as that water is absorbed by the wine. But that the uniting power might be signified, the species of bread is assumed, which strengthens the heart of man, and consequently binds the members with the head. However, when all these reasons are united, one having vigor is effected from all. § 40. I say therefore to the first, that one thing in which there are two, can well be terminated at two things responding to it. But in the lamb there was indeed the eating of flesh and the oblation of blood, and the smearing of the doorposts and lintels: and therefore two things succeed: one responding to the eating of flesh, and the other responding to the drinking of blood. § 41. To the next it must be said, that it is well conceded, that nothing responds to those things in the substantials of this sacrament, but rather in the circumstances of the receivers: just as it is that unleavened bread signifies purity, sincerity and truth, and wild lettuces the bitterness of penance for sins committed. § 42. To the next it must be said, that other sacraments do not so have to signify the mode of union, which is fulfilled in two, as this one does, and therefore they are not handed down in a double species. § 43. To the next it must be said, that this is not the only cause, because we are twofold: but together with this because Christ is corporeally and spiritually joined to us through himself: but in others he is not joined to us, except in one way, namely spiritually through grace: and therefore since here there is both conjunction, namely of body, and of soul, therefore there had to be a double species in the matter of the sacrament. § 44. To the last it must be said, that although the whole Christ is under either species, yet he is whole from the power of the sacrament: since therefore very much utility has been shown in the dictated causes, it was necessary that from the power of the sacrament it should be had under a double species in the sacrament.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Master Says Well That Wine Produces Blood, In Which The Seat Of The Soul Is Said By The Physicists

Whether the Master well says, that wine works blood, in which the seat of the soul is said to be by the Physicists?

Whether the Master well says, that wine works blood, in which the seat of the soul is said to be by the Physicists? § 47. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the Letter, there, B, near the beginning: "Because wine works blood," etc. § 48. For this seems false according to the Physicists [Natural Philosophers], whom he nevertheless adduces in the Letter as witnesses. § 49. For either the soul is compared to the body as an act, or form, or perfection: or it is compared to it as a mover and principle of works. If in the first way: then what he says cannot be: because thus it is whole in the whole, as Augustine says. For if there were something of the body, in which it were not whole, it would be necessary that there be something of matter not perfected by a form: but of every substantial form this is proper, that it be whole in the whole, just as lapideity [stone-ness] in a stone, and igneity [fire-ness] in fire, and so of others. § 50. If perhaps you say, that this is not true except of homogeneous wholes, and not of heterogeneous wholes: because humanity is in the whole, and not in the parts: this does not stand in the way, because it is one thing to say that it is whole in the whole, and another to say that it is whole in the parts. And the first belongs to every substantial form: but the second does not, but belongs only to the soul: because Augustine says that it is whole in any part of the body. But it seems, that in this way it does not have its seat in the blood, but in the whole. § 51. Also, Blood is not a part of man, or of another animal, except in potency only: therefore it is not an animated part except in potency only: but the seat of the soul is more in that which is actually animated, than in that which is only in potency: therefore the seat of the soul, by the fact that it is actually animated, is more in the heart or in the brain, than in the blood. § 52. But if the soul is compared to the body, as mover and principle of works: it is still false, and more than before: for natural motions, as the Physicists say, proceed from the liver, and vital ones from the heart, but animal ones from the brain: therefore it sits in these members, when it moves, and not in the blood. § 53. Moreover, The Physicists say, that the seat of the soul is in the heart, and not in the blood: therefore he seems to speak falsely in the Letter. § 54. Solution. It must be said, that in truth the authority of Moses and of the Lord is greater, than that of all the Physicists: therefore without doubt the seat of the soul is in the blood. But this is to be understood in three ways: by which it is verified without contradiction. In one way: because "seat" signifies the first permanence of firmness of the soul in the body: and then animal motions are founded in vital ones, and vital ones are founded in natural ones: but since natural ones are to generate, to augment, and to use nourishment, the nutritive [power] subserves the prior two: and therefore they are founded in it: and thus consequently all in the nutritive. But the nutritive does not locate the others immovably in the body, except through nourishment, because from it is received augmentation, and the seed of generation, and from the evaporation of its spirit in the heart vital and pulsatile [spirits] are generated, and further animal spirits in the head. But it is certain, that the ultimate nourishment which is among the veins, is blood in those having blood, or a similar humor in those not having it: therefore the nutritive is founded in blood, and consequently the others. In a second way it is understood that the seat of the soul is in the blood, as in that which is in potency the whole body in which the soul is. But this is not flesh, nor bone: and therefore since it is whole in the whole, this seems to be more appropriated to it by reason of blood than of another part. In a third way it can be understood on account of the heart, in which according to Aristotle in the books on Animals, blood is first generated, and especially the operation of life proceeding from the soul into the body through the blood generated there. But yet Galen contradicts this: and that contradiction is to be reduced to concord elsewhere: because it does not pertain to the present treatise. § 55. But through the things dictated the solution to the whole is clear: because it is neither understood insofar as the soul is compared to the body, as form: nor insofar as it is compared, as mover to it: but rather insofar as it remains in it through the operation of blood.

Articulus 4 — Whether Under Both Species The Whole Christ Is Taken

Whether under either species the whole Christ is received?

Whether under either species the whole Christ is received? § 58. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, near the middle: "Under either species however the whole Christ is received," etc. § 59. 1. For from this it seems to follow, that something is converted into the deity: for since the whole Christ is there, and not except by the power of the sacrament, it seems that something of the matter passes into the body, and something into the soul, and something into the deity. § 60. 2. Also, This seems to be gathered from what was previously held in the Letter, namely, that the same bread is in the sacrament which descended from heaven. But it is certain, as Ambrose says, that the flesh of Christ did not descend from heaven: therefore it is necessary, that by the power of something existing in the sacrament transubstantiated into the deity, the deity is there. § 61. 3. Also, This seems [proven] by reason: because this food is confected for this purpose, that it be spiritual food: but spiritual food cannot be except in the truth of the deity: therefore it seems, that the intention of the consecrator is specially directed to this, that the deity be there: but that is caused in the sacrament upon which the intention of the Church, or of the minister in the person of the Church, is directed: therefore it seems, that the deity is caused in the sacrament. But if this is conceded, a very great absurdity follows: because the deity in some way will have a cause, which is most absurd. But that this follows, is clear from this, that the sacrament is the cause of every reality which it contains. § 62. 4. Also, It follows that there is some mutation in which nothing is common to that from which it is mutated, and into which [it is mutated]: because the deity has no commonality, neither of primary genus, nor of proximate [genus], nor of matter: but this is impossible: therefore nothing is mutated into the deity. § 63. 5. Also, Just as the deity does not begin to be, so there is no place where it begins to be: but the reality of the sacrament begins to be on the altar: therefore the deity is not the reality of the sacrament. § 64. Solution. Without any doubt it must be said, that nothing is converted into the deity: but since there are three proper things of the body of Christ, namely that it is mixed from humors containing them in itself: and it is an essential and natural part of the composite man or hypostasis, whose natural perfection is the rational soul: and that it is united to the deity in the singularity of the person. I say that in the transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ, the blood of Christ is in the body, not by the power of the sacrament, but by the power of the connection from which the body is: and the soul of Christ by the power of the composition of the hypostasis: and the divinity of Christ by the power of the union made in the singularity of the divine person. Similarly when wine is transubstantiated into blood, the body is there as connected to and containing its blood by nature: and the soul as the perfection of the body: and the deity by the power of the union made in the body according to the singularity of the divine person. § 65. To the first therefore it must be said, that the whole Christ is there by the power of the sacrament, just as something is said to be done by the power of something, which operates one thing to which others are conjoined: and not so that the power of the sacrament extends itself immediately to all those things, which are said to be in the sacrament. § 66. To the next it must be said, that that bread descended from heaven by reason of the person, and not of the human nature: and the same person is in the sacrament, and the power of the sacrament does not immediately extend itself over the person: and nothing else can be had from that authority. § 67. To the next it must be said, that there is an intention which is the end of the work, and an intention which is the end of him who effects the sacrament: the intention which is the end of the work, is not properly called intention, but the terminus of the work: and that [terminus] in the Church is not that by the power of the sacrament the whole Christ be on the altar, so that the power of the sacrament operates the whole which is in him: but the intention of the Church is, that in the power of the sacrament there be the body, or the blood: but by the power of the natural mixture or union to the soul, or of the gratuitous union to the deity, the other things which are in the person of Christ are there. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether It Is Well Said That This Sacrament Ought Not To Be Repeated

Whether it is well said, that this sacrament ought not to be iterated? § 70. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, toward the end: "Neither ought the sacrament to be iterated," etc. § 71. For this seems false through what the Lord says, "Do this in commemoration of me." And the Apostle: "Do this... as often as you shall drink, in commemoration of me." Therefore it is iterated many times. § 72. 2. If perhaps you say, that it is not the same, this seems false. For either the identity of the sacrament is attended to according to the matter, or according to the form, or according to the content. Not according to the matter, or the form: because both have plurality in the sacrament. § 73. 3. Moreover, In the Letter it is here said, that the sacrament is said to be one and the same, because under either species one and the same thing is received: therefore the identity is according to the content: but the content frequented is the same: therefore the same sacrament is repeated, as it seems. § 74. 4. Also, If the reality of the sacrament of baptism which is the reality and sacrament of baptism, were repeated, the sacrament would be said to be iterated: therefore by a similar reasoning with this sacrament the reality which is at once reality and sacrament is iterated frequently, the sacrament seems to be iterated: therefore what is said in the Letter is not true. § 75. Solution. It must be said that below the Master touches upon the iteration of sacraments at the end of the treatise on Penance: but as much as pertains to this treatise, it must be said that a sacrament for many causes is said to be iterated, or not iterated. In one way: because the cause is not iterated, as in baptism, because there the cause is original [sin], which is not iterated, for the deletion of which baptism is ordained. In another way: because that which is the reality of the sacrament is not iterated, by the fact that once received it wholely attains its effect, which is in itself, unless there is an impediment on the part of fiction [i.e., insincerity]: and this also does not impede the character, except on the part of the subject susceptible of that which the character has to effect; and therefore when fiction recedes the character operates the grace for the operating of which it had been impressed. In another way a sacrament is said not to be iterated not because it is not received more often, but because its form is not iterated over the numerically same [matter]: and thus it is said here: because if this is iterated, it would be signified that the form once proffered was not efficacious. § 76. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that the same thing is received many times: but the form is not repeated over the same species once received: and in this way it is not repeated. § 77. To the next it must be said, that the sacrament is the same in species and in number on the part of the contained reality: but by reason of it the iteration of the sacrament is not denied here: but it is not numerically the same on the part of the matter and the accidents which are signs in the sacrament, and by reason of those since the form is not repeated over the same thing, this sacrament is denied to be iterated. § 78. To the next it must be said, that here it is said to be one from the one relation of the species of body and of wine to the content with them, and not by reason of the content considered absolutely. And therefore with such signs materially multiplied the repetition of the sacrament is materially multiplied, although the signs are always the same in species, and in every consecration. § 79. To the next it must be said, that baptism is said not to be iterated in one way, and this sacrament in another way, as has already been held for this sacrament is celebrated by one man, and more often, and received more often: but that one not. Hence that one is said not to be iterated in one way, and this one in another way. § 80. Then follows, etc.

Articulus 6 — Why This Sacrament Is Given Under The Species Of Bread And Wine

Why is this sacrament given under the species of bread and wine? § 83. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, "But water must be admixed," etc. § 84. And there are five things to be asked here. § 85. For since it has been held above why he gave his body under another species, and again why he gave it under a double species, it now remains first to be asked, Why under the species of bread and wine? Secondly, Why under the species of wheat bread and not of another grain? Thirdly, Whether it ought to be confected in unleavened or fermented [bread] on account of the controversy of the Greeks? Fourthly, concerning the admixture of water. Fifthly and lastly, concerning the admixture of the species remaining with other bodies: as if a drop of blood were poured into a cask, or another liquor, how long would the body of Christ remain there, or whether it would be converted into it, or not? § 86. But to the first of these it is objected thus: § 87. 1. In many figures this sacrament was prefigured, as was held in the beginning of this treatise: therefore by the same reason by which the species of one figure is chosen, by the same reason another was to be chosen: but manna was in the species of bread, and the paschal lamb in the species of flesh: therefore the species of flesh which is more fitting ought rather to have been chosen, than the species of manna which is less fitting, since the matter was to be chosen among the figures. § 88. 2. Also, As time grew, the manifestation of truth in figures and signs also grew.

as Master Hugh says: but in the natural law it was prefigured in the species of bread in the time of Abraham, and again afterwards before the law was received in the manna: therefore especially in the New Testament a matter ought to have been added, which would have a sign of greater fittingness: therefore it ought not to have been given in the form of bread.

§ 3. Also, flesh fits with flesh better than bread with flesh: because the fittingness of those things which are of the same genus is greater than that of those which are of diverse genera: therefore it would have been more fittingly handed over in the matter of flesh, than in the matter of bread, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, flesh is a more fitting nourishment for a well-disposed human being than bread, and especially some flesh: therefore it seems that it ought to be handed down in that species.

§ 5. Also, bread is not a universal nourishment, because there are many nations that do not use bread: and likewise infants: since therefore the matter of the sacrament ought to be universal, it seems that it ought not to have been handed down in the species of bread.

§ 6. Also, the food which nature prepares for every born human being fits every animal, such as milk, and it has in itself a threefold substance, as physicians say, namely butyric, caseous, and waxy: therefore since that nourishment is the most natural and the most fitting, it seems that it ought to have been handed down in the matter of milk, or cheese, or butter.

§ 7. Also, since it has in itself all sweetness of taste, as is said [448], it seems that it ought not to be in the species of one food, but of many.

§ 8. Also, it is read concerning the manna, that it was in the taste of oily bread: therefore something of fatness ought to be added in the matter of the Eucharist: therefore the matter ought not to be only bread, and wine.

In the same way an objection is raised concerning the wine:

§ 1. For a general drink is water common to all: therefore it seems that it ought to be the matter of the sacrament.

§ 2. Also, since blood flowed with water from the side of Christ, it seems that blood and water ought to be the matter, and not wine.

§ 3. Moreover, this sacrament is given for the cure of sin, and is given to the sick still existing on the way: but wine is not given to the sick: therefore it ought not to be the matter of the sacrament.

Solution. It must be said that many causes of fittingness are assigned by the Masters, why this sacrament ought to be confected from bread and wine: and we will not touch upon all those causes in solving the objections, so that prolixity may be avoided. But it must be understood, that one alone is compelling, namely because the Lord gave it in such matter, and instituted that it be frequented: for if He had given and instituted it in another, it would be done in another, and not in this one.

It must therefore be said to the first, that as to many things which are in this sacrament, it was prefigured in diverse figures: and this division was held earlier: but this does not contribute to the fact that the matter is according to them, but rather the institution, as was said. But there could not be a greater fittingness of institution than that which belongs to this matter over another: and that fittingness is principally attended to in three things, of which one is the confection of that food: namely because bread is out of many purified grains, and wine flows together out of many grapes: and from this comes the fittingness of the true body to the mystical body. For the true body is composed of many similar and dissimilar, most pure members: and the blood of Christ flowed out of the many members of Christ. But the mystical body is composed of many most pure faithful: and the blood signifies the redemption of souls from diverse dangers, and not from one: and this is the principal cause.

The second cause of fittingness: because bread is a more general food, which is given to the sick and the healthy: and although wine is not given in a certain sickness, nevertheless from its effect it has a fittingness of signification, because it gladdens the heart, and according to the Philosopher it makes a man of good hope, and it is given to the sick who are already strengthened; and similarly the sacrament gladdens, and makes one of good hope: for because it so graciously communicates itself, we hope that it will give all things: and it is given, according to Augustine, to those strengthened with a good conscience who have already recovered from sickness.

The third was, because that food is the cleanest among those that are prepared by man, and wine the cleanest drink: and therefore again it has fittingness to the sacrament of maximal cleanness.

To what is objected afterwards, it must be said that the increase of signs is not attended to in the fact that the signs are in this and that other matter: which is clear, because the water of the Red Sea and of lustration was a sign of baptism, and yet baptism is in water: but it is attended to in the fact that the signs are more joined to the reality, and thus it was done in the New Testament.

To the next it must be said, that although flesh fits flesh more in genus, nevertheless accepting the proportion of the sign to the signified insofar as flesh is here taken as signified, it fits less: because here it is signified in the diversity of members, nerves, and muscles, yet all are assimilated into one shining-whiteness and taste of grace: and therefore on the part of the sign which is bread, it was necessary that the composition be such, as was also held before.

To the next it must be said, that although not all nations use bread, nevertheless it is a more general food for well-disposed human beings: because flesh inflames, as physicians say, but not bread when consumed with moderation.

Moreover, this is not the cause, but rather a greater fittingness with the reality contained under the sacrament, as was said.

To the next it must be said, that nature prepares this nourishment not for the strengthened, but for the feeble by age: but this sacrament, as Augustine says, is not given except to those strengthened with a good conscience: and therefore it ought not to have been confected in that matter.

To the next it must be said, that the diversity of taste refers to the diversity of grace in the content: because it contains Him who is the repository of all graces: and to this sufficiently responds the diversity of grains, out of which bread is confected. Or it may be said better, that although the diversity of graces is in this sacrament, nevertheless those graces tend to one, namely the highest good: but the tastes of diverse foods do not tend to one, but to diverse things: and therefore diverse foods are not the matter of this sacrament, but rather one food which is gathered from diverse things tending into one taste.

To the next it must be said, that the taste of oil in the manna belonged to imperfection: because in reality there was nothing, but it was only prefigured: but now the perfect sacrament is given: and therefore the fatness of the oil is wholly comprehended on the part of the reality: and therefore this sacrament by its perfection does not need seasoning.

448. Hebrews 2:14

To that which is further objected concerning the wine, it must be said that for the strengthened ones receiving good blood the better drink is wine, and not water: and therefore since this sacrament is given to such ones, the more fitting matter is wine.

To the next it must be said, that water distinct, and yet according to place conjoined, flowed out from the side of Christ: so that it might be signified not to be the matter, but only to be united to the matter of blood.

To the last, that in truth this sacrament is not given to the sick who are still subject to the disease of sin, but rather to those strengthened with a good conscience: and therefore that objection supposes a falsehood.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Sacrament Ought To Be Given Under The Species Of Bread And To Be Of Wheat; And, Whether Other Grains Can Be Admixed

Whether the sacrament ought to be given under the species of bread and from wheat? and, Whether other grains can be mixed in?

Secondly it is asked, why is it given under the species of bread from wheat, and of wine?

It seems, that it ought to have been bread of another grain: because § 1. Just as in baptism a common element was set down, so that poverty would excuse no one: so also in this it ought to have been, so that no one would be excused on account of poverty.

§ 2. Also, the Lord gave loaves to the crowd, and they were of barley: therefore since the Church ought to conform herself to the head, it seems that the sacrament ought to be confected in barley loaves.

§ 3. Also, this sacrament is consumed in memory of the Lord's passion: but to this memory a bristly and hard grain fits better than a delicate one: therefore it ought to have been confected more in barley which is a bristly and hard grain, than in wheat which is delicate.

§ 4. If perhaps it is said, that He did this for this reason, because the Lord compared Himself to a grain of wheat, saying: Unless a grain of wheat falling into the earth dies, etc., this seems to be nothing: because the Lord there said what fruits would rise up in the Church from His death, and not what ought to be done concerning the celebration of this sacrament.

§ 5. Also, there the Lord attends to the similitude of the sowing of a grain: but in the sacrament bread is made from the grain, and it is not sown for fruit: therefore it seems, that they do nothing to the proposition.

§ 6. If perhaps you say, that from this a more fitting nourishment is made. ON THE CONTRARY: Physicians say that flesh is quickly made from bread, and it does not adhere long to the members, but is easily consumed: since therefore that nourishment ought to remain unto eternal life, it seems that it has no fittingness.

§ 7. Also, soft things are of no benefit to wayfarers, because they are resolved into sweats, and evaporate through the heat aroused by motion, and are consumed: but hard things which are not converted by strong heat, nor easily consumed: since therefore this sacrament is of wayfarers, it seems that it ought to have been given in such matter: but this is not wheat, but rather rye, or another harder grain: therefore it seems, that the sacrament ought to have been given in rye bread.

§ 8. Also, if it ought to have been given in the matter of wheat, it seems that it ought to have been confected in the species of starch (amylum): and of it it is said by physicians, that a tenacious flesh is generated, and adhering long to the members.

Further it is asked concerning the mixture of other grains. For let us posit, that in a certain land no wheat is found, but only spelt, as is the case in many lands. And let it be asked, whether a confection can be made from the grain of spelt?

It seems, that not: because § 1. The Lord compared Himself only to a grain of wheat: therefore it can be confected from no other.

§ 2. Also, the Lord first consecrated His body in wheat bread: therefore it will be able to be consecrated from no other by any priest.

§ 3. Also, just as water received regenerative power by the touch of Christ's flesh, and baptism cannot be done in any other liquid: so it seems, that bread of wheat received power by the touch of the Lord, so that it cannot be done with another grain except from that: therefore it seems, that it cannot be done from spelt.

§ 4. If perhaps you say, that spelt and wheat are of one species: this is openly false: because neither are spelts of the same figure, nor do the grains have the same connatural earth: since therefore figure, although it is not a substantial species, nevertheless shows the species on the part of quantity: because we see that of those of the same species there is the same figure according to species, it seems that these grains are not of the same species.

§ 5. Also, it is said that the question devolved to the Apostolic See, and there it was judged that spelt was a species of barley: but it cannot be confected from barley: therefore neither from spelt.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Grains of spelt are scarcely distinguishable from grains of wheat in similitude of grain and color: therefore they are of the same species, or of close species: therefore it can be confected from one just as from the other.

§ 2. Also, it is said by all, that the Lord wished His body to be handed down in wheat for this reason, because the bread of that grain is more delicate and more fitting than of another: but bread of spelt is just as delicate and fitting or more so than of wheat: therefore it ought to be confected in spelt just as in wheat.

Further it is asked concerning the admixture of other grains with bread of wheat, whether a confection can be made from such a mixture? For example, I posit that to a modius of wheat is put a half modius of barley or rye, and bread is made from it, whether a consecration could be made from such bread?

It seems that yes: because § 1. Thus their admixture does not remove the species, as is clear: because if a grain of barley is put in a sack of wheat, it always remains a grain of barley: therefore even of that part which is of wheat, at least it seems a confection can be made.

§ 2. Also, let it even be given that it is admixed, there will be abundant wheat in such a mixture: therefore something passes into wheat: therefore of the whole it will be wheat: and thus there will be a confection from it just as from bread of wheat.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. By sight it is clear, that the color of wheaten bread is remitted, when a third or fourth part is rye: therefore it seems, that the species are also corrupted: but a consecration cannot be made except from wheat: therefore even from such mixed bread no consecration will be made.

§ 2. Also, the Philosopher says, that mixture is said to be the union of alterated miscibles: therefore the miscibles are alterated from their species: therefore in such a mixture the bread of wheat does not remain in its species, but is alterated: therefore since a confection is not made except from wheat, it seems that from such bread no confection of the body and blood will be made.

§ 3. Also, the body of the Lord has nothing in itself alien to itself: therefore also nothing in the figure ought to be made alien from the species of wheat: therefore it seems, that even if a little is added of another grain, the ratio of fittingness is destroyed.

Similarly it is objected, whether a confection can be made from corrupted bread?

It seems that not: because § 1. Nothing corrupted has a similitude with the body of the Lord: therefore a sign ought not to be made: but on the part of the matter the sign of the sacrament is taken: therefore on the part of the matter of the sacrament nothing corrupted ought to be taken.

§ 2. Also, a corrupted human being is not a human being: therefore corrupted bread is not bread: and it ought not to be made except from bread of wheat: therefore it ought not to be made from corrupted bread.

ON THE CONTRARY: We see hosts kept for a very long time by some to such an extent that even if bread in a larger quantity were kept so long, it would be entirely corrupted: and yet they confect from these hosts: therefore it seems, that corruption does not impede the confection.

SIMILARLY it is asked on the part of wine, whether a confection can be made from verjuice (agresta)?

It seems however, that yes: because § 1. It is from the grape: and from the species of the grape diverse species are not generated: therefore verjuice will be of the same species with wine: therefore just as from wine, so it can be confected from verjuice, as it seems.

§ 2. Similarly it is objected concerning vinegar: because the Philosopher says, that vinegar is not wine, nor can it return to wine on account of the corruption made in it: therefore it seems, that a confection cannot be made from vinegar.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that a confection cannot be made except from wheaten bread in its genus: and the causes are, because that grain affords a better and more noble nourishment: and especially because the Lord compared Himself to that grain.

To the first therefore which is objected against this, it must be said that it is not similar concerning baptism and the Eucharist: because baptism is a sacrament of necessity, but not the Eucharist, and therefore baptism ought to have been given to us in a general matter, but this in a matter which has greater fittingness with the signified reality.

To the next it must be said, that those loaves which the Lord gave signified the books of the old law, and not the Eucharist: and those have a hard bark in the letter, and sweetness in the spiritual understanding within: whence from those loaves nothing is proved.

To the next it must be said, that the Lord's passion ought not to be presented in the taste of the bread, because the Christ who suffered was of the best taste: but rather in the mode of preparation of the bread, as Hugh says in a certain epistle to Bernard, that that bread was baked by the fire of the passion on the cross, but formed by the hands of wisdom in the Virgin's womb: and therefore that objection does not proceed.

To the next it must be said, that the Lord attends to both in the grain, namely the confection, and in the falling into the earth the death: but the matter of the Eucharist has its force from Christ, who compared Himself to that grain and not to another.

To the next it must be said, that the very showing of His comparison to this grain and not another, shows the cause of the institution, which was done afterwards, when He gave His body in this bread, and not in another.

To the next it must be said, that this sacrament is the cause of love and perfection of those who are delicate in spiritual delights: and therefore although flesh is quickly consumed, nevertheless if it is guarded as it ought to be, it is not consumed: and this is fitting for spiritual food, which does not suffer with itself the heat of concupiscence proceeding from mortal sin: and also as a sign of this the manna when reserved putrefied.

To the next it must be said, that one must distinguish concerning the corporeal way, and the spiritual way: for corporeal heat from aroused motion resolves soft things, but in the spiritual way from devotion the spirit is strengthened and not resolved; and therefore it is not similar.

To the next it must be said, that starch has no similitude with the body: because something in it is disposed to putrefaction, whence it is made viscous and tenacious: and it ought not to have been confected in it.

Moreover, it would be incautious to confect in it on account of the liquefaction of humors.

To that which is further asked concerning the admixture of other grains, and especially of spelt, it must be said, that without a doubt wheat (frumentum) is a genus, and not a species of grain: and it has under itself common wheat (triticum), and spelt: whence spelt is wheat (frumentum), and the body of the Lord can be confected from it, just as from common wheat (triticum): and this is doubtful to no one considering grain with grain, and bread with bread: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the next it must be said, that the Lord constituted it in the species of common wheat (triticum) giving from it the power of the grain in every species of wheat (frumentum): and this is because in that land there is wheat (frumentum) according to the species of common wheat (triticum).

To the next it must be said, that it is not similar concerning water and bread: because baptism is a sacrament of necessity, and water is a general element: and thus it is not concerning common wheat (triticum) and the Eucharist, as was said earlier.

To the next it must be said, that spelt and common wheat (triticum) are not of one species, but of one proximate genus which is wheat (frumentum): and they are very neighboring species, and therefore they are distant by little in the formation of the ears, but they are distant by almost nothing in the form of the grains and the color, and the taste of the bread.

To the next it must be said, that I do not think the curia determined thus: and if it determined thus, this was out of ignorance of the grain of the matter of spelt.

To that which is further asked concerning mixture, it is light to solve: for it must be said, that if there is a mixture a confection is not made: because every mixture properly speaking dissolves the species of the mixed things: but if there is a certain small addition, so that the whole added thing is absorbed by the common wheat (triticum), then a confection can be made: but that absorption can be noted in this that the color, taste, odor, and the like remain entirely the same: as if the whole were wheat (frumentum).

To the first therefore which is objected concerning this, it must be said that of the grains while they remain whole, there is no mixing: but the Philosopher says, that subtle and humid things are miscible: and therefore milled grains even infused in dough would be mixed: whence that objection is worth nothing.

Item to the next it must be said, that mixture is not always according to equality of quantity, but according to the proportion of powers which are in the mixed things themselves: whence when the power of rye can alter the wheat (frumentum) outside the species of bread of wheat, then a confection is not made.

To that which is further asked concerning corrupted bread, it must be said that if it is corrupted from the species of bread, a confection cannot be made: but if it is only disposed to corruption, then it can be made: but those confecting sin unless a great necessity compels them. But this corruption is to be weighed in odor, taste, and color, and the dissolving of continuity: because if all these are changed, it cannot be confected in it: but if the signs are saved, although it is disposed to corruption, and not corrupted, it can be confected in it: and through this the solution to the whole that is objected against this is clear.

To that which is further objected concerning wine, it must be said that a confection of blood cannot be made from verjuice: because it does not yet have the species of wine.

To the object against it however it must be said, that it is not true, that that which has a disposition to the species, and that which has the complete species proceed from the same: because from the same wood proceeds the watery in the leaf, and the more acidic in the juice of the fruit: and therefore what is objected is not valid.

To the last it must be said, that as the Philosopher wishes in the Metaphysics, vinegar is not wine, nor can it become wine: and therefore a confection cannot be made from vinegar: but from acidic wine it can, because this is not vinegar, although it is not safe to confect even from acidic wine on account of reverence for the sacrament.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Confection Ought To Be Made In Unleavened Or In Leavened Bread

Whether confection ought to be made in unleavened or leavened?

Thirdly it is asked, whether consecration ought to be made in unleavened (azymo), or leavened?

It seems that in unleavened: § 1. For it is to be confected in such matter of bread, in which the Lord handed down His body: but He handed it down in unleavened: therefore it is to be consecrated in unleavened. The first is proved through itself. But the second is proved from the time: because the day of the Passover of the Jews was the seventeenth day of the first month, the Parasceve: and on the preceding night He handed down His body: but on the preceding night the passover was killed, and there was not leavened bread in the houses of the Jews. Therefore He Himself handed it down in unleavened. From this the proposition is thus held: but this is especially clear [449], where it is said, that for seven days there was not leavened bread in the houses of the Jews.

§ 2. Also, this is seen from all the Evangelists: for it is said On the first day of the azymes, the disciples came to Jesus, saying: Where do you wish us to prepare for you to eat the Passover? But Mark [450] says: On the first day of the azymes, when they immolated the passover, the disciples say to him, etc. Luke But the feast day of the azymes, the Passover, was approaching. And below, v. 7: But the day of the azymes came, on which it was necessary for the passover to be killed. John Therefore they lead Jesus from Caiaphas into the praetorium. But it was morning: and they themselves did not enter into the praetorium, so that they might not be contaminated, but that they might eat the Passover. But this was on the Parasceve which was the seventeenth day of the lunar month which the Jews use, and on the preceding night He had given the body. Therefore on the fourteenth day at evening. But nothing leavened was then in the houses of the Jews, as is proved [451]. Therefore He gave His body in unleavened: and therefore we ought to do thus.

§ 3. Also, Jesus did not come to loose the law, but to fulfill it: therefore He Himself did not loose the rite of the Passover, but fulfilled it: but the rite was to eat in unleavened: therefore He Himself handed down His body in unleavened.

§ 4. Also, the old passover was eaten in azymes: since therefore the new passover is continued to the old, immediately in the same genus of bread He began the new: therefore He gave it in azymes, and thus He wished it to be observed by us.

§ 5. Also, it is established that in the old law the azyme with which the paschal lamb was eaten had a mystical signification: but it signified nothing except sincerity and truth alien from all corruption. Since therefore that was greater in the new passover than in the old, the new ought to be celebrated more in azymes than the old.

§ 6. Also, it is written Therefore let us feast, not in the old leaven, nor in the leaven of malice and wickedness, but in the azymes of sincerity and truth. Therefore it is necessary that this signification be represented in something as in a sign on the part of the sacrament: but it cannot be represented except in an azyme: therefore it is to be confected in an azyme, and not in leavened.

§ 7. Also, the principal sacrament among the ancients was the Passover. If therefore the Lord had perverted its rite, it would be probable that those who objected to things lesser than it, would have also objected to that, provided they ate with Him in the houses: therefore it seems, that He handed it down in an azyme, because nothing of such things was ever objected to Him.

§ 8. Also, He observed other things of this sacrament, namely by eating the lamb, and at night. Therefore He also observed the azymes: because there is no reason why He would have changed one, and not another.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. It is said Jesus took bread, etc., and in Greek it is held ἄρτον, and this sounds as leavened bread: therefore it seems, that He handed down His body in leavened.

§ 2. Also, it is written Before the feast day of the Passover, Jesus knowing that His hour has come, etc. Therefore the supper was before the feast of the Passover: but then the Jews used leavened bread: therefore He handed it down in leavened.

§ 3. Also, since the Lord's immolation was represented by the oblation of the lamb, the Lord ought to have been offered at the time of the oblation of the lamb: but before He was offered, He Himself had eaten the passover with the disciples: therefore He Himself anticipated the due hour of the old passover: but then there was leavened bread in the houses of the Jews: therefore He Himself gave it in leavened, which He Himself found in the houses of the Jews.

§ 4. Also, we see that in some other sacraments He changed the rite of that nation, and wished it to be changed lest we seem to judaize: just as in the observation of the sabbath, and circumcision, and in others: therefore especially this change ought to have been made in the principal one, in which maximum hope was placed: but this was the sacrament of the passover: therefore He seems to have changed its rite: since therefore it was formerly handed down in azymes, now it seems it ought to be handed down in leavened.

449. Exod. XII, 19.

§ 5. Also, the observance of the legal things is wholly harmful: therefore especially in the observance of the principal sacrament: but the principal sacrament was the sacrament of the passover: therefore that ought to have been wholly changed: therefore also in the observation of the azymes.

§ 6. Also, in this sacrament four things are principally to be observed, namely the roasting of the lamb, the smearing of the doorposts with blood, the wild lettuces, and the azymes: but it seems that three of these have ceased: therefore also the fourth ought to have ceased, as it seems.

§ 7. Also, Pope Leo says, that on account of the insult of the Jews in antiquity, the whole Church statuted that it be confected in leavened, lest we seem to judaize: since therefore this was the custom of the Fathers, it seems that it is also to be observed by us.

Solution. It must be said, that it can be confected in both, namely in azyme and leavened, from the power of the words: but from congruence and right and without sin it cannot be confected, except in azyme: and therefore the Greeks sin against the congruence of the sacrament, and against right in consecrating: but saying that it cannot be confected in azyme, they do not know what they are saying: just as in many other things: because now it is not true what the Apostle says, that the Greeks seek wisdom, but rather they have lost wisdom and study: and therefore they are detained by foolish assertions.

To the first therefore it must be said, that ἄρτος is posited indifferently among the Greeks for azyme and leavened: and therefore in the Old Testament there is frequently found, 'unleavened breads' (panes azymos): and therefore the name sounds as nothing but breads, although the usage of speaking excepts in the word leavened breads, because many use that.

To the next it must be said, that before the feast is said before the first day of the Passover, which as is held [452], was the seventeenth lunar day of the first month: but, as is clear from the other Evangelists, the Lord handed down His body, and ate the passover not long before, but on the preceding night: and then it was the fourteenth day at evening: and then the precept under penalty of death was, that there not be leavened bread in the houses of the Jews: and therefore that proves nothing.

To the next it must be said, that the Lord was not immolated at the same time at which the lamb was immolated: because thus He would have been crucified on the fourteenth day at evening in the night: which is clear to be false: but rather He was fittingly immolated, so that He might signify the new to begin after the old, and the shadow of the Old Testament to be terminated at His passion.

To the next it must be said, that in those things which do not have their signification except on the part of themselves, the Lord imposed an end: just as we do not immolate a lamb, and other such things. But those things which signify what is always to be done, He did not change, such as the azymes, as is expressly held from the words of the Apostle [453].

450. Marc. XIV, 12.

To the next it must be said, that we do not observe it as legal, but rather as competent to the sacrament of the new law: just as we also use water in baptism, although they used the water of lustration.

To the next it must be said, that just as was already said, that is not taken as legal, which also before the law was figured in the oblation of Melchizedek, and, Gen.

where Sarah made unleavened bread baked under ashes but rather it is taken as new, congruing with the signified of the sacrament.

To the last point it must be said that this was done by temporal dispensation: just as baptism was also done in the name of Christ [for a time]: but when the mockery of the Jews ceased, and when the Church prevailed in virtues and strengths, it resumed the use of the first institution of the sacrament. But the more obstinate retained such rites of temporal dispensation. For as Pope Leo recounts, at first it was confected in unleavened bread: then, for the reason stated earlier, in leavened: third, again in unleavened: and then the Greeks began to argue to the contrary.

Articulus 9 — Whether Water Ought To Be Mixed With Wine, And How Much Water; And, How Those Who Omit It Sin

Whether water ought to be mixed with the wine, and how much water? And, how do those who omit it sin?

Fourth, it is inquired concerning the mixing of water.

For it seems that it ought not to be mixed, because: § 1. The Lord does not compare Himself to water: therefore, since that comparison gives congruence to wheat and wine being the matter, it seems that water has no congruence for the sacrament.

§ 2. Also, water is a tasteless element: but it is said that this sacrament has every delight and the sweetness of every taste therefore water has no congruence to it.

§ 3. Also, water is the matter of another sacrament, namely baptism: therefore, since there cannot be one matter for two sacraments, as is clear in each of the others, it seems that water ought to be neither the matter nor a part of the matter in the sacrament of the Eucharist.

§ 4. If perhaps you say that water signifies the people to be united to Christ, just as water is united to wine. To the contrary: nothing is joined to the bread, and yet it signifies the mystical body: therefore neither ought anything to have been joined to the wine, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, the wine, as is held from the Letter, flows together from diverse grapes: by which diversity of grapes it has the power to signify the diversity of the faithful: therefore, since it has in itself one thing by which it can represent the faithful or the people, there is no need for this to be done by another admixed element: therefore it is superfluous to add water.

§ 6. Also, what is the cause why an addition of another matter is not made to the bread, but is made to the wine? And it seems that there is none, because under each the whole Christ is present, as was held above: therefore if no addition is made in one part, it seems also that it ought not to be made in the other part.

Further it is inquired concerning the quantity of the added water: § 1. For since warm wine is vehemently active, it seems that a little wine should be put into much water: therefore it seems that it could be added beyond half.

§ 2. Also, when the wine is red, much water is poured into a little wine: since therefore color belongs to the dominant element, the wine will still seem to dominate in the mixture: therefore it seems that more than three or four parts of water can be added.

Further it is inquired concerning the species of water to be either taken or added: because some waters are sharp, such as lye, and the washings of metals, of which the Alchemists treat; and thin beer, and ptisan, and things of this kind are certain waters.

And it is inquired: Whether, with such things infused, the consecration still occurs?

And it seems that it does: because such water is called water, etc.: therefore it seems that the confection occurs with it.

But against this it is objected first concerning the infusion of water: § 1. For it is agreed that water simultaneously flowed with blood from the side of the Lord: therefore also in the sacrament it is not to be separated from the blood.

§ 2. Also, this blood washes, as is said: Behold the Lamb of God, etc. [454] And: They have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. [455] Therefore with the blood there ought to be an ablutive element: but this is water: therefore water ought to be poured out with the blood.

§ 3. Also, the waters... are peoples and nations, as is said. [456] But peoples and nations are redeemed by blood. Therefore water ought not to be separated from the blood of redemption: therefore water, which signifies the nations, ought not to be separated from the chalice.

§ 4. Also, Moses sprinkling the people mixed water with the blood since therefore this preceded in the sign, the same ought to follow in the truth of the sacrament of the new law: therefore water is to be admixed to the chalice.

Then it is inquired: How do those who omit it sin?

And it seems that they sin mortally: because § 1. They sin against a statute of the universal Church: but such a statute obligates everyone: therefore they sin mortally by coming against this.

Also, they do not show in a sign that the redemption of blood pertains to the people: since therefore this is by all means to be shown, it seems that he who does not do it sins gravely.

§ 2. Also, it is said [457] that he who celebrates the sacrament otherwise than it was instituted receives the sacrament unworthily: but he who does not add water celebrates otherwise than it was instituted: therefore he receives unworthily: but nothing makes a man unworthy of the sacrament except mortal sin: therefore he sins mortally by not adding water.

Further it seems that water is to be admixed in a small quantity:

§ 1. For it is said in the Letter that the water is to be absorbed by the wine: but this does not happen if the power of the water's action has some proportion to the active power in the wine: therefore it must be so little that it has no proportion to the active power of the wine: therefore it cannot be a third or a sixth, or a proportionally notable part to the senses.

§ 2. Also, since it is not added except as a sign, and that one drop signifies the whole people, just like the whole sea: it seems that it would be foolish to add much.

Further it is objected concerning the species of waters: for it is agreed that when art works with nature, namely through active and passive virtues in nature, it gives a species, although weak and not long-lasting, because otherwise there would be no works of alchemists: but some waters are made by art working through active and passive qualities in nature, as enumerated above: therefore in those there is some species of admixture: therefore since proper water is to be admixed, it seems that such waters are not to be admixed.

Solution. It must be said that without a doubt water ought to be admixed to the chalice. I also think in a small quantity: because in a small quantity there is no danger, but in a large quantity there could be danger, as the last induced objections prove.

Therefore to the first it must be said that water, when admixed to the blood, is not admixed as matter, but rather as a sign of the people being joined to the Redeemer in the work of redemption, and it is to be absorbed by the wine: hence it is not a mixture, properly speaking, but a transmutation of water into wine, as the Philosopher seems to intend in the first book of On Generation and Corruption, that it is not a mixture if a drop of water is poured into ten amphoras of wine: hence it is rightly conceded that the water is neither matter, nor part of the matter, but passes into the wine, and having been made savory by the wine, it retains only the relation of a sign to the people united in the same spirit to the Redeemer in the work of redemption.

To the next it must be said that water is joined for this reason, because the people are tasteless, so that from this very conjunction they might simultaneously receive both the species and the taste of the wine: just as the people do not have the taste of the spirit and of grace except from Christ.

To the next it must be said that water is not the matter of this sacrament, nor a part of the matter: because in the confection it does not remain in its own species, like the other matter of sacraments: but rather it passes into the species and taste of the wine; hence that objection supposes a falsehood.

To the next it must be said that the addition is made to the wine, and not to the bread, for three reasons: one of which is on the part of the matter, and another on the part of the sign signifying the sacrament, and a third on the part of the end of the sacrament. The first on the part of the matter is taken because bread is a dry and gross element of the sacrament: and to such a thing it is not easy to admix something which could be assumed by it and drawn to its own species and taste: but wine is humid, having an acute, dividing heat, and from both parts something is easily thoroughly mixed with it to its own species and taste, and therefore it is more fitting that the admixture be made in the wine than in the bread. Another cause is that the body of Christ in the first oblation, when He hung on the cross, was not joined to anything else, but blood flowed forth from His side with water: and therefore water is congruously joined to it. The third cause is that blood signifies redemption, as was held above, which was entirely undertaken for the sake of the people: but it is not so concerning the body, and therefore the mixture of water signifying the people is more fittingly made with wine than with bread.

To the next it must be said that the body, on the part of its composition, is from heterogeneous or dissimilar parts: but blood is homogeneous and similar in all its parts: and therefore the body has more in itself by which to signify the diversity of the members of the body than the blood does: and therefore a diverse element is added to the wine: nor does it suffice that it flows from diverse grapes: because the flowing [liquid] is of one nature, and the diversity of the grapes does not remain in the wine, just as the diversity of members remains in the body.

To the next, the solution is clear through what has been said before.

To what is further inquired, it must be said that the minimum sensible quantity suffices, as was said: but a large quantity is in danger: because if, by the admixture of water, the wine is corrupted from its species, it will not be consecrated: and this is not easily tasted: because even water placed in a vessel over wine, such that the mouth of the vessel of water is turned over the mouth of the lower vessel and into the wine, contracts the taste and color of the wine, and yet remains water: just as happens when water in a vessel with a narrow and long mouth is placed in a bucket full of wine: and therefore I do not agree with those who say that a half, or a third, or a fourth part can be put in: but it seems to me that it should be put in a very small quantity, especially if the wine is very weak.

To the next which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that taste does not fully indicate the species nor the virtue of the wine in a mixture: because it is not wine, nor is it water, but a mean between both.

To the next it must be said that color indicates it even less: because since water does not actually have any color, it easily receives every color from something very slightly altering it: especially since even without the admixture of wine it receives the color and taste of wine, in the manner stated above, if a vessel of water with a covered and narrow mouth is immersed in a bucket or in a cask of wine.

To what is further inquired concerning the species of water to be poured in, it must be said that living water is called that which performs the operation and act of water: like that which is in the impetus of purifying and cooling. Hence the species of water which were mentioned are corrupted to another species, since they do not perform the operation, even though the element of water abounds in them: and the reason for this was also stated in the question concerning the matter of baptism.

But to that which is inquired afterwards, How much does he sin who omits adding water?

It must be said that the consecration is validly performed without water: because water is neither the matter of the sacrament, nor part of the matter, as was said: and therefore one must speak of the cause of the omission. For that can be heresy, or contempt, or negligence: and in the first two ways it is a mortal sin against the rite of the sacrament ordained to heresy or schism. In the third way it seems to me a distinction must be made in the cause of negligence, namely whether this is a detention, or an occupation with vain things, or with illicit things. If in the first way, he does not sin mortally: but he is to be severely reprimanded, lest he be found negligent concerning this in the future. If in the second way, either this is from the care of vain and temporal things which he treats of, or from unexpected subreption: and in the first way indeed he sins gravely: and if it were to happen to me, I would make amends as for a mortal sin. But in the second way one must pray for him, because he did not sin mortally: but he needs help against the tempter. But in the third way, namely when it happens from occupation with illicit things, there is no doubt that he sins mortally.

But to that which seems to prove that he always sins mortally, it must be said that the addition of water is not of the principal parts of the sacrament, but of the adjuncts for a fuller signification.

To the next it must be said that he does not celebrate otherwise than it was instituted: because he neither changes the form nor the matter, although he omits something of what is not principal.

And through this the solution to all the objections is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Sacramental Species, Mixed With Other Liquids, Are Corrupted, Or Remain Intact

Whether the sacramental species, mixed with other liquids, are corrupted, or remain intact?

Fifth, a most difficult question is inquired concerning these species when they are mixed with other liquids.

For it seems that they are never corrupted by any admixture: § 1. For the glorious divine body is not admixable with a non-glorious body: but after consecration it is the glorious and divine body: therefore it is not admixed to anything.

§ 2. If perhaps you say that the species are admixed and corrupted, and the body flies away to heaven: this seems to be unintelligible: because the Philosopher holds in the first book of On Generation and Corruption, where he distinguishes which things are mixable and which are not, that accidents are mixable neither with themselves nor with others: but it is agreed that nothing remains there except pure accidents: therefore they are not admixed to other bodies or accidents.

§ 3. Also, generation and corruption happen in two ways, namely simply, and relatively: but it is agreed that both belong to substance: one with respect to the reception or loss of substantial form, the other according to the reception or loss of accidental form: therefore neither will belong to an accident in itself: therefore it seems that since these are accidents, they are never resolved into something else in themselves.

§ 4. Also, everything that is corrupted, is corrupted according to its being: but the being of an accident is to be in something [to inhere], as the Philosopher says: therefore they are not corrupted except according to inherence: and thus they are not corrupted here, and they cannot be corrupted in another way: therefore they are simply not corrupted: but they remain incorruptible: and thus the species of bread and wine always remain.

§ 5. Also, Aristotle near the end of the first book of the Physics says that contraries neither act upon nor are acted upon by each other without a subject matter: but things that do not act nor are acted upon by each other, never corrupt each other: therefore accidents accepted in this way neither corrupt each other, nor are corrupted by others: but they are accepted in this way in the sacrament after the consecration is performed: therefore they are never corrupted either by themselves or by others.

§ 6. Moreover, concerning the putrefaction that is in a host reserved for a long time after consecration, it is agreed that it is not primarily referred to the glorious divine body: therefore it is necessary that it be referred to something primarily corrupted: but it is agreed that this is not an accident: because this according to its being depends on something else primarily, if there is not something there standing in for substance: therefore the putrefaction that appears there cannot be reduced to any primary putrefactible thing, which the intellect of man does not grasp.

§ 7. If perhaps you wish to say, according to what certain people have written and said, that after the consecration and the completion of the office of the sacrament the first substance returns, namely under the species of bread and wine, and through that substance it is mixed with other bodies and putrefies and is corrupted. To the contrary: That return is either because the substance was preserved under the accidents, or because it is created anew under the accidents. If in the first way: this cannot be: because, as was held above, it is converted into the body of Christ, and afterwards nothing is left over to it. If in the second way: this again is false: because as long as the remaining species can be discerned, so long is it judged to be the body of Christ: therefore under those accidents another substance is never caused.

Moreover, when it begins to putrefy, it is agreed that the species still remain: therefore the body of Christ is still under them, and not another substance.

Moreover, it would not truly be said here to be the body of Christ if those accidents were leading to another species than to the body of Christ: therefore, since it is true to say that this is the body of Christ while the accidents remain, it is agreed that under those accidents there is never another substance than the body of Christ will be.

And thus it seems to be saying nothing, that another substance returns. And therefore there were others saying that those accidents in mixture and corruption are converted into substance, and as substances they are corrupted and mixed.

But that this is nothing is easily proven thus: Those accidents are neither of one genus nor of one sense, but one is quantity, another quality, and another is taste, and another sight: therefore if they are converted into substance, they are not converted into a substance of one genus and one sense, but they pass into diverse substances even in genus and sense, and this is saying nothing.

But if it is said that they pass into a substance of the same genus: then it is inquired, what is this kind of conversion by which diverse genera pass into one in genus and number?

Also, since there are many accidents, it seems that there are many substances constituted from them: and this is not true.

Also, the Philosopher says that a substance does not come to be from an accident: therefore those accidents are not converted into substance.

Therefore again there were others who said that only one of those accidents is converted into substance, namely quantity, and the others affect that substance, just as they previously made the substance of bread and wine. But this is ridiculous: because substance does not come to be from quantity, as the Philosopher says.

Moreover, since that substance is quantified, whence comes that quantity, if it is all so transubstantiated into the subject? For it must be that from quantity alone comes both quantity and substance: and this is not true: therefore it is clear that that is saying nothing, and is unintelligible.

Solution. It seems to me it must be said, without prejudice to others, that the accidents are mixed and corrupted in themselves, either in the transition to another subject, or in corruption into non-being.

To understand this, it seems to me two things must be considered. One is that we say one substantial and accidental form in number cannot be in two subjects successively: because it is not [existent] according to itself, but always has being in a subject: and when it is not in that, then it simply is not: because if it were outside a subject and not in a subject, we would say that just as one and the same mobile object is transferred from place to place, so one and the same form would be transferred from subject to subject.

The other is that an accident in nature neither acts nor is acted upon by another without a subject for this reason: because it is not without a subject: and therefore the subject does not confer upon it the virtue of acting or being acted upon, but rather only sustains it: and therefore the subject is contrary to neither: but if it were according to itself without a subject, without a doubt it would act and be acted upon by its proper virtue. Since therefore, according to the more celebrated and more catholic opinion, those forms remain without a subject, I say that in themselves they can act and suffer admixture and putrefaction, and in themselves be transferred to another subject: but from that into which they are transferred, they cannot be transferred into a third: because the fact that they could be without a subject, they had from this, that they were in the mystery of the sacrament by way of being significative, and in this way they are not in a third or fourth or successive subject into which they are transferred from the second. The reason for this will be explained below, over the last chapter of this distinction.

These things being held, it is easy to respond to the objections.

Therefore to the first it must be said that the glorious divine body is neither mixed nor corrupted: but the species remaining in themselves pass into another by mixture or corruption: and then the body of Christ is not there.

To the next it must be said that the Philosopher considers only accidents whose being is inherence: and not those which are according to being by divine power for the mystery of the sacrament.

To the next it must be said that physical generation, whether it be simply or relatively, is always of substance, as was said: but here is another mutation, because the accident here remains without a subject by divine power for the use of the sacrament of faith and of the Church.

To the next it must be said that this is understood concerning an accident that totally depends according to its being on the subject in which it is: but such accidents are not here, but rather by divine power they are sustained without a substance, specifically so that the signification of the sacrament of faith and of the Church might be fulfilled.

To the next the solution is clear through what was said before: because this is not so that common matter may give them the virtue by which they act upon each other and are acted upon, but rather by which they do not act unless they exist: and they do not exist except because they are in the matter of both in common in potency: hence if hot and cold were without matter, then without matter they would be repugnant to each other and one would corrupt the other.

To the next it must be said that, speaking without prejudice, putrefaction is primarily in the quantity of the host: because this is prior to taste and color, as will be proven below: and it is in it by another corrupting agent, namely the active qualities of the air, or of another body: or from the fact that those qualities which are in the host have contrary acts, and resolve it.

But to the objection it must be said that in physical putrefaction this holds: because in those things the accident depends on the subject, and not here.

But if it is objected that that putrefaction is physical, I say that indeed it is physical, but it is not of something physically existing, but rather by divine power.

But still then it is objected that the conserving divine power is more potent than any corrupting agent: and thus those species ought not to be corrupted. To this it seems it must be said that the divine power does not conserve and contain except for the act of the sacrament: and therefore its conservation does not impede their corruption according to the natural being which they have in themselves.

But to what is objected against the induced opinions, it seems it must be conceded: but nevertheless in difficult matters one must not prejudge anyone, except only an error, where it is openly known: because certain things underlie faith which cannot be penetrated by reason: and God can do more than we can understand: because no word shall be impossible with God .

Articulus 11 — Whether The Water And Wine That Are Mixed In The Chalice Can Be Separated

Whether water and wine that are mixed in the chalice can be separated?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, towards the end: Which coupling of water and wine is so mixed in the chalice of Christ, that that mixture cannot be separated, etc.

For this seems false: because § 1. The Philosopher says that mixed things can be separated.

§ 2. Moreover, if wine has water mixed into it, as the alchemists say, it happens that it can be separated in many ways, by which a substance is extracted from the substance in which it is, and let one way suffice for the sake of example: for since like attracts like, and the porous especially draws the humid: if a dry peeled rush is put into mixed wine due to the likeness of nature, because it grows in water, it attracts its like, and from its porosity it draws the humid: therefore from porosity and likeness to the nature of water it draws the aqueous humid, leaving the wine: therefore the admixed water will be separated in this way: therefore it is separable: and this is against the Letter.

Also, it is against the rite of the Church and faith: because the Church ordains and says that the water is consumed by the wine, such that it passes into the species and taste of wine, as was said before.

§ 3. If perhaps you say that the water is not separated by this manner: but it is wine that the rush or reed contracts. To the contrary: Let the strength and taste of the wine be tested before the insertion of the reed or rush, and after its extraction: and it will be found stronger and more flavorful afterwards than before: but this intensification of taste and strength cannot be except from the removal of the contrary, which is the humid of the water: therefore the rush extracts the water, as it seems: therefore he speaks falsely in the Letter. However, other things could be posited by which this is taught to be done: but because this is natural and more apparent, let it suffice.

Solution. It must be said that the rush does not draw the substance of water from every humid thing, whether it be mixed or pure: but when it is more mixed, it draws that much more, because it finds more: and the purer it is, the less it draws, because it finds less: hence the very same infused water is not separated: but rather the substance of water in the wine, which is actually wine, by the qualities of water existing in the rush, is converted to the nature of water and is drawn. For wine, as the Philosopher says in the fourth book of the Meteorology, is a species of water: and there are weaker parts in it, more quickly transmutable to the nature of water than the others: and by attracting those the rush or reed alters them: and therefore it is not a separation, but rather a corruption of certain weaker parts of the wine. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Chalice Can Be Water Alone, Or Wine Alone, Or A Mixture Of Both

Can the chalice be water alone, or wine alone, or mixed from both?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the middle: That therefore which was said above, that it cannot be wine alone, etc.

For the exposition seems to be worth nothing, when he says: Unless it be done simply, or ignorantly. Because simplicity or ignorance are dispositions of the consecrator, and not of the essence of the sacrament: therefore they do not contribute to whether the consecration happens or does not happen, but rather whether it happens meritoriously or not meritoriously.

Solution. It must be said that this "cannot" is not a "cannot" of the sacrament [concerning validity]: but rather a "cannot" of law from the ordination of the Church and the congruence of the sacrament, as was said above: and through this the solution is clear.

Articulus 13 — What Kind Of Body Christ Gave To His Disciples, Whether Mortal And Passible, Or Immortal And Impassible

What kind of body did Christ give to His disciples, mortal and passible, or immortal and impassible?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, § 2: But He gave such a body as He then had, etc.

Concerning this before the Letter three things seem to be inquired: of which the first is, What kind of body did He give to the disciples, namely whether mortal and passible, or immortal and impassible? Second, And what would it be if it had been preserved in a pyx until the triduum, or had been celebrated in the triduum, or newly confected? Third, Whether He Himself consumed His own body, when He gave it to His disciples, or not?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. In the Letter, and in 1 Corinthians 11:24 [458], there are the same words in the Gloss, that He gave the body such as He then had: but then He had a passible one: therefore He gave His passible body.

§ 2. Also, Innocent in the book On the Sacraments: The Lord gave to the disciples such a body as He then had: but it is agreed that He had a passible one: therefore He handed over a passible one.

§ 3. Also, it does not belong to truth to feign: but Christ is truth: therefore it does not belong to Christ to feign: but to feign is to exhibit oneself in another mode than one is: therefore Christ did not exhibit Himself in the sacrament in another mode than He was: but He was passible: therefore He gave a passible and mortal body to the disciples.

§ 4. Also, this is accepted from the mode of speaking when He says: This is My body, which will be given up for you: for the body to be given up in the future could not be except mortal, because otherwise the giving up would not have inflicted passion upon it: since therefore He offered the same to the disciples, it seems that it was under the same disposition: therefore He offered a passible one.

§ 5. Also, let it be granted that he gave it impassible: therefore it was impassible, and on the cross it was passible: therefore it was simultaneously passible and not passible. But "impassible" and "not passible" are either equipollent, or one follows from the other: therefore it was simultaneously passible and not passible. But if it was "not passible": therefore it "was not" passible: because a negative with a finite predicate, and an affirmative with an infinite predicate, are equipollent. Therefore it was simultaneously passible and was not passible at the same time: therefore contradictories are verified of the same thing at the same time, which is impossible.

§ 6. If perhaps you say that this does not follow, because they are taken with respect to different things, namely with respect to the form of the sacrament according to which it is impassible, and with respect to its own natural form according to which it is passible. Also, with respect to those receiving the sacrament it is impassible, and with respect to the lance and the cross it is passible. If, I say, you say thus. Against: "Passible" and "impassible" are absolute qualities flowing from a natural potency or impotency of suffering: therefore whether they are compared to another thing or not, they are always in one way. But it is certain that Christ then did not have a natural impotency of suffering, that is, by which he would not suffer when a harmful agent inflicting passion approaches: therefore by no comparison could it be or become impassible, his passible nature not having been altered in him. But it is certain that the sacrament in him did not alter his nature: therefore he gave his passible body, and in no way impassible.

But against this it is objected: § 1. On that text: And he was transfigured before them [459], the Gloss says: "That body which he had by nature mortal, he gave to his disciples at the supper not mortal, not corruptible." This it expressly said: because he gave it incorruptible, although he had it passible.

§ 2. Also, on that text: He who offers the blood, etc. [460], the Gloss says: "His flesh, which before the passion was not fit for eating, he made fit for eating." But it is certain that passible flesh would not be fit for eating: therefore he made it impassible.

458. 1 Cor 11:24.

§ 3. Also, Hugh of St. Victor: "He held himself in his hands, the one holding was mortal, the one held immortal." But this was the body which he gave to his disciples: therefore he gave an immortal and impassible body.

Also, Hugh: "I, without prejudice to the truth, more closely approach this [view], that he is said to have handed over that impassible and immortal [body] insofar as it pertains to the sanctification of the sacrament: for if this could be, that he himself bore himself in his hands, and distributed his body to be eaten without corruption of himself, and yet he who gave and he who was given, and he who bore and he who was borne, were the same: what wonder is it if it is said, that he in that which was given was immortal, and in that which gave was mortal, not two, but one?"

§ 4. Also, the passible suffers when a harmful agent approaches: if therefore he gave it passible, it suffered when a harmful agent approached: but the attrition of teeth is a harmful agent: therefore it suffered and was killed by the mastication of the disciples, which is false: therefore he did not give his passible and mortal body, as it seems.

Solution. One must say that concerning this question both sides have their defenders. And those who follow Hugh of St. Victor say that the Lord before his resurrection assumed the use of the four dowries of the glorified body, although he did not assume the habit. For he assumed the act or use of subtlety when he came forth from his mother's womb while the bars of modesty were closed; the power of agility when he walked with dry feet on the waves; of clarity when his face shone on Mount Tabor, when he was transfigured before the disciples. But [he assumed] the act of impassibility at the supper, when he gave his body to his disciples, not passible according to act, although in habit it was passible: because (as has been said) he did not assume the habit of the dowries, but only the act: and this is the opinion of Master Hugh of St. Victor. And then the solution is clear to all the first objections, except two, namely what is objected concerning fiction, and concerning the verification of contradictories simultaneously of the same thing.

To the first of those, therefore, one must say that it will not be a fiction (as Augustine says) unless it is ordered toward deception: hence it is also said that he feigned to go further nor is it reputed to be a fiction unless it is good, as Augustine says, because it is not ordered to deceiving, but rather to instruction. Hence just as he showed clarity to his disciples lest they be excessively saddened and disturbed about his death: so at the supper for the sake of instructing them about the resurrection he showed them impassibility, and in other places the acts of the other dowries.

To the next one must say that there was no opposition of contradiction there: because "passible" and "impassible", "mortal" and "immortal", are taken equivocally. For passible and mortal are taken according to habit, but immortal and impassible according to act: so that it is the same thing that is impassible and immortal, because not suffering and not dying in the distribution of the sacrament.

459. Matt. 17:2.

Whoever wishes to say this, can do so, and has the means to respond to the objections. I, however, assent more to the other opinion which the Master touches upon in the Text, and the Gloss on the epistle , and Innocent in the book On the Sacraments, namely that he gave his passible body: and therefore also the sacrament is frequented by the Church in memory of his passion.

To this, however, which is objected first, one must say that the Gloss is understood thus, namely that he gave it immortal and impassible, that is, not having suffered, and not having died in the sacrament or in the reception of the sacrament: and the cause of this is not that it was impassible, but the cause will be clear in the solution.

To the next one must say that that Gloss of Leviticus is not understood of impassibility, but rather because the body in human figure and form is not fit for eating, therefore he handed it over under the form of bread, under which it is fit for eating.

To the next one must say that that was Hugh's opinion which we are not bound to follow unless we wish. If, however, we wish to sustain what they say, we will say that he refers this to that which did not suffer according to act under the sacrament: but he does not determine the cause of this: and I do not believe that this was the cause that he assumed impassibility, because no necessity compels this, as will be clear below.

To the next one must say that that proposition is very true which says: "The passible suffers when a harmful agent approaches." But in the sacrament no harmful agent approached it: because as we will have determined by the Master in the following distinction, mastication and division do not refer to the body of Christ, but only to the forms or accidental species. However, I think this was what compelled those who opined differently from the Master here, that he gave his impassible body: hence since this, as has already been clear, compels absolutely nothing, it is clear that there is no reason why it should be said that he handed over his impassible body.

