherwise properly speaking it is not the will, as Damascene says: and by this the solution to that which was asked first is evident, namely why it is called by a double name?

§ 64. To the next objection it must be said that that which is of reason in free choice with respect to the act which is to choose, is material and in potency: therefore it is signified substantially. But that which is of the will, is formal and completing: and therefore it is signified formally, that is, adjectivally.

§ 65. Now to that which is objected concerning the definition, it must be said that it is rather a certain interpretation or assignment: but yet we do not make an issue here, whether it is a definition, or not: and in whatever way it may be, it must be said that "free" names the cause according to Augustine and Bernard : because all freedom is from the will, as was shown above: because no power in act is entirely the cause of itself except the will: and from the will whatever things exist are free. For that which is the cause of itself, is free, as the Philosopher says: and therefore it is commonly said that no cause of the will is to be sought; and therefore it is defined below in the following distinction, that the will is the movement of the mind, with no one compelling, to obtain something, or not to admit something. And Bernard defining free choice, says: A rational consent, on account of the inamissible freedom of the will and of reason, which always and everywhere carries or participates in indeclinable judgment, I think is called free choice. Whence it is clear that the will is the first cause of freedom: and free choice participates in freedom according as by nature, not by time, the appetite presupposes and subordinates the will to itself: because the extremes are before the means by nature, though not necessarily by time. However, it has often already been shown that free choice is the medium between reason and will.

§ 66. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the naming is not from just any first thing that is found in the thing, but rather from the more substantial: and the will or volition [velleitas] is more substantial to the will than freedom: and therefore it is not named from freedom, but from volition.

§ 67. Moreover, although it is primarily in the will as in a cause, nevertheless in free choice it is prior in time: because the act of free choice precedes the act of the will in acting, just as choosing precedes the willing of completion to consent.

§ 68. To that which is asked, Whether it is a universal power?

§ 69. It must be said that the question is absurd: because none of the authors ever intended this: but it is a fiction of certain people.

§ 70. To the authorities it must be said that they speak thus for this reason, because every power participating in the freedom of the will is universal in moving the others to act: for by this that it is compelled by nothing interior or exterior, it is made universally powerful to turn itself over all things: and this is what the authorities intend to say.

§ 71. And note that some opine here that free choice is a universal power, and indeed composed of will and reason. Certain others that reason and will are the same, and free choice is the same with both, and has a difference in name only. Hence they say that those three are one power having the force of performing three acts: and they distinguish between force and power, saying that power does not indicate a difference in act only, but also in rooting, namely that it is another property of the soul by which it is completed for this power and for that: but forces differ only in acts, and not in rooting. And all these I consider absurd, and they are disproven elsewhere, as it seems, by necessary and compelling reasons: and there also the art is posited through which the principle of the distinction of powers is found.

Articulus 2 — Whether Free Choice, As To The Act Of Choosing Or Deliberating, Is Only Of Future Contingents Operable By Us, Of Which We Are Masters

Whether free choice with respect to the act of choosing or deliberating, is only of future contingent things operable by us, of which we are masters?

§ 72. Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, Now this must be known, that free choice, etc.

§ 73. For it seems to be false: because 1. Those things which were done in the past by the will of a human being, and those in the present, must necessarily be reduced to some cause: but they cannot be reduced to nature, or chance, or to fortune: therefore they will be reduced to free choice, as the caused to the cause.

§ 74. 2. Also, not all things which will happen in the future are referred to free choice as to a cause: therefore it seems to be false what he says.

§ 75. Solution. It must be said that free choice as to the act of deliberating or choosing, is only of future contingent things operable by us, of which we are masters, as Damascene says.

§ 76. To the first it must be said that the past as past does not depend on free choice, as on a cause, but as an act it is reduced to the cause which caused it: and therefore it does not look even as to its act to deliberation and choice: because those are only of a future operable thing: but the present in that it is present, does not depend on us, nor is it under deliberation or choice, but under necessity while it is: and thus the Master understands it.

§ 77. To the next objection it must be said that he does not understand it of all future things, but of those which have been stated.

Divisio Textus

§ 78. Then the third part of this distinction is to be taken up, which begins, there, C, And indeed according to the aforesaid assignment, etc.

§ 79. And it is divided into three parts. In the first it is shown how it is differently in rational nature. But in the second he distinguishes a threefold freedom, there, I, For there is a freedom, etc. In the third he posits two objections to the contrary, there, L, Here it can be asked, whether freedom, etc.

Articulus 3 — What Liberty Is According To The Definition

What is freedom according to definition?

§ 80. Around the first there occur three questions, namely, What is freedom? Second, Whether free choice is in the confirmed [i.e., the blessed/angels]? Third, Whether it is in all rational nature according to one or a diverse principle?

§ 81. To the first various definitions are posited.

§ 82. Anselm posits this one: Free choice is the power of preserving the rectitude of the will for its own sake.

§ 83. And Bernard seems to give this one: Freedom is the power of doing what one wills.

§ 86. But IT IS OBJECTED against the first: because 1. Rectitude is created: therefore it ought not to be preserved for its own sake: because otherwise an end would be posited where it ought not to be.

§ 87. 2. Also, a power for an impossible act is in vain, and idle: but the damned are impossible toward rectitude: therefore the power is not in them: because nothing is in vain in the works of God or nature.

§ 88. Also, it is objected concerning the second; The power of doing what one wills belongs to the omnipotence of God alone. PROOF. For the Philosopher says that the will is of impossible things. Therefore the will is of all things possible and impossible: and if freedom is the power of doing what one wills, freedom will be omnipotence, which is false.

§ 89. Also, of the third: 1. The power of turning oneself to whatever acts one wishes extends itself also to the acts of sins, and the power of sinning, as Anselm says, is neither freedom, nor a part of freedom.

§ 90. 2. Also, Anselm: He who can do what does not profit him, nor is expedient, the more he can do that, the more adversity and perversity can do against him.

§ 91. And the same objection is against the fourth definition.

§ 92. Moreover, Flexibility to opposite acts is not in God and the confirmed and the obstinate, in whom nevertheless the Master says there is free choice.

§ 93. It is also asked, According to what are these assignments of freedom taken?

§ 94. Solution. It must be said to this last point, that the first is given in comparison to the end for the sake of which freedom was given, or for the sake of which it is: because it is for preserving the rectitude of the will, not for acquiring it: because not in every rational creature can it acquire it from itself...

it, but given from itself it can preserve. Other definitions, however, are given in comparison to acts: but they are considered in three ways. According to the first commanding: and thus the second and third are given, which are the same in this: for the first commanding is the will: and those two do not differ, except that the first states the immediate relation of power to act, but the second states that same as it is the general mover of other powers to act, and as it is the principle of its own proper acts. But when it is said the power of preserving itself, etc., the faculty of turning itself upon others and moving them is implied, as was previously held. The third, however, is said by comparison of the act to the object, which is good, or evil: and evil not as it is in the nature of evil, but of changeable good, which is good as now.

To that, therefore, which is first objected, it must be said that rectitude is placed here principally for the uncreated, because by the grace of that it is fitting to the freedom of divine will: and if in others there is created rectitude, that nevertheless touches the uncreated, as the exemplified touches the exemplar: and therefore it is the terminus of the act, and the uncreated the end of intention: just as it is also said of created and uncreated beatitude.

To the other it must be said, that such power even in the damned is not in vain: because if such power were not present, they would be unjustly punished for the lack of rectitude, just as a stone would be unjustly punished, and therefore that the justice of God may shine in punishments, the power remains and when it is said to be impossible to act, this is not from nature, but from malice of confirmation.

To what is objected concerning the second, it must be said that it is understood of those things of which we are masters: for in these we are not bound to one work, and not to another, as natural powers.

To the other it must be said, that the power of committing sin, insofar as sin is the terminus of the act, is not liberty, nor part of liberty: but insofar as the act proceeds from a power not bound to this or that, but freely, thus it indicates liberty: because the act of sin itself can be considered from the terminus, and thus Anselm considers it: or it can be considered from the eliciting principle, and thus it indicates liberty, because of spontaneous will: and thus other Saints speak.

By this the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said, that flexibility as flexibility is not liberty, but indicates liberty in a certain nature: and that which it indicates is in every rational nature: for nothing prohibits the same from being indicated by many and diverse signs: which nevertheless are all found in all those in which the faculty indicated by the sign is found, because it is not entirely univocally nor in one way in them.

Articulus 4 — Whether Free Choice Is In The Damned Angels, And In The Confirmed, And In God

Whether free will is in the damned Angels, and in the confirmed, and in God?

Secondly, it is asked, whether free will is in the confirmed Angels, and the damned, and in God?

And this indeed has been determined above.

But still it is objected, because some wish one reason for confirmation to be noted by them. Therefore, it seems not to be free: because it is not towards opposite acts.

It must be said, that free by nature is not bound nor by habit to this or to that: and this is the inseparable freedom in God, and Angel, and man, for they do nothing without being able not to do it, and without being able to do otherwise: and this has been noted above, and it has been proven in the Third of the Sentences.

However, the cause of confirmation in God and in Angels has been said often to be manifold: and therefore here one suffices, namely that God in Himself is full light, and to Himself the reason of knowing whatever He knows: and just as that light is not deceived, so it is impossible for Him to be deflected into falsehood.

Likewise, His goodness is to Himself the reason for willing whatever He wills: and just as His goodness is impossible to malice, so also is His will. In the blessed indeed the reason was of true and false, and the will of good and evil: and this on account of the other of those: for the ultimate end of reason is the first truth, and the ultimate end of the will is the first goodness: and therefore when the first truth and the first goodness are joined to the blessed through intellect and will, then the will is fulfilled with the first goodness, and reason with the first light: and therefore the first light then becomes to the intellect the reason of knowledge of all things, and illuminating above all things: and therefore it is indeflectible from itself: just as now if this principle were given, Every whole is greater than its part, to be the sufficient light of all knowables universally and particularly, it would be impossible to fall into error in any of the known things. So also I say on the part of the will, that the first goodness penetrating the will, becomes the reason for willing and desiring whatever anyone wills and desires: and therefore it is impossible to desire anything not joined to it. Just as now if we were to grant, that the honest were the reason for the inclination of the will in every willed thing, and the will were never inclined except in it to willing, it would be impossible to will anything base. And through this the solution of the question is clear throughout, because it has been disputed often in this book and in the third of the Sentences.

Articulus 5 — Whether Free Choice, According To One Notion Or Diverse, Is In Every Rational Nature

Whether free will according to one reason or diverse is in every rational nature?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether it is according to one reason in all?

It seems that it is not: because there is nothing common to the Creator and creature by which a common reason can be taken; therefore, neither is the freedom of will common to the Creator and creature.

But on the contrary is what Anselm says, because this definition, "Liberty is," is suitable to God and creature: therefore, the faculty of preserving rectitude for its own sake seems to be said commonly according to that reason.

Solution. It must be said that according to analogy this commonality is in the creature and Creator: because rectitude in the Creator does not differ from the power preserving it, except according to reason: nor does the power preserving differ from the powerful, except according to reason: but in the creature there is a difference between these according to the thing: and in God it is, as in the first exemplar: and in the creature, as in the exemplified: but in the Angel and in man it is not according to a common species, but by genus, as the sensible in brute and man: and what is more, it is not according to a proximate genus, but remote: because it is not my opinion that the Angel and soul are the same in species, or in proximate genus: nor are Angels the same in species, as I think: therefore, the powers also according to these have a difference among themselves. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether There Is A Threefold Freedom Of Choice

Is there a threefold Freedom of choice? and,
Whether that middle one is in which man can sin, and cannot not sin before reparation, etc.?

Then it is asked about this which he says, there, F, at the end: The middle one, in which he can sin, etc.

For according to this, it seems not to be imputed to man: because
1. Concerning actual sin, it is true, as Augustine and Jerome say, that it is so voluntary, that if it were not voluntary, it would not be sin: and if it is voluntary, it is not necessary, as Augustine says against Tullius. Therefore, it seems that it is not necessary for him to sin: therefore he can not sin: therefore it is true that he can not sin mortally: therefore its contradictory is false, namely, he cannot not sin mortally.

1. If you say that this is through grace freely given, which no man lacks. Against this seems to be what is said in the Letter: because he says before reparation: it is clear, however, that it is not repaired except by grace making pleasing, and not freely given.
2. Likewise, let man be understood in only free choice and one or two mortal sins, and let him be tempted concerning a third: either he can resist, or not. If not: therefore he sins necessarily: therefore involuntarily: because when we cannot resist, the cause of this is not in us: and what we do voluntarily, we are the cause of this, and the cause of it is in us: therefore that work is excused entirely: because involuntary through violence is, whose principle is in another, contributing nothing to the one suffering force, as Damascene says. Since therefore this is false, he can resist, and he does not have to sin mortally before the reparation of grace freely given, or making pleasing.

If, however, this is conceded, the sayings of the Saints seem to be contrary, as it seems:

1. For thus Christ says, John 15:5: Without me you can do nothing. Therefore much less resist the temptation of following sin.

Likewise, Isaiah 26:12: All our works you have worked for us, Lord. Therefore without him we can do nothing of works.

Likewise, Exodus 14:14: The Lord will fight for you, and you will be silent. Therefore there is no fight of ours without the Lord, as it seems. And, Psalm 18:35: Who teaches my hands to battle, etc.

Likewise, Psalm 68:3: I am stuck in the mire of the deep, etc. Therefore man after the first sin always tends downward: therefore he cannot stand by himself.

1. Likewise, Gregory: Sin which is not erased by penance, immediately by its weight draws to another. It is necessary to fall.
2. Likewise, He who is in sin has nothing lifting up, but has sin pressing down: therefore the power of the pressing down is stronger: but the stronger power, by outweighing, conquers: therefore it is necessary for such a one to sin whenever he is tempted.

Solution. Without prejudice I say, that no man as long as he is on the way, is destitute of all grace aiding against sin: for he always has some influence of divine goodness, either in fear, or unformed hope, or faith, or something such lifting himself up: and he also has externally, the instigation of a good Angel: by which he can resist sin. If, however, it is supposed that he has only free choice, it seems to me, that he can still resist temptation.

To this, however, which is objected from the Letter, it is solved in two ways. In one way according to Augustine against Celestius concerning the defense of grace saying thus: From this it is taken, that the sense is, he says, If the Son shall make you free, you shall be truly free. For the will, conquered by the vice into which it fell, lacked natural freedom. Hence another Scripture says, For by whom a man is overcome, by the same he is brought into bondage. Therefore, just as a physician is not needed for the healthy, but for those who are ill: so a liberator is not needed for the free, but for the slaves, so that to him the gratitude of freedom may say: You have saved my soul from necessities. For health itself is true freedom: which would not have perished, if the good will had remained. But because the will sinned, a hard necessity of having sin followed the sinning will, until the whole infirmity is healed: and the whole freedom is received, in which as it is necessary, the will of living blessedly remains, so that there is also a voluntary and happy necessity of living well and never sinning. It is: He cannot not sin, that is, not be in sin: and this is plainly true: because he is not freed from sin except by repairing grace, which is grace making pleasing: because man is a spirit going, and not returning. According to Anselm, however, we are said not to be able what we cannot do without difficulty and labor: and therefore it is said here not to be able to resist sin, or not to be able not to sin, because it is difficult for the infirm when tempted to stand.

To those things which are objected in the contrary, it is easy to respond: because the authorities do not prove nor say, that without grace one cannot resist, but that one cannot without God: and this is plainly true: because in God we live, and move, and are: and unless he continually contains, and saves, and moves, we can be and operate nothing: but this does not posit special grace.

To that which is objected from the saying of Gregory, it must be said, that weight means inclination, and not necessity: and this is true. Because inclination cannot grow beyond the freedom of the will which is from coercion, therefore it does not induce the necessity of sinning.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that it does not follow: because the temptation of the will can never grow beyond the willed, because otherwise the will would not be free from coercion: and therefore the will always wills to turn away from it, and not consent to it: and therefore it is not similar, the good nature which God gave is much more powerful in lifting up, than sin in pressing down.

If, however, it is objected, that the power of the will is finite: therefore temptations can be so intensified that it is conquered: it must be said, that this is impossible, that temptation remaining only temptation is so intensified: because then it would be coercion and not temptation.

Likewise, the will is infinite to act, although in itself it is finite: and therefore its act is always under itself however much it is intensified.

Articulus 7 — How There Is A Threefold Liberty, And How The Divisions Of Liberty Are Taken, And Whether There Is Equally In All Freedom From Coaction

How is there a threefold liberty? and,
How are the divisions of liberty understood? and, Whether equally in all there is liberty from coercion?

How is there a threefold liberty? and,
How are the divisions of liberty understood? and, Whether equally in all there is liberty from coercion?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, I, For there is a threefold liberty, etc.

However, other divisions of liberty are found, as Bernard posits this, that there is liberty of choice, counsel, and complacency. And Anselm posits this, that there is liberty having rectitude, and liberty not having it. However, that which has it: one indeed has it in a manner that can be lost, another has it in a manner that cannot be lost. That which has it in a manner that cannot be lost: one is given or accepted, another is not given or accepted, but gives to others having it. The one not given is divine: the one given is of the creature: and having indeed rectitude given in a manner that cannot be lost, is the blessed rational creature, like an Angel, or man, and soul: however, having it given in a manner that can be lost, is man constituted in grace on the way. However, not having it: either lacks it recoverably, and thus man living in mortal sin: or lacks it irrecoverably, and thus the damned souls and Angels have it.

Therefore, it is asked, By what are these divisions understood?

Likewise, the Master says in the text, that liberty from coercion is equally in all: and this does not seem true: because

1. God is freer in acting and in the absolution of coercion, than man: and a holy man, than a sinner: whose proof is: because it is freer from coercion, that which is not drawn nor conquered, than that which is drawn and not conquered: and it is freer that which is drawn and not conquered, than that which is drawn and conquered: therefore, since according to these degrees it is in the blessed, and the good, and the evil, it seems that it is not equally free from coercion.
2. Likewise, Every creatable thing is changeable: therefore the liberty of a changeable creature is towards evil and non-being: however, divine liberty is neither changeable, nor drawn, nor conquered: therefore it is most free.

Solution. It must be said, that liberty is a power ordered to act and to an end, removed universally or particularly from contrary habits. Whence a division can be given either by the contrary habit to liberty, separated from it: and this the Masters call by the term from which: and then there is the division given in the text, namely, liberty from coercion, from guilt, and from misery.

And the division is understood thus, that the habit inducing servitude: is either from nature, or from the act of merit. If from nature: then there is obligation with matter, so that it is acted upon rather than acts: and against this is liberty from coercion. However, if it is from the act of will, and merit: either it is a habit to which the will subjects itself, and this is guilt, and against it is liberty from sin: or to which it is subjected by the order of avenging justice, and thus is the misery of penalties: and against this is liberty from misery. Therefore, the first is through the liberty of rational nature, the second through grace, and the third through glory.

However, the second which is Bernard's, is given by those disposing to the proper act of liberty: however, this is either according to the power of free nature, and thus is the liberty of choice: or in those things which are above nature: and this in two ways, namely in the best according to the state of the way, and concerning these is the liberty of counsel: or in the best according to the state of the homeland, and concerning these is the liberty of complacency: and all these must be understood according to the relation of each of these to the best act. Whence Bernard says, that the liberty of choice has to discern what is lawful, but the liberty of counsel to approve what is expedient, but the liberty of complacency to experience what is pleasing.

However, the division of Anselm is given through the efficient cause and the end together: because given and not given speak of the reason of the efficient cause: and rectitude is the end of the power of preserving it.

However, another division is reduced to art in objecting.

To what is further asked concerning liberty from coercion, it must be said that it is considered in two ways, namely first according to that from which it liberates, and second in comparison to the natural faculty perfected by habit to act. If in the first way: then it is only privation, and it is the same as not having coercion: and privation is not more something in one, than in another: nor more something in God, than in a rational creature: nor more something in the damned, than in the just: because negation and privation are neither intensified, nor diminished: and none of these have obligation with matter. Whence Bernard: Liberty from necessity equally and indifferently belongs to God, and universally, both to good and evil, to the rational creature: nor is it lost or diminished by sin, or misery: nor is it greater in the just, than in the sinner: nor fuller in the Angel, than in man. For just as the consent of the human will turned to good by grace makes a man freely good, and in good free, by which he is made voluntary, and not drawn unwillingly: so having spontaneously fallen into evil, in evil nonetheless as free as spontaneous it constitutes him indeed led by his own will, not compelled by another to be evil. And just as the heavenly Angel, or even God himself remains freely good by his own will, not by any extrinsic necessity: so indeed the devil equally freely fell into evil, and persists, indeed by his own voluntary will, not by another's impulse. Therefore, the liberty of the will remains, where even the capacity of the mind is made, as full indeed in the evil as in the good, but in the good more ordered: as whole also according to its mode in the creature as in the Creator, but in the latter more powerful. It is considered to act, then it is not equally present: because where there is a nobler nature, there the act is more expedient.

However, to all other things there is one solution, except the last: because they proceed from liberty from sin, and from misery: and these are the habit of grace, and of glory: and they well receive intensification and remission.

To the last it must be said, that this changeability speaks of the order to act, and not of the consideration of that from which it liberates only: and it is well conceded, that thus it is more powerful in the Creator, as Bernard says, and more ordered in good than in evil.

In another work, more things concerning these liberties are found.

DISTINCTIO XXVI

Divisio Textus

This is operating grace, etc. Here the Master touches upon that from which man fell with respect to the good of grace, or what he had if he was created in grace, or what he would have had if he was not created in grace, according to another opinion.

It is divided, however, into three parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon what grace is. In the second, however, what virtue is, and how free will is related to grace and virtue: and this begins in the following distinction XXVII, there, A, Here it must be seen what virtue is, etc. The third touches upon the comparison of grace and virtue to the first state of man, inquiring, Whether then he needed grace and virtue, or not? and this begins below, in distinction XIX, there, A, After these things it must be considered, etc.

However, this distinction which contains the first part, has three parts: in the first of which it deals with operating and cooperating grace according to itself. In the second, however, it determines the first supposition in the justification of the impious, there, D, And if dili In the third it touches upon the comparison of grace to virtue, whether it is the same to it, or not? there, H, Here it must be considered, when the aforementioned is, etc.

However, the division further is evident to each one from the consideration of the chapters.

Articulus 1 — Whether Grace Is Necessary

Whether grace is necessary?

Concerning the first, four questions arise, namely, Whether there is grace? and, Whether it is a substance or an accident? and, How and to whom does it belong? and, What is it in reality and definition?

To the first, objections arise in many ways, but we will proceed with five, namely from the consideration of similars, from the consideration of the first agent, from the consideration of the dignity of the human mind, from the consideration of the gratification of men, and from the consideration of grace itself.

The first way is objected thus:
1. God works the work of creation without a medium: therefore also the work of beatification without a medium: because thus says Master Hugh of Saint Victor: Just as we are not created except through Him in goodness, so nothing stops us until Him. Let it be granted that the work of recreation is also immediately through Him: and since this is gratification, it seems that grace besides Him places nothing in us, or in another rational nature.

1. Likewise, Grace is a certain spiritual light that illuminates the mind: but from the corporeal sun, as they say, day is made without a medium: therefore grace is nothing created as a medium between God and us in us.

SECOND WAY is proceeded thus:
1. It is of the most perfect agent to act without a medium: God recreating and gratifying is the most perfect agent: therefore God acts our gratification without a medium.

1. Likewise, No wise and powerful agent acts in a less worthy manner for a more noble thing than for a less noble thing: but God is the most wisely acting agent: therefore He does not act in a less worthy manner for a more noble thing than for a less noble thing: but He acts upon prime matter, which is the most ignoble of beings, without a medium and perfects it: therefore He will not perfect the human mind through a medium, since this is a less noble mode of action.
2. Likewise, God is not less wise in acting than nature: but nature, as the Philosopher says, is ingenious to this extent, that it never does with many what it can do with one: therefore neither does God: but He can perfect the mind by Himself alone: therefore He does not perfect it using a medium.

THIRD WAY is proceeded thus:
1. The less worthy does not intervene between the most worthy and that which is proximate to it in dignity: but an irrational creature is less worthy than a rational one: and the most worthy nature is God, and the nature proximate to Him is rational: therefore no grace, which would not be a rational creature if it were, can intervene as a medium: and grace is posited to be something in us only to be a medium joining us to God: therefore grace is nothing, because if it were, it would be in vain.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that between the human mind and God there is nothing medium: therefore neither grace, which is a creature, if there is any, will be posited as a medium.
2. Likewise, it has been held in the first book of the Sentences, that the human mind by itself is capable of God: therefore it is in vain to posit a medium by which it is made capable of Him: therefore since grace is posited to be for this, it will be in vain if it exists. Let us suppose, however, that in the works of God nothing is in vain: therefore grace is not.

The fourth way is proceeded thus:

If a soldier is pleasing to the king, by this nothing is placed in the soldier, but in the king the acceptance of the soldier according to good will: for a soldier can, with no change made in himself, both be pleasing and not be pleasing to the king, by the sole change of the king's will: therefore similarly if a man is pleasing, nothing is placed in the man, but in God, as it seems.

1. Likewise, When we say, This one has the grace of the king, the sense is that the king wills good for him, and has good will towards him: but by none of these is anything placed in the one gratified, but only in the one gratifying: therefore it seems that also when it is said someone has the grace of God, nothing is placed in him, but only in the one gratifying.

The fifth way is proceeded thus:
1. Every creature is vanity, and an accident is more vain than a substance: but the more vain of vanities does not join the less vain with the first truth: therefore since grace is an accident, if it is, as will be proven below, it does not join the rational substance less vain than itself with the truth: and it is posited for this alone: therefore it will be in vain if it is: therefore it is not: because nothing is in vain in the works of God.

1. Likewise, If a creature is not joined to the highest good except through a medium, because a creature is infinitely distant from the Creator: that medium which is called grace, is either created or uncreated. If created: therefore it is infinitely distant: therefore it needs another medium joining it: and that again is created, or uncreated, and the reasoning proceeds to infinity. But if it is uncreated: then it is not a medium, but an extreme, to which we are joined: and thus the proposition will be held, that grace places nothing created in the one who has grace.

2. Likewise, Everything perfecting something according to the best mode of perfection, is more worthy, and better, and nobler than that: if grace is, it perfects the mind of man and angel according to the best mode of perfection: therefore grace is better, and more worthy, and more perfect than the human mind, which is absurd, since it is an accident, and the mind of man and angel is a creature made in the image of God.

But it is objected on the contrary by infinite authorities, which we will omit, because many are placed in the Letter.

And by reason the same is held thus:
1. Whatever is an agent receiving nothing from its work, and infinitely distant from it, if its work is to be worth anything in its reputation, it is necessary that it receives this from the agent: but the rational creature is the work of God, from which God receives nothing, and is infinitely distant from Him: therefore if it is to be worth anything in the reputation of God, it must receive that in which it is reputed from God. The first is proven by this, that if the work by itself is nothing, nothing can be made from the work by which it is reputed, except by a superior power. The second, however, is evident by itself. But that by which we are something in the reputation of God, we call grace by which He deems us worthy of eternal life: therefore grace is something created in us by God.

1. Likewise, God is present, essential, and potential in all things: therefore either He is in the Saints in some different way than in all, or in none. If in some different way: since the cause of this difference is not on His part, nor on the part of the created rational nature, it is necessary that it is through the habit of grace received and infused by Him: and thus the proposition is held. But if in none is there a difference: therefore what corresponds to the existence of God in one, will correspond in all: but it does not correspond in a stone except as containing, in being for a time: therefore now the honor of holy souls would not have more than a stone, and it would not correspond to it reward and merit, which is absurd - therefore the indwelling grace which is in the Saints, is something created.
2. Likewise, In bodies we see that the noblest of bodies, like the heavens, is not joined to the lower without a quality infused by it as a medium: therefore the noblest spirit, namely God, will not be joined to the spiritual mind without a quality infused by Him as a medium: and this we call grace: therefore grace is something in the souls of the Saints.

Solution. It must be said that grace is something created in us, as the last reasons sufficiently persuasively show:

To that which is first objected by the first way, it must be said that it is not similar: because the work of creation supposes nothing, and therefore nothing cooperates with it, neither antecedently, nor concomitantly, nor consequently. But the work of glorification is the elevation of the whole nature to the highest: and therefore also in that nature nothing can cooperate. But the work of gratification is for this that we may be able to operate meritoriously: and therefore it necessarily places in us a form and habit perfecting that work. Or it may be said that the proportion of similarity supposes a falsehood in the work of glorification: because although God on His part does not use a medium, yet on our part there is a medium elevating, as the endowments of body and soul in created beatitude. But nevertheless the first solution is truer: because it supposes the true cause.

To the other it must be said that a falsehood is supposed in the similar: because the material sun does not illuminate the world immediately by itself, but by its light flowing from it: and therefore.

To what is first objected in the second way, it must be said that we do not need a mediator because of God's indigence, but because of our own: for grace is for this purpose, that what is ours may become pleasing: but we cannot have this from ourselves: and therefore it is necessary that we have the form perfecting for this from Him. However, the objection to the argument is that according to this, no matter should have a form, but God should be the immediate perfection of every perfect thing: and this is absurd.

To another it must be said that God immediately as an efficient cause made the mind, just as He made matter: but just as He did not perfect matter formally by Himself, but through a created form, so neither the mind: for everything perfectible for some act requires that a form ordering to that act be given to it, because God is not mixable with a subject as a form, nor unifiable: and this shows the indigence of the created subject, not of God.

To another the solution is evident by the same: because although God can do this by Himself, yet on our part it cannot be done fittingly: and thus every creature also always operates according to the fittingness of that which is made, and not according to the fittingness of the agent.

To what is first objected in the third way, it must be said that the dignity of grace and the dignity of the mind are equivocal and incomparable: because one is according to the proportion of the capacity of God through cognition and affection, but the other is according to the perfection to the act of meritorious good: and therefore the soul in this way is less worthy: and this is according to what is less worthy than grace: and therefore a middle intervenes: for by formal goodness in the goodness of likeness through the imitation of the image, the soul is good: and these goodnesses are not comparable.

To what is said, it must be said that Augustine's statement is understood, that no substance and creature standing the soul short of God falls in the middle: but the form which elevates so that it can be joined without a standing middle, that indeed falls in the middle, like grace and glory.

To another it must be said that in this way the soul is capable of God by itself, namely materially: but for it to actually receive, it is necessary to have grace not standing the soul short of God, but elevating it up to God.

To what is objected in the fourth way, it must be said that nothing is similar between a king, a man, and God: because a soldier indeed has in himself something by which he may please, or ought to please the king, because his goods are proportionate to the king's good pleasure, and can move his good pleasure: but it is not so with God: because nothing on the part of his work is by which he can or ought to please, unless the reason for pleasing is taken from Him.

To another it must be said that what has already been said varies the sense of the expression, when it is said, this one has the grace of the king: and when it is said, this one has the grace of God.

To what is first objected in the fifth way, it must be said that although every creature is vanity insofar as it is a creature, yet insofar as it proceeds from God, some are perfecting towards truth, and some are perfected, and some are given only for the way: for what is said, that every creature is vanity, is understood by the nature of convertibility: and this is in the creature, insofar as it is from nothing: but it is also from God, and therefore from that part it can approach truth. Therefore, some approach as a form perfecting towards truth, by this that it proceeds from God as a likeness of His goodness, and assimilating to Him, and this is grace: some, however, as attaining truth, by this that it is perfected by such grace, as the rational mind, and the body joined to the soul on the way, because it serves man. Hence, in Romans 7:22, it is said, that every creature groans and labors until now, because it desires to be freed from the servitude of the body, and to attain truth in order to man attaining truth: and therefore it is evident, that that reasoning proves nothing, rather if grace were not given, all things would remain vain and corrupt.

To another it must be said that the created thing insofar as it is from nothing, is distanced from God by infinity: but insofar as it is from God, it approaches Him by certain degrees of fittingness, as Dionysius suggests. Hence, the living thing approaches God more than the merely existing thing: and the sensing thing more than the living thing: and again the rational and intellectual nature more than that: according to what Augustine also says, that God created two things: one near to Himself, and the other near to nothing. And thus grace also approaches from that part, which has the act of assimilation to the goodness of God: and this it does not have insofar as it is distant, but insofar as it imitates the effect of the goodness from which it is: and from the same it has, that grace making pleasing is never without God, because through it He inhabits the Saints.

To the last it must be said that just as there is being simply, and being in a certain respect: so there is perfect and noble and good simply, and good in a certain respect. For being simply is substantial, and first, and good simply, and perfect: but in comparison to act or end, it is being in a certain respect, and good and noble in a certain respect: and in this way nothing prohibits the habit of grace from being even more perfect than the nature of the rational mind: but according to being simply, the spiritual substance is more perfect.

4 The Vulgate has, Numbers 27:18: and following. The Lord said to Moses: Take Joshua, the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, ... and you shall give him a part of your glory, etc.

Articulus 2 — Whether Grace Is A Substance Or An Accident

Whether grace is a substance or an accident?

Secondly, it is asked, whether it is a substance or an accident?

And this is light:
It is objected thus:
1. Whatever remains the same in act and substance, is transformed from one into another, that is a perfect substance in itself or its matter: one grace remaining, is transformed from one into another: therefore it is a composite substance, or matter. The first is proved from this, that both accidental and substantial form do not change the subject while remaining the same: but matter does this, and a composite substance remains the same in different places. The second is proved in Numbers 11:17, where it is said: "I will take of your spirit and will give to them," namely the elders. And similarly: "I will give to Joshua of your spirit." And, in the book of 1 Kings: "The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul." And, "The Spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha." And in the New Testament, "Of his fullness we have all received, and grace for grace." Some things also in the preceding chapter are relevant to that problem.

1. Likewise, every accident depends according to being on the principles of the subject: therefore if grace is an accident, it depends according to being on the principles of the subject: but whatever depends on the principles of some subject, has no power except from them: therefore grace would not have power except from the subject in which it is: which is false: because from the power of the subject it never performs a meritorious work and pleasing to God. With this objection, Pelagius seems to have been deceived, who believed that by one's own powers one becomes a Son of God: therefore it seems that grace is not an accident.

FURTHERMORE, if grace is an accident, what kind of accident is it? It can only be a habit.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Augustine says that a habit is that by which someone acts when the time is right: therefore grace is ordered to some act: and it is asked, what is that, and to whatever it is ordered, then it is not ordered to another: just as neither does a virtue ordering to one act, order to another.

1. Furthermore, no habit is continuously in act, because a habit acts when the time is right: but grace, if it is a habit, acts continuously, because it continuously makes one pleasing: since therefore this is against the nature of a habit, it seems grace is not a habit: nor is it another accident: therefore it is not an accident.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. No substance is unifiable to another unless it is matter, or a substantial form: grace is not matter, or a substantial form: therefore it is not unifiable to another substance: but it is united formally: therefore it is not a substance, but an accident.

1. Likewise, Boethius says that whatever is consequent to substantial being, is an accident: grace is consequent to substantial being: therefore it is an accident.

2. Likewise, an accident is that which can be present or absent from the same thing: grace can be present or absent from the same thing: therefore grace is an accident.

3. Likewise, an accident is that which is present or absent from a subject without the corruption of the subject: grace is present or absent without the corruption of the subject: therefore it is an accident.

Solution. It must be said that grace is an accident.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said that grace according to essence does not change the subject: but by similarity to act it is said that grace is given to one from another, and of the grace of another.

To the other it must be said that this is false, "Every accident depends on the principles of the subject as to cause": but if it is understood to depend on the subject as to being, because with the subject not existing, there is no accident in it, then it is true: but then it does not follow that its being depends on the principles of the subject: and there is an instance of light, which depends according to its being and cause on the direct opposition of the illuminator: and similarly it is with grace. But if according to this it is opposed, that the being of grace is to be made, like light: it must be said that this does not hold: because the first agent is more perfect than the luminous body: but as to this it is well concluded, that there is no grace except by conversion made to God, just as there is no light except in the direct opposition of the diaphanous to the luminous body.

To the other it must be said that grace is a habit universally making pleasing, both essence and power: and therefore it does not have a special act like virtue: but just as the soul is an act giving being according to itself, and according to power is the principle of operations: so grace is a habit making being good, and according to infused virtues it perfects to act: and therefore I well concede that just as the act of form which is being, is continuous, or rather one indivisible remaining: so the act of grace which is being good, is one continuously remaining. But what I say of the act of form, not properly continuous, but indivisible, I do so because the Philosopher wishes that the reception of being is in the indivisible: but continuous motion is not in the indivisible, and there is no giving of the indivisible in which it is: and therefore the corruption of being is in time, and the reception in the indivisible.

But the objections made about habit do not hold, except about a habit respecting a particular act: and about this Augustine and the Philosophers also speak: because they did not consider habits, except those which are generated from acts: and those are similar to acts, and particular like the acts from which they are generated. But infused habits are not so: because God infuses the whole perfection according to being good and according to acting at once: and according to being good which is universally in all, it is a habit universally respecting essence and power: according to particular acts, however, habits perfect the powers.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Grace Is Immediately Inherent In The Essence Of The Soul, Or By Means Of The Powers

Whether grace is immediately present in the essence of the soul, or through the mediation of the powers?

Thirdly, it is asked, How, and to whom is it present?

It seems, however, that it is not immediately present in the essence of the soul, but through the mediation of the powers.

1. For every habit perfecting towards action is present in the first through the mediation of that to which that action is immediately present: grace is such a habit: therefore it is present through the mediation of that to which such an action belongs. The first is clear from the fact that otherwise a perfecting habit would not perfect as required by that which is perfected. The second is clear from the fact that there is operating grace and cooperating grace: and they are said in the Text to be one grace: hence, since the operating is perfecting towards action, the cooperating also perfects towards the same. Thus: Grace is in the soul first according to its ordination towards action: but this according to its ordination towards action, the powers are: therefore grace is in the soul through the mediation of the powers.
2. Likewise, in the Text it is held that the operating is said to be that which causes willing, and also that which causes running: which of these regards the power: therefore grace is present through the mediation of the power.
3. Likewise, from the Text it is held that: grace is prevenient and subsequent: and both of these are said in comparison to the will, as it is held in the Text: therefore grace is immediately in the powers, and not in the essence of the soul.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Perfection ought to be proportionate to the perfected: but grace is the perfection of the soul: therefore it is proportionate to the soul perfectly: but the soul in its substance is prior to the powers through which it acts: therefore also its perfection regards the essence before the power.

1. Likewise, the soul is perfected in virtue according to the powers: if therefore it is perfected by grace also in the powers, then there are two perfections towards the same equally primary: and this cannot be.
2. Furthermore, grace is defined by the Doctors as a form making the possessor and his work pleasing: but the possessor is the very substance of the soul: therefore it informs the substance of the soul first, then the powers.

Solution. I think it must be said that grace is a habit more perfecting in comparison to God than to action. For a habit perfecting towards action must be perfecting towards this and that: because every act is singular: hence grace, which does not regard work under a determined reason, cannot be the perfection of grace by act. This is thus proved: By the determined reason of act, it is evident that it is not taken from the part of the agent: because the agent is related to every act it performs: because one and the same agent can be of diverse arts, namely, sculptor, lyre-player, and so on. Therefore, since it is between the agent and the object concerning which it operates, it must be that the determined reason is taken from the part of the object, as of the lyre-player with respect to the lyre, of the sculptor with respect to the statue, and so on. It is evident, however, that grace regards no determined object: because if it regarded one, then it could not regard another, just as this or that virtue is only of its own object: therefore it is clear that grace is not the first perfection of the power which operates, but the first perfection of the essence of the soul, and through it is referred to the powers.

To what is first objected, it must be said that the middle is false, that grace is a habit ordered per se to this or that act: because it is more perfecting in comparison to God than to act.

To the other by which it is proved, it must be said that the operating is grace per se, and its work is to be good, as was previously held: the cooperating, however, is consequent: and therefore since being good operates in the essence of the soul first, the essence itself will be its proper subject.

To the other it must be said that grace makes being good according to the state of gratification of the one having it: but this is first known in the will: and therefore it is said to be the principle of operating grace.

To the objections it must be said in the same way, that grace prevents the actual good will: not that the will is its first subject, but rather the essence: but to note, that being grace in us is not caused by our will.

Articulus 4 — What Grace Is

What is grace?

Then it is asked, What is grace in definition and in reality?

And therefore two things are asked, namely about its definitions, and whether it is the life of the soul, as some say?

To the first, it proceeds thus:

1. Chrysostom says: Grace is the health of the mind, and the delight of the heart.

1. Likewise, Isidore: Grace is the gift of divine mercy, through which the outcome of good will is made.

2. Likewise, Augustine, as some say,
   Grace is the habit universally ordering the whole life.

3. Likewise, the Gloss on that, says: As it exhilarates, etc., grace is a certain brightness of the soul, conciliating holy love.

However, it is objected against the first definition thus:
1. The health of the mind is only when infirmity is universally removed: infirmity is not only in guilt, but also in punishment: but this is not universally removed except through glory: therefore it is wrongly attributed to grace.

If perhaps it is said that the health of the mind is in comparison to the wound of sin. Against this: To heal the wound of sin is properly of the sacrament: but grace is not a sacrament, nor only in the sacrament, but also in the habits of virtues and gifts: therefore it seems that it is still wrongly defined by the health of the mind.

1. Likewise, it is objected concerning what he says, Delight of the heart: because this is rather a fruit than grace: because fruit seems to denote refreshment in the heart.

Further, it is objected concerning the second definition which is of Isidore:

1. For the virtue of divine mercy is a gift, through which is the outcome of good will: therefore virtue is grace: and this is not conceded by many, as will be had below.
2. Likewise, it was previously held that grace is in the soul proximally, and consequently in the power: therefore it is wrongly said that the outcome of good will is grace.
3. Likewise, just as through grace the outcome of good will is made, so the good of the intellect in faith, and the good of the concupiscible in temperance, and the good of the irascible in fortitude:

therefore it should not be defined more by the outcome of good will than by the other virtues, which through cooperating grace proceed into action.

Further, it is asked about the third definition which is said to be of Augustine, although it seems more to be of the Master:

1. For the habit universally ordering the whole life, it is necessary that it regards every order to God, to oneself, and to one's neighbor: but this is the universality of virtues, or general justice: therefore grace is the same as the universality of virtues, or general justice: and neither of these is conceded by many.
2. Likewise, grace only denotes making pleasing: but this does not universally determine the order of life, but only denotes respect to divine acceptance: therefore it is wrongly defined by the habit universally ordering life.

Further, it is objected concerning the last:
1. For the brightness of the soul does not seem to be except according to the intellect, because it is proper for it to shine: therefore if grace is the brightness of the soul, it will only be in the intellect,

1. Likewise, conciliating holy love is charity: therefore if grace conciliates holy love, it seems to be the same as charity: and this is denied by many.

Solution. It must be said that by some ancient Masters this definition was given, which I consider more proper, that grace is the gift of God's good will, making the possessor pleasing, and rendering his work pleasing. For by what is said to be the gift of God, grace is placed in the genus. By what is said, of good will, it is placed as different from other natural gifts which do not have the exemplary likeness of divine goodness. By what is said, making pleasing, grace making pleasing is distinguished from grace freely given.

Wherefore the other definitions mentioned above are certain notifications, and not proper definitions: and the first of them is given by the effect which it follows in the subject according to comparison to the opposite habit, which it removes, which is the habit of infirmity, which is said by effect to be health, and by comparison to the end it is said to be the delight of the heart: because it delights the heart from the taste of goodness which is the end.

The second is given by comparison to a double act in general, namely of operating and cooperating: because as it is the gift of mercy, so it is given to be: and as it is the outcome of the will, so it is given to act.

The third is given by its proper act which is to make pleasing for meriting, and for the state of merit: because in this and for this it orders the whole life.

The fourth is given by what it executes in the two principal parts of the soul: because it shines in the intellect, and burns in the affection.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that infirmity in cause is removed by grace, according to what makes pleasing: because thus it removes that from which there was ingratitude: but infirmity as to the remnants and consequent weaknesses is indeed universally cured in glory, but particularly in the reception of the sacraments.

To the other which is objected concerning the second part, it must be said that delight is in the work, and delight is in the goodness of divine gratitude: and the delight which is after the labor of work is called fruit: but in the example of goodness which is grace, grace gives delight.

To what is objected concerning the second definition, it must be said that virtue according to the reason of virtue does not denote the first gift according to the reason of its name, but rather perfection for action: but grace according to the reason of the name is a gift: whence the Apostle, Otherwise grace is no longer grace[197], namely if it is rendered, and not given freely.

To the other it must be said that the will is the universal mover of all powers, as will be had below: and therefore it is rather said the outcome of the will, than of others: and this as to the cooperation of grace: because although grace primarily regards the essence of the soul, yet secondarily it refers to the powers, as will be proved at the end of this distinction.

Through this also the solution to the following is clear: because the will moves all others in gratuitous acts which are informed by grace.

To what is objected concerning the third definition, it must be said that this order is determined according to the reason of good and end: and therefore it is disordered which does not reach the end: and because grace makes to reach the end which is God and eternal life, therefore it is said to be the habit universally ordering the whole life: and this order is not taken here which is according to the degrees of the ordered, but rather it is said the relation of the whole life to the attainment of the end. But this justice or virtue does not do: because justice in that it is justice or virtue does not necessarily make worthy of eternal life.

Through this the solution to the following is also clear: for universally does not determine ordering, but life, that is, which orders the whole life in itself and to others universally as to all voluntary acts to the merit of life.

To the other it must be said that brightness is properly in the intellect: but yet the brightness of honesty is in all parts of the honest, and especially in grace: and therefore we can say that in the whole soul grace makes beauty, and the adornment of the divine image.

To the other it must be said that it is not said to conciliate holy love, because it only conciliates it, but because it principally conciliates it: whence also it cannot be without form, just as neither grace.

Articulus 5 — Whether Grace Is The Life Of The Soul

Whether grace is the life of the soul?

Secondly, it is asked concerning this part, whether grace is the life of the soul?

It seems, however, that it is so: because

1. The first death of the soul is sin: therefore, by opposition, grace is its life.

1. Likewise, the first by which the soul lives in the body is life: therefore also the first by which it lives in God is its life. For in Him we live, move, and have our being. But that by which we first live in God is grace: therefore grace is the life of the soul.

But against this it seems to be, that life is the continuous act of the soul in the body: however, grace does not act continuously in the soul: therefore grace is not called life. The first is supposed from what the Philosopher is said to be the word. The second, however, is proved thus: because if grace acts continuously, then it continuously merits: therefore it is continuously intensified and increased: and this is not said to be true.

Solution. It must be said that in truth grace is the life of the soul, according to which life formally adheres to the living, as a form flowing from the cause and source of life. And to understand this, it must be known that the body lives in two ways by the act of the soul: for it has one act, according to which the soul is the form of such a body, namely, the potentiality of having life: and this act is to live, according to which to live (as the Philosopher says) is to be for living beings: and this is simple, and not continuous, nor is its being continuously becoming: but rather this act is the terminus of the generation of the animate.

According to this mode, the life of the soul, metaphysically speaking, is God giving being to the soul, not as a form, but as bearing its being and conserving and making by the word of 197. Romans 11:6.

His power. In another way, the body lives, according to which we say that the vital spirit is the vehicle of life, which is continuously infused into the body from a special organ of the animal, like the heart: and its being is continuously becoming, and of that the true definition is, that life is the continuous act of the soul in the body. And to this metaphysically corresponds the life of grace, which is infused into the soul by God, and is continuously infused, as some say. However, it is not probable that the being of grace is continuously becoming, as was held above.

To what is objected, it must be said that the continuity of that act which is being does not intend the form, but rather by the act which is work, the habit and form which is the principle of that work is intended: because, as the Philosopher says, from similar acts similar habits are generated: and therefore that objection does not proceed. However, some concede that it acts continuously, although it is not perceived: just as the agent intellect acts continuously, and is not perceived because of the tumult which is in the phantasms, as they say. But this is nothing: because it does not follow, if the intellect is always in act, that it acts continuously, because the species are lacking: just as light is continuously in act, and does not always make colors in act: and this is the opinion of the Philosopher according to three Commentators, namely Averroes, Maurit, and Rabbi Moses.

Hence, to the first solution it must be returned, which is true: and therefore even though life is continuously infused into the body, yet it is not intensified from this, because from such acts it is not born to be generated.

Articulus 6 — On The Various Divisions Of Grace

On the various divisions of grace.

Then we must come to the Letter uh; it says, A, This is operating grace and so. operating.

Concerning which part two questions are asked namely about the divisions of grace, and about the meaning of the names which it sets forth, when it says, operating grace, and cooperating, and preventing, and subsequent.

From the FIRST it proceeds thus: 1. Augustine says in the book On Nature and Grace: It prevents that we may live piously, therefore it subsequently follows that we may always live with it: now it prevents that we may be called, then it follows that we may be glorified: it is granted, that preventing grace is referred to this whole life of merit, and subsequent to the reward of glory.

1. Likewise, Augustine, in the same place, It prevents Health, however, does not happen without exercise of work, that we may be healed, it follows that being healed we may thrive. Therefore it seems, that preventing grace includes both operating, and cooperating: and the contrary of this is held in the letter.
2. Likewise, Augustine, in the same place, Therefore it prevents the will that it may will the good, it follows that it may complete or cease. It seems, that preventing makes the work interior, and subsequent makes the work exterior and perseverance: but both of them are attributed to cooperating grace: for every work is given by free will, either in whole, or in part, as the Master will prove in the following distinction.

Many other differences of graces are also found, which are not to the purpose: because the Apostle, I to the Corinthians xii, 4 and following, divides grace.

freely given through twelve differences. And others divide it differently through diverse effects. But here the intention is only concerning operative grace and cooperative grace.

Similarly, in Romans 8:29 and 30, it divides it into the grace of predestination, calling, justification, magnification.

Similarly, in Isaiah 31:5, it gives a fourfold saying, that the Lord will pass through Judah, protecting and delivering, passing and saving.

In the same way, Genesis 16:38, upon that, "If I have found grace in your eyes," the Gloss says that not one grace suffices for the Saints. For one commands that they love and know God; another follows that they keep themselves pure.

In the same way, Chrysostom says upon John in Homily XIV on that, "Grace for grace": From this, which were of the law, were also graces, even the very formation of man from nothing. For we do not receive this reward by our preceding merits. For how, when we were nothing? but by the grace of God, which always claims the first parts in benefits for itself. Not only that we were made from nothing: but that, being made, we learned what is to be done and avoided, and from these, we received the law of nature, and an incorrupt judgment of conscience was granted to us by the Creator God. This, I say, was especially of grace, after which another followed, that we might recover this corrupted law through the written one. It is accepted by authority, that there are as many graces as there are benefits of God appearing around us, whether in natural things or in superadded ones: and according to this, Anselm defines grace: Grace is what descends from grace, that is, from gratuitous will.

Solution: It must be said that for the purpose of this reading, only the divisions of Augustine, which we first set forth, are relevant. And I well concede that prevenient and subsequent grace have multiple expositions, as the objections suggest: and therefore those must be solved: but in those graces, the reason of prevenient or operative, and the reason of subsequent and cooperative, is not first found: and therefore Augustine in the same book places the words which the Master places here: and they properly divide grace: because prevenient grace is that which precedes all our merit, and this is what works to be good in the will through the informing of the will: for the habitual will must be informed by grace before a good meritorious act is elicited from it. Subsequent, however, is first found in that which merits: because the act immediately follows the habit: and therefore it is called cooperative, because it provides the matter of the act to free will in merit: but the form through which the efficacy of merit is, grace gives, which is in the soul and free will: and therefore the Master says in the following distinction, that the use of virtue and grace is partly from free will as from a cause.

But although other divisions of grace are not to the purpose, it can be said that the first is given according to the acts in which the Spirit is manifested for the utility of the Church. But further multiplication and differences have been sought elsewhere.

The second, however, is given according to absolute order: for to this order is first required preparation in God, which is predestination, and on the part of the one graced is the terminus from which: and according to this is required calling through the grace of separation from the mass of perdition: and it is the terminus to which: and it is twofold, namely proximate, and this is justification: or remote, and that is magnification, whether magnification says exaltation in the increase of grace through the exercise of virtues, as one Gloss suggests, or says exaltation in glory through merit, as another suggests.

But that which is from Isaiah is given according to those things which perfectly contribute to the redemption of the captive: because first it is required that he be protected from the enemy, and afterwards delivered from inflicted danger, such as wounds, and the like, and afterwards there is the passage of frequent visitation in the progress of good work, to which the salvation of the perfect in the return of health follows.

But that which is from the Gloss on Genesis is given through those things which contribute to the acquisition and conservation of grace: for regard to God in knowledge and affection acquires grace, but self-guarding conserves it.

However, the division of Chrysostom is sufficiently clear from the pre-established, according to which it is accepted.

Articulus 7 — What Operating And Prevenient Grace Is, And How It Moves Free Choice

What is operating and prevenient grace?
and, How does it move free will?

What is operating and prevenient grace?
and, How does it move free will?

Then it is asked about the second, namely,
about the nature of the names of these graces.

For when it is said operating grace:
either it is understood to operate itself, or the will, or itself in the will. If itself: this cannot be: because nothing operates itself or makes. But if it is understood to make the will:
this again is nothing: because the will was before this. But if itself in the will: this again is nothing: because nothing makes itself neither in itself, nor in another: therefore operating grace is poorly understood.

If you say, that it makes a good will: it is asked, what does the term good supply? It is evident, however, that it is not the will according to itself, but grace informed: therefore it is the same to make a good will, as to make itself in the will. and thus it returns to the first.

In the same way it is asked about prevenient grace, what does it prevent?

It is evident, that it does not prevent the will: because the will was before, even before grace: nor does it prevent itself, because nothing can prevent itself. But if you say, that it prevents the subsequent: this again cannot be: because the Master below says, that prevenient and subsequent grace are one grace in number: therefore if it prevents the subsequent, it prevents itself: and this cannot be.

In the same way it is asked about cooperating grace.

For it seems, that it is secondary in a meritorious act: because when two operate, and one gives the substance, the other gives the property — the substance following, will be more principal in the work which gives the substance, than that which gives the property: thus free will and grace operate, such that free will gives the substance of the act, and grace the property by which the act is pleasing: therefore free will is more principal in the work.

If you say, that grace moves and excites free will to act: and therefore it is more principal. Then it is asked, Whether it moves naturally or violently?

It seems, that violently: because 1. Augustine likens grace to a rider, and free will to a horse. It is evident however, that the motion by which the rider moves the horse, is violent, since its principle is outside the horse: therefore grace moves free will violently.

1. Likewise, Natural motion is to that which is in the nature of the moved thing: but the motion by which free will is moved is to that which is above the capacity of its nature:

therefore it seems, that it is violent, and not natural.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Violent motion if repeated, induces corruption, and labor of the movable: but the motion of grace is the perfection of free will:
therefore it is not violent.

In the same way it is asked about the subsequent, about which the Master says in the Text, that it follows free will lest it will in vain:
but this seems to be nothing: because if grace perfecting the will is first given, the subsequent work cannot be in vain,
since it is always worthy of eternal life.
For in vain, as the Philosopher says, is that which is for some end which it does not include.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that it is called operating, because it operates to be good in the will: and it is said to operate as a form makes to be, not as an efficient. But this making which is of the form, is nothing but the diffusion of itself in the formed. And therefore I well concede, that a form absolutely accepted in the act of a non-efficient form makes itself in the formed:
but it makes nothing of itself according to the same consideration accepted: and the efficient does not make itself even in different considerations accepted: but because a form does not properly make, but gives, and its giving is the diffusion of itself and information, therefore a form gives to be which is the act of that form, and operates, and this is its being in the formed. The first objections proceeded as if grace were operating in the manner of an efficient, and not of a form.

To what is objected about the prevenient, it must be said that it prevents the act of merit, which is the grace of the subsequent and cooperating:
and grace is called cooperating inasmuch as it operates with free will: and I well concede, that free will is secondary in that work for three reasons; one of which is, because grace is the first mover, as a habit moves in the manner of inclining nature to the impulse of some act, as a heavy thing inclines downward.
The second is: because it does not give the property or accidental form, but the substantial form of merit, from which is all the efficacy of merit: so that an act without that form, is not meritorious, nor would it be worth eternal life. The third reason is which Augustine touches, because it governs free will: and free will is as an obedient beast. Hence, Psalm 32:9:
I became as a beast before you.

To what is objected, it must be said that it prevents the subsequent: although it is one and the same in substance prevenient and subsequent, yet it is not one in reason:
and therefore in different reason it can prevent itself, as a habit informing a power prevents a habit operating in act.

To what follows, namely about cooperating grace, the solution is clear from the above.

To the other question, Whether it moves violently or naturally? It must be said, that there is no division: because voluntary motion is neither natural, nor violent: and it moves as the perfection of the will. But it is true, that it moves in the manner of nature, as Cicero also says about virtue.
However, it is a voluntary habit: and therefore we are born to receive in such things, and perfection is from habit in civil virtue:

but in grace perfection is from the infuser of grace: and therefore those questions are ridiculous.

To what is objected about Augustine, it must be said, that grace is compared to a rider as to governance, and not as to this that grace is extrinsic, as a rider is extrinsic to a horse.

To the other it must be said, that it is true that the natural motion of a body has a moving principle within; but the voluntary which we are born to have, does not have a sufficient principle within, but receives from elsewhere, as has been said: and thus it is the proper solution according to this matter, and not that which some solvers posit, that it is natural, and because it is not done against the will:
and they give an example, as if a bird striving upwards by itself, is thrown upwards, it will not be entirely a violent motion, as if a stone is thrown upwards: and these are improper words according to this science of voluntary habits.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Will Is Well Defined By Motion, Although It Is A Power

Whether the will is well defined by motion, although it is a power?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, B, Augustine in the book on the two souls, etc.

For the will does not seem to be motion, but a power: and therefore it is poorly defined by motion.

If you say that it defines the will which is an act, and not a power. ON THE CONTRARY:
1. According to this, it ought to say, the will is the motion of the will, and not the motion of the mind.

1. Furthermore, the motion by which it is moved to acquire something seems to belong to the concupiscible.
2. Furthermore, that which is moved to not admit something is irascible: the irascible and concupiscible are not the will, since the will is a part of the rational soul, the irascible and concupiscible are parts of the sensitive soul.

Solution. It must be said that according to Anselm, the will is threefold, namely instrument, motion, and affection: and here motion is defined, and not instrument or affection.

To the objection, it must be said that the mind is placed there for the superior part which is rational: but it is referred to the will by what is said, with no one compelling: because, as was held above, freedom from coercion is primarily and per se of the will.

To the other, it must be said that to acquire something with the reason of delight ordered to sense is of the concupiscible: but to acquire something according to the reason of good simply is of the will which is in reason which considers good simply.

As for what is objected concerning what is said, not to be admitted, etc., it is not true what is objected: because it is of any power not to admit what is repugnant to its object: but the irascible is to detest and rise against what is harmful in sense, or to overcome arduous things with its own strength.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Grace Of Justification, By Which The Ungodly Becomes Godly, Is Faith Or Operating Grace Or Cooperating Grace

Whether the grace of Justification through which the impious becomes pious is faith, or operating grace, or cooperating grace?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, "And if you diligently attend," etc.

For here he seems to say that the grace of justification is faith through which the impious becomes pious. However, below, according to the opinion of many, it will be proven that grace is not faith, except as a potential whole is its part: therefore, it seems that he speaks wrongly here.

Concerning this question which is asked about the justification of the impious, many things are noted in another summa in the fourth book of the Sentences, in the treatise on contrition, and in this below, on the third book of the Sentences: and there they should be sought.

But as far as pertains to the present, it must be said that faith is not called operating and cooperating grace, except as the whole is predicated of the suppositum: nor does the Master intend otherwise: and grace is rather manifested in this suppositum which is faith, than in another virtue: because faith has the first act in the justification of the impious, although all habits are infused simultaneously: but nevertheless, this is responded to in the aforementioned places.

Articulus 10 — Whether Operating Grace And Cooperating Grace Are One Or Diverse

Whether operative grace and cooperative grace are one or diverse? And, why do they have different names?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, I, Here it must be considered, why it has been said, etc.

And four questions are asked: of which the first is, Whether operative and cooperative are one grace, or diverse?

Second, Whether it is a virtue, or not? Third, How grace is in virtue and in certain other things, whether distinct or indistinct, or multipliable or multiplied?

Fourth, concerning the act of grace and virtue; how they are united, and how they are distinguished?

TO THE FIRST, it is objected thus:
1. Operative and cooperative have diverse acts: however, habits as well as powers are distinguished by acts: therefore, operative and cooperative are diverse?

1. Likewise, Operative is that which works good, as was held above: however, to work good is to make good through the informing of the good which is grace making pleasing: however, this commonly regards power and essence, cooperative only power: therefore, operative and cooperative are not the same: by the same reason neither are prevenient and subsequent.

But ON THE CONTRARY:
In natures it is thus, that the same form which makes and gives being, becomes the efficient principle of operations, as the Philosopher says in II De Anima. Therefore, it is also thus in habits: however, operative grace is that which makes being, cooperative however the principle of operations, and they do not differ in another. Therefore, they are one in number: and this also the Master says in the Text.

Solution. It must be said, that they are one in number, and on account of the diverse reasons which were held above, it takes diverse names.

To the first, however, it must be said, that not every difference of acts makes a difference of habits and powers, but only of those acts which are upon objects of diverse reasons: but here it is not so, but rather those acts are ordered, just as being which is prior, and acting which is posterior.

To the other it must be said, that grace which is the perfection of the soul, is proportioned to the soul itself. Whence just as the essence of the soul is in the powers, and not outside them: so also grace reaches the powers of the soul, and operates with them: and therefore it is called cooperative. And this does not divide grace as to substance: just as neither is the essence of the soul divided in itself and in the powers taken, but remains one and the same undivided.

Articulus 11 — Whether Grace Is A Virtue, And Virtue Grace; Secondly, Whether Grace Is A Virtue

Whether grace is a virtue, and virtue grace? Secondly, it is asked, Whether grace is a virtue?

Whether grace is a virtue, and virtue grace? Secondly, it is asked, Whether grace is a virtue?

It seems, however, that it is so: because 1. This seems to be said in the Letter, that faith is grace: and the same reason applies to other virtues: therefore virtue is the same as grace.

1. Likewise, Virtue is defined in the following distinction thus: Virtue is a good quality of the mind, by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly, which God works in us without us. All these agree with grace: therefore, etc.
2. Likewise, Perfection for merit is grace: but virtue is perfection for merit: therefore virtue is grace.

ON THE CONTRARY: If virtue is grace: it is either grace freely given, or grace making one pleasing. If it is grace freely given, this is not questioned: because both the powers of the soul and virtues and all other things which are had from God are grace freely given. But if it is grace making one pleasing. On the contrary: Virtue can exist without grace, infused, and acquired apart from charity: therefore if grace is virtue, it will be only charity: therefore at least it is held of necessity, that grace is not every virtue, but either some or none.

If you say, that it does not follow, if grace can be lost while virtue is retained, that grace is not virtue. On the contrary: Whatever things are essentially separated, so that one is without the other, those are not the same either in essence or in substance: but virtue and grace are separated thus, that one of them can be without the other: therefore grace is not the same as virtue.

If you say, that the form of virtue is grace, and thus it is virtue making one pleasing then: at least it is held, that grace and virtue as virtue are not the same. But if it is the form of virtue: it is either the form giving being, or the form following the being of virtue, that is, the essential form, or accidental which is for well-being. If you say, that it is the form for well-being: then it is necessarily held, that it essentially differs from the substance of virtue: because every form which is for the well-being of something, essentially differs from that: therefore grace according to this essentially differs from virtue. But if it is the form giving being to virtue. On the contrary: The form giving being is multiplied and contracted in different things to different things: and as those differ in species or number, so it differs in species or number. If therefore grace is the form giving being to virtue, it will be in different virtues different in species, and thus it is not one grace operating, but many species according to the number of species of virtue: and this I do not think anyone concedes.

If however it seems to someone not to be inconvenient. It is argued against thus: The form giving being has a name applicable by concretion to the species which it constitutes, just as humanity makes a human: and let us take the natural form, and thus it is found in all: therefore faith is constituted by the form of another reason and human, than hope, and charity, and prudence, and so of others: but grace says only the form of one reason: therefore grace is not the form constituting virtue according to essence.

If you say, that this would be true, if all virtues did not agree in one act, which is to make pleasing and to merit in work: and because they do agree thus, therefore they have one form: then it will necessarily be proved, that grace essentially differs from virtue thus: Every virtue is essentially determined to a special object, and to the act of that object: just as faith to the first truth and the act of assenting to the first truth, and charity to the first goodness and the act of loving: and concerning carnal things there is no question but that it is so: therefore what does not regard an object in one reason, nor an act in a special reason, that will not be of the essence of this or that virtue: but either it is not a virtue, or it is not one kind of virtue: but grace does not regard any object in species, nor an act in a determined reason: which is proved from this that whatever it would regard, already by this very thing it would be opposed to another: and this is not true, because any virtue has grace in itself: therefore grace is either not specifically a virtue, or it is not a species of virtue: because a genus according to being is in a species, and a species in individuals, and they are ordered to the same act to which the form of the individual is: therefore it remains, that grace is not essentially a virtue.

Likewise, It is impossible that that in which different species agree, and in which they are distinguished, is from one principle: but in the reason of meriting different species of virtues agree, and in the reason of the act by the object different species of them are distinguished: therefore the reason of meriting and the reason of acting the act of this or that virtue, are not of one principle according to essence. But virtue is the principle of acting in the reason of a determined object, because every act of virtue of a determined reason has an object: and grace is the principle of good merit, as it is said in the Letter: therefore grace and virtue are not the same.

If you say, that one form in number is giving being, and the principle of actions following being: and thus in one number it is the form giving being good, and which acts actions following virtue. This is ridiculous, and said from great ignorance of natural Philosophy. For when the form is the principle of actions following being: either it in itself remaining one is the principle of all those actions, or by different principles which are caused by it in the composite or in the substance.

If you say, that in one way in itself remaining: this will be against every known principle: because the same in the same way disposed, always does the same. But if it does this by different principles by which it acts, and by which it causes in the substance: just as the soul by intellect and will and memory is made the principle of different things: then nothing is worth what is induced because then neither will grace be made the principle of acts different in species, unless different in species are joined to it: and those are virtues which are infused in it: therefore grace and the virtue of the soul differ, just as the substance of the soul and the powers: and this we intend to prove, because they differ essentially thus.

Solution. Without prejudice perhaps to those understanding more subtly here, it seems to me impossible, that grace and virtue are the same in essence: but in substance they can be the same in some way as the soul with its powers: because the nature of the soul subsists in all powers, and its power is completed in them, although according to itself it has the act of giving life, according to which act it is the first perfection of the body: because, as the Philosopher says, to living things being is, just as to sensing things is to sense, and to understanding things is to understand: and, to speak briefly, just as the first act of any substantial form in that of which it is the form, is the being of that formed: so it seems to me, that grace subsists in all virtues making pleasing, and its act is the spiritual life of the soul: and virtues receive essence from added properties, just as natural properties added to the soul make powers: and those properties are not essentially grace, although grace subsists in them: and those properties because they are diverse, therefore they are different habits regarding different acts and objects. And this opinion seems necessarily proved by the reasons induced.

To the first therefore which is objected against, it must be said that it is said, that the soul is a power: because the nature of the whole potential does not fail the part added to it by the property of a special act: but the whole substantial nature subsists, and therefore it is predicated of that.

To the other it must be said, that grace is not properly lived rightly: because the right is taken from the mean according to the dimension proportioned to the extremes: but the mean is the act, and the extremes, the power and the determined object; and then this rectitude agrees only to virtue, and not to grace, because that by itself neither regards power, nor any object.

To the other it must be said, that in that argument there is a sophistical place of the accident: for perfection for merit is grace by itself: but virtue is not substantially determined to merit, but to the object of a determined reason, and to merit insofar as it is in grace: and it contributes to merit, just as the act of the power of the soul, as to understand, or to nourish, or to generate, operates life: and it is evident, that the proper act of powers is not life, but as it is reduced to the soul in which it is rooted.

Articulus 12 — How Grace Is In Virtue, And In Certain Other Things, Such As Gifts, Beatitudes, Fruits, Etc

How grace is in virtue, and in certain other things, such as gifts, beatitudes, fruits, etc.?

Thirdly, it is asked, How grace is in virtue and other gifts, namely beatitudes, and fruits, and sacraments, in which not all have virtue: whether it is divided in them, or remains undivided?

It seems, however, that it is divided. 4. For that which is in many things specifically and numerically different, it is necessary to be multiplied in them at least according to being: grace is in all formed virtues, and other gifts: therefore it is multiplied and divided in them according to being, as it seems.

1. Likewise, According to the number of formed things, forms differ according to being, although not according to reason: but virtues are informed by grace at least according to well-being: therefore they differ according to the difference of virtues: therefore according to being.
2. Likewise, In acts there is a number of merits: because what has more meritorious acts, has more merits: therefore it seems to be similar in habits.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The substance of the soul is not multiplied by the multiplication of powers, since perfection proportionally corresponds to the perfect: but grace and virtue are perfections of the soul: therefore since grace refers to substance, and virtue to power, it seems that with the multiplication of virtue grace is not multiplied.

Solution. It must be said that here there are two opinions. One is which I believe to be truer, which is concluded in the last objection, that grace is not multiplied in virtue, and it underlies all, as one nature of the whole potential, which universally makes the possessor and work pleasing. And according to this, because it is more subtle, the objections must be answered.

To the first it must be said, that this is true, that that is multiplied which is in many things which are simply many and are not reduced to one, or which is in those reduced to one, not according to that they are reduced to one, but according to that they are many. But thus grace is not in those which are introduced: because virtues are reduced to powers, and powers to the nature and substance of the soul which grace regards first. They are also reduced to grace which underlies all, as they are formed in the virtue of meriting. And therefore it is not necessary that grace be multiplied in them.

To all the following there is one solution, that this is true of the perfection of the formal, which is multiplied as the object concludes: but virtue is perfected by grace as a potential part in meriting is perfected by the whole: and as power is perfected by the nature of the soul by this that it is caused by it and contained by it, as it is held in the first book of the Sentences, that powers flow from the nature of the soul: and this is also diligently proven in our treatise which we have disputed concerning the soul.

Articulus 13 — Whether And How The Acts Of Grace And Of Virtue Are Distinguished

Whether and how are the acts of grace and virtue distinguished?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the act of grace and virtue, how are they distinguished?

It seems, however, that in no way:
§1. Of one power there is one act: but one power is the subject of grace and virtue: therefore, there is one act of both.

§2. Likewise, we do not say that in any act someone merits, and in that acts according to virtue: therefore, by one act he does both: therefore, to merit is an act of grace and virtue, as it seems.

§3. Likewise, the soul is not an active principle except through power: but virtue is the perfection of power for act: therefore, the soul does not have good acts except of virtues: either, therefore, the same acts are of grace and virtues, or none are of grace, but all of virtues, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
§1. The act of grace is to make pleasing: but the act of virtue is not necessarily this act because it can be without it, as political or cardinal, and all theological except for charity alone which cannot be without form.

§2. Likewise, the act of virtue is defined by the object, as to believe, to love, to hope.

and so concerning others: however, the act of grace is not defined to any object, but to the acceptance of good pleasure: therefore they are not the same.

Solution. It must be said that the act of virtue and grace is the same by supposit, and by reason not vain, but founded in the property informing the act differently. And the first reasons proceed only concerning the identity of the supposit: and this is well conceded. However, the property informing the act and difference is that which makes worthy of eternal life, and this is from grace: and that which specifies to this and to that object, and this is from virtue.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Note, however, that concerning these last four articles of the question, there are still two opinions of others. For some say that grace and virtues are entirely the same by substance and essence, but different by reason: and this is the reason why they say thus: because in comparison to acts which are to make pleasing, and to operate rightly, they are the same. But I do not see how those different acts can proceed from a principle by essence in every way one: nevertheless, this is the common opinion of many, because the multitude does not attend to subtlety.

Another is the opinion of certain great ones, that grace indeed and virtue differ in the manner spoken, but that grace is multiplied in virtue: and they give an example of this, that just as light is in the star in the center one, in which all rays are gathered to one, but distant from it is multiplied in rays: so in the soul they place grace in itself one and spiritual light, whose spiritual rays are diffused in the diversity of powers and virtues.

DISTINCTIO XXVII

Divisio Textus

Here it must be seen what virtue is, etc. In this part, the Master deals with virtue in two ways: and therefore it has two distinctions: because in this he determines what virtue is, and that virtue is not a motion or use of virtue, unless speaking through cause. However, in the following, he touches upon how the power of free will relates to grace and virtue, namely there in distinction XXIII, A, "Id vero inconcusse," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Definition Of Virtue Is Good Which Says, It Is A Good Quality Of The Mind

Whether the definition of virtue is good which is said, "It is a good quality of the mind"?

SOLE ARTICLE.

Whether the definition of virtue is good which is said, "It is a good quality of the mind"?

Concerning the first distinction, there is nothing doubtful, except about the definition of virtue, which the Master posits: and about this, even in other definitions and virtues in common, it has been disputed in another summa very extensively and diligently. But here, in this place, we consider the definition which is posited here, namely that Virtue is a good quality of the mind, etc.

1. For when it is said, "good": Either it is a predication of the denominative, or of the substantial. If of the denominative: then the notion of goodness does not belong to virtue, which is false: since virtue is a certain goodness, because the good is the end of appetite, because it is what is wished and desired: but virtue, since it is among the parts of the honorable, falls under the division of the good: and thus the good is predicated substantially of virtue itself. But if this is conceded, that it is predicated substantially: since therefore virtue is something simple and abstract, goodness ought to be predicated abstractly of it: for whiteness is not said to color, but color: therefore neither is virtue good, but goodness, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, it is questioned about what is said, "Quality of the mind." For virtue is not always in the mind, since the mind is the superior part of the soul, and virtues are as if in the irrational parts participating somewhat in reason, such as the concupiscible and irascible.
3. Likewise, it is objected about what is said, "By which one lives rightly": for rectitude seems to belong only to justice: for which reason it is also said by Anselm that justice is the rectitude of the will: therefore it seems that it is wrongly posited in the definition of virtue in common.
4. Furthermore, this seems false which says, "By which no one uses badly." Because many have abused virtue, considering it to be the highest good in life, as certain Stoics.
5. Likewise, this seems false which says, "Which God alone works in man." For if it is understood of habitual virtue, it is plainly false: because the efficient causes of it are knowing, willing, and persevering in action. But if we speak of infused virtue, it is still false in adults to whom nothing is infused unless they are willing.
6. Likewise, this definition seems to agree with grace: therefore virtue is grace.

Solution. It must be said that the good is substantial to virtue: and yet it is of greater simplicity than virtue: because the good, insofar as it is good, regards being, but virtue regards action: and therefore nothing prohibits it from being predicated concretely of virtue in name, although according to the thing it is substantial to it: just as also rational of man, and not rationality. However, how this is, requires long words which are found elsewhere in the question about virtues in common.

To the other, it must be said that Augustine defines infused virtue with grace making one pleasing. Such a thing, however, as in the first subject, is received in that which is nearest to God: but this is the mind by descent: afterwards, the parts of virtues are in other powers.

To the other, it must be said that rectitude is the preparation of the due, and of the debtor, and of that which God alone works in man. to whom it is due: and this is of justice. It is also rectitude as the extension of an act to the end, or to the reason of the mean without deflection from the end, or to the superfluous, or diminished: and this is the rectitude of virtue in general: for theological virtue has a direct extension to the end without obliquity from it, and political virtue attains the mean without bending to the malice of superfluity and defect.

To the other, it must be said that no one ever used virtue badly: because by the very fact that some did not refer it to the due end, they did not have true virtue, but only the image of apparent virtue.

To the other, it must be said that consent is not excluded. But that consent is only disposing on the part of the subject in which virtue is.

To the last, it must be said that grace is not lived rightly, if force is made in rectitude, as has been said: but one lives meritoriously by grace, as is clear from what has been previously held.

But other things of this distinction are evident by themselves, and by our position elsewhere treated about virtue.

DISTINCTIO XXVIII

Articulus 1 — What Good Free Choice Can Do By Itself Without Grace

What good can free will achieve by itself without grace?

What good can free will achieve by itself without grace?

Let us indeed firmly and unhesitatingly hold, etc.

Concerning this distinction, there is a small difficulty. We will inquire about two things only, namely, what good free will can achieve by itself without grace, and whether in any state it is possible to merit the first grace.

It seems, however, that free will can achieve good by itself thus:

1. Just as grace relates to glory, so that it precedes it, so does the nature of free will relate to grace: but grace can acquire glory by itself without the addition of another: therefore, it seems, free will can acquire grace by itself.
2. Likewise, the will without grace making it pleasing can will the good: but the will is denominated good or evil from what is willed: therefore, the will willing the good is good: therefore, willing the good by grace, it is good by the good of grace, as it seems.

3. Furthermore, for the good, nothing is required except to think, assent, will, and act: and we have the power of all these from our side: therefore, it seems that we are perfected for the good of grace.

4. Likewise, the commandments of God are imposed on all: therefore, either it is possible for all to keep them, or not. If not: then impossibilities are commanded: which is against Ambrose saying that it is anathema to think that God commanded impossibilities. But if it is possible to be kept by all: therefore, it is in our power to fulfill the commandments: but in the fulfillment of the commandments, we merit: therefore, a meritorious work is in our power.

5. Likewise, services are more pleasing the less they are owed, as Augustine says: but he owes less who serves from his own, than he who serves from another's: therefore, it seems more pleasing what we do from our own strength, than what we do from the gifts of others: more merit consists in our ability before grace, than after.

6. Likewise, it is taken from certain authorities found in the Scripture: such as that, "He gave them the power to become sons of God": and that, "to be able to believe and such things is the nature of all, but to believe is the grace of the faithful," the Master sufficiently explains in the Scripture.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY, this is all that is held in distinction XXVI, where it was shown that nothing is pleasing to God from us, unless we receive the reason for gratitude from Him: therefore, we cannot achieve meritorious good from our own ability.

But FURTHER, it is asked, since there is the good of nature, like eating, drinking, and providing for the family, and such things: and good in general, like a voluntary act upon due matter, like feeding the hungry: and there is the good which is generative of political virtue, which is an act clothed with circumstances: because from similar acts, according to the Philosopher, similar habits are left: and there is the good of customary virtue: whether in all these free will can act and in what manner?

Whether, however, it can resist temptation, has been explained above.

Solution. It must be said without any ambiguity, that free will by itself cannot achieve grace, nor meritorious good: because (as was proven above) it is necessary that we receive this from God.

Therefore, it must be said to the first that although there is similarity in the order of precedence according to time, there is not similarity in the mode of causality: because grace cannot be caused by nature, for then it would not be grace, and it would be something vain and not worthy of reward.

To the other, it must be said that the will is denominated from that in which it is in this way: and therefore, because it is only imperfectly, and by way of preparation, in the good of grace, but in perfect ordination and preparation in it, and this is from material disposition: therefore, such a will is semi-perfectly good.

To the other, it must be said that those are not sufficient for the good of grace, but for the good subject to our power, like the good of nature, and good in general.

To the other, it must be said that if the form is in the precept, which form is said by the Doctors to be charity, then it is not in our power to fulfill the divine commandments: and yet they are commanded to us, because it is possible for us to do something, by doing which we have power from grace: this, however, is to do what is in us: because if we do this, God inevitably gives grace: because He always relates to us in one way, namely by offering grace: but we do not relate to Him in one way, when we turn away: but if we turn by doing what is in us, we immediately receive. Therefore, because the antecedent is in our power, the consequent is also commanded to us. But if according to another opinion the form is not in the precept, then we can fulfill the commandments of God: but we will not have the merit of eternal life, but we will avoid punishment: but the commandments of the love of God and neighbor to which the commandments of the Decalogue are referred as to the form by which they are fulfilled, we cannot fulfill: because they are of the form of the command rather than of the command itself. And thus the solution is clear according to both opinions.

To the other, it must be said that this is understood of the freedom of the will in the work, and not of the ability from which the work proceeds. For there are those who serve only out of fear or obedience compelled by necessity: and their services are less pleasing. There are also those who serve out of charity, and they serve liberally: but no one serves meritoriously without grace.

To the authorities, it must be said that they speak of the power of receptivity, and not of the complete power for action, which completion is only through the habit of grace, of which, however, we are receptive by nature.

To the last, it must be said in my judgment, that free will without grace making it pleasing superadded, not without freely given grace, with nature can achieve a threefold good, namely of nature, in general, and clothed with circumstances which is generative of virtue. For it can be considered as it is the nature of man, and thus it can achieve the good of nature. It can also be considered as it is deliberative, and thus it is collative to another, and composes proportionate things to due action upon matter, and divides disproportionate things, and thus it can achieve good in general. It can again be considered according to the order to the perfection which it is innate to receive, although to perfect is from custom, and if it joins to the natural good which has an order to the honest good, and thus it can achieve an act generative of political virtue: but with freely given grace which is political virtue, it can achieve the good of political virtue, and with grace making it pleasing it can achieve meritorious good.

Articulus 2 — Whether In Any State It Happens To Merit The First Grace, And Whether Someone Can Merit For Himself Or Another The First Grace

Whether in any state it is possible to merit the first grace? And, whether anyone can merit the first grace for himself or another?

Whether in any state it is possible to merit the first grace? And, whether anyone can merit the first grace for himself or another?

Secondly, it is asked, whether anyone can merit the first grace for himself or another?

And let us posit two states, according to which someone is now in a state of justice, and fears falling, and prays that if it happens that he falls, he may rise again. And it is asked, whether he in the first state can merit that he rises again when he has fallen?

However, it seems that he can: because 1. This prayer is for himself, piously, and perseveringly, because with the intention of persevering, and for salvation: therefore it is heard: therefore afterwards he will rise again by the merit of the first prayer.

1. Likewise, someone merits the first grace for another, as the Saints say, as Stephen merited for Paul, and others for others: therefore much more quickly for himself.
2. Likewise, he is already in a state of meriting: therefore he can merit eternal life, and everything that is substantially ordered to it: but to rise again if he falls is substantially ordered to salvation: therefore he can merit this.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. By subsequent sin all preceding goods are mortified: and that which he prayed for, that he might rise again: therefore he did not merit that he might rise again.

1. Likewise, in Ezekiel 18:24, it is said, that the just man turning away from his justice, therefore it seems that in his iniquities he shall die: and of all his justices God will not remember anymore, he merits nothing by that.

Solution. It must be said that no one merits the first grace for another de condigno, but only de congruo: for himself, however, neither de condigno nor de congruo can he merit: because before he has grace, he is not worthy of the bread by which he is fed, as Augustine says: and then he can merit nothing. However, when he is in a state of grace, and does not persevere in the same, he does what is directly an impediment to prayer: and therefore he does not merit the subsequent resurrection: because subsequent sin is against grace in the one meriting through it.

To the first objection, it must be said that he does not ask perseveringly: because he can fall, and the fall is ordered against the effect of prayer in the one praying: and therefore he is frustrated from being heard.

To the other, it must be said that the fall or sin of another does not contradict the prayer in the one praying: and therefore he can obtain the effect de congruo, because it remains alive, always: but the fall of the one praying contradicts the effect of prayer in the one praying: and therefore it does not remain alive to be heard: and therefore there is no place for affirming from the lesser, but rather for denying from the lesser: and therefore the process is not valid.

To the third, it must be said that he is heard in those things which are per se ordered to salvation: but to rise again if he falls is not among the substantial things of the one praying: and therefore it can be frustrated by subsequent sin: as also other goods which he does.

And through this all the doubts of this distinction are made clear.

DISTINCTIO XXIX

Divisio Textus

After this, it must be considered whether man was before sin, etc. In this distinction, two things are said, namely, whether Adam was in grace and virtue before sin, or not? And secondly, concerning the place from which he was ejected. Certain things are also said about the tree of life: and in that also the punishment of sin.

Articulus 1 — Whether Adam Before Sin Was In Grace And Virtue

Whether Adam before sin was in grace and virtue?

ARTICULUS UNICUS.
Whether Adam before sin was in grace and virtue?

Concerning the first, it is objected:
For it seems that Adam did not need operative grace, because

1. That makes the impious pious; however, he was not impious; therefore, he did not need that grace.
2. Likewise, every motion is between contraries, or between privation and habit. But if Adam received operative grace, he was made good; therefore, from not good or from evil, both of which are false, since Scripture says thus, God saw all that He had made, and it was very good; and specifically about man, that God created man upright; and elsewhere, that He clothed him with virtue.

The same objection applies to the Angel.

Here also some reiterate the question, Whether man was made in grace or not? But because it is disputed by the same reasons, as was inquired above concerning the state of the Angel, I therefore pass over it.

Solution. It must be said that the Master supposes in the text that Adam had virtues and charity; and consequently supposes that he had grace: which some denying say that charity is here placed for natural love, and other virtues for natural inclinations to the acts of those virtues: as Job says, Mercy grew with me from my infancy, etc.; and as gentleness is said to have been innate to Moses, and to some others other virtues.

This also seems according to the Master to need to be said: because above he conceded that by resisting temptation he would not have merited. But yet the opinion of others is that he had grace by which he could progress in merit, but not for the confirmation of beatitude. All this was disputed above, and in another Summa.

To what is first objected, it must be said that grace deletes sin where it finds it; but this is not substantial to it, but happens from the part of the subject: and therefore before sin man needed operative grace so that he might be formally good according to grace.

To the other, it must be said that he was good before the privation of that habit which he received: hence before this he was not good by gratuitous goodness, although good by natural goodness, about which the authorities introduced speak.

But the rest of this distinction is evident from what has been said above.

DISTINCTIO XXX

Divisio Textus

In the preceding, it was insinuated, etc. Here begins the part in which the Master determines into what Adam and his posterity fell, according to the state of guilt. However, there is a twofold guilt into which they fell, namely original, which he treats first, and actual, which he treats second, where distinction XXXIV begins, there, A, After the aforementioned concerning actual sin, etc.

The first of these is divided into four distinctions, which are placed here concerning original sin: in the first of which he inquires, What is original? In the second, How is it transferred to posterity? which begins in the following distinction, there, A, Nene supe In the third, it is touched upon, How is it remitted in baptism? which begins in distinction XXXII, there, A, Quo In the fourth, since it was said above, etc. he inquires, Whether the sins of all preceding fathers are transferred into their sons, or not? which begins in distinction XXXIII, there, A, To the aforementioned should be added, etc.

This distinction is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master investigates, what is original sin in general: Whether act, or guilt, or fault? In the second, however, he investigates, What is it in its own species? there, G, Nune su In the third, he resolves certain objections which seem to persuade that original sin is actual, there, K, What therefore he says, Through disobedience, etc. In the fourth, he touches upon, how all men were in Adam sinning? there, M, To this, however, which we have said, etc.

The subdivision of these parts is evident by itself.

Articulus 1 — Whether Original Sin Is In All Those Begotten By Adam Under The Law Of Concupiscence

Whether original sin is in all begotten by the law of concupiscence from Adam?

Concerning the first, here arises a most difficult question, Whether original sin exists?

To which the Masters have given reasons in four ways. For some have proven it not to be from the consideration of divine and human justice: and this is the first way. Some, however, from the consideration of the human body: and this is the second. Some from the consideration of the human soul: and this is the third. Some from the consideration of God creating the soul and informing man: and this is the fourth way.

ACCORDING TO THE FIRST WAY, it proceeds thus:

1. Ezekiel 18:20: "The soul that sins, it shall die: the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father," etc. Therefore, it seems unjust that infants be condemned for the sin of the first man.
2. Likewise, the Lord commanded that fathers should not be put to death for their children: therefore, much less should He punish infants for the sins of their parents.
3. Likewise, in human laws, children are not punished for their fathers, except in what they receive from their fathers, namely in inheritance: therefore, infants should not be punished except in what they receive from their earthly father; this, however, is the body, and not the soul: therefore, they should not be punished in the soul concerning original guilt. That the soul is not received from the fathers is proven from the fact that the soul is not from transmission as the body is. Hence, Hebrews 12:9: "We have had fathers of our flesh who corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live?"
4. If you say that the son is punished for the father temporally, not eternally: and thus the Lord punishes infants for the sin of Adam. On the contrary: Original guilt binds eternally to the deprivation of the vision of God, unless it is cured by the grace of the Mediator: therefore, God punishes children eternally for the father, and not only temporally; and this seems unjust.

ACCORDING TO THE SECOND WAY, it proceeds thus:

1. Augustine says that in all things the agent is more excellent than the patient: and the Philosopher, that the agent is always more honorable than the patient, and the efficient than the matter: but the body is not more excellent than the soul: therefore, since original sin is not caused in the soul from elsewhere except from the body, it seems that it cannot be caused in it.
2. Likewise, the agent impresses its form on the patient: if therefore the body acts on the soul, it impresses a form according to which it acts on the soul: this, however, is not guilt, because the body is not susceptible of virtue or vice: therefore, it impresses on the soul only punishment, and not guilt: therefore, no guilt is born in the soul from the body.
3. Likewise, nothing gives what it does not have: but the body does not have guilt: therefore, it does not give guilt to the soul.

Likewise, Anselm says that original sin is not more in the seed than in the spittle: therefore, it is not in what is formed from the seed: but the infant is formed from the seed: therefore, original sin is not in the infant.

ACCORDING TO THE THIRD WAY, it is objected thus: 1. The soul that receives the guilt of another must have a connection with it: but the soul of the infant cannot have a connection with the soul of Adam, unless it were in it: therefore, it seems that the soul of infants is transmitted from the soul of Adam, which is heresy: therefore, it does not have original sin, as it seems.

1. If, however, it is said to have it from the body. On the contrary: The rational soul is not a form drawn from matter like other forms, but is given from without: therefore, it will not participate in any of the properties of matter, nor the corruption of sin.
2. Likewise, the rational soul according to its powers, which are intellect, reason, and will, and the like, is not bound to bodily organs: therefore, it receives no infection from them.
3. Likewise, every sin is so voluntary that if it is not voluntary, it is not sin. If therefore the soul is corrupted in the body, it is either willing or unwillingly incorporated. If willing, it already sins actually choosing its corruption. If unwilling, then it is compelled to be incorporated: and thus the corruption should not be imputed to it. If, however, you say that the whole man has sin because he was in Adam sinning: then it seems that he also satisfied because he was in Adam satisfying.

ACCORDING TO THE FOURTH WAY, it is objected thus:

1. God created the soul, and it does not have malice from the matter from which it is caused, because it is not from matter: therefore, if it has a stain, it will be from the efficient cause: but it cannot have it from the efficient cause: therefore, it does not have the stain of guilt, as it seems.
2. Likewise, either at the same moment in which it is created, it is evil, or after. If at the same: then it must be that it is evil and exists at the same time: therefore, it has being and malice from the same, since according to malice it cannot be reduced to another cause existing before it.
3. Furthermore, this seems impossible: because Augustine says that it is not evil except because it harms, that is, because it takes away the good of nature: therefore, it seems that that good of nature was prior - and it cannot have been unless the soul itself was first: therefore, the soul itself was first good. If, however, this is granted, then the soul is prior to being in the body: because as soon as it is in the body, it is evil, as the Saints say.
4. Furthermore, Julian the Pelagian objects: Since sex is good because it is created by God: and the act of marriage is good because it is blessed by God, when He said: "Be fruitful and multiply," etc., parents are often holy and good: marriage is good because it is instituted by God: among so many defenses of innocence, through which cracks will original guilt enter?

5. Likewise, when parents are infected with bodily leprosy, they are advised to abstain from procreating children because of the defect of the body, if they can otherwise abstain: therefore, since the defect of the soul is greater, it seems that marriage should be prohibited, lest children be born in original evil.
6. Likewise, the good of offspring is that it is received for the worship of God and is religiously nurtured: therefore, it is not the good of offspring that it is born infected with sin: but all are born thus: therefore, it seems that marriage no longer has the good of offspring: and for this it is principally instituted: therefore, it seems that it should cease.

Solution. It must be said that original sin is in all begotten by the law of concupiscence from Adam: and how this is, it must be understood that there is a twofold corruption in the body from sin: one is that which has an active principle and cause.

in the body, but it has an act from the fault of the first parent: and this is hunger, thirst, weakness, death, and the like: and these are called natural defects: because although their act is from fault, yet the potency is from nature, and it is called by the Masters the corruption of passibility. Another is the corruption which according to act and potency is caused by the fault of the first parents: and it is not in the body insofar as it is from contraries, nor insofar as it is the body of man, but insofar as the grace of innocence has flowed away through fault. However, this defect is habitual concupiscence spread in the organs, as they are movable by the rational soul according to the law of nature inserted in it: for this law is contrary to that law of the members making the movable difficult in good, and easy in evil from the desire of good, as now habitually spread in the body. This corruption is called by Augustine the daughter of sin in the book on Marriage and Concupiscence, because of its similarity with sin, because it is immediately caused by sin: which can be shown thus: The first sin turned away from God, converting to a changeable good, and perverted the order by which reason was under God, and the body was under reason: and all these are found in this corruption: because habitual desire diffused through the body joined to the soul inclines to a changeable good, turning away as much as it can from the unchangeable, and does not subject itself to the order of reason: for which the Apostle says: I delight in the law of God according to the inner man: but I see another law in my members, etc. Therefore, this penalty is only in the body, because the body is not the substance of reason, and therefore not susceptible to fault: and therefore when that subject which is susceptible to the fault of man is infected, it is at the same time with that: and thus the soul is infected with the infection of fault and penalty. This corruption of disordered habitual fervor in the body our more learned contemporaries have called the corruption of vice: because it is the image of the first vice, and is an instrument to vice. This is drawn from the words of the Apostle, where it is said that we have borne the image of the earthly Adam. And because this mode relies on the words of Augustine, and Anselm, and other Saints, according to that we respond to all objections: and in the end, we will place two other solutions of others, returning to the same through other words.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the saying of Ezekiel is understood of sin whose cause is not taken from the father, as it is actual, as has already been shown, that the original cause in the soul is taken from the father in the corruption of vice, or in the penalty, which is called the daughter of vice: and it is called concupiscence by Anselm.

By the same, the solution to the following.

To another, it must be said, that although the soul does not receive from the father, yet it receives the cause of the infection of the soul from him in the pre-existing corruption, which is transfused with the seed, and is called the law of concupiscence: and therefore this is born with the law of corrupted nature over him. But in the case of men, the son does not participate with the father in the cause of sin: and therefore the father is punished in the son by temporal law through exile or through disinheritance of the son.

To another, it must be said, that the penalty corresponds to the original, because it is born from the aforementioned cause: and this is because the whole nature was corrupted in Adam, as will be shown below: and from the corrupted nothing proceeds except the corrupted: and nothing can be united to the corrupted, which does not contract some corruption.

To what is objected in the second way, it must be said that the word of Augustine and the Philosopher is true of the universally acting, because it in no way suffers from that in which it acts: whence the Philosopher speaks of the universally acting intellect, and Augustine of God. But in agents through corporeal or spiritual contact, the patient also acts on the agent: whence the Philosopher says that the physical agent suffers; and the Commentator on the books on the Soul says that the body acts on the soul, and inflicts certain passions on it, just as conversely: as is evident in sleep, and wakefulness, and certain others: and in this way, I can say that although the soul is nobler, it nevertheless suffers from the body to which it is united.

To another, it must be said, that it is false that the agent impresses its species on the patient, unless of the univocal agent: but they do not act univocally, unless when the matter of the agent and the patient is one, which is not in the body and soul: and therefore that objection does not proceed: and it is similar, that the sun heats and dries, but it is neither dry nor hot. If, however, we wished, we could say otherwise, that the species of that penalty is impressed on the soul: because what is not fault in the body, does not impede anything except the nature of the subject, because it cannot be the subject of fault: therefore, when it has its proper subject, it takes on the reason of fault.

To another, it must be said, that if it is understood thus, Nothing gives what it does not have contained by substance, to that whose substance it contains in itself, the proposition is false in all causes which have the caused by virtue, and not by substance, yet they give it: and thus flesh has fault. If, however, it is understood that nothing gives what it in no way has, then the proposition is true: and it does not avail for the purpose, because flesh in some way has fault.

To what is objected according to the third way, it must be said that the soul does not receive sin from the soul, except as from the first cause infecting the flesh: but it receives from the flesh, as from the proximate agent: not because it is from propagation: but because it is caused in the flesh, and united to the flesh.

To another, it must be said, that the soul is spiritually united to the body first: because it is through substance the perfection of the body, and certain powers consequently are the perfections of parts, and certain not all, flow from the soul substantially united to the flesh: and therefore they all contract the infection of substance.

To another, it must be said, that in the Book it is held, that this sin is voluntary in its first cause: that is, Adam, which is called the separated will by the Masters: but it is not voluntary by the will joined. And it must not be said, that the soul wills to be incorporated by the will of nature: because it is false, because the soul must first exist before it wills, and it is never except incorporated. If, however, it is said to be the will, the natural appetite of matter, which, as is said by some, is in all forms: that is nothing: because according to the Philosopher, it is not true: although matter desires form, as the female desires the male, and the base desires the good, yet it is not conceded by the Philosophers, that form desires matter, since it is divine and the best not desiring, but desired, and in matter it is subject to variation and corruption, which can desire nothing. Moreover, given such an appetite, then the soul of man does not otherwise will to be incorporated, than the form of a stone to be in the earth mixed with mineral: and this is absurd, that it should be disputed in this matter about such a will, when it is asked about the will of sin.

To another, it must be said, that Adam as the material principle of men sinned but could not thus satisfy, as has been proven above the third, and therefore we did not satisfy by him satisfying.

To what is objected according to the fourth way, it must be said that God creates the soul pure, that is, that from creation it does not have impurity: but rather in infusion it receives, not from creation but from union to that to which it is infused: as wine in contact with an unclean vessel which in the hands of the giver is clean, as the Master says in the following distinction: and therefore it would not follow, if by creating he made it clean, that it is clean: because from another in the same moment it is made unclean.

To another, it must be said, that malice is reduced to the foulness of the flesh in which it is created, as to an antecedent cause.

To another, it must be said, that evil takes away the good which precedes by nature or time, or in both ways: by time and nature in actual sin, but by nature only in original sin.

The solution to Julian's objection is now clear: because the channel through which concupiscence descends is habitually drawn in the seed. Whence Augustine arguing against him says, that he himself, the impudent preacher of concupiscence, makes no mention of concupiscence, which if it could be removed by generation, there would be no original: and this is to be understood of concupiscence which is the material substance of original sin, as will be shown in another question when it is asked, What is original sin according to matter and form?

To another, it must be said, that if sin were irremediable, then the objection would hold: but it is remediable by the grace of the Mediator. Or it may be said, that because of the defect into which it falls on the part of man, marriage was instituted and the course of nature in conception should not be impeded. However, the first solution is truer.

To the last, it must be said, that the good of offspring is not impeded, because sin has a remedy: and moreover, by nature, the intention of God is the multiplication of nature, and the impediment is sometimes from the act of man: and he cannot impede the divine.

Articulus 2 — Whether Original Sin Is A Fault

Whether original sin is guilt?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "But that original sin is guilt," etc.

For it seems that original sin is not in the genus of guilt: because

1. The involuntary, even in act, does not have guilt, but pardon and mercy, as the Philosopher says: therefore much less the involuntary, in which he who is subject to it does nothing: but such is original sin: therefore it seems that it is not in guilt.
2. Likewise, Augustine says that no one sins in that which can in no way be avoided: but infants can in no way avoid the original fault: therefore they do not sin.

Solution. It must be said that original sin is the sin of nature, as has been held: and because that justice obliges, as Anselm says: because if it had stood, it would have poured forth original justice into the children, just as it later poured forth injustice.

How this happens must be understood by other two ways besides that which was held in the preceding question: one of which is the masterly way, namely that corrupted nature generates, and does not intend to generate only the body, but the composite: and therefore although the soul is not drawn from matter, nevertheless the work of nature reaches the soul by intention, inasmuch as even in the seed the soul operates: But that which is reached by a corrupted work, that is stained: and therefore the soul, inasmuch as it is the form, which is the end of the act of generation of corrupted nature, in which the act of generating rests, is necessarily corrupted: and therefore in all others they have the same order of response to objects, which was previously held.

Another way of solving is of a certain Lord Ebdoms, Bishop of Cambrai, who posits that common nature participates in the person in acting in the body: for it follows if this man sins, that man sins: and if this man is corrupted by sin, that man is corrupted by sin: because common nature according to being is only in this one, especially in Adam before it was derived into others. Therefore in him the whole and all nature was corrupted. But the particular responds to the universal: therefore to corrupted nature in common must respond every particular corrupted by the act of generation from that in which it itself is corrupted. And this returns to the same with the previously held way, although they are other words: and afterwards it is again the same mode of solving.

To that which is first objected here, it must be said that the involuntary is that guilt, and the saying of the Philosopher holds in the act of the person, and not in the guilt of nature.

To the other it must be said that nature could have avoided in Adam, although not in this one: and another reason is, because Augustine does not understand concerning the natural, but concerning that of which we are the cause.

Articulus 3 — Whether Original Sin Is Concupiscence Or The Fomes

Whether original sin is concupiscence, or the tinder?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, Now it remains to see, etc.

For there it seems to be implied from the words of Augustine, that original sin is concupiscence: and because it would be long and burdensome to introduce here the multitude of authorities which are in the Gloss on chapter v, vi, and vii of the Epistle to the Romans, it must be known that we speak in three ways: for some say that the tinder is original; some, however, that the intense tinder; some, however, that concupiscence.

And it seems all this is false: because
1. The tinder remains after baptism: but original does not remain after baptism: therefore original is not the tinder.

1. Likewise, Intense and remiss do not vary the species: but the intense tinder is before baptism, and remiss after baptism: therefore they are of the same species: but the remiss after baptism is not sin nor fault: therefore neither is the intense before baptism.
2. Likewise, Concupiscence, which is concupiscibility in the infant, and in the adult concupiscence, also remains in the Saints: but original does not remain in the Saints: therefore original is not concupiscence: therefore all seems false which is said here.
3. Furthermore, Since we have fallen from sin into ignorance, just as into concupiscence, and infirmity: it seems that ignorance and infirmity ought to be original sin just as concupiscence.
4. Likewise, Hugh of Saint Victor:
   Original sin is that which by being born: Therefore we contract through ignorance in the mind, through concupiscence in the flesh. It is granted, that ignorance is as much original sin as concupiscence.

Solution. It must be said, that here many have spoken in many ways, so that none agrees with another: but the easier way by which we can exit, is this, that we say certain things are in original sin, as material, and certain as formal. The material in the original is the foulness of concupiscence or the corruption of vice, of which it was said above. The formal, however, in it is the lack of due justice: for nature had lost the justice in which it was created and which it had from itself, in all those in whom it is required, as Anselm says: and therefore according to what can be gathered from the words of Anselm in the book on the Virginal Conception, it can be defined thus: Original sin is the proneness to all evil with the lack of due justice. And this definition is of certain ancient Doctors, but it is extracted from the words of Anselm. And what is said, proneness to all evil, is the inclination to conversion in a changeable good, and not conversion, because original does not have conversion except in potency. I say, however, in potency completed through the habit of the corruption of vice, of which it was said above. But it has aversion in act: and this is touched upon by what is said, lack of due justice. For if it were said lack of justice only, it would be said only as the reason of the penalty of loss: but when due is added, then the reason of fault is posited: whose cause is justice deserted by nature. According to this, therefore, we can say, that the authorities speak of the original from the part of that which is material in it: or they speak of the material, according to what underlies the formal: because thus it is original fault or sin.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that the tinder in this formal reason does not remain after baptism, but in the remote matter without form: and in this way the Saints do not speak, when they say that the tinder is original.

To the other it must be said, that there is intensity in the same act according to reason, and this is in the same quality according to habit, and does not vary the species, as in whiteness to the act of separating: and in this way the Saints do not speak. In another way there is intensity with respect to some act varied according to species: just as we say the Angel understands better than we, because he understands in a godlike manner, but we inquisitively and with study: and that is caused by nature according to another species, and more noble than ours: and that varies the species: because it is not properly intensity, but by analogy participation of the same. So it is in the tinder before baptism, and after: because before baptism it has the form of aversion through which it can harm damnably and concupiscentially: but after baptism it agrees only through the natural habit, through which it inclines concupiscentially: but it does not harm to damnation, as Augustine says: and this the Gloss understands which says this.

To the other it must be said, that concupiscence is suffocating and promoting. Suffocating, however, is only according to what extinguishes the fire of good, and precludes the vital spirit of grace: and this is only from what is formal in concupiscence, namely from the lack of due justice. Promoting, however, is that which is the cause of exercise in fighting in temptation: and this remains after baptism: and this is materially the sequel of the original, and not original sin.

To the other objection concerning ignorance and infirmity, it must be said that they are not the matter underlying the original, but rather the penalties following: and this is clear from this that they relate to evil in the reason of diminishing and excusing: but concupiscence relates to it as inclining into it.

To the dictum of Hugh it must be said, that he does not manifest nor define the original through its substantial things, but through the signs of sins following it and remaining in the subject, even after it has passed and is remitted.

Articulus 4 — With Respect To What The Names That Are Attributed To Original Sin Are Distinguished

Upon what are the names, which are attributed to the original, diversified?

Upon what are the names, which are attributed to the original, diversified?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, around the end: Which come from the languor of nature,

Here many names of the original are posited, namely original sin, fomes, concupiscence, languor of nature, law of the members, and tyrant. And it is asked, Upon what are they diversified?

To this it must be said that original sin is named in comparison to the good which it loses, and in comparison to the illicit act, and in comparison to that in which it is. In the first way, it is called original sin. In the second way, it is called in two ways, namely according to that which is the nourishment of the libido of sin, or according to the comparison to the object delighting as now: and in the first way, it is called fomes, because it is the foment of libido. In the second way, concupiscence. In the third way, it is named in two ways, namely according to the force which it inflicts on the intact nature which delights in the law of God, and thus it is called tyrant: and according to that which binds and captivates sensuality to the illicit, and thus it is called law of the members.

M. Objection of some against that which was said above, that all men were in Adam.

To this, however, which we have said, that all men were in Adam, some followers of words object thus, saying: Not all flesh which is propagated from Adam could exist in him at once: because it is of much greater quantity than the body of Adam was. In which neither were there so many atoms as there have descended men from him. Wherefore they assert it is not true that the substance of each one was in the first parent.

N. Response, where it is opened how they were in Adam according to the seminal reason, and how they descended from him, namely by the law of propagation.

To which it can be responded that materially and causally, not formally, it is said that everything which is naturally in human bodies was in the first man, and descended from the first parent by the law of propagation, and in itself was increased and multiplied, with no external substance passing into it, and it will rise again in the future. Indeed, it has nourishment from food: but foods are not converted into human substance, which indeed descends by propagation from Adam. For Adam transmits a small amount of his substance into the bodies of his sons, when he begets them, that is, a small part of the mass of his substance is divided, and from there the body of his son is formed, and by its multiplication without the addition of an external thing it is increased: and from that so augmented something is separated, from which the bodies of posterity are formed: and thus the order of procreation progresses by the law of propagation, up to the end of the human race. Therefore, it is clear to those who understand diligently and clearly, that all were in Adam according to bodies by seminal reason, and descended from him by the law of propagation.

O. By authority and reason it is proven that nothing external is converted into the human substance which is from Adam.

But that nothing external passes into the nature of the human body, the truth signifies in the Gospel saying: "Everything that enters the mouth goes into the stomach, and is cast out into the sewer"[198]. Which also can be shown by reason in this way: A child who dies immediately after birth will rise in that stature which he would have had if he lived up to the age of thirty years, impeded by no defect of the body. Whence, therefore, will that substance which was so small when dead be so great in the resurrection, unless by multiplication in itself? Whence it appears that even if he lived, that substance would be increased not from elsewhere, but in itself: just as the rib from which the woman was made, and just as the Evangelical loaves. We do not deny, however, that foods and humors pass into flesh and blood: but not into the truth of human nature which descends from the first parents, which alone will be in the resurrection: but the remaining flesh into which foods pass will be cast off as superfluous in the resurrection: which, however, coheres by the nourishment of foods and other things.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Exposition of the Text.

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, "M, To this, however, which we have said, in Adam there was," etc.

But concerning this, it has been disputed in the third book of the Sentences, distinction 3; and in another Summa, in the question concerning the truth of human nature: and therefore let those be examined, and let them suffice, because it is not necessary to repeat.

DISTINCTIO XXXI

Divisio Textus

Now it remains to investigate, etc. In this part, the Master determines how that sin is propagated from Adam into all men. And he touches upon four things concerning it: the first of which is that he refutes the error of those who said the soul is from transmission, because they did not see how otherwise it would contract original sin. The second is that he determines how sin dwells in the flesh, there, "For the flesh, on account of sin," etc. In the third, it is asked whether that which is in the flesh is guilt or punishment, there, "Here it is usually asked, whether," etc. In the fourth, the cause of original sin, etc., he objects how the soul is infected in conception, when it is not yet infused, there, "But to this it is opposed," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether A Person Could Infect Nature, Namely, That Adam Corrupted The Whole Nature

Whether the person could infect the nature, namely, that Adam corrupted the whole nature?

A question arises, whether the person can infect the nature, as is suggested here—nature and the powers of nature:

as is suggested here, it is broken:

Master, saying that Adam corrupted the whole nature?

1. For that which is perpetual and existing in one way does not receive transmutation—however, the common nature of men, existing in one way in the past, present, and future, seems to be perpetual and intransmutable: therefore, it seems it cannot receive alteration or corruption from another person.
2. Likewise, the less noble does not act upon the more noble: but the person is ignoble, because corruptible: therefore, it does not act upon the nature by corrupting it.
3. Likewise, if nature is corrupted in something, this is per accidens, and in a certain respect: per accidens, because not per se, but through this or that person: in a certain respect, because only as it is in itself: therefore, when it is separated from that, it will have neither corruption per accidens, nor according to what it had in that: but as it is in another, it is separated from the principle in which it was corrupted: therefore, in another, it is not corrupted, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
The whole nature is there by being, where nothing is outside by being: but nothing by being of human nature was outside the first parents: therefore, the whole was in them: however, it is evident that it communicated singularly in act, because the singular acts only according to nature and the powers of nature: therefore, from the sin, the whole nature was simultaneously corrupted, but whatever is taken from the corrupted is corrupted: therefore, everything that descends by propagation is corrupted, because everything is taken from the corrupted.

Solution. It must be said that, as Anselm says, and the Master suggests here, in the first sin the person corrupted the nature: and then the corrupted nature of the father corrupts the nature of the offspring: and the corrupted nature of the offspring corrupts the person of the offspring and the soul: and thus corruption returns from person to person in a circle, although not according to the thing.

To what is first objected, it must be said that nature does not entirely name the same as perpetual and incorruptible: because nature names the principle of acting and the power, which is to procreate similar from similar: and this is not done by the universal, but rather by the nature of man accepted by being: and since it is the substantial being of the individual, according to this it is corrupted by it: and this is to accept it according to nature and thing: however, according to the abstracting reason, it is perpetual and incorruptible, according to what is universal: and it is well conceded that the reason of the universal accepted does not act, nor suffer, nor generate, nor is generated: but is a simple power of communicability only. Whence the first transcendent reasons are, and concluding nothing of the purpose.

To the other, it must be said that this is true according to what is more noble: but it acts upon it, according to what it communicates to it in being: and the corruption of the less noble in this way redounds in the more noble.

To the other, it must be said that there is a double per accidens, namely, that which is opposed to what is per se in denomination, and thus per accidens it is corrupted in this, because it is corrupted by another. Another is per accidens by the nature of the accident: and thus nature is not per accidens in this, but substantially, and it has substantial being in this: and the corruption of the person substantially in this redounds in the substantial being of nature.

Articulus 2 — Whether Original Sin Is Transmitted To Descendants Not By Propagation But By Lust

Whether original sin is transmitted to descendants, not by propagation, but by lust?

Whether original sin is transmitted to descendants, not by propagation, but by lust?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, C, around the beginning: Now after sin, carnal copulation is not valid, etc.

For from this is implied that word which he will later say, that original sin is transmitted to descendants: not by propagation, but by lust.

However, it seems that this is false:
1. For lust is an improper will: but an improper will is the sin of the parent and not of the offspring: therefore, if from that original sin is caused, original sin is caused by the act of the proximate father, and not by the sole transgression of Adam, which will be disproved below.

1. Likewise, it frequently happens that parents do not have an improper will, but come together with pious intention in hope of offspring: therefore, according to this, then original sin would not be caused in infants.
2. Likewise, if it is said that original sin is caused by lust which is called the itch of concupiscence in intercourse: this does not seem so: because this is only in the parent: but original sin occurs in the offspring: therefore it seems that it is not substantial to the original sin: because what is substantial is not divided from the thing to which it is substantial. But if it is said that it is not substantial, but nevertheless is a cause: then it follows that original sin is caused by the proximate parents, and not by the first: and again it is said by trustworthy sources that by the merit of the devotion of the parents, the itch is separated from the act of marriage: and yet they conceived and begot: therefore according to this, the children did not have original sin.

3. Likewise, the Doctors have said thus far: that if the body of a man were formed by hand or from the foot without intercourse, and the soul were infused, that it would still contract original sin: therefore it seems false that original sin is transmitted by lust and not by propagation.

Solution. In my judgment, there is a threefold lust, namely, actual in the soul, which is an improper will actually or habitually preceding sin. There is also lust, concupiscence suffocating reason in the itch of the flesh in intercourse: and I do not think that any of these causes original sin, as the objections prove. But there is a third, of which it was said above, habitual concupiscence residing in the seed, which corrupts the order of the organs of the body to the soul according to mobility towards good: and this is the cause of original sin according to which original sin is drawn from the flesh, and this is what transmits original sin, and it is not caused except by the first parent and not by others, and it is called the daughter of vice or the corruption of passibility, as we have said.

And through this the solution of all objections is clear: for I indeed concede what is objected: because the flesh corrupted by its corruption does not cause original sin, except when it is in the act of nature, which is the multiplication of individuals under the common species; and if that were done otherwise than by intercourse, unless that actual lust or concupiscence were removed, the soul would always be infected just as now.

However, there are others saying otherwise, namely that there is a pollution of the seed by the lust of intercourse, which lust is said to be of Adam, because it was caused by him: and the seed polluted by that disordered fervor pollutes the soul: and they concede that if man were formed otherwise, he would contract only the corruption of passibility and not of vice.

Articulus 3 — Whether There Is One Original Sin Or Many

Whether there is one original sin, or several?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, H, towards the end: Behold, in iniquities I was conceived, etc.

For from this it seems that there are several original sins, not one: because

1. The Gloss explains this concerning the original. Likewise, on that of Psalm 31:1: Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven: the Gloss says, Original sins.

Likewise, Matthew 18:23 and following, concerning the wicked servant, the Gloss of Rabanus says that even the original sin returns upon him.

1. By reason it also seems the same: because the proneness to all evil, multi...

It is divided according to the division of evil: but evil is of many kinds: therefore, since original sin is a proneness to all evil, it seems that it is in a multiple division.

1. Likewise, it is contrary to all virtues: but one and the same thing is not opposed to many: therefore original sin is not one.
2. Likewise, this seems from the fact that it does not exist in one way in the powers of the soul: because the concupiscible part is said to be corrupted and infected by original sin according to the generative part, but the others are only corrupted.

There is also a question about the meaning of these words, what is meant by saying that one is infected and corrupted, and the other only corrupted?

Solution. It must be said that original sin is only one: and the reason for this is that the soul contracts it, insofar as it is the perfection of the body: but the perfection of the body is according to substance: and therefore it contracts it according to substance: and just as substance is one, so original sin is one: but it is said to be multiple, insofar as it is multiplied to acts, in that it extends itself by spreading in the corruption of the powers: and in this way the authorities are understood to be led: but this is not to be many, except in a certain respect.

To the other, it must be said that original sin has aversion simply: but it has conversion only in potency: and this is the proneness which is not converted, but convertible into good changeably: and therefore from that part it touches the powers, and is multiplied in a certain respect in them.

To the other, it must be said that original sin is not directly opposed to virtues, but actual sin is: but original sin is per se opposed to grace, which regards the essence of the soul, as was previously held, and consequently it is opposed to virtues, and is not multiplied per se, but per accidens.

To the other, it must be said that the reason for that saying can be twofold: one, that it is said to be infected actively, that is, infecting: and then it is plainly true that this is infected, because through it the whole posterity is infected. Another reason is: because none of the powers resists reason so violently as that one, and the delightful movement of it is poured into the soul, so that the whole becomes flesh: and this is a sign that concupiscence is more withered according to that power than according to others: and therefore because of that abundance of corruption it is said to be infected.

I. Objection of some striving to prove that sin is not transmitted from the law of coitus.

But to this it is opposed in this way, In the very conception where it is said that sin is transmitted, flesh is propagated: yet then the soul is not infused according to the physicists, but when the body is already formed. Which Moses also clearly signifies in Exodus, where he speaks of the striking of a pregnant woman: "If," he says, "someone strikes a pregnant woman, and causes a miscarriage, if the offspring is still unformed, he shall be fined with money: but if it is formed, he shall give life for life." But formed is understood as animated with its own soul: and unformed, as not yet having a soul. Therefore, in the very conception when flesh is propagated, the soul is not yet infused. How then is sin transmitted there, since sin cannot be where the soul is not? To which it can be said, because in that conception sin is said to be transmitted: not because original sin is there, but because the flesh there contracts that from which sin arises in the soul when it is infused. And both are called conception, namely when flesh is propagated and receives the form of the human body, and when the soul is infused, which is sometimes also called birth. Hence it is said, "What is born in her." But properly birth is called the bringing forth into the light.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

Then, it is asked concerning what is said there, "But to this it is opposed in this way," etc.

For it seems that this disobedience ought to have been more in reason than in the generative organs, because reason first sinned by willing to be like God.

Likewise, it seems that it should have been in the nutritive part, because it tasted the illicit.

Likewise, in the ear, because it first heard the serpent.

The solution to all such things is that it is not considered whether the sin was first in this member or that, but rather the corruption of nature in the original is considered: and therefore disobedience and lust dominated in the act of propagation, so that disobedience itself is an argument that conception is corrupted by original vice.

DISTINCTIO XXXII

Divisio Textus

Since it was said above that original sin is a vice, etc. In this distinction, the remission of original sin is treated.

And the distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which, it treats the remission of original sin. In the second, however, it presents certain consequent questions, which begins there, "Moreover, it is usually asked, Whether concupiscence which follows, etc." And there are five, as is clear in the Letter there in the order of the chapters.

The first still has two: because first it inquires about remission in the soul; second, about remission in the body, there, "It is usually asked here, Whether even itself, etc."

Articulus 1 — Whether Original Sin Is Blotted Out Totally Or In Part, And In What Sense It Is Said To Pass As To Guilt And To Remain As To Act, And Whether It Returns In The Baptized

Whether original sin is entirely or partially removed? And, in what sense is it said to pass in guilt and remain in act? And: Does it return in the baptized?

There arise, however, four questions concerning the first: of which the first is, Whether original sin is entirely or partially removed by baptism?

The second, Whether the remaining original concupiscence after baptism can be increased or diminished?

The third, How the remaining punishment is said to promote and not suffocate?

The fourth is, Whether it remains equally in all, just as it is equally contracted by all?

To the first, it is objected thus: 1. The merit of Christ's obedience was not of lesser efficacy than the demerit of Adam's disobedience: but through Adam's disobedience, the whole original sin entered concerning guilt and punishment, etc.

1. Likewise, satisfaction ought to correspond to the guilt of sin, but original sin was contracted entirely through an alien act: therefore, it seems that it ought to be entirely resolved through an alien act.
2. Furthermore, the merit of that which could not avail us should not have harmed us, or at least through Christ, we ought to have been entirely liberated.
3. Furthermore, it seems that this is not substantial to baptism: because before baptism, they were cured by various sacrifices, and circumcision, and sometimes by faith alone.

Further inquiry is made about this, What is this statement that the Master says in the Text, that through baptism guilt passes, and remains in act?

1. For original sin does not have an act: because if it had an act, it would not be original but actual: therefore, it seems it cannot remain in act.
2. Furthermore, there is no guilt unless there is some fault: therefore, since that passes before guilt passes, it seems that it ought to be said that guilt passes, and concupiscence remains.
3. Furthermore, it seems false what he says. For above he said that original sin is concupiscence which renders the infant concupiscible, the adult concupiscent; but this in no way passes through baptism: therefore, original sin does not pass in baptism.
4. Likewise, since concupiscence remains after baptism, the cause of the original is still in the body: therefore, it ought to infect the soul again: and thus original sin returns upon him who is baptized.

If you say that grace received in baptism prevents it, Against: Suppose that one falls from grace: then, since concupiscence remains, original sin returns.

If you say that the character prevents it: therefore, since circumcision and sacrifices did not impress a character, then original sin returned, which is false.

Solution. It must be said, as stated above, that there is something material in original sin, and something formal: the material remains in the baptized, but not the formal, namely the lack of due justice: because the justice lost in Adam is not required from the baptized, because he recovered it through the justice of Christ, either through baptism, from which it was instituted, or through sacrifices and faith and circumcision, before baptism was instituted, as was explained at the beginning of the fourth Sentences.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although original sin is caused by the first injustice according to both parts, it is not ordered against the grace of redemption according to both parts, but only according to the formal part: and therefore in that part, the whole is remitted: but in the other part, in which it cooperates with grace for humility and exercise, there the damage would have been removed by baptism. Hence, this is not due to the imperfection of Christ's satisfaction, but rather for our utility, so that we may be cautious and circumspect, lest we fall again.

To the other, it must be said that the whole guilt is removed, but not the punishment. For it is necessary that the punishment of Christ be mixed with our punishments: because just as the evil of the first Adam is continued to us through matter, so it is necessary that the benefit of Christ be continued to us through faith and compassion: and therefore satisfaction cannot be entirely alien, because it is owed by the spirit, and therefore it must be voluntary: but that which depended, did not have to be voluntary. And much has been said about this elsewhere.

To the other, it must be said that it is false concerning merit or justice before sin: because original justice (as Anselm says) would have transfused into us from Adam, just as he transfused original injustice. But concerning justice after sin, it is true: and then it is not to the point: because that did not have to be had except through the faith of the Mediator: and thus it is referred back to the second Adam, not to the first: and therefore he did not have it as origin and fomes, but as infused and originated from him from whose fullness we have all received.

To the other, it must be said that the faith of the Mediator is substantial according to all time, but baptism according to the state in which it is instituted.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that to remain in act is explained in two ways, namely potentially concerning the material part: as we say that this one is actually blind: or in act, that is, by inclination to act, namely by the proneness of concupiscence: and both can be understood, and are understood by different people.

To the other, it must be said that guilt properly regards the act of one's own will: and therefore, although original sin is in the genus of guilt, as was held above, yet it has the notion of guilt more completely than the notion of guilt: and therefore it is said that guilt passes: for guilt is more properly from another than guilt: yet what the objection concludes is true according to the truth of the matter.

To the other, the solution is clear from what was said before: because concupiscence can be considered standing under deformity: and thus he said above that it is original sin. It can also be considered as the material remnant of the original, and thus it remains after baptism: and thus he speaks here.

To the other, it must be said that after baptism it does not remain to harm according to what Augustine says, namely to infect one's own soul: because, as was said above, it never infects unless when it is in the act of nature, because thus it regards the common nature, which is corrupted in Adam: but this act is not propagation, and therefore it does not infect except in that. Hence, there is no question about the body of the baptized: because it is only the material disposition of the body of the person, and does not regard the common nature.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Original Concupiscence Remaining After Baptism Can Be Increased Or Diminished

Whether original concupiscence remaining after baptism can be increased or diminished?

Secondly, it is asked, whether it can be increased or diminished?

1. It seems, however, from many things said in the Text, that it can be increased and diminished according to that which remains after baptism.
2. To these are reasons: For every habit directed to some act is intensified by the frequency of those acts to which it is directed; but concupiscence which remains is a habitual inclination to an illicit act; therefore, it is intensified by the frequency of illicit acts, as it seems.
3. Likewise, a habit is generated and increased from the same source, just as it happens in natural growth and generation; but habitual concupiscence is generated from illicit acts; therefore, if concupiscence is present by corrupted nature, it is increased from the same.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Suppose it is increased: then since it can be increased more, and its state was finite before baptism, concupiscence after baptism will eventually become as intense as it was before baptism; therefore, it will then operate identically; therefore, original guilt returns: and this is false; therefore, it cannot be intensified by subsequent sin.

1. Likewise, a habit left from illicit operations immediately regards the power from which the act proceeds; above, it is said that the material of the original is immediately in the substance of the soul ; therefore, it seems that from the works left, it is not united to that innate habit; therefore, it does not intensify it.
2. Likewise, the innate and that left from operations are not of the same nature; but original concupiscence is innate, while the habit left from operations is actual; therefore, they are not of one nature; therefore, one does not intensify the other, as it seems.

It is further asked, whether it can be diminished?

It seems so: because
1. This is often said in the Text.
2. Likewise, to satisfy, as Ambrose says, is to cut off the roots of sins; but the roots of sins are in the fomes; therefore, the fomes can be cut off; but it is cut off by diminution; therefore, it seems that it can be diminished.

1. Likewise, every habit directed to some act is diminished and weakened by the contrary act; but the fomes is directed to an illicit act; therefore, it is diminished and weakened by contrary operations; but every diminution is according to some alleviation of parts; therefore, by multiplying the diminishing factors, since it is finite, it could be entirely removed, which is denied to be possible in the Text. Nor is there an instance concerning the Blessed Virgin: because this was by miracle, as is disputed below.

Solution. To solve this, it is necessary to distinguish original concupiscence, or fomes, or original inclination, or by whatever other name it is called. For original concupiscence can be considered inasmuch as it is original, namely, according to what is contracted by the law of concupiscence at birth, and thus it is never increased; but it can be diminished by the operation of the sacrament, although not by the operation of the person: because whatever is left from the operation of man is not original, and therefore does not reach the original as original, as the induced reasons prove: and in this way the Saints do not speak of original concupiscence. Or, it can be taken according to what is original concupiscence materially, and not under the notion of original form: and thus it can be taken in two ways: because it either happens universally, and thus it is properly taken according to what is an inclination to all evil: and because beyond all there is nothing, therefore it cannot be intensified as to the object. However, as to illicit fervor, it is also not intensified when considered thus: because habits left from works are particularly directed to this evil or that, and not to all. But in this way, it can be remitted by the operation of the sacrament, and the intensity of the motion becomes less, and not as to the number of those in which it moves: because after baptism it moves towards all illicit things, although not as intensely as before, as will be evident below. It can also be considered particularly diffused concupiscence in the powers of the soul, according to what is determinately moving to this illicit thing or that: and thus nothing prohibits concupiscence from being intensified in my judgment: and thus the Saints speak in the Text: and in every such way, I think it should be said concerning diminution: and in this last way, the first three reasons proceed.

To what is objected against, it is immediately clear that all those reasons proceed, with original concupiscence formally accepted as original in the first way: and therefore the solution is now clear.

To what is objected, whether it can be intensified so much that it causes the original to return, it must be said that never: the reason for which is that there is a twofold cause of the intensity of an act, one of which is founded through all the formal principles ordered to that act: as we say an Angel understands better than a man: and that better and lesser understanding is founded upon different forms by species. In another way, an act is said to be intensified by the approximation of the same form to a greater or lesser term, as white unmixed with black, and whiter more unmixed. I say, therefore, that before baptism concupiscence had the power of infecting from that form which is the lack of due justice in the act of propagation:

but because after baptism that form does not return, therefore concupiscence will never have that act of infecting in one who is baptized: and this is what Augustine says in the Text, that it is not about the intensity by which concupiscence would be intensified so as not to be, but so as not to harm the one dead through baptism, which was inherent in the one born. It is said in the third way, it is upon the same form more and less receding from the good.

By the same reason, the solution to what is objected in the contrary.

To the small question, it must be said that it is diminished, as the Saints seem to say: but it is considered in two ways, namely, in comparison to the subject in which it is or is induced, and it is natural from corrupted nature: and in this way, it cannot be removed, because it always sprouts again: but in comparison to the act, it is infinite, because it is infinitely related to the act of evil: and therefore, however much it is diminished, it is not removed from the whole.

Articulus 3 — How The Remaining Punishment Is Said To Be Promotive

How is the remaining penalty said to be promoting?

Thirdly, it is asked, How is the remaining penalty said to be promoting, when it rather seems to be suffocating?

It is argued thus: 1. Whatever penalty is per se ordered to the illicit is more a cause of evil than of good: but concupiscence is per se inclined to the illicit: therefore it is more a cause of evil than of good. The first is evident per se. The second is proved by this, that it is signified by the Gentiles whom the Lord did not destroy from the face of the children of Israel, who without doubt worshipped the devil.

1. Likewise, whatever motion is prohibited by the Lord is a penalty more suffocating than promoting: but the motion of concupiscence is prohibited by the Lord, when it is said, Thou shalt not covet: therefore concupiscence is a penalty suffocating reason: but this is done by the act of concupiscence, especially in intercourse: therefore it is a suffocating penalty: therefore it seems that it ought to have been entirely removed in baptism, and not left in part.

But on the contrary, although those Gentiles whom the Lord did not wish to exterminate were evil, yet He wished them to remain, that in them He might instruct the children of Israel: therefore neither should concupiscence be entirely exterminated, but in part, that the spirit may be instructed in the fight against it.

Solution. It must be said that it was not useful for the good remaining in the state of this life and mortality not to have concupiscence, with which to fight: and indeed there are many causes of this, but three suffice for the present: namely, the memory of the ancient transgression which aids faith and the knowledge of sin. Second, the exercise of the fight, which aids the increase of merit. Third, the recognition of one's own fragility and humility, which makes one desire eternal life and liberating grace.

To the first objection, it must be said that it is not suffocating which remains after baptism, because it does not suffocate the habit of the life of the spirit, and although it is ordered to the illicit, yet its appetite is under us, and we can dominate it.

To the other, it must be said that the mortal motion of concupiscence is directly prohibited by the Lord: but the venial indirectly falls under the prohibition of sin, and it aids the exercise of the fight.

To the other, it must be said that reason is bound in two ways, namely, so that it is abstracted from the act of contemplation: and this binding does not suffocate, because this is done by delight even in the marriage of the Saints: and again it is bound so that it is abstracted from the habit, and that is suffocating and mortal, and in such power concupiscence does not remain after baptism.

Articulus 4 — Whether Original Sin Affects All Equally

Whether original sin affects all equally?

Fourthly, it is asked whether original sin remains equally in all?

It seems that it does not: because 1. We see one person more incited to illicit acts than another: since therefore the impulse is towards the illicit from the fomes, it seems that original sin does not remain equally in all after baptism with respect to concupiscence.

1. Likewise, natural virtues are not equally in all, about which Job 21:18 says that compassion grew with him from infancy, etc.: therefore, by opposites, neither does the fomes remain equally in all.
2. Likewise, it is held in the text that in the same person it can be intensified and diminished: therefore, it is unequally in the same person; therefore, much more in different persons.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If they die after baptism, they have equal beatitude, as the Master says in the following distinction: and those dying before baptism equally suffer darkness: but equal beatitude and equal punishment presuppose equal original sin: therefore, it seems that original sin is equal in all, and also concupiscence remaining after baptism.

1. Likewise, in each person it remains with respect to the proneness to all evil: but nothing can be added to all: therefore, it seems that on that part there cannot be inequality. On the part of the lack of due justice, there is privation, which also does not admit more and less: therefore, neither on that part can there be inequality: therefore, it is equal in all.
2. Likewise, in one way all are in Adam materially, and through the law of concupiscence: since therefore this is the cause of original sin before baptism, and of concupiscence remaining after baptism, in one way original sin is in all, and in one way concupiscence will remain in all, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that the first distinction was made in the first problem of this reading: and to respond to this is not difficult. For it must be said that if original sin is considered as original, it is equally in all.

Likewise, if concupiscence is considered as it is towards all evil discretively, it is equally in all.

But if it is considered as it is determined to this or that, intensively it is not equally in all, nor always equally and in one way in the same person, but more remiss and more intense: and in this last way considering concupiscence, the first three arguments proceed: but considering original sin and concupiscence in the first way, the arguments proceed in the opposite: and therefore the solution to the whole is clear through this distinction.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Sacrament Of Baptism Works Anything In The Flesh Against Bodily Stench

Whether the sacrament of baptism effects anything in the flesh against bodily corruption?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, C, "It is customary to ask, Whether even the flesh, etc."

However, it seems that the sacrament does not effect anything in the flesh.

1. For a sacrament does not operate except through grace: but grace is not in the flesh as in a subject, but in the soul: therefore it removes nothing of corruption in the flesh.
2. Furthermore, we see that the flesh of the baptized, when generating, transmits original sin: therefore it seems that since it could not transmit except through that corruption, that it itself is not cleansed from corruption.

But on the contrary:

1. Infants are saved in the sacrament of baptism: but it is evident that this is only against the corruption in the concupiscence. Therefore, since the sacrament is the cause of everything of which it is a sign, it is necessary that the corruption on the part of the body be removed.
2. To the same, it is commonly objected: because we see the unbaptized to be bodily corrupt: because bodily corruption is a demonstrative of spiritual impurity: therefore it seems that the corruption of the flesh is removed in baptism.

Solution. It must be said, as I think, that the corruption of the flesh is indeed removed, insofar as it is in the flesh in comparison to the spirit, and it is demonstrative of the impurity of the spirit.

To what is first objected, it must be said that although grace is in the soul, nevertheless through the acts which the soul exercises in the flesh, the flesh contracts a certain sanctity and purity, of which the Apostle says that our bodies are the temple of the Holy Spirit: and thus by participation in sanctity, that carnal corruption is removed.

To the other, it must be said, as Augustine bears through many similar things in the letter: because when the grain is cleansed from the chaff, nevertheless when it is sown, it is born in the chaff: and when the circumcised is freed from the foreskin, nevertheless he begets with foreskin: and this is because the flesh is cleansed in act as it is in this one: but as the seed is cut off in the act of nature, it reverts to the corruption of common nature: and therefore then the potentiality of the first corruption is reduced to act, as has often been proven above.

Articulus 6 — Whether All Souls Are Equal From Creation, And Whether Some Are More Excellent Than Others

Whether all souls are equal from creation, and whether some are more excellent than others?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "That also is not incongruous," etc.

For it seems that there can be no cause of this equality of souls: because God is disposed in one way in creating.

Again, the diversity of corruption is not the cause of the diversity of souls, but rather conversely.

Likewise, they are not diverse from this, because they are from nothing: therefore it seems, since no cause of this diversity is found, that souls are equal from creation.

As was said above concerning Angels, and in another Summa concerning this question, the cause of diversity is the wisdom ordering the created: and although this is disposed in one way to the wise God, nevertheless it does not explain in one reason those things about which it is: and therefore diversity arises. Why, however, it is united to the body, and whether voluntarily or not, has been explained above.

DISTINCTIO XXXIII

Divisio Textus

To the aforementioned, it seems necessary to add, etc. In this last part of this treatise, five things are determined. First, indeed, he objects sophistically by proving that the sins of all preceding are transferred into infants. Second, he shows that this is said by opinion, and that infants contract only the sin of Adam alone, there, D, "But truly in actual sin," In the third, he inquires whether that sin, etc., is the most grievous, which harmed all? there, F, "Here it is usually asked," etc. In the fourth, he inquires whether it was remitted to the first parents, or not? there, H, "If" In the fifth and last, indeed, it is asked, etc., he resolves the authorities first introduced, by which it seemed to be proven that the sins of all preceding are contracted in origin, there, I,

"And although by sins," etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sins Of All Ancestors Are Transmitted To Descendants, Or Only Those Of Antiquity

Whether the sins of all preceding are transmitted to descendants, or only of antiquity?

A doubt arises concerning the first: because it seems that the sins of all preceding are transmitted to infants:

1. For every matter disposed by some disposition is more disposed by a proximate agent than by a remote one which touches only through a medium: but a body severed from the generator is disposed by the disposition of corruption: therefore it is more disposed by the proximate touching than by that which touches only through a medium: but the first parent touches only through a medium, and the proximate by itself: therefore there is more corruption of the proximate parent in the severed body than of the first.

1. Likewise, the generated does not have a relation to the body of Adam, except through the body of the nearest parent: therefore it more properly contracts from the nearest than from the first.
2. Likewise, if the first sin corrupts nature: therefore also the second, and the third: therefore since nature is corrupted by sins, either each corrupts the whole, or not. If so: therefore the later someone is born, the more they contract greater corruption: and thus the proposition is held, that corruption is contracted from the nearest parents. If it does not corrupt the whole: therefore it is necessary to say how much part it corrupts, and what is that to which it does not extend: and this is difficult even for those wishing to imagine.
3. Likewise, when Abraham gave tithes, those who were in his loins were tithed: but they were tithed before they were in his loins by the law of concupiscence, as Augustine says: therefore in his loins they received the original: therefore by the same reason the sons of others: therefore the original is contracted from the nearest.
4. Likewise, concupiscence (as Augustine says) is the cause of original sin: but concupiscence joined to the seed is the concupiscence of the nearest father: therefore it seems that sins are contracted from the nearest parents.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: If the sins of the nearest parents corrupt nature, this is either by the corruption of vice, or by the corruption of passibility. If by vice: therefore the body of the later born ought to burn more in lust than the body of the anciently born: and we frequently see the opposite.

Likewise, the body of the son of saints ought to resist the spirit less than the body of the son of fornicators: and we frequently see the opposite of this too.

But if it contracts greater passibility, this again we see to be false: for we are not more mortal than the first who were subjected to the necessity of death. If it is said that now we live a shorter time than then: this is nothing: because in the time of Moses the days of man were a hundred and twenty years: and we still see some living so long: and according to this men would not live for ten years, and thus the son ought always to live less than the father: and this we do not see: therefore it seems that from the sin of the nearest parents our nature contracts no corruption.

Solution. It must be said that the original is contracted only from the first parent, and through the nearest parents only: and this is because every man who generates, generates only in the oldness of Adam, as is said in the Letter of the preceding distinction, and not in his own sin, because this does not corrupt the nature of human misery, although it corrupts the natural good in the sinner: but the sin of Adam corrupted human nature by the corruption of passibility and vice, and no other sins corrupt nature in this way, but the natural good in the person sinning: and that natural good does nothing for generation: and therefore only the sin of oldness is transmitted.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that reasoning holds in those cases where the nearest mover and disposer moves by its own disposition, and not by the disposition by which it was moved by another anterior. But when it is so, that the nearest moves by the disposition by which it is moved by another only, then it does not hold: because then the first moves more than the nearest: as the Philosopher says about the first mover in the Physics, that without the first mover moving, none of the secondaries move, and not conversely. That it is so is clear from what Augustine says, that all generate in the first oldness.

To the other it must be said that it is true, that the relation of this is not to the body of Adam, except through the nearest parents: but nevertheless it is not contracted through them as through the first source, but through them, as the carnal corruptions of the first.

To the other it must be said that the second and third do not corrupt all this nature which the first corrupts: because it corrupts the matter of the body and the good of nature: but the subsequent sins corrupt only the natural good: the cause of this is because the equality of humor and composition was maintained by the grace of natural innocence, which was taken away by the first sin: and since it cannot be recovered, like lost virginity, therefore no subsequent sin does anything, in my judgment, in that corruption, but only corrupts the good of nature to which it is contrary: and this is the true cause, and they give the example of a wet cloth, which is not wetted more inside, because it is not susceptible of greater infusion: and of a mirror infected by a bloody cloud of menstruation, which is not infected more.

But the reason for this is what was said: because namely sin found the grace of innocence in the subject, which made impassibility and incorruption, which because another sin does not find, it does not act against it, but only against the good of grace and nature, and what it finds in the subject.

To the other it must be said that it is well conceded that in the loins of Abraham the sons descending through intercourse contracted the original: but nevertheless not from the loins of Abraham, as the proper and first source of that corruption.

Through this the solution to the whole is clear. For what is objected, above it is solved, namely how the original is one and many.

Articulus 2 — Whether In Adam's Actual Sin Several Sins Can Be Noted, And For What Reason Original Sin Was Transfused, And Whether, If He Had Sinned By Consent Only, His Body Would Have Been Vitiated

Whether in the actual sin of Adam several sins can be noted? And, by the grace of whom is original sin transmitted? And, whether if he had sinned by consent alone, his body would have been corrupted?

Whether in the actual sin of Adam several sins can be noted? And, by the grace of whom is original sin transmitted? And, whether if he had sinned by consent alone, his body would have been corrupted?

Then it is objected concerning what is said there, D, "But truly in the actual sin of Adam," etc.

For it seems this is false: because 4. Adam sinned only by one sin: therefore in his sin several sins are not noted.

1. Furthermore, according to what Augustine says here, anyone who sins in one way, sins in many: because sin is the death of the soul, and it kills itself.
2. Furthermore, sin is the transgression of divine law and disobedience to heavenly commandments: therefore it is disobedient: and so concerning many other things which can be similarly held.

Furthermore, since many things are enumerated here, it is asked, by the grace of whom is original sin transmitted?

For it seems, by the grace of gluttony: because it infects the body: and in the sin of Adam there was no bodily act except of gluttony alone.

But against this is what the Apostle says to the Romans 5:12, that through disobedience sin entered into the world, and through sin death.

Furthermore, in this commandment it seems the special sin is disobedience: because what was prohibited was only the evil of disobedience: therefore the special sin of Adam was disobedience, as it seems.

But if this is conceded, it is against what was determined above, in which it was proven that pride was the first sin of man, from which all evils of man arose.

Furthermore, it is asked, if Adam had sinned by consent alone, whether his body would have been corrupted, and original sin transmitted to us?

However, it seems not: because 1. In the act of sin the body would not have communicated with the soul: therefore it would have been unjustly acted with the body, if the body had been punished.

1. Furthermore, penance restores the losses of the mind in full, but not of the body: therefore it seems, that if he had sinned mentally in consent, he would have risen again in whole through penance: but this cannot be unless the body remains uncorrupted: therefore through mental consent the body would not have been corrupted.