Articulus 14 — What Would Have Happened Concerning The Body Of Christ If It Had Been Consecrated By One Of The Disciples During The Three Days, Or Kept In A Pyx; And, Whether The Soul Existing In Limbo Could Also Have Been In The Consecrated Body

What would have been done to the body of Christ if it had been consecrated by one of the disciples during the triduum, or kept in a pyx? And; whether the soul existing in limbo could also have been in the consecrated body?

Secondly it is asked: What would have been done to that body, if it had been kept for the triduum by one of the disciples, or newly confected or consecrated by one of them?

§ 1. For since it was one and numerically the same body that hung on the cross and that was kept in the pyx: it seems that whatever happened to it on the cross, all this would have happened to it in the pyx: but on the cross it was wounded, pierced with a lance, mocked, and given vinegar to drink: therefore in the pyx any of these was done to it. And this is plainly false: because the crucifixion and the like were to the sight of men, and nothing of such things was seen to be done around the body in the pyx.

460. Lev. 7:33.

§ 2. But if you say that it was not crucified in the pyx, then it seems that contradictories are verified of the same thing at one and the same time: for on the cross it was being killed, and not in the pyx, and at the same time it was identically existing: therefore one and identically existing at one time was crucified and was not crucified, or died and did not die, which the intellect does not grasp.

§ 3. Also, Either it died in the pyx, or it did not die: but it did not die: therefore the same man at the same time was dead and alive, which faith does not admit nor the intellect grasp. If he died: either by the same kind of death by which he died outside the pyx, or not. If not: therefore Christ died by two kinds of death, which again Scripture abhors. If by the same, but outside he died by crucifixion: therefore also in the pyx he died by crucifixion: but one dying by crucifixion is crucified: therefore Christ in the pyx was crucified, and by the same reasoning lanced, etc.

But against: § 1. Christ was crucified only in one place, namely on Golgotha: but the pyx was not on Golgotha: therefore in the pyx he was not crucified.

§ 2. Also, Although the body of Christ and the soul, from the union to the deity which is everywhere, can be in several places, nevertheless the act of the Jews and Gentiles could not be except where the Gentiles and Jews were, who were only in one place: but they were not in the pyx: therefore neither was their act: but their acts are crucifixion, lancing, nailing, and the like: therefore these were not done in the pyx, but only on the cross.

Also. Further it is asked here: If it had been confected during the triduum, whether it would have been a perfect sacrament, or not?

It seems that not: § 1. For above it was held that from the force of the consecration the bread is only converted into the body, and the wine into the blood, and from the union there is both soul and deity: therefore, the union of the soul to the body not existing, the soul was not there: therefore nothing is confected except a dead body: but a dead body and dead blood would not be a perfect sacrament: therefore in the triduum it would not have been a perfect sacrament, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, the non-living does not vivify: but the body of Christ vivifies: therefore it could not be confected non-living: but if it had been confected in the triduum, it would have been non-living: therefore in the triduum it could not be confected, as it seems.

If then it is asked: Whether Christ could command the soul existing in limbo to be in the consecrated body?

It seems that yes: because § 1. He himself is omnipotent, and has the power of laying down his soul, and of taking it up again: therefore it seems also that he could do this.

§ 2. Also, From this no prejudice to redemption is generated: because the soul can be simultaneously and at once in diverse places: and thus existing in the body under the sacrament, it would not on this account recede from limbo, shining to those to be redeemed from hell: therefore it seems that Christ would have done this, if it had been consecrated in the triduum.

§ 3. Also, Now he is wholly in heaven, and wholly on many altars simultaneously and at once: therefore the whole soul similarly could be in limbo separated from the buried body, and the whole soul in the body confected under the form of the sacrament, and there seems to be no inconvenience.

But against: This position having been made, the numerically same body would be in the form of the sacrament, and in the tomb: and in the form of the sacrament it would be animated and alive, but in the tomb inanimate and dead: therefore the numerically same body and at the same time would be animated and not animated, and alive and dead: which is inconvenient, and absurd, and also contrary to faith.

Solution. It seems one should say with the ancients in this question, who say that certain nouns, verbs, and participles signify natural passions or passions common to natural and violent ones, and these can be copulated to the body existing in the pyx if it had been kept through the triduum, such as "suffers", "grieves", "dies", "feels pains", "feels passions", and the like. But some signify violent passions by the very word, such as "is wounded", "is beaten", "is crucified", and the like, and these cannot be copulated to the body except where it is under its proper form, as it was in the place of Calvary or on Golgotha, which is the same. The cause of this is, because such words signify a passion, not according to what belongs to the one passioned, but according to what is the infliction and effect of the action: and since the act of the crucifiers was not except in the place of crucifying, such things cannot be done around Christ except according to the form in which he appeared among the crucifiers, and in the place of crucifixion. But other words signify passion, according to what is only in the patient: and since the patient was the same on the cross and in the pyx, therefore those are copulated to him in both places. Hence the ancients determined this question by two verses, saying thus:

"Kept in a pyx it will be able to couple innate pain: But an inflicted one does not suit it."

According to this therefore one must say to the first, that although the body is the same on the cross and in the pyx, nevertheless under one form and another: and it is true that whatever happened to him on the cross, happened to him in the pyx, regarding what expresses the quantity and substance of the passion itself on the part of the patient: but "to be wounded", and the like, besides the substance of the passion, express a relation to an outside agent: and therefore it is not necessary that they happen to him. And there is in the argument the sophistic topic of a figure of speech from the commutation of that which expresses the "what" of a passion, into that which expresses "what sort" of a passion, namely compared to the action of an agent.

To the next one must say that a contradiction concerning the same thing is not verified; because this is true: "The body of Christ was being crucified," and this is false: "The body of Christ was not being crucified." But this is twofold: "The body of Christ was crucified in the pyx", from the fact that the phrase in the pyx can determine the body of Christ by means of an understood participle, namely existing, under this sense: "The body of Christ existing in the pyx was crucified", and thus it is true. Or it can determine the word was crucified, and thus it is false. Similarly also this is twofold: "The body of Christ in the pyx was not crucified", as is clear per se from the preceding distinction. And these, "The body of Christ was crucified in the pyx", and, "The body of Christ was not crucified", are not contradictories, unless according as the determination refers to the same thing in one and in the other: and this is not inconvenient, that in this way it was not crucified in the pyx, because from this it does not follow that it was not crucified: and there is there a fallacy of secundum quid ad simpliciter [from a qualified sense to an absolute sense].

To the next one must say that in the pyx it died, and by the same kind of death as outside, but this death in the pyx was not inflicted upon it, but on the cross. And therefore it does not follow: "it died in the pyx by the same kind of death: therefore it was crucified": because to be crucified not only signifies the same kind of death, but also the infliction of it according as it is from an agent, and by virtue of that it does not suit it in the pyx, but by virtue of that which was only on the part of the patient: and this solution states the same kind of death.

To that which is further asked, without prejudice it seems to me, supposing that it were confected in the triduum, that the body of Christ would be in the sacrament without the soul: nor do I think it to be true what some say, namely that the form of the sacrament would have been suspended in the triduum, but rather I think that if the sacrament had been consecrated in the triduum, it would have had effect.

To that however which is objected against, one must say that a perfect sacrament is spoken of in three ways. In one way from the perfection of the matter and form of the sacrament: just as every thing perfect in its being is by the perfection of those two in composition, provided that thing is not simple, but composed of matter and form. In a second way it is called a perfect sacrament: because it perfectly performs the act to which it was instituted. And by these two that sacrament would have been perfect in the triduum. In a third way it is called a perfect sacrament from the number of those things which the sacrament contains, and in this way improperly. And in this way it is true that it would not contain as many substances in the triduum, as it contains outside the triduum, because it does not contain the soul.

To the next one must say, that the body of Christ is not vivified by a natural life, the cause of which is the soul, but by the life which is the deity: and it would have had that life united to itself in the triduum, and by virtue of that it would vivify, and therefore also Christ by his death vivified the dead by the power of the deity, as Augustine says.

To that which is further asked: Whether Christ could make his soul enter his body under the sacrament, and not in the tomb?

One must say that it is one thing to be able to make, and another to be able to be made, and concerning his ability, and its being made, it was spoken of elsewhere, namely at the end of the first book of the Sentences. But I think it must be said, that that could not be made: because thus it would follow that the same thing would be animated and inanimate, which is inconvenient.

To the first however which is objected against, one must say that he can do all things: yet not all things can be done simultaneously on account of opposition, or the consequence of an impossibility.

To the next one must say, that this is not the cause, that it can be in several places simultaneously: but rather this, that the numerically same body in one and the same time cannot be animated in one place, and inanimate in another place: because if this were so, everywhere it would be inanimate: and if it is animated here, everywhere it is animated: and therefore it cannot be, that the soul is in the body in the sacrament, and not in the tomb.

But some say otherwise: and those who wish to follow them, can: but to pursue the opinions of all here would be excessively tedious.

Articulus 15 — Whether Christ At The Supper Took His Body In His Own Person

Whether Christ in the supper in his own person partook of his body?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether Christ in his own person partook of his body in the supper, when he gave it to his disciples?

And it seems that yes: because § 1. On that text: Drink of this all of you [461], Chrysostom says: "Drink of this, so that the disciples seeing it would not say: Why do I drink blood? For that they might not be disturbed, as were disturbed many who went back, first he himself drank his blood."

§ 2. Also, on that text: When Booz had eaten and drunk [462], the Gloss says: "Christ ate and drank, when in the supper he handed his body and blood to his disciples."

§ 3. Also, Because the children communicated in flesh and blood, and he himself similarly participated in the same, so that by death he might destroy him who had the empire of death.

§ 4. Also, on that text: Which, namely the ram, when Moses had immolated, taking of its blood, etc. [463], the Gloss says: "First the priest, afterwards others are anointed with its blood: because at the supper first Christ received his blood, then handed it to his disciples."

§ 5. Also, the Gloss in the same place: "He drank his blood, and gave it to others to drink, when he poured the intelligible blood on the altar, that is, his body."

§ 6. Also, This seems to be the opinion of the ancients, who made verses about the solution of this question, saying:

"The King sits at supper, surrounded by the twelve-fold crowd: He holds himself in his hands, he, the food, feeds himself."

§ 7. Also, We see this, that he himself was circumcised, and afterwards received baptism succeeding circumcision: therefore by similarity since he communicated in the typical lamb, he himself also communicated in his flesh and blood succeeding the typical lamb.

§ 8. Also, The sacraments began from Christ, and from him as from a head flowed into the Church: therefore they ought first to be in Christ, then in the Church: since therefore communion is the principal sacrament of the Church, communion ought to begin from him.

§ 9. Also, Since it is said in Psalm 132: Behold how good, etc. And there is added, v.2: Like ointment on the head, which descends to the beard, etc. therefore from the head the sacramental unction descends to the beard, that is, to the Apostles, as the Saints expound, and from the beard to the hem of the garment, that is, to the least of the Church. Therefore the unction of the principal sacrament, that is, communion, seems to have begun first from him, then derived to the Apostles.

But against: § 1. In nature nothing is vain and in vain: therefore less so in the works of Christ: but it would be, if he had communicated: therefore he did not communicate. Proof of the assumption. That sacrament restores what is lost in spiritual powers, perfecting a greater union of the members with the head: but Christ lost nothing, nor could he be more united than he was united: therefore in him communion would have been to no end if he had communicated: therefore in vain and useless; because the Philosopher says that useless or vain is that which is for some end, and does not include it.

§ 2. Also, Blood causes redemption in those by whom it is received: but Christ was not one to be redeemed, but rather the redeemer: therefore he ought not to communicate in the blood.

Also, It does not belong to the same person to serve his blood as drink and to drink it: but Christ was as the cupbearer of the blood: therefore he did not drink it.

§ 3. Also, It seems to be an occasion of heresy, namely that he himself like others there needed the shedding of his blood, since he received it like others: but Christ in all things intended to build up faith: therefore he ought not to receive his blood.

Solution. Without prejudice to some saying otherwise, it seems to me safer to say this which the holy Fathers expressly handed down, namely that Christ received his blood, and his body. And I confess that I fall short in solving their sayings: but it seems to me that they expressly intend to say this.

To the first that is objected against, it can be said, that there is an end in itself, and an end in another: but the communion of the body and blood of Christ did not have its end in itself [for him], but in another: and the first authority of Chrysostom touches upon that, namely lest others should shudder who had shuddered before, saying: This is a hard saying, who can hear it? And leaving him they went back.

But another cause is to signify, that just as the grace of redemption is derived from him to the members, so also the rite and institution of observation, and therefore he communicated.

461. Matt. 26:27.

To the next one must say, that communion in Christ does not cause redemption, but rather was as a form and exemplar of the rite to be observed, and of communicating without horror for the future. This also was one of the causes posited above, why also he himself generally handed over his body and blood under the species of food and drink.

To the next one must say, that this was not an occasion of heresy: because already by doctrine and miracle and the testimony of the Father made from heaven, and the transfiguration they had learned, that he needed none of these, but there remained only the information to the rite of the Church by an example received from Christ. Hence the Apostle For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you.

Articulus 16 — Whether In The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Accidents Remain Without A Subject

Whether in the sacrament of the Eucharist the accidents remain without a subject?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, E, But if it is asked concerning the accidents which remain, etc.

This is a very grave question concerning the accidents, because he says accidents here are without a subject.

And against this it is objected manifoldly: because the whole of philosophy seems to be against it.

§ 1. First thus: Being (esse) cannot be separated from a being (ens), because a contradiction would follow, namely a being which is, not to be: but an accident is a certain being: therefore its being is not separable from it: but its being, as the Philosopher says, is "to be in" (inesse): therefore "to be in" is not in act separable from it: but if it is in, it is not in except in a subject: therefore in act it cannot be separated from a subject: and thus it will not be here without a subject.

§ 2. If perhaps you say, that God can do even more than we can understand: but we can understand an accident without a subject: therefore God can do this. Against: It is not asked what God can do, but what can be done in a creature: but it has already been shown, that the being of any being cannot be separated from it, without a contradiction following if it is separated according to act: therefore this cannot be done in an accident.

§ 3. Also, In the ordination of divine wisdom it is, that an accident is not except in a subject: but against the ordination of wisdom God cannot act, as Augustine and Anselm say: because he would act against himself: therefore he seems not to be able to make an accident be without a subject.

§ 4. Also, If an accident is caused by the principles of the substance in being, so it is contained by the same in being: but each thing naturally fails, when it is separated from the principles causing and containing it: therefore an accident fails when it is separated from the substance, and its principles: therefore if in the sacrament the accident is separated from the subject, the accident does not remain: but it remains as sight judges: therefore it is not without a subject.

§ 5. Also, on that text: One indeed is hungry, but another is drunk [464], the Gloss says, that they were consecrating and eating in great quantity. But it is certain that accidents would not inebriate or refresh anyone: therefore it seems that accidents do not remain there without a subject.

§ 6. Also, Those things which are in diverse genera are more distant, than those which are in the same genus: but body and spirit are in the same genus, accident and per se being in diverse: therefore an accident and a per se being or substance are more distant, than a body and a spirit: but a body cannot become a spirit, as Augustine says, and Boethius proves in the book On the Two Natures in One Person of Christ at the end: therefore much less can an accident become a per se being: therefore it cannot be without a subject.

§ 7. Also, To human sight there appears there not only an accident, but white, round, denominated and informed by an accident: either therefore it is so in the sacrament as it appears, or not. If it is so: therefore there is there something denominated and informed, and nothing except a substance and subject: therefore the accident is not without a subject. If not: therefore it is otherwise in the sacrament of truth, than it appears outwardly to the sight of man, and thus it is a phantasm or prestige, which is absurd to say and believe of the sacrament of truth and of the Church.

§ 8. Also, A definition is not separated from the defined, because the definition states the being of the defined; since therefore an accident is defined by "to be in", it seems that "to be in" cannot be separated from an accident in act: because it is asked concerning that separation here.

§ 9. Also, The Philosopher in the first book of the Physics speaking against Parmenides says: If animal and biped which define man, are an accident, man also will be an accident: and thus it would also happen, that man would be an accident to another: therefore by similarity if the defining of an accident is only to be in another, and never to be per se, the defined accident itself will also be only in another, and never per se: but "to be in" is definitive of an accident, and it never has being unless it is in another: therefore an accident never is unless it is in another. Proof of the assumption. The Philosopher says, that an accident is that which when it is in another, is not in it as a certain part, and it is impossible for it to be without that in which it is: therefore the proposition is clear.

§ 10. Also, Damascene seems to want to say, that the substance of bread remains, and also the substance of wine, in which the accidents are founded, and thus they are never per se: because he himself says, that just as we were composed of a twofold substance, namely body and soul: so he made a twofold food by conjoining deity to bread and wine into a spiritual food: but deity is not conjoined to bread and wine unless the substances of bread and wine remain there: therefore the accidents are in those, not without a subject, as is said in the text.

§ 11. Also, The Philosopher says, that as great as the surface is, so great will you say the white is: but we see there so much white: therefore the quantity of white is defined by the quantity of some surface: therefore it is...

[there is the] surface: but just as white is related to a surface in its dependence with respect to being, so too a surface is related to a substance: therefore just as white is not without a surface, so a surface is not without a body and a substance in which it is.

§ 12. Also, there will not be a being by accident unless there is a being through itself: but in the sacrament, as is said in the Letter, there is no being through itself: therefore there will not be a being by accident there: but there is a being by accident there, as sight proves: therefore it is necessary that a being through itself, which is a substance, be sublaid to it: therefore the accident will not be there without a subject, as it seems.

§ 13. If perhaps you say that the accident is changed into a substance, this is proved to be impossible in many ways. And first indeed: because the Philosopher says that it is impossible for a substance to be made from an accident. In another way: because if a substance is made from an accident: either it is the substance in which is the accident that is seen in the sacrament, or another substance. If the substance in which it is [is made]. To the contrary: An accident that is in a substance, is caused by the substance in which it is: if therefore it is the cause of the existing of the substance in which it is: therefore the accident is the cause of the cause which causes it, which is not intelligible: and Augustine denies this: because the caused is not the cause of its cause that it exist, but rather conversely. If however it is converted into another substance than that in which it is: let it be asked, which is that, and there will be none to assign. And moreover then the same question remains concerning those accidents which still remain without a substance: since they are not in the substance into which they are converted.

Also, it seems to be ridiculous: because nothing is converted into another while remaining in the same way it was before: but we see the accidents in the sacrament remaining in the same way they were before: therefore the accidents are not converted into a substance.

Also, if they are converted into a substance, into which substance are they converted? For since it is clear from the things said above that there are only two substances, namely of the bread and wine, and of the body of Christ, they are converted into one of these. But it is established that they are not converted into the substance of the bread and wine: because those substances do not remain, but are transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ: therefore it is left that they are converted into the substance of the body of Christ: and this is absurd: because the glorious body of Christ is neither white, nor round, nor has the taste of bread or of wine.

462. Ruth 3:7.

§ 14. Also, that by which species differ, by those same things their differences differ: but substance and accident are two species of being, or genera, because about this there is no force: therefore by those things by which substance and accident differ, by those same things their differences differ: but substance and accident differ by existing through itself, and by being in another: therefore their differences also [differ by this]: therefore being in another cannot be through itself, as it seems, since it is not a substance, and this is impossible, as has already been proved: therefore an accident cannot be separated from a subject.

This can also be proved in another way in multiple ways, namely through the operation of accidents:

§ 1. For there are two things in heat, namely the essence of heat, and the operation, namely to heat: but it is established that the operation of heating does not belong to heat existing through itself without a subject: which is proved by this which the Philosopher says, that things do not act mutually upon one another unless they are communicating according to nature. And Boethius says this same thing. Since therefore the operation of accidents is expressly found in the sacrament, it seems that there the accidents are not without a subject.

§ 2. Also, for color to act upon sight, it is necessary that it be the act of the transparent, and the light incorporated in it which abstracts it: but if there is no body in which the color is, there will be no incorporated light abstracting the color: therefore there will be no visible color: but in the sacrament there is visible color; therefore there is a body there to which the light abstracting it is incorporated: therefore it is not there without a subject.

§ 3. Also, the Philosopher says, that to a straight line insofar as it is straight, many things happen, such as touching a sphere in a point: but nevertheless it will never touch this separate straight line: therefore for an accident to have an operation which belongs to it through itself, it is necessary that it be in a subject: but the accidents in the sacrament have an operation proper or suited to them properly: therefore they are not there without a subject.

§ 4. Also, the Philosopher says that the sense is receptive of sensible species with matter being present: therefore if matter is not present, it neither receives them, nor will they act upon the sense: but species act upon the sense: therefore they are in some matter, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, the senses properly differ: because some apprehend from afar, some apprehend nothing except a species in matter, such as sight from afar, but touch receives a species in matter, and taste according as it is a kind of touch: but that which is in the sacrament alters both taste and touch: therefore there is a species in matter there.

§ 6. Also, the Philosopher says that touch is only of bodies: therefore that which is touched in the sacrament, is a body: therefore it is not an accident without a subject.

§ 7. Also, the apprehensive senses from outside and from inside are distinguished in this, that the interior ones receive species without matter, but those from outside only with matter being present: therefore whatever is received by a sense which is an apprehensive power from outside, is a species in matter: therefore since it receives that which appears in the sacrament, it will be a species existing in matter: therefore there is not an accident without matter there.

The third way it is objected still through the putrefaction of those species into those things which are generated from the putrefaction of those species:

§ 1. For it is established that when those things which appear in the sacrament putrefy, whatever those things also are, worms are generated from them: but a worm cannot be generated materially from a pure accident: therefore it is necessary to posit some substance there, which being putrefied is converted into a worm.

§ 2. Also, putrefaction is a corruption, but it is established that generation and corruption occur from contrary causes: therefore it is not generated nor corrupted unless according to its mutation it is receptive of contraries: but this is a property of substance alone, as the Philosopher says. Therefore it does not belong to an accident to be generated and corrupted, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, Porretanus says concerning accidental form, that form is contingent to composition, consisting of a simple and invariable essence: but it is established that that which is invariable neither putrefies nor is corrupted: therefore if the accidents are there without a subject, the accidents neither putrefy nor are corrupted: which is against sight, because we see them being corrupted: therefore they are not there without a subject.

§ 4. If perhaps you say that God corrupts them: this is ridiculous: because God is the cause of the existence of things: and if He destroys what He builds, according to the Apostle, He establishes Himself as a transgressor. Therefore God is not the cause: but rather this happens from the subject in which they are, as it seems.

But against all these things it is disputed thus: § 1. An accident denominates the substance in which it is: but the accidents do not denominate the body of Christ, because the body of Christ is not white, or round: nor the substance of the bread, because that is transubstantiated into the body of Christ: therefore they do not denominate any substance: therefore they are there without a subject, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, in the Decree, all the words of Ambrose say that they are there without a subject. Also, this is said here in the Letter. Therefore it is so.

§ 3. Also, we see that in this sacrament all things which are in it, receive a higher state: for an inanimate body passes into an animate one, and a non-glorious one into a glorious one, and a non-divine one into a divine one: therefore the accidents must also receive a higher state: but they do not receive a higher state except according to the fact that they are without a subject: therefore in the sacrament they are without a subject.

§ 4. Also, accidents remain, so that they may lead to another thing just as sacramental signs: but if the proper substance of the accidents remains, they do not lead except into that substance of the subject: therefore they do not lead into the spiritual refection of the body of Christ, and thus the use of signs in the sacrament would vanish: since therefore this is unfitting, it is necessary that in the sacrament they are without a subject.

§ 5. Also, we see that those things which are above reason, like the articles of faith, cannot be proved except through another thing which is above reason, just as the articles were proved through the working of miracles. Since therefore many things in this sacrament which is also called the sacrament of faith, are above reason, it seems that congruity demands that something in it be subject to sense, which is above reason: but this cannot be except that the sensible accidents be there without a subject: therefore the accidents ought to have remained in this sacrament without a subject.

§ 6. Also, there does not seem to be an impediment on the part of the operation of accidental species in the sense: because if something belongs to a thing through itself, it also belongs to it separately, just as for a triangle to have three angles equal to two right angles, etc.: but the altering of the senses belongs to sensible things through themselves: therefore it also belongs to separated sensible things: therefore although they are without a subject, nevertheless they alter the sense, and act upon it.

§ 7. Also, the sense, as the Commentator says, receives sensible things according to spiritual being: but separated things are more according to spiritual being, than when they are in matter and subject: therefore the sense is more receptive of separated sensible things, than of those which are in matter: therefore there is no impediment why those forms cannot be sensed, although they are separated from a subject.

§ 8. Also, let us posit that a form remains in a mirror, even with the object not present, and when a beholder is apposed, that form will still be seen: and yet it is not in matter: therefore a form without matter can well alter the sense.

§ 9. Also, what is objected in the third way, seems to offer no impediment: for just as it has already been held, that what belongs to a thing through itself, always belongs to it: but those forms are through themselves corruptible: therefore even they existing without a subject will be corruptible.

§ 10. Also, it is clear to sense to every beholder, that they are corrupted: and I prove that it is not by a miracle: because Anselm and Chrysostom say that those things which are done miraculously, are by the divine will alone: but it is established that the divine will which produced them, does not corrupt them: therefore they are corrupted by nature: therefore corruption happens to them separated, just as conjoined in matter.

§ 11. Also, it was sufficiently proved above that a common subject of contraries does not confer upon them a principle of acting and power, but only sustains them: therefore if they were sustained without a subject, the contraries would fight, and destroy each other mutually: therefore those forms remaining without a subject can naturally be destroyed and corrupted, just as when they are in a subject.

§ 12. Also, let wine be poured over dividing those species: it is established that division corrupts: therefore those species can be corrupted: and the same follows concerning the division of the bread: but it is established that when those species do not remain, the body of Christ does not remain there: therefore the species are corrupted naturally, and then the body of Christ is not there.

§ 13. If perhaps you say that the species of bread and the species of wine are infinitely divisible, because the species are of homogeneous things: that is foolish: because to be infinitely divided is a passion only of the continuous, and not of bread, or flesh, or wine: therefore the species of wine can be divided so much that it will not be the species of wine, and the species of bread so much that it will not be the species of bread: therefore it can also be naturally corrupted, although it exists through itself.

Solution. It must be said that the accidents remain there without a subject, as the last arguments prove: and concerning this four reasons have customarily been assigned by the Masters: of which the first is, so that, namely, with the substance which is the proper subject of those species not existing there, the human mind may be ravished to another spiritual food from the signification of the accidents, understanding spiritual things in corporeal things, just as also in other sacraments. Hence Ambrose: "In that sacrament which is the body there is no corporeal food, but spiritual."

The second reason is that it may be shown that everything that is in the sacrament is of faith, and nothing of nature. Hence Hugh of Saint Victor: "Divine wisdom veiled the flesh of Christ under the species of corporeal food, and proposed it to be consumed thus, so that the sense might be fostered in one thing, and faith in another."

The third reason is the habituating of men to believe supernatural things, since they see with their own eyes accidents which affect no subject, as the Master says here in the Letter.

The fourth reason is the complete ordering of those things which are in the sacrament, and this was touched upon in objecting: because since all the inferior things of this sacrament receive a higher state, it was fitting that the accidental signs of the qualities should also receive a higher state in this, that they should remain there without a subject for the service of the sacrament.

And having held these things, we must respond to the objections in order, holding indeed the faith, but not following philosophy except insofar as we can with the faith safe.

Therefore it seems to be said to the first that those accidents are twofold, namely sensible qualities which are the objects of the proper senses: and quantity, and figure, which are the objects of the common sense: and they are not related to the subject equally: but according to the order of nature quantity is closer to the subject, than quality.

Also, among the qualities those which are the objects of touch are the causes of the others, and immediately follow the complexion of the qualities of touch, such as the qualities of taste, because that is a kind of touch: and because odors are signs of taste, therefore odor is closer to the subject, than color. And by this mode it seems it must be said that that which contains color is quantity, and that which causes it is the complexion of the qualities of touch: hence it is not caused there nor contained by divine power alone, but also by nature, as has already been said. And the same seems to be said of odor and taste. But the objects of touch are indeed contained by quantity: but according to cause they cannot be caused by other qualities. Figure also since it is a quality spoken of concerning quantity, as the Philosopher says, is in quantity as in a subject: because it itself is terminative of quantity, just as is received from its definition.

But concerning quantity it does not seem to me that according to nature it can be without a subject unless it is contained by divine power: for although quantity is prior to a natural body, nevertheless it is not prior to the composite of the parts of a substance which are form and matter, such a composite as the Metaphysician considers: because it is proved,[465] that matter is primarily receptive of substantial form, because that alone finishes it: and therefore also the substantial form is not divided by the division of the subject: because it is not greater in a greater part of the subject, and lesser in a lesser: but every form which is received by a subject according to the order of nature after quantity, is divided by accident, and is greater in a greater part, and lesser in a lesser part. Hence I say, that quantity is of the form, and not of the matter, but of the composite of matter and form. But that matter and form are parts of a substance, which is the first being, which the first Philosopher considers separated from quantity and motion, this has already been sufficiently clearly proved elsewhere by the Philosophers. But yet because some in that question contradicted this, therefore these things are posited here.

But to the objection it must be said, that being is never separated from a being: but being is the act of a being, and the act of an essence: hence if we take the essence according to itself, according to the intellect the essence still is. And so I say here, that quantity is the being of the essence, and not the being of some quantity which it informs, as a subject in which it is: and this happens by divine power working this for the congruity of the sacrament.

To another it must be said, that what has already been said can well happen: because just as it was held, the being which an accident has in a subject, is as it were the being of a composite being: but the being by which an essence is that which it is, is understood in the accident according to itself: and concerning this the Philosopher does not understand, that its being is to-be-in, but rather this is constituted from the principles of its essence and its quiddity: just as the Philosopher himself says, that if someone, positing a cubit magnitude, should ask what that which is posited is, to be a quantum, what he says, and he signifies a quantum, and this is not separable from it, such that it remains: but that which it has in a subject, is separable by the power of the Creator.

To another it must be said, that it is from the ordination of divine wisdom, that an accident is not without a subject according to the natural seminal causes which the founder first inserted, as Augustine says: but besides these causes, the Lord also inserted in the first created things the power of obedience to that which the Creator would will for the demonstration of faith: but in this He does not contradict Himself, if He explicates both for a time as He has willed, as Augustine says.

To another it must be said, that an accident is neither only caused by the principles of the substance in being, nor only contained by the same, but by divine power: hence even with the substance of the subject subtracted according to being, it can be held, because divine power does not depend on a subject containing and causing it, but rather conversely, since as has already been clear, not according to every being is an accident caused by the principles of the subject, because according to the being of its essence or definitive being, it does not depend on the principles of its subject, but rather on those things which enter into its definition.

To another it must be said, that it is answered differently here, and I prejudice no one: for some say that in the passage of those species into another thing, the first substance of those species returns. But some others say that just as the species are there without a subject as if in the act of a substance, so in nourishing they have the act of a substance. And both can be said congruously enough.

To another it must be said, that the accident here is not changed into a substance: and the objection supposes this, and therefore it is not valid.

To another it must be said, that in all accidents information is sufficiently saved except in quantity, as is clear from the things said before, but in quantity it cannot in my judgment be properly said "quantum" by denomination, except in this way by which first things denominate themselves, just as unity is one by itself. And Augustine says,[466] that whiteness is white by itself: although the Philosopher in another sense seems to deny this: for since to denominate belongs to an accidental form, and not a substantial one, as is held from the beginning; and quantity is the first accidental form, it itself will be the first denominating thing: and since it itself is in the place of the subject of the other species which appear there, it will be denominated itself by the others, and denominating itself: and therefore the quantum which is seen there, is the quantity itself, as it seems to me.

To another it must be said, that it is true that the definition is not separated from the defined: but the definition of an accident is twofold, namely according to the being which it has in a subject: and thus those definitions are given which are contained, namely that an accident is that which happens to be in the same thing, and not to be in it: and these belong to an accident according to its name: because an accident is said as if falling towards another. But according to the essence of the accident other definitions are given from the genus and difference of the accident, according as the accident is understood absolutely in its essence: and that definition is not separated from it, such that it remains, as was said: but the objection proceeds as if an accident does not have definitive being except in a subject, and this is not true.

By the same thing the solution to the following is also clear: because animal and biped are of the definition of man, and otherwise to-be-in is of the definition of an accident: because animal and biped constitute the essence of man, but to-be-in does not give the essence to the accident, but only the being which it has in a subject, and with that abstracted the essence of the accident still remains, with something containing it for the use of the sacrament.

To another it must be said, that this must be solved, as the Master said above, through the trope by which those things signing and containing things are accustomed to sort the names of the things which are signed and contained: and this trope is called metonymy by Donatus. Hence Damascene posits there "bread" for the species of bread.

To another it must be said, that that proposition is not valid here: because just as white is related to a surface, so surface is to a subject: because a surface here is contained by divine power for the use of the sacrament, because a surface agrees with the nature of a subject in this, that it itself is the subject of qualities which are in the subject through it: hence it is given to the surface and quantity which according to something agrees with the subject, namely in receiving certain qualities, for the use of the sacrament to agree in whole with the subject, namely regarding its existing through itself without a subject.

To another it must be said, that this proposition, "There will not be a being by accident unless there is a being through itself," is not understood thus, that the essence of an accident does not exist unless the essence of the subject in which it is founded exists: because this is false, since Avicenna expressly says that an accident is that whose being is of an absolute intellect, and is dependent upon a subject: but it is understood that every being by accident is reduced to something through itself, which is prior to it, and this is true: and in this way it is not valid at all for concluding the proposition.

To another it must be said, that I well concede this, that it is absurd to say that an accident is changed into a substance. Hence those things which were objected against this seem to have to be conceded.

To another it must be said, that namely the last one in the first way of objecting, that accident and substance do not differ only in the modes of being through itself and in another, but also in their essences: hence although after the transubstantiation of the substance which is the matter of the sacrament, there is an accident of a subject without a subject through itself, nevertheless it still differs from a substance by the proper essence of accidental nature through itself, namely that it itself in its nature is an accident.

But to this which is objected through the second way, it must be said that this is not valid at all: because the Philosopher does not speak except concerning that operation in which one thing is transmuted into another which throws off from the subject, and not concerning just any operation: because the Philosopher does not consider an accident except as caused and contained in being by a subject: because he himself through reason taken from the natural principles of a thing cannot investigate anything else: therefore he says that it does not act without a subject: but where it is contained by a superior power for demonstrating a divine work in the sacrament, nothing prohibits its operation from also remaining.

To another it must be said, that just as the Philosopher says, Pythagoras called color an epiphany, because it appears on the surface: hence light is understood to be incorporated, when it makes color actually immutative of sight. And what the Philosopher says, that color is the extremity of the transparent in a determinate body, is understood thus, that there is a reflection of light at the determinate body: therefore the extremity of the transparent lucid thing shines more there, and therefore it makes color more in act at the extremity than elsewhere: and therefore also, because light not only abstracts color there, but reflects it to the sight: and the surface of quantity suffices for all those things as long as it remains through itself, and therefore this impedes nothing from the accidents altering the sight.

To another it must be said, that the Philosopher says, that even touch is metaphysical: and therefore that a separated straight line does not touch a bronze sphere, this is because a bronze sphere is a natural body, and has being in matter on the part of the bronze in which it is: and the straight line does not touch insofar as it is straight: but if there were a straight line in nature insofar as it is straight, it would touch in such a way, just as a wooden or copper straight line touches: but those are accidents, and therefore they can act.

To another it must be said, that it receives with matter being present, this is because it receives a species existing in matter: but if it were without matter, it would receive it without matter: hence this happens to the sense, that it does not receive a species unless matter is present, and nevertheless it would receive it, if it were a sensible thing without matter.

To another and the following there is one solution through those things which were said before, namely that there is there a physical touch with respect to qualities altering the touch, and a metaphysical one with respect to quantity: and that there is no substance there, this does not impede the touch: because a substance insofar as it is a substance is sensible by no sense: and that it is required in other things, this is because tangible things do not have being without a subject as here.

To the last the solution is clear through those things which were said before in the solution of the immediately preceding argument.

To that which is objected through the third way, it is heavier to solve. Nevertheless it seems to me to be said, that those species putrefy in that mode which was determined above in a proper question concerning this. And it well seems to me, that worms or certain other things can be generated from putrefaction in one of two ways, namely that either the substance returns, and it becomes the matter of the thing generated from putrefaction: or if it does not return: because then from the mutual action and passion of those species upon the surrounding bodies, something of the surrounding bodies is thrown off, and from that corruption worms are generated materially. But some say that nothing is ever generated from such putrefaction: but this is against what we frequently see, especially if we consecrate in a large quantity.

To another it seems to me to be said, that just as quantity agrees with substance in this, that it itself is the subject of certain accidents, so it also agrees with a property of a substance, that it itself receives contraries according to its own mutation: nevertheless it is not a substance: because this does not belong to it through itself and primarily, but by accident, namely through the substance holding it in being: and this is from the fact that by divine power it is contained in being in the place of a subject, and therefore they are naturally corrupted by the corruption of a contrary.

To another it must be said, that Porretanus without a doubt speaks there concerning accidental form, and speaks concerning it according as it itself is an essence abstracted from this and from that, and not according as it has being in nature through a containing subject, or through divine power for the use of the sacrament: and therefore it is not corruptible in such being.

To the other objects it seems to me it must be conceded plainly.

DISTINCTIO XIII

Divisio Textus

"It is also customary to ask concerning fraction," etc. This distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master first moves a question, what is broken in the sacrament, and solves it according to four opinions. But in the second he touches upon the signification of the parts, there, E, "But what those parts signify," etc.

Still the first is divided into four according to the four opinions touched upon in the Letter. And the second begins there, B, "But others say," etc. The third, there, C, "Others hand down that the body of Christ," etc. The fourth, there, D, "But because the incorruptible body of Christ," etc.

But four things are contained in the first. For first he posits a reason for the fact that the body is broken. Second, a reason to the opposite. Third, he elicits the false opinion of some concerning this. Fourth, he objects against it.

And these things are plainly obvious in the Letter.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is Possible For Something To Be Broken In The Sacrament

Whether it is possible for something to be broken in the sacrament?

But a question falls here, Whether it is possible for something to be broken there?

And it seems, that it is not: § 1. For whatever is not in act according to itself, this is not broken: but an accident is not in act according to itself: therefore it is not broken according to itself: it is necessary therefore, that the body of Christ be broken in itself: but this is impossible: therefore nothing is broken there.

§ 2. Also, fraction sounds of a violent division: but a violent division is by no means except in a substance: but no substance is breakable there: therefore there is no fraction there except according to fantasy.

§ 3. Also, quantity is indeed divisible, but it is not divisible unless founded in another: but this is not founded in another: therefore it is not divisible.

§ 4. Also, quantity cannot be taken except in two ways, namely according to itself, and according to being: but taken according to itself it is not except in the soul, namely in the imagination or intellect: but according to being it is in natural things: therefore either fraction belongs to it according as it is in abstraction and in the soul, or according as it is in being. It is established that not in the first way: because according as it is in the soul it is not a quantity, but an intention of a quantity which is not in the soul except through spiritual being, and thus it is not divisible: therefore if it is broken, fraction belongs to it through the being which it has in natural things: but in the sacrament it is not in any natural thing: therefore fraction does not belong to it there.

§ 5. Also, all generation primarily belongs to a substance, and other things do not have generation except through the fact that they are of a substance, or in a substance: therefore also all corruption will primarily be of a substance, and other things are not corrupted except insofar as they are of a substance or in a substance: but fraction is a kind of corruption: therefore it is of a substance, or of something which is in a substance: but no substance is corruptible there, nor any being in a substance: therefore there is simply no fraction there, but an appearance of fraction.

§ 6. Also, in every division of quantity in which there is a true division, a part of the subject is measured by one part of the quantity, and another part by another: therefore if this is a true division of quantity, one part of some subject is measured by one part, and another part by another: but this is not true: therefore this is not a true division or fraction of quantity: therefore it is fantastical, as the first opinion said in the Letter says.

§ 7. Also, as the Philosopher says in the first book of On the Heavens and the Earth, a continuum is infinitely divisible: but since this is a property of a continuum insofar as it is a continuum, it does not belong to a physical body insofar as it is such: therefore bread will not be divisible to infinity. From this I proceed as follows: Whatever is divided by a division that corrupts the species is not divided by a division of continuous quantity alone, but by a division of a physical or artificial body: but the sacrament, when it is broken, is divided in this way: therefore it is not divided by a division of continuous quantity alone, but by a division of a physical or artificial body. The first premise has been proved. The second is proved thus: For let the breakings be multiplied: now it is certain that eventually there will be non-species of bread [i.e., they will cease to be species of bread]: therefore the proposition is certain: but no physical or artificial body is broken there; therefore there is no true breaking there, but only an apparent one.

§ 8. Also, there does not seem to be any cause which the Master assigns against this opinion from the words of Ambrose, namely that there ought to be nothing false in the sacrament of truth, as there is in magicians' illusions. First: because as it is said in the Text, the apparent breaking is not referred to the thing, and therefore nothing deceives or is deceived there. Second: because Aristotle says that "there is no lie on the part of those who abstract," because they do not refer the abstraction to the reality: therefore neither will there be a lie here of an apparent division, because it is not referred to reality.

§ 9. Also, when the breaking is done, there seem to be many things there: and yet it is certain that there is only one thing there, namely Christ: therefore it appears as it is not, and yet we do not say it is an illusion or a falsity: therefore, similarly, even if it is said that an apparent breaking is there and yet not existing, there will not be falsity or illusion there on this account.

§ 10. Also, the accidents seem to be in something, and yet they are in nothing, as was established before: if therefore falsity is not said to be in the sacrament on this account, neither ought any falsity be said to be in the sacrament on account of those things.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Aristotle says in the first book of the Physics, that if there is only substance, it is indivisible: therefore substance is not primarily divisible, but quantity is: but in the sacrament there is quantity per se, as was shown before: therefore something is divided there per se and properly: but breaking is a certain division: therefore something is broken there per se and properly.

§ 2. Also, whatever has parts that can be taken in themselves, is in itself breakable: but the parts of continuous quantity are taken in themselves in the sacrament: therefore it seems that it is breakable in itself.

§ 3. Also, in the text of the Gospel it is said that he took bread, and blessed it, and broke it, and said: This is my body.[467] Therefore it was most truly broken: therefore there was also a most true breaking.

§ 4. Also, that which is referred to signifying many things according to a plurality of parts must have many parts, if it is to be a true sign: but the sacrament is thus referred according to its parts to the living, and those who are in purgatory, and the blessed: therefore it is necessary that in truth it has many parts: but it is certain that it is not possible to take many parts in one sacrament except through breaking: therefore it is necessary that a most true breaking is there.

§ 5. Also, illusions are those things which are not in reality, but only in the eyes of the beholders: if therefore this breaking is not in reality, but only in the eyes of the beholders, then it will be an illusion, and not a sacrament: but this is unfitting: therefore there is no breaking there, unless it is in some reality.

§ 6. Also, if a mathematician takes division according to act, he can never not refer it to reality: therefore it will be similar in the sacrament: but in the sacrament, an imaginative or merely understood breaking or division is not taken, but according to act: therefore it is referred to reality: therefore something is broken there really and in truth.

§ 7. Also, whatever may be the case regarding division, breaking implies violence: but violence only happens in things: therefore breaking only happens in things: therefore breaking only happens according to reality: therefore it is not only apparent in the sacrament, but existing in truth.

§ 8. Also, if there were only an apparent breaking, there would need to be nothing for the breaking except an act of the soul, and not of the body: but in the sacrament it is necessary that a bodily act be applied, namely a tearing apart by the pressure of fingers or nails: therefore the breaking is not only imaginary, but real and in truth.

SOLUTION. It must be said that the breaking in the sacrament is in truth real, as the last opinion says, which alone clearly holds the truth of the faith.

To the first objection, however, it must be said that the accident which is quantity is there in itself: but to be in itself is to be without a subject, as was said before, that is, not according to natural being, but by divine power containing the species for the use of the sacrament and of faith. Hence, since it is thus held by divine power, it can be broken in itself and divided.

To the next, it must be said that it happens per accidens that no division by violence occurs except in a substance, namely because quantity does not exist according to natural being except in a substance: nevertheless, if it were to exist in itself, it would be divided: but in the sacrament it is in itself, as has been established, and therefore it can be broken and violently divided there.

To the next, it must be said similarly, that it is one way here, and another way in natural things: because here divine power operates according to the requirement of the signification of the sacrament, and therefore it contains quantity here without a subject.

To the next, it must be said that quantity is taken in one way according as it is an accident of a natural thing in whose definition sensible matter falls, and in another way according as by divine power it is referred to the use of the sacrament. And in the first way indeed the introduced objection proceeds, but not in the second way.

To the next, it must be said that this division is a kind of corruption: and I well concede that the accidental form of the bread is naturally corrupted: and how this is done was established and determined in the preceding distinction.[468]

To the next, it must be said that this is true where quantity remains according to natural being: but it has already been established that in the sacrament it is without a subject.

To the next, it must be said that it seems to me it should well be conceded that division could be multiplied so much that the accidental species of bread which remain there would be corrupted: and therefore the breaking that occurs there is not entirely of mathematical quantity, nor even properly of natural quantity, but of that to which natural breaking belongs on account of the fact that it is contained in being by divine power.

To the next objection against the cause which the Master assigns as to why the opinion from the words of Ambrose is not valid, it must be said that it is excellently objected: because the opinion is worthless. But to that which is objected, it must be said that it is impossible not to refer that division which is done in act to reality: because there is no division except in actual reality; and therefore they say nothing. To that which is objected concerning mathematics, it must be said that it is not similar: because in mathematics the proved property belongs to the quantified thing in itself, although it does not belong to this or that quantified thing: but here it is considered not as it belongs to the quantified thing in itself, but rather to this one according as it is some "this".

467. In the first book of On the Trinity.

To the next, it must be said that in truth there are many things and many parts there, but not many sacraments: because that number is not posited concerning the form of the sacrament, but rather concerning the sacramental species.

To the next, it must be said that the accidents seem to be, and the particular sense is not of the substance which underlies the accidents except per accidens: but here the intellect of the sacrament compels that they be taken without a subject. Hence it is false that they seem to be in a subject there: for sense is only of the accidents: and the intellect takes them without a subject on account of the requirement of the sacrament.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Aforesaid Breaking Is In The Body Of Christ, Or Only In The Species

Whether the aforesaid breaking is in the body of Christ, or only in the forms?

Next, it is asked about what he says there, at A, near the beginning: But on the contrary, since the body itself is incorruptible, etc.

For this seems in no way to impede breaking: because § 1. Eating corrupts more than breaking: and yet it is conceded that the body of Christ is eaten: therefore it ought also to be conceded that the body of Christ is broken.

§ 2. Also, whatever the species is proved of, the genus is too: but whatever is eaten is broken by chewing with the attrition of the teeth: therefore if the body of Christ is eaten, the body of Christ is broken.

§ 3. Also, this sacrament is a memorial of the passion: but in the passion the body of Christ was truly divided by nails and a lance: therefore it was broken: therefore the sacrament will not expressly represent this, unless it is also thus divided in the sacrament: therefore the breaking is most truly in the body of Christ.

§ 4. Also, we see some other things impossible according to nature to be in the sacrament: such as one circumscribed body in number being in diverse places, and an accident being without a subject, and a gross inanimate body being transubstantiated into a divine glorious animate body: therefore I ask, why are those things conceded to be in the sacrament, but not that what is incorruptible is simultaneously broken?

SOLUTION. It must be said that without a doubt the breaking is not in the body of Christ, but rather only in the forms.

To the first, however, it must be said that eating implies many things, namely the division of food by the teeth, and passing it into the body, and digestion, and incorporation, or union. And yet it is passively conceded that the body of Christ is eaten by reason of that which is to pass into the body, because the true body of Christ is passed under the species of the sacrament into our body: but the division by the teeth is referred to the species: while digestion is not there: because it does not pass into the draught, and spiritual union or incorporation passively belongs to the eater, as was shown above, and thus it is clear that eating does not posit breaking.

To the next, the solution is clear, that eating is not a species of breaking by reason of passing into the body, but by reason of attrition by the teeth, and that is not referred to the body of Christ.

To the next, it must be said that the passion is represented in the sacrament according as it is effective of redemption and solvent of the price: and this is clear from the very act of immolation into which we offer the sacrament which Christ offered for us on the altar of the cross: but the particular inflicted punishments are not represented, and therefore it would not be fitting for the body of Christ to be divided.

To the next, it must be said that contraries, or things from which things disposed by affirmation and negation directly follow, are never posited to be simultaneously: because this cannot be done. But when it is said that it is simultaneously in many places, this is said by reason of the consecration which is done in many places, and from this there does not follow any opposite to it: and thus regarding the others introduced. But if it were conceded to be broken, since to be broken is to be corrupted in a certain way, it would be necessary by the topic from species to concede that it would be corrupted: and by the fact that it is incorruptible, it has it that it is not corrupted: therefore it would simultaneously be corrupted, and not be corrupted: which is that opposites by affirmation and negation are true simultaneously, which cannot be done.

Articulus 3 — Whether When Christ Showed Himself To The Disciples On The Way In The Appearance Of A Stranger, He Performed A Simulative Or Illusory Act

Whether, when Christ showed himself to the disciples on the road in the species of a pilgrim, he performed a simulated or illusory act?

Next, it is asked about what they introduce for an example there, at A, toward the end: Just as Christ also showed himself to two disciples on the road in the species of a pilgrim, etc.

For it seems to have been an illusion: § 1. For what is not of the essence of a thing does not make the thing true or false in its substance: but what is intended by the agent is not of the substance of his act or deed, because the end is not part of the thing: therefore it neither makes the thing false, nor true: therefore the fact that he did this for the utility of faith did not make his act non-simulatory.

§ 2. Also, simulation is not perfected in one person only, but in two, namely in one showing what is not, and in another understanding it as an ostension of simulation: but the Gospel expressly says that he pretended to go further, and the disciples thought he wanted this: therefore there was a perfect illusion there.

§ 3. Also, nothing is recognized under a species which is in no way in it except by an illusion or an infirmity of the beholder's eye: therefore what is seen neither illusorily nor by an infirm eye, is seen under its proper species: but the disciples' eyes were not infirm, nor bound by illusion: therefore the species which they saw in God was the species of a pilgrim: but it is certain that according to truth he was not a pilgrim: therefore the species of a pilgrim was simulated by him, and thus there was a most true illusion there.

SOLUTION. It must be said that there was no illusion there. Hence it must be said that the example is good: but nevertheless that that to which it is introduced by that opinion to confirm is false.

To the first, however, it must be said that intention makes the agent non-simulatory: but what is intended is twofold, namely in the work, and through the work: what was intended in the work was to show them through a likeness what sort he was at that time in the minds of the disciples, and as to this he acted most truly and not in a simulated way: because no one else demonstrates this thus: but what was intended through the work was not in the work, but following from it, namely the confirmation of the disciples' faith as to the article of the resurrection, and this is outside the work, and does not make the work true, or simulatory, but rather the first does: just as we also do not say that Ezekiel simulated when he had the house dug through, and himself carried out secretly: because at that time he demonstrated that they would have to flee thus from their houses in transmigration.

To the next, it must be said that simulation is also in one in comparison to another: but it was not so here, but rather instruction through an act which he exercised for the sake of the disciples: because instruction which is done by the likeness of parables and works is easier.

To the next, it must be said that the disciples' eyes in truth were held, and what held them was their doubt of the resurrection. Hence Christ presented himself to them in his proper species: and yet on account of the impotence of the nonglorified eye, they did not see him under the light of a glorified body, but rather under the species of color: and the doubt of the resurrection made them estimate him to be a pilgrim, because they saw him coming from the place of adoration, namely Jerusalem. Hence it is clear that there was no simulation there.

Articulus 4 — Whether, The Consecration Having Been Made, All The Accidents Remain, And Also Mathematical Solidity According To Real Being

Whether, once the consecration is done, all accidents remain, and even mathematical solidity according to real being?

Next, it is asked about the second opinion which begins there, at B: But others say, that just as the species of bread is there, and the thing whose or in which that species is is not there, etc.

For what they introduce as an example seems to be false, namely that there is a species there, and not some thing whose species it is:

§ 1. For it is sufficiently certain from what has been held before, that it is not understood of a substantial species, because that does not remain after consecration, but of an accidental one which does remain: therefore either every accidental species remains there, or some. If every one: therefore also mathematical solidity: therefore a body remains there: therefore after consecration that body which is the species is there: but it is certain that the true body of Christ is not that species, nor any part of those species: therefore the true body of Christ is not that body which remains in the number of the species: therefore after consecration some body remains which is not the body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, which was denied in the preceding distinction in the Text.

§ 2. Also, whatever body is found without something is not the same as that without which it is found: but the body which is trinal dimension is found in the sacrament without the body which is bread before consecration: therefore it is not the same as it: therefore in the sacrament there are three bodies, namely the body of bread, and the dimensional body, and the body of Christ: and no one says this.

§ 3. Also, the Philosopher in the fourth book of the Metaphysics in Boethius's translation, objecting against Plato, left it as unfitting that a mathematical body different from a natural one, and a natural body, should be in the same place: therefore this will be unfitting here too: but if a mathematical body remains there, and a natural body, two bodies of which one is mathematical and the other is natural are in the same place, which the Philosopher says is unfitting: therefore there is no such body there.

§ 4. Also, it is impossible for the same lines in number to belong to two bodies: but the passing body which is bread, and the remaining body which is mathematical solidity, are two bodies: therefore the same lines in number will not belong to those bodies: but it is certain that there were some lines by which the bread was measured: therefore there will already be three quantified bodies in the sacrament, namely the bread, and that which is seen as quantified and round after consecration, and the body of Christ: and this will be a marvel, for what purpose they are there.

If on this account it is said that not all species remain in the sacrament, this will be unreasonable, since the rationale is the same for one accidental species remaining and for another.

Moreover, it was shown above that quantity especially remains there as the foundation of the other species: but there is no reason why length should remain, and not width and depth: therefore it seems that the whole mathematical solidity remains.

Also, Euclid in the beginning of the Geometry says that a mathematical body is that which has length, width, and depth: but we see that the remaining species itself has this: therefore a mathematical body remains, and thus it returns to the same thing as before.

SOLUTION. It must be said that just as in the preceding opinion, so too in this one the example is most true: but nevertheless the opinion confirmed by the example is false: and I well concede that all the accidental species remain, and even the mathematical solidity remains there according to real being, not only in the soul according as it has being in abstraction.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that I do not consider it unfitting that after consecration there are two things in the sacrament, each of which is a body: but nevertheless they are not properly called two bodies: because "body" is not predicated by one rationale of the natural and the mathematical, as some say. But nevertheless it seems to me it should be said, if we wish to speak properly, that there are two bodies, namely a natural and a mathematical one: one of which is a body per se and substantially; while the other is not per se, but by denomination and measure from the former, namely the natural: and nothing prohibits such two bodies from being in the sacrament, and this was not denied above, but rather that there are not two natural bodies there consisting of matter and form which are parts of a physical body.

To the next, it must be said that that proposition is false, unless it is understood to be something else that is a different essence: for the essence of a substance is one thing, and that of an accident is another, if indeed an accident is some essence. Hence if the accident were to remain once the subject was corrupted, the mathematical quantity would be denominated from it: just as we say that this which we see on the altar is a white figure, this white thing will not be diverse from the first white thing which was the bread, unless it be a different essence, but in subject it is the same. For the Philosopher says that one per accidens is said in three ways, namely as accident and subject, as white, and this pointing to whatever, etc.: but it is true that whatever things are separated by nature, those are substantially diverse: but divine power operating for the use of the sacrament does in the sacrament what is above nature, as has often been said.

To the next, it must be said that in my judgment, two bodies, whether natural or mathematical, or of which one is natural and the other mathematical, provided there are two quantities there, cannot be in the same place by nature. Hence I say without prejudice that the body is indeed in truth in the sacrament, but not as in a place, but in a sign: but this will be clearer below in this same distinction, in the explanation of the fourth opinion. And therefore the objection which supposed that there were two bodies there as in a place, supposed what is false, and proceeds from false premises.

But if it is objected that wherever there is some body contained in another body through the truth of its nature and quantity, there it is as in a place: I say that this is false: but this cannot be unraveled without a long disputation which we will posit immediately below, the Lord conceding.

To the next, it must be said that as was clear before, there were the numerically same lines of the bread as subject, which remain essentially in the sacramental forms: and therefore there were never three bodies there, nor three of which each is a subject body divided from another.

Articulus 5 — Whether, The Breaking Having Been Made, One Sacrament Remains, But There Are Several Species There

Whether, when the breaking is done, one sacrament remains, but there are multiple forms there?

But it is still asked about that opinion which is touched upon in the Text, there at C: Thus there is a breaking there which is not done in any reality, etc.

For it seems to be true. For thus we see that in a body which in potency is two, if it is divided, it becomes two in act and its essential being is predicated of it as two according to being: as a line divided in act is two lines, and two lengths, and two quantities: therefore that whose essential principle remains one according to being, remains undivided: but "sacrament" is essentially predicated of the species, and that remains one once division is done: therefore that division was not in the species, nor in the body of Christ: therefore it is not divided there.

But that it is essentially predicated of these species, is taken from this, that the one falls into the definition of the other, as was clear in the beginning of this book in the Text.

Also, that it remains one sacrament according to act, this is clear from the supposition of all: because through everything that is done in the canon, they do not intend to confect except one sacrament.

Furthermore it is asked: In what does this opinion differ from the preceding one?

For it seems that in nothing: because the preceding one said that a breaking is seen there which is not, since nothing is broken: but this one seems to say exactly the same thing according to reality: therefore it seems either to say what is false, or to be superfluous: since it relates one thing twice or as two.

To this it must be said that one sacrament remains, and the form becomes many forms through division. But that proposition which was introduced, that when an inferior is divided according to being, that which is predicated of it is multiplied, is understood of those things which absolutely inhere in the inferior: but if they inhere respectively, it is not necessary: as if a white thing is divided, there will be two white things, but nevertheless not two likenesses of the white things to a third white thing, but rather one likeness: because a relation does not receive unity or multiplicity from that in which it is, properly in that it is a relation, but rather from that to which it is: and this is clear from the definition of relatives which according to the Philosopher are "whatever are what they are, are said of others." Hence also a relation is more a ratio [concept or account] than a being or an essence: but nevertheless it has something of being or something of essence. But the ratio of the sacrament is in relation: and therefore it draws unity from that of which it is the sign, as of the interior and caused reality which it signifies.

To the next, it must be said that this opinion differs from the one held before: because that one posited that the division is in truth in the sacrament according as it is an act of the one dividing, and not according as it is an act of the divided thing: but the preceding one did not say that division is in the sacrament except according as the division is apparent to sense, but not existing in the truth of reality.

Articulus 6 — Whether That Opinion Is True Which Says That The Body Of Christ Is Essentially Broken And Divided, And Yet Remains Entire And Incorruptible

Whether that opinion is true which says that the body of Christ is essentially broken and divided: and yet remains whole and incorruptible?

Next, it is asked about the third opinion which he touches upon, there at C: Others hand down that the body of Christ is essentially broken and divided, etc.

For this seems to belong to the sacrament: because § 1. They say that since all preceding things in this sacrament are above nature, something also in the breaking ought to be above nature: but this cannot be, except in this that the unbreakable is broken, and yet remains whole: therefore the opinion of these men will stand. But that in all preceding things there is something above nature, is clear in the converted thing, and in the conversion, and the remaining of accidents without a subject, and again in its containment under such small species.

§ 2. Also, in this sacrament an inanimate material body in some way tempers itself by the power of the words to an animate, divine, and glorious body: therefore conversely also in some way the divine body ought to be tempered to a non-glorious material body: but it cannot conform itself to it, unless it is broken: therefore it seems to be essentially broken.

§ 3. Also, it is customary to say that in this sacrament the Lord shows Himself omnipotent, who did this which human reason cannot understand; since He ought especially to do this in the breaking, in which the body is adapted to the parts of the Church which are in glory, or in the world, or in hell, that is, purgatory: it seems that especially in this He ought to do something above the intellect: therefore the body is broken, and yet remains undivided.

§ 4. Also, Gregory says that "faith has no merit for which human reason provides proof:" therefore also in the breaking it is fitting that there be something which is removed from human reason: but that the species be broken is not alien to reason: therefore the body ought to be broken, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Christ was offered whole and entire for individuals : but the division is referred to the parts of the Church: since therefore He was offered whole for the individual parts, the whole Christ ought to remain in the individual parts: therefore He ought not to be broken.

§ 2. Also, contradictories cannot be verified simultaneously: but that the body of Christ is broken and not broken are contradictories simultaneously and in respect to the same thing: therefore they cannot be verified simultaneously: therefore the opinion is false.

SOLUTION. It must be said that this opinion is false and not to be posited: because, as has been proved by reasons, it accords neither with faith nor with reason.

To the first therefore, it must be said that although some things are above nature, it is not necessary that that be above nature, because it does not belong to the sacrament: for some things operate toward the being of the sacrament, some toward its use: and those which are toward the being of the sacrament are above nature: but those which are toward its use need not be above nature: and the breaking is ordered to the use of the sacrament, not to its being, the sign of which is that the breaking is done on account of the triform parts of the Church for which this sacrament is offered, and not as something which operates or pertains to the being of the sacrament.

To the next, it must be said that this is not necessary: because the inanimate material body is not assumed, except so that through transubstantiation a divine glorious body may come to be there: and therefore the bread is transubstantiated into the glorious body of Christ, as was said above in the question on transubstantiation: for the body of Christ is not transubstantiated into bread, but conversely.

To the next, it must be said that it is not entirely a sign of omnipotence to do things which are above reason, except in such things as are necessary for salvation, and are expedient for the Church: otherwise it would follow that God would operate better by doing contrary to the order of nature, than by operating according to nature.

To the next, it must be said that faith has no proof from human reason: but this is understood such that it does not lean on reason, but on truth: for reason obeys faith: hence in the heart of the believer reason leans on faith, and not faith on reason: and thus the saying of Gregory is understood.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Confession Of Berengar, Who Confessed Before The Pope That The Bread And Wine Which Are Placed On The Altar, After The Consecration, Are Not Only A Sacrament, But Also The True Body Of Christ, etc., Is True

Whether the confession of Berengar, who confessed before the Pope that the bread and wine which are placed on the altar, after consecration are not only a sacrament, but also the true body of Christ, etc., is true?

Next, it is asked about the confession of Berengar who says, there at the end of C: But in truth to be handled by the hands of the priests and broken, and ground by the teeth of the faithful.

§ 1. For if this confession was received by Pope Nicholas, and many Bishops, then it seems to be rash if anyone should think otherwise: but here the Master says that one should think otherwise: therefore he is rash.

§ 2. Also, whatever is commanded by the Apostolic See to be published in diverse parts of the world as of the faith, that must be held for the faith: but this confession was published by the command of Pope Nicholas: thus therefore it is to be held for the faith. That this is so is taken from the decree on consecration, where it is said thus: "This confession of his faith concerning the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, made by Berengar at Rome before one hundred and fifteen Bishops, Pope Nicholas sent through the cities of Italy, Germany, Gaul, and to whatever places the fame of his depravity could have previously reached."[469]

§ 3. Also, there it is said, that after the confes-

§ 1. ... a written confession in these words, he swore saying: "By the holy consubstantial [homousion] Trinity, and by these sacrosanct Gospels, I pronounce that those who come against this faith with their dogmas and followers are worthy of eternal anathema." From this it is gathered that the council decreed those should be excommunicated who would hold any other sentiment than what Berengarius professed. And it seems that almost the entire universality of Doctors who hold the fourth opinion falls into excommunication.

§ 2. 4. Also, at the beginning of his confession Berengarius says: "I consent, moreover, to the holy Roman Church and the Apostolic see: and with mouth and heart I confess regarding the sacraments of the Lord's table that I hold the same faith which the Lord and the venerable Pope Nicholas and this holy synod by Evangelical and Apostolic authority handed down to be held, and affirmed to me." From all these things it seems that the Masters do poorly in condemning this opinion.

§ 3. Solution. It must be said that the opinion which is posited as third is not sound, nor is it to be held.

§ 4. To this which is objected concerning Berengarius's confession, it must be said that that confession was introduced for one purpose in the council before Pope Nicholas, and it is introduced for another purpose here: for in the council it is introduced because he himself used to say that the body of Christ was not truly on the altar after consecration: but only in a sacrament, that is, in a sign, and not in truth: and therefore in order that he might express that it is there in truth, he was compelled to this mode of expression. But that it is so, is clear from Berengarius's confession, where he speaks thus: "I anathematize all heresy, especially that of which I have hitherto been defamed: which attempted to assert that the bread and wine which are placed on the altar, after consecration, are only a sacrament, and not the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ." Hence the Pope compelled him to such a mode of expression, which shows that by all means, in whatever mode the forms are made, held, retained, and replaced, after consecration they always contain the true body whether beneath the teeth or beneath the hands: and this indeed is true.

§ 5. Hence this is also conceded, that the true body of Christ is ground by the teeth of the faithful in the sacrament: but this is not to be conceded here simply [i.e., without qualification] without a determination. For when it is said that the true body of Christ is ground by the teeth of the faithful in the sacrament, the attrition refers not to the truth of the body of Christ contained, but to the containing forms: and this the Pope and the council understood: because this was directly contrary to his heresy which he had previously held.

§ 6. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that the confession is not commanded to be extended, except for the sake of the fact that the body of Christ is in truth contained under the species after the consecration.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that he swore only concerning the truth of the body of Christ contained under the sacrament.

§ 8. And in the same way it must be responded to all the things that are objected concerning his confession.

469. Decretum Gratiani, De consecratione, dist. 2.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Opinion Of Those Is True Who Say That In The Sacrament There Is No Breaking Or Partition Which Is Not In The Substance And In The Sacrament

Whether the opinion of those is true who say that in the sacrament there is no fraction or partition, which is not in the substance and in the sacrament?

Whether the opinion of those is true who say that in the sacrament there is no fraction or partition, which is not in the substance and in the sacrament?

§ 11. Next, it is inquired concerning the fourth opinion which says that there is a true fraction and partition there which occurs not in the substance, but in the sacrament.

§ 12. For this seems to be false: because 1. If some one thing belongs to several, such that it is in the others from the one which is its cause in all, if that does not exist, it will not be in any of the others: but fraction is not in the accidents unless it is caused by a broken substance: therefore, if a broken substance does not exist, there will be no fraction in any of the accidents. The proof of the major [premise] is: because since fire is the cause of heat in all things, if no fire exists, nothing will be hot: and if the first mover is the cause of motion in all things, if the first does not exist, it will not move nor will any of the other moving things be moved. The proof of the minor is intimated in the Text, namely that fraction primarily belongs to substance.

§ 13. 2. Also, every form insofar as it is of itself, unites and contains that whose form it is: if therefore a plurality according to being occurs, this will be from the matter: therefore it is necessary that some things according to being are diverse and multiplied there: therefore in multiple parts there will be broken matter.

§ 14. Solution. It must be said to the first, that although some say that division and fraction also primarily belong to substance, and secondarily to a quantum [i.e., a quantified thing]: I however do not say this, because I do not understand it: because the Philosopher says that if there is only one thing which is substance, it itself is indivisible: and therefore since the first cause of fraction and division is not matter or substance, but rather quantity: therefore the first reason does not seem to proceed.

§ 15. But to that which seems to be intimated from the Text as a proof of this, it seems it must be said that he intimates this in the Text: not because fraction primarily belongs to substance, but because accidents cannot be received except in a substance: and because fraction does not belong to them except as received according to their being, therefore he intimates in the Text that nothing according to nature is broken, except in a substance: however, in truth, if anyone wished to say properly what it is that is broken, he would say that it is a quantified substance per se [i.e., in itself]: but because an accident in the sacrament has being apart from a substance, therefore it belongs to it per se to be broken without a substance.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that a form of itself unites that whose form it is: but division belongs to it per accidens, that is, according to its being: but this being is twofold:

according to nature in matter, and according to the use of the sacrament per se, as has been said more often above.

Articulus 9 — Whether It Can Be Said That The Accidents After The Consecration Remain In The Air

Whether it can be said that the accidents remain in the air after consecration?

§ 19. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the beginning: Although some assert that they are founded in the air.

Peter Lombard, Sentences, IV, d. 12, c. 1.

§ 20. This opinion seems to be conceded: because 1. As long as something is consonant with the faith, the more it approaches reason, the more it is to be conceded: but it more approaches reason that they are in the air, than without a subject: therefore it should more be conceded.

§ 21. 2. Also, the truth of the sacrament is not excluded by this: because the whole body of Christ is contained there in any part whatever: therefore someone can opine this.

§ 22. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Air is a humid, spiritual, undetermined element: therefore what is founded in it flows, and does not hold shapes in it: therefore if the forms are founded in the air, they retain no shapes: and this is false to the senses: therefore they are not founded in the air.

§ 23. 2. Also, the Philosopher says that accidents contribute to the knowledge of that which a thing is [quod quid est], that is, of a substance: therefore an accident leads to the knowledge of the subject: therefore those forms would lead to the knowledge of the air, if they were founded in the air: but simultaneously and at once one thing behaving in the same way does not lead to the knowledge of diverse things: therefore those accidents would not lead to the knowledge of the body of Christ: therefore they would be in the sacrament in vain, which is unfitting: therefore they are not founded in the air.

§ 24. Solution. It must be said that they are not founded in the air, as is clear from the last two reasons.

§ 25. But to the first it must be said that neither is very close to reason, namely that the accidents are there without a subject, or that they are founded in the air: but nevertheless because this is more according to the fittingness of the sacrament, that they are without a subject, therefore this is conceded, and the other is not.

§ 26. To the other it must be said that the truth of the sacrament would not be excluded by this: and therefore those who said this are not considered heretics: but the fittingness of the sacrament, and of those things which are in the sacrament, would be excluded by this: and therefore it is not conceded.

Articulus 10 — How The Whole Body Of Christ Is Contained Under So Small A Form In The Sacrament

How is the whole body of Christ contained under such a small form in the sacrament?

§ 29. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, after the beginning: But Christ remains entire, and is whole in each single part.

Peter Lombard, Sentences, IV, d. 12, c. 2.

§ 30. For there is a grave question: How is the whole body of Christ contained under such a small form?

§ 31. For it seems that this is impossible: 1. For the Philosopher says that place and the placed are equal according to quantity: but the placed is the body of Christ, while the placing is the species which appears: therefore they are equal through quantity, which is false, since the body of Christ is perhaps three cubits or a little less, while the placing scarcely has the width of one finger.

§ 32. 2. Also, Euclid in book II of the Geometry says that a body is what has length, width, and depth: therefore what contains it, must necessarily contain it according to length, width, and depth: but it is unintelligible how the greater could be contained by the lesser according to every dimension, since that form is smaller in every dimension than the true body of Christ which hung on the cross: therefore it seems that it cannot contain it.

§ 33. 3. Also, the particles of the body and of the place, as the Philosopher says, are joined at one common boundary: therefore wherever it is possible to take the particles of the body, it is necessary that the particles of the body of the place be joined to the same, and conversely: but according to two or more cubits it is possible to take the particles of the Lord's body, which hung on the cross: therefore the particles of the place will be extended that much: therefore also the containing forms, which we see to be false, because the form scarcely exceeds the quantity of a fingernail.

§ 34. 4. Also, the sacrament, as the ancients said, contains its realities as medicinal vessels contain medicines: but a vessel is of a larger extension than the thing itself which is in the vessel: therefore the sacramental form is also of a larger extension than the body of Christ: and this we see to be false: therefore the sacramental species does not contain the whole Christ.

posed in demonstrative sciences that the greater is not equaled to the lesser: but the container and the contained, if they are properly taken, are equaled: therefore they are equal: but the form contains, and the body of Christ is contained: therefore they are equal. Hence thus: The species is the size of a finger, and the body of Christ is the size of two cubits: therefore the finger-sized and the two-cubits-sized are equal: but the two-cubits-sized is greater than the finger-sized: therefore the greater is equaled to the lesser, which is also impossible.

§ 37. 6. Also, if a line goes out from the center of the placed to the surface of the place, and another from the center of the place to the surface of the placed, those lines will be equal. The proof of this is: because they differ only by a point: and this does not add any length. Therefore let a line be drawn from the center of Christ's body to the surface of Christ's body according to whatever dimension, and let another be drawn from the center of the species to its surface: therefore those will be equal, which to the senses is false.

§ 38. 7. Also, equal things are, as is said in the first book of Euclid, those which when superimposed upon one another do not exceed one another: but the body of Christ does not exceed the quantity of the species, nor conversely: therefore they are equal: but the body of Christ is seven feet, assuming it is that much: therefore the quantity of those species is seven feet, which is also against the senses.

§ 39. 8. Also, just as a whole container is filled by the contained, so the container and the contained are of the same shape: but that whole form is filled by the body of Christ: therefore the form and the body of Christ are of the same shape: but that form is round: therefore also the body of Christ is round, which is false, since it has a face, and hands, and feet, differing in position.

§ 40. 9. Also, when something is contained through its whole quantity and substance in another, there will be the head in a determinate part, and the feet in another: let it be asked, therefore, where in that form is the head, and where the feet? If you say, above: therefore if someone divides below, there will be nothing under that except the feet, which is false. But if you say, below: then you will have an inverted head: and this is ridiculous.

§ 41. 10. If someone because of this wishes to say that the body of Christ is not in those species like a placed thing in a place, but rather like the signified in a sign: this seems to be the heresy of Berengarius condemned above: therefore it must not be said thus.

§ 42. Moreover it is asked, Whether the signified according to the truth of its whole quantity is contained by the sign, or is not contained, but is only signified? If in the first way: then the same question will return. If in the second way: then the heresy of Berengarius occurs, who said that Christ is contained in the sacrament not according to truth, but according to signification.

§ 43. To this some wish to say that the glorious body of Christ is now in a place not by the mode of a gross body, but by the mode of a spiritual body: and that it might be better understood, they posit a simile in a spiritual body which they say to be light, which is indeed positionally dilated through the world, and yet could be whole in one point. And this indeed is their statement, which if I understand well, I understand to be stated thus, that of a body having a dimensive quantity there are twofold parts: so that some have part next to part: and this demands a place equal to itself. Another is that which behaves indifferently to this, whether it has part next to part, and whether it has part under part: and therefore indifferently it can be in the place of the part and of the whole, and in an indivisible place on account of its spirituality. And this indeed I have fabricated to understand the statements of some moderns: because it is clear that none of the ancients agree with them. Therefore it can be said according to them that the body of Christ is of maximal simplicity among bodies: and therefore it behaves indifferently to this that it has part next to part, and part under part, and therefore it can be in a place smaller than its stature, and even an indivisible one.

§ 44. But that this figment cannot stand is proven thus: because shape is the termination of a quantity according to a certain mode of eminence and depression in natural bodies: just as the shape of a man is one thing, and that of a donkey is another: therefore that shape is either the termination of a quantum which has part next to part, or part under part, or as regards both. If in the first way, I have my proposition: because the Philosopher says in the First Philosophy [i.e., Metaphysics] that every natural body has a proper shape, without which it is not itself in its species: and the Commentator says the same on book II of De Anima. Either therefore Christ's body retains its one shape, or it does not. If so: therefore under the species it has part next to part, and then the first question returns. If not: therefore Christ is there without the shape of a nose, and of eyes, and of a mouth, and with the shape not existing, those very members are also not present: therefore he will be there without members, like a trunk, and not even like a trunk, because even the shape of a trunk is destroyed there. But if shape is the termination of a quantum according as it has part under part. On the contrary: Having part under part, it has or can have all parts in one, and then that is indivisible by the senses: therefore the same thing seems to be capable of the shape of the whole, and of the part: but the shape of a nose tends to a cone and inside is triangular: and the shape of a trunk is round and circular: therefore in the same indivisible according to sense there will be a circular shape, and a pyramidal one, inside triangular: which if it is intelligible, it is a wonder.

§ 46. Also, some parts of a man are such that by their nature they are concave, like the nose, the chest, and the like: therefore in that indivisible they are either remaining concave, or compressed under one part. If in the first way: therefore a part will be next to a part and in an indivisible, and not under a part. If in the second way: therefore the glorious body is compressed, and its shape is destroyed, and consequently its nature, as was said before. If it is said that the glorious body behaves in a third way, the same impossibility follows.

§ 47. Moreover, when a part is said to be under a part: either it is understood that the preposition 'under' notes the site and position of one under another only, or containment. If in the first way: therefore it grows as much in increment underneath on account of the aggregation of quantitative parts, as it diminishes in width, or in length: and thus it will not avail for the proposition: because that form will not contain it according to that site which the preposition 'under' notes. If it notes containment: therefore the whole or all the parts can be in one: which again is a wonder if anyone understands it.

§ 48. If perhaps you say that to be part under part notes the indifference of the parts with respect to place, and not with respect to something else. On the contrary: Place is given to a quantum insofar as the quantum is limitable or terminable outside: therefore whatever things have a difference in such a quantity, necessarily differ according to site: but thus do the whole and the part differ: therefore their place will have a difference.

§ 49. If perhaps you say that all these things are true of a body which poses an obstacle to another, and this is a gross and material one: but a spiritual body which is like light is not such. On the contrary: These reasons suppose nothing except the quantity of a body: therefore they indifferently conclude in any body whatever having quantity.

§ 50. Also, let us take some celestial body, whose substance is that it is a round body, having a diameter of a hundred cubits: I ask, whether with this shape remaining it can be in a place indivisible with respect to the senses? If so: therefore the shape received according to being of a hundred cubits in diameter and three hundred in circumference, without its corruption can be in that which is indivisible according to sense: and this is to say that the heaven can be locally in one grain of millet: which he who says, need not deny anything absurd. If in the second way: then the reasons previously held also hold in spiritual bodies.

of the question concerning the resurrection, for now let the things which have been said suffice.

§ 53. But BY SOLVING we say to the question, that Christ is compared to created things in three ways. For he is compared as God, and thus he is in things in three ways: in one way which belongs to the Father and the Holy Spirit, by which he is in all things essentially, presentially, and potentially. In another way the same belongs to the Father and the Holy Spirit, by which he is in the saints through indwelling grace. In a third way distinct from the Father and the Holy Spirit, by which he is in human nature through union.

§ 54. In the second way he is compared to other things through the assumed flesh, according as he was born of the Virgin, and hung on the cross: and thus he is in place through circumscription.

§ 55. In the third way, according as he, existing full of grace in deity and humanity, by a supermundane rationale is the sacramental reality, and the spiritual food of the Church, and thus he is in the sacrament. Hence just as bread is not according to part and part in this and another ratio of food, but the same ratio of food is in the whole and in any part of the food: so he himself, in order that the signified may correspond to the sign, is not in one part otherwise than in another, but in one mode essentially in the whole: and if it is divided into parts, he will be in any part. And similarly concerning the wine in which there is one ratio of signifying the whole in the whole, and in any part: and therefore although the wine is divided, he will be whole who was under the whole species of wine, and whole under any part: and therefore no reasons are to be received in this sacrament, which are not according to the operation of the sacrament toward being, or use. Hence just as by a supermundane rationale the divine power operates toward the being of the sacrament in transubstantiation and the measure of accidents without a subject: so also it commensurates itself to the whole and to the part according to the fittingness of the signified to the sign: and therefore the reasons which were concerning the comparison of the placed to the place are completely worthless: because although Christ is there quantified in the truth of quantity and substance, nevertheless it is not according to the laws of place and the placed, but according to the laws of the signified in the sacrament and of the sign containing that which it signifies according to the property of the sacraments of the new law, which this sacrament most fully has among all the sacraments of the new law.

§ 56. It must be said therefore to the first, that a falsehood is supposed by objecting: because that form is not related to the body of Christ like a place to the placed, but rather like a containing sign to a signified thing contained according to truth, not indeed according to the laws of place, but according to the laws of a sign: and therefore even if it is broken, in any part the whole will be, which would not be the case if he were in it as in a place.

§ 57. To the other it must be said that the body of Christ has all three dimensions with a proper shape, and without any contraction, and therefore it is most truly a body: but it is not compared to that form as to a place or an equal to which it is commensurated, but rather, as has been said, as the signified to the sign.

§ 58. To the other it must be said, as has been said, that they do not relate to one another like place and the placed.

§ 59. To the other it must be said that the ancients did not understand that the sacraments were certain vessels insofar as a place is a vessel, but insofar as a vessel is related in a certain way to the act of the medicine and the physician: for we say that the physician heals, and the medicine and the enema and the funnel: but the physician effectively, and the medicine as a power conjoined to nature, and the enema is like an instrument placing the medicine in the due place: and so God, and grace, and the sacrament are related in the healing of the soul: hence the objection introduced is worthless.

§ 60. To the other it must be said that the lesser is not equaled to the greater: for this has been demonstrated: but here there is no comparison of a quantum to a quantum according to the law and principle of quantity, but rather according to the ratio of food it is compared to the conjoined: and because that ratio is one in the whole and in the part, therefore by one ratio it is compared to the whole and the part, as has been said.

§ 62. To the other it must be said that according to the ratio of the sacrament no line can go out from the center of the round form which appears on the altar, nor is its center figurable: because thus it would already be considered according to the principles and laws of quantity, and we have already said that the commensuration of Christ's body to the sacrament is not thus there: and therefore that objection is worthless.

§ 63. To the other it must be said that equality is twofold, namely according to the quantity of bulk, and according to the quantity of power: equality between the sign and the signified is not considered according to the quantity of bulk, but according to the quantity of power: so that, namely, since there that signified is contained, which that sign also contains, and this is equally in the whole and the part, by the reason stated above, by which we said that the ratio of food is one in the whole and in the part.

§ 64. To the other it must be said that it does not follow, if a whole container is filled by the contained, that it is of the same shape, unless the contained is in the container like a placed thing in a place: but this is not the case here, as has been said more often.

§ 65. In the same way I respond to the following: because this is not true except of those things which are in others in such a way that one part is in one part of the container, and another in another: in the sacrament of the Eucharist it is not so: but there is one comparison of the contained to the whole and to the part on account of one ratio of signifying spiritual food in the whole and in the part.

§ 66. To that which is objected against the induced reason, it must be said that if anyone were to say that the body of Christ is not in the sacrament according to the truth of substance and quantity, but only like a signified thing remote through substance from the sign, he would be of the heresy of Berengarius: but we do not say thus, but rather we say that the signified itself is in the sign substantially in its whole quantity: and therefore, the Lord granting, we will have nothing in common with heresy.

§ 67. To the other it must be said that some things are in a place according to the truth of substance and quantity, and according to the laws of place and the placed: but some are in a place according to the truth of substance and not of quantity, nor according to the law of place: and some are in an intermediate way in something, not as in a place, through the truth of substance and quantity, and not according to the laws of place, but according to the law of that in which they are or are said to be. In the first way, those things are in a place which are circumscribed in a place. In the second way, those things are in a place which are defined in a place, like created spirits. In the third way, the body of Christ is in the sacrament, not according to the law of place, but according to the law of a sign signifying spiritual food equally in the whole and in the part: and therefore the solution of that objection is clear.

§ 68. To the other which is objected concerning the induced opinion, without prejudice let him respond who wishes: because I was never able to understand that light was a body, or that a body had part under part, or that two bodies could be in the same place. And therefore what I do not understand, I do not presume to defend: but our opinion is that which has been said: and below, in the question concerning the resurrection, it will become clear what I think concerning glorious bodies.

Articulus 11 — Whether Each Of The Faithful Communicating Receives The Whole Christ Or His Part; And, Whether The Whole Christ Is In Any Part Of The Host

Whether each of the faithful communicating receives the whole Christ or his part? and, Whether the whole Christ is in any part whatever of the host?

Whether each of the faithful communicating receives the whole Christ or his part? and, Whether the whole Christ is in any part whatever of the host?

§ 71. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the middle: The faithful know how they eat the flesh of Christ: each one receives his part.

Peter Lombard, Sentences, IV, d. 12, c. 2.

§ 72. But on the contrary: Each one receives the whole Christ: therefore not each one receives his part.

§ 73. If perhaps you say that the part refers to the division of the containing host, and not to the contained Christ, it seems false: for I ask, Whence is this that the whole Christ is under any part?

§ 74. 1. For whatever things are so related to one another, that one according to being does not depend on the other, when one is multiplied, the other is not of necessity under any whatever of the parts received through the multitude: but the body of Christ and that shape which is called the host are so related to one another: therefore with the parts of the host multiplied, Christ will not necessarily be under any whatever of them.

§ 75. 2. Also, in natures we see multiple forms: for some are so in matter that when matter is divided the form is divided, like the form of a stone and of other homogeneous things: some also are so in matter that when the matter is divided, the form does not necessarily remain in any part, like the sensitive soul in a body of great diversity in the composition of parts, as in a lion or a donkey: but some are such that it is not the proper act of any body, since it is not affixed through its operation, but rather its operation is pure and denuded of matter, and similarly its essence, like the rational soul according to the intellect: and that, as the Philosophers say, is neither a body, nor a power in a body: and when the body is divided it does not remain in the single parts, nor is it multiplied in them: but to the likeness of this the body of Christ seems to relate to the sacramental species: therefore it seems that when they are divided, the whole Christ ought not to be under each single one.

§ 76. Moreover it may be asked, Whence does this happen, that the whole Christ is under any part when the host is broken?

§ 77. For it seems that it ought not to happen: for Christ is not had in the host except by the power of one consecration: therefore by the power of one consecration Christ will be had once, and by the power of two twice, and so on: but in all the parts of the host there is only one consecration: therefore he ought not to be had except under the whole, and not under this part here, and under that one there.

§ 78. If perhaps someone wishes to adduce this through examples, and posits an example in a mirror in which one form entirely results [i.e., is reflected], and when broken multiple forms result: it seems that this is nothing: because in one convex or flat mirror one form results on account of the reflection which occurs to one point: but in multiple broken pieces a reflection cannot occur to one point: because the ray is divided at the boundary of the glass, and thus returns to the center of the continuum: but this is not so in the host, hence there seems to be no likeness.

§ 79. Also, some posit a simile in the sensual soul of certain animals having wrinkled or ringed bodies and equal in composition and complexion throughout or almost equal, which when divided the sensitive soul remains through sense and motion in all the truncated parts; and this again does not seem to have a likeness: because there is not numerically one soul there in both truncated parts, but two made by division from one, which on account of the likeness of complexion become two: but here the numerically one Christ remains in the single parts of the host: hence nothing seems similar.

§ 80. If perhaps you say that nothing prohibits one numerically from being in diverse places. Hence Augustine says that the soul is in...

§ 1. ...in different places, because the whole [soul] is in the heart and in the brain and in other parts. And perhaps someone might wish to say that it is so in other spiritual substances as well. But it seems that this is not to the purpose: because even if we say that it is so in spiritual substances (which nevertheless is not true), it would not on this account follow that it is so in the true body of Christ: because this is most truly a body, and not a spirit.

§ 2. Moreover, concerning created spiritual substances, this is false: because, as Damascene says,[470] they are defined in a place: and as the same Damascene says, to be defined in a place is to be here and not elsewhere: but to whatever it belongs to be in several places at once, to this it belongs to be here and elsewhere: therefore it is not defined in a place, which Damascene denies.

§ 3. But if someone says on account of this, that this belongs to the divine body according as it is a mean between God who is everywhere, and a creature which is in one place, as was said. Whence a created body united to God is in several places, where it is consecrated, and into whatever parts the host is divided: this seems to be false: for the property of a mean always accompanies the mean, as long as it is a mean: since therefore the body of Christ is always a mean between the uncreated God and the creature, if nevertheless it is a mean, it will always be in several places: whether therefore it is consecrated in several places or not, and whether the host is divided or not, it will always be in several places, which is false and heretical: therefore this is no reason, which nevertheless is wont to be assigned by almost all.

§ 4. Solution. Without prejudice [to better judgment] it seems to me it should be said, that the reason why the whole Christ is under any part whatever, when the host is divided, is this: because the formal aspect [ratio] of signifying the whole spiritual food is equally in the whole body and in the part: and therefore when the host is one, there will be one thing signifying one spiritual food: and when it is many [parts], they will all be things signifying the same food: and therefore since in this sacrament (especially because it is the principal among the sacraments of the New Law) the containing follows the formal aspect of signifying, when there is one signifying thing, there will be one thing containing in itself the signified food: and when there are several signifying things, there will be several things containing the same whole and integral food: and this is the reason why, when the host is divided, the whole Christ, the food of the spiritual soul, remains in whatever part under whatever [species].

§ 5. To this therefore which is first objected, it must be said, that according to existence form and matter depend on one another: and in such things the objection proceeds: but according to being contained the sign in the sacrament and the signified depend on one another, according as the sacrament of the New Law is received: and therefore the sign being multiplied, it is necessary that the signified thing be under each of them.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that that objection proceeds according to the degree of a more and less separated form: but in the sacramental sign it is not so: for we do not say that Christ is in the sacrament as the soul is in the body, and as the intellect is in the body: although as to this, that the whole Christ is in the whole form, and whole in any part, it has a certain likeness to the existence of the rational soul in the body: which, according to Augustine, is whole in the whole, and whole in any part.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that as was already said, by virtue of such a signification, and not by virtue of signification simply, this happens, namely that this sacrament is the cause of that according to existence because it signs, and contains it: but the consecration is not a cause except a remote one, namely that it be under the host, whether divided or undivided.

§ 8. To the next it must be said, that signification in general is not the cause of this: but rather a special signification, and especially of this sacrament, which by antonomasia is the sacrament of the New Law, as was said.

§ 9. To this which is said concerning the examples, it must be said that those examples are similar in part, and not in whole, as the objections well prove: for divine things do not have perfect likenesses in corporeal

Articulus 12 — Whether It Is Truly Said That Christ Is Eaten By Parts In The Sacrament, And It Remains Truly Said That Christ By Parts Is Entire And Whole In Heaven; He Remains Entire And Whole In Your Heart things. Whence Hilary: "If we bring forward any examples for divine things, let no one think that they contain in themselves the form of perfection": and yet they are good likenesses, in the way in which that which is in the part, represents that which is in the whole.

§ 2. To that which is objected concerning Augustine, it must be said that it happens in two ways that something is in another as in a place, namely properly, and improperly: properly as it is circumscribed or defined in a place: and this cannot be in several places at once: but improperly that which is in another, as in matter which has a likeness to a place according to Isidore on account of its capacity: and thus the statement of Augustine is understood: because the soul is in the body as in that which has some likeness to a place: which nevertheless is properly its matter and subject. Whence just as there is no part of matter which is not perfected by a form, so there is no part of the body in which the soul is not essentially: yet it is not properly in several places.

§ 3. Concerning this however which is said, that the body of Christ has this inasmuch as it is a mean between the purely created and the purely uncreated, it seems it should be said that it is false: as the reasons made to the contrary prove.

470. John of Damascus, De fide orthodoxa, Bk. 1.

Whether it is truly said: Christ is eaten by parts in the sacrament, and remains whole and integer in heaven, remains whole and integer in your heart?

§ 4. Then it is asked concerning this which it says, there, D, after the middle: He is eaten by parts in the sacrament, and remains whole and integer in heaven, remains whole and integer in your heart.

§ 5. For according to this He seems to be in several places at once and at the same time, which seems unable to stand:

§ 6. 1. For there is nothing of whose substance anything is found outside the boundary of its substance: but place is the boundary of a substance and of a being: for just as time is the measure of existence, so place [is the measure] of a being or of that which is: but in this place is the boundary of Christ in which He is: therefore nothing of Him is found outside that place, as it seems.

§ 7. 2. Also, the Philosopher says:[471] Whatever things are divided by place, are divided also by subject: but it is certain that Christ is not disjoined from Himself as subject: therefore neither is He divided by place: therefore He is not in several places at once: because whatever things are in several places, are divided by place.

§ 8. 3. Also, let it be that Christ on this altar is in a place which is a palm's breadth on account of the species of the host which is that great and no greater, and on another altar He is at one cubit, but in heaven He is according to the proper stature of a body of seven feet. Then I proceed thus: Whatever things are equal to one and the same thing, are equal to each other: but these three places are equal to one and the same thing, because to one and the same body of Christ: therefore these three are equal to each other, which is absurd: therefore it seems, that what was first supposed is not true, namely that He is on several altars and in heaven.

§ 9. Also it is asked, Whether Christ is in several places?

§ 10. For someone could say, that to be in the sacrament is not to be in a place, as was said before, but the sacrament is in several places: and from this it does not follow, that Christ is in several places. ON THE CONTRARY: Whatever is in every place in which it is consecrated, if the places of its consecration are many, will be in several places: but the body of Christ is in every place in which it is consecrated, and the places of its consecration are many: therefore it is in several places.

§ 11. Further it is asked here, How are these three specially enumerated in the Letter, that He is eaten in the sacrament, and remains whole and integer in the mind, and whole in heaven?

§ 1. For either He is bodily in the mind, or not. If not: then He is said equivocally to be in the mind, and in heaven, and in the sacrament: because in the sacrament and in heaven He is bodily, but in the mind only spiritually: therefore it seems, that it ought not to be enumerated with the other two ways. But if He is said to be bodily in the mind: therefore something besides God the Trinity essentially flows into [illabitur substantialiter] the mind: which is against Augustine who says, that nothing essentially flows into the mind besides God the Trinity.

§ 2. But further it still seems, that He ought to flow bodily into the mind: because it is said, that He is the food of the soul. But it is certain, that food flows into that which it feeds: therefore the body of Christ flows into the soul.

§ 3. Also, Augustine, Why do you prepare your teeth and belly? believe, and you have eaten: therefore it seems, that He does not pass into the belly, but into the soul: therefore He flows essentially into the soul.

§ 4. But because this was much inquired into above, let what was said suffice.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said to the first, that to be in a place is said in two ways, namely per se, and per accidens. Per se I do not believe that any created thing can be in several places at once. This however I say without prejudice to the opinion of others. But to be in a place per se I say [of] that which is circumscribed by a place: and in this way the body of Christ is only in one place, that is, in the empyrean heaven placed in the highest goods of the Father. But something is said to be in a place per accidens, which by grace of another in which it essentially is, is in a place: as the soul is in a place, and the body of Christ is in a place in the Church or on the altar, because the species of the sacrament in which it essentially is, is in a place per se: for nothing prohibits a certain accident from being in a place per se, as the Philosopher wishes: because in mathematical things also place is given, although mathematical bodies are accidents. It is clear therefore, that the objection is not valid: because when it is thus said, that there is nothing of whose substance anything is found outside its proper boundary, this is understood of an inner boundary, as is the surface of the localized thing: or an outer boundary, as is the place of those things which per se are in a place: and thus the proposition has necessity. But it is not understood of those things which are in a place per accidens: because if it were granted through impossibility, that the body of a man were in several places, it follows necessarily that the soul would be in several places per accidens: and so it must be said here by grace of the sacramental species: and this is not unfitting, that they are in several places per se, because those species are many in number.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that the saying of the Philosopher is understood of those things which are divided or distinguished by place per se, and not of those things which are divided by place per accidens.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that as was clear from things previously established, Christ is said equivocally to be in a place, in heaven, and in the sacrament: because in heaven per se, and in the sacrament per accidens: but equality is of those things in which there is one or univocal quantity: whence that objection is not valid.

§ 8. Moreover it was held, that between the species of the sacrament and the contained body equality cannot be attended to, except only quantity according to power, and still by relation, that as much as that signifies, so much this is signified: and by this reason again it is clear, that this objection does not proceed.

§ 9. To the next it must be said, that Christ per se is only in one place: but per accidens He is in several places, as was said: and this is not unfitting: for thus He is per accidens in every place in which He is consecrated, and yet essentially and

Articulus 13 — Whether Where A Part Of The Body Is, There The Whole Also Is, According To Hilary; And, What That Where Is When It Is Said: "Where The Prince Is, There The King"

according to truth He is there: just as the soul, if the body were in several places per se, per accidens would be in several places and yet according to truth and substance would be in them. For what is in a place per se, is in a place according to the laws of place: and this was sufficiently shown above, that it does not belong to the body of Christ in the sacrament.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, that the modes of saying something is in a place can well be distinguished, even if they are equivocal: and so they are distinguished here: for Christ is said to be in things in three ways, as was said above. But that He is in the mind, this He has in common with the Father and the Holy Spirit, but not this that He is in the sacrament: nor this that He is in the empyrean heaven, because this is understood circumscriptively by grace of the body which is circumscribed there.

§ 3. But to that which is objected, that nothing essentially flows into the mind besides God the Trinity, it must be said that Christ as to the body does not substantially fill the mind, but rather as to the divinity united to the body.

§ 4. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that He is called the food of the mind, because through the effect of grace He fills the mind.

§ 5. But how He passes into the belly, and how not, has been broadly disputed above.

Whether where a part of the body is, there is also the whole according to Hilary? and, Of what sort is that 'where', when it is said: Where the prince is, there is the king?

§ 6. Then it is asked concerning the saying of Hilary, there, D, at the end: Where a part of the body is, there is also the whole.

§ 7. For this seems impossible: because 1. It follows well in an integral whole, where the whole is, there is the part, since the whole put into existence posits the part: but Hilary gives us the converse of this: therefore let these two be conjoined thus: where the part is, there is the whole: and where the whole is, there is the part: therefore where any one part is, there is any part whatever: therefore where the foot is, there is the hand, and the eye, and the ear: therefore all the members are confused in one place.

§ 8. 2. Also, Where the part is, there is the whole: therefore where the foot is, there is the whole: therefore also the head: therefore where the foot is, there is the head: therefore the body is most inordinate and unseemly, because the members do not have the distance which makes the elegance of the body.

§ 9. 3. Also, Where the part is, there is the whole: therefore, as before, the head has itself to the feet: therefore it is reversed: and such infinite things follow from the saying of Hilary, as it seems: therefore it seems to be false.

§ 10. 4. Also, In that in which it is not possible to distinguish whole and part, in that it cannot be said: Where the part is, there is the whole: but in those species it is not possible to distinguish part and whole: therefore one cannot say: Where the part is, and the whole. But the FIRST of these is proved through this that all things which are per se in a place, are distinguished in a place according to beginning, middle, and end. But the SECOND is proved through this that in no part of that host is it possible to say, that the hand is there, or the foot, as is clear from things previously established: therefore it seems to be simply false what Hilary says.

§ 11. Further it is asked, What kind of where is signified when it is said: Where the part is, there is the whole? For where (as the Philosopher says) is the circumscription of a body proceeding from the circumscription of place: and if such a where is signed, this will seem to be impossible: because as was often held, place and localized thing are equal: whence the place of the part, and the part are equal: and if the whole were in the same place, it would be necessary that the whole...

Articulus 14 — What The Parts Mean Into Which The Host Is Divided By The Celebrating Priest

§ 1. ...and the part be equal: and this is against the first principle, Every whole is greater than its part.

§ 2. Solution. It must be said, that Hilary in my judgment intends to say, that Christ is otherwise in the sacrament, and otherwise in a place per se: because where He is in a place per se, there the distinction of parts in a place is assigned to Him: but where He is as in the sacrament, there such a distinction is not assigned to Him: and this Hilary intends to say when he says, Where the part is, there is the whole: because He is everywhere in the form: for if it is broken, any part is everywhere, and the whole is everywhere in all parts: and in this way it is improperly true, that where the head is, there is the foot, because not accepted of just any part of the form. But it does not follow what is inferred further, that the members are confused in one place: because they are not there as in a place except per accidens, as was said before, through this namely, that that form or its part is in a place.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that it does not follow, that the body is inordinate: because when it is said, Where the foot is, there is the head, it is understood that where as in a signing and containing sacrament there is the foot, there is the head: and this is not unfitting: because neither is the foot contained and signed there as a foot, nor the head as a head, but both as spiritual food: and from this no confusion or inordination of the body follows: but it would follow if the members were distinguished there as in a place per se.

§ 4. Through the same the solution to the following is clear.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that in the body of Christ according to itself the members can be distinguished: but in comparison to the signing forms they cannot be distinguished: because through any part whatever of the form the whole body with all its parts is signed and contained. But Hilary speaks here, that where the part is, there is the whole: that he may express that distinction by comparison to the signing and containing form.

§ 6. To that which is further asked, it must be said that where is said per accidens, and per se. Per accidens: as we say, that where the body is, there is the soul, although yet the soul does not have a where per se. But per se, as when we say, there is the circumscribed body: and Hilary intends to consignify here a where per accidens: because where the part is as in the sacrament, there is the whole, as was previously held.

DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

But what those parts signify, etc.

§ 7. Here begins the second part of this distinction in which it is treated of the signification of these parts. And three things are said here in this chapter, namely what those parts signify: and this at the beginning of the chapter. Secondly, what the breaking through which those parts are divided signifies, because [it signifies] the passion of the Lord, there, E, § 2: And as those parts, etc. Thirdly, he touches on, who participate worthily and who unworthily, there, E, § 3: But let everyone beware lest, etc.

§ 8. The sentence of the first is noted in two verses: The host is divided into parts: dipped it notes the blessed Fully, dry the living, preserved the buried.

What do the parts into which the host is divided by the celebrating priest signify?

§ 9. A question arises, Since the division of the Church is multiplex:

§ 10. 1. First, Because some are of the Church in number only, but some in number and merit: and Christ offered Himself for both: therefore it seems, that some partition of the body of Christ ought to be corresponding to them.

§ 11. 2. Also, Another three-membered division of the Church is understood through Noah, Daniel, and Job, which is into prelates, and continents, and married: therefore there ought to be made some division responding to that division.

§ 12. 3. Also, It seems that no part ought to be for the blessed: because they not in species, but in the truth of things already take the sacrament: but the partition is not made except in species: therefore no partition ought to be made for the blessed in the species itself, as it seems.

§ 1. 4. Also, The blessed do not need the oblation of redemption: because they are already saved: since therefore this sacrifice is made for redemption from sins, it seems that nothing in it ought to be made for the blessed.

§ 2. 5. Also, If there were no sin, Christ would not have died and been offered on the cross: but the consecration of the sacrament is made in memory of the Lord's death: as the Apostle says, I Cor. 11:26: therefore for those who no longer need the effect of death, nothing ought to be made in the sacrament: but such are the blessed: therefore nothing ought to be made for them in the sacrament.

§ 3. 6. Further, It seems that it is the same to offer for those who are in the sepulcher and for the blessed: for those who as to the soul are blessed, as to the body are in the sepulcher: and it seems, that thus they do not differ as to persons, but as to parts only.

§ 4. 7. If perhaps you say, that those who are in the sepulcher, are those who are in purgatory: then the Letter speaks badly in speaking generally of those who are in the sepulcher.

§ 5. Further it is asked concerning this which is said in the Letter, that the part offered, put into the chalice, shows the body of Christ which has already risen.

§ 6. For it seems, that this is unfitting: because the chalice signifies the passion: but the body which has already risen, is extracted beyond passions: therefore the part put into the chalice does not congruously signify the part which has already risen.

§ 7. Moreover it is asked, What is that part which has already risen?

§ 8. For we do not have it for certain from the Saints that anyone is already blessed in the body with Christ: for concerning those who rose with Christ, and concerning the blessed Virgin some feel thus and some otherwise: therefore that part which is put into the chalice, signifies nothing but Christ: but this seems unfitting: because Christ did not offer the sacrifice for Himself: therefore neither now ought it to be offered for Christ: therefore no part ought to be offered for those who have already risen, as it seems.

§ 9. Further it seems, that the eating ought not to signify those still walking upon the earth: because

§ 10. 1. Eating signifies incorporation: therefore to those more united to Christ and incorporated it more belongs: but the more united to Christ and incorporated are those who are in glory: therefore they ought rather to be signed by the eaten part: and the contrary of this is said in the Letter.

§ 11. 2. Also, It was said above, that it is not so in this food as in another: because this food converts the fed to itself, which other foods do not do, but rather they are converted to the fed: therefore the eaten part most signifies that part, which is most converted to Christ: but this is the part united to Him through glory: therefore it ought to signify those who are in glory, and not those walking upon the earth.

§ 12. Further it seems, that that part which remains on the altar, ought not to signify those who lie in sepulchers: for at the end of the Mass that part which remained, is consumed through eating: but eating signifies those walking upon the earth: therefore it is also signed by this that those who lie in sepulchers, at the end will rise and walk upon the earth: which is false, since then they will be caught up in the clouds in the air to meet Christ, and so they shall always be with the Lord, as the Apostle says.[472]

§ 1. ...the end of the Mass: therefore it seems, that no part in their sacrament signifies those lying in sepulchers: and so it is not general what is said here.

§ 2. If perhaps it is said, that Pope Sergius speaks according to the custom of the primitive Church, in which the subdeacon and deacon consumed the relics of the sacred partition remaining at the end of the Mass after communion: this is nothing: because this was not done in the host divided into three: nor was this done every day, but at the time of the communion of the people: nor then always, but when something remained of the relics: but here the Pope speaks generally of the signification of the parts.

§ 3. Solution. It seems it should be said, that the Pope speaks here of the most congruous signification of the fraction and of the parts: and not of just any less congruous signification: and he speaks only according to the rite which was wont to be observed in the Roman Church for the time. For universally the body of Christ is divided into three, although not universally one of the parts is observed until the end of the Mass; because on account of the danger of parts falling from the sacrament, by some both parts are consumed together, and then also the part put into the chalice: and this not that they wish to signify the contrary of what the Pope says, but rather to avoid danger, understanding the same thing to be signed, which he faithfully expressed.

§ 4. It must be said therefore to the first, that every part in some way signifies those incorporated into Christ who alone communicate: because (as Ambrose says) he communicates spiritually, who brings innocence with him to the altar: but since those who are of the Church in number only, do not communicate spiritually, they are signified by no part: although it is offered for them in redemption and expiation: for not all those are of the parts of the body or are signified, for whom it is offered, but those who are in the mystical body are signified by the parts of the sacrament of the true body.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that that division is not the first which is signified in Ezekiel,[473] through Noah, Daniel, and Job: but rather it is the division of one part, namely of that which walks upon the earth: and therefore that presupposes this: because of the mystical body of Christ one part is in glory, and another awaits secure in the sepulcher, and a third fights in merit: and that which fights in merit, is triform, as is signified in Ezekiel.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that the parts do not signify the power of the passion, but rather the parts of the body of Christ which are spiritually united to Him: and therefore those reigning in glory, since they are especially united to Christ, ought to be signified in the parts of the sacrament. There is also another reason for this: because this sacrament is not made [only] for obtaining pardon, but also that praises may be rendered to God through it for the liberation already accomplished: and in this way significations can be made for the blessed in the partition of the sacrament.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that Christ would not have died, if there were no sin: yet it does not follow, that the liberated one not having sin ought not to have a memory of the liberating death that he may give thanks, and praise the redeemer: and this is signified in the fraction of the body of Christ.

§ 8. To the next it must be said, that it is not the same to offer for the blessed and for those who are in the sepulcher: because since resurrection is threefold, as will be shown below, namely resurrection from fault through grace, which is made here: and resurrection of the soul from punishment, which is made through glory: and resurrection of the body from putrefaction and corruption, which is made in the future: those are understood to have already risen here, who have risen by the middle resurrection: but to lie in the sepulcher, [those] who are still tormented in purgatory which will last until the end of the world.

§ 9. Through this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 10. But to this which is objected, that he seems generally to understand those lying in the tomb, it must be said that he speaks generally for this reason: because such an alternation of those dying, those being purged, and those flying away [to heaven] will last until the end of the world. Hence, those who are in purgatory lie down, because they have not yet obtained either stole; in the soul they already stand in a way in the resurrection, because they have risen from guilt and also from punishment in their soul.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that it is not considered in this sacrament that the chalice signifies the passion: but since there is a twofold perception of the Eucharist: one is with the labor of chewing, and the other is without labor, but with the sweetness of drink it holds wisdom. Here it is consumed in the species of the sacrament as if under an alien rind which must be chewed; but in the future it is consumed in the taste of saving wisdom without resistance, as a drink, and this is signified by the part put into the chalice. Whence nothing prohibits many things from being signified by one thing according to diverse properties: so that if the chalice through itself signifies the passion, nevertheless inasmuch as it holds a drink, it signifies the state in glory.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that that part which has already risen is that which has obtained the stole of the soul, as is evident from what has been said, or the stole of the body and of the soul, if there are any who are already with the Lord in the homeland: which I indeed believe to be most true of the Blessed Virgin and others who rose with the Lord.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that the part eaten signifies those walking upon the earth, not from that property by which eating is an incorporation, but from that by which eating is the restoration of what is lost and the strengthening of what is weakened by hunger. For the fervor of spiritual grace is lost through the heat of concupiscence, and the spiritual man is weakened: for which reason the custom of eating was introduced; and therefore the objection made concerning union and incorporation is invalid.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that that which remains lying most fittingly signifies those lying in the tomb. And therefore it is left lying on the paten, which signifies the pressing of the stone closing the tomb; and therefore it signifies the punishment which follows death in purgatory. For no others are in the tomb of the Lord except those who descend to the place of good people being purged. But the fact that it is eaten at the end is not done to signify that they must again walk upon the earth, but that through the oblation those punished in purgatory receive comfort just as through food. And it is not necessary that all properties be considered in signifying something according to a mystical reality: because even this same thing has many properties and can signify many things according to its manner in Sacred Scripture.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that it is not necessary that this custom be generally observed: because not everyone has the caution by which they know how to take care lest anything fall from the partition of the sacrament. But I well think that when solemn prelates primarily celebrate, such as the Pope or others who are in the place of general heads in the Church, it ought then to be observed: so that through the persons who generally preside over the Church, the whole state of the parts of the Church may be signified.

§ 7. But to what is ultimately objected, I readily concede that Pope Sergius did not intend this when attributing such a signification to the parts.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Communion And The Breaking Of The Host Are A Sign Of The Same Or Of Different Things; And, What Each Signifies

Are the communion and the fraction of the host a sign of the same thing or of different things? And, what does each signify?

§ 8. Next it is inquired concerning what is said there, F, § 2: That just as those parts hold a mystical signification, so also does the fraction, etc.

§ 9. 1. For it seems that not this, but something else is said to be signified by blessed Dionysius in the book On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, in the chapter On the Contemplation of the Holy Synaxis, speaking thus: But the most divine communion of the one and the same bread and the peaceful handing over promulgate a similar divine conversation for them as those eating alike, and it leads them in sacred memory to the most divine supper and the principal symbol of the perfect. Therefore it seems that it does not signify the passion as it does here: because blessed Dionysius, among the things signified by communion, made no mention of the passion.

§ 10. 2. Also, in the Celestial Hierarchy he says that the assumption of the most divine Eucharist is the image of the divine participation of Jesus therefore since this participation will be future in beatitude, it does not seem that this sign ought to be called a sign of the passion.

473. Ezekiel 14:14 et seq.

§ 11. 3. If perhaps you should say that the fraction signifies something other than communion: since the fraction signifies the passion, but communion signifies communion, and the Lord's supper, and the other things which Dionysius says. Against this seems to be that the fraction is not referred to the body, as was said before, but to the species in the sacrament: therefore it ought not to signify the bread in which the body of Christ was broken, but something else.

§ 12. Solution. It must be said, as was touched upon, that the communion itself is a sign of one thing, and the fraction itself of another: because the fraction subserves communion. Whence it is said, Luke 22:19: He broke, and gave to them, namely to his disciples. Hence the fraction signifies the passion, while the communion signifies the union of charity toward neighbor and toward God. Whence Augustine says in the book of the Sentences of Prosper: While the host is broken, while the blood from the chalice is poured into the mouths of the faithful, what else is designated than the immolation of the Lord's body on the cross and the outpouring of his blood from his side?

§ 13. Therefore it must be said to the first that those words of Dionysius state the things signified by communion, which communion the sacrament effects through the grace of union. And this communion consists in a conversation similar to Christ into whom they are incorporated, and in the memory of the supper in which they are incorporated and comforted, and in the memory of the communion of the charity of Christ into which the first men were perfectly congregated and united, and the Church is still being congregated and united.

§ 14. But to what is objected from the Celestial Hierarchy, it must be said that he is speaking there of the thing signified by communion according to the anagogical sense: and this is true, because it signifies through this reception in the sacrament the reception of realities in truth that will be in beatitude: but this is not imported in the fraction properly speaking.

§ 15. But to the last it must be said that although the fraction is not in the body of Christ, since it cannot be broken, nevertheless the fraction in the species represents that which was in the body of Christ. And this is not unfitting: because even then something mortal and passible was broken, such as it is not now: and that breaking is designated through something that is about the body.

Articulus 16 — Whether Someone Existing In Mortal Sin Can Approach To Communion And Receive The Body Of Christ

Can someone existing in mortal sin approach communion and receive the body of Christ?

§ 16. Next it is inquired concerning what is said there, E, § 3: But let each one beware lest he perceive unworthily, etc.

§ 17. For immediately below he will say that unworthy is he who approaches having mortal sin.

§ 18. Whence three things are inquired here, of which the first is: can someone existing with mortal sin approach? Second: whether a priest can repel someone existing in mortal sin? Third: can one having mortal sin look at the body of Christ?

§ 19. To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Ambrose says: If faith and charity be lacking, he eats and drinks judgment to himself but to him who is in mortal sin, faith and charity are lacking: therefore he eats and drinks judgment to himself.

§ 20. 2. Also, Augustine: Just as Judas to whom Christ handed the morsel gave place to the devil not by receiving something evil, but by receiving something good evilly: so he who unworthily consumes the body of Christ does not bring it about that, because he is evil, it is evil: or that because he does not receive it unto salvation, he receives nothing. From this it is gathered that such a one does not receive unto salvation, but by receiving gives place to the devil: therefore he ought not to receive.

§ 21. 3. Also, it seems less of a sin that an unworthy man thrust himself into holy offices, and clothe himself in sacred vestments, or preach unworthily, than if he unworthily receives the body of the Lord: but he who preaches unworthily, or is clothed in sacred vestments, or receives orders unworthily, sins mortally, as the Masters say: therefore much more so does this one.

§ 22. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Ecclesiastes 9:1 says: Man knows not whether he be worthy of love or hatred: therefore no one knows whether he has charity or not. Therefore all doubt whether they have charity: therefore all doubt whether they are worthy or unworthy: therefore by consequence they also doubt whether they sin mortally by receiving or not. But the rule in Sacred Scripture is that he who does that concerning which he doubts whether it is a mortal sin or not, sins mortally: therefore every man approaching the body of the Lord sins mortally, which is a very horrible thing to say.

§ 23. 2. Also, he is called worthy of eternal life who does something for which eternal life is justly owed to him: therefore he approaches the body of Christ worthily who does something for which the body of the Lord is justly owed to him: therefore the body of the Lord can be weighed against some human work, which is most false, because it is worthier than the whole world and infinite worlds if they existed: therefore no one approaches as worthy: therefore every man approaching sins mortally.

§ 24. Solution. It must be said that someone is called worthy in two ways, namely by equivalence: and in this way no one is worthy of eternal life, nor even of the body of the Lord. In the second way one is called worthy by estimation: and this again in two ways, namely by the estimation of the thing, and thus no one is worthy; or by the estimation of the one estimating through his own goodness on account of our value from the part of our works: as is said in the Epistle to Titus, 3:5: Not by the works of justice which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us. And thus we are worthy of eternal life and worthy of the communion of the body and blood of the Lord: because he estimates us worthy when we are without mortal sin according to our conscience: but unworthy when, with our conscience accusing us, we are in mortal sin.

§ 25. Therefore to the first objection against this, it must be said that no one knows whether he is worthy with certain knowledge: but many know by the knowledge of presumption: and this suffices: because no one understands his faults. Whence also Augustine says that regarding a sin which someone does not remember, and yet is prepared to confess and make satisfaction for if he recalled it, either God mercifully pardons it, or reveals it as a devoted father. And therefore such a one is reputed worthy.

§ 26. To the next the solution is clear through the distinction posited earlier.

Articulus 17 — Whether A Priest Ought To Repel Someone Existing In Mortal Sin

Ought a priest to repel someone existing in mortal sin?

§ 27. Next it is inquired: Ought a priest to repel someone existing in mortal sin?

§ 28. But it seems that he ought not: because 1. Augustine says in book IV On the Trinity: Let not the dispenser prohibit the fat ones of the earth from eating the table of the Lord, but let him warn the exactor to fear. But the fat ones of the earth, as the Gloss on that Psalm 21:30 says: All the fat ones of the earth have eaten and adored, are unworthy sinners. Therefore they are not to be prohibited by the priest who is the dispenser.

§ 29. 2. Also, in the Decree that passage is expounded by Augustine, If thy brother shall offend against thee, etc. Augustine says there, against thee, that is, with you alone knowing. If therefore he has offended against thee: and you wish to argue with him before men, you are not a corrector of the man, but a betrayer of his crime. Therefore by a similar reasoning, if the priest alone knows this one to be unworthy, if he repels him from communion, he is not a corrector, but a betrayer: therefore he ought not to repel him.

§ 30. 3. Also, from this the greatest scandal would happen: because a bad priest could in this way impose a stain upon anyone and repel him from communion. Therefore since this ought not to happen, it seems that a priest ought to repel no one.

§ 31. 4. Also, the Lord did not repel Judas, although he warned him to take heed to himself. Therefore since His action is our instruction, a priest ought not to repel anyone, as it seems.

§ 32. 5. Also, the priest is not the lord of the sacraments, but the dispenser. But the sacraments are granted for the use of subjects: therefore it seems that, since to everyone is to be given what is his own, he ought to deny it to no one, worthy or unworthy: therefore he ought to repel no one.

§ 33. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A sword is not to be given to a madman in a time of fury, because he would kill himself: therefore since killing in the soul is worse, that by which he would kill himself in the soul is not to be given to anyone no matter how much he asks. But by receiving the body of the Lord unworthily, he kills himself by receiving: therefore it is not to be given by the priest: therefore he is to be repelled.

§ 34. 2. Also, Aristotle in Ethics V says that the legally just is of less value than the naturally just: because the naturally just considers what, to whom, and when it is to be rendered: but the legal says that what is his own is always to be rendered. Whence the legal commands that what is another's is to be rendered to him whenever he asks: but the just of itself does not render, except when it can result in utility: and therefore one having a deposit does not render it to the one asking when neighboring robbers would despoil him. Therefore it seems by similar reasoning here too: although divine law commands that the sacraments be given to all, nevertheless a just priest ought not to give, unless he gives unto salvation: but the unworthy does not consume unto salvation: therefore it ought not to be given to him, and therefore he is to be repelled.

§ 35. 3. Also, divine law even commands that this not be done. Matthew 7:6: Give not that which is holy to dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine: but dogs and swine are sinners: therefore it is not to be given to such: therefore they are to be repelled.

§ 36. 4. Also, See thou never do to another what thou wouldst hate to have done to thee by another but if a priest were unworthy, he ought to will that the body of the Lord not be given to him: therefore he ought not to give it to another: therefore he ought to repel the unworthy.

§ 37. 5. Also, one throwing the body of the Lord into a latrine or into the mud sins mortally: but a sinner is viler than mud: therefore one giving it to a sinner sins more than one throwing it into the mud: therefore the sinner is to be repelled.

§ 38. 6. Also, Bishop Cyprian wrote thus to Bishop Eucratius: Out of your love you thought it necessary to consult me, dearest brother, what seems right to me concerning that actor and magician who, established among us, still perseveres in the disgrace of his art, and as a master and teacher, not for the instruction but for the ruin of boys, insinuates to others also that which he evilly learned: whether to such ones holy communion with other Christians ought to be given, or whether they ought to communicate with us? I think it befits neither divine majesty nor Evangelical discipline that the modesty and honor of the Church be defiled by so base and infamous a contagion. Therefore by a similar reasoning some seem to be repelled.

§ 39. 7. Also, from the Council of Carthage: To stage-players and actors, and other persons of this kind, or to apostates, if they are converted or return to God, grace or reconciliation is not to be denied. Therefore by the contrary sense, if such do not return, nor are converted to God, reconciliation ought to be denied to them: therefore they ought to be repelled.

§ 40. Solution. It must be said that a sinner is twofold, namely notorious and occult. The occult ought not to be repelled, but the notorious persevering in sin ought to be repelled. But notorious is twofold, namely by the conviction of witnesses in judgment, as a convicted adulterer who is not penitent: and notorious by the shameful office or art or cohabitation which he exercises, such as usurers and publicans through public exercise and office; and an actor and magician through his art; and through shameful cohabitation, such as a prostitute: for such are to be repelled unless they first make satisfaction by public penance renouncing their prior acts. But others are not to be repelled, lest they be betrayed, and lest the people who are ignorant of their sins be scandalized.

§ 41. To the first therefore it must be said that it is not similar concerning the sinner and the madman: because the madman does not see his own danger, and therefore has nothing drawing him back from killing himself when he has the sword: but the sinner has the use of reason and sees his danger, and can be drawn back if he wills.

§ 42. To the next it must be said that what is just of itself takes precaution for the neighbor concerning danger from the part of another, but does not take precaution concerning the danger of a bad will: and therefore a just man restores to another what is his own, even when he knows that he spends it evilly, although he would not give it when he is among robbers who can take it away: and so is a just priest situated toward a sinner requesting the body of the Lord.

§ 43. To the next it must be said that divine law commands that the priest not give, and the priest does not give, but the other snatches it from his hands: especially since the priest is only a dispenser. Or it may be said that the force is in what he says, Nolite (do not), that is, be unwilling: yet sometimes something else must be done because of the necessity of scandal: just as it is said, James 5:12: But above all things, my brethren, swear not, although sometimes it is necessary to swear because of the malice of unbelief.

§ 44. To the next it must be said that this is false, that the priest ought to will in such a case that it not be given to him: rather he ought to will that it be given to him, but he ought not to will to receive it if it were given: because to give is just, but to receive is unjust.

§ 45. To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because a latrine and mud have an impossibility of cleanliness for receiving the body of the Lord: but not so a sinner who in a moment can be contrite and made worthy. And therefore he ought not to deny it: because he could do much harm if he withheld it from a penitent sinner, and a sinner can be converted in a moment.

§ 46. To the next and the last the solution is clear through the distinction posited at the end of this [article].

Articulus 18 — Whether It Is Permissible For One Having Mortal Sin To See The Body Of Christ, And How

Is it licit for one having mortal sin to look at the body of Christ, and in what way?

§ 47. Thirdly it is inquired: Is it licit for one having mortal sin to look at the body of Christ?

§ 48. For it seems that it is not: because 1. Luke 18:13, the publican is praised who would not even lift his eyes to heaven: therefore much less is a sinner worthy to look at the body of the Lord, which is better and worthier than heaven.

§ 49. 2. Also, 2 Paralipomenon, Manasseh said in his Prayer: I am not worthy to behold and look upon the height of heaven, because of the multitude of my iniquities therefore much less will a sinner be worthy to see the body of the Lord.

§ 50. 3. Also, 1 Kings 6:19, the men of Bethshemesh were struck because they looked at the ark of the Lord, which was only a figure of the body of the Lord: therefore much more will a sinner be struck looking unworthily at the Lord's body.

§ 51. 4. Also, 2 Kings 6:6–7, Uzzah was struck because he stretched out his hand to hold the ark, since the oxen drawing it had kicked. From this it seems that even if the body of the Lord were endangered by a fall or something else, it would not be licit for a sinner to touch or to see it.

§ 52. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. We often see that the showing of a good provokes to good: therefore it seems that sinners ought not to be prohibited from seeing it.

§ 53. 2. Also, we see that the universal custom of the Church holds that after the consecration is done, the host is elevated to be seen and adored by the people, although it is probably evident to the celebrant that many existing in mortal sins are present in the Church. It is evident, moreover, that the universal Church does nothing dangerous: therefore it is not dangerous to see it, but salutary, as it seems.

§ 54. Solution. It seems it must be said that it can and ought to be seen: but one should not multiply looks out of humility; rather, having seen the body, by striking the breast in penance let him reflect that he is not worthy to remain in the sight and frequent gaze of such holiness.

§ 55. Therefore it must be said to the two authorities that are first adduced, that humility is praised in them. And it is praised in this one in that he does not multiply his look; yet on account of the admonition of the death of Christ which rends rocks and raises up children of Abraham from them, it is good to see the memorial of his death. Whence it is not similar concerning heaven, because such is not His memorial, which so efficaciously converts sinners.

§ 56. To the next it must be said that the men of Bethshemesh who were struck saw the naked ark, which they ought not to have seen unless wrapped, as is said in Numbers 4:6. Whence it is also intimated in the Letter that many rather looked at the ark out of curiosity than call the priests to wrap it. Here, however, the body of the Lord is wrapped in the species of bread and wine: and therefore it can be seen.

§ 57. To the next it must be said that, as is commonly said, Uzzah was struck for two reasons: one, because polluted in the night with his wife, he presumed in the morning to approach nearer to the cart, and wishing to hold it by approaching closer among the others, he ought to have prepared himself worthily; or when he did not wish to prepare himself, he should have let it go and let another approach closer who was more worthy. The other reason was: because since he was a Levite, he ought to have carried the ark on his own shoulders, but he himself permitted oxen to draw it, and therefore he was struck.

Articulus 19 — Whether He Who Celebrates Otherwise Than It Was Instituted By Christ Sins Mortally

Does he who celebrates otherwise than was instituted by Christ sin mortally?

§ 58. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, E, §3: Unworthy is he who celebrates the mystery otherwise than Christ handed down, etc.

§ 59. For it is asked, Who is this? For it can be celebrated otherwise in many ways, either from the part of the matter, or from the part of the form. And from the part of the matter: like the Greeks who confect in leavened bread, since the Lord consecrated in unleavened; or he who does not mix water with the wine.

§ 60. Therefore it seems that every such one sins mortally: or let it be said who it is who celebrates otherwise.

§ 61. Solution. It must be said that all those things are to be considered concerning the matter and form, and the mode of the Mass and the canon, which were determined above. And he who celebrates otherwise out of contempt sins mortally, and is so unworthy that he ought to be subject to the danger of his rank.

§ 62. Since Pope Julius touches upon certain errors against the celebration of the sacrament writing (and it is posited in the Decree on consecration, distinct. II, chap. Cum omne crimen) speaking thus: We have heard that some, detained by schismatic ambition, against divine orders and Apostolic institutions, dedicate milk instead of wine in the divine sacrifices; others also hand out a dipped Eucharist to the people for the complement of communion; some also offer expressed wine [grape juice] in the sacrament of the Lord's chalice; but others reserve a linen cloth dipped in must through the whole year, and in the time of sacrifice wash a part of it with water and so offer it. How contrary this is to Evangelical and Apostolic doctrine, and adverse to Ecclesiastical custom, will not be difficult to prove from the very fount of truth, from which the ordained mysteries of the sacraments themselves proceeded.

§ 63. A fifth error is in the mode of celebrating and receiving, as will be said a little below. Whence Pope Gelasius: We have found that some, having taken only the portion of the sacred body, abstain from the chalice of the consecrated blood: who without doubt (since they are taught to be bound by some unknown superstition) should either perceive the entire sacraments or be kept from the entire sacraments: because the division of one and the same mystery cannot happen without grand sacrilege.

§ 64. Another error is touched upon in the 12th Council of Toledo: It has been related to us that some of the priests do not consume the grace of holy communion as many times as they are seen to offer sacrifices in one day: but if they offer multiple sacrifices in one day, in all the oblations they suspend themselves from communion: and only in the oblation of the extreme [final] sacrifice alone do they consume the grace of holy communion, etc. Wherefore it is so certain that those who sacrificing do not eat, are guilty of the Lord's sacrament. Whosoever therefore of the priests henceforth shall approach to offer the sacrifice of the divine altar and suspend himself from communion, let him know himself repelled for one year from the very grace of communion of which he indecently deprived himself. For what sort of sacrifice will it be of which the sacrificer himself is recognized not to be a partaker?