BUT on the contrary:
Every sin is to adhere to mutable things with the immutable good despised (as Augustine says): therefore it is a perversion from the highest making the lowest, and from the way the end: therefore for punishment the perversion will respond to it: this is, however, that what was subjected to the soul is not subjected to it, just as reason itself is not subjected to God. Since therefore the body ought to be subjected to the soul, the body will not be subjected: but this disobedience is not caused except by the corruption of concupiscence: therefore the body would have been corrupted by every sin whether spiritual or bodily.

Solution. It seems to be said, as above, that in the sin of Adam there are not several sins except materially speaking and by metaphorical adaptation, and how this is, was explained above. Simply, however, it was the appetite for excellence in the perfection of the knowledge of good and evil: and all other things were done to achieve that: and therefore that was the end of the appetite and substance: but other sins were done and intended and joined to it in the perfection of sin, and therefore they are materially.

And through this the solution to the first three is clear.

To the other which is asked, by the grace of whom is the transmission of original sin made?

It must be said, that formally it is transmitted because of pride, but materially because of gluttony: according to some, however, formally because of disobedience, although disobedience was not intended in the sin: because disobedience gave the form of sin to the eating, which otherwise would not have been sin, although it did not give the form of pride, which alone there fulfilled the reason of sin and was the cause of all others.

And through this again the solution to the following three, which proceed above the members of this distinction, is clear.

To the first which is further asked, whether he would have transmitted original sin if he had sinned mortally by consent alone? I think so, as the last objection proves.

But to what is objected, it must be said that immortality and incorruption of the body, whether contracted by the corruption of passibility or by the corruption of vice, falls from the grace of innocence, as we said above, when it was disputed about the mortality of Adam; but to this grace insofar as it was original innocence, the first mortal sin, whatever it was, was contrary, by this that it interrupts the adhesion of the soul with the perpetual source of incorruption, and consequently corruption is caused in the body. But the objection would proceed, if the cause of the incorruption of the body had been in the body alone, or in the body and in the soul separately: now, however, it was in the soul, and the soul itself could contain the body, and with it lost it could not do this: and therefore any sin could corrupt the first state.

To the other it must be said, that penance restores the damages of the mind which are only of the mind: but the grace of innocence, although it was in the mind, yet it was in it as a ruling reason, and it was compared to the body: and therefore the damage incurred by its loss affects the body, which was not reparable by penance. However, there are those who concede, as the objections prove, to say that it would have been erased by penance, or that it would not transmit to us except the corruption of passibility and not of vice: although their saying is very improbable.

Articulus 3 — Whether Adam's Sin Is The Greatest And The Most Punished

Whether the sin of Adam is the greatest,
and most punished?

Whether the sin of Adam is the greatest,
and most punished?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, Here it is usually asked, Whether the sin of Adam, etc.

For it seems that the sin was the greatest: because it is most punished.

Likewise, because it was committed without temptation.

But if it is conceded, on the contrary, it is objected by what is said in the Text, because the greatness of sin is especially considered in the deformity of the act: but many acts were more deformed than the actual sin of Adam.

Solution, There is a manifold comparison of sin, namely in the substance of sin, or in the circumstances. But according to substance, there is a simple comparison, as we say that homicide is a greater sin than theft, and the like.
However, comparison in circumstances is a comparison in a certain respect.

Hence the Doctors have noted here eleven modes, by which one sin can be lighter or graver than another in a certain respect: the first of which is causality:
because it is the cause of many or all sins: and thus the sins of the Angels and the first man surpass others.

The second is generality: because it contains more in itself through material adaptation:
and thus again the sin of Adam surpasses, because Augustine noted more in it.

The third is the multitude of punishments: and thus the sin of the woman surpasses over the sin of the man.

The fourth is greater ingratitude: and thus a saint falling in the same kind of sin sins more than another.

The fifth is danger: and thus ignorance is a graver sin than others, as was held above.

The sixth is inseparability: and then avarice is said to be a graver sin: because as things and age increase, cupidity becomes inseparable.

The seventh is proneness: and thus the sin of incontinence is graver, because it is in the delight contemporaneous with life.

The eighth is persecution or tyranny:
and thus pride is said to be graver: because it arises from its opposite, and after all virtues it rages: as Augustine says, that pride even lies in wait for good works,
so that they perish.

The ninth is the attack on greater grace:
as the sin against the Holy Spirit is said to be great.

The tenth is said by reason of offense: and thus the sin of idolatry is the greatest.

The eleventh is drawn from the Text, and is the ability to resist: and thus one less tempted in the same kind of sin is said to have sinned more, than one more tempted.

And thus through this the solution to the whole is clear:

Articulus 4 — Whether Original Sin Was Remitted In The First Parents

Whether original sin in the first parents was remitted?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, H, If indeed it is inquired, Whether that sin; etc.

And it is inquired here concerning the punishment of the original in the body and in the soul. For if it was remitted, then it seems that every punishment ought to be remitted: because Jerome says, and it was disputed above, that all things which we suffer, our sins have deserved: but this was not done: therefore it was never remitted.

Likewise, In limbo they lacked the vision of God - therefore neither in the soul was it remitted.

Solution. It is not to be disputed here concerning the punishments of the original: because they were touched upon above, and what is its proper punishment, and what is not. But also this which is objected here, was solved in the preceding distinction, where it was shown that the punishment promoting in the body remains: but the punishment of privation with respect to the satisfaction of the person was remitted: but the guilt of nature could not be solved, except through the mediator of God and men, our Lord Jesus Christ, as was proven in the III Sentences, and therefore it was necessary to await the offering of the price in limbo: because all merit has efficacy, and always had from the merit of Christ: and that, held in faith only, cures the person, but in faith and act it cures nature and person, and opens the gate.

DISTINCTIO XXXIV

Divisio Textus

After the aforementioned, concerning actual sin, etc. Here the Master discusses the actual evil into which man has fallen. It is considered in three ways, namely according to substance, and thus he discusses it in the first part. And it is considered according to quantity, and thus he discusses it in the second part, below, in distinction XXXVII, there, A, After the aforementioned. It is also considered concerning the will, etc., according to differences of species and number: and thus he discusses it in the third part, where distinction XLU begins, there, A, When, however, the will is evil, etc.

The first of these is further subdivided into two: because in this distinction he discusses sin in the notion of evil, and in the following he begins to discuss the same according to how it consists in act, and has something of being, namely there, Distinction XXXV, A, After these things it must be seen what it is, etc.

However, the present distinction has three parts: in the first of which it is determined whence evil comes: and in the second, in what evil is, there, D, The origin of evil having been shown, etc. In the third, he objects to certain things, and resolves them, there, H, To this, however, which has been said, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Evil Is Whether evil exists?

Concerning the first, three doubts arise: the first of which is, Whether evil exists? The second, Whether it has an efficient or deficient cause? The third, How it proceeds from an efficient or deficient cause?

To the first, objections can be made through authorities: but since they are copiously introduced by the Master in the following part of this distinction, and in the following distinction, I refrain.

By reason, evil seems to be nothing thus:
1. Good is defined by its end: since therefore evil is opposed to the end, either evil is defined by a contrary end, or by the privation of the good end: however, it cannot be defined by a contrary end, because nothing is contrary to the highest good, since there is nothing supremely evil: therefore it will be defined by the privation of the good end: but privation does not posit or signify being: therefore evil is nothing of beings.

1. Likewise, Dionysius: Evil is nothing. Therefore, since it cannot vary in many ways among beings, neither in an angel, nor in the soul, nor in the whole of nature, evil will not be a being.
2. Likewise, Either evil is said to be per se and substantially evil, or by participation substantially evil, or by privation of good. If in the first way: then something is substantially evil: but what is substantially evil, has nothing of good: therefore that evil has nothing of good: but being is some good, and the good of which the Philosopher says that all desire to be good, and act for its sake, whatever they do: therefore that substantially evil does not have being: therefore it is not evil. But if it is said to be evil by participation. On the contrary: Nothing becomes evil by participation, unless something is per se evil which is participated: therefore nothing is participatively evil. It remains therefore, that evil is said by privation of good: therefore evil is nothing but privation: but privation is nothing: therefore evil is nothing.
3. Likewise, Damascene says that evil is spiritual darkness: but darkness signifies only the absence of light, where light ought to be: therefore neither does evil signify anything but the absence of good, where good ought to be: this however is nothing.
4. Likewise, As it is in the external powers compacted to act and perfection, so it is also in the internal powers: but external powers are not removed from act and end except by privation, as blind, and deaf, and the like: therefore neither are internal powers: but evil signifies the removal of act in the perfection of the end: therefore evil signifies nothing but privation: but privation is nothing: therefore evil is nothing. If you say that an external power is sometimes removed by something that is, like the power of the eyes by skin covering the sight: this is nothing: because there the disposition and perfection of the eye to act is not removed, but is covered and impeded, just as it is not removed by the hand if it is placed over it.

But because all confess this, it is objected to the contrary thus:

1. Evil is nothing: but what is nothing, opposes nothing: therefore evil opposes nothing: but it fights against good, as Dionysius says: therefore evil is actually a being.
2. Likewise, Nothing corrupts something, unless it is actually a being: evil corrupts good: therefore evil is actually a being.
3. Likewise, Evil is first in act, as is said here in the text: but act leaves a habit such as it is: therefore evil is in habit: but act and habit are actually beings: therefore evil is actually a being.
4. Likewise, A stain either signifies something in the soul, or nothing. If nothing: then it is not erased by grace, because nothing is not erased. But if it signifies something, since it itself is evil, evil will be some being.
5. Likewise, The soul is said to be good by participation in good: therefore if evil is the privation of good, from the same it is evil and indifferent, which is false: therefore it must be that it is evil by participation in some being: therefore evil similarly is actually a being.

1. Likewise, If evil is nothing, and men become nothing when they sin, as Augustine says, and it is held in the following distinction: therefore it seems that when God punishes men, He punishes them for nothing: and this is ridiculous: because what is punished for nothing is punished without cause.

According to this, the solution is sought of some saying that there is a twofold being, namely primary and secondary. Primary being is true being. And secondary being is the being of perfection perfecting according to good, of which Boethius says that being is what retains order and preserves nature. They say therefore that evil is non-being according to secondary being, because it deprives of well-being: but it is being according to primary being, because it is preserved in that. But that this is nothing to say, is easily proven thus:

1. Given that evil is the privation of good, evil will not have being except of privation concretely taken: but this neither signifies the being of the subject, nor the being that it deprives: therefore it signifies neither primary being, nor secondary being: therefore it is simply nothing.
2. Likewise, This seems to be proven by similarity: because blindness (as Anselm says) signifies nothing more in the eye than in the stone: but it signifies neither primary being, nor secondary being in the stone: therefore neither in the eye.
3. Likewise, Negation is not said to have being because it does not negate whatever is: but it is said to be nothing because it is nothing of composition or affirmation opposed to it: therefore neither will privation be said to have being according to primary being, because it does not deprive primary being, since that privation which deprives secondary being is not opposed to it: but rather it is said to be nothing at all, because it signifies neither primary nor secondary being.

Solution. To this it seems to be said that evil, in that it is evil, is altogether nothing, neither according to primary being, nor according to secondary being. But that which is materially evil, is something: just as blindness is altogether nothing, although that which is blind is an animal lacking sight. And this is what is said in other words, that the subject of evil, materially speaking, is something: but the form of evil consists in pure privation. And this is because every privation leaves the subject and aptitude or due to the habit, and deprives the habit itself: and evil does not take the intention and reason of evil from the part of the subject which it leaves, but rather from the habit which it deprives: for as the Philosopher says, From the potency of the subject we are not said to be good or evil: According to this, therefore, I concede that evil, in that it is evil, is altogether nothing: just as neither is any privation, in that it is privation, something.

To the first it must be said that to fight is said properly and improperly. If to fight is said properly: then to fight is the same as to act with contrary virtue against the contrary: and then evil does not fight against good except by the virtue of good, as Dionysius says: and this is to be understood thus, that there is particular good, and universal good which is the end of all goods. But universal good which is the end, that has no contrary evil: and therefore nothing opposes it. But there is particular good, which is the form of good in act or habit. But the habit of special virtue is not good substantially, but rather insofar as it joins to the end. So also the habit of vice is not substantially evil, but insofar as it deprives of the end, which is universal good. Therefore privation sustained in act or habit fights against particular good: not as privation, but rather as contrary act or habit: and therefore it fights only by the forces of good: because that insofar as it is, is good: and insofar as it is, is contrary, although privation follows passively: and then to fight against good is to fail good: and this happens by depriving it: and thus every privation fights against habit. But from this it does not follow that thus fighting is actually a being: but that which fights in the first way is actually a being: because thus it is not only privative, but also contrary, having a contrary form to the habit and act of particular good.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that if to corrupt sounds like acting with contrary forces to destitution, then evil and good are improperly taken for their subjects in acts and habits: and thus each is actually a being. But if to corrupt is taken for failing from the destitution of the end, then it is not necessary that the corrupting is actually a being: just as neither is death actually a being, although it corrupts and deprives life.

To the other it must be said that evil is first in act: but act is not the reason of evil, but rather the subject: because insofar as it is, it is good, as will be evident in the following distinction.

To the other it must be said that a stain is said in two ways, namely for the habit of vice, and for the defect of that which ought to be present. In the first way, the stain is not evil as per se, but as the subject of evil: because that habit insofar as it is, is not evil, but insofar as it deprives of good from the lack of the end. In the second way, it is a defect absolutely positing nothing of being, but the disgrace is from the defect of that which ought to be present: as the blind is said to have a stain, not because of the privation of something, but because of the privation of that which ought to be present.

To the other it must be said that the soul is not said to be indifferent from the same from which it is said to be evil: because indifference does not signify the privation of the end, but rather signifies non-conjunction with the end: but evil signifies the corruption and privation of the end.

To the other it must be said that that is a vile objection having little reason. For when it is said, evil is nothing, it is understood not to posit any being, which nevertheless ought to be present. But when it is said, men are punished for evil, it is understood for the privation of the habit of good, which ought to be present. And from this it does not follow that they are punished for nothing, but for something, that is, for the good which ought to be present, and is not present. And therefore for the same men are punished and rewarded, but for the good which they have done and have, they are rewarded: and for the good which they have not done nor have, they are punished. And to speak more openly, when it is said, evil, two things are said - one namely which is the reason of evil, and the other which it leaves in the subject: and when it is said, evil is nothing, the being of evil is denied according to the reason of evil. But when it is said, men are punished for evil, evil signifies the cause of penalty or punishment according to that which it leaves in the subject which is the lack of habit. And from this it does not follow that they are punished for nothing, since it is taken in different ways in the premises, for the sake of the different things it signifies. But it follows: therefore they are punished for the habit which they ought to have, since they have nothing.

Articulus 2 — Whether Evil Has An Efficient Cause Or A Deficient Cause

Whether evil has an efficient or deficient cause?

Secondly, it is asked, whether it has an efficient or deficient cause?

However, it seems that it has a deficient cause: because
1. As Augustine says, efficient causes of evil ought not to be sought, but deficient ones.

1. Likewise, evil (as has already been held) is privation. However, privation does not have an efficient cause, but a deficient one; therefore, evil similarly.
2. Likewise, an efficient cause does not effect except in two ways, namely by influencing the form.

its own, or by eliciting its form from that in which it acts. For example, fire influences its own form in the combustible, and the sun elicits the form of liquefaction in the earth, which is not proper to the sun: therefore, if evil has an efficient cause, it must have a form in one of those ways. However, whatever has a form, is itself absolutely: therefore evil is absolutely. But this is false, as has been proven: therefore evil does not have an efficient cause, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY 1. Everything that is, is either the first cause or caused by the first cause: evil is in act and habit: therefore it is either the first cause or caused by the first cause. However, it is not the first cause: therefore it is caused by some efficient cause.

1. Likewise, a whitener is the efficient cause of white: therefore also an evildoer is the efficient cause of evil: therefore evil has an efficient cause.
2. Likewise, whatever is in the potentiality of something, before it exists, it is necessary that it is in it, as in the potentiality of an efficient or material cause: however, evil is in the potentiality of free will before it comes to be: therefore it is in it as in matter, or in the efficient cause: however, not as in matter: therefore as in the efficient cause: therefore it has an efficient cause.

Solution. To all these it is easy to solve, if what has been previously considered in the preceding problem is held. For if evil is taken materially, that is, what is evil, then evil will be in act and habit. However, that act is considered in two ways, namely in comparison to the object, which is a changeable good: and in the same way, the habit can be considered inasmuch as it inclines towards it: and thus evil is voluntary and intended and caused, and has an efficient cause, as will be proven in the following distinction. However, if evil is considered in that which is evil, or the act or habit inasmuch as it is compared to the formal privation of good: thus evil is not voluntary, and not intended, and not productive, but sluggish, as Dionysius says, and not caused by any efficient cause: but it is a defect arising from the will deflected from changeable good, and thus proceeding into act.

And all this is to be proven in the following distinction, in which it will be asked, Whether every act is from God? According to the first intention of evil, the reasons proceed secondly induced: and according to the second intention of the same, the reasons proceed firstly induced.

Whence the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — How Evil Proceeds From An Efficient Or Deficient Cause

How does evil proceed from an efficient or deficient cause?

Thirdly, it is asked, How does evil proceed from an efficient or deficient cause?

It seems, however, that it is not caused by a deficient cause: because 1. The deficient rather falls from the power of causality than itself is a cause: if therefore the will in that which is deficient is a cause, it rather falls from the power of causing than that it causes something.

1. Likewise, Evil (as has been held) is not in a subject except in the soul, or habit, or act: but as it is in the soul, thus it is caused by an evil act: therefore an evil act is caused by the soul: but nothing deficient acts; therefore an evil act is not caused by a deficient will, but rather by an acting and potent one.
2. Likewise, There is no evil unless there is a conversion to a changeable good by way of enjoying: but to be able to convert, to be able is, and similarly to be able to enjoy a changeable good, to be able is: therefore the cause of sin consists in the potent and acting, and not in the deficient.

Defect (as has been held above) is never from the efficient, because the efficient effects being according to some species, and this is not defect or privation, but Augustine says, and it is placed in the following distinction, that the whole nature of evil is taken from privation of species: therefore it is not caused by free will or will, according to which it is efficient, but according to which it is deficient.

Solution. It must be said to this, that evil is from a deficient will, whether it is taken materially or formally. For if it is taken materially: then it is an act upon an object lacking the form of good from the privation of the end. But if it is taken formally: then it denotes the privation of the reason of good. But if evil were to denote an act in comparison to the object only, then it would be true that it would be from an efficient cause: but this it does not denote according to any sense. And so that it may be more fully understood, let us set forth two examples, one of which is from Augustine, the other is taken from the Philosophers. Augustine's example indeed is, that the walking power is considered perfect and whole, situated in a member in which the leg is turned, and it is considered in the leg itself joined to the thigh or to the knee a bent shin, and the act of walking is considered: for the act of walking is reduced to the walking power as moving and not deficient, but to the shin as deficient in the reception of straight motion from the walking power: and therefore that which is of walking, the whole flows from the walking power, but the reason of limping and defect from the straight falls beyond the intention of the walking power from the curvature of the shin, which curvature is also nothing other than weakness and defect of straightness in the instrument of walking. Let us say therefore, that the walking power in moving is like the divine power generally moving the will and nature: but the will in itself is like an instrument able to fail from the convertibility of nature: the will however turned to a changeable good by consent, is like a deficient and bent instrument, because the direct intention tends upwards, as it is said in the Canticles, 1, 3: The upright love you, where Ambrose says, that to love earthly things is the curvature of the soul. Therefore when the cause of evil is asked, either the cause of evil in potency is asked, or the cause of evil in act. If the cause of evil in potency: then I say, that it is the will able to fail from the convertibility of nature and choice. If the cause of evil in act: I say that it is the will deficient from the first good by deficient conversion to a changeable good so that whatever is the motion of the interior or exterior, proceeds from the moving power of God: but the defect of good falls from the moved will, which is deflected from the order of the first moving power to the end of good, by this that it is converted to that which is under itself or ought to be. Another example is of the informative power in the seed, to which the substance of the seed does not obey: for there a monster is generated, not from the defect of the informative power, but because the substance of the seed fails from the mobility which it receives from the informing power: but the defect from the perfection of form is the defect of the mobility of the seed, from this that it is joined to contrary dispositions. And these two examples almost solve the whole difficulty of this and the following distinction.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that evil has a deficient cause, so that causality is turned back to that evil which is material and being, but defect to the privation of good which causes the reason of evil.

To the other it must be said, that the act is being, and is caused by the will as it is moved by the power of the first mover: but the defect falling around the act is caused by the actual defect of the will, which defect is a deflection from the order of the divine power's motion to the end of good. For from this is caused the privation of the end and good: because if it were moved as God moves, then it would attain the end. What that egress and defect is, will be clear below in the same problem.

To the other it must be said, that conversion to a changeable good is not evil, as Augustine says in the book On Free Will, just as neither is the changeable good itself evil, nor is the fruit of the changeable good evil: but conversion turning away has the reason of evil, and the fruit excluding that which is to be enjoyed is evil: and therefore it is clear, that evil falls by the exclusion of the highest good, because it is impossible for there to be two ends not ordered to each other of one will: and therefore if it is converted to a changeable good as to an end, the incommutable good is necessarily excluded: and this exclusion of the changeable good's defect is in the will, and is the whole reason of evil. And therefore this is of impotence and of the second cause deficient from the order of that motion, by which they are moved by the first cause.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear: because to that which is contrary, we well concede.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Cause And Origin Of The First Sin Was A Good Thing

Whether the cause and origin of the first sin was a good thing?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the Text, chapter B: The cause and origin of the first sin is a good thing, etc.

For this seems false: because
1. Matthew 7:18 says: A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruits, etc. Therefore, the root of the first evil is evil and not good, as it seems.

1. Likewise, it has been held that evil is from a deficient cause: but a deficient cause is only from a good: therefore, it is from a deficiency of good: but a deficiency of good is evil: therefore, the first evil is from an evil, as it seems.
2. Likewise, that defect from which evil arises is either punishment or fault: not punishment, as it seems: therefore, fault: therefore, fault precedes the first fault: for it cannot be said that it is punishment, because punishment is not before the first fault, but after it according to the order of divine justice.
3. Likewise, when it is said, the first evil, it is understood concerning the interior will, which is the act of the instrumental will: but this evil proceeds from the will, which is the instrument: either therefore insofar as the will is moved by God, or insofar as the will is changeable. And in whatever way it is said, it follows that evil is always from the will: because it is never without any of those, which is false: therefore, it seems that it is not from it except insofar as it is evil.

1. Likewise, it has been held that the will actually deficient from good is the first cause of evil: therefore, either that defect is the same as the caused evil, or different. If the same: then the same is the cause and the caused, which cannot be. If different: then it inevitably follows that the first evil is from another evil: because the defect of the will from the first good is evil. But if this is conceded, it is necessary that this goes on to infinity, or there is something supremely evil, which causes all evils, as the Manicheans say. For if before the first evil in act there is evil, it is asked concerning that evil, whether it is the cause or the caused? If the cause: then it will be evil per se: and thus the Manichean speaks truly. If the caused: then it is asked concerning its cause, whether it is good or evil? And it seems that it is evil: because contrary things have contrary causes. Therefore, if the cause of good is good, the cause of evil will be evil: and then it is asked concerning that evil: and it goes on to infinity: or it is necessary that the cause of evil is good: and this seems impossible.

Solution. It must be said that the cause of the first evil of the interior act is a good thing by the goodness of nature, but not by the goodness of an end ordered to grace and virtue: and this thing is the will created from nothing, changeable according to choice to diverse willed things, which are changeable good and unchangeable good, according to what it has chosen.

To the first, therefore, it must be said (as the Master says in the Text) that the Lord speaks there of the actual evil interior will, and calls the fruit the exterior work.

To the other, it must be said that a deficient cause in potentiality is evil, but good by the goodness of nature: but a deficient cause in act is evil: but the defect in act is the same defect which is of the interior will according to act: and therefore one evil does not precede another, because both are one.

To the other, it must be said that that defect is fault, and it is in the act of the interior will: because the substance of that act consists in illicit conversion to a changeable good: and this conversion under such a notion indicates such a defect: but the changeability of the power itself is neither punishment nor fault, but nature which follows it insofar as it is from nothing.

To the other, it must be said that none of those modes is necessary: because evil does not have a necessary cause, but is from the will having the freedom of converting itself and averting: and therefore sometimes it sins, and sometimes it does not sin. And what is objected, that contrary things have contrary causes, does not hold in rational causes, but only in agents acting by necessity of nature.

To the other, it must be said that that defect is the same, because the will actually does not fail except in the act of willing and undue conversion. Nor does it follow, however, that it is not the cause of evil: because it is the deficient cause of evil, that is, from which evil has its notion: and that is conjoined with evil, but it is not efficient, but rather the will is efficient according to itself, and the whole effect is evil according to nature and notion, although not in the same way, as has been said. Hence that defect does not precede evil except by nature, as the notion of something precedes that of which it is the notion, although according to being it is the same.

Articulus 5 — Whether Evil Is In A Good Thing Or A Bad Thing

Whether evil is in a good thing, or a bad thing?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, Having shown the origin of evil, etc.

For it seems impossible to say this in three ways.

For in this which he says, that good is the subject of evil: because according to this, the opposite is the subject of the opposite, which can in no way be: because

1. The Philosopher says that the subject of neither of the opposites is the opposite. If you say that good and evil are not contraries, but opposites, like privation and habit: then it is even more impossible: for a deprived habit is in no way the substrate of the privation which deprives it: therefore good is not the subject of evil.
2. Likewise, Good and evil are opposed: therefore either the whole evil is opposed to the whole good, or to a part of the good. If to the whole good: therefore nothing of the good remains with that which is subjected to evil. If to a part of the good: therefore since nothing is good unless it is opposed to evil, not the whole good is good, but only that part which is opposed to evil, which is false: therefore nothing remains of the good which is subjected to evil, as it seems.
3. Likewise, Nothing is the subject of something unless it is naturally disposed to receive it: good is the subject of evil: therefore it is naturally disposed to receive it. Let it receive, therefore: then good will be evil, and the opposite will be proved from the opposite, which according to every kind of opposites is impossible, although it is said in the Letter Z, and conceded.

According to what he says, it is that evil takes away good: and this also seems impossible: because since good is finite, there can be so many evils that they would consume the whole good: and what has nothing of good is non-being: therefore evils can be multiplied in something so that it would become non-being. If you say that good has the property of the continuous which is divisible into infinity: and the first evil takes away some part of the good, and the second does not take away as much, but some part of the remainder, and so on to infinity. And then the question is, What is the reason, since the second evil finds the good weaker than the first, yet the second takes away less from the quantity than the first? And no reason can be found, even by one willing to feign.

Moreover, In the Letter it is not solved thus by Augustine: but that this happens because the good itself is natural. And then the question is the reason for this, How is it that good is not finished because it is natural?

The third thing he says is that in these contraries the rule of the Dialecticians fails: and it seems Augustine read the rules of the Dialecticians poorly: because good and evil are not contraries according to him, but opposites, like privation and habit.

Moreover, Even if it is granted that they are opposed as privation and habit, still it can in no way be held that evil is in the same good which it deprives: because no intellect grasps this: because the deprived is not: but the subject of privation and evil is simply. Therefore Augustine seems to say this poorly.

Solution. It must be said to this that there is a threefold evil, and a threefold good: and because good is said as a habit from which privation is known, good must first be distinguished: and from that the distinction of evil is obtained. Therefore, good is said to be grace, and good which is substantially converted with being, and the middle good which is the ordainability of rational nature to grace. The first good is in grace and the virtue making pleasing. The second follows every nature insofar as it is nature. The third, however, is especially of the nature which is capable of grace: because that capacity has a natural relation by which it is ordered to grace: and this is called by the Doctors and Saints the natural good divisible by sin. Hence that middle good between grace and nature is considered in two ways, as every middle, namely on the part of the substance in which it is rooted, and on the part of the end which it attains, namely grace. I say therefore that evil is also said in three ways according to Dionysius: because the evil of nature is against the nature of that thing of which it is the nature: and the evil of fault is against grace: and the evil of reason or soul is against the natural good, which is the natural ordainability to grace.

I say therefore to the first of those three objections, that the evil of fault of which he speaks here is opposed to the whole good of grace, and therefore it wholly deprives it, so that nothing remains of it with evil: but the same evil of fault is in no way opposed to the substantial good which is converted with any being insofar as it is, and therefore in no way deprives or takes it away: but it is opposed to the middle good in that part in which it relates to grace, and not in that in which it relates to the substance in which it is rooted: and therefore in that part in which it is opposed to it, it deprives it, and is not preserved with it: but in the other part in which it is not opposed to it, it becomes its subject, as a subject can have privation, because from that part it is left by privation: and therefore it happens that the middle follows the nature of the extremes: and therefore in that part in which it attains grace to which the evil of fault is opposed, evil is opposed to it, and in that part in which it is rooted in the substance to which it is not opposed, it is left by evil, as a subject by privation. Therefore it must be said to the first that it is not according to the same reason that it is subject and opposite, as is clear from what has been said.

To the other it must be said that evil is opposed to the whole good of grace, and therefore it deprives it, but to no part of the substantial good, and therefore it deprives nothing of this:

but it is opposed to the middle good according to something, and in this respect it deprives: and according to something it is not opposed, and therefore in this respect it does not deprive.

To the other it must be said that in the Letter it is conceded that evil is good: but it is not the same predicate and opposite: because the good which is opposed to evil is the good of grace or nature, which is the middle from that part in which it attains the good of grace. But what is predicated of evil is the good which is converted with being, or the middle good according to that which is rooted in the rational substance: and therefore there is no opposition according to the thing, but according to the name alone.

To what is objected secondly, it must be said that that solution is feigned, and well disproved: but the cause is what Augustine posits in the Letter: namely that from that part from which it is rooted in the substance, it is natural as the substance: and therefore since evil is not opposed nor deprives from that part, it is infinitely related to good: and therefore although it is always removed, yet it is not taken away that the potency of good remains through the help of grace: but if it were infinitely related to the good of grace, then the objection would proceed.

To what is objected thirdly, it must be said that contraries are said in two ways, namely properly, and broadly. Properly taking contraries, thus they are forms contrary ordered to one subject: and thus each of the contraries is a being in a perfect species: and in this way evil and good are not contraries. Broadly, however, they are contraries which are principles of contrary acts and habits: and in this way complete good and evil are contraries: because a complete will is the cause of a good act through the form of grace and virtue, and a diminished will which is subject to sin cannot of itself, but can in the act of vice and habit of virtue. And in this way Augustine takes contraries here, and in this respect he speaks truly: and therefore the rule of the Dialecticians does not simply fail here: and therefore some gloss that it does not fail, but seems to fail: and it is not Augustine's opinion according to the thing, but which makes one seek the true understanding of the rule.

DISTINCTIO XXXV

Divisio Textus

After these things, it must be seen what sin is, etc. Here he begins to discuss sin. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he touches on what sin is definitively and really. In the second, however, he determines whether sin has the nature of punishment or not, in distinction XXXVI, there, A, It must be known, etc. In the third, he inquires whether the acts of sins are from God or not, in distinction XXXVII, there, A, There are also many others, etc.

The present reading, however, contains four arts: in the first of which the Master gives three definitions of sin. In the second, he presents the reasons for different opinions on what sin is according to reality and substance, there, B, Therefore of diversity. In the third, he touches on the reasons of those who say every sin, insofar as it is, is from God, and he objects against them and resolves, there, D, Some. In the fourth, however, he diligently inquires, Since sin is the corruption of good, whether it corrupts good insofar as it is, or insofar as it is an act, or insofar as it is sin, there, K, It can also be asked by the same, Since sin, etc.

And through this the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether Sin Is Definable, And Whether Mortal And Actual Sin Can Be Defined By One Definition

Whether sin is definable? and,
Whether mortal and actual can be defined by one definition?

Whether sin is definable? and,
Whether mortal and actual can be defined by one definition?

A threefold doubt arises according to the Letter, namely, whether sin is definable?

And, whether the reasons which the Master touches upon are applicable to every sin?

And thirdly, concerning the definitions which he posits.

To the FIRST, it is proceeded thus:
For it seems that sin is not definable.

1. For whatever, according to the common name assigned to it, is not reducible to any one proximate genus of cause, cannot be defined by any cause: sin is of this sort: therefore, it cannot be defined by any genus of cause. The first is evident from this, that every definition is given through some cause. The second is proven by this, that sins have no form, but rather a privation of form, just as species.
2. Similarly, since it has no matter except that around which, and that is not of one reason in sins, they cannot be defined by it: nor by the efficient cause, because there is no efficient cause of sin, but a deficient one: nor by the end, because every sin is sin because it deprives of the end: therefore, in no way does sin seem definable.
3. Likewise, whatever is definable, with this definition posited, constitutes something and is perfect in the order of the universe: but sin is none of these: therefore, sin is not definable at least by a positive definition. The first is proven by this, that all parts of a positive definition constitute something in the defined. The second by this, that although sin is ordered, yet that order is in another, and not in sin, and it is an extrinsic order by which someone uses evil well for another: because sin deprives of the substantial and intrinsic order of a thing, as was said before the end of the first book of the Sentences, in the question concerning the order of evil.
4. If you say that sin, like evil, is a privation, and can be defined as a privation. Against this is that at least it is not definable by a positive and affirmative definition, as the Master here defines.

On the contrary, however, is what is held in the Letter.

Furthermore, every sin, as the Master will say below, has an act concerning a determined object: such an act is definable by the object: therefore, sin is definable.

Solution. It must be said that mortal and actual sin, as the Master says, can be defined by one common definition. Whether every sin can be defined by one definition will be clear in the following problem.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that by the efficient cause and matter, actual and mortal sin can be positively defined: for although it has a deficient cause in comparison to the form of circumstances and the end of good, inasmuch as it is sin, yet it has a cause operating from intention, inasmuch as the act is compared to the object: and how this is, was explained above in the preceding distinction.

To what is objected concerning matter, that it is not of one reason, it must be said that matter is considered in two ways, namely in itself as it is a certain thing, and thus it is true that it is not of one reason. It is also considered as it is bent to the will, and thus it takes on the reason of the end of the will and of the willed or desired. Through these two causes, although the act of sin is defined, yet sin is not sufficiently defined unless something is posited in the definition that implies the privation of the end and the corruption of circumstances, as is evident in the definitions posited in the Letter.

To the other, it must be said that in sin it is necessary to posit something implying defect, such as disobedience to commands, or being against the law of God, or what justice forbids, or the like: and for this reason it falls into the reason of the perfect and good order of that which is substantial to the thing: but by reason of the act it can be defined, as has been held.

To the other, it must be said that although these words, against the law, or what justice forbids, are said positively, yet they signify privations, as has been held: and therefore the definitions given in the Letter have privations in them, in which the reason of sin is completed, although not the reason of the act.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Reasons Which The Master Touches Upon Agree To Every Sin, So That By Those Reasons Every Sin Is Defined

Whether the reasons which the Master touches upon are suitable to every sin, such that by those reasons every sin is defined?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether every sin is defined by those reasons which he sets forth in the Text?

However, it seems that it is so:

4. Whatever things divide something common are defined by one given reason according to that common name which they divide: original, venial, and actual divide sin taken in common; therefore, the definition given in common concerning sin is suitable to them.

1. Likewise, the definition of the genus is applicable to the species: but the species of sin are original, venial, and mortal: therefore, the definition given concerning the genus is suitable to them.

2. Furthermore, every sin takes away good, as it is said in the Text: and similarly every sin is voluntary, even original, as Augustine says, and it has been held above in the Text: therefore, every sin agrees in the efficient and deficient cause: since therefore by those two causes it is chiefly defined, it seems that every sin can be defined in one common definition.

But against this is that
1. That which is the privation of good takes away in good the good of grace, and diminishes the good of nature: but venial does not take away the good of grace, nor does it even interrupt the good of nature, because as it has been held above, the good of nature is not diminished except according to the order in good: therefore, the corruption of good does not agree with venial.

1. Likewise, original is a necessary sin, as it has been held above: but that which is voluntary is not necessary: therefore, original does not agree with...

venial and mortal in the efficient cause: therefore it cannot be defined together with them by that.

Solution. It must be said that there is not one definition by which in common those kinds of sins, namely original, venial, and mortal, can be defined, as the last two arguments prove.

Therefore, it must be said to the first that this is true of those dividing a common genus: but original, venial, and mortal do not divide sin as species divide a genus, but as prior and posterior participants of it: just as potency and act divide being, for potency adds no positive difference to being, but adds to it a mode by which it is divided against act, against which being is not divided: but act divides by a constitutive difference, and therefore participates according to perfection. And so also when sin is divided by venial, mortal, and original, venial does not add anything over sin that is of the essence of sin, because the minimum in which the notion of sin is preserved is venial: but original adds something: but what it adds is not of the essence of sin, but rather contributes to the diminution of sin, for it adds a trait from nature and from necessity, and diminishes sin. Mortal, however, adds that which perfects the essence of sin, in the way that sin can be said to be perfected: and therefore it is clear that although these three divide sin, they do not participate in its essence in the same way.

To the other it must be said that they are not species of sin: because venial cannot be sin or evil unless because it disposes to sin by taking away not the good of grace or nature, but rather the good of fervor in the act of devotion or good work, or the good of rooting in the subject: and so it is clear that that argument does not proceed.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Definitions Of Sin Which The Master Posits In The Text Are Well Assigned

Whether the definitions of sin which the Master places in the Text are well assigned?

Thirdly, it is asked concerning the definitions placed in the Text, and first concerning this, that sin is a word, or deed, or desire against the law of God.

1. However, original sin is not a word or deed or desire against the law of God: therefore it is not sin, which is false.
2. Likewise, the sin of omission is not a deed: therefore it is not sin. And these two objections lie in the Text.
3. Likewise, venial sin is not against the law of God: because whatever is against the law of God is mortal sin: therefore venial sin is not sin, which is false.
4. Likewise, if there were no law of God, there would still be sin: therefore it is badly defined by being against the law of God.
5. Likewise, some things are evil because they are prohibited, like the eating from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil: but some things are prohibited because they are evil, and those are truly evil: therefore it is not the reason of sin that it is against the law of God, and rather the law prohibits it because it is sin: therefore sin is badly defined by being against the law of God.

It is objected, however, against the second definition of sin; because

1. There are some sins in which one does not wish to obtain or retain anything, but rather to destroy, such as hatred, anger, and envy: therefore sin is badly defined by those.
2. Likewise, particular sins are contrary to particular virtues: therefore not every sin is prohibited by justice, but also by other virtues.

It is objected, however, concerning the third which is of Ambrose, namely, Sin is the transgression of the divine law, and disobedience to heavenly commandments.

1. For sin is not a transgression unless a law is set, as the Apostle seems to want: but before the law was set, there was sin: therefore it is accidental to it that it is a transgression: and thus it is badly defined by transgression.
2. Likewise, not every virtue is obedience: therefore not every vice or sin is disobedience: therefore it is badly said to be disobedience to heavenly commandments.

There are moreover other definitions of sin, such as that of Augustine: Sin is an act arising from the defect of good.

And against this it is also objected:

For every sin is from a determined purpose: but a determined purpose is a determined cause: and what is from a determined cause does not arise: therefore sin does not arise: therefore sin is not an arising act.

Likewise, if it is said to arise from the defect of good, it is asked, From the defect of which good does it arise? If you say from the defect of uncreated good: then it seems that every act of nature is sin. The same follows if it arises from the defect of the good of grace. But if it is said to arise from the defect of the good end, it seems that every sin is indifferent, since it does not have an end, and yet it is done.

There are also other definitions of sin, such as that which Augustine places, that sin is to adhere to mutable things, with the immutable good despised.

Likewise, Augustine: Sin is to desire what Christ despised, or to flee what Christ endured.

Likewise, Augustine: Sin is the corruption of mode, species, and order. Likewise, Sin is the merit of punishment.

Therefore it is asked, By what is the difference of these definitions taken?

Likewise, since there is evil, fault, sin, stain, vice, and guilt, by what do these differ?

Solution. It must be said that, as the Master says in the Text, in these definitions only mortal sin is defined, which alone is simply sin.

However, those three definitions which are in the Text are taken according to a threefold consideration of sin, so that the first is taken according to the substance of sin by comparison to deformity, which, I say, the substance is subject to deformity: for it is a word or deed, etc. And deformity is implied by what is said, against the law of God.

The second, however, is taken by the efficient cause of sin by comparison to the reason of deformity: for the will is the cause of retaining or obtaining, etc., is of every sin. The prohibition of justice is the reason of deformity.

The third is taken according to the contrariety to the law regulating us in good life: for this is the divine law, and heavenly commandments.

The fourth definition of Augustine is given concerning sin, according to which it has the reason of evil, because thus it is not intention, but it arises, as was held above from the defect of good.

The fifth, however, is taken by the aversion from the highest good, and undue conversion to a changeable good. This namely, With the immutable good despised, etc., so that to despise is said generally for what is to not wish to adhere, and to adhere says the adhesion of fruition.

The sixth, however, is taken by the defect of the exemplar regulating us in life: for Christ gave us an example, that as he did, so also we should do.

The seventh is taken according to the effect of sin in the good of nature.

The eighth is taken by comparison of sin to guilt.

To that which is objected against the first, it must be said that here original is not defined according to the Master. Or otherwise it must be said that there is original originating, and this is actual sin: Adam, and of that the said definitions hold: and there is original originated, and this is considered in two ways, namely in itself, and thus the said definitions do not hold: and in its first cause, and thus it is a word or deed, not what is proper, but what is alien, because of the first parent. Thus also it was held above, that it is voluntary by a remote will, and not proximate.

To the other it must be said that according to the more probable opinion of the Doctors, there is no sin of omission which does not have some act, as is also said in the Text. For to omit that about which there is never thought, nor will, is pure privation, and does not say something which is from us. Hence omission is done in two ways, namely when in the time of omission the will is of the contrary, as in the time of necessity not helping the miserable, one does not wish to help, and to will not to help says an act of will, and for the sake of this it is made a desired sin against the law of God. Although this opinion is more celebrated, yet there are others who say that word is taken commonly and deed, etc., to word and not word according to the law, and to deed and not deed according to the law. The second way is when before the time of fulfilling the command one wills something, which cannot stand with the fulfillment of the command: as he who is bound to rise for Matins, before the time of rising wills to intoxicate himself or to watch excessively disorderly, with which will the fulfillment of the duty, namely that he rises for Matins, cannot be.

If, however, it is asked about this, Why is it called omission, since every sin according to this is some omission? It must be said that it is therefore called omission, because it omits the act which is in the precept, although by another act it commits.

To the other it must be said that venial is not sin simply: because sin is predicated by prior and posterior of venial and mortal, as was held before: but venial is properly beside the law, and a disposition to that which is contrary to the law, and thus indirectly against the law of God.

To the other it must be said that the law of God is taken commonly to the interior and exterior law: and just as the straight is before the curved, because it is the judge of itself and the oblique, because by the straight we know it, as the Philosopher says, and the oblique: so the law of God thus commonly taken, is according to reason before the judgment of every curved act, and thus according to reason before sin: and every sin is sin by this that it disagrees from it, and in this way it is understood what is placed in the three definitions: and thus it is plain that every evil is evil by this that it is against the law of God thus taken, since the reason of malice is discordance to the rectitude of the law.

And in this way those objections cease which are made about this, that some things are prohibited because they are evil: and some are evil because they are prohibited.

To that which is objected about the second definition, it must be said that all those placed, as will be clear in the following definition, proceed from the will of obtaining something: and thus they destroy the alien, so that they may obtain or retain their own: and thus of those also the definition holds.

To the other it must be said that justice is said here generally for the whole order of rectitude which is contained in the natural and written law, and it is not placed for a special virtue, nor even is it placed for the general virtue which is called general justice, but rather for the rule of life contained in the natural and written law.

To that which is objected about the third, it must be said that law is taken commonly, as was held, and thus to be a transgression is not sin, but is rather the reason of sin: and therefore it is well defined by transgression.

To the other it must be said that obedience is taken in two ways, namely for a special virtue, and this is the will of fulfilling the command, because it is a command, and of that obedience and disobedience the objection holds. Otherwise obedience is said generally the fulfillment of that which is commanded, not because it is commanded, and thus every virtue fulfills the command and falls under obedience in the general sense, and to this is opposed disobedience generally taken which is every sin: and this is nothing other than the non-fulfillment of the command which is done in every sin, and thus it is taken in the definition of Ambrose.

To that which is objected about the fourth, it must be said that that definition is given of sin according to the reason of evil, and of that it was proved above, that it is not by will or purpose, nor does it have a cause, but rather it arises from the defect of the first good, from which it is deflected in the act of sin, according to which sin has a deficient cause, as was shown above.

And that which is objected is of no value: because nature is not deflected deflectibly from the first good, although by the act of will it is not always converted: for to be deflected is to go out from the order which is the principle of the first mover continuously to the end, which is the same as the first, as was said above.

By this the solution concerning the arising is clear.

The remaining definitions are explained at the beginning of the reading of this problem.

To the last it must be said that sin more regards the act, evil however the deformity, and fault the contrariety to grace, stain however the infection of the image, vice however the depravity of the natural, and guilt says the obligation to punishment.

Articulus 4 — Whether Only An Evil Will Is Sin And Not Exterior Acts, Or Will And Exterior Acts Together, And Whether It Should Be Said That All Acts Are Good And Have God As Author

Whether an evil will alone is sin and not external acts, or will and external acts together? And, whether it should be said that all acts are good and from God as author?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, "Wherefore of this diversity," etc.

For it is asked, What is the reason for the diversity of these opinions?

And to this it must be said that the first opinion determines concerning sin according to the cause of sin: and because this is the first actual interior will, therefore it said that will alone is sin.

But the second considered sin or evil according to the nature of the subject, and on the part of the act: and because malice is founded both in the interior act and the exterior, therefore they said that both interior acts and exterior acts are sin.

But the third opinion considered evil according to the nature of evil or sin: and because that entirely consists in privation, therefore they say that sin is altogether nothing.

Articulus 5 — Whether Evil Altogether Can Consume Natural Good

Can an evil man entirely consume natural good?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, around the beginning: "But nothing is evil," as Augustine says on John, etc.

For the sake of this, two things remain to be inquired about evil, namely,

Whether it can entirely consume natural good?

And, Whether evil is diminishable in that which is evil?

TO THE FIRST, the procedure is as follows:

1. Everything that is consumed according to a part proportionate to the whole, if the consuming thing is multiplied, will be consumed in whole: natural good is consumed by evil: if therefore evil is multiplied, natural good will be consumed in whole.
2. Likewise, in Jeremiah 2:16, it is read: "The children of Memphis and Tahpanhes have broken your crown": but the crown is the highest point: therefore they have led to the height of evil: but the height of evil has nothing of good: therefore natural good can be consumed in whole.

To this, some of the ancients wished to say that natural good is diminished, just as a continuum is divided: for if a continuum is divided according to parts proportionate to the whole, the division stands and the continuum is finished, as the Philosopher says. But if it is divided according to parts having the nature of the whole, since the continuum is always divisible, the division will never stand, because none of the divisions divides the form of the continuum from the matter of the continuum. Thus they say that the first sin takes away some part of natural good, and the second not as much by equality, but divides from the remainder some part, as the first, and divides the remainder in the nature of the whole. Hence if the first diminishes by a hundredth, the second diminishes by a hundredth of the remainder, and so on.

But against this it is objected:

1. Since in the second sin natural good is perhaps less strong to resist than in the first, and the second sin is equal to the first, then an agent acting equally on a less strong thing acts less, and on a more strong thing acts more, which is against reason.
2. Likewise, let us suppose that the second, and third, and so on sins are greater than the first: either therefore they take away more in quantity from natural good, or less. If more: then necessarily natural good would be finished, which Augustine denies can happen. If less: then a stronger agent in a weaker resistant does less than a weaker agent in a stronger resistant, which again is against reason.

Solution. According to what has been said above, it must be said that natural good is never finished: and yet I well concede that a greater sin takes away more, and a lesser takes away less: and the cause of this was touched upon above, because on that part where it is the subject, it is not contrary. But on the other part where it relates to act and to good, it is corrupted by evil, and is contrary to it: but on that part, the potentiality is infinite, although it is finite according to being, as was said above: and I well concede that no solution is posited in opposing. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether Malice Is Diminishable And Intensifiable

Whether malice is diminishable and intensifiable?

Whether malice is diminishable and intensifiable?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether malice is diminishable?

It seems that it is so: because one is said to be less good than another: therefore, by similarity, one is said to be less evil than another: therefore malice is diminishable.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The opposite of malice is grace: and this is not diminishable: therefore neither is malice.

1. Likewise, Malice has no contrary except grace: and this does not diminish it, but removes it entirely: therefore it is not diminishable.
2. Likewise, Malice is a privation: and privations are neither increased nor diminished: therefore neither is malice.

Solution. Malice is taken in two ways, namely according to the subject in which it is substantiated: and this is an act, or habit, or disposition left from a habit: and from that part it can be intensified, and not diminished: and this is because it is in us to commit sin, and to induce an evil habit, but it is not in us to remove it from the soul, or to diminish it when it is induced, but it is removed by grace and not diminished: however, the remnants can grow and decrease. It can also be considered from the part of deformity which is a privation, and thus it is neither diminished nor increased: and as to the first, the first objection proceeds, and the two objections secondly made proceed. The last, however, proceeds according to the second consideration of malice.

And therefore the solution to the whole is clear through this.

Articulus 7 — Whether Every Act Is From God, Both Good And Evil

Whether every act is from God, both good and evil?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, Some, however, diligently attending, etc.

And this is a famous question, Whether every act is from God? And although the other part pertains to distinction XXXVII, yet so that it may be better elucidated, both parts will be disputed here.

It is proposed for this opinion thus:
1. Giving alms can be done well or badly in itself: therefore it is indifferent, or good in kind. But everything that is good, whether in kind or otherwise, is from God. Therefore, let this circumstance be added which is giving alms for vain glory: then it is a sin: therefore if then the act is not from God, the same act in number can be from God, and can not be from God, which is impossible.

1. Likewise, Matter is one in number under privation and form: therefore that which is the cause of it according to the substance by which it underlies the form, is also the cause of it according to the same substance by which it underlies privation: but the act to the form of good and privation, relates as the substance of matter to form and privation: therefore that which is the cause of the act when it underlies the form of good, is also the cause of the act when it underlies privation and malice: therefore every act is from one cause which is God.
2. Likewise, The same act can be done well and badly: if therefore when it is done badly, it is substantially acted by another principle than God: and when it is done well, it is substantially acted by God: therefore the same by substance is substantially acted by God, and is not acted by God, which is impossible.
3. Likewise, Good and evil action agree in the kind of action: therefore it is necessary that they agree in some one thing which causes that action: but this is none other than God: therefore every good and evil action is from God.
4. Likewise, Dionysius wishes that evil is only in good: if therefore there is evil in action, the action will necessarily be good: but every good is from God: therefore the action which underlies malice in sin, is from God.
5. Likewise, Whatever is the cause of the cause, is the cause of the caused: but God is the cause of free will or the will: but the will is the cause of evil action: therefore God is the cause of the action which is evil.

6. Likewise, Every one effect which is commonly found in diverse things, is necessarily reduced to one kind of cause of those diverse things, because one is not caused except by one: but entity is an effect found in good and evil action and many others, and is one effect; therefore it is necessary that it be reduced to one cause with respect to all those in which it is found. But it is evident that in others it is reduced to the first being, as to a cause: therefore also in these it is reduced to the same cause.

7. Likewise, It is evident that the will is the cause of evil action: therefore let the action itself be considered according to substance, namely the conversion of the will to a changeable good: this action thus considered, either proceeds from the will according to which it is a deficient cause, or according to which it is an efficient cause. But it is evident that not according to which it is a deficient cause, because thus nothing except deficient proceeds. Therefore either the will itself is the first cause of this act which has being through the substance of the act terminated to the matter of changeable good: or it is the substantial cause of sin, with the first moving it. If in the first way: therefore the will would be the first cause of some being: because the first is, before which there is nothing else, and this is heretical. But if in the second way: since before the will in the order of cause there is nothing except the first cause, that act according to substance proceeds from the first cause, and thus again it returns, that every action is from God.

8. Likewise, Let it be granted that that will is the cause of the act. Therefore since it does not make it from matter, it is necessary that it brings it forth from nothing: therefore the will is able to create something, which is absurd.

9. Likewise, By examples previously introduced concerning evil, the same is proven: for although sin sometimes falls on the part from the iniquity of matter, yet whatever form is induced in a monster, the whole flows from the informative power: therefore similarly although the defect of malice falls in the act of the will, yet whatever entity it has, the whole is from the first cause moving all. The same is proven by the motion of the sun, which moves natural powers, around whose works multiple defects occur: and yet whatever is there of information, the whole is from the power of the sun not erring.

10. Likewise, Concerning limping: for whatever is there of walking, the whole is from the power moving the shin without error: but the deviation from the straight, is caused by the curvature of the shin, which is nothing, just as the curvature of the shin is not something: therefore similarly thus it is in God moving free will in the act of evil.

11. Likewise, This is taken from the words of Anselm. For he says that it is audacity to say something is a being which is not from the first being. Therefore it seems that the other opinion is presumption, or heresy.

12. Likewise, Anselm in the book on Foreknowledge and Free Will: Every quality and every action and whatever has essence, is from God, from whom is all justice, and no injustice. Therefore he makes all things which are done by just or unjust will, that is, good works and evil. Indeed in good things he makes that they are, and that they are good: but in evil things he makes that they are, but not that they are evil. Therefore evil action in what it has of being, is from God.

13. Likewise, Anselm, in the same place, Also the willing itself which is sometimes just, sometimes unjust, is nothing other than using the power of willing and the will, which God gives, inasmuch as it is, it is good, and is from God: which then indeed, when rightly it is good and just: but when not rightly, this alone because it is not rightly, it is evil and unjust. This is taken, that evil is nothing but privation: and the substance of the act in what it is, is good and from God. It is also taken from the act of Caiaphas who in truth with evil intention was exercised, and yet is said to have prophesied by the Holy Spirit: and this could not be, unless the action were from God.

But it is objected against for the other part: because
1. On that of the Apostle to the Romans, iii, 5: But if our iniquity commends the justice of God, Fulgentius says, God is the avenger of that thing of which he is not the author. But this thing is nothing other than evil action: therefore evil action is not from God.

1. Likewise, On that of Paul, I to the Corinthians, viii, 4: An idol is nothing in the world, the Gloss says that God created the matter, but the foolishness of men gave the form. If therefore the form of the idol can be from man without God, also evil action can be from man without God.
2. Likewise, Whatever God does, he wills to be done: but God makes the act of fornication: therefore he wills the act of fornication to be done: which is absurd, because he does not punish anyone for doing what he wills, but rather rewards him.
3. Likewise, Whatever God does, is good: but he makes the act of fornication: therefore it is good: which is absurd and heretical, as it seems: since Augustine says, that the act of fornication cannot be done well.
4. Likewise, He does good who moves the power to good: if therefore he also moves the power in evil act, he equally operates good and evil: therefore one will not be rewarded, and the other condemned.
5. Likewise, The one aiding in theft and supplying strength, and he who steals, are blameworthy: but cooperating and containing powers and moving them, is aiding in evil since it is evil. Therefore since God thus operates, it will seem to someone that he is equally made blameworthy as the one doing evil, which is absurd.
6. Likewise, An act is not caused except as it is in act, and not as it is in kind or in intellect: but in act it is only as it is subjected to malice therefore it is not caused by anything except as it is subjected to malice. If therefore it is caused by God, it will be caused as it is subjected to malice: but this is false: therefore evil act is not from God.

Sorvutio. The ancients concerning this question, as is clear in the Letter, opined in two ways. For some said that the will by itself suffices for an evil act, but not for a good or indifferent act. And they said that from this it does not follow that there are two principles:

because the will by itself performs an evil act, yet it is not from itself. However, in that which is the first principle, it is required that it be from itself, and act from itself. Their stronger reasoning was that an evil act is not performed except according to what it is: but existing in kind or without malice, it is only in potency and according to the intellect: therefore it is not performed in this way. However, an evil act is actually conjoined with malice: therefore it is performed according to what it is conjoined with malice: but in this way it is not performed by God: therefore an evil act is not from God. And this opinion prevailed among many of the ancients.

But because the moderns saw that it is more perfect to act than to be, they saw that what is not from itself, nor can remain in being from itself, much less can act from itself: and since an evil act according to conversion to matter is simply an act proceeding from a perfect active potency according to nature, therefore they concluded that it does not proceed from it except according to what it is moved by the first cause: otherwise it would follow that there are two principles: and this is the reason why the other opinion almost withdrew from the court, and by many of the moderns is considered heretical. Therefore, sustaining this opinion, it must be resolved to the objections in order.

To the first, it must be said that an evil act is referred to an efficient principle in two ways, namely concretely with malice, and thus it is referred only to the will which is the efficient and deficient principle, but further it is not referred to God: and thus it is not a thing, and in this way Fulgentius speaks. In another way, it is referred to the efficient principle according to what it has of being, and in this way it is referred to God as the efficient principle.

To another, it must be said that there is the form of art in an idol, and there is the form of opinion, which is only in the foolishness of men, like the form of the deity believed in Asclepius, and this is not in reality, like a chimera or tragelaphus: and this is not a thing, and of this the Gloss speaks: and therefore it does not follow that there is any thing which is not from God.

To another, it must be said that there is the will of the sign which is operation: and in this way God wills the act to be done, but not an evil act, as is clear from the aforesaid. There is also the will of good pleasure: and in this way God does not will an evil act to be done, nor does He will it not to be done, as is clear from the disputes on the end of the first.

To another, it must be said that whatever is actually good, is by the nature of the act, but it is not good by the goodness of morals, which is from the relation to the end.

But if it is objected that it is of the will to refer the act to an evil end, and to refer is to do something: and since that relation is not from God: therefore some act is not from God. It must be said that this relation is only in the habit of relatives, and on the part of the act it is being and from God: but on the part of the end it is privation, just as the evil end: and therefore because it does not have a good end, on that part it is privation, and according to this it is evil.

To the next, it must be said that as is clear from the words of Anselm introduced above, God operates differently in good and in evil: because in good things there is the perfection of the substance of the act and the moral form, and therefore He makes both there: but in evil things only one, because the moral form is lacking in them.

To another, it must be said that that reasoning holds in those things which cooperate with each other by way of counsel and consent of the will: but God cooperates with the will in this way: but rather the nature of the will depends on Him, just as the second depends on the first causing and containing, and moving: and in such an order the defect arises from the second, and is not reduced to the first, as is clear from the three examples introduced above in objecting, which need not be repeated except universally, that one is about the sun and complexional heat, and another about the informative power in the seed, and the third about the moving power of the bent leg in walking.

To another, it must be said that matter is considered in two ways, namely as it is, and thus it is matter in act. In another way, matter is considered without any form, and thus it is only in potency. So also the act subsisting in privation, is in act, and is caused according to its being by which it subsists, by God: but considered under privation, it is only in potency, and in this way it is not caused.

Articulus 8 — On The Various Definitions Of Evil

On the various definitions of evil.

On the various definitions of evil.

Then it is inquired about what he says there, K, It can also be asked by the same, Since sin is, etc.

For here the question arises, what is evil?

And the Master says here, that it is the privation of mode, species, and order, and in solving the objection he says, that it is an active privation: from this, however, it is taken that evil acts.

But against this is the fact that evil is privation: but privation does nothing, therefore evil does not act.

But because Dionysius says that evil acts by the power of good, and fights against good by the power of good, and this was treated above in the preceding distinction, therefore we will present other definitions of evil, and we will assign according to what they are taken. The response to the objection about this definition is above.

Augustine says in the book On Free Will, that evil is aversion from the immutable good.

The same, in the book On the City of God, Evil is to use good badly.

The same, in the book of Eighty-Three Questions, Evil is the privation of good.

The same, in the book On the Nature of Good, Evil is the corruption of species, mode, and order.

The same, in the book On the Trinity, Evil is to use what should be enjoyed, and to enjoy what should be used.

The same, in the book On True Religion, Evil is the lack of immutable goods, which should be enjoyed.

Damascene also says that evil is from that which is according to nature, into that which is beyond nature, a voluntary conversion.

The same, Evil is the darkness of the intelligible.

Basil, however, says that evil is a disposition of the soul contrary to virtue.

It is asked, According to what are these definitions of evil taken?

And it must be said, that the first speaks of the defect of the first mover towards good, and this is God.

The second, however, speaks of the defect of the form which is grace, in the act of conversion to a changeable good.

The third indeed speaks of the defect of the end informing the act.

The fourth, however, speaks of the privation consequent in the good of nature.

The fifth indeed speaks of the perversity of the work compared to the end, and to that which is for the end.

The sixth, however, speaks of the defect of the end which ought to be intended in every work.

The seventh, which is of Damascene, speaks of the defect of the conjoined mover, who moves to good by nature.

The eighth, however, speaks of the defect of the light governing the intellect.

The ninth, which is of Basil, speaks of evil as it is left from an evil act in disposing the soul through the habit of vice.

Moreover, Anselm gives one, which is, Evil is the absence of good, where it ought to be, and this touches the relation under the being: of the subject in which evil can be, in that privations seek around the subjects in which they are.

And let these suffice for the reading.

DISTINCTIO XXXVI

Articulus 4 — Whether The First Motions Proceed From The Necessity Of The Fomes

Whether the first motions proceed from the necessity of the fomes?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the first motions, which Augustine says proceed from the necessity of the fomes.

And it seems the contrary: because
1. What is not voluntary is not an actual and personal sin: but what is necessary is not voluntary: therefore it seems that such are not sins.

1. Likewise, Jerome says that anathema be upon him who says that man cannot avoid sin.

Solution. To this it has been solved above, in Distinction XXXII, the question concerning the first motions.

And here Augustine takes "necessary" in two ways: namely, for the necessity of difficulty, and for the necessity of inevitability. And in the first way, it refers to mortal sins: because after sin, it is difficult to resist mortal sins. It also refers to singular venial motions, which are also difficult to resist through grace. But if it is taken for the necessity of inevitability, then it refers to the first motions universally taken together: because it is impossible to prevent all at once by a will contrary to all, so that none arise. And a similar example is given by the Masters of someone who is attacked by many from the front and back, right and left, above and below: for he can receive each singular blow on the shield, but cannot guard against all at once. And in this respect indeed, it is remitted, and cannot be over penalty. Insofar as the appetite follows the concupiscence of the fomes, they are not penalties, but sins.

Articulus 5 — Whether Anger, Envy, And The Like, Are Punishments Of The Sinner

Whether anger, envy, and the like, are the penalties of the sinner?

Whether anger, envy, and the like, are the penalties of sins?

Fifthly, it is asked concerning the fifth chapter, whether anger, and envy, and the like, are the penalties of sins?

It seems, however, that they are: because they are defined by penalty. For anger is the fervor of blood around the heart from the evaporation of bile. Envy, however, is pain in the prosperity of goods or neighbors. Therefore, it seems that they are passions, and not sins.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
By passions as they are passions, we neither merit nor demerit. If therefore such sins are essentially passions, we neither merit nor demerit by them, which is absurd.

Solution. It must be said that passions are considered in two ways, namely as inflicted: and thus they are not the principle of meriting. They are also considered as received by the will, or caused by the will loving something inordinately or ordinately: and thus they are merits and demerits: and thus it is in those sins which cause penalties which are in them by inordinate love of one's own good: and therefore they are not penalties, insofar as they are sins, except materially: but rather they are perverse wills, which because they do not achieve their effect, therefore they are punished and waste away by themselves: as envy is a will impeding another's good from inordinate love of one's own: and because it does not impede, it wastes away, and so with others.

Articulus 6 — What Is The Good In Genus, And Whether The Good In Genus Can Become Evil In Genus

What is the good in general? and, Can a good man in general become evil in general?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said at the end of the distinction, there, K, They also add that some are good not only in essence, but also in kind, etc.

And two things are inquired here, namely, what is the good in general? And, Whether to the good in general, there always corresponds the good in species.

To the FIRST, it proceeds thus: 1. In the text, the Master says that the good in general is, as to refresh the hungry: but to refresh the hungry is to refresh what ought to be refreshed: therefore, the good in general is said to be an act proportioned to the due matter: and therefore some define the good in general as an act upon due matter. But against this is what the Master here says, that this is of the kind of works of mercy: but a work of mercy is a work of virtue in species: therefore, the same is the good in general as the work of virtue in species: and this is said by no one.

1. Likewise, other ancients said that the good in general is what can be done well and badly: but this again does not seem fitting: because to preach, to pray, to teach, to give alms, to know oneself, can be done well and badly: yet each of these signifies an act clothed with circumstances, which does not make the good in general. For a genus is what is predicated of many differing in species: and this way the genus is not taken here: because it is not predicated of many.
2. Likewise, a genus is said to be the principle of generation: which way again it is not taken, because the good in general does not generate the good clothed with circumstances or specified.

Likewise, a genus is also said to be the first subject: which way again it does not seem to be taken here: because an act upon due matter is not first, but rather the act in itself seems to be first.

1. Likewise, a special due is considered by justice: if therefore an act upon due matter is the good in general, it seems that every good in general should be referred to justice, which is false.
2. Likewise, it seems that the good in general is the good of virtue: because comparing virtue to virtue, we say charity in general is better than temperance in general: therefore, it seems that such virtues and vices are good and evil in general: which yet no one says.

3. Likewise, it is inquired, By what goodness in general is it good? since it (as the Masters say) can be done well and badly, it seems that it ought to be called evil in general as much as good in general.

Likewise, it is inquired, Whether the good in general can become evil in general?

It seems that it can: because contraries are naturally made around the same: therefore, the good in general can become evil in general.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: An act proportioned to due matter cannot be unless proportionally: since therefore this is the goodness of the good in general, it cannot become evil in general.

But it is inquired, Why this which is good...

whether in the genus, it cannot become evil in the genus, and yet in the species? For since the species is more perfect than its genus, its goodness ought to be more inseparable from itself than the goodness of the genus from itself.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that good in the genus is said metaphorically with respect to the genus which is the first subject and first potentiality: but this in morals is the act of the will compared to the matter about which it ought to be according to its nature, as to refresh concerning the hungry, and to give concerning the needy, and so with others. And the ancients intend to say the same when they define good in the genus, saying that it can be done well and badly: because the first potentiality in some genus is determinable to either of the contrary outcomes through differences ordered to the potentiality of the subject.

To what is first objected, it must be said that the Master intends to say that it is specified concerning works of mercy by circumstances, but considered according to itself and without circumstances.

To another it must be said, that when the ancients say that it can be done well and badly, the term "can" couples the potentiality of the subject: but the objection proceeds as if it coupled the second potentiality, which is in circumstances other than the end; and therefore the coupling is predicated of the term "can," and a fallacy of figure of speech occurs.

To another it must be said, that the genus is taken for the subject of the first potentiality ordered to the complete form in morals.

And to the objection against this it must be said, that the act according to itself does not place potentiality in morals, but is effected outside morals: and therefore it is not first in the genus, but outside the genus: and this is not inquired here. However, it has a similarity with the predicable genus in some respect. For in the predicable genus there are two things, namely that which is said of many differing in species, and this is power: and in this respect it does not agree. There is also that which is the subject or substance around which the difference is placed, and thus it is substantially in the species: and in this respect it has similarity: because good in the genus is substantially in good in the species, as will be shown below. However, the genus which is the principle of generation also has two things. One is that it acts the species: and in this it does not agree with good in the genus. The other is that it remains in the species through division: and in this respect it agrees in some way.

To another it must be said, that there is a debt of law, and this is of justice: and there is a debt of the proportion of the nature of the act to the matter in morals, taken, and this is of good in the genus.

To the objection it must be said, that that objection proceeds as if the genus is said here to be a general form: and this is not true. And that objection equivocates in the genus.

To another it must be said, that good in the genus is said to be good by the goodness of proportion, which further is potential to the good of circumstance: just as matter inclined to form, not having it, is said to be good by analogy to the form to which it is proportioned: and this is incomplete goodness, because it is founded in privation, yet with order to good.

To another it must be said, that good in the genus cannot become evil in the genus, just as matter cannot become evil, although the composite can become evil: and this is because the proportion of matter is substantial, but the form is not substantial to it, but separable: and therefore the first goodness is inseparable, and the second is not: and this is not because matter is more perfect than the composite (whence the objection does not place the cause for the cause) but from the reason already stated.

Concerning this and the following article, more things have been diligently sought in another summa in the question of good in the genus, in the treatise on virtues and good.

Divisio Textus

It must be known, however, that certain sins are such, etc. Moreover, a division is introduced under the opinion previously held by way of disputation. For it is asked from this opinion, Whether sin, insofar as it is a punishment, is from God, or whether the act of sin is from God? and, If by way of punishment it is from God? and, Whether every sin is a punishment insofar as it is sin?

This distinction, however, is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows how sin takes on the nature of punishment. In the second, however, he presents the summary of this opinion, there, K, Satés diligently, etc.

The first is further subdivided into two: in the first of which he shows that sin is a punishment. In the second, however, he resolves a certain contradiction which seems to be between Augustine and Jerome, there, H, However, diligently, etc.

In the first he does four things. First, he proves that every sin is a punishment. In the second chapter he asks, Whether insofar as it is sin, or not? and determines that it is not, there, B, And therefore rightly it is asked, etc. In the third chapter he asks, Whether one sin is the punishment of another? there, C, #¢ In the fourth, from this sense, etc., he tends specifically in certain sins, that they are punishment: and this in two ways: because first concerning original sin in the concupiscence, there, F, That however certain sins. Secondly in certain acts which are defined by punishment, such as anger, envy, and the like, there, G, Furthermore, by no means doubting, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Sin Is Essentially Punishment

Whether sin is essentially punishment?

Whether sin is essentially punishment?

According to the order of these, we will also inquire five things. First, concerning the first chapter, Whether sin is essentially punishment?

Second, on account of the second, Whether punishment is essentially joined to every sin, and in how many ways?

Third, on account of the third, Whether one sin is the punishment of another, and in how many ways?

Fourth, we will inquire, Whether first movements are punishments? And it seems Augustine says that they are the punishment of original sin.

Fifth, on account of the fifth, we will inquire, Whether envy, wrath, sloth, and the like, are substantially punishments.

And we will briefly touch upon this: because one solution in any of these solves the whole.

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Punishment is essentially caused by sin: but cause and effect are never the same: therefore sin is never potentially punishment.

1. Likewise, Whatever things are such that one is prior to the other in time, one of them is not essentially the other: but sin is the merit of punishment, and merit precedes that of which it is the merit: therefore it precedes punishment: therefore sin is not punishment.
2. Likewise, Every punishment is just and good: but no sin is just and good and from God: therefore no punishment is essentially sin: therefore conversely it is simply true, no sin is essentially punishment.

BUT on the contrary is what
1. Augustine says in the book of Confessions: You have commanded, Lord, and it is so, that every disordered movement is sin and is punishment to itself: therefore it is punishment to itself: but nothing is punishment to itself unless it is substantially punishment: therefore sin is substantially punishment.

1. Likewise, Sin is substantially evil: and evil is substantially the privation of species, mode, and order: therefore, sin is substantially punishment.
2. Likewise, Sin is substantially aversion from the immutable good: but this is the punishment of loss: therefore sin is substantially the punishment of loss. This is also supported by what is in the text.

Solution. Without prejudice, speaking it seems to me, that sin is not substantially the punishment of sin, as the Master also says in the text.

To the first objection, it must be said that sin, as sin, is not punishment: because as sin, it is an act proceeding from free will: but punishment substantially accompanies it, that is, disorder in the kingdom of the soul, where the ruler becomes ruled, and the mistress becomes a servant: and thus Augustine speaks.

To the other, it must be said that sin is formally evil, and evil is the privation of active good, as the Master said above: and therefore in the construction, the equivocation of sin occurs, because the privation of passive good is taken, whereas in the premises it was taken actively.

To the other, it must be said that it is passive aversion: and this follows sin as an effect follows a cause, not indeed in time, but in nature and cause: because it is not true that sin always precedes punishment in time. There is also active aversion, when the will turns away in action: and this is essentially sin, and not punishment.

Articulus 2 — Whether To Every Sin Punishment Is Essentially Conjoined

Whether to every sin punishment is essentially conjoined?

Secondly, it is asked, whether to every sin punishment is essentially conjoined?

And it seems that it is so: because
1. Given the cause, the effect is posited: but the cause of punishment is sin, therefore with sin posited, punishment would necessarily be induced.

1. Likewise, Gregory: No adversity will harm, therefore it seems by contrary sense, if no iniquity dominates, that all adversity is from the dominion of iniquity.
2. Likewise, Psalm 103:3: Who forgives all your iniquities, who heals all your infirmities. For from this, as Augustine says, it is understood that there is no infirmity except from iniquity.
3. Likewise, Jerome: Whatever we suffer, our sins have deserved.

But on the contrary: Punishment is found without sin: therefore sin can also be found without punishment. The first is proven in Christ, and in Job who says, I have not sinned, and in bitterness, etc., and in the man born blind, of whom the Lord says: Neither has this man sinned, nor his parents.

Solution. It must be said that punishment is essentially conjoined to sin as a cause, as the first objections prove: and punishment is at least fourfold, of which two are punishments of loss, one namely in the loss of the immutable good which inhabits the Saints. Another is in the deprivation of gratuitous gifts, through which God inhabits the Saints. The third is the corruption of natural good, about which much has been discussed above. The fourth is the disorder of powers in the kingdom of the soul: because the higher serve, and the lower dominate. Besides these, there are others not so perceived, such as greater power of the demon, and impotence of rising from evil, and defect towards good, and inclination to evil, and darkening of the light in the intellect towards good, and infinite others, so that it is true what is said, that he who offends in one loses many goods.

Therefore, to what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it is of no value: because punishment is not bound to sin, as conversely, and that punishment is satisfactory for sin both in the members and in the head: and therefore inflicted upon us sometimes by the mercy of God, and upon the head, so that through it satisfaction may be made.

Articulus 3 — Whether One Sin Is The Punishment Of Another

Whether one sin is the punishment of another?

Thirdly, it is asked whether one sin is the punishment of another?

It seems, however, that it is so.

1. By many things which are introduced in the text of the first and third chapters, which it is not expedient to bring back here again.
2. The same is proved by reason: for the subsequent act is caused by the preceding habit: since therefore the preceding sin leaves a habit in the soul, it seems that every subsequent sin is caused by the preceding: but it is the same for a sin to be caused by a sin as for a sin to be the punishment of a sin, as it is said in the text.
3. Likewise, it seems that any subsequent sin is the punishment of any preceding sin: because the preceding universally deprives one of the goods that help to stand: but that which deprives one of the goods that help to stand universally disposes one to fall: therefore any sin disposes and inclines one to the fall of any sin.

But on the contrary, it seems that

1. Disposition and habit do not incline except to an act similar to that from which that disposition or habit was left: therefore they do not incline to any sin, but to a similar sin.
2. Furthermore, it seems that no sin is the cause of another. For since God is a just judge, He punishes equal sins equally. Let it be supposed, therefore, that the first sin and the hundredth are equal sins: therefore they are punished equally: but the hundredth is not punished except by the punishment of eternal fire, assuming that it is the last: therefore neither is the first sin: therefore it is not punished by subsequent sins: therefore the subsequent sins are not its punishment.
3. Likewise, a just judge among humans does not punish one theft so that another is committed: therefore much less does the heavenly judge, who hates iniquity, do this: therefore one sin is not punished by another sin.

Solution. It must be said that one sin is the punishment of another sin in three ways: the first of which is taken from the part of the deprivation of gratuitous gifts and the uncreated good and the corruption of the good of nature, which contain in good and give virtue from the part of conversion to a changeable good: because from that part the act of sin leaves a disposition to another sin in the soul; and this in two ways, namely to a similar sin in species, as gluttony to gluttony, and lust to lust, and so on for others: or another in species, to the act of which the first causes a proneness, as gluttony to lust, because the belly heated with wine, as Jerome says, easily foams into lust. The third way is when someone deprives himself of the governance of reason through one sin, and afterwards falls into another, as if a drunkard kills. And through this the solution to the first objection is clear.

To the penultimate and last, it must be said that the first punishment of mortal sin is eternal fire: and with this God punishes: but other punishments are accidental, and not per se: and they can also happen to one sin because it is prior, and not to another because it is posterior.

How all these punishments are from God will be determined at the end of the following distinction, where the Master makes a special chapter about this.

Articulus 7 — Whether To The Good In Genus There Corresponds The Good In Species

Whether to the good in general corresponds the good in species?

Whether to the good in general corresponds the good in species?

Secondly, it is asked whether to the good in general corresponds the good in species always?

It seems that it does: because
1. Genus and species are correlatives: and where one is, the other is necessarily presupposed.

On the contrary: The good in general can be done well and badly: therefore, the good in general can be the substrate of evil in species.

1. Further, it seems for the sake of what is said in the Text: because a good act is essentially and generically good as matter proportioned to form through inclination, but not sufficiently adapted through dispositions: and therefore, just as such matter, with contraries overcoming the disposition, can be under another form than that to which it was first proportioned, so also the good in general can be subjected to evil in species.

There are, however, those who say that the good in general is always subjected to the good in species, and evil to evil, and that it is adapted through circumstances. And this is not well said: because in certain acts it is never possible to take the due matter without circumstances, just as in those in which there is nothing to direct without circumstances, such as to copulate, to kill, and the like: and in which the due circumstance is implied in the act and matter, as to love God. However, in some it can be separated, and clothed with both good and bad circumstances, as to give to the needy, and to refresh the hungry, and in similar cases.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that to the good in general corresponds a species necessarily supposed to it, but some which is referred to it.

To the same it must be said, that species is said here metaphorically in relation to the property of species which is abundant in genus: thus indeed: the specified and determined good in morals abounds in circumstances from the good in general.

To the last it must be said, that the good by essence is the same good which is convertible with being insofar as it is, and adds nothing over being except relation to the end.

However, the good in general is said in two ways, namely by the proportion of act to due matter, or from the general form, as is clear from the aforesaid. But the absolute good simply is the good which is perfect according to the form of good from circumstances and end.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXXVII

Divisio Textus

There are, however, also many others, etc. Here he touches upon the opinion of others concerning the acts of sins, saying that they are not caused by God, but by free will. And it has two parts: in the first of which he pursues this opinion in four chapters. In the second, however, he says that it is the concordant opinion of all that every punishment is from God, there, "E, Since therefore all agree in this," etc:

In the first part, he proceeds thus. In the first chapter, he explains the opinion. In the second, he responds to the words of Augustine introduced for the first opinion. In the third, he shows that there is something which is not from God. In the fourth, he presents an objection against punishment.

Articulus 1 — Whether Sin, Insofar As It Is Sin, Is From God

Whether sin, insofar as it is sin, is from God?

Regarding this part, two questions remain to be asked, namely, Whether sin, insofar as it is sin, is from God? and, Whether sin is some thing, on account of those things which are determined in the third and fourth chapter.

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. In natural causes it is thus, that absence and presence cause opposites, as the sun by its presence illuminates, and by its absence darkens: therefore the same can be said of the spiritual sun: but sin is spiritual darkness: therefore sin, insofar as it is sin, can be said to be from God.

1. Likewise, it is proven by what the Philosopher says, that the presence of the governor is the cause of the safety of the ship, but his absence is the cause of its peril.
2. Likewise, what is the cause of the cause, is the cause of the caused: but God is the cause of the will from which sin is, insofar as it is sin: therefore He is the cause of sin.

3. Likewise, this is held from certain authorities. On Romans 5:19, on that, "By the disobedience of one," etc., the Gloss says: The work of the work of God passes through sin is the work of the work of God: the work of God: therefore it passes through the work of God: and nothing is in the work that is not in the cause of the work in some way, therefore sin is in God as in the cause.

4. Likewise, on Romans 1:26, it is said: "God gave them up to vile passions": but these are sins: therefore He was the cause of sin.

5. Likewise, 1 Kings 22:20 and 22: "Who will deceive Ahab?" And He responded to the lying spirit: "You will deceive, and you will prevail." Therefore He made the lying spirit lie: therefore He was the cause of the lie, as it seems: and by the same reason He was the cause of other sins.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Augustine: Far be it that God is the cause of evil, either per se or per accidens.

1. Likewise, sin has no cause except a deficient one, as is clear from the above: but God cannot fail in any good: therefore He cannot be a deficient cause of anything: and sin, insofar as it is sin, has only a deficient cause: therefore God cannot be the cause of sin.

2. To this also the Masters commonly object: because it is better that from which evil cannot be, than that from which it can be: but God is better than can be thought: therefore iniquity or evil cannot be from Him.

3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 5:3, on that, "Absent in body, but present in spirit": the Gloss says, Every carnal will is from the devil: therefore not from God.

4. Likewise, on Romans 1:27, on that, "They burned in their desires," the Gloss says, These are not from God.

Solution. It is easy to solve this, if the things previously discussed are recalled to memory: because an act under deformity conjointly cannot be referred to God as to a cause, nor even deformity according to itself: but the act in itself can be from Him, as was proven above by reason, and shown by examples.

To the first and second, therefore, it must be said that it is not similar concerning natural causes: because they are present and absent, but God is always able and prepared to give grace: and therefore nothing evil happens by His absence: and this is also noted above at the end of the first book.

To the other, it must be said that sin, which is the work of the work of God, passes through the work of God: yet it cannot be referred to God, just as limping cannot be referred to the moving power of the leg. But what is objected, that nothing is in the work that is not in the cause of the work, it must be said that this is true of those things which are simply so: but defect and failing are well in the second, so that they do not return to the first, and thus sin occurs insofar as it is sin.

To the other, it must be said that God gave them up not by imparting malice, but by not infusing grace to the opposite: and of this non-infusion of grace He is not the cause, but the sinner turning away from the influx of grace, as has been often said above.

To the other, it must be said that that is understood concerning the permission of power, and not concerning the work or command of lying: and it was just and good.

Articulus 2 — Whether Sin Is A Thing, Or A Nature, Or A Substance

Whether sin is a thing, or nature, or substance?

Secondly, it is asked whether sin is a thing, or nature, or substance, because the whole intention of the third and fourth chapter revolves around this.

However, it seems that it is not: because
1. "Without it nothing was made," says Augustine, that is, sin.

1. Likewise, it is held in the Letter that it is not a foundation.
2. Likewise, in 1 Corinthians 8:4, it is said that an idol is.
3. Likewise, in the Gloss there, that the form of an idol is nothing: but an idol is the apparent sweetness of sin: therefore sin is nothing, as it seems.

But on the contrary: Fulgentius says, God is not the author of that thing of which He is the avenger.

Likewise, Wisdom 12:11, "The seed was cursed from the beginning": the Gloss says, from which they were in foreknowledge, there was in them some quality: and this is a thing: therefore sin is a thing.

To this also the Master objects at the beginning of the fourth chapter.

Solution. All this is solved by the distinction of thing, nature, and substance.

For a thing can be said to be as if an entity established by form: and thus what lacks form is not a thing, like privation, and sin insofar as it is sin. A thing is also said from "reor, reris," not that it is in opinion alone, but from the thing itself which is nevertheless deprived, and thus sin is a deficient thing: and in this way, a thing is taken in the authority of Fulgentius, and other authorities introduced.

However, substance is said from the nature of substance: and then a thing is per se existing: and in this way, no act is a substance: it is also said as if from effect, because it makes to subsist: and in this way, a good work is called a substance, but not an evil one: because evil makes to fail, and good makes to subsist in the order of natural good, and contributes to it: and this is said to be evil not being, and not having a foundation. Sometimes also substance is said effectively by negation explaining, namely that it does not make to fail from subsistence: and thus indifferent is called substance, but evil is not substance. In the fourth way, substance is said to be what has in any way a quiddity in being: and in this way, evil is substance.

In these ways also nature is said in two ways, namely that which is the cause of order: and thus evil and sin are not nature, and thus it is taken from the Philosopher in VIII Physics, where he says that nature is the cause of order in all things. In another way, nature is said to be that which is understood in any way: and thus privation is nature and sin.

And in this way, by distinction, the solution is clear to the whole.

Articulus 3 — Whether Every Punishment Is From God

Is every punishment from God?

Is every punishment from God?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the last chapter E, there, "Since therefore all agree in this," etc.

Here the Master seems to say that every punishment is from God: and this does not seem [correct]: because it is read that God did not make death.

Likewise, God does not make His work worse: but by corruption the work is worsened: therefore, He neither makes the corruption of the body nor of the soul.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY is what the Master says in the Text. And thus it is read in the Gloss on Romans 1:26: "He delivered them," etc. God works in the hearts of men to incline their wills to what He wills, whether to good or to evil.

Solution. The Masters here found a distinction, that there is punishment enacted, and punishment contracted, and punishment inflicted. Punishment enacted or which we do is sin: and this is not from God, as they say. Punishment contracted is the fomes, which insofar as it resists the will, is a punishment justly inflicted by God: but insofar as it inclines to evil, it is not from God, but from man, as they say. However, inflicted punishment is simply from God, like the infliction of fire.

But because the Master says absolutely that every punishment is from God, therefore it must be said otherwise, that sin (as was shown above) is sin from one and punishment from another. Punishment is either of loss or inflicting. If of loss: then it is indirectly from God, because He does not infuse the form of grace or the good supplying the loss: and He is not the cause of this influence, but turns away from it. Hence, although this punishment does not make His work worse in body and soul, yet He does not do this, except in the manner stated. And thus it is also understood that God corrupts nothing of existing things, namely by acting, but rather from the fact that He does not infuse being as He did: and this is not because God is otherwise disposed to the thing which is corrupted than before, but rather because the corrupted thing is otherwise disposed to Him. However, God inflicts the punishing punishment, by this that He infuses a form of some affliction, which is contrary to the good nature, due to the order of justice.

Through this the solution to the first is clear, how God makes the death of the body and soul, and how He does not make it.

To the other it must be said that that Gloss on Romans is good and subtle: and the first part of it touches on what God works, namely the substance of the act: and the second part touches on the work of order, because He does not make malice, as it is nothing, but inclines evil to what He wills, ordering that from it He may elicit good for which He permits malice to occur.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXXVIII

Divisio Textus

After the aforementioned concerning the will and its end, etc., here begins the part in which the Master discusses the quantity of action in general in good and evil action. And he does this so that the quantity of sin, about which he intends here, may be better seen.

It is divided into three parts: in the first of which he discusses the quantity of the interior action, which is the will. In the second, the quantity of the exterior action, which is the work. And this begins below, distinction XL, there, A, After these concerning the acts, etc. In the third, for the sake of a certain thing that was said, namely that faith directs intention, he inquires about the acts of the unbeliever, distinction XLE, there, A, And when in intention, as above, etc. follows the part which is about the modes of sins, as is clear from the division assigned above.

The first of these is divided into two: in the first of which the Master inquires about the quantity of the will. In the second, however, why the will itself is a determined sin: and this begins in the following distinction XX AIX, there, A, Here, however, arises the question, etc.

The present distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which he touches upon those things which contribute to demonstrating the quantity of the will. And in the second he inquires, What is the difference between will and intention which measures the will? there, F, It is also usually asked, etc.

In the first of these, the Master does three things. First, indeed, he shows the measure of the will from the end. Second, he inquires whether all good wills have one end, and all evil ones one or diverse? there, C, But it is asked, Whether all good, etc. In the third, he determines a certain objection of Augustine against the determined, there, D, Nevertheless to this opinion, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Quantity Of The Will Is Weighed By The End

Whether the quantity of the will is measured by the end?

A doubt arises concerning the first, whether the quantity of the will is measured by the end? And, if it is measured by the end, by which end is it measured?

To the first, it is proceeded thus: 1. Every agent by intention and intellect, unless it acts in vain, sets for itself an end to which it measures the whole work: the will is such an agent: therefore, it sets for itself an end to which it measures the whole work. The first is proved by this, that whatever of the work is not proportioned to the end, that is vain. This is evident from what Damascene says, that every will is in reason. Hence thus: Every work receives the quantity of value from that to which it is measured: but the whole work of the will is measured by the end: therefore, the whole receives the quantity of value from the end.

1. Likewise, in agents according to nature, in which the form of the end is, the goodness of generation and act is considered from the form which is the end: therefore, similarly it will be in agents from deliberation: therefore, again it follows that the actual quantity of the will is considered from the end.
2. Likewise, the reason of good in all things is from the end: therefore, much more in moral work, in which there is simply the good which is honest: therefore, since the work of the will is solely moral, the quantity of goodness or malice will be taken from the end.

Likewise, Boethius in the Topics gives this maxim, "Whose end is good, if it itself is also good: and whose end is evil, it itself is also evil."

Therefore, a good end makes good: and the quantity of good makes the quantity of good from the will: therefore, the quantity of the will is considered from the quantity of the end.

Likewise, this is taken from the Letter through many authorities.

But against this, it seems to be an instance through many acts: as

1. Someone fornicates with someone, so that from that familiarity he may recall her from heresy, here is a good end, and yet the work is evil.
2. Likewise, someone steals to feed the poor: whose end again is good, and the work is evil.

The solution of the ancient Doctors tends to this, which a certain Gloss says on that, "The lamp of your body is your eye": that as much as you intend, so much you do: this is understood in evils generally because of contempt: because if you intend by lifting a pen to sin mortally and provoke God, you sin as much towards God, although not as much towards your neighbor. Similarly, they say that generally it is understood in indifferent things: because in those it is true that your intention imposes the name and form on your work: because it does not have indifference by reason of merit or demerit, except from intention. But in goods, they said that rule is particular: because in goods you do not always do as much as you intend. For if you give a penny and can give more, and intend to merit as much by a penny as by a hundred thousand, you will not merit as much for this. And so they said also about evils done for good: although the intention of good diminishes the fault in such things, it does not, however, remove it entirely, nor make the work meritorious. And in this solution stood Prepositivus Cantua and William of Auxerre.

However, it can be said otherwise without prejudice, by distinguishing in that which is referred to the end, and in the end to which it is referred, that which is referred to the end. For of those things which are referred to the end, some are akin to the end by their nature, that is, which are naturally ordered to it: some, however, are by nature oblique from it: and some neither in this way nor that way, which are imposed to the end, and imposed in obliquation from it. Similarly, the end is threefold, namely, in the first way which disposes the thing related to it, as the terminus of motion disposes and defines motion, just as the form of the end is in generation: and this end is a part completing the thing, either in being or in well-being. There is also the ultimate end intended in which the agent rests, although not moved first reaches it, just as the end in natures is the conservation of the species. And in the third way, the end in which the whole intention of motion rests: and this is in nature by assimilating in some first author, according to which this is possible for each of the secondary movers. In morals, these are adapted, namely, that a good action is akin to a good end: but an evil one is oblique: and indifferent, potential to either. The end, however, which is completing in act in well-being, is the form of charity in merit: and the end in which the agent rests, is beatitude: and the end in which the whole intention rests, is God.

Let us say, therefore, that intention imposes the name on the work through the proximate or first end, in those things which are akin to it, and in those things which are not oblique to the contrary. And then it never has an instance: because just as in natures the moving form induces its species in the end of motion, so the quantity of charity induces the quantity of merit in the work akin and indifferent to it.

And in this way, the reasons previously introduced proceed.

But to those things which are objected, it must be said that they are not valid: because there is not in such things a relation by the nature of the work, but only by the thought of the agent: and of such a relation, the Master does not speak here: because that is foolish, if it applies to an end which is not applicable to it.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear,

Articulus 2 — What Is The End By Which The Quantity Of The Will Is Weighed

What is the end from which the quantity of the will is measured?

Secondly, it is asked, What is that end? And it is said in the Text, that it is charity which is the end of the commandment.

However, it seems that it is not.

1. By that Ecclesiastes 12:13: Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. The Gloss there, that is, to this is the whole man: therefore all things are to be referred to fear.
2. Likewise, that charity is not the end, it seems from this which is said, Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred. However, it is certain that everyone who acts knows the end of his work: therefore the end is not charity.

3. Likewise, in the First Book of Sentences, distinction I, it was held that the end of love and the use of every work is that which is to be enjoyed: however, this is God the Trinity, as it is said there: however, God the Trinity is not created charity: therefore charity is not the end of the work.

Likewise, Beatitude is said to be the end of every appetite by Augustine, and the Philosopher, and Boethius: however, this is not charity: therefore it is not the end.

1. Likewise, just as we are moved by charity to the goodness of God, so by faith to truth, so by hope to eternity.

Therefore, it seems, since uncreated truth and eternity are the end, that faith can be called the end just as charity.

1. Likewise, nothing is moved to an end which it already has: however, having charity, one is still moved in meritorious work: therefore, one is not moved to charity: but that which is the end, is that to which there is movement: therefore, charity is not the end.
2. Likewise, furthermore, obedience seems to be more the end of the precept than charity: because obedience regards every precept insofar as it is a precept, but charity does not: therefore, it seems wrong to say in the Letter.

Solution. It must be said, as the Gloss says on that of the Apostle, 1 Timothy 1:5: The end of the precept is charity: the end is threefold, namely of determination, as of a field in its last part, when the whole continuous to that term is finished: and the end of consumption, as bread is finished in the last part, insofar as there is no more of the bread: and of consummation, as the perfection of the end is.

It must be said, therefore, that charity is the end of the works of the precept consummating the works: because to it, as they are meritorious, they are referred. However, how charity is the end and form and root and mother, has been said in the First Book of Sentences: here, however, it is only said that it is the end induced by the species of merit in the work from itself, as it is moving the meritorious in the work: just as in natures according to reason the same is the mover and the end: but the end in which the agent rests is beatitude: and in which the whole intention rests, is God the Trinity: and the first indeed is the form of the act, the second is the rest of the appetite, and the third is the complete attainment of the intention. Hence the first is referred to the second, and the second to the third: and concerning all these many things have been said in the third Sentences in the aforementioned places.

To the first, therefore, it is said that fear is the end in a certain respect, namely by withdrawal from evil: but charity is always the proximate end to the meritorious act insofar as it is meritorious: and also because other virtues have as their end the object of charity.

To the other, it must be said that nothing prohibits charity from being known and intended as the end: and as informing the soul, from being unknown. Hence in the argument there is a fallacy of the accident.

To the other, it must be said that it is understood concerning the end in which the appetite rests, not which informs the act, or in which as in the last the intention rests.

To the other, it must be said that the fulfillment of joy in good is, to which truth relates as showing, and eternity as unfailing: and therefore others are not the end as charity is. And another reason is: because they can be without form: and therefore they do not inform the act of merit: hence since form is the end of the act, at least they cannot be ends in this way.

To the other, it must be said that this is true: but something moves to induce its species in another: so it is here that charity moves in the meritorious work, as in the end of the work, as it itself makes the force of merit: hence the movement is so that it is held otherwise than it is held.

To the other, it must be said that obedience regards the precept insofar as it is a precept, but not that which is the precept, nor that which is the work of the precept, and therefore it cannot be the end of every meritorious work: but charity regards that which is the precept, and that which is the work, as the form of the act, and therefore it takes the nature of the end.

Articulus 3 — Whether There Is One End Of Good Wills, And Whether We Can Set Two Ends For Ourselves, And Whether Good Hirelings Merit

Whether there is one end of good wills? and, Whether we can set two ends for ourselves? and, Whether good hirelings merit?

Then it is asked, concerning what is said in the second part, there, C, But it is asked, Whether all good wills, etc.

And two things are asked, of which the first is, Whether there is one end of good wills?

Secondly, Whether there is one end of evils, as it seems to say in the Letter?

To the FIRST it is proceeded thus: For it seems that there is not one end of good wills: because

1. If the end is the perfection of a thing, as perfect things differ, so do perfections differ: But meritorious works differ even in the same man: therefore also perfection according to the end.
2. Furthermore, It is held that charity is the end, and beatitude is the end, and God is the end: therefore it seems that there are many ends even of the same man and the same work.

If you say that one of these ends is referred to another, and thus the ultimate end is one: but short of the ultimate there are not many ends. This still seems to be false: because it says in the Letter at the end of the preceding distinction, that the ends are the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit: and it is evident that they are equal: therefore one is not referred to another: therefore they are ends.

If you say that they are one end inasmuch as they are one supreme good. On the contrary: Faith posits them three to be enjoyed, as it is held in the first distinction of the book of Sentences: therefore it posits them three to whom we adhere by love for their own sake: therefore three ends, because nothing is loved for its own sake unless it is an end.

1. Likewise, Since the end of the intellect is truth: and this distinguishes articles by faith, there seem to be many ends.
2. Furthermore, Since there is divine wisdom and power and goodness and virtue and many other things which are God, He seems to be a multiple end according to the reason of the multiplicity of all attributes: therefore there is not one sole end.

According to this, it is further asked, Whether we can set two ends for ourselves?

But it seems that we can: because
1. In many Churches it is customary to give a penny to those coming to Matins, so that they may come more willingly: and it is evident that we do not condemn either the givers or the receivers.

1. Likewise, the Apostle: He ought to labor in hope, therefore he who plows should plow in hope: he can hope for the temporal: but whatever is hoped for is intended: therefore he can intend that end in labor.
2. Likewise, The laboring farmer ought first to partake of the fruits.
3. Likewise, elsewhere, the Lord ordains that he who serves the altar should live from the altar.
4. Likewise, elsewhere, You shall not muzzle the ox that treads out the grain.
5. Likewise, elsewhere, If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it a great thing if we reap your carnal things? As if he would say: No.
6. Likewise, in the Letter it is also held, His left hand is under my head, that is, temporals in sustenance.

But on the contrary is what
1. Augustine says in the book of Confessions: He loves you less, who holds with you, that is, less than he loves something else.

1. Likewise, On that Deuteronomy vi, 5: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, etc., the Gloss says that God does not want His love to be divided: therefore nothing is to be loved with God.
2. Likewise, Isaiah xxv, 20: It is narrowed. It is explained concerning charity: therefore the bed is so narrow that another falls out: and the short covering cannot cover both: therefore nothing covers with God: therefore we cannot make two ends.

It is also further asked concerning good hirelings who seem to make two ends because
1. Some serve for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, and not for the sake of God: for they seem to sin according to this.

1. Likewise, Psalm cxvii, 1: Give thanks to the Lord, for He is good. It does not say, For He is good to me or to you: therefore He ought to be loved for His own sake, and not for any temporal or eternal utility: therefore it seems that those serving for eternal reward sin.

But on the contrary: In Luke, How many hired servants in my father's house have bread in abundance. Therefore those hirelings do not perish: therefore someone can set for himself the ends of created beatitude in the service of God.

Solution. It is easy here to respond to the objections according to what has been determined above.

Therefore it must be said to the first part of the objections, that there is only one ultimate end, and one object of fruition, as it has been determined in the second book of Sentences, first distinction: and although faith distinguishes, yet the complement of joy is neither in the intellect nor in truth, but in effect and goodness: and therefore one end.

To the other it must be said, that none of the attributes says two things at once, namely, lovable for its own sake, and the reason of lovable for its own sake, except only goodness: and therefore it alone is the end, and in the reason of the end: but other attributes are indeed ends, but not in the reason of the end.

To the SECOND part it must be responded by distinction, that we cannot set more than one ultimate end: but short of the ultimate we can have other ends, as it says in the Letter: and this in two ways: for what is sought short of God is sought in two ways, namely, to God alone: as those who seek nothing but from which they may make for themselves an instrument of meriting, as those who give all in alms. It is also sought for love short of God alone: and they build wood, hay, stubble: but yet by the merit of the foundation and charity by which they loved nothing as much as God, they will be saved.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that when Augustine says, He loves you less, it is understood according to which the "you" says association of equality or contrariety: because then such love is mortal sin, and is lustful, which does not prefer God to all creatures.

To all others it must be said, that they are understood concerning the end short of the end, and there is no sin in such things.

To the THIRD part of the objections, it is disputed also on the third Sentences, question concerning the number of things to be loved.

And it must be said, that a good hireling not only does not sin, but merits much: because the same is the eternal reward which is God Himself according to cause, although created beatitude formally is not God: but he refers it further to God as the best for himself.

To what is objected, it must be said that the same good simply good, is good for us in glory, although in the state of sensuality it is not always the same: and the good hireling attends to his own good according to the state of glory: and therefore he confesses because He is good.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Divisio Textus

It is also customary to inquire, What is the difference between will, etc. And it has two chapters: in the first of which it distinguishes between end, will, and intention. In the second, it touches on how in one work there are multiple material wills and material ends: and yet there is one ultimate will, and one ultimate end. And this is clearly evident in the Letter of that chapter, there, G, But it is asked whether intention, etc.

Articulus 4 — Whether There Is One End Of Evil Actions, Namely Of The Avaricious Man And The Lustful Man

Whether there is one end of evil actions, namely of the miser and the lustful?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether there is one end of evil actions?

And it seems that there is:
1. By what is in the Text in three places, namely in this chapter once, there, CG, But it is asked, etc.: and in that chapter, F, It is usually asked, etc.: and twice by the words of Augustine on those verses of the Psalms: Searching hearts, etc., and, In this snare which they have hidden, etc.

1. Likewise, By reason: All (as Augustine and Boethius say) wish to live happily, and for that they do whatever they do: therefore there is not only one end of evil actions, but also of all actions, good and evil, namely happiness.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. We see that there is not one love according to the reason of the species which moves the miser or the lustful: and this is evident in the works: therefore there is not one end of all evil actions.

1. Likewise, It is impossible for the prodigal and the miser to take pleasure in one thing according to reason: therefore there is not one end of all evil actions in the species of pleasure. And if you say that this is desire. On the contrary: This desire is diversified according to the matter: but the matter differs in species in evil acts: therefore also desire: therefore desire is not one in number, nor one in species.
2. Likewise, It seems false that all seek happiness: because we see that many times some seek unhappiness: but they seek in action what is sought through it: therefore the end of all is not happiness.

Solution. It must be said, as it seems to me, that the ultimate end of all good actions is one in number and reason and substance, which is God Himself or the highest good: but the ends which are around Him are not one, but many ordered to Him. However, it does not seem to me that there is one end of evil actions, neither in number nor in species, as the objections prove, but in cause: Because every evil love of any species is caused by disordered self-love, as Augustine says on that, Set on fire and undermined: because although there are two roots of evil, namely fear badly humbling, and love badly inflaming, yet also as he says, fear is born from love. But there is not one end of both good and evil actions, except according to analogy, and not in species or number: and this is to live happily: which happiness is considered in two ways, namely according to what it truly is either by substance or by supposition: and thus it is not sought except by those directly seeking and finding it.

It is also considered according to reason: and this in two ways, namely according to the true reason which is according to its nature, and in this way again it is not sought by all: and it is considered according to the common reason from those things of which it consists, and this by the commonality of analogy not of species: as Anselm says, that it consists of advantages: and it is true that all seek to live comfortably and according to their will: and this is sought in every action: and in this way all seek to live happily: but this is not to have happiness as the end of the act, except in a certain respect, and not simply.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — What Intention Is

What is intention?

A certain doubt arises here concerning intention, What is it?

For it seems that it is not a habit or a power, because we say that a sleeping person intends nothing, although we say that powers and habits are in the sleeper. By the same reasoning, it seems that it is not a passion: therefore, it seems that it is none of those things which are in the soul, because the Philosopher posits three things in the soul: passions, powers, and habits.

And on the contrary, it seems that it is a habit, because in the Gospel it is compared to light, where it says: "See that the light which is in you is not darkness?" Light, however, is a habit: therefore, it seems that intention is a habit.

Further, it is asked whether it is in the soul on the part of the affect or on the part of the intellect?

However, it seems that it is on the part of the affect, because
1. Augustine says here in the Text that it is the will with an end: but the will is present in man according to the affect.

1. Also, the Philosopher says that the will is the end. Since therefore intention is a relation to the end, as it is said in the Text, it seems that intention is present according to the will.

2. Also, merit or demerit, and the quantity of good and evil, depend on intention, as was held above: however, none of these depend on the intellect or the affect of reason: therefore, intention is present according to the affect.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. In the Gospel it is compared to the eye, when the Lord says: "The lamp of your body is your eye." And again, "If your eye is simple, your whole body will be full of light," that is, the whole mass of works: however, the eye is not the affect, but sight: therefore, intention is present according to the intellect, and not according to the affect.

1. Also, when it is said, "I intend this," the sense is, "I assign this end to my work": however, to assign an end to oneself is of the power of conferring: since therefore the will confers nothing, it seems that intention is not present according to the will, but according to reason.
2. Also, the will never wills anything willed unless it is announced by reason, because it does not have the eye of seeing the willed.
3. Also, it cannot see the end unless it is assigned by reason. Since therefore intention foresees the end, it seems that intention is present according to reason, and not according to the will.

Further, it is asked about what is said above in the Text, chapter B, that intention is the end: for this seems false because intention is related to the end: however, the end is not related to the end: therefore, intention is not the end.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice to the first, that intention is an act.

However, when it is objected that the Philosopher says that there are three things in the soul: it must be said that this is understood concerning those things around which virtue consists according to substance: because according to the subject it is around power, and according to essence it is a habit, and according to matter it is around passions: however, there are many other things in the soul, such as acts, species, and the like.

To the other, I think it must be distinguished that intention can intend the end by operation, or by judging the end only, or in both ways. And in the first way, as a traveler tends to the end of the journey: and thus intention is the will tending to the end: or, as it is better said, the tension of the will to the end. In the second way, it is similar to one who, standing on the road, points with a finger. And in the first way, intention is in the will: and in this way Augustine speaks, and other reasons are induced for this. In the second way, it is in reason: and in this way the Gospel speaks. And in the third way, it is of the will rightly or regulated by reason: and this is the intention taken in the proper manner of the matter.

And by this, the solution to almost everything is clear except for two.

To what is objected, that merit is only in the will, it must be said that this is false, because it is also in practical reason: but as we said above, in reason all merit is as in determining, and in free choice as in choosing, and in the will as in completing merit perfectly by willing and acting.

To the last, it must be said that intention is not called the end except speaking materially, so that intention is put for the intended: and in this way, what is said in the Text is understood.

DISTINCTIO XXXIX

Divisio Textus

Here arises a quite necessary question, etc. This distinction contains three chapters: in the first of which the Master touches upon why the will is sometimes good, sometimes evil. In the second, why the act of this natural power is rather susceptible to malice and goodness than the act of another, there, C, But still it is asked, etc. In the third, he touches upon the natural will imperfect towards good, there, C, Furthermore it is usually asked, etc.

Through this the meaning is clear.

Articulus 1 — Why The Act Of The Will Is More A Sin Than An Act Of The Other Powers

Why is the act of the will more a sin than the act of other powers?

Why is the act of the will more a sin than the act of other powers?

Concerning the first part, a doubt arises: Why is the act of the will more a sin than the act of other powers?

For it seems that the acts of others are sins, just as those of the will:

1. For opposites are naturally made concerning the same thing: but virtues are in reason: therefore, sins are also. The first is evident in itself. The second is evident through a certain Gloss on what is said in Matthew 13:33: "The kingdom of heaven is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of flour." For the Gloss says that by the three measures, the three powers of the soul are understood, so that in reason we possess prudence, in the concupiscible the desire for virtues, in the irascible the hatred of vices.
2. Likewise, it has been held above that sin is in reason concerning both the lower and higher part, and it is also in sensuality: therefore, the act of the will alone is not sin.
3. Likewise, it has been held that sin is in free will, where it was said that free will is flexible towards good and evil: but free will is the faculty of reason and will: therefore, sin is also present according to the act of other powers.
4. Likewise, sin stains the image: but the image encompasses memory, understanding, and will: therefore, sin is present according to the cognitive part of the soul.

5. If you say that it is present cognitively insofar as it extends itself into practice or operation. On the contrary: For it seems that even in cognitive things which are purely cognitive, there is sin: for knowing, whose end is truth, is in some things prohibited, as in the sciences of divination and necromancy: but there would not be a reasonable prohibition unless knowing that were evil. Therefore, since this is in speculation alone, in speculative matters insofar as they are speculative, sin occurs in act.

6. Furthermore, it seems that sin is more according to reason than according to will. For the Philosopher at the end of the first book of the Ethics says that other powers are susceptible to virtue, insofar as they participate somewhat in reason. Therefore, according to the same, they will also be susceptible to sin: therefore, reason much more: but from the participation of the will, no susceptibility to virtue or sin is posited in others: therefore, sin is more according to reason than according to will.

7. Likewise, it seems that it is present according to every power: because for sin the whole man is damned: but he is not punished except in that in which he sinned: therefore, the whole sinned, therefore he sinned concerning every power of the soul.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Sin is voluntary, so much so that if it is not voluntary, it is not sin, as Augustine says: therefore, it is not sin unless it is under the act of the will.

1. Likewise, it has been shown above that man is not the entire cause of his act, except in that part where he is entirely free: but he is not entirely free except according to the will: but sin is where man is the cause of the act: therefore, sin is according to the will alone.

Solution. It must be said that, as was distinguished above, sin is in the soul in three ways: for it is either as in the first discerning and willing and choosing, or as in obeying, or as in not obeying indeed, but in being ordered to reason and will. In the first way, it is in the soul concerning reason and free will and will, in the second way concerning the irascible and concupiscible, in the third way concerning sensuality which is subject to mortal and venial sin. However, the first mode is subdivided into three, as is evident: because three things are required for voluntary acts, namely, the decree that they be done, and choice which is mixed with will, and thirdly complete consent in the work. Concerning the first of these, every sin is in reason, and concerning the second it is in free will, and concerning the third it is in the will: and therefore the completion is in the will and reason, and also free will is a power ordered to completion. And similarly, it is concerning good: and through this, the solution to the first three is evident.

To the other, it must be said that the image is taken in two ways, namely, per se: and thus it is in the simplest powers of the soul, which are only naturally inclined to be directed towards God through habits connatural to them: and in this way, there is no sin in the image. In the second way, it is taken for that part which imitates concerning acts, that is, which knows and can and wills to act freely: and in this way, sin is in the image: and this image is present according to reason and free will: and then it returns to the same distinction: because it is the same for sin to be in the image as it is to be in reason, free will, and will.

To the other, it must be said that in speculative matters there is no sin.

To the objection against, it must be said that such things are not prohibited because of knowing, because knowing is good, but because of the promptness to act from experience in the work in the knower himself: which act is evil, and is ordered to the perversion of the worship of faith.

To the other, it must be said that there the Philosopher speaks of practical reason, which has something of the will: and through this very thing, that they are orderable by reason, they become more free in the work of the will. Hence, whatever receives order, also receives free command from the will: and therefore it is not proven through this that sin is more in reason than in will: because the Philosopher supposes one in the other.

To the other, it must be said that the whole man is damned: because the act is of the whole man, although not according to the whole man: as Augustine said above about the man and woman, when only the lower portion ate: for damnation is due to the agent, just as the work is: but the powers according to which he does not sin, although the whole sins, are damned in him because of the conjunction and union to the damned agent.

To what is objected against, it must be said that the will communicates the freedom of acting even to other powers, insofar as it is the mover of other powers, as was noted above: and through this, they become susceptible to sin like the will, although in a different way, as was evident through the distinction introduced above.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Natural Will By Which We Will The Good Naturally Is An Actual Willing

Whether the natural will by which we will the good naturally is something to will in act?

Whether the natural will by which we will the good naturally is something to will in act?

Then it is asked concerning what he says in chapter 3, there, C, "Moreover, it is usually asked," etc.

For it seems that the Master says that the natural will by which we will the good naturally is something to will in act, and is a movement of the will.

However, it seems that this is not true: because opposite acts cannot exist in the same thing at the same time: however, it is evident that the sinner, when he wills evil, wills evil according to the whole power of the will: therefore, according to that, he cannot will good: therefore, he is not moved by a movement towards good and evil at the same time, according to one power which is the will.

If you say that it is not one will, but two: then I ask, whether they are two powers? If you say yes: therefore, there are two powers of the will in man: and this is superfluous, since according to one he could will good and evil, because all rational powers are towards opposites.

Likewise, to will naturally, as it is said in the text, is imperfect towards the good: but every imperfect thing can be perfected remaining the same in number according to substance: therefore, when liberating grace comes, it is the same will by which he wills the good effectively: but this is deliberative: therefore, it is the same will according to the essence of the power which naturally wills the good, and the deliberative will: but the deliberative is that which wills evil: therefore, it is the same according to the essence of the power that is the natural will, and effective towards good, and effective towards evil.

If you say that it is not inconvenient that one power according to essence is in opposite acts: because in truth they are not opposites, namely to will good naturally, and to will evil deliberatively. On the contrary: the will is towards act: either therefore towards one only, or towards many at the same time. If towards one, I have the proposition: because then when it is moved towards good either naturally or in any other way it is moved, it will not be moved by another act. But if towards many: therefore, from one simple immediate mover, many immediate acts proceed, so that one is not through another: and this is inconvenient, because it is supposed by the Philosopher that from one there is only one immediately.

If you say that that one mover which is the will is disposed by different habits, namely natural and deliberative: and therefore it can be in different acts at the same time. On the contrary: we speak of the conversion of the will by habit to act: either it can be converted to two acts at the same time, or not. If at the same time: therefore, one by essence and indivisible at the same time makes two, which the intellect does not grasp. But if it does not convert itself at the same time: then the proposition is held, namely that it is not moved by different movements at the same time.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Damascene says that no substance is deprived of its proper operation: therefore, neither is the natural will: therefore, it always wills something.

1. Likewise, it is natural always to be in act: the natural will is natural: therefore, it is always in act.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice that the natural will is not always in act, and that it wills the good in act at the same time when the deliberative wills evil: but it wills it according to nature: and this is to will in a certain respect, and not simply: and this is to say that returning to the order of nature it wills good, but deliberation frequently neglects or despises that order: hence I concede the first part of the objections.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that there is an operation of the substantial form by which there is being: and this is a continuous operation. And there is an operation of the power following the form in that which is: and this does not have to be continuous, especially when it does not operate by necessity of nature, but rather by the freedom of will or reason.

Here also incidentally can be introduced the whole disposition concerning synderesis, and the whole disposition concerning conscience, which elsewhere among the questions concerning the motive powers of the soul in our treatise on the Soul as we were able, we noted: and therefore it would be superfluous here to fill the pages with the same.

DISTINCTIO XL

Divisio Textus

After these concerning acts, it is to be added whether it is granted, etc. In this distinction, the Master discusses the quantity of external acts by inquiring, Whether they also ought to be considered according to intention?

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he proposes the question with the authority of Ambrose, who seems to say that in all things the affection gives the name to the work. In the second, he introduces two opinions variously solving that question, the first of which begins there, B. But which is sown, Whether all works, etc. The second begins there, B, § 2: Others, etc. And for that opinion, he introduces a long chapter from the words of Augustine. In the last part of the distinction, he determines how those who are of the first opinion respond to the words of Augustine, and this begins there, D, Which nevertheless some contend never to have, etc.

And this is the sentence of the whole reading.

Articulus 1 — Whether Good And Evil Are Constitutive Differences Of Voluntary Action In Morals

Whether good and evil are constitutive differences of voluntary action in morals?

Here arises a doubt concerning the first part of the distinction, whether good and evil are constitutive differences of voluntary action in morals: so that a good action differs from a bad one, or not?

It seems that they are, 1. Whatever forms are intransmutable concerning a subject, seem to be substantial to that subject: but good and evil in action are forms; intransmutable concerning voluntary action - therefore they are substantial forms. The first is proved by the definition of an accident, which can both be present and not present in the same thing. The second is proved by this, because whatever action is good, it can never become bad, so that it remains the same in number: and thus the proposition is held.

1. Likewise, action in morals is not specified except by the reason of good and evil: therefore it seems that good and evil are substantial forms to action.
2. Likewise, action upon due matter signifies good in general, to which as a species responds good from circumstance: but circumstances make an act good or bad: therefore it seems that goodness and malice are forms specifying the act or voluntary operation.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Evil is a privation: but no privation specifies anything: therefore evil does not place action in a species.

1. Likewise, whatever things are differently present in individuals of the same species, those cannot be substantial forms: good and evil are differently and contrarily present in individual actions of the same species: therefore they cannot be substantial forms specifying action. The proof of the first is that whatever is after the species, is of the accidents, as Boethius says. The second is proved by example: because every coitus is one action in species: and yet one is good, and another bad. Similarly, the giving of alms by anyone is one action in species: and yet one is good, and another bad: and thus it is found in many others.
2. Likewise, all differences and specific forms are caused by the same principles from which the substance they inform and specify is caused: but good and evil are not caused by the same principles from which action is caused: therefore they are not differences or specific forms.

This is proved first by the fact that difference is potentially in the genus, and form in matter: and the operation of the agent brings it forth when it operates upon that matter. The second is proved by this, that it has been proved in many ways above that evil is not from God, and yet every action is from God.

Solution. It must be said that goodness and malice befall action. But there is a double accident. One is that which flows from the principles constituting being, but is after it, and this is an accident of the species, like even and odd befall number, and straight and curved line, and risible man: for since it is not of being, as Boethius says, it is necessarily of the number of accidents: but yet it is an accident per se not transmutable concerning the subject.

Hence it is clear that the first argument which seems to prove good and evil to be specific forms of acts, from the fact that they are not transmuted concerning the subject of one action, does not proceed: because it has an instance in such an action. Yet this solution solves nothing except concerning man: because good and evil are not properly passions of action,

For it is an accident of the individual which is caused by a cause per accidens: as white and black befall man: and this can be compared to the subject in two ways, namely to the subject only, or to the subject and cause. In the first way it is still compared in two ways, namely that there is a double subject, namely permanent, and that which is successive, like motion. If in the first way: then without doubt the accident is transmutable concerning the subject remaining the same in number, like white and black concerning man. But in the second way compared it is not transmutable: and this is not from the power of the accident, but from the fact that the subject passes, and cannot even be resumed the same in number: but if it could be resumed, it could also be under another accident, as we say swift and slow befall motion:

although the same motion in number can never be swift first, and afterwards slow, or conversely: and in this way also good and evil befall action. Hence that they are not transmuted, this itself is per accidens, and not of the nature of those forms. But if the accident is compared to the subject as to the subject and cause: and this happens in two ways, namely that the name of the subject names per se the cause of the accident: as an Ethiopian the cause of blackness in the subject, and snow of whiteness: and then the accident is not transmutable concerning the proximate subject, but concerning the common, as concerning man or frozen water. Or it is compared to the subject in such a way that it flows to some causes of the subject, as being Gallic or Teutonic, which is caused by place, which place of generation is a principle concerning something: and thus the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that action in morals is specified in its end, as every motion: because it is for that end, and it is its end: but good and evil, as will be clear below, are not thus caused from the end, but also from others.

To the other it must be said that good in general, as determined above, is not said in general from a general form including under the scope of predication its many species, but rather from the first potency in morals: and good from circumstance does not respond to it as a species of which it is substantially predicated without conversion in what it is, but responds to it as determining the potency of the subject, which could be done both well and badly: and good in action is not always caused from circumstances, but rather from the root of charity: and evil which proceeds from the evil root of the will: and frequently evil is that which does not have circumstances, as the interior act: for circumstances are properly concerning exterior acts.

Articulus 2 — Whether All Acts Can Be Called Indifferent

Whether all acts can be said to be indifferent?

Whether all acts can be said to be indifferent?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the first opinion, there, B, around the beginning:

To some it seems to be so, who say that all acts are indifferent, etc.

For it seems that this is impossible:
1. For it can never be indifferent, that which cannot be done except badly: to hate God, to persecute the innocent, to blaspheme the Creator cannot be done except badly: therefore an act can never be indifferent.

1. Likewise, Augustine says in the Letter, that some things can never be done well no matter how good a cause they have: therefore they can never be done except badly: therefore never indifferently: because indifferent is that which is neither good nor bad: therefore it seems this opinion speaks falsely.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
A common action is from God: no evil is from God: therefore no act is per se evil, nor per se good: therefore every act per se is indifferent, as this opinion says.

According to this, it is further inquired, Whether good in general signifies an indifferent act?

However, it seems that it does: because good in general is that which can be done well and badly: indifferent, however, is the same: therefore good in general signifies an indifferent act.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Good in general signifies an act upon due matter: however, it is evident that the bare substance of matter is not due: therefore through some disposition it is made due: however, that makes good in general, or evil in general: therefore it is in the nature of good or evil: therefore acts are not in the nature of indifferent in good in general, or good in general does not signify an indifferent action.

Solution. It must be said that an indifferent action is said in many ways. In one way, an action is said to be indifferent, which can be done well and badly and be well informed, since it is an action of deliberative will, and of itself or of its species is not ordered more to one than to the other: and in this way indifferent is taken, as will be clear below, when it is inquired about the indifferent: and in this way indifferent is properly taken. In the second way, however, it is said to be indifferent, which through the substance of the subject does not determine the good or evil by which it is informed or deformed.

Therefore, it must be distinguished to the first, that when it is said, This action of this agent, the action is already demonstrated under the accidents of circumstances forming or deforming it: and similarly when it is said, This agent under the circumstances of the person: and it is true that thus accepted it cannot be done well: but when this opinion says that the action of itself is indifferent, it understands of itself for what it is of its simple substance understood without circumstances, as has often been explained above.

There are, however, those who say this is twofold, this action cannot be done well, and the action of this man cannot be done well: from which a demonstration can be made to the eye, and then the substance of the agent and action is demonstrated under the forms forming or deforming it: and thus they say it is true. It can also be a demonstration to the intellect concerning the bare substance of the action and agent, and thus they say it is false.

Thus this distinction seems to be without art through the said, and the solution to the second is clear: because Augustine speaks of action with circumstances.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that good in general or evil does not signify indifferent, as the objection says and proves.

To what seems to prove this, it must be said that when it is said, that good in general can be done well and badly, the "can" couples the power disposed to the other: just as when it is said, Indifferent can be done well and badly, the power is removed only: and that is not the proper nature of indifferent: but rather in this indifferent is, that it is neither good nor bad.

Articulus 3 — What The Indifferent Is

What is indifferent?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, C, But Augustine most evidently teaches, etc,

And two things are inquired. First, What is indifferent?

Second, Whether anything according to the Theologian is indifferent in the works of deliberative will?

TO THE FIRST THUS: Indifferent, which is placed between good and evil, is that which is neither good nor evil: however, many such things exist in the works of men, whether they are good, or evil, such as eating, drinking, moving the hand, and the like: therefore, indifferent seems to be a human work proceeding from the will, which is neither good nor evil.

But against this seems to be, that 1. Good and evil have a medium between them which are in the same genus: therefore it is necessary that they have the same cause: but the proximate cause of good, and similarly of evil, is deliberative will: therefore, it will not be indifferent unless it proceeds from deliberation, and is neither good nor evil.

1. Furthermore, There is the good of nature, and the good of morals: however, the medium between certain extremes ought to be of the same order according to nature with them: therefore, that which is the good of nature, ought not to be indifferent which is placed as a medium between good and evil in morals. And this is said against some who place indifferent in the good of nature, or in the good in general.

2. Furthermore, If anything which is not good nor evil in morals, were indifferent, then hands and feet and the like would be indifferent, which is false: therefore, it is necessary that indifferent be reduced to the same genus of cause with good and evil: but those have a deliberative cause: therefore, an indifferent act would proceed from deliberative will, which is neither good nor evil.

But on the contrary: Since every good is good from the end, and evil is evil from the privation of the end, that which is neither good nor evil, is that which lacks the reason of just necessity and pious utility: therefore it is idle, because Gregory says, that idle is that which lacks the reason of just necessity and pious utility: however, in Scripture it is considered a sin!:

therefore indifferent is a sin: and sin is evil: therefore indifferent is evil, which is false.

Likewise, Indifferent seems to be the same as vain or in vain: because, as the Philosopher says, Vain or in vain is, indifferent however by the very fact that it is for some end, and does not include it: what can be done well, is for some end, and does not include it when it is not done well: therefore it is the same as vain, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that indifferent is taken in two ways, namely broadly, and properly: and this speaking only in morals.
Broadly, indifferent is said of every act which of itself determines neither the good of virtue nor the evil of vice: and this in two ways: for of itself it does not determine as to the substance of the act considered in itself:
and thus every act is indifferent, as the first opinion says:
and in this way it is not spoken of here concerning indifferent.

In the second way, still broadly, indifferent is said of an act of will which of its form determines neither good nor evil, but is ordainable to either by intention: and that act proceeds sometimes from the will of justice: as is eating, going, moving, and the like: and in this way again it is not spoken of indifferent. Properly, however, indifferent is said of that which proceeds from deliberative will,
and is neither good nor evil, but ordainable to either: and in this way it is inquired about indifferent, because this has the same cause, and is ordered in the same genus with good and evil in morals: and this nothing prohibits to place according to the ethical Philosopher: but whether also according to the Theologian it can be placed, will be the question in the following problem.

To what is first objected, it must be said that that is indifferent broadly accepted:
but those things which are objected against,
proceed from indifferent most properly taken,

But what is further objected, that indifferent is the same as idle, without prejudice it seems to me properly taken indifferent is the same as idle: but nevertheless I do not always consider idle an act of deliberative will, when it is not immediately referred to God: because idle is, that which lacks the reason of just necessity or pious utility. Just necessity of nature, as that which requires eating, and drinking: and pious utility is any utility concerning oneself or concerning one's neighbor, as there are certain things concerning oneself from love to remove tedium or sadness, as lawful games, and symphonies, exercises, and conversations, and songs, and the like:

for which reason also the Philosopher says in the Ethics, that concerning the pleasurable which is in play, the mean indeed is Eutrapeles, that is, well moderated, and the disposition Eutrapelia. Superfluity however is Buffoonery: and he who has it, is called Buffoon. But he who lacks, is called boorish or rustic: and the disposition rusticity.

Whatever things however are done for such ends either in oneself, or in one's neighbor, I do not consider indifferent nor idle. Whatever things however proceed otherwise from deliberating will,
I consider idle and sins,
according to which vain is considered a sin by the Theologian.

To what is objected about vain, it must be said that vain properly taken differs from idle indifferent: because vain is related to the end, but does not achieve it: but idle and indifferent lack that relation.

Note however, that there are some concerning this thinking in diverse ways: for some say, that indifferent is properly an act of will whether deliberating, or not, not related to the end of good or evil, nor of itself determining either of them, as going, exercising, eating, and the like. For there are some acts of themselves having a good end, as believing, loving, hoping and the like. And these say indifferent is something both according to the Ethicist and according to the Theologian. Others say, that indifferent is not an act proceeding from will in whatever way it is, but from deliberative will, having neither of itself, that is, neither good nor evil, nor related to any of these: and this they say in word is a sin, because word is to another: but not in deed, because this is not ordered to another.
And these, with all due respect, do not know what they say: because when a word is said to another, it is not said to another as to the end of good, but it is said to another as manifesting to another the intention of the speaker: and then in the same way is determined the deed and word of deliberative will.

Hence also Gregory well says:

What the word condemned, it is not to be believed that the word permitted, since the deed is greater than the word. They hold the opinion above determined, that indifferent is the same as idle, according to which indifferent is strictly taken: and therefore there is not much diversity between the first opinion and the third.

Concerning this however in the following problem, and concerning many other things more are found in another treatise of ours on Virtues, the question of good in general.

Articulus 4 — Whether, According To The Theologian, There Is Something Indifferent In The Works Of The Deliberative Will

Whether according to the Theologian there is anything indifferent in the works of deliberative will?

Secondly, it is asked, whether according to the Theologian there is anything indifferent in the works of deliberative will?

And it seems that there is nothing at all: because 1. The Apostle says to the Colossians 3:17: "Whatever you do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through Him."

Therefore, either the Apostle's precept is fulfilled, and then it is done well: or it is not fulfilled, and then it is done badly, because it is omitted: therefore it seems that nothing is done indifferently.

1. The same is concluded by what he says in 1 Corinthians 10:31: "Whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God." And in the same book, 14:40: "Let all things be done decently and in order," namely among you.
2. Likewise, Bernard says that to stand in the way of God is to go backward: but if someone acts indifferently, he stands: therefore he goes backward: therefore to act indifferently is to go backward: and this is evil: therefore indifferent is evil.
3. Likewise, the Lord says: "I tell you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment." And Gregory says, much more about deeds. Since therefore this is the same as indifferent properly taken, as was previously evident, it seems that nothing is indifferent to the Theologian: but many things are evil or good.

4. Likewise, this seems by that: "Either make the tree good, and its fruit good; or make the tree bad, and its fruit bad." Therefore it seems that a bad man produces all bad acts, and a good man produces good acts. Since therefore without a middle every man is good or bad, it seems every act is good or bad.
5. Likewise, no one can serve two masters: therefore it is necessary in every work to serve one or the other without a middle: if therefore the work is not of the service of God, that is, good, without a middle it seems to be of the service of the devil.
6. Likewise, there is nothing between rewards and punishments: therefore there should be nothing between the merits of punishments and rewards: but good works are causes of rewards, and evil works of punishments: therefore there is nothing between a good and evil work: therefore nothing is indifferent, as it seems.

1. Likewise, if Adam had persisted in the first state, he would have referred all his works to God: therefore what is not referred, this is from sin: but what is from sin is evil: therefore not referring is evil: and thus not referred is evil: therefore indifferent is evil.
2. Likewise, Augustine says that to use what comes into one's power without referring it to something else to be enjoyed is to abuse and not to use: but indifferent when it proceeds from deliberative will, as has been said, is assumed into the power of the will: therefore it must either be referred to something else, or its use is abuse: and if it is referred to something else, it induces the reason of good: if however it is abuse, it becomes evil: therefore it never remains indifferent.
3. Likewise, Augustine: What we call sin is not the desire of evil things, but the desertion of the better: but indifferent deserts the better: therefore indifferent is sin, as it seems.
4. Likewise, reason is king in the kingdom of the soul: therefore it ought to refer all things to God, or it omits in governing: but things referred to God are good, and things omitted are evil: therefore all things under its governance are good or evil.

Likewise, God is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and end of all things: therefore whatever is from Him as the beginning, if it does not intend in Him as the end, that remains imperfect: but an indifferent act is from Him, as from the beginning: therefore if it is not referred in Him as the end, it remains imperfect in morals: but what is deprived of the perfecting end is evil: therefore indifferent is evil.

But if this is conceded, 1. It seems that the Saints sin much: for there is no one who refers all his voluntary motions to God: therefore the Saints sin all day, as it seems.

If you say that the word of the Apostle is not a precept, but a counsel. Against this is that he speaks not to certain men, but to all: nor about certain works, but about all, such as eating and drinking, without which no man lives. Moreover, from the manner of speaking it seems that we ought to refer even the works of nature to God: because eating and drinking are works of nature, although it is conceded that in them something can be indifferent.

1. Likewise, if it were a counsel, at least it would be necessary that some fulfill it as the perfect: and we see that no one fulfills it.
2. If you say according to some, that there is a certain precept that obliges habitually, but not actually, that is, that it is habitually referred, not in act, that is, that nothing is done against the glory of God: but such are works referable to the glory of God. Against: For according to this, one sleeping would fulfill that precept, because he does nothing against the precept of God: but all his works are referable to the glory of God: but whatever fulfills the precept of God, merits: therefore one sleeping merits in act, which is false.
3. Likewise, a precept regards of itself a work that is in our power, and not a habit: therefore it is not to be said that it obliges habitually and not actually.

From this disputation it seems further to follow that

1. Religious and any others are bound to refer all singular works to God, or they will not be meritorious, but demeritorious: which is very difficult to sustain, because no such person is found.
2. Moreover, if we are bound to refer all to God: therefore also venial sins.

Conclusion. Speaking without prejudice, I do not see how according to the sayings of the Saints it can be sustained that there is anything indifferent in the works of deliberative will: because it will either be idle, and then it is considered evil in the Gospel: or it will be referred, and then it will be meritorious: and therefore I concede the first four arguments.

To the fifth, however, it must be said that it is not valid: for it can well be that a bad man does a work not bad: as if he gives alms for the sake of God, because good is not the same as meritorious: but it can be good of the genus of goods, as the Masters say. But what is said, "Either make, etc." It must be said that the tree is not said here to be the acting man or the will which is the instrument, but the tree is said to be the fruit of the will: and this is true: because from such an interior act by itself proceeds only according to the likeness of the fruit, but from the man himself it can proceed as evil and good.

To the other it must be said that that objection is not valid: because it is understood that by one work one cannot intend contrary things: whence the Gloss says that it is understood of masters commanding contrary things: but yet by one work one could tend to one thing according to what is of the genus of goods, and by another tend to another which by itself is evil.

To the other it must be said that there is nothing intermediate in my judgment regarding the acts of deliberative will: because that which seemed to be intermediate takes the condemnation of evil, but not regarding all acts of will, as is evident from what was previously held.

To the other it must be said that we are not bound to all those things which we would have had in the state of the first man, if he had stood. And although some things are caused by sin, such as the necessity of dying, and such penalties, yet by occupation we are not bound to refer all to God, unless they are done by deliberating will: but sudden or not thinking we are not bound, and that is not the cause of indifferent properly speaking, but deliberative will, as was previously said.

To the other it must be said that it is an act of deliberative will: yet I do not say that it is abused if it is not referred: but if it is referred to the opposite, then it is abused: and the reason for this will be evident in the following of this same problem.

To the other it must be said that the desertion of better things is only through actual aversion: and this aversion is only through conversion to the opposite.

To the other it must be said that an indifferent act is from God, as every act: yet it is not necessary that it be actually referred to God: because it has perfection according to nature: and that relation would not give it perfection according to nature, but only according to well-being: and that is said to be perfect which is complete according to being; yet it is true that it remains vain not referred, as will be evident below.

To what is objected in the contrary, without prejudice I say that it is the precept of the word of the Apostle: but since it is affirmative, it does not oblige always, although it obliges always. I say, however, that it obliges for place and time: and place and time are when he actually thinks that such an act is referable, and can be meritorious if it is referred. But still the precept is violated in two ways, namely by the will tending to the opposite relation: and this is the will despising the honor of God by that relation, and then it transgresses mortally and violates the precept. It is also omitted by the will simply: and then I think that work remains vain, and it becomes venial, and it is not done against the precept, but we do it beyond the glory of God. And thus it is evident that the commandment is fulfilled by many: and by those who do not fulfill it, they do not always sin mortally.

To what is further objected, it must be said that such works, although they are of nature, yet they are ordainable by deliberating will: and in such a case the Apostle speaks.

To the other it must be said that the one ordaining does not have actual will: but this sin has will actually deliberating, as has been said: and therefore against the will of God: as to do is in the sleeping pure privation: in the waking, however, if it is referred, then it places actual merit. If however it is not referred, then it places something to be done against the commandment or beyond the commandment, as has been said: and therefore in one case it can be a grave sin, in another however idle, which is also considered evil by the Saints.

By this also the solution to the following is evident,

To what is further asked, it must be said that a universal relation suffices: as for example, if he devoted himself entirely, all works are related in that relation, unless actually in some evil work the relation is revoked: as if we say, he devoted a hundred marks to God, and every day he gives single pennies, it is not necessary that he refers every day: because the relation suffices unless it is revoked: and it is similar in those things which are carried by violent motion, in which the first motivating force is not always joined, but is multiplied in the middle, and remains.

To the other it must be said that it is not valid: because venial sin is a disposition to evil: and therefore it is not referable: but the saying of the Apostle is understood of those things which by nature are ordered to the glory of God.

Articulus 5 — Whether One And The Same Act Numerically Can Be Good And Evil

Whether one and the same act in number can be good and evil?

Whether one and the same act in number can be good and evil?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, towards the end: In which some place the act of the Jews, who crucifying, etc.

For it seems to follow from this that one act in number can be good and evil.

1. For the crucifixion of the Jews was one act in number: and therefore the passion of Christ pleased the Jews, and the act of the Jews displeased God; therefore the same pleased and displeased: but nothing pleases God unless it is good, nothing displeases unless it is evil.
2. Likewise, This also seems in many examples, as in all the temptations of the Saints which on the part of the tempters displease, and on the part of the sufferers please, although it is one and the same act in number.
3. Likewise, The good lord commands the evil servant to give alms, and he gives it with an evil will: that giving is one in number, and meritorious for the lord, and demeritorious for the servant: therefore the same action is good and evil.
4. Likewise, This objection is concerning the suffrages which are made for the good dead by the evil living, in which one act in number seems to be meritorious of the diminution of punishment, and not meritorious. If you say, that this is not inconvenient with respect to different things. This is nothing: because good and evil are absolute forms inhering, and not in comparison to another: therefore it seems, that an action which is good for someone, is good in itself: and which is evil for someone, is evil in itself: therefore the same act in number is in itself evil, and in itself good, which is impossible.
5. Furthermore, It seems this is verified concerning some continuous act, which someone first does for God, and afterwards before he finishes, he turns the intention to vain glory: for then the act is one, because the agent is one, and the time is one, and the terminus of the motion is one: and yet it is first good, and afterwards evil: therefore one act in number can be good and evil, which seems to be impossible, since good and evil are opposites, either as contraries, or as privation and habit, as was determined above.

Solution. It must be said, that in my judgment one and the same act thus posited as the same taken in essence, cannot be simultaneously good and evil.

To the first and second, therefore, it must be said, that action and passion are not the same: because action is in the agent as an accident in a subject, although it is from it as from a cause: and therefore although the passion pleases, it is not necessary that the action pleases: because they are not the same essentially, although they are simultaneous, and one is effected by the other.

To the other it must be said, that there are two actions there really, namely the will to give in the lord, and the will not to give in the servant: and therefore the action of the lord is simply good: but the action of the servant has two things, namely the essence of the action according to which it is in the agent and from it, and this is absolutely evil: and the act itself, and this by the authority of the lord, although the ministry is of the servant: and this is good according to which the authority is, and that ministry is right, although absolutely it is evil.

To the other it must be said, that the work of suffrage done by the evil, has the first motive that which is in purgatory, and the grace of that informs the act itself: but the action itself is substantially evil and demeritorious for the doer, or at least not good.

To the other it must be said, that in such an action there are two moral actions, although one is naturally: and with respect to its diverse parts it is informed diversely by intention: for in morals intention is principally moving: and since there are two intentions there, there are two movers, and to two movers follow two actions, and not one.

DISTINCTIO XLI

Divisio Textus

Since the intention, as was said above, etc. In this distinction, the Master determines a certain question which follows from what has been established, namely, whether every act of unbelievers is a sin, whose intention is not directed by faith?

It is divided into two parts: in the first of which he determines whether every work is a sin that is not done from faith directing and charity informing the intention. In the second, a question arises incidentally, because intention in one way is the will related to the end, he inquires whether every sin is voluntary. And this begins there, D, "After this it must be investigated," etc.

In the first part, there are four chapters, in the first of which from the words of Augustine it seems to be proven that there is no good work where there is no charity. In the second, the contrary is objected again through the words of Augustine. In the third, a response is given according to those who say that there is no good work where there is no faith. In the fourth, another response is given according to those who make a threefold division of acts.

And through this, the meaning of the first part is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Will Alone Or Intention Suffices For Merit Or Demerit, Or The Act Adds Something In Both

Whether the will alone or intention suffices for merit or demerit, or does the act add something in both?

Before the Letter, however, due to the diverse disputations of the Masters, four questions are asked: the first of which is, Whether the will alone or intention suffices for merit or demerit, or does the act add something in both or not? Secondly, Whether intention makes a work good or evil? Thirdly, Whether it is true that intention gives quantity to a good or evil work? Fourthly, Whether intention is directed by faith and charity, or not?

To the first, it is said thus:

1. Bernard in the book on Free Will and Grace: A good intention suffices for merit, but a good action is required for example. Therefore, it seems that action does nothing with respect to merit, but intention alone.

1. Likewise, on that place of Psalm 31:5: "I said: I will confess," etc., the Gloss says: The will is counted for the work. Therefore, it seems that the work is superfluous, since God does not regard anything unless it is truly sufficient.
2. Likewise, Psalm 125:3: "Those who sow in tears," etc., the Gloss says: To which it suffices if the ability is lacking. Therefore, it seems that in every good the will suffices.
3. Likewise, the same seems by reason: For merit is to be considered according to that which is most ours: but nothing is so much ours as that which is most in our power: and this is the will, as Augustine says in the last chapter of this distinction: therefore, it seems that merit is considered according to the will of man.
4. Likewise, God created us all equally for the kingdom: therefore, He also placed the power of meriting in something that all equally have: but this cannot be an external work, but an internal will: therefore, the power of merit consists in the will, and not in the external work.
5. The same seems by authority, that the external work adds nothing to merit: because on that of Mark 12:43: "This poor widow has put in more than all those who have given to the treasury," the Gloss says: The merit is of pious intention. Therefore, intention is more accepted than the work, or rather without the work, because the widow did no or little work compared to others.
6. Likewise, the Gloss of Jerome, there: "Not how much, but from how much you give," and from this follows the same.
7. Likewise, on that which merit did not abound: the Gloss says: Where the will is equal, it will have equal reward.
8. Likewise, all that we work is by grace: but grace is not given according to works, but gifts: therefore, it seems that neither is merit, which is from grace, in external operations, but in the internal act of grace.

If it is said that it is so in good things, but not in evil: because evil in work is worse than in will alone. Against this, it is objected thus: On that place of Psalm 7:3: "They work iniquities in their heart," etc., the Gloss says: If you will and cannot, the Lord counts it as done.

1. Likewise, on that of Leviticus 15:19: "A woman who suffers the flow of blood at the return of the month," the Gloss: The will is counted for the deed: and so it seems that in evils, it is the same, and also in goods: and thus it seems that the work adds nothing on either side.

But against this, it is objected thus:
4. James says in the canonical, 2:20: "Faith without works is dead": but faith directs intention: therefore, intention without works is worth nothing.