§ 65. There are also infinite other modes: but let these modes suffice because they have been touched upon by the holy Fathers in this mode.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Priest Ought To Give To One Existing In Mortal Sin The Consecrated Host Or The Unconsecrated

Ought a priest to give a consecrated host, or an unconsecrated one, to one existing in mortal sin?

§ 66. Next it is inquired concerning what he says immediately after, there, H, §3: Or he who approaches having mortal sin.

§ 67. For it seems since the priest is a physician, and the sacrament is medicine, that the priest ought not to give it to such a one no matter how much he desires it: therefore he ought to repel him, which was disproved above.

§ 68. Next to this it is further inquired: Is it better to give an unconsecrated host to such a one?

§ 69. It seems that it is: because 1. Thus precaution is taken for him lest an unworthy communion of the sacrament harm him.

§ 70. 2. Also, by this scandal is removed: because the people might perhaps be scandalized by the fact that he does not communicate.

§ 71. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. 2 Maccabees 6:18 et seq., Eleazar refused to simulate even for the love of life: therefore it seems that one must not simulate here either.

§ 72. 2. Also, this sacrament is the sacrament of truth: therefore it is repugnant to all falsity: therefore nothing in it is to be done through falsity. But such a simulation would be a certain falsity: therefore it is not to be given.

§ 73. It is further inquired: Whether the priest of himself could give blessed bread, and not the Eucharist, to such ones not asking?

§ 74. But it seems not, 1. Because of the reasons already had.

§ 75. 2. Furthermore, he can be compunct in a moment: and if he is compunct, the priest harms him by withdrawing salutary food: therefore he ought not to do it.

§ 76. 3. Also, nothing benefits the sinner through these things, because he believes he is communicating: therefore he who does not communicate is just as contemptuous as he who communicates: therefore he ought not to give him anything but the host.

§ 77. Also, the Lord gave the Eucharist to Judas: therefore His dispenser ought also to give it to the evil.

§ 78. Solution. It must be said to the first that it is not entirely similar concerning the physician and the priest: because the priest aids the will of man which is free toward this, that he do what is in him: and then God does not deny grace: but the physician aids nature which is subject to necessity, and sometimes cannot be aided, nor can it return when it wills: and therefore the priest gives what he wills, so that thus the will may be drawn back from death and shame, and be converted to the Lord: but the physician does not, because nature is not aided by harmful things, but rather impeded.

§ 79. To the next which is inquired next to this, it must be said that an unconsecrated host can be given to such a one asking, posited apart indeed, not intermixed with the body of the Lord; nevertheless it ought not to be done often, as I think, so that being more terrified of his sin he might return more quickly.

§ 80. To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it is not similar concerning Eleazar; because he was asked to simulate that he ate what is illicit, which no one ought to simulate: but here what is licit is simulated, which is even commanded to be done.

§ 81. To the next it must be said that it is not falsity, but rather a caution against an evil that could come from the scandal of many. Nor is it a simulation in the confection of the sacrament, but rather in the similitude of the use of the sacrament.

§ 82. To that which is further inquired, it must be said that in no way ought the priest to do this of his own accord, as was proven: but if he is asked, he can sometimes acquiesce, and not often, as we have said.

Divisio Textus

§ 1. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

"After these things it is asked, whether what the priest performs is properly called a sacrifice or an immolation?"

This is the last part of this treatise on the Eucharist, in which it is treated on the part of the one consecrating it: and this is on the part of the efficient cause or quasi-efficient cause.

§ 2. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which it is treated of the act of the priest which he does in confecting. In the second, it is treated of those things which this sacrament requires in consecrating, such as order, and life, and intention: and it begins there, H, But it is customarily asked, Whether depraved priests, etc.

§ 3. Furthermore, the first part has four questions, two of which, however, are touched upon and determined at once in the book, namely, by what name the act of the priest is called, and whether Christ is immolated once or more often? And the first chapter is about the resolution of these.

§ 4. The second question is about the institution of this sacrament: and the second chapter is about this, which begins there, G, For this sacrament was instituted, etc.

§ 5. The third question is, Whether it is to be celebrated and communicated daily or rarely? And about this is the third chapter which begins there, G, § 2: But if it is asked, Whether it is to be communicated daily, etc.

Articulus 21 — Why One Who Is About To Communicate Is Especially Commanded To Forgive His Debtors

Why is one about to communicate specially commanded to forgive his debtors?

§ 83. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, E, § 3 : Before you approach, forgive your debtors, etc.

§ 84. Why does he specially make mention of this sin in communicating: for every sin makes one unworthy if it is mortal, as I said before: therefore he ought to make mention generally of all that he might be forgiven.

§ 85. To this it seems it must be said that the sacrifice by which Christ offered himself was especially on account of fraternal love. Whence, Hebrews 2:14 and 15: Because the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner hath been partaker of the same, that through death he might destroy him who had the empire of death, that is, the devil: and might deliver them who through the fear of death were all their lifetime subject to servitude. And therefore the sin of hatred of brothers is maximally contrary to communion. 1 Corinthians 11:18: For first of all (that is, the principal evil), I hear that when you come together in the church, there are schisms among you, etc.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Master Says Well That He Eats Spiritually Who Brings Innocence To The Altar

Does the Master say well that he eats spiritually who brings innocence to the altar?

§ 86. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, E, § 3, at the end: He eats spiritually who brings innocence to the altar.

§ 87. For according to this it seems that few eat spiritually: because few are innocent who have not sinned.

§ 88. Solution. It must be said that it is understood of innocence as to immunity from mortal guilt, and not of the innocence of baptism: for a man through penance can be immune from guilt: and thus innocence is taken by Blessed Gregory in a certain Lenten Collect: O God, the restorer and lover of innocence, to know whom is to live, and to serve whom is to reign, etc.

Articulus 23 — Whether Christ Is Immolated In Every Sacrifice

Whether Christ is immolated in every sacrifice?

§ 6. Now a question arises concerning the first.

It seems that Christ is not said to be sacrificed and immolated daily on account of the representation of past events:

1. For there is the same rationale regarding crucifixion and death, as there is regarding sacrifice and immolation: therefore if he is said to be immolated because a representation of the immolation once made is enacted, he will be said to be crucified and handed over because a representation of the crucifixion and killing once made is enacted: which is false.
2. Also, it does not follow: "the killing of this man is represented, therefore this man is killed"; therefore neither does it seem to follow here: "the immolation or sacrifice is represented, therefore he is immolated or killed."
3. Also, it seems that this ought not to be done: because that which is an occasion of heresy ought not to be done by the Church: but the representation of death signifies a mortal being, although the Apostle says that Christ rose from the dead and dies no more; therefore it ought not to be done.
4. Also, in a sacrament no injury is to be done to anyone: but Christ, having been offered once, took away the sins of men sufficiently, just as the Apostle says; therefore an injury is done to him if he is offered for sins all day long.

§ 7. Further it is asked, Why is it called an immolation or sacrifice?

§ 8. To this it must be said, that Christ is most truly immolated every day, when the sacrifice is offered to God the Father: for immolation denotes the act of offering on the part of the thing offered , and sacrifice denotes the same act on the part of the effect: whence, since on the part of the thing offered there always remains the offering offered and to be offered for us, we always immolate and always sacrifice. But it is not so concerning the crucifixion: for this denotes not the act of the thing offered, but rather the wicked act of the Jews or the passion, insofar as it was inflicted by them: but thus it was not to be repeated: and therefore it is not similar. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

§ 9. To the next it must be said, that our immolation is not only a representation, but a true immolation, that is, the offering of the immolated thing by the hands of the priests: whence it denotes two things, namely the slain thing, and the offering: because an immolation properly is the offering of a slain thing for the worship of God: and regarding the offering it is not merely a representation, but a true act of offering. But it is not so concerning the killing and crucifixion.

§ 10. To the next it must be said, that here there is no occasion for heresy: but there would be if it were noted that the killing is repeated: and this is said because it is not noted.

§ 11. To the next it must be said, that no injury is done: because the same thing is always offered, and under one effect: but if another thing were sought for killing and redemption, then an injury would be done to the death of Christ.

§ 12. To the last it must be said, that the name itself, which is immolation, is derived from the instruments where the cattle which was offered used to be killed: for it was killed upon a great stone, round in the manner of a millstone (molaris), and the parts of the slain beast were placed upon it: and in place of that we now use an altar; but according to its proper signification it sounds the act of offering on the part of the thing offered and slain: while "sacrification" or sacrifice denotes the same on the part of the effect.

Articulus 24 — Whether Christ Is Daily Immolated In The Sacrament

Whether Christ is immolated daily in the sacrament?

§ 13. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, after the beginning: But he is immolated daily in the sacrament, etc.

For an instance against this seems to be on the Parasceve (Good Friday): because then there is no consecration.

§ 14. Further it is asked, why is there no consecration on that day?

§ 15. Further still it is asked, Why is the blood not reserved from the day of the Supper until the day of the Parasceve, just as the body is?

§ 16. Solution. It must be said that he is immolated daily, even though he is not confected daily: because even on the Parasceve an immolation occurs without a consecration.

§ 17. To the next it must be said, that the Church instituted this, because on that day Christ truly offered himself on the cross: and therefore the Church did not will that he be immolated in the sacrament, so that the people might be more affected concerning the true offering, with the sacramental one—which is under a veil—having been removed.

§ 18. To the next it must be said, that the cause is none of what some say, that by the intinction of the consecrated host the wine on the Parasceve is converted into blood: because according to this, it would be lawful for any priest intincting the body of Christ in the wine, and afterwards consuming both, namely the body and the wine, to celebrate again on the same day: which is false, since he has broken his fast.

§ 19. Also, wine does not become a sacrament unless the word is added to it: but if what they say were true, a sacrament would be effected without the form of the sacrament. Whence it must be said, that the blood is not reserved because of the danger of spilling, because it could be spilled: and again because it cannot be transferred from vessel to vessel without some of the liquid adhering to the vessel: and therefore the Church established that it is not to be reserved.

§ 20. Next it is to be noted concerning what he says, there, F, below the middle: As often as the passover is celebrated, etc., that 'passover' is said in multiple ways.

For sometimes it means the unleavened breads, which were eaten then. John 18:28: They did not enter into the praetorium, that they might not be defiled, but that they might eat the passover.

Also, Christ immolated is so called. 1 Cor. 5:7: For Christ, our passover, has been immolated.

Also, the paschal lamb which was eaten then. Matt. 26:17: Where do you want us to prepare for you to eat the passover?

Also, that time when it is celebrated. John 13:1: Before the feast day of the passover, etc.

Also, the supper which they ate in the evening. Matt. 26:2: You know that after two days the passover will be. Whence the verse: "The passover is unleavened bread, Jesus, lamb, evening, supper."

§ 21. Next it is to be noted upon what he says, there, F, after the middle: Do we not offer every single day, etc.

For Innocent says that this immolation is made for five causes.

The first is because we sin daily: and therefore it is necessary that a medicine be prepared: and this is touched upon in the Letter. The second is so that the tree of life may always be in the midst of paradise. The third is so that Christ may be united to us sacramentally, and we to him spiritually. And Hilary touches upon this in book VIII On the Trinity, saying thus: "Why did he set forth a certain step and order of consummating the truth, unless so that he might be believed to be in the Father through the nature of divinity, and we conversely in him through his bodily birth: and he again in us through the mystery of the sacraments: as if the perfect unity of the mediator taught, that while we remain in him he himself would remain in the Father, and remaining in the Father he would remain in us: and thus, to perfect the unity with which he is naturally in him through birth, we also by nature would be in him, with Christ himself naturally remaining in us. Now that this unity is naturally in us, he himself testified thus, saying: 'He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood, abides in me and I in him'."

The fourth cause is so that we may have a memory of the passion: and this is touched upon in 1 Cor. 11:24: Do this in commemoration of me.

The fifth is so that the converted Jews may use the true lamb in place of the typical one, for which they will hunger, just as Psalm 58 says: They shall be converted at evening, and shall suffer hunger like dogs: and shall go around the city.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Avails Against Venial Sins

Whether the sacrament of the Eucharist avails against venial sins?

§ 22. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, F, around the end: Nor is it repeated because of its own infirmity, etc.

For from this which is said here, it seems that this sacrament avails against venial sins: but it seems that it also avails against mortal sins: because

1. It is said in the Collect of blessed Gregory which is said for the living and the dead in common: May it be a washing away of crimes, may it be a strength-of the fragile, may it be a support against the dangers of the world, may it be a remission of all faults of the living and the dead faithful. From the first part it is accepted that it avails against mortal sins: because only mortal sins are called crimes. But from the last part it is accepted that it avails equally against venial and against mortal sins.

1. Also, it was held above in the same chapter, that it is a representation of the death of Christ and of his offering: but that was against mortal and venial sins: therefore this sacrament is ordained against both kinds of sins.
2. Also, De consecratione, dist. II, Pope Julius says: Since every crime and sin is wiped away by sacrifices offered to God, what else shall be given to the Lord for the expiation of faults, when an error is made in the very offering of the sacrifice? Therefore it seems that this sacrifice avails for the expiation of every fault.
3. Also, this is called the sacrament of sacraments, and the greatest sacrament: therefore it has a greater effect than other sacraments which are not as worthy: but baptism and penance avail against mortal sin; therefore much more so does this one.
4. Also, the act of a man informed by grace avails less than the act of Christ, which is full of grace: but the act of a man informed by grace suffices to wipe away mortal sin, as is clear in the sorrow of penance: therefore much more the act of Christ: and that is represented in communion: therefore it avails against mortal sins.

§ 23. But on the contrary it seems that it does not avail against venial sins. 1. For a sacrament avails for inducing its own proper effect: but the wiping away of venial sins is not its proper effect: therefore it does not induce it. PROOF of the minor: Whatever is such that many things are ordained against it, none of them will be its proper destroyer, unless all those things are one in rationale, or one is reduced to another: but many things are ordained against venial sin, such as holy water, a pontifical blessing, and the like: and all these do not have one rationale, nor is one reduced to another: therefore none of them is the proper destroyer of venial sin.

1. Also, let it be that someone approaches with two or three venial sins: either it avails for the remission of all, or not. And it cannot be said that it does not avail for the remission of all, because there is the same rationale concerning one and concerning another: therefore if it avails for the remission of one, it avails for the remission of all. But if this is granted: then someone in this life can live without sins, which is against Augustine who says that this cannot happen, and it was written above.
2. Also, since such a purgation is the effect of this sacrament: and all such remedies ought to be repeated frequently: it seems that according to this one ought to communicate several times a day, or several masses ought to be celebrated, which is false.
3. Also, that it does not avail against mortal sin, seems to be proved thus: because either he approaches with mortal sin, or not. If so: then he eats and drinks judgment to himself. If not: then mortal sin is not remitted for him.

Also, at the supper of Christ it availed for everyone except him who approached with mortal sin, namely Judas, of whom it is said, John 13:27, that after the morsel, Satan entered into him; therefore the same happens now: therefore mortal sin is not remitted in the perception of this sacrament.

§ 24. Solution. Just as was said above in the question on the distinction of the sacraments, the Eucharist is ordained neither against mortal nor against venial sin as its proper effect, but rather against the weakness which proceeds from the loss of spirituality: which loss of spirituality happens as much from original as from actual sin. But what Ambrose says here, and the Master concludes at the end of the chapter, is understood of a consequent effect, and one common to this sacrament and certain other remedies of sin: for when the strength of the spirit is restored through spiritual food, then it excludes the frequency of venial sins: and from the fervor of devotion the venial sin which is present is wiped away, and also the guilt of the punishment of mortal sin, which has been made venial through penance. And in this way the words of the Saints brought forward are understood.

§ 25. To the FIRST therefore it must be said, that the washing away is of crimes, with respect to the remaining relics and the debt of punishment.

§ 26. To the next it must be said, that in this way which has been said, it avails against every sin, but properly it restores the strength of the spirit lost from sin and the punishment of sin.

§ 27. To the next it must be said, that the death of Christ had many things which the sacrament does not have in itself, except through representation: for it had the laying down of his soul in truth, and a punishment satisfying sufficiently for all, although not efficiently: and the sacrament does not have this in itself in truth: because Christ now does not die, nor does he suffer the punishment of the passion: and therefore it does not follow that the sacrament, like the passion, avails against every sin, but that the remission of every sin is represented in it sufficiently, not efficiently.

§ 28. To the next it must be said, that in many ways, just as was also touched upon above, and was held concerning Confirmation, one sacrament is said to be greater than another: because either it is given by a greater person: or it is collative of greater grace: or because the thing contained is worthier: or it is significative of a worthier thing not contained. And in the first way indeed confirmation is said to be worthier, in the second baptism, in the third the Eucharist, and in the fourth matrimony: and therefore it does not follow that if it is greater in genus, it confers greater grace against sin, because this is to be greater according to a certain mode of the majority of sacraments. And there is a fallacy of the consequent there.

§ 29. To the next it must be said, that the act of God which is satisfactory sorrow for our sins, is not in the sacrament in truth, but only by representation: and therefore that objection does not hold.

§ 30. To that which is objected, that it does not avail against venial sins, it well seems that it must be conceded in the manner in which the first objection proceeds. But the second does not hold: because as a consequence it wipes away venial sins: and therefore if someone obtains the remission of all venial sins, which I well believe often happens: nevertheless the word of Augustine and of John the Evangelist remains true: because he cannot remain long in such a state, while concupiscence remains in the flesh.

§ 31. To the next it must be said, that even if it avails against venial sins, it does not follow that it ought to be repeated frequently: because, since it is the most worthy sacrament with respect to the thing contained, it requires great preparation before it is to be done, which cannot happen often: nevertheless he who communicates every day on account of this is commended, as is said in the Letter, provided he communicates worthily: which worthiness is caused from preceding preparation.

§ 32. To the next it must be said, that one must not approach with mortal sin: but nevertheless it avails against mortal sin, not on the part of guilt, but of punishment, as has been said.

And through this the solution to the whole is also evident.

Articulus 26 — Whether The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Was Instituted At A Fitting Time By Christ After The Supper

Whether the sacrament of the Eucharist was instituted by Christ at an appropriate time after the supper?

§ 33. Next it is asked concerning what is asked third: and it is touched upon there, G, For this sacrament was instituted for two causes, etc.

1. For since other sacraments were instituted more often, such as baptism when it was said: Unless one is born again of water, etc.; and in the baptism of the Savior, as was determined above in the questions on the baptism of the Savior, and this sacrament is the sacrament of sacraments, it seems that this one too ought to have been instituted more often.
2. Also, Baptism was instituted after the passion with respect to its form: but the effect of the Eucharist is the incorporation by which the faithful are incorporated into Christ, which happens through a renewal, the example of which is the resurrection: therefore it too ought to have been instituted after the resurrection.
3. Also, Innocent, as we noted above, posits one cause of the Eucharist, that the tree of life may be in the midst of paradise: but the tree of life is the bread of Angels, and this is through the glory of beatitude which was shown after the resurrection: therefore it seems that it ought to have been instituted after the resurrection.
4. Further it seems that it ought to have been instituted before the supper: for the paschal lamb ought not to have been consumed by the lamb, but rather by those who were being redeemed by the blood of the lamb: therefore it seems that Christ, who is the true lamb, ought not to have first eaten the typical lamb, but rather before the supper, or without the supper, to offer himself.
5. Also, when Christ received circumcision, he did not immediately continue baptism onto circumcision, but long after. Since therefore the typical lamb and the true lamb are related to each other in the same way as circumcision and baptism, it seems that the immolation of the true lamb ought not to have been instituted immediately after the typical lamb, but long after: and this was not done.

§ 34. Further it is asked concerning the cause of the institution, which the Master touches upon in the Letter, namely which is the increase of virtue: for concerning the other cause which he touches upon in the Letter, it was held before.

1. For it belongs to the same thing to increase virtue and to confer it: but it belongs to baptism to confer virtue: therefore it also belongs to baptism to increase it; therefore this is not the proper cause of the institution of the Eucharist. But that the first premise is true, is clear through consuetudinal virtue which is generated by acts and is increased by the same acts, and it is thus with other things in nature.
2. Also, above in the treatise on baptism, it is said that virtues are increased in baptism: therefore it is clear that this is not the proper effect of the Eucharist.
3. Also, above in the beginning of this note on this fourth book of the Sentences, it was often proved that every sacrament is against sin and against the wound of sin, and in this sacramental grace differs from the grace which is in gifts and virtues: therefore according to this, the proper effect of no sacrament will be to increase virtue: therefore neither of this one: therefore also this cause which he touches upon in the Letter seems to be nothing.

4. If it is said, that it does not increase virtues in general, but increases a certain virtue, namely charity. AGAINST: Charity is increased, grace being increased through good works: because Augustine says that charity is given so that it may be nourished, and nourished it may be increased, and increased it may be perfected: but since doing this belongs to grace and a good life, it will not be the proper effect of this sacrament.

Also, nothing is increased except by that which, united to it, is similar in species, as the flesh of a man by that which becomes the flesh of a man, and thus concerning others: but it was proved above that sacramental grace and the grace of virtues are not of one species: therefore the one does not increase the other: therefore what is said in the Letter is false, as it seems.

§ 35. Solution. It seems it must be said to this, that the Eucharist was instituted, as is said here, by God as a medicine for daily infirmity, which is caused from the lost strength of the abstinence from spiritual food, as has been said often, and it ought not to have been instituted except after the supper before the passion, because it does not draw its effect except from the passion, and is a representation of the passion itself: and therefore, as a memorial to be more strictly commended to memory, it ought to have been instituted last, as will be said below in the Letter.

§ 36. To that which is objected first, it must be said that there were many things in baptism, and according to those many things it had various institutions, as was said above in the questions on baptism: but it is not so in the Eucharist, which is entirely of grace, and therefore it ought not to have been shown except near the showing of the greatest grace.

§ 37. To the next it must be said, that baptism is a sacrament of necessity, to which it was fitting to accustom men in many ways: and therefore before Christ it was introduced by John, and afterwards it was instituted in many ways by Christ, and after the resurrection it had the completion of its form: but the Eucharist is a representation of the immolation made in the passion, and therefore it ought to have been instituted not after, but before: for although it renews, this is its consequent effect, and not its proper one, as was held.

§ 38. To the next it must be said, that the tree of life is the bread of Angels: yet according as it is received under the sacrament, it is bread covered under ashes, that is, the reproaches of those killing him, and spittle, and scourges, and also for this reason the figure of the cross is more frequently repeated in the consecration, which will not be done when it is received with the truth of things uncovered.

§ 39. To the next it must be said, that Christ continued the New Testament in the sacrifices of both to the Old, by first taking the paschal lamb, and afterwards giving his body: and therefore it ought to have been instituted after the supper, which is true: therefore Christ took the paschal lamb, and did not do it to show that he needed liberation, but by keeping the law in all things, he showed that the law was not profane, like idolatry, but was given by God: and was to be converted into the truth of the New Testament. But that objection proceeds as if the lamb were eaten by no one except for the end that he be liberated by it from the exterminating Angel.

§ 40. To the next it must be said, that it was fitting for men to be induced to baptism in multiple ways, both because it is a sacrament of necessity, and because it is a general sacrament, and also because it is the door of the sacraments: and this having been well and congruously introduced, all the others are introduced: and therefore it was fitting to wait a long time after circumcision was received: but it is not so in the Eucharist: but rather the New ought to be continued immediately to the Old, the Old having been consummated through the passion of Christ.

§ 41. To that which is further asked about the cause which the Master touches upon in the Letter, it must be said that the sacrament of the body of Christ can be shown in multiple ways, according as it has many things in itself.

For it can be considered with respect to its principal reality which it contains and causes on the part of the recipient as far as is in itself: and thus it is properly a sacrament of the new law, collative of a special grace, which is ordained against daily infirmity, which is from the weakness of spiritual strength, as has been said.

It can also be considered not insofar as it is a sacrament, but insofar as it is a representation of those things which were done around the death of Christ: and thus it is a sacrament of love, because there Jesus showed greater love toward us, and thus excited and purchased our love for himself. Whence Bernard: "Above all things, the chalice which you drank, the work of our redemption, renders you lovable to me, O good Jesus." Also, Bernard: "The difficulty of the redemption took on much difficulty, by which it might make you a debtor of much love, and admonish you to acts of thanksgiving, whom the facility of your condition had made less devout." And in this way the Master speaks here. Whence here it is not the proper effect of the sacrament insofar as it is a sacrament from the reality operated in the sacrament, but rather insofar as it is a representation of the passion of Christ purchasing our charity for himself.

It can also be considered insofar as it has for its reality him who is the cause and author of all grace, and from whose fullness we have all received, and grace for grace; and thus it confers not only an increase of charity, but also of all virtues.

§ 42. And through this the solution to the first is evident: because nothing prohibits there being multiple secondary causes of the same effect, although one is per se according to one mode of causality. Whence baptism gives an increase of virtues, through this, that it is the principle of a greater grace: but the Eucharist, through this, that it is an exciter to greater devotion and love from the memory of the passion of Christ.

Through this the solution to the second is also evident.

§ 43. To the next it must be said, that in truth sacramental grace differs from the grace of virtues and gifts, and does not increase it through an essential union with it, but rather through occasion, namely because it excites to devotion, which being had, a greater grace is frequently conferred in habit, but always in act.

§ 44. To the next it must be said, that the increase of charity by way of merit can be attributed to many things, namely to all things which cause one to merit: but nevertheless it is not essentially increased except by God through the apposition of grace or the assimilation of his goodness, as has to be determined in the question on the increase of virtues.

Articulus 27 — Whether One Ought To Communicate Daily

Whether one should communicate daily?

§ 45. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, G, § 2: But if it is asked, Whether one should communicate daily, etc.

Now this is the fourth question touched upon in the beginning of this distinction.

1. For Augustine seems to speak badly: I neither praise, nor blame. For either he speaks of the bad, or of the good. If of the bad: then it will be blameworthy. But if of the good: then it seems to be praiseworthy: for it is praiseworthy to do a good thing well: and the more often he does it, the more praiseworthy he is: but the best, or among the best things, is to say masses and to communicate: therefore the more often someone does it, the more he is to be praised: therefore Augustine speaks badly.
2. Also, foolish is the sick man who has the medicine prepared, and does not repeat it as often as the disease returns: but the disease of venial sins always returns: therefore foolish is he who does not take the medicine often: therefore much more blameworthy, because every fool, insofar as he is such, is blameworthy: therefore again Augustine seems to speak badly.
3. Also, to offer a sacrifice to God has always been good, and will be good: therefore to offer the best sacrifice to God is the best: therefore it is to be offered very often: therefore it is praiseworthy that Christ be immolated and received daily, because he is the best sacrifice.

1. Also, the manna which God rained from heaven was gathered daily except on the sabbath day;[474] therefore it seems also, that that which the manna signified is to be gathered and eaten every day before the rest of perpetual life: but this is the body of Christ: therefore it is praiseworthy that it be done daily.
2. Also, in the old law the continual sacrifice signified this sacrifice: and that was done twice daily; therefore it seems also that this one should be repeated more often: and the more often, the better.

§ 46. BUT ON THE CONTRARY. 1. Gregory says, that it is a mark of good minds to acknowledge a fault there, where there is no fault: therefore much more is it a mark of a good mind to acknowledge its own unworthiness: but it is certain that no one is sufficiently worthy: therefore it is a mark of a good mind to acknowledge oneself unworthy, and to remove oneself from communion.

1. Also, in the old law not all the people entered the Holy of Holies, but only the high priest, and once a year, and with much adornment of vestments, and with incense, and with blood:[475] but it is certain that these were significations of those things which are done now: it seems therefore still that not by all, and not always, but sometimes by ordained men with the incense of prayers, and with blood, namely the memory of the passion, is it to be communicated: since therefore they cannot be thus prepared often, they must not communicate often.

§ 47. Solution. It must be said that the words of the objections proceed on the cause of the saying of Augustine. And this is clear in the decree De consecratione, dist. II, cap. Quotidie, where the words which are lacking here are supplied thus: "If anyone should say that the Eucharist is not to be received daily, while another affirms daily, let each one do what according to his faith he piously believes ought to be done. For they did not litigate among themselves, nor did anyone of them place himself before the other, Zacchaeus, and that centurion, when the one of them rejoicing received the Lord into his house:[476] the other says, Lord, I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof:[477] both honoring the Savior, although not in one way: both miserable with sins, both having obtained mercy." From these things it is accepted, that by reason of diverse virtues, namely of humility recognizing its own infirmity, and of charity desiring to join itself to God, both are praiseworthy. "To this avails, that the manna tasted in the mouth of each one according to his own will."[478] But discretion, which is the charioteer of virtues, tempers both: and the mean is always more praiseworthy than the extremes.

§ 48. Therefore it must be said to the first, that Augustine speaks of the good: and although one may be suitable, yet in his own estimation he is not suitable enough: and because in this he honors God by recognizing the excellence of his body for which nothing is worthy enough, this very thing is converted for him into praise and merit.

§ 49. To the next it must be said, that the fool eats neither sacramentally nor spiritually. Whence he who abstains sacramentally for a time on account of humility, is not a fool, because he does not abstain spiritually: and therefore that objection does not hold.

§ 50. To the next it must be said, that many acts are good in themselves, and yet on account of our fragility compared to those acts... (text cuts off here)

§ 1. [Certain things] become evil or reckless for us, such as taking an oath. For to speak the truth is good, and to call upon God's truth as a witness is good: nevertheless, because of our knowledge which is always mixed with doubt, taking an oath is something we ought to avoid. And so it seems it should be said here concerning communion: because although it is excellent in itself, nevertheless because our aversions and unsuitabilities are many, it is sometimes safer for us to abstain on account of humility.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that although the manna signified the future refreshment in the body of Christ, it was nonetheless given for the use of bodily nourishment for those journeying through the desert: and therefore it was not a danger to receive it every single day, but rather a necessity.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the daily sacrifice signified the future passion of Christ insofar as it is a passion, and not the spiritual food, which is in the suffered Christ as such: and therefore it was entirely burned. And because this passion ought to be daily in the fire of our heart, for this reason it was offered daily. Whence, Psalm 141:2: Let my prayer be directed as incense in thy sight, etc. [479]

Articulus 28 — Whether One Ought To Communicate Three Times In The Year

Should one communicate three times a year?

§ 1. Next, inquiry is made concerning what he says there, at G, § 2, near the end: If not more frequently, let men communicate at least three times a year, etc. For this is the decree of Pope Fabian, as is said there, De consecratione, dist. 2.

§ 2. However, it seems that one ought to communicate more often: because 1. Ambrose says, as we had in the Letter: If as often as the blood of Christ is poured out, it is poured out for the remission of sins, I ought always to receive it, I who always sin: I ought always to have the medicine.

§ 3. 2. Also, Bishop Hilary: If sins are not so great that someone is excommunicated, he ought not to separate himself from the medicine of the Lord's body: therefore it seems that one should communicate daily.

§ 4. 3. Also, From the council of Pope Martin: If anyone enters the Church of God, and hears the sacred Scriptures, and for his own indulgence turns himself away from the communion of the sacrament, and in observing the mysteries declines the established rule of discipline: we decree that such a one is to be cast out from the Catholic Church until he does penance and shows the fruit of his penance: so that, having received communion, he may merit indulgence. Therefore it seems that one should communicate more often.

§ 5. 4. Also, This seems to hold by a likeness to bodily food, which we receive daily: since therefore man does not live on bread alone, but rather on spiritual bread, it seems that this food should be received daily.

§ 6. 5. Also, Upon that passage of Matthew 6:11: Our supersubstantial bread, etc., a Gloss says, the Eucharist. Therefore it itself is daily bread: therefore it is to be consumed daily: therefore not merely three times a year.

§ 7. Furthermore it seems that one should communicate at least four times a year.

475. Cf. Lev. 16:2-15; Heb. 9:7.

§ 8. 1. For Pope Soter says: On the Lord's Supper the partaking of the Eucharist is neglected by some: that it should be partaken of by all the faithful on that same day (except for those to whom it is forbidden on account of grave crimes), Ecclesiastical practice demonstrates: since even penitents on the same day are reconciled for partaking of the sacraments of the body and blood of the Lord. Therefore one must communicate on the Supper at least.

§ 9. 2. Also, the Lord instituted it then, and gave communion to his disciples then: therefore since his action is our instruction, it seems that the whole Church ought to communicate then.

§ 10. 3. Also, In certain religious orders it is observed so strictly that on that day none of the subjects celebrates [mass], but all communicate from the hand of the superior, just as the disciples did from the hand of the Lord: therefore it seems that this practice should be emulated by all.

§ 11. Furthermore it is inquired here, What is the penalty for one who does not communicate according to the statutes of the canons?

§ 12. It seems that he should be cast outside the Church, because 1. It is said, John 6:57: He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. Therefore, by the contrary sense, He who does not eat, etc., does not abide in Christ: but to abide in Christ is to abide in the mystical body: since therefore such a one casts himself out from the mystical body, he also seems to be someone who should be cast out from the Church.

§ 13. 2. Also, this sacrament has its proper name from that by which the whole Church partakes together with it, namely communion: therefore he who deprives himself of communion ought to have nothing of the community or of communication: therefore he must be cut off from that community and communication: therefore he should be excommunicated.

§ 14. 3. Also, this seems to be from the Council of Toledo, in the decree De consecratione, dist. II: Those who enter the Church of God, and are discovered never to communicate, are to be admonished that if they do not communicate, they should approach penance, that is, if they are excommunicated, they should make satisfaction: if they do communicate, that is, if they are not excommunicated, let them not abstain always: if they do not do so, let them abstain, that is, let them be excommunicated.

§ 15. 4. In the Council of Elvira: Every man before holy communion ought to abstain from his own wife for three or four or six days: nor shall he be counted among Catholics who does not communicate in these times, namely, Easter, Pentecost, and the Nativity of the Lord. From these it seems that one who does not communicate should be excommunicated.

§ 16. Furthermore it is inquired, Why did the Fathers institute that communion be taken in these three times, rather than in others?

§ 17. 1. Because since this sacrament is nothing but a memorial of the passion, it seems that the faithful should communicate only on the day of the Passion, and at least on Easter.

§ 18. 2. Also, On Pentecost it seems [fitting] in no way: because then all carnality was converted to spirit: and the presence of flesh was withdrawn from the heart of the Apostles, so that the presence of deity might have a place: therefore it seems that one should not then communicate in the flesh and blood of Christ: because as he himself says: It is the spirit that gives life: the flesh profits nothing.

§ 19. 3. Also, In the Old Testament it is read in Exodus 12:10 that if anyone was unclean in the first month, he should celebrate the Passover in the second month. Therefore it seems that the holy Fathers in the New Testament ought also to provide a remedy for this, if someone were not prepared in these times, that he should communicate at another time.

§ 20. 4. Also, in Leviticus 23, passim, it is read that all these three feasts are celebrated for eight days, and on each day sacrifices were made, and the people ate before the Lord. Therefore it seems that this should also be done in the New [Testament], and much more: because the New Testament is of octaves, whereas the old was of weeks: therefore it seems one should communicate for eight days in any feast.

§ 21. 5. Also, Since two of these times have a correspondence in the Old Testament, namely Easter and Pentecost, in which the people ate before the Lord: why does the third, namely the Nativity, not have any correspondent: for in January the people do not convene before the Lord, but rather in September, and at that time we do not communicate.

§ 22. 6. Also, Since the Fathers decreed first that the people should communicate on every Sunday, and subsequently three times a year, how is it now decreed that this should be done at least once a year?

§ 23. 7. Also, Are matrons who have their own husbands, and who abstain from intercourse for one or two nights and otherwise devoutly, to be prohibited lest they communicate more often?

§ 24. 8. Also, Are widows and others living in chastity and desiring to communicate to be prohibited? It seems not: because nothing which increases grace and devotion and the custody of oneself is to be prohibited: but the frequency of communion does all these things in the communicant: therefore it is not to be prohibited.

§ 25. Solution. It seems it must be said to the first, that it does not speak solely of sacramental communion, but rather of spiritual communion: for this is to be repeated more often, even on the same day: because it is the medicine of our infirmity. But the other is to be ordered so that it may be done with the solemnity and honor of so great a sacrament.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that Pope Hilary is speaking of those who abstain always. For they act evilly and contrary to the statutes of the canons.

§ 27. Through this same [point], the solution to the following is clear: because it speaks of those who abstain at the times in which the Church ordains that one should communicate.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that bodily food is not entirely similar to spiritual food: because bodily food does not repel our unworthiness out of its own worthiness, but is always less worthy than the eater: whereas spiritual bread, because of its worthiness, sometimes repels us from itself, when foulnesses or sins are apparent in us.

477. Matt. 8:8.

§ 29. Also, Bodily bread does not supply our defect unless it is taken materially: but spiritual bread supplies our defect even if it is taken only sacramentally.

§ 30. To the next it must be said that the Gloss [cited] to the contrary speaks under a distinction, namely that it ought to be daily as regards the use of sacramental or spiritual eating: and not as regards the use of sacramental eating alone.

§ 31. To the next it must be said that in truth it is quite consonant with spiritual works to communicate on the Supper: and I well think that those who are otherwise prepared, and then wishing to communicate, are not to be prohibited: but nonetheless because the infirmities of men are many, and when one communicates another wants to communicate: sometimes they are deferred until the day of Easter, so that for the remaining two days they might be in fuller custody of themselves: because the people guard themselves poorly after communion, and guard themselves better in expecting communion. Hence if there is some person in whom this is not feared, I think it should be granted to him that he communicate on that day: and so it is done among religious, as is proven in the subsequent objection.

§ 32. To the next, which is further inquired, What is the penalty for one who does not communicate? It seems it must be said that without a doubt such a one is to be excommunicated after sufficient admonition. But I consider it a sign of one of two sins: namely either obstinate malice, since he in no way wishes to withdraw from his sins, or heresy. Whence in my judgment Prelates also offend greatly by fostering such ones, when they ought especially to excommunicate them: and Pope Fabian seems to mean this when he says that all should communicate in these three times, if they do not wish to lack the thresholds of the Church. § 33. To that which is objected concerning that decree, which commands abstaining from one's wife for three days, etc., it must be said that I well think this is how it should be done: if however one of the spouses is found compelled to render the debt and not to demand it: and does this frequently, because the other does not wish to abstain even at that time: I would grant communion to the one who renders it unwillingly, and not to the other who extorts the debt when it should not be extorted: because it is clear that he is bound to render it even at that time, if he probably fears regarding the incontinence of the other.

§ 34. To that which is further inquired concerning these special times, it must be said that there are three things in communion, namely the spiritual eating which gives life, as the Lord says, and the body which is consumed, and the representation of the passion. And the first responds to the time as regards the advent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. The second as regards the Nativity, when that body appeared in the world. The third as regards Easter, when the passion was celebrated.

§ 35. To that which is objected concerning Pentecost, it must be said that the carnal presence which was accompanied by the weakness of faith impeded divine consolation: but it is not such in the sacrament, but rather is accompanied by the fullness of faith: because nothing operates in this sacrament except faith: and therefore communion is especially fitting at the time in which the Holy Spirit was given.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that the Fathers of the New Testament do not attend to any uncleanness except that of sin: or that which is a sign of sin, such as pollution, or marital intercourse proceeding from the vice of incontinence. And because these infirmities are quickly corrigible, it is not necessary to provide other times, except perhaps for another day, or a third: and the custom of the Church holds this well; nor was it necessary to make a new constitution upon this, as blessed Gregory determines speaking of this pollution, as was also noted above.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that sacrifices were repeated for eight days on account of the memory of the resurrection, to which we come through the sacrifice of Christ. But that they feasted continuously for eight days does not signify sacramental feasting, but rather spiritual eating, which is not to be interrupted, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 5:8: Let us feast... with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that the Feast of Tabernacles (Scenopegia) which occurs in the month of September does not have anything corresponding in the New Testament: because it signifies the journey through the desert, in which the old law was received, which was to be ended in the New Testament: but Easter and Pentecost signify the sacraments of the new law, namely the Passion and the advent of the Holy Spirit: and therefore these have corresponding times, but that does not.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that the ancient Fathers were in a golden age with respect to our time, namely because the Church was still burning with novice fervor. But afterwards dangerous times came in the latest age, in which the charity of many grew cold, and because of the unworthiness of the people it was established [to communicate] three times a year. But because the senses of man are prone to evil from his youth , therefore in these times it was established that the people should generally communicate once a year: and would that they still communicated worthily!

§ 40. To the next it must be said that it seems to me that those preparing themselves for communion by abstinence from intercourse or those having intercourse ought not to be prohibited from frequent communion, especially from month to month according to the greater solemnities: because those who are worthy are unjustly kept away: and they are dealt with impiously when salutary food is withdrawn from them, which being given increases in them the grace they have received. H. Whether heretics and the excommunicated can confect this sacrament

§ 41. It is also usually inquired, Whether wicked priests are able to confect this sacrament? To which it can be said that some, although they are wicked, truly consecrate, namely those who are within [the Church] in name and sacrament, even if not in life: because it is brought about not in the merit of the consecrator, but in the word of the Creator. Whence Augustine; Within the Catholic Church in the mystery of the body and blood of the Lord, nothing more is accomplished by a good priest, nothing less by a bad one: because it is perfected not in the merit of the consecrator, but in the word of the Creator, and by the power of the Holy Spirit. For it must be believed that sacraments are confected in the words of Christ. Just as it is he himself who baptizes, so it is he himself who through the Holy Spirit makes his own flesh and blood. Also, Gregory: Some think the communion of the body is less sanctified if it is done by the office of those whose life seems ignoble to their eyes. Alas! into how great a snare they fall: that they believe divine and hidden mysteries can be made more sanctified by others, since one and the same Holy Spirit invisibly sanctifies those mysteries in the whole Church by operating, and blesses them by sanctifying. It is called a mystery because it has a secret and hidden dispensation. But a sacrifice [is so called], as a sacred action: because it is consecrated by mystical prayer for us in memory of the Lord's passion. A sacrament is in a certain celebration, when that thing is so done that we receive something of the signified thing. Sacraments are baptism, chrism, the body of Christ: which are therefore called sacraments because under the covering of visible things divine power works the salvation of those same sacraments more secretly. Whence from secret virtues or sacred things they are called sacraments. The sacrament of bread and chalice is called in Greek Eucharist, interpreted in Latin as good grace: and what is better than the body and blood of Christ? Whether therefore it is dispensed through good or through bad ministers within the Church, it is nevertheless a sacrament, because the Holy Spirit gives life: it is neither enlarged by the merits of good dispensers, nor diminished by the merits of bad ones. § 42. This must be said and held concerning the Lord's body, and this also concerning baptism and chrism: because divine power works more secretly in them, and this virtue or power is solely divine, not of human efficacy.

§ 43. But those who are excommunicated, or manifestly marked with heresy, do not seem able to confect this sacrament, although they are priests: because no one says in the consecration itself, I offer, but We offer, as though from the person of the Church. And therefore although other sacraments can be celebrated outside the Church, concerning this one it does not seem so. Which also Augustine seems to hand down saying: Recall the name, and heed the truth. For the Mass is so called, because a heavenly messenger (missus) comes to consecrate the life-giving body: according to the saying of the priest who says, Almighty God, command these things to be borne by the hands of your holy Angel onto your sublime altar, etc. Therefore unless the Angel comes, it can by no means rightfully be called a Mass. For if a heretic dared to usurp this mystery, would God send an Angel from the heavens to consecrate his oblation? especially since he threatened those same ones through the Prophet, saying: I will curse your blessings. But if truth asserts that it will curse their blessings, what will become of the host? Shall we then say that it can be blessed by him whom we know will be cursed by God with his blessing? For if God has cursed the blessings of heretics, and a simoniac has blessed: which of them will prevail? Will the blessing of the cursed one be able to reduce to nothing the most true words of the threatening God? From these things it is gathered that a heretic cut off from the Catholic Church is unable to confect this sacrament: because the holy Angels, who assist at the celebration of this mystery, are not present then, when a heretic or simoniac rashly presumes to celebrate this mystery. For it is not permitted to doubt that where the mysteries of the Lord's body and blood are transacted, assemblies of supernal citizens are present.

§ 44. But in the fulfillment of this mystery, just as form is to be preserved, so order is to be had, namely that there be a priest, and intention must be applied so that he intends to do it. But if he does not believe concerning that mystery as the truth holds, can he intend to confect it? and if he does not intend it, does he confect it? Some say that even those who do not think rightly about that mystery can intend: not indeed to confect that which would now be to believe rightly, but to do that which is transacted by others while it is confected: and thus intention is applied; and if the intention to confect that mystery is said to be lacking, nevertheless since he intends to say and do those things which are transacted by others, the mystery is fulfilled.

§ 45. That also can soundly be said, that the body of Christ is not consumed by brute animals, even if it seems so. What then does a mouse consume, or what does it eat? God knows this.

§ 46. We have touched upon certain things concerning this heavenly mystery to be held faithfully by Catholics. For he who contradicts these is judged a heretic.

Divisio Textus

§ 1. Next one must pass to another part of the distinction which begins there, at H, It is also usually inquired, Whether wicked priests, etc.

§ 2. For in this part it is treated of those things which this sacrament requires in the consecrator.

§ 3. And it has three parts: in the first of which he shows what is required in life, namely that he be within the Church. In the second, he shows that it requires order and intention, there, at H, § 3: But in the fulfillment of this mystery, etc. But in the third he states what is required on the part of the consumer, namely that he be rational. And to these at the end he incidentally adds what a heretic is, because he said in the epilogue that he who contradicts the things determined here is a heretic: and this begins there, at H, § 4: That also can soundly be said, etc.

§ 4. Moreover, two things are said in the first part: in the second of which he shows with many authorities and reasons that he who is not within, but excluded through schism or heresy or excommunication, does not confect the communion, that is, the Eucharist. But in the first he shows that the wicked who are within, not cut off from the Church, do confect, although they are wicked. The second begins there, at H, § 2: But those who are excommunicated, etc.

Articulus 29 — Whether Even A Wicked Priest Confects

Does even a wicked priest confect?

§ 1. A question arises contrary to what the Master intends in the first part, namely whether a wicked man confects? Next, Whether one cut off from the Church confects? Third, Whether the mass of a good priest is better than the mass of a wicked priest? Fourth, Why is it specifically prohibited by the canons that sacraments not be received from heretics, simoniacs, and manifest fornicators?

§ 2. To the first it is objected thus: 1. The Lord Jesus Christ through himself gave the power of confecting: and not to all, but to certain ones: therefore those who are not their successors do not have the power of confecting: but Apostolic men are known by three things, namely life, knowledge, and power: therefore those lacking in any of these do not have the power of confecting: but the wicked lack in life: therefore they do not confect. § 3. 2. Also, The more sublime an act is, the more it requires a perfect agent: but the most sublime act is confecting the body of Christ: therefore the agent ought to be most sublime: therefore the sublimity of life must not be lacking in such a one: therefore if this is lacking, it seems he does not confect.

§ 4. 3. Also, Augustine says that Christ remits sins through the dove, or through the members of the dove: therefore much more does he confect through the Holy Spirit, or the members of the dove: but the wicked are not members of the dove: therefore they themselves do not confect, as it seems.

§ 5. 4. Also, All power is ordered, and descends in an ordered way from God: therefore it descends from God into the Church, and through the Church to individuals: but the wicked are not of the unity of the Church: therefore it does not descend from him to them: therefore the wicked do not confect.

§ 6. 5. Also, Since in natural things it is thus, that a severed member does not have the act of the body, nor even a putrid member. Therefore since the wicked are in the Church like a putrid member, it seems they do not have any act of the mystical body: but to consecrate the body of Christ and the blood of the Lord is a most sublime act: therefore they do not have the power of consecrating, as it seems.

§ 7. 6. Also, Wisdom 1:5: The holy spirit of discipline will flee from the deceitful. Therefore much more will it flee from the openly wicked: but without the operation of the Holy Spirit the body of the Lord is not consecrated: therefore the wicked do not consecrate, as it seems.

§ 8. 7. Also, He who is unable to do what is less, is also unable to do what is greater: but a wicked man cannot obtain the first grace for anyone, which is less than the whole Christ in the fullness of deity and humanity: therefore much less can he confect the sacrament containing Christ in fullness.

§ 9. But if these things be granted according to the heretics,

§ 10. 1. To the contrary are those things which are first adduced in the Letter.

§ 11. 2. Also, Reason argues to the contrary thus: Certain acts are divine, such that they may also be done through other causes: but certain ones are divine only. For example, acts of nature are from God and from nature: but to create, and to give grace, and to resuscitate, are divine only: therefore those cannot be communicated, although man by praying may be able to operate something through ministry concerning promoting them: therefore in such acts, neither a good nor a bad man does anything: therefore they are done equally through a good and a bad minister: but such are sacramental acts, as is held in that Letter, where a sacrament is defined from Augustine, saying that a sacrament is that which under a certain covering of visible things divine power works salvation more secretly: therefore all such things are done equally through good and bad ministers.

§ 12. 3. Also, Matthew 23:3: All things whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do: but according to their works do ye not. Therefore the wicked have the power of binding and loosing even over the good: but the power of binding and loosing, and of consecrating the Eucharist, is given in the same order: therefore the wicked have power for both.

§ 13. 4. Also, A gift of God purely having force from the passion of Christ is sacramental grace, and is necessary to man for salvation: but to place such a thing under the power of man would be a danger, since a good man is scarcely found: and he who is believed to be good is frequently wicked: therefore everyone, in perceiving the sacraments from him, would be neglected and damned, which would be the greatest inconvenience: because then a man, totally excused by ignorance, would be damned for the fault of another, which is inconvenient: therefore it is necessary that a minister, whether good or bad or whatever kind he may be found to be, gives grace in the sacrament.

§ 14. Solution. Without any doubt it must be held that wicked priests confect, and give other sacraments: and the opposite is an error, and is defended as a heresy.

§ 15. Whence it must be said to the first, that Christ did not give them power such that they should necessarily be good in life: but Christ, wishing not merely to give ministers of the sacraments, but also to show what kind of minister is suitable who might handle the sacraments meritoriously, chose those perfect in life, and bestowed upon them knowledge and power: but it is not necessary for others to be so: but it is true that unless they are such, they are not worthy, but they handle the sacraments to the perdition of their own souls.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that that act which is transubstantiation is not done by the priest, but rather by the uncreated Word in the created word, as was shown above in the question concerning the form of this sacrament: whence if this act were the priest's, then the objection would make some contribution to the proposition: but the priest does not operate there except in ministry as uttering the words, as was said.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that members of the dove are spoken of in two ways, just like members of the body. For there are members by which the acts of the soul's powers which are in the body are fulfilled. Now the Holy Spirit is the motor of the whole mystical body, and moves it in multiple ways, namely as regards power in certain miracles, and as regards power in the sacraments, and in the dispensations of jurisdictions, and as regards the act of merit. And he who is a member of the dove as regards the act of miracles which the Holy Spirit works through him, is not a member except insofar as he conforms himself to the motor. And therefore they are not members unless they are moved according to grace to meritorious works. Whence a wicked man is a member of the dove as regards the power of the dispensation of the sacraments: just as the same can be a member through which the act of grace freely given by the Spirit is fulfilled, such as miracles, or doctrine, or prophecy.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that all power descends in an ordered way: but the conjunction of the body to the head is twofold, namely in life, and in power. And as regards life, that which moves formally does not descend into the wicked: because its contrary is in the subject, namely sin: but as regards power it descends, because sin is not contrary to power, but rather is frequently aggravated [by it].

§ 19. To the next it must be said that even in natural things members are not moved in one way by the soul: because some receive sensation and motion: whereas some receive motion and not sensation, such as bones and things of this sort. And in this way the wicked are in the mystical body into whom the strength of power descends for sustaining the whole Church: although they themselves do not receive the sensation of grace.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that the force there is in what it says, The holy spirit of discipline: because the Spirit, insofar as it is holy, inspires holiness and discipline, that is, the correction of morals: and as regards such acts it will flee the openly wicked, just as it will the deceitful. But there are other acts of the Spirit insofar as it is a spirit, such as to corroborate in the power of a miracle, and acts of this sort: and those do not have an impediment in the wicked: and therefore the Spirit, converting all things to its own service, frequently confers upon such men the power for the works of the sacraments.

§ 21. To the next it must be said that that which is unable to do the less, is also unable to do the greater: but it is not greater to operate in ministry for a sacramental act than to obtain the first grace, but rather much less: and therefore that objection does not proceed. Moreover, that act which is transubstantiation is not the priest's, but God's, as was said.

Articulus 30 — Whether One Cut Off From The Church Also Can Confect

Can one cut off from the Church also confect?

§ 1. Secondly it is inquired, Whether one cut off from the Church is able to confect?

§ 1. It seems, however, that they do not: because 1. Augustine says that outside the Church there is no place for a true sacrifice: but one cut off on account of heresy, simony, or schism, or otherwise excommunicated, is outside the Church: therefore he does not have a true sacrifice.

§ 2. 2. Also, the martyr Cyprian: The sacraments of heretics are sacrilegious and empty; therefore they do not consecrate.

§ 3. Also, Jerome: Heretics eat polluted bread: therefore they seem not to have the bread of sanctification: but the Eucharist is the bread of sanctification: therefore heretics do not consecrate, as it seems.

§ 4. 3. Also, Just as the power of consecrating is conferred upon a priest in Order, so is the power of binding and loosing conferred upon him: but it is certain that those cut off cannot bind and loose: therefore they cannot consecrate.

§ 5. 4. Also, From the Council of Laodicea: One ought not to receive the blessing of heretics, since they are curses rather than blessings: therefore it seems that by blessing they cannot consecrate the Eucharist.

§ 6. 5. Also, In the council of Pope Martin: It is not permitted for clerics or laymen to receive eulogiae, that is, blessings, from heretics: because they are curses rather than blessings.

§ 7. 6. Also, Pope Leo: In the Church of God (which is the body of Christ) priesthoods are not otherwise valid, nor are sacrifices otherwise true, unless the true Pontiff reconciles us in the property of his nature.

§ 8. 7. Also, Pope Leo: It is manifest that, through the most cruel and insane madness in the Alexandrian see, the light of all heavenly sacraments has been extinguished. The oblation of the sacrifice has been intercepted, the sanctification of chrism has failed, and by the parricidal hands of the impious all mysteries have withdrawn themselves.

§ 9. 8. Also, Gregory in the third book of the Dialogues concerning King Hermenegild, son of Leovigild: When the day of the Paschal festivity arrived, in the silent dead of night, his perfidious father sent an Arian Bishop to him, so that he might receive from his hand the communion of a sacrilegious consecration, and through this merit a return to his father's grace. But the man devoted to God rebuked the Arian Bishop coming to him, as he ought, and repelled his perfidy from himself with worthy reproaches. And many other things to be done towards this are adduced in the decree Causa I, question 1.

§ 10. From all these things, therefore, it seems to be gathered that, especially in this sacrament, those cut off from the Church do not consecrate.

§ 11. 9. Also, In Psalm 83:4: The sparrow has found herself a house, and the turtle a nest, etc., where the Gloss says that the chicks of heretics are trampled upon, because they are outside the Church: therefore it seems that they do not consecrate this sacrifice.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 12. 1. A heretic baptizes, and it is baptized: he confirms, and it is confirmed: therefore he also consecrates, and it is consecrated. But that these inductions are true is proven by I, q. 1, through many decrees.

§ 13. 2. Also, the power to consecrate is given to the virtue of the words with Order and the intention of consecrating: but all these can be in a heretic and one cut off: therefore such men can consecrate.

§ 14. 3. Also, Augustine speaking against Cyprian says that wherever the sacraments of the Church are, there they are also to be venerated, whether inside the Church or outside the Church. Therefore if one has Order and consecrates in the form of the Church, the sacraments are true.

§ 15. 4. Also, Jacob recognized his seed as his own through the bed, that is, through the womb of the handmaids: and the handmaids signify heretics, as Augustine says against the Donatists: and the seed signifies the sacraments: therefore the sacraments are also made by those cut off.

§ 16. 5. Also, I cau. q. 1: A sacrament, after the manner of light, cannot be defiled by the impure. And there are many other things there concerning this. Therefore it seems that the Master speaks falsely here in the Text.

SOLUTION. § 17. It seems it must be said that the Master is not to be supported: because the common opinion and truth is, as Augustine says, that all the sacraments of God require nothing in the maker except the Order by which he himself is a minister, and the intention, as will be clear below. In themselves, moreover, they require nothing except the due matter and the proper form. Since therefore this Eucharist has these even outside the Church, it can be consecrated, although they do this to their own damnation.

§ 18. And therefore also it seems one should not agree with certain Doctors, who investigate this by subtilizing, why heretics, or schismatics, or simoniacs, or open fornicators do not consecrate? because it is simply false what they say, as will be shown below in the fourth article of this question.

§ 19. If, however, anyone wishes to support the Master, he could say otherwise, namely that the Master speaks of heretics and those existing outside the Church not only with respect to the reputation of the Church which excommunicated them, but also with respect to the mode and rite of celebrating the sacraments: because they do not hold the form of the Church in celebrating the sacraments: and then what the Master says in the Text is true.

§ 20. Therefore to all the decrees which were introduced for that side, it must be said that they do not profit for their own salvation and that of others, according as the reality of the sacrament is twofold. One which is the reality and the sacrament (res et sacramentum): and this they confer, like the character in Baptism, Confirmation, and Order. Likewise in the Eucharist the true body of Christ under the visible species of bread and wine. The other is the reality which makes salvation formally, as grace is caused in the sacraments: and this they cannot confer: because the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the deceitful. And this solution is common.

§ 21. Another solution, however, was touched upon earlier, that those decrees of the Fathers speak of those who are outside with respect to the true form of consecrating, and with respect to the matter: and then it is no wonder if they do not consecrate the sacraments, because they do not observe the Order and form.

§ 22. But those things which are objected to the contrary, I concede outright.

Articulus 31 — Whether The Mass Of A Good Priest Is Better Than The Mass Of A Wicked Priest

Is the Mass of a good priest better than the Mass of a bad priest?

§ 23. Thirdly it is asked, Whether the Mass of a good priest is better than that of a bad priest?

§ 24. It seems, however, that it is not: because 1. Augustine says that sacraments are made neither better by the good, nor worse by the bad: but a Mass is good by reason of the sacrament of the Eucharist: therefore it seems that the Mass of a good priest is not better than that of a bad one.

§ 25. 2. Also, That which cannot increase in goodness nor be corrupted from goodness, is made neither better by a good man, nor worse by a bad man: but such is the body of Christ which is consecrated in the Mass: therefore, etc.

§ 26. 3. Also, According to this, hope would be placed in man if it were done better by one than by another. The Lord, however, commands that this not be done . Therefore it seems that the Mass of one is just as the Mass of another.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 27. 1. If two goods were equal, and a good is added to one, and nothing to the other: the two are better than the one: but the body of Christ is a certain equal good, whether it be done by a good man or by a bad man: and to this in the Mass of the good man is joined personal goodness in prayers, and devotion, and the like: but in the Mass of the bad man none of such things are added: therefore the Mass of the good priest is better than that of the bad priest.

§ 28. 2. Also, Better is that which, other things being equal, is more fruitful: but that is more fruitful which is excitational of greater devotion, than that which is of lesser, other things being equal: but the Mass of a good man excites greater devotion than that of a bad man: therefore it is better.

SOLUTION. § 29. It must be said that Masses, by reason of the substantial thing which is in the Mass, are equal: but by reason of that which is adjoined, and is the work of man, they are unequal: and thus the Mass of a good man is better, as the objections prove. Nor do I blame one who more gladly hears a good man than a bad man: because frequently a bad man handles the Lord's body irreverently, so that the palls are not clean, nor does he stand attentively at the altar: and this ought to be abominable to everyone who loves the Lord's body.

§ 30. TO THOSE THINGS, however, which are objected first, it must be said that this is true only by reason of the substance of the sacrament; but there are many things adjoined to the sacrament. I said, moreover, "other things being equal": because obedience could compel one to hear a bad man rather than a good man: and then it is better to hear a bad man than a good man, because obedience is better than sacrifice, and than personal goodness.

§ 31. And through this the solution to all the questions is clear.

Articulus 32 — Why It Is Especially Prohibited By The Canons That The Mass Or The Sacraments Are Not To Be Received From Heretics, Simoniacs, Schismatics, And Notorious Fornicators

Why is it specially prohibited by the canons that a Mass or sacraments not be received from heretics, simoniacs, schismatics, and notorious fornicators?

§ 32. Fourthly it is asked, Why is it specially prohibited by the canons that a Mass or sacraments not be received from heretics, simoniacs, schismatics, and notorious fornicators?

§ 33. And concerning heretics, and those cut off, and simoniacs, it is sufficiently found in I, q. 1, and XXIV, q. 3. But concerning fornicators much is found where treating of the life and honesty of clerics.

§ 34. 1. Since therefore the laws prohibit it, men seem to sin who receive ecclesiastical sacraments from such men, or hear their Masses.

§ 35. 2. Also, I Cor. 5:11: If he who is named a brother, is a fornicator, or covetous, or serving idols,... with such a one not even to take food. Therefore much less ought we to hear a Mass from him, or receive the sacraments.

§ 36. 3. Also, Such men seem to be fostered in sin by the fact that they are admitted in the dispensation of the sacraments: therefore it is good and useful that the people, by withdrawing, should show them their condemnation, so that they might sooner repent.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 37. 1. We know many to be fornicators through arguments walking upon the earth (i.e., manifest proofs), and also through non-distinction of bed and cohabitation: but yet we do not see the act itself, because coitus itself cannot be seen: and the holy Pontiffs tell us that we ought to hear such men and not despise them. And the Lord says: All things whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do . Therefore we ought to receive sacraments from such men, and hear their Masses.

§ 38. 2. Also, We see that such men are frequently prelates and deans and plebans and archdeacons and bishops and archbishops, and such men are not lacking: therefore all such men would have to be fled from.

§ 39. If perchance you say that Pope Lucius III distinguishes between a notorious and an occult fornicator: then the question is, What is to be held and what is to be thought concerning this?

SOLUTION. § 40. It must be said that those existing notoriously in such vices are not to be heard, if indeed it is notorious through confession made before a judge, or the proof of witnesses: or that by no subterfuge can it be hidden that he is a heretic, or schismatic, or simoniac: since he is excommunicated by the law itself, no one ought to receive sacraments from him: and if anyone knowingly receives them, he sins mortally. However, as long as this is not done, and it is concealed from the Church, then he ought to be heard.

§ 41. But concerning fornicators it is to be distinguished in the same way between notorious and occult. If, however, he is only infamous in the mouth of many, a purgation ought to be imposed on him, in which if he fails, he is held as convicted: and then he ought not to be heard: and this is of the rigor of the law, so that the rest may be terrified: because otherwise it would not be evil to hear such men. But before he becomes notorious, such a man ought to be heard: and he is reputed contumacious who will not have heard him.

§ 42. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the Apostle speaks to instill terror, so that they might be corrected sooner: and so also the laws speak.

§ 44. TO THOSE THINGS, however, which are objected to the contrary, the solution is clear: because of anyone, and especially of superiors, good is to be presumed, unless the contrary is proven.

§ 45. To another thing which could be asked, Since there are many mortal sins, why do the laws speak against these more than others?

§ 46. It must be said that these sin directly against the sacrament itself: for this is the entire sacrament of faith, and the causative agent of the union of the mystical body through the charity of Christ having suffered, and of maximum grace, so that it contains in itself the author of all grace, in whom are hidden all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge and grace of God: and it is the consummative agent of maximum spirituality. But the heretic violates the faith working in the sacrament: the schismatic, charity and unity: the simoniac sets invaluable grace as vile and under a price: and the fornicator, through carnal impurity, is contrary to the spirituality of the sacrament. And therefore these are especially warded off from celebration.