1. Likewise, Gregory: Charity works great things, if it is: but if it ceases to work, it is not charity. Therefore, it seems that in charity, which is the end of works, as was said above, works are required.
2. Likewise, Gregory: The proof of love is the exhibition of work.
3. Likewise, 2 Corinthians 8:10-11: "You began to will from the previous year: now also complete it in deed, so that as the readiness of the will is, so also may be the completion from what you have."
4. Likewise, there, 8:12: "If the will is ready, according to what one has," etc.
5. Likewise, there, 9:6: "He who sows sparingly," etc., and he speaks of works. From these and many others, it is clear that good works done in charity are worth for reward and merit.
6. Furthermore, it would be absurd to say that they are not worth anything: because thus men would be withdrawn from works.
7. Likewise, in human judgment, one who serves with will alone is not equally rewarded as one who serves with will and work: therefore, it is the same in divine justice. Similarly, it seems that in evil they also bring: because in human judgment, a thief is condemned, not one who wishes to steal, although incomparable: therefore, in the judgment of God, it should be so, that the deed is more condemned than the will alone.
8. Likewise, Matthew 25:35 and following, the king, namely God, reproaches both the good and the evil with deeds as the cause of salvation or condemnation, saying: "I was hungry," etc.: therefore, works are added to the will.

Solution. It must be said that in good things, the will and intention suffice in adults, in all those cases in which the ability of the work is lacking. But in all those cases in which the ability is present, the intention and will deceive themselves unless they proceed in work: and then the will and deed are rewarded together.

By this, the solution to all those objections concerning good things is clear.

Likewise, merit must be distinguished. For there is the merit of actual reward here, and in the future: in the future, to glory in the multitude of good operations: here, however, to be rooted in good by the confirmation of habit and the increase of grace, from the knowable because one uses well what is received, and suchlike: and for this, works are worth, and they add upon this a complete will. And there is merit with respect to substantial reward only, that one may glory in the participation of God: and this is considered only according to the root of charity.

By this, the solution to all objections concerning good things is clear.

To what is objected concerning evils, there is also one solution, that a complete will is counted as a deed in those things which are sins against God, such as contempt, aversion, ingratitude, and suchlike. But in those things which are against one's neighbor, a complete will alone is not as harmful as the work: and consequently, the punishment of loss and sense is equal, but the punishment of remorse is not so. Yet it must be noted that in some sins, the will is scarcely so complete in itself as in the work of the flesh, as in fornication: because the bodily act adds delight there.

To what is objected concerning human judgment, which condemns the work, not the will, it is not similar: because man does this, because he does not see the heart: but God, who looks at the heart, condemns both, and more the heart than the work.

By this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether Intention Makes A Work Good Or Evil; Secondly It Is Asked, Whether Intention Makes The Good And The Evil Work

Whether intention makes a work good or evil?

Secondly, it is asked, whether intention makes a work good and evil?

Whether intention makes a work good or evil?

Secondly, it is asked, whether intention makes a work good and evil?

It seems that it does:

1. By that of Luke 6:45: "A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good, and an evil man out of evil, etc.": there the Gloss says: The treasure of the heart is intention, from which the Lord judges works. Therefore, it seems that works are good and evil through good or evil intention.
2. Likewise, a good which is perfect in being and well-being can become evil through intention, as is believing in God or giving alms with an evil intention: therefore, much more can an evil which is imperfect and a defect become good through intention: therefore, good becomes evil through intention, and evil becomes good, and thus the quality of the work generally depends on the quality of the intention.
3. Likewise, since the work is not the cause of the intention, but rather the intention is the cause of the work, and the cause influences its quality upon the caused, it seems that the goodness or malice of the intention flows into the work: and thus the work is good or evil by a good or evil intention.

4. Likewise, theft is evil in itself: and yet done with a good intention, it is good in those who took the goods of the Egyptians by the command of the Lord.

5. Likewise, someone simple steals from a rich man without any remorse of conscience, to give to the poor: in that case, only the good intention moves to the work: therefore, it seems that it becomes good.

6. Likewise, this one intends to sin mortally, and the act in itself is a venial sin: the Masters concede that he sins mortally because of the intention: therefore, similarly it should be conversely, that one sinning mortally from the act, will sin venially from the intention, since the Lord is more inclined to have mercy than to condemn.

But if this is conceded, those things which were held by Augustine in the preceding distinction will be contrary.

Solution. It must be said that good and evil in a work are not caused in one way: but good, as Dionysius says, is from one whole cause, that is, for the constitution of good, all circumstances and the end and form in the will of the agent must agree: and it is not constituted except by all these together in the manner of an integral whole, which is constituted by all its parts taken together. Evil, however, as Dionysius says, happens in every way, that is, from any particular defect: just as an integral whole is destroyed by any part being destroyed separately. And therefore it is, that good is not without a good intention, although it is not good from intention alone: just as a house is not without a wall, although it is not from the wall alone.

And by this the solution to the first is clear: because for evil, the intention of corruption suffices, although it is also caused by other corruptions. But for good, the integrity of intention does not suffice: because many other corruptions can be around the work.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar, as is clear from what has been said.

To the other, it must be said that intention is the cause of the work, but it is not the sole cause: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the other, it must be said that it was not theft, but rather a transfer of dominion from him who could, into the power or dominion of the people: and therefore that argument does not prove.

To the other, it must be said that in that work there is ignorance of the law, which excuses no one entirely: and therefore that intention is perverse.

To the other, it must be said that as it is in good and evil, so it is in evil and worse: because for worse, a particular corruption in act or intention suffices. However, for evil to become less evil in kind, it does not suffice in the same way. I say in kind, so that from mortal in itself it becomes venial: because the goodness of intention diminishes in the same kind, but not by changing the kind of sin.

Articulus 3 — Whether Intention Gives Quantity To The Good Or Evil Work, And Makes The Work Good Or Evil

Whether intention gives quantity to a work, good or evil, and makes a work good or evil?

Thirdly, it is asked whether intention gives quantity to a work, good or evil?

It seems that it does: for the Gloss on that passage of Luke 6:45: "A good man," etc., says: "From the good treasure, as much good as you intend, so much good you do." And another on that, "An evil man from the evil treasure," etc.: "As much evil as you intend, so much evil you do." Therefore, it seems that both good and evil work receive quantity from good or evil intention: but this one, by giving alms or by the mere will of martyrdom, intends to be a martyr: therefore he is a martyr. And similarly in evil, this one by fornicating intends to sin venially: therefore he sins venially: both of which are false: therefore, not as much as you intend, so much you do.

Solution. To this, it can be said, as was answered above: and I consider that solution better. But nevertheless, the Antisiodorensis distinguishes here by saying that when it is said, "As much as you intend, so much you do," "as much" and "so much" can be taken nominally and adverbially. If nominally: they are in the accusative case, and the sense is: "As much a thing as you intend, so much you do": and then in good things it does not hold for the reasons stated above: because good is caused by one whole and sole cause, and not by intention alone. However, in evils, having comparison to worse, it holds on the part of guilt, although it does not hold on the part of conversion to a changeable good, as was said before: but descending with respect to lesser evil, it does not hold: because it does not follow, if you intend by fornicating to sin venially, that you sin venially. If, however, they are taken adverbially: then they can denote intention in general and similarity, or in species in equality. In the first way, it is true, "As much as you intend, so much you do," that is, if much, much. If in the second way, it is false: because the work is not always measured to the equality of intention.

And by this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Intention Is Directed By Faith Or By Charity

Whether intention is directed by faith or charity?

Fourthly, it is asked whether intention is directed by faith or charity, or not?

And it seems that it is not:

1. For reason by itself suffices to see the end of its work: therefore, by itself without the end, it suffices for directing.

1. Furthermore, charity in no way seems to direct: because to direct is an act of sight, but charity is according to simple affection.
2. Likewise, why is looking attributed to faith and charity, and not to hope, since it is a theological virtue and regards the end like the other two?

Solution. It must be said that faith alone properly directs by this, that it shows the end of good and the reward.

To the first objection, it must be said that although reason by itself suffices to know the end as it is, it does not suffice to know what is the reward of the work in the participation of God through glory: and therefore the light of faith must be present in that direction.

To the second, it must be said that charity directs in the manner of tending towards the end, not in the manner of indicating, as was explained above.

To the third, it must be said that the end is present in that which intends towards the end through intention: but hope and that which it expects is in the manner of the future, not the present: and it does not properly direct, but raises up the one working.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Works Of All Unbelievers Are Necessarily Evil Or Not

Whether the works of all unbelievers are necessarily evil or not?

Then inquiry is made concerning those things which are said in the Text: and first concerning this which it says, there, A, Whether every intention and every work of theirs is evil, etc.

For it seems that this is true: because
1. A good tree cannot produce bad fruits, nor a bad tree, etc. It is evident, however, that the unbeliever is a bad tree: therefore, he does not produce good fruits: thus he cannot perform good works.

1. Likewise, Unbelief is a habit contrary to faith: therefore, it directs towards the contrary of faith: however, a right intention towards the contrary of faith makes a work evil: therefore, every work of an unbeliever is evil.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Unbelievers had the work of civil virtues: but those works are not evil, but rather good: therefore, an unbeliever can perform good works.

1. Likewise, a certain Gloss on Matthew says that many come to Christ with natural virtues. Therefore, before they come, they have natural virtues: however, the works of those virtues are not evil: therefore, not all their works before faith are evil.

Solution. It must be said that not all the works of unbelievers are necessarily evil: but all their works are necessarily without grace making one pleasing, and not meritorious, although they can be of the genus of good things, as the second opinion introduced here says: because the prior opinion which responds to this question in the Text is false.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that a tree is not called a working man, nor is the will an instrument, but the will is an interior act: and that which proceeds from it per se, not per accidens, is informed according to it: and therefore, if it is evil, it itself is evil: and if it is good, it itself is good. And this has also been noted above. However, a bad man in himself can well do good, not insofar as he is bad, but insofar as he is moved by natural piety or the goodness of political virtue.

To the other, it must be said that unbelief, insofar as it does not denote the privation of faith, but the habit contrary to faith which is called error, does not always direct the unbeliever: but it is true that whenever it directs him, it perverts the work. However, the unbeliever is directed, just as the believer, sometimes by the light of natural reason: and then he can perform works which are of the genus of good things. However, what Augustine says in the Text, that false virtue is in such, even in the best morals, the second opinion which is called false solves well enough: because what it promises as far as the nature of the act which is ordered to beatitude, it does not solve due to the contrary disposition found in the subject of the acting.

Articulus 6 — Whether Every Sin, Even Original, Is Voluntary

Whether every sin, even original, is voluntary?

Whether every sin, even original, is voluntary?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, After these things it must be investigated, how it is to be understood, etc.

For it seems that every sin is voluntary: because

1. Original sin is innate from the necessity of corrupt nature: and what is from necessity, as Augustine says, is not under the will: therefore the first motions are not under the will: therefore they are not voluntary: and yet they are sins: therefore not every sin, even actual, is voluntary.
2. Likewise, some sin is from ignorance, as was held above. However, it is evident that what is involuntary is through ignorance, as Damascene says, whose principle is within the one not knowing singulars: therefore what is unknown is not voluntary: but ignorance is sin: therefore not every sin is voluntary.
3. Likewise, someone is bound to rise for Matins, and while sleeping does not hear the signal: therefore he omits by not rising: but it is evident that he does not have will while sleeping: therefore he sins by omitting without will: therefore not every sin is voluntary.

Solution. It must be said that every sin is voluntary, as it says in Zitfera: but it is not voluntary in one way, but in multiple ways. For some is voluntary which is caused by will alone with nothing else inclining to sin, neither interior nor exterior: and thus the first sin of the demon was voluntary.

In another way, it is called voluntary, which is caused by will alone inclining internally, although it has an external inclining: and thus the sin of the first parents is called voluntary, whom nothing inclined internally to sin except will, and the demon externally: and this mode is held in Litlera.

Sometimes a sin is called voluntary, whose act is voluntary: but with will inclining to the same thing both internally and externally: and thus actual mortal sins in us corrupted are called voluntary.

Sometimes a sin is called voluntary by the will causing the cause of the first sin, although not the sin itself: and this in two ways, namely in different persons, or in the same: in different as original is called voluntary, because its cause in Adam was voluntary: in the same, however, as when someone voluntarily first intoxicates himself, or does something else, whereby he loses the governance of reason by his fault, and afterwards falls into another sin.

Otherwise, a sin is called voluntary, which in singular can be prevented by will, although it cannot in universal: and thus the first motion is called voluntary, as we said above.

Sometimes a sin is called voluntary, because the will tends to its contrary: and this in two ways, namely in itself, and in cause: and thus the sin of omission is called voluntary in itself, as when he does not honor when he ought and can his parents, or does not rise when he can and ought and notices, for Matins: then indeed the will ought to tend to rising and honor. In cause, however, when someone directly intoxicates himself or stays awake too much, so that nature cannot sustain rising at the due time: or when someone promises at a term in which he thinks himself insufficient to pay: but if he does whatever he can, and cannot, then he does not omit. And thus also in the sin of ignorance it is voluntary, because the will is bound to tend to knowing.

Sometimes it is called voluntary whose act is voluntary, and the circumstance involuntary: just as ignorance of fact excusing from the whole is voluntary, because he wills the act, although he does not will the circumstance which he ignores: and if he could know, he would not will the act, just as knowing Leah in Jacob was voluntary before he consented to her as his.

In the last way, it is called voluntary what is not chosen in itself, but for the sake of something more difficult into which it is necessary to fall, if that is not voluntary, just as in time of storm the casting of goods is voluntary, because unless they are cast, it is necessary to sink from the weight of the ship.

And through this the solution to all objections is clear, except concerning invincible ignorance: and concerning that it must be said, that it is reduced to voluntary whose act is voluntary, but not the circumstances: yet in such a way that will is taken broadly.

DISTINCTIO XLII

Articulus 7 — What Tumor Is; And How The Species Of Tumor Are Taken

What is swelling? and, How are the species of swelling received?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, 1, around the beginning: Of which there are four species, etc.

These according to Gregory are species of swelling rather than of pride.

Therefore, two things are inquired, namely, what is called swelling? and, By what are these species received?

And it must be said that (as Gregory says) swelling of the mind is an obstacle to truth: and swelling is called the inflation of presumption from the power which someone believes they have. And in this it differs from pride: because pride is the appetite for excellence or dignity: but swelling is arrogance, and is caused by power and dignity obtained.

But secondly, it must be said that one's own power is caused in three ways, namely from innate things, acquired things, and the manner of having. If from innate things: then it is the first species, when one believes they have by their own strengths. If it is from acquired things: then it is the second, when one indeed believes they have from another, but not freely, but through the acquisition of merit which was proper. If from the manner of having: either which seems, and is not: and then it is the third species, when one falsely boasts to have what they do not have. Or it seems and is, but is singular: and then it is the fourth species which is, when one believes they have more excellently than all others what they have. And concerning these there is a verse:

From oneself, for merits; falsely, more than all, they inflate.

Divisio Textus

Since, however, a bad will and operation are sin, etc. Here he begins to discuss the modes of sins. And it has two parts: in the first, he touches on the general definitions of the roots of sin. In the second, he specifically touches on the diversity of the greatest sin, which is the sin against the Holy Spirit, which begins below, distinction XLII, there, A, There is moreover a certain sin, etc.

This distinction, however, has five parts: in the first of which he inquires, Whether the actual interior will and the exterior work are one sin, or not?

In the second, how sin passes in act and remains in guilt? there, D, Moreover it is usually asked, When by someone, etc. In the third, he touches on the diversity of the roots of sin, there, F, The modes of sins, In the fourth, he discusses the seven capital vices, there, H, Moreover it should be known In the fifth, he shows how from pride and greed all vices arise, there, I, However pride all evils, etc.

And through these and the following disputation, the sentence will be made clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Interior Will Together With The Exterior Act Is The Same Sin Or A Different One

Whether the interior will with the exterior act is the same sin or different?

The question arises concerning the first part, whether the interior will with the exterior act is the same sin or different?

It seems, however, that they are different:

1. By three reasons, which the Master sets forth in the Text, and solves: of which the first is this, Will and act are either multiple sins, or they are not multiple sins. If they are multiple sins, I have the proposition: but multiple sins are not one sin: therefore will and exterior act are not one sin. But if they are not multiple sins: either therefore neither is a sin, or one is not a sin: both of which are false: therefore it remains, that they are multiple sins.

1. The second is this: By multiple things of which one is not a sin, one is not made more guilty than by one which is a sin: therefore if will and act are multiple non-sins, by them one is not made more guilty than by will alone: but this is false: therefore the act is a sin added to the will: therefore will and act are two sins.
2. The third is this: One sin is not prohibited except by one command, and multiple by multiple: but will and act are prohibited by multiple commands: therefore they are multiple sins.
3. To the same can be objected in this way: As was held above, the interior will and the exterior work differ as tree and fruit: but tree and fruit are different evils in evils, and different goods in goods: therefore the interior will and the exterior work are different sins.
4. Likewise, on that of the Psalm xcviii, 28: "Add iniquity upon iniquity," etc., the Gloss says, that he who adds work to will, adds iniquity to iniquity: but iniquity is not added to iniquity, unless different to different: therefore will and work, etc.
5. Likewise, on that of the Apostle to the Romans 1, 29, "murders," the Gloss says:
   He says in the plural, "murders": because one is the murder of will, and another simply of work. Therefore similarly it is in other sins: therefore will, etc.
6. Likewise, the interior will and the exterior work differ as cause and effect: but these are always different: therefore they are different sins.
7. Likewise, a universal is predicated of its multiple inferiors separately, and afterwards separately falls into plurality, when it is predicated of multiple together conjunctively, as if Socrates is a man, and Plato is a man: therefore Socrates and Plato are men. But it is evident, that the will of fornicating is a sin, and fornication is a sin: therefore the will of fornicating and fornication are two sins: and the same is in others: therefore in all the interior will, etc.
8. Likewise, in two things differing in substance by number, there is not one accident by number: but the interior will and act differ by substance: therefore one accident by number is not in them: but malice and deformity is an accident or by the mode of an accident: therefore there is not one deformity in the interior will and the exterior act.
9. Likewise, sometimes the interior will and the exterior act are not simultaneous in time: and it is evident, that each is a sin: therefore they are not one sin by number: because the same by number does not precede itself in time.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. It was held above, that the first evil and cause of evil is will: therefore the act is not evil per se, but per aliud or per accidens: but evil per se and evil per accidens do not diversify substance according to number: therefore the interior will and the exterior act do not make different sins according to number.

1. Likewise, one sin by number is for which one penance by number is enjoined: but for will and act when they are conjoined, one penance by number is enjoined: therefore one sin by number.
2. Likewise, in good works the interior will and the exterior work, when conjoined, constitute one merit only according to number: therefore since God does not count our evils as much as our goods, there will be in evil one sin by number, the interior will, etc.
3. Likewise, there is one conversion and aversion in both: because when will and work are conjoined, the will is not converted to a changeable good, except through the work: therefore since the unity of sin is from one conversion, and by one conversion the interior will and the exterior act are one sin,
4. Likewise, one sin is from one privation of grace and corruption of natural good: but the work does not deprive otherwise than the will, when they are conjoined: therefore one sin is the will with the exterior work.
5. Likewise, there is one punishment for both: but of multiple sins there is not one punishment; therefore they are one sin.

Solution. It must be said, that when will and act are conjoined, they are one double sin: because that which is natural in sin is duplicated in sin, namely the substance of the act: because the interior and exterior acts are two. But that which is formal, namely deformity, is the same. For in the notion of form and end, it is one sin, because one is the end for both, and one aversion.

And by this the solution to almost everything is clear.

To the first it must be said, that these are multiple non-sins but one sin, that is, united in one deformity. And thus it is clear, that each is a sin: and yet not multiple sins: because one is there on account of the other, as act through will: and one from the other, as from cause and from will: and one in the other conjoined to the end, as will in the exterior act.

To the other it must be said, that one is not made more guilty intensively, when will and act are conjoined: but one is made guilty of more materially, because of a double act. But if will preceded act in time, then the argument would follow: because then not only the exterior act follows the interior will, but the intermediate will with the exterior act follows the will which preceded, and this makes two sins.

To the other it must be said, that it is false, that it is prohibited by a double prohibition, when they are conjoined: because when it is said, "You shall not commit adultery," there the will progressing into work is prohibited. But when it is said, "You shall not covet," etc., there the will resting only in the delightful thought is prohibited. But yet the Master solves this thirdly otherwise in the Text: but it is not to be cared for: because this solution is more to the point, his however more to the man.

To the other it must be said, that they differ materially, and in this they have similarity with tree and fruit: but they are not similar in the multiplication of form, because it is multiplied in tree and fruit.

To the two following it must be said, that this is either understood of material diversity: or if it is understood of formal diversity, then it must be taken of will divided from work according to time.

To the other it must be said, that although the exterior work proceeds from the interior will as from an efficient cause, yet it is united to it in the end, and consequently in the aversion following that end because it is not averted except through this, because it places a changeable good as its end: and therefore formally they are one sin.

To the other it must be said, that this is true, when the common is predicated of multiple differing in form according to being, although not according to reason, as Socrates and Plato have two humanities: but as we said before, the interior will and the exterior act have only one deformity according to the being of sin, inasmuch as it is sin: and therefore it is not similar.

To the other it must be said, that in two things which are entirely different, it is true what is objected: but will and act are not entirely diversified: because they are united in the end, and from that end is all the deformity: because (as Augustine says) all human perversity is to enjoy what should be used, and to use what should be enjoyed.

To the other it must be said, that when they are divided, and will is limited in itself, nor does it progress into work, nor does it continue to work: then it is well conceded, that they are different sins, as is evident from the prehabited.

Articulus 2 — On What Liability To Punishment Is Founded

On what is guilt founded?

On what is guilt founded?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "Moreover, it is usually asked," etc.

For guilt, since it signifies an obligation to punishment, must be founded on something as on a cause: therefore, it is either founded on the act, or on something left from the act. Not on the interior or exterior act: because each passes away, as is proven in the Text: and with the cause ceasing, the effect ceases: hence, if it were founded on the act, it would be necessary that there would be no guilt unless the act existed: and this is false: therefore, it is founded on something left from the act. It is asked, therefore, what is that?

However, it seems that it is a habit or disposition: because

1. From similar acts, similar habits are left (as the Philosopher says) in good and in evil: therefore, from evil acts, a habit or disposition is left in the soul towards a similar act in species.
2. Likewise, a man does not become more prone to acts of one species than another, except from some disposition or habit left: but from frequently acting badly, a man becomes more prone to acts of the same genus or species: therefore, they leave a habit.
3. Likewise, a determined punishment of sense does not follow the substance of the soul, but something placed in it which is a being. Since, therefore, nothing positive is caused in it except a habit from the operation of sin, it seems that nothing remains of sin in the soul, except a disposition or habit inclining to sin: therefore, it seems that guilt is founded on that disposition or habit.
4. Likewise, from that part from which sin is nothing, it cannot remain in act: but from the part of aversion, it is nothing: therefore, from that part, nothing is left to remain in the soul: therefore, it must remain from the part of conversion to a changeable good: but from that part, nothing remains except through the disposition or habit which it leaves: therefore, guilt either does not remain in the soul, or if it remains, it is founded on that disposition or habit, as it seems.

But it is objected against this insolubly, that

1. Someone commits the sin of avarice, and before he repents, he becomes prodigal; it is evident that the guilt of avarice remains. Therefore, either the habit of avarice remains in which that guilt is founded, or not. If it remains: therefore, contrary acts are in the same according to the same, namely of prodigality and avarice, which is impossible. But if the habit of avarice does not remain, and yet the guilt remains: therefore, guilt is not founded on the habit or disposition left from sin.
2. Likewise, the proneness to the act of sin remains after penance and grace, because it is not purged except through the habit of good: however, guilt does not remain after penance and grace: therefore, it is not founded on the proneness of disposition or habit: because proneness to some determined act in species is not in the soul except according to dispositions or habits.
3. Likewise, every disposition and habit are qualities of being: therefore, they are from the first being: but that which stains the image and defaces it cannot be from the first being: therefore, the stain is not a disposition or habit: therefore, guilt is not founded on that.

Solution. To this, without prejudice, it must be said that guilt is founded on a culpable stain. This stain, however, is the corruption of the beauty of natural good, as if we were to say stained in the face mutilated. This stain, however, is left from the sin of the soul, as the Master said above, not dispositively: and in that it is founded.

The guilt, according to which it is substantiated in the natural good.

If, however, it is objected that according to this there is one stain in all sins: because one is deprived, namely grace, and one is corrupted, namely the natural good: therefore also the guilt of all sins is one in number: therefore also the punishment is the same and one. It must be said that none of these follow: because the deprived good, namely grace and the integrity of nature, is considered in two ways, and also the corrupted good, namely in itself, and thus the objection proceeds: but thus it is not corrupted nor deprived except by evil according to which it is evil, not according to which it is this evil.

Both are also considered according to which it is towards the act, and thus the good of nature is more deprived with respect to chastity by the stain which is from lust, than with respect to liberality: and the good of grace is more distanced inasmuch as it is in chastity, than inasmuch as it is in liberality. However, on the part by which the privation regards the act by which it deprives, nothing prohibits privations from being numbered, and the following guilts from being numbered, and also from being diversified according to this.

To what is first objected, it must be said that guilt, in my judgment, is founded in the stain, which is privation and corruption considered in this way.

To what is proven, that this is a disposition or habit by two arguments: it must be said that indeed disposition and habit can be left from bad operation: but guilt is not founded in that, as was proven by objections made to the contrary.

To another objection about sensible punishment, it must be said that punishment is diversified according to the diversity of the stain, and it has already been said how the stain is diversified.

If, however, it is asked, whether it follows the soul, or the substance of the soul, or something else posited? It must be said that nothing prohibits it from being posited to follow the substance under such a defect, although it could not be in it according to which it is taken without that defect: just as also many agents according to nature are brought to the composite body by some of the principles composing the harmony of the body, which, with the harmony remaining, could not bring any passion.

To another it must be said, that although sin considered according to aversion alone is nothing, yet it is not entirely nothing according to which aversion is substantiated in conversion: because (as we said above) evil acts by the power of good, and thus causes evil in the soul which is rooted in the natural good: and it is not entirely nothing, but its stain deforms the image by its spiritual mutilation.

There are, however, those who solve this question otherwise, that the stain is something positively existing: but because what they say cannot be well sustained, therefore I pass over their sayings.

Articulus 3 — Whether Sin Is Said Of Venial And Mortal Sin By One Notion, Or According To Prior And Posterior; And How Venial Sin Is Sin

Whether sin is said of venial and mortal sin by one reason, or by prior and posterior? And, How is venial sin a sin?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, E, around the middle: For there are two kinds of sins, namely mortal and venial.

And there are two things to be asked here, namely whether sin is said of mortal and venial by one reason, or by prior and posterior? And, How is venial a sin?

But the first of these has been determined above in the same work.

TO THE SECOND, it proceeds thus:
1. In every actual sin which is sin, it is necessary that there be those things which constitute sin: venial sin is actual sin: therefore, necessarily there are in it those things which constitute sin: these, however, are aversion and conversion: therefore, in venial there is aversion and conversion.

1. Likewise, Everything that is not turned away from the order by which it exits from the first principle, is ordainable to the same principle as it is the end: but venial is not ordainable to it as it is the end: therefore, it is turned away from the order by which a thing exited from the first principle: therefore, it is turned away from the immutable good: however, it is evident that venial has conversion to a mutable good: therefore, in venial there is aversion from the immutable good and conversion to a mutable good.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Aversion from the immutable good does not have it through inhabiting grace: therefore, if one sinning venially is turned away from the immutable good, he does not have the immutable good through inhabiting grace: which is false, because then no one would be saved.

1. Likewise, One sinning venially loves the creature below God, therefore more than God: therefore, he is not turned away, because the weaker does not turn away the stronger, but the contrary.

Further, it is asked, Why is venial sin said to be evil? For evil is said from the privation of gratuitous good and the corruption of the natural: and venial sin neither deprives grace, nor corrupts natural good: therefore, it ought not to be called evil.

Solution. It must be said according to the Doctors, that venial sin has conversion to a mutable good only as to a lingering way, not however as to an end; and since according to the intention and will of the sinner only conversion is intended in sin, and aversion follows without will and without intention, venial will have only a disposition to aversion, and not aversion from the end: and therefore it does not have the full reason of sin, neither in conversion nor in aversion as mortal: and therefore venial sin is not rightly divided against mortal: whence neither conversion nor aversion has it in the same reason with mortal sin.

And through this the solution to the first is clear: because these two do not constitute venial and mortal sin in one reason, but they are in them by prior and posterior, just as sin is predicated of them by prior and posterior.

To the other it must be said, that what is directly turned away from the order of exit from the first, which exit is continuable into it as into an end, is mortal sin: because this corrupts the order even according to the habit in the turned away: but venial properly speaking is beside the order, and not against: because although with it there is not conversion to the immutable good according to act, since one cannot at the same time and once sin venially and merit according to act, it is not contrary to the order according to habit: because one sinning venially is converted according to habit, although not according to act.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Through Mortal Sin Man Merits Eternal Death, And Not For Venial Sin

Whether through mortal sin a man merits eternal death, and not for venial sin?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, D, around the middle: Mortal is that by which a man merits eternal death. For it seems that mortal and venial are proportionate on the part of conversion: because

1. Someone well loves temporal goods around God, and another loves beyond God: and it is evident that neither loves with infinite love: but the finite has every proportion to the finite: therefore venial is not exceeded by mortal infinitely. Therefore, since bitterness is due to sin on the part of conversion, it seems that it is an unjust judgment to punish one infinitely and the other finitely in fire.

If you say with Gregory, that this is because a man sins in his eternal, and therefore he will be punished in the eternal of God. On the contrary: Suppose that someone remains until death in venial sin, he sinned venially in his eternal: and yet he is not punished eternally: therefore neither does it seem that one sinning mortally in his eternal ought to be punished eternally.

1. Furthermore, it seems false that venial is punished temporally because when someone departs in mortal and venial: either venial is remitted to him after death, or not. If not: therefore he is punished eternally, and then it is false what is said in the Letter, that venial sin is punished temporally. Or it is remitted then after death: and then it is false what is said by the Church in song, that in hell there is no redemption.

2. If you say that venial sin is not punished eternally by itself, but insofar as it is joined to mortal, and this happens to it. On the contrary: Let us suppose that someone departs in original and venial, he is due sensible punishment from venial: but since he is not susceptible to grace after death, it is evident that venial is never remitted to him, because no sin is remitted without grace: therefore he will be in venial sin eternally: therefore the guilt of punishment remains eternally: therefore also the punishment: and thus venial sin not joined to mortal is punished eternally: therefore it is false what is said in the Letter.

Solution. Without prejudice, it must be said that although many reasons have been assigned by the Saints and Masters why mortal sin is punished eternally, yet one is above the others, which seems to me to be more compelling, namely this: because a man by himself subjects himself to perpetual impotence to exit from sin: but he has no power of himself to exit, and also in himself he does not have that from which there is the power to exit, which is grace: and therefore it is just that he who dies thus should be punished perpetually, and this Gregory calls (in my judgment) sinning in the eternal of man. But it is not so in venial sin: because in it the power to exit from sin is not taken away, nor does a man subject himself to perpetual impotence by will, since habitual will remains towards God. And therefore it is fitting that it be expiated temporally, just as it is turned away temporally according to act and not according to habit, and with the power of returning.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the conversion of mortal and venial is considered in two ways, namely according to the quantity of love which is in both: and thus both are finite, and neither is due the eternity of punishment, but bitterness: and these punishments are proportionate in this respect, just as the loves are, and the punishment of the fire of hell is not infinite in bitterness. They can also be considered according to the mode of conversion in comparison to aversion: and thus they differ as affirmation and negation, and as being and non-being, which differ infinitely: because mortal turns away, and venial does not turn away, but only disposes towards aversion: and thus punishments not proportionate respond to them.

To what is objected concerning venial existing with mortal in the same subject, I concede well.

But to what is objected, that one departing with venial and original is punished eternally: I say without prejudice, that the position is impossible.

There are, however, those who prove it thus, that before the years of adolescence one is not held to confer about his state, when he is born of unbelieving parents. Let us be in the first instant in which he is an adolescent, and in that instant the adolescent cannot be and confer: because it is prior to be an adolescent than to confer as an adolescent: therefore he can be an adolescent before he is held to confer. Let him sin venially, and depart, then he departs only in venial and original: and thus the position seems possible. To this, however, in my judgment it must be said that this proof errs in many ways: first, because to be an adolescent is to be in becoming and not in permanence, just as also youth and old age. And when it is said, Let us be in the first instant in which he is an adolescent, it is a foolish statement: because in such things which are in succession, there is no taking an instant in which they are, but time, and in the time in which he is an adolescent, he can and is held to confer: and if he omits, he sins mortally. Secondly, it errs: because given that the adolescent could be in the first instant, then in the same he can also confer or begin to confer, because someone can first be an adolescent and confer as an adolescent, because to be an adolescent does not precede to confer as an adolescent in time, but in nature: and in this way (in my judgment) the position is impossible. Even given that it is posited for the sake of disputation, then I say that he is punished with sensible punishment eternally: and this per accidens, and not per se.

And if it is objected, that according to this he is in purgatory or in hell and in limbo: therefore at the same time he is in different places, I say that he is locally in hell: and yet he only feels the bitterness due to venial: but he is not locally in limbo, but as to the punishment of limbo which is the lack of the vision of God.

Articulus 5 — According To What The Saints And The Masters Distinguish The Modes Of Sins

In what do the Saints and Masters distinguish the modes of sins?

In what do the Saints and Masters distinguish the modes of sins?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said, there, F, "The modes of sins have various distinctions in the Scriptures." For indeed, the modes determined here are found in many ways by the Saints to place differences of sins. Hence, 1 John 2:16: "All that is in the world is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life."

Likewise, on Psalm 37:6: "From the face of my ignorance," Gregory and Chrysostom say that every sin is from ignorance. Ambrose, however, says that every sin is from contempt. And Augustine, that every sin is from lust. And Bernard, that every sin is either from love of the world, or from excessive love of self.

And it is asked, In what are these taken?

The Philosopher also says, "that every evil person is ignorant." And Augustine, that every sin is from error. To dispute about all these would be long and burdensome. But the things that can be inquired are two, namely, how each of those is taken, according to which sin arises from it, and in what is the diversity of them taken?

Solution. It must be said that the diversity is threefold which the Master places in the text: and it is taken indeed generally, and first according to those inclining to sin from the part of the affection only. This, however, is either according to the order in good, and thus it is love badly inflaming: or according to the disordered flight from evil, and thus it is fear badly humbling. If, however, the cause of this inclination is considered first: then it is fear only, because as Augustine says, even fear arises from love: and this generally, either with respect to one's own good, or ordered to one's own: and first it is love of self, and in the second way love of the world: and according to those two is taken the saying of Bernard. If, however, it is taken inclining from the part of the affection generally according to comparison to the sweetness of the moving object: then it is lust, which is in every sin moving from the part of the affection. If, however, it is inclining from the part of the irascible in particular: then it is contempt. If indeed from the part of reason only: this can be in three ways, namely according to the privation of the governing habit, or according to the contrary habit to the governing, or according to the privation of knowledge not speculative but of the approval of good. And in the first way sin is from ignorance, in the second way from error, and in the third way from ignorance, about which the Philosopher says, that every evil person is ignorant. The division, however, brought from the epistle of John is taken according to the general objects moving the powers to sin: because that is either within, or outside. If within: then it is the lust of the flesh.

If outside: either according to the concupiscible, or according to the irascible. And in the first way it is the lust of the eyes. In the second way it is the pride of life.

The second diversity of concupiscence which Matthew places is taken according to the general instruments of sinning, which are the heart, mouth, and hands or work.

The third diversity is taken according to those against which the offense or harm of sinning is ordered, which are God, neighbor, and the sinner himself.

To that which is asked, What is ignorance? It must be said that ignorance is said in two ways, namely from the privation of that which is to be wise: and then it is the same as ignorance, and thus it is not the root of every sin. It is also said from the privation of wisdom and good: and thus every sin proceeds from it, because in every sin the good which is deserted by it is foolish.

Error, however, is said in two ways, namely in the knowledge of choosing, and thus it is not the root: and in choosing, and thus it is the root, because every sinner chooses erroneously, although he knows to choose otherwise.

Lust also is taken in two ways, namely actual inordinate pleasure of good, and thus it is a special actual sin. It is also said habitual concupiscence of changeable good, and thus it is the root of every sin: because otherwise changeable good pleases in every sin, since it is a conversion to it.

Love is also taken for the will inclined to good according to act, and thus it is a special affection. It is also taken for the habitual inordinate inclination of the will to one's own good, and thus it becomes the root: because thus it is in every sin.

In the same way it must be understood concerning fear with respect to the evil which fear flees.

And thus the solution to each of the questions is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Capital Vices Are Seven Or More

Whether there are seven capital vices or more? And, by what is the number of vices taken?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, "Furthermore, it must be known that there are seven vices," etc.

For it seems that there are more than seven: because:

1. The Gloss on Proverbs vi, 16, on that passage: "There are six things which the Lord hates," etc., states that it enumerates seven capital crimes there, and by comparison, it dismisses those sowing discord as lesser. But it does not enumerate any of those there. Therefore, those with these make at least fourteen.

Furthermore, vice is of a broader multiplication than virtue, since around one virtue there are at least two vices, one according to defect, and another according to excess: since there are seven virtues, it seems that there should be fourteen principal vices.

If you say that vices are taken by opposition to the cardinal virtues, and not by opposition to the theological virtues, then it seems that there are at least eight vices: because there are four cardinal virtues.

1. Likewise, Augustine in the book of Confessions enumerates these vices and adds foolishness and certain others. Therefore, there seem to be more than are enumerated here.
2. Furthermore, lust and gluttony are opposed to temperance: why then are not other vices taken by opposition to other cardinal virtues? For none is opposed to fortitude or prudence, except insofar as justice is a general virtue.
3. Likewise, since there are seven gifts, eight beatitudes, and twelve fruits, why are not other vices determined by opposition to these? For it seems that it should be done so: because the opposites of these are vices: therefore, just as these are principal in goods, so their opposites are principal in evils: therefore, now there will be many capital vices.
4. Likewise, it seems that there is some contradiction between Gregory and Isidore concerning these vices: because Isidore, on Deuteronomy vii, 1, enumerates thus: gluttony, avarice, fornication, wrath, sadness, sloth, vainglory. But Gregory enumerates on Job xxxv, as recited here in the text. However, it is clear that Isidore makes no mention of envy, nor even of pride: for vainglory and pride are not the same, since vainglory is the same as unclean glory from "kenos" which is empty, and "doxa" which is glory, or vain glory: but vain glory is not the same as pride: therefore, there seems to be a contradiction.

Solution. To these and other things which could easily be objected against the division, it must be said that a capital vice is said in two ways. In one way, that which is to be punished by death: and thus it is taken in the Gloss on Proverbs vi, 16. In another way, that which is the head in the number of vices, to which the others are reduced as members: and thus a capital vice is taken here as a fountain-like vice, from which the others arise; and therefore, according to both Isidore and Gregory, many daughters are assigned to each of these which are born from it.

To the other, it must be said that although vice is opposed to virtue, it is not necessary that the first vice is opposed to the principal virtue: and therefore capital vices are not taken by opposition to the cardinal virtues, or theological virtues, or gifts, or beatitudes, but by general things moving the appetite, to which as to a cause other vices can be reduced, as will be clear below.

By this, however, the solution to all except the last is now clear.

And to that it must be said that pride is taken in two ways. In one way generally, according to which pride is said to be as if it is a way to any higher things: and thus the appetite for excellence to any higher things is called pride: and thus it is not a special and capital vice, but rather the cause of all vices: and thus it is taken by Isidore: and thus Gregory also calls pride the queen of vices. And thus vainglory or empty glory is taken under it, and thus it is glory from unworthy dignity, and that is special and capital.

In the second way, pride is said specifically as the appetite for dignity or preeminence: and thus it is the same as vainglory in the aforementioned way, and thus it is said by Gregory to be one of the capital vices: and vainglory is the same as the appetite for glory in praise which is empty: and since praise is not the principal mover to which others are reduced, it will not be a capital vice in this way, but a daughter of the capital.

If, however, it is inquired, by what is the number of these vices taken?

It must be said that the principal movers are either on the part of the spirit or on the part of the flesh. If on the part of the spirit: either they move by the reason of apparent good, or of apparent evil. If according to the reason of apparent good: either of good which is in itself, or of that which is in another. If in itself: then there is a perverse order in that: and thus it is pride, which is exalted above the good received generally. If, however, it is in another: then the perverse order in that is to desire that good through envy, and this again in kind. If, however, it is moving according to the reason of apparent evil: either that which is punishment, or that which is guilt. If it is the appetite against the evil of guilt to be destroyed, it cannot be perverse: and therefore on that part there cannot be any vice. If, however, it is against the evil of punishment: either in itself, or in another. If it is against the evil of punishment in itself and in a perverse way: then it is sloth, which flees the punishment which is from spiritual labor: and therefore it seeks to wander, because in spiritual things it does not find whence it may rejoice, because it considers them laborious. If, however, it is the evil of apparent punishment in another and in a perverse way: then it is wrath which is the appetite for vengeance, because it seems to have inflicted punishment on the one to whom it is angry.

If, however, it is objected that apparent good is multiplied by the good of any virtue, as there is apparent truth, and apparent height, and apparent delight: therefore, it is necessary to multiply vices by the appetite in those.

Likewise, just as there is the delight of the sense of taste, and the sense of touch: so there are delights of other senses: therefore, just as two vices are taken by the delight of taste and touch, so vices should be taken by the delights of others. It must be said that it is not true: because since truth in morals is ordered to good, there is not a complete appetite in apparent truth: and therefore by truth a capital vice cannot be taken: thus infidelity and error are not capital vices, although they are criminal and mortal. And the cause of this is because it is not by a complete appetite, but there is error there from deception which, insofar as it is deception, is not voluntary: and therefore if infidelity were a capital vice, there would not be leaders with the queen, as Gregory says: because it could be that the queen pride was present, and the other six vices, but not infidelity: and therefore infidelity cannot be a capital vice.

To the other it must be said that the delights especially of the concupiscible and irascible, since they are parts of the sensitive soul, as Damascene and Aristotle and Avicenna and Jerome say on the beginning of Ezekiel in the Gloss, are not outside the flesh: and since the principal act of the irascible is to rise up fighting against the harmful, this has a place in sloth and wrath. But the concupiscible especially is to desire the delight of the flesh: and this has in the delight of taste and touch in the highest; and therefore by this no special is taken except gluttony and lust.

To the other it must be said that as it is proven in the questions about the Soul, no sense simply has delight except touch alone, and taste insofar as it is a certain touch: and therefore by the delights of other senses capital vices are not taken, as by the delight of taste and touch.

Articulus 8 — What Difference There Is Between The Beginning And The Root; And Which Is More Essential To Sin, Namely, Pride Or Avarice

What is the difference between the beginning and the root? And, which is more essential to sin, namely, pride or avarice?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, I, near the end: To this, however, it seems rightly to oppose, etc.

And briefly three things are asked under one article. First, what is the difference between the root and the beginning? Second, which is more essential to sin, namely pride or avarice? Third, whether it is a special sin, or two sins, or two evils, or one?

To the first, it proceeds thus: One motion has only one principle: and the beginning is a principle: therefore the beginning and the root are the same.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: But on the contrary, in sin there are two things, namely aversion and conversion: and in aversion, sin begins insofar as it is sin: therefore from that part it has a beginning: but conversion, because of delight, provides nourishment and juice: therefore from that part it has a root: therefore the beginning and the root are not the same.

TO THE SECOND thus:
1. If we consider sin according to the intention and will of the sinner, it is not intended and willed from the part of aversion, but intended and willed from the part of conversion: therefore from that part it is more effectively initiated than from the other part: therefore covetousness is more the root and more effective than pride is the beginning.

1. Likewise, sin from the part of conversion has a term and end to which the will is moved, and the species by which it is distinguished: therefore what inclines to that, more substantially regards sin than that which is in sin according to aversion in which neither the end nor the term of the will is, nor is the species of sin distinguished: therefore from that part again it follows that covetousness more substantially regards sin than pride.

But on the contrary, this is what Augustine says in the book on Free Will, that sin is not from this that it is conversion to a changeable good, because to be converted to a good is not evil: but it is sin through aversion. Therefore what initiates from the part of aversion regards more substantially than that which initiates it from the part of conversion: but in the former way pride initiates, in the second way avarice: therefore pride regards more essentially than avarice.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that sin is not the appetite of evil things, but the desertion of better things: but there is no appetite of evil things insofar as they are evil: but pride initiates according to that which is the desertion of better things, therefore pride is essentially in sin.
2. Likewise, sin is death: but death is more separation from the cause of life than pain: therefore since pride initiates sin according to that which separates from God, it initiates it more essentially than avarice.

To the THIRD, Augustine thus says:
The beginning of all sin is pride, and the root of all evils is covetousness. Let us beware therefore of pride and avarice, not two evils, but one evil. This is the Gloss on Exodus, last chapter. Therefore it seems that pride and avarice are the same vice.

But on the contrary, this is what the Master says in the Letter, last chapter, where he wishes that they initiate sin separately and not together: and therefore he wishes that it be understood concerning the genera of each, that each is said to be the beginning of all sin, and not of the individuals of the genera.

Solution. It must be said that the beginning and the root differ in reason, although they are the same in subject. For the root, as was touched upon in objecting, begins sin from the part of conversion which is material in it. But the beginning is the first from the part of aversion, as the first objection proves. Hence pride, when taken generally for habitual pride which makes a way over the will of the superior, is the beginning in sin, and not properly the root. But covetousness, also generally accepted for habitual lust for a changeable good, is the root providing nourishment to illicit appetite.

And through this the solution to what is first asked is clear, that from the part of sin insofar as it is sin, pride is the beginning: but from the part of sin in us or the sinner, covetousness is the beginning.

To what is second asked, it must be said that the solution is now clear, that pride is more the beginning: but avarice is more the root, because that begins from the part of being sin according to which it is sin, but covetousness begins more from the part where there is conversion.

From this the solution to all the objections concerning this is clear: because by that to which the conversion is made, the sin is also distinguished into species, even if it does not receive the formal character of sin from it.

§ To the third it must be said that pride is taken generally, and specifically. Generally, it is an habitual overstepping of the height of the divine will, to which the sinner does not submit: and thus it is the beginning of all evil, and thus it is not a specific and capital vice. In a second way, it is taken according as it has its end as excellence in a specific matter which is the dignity of prelacy and honor: and thus it is not a root, but nevertheless thus it can be the cause of all vices in number.

§ Avarice is also spoken of in two ways, namely as an habitual lust for mutable good: and thus it is the root of every sin, and thus it is the same in subject with pride spoken of in the first way, although it differs in formal character (ratione), just as aversion and conversion differ which are in the same sin, and thus Augustine takes it. In another way avarice is spoken of, which has its end as possessing unto sufficiency in a specific matter which is the good of fortune: and this is a specific capital vice, and is not a root: yet it is taken in this way by the Master in the Text, when he says that all sins can be caused from it as regards the genera of single sins, and not as regards the single sins of the genera: but thus it is not a root, since a root is an essential inner part of a thing: but a cause is not a part, nor conjoined to the thing as a part. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XLIII

Divisio Textus

Furthermore there is a certain kind of sin more grave than the rest, etc. Here the Master treats of the differences of the more grave sin, which is the sin against the Holy Spirit.

And it is divided into four parts: in the first of which he compares this sin to others, and shows that it is more grave. In the second, he posits the assignment of this sin according to Augustine, from which four species of it are drawn, there, A, § 2: But it is asked, What is that sin, etc.? Now the four species which are gathered there, are obstinacy or induration, final impenitence, despair, and presumption.

In the third part, he posits another assignment according to Augustine, from which two other species are drawn, namely envy of fraternal grace, and the attacking of recognized truth, there, C: There is also another. In the fourth, he posits the assignment of this sin according to Ambrose, from which the same two others, yet by another rationale, are extracted, namely there, D: Concerning this sin also, etc.

Articulus 1 — What It Is To Be A Sin Against The Holy Spirit

What is it to be a sin against the Holy Spirit?

Now there occur concerning the first part here three things to be inquired into, the first of which is, What is it to be a sin against the Holy Spirit? Second, Why is the sin against the Holy Spirit called unto death? Third, Whether it is a special sin separated from others, or is conjoined to other sins as a circumstance of the sin or an accident of it?

To the first one proceeds thus: § 1. Every sin is against grace which is the effect of the Holy Spirit: since therefore this is to be a sin against the Holy Spirit, that it is against the attribute of the Holy Spirit, it seems that every sin is against the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Also, every evil is opposed to goodness: but malice is in every mortal sin: therefore every mortal sin is opposed to goodness: but the sin against the Holy Spirit is so called, because it is opposed to the goodness of the Holy Spirit: therefore every mortal sin is a sin against the Holy Spirit.

§ 3. Moreover, it seems rather to be a sin against the Holy Spirit, in which one thinks badly concerning the Holy Spirit, like Eutyches who said that the Holy Spirit is a servant: therefore it seems that the sin against the Holy Spirit is a sin proceeding from error against the Holy Spirit. But if this is conceded. On the contrary: A sin proceeding from ignorance is a sin against the Son: but a sin concerning which one thinks badly of the Holy Spirit, is a sin proceeding from ignorance: therefore it is a sin against the Son: therefore it is not against the Holy Spirit.

§ 4. Also, it seems that no sin is against the Holy Spirit: because every sin is born from the infirmity and corruption of nature: therefore every sin is from infirmity: but this is to sin against the Father: therefore every sin is against the Father: therefore it seems that no sin is against the Holy Spirit.

§ 5. Also, it seems that every sin is against the Son: because the Philosopher says that every evil person is ignorant therefore sin is from ignorance: but this is to sin against the Son: therefore every sin is against the Son: therefore no sin is against the Holy Spirit.

§ 6. Also, it seems that he who sins against one, sins against another: because just as the one substance belongs to the three, so the one offense belongs to the three: therefore he who sins against one, also sins against another.

§ 7. Also, there is one goodness of the three: therefore he who sins against one, sins against another: therefore to sin against goodness, is to sin against the three persons equally: therefore to sin against goodness, is to sin against the three persons.

§ 8. Also, the three persons have a greater union than the virtues have with charity: but on account of the union of virtue with charity, he who offends in one, is made guilty of all ; therefore much more on account of the union of the persons to one another, one sinning against one, sins against all.

But if this is conceded, to the contrary will be what is said in the Text.

Solution. It must be said that a certain sin by its name expresses only the sin: and a certain sin by its name expresses the sin, and the cause of the sin. An example of the first is fornication, which names only the illicit act or the intercourse of an unmarried man with an unmarried woman. But a certain sin names at the same time the moving cause on the part of the sinner, as a sin against the Father, and a sin against the Son, and a sin against the Holy Spirit: for that expresses the sin, and the moving cause, which is infirmity, or ignorance, or malice. Now there is a third mode of naming, when the name of the sin expresses both the act of the sin, and the circumstance, as incest, or defloration, or sacrilege, or things of this kind: but this mode does not serve the present purpose.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that a sin against the Holy Spirit is spoken of in two ways, namely from the object concerning which the sin is, and from the moving cause to the sin. From the object, when namely it is against the person of the Holy Spirit, just as also many sin against the person of the Son, and fewer against the person of the Father. But the sin against the Holy Spirit is not taken in this way here: but rather in the moving cause to the sin, it has contrariety to the goodness of the Spirit, just as a sin from malice is contrary to the goodness of the Holy Spirit, in which sins are remitted in the Church. And through this it is clear, that not every sin is against the Holy Spirit, because it does not have such a moving cause: but every sin deprives of grace through the contrariety which it has to grace: yet the moving cause to the sin is not contrary to the goodness of the Holy Spirit in which He remits sins.

Through this the solution to the second is clear.

§ To the third it must be said that this is a sin against the Holy Spirit spoken of in the first way: and thus the sin against the Holy Spirit is not treated here: for in this way a sin against the Holy Spirit is spoken of, just as a sin against man, or against oneself, or against God.

§ To the next it must be said that it is one thing for a sin to be from infirmity, and another to be with the infirmity of corruption from whence it draws its origin. For when it is said to be from infirmity: then infirmity is understood to be the moving cause: just as when someone blasphemes from fear of punishments, or sins from fear of poverty: and this is properly called a sin against the Father. But not every sin proceeds from such a motive, but sometimes nothing moves except malice and the industry of sin. Sin is also said to be with the infirmity of corruption from which the temptation to sin arises, and thus after the state of corruption every sin is from infirmity: but then the preposition from (ex) does not denote the cause moving proximately to the act, but remotely: because namely the infirmity of corruption is the origin from which every temptation to sin is constituted and arises: and this infirmity admits another proximately moving cause, which is malice on account of which it will be called against the Holy Spirit.

§ To the next it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of the ignorance which is the privation of knowledge, not of just any knowledge, but of that which is called the knowledge of approbation, namely when in works the good is not approved: and every evil person is deprived of that knowledge in act. But that ignorance does not make a sin against the Son, but rather that which expresses an absolute or relative privation of the knowledge governing in works, on account of which the committed fault becomes excusable either in whole or in part.

§ To the next it must be said that although the three persons agree and are one in subject, yet they do not agree and are not one in their proper characteristics (propriis): and as regards the proper characteristics something can be contrary to one, which will not be against another.

§ Also, the middle term as regards the mode of understanding between the substantial and notional properties are the appropriated properties: and these are considered in two ways, namely according to what they are, and thus they express the substance: and according to the appropriated properties, and thus they are not known except from the rationale of the proper characteristics: and as regards this something can be against the appropriated property of one person, which does not happen against the appropriated property of another person: and in this way we speak here. Whence although there is one offense, yet the cause of the offense does not have one opposition to the appropriated properties of the persons, insofar as they are appropriated.

§ To the next it must be said that there is one goodness of the three, insofar as goodness is considered in itself and substantially: but if it is considered under the rationale of an appropriated property, then it receives a specific rationale which is attributed to the Holy Spirit: and in this way it is a sin against the Holy Spirit as regards the moving cause which is contrary to it.

§ To the next it must be said that through the offense it is against all: but just as it is in sin, that through the rationale of malice it deprives of all virtue, and yet through the rationale of the act it is not contrary except to one: so it is concerning the sin against the Holy Spirit, namely that through the offense it is against the three persons, yet through the moving cause it is not contrary except to the attribute of the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 2 — Why Sin Against The Holy Spirit Is Said To Be Unto Death

Why is the sin against the Holy Spirit called unto death?

Secondly it is asked, Why is it said, There is a sin unto death [199]?

§ 1. And this through the rationale of the name: because mortal is that which makes one die here by the death of fault, and in the future by the death of punishment, unless it is deleted by penance: but such is any mortal sin: therefore every sin is a sin unto death.

§ 2. Also, 1 John 5:16, upon that: There is a sin unto death, not for that, etc., the Gloss says: "A sin unto death is that which separates from God, just as death separates the soul from the body" but every mortal sin does this: therefore, etc.

§ 3. Also, in the same place, in another Gloss: "A sin unto death is that which endures unto the end" but such is a venial and mortal sin in which someone finishes life without penance: therefore any mortal and venial sin can be against the Holy Spirit: which is false, since it is said in the Text that it itself is more grave than the rest and the greatest.

§ 4. But if a sin unto death is said to be that in which the potency of revivifying or returning to life is deprived: then it seems that every sin is a sin unto death: because in every mortal sin the life of grace and the potency of returning to grace is deprived: since man is a spirit going by itself into sin, and not returning by itself from sin, it seems that there is no reason why this sin specially should be called a sin [unto death].

Alongside this it is also further asked, Why does John say, 5:16: I do not say that anyone should ask for that?

§ 1. For thus it is held in the second assignment of Augustine, that one should despair of no one while he is in life, as long as the kindness of God leads to penance: and for him one does not pray imprudently, concerning whose salvation one does not despair: therefore for him who sins against the Holy Spirit, we ought to pray: therefore he does badly by prohibiting prayer.

§ 2. Also, prayer is for impetrating pardon: where therefore there is a greater necessity of pardon, there the prayer is greater and more frequent: but there is never so great a necessity as in the greatest sins, as in sins against the Holy Spirit: therefore for it one must maximally pray: therefore he ought not to say, I do not say that anyone should ask for that, but rather, I say that every man should pray for that.

Solution. It must be said that a sin unto death expresses more than a mortal sin. And so that this may be better understood, it must be noted that there are three things in corporeal death, and three responding to them in spiritual death. The first is the separation of the soul from the body: because the soul is the cause of the life of the body. The second is the impotence to return to habit from privation. And the third is the cause of disease or death in the dead subject being repugnant to life. And to these correspond three in spiritual death. And the first is done through the act of sin which separates God and grace from the soul. But the second is from the defect of free choice, which by itself cannot recover grace: and every mortal sin has these two, and for so much is it called a mortal sin. The third is from the cause of death, which is contrary to the disposing to the influx of life on the part of God: and thus the sin against the Holy Spirit is unto death: because the moving cause to that kind of sin is contrary to the goodness by which He moves the Spirit vivifying all things, to this that it may inflow life: and through this the solution is almost clear to all the things which were objected as regards the first part: because mortal and unto death are not the same: because when it is said unto death, by virtue of the preposition an order to the impediment of the inflowing life, and the cause of the sin, is denoted.

§ To the next it must be said that those Glosses call a mortal sin unto death: and speak concerning the separation of life, in the cause of which is an order contrary to that which inclines to the influx of spiritual life.

§ To the next it must be said that to finish life in mortal sin happens in two ways, namely as regards the proposal, and thus it is a sin...

against the Holy Spirit: and as to the continuation in sin, and thus it is not against the Holy Spirit: but this is special, which was proposed not to repent of the sin committed.

To the other, the solution is clear from the aforementioned.

As to what is further asked, How is it understood, I do not say that anyone should pray for him, that is, whoever?

It must be said that he does not forbid every prayer, but signifies the magnitude of the crime, that is, that he does not command anyone from the people to pray: but someone of special sanctity and perfection ought to pray for such, because it is for the great to pray for the great.

199. 1 John 5:16.

But if it is objected concerning what was said to Samuel, How long will you mourn for Saul, since the Lord has rejected him? and to Jeremiah, that he should not pray for the people? it seems to be understood in this way, that no one should pray, because it is altogether of no avail. It must be said that this is not to the purpose: because neither Saul nor the people had sinned against the Holy Spirit: but God had confirmed the sentence of rejection of Saul, and of the captivity of the Jews, and in this He did not wish to hear the Prophets.

Articulus 3 — Whether Sin Against The Holy Spirit Is A Special Sin Separated From All Others

Whether sin against the Holy Spirit is a special sin separate from all others?

Thirdly, it is asked whether it is a special sin separate from other sins?

And it seems that it is: because 1. Remissible and irremissible are passions that pertain to sin according to which it is considered in species: therefore, since sin against the Holy Spirit is said to be irremissible, it will be a species of sin according to itself.

1. Likewise, that sin, as the Masters are accustomed to say, is opposed to the special grace in which the remission of sin is made with grace informing free will to act: but that which is opposed to special grace is a special sin: therefore, sin against the Holy Spirit is a special sin.
2. Likewise, in the text it is said that it is a certain sin graver than others: but it is not compared to other special sins unless it is a special sin: therefore, it is a special sin.
3. Likewise, sin is not divided into species unless it is taken in a determined genus: but sin against the Holy Spirit, here in the text and by the Masters, is divided into species: therefore, it is a genus of sin according to itself.
4. Likewise, to oppose known grace or to envy fraternal grace are said to be special acts: but these acts are sin against the Holy Spirit: therefore, the sins moving towards them are special sins: therefore, also other special sins are another species of sin against the Holy Spirit.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Sin against the Father is sin from infirmity: and sin against the Son is sin from ignorance: but such are not special sin, but many diverse sins according to the species of the act can be from infirmity, and also from ignorance: therefore, since sin against the Holy Spirit divides sin differently with those, it rather seems to denote a circumstance of sin than a special sin.

1. Likewise, to sin from certain malice denotes a circumstance accusing from the part of the sinner: but this is sin against the Holy Spirit: therefore, it seems that sin against the Holy Spirit is not a species of sin, but a circumstance of sin.

2. Likewise, that which can circumstantiate the same act in species is a circumstance: but to sin from coercion through malice, as Richard of Saint Victor says in the epistle on the spirit of blasphemy, and to sin from ignorance, and to sin from malice, can be around the same act in species, as around denying or blaspheming Christ: therefore, they are circumstances, and not species of sins.

3. Likewise, a special sin seeks a determined nature: but sin against the Holy Spirit does not have a determined nature, but rather is founded upon other sins, as is evident in obstinacy, and despair, and presumption, and final impenitence: therefore, sin against the Holy Spirit is not a special sin separate from others.

Solution. It must be said that sin against the Holy Spirit, according to the reason by which it is drawn into species, is separate from other sins. However, from the part of the matter around which it is, sometimes it is conjoined with other sins, sometimes separate. For according to the two species which are envy of fraternal grace and opposition to recognized truth, it does not suppose other sins for matter: but in the four other species, it supposes other sins in the subject: but it does not suppose them as a circumstance of their act, because it always has an act separate from the acts of other sins, although it does not have an act separate, so that other sins are the matter around which the act of this sin is made.

Therefore, it must be said to the first objection, that sin against the Holy Spirit is divided against sin against the Father and against the Son, by reason of the cause which it says with the act, and not by reason of the act: and therefore it does not follow that it is only a circumstance of sin like sin against the Father, but because it says a circumstance, by reason of which it is opposed to sin against the Father and sin against the Son. However, as was said above, sin against the Father is said in two ways, namely according to which it is against the Father, so that the Father is the matter of the act and object: and according to which it is from a cause which is against the attribute of the Father: and in this last way it is taken here by the Master. But if it were taken in the first way, it would have a special act, and it would be a special sin separate from others.

To the other objection, it must be said that although certain malice denotes a remaining cause which sounds a circumstance from the part of the sinner, nevertheless it also supposes an interior act of will: because one does not sin from certain malice unless one wills evil, and it pleases him for its own sake, as it is said in the text: and this is to be moved by a special act around sin. But it is not so in sin from infirmity, nor from ignorance: because such a one does not will infirmity or ignorance or even evil: and therefore those are only circumstances: but sin against the Holy Spirit is both a circumstance and an act.

To the other objection, it must be said that that which is a circumstance in sin against the Holy Spirit can be around a similar act in species around which infirmity moving and ignorance are: but from this it is not called a special sin, but rather from this that with such a circumstance posited, the act of the will of evil is also posited, namely of the interior for which it is made a special sin.

To the last, the solution is evident through the principle of this solution: because a special sin does not always seek special matter, but the act suffices for it, and its matter is sometimes other sins.

And through this the solution to all that was asked is evident.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Species Of Sin Against The Holy Spirit Are Well Assigned

Whether the species of sin against the Holy Spirit are well assigned?

Whether the species of sin against the Holy Spirit are well assigned?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, A, §2: But it is asked, What is that sin?

For there it seems to touch upon the species of sin against the Holy Spirit: and it is objected concerning those species, and it seems.

1. That hardness is not a species of sin, but an accident of the sinner. For it says in the Letter thus, that obstinacy is in the constancy of a hardened mind in malice, through which a man becomes impenitent: however, that obstinacy does not regard one or two sins, but all, and similarly impenitence: therefore it will not be a defined sin, but rather a property of the sinner with all sins.
2. Furthermore, from the second part of this definition it seems that obstinacy is not a species distinct from final impenitence, but is its cause: and this is against many who say there are six species of this sin.
3. Further, it is inquired about impenitence: because that seems to be nothing other than the continuation of sin until death without penance: however, many die in such a state even in small sins: therefore all those sin against the Holy Spirit: and this is false, because thus all the damned would have sinned against the Holy Spirit.
4. Further, it is also objected concerning despair. For since despair is against hope, and similarly presumption, there should be something against faith and charity: and this does not seem to be the case: therefore sins against the Holy Spirit are insufficiently assigned.
5. Likewise, charity is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore its species should especially be taken according to the contrary of charity, and we have none such.
6. Likewise, Augustine says that infidelity is a sin by which all are retained: therefore it is the greatest sin: but in the Letter it is said that sin against the Holy Spirit is the greatest sin: therefore it seems that infidelity is a sin against the Holy Spirit.

Further, it is inquired about the species which he touches upon in the second assignment, which are the impugnation of recognized truth, and envy of fraternal grace.

1. For since truth is attributed to the Son, the impugnation of recognized truth is rather a sin against the Son than against the Holy Spirit.

2. Similarly, it is objected concerning the second, that if envy is a sin against the Holy Spirit, then the envious sin against the Holy Spirit: which is grave to say.

Solution. It must be said that according to the more approved Doctors, there are two opinions concerning the number of species of sin against the Holy Spirit: one of which is held by many moderns, and posits there to be six, which are thus taken. Let those things which are above be supposed, namely that sin against the Holy Spirit according to its complete notion signifies that genus of sin which is opposed to the attribute of the Holy Spirit in the cause moving to sin, and to that attribute which according to the notion of understanding inclines one to retain sin, because this is its goodness: and that it opposes the Holy Spirit not in itself, but in those things which are required for the remission of sin, which are its gifts. However, since three things concur for remission, namely the one remitting, and the one to whom it is remitted, and the good of the Church which is communicated to the one to whom it is remitted, because sin is not remitted except in the Church in the sacraments. Since, I say, it is so, from the part of each of these two things are required for the remission of sin. From the part of the one remitting, mercy is required in remitting the whole guilt, and in changing eternal punishment into temporal. From the part of the penance imposed by the power of the keys, justice is required willing satisfaction through the imposed punishment. But despair opposes this mercy, and presumption opposes this justice. From the part of the one to whom remission is made, they say there are two things, namely sorrow for the committed sin, and the purpose of not committing it in the future. And obstinacy opposes the first, which is pleased with sin through act: and final impenitence opposes the second, which is the purpose of never repenting of sin. From the part of the Church also there are two things, namely the efficacy of the sacraments and faith, which are in the Church: and that is opposed by what is called the impugnation of recognized truth, as if you knew an article of faith to be true, and said it was false out of malice: or if you knew sins to be remitted in baptism, and said it was false out of malice: or if you knew through works that miracles and divine things were true, and said out of malice they were done by Beelzebub. As is clear below in the words of Ambrose, the common good which is in the members of the Church is also required, which is communicated to each through fraternal charity: and this is opposed by envy of fraternal grace.

Another opinion, which has fewer followers, says there are five species of sin against the Holy Spirit: and it does not differ from this one except in this alone: for it reduces obstinacy and final impenitence into one species: because the purpose of never repenting always arises from the obstinacy of sin: and this seems to have been the opinion of the Master in the Letter: and some great ones follow him in this.

But according to this assignment it seems that despair is a sin of infidelity: because he who says his iniquity is greater than God's mercy is moved by infidelity against the greatness of God: because God in any of His attributes is greater than can be thought: therefore infidelity is to despair, and not a sin against the Holy Spirit. A similar objection is about the sin of presumption: for the one presuming says God is not just: but this is infidelity: therefore the one presuming is an infidel, and not sinning against the Holy Spirit.

But it is objected on the contrary: because 1. Sin is against God, and to be punished in sins shows only faith: therefore since the one despairing is moved by these motions, namely the knowledge of the greatness of sin, and the rigor of justice in punishing, he is moved by the motion of faith: but he cannot be moved by the motion of faith and infidelity at the same time: therefore the one despairing is not an infidel. The same objection is about the one presuming: because he knows God's mercy forgiving through faith.

1. It also seems that the aforementioned assignment is insufficient for another reason: because Bede says: We fall into four things from sin, namely we have weakness, ignorance, malice, and concupiscence: but sin against the Father is according to weakness, and sin against the Son is according to ignorance, and sin against the Holy Spirit is according to malice: therefore we should also have some genus of sin according to concupiscence: and we do not have it: therefore the Master in the Letter seems insufficient in assigning the genera of sins.

Further, it is also inquired, since weakness is a punishment and also ignorance and concupiscence, why the fourth was not a punishment, namely malice: or if it is a punishment, why it does not excuse the sin itself as the others do.

To the last objections, it must be responded, and it must be said to the first, that the one despairing is not an infidel, and the objection supposes something false: for the one despairing does not think his iniquity is greater than the mercy of God, but his iniquity is greater than God ought or wills to have mercy: and this sounds like the word of Cain, who did not say, My iniquity is greater than your mercy: but, than that I may deserve pardon, that is, that I can merit it: and in this he spoke truly, but not that you never will to have mercy: because God does not demand satisfaction of condignity, but satisfaction of congruity which we can offer. In the same way it must be said about the one presuming, that he well considers God to be just: but because mercy exalts over judgment, he says God does not use justice in punishing sins.

To the other it must be said, that concupiscence does not signify any special moving of any power determinately like ignorance which is present according to reason, and infidelity which overflows into the Holy Spirit from the flesh, and like malice which is in the will: but, as the Gloss says, on Romans vii, 7: Concupiscence is conflated from all, and is a defect spread

In all powers according to natural appetite: because each power desires its object, and therefore it sometimes moves with ignorance, sometimes with weakness, sometimes with malice, and it is not a distinct motive: and therefore no special genus of sin is taken according to it.

To the other it must be said, that without doubt according to which malice is a consequence of sin, it is a punishment: and it sounds the same as malignability, because man through sin has become malignable: but nevertheless because this punishment is subject to liberty and will, and not weakness or ignorance, therefore this does not excuse the whole or part.

To what is objected at the beginning, it must be said that obstinacy is said in two ways, namely the habitual hardness itself, and this is not a sin, but a punishment left from the custom of sinning. It is also said the actual affection of past sin, when namely one delights when he has done evil, and exults in the worst things: then it is a sin against the Holy Spirit.

To the other it must be said, that also impenitence is said in two ways, namely impenitence in sins, and from that the objection proceeds: and the actual purpose of never repenting, and this is a sin against the Holy Spirit: because it proceeds neither from weakness nor from ignorance, but from malice and the pleasure of evil.

To what is objected, that obstinacy does not differ from final impenitence, the solution is clear from what has been said in the assignment of species according to different opinions.

To the other it must be said, that despair is not said to be a sin against the Holy Spirit because it is against hope, but rather because it is against the grace in which sins are remitted: and therefore those objections are of no value: But because this solution seems to be an evasion, it must be said that hope is not only of the uncreated, but also of pardon and grace: but faith is not, but relies on the first truth, and charity on goodness: and because pardon and grace and other things of which there is hope, work for the remission of sin, for this reason it is more a sin against the Holy Spirit against hope, than against faith and charity.

To what is objected concerning the second assignment, it must be said that the truth which is impugned in this sin is that which is according to impiety, and for this reason it is attributed to the Spirit of truth. Or it is said, that it does not say against the Holy Spirit only, because it is against the person of the Holy Spirit or the attribute of that person or another, but because the moving cause is contrary to the attribute: and although truth is impugned, nevertheless because it is impugned out of malice, therefore it is a sin not against the Son, but against the Holy Spirit.

To the last it must be said, that it is not the same envy, and envy of fraternal grace: because envy is with sadness in the good of the neighbor, insofar as it is an impediment to one's own good: and therefore Job, v, 2, says that envy kills the little one: because unless he considered himself little, that is, impedible in his own good, he would not envy another. But goods which impede each other are those which are diminished from community, such as riches, honors, praises, and such worldly things. But envy of fraternal grace is properly with respect to a good which is not diminished from the participation of many, but rather grows, as is spiritual good: and this cannot be impugned from ignorance or weakness in the neighbor, because it is not impugned unless it is known. And therefore that envy proceeds from malice against the gift of the Holy Spirit.

Through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether Sin Against The Holy Spirit Ought To Be Called Irremissible

Should the sin against the Holy Spirit be called irremissible?

Should the sin against the Holy Spirit be called irremissible?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, But it is asked, Whether every obstinacy, etc.

For here the Master treats of how it is irremissible: and concerning this it is asked thus:

If that sin is called irremissible, this will only be on account of the magnitude of the sin, or on account of the impotence of remission. But not on account of the magnitude, as is proved in the Text by the words of Augustine. If, however, it is called irremissible on account of the impotence towards remission: this impotence will either be on the part of the one remitting, or on the part of the one to whom it is remitted. Not in the first way: because thus no sin is irremissible to the omnipotent physician who is equally potent to save in many things and in few, and in great things and in small. If, however, it is called irremissible on the part of the one to whom it is remitted: thus every mortal sin would be called irremissible: and thus every mortal sin will be a sin against the Holy Spirit. If, however, it is called irremissible, because it is not remitted neither in this world nor in the future: thus every sin in which someone departs without grace, will be a sin against the Holy Spirit, which again is false.

SOLUTION. It must be said that that sin is called irremissible not on the part of the guilt, nor on the part of the one remitting, nor on the part of the one to whom it is remitted, but on the part of the cause moving to remit, and it is the same cause which moves to sin: for this is malice: and this accuses, and it does not have the congruity of remission, because it does not have a cloak of excuse: hence that it is sometimes remitted, this is out of the mere piety of the physician.

But Richard of St. Victor touches upon another cause in his epistle On the Spirit of Blasphemy, saying that just as charity does not fall away, but is perfected, because it has an object and an act of remaining in the future, and here, but there more perfectly: so that sin as to its cause and act is not remitted, because it has a more abundant cause in the future world than here: for its cause is the love of sin, and the hatred of God: and this abounds more in the damned, than in the evil here. It is similar in the other species besides presumption alone.

Others assign other causes up to six, which with these will be eight. And of these six, the first is: because it is opposed to the font of mercy. Hence Augustine says on Matthew 12:32: The sin against the Holy Spirit is, when someone is agitated by the torches of envy against the grace of God. The second is, because such a one scarcely humbles himself to seek pardon: and this is held in the Text. The third is, because it is rarely and to few forgiven: and of this can be expounded that of the Apostle to the Romans 2:5: But according to your hardness, etc. The fourth is, because it is not read to have been forgiven. Hence, Luke 12:10, on that, He who shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit, the Gloss says: This blasphemer, his merits demanding it, just as he is never to arrive at remission, so he is never to arrive at penance. The fifth is also the one which Richard assigns, because in such [sins] nothing is diminished of the due punishment, that is, less than in others: because they do not have an excuse in the cause moving to that sin. Hence Richard says thus: The sin of the devil is inexpiable, because it can in no way be expiated: and through this is evident the difference between the irremissible sin against the Holy Spirit, for which no relaxation of punishment is accustomed to be made: inexpiable, and irremissible. The sixth is, because such a one never merits to obtain the grace of penance. Hence, Matt 12: 32, on that, He who shall speak against the Holy Spirit, the Gloss says: He who sins against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be remitted to him, because he does not merit to do penance so that it may be remitted.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

D. Another assignment of the sin against the Holy Spirit.

Discussing this sin against the Holy Spirit, Ambrose in the book On the Holy Spirit hands down a defined assignment, saying: Why the Lord said, 'He who shall blaspheme against the Son of Man it shall be remitted him: but he who shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit it shall not be remitted him, neither here, nor in the future', advert diligently. Is the offense of the Son one thing, and that of the Holy Spirit another? Just as the dignity is one, so the injury is one. But if anyone, deceived by the visible species of the human body, thinks something more remissly of the flesh of Christ than is worthy, he has fault, yet he is not excluded from pardon. But if anyone denies the eternal dignity, majesty, and power of the Holy Spirit, and thinks that demons are not cast out in the Spirit of God, but in Beelzebub, there cannot be the exhortation to pardon where there is the fullness of sacrilege. Here it is explained clearly enough what the sin against the Holy Spirit is. Which seems to agree with that description of Augustine, by which that sin is said to be envy of grace attacking fraternal charity. For he who after the cognition of the truth denies the truth of the Holy Spirit, and says his works belong to Beelzebub, is not doubted to envy the power, goodness, and grace of God. Therefore that distinction of words is not to be accepted thus, as if the offenses of the three persons were divided: but there the genera of sins are distinguished. For the sin against the Father is understood as that which is done through infirmity, because Scripture frequently attributes power to the Father. The sin against the Son, [that] which is done through ignorance, because wisdom is attributed to the Son. The third is expounded. Therefore he who sins through infirmity or ignorance easily obtains pardon: but not he who sins against the Holy Spirit. But since the power, wisdom, and goodness of the three is one: why power is more often assigned to the Father, wisdom to the Son, and goodness to the Holy Spirit, was said above.

Articulus 6 — How Blasphemy Against The Holy Spirit, Sin Against The Holy Spirit, And The Spirit Of Blasphemy Against The Holy Spirit Differ

How do blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, sin against the Holy Spirit, and the spirit of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit differ?

How do blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, sin against the Holy Spirit, and the spirit of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit differ?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, But he who shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit, etc.

And here is asked the difference between blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and the sin against the Holy Spirit, and the spirit of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. For he touches upon these three differently in the Text.

And it must be said that the sin against the Holy Spirit is the more general among these, and does not posit a sin except as to the moving cause, which attacks the grace in which the remission of sins is made, as was said before. But blasphemy against the Holy Spirit posits an act of dishonoring the Holy Spirit acknowledged in a work showing him, just as was the work of miracle in the cast-out demons, because as the finger of the Holy Spirit demonstrated, and yet they attributed it to the contrary spirit, namely Beelzebub. For blasphemy is the imposition of a false crime upon God. But the spirit of blasphemy is the love of blaspheming through hatred of God, spirating against the power and grace of the Holy Spirit.

Moreover, Richard says: If anyone blasphemes compelled by torments or deceived by ignorance, who would deny that it is more tolerable than if anyone blasphemes led by malice alone? Therefore the malignity of blasphemy is the worst before all others. But it is most wicked in this genus, and in which malice grows to the highest [degree], when anyone delights and glories in the vituperations of God: for what is blasphemy, except divine vituperation? But everyone aspires to this which he strongly affects and desires much: what else therefore does the spirit of blasphemy seem to be, than the affection and desire of divine vituperation?

Articulus 7 — Whether The Sin Of The Jews Who Crucified Christ Was Sin Against The Holy Spirit; And Whether The Sin Of The Angel And Of The First Man Was Against The Holy Spirit

Whether the sin of the Jews who crucified Christ was a sin against the Holy Spirit? And, Whether the sin of the Angel and of the first man was against the Holy Spirit?

§ 10. Then it is asked about what he says, there, D, near the end: For the sin against the Father is understood as that, etc. It is asked, Whether the sin of the Jews was against the Holy Spirit?

§ 11. And it seems that it was: because in Matthew 12:32 and Luke 12:10, where it treats of the sin against the Holy Spirit, it speaks of the sin of the Jews who contradicted the operations of Christ done through the Spirit.

§ 12. But against this seems to be what is said in Acts 3:17 I know, brethren, that you did it through ignorance, as did also your rulers. Therefore it seems to be a sin against the Son. And many things could be adduced for this: but let these suffice, because they all have one solution.

§ 13. Further it is asked concerning the sin of the Angel, and of the first man. For since infirmity and ignorance are penalties consequent upon sin, it does not seem that they were in the Angel or in man before the first sin: therefore it seems that their sin was neither against the Father, nor against the Son: therefore it remains that it was against the Holy Spirit.

§ 14. But against this is what the Apostle says of the woman Adam was not seduced, but the woman being seduced was in the transgression But seduction falls under ignorance: therefore she sinned against the Son, and [not] against the Holy Spirit.

§ 15. Also, concerning the man Augustine says that he believed to be venial what was mortal: and he himself was ignorant of something.

§ 16. Also, the first Angel believed that he could receive beatitude according to perfect power without merits, and from himself, because otherwise he would not have desired it: therefore he too was deceived: and thus the sin of all was against the Son, and not against the Holy Spirit.

§ 17. Solution. To this it must be said that the sin of the Jews as regards the works which were an argument of the power of the Holy Spirit, was against the Holy Spirit: but the infidelity by which they crucified Christ, was from a crass ignorance by which they were deceived concerning the flesh of the Savior: and as regards this it was a sin against the Son. And thus the solution to the contrariety is clear.

§ 18. To the other it must be said that ignorance is twofold, namely nescience accompanying a created nature, and from this both the first Angel and the first man sinned: and ignorance which is a sequel to sin, which signifies a privation of the light of grace directing in things to be done, and from this they did not sin: and in the first way it was a sin against the Son. And through this the solution to all that is usually asked in this distinction is clear.

DISTINCTIO XLIV

Articulus 3 — Whether The Potency Of Sinning Is One Or Many

Whether the power of sinning is one, or many?

§ 34. Thirdly it is asked, Whether it is one, or many?

§ 35. But it seems that it is many: because evil is done by speaking, and walking, thinking, willing, and choosing, and many other actions, which it is impossible to reduce to one power: therefore the power of doing evil is many powers, and not one.

§ 36. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine says that in every evil only the will is blamed: therefore only the will is the power of evil, or of sinning. 2. Also, we had above, that the act of this natural power which is the will, is called evil, and not of the others: therefore only the will is the power of sinning.

§ 37. Solution. It must be said that the power of sinning, namely executing sin, is multiplex in man: but the power commanding sin is only one alone, which is the will. And through this the solution to the whole is clear. However, a distinction was noted above how sin is differently in reason, and free choice, and will, and the other powers: and those also are valid here.

Divisio Textus

§ 19. After the aforesaid things it seems worthy of consideration, etc. This last distinction is divided against the whole treatise on sin: because in this one it is treated of the power of sinning.

§ 20. And the Master asks two things here, namely whether the power of sinning is from God? and, Whether we ought to resist the sin of the wicked? there, C, Here arises a question, etc. And through this the meaning is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Potency Of Sinning Is A Potency Or An Impotence

Whether the power of sinning is a power or an impotence?

§ 21. Around the first part three things are asked: of which the first is, Whether the power of sinning is a power or an impotence? Second, Whether it is from God? Third, Whether it is one, or many?

§ 22. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. The Philosopher says that rational powers are for opposites: but opposites are good and evil: therefore there is one power for these in the rational soul: but the power for good is a power: therefore also the power for evil is a power. 2. Also, the power of evil is a power able to do evil: therefore it is an active power: but every active power is a power and not an impotence: therefore the power of evil is a power, and not an impotence. 3. Also, it was held above that free choice is a faculty of reason and will, by which good is chosen when grace assists, and evil when it deserts: therefore free choice is the power of evil by which evil is done: but the will is a power simply: therefore the power by which evil is done is a power and not an impotence.

§ 23. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Anselm says in the book On Free Choice: Do you think that what being added diminishes, and being subtracted increases liberty, is liberty, or a part of liberty? as if to say: No: but the power of evil added to power and faculty and liberty, diminishes each one of them: therefore it is neither a power, nor a part of a power. 2. Also, if it were a power absolutely, since no power which is of the genus of praiseworthy things is lacking to God and to the confirmed Angels, this would be in the Angels and in God, which is false: therefore it is not a power. 3. Also, if it were a natural power of man, since grace is the perfection of nature, and glory the perfection of grace, that power would remain in grace and glory: but it is established that this is not true: therefore it is not a power, as it seems, but a defect and an impotence.

§ 24. Solution. It must be said that the power to evil can be in two ways, namely to the evil of pure privation, and this power is material, and is a defect in all corporeal and spiritual things: and we are not speaking of this here: because its ultimate (as the Philosopher says, and moreover the Commentator in the book On the Heavens and the Earth) is in the minimum: as if it can be overcome by one, it can be overcome by two, and three, and so successively. The power of evil is also called the power of doing evil: and then it is necessary that evil be taken in a bad action, according to what we said above, that evil has a deficient and efficient cause: and thus that power can be considered in three ways, namely according to the root in which it is rooted in the subject of the power, and according to the essence of the power, and according to the conjunction to the act. In the first way it is a power, and in the second way: and thus is understood that saying of the Philosopher, that the power of acting wickedly is good. But in the third way it is still considered in two ways, namely by comparison to the substance of the act, or by comparison to the act under the deformity. And in the first way it is still a power.

But in the second way it is a power mixed with impotence. But if it be compared to the deformity alone: then it is not an active power, but a material defect and weakness succumbing to malice: just as we say that this one can die, and that one can become sick, and that one can be overcome, always with the material power failing.

§ 25. And through this the solution to the whole is clear: because the first reasons proceed concerning the power in the first, and second consideration, and third according to what refers to the act only. But the other reasons proceed in the consideration by which it is referred to the defect and deformity. Also in the first and second way these powers are in the Angels, although not in the third way.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Potency Of Sinning Is From God

Whether the power of sinning is from God?

§ 26. Then it is asked concerning the second, namely whether it is from God? because this is asked about in the Letter.

§ 27. It seems that it is: because 1. All power is from God: therefore also this one. 2. Also, Sirach 31:10, the holy man is praised, who could transgress, and did not transgress, do evil, and did not do it: but he is not praised except through what he has from God: therefore he has this power from God. 3. Also, whatever is the cause of a cause, is the cause of the caused: but every act is from God, as was proved above: therefore every power of acting is from God. 4. Also, whatever power is by analogy in God and in the creature, that is from God according to what it is in the creature: therefore according to what it is in the creature, it is from God.

§ 28. ON THE CONTRARY: A wise man does not make something by which his work becomes worse: from the power of evil is all that by which the work of God becomes worse: therefore the power of evil is not from God. The first is clear through Augustine. The second is clear through this, that evil is that by which the work of God becomes worse: and if there were no power of evil, evil would not be done.

§ 29. Solution. It must be said according to the distinction previously had, that the power of evil according as it is prior to the evil, and considered in the subject, or in itself, is a perfect being and from God: but it has an order to evil from the fact that it is from nothing, and not from God, and thus it is not from God. And as regards the first consideration the first four reasons proceed: because also it cannot elicit an act from itself, except according to what is from God. But according to the other consideration the reason to the opposite proceeds: and it is not difficult to assign this solution to the induced reasons.

Articulus 4 — Whether In All Things Obedience Ought To Be Given To Authority

Whether power should be obeyed in all things?

§ 40. Then it is asked concerning the second part which begins there, C, Here arises a question not to be passed over in silence. Around which two things occur to be asked, namely, Whether power should be obeyed in all things? And, Whether the power of the devil should be resisted?

§ 41. TO THE FIRST it is objected thus: 1. Bernard says in the book On Precept and Dispensation: Let the Prelate exact nothing of those things which I have not promised. Therefore the power of a prelate is not to be obeyed in all things. 2. The same, Ibid.: A subject is neither to be inhibited short of his promise, nor to be compelled beyond it by the law of observance. From this the same follows.

§ 42. But against this seems to be that 1. Ibidem he says, that perfect obedience knows no law, is not straitened by limits. Therefore it obeys in all things. 2. Also, Hugh of St. Victor: Obedience is a virtue, which embraces all enjoined things to be necessarily fulfilled, unless the authority of the commander withstands. 3. Also, Sirach 4:32: Do not resist against the face of the mighty. Therefore in nothing is one to resist. 4. Also, Coloss. 3:20: Children, obey your parents in all things. Therefore much more spiritual parents: therefore power is to be obeyed in all things. 5. Also, Jerome to Rusticus the provost of the monastery: That you may fear God, that you may love God, believe whatever salutary thing he shall have commanded: nor judge lesser the sentence of the greater, whose duty it is to obey and fulfill commands, Moses saying, Hear, O Israel. 6. Also, Gregory: Consider not the quantity of the command, but the dignity of the commander. 7. Also, in the Gospel: He who hears you, hears me: and he who despises you, despises me. But it is established that God is to be heard in all things: therefore also the Prelate. 8. Also, Benedict in the Rule: If perhaps the Prelate commands impossible things, one must attempt to do them. Therefore in possible things it is much more to be obeyed.

§ 43. Solution. To this, according to Bernard, it must be solved under a distinction: because either we are speaking of perfect obedience, which is of charity and liberty: and this knows no end, just as charity does not. Or we are speaking of the obedience of justice: and this has the limits of its vow, and is not to be compelled beyond it except from charity. However further according to the Masters it is necessary to distinguish: because there is full power, and limited power. Full power is to be obeyed in all things: but in nothing which is not of power, but of impotence. Whence if he commands sin, this is not of power, but of impotence: and therefore in this he is not to be obeyed. But if he commands those things which are of power, as the Apostle says, According to the power which the Lord has given me unto edification, and not unto destruction, namely yours: then what Bernard says has place, namely that either it is the obedience of perfection, and this obeys in all good things, because for those alone is power given: or of justice, and this one need not obey, except in those things to which he is obligated from a vow or from the chair. For thus is understood that of Matt. 23:2: The Scribes and Pharisees have sat on the chair of Moses. All things therefore whatsoever they shall say to you, namely pertaining to the chair, observe and do, etc. But if it is limited power: then from justice I ought not, except insofar as a subject, whether from the command of a greater, or from a vow: but from charity and perfection I can obey further, never however against the vow or against the mandate of a superior. And thus it is clear to the whole: because the first authorities speak of the obedience owed from justice: but the second of the perfection of charity in obeying.

Articulus 5 — Whether We Ought to Resist the Power of the Devil, and Whether We Ought to Will to Be Tempted

Whether one must resist the power of the devil, and whether we ought to wish to be tempted?

Secondly, it is asked whether one must resist the power of the devil?

It seems that one should not: because he who resists power, resists the ordination of God: therefore the power of the devil is not to be resisted.

1. Also, this seems so through the fact that Jeremiah urged that Nebuchadnezzar should be served, by whom the power of the devil is signified: therefore the power of the devil is not to be resisted.
2. Also, a man ought to endure what he has deserved to endure from his sins: but he has deserved the exercise of the devil from his sins: therefore he ought to endure this, and not resist. PROOF of the minor: because on that of the Psalm He often delivered them, namely the Lord his people, etc., the Gloss says: Not his own virtue, but the sins of men made him powerful.

Also, the Psalm Prove me, O Lord, and tempt me, etc. But temptation happens through the power of the devil: therefore we ought even to desire that we be subjected to the power of the devil.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY is what we note in Matthew And lead us not, etc.

Also, 1 Peter Whom resist, steadfast in the faith.

Solution. Whether we ought to will not to be tempted, has been disputed above. But here it must be said that the devil is to be resisted with all our might: because "devil" names a substance depraved in will: and therefore he does not use the power conceded to him, except to an evil end: and therefore he and his power must be resisted.

TO THAT therefore which is first objected, it must be said that all power is ordained by God: but with this ordination is sometimes conjoined the iniquitous will of the one having power, and in this respect the power is to be resisted: but if he were to remain in the divine order only, which would be for the punishment of evildoers and the praise of the good, then in no way would it be to be resisted.

To the other it must be said that Jeremiah urged this with respect to the affliction of bodily captivity, but not with respect to spiritual captivity which occurs through fault: because that does not proceed from the order of power, but from the intention of an iniquitous will.

To the other it must be said that this is true with respect to bodily afflictions: just as Job was afflicted. But in no way must one consent to the fault which he intends: just as neither did Job sin with his lips in all his temptations, nor did he speak foolishly, etc.

TO THAT which is asked, Whether we ought to wish to be tempted? It must be said that no, on account of two things: of which the first is, because temptation does not only state that which is of ordained power, but also that which is of perverse will, which must be resisted.

The second is weakness: for we are weak, and we ought to beware of occasions of falling. To that however which is objected to the contrary from the Psalm, it must be said that David desired the effect of temptation which is purity, and not the probation in itself. And if it is objected that this is impossible, that one be had without the other: it must be said that by the virtue of the Lord he willed to be confirmed in the act of temptation, so that he could not be tempted except unto purity: and this was well possible, just as Augustine said in the book of Confessions: Grant to fulfill what thou commandest, and command what thou wilt. And a certain holy Father in Egypt: I do not pray that I may not have temptations, but that the Lord may give me the virtues to bear them.

Articulus 6 — Whether One Must Always Obey a Superior

Whether a superior must always be obeyed?

Then it is asked about what he says, there, C, around the middle: Attend to the grades themselves of human things, etc.

And two things are asked, of which the first is, Whether this is always true what Augustine says, that a superior must be obeyed, when a superior and an inferior command contraries?

Second, Whether the power of tyrants must be obeyed?

TO THE FIRST it is proceeded thus: 1. On that of the Apocalypse And to the Angel of the Church of Pergamum write, the Gloss says, Let not an Archbishop dare to lay a hand upon the subjects of a Bishop without him. Therefore an Archbishop cannot command contraries to the subjects of Bishops, as it seems: therefore it is not generally true what is said here.

1. Also, a more immediate power influences more than a mediate one: but an inferior power is more immediate: therefore it is stronger over subjects, than a superior one: therefore if they are contrary, one must stand by the inferior, and not the superior.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Boethius says, that whatever an inferior power can do, a superior can do, and more: therefore if they are contrary, it is necessary for the inferior to yield.

Solution. It must be said that superior and inferior hold themselves in two ways, namely as in order to each other, so that the whole inferior goes out from the superior, as the power of a Proconsul from the power of the Emperor, and of Bishops from the Pope: and then the superior power remains ordinary and immediate to all inferior subjects: and in such a case Augustine speaks here, and it has no instance [i.e., exception]. But sometimes they hold themselves thus, that both go out from one universal power which subjects the inferior to the superior in those things which it wills, and in those things which it wills it does not subject: and then the inferior can command something which the superior cannot retract: and thus the power of a Bishop and an Archbishop hold themselves in comparison to the Pope.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether the Power of Tyrants Ought to Be Obeyed

Whether the power of tyrants must be obeyed?

Lastly it is asked concerning the power of tyrants, of whom Boethius says, that they are invaders, and do not have power unless usurped, whether they must be obeyed or not?

But it seems that they must be obeyed: because there is no power but from God: and he who resists power, resists the ordination of God.

Also, concerning Nebuchadnezzar it is certain, that he did not have power over the Jews except usurped: and yet Jeremiah urged, that he be obeyed.

Also, Pilate did not have power over the Lord except usurped: yet the Lord said: Thou wouldst not have any power against me, unless it were given thee from above: and he obeyed him with respect to this that he did not resist.

BUT AGAINST this seems to be that what is usurped is that which is invaded contrary to the order of right: and to those we are not bound to obey, but rather to resist, lest he lose his soul by invading what is not his.

Similarly, the cross is borne against barbarians invading the rights and peace of the Church: therefore the power of such is to be resisted.

Solution. Power is twofold, namely ordained according to the grades of the power of the Church or civil law: and to this power one must not resist with respect to obedience. There is also usurped power which is the power of a minister by which the Lord scourges us... and to this one must not resist with respect to this, that we should not endure if the Lord wills; but we can well resist with respect to obedience, if we can: for the power of such is iniquitous, and iniquity must always be resisted. If however the Lord wills, the scourge is to be endured: and with respect to this the first authorities speak: because the Lord willed the Jews to be scourged: and this was revealed to Jeremiah. And the Lord of peace placed the discipline of our peace immediately upon our Lord Jesus Christ: and with respect to this he said that it was given to him from above: and not with respect to this that he would justly command the Jews or the Lord Jesus Christ, who was the Lord of ages, to whom is honor and glory unto the perpetual ages of ages. Amen.

LIBER III

Prologue

D. ALBERT THE GREAT, BISHOP OF REGENSBURG, COMMENTARIES

ON THE THIRD BOOK OF SENTENCES. ON THE INCARNATION OF THE WORD AND OTHER THINGS PERTAINING TO THIS. PROLOGUE. The contents of this volume are briefly outlined.

For here the order of reason demands that, having in the first book discussed something about the inexplicable mystery of the most high Trinity with the irrefutable testimony of the Saints, and then in the second book having suggested the order of the condition of things and the fall of man under certain rules of authority - concerning his restoration through the grace of the mediator of God and men, and the sacraments of human redemption, by which the contritions of man are bound and the wounds of sins are healed, we consequently discuss in the third and fourth book: as the Samaritan approaches the wounded, the physician the sick, grace the wretched.

DISTINCTIO I

Divisio Textus

When therefore the fullness of time came, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem those who were under the law. This is the third book concerning the restoration of the human race, or of fallen man, in those things restoring which are by way of things and signs. And therefore it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is treated of the restorer and those things fitting to him in that he is a restorer: because the restorer himself restores effectively. In the second, however, it is treated of the dispositions which restore formally, as of virtues, and gifts, and precepts: because those dispositions are supposed in this doctrine, as things, and not as signs. And this second part begins in distinction XXXIII, where it says: When indeed, etc.

The first of these is divided into two: in the first of which it treats of those things which perfect the union of the Son of God to human nature, and conversely. In the second, however, it touches upon the very properties which are fitting to Christ the Son of God and son of man according to that he is united, and by the grace of his union. And this begins in distinction VI, where it says: From the aforesaid, however, a question emerges, etc.

And the first of these containing five distinctions, is further divided into three parts, according to that three perfect the union, namely, the uniting, the united, and both together associated. Hence in the first it treats of the uniting. In the second, of the united or assumed. And this begins in the second distinction, there, A, And because in man. In the third, lest the whole human nature, etc., it treats of both together: and this begins in the third distinction, there, A, It is also asked concerning the flesh of the Word, etc.

The first distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which it treats of the time of the incarnation, or union to the flesh. In the second, of the uniting another in person: and this begins in the second chapter, there, B, It must indeed be diligently noted, etc.

And this is further divided into two parts: in the first of which it determines why the Son, not the Father, nor the Holy Spirit united flesh to Himself. In the second, it touches upon a doubt concerning this, there, D, But perhaps some will say, etc.

Still the prior has two parts, so that in the first it proves what was said: in the second, it solves the question incident to this, there, C, But if it is asked.

In the first chapter it does three things. First, it is said, that when the fullness of time came, God sent His Son. Second, it explains what the fullness of time is. Third, it explains what it is for the Son to be sent, as is clear in the Letter.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

The letter is thus expounded:

"When the fullness of time had come," etc. The Apostle to the Galatians 4:4-5.

"Sent," by this is meant that He appeared in the flesh.

"Made under the law."

Note that the law is not established for the just. Hence, to be under the law is said in three ways, namely, by cause, or by the observance of certain commandments of the law, or by the motive of the law. By cause, thus all born in sin were under the law. According to observance, however, it happens to be under the law in two ways, namely, by obedience, or by consummation: by obedience, as the just are under the law; by consummation, however, as Christ who fulfilled the law. Under the motive of the law, which was fear, were those who observed it out of servile fear.

"Therefore, the Son sent," etc. Objection: In the law, in the time of the fathers, He was often sent through the gift of wisdom: therefore, He was incarnate from then.

Solution: It is understood concerning the mission into the world, not only into the heart.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Was Fitting For God To Be Incarnate

Whether it was fitting for God to become incarnate?

The first doubt arises, whether it was fitting for God to become incarnate? And I will present reasons for this, first on the part of God, second on the part of the creature. On the part of God, I will present reasons first taken from the power of God, second from wisdom, third from goodness.

On the part of the power of God, first four things are supposed which are approved among the wise. The first supposition is that the first cause is of infinite power in acting. The second is that it is of infinite power to demonstrate itself at some time in work. The third is that infinite power cannot demonstrate itself except in a work in some way infinite. The fourth is that the power of God in acting needs nothing.

From this, thus: 1. Whatever is purely created is finite and of finite power: therefore it is of finite essence: therefore infinite power will not be sufficiently demonstrative; therefore it is necessary for the operation of God to be in some way above created being. This, therefore, will be either that it be made by Him, or that He unite with another: not in the first way, because if it is a non-created being, it cannot be made, otherwise contradictory things would be verified of the same: therefore it will be thus, that He unite with another created being which is without proportionate comparison distant from Him: therefore it is necessary or fitting that God unite with a creature: and below it will be proven that only man is unifiable with Him: therefore it was necessary for God to unite with man: because otherwise infinite power would not be demonstrated through an infinite effect, which is against the second.

1. Likewise, Infinite power is to lead the created to the highest act of which it is susceptible: but (as will be shown later) the created will be susceptible of deity in one person: therefore it will be of infinite power to join deity in some effect in one person; not unless with man: therefore it was fitting for God to become incarnate.
2. Likewise, It is proven through wisdom, and three propositions are supposed, namely, that it is of wisdom to order. The second is that supreme wisdom is to fulfill every possible order. The third is that supreme wisdom demonstrates itself in every possible beauty.

From this, thus: Order is in created things to each other, according to which they touch each other through union and composition. Similarly, order is of the creature to the Creator: therefore it is necessary to complete this order in the ordered: but it will not be completed unless the first is joined with the last: therefore it is necessary for the first and last to be joined, as it is held, Wisdom 8:1: "She reaches from end to end."

1. Likewise, All beauty is of wisdom: but I see that beauty from species is such that mixed things are more beautiful than elements, and complexioned things than mixed, and animated things than complexioned, and the most beautiful composed of a rational soul and corporeal substance having the potential for life: therefore since supreme wisdom does not stop there unless it comes to the beauty of infinite beauty, it will join with this creature animated by a rational soul which is the last in the beauty of nature, the most beautiful uncreated spiritual substance: and this is what is held, Proverbs 31:10: "Far and from the ends of the earth is her price." For far is the uncreated spiritual substance: but the last lines are the last end of nature, and the last end of the universe: but the last end of nature is man through the enumeration of compositions, but the last end of the universe is God, from which ends the price of redemption is made.

2. Likewise, From power and wisdom together it is argued thus: Great is the power in the bringing forth of simples from nothing: but greater shines forth in the grades of nature which are to be mixed being, living, sensing, understanding; yet neither is infinite in these. Therefore, since both are finite, they will still bring forth a further grade from the conjunction of a nature which is above intellectual with intellectual or rational.

If perhaps it is said that according to this reasoning man ought first to be joined to the angelic nature, and afterwards the divine nature to him: as we see that after the simple is the mixed mineral, and after that living, and so on with others, and always the prior is preserved in the subsequent. To this, the response is deferred until later, where it will be shown that the Angel is neither unifiable with God nor with man.

[uni]ble: hence this does not impede the process.

§ 6. Next, this is shown from goodness: and let three things be supposed, namely, that the good is diffusive and communicative of itself. Second, that it belongs to an infinite good to communicate itself in an infinite mode. Third, that the created thing is capable through union of the infinite good, as has appeared in effect.

Hence thus: The infinite good communicates itself in an infinite mode, and it is not infinite unless it is so substantially: therefore it will communicate itself to the created.

If perhaps it is said that, according to this, it communicates itself to every capable created thing. On the contrary: The Good regards the nature to which it communicates itself, and not the person: nature, however, is indifferent: therefore it will not be communicated except through a nature: in a person, however, it cannot be, because then the order of that nature to another according to other gifts would already be destroyed, if every person were united to it, and the plurality of individuals [would be destroyed], which is proved thus: If a union were made to Socrates, or to Plato, it would be such as would make God man, and man God. Therefore Socrates is the Son of God, and the Son of God is Socrates: and the Son of God is Plato, and conversely. But whatever things are the same as one and the same thing, are the same as each other: but Socrates and Plato are the same as the Son of God and according to the same thing, because according to one union: therefore Socrates and Plato are the same. And the same reasoning holds concerning others: therefore the number of persons of that nature would be destroyed: therefore it was not fitting for Him to be united except to one of that nature.

§ 7. Also, from power and goodness together I argue thus: Great is the power and goodness that makes the universe: but yet a greater can be thought, namely one that makes infinite worlds: but a still greater can be excogitated, namely one that conjoins God to some creature in one person: because that is incomparable to it. Since therefore God has a power than which a greater cannot be thought, and indeed even greater than can be thought, He Himself can, and wills (since His goodness is as great as His power) to produce such a conjunction: but it cannot be done to all created things, because the number of individuals would be destroyed, as was held: therefore He will do it to one: but no creature is unible except man: therefore He will do it to man. And because it is easy to multiply reasons of this kind, therefore let these suffice: provided that caution is taken not to say that any of these is necessary; because all are certain fitting reasons to the end that the incarnation should occur, even supposing that there had been no sin.

§ 8. From the condition of the state of man, which is under sin, the same is argued: and first let it be supposed that it is necessary that God's preordination made concerning man be fulfilled. Second, that every rational creature was made for beatitude. Third, that every rational creature, through some number of its individuals, should participate in it. Fourth, that God has not punished a rational creature without sin. Fifth, that every simple creature owes to the Creator, for itself, all that it is and is capable of, and cannot respond to Him in thanksgiving. Sixth, that a sinner can make satisfaction for nothing, since he has not made satisfaction for himself.

Hence thus: Man is subject to many penalties, and is a rational creature: therefore he sinned: therefore both because he is a creature, and because he is a sinner, he cannot make satisfaction, nor can any simple creature: therefore it is necessary, if satisfaction is to be made, that the one satisfying be the Creator so that he can, and man so that he ought [to do so], if satisfaction must be made, otherwise the preordination concerning man would be frustrated: therefore it is necessary for God to become incarnate.

We have also placed many such arguments elsewhere, and therefore let these suffice here.

To the contrary it is objected thus: § 1. That which is of infirmity does not befit God; to be joined to the infirm is of infirmity; therefore it does not befit God. But to be joined with a nature subject to penalties is to be joined with the infirm: therefore, etc. The proof of the first is because everything that is joined, is joined for the sake of something better. The proof of the second is because a junction is desired so that the conjoined may be elevated.

§ 2. Also, that which is imperfect with respect to nothing, is in potency with respect to nothing. Hence thus: That which is not in potency in some way, is not unible, since unible expresses potency. God is not in potency to anything: therefore He is not unible to anyone.

§ 3. Also, everything that becomes something has something making it outside itself: God becomes man, and becomes united, since He was not always united: therefore He has something making Him outside Himself: but this is false: therefore God is not united.

§ 4. Also, God is united to human nature: therefore something unites Him: either the same thing, or another: if the same thing, then the same thing is the maker and the made, which is not intelligible: if another, since the agent and maker is more noble than the made and acted upon, something will be more noble than God united, which is a heresy, because God is not more noble than God with flesh.

§ 5. Also, every union of two things seems to be with respect to some third thing constituted from both: but the deity is not capable of being subjected with respect to any third thing: therefore it is not unible.

§ 6. Also, no substance perfect in being and nature is unible or componible with anything: God is the most perfect substance: therefore in no way is He unible to anyone. The first is proved: because every composition and union is for the sake of acquiring some perfection: either in act, as matter is united to form: or in being, as form is united to matter.

§ 7. And because it takes long to object many things concerning this, since it is very easy to adduce reasons concerning this, let all conceptions of the mind existing against this union be posited: of which one is, that a substance perfect in act and being is unible to nothing. The second is, that every union terminates in a substantial or accidental composition. The third, that of diverse natures differing in species there is not one hypostasis and person. The fourth, that diverse differences in nature and species and genus constitute nothing that is one in genus, species, or individual. The fifth, that those at an infinite distance have no proportion of union. The sixth, that the first cause uniting and composing all things is possible toward no union or composition, and infinite other things which it is easy to find. Since therefore the intellect holds and supposes these things within itself, it will not receive the union of God with human nature.

Solution It must be said that the reasons which have been adduced to prove that God is unible with human nature are fitting, and they will not be of necessity: for if they were of necessity, it would not be a work of His good will, nor would we be bound to so many and such great acts of thanksgiving, nor would we accept it through the revelation of faith. This, moreover, easily appears to one paying attention to those reasons posited here and elsewhere, and this I leave to the judgment of the readers. But all the reasons posited to the contrary do not impede the union. And I say this for this reason: because although faith cannot be sufficiently proved, nevertheless it also cannot be disproved.

It must therefore be said to the first, that it is not of infirmity to be united to an infirm nature, except where the united nature would be submerged into those infirmities, and would begin to distance itself within itself. But the divinity is not thus united to humanity, and there is Augustine's example of the light of the sun, which is not infected by those things upon which it places its rays.

To the other it must be said, that this reason holds in those things which are united with respect to some third thing. But the divinity is not thus united to humanity: because it will be proved below that in the Lord Jesus Christ a common species is not to be found.

To the other it must be said, that the unible which is in potency with respect to composition has another uniting it outside itself, and this is the unible which becomes in some way in the composite . But the deity is not such: because it neither becomes in itself, nor in the composite.

Nor is this to be accepted simply, 'God becomes man': because becoming is noted to be posited concerning God. And if it is found posited in an authority, it is to be glossed thus: This comes to be, that God is man, but this 'becoming' is then posited concerning the nature of humanity, not of deity, and therefore it unites itself. Nor is this true, that the deity is better united than not united: on the ground that united it is as if conjoined to a created good, and by itself it is only an uncreated good. And this is so because nothing can be added to the uncreated goodness that would augment it, since it is infinite: and if something is added to it through union, it has neither the notion nor the essence of good except from it: hence it does not add anything to it, but rather receives this very good that it has, from the fact that it is united to it: because the more closely something is ordered to it, the more it receives of its goodness.

To the other it must be said, that the union of two things which are both imperfect in some way, is with respect to some third thing: just as matter is imperfect regarding act, while form is imperfect regarding being. But it is not thus concerning deity and humanity.

To the other it must be said, that all those common conceptions of the mind prohibit that the deity even as a part be unible. And this we readily concede: because the definition of a part is the definition of something imperfect, and this does not befit the deity.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — What The Fullness Of Time Is, And In How Many Ways It Is Said

What is, and in how many ways is "fullness of time" spoken of?

§ 14. Then it is objected concerning what He says, there, at A, The fullness of time.

§ 15. For a manifold fullness is found in Sacred Scripture, which does not apply to the time in which the Son of God came into the flesh: therefore it seems that the fullness of time is not spoken of specially.

§ 1. But that a manifold fullness is found is evident thus:

§ 2. 1. Deuteronomy 32:3-4: Give magnificence to our God. The works of God are perfect: therefore, full. Whence, Psalm 23:1: The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof: therefore it seems that in the universality of creatures there was a perfect fullness of time.

§ 3. 2. Item, Matthew 13:48, upon that: Which, when it was filled, they drew out: the Gloss intends that this be applied to the end of the world. Therefore, it seems the fullness of time is at the end of the world.

§ 4. 3. Item, Ephesians 4:13: Until we all meet into the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ: but this was in the time of the Resurrection, because this was the fullness of Christ, or in the time of the resurrection of the blessed.

§ 5. 4. Item, In the Prologue of Luke, Jerome says: That God into a full God, he refers this to the Ascension of the Lord Jesus. Therefore, it seems that there was also a certain fullness in the Ascension.

§ 6. 5. Item, John 19:30, Jesus on the cross said: It is consummated: but this happens when through the fulfillment of the number of the elect the ruin of the Angels is filled up. Therefore, then was the fullness, as it seems. Whence, Apocalypse 6:11: It was said to them that they should rest for a little time, until their fellow servants and their brethren should be filled up, etc.

§ 7. Solution: It must be said that fullness is manifold. Namely, of nature according to the sufficiency of principles, so that it might be propagated: and this was when He rested on the seventh day from the perfect works of God. Whence, Genesis 2:2: And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made: and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had done.

§ 8. Item, Fullness of propagated nature, of which it is said, Psalm 23:1: The earth is the Lord's, etc.

§ 9. There is also the fullness of grace, and the fullness of glory. Now the fullness of grace is twofold: in the head, and in the members. In the head, however, it thus began in the Incarnation: because that fullness is the cause and beginning of the other fullnesses on account of three things. Namely, because then was the fullness of the preordination of the time that He should become incarnate; whence, Colossians 2:9: For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead corporeally. Secondly, because then was the fullness of generation. For the first was of a man from the earth; the second, of a woman from a virgin man [i.e., Adam's rib]; the third, of children from the commingling of parents; but the fourth, of a virgin man from a virgin woman, which completed the order of generation. Whence, Genesis 15:16: In the fourth generation they shall return hither. And therefore it was said to the one generating: Hail, full of grace. Thirdly, because then grace overflowed for fulfilling the law, and for paying the promises. John 1:14: We saw His glory, the glory as it were of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace, with respect to the fulfillment of commandments, and truth, with respect to the fulfillment of promises. Whence, below, v. 16 and 17: And of His fullness we all have received, and grace for grace. For the law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. But in the members there was a fullness of grace at Pentecost: of which it is said, Acts 2:4: And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. Item in the same place, 6:8: Stephen, full of grace and fortitude, etc. Psalm 89:14: We are filled in the morning with Thy mercy, O Lord.

§ 10. There is also the fullness of glory in the head with respect to the glory of the body in the Resurrection, of which the Apostle speaks in the authority brought in above; or with respect to the place corresponding by way of fittingness, and this in the Ascension, of which Jerome speaks in the Prologue. But in the members there can be a fullness of glory with respect to number, and thus speaks the Gloss upon

§ 1. Matthew concerning the net; or with respect to the perfection of sanctity in both schools [i.e., Jews and Gentiles], concerning which, Ecclesiasticus 24:16: In the fullness of the saints is my detention; or with respect to the outcome which is the restoration of the ruin of the Angels, of which Psalm 1:7 and following speaks. Thus the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Son Of God Can Be Said To Have Been Made Of A Woman

Whether the Son of God can be said to be made of a woman?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what He says, there, at A, near the beginning: Made of a woman.

§ 3. 1. For a making (factura) does not fall upon the Son of God, but upon the Son of man. Therefore, he speaks badly calling the Son made.

§ 4. 2. Item, Why does he not say born of a woman: since nevertheless this is true?

§ 5. 3. Item, The Gloss: The Virgin was not a woman (mulier), but a virgin. Therefore, the Apostle seems by this to inflict an injury on the Mother of the Lord.

§ 6. Solution: Without doubt, making is not posited concerning the Son of God inasmuch as He is such, but concerning the Son of man. Whence Augustine: Inasmuch as He is made, it is inasmuch as He is of a woman. Whence the sense is: His Son made, not inasmuch as He is the Son of God, but made in human nature, so that namely human nature might be the subject about which the making itself is.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that creation is the work of the divine will bringing forth a creature from nothing; but birth is the work of nature on both parts, namely, on the part of the patient as is the mother, and on the part of the agent as is the father. But to make is the work of the will upon pre-existing matter, just as God the Trinity made human nature, which is united to Christ or the Son of God; and to signify this, he says, made. But when He is said to be born, this is according to nativity, which is from the mother alone.

§ 8. To the last it must be said that "woman" (mulier) is said in two ways. Namely, according to the signification of the name, and thus the Gloss says: The Virgin was not a woman (mulier) [i.e., not a deflowered female]. Or according to the interpretation [etymology] of the name, and thus she was especially a woman (mulier) [i.e., molliens heroum, softening a hero]: because she softened the hero of all heroes. Whence when, dissolved out of softness entirely on the cross, He poured forth sweetness, He referred this softening to her, saying: Woman, behold thy son.

Divisio Textus

§ 9. But it must be diligently noted, etc.

§ 10. The Master [Lombard] touches here upon three causes why the Father was not sent into the flesh, of which two are specially why the Father was not incarnate. But the third generally why neither the Father nor the Holy Spirit. The first is in the beginning. The second, there, at B, § 2: Therefore also the Son, etc. But the third, there, at B, § 3: Whence Augustine in Ecclesiastical Dogmas: The Father did not assume flesh, etc.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Time Predetermined By The Father Is And Ought To Be Called The Time Of Fullness, In Which God Sent His Son

Whether the time was preordained by the Father, and ought to be called the time of fullness, in which God sent His Son?

§ 9. Next it is asked concerning what He says, there, at A, near the beginning: The time of fullness is called the time of grace, etc.

§ 10. For this seems to be against the Gloss of the Epistle to the Galatians 4:4-5, which upon the same says that it is called the time of fullness because it was preordained by the Father that He would send the Son then.

§ 11. ON THE CONTRARY: It was preordained from eternity. Therefore, He ought to have sent Him from eternity.

§ 12. If it is said that the will is a dilatory cause. On the contrary: A will which receives dispositions from things conceived by reason wills this and that. Therefore, a will which always holds itself in one way does not will this and that. But such is the will of God. Therefore, He always wills the same. Therefore, if He willed it then, He willed it from eternity. Since therefore He is omnipotent, He fulfilled it from eternity, which is false.

§ 1. Solution: The time of preordination that He would send is called the time of fullness, as was said, for those reasons which were assigned. And it is true that from eternity He preordained that He would send then; and therefore the will was not changed according to the diverse things willed: because from eternity He willed that He would come then. Just as if I should will to build tomorrow, and I persevered in that will, if I were to build not now but tomorrow, I would not be said to have changed according to my will. Whence the argument does not follow: because He did not preordain from eternity absolutely, but He preordained that He would send, and also with this He preordained when He would send. But by what cause He deferred it, some causes are assigned by way of fittingness. But the sufficient ones are hidden in the wisdom of God, over which the Apostle exclaims, in Romans 11:33: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are His judgments!

Articulus 6 — Why The Time In Which God Sent His Son Is Called The Time Of Fullness, The Time Of Mercy, The Year Of Kindness, The Time Of Grace, Etc

Why the time in which God sent His Son is called the time of fullness, the time of having mercy, the year of benignity, the time of grace, etc.

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what He says, there, at A, near the middle: The year of benignity.

§ 3. For what is the reason for the four or three names of this time, namely, that it is called the time of fullness, the time of having mercy, the time of benignity, and the time of grace?

§ 4. To this it must be said that the reason why it is called the time of fullness has been stated. But because from the fullness followed the redemption of the miserable, therefore it is called the time of having mercy, Hosea 11:8: My repentance is stirred up. And, Jeremiah 31:3: I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore have I drawn thee, taking pity on thee. But for such a great help an ignited goodness was required, which melting the good within would make it flow out into all; and therefore it is called the year of benignity. Canticles 1:3: Thy name is as oil poured out: therefore young maidens have loved thee exceedingly. And the time of grace because of the abundance of grace for fulfilling the commandments.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Law Of The Decalogue Can Be Fulfilled Without Grace

Can the law of the decalogue be fulfilled without grace?

§ 5. Next it is asked concerning what He says, at A, near the end: Because through charity, etc.

§ 6. On the contrary: Because no wise legislator obliges to the impossible. But to have grace is not in our power. Therefore we are not obliged to have grace. And yet we are obliged to the decalogue. Therefore the law of the decalogue can be fulfilled without grace.

§ 7. Solution: If we wish to sustain that opinion, that the mode [of acting from charity] is in the precept, then we say that although the decalogue can be fulfilled without grace with respect to the works themselves which are commanded, nevertheless it cannot be fulfilled according to the intention of the legislator: because he intends that the observance should obtain life, and thus it cannot be kept without grace.

§ 8. As to that which is objected, that to have grace is not in our power, it must be said that this is true; but nevertheless it is not impossible to have: because doing what is in us, we will of necessity have it, because God gives to all abundantly, and upbraideth not.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Father Could Have Been Incarnate And Redeemed The Human Race

Could the Father have become incarnate, and redeemed the human race?

§ 11. But here a doubt arises: because it seems that the Father ought to have become incarnate rather than the Son.

§ 12. 1. For power is attributed to the Father. But it belongs to the powerful to conquer the strong. Therefore, it belongs to the Father to become incarnate for the work of redemption. Proof of the minor: Job 41:24: There is no power upon earth that can be compared with him.

§ 13. 2. Item, Isaiah 49:24: Shall the prey be taken from the strong? or can that which was taken by the mighty be safe? Therefore it seems that to redeem belongs to power.

§ 14. 3. Furthermore, the Incarnation is a work in which infinitely distant things are conjoined, as God and man. Therefore this will belong to the infinitely powerful, and this is appropriated to the Father. Therefore, it belongs to the Father to redeem, and not to the Son.

§ 15. 4. Item, the affection of a Father is greater toward sons, than of a brother toward brothers. Since therefore the Father is read as our Father, and the Son as brother, it seems that there would be more solicitude for redemption from the Father than from the Son.

§ 16. 5. Furthermore, to adopt belongs to a father and not to a son. Since therefore through the Incarnation we are made sons, it seems that the Father ought to have become incarnate.

§ 17. FURTHERMORE, it is asked, what unfitting thing would there be if the Father were incarnate?

§ 18. It seems that there would be none: because the whole world would still experience an amelioration, just as it experiences in the Incarnation of the Son. Since therefore the Father is not envious, this good

§ 1. [Thus] He wished to communicate to the world, and thus the incarnation of the Father is still to be hoped for, which is a heresy.

§ 2. Solution: It must be said: If we consider congruence [i.e., fittingness], it does not belong to the Father to be incarnate; but if we consider power absolutely, the Father can be incarnate, as will be said below.

§ 3. Therefore, to the first objection it must be said, that the work of redemption, as to that which belongs to action, belongs indivisibly to the three persons. And therefore there is something in it which belongs to power, something which belongs to wisdom, and something which belongs to goodness. For as to the effect, which is to redeem from the strong armed man, it is of power; but as to the mode through humility and justice, it is of wisdom; and as to the end in which the highest goodness shines forth, it is of goodness. But because it principally consists in the mode, therefore it is principally of wisdom, especially because there, in 'being sent', 'being from another' is enclosed, which does not belong to the Father, as Augustine says. Through this the solution to the second objection is also clear.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that our Father is God the Trinity, and the Son is our brother according to the flesh: and if the Father were incarnate, He would be our brother, and therefore that objection does not proceed.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that we are adopted by the whole Trinity, and not by the Father alone, and therefore it was fitting for the Son to be sent, who might confirm us in the inheritance into which we are adopted, lest a doubt should be generated for man that the Son might contradict those things which the Father had established.

§ 6. To the other objection which is subsequently asked, it must be said that many absurdities would follow: yet for the sake of brevity let these suffice: one of which is that there would be confusion in the Trinity, on the grounds that there would be two sons, one according to divinity, the other according to humanity. A second is that He who is the Son according to deity would be the grandson of the Virgin: for the Father would be the son of the Virgin, whose son would be He who is the Son according to eternal generation; and thus He would be the grandson of the Virgin, because He is the son of her son. A third is because the opposite to the innascibility of the Father would be signified in two ways, namely, in the fact that He would be sent, and in the fact that He would be born. For as Saint Augustine says, the mission of the Son is His incarnation. For Augustine says in book IV On the Trinity, that to be sent is to be known to be from another. Hence in the mission itself it is given to be understood that the Father is from another, and thus it would be necessary that there be someone from whom He is: therefore He would not be innascible, and there would be a quaternity in the Trinity, since He could not be from the Son who is from Him by generation, nor from the Holy Spirit who is from Him by procession. And similarly, through nativity He would be nascible [i.e., capable of being born], at least according to humanity, and this nascibility would not be congruent with the property of innascibility.

§ 7. And because of these and similar things, it is not fitting for the Father to be incarnate.

Articulus 9 — Why The Holy Spirit Did Not Assume Flesh

§ 9. Next it is inquired concerning that which he says, there, B, § 3: Neither the Father assumed flesh, nor the Holy Spirit, etc.

§ 10. For it seems that the Holy Spirit ought to have assumed it, because:

§ 11. 1. Augustine says in the book On the Spirit and the Soul, that the Holy Spirit is the person in the Trinity closer to us: therefore, since things that are closer are more quickly united, it seems that He ought to have assumed flesh.

§ 12. 2. Furthermore, the incarnation was a work of the highest goodness and love: but goodness and love are attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit ought to have been incarnate.

§ 13. 3. Also, if to be sent belongs to him who is from another, as Augustine says, then it is more fitting for the Holy Spirit than for the Son: because the Holy Spirit is from two, but the Son is from one only: therefore it is more fitting for the Holy Spirit to be sent into flesh than for the Son.

§ 14. 4. Also, the incarnation is for the sake of acquiring grace, which was lost through the sin of the first man: but grace is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore the Holy Spirit ought to have been sent into flesh.

§ 15. 5. Also, the Master will say below that, on account of the charity which appeared in it, this work is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore He ought much more to have been incarnate, because in this a greater charity would have appeared.

§ 16. Solution: It must be said that it was not fitting nor is it fitting for the Holy Spirit to be incarnate, but for the Son alone, for the reasons stated above.

§ 17. Therefore, to the first it must be said that the Holy Spirit is not called closer to us for the reason that He is more unible to flesh than the Son, but because He proceeds from eternity as capable of being given in time; and therefore, according to His name, He speaks a relation to the mission which occurs into the hearts of the faithful to sanctify the rational creature. For He proceeds as the gift of the Father and of the Son, capable of being given even to a rational creature: but the name of the Son, according to which He is from the Father, does not import such a relation to us.

§ 18. To the next it must be said, that goodness and love are appropriated to the Holy Spirit with respect to the distribution of gifts, and not with respect to the incarnation. For the incarnation encloses within itself nativity, which chiefly belongs to the one born according to eternal generation.

§ 19. To the next it must be said, that the concept of mission is enclosed in the concept of incarnation, but this is not sufficient; rather it is necessary that from His own property He has a congruence toward such a mode of mission which is to be born in flesh, and no one has this except the Son. Hence Augustine says that He was incarnate lest the name of Son should pass to another: hence it was fitting for Him alone to be incarnate.

§ 20. To the next it must be said, that the work of the incarnation was for the sake of grace, not just any grace, but that which is of reconciliation and of the adoption of sons. Hence the Apostle, to Galatians 4:4 and 5: God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that He might redeem them who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. Therefore, since adoption occurs with the consent of the true heir, it was necessary for us to be adopted through the true son. And therefore the Apostle says, to Colossians 1:13: He has translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His love. The gloss of Augustine says, that is, of His beloved Son: and therefore this grace is more appropriated to the Son than to the Holy Spirit.

§ 21. To the next it must be said, that the incarnation itself is the action by which the three persons worked flesh, not for themselves, but for the Son: and this is more fittingly attributed to the Holy Spirit because of the love which appeared supremely in it, as the Master says. But the incarnation is the assumption of flesh, and that is more fittingly attributed to the Son for the reasons stated above.

§ 22. The text of this chapter is self-evident.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Father And The Holy Spirit Could Have Become Incarnate, And Whether They Can Assume The Same Man, And Whether They Can Assume Several Men

§ 24. Next it is inquired concerning that which the Master says: But if it is asked whether the Father, or the Holy Spirit, etc.

§ 25. For there it is said, that the Father and the Holy Spirit could and can be incarnate. And this seems to be false:

§ 26. 1. By the reasons stated above.

§ 27. 2. Also, the power of God is as great as His wisdom: and His wisdom is as great as His knowledge: but He never knew that the Father or the Holy Spirit was to be incarnate: therefore He never could.

§ 28. 3. Also, nothing can or could ever be done, the reason for which did not precede it in the divine mind: but there was never any reason for this: therefore it never could be done.

§ 29. Furthermore it is asked, whether the Father and the Holy Spirit could assume the same man, or the same human nature which the Son assumed.

§ 30. And it seems that they could: Luke 1:37: No word shall be impossible with God: therefore they could assume the same nature.

§ 31. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Let it be posited that they assumed it: such a union is one which makes God man, and man God in person: therefore the Father is this man, and the Son is this man, and the Holy Spirit is this man. But whatever things are the same as one and the same thing, are the same as each other: therefore the Father is the Son and the Holy Spirit, and conversely, which is false: therefore they could not assume the same man.

§ 32. Again it is asked further, if they could assume multiple men, or even every man?

§ 33. And it seems that they could: For the assumption of one would have conferred as much benefit as the assumption of another. Therefore, since God is not envious, and this benefit was communicable, it seems that it ought to have been bestowed upon every man.

§ 34. Solution: It must be said with the Master and Augustine, that the Father and the Holy Spirit could and can be incarnate: but it is not fitting, nor was it necessary. Hence, since God does nothing unless it is fitting and decent, He did not do this: yet if He were to do it and had done it, it would be most fitting.

§ 35. To the other point which is objected first, it must be said that the reasons previously had are reasons of greater fittingness according to human investigation: they do not, however, remove divine power, nor do they limit it in anything. Because God, as Dionysius says, is above mind and above reason, from which He is neither worthily thought of, nor worthily spoken of.

§ 36. To the next it must be said, that His power is as great as His knowledge, according as each is essentially considered in Him. But if each is referred to external objects, the power will be wider than the knowledge: for He can do certain things which He does not know [i.e., with the knowledge of vision], because He will not do them, that is, for which He does not have a reason within Himself: which, if He were to do them, He would without doubt fore-have the reason for them. And this is also the case with the will, which, although it is as great as power and knowledge, is nevertheless lesser with respect to objects. Hence Augustine says that certain things are subjected to power and not to knowledge, and certain things to knowledge and not to will.

§ 37. To the other point which is further asked, I say without prejudice, by the reason introduced, that it could not have happened that the Father and the Holy Spirit should assume the same man on account of the confusion in the persons: because, since the union is in person, it would seem to follow that they would all be one person. I say moreover that it cannot be done: because, although God could have done this, nevertheless on the part of the assumed nature it could not be done, and this is not a divine impotence, but rather of the creature, on account of the absurdity which seems to follow.

§ 38. To the other point which is further asked, whether they could have assumed every man, it has been answered above that this again would not be fitting on the part of the individuals: because all men would be united into three men, as was proved above, and thus the beauty of the universe would perish, as well as the potential for the multiplication of the human race, and also (which is more absurd than these) the number of the elect, and the restoration of the ruin of the Angels would not occur. But if the nature of three men were assumed, it would be superfluous: since redemption is the end of the assumption of human nature, and through the assumption of one man the redemption of infinite worlds could be accomplished, if they existed. I do not say it is superfluous, however, for the reason that if it were done or had been done it would be unseemly: on the contrary, whatever God does is most fitting. Rather, I assign the reason of fittingness on the part of the creature. For most fittingly God arranged the nose below the forehead: but if He had placed it under the back, it would nevertheless be most fitting, although we might not see the beauty on the part of the disposition of the human body.

§ 39. The text of that chapter is self-evident.

Articulus 11 — Whether, For The Assumption By One Person, When It Is Said, The Son Assumed Human Nature, All Three Persons Assume

§ 41. Next it is inquired concerning that which he says: But perhaps some will say: Since they are undivided, etc.

§ 42. For it seems that for the assumption of one, all three assume.

§ 43. 1. For when He is said to be incarnate, an effect in the creature is noted: but every such effect is indivisibly of the three persons: therefore if one assumed, all assumed.

§ 44. 2. Also, Damascene says that the three are the same in all things except ingeneration, and generation, and procession. The incarnation is not any of these: therefore it seems that in the incarnation they are the same.

§ 45. 3. Also, the Son is not united to flesh only in that which relates to another: because Damascene says that the whole divine nature is incarnate in one of its hypostases; but in nature He is the same as the Father and the Holy Spirit: therefore it seems that whatever belongs to Him according to nature, belongs also to the Father and the Holy Spirit. But this is the assumption of flesh: therefore this belongs to the Father and the Holy Spirit, which is false. Because thus Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names, where he discretely posits what is fitting to the divine persons: But it is discrete [or proper] by the benign divine operation toward us, that the substantial Word truly and totally was made a substance according to us [and] from us, and to do and to suffer, and whatever things belong to His human contemplation, are selected and set apart. For in these things the Father and the Spirit communicated according to no reason, unless someone says according to a good, fitting, and benign will, and according to every superposed and ineffable divine operation which He did, and being made according to us, invariable according to [the fact] that He is God and the Word of God.

§ 46. Solution: It must be said that in the incarnation there are three things, namely the operation or action, and the thing worked itself, and that to which there is union. The operation or action is indivisibly of the three persons. But the thing worked itself is the body and soul joined by a natural conjunction. And He to whom it is united is the Son alone. And this is taken from Damascene, where he says thus: The wisdom and power of the most high God, subsisting in His own hypostasis, the Son of God, consubstantial with the Father, overshadowed the Virgin as a divine seed. And He constructed for Himself from pure and unspotted bloods a flesh animated by a rational and intellectual soul, the firstfruits of our mass, not with seed, but by a forming work through the Holy Spirit.

§ 47. Therefore it must be said to the first objection, that the effect is indivisibly of the three, that is, from the three: but it is not of the three in the sense that it is united to the three: and in this sense the objection infers.

§ 48. To the next it must be said, that what Damascene says is true: but it is to be understood thus, that those properties are considered in two ways, namely, in themselves, or in the concept of others. And just as they distinctly belong to the persons in themselves, so also those things in whose concept they are inseparably enclosed cause distinct things to belong to the persons. Hence "incarnate", in the concept of that which is called "incarnate", encloses the property of the Son, on account of which it belongs to the Son alone: because it encloses within itself a mission and a 'being from another'. How this is the case is clear from the aforesaid, where it was proved that the Son alone is unible to flesh. Hence, on account of the concept of relation, this cannot belong to the other persons.

§ 49. To the next it must be said, that to be incarnate, or to be united to flesh, does not belong to the divine essence according as it is considered absolutely without the concept of the persons: and this will be proved below. Hence to be incarnate, according to the reason of understanding, priorly belongs to the person of the Son, and posteriorly to the essence, namely, because the essence is the Son of God, and conversely. And therefore it cannot be argued that it belongs to the Father and to the Holy Spirit: just as the Son is His own property, and His property is the divine essence, and the divine essence is the Father: and yet the Father is not the property of the Son, nor is the property of the Son the Father.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Whole Trinity Descended Upon Christ Baptized In The Appearance Of A Dove

§ 51. Next an objection is raised concerning that which he says, there, D, near the end: Nor that the same Trinity descended in the species of a dove, etc.

§ 52. For in the dove and the voice there seems to be nothing whereby it is not commonly of the three persons: for the operation of the dove and of the voice is indivisibly of the three, and the thing worked itself. But the union, which is a third thing there, was not present: for the Holy Spirit was not united to the dove, as the Son to the flesh; nor the Father to the voice, but the Son to the flesh: therefore nothing seems to stand in the way why those two should not commonly belong to the three persons.

§ 53. Solution: There is not only a dove there: but the descent of the dove, in which descent the mission of the Holy Spirit is understood. And the mission encloses within itself the concept of the personal property of the Holy Spirit according to how He is in the dove: namely, in such a way that the species of the dove is an appropriated [sign] of the Holy Spirit, in which the proper is enclosed. So that the sense is, that a dove appropriable to the Holy Spirit descended, in which descent the Holy Spirit proceeded by a temporal procession which contains within itself through its concept the eternal procession. And thus it is clear how this does not belong to the Father and the Son except with respect to cause, not by reason of a relation or property enclosed in the concept of that descent.

§ 54. Similarly I say concerning the voice, that it is not only taken as a created voice sounding in the air: but also according to the articulated words which sounded there. And these are: This is my Son, etc. In the utterance of this, therefore, the Father is understood sounding according to His personal property, although the Son and the Holy Spirit produced that sound with Him.

§ 55. And the text is self-evident in the chapter.

Articulus 2 — Why The Son Of God Did Not Assume Human Nature From The Beginning

Why did the Son of God not assume human nature from the beginning?

§ 9. But a doubt still remains: Why did He not assume human nature from the beginning?

§ 10. And it is objected thus: 1. When there was a disease, it was the time for medicine. But from the beginning there was a disease. Therefore, the physician ought to have been incarnate from the beginning.

§ 11. 2. Furthermore, this is seen by similarity to a bodily disease, which the longer it grows strong, the more difficultly it is cured. Therefore, it seems that from the beginning of the disease it was fitting for the Son to be incarnate.

§ 12. Solution: It must be said that it is otherwise in the medicine of the spirit and in the medicine of the body. Because bodily medicine acts with nature and helps it, and this through the actions of the primary qualities, which do not act voluntarily nor through the intellect; and therefore it is better to meet that disease in the beginning, as long as nature is strong, before it succumbs. But spiritual medicine does not act except with our will at least consenting. But for a consent of this kind, a foreknowledge of the disease, and of the medicine, and of the need is required: because otherwise the physician and the medicine would not be sufficiently embraced, and it is of no avail unless it is fervently desired. And therefore it was consequential (as the Saints say) first to make the disease known, and that there was no help through nature, or the obedience of the law without grace, and afterwards the physician would come with the medicine.

§ 13. And through this the solution to both objections is manifest.

DISTINCTIO II

Divisio Textus

§ 56. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 57. And because in man the whole human nature, etc. Here begins the second part in which what was assumed is treated.

§ 58. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which it is touched upon what is assumed. In the second it is determined whether the soul was assumed mediating the intellect, and the body mediating the soul: and this begins there, B, Therefore the Son of God assumed, etc. And in the third it is determined whether He simultaneously in time assumed, and made, both the soul and the body, there, C, But if it is asked, etc.

§ 59. In the first part he does three things. First he proves that when it is said, "The Son assumed human nature," by human nature is understood the body and the soul. Secondly, he introduces the error of some saying that by human nature is understood a property following the conjoined body and soul: and he destroys this through John of Damascus who says that in the Lord Jesus it is not possible to accept a common species. Thirdly, he introduces John of Damascus also saying of what sort was that which He assumed: because it was of the same sort as that which He planted in our nature.

§ 60. The sentence in the Text will already be clear through the disputation.

Articulus 1 — Whether Only The Rational Nature Is Assumptible

§ 62. First therefore five things occur to be inquired into, of which the first is, Whether only rational nature is assumable, or conversely irrational nature? Secondly, Whether only the nature of man, or also of an Angel? Thirdly, Whether the nature of man, or also a man? Fourthly, How this is true that in the Lord Jesus one may not accept a common species? Fifthly, Whether He assumed nothing except what He planted in our nature?

§ 63. First therefore it seems that irrational creature is also assumable.

§ 64. 1. There is a congruence [or sharing] of those things, and of congruent things a transition to one another into one is possible: therefore the possibility and aptitude of union belongs to the irrational creature.

§ 65. 2. If perhaps it is said that a trace [or vestige] is not a sufficient likeness, but only an image. On the contrary: Between the Creator and any creature there is an infinite distance: but of things infinitely distant, one is not nearer than the rest: therefore it seems that an irrational creature is just as unible as a rational one.

§ 66. 3. Furthermore, union is for the complement [or completion] of the universe: therefore it seems that irrational nature ought to be elevated through union just as rational nature.

§ 67. 4. Furthermore, in some things irrational creatures are more assimilated to divine nature than human nature is: such as the sun, and the moon, and things of this kind, which Boethius calls immortal and spiritual bodies: therefore, since a transition is easier for things having a symbol [or common ground], it seems that these are more unible than rational things.

§ 68. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. That which is unible to the deity through union is glorifiable, and partakes of beatitude: but the irrational does not partake of beatitude: therefore it is not unible. Proof of the first premise: The conjunction of sanctifying grace is lesser than the union to the deity: but the conjunction of sanctifying grace orders towards the partaking of beatitude: therefore that which is to the deity does so.

§ 69. 2. Also, the end of the assumption of a creature is redemption: but the irrational is not in this way unible to God: therefore it is not unible.

§ 70. 3. Also, nobler gifts belong to nobler creatures: but the rational creature is nobler than the irrational: therefore it is capable of nobler gifts. But above all things the communication of the deity with a creature is most noble: therefore none but the rational was susceptible of a gift of this kind.

§ 71. And because it is easy to adduce many such arguments, let these suffice.

§ 72. Solution: It must be said that an irrational creature is not unible: for when it is asked what is unible, it is not asked what God can unite to Himself, but rather what has an aptitude from some fittingness for union. And therefore, since the irrational creature has no fittingness for union, I say that it is not unible.

§ 73. To the first thing therefore which is objected, it must be said that a vestige does not make for unibility, but is rather an indication that it is from another as from an acting cause. For unibility posits the perfection of the same union as to joy and fruition, which is born from such a conjunction, and also some cause of the union, as Anselm says, none of which is present according to possibility in the irrational creature: and therefore it is not unible.

§ 74. To the next it must be said, that although the Creator is equally distant from all created things, nevertheless not all things are equally distant from Him, as Dionysius says in the book On the Celestial Hierarchy, and Aristotle in the book On Causes. And therefore, through degrees of dignity which are distinguished by the participation in the goodnesses which are in God, one thing approaches more than another: just as the living approaches more than mere being, and the sensing more than the living merely, and the reasoning more than the sensing. And therefore the rational creature is more unible than the irrational.

§ 75. To the next it must be said, that the irrational creature did not fall except through the fall of man: and therefore it is not elevated except in him for two reasons: one of which is because every creature is in some way in man. Because the elements are in those things which complexion the body, but the vegetative and sensitive potential is in the soul, and also a likeness to the Angel in reason and intellect. And therefore he is also called a microcosm, because he collects all the parts of the macrocosm. And therefore in the microcosm the macrocosm is elevated to a higher dignity. But the other reason is because man is the end of every creature: therefore, just as that which is towards the end has dignity only in the end, so every creature will have dignity in man. And thus the Apostle says: All things are yours, but you are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Articulus 2 — Whether An Angel Is Assumptible

§ 77. Secondly it is asked, whether an Angel is also assumable?

§ 78. And it seems that it is. 1. For an Angel (as Gregory says) has the image of God more expressly than man: and therefore by Ezekiel 28:12 he is called the seal of resemblance. Since therefore man is unible because of the image, it seems that an Angel is more unible than man.

§ 79. 2. Furthermore, an Angel is capable through the intellect of the union itself, and is beatificable: therefore he is unible.

§ 80. 3. Also, it belongs to the highest mercy to reduce all things from a state of misery: but the Angel is in a state of misery: therefore since God is supremely merciful, it seems that He ought to unite the Angel to Himself so that He might redeem him.

§ 81. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. From whatever thing personal distinction is inseparable, that thing is not assumable: but personal distinction is inseparable from the angelic nature: therefore it is not assumable. Proof of the major premise: Assumption destroys nothing in what is assumed, because one of the assumers does not transition into the other. If therefore He were to assume that which is in a personal distinction, the personal distinction in it would not be destroyed, and thus union in person would not occur, nor even in nature, because the nature of the assumer and the nature of the assumed would always remain distinct, and thus no union would occur. Proof of the minor premise is taken from the second book of the Sentences, where the Master says through the word of Augustine, that personal distinction is one of the attributes of angelic nature, which does not forsake the nature itself.

§ 82. 2. Also, in those things in which potentiality is never towards an act, in those things nature does not precede the person if there are persons—that is, if they are individual substances of a rational nature: therefore in them nature exists with the person: therefore the nature or person is not assumable.

§ 83. 3. Also, assumption is for redemption, which occurs through someone other than him who sinned: but he who sinned by himself does not have a congruity to satisfy through another: since therefore the Angel sinned by himself, he could not satisfy through another: and thus assumption would be empty.

§ 84. 4. Also, union is not accomplished through all hypostases of a unible nature, but rather towards one; and because all sinned from one from whom they descended, they can also satisfy through one. But not all Angels descended from one Angel; therefore even with one assumed, he could not satisfy for the others: therefore the Angel is not assumable.

§ 85. 5. Also, the Apostle says this, to Hebrews 2:16: For nowhere does He apprehend Angels, but He apprehends the seed of Abraham.

§ 86. Solution: It must be said that an Angel is not unible for the reasons lastly introduced.

§ 87. Therefore to the first it must be said, that a likeness is not a sufficient cause. For some say that an Angel is not the image of God, and they assign the reasons they wish: but because they contradict the Saints, namely Gregory, Augustine, and Anselm, it does not seem to me that one should say this: but rather, that the rationale of an image is not a sufficient cause for the assumption of a rational nature. Rather, something is required on the part of the nature, and something on the part of the state. On the part of the nature, namely, that the nature is distinguishable in time and act from personal perfection, and that it has an origin from one: because otherwise if one nature of man were assumed, God would not be united in nature, because one nature and another is according to its coming from another principle of origin. But on the part of the state, namely that he sinned through another, that he could rise again, and the like. And neither such things on the part of nature, nor on the part of the state of sin, are found in the Angel: and therefore the Angel will not be assumable.

§ 88. And through this the solution to all the objections is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Nature Of Man Is Assumptible, Or Also A Perfect Man

§ 90. Thirdly it is asked, whether only the nature of man is assumable, or also the perfect man?

§ 91. And it seems that the man is: because 1. It is said thus, Psalm 64:5: Blessed is he whom You have chosen and assumed:[200] but it speaks of a person: therefore He assumed a man.

§ 92. 2. Also, Augustine: He who says that the man Christ, once assumed by God, is laid aside, let him be anathema: therefore He assumed a man.

§ 93. 3. And because many authorities say this, let the same be proved by reasons thus: Christ assumed the conjoined body and soul: but the conjoined body and soul are a man: therefore Christ assumed a man.

§ 94. 4. Also, Christ is most truly a man: either therefore a man whom He assumed, or a man whom He did not assume. If a man whom He did not assume: therefore He Himself is some man whom He did not assume: but a man whom He did not assume is Peter, or John, and so of all the others whom He did not assume: therefore He Himself is some one of them, which is false.

§ 95. 5. Furthermore, "to assume" either says the grace of union, or another [grace]. If another, let it be asked what that is, and it will not be possible to assign it. If it says the grace of union, thus: The grace of union unites: therefore the uniter unites the one thus assumed: but to every union there corresponds a one: therefore He Himself is one with the assumed. But the Son of God is not one with human nature; because He Himself is not human nature; therefore He did not assume human nature, but a man, since He is one with this man.

§ 1. Solution: It must be said that Christ did not assume a man. For the rule of the ancients is good, that the assuming [principle] is not the assumed [nature], but the uniting [principle] is the united [nature]; this is evident from our manner of speaking. For we do not say: "I assume to myself the clothed or dressed thing," but rather it is well said: "I assume a garment or clothing." But it is well said: "I unite the clothed thing to myself," or "I am one with the clothed thing." And it is not said thus: "I am one with the garment." Whence it must be noted that to assume expresses a violent motion which is a drawing toward the one drawing; and therefore, according to the conceptual order [ratio intelligendi], assumption is prior to union. For first there was the drawing of the nature to Himself, and afterwards, according to the conceptual order, union in a hypostasis followed. Therefore, union is, as it were, the terminus of assumption. Hence, He could not assume a man. For if He had assumed a man, then He would have assumed some man: and thus there would have been some man whom He had assumed, which is false. Therefore, since that union destroys nothing in the assumed reality, if He had assumed some man, and that man had been an individual person, his personality would not have been destroyed: and thus distinct persons and distinct natures would have remained, because those are always distinct: and then there would have been no union. However, this will be inquired into more fully below.

§ 2. Therefore, to the first, it must be said that it is commonly glossed thus: "Blessed is he whom," that is, whose nature, "You have assumed."

§ 3. To the next, it must be said that man is posited by Augustine for human nature: because otherwise he would be saying nothing. For it is certain that Christ was not a man during the three days [in the tomb], but He had human nature united to Himself: and therefore, during the three days He would have laid aside the man, if man were taken strictly there.

§ 4. To the next, it must be said that a body and a soul conjoined are not a man. For not just any conjunction of body and soul makes a perfect man in person, but rather a conjunction which is complete according to nature: and this is with organs formed and perfected, and with their powers strengthened in them. Although in Christ these were present after the union, and the assumption and the union were simultaneous in time, nevertheless (as has been said) according to the conceptual order, assumption is prior to union, and is like the becoming [in fieri] of that union itself, and union is like the completed state [in factum esse] of that assumption itself. And therefore, to assume is with respect to the nature, and not with respect to the hypostasis. However, some have sometimes said that this can be conceded in some way: "He assumed a man"; distinguishing that "He assumed" can signify assumption according to the conceptual order either as in becoming, or as in the terminus. If it is as in becoming or something like in becoming, then He did not assume a man, but human nature. But if it is as in the terminus, then He assumed a man: because the terminus, or quasi-terminus, of the assumption is a man.

§ 5. To the next, it must be said that Christ is indeed most truly a man: but He is not a man whom He assumed under the formality of a man; rather, He is the one whose nature He assumed.

§ 6. Therefore, to what is asked, "Is He the man whom He assumed?", it must be said that this is not a division opposed by contradiction: "He is the man whom He assumed," "He is the man whom He did not assume," in such a way that the implication falls under the negation, because otherwise it would not contradict. Rather, He Himself is the man whose nature He assumed, which nature is neither the Son of God, nor is it this man, because no man is his own nature.

§ 7. To the next, it must be said that union is through the grace of union: but this union is both as in becoming [in fieri] and as in completed state [in factum esse]. When it is as in becoming, then it is strictly assumption; and when it is as in completed state, then it is as union. And it still remains clear that He assumed human nature.

Articulus 4 — Whether It Is Lawful To Say That Christ United To Himself This Man Per Se, And Man Consequently, And The Son Of The Virgin Per Accidens

Whether it is permissible to say: Christ united to Himself this man per se, and man by consequence, and the son of the Virgin by accident?

Whether it is permissible to say: Christ united to Himself this man per se, and man by consequence, and the son of the Virgin by accident?

§ 1. Fourthly, it is asked whether it happens to be said that Christ united to Himself this man per se, and man by consequence, and the son of the Virgin by accident?

§ 2. And it seems that it is so. 1. For union is in a hypostasis: but Christ is only one hypostasis, namely eternal: therefore, this man is that hypostasis. But this hypostasis is a man, and an animal, and a body, and a substance, just as the essential predicates that follow it: therefore, by consequence, the union is of those things.

§ 3. 2. Also, it happens accidentally to this man that he is the son of the Virgin; therefore, it seems that He united that to Himself by accident.

§ 4. But against this, it seems that He did not unite to Himself this man: for nothing is united with something unless according to reason it preexists prior to the union with the other: but this man, according to reason, was not prior to being united. Therefore, this man was not united: therefore, neither by consequence was man or animal, nor by accident the son of the Virgin.

§ 5. Solution: It must be said with Augustine that such was that union which would make God man and man God. Hence it must be conceded that He united a man to Himself: because the union is the terminus of the assumption, and man is, in a certain way, of the assumed nature, because it is consequent upon the conjoined body and soul which are assumed here. And it is rightly conceded that by consequence it is of man, or animal, and of the other enunciable predicates of men; and by accident of the others which are accidental, such as the son of the Virgin, and the like.

§ 6. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that if He unites a man to Himself, it is not necessary that He unite to Himself some preexisting man: because by making a man He united, and by uniting He made. For the uniter in this union is of infinite power, which is not the case in other unions. If, however, it is objected that a similar thing could be said concerning assumption, it must be said that it is not similar: because to assume, by its very notion, implies a diversity between the assuming and the assumed; but union does not imply a diversity between the uniting and the united.

Articulus 5 — Whether In The Lord Jesus A Common Species Is To Be Admitted

Whether in the Lord Jesus it is possible to take a common species?

§ 7. Fifthly, it is asked concerning what he says there, A, toward the end: In the Lord Jesus Christ, however, it is not possible to take a common species, etc.

§ 8. For this seems to be false, because: 1. The Lord Jesus is a man, and man is a common species: therefore, in Him it is possible to take a common species.

§ 9. 2. Also, this man who is Jesus is either in some species, or not. If not: then He does not have communication in the species of man, and thus His redemption would not avail for man, which is false: therefore, He is in the species of man, and thus a common species is taken in Him.

§ 10. 3. Furthermore, the reasoning of John Damascene does not seem valid when he says: For He was neither made, nor was He ever another. For this does not seem to be a cause: because the sun is neither made, nor will it ever become another: and yet it has a common species, as far as the communicability of its form is concerned: and if it is not communicated, this is because the entire matter is determined within the form, and therefore the form remains undivided in all its matter.

§ 1. 4. But to this some say that (as Boethius says) a species is the whole being of individuals, at least formally: because what is subsequent to the species belongs to the individuating principles. In the Lord Jesus, however, this species is not the whole being: because He has a certain being from the Deity. And therefore Damascene says that in the Lord Jesus Himself a common species is not to be found.

§ 2. But against this: Avicenna says that just as light, shining, and the shining thing differ: so do essence, being [esse], and a being [ens] differ. Therefore, just as light is referred to nature, so is essence; and just as shining is referred to act, so is being [esse]. But in Christ there is only one hypostasis and person. Since therefore being [esse], which is strictly an act, belongs to a person, Christ will not have except one being [esse], as it seems: but one being [esse] is what is in one species: therefore it seems that Christ is in some one species.

§ 3. Furthermore, according to this, His reasoning which He introduces would be no reasoning at all: as if there were not one species for the reason that the form in Christ according to which Christ could exist is not communicable.

§ 4. Solution: It must be said that according to the understanding of Damascene, it is to be understood thus: In the Lord Jesus, etc., namely, that there are understood to be two compositions in Christ, one of which is natural, the other by the grace of union. One is proper, the other indeed improper. The proper composition is called the first one, which is of soul and body: the soul (I say) which is the act of a physical organic body having life in potency: and this composition is followed by the form of the whole which is man, or humanity if it is permissible to speak abstractly of it, and this itself is the species in this particular individual. For form is twofold, namely the form of the matter, or of the part, or of potency: and this form is the end of generation in nature, and is a part of the thing not predicable of the thing itself, and such a form is the soul in man.

§ 5. But the other form is that which is the formal definition [ratio] of the thing, and the whole being according to definition: and this is consequent upon the composition of the natural form and the natural potency, which is matter. And the Lord Jesus had such a consequent form on account of the natural composition, on account of which He is a true man, and one supposit in the species of man. But there is another composition in Christ, which is not truly a composition unless composition is expounded to mean the placing of one with another: and this is of the whole human nature with the Deity, not for constituting some third thing, but rather in the reception of personality which had been from eternity in the supposit of the divine nature. And this must be posited for this reason: because every composing element has the character of a part and of something imperfect with respect to the form of the composition: but divinity neither in itself, nor posited with another, can fall into the character of a part and of something imperfect. Whence it is not strictly any composing element, but, posited with itself, draws [the other] into some act of its own supposit: and therefore human nature posited with it in the supposit came to be through the association of the supposit of the divine nature. And with respect to this composition Damascene says that there is not a common species in the Lord Jesus, a species (I say) which would be the form of the composition, and the formal definition consequent upon the composition of the whole human nature with the divine.

§ 6. Therefore, to what is objected concerning Damascene's proof, it must be said that he does not intend this to be the reason, that He Himself cannot be predicated of many: but rather he proves the antecedent from the consequent. For what is impossible to have a form which follows a composition, is impossible to have a communicable form. Since therefore every species, as far as it is in itself, is communicable (as has been said elsewhere), that which is impossible to be communicated of itself does not have a species of composition, or a form of the whole, which is the same thing; and thus since it is impossible for Christ to have a communicable form, it is impossible for Him to have a form which would follow upon the composition of the Deity with humanity.

Articulus 6 — Whether Christ Assumed Only What He Planted, Such That He Assumed Of The Same Number

Did Christ assume only what He planted, such that He assumed of the same number?

§ 1. In the sixth place, a doubt arises concerning what he says there, A, at the end: All the things which God planted in our nature, the Word assumed, etc.

§ 2. For the sake of this, three things are asked in order to exclude heresies. One of them is, whether He assumed only what He planted, such that He assumed of the same number.

Secondly, if He assumed not the same in number, but in origin, whether He assumed such as He planted? Thirdly, how did He assume?

§ 3. Regarding the first, there was a certain heresy which said that the substance of Christ's body descended through all the parts like a certain light, unmixed with the parts of nature corrupted by the corruption of vice, nor infected by the lust of copulation: and it could have, or did have, this sort of support for its error:

§ 4. 1. Medicine and a wound are of diverse qualities: since therefore the substance of Christ was medicine, it must not be of the same quality as the wound: but the wound was the corruption of vice: therefore the quality of Christ's substance always remained without this sort of corruption.

§ 5. 2. Also, it is found in the book of Wisdom (7:30): Malice does not overcome wisdom. And in the same place, v. 25: No defiled thing incurs into her. Since therefore Christ is the wisdom of the Father, it seems that nothing defiled ever incurred into the substance of His body.

§ 6. 3. Also, the greater purity that could be under God is owed to Christ: but it is a greater purity for the substance of His body never to have been subjected to sin, than to have sometimes been subjected even in another: therefore it was never subjected. Therefore, like light unmixed with darkness, it descended through all.

§ 7. 4. Also, Augustine says that Christ was in the loins of Abraham in one way, and Levi in another. For Levi, who was to come into his mother through copulation, was there through the law of concupiscence, and through corpulent substance; whereas Christ, who was not to come into His mother through copulation, was there through corpulent substance only. Therefore it seems that He was similarly so in the others: therefore this corpulent substance descended without the admixture of the other infected substance: therefore it descended like light from the first parent.

§ 8. 5. Also, the first man was not totally corrupted, for otherwise he would not have been capable of medicine: but it was more fitting that the substance of Christ should be formed from an integral part than from a corrupted one: therefore the entire substance of Christ always descended integrally, unmixed with corruption.

§ 9. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. All the parts of the first man ought to have been subjected to reason equally, with none excepted, and all the powers of the mind ought to have been subjected to God. Therefore, since he was punished in this that his body was not subjected to him because his reason was not subjected to God, he ought to have been punished in all parts of his body, and the whole body corrupted: therefore no part remained uncorrupted.

§ 10. 2. Also, in the generation of Seth there was only the use of the act of generation: therefore whatever of the substance of Adam came into Seth, descended through that act. But the substance from which the body of Christ was afterward originally formed came from Adam into Seth: therefore it descended through that act: therefore through copulation. And whatever descends through copulation is corrupted by the law of concupiscence, as Augustine says: therefore the substance of Christ's body existing there, not mixed as in Christ, was corrupted.

§ 1. 3. Also, in the succession of the fathers there was either a similitude of parts, or a dissimilitude. If in the first way, I have my point: because since Christ descended in their succession, the substance of Christ's body was not unmixed with the substance of the bodies of the others. But if there was a dissimilitude in the parts, a dissimilar substance means a dissimilar act of transfusion, and a dissimilar receptacle in which it is kept and guarded: but it is impossible to find such a diverse act of transfusion and dissimilar receptacle, even for those wishing to feign it: therefore the substance of Christ's body was not distinct from the substance of the bodies of the others.

§ 2. 4. Furthermore, according to this, Christ would have descended only from Adam, and from none of the others, if this substance was preserved distinct in the others only: which is contrary to the Psalm saying: Today I have begotten you. Which a Gloss also expounds concerning His temporal nativity.

§ 3. Solution: It must be said that the substance of Christ's body was transfused indistinctly all the way down to the substance of the body of the glorious Virgin: which was also for this reason sanctified in the womb, and afterward purged by the Holy Spirit: so that the vice of propagation might be entirely deleted from that which Christ deigned to associate with Himself.

§ 4. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the medicine was the body assumed as assumed, and it was not in many [ancestors] in the quality of medicine, but only according to original matter: and this sufficed.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that no defiled thing ever ran into Wisdom: but the matter of propagation had no relation to Christ except according to matter, and not according to the corruption to be purged from it by sanctification in the womb and the coming of the Holy Spirit. And therefore it could not even incur; but it ran only as far as the mother: but into Christ it could not incur.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that the greater purity that can be understood under God is owed to Christ, in such a way that the end of the redemption which was accomplished through Him is preserved. But it creates no impurity if Christ accepted the pure matter of His body from matter that was vitiated in origin. For because of this Christ was never subjected to sin: although the others with whom He agrees in matter were subjected to sin.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that Augustine understands the matter which is in the loins not absolutely, but in comparison to those whose matter it is: and thus it receives conjungibility with lust necessarily in some, and in some it is impossible for such a conjunction. For the matter as related to Christ cannot be subjected to the law of concupiscence, as related to Levi it cannot fail to be subjected. If, however, the matter of the loins is considered absolutely, it entirely is subject to the law of concupiscence: and in this way Augustine is speaking, as will become clear below, when the tithing of Christ is inquired into.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the first man was materially totally corrupted: whence the medicine was in him only according to potency, namely that in assumption it could be purified: and therefore that objection is founded upon a frivolity. But as to what it says, that if he was totally corrupted, then it was impossible for healing, it must be said that this too is false: because he was not corrupted in such a way that the corruption would be inseparable from him, unlike in a demon, from whom corruption cannot be separated.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Assumed Such A Body As He Planted

Did Christ assume such a body as He planted?

Did Christ assume such a body as He planted?

§ 1. Next it is asked: What kind of body did He assume?

§ 2. And it seems that it was such as He planted: 1. But He planted it in a certain immortality: therefore (as it seems) He assumed such a body.

§ 3. 2. Furthermore, Christ's incarnation was for this end, that what we lost in Adam, He might recover for us: therefore He ought to have assumed our body in that state.

§ 4. 3. Furthermore, an effect does not seem to exist without a cause: because the Philosopher seems to say that when the cause ceases, the effect ceases. But penalty is the effect of fault. Since therefore Christ was immune from fault, it seems He also ought to have been immune from penalty: and thus He assumed a subject not subject to penalties.

§ 5. 4. Also, He assumed nothing except what He planted in our nature: but He did not plant penalty in our nature: therefore He did not assume penalty. The first premise is written in the Letter. The second is written, Wisdom 1:13, 16: God did not make death. But the wicked with hands and words have called it to them.

§ 6. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Christ came to redeem: but redemption could not congruously happen except through satisfaction. But he who could not suffer penalty could not satisfy: therefore He ought to have assumed our penalties.

§ 7. 2. Also, Hebrews 2:14: Because the children have communicated in flesh and blood, He Himself likewise partook of the same, that through death He might destroy him who had the empire of death.

§ 8. Solution: It must be said that Christ assumed a body with its penalties. And concerning this there will be a more proper treatise below, where it will be determined what penalties Christ assumed, and what He accepted from each state.

§ 9. To the first therefore it must be said that penalty is in the body in three ways: namely, with respect to merit, and thus it is induced by sin, and not planted by God; and with respect to vindicative justice, and thus it is inflicted by God as a just judge; and with respect to contrary principles repugnant to one another and inducing dissolution, and thus it is planted by God in this very fact that He made the body from contraries. For the fact that contraries did not fight before sin is owed to grace, not to nature—the grace (I say) which is the grace of innocence, as is determined in Book II of the Sentences, concerning the state of Adam before sin.

§ 10. To the next it must be said, as Augustine says on Genesis, that we do not recover in Christ the same immortality in species which we lost in Adam, but that to which Adam was to be transferred if he had stood firm. And even if we were to recover the same, nevertheless Christ ought not to have assumed the same: because through the merit of Christ we recover what we lost; but this merit consists in the laying down of His soul for His friends: and therefore it was necessary that He be mortal.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that without doubt penalty is the effect of fault: but it is not necessary that the fault be in the same subject in which the penalty is; rather, it suffices that it be originally in the same nature. But I say "originally," that is, it had preceded in him in whom the whole nature was according to origin.

§ 12. To the last, the solution is clear through what has been said before.

Articulus 8 — How The Word Of God Assumed The Body That It Planted In Our Nature, That Is, Whether In A Perfect Man Or In Seed

How did the Word of God assume the body which He planted in our nature, that is, in a perfect man, or in a seed?

How did the Word of God assume the body which He planted in our nature, that is, in a perfect man, or in a seed?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, How did He assume it?

§ 2. And Jeremiah seems to say that it was a whole perfect man in the lineaments of the body, and the perfection of the soul according to wisdom and grace: because, as he says, the Lord will create a new thing upon the earth: A woman shall compass a man. And the faith holds this.

§ 3. But this seems to be contrary to sacred Scripture: 1. Hebrews 2:16: For nowhere does He apprehend the Angels, but He apprehends the seed of Abraham; therefore it seems He received it in a seed, and not in perfect lineaments.

§ 4. 2. Furthermore, two heresies which were sometimes spoken seem to follow from this, namely, that Christ did not grow in His mother's womb: for if at the instant of conception He had the lineaments and organs for the having of which other little ones grow, it seems He Himself did not grow. The other heresy is that Christ was not in the womb as long as another little one: because in others, forty days, as Augustine says, are owed to the formation of the lineaments; but that was perfected in Christ in one moment: therefore it seems that He would have exited the womb forty days sooner than another little one, which is contrary to the book of Wisdom, where it is said that He was in the womb for a time of nine months just like another.

§ 5. Solution: It must be said to this that, just as the faith says, Christ in receiving the body formed it into lineaments, and by forming it received and united it simultaneously in time: as will be determined in the last part of this distinction.

§ 6. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the seed is posited for the human nature to be redeemed: for the seed of Abraham are the sons of Abraham. But the seed of Abraham is posited, so that it may be understood to pertain to the blessing of Abraham.

§ 7. To the reasoning of the first heresy it must be said that it is not valid: because although Christ received a lineamented body, nevertheless the lineaments were not in that quantity to which the lineaments of other little ones grow when they are born from the womb. Whence what is owed to two things in other little ones, was owed to one thing in Christ. For the time of pregnancy in others is for the formation of the lineaments, and for their due increase; but in Christ it was only for the due increase.

§ 8. Through this the solution to the reasoning of the other heresy is also clear: because although Christ's body immediately had the lineaments of its members, nevertheless He did not have them in the quantity in which they were after forty days: and therefore He had days in the womb along with others in order to acquire the due increase.

Divisio Textus

§ 1. Next the second part of this distinction must be treated, which begins there, B: Therefore the Son of God assumed, etc.

§ 2. In which the Master does three things. For first he shows the medium of congruity and reason through which the Deity is united to the flesh. Secondly, he shows that the mode of this union is inexplicable, there, B, § 2: But that union is inexplicable, etc. Thirdly, he excludes the error of the Manichaean who said that Christ assumed a phantasmic and not a true body, there, B, § 3: Therefore they are not to be heard, etc.

Articulus 9 — Whether In The Union To The Flesh A Medium Was Needed

Did He need a medium in the union to the flesh?

§ 3. Concerning the first of these, however, there are two doubts: the first of which is, whether the Deity needed a medium in the union to the flesh?

§ 4. The second is, what sort of medium is that?

§ 5. Concerning the first it is objected thus: 1. Extremes that are very distant are not united except through some medium: but a created corruptible corporeal thing and an uncreated incorruptible incorporeal thing are very distant: therefore they are not united except by some medium. But the body and the Deity are such things: therefore it seems that such a conjunction needs a medium.

§ 6. 2. Also, a corporeal corruptible created thing and an incorporeal incorruptible created thing are less distant than the Deity and a body: and yet those two are united through a medium, namely through a corporeal spirit which is moved in the body in the manner of the luminaries in the world: therefore it seems that much more should the Deity and flesh have a medium.

§ 7. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever can do something per se without a medium, if it uses that medium, the medium will be superfluous in that case: but the Deity can unite itself to the flesh without a medium: therefore a medium will be superfluous.

§ 8. 2. Furthermore, it seems that Christ would not have had a soul. For nothing is required for life except what is the cause of life, and what is the recipient of life. But the Deity is especially the cause of all life, and the body the recipient: therefore He would have had a soul superfluously.

§ 9. 3. Furthermore, the Gospel seems to say this when it says: The Word became flesh, It does not say anything about a soul.

§ 10. 4. Furthermore, a redeeming union sufficed at the origin of sin: but the origin of sin is in the flesh: therefore it seems that the union of the Deity to the flesh sufficed.

§ 11. 5. Also, Christ came to redeem the propagation: but we are propagated only according to the flesh: therefore the union is only according to the flesh, and not according to the spirit: because God creates all souls anew.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The whole [Christ] assumed the whole of me, so that He might gratuitously bestow salvation on the whole of me; but the principal part of us is the soul: therefore He assumed that principally.

§ 13. 2. Also, the principal death was in the soul: therefore since He came to destroy death, He ought principally to have assumed a soul.

§ 14. Solution: It must be said that Christ assumed a soul, and a body, and all the parts of both.

§ 15. To that which is asked concerning a medium, it must be said that there the medium in a certain way is one to the other, as the Saints say.

§ 1. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Deity on its own part does not need a medium: but a medium was congruous on the part of the flesh, and what kind of medium this is will be determined in the following article of the question.

§ 2. To that which is objected, that Christ did not have a soul, it must be said that although the Deity is per se the cause of life, nevertheless it is not the cause of life as the act of a physical body: because thus it would be a form united to the body, and making a composition: which is absurd. And such a cause of life is demanded in natural life. Whence He would not be a true man if He had assumed only a body, nor would His life be as from a natural form and cause, but rather it would be by the effect of a miracle; and it would not avail us, because such a one would not have convenience with us in the nature of the species, and therefore could not have paid our debt.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that flesh in the Gospel is posited for the whole man: but the more defective part is named, for this reason, to show that Christ despised no part of our nature, and accepted our weaker things.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that although sin in posterity is in origin in the body, nevertheless it is primarily only from the soul, and even in posterity it infects the soul.

§ 5. Also, in posterity He does not redeem only from original sin, but also from actual sin: because our penance would be worth nothing if His satisfaction had not killed the sin before the actual sin, which is from the soul as from a first cause.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is A Medium Of The Thing Or Of Congruity

Is it a medium of reality or of congruity?

§ 6. Secondly it is asked, What kind of medium is it, whether of reality, or of congruity?

§ 7. That it is not a medium of reality is proved in this way: With a medium of reality removed, the conjunction which was held by that medium is removed: but during the three days [in the tomb] the soul was not conjoined to the body. Therefore if it was a medium of reality, the Deity ought not to have been conjoined to the body then, which is false: because the Deity was united to the flesh in the sepulcher, and to the soul in hell.

§ 8. If on account of this it is said, as almost all say, that it is a medium of congruity only:

§ 9. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. With a medium of congruity not posited in being, the extremes are still unible: but with the soul not posited, the extremes are not unible unto the end of redemption: therefore the soul is not merely a medium of congruity. The first premise is self-evident: Because the congruous is indeed fitting and convenient, but not necessary. The second is proved by a supposition thus: Let us suppose Christ assumed a body without a soul; then Christ would not be a true man, and could not pay the debt.

§ 10. 2. Furthermore, a body without a soul is inassumable, like a creature which only has a vestige.

§ 11. Further it is asked concerning this that is said, that He assumed the soul through the spirit: for the soul and the spirit, that is, the inferior and superior part in the soul, are one substance, as Augustine says: therefore one through another is not assumable by God.

§ 12. Solution: It must be said to the first that the soul has something of a medium of reality. For in holding the extremes it has the character of a medium of congruity: but in causing unibility in the other of the extremes, namely in the flesh, as the objection proves, it thus has the character of a medium of reality. And this is drawn from the Letter, where it says that it was not congruous for the Deity to be united to a body formed from the slime of the earth: and this is true, unless according as the body participates in a soul. And thus the solution to the first question is clear.

To that which is asked further, it must be said that the soul, as the Philosopher says, is named from animating [animando], and it animates through powers affixed to organs, and those are the vegetative and sensitive power; and those powers, unless they are conjoined to the rational, are not unible of themselves, namely, to the deity. And therefore, insofar as the rational makes them unible, it is made a medium of the thing for them, but in holding together it is a medium of congruence: because, positing by impossibility that the rational were separated from the sensitive, it would not on this account be necessary for the deity to be separated from the same, just as when the soul was separated from the body, the deity was not on this account separated from the same.

Articulus 11 — How The Union Of God Or Of The Divine Essence Relates To The Other Unions In The Incarnation Of Christ

How does the union of God or of the divine essence relate to the other unions in Christ's incarnation?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, §2.: But that union is inexplicable, etc.

And three things are asked, namely, concerning the mode of the union relative to the natural union of soul with body. Secondly, it is asked, what sort of one is that one? Thirdly, whether that union excludes the reasoning of the Manichean, or not?

Concerning the first, one proceeds thus: § 1. We commonly say that God is united to the flesh. Therefore, let it be asked, what does the word "united" signify? And it seems that it signifies the divine essence, connoting an effect in the creature, by this rule: Every statement made of God from a point in time in comparison to a creature signifies the divine essence while connoting an effect in the creature. Such is the case when we say, "He is united to the flesh or to the man"; therefore, it seems to signify the divine essence.

But on the contrary: Through this word "united," it would not relate to God except as to a cause. Therefore, just as when I say "God is the creator," it is sufficiently expounded when it is said, "that is, God, from whom this creature is," so it would be sufficiently expounded, "God is united to the flesh, that is, God is He from whom this union or flesh is." But this is false, since this union, according to Augustine, makes God man, and man God. Therefore, it is necessary that it state something more. And I ask concerning that "more," whether it is posited in regard to the divine essence or not? If not, then that union does not make God man, which is false, because it makes nothing in regard to that around which it is not posited. But if it is posited in regard to God: either it is posited in regard to God from eternity—and therefore from eternity it made Him man, since that is its effect, as Augustine says—or it is from a point in time, and therefore something began to be in regard to God which was not in regard to Him from eternity, and thus He is variable, as it seems, which is absurd.

§ 2. If perhaps it should be said, as some say, that this union according to reality is posited in regard to human nature, and according to the intellect is posited in regard to God; just as when "creator" is said, the dependency which is the cause of the relation is really posited in regard to the creature, but because a relation of the creature cannot be understood unless its correlative is understood, therefore our reason posits a relation in regard to the creator, which, however, is not according to reality. If, I say, it is said thus. On the contrary: The relative

"father" is one thing, and "son" is another, because the father is the cause of the son. But "similar" posits similarity in both of the similar things, and does not express the dependence of one upon the other more than the reverse. Similarly, "union" expresses a relation which is not signified to be more in one of the united things than in the rest. Hence, it is not similar for "union" and "creator."

§ 3. Besides, Since it belongs to this union to make one, concerning that in regard to which it is not posited according to reality, its effect will not be concerning that. If, therefore, it is not really posited in regard to God... ...its effect will not be in God, and thus really this would not be true: "God is man," which is false.

Further, it is asked whether this union is creator or creature? If creator, then it seems that it was from eternity. If creature, then it is asked, according to what was it in the works of the six days? If it is said that it was in a causal or substantial principle, then the conjunction still seems to be natural, which is false.

Solution. Without prejudice, it must be said that it is one thing when "union" is said, and another thing when "united" is said; just as "creation" is one thing, and "creator" another. For creation expresses a relation insofar as it is a mediating condition between creator and creature, which according to reality holds itself in the creature, and therefore does not signify the divine essence, nor is it the divine essence. Similarly, union expresses a relation which is a mediating condition between God and man, and is not the divine essence, but according to reality is rooted in human nature. But if I say "God is united," the word "united" signifies the condition of God and of the divine essence in the person of the Son to human nature, which is consequently according to reason in God, and not as primarily; which is evident as follows. Union, which is a relation, is a mediating condition between God and man: therefore, it is caused by some mutation or immutation. But here nothing is mutated except the nature of man which is assumed; therefore, the cause of the relation, which is a mutation, is not found except on the part of human nature, and therefore that relation is rooted in human nature. But because man cannot be one with God unless consequently God is one with man, therefore, conversely, the union attains God according to reason in this way, although He is not mutated according to reality, but relates to Himself in one and the same way. And this happens because something is mutated toward Him by this mode of mutation which is union.

Therefore, it must be said to the first that when it is said "God is united," it is understood as a union according to reason attaining God consequently: because although it is from Him, since God makes it, nevertheless it is not signified as from Him, and therefore I well concede that it is not similar for creator and creature.

To the other, it must be said that it was not in God from eternity, because the union of the creature is also a creature. Nor is it signified as really in Him, because the cause of that relation, which is a mutation, is not concerning Him; but rather it is as in Him according to reason consequently, from the fact that something else began to relate to Him according to that relation.

To that which is objected, that it does not make one except in that in regard to which it is posited according to reality, it must be said that it does not make one for the reason that it is equally posited according to reality in both of the united things, but rather consequently it regards the other of the united things, as was said. Namely, because a man cannot be one with the Son of God, unless it is also not only understood, but also is conversely so; yet in such a way that this is caused from the fact that the created thing thus relates itself to the creator, and not that the creator relates Himself in any way (as far as He is of Himself) otherwise than He had from eternity. And according to this mode, the union is ineffable and unintelligible, as John Damascene says.

To that which is further asked, "According to what was it in the works of the six days?", it must be said that, according as it is radically founded in the creature, it was there in the causal principle of matter; which causal principle, however, is nothing else than the principle of obedience, by which it could be made of the creature what the Creator willed by His power, not what can be produced by nature or an Angel, and thus it still remains miraculous.

Articulus 12 — To The Likeness Of Which Unity This Union Or Unity Is Said

To the likeness of what unity is this union or unity said to be?

To the likeness of what unity is this union or unity said to be?

Secondly, it is asked: What sort of one is that one?

For we see that out of matter and form there is made one in nature; similarly, out of accident and subject there is made one; similarly, the three persons are one in one essence. And it is asked, to the likeness of which unity is this one?

§ 1. Now it is clear that it is not to the likeness of the first unity, because those are one by the unity of a form perfecting a potency; but Christ is not one in this way, because He is one by the unity of person and has two natures.

Similarly, it does not seem to be the unity of an accident with a subject, because neither of the natures in Christ is the accident of the other.

§ 2. Again, the more distant the united things are, the less they are one when they are united; because the Philosopher says that for those having a symbol [i.e., a common feature], transmutation into one another is easier. But natures, of which one is created and the other uncreated, are more distant than those of which one is an accident and the other a substance. Therefore, it seems that the union of natures in Christ has less of "one" than the union of subject and accident.

§ 3. Again, when "one" is said of many things, those very "ones" are ordered among themselves; for one from matter and form is more one than one from subject and accident, just as we call an individual one. Since therefore a person also adds a property pertaining to the dignity either of nature (as any individual of a rational nature is a person) or even civil dignity (as we call prelates persons), the "one" of a person seems to be after the "one" from subject and accident; therefore, it is less one. But Christ is one by the unity of person: therefore, He has less of "one" than a one from subject and accident.

Besides, it is asked whether natures are more united in the person of Christ, or the three persons in the one divine nature?

And it seems that it is the former: because the union in the person is so great that it makes God man, and man God; and whatever belongs to this man, belongs to the Son of God, and conversely. But this is not so in divine things: for one person does not become another on account of the union of nature with them; nor does whatever belongs to one person necessarily belong to the others.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Bernard says in Book V of De Consideratione that among all unions, the unity of the Trinity holds the summit. [201]

§ 2. Besides, the more simple something is, the more it is one. But the three persons have the most simple being in the divine nature; therefore, they are maximally one in it.

Solution. It must be said that Christ is one by the unity of an eternal person, and therefore He is more one than any natural one; and therefore His union is similar to none of those ones. And the reason for this is this: because a "one" in nature is according to those things that order toward the end of that which is united and composed. Hence, as many things are required for one man as are required for his perfection according to the end of nature, which is to reason; and therefore it is required to be, to live, to sense, to understand. Similarly, those things are required for the one that is Christ which suffice for the end of redemption. But for that end (as was held above), it is required that He ought, and thus it is required that He be man; it is also required that He can, and as to this it is required that He be perfect God; and therefore Christ is one God and man.

To the other, it must be said that the power of a one is not taken according to the distance of the united things alone, but also according to the power of the one uniting. And therefore, although the created and uncreated natures are more distant than some created natures, yet they are more united on account of the infinite power of the one uniting.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that the unity of person is minimal in those things in which there is a union in a personal property following (according to nature or time) the unity of a supposit from matter and form, and the unity of a subject from subject and accident. But here it is not so; rather, the union is made into an existing person, because into an eternal person; and therefore this is greater than the other unions existing according to nature.

To the last, it must be said that the maximal union is of the three persons in one essence. But after this is the union of three natures, namely, of body, and of soul, and of deity, in one person. Because persons have a simpler being in the divine nature, whereas the natures are composed, and remain substantially diverse in the person.

But to that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it does not impede the simplicity of nature that those things which belong to one person do not belong to another, because this is on account of the opposition of relation, and not on account of a division of nature. But in the person, the natures do not merely remain distinct, but also substantially differing. Yet the union in the person again surpasses the other natural unions of creatures, because in those, diverse things are united into a consequent act which belongs to none of the preceding, nor to any of them. But when natures are united in the person of Christ, the assumed nature is united into the uniting one, not into some third thing consequent upon their union.

Articulus 13 — What Sort Of United Thing Christ Is, Or By What Unity Christ Is Said To Be One

What sort of united thing is Christ, or by what unity is Christ said to be one?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says in the third place, there, at B, § 3: They are therefore not to be heard, etc.

For it seems that the reasoning of the Manichean holds, because: § 1. If some two things are entirely the same in reality, whatever belongs to one according to reality, belongs also to the other. But the Son of God is according to reality entirely the same as the divine nature, and conversely. Therefore, whatever belongs to the Son of God according to reality, also belongs to the divine nature. But if He assumed true flesh, it belongs to the Son of God to be born, to suffer, to be wearied, to hunger, and the like. Therefore, this belongs to the divine nature; and thus it is defiled by human flesh, as it seems.

§ 2. Besides, the example he posits about the rays of the sun does not seem fitting, because they are not united to dung.

§ 3. Besides, we see that even a spiritual substance, which is simpler than the rays of the sun, contracts passibility or compassibility from the body to which it is united, such as the rational soul. Therefore, it seems that it would happen similarly in the union of the divine and human nature.

Solution. It must be said to the first that the divine essence and the person are the same in reality, yet they are not the same in the mode of understanding and attributing. For not to be distinguished is attributed to the essence, but to be distinguished to the person; and to generate and to be generated is attributed to the person, but not to the essence. And therefore, things which are related to another belong to the person, and not to the essence; but to be born, to suffer, and the like, have the force of distinguishing features, as was held above; and therefore these do not belong to the divine essence. And for the theologian, it is a mutation of predicament [i.e., category], because "who" is mutated into "what."

If perhaps it should be said that, according to this, it does not even belong to the divine essence to be incarnated: it must be said, according to the aforesaid, that it does not belong to it primarily, but rather belongs to the person primarily, and to the essence as it is the same as the person. But it is not similar concerning being incarnated, and suffering, and being born, and the like; because to be incarnated expresses nothing but to be associated with flesh, which is to be per se in another, that is, in that which is another in the mode of attributing. But to be born, to suffer, and the like, express acts or passions consequent from the flesh, and therefore they immediately belong to the person by grace of the human nature, and not per se. But since the natures remain distinct in Christ, and their properties too, it follows that these do not belong to the divine nature. The proof of this is as follows: When an essential predicable is predicated of something, by the very fact that it is posited to be of that thing, the opposite of that predicate is removed from the same subject. As when it is said, "Man is an animal," I can by that very fact infer: "therefore he is neither a stone, nor wood, nor the like." Therefore, similarly, when it is said, "Christ is born, suffered," these are predicates that do not belong per se to the Son of God, but rather by grace of the human nature. Since, therefore, the human nature has an opposition and distinction in Christ from the divine nature, by the very fact that they belong by grace of the human, they do not belong by grace of the divine: therefore, neither to the divine. And thus it follows: "Christ suffered: therefore the divine nature did not suffer."

To that which is objected concerning the example, it must be said that the example is fitting. For it is precisely because celestial and inferior bodies do not have a single matter, that one does not act upon the other by immutating it according to species. Therefore, much less do those things of which there is no agreement either in matter or in anything univocal—such as the divine nature relates to all created things. And thus no defilement incurs upon it.

To that which is objected concerning the rational soul, it must be said that it is otherwise. Because, although it does not have matter out of which it is, nevertheless it has matter in which it is, as a mover and form; and therefore it is united to it, and is affected by it. But the deity is not in matter in this way, but rather is associated while remaining distinct, for the perfecting of the union in the person, to whom, on account of the union, these things belong: to be born, to suffer, etc.

Articulus 14 — Whether Christ At The Same Time Formed, Consolidated, And United The Body To Himself

Did Christ simultaneously form, consolidate, and unite a body to Himself?

Next we must come to the third part, in which the Master determines whether He assumed body and soul simultaneously in time? And it begins there, But if it is asked, whether the Word, etc.

Now in this chapter it is determined that Christ simultaneously formed and united a body to Himself: and the Letter is evident in itself.

But a doubt arises concerning this which he says, that He simultaneously formed and united a body to Himself.

§ 1. For the Apostle says that in all things He had to be assimilated to His brothers. Therefore, it seems that in the mode of assuming a body, He ought thus to have first formed it, and afterwards united it.

§ 2. Again, Augustine in Book IV of De Trinitate says: "Not without reason in the building of the Lord's body, in the figure of which He used to say that the temple destroyed by the Jews would be resuscitated by Him in three days, the number six itself is understood to be posited for a year. For they said, Forty-six years was the temple in building, and forty-six times six becomes two hundred and seventy-six, which number of days completes nine months and six days; which are imputed as ten months for childbearing women: not because all arrive at the sixth day after the ninth month, but because the very perfection of the Lord's body is found to be brought to birth in that many days, just as the authority of the Church guards, having received it handed down from the elders. For He is believed to have been conceived on the eighth of the Kalends of April, on which He also suffered." [202] Therefore, it seems that the succession of days in the formation of the body was so great, that the whole was not made once and simultaneously.

§ 3. Again, since in others there is conversion, formation, consolidation, distinction of lineaments, and the ordering of the same in composing the body, how could all these things happen simultaneously with the union? For the union seems to put animation beforehand, but animation presupposes the other things.

Solution. It must be said that all these things were made simultaneously. Hence, by comforting and forming, consolidating and distinguishing the members, and composing the body and animating it, He united it to Himself, and conversely by uniting it He made all those things.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that He was similar to His brothers in all things which were expedient for us, but not in those which imply a defect. For if His body had been formed successively in this way, then it would have been made by the operation of nature, and not by the work of the Holy Spirit. But whatever is made by nature is not elevated above nature, and thus He would not be God. Hence, this was not expedient for us.

To the other it must be said, that the authority of Augustine speaks of the time in which the Lord's body was drawn out to its due quantity, and he does not intend that it had a successive formation like other bodies.

To the last it must be said, that all things were made simultaneously, on account of the infinite power of the Holy Spirit operating, who can do those things simultaneously which nature cannot do even successively.

DISTINCTIO III

Divisio Textus

It is also asked concerning the flesh of Christ, whether before it was conceived, etc. Here begins the third part, which is about the conjunction of the one assuming and the assumed, and it lasts up to the sixth distinction.

It therefore contains three distinctions, according to which it is distinguished into three parts, according as three things are required for conjunction. The first of which is the due disposition in the assumed: and this is treated in this third distinction. Secondly, that there be something operating and conjoining the conjoinables: and this in distinction IV, which begins there, A, But when the incarnation, etc. Thirdly, a union in hypostasis and person is required: and this is treated in the fifth distinction, there, A, Besides it must be inquired, etc.

The first of these parts, which is entirely terminated in this third distinction, is divided into three parts: in the first of which is explained the sanctification of the Blessed Virgin, and the mode of conception, because her sanctification disposed toward the conception. But in the second, because the Blessed Virgin according to her whole flesh was obnoxious to sin in her parents, it is asked whether Christ, or the flesh of Christ, according to the obnoxiousness of sin and the sign of obnoxiousness which is tithing, was in the loins of the Fathers, just as of Abraham, and of others? There, C, But since that flesh, the excellence of which, etc. But because it was said in the first part, that Christ united to Himself the flesh once made, therefore in the third part he objects against it, and solves it, where, E, But to that sentence which we said above, etc.

The first of these is yet subdivided into three: in the first of which he shows that the assumed flesh, before it was assumed, was the flesh of the Virgin, and obnoxious to sin. In the second, he shows the mode of the sanctification and conception of Christ in the glorious Virgin, there, A, § 2: Mary also entirely the Holy Spirit, etc. In the third, he proves that the Blessed Virgin from then on lacked all sin, there, B, But that the sacred Virgin from then on, etc.

The Letter of the first part is evident in itself.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Flesh Of Christ, Before It Was Assumed, Was Liable To Sin

Was the flesh of Christ, before it was assumed, obnoxious to sin?

Was the flesh of Christ, before it was assumed, obnoxious to sin?

But here a doubt arises concerning what he concedes, that the flesh of Christ, before it was assumed, was obnoxious to sin.

202. Augustine, De Trinitate, IV, 5.

§ 1. For before it was assumed, it was in the loins of the Fathers, and it was not there except as the medicine of the wound, as Augustine says. Therefore, it was not obnoxious to sin, because what is obnoxious to sin is not medicine.

§ 2. Again, it is not conceded that Christ was in the loins of the Fathers according to the law of concupiscence. But the law of concupiscence is the cause of the obnoxiousness to sin. Therefore, it ought not to be conceded that it was obnoxious to sin even beforehand.

§ 3. Again, it is not conceded that the flesh of Christ was tithed in the flesh of the Virgin or of the Fathers. Therefore, much less ought it to be conceded that in them it was obnoxious to sin.

Solution. It must be said that the flesh of Christ can be taken in a twofold way. Namely, materially only, according to a potency indisposed to union: and thus it was indistinct from the rest of the flesh of the Virgin in the Virgin, and from the rest of the flesh of the Fathers in the Fathers; and thus it was obnoxious to sin. And this is how the Master understands it.

The flesh of Christ can also be understood insofar as it is of Christ, or with relation to Christ. And thus it was never obnoxious to sin, but always the medicine of the wound, nor was it ever tithed, as will be clear below.

And through this, the solution to the reasons which are brought forward to the proposition is evident. Because they take the flesh of Christ as determined for Christ by the form of Christ, or by faith. And when it was under the form of Christ, it was not obnoxious. But faith, determining it for itself, did not determine it as obnoxious, as it was in the tithes, and by reason of medicine, and the like which faith promulgated concerning the flesh of Christ.

Articulus 2 — Whether Christ Suffered Not Naturally, But Voluntarily

Did Christ suffer not naturally, but voluntarily?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, near the beginning: Penalty only, not by necessity, etc.

For from this it seems to follow that Christ suffered not naturally, but voluntarily, which some also wished to draw from that word of Isaiah, 53:7: He was offered, because He Himself willed it.

But because there will be a proper treatise on this below, it must be said that "penalty" means a penality in a passible body, which Christ indeed assumed at first by will and not by necessity. Because He could have so separated the nature of the body from compassibility, just as He separated it from sin, if He had willed it. But after He first voluntarily assumed this penality, afterwards He had it naturally and by the necessity of nature, or naturally according to existence He suffered inconveniences. Just as one approaching a fire, approaches voluntarily indeed; but after he has approached, he becomes hot from the fire not voluntarily, but naturally.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Blessed Virgin Was Sanctified In The Womb, Or Before The Womb

Was the Blessed Virgin sanctified in the womb, or before the womb?

Mary also entirely the Holy Spirit, etc.

In this chapter four things are said. The first is about the sanctification of the glorious Virgin. The second is about the mode of her conception, there, The power also of generating, etc. The third is, out of what, as it seems, the body of Christ was formed, there, Then overshadowed her the power of the Most High, etc. The fourth is, what she conceived, because it was a true body and soul: and therefore the error of the Manichean is convicted, there, Flesh animated and rational with intellect, etc.

Regarding the first of these, the question arises concerning the sanctification of the Blessed Virgin. And eight things are asked briefly, namely: First, whether she was sanctified in the womb, or before the womb? Second, whether in the womb before animation, or after? Third, whether after animation, or before birth, or after? Fourth, how great was her sanctification in the womb? Fifth, what did the sanctification add from the prevention of the Holy Spirit upon her, and from the indwelling of the Son? Sixth, concerning the teaching on the sanctification of her, and of Jeremiah and John, who were also sanctified in the womb. Seventh, whether the grace of sanctification in the womb confirms the sanctified, and especially whether it confirmed her, such that afterwards she could not sin? Eighth and lastly, in what does the grace of sanctification in the womb differ from the grace of sanctification which is in the sacraments? And, whether those sanctified in the womb are bound to the sacraments?

To the first, one proceeds thus: § 1. The Apostle says that all sinned in Adam, who was the form of the prevarication of all. Since therefore God is more prone to have mercy than to condemn, all in Adam or some could have satisfied, and whatever could be conceded, was conceded to the mother who was full of grace. Therefore, Christ conceded this to her.

§ 2. Again, Anselm: "It was fitting that the Virgin, to whom God prepared a mother for the Son whom, begotten in His heart, He loves as Himself, should shine with that purity than which a greater under God cannot be understood." [203] But to have had original sin and to have lost it, is not the greatest purity which can be understood under God, because a greater is understood in never having had it. Therefore, this was conceded to the mother, to whom whatever can be conceded was conceded. Which is accepted from the word that in 3 Kings 2:20, Solomon said to his mother: Ask, my mother: for it is not right that I turn away your face, namely, for me to deny you anything.

§ 3. Again, the Church sings that Eve was the way of death, and the Blessed Virgin the way of life. Therefore, just as that one was of death, so this one of life. But that one was of death for those existing in the loins; therefore, this one is the way of life existing and for those existing in the loins.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine: "He cannot be well who is not." But to be sanctified is to be well. Therefore, it does not belong to a non-existent thing.

§ 2. Besides, whatever was in the loins as not obnoxious to sin, was the medicine of the wound, as Augustine says. Therefore, if the Virgin had been in the loins as not obnoxious to sin, she would have been the medicine of the wound. But once one efficacious medicine is had, another is superfluous; therefore, the incarnation of Christ would be superfluous.

§ 3. Besides, in the Church there is only head and members. It belongs to the head only to redeem; therefore, it belongs to the members to be redeemed. Since therefore the Blessed Virgin was a member, thus it belongs to her to be redeemed. But Augustine says that it belongs to whoever is to be redeemed to be in the loins of the Fathers as obnoxious to sin; therefore, the Blessed Virgin in the loins of the Fathers could not be sanctified.

Solution: We say that for three reasons the Blessed Virgin, and anyone else, cannot be sanctified in their parents. One of which is that the grace of sanctification does not have its origin from the parents, and therefore cannot be transferred in them; but sin has its origin, and therefore is transferred by the propagation of nature.

And through this, the solution to the first and third is clear.

The second reason: As Augustine says, from lust in propagation, as if a daughter of sin, the cause of sin is born in the flesh: and Augustine says the same. However, this lust is not separable from the concupiscence of the mixing of seeds, and therefore sin is born: and therefore, because the Blessed Virgin was under this law of concupiscence in the loins of the Fathers, because she was to come into the womb of her mother, she did not have in them the possibility for grace.

The third reason is that the flesh is not a participant in the grace that makes one pleasing except through the distinct soul: and therefore in the loins of the Fathers no one was according to the soul susceptible to grace.

To what is objected concerning Anselm, it must be said that that purity is not understood in comparison to before, but to after. For original sin is had in comparison to before, whence it is contracted, and in comparison to after, because it inclines to evil. However, Christ, God and man, did not have it in comparison to before, nor to after: whence under that there is purity which has original sin in comparison to before, because it was contracted: but not to after, because after the law of concupiscence it could not incline to evil.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Flesh Of The Blessed Virgin Was Sanctified Before Animation, Or After

Whether the flesh of the Blessed Virgin was sanctified before animation, or after?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether her flesh was sanctified before animation, or after?

1. For some have presumed to say this, namely, that she indeed contracted original sin in the cause and matter of the body: but because the Holy Spirit and the soul came simultaneously to the body, and the Holy Spirit is more mobile than all mobile things, therefore it preceded the soul in entering the body, and cleansed it so that it could not infect the soul with original guilt.

203. Anselm, De Conceptu Virginali et de Originali Peccato, cap. 18.

2. And they strive to prove this thus: The Blessed Virgin is signified by the ark, and her soul by the golden urn, and her grace by the manna: therefore, since the ark was covered with gold on every side before the urn was placed in it, the flesh was prevented by the purity of the Spirit before the soul came to it.

3. Furthermore, as has been held, her purity is greater than that which can be under God: but this is so that she has it in cause and not in guilt, since the Son, true man and God, has it neither in cause nor in guilt.

4. Furthermore, what would be the cause that God would wait for that sanctification until the body would infect the soul, when He could bestow it before? It is evident that there is none. Since therefore whatever can be conceded, He conceded to the mother, it seems that He granted this.

5. Furthermore, concerning the Antichrist who will be the instrument of the devil, it is read in a certain Gloss on Daniel, that even in the mother the devil procures growth for himself: therefore by the opposite concerning her who is as it were the instrument of God, it seems that God ought to procure the body itself so that it does not infect the soul.

6. Furthermore, it is read concerning Jeremiah: Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you. But formation (as Augustine says) is in the infusion of the soul: therefore He knew Jeremiah before He infused the soul: but it is evident that He speaks of the knowledge of approval through grace; therefore He approved Jeremiah through grace before He animated him: therefore much more strongly the mother.

7. Likewise, Luke 1:15, on that: He will be filled with the Holy Spirit even from the womb, Gloss: The spirit of life was not yet in him, and already the spirit of grace was in him: therefore much more strongly it was so in the mother, and thus she was sanctified before the spirit of life: since therefore the spirit of life is the soul, she was sanctified before animation.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Sanctification in the womb is against the guilt of original sin, and not against the penalty, or concupiscence of it. Proof: Because contraries do not remain with grace: therefore guilt has contrariety to grace: but the flesh is not susceptible to guilt: therefore neither to grace.

1. Likewise, there is order in the parts of man to God, so that the body is under the soul, and the soul under God: therefore in the descent of graces God, by giving grace, is more closely related to the soul than to the body: therefore the effect of grace ought to pass into the body through the soul.

2. Likewise, Dionysius says that the law of divinity is to lead through the first to the middle, and through the middle to the last: therefore since the soul is the middle, the body ought to be led back to the state of grace through the soul.

Solution: We say that the Blessed Virgin was not sanctified before animation: and those who say the opposite, it is a heresy condemned by Blessed Bernard in the letter to the people of Lyons, and by all the Masters of Paris.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Holy Spirit is moved when He transfers Himself into holy souls through motions: not indeed in Himself, but in the gifts of graces: and therefore He first comes into the soul, and through it sanctifies the body. Hence it is false that He would precede the soul into the body through the indwelling grace making one pleasing.

To the other, it must be said that that allegorical exposition is: and it is not similar: because what was in the ark was said materially, and this was ordered otherwise in nature: and grace did not have itself so, because the grace of the body was only from the soul: and it is similar if the gold of the urn were the soul, and the gold of the ark proceeded from the urn: but art could not do this, and therefore it divided the works.

To the other, it must be said that that purity is to be taken according to the soul: because Christ could well take the body without penalty, and yet did not: hence the penalty of the flesh is not impurity: hence pure and impure are referred to the soul: and she had that greater which could be under the Son, as was said before.

To the other, it must be said that there are many causes why God willed her to be animated first: of which one is, that otherwise she would not have been susceptible to graces. The second is, because otherwise she would not have needed liberation as to the soul, and would have performed lesser graces. The third cause was the firmness of the sentence: because He said: You shall die the death. Which is understood of both deaths in propagation. And many others can be assigned.

To the other, it must be said that the devil does not so prepare nourishment for the Antichrist, that he nourishes him with sin, or infuses more sin into him than original: but it is said to nourish, because he inflames the complexion of the mother's blood, so that the flesh generated in the offspring is more inclined to sin than in another. And on the opposite, nothing prohibits, rather it is pious to believe concerning the Blessed Virgin, that her flesh even from the first complexions in the mother, was not so fervid to lust as the flesh of another: yet this cannot be proved otherwise, except because it is pious to believe. But from greater concupiscibility (so to speak) the flesh does not have that it infects the soul more or less with original sin: but rather from this that it is wholly corrupted in the first parent sinning, in whom it wholly was: and therefore also it transfused only one sin: and therefore Augustine says that every man was Adam in nature except Christ.

To the other, it must be said that it is understood of the knowledge of predestination: and therefore it follows also: Before you came forth from the womb, I sanctified you: so that it might also notify the grace of predestination with the grace of sanctification which is given in the womb after the formation of the offspring.

To the other, it must be said that the spirit of life is not called the soul there, but the attraction of the vital spirit from the free womb, that is, before you freely took the vital spirit, you were separated from the mother.

Articulus 5 — Whether After Animation And Before Birth From The Womb She Was Sanctified

Whether she was sanctified after animation and before birth from the womb?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether grace was given to her after animation and before birth?

And it seems that it was not.
1. Augustine: What is not born, but by the grace of the saint cannot be reborn: regeneration of the fig tree: therefore it is not given except to those born.

1. Likewise, in maternal wombs, as Augustine says, you know that infants cannot be reborn, and from this it is concluded as before.

On the contrary, there are authorities above introduced concerning John and Jeremiah.

Solution: It must be said that she was sanctified before birth from the womb: but on what day, or at what hour, no man knows, except by revelation: except that it is more probable that it is conferred soon after animation, rather than long awaited.

To the objections, therefore, it must be said that Augustine speaks of the grace of the sacraments which are conferred by the minister: because in those grace is conferred. Hence, since the operation of the minister is only upon distinct persons, this grace cannot be given except to those distinct outside the womb. Or it must be said that birth is twofold: in the womb when the child is animated, and out of the womb when the child comes forth to the light: and what Augustine says is understood of the first birth if it is taken generally.

Articulus 6 — How Great Was The Sanctification Of The Virgin In The Womb

How great was the sanctification of the Virgin in the womb?

Fourthly, it is asked, How great was her sanctification in the womb?

And it seems that it removed the guilt of original sin and the act which is the fomes, thus:
1. In Jeremiah and John, it removed the guilt: therefore, since it conferred more upon the Blessed Virgin than upon them, in her it ought to have removed both.

1. Likewise, Augustine says that due to the inclination of concupiscence, we cannot now say, "We have no sin": therefore, since she could have said this (as he also says), it seems that she did not have that inclination: and this is the fomes: therefore, she did not have the fomes.

1. Furthermore, there is nothing in what some say, that she had it according to habit, but not according to the act of evil inclination: for a quality that is active by itself always acts, as long as it finds a subject in which to act, like heat, cold, and the like: but the fomes is a quality that inclines to evil by itself: therefore, it will always incline, because it always finds a subject, that is, sensuality and free will.

2. Furthermore, there is nothing in what others say, that the fomes does two things, namely, it inclines to evil, and in this respect it was removed in the Blessed Virgin: and it causes difficulty towards good, and in this respect it remained: because it causes difficulty towards good from the same and not another source that inclines to evil: and consequently, if the inclination to evil were removed, the difficulty towards good would be removed.

3. However, there are others who wished to say that the whole fomes was removed with respect to the person, but remained with respect to nature, that is, that in her there was no habit of the fomes: but if she had conceived, still due to corrupted nature, she would have transmitted original sin to the child. However, this solution is false in two ways. In one way: because it is against the Letter which says here, that the Holy Spirit, preventing in her, purged her from sin and freed her from the fomes: therefore, it found the fomes in her, which it either weakened (as the Master says) or completely removed. In another way: because let us suppose, by impossibility, because it is impossible for the mother of God (as Ambrose says) that after Christ she would have borne a son, it is certain that he would have had original sin: therefore, this operation of the fomes was never removed, which is the matter of another.

Solution: It must be said without prejudice, that the habit of the fomes is considered in two ways: in its vigor, namely inclining as it is in itself to mortal and venial sin: and in habit only, and in disposition only. For there is a habit ready for action, and there is a habit not ready for action due to contrary habits impeding, although they are not in the same proximate subject, yet in the same common subject. And there is a certain disposition remaining after the habit, which is weak and easily purged: yet sometimes it is not quickly purged due to its coherence with the subject: because it infects deeply, although it infects slightly.

Hence we say without prejudice, that the sanctification of the Blessed Virgin removed the power of inclining to venial and mortal sin as it is in itself, the habit of original sin and the guilt: and according to the sayings of the Master here, and of Damascene, it remained in habit and disposition not inclining. However, in Jeremiah and John, it remained inclining to venial sin, but not as it is in itself to mortal sin.

To the word of Augustine, it must be said that she could have said this, because even if she had the habit, it did not incline her to evil, nor did it draw her away from good.

To what is objected against this solution, it must be said that it found a disposed subject, indeed with a contrary disposition, like free will and reason: and that contrary habit represses the act of the fomes so that it cannot manifest in any way.

Regarding other solutions, it seems that it must be said, as the objections proceed: because they do not have the foundation of their saying from the elders.

Articulus 7 — What The Sanctification From The Prevenience Of The Holy Spirit Added In The Blessed Virgin

What did sanctification add from the prevenience of the Holy Spirit in the Blessed Virgin?

Fifthly, it is asked, What did sanctification add from the prevenience of the Holy Spirit in her?

For if it was fitting that she should shine with that purity, which is greater under God, then it seems also that the habit of concupiscence did not remain in her: and it could add nothing, if it is said, that it added with respect to the state of greater purity, not that she was impure before: against this is the Scripture which says, that it diminished concupiscence.

Solution: This is now easy to determine, because it added by extinguishing the habit of concupiscence.

And if it is asked, What does the indwelling of the deity still add?

It must be said, that by removing the disposition: for just as before the habit there is a disposition, so also after the habit there is some disposition frequently remaining: but then it could not remain, because the whole body shone with the light of the indwelling deity in itself: and this is signified, Ezekiel 43:2, where it is said, that the glory of the Lord entered the temple by the way of the eastern gate, and the earth shone with His majesty.

Articulus 8 — How The Sanctification Of The Blessed Mary The Virgin Differs From The Sanctification Of John And Jeremiah

How does the sanctification of the Blessed Virgin Mary differ from the sanctification of John and Jeremiah?

Sixth, it is asked about the difference of her sanctification compared to the sanctification of John and Jeremiah? And, why are these read as sanctified more than others?

And it seems that there is no difference: because

1. Augustine says that to live in the flesh without sin is only of the Redeemer: therefore it seems that the glorious Virgin did not live without sin.
2. Furthermore, Jeremiah and John also sinned. It is evident about Jeremiah, where it is said: "Behold, I have touched your lips." For the touching of the lips (as Gregory wishes) is the purification of sins. Similarly about John, when Christ came to him to be baptized by him, Matthew 3:14, John said: "I ought to be baptized by you," there the Gloss says, that is, to be cleansed from sin: therefore all sanctified were similar in venial sin.

Furthermore, it is asked, why was this grace given to no Patriarchs, but to one Prophet? and to John who is the end of the Law and the Prophets, and to the Blessed Virgin?

1. Furthermore, it seems that Job was sanctified in the womb, and yet he was not a virgin: because it is said: "From my infancy mercy grew with me, and from my mother's womb it came forth with me." Whoever has one virtue, has all: therefore he had all, and thus was sanctified in the womb.
2. Furthermore, Malachi 1:2: "I have loved Jacob": therefore Jacob also seems to be sanctified.
3. Furthermore, it is similarly said of Jeremiah: "Before you came forth from the womb, I sanctified you." Of John: "He will be filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb"; therefore something more should be understood about the mother of the Lord, even if it is not said.
4. Furthermore, Augustine says that all apparitions made to the Fathers were ordered to the one in which Christ appeared in the flesh, and all miracles to the one in which divinity was united to human nature: therefore it seems that all sanctification made in the womb should be ordered to the sanctity in the womb of which it was said: "That which will be born of you is holy," not sanctified. Since therefore Isaiah predicted this most clearly, he also should have been sanctified in the womb.

Solution: It must be said that the Blessed Virgin never sinned: and this is expressly held here in the Text.

To the objection against, it must be said that to live in the flesh without contracted and actual sin is only of the Son of God: but the Blessed Virgin contracted sin first, and afterwards was sanctified.

To the other, it must be said that I well concede that Jeremiah and John sinned venially, but not the glorious Virgin for the honor of the Lord.

To what is further asked, without prejudice I say that this grace is ordered to works of perfection, especially in continence: and since coitus cannot be without lust, it was not fitting to give them this grace: because they were engaged in generation for the promised seed, which was mixed with concupiscence. But what was given to Jeremiah was because he had an order to sanctity in the womb in the most open expression more than all the Prophets: which is thus proved: Among all, Isaiah and Jeremiah prophesied more expressly about the manner of the Lord's nativity, Isaiah 7:14 and following, and Jeremiah 30:22. Isaiah, however, says thus: "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son": where he only expresses the disposition of the mother, namely that she would conceive and bear. But Jeremiah says thus: "The Lord has created a new thing on the earth: A woman shall encompass a man." And before this, in the same place: "How long will you wander, O unfaithful daughter?" But it would not be new if a woman conceived: therefore in this alone is understood what Isaiah had said.

Furthermore, it would not be new for a pure man to be made from one man alone: because this was done when Eve was taken from Adam: therefore in this he wishes the conjunction of humanity with deity. But when he says, "shall encompass," he speaks of the contraction of the infinite to the narrowness of the womb. But when it is said, "a man," it is understood the perfection of him in soul and habits of the soul, which are wisdom and grace. But by what preceded: "How long will you wander, O unfaithful daughter?" he notes the preaching of chastity henceforth in all time, in which daughters do not seek to be dissolved in delightful embraces, but to adhere to God with chaste embraces. John, however, demonstrated this sanctity in the womb by exulting in his mother's womb, and afterwards also pointed it out with a pure finger: and therefore he was more closely ordered and lived more saintly. But above all, she receives sanctity who thus approached sanctity, that from her was taken what was united to God.

To the other, it must be said that Job was not sanctified in the womb: but he touches on the grace freely given to him in the complexion of the body, from which he had that he was more easily inclined to mercy than another man: just as any man is closer to one virtue according to his complexion than another.

To the other, it must be said that it is understood of the love of predestination.

Articulus 10 — Whether This Grace Abounds Or Falls Short Of The Grace That Is In The Sacraments

Whether this grace abounds or is deficient compared to the grace which is in the sacraments?

Eighthly and lastly, it is asked, Whether this grace abounds or is deficient compared to the grace which is in the sacraments?

And it seems that it is deficient: because
1. It does not imprint a character, as baptism does.

1. Likewise, it does not open the gate which baptism opens: therefore it seems that it is deficient.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Baptism does not so weaken the fomes that it does not incite to mortal or venial sin: the grace of sanctification in the womb so weakens it that it does not incite as far as it is of itself: therefore it seems that it abounds.

1. Likewise, abundant and undiminished grace is given to those who are of special privilege and prerogative: but those sanctified in the womb are of special privilege and prerogative: therefore greater grace is given to them.

Further, it is asked, Whether they are bound to receive the sacraments?

And it seems that they are not: because God has supplied in them the place of the sacrament more abundantly: therefore, since the operation of God is greater than that of the minister, it is not necessary to receive the sacraments.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Jeremiah and John were circumcised, therefore they are bound to the reception of the sacraments.

Solution: It must be said that in some, sacramental grace abounds more, and in some, it is deficient compared to the grace or sanctification in the womb. As to those things which are substantial to salvation and grace, such as the order towards good and the removal from evil, the grace of sanctification in the womb abounds more than the sacramental grace: but as to other things, it abounds less, such as the impression of character and the opening of the gate which is done in the sacraments, insofar as in them the Passion operates which pays the price.

As to what is further asked, it must be said that they are bound to receive the sacraments because of the precept: for circumcision was not only given as a remedy, but also as a sign: and therefore because of the work operating it was necessary to receive, and not because of the work operated, unless perhaps the Blessed Virgin and John were baptized for the impression of character.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Glorious Virgin, By Her Generative Power, Did Anything In The Conception Of The Son

Whether the glorious Virgin by her generative power did anything in the conception of the Son?

Whether the glorious Virgin by her generative power did anything in the conception of the Son?

Then a doubt arises concerning the second part of this chapter, where it says, there, A, near the beginning: He also prepared the power of generating without the seed of a man for the Virgin.

Where two things are asked, Whether the Blessed Virgin by her generative power did anything actively in the conception of the Son?

Secondly, What is meant by saying that the Holy Spirit prepared the generative power?

Concerning the FIRST, it proceeds thus: 1. Among all natural Philosophers it is supposed that the informative power is in the seed of the male, and not of the female: and this is proven by the eggs of the wind, from which a chick is not formed due to the lack of informative power. Therefore, since it is the role of the formative power to form and convert into similar and dissimilar members, none of these belong to the power of the mother: therefore neither to the generative power of the Virgin: therefore, concerning the form of the members and body, the generative power of the Virgin did nothing.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher in the book XVI of Animals says that the soul is in the seed, as an artisan in the artifact: it is clear, however, that he does not mean the soul as it is the act of a physical organic body having life in potentiality, because the seed is not such a body: therefore he means the formative power: therefore again it is not from the mother.

2. Likewise, in the same place he says that the power of the seed operates formation, conversion, and animation with a threefold heat joined to it: for by the heat of fire it converts, and by the heat of the sky it forms, and by the heat of the soul it prepares for life: but nothing of this sort is in the mother: therefore she does not operate in these.

3. Likewise, in the book on Vegetables the properties of the male and female are set forth. And the properties of the female are moist and cold: because these are suitable for the sealing of forms and reception, since the moist conveniently receives, and the cold conveniently retains. But the properties of the male are hot and dry, which seal well: because the hot opens for sealing, and the dry penetrates through sharp angles. Therefore, since it is the role of the sealer to form, convert, and the like: this will be of the male, and not of the female: therefore neither did the Blessed Virgin have this for Christ.

4. Likewise, whatever else may be said in the conception of Christ, conversion, formation, vivification, union were done simultaneously: therefore they could not be done by a created power, but by an uncreated one: therefore not by the Blessed Virgin.

5. Likewise, Damascene says that the wisdom of God itself preceded her, as a divine seed: it is clear, however, that it was not seed as to matter, because this would be heresy, since he is the father from whose seed the child is materially formed, and thus Christ would have a father according to temporal generation: therefore it remains that it was seed as to the power of the seed, namely forming, strengthening, converting, shaping, composing, and the like: therefore this was not by the power of the glorious Virgin, as some have said.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. One is not called a mother solely because of the matter: for by this gold would be the mother of a ring: therefore it seems that she did something prior to the matter being received in her.

1. Likewise, some Philosophers say that the child hangs on the womb, having veins to the veins of the womb, and nerves to the nerves of the womb, and arteries to the arteries: so that it may draw sense and motion in the nerves, and nourishment in the veins, and life and vital spirit in the arteries: therefore it seems that the operation of the mother is more than giving matter.

Solution Without prejudice it must be said, that all that is a simple operation towards the form, and towards the species of man, and union, was done by the Holy Spirit: but as to the matter, and the fostering of a suitable place warming with external heat, the generative power of the Blessed Virgin operated, as it happens in other women: hence the first reasons, although indecent for such sanctity, were brought forth because some presumed to say that Christ was formed by the generative power of the Virgin, and wrote and said many other abominable things about this.

To the item that is said on the contrary, it must be objected that not only matter is received in the mother, but also work by way of fostering aiding externally: as the nature of the womb operates, namely cold and dry: and coagulating the form by cold, and retaining the form by dry. And as natural heat operates towards being by fostering, and towards inducing better qualities to the complexion: but these do not operate as an intrinsic nature conversion, formation, and shaping.

To the other it must be said, that this is done only as fostering, which is clear: for sense and motion are not derived from the mother, but from the brain which is formed in the child: and nourishment from the liver, not of the mother, but which is formed in the child: and vital spirit from the heart formed in the child: and therefore such things are fostering, and not operating. Especially is this true in the glorious Virgin, in whom all these things were simultaneously perfected.

However, some say that she did something towards the conception by the consent of faith, when she said: Let it be done to me according to your word: but this is not to be said - because this consent does not operate towards this, but removes the obstacle so that the conception might occur in her. For the obstacle to this was her dissent, and when she consented, the obstacle was removed.

Articulus 12 — What It Is To Give To The Blessed Virgin The Generative Power Of The Word Of God; And Whether This Is From The Holy Spirit

What it is to attribute to the Blessed Virgin the generative power of the Word of God? And, whether this is from the Holy Spirit?

Secondly, it is asked, What it is to attribute to her the generative power of the Word of God?

1. For John of Damascus says:

I say thus: The power of the deity of the Word. For either it is the same to prepare the receptive as preparing at the same time the generative for reception, and to give the generative, or another. If the same, then the Virgin does not seem to be a mother, except because she received through the ministry of matter and womb: and this seems to be little. But if another, then the generative seems to act something in conception.

1. Furthermore, this is well conceded, the Virgin generates the Son: therefore, when it is said "generates," or "generated," it speaks in the manner of action of generation, it seems to have acted in conception.
2. Furthermore, some have said that the Holy Spirit aroused the generative power in the Blessed Virgin, so that it could proceed into the act of generation. But this seems false: because the one arousing the power is the father in generation: but the Holy Spirit is not the father of Christ, even according to human generation, as will be proven below.

3. Furthermore, according to this, the words of Damascus do not seem: which John of Damascus, explaining, says: After consent, etc., the generation of Christ from the Virgin is miraculous: because if a blind man is illuminated, afterwards it is not a miracle itself to see: therefore similarly if the generative power of the Virgin is aroused to act, it will not be a miracle afterwards for her to generate.

Solution: It must be said without prejudice, that to give the generative power is nothing other than to prepare the generative power of the Virgin for the act which is due to the mother according to the nature of the mother: this act, however, as has been held, is not to form, and convert, and shape, except as assisting externally, and to minister the matter in which conversion, and formation, and other such things are done: to minister, I say, the matter, and the convenient place. However, to prepare for receiving, is to sanctify her so that her womb may befit the deity to be received: and therefore it is said, that it gave her the receptive power of the Word of God, and at the same time the generative: because first according to reason it was to receive, and afterwards to generate.

To the other it must be said, that the Virgin most truly begot Christ, as a mother: but the mother does not have the principal act of formation, but rather that which is in generation is in the manner of an efficient cause.

To the other it must be said, that this word that aroused her generative power does not seem to be truly received: but rather it gave it to her, not indeed in itself, because she had it from nature, but so that she might be ready for such an act which befits a mother.

To the other it must be said, that the conception of the son was the miracle of all miracles: and it is not similar to the illuminated blind man: but it would be similar if the blind man saw: for then both the power and the act would be miraculous: just as here the Virgin herself conceived and gave birth.

Articulus 13 — Whether It Was Fitting That The Annunciation Be Made To The Blessed Virgin Concerning The Conception Of The Son

Whether it was fitting that the annunciation be made to the Blessed Virgin concerning the conception of the Son?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, towards the middle: The Angel addressing the virgin said, etc.

And for the sake of this, it is inquired concerning the annunciation made by the Angel to the Blessed Virgin: and five things are inquired: of which the first is, Whether it was fitting that the annunciation be made? Second, Whether it was fitting that it be made by an Angel? Third, Of what order was the announcing Angel? Fourth, concerning the mode of the annunciation. Fifth and last, concerning the end of the annunciation.

Concerning the FIRST, it is objected thus:
1. A Gloss on Matthew 1:20 and following says that the prophecy of predestination is fulfilled without our will, as the Virgin giving birth. Therefore, since, as the Gloss says on Luke 1:26 and following, the annunciation is to obtain the consent of the Virgin's will, it seems the annunciation is superfluous. For on that passage of Luke 1:38: The Angel departed from her, the Gloss says: The Angel seeks heavenly things with the consent of the Virgin.

1. Likewise, Gregory says, Faith does not have merit, but the annunciation was through merit, to which human reason offers experience: persuasion to believe: therefore it was more to nullify the fruit of faith than to aid it. Therefore, since the annunciation was to make faith for the Virgin, it seems that it ought not to have been made. But that the annunciation constructed faith through reason is clear from the words of the Angel: The Holy Spirit will come upon you, etc., and, Nothing will be impossible with God. And from what Elizabeth said: Blessed is she who believed.
2. Furthermore, Without the operation of an intervening Angel, God works grace: therefore, since the incarnation was something greater than the grace given to the Saints, God ought to have perfected this by Himself: but the annunciation is towards the incarnation: therefore God ought to have made it by Himself.
3. Furthermore, Augustine in the fourth book on the Trinity says that the apparitions made to the Fathers were made through Angels and were ordered towards the incarnation of the Son as to an end: therefore, since the end is more worthy than that which is towards the end, and those were made through Angels, the annunciation ought not to have been made through an Angel, but through interior illumination by God.

Solution: It must be said that it was fitting for the annunciation to be made through an Angel to obtain the consent of the Virgin.

To the first objection, it must be said that the prophecy of predestination is not fulfilled without us consenting, but without us acting.

To the second, it must be said that the Angel did not intend to build the virtue of faith in the Virgin through the annunciation, because she was most full of faith: but because she was most humble, not presuming high things of herself; and since it is most high to be the Mother of God, she ought not to have presumed this of herself from her own estimation, unless instructed by the Angel: and therefore the faith which the annunciation constructed is the faith of knowledge and opinion: so that she could think, know, and believe this, that it would be done concerning her. But that it would be done through another, whoever might be chosen for this, she believed would happen. And such faith rightly seeks reason and revelation laudably, and without these, to believe such great things of oneself would be blameworthy.

To the third, it must be said that the incarnation is something greater than grace, but not the annunciation: and therefore, although God made the incarnation by Himself, yet not the annunciation.

To the fourth, it must be said that those apparitions were ordered towards the apparition of the Son in the flesh, but not towards the annunciation: and therefore the objection does not proceed.

Articulus 14 — Whether It Was Fitting That This Annunciation Be Made Through An Angel

Whether it was fitting for this annunciation to be made by an Angel?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it was fitting to be made by an Angel?

And it seems that it was not. For Angels are superior illuminators to those whom they illuminate, as Dionysius says: but no Angel was superior to the Blessed Virgin: therefore no one ought to have illuminated her. But the annunciation was an illumination concerning the conception of Christ: therefore no Angel ought to have announced this to her. But that the Blessed Virgin was superior, Jerome says in a sermon, that she was exalted above all the choirs of Angels to the heavenly kingdoms.

1. Likewise, God was nearer by grace to the heart of the Blessed Virgin than an Angel: therefore it was more fitting for the illumination to pass through her to the Angel, than conversely.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Dionysius says that the whole dispensation of the incarnation of Christ was announced by Angels. They announced, they made the Magi cautious, they preached to the shepherds: therefore it was fitting to be made by an Angel.

1. Likewise, to the Ecclesiastical hierarchy according to order descend illuminations from the celestial hierarchy: but the Blessed Virgin was of the Ecclesiastical hierarchy: therefore illuminations ought to have descended to her from the Angels.

Solution: It must be said that, as the last reasons prove, it was fitting for the annunciation to be made by an Angel.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Blessed Virgin was more excellent by the merit of life, but she was inferior as to state: and the descent of illuminations is chiefly according to the state of sacred order and hierarchies.

To the other, it must be said that God was nearer to the heart of the Virgin by indwelling grace, but not by the mode of contemplation: for Angels saw face to face, but the Blessed Virgin in a mirror and in an enigma: and therefore according to the order of revelation the Angel was nearer: and therefore the illumination descended from him to the Virgin.

Articulus 15 — Of Which Order Was The Angel Who Announced The Incarnation Of Christ

Of which order was the Angel announcing the incarnation of Christ?

Thirdly, it is asked, Of which order was the Angel announcing?

It seems that he was from the higher orders. 1. For Gregory says: Therefore it was fitting that the highest Angel be sent, who announced the highest of all: not only was he from the higher order, but also the highest in it.

1. Likewise, on that of Isaiah, "Who is this that comes from Edom?" the Gloss of Jerome says that it is the voice of the lower Angels ignorant of the mystery of Christ's incarnation: but the announcer was not ignorant: therefore he was not from the lower orders.
2. And this also seems to be suggested by the name of the Angel: because Gabriel is interpreted as the strength of God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Dionysius and Gregory say that the higher ranks do not have the use of external office: therefore none from the higher orders was sent. If it is perhaps said that this has an instance, Isaiah 6:6: "One of the Seraphim flew to me, having a coal in his hand, which he had taken with tongs from the altar." On the contrary: Dionysius says that he was not one of the higher ones, but delegated by a superior, and named from his office, which is to go forth.

If, however, it is said, as some say, that the mystery of the incarnation was beyond the order of nature, and therefore ought to be announced beyond the law of order. This is nothing: because the incarnation, although it is beyond the order of nature, is not beyond the order of grace, and the orders of Angels are distinguished according to the gifts of graces.

1. Furthermore, whatever has an office, the highest in that office is of the same: it is the office of Archangels to announce secrets: therefore the highest in that office: but the highest is the incarnation of Christ: therefore this ought to be announced by an Archangel.

Solution Without prejudice, it must be said that that Angel was from the order of Archangels, as the Church sings, saying:

We know Gabriel the Archangel to be divinely inspired: and so the Saints say.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Gregory understands not of the highest simply, but of the highest order of Archangels. Hence he says these words: Angels. And it follows: for the messengers, Archangels are called the highest messengers. For as above, the highest messenger, etc., was introduced.

To the other, it must be said that the Angels, as Augustine says, knew the mystery of the incarnation: but the depth of the divine counsel concerning the incarnation they did not fully know: and therefore they wished to be instructed about this: nor do they ask, Who is this, from the fact that they are ignorant of the person: which is evident: because they are not answered about the person, but about the time: "I, who speak justice," he says. Hence they wished to learn the height of the counsel concerning this. And this solution agrees with the words of Augustine and Dionysius.

To the other, it must be said that the Angel was named from his office: because, namely, he announced the strong one, who had come to overthrow the powers of the air, as Gregory says.

Articulus 18 — What Is Understood By "The Most High" When It Is Said "The Power Of The Most High"

ARTICULUS XVHI.

What is understood by the Most High, when it is said, the power of the Most High?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, towards the middle: Why does it call him the Most High, and what is it for the Holy Spirit to overshadow?

And to this it must be said, that according to Cassian in the book against Nestorius and Eutyches, by the Most High is understood the Father, and by appropriation in the Father is authority: but by wisdom and power is understood the Son, and the Holy Spirit is expressed by his own proper name: so that thus the three great craftsmen of the world are understood in the indivisible work of incarnation to have also repaired the world in the making of the virginal womb.

For another reason also it says, Most High, because he made the most high: for he elevated the lowly to the high, by uniting our nature to the Word, and joined the high to the lowly. But wisdom appeared in the manner of conjunction, so that the natures are distinct and united hypostatically: but power in the conjunction of such distant things, as deity and humanity. But a shadow cools, unites vision, and shades or darkens. To cool is fitting to the sanctification of the Virgin, and to the extinction of concupiscence, to unite vision to the contemplation of the incarnate Word: but to be darkened to the Word which emptied itself taking the form of a servant.

But Damascene says to be born from it not sanctified: because it was never not holy.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Flesh Of Christ Was From The Purest Blood

Whether the flesh of Christ was from the purest blood?

Then, it is asked concerning what is said there, A, towards the middle, that He united to Himself from the most holy and purest blood, etc.

For from this it seems that, as to matter, Christ is from blood.

ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Augustine says below, that [He is] from flesh.

1. Furthermore, flesh is nearer to flesh than flesh to blood, or conversely; but the union of those having a symbol is easier: therefore it was more fitting to assume from flesh than from blood. But if this is said, then it was also necessary to take bones from bones, nerves from nerves, and so on with others.

Solution: It must be said that He took from the purest blood: because blood is potentially the whole body, but not flesh.

To the first of Augustine, it must be said that he understands flesh for that which is the matter of flesh: and this is blood.

To the other, it must be said that flesh is nearer to flesh in the form of the species: but not in the way of generation: because flesh is not made from flesh unless it is corrupted in food, and through digestion is converted into blood, and then finally flesh is generated from it. However, from blood, flesh is immediately made through the conversion and formation of generative power, or even nutritive in some.

Articulus 20 — What Is Meant By 'The Ancient Conspersio'

What is said, Ancient sprinkling 2

What is said, Ancient sprinkling 2

Then, it is asked concerning what is said there, A, towards the end: Of the ancient sprinkling, etc.

For this does not seem true: because ancient sprinkling is ancient from the infection of vice, as the Apostle suggests, 1 Corinthians 5:7, where he says: Purge out the old leaven, that you may be a new sprinkling.

Response. It must be said that it is called ancient on account of the wrinkles of punishments, and not of guilt: because guilt does not receive from our antiquity, but punishment, as the Master will say below.

Articulus 21 — How What Is Said Is Understood, 'Not Sowing, But Creating Through The Holy Spirit'

How is it understood what is said, Not sowing, but creating through the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked about this which he says, there, A, towards the end: Not sowing, but creating through the Holy Spirit, etc.

For since to create is to make something from nothing, it does not seem to befit Christ, who was made not from nothing, but from some material, because from the blood of the glorious Virgin.

Solution: It must be said that to create implies two things, namely that it is the immediate work of God, and therefore it says creating: but it does not have the other, and therefore another Letter in the original has. But through the Holy Spirit conditionally.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Blessed Virgin Had The Power Of Generating The Son

Whether the Blessed Virgin had the power of generating the Son?

Then, it is asked concerning the word of the Master which says, there, A, towards the end: To whom was conferred the power of generating in a new manner, etc.

For from this it seems to be understood that the Virgin did not generate Christ actively in any way: because it is explained thus, that without the intercourse of man, without the lust of the conceiving one, the conception of God and man was celebrated in the womb of the Virgin.

And to this it must be said, as was said above, that she acted only by disposing, and assisting externally, and ministering the material for the substance of the members and for the growth. But the power converting, forming, and shaping, and composing the members, and uniting the soul with the deity, was entirely in the work of the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Glorious Virgin Could Sin

Whether the glorious Virgin could sin?

ARTICULUS XXIV,
Whether the glorious Virgin could sin?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said,
there, B, around the beginning, For from this we know, that more grace was bestowed upon her, etc.

For if she conquered sin in every respect, then it seems that she also conquered in respect of the power to sin, and thus could not sin.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY
There are four states of free will, as is held in the book II of the Sentences: To be able to sin and not to sin, which is the state of innocence: and not to be able not to sin mortally, which is the state of condemned man: not to be able not to sin venially, which is the state of redeemed man: not to be able to sin, which is the state of the glorified: therefore it seems that the Blessed Virgin then was in the state of the glorified, and beyond the state of innocence by itself, which is false.

Solution It must be said, that there is a power from an inclining habit, and there is a power from the freedom of choice: and the Blessed Virgin had conquered the power from an inclining habit to sin, but she had it from the freedom of choice.

But on the contrary, it is objected, that according to this she had the state of Adam before he sinned.

Solution It must be said, In this respect she had that she did not have an inclination to evil from the part of the body, but as to mortality and internal troubles she did not have: for in her death was not joined to the ability not to sin, as it was in Adam.

Articulus 25 — How 'We Have No Sin' Ought To Be Understood

How should it be understood, "We do not have sin"?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, B, around the middle: If all the saints and holy ones were to convene, etc.

For infants recently baptized do not seem to have sin. Similarly, let us suppose someone with contrition for all venial and mortal sins has confessed, according to the faith of the Church, he does not have sin.

Solution: If it is generally understood even of infants, then I think it should be glossed, "we do not have sin," that is, the fomes and cause of sin, in the manner the Apostle takes sin in the Epistle to the Romans 7:16-17: "If then I do what I do not want, I consent to the law, that it is good. Now then it is no longer I who do it, but sin that dwells in me." But if it is understood of adults, then it scarcely happens to be without sin: because some things adhere so greatly, that a man scarcely confesses without the intention of dismissing all even venial sins.

C. Why was Christ not tithed in Abraham, as Levi was, since the flesh which he took in him was subject to sin?

However, since that flesh, whose singular excellence cannot be explained in words, before it was united to the Word, was subject to sin in Mary and in others from whom it was transmitted by propagation: it can not undeservedly seem to have been subject to sin in Abraham, whose entire flesh is subject to sin.

Hence it is usually asked, Why is Levi said to be tithed in Abraham and not Christ, since both were in the loins of Abraham according to the material reason, when Abraham was tithed, and gave tithes to Melchizedek? For then the Apostle says Levi was tithed in Abraham, as in the material cause: because by that tithing, just as Abraham is shown to be lesser than Melchizedek, to whom he personally paid tithes, so also the Levitical order, which was in Abraham according to the seminal reason, and descended from him through the concupiscence of the flesh. But Christ was not tithed: because although he was there according to the flesh, he did not descend from there according to the common law, namely through the lust of the flesh: just as in Adam all sinned, but not Christ.

Hence Augustine on Genesis: Just as in Adam sinning, those who were in his loins sinned: so in Abraham giving tithes, those who were in his loins were tithed. But this does not follow in Christ, although he was in the loins of Adam and Abraham: because he did not descend from there according to the concupiscence of the flesh. Therefore, since Levi and Christ were according to the flesh in the loins of Abraham, when he was tithed, they were not equally tithed, because in some manner Christ was not there as Levi was there. For according to that seminal reason Levi was there, by which reason he was to come into the mother through intercourse: according to which reason the flesh of Christ was not there, although according to it the flesh of Mary was there. Therefore, he was tithed in Abraham, who was thus in the loins of Abraham as he was in the loins of his father, that is, who was thus born of father Abraham, as he was born of his father, namely through the law of the flesh, and invisible concupiscence.

It follows concerning the second part of the distinction, in which it is asked, Whether Christ was tithed? And it arises from the preceding in which it is asked, Whether the flesh of Christ was subject to sin? because he who has flesh subject to sin, he was tithed in the Fathers: but this part begins there,

Expositio Textus

Having established these things, we must come to the Letter of this part, and take that which it says, there, C, "Because by that tithing thus and by what inferiority? so Abraham is shown to be inferior to Melchizedek," etc.:

And it is said, that the imperfection of blessing and of neediness, which imperfection he signified by the offering of the tithe and the retention of the nine: for when Melchizedek received the tenth, the denarius did not remain with Abraham: and therefore the reading was with Melchizedek and not with Abraham, which he signified by removing the tithe: and therefore by the priesthood of Melchizedek, and not of the sons of Abraham, the perfection of blessing and redemption was signified. But when Melchizedek exhibited the type of the priesthood of Christ in the offering of bread and wine, the priesthood of Christ is perfect and liberating: and Abraham's is imperfect and needing a liberator.

Then take that before the end of the chapter: "According to the seminal reason," etc., is the reason by which posterity is sown: and that reason is the force of concupiscence, and the commingling of the sexes, as is evident in all.

After these things take that, at the end of the chapter:

"Invisible concupiscence." This concupiscence is called invisible, because in the properties of the visible body sown it does not appear, but through the reason of the flesh it almost appears against the spirit.

Articulus 26 — Whether Christ Was In The Limbo Of Adam Or Of Abraham According To A Different Mode From Others

Whether Christ was in the loins of Adam or Abraham in a different mode from others?

Here three difficult questions arise. The first is, Whether Christ was in the loins of Adam or Abraham in a different mode from other men? The second, What it means to be tithed in the loins of Abraham, or not to be tithed? The third is, What it means to sin in Adam, or not to sin?

Concerning the first, the procedure is as follows:

1. Augustine says in Book VIII on Genesis, that we were all in Adam through corporeal substance. Therefore, either corporeal substance is understood as that which is according to the form and matter of our body, or corporeal substance, which is the matter of our body. It is clear that it is not in the first way: because thus our organized bodies would have been there, which cannot be. But if corporeal substance is the matter of our body. On the contrary: That matter was something designated in Adam, or the matter of another: therefore, the matter of all bodies made and to be made was there by some designation, which is very unreasonable: because if it had been as a great mountain, it could not be divided into so many: especially if the world were infinite, it would always be possible for men to be propagated from men. Yet there are and were before us those who said this, like the Master who wrote this book, and he solves the objection made, that indeed something of all was in him: and this was multiplied by the operation of the Lord into as many as would be born, just as the matter of five loaves was multiplied into so many thousands of men who are said to have been satisfied from it.

But against this is that the work of nature would be entirely miraculous, and men would not be naturally generated from men.

1. Furthermore, the same reasoning applies to horses, donkeys, and other animals, how they were derived from the first ones created in the works of the six days.

2. Furthermore, this is reduced to an impossibility thus: God multiplies what is taken from Adam: either therefore by adding something from the elements of the world to that matter: or by newly creating matter and adding it to it. If He adds something from the elements of the world: then not everything was in Adam, as they say: because their opinion is that nothing is converted into the truth of human nature which is taken from the first parents. If in the second way, the same question arises. But if it is said that He multiplies that matter in itself, neither by creating something to be added, nor by converting something else into it: this is not intelligible: because the Saints say that He multiplied the five loaves, just as He multiplies crops from one grain. But this multiplication is done by converting other grains into crops: hence then it is not similar to what they add: because He multiplied the loaves by converting foreign matter into them.

For this reason, others found a more subtle imagination, and said that matter is divisible into infinity by the act of nature: and thus that everyone has something from the first. But against: Either matter as it is substance existing only in potentiality is divisible: or quantified matter. If in the first way, this is not understood by the intellect, that something is actually divided by the division of matter and not of form, which has no quantity: and this is against the Philosopher in Physics I, saying that if there is only one thing that is substance, that it is indivisible, because it is not divided by the division of matter except quantitatively. However, by the division of form, something can be added that is not quantitative, like being, and substance, and other such genera which are divided by their differences: but such a division does not have a place here. But if they say quantified matter is, On the contrary: The Philosopher in On the Soul II says that the nature of all things that stand is the limit and reason of magnitude and increase: but this limit and reason is taken from two things: from the quantity of radical moisture, which is the first matter of generation, and from the vigor of formative power, and information, as Galen suggests, who says that the defect of some members is caused by the defect of matter, but of others by the defect of power: therefore that matter is proportionate to such a body in such a quantity, which if it is less, it will not be as much: therefore if it is divided, I do not say now, into infinity, but even to a small extent, as into two, the whole quantity of the human body will not be generated from it: and thus there is nothing of what they say about division into infinity.

If perhaps it is said that this is true: and therefore now men are born of lesser quantity than anciently: because the divided matter has become less.

Against:
1. According to this, the son should continually be lesser than the father by as much quantity as the matter is divided into the number of sons and daughters. And since someone is read to have had thirty sons, and more daughters, he should have been greater by thirty parts than any of those sons, which is ridiculous.

1. Furthermore, we often see a son generated greater than the father.
2. Furthermore, the succession of men has lasted so long that it is a wonder that we are not now atom-sized.
3. Furthermore, perhaps this opinion is refuted by another reason, namely that what was divided from Adam, either was entirely formed into the body of Seth, or not entirely, but a part was reserved in Seth so that the son of Seth would be born from it. If in the first way, since that which has the human form in one is not susceptible to the human form in another, nor will it rise with it, as Augustine says, it cannot be made into the body of another by succession: for it is very contrary to reason that a thing is in potentiality to a form which it already has. But if it is said that it does not oppose what Augustine said about the resurrection: because it has a nobler being in the second than in the first. On the contrary! In the first it is like a radical member of man, and not like a nutritive one: because it was given that it is entirely formed into the body of a man: therefore in the first it has a nobler being. If for this reason another part is given, that not all is formed into the body, but a part is reserved, then it follows that either it is divided into parts numbering the whole, like halves, thirds, fourths, fifths, or into numbering parts, each of which is smaller than the preceding divided. If in the first way, then the propagation of the human race will necessarily stand, with as many born as the seed is divided into parts. If in the second way, then the latter is always smaller than its father by some quantity, and this is not true, because sight frequently proves the contrary.

4. Furthermore, all philosophers commonly say that generation is from the superfluity of nourishment, to which formative power is conferred through the organs of generation; therefore it is not in this way as they say.

5. Also, Aristotle in Book XVI of Animals says that the seed of generation is likened to a son going out from the house of the father: because just as he carries a part of substance with him, and multiplies it through negotiations and profits: so the seed carries with it a part of the radical moisture in which the organs are formed, and multiplies it through the part of the mother.

Solution Without prejudice, we say that we were not in Adam by any designation: but we say that there is a twofold matter of the human race, namely designated in the form of a man, or in the form of a part of a man: as there is the matter of Peter, or the foot of Peter: and there is original matter. But original matter is that which was cut off from the body of Adam, that is, from what was potentially the body of Adam, for this was the superfluity of nourishment - cut off, I say, by the act of generative power, and it received formative power in a place determined by the soul of Adam, so that from it the body of a son would be formed, and it would be entirely converted into it. Nor is it called superfluous, which is not assigned for the sustenance of individual substance by the act of nutritive power; but from what is superfluous to it, it ministered to the generative for the sustenance and multiplication of the species. But the same is not converted into the body of the son of Seth, nor a part of it, as has been proven, but rather it receives the moisture of nourishment in the body of Seth: and again the superfluity of that moisture is sent to the generative, so that it receives formative power from that which originated from Adam: and thus succession is made through all. And this I call the matter which is originally converted to one man Adam: thus we were all in Adam. And this Augustine suggests when he says that if a man is fed with the flesh of another man, and generates, that flesh will rise in that in which it was from the radical moisture, not in that in which it was only nourishment.

Hence it seems to me that the superior opinions are either false, or cannot be understood how they are true. And I concede the reasons brought against them.

And concerning this I say that when it is said, Christ was in the loins of Adam, it was through matter in this original way, but not like other men. For the corporeal in which formation was made was thus originally there: but the forming power did not originate from there, but rather from the Holy Spirit, as was said above. And therefore when it is said, Christ was in the loins of Abraham like others, I think it should not be conceded: but when it is said, Christ was in the loins of Abraham or Adam through that by which others were, it should be conceded: because one says the substance of matter or origin, the other says the mode of propagation or generation.

Articulus 27 — What It Is To Be Tithed In The Loins Of Abraham

What is it to be tithed in the loins of Abraham?

Secondly it is asked, What is it to be tithed in the loins of Abraham?

§ 1. For either to be tithed is to give tithes, or to be obligated to tithes, or to prefigure the sign of the tithing of those who were to be in the future. If it is to give tithes: then those who were to be in the future, then gave tithes: and with the tithes given, he who gave is freed from the obligation to give: therefore afterward he was not bound to give tithes, which is false.

§ 2. Moreover, it seems that a thing existing in the material potency of its origin cannot be tithed in this way: because someone tithes his wheat, and from the tithed wheat he sows, and the fruit which grew, he is again bound to tithe, even though it was in the tithed seeds according to the matter of origin: therefore by a similar reasoning, although Abraham gave tithes, yet he could not tithe his sons in himself.

§ 3. But if it is said that to be tithed is to be obligated to tithes. On the contrary: The Levites are not obligated to tithes: rather they received tithes from the people according to the law: and so they were more tithed, if this were to be tithed, in Melchizedek who received tithes, than in Abraham who gave. But if this is to prefigure the sign of the tithing of others. On the contrary: They were then only according to the matter of origin: but Christ was there in entirely the same way: therefore Christ was tithed, just as they were.

§ 4. Moreover, it seems to apply more to Christ than to others: because he himself is signified by the tithe, as Augustine and the Master say ; therefore he seems more to be tithed.

§ 5. Moreover, after the victory Abraham offered tithes to Melchizedek: so Christ after the triumph offered the price of redemption to the Father: therefore it is more fitting for Christ to be tithed in such a sign, than for others.

Further it is asked, What is this that Augustine says as the reason why Christ was not tithed in the loins of Abraham: namely because he was there otherwise than the others? For this seems to be false: for the law of concupiscence is not in anyone unless when he exists: but then his descendants did not exist: therefore they were not there then by the law of concupiscence: therefore by corporeal substance only: and thus Christ was there: therefore the others were there just as Christ.

Solution. It must be said that to be tithed is different from to tithe. For to tithe is the same as to give tithes: and this is done for two causes, one of which is moral: and as regards that, tithes have remained in the new law, namely so that there may be food in the house of God, as Malachi says , namely so that the ministers serving in the temple may have whence they may be sustained. The other cause is so that an offering of perfection may be shown to be made for oneself before God: for he who gives a tenth, offers the tenth which occurs to the number and to his superior, and retains nine for himself. Now the number ten (denarius) is the first boundary, and signifies perfection: whence it signifies the price of our redemption which is removed from us, as the price from the redeemed: because on our part we could not have this price. But the retention of the nine, which number signifies imperfection, through the fact that it falls short and is lacking from the number ten, signifies our imperfection: and thus the offering of the tenth is to signify that one is imperfect and in need of redemption. But the tenth which he offers from himself signifies the price of that redemption. And thus Master Hugh of St. Victor expounds it. Now, to be tithed is to signify this need for liberation.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that the Apostle in Hebrews 7:4 et seq., from whence all this is drawn, intends to prove that Christ's priesthood excels the Levitical priesthood, in this that Christ's priesthood is signified by the priesthood of Melchizedek, who as greater received tithes from Abraham, in whom the ministers of the priesthood of the old law were signified to be in need of redemption, and this is signified by the tithes offered by Abraham to Melchizedek himself, of which redemption Christ had no need: rather his flesh is signified by the tenth which Melchizedek received, so that he might bless Abraham: just as the Father received the immolation of Christ's body, so that he might bless the human race. And thus it is clear why Christ was not tithed in the loins of Abraham, namely signified as needing liberation. But others were tithed in his loins, who by the retained nine were signified to need liberation, which is signified by the priesthood of Melchizedek and the blessing. Therefore let it be said to the first, that to have been tithed is to signify the need for liberation by the nine retained in the offering of the tenth part to him who blesses and redeems: and to this tithing it is clear, that all who are signified by the nine, are obligated through Abraham.

§ To that which is objected, that a thing existing in potency cannot be tithed, it must be resolved that it cannot be tithed by a number actually casting out a tenth: because it is not in act, but in potency: but it can be tithed, that is, determined to tithing: and obligated in this way in which it is. And as to what is objected concerning the grain, it must be said that this grain is twofold, namely as being in act, and thus it is tithed: and as another being in potency in it, and thus what is in it, is not tithed, and ought to be tithed when it comes forth from it.

§ To the next it must be said that the Levites received tithes, as they are for the sustenance of the ministers, but not as tithing signifies the need of liberation: because thus they were tithed, and did not receive tithes.

§ To the next it must be said that to be in the loins is attributed to all as regards the matter of origin: but that matter has a twofold relation, namely to the origin, and to the originated. To the origin again it has a twofold relation: one according to corporeal substance, another according to the law by which it is severed and transferred into another. But to the originated it again has a twofold relation, namely as being a possible substance in him, and according to the mode by which it is to be taken for constituting the originated itself.

§ If however matter is taken here in respect to the origin only materially: but to the originated as being only its matter. It must be said that Christ was in this way in the loins, as others: and this Augustine calls being in the loins according to corporeal substance: for the reason that in both respects, namely to the origin and to the originated, it is not considered except materially according as matter is a corporeal substance in which the form of the body is made. If however it is taken in the two secondary respects, namely according to the law of concupiscence by which it is transferred from the origin, and according to the commingling of sexes how it is taken in the conceived, Christ was not there just as others. And this Augustine intimates, when he says that those were tithed in the loins of Abraham, who were in his loins in such a way, just as Abraham himself was in the loins of his father: and who were to be in the mother through sexual union.

§ If however it is still objected, that Christ's flesh before it was under Christ's form, was entirely the Virgin's flesh: and that whole was there according to both respects: therefore also Christ's flesh. Just as it was determined above, it must be said that it is not true: because the Virgin's flesh is of another formal character (rationis) than Christ's flesh. For flesh is called Christ's in two ways, namely that which is actually Christ's flesh, and that was never as Christ's in another than in himself. In another way it is called Christ's flesh, which through faith from our mass was determined to be assumed by Christ: and that was descending in all, and always indeed through the act of sexual union according to substance: but as faith conjoins it with respect to Christ, thus it was impassible to the law of concupiscence: and this is to take the flesh of Christ according to formal character: because in this formal character by which it was to be Christ's, it never was subjected to the law of concupiscence, just as we said above.

§ To the next it must be said that in the offered tenth Christ is signified: but the offered thing itself is not tithed thus, just as we said above: but rather his very act who retains nine, obligates to tithing through the fact that he professes himself to need to be redeemed by such a tenth.

§ To the next it must be said, as is clear from the aforesaid, that that flesh as determined for Christ through faith was not except through corporeal substance in the loins of the fathers: but others in two ways.

Articulus 28 — What It Is To Sin In Adam, Or Not To Sin

What is it to sin in Adam, or not to sin?

Thirdly it is asked, What is it to sin in Adam, or not to sin?

§ 1. For to sin is to act: but nothing acts except what is in act: we were not in act in Adam: therefore we did not sin in Adam, as it seems.

§ 2. If you say, that this is to be obligated to sin in a material principle. On the contrary: Christ was there according to a material principle: and yet he did not sin in Adam.

§ 3. If you say: This is to contract guilt from the vice of that matter. Against this is what Anselm says, that sin or vice is no more in the seed, than in spittle: therefore it is not contracted from seminal origin.

§ 4. Moreover, it seems the greatest injustice, that sons beyond the third and fourth generation, and up to infinite generations are punished for the sins of the parents.

Solution. It must be noted beforehand, that a treatise concerning original sin and its infliction is had in the II book of the Sentences. But passing by briefly here I say, that to sin in Adam is to contract the guilt of original sin through the mode of the reception of matter from Adam: and in this way Christ did not sin in Adam: rather as the medicine of the wound he was in him. For although the whole flesh of Adam was corrupted by the corruption of passibility and vice, yet not according as it is determined by faith to Christ: because thus tithed it has in itself a part of itself which is the medicine of the wound, as Augustine says, and this is easily clear through what was said before.

§ To the first therefore it must be said that we all sinned in Adam, as in a vitiated origin, who were so in him that neither the reception of our flesh from his propagation is repugnant to corporeal substance, nor to the law of concupiscence. But Christ was not there thus. And thus to sin is to sin in a certain respect, that is, according to the origin of nature: and in this way also we were in him, who have been propagated from him.

§ To the next the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ To the next it must be said that vice is spoken of in two ways, namely for the habit of vice, and for the cause of vice. In the first way it is not in the seed: but in the second way it is in the seed: because from its foulness which in it is a punishment, foulness is caused in the soul which is a fault and a punishment, and the rationale of this, the Lord granting, is explained in the second book of the Sentences.

D. For what reason the flesh of Christ is said in Scripture not to have been sinful, but similar: by which it is opened, why it was not obligated to sin in Christ.

Wherefore Christ is rightly said to have assumed the first fruits of our mass: because he did not take the flesh of sin, but the likeness of the flesh of sin. For God sent His Son, as the Apostle says, in the likeness of the flesh of sin . For the Word assumed flesh similar to sinful flesh in punishment, and not in fault, and therefore not sinful flesh. But all the rest of the flesh of men is flesh of sin. His alone is not flesh of sin: because a mother did not conceive him by concupiscence, but by grace: yet it has the likeness of the flesh of sin through passibility and mortality, because he hungered, thirsted, and things of this kind. Although therefore his flesh is the same as ours, yet it was not so made in the womb as ours. For it was sanctified in the womb, and born without sin, and neither did he himself ever sin in it. In punishment therefore it is similar to ours, not in the quality of sin: because the pollution which is conceived from the motion of concupiscence, it entirely did not have, nor was it born from carnal delight. Therefore he came to an immaculate body, which was conceived apart from the concupiscence of lust: nor did it have in itself the vice, which in others is the cause of sin, nor did he sin in it. And therefore it is truly said that the flesh of the Word was not in Christ obligated to sin.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text.

Wherefore the first fruits of our mass, etc. This is the second part, and it is a certain conclusion which follows from the preceding.

And note, that first fruits are spoken of in two ways, namely that which on account of greater vigor of nature more quickly reaches maturity, this is called first fruits: and this was offered to the Lord according to the law. First fruits are also called the first in nobility. And in both ways the flesh of Christ is called first fruits: because that first attaining purity, led all to the maturity of purity: and because it was most worthy on account of the union of the deity.

Then take that: A mother did not conceive him by concupiscence, but by grace, etc., because it is in the act of a concupiscent mother. Or more truly, this is what always fornicates with the demon, so as to establish sinful sons from adultery. But the grace of Christ is spoken of which is the grace of union, not of habit, as in us: but she conceived man as God in hypostasis. But I do not say this for the reason that Christ did not have the grace of habit, but he had it in the virtues and gifts: but the grace of union was not habitual, as some erring men have said, because according to this he would not be a son except by the reception of that grace; but the grace of union is given to be naturally the Son of God in one person of both natures.

All the other things of that part are clear through the disputation.

Divisio Textus

But to that sentence which we said above, etc. This is the third and last part of this distinction, and it has three parts: in the first of which he posits an objection against the things determined above, which is clear in the Text. In the second, he posits the solution, there, § 2: But another reason of that saying existed, etc.: and that also is clear through the things said before. In the third, from all the prehabits he concludes that through the union of the Word and man the properties of both natures are not confounded: but remain different and distinct: and this he proves through the authority of John Damascene which begins, there, § 3: The Word therefore was incarnate, etc.

Articulus 30 — Whether The Word Is Everywhere Man

Whether the Word is everywhere man?

Then it is objected concerning this which he says, there,
§ 3: Not coextensive with the flesh, etc.

For either the Word is everywhere incarnate, or not everywhere. If everywhere, then Christ is everywhere man: and thus the flesh is coextensive with the uncircumscribed deity. But if not everywhere: therefore the Word is somewhere where man is not, and somewhere man, which is false, since it is simple: and it is either wholly incarnate, or nothing of it is incarnate.

Solution It must be said that the Word is everywhere man, but is not man everywhere: because when it is said, the Word is everywhere man, there is a double expression, from the fact that the adverb, everywhere, can determine the verb is in comparison to the suppositum, and thus the expression is true: or in comparison to the appositum, and then the expression is false. And in the first way the sense is: the Word being everywhere, is man: and this is true. In the second way the sense is: the Word is man everywhere, such that in human form it is everywhere. And thus when it is said, the Word is everywhere on this altar: therefore the Word is on this altar everywhere, it does not follow, and a fallacy of diction occurs. For Pope Innocent says that the Word in triple consideration is related to place in three ways: according to the deity it is everywhere essentially, by presence, and potentially: but according to the human form it is openly and distinctly in a determined place at the right hand of the Father in the empyrean heaven, that is, in the highest goods; but according to the species of bread it is on the altar on which it is consecrated.

Articulus 9 — Whether Sanctification Confirms The Sanctified, And Especially The Blessed Virgin

Whether sanctification confirms the sanctified, and especially the Blessed Virgin?

Whether sanctification confirms the sanctified, and especially the Blessed Virgin?

Seventhly, it is asked, Whether this grace which is called sanctification in the womb, confirms the sanctified, and especially the Blessed Virgin, by which afterwards she could not sin?

1. For this seems through Ambrose in the book on the Virginity of the glorious Virgin, where he says that it was impossible for the womb of the Virgin, which the Son had consecrated by inhabiting, to be defiled by the intercourse of another union: since therefore a similar reason applies to other acts of imperfection and sin, it seems she could not have sinned.
2. Likewise, indecency does not befit Christ: but the reproach of the mother if she sinned would result in some blame, which would seem indecent to have bad parents: therefore it seems that she could not sin.

Solution: It must be said that this grace does not confirm those to whom it is given: but it is indeed true that in the Blessed Virgin it removes the habit towards evil, so that, namely, on the part of habit she did not have an inclination.

But what Ambrose says is understood of the impossibility which is from incongruity: because it would have been incongruous for the womb which had been the temple of the Son of God to be offered to be corrupted by a man: and this impossibility is the immobility of honesty from free will.

And in this way proceeds the following objection, which proves this by way of indecency.

Articulus 16 — What The Mode Of The Annunciation Is, Whether Intellectual, Or Some Other Leading To Assent

What is the mode of annunciation, whether intellectual, or some other leading to assent?

Fourthly, it is asked about the mode of annunciation.

For it seems that it ought to have been done by intellectual vision: because
1. This kind of illumination is the highest, as Augustine says in book XII on Genesis.

1. Likewise, Daniel 10:1: Understanding is the work in vision.
2. Likewise, Augustine says that prophecy is only from intellectual vision, because in others there is error: therefore it ought to have been done in that way, as it seems.

If perhaps it is said that Angels cannot illuminate our intellect, because according to intellect we are equal to them: for an equal does not have power over an equal. This is against Augustine in book XII on Genesis, where he says this is done in wondrous ways, that Angels imprint intelligible species on our intellect.

Solution: It must be said that annunciation is by the mode of inducing into consent, so that to consent is from free choice: because otherwise it would not be praiseworthy: because illumination in the intellect convinces reason of consent. And therefore, although the mode of intellectual illumination is more noble in its kind than through vision or imagination, nevertheless it would not be as useful for annunciation which inclines to free consent.
And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 17 — What The End Of The Annunciation Is

What is the end of the annunciation?

Fifthly, it is asked, What is the end of the annunciation?

And it seems that it is faith: because
1. Thus says Elizabeth, Luke 1:45:
Blessed is she who believed.

1. Likewise, the faith of the Blessed Virgin is said to have been the way: therefore it was the end of the annunciation.

2. Likewise, this seems to be in the words of the persuading Angel.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
The Blessed Virgin had faith before the annunciation: therefore it was not the end of the annunciation, because it was not acquired by her.

Solution: It must be said that there was a twofold end: one in the Virgin, and this is the consent, or faith in the words of the Angel, not the simple faith by which one believes in God, because she had that before: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

Another end was consequent, namely the conception and incarnation of Christ, not operating through the annunciation, but disposing the Virgin for this, so that it might be done in her by the operation of the Holy Spirit: and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 23 — Why It Is Said, 'Do Not Think This Flesh To Be Of A Heavenly, Nor Airy, Nor Of Any Other Nature'

Why is it said, "This flesh is not celestial,
not airy, not of any other nature"?

Why is it said, "This flesh is not celestial,
not airy, not of any other nature"?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there,
A, at the end: "This flesh is not celestial, not airy," etc.

Against this is what is held, John 3:31: "He who is of the earth, is of the earth, and speaks of the earth. He who comes from heaven, is above all." And John says this of himself, comparing himself to Christ according to inferiority. However, it is evident, that from the anibut he does not speak, but of the body: therefore the body of Christ came from heaven: therefore it is of heavenly nature.

Solution: It must be said that John says this about the person of Christ, not about the nature of man: for Christ in person came from heaven: but John had the person of earthly nativity: as Christ also says elsewhere about himself: No one ascends into heaven, except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man, who is in heaven.

Articulus 29 — In What Sense It Is Said, 'The Whole Word Was Incarnate'

In what sense is it said, the Whole Word is incarnate?

But it is asked concerning this which is said there, § 3: The whole is incarnate, etc.

For either the whole is referred to nature, or to person, or to both. If to nature, it seems false: because although the whole divine nature is incarnate in one of its hypostases, yet the whole nature of the Word is not uncircumscribed, but circumscribed.

Solution: It must be said that the term "whole" regards both nature and person: but the nature of man is not incarnate, but rather united to the deity. Hence it speaks of the Word according to that which is incarnate: and because to be incarnate does not pertain to human nature, therefore the distribution does not regard parts of human nature.

DISTINCTIO IV

Divisio Textus

Since indeed the incarnation of the Word, as has been treated in the above, etc.

Here begins the second part of that part, in which it is discussed concerning the conjunction of the assuming and the assumed, and in which it is determined concerning the one operating the conjunction and joining the unibles themselves: and the whole is contained in this distinction.

It is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master adduces the reason for and against, Why is the incarnation attributed to the Holy Spirit? In the second, however, it is further inquired, Why does the Apostle say he was made from the seed of David according to the flesh: when he was made according to the flesh from the power of the Holy Spirit, not from the male seed? and this begins in the last chapter of this distinction, namely there, D, But it can be asked, Since we the Savior, etc.

The first part is subdivided into two: in the first of which the reason is taken, why Christ is said to be conceived of the Holy Spirit, according to the attribute of the Holy Spirit which is charity. In the second, however, another reason is taken according to the work of the Holy Spirit, there, C, It can also be said that Christ according to man was therefore born, etc.

The former of these is further subdivided into three: in the first of which he raises the question, and applies the solution. In the second, he confirms the solution through the authority of Augustine, there, A, § 2: When that creature which the Virgin conceived, etc.

In the third, he touches upon the contrary objection from this that it seems the Holy Spirit is the father of the Son according to man, and solves it, there, B, But it is not to be dwelt upon longer in this.

Articulus 1 — To Which Person's Attribute The Incarnation Is Chiefly Attributed

To which person is the attribute of Incarnation most especially attributed?

The question arises concerning the first chapter, to which person the attribute of incarnation is most especially attributed.

It seems, however, that it is to the Father. 1. John 3:16: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son." It is evident, however, that the term "God" there supposes the Father: because the only begotten Son is not Christ except of the Father, not of himself, nor of the Holy Spirit, nor of the whole Trinity. Therefore, it seems that this giving is a mission into flesh: therefore, it seems that it especially belongs to the Father.

1. Likewise, this is shown by the name of the Angel sent: because Gabriel is interpreted as the strength of God. Since, therefore, the names of messengers declare attributes, and mission and strength are power, it seems that it ought to be attributed to the Father.
2. Likewise, by human generation he is not the son by another filiation than that by which he is the Son of the Father: since, therefore, by this relation he posits something other than the Father, the work of human generation ought to be attributed to the Father, and not to the Son, or the Holy Spirit.
3. Likewise, it was held above, that he is sent who is from another: but the Son is from the Father: therefore, he is most fittingly sent by him; but the principal of all missions was that which is into flesh: therefore, that is most fittingly attributed to the Father. But that mission was incarnation: therefore, incarnation is attributed to the Father.

However, it seems that it ought to be attributed to the Son.

1. For it was held above, that because he made all things in wisdom, they ought also to be recreated in wisdom: therefore, the work of incarnation is attributed to the Son, to whom wisdom is also attributed.

2. Likewise, it is the work of him who especially assumes the flesh, to operate the incarnation. But this is the Son: therefore, the work of incarnation is of the Son as the operator.
3. Likewise, Bernard in the fifth book of "Consideration" says: "Wisdom, with the garment of the faith of the glorious Virgin, joined three measures in the incarnation, namely new, ancient, eternal: new in the creation of the soul from nothing, ancient in the assumption of the body from the nature of Adam's body, eternal in the union of the deity." Therefore, since wisdom is attributed to the Son, incarnation is most especially attributed to the Son.

But it seems that it is especially to the Holy Spirit: because 1. The Creed says, "Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit."

1. Likewise, Matthew 1:20: "For that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit."
2. Likewise, Luke 1:35: "The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee."
3. Furthermore, this is proven here by many authorities in the Scripture.

Solution: It must be said that according to something of each person, attributes are found in the incarnation: for as to the conjunction of the distant human nature and divine, power appeared, but as to the moving to the assumption of flesh, goodness appeared, but as to the mode of the indissoluble union, wisdom appeared.

Similarly, in the consequences of the incarnation on the part of the end which is redemption, goodness appeared: but in the payment of the due price by the mode of the debtor and the powerful to pay, wisdom appeared, which joined those things in the price, by which the price itself could not be refused: so that (as Augustine says) it might have one in itself from which it ought, and from which it could pay the price, and by the deity itself offered it might be one with him to whom it was offered, and with the priest offering it in sacrifice one, and with those for whom it was offered one in the nature of humanity. And this is what Augustine says in the fourth book of "On the Trinity," thus saying: "What could be offered and received more graciously than the flesh of our sacrifice, the body made of our priest? So that since four things are considered in every sacrifice, to whom it is offered, by whom it is offered, what is offered, for whom it is offered. The same one true mediator, by the sacrifice of peace reconciling us to God, might remain one with him to whom he offered, might make one in himself for whom he offered, might be himself one who offered, and what he offered." It appeared in the end, also in the victory over death, hell, and the devil: because, however, the intended end is goodness, and the first mover is goodness: therefore, it is attributed to the Holy Spirit.

But that it is so, four authorities say. For John Damascene says thus: "In the incarnation, the goodness, and wisdom, and justice, and power of God are shown together: goodness indeed because he did not despise the infirmity of his own creation, but his bowels were moved by it falling, and he extended his hand. Justice indeed because, with man conquered, he made the tyrant to be conquered by no other than man. Wisdom indeed; because he found a solution of the most difficult, that is, the most fitting solution." Likewise, Cassian in the first book against Nestorius says thus: "The Word descended." Likewise, Bernard in the fifth book of "Consideration" says that the three persons worked the incarnation of Christ. The same Augustine says in the fourth book of "On the Trinity."

And through these things, the solution to all that was objected is clear.

Divisio Textus

But one must not dwell longer on this, etc.

Here the Master objects against the things previously determined: because if the work of the Incarnation is attributed to the Holy Spirit, and whatever works the form of the body in generation seems to be a father: it will seem that the Holy Spirit is the father of Christ according to human generation.

And this part has three chapters: in the first of which he touches upon the said objection, and solves it. In the second, he gives an instance against this proposition, Whatever is reborn of water, is the son of that [water], there, § 2: However it is not to be conceded, etc. In the third, he gives an instance against this, Everything that is the son of someone, is born of him, there, § 3: Thus therefore he is born of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Trinity Could Be Called The Father Of Christ; And Whether The Holy Spirit Could Be Called His Father; And Whether Christ Can Be Called The Son Of The Holy Spirit According To Grace; And Whether He Is An Adoptive Son

Could the Trinity be called the father of Christ? And, could the Holy Spirit be called his father? And, could Christ be called the son of the Holy Spirit according to grace? And, is he an adopted son?

However, a doubt arises here: Whether the Trinity could be called the father of Christ?

It seems that it could, because: § 1. Augustine says below, Since that man had it by no preceding merits, but by grace, that he be assumed into the unity of the person of the Son of God: but from this grace the Trinity is called our Father, when we pray, Our Father, who art in heaven therefore it seems that the Trinity is the Father of Christ.

§ 2. Moreover, the active power of conception is from the father: but the active power of the conception of the Son, as is proved before, was communally from the whole Trinity: therefore it seems that the Trinity is the Father of Christ.

§ 3. Moreover, I confess to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth. The Saints expound this, that he is the father of all by creation: therefore much more will he be the father of Christ by the formation of the divine body, as it seems.

§ 4. Moreover, we see according to nature that the operation of the father is the detaching of matter, its conversion into the body of the one born, formative into the figure of the members, distinctive and positing of the organs: but the Trinity did all these things, by separating the purest bloods of the Virgin, by forming the species of the body, by distinguishing and composing the members: therefore the Trinity even more truly seems to be the father of Christ, because it did these things in a moment, than a man is the father of a man whose power does this successively.

§ 5. Moreover, a human is called the father of another because of the power forming the body: therefore much more will the Trinity be called the father of Christ on account of the power forming the body and soul; because the Trinity formed both.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. He cannot be called the son of the Trinity except by the grace of the persons: therefore Christ is his own son: therefore some thing begets itself as such.

§ 2. If it is said that this does not follow: because Christ according to human nature is his own son, but according to divine nature he is not. Against this: No thing is called the son of another by grace of nature, because nature is not the son of anyone, but rather the person is: for we do not say that the body and soul of Socrates is the son of Plato, but rather Socrates himself; therefore Christ in person is his own son according to person: therefore some thing in every way the same as that which begets, begets itself as such.

§ 3. Furthermore, Christ is his own son. Let this be granted. Also it is true that Christ is not his own son: therefore Christ is two sons, namely of the Father, and his own along with the others: but this is false: therefore Christ cannot be called the son of the Trinity.

§ 4. Moreover, Cassian in book V On the Incarnation, treating that text of the Apostle John, Every spirit that dissolves Jesus is not of God says thus, To dissolve, this is to want to break what is united in Jesus, and to separate what is undivided. But what is united and undivided in Jesus? Certainly man and God: therefore he separates Jesus who separates and breaks this: therefore whoever says that one thing belongs to the man insofar as he is man, and another to the Son of God insofar as he is person, dissolves Jesus: but filiation belongs to him insofar as he is person: therefore he who says that one filiation belongs to him insofar as he is God, and another insofar as he is man, dissolves Jesus: therefore to say this is not only unfitting, but even heretical.

§ 5. If perchance it is said that filiation does not belong to him by grace of the hypostasis, but by grace of the nature: this is ridiculous: because paternity or filiation does not belong to anyone, neither to God nor to man, except by grace of the hypostasis, and not of the nature.

§ 6. Moreover, the union in Christ is by grace of the hypostasis, and not by grace of the nature, because the natures remain distinct: but the union is unto being, not merely unto the consent of the will: therefore this hypostasis is that [hypostasis]: and whatever is said of the one insofar as it is a hypostasis, will also be said of the other: but the eternal hypostasis is not the Son except of the Father alone. The first premise is written by Augustine who says that the union was so great that it made the man God, and God man. The second is written by Cassian in book VII On the Incarnation, and by Pope Leo against Nestorius, where he says thus: Such an unity of man and God is read, that both the man seems always previously coeternal with God, and afterwards God seems to have suffered with the man.

But these things are introduced because of the erroneous solution of certain ones, who say that he could be called the son of the Trinity, unless a confusion of relations were implied: yet it would not be distinguished whether he was son according to the divine nature or according to the human [nature]. For this was the heresy of a certain monk Leporius, who introduced a quaternity of relations, so that he called Christ two sons.

§ 7. Moreover, Christ is an eternal person and hypostasis by no other personality: but he is a person and hypostasis by eternal filiation: therefore even the man himself existing because of the union will not be called son except by the eternal filiation through relation to God.

But further it is asked, Whether he could be called the son of the Holy Spirit?

And it seems that he could: because § 1. That which is conceived and born out of someone and from someone existing with him in likeness of substance, is his son: because by saying "is conceived and born in likeness of substance," I exclude all of Augustine's counter-examples: but the son is conceived and born from the Holy Spirit existing with him in likeness of substance: therefore he is the son of the Holy Spirit. The first premise is proved. The entire second premise is written in the Creed and the Gospel: because the Creed says that he was conceived by the Holy Spirit: the Gospel says he was born of the Holy Spirit and consubstantial with him: because he is also homoousios with the Father and the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Moreover, Damascene says that the Word descended into the Virgin as a divine seed: therefore it seems that the Holy Spirit operated from seed: and he who operates from seed is a father: therefore it seems that the Holy Spirit is the father of Christ.

§ 3. Moreover, the operation of a more perfect agent is more perfect: but the operation which operates from matter is more imperfect than that which produces matter and form simultaneously: therefore the first belongs to a more imperfect agent, the second to a more perfect one. But if on account of his operation it is attributed to a human father that he is a father, much more ought it to be attributed to the Holy Spirit to be a father on account of a more perfect mode of operation.

To this, again, men are marvelous at solving, [saying] that even this could be said unless a confusion were noted in the voice, namely a confusion of filiation.

But against this are: § 1. The authorities of Augustine and Ambrose saying that in no way can he be called the son of the Holy Spirit: since he himself is not a son except according to hypostasis, and the hypostasis in Christ is but one, he will not be a son except by one filiation.

§ 2. Moreover, the Saints say that Christ is a Son only by nature: but he is not a Son by nature except of the Father: therefore he is not a Son except of the Father: therefore he is not a Son of the Holy Spirit.

But still further it is asked, Whether with this determination, Son by grace, it should be said that Christ is a son of the Holy Spirit by grace or according to grace?

It seems so: because here in the Text we have, that that man was assumed into the unity of the Son of God, which he had by grace not by merits: but all grace is of the Holy Spirit by appropriation: therefore it seems that he himself is a son of the Holy Spirit by grace.

Against this is: § 1. The text of the Gospel which says: We have seen his glory, glory as of the Only Begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth therefore the fullness of grace is to him from the Father: therefore it is not attributed to him from filiation of the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Furthermore, when I say, This man is a son by grace: either grace is taken there for a grace-making habit, or it is the grace making the union of the hypostasis and person. If in the first way, then this man is not the son of God except through the reception of grace, and not through the hypostasis: and this is the heresy of Nestorius and Eutyches. If in the second way, then the hypostasis of this man and of the Son of God is the same: but this hypostasis is a hypostasis by eternal filiation alone: therefore this hypostasis will not be by the grace of the Holy Spirit.

But further it is asked, Whether Christ is an adopted son?

But the Master will determine this below: therefore it must be deferred until then.

Solution: Without a doubt it must be said that in no way, neither by grace nor by nature, is Christ the son of the Trinity, nor even of the Holy Spirit, on account of the reasons to the contrary, which are almost all extracted from the sayings of the Fathers. For that grace is the grace of union according to being, and not of acceptation: and therefore [being] a son by grace in this way is [being] a son by nature: because he is not a son by nature except of the Father: and also by this grace he is not a son except of the Father. But why he is the son of a mother will be inquired below.

Therefore to the first it must be said that this is false, that from such grace the Trinity is called our Father: on the contrary, that grace is of acceptation, which makes a consent of the will: and it does not unite us to God into a unity of person, but into a unity of the Holy Spirit, as the Apostle says: He who adheres to the Lord is one spirit, namely with him. Which unity of spirit is in the consent of the will, not in the unity of person or nature.

To the other it must be said that the operative power of conception which is intrinsic in the seed, because the begotten is from the substance of the begetter, makes the human father to be a father: but a power which operates extrinsically upon matter not brought from the substance of the operation, but upon foreign [matter], and assumed from elsewhere, makes the operator to be an artisan or maker, but not a father: and such was the power operating in the conception of Christ. Hence Praepositivus says in a certain sermon on the Lord, treating that of the Gospel: Is not this the son of the carpenter? For he says that he is the Son of the heavenly Father: for in the Incarnation those three great artisans, the makers of the world, descended into the workshop of the virginal womb, and fabricated a body for Christ. But the operation of a carpenter is the operation of an artisan, and not of the nature of a father.

To the other it must be said that we are called adopted sons, in which filiation Christ cannot be called a son, as the Master will show below: therefore it is not similar, because his grace is uniting to one being in person, but ours is to one being in consent of the will alone.

To the other it must be said that the detaching which belongs to fathers is from their own substance, and not from an alien one: just as the Trinity detached from the body of the Virgin, and the formative power is originated in the seed from the generative [power] of the father: and such was not the power operating the conception of Christ: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the other it must be said that although God forms the body and the soul, nevertheless God the Trinity is not called the father of Christ, on account of the dissimilar mode of formation, as was said.

To the other which is asked further: Whether Christ is called the son of the Holy Spirit?

It must be said that in no way can he be catholically called the son of the Holy Spirit.

To that which is objected first, however, it must be said that Christ was not conceived and born of the Holy Spirit as from a father: because [he was] not [conceived] from a substance detached from the Holy Spirit, or by a formative power originally received from him: but he was born and conceived from him as from the power of an extrinsic operator: and therefore he is not his father, nor does the son have an identity of substance with the Holy Spirit according to which a nature operates according to the substance of the Holy Spirit: because that nature is human, in which the Holy Spirit does not communicate with Christ.

To the other it must be said that John Damascene does not say that a true seed descended into the Virgin, but as a divine seed: so that through the two words as divine seed it may be drawn outside the ratio of a seed: for a divine seed cannot be a part of the substance of God: because the substance of God is indivisible: but it has something of the power of God.

Moreover, As a divine seed still says less than divine seed: hence divine seed removes the ratio of the substance of seed: but as a power removes the operator of the seed, which is intrinsic and natural, what kind of power for the formation of Christ's body was not in the separated flesh. Hence nothing remains of the properties of seed, from which the intrinsic formative power and substance is removed, except the operation itself, and that was there, because the concept was being converted, formed, and figured to the conversion of the species, and the form of the body, and the figure of the lineaments of the body of other humans, and this by the operation and power of the Holy Spirit. Hence from this it does not follow that he operated from seed.

To the other it must be said that to a more perfect agent is due a more perfect operation: but it does not follow that that operation causes the ratio of a father in the operator. For I well concede that the operation of the Holy Spirit is more perfect than that of a carnal father: nevertheless that operation was not by the mode of a father.

To that which is asked further: Whether with this determination according to grace the Holy Spirit could be called the father of Christ?

It must be said that in no way is it to be said: because the grace is unto one being in person, and no one is called a son of a father except in person and by grace of the person: hence that objection does not proceed. And I well concede that that solution is erroneous and contrary to the sayings of the Saints, [namely] that it could be conceded in reality, if confusion in the signification of the relations did not accede, as was expressly proved. And the Saints say that our concession through speech, or negation, does not make a thing to be so, or not to be:

hence it would be so, that Christ would be the son of the Holy Spirit by grace, which the Saints deny by the induced reasons.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Glorious Virgin Truly Was The Mother Of Christ; And Whether She Ought To Be Called Theotokos Or Christotokos

Was the glorious Virgin truly the mother of Christ? And, should she be called Theotokos, or Christotokos?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says in B, at the end of § 1: But he was born of her thus, as of a mother.

For this seems false: § 1. For a mother is one who, by the power of the act of her own generative [faculty], detaches the matter of the concept from the substance of her body, as some say: but the detaching of the purest blood was done by the Holy Spirit, as was held above in the authority of Damascene: therefore the Blessed Virgin was not the mother of Christ.

§ 2. If perchance it is said that she is called mother by grace of the matter which was accepted from her, and by grace of the nutrition of the concept which was made in her: according to this, bronze would be the mother of a statue, which is false: therefore it seems that she was not his true mother.

§ 3. Furthermore, some say that the vegetation of embryos is in the mother after the manner of a plant, because it is bound to the matrix through the cotyledons, and receives sense and motion from the mother's nerves, vital and pulsatile spirit from the arteries, and its nourishment and natural spirit from the veins: and thus they wish that all movements of formation and nutrition and vegetation be from the mother's soul. BUT AGAINST THIS: The seed projected to the matrix either has a natural movement toward conversion and vegetation, or not. If it has a natural [movement]: therefore from a principle intrinsic to itself: but the mother's soul is not a principle intrinsic to it: therefore it is not moved by the mother's soul. If it does not have a natural movement: then all human generation would be unnatural.

§ 4. Furthermore, let this be granted, that it is moved after the manner of a plant in the earth. But a plant in the earth receives only matter, and not the formative power: rather it has that either from the stars, or it is in the seed of the plant: therefore the concept in the mother also does not receive the formative [power] from the mother.

§ 5. Moreover, the Philosopher says that in plants alone the power of female and male is in one: because plants everywhere impregnate and are impregnated. But in all sensible beings the formative power is not from the mother, but from the male: therefore this is not proper to the mother, that she moves to form and vegetation: and because this is believed among those who know the opinion of Aristotle, but such a disputation is not congruent for such a great matter, it is dismissed.

And let it be asked, Whether the Blessed Virgin ought to be called Theotokos, or only Christotokos, as certain heretics said?

But it seems that she ought to be called Theotokos, because: § 1. Thus Damascene says: We preach the Virgin Mary principally and truly Theotokon, that is, the Mother of God: for just as he who was born of her is truly God: so she is truly Theotokos, that is, the Mother of God, who bore the true God incarnate from her.

§ 2. Moreover, Damascene, in the same place: The Holy Virgin did not bear a mere man, but true God: not mere, but incarnate: not bringing down a heavenly body, and passing through her as through a pipe, that is, a channel, but assuming from her flesh homoousion, that is, consubstantial with us, and subsisting in himself.

§ 3. Moreover, in the same place: Justly and truly we name holy Mary Theotokon, that is, the Mother of God. For this name constitutes the universal mystery of the Incarnation. For if she is Theotokos, that is, the Mother of God, who bore God, he who is born of her is altogether God, and also altogether man.

§ 4. Moreover, in the same place: We do not call the Virgin Christotokon, that is, the Mother of Christ: because unto the destruction of the word Theotokos, that is, the Mother of God, the wicked and defiled Nestorius, similar to a Jew, invented it, as a vessel of dishonor unto the dishonor of the only one truly honored above all creation: even if he himself is cut off with his father the devil. In that authority, Nestorius is not dissimilar to a Jew, that is, the heretic, who is a vessel of dishonor, and frantic, similar to a Jew, that is, having the frenzy of a Jew or of the Jews, saying that Christ is a pure man, invented this name from the lies of his father the devil.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. According to this she is mother, according to what she gave: but she gave no nature except that of a man: therefore she herself ought not to be called, as it seems, Theotokos.

§ 2. Moreover, according to this she is mother, according to which she is consubstantial: but she is not consubstantial except according to human nature: therefore she ought not to be called mother except as to this, that she is of human nature. And thus again it follows that she ought not to be called Theotokos.

§ 3. Moreover, what is the obstacle if she is called Christotokos? For as Ambrose says, in the name of Christ not only, I say, divinity, but the Trinity is understood: since therefore Christ is understood as the anointed according to human nature, and the unction according to divine nature: it seems that there is no dishonor to her, if she is called Christotokos.

§ 4. Moreover, it was held above that Christ is a son by one filiation: and that filiation is eternal: therefore according to this filiation he is not the son of the Virgin: and he has no other, as was proved: therefore in no way is he the son of the Virgin: therefore she herself ought to be called neither Theotokos nor Christotokos.

SOLUTION. We say without a doubt that the glorious Virgin is most truly the mother of Christ: and because this was conferred on her, that she could become the virgin mother of Christ by grace: but...

§ 1. ...when a comparison is made, she is naturally the mother of Christ. However, as was held in the preceding distinction, it does not belong to the mother to be convertible to the species, and formative of the members of the conceptus: but her operations are toward the improvement of the complexion from the matter, and disposing powers from the complexion of the matrix and nourishment. Nor do I presume to say this, that she herself severed the blood to be formed into the body of Christ: because the authority of Damascene had above says that the Holy Spirit made that separation. But this is true, that the merit of her faith disposed in her to this, that this should be done in her: and this is what Blessed Bernard says in Book V On Consideration in these words: "Whether the two (namely soul, and flesh) are conjoined or separated, nevertheless the personal unity persevered in the three. Just as one Christ, and one person, Word, soul and flesh, endured even when the man was dead. In the womb of the Virgin (as I perceive it) this commingling and fermentation was made: and it was the woman herself who mingled, and fermented. For I might not undeservedly call the faith of Mary the ferment. Plainly blessed is she who believed, since the things spoken to her by the Lord were perfected in her. But they would not be perfected if the whole had not been fermented according to the word of God, and perpetually fermented, preserving for us as much in death as in life equally one and integral mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus with his deity." According to this authority it is necessary that the Blessed Virgin mingled and fermented, that is, she operated by the merit of faith toward the mingling, that is, toward the union and fermentation and congruity of the matter: because that commingling here is nothing other than the union of three sown elements, that is, of the body, and soul, and deity: and the fermentation of the virginal mass is nothing other than the maturity of congruity.

§ 2. To what is objected concerning the bronze in the statue, it must be said that it is not similar: because the bronze is the whole matter of the statue according to its whole self, and moreover it does not operate by secondary acts toward the figure and vegetation and nourishment of the statue through a power internal to the bronze itself.

§ 3. To that which is objected concerning the solution of certain ones, it must be said that that suspension does not show that anything is from the mother except secondary operations: because the principal one is in the seed of the man: but in the virginal conception it was from the work of the Holy Spirit.

§ 4. To that which is further asked, Whether the Blessed Virgin could be called Christotokos? It must be said, that not absolutely: because, as Damascene and Ambrose say, the fronestarii [i.e., those holding the mindset] of the Jews, like Paul of Samosata, and Nestorius, and Eutyches, and Pelagius invented this to the diminution of the honor of the Blessed Virgin, so that namely only Christ, and not God, was born of the Blessed Virgin: and therefore since (as Jerome says) we ought not to have words and names in common with heretics, this is not to be received absolutely.

§ 5. To what is objected against this, it must be said that to be born does not properly belong to the nature, but to the person or hypostasis per se: therefore the hypostasis God and one perfect man was born, who is the son of the mother and of the heavenly Father according to his two nativities. But that argumentation proceeds as if by the grace of the nature born the mother and the born were so called: and this is not true.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that the consubstantiality of the parent to the born is consequently according to the intellect, and not primarily. For primarily and principally this one generated this one: but because he generated from his own substance, therefore he is consubstantial. Whence since nativity regards the being of the hypostasis and person primarily and principally, but the nature secondarily, she is called the mother of Christ according to the hypostasis, which hypostasis is God and man, and therefore she is the mother of God and man: although she is not consubstantial except as regards the human nature only, because consubstantiality from its own concept only signifies agreement in substance: but nativity is of the person primarily and per se, and of the nature consequently and secondarily.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that she is not to be called Christotokos: because although unction is understood in Christ, nevertheless it does not necessarily posit the unction of deity, but of grace, as when it is said: Touch not my christs[204].

§ 8. To what is further objected, without prejudice it must be said that Christ is son by only one filiation: but he has two nativities: but from the other nativity, namely the earthly one, there is not born in him a new filiation, which determines his hypostasis: however in the parent there is born a new respect [relation] toward him, as can be seen in a similar case: for we do not say that by one filiation Socrates is the son of his father, and by another filiation the son of his mother, but by the same: but nevertheless the respect of the father to the son is one, and the respect of the mother is another. And therefore Christ from the human nativity which he truly has, most truly makes the mother have a respect of relation to him in conformity of earthly substance: but nevertheless he does not have another filiation by which he is son, than that which he has from eternity: for filiation determines the hypostasis, which is only one in Christ: and in one insofar as it is one and according to one, it does not befit there to be two qualities of the same species according to two relations: and therefore by one filiation he is the Son of the Father according to the eternal generation, and by the same filiation he is the Son of the mother according to the temporal generation.

§ 9. But there are found some saying otherwise, against whose opinion it is long to dispute. But what has been said here agrees with the sayings of the Saints.

Articulus 6 — Why Something Born Of Another Is Called A Son, And Something Not; And Why Those Reborn Of Water And The Holy Spirit Are Not Called Sons Of The Water And Of The Holy Spirit

Why is something born of another called a son, and something not? and, Why are those reborn of water and the Holy Spirit not called sons of water and the Holy Spirit?

§ 30. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, § 2: Otherwise is a son born from a man, otherwise a hair, etc. For it is doubted, why it is that something born of something is called a son, and something is not called a son?