§ 47. Then it is to be noted upon that text, Nothing greater by a good man, etc. For there are verses in determination of this question, thus: The life of the minister alters not the sacrament's force, Just as it is not made worse by a worse one, So it is not made better by a better presbyter, This sacrament is never allowed to be sinister, Though it be often celebrated by a depraved minister.

Articulus 33 — Whether The True Body Of Christ Is Better Than The Mystical Body Of Christ

Is the true body of Christ better than the mystical body of Christ?

§ 48. Then an objection is made concerning what he says, there, H, § 1, near the end: And what is better than the body and blood of Christ, etc. 1. For from this he gathers that the true body of Christ is better than the mystical body of Christ.

§ 49. 2. Also, A cause is always better than its effect: but the cause of the mystical body is the true body; therefore it is better than it.

§ 50. 3. Also, A price worth this much and still more, is better than this demonstrated thing: but the true body of Christ is a price worth the redemption of the whole mystical body, and still more, because if there were infinite worlds, all would be sufficiently redeemed by the blood of Christ: therefore it itself is better.

§ 51. 4. Also, The pure Creator is infinitely distant from the pure creature: but that which is a creature, united to the Creator, is a mean between these two: therefore just as it is a lesser good than the Creator, so it is better than a creature; but the true body of Christ is united to the Creator, and the mystical body of Christ is not: therefore the true cor- pus of Christ is better than the mystical body of Christ.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 52. 1. I Cor. 10:11: All things happened to them in figure. The Gloss: "In good things it is figured much better by a figure than the figure itself is." But the true body of Christ is a figure of the mystical body. Therefore the mystical is better.

§ 53. 2. Also, Augustine says that the whole Christ is the members with the head: but it is certain that the members with the head are something better than the head alone: therefore the mystical body of Christ is better than the true body of Christ.

Response. § 54. It must be said that the true body of Christ is better than the mystical body, properly speaking: because, properly speaking, the mystical body means nothing but the members adhering to the head: and then a comparison is made between the members and the head: and in that comparison the head is not understood in the other of the things compared.

§ 55. And according to this it must be said to the first, that the Gloss upon the words of the Apostle to the Corinthians speaks of those things which are a figure only: whose entire use, namely, is in signifying, and not in communicating, as was the paschal lamb: and it is not understood of those things which are sign, and cause, and reality.

§ 56. To the other, the solution is clear through the things said before: because although the whole Christ is the head with the members, nevertheless when a comparison is made between the true body which is the head, and the mystical body which is the members, the head is not understood to be included with the members.

§ 57. Others say otherwise, distinguishing in the mystical body, namely that it can mean the members only, or the head with the members. If in the first way, they say the true body of Christ is better than the mystical: if in the second way, then they say the mystical is better than the true.

Articulus 34 — Whether It Is Well Called Mass Because The Heavenly One Was Sent To Consecrate Or To Give Life

Is the Mass well named because a heavenly messenger is sent to consecrate or vivify?

§ 58. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, H, § 2: For it is called a Mass, because a heavenly messenger comes to consecrate the life-giving body, etc.

§ 59. The heavenly messenger is an Angel: therefore an Angel is sent to consecrate and vivify: and this is false: because it was proven above that the uncreated Word consecrates and vivifies in the created word.

§ 60. Also let it be asked, What is vivified there? It seems that nothing is: because the body of Christ was alive beforehand, and those species never live, neither before nor after: and there are not more things there in the sacrament: therefore it seems that nothing is vivified there.

§ 61. If perhaps you say that the heavenly messenger is not called an Angel here, but rather Christ, who is called the Angel of great counsel, according to the Septuagint translation. The contrary is seen from the Text immediately, where it follows: Command these things to be borne by the hands of your holy Angel to your sublime altar, etc. For since nothing carries itself, it is clear that Angel is not taken there for Christ.

§ 62. FURTHERMORE it seems false what they say, that this is the reason why it is called a Mass. 1. For Hugh of St. Victor says: "The Mass (missa) is called as if transmitted (transmissa), because the people, through the ministry of the priest who performs the role of mediator between God and men, transmit prayers, vows, and oblations to God." § 63. 2. Also, Hugh: "For the sacred host itself can be called a Mass (transmission): because it was transmitted from the Father to us first, namely so that it might be with us: afterwards from us to the Father, so that it might be with the Father for us."

§ 64. 3. Also, Hugh: "The Mass is called from sending out (emittendo), as some say: because when the priest begins to consecrate the host, through the hand of the deacon and doorkeepers, he sends out of the Church the catechumens and non-communicants."

§ 65. Furthermore it is still asked concerning what he says: Command these things to be borne to your sublime altar. For either the species are demonstrated, or the true body of Christ, by the word these things (haec). If in the first way: then he says nothing: because the species are not borne there, and they have no place where the open truth of things is, as in the fatherland: whence they would be borne there uselessly. If in the second way, the petition is useless: because the true body of Christ is always in the superior goods of the Father.

§ 66. FURTHERMORE it is still asked, What is the sublime altar?

Solution. § 67. It must be said to the first, that the heavenly messenger, according to the Master in the text, is called a created Angel who, on account of reverence for such a great sacrament, comes and assists at the altar. Or rather it must be said, that it is a multitude of Angels: and according to this those gerunds, to consecrate and to vivify, descend from an impersonal verb: and the sense is, "so that it may be consecrated and vivified." But if it is understood of Christ, then the first objection has no place.

§ 68. To another it must be said that the vivification refers to the mystical body of Christ, united to the true or understood in the true: and it does not refer to the true body, or to the species.

§ 69. TO ANOTHER it must be said that it is called a Mass for many reasons: three of which Hugh touches upon in the three authorities, and the Master touches upon a fourth in the Text, and many others can be found.

§ 70. TO ANOTHER it must be said that that entire petition refers to the mystical body understood in the true: whence the sense is: Command these things, etc., that is, all the faithful understood in the word these things, to be borne, etc., so that, namely, they may be joined to the true body in heaven according to the goods of the fatherland, just as they are joined according to the grace of the way.

§ 71. To another it must be said that the sublime altar here is called the eminence of the Trinity, in which every sacrifice that is offered by the Church is reposed. For there is a superior, inferior, interior, and exterior altar.

§ 72. The superior, moreover, is twofold, namely the eminence of the Trinity, Exod. 20:26: You shall not go up by steps to my altar. The Gloss: "In the Trinity you shall not make steps, distinct according to more and less." Also, the superior is the Church triumphant, Ps. 50:21: Then shall they lay calves upon your altar.

§ 73. The inferior, again, is twofold, namely the Church militant, Exod. 20:25: If you make me an altar of stone, you shall not build it of hewn stones. Also, the inferior is the table of the temple, Ps. 117:27: Appoint a solemn day in thick crowds, even to the horn of the altar.

§ 74. The interior, moreover, is again twofold. The first is a clean heart, Lev. 6:12: The fire on the altar shall always burn. The Gloss, that is, charity in the heart. Also, the interior altar, faith in the incarnation, Exod. 20:24: You shall make me an altar of earth, that is, you shall have faith concerning the incarnation, not only concerning the deity.

§ 75. There is also the exterior altar, and this is twofold, namely the altar of the cross, Lev. 6:9, Upon the altar of holocaust the evening sacrifice was placed. Also, the exterior, the sacraments of the Church, and especially the Eucharist, Ps. 83:4: Your altars, O Lord of hosts, my king, and my God.

Articulus 35 — How That Saying, "I Will Curse Your Blessings," Is To Be Understood

How is that to be understood, "I will curse your blessings"? How is that to be understood, "I will curse your blessings"?

§ 76. Then it is asked concerning what is said, there, in the note, § 2, I will curse your blessings. For since the blessings of priests are or seem to be sacraments, it seems that they are cursed: which is against the decree I, question 1, because it says that sacraments cannot be made impure.

§ 77. FURTHERMORE it is also asked next to this about two equally bad priests, of whom one celebrates with the conscience of mortal sin, while the other, terrified, does not celebrate, but pretends to celebrate: which of them sins more?

§ 78. And it seems that the first does: because he contemns and, as much as is in him, profanes the sacrament.

Solution. § 79. It must be said to the first, that if force is applied in the Text, there is no objection. For this that is said, your, is taken discretively: and there is then no objection: because the sacraments are not the blessings of priests, but of God: whence, Num. 6:27, it is said: They shall invoke my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them.

§ 80. To another it must be said that the one pretending sins more, because he sins against God, placing pretenses in His sacrament: and against the men whom he deceives, and causes to adore a creature, that is, an unconsecrated host: and against himself, because Order was given to him for consecrating. But the other sins against himself.

Articulus 36 — Why The Sweetness Of The Sacrament Is Not Felt By Those Receiving

Why is the sweetness of the sacrament not sensed by the recipients?

§ 81. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, H, § 2, at the end: For it is not permitted to doubt, etc. For what he says here shows the reverence of the sacrament which is expressed, Wis. 16:20: You provided for them bread from heaven prepared without labor, having in it all that is delicious, and the sweetness of every taste.

§ 82. But then it is asked, Why is the sweetness not sensed? If perhaps you say that the palate is not well disposed in the one tasting, this seems to be nothing: because virtues dispose the palate optimally: and many approach who have all the virtues: because he who has one, has them all: and yet they sense nothing.

Solution. § 83. To this it must be said that this bread is voluntary, and it is sensed as it itself wills, and it holds back its sweetness now so that it is not sensed, so that the merit may be greater at the end, and so that it may be sensed more fully in the future. Furthermore, Although one may have virtues, nevertheless he has not yet purged the remnants of sin, which impede spiritual taste.

Articulus 37 — Whether A Priest Can Celebrate Outside The Altar And Without Sacred Vestments

Can a priest celebrate outside an altar and without sacred vestments? Can a priest celebrate outside an altar and without sacred vestments?

§ 84. Then it is to be noted concerning what he says, there, H, § 3: In the fulfillment of this mystery, just as the form is to be preserved, so the order is to be held, etc.

§ 85. But this seems to be false: 1. For the cause of an effect is outside the thing: therefore the thing does not contract its substance from it: therefore even without order, if someone says those words, he will perfect the body of the Lord.

§ 86. 2. FURTHERMORE, It has frequently been held above that the efficient cause here is the uncreated Word in the created word: therefore whoever, whether ordained or not ordained, utters those words, he seems to consecrate the body of the Lord. But if this is conceded according to the heretics, it seems then that the presbyteral order is given for nothing, which is unfitting.

§ 87. FURTHERMORE it is asked here, If a priest can celebrate not in the due place, that is, an unconsecrated altar, or on the ground where there is no altar, and without sacred vestments? It seems that he cannot: because 1. The Church has instituted that it be celebrated in this way: and God approves the deed of the Church: therefore God does not permit that it be consecrated against the statute of the Church.

§ 88. 2. Also, This would yield to the dishonor of such a great sacrament: and God does not permit this, as it seems: because then he would permit dishonor to befall His Son.

§ 89. Furthermore it is to be noted, that all things that were said in the tractate on Baptism concerning intention and those things which are required for a sacrament, have place here.

§ 90. It must therefore be said to the first, that without order someone cannot consecrate. For every act seeks its proper efficient cause. Whence the proper efficient cause in the ministry is the priest himself, unless he has order: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 91. To another it must be said that the operative efficient cause is the uncreated Word with the created word: but the ministering one is the priest: and he must be appropriated through priestly order.

§ 92. To THAT which is further asked, it must be said that it would be consecrated without sacred vestments, and without an altar, and by one not fasting: but the one consecrating would sin most mortally, and would have to be degraded, if found out.

§ 93. To another it must be said that the Church instituted this as existing concerning the solemnity of the sacrament, and not as concerning the substance.

§ 94. To another it must be said that this does not yield to the dishonor of the Son, because He cannot have dishonor: but God would permit this, if He permitted it, so that the condemnation of the doer might appear more just.

Articulus 38 — Whether A Mouse Or Another Brute Animal Can Take The Body Of Christ

Can a mouse or other brute animal consume the body of Christ?

§ 95. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, H, § 4: That also can soundly be said, that to brute animals, etc. This seems to be false: because 1. It was proven above that the body of Christ is there as long as those incorrupt species appear there: but in the mouth and in the belly of a mouse the species of bread appear: therefore it seems that the body of Christ is there: therefore a mouse consumes the body of Christ.

§ 96. 2. Also, Sin is more repugnant to the perception of Christ than the nature of a mouse: but a sinner receives the body of Christ: therefore also a mouse, as it seems.

§ 97. 1. FURTHERMORE it is asked concerning the punishment of him who badly guards the body of the Lord, so that out of his negligence it is eaten by mice or by other animals.

§ 98. 3. ALSO, Concerning the punishment of one spilling the blood, and concerning the punishment of one vomiting: and what is to be done when such cases happen?

Solution. § 99. Concerning the first a long question was had above: nevertheless it must be said here that "to consume" implies union or the potency for it, which is not in a brute: but it is in a sinner in whom sense is ordered to reason, according to which he is capable of spiritual eating, which a mouse is not. Well, however, do I concede that as long as discernible species are there, so long is the body of the Lord there: for this that is said in the apparatus of the decrees on consecration, dist. II: "He who has not well guarded," etc., namely that the sacrament immediately ceases after it is touched by a brute, is heretical, and laughable: but it must be said in the aforesaid way.

§ 100. To another it must be said that sin is not repugnant to capacity, but to fitness. But that someone is not fit does not cause him not to consume, but rather that he does not consume unto salvation: but if one is not capable, he eats neither spiritually nor sacramentally: although under the species of the one eating the true body of the Lord is present, as long as discernible species appear not transmuted into another humor.

§ 101. To another which is further asked, it must be said through the decree on consecration, second distinction: "He who has not well guarded the sacrifice, and a mouse or some other animal has eaten it, let him do penance for forty days. But he who has lost it in the Church: or a part of it has fallen, and has not been found: let him do penance for thirty days."

§ 102. To THIS, however, which is asked, What ought to be done if it is spilled: and how ought the one spilling to do penance? It must be said, that according to a certain decree on consecration, second distinction, of which these are the words. Behold the response from the words: "If by negligence something of the blood has dripped upon the earth, or upon the board, let it be licked up with the tongue, and let the place itself be scraped as much as is sufficient, and let the scraping be burned: but let the ash be recondited in the sacrarium: and let the priest do penance for forty days. If the chalice has dripped upon the altar, let the minister sip the drop, and let him do penance for three days. If upon the linen of the altar, and the drop has reached another, let him do penance for four days. If unto a third, let him do penance for nine days: if unto a fourth, let him do penance for twenty days, and let the minister wash the linens which the drop touched three times with a chalice placed underneath, and let the water of the ablution be consumed, and let it be recondited next to the altar." Of Pope Pius.

§ 103. To another which is asked concerning one vomiting, it must be responded from the words of Bede in his Penitential, who says thus: "If anyone through drunkenness or voracity has vomited the Eucharist, let him do penance for forty days, if he is a layman: clerics and monks or deacons and presbyters let them do penance for seventy days: bishops for ninety. If they have vomited it for the cause of infirmity, let them do penance for seven days."

§ 104. But if it is asked, What is to be done when he receives the species of living flesh or of a member? It seems to me it must be distinguished, that either it is transfigured as regards the sight of all, or as regards the sight of some only. If as regards the sight of some only: then it seems it is to be consumed.

§ 1. But if it is transfigured according to the sight of all: then it seems to me that it should not be consumed, but kept as a relic: and another is to be consecrated, and that must be consumed by the priest: because the canon says that the priest ought to communicate as often as he celebrates. That this is so is clear in the decree De consecratione, Dist. II, where Jerome says on Leviticus: "Of this host indeed, which is miraculously made in commemoration of Christ, it is lawful to eat: but of that which Christ offered on the altar of the cross, it is lawful for no one to eat in itself,"[480] that is, when it takes on the appearance in which He hung on the cross, that is, in the appearance of bleeding flesh, or of some member.

Articulus 39 — Who A Heretic Is, And Whence He Is So Called

Article 39: Who is a heretic, and from where is the term derived?

§ 2. Next, we must consider what he says, there, chapter I: Lest you be ignorant of what makes a heretic, etc.

For "heretic" (haereticus) can come from the Latin verb haereo, haeres (to cling): or from the Greek haeresis, which is choice. If in the first way: then he who clings to his own opinion by defending it is a heretic, if that opinion is heretical. If in the second way: then he is a heretic who follows his own choice, and not the meaning of the Scriptures, and defends it.

§ 3. However, there seems to be a contradiction between Hilary and Jerome in the text: because Hilary says that the crime lies not in the word but in the sense. But Jerome says that heresy is incurred from words spoken inordinately.

§ 4. But the solution is that words are sometimes spoken inordinately under a different signification than they usually have: for the reason that the one speaking...

DISTINCTIO XIV

Divisio Textus

...thinks they produce a sound understanding. And Hilary speaks in this case: because then, when it is shown that poison lurks in them, the one who spoke should correct his statement: and in such a case it suffices to correct his statement and retain the sense. But if he clings to the words' mode of signifying, then the sense was heretical: and in this way Jerome's statement is understood: and especially in difficult matter, such as concerning the Trinity and the Incarnation.

§ 5. And let these things said concerning the Eucharist suffice.

Division of the Text.

After this, concerning penance, etc. The entire treatise of this sacrament is divided into three parts: in the first of which he treats of penance in itself, namely as it is not contracted to this part which is compunction, or to that which is confession, or to that which is satisfaction. But in the second part he treats of its parts, or of it as considered in its parts: and this begins below, in Distinction XVI, there at A, But in the perfection of penance three things are to be observed, etc. And the third part treats of those things which are sacramental signs in penance: and this part begins near the end of this treatise, before the end of Distinction XXII, there at C, After the aforementioned things it remains to investigate what is the sacrament in the action of penance, etc.

§ 6. Furthermore, the first part is subdivided into two parts: in the first of which he states what penance is in reality and by definition; but in the second he eliminates certain errors concerning penance, there at A, § 4: By these words certain men more vehemently, etc. Furthermore, in the first part he determines three things: the first of which is the order of this...

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Is Well Ordered With Respect To The Order Of The Sacraments

...sacrament to the others, and its necessity for healing sin. The second is the distinction of penance according as it falls into diverse genera, namely of virtue, grace, passion, and sacrament: and this begins there at A, § 2: Baptism is only a sacrament, but penance, etc. In the third, he defines penance by its proper act, there at A, § 3: For penance is, as Ambrose says, etc.

§ 7. He touches first on the necessity of penance, saying that it is necessary for those placed far from God, that they might approach; and he touches on its order, when he says that penance is the second plank after shipwreck.

Article I: Is the sacrament of penance well ordered concerning its place in the order of the sacraments?

§ 8. But concerning this a double question arises, namely about the order of this sacrament, and about the phrase of Jerome which he adduces: The second plank after shipwreck.

1. For it was held above that no adult in baptism puts on the new man unless he repents of his old life; therefore one approaches baptism with penance; therefore the treatise on penance should be placed before baptism.
2. Also, in Matthew 3:5-6, it is said that they went out to John confessing their sins, and afterwards were baptized; therefore penance precedes baptism.
3. Also, one coming to baptism without penance is considered a hypocrite (fictus), and is one; therefore, in order to remove the obstacle, one must be penitent.

§ 9. It also seems that he ought to have treated penance immediately after baptism: because

1. It is the second plank after shipwreck, since baptism is the first; therefore just as the second plank is immediately after the first, so penance ought to be immediately after baptism.
2. Also, it is the second plank; therefore it is the second sacrament; and this seems to follow because, as was held above, sacramental grace looses from the sin which causes the shipwreck.

§ 10. It also seems that it ought to have been treated before the Eucharist: because

1. Penance is prescribed to all before communion.

480. Ps. 145:3.

2. Also, the lamb was eaten with wild lettuces, which signifies that one must communicate with the bitterness of penance. Therefore it seems that this sacrament precedes the sacrament of the Eucharist, although the Master ordered them conversely.

§ 11. Solution: It must be said that the Master orders the sacraments in a congruent order; which order was assigned above at the beginning of the notes on this fourth book of the Sentences.

But as far as pertains to this treatise:

§ 12. Reply to the first: It must be said that the Master orders the sacraments according to the order of the disease against which the grace of each sacrament is ordained: and because the first disease is original sickness and the penalties following it, for this reason the sacraments that are remedies against it with its consequences had to be placed first. Now baptismal grace is against that disease in itself; but because concupiscence remains, weakening one in the battle, therefore the grace of confirmation is given; but from the motion of concupiscence there follows a defect of powers from the loss of spiritual strength, against which the grace of the sacrament of the Eucharist is ordained. But because after all these things actual mortal...

Articulus 2 — Whether Penance Is The Second Plank After Shipwreck

...disease frequently occurs, therefore in this fourth place he treats of penance, which is ordained against it; nevertheless, in some respect, penance could be ordered before the Eucharist, as was shown elsewhere.

§ 13. Thus the solution to the first is clear, and also to the third: because this is particular and by accident, namely because the adult has actual sin; yet it is original sin in itself which is cured by baptism, and penance is not pre-required as regards the nature of the sin against which baptism in itself is ordained. But rather, because the one baptized, if he is an adult and has sinned, repents—otherwise he would be a hypocrite; but that it is not per se is clear, because if it were per se, penance would always precede baptism, and this is not true, as is evident in infants.

§ 14. To the next, it must be said that those baptized by John were all adults, and existing in actual sins; and therefore it was necessary for them to be prepared by penance for the baptism of Christ; but nevertheless, it is not necessary on this account that per se and according to the nature of the grace which baptism causes, it should not precede penance, as was said.

§ 15. To the next, it must be said that in the disease there are two things, namely guilt and punishment; and numbering guilt with guilt, then the first guilt is original, and the second is actual; and against the first is baptism, and against the second is penance. But since a sacrament is not only ordained against guilt, but also against punishment, it does not follow that it is the second sacrament: just as it does not follow: "actual sin is the second guilt in its genus, therefore it is the second disease"; because the second disease is that which proceeds from the first, with nothing added; and this is concupiscence and proneness to evil, which is from the fomes [of sin], or is the fomes itself. But a just punishment does not per se cause shipwreck, but rather guilt does; and therefore penance is the second plank, but nevertheless not the second sacrament, nor to be ordered in the second place.

§ 16. To the next, it must be said that sacramental grace looses from sin, not only on the part of the guilt from which it per se makes shipwreck, but also on the part of the punishment, as was said; and therefore that argument does not proceed.

§ 17. To the next, it must be said that just as what is generated is comforted after generation by nature, and thereafter is nourished; so it is also in the sacraments: because first is given the sacrament of regeneration which gives the being of grace against the first defect; then one is comforted from the grace of confirmation, and thirdly is nourished immediately.

§ 18. But if anyone should object that comfort is through nourishment, and therefore according to this the Eucharist ought to precede Confirmation: it must be said that this is invalid, because there is a twofold comfort in nature. One is which is through the removal of contrary dispositions: and this the generator itself gives with the form, or immediately after the form; because otherwise the generated thing would not resist the following alterations, but would immediately be corrupted. But the other is through the restoration of what is lost; and that is done through food.

§ 19. Therefore it must be said that the first comfort is that to which confirmation is similar, just as its name sounds: and its grace weakens concupiscence, and confirms the grace conferred in baptism; but the following comfort is likened to the Eucharist; and thus it is clear that the Master's order stands.

§ 20. To the next, it must be said that this is so by accident, insofar as there is actual sin in the partakers; but nevertheless, the defect against which the Eucharist is generally ordained in all, is prior to actual sin; and therefore the Eucharist is before penance.

Article II: Is penance the second plank after shipwreck?

Articulus 3 — Whether Penance Is A Virtue

§ 21. Secondly, it is asked, in what way is it called the second plank?

For the first shipwreck was caused by original sin, and the saving plank is baptism; but the second shipwreck is by actual or personal sin, and the saving plank is penance. Therefore it is asked whether it is a plank insofar as it is a virtue, or insofar as it is grace, or insofar as it is a sacrament?

For it is in all these genera, as will be clear below.

§ 22. If it is said, insofar as it is a virtue: ON THE CONTRARY: A second virtue ought to share something in common with some first virtue: for it is not congruously said that Peter is the second man, if the one prior to him was a donkey. Therefore baptism would be the first virtue; and this is false; therefore it is not the second plank insofar as it is a virtue.

§ 23. If it is said that it is the second insofar as it is a grace, this seems false: because many graces precede it, namely of confirmation, of the Eucharist, and of baptism.

§ 24. It is objected in the same way if it is said, insofar as it is a sacrament: for it was held earlier that it is not the second sacrament; therefore it seems that it is in no way the second plank.

§ 25. Solution: It must be said that it is the second plank insofar as it is a sacrament ordained against the disease which is guilt: because, as was said earlier, punishment does not cause shipwreck as such, because many punishments promote toward merit; and he who merits does not suffer shipwreck. Whence it is not the second sacrament absolutely, but the second one ordained against guilt. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Article III: Is penance a virtue?

§ 26. Next, objection is made concerning what he says there at A, § 2: Penance is called both a sacrament and a virtue of the mind, etc.[481]

And two things are asked here, namely whether penance is a virtue? And, whether it is a general or a special virtue, if it is a virtue?

§ 27. That it is a virtue, however, seems proven by reason and authority.

1. Matthew 3:2, on the words: Do penance, the Gloss says: "The first virtue is to destroy the old man through penance."[482]
2. Also, Ambrose: "To strip and cleanse minds imbued with vices belongs to perfect virtue and heavenly grace."[483] But it is evident that to strip and cleanse from sins belongs to penance. Therefore penance is a virtue.

Also, this is said in the text in many places.

§ 28. 3. The same is proven by reason: For the Commentator says on the fifth book of the Ethics, that every praiseworthy act is an act of virtue;[484] but to repent is a praiseworthy act, and is the act of penance; therefore penance is a virtue.

1. Also, in the fifth book it is said (both in the text and in the commentary) that legal justice is the same as virtue in general, precisely because the precepts of laws are concerning the acts of the virtues.[485] Therefore much more will the divine precepts be concerning the acts of the virtues; but to repent is commanded; therefore it is an act of virtue.
2. Also, virtue and vice are oppo-

...sites: therefore they mutually expel each other: for the Philosopher says that a contingent is not expelled by a contingent, but an opposite by that which is per se opposite to it; nor does a contingent arise from a contingent, but from an opposite in position.[486] Therefore that which expels sin is a virtue: but penance expels sin.

1. Also, some things are commanded because they are good; but some are good because they are commanded. To repent, therefore, will be in one of these genera. But it is evident that it is not good precisely because it is commanded, because if it were not commanded, it would still be good to repent; therefore it belongs to things that are good per se. It therefore pertains either to the intellect or to works. That it does not pertain to the speculative intellect is self-evident; therefore it pertains to a good work in morals. But every such thing is a virtue, as is elicited from the text of Tully at the end of the first Rhetoric;[487] therefore penance is a virtue.
2. Also, as the Philosopher says, virtue makes the one having it good, and renders his work good;[488] but penance does these things; therefore it is a virtue.

§ 29. If perhaps you say that to repent is not a work, but a passion. ON THE CONTRARY: It is either a passion only, or it posits an interior act. But it is evident that it is not a passion only: because it is said in the text immediately below, that penance is a virtue, or rather a purpose of amendment by grace, by which we mourn and hate the evils committed with a purpose of amendment, and we are unwilling to commit further those things to be mourned;[489] and this is an act, and to be unwilling to commit an act again posits something, because in this verb "I am unwilling" (nolo, you are unwilling), there remains an actual affirmed and supposed will; therefore there is a purpose, which renders the work good; therefore it is a virtue.

§ 30. But against this it is objected:

1. From the very name which sounds like a passion: for poenitentia (penance) is the same as poena tenta (punishment held); but no passion is a virtue, as is shown in the second book of the Ethics.[490] Therefore penance is not a virtue.
2. Also, certain other praiseworthy things which concern evils by suffering in some way, the Philosopher says are not virtues, as is clear at the end of the fourth book of the Ethics, where he says that shame is not a virtue, but a passion: although it is praiseworthy and has a mean.[491]
3. Also, in the second book of the Ethics he seems to say that nemesis is not a virtue, although it is praiseworthy and has a mean;[492] therefore it seems that neither is penance, which is sorrow for a committed offense, properly speaking a virtue.

§ 31. 4. Also, although the act of a virtue is sometimes concerned with passions, as its material, it is nevertheless in no way accompanied by a passion in the one operating, unless that passion is called joy, which is the sign of a form already possessed. But penance is always a passion, or with the passion of the one operating; therefore penance is not a virtue, as it seems. But that the first premise is true, is indeed written by a certain Philosopher, but it is also proven by induction: because the chaste or temperate man, by containing himself, does not suffer according to the delectable things in sense surrounding him, and so of the others; therefore I have my proposition.

Also, every virtue is a habit; therefore its act will be some act and not a passion; it is thus clear that it does not belong to a virtue properly to suffer.

Also, virtue is with joy, or at least without sadness; but penance is sorrow, or always with sorrow and sadness; therefore it is not a virtue.

§ 32. 5. Also, if it is a virtue: it will be either theological or cardinal. But it is evident that it is not theological: because all those have God as the material object concerning which the act operates, and the end on account of which; but penance does not have God as its material. It also seems that it is not a cardinal virtue: because it is not one of the four.

If you say that it is a virtue reduced to one of them: this seems false: because every reduction is according to something common; but there is no virtue which...

...seems to have anything in common with penance: since virtue is concerning a work ordained to the good, but penance is in a way a detestation, and not a good according as it is a good; therefore it seems that it is not a virtue.

§ 33. 6. Also, Augustine says that virtue is a good quality of the mind, by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly, which God works in us without us.[493] But all these things do not fit penance. PROOF: Because one does not live rightly by penance; therefore penance is not a virtue. That one does not live rightly by penance is proven thus: Everything by which one lives rightly, one lives by some rectitude of work; but rectitude of work is not penance, because to detest evil does not determinately signify any right work, but rather a certain disposition which precedes every right work, because no right work occurs with complacency in evil; therefore it seems that it is not a virtue.

§ 34. 7. Moreover, it is said commonly by almost all that he who has one, has them all; therefore if penance is a virtue, he who has it, has them all. But infants and innocents have many virtues; therefore they have penance, which is false: for it is said in the Prayer of Manasseh, in the middle: You have not appointed penance for the just, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, for those who did not sin against you.[494]

1. Also, Christ had many virtues: therefore He had penance; and penance is sorrow for a committed crime; therefore from this it would follow that He had committed a crime, which is absurd.
2. Also, all the virtues will be in some way in the fatherland (heaven); penance will in no way be in the fatherland; therefore it is not a virtue. That it will in no way be in the fatherland seems clear because in no way will there be sorrow there, and penance is sorrow, or with much sorrow.

§ 35. It is very easy to adduce many other objections here for both sides, but let these suffice.

482. Glossa ordinaria on Matthew 3:2.

§ 36. Solution: It seems to me it must be said that virtue is taken strictly, and broadly. Strictly indeed by the Philosopher in the Ethics; and according to this it is a habit ordering to the good, either intellectual or moral. Intellectual, indeed, because by teaching and by experiencing concerning operable things it takes the generation of its nature or of itself from that part in which it is material: and the will is what completes the form, according as the Philosopher says that virtues are simply wills or not without the will, such as [choice], and prudence, and the like, which, as the Philosopher himself says in the sixth book of the Ethics, is the same as right reason:[495] and this is understood of the right reason of what is eligible for the work of virtue.

§ 37. But moral virtue is about passions or operations: about passions indeed, innate or inflicted; about innate ones is temperance, but about inflicted ones is fortitude. But justice is about operations, in which there is strictly speaking no passion: for which reason justice itself is called a common good. Because also the virtues moderating delectations or sadnesses are about their proper objects. But as the same Philosopher says in the fifth book of the Ethics, they do not have a mean in the same way:[496] since that virtue which is about passions is strictly a mean of two malices, each of which is an excess and a defect differently: just as the mean of audacity (which exceeds in daring, but is deficient in fearing) and of timidity (which exceeds in fearing and is deficient in daring), and this mean is indeed fortitude; and so it is found in temperance, and in others. But justice is not always the mean of two malices, nor of two of which each differs as excess and defect: which is easily shown in directive justice. Because if injustice exceeds by ten, in which it deceives me, I unjustly lack by ten: and the mean will be that as much is restored to me as I unjustly lack, and as you unjustly exceed: and the malice here is only on the part of the one deceiving or defrauding; but on the part of the one who suffers the injury, there is no malice, but only punishment. Simi...larly, there is only one possessor here who has more than he ought, and only one who is lacking. The ratio of the mean also differs in another way: because in the two which are about passions, the mean is relative to us; but in justice the mean is strictly of the thing itself, and therefore it is taken by geometrical or arithmetical proportionality, as the Philosopher says.[497] But of these things elsewhere. Thus, therefore, speaking most strictly of virtue, I readily concede that penance is not a virtue.

§ 38. In another way, virtue by which one lives rightly is taken with an extended name: and this especially by the Theologian, who calls many things virtues which are placed in the genus of passions by the Ethicist: just as Gregory calls fear a virtue, as also generally the seven gifts; [498] and Ambrose calls joy a virtue, as also generally the twelve fruits enumerated in the Epistle to the Galatians.[499] And every theologian calls hope a theological virtue, and similarly charity, and others which according to their very name seem to sound of passion. And according to this, virtue will be more generally defined: namely that whatever habit perfects the rational soul according to an act ordering it into the good or away from evil, that is called a virtue. And thus penance is a virtue, and fear, and joy, and the like, according to the sayings of the Saints.

483. Ambrose, De poenitentia, II, c. 10.

§ 39. However, induced by this diversity of virtue, our Doctors took different opinions, namely with Master William of Auxerre and his followers saying that penance is not a virtue; but with others venerating the sayings of the Saints and saying that it is a virtue. But to me and to certain others it seems that it is a virtue.

§ 40. But we must reply to the objections of both sides, lest we fail those holding either opinion, because in a certain way we agree with both.

§ 41. WE SAY therefore to the first and second, that virtue is taken there with an extended name. But in what way it is called a perfect virtue, will be treated below in a question.

§ 42. To the next, it must be said that this is understood of virtue generally taken: according to which even the treatise of certain passions pertains to the treatise of virtues, such as of shame, and fear, and penance, and the like. Or force may be put on the "praiseworthy act": for a praiseworthy act is determined to the good on account of a good end: and penance does not have such an act, which is in respect to evil.

§ 43. To the next, it must be said that it is not necessary that everything concerning which there is a legal precept be an essential act of virtue. And there is a counter-instance: because there is a precept of the law not to ascend the tower: although nevertheless it is not an essential act of any virtue. And in theological matters, to go to Church, or to appear three times a year in the sight of the Lord. And therefore the Masters distinguish that the act of a virtue is twofold, namely proper and common. The proper act is essential, and that is one alone; but the common act is that which is secondarily intended on account of something that is done around the act of virtue.

§ 44. Also, they distinguish acts as they go forth from a virtue in a twofold way, namely elicitively and imperatively. Elicitively, just as each virtue effects its own act; but imperatively, just as one nicely effects the act of another, according as the former is made commanding to it, and the other obeying it. And thus it is true that every precept is concerning an act of virtue, primary or consequent, elicited or imperated: but from this act thus accepted it cannot be proven that any habit is of virtue, if virtue is strictly taken.

§ 45. To the next, it must be said that again the middle term of that argument does not prove that penance is a virtue, unless virtue is taken generally: because for the ratio of merit it suffices in a virtue that it be an act consequent upon or imperated by some virtue.

§ 46. To the next, it must be said that sin has a twofold expeller, namely by mode of a contrary: and thus any sin is expelled by the virtue contrary to it: and this is the formal expeller, and per se. It also has an expeller by mode of an efficient cause: and this is twofold, namely, an efficient cause per se: and this is God alone, according to what He says, Isaiah 43:25: I am, I am He who blots out your iniquities for my own sake. And there is an expeller by mode of merit on the part of the sinner: and this is the detestation of sin, which is the act of penance, because he merits to abolish sin, to whom sin is not pleasing, but who detests it. And that expeller which expels in this way, is not on this account a virtue: but it would be a virtue if it expelled in the first way, namely as a contrary; and the objection proceeds in this way. But that it is so, is clear: because from the terms of motion it is shown what is contrary: just as from healthy comes sick, not from white; and from white comes black, not from a length of three cubits: so from vicious comes virtuous, and not from penitent, unless from there denotes the order of being, as was said.

§ 47. To the next, it must be said that to repent is not perfectly a good per se: because to repent signifies a certain thing which is required for a good per se; whence it is like an adjunct to the good per se; and therefore it does not strictly follow that it is the act of a virtue strictly taken. But when it is said that something is good per se, or from a precept, good per se is taken generally, and not strictly, namely as it commonly applies to the honorable and useful good, to that and what is conjoined to it. And when it is said that virtue is of things good per se, it is taken for the honorable good strictly accepted; which Tully defines, saying, that the honorable is that which draws us by its own force, and allures us by its own dignity.[500]

§ 48. To the next, it must be said that when it is said, "virtue makes the one having it good, and renders his work good," it is understood of a work which is per se good according to the ratio of the mean and the end; but such is not a work which is merely withdrawing from evil, as was said.

§ 50. For the other side, namely sustaining that it is a virtue, we say to the first objection to the contrary, that there are many things which by their very name sound of passion, such as mercy, nemesis, and the like, which nevertheless are habits. And therefore because we do not have a proper name for the habit itself, we name them by the names of the passions, on account of some similitude between the act of the passion and of the habit, as in hope, joy, love, etc. And thus also penance (poenitentia) is the name of a passion by which that habit is named which moves free will to detest sin.

§ 51. To the next, it must be said that shame and penance are not similar. Because shame does not properly denote an act, but a passion consequent upon guilt. And therefore also the ashamed person, as the Philosopher says, does not flee the base thing because it is base, but because it has reproach or upbraiding with it; and therefore that is only a passion.[501] But penance detests sin, not because it has reproach or upbraiding, but it detests the perpetrated sin because it is base and evil. And this is a certain simply good act; and therefore penance will be a virtue, and not shame.

§ 52. To the next, it must be said that the act of a virtue does not have the act of the passion outside of which it is, because this is impossible. But it has already been held that it is false that every virtue is operative concerning passions or operations of the best things. And we also say that penance is concerning a certain work, that is, to detest the perpetrated sin; and it is with sorrow adjoined to that act.

485. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, V, 1 (1129b 11-25).

§ 53. To the next, it must be said that a virtue has a delectation which is consequent upon the act of virtue, insofar as it is a virtue; but that it does not have any sorrow concerning its material, or concerning its contrary, or as an instrument, this is not true:

and penance has voluntary sorrow as its instrument, yet it has joy following upon the act, as will be held below from the words of Augustine: Let the spirit sorrow, and rejoice in the sorrow.[502]

To the next it must be said that, as was said, the Moral Philosopher[503] considers only strictly spoken virtues: but if a cardinal virtue is taken broadly, then it will be reduced to one of the cardinal virtues as a secondary habit to a principal one: and according to this it is reduced to a part of justice, insofar as penance is satisfactory for sins, returning the due honor to God, as Anselm says and in light of this it is clear what is common in the act according to which the reduction is made.

To the next it must be said that penance is correctly [called] a virtue: because rectitude is a rule towards the good and away from committed evil according to what is commonly accepted; and therefore here rectitude is from evil. But the objection does not take the "right" except as taken very strictly, which is only towards the good.

To the next it must be said that different people respond differently, and all well: because that objection is made concerning many things. Some say quite probably that virtue is twofold, namely informing towards the good, and reforming from evil: informing towards the good is a perfect and true virtue, such as charity, and justice, and the like: but reforming from evil is called an imperfect virtue. And they say that what is said, He who has one, has all, is understood of perfect virtue informing towards the good: and still in that it does not follow except concerning the perfections of virtues, because faith did not remain according to an imperfect act in Christ, but according to an act of its own genus which is vision. But concerning this many things were noted above in the third book of the Sentences.[504] Others say, to whom it seems one should consent, that although he who has one, has all, nevertheless it is not necessary that he have them according to the same acts, just as was already said of faith which Christ did not have according to which seeing through a mirror in an enigma is an act of faith, but he had that which is perfect in the virtue. So they say also of penance, according to which it is a virtue, that he who has one, has penance, both the little child, and the innocent, and Christ: but not the act to which imperfection belongs, which is the detestation of sin with the will to never commit it again: for the act which is to detest a committed sin and to sorrow over what is committed is of imperfection: and therefore according to this act it is not in them.

But to what is objected concerning little children, it is to be understood of penance, according to which it is a virtue in the genus of passion, and of sacrament: for thus it is true, that no one repents except he who has sinned.

To the next it must be said that this act, which is the detestation of sin and the will not to commit it again, is most complete in the fatherland [heaven]: and in this way it can be said that penance is in the future, which in every way will be without passion: as Gregory says, that we gladly remember sometimes our wounds: not from which we may be sad, but from which we may give more abundant thanks to the physician.[505]

486. Aristotle, Physics, V, 5.

Articulus 4 — Whether Penance Is A General Or A Special Virtue

Whether penance is a general or special virtue?

Secondly still, for a greater understanding of what has been held, it is asked whether it is a general or special virtue?

It seems that it is general: because

§ 1. Augustine says that penance is a good and perfect thing, which recalls all defects to the perfect: but defects are manifold: therefore they are not recalled by one, but by all opposed virtues: therefore penance is every virtue: and thus it will be the same as virtue in general.

§ 2. Also, Augustine in book V of the Responses There is one virtue which recalls the defect of the irascible [power] to the perfect, and another which [recalls] the defect of the rational: but penance recalls all: therefore penance in the irascible is some virtue, and some [virtue] in the rational: therefore it is diverse virtues: and thus it will be the same as virtue in general.

§ 3. Also, habits are known through acts, and acts through objects opposed to them: therefore an act is general, whose object is general: and an act is special, whose object is special: but to this act which is to repent, a general object responds, because every sin: therefore it is a general act: therefore also a general habit: therefore also penance is a general virtue, and not special.

§ 4. If by chance you say, that sin in general does not respond [to it], but rather committed sin, insofar as it is committed: this seems false: because committed sin, insofar as it is committed, cannot not be committed, since it is a word of the past: therefore penance concerning it in such a respect will be in vain.

§ 5. Also, the sin which someone commits is not contracted by multiplication to one species of sin, or genus: but it is contracted by comparison to the agent only, namely with respect to that which he did not do the same in genus or species: therefore by that determination 'committed' the sin is not contracted to a species or matter, but on that part it still remains general: therefore its act will be general: therefore also a general habit: and thus follows the same as before.

Also, when it is said that of a general object is a general act, and of a special object the act is special, it is not understood except of the generality and speciality of the matter.

§ 6. Also, to will the good and to will this or that good, differ like species and genus: because the will is not determined except by the thing willed. And just as the good and the not-good differ: so too willing this and willing this good. Therefore similarly detesting evil and detesting this or that will also hold themselves by the same reason: but penance is not the detestation of this or that, but generally of committed evil: therefore it is a general virtue, as it seems.

§ 7. Also, since sin is a certain privation, it will not be specified except by a habit: therefore the privation which is the habit of good in general, is general: therefore the detestation of that privation which is not contracted to a matter or species, is a general detestation: but this is of penance insofar as it is penance: therefore penance is a general virtue.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Penance detests evil, not any evil whatever, but existing in a proper subject: but this is not general: therefore penance is not a general virtue, but a special one.

§ 2. Also, to detest a sin which is present, because it is vitiated, or because it is base, is a determined and good and difficult act: but virtue is concerning the difficult and the good: therefore that which ordains to this will be some virtue.

§ 3. Also, everything that perfects free choice through a determined act according to the good and the difficult, is a special virtue: but penance is of this kind: therefore it is a special virtue. Proof of the middle premise. Detesting sin with the hope of pardon, is an act reducible essentially to some other virtue, although by command it could be otherwise: therefore this such will be a special virtue which is penance.

SOLUTION. It must be said that a general virtue is spoken of in two ways. In one way it is taken by the Philosopher: in another way by the Saints. For in book V of the Ethics it is said: Justice is a general legal virtue, differing from virtue in general by reason only, not by subject: because virtue is according as it perfects the soul: and justice or injustice is according as it consonant with the law, or not, in the work concerning which the law is:

but in this way penance cannot be called a general virtue, that is, the same as virtue in subject, and differing in reason: because the work of penance is not the general work of all virtues as its work is taken properly, namely the detestation of committed sin because of the hope of pardon and the fear of hell. But if the detestation of sin or sorrow is taken commonly, according as Boethius says, that virtue loves itself and spurns its contrary, then any virtue spurns and detests the vice opposed to it: and in this way the general detestation of vice or sin will be the act of virtue in general. But this is not properly called penance: because all penitence is in a committed act that is not voluntary, that is, to which the will is contrary in that which is done, as is held from the beginning of book III of the Ethics. But virtue in general spurns every vice whether it is done or not.

But general virtue is specially called by the Saints a certain general justice, by which the impious becomes just: which some say is the state of general rectitude to God, to oneself, and to neighbor: and in this way again it is not true that penance is a general virtue. To these modes some add a third, namely that a general virtue is one collecting other virtues integrally, or quasi integrally, according as Chrysostom says, that justice is general: because it is like a vine: and other special virtues are like branches. But I do not understand this thus: but I understand Chrysostom speaking of legal justice, which is general through the said mode: yet it is not like an integral whole to virtue: but it is called a vine because of the scope of its commonality to the works of other virtues, according as they are referred to the precept of the law: and the others are called branches, because they are particular quasi planted in the reason of legal justice. But in some way in truth it is called a general virtue according to matter, although it has a special form and reason: just like prudence whose object is the eligible towards a moral work, not in one matter, but in every reason: yet in a certain special reason prudence is contracted into a special virtue. But this reason is called by some the order of the work in circumstances and end, according as every virtue is called the inspector of the mean in some way, but prudence simply. And in this way through a certain similitude penance can be called a general virtue: because it has an act which does not determine for itself this or that matter, but rather receives evil or sin in every matter under the reason of a special thing, namely a committed thing, which can obtain pardon.

According to this mode therefore we shall say, that penance is a general virtue with the generality of the matter about which it is: having however a determined reason of existing about it: and therefore it is called special from other virtues.

IT MUST BE SAID therefore to the first, as above, that what recalls defects is twofold, namely by way of form, and by way of something like an efficient and operative [cause] concerning the defective subject, so that it may be removed from the defect. The first is general. The second does not need to be general, but can be special.

To the next it must be said that Augustine speaks there of things recalling individual defects formally.

To the next it must be said that that objection does not prove that penance is general except by the commonality of the matter about which it is, which is like a remote matter. But that is contracted and is made like a proper matter, through the special reason which penance places about it: and this is committed sin, able to have pardon through sorrow, as was said.

To the next it must be said that 'committed' posits the necessity of the committed thing: and according to this penance purging sin is not concerning it: but from the fact that what is committed still is present in some way in the subject, according as the Master says above in the second book of the Sentences, that sin passes in act, and remains in guilt: and it does not remain indissoluble in the subject, but rather soluble through penance: and in this way penance is concerning committed sin, but insofar as the commission is the cause by which it is in some way in the subject not soluble except through penance.

To the next it must be said that sin is general as to matter: but nevertheless it is restricted by the fact that it is committed concerning the subject: whence from this the sin which is committed is present, and what is not committed is not present: and penance does not seek another speciality: and since the act of penance formally receives that speciality, penance will not be a general virtue, but a special one, just like prudence, as was said before.

489. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, IV, dist. 14, cap. 1.

To the next it must be said that it is true, that the will is determined by the willed thing: but to repent is not to determine evil in such a respect, but rather according as evil is existing in the subject: and through the fact that it is committed, able to have pardon through sorrow: and thus a special will is produced: and therefore it is not similar what is brought for a similar thing in the opposite.

To the next it must be said that sin denotes a privative act, and malice denotes the privation itself: and I well concede that it is not specified except by its opposite: but it is specified by its opposite in two ways, namely by that which is the matter about which it is, or by the reason which it places about the remote matter, which although it belongs to another, yet by determination is made its own: just as prudence which about the matter of chastity or fortitude, places a special reason, and makes it by this proper to itself: and so virtue is also specified on the part of the subject, namely what is present, and through the consequence itself committed, insofar as through a proper privative work it is of this or that virtue. Or better it is said, that penance is not concerning sin insofar as it is solely a privation, but insofar as it is a committed act with a privation: and thus although on the part of the privation it is not specified except by its opposite, yet on the part of the act it can be specified: and in this way penance is concerning it like a special virtue.

But to those things which are objected to the contrary it seems it must be conceded.

Articulus 5 — Whether Penance Is In One Genus, Or In Several Whether penance is in one genus, or in many?

Then it is asked about this which he says, there, A, § 2: For there is interior penance, and there is exterior, etc.

For from this that is said here, and a little below, it seems penance is placed in a multiple genus: for it is called here a virtue, and a sacrament.

Also, a little below, it is called an act, when Ambrose says, that penance is to weep or bewail past evil things, and not to commit things to be bewailed.

But a little below also a virtue, or grace: since nevertheless grace properly speaking is not a virtue.

Also, further on in the same distinction it is called a sorrow or affliction and bitterness of soul. Therefore penance is in the genus of virtue, and of grace, and of act which is to bewail, and of passion, namely of sorrow, and of sacrament: but since one and the same species is not in diverse genera, it seems that in these ways it is not said univocally, but equivocally.

Also, it seems that the Master speaks falsely in the Littera, when he says that exterior penance is a sacrament: because, as was often held above, in a sacrament a certain thing is that which is a sacrament only, and a certain thing which is a reality only, and a certain thing which is a reality and a sacrament: and this is always the interior and truest sacrament: therefore in penance it is similar: therefore the exterior is not solely a sacrament.

Also it is said below, and the Master says in the Littera, that in penance there is a certain thing which is reality and sacrament, and it is interior: therefore he seems contrary to himself to this which he says here.

FURTHER it is asked, Since others are only sacraments, like baptism, and confirmation, and the Eucharist, and so for the others: why is this one a virtue and a sacrament, and grace, and sorrow, and a certain act, just as it was already held, that it is placed in diverse genera?

Also further it is asked, Whether penance according as it is a virtue, is the reality of penance according as it is a sacrament?

And it seems that yes: because

§ 1. This is the reality of a sacrament, which is caused by it: but the virtue of penance is caused by the sacrament of penance itself: therefore it is its reality. Proof of the minor. Every virtue is given to one truly receiving the sacrament of penance: therefore also this one: therefore it is its reality.

§ 2. Also, against the disease according as it is a fault, two sacraments are ordered, namely baptism and penance: but the fullness of virtues is the reality of one, namely of baptism: therefore also the reality of the other, as it seems, because sin also is not expelled except through a virtue.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Although every virtue is given in baptism, yet it is not congruously said that chastity is the effect or reality of baptism: because just as causes are proper, so they have proper effects in which they differ from others: but baptism and penance are diverse sacraments: therefore they have proper effects: but a proper effect cannot be a virtue, because this effect is caused by many things: therefore it is not the effect of this sacrament, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, unless someone detests the committed sin, he does not receive the sacrament of penance, nor absolution by the power of the keys: therefore since to detest is of the virtue of penance, it seems that before penance according as it is a sacrament, he has penance according as it is a virtue: but a cause always precedes the caused thing according to being and reason: therefore the sacrament of penance is not the cause of the virtue of penance, according as it is such, as it seems.

SOLUTION. It must be said to this, as it seems, that penance is not taken in one signification, according as it falls in the diverse aforementioned genera: but since in sin there are many things, and penance is contrary to sin according to diverse reasons of contracting sins, it falls in diverse genera: for in sin there is a fault, which is contrary to grace: and there is an act there which causes its existence in the subject, because although its act passes, yet the sin still remains in the subject, as was said before: and again sin is a certain wound of natural good, and a despoilment of gratuitous things: and it is the same with a certain delight in the work. Therefore according to the contrariety which penance has to it in that which is a certain fault, thus penance is grace, and is placed in the genus of grace: but in that it is remaining in the subject from the commission, thus its contrary is virtue, and it is placed in the genus of virtue: but sin according as it is a certain wound of the soul, thus has a medicine which is a sacrament, and in this way penance falls in the genus of sacrament: and according as it is in a delectable work, the act which is to bewail or sorrow is contrary to it: and according as it is a certain lust or from lust, the passion which is sadness which is called penitence is contrary.

But if someone should say, that these are differences considered according to certain modes, more than according to reality: since those things which are in diverse genera, differ according to reality: and thus this distinction is not competent. It must be said, that this distinction is according to reality: because in truth penance which is in the whole, that is, as to every mode and all things which are in sin, is: a sorrow proceeding from a habit of free choice informed by grace, having a certain act destructive of sin, and manifested in a sign, and inwardly by the power of the keys: whence penance singularly is called all those things, namely grace, and habit, and act, and sacrament, and sorrow, and also that which is extra enjoined through the keys: and therefore it falls equivocally into diverse genera, although in all significations it has an analogy to one thing, which is to be contrary to a sin which is committed.

To the next it must be said that the Master here takes the exterior, according as it attests to the interior: and thus it is clear, that the objection is not valid. Or it can be said, that the Master here speaks of that which is a sacrament only: but the first solution is better, as is proved below, in distinction XXII, last chapter.

To the next it must be said that this sacrament is ordered against personal sin, insofar as it is proper and personal: but this consists in a voluntary blameworthy act, by the fact that it is base: and therefore it necessarily has a twofold contrary remedy, namely insofar as it is an act, and insofar as it is a wound: and in the first way virtue is contrary to it, in the second way the sacrament of medicine: and therefore penance which in whole is contrary to it, is a virtue and a sacrament by diverse consideration. But other sacraments are not against sin thus considered, but rather are against original [sin], which is not done, but contracted: or they are against the punishments of sin, as is proved above in the question on the division and sufficiency of the sacraments; and therefore because those do not regard a voluntary act about which is virtue and vice, therefore they in no way have the reason of a virtue.

To the next it must be said that the reality of the sacrament of penance is not properly the virtue of penance, as is clear through the contrary objection, which is good, and renders the cause, why it is not its reality: because the reality of the sacrament is twofold, namely proper, and common, or conjoined to it: proper indeed is the special grace curing that special disease against which the sacrament was instituted: and having one sacramental grace, another which is properly the virtue of another sacrament is not had because of this. But because no grace is given in part, but in whole, every virtue already accompanies that grace: and therefore it receives every virtue: and this is a consequent effect: and in this way proceed the objections proving the virtue of penance to be an effect of the sacrament of penance. But those things which are objected to the contrary, although according to the argument they are of little value, I concede. But I say, it is of little value: because it was said above in the questions on baptism, that sacraments are compared in two ways to inducing one effect, namely according as they are in the purpose to receive and according as they are received in reality: and thus nothing prohibits, that coming to receive the sacrament of penance, one has the effect...

Articulus 6 — Whether Penance Is Justice

Whether penance is justice?

Whether penance is justice?

Then it is asked about this which is said, there, A, § 2: Penance is called from punishing, etc. And three things are asked, of which the first is, Whether penance is justice: as the Master seems to intimate in the Littera. Secondly, Whether it is charity? Thirdly, If it is a special virtue, in what power of the soul is it?

But to the first it is objected thus: § 1. Upon that of Psalm 4:6: Sacrifice a sacrifice of justice, the Gloss says: What is more just, than that each one should be angry at his own evils rather than at others', and punishing himself through penance and satisfaction should offer himself to God? Therefore penance is a species of justice, or justice itself.

§ 2. Also, Isidore: Then anyone establishes judgment of himself, when through worthy penance he condemns his own depraved deeds: but judgment is the execution of justice: therefore it seems that penance is the same as justice.

§ 3. Also, below in the Littera it is said, that penance is a virtue, or grace, by which we bewail and hate committed evils with the purpose of emendation. But the purpose of emendation belongs to directive justice, as the Philosopher seems to intend. Therefore penance is justice, or a species of it.

§ 4. Also, through reason the same is seen: For Aristotle in book V of the Ethics distinguishes two species of justice: one of which he calls distributive, but the other directive: but directive is that which satisfies the injured party as much as it exceeded by injuring, or by inflicting an injury: but this penance does especially: therefore penance is a species of justice, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, by the Canons a priest is called a judge in the cause of penance, so that he may enjoin satisfaction according to the measure of the offense: therefore it seems that penance regards what is ordained by a judge and judged: but this proceeds from justice, as Tully says: therefore penance seems to be a certain justice.

§ 6. Also, this is seen from the Gloss on Epistle I to the Corinthians 11:31, upon that: If we would judge ourselves, we would not at all be judged. For Augustine says in this Gloss, that a man should ascend the tribunal of his own mind: but let conscience be the witness, and the fear of God the executioner: but it is established that he speaks of penitential judgment: therefore it seems that penance is a certain justice, whose execution is such a judgment.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Special justice (as the Philosopher says) properly taken is not of a man to himself, but rather a metaphorically spoken justice: but penance is of a man to himself: therefore penance is not justice.

§ 2. Also, the Philosopher says that in justice there is a certain middle equality between loss and gain: but according to the equality of the loss the penitent does not restore the loss, but much less: therefore penance is not justice, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, Gregory: To repent is to cut out the root of sins, and not to indulge further entry to their suggestions: but the roots of sins do not attend to any proper debt: but all properly taken justice is about some debt: therefore penance is not properly taken justice.

SOLUTION. It must be said that this question is light, and of little value. For penance can be considered in habit or in act. If in habit, it is a distinct habit moving free choice essentially into the detestation of sin under the hope of pardon: and it is not justice, nor properly a species of justice, of which justice is predicated like a genus of a species: as common justice of distributive justice, and of directive justice. But if it is considered in the act which is to detest: then its act can be commanded by justice according to what Augustine says, that penance is a certain sorrowing vengeance, punishing in oneself what one sorrows to have committed. And according to what Anselm says, that the penitent restores to God the due honor: and such words the Saints frequently say: yet justice does not properly elicit this act, but only commands it: and then it assumes the reason of a debt. But according as it is considered in habit, it is a secondary habit taken alongside a principal one which is cardinal justice: just as also other secondary virtues are taken alongside the cardinal ones, which neither are cardinal, nor species of cardinals, like magnanimity, liberality, magnificence, meekness, and the like, of which it is determined in book IV of the Ethics. And through this the response to the objections is clear.

It must be said therefore to the first, that that Gloss speaks in that sense by which the imperative of penance is justice: yet there is another habit eliciting that act. And in this way proceed the objections brought to that part: whence the solution to all is clear.

But to those things which are objected to the contrary, it must be said that justice properly is not of a man to himself, unless as the Philosopher says, it is of a man to himself insofar as there are diverse things in one man, like the superior and inferior powers, and in a certain way it is just for the inferior to serve, and the superior to command: and this justice is not called mathematical by the Philosopher. Nor is it properly the justice of a man to his own, as they are his own: as of a father to a son of the family, or of a servant to a master, or of a husband to a wife: because a servant and a son of the family and a wife do not have their own except in the name of the master and father and husband: and that properly is not rendered to them unless they are equal in something, and unless one is in the power of the other, like a wife and husband in matrimony, and the like. Broadly, however, there is justice between these persons, which justice the Philosopher calls directive justice. But justice properly is between those who by their own right are peers and equals, so that the own of one is not the own of the other: and in this way penance, according as its act is commanded by justice, is a certain parity of right between God and man: so that God indeed is injured in His own, and man is superabounding and injuring: but penance is an equality, restoring to God as much as He was injured and man injured.

To the next it must be said that there is equality of reality, and equality accepted by him who was injured, which is the equality of estimation [reputation]. And we cannot restore an equal of reality: but an equal which is of estimation, namely because God does not exact more from us than He gives us from the gift of grace: just as if I owed you a hundred, and gave you ninety-nine, and I restored to you one, I would have justly restored.

To that which is asked concerning Gregory, it must be said that it is understood of the roots of a committed sin: and this can be done by the command of justice, although it is not always necessary for it to be done thus, as was said.

Articulus 7 — Whether Penance Is Charity Or Another Virtue

Whether penance is charity or another virtue?

Secondly it is asked, Whether it is charity, or another virtue, or some species of it? § 1. For to this some object, although it has little appearance: as Augustine says upon that of Psalm 89:17: Burnt with fire and dug up, Gloss: Every sin arises from badly persuading love, and also fear: for from love it happens, that...[506] Therefore in the opposite similarly...

§ 1. ...he fears for himself.

§ 2. ...it will be that every hatred proceeds from the love of the good: therefore this hatred on account of an enacted sin proceeds from the love of the good, and especially of the highest good: and this is charity: therefore the first thing in penance is charity. Moreover, from the motive principle the act itself must be drawn to its species: because that informs the act, which first moves the power: therefore penance will be an act of charity, as it seems: therefore habitual penance is charity.

§ 3. 3. Also, love of the good universally is in the concupiscible power: but from that proceeds the hatred of evil: therefore also the hatred of evil is in the concupiscible power: and the first perfection of the concupiscible power is charity: therefore the first love of the good and the hatred of evil belong to charity: and these belong to penance: therefore penance is charity.

§ 4. But to the contrary it seems that 1. It is patience through that which is held below from the words of Chrysostom: Perfect penance compels the sinner to sustain all things willingly: but to sustain belongs to patience: therefore penance is patience.

495. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, VI, 5 (1140b 20).

§ 5. 2. Further it seems, that it is temperance. For Hilary says in Book II On the Trinity: That is the perfect affection of compunction, which repels all the affections of carnal desires from itself.

§ 6. 3. Further it seems, that it is prudence. Luke 6:21, upon that verse: Blessed are ye that weep now, etc., the Gloss: Behold the prudence by which it is considered how miserable are these earthly things, and how blessed the heavenly. Now to mourn belongs to penance: therefore penance also is prudence.

§ 7. SOLUTION. To this and all such things it must be said that penance is not charity: but it is one thing for it to be an act of some virtue naturally, or per se elicitively, as the Masters say, because it actively elicits such an act by the mode of a certain nature: just as a hot thing elicits from itself heating. And it is another thing for some act to be of some virtue by some command: and this act has something of the nature of the commanding virtue. And it is another thing for an act to be of some virtue as promoting and expediting by some aid toward the act: because, as Saint Gregory says, the virtues invite each other to feasts and mutual aids. [507] Now all the objections introduced here do not prove that the act of penance belongs to this or that virtue, except by way of assistance.

§ 8. BUT NEVERTHELESS it must be known that the first two arguments are worth nothing at all. For what is first objected there, that all fear is from love: this is plainly true: but that love is a habitual self-complacency, which is said to be the root of vice, not some vice determined in species or genus. Similarly, when it is said that hatred of evil proceeds from the love of the good, that love is not charity or another virtue, but a habitual complacency even of the natural good, according to how the proposition is generally taken. If, however, it is taken particularly, because sometimes the hatred of sin is from the charity of God, when sin is hated insofar as it is contrary to the beloved God: then that act will be by the command of charity. And the form of arguing is invalid: because it proceeds from all particulars.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that this is false: the love of the good universally is in the concupiscible power: for whether the word universally determines the word good: so that the sense is, 'the love of the good taken universally, is in the concupiscible power': or whether it places a distribution around the word love, and determines the composition, the proposition is false: for the good is particular, which it loves from the concupiscible power, as all know who have already learned elsewhere that the concupiscible power is a sensible part of the soul. Similarly the good is something of each individual object which the power loves: just as the concupiscible power also loves its own good. Hence the proposition is false in every way.

§ 10. If however it is said that the good simply is loved by the concupiscible power, and by others its own good and in a qualified sense, the proposition is still false, if we agree that the concupiscible power is a sensible part of the soul: as all the authorities both of the Saints and of the Philosophers concordantly pronounce. If however we say that the proposition is understood concerning the human concupiscible power which some say is a part of the rational soul: then it is worth nothing to the point at hand: because, as was shown before, that love is not universally charity: and if sometimes it is charity, then the act of penance will be by the command only of charity, and not essentially. And the form of arguing from equals is invalid.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that to sustain is taken equivocally concerning patience and penance: for patience is in dangers, and in afflictions inflicted by violence from without: but in penance it is the sustaining of pain assumed voluntarily: hence the objection is invalid.