§ 31. Also, concerning this it is asked, How is it that some reborn of water and the Holy Spirit are not called sons of water and the Holy Spirit, but rather of God the Father and of his mother the Church? Mother Church is the congregation of the faithful: and because a mother ministers matter to the fetus, mother Church ought to minister matter in this birth: and this is not true, because neither is grace from her, nor the matter of the body, according to which matter a man is generated.

§ 32. To the first it must be said that it is not called a son unless three things come together in the born, namely matter which is in potency the whole body, and a formative power in that matter, according to which this ought to be severed by an act of the generative power in the parents: and third, that the born is terminated through nature and is reduced to a similar according to species and form to the generator itself. But hairs are not generated thus: but rather from a gross terrestrial smoky nourishment reaching to the skin, hairs are generated: but earthworms from putrefied nourishment in the lower belly, as the Philosopher says: for when the nourishment putrefies, a natural heat exhales which draws with it the natural humidity: which because it is viscous, is outwardly surrounded in the manner of skin, which skin contains the exhaled hot in itself in the extracted humid: which heat since it cannot evaporate, is converted into a spirit, and draws out a sensible soul, and a worm is generated, long or short according to the complexion of the matter: but perhaps the sensible soul is given by the power of the stars: this however is plain, that it has neither the matter nor the formative power of the generation of a man, nor is it terminated in the similar of species and form.

§ 33. To what is further asked, it must be said that the water is not there except as the matter in which a sensible similitude is taken for the signification of the sacrament: through which similitude it causes not from the water, but from the sanctification: and therefore since a mother causes in some way, water cannot be called mother. But the Spirit is well called spiritual father. For a spiritual father is not a father absolutely, but is so called metaphorically, because by his power he gives being according to the spirit, and this is well-being. But the Church is called mother not properly, but by metaphor, because in the womb of her affection she gives birth to us, until Christ be formed in us.

Articulus 7 — Whether Some Can Be Called Sons Of Gehenna

Whether some can be called sons of Gehenna?

§ 38. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, § 3: Sons of Gehenna, not born of it, but prepared for it. For from the fact that something is compared to something after its being, it cannot have the rationale of filiation to it: since therefore no one is compared to Gehenna except ex post facto, which follows being: it seems that they ought not to be called sons of Gehenna.

§ 39. Solution. Son includes in itself three things, namely to be born of the substance of the parent, and to have the discipline of the parents, as the Apostle says, Heb. 12:8: But if you be without discipline, whereof all are made partakers, then are you bastards, and not sons. The third is the right of paternal inheritance. And indeed the sons of Gehenna do not have the first from Gehenna: and this is because nativity follows this alone: therefore they are not born of

204. Mt 6:9.

Gehenna: but in the middle they are prepared for it by Gehennal acts: and the third when they will possess Gehenna, because through acts they will have it by hereditary right.

Articulus 8 — Whether Any Merits Preceded the Incarnation

Whether any merits preceded the Incarnation?

§ 44. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, § 3: It insinuates to us the grace of God, by which man with no preceding merits, etc. For it seems that many merits preceded the Incarnation: because 1. So God says to Abraham, Gen. 15:1: I am thy protector, and thy reward exceeding great: where he promises himself to be incarnated, as the Saints say: but a reward is owed to merit. 2. Moreover, the Saints believed this, and faith is merit: therefore merits preceded. 3. Also, Isa. 26:8: In the way of thy judgments, O Lord, we have patiently waited for thee: but to patiently wait in the way of judgments is a merit of the just: therefore from the merits of the Fathers this is given. 4. Also, Heb. 11:39: And all these being approved by the testimony of faith, received not the promise: God providing some better thing for us: therefore to those approved by the merit of faith this was given from debt, and not from grace. 5. If perhaps it be said that it is not such a good that is owed to merit. On the contrary: Glory is greater than any grace: but someone can merit glory: therefore much more grace: but among the graces ordained to glory, is the grace of redemption accomplished through Christ: therefore it seems that it falls under merit.

§ 45. Solution. The induced reasons are in no way against what is said in the Letter: because in the Letter it is said that that man does not have it from preceding merits, because he was not before he was united to the deity: and before he was, he could not merit.

§ 46. To that which is asked, Whether there was any merit of the Church? It must be said that there is merit of congruity, and there is merit of condignity or of debt: and merit of congruity could precede, by which namely it would be given more congruously than if there were no such merit: but it was not given by the merit of condignity or debt. Whence, Titus 2:11: The grace of God our Savior has appeared to all men. And, below, 3:4-5: When the goodness and humanity of God our Savior appeared, not by the works of justice which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us. Therefore I well concede that it does not fall under the merit of condignity.

§ 47. And to what is objected against this, it must be said that glory falls under merit, also that which is ordained to glory, although no one can merit the first grace, because otherwise grace would be before the first grace. But the Incarnation is not substantially ordained to glory: because Augustine says that another mode was possible, although none more congruous for healing our misery. Or it can be said that although glory falls under the merit of condignity or debt, it does not however follow that all that falls under the merit of condignity which is ordained to glory: because the first grace, even when another merits the first grace, does not fall under the merit of condignity or debt, but under the merit of congruity. Whence it is clear that that argument does not follow: from which the solution of all the arguments which are induced is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Grace Is Natural to Christ

Whether grace is natural to Christ?

§ 48. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, § 3: That grace itself should become in a way natural to that man, etc. On the contrary: No grace is natural, but a gift of God consequent upon nature, and perfecting it in well-being: therefore it is not natural.

§ 49. Solution. Natural is spoken of in three ways, namely what is of natural being in some way, and what cannot relinquish nature, and what is caused by some part of nature per se. And in these three ways grace is said to be natural to Christ. For the grace of union is not a habit of acceptation and gratification in Christ: but it is making one being of the person of the Son of God and of the Son of man: and thus that grace is of being. But the habit of grace in virtues and other graces could not relinquish the subject: and thus it again had the property and similitude of a natural thing, which never relinquishes that in which it is. In the third way grace is also said to be natural: because per se grace is caused by the deity which is, and was the other of the natures in Christ: and in this way the Author understands what he says here.

§ 50. To that therefore which is objected, that grace is of the things consequent upon being, it can be said that this is true in other rational creatures, which are not united to the deity in the principle of their being. Or let it be said, that this is true as to the order of rea-tion, which is between being and well-being: but it is not necessary that this be according to time.

Articulus 11 — Whether Both Can Be Said, That He Was Conceived Of The Holy Spirit, Born Of The Virgin Mary

Since it is said in the symbol, Who was conceived of the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary, can both be said [of either]?

Then it is objected concerning what he says: Conceived therefore and born of the Holy Spirit, etc.

For the symbol does not seem to have it so, but thus: Who was conceived of the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary.

It is asked therefore, Whether both can suitably be attributed to the Holy Spirit?

And it seems that they cannot: because 1. By reason of nativity he is called Son: whence if he is said to be born of the Holy Spirit, he will seem to be the Son of the Holy Spirit.

1. Furthermore, the Holy Spirit did not operate toward nativity just as toward conception: because in conception he converted, separated, formed, distinguished, and united: therefore it ought not to be attributed to him.

Solution. It must be said, that conception is more congruously attributed to him than nativity: yet one can be attributed to him on account of the other. Nor from this does it follow, that he is a son: because to be born of someone operating does not posit filiation to him, but rather to be born of him substantially. Or, it can be said, that there is a nativity in the womb which is through the information and infusion of the soul, which the Holy Spirit made in conception: of which it is said in Matthew That which is born in her, is of the Holy Spirit: and this is the nativity which is here attributed to the Holy Spirit.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Incarnation Can Be Called A Work Of Charity, And A Work Of Gift, As It Is Called A Work Of The Holy Spirit

Can the Incarnation be called a work of charity, and a work of the gift, just as it is called a work of the Holy Spirit?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, around the middle: the Holy Spirit is charity and the gift of the Father, etc.

Whether it can namely be called a work of charity, and a work of the gift, just as it is called a work of the Holy Spirit?

And it seems that it can: because that on account of which each thing is such, and that more so is such: but the work of the Holy Spirit is called on account of charity, and because it is a gift: therefore it ought more to be called a work of charity and of the gift.

Solution: Nothing prohibits that it be called a work of charity as disposing towards the work: but it is otherwise called a work of the Holy Spirit, namely as of the substance operating, but the work of the Gift is not fittingly said: because the gift does not imply a comparison to the work, but to the giver, and to him to whom it is given. Charity, however, regards the act, as a habit ordering towards the act and inclining: and therefore it is properly called a work of the Holy Spirit, less properly of charity, but it cannot fittingly be called a work of the gift.

Articulus 3 — Whether, When One Is Named, Three Are Necessarily Understood

Whether when one is named, necessarily three are understood?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said: But rather when one is named, three are understood, etc.

For it seems that not: because with the essence understood, the person is not necessarily understood: because many understand the essence, who deny the person: and with one person named, the others are not necessarily understood: for with the Father named, the Holy Spirit is not understood.

Furthermore, it is asked, Whether it is always so, that when one is named, the others are understood? It seems that not: because above it was held, that some knew the Father and the Son, and not the Holy Spirit; therefore it seems that it is not necessarily true, that when one is named, the other three are understood.

Solution: It must be said that when one is named in the act of work, without doubt three are understood: because in the indivisible essence, three are referred to the work.

Furthermore, the properties which are attributed to the persons result in the work: and therefore all are understood together.

To that which is objected against, that with the essence understood by someone, the persons are not necessarily understood, it must be said that the Author does not speak thus, but according to the manner of Scripture which is accustomed to name one thing on account of a special attribute; and yet it implies others: as in John 17:3: That they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent. For here the Holy Spirit is not excluded.

To the other [objection], it must be said that it is always thus, when they are referred to some work in themselves: and it is not necessary that it be through the intention of their relations.

Articulus 10 — Whether Human Nature Can Be Said Concretely of the Word, and Whether the Word Was Bodily Filled with Divine Grace

Whether human nature can be said to be concrete with the Word? and, Whether the Word was corporally filled with divine grace?

Then it is asked about what he says, there, B, § 3 at the end: Man... in an ineffable mode is adjoined and connected to the Word of God, etc.

But it seems that it is not concrete: because 1. "Concrete" denominates a subject as an accident: whence it seems, that one of these natures verges into an accident.

1. Furthermore, it is asked about what is said, "corporally filled": because the body is not the proper subject of divine grace: therefore Christ is not corporally filled with divine grace.

Solution. Some have said, that the human nature in Christ verges into an accident: and therefore it does not make a personality in him, nor a person. But I do not dare to say this: nevertheless it will be treated below. But here it must be said, that "concrete" is taken improperly for "united": and thus the objection ceases.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that he is said to be "corporally filled" with respect to the grace of union: for the union is to the body and to the soul. Although therefore the body is not the subject of grace in which there are the habits of virtues, nevertheless the body of Christ united to the deity can be said to be the subject of divine grace: because in him, as the Apostle says, the fullness of deity dwelt corporally.

Others however wished to speak more subtly, and less to the point, saying that there are three dimensions of divine grace: of which one is of the simplicity of God, the grace of which God is in all things, reaching from end to end mightily, and disposing all things sweetly, as if by a protension from the point of the first principle up to the ultimate point of the newest creature, according as God is in all things essentially, presentially, and potentially: and this is the dimension of length by the mode of length through all the grades of beings. But there is a dimension by the mode of width, but more contracted in length, according to which God inhabits the Saints through charity and grace, of which inhabitation it is said: Thy commandment is exceedingly broad. In the third mode he conjoins the prior two in Christ, and adjoins the depth of the solidity of the grace of union in the being of the person: and thus as if by a threefold dimension he inhabits in Christ, by a twofold in the Saints, and by a single dimension in all things.

Others expound, that "corporally" is said here figuratively: because a shadow is only from the object of some body which stands before the light: whence the Fathers were in the shadow of this grace: but the body of the truth of grace is Christ: but the subsequent redemption is the light.

Articulus 12 — Whether It Can Be Granted That the Holy Spirit Begot a Son from the Virgin Mary by Grace

Whether it can be conceded that the Holy Spirit begot a son from the Virgin Mary through grace?

Then it is asked about what he says, there, C, Because through the grace of God and the operation of the Holy Spirit from the flesh of the Virgin, etc.

It is asked, Whether by reason of this grace it could be conceded that the Holy Spirit begot a son from the Virgin Mary?

It seems that it can: because, on that of Matthew God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham, the Gloss says: In testimony of this thing God begot a son from Sarah. Since therefore God did not beget from Sarah materially or seminally, but through the effect of grace, it seems that here much more this could be said, where the effect of grace is greater.

Solution. In no way ought it to be conceded that the Holy Spirit begot a son from the Virgin Mary. And that Gloss which is adduced, is improper: and the sense is, begot, that is, caused to be born.

THEN, On that chapter C, at the end: If as if from his operation and power the Virgin conceived, etc.

Take the authority of Hugh of St. Victor, who gives the reason for this in these words: Mary conceived of the Holy Spirit: not that she received the seed of offspring from the substance of the Holy Spirit, but because through the love and operation of the Holy Spirit substance was ministered to the divine offspring from the flesh of the Virgin: for because in her heart the love of the Holy Spirit burned singularly, therefore in her flesh he did miraculously: whose love because it received no companion in the heart, his operation in her flesh had no example.

Articulus 13 — How Generating and Making Differ

How do to beget and to make differ?

But it can be asked, Since we the Savior, etc.

Here begins the part which is divided against all the preceding, where the Master further asks why the Apostle says he was made of the seed of David. And the reason which the Master assigns lies plainly in the Letter, and is good, and solves the question.

But it is asked here, What is the distance between to make and to beget?

TO THIS it must be said that "to make" is taken broadly, and strictly. Broadly, then any work is said to make, and to create, and to form, and all such. Strictly however something is not said to make unless what operates by extrinsic virtue concerning pre-existing matter, as an artisan, and so it is taken here. But to beget is to produce from substance something similar to the begetter in species and form.

Articulus 14 — Whether the Blood of the Blessed Virgin Is Also Coagulated

Whether the blood of the Blessed Virgin was also coagulated?

Then it is asked about that which he says, there, D, For it is one thing to beget by mixed seed and coagulated blood, etc.

For it is doubted, Whether it was thus in the Blessed Virgin?

It must be said, that in the generation of another little child (as some say) three things concur, namely the seed of the father which is a coagulant in milk, the seed of the mother which is more obedient, and the more unible blood of the mother into nourishment and augmentation: but in the Blessed Virgin there was only one, which is the blood separated and purified by the virtue of the Holy Spirit, as was had above in the authority of Damascene.

DISTINCTIO V

Divisio Textus

Furthermore it is necessary to inquire, etc.

Here begins the third and ultimate part of this question in which it is treated of the union of the assuming and the assumed in hypostasis and person.

But it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is treated of the union made in hypostasis. But in the second objections are made against what was determined, there, E, Here by some it is objected, that the person, etc.

Yet the prior is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is determined, that a person assumed a nature, and that a nature assumed a nature. But in the second it is further asked, Whether this ought to be conceded, the nature was made flesh?, there C, But it is asked, Whether the same divine nature ought, etc.

The first of these is yet subdivided into two: in the first of which he proves, that a nature did not assume a person, nor a person a person, but a person assumed a nature. In the second, he moves the question, Whether a nature assumed a nature? there, A, § 2: By these and many other authorities, etc.

In the first paragraph of the first chapter he first touches the question of four problems, namely whether a nature assumed a person, or a person a person, or a person a nature, or a nature a nature? and he determines three of those problems, namely that a nature did not assume a person, nor a person a person, but a person assumed a nature.

Articulus 1 — Whether to Assume Is the Same as to Unite in the Incarnation of the Son of God

Whether to assume is the same as to unite in the incarnation of the Son of God?

Here a question falls before the Letter of a fourfold member: of which the first is, Whether to assume is the same as to unite in the incarnation of the Son of God? Second, Whether the divine nature, with personality abstracted, is assuming or uniting to itself, or can be. Third, Whether a divine person can assume or unite anything to itself? Fourth, Whether assumption primarily belongs to the nature or to the person?

To the first of these it is proceeded thus: Something is assumed in manifold ways: for assistance, as a wife in the generation of a son: for nature, as a seed assumes to itself by attracting whence it takes increase, and unites that to itself: and also assumption into friendship and society. And in all those modes there is always diversity of the assumed and the assuming. Therefore it seems, that since the uniting is the united, that this is the difference which almost all make, that the united is the uniting, but the assumed is not the assuming: and this difference between to assume and to unite is attributed to Boethius, although in his books it is not found, as far as I know.

If perchance it be said, that it is not true, that the uniting is the united. ON THE CONTRARY: The united makes one with that to which it is united, because otherwise it would not be united: therefore the united after union is one with that to which it is united: but the united is unible: therefore this is true, The uniting is the united.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Assumption is the same as a taking to oneself. But when I say "to oneself": either it is understood that it is united, or it is understood that it is next to something else rather than that it constitutes one. If in the first mode, then the assumption will be of the same thing of which the union is in the incarnation. If in the second mode, then the nature seems to be assumed to something else than to union, which again is false.

1. If perchance it be said, that these two, namely to assume and to unite follow each other according to nature: for something is first assumed before it is united: and this is clear: because nothing is united, unless first assumed that on account of this it may be united. ON THE CONTRARY: In the incarnation all things were made at once, namely separation, conversion, union in person: therefore one cannot posit one before another, and thus what is said is nothing.

Solution. It must be said that to assume and to unite, and assumption and union, differ in reality and in reason in the incarnation.

And their difference is in four things, of which the first is according to name: because assumption is only of what is diverse in substance, and reason, or in number: for it is not said, "I assume me wearing a cope": but, "I assume a cope, or a garment, or I assume a companion, or a friend." But union according to its name states one either in subject or in identity, just as we say white is one or united to Socrates, if Socrates is white, and we say it to be the same to him.

The second difference is in the act of assumption, or union: since not everything which is assumed, is made near or next to: but everything which is united, is made one.

The third difference is in the assumed and the united: since the nature was properly assumed: and since the human nature always remains under properties which belong to no other nature, distinct, it is not properly united except perhaps in another which is the hypostasis: but the hypostasis is the united in itself: and thus union immediately respects the hypostasis, but assumption per se respects the nature.

The fourth difference is taken by reason of order between the two acts, namely to assume, and to unite: because according to reason it is prior to assume, than to unite the assumed. Thus therefore we concede the difference which is commonly assigned, that what is diverse is assumed, and what is the same in person is united.

TO THAT however which is objected to the contrary, that the nature is not assumed here except unto union, it must be said that if force is placed in this that he says "unto union," so that it be understood to be united in itself and per se, it is false, because the assumed remains in itself and per se distinct: because human nature is not divine nature, nor a divine person, nor is it a man. But if it is understood broadly "unto union," that is, to union as to an end, and it is united in another although not in itself, then it is true that the assumption of the nature is unto the union of the hypostasis whose that nature is.

To the other it must be said that although there is not a consequence according to time between to assume and to unite, nevertheless they follow each other by a necessary order of the assumed and united reality: and that consequence suffices to demonstrate the difference of assumption, and union. For assumption states an attraction from another to oneself: whence assumption according to its perfect reason or terminus a quo, is saved in that act by which the Holy Spirit separated from the rest of the blood of the glorious Virgin what would yield into matter for the body of Christ: nevertheless in that act the reason of union is in no way saved.

Articulus 2 — Whether, with Personality Abstracted, the Divine Nature Can Unite Something to Itself

Whether with personality abstracted, the divine nature could unite anything to itself?

Secondly it is asked, Whether with personality abstracted, the divine nature could unite, or assume anything to itself?

But it seems that it could. 1. Nature states something unible to another, in that every nature of something is a nature in that in which it is: but a person does not state what is unible to another, but rather a perfect being in itself: therefore nature seems more to agree to another, and to unite another to itself than person.

1. Also, it belongs to nature to work the incarnation, as the Saints say: therefore it also belongs to it to unite itself to the worked and made.
2. Furthermore, let it be understood through an impossibility that persons do not exist, just as Jews and Pagans understand God, God will still be omnipotent: therefore by reason of omnipotence it will still befit him to unite himself. If perchance it be said that union is not a work of omnipotence. ON THE CONTRARY: the Angel proves that what he says to the Blessed Virgin can be done, because no word shall be impossible with God: therefore this will be proper to omnipotence: and thus it follows since omnipotence is not abstracted from nature, even with the persons posited not to exist, that it still befits him to be incarnated.
3. Furthermore, it still befits him to love his workmanship: therefore he will still be moved by love to the redemption of man: therefore he will still be incarnated. He will still predetermine the number of the elect, and still understand that it is fitting that that number ought to be fulfilled: and that he who sinned through another, will be able to satisfy through another, and suchlike. Since therefore these causes are assigned by the Saints, why the Son was incarnated, and all are saved even when persons are not understood, it seems that with persons circumscribed, it still befits the nature to be incarnated.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nature is considered triply, as Damascene says, either in bare contemplation, and thus it is in the soul only, or in potency, or in species, or in an atom. But in a universal species it is in all its atoms. If therefore separation from the atom is separation from the person, and conversely, it seems that nature according to reality is not outside the person: but it never befits it to assume unless where it is according to reality: therefore it never befits it to assume except in a person: therefore it will assume nothing with personality circumscribed.

1. Also, nature as considered in itself, does not act, nor suffer: because actions and passions belong to perfect singulars: but to assume requires to act: therefore it will not assume according as it is abstracted from persons.
2. Also, to assume is after the perfect being of the assuming: because no one assumes anything to himself, unless after he is completed: since therefore nature states something incomplete which is completed in a suppositum or reality of nature, nature cannot assume.
3. Furthermore, nothing assumes anything to itself except through the mode through which it is: but nature is never except in a reality of nature: but this in divine things is a person: therefore then it does not assume except in a person.

Solution. It must be said that it is one thing to circumscribe every personality from the nature, and another to circumscribe this personality which faith determines, namely of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. For if in the first mode a circumscription of personality is made in the divine nature, it will be in the intellect only, and will act or assume nothing, and will be understood by the mode of something ordinable into another in which it may be according to being, because it will be understood as ordinable to a person: and thus proceed all the objections adduced to this, that a nature abstracted from persons cannot assume. But if an abstraction is made from the personality which faith determines in divine things, then there still remains according to the intellect God, a being one in himself of rational nature, and discrete by his attributes from all others: and thus he will remain in the reason of a person, although he will not remain in the reason of this person or of that one: and to him it belongs to assume, or to operate, and to unite to himself from his omnipotence whatever he wills. But it is true, that thus the order of redemption will not be fitting. And the reason for this is: because with the personality which faith distinguishes in divine things abstracted, the distinction of persons would not remain, although one person would remain according to a perfect and one substance, and there cannot be many such persons in divine things: because with many such persons posited, it would follow that there are many gods, which is not true. And therefore since to redemption a personal distinction between the sender and the sent is required, and between the one satisfying and the one to whom satisfaction is made, such fitnesses cannot then be saved: because the sender and the sent would be personally the same, and the one satisfying and the one to whom satisfaction is exhibited. Whence it must be said, that with the personality of faith circumscribed, the potency of incarnating is still saved in God, but not the fitness.

TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said, that nature is said as something unible to another which is its own reality just as the individual of its own nature: but it does not state what is unible to another nature or person of another nature.

To the other it must be said, that it does not belong to nature to operate unless a person is assumed, although it does not behoove to suppose it in this or that distinct person, as faith supposes.

To the other it must be said, that with these persons not understood, the reason of personality still remains in God: but it is true that it is not the same reason of personality: because it would not be distinguished by relations from a reality of the same nature, but it would be distinguished by attributes from realities of other natures: and therefore it is no wonder if he remains omnipotent.

To the other it must be said, that he will love and command: because he is supposed as a person subsisting in himself perfect, and indistinct from others: but nevertheless because only one is then posited, the fitness of incarnation and redemption will perish.

Articulus 3 — Whether to Assume Befits a Divine Person

Whether to assume belongs to a divine person?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether to assume belongs to a divine person?

It seems that not: because 1. Person states something distinct and incommunicable: but in assumption union to another and communication is stated: therefore the intellect of person is contrary to assumption and union.

1. Also, every union which nature makes is to this that the united may stand in one, so that it is not further united to another, just as it unites elements in humours, and humours in complexion, and complexion in similar members, similar ones in dissimilar ones, and dissimilar ones in the composition of a physical organic body, and the organic body with the soul having a diversity of powers, and there it stands: therefore this is the ultimate which is repugnant to unibility: since therefore this is the individual of nature or person: person according to the reason of person is not unible to another: since therefore in divine persons the reason of person is truest, it seems that it is not unible according to the intellect of person.
2. Also, Boethius says, that person is an individual substance of a rational nature: therefore since an individual is divided from others, it follows that by its intellect it posits separation from others: since therefore separation is contrary to union, which is to another, person according to its intellect is repugnant to unibility. And this is against all Saints and Doctors, saying that a person can assume more than a nature.
3. If perchance it should be said, that these reasons prove, that congruently the union of a person ought not to be made as far as it is on the part of the assuming, but nevertheless God can...

to do this out of His omnipotence: this is saying nothing, because many Saints assign reasons why it is more fitting that the assuming subject be a person rather than a nature.

§ 2. 5. Furthermore, according to this, God could do something contrary to the formal character of His person: and this would not be expedient for Him, because in this way He could do something against Himself. For Anselm says that he who is able to do what does not profit him and is not expedient for him, the more he is able to do it, the more adversity and perversity have power over him.

§ 3. 6. If on account of this it is said that these arguments would proceed well if the person, on the part of its personality, were to lose its incommunicability through the union: but this is not the case, and therefore they remain incommunicable just as before. On the contrary: Every union or unibility implies a communication or communicability: but the union is only in the person, as the Saints say: therefore communion and communicability are in the person, and thus what is said amounts to nothing.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 4. 1. The union is for the sake of redemption: therefore the union will be through that mode which is most fitting for redemption: but it is fitting for redemption that the one making satisfaction be the same in person as the one owing the debt, and not [the same] in nature: therefore the union ought most fittingly to be made in the person.

§ 5. 2. Also, Augustine says: He who is sent is from another: therefore he who is sent into the flesh is from another: but nothing is from another except a person: therefore the incarnation properly belongs to the person.

§ 6. Solution: We say with the holy Fathers that the person is unible on the part of the one assuming.

§ 7. To the objection raised to the contrary, it must be said that this is true, because singularity and incommunicability belong to the concept of a person: but not every singularity nor every incommunicability, but the singularity that is contrary to being in many things, and the incommunicability that is contrary to a unibility for the sake of constituting a third thing. And in this way the divine person did not lose its singularity: because it still remained one singular person, not predicable of many things in which it might be, nor changed into any third thing; but rather, it assumed the assumed [nature] into its own incommunicability and eternal personality, so that the same subject would be God and man in person, and a quaternity in the divine [persons] would not be constituted in the number of hypostases (which would happen if the hypostasis of each nature had its own proper personality, or if a new one were made in the Trinity when the eternal hypostasis together with the hypostasis of man constituted a third person).

§ 8. To the next it must be said that this is true, that a nature in all united things intends one ultimate thing, not unible to another to constitute a third thing, just as was done in all things which it unites to the person: but it does not intend that nothing be united to it into its own singularity and personality: for otherwise He would not assume drink, and food, and the like. Hence it is clear that it is not contrary to personality that something be united to it into its own personality.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that when one says "individual substance," the word individual signifies a separation from others which is contrary to union and to the communicability of potency to act, and vice versa: because such communicability is for the sake of constituting a third thing. But it is not contrary to the union of something into the same singularity of the person, as was established earlier.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that the union is posited by the Saints to have been made in the person: but not such a union as would be contrary to singularity, or would induce a new personality.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that God could do something contrary to the formal character of His person if the union were made in such a way that personality was destroyed: but it is not done in this way, as is clear from what has been said.

§ 12. To the objection that every union implies communicability, it must be said that this is false if one insists on the strict sense of communicability. For something is said to be communicable properly in two ways, but improperly in a third way. For it is called communicable when communicated by way of matter to constitute another thing, just as the body is communicable to the soul: and this communicable thing is communicable as a part. In a second way, it is called communicable of many things as far as it is in itself, in which it is or can be, such as a common nature. And those two are contrary to personality or singularity. In a third way, it is called communicable as unible, by grace of which a communion is made to the properties of another: and in this way the hypostasis of God and of man are united and communicate: and this hypostasis is that one: and whatever belongs to the one by grace of the hypostasis, belongs also to the other. Hence we say that this God is this man, and this man created the stars and was from eternity, and this God was born of the Virgin and suffered under Pontius Pilate.

Articulus 4 — Whether Assumption Primarily Befits the Person or the Nature

Does the assumption belong first to the person or to the nature?

§ 14. Fourthly, it is asked to what it belongs first: namely, to the person or to the nature?

§ 15. It seems, however, that it belongs to the nature: because 1. To whatever creation belongs by grace [of it], recreation belongs by grace of the same: but creation belongs by grace of the nature; therefore recreation does too. If it is said that the first proposition is false, it is proved by a similarity from earlier points, where Augustine said that because He had created in wisdom, it was fitting that redemption be made in wisdom.

§ 16. 2. Also, the Incarnation is a work of the three persons in common, as was established in the previous distinction: therefore it seems that the assumption also belongs to the nature first: because whatever is common to the three belongs to them by grace of the nature.

§ 17. 3. Also, Damascene says that the whole divine nature assumed human nature in one of its hypostases: therefore this belongs first to the nature.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 18. 1. Whatever belongs to any person by grace of the nature, belongs in common to all the persons: therefore if the Incarnation belongs to a person by grace of the nature, it belongs to all the persons, which is false: therefore it does not belong by grace of the nature.

§ 19. 2. Furthermore, all the fitting reasons of the Saints are assigned according to the proper or appropriated attributes of the person: therefore it seems that the work of the Incarnation belongs first to the person rather than to the nature.

§ 20. 3. Also, something belongs first to that to which it belongs in itself and per se: but the Incarnation does not belong to the nature in itself and per se, but to the person, as was proved from earlier points: therefore it belongs to the nature secondarily, and to the person first.

§ 21. 4. Also, a union more properly touches that which is effected than that which is not effected: but nature is not effected as one with nature, but rather hypostasis with hypostasis: therefore it seems that the union, according to the order of understanding, belongs first to the person rather than to the nature.

§ 22. But on the contrary: In whatever things there is absolute real indifference, whatever belongs to one belongs to the other, and equally first if they are absolutely indifferent and identical in reality: but the divine nature and the person are absolutely indifferent in reality: therefore if it belongs to one to be incarnate, it equally belongs first to the other.

§ 23. Solution: It must be said that, according to the order of understanding, to be incarnated belongs first to the person rather than to the nature. Nor does it belong to the nature in that it is a nature, but rather to the nature according as it is in this person, which posits a fittingness—from His relation by which He is the Son—for the mission into the flesh. For otherwise it would be either impossible or difficult to resolve why the Father and the Holy Spirit did not assume flesh. And therefore we said above that the Incarnation, by the fact that it is a mission into the flesh, includes within itself the relation of the Son, through which the Father and the Holy Spirit are excluded from the Incarnation. Nor do we mean "first" in time here, or from the fact that the nature in reality is prior to the person or simpler; but because it is so in the mode of attributing: and the order of understanding is informed by that mode of attributing. For the attributes of nature are in the divine [persons], although they do not differ in reality: and therefore the order of understanding, thus informed, says that it belongs first to the person rather than to the essence or nature.

§ 24. To the first, therefore, it must be said that to create does not imply a mission in the way that to recreate implies a mission: and therefore what is here of the work is common, because this does not import a mission: but the union includes a relation within itself, and therefore it cannot be common. But when Augustine says that He created in wisdom, the proper [attribute] of the Son is attended to in both cases in His appropriated [attribute], which is wisdom: but creation does not import this appropriated [attribute] according to the meaning of the name.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that the operating work, which is the action itself, and the operated work, which is the composite of body and soul, are common: but the Incarnation does not signify this, but rather the assumption of flesh into Himself, and that is not common on account of the included relation of the Son Himself.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that the authority of Damascene rather supports the opposite: because he says that He assumed in the person, as if to signify from the mode of speaking that this belongs to Him by grace of this person, not by grace of Himself.

§ 27. To the last it must be said that although there is no real difference between the essence and the person, nevertheless they differ in the mode of attributing to them those things which belong to nature in the divine [persons]: because the essence is communicable, the person incommunicable: the essence is not generated, the person is most truly generated: for the essence is not distinguished, whereas the persons of the nature are most truly distinguished, and the essence is not generated in such things: therefore something can belong first to the person, such as the Incarnation on account of the included relation, and secondarily to the essence, both on account of the fact that it is not separated from the person, nor is it distinguished from it.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Assumed Nature Is According to Every Mode of Nature, Which Is Fourfold

Is the assumed nature according to every mode of nature, which is fourfold?

§ 29. Next, it is asked concerning those things which are said in the text, and first concerning what he says there, A, § 1: "Therefore He, God, received the form of a servant, that is, the nature of a servant, into His person."

§ 30. For it is asked here: According to which formal character of nature is the nature said to be assumed?

§ 31. For Boethius posits four definitions of nature, of which the first is this: "Nature is of those things which are, since in whatever way they can be grasped by the intellect." He says "in whatever way" on account of God, who by His excellence is not perfectly grasped by the intellect, and on account of the mixed privation in matter, which he also posits as an example, and of these there are also time and motion according to Avicenna. According to this mode, nature is indeed whatever exists: but nature is not taken in this mode when "assumed nature" is spoken of: because if He had assumed only a body in this mode, He would have assumed a nature.

§ 32. The second definition: "Nature is either what can act or indeed be acted upon:" and this belongs to all substances to which it is proper to act and to be acted upon, and such are both corporal and spiritual substances: and if He had assumed a nature in this sense, again the assumption of a body alone or of a soul alone would suffice for the assumption of our nature.

§ 33. The third definition is: "Nature is the principle of motion per se and not per accidens:" for this belongs only to corporal substances. But Christ had not taken merely a body: therefore He did not receive it in this sense of nature.

§ 34. The fourth is: "Nature is the specific difference informing each thing, or the common difference:" if therefore He had taken human nature according to this acceptation, it seems that He would have taken it in all men, which is contrary to Damascene, who says that He did not take the nature considered as a species, but in an atom [i.e., an individual].

§ 35. If you say that He took the difference according as it is in this [individual] constituting its being. Against this is still: because although the difference makes the formal being, it nevertheless does not make the whole natural being. But Christ also took our matter: therefore it seems that He took our nature understood in no mode at all.

§ 36. If perhaps it is said that our nature is a form, then it follows that He would not have assumed a body: because the same Philosopher says that the body is not a form, but matter: therefore He did not take it in this mode either.

§ 37. If perhaps it is said that nature is taken for the conjunction of the two significations of nature, namely of form and of matter, just as the Master [Lombard] said above, that by the name of nature the body and soul are understood, and these conjoined, as the Master said. Against this is that the composite is rather called a thing of nature by the Saints and Philosophers according to nature or the natural.

§ 38. Furthermore, it is asked concerning this: Whether it must be conceded that He assumed our natural, or what is according to nature. Now the natural is that which follows upon nature in the composite. If therefore He did not assume the antecedent according to the intellect, it seems that neither did He assume the consequent.

§ 39. Further it is asked: Whether it must be conceded that the Son assumed our essence?

§ 40. It seems that He did: because our essence is body and soul: and He assumed those: therefore He assumed our essence. But on the contrary: Essence is that from which being comes: but every composite exists: therefore, since the composite is this or that singular thing, and He did not assume a singular thing, as will be proved below: it seems that He did not assume our being: therefore neither our essence, as it seems.

§ 41. Furthermore it was asked: Whether He assumed our humanity?

§ 42. It seems that He did: because humanity is what makes a true man: therefore, since Christ is a true man, and this is from the assumption of human nature: it seems that He Himself assumed our humanity. But on the contrary: Humanity is only in this man or that man: but He assumed neither this man nor that man: therefore He did not assume humanity.

§ 43. Solution: It must be said without prejudice that Christ received our nature according to every definition which Boethius posits.

§ 44. For if nature is said to be of those things which in whatever way can be grasped by the intellect, then just as He assumed every reality of our nature: because [He assumed] both substance and natural accidents, such as sleep and penal liability. Nor is the argument valid which is objected to the contrary: because Christ is not merely said to have assumed our nature, but also the whole of it.

§ 45. If however nature is said to be what can act and suffer, again He received it: and although He might have received something of our nature, namely flesh only, or soul only: yet when one says the nature of man, it is something else than nature said absolutely: because the nature of man is the whole nature of man. And through this the solution to what is objected to the contrary is clear.

§ 46. Similarly if nature is taken in the third way insofar as it is the principle of motion and rest per se and not per accidens, in this mode again He received it: because it is as the principle of natural motions and operations.

§ 47. If it is taken in the fourth way, Boethius says that both Catholics and Nestorius say there are two natures in Christ.

§ 48. But difference is taken badly and contrary to intention for the universal and specific difference in common: rather it must be taken for the difference in this particular, and then a distinction must be made: since just as it is in generation that a certain thing is generated per se, and a certain thing as a consequent, and as a consequent it follows from the generation, just as "this" is generated by "this" per se: but because "this" is a supposit of man, it follows from the generation of this that this is a man, and further that this has humanity, and that it is an animal capable of discipline, and the like. So I say concerning the assumption, that what is assumed properly and per se is human nature accepted materially, that is, in the parts which are material to the form of the whole, that is, to the being of a man in Him. But because that assumed thing is united by assuming, it follows the assumption as a consequent that there is a specific difference in that assumed thing, that is, had through the assumption; and in this way it can be conceded that nature in that mode is not only in Christ, but also assumed: just as I say that not only "this" but also "man" is generated, when "this" is generated: because it stands as a necessary consequent to the generation of this, and is in this.

§ 49. To the question concerning the division of the Philosopher, it must be said that although matter is a nature, and form is a nature: nevertheless neither of them is the whole nature of man. Nor can it be said that the body, which is the matter of man, is the human nature: nor can it even be said that the soul, which is the form of the body, is the human nature: because when one says "human nature," the whole is understood: and therefore body and soul, as the Master said above, are understood by human nature: and therefore both significations are conjoined in the concept of human nature which Christ assumed, which is proved thus: Christ is true man in the nature which He assumed: but He is not true man only in body, or only in soul: therefore both are comprehended by the concept of human nature.

§ 50. To the question concerning nature and natural, it must be said that "according to nature" is said in many ways, and similarly "natural."

§ 51. For it is said to be according to nature what belongs according to some principle of nature, and what belongs through a natural potency: and thus according to the nature of man is to be rational, and according to the nature of man is to understand. And it is also said to be according to nature what is according to the way which leads into nature, just as what is through generation or according to generation. And Christ assumed all these things, which are thus according to nature, in the mode which we stated above, that to assume, taken broadly, is said of the assumed thing and of that which follows the assumed thing insofar as it is in human nature.

§ 52. Now, natural is said either from the first nature, or from corrupted nature. And if natural is said from the first nature, that is, according to the first institution, then He assumed all natural things: because immortality was not among the natural things, but among the gratuitous things, as Augustine says. But if natural is said from corrupted nature, then He did not assume all things natural to us: because it is natural to us that we are born children of wrath: and He Himself did not assume this, but only assumed the penalty following from the fault, although it was not a consequent in Him from fault: which nevertheless would not have been either in Him or in another unless a fault had preceded. In this way the penal liability natural to us is said to be assumed by Him, and not contracted.

§ 53. 2. To what is further asked: Did He assume our essence?

§ 54. It must be said that essence can be taken from that which is in our nature, or [it can be taken as] our nature: and thus by taking our nature, He took the essence. But if essence is taken for that by which formally the being of a man is insofar as he is a man: then it seems it must be said that the essence is a consequent of the assumption just as the man is, and it will not be called assumed as pre-existing before the assumption, but as a consequent assumed thing, as we said earlier.

§ 55. 3. To what is asked concerning humanity, it must be said that the Master said above that by the name of humanity the body and soul are taken, and it is well conceded that this humanity is assumed principally and first. But if by the name of humanity the form of man insofar as he is man is understood, it will not be assumed except in the mode by which the whole is said to be assumed, which is had in the assumed thing. For because by assuming He united the body and soul, it follows that that which is assumed is as a consequent a man, and the man is having humanity; humanity follows as a consequent in the assumed thing: and otherwise I do not see that it should be conceded.

Articulus 6 — Whether the Whole Trinity Effected the Assumption of Human Nature

Did the whole Trinity operate the taking up of human nature?

§ 57. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, § 2: "Since the whole Trinity operated the formation of the taken up man," etc.

§ 58. The Master will deny this below.

§ 59. Solution: It must be said following those commonly glossing this phrase, "of the taken up man," that is, of human nature. Or it can be said following the aforementioned points, that although a man was not taken up, nevertheless that which is taken up attains the being of a man because by taking it up He unites the body and soul and forms and perfects them: and thus although not first, nevertheless consequently a man is had through the taking up by the Son of God, and He Himself is that man, because the union was made in the hypostasis.

Articulus 7 — What Is Understood by the Form of God

What is understood by the form of God?

§ 61. Next it is asked concerning what Augustine says there, A, § 2: "When," he says, "you hear concerning Christ in what form of God He was," etc.

§ 62. For he calls both the human nature and the divine nature a form. And the reason for this is asked.

§ 63. 1. For Boethius says in the book De Trinitate: "A form which is without matter cannot be a subject, nor truly be in matter: for then it would not be a form, but an image. For from those forms which are outside matter, those forms came which are in matter and affect the body: for the rest which are in bodies we abuse by calling them forms while they are images: for they are likened to those forms which are not constituted in matter." From this it is gathered that the divine nature which is not in matter, nor is the subject of anything, can be called a form: but the human nature only abusively.

§ 64. 2. Furthermore, human nature is said in this book by the Master to be the body and soul: but the body and soul are neither a form in matter, nor outside matter: therefore it seems that it ought not to be called a form.

§ 65. Solution: Some have said that human nature in Christ is called a form, as it were foris manens [remaining outside]. But whatever the case may be regarding this, the divine nature cannot be called a form in this way. Hence, since Augustine seems to accept the name of form in one way in both instances, it must be said that the acts of form are many, but the principal one is to make the proper being of that form. Hence since Christ most truly possesses the being of God, He is said to remain in the form of God: and since He most truly possesses the being of man, He is said to remain in the form of man.

§ 66. To the objection concerning Boethius, it must be said that he speaks there of forms according as they descend from the givers of forms, which are the Intelligences according to the Philosophers, and especially from the First Intelligence. Hence those forms, speaking theologically, are Ideas, the images of which are the forms that are in matter. Human nature in Christ, however, is not called a form in this way, but from the act of form, which is to give true being according to nature: and this being each nature gave in Christ: hence we truly say that He Himself is man, and that He Himself is God.

Articulus 8 — Why He Says, the Trinity Made Only the Word Flesh

Why does he say, "The Trinity made the Word alone flesh"?

§ 68. Next it is asked concerning what Augustine says there, A, § 2, towards the end: "By the fact that the Trinity made the Word alone flesh."

§ 69. For flesh means a part of man, or even a part of a part: since therefore that man is not his flesh, nor together with the Word can he truly be called his flesh.

§ 70. If, however, it is said that the part is put for the whole: then I ask, Why is flesh put there for the whole rather than the soul, or something else?

§ 71. Solution: It must be said that the part is put for the whole: but he specifically posited this part for two reasons, one of which is to exclude an error. For certain heretics said that God was not unible to flesh on account of the passibility of the flesh. Therefore, so that the Evangelist might show this to be erroneous, he did not posit the more noble part, but the more defectible one. Another reason is so that we might know that He assumed the defects of our penalties which were fitting for Him: because our greatest defect with respect to mortality, and penalty, and pain, is in the flesh.

Articulus 9 — What the Truth of Human Nature Is

What is the truth of human nature?

§ 73. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, § 2, near the end: "In whom thus the immutable truth of the divine and human remains," etc.

§ 74. For there can be a doubt as to what that truth is.

§ 75. Solution: It must be said briefly to this that the truth of human nature is that of which it can truly be said, "This is the nature of man," or an essential part of the nature: and similarly the truth of the divine nature is that of which it can be said that "this is the divine nature." Hence it is clear that sin is not of the truth of human nature. Since this is neither a nature, nor a part of a nature, but beside nature and against nature and corrupting the good of nature, which is mode, species, and order; and therefore Christ did not assume this. Similarly, penal liability is not of the truth of human nature: because without it human nature is true, just as it was in the first state, and just as it will be in glory: and therefore the penalty was assumed with the nature of the second state, not the first, as something conjoined to the nature: and this was fitting on account of the mode of redemption. Penalty is not, however, contrary to truth like sin is: because it is caused from something natural, which is the admixture of fighting and dissoluble contraries.

Articulus 10 — Whether What Was Assumed Was Necessarily a Nature or a Person

Was the assumed thing necessarily a nature, or a person? § 77. "But we [avoiding] the mark of all falsehood and contradiction," etc.[205]

§ 78. Here the question arises concerning this assumed thing: Whether this was necessarily a nature, or a person? And if a nature, whether in some way a man was assumed, and thus this man is assumed or not? And, what inconvenience follows if it is said, "A person is assumed"?

§ 79. To the first we proceed thus: For it seems that a nature was not assumed:

§ 80. 1. For nothing is assumed unless it exists prior to the assumption: but the nature of Christ did not exist prior to the assumption: therefore it is not assumed. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved from the fact that the Holy Spirit, by separating the nature and making it, formed and animated and united it to the Son, as was held earlier: therefore the nature never existed prior to the assumption.

§ 81. 2. Also, an assumption is made for the sake of uniting to oneself: but the nature was neither united to the Son, nor to the divine nature: therefore it was not assumed. The first premise is clear from what is written in the text: because by the assumption Christ was made one: and therefore assumption is often put in translation in place of union. The second, however, is proved by the fact that everything united is one with that to which it is united: but human nature is neither the son of man, nor the Son of God, nor the divine nature: therefore there is no union in it. Since therefore the assumption is for the sake of union, the nature does not seem to be assumed.

§ 82. 3. Also, whatever things remain in the same separation are at one time no more united than at another: but the divine and human nature always remain in the same separation: therefore at one time they are no more united than at another. Proof of the middle premise: because the first is self-evident. Because from the beginning the divine nature was never the human, nor was the divine person the human nature, nor is it now any more than then; therefore it is certain that there is always the same separation between them: therefore human nature is never assumed or united either to the divine nature or to the divine person.

§ 83. 4. Also, everything united to another or assumed into union acquires the properties of that to which it is united and by which it is assumed: human nature never acquires any property of the divine nature nor of the divine person: therefore it is never united to either, and is never assumed by either. Proof of the middle premise: For the first is certain. For the properties of the divine nature and of the divine person are to be uncreated, immortal, impassible, and the like: and none of these is participated by human nature.

§ 84. If this is conceded, against this there are very many authorities which the text adduces.

§ 85. 1. The first reason to the contrary is thus: What is neither by assumption nor by union in the Son of God, is in no way in Him: therefore if a single human nature is neither by union nor by assumption in the Son of God: therefore it is in no way in Him: but it is in Him: therefore that which is, by reason of the consequent, will be in Him by union or assumption: but not by union properly speaking, as is clear from what was disputed earlier at the beginning of this distinction: therefore it will be in Him by assumption: therefore human nature is assumed.

§ 86. 2. Also, the assumed [thing] is a thing taken to oneself: now it is certain that human nature is taken to the person, because it is in the person: therefore human nature is assumed.

§ 87. And because everyone says this, the adduced reasons suffice.

§ 88. Solution: It must be said that human nature is the assumed thing properly and per se, and also united in some way: but it was assumed first and per se, however united in its hypostasis to the divine hypostasis.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that we needed the human nature in natural potentiality even before it was assumed by Christ: but the nature of Christ was not before it was assumed by the Word. Nor is this argument valid, "It was not before it was assumed: therefore it could not be assumed," because although by assuming it made, nevertheless the assumption does not deprive the nature made; just as if I were to draw a garment to myself by making it, I would nonetheless draw it made: for by the fact that both are with the other, namely to make and to assume, one is not destroyed by the other.

By this, the solution to the second is also clear.

To the other, it must be said that this is false, that human nature with God or the Will of God is always of the same separation: because although it was never one in itself with the hypostasis or nature, nevertheless as soon as it was assumed, it was consecrated and joined in a new way to the Son of God, and to the divine nature in one person: and this is the conjunction which can be in the assumption of nature.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that the divine nature does not communicate its properties to the human nature in itself: but this does not suffice for there not to be assumption: for it suffices for the assumption, that the hypostasis of human nature participates in the properties of the Son of God and the divine nature, and conversely the divine hypostasis receives the properties of the human hypostasis, as was said before.

205. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, III, d. 5.

Articulus 11 — Whether Man, or This Man, or Some Man, Was Assumed

Whether man, or this man, or some man, is assumed?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether man, or this man, or some man, is assumed?

It seems, however, that this man is assumed. 1. For it is conceded that Christ assumed body and soul: therefore, either he assumed them united, or not united. If not united: then there will be two assumptions, one of the body, the other of the soul.

1. Furthermore, it is written above in the Letter, that he assumed these united: but the mode of union of nature is like potency and act: therefore they make one complete in the genus of men; but nothing is complete in the genus of men, unless it is this something, and this man: therefore the Son of God assumed this man or some man.
2. Furthermore, why is this not conceded, He assumed this man? If because it would be necessary for this man to have pre-existed before the assumption, which is not true: therefore it should not be conceded that he assumed human nature either: because the human nature which was assumed by the Word did not pre-exist before the assumption. But this is conceded. Therefore that should also be conceded.
3. Likewise, the conjunction of all things conjoinable by nature constitutes some one thing: but body and soul are conjoinable: therefore the conjunction of these will constitute some one thing which is from both: but Christ assumed them conjoined: therefore the conjunction of these had already constituted some one thing before the assumption by the intellect. Therefore it is asked, What is that one thing constituted from body and soul? and it cannot be found except this man: therefore he assumed this man, as it seems.

But if this is conceded, it is proven contrary to many authorities of the Saints in the Letter: and the Master also says, that it is undoubtedly certain, that the person is not assumed: since therefore this man is nothing but a person, this man will not be assumed.

Solution: It must be said that the Son of God neither assumed man, nor this man, as the Master says. But Jesus was never this man except after he assumed the human nature which is in him. Hence he was never this man, nor will he be, nor is he by the proper singularity of man: rather, the assumption is terminated in the singularity not of man, but in the divine person.

To the first, it must be said that this is conceded, Christ assumed body and soul united, in such a way that by assuming he made the body and united it, not that they were before the assumption, or were united: but this union did not make a singular of man as man. For since one is said to be undivided in itself, and divided from others: and this assumption did not first conjoin body and soul into some one thing of the nature of man, which united to the divine nature and divine person in divine personality, it is clear that it never made one from body and soul, as one of human nature in this mode: rather it made simultaneously the conjunction and one of the divine person. Hence since one from body and soul makes this man as this man, it is clear that such a one was never assumed in Christ: therefore he did not assume this man.

And this solution is notable: because it solves almost all that can be asked about this matter on the part of the assumed.

To the other, it must be said that the reason why it is not conceded has already been stated: namely because the union of body and soul does not make one divided from another before it was assumed or in the assumption itself in which the assumption is terminated: but the assumption indeed makes one nature preserved as human: because it did not lose its properties from the assumption, as it loses that one which is constituted from body and soul.

Moreover, it must be said that this is true in things conjoinable only by nature: but in Christ the conjunction of soul and body by the conjoining was not alone: rather with this there was another union in another, in which the union of the assuming and the assumed was completed: and this is one of the person in whose singularity the assumption was made: nor did any one thing ever pre-exist, nor was it in the assumption itself, nor after from body and soul according to which one is said to be singular divided from another and undivided in itself: and therefore this is simply false, that the Son of God assumed one, or some man, or this: for the reason of man and of one man is the same: hence if he did not assume one man, he also did not assume man.

Articulus 12 — What Inconvenience Would Follow from Christ's Having Assumed a Person

What inconvenience would follow if Christ had assumed a person?

Thirdly, it is asked, What inconvenience follows if Christ had assumed a person?

It seems that none: because 1. Immediately in the conjunction of the human person to the divine, the human personality would be destroyed, and thus there would not be two persons, but one: just as some ancients also said that a person did not assume a person, but consumed it. If therefore it is so, it is not necessary to hold this inconvenience, that it follows there are two persons.

1. Furthermore, a person is an individual substance of a rational nature, as Boethius says: but Christ as man, insofar as he is man, is an individual substance of a rational nature: therefore Christ as man, insofar as he is man, is a person. Similarly, he is a divine person: therefore either a person consumes a person, or there are two persons.
2. Furthermore, let us suppose that Christ lays aside our humanity: that which he lays aside will be composed of a rational soul and a body: therefore it will be a man: and it will also be this man: therefore it will be an individual substance of a rational nature: therefore it will be a person.

Therefore, it is asked, What did confer upon him that personality which God did not have? It seems that nothing: because nothing happened to him except division: but division gave him nothing, rather it took away: therefore since nothing made personality in him, it seems that he had it, and thus Christ seems to have assumed the personality and person of man.

1. Likewise, let us further suppose that he resumes the man laid aside, either this resumption destroys something of dignity in him, or it does not. If it destroys, then it seems that the union of deity to man harms according to some dignity, which is absurd. If it does not destroy, then it seems that afterwards he is a person as before: and thus there will be two persons: therefore it is not an inconvenience for the Son of God to assume a person.

CONTRA: 1. Whatever two things are, in that they are two, they are not one. Proof. Damascene says that difference is the cause of number: therefore since in that in which things differ, they do not agree, it is clear therefore that whatever two things are, in that they are two, they do not agree, nor are they united. Therefore it is given that Christ is two persons: therefore a person is not united to a person, nor is nature united to nature, because natures remain distinct, as was previously held: therefore there is no union in Christ, which is false: therefore in Christ there are not two persons, but one.

1. Likewise, it was previously held that by forming and joining he united to himself: therefore never did the body and soul have or could have their own singularity. And proper singularity makes a person in a rational nature: therefore he never assumed a person, nor had, nor will have.

Solution: It must be said that in truth many absurdities would follow if Christ had assumed a person, namely that by its own singularity it would have been at some time distinct, and would have consumed some dignity of human nature by its assumption, or that there would be no union in Christ: and therefore it is denied by all, because this was the error of Eutyches. For Nestorius and Eutyches found two errors concerning the incarnation. One, seeing that always to the number of natures follows the number of persons, and seeing that Christ is only one person, said that Christ is also of one nature: and this was Nestorius. The other, however, considering that in Christ there are two natures, and supposing the same with him, said that there are also two persons there. And the error of both arose from the fact that they did not know how to distinguish between person and nature: the distinction, however, will be made clear below.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that this is a great absurdity, that it is posited that Christ destroys something in us that pertains to dignity. Likewise, it is against understanding that, with the singular remaining, singularity is taken away from it: because this cannot be understood: and therefore he did not assume a person. And therefore we say that it is not an opinion, but an error, that Christ assumed or consumed a person. For nothing is consumed except what is: but it has already been proven that that man was never one by his own singularity, nor will he be.

To the other it must be said that Christ as man, insofar as he is man, is not an individual substance of a rational nature, nor is Socrates insofar as he is man, but insofar as he is a rational mortal animal: but insofar as this man is himself a person. And Christ insofar as this man is a person: but that he is this man, he has from the singularity of the divine person, into whose singularity, as it is held in the Letter, he is assumed.

To the other it must be said that if that position is posited, I well concede that the laid aside will be this man, and a person.

To what is asked, What confers upon him the personality which he did not have before? It must be said, that the singularity which he did not have before or incommunicability, as others say.

But if it is asked again, What confers upon him that singularity? It must be said, that division by accident confers it upon him. And if it is said that division rather takes away than confers. It must be said that it takes away per se, and by accident confers being one and divided from another: and this is singularity. And an example of this is in animals with annulated bodies, in which there is a similar or nearly similar composition of parts in the whole body. For in them there is one sensitive soul, as the Philosopher says: and if it is divided, there will be a soul in each of the parts by sense and motion, and each part will have a singular soul, and this division confers by accident upon the parts, just as something confers by consequence from another through another. Yet in that example I do not define whether they are one or two, because of the word of Augustine: but according to the intention of the Philosopher the example is given, who wishes that there are two souls. And if each part does not recover, he says this is due to the defect of organs necessary for life, such as the organ by which food is taken, and by which it is digested, and from which spirit arises, and the like.

To what is further posited, that he resumes again, not except by uniting to himself, whence since union destroys nothing, etc. I say, that that man will not be assumed, but yet by infinite power he could be assumed, and then by accident personality would be destroyed, just as division was made by accident.

And these positions are vain and according to a merely phantastic understanding.

Articulus 13 — Whether This Should Be Conceded, the Divine Nature Is Incarnate

Whether this is to be conceded, the Divine nature is incarnate?

Then, it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, around the middle: For we affirm the whole nature or substance of the deity to be united to human nature.

For what is simple does not seem to have parts. What then does it mean when it says, the whole nature of the deity?

Solution: It says, whole, on account of the modes of signifying through attributes, such as wisdom, power, and the like.

Articulus 14 — Whether the Divine Nature Ought to Be Said to Be Made Flesh

Whether the divine nature ought to be said to be made flesh?

It is asked whether the same divine nature ought to be said to be made flesh?

It seems, however, that it should be: because
1. It is conceded by almost all moderns that the divine nature is incarnate: because it assumed in such a way that it was in the flesh itself: therefore it is incarnate. And similarly also the Son of God assumed flesh to be in flesh: therefore he is incarnate.

Further, it follows from this that the Son of God is made flesh, because the Word was made flesh: therefore it seems similarly to follow from the other side, the divine nature is incarnate: therefore it is made flesh.

1. Furthermore, if this is admitted by some, why is this not similarly admitted, the divine nature is born, suffered, and died: just as the Son of God is born, suffered, and died?

For it seems that it follows. For the divine nature is really and not accidentally the Son of God: and the Son of God is not accidentally, but truly and really born, suffered, and died: therefore the divine nature is born, suffered, and died, as it seems; for in the process nowhere does it seem that the assumption of something extraneous or accidental in the predicament intervenes.

Solution I say without prejudice, that I think this should be conceded, the divine nature is incarnate, because this is written by Damascene, and the authority is placed here in the Letter; for it has two senses, and in one it is true, and this suffices for the truth of the proposition. For incarnate says nothing other than the assumption of flesh, in which flesh the one assuming is, whether he assumes to himself in himself, or assumes to himself not by himself, but in his hypostasis in which the nature is full and perfect: and for the other part it is verified of the nature: because he united flesh to himself not in himself, but in the hypostasis and assumed it.

But this seems to me to be denied, the divine nature is made flesh. For since this can have only two senses, in both it is false concerning the nature and the person. These are the two senses. The first, that the making is noted, whose according to the intellect is made, to be placed around the divine, as around its subject: and thus it is false concerning the nature and person: for thus neither is the divine nature made flesh, nor is the Son of God made flesh. The second sense is, that made places its making around another nature which is assumed, so that the sense is, the divine nature is made flesh, that is, flesh is made the divine nature, or it is made that the divine nature is flesh: then it is false concerning the divine nature because of excessive expression, as the Master says, but it is true concerning the person: for the Son is made man, and it is made that the Son of God is flesh or man. There are indeed those who concede it in the second sense: because the divine nature is man who is made: although it should rather be denied because of the expression and because of the simple who would take it in that sense, that the making is placed around it.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not similar concerning the Word and nature: because the Word united the nature to himself and in himself: but the nature united to himself, not in himself, but in the person. But if it is objected that nature is the same as person, it is ridiculous: since this has often been solved in the first book of the Sentences, that they differ greatly in the mode of attributing, although they are the same in reality.

To the other it must be said that although this is conceded by some, the divine nature is made flesh, under one sense: yet it is not conceded that it is born: because nativity is a property of this man according to human nature, and similarly suffered, and died: whence since the natures are discrete and disparate, the divine nature is excluded from such predicates.

To the first objection, it must be said that the extraneous is taken in two ways, namely for the sake of the person, and for the sake of the nature which is in the person. Therefore, when it is said, the divine nature is the Son of God, here it is predicated for the sake of the thing of nature: and when it is said, the Son of God is born, here the predicate, although it is not extraneous to the Son from the side of the person, yet it is contrary for the sake of the nature in which the person in the prior proposition was predicated of the divine nature: and therefore an accident falls in the process of that argumentation.

Articulus 15 — Why the Person Is Repugnant to Unibility

Why does personhood oppose unibility?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

Therefore, indeed, he did not assume the person of a man, etc.

The reasoning of the Master is the same as ours above, that never did body and soul make one by their own singularity.

If it is asked, Why does personhood thus oppose unibility?

To this it must be said that personhood, by its own understanding, posits itself as one per se; it also posits per se incommunicability to another: because it is not in the potentiality of another, nor of another as a predicate, as was said above. Similarly, it posits singularity of itself. And these are three things, namely unity, singularity, and incommunicability. And unity is from matter: because the same is one in number and matter, as the Philosopher says. Singularity, however, is from individuating factors. Incommunicability, however, is from the distinction ultimately completing and perfecting. Hence, since that conjunction from body and soul is not one nor was it one per se, nor distinct per se, but united to another in the singularity of another and personal distinction, it is clear that personhood could not be assumed, and that the intellect of personhood expressly opposes assumption.

Articulus 16 — Whether A Soul Separated From The Body Is A Person

Whether the soul separated from the body is a person?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

For separated from the body, it is a person, just as an Angel.

For the soul, even when separated, according to its definitive substance is the actuality of an organic physical body having life in potentiality: therefore it seems that there is an essential dependence of it on the body: therefore it cannot be incommunicable to another incommunicability: therefore the soul is not a person: and this all concede.

However, if we wish to sustain the Master, then it must be said that the soul is said to be separated from the body in two ways, namely separated, that is, divided from the body: and thus it is not true. Or, separated from the body, that is, from the order to the body: and then the Master speaks hypothetically, namely if it is posited to be separated from the dependence which it has on the body: because then it will be a certain intelligence of a nature similar to Angels.

DISTINCTIO VI

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT,

From the premises, however, emerges the question, etc. Here begins the part in which the Master begins to treat of the things consequent to the union.

Now, the consequents that follow the union are, as the terms of the union itself, such as God being man, and conversely: and man and God being two, or one: and the union having been made in nature, or in supposit, or in person. And the Master treats of these consequents first.

There are also consequents not as terms, but as properties of such a union, such as omniscience, and being the head of the Church, and being fearful with natural fear, and concerning merit, and the like, about which the Master treats later.

It is therefore divided into two parts, of which the first treats of the consequents of the union in the first way: and this contains two distinctions. In the second, it treats of the consequents of the union in the second way: and this begins in distinction VII, there, A, After the aforesaid, it ought to be inquired, etc.

In the first of these, there are two parts: in the first of which it contains this question, Whether it ought to be conceded, Man or this man has been made God, just as conversely it is conceded? and, What is predicated, when it is said, God is man, or made man? And moreover, in the second part, it contains the distinction of three opinions on this question, there, B, For others say in the incarnation of the Word itself, etc.

And this is further divided into three distinct opinions, which are easy to distinguish in the text.

In the second, however, the Master sets forth the responses of these opinions to the question made: and this begins in distinction VII, there, A, According to the first it is said, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether This Should Be Conceded, the Son of God Was Made Man

Is this to be conceded, the Son of God was made man?

However, a doubt arises here concerning the first part of the first distinction regarding that proposition which the Master says is conceded by all, namely, God was made man, or the Son of God was made man, or God is man, or the Son of God is man: because in all of these there is the same reason for doubt.

However, it seems that this is false, God was made man, or the Son of God was made man: which nevertheless the Master says is conceded by all.

1. For everything made is the terminus of some becoming which is posited concerning that which is made, or concerning some part of its nature. Therefore, when it is said, the Son of God was made man, "made" indicates the terminus of some becoming which by the power of the expression is posited concerning the Son of God or God: but no becoming can be posited concerning God or the Son of God: therefore the expression is false.

If it is said that it is not inconvenient that some becoming is noted to be posited concerning the Son of God. On the contrary: Everything that becomes is changed and is imperfect: but God is not changed, nor is He imperfect in any respect: therefore no becoming can be posited concerning Him. Likewise, What becomes is not among the permanent things: therefore if the Son of God becomes, He is not, which is false.

1. Likewise, when it is said, Iron was made a knife, it is noted that iron was the subject of the becoming of the knife, as matter: therefore similarly when I say, the Son of God was made man, it is noted by the power of the expression that the Son of God is subjected to the becoming itself, as matter: and thus it would follow that the Son of God in the man Christ would be material, and man formal, which is absurd: therefore that proposition is false.
2. Likewise, Everything made is the complement of that which is made, and of no other: therefore if the Son of God was made man, "man" will be called by the power of the expression the complement with respect to the Son of God becoming, which is false: therefore that proposition is not to be conceded, as it seems.

Further inquiry is made about this, God is man, which he says is conceded by all opinion.

For it seems to be false: 1. For nothing is predicated univocally of God and creature: but when it is said, Peter is man, John is man, "man" is predicated univocally. Therefore, by this reason, it ought not to be predicated of God: therefore this is false, God is man.

1. Likewise, If something inheres in something, or is predicated of something, and it did not always inhere, it indicates that a change has been made concerning it: God is man, and He was not always man: therefore He has been changed from this that He is man: but this is false, because God is immutable: therefore God is not man.

2. Likewise, When it is said, God is man: either "man" is predicated essentially of "God," or accidentally. If accidentally. On the contrary: Avicenna says, What is in itself a substance, with respect to nothing can it be an accident: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, if it is predicated with respect to something as an accident, in itself it is not a substance, which is false: because man is a substance: therefore it cannot be predicated accidentally. But if it is predicated essentially of God, it necessarily agrees essentially with every suppositum of the subject, just as when it is said, man is animal: because animal is predicated essentially of every suppositum of man: therefore every suppositum of God would be man: but the Father is a suppositum of God: therefore the Father is man. Likewise, the Holy Spirit is a suppositum of God: therefore the Holy Spirit is man, which is false: therefore this is false, God is man, from which that follows, as it seems.
3. Likewise, In Topics four kinds of predicates are distinguished, namely accidental converted, and accidental not converted, substantial converted, and substantial not converted. However, the predication of species and difference are reduced to substantial not converted.

Therefore, it is asked, in which of these predicates is the predicate of this proposition, God is man? If it is said, that in accidental, either in not converted, or in converted. If in the first way, then man ought not to be predicated of God except denominatively or by inherence. But if denomination could be made, then either it could be said that God is not man, but humanized, which is false: or it ought to be said that it inheres in God as an accident, and it ought not to be said man, which again is false. But if it is an accidental converted predicate. On the contrary: That is converted with the subject with a distributive sign: just as man is risible, I can say, every man is risible, and everything risible is man. Therefore, if we say thus, God is man, it will be, Every man is God, which is false: therefore it will not be such a predicate. Furthermore, Boethius says about such a predicate, that it flows from the essential principles of the subject: therefore according to this man flows from the principles as a passion of God, which is most absurd. But if it is substantial: either converted, or not converted. If converted: therefore man will be the definition of God, which is absurd. But if it is not converted, then it will be genus, or difference, or species. But on the contrary: In all such predicates the form of the subject and the form of the predicate posit and say necessary and natural coherence both of inferiors and superiors: but deity which is the form of the subject does not posit such coherence with the form of the predicate, but rather disparity: therefore it is not such a predicate: therefore this expression, God is man, and God was made man, is false, as it seems.

1. Likewise, When it is said, God is man, and when it is said, Peter is man, whatever universally by the grace of the supposita of man is predicated of man, all can be said of the subject, as man is risible, and substance, and suchlike, all are said of Peter: therefore similarly when it is said, God is man, everything that is universally predicated of the predicate can be said of the subject: but man is created: therefore God is created. Likewise, man is creature: therefore God is creature. Nor can it be said that here falls the fallacy of the accident: because creature and created, although they say accident, nevertheless they say inseparable accident and proper passion universally consequent to man: and in such things neither extraneous nor fallacy occurs. If it is said, that pas-

§ 1. ...[proces]sion indeed is of that which comes forth from nothing, but not of man insofar as he is man: this does not hinder the argument: because when I say, "Peter is a man," I can further infer, "and man is living, therefore Peter [is living]," and "man is corporeal, therefore Peter [is corporeal]"; and yet these things do not follow upon man insofar as he is man, although they follow upon man universally, although they do not follow upon man alone.

§ 2. If perhaps it is said that this is true: "God is created," and "God is a creature," this is nothing [i.e., invalid]: for the Master denies it below, and says it is the perfidy of Arius.

§ 3. Furthermore, if he were created: he would be created either by himself or by another. If by himself. Against this: Everything creating is; everything that is created is not: therefore the same thing is and is not, which is false. But if he is created by another: therefore there is another creating God than himself, which was disproved in the first book of the Sentences.

§ 4. Also, when it is said, "God is man," of what quantity is that proposition?

§ 5. If it is said that it is indefinite: then it will receive a universal or a particular sign. If universal, then it follows that "every God is incarnate," which is false, because the Father is not incarnate. But if it is not verified with a universal sign, then it will be verified with a particular sign, and its subcontrary will be true along with it: for then it will be in contingent matter; therefore these two will be true at the same time: "some God is man," "some God is not man"; therefore also these: "God is man" and "God is not man," by the topic from particular equipollence to the indefinite.

§ 6. If perhaps it is said that the subject is restricted by the predicate to supposit [stand] for the Son alone: this will be against the art of restrictions, where it is proved that predicates do not restrict their subjects: for otherwise, if only one, or two, or three were running, this would be true: "every man runs," because the sense would be: "every running man runs," which is false: therefore it is saying nothing to claim that the predicate restricts the subject.

§ 7. Also, when it is said, "God is man," in what matter is this proposition?

§ 8. For it will be either in natural, or impossible or remote, or contingent [matter]. If in natural: therefore the predicate always belongs to the subject, while the subject exists: therefore this was true from eternity, "God is man," because God existed from eternity, which is false. But if in remote matter: therefore the predicate cannot cohere to the subject: and it is signified to cohere; therefore the statement is false. But if in contingent, then the predicate can be separated from the subject, and the same God in person who is man can be non-man: just as the same Peter in person can be white and can be non-white, which is false: therefore that statement ought to be simply denied.

§ 9. Also, there are two modes of predicating, namely by cause, and by the coherence of the predicate with the subject. By cause, as when it is said: "the sun is hot." By coherence, as it is said: "man is white."

§ 10. And let it be asked which of these modes is in this [proposition], when it is said, "God is man"? If by cause, then the sense is: "God is man," that is, the cause of man: therefore according to this he could be called a lion and an Angel, because he is the cause of the Angel. If in the second mode, then humanity coheres to God: but humanity is not deity: therefore a form extraneous to deity is in God: which cannot be, because thus he would be composed of disparate forms, which is against Hilary saying: "God, who is spirit, is not out of disparate things."

§ 11. FURTHERMORE it is asked concerning the converses of these propositions, namely, "man was made God," and "man is God": for even those opinions concede these converses; and therefore it is necessary to inquire about them before we descend to distinguishing the opinions.

§ 12. For it is asked first concerning this: "Man was made God." For it seems that it is false: for when something is being made (in fieri), it is not under the same form in its being made and in its having been made (facto esse): therefore since it is in being made, that is, in union with the form of man, by a perfect union it is not under that [form]: and thus Christ was not man when he was united, which is heresy, because today he is true man, and always was from the moment he assumed human nature.

§ 13. Also, when it is said, "Man was made God," man is noted as pre-existing before the making itself, the terminus of which is "to have been made": just as I say, "iron was made a knife"; but he was not man before the union: therefore since this is noted, by virtue of that statement, that statement will be false.

§ 14. It is also asked concerning this: "Man is God." Either this is by virtue of the union, or by virtue of the coherence of the union. If in the first mode. Against this: God and man are more distant than affirmation and negation concerning the same thing. If therefore by no power are affirmation and negation conjoinable concerning the same thing, and according to the same thing, by no power will God and man be in the same thing, and according to the same hypostasis.

§ 15. But if it is said that the proposition is verified on account of the coherence of the terms, it is ridiculous: because deity and humanity are disparate.

§ 16. Solution. Without prejudice, on account of the errors intruding themselves here, it is necessary to respond to the aforesaid arguments cautiously, so that the truth of faith is entirely held rather than Aristotle, the prince of the Philosophers: because it is no wonder if the incarnation holds within itself something contrary to the art [of logic], which could not be investigated even by a genius supported by grace: whence John the Baptist says: "There comes after me one stronger than I, the strap of whose sandals I am not worthy to stoop down and loose." We will, however, save the art as much as is possible.

§ 17. I say therefore, that without doubt this is to be conceded, as the Master says: "God was made man," and "the Son of God was made man"; for the reason that it has two senses of truth. For if the word factus determines the word homo, it is true under this sense: "God was made man," that is, "God was made the man who was made"; and this immediately appears true to everyone. If therefore the word factus is referred outside the proposition to the making (fieri) whose terminus is factus, so that the sense is: "God was made man," that is, "something was made by which God is man, because a union was made by which God is man": then again it is true, and "having been made" (factum) places its making (fieri) around that which in the union was subjected to the Holy Spirit, and this was human nature. But if the word factus were to place its making (fieri) around God, or the Son of God, it would not be conceded in that way, and the objection proceeds in that sense. Now, in the middle sense it seems to be explained in the Text thus: "God was made man, or began to be man, and he did not begin to be man, except through the fact that something was made by which he then was man, and before this he was not man." Whence that statement, since it is verified in a twofold sense, is conceded by every opinion.

§ 18. To the next, it must be said that it is not similar concerning this: "iron becomes a knife": because iron is the matter of the knife; because matter of its own nature is subjected to the making itself; therefore it seems from its nature that the making is placed around it: but this is not so in this [proposition], "God was made man," or "the Son of God."

§ 19. To the next, it must be said in the same way, that "having been made" is the complement of that which is being made, when the making is noted to be placed around it, as in natural generation, or motion: but here it is not so.

§ 20. To that which is further asked concerning this: "God is man," it must be said that nothing is predicated univocally of God as he is God, and of a creature as it is a creature: because I readily concede this, that man in the same ratio [concept/definition] is predicated of Christ as of others. And if it is objected through John Damascene, that in the Lord Jesus a common species is not to be found, it was solved above, where that authority was explained.

§ 21. To the next, it must be said that that argument does not proceed: because it does not follow that if something is predicated of God which was not always predicated, that he himself has been changed. For this proposition, "Something belongs to God which does not always belong," has two causes of truth: one of which is, if God has been changed, the proposition is true. The second is, if something has been changed towards him, again it is true: and then it does not follow that he himself has been changed, but that something has been changed towards him. Whence in that argumentation there is the fallacy of the consequent, and there is an instance [counter-example]: "God is in this created soul now essentially, by presence, and by power: and he was not always in it: therefore he has been changed"; so it is also here. Beyond this it follows that he is with the man Christ through union.

§ 22. TO THE NEXT it must be said that when it is said, "God is man," the word homo is predicated essentially. And for this, something must be understood: that when it is said, "God is man," or "the Son of God is man," this term, "God," is subjected for the sake of the suppositum, and not for the sake of what is signified by the term: and this is compelled by the predicate, as is proved below. Just as when it is said, "man runs," by virtue of the predicate this term, "man," stands for the suppositum to which running belongs; so when it is said, "God is man," by virtue of the predicate this term, "man," stands for the suppositum.

§ 23. And if it is objected that it is against the art [of logic] that an essential predicate should compel a term to stand for the suppositum: because an essential predicate notes coherence to the signified primarily, and to the suppositum as a consequence: for when I say, "Socrates is an animal," it is not said, "Socrates is an animal," except through the fact that he is a man. If, I say, it is objected in this way, I respond that this is true in those predicates which are taken from the form of the whole, which is a genus, or species, or difference with respect to the subject: but this predicate "man," when it is said, "God is man," is not such a predicate that it is essential to the subject by reason of being a genus, species, or difference: but it is essential as having been made essential through another; and therefore it compels the subject to stand for that in which the union was made, which makes the predicate itself essential.

§ 24. And thus it is evident that it does not follow that it can stand for just any suppositum: rather, it will not appellate [refer to] any except that suppositum in which the essential union was made: and then it does not follow: "therefore the Father is man," or "the Holy Spirit is man."

§ 25. To the next, it must be said that it is reduced to an essential predicate, not converted, but by the reason already stated it cannot be inferred, "Every God is man," even if grammar were to admit this [expression], "every God": because in the second distinction of the first book of the Sentences it was proved that the word "God" does not receive a distributive sign, or a particular or plural number.

§ 26. To the next, it must be said that this is to be simply called false: "God is created," and "God is a creature," unless a determination is added, as the Master will teach below. Nor is it similar when it is said: "God is man," and "Man is a creature, therefore God is a creature." For although man is a creature, nevertheless "man" from its own concept does not import anything contrary to the signified of this term, "God": but rather it imports from its own concept something unitable to the divine nature and deity, and through this it compels this term, "God," to appellate the suppositum of the Son, as was said before. But this term, "created," or "made," or "creature," from its own concept imports this which is common to the Trinity: because to make and to create are works of the essence: and therefore they respect this term, "God," for the sake of the signified: whence opposites are posited concerning the same thing: therefore the statement is false. Nor is it valid that if "being a creature" follows universally upon "being a man," that on account of this, of whatever in any case "man" is predicated, "creature" (for a sheer making) should also be predicated. And this is so because "man" is not predicated for its own sake, but for the sake of the union that was made: for this term, "man," does not have it from its own signified that it is God, but rather from the union made in the hypostasis.

§ 27. To the next, it must be said that when it is said, "God is man," it is not a proposition of any quantity: and this happens on account of the nature of this term, "God," which says neither a universal nor a singular. Now, that it does not say a universal is evident: because a universal is in many by intention, and divided from them by being; but God has a signified communicable indeed to many, but singular in being: because the three persons according to deity have the same being. That it is not a singular is evident: because no singular is communicable to many, neither in reality nor in reason: therefore it cannot be said that it is a proposition of any quantity. Nor is it indefinite, and therefore the arguments from the particular to the indefinite do not proceed. Yet, lest we seem to flee the argument, it must be said that this is true, "God is man," and this is false, "God is not man." For as Boethius says: "Subjects are such as predicates have permitted them to be"; and this always holds as to this: that the subject is compelled by the predicate to stand either for the subject, or for the suppositum, or for both. For when it is said, "man runs," the predicate always compels the subject to stand for the suppositum. And similarly in the negative, when it is said, "man does not run." Therefore similarly when it is said, "God is man": since the predicate is not essential to the subject by nature, but by the union which was made in the hypostasis, it compels the subject to stand for the suppositum in which that union was made. Therefore, if it is denied, it will be denied by reason of the same hypostasis: because it does not respect any other except that in which the union was made. Therefore these two, "God is man," and "God is not man," are not opposed except as affirmation and negation concerning the same thing: since therefore this is true, "God is man," this will be false, "God is not man."

§ 28. But to that which is objected, that predicates do not restrict subjects, it must be said that although they do not restrict in the number of supposita, they nonetheless restrict for the sake of the signified or the suppositum, and compel [them] to stand for the signified or the suppositum, as is evident in these: "man is the most worthy of creatures," and "man is an animal," and "man runs"; in all of which the subject is respected by the predicate, and on account of a respect of this kind it is compelled to have personal or non-personal supposition. And so it is in this statement, "God is man," except only for this, that the predicate of this statement does not have this from the nature of the signified, but from the union which was made in one hypostasis alone: and therefore it does not respect the subject except only for the sake of that, and in the negative similarly. And it is similar if we posit only one to be snub-nosed: as when it is said, "man is snub-nosed," the statement is true, and the subject is respected for the sake of that one, and it appellates him, and for him renders the statement true. That this is verified, "man is not snub-nosed," this happens because "man" is not restricted, and in another he is according to another being: which is not the case in God, or in the signified of this term, "God."

§ 29. To the next, it must be said that when it is said, "God is man," the proposition is in natural matter: but something is in natural matter in a twofold way, namely, from the natural coherence of the terms which they have from the order of their signifieds to one another, and from another [agent] making to cohere substantially those things which by nature are separated from one another, and so it is here: whence also a likeness of this cannot be found in nature. § 30. To the next, it must be said that it is not predication by cause, but by essence, as was said.

§ 31. To that which is further asked concerning the converses, namely this: "Man was made God": it seems to some that it is not to be conceded, for the reason that it seems to follow: "man was made God, therefore some man was made God," or "therefore one was made God," and thus both were disproved in the preceding distinction.

§ 32. But it seems to me, speaking without prejudice, that the Master concedes them, and even Augustine posits them: and therefore they can be received under a distinction: "man was made God," such that the word factus determines the word homo, so that the sense is: "man was made God," that is, "the man who was made [is God]"; and in this sense it is not necessary that the man pre-existed, because his having been made (factum esse) was simultaneous with his having been united, and his being made (fieri) was simultaneous with his being united. Similarly, if the word factus is referred to something understood outside the proposition, so that the sense is: "it was made that man is God," that is, "something was made, that is, the union by which man is God," it will be true.

§ 33. To the first therefore which is objected against this, it must be said that this is true when the making (fieri) is successive: because then the having been made (factum esse) is a mutation in the terminus: but it was not so in Christ; rather the whole was made simultaneously by the infinite power of the Holy Spirit. Or let it be said that if the making is distinguished by the intellect from the having been made, then the making does not posit man to be, but only the potency of man which is mutated to the form of man, but simultaneously the union and the man to God are had, and therefore both remain: because the union is not into a terminus, but rather into the singularity of a pre-existing person.

§ 34. To the next, it must be said that this is not true: because the word "man" is not said to have been made like matter, but rather like the terminus of that making which is imported by the term of the union: and to this, on the part of the assumption, the nature was subjected, and the union was terminated in a perfect united man: not such that it was successively made there in time, but on the part of the natural order it is prior to assume a body and a soul, than to have a perfect united man.

§ 35. To that which is further asked concerning this: "Man is God," it must be said that this is absolutely true.

§ 36. But to the objection against this, it must be said that in one respect affirmation and negation are more distant, in another respect God and man are more distant. For if the nature of opposition between being and non-being is considered, affirmation and negation are simply more opposed than God and man, and therefore they are not verified simultaneously, nor can they be conjoined; but God and man can well be conjoined. But if the proportion of dignity between the extremes is considered, then God is more distant from any created thing than affirmation and negation [are from each other].

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

§ 37. For some say in the very incarnation of the Word, etc. Here the Master approaches the first opinion: and as it seems to me, this opinion is divided into two parts: in the first of which its positions are posited, in the second the confirmations of its positions, namely there: And lest they be thought to have spoken only from their own sense, etc.

§ 38. Note that four positions of this opinion can be extracted from the Text from the prior chapter, in which the positions are posited : the first of which is that man is assumed: and this is extracted from what the Master says, there: They concede also that man assumed by the Word, etc. The second is there, that both of these propositions are true: "God was made man," and conversely: and this is extracted, there: And for that reason they hand down that it was said, God was made man, etc. The third, that Christ is two supposita, and not only two persons: and this is extracted from what he says at the beginning of the chapter: A certain man from a rational soul, etc. And it is confirmed by the authority of Augustine: Both are one: but one thing on account of the Word, namely God assuming, and another thing on account of the assumed man. The fourth is that when it is said, "God is man" or "this man," that suppositum has only two substances in itself, namely of body and soul, and is not subsisting from three: and that is extracted at the end of the chapter, there: And when they say that man, etc. For this fourth position is the cause of the third, why they say Christ to be two supposita: and therefore I have joined them here, although the third is taken from the beginning of the first chapter. Moreover, from these follows the fifth position, by which they respond to the question posed to those who are of this opinion, namely that when it is said, "The Son of God is man," that something is predicated there, because the suppositum of man is united to the Word or Son of God: because the suppositum is in two substances, namely of soul and body.

§ 39. This therefore is the sentence of the two chapters, which are posited in the first part of the distinction.

Articulus 2 — How the Thing of Nature, Supposit, Substance, Hypostasis, Individual, and Person Differ

Thing of nature, suppositum, substance, hypostasis, individual, and person: how do they differ?

§ 40. But here a question occurs concerning three things: the first of which is, what difference is there between thing of nature (res naturae), suppositum, hypostasis, substance, individual, and person? The second is, in which of them was the union made, and in which not? The third is, whether this is true, that Christ is two or one? and, which two is Christ himself, if he is two?

§ 41. To the FIRST it is proceeded thus: When "thing of nature" is said, it is understood in two ways, that is, a thing intended by nature, and [a thing] constituted by an act of nature: therefore a thing of nature is that which is closer and more immediate to generation: since therefore it generates per se here and now, a thing of nature is nothing other than something constituted through the act of generation in that nature, namely this something (hoc aliquid), and this is to be conceded.

§ 42. FURTHERMORE, when it is said, "Peter is a man," "John is a man," and "Thomas is a man": what "man" is is common to them, and by one ratio it is common to them: therefore each one of them has a similar respect to the other towards the common nature which is signified in "man." Therefore from this similarity of respect another community of proportion to one is caused, namely that just as one is supposited to the common nature, so also is the other: and from this they receive the community of the suppositum: such that each one is a suppositum of man: therefore the suppositum is said to be standing under a common nature: and this is also to be conceded. § 43. Also, that which stands under a common nature is indeed distinct through matter: but since it is a suppositum, it is distinguishable through individuating accidents. Since therefore substance is properly that which substands the person and accidents, substance will be distinct through this matter, but distinguishable through accidents and not distinct through them: and this is also to be conceded.

§ 44. Hypostasis is the same in Greek as such a substance is among us.

§ 45. FURTHERMORE, an individual, according to the Philosopher, is distinct by a collection of accidents which cannot be found in another: yet it is not necessarily a person: because an individual, although it is distinct, is not necessarily of a rational nature.

§ 46. And therefore a person is still of greater concretion, namely that it is in a natural dignity which is of a rational nature, distinct by a property making it incommunicable in three modes, namely that it is not communicable as a part, as the soul and body are: and that it is not communicable as a universal, like what is predicated of many: and that it is not communicable through union into the singularity of another, as we said in the preceding distinction: and this is to be conceded.

§ 47. Therefore from this it is evident that these are ordered: that first is the constituted thing of nature, second the suppositum, third indeed the hypostasis, fourth the individual, fifth the person.

§ 48. And through these things the solution of the first is evident.

Articulus 3 — In Which of the Aforementioned the Union Was Effected

In which of the aforesaid was the union made?

§ 49. To the SECOND doubt, namely in which of them the union was made, it is proceeded thus:

§ 50. 1. A thing of nature is not repugnant to any communicability: therefore it seems that the union is not necessarily in it. PROOF. For in a nature, for the reason that it is not repugnant to communicability, therefore the union is not made in it: therefore neither in a thing of nature, as it seems.

§ 51. But that a thing of nature is not repugnant to communicability is evident. A thing of nature seems to be a composite: but a composite is united and assumed. PROOF. Above we frequently had that he assumed a body and a soul, and these conjoined. Since therefore those composites are things of nature, as it seems, it seems that the union was not made in the thing of nature just as neither in the nature.

§ 52. 2. In the same way it seems that neither is it in the suppositum: because a suppositum means something posited under a common nature: but something is posited under a common nature, which is the nature of man in Christ: and that is not in the same order posited under the divine nature. For as the natures to which the supposita substand are related, so are the supposita which are posited under them related: but the natures are diverse: therefore the supposita will also be diverse, as it seems.

§ 53. 3. Also, of diverse natures and those not posited subalternately there are necessarily diverse supposita: therefore although the natures are united in Christ, nevertheless because they retain their diversity, they will have diverse supposita: and thus the union will not be in the suppositum.

§ 54. 4. Also, whatever things are one in suppositum, of those things there is necessarily one respect to the nature to which that suppositum substands: therefore by the destruction of the consequent, those to which there is no one respect to the superior nature, of those there is not one suppositum: but of this man and this God there is no one respect to the nature, just as there is not one nature: therefore of those there is not one suppositum: therefore the union is not in the suppositum.

§ 55. 6. Furthermore, the nature and ratio of a suppositum is not repugnant to communicability by mode of a part: for if I say, "this hand," the pronoun, namely "this," tells me the suppositum of the hand: and yet it is a part of man: therefore the ratio of a suppositum is not an incommunicable ratio: therefore it seems that it holds itself on the part of the nature, and not on the part of the person. Since therefore the union was made in the person, it seems Christ is two supposita.

§ 56. Furthermore it is asked concerning the individual. For an individual seems to be distinguished by a collection of accidents which cannot be found in another: but those accidents are either of nature, or adventitious by accident. If they are of nature or natural, it follows (as it seems) that Christ is not one individual. For the natural properties of that which is man are not the properties of that which is the Son of God: therefore they do not communicate [share] in individuating features: therefore they are not one individual.

§ 57. But concerning the union in the person, it was held in the preceding distinction.

§ 58. Solution. Modern doctors almost all belong to the second opinion, and not to the first: because without a doubt it cannot be reasonably sustained. Yet he uses the arguments already induced, supposing that this man, not insofar as he is man, but demonstrating Christ, is not constituted from two natures and three substances, but only from two substances and one nature of man, such that no force is placed on the word "from" (ex): because no opinion says that there a composition is made with respect to some third thing: but this second opinion posits an exigitive [demanded] composition in the man Christ: because the exigitive has as many substances in itself as the redeemer demands: for the redeemer both owes and is able [to pay]: whence it is demanded that he have a nature by which he owes, and this is human; and a nature by which he is able, and this is divine: and to posit such a composition in the Son of God is not unfitting. And therefore I do not wish to solve for the first opinion, because I think that it is false.

§ 59. I respond to the first, that the union is in the thing of the nature of man, and of the suppositum, and of the hypostasis, and of the individual, and of the person. For if it were only in the person and not in the others, it would be necessary that this man and this God would not be one, except only in a personal property: and this is ridiculous, namely that they would not agree except in a certain accident. In the same way, if they were united only in the ratio of an individual, they would not be one by nature, but only in a collection of accidents. In the same way, if they agree in hypostasis, and not in the thing of nature, the agreement will be in the act of substanding to the nature: and this is not intelligible, that that which is something would not be the same and one with that "this something" (hoc aliquid), since the supposita are not diverse. Similarly, it is not intelligible how the supposita could be diverse, and yet the hypostasis one. And furthermore it cannot be understood how the hypostasis could be diverse, and not the individuals. And if the individuals are posited as diverse, it is not understood how the person could be one.

§ 60. And therefore I say that Christ did not assume a man, nor a suppositum, etc., but all these he united to himself into the singularity of the person. And I say that the thing of nature is not distinct by being from the Son of God, and it is incommunicable by the incommunicability of the Son of God, and not by another in Christ. But in others, a thing of nature is incommunicable through this matter, just as the suppositum, and the individual, and the person.

§ 61. To the next, it must be said that the supposita are united: for although the respect of this man insofar as he is this man, and of this God insofar as he is this God, to the nature of man and to the nature of God, is not one, not on account of this is this suppositum any less that [same] suppositum: and from this it follows that by reason of the twofold nature it substands to both natures: for the respect is in the suppositum not from whence it is "this something" (hoc aliquid), but also from the fact that it is "this something" of this nature. And therefore the terminus to the nature is varied on account of the diversity of the natures in Christ: whence since that respect of supposition is a consequence of the suppositum, from the nature a diversity remains in the respect, just as in other accidents of the natures: but yet the union will be in that which is the suppositum.

§ 62. To the next, it must be said that this is false, in Christ, that just as the nanatures, etc. Because in Christ there are diverse and distinct natures, yet not [diverse and distinct] supposits: and this is caused by something else, namely by the union. But the proposition is true in those things in which the being of the supposit is entirely one nature. But this is not the case in Christ: rather, it is in this that that opinion errs, because the being of this or that supposit is not from one nature, but from two, because this man has the being of a man unitively, and not confusedly or mixedly.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that it is not true, unless those natures remain separate from each other, such that they are not united into one hypostasis or supposit: this is not true in Christ, as has already been said.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that it is not necessary that things whose supposit is one must have one relationship to the common nature: because if one supposit is, through its proper being, in two natures, then it is subjected [to them] by a twofold relationship, and yet remains one.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the rationale of a supposit is repugnant to communicability: because that is a supposit which has the form of a nature particularized over this matter: and this is one thing constituted in itself and divided from others. Since, therefore, there are not two such things in Christ, it must be that that [supposit] is one through the being of the Son of God: because it is not of the nature, but rather stands under it. For otherwise something would be truly predicated of this man which would not be predicated of the Son of God, which is contrary to Augustine. For this is true: "this man is a supposit of human nature and a thing of nature"; hence it is necessary that this be true: "the Son of God is a supposit of human nature and a thing of human nature."

§ 4. To what is further asked about the individual, I say in the same way that there are not two individuals in Christ: for although the properties are not the same, just as the natures are not, nevertheless the properties of both are denominatively predicated of this man, and of the Son of God. For such is that union (as Augustine says) that would make God man, and man God: and the properties of one are said of the other, and conversely: hence it is said, "God was born, suffered, was weary, sorrowing," and the like; and "man is the creator, the governor of the world," and all such things. And therefore it must not be said that Christ was ever a "this something" (hoc aliquid) or one supposit, or an individual by a proper unity and singularity that belonged to human nature: but he was always a "this something" by both the unity and singularity of the divine person.

Articulus 4 — Whether Christ Is in Some Way Two, and Whether He Had Only One Being Whether Christ is in some way two? And, whether he had only one being (esse)?

Whether Christ is in some way two? And, whether he had only one being?

§ 5. Thirdly, it is asked whether Christ is in some way two, as this opinion says?

§ 6. And it seems that he is: 1. For Damascene says that difference is the cause of number. Therefore, a multitude of number follows from a multitude of differences. But in Christ there are two differentiating things according to being (esse) and making being; therefore they make two beings. But from a plurality of being a thing is two or more; therefore Christ is two.

§ 7. 2. Also, Cassian in the sixth book against Nestorius says thus: "Because you say that the nativity ought to be consubstantial (homoousion) with the parent: I say that by the diversity of persons our Lord Jesus Christ was consubstantial (homoousion) with both the Father and the mother equally: he renders to each parent his own likeness." From this it also seems that not only are there two, but even diverse persons.

§ 8. Further, it is asked whether Christ had only one being (esse)?

§ 9. And it seems that he did: because being belongs to the hypostasis: and there is only one hypostasis; therefore there is only one being.

§ 10. Also, being belongs to what is complete and distinct: but there is only one complete and distinct thing there; therefore there is only one being.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 11. 1. It is unintelligible how there are two essences making being, and yet only one being.

§ 12. 2. Furthermore, essence is not in the hypostasis except through being: if therefore there is one being, it seems there is only one essence according to nature, which is false.

§ 13. Solution: To this it must be said without prejudice that Christ's being in the hypostasis is only one, which is made from two natures unconfusedly united in that hypostasis: because we posit according to the second opinion that this demonstrated [individual] is constituted from three substances and two natures; and this is confirmed by the authority of Boethius and Cassian.

§ 14. For Boethius says thus in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ: "The nature of Him who alone is God came together with human nature, which was dissimilar from it: and thus from distant natures the one person of Christ was made by the coupling of divinity and humanity." From this it is accepted that the supposit of the person of Christ is posited as supposit in two natures existing essentially in Christ.

§ 15. Moreover, Cassian in the sixth book against Nestorius says thus: "The same our Lord Jesus Christ, born man and God, had in Himself the property of each parent, while in that He is man, He rendered a likeness to His human mother: and in that He is God, He had the truth of God the Father."

§ 16. Thus, therefore, according to the aforesaid, I say that there is one being in Christ according to the comparison to the hypostasis to which the being belongs, although this being is of two essences which remain distinct, because this being of the one is this being of the other: and it is marvelous that the union is made in being, and not in the essences.

§ 17. Therefore, it must be said to the first that difference is the cause of number: but in being, insofar as being belongs to the hypostasis, there is no difference except through the nature, because one is united to the other, or rather one is united into the other.

§ 18. To the statement of Cassian it must be said that he does not intend that Christ is two persons, but that through two natures He is referred to two persons, which are the father and the mother. Hence Christ is not two, but one: because He is neither two persons, nor two hypostases, as is already clear from the aforesaid.

§ 19. To the objection that it is unintelligible how there is one being of the hypostasis belonging to two essences, it must be said that this is unintelligible, unless those essences are understood to be united, such that the being of one is terminated in the being which the other makes, as is the case in Christ. Hence in nature no similar thing is found to this.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that in the hypostasis there is an essence, and the being of that essence itself, that is, the being which gives the essence to the hypostasis, and they differ as effect and cause; hence that is not the nature. However, some say that the being is one, and two. Two by the number of the essences from which it is, and one by the number of the hypostasis in which it is. But the first is truer: because being is singular; but nothing befitting the person is singular, except by the singularity of the divine person.

Articulus 5 — Whether in Christ There Is One Being Simply Whether there is simply one being in Christ?

§ 21. But it is still objected against this: because 1. Peter is not the being of Peter; therefore Christ is also not the being of Christ. Therefore it seems that being belongs to the nature; therefore being is not that which the hypostasis is, and the union is only in the hypostasis; therefore there is not one being.

§ 22. 2. Also, the Son of God is His own being; this man is not his own being. Therefore the being of this man, insofar as he is this man, is one thing, and the being of the Son of God, insofar as He is such, is another. Therefore there is not one being, but two; therefore He did not become one in being.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 23. Whatever are two in being simply, they are two simply: and whatever are two simply, they are not only one. Therefore the Son of God is not only one, which is false; and this was disproved in the preceding distinction.

§ 24. Solution: Holding the truth that the union is made in the hypostasis, as is the truth, and the second opinion says there is only one being, there is simply one being of Christ. But the being of this simply is one thing, and the being of this according to this or that nature is another, and the being of this or that nature is another. For the being of this simply is the being of the person or hypostasis, according as it is a hypostasis: and this is only one in Christ. And this can be clear from the fact that the Catholic faith says that that union was made in being. For if it was made in being, it will be made in some being, and not except in the being of the hypostasis. Therefore the being of this hypostasis resulting from that union is one: for whatever things are united, are one.

§ 25. Also, of one hypostasis there is only one being. But Christ is only one hypostasis; therefore Christ has only one being simply: because the being of a thing of nature or of a hypostasis is the being of the whole: and this is being simply.

§ 26. But being according to this or that nature is being taken in comparison to the nature making being in the hypostasis, and on that side being is doubled in Christ. For there is in Him the being of the nature of humanity, and the being of the nature of deity. And if we wished to speak properly, then we would say that He would have in such a consideration not two beings, but a single twofold being in that which constitutes being.

§ 27. The being of the nature is the being which the nature has in itself: for every thing has its own being. The being of human nature in Christ is not the being of the nature of God, nor are those beings two just as the natures [are two].

§ 28. Therefore, to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that Christ is not His own being: this happens, not according as He is a hypostasis of divine nature, but because there is absolute simplicity there: but this is not [the case] in the hypostasis of man, because that hypostasis is posited to be in two natures and three substances.

§ 29. However, it must be known that, saving that [first] opinion, there would be a twofold being there: because it says that when this man is posited as a supposit, there is posited in Him only a twofold substance, namely of flesh and soul, and one nature.

Divisio Textus

But there are also others who partly consent to these, etc.

§ 30. Here begins the second opinion which almost all moderns defend: because in it the sacrament of the union is more expressed. And it has two parts: in the first of which its positions are posited; and in the second, the proofs of its positions, there, E, Concerning this Augustine in the book of the Sentences of Prosper, etc.

§ 31. But as can be gathered from the letter of the prior chapter, there are four positions of this [opinion], namely that when it is said, "this man," Christ is set as supposit in two natures, composed of three substances, namely flesh, soul, and deity: and it is extracted at the beginning of the chapter, where he says: They say that that man not from the soul, etc. The second is that Christ is only one, and not two; and it is taken there, Not as if there were two persons, etc., because in truth, as was clear above, from there being two supposits, it follows that there are two persons, since nothing is said that the union was made in personal property alone, and not in that which is a person. The third is that man is not assumed, neither this man, nor the person: and this is taken there, Therefore the person who previously was simple, etc., because they do not say that the assumed [thing], that is, the composite, to Him is anything except a nature. But the fourth is that that person is not said to be "made" absolutely unless "according to human nature" is added, or "was made composite," or the like: and this is extracted from there: And yet that person ought not to be said to have been made a person, etc.

Articulus 6 — Whether Christ Can Be Said to Be Composite

Whether Christ can be said to be composite?

§ 32. Now there are few doubts against this opinion, because it clearly contains the truth. But yet there can be a doubt about its first position, which says that Christ is composite.

§ 33. 1. For every composite unites its components into a third: but this union is made into the eternal person; therefore Christ is not composite.

§ 34. 2. Also, in every composite each of the components is a part. But deity cannot be called a part: because since every part is something less than its whole, deity would then have something greater and better, which is most inconvenient.

§ 35. Also, since every part is imperfect with respect to the whole, deity would then be imperfect, which again is false.

§ 36. To this it must be said that this opinion does not take composition according to nature, but according to the name alone, so that "composite" (compositum) is the same as "posited with another" (cum alio positum) in the same thing that was before: although in this way He was not entirely as He is now; and thus the person of Christ is composite, because He is now in two natures and three substances. Hence this opinion says that neither of the natures is a part: because deity cannot be a part, as the objections prove; and humanity, although it has parts, is nevertheless not a part: because every part has a co-part, for the reason that no one part makes a whole; hence humanity cannot be a part.

§ 37. And thus the solution is clear to the objections which proceed as if composition were properly taken according to the nature of a composite. But some call this composition "exegitive" (exegitiva), as we said in the exposition of the preceding opinion.

Articulus 7 — What the Pronoun "This" Demonstrates When "This Man" Is Said of Christ

What the pronoun "this" demonstrates when it is said, "This man," of Christ.

§ 38. There is also a doubt concerning this which this opinion posits, that when it is said, "This man," demonstrating Christ, His supposit is set in three substances and two natures, and not in human nature alone. For this seems false: for this is not held from the understanding of that which is said, "this man." For if we consider the substance of the pronoun, that is, what the pronoun supposits for, it speaks only of the supposit; but the [word] man (homo) which follows speaks of the nature for which it is supposited. Therefore it seems that by the power of the term thus complexly composed of supposit and nature, Christ is not supposited except in one nature, as the preceding opinion said, and in a twofold substance, namely in flesh and soul.

§ 39. Solution: It must be said that it is one thing in Christ, and another in other men. For when "this" is said in Christ, the supposit cannot be demonstrated except as united, or rather as one: and therefore the demonstration imports a twofold nature or relationship, of which we determine only one through the [word] man that follows, and the other is signified to be determined by the name signifying that nature which is also in Him. And therefore both are imported when it is said, "This man is this God": for in that phrase, twice in the pronouns "this" and "this," one supposit is signified, and through the following terms signifying the common nature for which it supposits, a twofold relationship of that supposit to those natures is signified: but through the middle composition [the verb "is"], the identity of the supposit in both natures is signified. And from this it is clear that this opinion alone has touched the truth.

§ 40. From these things which have been said, it is easy to understand the authorities which are introduced by this opinion.

F. The third opinion of others.

§ 41. There are also others, who in the incarnation of the Word not only deny that the person is composed of natures, but even deny that any man or even any substance is there composed or made from soul and flesh. But they say that those two, namely the soul and the flesh, are united to the person or nature of the Word in such a way that neither from those two nor from these three was any nature or person made or composed, but the Word of God was clothed with those two as with a garment, so that He might appear congruously to the eyes of mortals. And for this reason He is said to have been made a true man, because He accepted the truth of flesh and soul. Which two He is also read to have accepted into the singularity or unity of His person: not because those two, or some thing composed of them, is one person with the Word, or is the Word; but because, with those two acceding to the Word, the number of persons is not increased, so as to make a quaternity in the Trinity: and because the person of the Word itself, which was previously without a garment, is not divided or changed by the assumption of the garment, but remained one and the same immutable [person]. They say that God was made man according to habit [clothing]: for by accepting man, God is called, and was made, man: and on account of the accepted man, God is truly said to be man: and on account of the assuming God, man is said to be God. For if it were understood that God is essentially man, or man is essentially God, they say, then if God had assumed man in the female sex, the woman would also be essentially God, and conversely. But God could have assumed man in the female sex; therefore a woman could be God, and conversely.

G. He introduces authorities by which this sentence is strengthened.

§ 42. But lest these men also seem to assert merely from their own sense, they confirm what they say by bringing forth testimonies into the midst. For Augustine says in the book On the Grace of the New Testament "Just as the number of persons is not increased when flesh accedes to the soul so that there is one man, so the number of persons is not increased when man accedes to the Word so that Christ is one man. And thus God is read to be man, so that we may understand the singularity of this person, not so that we may suspect the divinity to be changed into flesh." The same author, also treating that word of the Apostle, found in habit as a man [206], manifestly shows that God is said to have been made man, or to be man according to habit, saying thus in the book of Eighty-Three Questions "We speak of habit in many ways: either a habit of the mind, as the perception of a discipline firmed by use; or a habit of the body, as when we say one is stronger than another; or a habit of those things which are accommodated to the members from the outside, as when we say someone is clothed, or shod, and the like. In all these genera it is manifest that 'habit' is said in that thing which happens or accedes to someone, in such a way that he can also not have it. But this name is derived from that verb which is habere (to have). Therefore, habit is said in that thing which either happens or accedes to us in order to be had. Nevertheless, there is this difference, because some of those things which happen or accede to make a habit are not changed, but they themselves change [the subject], remaining whole and unshaken in themselves: just as wisdom acceding to a man is not itself changed, but it changes the man, whom it makes wise from a fool. But some accede or happen in such a way that they change, and are changed: as food, which losing its species is turned into the body, and we, refreshed by the food, are changed from thinness and languor into strength and vigor. A third genus is when those things which happen or accede neither change those to which they accede, nor are they changed by them: such as a ring placed on a finger; which genus is very rarely found. A fourth genus is when those things which happen or accede are not changed in their nature, but receive another species and form: as a garment which when cast off and laid aside, does not have the form which it assumes when put on. For when put on the members it receives a form which it did not have when stripped off: which genus is congruous with this comparison. For God the Son emptied Himself, not changing His form, but receiving the form of a servant: nor was He converted or transmuted into man, having lost His immutable stability, but the Susceptor Himself was made in the likeness of men; by taking up a true man, He was found in habit as a man, that is, by having man He was found as man, not to Himself, but to those to whom He appeared in man. But that he says, as a man, expresses the truth. By the name of habit, therefore, the Apostle sufficiently signified how he said, made in the likeness of men: because He was made not by transfiguration into man, but by habit, since He put on man, whom uniting and conforming to Himself in a certain manner He might associate with immortality and eternity." By these words Augustine seems openly to intimate that God is said to have been made man according to habit. He also, wishing to express the mode of the incarnation itself to those inquiring, says in the fourth book On the Trinity "If it is asked how the incarnation was made, [I say] it itself; for these things are difficult." The same, in the book On Faith to Peter "I say the Word of God was made flesh, that is, made man: yet not converted and changed into that which He was made, but clothed with flesh so that He might appear congruously to flesh. Indeed so made, that there is not only the Word of God and the flesh of man, but also the rational soul of man. And this whole is called both God on account of God, and man on account of man. But if this is difficult to understand, let the mind be purged by faith, by abstaining from sins, and doing good works. The Son of God, though He is the eternal and true God, was made a true and full man for us. True in this, because that God has true human nature: full indeed in this, because He assumed both human flesh and a rational soul." Also, "That taking up or emptying of the highest God was nothing else than the taking up of the servile form, that is, of human nature: therefore both forms are in Christ, because both substances are true and full in Christ, namely the divine and the human nature." Also, in the book Against Maximinus "Since He was invisible through Himself, He appeared visible in man, whom He deigned to assume from a woman." Also, in the same: "We believe that Christ the Lord assumed a true man, and in him, invisible, appeared visibly to men: in him He conversed among men, in him He endured human things from men, in him He taught men." Hilary also in the book On the Trinity [207] says: "How was the Son of God born of Mary, except that the Word was made flesh, namely that the Son of God, since He was in the form of God, received the form of a servant. Yet we profess one and the same, not by the defection of God, but by the assumption of man: and that He was found in the form of God on account of the divine nature, and in the form of a servant from the conception of the Holy Spirit according to the habit of man. That habit was not only of man, but as of man: nor was that flesh the flesh of sin, but in the likeness of the flesh of sin."

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

There are also others, who in the incarnation, etc.

206. Phil 2:7.

§ 44. This is the third opinion, which is now not an opinion, but a manifest error condemned by Pope Alexander [III].

§ 45. And the treatise on this error is divided into two parts, just like those of the preceding opinions. For first he posits the chapter in which there are two positions. Secondly, authorities are introduced which seem to say this, although they do not say it.

§ 46. From the first chapter they draw seven positions of this error, which are all false. The first is that, since the natural union is twofold, namely of the soul to the flesh, and of the flesh and soul with the deity, that in Christ neither of those made any one thing: for neither did the soul and flesh when united make one man, nor did the nature of man and the Son of God when united make one person: and this is at the beginning of the chapter, there, F, There are also others, who in the incarnation of the Word, etc.

§ 47. The second position is that, with these two things accepted according to truth, Christ did not use them to make them one with Himself, but rather as a garment, so that He might appear visible in them to the eyes of mortals: and this is taken there, They say that those two, namely the soul and the flesh, are united to the person or nature of the Word.

§ 48. The third is that He was not made one with man in truth: but for this reason He is said to have been truly made, although He is not truly a man: because He accepted true flesh and soul for a garment: and this is extracted from there: And for this reason He is said to have been made a true man, etc.

§ 49. The fourth is that He did not accept these into singularity or [into] something constituted from them: but He is said to have accepted them, because with those two accepted for a garment, the number of persons is not increased: and this is drawn from there: Which two also into singularity, etc.

§ 50. The fifth is that the person was not made composite by any composition: for He did not unite these to Himself: but He is said to be made composite because He accepted the use of this garment: and this is taken there, and because the person of the Word itself, which was previously without a garment, etc.

§ 51. The sixth is that God was not essentially, that is, according to being, made man, or the Son of God is not called man [essentially], but according to the habit of man: and this is elicited from there: For by accepting man, God is called, etc., and they call "being a man" having human nature, not that by the union of soul and flesh a man was made from that nature, as is clear in the second opinion.

§ 52. The seventh and last is the cause of their statement: because it seems inconvenient to them that God could be united according to being to a creature: because if He were united to a weaker creature, then it would follow that He Himself, according to being, would be that creature; and they give the example of the female sex: and this is taken at the end of the chapter, there, For if essentially, they say, God is man, etc.

207. Hilary of Poitiers, De Trinitate, X.

§ 53. From these statements two other positions further follow: of which the first is that to say Christ is man is this, which is to have an ununited human nature. For grant that it is united: this will be against the first position. Similarly grant that it is essentially: this will be against the seventh position. Therefore it is left that He is called man for the reason that He had true human nature not united by a natural union. The second is that, because in the three days [of death] He had these ununited, He was a man in the three days: and on account of this last point, because the Master [Peter Lombard] grants this below, the Master is blamed for having been of this opinion.

§ 54. But because this error is novel, and no one has disputed against it: we will posit some reasons against these positions.

§ 55. There are three against the first [position]: because the body of a man neither senses nor lives the life of nature through the fact that it is conjoined to the soul by just any conjunction, but through the fact that it is conjoined to it as to a perfection and act. Either, therefore, Christ's body neither sensed nor lived with natural life and natural sense, or it was necessary that the soul was united to the body as the act of a proper potency or matter.

§ 56. Then one proceeds thus: Whatever two things are conjoined by a natural conjunction as matter and form, constitute a third which is neither of them. Christ's soul and body, as has been proved, are so conjoined; therefore they constitute a third which is neither of them. But this is nothing other than a man; therefore they constitute this man, which the first position denies.

§ 57. Also, this position is expressly the heresy of Pelagius. Hence Cassian in the sixth book against Nestorius "The wickedness of the Pelagian heresy, asserting a solitary man born of the Virgin, yet said he was an instructor of the human race rather than a redeemer: because he did not give redemption to men, but an example of living." If therefore no union was made to the Word, but He only thus appeared to the eyes, it is necessary that the Virgin begot only a man, or less than a man, if she begot only a part of a man, which is the body.

§ 58. Also, thirdly: because from this it follows that Christ was never a man, just as the human nature which is the body never was, nor is, nor will be a man. The Son of God never had anything except the nature without the twofold union of which it has been spoken: therefore Christ was never truly a man. It is clear, therefore, that the first position is false.

§ 59. The second [position] is proved false in this way: If He only used these two accepted according to truth so that He might appear to the eyes of mortals: then He superfluously used that which would not appear to the eyes of mortals. But the soul does not appear to the eyes of mortals; therefore He assumed it superfluously.

§ 60. Also, whatever is assumed without union to the one assuming, once the office for which it is assumed is accomplished, is laid aside: and this is proved both of the dove in which the Holy Spirit appeared, and of the voice in which the Father appeared, and of all creatures assumed in the apparitions of the Old Testament. Therefore, if the Son of God remaining [un-united] assumed such a nature only...

for the apparition, and when the apparition was enacted he laid it aside: therefore he did not rise in the same nature which he assumed. But whoever says and feels this, is anathematized by Augustine in his exposition of the council: therefore this is also a heresy.

AGAINST THE THIRD OPINION THUS: Christ was neither born nor suffered except from the union. Either from the union with the nature, or with the hypostasis of human nature. Not from the union with the nature: because the nature remains distinct, and the divine nature is neither born nor suffered. If therefore he is not essentially united in hypostasis, he himself in no way essentially truly suffered, nor was born, nor any of the other things.

AGAINST THE FOURTH OPINION: The Son of God did not take this nature into a singularity of nature nor of person, as this position says: therefore the assumed had no singularity with the assuming: therefore in no way was it one with him: therefore what is said of one is not said of the other: and this is contrary to Augustine. And in the same way it is easy to argue against others who agree with them.

Moreover, the authorities adduced for this opinion also do not seem to do anything except in two places, namely where Augustine adapts the fourth kind of habit, and says that it happens or accrues that he was found as a man, not to himself, but by men. But Augustine explains this, because he places force on the fact that he was "found": for he did not find himself, although he was truly man, because he was always known to himself: rather, others knowing him found him conversing among human affairs. And Augustine says that this happens in the similitude adduced: yet human nature does not happen to Christ as an accident, although some say it is turned into an accident: but I do not presume to say this concerning the truth of the incarnation. The second place is in the middle of the same chapter G, where he says: Therefore it is not necessary to understand the Word to be changed, etc. But indeed every man confesses that the Word is not changed, as was said above: but what he says, "as if he had assumed a habit," Augustine corrects that wherein the simile is insufficient, when he says: Although that taking up would ineffably couple—that is, unite—the taken up to the one taking.

From these, the other texts can also plainly be glossed.

DISTINCTIO VII

Divisio Textus

§ 1. But according to the first [opinion] it is said, God became man, etc. This seventh distinction corresponds to the preceding one. For here it is shown how, according to these three opinions, the above-mentioned question is answered—namely, when it is said "God became man" or "God is man," what is predicated in those locutions. And therefore it has three parts: in the first of which he touches upon the response of the first opinion. In the second, the response of the second, there at B: But in the second opinion of this distinction, etc.

§ 2. The first part is divided into two chapters, in the first of which he posits the response according to the first opinion. In the second, however, he posits an objection and solves it, there at A, §2: But to this opinion it is objected, etc.

And through this the meaning of the first part is evident.

Articulus 1 — Whether This Should Be Conceded, Man Began to Be God

Whether this must be conceded: Man began to be God?

But an objection is raised concerning what he says in the first chapter A, §1: That substance began to be God: and concerning that, God began to be a certain substance.

1. For he wishes to say by this that God began to be man, and man began to be God: but what begins, is new: therefore if man begins to be God, he begins to be new: therefore the man then was a new God: but what is new is recent: therefore he begins to be a recent God, which will be against the Psalm saying: There shall be no recent God in thee.
2. Again, what begins to be, now first is, and before this was not (in things that are permanent): because in successive things, "begins" and "ceases" must be expounded otherwise. If therefore man begins to be God, now first he is God, and before this he was not, which is against Augustine and Cassian who say that that man from eternity is God, and that he created the stars.

Solution. It must be said that the first argument does not suit this [first] opinion, but necessarily suits the second, as will be said below.

Hence it must be said to the first, that "man begins to be God" must be conceded according to this opinion which posits that when "man" is said, nothing is supposited except one nature and two substances, as was explained above. And it well follows further: therefore now first he is God, and before this he was not, if we are in the instant of the union: but it does not follow further: therefore he begins to be a new God, or something new, or something recent. Because when this was conceded, "Man begins to be God," the word "begins" posited its inception concerning the nature of the subject in comparison to the predicate: and therefore the inception was posited concerning the form of man and his union. But in the conclusion, it is noted to posit inception concerning the form of the predicate in comparison to the subject: and therefore then it is denoted that God began, and now first is, which is false. Thus one must respond according to this opinion. But it will have to be answered otherwise according to the second opinion, which alone is true among the opinions, as will be clear below.

To the other it must be said that the argument suits this [first] opinion, inasmuch as it posits that nothing is supposited when it is said, "this man", except the supposit of man insofar as it is from human nature and the double substance which is flesh and soul: and thus he was not from eternity. And therefore this opinion is contrary to the Saints, namely Augustine and Cassian. But according to the true opinion, which is the second, it supposits the divine person in human nature and a triple substance. And then one must respond otherwise to both arguments thus: that when it is said, "Man began to be God," that the word "God began" or "commenced" can note an inception concerning the reality of the subject, or of the predicate. If of the predicate, it is false. If of the subject, it is still twofold, namely that the inception can be posited concerning the supposit in comparison to the form which is signified by the name of the subject; and thus it is true under this sense: this one who is man, insofar as he is man, begins to be God. For although the supposit of the man is the divine person, as proved above, yet the form signified by "man" is nothing but humanity: and in this sense an inception is posited concerning the person by grace of humanity: and therefore it is true. But if the word "begins" posits an inception concerning the supposit absolutely, the locution is false: because then the sense is, "that one who is man begins to be God": and this is false, since he was God from eternity.

Articulus 2 — Whether Christ Insofar as Man Is Predestined

Whether Christ insofar as he is man is predestined?

Next, it is asked concerning what is held in the same chapter A, below, §1: It is rightly said that Christ, insofar as he is man, is predestined, etc.

It seems that being predestined does not belong to Christ: because

1. It does not belong to the same [subject], namely Christ, to predestine and to be predestined. The first is proved from the fact that being active belongs to God alone: but the other only belongs to a creature who is to be in grace and glory. The second is proved from the fact that the works of the Trinity are indivisible.
2. Again, Christ is the art of the Father full of the reasons of all living things, as Augustine says: therefore in Christ are all the predestined and their graces: therefore if Christ is predestined, Christ is in Christ, and the art in the art, which seems absurd.
3. Again, the Apostle says: He chose us in him, namely in Christ, before the constitution of the world. Therefore we are chosen in Christ: therefore predestined. If therefore he himself is predestined, he is not predestined except in himself: and this again is to say nothing, that the same one should be chosen and predestined in himself.

But on the contrary: To the Romans 1:4: Who was predestined the Son of God in power, according to the spirit of sanctification.

Solution. According to this [first] opinion it is easy to respond to the objections: because the objections do not touch it, but rather the second opinion: because this opinion says that "man" supposits nothing but the supposit of man in one nature and two substances.

And therefore they say to the first, that Christ in the divine supposit and nature predestines: and that man in the human supposit and nature is predestined: and thus it is not absurd that to one in person according to diverse supposits and natures it belongs to predestine and to be predestined, and to be eternal and temporal.

To the other they say similarly, that Christ in the eternal supposit and nature is the art of the Father: but in the supposit of man he is an artifact which is contained by an ideal cause in the art, and yet the person is one.

To the other they say in this way, that it is not absurd to choose something in himself: for the very same person according to the divine supposit was choosing in whom the Father chose: and he himself according to the human supposit and nature was chosen, because there were two supposits, not one.

But since this opinion is false, therefore it is necessary to respond.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that although Christ the Son of God insofar as he is such is the same as Christ in both natures and triple substance, yet according to consideration he differs: because first the simple person is supposited, but second the composite person. Now to the person as he is simple, it belongs to predestine: but to the person as he is composite, it belongs to be predestined: yet not that the person is either in the divine nature, but as the composite person in human nature and the substance of flesh and soul. And let no force be placed on the [term] composition: just as the second opinion in the letter explains through what mode he is composite. And thus it is clear that although to predestine and to be predestined belong to the same, yet it is not in respect of the same thing.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that the person as simple is the art of the Father by appropriation, and nothing prohibits the same from being contained in itself as regards the fact that it was going to be in human nature.

To the third it must be said that there is nothing absurd in this way for him to be chosen in himself considered diversely.

Exposition of the text.

Next it is asked concerning this proposition of Origen which they adduce in the same chapter, A, §2: He was made without doubt that which he was not before.

For either this is the hypostasis, or the human nature. If the hypostasis: therefore Christ was made some hypostasis which was not always: but some hypostasis is some man: therefore he himself was made some man: and this was disproved above.

And it must be said that Origen adds according to the flesh: and this determination verifies the locution. Because it must not be conceded according to the truth, although this opinion says so, that Christ is some substance which was not always: because the hypostasis of this man and of the Son of God is one. But if the nature is understood: he himself on this day is not his nature: just as he never was, nor will be: and therefore it can be verified neither of the hypostasis nor of the nature: and therefore it is excluded, because this opinion is absolutely false.

§ 3. But in the second opinion, etc.

Here is posited the response of the second opinion which, as is commonly held, is contained in six chapters, in the first of which the response is posited. In the second, the determination of the authorities adduced for the first opinion, there at D: The authorities also determine, etc. In the third, certain objections to the contrary, there at E: But to these it seems to be opposed, etc. In the fourth, the solution of those, there at F: But these in this manner, etc. In the fifth, it is determined how Christ is said to be both, there at H: What was also said, Christ is both. In the sixth and last, he objects a certain thing which seems more contrary, and solves it, there at I: But there is also another thing which [seems opposed] to this opinion, etc.

Articulus 3 — Whether Christ Is One or Two Supposits

Whether Christ is one or two supposits?

Concerning the authorities adduced in the fifth chapter E, a doubt arises: because they seem to prove that Christ is two: and this is against the position of that opinion stated above, which is that Christ is nothing but one: since he himself is neither two supposits, nor two natures.

BUT IT IS OBJECTED: 1. As Augustine says: The Word of God is one thing, the man is another. Again, in the same place: The Son of man is one thing, the Son of God is another: and the other authorities adduced there.

1. To the same by reason: Christ is one by a created unity, and he is one by an uncreated unity: and the created unity is not the uncreated unity: therefore Christ is two. Proof of the first. Every thing is one by the unity of a form: but Christ is in an uncreated form: therefore he himself is not one. Proof of the second: because created and uncreated are opposed: therefore the one is not the other.
2. Again, Christ is something in which he agrees with the mother, and Christ is something in which he agrees with the Father: and that in which he agrees with the mother is not that in which he agrees with the Father: therefore Christ is two. And the propositions are proved in the same way.
3. Again, Christ is something passible and mortal, because [he is] a man who is passible and mortal: and he is something which is impassible and immortal, because of the divine nature of Christ: therefore Christ is two. If it is said that it does not follow: He is passible and mortal: therefore he is not impassible and immortal. On the contrary: Impassible and immortal is what is neither mortal nor passible: passible and mortal is what is passible and mortal. Therefore if they are the same, that which is not mortal and passible is mortal and passible: these are contradictorily opposed: therefore contradictories are simultaneously verified of the same thing, which cannot be.

Solution. To these and all sophisms of this kind it must be said that Christ is truly one supposit subsisting in two natures, and out of three substances: because this is the confession of the Catholic faith. Now it is notably said that Christ is a supposit in two natures . Hence the supposit is predicated of Christ in the nominative [recto], but the nature in the oblique. Thus the Son of God is man, and the Son of God is of human nature. And on the part of the other nature it is similarly thus: this man is the Son of God, and this man is of the divine nature.

And if it is said that this is not the divine nature, but it accrues to him, and not essentially (per se): for this is not from the nature insofar as it is a nature, but from the fact that in divine things person and nature do not differ. And this is clear from the fact that although in divine things the nature is the supposit, and conversely, yet not whatever belongs to the supposit belongs to the nature. And this is so because the nature, in that it is a nature, is not the supposit in that it is a supposit: but this happens on account of the simplicity which is between the nature and the supposit. And although in divine things no predicate falls by accident, nevertheless the proposition is not immediate when it is said, "The supposit is the nature": and still less immediate is the proposition when it is said, "This man is the divine nature," demonstrating Christ. Because there are two middle terms there, namely that this man is the Son of God, and the Son of God has no difference from the eternal nature.

Having seen these things, one must respond to the objections.

To the first therefore it must be said that when Augustine says that the Word is another thing, he rightly understands another according as the predicate is taken in conjunction to the oblique predicate signified in the form of that nominative: hence it is another Word, that is, the Word in the divine nature insofar as he is such. And from this it does not follow that Christ is simply two: but it follows that he is one thing and another according to something that is in him: and this is true, and it is not against this opinion.

In the same way the solution to all the authorities adduced in that chapter is clear.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that this is true, that Christ is one by a created unity: and it is true that this unity is not that unity if it is taken in the abstract, as the objection proceeds: because the unity will be the nature which makes the one a unit, or a form. But it does not follow further: therefore Christ is two. Because although this unity or form is not that one, nevertheless the "one" of the one is the same as the "one" of the other: because "one" speaks of the hypostasis, while "unity" speaks of the natural form: and those forms in Christ were two, and yet the "one" was only one.

To the other it must be said that "Christ is something in which he agrees with the mother"—this is true, if it is duly understood. Now the sense is that Christ is one in which the grace of the nature agrees with the mother, and not the grace of the supposit: because the supposit of the Son is not the supposit of the mother. Similarly this is true: "Christ is something in which he agrees with the Father": and in the same sense, because the hypostasis of the Son is not the hypostasis of the Father: but the nature of the Son is the nature of the Father. But from this it does not follow that Christ is two hypostases, but that one hypostasis existing in two natures, in one of which he agrees with the mother, and in the other he agrees with the Father.

To the last it must be said that when it is said, "Christ is something passible and something impassible," something is not taken in the same way in both. For when "something passible" is said, the word something signifies the supposit, and not the nature except obliquely. But when "something impassible" is said, it signifies the nature in the nominative: and it does not signify the supposit, neither obliquely nor directly. And therefore it does not follow that he is two, but that he is one in two natures. From this it is clear that they are not contradictories, to be something passible, and to be something impassible. Yet although this is denied, "the divine nature is passible" is false because of simple things and because it is composite: however, it is distinguishable from the fact that "passible" can be an adjective, and posit its reality concerning the divine nature, and then it is false and composite. But if it is a substantive and does not posit its reality concerning the divine nature, but concerning the word something which is understood implicitly: then it is true, "the divine nature is a passible thing," that is, something which is passible: because it itself is the supposit of the Son of God, which supposit is passible. But then it is invalid if from this it is inferred thus: "The divine nature is a passible thing (neuter): therefore the divine nature is passible (feminine)": because "passible" (in gendered form) signifies a formed gender, namely masculine or feminine, and that does not enclose within itself a finite subject like the neuter does, which encloses in itself the finite essence of a thing, because a general subjected thing suffices for the finitude of nothing: which is not the case in a formed gender which seeks to posit its reality concerning a special entity. And therefore passibilis (passible, m./f.) is an adjective according to the Grammarians: and cannot be substantivized in the same way as passibile (a passible thing, n.).

Articulus 4 — What Kind of One Christ Is

What sort of one is Christ?

Next it is asked concerning what he says around the end of the following chapter F: Not that the Son of God himself and the Son of man are those two diverse things, etc.

For from this it is supposited that Christ is only one.

But it must be asked, what sort of one: and having established what sort of one he is, it is asked whether he is more one than other natural unities?

To the first one proceeds thus: Blessed Bernard in book V of De Consideratione distinguishes nine modes of unity, saying thus: There is a unity which can be called collective, for example, many stones make one heap. And there is a constitutive unity when many members constitute one body or many parts constitute any whole. There is also a conjugative unity by which it comes about that two are not two, but one flesh. There is also a natural one by which a soul and flesh are born a man. There is again a potestative unity, by which a man of virtue is not unstable, not divisible: but strives to be found one with himself. There is a consentaneous unity when through charity there is one heart and one soul of many men. There is also a volitive unity when the soul adheres to God in all its vows, and is one spirit. And there is a dignative unity by which our clay is assumed into one person with the Word of God. (The ninth he had called the union of the three persons in one nature of the deity). From this it is clear that Bernard reduces that "one" which is Christ to the dignative unity.

But it seems that it ought to be reduced to the conjugative unity: because

1. So says the Apostle to the Ephesians 5:32: This is a great sacrament: but I speak in Christ and in the Church. Now the Church is espoused by immediate espousal in the head: therefore it seems that it is reduced to the conjugative.

2. Again, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh, the Saints expound concerning the flesh assumed by the Son of God.

3. Again, the Apostle, I Corinthians 11:3: I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ: but the head of the woman is the man: but the head of Christ is God: he seems to intimate the same union.

Solution. It must be said in truth that it is a dignative unity, and it is called dignative because through the grace of God's condescension (dignationis) to our nature this unity was made, as was held above and is held here, that that man, in order to be assumed into such a singularity of the Son of God, had it by grace, and not by nature, nor by merits.

But from the objections to the contrary, nothing is proved except that it has something similar with the matrimonial or conjugative unity: because namely the two natures in Christ have the custom of an undivided life, and the one is ruling and the other is ruled.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Is More One than Other Things That Are One Naturally

Whether Christ is more one than other natural unities?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the comparison of that union to those things which are united by nature, which are distinguished in manifold ways by the Philosophers: but let us briefly touch upon the summary, reducing them to an order.

Now the Philosopher distinguishes between one essentially (unum per se) and one accidentally (unum per accidens).[208] Accidentally is said in four ways, namely: two accidents, of which one accrues to the rest, as "a navigator" and "a musician" are one; two substances under one accident, as Socrates and Plato are one in being musical; one accident in two substances, and this in two ways: either as a subject is contained under another subject, and then the accident can be compared to both, although to one more properly, as "a man" and "a musical man" are one; or the accident can be attributed to the subject without comparison to a superior, as "this man is musical." The first and third and fourth modes the Philosopher posits in the fourth book of the Metaphysics.[209] But the second, although he does not posit it, nevertheless he intimates by examples, by similitude, by the whole from the lesser, when he says that "musical" is an accident to both men, and because among one essentially he posits one in genus, as an isosceles and an equilateral are one figure, although they are not one triangle.

But one essentially has nine modes, namely: indivisible, as a point or a unit.

Continuation, and this in three ways, namely: whose parts are coupled to the same boundary; or whose diverse parts are glued together by artifice; or whose parts are collected to one thing which is their origin by nature, just as an organic body is one by the colligation of its parts to a principle, namely to the heart, which (as Basil says) is the foundation of the whole body. Now the sign of being one is that its motion is one. Because Boethius says that the sign of a continuum is that when one part is moved, the whole is moved: and this is understood of local motion. And in this way the parts of the body are also called one, as one hand, or one foot, which is easily seen, because the motion of the hand is one even if the arm is unmoved, and so of the others.

The third mode of one is that whose subject is not divided according to form. Now those things are not divided according to form whose forms are not divided according to position and subject, either first or ultimate: just as it is said "one wine" and "one water." Also, homogeneous things which if divided, the same form remains in the whole and in the part: and therefore they are not divided according to form. But simple things, like water, are not divided according to the form of the first subject which is simple matter: because elements are not mixed, nor do they have a mixed nature; and therefore they are homogeneous in whole and in parts in the first subject in the order of nature. But wine and lead and oil are one according to the form of the ultimate subject, which is proximate to the form of the species, just as a mixture which is one in the whole and in the parts: although they are not one in the form of the first subject which is the intermediate miscible things of wine or oil, because a certain part of that first subject is water, a certain part air, a certain part earth, and a certain part fire.

In the fourth mode it is one in the form of a genus only, which is not the whole being: although it is part of their being, and, although it has diverse differences by which their species are constituted, such as man, horse, dog. And according to this mode, things are called materially one whose species are diverse in nature: but they are mutually transmutable, just as generable and corruptible things are one, as Boethius says, because their matter is one, and species diverse.

In the fifth mode, what is one by definition is one: and this in respect to a superior, just as augmentation and diminution are one, because both of them are motion in quantity: or in respect to an inferior, just as the definition and the defined are one.

In the sixth mode it is one: because it is divided neither by time nor place nor definition: and such a one is chiefly a substance which is one in the division of its substantials.

In the seventh mode it is one, which is not divided according to form, although it has material parts: as one man is one animal, and one entity is one; although both are divided through matter.

Eighthly it is called one, as diverse things in acting and suffering are united in order to one form: as the members of an organic body are called one in respect to the act of life, which is the soul.

Ninthly they are called one, whose substance is one: and because substance is said in three ways, namely matter and form and composite, therefore it is said in those three ways.

Let it be asked therefore, whether Christ is more one than any of those ones, so to speak?

It seems that he is: because chiefly one among those is one indivisible, and one by natural form just as a composite is one: and yet in those, what belongs to one does not belong to the other: because what belongs to a point does not belong to a unit: or what belongs to a form does not belong to matter: therefore since whatever belongs to the man belongs to the Son of God, and conversely, it seems that Christ is more one than those.

208. Aristotle, Metaphysics, Book V.

But on the contrary it seems that he is less one: because

1. In nature there is the unity of a composite in united matter and form. And there is the unity of an individual in individuating principles, which are more distant than matter and form: for substance and accident are more distant than substance and substance: therefore the union of the individual is lesser than the union of matter and form.
2. Again, an accident and an accident pertaining to dignity are more distant than an accident and an accident absolutely: therefore the union of the person is lesser than that of the individual: because the individual is made by a collection of accidents, but the person by a property pertaining to dignity: therefore it seems that the union of the person is the least.

But this is against Blessed Bernard, who in book V of De Consideratione says thus: Among all things which are rightly called one, the unity of the Trinity holds the peak: because three persons are one substance. In second place excels that unity by which, conversely, three substances are one person in Christ.[210]

Again, in the same place, I say that in Christ the Word, soul, and flesh are one person without confusion of essences, and likewise remain in their numerousness without prejudice to the personal unity.[211]

But it seems that this unity collects two simultaneously, namely the union of soul and body, and the union of the three persons in the divine nature: because so says Bernard: Nor would I deny that this also pertains to that kind of unity by which soul and flesh are one man. For it was fitting that the sacrament constituted for man should agree more familiarly and similarly with the constitution of man. It was also fitting to agree with the highest unity which is in God: so that just as there three persons are one essence, so here by a certain most fitting contrariety three essences are one person.[212]

Solution. It must be said that the "one" by which Christ is one is reduced to no unity of natural things, neither to essentially one nor to accidentally one. And it is no wonder if the Philosophers did not know of this unity, which was made not except through grace and not through nature.

And therefore I say that unity can be considered in three ways. In one way, namely in the proportion of the conjoined things: and thus the unity of the Trinity is the greatest, and after this the unity of an indivisible nature, and afterwards the unity of a nature through form, and it is more in homogeneous things, and less in heterogeneous things, and still less in things conjoined out of a spiritual and a corporeal nature. And especially it must be considered that according to the distance of the united things, the union is lesser. Uniting power can also be considered: and thus the unity of the Trinity is the greatest, and after this the unity of the three substances in Christ, and the natural union is lesser: because form in natural things...

uniting is weaker than the nature uniting persons, or the person uniting natures. § 2. In the third way, union can be considered according to the things that follow upon the united: and thus the maximum unity is still that of the Trinity, because from it whatever substantially belongs to one, belongs also to the other, and conversely. Still less is the natural unity which is of form and matter: for not from the union of those does whatever belongs to the form belong to the matter, and conversely. § 3. To that which is objected, therefore, that the personal union is minimal, I say that this would follow if there were no union except in a personal property: but just as was determined in the fifth distinction, this union is according to the being of the hypostasis, which is to be this, or which is here: and therefore the union is in a thing of nature, although the natures remain distinct. But the objection proceeds as if the union of the individual and the person were only in the accidents, or properties of the individual and the person. § 4. But to this which is objected concerning Bernard, that it seems to be intermediate between the unity of the Trinity and the union of the soul with the body, it must be said that this is true with respect to the last two considerations, and not with respect to the first. And that he intends this is clear: because he adds thus in the original: Thus this unity of the two, subsisting in the middle of the unities, is known to succumb to one and to pre-eminent the other, by as much as it is inferior to the superior, so much it is superior to the inferior. Finally, the person in whom God and man is one Christ exhibits in Himself so great and so express a force of union, that if you predicate those two of one another, you would err, namely pronouncing God to be man, and not man to be God truly and catholically. But you do not similarly predicate flesh of soul, or soul of flesh, unless most absurdly, although similarly soul and flesh are one man. Moreover, that it is not through the power of the uniting, is clear in the same place, where he says thus: Nor is it surprising if the soul by its vital though valid intention is not equally powerful to connect and by its effects bind flesh to itself, as the deity connects to itself that man who is predestinated to be the Son of God in power. And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether It Is True That Human Nature in Christ Degenerates into an Accident

§ 6. Whether it is true that the human nature in Christ degenerates into an accident? § 8. Whether it is true that the human nature in Christ degenerates into an accident?

§ 9. Next, it is asked concerning the third opinion which is an error, which is touched upon there, K, In this sentence therefore, etc. § 10. For certain people, who wish to be of this opinion, do not indeed say that He took human nature as a habit: but nevertheless they say that in Christ it degenerates into an accident: and this is proved thus: § 11. 1. An accident is that which is present and absent besides the corruption of the subject: but human nature is present and absent to the Son of God, who is no less the Son of God: therefore human nature is an accident to the Son of God. § 12. 2. Also, An accident is what comes to a nature already complete: but human nature comes to the Son of God already complete in nature and person: therefore human nature in Him is an accident. § 14. 3. Also, An accident is what is predicated denominatively, and not as a substance: for Socrates is not said to be humanized, but is called a man: but he is called whitened, if whiteness is signified to be in him as at the term of motion to whiteness: since therefore Christ here is called humanized, it seems that human nature is present by accident. § 15. 4. Also, An accident united to something does not vary it from its proper nature: the human nature coming to the Son of God did not vary Him: therefore it is an accident, or it degenerates into an accident.

210. Bernard of Clairvaux, De Consideratione, Book V.

§ 16. BUT AGAINST: § 17. 1. The Philosopher says, What is a substance in itself, is an accident to no one: but human nature in itself is a substance: therefore it is an accident to no one. § 18. 2. Also, An accident is either of the species or of the individual: of the species, as a proper passion: but of the individual it is compared to the subject either as to a subject only, or to a subject as to a cause. If therefore human nature degenerates into an accident, it will be an accident in one of these ways. Not in the first way: because thus human nature would be converted with the Son of God always and everywhere, which is false. Nor in the second way: because the Son is not the subject of human nature. Hence if human nature were in a divine person, then the divine person would be human nature, which is false. Nor in the third way: because the Son of God does not express the cause of human nature.

§ 19. Solution § 20. It must be consented to the last reasons, that human nature in no way is an accident, nor does it degenerate into an accident: nor did the ancients say that it degenerates into an accident, but that it converges (vergit) into an accident: and the moderns changed vergit into degenerat, although those are very different. For it seems to verge upon an accident because of its agreement with a certain property of an accident, not because of the nature of an accident, namely that it can be absent from the Son of God without the diminution of the person, and comes to Him without augmentation: because the goodness of human nature adds nothing to the divine person, just as neither does a point to a line or a quantity: but far be it that it degenerates, because rather it becomes generous (ennobled). § 21. To the first, therefore, it must be said that this makes it communicate in a certain property of an accident, and not to be an accident according to nature. In this way it must be answered to the next. § 22. To the other it must be said, when God is called humanized, that in the mode of predication it is not understood that it is an accidental habit according to nature, but according to the property which was mentioned. Through these also the solution to the last is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Is Fittingly Called the Lordly Man

§ 24. Whether Christ is congruously called a dominical man? § 26. Whether Christ is congruously called a dominical man?

§ 27. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, M, Yet he is not congruously called a dominical man. § 28. For the contrary seems because § 29. 1. 1 Kings 1:19, upon that: Elkanah knew, the Gloss says: Who is here except the dominical man, namely the Lord Jesus Christ. § 30. 2. Also. Augustine in the Sermon on the Mount: It is permitted to no one to be ignorant of the kingdom of God, since His only-begotten came down from heaven not only intelligibly, but also sensibly and visibly in the dominical man. § 31. 3. Also, Cassian in the sixth book against Nestorius: Although therefore with our confession itself before the birth and conception of the Virgin Christ was not the dominical man: nevertheless because in you He is called solitary, the God-man is preached in the Sacred Scriptures without beginning: and so great a unity of man and God is read, that both the man seems always coeternal to God before, and God to have suffered for the man afterwards. § 33. 4. Furthermore, Damascene often calls the man deified: therefore he can also be called a dominical man.

§ 34. If perchance it is said, that dominical is a possessive noun, and thus signifies the thing of the noun to which it is adjoined to be possessed. § 35. Against: Christ took the form of a servant, and is called the servant of the Lord, Isa. 52:13: Behold my servant shall understand.

§ 36. Solution § 37. He ought not to be called a dominical man: but it ought to be said, that Christ the man expresses a person: and that was never a servant, although He took a servile nature. § 38. But that He himself is called a servant does not belong to Him by the grace of the person simply, but by the grace of the nature which is in the person: and therefore because dominical sounds as if the person of Christ is servile, therefore Augustine retracts himself. § 39. Nevertheless, dominical is sometimes said not as a possessive, but for one having dominion, as a logician who has logic: and thus some call him dominical, but it ought not to be extended, because it more properly sounds of a servile person.

DISTINCTIO VIII

§ 42. After these things it ought to be inquired, etc. § 43. Here begins that part which is about the things convenient to the conjunct from the unity and the unible. § 44. There are moreover three things according to Dionysius to be considered in every perfect unity, namely substance, power, and operation: and substance is called the composite or person, power however is the natural potency for action or passion, operation however is the work which belongs to the hypostasis constituted and perfected according to the power which is in it. And therefore also the properties of the united Christ are threefold. For either they are of the united according as it is united: and these are treated in the first part. Or they are of Christ according to the potency or power taken on the part of the soul or the body: and these are treated in the second part, which begins, distinction XIII, there, A, Furthermore it must be known, that Christ according to the man from the very conception, etc. And that this is true is clear: because there he treats of the wisdom and grace of Christ, which are in Him according to the potency taken in the soul: and in distinction XV he treats of our assumed defects, which are in Him according to the impotency taken on the part of the body. Or there are also properties taken according to works: and these he treats in distinction XVIII which begins there, A, Concerning the merit also of Christ it is not to be passed over, etc. And that this also is true is clear: because all the things which are posited there are about merit, mediation, and redemption, and about death which was the work of most excellent fortitude: and therefore in that the tractate on the incarnation is finished.

§ 45. Therefore concerning the properties of Christ the man in so far as He is God and man, it is treated in the first part: and it is divided into two parts. For certain properties are in Him in being: but certain ones are not in Him, except according to power through the intellect, just as is the power to assume another, the power to assume in the female sex. Therefore concerning those which are in Him in the first way, he treats in the first four distinctions, and also in the first chapter of the fifth distinction which is the twelfth. But concerning those which are in Him in the second way, he treats in another part of the twelfth distinction, there, B, But it is usually asked, Whether another man, etc.

§ 46. The properties which are in Him in being are caused by the essential principles of Christ. But those are either extrinsic, like father and mother: or intrinsic, like both natures. And therefore the former is divided into three parts: in the first of which it is treated of the properties following the united Christ according to the comparison to the principle from which as through generation, such as to be born, or to be born twice: and these are treated in this eighth distinction. Or they are caused by the divine nature, such as honor, and adoration, and the like: and these he treats in distinction IX, there, A, Furthermore it is necessary to investigate, etc. Or they follow Him from the human nature: and of those it must be spoken in the tenth and eleventh distinction, and in the first chapter of the twelfth. But this part begins there, dist. X, A, It is also usually inquired by some, etc.

§ 47. But in this distinction which is of the present reading, there are two chapters, namely whether the divinity ought to be said to be born and conceived? And, Whether Christ ought to be said to be twice born, there, B, It is also usually asked, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Divine Nature Is Born and Conceived, and Whether the Human Nature Is Born, and Whether It Can Be Said That the Divine Nature or the Human Nature Is Born by Consequence

§ 49. Whether the divine nature is born and conceived? and, Whether the human nature is born? and, Whether it can be said that the divine or human nature is born consequently? § 51. Whether the divine nature is born and conceived? and, Whether the human nature is born? and, Whether it can be said that the divine or human nature is born consequently?

§ 52. But a doubt arises here concerning the beginning of the first chapter, where he says: It seems indeed that it ought not to be said, namely of the divine nature, that it is born of the Virgin. § 53. And the question is multiplied, so that first it is asked, If the divine nature is born and conceived? § 54. Secondly, If the human nature is born in Him? § 55. Thirdly, If the divine or human, although not primarily, yet consequently ought to be said to be born or conceived?

§ 56. To the first of these it is proceeded thus: § 57. 1. This is conceded, The divine nature is incarnate: but nothing is incarnate, except what was first conceived in the flesh in the womb of the Virgin: therefore it ought to be conceded that the divine nature is conceived: but nothing is conceived except what is born, if the nature does not suffer an impediment: therefore it ought to be conceded that the divine nature is born. § 58. 2. Also, Hilary in the book On the Trinity: The Son has nothing except what is born: since therefore this is true of eternal generation, it can also be said of the temporal; because He is not born of the Virgin in part, and not in part, but wholly. § 59. 3. Also, for otherwise His mother would not be called Theotokos: therefore it ought to be conceded that the divine essence is born in Him. § 60. 4. Also, In the Son of God according to the intellect there are only two, namely the essence, and the property, although those two are one in Him. Therefore He is incarnate either by reason of the essence, or by reason of the property, or by reason of both. Not by reason of the property only: because this would be ridiculous, that that property would be born. Similarly not by reason of the essence only: because thus the Father would be born. Therefore He is born by reason of both: therefore the divine essence is born. § 61. 5. Also, In lower things we see that when someone is born, everything which is in him is born with him: therefore much more will this be in higher things, in which there is greater simplicity: since therefore the essence is in Him, the essence seems to be born. § 62. 6. Also, In lower things whatever is predicated directly of the born, is said to be born, just like the born one: as, this is born, and this is Peter, and Peter is said to be born. Therefore also in higher things whatever is predicated directly of the Son of God, if the Son of God is said to be born, they also will be said to be born: but the Son of God is the divine essence: therefore it itself is said to be born.

§ 63. Furthermore it is asked concerning the second article of the question, Whether the human nature ought to be said to be born? § 64. It seems that it should: because § 65. 1. Human nature began: and everything which began, either began through creation, or generation: but human nature did not begin through creation: therefore through generation: therefore it itself is born or generated. § 66. 2. Furthermore, Nothing is generated by temporal generation, except what began in time: the person of Christ did not begin in time, as has already been often proved: therefore the person of Christ is not born in time: since therefore something is born of the Blessed Virgin, it seems that it is necessary for the human nature to be born. § 67. 3. Also, This is born of the Virgin, which is made by the operation of the Holy Spirit: but this is human nature, for the Holy Spirit did not make the person of Christ: therefore human nature is born.

§ 68. BUT AGAINST both parts of the question it is objected thus: § 69. 1. Nothing is generated except a complete being in that nature: but a complete being is the supposit: therefore what is generated is the supposit. § 71. 2. Also, The Philosopher in the VII of First Philosophy proves that neither matter nor form is generated, but the whole composite: since therefore both matter and form are the composite of nature, it does not belong to nature to be generated, nor to be born. § 72. 3. Also, That is not generated except in which generation is terminated: but generation is not terminated except at the supposit: therefore it does not properly belong to nature to be generated, or to be born.

§ 73. Furthermore it is asked concerning the third article of the question, namely, Whether it can be conceded of the divine nature, that it itself is born consequently? § 74. It seems, that it can: because § 75. 1. If I say, This generates this one per se, and this one is a man: I can further infer, therefore consequently he generates a man: and man is an animal, and consequently he generates an animal, and so of others. Since therefore man and animal express the nature of man, it seems that nature has to be generated and born consequently: therefore similarly of the Son of God, this generates this: and this is the divine nature: therefore it seems, that consequently He generates the divine nature. § 76. 2. Furthermore, Although a foot and a hand and a body are not born per se, yet we can congruously say that they are born in this born one, and thus there is some nativity of them; therefore by a similar reason, although the divine nature is not born, yet it seems that we can say that it is born in Christ.

§ 77. Solution § 78. It must be said, that the divine essence ought in no way to be called born. For as is said in the Letter, nothing ought to be called born in time, which is not born in eternity, lest the name of filiation pass to another, as was held above in the first and fourth distinction. And also therefore because in no nature is it the case that the nature is born: but the hypostasis is born, or the composite substance, as was well proved in the objections. § 79. To the first therefore it must be said, that it is indeed true that this is conceded, that the divine nature is incarnate, under this sense, that the divine nature is associated with flesh in the same person, namely not to itself and in itself according as the nature assumed flesh, but it assumed to itself in the person: whence since nativity belongs to that which in itself and per se is incarnate, the divine nature will not be born on account of this. § 80. To the same it must be said, that nothing is incarnate except what was first conceived, as is already clear: because nothing is conceived, except what is per se united to flesh according to the reason of understanding: and thus the divine nature is not incarnate. § 81. To the other it must be said, that Hilary speaks of the eternal generation: and the sense is, Nothing except what is born, namely what it received by being born. But this cannot be said of the temporal: because by being born temporally, He did not receive the divine nature: and therefore also this is not true, that it is born, so as to be temporally received. § 82. To this which is objected, that according to this the Holy Virgin would not be called Theotokos: it must be said that it does not follow: because although the divine nature is not born, yet the Son of God and God is born of her. § 83. And if it is objected, that God is the name of substance and nature: and if God is born, the divine nature is born. The response is that although the word 'God' is the name of substance, yet through a notional act as is to be born temporally and eternally, because both belong to the supposit, it is drawn to supposit for the person: and therefore then it does not follow that the divine nature is born. If however the proof is asked, that to be born temporally is notional, let it be recalled to memory what was said above about the incarnation, where it was shown that the eternal generation according to the intellect is enclosed in the temporal. § 84. To the other it must be said, that in the Son of God is the essence, and is the property, and is the person: and these do not have number: because the essence is the person, and the property: whence just as we say that it does not belong to the essence to be born, so also we say that it does not belong to the property to be born, but to the person which according to the intellect is intermediate between the essence and the property, and signifies the hypostasis perfect and subsisting in itself: for although in divine things because of omnifarious simplicity the essence does not differ from the person and the property, yet when one is supposited the other is not supposited, nor is whatever attributed to one attributed to the other. § 86. To the other it must be said, that in lower things it cannot be said that everything which is in someone is born: for properly it is also not said that the whole is born in him: but properly it is said that he is born in that whole which is in him. Hence that reason proceeds either from false premises or from improper ones. § 87. To the other it must be said, that in lower things although all things are said to be born which are predicated directly, yet not all are said to be born per se, but some by accident, and some consequently: but of some it is said that he himself is born in them, for example, the hypostasis of this one per se: that which is one with the subject, by accident, as white, long, and the like: but that which is the second substance to which the supposit or property or of the species or genus substands, will be said to be born consequently: because the Philosopher says that a universal animal is either nothing, or is posterior. Hence this one is born, and this one is a man, consequently the man is born: and man is an animal, consequently the animal is born, and consequently susceptible to discipline because of the property of the species, consequently alive or vital because of the property of the genus: and so of others. But it is not so in Christ for two reasons. One is, because although the divine nature is predicated of the Son of God, this does not happen from the reason of the person, because He is a person: nor from the reason of the nature because it is a nature: but from elsewhere, namely from omnifarious simplicity. Hence the nature is not posterior to the person, but the same under another mode of signifying. The second is more to the proposition: because namely in those things the whole is received through generation in some way, but it is not so in Christ: for He did not receive the divine nature through temporal generation, as we said before. § 88. To that which is further asked, Whether the human nature ought to be said to be born? It must be said, that according to the understanding of nature which is posited above in the Letter, namely that human nature is the body and the soul, it ought not to be conceded: because in no nature is this true, as the objections well prove. But if human nature were called the universal of the species or genus, it could be said that nature occultly operates in these, and would be born consequently, or a posteriori. § 89. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this is false, This is born of the Virgin which is made by the operation of the Holy Spirit: because the person is born of the Virgin, and yet the person was not made by the operation of the Holy Spirit. Hence that reason proceeds from false propositions. § 90. 3. To that which is further asked, Whether it can be said, that the divine nature is born consequently? It must be said, that not by those two reasons which are posited above: and it is not similar in lower generation, as is clear from what has been said. And through this the solution to the first is clear. § 91. To the other it must be said, that it is not true, This foot is born in this one, unless very improperly: but it must be said thus, This one is born having a foot and a hand: if however it is conceded improperly, it will not be similar concerning the divine nature: because it is not received through temporal generation, like a foot, or a hand.

Articulus 2 — Whether in Christ There Is Only One Filiation

§ 93. Whether in Christ there is only one filiation? § 95. Whether in Christ there is only one filiation?

§ 96. Next it is asked concerning this which he says. there, A, around the beginning: Lest any thing have the name of filiation in the humanity, which does not hold it in the divinity. § 97. For from this it seems to be taken, that there is only one filiation, which also is proved by many reasons thus: § 98. 1. In divine hypostases there is no distinguishing property except the relation of origin: therefore there is no personal property except that: but from one personal property one person is called: since therefore this property in the person of the Son is the filiation of the Son, then one person will have only one filiation. § 99. 2. Also, Let us suppose someone is generated actively by a father, as mules do, and the same is generated passively by a mother: from the fact that this one is otherwise generated by the father, and otherwise by the mother, there do not become in him diverse filiations: but by one filiation he posits a respect to the father as to the generating actively, and he posits a respect for the same to the mother according to passive generation: therefore by a similar reason the Son begotten in a diverse way by the Father eternally, and by the mother temporally will not have diverse filiations. § 100. 3. Also, Let us suppose one has ten sons: by one paternity he is referred to all according to diverse respects compared to this one: therefore a diverse act of generation does not cause a diversity of origin. § 101. 4. Furthermore, In every nature a similar thing cannot be found, that something according to the same part even from diverse causes has two properties of the same species: for two whitenesses are not in the same thing according to the same, nor two blacknesses even induced from diverse causes, and similarly in the soul there are not two sciences of the same reason in the same, nor two species of man for understanding man, and thus it is in all things: therefore also it is impossible to understand how this can be true. § 102. 5. If perchance it is said, that human filiation is of another reason, and divine filiation is of another reason: and therefore there are two filiations in the same. Against: Filiation is that which constitutes a son: and whatever is of another reason in the abstract, is also of another in the concrete. This proposition has no instance. Therefore if the filiation is of another reason, the son is of another reason: but a son of one reason, and a son of another reason are two sons: therefore Christ is two sons, which is a heresy. § 103. 6. Also, Either it is of another reason thus, that it is equivocal to it, or that it is said according to prior and posterior. If equivocal: it follows necessarily, that Christ is a son by another and another reason. But if it is said according to prior and posterior: since prior and posterior cannot be equally something common, and because nothing is common to the Creator and the creature, the filiation will be in this mode that this is a filiation by imitating that: therefore it does not recede entirely from its reason: therefore two properties in this way are similar in the same according to the same, although from diverse causes: but because it does not happen to be understood or imagined (for let us suppose uncreated wisdom and created wisdom to be in the same) adjectivally: it will not be intelligible, since they do not recede from one reason of community according to the proportion to one act. § 104. 7. Furthermore, Let us suppose one master today to have one disciple and tomorrow another and so successively up to a thousand, it would be necessary according to this, that a thousand masterships would be generated in him, which is absurd. § 105. 8. Also, Filiation is the property of a person according to what a person is: but the person is only one, and of one person as a person, there is only one constitutive property: therefore since the son is one person, the son will not have except one filiation.

§ 107. BUT AGAINST: § 108. 1. Generation is the cause of relation: but in Christ there is not one generation: therefore neither one filiation. § 109. 2. Furthermore, Filiation is that by which the Son is referred to another: but by eternal filiation He is referred to the Father, and not to the mother: therefore there will be another relation to the mother: therefore another filiation.

§ 110. Solution § 111. Without prejudice I say, that there is only one filiation of Christ the Son of God: because it is not intelligible, how those two properties of the same reason would determine one hypostasis: hence I concede the former reasons. § 112. To that which is objected against, that generation is the cause of relation: it must be said, that this is true, unless it is a relation of the same reason which it has to cause: for if that is in it, another cannot be induced upon it, but it induces diverse respects of the same, namely that a father or son with respect to someone is a father, with respect to whom he was not. Just as if we posit someone to be white: and causes inducing whiteness come to him, they will not induce in him another whiteness, but they will make that the same whiteness from another cause is also had than he previously had. § 113. To the other it must be said, that filiation is a property causing a respect in the relative, and in that which is a property it does not look back except to that in which it is, and it is one: but according to that which causes the respect, it does not look back to that in which it is as in a subject, but it seeks to be determined outside: and therefore in one property as many respects are multiplied, as it has outside to which it is referred: and therefore it does not follow, that if in some respect it is referred to the father, and in another to the mother, that there are diverse properties of filiations in Him. Nor is this opinion new, but also written in the writings of other Masters.

Divisio Textus

§ 114. Division of the Text § 115. B. Concerning the twin nativity of Christ, by which He was twice born. § 116. It is also usually asked, Whether Christ ought to be called twice begotten, as He is called the Son of God and of man? To which it can be said that Christ was twice born, and had two nativities. Whence Augustine in the book On Faith to Peter: God the Father from His own nature begot God the Son coequal and coeternal to Himself. The same also only-begotten God was secondly born from the Father once, from the mother once. For the Word of God was born from the Father: the Word made flesh was born from the mother. Therefore one and and same Son of God was born before the ages, and born in the age: and each nativity belongs to one Son of God: namely the divine, and the human. [213] Concerning this also John Damascene says: We therefore venerate two nativities of Christ: one from the Father before the ages, which is above cause and reason and time and nature: and one, which in the last times... [214]

§ 1. ...in times past for our sake, and according to us, and above us. For our sake, because it was for our salvation; according to us, because He was born a man from a woman, and in a time of conception, namely of nine months; above us, because [He was born] not from seed, but from the Holy Spirit and the Holy Virgin, above the law of conception. From these things it manifestly appears that there are two nativities of Christ, and that the same [Christ] was born twice.

Articulus 3 — Whether Christ Can Be Said to Be Twice Begotten, and How He Ought to Be

Whether Christ can be said to be twice begotten, and how He ought to be?

§ 2. Next, it is asked concerning that which is said in chapter B: It is also customarily asked, whether Christ ought to be called twice begotten, etc.

§ 3. It seems that He should not be. 1. For nothing thus existing in act, which itself is never interrupted, makes a number with another act of the same account (ejusdem rationis). For example, if I run eternally with one run, I will never be said to have run twice, even if I am able to run with another run alongside it. For "twice" implies an interruption. But the one generation of the Son is eternal, and therefore not interrupted; therefore, it does not make a number with another generation.

§ 4. 2. Also, whichever acts are not of the same account, "twice" cannot be said of them. For instance, if I run once and write once, it cannot be said, "I ran twice" or "I wrote twice." Therefore, since likewise eternal and temporal generation are not of the same account, He cannot be said to be twice begotten.

§ 5. Solution. Isidore expressly says that Christ is twice born, and the Master says this too; hence this is conceded improperly, so that the sense is "twice born," that is, He has two nativities.

§ 6. Therefore, it must be said to the first objection that when the generation of the Son is called eternal, it is not called eternal because it never reaches an end, but because it stands wholly at once and is perfect—never in becoming (in fieri), never in having-been-made (in factum esse). Rather, it is always complete and perfect, and not interrupted, because nothing is interrupted except time and the temporal. And although eternal generation is not entirely of the same account as temporal generation, it is nevertheless not in no way common to it, because there is a community of proportion there. And thus, insofar as it is complete and perfect, it is improperly numbered together with the temporal generation perfected by the perfection of time. For although eternity and time are not univocal in one [genus], yet they are so ordered that one is under the other, and time imitates eternity insofar as it can.

213. Augustine (Fulgentius of Ruspe), De fide ad Petrum.

§ 7. To the other objection, it must be said that eternal and temporal generation are of the same account by prior and posterior through analogy, as has often been said.

Articulus 4 — Whether Christ Is One Son

Whether Christ is one Son?

§ 8. Next, it is asked concerning that which is said there, at B, around the middle: Therefore one and the same Son of God was born, etc.

§ 9. For this seems to be false, because: 1. Individuals of diverse natures in genus and species are diverse. But the divine nature and the human nature are diverse natures in species and genus; therefore, their individuals are diverse, as it seems.

§ 10. 2. Also, the termini of diverse acts in nature and being are diverse. Divine and human generation are diverse acts, and each is in nature and being (because generation, according to the Philosopher, is the way into nature). Therefore, they have diverse termini. But the terminus is he who is born; therefore, those who are born are diverse. But those who are born are sons; therefore, the sons are diverse.

§ 11. 3. Also, individuals of diverse species and genera are diverse; therefore, also persons of diverse rational natures in species and genus are diverse, because a person is an individual hypostasis of a rational nature.

§ 12. Solution. From the foregoing it is easy to solve this: because it has been proven above that Christ is only one; and therefore, there is only one son.

§ 13. Therefore, it must be said to the first and the last objections, which are almost the same, that this is true of natures neither of which is communicable to the other, or communicates. But if one communicates, and the other does not, the one that communicates will not have an individual, because it is not undivided in itself and divided from another. For example, the soul is a spiritual rational substance, and the body is a corporeal substance; and yet neither does the body have an individual, nor the soul a person, because they communicate with each other. For to communicate to another through union removes the potency of having personality or a person.

§ 14. To the other objection, it must be said that generation in divine things does not signify some act which is terminated as a becoming at the produced son. For according to this, it would be successive, and the son would first have been in potency and afterwards in act, and he would not be eternal. And therefore, this holds only in human things. But if force is not put on this, it must be said that then human generation is of the same [subject] as the divine is, as is clear through the things said above; but not according to the same [nature]. For His eternal generation is according to the divine nature, but the temporal is according to the human nature.

§ 15. But if it is objected that from this, human nature seems to lose much because it is communicable, since it loses the potency of constituting a person, it must be said that it loses nothing. Nay rather, it is ennobled from this, because it has the supposit and person of the Son of God in a more noble way.

214. John Damascene, De fide orthodoxa.

DISTINCTIO IX

Divisio Textus

§ 16. Furthermore it ought to be investigated, etc. Here he treats of the properties of the united [nature] caused by the divine nature, which are honor, and the debt of adoration, and things of this kind.

§ 17. It is divided into two parts. In the first of these he touches upon the opinion of certain men saying that the flesh of Christ is to be adored with dulia, and not with latria. In the second, he touches upon the opinion of those who conversely say it is with latria, not dulia, there at B, But it pleases others that the humanity of Christ, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Latria Is

What is latria?

§ 18. Now four doubts occur here before the Text, namely: What is latria? Is it a virtue? And if it is a virtue, of which of the principal virtues is it a species? And fourth, to whom is it owed?

§ 19. Here in the Text, the definition of latria is had as follows: Latria is the service or worship exhibited to God the Creator alone. And this definition is drawn from Augustine in Book I On the Trinity, chapter 6. In that place it is especially clear enough that the Holy Spirit is not a creature, where we are commanded to serve not the creature but the Creator: Not in the mode by which we are commanded through charity to serve one another, which is in Greek δουλεύειν (douleuein), but in the mode by which God alone is served, which is in Greek λατρεύειν (latreuein). Hence they are called idolaters who exhibit that service to images, which is owed to God alone. From this word of Augustine, the aforesaid definition is proven.

§ 20. But it is objected against the definition thus: 1. Service or worship does not name a habit of the soul. Since therefore latria is a habit of the soul (and let this be supposed, because it will be proven below to be a virtue), it seems that the definition is bad, inasmuch as a habit is posited in the genus of act.

§ 21. 2. Also, service regards a lord (dominus); but obedience is owed to a lord as to one commanding. Therefore it seems that service is not properly the act of latria.

§ 22. 3. Furthermore, worship is in many things exterior, such as in prostration, genuflection, and the like, which are corporeal acts. Therefore it seems that it does not properly denote the act of a virtue, because the act of a virtue is in the will.

§ 23. 4. Also, "Creator" does not declare the account of the end in worship: because He is also worshiped as God, and as Lord, and as Creator, and as Glorifier. Why therefore is "Creator" specifically posited in the definition of latria?

§ 24. 5. Also, to believe is a service owed to God alone, and similarly to love Him for His own sake and above all things. Therefore it seems that faith is latria, and charity; and the same can be argued concerning the act of hope. Since therefore this definition applies to so many things, it is not convertible with the defined thing; therefore it is not a good definition.

§ 25. 6. Also, the Apostle, 1 Cor. 10:31: Whether you eat, or drink, or whatever else you do, do all to the glory of God. Therefore it seems that in all works we exhibit the service owed to God alone, and thus that any work whatever will be a work of latria.

§ 26. Solution. We say that latria is defined here through a general act, which nevertheless can be appropriated through an account sub-understood from the object, namely, so that it is service or worship owed to the Creator insofar as He is God, out of the reverence or honor proper to Him. For properly, reverence or honor are owed to the Creator, which are not owed to anything created.

§ 27. Therefore it must be said to the first objection that it is not unfitting for a virtue to be defined through its act; because just as we know powers from acts, so also we know habits from acts. And that definition does not then posit latria in the genus of act, because it is not an essential or formal definition, but rather it makes the habit manifest through its act and object.

§ 28. To the other objection, it must be said that service is called here compliance (obsequium), not subjection, as is the service taken from the condition of a slave. Just as was also evident in the authority of Augustine, that we are commanded out of charity to serve one another, that is, to comply.

§ 29. To the other objection, it must be said that worship is material in many acts, but there is one formal act, namely the exhibition of worship in testimony of the honor owed to the Creator because He Himself is God, or the Creator. For that account is one in all the material acts, and unites them all.

§ 30. To the other objection, it must be said that "Creator" expresses in its name a distinction toward the creature, which "God" or "Lord" does not do, because creatures are in some way called gods or lords. And because this worship is given to God according as He is distinguished from everything created, therefore the object of latria is expressed more properly through "Creator" than through another name. And I well concede that it is not owed to the Creator by reason of this name; but rather to Him who is Creator in this, that the Creator is distinct in honor and reverence from everything created.

§ 31. To the other objection, it must be said that believing, loving, and hoping name acts which can be material in the act of this virtue, namely if one believes or loves with the intention of professing oneself in this to worship God in testimony of the honor owed to Him. But nevertheless, to believe, to love, and to hope name the acts of faith and charity and hope, and so on for the others. Hence, to believe, according to its own account, does not regard the compliance of worship, but rather consent to the First Truth. Similarly, charity regards the account of the First Goodness, and so on for the others. And then they are distant from the act of latria. For it is not unfitting that one act that is not proper, but common, when informed by diverse differences, is of diverse virtues.

§ 32. To the other objection, it must be said that it is one thing to do something for the glory of the Lord, and another to refer it to the worship of God: because the first regards the rectitude of intention only, but the second regards the rectitude of worship and of the owed honor exhibited.

Articulus 2 — Whether Latria Is a Virtue

Whether latria is a virtue?

§ 33. Secondly it is asked, whether it is a virtue? And it seems that it is not. For a virtue is a voluntary habit consisting in a mean, determined for us by reason, and as the wise man will determine. But latria does not have a mean of this kind, because God cannot be worshiped too much. Therefore latria is not a virtue.

§ 34. If you say that it is a theological virtue, which does not have a mean of this kind. ON THE CONTRARY: The theological virtues are only three, and therefore species are assigned to them, just as to the others. Therefore if it were a theological virtue, it would be faith, hope, or charity; but it is none of these; therefore it is not a virtue.

§ 35. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. No act is meritorious unless it is an act of virtue. But the act of latria is a meritorious act, if the one exhibiting latria is in grace. Therefore latria is a virtue.

§ 36. 2. Also, nothing is commanded except a work of virtue. But the act of latria is commanded, Deut. 6:13: You shall fear the Lord your God, and Him alone shall you serve. Therefore latria is a virtue.

§ 37. 3. Also, concerning every difficult and good thing consisting in the will, there is had a virtue and an art. But the exhibition of worship, insofar as it is such, is a certain difficult and good thing. Therefore concerning this there is a virtue; and concerning this is latria; therefore latria is a virtue.

§ 38. Solution. It must be conceded that latria is a virtue, and the first reason which is against this must be solved, namely that this habit consists in a mean. But according to the Philosopher, not all virtues have a mean of one account. For not all have the mean of the matter of the virtue between too much and too little, as Aristotle says in the V book of the Ethics; but they have a certain mean, which is right reason. Such are those that are in reason, like prudence, and justice with its parts. And this is the mean to which the work is directed, and this virtue has such a mean. For I well concede that God cannot be worshiped too much. Nevertheless, there are some who say that every political virtue has a mean between too much and too little; and they say that God can be worshiped too much, and too little. But this is not according to the Philosopher in the New Ethics.

§ 39. To the other objection, it must be said that I well concede that it is not a theological virtue, nor any part of any theological virtue.

§ 40. Nevertheless, even the arguments brought to the contrary, although they conclude to what is true, and belong to the Masters, they are not however drawn from the proper principles of Ethics. Because in my judgment, it is not true that no act is meritorious unless it is an act of virtue. For properly speaking, an act of virtue is called that which is similar to the virtue, and from which it would be generated and perfected by habituation; just as to attack arduous things and to undergo terrible things voluntarily belong to fortitude, and to restrain from innate delectable things, and sexual matters, and matters of taste belongs to temperance, and so on. And beyond this, to go to Church, or to sit, or to stand, are not acts of any particular virtue, yet they can be done meritoriously. But the Masters who introduce that proposition take the act of virtue generally, because namely it is elicited by some virtue in whatever mode, and especially by charity, which is as it were the universal mover in all good works.

§ 41. I say the same concerning the other, that "nothing is commanded except a work of virtue" is not true, unless it is understood of an act reducible to a virtue in whatever mode. For it was commanded to Adam that he should not eat of the tree which was in paradise, and it was not according to itself a work of any virtue.

Articulus 3 — Of Which of the Principal Virtues Latria Is a Species

Of which of the principal virtues is latria a species?

§ 42. Thirdly it is asked, of which of the principal virtues is it a species? And it seems that it is of faith, because: 1. Faith determines God and the rewarder who is to be worshiped. For the Apostle says, Heb. 11:6: He who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder to those who seek Him.

§ 43. 2. Also, it seems that it is of prudence, because prudence discovers what is to be worshiped.

§ 44. BUT IT SEEMS, as all say, that it is justice. 1. For when it is called worship owed to God, in the name of the debt the account of justice is determined. Therefore latria is a species of justice.

§ 45. 2. Also, justice orders toward a superior. But latria is exhibited to God the superior, insofar as He is superior. Therefore it pertains to justice.

§ 46. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Justice renders a debt, because it is a debt; but worship is expended out of liberality, because otherwise it would not be meritorious. Therefore it seems that it is not a debt; therefore it is not ordered under justice.

§ 47. Solution. It must be said with Cicero that it is a part of justice, and falls into that part of justice which is religion. For thus Cicero says at the end of the first Rhetoric, where he posits religion as a part of justice, because religion is that which brings care and ceremony to a certain superior nature which they call divine. Now it is clear that he calls "care" the due account, and "ceremony" the worship; because ceremony or piety denotes the duties of Ceres, and it is transferred to the other services of the gods, in which they were worshiped. But here it is taken for the worship of the superior nature which is divine. Hence latria is located under it; and if it is exhibited to an idol, it will be idolatry.

§ 48. Therefore it must be said to the first objection that although faith shows what is to be worshiped, nevertheless it does not move one to worship, as the proper habit of this act; but rather it moves one to believe.

§ 49. To the other objection, it must be said that prudence does not attend to the debt, but rather to the account of what is eligible for the work. For Augustine says in the book On the Morals of the Catholic Church, that prudence is a love wisely choosing those things by which it is helped, away from those things by which it is hindered. And although sometimes the eligible thing, the work, and the debt are the same, yet the account of what is eligible insofar as it is such is one thing, and the account of the debt even in that it is such is another; and they are distinguished by those accounts.

Articulus 4 — To Whom Is Latria Properly Owed, and Whether Through Any Creature We Can Adore God with Latria

To whom is latria properly owed? And, can we adore God with latria in any creature?

§ 50. Fourthly it is asked, to whom is latria properly owed?

§ 51. As the Text says here, to the Creator alone. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Concerning Abraham, Gen. 18:2, it is read that he saw three, and adored one. And yet Augustine says that they were Angels. Therefore it seems, since Abraham is not reprehended, that worship of this kind can be transferred to a creature.

§ 52. 2. Also, Rev. 22:8–9, John fell before the feet of the Angel, and wished to adore him; and he forbade him, saying: See that you do not do it; for I am your fellow servant. Therefore he wished to adore him either with dulia, or with latria. If with dulia: this does not seem right, because the Angel would not have forbidden it, since that can be expended to a creature, even one that is lower than an Angel. Therefore it seems that he wished to adore him with latria; and John is not reprehended for this, nor is he said to have sinned. Therefore it seems that latria can be exhibited to a creature without sin.

§ 53. 3. Furthermore, we adore images of Christ, and of the crucifix, and of the Saints. Therefore, either with dulia, or with latria. If with dulia: then since adoration, as Damascene says, is referred to the prototype, we adore Christ with dulia, not with latria, which is against Damascene and Augustine. But if with latria: I have my proposition, that some creature can be worshiped with latria.

§ 54. 4. Also, in honor and reverence we see God communicate His gifts and attributes to men and Angels, because some are established from the opposite in dignity. Therefore, if He communicated to them that which is worshiped in Him, He Himself also communicates worship to the same; therefore they are to be worshiped with latria; therefore not God alone.

§ 55. Solution. It must be said that God alone is to be worshiped with latria, as Augustine says here.

§ 56. As to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that Abraham recognized the mystery of the Trinity and unity in the Angels, and therefore he adored the Trinity in them. And it well happens that the Trinity is adored in itself or in a sign.

§ 57. To the other objection, it must be said that John adored the Angel with dulia. But there are three reasons why the Angel forbade him. One is: because human nature was already exalted in Christ; hence what the Angels allowed to be done to themselves in the Old Testament, they did not allow in the New. The second is the evil appearance: lest perhaps it might seem to some simple person reading later that John had adored with latria, and he might do likewise. The third reason is more efficacious, as I think, that in this the Angel showed the dignity of John, who was of no lesser dignity than many Angels.

§ 58. But from this determination a question results: 1. For it was said that Abraham adored God in a sign, and we in images.

§ 59. Therefore let it be asked: Whether I can adore God in any rational creature? It seems that I can, because:

§ 60. 2. No image is so similar to God as that which is in the mind of a rational creature. Therefore, God ought especially to be adored with latria in it.

§ 61. 3. Also, 1 Cor. 3:17: The temple of God is holy, which you are. But in a temple we adore God, which we made with our own hands. Therefore much more can we adore in the temple which He Himself made.

§ 62. 4. Also, the soul of the just man is the seat of wisdom. And again: I will dwell in them, and walk among them. Therefore it seems that we can adore Him, especially in the Saints.

§ 63. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The Angel forbade that he be adored by John; therefore neither ought other Saints to be adored.

§ 64. Solution. It must be said that God ought not to be adored except in an image established in memory of His figure, which He assumed for us, that is in the figure of the cross and passion, and of the other sacraments which He undertook for us, such as of the nativity, baptism, and resurrection, and the like. For adoration of this kind in a dead image is referred to the prototype, as Damascene says. And this is conceded in the New Testament, and not in the Old, because God had not yet assumed an image which could be made for Him.

§ 65. Similarly, the state of idolatry was still strong [in the Old Testament]. Hence, now latria can be adored in such images.

§ 66. But note that it differs to speak of an image as an image, and an image as an absolute thing, made of stone, or wood, or another matter. To adore an image as an image is to be led through the intellect and the intention of adoration into Him whose image it is; and this is what John of Damascus calls referring the honor of adoration to the prototype. For it is called a prototype from πρῶτος (protos), which is first, and τύπος (typos), which is figure, and it is the principal figure of the man Christ. But an image as it is a thing out of this matter, we ought in no way to adore. And by this the third and fourth arguments of the principal question are solved. Hence, if a cross is taken apart, so that it does not represent the figure of the passion, I ought not to adore it with the adoration of latria.

§ 67. Therefore it must be said to the first objection that in the three men whom Abraham adored, personal distinction was represented with respect to number, and unity of essence with respect to consent. But this was not yet sufficient; rather, because their apparition was for this end, that such a distinction of Trinity and unity might become known to Abraham in them. And therefore, if three men appeared to us not sent for this end, we ought not to adore them with the adoration of latria.

§ 68. But if you ask, whence would Abraham know this? I say that it was through revelation, and that gift of grace which is called the discernment of spirits.

§ 69. To the other objection, it must be said that we cannot adore God with latria in an image which is a man, because of the conjoined danger. Because vainglory is near to us, and therefore that man would quickly believe that he is being adored on account of his own dignity. But from the contemplation of the image in him, and especially from the grace which appears in him, we can well be excited to adore God, just as we praise God in His saints.

§ 70. To the other objection, it must be said that in a material temple there is not a conjoined danger as there is in a spiritual temple. And if you say, "I will adore secretly, so that he does not know." The response is that still it is not to be done, because his image is not established for this, that it be referred to the prototype. But as I said before, you can be excited to adore from his similitude which he has to God in natural things and in grace.

Articulus 5 — What Dulia Is

What is dulia?

§ 71. Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, at A, around the middle: For there is a certain mode of dulia, etc.

§ 72. For here it is asked, What is dulia, and whether it is one and the same virtue with latria, and to whom is it owed?

§ 73. Now from the authority introduced above from the first book On the Trinity and from the Text here, a definition is drawn which the Masters give, that dulia is the honor or service or worship owed to a creature.

§ 74. But it seems that no honor is owed to a creature from the time that man fell, except perhaps to Angels and Saints, because:

1. Thus says Psalm 48:13, 21 [Vulgate]: Man, when he was in honor, did not understand; he is compared to senseless beasts, etc. Therefore it seems that no worship is owed to man; therefore much less to a creature lower than man is; and thus the definition seems false.

§ 75. 2. Also, if I ought not to adore a man (in such a way that I adore God in him) because of the conjoined danger, since there is also danger in the honor of dulia, I ought not to adore with dulia.

§ 76. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Gen. 23:7, Abraham adored the people of the land, and he was not reprehended, even though they were sinners.

§ 77. Solution. I say that worship and honor are owed to a creature which is the image of God, unless it is depraved by the vice of confirmation in evil. And this is what the Apostle says, Rom. 13:7: To whom honor, honor. And elsewhere: Outdoing one another in showing honor. And it is the custom of certain religious to bow to every brother when meeting them.

§ 78. Therefore to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that fallen man (in a recoverable way) is not compared to beasts in the loss of the image, but in the loss of the honor of grace which he had upon the image. And therefore through the necessity of dying and penalties he is compared to beasts, not through this, that no worship is owed to him, since he himself still, according to possibility and the order of the way, can attain to the highest honor of eternal beatitude.

§ 79. To the other objection, it must be said that it is not similar: because latria has divine honor in itself, which is the greatest; but not dulia. And therefore the honor of dulia does not elevate a man above himself, so that his heart is lifted up in pride like that of latria. For it is no pride if a man receives that which is owed to him; but if he attributes it to himself on account of himself, this is pride.

Articulus 6 — Whether Dulia Is the Same Virtue as Latria, and Whether Dulia and Hyperdulia Are of One Common Species

Whether dulia is the same virtue with latria? And, whether dulia and hyperdulia are one common species?

§ 80. Secondly it is asked, whether it is the same virtue with latria?

§ 81. It seems that it is, because: 1. We love God and neighbor by one species of virtue which is love (dilectio).

§ 82. 2. And again, we believe certain things about God, and about the punishments of hell, and about certain other things, by one species of virtue which is faith.

§ 83. 3. Also, by one species of dulia we adore a king, and a simple man. Therefore it seems that it is one habit moving to adore God and man. Therefore dulia and latria are one species of virtue.

§ 84. 4. Also, species of virtue do not differ by matter alone, but by form. But if worship is attributed to God, and if it is attributed to man, there seems to be no difference except a material one. Therefore it seems that the species of virtue is not varied on account of this. Therefore dulia and latria are one species of virtue.

§ 85. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

There is an infinite distance between the honor...

§ 1. [Conclusion of a preceding argument:] ...owed to God, and among the honor owed to a creature: but between those things that are of one species there is not an infinite distance: therefore the virtue moving to render cult to God, and the virtue moving to render cult to man, will not be of one species.

§ 2. Next to this it is further asked, Whether hyperdulia and dulia are one common species of virtue?

§ 3. It seems that they are not: because 1. The Master here says that these two species of dulia differ.

§ 4. 2. Also, justice, according to the degrees investigating what is due, is distributed into species: as obedience is due to superiors: hence, Heb. 13:17: Obey your prelates, and be subject to them: for they watch, as if to render an account for your souls. To inferiors, however, mercy is due: because mercy is due to misery. And to parents, piety: because Tully says that: Piety is benevolence toward parents. Therefore, by a similar reasoning it seems also that dulia is distinguished into species according to the degrees of men.

§ 5. 3. Also, not one cult and honor and reverence is due to all: for princes are honored and worshipped in one way, and inferior prelates in another, and subjects in another: therefore it seems that they are diverse species.

§ 6. Solution. To the first, it must be said that latria and dulia are diverse species of virtue: agreeing nevertheless in a proximate genus, which however is unnamed, just as we do not have names for many virtues.

§ 7. To that which is objected concerning love: it must be said that it is not similar: because in love the end and the material are the same: and the end serves as its formal difference. Hence, since charity does not differ regarding God and neighbor except according to the material, and not according to the end which is the rationale of the act and the difference drawing it into a species: the love of neighbor does not differ from the love of God except through the material and the act, and not through the habit. For when I love my neighbor, for God's sake I love him as myself, that is, for that for which [I love] myself, that is, for God: and thus love rests in God, although it takes its material in the neighbor. But it is not so here: because the cult due to a creature does not rest in divine cult.

§ 8. And if you object that all things are referred to one end, namely that they be for the sake of God. The response is that this is true concerning the end of a universal intention, but it is not true concerning the end of this or that act: for just as we see in nature, that it intends a double end: one through generation, and that end is the form acquired in the generation of this thing: and another which it does not intend through this generation, but through the whole succession of generation, which is the perpetuity of being in generable and corruptible things: so also it is in moral works. For the intention of the work is that in which the act of the efficient cause terminates, and that is to render what is due in a work of justice, and to endure for the sake of the good in a work of fortitude, and the love of the highest good in a work of charity, and not of just any good, and divine ceremony in a work of latria, and reverence due to a creature in a work of dulia. There is another intention which is the universal act to the effect that through all these things [something] ought to be acquired, namely eternal beatitude and happiness. Hence it is clear that charity in loving God and neighbor has one end of the work, but not dulia and latria. Moreover, this end is that by which the virtue is drawn into a species.

§ 9. To that which is objected concerning faith, it must be said that there is no similarity: because in every article of faith one divine truth is subjected, which nevertheless receives determination through special articles: and therefore there is one rationale of believing in all of them, namely on account of the highest truth: and therefore faith is one species of virtue: yet we do not believe in eternal punishments, nor in one Church [in the same way as God]: but in God judging through punishments, and in God uniting the Church: and so concerning the others. But here, divine and human honor are not reduced to the same thing.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that human honor is reduced to the same thing, namely to the sign of the image of God, not depraved through the confirmation of sin. But that which is added in the other likenesses only varies according to quantity: as a king who has the likeness of God in an image, and the place of God and of a judge in degree, and so concerning others: and therefore a greater cult is due to him, but not one that is other according to species. But in divine honor and human honor there is no such agreement: because we are nothing compared to God: and through Him we are whatever we are: and therefore in adoring God we profess this: but we do not profess this in honoring a king or a simple man, but rather a remote likeness to Him in an image, or His place in the governance of justice and prelacy.

§ 11. To the other the solution is already clear through what was said before: because it has been shown that they do not differ through material alone, but also through the proximate end of the act which is the form in moral matters.

§ 12. To that which is further asked, I respond that every dulia is of the same species as every [other] dulia, as was explained before: and what the Master says here, he says on account of the speciality of the material, and of an inseparable accident. Hence they are accidental species, just as sulfurous water, and sweet, and salty, are diverse species of water.

§ 13. To the other it must be said that in justice the rationale of the debt is varied, not only the material. For the rationale of the debt which is due to an inferior is one thing, and that which is due to a superior is another: but this is not posited over common honor except as an accidental difference.

§ 14. To the other it must be said that such a difference, causing only a greater and a lesser, does not vary the species: but it attends to an accident, and to some property of those things which are in the species.

Articulus 7 — To Whom Dulia Is Owed

To whom is dulia due?

§ 17. Thirdly it is asked, To whom is dulia due?

§ 18. Here it seems according to what was determined, that it is due to every creature. From this it follows that it is due even to sinners, especially since Abraham adored sinners when he wished to buy the double cave for the right of a sepulcher.

§ 19. But then it is asked, Whether it is due to the devil and to the souls of the damned?

§ 20. And it seems that it is: because the image is in them, as Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: The natural gifts given to them we say are by no means changed: but they are intact and most splendid.

§ 21. NEXT TO THIS it is further asked, Whether it is due to those whom we see in the act of sin, while they are in the sin itself and the act: as if I were to see a prelate fornicating, whether in that act when I passed by, I ought to recognize the honor of his degree to him through dulia?

§ 22. And it seems that I ought not: because Gregory says in the Pastoral Care, that fault is vehemently extended as an example, when a sinner is honored through reverence for his degree.

§ 23. Also it is further asked, Whether such honor is due to an irrational creature?

§ 24. And it seems that it is not, on account of the appearance of idolatry: for not only must evil be fled, but also the appearance of evil.

§ 25. Also, such creatures are inferior to us: and what is inferior ought not to be honored by a superior.

§ 26. Solution. I say that dulia is due to a rational creature not irremediably depraved by sin, in whom an act of unworthiness does not appear: and thus it is not due to those who are in the act of sin, because an act contrary to honor and reverence appears in them: because honor is the exhibition of reverence in testimony of virtue, and an act of iniquity appears in him. But afterwards we do not know, nor can we know, in what state he is: and therefore he is to be honored then.

§ 27. And from this the solution to the whole is clear: because it is not due to a rational creature irremediably depraved on account of a contrary disposition inseparably conjoined to it: and it is not due to an irrational creature, because it is a trace and an obscure likeness, not expressly showing the honor of the likeness of God.

Articulus 8 — Whether Piety Belongs Univocally to God and to Creatures

Whether piety belongs univocally to God and to creatures?

§ 30. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, towards the end: Which in Latin is called piety, etc.

§ 31. For piety is a gift of the Holy Spirit. Piety also, according to Tully, is a species of the virtue of justice through which duty and worthy cult are attributed to blood relatives and well-wishers of the fatherland. Piety is also called the cult of God.

§ 32. And it is asked, Whether it is said univocally or equivocally?

§ 33. It seems that it is equivocal: because 1. There is not one rationale in all these, especially in God and a creature.

§ 34. 2. Moreover, Augustine posits another signification: for he says that prayer is the pious affection of the mind towards God: and that signification does not fall directly into any determinate signification.

§ 35. 3. Moreover, it seems to be false what he says, that this cult is of piety: because it is rather of religion. Hence Augustine in book X of The City of God: Which therefore is called 'latria' in Greek, and in Latin is interpreted as service. But that by which we worship God, or which is 'threskeia' in Greek, in Latin however is called religion: but that which is in us toward God, or which they call 'eusebeia', we indeed cannot express in one word, but can call it the cult of God: for this we say we owe only to God, who is the true God, and makes his worshippers gods: therefore it seems that it is not called piety.

§ 36. 4. Also, Augustine, in the same place a little further down: He (God) is the fount of our beatitude, He is the end of all appetite. Choosing Him or rather re-choosing (religentes) Him, for by neglecting Him we had lost Him: therefore re-choosing Him, whence also religion is said to be named, we tend to Him by love, so that by arriving we may rest. Therefore it seems that it should be called religion, and not piety.

§ 37. Moreover it is asked, How are love and sacrifice part of divine cult? For love is an act of a special virtue which is charity: and therefore it does not seem to pertain to latria. Similarly sacrifice is an act of exterior oblation: why then does the cult of God consist more in it, than in censing, prostration, and genuflection?

§ 38. Solution. We say to the first, that piety according to Augustine is said in multiple ways, and not equivocally, nor univocally, but according to prior and posterior [i.e., analogically]. For it is called the cult of God, and of the image of God: but there is a certain image of God in blood relatives and well-wishers of the fatherland, from the fact that we somehow are through them, just as we simply are through God. And the rationale of the image is also found in all men: and thus cult and service are found in the gift of piety towards all. Moreover, piety which is an affection in prayer, expresses the disposition of one tending through service and cult to God, in an affection melting through the love of Him who is worshipped. And through this the solution to the first two is clear.

§ 39. To the other it must be said that religion and the cult of God are not the same: but religion is the observance of those worshipping derived from cult, and observed on account of cult. Hence religion is named as if a binding back (religatio): and it binds the worshipper to a life which harmonizes with the cult. And Augustine notes this distinctly saying, that latria is the cult by which God is worshipped: while religion is that which is in us toward God. And if it is objected that Augustine says that it is named from re-choosing (religendo): it must be said that Augustine says both, because one is the cause of the other: for when we re-choose God to be worshipped by us, we bind ourselves back to the observances in which we harmonize with His cult.

§ 40. To the other it must be said that love is of the cult materially, and as moving [it]. But sacrifice [is of it] essentially as an act of cult. Hence Augustine says that sacrifice is offered to none but God: and the appearing Angels, if they were good, did not ask that sacrifice be offered to them: because they did not usurp the honor of God.

§ 41. TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that that act professes divine honor more than any other, because it is due to Him alone from whom we have all things that we offer, and who offered a sacrifice for us: but we exhibit other operations even to men.

§ 42. And note that sacrifice is one thing, oblation another: because an oblation is made for the use of the ministers, so that they may have food in the house of God. But a sacrifice is offered to God alone: although from its determination afterwards, it may be converted either to use, or to something else.

§ 43. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether the Humanity of Christ Is to Be Adored with Latria

Whether the humanity of Christ is to be adored with latria?

§ 46. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: But it pleases others, etc.

§ 47. For it seems that Christ's humanity ought not to be adored with latria: because § 48. 1. Humanity (as exposed above) is human nature, and always remained created, and a creature in all its properties: therefore service is not due to it except as to a creature.

§ 49. 2. Also, Christ is true God, and true man: therefore if from the truth of God the cult of God is due to Him, from the truth of man the cult of man is due to Him. But this is dulia: therefore He ought not to be adored with latria.

§ 50. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Rabanus says: The flesh of Christ is to be adored with latria: therefore it seems that it is to be adored with latria just like the Word of God: but not with every species of latria: because we do not adore it prostrated on the earth: just as we neither believe that it created us: nor do we sacrifice to it as to God: but we adore it, because through it we were redeemed, just as through God.

§ 51. To the same effect avail the similarities introduced by Damascene and Augustine, which lie in the letter [of the text].

§ 52. But here a doubt occurs concerning the saying of Rabanus: because he seems to posit diverse species of latria, and he seems to say that we do not adore prostrated: yet we frequently adore even men while prostrated: as Jacob said to his sons going into Egypt: Go to the lord of the land, and when you find him, adore him upon the earth.

§ 53. Moreover concerning this it is asked, With what adoration is the glorious mother of the Word who assumed flesh to be adored?

§ 54. And it seems that with latria: because the honor of the mother is referred to the king.

§ 55. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Because she is a simple creature: therefore divine honor is not due to her: nor will she, since she is most excellent and most just, seek it as if by usurping what belongs to another.

§ 56. Solution. It must be said that the flesh of Christ is considered in two ways, namely as it is the supposit which is this man and Christ: and since He is God, He is adored with nothing but latria as God, because He is truly God according to the second opinion touched upon above, which alone is truly Catholic. And through this "flesh" is understood when it is said, The Word became flesh: because through synecdoche a part is posited for the whole.

§ 57. In another way it is considered as a part of this man: and then because it is actually united to the deity, and nothing of it is separated from the deity, just as no part of a coal is separated from the fire: therefore it is still to be adored with latria.

§ 58. Thirdly, it is considered vaguely according to the intellect alone, denuded of the deity: and thus it is to be adored with hyperdulia, as the previously introduced opinion stated.

§ 59. To that which is first objected, it must be said that although humanity is distinct from the [divine] nature by its properties, it is nevertheless not separated from fellowship and union.

§ 60. To the other it must be said that although He is true man, He is not, however, a mere man. Yet I do not deny that hyperdulia may be exhibited both to Christ and to God: because He is worthy not only of one honor, but of every honor: but He ought not to be adored with dulia alone. Hence the Gloss on that Psalm 97:5 [Vulgate]: In the churches bless the Lord God: says God, because He is adored with latria: and Lord, because He is adored with dulia.

§ 61. To the other it must be said that there are material and accidental species, as was said before concerning dulia, because God is adored in Himself and in the assumed humanity.

§ 62. To the other it must be said that prostration is done in two ways, namely in testimony of honor, or as a sign of an attribute which is to us the cause of veneration in that mode of adoration. In the first way, we adore prostrated everyone whom we worship. In the second way, we adore prostrated the Creator who raised us from nothing into something, and genuflection is as if a falling toward the Redeemer who raised the sinner up from his fall.

§ 63. To the other it must be said that the Blessed Virgin is to be adored with hyperdulia: for although the honor of the mother is the honor of the king, yet because through the deity the Son had another generation, divine honor is not due to her, just as the Son did not receive the deity from her.

Articulus 10 — By What Species of Worship Christ Ought to Be Worshiped

With what species of cult ought Christ to be worshipped?

§ 66. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, around the middle: If the Son is not God by nature, but a creature: neither is He to be worshipped, etc.

§ 67. On the contrary: It does not belong to the same being to worship, and to be worshipped. But the Son worshipped the Father, by praying, offering, subjecting Himself: therefore it seems that He ought not to be worshipped with latria.

§ 68. TO THIS it must be said that Christ ought to be worshipped with latria: for although He worshipped, He did this insofar as He was man, and the mediator of God and men. Hence both belong to Him, and one does not exclude the other: just as according to humanity He is less than the Father, and according to divinity equal.

Articulus 11 — How The Consecrated Host Is To Be Adored

§ 71. How is the consecrated host to be adored?

§ 72. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, around the middle: They worshipped and served the creature rather, etc.

§ 73. 1. For let us suppose that Satan transfigures himself into an Angel of light, and some simple person adores him with latria: he seems to worship a creature: and yet not to sin, because ignorance of fact excuses entirely.

§ 74. 2. Moreover, let us suppose that he applies whatever diligence he can, and it always seems to him to be God: then he seems not to sin by adoring him as Christ: for this man is not bound to have the discernment of spirits, because he cannot acquire it: therefore if he does what he can, he does not seem to sin.

§ 75. Further, it is asked concerning the adoration of the host in the Mass:

§ 76. 1. For it is not certain to me that it is consecrated: therefore I ought never to adore it, except under a condition, namely, if he omitted nothing of the contingents: but this seems absurd if every simple person ought to have a condition of this sort in his consideration.

§ 77. 2. Moreover, good is to be presumed of anyone, unless the contrary is proved: therefore I ought to presume good of the celebrating priest: therefore I ought to presume that the host is consecrated, since the contrary has not been proved to me.

§ 78. Solution. To the first I say that by him who does not have the discernment of spirits, everything that appears to the senses is to be feared, and is never to be adored absolutely for three reasons: one of which is on account of the frequent illusion of the senses.

§ 79. The second is the conscience of one's own humility: because he ought to repute himself not worthy that a good Angel should appear to him: and therefore to fear an evil one. The third is that an appended condition does no harm, but can be beneficial. For if it is God who appears, He will love that we are safe on account of the fear of Him. We have an example of this according to the exposition of Chrysostom on John 1:45 and following, in Nathanael, to whom when Philip called saying: We have found Jesus, the son of Joseph, from Nazareth, he responded: Can anything good be from Nazareth? as if slow to believe: and therefore because he did not believe immediately, but examined the fact, not believing every spirit, but testing the appearance if it was from God, he was praised by Christ when He says: Behold a true Israelite, in whom there is no guile. There is also an example in Zechariah, Luke 1:12 and 29, and in the Blessed Virgin, who were troubled at the visitation of a good Angel: and therefore I say that he who adores absolutely can never do what is in his power [to avoid error]: because it was within his power that, fearing for these reasons, he should append a condition.

§ 80. And to that which is asked concerning the host of the priest, it is to be solved by distinguishing, that namely the priest is either known or unknown. If he is known: it is either known that he is accustomed to be negligent in divine matters, or not: because many, although they are of bad life, are nevertheless not negligent in divine matters, so as to omit anything. If it is known that he is not accustomed to omit anything, then by that very fact the condition is probably presupposed by the adorer, namely that the host is consecrated. But if he is unknown, or his customary negligence in divine matters is known: then I consider it well that the condition ought to be appended actually or habitually.

§ 81. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that I do not thereby judge the priest to be evil: but as a wise man I guard myself from the danger of idolatry, or from the appearance of idolatry.

Articulus 12 — Whether Christ Is More Adored than Any One of the Three Persons

Whether Christ is adored more than any of the three persons?

§ 84. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, near the end: In Christ the Lord humanity not alone, or bare, etc.

§ 85. 1. For it seems to follow from this that the Son is more to be adored after the incarnation than before: because after the incarnation we adore both natures in Him, before the incarnation only one.

§ 86. 2. Also, from this it seems that the Son is more to be adored than the Father or the Holy Spirit; because in them we adore only one nature, but in Christ two.

§ 87. But TO THIS it is easy to respond: because it does not follow if more things are adored in Him, that on account of this He is adored more: and the discrete is changed there as if into the continuous. Or it may be said that the adoration of the human nature does not add a new adoration, but a new material, in which the deity is adored: because the adoration does not rest in the human nature in itself, but is referred to the divine nature united to it: and thus the adoration of the three is one, just as the divinity of the three is one.

Articulus 13 — Whether There Is One Adoration of the Three Persons

Whether there is one adoration of the three persons?

§ 90. But then it is asked by reason of this, Whether the three persons are adored with one adoration?

§ 91. And it seems that they are not: because faith distinguishes among them: and adoration follows faith: therefore the adoration will be distinct.

§ 92. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Adoration is the profession of majesty to be worshipped: since therefore the majesty of the three is one, the adoration will be one.

§ 93. 2. Also, let us suppose the persons did not exist, there will still be the same rationale of adoration as now, namely because the Creator and the highest majesty is worthy of the highest cult and honor: therefore it seems that adoration is not due to the persons insofar as they are distinct, but insofar as they are one: and thus it follows that their adoration is one.

§ 94. Solution. I readily concede that the adoration of the three is one as to the rationale of adoration: because that which and on account of which we adore, is one in the three.

§ 95. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although faith distinguishes, nevertheless it also unites the persons, and says that there is one thing in the three insofar as they are to be adored. But if faith were to posit the rationale of adoration in distinguishing properties, the argument would follow, which faith does not do: but rather it posits [the rationale of adoration] in that which unites the persons, which is the nature of the divinity one in the three.

§ 96. Division of the Text

§ 97. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 98. It is also customary to be inquired by some, etc. Here begins that part in which the Master treats of the properties consequent upon Christ united from human nature: and it contains this and the following distinction, and the first chapter of the twelfth distinction.

§ 99. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is determined concerning the properties consequent upon Christ according as He is man: and this begins at the beginning of distinction XI, there, It is also customary to be asked, Whether it ought to be said simply, etc.

§ 100. And this distinction which contains the first part, is divided into three parts. In the first it is shown that being a person does not follow upon Christ in that He is man. In the second it is shown that being an adoptive son does not follow Him in that He is man, namely there, D, But if it is asked, Whether Christ is an adoptive son, etc.? In the third it is asked, To what is His predestination referred, whether to nature, or to person? and this in that He is man, because thus He is predestined: in the last chapter, namely there, F, Next if it is asked, Whether predestination, etc.

§ 101. In the first of these there are three chapters, whose division is evident in itself.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ, Insofar as He Is Man, Is a Person, and Whether Christ, Insofar as He Is Man, Is an Individual, and Whether Insofar as He Is Man He Is Also a Supposit, and Whether Insofar as He Is Man He Is a Thing of Nature

Whether Christ according as He is man, is a person? and, Whether Christ according as He is man, is an individual? and, Whether in that He is man, He is also a supposit? and, Whether according as He is man, He is a thing of nature?

§ 104. Here there is a doubt first concerning that question which he posits in the first chapter, Whether Christ according as He is man, is a person?

§ 105. Now it seems that He is: because 1. Christ according as He is man, is either man in species, or in the individual. Not in species: because thus He would either be very simple, because He would be in every man: or He would be every man: both of which are false. Just as Damascene also says, that He assumed our nature not in species, but in an atom: therefore Christ is one man: but the one is that which is undivided in itself, and divided from any other: therefore Christ is a singular man in the nature of man: but every singular man in the nature of man is a person: therefore Christ insofar as He is man, is a person.

§ 106. 2. Also, Christ insofar as He is man, is a rational mortal animal, and a 'this': therefore He is this rational mortal animal: but of whatsoever it is true to say that it is this rational mortal animal, it is a person: therefore Christ insofar as He is man, is a person.

§ 107. 3. Also, a person is called as if one through itself: but Christ insofar as He is man is one through Himself: which was proved above, because Christ is not two: therefore Christ insofar as He is man, is a person.

§ 108. 4. Moreover, what inconvenience would there be, when it is said that Christ insofar as He is man, is a person? It seems that none: because from this it does not follow that Christ is two persons: just as I see that insofar as He is man He slept, and insofar as He is God He created the stars: and yet it does not follow that He is two.

§ 109. 5. Moreover, Insofar as He is man: He is either something, or nothing. It is certain that He is something: therefore that which He is insofar as He is man, is predicated directly of Him, and He cannot not be this something in the species of man: but this perfect something in the nature of man is nothing other than a person.

§ 110. FURTHER it is asked, Since being an individual is less than being a person, whether according as He is man, He is an individual?

§ 111. Now it seems that He is: because 1. An individual is that which consists of a collection of accidents, which is impossible to be found in another: but many such accidents are found in the man Christ: therefore it seems that in that He is man He is an individual.

§ 112. 2. Also, Boethius: Species is the whole being of individuals. And he says this for this reason, because whatever is after the species, has individuating characteristics befitting it alone: therefore He according as He is man, is an individual.

§ 113. FURTHER it is asked, Whether He in that He is man is a supposit?

§ 114. And it seems that He is: 1. For everything which is a this something under some common nature, is a supposit of that nature: but Christ in that He is man, is a this something in this common nature which is man: therefore He is a supposit of man.

§ 115. 2. Also, the community which is in the rationale of a supposit when it is said, Peter is a supposit of man, and Paul is a supposit of man, and so concerning others, proceeds from the proportion of the singulars to the community of the species: but man is truly predicated of Christ: therefore He has that proportion to the species which others have: therefore He according as He is man, is a supposit of man.

§ 116. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Damascene says that in the Lord Jesus one cannot receive a common species: therefore nor a supposit of any species: therefore Christ according as He is man, is not a supposit of any species.

§ 117. 2. Also, Boethius: Species is the whole being of individuals: but the species of man is not the whole being of Christ: therefore He is not a supposit of man. THE PROOF of the minor is: because Christ is in divinity and humanity: therefore humanity is not His whole being.

§ 118. 3. Also, it was held above in the exposition of the second opinion, that this man is supposited by three substances, and two natures: but no supposit is except in one nature: therefore Christ in that He is man, or according as He is man, is not a supposit of man.

§ 119. 4. Also, the Philosopher says that the rationale of a proposition, and of only one proposition, is the same: therefore by a similar reasoning the rationale of a supposit, and of only one supposit, is the same. Thence it is further objected: One supposit is the supposit of one nature: but Christ is not subjected to one nature: therefore He is not one supposit: because what is not one, is not anything, as Boethius says.

§ 120. FURTHER it is asked, If Christ according as He is man, is a thing of human nature (res naturae humanae)?

§ 121. It seems that He is: because 1. A thing of nature is that which is made by the act of that nature which is generation: but Christ was made by human generation and nativity from a mother: therefore He is a thing of human nature, as it seems.

§ 122. 2. Also, it was held above from Damascene that He is homoousios, in the explanation of the second opinion: but this cannot be unless He is a thing of the same nature as that thing is: and that thing is of human nature: therefore Christ also is a thing of the same nature.

§ 123. 1. A thing of any nature is a hypostasis...

incommunicable under that nature. But Christ, according to what he is as man, is not an incommunicable hypostasis under human nature. Therefore, he is not a thing of human nature. Proof of the minor premise: Christ, in that he is man, is assumed into the singularity of the divine person; therefore, he is not incommunicable under human nature, because it was held above that what is incommunicable does not communicate assumption to another.

§ 2. If you say that in that he is man, he is not assumed into the singularity of the divine person. On the contrary: Christ is one singular person: either in that he is man, or in that he is

God. It is clear that it is not in that he is man, because he is a person by an eternal personality, as the Saints say. Therefore, he is a person insofar as he is God. If, therefore, this man is in the same singularity of person, this will be through assumption; therefore, he himself, in that he is man, communicated in the singularity of the divine person.

§ 3. To these and all sophisms of this kind the Master posited a distinction regarding the consignifications of "according to what" or "in that", as is clear in the text. But because below we will give the rationale for that distinction, we therefore answer these plainly according to what was held above in distinction 5. And we say to the first question, that if the word "according to what" notes a cause or a condition of the nature—that is, that humanity is the cause why he is a person, or the human condition or property in him is the cause that he is a person—then, I say, we state that he in that he is man, or according to what he is as man, is not a person; because the personality by which he is a person is an eternal personality, and this follows divinity in him. But if, when it is said, "Christ according to what he is as man is a person," the word "according to what" notes the unity or identity of the human supposit to the divine supposit, then he in that he is, or according to what he is as man, is a person.

§ 4. In this sense all the subsequent questions concerning the individual, and the supposit, and the thing of nature, must also be distinguished, especially according to the second opinion, which alone we hold: because it posits that when I say "this," pointing to Christ, he is pointed to in two natures, and in three substances because of the union. However, the last two are more easily granted—namely, that Christ according to what he is as man is a supposit and a thing of nature—than the first two—namely, that according to what he is as man he is a person or an individual of man.

§ 5. It must be said, therefore, to the first, that Christ according to what he is as man, is a man in the individual. But if we wished to force the intention of what is "one," as the objection does, then it does not follow from this that he is one man, because he is not divided from the person of the Son of God, into whose singularity he is united.

§ 6. And if you object: Christ according to what he is as man is either one man or several men; but he is not several; therefore, one. I say that this does not hold, because "one" is taken in different ways. For in the first way, being is taken as it is opposed to existing in conjunction with another; and in the second way, it is taken as it is opposed to several. And there is a counter-instance: the foot of Paul is not one. Proof: the foot of Paul is not divided from others; therefore, the foot of Paul is not one in itself. On the contrary: the foot of Paul is not one in itself; therefore, it is several. Whence it is clear that in the present case, in which there is the union of this man into the Son of God, a process of this kind is invalid. Moreover, even if it were granted that Christ were one man, insofar as one is opposed to several, it would not further follow that he would be a singular man, because he communicated in the divine person, and he is not singular by human singularity, but rather he is singular by divine personality.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that this is false: "Christ, insofar as he is man, is in himself one," as has already been shown, because person is interpreted through my saying "one in itself." But "one" as opposed to communicability and to plurality. But the objection proceeds as if it were opposed only to plurality; for thus, as it is opposed to plurality, it was proved above that he is one, and not two; but not as existing, because thus he subsists in the divine person.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that if it were granted that Christ according to what he is as man were a person, and the word "according to what" noted a cause or condition of the nature, it would follow that he would be two persons. Proof: for Christ according to what he is as God is a person, and according to what he is as man would be a person; and what he is according to what he is as God, he is not according to what he is as man. Proof: "According to what he is as man he created the stars, and is eternal," is false. "According to what he is as God he slept and ate," is false. Therefore, what he is according to what he is as God, he is not according to what he is as man; therefore, it would follow that he would be two persons. Thus I say, if the word "according to what" noted a cause or condition of the nature. And this is a great absurdity, because it is a heresy. Proof: if Christ is two persons, it is written [215] that the Father gave to that man a name which is above every name, and Augustine says, namely, that he be called and be God: that every tongue should confess it, because Christ is in the glory of God the Father. Therefore, there would be four persons in the glory of God; and thus a quaternity in the divine things would follow, which is the heresy of a certain Leporius, a Gallic monk, reprobated in the time of Pope Leo. Another heresy follows according to Boethius, namely, that if he is two persons, the union is not made in a person; nor again is the union made in a nature; therefore, no union is made in Christ; and thus that man is a mere man. And this was the heresy of Nestorius and Eutyches, refuted by Ambrose and Cassian, and reprobated by the same Pope Leo III, and condemned in the Council of Nicaea. Therefore, it is clear how great an absurdity it is to grant that Christ, in that he is man, is a person, such that the word "according to what" expresses a cause or property or condition of the nature.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that Christ in that he is man is a "something" [aliquid], because he is this man; but it does not follow that he is a person, because this "something"—that is, the man—does not have the threefold incommunicability of a person, which we noted above at the end of distinction 5.

§ 4. To what is further asked: Whether Christ according to what he is as man is an individual? It must be said in the same sense that he is not, because an individual is said to signify what is one in itself, and by its singularity is divided from others. And so all individuals include the incommunicability of a person in their understanding, although they may not have in themselves that they are supposits of a rational nature.

§ 5. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that if force is applied regarding the individuating principles, he does not have the individuating principles in that he is man. For the principle of the individuating principles is the singularity of the person, that is, the personal property, by which a person is a person; and this he does not have in that he is man, but in that he is the Son of God. But this is true, that he, being man, has that collection of individuating principles; and in that he is man he has some things which are not found in another, but those do not complete the singularity of his individuation.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that Christ in that he is man is something after the species and under the species of man; but he is not only this, rather he is also the Son of God. And therefore it does not follow that whatever is after the species in him belongs to the individuating principles in that species.

§ 7. Furthermore, this proposition of Boethius, that "The species is the whole being of the individuals," is not true except of those individuals which are subordinated to a species in one nature alone. But Christ is subordinated in two natures and three substances, as was said above.

§ 2. To what is further asked, whether Christ in that he is man or according to what he is as man is a supposit, this can be granted: even if "according to what" designates a cause or condition of the nature. However, the Master seems to wish that it not be granted absolutely, because his question is as follows: "Whether Christ according to what he is as man is a person, or even is a 'something'?" And he seems to direct his distinction back to both parts of the question. If, therefore, it is granted, it is without a doubt because supposit, individual, and person are not convertible according to the intentions of the names, even though supposit and individual are convertible according to the supposits.

§ 3. If, I say, it is granted, it must be answered to what is objected to the contrary that the understanding of the authority of Damascene is not the one which is posited, but rather that there is no common species, insofar as a species designates a form of the whole predicable of the whole: because thus in the Lord Jesus there does not result any form of a whole in which divinity and humanity are united, as the body and soul are in a man. For it was held above that the rationale of this composition, which is not a union of parts, is inexplicable. But Damascene does not mean that Christ, in that he is man, is not truly a man in species, because this was held above in his words, that he is homoousios [consubstantial] with his mother, precisely because those two natures are not compounded with respect to a third: because if they were compounded with respect to a third, then Christ would be neither man nor God, just as a man is neither a body nor a soul.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that that proposition does not hold in Christ, nor was it posited by Boethius except concerning those things which are in only one nature.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that when Christ is said to be a supposit of man, the divine nature is not excluded, nor is the supposit of the divine nature excluded; because Christ is one supposit which is truly subjected to both natures.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that I well grant that Christ is one supposit, but it is invalid if it is further inferred: "Therefore he is a supposit of one nature"; and it proceeds from an insufficiency, because either one supposit is of one nature, or it is a supposit of several natures.

§ 7. To what is further asked concerning a thing of human nature, I grant this as well in every sense.

§ 8. Now to what is objected to the contrary, that a thing of any nature is an incommunicable hypostasis, etc., I well grant it: because a thing of this nature is incommunicable, but not by its proper singularity, but by the singularity of the divine person. And this does not prevent him from truly being a thing of that nature: for the union takes nothing away from the things found there, but confers many goods.

§ 9. To what is further proposed, whether according to what he is as man he is communicable and communicates? It must be said that if the word "according to what" notes a cause or condition of the assumable and unible nature, that phrase is true. But if it expresses the unity of the person, it is false. Moreover, if it is granted in the truest sense, the further inference does not hold: "Therefore he is not a thing of nature," because a thing of nature does not have incommunicability from its own understanding. And there is a fallacy of the consequent in the argument. For it holds conversely: "It is not a thing of nature, therefore it is not incommunicable," because a thing of nature follows upon the incommunicable, and not conversely.

Articulus 2 — What Belongs to the Distinction of "Insofar As"

On the things that concern the distinction of what "according to what" is.

On the things that concern the distinction of what "according to what" is.

§ 1. Next it is asked about what the Master says, there, at A, towards the end: "For according to has a multiple rationale."

§ 2. Here the Master posits four things which the word "according to what" posits, namely, condition or property, unity of person, habit, and cause. And it is asked: What are the examples of this division?

§ 3. And it must be said that it notes condition for property, when it is posited with a word signifying one of the natures in him, and there follows something which is proper to that nature: as when it is said, "Christ according to what he is as God is good," or "according to what he is as God is uncreated," and things of this kind which denote properties belonging to God alone. And on the other part, when posited with the human nature, it infers properties following upon it: as, "Christ according to what he is as man is capable of laughing, and an animal capable of discipline, and rational, and corporeal, and mortal," and the like. According to this, note the rule, that whatever is predicated of any subject to which this phrase "according to what" or "in that" is joined, taken in this sense, is either the definition of the subject, or a part of the definition, or a proper passion which is called an accident adhering per se, or an immediate effect, or its immediate cause. And examples of this are these, in the order of enumeration: "Christ according to what he is as man is a rational, mortal animal," and "is an animal," and "is capable of laughing"; and "Christ according to what he is as slain, died"; and "Christ according to what he is as man, was generated by a temporal generation."

215. Hebrews 13:17.

§ 4. But sometimes it notes the unity or union of the nature, and this especially in Christ, as when it is said, "Christ according to what he is as man created the stars," "Christ according to what he is as God died on the cross." For there "according to what" does not note that that predicate can be inferred from the form of that to which it is joined, but rather that by virtue of the union made in the hypostasis such predicates are attributed to the subject.

§ 5. The third signification or consignification of what "according to what" is, is that it notes habit: and an example of this is in Philippians 2:8: Found in habit as a man. And the sense is that Christ as man, that is, according to what he is as man, is found in habit, that is, that the human nature has a certain likeness in him, as was expounded above in distinction 6. But a plainer example is that as man he was shod, and according to what he is as man he was clothed: because a habit of this kind belongs to him on account of the man, and not on account of God. And in that signification of habit, Christ according to what he is as man is holy, beautiful, fair before the sons of men, grace is poured forth on his lips , and so for the rest, because "to have" is spoken of in many ways according to all those things which come to us, so that we have them, as Augustine said above in distinction 6.

§ 6. In the fourth signification it denotes a cause; and since there are four causes, it can note all of them. Thus, it notes the efficient cause, when it is said, "Christ according to what he is as man merited for himself and for us." The formal cause, as "Christ according to what he is as man is rational." The material cause, as "Christ according to what he is as man is from body and soul." The final cause, as "Christ according to what he is as man is the end of all creatures, or the most worthy of creatures," or "according to what he is as man he came for our sake."

§ 1. But on the part of God it can note the efficient cause, as "Christ according to what he is as God has the power to lay down his life, and to take it up again"; and as it were the formal cause, as "Christ according to what he is as God is a supposit of the divine nature." But it never notes the material cause, nor as it were the material cause, because divinity is not to be called matter, and what is similar to matter is also imperfect. And it notes the final cause, as when it is said, "Christ according to what he is as God is he to whom all things are directed, and for whose sake all things are and come to be."

§ 2. From this distinction it is easy to solve those things which some ask here, namely, whether Christ according to what he is as man is God; and if according to what he is as God he is this man; or according to what he is this man, he is God, or Creator, or anything of this kind; which, because they are easy to solve, we pass over.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Master's Objection Avails in the Definition of Person

Whether the Master's counter-instance is valid against the definition of person?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning the counter-instance which the Master gave in the text, there, B: "For even now the soul of Christ is a rational substance," etc.

§ 2. For it does not seem to be valid, because: First, "substance" is taken equivocally on either side, because the soul of Christ is a substance as a form; when it is said, "a person is a substance of a rational nature," "substance" is taken for the first composite substance, which is properly and principally, and maximally so called, as "some man," or "some substance of a rational nature"; therefore it is a person; from which the counter-instance is invalid.

§ 3. Second, the Master seems not to have interpreted "person" grammatically: because if it were said to be as it were "sounding by itself" [per se sonans], the middle syllable in the noun "persona" ought to be shortened or abbreviated: because in the verb "sonans" the first syllable is short. The proof of this is in the composition "consonum" [consonant] and "absonum" [dissonant].

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that in truth the Master's counter-instance does not stand with respect to the understanding of "substance." But he intends to show that the elements posited are not sufficient for the definition of person, because "person" is not sufficiently defined when it is said that it is a "substance of a rational nature," unless "individual" is added; and then it does not belong to this man, according to what he is as man, in that sense in which the word "according to what" notes a cause or condition of the nature: because then "individual" posits a threefold incommunicability, because it means incommunicable to several, and incommunicable by opposition to the communicability of a part in a composition, and incommunicable by opposition to communicability through assumption into the singularity of another, as was expounded above.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that the interpretation of a name is twofold. One which follows the sound of the syllables posited in the word, or even the correspondence of the letters: as when "lapis" [stone] is said to be "laedens pedem" [injuring the foot], "petra" [rock] as "pede trita" [rubbed by the foot]; and it is not necessary that in such interpretations the interpreted thing follows the nature of the interpreting elements; and thus the Master speaks here. The other is an interpretation according to the signification of the name: just as we say that a composite draws its signification from its components: and thus "persona" [person] is composed from "per se" and "unum," as it were "one by itself" [per se una]. Whence it is clear that Christ insofar as he is man is not one by himself; and therefore he is not a person insofar as he is man.

Articulus 4 — Whether the Son of God Is Predestined

Whether the Son of God is predestined?

Whether the Son of God is predestined?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says: "Christ according to what he is as man is predestined to be the Son of God," etc.

§ 2. On account of this there arises here a question concerning predestination as the Son of God; concerning which let us briefly ask three things, namely: Whether the Son of God is predestined? Secondly, Whether the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God? Thirdly, Whether the Son of God is predestined to be man?

§ 3. To the first it is objected thus: First, Augustine says, and the authority was held above, that such was that union which would make God man, and man God, that all things which are truly said of the man, are said of God, and conversely. Therefore, since this is true, "The Son of God is man," and "The man is predestined," it seems to follow because of Augustine's ante-predicamental rule that the Son of God is predestined.

§ 4. Second, according to the second opinion, Christ is nothing but one single supposit; but of this supposit it is true to say that it is predestined; therefore the Son of God is predestined.

§ 5. Third, if it should be said that this is invalid, because "Son of God" names nothing but what is eternal; but passive predestination is only of temporal things. On the contrary: I see that this is granted: "The Son of God is sent," "The Son of God is given," as is proved in Book I of the Sentences; but "is sent" and "is given" connote time according to act, because they do not belong to God from eternity. But "to be predestined" does not connote time. Therefore it seems that much more ought it to be granted, "The Son of God is predestined," than "The Son of God is sent."

§ 6. Fourth, in other predestined persons I see that it is not necessary to add "according to what"; for we say simply that Peter is predestined, and Paul; therefore it seems that neither in Christ is it necessary to add it; therefore it can simply be said, "The Son of God is predestined."

§ 7. Fifth, predestination is properly of a person, and not of a nature; for we do not say that Peter's body is predestined, nor his soul, but Peter himself. Therefore, since according to the sayings of the Saints Christ is predestined, predestination belongs to him insofar as he is a person; but insofar as he is a person, he is the Son of God; therefore it seems that the Son of God is predestined.

§ 8. Sixth, when a subject is posited, it is not necessary that a predicate be rendered to it per se, unless a reduplication is made about that subject: as when I say "man," I can predicate of him that which belongs per se, and that which belongs through another, and that which belongs by accident. For man is a rational, mortal animal; and man is an animate body, which does not belong per se, but insofar as he is an animal; and man is white, which belongs by accident. Therefore it seems similarly that since the Son of God is a certain subject, it can be truly predicated of him what belongs to him through another: but through the fact that he is man, it belongs to him to be predestined; therefore I can simply grant, "The Son of God is predestined."

§ 9. Seventh, other predicates which belong to him insofar as he is man I can predicate simply of him, such as "born," and "suffered," and "dead"; therefore it seems that this is simply to be granted, that the Son of God is predestined.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The Son of God is eternal; nothing eternal can be predestined; therefore the Son of God cannot be predestined.

§ 2. Second, the Son of God is the one predestining; but the one predestining can never be the one predestined; therefore the Son of God cannot be predestined.

§ 3. WHICH we grant, saying to the first, that "such is the union," etc., is understood of those things which do not have in their understanding a rationale of opposition to the Son of God: such as "made," "created," "creature," "predestined," "recent," and the like. For all these things are not said even of that man on account of the person or supposit, but on account of the human nature, as was evident above in the explanation of the second opinion, where Christ is said to be predestined according to what he is in human nature.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that that supposit, just like the person, is not predestined except on account of the human nature.

§ 5. To what is objected to the contrary concerning mission, it must be said that it is not similar: because mission has in itself the eternal and the temporal; and yet it is determined by the temporal, as Augustine says, that to be sent is to be known that he is from another. But predestination does not enclose in itself the eternal insofar as it is passive, but only the temporal; whence the mission of the Son does not precede "to be sent," as predestination precedes the predestined.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that in others it is not necessary to add it: because their form signifies nothing opposed to predestination, because their form denotes that which is not from eternity; and therefore the determination is enclosed in their understanding. But in the Son of God the total opposite is true, because the contrary of predestination is enclosed in the understanding of the Son of God.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that predestination is of the person, but not on account of the person, rather it is on account of the nature in the person: because on account of it [the nature] the person is temporal, or eternal. Whence in others in which both are temporal, namely nature and person, there is no opposition of the form of the subject to the predicate. But in Christ it does not belong on account of the person, but on account of the temporal nature; and therefore it is necessary to add a determination.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that although a predicate is not always rendered to a subject per se, nevertheless a predicate which is opposed to it is never fitted to it, unless some determination is added on account of which it belongs to it. Now it is so in the present case, that the predicate has an opposition to the subject; and therefore it is necessary to append the determination of the other nature, on account of which those things which are opposed in themselves, belong in Christ because of the union of the two natures made in the eternal person.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning certain other predicates, which do not have an opposition to the subject, as has been said. And concerning those which express opposition from themselves, for instance, "to be born," "to suffer," "to die," they do not belong to the supposit except on account of the nature, and therefore belong to the nature per se and immediately, and to the person consequently. But "to be created," and "to be recent," and "to be predestined," belong to the person by reason of the supposit; and therefore it is not similar.

Articulus 5 — Whether the Son of God Is Predestined to Be the Son of God; Secondly, Whether the Son of God Is Predestined to Be the Son of God

Whether the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God? Secondly it is asked, Whether the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God?

Whether the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God? Secondly it is asked, Whether the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God?

§ 1. It seems that he is, because: First, this man is predestined to be the Son of God; and this man is the Son of God; therefore this man is predestined to be the Son of God; therefore the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God.

§ 2. Second, Damascene says that the natures of Christ communicate their idioms to one another, that is, their properties; but one of the properties is predestination to be the Son of God; therefore this is communicated to the Son of God; therefore the Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 2. First, the composition imported by the word "is," when it is said, "The Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God," has opposition on both sides, namely on the part of the subject, and on the part of the determination of the predicate; therefore that is falser than the first, namely this: "The Son of God is predestined."

§ 3. Second, nothing is predestined to that which is eternal; therefore nothing is predestined to this. Proof of the first premise (for the second is evident of itself): because Augustine says that predestination is the preparation of grace in the present, and of glory in the future. But neither grace as present, nor glory in the future is eternal for us; therefore since all predestination is to this, nothing is predestined to the eternal; therefore the first premise stands, and thus the conclusion follows.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that this is false, in my judgment, "The Son of God is predestined to be the Son of God," and falser than the former.

§ 5. TO THE FIRST ARGUMENT it must be said (as above) that although this man is predestined, this does not follow concerning the Son of God: because in the signified meaning of the name, when "this man" is said, there is enclosed that on account of which predestination belongs to the Son of God; but not when "Son of God" is said, etc.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, as before, that those idioms which do not belong per se to the hypostasis, but primarily belong to the nature, and have in themselves a rationale of opposition to the subject, are not communicated without a determination. However, note that in the argument which is last introduced for the opposite, there is also an error: because it does not hold except for those predestined in whom the grace prepared is a habit rendering them good, and making their works good and meritorious. But in Christ there is the grace of union to being, and it is prepared for him that this man himself be the eternal Son of God: but yet this is not prepared for the Son of God, because he was this from eternity.

Articulus 6 — Whether It Should Be Conceded That the Son of God Was Predestined to Be Man

Whether it should be granted that the Son of God is predestined to be man?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, Whether it should be granted that the Son of God is predestined to be man?

§ 2. It seems not, because: First, predestination, by virtue of the preposition prae- (pre-), notes an order of antecedence with respect to the one predestined. If therefore the Son of God is predestined, it would be necessary that something be prior to the Son of God, which is false.

§ 3. Second, nothing is predestined except to grace, or to glory, or to one of those. But no grace is prepared for the Son of God; for grace does not come to him through union to the man, but rather conversely. Therefore it seems that the Son of God is not predestined to be man in time.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 4. First, in the text above it was held that it is predestined that the Son of God should be man in time; therefore it seems that the Son of God is predestined to be man.

§ 5. Furthermore, the Son of God is man: either therefore this is true from eternity, or not. If so: then it is true from eternity that the Son of God is man, which is false. If it is verified in time: then beforehand it was foreseen that it would happen. Either therefore that it would happen through grace, or through nature. Not through nature; therefore through grace. But no grace is given in time which is not prepared beforehand; therefore it was foreseen and prepared through grace that the Son of God be this predestined man; therefore before the incarnation the Son of God was predestined to be man.

Solution: It must be said that this is twofold. The Son of God is predestined to be man, from the fact that the term "predestined" can determine the composition on the part of the subject or on the part of the predicate. If it determines it on the part of the predicate, it is true: because the Son of God being man is predestined. But if it determines on the part of the subject, thus it will denote precedence to the subject, and thus it is false. However, some say that for another reason it is twofold, namely from the fact that the term "predestined" can be a noun or a participle: and if it is a noun, they say that it is an adjective of what I say, man: and if it is a participle, then they say it is false. But this is nothing: because if it is a noun, then nothing is said, that the Son of God is predestined to be man: just as nothing is said, the Son of God is to be man, which is an incongruous expression: hence the first distinction is better.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that if the term "predestined" determines the composition before and after, then it will denote precedence not with respect to the Son of God according to himself, but rather with respect to being man.

And through this, the solution to the second is also clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Was Predestined to Be This Man

Whether Christ is predestined to be this man?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said:

Christ, insofar as He is man, is predestined to be the Son of God, etc.

For by this, this seems to be conceded by the Master, that this man or Christ being man is predestined to be the Son of God: and this seems to be false, that this man or man is predestined to be the Son of God: for nothing is predestined which is not predestined from eternity: if therefore this is true, Christ according to man or human nature is predestined, it seems that before the incarnation it was true: just as also this is said to be true, Peter is predestined from eternity or was predestined.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
When it is said, This man before the incarnation is predestined, this man supposes because it supplies the place of a verb of past tense, just as when it is said, This man is loved. But the rule is, that a term supposing for a verb of past tense, supposes for the present or for the past if the speech is to be true. For it follows, This is loved, or man is loved: therefore the man who is or was, is loved: therefore similarly, if Christ is predestined, it seems that either the man who is, or who was: and since for both it is false, the speech seems to be simply false. And this is a general objection concerning all predestined.

Solution: It must be said that this does not follow with words pertaining to the act of the soul, or noting form: because they have the power of extending: for it does not follow, it is thought about man: therefore about the man who is, or who was: nor does it follow, man can or could be: therefore the man who is, or who was. Similarly, this which I say, that predestined pertains to the act of the divine intellect and will: because to be predestined is to be foreseen for grace and glory: and therefore it does not follow, that it is about him who is or was: but it suffices for him, that he will be.

Articulus 8 — Whether Christ Was Predestined to Infinite Grace

Whether Christ is predestined to infinite grace?

Whether Christ is predestined to infinite grace?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, G, towards the end: "That he himself, being man, is the Son of God, he has through grace."

For from this it seems that he is predestined to grace, and it seems that he is predestined to infinite grace.

1. John 3:34: "For God does not give the Spirit by measure." But what is not by measure is infinite: therefore it seems that he is predestined to infinite grace.
2. Likewise, "We saw his glory, the glory as of the Only Begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth." But since no grace is in him unless prepared from eternity, it seems he is predestined to the fullness of grace, from whose fullness we have all received, and grace for grace.

3. Likewise, the Gloss on that of the Apostle, to the Romans 8:23: "Waiting for the adoption of the sons of God," etc. No greater gift could God predestine for man than to make his Word, through which he created all things, their head, and them as members of the head. This is for this, that he be the head of the Church: but the head imparts sense and motion: therefore Christ gives the fullness of grace: but this he cannot do except from divine fullness, because faith and grace cannot be from any creature: therefore this man is predestined to infinite grace.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Infinite grace is uncreated grace, because nothing is infinite unless uncreated: but what is uncreated is eternal: but what is eternal, nothing precedes: therefore nothing precedes that grace. But everything that is prepared by predestination, predestination precedes: therefore predestination does not prepare infinite or uncreated grace for this man.

1. Likewise, predestination is the preparation of grace in the present, and of glory in the future: therefore both grace and glory prepared have a condition from predestination marked by the difference of time: but the eternal and infinite have no such condition of time: therefore predestination does not prepare eternal or infinite grace.

Solution: It must be said that all grace which is had by Christ as man according to which he is predestined, is predestined with him and prepared for him, and is created in time: because he is not predestined except insofar as he is man, as was previously proven: and this grace is twofold, namely of union, and of habit. But the union is again twofold, namely the first, and the consequent. The first is that he truly be the Son of God, and the created union which is the medium between man and the Son of God, and the human nature and the divine nature, as was proven above: because it is a relation holding according to the thing on the part of the united which is created. And to this grace follows multiple other grace, namely that he be the head, that he be God, that he be imparting sense and motion to the Church: because although the infinite and eternal are in themselves, yet the relation of man to those is only through union made in time: and thus insofar as these are of man, they are prepared and predestined, and not simply: and this is what the Master intends to say from the words of Augustine: and through this the solution of those things which are first objected in the contrary is clear.

But habitual grace is the charity of Christ, and other virtues: and to these consequent grace is the merit of Christ, and suchlike.

And through this distinction the solution to all the questions is clear.

However, there are those who say this, that no infinite grace is predestined in Christ, and they say that Christ is the head of the Church in two ways, namely in the conformity of nature: and thus he does not impart except through merit, namely because he merited grace for the Church: and he is one head with the Father and the Holy Spirit, and thus he imparts: and they say this is not predestined for Christ.

But on the contrary: This man has to impart sense and motion, and not from eternity: therefore in time; and he has nothing in time except what is prepared for him from eternity: therefore from eternity this is predestined for him.

Furthermore, in the text it is often held that it is predestined that he would be God naturally and truly, and that he would be the Son of God: whence it is clear that opinion is false. For although the eternal does not begin in itself, yet he began to be eternal, that is, that which is eternal and infinite: whence also this is conceded, that this child created the stars: and this (because he had grace) was without doubt predestined before he had grace.

Articulus 9 — Whether Christ Is an Adoptive Son

Whether Christ is an adoptive son?

Whether Christ is an adoptive son?

If indeed it is asked, Whether Christ is an adoptive son, etc.

Here begins that part which is about the question, Whether Christ is an adoptive son.

And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows that Christ is not adoptive, but a natural son. In the second, he objects to the contrary and solves it, there, But to this it is opposed, etc.

Before the Letter, it is necessary here to inquire two things, namely, what is adoption in divine matters?

And, Whether it is fitting for God to adopt anything?

To the first, it proceeds thus: Adoption by men is perfectly described thus: It is the legitimate assumption of an external person into a son, or grandson, or thereafter.

But according to this definition, it seems there is no adoption in divine matters: because

1. According to God, no one is external to God: therefore it seems that no one is adopted.
2. Likewise, an adoptive father does not bring forth an adoptive son into being: but God brings us all into being: therefore He cannot be an adoptive father.

Furthermore, since adoption is done in two ways by laws, namely when someone who is of his own right is adopted into a son, and passes into the tutelage and dominion of the adopter, and similarly the sons if he has any: which adoption is called arrogation. Another adoption is of one who is not of his own right, but still under the governance of the natural father: and he does not pass into the dominion of the adopter.

It is asked, Whether in both ways it can be in divine matters?

It seems so: because we are all adopted, whether we are of our own right or not: therefore it seems that in both ways it is in divine matters.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: An adopted person by simple adoption does not pass into the governance of the adoptive father: but all adopted by God pass into the discipline and governance of God: therefore there is no adoption in divine matters. For the middle proposition. To the Hebrews xii, 7 and 8: What son is there whom the father does not correct? But if you are without discipline, of which all have become partakers, then you are bastards and not sons.

Likewise, To the Romans viii, 15: For you have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but you have received the spirit of adoption of sons, in which we cry: Abba (Father). Therefore it seems that since we all pass into the dominion of God through adoption, that there is not simple adoption there: but only arrogation.

Furthermore, It is asked about what he says,

Legitimate assumption.

For it seems that by the very fact of creating us, He assumes us: because 1. He creates in us the light of His countenance, which is the image in our soul: therefore it seems that from creation He takes us into sons.

1. Furthermore, the Saints say that we are sons of God from creation, and not natural sons: therefore we are adoptive sons.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Adoption is not done except by the consent of free will, for it does not compel the unwilling, as Damascene says. But from creation we do not have the use of free will: therefore it seems that we are not adoptive sons from creation.

1. Furthermore, the Spirit of adoption is distinguished from the Spirit of servitude, as previously appeared in the authority introduced: but the Spirit of adoption is in the grace that makes one pleasing, which we do not have from nature: therefore it seems that we are not sons of adoption from nature.
2. Likewise, the Apostle, to the Romans viii, 17, infers after he has spoken of the Spirit of adoption which makes sons: If sons, then heirs: heirs indeed of God, co-heirs however of Christ. But it is evident that we are not heirs from creation: therefore it seems that we are not adopted from creation.

Furthermore, What is legitimate assumption?

If it is that which is done according to laws: it is done by the consent of the prince, if it is arrogation: or by the consent of the senate, when it is simple adoption: but nothing similar is in divine matters: therefore it seems that in this regard the definition does not hold.

Likewise, Augustine says that through the natural son, sons of grace are adopted: and in this way, legitimate adoption is not done: rather the father adopts without the son: therefore it seems that adoption in divine matters is not done in the likeness of legal adoption.

Solution It must be said that in part divine adoption is similar to legal, and in part dissimilar. For in this respect, that adoption is done by the special favor of the adopter towards the adopted, and that the adopted by arrogation passes into the power of the adoptive father, and concerning some right in the inheritance to be received according to the portion of the adoptive son, it is similar. But in this respect, that the adoptive father is not bound to give the adoptive son except a fourth part of the goods: and in this respect, that he is external to him, so that he did not bring him into being, it is somewhat dissimilar.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that we are all adopted into sons for the inheritance of the beatitude of our adoptive father. Hence in Psalm xci, 6: I cried to you, Lord: you are my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Psalm xvi, 6: The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places. And, Baruch: O Israel, how great is the house of God, and the vast place of His possession.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that no one is external to God: because external in sacred Scripture denotes alienation by vice, as it is said in Psalm xvii, 46: The sons of strangers have lied to me, the sons of strangers have grown old, etc. Hence, Acts xvii, 28, Paul said: For we are also His offspring. But yet we are not sons by nature: therefore we can be adopted.

To the other, it must be said that although God brings us into being, yet He does not bring us into being by generating: and therefore we are not of His substance, and therefore we can be adopted.

To the other, it must be said that something similar is found in both adoptions in this respect, that some pass into the more special power of the adopting God by the grace of adoption, like religious who are as if arrogated, because they make themselves first devoted by what is held, Deuteronomy xxx, 9, concerning Levi: Who said to his father and to his mother: I do not know you: and to his brothers: I ignore you. Others, however, remaining in the world, in the care and solicitude of this life, have something more similar to simple adoption.

To the other, it must be said that I well concede that all those are adopted who by the testimony of the grace of the adopting and the Holy Spirit can say in conscience, Abba: because that testimony is required, as the Apostle says, to the Romans viii, 16 and 17: For the Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. If children, then heirs: heirs indeed of God, co-heirs however of Christ.

To what is asked, Whether by the fact that we are created we are adopted? It must be said, that we are not: because the mere likeness of the image does not make us adoptive sons, nor does any creature have from creation whereby it could justly pass into the dominion of the father: but from adoption we receive the pledge of the spirit, by which we acquire the right to the inheritance and dominion of the father. Nor do I say, however, that the use of free will is required: because thus infants would not have the grace of adoption.

To what is objected, that it does not compel the unwilling or resisting, it must be said that to compel is to inflict force: and force is inflicted where there is a resisting obstacle; but in these infants, although there is the obstacle of original sin, yet there is not a resisting with a contrary effort of will; and therefore there is no compulsion there.

Furthermore, To this that they are adopted, the passion of Christ and the faith of the mother Church operate: and such adoption is done from the excessive liberality of the adopting prince.

To what is further asked, Whether it is by the consent of the prince? It must be said, that it is not: because this adoption is of the prince: for it is not necessary that the prince seeks the consent of another or the senate: hence also this adoption is done with a more generous hand than human: because it is done for the whole inheritance: not by one who lacks a son, but by one who has the Only Begotten, and who brings many sons into the glory of His house: nor is it done by one who has not adopted others, but by one who has adopted all: for in human laws one who has natural children cannot adopt because of the scarcity that occurs from the division of the inheritance. Similarly, one cannot adopt many for the same reason: and this obstacle is not in divine matters: and therefore we can all be adopted individually into the whole inheritance.

To what is asked, Whether it is done through the son by nature? It must be said that it is: For the Father adopts from His own property; but the Son communicates to us the name of sonship, and transfers us into the kingdom of His inheritance by the right of adoption. The Holy Spirit is by whom, as by a pledge, we are adopted through charity which makes sons.

But what is objected, that according to this it does not seem to be legitimate. It must be said that it is still legitimate: because in human adoption another thing reforms the pact, as was said, namely the scarcity that occurs by the division of the inheritance: but here the more are adopted, the greater the inheritance of each becomes.

Articulus 10 — Whether It Is Fitting for God to Adopt

Whether it is fitting for God to adopt?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is fitting for God to adopt?

It seems, however, that it is not: because
1. One who has many sons cannot adopt.

1. Furthermore, adoption is granted for the consolation of lost sons: whence it is also granted to a woman as solace for deceased sons: therefore it seems that it is not fitting for God.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
One who cannot generate cannot adopt: but God regenerates us: therefore He can adopt all, by the place from the contrary sense which jurists use in their arguments. Whence, Isaiah 66:9: "Shall I who cause others to bring forth, shall I not bring forth myself?" says the Lord: "if I who grant generation to others, shall I be barren?" says the Lord your God.

Solution
That question has already been determined above: because God can adopt all with a generous hand, on account of the riches of His patrimony.

To that which is objected, it must be said that this adoption is not made for the distinction of sons, unless we say that it is to restore the kingdom made in heaven and in paradise: but this will not be fitting except concerning that adoption by which sons are adopted in reality, about which it will be determined below: because the grace of adoption to inheritance is fitting for every rational creature: nor is this grace properly for the solace of sons lost through sin: because it would be, even if sin were not, unless it is taken according to the accident of this state of sin in which we are: but rather from the magnificence of the supreme Emperor, and from the greatness of the inheritance: and this seems to be signified in the Gospel, where it is said: "Go quickly into the streets and lanes of the city; and bring in here the poor, and the weak, and the blind, and the lame... that my house may be filled."

Articulus 11 — Whether Christ Is Called Son by Nature, as God

Whether Christ is called Son by nature, as God?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, "However, He is not called Son by nature, as He is called God by nature."

For this seems false: because God is called by nature according to deity: therefore, thus He is called Son by nature, as God by nature.

To this it must be said that the Master emphasizes the mode: because when God is called by nature, the ablative is constructed in the relation of formal cause. However, when Son is called by nature, it is constructed in a double relation. If indeed the Son is called a simple person without assumed humanity, then "by nature" is constructed as if in the relation of efficient cause, according to what the Philosopher says in the fifth book of the Metaphysics, that nature is that from which the sprouting sprouts first. However, if the Son is a person in two natures and three substances, as the second opinion states, then Son by nature: because He is Son by eternal filiation which is according to the divine nature: for He is a person by eternal personality: and the Master indicates this when he says: "And yet He is called Son by nature or of nature, because He is naturally Son, having namely the same nature as He who begot." In this is the difference, that Christ as man had that nature by grace not of adoption, but of union in the being of hypostasis and person which by nature is Son: and therefore natural filiation as it were passes to this man, who is per se in the Son of God: but it passes through the union made in hypostasis.

Articulus 12 — Who Are Those Who Are Adopted, and Whether They Are Existing in Sin

Who are those who are adopted, and are they existing in sin?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, towards the end: Because when we were born we were sons of wrath, through grace we have been made sons of God.

For from this it seems that only those who are existing in sin are adopted.

This also seems so, because 1. They are not adopted unless they are called: but they are not called unless they are removed from sins, as the Gloss says on that of the Apostle, to the Romans 8:30: Whom he predestined, those he also called: and whom he called, those he also justified. On the contrary: Sin seems rather to be the cause of wrath than of adoption: for in human adoptions, if someone offended someone, he would not adopt him, but rather him who obeyed him.

1. Furthermore, according to this it seems that the grace of adoption does not pertain to an Angel in the first state, nor even to man in the state of innocence. For it seems that it does not pertain to an Angel: because he is not adopted who is already in the house: but the Angel was always in heaven, both before confirmation and after: therefore it seems that he does not need to be introduced through adoption.
2. Furthermore, concerning man also: in the state of innocence it seems that he did not need the grace of adoption: because the sin which distanced him from the inheritance had not yet been committed. But on the contrary: From our own we cannot have a right to the inheritance of God, but it is necessary that we acquire it freely from his gift: but this is to adopt, to acquire a right in the inheritance of God from grace bestowed upon us: therefore adoption pertains both to the Angel before confirmation, and similarly to man in the state of innocence.

Solution We say that the grace of adoption has something per se, something per accidens. Per se it has three things, namely the state of not being a son by nature which it finds in the adopted: the habit of grace making pleasing, which habit is the substance of this grace through which adoption is made: and the third which is its effect, and this is the conferral or acquisition of a right in the inheritance of the adopting Father: and according to these three substantial things adoption is preserved, both in the Angel and in man first before the state of sin: it has a fourth per accidens, namely the state of sin, in which those who are adopted after sin are born.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is not similar concerning God and man adopting: for we can anticipate the affection and favor or love and grace of a man adopting us by services: because we do not serve him from his own, but from our own: but in God it is not so: because we cannot serve him except from his own: and therefore he anticipates us with grace so that we may will; hence he first adopts, and we being adopted begin to serve.

To that which is objected concerning the Angel and the first man, the solution is already clear,

To that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it is not the same to be in heaven, as in a habitation more fitting according to nature, and to have a right in the inheritance of the kingdom. For the first was granted to the Angel by creation: because Bede says on that Genesis 1:1: In the beginning, that by created God heaven and earth heaven is understood as angelic nature, or the empyrean heaven which as soon as it was made, was filled with holy Angels. But the second is not given except through the grace of adoption.

And if it is objected that natural things are not deserved: therefore if the empyrean heaven is a natural place and given from creation to the Angels themselves, the devil ought to have remained there. It must be said that natural things which are parts of substance we do not lose, like parts of the soul and body: for concerning those Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: We do not say that the natural gifts given to demons have been changed: but they are whole and most splendid! There are other natural things fitting according to the state of innocence, or grace, or fault: and those are changed for the better, and for the worse: as the world is given to man existing in fault for the dwelling of misery, yet in which he can merit: paradise however to the state of innocence as a place of delights: and hell to the damned: but the empyrean heaven to creatures exalted through glory.

Articulus 13 — Whether Christ Was an Adoptive Son

Whether Christ was an adoptive son?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, shortly after: The Son of the Virgin is said, because in the Virgin He assumed man into the unity of person: and this was of grace and not of nature.

From this it seems to follow, that Christ was an adoptive son:

1. For the grace which makes a son from one who is not a son, is the grace of adoption: but the grace of assumption makes a son from one who is not a son: therefore it is the grace of adoption.
2. Furthermore, why is it not conceded, that Christ is an adoptive son? For from this, as has been held, it does not follow, that He was a son of wrath: because this happens by the grace of adoption. If you say, that it would be necessary that He was not a son before, and afterwards be adopted to become a son: however, He was made the Son of God: this again does not seem to impede: because let us suppose this opinion to be true, that Angels were created in grace, and not confirmed: just as also some say about man, it is still true, that by the grace of adoption both Angels and men are sons: therefore it seems, that this also happens by the grace of adoption, that it finds not a son whom it makes a son: therefore it seems, that it does not prevent Him from being able to be called an adoptive son.

Solution It must be said, that in truth, as it was objected, those things happen by the grace of adoption: but because there is also in Christ, the man existing, the reason of sonship, and therefore He is not to be called adoptive.

To understand this, note that it is one thing to have sonship per se, and another to have it by gift. He who has the sonship of God by gift, since that gift is not his being, has it only by the grace of adoption which God gave him. But by being it happens to have in two ways, namely by the act of nature which is towards being: just as we have natural things in us by receiving from parents their natural things: and therefore we are their sons by nature, and not by the grace of their good pleasure: and in this way the Son of God, insofar as He is the Son of God, is the Son of God the Father by nature. In another way it is had by being through identity and through union to Him who has it by nature. For if I am one with you by the being of your person, whatever you have by nature, this is also natural to me: although we have received it by union, and not by the act of nature which is generation. Thus this man insofar as this man: so that "insofar as" indicates union, has that he is a son by nature: and yet this man is not begotten of the Father: and this is what Augustine says, that this man has this by grace; but this grace is not a habit of the soul, as the grace of adoption, but rather is a union to be one with the person, who naturally has the sonship of God the Father: and by this the solution to the question is sufficiently clear.

Articulus 14 — For What Did God Adopt Us

To what end did God adopt us?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, K, around the middle: "He indeed by nature is Son, but we by adoption." And it is asked, To what end did He adopt?

For it seems that 1. We are more espoused, as is evident throughout the Song of Songs. However, a father adopting a daughter whom he has adopted cannot espouse her.

1. Furthermore, He does not give a part of the inheritance, but the whole: therefore, it is not adoption.

Solution: This is easy to determine from the preceding: because in truth we are adopted, and even more truly than adoption according to the laws. Although legal affinity excludes carnal marriage, no proximity excludes spiritual marriage: but rather, the more reasons there are for joining, the firmer it is.

To the other, the solution is already clear: because what according to the laws gives a part of the inheritance and not the whole, this happens due to the defect of temporal things, which the more they are divided, the more they are diminished. But in spiritual marriage, it is the opposite: because the more it is given to many, the greater it is: and therefore it increases for each one from the adoption of the just, because he will rejoice in God in the adoption of many. Hence the Lord says: "There will be joy before the angels of God over one sinner doing penance."

Articulus 15 — Whether the Father Alone Adopts or the Whole Trinity

Whether the Father alone adopts or the whole Trinity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said there, FE, around the middle: He did not only by name declare Himself to be the Son of God, etc.

For there is a doubt, Whether the Father alone adopts, or the whole Trinity?

It seems, however, that the Father alone [adopts]; because the law says that he who can generate can adopt: but the Father alone can generate in divine matters: therefore the Father alone can adopt.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. On "Our Father, who art in heaven," the Gloss says that our Father is the God Trinity: therefore it seems that the whole Trinity adopts.

1. Likewise, Grace is equally from the whole Trinity: and through grace we are adopted: therefore it seems that the whole Trinity is the father of adoption.
2. But again, against this it seems to be that which is determined in the first Sentences, that it is not said, "Our Son": therefore it seems that it does not have relation to us: nor is it said, "Our Holy Spirit": but only "Father" is said.

our: and since through the grace of adoption He is our Father, it seems that only the Father can adopt.

Solution We say that the whole Trinity is the adopting Father: but nevertheless only the Father appropriately, not properly: and therefore it was said above, that the Father adopts through the Son, and through the Holy Spirit: because we receive the name of sons through the testimony of the Spirit of the Son.

To the other it must be said, that the whole Trinity can generate by that generation. And if you object certain things in the laws, He cannot adopt who cannot generate by nature: it must be said, that this compels nothing more than that adoption appropriately, and not properly, belongs to the Father.

To the other it must be said, that although He is not called ours under that name, nor the Holy Spirit under that name: nevertheless each of these is called ours under the name of the adopting Father: because the Son according to the name of Son, does not place a relation to us, but to the Father: and similarly the Holy Spirit under the name of the Holy Spirit, does not place a relation except to His principle, which are the Father and the Son.

Articulus 16 — Whether Son Is Said Equivocally as Son by Origin and by Adoption

Whether the son is said equivocally to be a son by origin and adoption?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, EK, near the end: For this one is the true and proper Son by origin, not by adoption.

For from this it seems that the son is said equivocally by adoption and by origin: and the father is said equivocally of the true father and the adoptive father. Which is also proven by another reason: for the father is a father from generation, and the son is a son from birth: but generation is not of one reason, and birth is not of one reason in natural generation and adoption: therefore, the father or son is not of one reason in both cases.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY
The Apostle infers, "And if sons, then heirs: heirs indeed of God, and joint-heirs with Christ"[216]. Which inference would not be valid unless it had something of the reason of his sonship.

1. Likewise, to the Romans viii, 29: "Whom he foreknew, he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son." And there, "That he might be the firstborn among many brethren." Therefore, if we are conformed to the image of the Son, we are not said to be sons equivocally: and if he is called the firstborn, his generation is counted with ours: and thus it is not equivocal. Similarly, this is taken from that word: "Go to my brethren, and say to them: I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God"[217]. For he would not say, "brethren," if the generation were entirely equivocal.

Solution
It must be said that these are not of one reason: but they are said by prior and posterior: for Christ is truly the son, to whose likeness we are sons: and likeness is not taken in the act of generation, as the first objection proceeds, but to the born, and to the right of the born. To the born because he is an example to us, to whom we are assimilated as much as we can, so that we may be conformed to him. And this the Apostle intends when he said to the Romans, viii, 17. For when he had said: "And if sons, then heirs: heirs indeed of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," he immediately added: "If so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." As if he were saying: If in life we have been similar to the Son. To the right of the born, likeness is taken in the perception of inheritance.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 17 — Whether There Are Some Sons by Appellation Only, and Whether There Is Some Mean Between a Son by Nature and the Grace of Adoption

Whether there are some sons by nuncupation only? And, whether there is any medium between a son by nature and a son by the grace of adoption?

Whether there are some sons by nuncupation only? And, whether there is any medium between a son by nature and a son by the grace of adoption?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, towards the end: Truth, by nuncupation.

From this, a third kind of sons seems to be introduced: who are neither adoptive sons nor sons by nature, but by nuncupation alone.

But if it is said that these are those who are sons by creation alone, on the contrary: they are not sons by nuncupation alone, but they have the act of the Father in leading to being, and also the likeness of the Father in image.

Further, it is inquired according to this, whether there is anything medium between a son by nature and a son by the grace of adoption?

It seems that there is: because a medium participates in the nature of the extremes: but a son by nature is a son by nature only: an adoptive son is only by grace: therefore, he who has by grace only what is a son by nature, as Christ the man, he is the medium between a son purely by nature and a son purely by adoption.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
A medium is not named by the name of an extreme unless it is compared to another extreme. If therefore this man is the medium between a son by nature and a son by adoption, it seems that he ought not to be called either adoptive or naturally a son absolutely.

Solution: To the first, I say that there is a son by creation alone: and there is a son by creation and adoption: and there is a son by nuncupation, who has defaced the image of creation by the act of sin in which he is: and he is called a son by nuncupation, not because he does not have the act and image of the Father, but because he falls short of the imitation and likeness of the father: as Abraham said to the rich man: Son, remember, etc.

And through this, the solution to the first is clear.

To the other, it must be said that in no way should Christ the man be called a medium between a son by nature and a son by adoption: because he participates in only one of the extremes: and this not by the reason of a medium, but by the reason of an extreme: for the grace by which that man is a son is not the grace of adoption, as has been said, but of union to being: and therefore there is nothing there of the reason of that extreme which is the filiation of adoption. But the other extreme is there in the reason and simplicity of the extreme: because Christ is a son by the same numerical filiation by which the eternal Son of God is a son. The nature of the extreme which constitutes the medium is mixed and not remaining in its simplicity and nature.

Articulus 18 — What That Grace Is by Which We Are Adopted

What is that grace through which we are adopted?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, towards the end: Through adoption we are called sons, etc.

For it can be doubted here, What is that grace through which we are adopted?

It seems, however, that it is love: because
1. Love moves the adopting father to adopt a son.

1. Likewise, to the Colossians 1, 13: He has transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of his love. Since therefore the grace of adoption transfers into the kingdom, it seems that that grace is charity.

216. Romans 8:17

1. Likewise, the Holy Spirit pours charity into our hearts, as it is held, to the Romans v, 5: and he himself is called the Spirit of adoption of sons in whom we cry out, Abba (Father). Therefore it seems that adoption is made through charity.

2. Likewise, Augustine says that only charity distinguishes between lambs and kids, between sons of the kingdom and of perdition: since therefore we are adopted to the kingdom, it seems that this was through charity.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
4. We are adopted through assimilation to the Son: but the Son says, Matthew xi, 29: Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart, And, John xiii, 13 and following: You call me: Master, and Lord: and you say well, for so I am. If therefore I have washed your feet, Lord and Master, you also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that just as I have done to you, so you also should do.

1. Likewise, That which chiefly gives grace, chiefly works towards adoption: but God resists the proud, however gives grace to the humble: therefore humility adopts.

Solution In adoption something is considered on the part of the adopter, and something on the part of the adopted. On the part of the adopter first is love inclining to the bestowal of grace, and consequent according to reason and not according to time is the bestowal of grace. On the part of the adopted, however, first is faith, or the movement of faith, showing the breadth of the inheritance and the kindness of the adopter: for one approaching God must first believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder to those seeking him. Secondly is the fear of punishment. Thirdly, hope of obtaining the inheritance and adoption. And fourthly, desire according to love. And consequently the adoption itself: and this according to nature, although not according to time. And therefore grace simply adopts: charity, however, as perfectly uniting on the part of the adopter and the adopted: faith, however, fear, and humility, and other virtues in a certain respect: because faith as showing, fear as impelling from the contrary to adoption, humility as preserving the grace of adoption.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Predestination Of The Son Of God Is Of The Same Kind As Ours

Whether the predestination of the Son of God is of the same nature as ours?

Then it is inquired concerning the last part of this distinction, which begins there, F, Then it is asked, Whether predestination, etc.

And two questions are asked. Whether the predestination of the Son of God is of the same nature as ours?

And, Whether it is the cause of our predestination?

TO THE FIRST, it is proceeded thus:

1. To Romans viii, 30: Whom He predestined, He also called. But calling is a separation from the mass of perdition through final grace, as is gathered from the sense of the Gloss. Since therefore the Son of God, being predestined, is not called: it seems that His predestination is not of the same nature as ours.

1. Furthermore, It seems to agree with us subsequently: because predestination agrees with us as to the whole person and the whole nature: but with Him, it does not agree absolutely as to the person, but as to the grace of the person in nature, or the grace of nature: therefore it seems that it agrees with us primarily.
2. Furthermore, Nothing is predestined (as Rabanus says) unless it is destined beforehand: but nothing is before the Son, whereas eternity is before us: therefore it agrees with us primarily, rather than with Him.

ON THE CONTRARY:

The Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans viii, 30: The predestination of God is the most splendid light of our predestination: it would not be of the same nature: because neither illuminates the other equivocally.

Solution: It must be said that predestination is spoken of as prior and posterior: and in predestination there are three things, namely, the terminus from which, the terminus to which, and the one who is predestined. The terminus from which is nature or guilt: I say pure nature: because if there had never been sin, we would still be predestined to grace and glory; and in this respect, the preparation of grace agrees with us primarily, rather than with Christ. The terminus to which is glory: and that agrees with Christ primarily: because He ascended, opening the way before us, and led us into glory: and thus the preparation of glory agrees with Him primarily. However, the one destined and predestined is the medium: and this agrees with Christ simply by the grace of nature, and by the grace of the person in a certain respect and not simply: and therefore it agrees with us primarily according to the nature of the name: and through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 20 — Whether the Predestination of the Son of God Is the Cause of Our Predestination

Whether the predestination of the Son of God is the cause of our predestination?

Secondly, it is asked, if His predestination is the cause of our predestination?

217. John 20:17

And it seems that it is so: because
1. He Himself is the cause of our salvation: and His resurrection is said to be the cause of our resurrection. 1 Corinthians 15, 1 and following in the Gloss.

1. Furthermore, the mediation of the mediator is reduced to the act of an efficient cause: but He Himself was the mediator of God and man: therefore He Himself was the cause of our salvation, and consequently of our predestination.
2. Likewise, predestination, as Gregory says, is aided by the prayers of the Saints: therefore much more is it aided by Christ: therefore He is the cause.
3. Likewise, we are not to be saved except through Christ: and whatever would be done, this was foreseen: therefore that we are to be saved through Christ is prepared and foreseen: therefore it is predestined: therefore that predestination causes our predestination.
4. Likewise, just as the predestined relates to the predestined, so predestination relates to predestination, but the predestined Christ causes us: therefore His predestination seems to cause ours.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Nothing is the cause of the eternal: but our predestination is eternal: therefore nothing is the cause of it.

1. Furthermore, it seems that neither is the effect of our predestination grace in the present: for predestination does not pertain to Christ except by the grace of humanity: and grace is not caused by His humanity: therefore no nature can be the cause of our predestination.

Solution: It must be said that there is a cause in two ways, namely, exemplary, and causing by influence over the caused. Similarly, in our predestination there are two things, namely, the eternal which is the purpose of mercy, and the preparation of grace in the present and consequently of glory in the future. If, therefore, it is asked whether the predestination of Christ is the cause as influencing over that which is eternal in our predestination? I say, it is not: but nothing prohibits that it influences by way of merit and mediation over that which is temporal: because this is the effect of predestination, which is also aided by the prayers of the Saints. However, it can be an exemplary cause: because we are predestined to conformity with Him.

Through this, the solution to the first arguments is clear, which all prove that it is a cause influencing by way of merit and mediation.

To the objection, it must be said that that which is eternal is not caused by anything: but although the grace which is the effect of predestination is not from the man Christ insofar as He is man, nevertheless, it can influence by way of meriting and satisfying for us and mediating, as was said before.

DISTINCTIO XI

Divisio Textus

It is also customary to inquire whether it ought to be said simply, etc. In this part, the Master determines the consequences of Christ being one from human nature by relation to the efficient cause, or to the act of the efficient cause, which on the part of the efficient cause is creation. From which it is left that human nature is created and a creature. However, on the part of the effect or caused, it follows the inception of being in human nature.

And therefore there are here two questions, namely whether it should be conceded that Christ is a creature? and this is determined in this distinction. And, whether Christ began? and this is determined in the first chapter of the following distinction, there, A,

After the aforementioned, it is asked whether that man began to be, etc.

This distinction contains three things, of which the first is that it should not be conceded simply that Christ is a creature. The second is concerning the perfidy of Arius and punishment, because he said that Christ is a creature: and there it is contained in what sense creature is said, since sometimes it is said made, there, B, Arius said these things to have been. In the third and last part, a certain sophistical argumentation is solved, by which it seems to prove that Christ is a creature, namely there, B, § 3

Nor from the fact that Christ according to man is said to be a creature, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Can Truly Be Said, Christ, or This Man, with Christ Being Pointed Out, Is a Creature

Whether it can truly be said, Christ, or this man, with Christ being pointed out, is a creature?

It is objected, however, concerning this which is said there, A, after a few: To which it can be said, this simply and without determination is less fittingly said, etc.

For from this it seems to say, that it can truly be said, although incongruously on account of heretics.

Which also seems able to be shown by reason:
1. For this is true, This man is God, on account of the union: therefore by conversion, God is this man. Either therefore created man, or not created man. If not created man: therefore there is some not created man, which is false: therefore God is created man: but created man is a creature: therefore God or the Son of God, or Christ is a creature.

1. Likewise, On account of the union this is received, This man is Creator: therefore on account of the same union this should be received, The Son of God is a creature.
2. Likewise, When it is said, Christ as man is a creature, it is understood thus, Christ as man is a creature: either the term man signifies the suppositum, or the human nature: not the human nature: because that is not predicated in the strict sense of Christ:

therefore it signifies the suppositum: therefore the sense is, Christ as man and according to the human suppositum is a creature: but whatever is said of the human suppositum, is said of God: therefore Christ simply is a creature.

3. If you say, that this is due to the repugnance of the intellects. On the contrary: There is no greater repugnance of the intellects between this, when it is said, This man is Creator, than between this, The Son of God is a creature; and yet the first is received: therefore it seems, that also the second.

Likewise, I ask when it is said, Man is a creature, if the predicate and subject have dissonance? It seems that not: because the dissonance will either be by reason of disparate forms, or by reason of opposition: but it is clear, that this form and the form of creation, are neither disparate nor opposite: therefore it seems, that this should be conceded, This man or this man is a creature.

1. Likewise, From whatever it is denied above and below: but creature is above every form except the divine: therefore it is also above the form of man; therefore if this man is not a creature, it follows that this man is not a man, which is false: therefore this should be conceded, This man is a creature.

Solution It must be said, that all propositions are false if proposed without determination. For if man is on the part of the subject with the note of demonstration, it will necessarily stand for the suppositum and person, for a twofold reason, namely on account of the demonstration, because only a person is demonstrated: and also by reason of the subject, because it is not subjected for the sake of nature, but for the sake of the person: and therefore since the person is not created or a creature, that expression will be false when it is said, This man or this man is a creature. But if Christ or Jesus is subjected in its proper name, that name is also of the person and suppositum: and therefore again it will be false if proposed without determination. But if it is supposed with the subject naming the eternal person or personality, then again it will be false, as when it is said, The Son of God is a creature, or Jesus or Christ is a creature. But if creature is on the part of the subject, and this man according to some of the names on the part of the predicate, again it will be false: because then it will be inartificial: because on account of the demonstration or the predicate name it will stand for the person, and the subject for the form of creation: and therefore then the proposition is understood to be converted, as when it is said, Some creature or creature is this man: and therefore again then it will be false: and therefore in every contingent case it is false without determination.

Therefore it must be said, to the first that this is true, God is this man: but the term God supposes for the person of the Son of God or for the nature: because it is true, that the divine nature is this man, although according to the reason of understanding it is not as much per se this, God is this man, as this, The Son of God is this man. And what is afterwards inferred by dividing: either created man, or uncreated man: it must be said that, the term this man supposes for the composite person: and therefore that person is simply uncreated, and in a certain respect created: whence simply it must be given, not created man: but this God, is created man, is not created man, are not opposed by affirmation and negation, since both are affirmative. But if this is given, not created man, it cannot be inferred, therefore it is not created man, so that not created is as much as uncreated: because as the Master says in the book of Sentences: When therefore God so it seems here to be said he willed God: therefore the same God or another God, which does not follow, another God, on account of the identity of nature: nor does it follow, the same, on account of the distinction of person: on account of the diversity of natures in one person, since the term man or this man supposes the composite person in two natures, on account of the uncreated nature it does not follow, that it is created and on account of the created it does not follow, that it is uncreated: whence neither does it follow, that it is created man: nor does it follow, that it is uncreated man.

To the other it must be said, that this is received, that it is creator, this is true because creator is imposed from the act which properly is of the person as person: but to be created or to be uncreated is said for the sake of nature: whence it is not similar concerning created and uncreated, and the term creator.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, Christ as man is a creature, the term as notes the condition of nature: for it is not necessary, that when the term as is predicated in the strict sense, that this is simply predicated in the strict sense, unless the term as always noted the identity or unity of the person: and this is not true and what is fitting to Christ according to the term as, it is not necessary that it is fitting to him absolutely: as was evident in the preceding distinction.

To the other it must be said, that when it is said, This man is creator, there is no repugnance of intellects: because the term this man supposes the person, and to this it is fitting to be creator: but this is true, that it supposes the composite person in the manner of composition which the second opinion says: and therefore I would not receive this, This man is uncreated: just as neither this, This man is created, unless a determination were added, However there are some who say, that it is dissimilar: because human nature is exalted in Christ, and it has itself moreover as coming to the divine person, and thus it inclines almost as an accident: and therefore its attributes do not so fit the person, as the attributes of the divine nature which is almost substance and in the reason of substance itself the person. But this does not seem: but rather it must be considered in the attributes, because some are first and per se of the person, as those which say the act or possession of the person, or are imposed from those: as creator, creates, and the like. But some fit by reason of nature, as to be created, or to be uncreated. And those which fit the person per se, those are attributed on the part of both: but not those which by reason of nature, when they say repugnance on the part of the subject.

But if you object, that this is found from the Saints, This man was from eternity, I say that to be from eternity fits the person as nature: and therefore that is attributed.

Moreover, To be eternal does not so repugn, as to be uncreated: because eternity can be communicated by reason of immutability, as Augustine says: just as Angels participate in eternity, because eternity says by way of measuring outside: and therefore it fits man by reason of person. But to be uncreated absolutely places repugnance to nature: because nothing is created nor uncreated except by reason of its nature. However concerning this there are opinions: and some concede simply, that this man is uncreated: but they do not wish to concede, that this man is created except with determination.

To the other it must be said, that creature is not above this man as it supposes the composite person, unless with determination: and therefore if it is denied, it is not necessary on account of this that man is denied from it.

Articulus 2 — Whether We Can Truly Say Christ Was Made

Whether we can truly say Christ was made?

Then it is inquired concerning what Augustine says there, A, around the middle: But if the Son... is a made substance, not all things were made through Him.

For this does not seem to follow: because the Son of God was made man, this was conceded above, in the sixth distinction: and man is a made substance.

Solution: The substance which is Christ is predicated of Christ directly: and therefore that cannot be anything but a person and suppositum: because a nature made from that of which it is the nature is not predicated directly: and therefore Christ cannot be a made substance: because a person and substance cannot be made. And thus Augustine understands.

To the other it must be said, that (as was said) the Son cannot be the substance which He made: but He can be the substance which He made in nature, or according to nature, or of which He made the nature.

Articulus 3 — Whether A Creature Can Be In God

Whether a creature can be in God?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said in the second part of the distinction, there, B, § 3:

How can a creature be in God?

For this seems to be against the predetermined: because
1. Above, in distinction IX, Augustine said: It must be known that in the Son of God the earth is, which is worshiped without impiety. For he took from the earth the earth: because the flesh is from the earth.

1. Likewise, it is also said by some Saints that there is a creature: as Damascene says, that he does not disdain to be called a creature. And Master Rodolphus of Saint Victor: By power, not by nature, it becomes a creature. Therefore, it seems that a creature is in the Creator himself.

Solution: It must be said that the intention of Augustine is that in God, that is, in the Trinity and in unity, a creature cannot be: because it would either be a person or a nature: and thus neither can be: and therefore Christ is not a creature: because it is the name of a person who is not a creature nor created: but he does not intend that this person is not in a created nature, and a created nature in itself.

To the other, it must be said that authorities of this kind are to be understood with determination, not simply, although they are simply stated.

Articulus 4 — What the Master Understands by Tropic Argumentation

What does the Master understand by tropical argumentation?

What does the Master understand by tropical argumentation?

Then it is asked about the argumentation which the Master says is from tropics, there, B, §4: But from tropical expressions, etc.

For if a trope is a figurative speech, it seems to be from figurative propositions such as this, Christ insofar as man is a creature, or rational, or irrational, etc.: indeed it does not seem to be an error, except that in the conclusion the reduplication is not repeated thus, Christ insofar as man is a creature: because this is the intended conclusion, and it ought thus to be argued, Christ insofar as man is a creature: because this is the intended conclusion, and it ought thus to be argued, Christ insofar as man is a rational creature: but a rational creature is a creature: therefore Christ is a creature. Then it is clear, that here there is no error from any trope, but only from the fact that the reduplication is not repeated in the conclusion.

The response to this is that the Master calls improper tropical: because in truth that which by nature is per se, ought not to be predicated of a person simply: and if it is done, it is done improperly.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Is Something Non-Divine

Whether Christ is something non-divine?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, § 4: Christ to be something non-divine, etc.

For above it was said that Christ is not a dominical man: therefore by the same reasoning it seems that he ought not to be called something divine.

Solution: It is not similar: for although both are possessive, yet one denotes supposition, the other denotes the habit of nature as form: and it is well conceded, Christ is something divine, because having deity: however, it is not conceded to be dominical, because this implies subjection to a lord and servitude.

latin

DISTINCTIO XII

Articulus 1 — Whether This Is True, A Man Was Made God, And A Man Began To Be God

Whether these [propositions] are true: "Man became God", "Man began to be God", "This man began to be God"?

§ 2. After the aforesaid, it is asked, etc. In this first chapter, it is asked by the Master: Whether Christ began to be?

§ 3. And by reason of this it is asked: Whether this is true: "Man became God", and, "Man began to be God"?

§ 4. Now, it seems that the first of these is true: because 1. It was conceded above in all three opinions, which were introduced for no other reason than to show how the Son of God became man, and man became God, and what is predicated by the term "man".

§ 5. 2. Also, Man is God: therefore he became God, and began to be God.

§ 6. 3. Also, God became man: and whatever is made, began to be: therefore God began to be man: therefore converted simply: therefore man began to be God.

§ 7. 4. Also, in the Text this is found: "Our Christ is a recent man": therefore the man who began is God, as it seems: and this seems much more false than this: "Man began to be God."

§ 8. Further it is asked whether this is in any way conceded: "This man began to be God?"

§ 9. And it seems that it ought to be conceded because:

1. It is the same to begin simply, and to begin to be in a substantial species: just as it is the same for Socrates to begin to be simply, and to begin to be a man: therefore by similarity it is the same for this man to begin to be, as to begin to be a man: but he begins to be a man: therefore he begins to be. And if you wish to object by means of this: "He begins to be white: therefore he begins to be": the objection is excluded: because to be white is to be according to an accident, and therefore it does not infer being simply: but to be a man is to be substantially: therefore it seems that it follows that he begins to be.

§ 10. 2. Also, it was held above that He made man, and in making united [him]: therefore in the same instant there was being for this [man], and being man: therefore it seems that just as this is conceded: "He began to be a man", so this ought to be conceded: "This [man] began to be."

§ 11. 3. Furthermore, it is commonly said, and has been held above rather often, that this is true: "God began to be man", "God became man": although the making of him who was made seems to be posited concerning the word "God" or concerning the Son of God, and belongs to neither: therefore much more ought this to be conceded: "Man began to be God", or "became God": since making and beginning are not repugnant to the nature signified by this term, "God".

§ 12. 4. If perhaps you say, that this [man] from eternity was God, and this man from eternity is God: therefore it seems that this man from eternity is: but in every statement I can predicate the same of itself: and Boethius says that no proposition is truer than that in which the same is predicated of itself: therefore it seems that if this man from eternity is, that it can be inferred: therefore this man from eternity is man, which is against Augustine in the Text, where he says that before the world was, neither were we, nor the mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ.

§ 13. 5. Furthermore, from the same authority it seems to be taken directly that the mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ, was not from eternity: which is against this which all say, that this man was from eternity, and this boy who created the stars. And against this is what He Himself says in the Gospel of John, 8:25: "I am the beginning, who also speak to you": for there "I" supposes for its utterer, that is, for that man. And it is against what He says in the same place: "Amen, amen I say to you, before Abraham was made, I am." For just as He says, "Before Abraham was made," so for the same reason, namely on account of the unity of the person, He can say: "Before the world was made, I am."

§ 14. Solution. It must be said, in my judgment, that no solution of the moderns avails as much here as the Author's solution which he posits here: because it is most cautious, that without a distinction understood or posited in speech no answer should be rendered: because to be made and not to be made, to have begun or not to have begun, to be a creature or not to be, are concerning the person of Christ, on account of the union of two natures in Him: just as [to be] another or the same God is concerning God generating, as was said above.

§ 15. There are some, however, who have investigated subtleties here, less cautious for the simple, although they speak the truth. And the author of these solutions is Master William of Auxerre. And according to them it must be said that when it is said, "God became man", or "The Son of God became man," or "began to be man": because in all those in which a simple person stands for an essential noun or for a noun of a person in the subject, and "became" or "began" is subjoined on the part of the predicate with this term "man", the statement is twofold with that twofoldness which we posited above in the fifth distinction, namely that the word "became" or "began" can posit its thing concerning the thing of the subject, and thus the statement is false, and is called a proposition de re among the Sophists: or it can be bent back to the whole, so that the making is not posited concerning the thing of the subject, but the beginning or making is of the whole under this sense: "This began: that God is man": and then it is called a proposition de dicto among the Sophists, and thus it is true. If, however, those propositions are converted thus: "Man became God," or, "Man began to be God": they say that if it is de re, it is false, just as the other is; but if it is de dicto, it is necessary that it be said to be true and is true: because this is true: "It was made that man is God": and, "This began: that man is God"; because not from eternity is this true: "Man is God": but it is otherwise when it is said, "This man became God": because that is de re, and is false.

§ 16. Now the reason of William of Auxerre is, that he wishes that terms suppose in one way on the part of the subject, and in another way on the part of the predicate: for when this term, "man", is in the predicate, it stands for the nature and not for the person: and since being made and beginning apply to the nature, therefore they concede that the Son of God became man, and God became man, and this man became man. But when it is in the subject, it stands for the person: because subjects are subjected by reason of supposits: and therefore since the human nature in Christ is adventitious and tends toward something similar to an accident, when it is said, "Man became God," it is understood of the person: and it can be descended from it to the supposit thus: "Man became God; therefore some man, either this one or another: not another: therefore this one: therefore this person became God," and this is false: therefore this is false: "This man began to be God": and that from which it follows.

§ 17. And he posits an instance thus: that if that shield were just now made white, this is true: "This shield began to be white": but this is false: "This white thing or white thing began to be a shield": because when the word "white" is on the part of the predicate, it states nothing but whiteness in this, but yet on the part of the subject it stands for another subject: and therefore when it is said, "The white thing began to be a shield", it follows: "therefore this white thing or another began to be a shield: not another: therefore this one: but this white thing is a shield: therefore a shield began to be a shield," which is false: therefore this also is false, "The white thing began to be a shield": because the word "white" in the subject supposes for the supposit which is before the form of whiteness. By similarity they say here, when it is said, "Man began to be God," that the word "man" stands for the person who is before the humanity which in him has the likeness of an accidental nature: because it came later: and therefore it follows from that, that this person began to be God: but this is false: therefore this also, "He did not begin to be God, or the Word, or a divine person." But it is not the same concerning this: "God or the Son of God began to be man": because the word "man" in the predicate stands formally: and therefore then it is not permitted to descend to the person: and it does not follow that God or the Son begins to be a person. Through this therefore the solution to all those things about which it was first asked is evident.

§ 18. To the authority of Augustine, which is had in the Text, that "Christ our God is a recent man," it must be said with the Master, that it is to be received with a subintellected determination, and not otherwise.

§ 19. To that which is asked further, Whether this man begins to be? It must be said that in no way is it to be conceded.

§ 20. To the proof, however, it must be said that in Christ it is not similar: because the being of man is not the whole substantial being of this [thing], or of this man, or of Christ: and therefore although with a determination it is conceded according as it is de dicto, yet it cannot be inferred, "therefore he began to be." And the instance is good in Christ: because in Him "man" predicates an adventitious nature, although not an accidental one, from which nature this man does not have that he is "this" or a "person": because he was "this" and a "person" beforehand.

§ 21. To the other it must be said, that although by making man he united [him], yet not by making this [person] or that person: but the word "man" on the part of the subject supposes this person.

§ 22. To the other it must be said, that those were conceded above, according as they are de dicto, and not de re: just as also was said in the sixth distinction: and it is not similar concerning their converses according to William of Auxerre, on account of the cause which was stated.

§ 23. To the other it must be said, that in truth this man was from eternity: but it does not follow from this, that from eternity he was man, or from eternity is man: because the word "man" on the part of the predicate stands formally, and formally according to the form signified by the term he was not from eternity: but in the subject supposit it stands personally, and the person was from eternity. Whence this man from eternity was God, and the man from eternity was God: yet it does not follow that God is from eternity or was man, as was said.

§ 24. To the authority of Augustine it must be said, that in my judgment it is understood thus, that the word "man" is on the part of the predicate, thus: "Before the world was," etc., that is, the very mediator of God and men, Christ Jesus, was not man before the world was: and then according to the aforesaid reason of supposition in the predicate and subject, it is true.

§ 25. Behold, in so far as I was able to investigate, this is the opinion of William of Auxerre. There are others, however, who do not speak thus: for they do not wish to say, that when they say "Man" or "this man" in the subject, that it supposes like an accidental term for the supposit or form: but they say, that in such a noun a composite person is supposed, or a composite supposit in three substances and two natures, as the second opinion says: and therefore to that supposit belongs beginning and making, not simply, but by reason of the human nature which is signified in him: and therefore they say, that this can be received: "Man became God", according as it is determined according to the intellect: and then it does not follow, that that man was from eternity: but it follows, that insofar as [he is] man he was not from eternity: and this almost returns to the same according to sense, although not according to words.

Divisio Textus

§ 26. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

"It is also wont to be asked, Whether another man," etc. In this place the Master touches upon Christ conjoined from the union of divinity and humanity from the conditions of human nature, according to those things which are in it, such as matter, the power of sinning, the distinction of sex. And concerning these three he moves three questions here. First, Whether from elsewhere He could have assumed materially that matter, than from Adam? Second it is asked, Whether that man could sin? there, C, "Therefore not undeservedly is it asked", etc. Third it is asked, Whether He could have assumed in the female sex? there, D, "It is also wont to be asked, although curiously," etc.

Articulus 2 — Whether Christ Could Materially Assume That Matter from Elsewhere than from Adam

Whether from elsewhere He could have assumed materially that matter, than from Adam?

Whether from elsewhere He could have assumed materially that matter, than from Adam?

Now a question occurs concerning the first, Whether from elsewhere than from Adam He could have assumed?

§ 29. Second, Whether He ought to have assumed someone who was similar to Adam in beginning the whole human race naturally and materially, like Adam?

§ 30. Now it seems from elsewhere: because 1. Thus Augustine says: "God could therefore take up a man from elsewhere, in whom He would be the mediator of God and men, not of the lineage of that Adam, who bound the human race by his sin."

§ 31. 2. Also, one extracting from penalty and from fault ought to be far from both: just as one extracting from a pit is not in the pit: but Christ is extracting us from penalty and fault: therefore He ought to be far from both.

§ 32. 3. Also, everything that was in Adam was subject to the debt of penalty: but that which owes a penalty through itself cannot satisfy for another by suffering the penalty. Since therefore Christ came to satisfy, He ought not to have assumed the matter of nature from Adam, as it seems.

§ 33. 4. Also, the medicine of a twofold disease is not prepared for the body through contrariety to one disease only: but Christ is our medicine: therefore He ought to have had contrary forms to both diseases: but the disease is twofold, of penalty and of fault: therefore it seems that He Himself ought to have had neither in Himself: and thus He ought not to have taken nature from the nature of Adam which was wholly subject to penalty, as it seems.

§ 34. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. Anselm in the book, Cur Deus homo, says, that the one satisfying, and he for whom satisfaction is made, either ought to be the same, or of the same nature: but they cannot be the same, because Adam by sinning had taken away an infinite good from God: therefore it was necessary that they be of the same genus: but they would not be of the same genus if He had assumed a man from elsewhere: therefore it seems that He ought to have assumed a man from the lineage of Adam.

§ 35. 2. Also, God had foreseen many to be born of Adam who were to be saved: but the Apostle says, Hebrews 2:11, that "He who sanctifies, and they who are sanctified, are all of one," supply, "origin": therefore it was necessary, insofar as it is of the necessity of congruity, that Christ sanctifying and those who are sanctified should be through the matter of nature from one.

§ 36. 3. Also, no one thing in nature is referred to two principles of its own genus, which are principles according to one character: for donkeys are not referred to two donkeys actively first generating, nor lions to two lions: therefore neither can men be referred to two men. But if He had assumed a man from elsewhere, either human nature would truly be in him, or not. If not: then the redemption avails us nothing: because he who was not man ought not to have satisfied for us, as was proved above. But if human nature were truly in Him: then human nature in one species would not be referred to one first principle, which is against all order of nature. Therefore the Creator of nature who instilled this order of nature would also be the perverter of nature, which cannot be.

§ 37. 4. Also, in material nature there is recourse to one material principle in that genus: therefore this will also be in human nature. Therefore this material thing will either be in the first man, or outside him. If in the first man, then every man materially will be from him, as is the truth: and the man Christ could not congruently take matter except from him. But if outside him: therefore something of possible matter disposed for the form of man (because we are speaking of that) was outside the principle of propagation of human nature. But whatever is outside the principle of propagation is not propagated: therefore some matter disposed for the form of man is not propagated, which is not intelligible: therefore it was necessary that all of it was within. If therefore Christ ought to have been man, it behooved Him to assume nature from the matter of Adam.

§ 38. Solution. Consenting to the last reasons, we say that nothing is impossible for God: but insofar as it is of the congruity of nature and of satisfaction, Christ ought not to have taken a man from elsewhere than from Adam.

§ 39. To the first therefore it must be said, that Augustine is speaking of the absolute power of God, to which nothing is impossible nor incongruous: because by the very fact that He would do it, this would be congruous.

§ 40. To the other it must be said, that it is one thing concerning one extracting from place to place, and another concerning one extracting through the merit of satisfaction: because the former must be distant from the place of the fall, but it is permitted for the latter to communicate in something with him who fell, not in the debt of satisfaction, unless as he himself willingly makes himself a debtor: whence he will communicate in penalty and nature.