§ 12. TO THE OTHER it must be said that this objection does not prove anything, except that temperance by way of an addition promotes penance: and in the same way proceeds that which is finally introduced concerning prudence: and such adaptations of the Saints consider certain similitudes, and not properties: and they prove very little concerning the point at hand.

Articulus 8 — In Which Power Of The Soul Is Penance

In which power of the soul is penance?

§ 13. Thirdly it is inquired, In which power of the soul is penance?

§ 14. 1. Now it seems that it is in synderesis. For if some act always belongs to something, and to another not always, it more essentially belongs to that whose it always is, than to that whose it is not always: but it always belongs to synderesis to detest sin, whereas not always to any other power of the soul: therefore this act properly belongs to synderesis: therefore also the habit from which it is elicited; but that habit is penance, as has been said: therefore penance is in synderesis.

§ 15. 2. Also, it seems that it is of reason: because upon that verse of Psalm 42:5: Why are you sad, O my soul? etc. The Gloss there says: Because there reason consoles sensuality saying: I will still confess to him, that is, I will do penance: but to whichever power it belongs to do penance, in that is penance as in a subject: but it belongs to reason to do penance, as has already been proved: therefore penance is in reason as in a subject.

§ 16. 3. Now it seems that it is of the concupiscible power: because the love of the good and the hatred of the opposite evil are concerning the same thing: but the love of the good belongs to the concupiscible power, and the hatred of the opposite evil, and the hatred of sin is penance: therefore penance is in the concupiscible power.

§ 17. 4. But it seems again that it is in the irascible power. For upon that verse of Matthew 13:33: The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven, which a woman took, etc., the Gloss says, that in the rational we possess prudence, in the concupiscible the desire of virtues, and in the irascible the hatred of vices: but to hate vices is to repent: therefore penance is in the irascible power.

§ 18. 5. Also, it seems that it is in free choice. For it belongs to the same power to sin and to do penance: but it belongs to free choice to sin: therefore also to do penance: therefore penance is in free choice.

497. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, V, 3-4 (1131a 31, 1132a 1).

§ 19. 6. Also, it seems that it is in all the powers simultaneously. For a virtue is in that power in which its matter is: but the matter of penance concerning which it acts, is sin: and diverse sins are in individual powers: therefore penance is in all simultaneously.

§ 20. But again this seems impossible: because it is not possible for one and numerically the same form to be in diverse subjects: but penance is one numerical form: therefore it is only in one subject: but all powers simultaneously are diverse subjects: therefore penance is not in all simultaneously.

§ 21. SOLUTION. It must be said that although some say that the powers of the soul are the subjects of both virtues and vices, nevertheless this is not true: and what they say is not said by subtle reasoning. For it is impossible that something be a subject not having some property of matter: hence the soul is the subject of all those things which are in the soul according to that which it is, and not according to that by which it is: but it is true that since the soul is perfected by the habits and forms which are in it, in a certain way it is perfected as to this power, and in a certain way as to another: and in this way perhaps they mean to say that a virtue is in this or that power. Therefore I say, without prejudice to those who say otherwise, that that habit which is penance is in the irascible together with reason participating in something of reason, according as it is ordered to reason; and this seems to be from the saying of Augustine, that penance is a vengeance punishing in itself what it grieves to have committed. Also from this, that penance is said to be indignation against oneself for a perpetrated sin. And again the name itself implies this, which sounds like 'holding to punishment', by which a man punishes himself.

§ 22. To the first therefore which is objected, it must be said that synderesis does not murmur against sin in that way in which the irascible power does: because synderesis murmurs against sin universally, not perpetrated insofar as it is in the subject: but the irascible power murmurs just as the penitent murmurs: because this is said improperly: but it detests perpetrated sin according as the perpetration is the cause that it is in the subject and in particular: and thus the solution to the first is manifest.

§ 23. To the other it must be said that reason is spoken of here as the orderer of the other powers: and therefore what belongs to the other powers is attributed to it, since it is their orderer.

§ 24. To the other it must be said that in the concupiscible power is the love of the good generally, just as was also said in the preceding question. If however it is conceded: then let it be said that the hatred of vice is twofold. One which is the dissent to vice in general and follows the love of virtue in general: and this love does not belong to the concupiscible power properly, but appropriately, since it belongs commonly to all. But there is also another special hatred with indignation and insurrection against it, insofar as it is in the subject: and this belongs to penance and the irascible power, and this is not opposed to the love of virtue or of the good in general, but in the species by which the irascible power loves its proper object.

§ 25. To that however which follows, although we concede the conclusion, nevertheless it must be known that that Gloss speaks not of the proper features of the powers, but rather of appropriated ones: and concerning such things, what we were able to understand we have written in our conclusions On the Soul in the tractate on the motive powers.

§ 26. To the other which follows it must be said that not every sin is in free choice as in a subject: nor in the soul according to free choice: but every sin is in free choice as in the cause causing and completing the sin: for reason begins through the determination that it should so be done, but the will completes it. Then note that some concede this, and use this reason: because the inferior powers are moved movers: hence if the virtues were in them, they would be virtues moved by reason: and since they are gratuitous, it would be necessary that the movement of nature on the part of reason, or of free choice, precede the movement of grace, and this is incongruous: therefore they say that no virtue is in the inferior powers. And if this is true what they say: then it seems that whatever is said at the end of the first book of the Ethics, and by Damascene, and by Gregory of Nyssa, and by Avicenna, is all false: and this I consider absurd: and therefore I say that the movement by which reason orders and rules the inferior powers, is equivocal to the movement of the gratuitous virtue informing the work: and therefore if that preceded this, it would not on this account be prior unless it were of the same nature.

§ 27. Furthermore, it is not incongruous that reason informed by grace precedes the concupiscible or irascible power informed by grace: because the movement of grace will always be first.

§ 28. To the last it must be said that penance is not in just any power, although the matter concerning which it acts is in all or can be: and this is the reason why it is not in all according to what concerns penance itself, but only in the irascible power: for it belongs to the irascible power to detest a perpetrated sin under the hope of pardon, and insofar as the sin is to it unworthy and contemptible: and in this way sin is made the proper matter of the irascible power: and in this way penance is concerning it.

Articulus 9 — Whether Penance Is Prior To The Other Virtues

Whether penance is prior to the other virtues?

§ 29. Next it is inquired concerning that which is said, there, A, § 2: The virtue of penance is conceived by fear, etc.

§ 30. And three things are inquired here: first concerning its order to the other virtues, both on the part of the intellect and on the part of the affection. And secondly, how is it true what he says, that it is conceived by fear? Thirdly, why is it not said that it is conceived by love?

§ 31. To the first however it is objected: 1. Through this which is held in Matthew 3:2, in the Gloss: Do penance, etc., where the Gloss says: The first virtue is to destroy the old man through penance: therefore no virtue precedes penance.

499. Galatians 5:22-23; cf. Ambrose, De paradiso, c. 3.

§ 32. 2. Also, penance is the cause of justification: but in justification all virtues are infused: therefore by consequence it is the cause of every virtue: therefore it is itself first among all virtues: because the cause is prior to the caused. Now the first premise is proved by Hilary in Book I On the Trinity, where he speaks thus: Just as we believe all sins are remitted in baptism, or by martyrdom we believe no sin is imputed: so by the fruitful compunction of penance we confess that sin is wiped away: for the tears of penitents are reputed before God for baptism.

§ 33. Also, Bernard says that vices must be extirpated before virtues are implanted: but penance extirpates vices: therefore it is itself before the implantation of virtues: therefore no virtue precedes it.

§ 34. Also, Augustine: No one unless he repents of his old life, can begin a new one: but the rejection of the old life is before the beginning of the new: therefore penance is before the beginning of the new life: moreover the beginning of the new life is through the virtues: therefore penance is before the other virtues.

§ 35. 3. Also, Hebrews 6:1, it is said: Not laying again the foundation of penance from dead works: but the foundation is first: therefore penance is first.

§ 36. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. Life is the first act of the soul in the body, or the first act of substance: but life in morals proportionally corresponds to life in nature: therefore also in morals the first act is life: but this is the act of faith: therefore faith is the first virtue. Proof that it is the act of faith, Romans 1:17, and Hebrews 10:38: The just man lives by faith.

§ 37. 2. Also, the first thing purifying the heart is the first purgative virtue: but faith is the first thing purifying the heart: therefore it is the first virtue. Proof of the minor premise, Acts 15:9: Purifying their hearts by faith.

§ 38. 3. Also, Saint Gregory and Bede say that fear is born from faith: therefore faith is prior to fear: but what is prior to the prior, is prior to the posterior: but fear is prior to penance, because penance is conceived by fear, as is said in the text: therefore faith is prior to penance: therefore penance is not the first virtue.

§ 39. 4. Also, in every work or movement the directing is prior to the executing: for it is prior to open one's eyes, than to walk: therefore it is prior to see what is to be grieved over, than to grieve: but this faith shows: therefore faith is before penance.

§ 40. SOLUTION. It must be said that the habits of the virtues are all infused simultaneously in time: nevertheless the nature of one has an order to another according to the order of their acts: because acts are prior to habits. Hence, without prejudice to certain moderns who say otherwise, I say with the ancients that by that priority faith is first, but penance is proximate to justification, and the fear of the Lord is a middle virtue, and hope similarly. Now this can be expressly seen from the very movement of the penitent, concerning which Gregory says that between hope and fear we are stabilized by faith: for he that cometh to God, must first believe that he is, and is a rewarder of the good, and a retributor of the wicked. Now from this habitual and actual concept had beforehand, there follows the fear of punishments, and the hope of goods, and of pardon, or of goods through pardon: and from this follows sorrow for sins with the hope of pardon from the consideration of punishment. And this the ancients concordantly write and say: although certain moderns by some deliberation attempt to say otherwise.

§ 41. It must be said therefore to the first, that the first virtue there is called the proximate one, not that which is first according to the order of nature. Or it is better said that penance is called first, not simply the first of the virtues, but on the part of the justifiable subject: because on his part it is prior to cast away vices, than to be imbued with virtues: and since vices are cast away through penance, it itself will be first on the part of the matter of its subject. And this is first in generation, and not formally: and it is not first in nature except in that mode by which matter is called nature: and this is by posteriority, as the Philosopher maintains.

§ 42. To the other it must be said that from the fact that it is the cause of justification, it is not proved to be prior except in the stated mode. For the cause of justification is twofold, namely the one removing the contrary, and there is the formal cause: but the formal cause of justification is not penance insofar as it is such, but rather justice: but it is the one removing the contrary on the part of the matter. By this also the solution to the sayings of the three Doctors is clear, namely of Hilary, Bernard, and Augustine.

§ 43. To the other it must be said that it is called the foundation of goods on the part of the preparation of the subject or the place where it is to be built, and not as the first underlying thing which is an essential part of the building: because in this way faith is the foundation.

§ 44. And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 10 — How Penance Is Conceived By Fear

How is penance conceived by fear?

§ 45. Secondly it is inquired, how is penance conceived by fear?

§ 46. But it seems that it is not conceived: because all virtues are given simultaneously by infusion: therefore none is conceived by another, as it seems.

§ 47. Furthermore, how is it conceived rather than generated?

§ 48. Further it is inquired, if it is conceived by fear, by what fear is it conceived?

§ 49. It seems, however, that by servile fear: because that is prior, and flees punishment: therefore it induces sorrow concerning the merit or guilt of punishment: and this is the act of penance: therefore it is conceived by servile fear.

§ 50. To the contrary: The conceived thing is within the conceiving thing: therefore penance is within the conceiving fear, but penance is with grace: therefore the fear by which penance is conceived is gratuitous: but servile fear is not gratuitous: therefore it is not conceived by servile fear, as it seems, but by initial fear.

§ 51. SOLUTION. It must be said that 'conceived' means taken within, imperfect: and therefore since there are two things between which the penitent is moved, as Gregory says, namely hope and fear: and there are two things in penance, namely sorrow, and informing grace, which is followed by joy concerning the sorrow, as will be held below. On the part of hope, grace and joy hold themselves more, which are perfective of penance insofar as it is meritorious: but on the part of fear, sorrow holds itself more, which is material in penance, and in itself imperfect. And this is manifest from the fact that contrition has a common sorrow with attrition: although nevertheless attrition is an unformed sorrow concerning sins: and because conceived means taken within imperfectly, and on the part of sorrow holds itself to fear, it is rather said that it is conceived by fear, than by hope or another virtue.

§ 52. To the first therefore it must be said that although all are infused simultaneously in time, nevertheless they have a certain order according to the nature of the acts of the virtues themselves, and also on the part of the subject to whom they are infused, as was determined in the preceding question.

§ 53. To the other it must be said that to be generated means the building up of the perfect: and according to this penance is reduced also to fear as to an effect, as it encloses penance within itself.

§ 54. To the other it must be said that either fear can be signified when it is said, The virtue of penance is conceived by fear. Now by 'conceiving' can be signified the efficient agent outside, and closing penance within itself, not simply, but imperfectly: and this is in the sorrow of attrition.

§ 55. And thus what is objected to the contrary does not follow: because penance thus accepted is like an unformed fetus, therefore it is without grace: and therefore servile fear generates it and encloses it within itself. If however by 'conceiving' is understood generating within and enclosing penance having the form of grace, just as formed fetuses are enclosed: then the conceiving thing will be initial fear: and the first argument is invalid, because the showing of punishment is not the cause of penance insofar as it is such, but of sorrow only.

Articulus 11 — Why Penance Is Not Conceived By Love, Or By Another Virtue

Why is penance not conceived by love, or another virtue?

§ 56. Thirdly it is inquired, why is it not conceived by love or another virtue?

§ 57. For it seems to be conceived by faith, because 1. Faith is in the intellect, as was held before: therefore it seems to be the conceiving thing.

§ 58. 2. Also, love is the mother of virtues: and it belongs to a mother to conceive: therefore it seems that it is conceived by love.

§ 59. 3. Also, as was held above, love is also the root and cause of fear: therefore love is the first conceiving thing of both fear and penance.

502. Gratian, Decretum, pars III, De consecratione, dist. 2, c. 41. (Cf. Jerome).

§ 60. 4. Also, the penance turning to God, which is truly penance, is love, and the first is love, as was held: therefore it is the first cause of penance: therefore the conceiving thing.

§ 61. SOLUTION. It must be said that all those questions are light. It must be said nevertheless, that faith is first in the intellect, and love according to the order to the good is the first of virtues in the affection, and fear is the first of virtues in the affection according to the withdrawal from evil. And so according to diverse considerations nothing prohibits diverse things from being first: but nevertheless the thing conceiving imperfect penance, and enclosing it in itself, this is the efficient cause of penance immediately conjoined to it, and this is nothing but fear, as was shown before. Now through the first distinction the solution of the objections is clear: because all proceed upon that distinction.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Definition Of Penance Is Well Assigned By Ambrose

Whether the definition of penance is well assigned by Ambrose?

§ 62. Next it is inquired concerning that which is said, there, A, § 3: For penance is, as Ambrose says, to lament past evils, etc.[508]

§ 63. For it is objected against this definition: because

1. As the Philosopher says in the VI book of the Topics, they err who put an act in the definition of a habit, as its genus:[509] but to lament past evils is an act: therefore it does not fall into the definition of penance which is a habit.

§ 64. 2. Also, to lament means a lamentation: but not every penitent can have lamentation: therefore it is not essential to penance to lament past evils.

§ 65. 3. If perhaps you say that to lament means a lamentation of the heart, not of the eyes, or of the sense in the flesh. It seems that it is still not essential to penance to lament: for to lament, whether it be interior or exterior, means an act elicited from a power informed by grace. For this to be elicited, time is required, before which the penitent himself is in grace which is infused in an instant. Let us suppose therefore that he has grace, and does not elicit the act of lamenting, and dies thus: it is certain that he will be saved since he has grace: therefore he had penance availing for salvation without lamentation in act: therefore it is not essential to penance to lament: therefore it ought not to be so defined: Penance is to lament past evils.

§ 66. 4. If you say that to lament is necessary for the penitent on account of the sorrow which is supposed in the name of penance: for one who sorrows cannot not lament. This still seems to be false: because either the infusion of grace precedes that sorrow, or not. If not: then it is the sorrow of attrition, and not of penance: therefore lamenting which essentially defines penance does not follow it: and thus what Ambrose says would be nothing. If grace precedes it: then in the instant in which grace is infused, all virtues are infused simultaneously with it: therefore also penance: and this infusion is followed by sorrow which cannot be except in time: and between the instant of the infusion of the virtues, and the time of sorrow, there is time: therefore there is some time in which penance is a virtue, and there is no sorrow, or lamentation: therefore it is not essential to penance to sorrow and to lament, as it seems.

§ 67. 5. If perhaps you say that the sorrow of attrition is the sorrow of contrition according to the opinion of those who say that natural things become gratuitous. This still seems to be false: because, Matthew 3:8, upon that verse: Bring forth fruit worthy of penance, etc.[510] The Gloss: Discretion is in penance which sets the fear of God and the dread of punishments before the eyes, recollecting ancient turpitude. Thus the sorrow of the heart breaks out into weeping: because there are no wounds without pain, unless the vitals of the members have become mortified. It is grace that feels, and feeling seeks health. Thus the Gloss.[511] Therefore grace gives feeling, as is said in the last part of the Gloss: therefore grace precedes sorrow, as a cause its effect: and so the proposition is held.

§ 68. Also it is objected concerning this that he says, Past evils.

§ 69. 1. For past evils cannot not be past: but it is foolish to lament what cannot not be: therefore every penitent is foolish.

§ 70. 2. Also, through penance the sinner is made conformable to the divine will: therefore he wills what God wills: but God wills the past to have been done: therefore also the sinner wills the past to have been done: but no wise man laments what he wills to have been: therefore the penitent who is wise, does not lament past evils, as it seems.

§ 71. 3. If perhaps you say that although with respect to necessary past things there is no absolute will, nevertheless there is a velleity which is the same as a conditioned will, namely that he would will past evils not to be, if this were possible: therefore according to this the penitent simply wills past evils to have been done, and under a condition would will them not to be: therefore simply he does not lament past evils: although nevertheless Ambrose implies above, that he laments past evils.

§ 73. For either he laments evils which are, or evils which are not. If evils which are, since they are not evils unless when they are present, it seems that they are present: but opposites are not present simultaneously: therefore when evils are present, virtues are not present, nor grace: therefore when he laments evils, he does not have grace nor virtues: therefore such a lamentation is not the lamentation of the virtue of penance, and informed by grace, which is false. If however he laments evils which are not. To the contrary: No one sorrows concerning that which is not, according as it is not: therefore he does not lament it: therefore he does not lament evils which are not.

§ 74. Further it is objected concerning this that he says, And not to commit again things to be lamented.

504. Jerome (cf. Gratian, Decretum, II, C. 24, q. 3).

§ 75. 1. For through that particle it expressly seems that he who suffers a relapse, has never repented: and this immediately below in this same distinction is condemned as heresy.

§ 76. 2. Furthermore, it seems that this apposition is not essential to penance. First indeed through the definition of Ambrose, which will be posited below: True penance is the sorrow of the heart and the bitterness of the soul for the evils which each one has committed.[512] For in this the whole being of penance is explicated: and yet nothing is touched upon concerning future sins.

§ 77. 3. The same seems by reason: For penance is with respect to past things, as is accepted from the beginning of the III book of the Ethics:[513] therefore it is not to be defined with respect to future things.

§ 78. 4. Also, Boethius says there is a topic from commonly occurring accidents: he repented: therefore he sinned.[514] But there is not from commonly occurring accidents: he repented: therefore he will beware of future sin: therefore it seems that penance respects the past, and not the future: therefore penance is not to be defined by the future.

§ 79. 5. Also, penance differs from caution: for penance is not caution, nor conversely. Since therefore caution is with respect to the future, penance will not be of the same, as it seems.

§ 80. 6. Also, to repent is not penance: therefore the definition of penance is not the definition of what it is to repent: but immediately in the Text it is said, that to repent is to bewail prior committed evils, and not to commit things to be bewailed: which is wholly the same as the prior definition: therefore it seems that the Master errs in the Text.

§ 81. 7. Also, it seems that the parts of this definition are badly ordered: because Augustine in the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas defines it thus: True penance is not to admit things to be repented of, and to bewail things admitted.[515] Therefore what was with respect to the future, ought to be the prior part in the order of the definition: and that which is with respect to the past, ought to be the posterior.

§ 82. Further it is inquired here, Whether this definition belongs to the sacrament of penance, or to the virtue of penance?

§ 83. Now it seems that not to the sacrament: because it is essential to a sacrament to be a sign and a cause: but nothing here is posi-

...is defined as being a cause and a sign insofar as it is of this kind: therefore, it is not given concerning penance as it is a sacrament.

§ 2. Also, the sacrament of penance, as is said below, has parts: contrition, confession, and satisfaction: and nothing is posited that responds to confession and satisfaction; therefore this definition is not given concerning the sacrament of penance.

On the contrary: To all those to whom penance is enjoined by a priest, it is specially commanded that they lament past things and not commit future things: therefore it seems that what he says is understood concerning the sacrament of penance.

505. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, IV, dist. 14, cap. 1.

SOLUTION. It must be said that this definition is given through its effect, and it is not, strictly speaking, a definition, but a kind of assignment (description): for an act is the effect of a habit, on the grounds that a habit moves the free choice of nature to such an act. And it touches on two things which belong to penance according as it is an exercised act. One is what is essential, and this is to lament past evils; and the other is what coexists with it, so that what is essential may be efficacious: and this is not to commit the things to be lamented: and therefore some ancients said that this is the foundation for the first, because without it the first avails nothing.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said that the saying of the Philosopher is understood concerning definitions given through the essence of the thing defined; but this one is given through its proper effect.

And if it is objected that a cause is prior to its effect, and therefore a cause should not be defined through its effect. It must be said that priority is twofold, namely, with respect to us and absolutely: absolutely, indeed, a cause is prior to its effect; but with respect to us, an effect can be prior to a cause. And thus the definition is given, which is a kind of description from what is prior with respect to us.

To the other it must be said that to lament is briefly said to be sorrowing in act or in habit; and it is the essential act of penance, and therefore it is posited in its definition. And what is brought forward by the objection made must well be conceded, insofar as sorrow is always supposed in the penitent, to whom it is always essentially conjoined to sorrow.

TO WHAT is objected to the contrary, it must be said that by nature sorrowing is prior to the infusion of grace, although in time sorrowing from the information of grace and the infusion of grace are simultaneous. But I say 'by nature' according as nature is called matter: and this is evident from what the Doctors say, namely that four things are required for the justification of the ungodly, namely the movement of free choice toward sin, the movement of free choice toward God, the remission of guilt, and the infusion of grace. Now the movement of free choice toward sin is detestation with sorrow. And thus it is evident that since penance is here defined from what is prior with respect to us, that sorrow by nature precedes grace, according as nature is matter, so that it first notes priority on the part of the subject and matter.

To that, however, which is objected against this, it must be said that something false is supposed in the objection: because although between an instant and an instant there is time according to Aristotle, nevertheless between an instant and time there is not time: just as between a point and a point there is a line, yet between a point and a line there is not [a line]; and so I say that between the instant of the infusion of grace and the time in which the penitent meritoriously sorrows, there is no medium.

To that which is objected concerning the Gloss on Matthew, it can be answered in two ways. In one way, indeed, that the Gloss speaks of freely given grace, which is unformed faith, which places punishments before the eyes and other such things: and then the objection has no force. Otherwise it can be said that it speaks of sanctifying grace: and then it must be said that the infusion of grace precedes sorrow, not in time, but by nature: but taking 'nature' differently than before, namely for form: whence the infusion of grace precedes sorrow absolutely, but sorrow precedes the infusion of grace with respect to us, and on the part of matter.

493. Augustine, De libero arbitrio, II, c. 19.

To what is further objected concerning what he says, "Past evils, etc.", it must be said that lamenting is not concerning sins according as they are in being perpetrated, but rather according as the perpetration of sin in some way precedes (alias, causes) sins with respect to existing in the subject: just as it is commonly said that sin passes in act and remains in guilt: and this was also noted in the preceding sections.

To the other it must be said that it is not always necessary to conform our will to the divine will in the thing willed: but, as we noted toward the end of the first book of the Sentences, it is sometimes sufficient to conform our will to the divine will with respect to the efficient cause: namely, that we will this which God wills us to will: and in this way the penitent conforms.

To the other it must be said that the penitent absolutely wills not to have committed the sin: for although with respect to the future it is contingent, and necessary from the past (but I say necessary by accident), nevertheless that necessary thing was caused by our will, and therefore it is not necessary except in a qualified sense (secundum quid): and concerning such things there can be an absolute will that they be, or not be.

To what is further asked concerning what is said, "Evils, etc.", it must be said that he laments evils which absolutely are not, but they are in a qualified sense, namely in memory, and according to their effect, which is the guilt of punishment: and through this it is evident that he who laments in this way is neither foolish nor has contrariety to grace.

To what is further asked, it must be said that what he says, "not to commit the things to be lamented," refers to his purpose, that is, that he has a purpose of not sinning for the rest of his life: and therefore this coexists with penance: because just as in other sacraments the sacrament always requires something that removes feigning, which the Holy Spirit flees from: and this must therefore be added in a definition which is from those things that are prior with respect to us, as was said before.

And through this the solution to the following is evident; because it is not essential, and yet with respect to obtaining the effect of penance, lest the penitent be feigned, it is necessary that it coexist with penance in the penitent: and therefore it is added by the Saints in the notification of penance.

To the other it must be said that this definition is not given through essence, but rather through effect, as has been said: for below he says that repenting is the same thing, where he notes its essence.

506. Glossa Ordinaria on Psalm 89:17 (Augustine).

To the other it must be said that Augustine regards the order of parts on the part of the penitent: because in him it is prior to remove the obstacle, and then for penance to be posited: but Ambrose orders the parts according as they are more essential to penance.

To the other it must be said that this definition belongs to penance insofar as it is a virtue, and insofar as it is a sacrament: for it is a virtue moving free choice to a work which is to weep for sin, and the same is a sacrament according as it draws causality from a sign and from the power of the keys: from a sign, I say, some external one, concerning which there will be discussion below.

But if it is objected that the being of diverse things is diverse, and a definition notes essence, and virtue and sacrament are diverse according to being, it must be said that many false things are supposed in this objection. The first is that nothing prohibits the same thing being diversified concerning the being of diverse things, just as to repent in the ratio of an act, and in the ratio of an act to be manifested in signs. The second is that this definition does not state the being, as has been established. The third is that penance as a virtue and penance as a sacrament are not diverse in subject, but only in ratio, and the being which follows that ratio: because it is a virtue as it is moving free choice to a work: but the sacrament of penance is as it is conjoined to certain signs signifying and causing interior grace, which is ordered against actual sin. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Next it is inquired concerning that part in which the Master crushes errors which are about penance: which is divided into two parts, according to two errors which were against penance. The first is of those who said that one truly repenting cannot fall: and this is crushed in the remainder of this distinction. The second is of those who say that someone remaining in one sin can do penance for another: and this is crushed in the following Distinction XV, which begins there, And just as their error is convicted in the aforesaid authorities, etc.

The first part is subdivided into three parts: in the first of which the Master posits certain authorities from which the first error seems to be confirmed and proved. In the second, however, he responds to those adduced authorities, there, But that which Ambrose says, They are reprehended, etc. In the third he confirms his solution through authorities, there, But that penance is not done only once, etc.

The subdivision of these parts is evident on its own in the Letter.

Articulus 13 — Whether One Truly Penitent Can Fall, And Thereafter Sin In A Damnable Way

Whether one truly repenting can fall, and for the rest sin damnably?

The question arises first concerning the error itself: because although the Master sufficiently brings forward authorities by which it seems to be proved, nevertheless reasons can also be brought forward, and thus:

§ 1. The foundation of penance is to not will to sin for the rest of one's life unto death: but if there is no foundation, there is no building built upon it: therefore if someone does not continue penance unto death, it was not penance: if he continues, he does not fall: therefore it seems that he who truly repents cannot fall for the rest of his life.

§ 2. Also, penance is not said to have unto punishment (ad poenam habere), but rather to hold unto punishment (ad poenam tenere): but "to hold" implies perseverance in punishment: if therefore he does not persevere, penance does not hold the punishment: and if it does not hold the punishment, he does not repent: therefore from the first, if he does not persevere, he does not repent: and this is what he says in the Letter.

§ 3. Also, an infinite penance is owed to an infinite sin: therefore if it be finite, it was not a just penance for that sin: but where he falls, there the penance is finished: therefore he did not have penance for that sin which was mortal: therefore if he falls, he did not truly repent. From this it seems by the opposite, that someone never repents unless he remains and does not fall. And this is the error which is spoken of in the Letter.

§ 4. Also, to the Hebrews it is said that it is impossible for those who were once illuminated, have tasted also the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Spirit, have moreover tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, and are fallen away, to be renewed again to penance. Therefore repeated penance cannot happen: therefore neither a second: therefore it is necessary for the first penance to be continued, or it will not be penance.

But to the contrary the Master adduces many things in the Letter. And to the contrary also is that:

§ 1. Penance, as was established before, does not regard the future as essential to itself: therefore it is without it, and thus even if he will have sinned in the future, he truly repented in the past.

§ 2. Also, it is one thing not to sin, and another to purpose not to sin: and it was proved above that penance with respect to the future has nothing but a purpose: and this is present. Therefore, since one purposing not to sin can sin in the future, his purpose being saved in the present, it is established that even one truly repenting, the truth of his penance being saved in the present, can sin.

SOLUTION. It must be said that what is said in the Letter, without any ambiguity, is a very bad heresy, and in no way to be held: and the Master constructs the Catholic faith by destroying that heresy.

To the first, therefore, which was objected, it must be said that the foundation of penance is not to not sin for the rest of one's life, but to not have the purpose of sinning, as the last objection made to the contrary proves: and therefore it proceeds from false premises.

To the other it must be said that it is not necessary for there to be that holding of punishment, except only in purpose.

To the other it must be said that penance in truth necessarily is infinite, but in duration it cannot be infinite, because at most it is finished at death: but it must be infinite on the part of the will, namely that for no thing would one will to sin or to have sinned: and therefore the objection proceeds badly, which seems to suppose that it must be infinite in its rationale (ratione).

To the other it must be said that it is one thing to be renewed again to penance, and another to repent again. For to be renewed to penance is to be baptized for the remission of sins unto penance: and this is impossible: but to repent again, while the first baptismal character remains, is possible.

But if someone objects that baptism is a sacrament ordered against original sin, and it is not repeated because it is perfect: and injury is done to the sacrament if it is repeated: therefore penance also ought not to be repeated, which is ordered against actual sin, and cures it perfectly. It must be said that there is no similarity, for three reasons. The first is that baptism immediately draws its power from the passion of Christ, because the satisfaction of the first sin is completed to God the Father in the passion of Christ alone: and therefore just as that is not repeated, so neither is baptism: but penance supposes something in our will, which is mutable and repeatable. The second is that baptism imprints a character that always remains: and therefore if a second baptism were received, there would be two characters of the same species, or one would have no effect: both of which are inconvenient: but penance does not imprint any character. The third is that although Rabanus below seems to say that original sin returns, nevertheless it must be known that it does not return, neither the same in species, nor the same in number: and to the authority of Rabanus a response will be given below in its proper place: but the disease against which penance is ordered is repeated, and therefore it is necessary to repeat the medicine.

Articulus 14 — Whether Someone Can Be Washed Through Penance Up To Purity

Whether anyone can be washed through penance unto cleanness?

Whether anyone can be washed through penance unto cleanness?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, A, § 4: Be washed, and be clean, etc.

For it seems that no one can be washed through penance unto cleanness from mortal guilt, thus:

§ 1. For an infinite injury there ought to be an infinite vengeance: but an injury to God, as Augustine says, is infinite: therefore the vengeance ought also to be infinite: but man cannot inflict an infinite vengeance upon himself: therefore by repenting he cannot avenge mortal sins: and guilt is not remitted unless the sin has been justly avenged: therefore it seems that the penitent is never cleansed from guilt.

§ 2. If perhaps you say that God's mercy exalts itself above judgment, and God's mercy holds back justice. On the contrary: He cannot deny Himself: therefore He cannot do anything against His justice: therefore He demands an infinite punishment.

§ 3. Also, a sin greater than an irremediable sin is irremediable just like it: but the sin of the Angel is irremediable, and the sin of man is greater than it: therefore the sin of man is irremediable, just like the Angel's: therefore he is never washed nor clean through penance. That the sin of man is greater than the sin of the Angel seems thus: The Angel willed to be equal to God, and man similarly: but man is by nature inferior to the Angel: therefore having less of divine equality: therefore more proud in desiring it: therefore man's sin proceeded from greater pride than the Angel's: therefore it is greater, and thus the proposition is held.

SOLUTION. It must be said that a sinner is washed and is clean through penance, if he has the will of not sinning for the rest of his life.

To this, however, which is objected concerning an infinite injury, it must be said that an injury to God on the part of the object is infinite, because it is against an infinite good: but on the part of the root by which it is rooted in the sinner, it is not infinite: because it neither proceeded from an infinite lust, nor from an infinite contempt, nor was the act of sin infinite in itself. But when a sin is weighed, it is principally considered on the part of the root which is founded in the sinner. Hence the Apostle says: I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly. And Augustine says that the sin of the Jews killing Christ was remediable, being done through ignorance, although it was against an infinite good which is the life of Christ. Hence it can well receive a finite medicine from that part, although from the other part it is infinite: and there it has an infinite remission, which is the mercy of God.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that He does not deny Himself on account of this: because justice is the rendering for merits according to the form and forum of judgment established for the utility of the people: and the forum here is one, and in the future another: and therefore here justice demands little on account of the obedient will of the penitent: but in the future it demands eternal things on account of the obstinate will.

To the other it must be said that the sin of man is less, if it is considered on the part of the sinner, than the Angel's. But if it is considered on the part of the object, then it is equal to it. For the sin of the Angel proceeded from fatness [i.e., arrogance] with respect to the sin of man: because the will of the Angel was elevated into pride from the beauty and nobility of natural endowments which he had within himself: but man had nothing such within himself whence he would become so proud, but rather, deceived from without, he listened: and therefore the pride of man is not of a greater swelling, but takes the judgment of an inferior and weaker state. Whence it is evident that that objection was not valid.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Prior Laments Profit Those Who Repeat Sins

Whether prior lamentations profit those who repeat sins?

Next it is inquired concerning what is said, there, A, § 4: Lamentations profit nothing, if sins are repeated, etc.

508. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, IV, d. 14, c. 1.

For this seems to be false. § 1. For lamentations profit unto the remission of past things: and this is to profit much: therefore they profit somewhat.

§ 2. Also it is asked, By what reason are past lamentations said not to profit? Because salvation is impeded from future sins: by the same reason baptism is said not to profit, if someone sins after baptism: but this is false: therefore that is too.

SOLUTION. It must be said that it is understood concerning those who repeat sins with a habitual will, even if they lament with an actual will: and those do not have the foundation of penance: and therefore their penance is nothing. Or it may be said, as the Master says below, that they profit nothing, not absolutely, but unto obtaining salvation.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that it is not similar concerning baptism: because although a feigned man approaches baptism, nevertheless he receives a character, and thus baptism profits somewhat: but penance does not profit one receiving it feignedly. According to another response which the Master holds below in the Letter, it must be said that it is not similar concerning baptism: because baptism is the foundation of the sacraments, and still when a man sins, it profits unto having a foundation: but it is not so concerning penance: and therefore it is said not to profit, because nothing of it is left through the subsequent sin.

Articulus 16 — Whether He Who Laments What He Has Committed, Yet Does Not Abandon Them, Subjects Himself To A Heavier Punishment

Whether he who laments committed things yet not forsaking them, subjects himself to a heavier punishment?

Next it is inquired concerning what Gregory says, there, A, § 4: He who laments committed things, yet does not forsake them, subjects himself to a heavier punishment.

For this seems to be false: because § 1. Through the punishment of the first lamentation he blotted out something of the punishment owed for the sin: therefore he subjects himself through the lamentation to a lesser punishment: and thus what he says is false.

§ 2. Also, sorrow for sin is not a circumstance aggravating a sin: therefore it does not make a sin worthy of a heavier punishment.

§ 3. Also, the opposites of sorrow and lamentation aggravate a sin, namely impenitence and the affection of sinning: therefore sorrow and lamentation diminish sins: and thus again what is said in the letter seems false. Proof of the first. In Job it is said: He has run against him, namely God, with his neck stretched out, and is armed with a fat neck.

SOLUTION. It must be said that he is speaking of hypocrites who lament as regards the outer man and in order to be seen: therefore they sin more heavily, as Augustine says, because simulated equity is not equity, but double iniquity. But it seems better to say that he is speaking of certain ones to whom sin is displeasing absolutely when reason comes, and yet, conquered by the sweetness of sin on the part of sensuality, they still have their will in sin: whence in them the punishment is aggravated by accident, on the grounds that they do not avoid the sin, and yet they advert to it: and because afterwards they do not withdraw, they are not excused by subreption or ignorance, but rather adverting to the sin: and since they do not forsake it, they contemn more heavily: and concerning such ones Gregory speaks, as the word seems to sound.

To the objections to the contrary, it must be said that they proceed concerning him who is withdrawn from sins both by will and by act: and concerning such a one Gregory does not speak.

To the other it must be said that although sorrow is not an aggravating circumstance, nevertheless it supposes an aggravating circumstance in the sinner, insofar as the sorrow is not a true cessation, on the grounds that it is an evil [associated] with an actual thought of the punishment which is owed to the sin.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that the opposite of sorrow aggravates: and from this it well follows that sorrow in itself does not aggravate, but diminishes: but insofar as the movement of the motive power of the soul is not caused except from some contempt apprehended in the soul on the part of the apprehensive power, sorrow supposes an actual contempt of the sin and of the punishment which is owed to the same: and from this it aggravates the sin: because to not abandon a sin on account of the punishment is of greater contempt than if the punishment were not adverted to.

Articulus 17 — Whether To Will Not To Sin Or To Cease From Sin Is True Penance

Whether to will not to sin or to cease from sin is true penance?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says at the beginning of the second part in his solution, there, A, § 4: But Ambrose says: This is true penance, to cease from sin.

For this seems to be false: because § 1. To cease from sin is a pure privation: and to do penance is to do something: therefore to cease from sin is not true penance.

§ 2. If perhaps you say that to cease from sin posits an interior act of the soul, although it deprives the exterior act, as the Doctors say concerning negative precepts. Whence the sense is, to cease from sin, that is, to will not to sin. It still seems false what they say: because, as was established above, penance has its whole essence with respect to past sin: but the will of not sinning is with respect to future sin: therefore the will of not sinning is not true penance: therefore neither is ceasing from sin, as it seems.

SOLUTION. It must be said that if force is applied to the word of Ambrose, it is a very good and subtle word: because he does not cease from sin, who sins: whence he who omits, does not cease from sin. Also, he who transgresses, does not cease from sin. Now there is an affirmative precept that we should repent, as we have in Mark and Matthew: and although this does not oblige continuously (ad semper), nevertheless it obliges then, when a man has sinned and remembers the sin: therefore if then he does not repent, he does not cease from sin: because he does not do what he ought.

Also, there is a negative precept, not to sin, not to will to sin, neither in the past nor in the future: and from this every man is obliged always to will not to have sinned, and to will not to sin: and if he does the contrary, then he does not cease from sin.

It is therefore evident that to cease from sin imports to repent, and to will not to have sinned, and to will not to sin: and these are the things which are required in penance.

And through this the solution to both objections is evident.

Articulus 18 — Whether Sins Are Blotted Out Through Penance Insofar As It Is A Virtue, Or A Sacrament; And, Whether It Has Two Acts, Namely, To Lament And To Hate

Whether sins are blotted out through penance according as it is a virtue, or a sacrament? and, Whether it has two acts, namely to lament, and to hate?

Whether sins are blotted out through penance according as it is a virtue, or a sacrament? and, Whether it has two acts, namely to lament, and to hate?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, A, § 4: Penance is a virtue, or grace, etc.

And because all things which pertained to that definition have been said, except two sought above in the other definition: therefore it is inquired here, Whether sins are blotted out through penance according as it is a virtue, or according as it is grace, or according as it is a sacrament? because the Master says here that it is a virtue, or grace: and it is supposed that it is a sacrament.

But it seems that it is according as it is grace: because § 1. Grace is contrary to guilt: if therefore guilt is blotted out by something, the blotting agent must be grace: but guilt is blotted out by penance: therefore penance blots it out according as it is grace.

§ 2. Also, if it were essential to a virtue to blot out guilt: then every virtue would blot out sin: but I see that this is false: because there is had a political virtue which is truly a virtue, and does not blot out sin: therefore it is not of virtue, but of grace as virtue.

§ 3. Also, with grace existing in act, and virtue in gift [as a habit] only, as in infants, the blotting out of sin is done according as it is guilt: therefore it seems that it is essential to grace to blot out guilt: therefore if penance remits guilt, this is done insofar as it is grace, and not insofar as it is a virtue, or a sacrament.

If perhaps you say that virtue is said equivocally of infused and political virtue: and therefore although political virtue does not blot out, nevertheless infused virtue blots out sins. This seems to be false: because a virtue is defined through its proper act: but its proper act is not equivocal in infused and acquired virtue.

§ 4. Also, when infused virtue and acquired virtue are so called, a diversity is not touched upon except of the efficient cause: but the efficient cause is no part of the essence of a thing:

511. Glossa Ordinaria in Matt. 3:8.

therefore infused and acquired virtue will not take a ratio of equivocation on the part of the efficient cause: therefore if it is not essential to an acquired virtue to blot out sin, neither will it be natural to a gratuitous [infused] one.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Sin is left behind from the act and the impotence of the agent: therefore that which removes it ought to be in penance according as it is ordered to a work: but this is a virtue, and not grace as such: therefore it seems that the blotting agent is a virtue, and not grace.

§ 2. Also, sin is voluntary, as Augustine says: and if it were not voluntary, it would not be sin: therefore it is in the will: therefore it regards a power of the soul: but grace regards the essence of the soul more than a power: and virtue regards a power more than the essence: therefore sin is removed more by penance as it is a virtue, than as it is grace.

BUT IT SEEMS that sin is removed by penance as it is a sacrament: because, as was established above,

§ 1. Sacramental grace is principally ordered against the defect of sin: but penance is a sacrament instituted against the disease of actual sin: therefore it is the cause of that [remedy]: therefore it removes sin insofar as it is a sacrament.

§ 2. Also, every sacrament of the New Law is a sign and a cause of grace: therefore this one too: therefore insofar as it is a sacrament it causes grace remitting the disease of actual sin.

Further it is inquired concerning what is said,

[it is said], "We lament, and we hate": For of one thing there is one proper and essential act: but penance is only one thing: therefore it has one act: therefore the other is superfluous.

§ 1. Again it is asked, in what do lamenting and hating or having hatred for a sin differ?

§ 2. It seems that both are with respect to the past: because it is prefaced in the text, Which committed evils we lament and hate therefore it seems that one of them is superfluous: because it suffices to lament past committed evils.

§ 3. Also, Gregory says that hatred is inveterate anger: and this does not seem to fit the newly penitent, because he is not yet angry about his sins.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice to the first, that penance deletes guilt insofar as it is grace. But whether there is any difference, and what it is, between grace and virtue, we noted in the second book of this volume: and therefore it is not necessary to repeat it here. But nonetheless, there are three things in a sin, namely the guilt which stains by the privation of gratuitous good and the vitiation of natural good, and the act which infects the power by leaving a vice in it, and the wound that it inflicts. And as for the first, it is properly removed by grace; as for the second, by virtue; and as for the third, by the sacrament: and yet principally the deletion of sin and guilt is an act of grace: because virtue, insofar as it is virtue, does not have this of itself, but rather according as it is informed by grace, and similarly according to how a sacrament does not have this except insofar as it is causative of grace.

512. Pseudo-Ambrose (Augustine), De vera et falsa poenitentia, c. 8, n. 22.

Let it therefore be said to the first and the second, that although grace essentially has contrariety to guilt as such, nevertheless it does not reach the powers from which sin is also expelled, except insofar as it is united to the virtues: and therefore sin is sufficiently remitted by grace, and the virtues, and the sacrament.

To the other it must be said that, as is well objected to the contrary, infused virtue and virtue acquired by our own effort differ essentially and formally: and therefore what belongs to one need not belong to the other.

But to that which is objected against this, it must be said that although the efficient cause is diverse, nevertheless more than the efficient is imported in these words, infused virtue, and virtue acquired through a human medium: for when it is called infused, that is understood which is rooted in grace: and when it is called acquired, that is understood which is left behind from custom, as if coessential with it: just as the Philosopher says, that as the operations are, such also are the habits: and therefore it is necessary that those virtues differ essentially.

To what is objected, that virtue purges sin, it must be said that virtue informed by grace does this, and not another, as was said.

And through this the solution is clear to all that was objected concerning the first part of the definition.

To that which is further asked, namely about lamenting and hating, it must be said that there are two things essential to sin, and two which coexist with it: and therefore four things are touched upon in this definition. The first essential is to detest the committed sin as such, as was said before, and this is denoted by lament. But there remained the root of that sin and the guilt, and with respect to it there is the hatred of the committed crime, and this hatred presupposes anger through zeal. But the first thing that coexists is the purpose of amendment through confession and satisfaction. The second is the purpose of not committing it further. Thus therefore there are four things in penance. One with respect to the committed act, a second with respect to the root: and a third coexists with respect to the past, and a fourth coexists with respect to the future: which two are necessary, lest the penitent himself be a hypocrite.

And through this the solution to the last two is clear.

Articulus 19 — Whether Almsgiving Removes Guilt, And Makes The Sinner Clean

Whether almsgiving takes away guilt, and makes the sinner clean?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what is said, there, A, § 4, around the middle: He is not to be bought off in a certain way for this end, so that it may always be permitted to commit these things with impunity.

513. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, III.

§ 2. For this seems to be false. 1. Through what is said, Luke 11:41: But yet that which remains, give alms; and behold, all things are clean unto you. Therefore it seems that through almsgiving general cleanness is possessed.

1. Also, 1 Timothy 4:8: Piety is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. If therefore piety avails for all things, it seems that it avails for the abolition of sin.
2. If perhaps you say that this is understood of the piety which is informed by grace making one pleasing (gratia gratum faciente). Against this: Ambrose on the same place in the Gloss: "Piety which works good things for the brethren avails for meriting divine things: for the whole sum of Christian discipline is in piety and mercy, which if anyone follows, if he suffers the slipperiness of the flesh, he will doubtless be beaten, yet he will not perish." But the just does not suffer the slipperiness of the flesh: therefore it seems that one existing in mortal sin buys impunity for himself by almsgiving.
3. Also, this seems to be shown by that which is held, Daniel 4:24, where Daniel said to the impious king: O king, let my counsel be acceptable to thee, and redeem thou thy sins with alms, and thy iniquities with works of mercy to the poor.
4. The same seems true by reason: For there are two parts of justice, namely to decline from evil, and to do good: and to decline from evil, as is commonly said, avoids punishment: therefore much more so does doing good: but even he who, being outside of charity, out of mercy supports the poor for God's sake, does good: therefore he avoids punishment: but he cannot avoid punishment unless almsgiving takes away guilt: therefore it seems that such almsgiving avails for the remission of guilt.
5. Also, Ambrose says that there precedes something in sinners by which they are worthy of justification: but what can precede, as the chief thing in them, is mercy and piety toward the poor: because in these, as the same Ambrose says, there exists the summit of Christian life: therefore it seems that this makes one worthy that guilt be remitted.
6. Also, Augustine in the Enchiridion: "To whom the suffrages for the dead are profitable, they are profitable either for this, that there be full remission, or certainly that the damnation itself be more tolerable": therefore much more does an alms given by oneself avail for a more tolerable damnation: but it cannot, unless the mortal sin is released by God: therefore it seems that it avails for the remission of certain sins.
7. Also, it is supposed by all that no good goes unrewarded. Let us posit, then, that someone existing outside of charity does many things of the genus of goods, and alms, and is not rewarded here: therefore he will be rewarded in the future: but he cannot be rewarded as regards the remission of punishment, while guilt remains to be punished, because this would be against God's justice: therefore it seems that guilt is remitted to him: therefore he buys impunity for himself.

514. Boethius, De differentiis topicis, II.

If perhaps you say that God rewards such people here: there is nothing contrary: because He can not-reward, even if He does reward: and if a false but not impossible thing is posited, what follows ought to be false and not impossible: but it follows that He might not reward some good: and this is impossible for a just God.

1. Also, it seems that God could not reward sufficiently here: because someone is not rewarded if he receives what is less valuable for what is more valuable: but a work of piety, even unformed, is worth more than any earthly gain: therefore it is not sufficiently rewarded by any earthly good: whatever is given here is an earthly good: therefore it cannot be sufficiently rewarded here. That an unformed work of piety is worth more than all earthly goods is clear: because even the civil life is posited as the best in life, or at least better than all pleasure, and riches, and honors: therefore it seems that Augustine speaks badly in the text.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Augustine says that one existing in mortal sin is not worthy of the bread he eats: therefore it seems that nothing he does can buy anything for himself from God with respect to worthiness: therefore not impunity either.

1. Also, equally displeasing to God are the impious man and his impiety, as is said in Wisdom 14:9: but the work of a displeasing one cannot be pleasing to God: therefore the impious man can do nothing, it seems, unless he first becomes pious and just: but this cannot be done without grace making him pleasing: therefore without grace he cannot do any work by which he may merit anything with God: therefore neither can he buy impunity.

Solution. It must be said that good works done outside of charity avail for many things about which there will be a question below in the following distinction: but here there is no doubt except concerning almsgiving. And therefore it must be said that almsgiving avails for the approximation of grace here, and in the future for a more tolerable punishment, as is said here: but in both ways by accident. One way is: because by the fact that he becomes accustomed to alms, he is withdrawn from sins, and thus commits fewer sins than if he were wholly bent upon sins, and continued in sin: and because the guilt that would be committed if the almsgiving were not present is subtracted, the punishment that would follow the guilt is also subtracted. Another way is: because he who is accustomed to piety begins to find good pleasing, and consequently the lust for evil and contempt of God are remitted in him, and thus he does not sin out of as much lust as otherwise, nor out of as much contempt: and therefore his sin is less as regards the root of sinning, than that of another who has no works of piety: and therefore a lesser punishment also follows, and consequently a more tolerable damnation.

I say therefore to the first, that that passage of Luke 11:41: Give alms, etc., is understood accommodatively, that is, above all other goods of fortune that you have conceded to your use, not that by this one's whole life is made clean: but the sense is that from goods of fortune illicitly retained, the uncleanness of sin is not generated for them.

515. Gennadius of Massilia (Pseudo-Augustine), De ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, c. 54.

To the other it must be said that piety avails for all things: but not unformed piety, but rather formed piety, of which the Apostle speaks there.

But to the other which is objected through the Gloss of Ambrose there, it must be said that the slipperiness of the flesh does not signify there a mortal slip, but a venial one which continually arises from concupiscence: and such a one will not perish: because although a venial sin is a disposition to a mortal one, nevertheless such a person is contained in the good by works of piety lest he perish.

To the other it must be said that Daniel's intention was that the king should first correct his life through penance, and then alms would avail him for the remission of sin on the part of the owed punishment, which the vision he had seen threatened him with.

To the other it must be said that to decline from evil is said in two ways, namely not to do evil insofar as it denotes nothing but the negation of an evil work: and thus it is true that it only avoids punishment, and is not a part of justice properly speaking. In a second way, to decline from evil is said to mean to will not to do evil, and thus it posits an interior act, and merits the palm, and is a part of justice: but doing an unformed good is not a part of justice, but a disposition to it, as was said above. But when it is said that not to do evil avoids punishment, this is not understood of that punishment which one has merited by a preceding sin, but rather of that which one would incur if one did the evil which one did not do: and in this way doing an unformed good avoids punishment: but then it does not follow that on account of it some sin is remitted to which punishment is owed, or the punishment which is owed to a perpetrated sin.

To the other it must be said that Ambrose is speaking of the merit and worthiness of congruity, not of condignity: for it is less incongruous to give grace to those exercised in alms than to others who do not attend to alms.

To the other it must be said that, as many of the Doctors say, Augustine calls damnation there the burning of the fire of purgatory, and not of hell: but all who are there have charity and works informed by grace. Whence nothing concerning the proposition is proved then by Augustine's word. If, however, it is said that it is understood of those who are in hell, then it must be said that suffrages are only profitable by accident, as was said, and in this way works done outside of charity are profitable.

To the other it must be said that no good goes unrewarded: but it is not necessary that it be rewarded with a reward not corresponding to it, and incomparably more valuable. Whence we say that such things which are not worth an eternal reward, are not rewarded in eternity: but even the chief reward is here: because through them they are made closer to grace: and this is a spiritual reward, and better than their works.

But that which is said in objecting to the contrary, that whatever is given here is earthly, is false: because many spiritual things are given here even to those who are in mortal sin sometimes, and especially to those who are exercised in almsgiving. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 20 — Whether All Good Things Done Before Are Vivified Through Subsequent Penance

Whether all previously done good works are vivified by subsequent penance?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what is said, there, A, § 4, after the middle: For that penance is mortified, and other previously done good works, etc.

§ 2. For the sake of this, five things seem to need to be inquired into here, so that this text may be more perfectly understood: of which the first is, Whether all previously done good works are vivified by subsequent penance? Secondly, If not all, whether all mortified ones? Thirdly, Whether they are vivified with respect to all that is in them, or with respect to some things? Fourthly, Through what are they vivified? Fifthly, What is called life there?

§ 3. But it seems against the first, that all previously done good works are vivified by subsequent penance, whether they were dead, that is, done in mortal sin, or whether they were mortified, that is, done in charity, and mortified by a subsequent sin.

And it is objected thus: 1. Adamantius [Origen] says on Joshua: "There are in the Church certain believers and those acquiescing to divine precepts, who are religious and dutiful towards the servants of God, and sufficiently prompt for the adornment of the Church or the ministry of the Church: but in their own conversation they are enveloped in obscene vices, nor do they altogether lay aside the old man with his acts, they apply nothing of the amendment of morals or of innovation. To these, therefore, Christ Jesus grants salvation: but they will not escape a certain mark of insanity." From these things it is gathered that good works done in mortal sin, either in themselves or through a subsequent vivification, avail for eternal life.

1. Also, Adamantius, in the same place: "Jesus, seeing the narrow purpose in faith, preserves a most just moderation, so that they may obtain salvation who have little faith: and yet they do not receive the summit of the kingdom or of liberty: because their faith is ennobled by no addition of works." From these things the same is gathered as before.
2. Also, Leviticus 25:25, on that: If thy brother being impoverished sell his little possession, etc., the Gloss says that the little possession is the inheritance of eternal life, which is sold by mortal sin: and the Gloss and the text say that if he wishes to redeem it, the fruits shall be computed from the day on which he sold it: but the fruits from the day on which he sold it were after a mortal sin: therefore they are computed for life as dead through the subsequent penance: therefore they are vivified by the subsequent penance.
3. Also, it is objected by reason thus: If any two things are ordered to a third thing, that one of the two which is more closely ordered to it will more essentially participate in that third thing: but the good of nature and of morals which is said to be of the genus of goods, is ordered to the good of grace which gives life: therefore that which is closer will more essentially participate in the life of grace: but the good of morals is closer: therefore it will participate in life more than the good of nature: but the good of nature is vivified: therefore the good work which is good in its genus [is vivified].

But that it is more closely ordered to grace is proved thus. Ambrose says that there precedes something in sinners by which they are worthy of justification: and this is nothing but the good which is said to be of the genus of goods, or the good of unformed virtue: therefore that good makes a man worthy to obtain life, and not the good of nature: therefore it is closer to life: and this is what we intend to prove.

1. Also, let us suppose now the opinion of those who say that natural things become gratuitous, and I proceed then thus: That which is better and more perfect among unformed goods, is more apt by nature to become gratuitous: but the act of a moral virtue, as the Philosopher proves in the first book of the Ethics, is more perfect and better than the habit: therefore it is more apt by nature to become gratuitous than the habit: and the habit is vivified, because natural things become gratuitous: therefore much more the act.

If you say that this cannot be, because the habit remains and its act passes away: this is nothing: because absolutely speaking in mortified works the act passes away, and yet they are said to be vivified by subsequent penance.

1. Also, in natures it belongs to much greater power to vivify something mortified like something killed, than something which never had life but could have had it. An example is that it is more to vivify a slain person, than an embryo which could live and never lived: but he who can do what is more, can do what is less, as Boethius says: therefore if grace can vivify a mortified work, it can also vivify what never lived, but could have lived: but it can do the former, as is said in the text: therefore also the latter: but a work which never lived, yet could have lived if grace had been present, is a dead work: therefore dead works can be vivified by subsequent grace.

But against this is what 1. Is said in the text.

1. Also, a sinner does not have a work ordered to life except through the motion of grace: but he himself is not in grace: therefore nothing of the potency of life passes from him into the work: but what has no potency of life is not vivifiable: therefore such a work cannot be vivified.
2. Also, in natures from a non-living thing is generated a non-living thing, and one not having the potency for life, as is clear in minerals: therefore in morals it will be similar: but a sinner is non-living: therefore the work which is generated by him neither lives, nor has the potency for life: therefore it cannot be vivified by a subsequent potency [penance].

501. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, IV, 9 (1128b).

Solution. It must be said that in truth, as all confess, dead works cannot be vivified, because, as the last objection proved, no potency for life passes into the generated from a generator which does not live, unless it is generated in it by accident, as a worm from putrefied matter.

To that therefore which is objected from Adamantius, it must be said that Adamantius calls "salvation" the sign of salvation in the Church among the faithful, and in the anointing of certain sacraments: and such salvation those possessing unformed faith obtain, who are signified by the Gibeonites. And that this is so is proved through Isidore on Joshua 9:1ff, who says thus in the Gloss there: "The Gibeonites signify those who believe, and seem to have devotion towards the servants of God, or the worship of the Church: yet they have nothing of amendment in morals: such ones indeed only proffer the sign of salvation within the Church: but among the spiritual ones, that is, among the Saints of God, they do not obtain the eternal kingdom or liberty." These are the words of Isidore as if glossing the obscure words of Adamantius.

Through this the solution to the following is also clear.

Or we can say that there is salvation in reality, and salvation in hope: the first is of the blessed, but the second of wayfarers. And this latter is again twofold, namely informing faith and hope: and this is of the Saints: or unformed, and this is of those who live by obscene acts in the Church, yet believing rightly and doing works of the genus of goods. And Adamantius speaks only of this last.

To the other it must be said that after sin and before penance there is no fruit of life in a man, but the law: and similarly the Gloss is understood of those things which are after compunction, and before the exterior satisfaction enjoined by the priest: for the priest ought to attend to all those things, and compute them into the redemption of the eternal inheritance.

Or it can be said otherwise, that it is understood of good works done in mortal sin: but a thing is computed into the principal in two ways, namely as it is a part of the principal, and thus it is understood in the Gloss: because nothing is a part of the principal except a meritorious work: or as impeding the excrescences of usury, and thus meritorious works are computed into part of the principal, because by them a man is detained lest he rush from sin to sin, since the usury of the preceding is as it were the subsequent sin: and by those goods grace is also brought nearer, as was said in the previous question.

To the other it must be said that that opinion which says that natural things become gratuitous is not understood according to becoming, that essentially these become those, because this is impossible and quasi-heresy: but it says that these become those because they can coexist with them, and with them bring something of good to the subject, such as the facility of working well, and the like: and then virtue is said to become gratuitous, because it remains: but the act in no way remains, nor does it have the potency for life, as the last objection proved, and therefore it cannot be vivified.

507. Augustine of Hippo.

But to that which it says, that a mortified act also does not remain: it must be said that, as is held below in this question, that act at least remains in the mystical body, but a dead act in no way: and therefore it is not similar.

To the other it must be said that what is adduced from natures is not similar: because what is slain is corrupted not only in the act of life, but also in the potency for life: but it is not thus with what is mortified in morals: because it is only deprived of life, and is in potency for life: and that which does not have life in morals, and proceeds from one not having life, is not similar to an embryo which proceeds from a living being from which it receives the potency for life.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 21 — Whether All Things Mortified Can Be Vivified

Whether all mortified works can be vivified?

Whether all mortified works can be vivified?

§ 1. Secondly it is asked, whether all mortified works can be vivified?

§ 2. But it seems that they cannot: 1. For life, as the Philosopher says, is the act containing the spirits: therefore life will be conserved in the living thing when the principles of life are conserved: but if the per se cause of the conservation of life is the conservation of the principles of life in the living thing, when life is destroyed, it is necessary that the principles of life or one of the principles be destroyed: it is necessary therefore that in this mortified work the principles of life are destroyed: but when the principles of life are destroyed, the potency for life is destroyed, and when the potency is destroyed, that thing is not vivifiable: therefore since in a mortified work the potency for life is destroyed, it remains a dead work which is not vivifiable: therefore it is not vivified.

1. Also, whatever lives in potency, has being in that manner in which it lives in potency: but a mortified work in no way has being in the time following penance, and also in the time of mortal sin which is before penance: therefore it is in no way vivified. Proof of the middle premise. If that work is, it can only be in act, or in habit: but it is certain that it is not in act: nor even in habit, because the habit of virtue whose it was to elicit that work, was destroyed by mortal sin: therefore, et cetera.
2. Also, Ezekiel 18:24: If the just man turn himself away from his justice, and do iniquity according to all the abominations which the wicked man useth to work, shall he live? All his justices which he hath done, shall not be remembered: therefore they will not be remembered for justification.
3. Also, an act is an accident: therefore it only is when it inheres: but it does not inhere in the time of sin: therefore it is not: and what is not, is not vivified: therefore that act will not be justified [vivified], as it seems.

Against this are: 1. The authorities of the Saints, which are posited in the text.

1. Also, Jerome on the Epistle to the Galatians: "If they repent, they will return to life."
2. Also, Augustine: "Penance is a most excellent and perfect thing, which recalls all defects to the perfect": therefore also the merit made defective by subsequent sin: and it does not recall unless it vivifies: therefore it vivifies mortified works.
3. Also, sin cannot be stronger than merit: but if all things were destroyed by sin, sin would be stronger: therefore the meritorious work is not totally destroyed: therefore something remains in it of the potency for life.
4. Also, an eternal reward is owed to a meritorious work: therefore if it is not owed to it, it is dealt with unjustly: but if it is killed, it will not have its reward: therefore there still remains in it the potency for life: but what has potency for life can be vivified: therefore, etc.
5. Also, Apocalypse 3:11: Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. And this crown is also owed to the works of present justice: therefore if this is lost, another can take it: therefore meritorious works remain, even when this person loses: but by the same reason by which the remaining things can be given to another, they can also be restored to this person: therefore they can be vivified by subsequent penance.

Solution. It must be said that works mortified by subsequent penance are vivified. And so that this can be understood more fittingly, it must be known that a meritorious work does not receive life from the worker, but rather from grace itself: and it is said to live effectively, because it gives life to the meriting and working person. But grace is considered in two ways, namely insofar as it informs the subject and the act, and thus it is an accident, and cannot give life: and insofar as it is a certain likeness of divine goodness and acceptable to God along with all that in which it is, and thus it gives life, and it is principally in the acceptor, that is, in God, with respect nevertheless to the work and the worker. And because God's acceptance which is with respect to a work done in the charity of God always remains, therefore the work remains even after mortal sin, not absolutely, but according as divine acceptance is with respect to it. Nevertheless the influx of life from God's acceptance and the accepted work is impeded on account of the mortal sin which is in that person: thus namely, that through that work God's acceptance does not flow life into him: but it is reputed to another in a certain way, as was said elsewhere, where it was shown concerning this how that authority of the Apocalypse 3:11 is understood: Hold fast that which thou hast, etc.