§ 41. To the other it must be said, that everything that was in act in Adam, this was subject to penalty and the debt of penalty: and also whatever was in him by this mode of origin: but He Himself could be an origin: but not whatever was in him materially, that is, through corporeal substance, was subject to debt, although it was subject to penalty: because Christ was in his loins through corporeal substance. Whence Augustine says, that in him was the wound, and the medicine of the wound: yet this was purged before it was assumed. Whence we could say, that the whole in him was subject to the debt of penalty: but as assumed from him, it was not subject to the debt of penalty: but He voluntarily assumed the penalty, who if He had wished to separate it, could have. The first solution, however, agrees more with the words of Augustine posited above concerning the tithing of Christ.

§ 42. To the other it must be said, that it is one thing concerning spiritual medicine and corporeal: because spiritual is through the mode of justice, and of one satisfying: and therefore as justice demands seeking restitution, the guilt of penalty is not remitted in that matter except through the sustaining of penalty: therefore it was fitting for Christ to assume the nature of man from Adam.

Articulus 3 — Whether Christ Ought to Assume a Nature That Would Be the Principle of All

Whether Christ ought to have assumed a nature which was the principle of all?

§ 44. Secondly it is asked, Whether Christ ought to have assumed the nature of someone who was the principle of all, like Adam?

§ 45. Now it seems that He should: because 1. The Apostle says to the Romans 5:19, that "as by the disobedience of one man many were made sinners, so also by the obedience of one many shall be made just": therefore justice ought to be propagable in one, like sin: but this cannot be, unless he be the principle of all: therefore it seems that the nature which is in Christ ought to have the relation of a principle to the whole human nature.

§ 46. 2. Also, this is the cause why the sins of parents are not inborn in children: because although they are propagated from them, yet they are not found in them as in the principle of the whole human origin: therefore by the contrary, that they are justified from one, the cause ought to be because originally they are repaired in one.

§ 47. 3. Also, no one ought to satisfy more for all, than he who is the origin of all, and in whom all sinned: therefore it seems that since Christ came to satisfy for all, that He ought to have assumed him who was the origin of all, namely the protoplast.

§ 48. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. As was proved before, it is against the character and order of the whole nature that there be two principles of principating in the same way: therefore Christ could not be the principle of all men in the conformity of nature, unless He assumed Adam himself.

§ 49. 2. Moreover five very great inconveniences would follow: the first of which is, because the assumed and the assuming would be one person: and since the assumed sinned damnably, it would follow that the Son of God sinned damnably: because whatever this man does or did, the assuming Son of God would do the whole. The second is, that since the whole nature of Adam actually was subject to sin, it would follow that Christ's nature had been subject to sin, which again is false. The third is, that it would behoove that grace originally be from the flesh, just as sin also: because multiplication could not be done except according to the generation by which Christ would generate: and this itself is absurd and horrendous even to think about Christ. The fourth is, that according to this the man Christ would not then be by human generation: because he who has been born will not be able to be born. The fifth and last is, that according to this Christ would assume a person from the person of Adam, and a person would consume a person. Because these things are absurd, it must be said that Christ ought not to have assumed one who would be the material principle or original principle of all according to propagation, that is, it was not congruous.

§ 50. To the first therefore it must be said, that the Apostle is speaking by way of satisfaction and merit, and not of the propagation of nature materially or originally.

§ 51. To the other it must be said, that it is not similar: because although sin through essence and form is not in the flesh as in a subject, yet causally it is in the flesh: because it is born into the soul from the flesh: but grace neither essentially nor originally can be except from God, and not except in a spiritual subject which is the rational soul or an Angel.

§ 52. To the other it must be said, that although no one ought more, yet no one can less than he. For a satisfier, however, (as was proved above) it is required that he can and ought: he ought from nature, but can from the deity conjoined to him.

Articulus 4 — Whether God Could Assume a Sinful Man

Whether God could have assumed a sinful man?

§ 54. Then it is asked about this which he says in the second question, there, "Therefore not undeservedly is it asked, Whether he," etc.

§ 55. Now it seems that He could have assumed a sinful man: because 1. He is omnipotent: therefore since it is of His power to assume him, He could.

§ 56. 2. Furthermore, it was mercy that He assumed our misery: therefore to assume a greater misery was of greater mercy: but a sinner is more miserable than an innocent: therefore it would have been of greater mercy to assume a sinner than an innocent.

§ 57. 3. Also, nature operates in the shortest way it can: therefore grace also, since there is less superfluity in grace than in nature, because grace dispatches itself with much fewer things: but by assuming a sinner he would immediately have been cured from sin, and it would not have been necessary afterwards to preach, and to suffer, and to do many other things which He did: therefore it seems that He ought to have assumed a sinner.

§ 58. BUT AGAINST THIS: If He had assumed a sinner, from sin He would have had the debt of death: therefore through death He would have satisfied for no one: because Anselm says, that that which one owes through himself, by paying that, he does not satisfy for another.

§ 59. Solution. It must be said, that in truth He could not nor ought He to have assumed a sinner: because this was fitting neither to the nature of God, nor to the office of mediator, and He would have brought an impediment of redemption upon those to be redeemed rather than redemption.

§ 60. To the first therefore it must be said, that it is of impotence to assume a sinner, in such a way that the assuming one be subject to his sin.

§ 61. To the other it must be said, that the mercy is cruel, nor is it mercy, which increases misery and does not abolish it. But if Christ had been a sinner, we would have been so much the more miserable: because then He in whom was the hope of all, that He might liberate from sin, could not even liberate Himself from sin.

§ 62. To the other it must be said, that this was not a short way. For if He had first purged the sinner, and then assumed him: although He would have liberated him, yet He still would not have liberated us: and therefore it still would have been necessary to do all the things which He did, also by assuming our innocent nature in the womb of the Virgin.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Could Will Evil or Iniquity

Whether Christ could have willed evil or iniquity?

Whether Christ could have willed evil or iniquity?

Then it is asked about this which he says, there, C, "To be God, and to be able to will iniquity, cannot be at the same time."

§ 65. For it seems that this is false: 1. For either Christ was able to sin, or not to sin. If He was not able to sin: therefore He was necessarily good: therefore His goodness was not praiseworthy. If He was able to sin, I have my proposition: because if He was able to sin, He was able to will iniquity, and yet He is God: therefore He was able at the same time to sin, and to be God.

§ 66. 2. Furthermore, some object thus: Christ either was able to lie, or not. If He was not able: therefore He was not able to utter a falsehood: therefore He was not able to do all things that you can do: because you will be able to utter a falsehood. But if He was able to lie: therefore He was able to sin: and every sin, especially actual, is voluntary: therefore He was able to will sin.

§ 67. 3. Also, He seems to have willed sin sometimes: because He willed this which God the Father did not will: because He willed the chalice to be transferred from Him.

§ 68. 4. If you say that it is not a sin to will what God does not will. Against this: Upon that of Canticles 1:3: "The righteous love thee," the Gloss says, that the crookedness of the soul is to will that which God does not will: therefore it is a sin, because the crookedness of the soul is nothing but sin.

§ 69. 5. Also, either He willed that the chalice would pass from Him, or not. If so: then He willed what the Father did not will, and thus He willed sin, as it seems. If not, and He asked [for it]: therefore He asked for what He did not will: and so He seems to have been double [i.e., deceitful/duplicitous], which again is a sin: and so it seems that these are not repugnant: to be able to will iniquity, and to be God.

§ 70. Solution. It must be said, that Christ was not able to will iniquity: and this was not coercion, but the immobility of His uprightness from the union to the deity.

§ 71. To the first therefore it must be said, that the goodness of Christ was most praiseworthy from this, that He was not able to sin: because this "not being able", is the most noble "being able": whence it does not sound like coercion, but rather the immobility of the will from perfect affection concerning the highest good which Christ has from the union.

§ 72. To the other it must be said, that Christ was never able to lie: and I posit that [if] He were to utter a falsehood, His utterance (suppositum) will be materially false, and not with the intention of deceiving, or of signifying a falsehood to be thus as it is pronounced: for falsity cannot be mixed with truth.

§ 73. To the other it must be said, that Christ never willed what the Father did not will Him to will. For the Father, when He made man, willed him to will and to show that he wills all things natural to man: and therefore He willed Him to will what followed from the fear of natural things. What He said: "If it is possible," etc., was indicative of natural fear: and this willing, provided that fear did not lead reason [astray], was not contrary to the will of the Father, but rather the Father willed Him to will this.

§ 74. To that which is objected concerning Canticles, it must be said, that it is understood of the conformity of the will of God and the form of willing, namely that we should will from the same charity from which God wills: for to conform the will to the will in the object willed alone is sometimes a mortal sin, as is clear at the end of the first book of the Sentences, in the authority of Augustine, concerning two sons, one of whom out of avarice wills his dying father to die: the other out of piety wills him to live, which God does not will. But concerning this matter more things are noted there.

To the other it must be said, that He asked what the Father willed Him to ask, when He gave Him a passible nature: and therefore it is shown to be neither double, nor difform from the will of the Father.

Articulus 6 — Whether This Statement Is True, with Christ Being Pointed Out: This Man Can Sin

Is this true, demonstrating Christ: This man was able to sin?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, Here there is need of a distinction, etc.

For it seems that this is simply false: This man was able to sin.

§ 1. For as was shown at the beginning of this distinction, the word this (iste) demonstrates and supposits for the person: and that person cannot sin whether understood in humanity or not: therefore, there is no need for a distinction, but it must be denied absolutely.

§ 2. Also, let it be granted that it demonstrates the nature; the union is still not excluded: and a united nature cannot sin: therefore, it still must be denied simply.

§ 3. Also, let us even grant that it is not united, since Christ had two things in Himself, namely the union and the state of a comprehensor on the way, because He was a true comprehensor on the way: if the union ceased, the rationale of a comprehensor does not fail on account of this: and then again He was not able to sin: therefore it seems that in every sense this should simply be denied.

Solution. It seems to me that it must be denied simply and absolutely: and yet the Master understands that a distinction is needed, not because the proposition is multiple [i.e., equivocal], because in truth it is absolutely false; but rather he intends that if the question is framed concerning the nature, it can then be understood as united, or not united: and if it is understood as not united, then it will have the potency of sinning: not from anything inclining it to sin, as in us from the fomes [tinder of sin], but rather from the sole flexibility of free choice.

And then, to the argument fashioned to the contrary concerning comprehension, it must be said that Christ's comprehension is founded upon the union, and if the union ceases the comprehension will cease (because in the state of the way it is not thus): but the human nature is not taken here except by a sole and naked contemplation of the intellect, as it never actually was: because in making it He united it, and by uniting He made it to be.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Could Sin in Act

Was Christ able to sin in act?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says: However, some strive to prove, etc.

For although Christ could not sin in act, He nonetheless seems to have had the potency of sinning, by several reasons.

§ 1. The first of these is taken from the authority of Bernard who says that He descended as much as He could descend: but the lowest degree apart from fault is the potency of sinning, and not sinning: therefore it seems that He descended to that degree.

§ 2. Also, Aristotle in the III book of the Topics: The powers of evils are to be chosen, such as to steal, etc.: for God can do depraved things. Therefore it seems that Christ chose these powers for Himself.

§ 3. Also, every rational potency is to opposites: Christ had a rational form: therefore He had a potency to evil or of evil: therefore He had the potency of sinning.

ON THE CONTRARY: Do you think that what is added diminishes, and what is subtracted increases, liberty and a part of liberty? So says Anselm, and he is speaking about flexibility to opposites: therefore flexibility diminishes freedom of choice if it is added to it: therefore it seems that it was not in Christ, because nothing diminishing His liberty would have profited us.

Solution. It must be said that Christ did not have the power of sinning.

To the other it must be said that the powers of evils are not powers to evils: and therefore they are not chosen insofar as they are of evils, but they are chosen insofar as they are powers to goods: because the power of good and evil is the same, although it is not except to good: and therefore the grace of that to which it is finally ordered says that it is to be chosen, and not the grace of evil, which when it is present, indicates its defect. But as for what he says, that God can do depraved things, it is understood thus, as some say, that God can do certain things which are now depraved: but if He did them, they would not be depraved. Or it can be said that he is speaking according to the opinion of the Gentiles concerning those things which are idols.

To the other it must be said that a rational potency, as it is a potency, is to opposites, and thus it always was in Christ: hence in Him it was never as a potency holding itself indifferently to either of the contraries.

Articulus 8 — Whether the Spirit and Grace Were Given to Christ without Measure

Was the Spirit and grace given to Christ without measure?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, That man to whom the Spirit was given without measure, etc.

For this seems false; because § 1. The Spirit here is either created, or uncreated. If uncreated, this would be saying little: because to every man to whom He is given, He is given without measure: because He has no measure. But if we are speaking of the created [Spirit] which is grace, this seems false: the essence of Christ's soul is finite: therefore His habit is not without measure.

§ 2. If you say that the habit of grace of Christ's soul is essentially finite, but is infinite in power. To the contrary: Infinite power is not in a finite subject, if infinity is considered according to the vigor of power, and not according to the iteration of acts: because the motors of the spheres, if indeed they have motors, as some Philosophers say, even if they were said to always be able to move, it would not follow from this that they are of infinite power; therefore since the power is finite in essence, it will be finite in the potency of meriting: and thus the Spirit is given to Him according to measure both in the essence of the Spirit of grace, and in the vigor of grace.

ON THE CONTRARY: Let it be posited that Christ has a finite grace; another Saint, whoever he may be, will have somewhat less: and since both are finite, they would be proportionable: for there is always some proportion of finite to finite. Let that Saint then progress: therefore he can progress so much that his grace will be like the grace of Christ in quantity, which is false. Therefore the grace of Christ is indeed created and finite, as it seems.

Also, Anselm proves that what Adam took away from God is infinite, and it cannot be recompensed except by an infinite good: but it is recompensed by the merit of Christ: therefore the merit of Christ is an infinite good, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that the grace of Christ is twofold, namely created, which is a habit of the soul; and of union, which attains to an infinite grace: because the union makes the man to be God, and to be able to do what God can do. However, the act of Christ's merit is considered according to both graces: because otherwise what Anselm says would not be true, that none could redeem that except God. Hence I say that the habit of Christ's soul is the habit of a soul united to the deity, and it acts in the virtue of that union.

I say therefore to the first, that it is a finite habit in its substance: and yet it can act infinitely, not of itself, but because it is the habit of a potency united to the deity. Hence it is not similar to just any simple created power, which is not united: because that one cannot do what Christ can, on account of the union. And through this the solution to the last point is evident, that no one, no matter how much he progresses, can equal that habit, on account of the union.

To that which was previously objected to the effect that it is simply infinite, it must be said that it is finite in essence: yet its ability [posse] is not taken only from itself, but also from the union of the potency in which it is: and from that part it attains the infinite, and contracts an infinite ability in act, as Anselm proves.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 9 — Whether Christ Had the Power of Transgressing

Did Christ have the power to transgress?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, near the end: Who was able to transgress, and has not transgressed, etc.

For this seems to be for an increase of praise: and thus, since nothing praiseworthy was lacking to Christ, it seems that He had this: therefore He was able to transgress. Nor does the Master's solution seem valid: because § 1. Nothing praiseworthy was lacking to Christ: therefore the potency to transgress was in Christ.

§ 2. Moreover, Damascene says that He assumed all things which He planted in our nature: but He planted this in our nature: therefore He was able to transgress.

§ 3. Also, Damascene says, For the Whole totally assumed me, that He might grant salvation to the whole of me: therefore it seems, since the potency to transgress is something of us and natural to us, that Christ assumed it.

Solution. It must be said that Christ did not have the potency to transgress: because transgression is not a potency as such, but is a defect.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that in man it denotes praise, not essentially, but accidentally, namely insofar as from it is inferred the voluntary preservation of justice; but in those in whom there is greater liberty, the rationale is taken not from the potency of this, but rather from the immobility of the free will preserving justice, as in Christ, and in the confirmed. The Master gives another solution in the Letter.

To the other it must be said that the potency of sinning, as such, is not planted as a part in our nature, but rather is a defect consequent upon the fact that we were created from nothing: and therefore it denotes neither liberty (as Anselm says) nor the perfection of liberty.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that it is understood of integral parts, and powers: but the potency of sinning is a defect and an impotence consequent upon the rational nature's emergence from nothing: and therefore it did not behoove Him to assume it: because it was not expedient for us.

Articulus 10 — Whether Christ Ought to Have Assumed a Human in the Female Sex

Ought Christ to have assumed humanity in the female sex?

Ought Christ to have assumed humanity in the female sex?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says in the last question, there, It is also customarily asked, etc.

For it seems that the Son of God ought to have assumed humanity in the female sex: because

§ 1. The first death began through a female: therefore life ought to have begun also through a female.

§ 2. Also, Wisdom, which is the Son, played as it were the role of a female, who conceived us in the bowels of charity, and formed us, and gave birth to us: hence also in Proverbs 31:10, a strong woman is spoken of: therefore it seems that it was more apt for Him to receive humanity in the female sex than in the masculine.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Preaching ought not to have been done by a female: since therefore He was sent to announce, He ought not to have assumed our nature in the female sex.

§ 2. Also, He had to be the Head of the Church, but a woman could not be the head of the Church: therefore He ought not to have been a female.

§ 3. Also, in no genus is the son and daughter the same: but Christ would have been a son by eternal generation, yet a daughter in time: therefore He would have been son and daughter, because the hypostases would communicate their properties to each other.

§ 4. Also, Aristotle in book XVI of On Animals says that the female is a misbegotten [occasionatus] male: therefore it seems that the female is from an imperfection of nature: but Christ ought to have been most perfect: therefore He ought to have been a son, and not a daughter.

§ 5. Moreover, God could make man in four ways, as Anselm says, namely without male and female, as Adam; from a male without a female, as Eve. From a male and female, as Abel, which course has become known to us: therefore there remained yet one way, namely from a female without a male: and since at first He had produced a female from a male, it remained that now He should produce a virgin male from a virgin female.

Solution. The last reasons are to be conceded.

It must be said to the first, that although death entered from here through a female, yet the propagation of death is more principally through the male: because he is more principal in generation: and from him it is more principally transfused in original generation.

To the other it must be said that this is understood spiritually, and in spiritual fecundity regarding preaching, he who is male in body is more apt than a female.

To the OTHERS the Master resolves sufficiently in the Letter, as is evident in itself to one looking into it.

DISTINCTIO XIII

Divisio Textus

Moreover it must be known, that Christ as man, etc. Here begins that part which is about the things fitting for Christ according to the natural potencies or powers which He received in human nature. And according as the substance of human nature is twofold, so the potencies are twofold, namely of the soul and of the body: and He acts first concerning the things fitting for Christ according to the potencies of the soul. But in the second part concerning the things fitting for Him according to the potencies of the body: and this begins in distinction XV, there, A, That also must not be passed over, etc.

The first part has two questions about the progress of the grace and wisdom of Christ, which are present through the potencies of the soul: one of which is determined in this distinction, namely in what way He progressed in grace and wisdom. The second is about the number of things known, whether He knew as many things as the Father, and equally limpidly, or not? and this is determined in the following distinction, there, A, Here it is necessary to ask, When the soul of Christ, etc.

Now this distinction has two parts: in the first of which he moves and solves the question. In the second, he objects to the contrary, there, E, To this sentence, however, seems to be opposed, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether the Grace of Christ Was Created Grace or Uncreated Grace

Was the grace of Christ a created, or uncreated grace?

First falls the question on the part of the grace and wisdom which Christ is here said to have received: Was it created or uncreated grace?

But it seems that it was uncreated.

§ 1. For every created thing is in number, weight, and measure: the Spirit is given to this man not by measure: therefore the uncreated Spirit is given to Him.

§ 2. Also, in the lower nature, namely the flesh, divinity was conjoined without a medium habit: therefore much more to the higher, namely the soul, was it conjoined without any created habit. And thus this man did not have wisdom, or grace, which was a created habit.

§ 3. Also, between like things it is not necessary to posit a conjoining medium: but the soul of Christ had nothing of that which makes unlikeness: because this (as Augustine says) is solely sin: therefore it is not necessary to posit a medium habit of grace, by which the divinity is conjoined to the soul.

§ 4. Also, in God we do not posit a habit disposing His power to a work: therefore neither even in that which is united to God: but the whole soul according to all its potencies is united to God: therefore it is not necessary to posit another aid besides it: and thus there is no created habit for it.

§ 5. Also, nature expedites itself with as few things as it can: therefore much more do grace and God: but the united divinity can do this by itself without a created habit of grace and wisdom: therefore it is superfluous to posit a created habit of grace and wisdom in Christ.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. To the best thing nothing is lacking of all the goodness which it can receive: but Christ is best: therefore no goodness was lacking to Him, which He could receive: but He is susceptible to created grace: therefore He had it.

§ 2. Also, He ought to have had all human things which belong to perfection, so that He might be shown conformed to us: but grace is among the principal things fitting for man, and wisdom: therefore He ought to have had them.

§ 3. Also, nothing overflows from someone unless it is in him: but grace overflowed in merit from Christ into us, because He merited for us: therefore the grace by which He merited was in Him: but this is created: therefore He had created grace, and by the same reason wisdom, because that overflowed from Him through doctrine.

§ 4. Also, Christ was most truly in the state of a wayfarer: therefore the grace of a wayfarer was not lacking to Him: but this is created grace: therefore He had created grace.

§ 5. Also, Isaiah 11:2: The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom, etc.

Also, Sirach 24:25: In me is all hope of life and of virtue. All of which indicate created graces.

§ 6. Also, Matthew 11:29: Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart. Psalm 44:3: Grace is poured abroad in thy lips.

Solution. It must be said that if emphasis is placed on the word when it is said that Christ from the instant of conception received the Spirit, it is understood (as the Saints say) of the Spirit in created gifts, both sanctifying [gratum facientibus] and freely given [gratis datis]: but by the uncreated Spirit, who is the Son, human nature was rather received in Him, than that it received Him: because we are said to receive and to have that which comes to us, as Augustine said above, not that to which we come. However, I do not say this because Christ was a man in time before His grace: but because nature precedes habit as a subject, and has the habit, and is not had by it. According to this, therefore, it must be said that according to the intention of the Saints this is understood of created grace.

But to the FIRST which is objected to the contrary, it must be said as above, that the Spirit is given to Christ not by measure through the virtue of the union by which God concurs in every act of Christ: and therefore there is an infinity of virtue, as was said above.

To the other it must be said that we do not posit a habit of grace and wisdom in Christ so that it may be a medium of union of the deity to the soul or to the flesh: but rather as a perfection informing works, on the part of the created potency: because the divinity was not conjoined to Him mediating charity or chastity, but rather immediately.

To the other it must be said in the same way, that the solution to both is one.

To the other it must be said that a habit is not posited in God on account of His simplicity: but nevertheless He truly has wisdom and goodness: but the human nature in Christ is not simple, and therefore the habit of the soul is not the soul itself, as the Master says in the Letter in the penultimate chapter of this distinction.

To the SAME it must be said that two aids are not posited for the created potency on account of the weakness of the deity, but rather on account of the demonstration of both natures. Hence, since the potency of human nature in Him is in the best of grace, and in the best which is the divinity, then the truth of both is known.

To the SAME it must yet be said that God in operating does not only consider what He can do from His power, but also what is congruous to be done according to the state of the nature in which He operates: and since it is congruous for the human soul to merit, He operates in it through a habit, and with a meritorious habit.

To the other it must be said that nature expedites itself with as few things as it can: yet in such a way that it does not fail in what is necessary, and thus does the divinity united to Christ; because it was necessary for human nature, not for the deity, that it be perfected by the best of grace and wisdom.

Articulus 2 — In What Way Christ Is Called Our Head

In what way is Christ called our head?

In what way is Christ called our head?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, As in our body sense is present in individual members, but not as much as in the head, etc.

For from this he wants to prove that Christ received the Spirit as head, but we as members.

Here, however, a twofold question falls, namely in what way is Christ called head? And, what is the grace of the head?

To the first one proceeds thus: § 1. At Ephesians 2 , the Gloss says that Christ is head according to the deity.

§ 2. Also, Hilary says that the head of all is Christ, but the head of Christ is God: but He cannot be the head of all according to conformity of nature: therefore He is the head of all according to the deity.

§ 3. Also, from the head flows sense and motion into all the members: but the sense and motion of the Church are not from Christ except according to the divine nature: therefore He is head according to the divine nature.

ON THE CONTRARY: A head which is not of one nature with the other members makes a monstrous body: therefore the head of the Church is in conformity of nature with the other members.

Solution. We say that a head has three things in itself in comparison to the body: one of which is virtue, which is the principle effectively flowing the virtue of sense and motion: because sense flows from the anterior part of the head, and motion from the posterior through sensible and motive nerves. The second is that which the soul formally flows into the members by assimilating them to itself in the sensitive virtue flowed in, which adheres to the members quasi-formally. The third is the conformity of nature with the members. And thus the spiritual head which is Christ can be considered in three ways. If He is considered as an effectively flowing principle only, then He is head entirely according to the deity. If, however, as He is an effective and assimilating principle to Himself through something which He flows which is as a form: thus He is the head of the blessed and of those existing in grace, to whom He flows a quasi-similitude of His life, and His motion, and His sense, in gifts perfecting the intellect and the affection. But if He is considered in the third way, then He is head of men only.

And through this the solution to all the objections except the last is evident.

To which it must be said that that which is of diverse nature and grace does not make a monstrosity, as long as it has an order to the body, as flowing from without: because otherwise the conjunction of the soul with the body would be monstrous: but that which is of a diverse nature, and does not have the virtue of flowing into the body, such as a lion's head, or the like, that makes a monster in its composition to the body.

Articulus 3 — What the Grace of the Head Is What is the grace of the head?

Secondly it is asked, What is the grace of the head?

But it seems that it is the union: because § 1. That is the grace of the head which causes the virtue of flowing both sense and motion: but He does not have the virtue of flowing sense and motion except from the deity: therefore it seems that the union to the deity confers upon Him the grace of the head.

§ 2. Also, the head is the governing principle of the members: therefore that which constitutes in another the governance of the members, that gives the grace of the head: but the union does this: therefore the union is the grace of the head.

ON THE CONTRARY: The grace of the head is what it flows into the members: but Christ does not flow the union into the members: therefore the union is not the grace of the head.

Solution. It must be said that the grace of Christ is threefold, namely as united, and as head, and as a singular man. That which is of Him as united, is not by measure, as was held in the preceding. But that which is of Him as head, is flowing upon the members simply, according to the threefold consideration of a head: but it effectively flows according to the first two considerations. In the third consideration, however, He who is head indeed still effectively flows, but not insofar as He is man: but He flows thus in three ways, namely meritoriously, because He merits for us the influx of grace: and in the manner of a mediator or redeemer, because He removes the obstacle of the influx into us, which obstacle is the debt of Adam which He paid. In the third way exemplarily. The grace as a singular man was also privileged in Him in the works of freely given grace [gratiae gratis datae]: as in words of wisdom and science, and in miracles: and in the works of sanctifying grace [gratiae gratum facientis], because the work of no man can ever be as pleasing as His was.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that the union is the grace for this man to be God, and not for flowing: and it well constitutes Him in the place and rationale of a head: but nevertheless it is not what the head communicates to the members.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 4 — Which Senses the Spiritual Head Infuses into the Spiritual Members

What senses does the spiritual head flow into the spiritual members?

Next, it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, For there is sight, and hearing, and smell, and taste, and touch, etc.

For although Augustine speaks here by similitude, nevertheless those senses are spiritually in us.

But it seems that only touch was in Christ: because the head does not flow anything into the members except touch, and not the other senses: therefore it seems that this is the same way in spiritual matters.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Psalm 33:9: Taste, and see that the Lord is sweet. Therefore we have taste and sight.

§ 2. Also, it is said reprehensively of the wicked: They have eyes, and will not see. They have ears, and will not hear: they have noses, and will not smell. They have hands, and will not feel [218]. Therefore it seems that our head flows every sense into us through the Holy Spirit.

§ 3. Also, Origen on Leviticus: There are five spiritual senses, namely that with a clean heart we may see God, and hear what He speaks, smell the good odor of Christ, taste the sweetness, of which it is said: If yet you have tasted that the Lord is sweet [219]: we may handle with John the word of life [220]. Therefore it seems that He flows every sense into us just as He has them in Himself.

Further it is asked, According to what are these five spiritual senses taken? For Augustine says that by one intellect is discerned whatever is received by all the senses. Therefore it seems that such a quinary difference of senses cannot be referred to species.

This also seems, because there are two differences of intellect in us, namely the intellect by which we make all things intelligible in us: and the intellect by which all things become intelligible, that is, the agent and possible: therefore it seems that one should not make such a quinary division.

Solution. It must be said that in truth Augustine is speaking by a certain similitude of the material head to the spiritual head: for the material head flows some sense which it has to the whole body: and some also it does not flow [to all], but one to one member, and another to another: as sight to the eye, taste to the tongue and palate, and hearing to the eardrum, and smell to the olfactory organ, which are two cones of the brain in the anterior part of the head in the manner of cones of a breast, as the Philosopher says. But to all the members it flows touch: because (as the Philosopher says) that is the sense on account of which the animal is, and it is not so much a sense, as a general difference constituting the nature of the animal and the necessity of sense. And thus Christ has certain gifts excellently, and flows them to none: but certain others He flows to some, not all, namely the freely given graces: but to all He flows what is necessary for spiritual being, and this is by way of touch without which an animal cannot be: and He flows to all the motion of merit. And this gift is charity. Yet Augustine does not deny but that in us there are all the spiritual senses.

And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in us there are all the spiritual senses, as Origen says. And the Psalm implies it. And they can be distinguished in this way. Because those things which are received from God are twofold, namely goodness, and truth: goodness in the affection, and truth in the intellect. But goodness is received in two ways, namely through its proper features: and thus it is received by way of touch, in this way that touch is altered according to the conjunction of the extremes: and this happens when by experience we attain God, and His goodness. Goodness is also received according to those things which show His complexion, and savor. For savor is a consequence of the complexion of a commingled tangible thing: and thus spiritually we prove the sweetness of God in His effects, in which on the way His charity is shown, as in the complexion of His body and blood: of which it is said, Wisdom 16:21: For thy substance showed thy sweetness, which thou hast toward thy children: and serving every man's will, it was turned to what every man liked.

But if it is objected against these two senses, that sense is a cognitive power: but this is not ordered to apprehend, but rather to be affected: it must be said that it is a cognition by way of reception as if from without: and it is an experimental cognition, as Dionysius says that Hierotheus by suffering divine things, learned divine things: and this cognition is through spiritual taste and touch.

But if it is a perception of truth, this is in two ways, namely as it is truth, or as it is ordered to the good, that is, the true in the rationale of the true, or the true in the rationale of the good. If it is in the rationale of the good, then it is spiritual smell: for smell is produced from a fumal evaporation showing the savor of a thing: and the true in its rationale as it were evaporates the savor of the good, and shows it as it were through a distance, which is the true. But if it is the true as true: either in a sign, or in itself. If in itself: then it is sight which is directed into the form of the thing intrinsically. If in the second way, namely as in a sign, then it is as hearing is perceptive of the form of a thing in a sign: and therefore these two are disciplinal, one by discovering, the other by receiving through doctrine.

To that which is lastly objected, it must be said that the possible intellect is one, but speculative, or that which is in it, can have rationales of difference according to...

the act, according to the reasons which have been stated.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

218. Cf. Ps. 113:5-7 (Vulgate) or Ps. 115:5-7.

Articulus 5 — Whether We Receive from the Fullness of the Grace of Christ the Same and as Great a Grace as He Himself Received

Whether we receive from the fullness of the grace of Christ the same and as much grace as he received?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, around the middle: But they received from his fullness not according to essence, etc.

It seems that this is false: because
1. There is in him the fullness of redundancy: therefore it seems that the same thing overflows into us that was in him: and thus we receive from the same in essence.

1. Likewise, we had only one Redemption: and this was accomplished through Christ: therefore it seems that at least we all received that essentially.

Solution
It must be said that the Master here speaks of habitual grace by which we are formally just: however, when he says that we received according to likeness, it must be understood that this does not suffice, that we have only the likeness of that: because thus we could receive from the grace of Paul or Peter; but the influence of the head is required which was said above, namely, for this that efficiently according to God, and meritoriously according to the noble man, he influences a similar grace to his grace, although not as much.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is redundant not materially, but causally, as was said.

To the other, it must be said that the reception is common grace in some respect, and in some respect special: for as to the solution of Adam's debt, it is common, and thus it is not in us: but as to its own efficiency, namely, that in me the debt of Adam, which is original guilt, be removed, it is necessary to receive habitual grace which formally blots out sin: and this was not essentially in Christ, but was first accomplished through his own work.

Articulus 6 — Whether Christ Was Full of Wisdom and Grace from His Very Conception

Whether Christ was full of wisdom and grace from the very conception?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, towards the end: He was full of wisdom and grace from the very conception, etc.

For this seems false: because, in Luke, iv, 21, on that: Today this scripture is fulfilled in your ears, etc., the Gloss says: For all the saints he was anointed with spiritual anointing, when the Holy Spirit descended upon him in the form of a dove. This happened when he was beginning to be about thirty years old. Therefore, he was not full from the instant of conception.

Solution: It must be said that there is a fullness for the act of perfecting the one who is full, and there is a fullness itself overflowing from the full one, and infusing others. And the first was in Christ from the instant of conception. But the second was from when the Spirit was sent in bodily form like a dove into him: because then the regenerative power flowed into the waters, and also into others through the grace of preaching and miracles. And concerning this fullness the Gloss speaks.

Articulus 7 — Whether God Could Confer Greater Grace than He Conferred

Whether God could have conferred greater grace than He conferred?

Whether God could have conferred greater grace than He conferred?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says:

To this sentence, however, it seems to be opposed, etc.

This is the second part in which he objects and solves through the words of the Gospel, and secondly through the words of Ambrose, and he solves, there, C,

Elsewhere, however, it is found written, etc.

Concerning the first part, it is inquired concerning this which he says: To which indeed it can be said according to man, etc.

For this indeed seems plainly done, that according to man he has finite grace: therefore greater can be thought. Either therefore God is able to confer that which can be greater, or not. If not, His power will be limited: which is inconvenient. Thus: therefore it is false what he says here, that God could not have conferred greater.

Solution It must be said that this is true which the Master says here: but it must be understood that every perfect thing of nature and grace necessarily has a determined capacity in species and nature proportionate to itself, of which it will not receive greater, unless the species is changed. However, in the species of man, the greatest of all capacities which can be, preserving the species and nature of man, was in Christ: and therefore God could not have conferred greater grace upon Him, because no man can receive greater, nor any creature.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that God can make greater and confer: but nothing created will be receptive of it. Hence the Master does not attend to what God can do, whose power is limited in nothing, but what can be done in the creature.

But if you object, that God can make a new species, and from that make Christ, and then confer greater grace upon Him: it must be said that this is nothing: because God can make what He wills, but yet on the part of the creature it could not be orderly done any species, which is higher than the intellectual nature in man and Angel: for the intellectual nature by its nobility through the intellect is capable of God, and of His gifts: and whatever else God would make, it could not be more capable than the intellectual nature, and in that Christ was most capable: hence since the measure of His grace was according to that capacity, it cannot be greater on the part of the receiving creature: and through this the power of God the maker is not limited, but rather the capacity of the receiving creature. And it is similar in the matter of the element which can be refined from the grossness of earth, and it can be refined so much that it will not be earth, but water: and similarly from water is made air, and fire from air: but it is not capable of greater subtlety than in fire: because all natural things have the limits of their capacities, which they do not exceed while the nature and species remain.

Articulus 8 — Whether Those Who Did Not Progress in the Grace and Wisdom of Christ Had Him as Head, Influencing Sense and Motion to Them

Whether those who were not advancing in the grace and wisdom of Christ had Him as a head influencing them with sense and motion?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, But in others, who were advancing in His wisdom and grace, etc.

For from this it seems that those who were not advancing in His grace and wisdom did not have Him as a head influencing them with the sense of grace and motion:

1. But those who were before the advent neither saw Him nor heard Him: therefore they did not receive sense and motion from Him.

1. Likewise, a head is properly said in conformity of nature: but before the incarnation, it was not in conformity of nature: therefore it was not a head.

ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Anselm says in the book "Cur Deus Homo" that never from the times of the creation of man on earth was the Church acephalous, that is, without a head: therefore there was always a head.
2. Likewise, Matthew 21:9: The crowds that went before and that followed cried out, saying: Hosanna to the Son of David! But those who went before signify those preceding the advent: those who followed signify those following: therefore all drew sense and motion of grace from Him: therefore all had Him as head.
3. Likewise, Augustine says, and it is placed below in the Letter, that the faith of the ancients and the moderns is the same: and the times are varied, but the faith remained unchanged. Therefore they believed in the incarnation of Christ just as these do, and thus through faith He was their head in conformity of nature. Which must be conceded.

To the first, it must be said that there is an influx through inspiration, and through presence, and word. The first was had by those preceding and following His ascension. However, the second was had by those present who followed Him: concerning whom He said: Blessed are the eyes that see what you see. For I say to you, etc. Concerning the second, however, He said, John 8:56: Abraham, your father, rejoiced to see my day: he saw it, and was glad.

To the other, it must be said that the head was thus in conformity of nature, as the last objection proves.

Articulus 9 — Whether Christ as Man Was the Head of the Angels

Whether Christ as man was the head of the Angels?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, B, towards the end: That boy is full of wisdom and grace is testified. according to humanity.

Therefore it is asked, Whether Christ as man influences the Angels?

It seems that he does not: because the Psalmist says thus: You have made him a little lower than the Angels. But the superior does not receive illumination from the inferior: therefore the Angels do not receive from Christ.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Revelation 21:23: The Lamb is the lamp. Therefore the slain Lamb illuminates all in the kingdom of heaven: therefore also the Angels.

1. Likewise, the Body of Christ is one in all the saints and blessed: because it is said, Song of Songs 6:8: My dove is one. Therefore the Angels are of the unity of the body: therefore they receive through the influence of the head, just as the other members.
2. Furthermore, Dionysius expressly says this, that from Jesus himself they receive illuminations.
3. Likewise, it is of the superior to illuminate the inferior: but Christ is in the greater goods of the Father, even according to man: therefore it is his to illuminate all.

Further it is asked according to this, What it is to receive sense and motion?

1. However, it seems that sense is of thought, but motion is of work: and so it seems that we do not receive the grace perfecting the intellect and its work.
2. Likewise, every animal has a head or another member in place of a head, as the Philosopher says in the book on Animals: yet not every animal has motion: therefore it seems that it is not of the nature of the head to give motion, but only sense.
3. Furthermore, here in the Letter there is no mention of motion, but only of sense: therefore motion is not ministered to us by the spiritual head, but only sense.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. In all perfect animals, motion flows from the head: but Christ is the most perfect head: therefore he flows motion.

1. Likewise, it will profit nothing to know divine things through spiritual sense unless we had the motivating power by which we are moved in the divine things known: therefore for sense to profit us, the influx of motion is necessary.

Solution
It must be said to the first, that the Angels are of the unity of our body: for it does not have only bodily parts, but also spiritual ones: and Christ is the head of the Angels in the first and second acceptance of head, although not in the third.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that he was made lower in the assumption of our penalty only: but not in the power of illumination.

To the other which is further asked, it must be said that we receive motion from the head, which is the motion of merit by which we are moved in the divine things known.

To the first objection, it must be said that there is a twofold motion: namely, progressive, and not every animal has it except from its head, or from a member which is in place of the head. There is also the motion of dilation and constriction, and every animal has it.

To the last, it must be said that in the Letter there is no mention of motion: because it is supposed in the cause. For charity, which is here as the touch of goodness flowing into all, is the cause of the greatest motion. For it is a mobile, sharp, superheated fire, as Augustine suggests: and Dionysius says that charity always progresses or regresses. And Gregory: Charity works great things if it exists: for if it ceases to work, it is not charity.

Articulus 10 — On the Intention of the Words of Ambrose; and Whether in Christ the Agent Intellect Could Abstract Universal Notions from Other Forms

On the intention of the words of Ambrose: and, Whether in Christ the agent intellect could abstract universal concepts from higher forms?

On the intention of the words of Ambrose: and, Whether in Christ the agent intellect could abstract universal concepts from higher forms?

Elsewhere, however, it is found written, etc.

Here he objects through the words of Ambrose. And it has three parts, namely the objection, and the explanation of the intention, with an objection to the contrary, there, EH, But from what cause of that saying's understanding, etc.

However, a doubt arises here concerning the intention of Ambrose. For if he wishes to say what the Master imposes on him: then he proves nothing against the heretic.

§1. For the Master says that he wishes to say that the human sense was advancing, while it showed progress to others: but this also pertains to the divine sense: therefore through that mutability in progress which is in others, he cannot prove that in Christ the human sense was, as Ambrose intends: for he speaks against heretics who said Christ was a simple creature.

§2. Furthermore, it seemed that Ambrose spoke the truth. For Christ assumed all that he planted in our nature: but in our nature even in the first state he planted experiential knowledge which is taken from singulars: therefore he assumed that. It is written by Damascene. The second is proved by Augustine in the book on Genesis according to the letter on that: The Lord God formed man, and placed him in the paradise of pleasure, to work and keep it.

For on that place in the book VIET on Genesis according to the letter Augustine says showing that not before sin did he condemn man to the need of labor: but that, aroused by experience, he might more know the Creator working in nature. And these are the words: For what is more wonderful than this spectacle, or where more can human reason in some way speak with the nature of things, than when seeds are planted, shoots are set, saplings are transplanted, grafts are inserted, as if each root and germ's power is questioned, what it can, or cannot do: whence it can, whence it cannot: what in it the invisible and interior power of numbers can achieve, what external diligence can apply: in the very consideration to perceive, because he who plants is something, neither who waters, but who gives the increase, God*. Although Adam had the knowledge of all natures, yet he advanced in the knowledge of experience. Therefore from the similar, let Christ have had the knowledge of all, he could also advance in experiential knowledge: and in this knowledge the divine intellect does not advance, because it receives nothing from things.

§3. Furthermore, the sense of Christ was receptive of the species of sensibles in present matter. Either therefore the common sense in Christ could make a composition of sensed things in him, as to say, this yellow is sweet, and this yellow is bitter: or not. If not: therefore it was more imperfect than in us: because the common sense could do this in us. If it could: therefore the common sense could in Christ make new compositions every day. Either therefore the forms of those compositions could be preserved by the imaginative power, or not. If not: again it follows, that it was less potent than in us. If so: therefore he had many new things in imagination.

Further I ask, Whether the agent intellect in Christ could abstract further concepts from other forms, or not? If not: therefore impotent. If so: therefore it abstracted. But whatever the agent intellect abstracts, it impresses on the possible: therefore the possible intellect in Christ received a new species, and many new species: therefore it seems, that a new knowledge: and thus the human sense advanced in him, as Ambrose says.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: §1. Two forms of the same species cannot be in the same subject: but the habit of knowledge of all was in Christ from the instant of his conception: therefore he was not susceptible of any habit through experiential knowledge.

§2. Likewise, Matter is not in potency to the form it has, and receives nothing except that to which it is in potency: therefore it never receives the form it has: but the agent intellect relates to the possible, as form to matter, as the Philosopher says, or art to matter: therefore the possible does not receive from the agent the form it has: therefore the intellect in Christ did not advance: and thus again it seems false what Ambrose says. If you say, that the possible is not like the matter of nature, but like the matter of art, because the Philosopher says that the agent relates to the possible as art to matter: still it is concluded proposed + for although the matter of art does not lose the form of nature by receiving the form of art, as Empedocles said, yet it does not receive at the same time two forms of art of the same species, nor two forms of nature of the same species. Since therefore the agent is like art, because it is the species of intelligible species, the possible does not at the same time receive from it two species of the same concept.

Solution It must be said without prejudice, that there is more truth in the words of Ambrose than the Master elicits from them, because without doubt otherwise he would prove nothing against the heretic. For I posit in Christ four knowledges, of which one in the highest was the knowledge of the Son of God which is the knowledge which he has one in number from eternity uncreated with the Father and the Holy Spirit.

Another he has from the conjunction to divinity: and this is the knowledge through the species which is of the homeland, and beyond that of the homeland: because others know through the species of divine presence, but he knew through the species: united to him: because the deity which is the species, is united to him, and in this knowledge he was a comprehensor and most truly.

Another is the knowledge which he received from the truth of the state of innocence: and this is the concrete knowledge of all natural things which Adam also had before sin.

The fourth knowledge is that which is of the wayfarer which is the knowledge of experience: but the origin of experience is twofold: one which makes knowledge, and thus is in the ignorant in whom through experience memory is acquired, and from memory and experience a universal concept which generates knowledge in the intellect not having it. Another is experience not making a habit indeed, but exciting, as Adam had experience, as was proved in the authority of Augustine: and this Christ had, and advanced in it: and this Ambrose intends: and therefore he says, The human sense was advancing: and he did not say, The human intellect was advancing, as Basil says in a certain homily on the beginning of Proverbs. Sense is intellect of the present, that is to say, intellect reflected to sense: and that is changed to act through experience, although not to a new habit, as was proved by objecting. For I well concede that the particular sense of Christ was apprehensive of sensibles, and the common sense was composed, and imagination— receptive of imaginations: but the intellect according to act made in some habit does not receive further a habit of the same concept: because two species of the same concept are not in one and the same.

But if it is objected, that it is similar with imagination and sense, I well concede as long as the imagination of the same remains: but imaginations frequently pass in the sensible powers, and new ones are received more than in the intellect.

But to what is objected against, it must be said, that he did not receive a new habit, but a new conversion of the habit to this or that from the intellect to the sense reflected.

But if you object, that Christ by the same reason should not have had except one knowledge: because two knowledges are not ordered to the same. It must be said, that those three are not of the same concept: because one is the divine essence: but another contemplation in the united Word: the third indeed habitual human, but flexible to this or that, is of the perfection of the wayfarer.

Articulus 11 — Whether Jesus Advanced in Age and Human Wisdom

Whether Jesus advanced in age and wisdom of man?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, around the beginning: Therefore, if He advanced in the age of man, He advanced in the wisdom of man, etc.

For it seems that He did not have the wisdom of man: because
1. Nature does not abound in superfluities, as the Philosopher says: since therefore He had a more noble cognition than even future things are not hidden, as it says below in the Letter, it seems He did not have human wisdom, because it would be superfluous.

1. Likewise, in lower things we see that a greater light obscures a lesser, as the light of a candle does not appear in the sun: therefore it was also thus in the soul of Christ: therefore He had only divine knowledge and thus it is false, as it seems, what is said.
2. Likewise, it is more perfect to know without receiving from another, than by receiving: and it is more perfect to know through the cause, than through the effect: and it is more perfect to know through knowledge which is the cause, than which is not the cause, but only a likeness. Therefore, since God denied none of the perfections to His Son, and removed all imperfection from Him except this alone which had order to our redemption, it seems that He removed every mode of imperfect cognition from Him: because imperfect cognition is more contrary to salvation, than promotive. Since therefore man knows by knowledge caused by things, an Angel by knowledge which is a likeness of things and not a cause, but God by knowledge which is the cause of things, it seems that He had only that and not another.

To this it must be said, that Christ had multiple cognition, — namely uncreated, and from union to the Word of the comprehensor in the homeland, because the Word was always present and united to Him as to the soul: and also the cognition of Adam: and also in some way experiential cognition.

To that which is objected against, it must be said that it was not superfluous in Christ what was of nature or of the state as demonstrative: because this greatly avails us to believe in Him both natures: and also such cognitions are of the nature of states.

To the other it must be said, that this is false, unless the lights are of the same nature at least as to light, and unless they project rays to the same part. But neither of these modes is here: because these knowledges are not of the same nature, nor do they illuminate in the same way over the known.

But if you say, that in lower things also the lights are not of the same nature, and yet they mutually absorb each other. It must be said, that this is false: because as to light at least they have the same nature of proportion to act: for light is not in a lower body except according to the nature by which it communicates with a higher body, as the Philosopher says: and therefore although they have diverse powers in moving, yet to shine is common to them according to proportion. But thus it is not in knowledges: because knowledge is equivocal, as the mode of objection shows: because one is the cause of the thing, and another a likeness, and a third caused by the thing.

To the other it must be said, that to have every mode of knowing is not of the nature of imperfection of human nature: for what would be imperfect for God, this would be perfect for an Angel or man: whence since Christ was God and man, He had all modes of perfection useful to us according to the state of each nature.

Articulus 12 — Whether in Christ from Infancy There Was Any Ignorance, or He Had All Knowledge

Whether in Christ from infancy there was any ignorance, or he had all knowledge?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, around the middle: "But the infancy of recognition," etc.

This also seems so.
1. By the authority of Pope Leo in the sermon on the Epiphany saying thus: "They adored the infant in no way distinct from the generality of others."

1. Likewise, Christ descended in humility below all: therefore it seems since the ignorant is more humble than one having all knowledge, that he ought to have assumed this defect for us.
2. Likewise, Chrysostom on John reproves the book on the infancy of the Savior, saying that in infancy he did not differ from other infants.
3. Likewise, it seems to be ignorance or nescience from the nature of the infant: therefore it seems since Christ assumed all things natural to us, that he assumed that. The first is proved by what the Philosopher says at the beginning of the natural things, that children at first consider all men fathers, and women mothers, and afterwards discern: therefore it seems that this is natural to them.

Solution: It must be said that ignorance or nescience never befits Christ, but all knowledge from the instant of his conception, as the Master proves in the Text, fourfold, or threefold, as was said, namely uncreated, united to the Word, and of the comprehensor: and according to the first state, it was similar to the knowledge which the Angels received from the beginning of their creation. However, the knowledge of the comprehensor is the knowledge of the present united, and therefore it is reduced to the knowledge of the union, that is, which the union makes: and thus there will be three knowledges of Christ. However, the fourth was experimental in him as an act not making a habit, as was said by the Apostle to the Hebrews, that he learned obedience from the things which he suffered.

To the authority of Leo, it must be said that he speaks according to what appeared outwardly in him: and in the same way, the saying of Chrysostom must be solved.

To the other, it must be said that to descend into that which is contrary to merit and beatitude is not of humility, but of foolishness: and this is ignorance and nescience, because a good intellect is for all making it.

To the other, it must be said that this is not of the nature of the infant except according to the state of corrupted nature, which was known to the Philosophers. For if Adam had not sinned, it would have been determined how much we would be born perfect in knowledge and grace according to the state of animal life, although not perfect in quantity due to the necessity of the maternal womb.

Articulus 13 — Whether Christ from the Instant of Conception Was Full of Grace and Wisdom

Whether Christ from the instant of conception was full of grace and wisdom?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says:

But from what cause, etc.

Here the Master seems to suppose what was determined above, namely that Christ from the instant of conception was full of grace and wisdom.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
He did not have faith, he did not have hope, he did not have penitence: all of which are graces: therefore not the fullness of divine grace.

Solution: Faith as to vision was in Christ, but as to the mirror and enigma in which faith sees, it was not in him, because those are of imperfection. However, hope is a certain expectation of future beatitude arising from merits and grace, and in every way it was not in him, but insofar as it is certain from merits and union, and of the glory or beatitude of the body, not of the soul, there was in him an act of hope: because he certainly expected the glory of the body. However, he did not have penitence: because it regards preceding sin, but for us only he exhibited an act of penitence: because he paid the penalties due for our sin, and because he was a sacrifice for our sin: for which reason he is also called a sinner by the Apostle saying: Him who knew not sin, for us God made sin, and again concerning sin he condemned sin in the flesh: and it is called sin there because he was a sacrifice for sin.

DISTINCTIO XIV

Divisio Textus

Here it is necessary to inquire, With the soul of Christ, etc. Here begins the fourteenth distinction, in which the second question of this part is asked, namely whether Christ had all knowledge as God, or not?

And it has three parts: in the first of which he objects for and against, and resolves that he had all knowledge. In the second, he assigns the reason why he did not have similarly all power or omnipotence, there, C, But if it is asked, Why God did not. In the third, it is objected against this second part, and he resolves, there namely, D, But if that soul does not have so much power, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Had Knowledge of All Secrets from God

Whether Christ had the knowledge of all things known from God?

Concerning the first, a question arises about three articles, namely whether Christ had the knowledge of all things known from God?

Secondly, whether He had that knowledge in created species, or in habit, or only in the Word?

Thirdly, whether that knowledge was or is the knowledge of comprehension, or only of simple understanding?

To prove, however, that He did not have the knowledge of all things, reasons are brought forward in the Letter, and these are subject.

To the same, however, another reason can be objected thus:

1. Nothing created is infinite, nor of infinite capacity: the soul of Christ is created: therefore it is neither infinite, nor of infinite capacity. However, the number of things known by God is infinite, which I prove thus: Augustine says in book XXII of the City of God, that although the species of numbers are infinite, yet in the manner of that knowledge they are finite, whose knowledge is not a number: therefore it is evident that divine knowledge is of infinite things.

Likewise, the Goodness of God is infinite, and similarly power, and whatever is in God is entirely infinite, and God is the most perfect contemplator of Himself: therefore if the soul of Christ knows what God knows, it knows and comprehends infinite things, which does not seem to be, since it is created.

1. Likewise, God knows whatever He can do: however, He can do things which never are, were, or will be: therefore the soul of Christ knows things which never are, were, or will be: and this is false, because what never was, is, or will be, is not known.
2. If perhaps you say that the soul of Christ knows infinite things as infinite, but not by comprehending infinite things: this is nothing, because we also know in that way the infinite: whence in this the knowledge of the soul of Christ does not differ from our knowledge.

If for this reason someone says, the soul of Christ comprehends in itself the infinity of God, namely infinite goodness, and truth, and so on. Against:

1. Whatever is comprehended is circumscribed by the intellect of the comprehender, as Augustine says in the book On Seeing God to Proba: Whatever, therefore, is circumscribed by a created intellect, this is limited by the intellect, because it is so contained by the intellect that nothing of it is outside: whatever is comprehended, is limited: nothing, however, is limited unless it is finite: therefore what is thus comprehended by the soul of Christ, is limited: but the infinite goodness, truth, etc., of God is comprehended, therefore God is finite, which is heresy.
2. Likewise, although the capacity of the soul of Christ is greater than that of any simple creature, yet it is not infinite: therefore it is not commensurate with the infinite.

§ 1. [infi]nite. But nothing comprehends anything else unless the measure of its capacity can encompass it: therefore, since the capacity of the soul of Christ cannot be made commensurate with the infinite, it does not comprehend anything infinite in God: and thus it is evident that in the number of things known it does not possess knowledge equal to God.

§ 2. ON THE CONTRARY: In the text [of the Sentences] there are again certain arguments which are assumed.

§ 3. Furthermore, it is objected as follows: 1. Augustine says that the union is such that it makes God man, and man God: and all things that are true of God are true of man, and conversely. But the Son of God knows infinite things: therefore this man knows infinite things. And this man knows nothing except what he knows in his soul: therefore he himself comprehends infinite things.

§ 4. 2. Also, Philippians 2:11: Every tongue should confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is in the glory of God the Father therefore he merited this through his passion, as is said in the same place, and this is understood according to his manhood. Therefore, according to his manhood, he is in the glory of God the Father, as it seems: but he is not in His glory unless he knows those things which He knows: therefore he is equipollent to Him in things known and in the number of things known, as it seems.

§ 5. 3. Also, from the union that soul has something over us. Since, therefore, we attain that which is infinite and do not comprehend it, he will be attaining it through the intellect and comprehending it.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said without prejudice that the soul of Christ knows all things that God knows, but not all things in the same way. For the infinity of God, which is not measured by anything extrinsic enclosing it (as has often been said in the first book of the Sentences on the second and third distinctions), the soul of Christ itself does not enclose by comprehending: rather, God alone comprehends Himself, because to Himself alone He is finite, inasmuch as nothing of Him is outside of Himself. For if we were to say that He is enclosed by the comprehension of the capacity of the soul of Christ, it seems to me that this would redound to a blasphemy against the deity of Christ: and we would then be attributing so much to His humanity that we would be derogating from His divinity, which must not be done. Thus, therefore, it must be said that it knows all things that God knows, but not all things in the same way: because it does not comprehend whatever God knows, but only comprehends all things known by God which are not God: but this known by God which is God, it does not comprehend.

§ 7. Therefore, to the first objection it must be said: when it is said that God knows infinite things, this can be understood in two ways: namely, that He knows things infinite in number, or things infinite, as it were, in the measure which He Himself is. In the second way, it is true that He knows certain things which are infinite, as it were, in the measure which He Himself is: and the soul of Christ knows these, but does not comprehend them. However, things infinite by number are only so in a qualified sense, namely, in the potency of infinite addition, as the Philosopher says and in the potency of an efficient cause, namely because He can make infinite things, and He knows that He can do this. And yet it does not follow through this that the species of infinite things are in Him in act; and from this it does not follow that God knows infinite things, unless "to know" were the same as "to have knowledge of the infinite." Therefore, although the soul of Christ knows all things that God knows, it does not follow that it knows infinite things.

§ 8. But some speak otherwise here, distinguishing a threefold knowledge in God: namely, that of approbation, which is only of good things; that of vision, which is of those things whose intelligible principles are present to Him; and that of simple intelligence, which they say is of all things that exist in any way, such as privations, and of those things which are in potency only. And they say that the soul of Christ knows all things known by God in the first and second ways, but not in the third way. But from this a twofold absurdity follows: first, that the soul of Christ would not be equaled to God in the number of things known, which is contrary to what is said here without exception. The other is that, by the same reasoning, it would also be ignorant of evil things, because those are known by simple intelligence.

§ 9. But as to what Augustine says, that the infinite species of numbers are finite in His knowledge, of whose knowledge there is no number. It must be said that this is true; yet it is not necessary that He knows infinite things. For since His knowledge is the cause of every real thing that is not predicated through privation, if the infinite species of numbers were in His knowledge, He would produce infinite species of numbers, which is false. Whence the understanding of Augustine is that His knowledge, which is the cause of being and is not limited by created being, comprehends that which is infinite in the potency of division and multitude (that is, insofar as something can always be taken outside it); yet it does not comprehend it in such a way that it causes it through a species, because then the infinite would already be finite, which cannot be.

§ 2. To that which he objects, that God knows what never will be, or is, or was. It must be said that He knows this in the way that it is in the cause: but it is not in the cause except through an exemplar. Whence also God does not know it except by knowing Himself to be capable of that of which there is an exemplar in Him. Whence, by knowing Himself to be in such potency to cause, He knows it. Yet it does not follow that He knows it simply; and the same is the solution concerning the infinite: for it does not follow that if He knows infinite things through the power of producing infinite things, He therefore knows infinite things simply.

§ 3. To that which is objected, that if the soul of Christ knows by not comprehending, it does not differ from our souls: it must be said that this is not true. For it still differs in two respects. First, in number: because no pure creature has the notice of all things that God knows, just as Isidore says that the Trinity is known to Himself alone and to the assumed man. And thus Augustine says that the soul of Christ loves every good, and nothing is loved unless it is known: therefore it knows every good. But each one of the other Saints knows only as much as God wishes to reveal to him. Second, it differs in mode: because His capacity receives, as it were, excessively, and more of any knowable thing than anyone else does.

§ 4. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this is rightly conceded: that this man comprehends all things that God comprehends. For this man supposits the person in three substances and two natures. But it does not follow further that, if this man comprehends, he comprehends according as he is man, if the term according as denotes the condition of the nature.

§ 5. To the next objection it must be said that Christ, in His person, is in equality of the glory of God the Father: but according as He is man, He is in a lower glory, yet higher than any creature.

§ 6. To the next objection it must be said that we neither entirely know the things that God knows, nor do we comprehend the infinite ocean of the divine substance, but we attain it. God, however, comprehends all things and knows all things. Whence Christ, according as He is man united [to the Word], is conformed to Him in the number of things known (in which He exceeds us), and is below Him in the mode of comprehension.

Articulus 2 — Whether That Knowledge Which Christ Has of All Things Is in the Contemplation of the Word United to Him, or in Some Formal Habit

Whether that knowledge which Christ has of all things consists in the contemplation of the Word united to Him, or in some formal habit?

§ 8. Secondly, it is asked: Whether that knowledge which Christ has of all things consists in the contemplation of the Word united to Him, or in some formal habit in which He knows all things, just as the Angels at the beginning of their creation received a habit in which they know all things?

§ 9. And it seems that Christ knows by a habit: because 1. The soul of Christ is not more imperfect, but higher than the Angels: therefore the gifts given to the Angels were given to it. But a habit was given to the Angels from the beginning of creation: therefore also to the soul of Christ.

§ 1. 2. Also, intellect does not occur except through the assimilation of the knower and that which is known. But the soul of Christ understood all things: therefore it was assimilated to all things. But this cannot be except through a habit and the species of all things: therefore it had a habit of cognition and the species of all things within itself.

§ 2. 3. Also, as matter is related to the forms of art or nature, so the rational intellect is related to the species of knowable things. But matter is not in act except through a received species and form. Therefore the possible intellect does not become in act except through species received either by creation or by abstraction from things. But He did not have them from the instant of conception by abstraction from things: therefore He had them given by creation, as it seems.

§ 3. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The knowledge of the Angels is threefold, as is elicited from the words of Augustine namely, evening knowledge, by which they know things in the proper genus of things, in which they are overshadowed by the shadow of privation always drawing toward sunset; and second, by which they know things in themselves [i.e., morning knowledge]; and third, which is nobler than the others, which is in the Word. Since therefore that knowledge, namely which is in the Word, does not require habitual forms (because the Word is more present to the contemplator than any species could be), much more does the soul of Christ united to the Word not require species of this kind.

§ 4. 2. Also, intellect would not occur without the presence of the thing understood. But that which is in the soul by essence is more present than that which is there only by similitude; and that which penetrates the intellect by its simplicity is more present than that which touches it only extrinsically, as it were. But the Word penetrates through Himself the intellect of the contemplator. Moreover, those things which are essentially in the soul, such as justice, temperance, faith, and the like, do not touch or inform the soul extrinsically. Therefore the Word is rendered more present than any habit could make present. But He is rendered still more present to the soul which He unites to Himself and which He penetrates. Therefore, since this is the soul of Christ, the soul of Christ knows all things in the Word and not in anything else.

§ 5. 3. Also, all things cannot be known except in that in which all things are in a certain way. But in no habit of the Angels or of nature are all things present: because those things which are subject to free choice are not ordered, nor can anything attain to comprehending them by knowing them as they depend upon the future, except God alone. Therefore these cannot be known except by God alone: therefore the soul of Christ could not know these except in God: therefore He did not know them in any received habit.

§ 6. Solution. Without prejudice, we say that the soul of Christ does not have knowledge of all things as all things except in the Word: because only to that soul which He united to Himself does He show Himself regarding all knowable things, while to the other Angels and blessed souls He shows Himself as much as He wills and as much as they have merited.

§ 7. To that which is objected first, it must be said that the soul of Christ does not have habits which are the similitudes of all things; rather, this is a sign that more was conferred upon Him than upon the other Angels. For in the preceding distinction it was determined that He has a habit in which He knows the order and process of all natural things, just as the Angels do. But this habit is not of all things knowable by God, because the Angels do not know all things. Whence, above this, He has the union to the Word, in whom He always contemplates and knows all things.

§ 8. To the next objection it must be said that assimilation is twofold. In one way, through abstraction; and in another way, through conversion to that which is the cause and first art of all things. And in this second way, through conversion and union to the Word, the soul of Christ had the assimilation of His intellect with all things.

§ 9. To the next objection it must be said that that similitude is true concerning an intellect acquiring the knowledge of things: and this does not befit a soul united to supreme perfection, because that soul could not be subject to ignorance.

Articulus 3 — How the Knowledge of the Soul of Christ Knew All Things

By what mode of knowledge did the soul of Christ know all things?

By what mode of knowledge did the soul of Christ know all things?

§ 2. Thirdly it is asked: By what mode of knowledge did the soul of Christ know all things that God knows?

§ 3. It seems that it was by one intuition, because: 1. Whatever is in the Word is in Him through the mode of one, and not through the mode of many, since He Himself is simple. But the soul of Christ always contemplates in the Word. Therefore it knew all things through the mode of one. But a simple intuition is of one according as it is one; therefore it knew all things by a single intuition.

§ 4. 2. Also, it further seems that He knew all things by comprehending them: because the whole Word is united to that soul. Therefore nothing of the Word is outside the soul of Christ. Therefore whatever is in the Word is also within the soul of Christ: because that which contains the container also contains what is contained in it. Therefore, since it grasps the Word, it therefore grasps everything that is in Him, and thus comprehends.

§ 5. 3. Also, God does not know all things by one mode of knowledge: because He knows in one way the things He Himself is going to make, and in another way He knows the things He can make but will never make, which, if He were to make them, would be good. If therefore the soul of Christ knew all things that God knows, it seems that it too knows in this diverse mode. And it is asked: How do these modes differ in it?

§ 6. 4. Moreover, it seems to be expressly said in the Gospel that neither did the Son know all things, Matthew 24:36: But of that day and hour no one knows, neither the Angels of heaven, but the Father alone, nor even the Son. And Acts 1:7: It is not for you to know the times or moments, which the Father has placed in His own power.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that God knows things in a threefold way: not that things are merely threefold, because they are manifold; but because they are in Him in a threefold way.

Namely, as in a powerful cause only; and they are in Him as in a cause knowing the rationale of the work and operating; and they are in Him as in one knowing only. Now, they cannot be in Him as in an operator only, without knowledge; because one possessing intellect operates by knowing the rationale of the work, or else he does not know what he is doing and operates vainly, which must not be said of God. Now, those things are in Him as in a powerful cause only which are related to Him in two ways: namely, that they are in the efficient potency of His power only, and will never be made. And these God does not know except by knowing Himself to be powerful toward things other than those He has produced. Whence this notice is nothing but the conversion of the divine intellect upon itself as it is of infinite power toward infinite effects: whence this notice posits no exemplar or idea in God. But certain things are in Him who is powerful in such a way that He Himself is giving the posse [potency] of the infinite, though not the act: and these, as to that given posse, have an exemplar, but not as to act. Just as the infinite exists only in potency: and therefore the infinite, through what it is, is only in that which is finite, and the rationale of the finite is made by God, and has an exemplar in Him. In the second way, all creatures are in the knowledge of God. In the third way, evils. I say, therefore, that the soul of Christ, by knowing the Word, knows in this threefold rationale as many things as God does.

§ 8. Therefore, to the first objection it must be said that "by one intuition" is said in two ways: namely, concerning the object, or concerning the discerner. And I well concede that concerning the object, it is one intuition by which all things are; but concerning the discerning intellect, there cannot be a single act: because there is one conversion according to the act toward this thing, and another toward that thing.

§ 9. And if it is objected that Augustine says that in the fatherland there will be no revolving thoughts, and therefore much less in the soul of Christ: It must be said that this too is understood concerning the object, and as regards the fact that we will not be involved in inquiring and pondering, but not as regards the idea that we would always be in the exact same act of conversion.

§ 2. To the next objection it must be said, as was stated earlier, that although the soul of Christ is united to the Word, it is nevertheless not said to enclose the Word: because thus God would be enclosed, which is false. Rather, it is united to the whole Word, and this is not to close Him within, such that He is not elsewhere, since He is everywhere essentially, potentially, and by His presence.

§ 3. To the next objection the solution is already clear through the distinction: for I well concede that the soul of Christ in those three ways is made equal to God in the number of knowable things. For the Saints except nothing: and therefore nothing seems to me needing to be excepted either.

§ 4. To the next objection it must be said that the Son is not excluded from the knowledge of the Father, nor is the Holy Spirit, nor even the soul of Christ which, united to the Word, knew all future things. But He intends that the Son "does not know," because He did not make us to know, and He held Himself after the manner of one not knowing because the knowledge of that day would not have profited us, but would have harmed us.

Articulus 4 — Whether Christ Was Ever Withdrawn from the Purity of All-Complete Contemplation; and Whether He Contemplated as Purely as God

Was Christ ever drawn back from the purity of omnifarious contemplation? And did He contemplate as purely as God?

§ 7. Next, it is asked concerning what He says in the text, there at B, near the beginning: Neither does it grasp all things as clearly and perspicuously as God.

§ 8. 1. For from this word the Masters derive what they say, that the soul of Christ does not see as limpidly as God.

§ 9. 2. Also, if it does not see as limpidly, this proceeds from some obscuration. But the cause of obscuration is sin. Therefore it seems that in it there is no obscurity, since He committed no sin, nor was deceit found in His mouth.

§ 10. 3. Also, the soul of Christ is a most clear mirror. Therefore that which results in it results most clearly. Therefore it contemplates as limpidly as God.

§ 11. Furthermore, it is asked: Was Christ ever drawn back from the purity of that contemplation?

§ 12. It seems that He was: because we see, and the Philosopher also says, that one power existing in act vehemently draws back another. Therefore, since He was sometimes very intent upon His disciples and the passions of the body, it seems that He was drawn back from this kind of contemplation.

§ 13. Solution. It must be said that the soul of Christ did not contemplate as limpidly and purely as God, and that lesser limpidity or perspicuity is caused by the privation of nothingness which is in every creature; and that obscurity which belongs to the intellect from the fact that it is created is an inseparable defect, because it is conjoined to the rationale of creation, or the exodus from non-being to being.

§ 14. Through this the solution is clear to those things which are objected against the first point.

§ 15. To that which is asked further, it must be said that Christ was a true wayfarer (viator) and a true comprehensor, and neither drew back the other: for the retraction of powers, by which one power in vehement act draws back another, is only in those things which are purely creatures.

§ 2. However, this will be inquired into more below in the question concerning the passion of Christ.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Had Omnipotence as He Had Knowledge

Did Christ have omnipotence just as He had omniscience?

§ 5. Next, it is asked concerning what he says in the text, there at C: But if it is asked, Why God did not give Him power, etc.

§ 6. For it seems that He had omnipotence just as [He had] omniscience: because 1. If because of the union the knowledge of all things was caused in Him, therefore by a similar reason the power over all things was caused in Him.

§ 7. 2. Also, He knew all things as God does: therefore He knew how to create. But no one knows the exercise of any act unless he knows how to exercise that act. Therefore He knew how to exercise it. But no one knows how to exercise what he cannot exercise. Therefore the Son of God can create.

§ 8. 3. Also, the power to understand all things is a certain power, and the power to operate all things is a certain power. Since therefore in God the one power is not less than the other, it seems He ought to have given the other.

§ 9. 4. Also, a wise architect not only teaches his son, nor just gives him the art of how things are fabricated, but also by instruction induces in him the power to operate from use. Therefore it seems that God, who loves the soul of Christ much more than any man loves his son, induces in it the power of operation.

§ 10. Next to this it is further asked: Could He have given Him the power of creating something?

§ 11. It seems so, because: 1. He says in the text that He could give Him the power to do certain things which He is not able to do.

§ 12. 2. Also, in knowledge there is nothing but to receive, but in power there is nothing but to operate actively.

§ 13. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. No power exceeds its proper subject. The subject of the soul of Christ is finite: therefore it cannot have infinite power. But God's power is infinite: therefore the soul of Christ cannot receive it.

§ 14. 2. Also, nothing is created except what is reduced from nothing into being. But "nothing" and "being" are distant infinitely and without proportion. Therefore, to educe something from nothing into being requires infinite power. The soul of Christ cannot have infinite power; therefore the soul of Christ cannot receive from God the power to create anything, however slight.

§ 2. Also, infinite power exists only in an infinite essence: therefore when infinite power is communicated, an infinite essence is communicated. But this is not communicated to anyone, unless he is essentially God: but this cannot be anything created. Therefore infinite power is not communicable to anything created.

§ 3. And this must be conceded; and it must be said that it is not similar concerning knowledge and power: because knowledge occurs through another, just as through the presence of the Word; but power goes forth from the proper essence.

§ 4. To the first objection it must be said that there is practical or operative knowledge (which is the same thing) and there is speculative knowledge. But Christ did not have anything but speculative knowledge [concerning creation], and not operative.

§ 5. To the next objection it must be said that He knew how to create, that is, how things are created; but He did not know how to create with an operative knowledge, in the way a practitioner operates.

§ 6. To the next objection it must be said that the power of understanding is a passive and receiving power, and therefore can be perfected by something higher than itself. But the power of operating into act is one going forth from the root of its own essence, and its perfection is in the agent, and this cannot be anything created.

§ 7. To the next objection it must be said that the wise architect, the glorious God, taught the soul of Christ contemplative knowledge, but did not teach the exercise: because it was not capable, nor could it be. And therefore that which is adduced for a similarity is not similar.

§ 8. To the next objection I well concede that no creature is capable of the power of creating even anything at all.

§ 9. But to that which is objected on the contrary side [i.e., regarding what God could have given], it must be said that He could have given Him the power to operate something out of pre-existing matter, which He gave to nature, but not the power of creating.

DISTINCTIO XV

Divisio Textus

§ 10. Division of the Text

§ 1. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 2. That also must not be passed over, etc.

§ 3. Here begins that part which is about the things befitting Christ according to the potency of the body.

§ 4. And it is divided into three parts, according to the three distinctions posited here: in the first of which the Master shows what defects Christ assumed in body and soul, according as the capacity to suffer was in Him. In the second he determines a question following from this, whether He suffered by the necessity of these defects, or by will alone? There, Dist. XVI, A, Here arises a question taking its origin from the aforesaid, etc. But in the third, because His prayer indicated a defect of natural fear and sadness, it is asked concerning His prayer, whether it was heard or not? There, Dist. XVII, A, After the aforesaid, it is necessary to consider, etc.

§ 5. The first of these distinctions is divided into three parts: in the first of which he touches upon the defects which Christ assumed. In the second, he posits the objection of certain persons from the words of Augustine and others, and resolves it, there at D, But because some concerning the sense in the passion, etc. In the third, he posits a special difficulty from the words of Hilary, and resolves it, there at G, Nevertheless they move more, etc.

§ 6. Further, the first of these is subdivided into four parts: in the first of which he shows that He did not take up certain defects on the part of the body; in the second, he shows that He did not take up certain defects on the part of the soul, such as ignorance and difficulty in acting well, there at B, Authority hands down, etc. In the third, he shows that if ignorance had not approached from sin, it would not be a defect, but a natural consequent of nature, there at C, But perhaps someone will say, etc. In the fourth, he shows that in this God should not be blamed, there at C, § 2: But these defects, etc. In these the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Received Our Defects

Did Christ take on our defects?

§ 9. Here falls a question concerning the defects which Christ assumed. And three things are asked here regarding the first chapter, namely: Whether Christ took on our defects? Secondly, Whether He took on the defects of the soul? And thirdly, Whether He took on all of them, or certain ones?

§ 10. Regarding the first, it seems that Christ did not take on our defects. 1. For it belongs to one who is failing to fail and not to conquer: therefore the reception of a defect is contrary to fighting. But He came to bind the strong man. Therefore He ought rather to have come in fortitude, than in the assumption of defects.

§ 11. 2. Also, contraries are cured by contraries. But Christ came to cure defects. Therefore He came in that which cures our defects. But nothing cures except virtue and fortitude. Therefore He ought to have come in virtue and fortitude.

§ 12. 3. Also, a sick man, seeing a sick helper, despairs more concerning the helper, rather than being elevated into the hope of liberation. Since therefore He came to erect us to the hope of liberation, it seems that He Himself ought to have come in strength and not in defects: and thus it seems that He ought not to have assumed any defects.

§ 13. 4. This same thing seems [proven] through the Prophet Isaiah, Isaiah 51:9: Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord! awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Hast thou not

§ 1. struck the proud one, and wounded the dragon? Since therefore in ancient days He did not come except in the showing of virtue and fortitude, now also He ought not to have come in defect, but in strength, as it seems.

§ 2. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. God can do nothing unjust. To dismiss a sin unpunished without the penalty of satisfaction is unjust: therefore God cannot do this. And this is the argument of Anselm. And he concedes the premises and the conclusion. Then thus: A pure man could not render the honor due to God for sin, nor ought anyone to have done so except man: therefore, in order that this compensation might be made, it was necessary that there be a God-man. Now I resume the first conclusion. Recompense is not made except by resuming the penalty: therefore it is necessary for the satisfier to suffer the penalty. But one who does not have defects ordered to penalty does not suffer penalty. Therefore Christ had to assume defects ordered to passion.

§ 3. 2. Also, the Apostle, Hebrews 2:18: For in that wherein He Himself hath suffered and been tempted, He is able to succour them also that are tempted. Therefore, in order that He might heal and succour, it was necessary to have the defects of penal inflictions.

§ 4. 3. Also, Isaiah 53:3 and 4: We have seen Him... despised, and the most abject of men, a man of sorrows, and knowing infirmity. But it does not speak of the knowledge of pure notice, because He had this even as God, but of the knowledge of experience: therefore it was also necessary to have the defects through which He could experience it.

§ 5. 4. Also, Hebrews 2:17: Wherefore it behoved Him in all things to be made like unto His brethren, that He might become merciful. Since therefore the brethren were all in penal conditions, He Himself also ought to be in them.

§ 6. 5. Also, ibid., v. 14: Therefore because the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself in like manner hath been partaker of the same, that through death He might destroy him who had the empire of death, that is to say, the devil. But He could not die unless He assumed the defects ordered to death.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that it was fitting for Christ to assume our defects, as the latter arguments prove: for the former are sophistic.

§ 8. Therefore, to the first it must be said that there is conquering through justice, and conquering through the use of power: and Christ came to conquer in the first way, and this could not be except through satisfaction by sustaining penalty, and to assume the penalty was more fitting for our redemption.

§ 9. To the next objection it must be said that this is true concerning the primary curing things, which are sin and grace; but not concerning proximate curing things, because often pain cures pain, as an incision cures an abscess, and cauterization a swelling, and things of this kind which are in Christ. For He Himself came full of grace against fault. But the mode of medicating so that we might be able to receive grace was fittingly through the sustaining of penalty, so that the disease due to us might thereby be expelled from us.

§ 10. To the next objection it must be said that the sick man in sin did not despair from the fact that he did not see the power of the Mighty One to redeem: because he always knew this, that He could redeem. Rather, he was cast down from the fact that he saw no one able to exhibit a just amends for the offense. And therefore, coming in those dispositions which made for the amends of the offense, He elevated hope more than if He had come in fortitude.

§ 11. To the next objection it must be said that Isaiah seeks an arm strong through justice, and not through power, as has been said: because power alone could not liberate with a congruous liberation, as Anselm says.

Articulus 2 — Whether the Soul of Christ Was Passible

Was the soul of Christ passible?

§ 14. Secondly, it is asked: Did He take on defects according to the soul?

§ 1. And concerning this, three things are asked, namely: whether the soul is passible? And if it is passible, whether it is passible according to its entirety, or was so in Christ? And if the whole is passible, whether the bitterness of great pain and the experience of great joy could exist simultaneously in some one part of it?

§ 2. To the FIRST we proceed thus: 1. There is no pain except from a contrary agent directed toward the dissolution of a continuum or a composite; Christ's soul had nothing contrary to it: therefore, it suffered nothing in such a way that it would feel pain. The first premise is established by the words of Augustine, who says that the evil of punishment exists only because it is contrary to a good nature.[221] The second premise is evident from the fact that nothing bodily has contrariety to the soul.

§ 3. 2. Further, nothing acts upon a thing unless it is stronger than it, as Augustine says.[222] But no bodily thing was stronger than the soul of Christ: therefore, it did not act upon it to induce pain.

§ 4. 3. Further, Aristotle in book XVI of On Animals: If it does not touch, it does not act; and if it does not act, no alteration follows.[223] But nothing bodily touched the soul of Christ. Therefore, nothing acted upon it: therefore, the alteration of pain did not follow. The first premise is written by the Philosopher. The second is proven by the fact that those things touch, as the Philosopher says, which have their extremities together;[224] therefore, since the soul of Christ does not have an extremity, and even if it did have an extremity, it would not have it together with the acting agent—the nail or the scourge or anything striking it to cause pain: therefore, it seems that the soul of Christ could suffer nothing.

§ 5. 4. To the same point, an objection is raised more theologically: Dionysius says in his epistle to John the Apostle: "And as for you, I am not so insane as to think that you suffer anything; nay rather, I believe you feel the passions of the body only in this respect, that you may merely judge them."[225] From this it is gathered that the Saints do not feel passions except according to judgment, and not according to pain: therefore, much less did Christ, in whom there was greater holiness: therefore, He did not feel pain.

§ 6. 5. Further, Moses was on the mountain with the Lord for forty days and forty nights, and he did not feel the pain of hunger on account of the presence of the Angel in the person of God: therefore, much more so Christ, who was united to God and continuously enjoyed the Deity itself.

§ 7. 6. Further, the holy martyrs continuously wore out their torturers, counting their torments as nothing because of the sweetness of charity: therefore, much less so Christ.

§ 8. 7. Further, we see that a soul most forcefully occupied with the act of one power is abstracted from the attention of another, as the Philosopher says in the book On Sleep and Waking.[226] Therefore, since Christ was continuously joined to heavenly things even by fruitive enjoyment, it seems that His soul was abstracted from the body, and thus He did not feel the passions of the body, even if passion were to rush upon the body.

§ 9. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Damascene says that when the body suffered, the soul suffered along with it;[227] therefore, the soul was passible, because to suffer along with [compati] is to suffer for another and with another; but if the soul suffered along with [the body], it suffered itself.

§ 10. 2. Further, pain is nothing but the sense of punishment; but sense belongs only to the soul, as is held in the Text [of the Sentences];[228] therefore, the soul suffered: therefore, the soul was passible.

§ 11. 3. Further, Lamentations 1:12: O all you who pass by the way, attend, and see if there be any sorrow like my sorrow! Therefore, the soul was passible.

§ 12. If it is said that the soul of Christ suffered pain by a miracle: Against this miracle we see in all men that blows and wounds cause pain; therefore, since this is present in all, it seems that it is natural for the soul to suffer along with the body, and we have this expressly in the Text. Therefore, since Christ assumed all defects, it seems also that He assumed in His soul the natural compassion and pain of the body.

§ 13. Solution: It must be said that the soul of Christ and every soul in the state of this mortality, as long as it is conjoined to the body, is passible by suffering along with the body and by suffering from the body. For (as the Philosopher says) there are certain movements coming from the body into the soul itself, and certain ones conversely coming from the soul into the body. Now, they come from the body into the soul, as in sensing and in sleep: in sensing, indeed, namely by receiving sensible species in the bodily organs, according to which the proper sense, the common sense, the phantasy, and the other apprehensive powers are said to be passive, according as to suffer [pati] is derived from the Greek pathein, which sounds like 'to receive'. And in sleep, because sleep is the binding of the senses from a cooled evaporation in the area of the brain, and descending to weigh down the organs of the senses. But other movements are from the soul into the body, such as progression, and works of art which are produced by the practical intellect: but in this manner, the passibility of the soul is not in question here.

§ 14. By another rationale, the soul is again passible according to how Damascene defines passion, which is a movement of the soul through the suspicion of good or evil. For from this suspicion arises a passion inflicted upon the sensitive part of the soul, which is called sorrow or delight: for from the apprehension of a fitting good arises delight, and from the apprehension of an unfitting evil arises sorrow: and in this way again, passion is not in question here.

§ 15. In a third way, passion is called the sense of pain resulting from something dissolving the continuous body conjoined to the soul, whether that dissolution is from an intemperance of humors, as in fevers, or through a violent agent, as in blows and wounds, and the like: and in this way passion is in question here; and thus we say that the soul of Christ suffered along with the body.

§ 16. To the first objection raised to the contrary, it must be said that it is true that the soul in itself and according to its own nature has no contrary, neither in itself nor in its composing parts; but nevertheless, the thing conjoined to it has a contrary, namely, the body; and because it naturally desires the preservation of the conjunct—just as the Lord says to Peter, John 21:18: When you are old, you will stretch out your hands, and another will gird you, and lead you where you do not wish to go—for this reason, I say, because it desires the preservation of the conjunct, it feels pain and suffers along with things dissolving it; and this passion is from what is contrary to it, or contrary to that which is conjoined to it: for in this way, what is contrary to the conjunct is contrary to itself in this state, although not absolutely.

§ 17. To the next, it must be said according to Augustine that the nail or sword were not stronger than the soul of Christ, nor are they even stronger than the soul of another; but when a passion is produced in the body, such as a wounding, a bruise, or something of this sort, the soul punishes itself. And this is understood thus: because the soul apprehends the species of the passions produced in the body by abstracting them from the organ of touch, and apprehends them as contrary to its conjunct, and from that apprehension pain is caused as from the immediate cause of the sense of pain. Hence, although the sword does not cut it, nevertheless it feels pain by the pain caused from such apprehended species, and the immediate afflicting thing is such an apprehended species. And this solution saves the statement of Augustine. But we can solve it more easily by saying that the stronger does not act per se except upon the less strong; but per accidens it can act upon something stronger than itself: just as if it acts upon something weaker than itself which is conjoined to something stronger, from whose compassion the stronger suffers.

§ 18. To the next, it must be said that the statement of the Philosopher is true; but here there is a certain touch, for although the sword does not touch the soul immediately, it nevertheless touches it through the conjunct, so that touch is spoken of insofar as it touches the apprehended species of the dissolving agent: and thus the alteration of pain itself follows.

§ 19. To the next, it must be said that Dionysius is speaking to commend the virtue and perseverance of John in that he did not regard passions for the sake of Christ; and therefore he means to say that the passions of persecutions and exile did not affect him so as to turn him away from the rectitude of life and faith. But he does not mean that he did not feel the tribulations, which he implies by his very manner of speaking when he says: Nay rather, I believe you feel the passions of the body only in this respect, that you may merely judge them. For if he had judgment and sense, then pain necessarily followed.

§ 20. To the next, it must be said that Moses had this by the grace of the fact that his body remained unchanged, and not by nature, since the turning away of the soul through the act of contemplation availed for this: because even this conversion to higher things draws after it the bodily spirits and lower powers, so that they operate less and direct less of the natural spirits to the natural works which are digesting, nourishing, and the like. But that he had this entirely by nature seems to me impossible: because although it is true that certain animals rest for a time, namely those of cold humors and thick skin, because they contract many superfluities at the time of nourishment, and therefore at the time when the cold begins, when the skin thickens and wrinkles more and the pores close, they do not receive food but rest: because otherwise, death would befall them due to the excessive viscosity of the humors; and so they rest then so that the heat may either consume or dissolve the contracted superfluities —nevertheless, this cannot be said of a human being: because he is not an animal of this sort, nor does this happen generally to every such creature, nor at a determinate time of every year. And therefore this miracle was greater in a man than in a woman, and greater in one moving from place to place than in one resting in one place.

§ 21. To the next, it must be said that the Martyrs suffered greatly in their passions; and if they sometimes said that the torments afforded them refreshment, as Vincent said to Domitian: "Now I am borne aloft, and I look down upon all your torments from a height above the world, O tyrant: rise up, then, and rage with all the spirit of your malice; you will see that I who am tortured can do more by the power of God than you can who torture," this must be referred to the fact that it is said as a cause, that is, that these torments are to me the cause of eternal refreshment, the hope of which already somewhat mitigates the torments, but does not remove them. And this is proven by this text in 2 Maccabees 6:30, where Eleazar says: O Lord, who have the holy knowledge, you know manifestly that although I could be delivered from death, I suffer grievous pains in body: but in soul am well content to suffer these things because I fear you.

§ 22. To the next, it must be said that a soul occupied with something can be abstracted from a light movement, but it is not withdrawn from a stronger one: for a stronger movement always draws the soul to itself. Hence, although the bond of charity binding to God through contemplation is stronger than the bond of the body, nevertheless the bond of the body in this state moves more, and is felt more; and therefore it rather draws the soul to itself than that the soul can be abstracted from it. However, I do not say this of Christ: because Christ was a wayfarer and a comprehensor; and therefore both could be in Him in actuality without one being withdrawn by the other.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Soul of Christ Was Passible According to Itself as a Whole

Whether the soul of Christ was passible according to its entirety?

223. Augustine, City of God, Book XII, ch. 18.

§ 24. Secondly, it is asked concerning this: Whether the soul was passible according to its entirety in Christ, or even in others, because for the most part it is the same question?

§ 25. For it seems that it was not: because 1. The Philosopher says that the intellect is the act of no body, that is, of no part of the body; since therefore it has no contrary in itself, nor is it conjoined to a contrary, it seems therefore that it neither suffers nor suffers along with the body.

§ 26. 2. Further, if the soul suffered according to its entirety, then it would be necessary that according to its entirety it would be occupied with the passion; therefore it would be withdrawn from all other things, and this would be a very imperfect thing to believe even of the Saints, much less of Christ; therefore it seems that the rational soul does not suffer according to its entirety.

§ 27. 3. Further, as the Philosopher maintains, it belongs to the wise man to suffer, but not to be drawn down; but he is drawn down if the passion reaches his reason: therefore it seems that it is contrary to reason to suffer according to reason: therefore He did not suffer according to reason.

§ 28. 4. Further, it was already held above that since the soul has no contrary in itself, it does not suffer per se, but suffers along with the suffering body; therefore it suffers according to that part by which it is conjoined to the body: but according to the higher powers it is not conjoined to the body: therefore according to the higher powers it does not suffer.

§ 29. 5. Further, Augustine in the book City of God says that the Philosophers found four natural passions: fear, hope, joy, and perturbation. Since therefore perturbation is the same as sorrow, and sorrow arises only from pain, in the wise man according to that part by which he is wise—that is, according to the higher part—there is neither passion nor compassion.

§ 30. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. As the body is in the composition of its members, so the soul is in the composition of its powers; but when one member suffers, as the Apostle says, all the members suffer: therefore, when one power of the soul suffers, all the others suffer with it: therefore the whole soul suffers in the passion of sense.

§ 31. 2. Further, the conjunction of the powers of the soul within the substance of the soul is greater than that of the soul and the body. If therefore from the disposition of conjunction the soul suffers along with the body, much more from the disposition of the powers among themselves does one power suffer with another; and thus when a passion takes place in one part of the soul, there will be passion in the whole soul.

§ 32. 3. Further, if the soul suffers on account of a natural passion by being thus conjoined, the whole soul will suffer. The first premise is evident from the foregoing. The second is proven by the fact that the nature which is the form of a human is different from that of a brute. Since therefore the body of a brute is perfected by the act of a sensitive soul, necessarily the body of a human will be perfected by the perfection of the rational soul: therefore the rational [soul] is conjoined to the body.

224. Isidore of Seville, Sententiae, Book I, ch. 2.

§ 33. Solution: I say that the soul according to its entirety is passible in the body. For it was once preached by a certain abbot that Christ's soul had not suffered according to the higher part, but at Paris this was condemned as heresy by the university of Masters. But it must be understood that in the soul there are two things to consider, namely, that it is the nature of a human being, and that it is the principle of human operations. As to the first, it is considered in three ways: for it has certain things insofar as it is a substantial form, and certain things insofar as it is a soul, and certain things insofar as it is the nature of a human being as human. For insofar as it is a substantial form, it is the very perfection of the human body, according as it arrives by temperament at a balance agreeing somewhat with heaven, and distant from the distemperament of the elements; and since this balance is highest in a human being, as Avicenna says, the most noble form is given to him by the Giver of Forms: and therefore the ratio of form and act in the soul is most noble. But insofar as the soul is the act of a body not only complexioned in such temperance, but also having life, and whatever is organic is of this sort, and thus the soul is able to flow forth from itself diverse powers into diverse parts of the body; this, again, the rational soul has most nobly: which is proven by the form and figure of the body and the figure of the members, which exceed every other animate body in comeliness and beauty. Third, insofar as it is the nature of a human being as human—a nature, I say, giving the human being the essence of a human being and reason, according to what the Philosopher says in II De Anima, that the soul is substance according to reason: because it gives essence and reason to the animate body: and thus the rational soul, considered as a nature, must necessarily have something more than form, and more than soul: and this is what a certain Philosopher says, that it has the property of flowing forth certain powers which are affixed to organs by the fact that it is a form giving being as a nature; and certain powers which are not affixed, having an order to those affixed by the fact that they receive species from them, and having an order to separate substances by the fact that they participate in their light; and this is what the Philosopher says, that the noble soul has three operations, namely, divine, animal, and intellectual. In this consideration, therefore, the whole conjoined soul suffers together. But there is another consideration of the soul insofar as it is the principle of human operations, and in this way it is not necessary that the whole suffers together: because a certain power of it can be about the contemplation of eternal things, and a certain one affected by the passions of bodies.

§ 34. Having established this, it is easy to reply to the objections.

§ 35. For to the first it must be said that although the intellect as intellect is the act of no body to which it is mixed as an organ, nevertheless intellectually the whole soul is the act of the body and a nature: and therefore the intellect as a nature of this [body] suffers and suffers along with it, although it is not necessary that it suffer as it is the principle of the work which is contemplation. But some say otherwise, that it receives from the body the order of a preceding power, and therefore according to that order they call it passible; but this solution, whether true or not, does little or nothing for the solution of the question.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that this is not necessary: because although the whole suffers as it is the nature of man, nevertheless not all the powers suffer in such a way that they are carried to the consideration of the passion so as to be occupied and detained concerning it: because by this consideration the powers are divided, and some are carried to higher things, but some to lower things.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that it is not drawn down: because drawing down is such that the higher powers are averted from the rectitude they have, according to which they are superior and ruling over those which are inferior; and this happens to them not as they are the nature of man, but rather as they are divided against the inferior ones.

§ 38. To the next the solution is already clear: because the whole soul is conjoined as a nature giving essence and reason to the body of man, as he is man.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that sorrow and perturbation do not fall into the wise man according to an effect that turns him away from the rectitude of governance, but they fall into him according to the experience of passion.

Articulus 4 — Whether, According to Some One Part, at the Same Time the Bitterness of Great Pain and the Experience of Great Delight Can Be Present

Whether extreme pain and the experience of great joy could simultaneously be present in some one part?

§ 41. Thirdly it is asked, whether the bitterness of great pain and the experience of great joy could simultaneously be present in some one part?

§ 42. 1. It seems that it could not: because 1. Contraries cannot simultaneously be in the same thing in the same respect: but maximum pain and maximum delight are contraries: therefore they cannot simultaneously be present.

§ 43. If perhaps you say that it was different in Christ than in other men, because Christ was united to the Deity, and therefore according to reason there could be in Him the maximum delight of fruition, and according to union with the body the maximum sense of pain in the same part of the soul. On the contrary: Whatever informs an indivisible thing informs it entirely; just as if it were possible for whiteness to be in a point, we could not say that it could be white according to its being the beginning, and black according to its being the end: because since whiteness is a being according to nature, it seeks a subject according to nature and not according to reason. But beginning and end do not diversify a point, except according to reason. Therefore similarly, since the soul is not divided such that one part is conjoined and another part is not conjoined, by the consideration of conjunction to this and to that it is not diversified except according to reason; but pain and delight are passions according to reality: therefore to whatever power of the soul it is present, it will inform it entirely: therefore the other will have no place unless it is posited that that power substantially has diverse parts, which would be absurd: therefore it seems that supreme pain along with supreme delight could not be present in the same power.

226. Aristotle, De sensu et sensato, ch. 7.

§ 44. 2. Further, the same act cannot be understood to terminate at two things as bounds, neither in the acts of the soul nor in the acts of the body: because then one would be made two: just as one line cannot terminate at two points in one direction unless two lines were made. But if the sorrow of pain and the joy of gladness were present simultaneously, they would be present as objects about which its act would be concerned: therefore the same act would terminate at two things as bounds, which also cannot be understood: therefore they are not present simultaneously according to the same part of the soul.

§ 45. ON THE CONTRARY: Either the reason of Christ apprehended the pain of the passion or not. If it did not apprehend it: then it did not ordain it: therefore it was not meritorious, which is heretical to say. If it did apprehend it: but it is established that it also apprehended the Deity conjoined to it, because it was never withdrawn from the apprehension of it: therefore in the same power there was an apprehension of two things, one as supremely contrary, the other as supremely agreeable. Now it is established that the experience of pain follows from the apprehension of death, and supreme joy from the apprehension of the Deity: and simultaneously, as it seems, because the apprehensions were simultaneous.

§ 46. Solution: Without prejudice it can be said that it happens that contraries are present simultaneously in two ways, namely, that both are present as form and act, and that one is ordered to the other as matter, and this happens especially in the powers of the soul. That contraries cannot be present in the first way, the previously held arguments seem to prove sufficiently. But in the second way contraries can be present, and the affection can follow: for example, in every penitent there is sorrow in the reason, because otherwise it would not be praiseworthy; and yet Augustine says: Let him always grieve, and rejoice in his grief: therefore joy can be about sorrow, such that sorrow is the matter of joy, and thus both can be present. Thus I say in Christ, that death was apprehended in reason as it was the work of redemption, and thus death was apprehended as the matter of joy: and thus both could be present, and the Psalm 18:6 seems to speak thus: He hath rejoiced as a giant to run the way. And in this way there could simultaneously be present the affection of pain in the judgment of death, and joy from the end of death.

§ 47. And by this the solution to the whole is clear. Or, we could say that pain concerning the death of the flesh is not contrary to the joy of eternal fruition or human redemption: because they are not about the same thing, and thus they can be present simultaneously. But this solution is not as valid as the first one: because although they are not strictly contraries, nevertheless by their effect they draw toward contraries, such as being occupied with lower or higher things: and therefore the prior solution is better in my judgment, and the objection made to the contrary proceeds in this sense.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Received All Defects, or Some and Not Others

Whether Christ took on all defects, or some, and some not?

Whether Christ took on all defects, or some, and some not?

§ 49. Next it is asked, whether He took on all or some?

§ 50. It seems that He took on all: because 1. He came to cure all: therefore He assumed all.

§ 51. 2. Further, Damascene: The whole [Word] assumed the whole me, that He might bestow salvation upon the whole me: therefore it seems that He assumed all.

§ 52. 3. Further, Damascene: What is unassumable is incurable: therefore if He did not assume some defect, that defect was not curable, as it seems: therefore He assumed all.

§ 53. 4. Further, if from those things which He suffered, He learned obedience and mercy: then He ought to have suffered especially in all our defects: because if He had not suffered in some, according to that He would not have learned to help those who suffer.

§ 54. Moreover, what would be the reason that He should assume some, and leave some aside, since none of them is a sin? Therefore it seems that He assumed all, or none: but He did not assume none: therefore He assumed all.

§ 55. ON THE CONTRARY: He was not leprous, nor hunchbacked, nor lame: therefore He did not assume all bodily defects.

§ 56. Similarly, He was not ignorant, nor impotent to act well: therefore neither did He assume all defects of the soul.

§ 57. Solution: Here it must be considered through the rule of Damascene given above, that He assumed all the defects which He planted in our nature. Therefore it must be considered that our nature was planted in two ways, namely in natural principles, and in the grace of innocence, and God made both plantings: but God did not make the loss of grace, but the fault of man did: and therefore those things which followed fault outside of nature He did not assume, because He did not plant them, such as ignorance, and infirmity for acting well in the soul, and the tinder of lust in the body, and the fighting of the flesh against the spirit: and therefore He did not assume those. But in the natural planting, God planted our bodies by converting elements into humors, and humors into similar and dissimilar members: and from the planting of those there are some on the part of the body, and some on the part of the soul: on the part of the body, like mortality; on the part of dissolution, like hunger from primary qualities acting on substance: and therefore He assumed those. In the soul, moreover, pain and the sorrow of separation and death follow upon conjoined natural affections, and He assumed those: and these are natural defects of every human being. But leprosy, and a hunchback, etc., are personal defects of this or that individual, and therefore they do not belong per se to the nature: and since He came to repair the entire nature, therefore He ought not to have assumed those. The same judgment applies to fever, epilepsy, and the like.

§ 58. The Master gives another rule for considering between the defects assumed and not assumed in the Text, namely that He took those which it was not unbecoming for Him to take, and which were expedient for us: and this is the same: because those which He planted in the beginning of nature, it was not unbecoming for Him to take, but not the personal ones and those consequent upon fault: and these were expedient for us, because these are for the cure of the nature, and not of one man.

§ 59. Moreover, if He had assumed personal defects, such as leprosy or a hunchback, He would have been hindered from preaching the word: because He would not have been heard on account of the despicability of His person.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Three Causes Touched By The Master, Why Christ Assumed Our Defects, Are Good

Whether the three causes mentioned by the Master, why Christ assumed our defects, are good?

§ 61. Next it is asked concerning what he says in the Text in the third part of this first part, near the end, there: For the defects which He had, whether for the showing of true humanity, etc.

§ 62. For here he determines a threefold end for the assumption of defects, namely the showing of true humanity in Him, the congruity for the work of redemption, and for raising up our hope from the despair of immortality.

§ 63. But it seems that none of these causes was fitting.

§ 64. And first it is objected concerning the first thus: 1. Whatever is true in one way in the state of corruption and incorruption, passibility of corruption does not belong to the truth of it: human nature is true in one way in the state of corruption and incorruption: therefore passibility does not belong to its truth. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proven by the fact that human nature will be that which will appear in man at the time of the resurrection: because nothing corruptible will be in him.

§ 65. Moreover, the same is also written by Anselm.[229]

§ 66. Further, whatever is not from the origin of any nature, this does not belong to its truth: therefore a true human being is not shown by that.

§ 67. Further, after the resurrection He showed true humanity: and yet He did not show it as corruptible, since He entered when the doors were closed, and before the disciples He was sometimes visible, sometimes invisible: therefore if He then exhibited the truth of human nature, then penalties cannot belong to the truth of human nature: therefore He could not show Himself to be a true human being through such things.

§ 68. 2. Similarly it is objected concerning the second cause: because the work of redemption was not just any death, but of violent killing: therefore it would have sufficed to assume flesh divisible by swords, and it was not necessary to assume the defect of thirst, and weariness, and the like.

§ 69. 3. Similarly it is objected concerning the third: because it seems that it depressed hope rather than raised it: since an infirm man is not consoled by an infirm helper, but is cast down into despair.

§ 70. Solution: It must be said that these causes which the Master determines here are good: and their rationale and sufficiency is taken thus: For the Redeemer assumed that which is a disposition to redemption, and that which is of avail for the work. And in the first way is the first cause: because He exhibited the truth of one owing satisfaction by taking on defects. But if it is as regards the work, it is either as regards the work itself in itself, or as regards the end of the work. If as regards the work itself, thus the second is taken. If as regards the end of the work, thus the third is taken: because this was the end of redemption, that man by the hope of the grace of reconciliation might be raised to the hope of immortality.

§ 71. To the first, therefore, it must be said that He did not intend to show the nature of man in general, because this would not have availed us, but the nature of man in the state of redemption as one owing and able to satisfy: and since this congruously could not be except through passibility, passibility belongs to the state of the truth of the nature in the one redeeming the nature, although it does not belong to the state of the nature in itself: and by this the solution to the following two is clear.

§ 72. To that which is objected against the second cause, it must be said that violent killing can inflict no injury.

with the natural defects having been assumed: because, as to the disposition of matter, the defect leading to natural and violent death is the same, although there is a difference in the efficient cause.

To the other, it must be said that from that infirmity hope is raised up: because hope is supported by the strength of merit and justice, and not by the strength of forces: and those defects accumulate for us the merit and justice of reconciliation.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Contracted These Defects, or Voluntarily Assumed Them

Whether Christ contracted these defects, or voluntarily undertook them?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says subsequently in chapter C of that part, there, C, § 2: But these defects not by the necessity of his condition, etc.

For it seems that Christ contracted these defects, because:

§ 1. "Contracted" is said of what is drawn simultaneously with nature: but he himself simultaneously drew both into himself from his mother's body. Therefore, it seems he contracted them.

§ 2. Also, the Holy Spirit, coming into the Blessed Virgin and cleansing her, did not cleanse that which was not unclean: but defects of this kind were not unclean. Therefore, Christ drew both, namely the defects and the matter of the body, from his mother: therefore he contracted them.

§ 3. Furthermore, if it is said that to "contract" is to draw from lust—the lust, I mean, in which our nature is sown—what is the reason that it should be called contracted? For this does not seem to contain the meaning of the word.

Solution: It must be said that Christ does not have contracted defects, but assumed ones. For assumption is in the will of the one assuming, and thus it was in the power of Christ, before he was a man, whether he would assume the nature of a human body without defects or with them: and for this reason they were assumed. But it is not so in us: because we did not exist before we possessed these defects as a habit, and for this reason we contracted them: and I fully concede that what is contracted is drawn from nature and along with the lust that is present in the sexual union of generation.

And through this, the solution to the first two points is evident.

To that which is further asked concerning the reason for the word, it must be said that its reason is taken from a threefold inseparable simultaneity in corrupt nature: one of which is in those generating, another is in the act of generation, and the third is in the matter of generation. Now, in those generating, although the person is cleansed from original sin through baptism, nevertheless in the act of generation the person is conjoined to Adam: because every pure man (as Anselm says) is Adam in nature, whoever he might himself be in person. And this is taken from the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 15:47: The first man was from the earth, earthly: the second man from heaven, heavenly. Such as is the earthly, such also are the earthly. And below, v. 49: Therefore, as we have borne the image of the earthly, etc. For if the person were generating as a person, then the begotten would be born according to the merit or demerit of the person: and this is not true. Therefore, the person generates as Adam in nature. And thus (according to Augustine), just as a circumcised man begets an uncircumcised son, passing into him that which he himself already lacks, so the baptized man generates a son of wrath, passing into him that which he himself already lacks. And in this simultaneity of the generating person and Adam, it is called "contracted," as if drawn from both [con-tractum], namely through the one and from the other: for through the person we draw from Adam.

Moreover, the simultaneity of the act is the conjunction of a twofold law, namely of the fusion of corpulent substance, and of the law of concupiscence in vehement and suffocating lust: for although it does not suffocate some as to the habit of virtue, it nevertheless suffocates all as to the act of reason. Whence Gregory also says that in such a work the Holy Spirit did not touch the hearts of the Prophets, because of the excessive descent of reason beneath the flesh. And with respect to the conjunction of these two things, again it is called contracted, as if drawn simultaneously from both in the act of generation.

The third conjunction is in the seed, which is the matter wherein lies the corruption of vice according to its cause, and the corruption of passibility. I say the corruption of vice which is a vice, either immediately from a vice, or tending toward a vice of itself. A vice, just as original sin in the soul. Immediately from a vice: because the law of the flesh sprinkled in the members is a figure of sin, as Augustine says in the book De Nuptiis et concupiscentia. For we do not have it from the things that constitute us materially, namely from the hot, the cold, the moist, and the dry: rather it is the immediate sequel to sin. And toward a vice of itself: because it is prone to sin. And I say that this corruption of vice is in the seed according to its cause, not according to its essence, because such an innate seed will cause it partly with respect to the body, partly with respect to the soul, and partly with respect to both. For as to habit, the law of the members will be sprinkled in the members of the body; as to original sin, it will be in the soul; and as to the fight of the flesh against the spirit (and conversely), it will be in both. And therefore I say that it is not in the seed according to its essence: because, as Anselm says, original sin is no more something by essence in the seed than it is in spittle. However, this has to be determined in the commentary on the second book of the Sentences.

Therefore, on account of this threefold conjunction, this passibility is said to be contracted in us. But in Christ it was present in none of these ways. For Adam was expelled in the nature of the mother; in the conception of the Son only the Holy Spirit acted, not a man; and in the assumed matter there was no corruption of vice. Therefore, he assumed these defects and did not contract them.

Articulus 8 — Whether Christ Assumed Fear and Sadness

Whether Christ assumed fear and sorrow?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says in that chapter D: But because some out of their own sense, etc.

For it seems that Christ did not assume sorrow and fear, which can be proved by a manifold reasoning. First, because such things could not fall upon him:

§ 1. For Seneca proves that they cannot fall upon the wise in this way: The wise man is not saddened by things that can be inflicted well; but bodily punishments can be inflicted well, as if they are inflicted innocently; therefore the wise man is not saddened by them.

§ 2. Also, the wise man is not saddened by things in which the act of virtue is chiefly at its peak; but in the endurance of inflicted punishments, and the peril of death, and death itself, is the act of virtue at its peak, because it is an act of fortitude: therefore he is not saddened by them: therefore neither was Christ, since he was supremely wise.

§ 3. Also, the wise man is not saddened by the assault of fortune, whether it assaults through prosperity or adversity: because fortune does not consist of praiseworthy goods, nor can it take away or give human good (and I call "human good" that for which man exists): therefore, since Christ was no less wise than the Philosophers, he was not saddened by inflicted passions. Therefore it is false that Christ had sorrow, as it seems.

§ 4. Furthermore, the authorities introduced in the following chapter E seem to support this.

228. Anselm of Canterbury, Cur Deus Homo, Book I.

Furthermore, it seems it can be shown that he did not have fear.

§ 1. For timidity is a vice opposite to fortitude; but Christ had no vice: therefore, no fear.

§ 2. Also, fear is not of that which can be taken away when someone wills it: but Christ could have transferred death from himself when he willed, because he himself said, John 10:17–18: Therefore the Father loves me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one takes it from me: but I lay it down of myself, and I have the power to lay it down, etc. Therefore it seems that he did not fear.

§ 3. Also, if man had not sinned, he would not have feared. Therefore it seems that fear followed upon sin. Therefore Christ ought not to have had it.

§ 4. Also, it was held above in the Text that if a man in the beginning of his birth or nature had ignorance or difficulty doing good, it would not be a defect in him: because there is no defect and punishment prior to sin. Therefore, by parity of reasoning, if a man by nature is saddened in dangers and fears, it is not a defect. But Christ feared, as you say. Therefore not through a defect, but through nature. And thus it did not avail us, because that which he did not freely assume did not grace us with salvation.

§ 5. Also, by the same reasoning that he did not assume ignorance and difficulty doing good (because they followed upon sin), it seems that he ought to have assumed no defect; for Augustine says in a previous chapter that that in which nature is instituted is not a defect or penalty, but rather that which follows upon sin. But all these things followed from sin. Therefore he ought to have received none of them: therefore neither sorrow, nor fear, nor hunger, nor thirst, nor any other.

Solution: It must be said that Christ had true natural sorrow, and true fear, just as the Master says in the Text.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is one thing for sorrow to be in a wise man, and another for perturbation to fall upon him: for although in a wise man sorrow is a trouble [turbatio], nevertheless it is not a perturbation [perturbatio]. For Christ is no less wise than the Philosophers; yet he says: I was troubled, and did not speak . Nor does Seneca intend that a troubling sorrow is not in them, but that there is not a perturbing sorrow in them: because perturbation denotes a deflection of reason away from equity. For it is one thing for reason to be touched by trouble, and not be deflected; and another to be touched and be deflected from the equality of governance by which it rules in the kingdom of the soul; and another to be touched and be deflected from the equality of virtue. For the wise man is touched and suffers by reason of the passion, but he is not led downwards, deflected from equality and equity. But the imperfect wise man suffers, and is touched, and is led downwards from equality indeed, but does not recede from equity. But the foolish man suffers, and is led downwards from both equality and equity. Therefore, although bodily punishments can be well received for the exercise of virtue, nevertheless because they act against a good nature, they induce in the wise man such a sorrow as we have stated.

To the next, it must be said that the wise man is not saddened by them insofar as the highest virtue is in them; but according to another mode he can be saddened. Whence Aristotle says in Book III of the Ethics that it suffices for the brave man not to be saddened, that is, not to be perturbedly saddened, although in other virtues this does not suffice: because in other virtues one must acquire a habit causing delight in the work, as he himself says: but the brave man cannot delight in the work of endurance, rather it suffices if he rejoices in the end, and is not perturbed in the work, even if he is saddened on account of the excessive bitterness of the passion.

To the next, it must be said that a passion, insofar as it is inflicted by fortune, is not the matter of virtue, except insofar as it is accepted by the brave and wise man: because the Philosopher says that the brave man also uses misfortunes well, and even natural dangers, such as natural death.

To the next, it must be said that those authorities do not intend to remove the passion of sorrow from Christ entirely, but they intend to posit the passion and remove the perturbing passion, just as the Master expounds those authorities below in the text.

To that which is further asked concerning fear, it must be said that timidity is not the same as fear: because timidity sounds like pusillanimity, which is a vice: but fear sounds like a certain passion which can be a virtue, a vice, and a condition of nature. A virtue, as we say that a brave man fears things that ought to be feared; a vice, as we say worldly or human fear; but a condition of nature, as we say there is a dread that falls upon a constant man. Hence fear does not always sound like a vice.

To the next, it must be said that in Christ one must consider the nature and the person: hence, although nothing was impossible for the person, nevertheless the nature in him was infirm, and its condition was the fear of the person in that nature. But that he said, No one takes it, etc., he says this of the power of the person according to the divine nature.

To the next, it must be said that sorrow and fear are planted in our nature, as we said above: because although the acts of fearing and sorrowing followed upon sin, nevertheless the potency of fearing, and the order to fear, comes from the mode constituting the nature of the body out of contraries. And this is not so for certain other defects, as will immediately be evident.

To the next, it must be said that "defect" is not properly said of that which is absent from one's natural endowments. For Diogenes is not called defective because he lacks horns; and man is not called defective because he lacks the power of flying. And for this reason these passibilities of men are called defects: because his nature is rational, and was instituted in opposite habits; but if it were not constituted with his nature, it would not be a defect, as Augustine says: just as it is not a defect in a goat that it does not reason.

To the next, it must be said that it is not similar for all defects whatsoever: because some follow nature according to the principles constituting it, and some follow fault, and some follow the person, as we said above. But Christ ought not to assume any except those which follow—

F. Determination of the authorities.

But lest there be thought to be any adverse diversity in the sacred letters, we say that the words of these authorities are to be taken in this way: that they are understood to have removed from Christ not the truth of fear and sorrow or propassion, but the necessity of fear and sorrow, and passion. For Christ had true fear and sorrow in the nature of man: but not as we do, who are his members. For we, on account of our sin, are necessarily subject to these defects, and in us these defects are according to propassion and passion: but in Christ they were only according to propassion. For just as in sins certain degrees are noted as propassion and passion, so also in these penal affects. For sometimes one is affected by fear or sorrow, in such a way that the intellect of the mind is not thereby moved from rectitude or the contemplation of God: and then it is a propassion. But sometimes it is moved and perturbed: and then it is a passion. But Christ was not so perturbed in soul by fear or sorrow, that he declined in any way from rectitude or the contemplation of God: according to which mode it is understood when he is said to have feared or been sad. Hence Jerome on Matthew, where it is read, "He began to be sorrowful and sad": "To prove the truth of the assumed man," he says, "he was truly saddened: but the passion does not dominate his soul; rather it is a propassion." Hence he says, "He began to be saddened." For it is one thing to be saddened, another to begin to be saddened: which means, one is saddened in one way by propassion, in another by passion. And therefore, according to this distinction, sometimes Christ is said not to have truly feared, sometimes to have truly feared: because he had true fear and sorrow, but not according to passion, nor from the necessity of condition. Whence Augustine, wishing an understanding of these sayings to be taken from these causes, says Christ did not truly fear or sorrow, and immediately says he had true sorrow: "Prefiguring the infirm in himself, the Lord says with these words: My Father, if it is possible, let this chalice pass from me. For the Lord did not truly fear to suffer, being about to rise on the third day, when Paul burned to be dissolved and be with Christ." That one rejoices, about to be crowned, and is the Lord sad, who is about to crown? Behold, here he seems to remove sorrow and fear from Christ. But he continuously added: "But he assumed sorrow just as he assumed flesh. For he was sad, as the Gospel says." For if he was not sad, when the Evangelist says, "My soul is sorrowful," etc., therefore also when he says, "Jesus slept," he did not sleep: or when he says he ate, he did not eat: and thus nothing sound remains, so that it might even be said that his body was not true. Whatever therefore is written of him is true, and was done. Therefore he was also sad: but by his will he undertook true sorrow, just as by his will he undertook true flesh. You clearly recognize that he contradicts himself in these words, unless he discerned the various causes of the sayings, from which the understanding of the words must be assumed. For if the cause for the understanding of the aforesaid words is discerned, no contradiction occurs.

Articulus 9 — Whether in Christ There Was Prepassion or Passion

Whether in Christ there was propassion, or passion?

Next, it is asked concerning what the Master says, solving objections against himself, there, F, near the beginning: In us these defects are according to propassion and passion.

§ 1. For those two species are posited in sins. But in Christ there was no sin: therefore neither of these degrees was in Christ.

§ 2. Also, he speaks in the Text of passion. Furthermore, the Gloss on Matthew 5:28 says that propassion is a sudden movement to which reason does not consent. But Dionysius in his third epistle to Gaius the monk says: The sudden is that which is contrary to hope, and brought forth from the unapparent into the manifest. Therefore nothing in him was sudden contrary to hope: therefore neither was there a propassion, in whose definition "sudden" falls.

BUT AGAINST THIS is, § 1. What he says in the Text.

§ 2. Furthermore, hope is not taken for the virtue of hope (which will be proven below not to have been in Christ): but propassion is that which is one of the four natural passions, which was well in Christ, just like the other natural passions: and thus there is no contrary instance.

Solution: To this it must be said that those degrees are posited in anger, not insofar as it is a sin, but insofar as it is a passion: and therefore they can be transferred also to other passions which are not a sin, such as to sorrow, or natural fear.

To the next, it must be said that there is the "sudden" on the part of the thing, and on the part of him in whom it occurs. In Christ, however, nothing was sudden on the part of him in whom it was: but it was sudden on the part of the passion. Or it may be said that propassion is not taken here according to that definition, but according to its effect: because, namely, it does not deflect reason from equality or from the equity of its governance.

Articulus 10 — Whether the Body of the Lord Had a Nature for Suffering

Whether the Lord's body had a nature for suffering?

Whether the Lord's body had a nature for suffering?

Next, it is asked concerning the words of Hilary posited in the Text in the last part, there, G: Nevertheless they move more, etc.

Now, it seems that according to Hilary the Lord's body did not have a nature for suffering: which is contrary to all the other Saints, as it seems.

But nevertheless this seems to be proved thus: § 1. Whatever is always and inseparably conjoined to a stronger repeller of every contrary, than any contrary agent is, that thing does not suffer from any contrary: but Christ's body was always and inseparably conjoined to the divinity: therefore it could not suffer from any contrary. Proof of the first premise: Let us grant that the coldness of water is infinite, and its humidity is infinite, and the heat and dryness of fire are finite: it follows that the water, before it is altered by the fire, will consume the fire: therefore it will then act without alteration of itself by the contrary. But thus it seemed to be in Christ's body on account of the infinite power of the deity.

§ 2. Also, the grace of innocence, as Isidore says, so preserved Adam's body, that fire could not burn it, nor a sword cut it, nor a thorn prick it. Therefore, since grace was much greater in Christ through the union, it seems it ought much more to have defended Christ's body from every attack.

Solution: It must be said that some say Hilary retracted these words: and this is, in my judgment, a more fitting solution. But because we have not seen his book of retractions, it is therefore necessary to examine the force of his words in three places: first where he says, there, G, § 2: What infirmity, then, of such a body do you believe dominated, whose nature had such power? For from this it is gathered that he is speaking against heretics, who said Christ was only of an infirm nature, and could not of himself, from the power of the person, have repelled such infirmity.

Second, where he says, there, G, § 4: Not having a nature for grieving. He understands this of the nature vitiated by sin, which alone is ordained to grieving from debt: but Christ did not have it from the debt of offense, but from the will of the one assuming it.

Third, there, G, § 3, where he says at the end of his words: Although the form of our body was in the Lord, nevertheless the form of our infirmity was not in the body through vice, which the Virgin brought forth from the conception of the Holy Spirit. From this also it is gathered that he intends that he did not suffer by the necessity of the corruption of vice, concerning which it was previously spoken in the preceding question. And thus it is evident how the words of Hilary are easily verified.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is indeed true that Christ's body was always conjoined to the deity: but the deity exposed it to tribulation, because the deity acts through freedom of will, and not by necessity of nature: and therefore it is not similar to the infinite power of water in cold and moisture with respect to fire.

To the next, it must be said that the grace of innocence preserved nature before it was turned away: and then it did not hold itself toward suffering and dying except in the potency of free will: but after it possessed the necessity of dying and suffering, it did not belong to grace to retain it. And therefore, although the grace of Christ was greater, nevertheless because not suffering and also not dying additionally regards the state, therefore in the first state a lesser grace could do this, which a greater grace could not do in the second and third.

Articulus 11 — Whether This Is True Which Hilary Says: Christ Could Suffer, but Could Not Be Passible

Whether this is true which Hilary says: Christ could suffer, but could not be passible?

Whether this is true which Hilary says: Christ could suffer, but could not be passible?

Next, it is asked concerning Hilary's note affixed at the end, where he says that he could suffer, and could not be passible.

For this seems false: because whose the act is, his is the potency. If therefore he could (in act), he was passible according to act; and so what he says seems false.

Solution: Hilary still speaks according to the first mode: because "passible" denotes a potency which he himself received that is not founded in nature according to a composition from passible contraries, but from a nature corrupt by the corruption of vice. And this potency is not necessarily his, whose the act is: but whose the act is, his is the potency according to the nature of that act, not according to the mode of the accidents disposing the potency: and this is what he intends.

DISTINCTIO XVI

Divisio Textus

Here arises a question taking its origin from the aforesaid, etc. Here begins that part in which he determines the question left over from what was said, namely whether Christ assumed the necessity of suffering and dying?

And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he disputes and determines the question: and the determination begins, there, A, § 2: To which it can be said, etc. In the second, to confirm the solution, he shows how Christ assumed something from every state, there, B, And here it must be noted that Christ from every state, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Suffered by Necessity or by Will Alone

Whether Christ suffered by necessity or by will alone?

Now four things occur to be asked here for the sake of the first part, of which the first is: Whether Christ suffered by necessity or by will alone? Second, whether his passion was greater than all the passions of the Saints? Third, whether it was greater than the passion of Adam in the first state, if it were granted through an impossibility that he could suffer? Fourth, whether it was greater than the passion of a soul, if it were granted through an impossibility that any of its powers could be cut off from it?

To the first we proceed thus: § 1. Anselm in the book Cur Deus homo, speaks thus: The Father did not force him, unwilling, to death, nor permitted him to be killed: but he himself spontaneously sustained death, to save men. Therefore it seems that he died by will alone and not by necessity.

§ 2. Also, in the same place: He did not force Christ to die, in whom there was no sin: but he spontaneously sustained death, not through the obedience of deserting life, but through the obedience of preserving justice, in which he persevered so bravely that he thereby incurred death.

§ 3. Isaiah 53:7 seems to say this same thing: He was offered, because he himself willed it.

§ 4. Also, He himself in the Gospel, John 10:18: No one takes it, namely my life, from me: but I lay it down of myself, and I have the power to lay it down, and I have the power to take it again.

But against this is what we have in the Text, that § 1. By the same right and the same necessity he was offered, by which we die: but we die by the necessity of dying: therefore so did he.

§ 2. Also, Augustine says that if he had not been killed, he would have been dissolved by natural death, and it would have been the same work of redemption that he accomplished through the cross. Therefore it seems that he died and suffered by the necessity of the condition of nature.

§ 3. Also, Anselm in the book Cur Deus homo: God did not will to save the world otherwise, unless a man were to do something so great as is the death of Christ, which availed just as much for the Son willing the salvation of men: because another was not able to do this: therefore it seems that it was necessary for Christ to die.

§ 4. Also, in the same place: Nothing is less to be tolerated in the order of things, than that a creature take away due honor from the Creator, and not pay what it owes: therefore nothing more unjust is tolerated. Therefore, since recompense could not be made except through Christ's death, it seems that it was necessary for Christ to suffer and die.

To this some say that necessity is fourfold according to the four kinds of causes. For they say that there is a compelling necessity or necessity of violence according to the efficient cause, according to which Damascene says that the involuntary by violence is that whose principle is in another, with the sufferer conferring no force: and by this necessity Christ did not assume the necessity of suffering. But there is another necessity according to the material cause: just as we say that a combustible must necessarily be burned, if it is conjoined to a burning thing: and the passible must suffer, if it is conjoined to its agent toward dissolution: and this again he did not assume. Third, there is said to be a necessity according to the formal cause: just as it is necessary for a man to be rational: and this again Christ did not assume. The fourth is necessity according to the final cause, as it is necessary for a man to breathe if he is to live: and it is necessary to use food if he is to be nourished: and it is necessary to go to the market if he is to receive money there. And by this last necessity they say Christ assumed our defects.

But that this solution is entirely absurd, and nothing to the point, is proved thus: We are not asking here why or by what necessity Christ assumed our defects, but what is the necessity of suffering resulting from the disposition and condition of the body. But this distinction does not solve anything except by what necessity he assumed them: therefore it is nothing to the point. For let it be granted that he assumed our defects by this necessity of the end, I still ask: Did he assume this defect, which is the necessity of suffering and dying, or not? Therefore, after the solution, the same question still remains, and thus it is completely worthless. Furthermore, if they say that the nature of the body in its material disposition did not have the necessity of suffering, but he willed to grieve because he could not redeem otherwise, it is doubly false. First, because according to this, the words of Hilary cited earlier would be verified to the letter, which is contrary to all. Second, because Augustine says that another mode was possible, but none was more fitting: therefore what they say is false.

Solution: It must be said with the Master in the Text, that he assumed the necessity of dying, and to assume is indeed a matter of will, and not of necessity, ordained however to this mode of redemption: but the assumption having been made, it was necessary for the matter and nature to suffer and die. But not by the necessity of the person, because the person was always omnipotent, and could have repelled death if he had willed. Moreover, this necessity of nature is distinguished from our necessity in two ways: one of which is that it is not contracted like ours: and this is what the Master said in the preceding distinction.

that He assumed our defects, not by the necessity of His condition, but by the will of His compassion. Another way is: because the matter of nature in us is doubly disposed to suffering, namely by the corruption of vice, and by passibility. But in Christ it had only one of those dispositions, namely of the passibility of nature, not of vice.

§ 2. To the first objection, it must be said that all the authorities of Anselm speak of the necessity of assuming, and not of the necessity of the thing assumed. For the Father did not compel the Son to assume a mortal nature and thus die; but He Himself willed it, and therefore assumed it. But after He assumed it, it was necessary to endure it according to the condition of the thing assumed, but not according to the condition of the assuming person.

§ 3. To the objection concerning Isaiah, it must be said that He willed it; but He was not passible by will alone. Hence, although He was offered voluntarily, He nevertheless suffered naturally, just as one approaching a fire approaches voluntarily, but is materially burned.

§ 4. To the other objection, it must be said that in the Gospel He speaks of the power of the person, and not of the assumed nature, as the other authorities of Anselm also show.

Articulus 2 — Whether His Passion Exceeded All Passions

Did the passion of Christ exceed all the passions of the Saints?

§ 5. Secondly, it is asked whether His passion exceeded all passions.

§ 6. It seems that it did not, because: 1. Many Saints endured both longer and many more, and more bitter, kinds of torments concerning the genus of the penalty, such as Lawrence and Vincent, who were afflicted with penalties for three days and nights. Therefore, it seems that His penalty did not exceed all penalties.

§ 7. 2. Further, it seems that His penalty was the least among all who have experienced death. For charity desires to be dissolved and to be with Christ. Since therefore He was of the greatest charity, He most greatly desired this. But in obtaining what is desired there is no penalty. Therefore, He was the least punished in the sense of sorrow.

§ 8. 3. Further, the recompense of a more beloved thing diminishes sorrow in the loss of what is loved less. But in the death of Christ, life was recompensed to Him through a more beloved thing, which was the redemption of the human race. Therefore, His sorrow was diminished in the loss of the lesser thing, namely life; therefore His sorrow was minimal.

§ 9. 4. Further, the hope of resurrection diminishes the sorrow of death in the Saints; therefore, much more so in Him who knew He would rise again. But Christ knew this about Himself, as Psalm 15:10–11 says: You will not give your holy one to see corruption. You have made known to me the ways of life, you will fill me, etc. Therefore, He sorrowed least.

§ 10. 5. Augustine also seems to have held this view in his commentary on Psalm 101:2, Lord, hear, saying thus: "The Lord did not truly fear, since He was to rise again on the third day."

§ 11. 6. Furthermore, it seems that even in any sinner, while he is sinning, there ought to be greater sorrow than in Him. For there is greater sorrow in separation from a better thing. But God is better than the natural life of Christ. Therefore, the soul grieves more in separation from God than Christ grieved in death, as it seems.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Aristotle says that the young grieve more in death than the old, on account of the nobility of their complexion. But He who was beautiful in form beyond the sons of men was of the most delicate complexion beyond all. Therefore, He was tormented by suffering beyond all.

§ 13. If you say that He was not of the most delicate complexion, on the contrary: According to the nature of the form it is necessary that the matter be disposed, as all authors say. Therefore, a soul most noble according to nature demands the most noble complexion. But Christ had the most noble soul according to nature; therefore He had the most noble complexion. From this I further conclude that the more the medium and organ of touch approaches the mean [temperament], the more efficaciously it senses excellences. But in Christ it most greatly approached the mean, as has already been proved. Therefore, He sensed excellences departing even slightly from the temperament much more than another; and pain is according to the sense of the contrary.

§ 14. 2. Further, in Book IV of the Ethics, the Philosopher says that the brave man is saddened and grieves in death in one way more than the one who is not brave, and he gives the reason, saying: insofar as he knows he is deprived of better goods. And this is insofar as he has the virtue of all goods. Therefore, the more virtuous a life is, the more it is loved by a well-disposed soul; but the more it is loved, the greater the sorrow in separation. Since therefore the life of Christ was supremely good, as one to whom the Spirit was given without measure, it was necessary that He grieved supremely in death.

§ 15. If perhaps you say that the Philosopher does not speak the truth, because he contradicts the Saints who say that perfect charity desires to be dissolved—because the Apostle said in Phil. 1:23: Having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ; and Augustine says that the Saints have life in patience, and death in desire; and Job 3:22: They rejoice exceedingly when they have found the grave—what will you say to Augustine in Book IX of The City of God, where he says thus: "Aulus Gellius, in the books entitled Attic Nights, writes that when a certain philosopher grew pale in a sea storm, a certain luxurious man who was not afraid insulted him. But he brought forth the response of Aristippus in a similar situation, who said that he rightly had no cause to be anxious for the soul of a most wicked scoundrel, but that he ought to have feared for the soul of Aristippus." Therefore, Augustine confirms what Aristotle says.

§ 16. 3. Further, Augustine in Book II of The City of God says that sound reason is to be preferred even to examples. Since therefore it is sound reason that a good thing is loved, and the best thing is more loved, and the natural life of Christ was more good and better than the life of all others, therefore it was loved beyond all others, just as He Himself said: I have given my beloved soul into the hands of its enemies—that is, my life; because the soul, which was a rational spirit, the enemies never had in their hands.

§ 17. 4. Further, since it is sound reason that in the separation of what is more beloved and joined by nature there is greater sorrow, it again follows that Christ grieved most greatly in death.

§ 18. 5. Further, the sense of a lesser intemperance in any member indicates a greater temperance of the same. Now, in the hands and feet, intemperance is immediately felt, for the hands and feet begin to grow warm even when the intemperance is so slight that it is not felt elsewhere in the body. Therefore, the hands and feet are of greater temperament. Therefore, to suffer in them will be of greater penalty than to suffer in others. But Christ suffered in them; therefore, from this also there was an aggravation of sorrow in Him. A sign of this is also that when we seek to discern by touch, we extend our hands rather than another part of the body.

§ 19. 6. Further, Lamentations 1:12: O all you who pass by the way, attend, and see if there is any sorrow like my sorrow. Further, the Psalm says of Him: My soul is filled with evils. Further, it is chanted of Him at the time of the passion, Lamentations 3:15: He has filled me with bitterness, he has inebriated me with wormwood.

§ 20. Solution. I readily concede that Christ suffered more and indeed more bitterly than any man could ever suffer or has suffered; and this for three reasons.

§ 21. The first is so that we might be the more bound to give thanks to Him. Hence Bernard says: "He assumed much difficulty in order to make you a debtor of much love, and the difficulty of redemption might admonish to thanksgiving him whom the facility of his condition had made less devout."

§ 22. The second reason is the goodness and innocence of His life. For it is not true what some say, that one suffering for his own sins is more afflicted; for such a man is indignant from the conscience of his sins, and more greatly despises life. But an innocent man finds nothing in life for which he ought to despise it. And if you object that one dying for offenses fears eternal death and is therefore doubly tormented, this is nothing: for we are not speaking of what is accidental, but of what is per se. That torture, however, is accidental, namely insofar as through this life he is freed from the death of the soul. Hence it is clear that they speak falsely, both from the authority of Aristotle and Augustine, and also through the reason introduced above. This is also gathered from the words of the thief, when one thief said to the other: And we indeed justly, for we are receiving the due reward of our deeds; but this man has done nothing wrong.

§ 23. The third reason was from the most noble complexion of His body, both in the whole, and also in the members in which He suffered, as the objections prove.

§ 24. Therefore, to the first objection concerning the Martyrs, it must be said that it is not the same to suffer more things and for a longer time, as to feel sorrow more bitterly. And the Saints indeed could suffer more and for a longer time, yet none of them felt the sorrow as bitterly as He did.

§ 25. To the other objection, it must be said that the charity of Christ did not diminish the sense of sorrow, but rather the reputation [estimation] of sorrow. In other Saints, however, it diminished both, both the sense and the reputation: because they were wayfarers, and when they were affected regarding higher things, the soul was drawn from the body, and felt less. But Christ was simultaneously both wayfarer and comprehensor, and one act did not withdraw Him from the act of the other.

§ 26. To the other, it must be said in the same way, that the reward caused life not to be esteemed, that is, to be less esteemed. Not that it was less valuable, as Anselm says, because it was worth infinitely more than the whole human race; otherwise sufficient recompense would not have been made through the death of Christ. But because out of love for men He chose death, not simply by casting away a life better than all men would be, but by postponing it for a time in order to recover it for all. And this evaluation belonged to charity, and was not according to value.

§ 27. To the other, it must be said that the Lord knew He would rise on the third day. For if the Lord had simply remained in death, then it would not have availed us; and He Himself also would have acted foolishly by losing His better life for us forever. But this foreknowledge of the resurrection in Christ did not take away the sense of the passion. And therefore that objection proves only concerning a lesser reputation, and not concerning the sense or experience of bitterness.

§ 28. To the objection concerning separation from God through sin, or even through eternal condemnation on the day of judgment, I say that this objection is nothing, because "penalty" is taken equivocally. For separation from God does not inflict a bodily sense, but a loss. If you say that the soul feels its loss, this is nothing, because to feel a loss is to feel a privation, like seeing darkness and hearing silence. And therefore the damage in the loss of God is infinitely greater than the loss of life, if you consider the privative damage, that is, your damnation or his; but there is no greater physical sense.

Articulus 3 — Whether the Bitterness of the Passion of Christ Was Thus Greater than the Suffering of Adam, if It Be Granted that He Could Have Suffered

Would the bitterness of Christ's passion be greater than the passion of Adam, if it were granted that he could have suffered?

§ 29. Thirdly, it is asked whether the bitterness of Christ's passion is greater than the passion of Adam in the first state, if it were granted through an impossibility that he could have suffered or had suffered in actuality?

§ 30. It seems that it is not, because: 1. A conjunction is the more difficult to separate, the fewer dispositions to separation are present in it. Now, in Christ a penalty was assumed, but in Adam none. Therefore, there would have been greater sorrow in the separation of the soul from Adam's body than in the separation of the soul from Christ's body.

§ 31. 2. Further, the stronger the bond, the more difficult it is to break. But the bond of immortal life is in some way stronger than that of a life in which there is a necessity to die. Since therefore Adam had the first life, it seems that he would have felt a greater penalty in death if he had died, than Christ.

§ 32. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Sorrow is the sense of penalty, and the bitterness of sorrow comes from a stronger sense of a stronger penalty. Therefore, things which do not contribute to a more subtle sense do not contribute to a greater passion. However, being immortal by grace in the state of animal life, and being mortal, do not contribute to a better sense, because they are not among the things that form the complexion. Therefore, they do not contribute to a greater sorrow. Therefore, Adam would not have suffered more from this than Christ.

§ 33. 2. Further, the cause of a longer or shorter life, or even a perpetual one in the animal state, does not contribute to sensation. Because if perpetuity were a cause, then length of life would also be a cause of better sensation than the sensation of a shorter life. And this is contrary to reason, because every cause of a longer life (as the Philosopher says) is reduced to moisture difficult to dry, and heat difficult to cool. But the goodness of sensation in touch is brought about by a closer approach to the temperament in the medium, which is a complexioned mixture. Since therefore the bitterness of passion follows upon the stability of sensation, therefore length of life or perpetuity, as such, contributes nothing to a greater passion.

§ 34. If perhaps you say that Adam was of a more noble complexion than Christ, I hold this as absurd. Because in this way the Author of all nature would have acted against the law which He Himself implanted in nature, because against Himself in Himself He would have neglected His own soul. For this law is implanted, that a more noble body or matter is prepared for a more noble form. And if the soul of Christ was more noble than the soul of Adam, God, the author of nature, would have done an injury to His own soul if He had given a more noble complexion to Adam.

§ 35. Solution. In my judgment, no bodily penalty can be compared to the bitterness of Christ's passion, which anyone could suffer bodily and according to nature. Hence, if Adam had suffered, I say that he would not have grieved as bitterly as Christ.

§ 36. Moreover, the two reasons that were first adduced are solved by the objections made to the contrary. However, I well believe that Adam had a more vivid sensation before sin than after, or than we have; but I do not believe that he had a more vivid one than Christ.

Articulus 4 — Whether the Death of Christ Was More Bitter than the Death of the Soul, Per Impossible That the Soul Could Die

Would the death of Christ be more bitter than the death of the soul, if it were granted by impossibility that the soul could die?

Would the death of Christ be more bitter than the death of the soul, if it were granted by impossibility that the soul could die?

§ 37. Fourthly, it is asked whether the death of Christ was more bitter than the death of the soul, if it were granted through an impossibility that it itself could die by the separation of its parts from itself?

§ 38. It seems that it would be, because the penalty which is contrary to a better good is greater. For Augustine says that a penalty is not called an evil except because it is contrary to the nature of the good. But there was a better nature in Christ than could be in any simple creature; therefore, a greater penalty.

§ 39. ON THE CONTRARY: The more closely something is conjoined, the greater the sorrow in separation. But a part of the soul is more closely conjoined with the soul than any body could be conjoined with the soul. Therefore, there would be greater sorrow in separation.

§ 40. Solution. A "greater sorrow" is said in two ways: namely, because it is contrary to a greater good, and in this way the sorrow of Christ would still be heavier than that of the soul, if it were supposed that it could die. It is also called a greater sorrow because it is the separation of a stronger conjunction according to sensory experience; and in this way I well think that such a death of the soul would be more bitter, but nevertheless it would not be more efficacious for redeeming.

§ 41. And thus the solution is clear: because one of the objections proceeds in one sense of this distinction, and the other in the other.

Articulus 5 — How What the Master Says, that Christ Came from Above, Ought to Be Understood

How is it to be understood what the Master says, that Christ came from above?

How is it to be understood what the Master says, that Christ came from above?

§ 42. Next, it is asked concerning those things which are found in the Text in Chapter B, where it says that Christ came from above, that is, from the altitude of human nature before sin.

§ 43. For from this it seems to follow that 1. He came either materially or formally. Not formally, because He did not have the form of Adam's body. Therefore, materially, because according to nature He possessed what is impassible.

§ 44. 2. Further, Damascene seems to say this, who said that He assumed the first fruits of our mass. But the first fruits of our mass are impassible; therefore, He assumed an impassible body.

§ 45. Solution. According to what has been held, it is easy to answer this: because He came from that state regarding the likeness of the exemplar, which He exhibited in Himself in that state. And thus it is also understood concerning other states. However, this is easily conceded, that He took from Adam the matter of the body, which is one in every state, although not disposed in one way. But here it is not a question of matter, since it is said in the Text that from the first state He took innocence and immunity from sin, which is the same thing.

§ 46. To the other objection, it must be said that they are called the first fruits of our mass on account of their nobility and purgation from the oldness of sin. Just as we have also expounded above in its proper place where this saying of Damascene is introduced. And they are not called first fruits because He first assumed them materially and in the disposition of the first man.

DISTINCTIO XVII

Divisio Textus

§ 47. After the aforesaid things, it is necessary to consider, etc. In this distinction, the Master determines a certain further question derived from the preceding, namely, whether Christ sought or prayed for anything which was not granted to Him? For since He naturally feared the passion, the consequence was that He naturally fled it, and asked that it pass from Him.

§ 48. Hence this distinction is divided into four parts. In the first of which he shows principally that in Christ, on account of two natures and wills, there was no struggle of the flesh against the spirit. In the second, he proves that there was a threefold will in Christ, namely of sensuality, of reason, and of deity, there at C: Therefore by that human affection which He drew from the Virgin, etc. In the third, he objects against the words of Ambrose, there at D: But the words of Ambrose move us not a little, etc. In the fourth and last, he objects through the words of Hilary, there at E: That also is not to be ignored, etc.

§ 49. From these things the meaning is clear, because the Text is plain.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Willed Something Which Was Not Done

Did Christ will anything that was not done?

Did Christ will anything that was not done?

§ 50. But first it is doubted whether Christ willed anything which was not done?

§ 51. For it seems that He willed nothing [that was not done]. 1. For one whose will is always in conformity with the will of the Omnipotent: just as nothing is done against the will of the Omnipotent, so nothing is done against his will. But the will of Christ was always in conformity with the will of the Omnipotent. Therefore, just as nothing is done against the will of God, so nothing is done against the will of Christ. The first proposition is self-evident. The second is proved by the fact that it belongs to the perfection of the just to have a will conformed to the divine will. Since therefore there is no perfection which Christ did not possess, He had a will that was always conformed.

§ 52. 2. Further, He said this to His mother, Luke 2:49: Did you not know that I must be about my Father's business? And to the disciples later: My food is to do the will of Him who sent me, namely, my Father who is in heaven.

§ 53. 3. Further, the Apostle seems to mean this in Heb. 5:7: He was heard in all things for His reverence. Therefore, He never asked for anything which He did not obtain, as it seems.

§ 54. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In Psalm 21:3: I will cry by day, and You will not hear; and by night, and it is not for folly in me.