The solution to the first is therefore clear: because the work is not destroyed according to how it is under divine acceptance: because that work is always accepted, and it is not a principle of life unless considered thus: but the influx of life is impeded through mortal sin: and therefore it is not true that the potency for life is destroyed in a mortified work: because it is not mortified in itself, but rather as regards this person lest it flow life into him, and when the obstacle is removed it flows as before. And that works remain there, is clear through that passage of Matthew 6:20: Lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven. For those treasures are the treasures of merits written down in divine knowledge and approbation. And through that passage of the Apostle, 2 Timothy 1:12: I know whom I have believed, and I am certain that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him, against that day, namely the just judge.

To the other it must be said that the work is in that manner by which it is the principle of life, as was already said: because in divine acceptance it is never destroyed: because it pleased God on account of the form of grace which was with respect to that work: and therefore that objection supposes something false.

To the other it must be said that the Prophet's intention is that the justices will not be remembered with respect to the just person: but nevertheless they remain absolutely under remembrance, as was said: and thus the response to the whole is clear.

To the other it must be said that this is true, that it does not remain as it is an accident, but as regards that rationale, as was already said.

Articulus 22 — Whether Works That Have Been Mortified Are Vivified With Respect To All The Things That Are In Them

Whether mortified works are vivified with respect to all things that are in them?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, whether mortified works are vivified with respect to all things that are in them?

§ 2. For it seems that they are: because 1. Augustine says that penance is a most excellent and perfect thing which recalls all defects to the perfect: therefore whatever is defective in goods through sin, is reduced to the fruit of life through penance: therefore all things are vivified.

1. Also, virtue is always more powerful than sin: but sin extinguishes all virtues when it follows them: therefore penance also vivifies all when it follows sin.
2. Also, Romans 6:1ff. [cf. Rom. 5:15], Not as the sin, so also is the good. And this is because the good is according to itself: and the evil is in respect, and useless, and sluggish: if therefore evil could kill the good, much more could the good vivify them.

On the contrary: 1. Virginity is indeed among the greatest goods: and it is not vivified, nor redeemed, nor restored: which is clear through Jerome [who says]...

In a certain letter to the virgin Eustochium, he says thus: I will speak boldly: although God can do all things, He cannot restore a virgin after ruin.

1. Likewise, Apocalypse III, 1: You have a name that you live, and you are dead. Be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain, which are ready to die. From this it is taken that someone dead had some living works, and the living are not vivified: therefore not all dead or mortified works need vivification.

Solution. It must be said that mortified works, in the manner in which they were dead, are all vivified through subsequent penance, as is suggested in the Text.

To the objection concerning virginity, first take the authority of Jerome in the Text, which says the complete opposite over Hosea 11, 2 and following, where he says thus:

See what is the difference between the agreement of God and of men: for a man takes a wife, makes a woman from a virgin, that is, not a virgin or corrupted: even being joined to harlots, he changes them into virgins. Master Hugh of Saint Victor solves Jerome's statement thus: These are the words of Israel has fallen, and shall not rise again. The virgin Israel is cast down upon her land, etc. Jerome placed some ambiguous words here saying thus: Although God can do all things, He cannot make the corrupted not corrupted: yet if this is understood of the corruption of the flesh, it is foolish to think thus: because a man could corrupt his flesh, but God could not heal it. But if it is understood of the corruption of the heart, it is similarly foolish to say this: because a man could sin, but God could not justify, and justify as much as this one could sin. But if it is said that God cannot do this because it is done: and what is done cannot be undone: because what is true cannot be false: and therefore He cannot, because He cannot be against the truth: because if He could be against the truth, He could be against Himself who is the truth: this statement has more weight than if it were said of any other thing that is done, and now cannot be undone. Hugh's. The weight, however, why it is said more of this than of any other past thing, is because the mind having voluntarily descended upon the actual and present delight of the flesh, causes the corruption of virginity: and this past induces an ignoble state in mind and body, which no other sin does. It is clear, therefore, that according to how virginity was meritorious, it is restored: because penance restores the integrity of purity from sin, but not the integrity of state according to dignity.

To the other it must be said that the Apocalypse speaks of the Church in which some were living, and some were dead, but about to die by the example of others: and therefore it warns to be watchful: and therefore the objection is of no value.

Articulus 23 — By What The Mortified Works Are Vivified

By what are dead works vivified?

Fourthly, it is asked, By what are they vivified?

And it seems that 1. By general justice.

1. It belongs to him who makes the impure pure to justify: this is of general justice: therefore also that.
2. This also seems through what is said in Ezekiel 18:24 and 22: But if the wicked... does judgment and justice, he shall live and not die... In his justice, which he has worked, he shall live.

1. It seems that this is of faith: because, in Romans 1:17, and in Hebrews 10:38, it is said: But the just shall live by faith.

2. However, it seems that it is the effect of charity: for Augustine says that charity is the life of the soul.

3. Likewise, it seems that it is grace: because life is divided into natural life, gratuitous life, and the life of glory: therefore life will be from grace: but to whom it belongs to justify, to him belongs life: therefore grace vivifies dead works.

Against this is what is said in the text, that this is penance: and this is taken from the words of Bernard in the Canticles, thus saying: You know that you have spoken, if you feel your conscience bitten by fourfold compunction, twin shame, and twin fear: for the triple species of confession attests to life to perfect the sevenfold. Therefore, the parts of confession and compunction attest to life and restored sense: therefore they make the dead alive.

Solution. It must be said that life is properly and primarily the act of grace, as is also noted in the second book of the Sentences: and it does not primarily belong to virtue, but rather secondarily: and therefore it is attributed in different ways to different virtues. However, penance is as the remover of the cause of death on the part of the matter or subject: because it is the cause of justification prior in reason, not in time, as was said above. And in this way, the Master speaks when he attributes to it the justification of dead works.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that justice is said to be the cause of life rather in living works, as it is said that works show the living: because it is first on the part of the term to which there is movement in the justification of the impious. Hence, justice is not properly said to be the cause of life, but rather consequent to life, and showing it through the rectitude of act: and thus the just is said to live by justice, but after living simply.

To the objection that proved that justice is the cause of life, it must be said that justice is not said to justify as an efficient cause, but rather as the form to which he who is justified is moved. But it is well conceded that it belongs to the same to justify, to whom it belongs to vivify by way of an efficient cause.

To the other, it must be said that the saying of Ezekiel is understood of the life of glory which is given to the one doing well in works of justice: but we speak here of the first act of life, which is restored from non-being to spiritual being according to grace, according to what the Philosopher says, that to live in living things is to be.

To the objection, it must be said that life is attributed to faith as first showing life, and in some way making it, not indeed by itself, but rather as it is informed by grace. And an example of this is in light: which manifests other things, and also vivifies, insofar as there is in it a certain celestial power, which is diffused in it over lower things. So also faith, insofar as it is a certain knowledge, manifests those things in which there is life, and insofar as it is a certain grace, causes and diffuses the same life.

To the other, it must be said that the charity of God is that which continues life: yet it is not necessary that it be its first cause: because to live perfectly, after faith and hope, nothing is required except charity, which unites by effect to the first source of life, namely God.

To the other, it must be said that in the beginning of the first solution it was said how to live is of penance.

And thus the whole is solved.

Articulus 24 — How And According To What Mode Life Is Given When It Is Said That Mortified Works Become Living

How and in what manner is life said, when it is said that dead works become alive?

Fifthly, it is asked, In what manner is life said, when it is said that dead works become alive?

For it seems that they ought not to be said.

For in no case is it so, that the works of someone are denominated and disposed as the doer himself: therefore, works of the living are not said to be alive, as it seems, nor even forms of life disposed or informed.

Likewise, if a white thing is whitened, the whitening itself is not properly said to be white, although the whitening is the proper operation of the white: therefore, also the works of the living are not properly said to be alive.

Solution. It must be said that living is said in many ways, but it is reduced to two, namely according to being, and according to well-being.

According to being, it is said properly and metaphorically. Properly, however, in two ways, namely as the per se effective cause of life in the living is said to be life and to live, like the soul, and like the form adhering to the living, that is, participating in life from that which is the cause of life. Thus we say the body lives and is formally alive. And this living is distinguished in the second book of the Soul and by its sign in that text, where the Philosopher says:

"However, with living itself said in many ways, and if one of these is present alone, we say it is living, as intellect and sense, motion and position according to place, or motion according to nourishment and diminution and growth." Then he reduces it to four modes, namely understanding, sensing, moving, and using nourishment. These are signs of the life of the soul, just as an effect is a sign of its cause: I say, the proper and essential effect, which is converted with the cause. However, life said metaphorically is according to the likeness of this, and this is said, namely according to the likeness of that which is the cause of life: and this is what gives being to the living, and permanence, and species: and thus life is taken from the Philosopher, where in the eighth book of the Physics he says, that it is a certain life for existing things, or according to the likeness of the living, which we then say is living, when it attains its perfect operation according to its species, which it has from the celestial power, influencing above the whole species: just as we say living water which is in the force of purifying and cooling, and a living adamant when it strongly attracts iron, and the like.

But life according to well-being is distinguished according to well-being in sense, and according to well-being according to reason. And according to well-being in sense, life is said to be of pleasure, as Aristotle says of Sardanapalus, that choosing a voluptuous life, he chose the life of beasts. But according to well-being of reason, it is said to live according to the good of reason, which is lawful and gratuitous. And gratuitous is twofold, namely of grace, and of glory.

Therefore, it must be said to the proposed, that works are said to be vivified by life said metaphorically: because, namely, it is restored to man, that they do in him what the best works do: and this is worthy of doing by eternal life. Because just as a stone is said to be alive, because it performs its proper operation excellently, and dead which cannot do so: thus a work is said to be alive, when it can perfect what the best work does, and this is the work of grace, which can avail for eternal life.

And through this also the solution to the objections is clear.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Third Definition Of Penance Is Well Assigned

Whether the third definition of penance is well assigned?

Whether the third definition of penance is well assigned?

Penance is a certain saying of the grieving, etc.

This is the third definition of penance. And it seems bad: because,
1. As Tullius says, Vindication is a species of natural justice: it is above, that penance is not properly natural justice: therefore it seems badly said to be vindication, etc.

1. Likewise, Tullius says, that vindication or revenge is that by which force and injury and altogether everything that is harmful is repelled by defending or avenging: penance, neither by force nor by injury of anyone, but rather by one's own will: therefore it seems that vindication is not of them.

Likewise, further inquiry is made about what he says, Always punishing in oneself, etc.

1. For thus he always punishes, always performs acts of penance: but one cannot be moved by several motions according to one power at the same time: therefore he is never moved by another virtue. If it is said that it is understood as always punishing in habit, not in act: it seems false by what he says, that where pain ends, penance also ends: therefore it seems that he is always actually bound to grieve. If you say that nothing prohibits grieving with affection at the same time, and being moved by another motion according to charity, namely, or another virtue: this seems against the Philosopher in the book, where it is said, that of Sleep and wakefulness one power of the soul being in act, another is drawn: therefore much more if one and the same is in one act, it is drawn from another.
2. Likewise, he always grieves: and where pain ends, penance also ends: therefore if he is moved by charity towards God, and does not grieve, it seems that penance is finished - and where penance fails, there grace fails, as it is said consequently in the Letter - therefore he who is moved by charity, loses grace, which is false: therefore it is not always to be grieved.

3. Likewise, it seems that it is harmful to always grieve: because Bernard says in the Canticles: Thus I advise you, my friends, to sometimes turn your foot from the troublesome and anxious remembrance of your ways, to escape into the smoother paths of the serene memory of the benefits of God: so that you who are confounded in yourselves, may breathe in his sight. From this it is taken, that it is not always to be grieved for sins, but sometimes to rejoice in the benefits of God.

Likewise, shortly thereafter in the same place: Therefore it is better that necessary grief for sins is not continuous. Indeed, let it be interspersed with a more joyful remembrance of kindness, lest perhaps the heart be hardened by sadness, and perish more by despair. Therefore, it is better to intersperse grief than to always grieve: therefore he who avenges sin in himself, should not always avenge by penance what he grieves to have committed.

Solution. We say to the first, as was previously touched upon, that penance sometimes assumes the nature of justice, when justice commands the act of penance. And thus Augustine speaks here of penance. Hence it is not thereby held that it is a species of justice, in the way that a species is said to be placed under an assigned genus.

And there is an instance in the word of Aristotle in the Topics, where he says that if someone, having placed a magnitude of two cubits, says that what is placed is quantity, what he says is quantity and signifies quantity. Where it is clear that although other categories sometimes assume some nature of substance, they are not properly said to be species of it. Hence that form of arguing is not valid: therefore it is a fallacy of accident, which such an argument is: vindication is a species of justice: and penance is a certain vindication: therefore penance is a species of justice.

To the other it must be said that although sins are committed with the will of man, yet they are injuries and harmful, and thus they are avenged. Hence they have from another that they are voluntary, and from another that they are injuries: because they are voluntary in act, as in act there is a conversion to a changeable good: but they are injuries to God and man, inasmuch as they strip of gratuitous gifts, and wound in natural things: and in this way revenge is in them.

To the other we concede that a created spirit according to the same power is not moved by several motions at the same time: and we well concede that when it is moved by another virtue, it is not moved by penance, if penance and that virtue are in the same power of the soul. But the saying of Augustine is understood, that he should always grieve, so that he never admits anything contrary to grief. However, to be moved by other virtues is not contrary, but fitting: because virtue is consonant with virtue, and not contrary. Others, however, say otherwise: but because I do not understand, therefore I do not care about their sayings.

And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 26 — Whether The Sinner Ought Always To Grieve, And To Rejoice Over The Grief

Whether a sinner ought always to grieve, and to rejoice in grief?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, § 4, at the end: But let him always grieve, and rejoice in grief, etc.

For it seems that it is not always to be grieved: because 1. As Bede says, Contraries are cured by contraries. Therefore, if some sins are cured with pain and sadness, they are not to be cured with grief, but with joy and delight: but many are such, like anger, sloth, envy, rancor, and the like: therefore, they are not to be cured with grief: therefore, it is not always to be grieved.

1. Likewise, II Corinthians 2:7-8: Comfort him, lest perhaps he be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow. Wherefore I beseech you to confirm your love toward him.
2. Likewise, II Corinthians 7:10: For the sorrow of the world worketh death. Therefore, some sins are with grave pain and sadness: therefore, they are not to be cured with grief and sadness: therefore, they are not always to be grieved.
3. Further, it seems impossible what is said, Rejoice in grief. For grief existing in something by essence makes it grieve: but grief exists by essence in the one grieving: therefore, it makes him grieve: therefore, he cannot rejoice, as it seems, because grief and joy are opposites.
4. Likewise, Grief and joy are opposite affections: therefore, they arise from opposites: therefore, one is not the cause of the other: therefore, it is not to rejoice in grief.
5. Likewise, It is of the same to rejoice, as it is to grieve: if therefore someone rejoices, he simultaneously rejoices and grieves: and it is of the same to rejoice and to grieve: therefore, according to the same, he rejoices and grieves, as it seems.

To this, some say that joy is sweet and delightful to the one grieving. And this they prove

1. By Augustine in the first book of Confessions saying: If I were to read of Dido's death, I would grieve: because I would not read what I would grieve. About his dead friend: I demanded my soul to be carried by me, and where I might place it I did not find, not in pleasant groves, not in games and songs, not in fragrant places, nor in prepared feasts, nor in the pleasure of the bed, not finally in books and poems did I find rest. The very light was a horror: and whatever was not what he was, was wicked and hateful except for groaning and tears. For in them alone was there some little rest: and thus only weeping was sweet to me, and it succeeded in my soul in the delights of a friend. Even disordered grief can be the matter and cause of joy: and thus the objection previously introduced does not hold. On the contrary: Sweet and delightful expands the heart: therefore, it excites laughter and joy: therefore, not weeping and bitterness. If therefore weeping was delightful from the death of a friend, it would no longer be weeping and sadness, which is false: therefore, it returns to the same as before.

If you say that the one rejoicing grieves in a certain respect, and grieves simply: and this is not inconvenient, namely for one contrary to be simply present, and the other in a certain respect. On the contrary: He who repents, simply rejoices, because otherwise his joy would not suffice: therefore, it seems that his joy is not present to him in a certain respect.

1. Likewise, There is a difference between voluntary grief and involuntary: but in every voluntary grief there can be joy in a certain respect, as in grief over the death of a friend: therefore, he rejoices and delights in weeping: therefore, with voluntary grief there seems to be simple joy: but in penance, grief is simply voluntary: therefore, also simple joy, as it seems.
2. Likewise, Simple joy is obtained from the acquisition of what is simply desired: but the penitent has simply obtained what is desired, when he acquires grief over sins: therefore, also simple joy is generated in him.
3. Likewise, It makes no difference to the generation of his joy, that someone simply acquires a good, or a good for himself: the penitent having obtained a good simply rejoices.
4. Likewise, The possession of virtue (as Boethius says) is pleasant: but penance is a certain virtue: therefore, its possession is pleasant: but it is most possessed by a man in act, when he actually grieves: therefore, then the penitent simply rejoices, and is glad.
5. Likewise, On Galatians 5, on that: But the fruit of the Spirit is charity, etc., Ambrose says: These virtues are called fruits: because they delight their possessors with sincere and holy delight.

Solution. It must be said, as Augustine says, Joy is the diffusion of the soul from the conception of present good: on the contrary, sadness is the constriction of the soul from the conception of present evil, and fear is a movement according to systole or constriction in flight from future and expected evil. Hope, however, is the extension or dilation of the soul in expectation of future good, whether this good is simply, or as now good, provided that good is as good in itself, and not as desired for another: because then it could be desired in itself, not as burning and cutting are desired for health, although in itself no one wishes to be burned or cut, whence also such things are not simply desired, but rather endured for something that is simply desired: and therefore, because of this, it is not contrary in such things to will to endure evil, and to rejoice in that which induces the evil that is endured, as in health. In the same way, I say, that no one wills or desires grief insofar as it is grief, but wills it rather insofar as it is purgative and inductive of pardon: and if he rejoices in grief, he does not rejoice in it insofar as it is grief, but rather insofar as it is inductive of justification and liberation from sin. It is clear, therefore, that in this way it is not contrary to rejoice and to grieve: because they do not refer to the same.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that grief is considered in two ways, namely from the part of the one grieving, and from the part of the same about which there is grief, as moving, and the matter around which it is, and the end: because all these in such things fall into the same. If in the first way: then it is considered only in general: because it does not receive its species except from the part of the moving object. But if in the second way: then it receives the species of the moving object around which there is grief: and from that part nothing prohibits grief from being contrary to the grief which is of contrary species. And thus I say, that the grief which is in penance for envy, is contrary to the grief or sadness which is in envy itself. For to grieve over the prosperity of others is envy: and to grieve over this that he grieves thus, is a contrary grief opposing it, and expelling it. And thus it is clear to be true, that contraries are cured by contraries. However, I think this solution is truer among all. Yet the common opinion is, that such sins are not without some delight, and with respect to that the grief of penance is contrary to them: for he who is saddened by the good of his neighbor, rejoices in his own good. But this solution, in my judgment, is of little value: because although envy has its root in one's own good, yet it receives its species and substance from the sadness of the good of the neighbor: and therefore in that part a contrary remedy should be sought for it.

Through this, the solution to the second and third is clear.

To what is further asked, it must be said that in the way previously mentioned, it is not contrary to have joy and grief together: because they are not about the same, nor in the same according to the same. That they are not about the same is clear: because grief is about sins committed, but joy is about grief, as it is said in the Letter. And that they are not in the same according to the same is clear: because grief is in the affection with the contact of the sense, in some way of the present sin: but joy is in the affection from some sense of the effect of grief, and not of grief as it is from the sense, but insofar as it is inductive of the purity which is rendered through grief.

But if it is objected, as noted above often, that we assent to this opinion, that the soul is not moved by multiple movements at the same time, but multiple movements and passions are of grief and joy, and we concede that these stand together in the affection, and therefore we contradict ourselves. It must be said, that we do not posit them equally in the affection, nor as two movements, but as one composite. And to better understand, it must be noted, that there is a certain power of the intellect simply, which the Commentator on the first book of On the Soul calls information which is of the incomplex. And there is a certain power of the composite intellect or reason, which the Commentator there calls Adem. Therefore, taking one mode of composition, which is by way of composition or reasoning, because Isaac says that reason makes the cause run into the caused: we say, that as it is in concept, so follows passion or movement in the affection. But in concept, voluntary grief is apprehended as inductive of pardon: therefore, a composite movement follows in the affection, which is joy in grief, thus purging and cleansing the soul. And thus it is clear, that they are not two movements, but one.

Moreover, many things have been said about this in the notes on the third book of Sentences, where it is treated of the passion of Christ.

To the other objection concerning Augustine, that simply sad is sweet: it must be said that it is false: nor does he intend this, but the will of remaining in mourning is a will in a certain respect, and this in two ways, namely because it conquers the one grieving and excludes delights, as happens in the death of friends: and then there is no rest in mourning except accidentally, namely because another rest is not found, because consolations are excluded, with the sad prevailing: or because to this delightful it has help, as histories and fables have, which although they are simply sad, yet because they pretend certain wonders, and men from the desire of hearing wonders, intend them, although they are sad: and therefore such things are simply sad, and delightful in a certain respect.

To what is objected against that saying, it must be said that I concede about the weeping.

To what is objected against the solution, that one is present per se, the other in a certain respect, it must be said that in truth the penitent grieves and rejoices, as is said: and both can be conceded to be simply in the way previously mentioned: because grief is present in sensuality, but joy is in reason, neither about the same, nor according to the same. Nor is there any inconvenience there.

Articulus 27 — Who Are Called Perfect; And, What Is The Penance Of The Perfect

Who are called perfect? and, What is the penance of the perfect?

Then it is objected concerning what he says, there, B, Concerning the penance of the perfect, etc.

For the perfect are those who have bound themselves to perfection by vow: and it is not fitting only for these always to repent in themselves, but also for others: because all ought to have the intention of persevering in penance.

Summary. It must be said that the perfect are called here those who according to the state of penance are perfect here, and they are those who continue penance until death. For there is a perfection of penance according to being, and according to well-being in the attainment of the end. According to being, four things are required for the perfection of penance, namely, withdrawal from evil, sorrow for what has been committed, the intention of not committing, and diligence in making satisfaction. According to well-being, which is in the attainment of the end, when it is actually continued until salvation after death: whence Ambrose: Just as charity is one thing beginning, another progressing, another perfect: so penance is one thing of beginners, another of those progressing, another of the perfect.

And through this the solution to the objection is clear: because he does not speak here of such perfection which is through vow, or in the sign of the habit of religion.

Articulus 28 — How Many Modes Of Penance There Are

How many are the modes of penance?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, C, around the beginning: Solemn therefore is the penance, where Ambrose, etc.

It must be noted, therefore, that there are three modes of penance, namely solemn, private, and public.

Solemn is that which is begun at the beginning of Lent, when the penitent is placed outside the Church. However, this expulsion of the penitent ought to be done by the Bishop with the Presbyters, who know the manner of the fault: and it is not to be imposed except for a crime which moves the whole city, as it is said in the canon: Presbyter without consulting the Bishop. However, this penance is not to be repeated: because it is a representation of the expulsion of Adam from paradise: but the introduction is not into paradise except after the death of Christ at least, which is represented at Easter. Hence concerning the first it is said, that with frequent sighs the Bishop announces to them, that just as Adam for his sins was expelled from paradise, so they for their sins are cast out from the Church: afterwards he orders the ministers, that they expel them, the clergy saying:

In the sweat of your face you shall eat bread so that seeing the holy Church moved by your crimes, they do not slight penance: nevertheless they ought to be sent into the Church on the Lord's Supper: but then they will not communicate with others in the Eucharist, or in the kiss: and thus they will remain until the octave of Easter, and then again they will go out. If, however, they repent, they will be able to have entrance to the Church, according to what seems expedient to the Bishop: sometimes, however, they will remain until the end of life. If, however, solemn reconciliation is given, it is to be done only by the Bishop or Abbot or priest by the mandate of the Bishop, if it cannot conveniently be done by the Bishop, especially indeed in the article of necessity: because then it can be done by a simple priest.

Likewise, this solemn penance is not to be imposed on priests, nor deacons, as it is said below, it is to be considered nor even on a cleric, unless first deposed.

Likewise, he who undertakes such penance, meanwhile while he performs it, ought not to contract marriage: if, however, he has contracted, it is contracted and holds.

However, public penance is that which someone does publicly in signs of the publication of penance, although not so solemn: and this also, as some say, is not to be enjoined on priests, as it is held in the twenty-eighth distinction, Presbyter: where it is said, that a priest ought not to do public penance among the laity. However, the contrary seems to be said in the twenty-eighth distinction, Presbyter. It is resolved: because if it is a hidden crime, he ought not to do public penance. If, however, it is public, the enormity of the crime can be so great, that he can do public penance, and ought.

In another way, public penance is spoken of, namely any which is done in the face of the Church: as when a pilgrimage is imposed through the world with a staff of a cubit. This, however, as they say, any priest can impose on his parishioner: because the contrary is not found, unless perhaps it is otherwise by the custom of that Church.

Private penance, however, is said to be that which anyone does with his priest, to whom he confesses his sins, and receives from him a worthy manner of satisfaction.

Exposition of the Text.

Then it is asked concerning what is said, there, C, after the middle: Some mortal fault, etc.

For there is a certain mortal fault, and a certain non-mortal, as venial sin. A certain mortal, against grace, as fornication: a certain mortal and against grace and against reason, as perjury: a certain mortal and against grace and against reason and against nature, as sodomy: a certain one, however, is worthy of accusation in judgment: a certain blasphemy, which is the imposition of a false crime on God, or when something is attributed to Him that is not fitting, or when something is denied to God that is fitting to Him, or communicated to another that is fitting to Him alone.

Articulus 29 — Whether Penance, However Often It Is Repeated, Always Grants Pardon For Crimes

Whether frequently repeated penance always grants pardon for sins as often as it is repeated?

Then the third part of that part must be seen, which begins there, D, "That indeed penance is not done only once," etc.

Here the Master introduces many authorities, that penance is frequently repeated, and always pardon is granted for sins.

However, it seems false to say: because Amos 1:3, on that: "For three transgressions of Damascus," etc., the Gloss of Jerome says: "It signifies that the Lord can grant indulgence three times, who on the fourth time to those committing the same sins neither penance nor indulgence will He grant."

On the contrary, it seems, 1, Matthew 18:22: "I do not say to you, Peter, up to seven times, but up to seventy times seven."

1. Likewise, Augustine on that John 13:14: "And you ought to wash one another's feet," etc. Why would the Lord have washed Peter's feet, and also taught to do this same thing, except because just as offense is daily, so it is necessary that remission be daily.
2. Likewise, Bernard on the Song of Songs: "My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon, far be it. Greater is piety than any iniquity. But impiety is so great that it is frequently repeated: therefore greater piety is always ready to destroy."
3. Likewise, the mercy of God is infinite; therefore it is not limited by any number of repetitions of sins: therefore however much sins are repeated, penance is always granted, if it is sought.

This must be conceded, and first it must be said, that according to Jerome, the first sin is to think. The second, to consent to the thought. The third, to act on the thoughts. But the fourth, finally not to repent. And this is clear, that it is not remitted: because life ends in sins. And, as Damascene says, what death is to men, this is the fall to evil angels: because just as to men after death no place for penance is given, so neither to angels after the fall. And thus it is clear, that by that it is not proven that penance cannot be repeated.

Articulus 30 — Whether One Rising Again From Sin Through Penance Rises Again In Greater Charity Than He Had Before

Whether one rising again through penance from sin, rises in greater charity than he previously had?

Whether one rising again through penance from sin, rises in greater charity than he previously had?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there BD, § 1, in the middle: Nor does He give less than He had given before, etc.

From this it seems that whoever rises again through penance, rises in equal or greater charity than he previously had.

But against this it seems,
1. Numbers xi, 34: Having gone out from the Graves of Lust, they came to Hazeroth, says the Gloss of Jerome: The prudent reader, attend, that after the virtue completed in the twelve, because Israel became proud in the Graves of Lust, desired the Egyptian meats, and again lays the foundation, and enters the courts, that is, the vestibules of virtues, showing us that those who stand can fall, and those who have fallen can rise again. The courts are interpreted: but the vestibules of virtue are called the beginnings of virtue. Therefore, since they previously had completed virtue, which is signified by the number twelve in Hazeroth, through the fall in the Graves of Lust they were reduced to the beginnings. Therefore, they rose again in lesser virtue: not therefore in equal or greater, as it seems.

1. Likewise, Ezekiel xliv, 10 and 11: But, etc. Therefore, the fall of those Levites who went far from me in the error of the children of Israel, and erred from me after their idols, and bore their iniquity, they shall be in my sanctuary as porters and janitors, He cast them into lower offices: and greater office is owed to the more virtuous: therefore, they rise again in lesser virtue, as it seems.
2. Likewise, the least charity can rise again after a prior fall: therefore, it is not necessary that it rises in greater or equal, because previously it could have had greater, lesser, or equal.
3. Likewise, it is said, Matthew xxv, 15, that He gave to each according to his own virtue: but virtue in those rising again is not the power of natural good, and natural power is weakened by sin: therefore, it seems that after the fall less is given than before: therefore, it rises in lesser, not therefore in greater.
4. Likewise, if it rises in greater or equal: therefore, however enormous the sins committed, they do not prevent him from such a resurrection. Let us suppose, therefore, one fell through one fornication, and another through much greater sins: therefore, they rise again in equal charity and virtues, as it seems. Let it be supposed, therefore, that they equally prepare themselves to receive grace, and in all things are equal except these two alone, that the one who offended more had greater grace before, and that he fell more disgracefully: therefore, it seems that nothing helps this one to have greater grace, except that he sinned more. If you say, Indeed because he previously merited more from greater grace. Against: From this that he fell from greater grace, he was more ungrateful: and from this that he was more ungrateful, he sinned more: and from this that he sinned more, he ought to have obtained less: therefore, from the first, the greater grace he had, the less afterwards he ought to have obtained of virtues and grace: therefore, he does not rise again in equal or greater.

5. Likewise, let us suppose two falling from grace, one from greater, the other from lesser: and the one who fell from greater, prepared himself much less to receive grace than the other. Hence thus: God gives to each grace according to his own virtue: and it is commonly glossed, that is, the effort by which he prepares himself: but the one who fell from lesser grace prepared himself more than the one who fell from greater: therefore, he receives greater grace: therefore, consequently the other receives lesser: not therefore, he rises in equal charity and virtue.

1. Likewise, Amos v, 3: The city from which a thousand went out, etc., says the Gloss:

Unity has the sacrament of one God: therefore, and to be in this one is the highest beatitude as one and true God is. The second in the second, namely in the decade. The third in the third, namely in the centenary. For as the denary is completed from ten units: so the centenary from ten decades, and the thousand from ten centenaries, through which the fourth, that is, the highest beatitude is signified: from which if anyone does penance, from the fourth, namely the thousand, he scarcely returns to the third, namely the centenary: and if he is in the centenary, he scarcely returns to the second, namely the denary: it is clear that the Gloss wants that he rises in lesser: not therefore always in equal or in greater.

1. Likewise, what is the cause, that he rises in equal or in lesser? For in the health of the body lost, we frequently see the restoration of health in lesser strength of the body: therefore, similarly and proportionally it will be in the lost health of the mind: therefore, he rises in lesser frequently, as it seems.

CONTRA:
4. To Romans viii, 28: For we know, etc., because to those who love God the Gloss: If any of these deviate and those who stray, and God makes this itself profit them for good. Therefore, by falling, profiting, he rises in greater virtues than before.

1. Likewise, to Romans v, 20: Where sin abounded, grace superabounded. But grace cannot superabound unless greater is given by the Lord than before. Therefore, after the fall greater grace is given than was had before. Therefore, the one falling rises in greater charity than he had when he fell.
2. Likewise, Joel ii, 25: I will restore to you the years which the locust has eaten, etc. Where the Gloss says: I will not allow the abundance to perish, therefore the Lord restores the virtue which was lost before for tribulations: equal after the fall to the virtue which was before the fall, because otherwise something would have been lost.

3. Likewise, Luke vii, 43 and 44: He loves more...to whom more is forgiven when he rises again more is given than if he had never fallen. Therefore, he loves more. Therefore, he rises in greater charity: because greater charity is that which loves more, as it seems.
4. Likewise, Matthew viii, 13: The fever left her: and she arose, and ministered to them. Gloss: For the health given by the command of the Lord is given all at once. Therefore, much more strongly in spiritual health: therefore, he gives spiritual health all at once: therefore, he restores the whole previous: therefore, at least he rises in equal.
5. Likewise, Hugh of Saint Victor: But they are not better unless they were permitted to fall so that from their very fall they might be corrected, and made better. Therefore, etc.

If perhaps you say, that they rise better as to prudence, but not as to charity. Against: Virtues are equal, and one being intensified, all are intensified. If therefore they rise more prudent: in any previous virtue they rise better.

1. Likewise, through subsequent penance previous merits revive: therefore all, or some. It is agreed that all through the previously held disputation: and afterwards something is added because of the subsequent conversion: therefore, always the latter has the whole former, and something more: therefore, the latter charity is always greater: therefore, they rise in greater charity.
2. Likewise, Leviticus vii, 1 and following, where the sacrifice for sin is offered, says the Gloss:

As the virtue of the just pleases God, and worthy penance of sinners, which restores to the former state, by erasing sin: the former, unless it were equal to the first: therefore, etc.

1. Likewise, Ezekiel xvi, 24 and 22: If the impious does penance from all his sins, which he has committed,...of all his iniquities which he has committed, I will not remember. But if iniquities harmed to the diminution of grace previously had, God would remember the iniquities: because the sense is: I will not remember to punish with the penalty of loss or the penalty of sense: therefore, it seems that equal virtue is restored to the one rising: therefore, he rises in equal charity at least.

1. Likewise, Luke xv, 7: I say to you, that, etc. Augustine: so there will be joy

It seems more to justify the impious, than to create and preserve the just. The cause of this is assigned by all Doctors and by Augustine, because in creation nothing resists the operation of God: but in the justification of the impious sins resist: therefore, also to the sinner rising again sins resist: therefore, he needs greater virtue to rise again, than if he had remained just. But it is agreed that he is given all that he needs to rise again: therefore, he is given greater virtue than he had before he fell: therefore, he rises in greater virtue than before.

1. Likewise, God wise and good has disposed best concerning the predestined: but the best disposition is, and then he is called from this life, when he was in the best state of life: but it is agreed that many predestined fall from justice, and rise again, and then they are called from this life: therefore, they are called in a better state in which they ever were before the fall: but the state cannot be better unless they rise in better charity: therefore, etc.

And the same reason is for others falling: therefore, etc.

Solution. This question is determined by Master Hugh of Saint Victor, thus saying: It is certain, he who falls can rise again: and not only can he rise again, but also rise better than he was when he fell. Many have fallen, and even rose better than they would have been if they had not fallen. Master Hugh does not want this to be so in all. Hence it seems to me to be said, that it is possible to rise better and worse, and equally good. And the sign of these is easy to see in those rising again, who are sometimes found more lukewarm and weaker after than before. According to these sayings, it should be answered to the objections induced secondly.

TO THE FIRST thus, that the fall cooperates to good by accident, and not per se: and this good is not always greater virtue, but greater caution in standing, and greater devotion in the service of God: and thus they can also agree with lesser virtue: just as lesser charity sometimes burns more fervently than greater, as we see in novices and perfect men.

To the other it must be said, that it is not noted that grace superabounds over some preceding state, but rather over the power of sin: and this is not: for as all were concluded under sin, so much more grace liberating opened. However, it sometimes happens that grace abounds, and in great sinners more than in others. But this is not always necessary.

To the other it must be said, that this is not understood except as to the vivification of previous merits through penance: but it is not necessary that virtues are restored in the same quantity: and this is because previously held virtues do not remain after the fall, although works remain in the reputation of God, as we said above: and since essential virtues remain in beatitude, the quantity of beatitude cannot be according to preceding virtues, but rather according to following: but works previously done are computed to merit: and this does not increase except accidental reward, not substantial which is considered according to the quantity of virtues and charity in the subject of the soul, which all take the quantity of charity, and thus essentially they will pass into beatitude.

To the other it must be said, that to love more is said in a greater sign of love, or in a greater debt: but it does not necessarily follow that such a one also has greater charity.

To the other it must be said, that the Lord restores the whole health of the mind at once as to the habit of all virtues, because this is owed to justification: but not as to the quantity of virtues, because this is not owed to justification, but rather to subsequent merit. And therefore Augustine says, that charity given merits to be increased, and increased to be perfected, perfected he says: I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ.

To the other it must be said, that it is not necessary that they become better except in the manner of guarding: and this itself is not necessary: but it is true that this is the intention of permitting the fall, which Master Hugh says, and he speaks of the sign of intention, and not of good pleasure, because it frequently happens otherwise.

To the other it must be said, that it does not follow if they are more prudent, that they have greater prudence: because nothing prohibits a lesser virtue in essence, being more in act, than a greater, namely because of greater attention around it, or greater custom of work, or a complexion more inclined to its act, or something of this kind. And therefore that argumentation is not valid.

To the other it must be said, that the merits of works previously done, through subsequent penance revive according to being in the reputation of merit: but it is not necessary, that according to the same power of meriting, or the quantity of reward which they had before.

To the other it must be said, that it is one thing the penance which is required from us by God, and another worthy penance: because worthy penance is what the sinner has from the consideration of his fall: and he owes more than the just, and does more: and, as it is commonly said, he recovers in syllables what he lost in times. Or it may be said, that it pleases equally for justification, but not as to the quantity of charity and virtues. However, the former solution is according to the intention of the Gloss.

To the other it must be said, that God does not remember the former impiety as to that for which the cause is meritorious of impiety, that is, the infliction of penalty: but that the one rising does not have as many virtues as before, this is from the manner of rising, namely because he prepared himself lukewarmly for the reception of grace, and not from the reservation or remembrance of sins. For if this were from sins, every man would rise in lesser charity: and this is not true.

To the other it must be said, that the least charity suffices to rise: but it is true, that when he rises, it is necessary that he be in a certain greater fervor: and this the least charity suffices to elicit: and it does not show a greater habit, but rather more power in work.

To the last it must be said, that I do not think this is true, that every one to be saved dies in the best state in which he was at the time of his life: although I have already heard this from a great Doctor, who wanted to prove this through that of Proverbs iv, 18: The path of the just is as a shining light proceeding, and growing until the perfect day. But this is not so understood: which is thus clear: because in that which falls it does not grow, but rather the light of present justice is intercepted. Hence as far as it is of itself it grows: because charity either profits or diminishes: but the increase is an impediment according to him who is just.

And what is said, that God disposes best concerning those to be saved, it must be said that this is true as to caution and occasion of more intense fervor: and as it was said, that he does not rise in greater charity, is beyond the intention of God from the tepidity of the one rising.

TO THOSE indeed which were first induced, which seem to prove that he rises in lesser charity, it must be said that all those authorities induced are understood of the lesser dignity, and not of the lesser virtue.

And the other is plain to solve.

An example of this is, that a bishop degraded because of heresy, converted sometimes returns to greater virtue, but not to the grade of former dignity. Nor is it true, that to him who has greater virtue, God gives greater dignity: because this is impeded by those noted in the Letter, namely irregularity, and that the former crime may be more feared, and that an example of caution may be given to others, and other such things.

Articulus 31 — Whether There Is Some Supreme Evil

Whether there is some highest evil?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, § 1, towards the end: Even if someone reaches the highest of evils, etc.

It seems that there is no highest evil:
1. For since evil is the privation of good, there cannot be some highest evil unless it is universally deprived of good. However, since good is not in a genus, as the Philosopher says, it is convertible with being; therefore, it is also deprived of being. But what is deprived of being is not; therefore, the highest evil is not.

1. Likewise, in those things which receive intensity by approach and by withdrawal from one and to one, there is no reaching to this highest. But evil is intensified by withdrawal from good; therefore, it is not in it to reach some highest; therefore, there is no highest evil. Proof of the first: In those in which a terminus to which is not posited but only from which, the motion is infinite, because motion is not finished unless it is in the moved being, and this is in the terminus to which. But in comparisons which are according to withdrawal from one, and not according to approach to something, a terminus to which is not posited; therefore, the withdrawal is infinite according to potentiality. But every highest posits a terminus; therefore, in such things there is no highest.
2. Likewise, if there were some highest evil, it would be contrary to the highest good; therefore, it could have as much power in evil as the highest good in good. But the highest good can constitute every being; therefore, the highest evil would destroy every being. But this is false; it is clear, therefore, that nothing is the highest evil.

Solution. It must be said that nothing is supremely evil absolutely; but according to act, there is something so evil that nothing in act is worse. And this the Master notes here and John Chrysostom.

However, the highest evil is twofold, namely simply, and according to state. Simply, as the demon than which there is nothing worse. According to state, however, still in two ways, namely comparing state to state: and thus the damned are supremely evil. Or comparing the state of one person to the state of another person in the state of life, and thus we call the obstinate and impenitent supremely evil. And concerning such, Chrysostom speaks here.

Articulus 32 — Whether The Wicked Can Return To The Way Of Virtue Through Penance

Whether the wicked can return to the way of virtue through penitence?

Whether the wicked can return to the way of virtue through penitence?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, D, § 1, at the end: "If indeed he wishes to return to the way of virtue," etc.

It seems this is false for the damned demons and souls. For that they wish to return to the way of virtue seems

1. By what Dionysius says in the book on Divine Names: Therefore I argue thus: To whomsoever it is fitting to desire the good and the best, inasmuch as they desire to be, to live, and to understand, it is fitting to desire the good and the best in itself: but the good in itself is virtue and the way of virtue: therefore they desire it: therefore God ought to receive them to penitence according to what is said here.
2. Likewise, everyone desiring to be and to live with wisdom and deliberation desires it in the best way possible for them, because otherwise it would be a vain desire, which the Philosopher considers inappropriate in the first book of Ethics: but demons (as Dionysius says) desire to be, to live, and to understand: therefore they desire it in the best way that can be according to nature: but this is according to grace and glory: therefore they desire it in those ways: but to desire according to grace is not without the way of virtue: therefore the desire is for the way of virtue: therefore they ought to be received to penitence.

But on the contrary. If it is said that they cannot flee evil, and thus cannot return to the way of virtues or penitence. ON THE CONTRARY:

1. If they cannot flee evil: either the cause of this impenitence will be outside them or within them. If outside them: then it will be entirely violence: therefore in no way culpable according to Damascene, Gregory Nazianzen, and the Philosopher: therefore it is not imputable to them, but rather to the one inflicting violence: but the one inflicting violence from outside cannot be other than God: therefore God would be blameworthy for the fact that they cannot convert to good. But if the cause is intrinsic to that obstinacy, it seems it can only be twofold: one, namely, that they do not have the perceptive power of the evil that is harmful to them, just as we see plants not fleeing harm because they do not perceive the harmful: or because, when they perceive, they do not wish to flee. If you say it happens in the first way. On the contrary: To everyone > to whom nature gives the perceptive power of harm, it also gives some power of fleeing it. This is also evident in those which do not move progressively, which nevertheless (as the Philosopher says) are constricted in the presence of the harmful, and expand in the presence of the suitable. If therefore evil Angels and damned souls have the perceptive power of the harmful: therefore either it is insufficient, or it gave them the power of fleeing.

Likewise, the rational nature is better than the irrational: but the irrational sensible nature is never deprived of some power of fleeing evil: therefore neither is the rational nature: therefore this cause cannot be.

However, it seems that neither can the second be, namely that it perceives and does not wish to flee. For everything that has a will which it can withdraw from this or that evil, can remove the will universally from evil: but the damned, however much evil they do or wish, can not do it: therefore they can remove the will universally from evil: and thus they do as much as they can to virtue: therefore they return as much as they can to the way of virtue.

Likewise, freedom from coercion (as the Saints say) is natural, and is separated from no rational creature: and this is known from the fact that free will does no act which it cannot abandon, and turn to its opposite: therefore demons who have free will from coercion do no act which they cannot abandon, and do its opposite: therefore if they wish, they can abandon evil, and turn to good as much as they can: therefore they can undertake penitence.

If perhaps you say that God does not give them grace, nor wishes to give: this is entirely false, since Anselm says that they do not have it because they do not receive: not because God does not wish to give.

Solution. It must be said that here many have many opinions to which, prejudicing none, I do not depart from my opinion which is noted in the third and second book of Sentences: and it is this, that the cause of the obstinacy of the damned in evil can be assigned in two ways, namely one by congruence, but the true one in the manner that Legislators in civil matters inflict penalties: therefore I seek the second cause from such, namely the just judgment of God, which is gathered from three things, namely the nature of the damned, the determination of the state, and the perpetual will of sinning.

But the nature of the damned is either of a demon or of a man. If of a demon: then its evil is against the deiform intellect, which is not to be perfected through a mirror and enigma, namely to progress from created things to the creator, as Augustine and Bernard say in the fifth book of Consideration in these words: Indeed, Bernard thus far. I say therefore, citizens do not need a ladder, but exiles. Which the author of this sentence saw, who when he said the invisible things are seen through the visible, significantly placed from the creation of the world. And truly what need is there for a ladder to one already holding the throne? That creature of heaven is there, having at hand through which it rather contemplates these things. It sees the Word, and in the Word the things made through the Word. Nor does it need to beg knowledge of the maker from these things which are made.

For neither to move itself does it descend to these things, where it sees them there, where they are far better than in themselves. Whence it does not require a medium to them of the body's sense: the sense itself to itself, sensing itself. The best kind of seeing, if you need nothing, content with yourself for everything you wish to know. Such an intellect is immediately to receive the end, or to be deflected from it voluntarily: and because after the end there is nothing, therefore such an intellect has the aptitude to stand in the end immediately, or to depart from it: which departure is a voluntary fall from the highest nobility of the intellect. Which natural aptitude of the deiform intellect follows confirmation in good, or obstinacy in evil, from justice with other circumstances concurring to the same. Whence Augustine in the book on Miracles: Therefore the Angel in the highest honor was struck with an irremediable punishment, when sinning and the command of his creator transgressing man is afterwards called to penitence. Established in the summit, he had no change to a more excellent state, unless confirmed in that state by the contemplation of his Creator, where he was established: and therefore having fallen he could not be recalled, who fell from the most sublime state of his order. From these it is clear that justice follows the aptitude of obstinacy to the nature of the sinner itself.

But if the damned is a man, then he has to go through many means to the Creator: and therefore falling in the middle, he falls venially, returning to the way: but falling at the end of the way, where there are no more means, he falls irremediably, because his evil is then against reason, as Dionysius says, because he falls from one to another: and he has not intuitive knowledge of the Creator, but rather discursive, as Dionysius says. Whence Augustine in the same book: Man is placed on earth for this, the things understood are seen, etc.

destined for the duty of generating, deputed for the use of food, would receive the transformation of food into a more sublime, better, and more spiritual life without death, if he had persisted: and therefore when he fell, he did not fall from the highest degree of his order.

The second is the determination of status. For it is just that to everything that is born to receive some perfection, a status and time and place of acquiring it, or of lacking it if it falls, should be determined: and because the deiform intellect does not need discourse, therefore to the Angel that status is deputed which is at the moment or hour of conversion or aversion: but to man throughout the time in which he uses the senses and draws from those things which are the way to the Creator: and therefore the Angel is made confirmed or obstinate after conversion, and man after death. Whence, in Apocalypse 12:9, it is said that their place was no longer found in heaven. And, Psalm 74:3: When I shall take the time, I will judge justices.

The third is confirmation in malice and the will not to return: but this follows from the first two. Whence, Isidore in the book On the Supreme Good: And this is taken from what was said about the fall, when they commit themselves to God through pride, and man fell and the devil: but man returned to penance, recognized God to be superior to himself: but the devil, not content with this, because estimating himself equal to God, fell: moreover, he even says himself to be superior to God, according to the saying of the Apostle, who says: He opposes and exalts himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Therefore the devil no longer asks for pardon, because he is not moved to penance. It is before, that the justice of condemnation follows such a state of Angel and man. Augustine says in the book On Faith to Peter thus: The part of the Angels which departed from its creator God, by whom alone it was blessed, by a voluntary aversion, found the beginning of its damnation in the very aversion of the will: so that there was nothing else to be punished in the work, than to be deprived of the love of that benefit: which God commanded to remain in eternal punishment, so that he also prepared eternal fire, in which those transgressing Angels, neither can they lack evil will, nor punishment: but with the evil of unjust aversion remaining in them, the eternal damnation of just retribution also remains. It follows further, that the evil will which is in the damned, is not sin in them. However, because it is for them in punishment, and more punishment than sin. And therefore it seems to some, that it does not aggravate the punishment of their damnation, except indirectly with respect to the worm of conscience.

There are also other congruities placed by the Saints, and collected by the Masters, seven, why the Angel fell irremediably immediately.

The first is despair, which is of Alcuin on Genesis thus saying: Why is the devil so hostile to the salvation of men? I answer, Because of hatred towards the Creator and envy towards man from despair of his own salvation.

Another is, because he sinned by himself, not by the persuasion of another. Whence Gregory in the Morals: The apostate Angel is not recalled by any hope of pardon, nor by any amendment of conversion: nor does he ever receive the light of his former state, because he did not lose it by persuasion. Thus indeed the blindness of perpetrated pride weighs him down, so that he never rises again to the light of penance through the memory of divine regard.

The third is, because since he is not assumable, it does not suit him to have a restorer. Whence Anselm at the end of the book Why God Became Man: You will then understand the reconciliation of the devil to be impossible, if you diligently consider human nature: just as man could not be reconciled except through a man God who could die, through whose justice what the sin of man lost would be restored to God: so the damned Angels cannot be saved, except through an Angel God who could die, and who through his justice would repair what the sins of others took away: and just as man ought not to be raised by another man who was not of the same kind, although he was of the same nature, so no Angel could be saved by another, although all are of the same nature: because they are not of the same kind, as men: for not all Angels are from one Angel, as all men are from one man.

The fourth is, because in him there is no infirmity, neither burdening nor depressing. Whence Isidore in the book On the Supreme Good: The apostate Angels therefore do not have pardon, because they were not burdened by any infirmity of carnal infirmity so that they might sin. Men after sin therefore return to pardon, because they drew the weight of infirmity from clay material. Therefore because of the condition of weak flesh, the return to salvation is open to man: as also the Psalm 103:14 says: He knows our frame: he remembers that we are dust. And again, Psalm 89:48: Remember what my substance is.

The fifth is the perspicuity of intelligence: but this was previously touched upon somewhat. Whence Dionysius: The evil of the Angel is to be against the deiform intellect, the evil of the soul against reason, and the evil of the body against nature.

The sixth is the particularity of the fall: because not the whole angelic nature fell: but the whole human nature fell. Whence Augustine in the Enchiridion: It pleased the creator and moderator of the universe, that since not the whole multitude of Angels perished by deserting God, that which perished should remain in its own perdition. But because the rational creature which was in men, since it had perished entirely by sins and punishments, could be repaired in part.

The seventh and last is the impugnation of God, who ought to infuse the grace of conversion: and therefore he does not receive the influence. Whence Augustine on Genesis literally: That it is thought that the devil never stood in truth, but fell from the very beginning of his condition, is not to be understood as if he were created evil by the good God: otherwise he would not be thought to have fallen from the beginning: for he did not fall, if he was made such: but made, he immediately turned away from the light of truth, swollen with pride, and corrupted by the delight of his own power.

Considering all these causes, it must be said that the first, which is a certain congruity of nature, is in some way the cause of the second, and the second is in some way the cause or disposition of the third; from which the justice confirming him in such a state is composed so that he cannot return, so that his sin is the punishment, which was for the one committing the sin, as we have said.

To the first objection it must be said, that good and the best can be considered or taken in two ways, namely in the genus, or outside the genus. Outside the genus, good is absolutely good, and the best is absolutely the best which is one alone: and this they do not desire with perfect desire: although they have an imperfect natural instinct towards this. But if good and the best are taken in the genus, namely natural good: then this is still considered in two ways, namely absolutely: and thus to be, to live, to understand are goods desired by the damned: or respectively, namely by comparison to punishment: and thus in my judgment nothing prohibits them from not desiring them, as namely such goods are under punishments. And therefore Dionysius says: Insofar as they are, they desire good and the best, and therefore it is clear, that that reasoning is of no value: because Dionysius does not speak of good in the genus of good or virtue, as we have said: and if it is extended to this, there is some imperfect desire of good: which is not in them except insofar as they are, and not simply; because simply they do not have a will except what befits them as they are under punishments and malice.

To the second it must be said, that I do not know well to see, what is the necessary cause of the immobility of the evil of the damned, or the impotence of flight: but yet it seems to me, that the cause is partly within, and partly outside. Within as the disposition is the aptitude of the nature from which they fall, and the determination of the status at whose end they fall. Outside, however, divine justice confirming in that which the damned finally chose the will.

And as to this last, there is no doubt that the obstinacy of the will has more the nature of punishment than of sin.

To what is objected, that if it is outside, that it is violence: it must be said, that this would be true, if it were only outside: but dispositively meritoriously it is within.

To what is objected, that if they perceive the punishments, and do not flee, etc., it must be said, that the damned perceive the punishments: and the perceived punishment is considered in two ways, namely insofar as it is contrary to the good nature which it punishes: and if it were considered by them only in this way, they would flee it: because, as was said before, they desire good, insofar as they desire to be and to live and to understand. And to that good the punishment is contrary, as Augustine says, that punishment is not evil, except because it is contrary to good nature: but because the appetite and such consideration is not perfect in them, but as it were in potency, namely in the root of nature only, therefore they do not consider the punishment, except insofar as it is a just consequence of the fault. And because they immovably will the fault, therefore they do not flee the punishment: and therefore they are accidentally disposed not to flee the punishment, namely insofar as it is bound to the fault, which they do not flee, but rather pursue and desire.

To what is objected, that they are of worse condition than beasts: it must be said, that in beasts there is only the instinct of nature, but in demons the instinct of confirmed malice: and therefore there is no comparison: but if according to nature this were, that they would not flee punishment, then the objection would be valid.

To the other it must be said, that the demon always wills evil: but this evil or that he does not necessarily will: whence in this obstinacy is noted, that from deliberation he always wills evil: and he is not properly compelled, because the cause of obstinacy is not only outside, as was said. But if he could universally turn away from evil, then the argument would follow.

To the last it must be said, that in truth he has freedom from coercion: because he is not coerced to evil: because then the cause would be only extrinsic, but it is intrinsic, as was said: and therefore he never follows this part, namely good: because freedom is weakened to good and corrupted by the habit drawing to evil.

Articulus 33 — Whether There Is A Return To The First State Through Penance

Whether there is a return to the first state through penance?

Then it is questioned concerning this which he says, there, D, § 1, towards the end: "He does all things so as to recall to the former state," etc.

This does not seem true: because
1. The former state is that of innocence: and to that there is no return through penance.

If it be said that it recalls to the former state as to the immunity from guilt, but not as to dignity.
On the contrary: We see that when the penitent rises again, there still remains in him the difficulty of doing well: and this is from the remnants of sin, which he did not have before: therefore through penance, he does not entirely receive the former state.

1. Likewise, the former state is that he is ready for doing well according to every work of virtue: and this cannot be unless from the perfect habit of every virtue: therefore this is not solely of penance, as the Master seems to suppose in the Text.

Solution. It must be said to this, that penance in its parts has to restore to the former state, namely in contrition, confession, and satisfaction: and especially as to that part, which is satisfaction: because that supposes the exercise of work according to whatever virtue is commanded by penance: and thus all that was objected ceases.

Articulus 34 — Whether David Ought To Have Been Punished On Account Of The Census

Whether David ought to have been punished on account of the numbering?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, D, § 2: He gravely sinned afterwards in the people, etc.

It seems that David ought not to have been punished by the numbering itself: because

1. There were many numberings, and they were not punished: as Moses, and Saul: and other kings of Israel and Judah.
2. Likewise, since David sinned by numbering, and not the people, it seems unjust that the people were punished.

Response. Others numbered by the command of the Lord, as Moses: others, however, for the sake of an expedition to battle, as Saul: but David numbered on account of pride, and therefore he sinned.

To the other it must be said that he is punished to show the relationship of the people to the ruler, just as the whole people were punished on account of the sin of one, namely Achan. Hence Augustine: Or it may be said, and better, it is shown in the punishment of Achan, how great a good in the people is unity itself, so that not in themselves individually, but in the whole, the parts are considered. Because he was proud in the people: and therefore he was punished in it as in possession: and thus the punishment itself redounds upon the king.

DISTINCTIO XV

Divisio Textus

And just as by the aforementioned authorities, etc. Here begins the part in which he refutes the second error, namely that penance can be done for one sin while another sin is retained in delight.

And this part is divided into two parts. In the first, he objects from the canon and resolves it. In the second, he objects from the sayings of the Fathers and resolves it.

The first part is subdivided into two, namely into objection and solution.

The second begins there, A, § 2: But concerning these, it must be understood only that, etc.

In this chapter, he does three things. First, he recounts the error; then, for that error, he first introduces an authority; third, he forms an objection from the sentence of the authority. And these are evident in the Letter.

Articulus 1 — Whether One Can Do Penance For One Sin While Another Sin Is Retained In Delight

Whether penance can be done for one sin, while another sin is retained in delight?

Here arises the question, whether it is true what they say?

It seems that it is so: 1. For debts contracted separately can justly be paid separately: sins are debts contracted separately: therefore, etc.

That sins are debts is evident from that in Luke 7:41: "Two debtors." And, Matthew 18:27: "He forgave him the debt." Also Matthew 6:12: "Forgive us our debts."

1. Also, in the fifth book of the Ethics, Aristotle holds that justice in one way, although not generally, is the same as counterpassion, and the just is the same as the counterpassioned, as Plato says. Let us suppose, therefore, that someone has offended in ten, and in two he is counterpassioned by enduring: either God, to whom he owes, requires satisfaction, or not. If so: then he seems to proceed unjustly: because it is not commanded by law, unless he who has offended is counterpassioned. If not: then the position is held.
2. If perhaps you say that the justice of God still requires satisfaction, but not human justice: this is nothing: because divine justice is infinite, and always mercy before judgment; since therefore in such a case human justice requires nothing, it seems much less that divine justice requires anything further from him.
3. Also, it has been held above from Augustine in the book on Penance, that it is evident to him that sins displease much, who is always ready to destroy them: therefore it will be much more evident if he entirely destroys what can be destroyed: but this will be by destroying individually: therefore it seems that the penitent individually destroys sins.
4. Also, if someone suffers from two or three diseases, which have different and opposite causes: the physician expels the more dangerous disease, leaving or even confirming the other in the subject. Since therefore it is similarly in the diseases of the soul, as in the diseases of the body, as the Saints say, it seems that penance can be done for one sin, while another remains in delight.

5. Also, no king or emperor would again require amendment from someone to whom for part of the injury a fitting penance had been imposed by his vicar, who is in his place: but it is evident that the priest is the vicar of God in confession, and according to what he hears imposes true penance for two or three, others being silent, therefore the supreme emperor will not require further penance for these.
6. If it is said that the sinner cannot satisfy unless he satisfies in charity: and because he does not have charity who repents of one and not of another: therefore he cannot satisfy. Against: Ecclesiastes 9:1: "Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred." Therefore no one knows whether he satisfies or not. Therefore all day everyone should repeat their penance, and despair that they cannot satisfy: because this is completely unknown, what is required for satisfaction: but this is false: therefore also this that someone must satisfy in charity.
7. Also, Daniel: "Redeem your sins with alms." But it is evident that when Daniel gave this counsel, he knew the king to be unjust: therefore the unjust in one sin can do penance for another.
8. Also, Luke 16:9: "Make friends for yourselves with the mammon of iniquity." Riches are called iniquities, because they are collected from iniquities. But it is evident that alms cannot be made from such things which would cause one to be received into eternal tabernacles, unless part of the iniquity is retained, from the other part alms and satisfaction could be made: therefore remaining in one sin, one can satisfy for another.
9. Also, sins do not have such a connection as virtues have, but each is separate from the other: but whatever things are separate from each other, one of them can be destroyed, the other not destroyed: therefore one sin can be destroyed, the other retained: but sin is destroyed only by satisfaction: therefore satisfaction can be made for one, the other retained in will.
10. Also, it is not so with political virtue that having one excludes all vices: therefore it seems that this should not be the case with theological virtue, since God, desiring our salvation, helps in all ways by which man can be helped.

If you say that with political virtue it is so, that he who has one has all, as Isidore says, as noted above in the third Sentences, that this was the opinion of the Stoics, and Aristotle in the fourth Ethics, when he speaks of magnanimity and the magnanimous: if, I say, you say thus: this is nothing, and against the intention of the Philosophers: because they do not attribute this to virtue according to its being by which it perfects its own proper and essential act, but rather according to its greatest power which it has in the subject. And therefore virtue according to its being can be in the subject, with some vice remaining in the same subject which does not contradict that virtue: and thus the proposition is held, as it seems.

But that this error is most pernicious and anathematized, it seems thus:

1. II Corinthians 6:13, the Apostle says: "What agreement has Christ with Belial?" therefore Christ has no communication with a heart in which the devil dwells: but he who is in one mortal sin is the habitation of the devil: therefore Christ has no communication with him: but Christ accepts no satisfaction unless with whom he participates in grace: therefore Christ does not accept such satisfaction, as it seems.

2. Also, among men during enmities satisfaction of the offender is not accepted: but he who is in sin still acts in enmity against God: therefore his satisfaction is not received.

3. Also, Matthew 5:23: "If you offer your gift, etc." But it is evident that your gift at the altar is not of lesser concern to God, that man reconciles himself to Him, than to man: therefore it is necessary first to be reconciled in all things to God, and then his offering is accepted. But a kind of offering is worthy satisfaction: therefore it is necessary first to have grace for all sins, before satisfaction is accepted: but no one remaining in will in one has grace for all: therefore remaining in will in one, he cannot satisfy for another.

4. Also, he who is in one sin, as Augustine says, is worthy only of eternal punishment: therefore he is not worthy that his work of satisfaction be accepted: and he does not satisfy unless by a work accepted by God; therefore he who is in one sin cannot satisfy for another.

5. Also, without grace there is no satisfaction: but grace encompasses all virtues: therefore without all virtues together there is no satisfaction: but opposites are not together: therefore with virtues there cannot be opposite vices: therefore he who has grace does not have any sin: and no one satisfies unless he has grace: therefore he who satisfies does not have any sin: therefore from the destruction of the consequent, he who has any sin does not satisfy.

6. Also, he does not satisfy who does not restore to God what is His: but he who does not restore to God the soul which he has taken away, does not restore to God what is His: therefore he does not satisfy, who restores the soul: but the soul is not restored as long as the will of any sin remains: therefore as long as any sin is in the will, satisfaction cannot be made.

7. Also, let it be that someone satisfies for one sin, another retained in will: either he loves the Creator as he ought, or not. If not: then he does not satisfy. Proof. Luke 7:48: "Many sins are forgiven her, because she loved much." If so: therefore everything he loves concerning God he loves: but loving everything concerning God, he loves nothing in mortal sin: therefore he loves nothing mortally: therefore no mortal sin remains in his will: and this is against the position: therefore it is impossible to satisfy for one, another retained in delight.

Solution. It must be said that this must be conceded, that what is put forth at the beginning of the chapter as an opinion, although false, must be condemned as contrary to faith, and it is reduced to the contrary of that article: "I believe in the Holy Spirit," namely the holy Catholic Church. Or against that: "The forgiveness of sins."