§ 55. 2. Moreover, He prayed that the cup might pass, and it did not pass. Therefore, He was not heard in all things.

§ 56. Solution. As the Master says in the Text, there are several wills in Christ; and whatever He willed by the will of good pleasure according to the divine nature, this He obtained. Similarly, whatever He willed according to the reason of the deliberative will, He obtained entirely. But not whatever He willed according to the will of natural affection, as the Master says.

§ 57. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the conformity by which our will is conformed to the divine will is fourfold, namely in the object willed: and this is according to the matter, and it is the least, that I will what God wills. And this does not produce merit of itself, because sometimes someone can evilly will what God wills, such as the death of some good man.

§ 58. There is also conformity according to the form of willing, so that from the same charity we will what we will, from which God wills what He wills; because that produces merit, even if sometimes we do not will what God wills, as Augustine says, and it is posited at the end of the first book of the Sentences.

§ 59. The third conformity is in the end of willing, so that we will for the same reason for which God wills, that is, for His glory. And this again is laudable and contributes to merit, even if there is deformity in the matter of the thing willed. Because for the glory of God I could will someone to live, whom He wills to die for His glory.

§ 60. The fourth conformity is in the efficient cause of willing, namely when I will that which God wills me to will. For example, seeing a poor man, if I want him to be miserable, I am already not merciful; and yet God wills him to be miserable. Therefore He wills me to will what He Himself does not will: and these are not contraries. Similarly, when He chose the Virgin mother, He willed her own soul to be pierced by the sword of His bodily passion, so that she would sustain within in the affection of a mother what He endured without. Therefore He willed her to will that the Son should not suffer.

§ 61. In the same way I say that when Christ willed to assume true humanity, He willed him to will to flee those severe dangers of human life. And this conformity suffices for the natural will; and this conformity, disputed and proved, is found concerning the first treatise of this volume on the conformity of our will to the will of God.

§ 62. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Was Sensuality in Christ

Was sensuality in Christ?

§ 63. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there at B, near the beginning: Human will is the affection of the whole reason or the affection of sensuality.

§ 64. Four things are asked here without which this passage cannot be understood: The first of which is, whether sensuality is or was in Christ? Secondly, whether there is any will of sensuality? Thirdly, whether the will of reason was conformed to the divine will, as he says in the Text? Fourthly, concerning the division of Christ's wills, which the Text hints at.

§ 65. To the first we proceed thus: It seems that sensuality was not in Christ, because: 1. Augustine says in Book XII of On the Trinity that sensuality is in the place of the serpent, in which the first movement of sin began. Since therefore Christ had no instinct of sin, it seems that sensuality was not in Christ.

§ 66. 2. Moreover, for what purpose would it be in Him? For merit is not perfected by three degrees (sensuality, the lower part of reason, and superior reason) in the same way as demerit. Since therefore He assumed nothing except those things which are ordered to grace, and grace does not reach sensuality, it seems that He did not assume sensuality.

§ 67. 3. Moreover, this is what always fights against the spirit. Therefore, since there was no such struggle in Christ, it seems He did not have sensuality.

§ 68. ON THE CONTRARY: The devil did not create sensuality in Adam, but corrupted it having been found in him. Therefore, since Christ assumed all our natural things in body and in soul, it seems that He also assumed sensuality.

§ 69. Further, Augustine: Sensuality is a movement of the soul, which is directed towards the five bodily senses. Now, it is certain that Christ had this kind of movement; therefore, He had sensuality.

§ 70. Solution. We must agree with the final reasons, that Christ had sensuality, which is the power of the soul's sensitive desire directed towards those things which confer to the salvation of nature, and directed towards those things which confer to the senses for presentation.

§ 71. But to the first objection it must be said that Augustine speaks of sensuality not according to nature, but according to the corruption which happened from sin; and since Christ did not take sin, He also did not take that corruption.

§ 72. To the other objection, it must be said that it was in Him to demonstrate the integrity of our nature, and so that our corrupted sensuality might be cured by His assumed incorrupt sensuality; for it is not curable, as Damascene says, unless it is assumable.

§ 73. To the other objection, it must be said that it does not fight against the spirit from its nature, but insofar as it is corrupted by sin; and in this way Christ did not take it.

Articulus 3 — Whether There Is Any Will Of The Sensuality

Is there any will of sensuality?

§ 74. Secondly, it is asked whether there is any will of sensuality?

§ 75. It seems, however, that there is not: because the Philosopher says in the Topics that all will is in reason.

§ 76. Further, the Philosopher in Book III of On the Soul: In the rational part will occurs, but in the irrational part, desire and anger. Therefore it seems that it is nothing when he says that there was one will of sensuality in Christ.

§ 77. If perhaps you were to say that this is animal according to the propriety of the Greek idiom, in which "will" is only spoken of as the affection of reason. On the contrary: Augustine in the book On the Trinity says: Voluntary causes are either of God, or of Angels, or of men, or of any animals whatever, if indeed those movements of animals devoid of reason by which they do anything according to their nature, when they seek or avoid something, are to be called wills. From this it is clear that "will" is used of sensuality abusively.

§ 78. Solution. It is said that "will" is taken broadly, and strictly. Strictly, "will" is not said, as the authorities wish, except of a rational movement and appetite. Broadly, the appetite of human sensuality is also called will. But altogether abusively the appetite of brute animals is called will. Hence John Damascene says that the will is rational; and if it is not rational, it is not a will. For will denotes that which is most free in the soul; and therefore, a sensitive nature, which is driven more by the command of reason or by the instinct of nature than it acts itself, cannot properly be said to have a will in it.

§ 79. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether Some Will In Christ Did Not Have Its Effect

Did any will in Christ not have its effect?

§ 80. Thirdly, it is asked whether any will of reason in Christ lacked its effect?

§ 81. It seems that it did: because it was determined above that even reason, and whatever part of the soul, can be considered as nature: and thus it grieves at inconveniences and flees them. Therefore, since reason was in Christ in that consideration, it seems that He willed something by the will of reason, which He did not will by the divine will. Therefore, since it belongs to any appetite to ask for what it desires, He asked for this according to that will, which nevertheless He did not obtain.

§ 82. ON THE CONTRARY: The contrariety of appetite in the soul is not because the appetites themselves are of contrary natures in us, as the Manichaeans said, who posited one created by the prince of light, and another by the prince of darkness. Therefore it is left that this contrariety is from the opposition of the things willed. Now this opposition in us induces a struggle of the flesh or the lower part of the soul against the higher, that is, against the spirit. Therefore, there was a struggle of this kind in Christ, which is absurd to posit. Therefore, there was no such deformity of wills in Him.

§ 83. Solution. Consenting to the first objection, it must be said that nothing prohibits that according to the will of reason as it is nature, that man, insofar as he is man, desired something which he did not obtain. And He even prayed for what was not given, because He did not pray for this willing from deliberation, but rather showing our infirmity; just as He Himself said to His disciples: The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.

§ 84. To that which is objected to the contrary, I say that there is no contrariety of struggle, except between those things where there is pertinacious resistance, as it is in us, in whom the will of carnal infirmity is strengthened by the fomes, and sometimes by the remnants of sins. But in Christ there was no such strengthening, and therefore the infirmity of the will did not progress beyond natural limits, showing itself in these things only for the demonstration of nature, and not to the point that it fought against reason, but rather that it followed it. And this is noted when He says: If this cup cannot pass away unless I drink it, Thy will be done. And this indeed some of the ancients, namely William of Auxerre, call a "velleity," and not a perfect will.

§ 85. There are others, however, who solve it otherwise, saying that there is no contrariety: because contraries are naturally suited to occur concerning the same thing, and sensuality and reason, or natural reason and reason, are not concerned with the same thing as the same. But it is clear that this is nothing, because according to this, even in us there would never be a contrariety of struggle. Hence the contrariety of struggle is from contrary objects willed striving to draw the whole after themselves; which willed objects (although they are not contrary in substance) are sometimes nevertheless contrary through an adjunct, namely through reason, such that one is willed as honorable, and the other truly as shameful.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Will, According To The Master, Is Well Divided In The Text

Is the will well divided according to the Master in the Text?

§ 86. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the division of the will which the Master hints at here.

§ 87. And he seems to hint at a threefold will, namely the divine, and a twofold human one, namely the affection from the infirmity of the flesh, and the affection of reason.

§ 88. 1. But since it is still one, as has been seen, namely the will of reason as it is nature, it seems that the Master is insufficient.

§ 89. 2. Further, from many forms there is not one mode of denomination of the same subject, just as whiteness denominates Socrates white, and grammar a grammarian, and so of others. Therefore, it seems by similarly, that from the many wills of Christ He Himself is willing in many ways, or many willing subjects, which Damascene denies, who says that He is nevertheless one willing subject.

§ 3. Also, those multiple, two, or three, or four wills of Christ, are all given for the act of willing: but in lower things even a single property or potency suffices for a single act: therefore it seems that all of them are superfluous except one.

§ 4. Also, it seems to follow from this that every action of Christ is composite, and not one, but multiple: for an act which is from multiple agents differing according to essence, is multiple, and not one: but those active wills in Christ differ according to essence: therefore his acts are multiple, and not one. And this also seems [true], because Dionysius speaks of a theandric, that is, a God-manly action: but it is not God-manly, unless there is in him something of God, and something of man: therefore there are multiple actions.

§ 5. Also, we see that he wills something by one will which he does not will by another: therefore those wills do not hold themselves in a single mode toward the act of willing: and thus every act of his willing is multiple acts, as it seems.

Solution: It must be said that the Master [Peter Lombard] posits a three-membered division of the wills of Christ, which can be reduced to a two-membered one thus: The will of Christ is either divine or uncreated, or human and created. But the human [will] is either of reason, or of sensuality. The [will] of reason, indeed, is either as nature, or as deliberative. But he makes no mention of that which is of reason as it is nature, because according to the substance and being of the potency it does not differ from that which is of reason as deliberative, but rather it is a certain mode of consideration of the same potency: for that it is as nature belongs to any potency of the rational soul insofar as it is the nature of man: and therefore through the being of the potency there are only three, as the Master says. But the third is divided by a twofold respect of it into two according to reason [i.e., conceptually], and not into two according to essence.

To the next, therefore, it is clear that it is one way in forms determining the whole, and another way in natural potencies: because forms which are in a whole cannot be in it as multiple [forms] of one ratio [i.e., nature or kind]: but in natural potencies according to one common, not special ratio, it can be that multiple potencies are named by one name. But because natural potencies, although they are present according to diverse parts of nature, are nevertheless referred to one which is the subject: therefore the thing denominated by them is only one: and therefore Christ is only one willing [subject], although he could will in many modes: because "willing" signifies him who wills, [and] this is the subject, and not the root upon which that potency is founded: but the diversity of wills is known in the diversity of things willed.

To the next it must be said that in Christ there are distinct actions: not in comparison to the agent, namely that Christ is multiple agents: but as to the ratio of acting, namely because sometimes he acted as man, sometimes as God: yet always he himself acting was the God-man: whence Dionysius considers the agent as agent: and Damascene considers the actions themselves in comparison to the potencies inclining to the act, and therefore Dionysius called the action theandric, and Damascene said there are two actions of Christ, just as there are two natures: nor does the composition of potencies inclining to the act make multiple actions, but rather a plurality of agents [does so]: and even this is not always so, as is clear in those things which are by act related to diverse powers, such as the drawing of the hand, and the sound of a measure of millet grains: and thus the solution to the last is clear. And note, that this very fact that the agent was one God and man, and the things inclining to the act were two, namely created and uncreated, makes every action of Christ salvific for us: because even if he ate and slept, it was true that God did this: and so he did it for us, who for himself had no need to do such things. And the same is true of sadness, fear, and all others.

To the next it must be said that they are not superfluous : because they are not given for one thing in a single mode: because although the deliberative reason sometimes consents with the natural and sensual [will] in the same willed thing, and conversely, it is not however in the same mode.

Articulus 6 — How And Why Some Kill Themselves

How and why do some people kill themselves?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says in the Letter, there, B, toward the end: He left behind the affection of infirmity, by which no one wishes to die.

For this seems to have a counter-instance in those who kill themselves:

§ 1. Some out of a desire for immortality, as Augustine says in Book I of the City of God, thus: If this is to be thought to be done with greatness of soul: when a man inflicts death upon himself, rather Cleombrotus is found in this greatness of soul, who they say, having read Plato's book where he disputed concerning the immortality of the soul, threw himself headlong from a wall, and thus emigrated from this life to that which he believed to be better. Therefore it seems, that some do desire death.

§ 2. Also, some beyond the hope of immortality kill themselves, like Judas: and some others too, like certain melancholics: therefore it seems that what he says in the Letter is false.

To this it must be said that according to Augustine and the truth of the matter no one kills himself out of weariness of life insofar as it is life: but some have killed themselves out of something which happens to their life, according to what they believed they would find after this life: and some out of shame for the baseness of an act committed or to be committed, as Judas out of baseness committed, and Lucretia out of baseness to be committed. But melancholics out of weariness of sadness prefer not to be, than to be thus: and Cleombrotus out of the immortality which he hoped he would find. But the love of life, since life is naturally sweet, is implanted in all.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ, In The Anguish Of Death, Asked From The Sensuality Or From Reason

Whether Christ in the anguish of death petitioned from sensuality, or from reason?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, §2: And from the human affection of sensuality indeed, not of reason, he willed and petitioned that, etc.

From this it follows that that petition was of sensuality, and not of reason: but how can this be?

§ 1. Since it does not belong to sensuality to order, and every petition is a certain ordered requesting.

§ 2. Also, since Damascene says that prayer is the petition of fitting things from God: and the fitting or honorable is not the object of sensuality.

§ 3. Also, prayer, as Damascene says, is the ascent of the intellect to God: therefore to pray does not befit sensuality.

§ 4. Also. Sensuality, as Augustine says, is stretched into the five senses of the body: therefore it is not affected concerning that which is not present to the senses: but that death at the time when he prayed, was not present to the senses: therefore sensuality was not affected concerning death: therefore he did not pray.

§ 5. If you say that he foreknew all things, and thus knew all things which were to come upon him: and from that foreknowledge fear and sadness were caused. On the contrary: From the instant of conception he knew all things which were to come upon him: therefore if this knowledge caused the fact that he began to fear and to be sad, he seems to have begun to dread and to be sad from the instant of conception.

Also, if he foreknew, this was not according to the affection of sensuality, but rather according to reason united to deity: and since according to that he never feared, it seems he feared nothing, nor was sad, nor prayed, nor was in agony.

Solution: It must be said to this, that the prayer was of reason as it is nature, and conjoined in the same substance with the sensual affection: and this [reason] can well order: and thus the first objection ceases.

To the next it must be said that what nature shows is not unfitting: but fittingness , however, says in that definition [that it is] proportioned to the need of the petitioner.

To the next it must be said that that definition is given concerning prayer through its effect, and concerning the prayer of a contemplator, and not concerning just any prayer.

To the next it must be said that from foresight, not from sense, sadness was caused: but from the binding together of lower things together with higher things it happens that in reason there is knowledge, [and] that this descending and putting on corporeal images by which they are determined, is made imagined through imagination, and then moves to sadness and fear: and this is nothing unfitting: since just as motions begin from sense and ascend to intellect, so it happens conversely through the reflection of the intellect to sense.

But to that which is objected, that from the instant of conception he ought to have feared: it must be said that it does not follow: because the cause of fear is not the foresight of evil, but rather the imminence of the evil of punishment. Whence although death was foreseen by him earlier, yet it was not foreseen as imminent.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 8 — Whether Christ Doubted When He Said, If It Is Possible, Etc

Whether Christ doubted when he said, If it is possible, etc.

Whether Christ doubted when he said, If it is possible, etc.

Then it is inquired concerning the words of Ambrose, there, But not a little do they move, etc.

For doubt is an undetermined motion of reason over either part of a contradiction: but Christ was certain of one part: therefore he did not doubt.

Solution: Doubt here expresses nothing but the trembling of sensuality between that which would follow reason, and the natural appetite for the opposite, namely that he might escape death: which posits nothing blameworthy in Christ, but rather a showing of the truth of our nature.

Articulus 9 — How Christ Prayed For Himself And His Own

How did Christ pray for himself and his own?

Then it must also be noted concerning the words of Hilary, there, That also is not to be ignored, etc. Note, that Hilary speaks optimally: because for the disciples and for us he prayed in three ways, and in one way for himself, namely that he might show the nature of the disciples in himself: for this was to our glory, not his; because our nature is exalted in him: and that through this he might be useful to us, not to himself; who sometimes surrounded by infirmity seek evasion of persecution, and do not despair, because we know our head did so. Thirdly, that he might give us the form and doctrine of ordering our sensual affection to reason: so that with him we might say: Not what I will be done, but what you will. Thus therefore in no way for himself, that is, for his own utility did he petition, but for us. But in another way he petitioned for himself.

And thus the things said in the Letter are plain.

DISTINCTIO XVIII

Divisio Textus

Division of the Text

Concerning the merit of Christ also it is not to be passed over, etc. Here begins that part which is about the works of Christ.

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he treats of the merit of Christ generally: and because his chief [work] was the passion, therefore first it is inquired about the merit of the passion. In the second, however, about the work of the passion, and of those things which were in the passion, such as the betrayal, and the like: which begins around the middle of Distinction XX, in that chapter C, Christ therefore is priest, and the same is victim, and the price of our reconciliation, etc. In the third, however, he treats questions following the death of Christ: such as if he was a man during the triduum, and the like: and by what ratio he is said to be dead: and this begins in Distinction XXI, there, A, After the aforementioned it is to be considered, Whether in death, etc.

The first of these parts is subdivided into four parts: in the first of which the Master inquires about the effect of Christ's merit in himself. In the second, however, about the effect of merit on our part: and this begins in the last chapter of this distinction, there, E, For what therefore did he will to suffer and die, etc. In the third, however, he determines from this, how he alone is redeemer and mediator, there, Distinction XIX, E, Whence he is truly called the redeemer of the world, etc. In the fourth he inquires, If there was another possible mode? and why did he will to liberate rather by this mode than by another mode? there, Distinction XX, A, But if it is inquired, Whether by another mode, etc.: and there is the beginning of the twentieth distinction.

In the first part the Master inquires four problems and determines them: of which the first is two-membered, namely whether he merited, and what he merited? and this is in chapter A. Second, When did he begin to merit? there, B, Nor did Christ only merit this, when obedient to the Father, etc. Third, What is the giving of a name which he merited? there, C. Nor did he only merit the glory of impassibility and immortality, etc. Fourth is, If he could have this without merit? there, D, But if it is inquired, Whether Christ [could have] that immortality and passibility, etc.

The sentence of the Letter is clear by itself.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Was Able To Merit Anything

Whether Christ could merit anything?

Here a doubt arises. Whether Christ could merit anything?

But it seems, that he could not: § 1. For what is perfectly full, can receive nothing more. But Christ from the instant of conception had the Spirit not by measure: and we have seen not only his grace, but also his glory as of the only-begotten from the Father, who (as Basil says) did not divide the paternal glory with another. Therefore he was receptive of no good

[at all]: therefore he merited nothing: because that which someone merits, he ought to receive, or he would be dealt with unjustly.

§ 2. Also, he was not indigent of anything: but merit is that by which we are indigent either for life or for beatitude: therefore he did not merit.

§ 3. Also, the state of comprehension removes the ratio of merit: but he most truly was a comprehensor [i.e., possessing the beatific vision]: therefore he did not merit.

§ 4. Also, whoever merits, profits in the goods of the soul, namely of grace and of glory: but above it was denied that Christ profited in the soul: therefore Christ did not merit.

Also, he did not come for this that he might merit for himself, but for us, as the Apostle says: For being rich he became poor, for your sakes; that through his poverty you might be rich. Since therefore he did not act except for that for which he came, it seems that he merited nothing for himself.

§ 5. Also, to merit belongs to him who is inferior in person: but Christ was never inferior to the Father in person: therefore Christ never merited. PROOF. Merit is a work and an act: but acts of all things belong to particulars, as the Philosopher says: therefore merit regards the person, and not the nature: therefore. The first is established.

Also, to merit is to make something one's own out of what is not one's own through work and obedience: but all things were the Son's, as he himself said: All my things are thine, and thine are mine; and I am glorified in them. Therefore it seems, that he did not merit.

ON THE CONTRARY, however, is: § 1. What is said in the Letter, proved by many authorities.

§ 2. Also, Christ's works were not less efficacious than the works of the Saints: but the works of the Saints avail for themselves and others: therefore also the works of Christ: therefore he did not merit only for us, but also for himself.

Solution: The Master here (as it seems) distinguishes well enough, that "to merit" is said in multiple modes: in one way, namely, abusively, by which someone is said to merit through a good work done badly and in a bad state, that is, done in the state of mortal sin: just as it is read in the life of Saint John the Almsgiver, that a certain soldier Peter, angered by the bread which he had thrown at a poor man, merited in the judgment of the Lord to which he was raptured, a prolongation of life for penance.

In another way again improperly, but less improperly someone is said to merit through good deeds done in mortal sin: for he cannot merit from debt: but yet it is said by the Masters, that he merits grace congruously (de congruo): and it would be more truly said, that he merited it from the less incongruous (de minus incongruo): because namely he disposes himself more to grace through the works he does, than he who does not do them.

In a third way properly someone is said to merit, when someone by acts worthy of eternal life makes eternal life owed to himself: and thus he does not merit unless having grace making him pleasing and charity. And this is said in five modes. In one mode properly, namely when the cause of merits with alien merit makes a debt: as in little children who have only the cause of merits, which is grace, with alien merit, namely Christ's: and on account of this eternal life is owed to them. In a second mode most properly, when from the cause of merit and the act of proper merit out of an eternal life not owed to him he makes it owed to him, as anyone justified by his first act merits eternal life. In a third mode, when he makes what is owed to him owed to him by more reasons: and thus anyone merits by the second, and third, and so on by meritorious acts. In a fourth mode, when he merits the increase of grace and of glory previously possessed and owed: and this happens by growing charity. In a fifth and last mode, when he merits through many works something conjoined to grace, such as the acceleration of the resurrection, or the glorification of his name, and the like: and in this mode Christ merited for himself what he did not possess before: although all honor was owed to him even through his nature, yet that which he ought to have possessed through nature, he made his own by reason of merits through works.

It must be said therefore to the first, that [though he was] rich by nature, although he possessed and could do all things: for he could accelerate the resurrection, and clarify his name; yet he did not possess all things in every ratio: for the Father of Christ willed him to have these also in the ratio of merit, so that thus he might be shown more glorious not in multiple goods, but in multiple reasons of the just possession of goods.

To the next it must be said that although he himself did not lack anything, yet we lacked, that he should thus merit for himself, giving us a form [to imitate].

To the next it must be said that the state of a comprehensor did not take away from Christ the state of a wayfarer (viator): and therefore it befitted him to merit: but if he had been a comprehensor only, then the objection would proceed.

To the next it must be said that this profit is not contrary to perfection: because it is not posited in the number of the goods of the soul according to knowledge, or grace, or glory: but rather in the goods of the body, like the acceleration of the resurrection, and the manifestation of his name, which is posited in others receiving knowledge of him: and it is posited in the ratios of possessing, and not things possessed in the soul, but in the body, or in others, as was said.

To the next it must be said that although acts belong to singulars, and to persons if the agents are of rational nature, yet they are not always referred to the agents themselves according as they are distinct persons, but also sometimes by grace of nature: as to understand is an act of man, and yet it is referred to man by grace of the soul. So we can say, that to merit is an act of Christ who is an equal person, but according to the nature in which he is inferior: and this well befits Christ, because he acts according to the property of each nature.

Articulus 2 — Whether Christ Merited For Himself The Glory Of Impassibility And Immortality

Whether Christ merited for himself the glory of impassibility and immortality?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says in the Letter, there A, §1: But he also merited for himself the glory of impassibility and immortality, etc.

For this seems to be impossible; because § 1. If he merited, some potency merited: but this is none but free choice. But it is proved, that it was impossible that he merited through his free choice: for a confirmed free choice is not in a state of meriting.

§ 2. Also, no potency determined to one [thing] has praise in its act. This is proved in all natural potencies. But the free choice of Christ was determined to one [thing]: therefore he had no praise in it. But nothing is meritorious unless praiseworthy: therefore Christ could not merit by his free choice.

§ 3. Also, the free choice of Christ did not hold itself otherwise then than it does now: therefore if now he does not merit, neither did he merit then.

§ 4. Also, a holy man is praised, that he could transgress and did not transgress, could do evil things and did not do them therefore if this belongs to the substance of merit, if Christ never transgressed, nor could transgress, he never merited.

ON THE CONTRARY: Our free choice did not have the potency of meriting from this that it can do evil, because this is a defect, as was proved above, but rather from this that with grace it spontaneously does good. Since therefore Christ without comparison more freely did justice than us, he can have merited more than us.

Solution: It must be said, that he himself possessed a free choice which could merit.

To the first it must be said that free choice can be called confirmed in three ways. In one way in the end according to genus, that is, in the good, yet not this or that good: and this confirmation does not take away except that defect in which it is flexible into evil: but it can still [move] into any good. Another is the confirmation of free choice in that which is simply ultimate, and it is confirmed in it by adhesion, as those confirmed in the fatherland: and this does not take away the will of doing what it wills, but posits a necessity not of coercion in it, but of immutability in that end: and since that is the reward, it is placed immutably in the reward: and therefore it now takes away the ratio of merit, because merit seeks more, and one thus adhering cannot think of more that he would possess, besides that which he has. This indeed was in Christ, but did not take away from him the ratio of meriting: because with that adhesion he was also a wayfarer (viator): and this happened in Christ on account of the two-fold conjunction of his soul, namely to the flesh, and to the deity: for the conjunction to the senses of animal flesh which precedes that which is spiritual, made the way and the wayfarer: the conjunction to that which is spiritual, which has nothing after it that is sought, made the comprehensor. The third is the confirmation of potency to this act by necessity of nature, such that it behooves him to operate this, and he could not not operate this, nor could he operate another: and this confirmation takes away the whole nature of free choice: because every rational potency is to opposites: and no one in the fatherland is confirmed, such that it always behooves him to will the same in number, and he could not not will this: and the opposite of this is posited by the nature of free choice in all, namely to be able [to will] this, and to be able to cease from this, and to be able [to will] another than this. And therefore it is clear from this that it is not the definition of freedom of choice, to be able to will good, or evil: but rather it happens to it to be able to will evil from defect: but its freedom consists in this that it can will this, and not will this, and be able to will something diverse from this. For in this the free is known, that it does not act by necessity of nature, and in this way Christ had a flexible free choice, and this suffices for merit with the state of a wayfarer: and therefore the first objection does not proceed.

To the next it must be said that a potency determined to one in number by necessity of nature, does not have praise: but it has already been shown, that this does not befit any free choice neither confirmed, nor unconfirmed.

To the next it must be said that the first [premise] is false: for it held itself otherwise then, because then it was in the state of a wayfarer: but now it is not the state of a wayfarer with the freedom which makes merit according to the state of meriting.

To the next it must be said that this concerning the praise of a just man is not per se, but according as it is indicative of freedom per se: for he who can [do] good and evil, can do what he wills, but it is not converted: and because that is per accidens, it does not make the state of meriting except per accidens: and this was also determined above, where it is inquired, Whether Christ could sin?

Articulus 3 — Whether The Humility Of The Passion Of Christ Was The Merit Of Exaltation

Whether the humility of Christ's passion was the merit of his exaltation?

Whether the humility of Christ's passion was the merit of his exaltation?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says there, A, §1: Therefore the humility of the passion was the merit of his exaltation, etc.

For it seems, that by the humility of his passion Christ merited nothing.

§ 1. For passion (as the Philosopher says) is the bringing on and effect of action: therefore it is from another: but whatever is from another according as it is from another, is not meritorious: therefore in no way is passion meritorious: therefore neither the passion of Christ.

§ 2. Also, nothing is meritorious, unless it is an act elicited from some virtue: but virtue is not in the body, but in the soul: therefore what is only in the body and not in the soul, does not have the ratio of merit: but the passion was wholly in the body, not in the soul: therefore it was not meritorious.

§ 3. Also, nothing is meritorious except that which is voluntary: but no passion is voluntary: therefore it is not meritorious. The first is clear per se: because Augustine says: No one unwillingly does well, even if what he does is good. The second is clear by the definition of the voluntary which the Philosopher and the Saint posits, that the voluntary is that whose principle is in us, or in him who acts: but the principle of passion is always in another.

§ 4. If you say, that it is otherwise in Christ, and otherwise in others: because Christ was God, and therefore they could do nothing in him except what he himself willed, and therefore what they did to him, makes it voluntary. On the contrary: A verse is proposed by all,

The action displeased, the passion was pleasing.

Moreover, below it will be proved that this is not true: because according to this they would not have sinned, if their act had been pleasing and voluntary: because according to this it would have been good, since Christ willed nothing except good.

Solution: It must be said, that Christ merited by his passion: and maximum merit consists in the passion of Christ, and the passions of other Saints.

And there is a single solution to all, that although it is brought on, yet the reception and sustaining of the passion is voluntary, for the sake of the good for which the passion is: and therefore the chief of virtues which is fortitude, consists in passions brought on.

To the next it must be said that materially the passion is in the body, but the equanimous sustaining is in the soul, and that is what makes virtue.

To the next the solution is clear by what was said before.

To that which is further objected against the solution of some, I concede well, that if it is inquired, How could this be, that passion is the effect of action, and could not be without action, yet the will is of one, and not of the other?

That question is weak: because the will separates those things which according to nature are conjoined, just as the other acts of the soul: just as I will to be white, and I do not will to be a monk, and I will to be clothed upon by glory, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life, and I do not will to die: and, to speak briefly, the will is even of impossibles, as the Philosopher says.

Through this therefore the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Humility Of Christ Is The Merit Of Clarity

Whether the humility of Christ is the merit of his clarity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, A, §1: Humility is the merit of clarity, clarity is the reward of humility, etc.

For from this it seems, that as by a habit he merited through humility.

§ 1. This also seems by another reason. To Philippians 2:8: He humbled himself, namely to the Father, made obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. And it follows, v. 9: For which cause God also hath exalted him, and hath given him a name which is above all names.

§ 2. Also, if exaltation is the reward of Christ, since this is properly owed to humility, because he who humbles himself, shall be exalted then humility properly seems to be the merit.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. All merit is in charity: therefore if he merited, he merited from charity.

§ 2. But it seems again, that Christ did not merit by any of his virtues thus. For he who merits by virtues, his virtues can be transferred to something better, than they themselves are: but the virtues of Christ could not grow, since they were infinite: therefore it seems, that he could not merit by virtues.

Also, charity which is in the meriter profits continually through merit, because otherwise it would be dealt with incongruously: but the charity of Christ could not profit: therefore the charity of Christ could not merit.

Solution: It must be said, that Christ merited by every virtue of his, by humility, obedience, charity, and so of others, and merited both for himself and for us. And some say, that he also merited the substantial reward of humanity in the endowments of the soul and the endowments of the body: for although he possessed them before, they say that this is not repugnant: just as the Angel [possesses] beatitude from God, and now merits it which he received: just as we also see among men, that sometimes a wage is conferred on a faithful worker, which he must afterwards serve to merit: and this sentence does not seem to me improbable. If however we wish to follow the common way, which has no calumny, then we will say that he merited for himself by multiple reasons, making his own what by fewer reasons was his before: and he also merited in the body those things which he did not possess in the body, and he merited among men to have what he did not possess among men, such as the acceleration of the resurrection, and the endowments of the body in the body, and the manifestation of his name among men.

To the first therefore I concede well, that exaltation responds to humility as a proper reward: but this exaltation is in the body, and among men. In himself and in the soul he was exalted beforehand, [meriting] in this mode by which through multiple acts the exaltation of the soul [became] owed to him.

To the next it must be said that merit consists in charity as in a root: yet it does not so consist, that it alone merits, but rather any virtue whatever, but rather drawing the power of meriting from the quantity of love: just as it is in natures, where the sun moves to the budding and maturation of all generable things, and the special motor of this and that is not excluded: and that which is generated, in form and ratio more follows its own special motor than the general one. Also, Charity inflaming the whole affection with its heat, gives to all the power of meriting: but yet the merit is special in the special virtues, and to this responds a reward according to the ratio, as to humility exaltation, to obedience freedom, and to faith vision, and to hope comprehension, and the like.

§ 1. To that which is asked further, it is already solved through what was said at the beginning of the solution: because to merit is not spoken of in one way, but in many.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Soul Separated From The Body Is Made Impassible Immediately

Whether the soul separated from the body is immediately made impassible?

§ 2. Next it is asked about what he says, there, A, § 2: Whether the soul is made impassible, etc.

§ 3. Here the Master touches upon one of the things he merited, namely immortality and impassibility.

§ 4. 1. Now since impassibility belongs to the soul and the body, it seems that it does not happen to the soul except by grace of the body: therefore, once separation from the body is made, the soul will seem to be immediately made impassible.

§ 5. 2. Also, the soul of itself has no contrary: if therefore passion is the sense of a contrary acting against nature, of itself it has no passibility, unless perhaps from sin or the body: therefore, once separation from the body is made, unless it is subject to sin, it does not have passibility: therefore it is impassible.

§ 6. 3. Also, everything that has passibility only by accident, will not be passible unless joined to that accident: but this accident is incorporation: therefore it will be passible [when] incorporated, setting aside the sin which makes it passible: therefore the soul of Christ soon separated from the body, and the souls of the Saints, are impassible.

§ 7. ON THE CONTRARY: Let us suppose that they are again incorporated to an animal body: either they will suffer, or not. If they do: then they were not made impassible by absolution from the body, because the impassible cannot suffer. But if they do not suffer: then they will not be united, because a soul united to a body necessarily co-suffers, since it grieves over things separating [it], as was held in the preceding distinction.

§ 8. Solution. That opinion which posits our souls as impassible after separation seems to me more probable, just as the reasons first brought forward prove.

§ 9. To that which is objected to the contrary, it can be said that souls are separated from bodies in two ways, namely as receiving the end of the life and time attributed to them by God's predefinition, as it is said: Thou hast appointed his bounds which cannot be passed ; and if those were placed again in a body, in my judgment they would not be able to suffer, unless God who is able to do all things were to again create the first affection of the flesh in them. But some are separated, not to have the end of life, but so that the glory of God might be manifested in them by a future miracle, as Christ says of Lazarus: Lazarus our friend sleepeth: but I go that I may awake him out of sleep . And of the man born blind he said: Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents (namely, that he should be born blind): but that the works of God should be made manifest in him . And those are not separated except in a qualified sense [secundum quid], and therefore they are not made impassible.

Articulus 6 — Whether Christ Merited In The First Instant Of His Conception

Whether Christ merited in the first instant of his conception?

Whether Christ merited in the first instant of his conception?

§ 1. Next it is asked about what he says: Nor did Christ merit this only when to the Father, etc.

§ 2. For this seems to be false: because 1. To be is prior to acting. But in the instant of conception he first received being: therefore in that [instant] he could not merit.

§ 3. 2. Also, the Holy Fathers and others say that no one can be regenerated unless he is first born: therefore much less to merit, since it imports to be reborn, and afterward to act according to the grace received in regeneration: therefore it seems that it was necessary for Christ first to be born at least in the womb, before he could merit: therefore he did not merit in the instant of conception.

§ 4. 3. Also, in the bad angel it was necessary to posit being by nature prior to turning away by malice: therefore by opposites, in any good it was necessary first to have being by nature prior to being converted to God by grace: since for this much more is required than for turning away: because anyone can turn away by himself, and cannot be converted except by grace.

§ 5. If perhaps you say that it is otherwise for Christ, and otherwise for others: because Christ was a person before conception and in conception, and therefore he was able to merit: this is nothing: because then to merit would belong to the person as person, and this is false, since to merit belongs to the free choice of the lower [nature]: therefore there does not seem to be a single instant of free choice and its act in merit.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that concerning this there are two opinions, of which that seems to me more probable which concedes the reasons brought forward, and says that Christ did not merit from the instant of conception, but continuously merited after that instant: as is also expounded that [passage] of John 8:44: He was a murderer from the beginning , that is, after the beginning. Others say that he merited in the instant of conception, and they resolve the reasons brought forward: because that instant is a certain midpoint of the past and the future: and according to how it is the end of the past, so in it Christ received being: and according to how it is the beginning of the future, so he merited in the same: hence in the same instant he began to be, and performed the work of merit, yet not according to the same notion of the instant.

§ 7. And by this the solution to everything is clear, except to what was objected concerning the bad angel: because he also, as I think, stood in the truth for a divisible span of time, and afterward fell: but it is not so concerning Christ.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Had, According To The Merit Of The Soul, That By Which He Was Able To Advance

Whether Christ had according to the soul's merit, by which he could advance?

§ 8. Next it is asked about what he says, there, B, Christ by no means had according to the soul's merit, by which he could advance, etc.

§ 9. For this seems false: since it was held above that to merit is spoken of in many ways, and a person can merit in multiple ways that which he already has: therefore Christ [could too].

§ 10. Also if it is asked, What is called the substantial reward?

§ 11. If this is called the vision of God which is the total wages, Christ had that in many ways from the instant of conception: but nothing prohibits that he could have acted so that it was owed to him by some reason more than it had been before.

§ 1. Also it is asked, What is called the soul's merit?

§ 2. If this is the merit by which he could merit some reward in the soul, it seems false: because he merited for the soul impassibility which he did not have before: therefore he had whereby he could advance according to the soul's merit.

§ 3. Also, Christ's action was not less pleasing than the action of other Saints: but there is no action of other Saints which is not meritorious of eternal life, which is the soul's merit and reward: therefore Christ merited for himself the soul's reward, as it seems.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that the Master does not understand that Christ could not merit the substantial reward by some reason: but his intention is to say that through that merit nothing was added to him according to the soul which he had not had before, nor did he receive anything more fully through merit than he had before.

§ 5. To this however which is objected concerning impassibility, it must be said that the passibility of the soul is attributed to it by accident, insofar as it is in the body or in sin, as was held before: and therefore the dowry of the soul does not consist in impassibility, nor does the substantial reward.

Articulus 8 — Whether Impassibility And Immortality Are Of The Soul Or Of The Body

Whether impassibility and immortality belong to the soul or the body?

§ 6. Next it is asked about what he says, there, B, towards the middle: Therefore from conception he merited not only the glory of impassibility and immortality of the body, but also the impassibility of the soul.

§ 7. For there can be a doubt, To what do immortality and impassibility properly belong?

§ 8. It seems to belong to the soul: because 1. Life belongs to it per se. Since therefore opposites such as privation and habit have to occur concerning the same thing, it seems that mortality and immortality belong to the same thing.

§ 9. 2. And in the same way it is objected concerning passibility: for the question here is not about every passibility, but only about that which consists in pain: and since pain is the sense of a contrary, and since sense is referred per se to the soul, it seems also that passibility properly belongs to the soul.

§ 10. Moreover it is asked, How do these fall under merit?

§ 11. For it seems that they do so directly: because immortality is a dowry of the body: but dowries fall directly under merit: therefore it seems that these directly fall under merit.

§ 12. Solution. It must be said that impassibility and immortality properly belong to the composite, and not solely to the body.

§ 13. To the first therefore it must be said, that there is life as the cause of life, and this is the soul: and life as a habit of life, and this belongs to the composite, and adheres to the body as a habit.

§ 14. To the other it must be said, that passibility belongs to the soul by accident as was held before: but if it belonged to it per se, then the objection would proceed.

§ 15. To the other it must be said, that the dowries of the body do not fall as directly under merit as the dowries of the soul: because the dowries of the body are caused by the soul: for the glory of God flows into the soul, and overflows into the body in the dowries of the body: and therefore they do not fall as directly under merit as the dowries of the soul. Hence Christ merited these out of congruity and condignity, but out of condignity they are as if added to the substantial reward: whereas out of congruity, immortality and impassibility are owed to him who endured harsh pains in the body.

Divisio Textus

§ 26. Next is to be taken that part in which another division begins, there, E, For what therefore did he will to suffer and die? etc.

§ 27. In which the Master inquires into the effect of Christ's passion in us. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master touches upon four things in general, for which his passion availed us in general, not executing specifically concerning any one. But in the second he posits a specific execution concerning each: and this begins at the beginning of distinction XIX, there, A, Now therefore let us ask, How through his death from the devil, etc.

§ 28. But in the first of these there are two: in the first of which he posits four, as was said. In the second he proves the first, there, E, § 2: But how through death he redeemed us from the devil and sin, etc.

§ 29. Through these the sentence is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether Christ Merited That The Name Which Is Above Every Name Be Given To Him

Whether Christ merited that the name which is above every name be given to him?

§ 16. Next it is asked, concerning what he says, there, But it behooved that the name which is above every name be given to him, etc.

§ 17. For he had this name from eternity: therefore this was not given to him then.

§ 18. If you say that he did not have the manifestation of the name, but the reality: but the manifestation itself was given to him through merit. On the contrary: Matthew 8:29, on that [verse], What have we to do with thee, Jesus, Son of God? The Gloss: He became known to the extent it was necessary: but not to them as life and light as to the Angels, but to terrify them through certain effects of his divinity. Therefore the demons knew him to be the Son of God even before the passion.

§ 19. Also, Luke 4:34: I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God, etc. The Gloss in the same place: Seeing the Son of God on earth, they immediately thought they would be judged.

§ 20. Also, in the law the Son of God and God was promised: therefore since the time and works testified, it seems that God was known by them. If it is said that in the law he is not called God, this is plainly false. Isaiah 9:6: His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, God, the Mighty, etc.

§ 21. Also, it is commonly said that the wiser ones knew that he would come into the world for redemption.

§ 22. Also, even the boys cried this through the streets: Hosanna to the son of David! blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord . Therefore it seems that this name was manifest even before the passion.

§ 23. ON THE CONTRARY: 1 Corinthians 2:8: If they had known, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory . And it is expounded there concerning the demons and the princes of the Jews. Concerning the demons: because they never would have persuaded him to be crucified, since they would have known they would thus lose their power. Concerning the princes however: because they would not have done it by handing him over to the Gentiles.

§ 24. Also, Anselm in the book Cur Deus homo, says that such a great crime as is the killing of God, could never be expiated by penance, unless ignorance had excused it .

§ 25. But against this it seems again on the other hand, that every particular ignorance or ignorance of fact excuses from the whole: and concerning Christ there could be nothing but particular ignorance and ignorance of fact: therefore it seems to excuse from the whole, which is false: therefore they were not ignorant.

§ 26. Solution. It must be said that the name which is above every name, is that he truly is God and is called so by every tongue of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth. And I well concede that the Father gave this name to him from eternity by generating him, as Ambrose says: but yet that he be called and become known as God having suffered and become incarnate, this the Father gave to him through the merit of the passion. For it was just that he who on account of sin and us, had so hidden the knowledge of his divinity, that everyone abandoning him fled from him, should through the passion of death be so crowned with glory and honor, that every tongue should confess him to be God.

§ 2. But to all the objects there is one solution, that there is a knowledge through conjectures, and this they had of him that he was the Son of God, both demons and men. There is also a knowledge through certitude, and this they did not have: because although they saw the deeds and other things testifying, again it came into doubt for them because of the indications of weakness which appeared in him: and the first arguments proceed concerning conjectural knowledge. But the second arguments proceed concerning the ignorance of certitude. But after the resurrection, when there was no longer any indication of weakness in him, then it was congruent for the name to be manifested.

§ 3. To that which is objected last concerning the excuse of ignorance, it must be said that it did not excuse in total: because credulity was also admixed through conjectures: but if it had been total ignorance, then it would have excused.

Articulus 10 — Whether Christ, In The Same Form In Which He Was Crucified, Was Exalted

Whether Christ was exalted in the same form in which he was crucified?

§ 4. Next it is asked about what he says, there, C, For in whatever form he was crucified, in that he was exalted.

§ 5. It seems that exaltation is not owed to his humanity: because 1. Exaltation is to the seat of God to equality with the Father: but this does not belong to the form according to which he is minor to the Father: and this is the humanity: therefore exaltation is not owed to the humanity.

§ 6. 2. Also, exaltation is owed to him to whom every knee bends of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth: but this is the deity: therefore that exaltation of which the Apostle speaks, is of the deity.

§ 7. 3. Also, in the words of the Apostle these things follow one another: He exalted him, and gave him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth, and every tongue should confess to him: therefore it seems that they refer to the same thing in Christ: but the name refers to the deity: therefore the exaltation as well.

§ 8. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Exaltation is owed to humility: but the deity cannot be humbled: therefore it will not be exalted.

§ 9. 2. Moreover, in the Text the opposite is said in the words of the Saints, as is clear to one inspecting it.

§ 10. Solution. It must be said that exaltation is owed to the person in the human nature, and also to the human nature: but to the person in the human nature it is owed [to be exalted] to the seat of the Father to equality, which although he had from eternity, yet he did not have it existing in the lower nature: but to the nature it is owed [to be exalted] to the better goods of the Father. And by this the solution to the first and to the second is clear.

§ 11. To the third it must be said that they do not have to refer to the same thing, just because the Apostle joins those four things: but they refer to the same [subject] in person, by grace of the different things which are in him.

§ 12. And if it is asked, By grace of what are these four things attributed to him?

§ 13. I say that there is the person in Christ, and both natures, and the work of redemption, and the effects. And indeed all things are owed to the person, yet by grace of the human nature, in which and by the assumption of which he emptied himself, taking the form of a servant , exaltation is owed to him by contrast. But by grace of the divine nature the name which is above every name is owed to him: but by grace of the redemption by which he was judged and blasphemed and mocked, the proclamation of every tongue is owed to him by contrast, that every tongue should confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is in the glory of God the Father. But by grace of the effect of the liberation of those who are on earth and in limbo, and of the restoration of the heavenly ruin, in thanksgiving it is owed to him, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth. Of those in heaven, because he restored the ruin: of those on earth, because he redeemed from the guilt of original [sin]: of those under the earth, because from there he extracted those who were there.

§ 14. If perhaps someone asks, Since this name which is owed to him from the grace of divinity is God and the manifestation of his deity, why does the Apostle say, That at the name of Jesus every knee should bend?

§ 15. It must be said that Jesus Christ are names expressing the incarnate person: and therefore they are not above every name, but they are to be venerated by us by genuflection: because they show us the nature in which the work of redemption for us was done. And Jesus indeed names the person according to relation to the flesh: because Jesus is said to be Savior, and to save belongs to Christ through the divine nature: hence the Angel said: Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins . Which although according to habit it belongs to him from eternity, yet according to the act of saving, it does not belong to him, except in the assumed human nature. But Christ is said to be the anointed one, which sounds like anointing passively: and therefore it names the human nature associated into the divine: because it belongs to the human to be anointed, and to the divine to anoint.

Articulus 11 — Whether Christ Ought To Have Had The Glory Of Immortality Without Merit

Whether Christ ought to have had the glory of immortality without merit?

§ 16. Next it is asked about what he says, there, But if it is asked, whether Christ [ought to have had] that glory... of immortality, etc.

§ 17. For it seems that he ought to have had it without merit: because 1. What is granted to the less pleasing, is granted much more to the only-begotten Son: but this kind of immortality is granted to infants [who are] less pleasing: therefore without merit it ought more to be granted to the more pleasing Son of God.

§ 18. 2. Also, the condition of a servant is one thing, and the condition of a son is another: for a son is born into the inheritance of the father, whereas a servant does not participate in the goods of the father, except by meriting through service: therefore since Christ was and is the only-begotten of the Father, to be disinherited for no act of his own, he seems to be born to the reception of immortality: and therefore he ought not to have come to it through merit.

§ 19. 3. Also, according to this he is the one who merits, and he is the one who remunerates: which is not fitting, because no one merits from himself, nor remunerates from himself.

§ 20. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Every better thing is to be posited in the Son. Since therefore it is held as better and more pleasing and more proper, that by some reason [what is given] is owed to us on account of what is ours, than that which is as if given to penitents: therefore that mode is to be given: but to have through merit is to have as that in which we have a right through what is ours: therefore he ought to have merited.

§ 21. 2. Also, none of Christ's acts could be void of the Father's gratitude: therefore neither is it evacuated from merit, because every act pleasing to God, is remunerated by God.

§ 22. Solution. It must be said that Christ merited: and this was of his nobility, as the last reasons prove.

§ 23. To the first it must be said, that just as infants have another's sin, so another's merit suffices for them, which is the merit of Christ and of mother Church, as Augustine says.

§ 24. To the other it must be said, that a son merits from a father, and a servant from a master, by one reason and another. For a servant concerning what is not owed to him by nature, by making it a debt on account of service: a son concerning what is owed to him by nature, by making it a debt by another and another reason, so that the possession might be more pleasing.

§ 25. To the other it must be said, that that objection concludes nothing inconvenient: because in Christ there are two natures: and therefore he himself in the divine nature is remunerating himself meriting in the human nature. But it is not so in others: and therefore they either only merit, or only are remunerated.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Suffering And Death Of Christ Availed Us For The Entrance To Paradise

Whether Christ's suffering and dying availed for us the entrance to paradise?

§ 30. The four things which he touches upon in the Text, are these: the entrance to paradise, redemption from the devil, from sin, and from punishment.

§ 31. Let it be asked however in order concerning each. First concerning the entrance to paradise. For the others will have their place in the following distinction.

§ 32. 1. That entrance does not seem to belong to the passion, but to the ascension. Hence in Psalm 67:19: He ascended on high, he led captivity captive, he gave gifts, etc.

§ 33. 2. Also, Micah 2:13: He shall go up opening the way before them.

§ 34. 3. Also, what impeded the entrance to paradise before the passion? It seems that nothing [did]: because the merit of the Saints was pleasing: therefore it was pleasing to God, and ought to have been remunerated in eternal life: therefore whether Christ suffered or did not suffer, the Fathers would have had the entrance to the kingdom: therefore the passion was not the cause.

§ 1. 4. Also, in baptism the heavens were opened over him therefore it seems that he did not open the heavens through the passion, but rather through baptism.

§ 2. 5. If perhaps you say that the fiery sword was not taken away except through the passion, and to open is to remove the fiery sword; it seems that this is nothing: because it was also removed at the entrance of Enoch and Elijah: therefore its removal does not pertain to the passion, as to a cause.

§ 3. 6. Also, we await the heavenly paradise through Christ's passion: but the fiery sword was before the earthly paradise.

§ 4. 7. Also, if the passion is the cause of entrance: then with the cause posited the effect is posited, and destroyed it is destroyed: but it is clear that when Christ suffered the Saints did not immediately pass from limbo to heaven, nor even did they immediately pass from hell: therefore it seems that Christ's passion is not the cause of entrance into the kingdom or into heaven.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said that Christ's passion opened the entrance to paradise by resolving the sword. But the sword is nothing else spiritually but the decree of God concerning not entering without a price, which must be paid for the nature, because it was totally damned through the sin in Adam.

§ 6. To the first therefore it must be said, that the ascension did not open paradise as to the open vision of the face of God: because the Saints ascending from limbo immediately had that, but as to this, that it determines a congruent place for fruition, namely the empyrean heaven: but here the entrance of paradise or the kingdom is called the perfect habit of it in the vision of God face to face. The same must be said to the following.

§ 7. To the other it must be said, that the merit of the Fathers was personal: and therefore through them the nature was not reconciled, and the guilt of the nature impeded them so that they might not see face to face until the time of the passion, nor be introduced into the kingdom, unless the price was paid in this or another way: and because that mode was determined by God, therefore it is the cause.

§ 8. To the other it must be said, that baptism opens the heavens as a disposing cause on the part of him to whom it is opened, and it does not open simply: hence if the passion had not been, baptism would not open, because it does not have power except from Christ's passion.

§ 9. To the other it must be said, that there is no instance concerning Enoch and Elijah: because this was done in the earthly paradise: but we are speaking of the heavenly paradise, in so far as it is essentially the kingdom of God, namely the vision of God face to face: and by this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 10. To the last it must be said, that immediately upon Christ having suffered the face [of God] was opened to the Saints, the contemplation of which is eternal life, although they had not yet obtained the place congruent to that life: because it was congruent for this to be done after the sacraments of burial, resurrection, and ascension were fulfilled: but the place does not relate to the opening of the kingdom except by accident, namely by way of congruity, and not per se.

Articulus 13 — Whether All Others Were Debtors, And Scarcely Did Each One's Own Virtue And Humility Suffice

Whether all others were debtors, and his own virtue and humility scarcely sufficed for each one?

§ 11. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, § 2: For all other men were debtors, etc.

§ 12. For from this an inconvenience seems to follow in multiple ways.

§ 13. 1. In one way, since by how much more services are owed, by so much less are they pleas-ing, it seems that the martyrs by dying for Christ did not do a pleasing service for Christ.

§ 2. 2. In another way: because if a person's own justice is scarcely sufficient for anyone, it seems that no one could satisfy for another, which is against the Apostle saying, Galatians 6:2:

Bear ye one another's burdens, and so you shall fulfill the law of Christ. And against James saying, James 5:16: Pray for one another, that you may be saved.

§ 3. 3. Thirdly: because if anyone is a debtor for all that he is and can do, and also a debtor of death: then it seems that whatever he does lacks remuneration, because he can never answer even for that which he has received.

§ 4. 4. Moreover, of what death is it understood that all are debtors of death? Either natural, or violent. If natural, this seems false: because then it is understood of the debt of nature which not all have paid.

§ 5. Moreover, if all are said to die, this is a condition of nature, and not a debt properly speaking.

§ 6. Moreover, according to this it is nothing to the proposition: because he is speaking here of a debt which satisfies for sin: but those dying according to nature do not necessarily pay off any sin through death. But if it is understood of violent death: this again is false: because we are not all bound to this that we be killed: therefore it seems that what he says of this debt is false.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that in truth the text is to be understood just as it lies: and what is more, no creature even without the offense against God which he has committed, suffices with his whole being and his whole work to be able to answer for one minimum thing which he has received from God. But what we are bound to by the law of creation is one thing, and what we are bound to by the law of offense is another, and what we are bound to by the law of mercy is another. By the law of our condition we are bound to more than we know: by the law of offense every man is bound to more than he could do until the end of the world: but by the law of mercy we are bound to less than even any infirm person could do: saying, Lord, I suffer violence, answer for me ; we immediately find him remitting the whole, and demanding little, namely the will to do what we can with good moderation.

§ 8. To the first therefore it must be said, that the martyrs suffered most pleasingly for Christ: because that which they owed by condition, they offered most pleasingly: because the debt of condition does not remove the freedom of service.

§ 9. To the other it must be said, that justice is not sufficient for anyone: but yet because what he owes is not exacted from him, therefore he can do something for another: but no one for the whole nature, except God and man, as was held above.

§ 10. To the other it must be said, that it is remunerable out of God's mercy not exacting all this which we owe by strict right.

§ 11. To the other it must be said, that he understands death in general: for from the fact that they are addicted to the necessity of death by the sentence of the Lord for the guilt of sin, all shall pay it, even if they are delayed for a time, like Elijah and Enoch: and the martyrs offered that voluntarily by free will: and therefore it was more pleasing: yet it is not exacted from us except in a case, namely in the persecution of the faith or of justice, if, being held by a judge, we are forced to deny the faith, or justice.

§ 12. To the other it must be said, that those remaining according to corrupted nature die, and therefore they first pay off the debt of guilt.

Articulus 14 — Whether Our Sin Was So Great That We Could Not Pay It Off

Was our sin so great that we could not pay it off?

Was our sin so great that we could not pay it off?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, E, §2: "Our sin was so great, that we could not be saved," etc.

§ 1. For it seems cruel not to forgive a sin except by the death of an innocent person: but God the Father is not cruel against the Son: therefore it seems that He ought to have forgiven the sin more easily, rather than that the Son should die.

§ 2. Also, it is no less a sin of a judge if he permits the innocent to be afflicted so that the guilty might escape, than if he remits the unpunished sin for the guilty. Since therefore the Father did thus in the Son, it seems that we ought not to be redeemed by the death of the Son.

§ 3. Also, the Son of God is better than the whole world, and a thousand worlds if they existed: therefore it seems that the Father exacted the life of the Son who was better, for the sin of the world which was baser, and thus He aggravates the penalty beyond condignity, although it is His nature to punish short of condignity.

§ 4. Also, it seems that satisfaction could have been made for the world otherwise than in that manner: for if Adam and Eve, in whom the whole world was materially, had made satisfaction: then the whole world materially would have made satisfaction, just as the whole materially sinned: therefore the satisfaction would have been as great as the fault: and this ought to have sufficed.

§ 5. Also, if we posit that any person makes satisfaction for himself, it is certain that eventually satisfaction would be made for the whole world: and thus again it was not necessary for the Son to die, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that, fittingly so that justice might be preserved, satisfaction could not have been made more fittingly except through the death of the Son of God: and this is because man does not pay for a sin by the fact that the damage is paid; for when a thief restores what was taken, he still owes his life to the judge for the lesion of justice. Therefore, much more so, even if the damage were paid, he would also owe his life if he were guilty of the crime of lese-majesty; therefore infinitely more so if he were guilty of the crime of lese-majesty against God, who infinitely exceeds all created majesty. Nor do I say this because man could pay the damage, but speaking under hypothesis: because even if he could, he still nevertheless would not have blotted out the guilt [reatum]. But above at the beginning of the book it was shown that this could not be done by any pure creature, nor by pure God: because although in the latter there is the power [posse], nevertheless in the same there is not the obligation [debitum]; but it was fitting that it be done through the God-man, and man-God, who would owe it insofar as he is man by the obligation of charity and conformity of nature, and would be able to do it insofar as he is God.

Therefore it must be said to the first according to Anselm, that the Father did not thirst for the blood of the Son, nor was He cruel to Him: but since He could not deny His own justice, and was overcome by the mercy of human redemption, He gave the Son, voluntarily offering Himself to make satisfaction, to man, so that He might make satisfaction for him, as it is said: For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son: that whosoever believes in Him may not perish, but may have eternal life.[230] But that the Son thus offered Himself by His own will is proved from the Psalms, where it is said: Burnt offering and sin offering you did not require: then I said: Behold I come. In the head of the book it is written of me, that I should do your will. My God, I have willed it, etc.[231]

To the next it must be said, that this would be a sin of the judge, if he did it out of cruelty and perversity: but nevertheless perhaps so that justice might stand, and the guilty one might be corrected and helped, then that judge is proved both just and merciful at the same time.

To the next it must be said, that justice exacted this: because he was not bound only to pay the damage, but also to make satisfaction for the guilt which was infinite, as was proved at the beginning of that solution.

To the next it must be said, that that argument is worth nothing at all: because immediately as they had sinned, they were ungrateful: and thus they could not do anything pleasing [gratum facere] except by the help of Him who alone could help; according to what Augustine says, that all whoever are saved, are saved in the faith of the Mediator: even if we grant this, that to make satisfaction is merely to restore what was taken away: which however was shown to be false.

Through this also the solution to the last is evident.

DISTINCTIO XIX

Divisio Textus

"Now therefore let us ask, How through his death from the devil," etc. Here begins that part in which he follows up on the other three things which he merited for us, namely concerning liberation from sin, from the devil, and from punishment.

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which, in one long chapter, he shows at the same time how he liberated us from sin and from the devil. In the second part, so that this might be explained more, he shows why God was made man and died, there, B, "Therefore man was made mortal," etc. In the third he shows how he liberated us from punishment, there, C, "From what punishment? temporal and eternal."

Articulus 1 — Whether Our Justification From Sin Is The Work Of The Passion Of Christ

Whether our justification from sin is the work of Christ's passion?

First therefore the question arises here, whether our justification from sin is the work of Christ's passion, or not?

For it seems that it is not: § 1. For the passion of Christ was corporeal: therefore it did not attain to our souls: but what does not touch, does not act, as the Philosopher says: therefore it did not act in justifying us.

§ 2. Also, that which justifies anyone, is conjoined to everyone: but the passion of Christ is not conjoined to everyone: therefore it is not justifying everyone.

§ 3. Also, to suffer was not fitting for Christ except according to human nature: but justifying grace is not from Him in this way: therefore the passion of Christ does not justify, as it seems.

§ 4. Furthermore, our justification seems to pertain to the resurrection, as to a cause: and so the Apostle says: He was handed over for our offenses, and rose again for our justification.

Furthermore, justice justifies the soul: therefore it has greater convenience with the resurrection than with death: therefore it is caused more by the resurrection than by death.

§ 5. Also, if the cause is the death of Christ, this will be by way of a sacrament: but a sacrament bears the likeness of that of which it is the cause: since therefore the death of Christ has no likeness with justification, but rather the resurrection, the resurrection will seem rather to be the cause of justification, than death or the passion.

But if this is granted, it is objected to the contrary:

§ 1. Zechariah: You also by the blood of your testament have sent forth your prisoners out of the pit, wherein is no water. Therefore redemption was made by blood.

§ 2. Also, in the Canon: For this is the Chalice of my blood, of the new and eternal testament: the mystery of faith: which shall be shed for you and for many unto the remission of sins. Therefore in the shedding of blood through death the payment of sin was made.

§ 3. Also, Hebrews: Almost all things are cleansed with blood according to the law, and without shedding of blood there is no remission.

§ 4. Also, ibid.: The blood of Christ... will cleanse our conscience from dead works, to serve the living God.

§ 5. Also, Bernard: "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed: save me, and I shall be saved. But nevertheless I am not your saint, unless your blood intercedes for me."

230. Job 14:5

§ 6. Also, John: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin of the world. But the Lamb does not take away sin except by washing in blood, as is held in Revelation: He loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood.

§ 7. Also, Ambrose above in the preceding chapter: "Our sin was so great that we could not be saved, unless the only-begotten Son of God died for us, debtors to death."

§ 8. Also, John: For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son: that whosoever believes in him may not perish, but may have eternal life.

§ 9. Furthermore, his resurrection seems to do nothing for justification: because then Christ was not in a state of dying: therefore he merited neither for himself nor for us: but rather what he had merited, he received in the reward of glory or the stole of the body.

But still it seems that justification belongs to neither of these, but rather to charity and grace: as it also seems to be implied in the Text: because every change is through an opposite: if therefore in us there ought to be made a passage from sin, and from the delight of sin, it is necessary that this be done through an opposite: but these are the virtues: therefore justification is due to the virtues, and not to the passion or the resurrection.

§ 1. Furthermore, what is it that the Master seems to say, that he justifies us: because we seeing his charity towards us, are moved to love, and so we are justified by charity? For thus his death was only accidentally aiding towards justification: and if without it we had had charity, we would have been sufficiently justified: and this is false: because however much we had loved him, unless he had paid the debt for us, we would not have been redeemed.

§ 2. Furthermore, according to this even the martyrs would justify us from sins: because we, seeing them suffer for the faith, are kindled with charity towards God, who grants them to suffer so constantly: and by that charity we are justified: and thus Christ would have done little or nothing for us.

§ 3. Also, according to this the benefits conferred by God, such as to be, to live, and to understand, and giving riches, and the like, would have availed us as much, or more, as the passion of Christ: because from them also we are kindled to love God, by which charity we are afterwards justified.

§ 4. Furthermore, the Master in the Text touches further on the cause which is from faith, in that God proposed him as a propitiator through faith in his blood, so that as of old those looking at the serpent erected on a pole, etc. But it is certain that there are many articles [of faith] besides the article of the passion: therefore if we are justified through faith in the passion, since it is a greater faith to believe God to be triune and one, than to believe Christ suffered: it availed us as much for justification that God is triune and one, as that he suffered: but this is false: therefore the cause which the Master posits is null.

§ 5. Also, Christ taught us humility and meekness, without which (as Augustine says in the book On Virginity) we are not healed: as he himself says: Learn of me, because I am meek, and humble of heart. Why are those virtues not joined to the remission of sin through the death of Christ, just as charity and faith are?

Also, the Master in the Text touches upon a third mode, saying from the words of Augustine, that by his death in one most true sacrifice, whatever there was of faults he blotted out: therefore it seems that he himself justified us by offering a sacrifice for us: and thus he does not seem to have justified us by kindling to charity, and illuminating by faith.

Solution. It must be said that justification is considered in two ways, namely in general, insofar as it is referred to the whole nature damned in Adam: and in particular, namely insofar as it avails this or that one who is justified in particular.

Also, in relation to the cause it can be considered in four ways, namely in relation to the efficient cause, or in relation to the meritorious cause, or in relation to the sacramental cause, or in relation to the formal cause. And further, in relation to the meritorious cause, in two ways, namely meritorious of congruity, and meritorious of condignity. Similarly, as to the sacramental cause, in two ways, namely as it is a cause and sign on the part of the justifier, or as it is a cause and sign on the part of the recipient.

Having made this distinction, it is easy to determine the whole. For I say that the justification of nature, referred to the meritorious cause which is meritorious according to condignity, is referred to the passion of Christ: because He merited for us the release from sin, upon which justification follows. But referred to the meritorious cause of congruity, the particular justification—not the general one which regards the debt of nature from Adam, which Christ alone could pay—is referred to the merits of the Saints. Referred to the efficient cause, it is referred to God alone, who alone efficiently blots out sins and works justice. But referred to the formal cause, both justifications are made through grace and virtues. But referred to the sacramental cause, which is a cause and sign on the part of the recipient, according to the debt of original sin it is referred to baptism, according to the debt of actual sin it is referred to penance, if it is after baptism. But referred to the sacramental cause on the part of the justifier, it is referred to God and man, by rising again, pre-signifying in himself the life of soul and body.

Whence it is now plain to solve everything.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the passion of Christ was corporeal and spiritual, and divine and human. Corporeal, because there were wounds in the body. Spiritual, because there was sorrow in the soul and spirit. It was human, because it was a man who suffered. But it was divine, because true God suffered. Now "to touch" is in two ways, namely through substance, and through effect: and in this second way it touched us, and acted upon us. But if it is asked, What contains this effect from Christ into justified souls, it will be clear below in this same solution.

To the next it must be said, that the passion of Christ is conjoined spiritually to anyone through something in the justified person regarding the effect and power of the passion, namely by faith and charity: and therefore the objection proceeds from false premises.

To the next it must be said, that although to suffer was fitting for Him according to human nature, yet the one suffering was not only man, but also God: and from that part sanctifying grace flows forth in the passion into all the justified.

To the next it must be said, that it pertains to the resurrection in the manner which was said, in an exemplary way, and sacramentally in a certain way.

To the next it must be said, that the death of Christ is a cause by way of the oblation of a meritorious sacrifice: and in this way it is called the sacrament of our justification, taking sacrament broadly for a sacred secret, and not for a likeness and cause. Or, it can be said (as some say) that there are two parts of justice, namely the removal of evil, and the obtaining of good. And the passion through death sets up a likeness to the taking away of sin, because just as death separates from mortal animal life, so justification separates from the mortal life of sin, in which we lived animally like brute beasts. But the resurrection sets up a likeness to justification on the part of the other term, namely the obtaining of life and justice: and this is what the Apostle seems to mean, saying: We are buried together with him by baptism into death; that as Christ is risen from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life. And elsewhere: Reckon yourselves to be dead indeed to sin, but alive unto God, in Christ Jesus our Lord.

To all the following things by which it is proved that the passion of Christ is the cause of our justification, the solution is already clear through the distinction had above.

But to that which is further objected concerning the causes introduced by the Master on the part of charity and faith, it must be said that the Master shows in three ways that the passion of Christ justifies: but justification is considered in two ways, namely as to sufficiency: and thus only one cause justifies, namely by the oblation of the saving sacrifice for us. It is also considered as to efficiency: and thus it is necessary that faith and charity be present: for the effect of the passion will not flow to us, unless we are of the mystical body of the sufferer. But nothing can do this except charity: and therefore the Master introduces concerning charity, so that considering his charity towards us, we might be united to the sufferer through charity, because his blood has no effect outside his mystical body. But because the sacrament of redemption flows from the head, therefore it is necessary to attend to the head by looking towards it: and to this, faith raises the eyes. And thus it is clear how reasonably the Master proceeds in the Text.

Therefore to what is objected against this, it must be said that it is not by accident: because charity does not make the sufficiency, nor does it posit the font of salvation: but it makes the efficiency, and unites us to the font of salvation: so that being in his body, we might draw from the fountains of the Savior, and confess to the Lord.

To the next it must be said, that although the martyrs kindle us to charity, nevertheless that charity, insofar as it is thus considered, does not unite us to them suffering, but rather to Christ suffering.

To the next it must be said, that benefits are supports of charity: yet by them the wave of salvation washing us is not infused into us, as happens through the passion.

To the next it must be said, that in every article [of faith] the font of justification is posited in us, although faith regarding every article purifies by disposing toward justification: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the next it must be said, that the other virtues are not attaining God, as these two are: and concerning the cardinal virtues it is clear, that their acts are in those things which are towards the end, and not immediately into the end. Concerning hope it is clear: because although it is with respect to the end, yet it is by expecting, not by having or uniting. But faith attains the truth of the divine article in whatever manner: and charity unites through love: and therefore the other virtues formally indeed justify, but they do not thus through their acts unite to the justifier himself, as charity and faith do.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether By His Death Christ Destroyed, By One Sacrifice, Whatever There Was Of Faults

Whether by his death, with one sacrifice, Christ destroyed whatever there was of faults?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, around the middle: "For by his death, with one most true sacrifice, whatever there was of faults, from which the devil detained us to pay punishments, Christ extinguished," etc.

For this seems false: because § 1. There are still many sins, by which the devil detains us to pay punishments, both here and in the future: therefore he did not destroy whatever there was of faults.

§ 2. Also, if he himself destroyed whatever there was of faults, because fault has opposition to grace, but satisfying punishment has order against punishment: but Christ satisfied for us through the punishment of the passion: therefore this sacrifice was ordered against punishment, and not against fault, as it seems: and so he did not blot out whatever there was of faults, but rather whatever there was of punishments.

§ 3. Furthermore, it seems that some fault could not be blotted out by that passion: because as great a good as was the life of Christ, so great an evil was his killing, or greater, on account of the offense adjoined to the damage: therefore it seems, since a lesser good cannot overcome a greater evil, that the death of Christ could not even avail to blot out that sole fault which his killers had perpetrated by killing him: therefore much less did it avail to blot out that one with all the other faults. Which however is false: because many of the killers were saved, such as Longinus, the Centurion, and others, as the Saints say.

Solution. It must be said that in sin there are four things, of which three are so conjoined that one is not loosed without another; but the fourth is severable from the other three. The first is the fault which is contrary to grace. The second is the stain defiling the image. The third is the guilt of eternal punishment: and these three are conjoined. The fourth is the guilt of temporal punishment. Well therefore I concede that the passion of Christ sufficiently blots out fault: but nevertheless the action of the passion into fault begins from the part of the guilt of eternal punishment, as the objection proves. But because the guilt is not severable, unless the stain and fault are loosed, therefore subsequently the force of the passion acts into the fault and the stain: but the passion has this insofar as in it grace flows into us from the sufferer himself: because it is to operate directly against the fault, and consequently against the stain and against the guilt. And through this the solution to the second is clear.

To the first it must be said, that the passion of Christ blots out sufficiently by itself: but efficiently it blots out with faith and charity, as was said in the preceding question.

To the next it must be said, that Anselm makes that argument, and solves it, saying that that ignorance by which they believed him to be a pure man excused from so much guilt: and therefore the sin was diminished: and it could be expiable with the others, as he himself said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. But nevertheless in the argument there is a supposition of falsehood for two reasons: of which one is, because the evil is not weighed from the circumstances of the affair only, but from the circumstance of the doer: and similarly the good: but the latter always infinitely exceeds in good.

And if you say, that the deed of the man was the killing of God, and from that part it was an infinite evil. It must be said, that this is nothing: because from the part of the one suffering it was a good, and not an evil: but from the part of the doers an evil only: and therefore the act of their sin is attended to insofar as it is in the doer, and not in the sufferer: and thus the induced reason stands.

The second reason is: because even if equality be posited, the good was still more powerful in destroying evil than conversely: because good has the power of itself to impugn; but evil does not have the power of itself, but from another, as Dionysius says.

Articulus 3 — Whether, With The Blood Of Christ Poured Out Without Guilt, The Handwritings Of All Faults Have Been Blotted Out

Whether by the blood of Christ shed without fault, the handwritings of all faults were blotted out?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, after the middle: "For by the blood shed without fault, the handwritings of all faults were blotted out," etc.

For a handwriting [chirographum] is an instrument which is held in the hand for the confirmation of the testimony of an agreement. Whence it is named from cheir, which is hand, and grapho, which is I write. But we gave no such writing to the devil: therefore it seems that nothing is said [i.e., it is meaningless to say], that the handwritings of faults were blotted out.

To this it must be said, that it is a metaphorical locution. For we by sinning are constrained by the guilt of eternal punishment: and thus by the sentence of God we are made debtors to the torturer of the judge: just as a thief by stealing is said to give a handwriting to the torturer, by which he is bound to pay punishments to him: so we by the debt of sin oblige ourselves to the demons to pay punishments, with them torturing: and it has no firmness except in the sentence of God, and our guilt.

Articulus 4 — Whether By The Passion Of Christ We Are Freed From The Power Of The Devil

Whether by the passion of Christ we were liberated from the power of the devil?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, towards the end: "He began to possess us as native slaves," etc.

For here the mode is introduced, how we were liberated from the power of the devil.

But the passion seems to have profited us in nothing towards liberation from the devil.

§ 1. Since the Apostle says, after the passion, that our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spiritual forces of wickedness, in the heavenly places.[232] Therefore a fight remains for us now just as before.

§ 2. But if you say, that demons do not enter the bodies of men, besieging the senses, as they did before: again it is false, since Augustine says that they mingle themselves with the blood: and concerning many of the Saints it is read, that they expelled demons even from obsessed bodies even after the passion.

§ 3. But if you say, that before the passion he compelled to evil, but he could not do this after: this again is false: because free will can be induced or impinged upon, but it cannot be compelled: because then a sin would be made not a sin: therefore it seems, that we are taken away from sin in nothing, as it seems, and from his power.

§ 4. If perhaps you say, that this is understood regarding idolatry, which was before the passion of Christ, and not after: this again is nothing: because still today there are viler idolaters in certain nations than there ever were: heresies also are multiplied from day to day: therefore it seems that his power is rather loosed to him, than taken away.

§ 5. Also, the Apostle says that in the last days dangerous times shall come:[233] therefore it seems that after the passion his power against us will grow rather than be taken away.

§ 6. Also, Daniel: There shall come a time such as never was from the time that nations began even to that time:[234] and he speaks concerning Antichrist.

§ 7. Also, in Revelation, it is said that Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go forth, and seduce the nations which are over the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog.[235] What is it therefore that he says, that his power over us is taken away?

§ 8. Also, it seems frivolous what he says, that "he began to possess us as native slaves." For by what right did the devil possess us? For it was not of his right to usurp us through this, that we sinned against the Lord: therefore it seems to be nothing what he says.

BUT TO THE CONTRARY: In Revelation, it is said that Christ, a strong Angel descending from the rising of the sun, bound the demon, that he should no more seduce the nations.[236]

Solution. It must be said, that multiple...

§ 1. ... is liberation from the demon. One is with respect to the power of holding [us] arising from the guilt of nature: and by this liberation we have all been liberated sufficiently through the death of Christ, although we are not efficiently liberated except through faith and charity. Before the passion, however, we were all detained at least in limbo. The other is with respect to the power of attacking: and that has not been taken away, but debilitated, principally with respect to four things. One of which is the victory by which he [the demon] was vanquished. For from this he has been made less powerful. The second is the bestowal of helps against him, such as the passion and blood of Christ, which intercede for us: and the other merits of Christ, who, in that He Himself suffered and was tempted, is able to help those who are tempted. The third is the strengthening of those fighting against the demon through the taking away of the fomes [tinder of sin], and the bestowal of greater grace. The fourth, however, which must not be neglected, is the figure of salvation in the sign of the holy cross: which is taken from Gregory in the Dialogues, where demons are read to have been unable to approach a Jew lying in the temple of an idol, because he had signed himself with the cross. Hence they said to their prince that it was an empty vessel, but a signed one. Thus, therefore, we are liberated from the strong one in infinite other ways which we do not see.

§ 2. To the first, therefore, and the second, and the third, and the fourth, it must be said that he still attacks: but his attack does not have as much efficacy as it would have if we did not have these four things from the passion of Christ.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the Apostle says this because men render themselves unworthy of the help of the passion, and weaken themselves by a multitude of sins: but the passion of Christ operates no less because of this, even if it does not operate in them.

§ 4. To the next objection regarding the time of Antichrist, it must be said that that persecution will rage in the whole Church with unloosed power: but this is not from any weakness of the passion taking away power, but from the justice [of God] unloosing it for a time, on account of the enormous sins of men adhering to Antichrist.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that in truth the demon possessed us by no just title: but nevertheless God justly permitted it on account of our sins: and because the whole world is seated in wickedness, and we are born in a wicked world as children of wrath from a Hittite mother and an Amorite father, who are servants of the devil: therefore we are called his home-born slaves, as if born from his house, from a handmaid and a servant: but Christ by His passion bought us, making of the children of the handmaid children of the free woman: so that we are no longer children of the handmaid, but of the free woman: with which freedom Christ has made us free, as the Apostle says, Galatians 4:31.

232. Ephesians 6:12.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Ought To Have Been Made A Mortal Man, So That Thus He Might Free Man From The Power Of The Devil

Whether Christ ought to have become a mortal man, so that He might thus liberate man from the power of the devil?

§ 6. Next it is inquired concerning what he [the Master] says there, "Therefore He was made a mortal man," etc.

§ 7. For it seems not to have been necessary: because 1. From the fact that the devil detained us unjustly (as will be said below), God could justly draw us back into His own power.

§ 8. 2. Also, It seems that He even ought to have drawn us back into His power: because it belongs to God as a just judge to revoke whatever is done unjustly: but the devil had unjustly claimed us for himself: therefore God ought to have revoked this.

§ 9. 3. Moreover, Why could not an Angel in man satisfy? For an Angel is more unifiable to man (although not to God) than God: because the union of those whose distance is less is easier: but the distance between man and Angel is less than between man and God: therefore man is more unifiable to an Angel, and conversely, than God is to man.

§ 10. 4. Let it therefore be posited to have been done thus: then it seems that he would not be a debtor to death, and thus he could have paid death for others: therefore it is not true what he says in the Letter, that man could not satisfy unless God were in him.

§ 11. Solution. It must be said to the first that God indeed could have justly drawn back the power of the devil whenever He wished: but man would not be justly drawn back: because man well deserved to be in the power of the devil, although the devil had no right over him: hence the justice (of which the Master speaks here) is on the part of the man who is drawn back, not on the part of the demon unjustly claiming the man for himself.

§ 12. Through this the solution to the second is also evident.

§ 13. To the third it must be said that the reason why man could not be liberated except by the God-man has been assigned above: and let these suffice.

§ 14. To the objection, however, that this is false, it must be said that if an Angel were incarnated, he would be a created good simply: therefore everything that he was, and did, and could do, he would owe to the Creator for himself: nor would he even then answer one for a thousand: therefore his justice would not suffice for himself and for all others.

233. 2 Timothy 3:1.

§ 15. Moreover, it was shown above that an offense against God, according to one circumstance, is infinite, and according to the damage inflicted it is also infinite at least in potency, because it took away all who could be born from him [Adam], although not all who would have been born from him; hence it is necessary for the one satisfying to be of infinite goodness and price in some way: and this would not befit any created being: therefore no creature could redeem: and thus what is said here in the Letter is verified.

Articulus 6 — What It Is Called

Whether the passion of Christ liberated us from eternal and temporal punishment?

§ 16. Next it is inquired concerning what he says in the Letter, there, C, "From what punishment? Temporal, and eternal."

§ 17. For here he touches upon the fourth thing from which we have been liberated through the death of Christ.

§ 18. But what he says for the first part seems false, namely that He liberated from eternal punishment, by relaxing the debt of death. For if eternal death means the fire of Gehenna, or eternal damnation: it seems that He did not then liberate those who were in the fire of Gehenna: because He only liberated those who were in limbo: and they were not in death, since they lived by charity, and awaited His coming with happy hope, as Augustine says.

§ 19. Also, Neither after nor before was the debt of eternal death relaxed for anyone through death alone: therefore what he says seems false.

§ 20. Also, Regarding the other part, what he says about liberation from temporal punishment in hope, when in the resurrection the enemy death will be destroyed: seems to be nothing, because § 21. 1. If Christ had not been, the saints would still have risen, and the enemy death would have been destroyed in them. Proof. The resurrection of the dead is an article of faith, under which falsity cannot lie: therefore it is necessary for it to happen: therefore whether Christ died or not, they would always have been liberated from temporal punishment.

§ 22. 2. Also, If such a liberation is caused by Christ, it seems rather to be caused by the resurrection, than by His death: because the resurrection of Christ is the cause of our resurrection, as the Gloss says on the first epistle to the Corinthians 15:1 et seq.

§ 23. Solution. It must be said that the death of Christ, by loosing the bond by which we were detained, liberates from both deaths, namely temporal and eternal: but that bond is the obligation from original sin.

§ 24. To the first thing that is asked, then, "What is it called?" I say without prejudice that it is separation from eternal life which is in the vision face to face: and this debt was relaxed in the payment of the price through the passion: and it is not unfitting that the holy Fathers were in that death.

234. Daniel 12:1.

§ 25. But if you ask, "How was that eternal death, since it passed away?" It must be said that it was eternal in its cause on our part, although it passed away by the power of the infinite price that Christ paid for us: for it would never have passed away from us except in that way, or another similar way of liberation which God might have determined.

§ 26. To what is inquired concerning the other part, it must be said in the same way, that our bodies could in no way reach the glory of the resurrection unless the price were paid, and with respect to a payment of this kind we were liberated through the death of Christ.

§ 27. To what is objected concerning the faith of the resurrection, it must be said that the articles of faith are ordered, namely in such a way that the resurrection of the dead is believed to be future by the power of God, with the price paid for us, and the bond broken by which we were detained so that we could not glory.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that now, with respect to the exemplar of the endowments of the body, it is referred to Christ's resurrection: but with respect to the payment of what impedes the glory of the body, it is referred to the passion as to a cause.

Divisio Textus

"Whence He Himself is truly called the redeemer of the world," etc.

§ 35. Here begins that part in which he treats of how Christ, by reason of His merit, is truly called the redeemer and mediator of the world.

§ 36. And therefore it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows how He is the redeemer. In the second, how He is called mediator, there, F, "That He alone is called mediator," etc.

§ 37. And that is further divided into two: in the first of which he shows the effect of the mediation, which is reconciliation. In the second, however, he shows in which nature He mediates, and in what ratio of a medium, there, G, "Whence He is also called mediator according to humanity, not according to divinity," etc.

§ 38. And in this the present distinction is terminated.

Articulus 7 — Whether By The Passion Of Christ Every Punishment Is Blotted Out

Whether through the passion of Christ all punishment is deleted?

§ 29. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, D, near the beginning: "All temporal punishment, which is owed for sin by the converted, is entirely relaxed in baptism," etc.

§ 30. For this seems false: because contrition and sorrow for sins are required: and those are punishments.

235. Revelation 20:7.

§ 31. Moreover, What is that punishment which is lessened in penance? For penance is inflicted according to the measure of the crimes: therefore it seems that it is not lessened.

§ 32. Also, Since the passion of Christ remits something, and the sorrow of the contrite person something, and the power of the keys something: it seems that no further punishment ought to be inflicted in affliction: since so many and such great helps seem to suffice.

§ 33. Solution to the first. Baptism does not require exterior groaning and weeping: and that it requires the interior in adults, this is not on account of the impotence of baptism, but lest the one approaching be feigned: because fiction places an obstacle to the Holy Spirit of discipline, as is held in Wisdom 1:5.

§ 34. To the next it must be said that the punishment owed for mortal sin is infinite and unproportionable: infinite in duration, because one has merited to be punished for eternity: unproportionable, on account of its bitterness. I say therefore that God, by relaxing the guilt, through Himself remits the eternity of the punishment and the unproportionability of the bitterness: but there still remains a great punishment of expiation, which it is necessary to compensate, but man does not suffice of himself: and therefore the passion of Christ takes away the greatest quantity, insofar as He satisfied for us: and there still remains a punishment payable in this life, if it lasts so long, but heavy for us: and therefore that which is heavy, the passion of Christ takes away in the power of the keys: and there still remains a satisfactory punishment, not very heavy, but arbitrary [discretionary] according to our powers, and the quality and quantity of the offense.

Articulus 8 — Whether Christ Is Truly Called Redeemer

Whether Christ is truly called redeemer?

§ 39. But a doubt arises concerning the first part, according to what notion Christ is called redeemer.

§ 40. 1. For if He is so called by the use of power, as he seems to say in the Letter: then He was redeemer from the beginning: and since it belongs to a redeemer to redeem, because redeemer is a verbal noun, and pertains to the act of redeeming, it seems that He redeemed from the beginning, which is false.

§ 41. 2. Also, It was held above in this same distinction that the use of power was not to be used in the redemption of man, but rather justice was to be used: since therefore that [justice] is nothing else than by undertaking the sacraments of redemption in Himself, it seems that the Son rather is the redeemer, and not the Father or the Holy Spirit.

§ 42. 3. Also, The use of power is in all divine acts, but not all divine acts are works of redemption: therefore the use of power does not suffice for someone to be called redeemer: therefore the Father and the Holy Spirit ought not to be called redeemer, but the Son alone.

§ 43. Solution. It must be said that in truth He is called redeemer in two ways, as he says in the Letter, namely by the use of power, and by the effect of humility: but the use of power absolutely does not make a redeemer, but rather the use of power in that work through which there is redemption: for unless there had been divine power in the passion of Christ, He would not have overcome death by death, nor conquered hell, but would solely have been free among the dead: and in this use of power the Father and the Holy Spirit operated with Christ, although not in the sustaining of the passion, and the effect of humility. And this is what the Master intends. Hence Christ Himself says, John 14:10: "The Father abiding in Me, He doeth the works." And, Luke 11:20, He says of the Holy Spirit: "If I by the finger of God cast out demons, doubtless the kingdom of God is come upon you."

§ 44. And through this the solution to all the objections is evident.

Articulus 9 — Whether Christ Received In Himself The Sacraments Which Are The Cause Of Our Justification

Whether Christ received in Himself the sacraments which are the cause of our justification?

§ 45. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, E, towards the end: "In it He received and fulfilled those sacraments," etc.

§ 46. For the sacraments which are the cause of our justification are penance, extreme unction, and the like, concerning which it is not read that Christ received them.

§ 47. But to this it must be said that sacraments are twofold, namely on our part, which are as it were medicine, like vessels bringing medicine to us: and sacraments in Christ, like His nativity, passion, and resurrection, and the like, which are the cause of our redemption on the part of the one satisfying for us, from whom the sacraments which we receive have their power: and we are speaking of those here.

§ 48. Or it can be said that Christ exhibited the reality [res] of the sacraments by giving them their effect: although He did not receive the sacraments as we receive them. For He received baptism by giving the regenerative power to the waters: but the reality and act of confirmation for us: the lament of penance, by weeping and praying and fasting for us, so that our lament could have its effect: the distribution of the Eucharist, by giving His body to the disciples: order, moreover, by making them partakers of His power in binding and loosing and consecrating His body: the act of extreme unction He is not read to have received, because the unction by Mary was not done with oil: but He exhibited the perfect reality of it when He rose, anointed with the oil of the exultation of full glory.

§ 49. However, the first solution is of the intention of the Letter.

§ 50. Others say that He exhibited the sacraments when blood and water flowed forth from His side, John 19:34: "One of the soldiers with a spear opened His side, and immediately there came out blood and water," namely the water of expiation, and the blood of redemption.

Articulus 10 — Whether Christ Is Mediator Between God

Whether Christ is the mediator between God and man?

§ 51. Next it is inquired concerning the other part where it is said, there, F, "That He alone is called mediator," etc.

§ 52. 1. For if Christ is called mediator according to human nature, He seems rather to be called an extreme, than a middle: because man is an extreme.

§ 53. 2. Also, A middle never has in itself in act both of the extremes: but Christ is true God, and true man: therefore He Himself is not a middle between God and man.

§ 54. 3. Also, He seems to contradict himself in the Letter. For first he says that Christ is mediator by reason of human nature only: and afterwards near the end of the second chapter speaking of the heretics, he says: "If therefore Christ according to you, O heretics, has only one nature, whence will He be a middle? and unless He be a middle in such a way that..."

[Continuing sentence from previous page: "...He be a middle in such a way that..."] § 55. ...He is God on account of the nature of divinity, man on account of the nature of humanity, He may be a middle on account of the conjunction of both natures." And here he says that it is on account of the human only. Therefore he is contrary to himself.

§ 56. 4. If a middle is so called by participation in the extremes, then the middle will be equidistant from both extremes: therefore the act of the middle will not be to conjoin one extreme with the other: therefore the act of the mediator will not be to reconcile man to God, as it seems.

§ 57. 5. Also, Since agreement with both extremes is found in another: like the demon, who is immortal with God, and miserable with us, will he himself be a mediator between us and God? It seems so: because he agrees with both extremes.

§ 58. 6. Also, A good Angel who is a creature with us, but immortal and good with God, seems to be a middle between us and God: therefore to be a mediator does not only belong to Christ, as it seems.

§ 59. The solution to almost all these is through a certain authority of Augustine in book IX of The City of God, which is indeed long, but good: where he speaks thus: "It was necessary for the mediator between us and God to have both a passing mortality, and a permanent beatitude: so that through that which passes, He might congruously [accommodate] those about to die, and to that which is permanent, He might transfer them from the dead. Good Angels, therefore, cannot be middles between miserable mortals and the blessed and immortal: because there [with God] they are both blessed and immortal. Bad Angels, however, can be middles, because they are immortal with the former, and miserable with the latter. Contrary to these is the good mediator, who against their immortality and misery, both willed to be mortal for a time, and could persist blessed in eternity. And thus, lest by the boasting of immortality they seduce to misery, He destroyed them—immortal, proud, and miserable, noxious—by the humility of His death, and by the benignity of His beatitude in those whose hearts, cleansing by faith in Him, He liberated from their most unclean damnation."[237] From this it is evident that neither a good Angel nor a bad Angel is a mediator: because the good Angel does not agree with us, but the bad Angel, although he agrees, nevertheless does not have the act of a mediator in conjoining to the blessed, but rather the act of a seducer. Hence in the same place below Augustine says: "For to this end the immortal and miserable middle interposes himself, so that he may not allow a passing to blessed immortality, since that which impedes persists, namely the misery itself. But to this end the mortal and blessed one interposes Himself, so that, mortality having been transacted, He might make from the dead immortals, which He showed in Himself by rising, and from the miserable, blessed, from which He Himself never departed."[238] From this it is gathered that that middle is a middle which is as a way into the extreme, and a middle of conjunction, and not by equidistance from both.

§ 60. It must be said therefore to the first, that Christ insofar as He is man, agrees with an extreme: and from the power of the union He has something in which He agrees with the other, namely justice and the fullness of grace: because without that He would not be a conjoining middle, but a distant one, and making distant, like the bad angel: but He agrees with man through mortality, which is the way through the payment of the price. And thus each is mediating, namely that in which He agrees with man, because mortality is passing into immortality, and that in which He agrees with God, which is the fullness of grace of which we have all received grace for grace. Hence He is not called a middle here by respect to nature, but rather to the two properties of the nature so united, in [Continuing sentence from previous page: "...to the two properties of the nature so united, in..."] § 61. ...one of which He agrees with one extreme, and in the other with the remaining one, and in both He is the way for the inferior extreme into the superior extreme.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that there is a middle by negation and commingling: and such a one does not have the extremes in itself, but that which is a middle in such a way that it has the act of a mediator, which is to unite the inferior extreme to the superior: but Christ is a middle in such a way that He Himself is the mediator, and the one conjoining one with the other: and therefore it is necessary to have the extremes in Himself in act.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that he [the Master] is not contrary to himself: because "middle" sounds like inferiority: but Christ, according to the fact that He is the Word, is not inferior to the Father, but equal: nevertheless the union of the Word is exacted for being a mediator: because He has one extreme through nature, namely immortality, and the other through union to the divine nature, although nevertheless it is in the human nature according to the fullness of grace, because the Spirit was given to Him not by measure, and because, if the union were to cease, the human nature would not have that fullness of grace: and therefore Augustine speaks against the heretics, saying that He would not be a mediator unless He had both natures: not that the divine is the mediator of both: but because, in order that He could be a mediator in the one nature, which is the way in Him to the remaining one, both are exacted. That it is so, moreover, is gathered from Augustine, who speaks thus in book IX of The City of God: "Nor is He a mediator on this account, because He is the Word: for the supremely immortal and supremely blessed Word is far from mortal miseries: but He is mediator through the fact that He is man, by that very fact showing indeed that for that not only blessed but also beatific good, other mediators ought not to be sought, through whom we might judge that steps of arrival are to be constructed for us: because the blessed and beatific God, made a partaker of our humanity, offered a shortcut to partaking of His divinity."

§ 64. To the next it must be said that the middle which is a mediator and a way (so to speak) is not so called by equidistance: because this has opposition with both of the extremes.

§ 65. To the next it must be said that the demon has a certain agreement with both: but his immortality is not true immortality: and therefore he does not agree except in a qualified sense [secundum quid]. Moreover, he himself is not a way, but rather an abduction: and therefore it does not befit him to mediate.

§ 66. To the next it must be said that a good Angel does not agree: because the fact of being a creature is not a sufficient agreement. Moreover, he could not mediate between God and man by reconciling them, as was held earlier.

DISTINCTIO XX

Divisio Textus

"But if it is inquired whether God could have liberated man in another way," etc.

§ 67. Here begins the fourth part of that division which was placed at the beginning of distinction XVIII. And here it is treated whether God could have liberated otherwise than through death: and it lasts up to that place where it is said in this same distinction, there, C, "Christ therefore is the priest, and the same is the victim," etc.

§ 68. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he shows the reasons of congruity why He willed to redeem in this way, since another way was possible. In the second, he executes the case between God, and man, and the devil, there, B, "For if those three had come into a case," etc.

§ 69. In the first part he does three things. First he proposes the question: and second, he gives one reason for the solution from those things that assist toward the hope of immortality. Third, he gives another from the rationale of justice. And he does these three things in one chapter: and from this the sentence is evident.

Articulus 1 — Whether Another Mode Of Liberation Is Possible Besides That By Which The Human Race Has Been Liberated

Whether another mode of liberation is possible besides that by which the human race was liberated?

§ 70. But a doubt arises here first: If another mode is possible, as he says, or not?

238. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, lib. IX.

§ 71. And if this is true, that another is possible: then it is inquired secondly, by what possibility is it possible?

§ 72. It is proceeded to the first in this way: 1. Anselm says that the least inconvenience is impossible to the most decent justice of God; but the greatest inconvenience is the injustice of a judgment, and especially before that judge from whom there is no appeal to another: therefore to sustain injustice is impossible for God: but to remit sin without condign satisfaction is an unjust judgment: therefore this is impossible for God. But it was proved above, and will still be proved more fully, that no one could make condign satisfaction for sin except the God-man: for Ambrose said this in the preceding distinction: therefore it seems that another mode was not possible.

§ 73. 2. Also, Congruity and incongruity are opposed: either therefore in the genus of nature, or in the genus of morals. It is certain, insofar as he speaks of them here, that they are not opposed in the genus of nature: because he does not speak of natures, but of a work of the will, which is liberation: therefore they are opposed in the genus of morals: therefore if congruous is good, it is necessary that incongruous be evil, because good is not opposed to good: but God or the Son of God cannot do evil: therefore He cannot do what is incongruous. If therefore another mode was not congruous to healing our misery, another mode was not possible for God.

§ 74. 3. Also, When it is inquired, as Anselm says, "Whether the human race could be liberated in another way?" the mode is not inquired on the part of God who can do all things, but the mode is inquired on our part: therefore this is to inquire, "Could we ourselves exit from the guilt of sin in another way?" But it is certain that not except through God satisfying, who would also be man, as Anselm proves: therefore another mode was not possible for God.

§ 75. 4. Also, Certain authorities seem to say this expressly, one of which is, Titus 2:11, the Gloss on that, "The grace... hath appeared," etc., says thus: "We would not be partakers of His deity, unless He Himself were a partaker of our mortality."[239] Since therefore we are not partakers, except through the grace of reconciliation, we would not have been reconciled, unless He had died for us in our humanity.

§ 76. Also, Romans 5:19, on that, "For as by the disobedience of one," etc., the Gloss: "That faith is sound, by which we believe that no man, whether of infantile age, or greater, is liberated from the contagion of the ancient death, and the obligation of sin, which the first nativity contracted, except through the one mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ, by the most salutary faith in whom they are made safe."[240]

§ 77. Also, Anselm in the book Cur Deus homo: "He could not pass the chalice unless He drank it, not because He could not avoid death if He wished, but (as has been said) it was impossible to save the world otherwise."[241]

§ 78. Also, Hebrews 2:10, on that, "...to make the author of their salvation perfect by suffering," etc., the Gloss: "Unless Christ died, man would not be redeemed: and unredeemed he would perish, and all things would have been made in vain."[242]

§ 79. From these and many others it seems to be concluded that there was no other mode possible for liberating the human race.

§ 80. 5. Also some object thus: God had foreseen and predestined that mode, because predestination is of all salutary goods: but what is predestined, it is impossible not to be: and to be necessary, and to be possible not to be, are contradictories in the fourth and second mode of modals.

§ 81. 6. Also, The faith of the Patriarchs believed this mode: but falsity cannot underlie faith: therefore it was necessary for this mode of liberation to be: therefore it was not possible for there to be another.

§ 82. ON THE CONTRARY: Gregory in the Morals: "He who made us exist from nothing, could also have recalled us without His death and passion."[243]

§ 83. Also, Pope Leo in the reading for Palm Sunday: "The omnipotence of the Son of God, which on account of the same essence is equal to the Father, could have stripped the human race from the dominion of the devil by the sole command of His will, unless in the divine works it had most congruously befitted that the hostility of enemy wickedness should be vanquished from that which it had vanquished."[244]

§ 84. Also, Augustine in book XIII of On the Trinity: "Therefore, those who say, 'Did God thus lack another mode by which He might liberate men from the misery of this mortality, that He should will the only-begotten Son, God coeternal to Himself, to become man, by putting on a human soul and flesh, morta-...'"[245] [Sentence incomplete] and fact, to suffer death: it is not enough to refute this by asserting that this mode is good and congruent with divine dignity; rather, we must also show not that another possible mode was lacking to God, to whose power all things are equally subject, but that there was no other mode more convenient for healing our misery."

Likewise, on that text of Psalm 21:3: And not for folly to me, the Gloss says: "So that the human race might wisely be freed by my blood: for there is no more convenient mode of our liberation than that man, who fell through pride, should rise again through humility."

To this end there are also arguments not only proving that another mode was possible, but even that another was more congruent.

§ 1. For it is not congruent for one worthy of honor to suffer punishments and exile. But the Son was worthy of all honor: therefore, he ought not to have done this injury to himself, to undergo punishments and exile.

§ 2. Again, to remit sin without satisfaction would have been of greater perfection: therefore, that mode would have been more congruent for the most perfect God. The proof of the first is that he invites us to this, that we should love our enemies, and forgive all who are in debt to us, even without exacting satisfaction. If, therefore, he persuades us to this good, he first ought to have done it in himself.

239. Glossa Ordinaria, on Titus 2:11.

If you say that he could not deny himself: but he would have denied himself if he acted against his own justice. Against this: Just as he himself is his own justice, so he himself is his own mercy which exalts itself above judgment: therefore, by exacting so heavy a reparation, he seems to go against his own mercy.

§ 3. Again, a judge is impious who exacts more in reparation than the guilty party can do: because he does not seek the amendment of the guilty party, but thirsts for his blood, since all justice seeks only to amend and save man. Therefore, if God exacts such a reparation that a mere man, or a man in the state into which he had fallen, could not provide, it seems that he did not exact it fittingly, but impiously, thirsting for the death of man. Therefore, since it is not lawful to believe this of God, it seems that a mere man could satisfy by himself: and thus another mode was possible for God.

§ 4. Or if you say that man was not in grace, and thus could do nothing pleasing. Against this is the fact that when a man does what he can, God immediately gives him grace: but there were many who did what they could, and had grace, and thus it was possible for all if they had prepared themselves. Therefore, it seems that God ought to have accepted what they were able to do.

§ 5. Again, in 1 John 5:3, it is said that his commandments are not heavy. And Jerome says that let him be anathema who says that God commanded impossibilities. Therefore, he never exacts from man such a mode of reparation that he could not fulfill unless God were man, as it seems.

Solution. Without prejudice, I say that another mode was possible, considering the power of God for whom nothing is unjust, as Anselm says, and nothing is impossible: but nevertheless on our part it was impossible for us to be redeemed except through God and man: not that I intend to say that if God had freed us we would not have been freed: but rather one must consider the power of liberation on the part of God, and on our part, and on the part of both together, namely of God and man. On the part of God, indeed, another mode was possible; on the part of man, however, another mode seems to me impossible. But if it is considered on the part of both, that is, our possibility related to God's power in which whatever he wills is done, there was indeed another possible mode, but none so convenient. For if it is asked, "Can a calf be made from a log?" we say no. But if it is asked, "Can God make a calf from a log?" we say yes.

With these things established, it is easy to answer the objections.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that to remit a fault unpunished is said in two ways. Namely, unpunished, that is, without any punishment: and this is impossible before the judgment of God, because, as Anselm says, the impious would be like the just before God, and sin would please God just as virtue does, which is impossible. Or, to remit sin without condign punishment: and this belongs to a judge seeking the amendment of the guilty party, and it would have been in this mode if God had pardoned man's sin without the death of the

240. Glossa Ordinaria, on Romans 5:19.

Son. For he had punished man in this life, and could punish him further in purgatory; and thus nothing unseemly on his part would follow from this.

§ To the next it must be said that "congruent" and "incongruent" are taken on our part, and not on the part of the judgment of God, to whom everything he does is congruent. Because even that which seems incongruent from contrary usage, if God were to do it, it would be most congruent. Hence, if he were to spare from condign punishment, it would be imputed to clemency, provided that justice were saved to the extent that the sin would remain punished by a penalty that amends, not suffocates, the guilty party.

§ To the next it must be said that I well concede that if possibility on our part is considered, as Anselm says, there will be no justice except one restoring what was taken away and satisfying the offense: and this could not be except through God and man, as Anselm and Ambrose say.

§ To the next it must be said that all those authorities speak of the possibility of congruence, and not of the power of God in itself.

§ To the next it must be said that predestination does not impose necessity, but causes immutability: and therefore nothing prohibits that another mode is still possible, if liberation is considered in general and in itself.

§ To the next it must be said that faith is concerning that which will not be otherwise than it is believed to be, but nevertheless it is possible to be otherwise: for faith and predestination indeed remove the act of immutability to the contrary, or to something other than what they are about, but they do not remove the potency of mutability: and therefore those arguments do not compel.

§ It is also necessary to solve the arguments for the opposite view: because according to my opinion, considering the power of satisfying on our part, no other mode was possible.

§ I say, therefore, to the first, that all those authorities speak of the power of God liberating, and not of the power of man who owes satisfaction.

§ But to what is objected through arguments, it must be said that it befitted the Son of God out of goodness to exhibit every sign of love to man which pertained to salvation, unless this were to result in an injury to justice or to the deity. But it was not an injury to the deity: because the deity neither suffered nor suffered with [humanity]; rather, the Son of God suffered in human nature: and in this it befitted the deity that there be exile and mortality.

§ To the next it must be said that God could have remitted the injury in another mode, but shame would have remained on the part of man, namely that man would have taken away what he did not restore. And if you ask, "Could God have taken away this shame?" I say without prejudice that he could indeed have taken away the reproach, but nevertheless he could not have changed the truth: because he would have acted against himself. For it was true concerning the past that man stole what he could not pay back by himself: and therefore it was most congruent for the most clement judge to make such a judgment that sin would be destroyed, and man, by giving as much or more than he stole, would be freed from both reproach and sin at the same time.

§ To the next it must be said that to exact more than a man can do is said in two ways. Namely, simply, and thus it sounds like extortion; or from the expenses of the judge, so that the guilty party might recover his original dignity. And thus to exact more than a mere man can do sounds of the mercy and goodness of the judge toward us: and this is what Psalm 110:9 says: The Lord has sent redemption to his people. For what he exacted beyond our powers was to the accumulation of our glory: because otherwise conscience, the witness of truth, would always say that we had stolen, and had not paid back God's honor.

§ To the next it must be said that a man, in whatever amount of grace he may be, provided he is a mere man, cannot satisfy for the sin which has abounded unto the whole world: and this has been sufficiently proved in the premises. Nor, however, according to the sayings of the Saints, do I believe that the grace of salvation was ever given to anyone after the first sin, except in the love and faith of the Only-begotten, who reconciled all. I do not say that it could not have been given, as far as God's power is concerned. And thus it is clear that his objection amounts to nothing.

§ To the next it must be said that the commandments are not heavy to one having charity: and this is because the Son of God lightened them for us by sustaining on our behalf what we ought to have sustained: because the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all ; and therefore it is now easy for us. Whence it can be said, as before, that he did not thus exact from us something impossible for us to our injury, but to our glory, since he himself gave his Only-begotten through whom what was previously impossible for us was made possible, although not impossible for God to whom nothing is difficult.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — What That Possibility Is, Of Which It Is Said That Another Mode Was Possible To God

What is that possibility of which it is said that another mode was possible for God?

Secondly, it is asked: What is that possibility of which it is said that another mode was possible for God?

But it seems that there is none: because § 1. The power of God cannot be except according to the most fitting congruence: therefore, God can do nothing that he cannot do congruently.

§ 2. Again, the power of God is not related to a work except according to the order of pre-ordaining wisdom, because otherwise God would act precipitately. But the wisdom of God had pre-ordained this mode: therefore, another mode was not possible for God, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, let it be granted that the power of God is with respect to this, as was evident in the effect, it would be changed from work to work. Since therefore this is a kind of change, and God is utterly immutable: it seems that if the power of God was concerning this mode, it could not have been concerning another.

242. Glossa Ordinaria, on Hebrews 2:10.

ON THE CONTRARY: God does not act by necessity of nature, as natural potency and power do, but he acts by freedom of the will. But whatever the freedom of the will does, it can do, and not do, and do in another mode. Therefore, it seems that God could liberate in this mode, and not liberate, and liberate in another mode: because otherwise he himself would be less free in acting than we are, which is absurd.

Solution. It must be said that God's power is one and simple; nevertheless it can be considered in two ways. Namely, as executing the foresight and ordination of wisdom, and thus it seems that no other mode of our liberation was possible than what was foreseen by ordaining wisdom: but nevertheless another mode could have been foreseen, and then operating power would execute the other. It is considered otherwise according as it is antecedent to wisdom: for God can do things which he has not ordained himself to do through wisdom ordaining all things: and speaking of this power, another mode was possible: and the Saints mostly speak of this possibility.

§ To the first, therefore, it must be said that whatever God might do, by that very fact it would be most fitting with respect to the operator, because he himself would do it, as was said before. And if you object that Aristotle says that God can do evil things, it must be said that he took "evil things" there materially, that is, he can do that which is evil, which nevertheless would not be evil, but optimal by the very fact that God did it.

§ To the next it must be said that this argument proceeds concerning the power executing the order of foreseeing wisdom: and we are not speaking of this when we say that another mode of liberation was possible for God.

§ To the next it must be said that God's power is immutable: because if it were granted that it was concerning another mode, it would follow that it never was concerning this one. For although each of these is possible separately—"God's power is concerning this mode," and "God's power is concerning another mode"—nevertheless they are not compossible according to the relation to operating power: because otherwise God would change his work, which cannot be.

Articulus 3 — If Another Mode Of Liberation Was Possible, Whether Another Mode Of Redemption Was Also Possible

If another mode of liberation was possible, was another mode of redemption also possible?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, around the beginning: But there was no other more convenient mode for healing our misery, etc.

For there can be a doubt, although another mode of our liberation was possible, whether nevertheless another mode by which we might be redeemed was not possible. For this is proved thus:

243. Gregory the Great, Moralia in Iob.

§ 1. To redeem is to recover one's property by a just price or by war. But a just price could not be anything but equivalent to the offense and the damage. But, as was proved, the damage is the whole human nature lost, and whatever flowed down into a worse state within it, and all this that is of an inferior nature to man, as the Gloss on Romans 8:22 says upon the text: Every creature groans and travails in pain until now. The offense, moreover, was infinite, because it was against God. Therefore, the just price had to be an infinite good: and for this nothing was sufficient but God and man, who ought to pay as man, and could pay as God. Therefore, redemption could not be accomplished except through God and man.

§ 2. Again, if we speak of the redemption of war and by right: then, as is clear in the Text, it is just that the same one conquer who was conquered, and in the same thing, namely on a tree. Whence Ambrose in his hymn on the Passion: He himself then marked the wood, That he might undo the damages of the wood [246].

This, therefore, again could not be done justly, except through God and man: and thus another mode of our redemption was not possible.

§ 3. Again, let it be granted that we are redeemed by someone other than God, whether it be a man newly made from uncorrupted nature, or an incarnate Angel. To him, therefore, we are bound as to a redeemer: therefore, we will always be inferior to him. But man is a creature in such great dignity that he was subject to none but God alone: therefore, by that redemption he will not have been restored to his original dignity. Therefore, a perfect redemption is not accomplished by him.

§ 4. Again, God foresaw man as future in dignity equal to the Angels. If, therefore, an Angel had redeemed him, he would not be in equal dignity: therefore, God would be frustrated in his pre-ordination. Because all these things are impossible, it seems that another mode of our redemption was not possible.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. From an unjust possessor one ought not to redeem a pledge, but to vindicate it into one's power. But the devil unjustly possessed us, as will be said below in this same distinction. Therefore, one ought not to have redeemed man from him with such a price.

§ 2. Again, it is impious to say that the price of the world, namely Christ's blood and soul, were offered to the devil for the redemption of man. Since, therefore, no one held us except the devil, it seems that we are not redeemed from the devil, neither in this mode, nor in another mode.

Solution. Speaking without prejudice, I concede the first arguments: there was no other possible mode of our redemption except through the payment of such a price, unless "redemption" is taken broadly for "liberation." For there is only a twofold redemption. Namely, by right of war, and thus we are redeemed from the servitude of the devil by the victory of Christ. And by payment of a price, and thus we are not redeemed from the devil: for God forbid that Christ was offered to the devil for us, but rather to the Father; and we are released from the decree of the Father obliging us not to enter paradise unless there appeared in one such a great justice of humility that it would suffice for all, as was said above.

And through this the solution to the last objection is clear.

§ To the preceding objection it must be said that although the devil unjustly possessed us, and the price was not paid to the devil, nevertheless we were justly possessed, as that just sentence of the judge's justice held us in obligation, to whom also the price was paid in our redemption.

Articulus 4 — Whether, If Man Had Not Sinned, The Son Of God Would Have Been Incarnate

If man had not sinned, would the Son of God have become incarnate?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, around the beginning: For what so lifts up our minds, namely to love, etc.

§ 1. According to this, then, if man had not sinned, it seems that he would not have provoked us so much to his love. Whence in a certain sequence it is sung: O exceedingly blessed fault, by which nature is redeemed. God who created all things is born of a woman. As if to say: By the very fact that the fault was committed, God became man. Therefore, if man had not sinned, God would not have become incarnate.

§ 2. Again, in certain churches during the blessing of the Paschal candle it is sung: O happy fault, that merited to have such and so great a redeemer. Therefore it seems that if there were no fault, the Son of God would not have become incarnate.

§ 3. Again, on that text of the Apostle, Romans 8:28: We know that to them that love God, all things work together unto good, to such as, according to his purpose, are called to be saints, the Gloss says, "Even sins." Therefore, the sin of the universe ought to have worked together for the same good for the universe: but this is original sin, which all draw from Adam. Therefore, some good can be elicited from it: but this is not easily found except by Christ being incarnate. Therefore it seems that Christ would not have become incarnate if there had been no sin.

§ 4. Again, for what would he have become incarnate? For we would not then have needed a teacher, or a liberator, or a redeemer. Therefore it seems that if there had been no sin, he would not have aroused us to charity for him in the way that he did once the sin was committed.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Good is diffusive of itself and its being: therefore, it will belong to the best to diffuse itself in the best mode it can. But it cannot be diffused in us better than by becoming incarnate. Therefore it seems that he would have become incarnate even if there were no sin.

§ 2. Again, Anselm says that there are four generations belonging to the perfection of nature, without which generation is imperfect. Namely: from virgin earth, a virgin man; from a virgin man, a virgin woman; from a corrupt man and woman, an infant (not a virgin). There remained therefore the fourth mode: to produce a virgin from a virgin woman; otherwise the order of generation would not have been perfect. Therefore, since God's works are perfect, he would have fulfilled this order even if man had not sinned. But from a virgin none can be born except the Son of God, as Cassian says. Therefore the Son of God would have become incarnate, even if man had not sinned.

§ 3. Again, above it was proved through the words of the Saints that an Angel is not unifiable [to the Word], but man is. Since, therefore, no aptitude is created by God in vain, it was necessary for this aptitude to be fulfilled. Therefore it was necessary for God to become incarnate.

§ 4. Again, sin did not make our nature more similar and more unifiable with God than it was before sin. Since, therefore, it is more similar to God without sin than after sin, it seems it is also more unifiable: and thus it was more fitting for God to be united to it, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, the perfection of the universe consists in a circular dimension, as the Philosopher proves; and because nothing can be added to a circle, therefore the world is perfected with the greatest perfection of nature. Therefore, since similarly God's works are perfect, the last must be closed into the first so that a circle is made. But the first is God, and the last is man. Therefore God and man must be united. And this would happen even if man did not sin.

§ 6. Again, the greatest love communicates itself in the greatest mode. But it cannot do so more than by uniting itself. Therefore, since he has such love for man, he will unite himself to him. Therefore it seems also that he would unite himself to him, if he had not sinned.

Solution. It must be said that in this question the solution is uncertain. But as far as I am able to opine, I believe that the Son of God would have become man, even if there had never been a sin. Nor, however, would he have become an Angel, because an Angel is not unifiable by nature as man is, as we showed above. Nevertheless, I say this without asserting anything about it; but I believe that what I have said accords better with the piety of faith.

§ I say, therefore, to the first, that such expressions are extremely improper, as when a fault is called "blessed" and "happy": because it is not called blessed and happy in itself, but consequently. And although perhaps Christ's incarnation does not follow from the fault, nevertheless the great works of redemption through labor, passion, and death followed from the fault.

Through this the solution to the second is also clear.

§ To the next it must be said that sin does not work together unto good except accidentally, namely because someone sometimes rises again more fervent and more pleasing than when he fell, and is made more humble and cautious. But whether Christ's incarnation also followed [accidentally upon sin], I do not know; but this is certain, that redemption through his death followed. § To the next it must be said that he would have become incarnate for the showing of his extraordinary love, and so that he might prepare manifold delights for man,

246. Venantius Fortunatus, Pange lingua gloriosi proelium certaminis (often attributed to Ambrose in the Middle Ages).

when he would contemplate as a brother in the flesh him whom he has as the God of the universe.

§ But if we wish to maintain the contrary, which nevertheless does not seem right to me, we will say to the first objection to the contrary, that the good does not diffuse itself according to the order of nature, but according to the capacity of those who receive it. However, the union of the deity to the flesh does not fall within any capacity of nature or merit: and therefore it would not be necessary that he diffuse himself in that mode.

§ To the next it must be said that nature would have been complete without the ultimate mode in the being of nature, although not in the optimal being of grace. Nor is it necessary for God to make each thing in the optimal being in which he could make it if he wished; but it suffices that he make it as he wills, provided that he denies them nothing of their natural endowments.

§ To the next it must be said that that aptitude is not from nature, but from the grace of election, as was often held above: because that man, that he might be assumed into the unity of the Son of God, had this not by merits or by nature, but by grace.

§ To the next it must be said that although sin did not make nature deiform, nevertheless it made a redeemer necessary: and this necessity compelled the merciful God to become incarnate.

§ To the next it must be said that such an account of a circle is not necessary for perfection, but rather a circle of order: namely, that those things that issued forth from God as from a principle be ordered to God as to an end.

§ To the next it must be said that the showing of love in glorification was sufficient: because it was not necessary for God to show every mode of love, just as he does not do so now.

§ But to what is objected concerning predestination, it has a special solution, namely that predestination supposes the order of wisdom; and that wisdom foresaw the future fault, and therefore preordained a redeemer. But nevertheless the first view seems more probable to me.

Articulus 5 — What The Justice Is By Which The Devil Was Overcome, Whether Of The Redeemer Or Of The Redeemed

What is the justice by which the devil is overcome: whether that of the redeemer, or of the redeemed?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, around the middle: Thus by justice the devil is overcome, etc.

For there can be a doubt here: what is the justice by which the devil is overcome? For either this is the justice of the redeemed, or the justice of the redeemer. If it is in the first mode, since they did justice even before the incarnation of Christ, it seems that they ought to have been redeemed: just as it is said of Abraham in Romans 4:11, that Abraham received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the justice of faith [247]; Noah was a just and perfect man in his generations [248]; and so on of others. But if it is the justice of the redeemer, as seems to be said in the Text, then it seems that justice is not done: because it is not equitable that one who did not do justice should be freed through the justice of another.

Further it is asked: If there were, or had been, another mode, would it be unjust?

It seems not: because God can do nothing unjust.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The mode of power here is divided against the mode of justice. Therefore, if Christ had used the mode of power, it would not have been a just mode.

§ 2. Again, let it be posited that God had assumed our flesh, and yet had snatched us away by power. Then it seems the mode would have been more convenient: because then we would be bound to thanksgiving for the assumed nature, and yet he and we would come to the kingdom by a similar labor. Therefore, that would have been a more convenient mode, and binding us more to God.

§ 3. Again, in the judgment of man, fraud is not advantageous to anyone; therefore it ought not to acquire any right in the judgment of God. But it is clear that the devil fraudulently deceived man; therefore no right was acquired by him in man. Therefore it seems to have been a more unjust mode that he left man to him as if adjudicated to him, and wished to free him by justice, than if, by condemning the demon on account of the fraud, he had drawn man back into his own power.

Solution. It must be said that no mode can be just on the part of God [in the strict sense of owing a debt]: but on the part of man, justice is redemption in return for merits; and therefore a satisfactory punishment for the fault must be inflicted. Whence I say that the first is understood of the justice of the redeemer, which he pays for the redeemed.

§ To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the justice of the redeemer was exacted for this reason: so that there would be no obstacle in them. For the grace of the head does not flow out over the members unless there is a disposition in the members, as if they are receptive of grace. And thus both are exacted: one as preparing the subject, the other as liberating.

§ To the next it must be said that every mode would have been just for God, but not as convenient on the part of the redeemed man.

§ To the next it must be said that the mode of power is not divided against the mode of justice as opposed to it, but as not as congruent, not on God's part, but on our part, as was expounded earlier.

§ To the next it must be said that the fraud of the demons was not without the fault of the deceived man. And therefore, although it ought not to have been advantageous to the demons, nevertheless it ought to have been harmful to man; and therefore on that part it was necessary for the justice of the liberator to be set against the injustice of man.

Articulus 6 — Whether Only Original Or Actual Sin Is The Cause Why We Need A Redeemer, And Whether Each One Could By Himself Satisfy For Actual Sin

Whether only original sin or also actual sin is the cause why we need a redeemer? And, whether anyone could satisfy by himself for actual sin?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, around the middle: By a certain justice of God the human race was handed over into the power of the devil, etc.

For from this it seems that only original sin is the cause why we need a redeemer: and thus it seems that anyone could satisfy for himself for actual sin.

But this does not seem so: because § 1. A sin committed by oneself is greater than one contracted from another: therefore greater satisfaction is exacted for it. If, therefore, it was necessary for the justice of the redeemer to intervene for the other sin [i.e., original sin], much more ought this to be done for one's own sin. Therefore, a heavier sin is that which is punished with a heavier penalty in the delinquent; but actual sin is punished in the delinquent by the lack of the vision of God and by burning fire, whereas original sin is punished only by the lack of the vision of God. Therefore, if original sin exacts a redeemer, much more does actual sin.

§ 2. Again, this seems so from the authority of the Saints posited above, who say that remission is never granted to anyone, neither infant nor adult, except in the faith of the mediator. But it is clear that the faith of the mediator conjoins the justice of Christ with the justified. Therefore, without the justice of Christ, no sin is remitted.

§ 3. Again, if it is true what all the Saints and Doctors say in common, that the passion of Christ operates in all the sacraments: then it must be said that it also operates in penance. Since thereis remitted without the sacrament of penance, no sin was ever remitted: without the justice of the mediator in the passion, no sin was ever remitted.

§ 4. Moreover, Isaiah 53:6: All we like sheep have gone astray...: and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all therefore he laid on him actual iniquity as well.

§ 5. Moreover, the Gloss on Romans 3:25 says that the sins of those preceding were sustained by God, until they came to the showing of the justice of the one redeeming through Christ .

§ 6. Moreover, it is expressly written in the preceding distinction thus: In penance the punishment is diminished through Christ: for that punishment by which the Church binds penitents would not suffice, unless the merit of Christ, who paid for us, cooperated. Now, it is established that the Church obliges no one to temporal punishment for original sin. Therefore, we would not be able to make satisfaction for actual sin, unless the justice of Christ existed.

247. Rom. 4:11.

§ 7. Moreover, Anselm's reason is that we needed a redeemer: because offending God causes an infinite offense, just as He Himself is the infinite good: therefore, since God is offended in actual mortal sin, it seems by the same reason to demand a redeemer.

But against these things some object thus: § 1. Another mode was possible: therefore the justice of a redeemer is not necessarily required.

§ 2. Moreover, the ancient fathers would have had faith, hope, and charity, even if Christ had not been incarnated: therefore, since actual sin cannot stand together with such virtues, it would have been destroyed by the merit of faith and of the other virtues, even apart from the justice of the redeemer.

§ 3. Moreover, the power of grace for conquering sin is greater than the power of sin: therefore, if sin is able to infect the soul without the help of another, the power of the grace of the virtues will be able to expel sin without the help of another: therefore, without the grace and justice of a redeemer.

Solution. It must be said that one should consent to the first arguments: because the Saints say this, relying on that word of John 1:16: And of his fullness we all have received, and grace for grace . Mark 11:9: And those who went before and those who followed cried out, saying: Hosanna in the highest , not for original sin only, but also for all actual sins.

To the first, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that another mode was possible: but nevertheless, every mode that would not confer helping grace against sin from an alien justice was impossible: whether that would have been the justice of God, or of someone satisfying.

To the next it must be said that the faith of the ancients, and hope, and other goods, would have drawn their efficacy then from that other mode whatever it would have been: but because there was no other, therefore they drew efficacy from this one: just as if the sun were not the cause of day, there would be another luminary that would make the day: yet it would never be possible that the world would be illuminated from itself, but that it would have sufficient light from certain parts of itself, shining as gems do, or certain parts of fire: and in this way the justice of the merits of Christ shines in the virtues of the Saints, just as the sun in gems, which glow more brightly in the presence of the sun, but in its absence are darkened.

To the next it must be said that grace is more powerful: but it does not have any power to destroy what is in some respect infinite, unless joined to that which is in some respect infinite, as to the merit of Christ, which is the merit of God and man: and that sin is said to be able to infect without help, this is not a power [posse], but rather a failing [deficere]: for anything can fail on its own by the corruption of its conserving principles, but it cannot in this way profit out of itself.

248. Gen. 6:9.

Articulus 7 — Whether Sin Is Not Remitted Unless The God-Man Satisfies For Us

Is sin not remitted unless by the God-man satisfying for us?

Is sin not remitted unless by the God-man satisfying for us?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, A, around the middle: We were by nature children of wrath: namely nature, as it is depraved, etc.

For from this it seems that if someone's nature had not been depraved, that one could have made satisfaction for us: and this has frequently been disproved above: because this would be a pure creature, either corporeal or spiritual. If corporeal: then it would be lower than man: and then man would be redeemed, and consequently subjected to, something lower than himself: therefore through redemption he would not recover the dignity he had lost.

Moreover, according to this, the foreknowledge of God, which had preordained man to be made equal to the Angels, would be frustrated.

Moreover, according to this we would not have been redeemed by a just price, but by a lower one than what was taken away: because the whole human race was taken away from God, and only one body would be offered to God.

Moreover, according to this the infinite offense against God would not have been compensated: therefore in the work of redemption justice would not be preserved.

But if it had been a purely spiritual creature, like an Angel. On the contrary: The greatest of works with respect to difficulty is to offer oneself as a price through death: but an Angel is immortal: therefore he could not redeem.

Moreover, no Angel is so high that one pure man could not be preferred to him, and several equaled: since the blessed Virgin is preferred to all, and others can be assumed according to the ranks of Angels: therefore an Angel with all his grace is not worth a single man, and others are equivalent: therefore, all the better, no Angel could be offered for all men.

Moreover, since he is of finite goodness, he himself could not compensate for an infinite offense, nor exhibit to God the due honor for sin.

There are also other reasons for this which we posited above.

But if you say that it is a composite creature made of an Angel and a corporeal man, precisely the same inconveniences follow.

But if you say that it could have been pure God. On the contrary: God cannot merit: because to merit is before another, and it belongs to an inferior to merit: therefore God cannot satisfy by meriting.

Moreover, God owes no one, neither for Himself, nor for another: therefore He will not restore a debt for another.

Moreover, God is not a mean between man and God: therefore as a mediator He is not reconciling and satisfying.

Moreover, God in the case of man is the judge: therefore He cannot be the guilty party, or exhibit satisfaction in the place of the guilty party.

From these things, therefore, it is concluded that it is necessary that it be God and a creature: therefore either man, or someone other than man. If man, I have the proposition. If someone other than man: then someone will satisfy who ought not to satisfy: but this is not just: therefore it cannot be done before a supremely just God: therefore it is necessary that it be God and man.

Moreover, it is necessary for a mediator to have the nature of both extremes, even if he mediates only in one, as was held in the preceding distinction: but the one satisfying for us is a mediator: therefore it is necessary that he have the nature of both, namely of God, and of man: and this is what we intend.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Original sin was contracted through another: therefore satisfaction can be made through another: now it was not contracted through another who was God: therefore satisfaction can be made through another who is not God, as it seems.

§ 2. Moreover, it seems that God ought to have created another Adam, who would transfuse the justice of the redeemer into all, just as that one transfused injustice: because otherwise justice does not seem to profit all, just as guilt harmed all.

§ 3. Furthermore, what kind of justice is it that for a sin in which we never communicated either in acting or in willing, such great satisfaction is demanded that none could pay it unless he were God and man?

§ 4. Moreover, where is it proved that original sin is in man, such that it behooves him to have such a redeemer?

Solution. It must be said that one should stand by the first arguments, that sin is not remitted unless by the God-man satisfying for us, although another mode was possible.

Therefore, to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that original sin is contracted through another who is the principle of all: and therefore it is not resolved through another, unless he too is the principle of all: but it cannot be in the same way, because a nature that has two principles of the same rationale is monstrous; but Christ is the efficient principle according to his deity, and influencing according to his humanity by way of merit: and it could not be done by another, because he could not flow into the members, since in no way would he be the head of the mystical body, as has been said elsewhere.

To the next it must be said that if He had made another Adam, there would be two principles according to one mode of material generation: and yet he would not infuse grace: because grace can only be infused by one who is God and of infinite power, and according to which the man has grace without measure, which would not belong to anyone who was a pure man.

But if you object that according to this, if Adam had not sinned, he would not have infused the grace of innocence into his posterity, which is contrary to Anselm who says that just as he transfuses original sin, so if he had stood firm, he would have transfused original justice. To this I say that this would not have been from Adam, but from the fact that the conjunction of human nature to God would in no way have been interrupted by sin: and therefore from God there would always have been an influence of both lives, namely natural and of grace, into the soul and from the soul into the body. But after the interruption was made, the influx of grace could not be done in this way: but it was necessary that it be through the merit of satisfaction: and that merit would not flow into all by one who had the nature of a member only, and not of a head or principle.

To the next it must be said that although we did not communicate in the sin of Adam by actual will and proper action, nevertheless we communicate in his corrupt matter from the fact that we are born from him, and the corrupt matter corrupts the soul according to the infection of guilt, as is proved in Book II of the Sentences, concerning the transfusion of original sin.

To the next it must be said that express signs prove that we are in sin: now these signs are punishments unfitting for the dignity of human nature, such as irrationality in infancy, the weakness of nature, the war of the flesh against the spirit, concupiscence, ignorance, error, and the like, by which no reason says God would have punished man except for sin.

Divisio Textus

Christ therefore the priest, and the same the victim, etc. Here begins that part which is about the work of the passion, in which the principal merit of Christ consists.

And it has two parts: in the first of which the Master determines the oblation and handing over of Christ, how it was done by the Father Himself, by Judas, by the Jews, and by the Gentiles.

In the second he shows whether it was good or not, there, D, The passion of Christ therefore is also called the work of the Jews, etc.

Articulus 8 — Whether, Just As Man Deserved To Be Assailed On Account Of Consent, So The Devil On Account Of Fraud And Lying

Whether, just as man deserved to be invaded for his consent, so the devil for his fraud and lying?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, A, around the middle: For when he abandoned the sinner, the author of sin immediately invaded, etc.

It seems that both ought to have been invaded by a third: for just as man deserved to be invaded for his consent, so the devil for his fraud and lying, and much more so.

To this it must be said that the sentence of the condemning judge invaded both: but nevertheless by that right man ought to have passed into the power of the devil: because he handed himself over to him willingly, permitting himself to be deceived where he could easily have avoided deception: and this is what he intends.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Mode Of Human Liberation Is Founded Upon Utility Or Necessity

Whether the mode of human liberation is founded upon utility, or necessity?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says, A, around the end. Therefore He did not want to conquer by power, etc.

For here he implies that such a mode of liberation was not necessary, but useful to man, which seems to be contrary to the sayings of Anselm, and also contrary to what was proved above.

To which it must be said that, as Cicero says in the book On Friendship, although true friendship is founded upon love, and not upon utility, nevertheless it has very many annexed utilities . So I say in the present case, that although the necessity of the liberator is not founded upon utility, but upon necessity (either in this or another mode), nevertheless it has very many annexed utilities, part of which the Master touches upon here from the words of Augustine, and certain others he does not touch upon. But it is impossible to touch upon all of them: especially since there are annexed utilities concerning four things, namely so that we might have a love of justice, not of power: so that we might receive the example of His humility, so that we might observe the doctrine of faith and the prudence of His preaching, and so that we might be strengthened in faith by miracles more than by demonstrations.

Now, the utilities of the passion the Master follows up below in the subsequent part.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Passion Of Christ Effected Salvation For The Predestined Only

Whether Christ's passion effected salvation for the predestined only?

Whether Christ's passion effected salvation for the predestined only?

A doubt arises first concerning that which he says, there, C, around the beginning: It effected salvation for the predestined only.

§ 1. For the predestined would have had salvation, even if He Himself had not suffered: therefore it seems that He suffered in vain for them.

§ 2. Moreover, it seems false: because there are many not predestined who receive present justice unto the remission of sins: and this they cannot do without the power of the sacraments, in which the power of Christ's passion operates: therefore even for the non-predestined His passion is efficiently availing, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that it efficiently avails only the predestined, but sufficiently it avails all: such that "efficiently" designates the attainment of grace and glory, for the sake of which there was grace: for it was not only for the sake of grace, but also for the sake of glory: and therefore it does not effect the whole effect in those in whom it avails for grace in the present only: and by this the solution to the second is clear.

To the first, however, it must be said that it was also predestined that they should be liberated in no other mode than through the passion of Christ: and therefore the passion was necessary. Or it can be said that even by those things which are done in time, such as the prayers of the faithful, predestination is helped, not on the part of the one predestining, but on the part of the effect of predestination, which is the positing of grace.

Articulus 11 — Whether And How Christ Was Handed Over To Death By The Father, And By Others Who Consented To His Death

Whether and how Christ was handed over to death by the Father, and by the others who consented to His death?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says: Concerning which it is also read, that he was handed over by the Father, etc.

§ 1. For if to hand over (tradere) is to give unto death: then it seems that to hand over implies the action of killing Christ: and thus it does not apply to the Father and to Christ. But if to hand over is to pay the price to the Father through death: then it seems that it applies solely to Christ, and not to the Father: and thus what he says here seems false.

§ 2. Moreover, the Apostle, Romans 8:32: He who did not spare even His own Son, but handed Him over for us all . Therefore the Father handed the Son over to death: which seems to imply cruelty of the Father toward the Son. Therefore the question returns again, that it might be said, according to what differing mode this handing over applies to all those who in the Letter are said to hand over Christ.

To which it must be said that to hand over is to give to death as it is taken here. Now, to hand over is twofold, namely as a gift is given: and as an exhibition is given for something else which is not a gift, because it is not of the giver, but is given in another mode. In the first mode the Father handed over the Son unto death, as a gift in which man is reconciled: and Christ handed Himself over unto death. But God the Father handed the Son over to man as a price which he might offer for himself: whereas the Son for man handed Himself over to the Father by making satisfaction for man through death. But the handing over which is an exhibition for the purpose of killing, applies to Judas as betrayer, to the Jews as instigators and accusers, and to the Gentiles as the executors of the ministry of iniquity.

To the first therefore it must be said that the Father handed the Son over unto the passion, but not to the action of killing: and acts of the soul do this, because they separate those things which according to nature are not separable. Whence, although to hand over is to will the Son to die, the Father willed the passion of the Son: but He never willed the action: but He permitted the wicked who willed it: and this is not cruelty, but supreme mercy, in that death could neither take the Son away from Him, nor make the Son inglorious before Him, and He could even restore others who had been taken away.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Passion Of Christ Can Be Said To Be Good And Evil From Diverse Circumstances

Whether the passion of Christ can be called good and bad from different circumstances?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, G, around the middle: For looking to the passion, they call it one work of theirs, etc.

It seems to be impossible: because § 1. In nature one matter cannot simultaneously have different and contrary forms: therefore also in motions one work cannot be informed by different and contrary circumstances.

§ 2. Moreover, according to this, one and the same thing would be the best and the worst: for the work of the Father and of Christ could only be the best, whereas the work of Judas and of the Jews could only be the worst in this deed.

Solution. It must be distinguished that there is the working work [opus operans] which is the operation itself, namely the action as it is from the agent, and in him as in a subject: and there is the worked work [opus operatum], namely the thing constituted and effected by the operation and action: and what the Master says is understood of the worked work, and not of the working work which was the worst. But concerning the same worked thing, different good and bad wills and operations can concur: for this is not unfitting, because the circumstances do not refer to the worked work, but to the working work: and therefore contrary forms are not posited in the same thing.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Passion Of Christ Is To Be Called Good

Should Christ's passion be called good?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says around the end, Whether it should be conceded that they worked something good there?

For it seems that Christ's passion should simply be called good: because every work of virtue is good: but the death of Christ was a work of Christ's fortitude and charity: therefore simply that passion should be said to be a certain good.

Moreover, what would be called simply good, if Christ's passion, from which all our good has emanated, were called good in some respect, but not simply good? Therefore it seems that one should not distinguish, as the Master says.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Passion is inflicted by another: but everything praiseworthy is from us, not from another: therefore Christ's passion from itself is not praiseworthy, as it seems.

§ 2. Moreover, it is both the work of the Jews that is the passion, and the work of Judas, and of the Gentiles: therefore it is the worst.

§ 3. Moreover, Boethius in the Topics: That of which the generation is good, its corruption is bad: but the generation of Christ in life was the best: therefore His death was the worst: therefore it should be called bad absolutely without distinction.

Solution. It must be said that the death of Christ absolutely and without distinction should be called the best for four reasons. One of which is, because it was the summit of a principal virtue, as of fortitude, which according to the Philosopher is a principal virtue: and maximally in Christ the summit of that virtue that one can attain is death: just as He Himself also says: Greater love than this no one has, that one lay down his soul for his friends .

Another reason was, because if precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His Saints , most precious is the death of Christ and full of price, as the Psalmist says: You will not give your holy one to see corruption. You have made known to me the paths of life: you will fill me with joy with your countenance: delights are at your right hand , that is, in your equity according to the deity, and in the more powerful goods according to the humanity, even unto the end.

The third cause is the utility of the entire redemption in the human race, as it is said, Hosea 13:14: O death, I will be your death! O hell, I will be your bite!

The fourth cause is the honorable cause of dying: for they placed above His head His cause written: Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews , that is, this is my cause of dying, that I am the savior flourishing with the grace and virtue of redemption, the king of those confessing and glorifying God.

To the first therefore it must be said that the Master does not order us to distinguish in this, whether the death of Christ is good or bad: but in this, whether the Jews worked anything good or bad. And in this it must be distinguished according to the aforesaid mode concerning the working work, and thus they worked nothing good: and concerning the worked good, and thus beyond their intention they worked something good.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the passion insofar as it is from another is not a work of virtue, but insofar as it was undertaken with the will of sustaining it for the sake of the good: and thus to sustain is from us, and not from the one killing.

To the next it must be said that the solution is clear through what was said before concerning the working work, and the worked work.

To the next it must be said that Boethius does not intend that death in itself is bad, but insofar as it deprives the good which is acquired in generation toward being and life: and thus it refers to the intention of the Jews who desired to take away and extinguish life from Christ: yet in itself it is good which was the cause of such great goods.

DISTINCTIO XXI

Divisio Textus

After the aforesaid it must be considered, Whether in the death of Christ the soul was separated from the Word, etc. Here begins that part which is about the questions following the passion: and they are two according to the two distinctions introduced here. The first is about the mode of death: and the second is, Whether in the three days of death He was a man, or somewhere, or everywhere? and this begins there, Dist. XXII, A, Here it is asked, Whether in that three-day period of death Christ was a man?

In the first part there are three things, namely the solution to a certain objection proving that by the separation of the deity and the soul Christ was dead: and for this the first chapter is introduced. The second is the solution of the authorities of Augustine and Athanasius. And for this the two subsequent chapters are introduced, there, B, Some also rely on authority, etc. The third is, how Christ laid down His soul and took it up again: and this begins there, C, Just as Augustine teaches on John, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Deity Was Separated From The Body In The Three Days

Whether the deity was separated from the body during the three days [triduum]?

Now a doubt arises concerning the first objection, whether it concludes or not?

It is this: The soul is the medium by which the deity is conjoined to the flesh: but with the medium dissolved, the extremes are not conjoined, because the cause of the conjunction is lacking: therefore, with the soul separated from the flesh, the deity is also separated.

Now it seems that this argumentation holds:

§ 1. For either God is unitable to an irrational creature, or not. If not, then I have the proposition, that when the rational no longer existed it was not united, and that the rational soul is not only a medium of congruency, but a medium of cause. But if He is unitable to an irrational creature: this has been disproved above by many arguments in the question concerning the unitable. Therefore it seems that this conclusion follows.

§ 2. Moreover, below in this same distinction it is said that if the Son of God had died, the fount of life would have dried up. From this I infer two conclusions: the first of which is, that the Son of God did not die: but if He had been united to the flesh, because of the union He would be said to have died, just as He is also said to be born: therefore at that time He was not united to the flesh.

§ 3. Moreover, every union makes something one: if therefore the deity was united to the flesh, it would behoove it to make something one: but it does not make one of person, because that flesh was never the Son of God: therefore it is left that it makes one of nature: and thus the flesh and the deity would be one, which is false.

§ 4. The second conclusion is, that if the deity is the fount of life, and more efficacious than the soul, then it would have infused life: therefore the body of Christ would have lived in those three days, which is false: therefore it seems that the deity was not united to the body.

§ 5. Moreover, the union through glory to God in the blessed is lesser than the union of natures in Christ: if therefore it is impossible for the Saints on account of their union to glory to be separated from life, much more impossible was it for the body to be separated from life, if it was united to the deity: but it was separated from life: therefore it was not united to the deity.

§ 6. Moreover, by a lower union than that by which it is united to the man Christ, the deity is not conjoinable except to a rational creature, and not according to the body, but according to the soul alone: now this is the union through grace: therefore much less by a more worthy union was it conjoinable to a body without a soul.

§ 7. Moreover, God is said to be in things in three ways by Innocent, namely essentially, presentially, and potentially in all things: but by grace in rational things, not in all things: and by union in the man Christ. Since therefore the body falls into the number of irrational things, it seems the deity was not in the body except presentially, potentially, and essentially.

On the contrary, however, is what the Master says in the Letter.

Solution. It must be said that in no way was the deity separated from the body during the three days: for the bond of the grace of union was inseparably stronger than the bond of the natural conjunction of soul and body: and therefore when the natural bond was dissolved, the bond of grace remained.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that even if the soul creates assumptibility in the body, namely, as was determined above, and in this respect is the medium causing the property of assumptibility, nevertheless it is not a medium except by congruency: and therefore when it is dissolved, it is not necessary to dissolve the deity from the flesh.

To the next it must be said that the deity is the fount of life efficiently, not as a conjoined form: and although it was united, and the Son of God was united to the body, nevertheless the deity is not said to have suffered or died: because the properties of one nature are not referred to the other nature: but I well concede that the Son of God is said to have suffered and died because of the union: the reason for which has frequently been determined above.

To the next it must be said that union makes one not of nature, but of person: but the union of one [part] does not make this one, but rather the union of one with the other owed to it united. Whence the union of the body with the union of the soul to be united to it makes one of supposit and person: and during the three days the order to that one remained, even though at that time that one did not exist: because at that time Christ was not a man.

To the other conclusion it must be said that the deity is the fount of life effectively, not formally, nor was it in the body as a form in matter, nor as a soul in an animated thing, but by a dignifying union, as St. Bernard says: and the deity being in something in this way is not the necessary cause of life, not from its own defect, but from the defect of the receiver.

To the next it must be said that the union of the blessed to God is lesser than the union of this body was to God: but nevertheless that one is more contrary to death than this one is: because that one, from the rationale of beatitude, has a contrariety to misery, and consequently to death: whereas this one does not remove misery from the body, nor is it contrary to such a defect, as was shown above: and therefore that lesser one does something which this one cannot do.