To the first, it must be said that although the debts of sins are contracted separately as to conversion to a changeable good, and as to act, yet they agree in aversion from one uncreated good: and in this respect they have the nature of offense and guilt: and therefore since that aversion remains, with any other sin remaining, man cannot satisfy for one, another retained. And this is similar to offenses against men: because the offender cannot satisfy for that offense, while continuing in offending. Although the sinner cannot harm God, yet as far as he is concerned, he harms.

To the second, which proves that sins are debts, it must be said that human debts are twofold. For some are those which are voluntarily believed by the debtor: and to such no offense is attached: and in this way sins are not called debts. Some are debts which arise from unjust harm to someone, either in person, or in goods, or in honor: and to such an offense of the harmed is attached: and therefore he cannot be satisfied unless the offense ceases: but this does not cease while he continues in any way of harm: and to such debts sins are likened. And therefore it is clear that that reasoning is not valid.

To the other, it must be said that although according to Plato the just is the same as the counterpassioned, and this is true in some cases, as in the rectification of inflicted injury, where the one inflicting injury is counterpassioned as much as he inflicted: yet this just supposes a cessation from harm generally: and from spiritual harm there is no cessation, as long as the will of any sin lasts.

To the other, it must be said that the justice of men also well requires cessation from harm, as has already been shown: but other debts to which the offense of him to whom we are debtors is not attached, can be paid separately. And to those debts in spiritual matters sins are not similar, but rather the gifts which are given by God, that we may gain in them, as it is said, Matthew 25:14 and following.

To the other, it must be said that actual sin is not destroyed in us without us: because, as Augustine says, "He who created you without you, will not justify you without you." It cannot be destroyed except by grace, to which the will turned away from the unchangeable good is opposed: and since that remains turned away even in one sin retained in delight, another sin cannot be erased: although God in Himself is always ready to destroy, whenever there is no impediment on our part.

From the above we concede that it is not similar with bodily diseases and spiritual ones: because bodily diseases do not have one cause: but spiritual ones have a single cause, which is the will, or free choice, which as long as it remains turned away is not susceptible to medicine: and therefore no spiritual disease is cured in it.

To the other, it must be said that the priest does not receive such a one to penance unless deceived: but what is exhibited by a deceived minister is well revoked by the justice of the king: therefore the objection brings forth not a similar for a similar, or something false is supposed in it, namely that true satisfaction is what is received by a deceived vicar.

To the other, it must be said that although man cannot know he has charity with infallible knowledge, he can know, namely with knowledge by probable signs accepted: and this suffices, as has often been noted in this work.

To the other, it must be said that Daniel does not intend that any king should persist in any sin, but rather that he should change his life for the better, and then with alms he will redeem the penalty of sins which he foresaw to be due to him because of sin.

To the other, it must be said that the meaning of that word is not that money is retained in part, which is acquired from iniquity: but rather it supposes what is of positive and common law, that first what was taken away is restored: then from the remainder which is called iniquitous, because it is retained unjustly, that is, avariciously against the poor, the poor are bought as friends, that they may receive their benefactors into eternal tabernacles: as below in the same distinction will be held in the question of alms.

To the other, it must be said that sins do not have a connection in any positive being, which is like a habit, or root, or something of this kind: but yet they have a commonality in the privation of conversion to the unchangeable good: from which part they all have the nature of sin and evil and guilt of offense. And since such privation remains in him who persists in sin, the wrath of God remains upon him: and therefore grace is not perceptible.

To the other, it must be said that different people have different opinions about this. And as far as I am concerned, I well think that one of the political virtues is had without another: although not as to all the power it can have in the subject: and then it must be said that it is not similar with political and infused virtues: because infused virtues are understood as formed virtues, which are as it were certain virtual parts of grace making one pleasing: and therefore they have a connection in grace, so that one is not had without another. And therefore also none is there, as long as the contrary of any virtue is in the subject.

But it is not so with political virtues: because they take their generation from custom and experience, and the customs of acts are diverse: and therefore one is generated in the soul, another not generated. And by this the solution to the following two is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether For One Sin A Twofold Tribulation Can Arise

Whether for one sin a double tribulation can arise?

Then it is inquired concerning that which is said, there, A, at the beginning: A double tribulation will not arise, etc.

It seems contrary

1. In Psalm 105, 29, where it is said: Let them be covered as with a cloak by their confusion.

1. Likewise, Ecclesiasticus 11, 16: Error and darkness were created together with sinners.

2. Likewise, In Psalm 148, 8: Fire, hail, snow, etc.

Solution. It must be said that a double tribulation will not arise for a sin that is simply one: but for that which is one in subject, and multiple in deformity: or for multiple sins a double tribulation will indeed arise; just as when the act of sin is one, yet there is lust, and contempt, and the like, to which something corresponds in punishments.

Hence it must be said to the first, that this is not understood by reason of diverse punishments owed to one sin, but by reason of the two parts of the sinner himself, which are body and soul: and just as he sinned in body and soul, so also he is punished in both.

To the other it must be said, that this is understood by reason of the privation of the habit directing in moral matters. For error...

There is in choosing, and darkness in providing what is to be done.

To the other it must be said, that those punishments do not correspond to one sin simply, but to many, or to a sin which is one in subject, and with much deformity.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Penances That Are Commuted Into Good And Are Enjoined In Satisfaction Are Just Or Not

Whether the penalties which are changed into good, and are enjoined in satisfaction, are just, or not?

Then it is asked, concerning what is said there, A, § 2: Those who are changed into good by present punishments, etc.

Here it can be asked, Whether those expiatory penalties which are changed into good, and are enjoined in satisfaction, are just, or not?

It seems that they are just: because 1. The Lord punishes sinners with these penalties: and God punishes no one unless justly: therefore these penalties are just.

1. Likewise, It is just that a judge renders according to merits: but the merit of guilt cannot be except by penalty: therefore when it is inflicted on the sinner, it is done justly to him: therefore such a penalty is just.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. To mortal sin is owed eternal penalty: therefore it is unjustly punished, when it is punished with temporal penalty.

1. Likewise, If the sinner is justly punished with a set penalty, it seems unjust if the set penalty is converted into a greater one: but this is not unjust: therefore that set penalty was not just. By the middle proposition. If the penitent does not complete the enjoined penance, he is punished in purgatory, where the penalty is more severe.

Conclusion. It must be said that if that penalty is set discreetly, it is just: because then the circumstances of the sinner are considered, namely devotion, will, and the like, and the circumstances of the forum of the Church militant, which helps, and others. Hence the conclusions first introduced must be conceded.

To the objection, it must be said that to mortal sin in itself is owed eternal penalty: but to mortal sin which by the event of subsequent contrition and confession has become venial, eternal penalty is not owed, but temporal.

To the other, it must be said that by accident the penalty becomes greater: namely because the circumstances of the penitent change, and the circumstances of the forum in which he repents. For voluntary penalty here becomes necessary there: and therefore of lesser power in purging: and therefore it must be intensified, and other circumstances changed.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Five Modes By Which Scourges Happen Are Well Assigned And Distinguished

Whether the five ways by which scourges occur are well assigned and distinguished?

Then indeed it is questioned concerning this which is said, there, A, § 2, in the middle: For scourges occur in five ways, etc.

It seems that the first way is none: because
1. It does not presuppose sin in the scourged, since Jerome says: Whatever we suffer, our sins have deserved.

1. Likewise, on Romans 8:28, on that: To those who love God, all things work together for good, the Gloss says: Death and therefore without sin, all evils proceed from the merit of original sin: some way of just scourge, as it seems.
2. Likewise, Job 6:2: Would that my sins were weighed, etc. Therefore it is manifest that whatever evil we endure happens for our sins.

1. Likewise, Gregory: No adversity will harm if no iniquity dominates.
2. Likewise, Augustine: It is unjust, but God does nothing unjustly: therefore a rational creature is not punished without sin: He punishes none except for sin.

On the contrary:
1. Job 16:18: I have suffered these things without the iniquity of my hand, when I had pure prayers to God.

1. Likewise, Job 19:6: Understand that God has afflicted me not with an equal judgment, and has surrounded me with His scourges.
2. Likewise, Gregory in the Gloss: The just Creator did not seek to extinguish the vices of blessed Job with so many blows, but to increase his merits.
3. Likewise, John 9:3: Neither did this man sin, nor his parents: but that the works of God might be made manifest in him.

Further, it is objected concerning the second way, which seems that it is none: because

1. Incitement to vice is not the custody of virtue: but provocation to anger without cause is incitement to vice: therefore it is not a good custody of virtues: but he who is scourged without merit is provoked to anger: therefore it is a bad custody of virtues.

2. If you say that this is lest pride tempt. On the contrary: Augustine says that pride rages after all virtues. Therefore even after penance in tribulation: therefore pride is not more guarded against by tribulation than by another way.

Further, it is questioned concerning the third way. For it seems not to be the correction of sin.

1. For sin is not corrected except by grace which is contrary to it, or by virtue: but punishment is not contrary to sin: therefore sin is not corrected by punishment.
2. Likewise, punishment which corrects sin: either it has this insofar as it is punishment, or insofar as it is voluntary, or insofar as it is inflicted, or as to two of these, or as to all three. If in the first way: then in all it corrects sin: and thus the fifth way is also understood. If in the second way: therefore where there is greater will, there will be greater correction of sin: but to the sweet works of virtues, and prayers, and suchlike, the will is greater and sweeter: therefore sin will be more corrected by those, as it seems: therefore that purgative of sin seems ill-ordered by the highest wisdom. If as to the third, this again cannot stand: because in demons and the damned punishment is inflicted, and yet it does not correct sin. If you say, as to two; either this will be because punishment is voluntary, or because punishment is inflicted. If in the first way: since this is not caused by what is punishment, but by what is voluntary: it seems that in those in whom the will is more devout, it is more corrective of sin: and those are acts of virtues, and other works of devotion, as is commonly said by all.

Further, it is questioned concerning the fourth way which he touches: because it seems to be entirely without reason:

1. For the glory of God can be manifested in many other ways without the harm of men: therefore it seems that this is useless.
2. Likewise, it seems to be a certain conformity to the miracles of the demon: because, as it is said in the life of blessed Bartholomew, the demons first harmed, and afterwards ceasing, they seemed: and so it seems to be here: therefore this way seems to be none.

Similarly, it is questioned concerning the fifth: because
1. Augustine says in the book on Penance: Whatever God permitted to suffer, but know it to be a scourge of correction: Herod suffered: therefore his suffering was a scourge of correction, as it seems.

1. Likewise, as long as a place for correction and penance is given, so long should the beginning of condemnation be deferred: but through this whole life a place for penance is given: therefore condemnation should not begin here: therefore no one is punished before the beginning or taste of his condemnation: and thus the fifth way seems to be none.

Against this is what is said, II Maccabees 9:13, concerning Antiochus punished when he was humbled by punishments, and prayed: But this wicked man prayed to the Lord, from whom he would not obtain mercy. Therefore punishment did not avail him for the amendment of the crime.

Moreover, it seems that that whole division is insufficient: because another is given which is contained in these words:

He instructs, turns, tests, and makes joyful, constrains,
Strengthens, satisfies, consummates, then crowns.

He instructs, Jeremiah 31:18: You have chastised me, and I was instructed.

He turns, that is, converts, Psalm 15:9: Their infirmities were multiplied, afterwards they hastened.

He tests, Ecclesiasticus 27:7: The furnace tests the potter's vessels, and the trial of tribulation tests just men.

He makes joyful, James 1:2: Count it all joy, my brethren, when you fall into various temptations.

He constrains, Isaiah 26:19: Only vexation will give understanding to the hearing.

He strengthens, Job 6:9 and 10: Let Him loose His hand, and cut me off. And this would be my consolation, that afflicting me with pain, He does not spare.

He satisfies, that is, makes fruitful, Exodus 1:12: The more the Egyptians oppressed them, namely the sons of Israel, the more they multiplied and grew.

He consummates, Matthew 5:10: Blessed are they who suffer persecution for justice's sake.

He crowns, II Corinthians 4:17: For that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation, works for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory.

In conclusion. It must be said to the first, that sin is twofold, as Augustine says, namely of nature, and of person. And without the sin of nature no one suffers, not even Christ, as noted in the third Sentences, question on the passion of Christ, but without the sin of person many are punished, as Christ, and Job, and certain others: and thus the authorities first introduced are understood.

To what is questioned concerning the second way, it must be said that all tribulation, insofar as it humbles, avails for the custody of virtues: and although this is universally true, yet there is a certain species of tribulation which shows the infirmities of man and the utilities of the body, which has a special efficacy of humiliation, as was the tribulation of blessed Paul, namely the thorn of the flesh.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that tribulation is not a provocation except of a mind ill-disposed, namely angry: but here Bede speaks of a tranquil mind, and the mind of the wise: concerning which the Philosophers have proved that perturbation does not fall into the wise: and therefore the virtue which is presupposed in the scourged guards against perturbation: but the mode of scourge is per se humiliative.

To the other it must be said, that although pride rages after all virtues, yet it rages less after that which reduces man into the actual knowledge of his state: and therefore it concludes false as far as it is of itself.

To what is objected concerning the third, it must be said that in sin there are two things, namely the substance of sin, and the guilt consequent to sin: and sin as to its substance is not purged except by grace:

but the guilt which is the debt of punishment is purged by the payment of punishment.

To the other it must be said, that punishment purges sin insofar as it is voluntarily accepted for sin.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that works of devotion indeed avail more for the merit of eternal life: because they kindle charity and fervor: but punishment voluntarily perceived avails more for the merit of the diminution of punishment. And this for this reason, because the guilt of punishment is by way of the debt of justice: which is said by the Philosopher to be directive of loss. And such justice requires that as much be paid as was offended: but it is paid when one atones for punishment: and therefore it avails more for the payment of punishment to endure punishment voluntarily. The reason introduced proceeds as if the merit of eternal life and the diminution of punishment were the same, which is not true.

To what is questioned concerning the fourth, it must be said that that mode has reason: because by this that He punishes and satisfies, the Lord shows Himself to be the founder of nature, as He Himself says, Jeremiah 16:6: Behold, as clay in the hand of the potter, so are you in My hand, house of Israel. But by other ways He would not so show Himself the artificer of the clay of our nature.

To the other it must be said, that demons conferred some health: and their harm was violent: but the Lord sometimes weakens by moving nature through dispensation: but He confers true health, with humors reduced to equality, or with the members of the composition of the body reintegrated. Hence it is not similar what is introduced for the similar.

To what is questioned concerning the fifth, it must be said, that I well think, that as far as the intention of the scourge and the scourger is concerned, no one is scourged here except to be corrected: but that he is not corrected is foreknown by the scourger, and therefore it is said to be the beginning of eternal punishment. For that it is just of punishments, this itself ought to make him recoil from sin as far as the nature of punishment is concerned: hence that he does not return, this is from the obstinacy of the scourged - and then it is per accidens as if the beginning of eternal punishment.

And by this the solution of those things which are objected is clear: because Augustine speaks according to the intention of the scourger and not of the scourged. And in the same sense the reason proceeds. But Bede speaks in the Letter concerning the scourge on the part of the scourged, which in him makes obstinacy, which is the beginning of eternal punishment.

To what is objected concerning the division, it must be said that many particular causes can be assigned for the scourge: but yet they fall under these five universals - as is clear in the eight members of the second division. For instruction is reduced to the custody of virtues: conversion however to correction: testing and making joyful, strengthening and healing and crowning all fall under the first cause here posited. And two causes posited here are not touched in the second division: because it has more general parts than the second.

And the number of causes posited here can be taken thus: Scourge is made either for the promotion of good, or for the removal of evil. If in the first way: either in the Church, or in the person. If in the Church, thus it is for the glory of God to be manifested, as in the blind man. If in the person: either it is for the good which is not present, but ought to be induced by the scourge: or for the good which is present, and can be improved by the scourge: because as the Poet says:

It does not harm to apply the spur to the admitted horse.
If with respect to that which is not present: thus it is for the correction of vice, that virtue may be introduced: because Boethius says, that vices must first be extirpated, that virtues may be inserted:

If however it is with respect to the good which is present, but can be amended for the better: then either it is on the part of the subject: and then it is the rooting of greater good and conservation, and thus it is the custody of virtues. Or on the part of the good itself which is present: and this does not accept improvement except according to quantity: and then that is the cause which Augustine calls merits. If however it is with respect to evil: either this will be with respect to removing evil: and thus it is again for the correction of vices: because nothing prohibits the same being of two or both ends: of one, as of that which is the end: of the other however, as of that which is to the end: and by the scourge first virtue is to be inserted: but that this may be done, it is necessary that vices be extirpated. Or it is to indicate evil, which cannot be extirpated because of the obstinacy of the scourged: and thus it is for the beginning of eternal punishment.

But there are verses concerning these causes:

Job tests, inclines Paul, and purges Mary,
In the blind man He manifests Himself, punishes Herod.
Or thus:
Why is man tormented? lest pride dominate.
When is man tormented? that merit may be accumulated for him.
Why is man tormented? that guilt may be expiated by punishment.
Why is man tormented? that Christ may be glorified.
Why is man tormented? that he may be punished doubly.

Articulus 5 — Whether God, In Punishing Sins, Observes The Due Measure

Whether God in punishing sins preserves a due measure?

§ 21. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, after the beginning: That God as of all things, so also of punishments knows the measures, etc.

§ 22. For it seems, that God Himself does not preserve the measures of the penalty of crimes: 1. For it is clear, that the crime is temporal: but the penalty is eternal: therefore it seems, that the measure is not preserved.

§ 23. 2. Also, below it is said, that the penalty even of purgatory exceeds every genus of passion, which a man can suffer in this life: therefore much more the penalty of hell: but the delight of sin does not exceed every genus of delight of this life: therefore the bitterness of the penalty according to intension exceeds in quantity the delight of sin: therefore penalty and fault are not measured against each other, as it seems.

§ 24. SOLUTION. It must be said, that the measure of penalty is not proportioned to the quantity of time, or of delight, but rather to the quantity of the root and of the contempt and of the command of the will, as the Saints say. For example, the root of sin is contempt: and the quantity of this is attended to according to the quantity of the eternal uncreated good, which it contemns: and this is a certain infinite good. And therefore if it is punished by a finite penalty, this will be from God's mercy. Similarly the act of sin is temporal: but nevertheless when a man voluntarily subjects himself to sin, with the knowledge of it that he is not able to rise per se, as much as is of himself, he chooses to be in sin eternally: and consequently also to this eternity responds an eternal penalty. And this is what Gregory says, that because man sinned in his eternal, therefore he is punished in God's eternal.

§ 25. And through this the solution of both objections is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether By The Sentence Of The Priest The Sentence Of The Judge Is Forestalled

Whether through the sentence of the priest the sentence of the judge is prevented?

§ 26. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, after the beginning: And that the sentence of the judge is not prevented, etc.

§ 27. For we see, that all day it is prevented through temporal penance.

§ 28. Also, John xx, 23: Whose sins you shall forgive, etc. And, Matt. xvi, 19: Whatever you shall loose, etc.

§ 29. But it is certain, that this whole is understood as to penalty: because God by Himself absolves from fault: therefore the sentence of the judge is prevented.

§ 30. SOLUTION. It must be said, that through the sentence of the priest the sentence of the judge is not prevented: because the sentence of the judge and of the priest is the same, if the priest enjoins penance by the order of the keys. But if he does not preserve the order of the keys, then it is the sentence of a man, not of God: and then again he does not prevent it, because the sentence of God does not on this account recede from the sinner, who willingly is deceived by the priest.

§ 31. Whence the first authorities, and the first reason speak of the sentence of the judge, inflicted by the ministry of the priest. And through this the solution is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether For A Light Fault, As Gathering Wood On The Sabbath, Death Ought To Have Been Inflicted

Whether for a light fault, as to gather wood on the sabbath, death ought to have been inflicted?

§ 32. Next it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, B, below the middle: And he who had gathered wood on the sabbath, etc.

§ 33. 1. For he seems to mean, that the fault of this Israelite was light: since nevertheless he was stoned, and for a light fault death would not have been inflicted.

§ 34. 2. Also, it is read, Levit. xxiv, 14: Lead the blasphemer outside the camp. Therefore he blasphemed: and blasphemy is a sin against the Holy Spirit: and this is a sin which is not remitted neither in this world, nor in the future: since nevertheless the Letter implies, that he afterwards was not punished.

§ 35. SOLUTION. It must be said, that the lightness of that fault is signified from the species of the twofold sin, namely of the gathering of wood on the sabbath, and of the curse by which he cursed not God, but an Israelite man: and he speaks only of these two sins.

§ 36. But to the first it must be said, that sins were then heavily punished on account of the recency and rigor of the law, that others might be terrified, and not on account of the gravity of the sin. § 37. To another it must be said, that as Richard of St. Victor says, the spirit of blasphemy is one thing, and blasphemy is another: because the spirit of blasphemy is, when the one blaspheming breathes not ignorance, but malice in blaspheming, as is clear, Matt. xii, 24, and Luke xi, 15, where they saw signs indicating the spirit of God, and said they were done in Beelzebub. But blasphemy is done sometimes from ignorance, or provocation: and then it is not a sin against the Holy Spirit: and such was that of that Israelite, who perhaps repented between the blows of the stones: and then by the merit of patience the sin was remitted to him.

§ 38. Also other authorities, etc. This is the second part, and it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he posits objections, and in the second the solution, there, C, To these it can be responded, etc.

Articulus 8 — Whether Without Faith Any Punishment Is Satisfactory

Whether without faith any penalty is satisfactory?

§ 39. But a doubt occurs concerning this which he says in the first part, there, B, § 2, in the text of Ambrose: Second, through punishment: where even if faith is lacking, etc.

§ 40. For against is that of the Apostle, to Rom. xiv, 23: All that is not from faith, is sin. And, to Heb. xi, 6: Without faith it is impossible to please God. Perhaps it is also necessary to displease: therefore it seems, that without faith penalty is not satisfactory.

§ 41. SOLUTION. There is an equivocation in faith: because faith is a virtue by which invisible things are believed on account of the first truth: and he is not speaking of this here.

Faith again is a certain credulity of reason concerning something apprehended, according to what the Philosopher says in III De Anima, that opinion aided by reasons becomes faith: and thus it is accustomed to be said, that faith is of something opined or known: and thus Ambrose speaks here. Whence the sense is: If faith, that is, conscience of the crime is lacking, because no one understands crimes: penalty satisfies, because such things God either piously indulges by the patience of penalties, or reveals to be confessed.

§ 42. TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said, that the sense of the authority of the Apostle is: All that is not from faith, that is, against faith, is sin: because he who acts against conscience, builds to Gehenna.

§ 43. To the other two it must be said, that he speaks of faith as a virtue.

Articulus 9 — Whether One Satisfying In Mortal Sin Has Satisfied

Whether one satisfying in mortal sin has satisfied?

§ 44. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, § 2, at the end: This seems far from reason, and the custom of the Church: which for the same sin, unless it is reiterated, imposes penance on no one twice.

§ 45. For it seems, that the Church does not enjoin another penance on him just as these also say.

§ 46. 1. For let us posit, that a priest has enjoined upon someone, that he should go beyond the sea, or that he should give a hundred marks of silver: and he completes the journey, or gives the silver in mortal sin, the Church does not enjoin upon him that he should do this again: therefore he himself is absolved: therefore he has fulfilled the penance: therefore he was not bound to do this in charity.

§ 47. 2. Also, the precepts of God do not include grace, as many say: because there is not commanded except the act: therefore the priest does not intend, that he fulfill the penance existing in charity: if therefore not existing in charity he fulfills this, he will seem to be absolved.

§ 48. SOLUTION. We believe, that if anyone existing in sin, pays what is enjoined, it is not necessary, that after he has repented, he pay again: but nevertheless it is necessary that he be contrite, and confess, and satisfy concerning that which he did not do enjoined in that mode in which he ought. Therefore he has not properly satisfied, as it seems: because contrition and satisfaction respect the dimission of sin as to the essence, for which dimission a man ought to be made pleasing to God: and therefore they cannot be done without charity: but they differ, because contrition not only is done in charity, but from charity, since through it fault is deleted, to the deletion of which the motion of free choice informed by grace is required. But although it is necessary that satisfaction be in charity, nevertheless it is not necessary that it always be done from charity. But confession does not respect the dimission of sin per se, but only the disposition to the dimission of fault, because it is made to the minister of the Church, that he may know how great and what is the fault, so that thus he may enjoin the due penalty. Therefore existing in sin he can pay the debt, but not satisfy: because payment only respects the quantity of the debt, but satisfaction respects this, and further says that it be done according to the will of the good pleasure of him to whom it is done.

§ 49. C. How are the premises to be accepted?

§ 50. To these it can be responded thus, That of Gregory: The Lord rains, etc., is to be referred not to the pardon of the crime, but to the desertion of the depraved work: so that therefore a part of the city is said to be rained upon, because from the act and delight of sin to which it formerly served, it now ceases: not that it has its pardon. And that rain is called such continence by which he is revoked from the work of sin: because from the fount of God's grace this is instilled into the heart, that either thus gradually he may come to penance: or thereby he may be less punished by God who by a longer delight and act of sin would have accumulated a greater torment for himself. But if the rain is referred to the indulgence of guilt, it will seem to be contrary to the Evangelical sentence[516]. For if on account of the unmercifulness by which someone does not show mercy to his neighbor, even the things which were dismissed, are replicated to penalty: much more the things which are not yet dismissed on account of fraternal hatred are proved to be reserved to penalty. And if he who is constituted the arbiter of his own will, cannot begin a new life, as Augustine says, unless he repents of the old life: how will he arrive at the newness of indulgence, who has not laid aside the oldness of hatred?

§ 51. Also that which Ambrose says: And if faith is lacking, penalty satisfies, etc., is not understood of the faith, by which it is believed in God, but of the conscience of the crime. For faith is lacking, when the conscience of sin is not underneath. For since no one understands all crimes, there is sometimes in a man a sin of which he does not have conscience. Whence the Apostle: I am conscious to myself of nothing, but I am not justified in this[517]. When therefore anyone is scourged for a sin of which he is not conscious, if he patiently bears the penalty and humbly embraces it, thinking that perhaps he has a sin which he does not understand, and for it is punished by God, that penalty satisfies and relieves the burdened. But to this which is objected concerning that satisfaction: if there was not satisfaction, it is to be imposed again. But if it is not to be imposed again, there was satisfaction: and if there was satisfaction, he obtained pardon. It can be responded that there was therefore not satisfaction, because he did not do worthy fruits of penance. For the satisfaction of penance is, as Augustine says, to cut out the causes of sins, and not to indulge an approach to their suggestions. Also, Indeed those who live wickedly, and do not care to correct such a life and morals, and among their very crimes do not cease to frequent alms: in vain therefore do they flatter themselves, because the Lord says: Give alms: and behold all things are clean to you[518]. For they do not understand how widely this extends. For there are many genera of alms: which when we do, we are aided. Not only he who gives food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, and such things: but also he who gives pardon to the one asking, gives an alms: and he who emends by a blow him over whom power is given or coerces by some discipline, or prays that a sin be dismissed to him, gives an alms: because he provides mercy. For many things are well provided to the unwilling, when their utility and not their will is consulted: but that is greater by which from the heart we dismiss what anyone has sinned against us. For it is less great to be benevolent towards him who has done you no evil. That is much grander that you also love your enemy, and to him who wishes you evil, and if he can does it, you always wish good and do what you can. What therefore the Lord says: Give alms; and all things are clean to you: are we to understand it thus, that to those not believing in Christ all things are clean, if they give those alms? For he who wishes to give alms ordinately, ought first to begin from himself, and give it first to himself. For alms is a work of mercy: and it is most truly said,

Have mercy on your soul pleasing God[519]. Let them not therefore deceive themselves, who by the most lavish alms of their fruits or money estimate that they buy impunity, remaining in sins: which they so love, that they opt to converse in them. But he who loves iniquity, hates his own soul and he who hates his own soul, is not merciful to it, but cruel. For by loving it according to the world, he hates it according to God. If therefore he wishes to give it an alms through which it is made clean, let him hate it according to the world, and love it according to God. By this alms, which a man first owes to himself, the interior things are cleansed. Exhorting to which Christ says: Cleanse the things which are within. For to the unclean nothing is clean: but their mind and conscience are polluted, as the Apostle says[520]. But all are unclean, whom faith does not cleanse, by which it is believed in Christ: concerning which it is written, Cleansing their hearts by faith[521]. But lest Christ should seem to reject those alms which are made from the fruits of the earth: These, He says, it behoved to do, namely judgment, and the charity of God: and not to omit those[522], that is, the alms of earthly fruits.

§ 52. From these things it is given to be understood, that those remaining in mortal sin, although they do lavish alms, nevertheless do not satisfy through them: because they act inordinately, while they do not begin from themselves. Nor is such a work properly called an alms, while to themselves they exist cruel, not pleasing God. Therefore that is not to be called the satisfaction of sin, which anyone does for one sin, while he perdures in another. Because it profits nothing to fast, and pray, and do other goods, unless the mind is revoked from sin: and if sometimes converted he has confessed a silent sin to a priest, for both satisfaction must be imposed upon him: because for the first he did not satisfy condignly.

Divisio Textus

§ 53. To these it can be responded, etc. Here he begins to solve. And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which he solves according to his own opinion: but in the second according to the opinion of others, in which nevertheless he seems to have been. Thirdly, he confirms the solution by authorities, there, F, I judge it enough, etc.

§ 54. And the subdivision of these parts is clear per se.

§ 55. But here fall useful and many questions.

516. Matt. 18:35.

Articulus 10 — Whether One Making Satisfaction Needs Grace That Makes One Pleasing In Order To Satisfy

Whether one satisfying needs making-pleasing grace that he may satisfy?

§ 56. The first question is concerning this which he says, there, C, § 4, after the beginning: Because from the fount of God's grace this is instilled into the heart, etc.

§ 57. 1. For it seems from this that grace or a drop of grace is in the sinner, still existing in sin: and since having grace he can satisfy, it seems, that the one satisfying does not need making-pleasing grace to this end that he may satisfy.

§ 58. 2. Also, This seems from a simile, that even without grace he can do this: because if anyone ought to satisfy a man for an injury, and there is enjoined upon him exile, or fasting, or some such thing: it is not required whether in a state of grace he pays the penalty, or not, provided that he pays it: therefore it seems, that similarly it is to be satisfied to God.

§ 59. 3. Also, Restitution is a part of satisfaction, and it can be done even in a state of mortal sin: therefore also satisfaction.

§ 60. But that restitution can be done in a state of mortal sin, is proved, Luke xix, 8, of Zacchaeus who says: If I have defrauded anyone of anything, I restore fourfold: therefore he seems to have the proposition.

§ 61. 4. Also, Levit. xxv, 25: If thy brother being impoverished sell his little possession, etc. And it follows, vv. 26 and 27: But if he have no near kinsman, and he himself can find the price to redeem it, the fruits shall be counted from that time in which he sold it. But according to the Interlinear [Gloss] there, the little possession is conversation, which is sold to the devil when a man mortally sins: and the fruits of satisfaction will be counted from that time in which he sold it, that is, from that time in which he mortally sinned: therefore satisfaction made in mortal sin, or with freely given grace only, seems to avail to the deletion of sin.

§ 62. BUT AGAINST: 1. It was held above, that dead works do not please God: and it does not happen to satisfy except through works pleasing to God: therefore it does not happen to satisfy through dead works: but outside of grace only dead works are done: therefore outside of grace no satisfactory works are done: therefore no satisfaction: therefore, etc.

§ 63. 2. Also, To satisfy is more than to merit: because to merit names only a work worthy of eternal life, and to satisfy names this and the payment of the debt of penalty: but it does not happen to merit, which is less, without grace: therefore also it does not happen to satisfy, which is more, without grace.

§ 64. SOLUTION. This question was almost determined, where it was inquired concerning works done outside charity, whether they can be works of penance: and therefore here is supposed what was said there, namely that works of penance, just as also the rest of works in which the placation of God is sought, are done according to the divine will and acceptation: but the acceptation of God is not in us from us, nor in our work from us, or from our work, but rather from that which we have received from Him: and this is making-pleasing [grace]: and therefore it is necessary that such works be done in making-pleasing grace.

§ 65. IT MUST BE SAID therefore to the first, that the cessation from the act of sin, proceeds from servile fear which is a gift of the Holy Spirit, and therefore it is called an instillation from the fount of grace: and nevertheless servile fear is not making-pleasing grace, but a certain disposition to it.

§ 66. To another it must be said, that without grace it does not happen to satisfy, and it is not similar: because it is said, 1 Kings xvi, 7: Man sees those things that appear, but the Lord beholds the heart: and therefore to man it happens to satisfy according to the face, but not to God, unless the heart of the one satisfying is reconciled to God.

To the other it must be said that restitution is not an essential part of satisfaction, but is pre-required by way of a foundation. Hence, since restitution is concerning those things which are done to a man, who judges according to the face, it is not always necessary that it be done in charity. Alternatively, it can also be said, and it is another reason for the same thing, that restitution is not made except in the taking away of corporal things, and since the act is simply corporal, not spiritual, it is not necessary for such an act to be done in charity.

To the last it must be said that it is not understood that the fruit is computed from the time at which he sinned, but rather thus: from the day on which he sold, that is, on which it was last in a state of sale. But it was last in a state of selling when he was last in sin, after which time he was not in sin: because then he was beginning to be converted: so that, namely, the preposition, when it is said from the day, notes the terminus outside, not inside. And then it is clear that it does not follow that he can satisfy while remaining in mortal sin.

Must anyone who has offended satisfy?

Articulus 11 — Whether It Is Necessary That Whoever Has Sinned Should Satisfy

Must anyone who has offended satisfy?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says there, chapter C, §2: For the satisfaction of penance is, as Augustine says, to cut off the causes of sins, etc.

And here three things are inquired, namely: whether it is fitting to satisfy? Secondly, concerning the definition of satisfaction laid down here. Thirdly, how the work of satisfaction differs from the other parts of penance, namely the work of confession, and of compunction?

To the first one proceeds thus: 1. Satisfying is measured against the other to which the satisfaction is terminated: which is clear: because he who satisfies the injured party measures what he does against the quantity of the injury which he inflicted, and similarly he who satisfies the one who suffered damage. And in the same way he who satisfies the Creator. Therefore, satisfying is nothing unless an equal is paid to the damage or injury: but no one can pay an equal to the injury and ingratitude to God which he inflicts by sinning: therefore no one can satisfy.

1. Also, he is more bound to satisfy who injures the majesty of a king or prince, than he who injures his equal: therefore infinitely more bound is he who offends an infinitely higher majesty than is that of a king or prince: but anyone sinning mortally offends an infinitely higher majesty than is that of a king or prince: therefore he is bound infinitely: but it is established that he cannot pay an infinite amount: therefore he cannot satisfy.
2. Also: All our justices are as the rag of a menstruous woman. Therefore they are not satisfactory: and we cannot satisfy otherwise than by works of justice: therefore since we do not have them, it seems that we cannot satisfy.
3. Also, if someone has two reasons of debt, namely that he is a slave who can possess nothing except in the name and right of the lord, and so has contracted a loan from the same, or from another: if all that he has he must pay for one reason of debt, he cannot pay the other debt: but thus it is of any man: because he himself from the condition of nature owes to God whatever he is, and whatever he is able: therefore for sins he does not have what he may render: but every one satisfying must render something: therefore it happens to no man to satisfy for sins.

ON THE CONTRARY 1. Take away all iniquity, receive the good: and we will render the calves of our lips. Therefore it happens that one can satisfy.

1. Also: Have patience with me, and I will render all to thee.

SOLUTION. It must be said that satisfaction is twofold, namely according to the equivalent of right, and according to the arbitration of him to whom the injury was done. Concerning the first satisfaction, it does not happen that God is satisfied by any pure creature: but concerning the second it happens, because it happens to pay God for sin what He exacts from us. Hence: What worthy thing shall I offer to the Lord, etc.? And it follows: I will show thee, O man, what is good, and what, etc.

And through this the solution is clear to the two reasons first introduced, which proceed as if satisfaction for sins were according to the equivalent of right which measures between the damage inflicted, or between the injury of the patient and the agent.

To the other it must be said that our justices are considered in two ways, namely in comparison to us, and in comparison to the informing grace which we have from God. And in the first way, humbling himself, Isaiah says that all our justices are as the rag of a menstruous woman, because our defects are many. But in the second way considered, our works are accepted by God.

519. Eccli. 30:24.

To the other it must be said that although we owe all that we are and can do by reason of our condition, nevertheless God does not exact all this from us which we owe by strict right: and therefore according to His arbitration we can satisfy even for sins.

Is the definition of satisfaction good?

Articulus 12 — Whether The Definition Of Satisfaction Is Good

Is the definition of satisfaction good?

Secondly, it is inquired concerning the definition posited here.

And it is inquired first, what is meant here by to cut off the causes of sins?

1. For Augustine says that sin does not have a cause, and of that which does not have a cause, it does not happen that its cause is cut off: therefore there seems to be nothing which is said in the Letter.
2. Also, Dionysius: Sin is uncaused and involuntary and unfruitful and lazy. And from this follows the same thing as before.
3. Furthermore, if no force is applied to this, but it is said that the deficient will is the cause of sin: it seems that still what he says is nothing: because to satisfy is an act and work of the one satisfying: but the cutting off of the deficient will is not the work of satisfaction, but of God alone, whose it is to convert the will: therefore to satisfy is not to cut off the causes of sins.
4. Also, the cause of sin is that which holds sin in the soul: therefore it is more strongly adhering than the sin itself: but sin is not loosed except by God: therefore neither is the cause of sin: therefore this is not the work of the one satisfying.
5. Also, this cause which is cut off is the cause of sin: but Boethius says that a cause is that to whose being another follows: therefore with the cause of sin existing in the soul, sin exists in the same: but it does not happen that he satisfies who is in sin, as was held before: therefore it does not happen that he satisfies who is in the cause of sin: therefore it does not happen that the one satisfying cuts off the causes of sins.
6. Also, this cause of sins which is to be cut off, of which the definition speaks: either it is conjoined, or remote. If it is conjoined: then with the cause existing, sin is present in the soul, as has just been proved. If remote: but this is the natural will of man, or the free choice flexible to evil: therefore it happens that the natural will is cut off through the work of satisfaction, which is altogether absurd.
7. Furthermore, by another way of disputing it seems that the definition is badly handed down: because satisfaction regards the lesion or injury inflicted on another: therefore it ought to be defined by comparison to that injury to be restored through the rigor of right or the arbitration of the will of him to whom the injury was inflicted: but this is not done here, but rather it is defined according to that which the penitent does in satisfaction: therefore it is badly defined.

8. Furthermore, the cause of sin in man is the fomes [tinder of sin]: and that is not extinguished in this life: therefore it does not happen that the causes of sins are cut off: but it happens that one satisfies, as was held before: therefore to satisfy is not to cut off the causes of sins.

Further it is inquired concerning the other part of the definition which he posits, when he says: Nor to indulge access to their suggestions.

1. For since satisfaction is for past sin: but the access of suggestion is expected in the future, it seems that this second thing is not of the essence of satisfaction: therefore it is badly posited in its definition.
2. Also, suggestion seems to be the same as the cause of sin: therefore the same thing is posited twice in the same definition.
3. Also, from this last part there seems to follow an error which is condemned in the preceding definition, namely that he who gives access to the suggestion of sin does not satisfy: but he who after penance falls into sin gives access to the suggestion of sin: therefore he does not satisfy: therefore he does not repent: because satisfaction is a part of penance.
4. Further it is inquired, because Anselm seems to give another definition of satisfaction in the book Cur Deus homo, speaking thus: To satisfy God is to render due honor. Therefore it seems that it is badly defined here.
5. Also, concerning Anselm's definition it is objected, because it is not convertible: for it is established that an innocent person keeping the commandments of God renders due honor to God: and yet he does not satisfy: therefore Anselm's definition is not good.
6. Furthermore, it is said that it belongs to magnanimity to render honor to oneself and to others: therefore this is not of satisfaction.
7. Also, it is said that honor is sought on account of virtue, and chiefly from those who know the virtue of him whom they honor: therefore it is also rendered in testimony of virtue: but satisfaction is a recompense for sin: therefore it seems that it is badly defined by the rendering of honor.

SOLUTION. It must be said that satisfaction can be defined in three ways, namely according to its substance, so that satisfaction is a recompense for damage or injury inflicted according to judgment and the order of right, or the arbitration of him to whom the injury is inflicted.

It is also defined sometimes according to what is a part of the sacrament of penance, which is the medicine for actual sin: and thus it is defined by the medicament of the wound which it makes in the one satisfying, and this is its proper definition in this treatise: and therefore it is so defined in the Letter. For the wound is healed through this, that the causes of sins are cut off, and access is not further indulged to suggestion: and therefore that definition is introduced here in this way.

Thirdly, it is defined in comparison to the end: for since we can neither injure nor damage God, by sinning we withdraw the honor due to Him: and to this end we satisfy, that the honor due to Him and previously withdrawn may be restored: and thus it is defined by Anselm: and from that definition is extracted, as it were, the truth of this whole question.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the cause of sin is said to be collected from three things, namely from concupiscence kindled by the act and custom of sin, and the relics of past sin, and the occasions of sinning, such as place, society, time, and the like. For the will affected by these three sins, although not necessarily: because it cannot be forced, as will immediately be clear below in this same solution . But what Augustine says, that sin does not have a cause, is to be understood of an efficient cause, which univocally or equivocally by acting would give it essence in that it is evil, just as we see a hot thing when it heats, by a univocal action, gives its essence according to the same species to the heated thing: and a hot thing when it dries, by extracting moisture, by an equivocal action induces aridity, which is a certain essence. But privations do not have essences. Hence nothing is the efficient cause of blindness: because blindness, since it is not any essence, receives essence from nothing: and so it is concerning evil in that it is evil, and concerning sin in that it is sin. But nevertheless the act of sin under deformity has a cause partly efficient, and partly deficient, as is noted above according to the second book of the Sentences. But this cause, conjoined with the three said things, is inclined to a mutable good, and consequently is turned away from God, and thus is made the cause of sins.

Through this the solution to the second is clear.

To the other it must be said that God alone, by aversion from fault, converts the will: but nevertheless it still remains bound by the forenamed three: and these are loosed by satisfaction through the custom of good.

To the other it must be said that the cause is twofold, namely that which is by way of privation of form: because sin does not have a formal cause insofar as it is sin: and this is the aversion of the will from the incommutable good: and this God cuts off. But the aforesaid causes which are by way of inclining things, and as it were certain infirmities left behind from sin, are rather punishments, and not causes: and therefore man can cut those off.

To the other it must be said that the saying of Boethius is understood of a true cause: but sin does not truly have a cause: but there are certain things inclining to it, and those are broadly called a cause here.

And through this the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said that it is not understood of a conjoined and proper cause, but rather of a remote one: and this is twofold, namely the most remote, and this is the will alone:

522. Luke 11:42.

and the nearer, and this is the will affected and inclined by the three which have been stated. And therefore those, through the contrary custom of good, are to be cut off by satisfaction.

To the other it must be said that satisfaction is defined here as it is a medicinal part of the Sacrament of penance: and the reason for this was stated above: but in the way the objection proceeds, it is to be defined by laws, or an ethicist, or a politician: but this is a sign, that the work of satisfaction is enjoined through the contrary of that by which the occasion of sin was greater in the sinner, such as fasting for the lustful, prayer for the proud, and almsgiving for the avaricious: because, as Bede says, what heals the heel does not heal the eye, nor conversely.

To the other it must be said that although the fomes could not be cut off in its entirety in this life, it can nevertheless be weakened and put to sleep: and this suffices for cutting off.

To that which is further inquired concerning the second part of the definition, it must be said that although the sin of which the suggestion is made is future, nevertheless the cause drawing to it is present in the subject, and this regards satisfaction, as was said.

Or it may be better said that not to indulge access to suggestion refers to the foundation of satisfaction: and this according to a proposition, so that, namely, he does not further propose to consent to the devil: and according to this it is posited in the definition of satisfaction: because, as Gregory says, just as all medicaments avail nothing for healing a wound as long as the iron remains infixed, unless it is extracted: so all benefits will profit nothing unless the sin itself is relinquished. Hence it falls into the definition of satisfaction just as penance does: because without it there cannot be satisfaction, although it is not of its substance.

To the other it must be said that suggestion refers to the demon, but the cause of sin to the man, according to the three drawing things which were stated above. For just as Augustine says: Sin is sometimes from the flesh, and sometimes from man: and thus it is clear that sin, and suggestion, and the cause of sin are not the same.

To that which is objected concerning Anselm, the solution is clear, how the difference of the definitions is to be taken.

But to that which is objected against Anselm's definition, it must be said that debt is manifold, but here we distinguish a threefold debt. Namely, debt from something committed: just as a receiver of God's gifts owes it to gain with them and bring back gain from them. There is also a debt from something remitted, just as he is a debtor to whom much is remitted: just as it is said: Many sins are forgiven her, because she hath loved much. The third is debt from sin: and this as if from damage inflicted: and this is the debt by which the penitent is bound in satisfaction: and in such a signification it is taken in Anselm's definition: and therefore not everyone keeping the commandments renders debt to God in this respect.

To the other it must be said that magnanimity in this way in which it is simply, rather attends to honor by which virtue is worthy: but just restitution attends to honor insofar as it restores the perdition of honor through sin.

To the other it must be said that honor is owed by the honorer to virtue and the virtuous person: and therefore from us it is owed to God: nevertheless this exhibition of honor also has the character of satisfaction, insofar as it is commanded by justice, which is directive of damage or injury inflicted, of which the Philosopher speaks.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

How does the work of satisfaction differ from the other works of penance?

Expositio Textus

§ 4. Exposition of the Text

Exposition of the text.

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says there, chapter C, § 2, in the middle: Give alms, and behold all things are clean unto you, etc.

For in this part is a great question concerning almsgiving, which we will divide into parts on account of the Letter.

And here we will inquire six articles, namely in what genus is almsgiving, what is it, and whether it is in precept or in counsel? Where it will also be determined to what precept it is reduced, and how it is distinguished from the other parts of satisfaction: and whether it consists more in the interior will, or in the exterior gift, or in the quantity of the exterior gift? And sixth, whether almsgiving can be without compassion, or whether compassion is essential to it? For these six are inquired concerning almsgiving in itself.

But afterwards proceeding in the Letter we will inquire concerning almsgiving according to three other considerations, namely on the part of the giver, and of the gift, and of him to whom it is to be given.

Is almsgiving in the genus of virtue?

Articulus 13 — How The Work Of Satisfaction Differs From The Other Works Of Penance

How does the work of satisfaction differ from the other works of penance?

Thirdly it is inquired: How does the work of satisfaction differ from the other works of penance, namely of confession and compunction?

For it seems that in nothing. 1. For each of these three satisfies for sin: therefore each of these three is a work of satisfaction.

1. Also, Augustine, and it is found below in the Letter: He has offered much satisfaction who, mastering his shame, denied nothing of the things he did to the messenger of God. Therefore confession is not distinguished from satisfaction, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that satisfaction here is not called every thing that looses guilt in some way, or the penalty due to guilt: but that only which is enjoined and taxed by the power of the keys, and by the arbitration of the priest: for that penalty is simply voluntary, and ordained according to the quantity of the offense. But in contrition and confession there are penalties, namely sorrow in contrition, and shame in confession, which are penalties inflicted from corrupt nature for sin, nor are they taxed, nor limited according to a certain time, but the greater they are, the better it is: provided the service is discreet and reasonable. Therefore although sin is expiated through them, nevertheless they are not properly satisfactory according to the judgment and arbitration of the forum of confession. And therefore this part which is satisfaction is distinguished from the others.

Furthermore, sorrow in the contrite and shame in the confessing declare nothing but an inward penalty: but in satisfaction it is outward in the conspectus of the Church: and therefore the whole man is then punished, because the interior penalty manifests itself in the exterior. And because the whole man then has a penalty, on account of this (as some say) it is more called satisfaction. But the first solution is better: because, as was held, satisfaction regards the judgment of the arbitration of the divine will.

Through this the response to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that the blessed Augustine broadly takes satisfaction for every penalty which is borne for sins, whether it is enjoined or not: but satisfaction properly taken is not accepted for such a penalty.

Articulus 14 — Whether Almsgiving Is In The Genus Of Virtue

Is almsgiving in the genus of virtue?

It is inquired therefore first concerning the genus of almsgiving, whether it is in the genus of virtue?

For it seems that it is: 1. For the Commentator says that the property of a virtue is that its act is worthy of praise: and this is drawn from the text: but the act of almsgiving is praiseworthy: therefore it is an act of virtue: therefore almsgiving is of some act of virtue.

1. Also, it has been accustomed to be said by all that the act of a virtue is that upon which a divine precept falls. And this from authority is held in the text and in the commentary, where it is distinguished between legal justice and the justice of the special virtue of justice. But it is established that the precept is concerning giving alms: therefore it is an act of some virtue.
2. Also, it is supposed by almost all that that which is meritorious is an act of some virtue: but it is established that the act of almsgiving is meritorious: therefore almsgiving is an act of some virtue.
3. Also, that which works towards the expulsion of a vice has contrariety to the vice: but almsgiving does this, as is said: therefore almsgiving has contrariety to vice, or to an act of vice: but nothing has contrariety of this kind except a virtue or an act of virtue: therefore almsgiving is an act of some virtue.

But against this it is objected thus: 1. Every gratuitous good and good of virtue has an exemplary virtue in God: but almsgiving does not have it: therefore almsgiving is not a work of any virtue. But the first is proved from this, that virtue is a most perfect good: and this is not to be taken away from the most perfect and highest good. But the second is proved from this, that in whom there is no passion, in him there is no compassion: and almsgiving is with compassion, as its name shows: and this is supposed, and is proved above. But in God there is neither passion nor compassion.

1. Also, there are three things in the soul, namely passions, potencies, and habits, as the Philosopher says. But virtue is in the genus of habit, and not of passion: therefore what is in the genus of passion is not a virtue: but compassion, from which proceeds the act by which almsgiving is denoted, is in the genus of passion, as its name shows: therefore almsgiving is the act of that passion: therefore it is not the act of any virtue.

But then it is further inquired concerning almsgiving in species, of what virtue is it said to be?

And it seems that it is of justice: because 1. Upon that: When thou dost an alms, etc., the Interlinear Gloss says: Almsgiving is a part of justice.

1. Also, everything satisfactory is reduced to the virtue to which it belongs to satisfy: but almsgiving is satisfactory, as is said in the Letter: therefore it is reduced to the virtue to which it belongs to satisfy: but this is justice: therefore almsgiving is an act of justice.

But against this it seems that it is an act of mercy, which is elicited from its name: because 1. It is said from eleos, which is mercy, or misery: because it makes another's misery its own. But this belongs to mercy: therefore almsgiving is an act of mercy.

1. Also, on that: He showeth mercy all the day, the Gloss says: Almsgiving begins from mercy, and afterwards opens the hand: therefore the mover to the act of almsgiving is mercy: therefore it is not an act of justice.

If you say that it is an act of both: because mercy is a part of justice: this does not seem so: because the beatitude of justice is sequestered from the beatitude of mercy. For He says afterwards, Blessed are the merciful: and earlier it is said, Blessed are they that hunger and thirst, etc. Therefore they are diverse virtues: therefore what is the act of one is not the act of the other.

But it seems to someone that it is an act of piety: because it is said that piety is profitable to all things. And it is expounded of almsgiving. Therefore since piety is neither mercy nor justice, it seems that almsgiving is neither an act of mercy nor of justice.

SOLUTION. It must be said that almsgiving is an act of the virtue which is mercy, as I think: although some say otherwise, whose reason I cannot understand.

To the first part of the question, therefore, it seems it must be responded that the first reasons conclude truth: although some have calumny as to their force of inferring: because it is not universally true that that which has praise is a work of virtue: but of this there will be another discourse.

But to that which is objected against, it must be said that virtues have an exemplar in God in diverse ways: for there is in virtue something perfect, and something imperfect, which belongs to virtue insofar as it is in an imperfect nature, and is evacuable from it when the imperfect nature passes to the state of perfection: as is clear in faith, in which the vision itself is perfect, but the mode of vision is imperfect, and it has an exemplar according to vision, and not according to a mirror and an enigma. So I say here that almsgiving and mercy, by reason of subvention of misery, have perfection: but they have compassion on the part of the deficient and passible nature which they perfect. And therefore according to the reason of subvention they have an exemplar, because God chiefly comes to the aid of the miserable, but not by reason of compassion, which does not befit a most perfect nature. And this is what our ancient Doctors said, that mercy in God sounds an effect, not an affect.

To the other it must be said that although virtue is not a passion, but a habit, nevertheless moral virtue is about passions or operations, as the Philosopher says. And therefore nothing prohibits an act of virtue from being in a passion, although the first motive is a habit. And so it seems it must be said here that there is a certain habit which moves to well-compassionating: and further to giving to him with whom we compassionate, which giving is with some passion, although it is not from it as from the first mover to the act.

To the second part of the question it must be said that it is a work of mercy: but just as we noted before in the preceding distinction, an act which is of one virtue per se and properly, which the ancient Masters call elicited, can be of another as commanding: and thus it can be of justice or piety. It will be of justice, indeed, as the giver gives from his superfluity, considering that he is rather the dispenser of the superfluity to the poor than its lord. And considering on the part of the poor person, that although he is poor in things, nevertheless he holds the place of Christ in receiving, who is the Lord of all: for then he gives as a dispenser to the poor person, who has the character of a patron in that he receives in the place of Christ: as is said: Amen I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me. But it puts on the character of piety when someone gives moved by this, that the poor person is in the same nature with us, or in the divine image, just as we are: because political piety is benevolence toward those who are joined by nature, as Tully says. But gratuitous piety is benevolence toward those who are marked with the same divine image with us.

And through this the solution to all the questions is clear.

Is almsgiving well defined?

Articulus 15 — Whether Almsgiving Is Well Defined

Is almsgiving well defined?

Secondly it is inquired, What is almsgiving?

But almsgiving has been accustomed to be defined by the Masters thus: Almsgiving is a work in which it is given to the indigent out of compassion for the sake of God.

But against the definition it is objected thus: No one gives to himself: but someone bestows almsgiving upon himself: therefore almsgiving is not a work in which it is given to the indigent. But the first is proved from the reason of giving. But the second is written: Have pity on thy own soul, pleasing God.[523] And by Gregory: He who wishes to have mercy on his neighbor, let him draw the origin of showing mercy from himself.

Also, it seems that almsgiving is not always a work. For sometimes someone does not have to give, and gives compassion: therefore it seems that then there is no work operated there: and this is called a work here: therefore almsgiving is not always a work, as it seems. But that a work operated is understood to be almsgiving is clear from the common usage of speakers, who call a thing accepted for the sake of God and out of indigence an alms.

Further it seems that it does not always proceed from compassion.

1. For it is said: God loveth a cheerful giver.[524] And he speaks of those giving alms: therefore it proceeds more from cheerfulness than from compassion: therefore also it is more to be defined by cheerfulness.
2. Also, let it be posited that someone indeed gives willingly, like a liberal or magnificent person, and yet does not have compassion. It is established that he gives to the indigent for the sake of God: therefore he gives almsgiving.

and nevertheless it does not proceed from compassion: therefore compassion is not the substance of almsgiving: therefore it ought not to be defined by it.

§ Again, an objection is raised regarding his saying, To one in need: for it is not always given to those in need, but also to others: as is clear in the case of clerics, who, needing nothing, nevertheless do not cease to accept alms, and contend that those givings are alms: therefore it seems that almsgiving is not always a giving which is made to one in need.

§ Furthermore, an objection is raised regarding his saying, For the sake of God. 1. For the end is not the essential cause of a thing: but for the sake of God names an end: therefore it does not name an essential cause: therefore it ought not to be posited in a definition. 2. Again, suppose that someone gives out of natural compassion; it is proved that that giving is almsgiving: because almsgiving (eleemosyna) is named from eleëmon, which is mercy or misery, which signifies passion or compassion on the part of the receiver, and on the part of the giver: but the whole of what is from this name is in this definition: Almsgiving is a giving which is made to one in need out of compassion: therefore what is added, for the sake of God, is superfluous.

§ Solution. It must be said that almsgiving is well defined in the aforesaid manner, according as it is properly taken. And it is the definition which is found in the writings of the learned Masters, who preceded us in this science.

§ For almsgiving is spoken of commonly and properly. Commonly, any subvention of a miserable person is called almsgiving: and thus a man, when he subvenes himself, does almsgiving, and also when he subvenes another in whatever manner. But properly, almsgiving is called the giving of some temporal or spiritual good, which is bestowed upon a neighbor in need for the sake of God, toward which compassion properly tends: because compassion is, as it were, a suffering with another (cum-alio-passio), as is said in Sirach: The compassion of man is toward his neighbor.[525]

§ Therefore it must be said to the first, that properly a man does not give to himself, nor does he bestow alms on himself.

§ To that, however, which is introduced to prove this from Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), it must be said that in that authority, and in the text of blessed Gregory, the order of the effects of mercy is touched upon: because just as charity has an order in its effect and affect, so also does mercy, namely, that one should not so attend to others as to neglect oneself: nevertheless, because almsgiving is a certain giving, which is not properly made to oneself, therefore almsgiving is properly made regarding a neighbor, and not regarding oneself, although in giving an order must be observed, that a man ought to prefer himself to a neighbor in need.

§ To the other it must be said, that almsgiving is properly a work operated (opus operatum), and not the one operating (operans). This is clear from a certain word which is written by the Philosopher at the beginning of the Ethics, where he distinguishes arts, on the grounds that in some the end is a work (opus), and in some an operation (operatio), as in musical arts: but in almsgiving the giving is not praised on account of the giver, but rather the given thing (datum): for it is not commanded on account of the operating work, but rather on account of the operated work.

§ To the opposite, however, against this, it must be said that he who wishes to give, and does not give, does not properly do almsgiving: but nevertheless he has the merit of one giving almsgiving on account of his complete will: as is said in 2 Corinthians: For if the will be forward, it is accepted according to that which a man hath, not according to that which he hath not.[526]

§ To this, however, which is further objected against what is said out of compassion, it must be said that almsgiving is always out of a compassion for misery which moves one to give: but there is a highly sensible compassion, and a compassion of the will, namely the willing that one not be miserable, or a dissent from the misery which the poor man suffers.

§ To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this cheerfulness is understood as that which does not take away sorrow from the giver through greed for the thing given: for there are greedy persons in whom the sorrow of alienating the given thing takes away compassion; and there are those in whom the sorrow of alienating fights with compassion, but nevertheless compassion conquers: and there are those in whom sorrow is not felt on account of compassion: and these are the most praiseworthy, who even rejoice in giving: and of these the Apostle speaks. Hence cheerfulness is a good condition of the giver: it is not, however, of the substance of almsgiving properly speaking.

§ To the other it must be said, that the work of a liberal or magnificent man is not properly almsgiving, although they discern to whom it should be given, and when, and how much, as is said in IV Ethics: because they do not attend to nor measure the given thing according to the

523. Ecclesiasticus 30:24.

exigency (need) and for the sake of God: hence I well concede, that one giving in this way does not do almsgiving except materially speaking.

§ To the other it must be said, that alms are given to clerics as to ministers of the poor, and dispensers of alms: and therefore what is given to them, is sent through them to the poor: but they themselves should see to it that they dispense it faithfully.

§ To the other it must be said, that it is one way in moral acts, and another in other things: for in other things the end is sometimes not of the essence, but in moral matters the denomination is principally from the end, and therefore it is of the essence.

§ To the other it must be said, that he who does not give for the sake of God, does not merit, and therefore he does not give alms properly: because almsgiving is a meritorious work of eternal life, if it is done in charity: or of nearness to grace, if it is done in mortal sin, as will be a question in this same distinction, when it will be treated, for what purpose works done in mortal sin are valid. It is nevertheless a praiseworthy work to give even out of natural compassion, and it signifies a nature easily inclinable to the good.

Articulus 16 — Whether Almsgiving Is Of Precept Or Counsel, And, If Of Precept, Under Which Precept

Whether almsgiving is a matter of precept, or of counsel? And, if of precept, under which one?

§ Thirdly, it is asked, whether it is in precept, or in counsel?

§ And here we will ask three things at once, namely whether it is in precept, and in which precept, and how it obliges?

§ But it seems that it is in precept. 1. Luke: But yet that which remaineth, give alms: and behold, all things are clean unto you. There the Gloss says: That which remains over and above necessary food and clothing, give to the poor, or I give counsel, etc. Therefore he wills that giving the superfluous is a precept.

1. Again, Matthew: But when thou dost alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth, the Gloss says: To the conscience doing almsgiving for the sake of fulfilling a precept, the appetite for praise mixes itself. From this again it is accepted that it is a precept.
2. Again, Luke: He that hath two coats, let him give to him that hath none. Gloss: A precept is given concerning the dividing of two coats.
3. Again, Ambrose: Feed him who is dying of hunger: if you have not fed him, you have killed him. Therefore it is in precept.
4. Again, all that is in precept without which there is no salvation: but without the giving of alms for him who is able to give, there is no salvation: therefore giving for him who is able to give, is in precept. The proof of the middle premise. Gregory: He is convicted of loving his neighbor less, who does not share even those things which are necessary with him in necessity.

524. II Corinthians 9:7.

5. Again, 1 John: He that hath the substance of this world, etc.

6. Again, this is taken from Matthew, where the Lord, as the reason for the just condemnation of the wicked, alleges that they did not give alms; but a counsel not fulfilled does not condemn: therefore if almsgiving were merely in counsel, the Lord would not condemn the impious on account of the withholding of alms, as it seems.

7. Again, Isaiah: the Lord requires this from the people, saying: Deal thy bread to the hungry, etc. And He adds: Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall hear, and the like. But it is certain that if it were merely a counsel, it would not impede his being heard.

8. Again, Tobit enjoins this upon his son as necessary for salvation.

9. Again, Daniel says this is necessary for the king's repentance. Therefore it is of the things necessary for salvation: therefore it is in precept.

§ But on the contrary, it seems that it is only in counsel. 1. Luke: And the multitudes asked him, etc., where the interlinear Gloss says: Struck with terror by the words of John, they seek counsel: but John responded that they should attend to almsgiving: therefore he responded by counseling: therefore almsgiving is a counsel, as it seems.

1. Again, one's own property is justly possessed: therefore if it is retained, injury is done to no one: therefore neither to the poor man: therefore neither is anyone bound to give to the poor man by precept: therefore, etc.

§ Further it is asked, If it is in precept, under which precept does it fall?

§ But it seems that it falls under a negative one. 1. On account of the saying of Ambrose introduced above: Feed him who is dying of hunger, etc.: therefore it is reduced to the precept which is, Thou shalt not kill: therefore a negative one.

1. Again. Every illicit taking and retention is reduced to this precept, Thou shalt not steal: but not to give alms is an illicit retention: therefore it is reduced to that: but this is negative: therefore, etc.

§ But against this is the fact that 1. When it is said, Honor thy father and thy mother, Augustine says that by the name of parents the neighbor is here understood in general: and by honor three things are understood, namely reverence, and bodily subvention, and spiritual subvention. But almsgiving is the bodily or spiritual subvention of the neighbor: therefore it is reduced to that precept: and this is affirmative: therefore it is reduced to an affirmative precept.

1. Again, it is said by almost all, that negative precepts oblige always and for always (semper et ad semper): but to give alms does not oblige always and for always, but according to place and time: therefore it is not reduced to a negative precept.

525. Isaiah 64:6.

§ But then it is asked, How does this precept oblige?

§ For either it obliges then when signs appear that someone will fall into extreme necessity unless he is subvened: or then first when signs of extreme necessity appear. If in the first way: against this it seems to be, that in all poor people signs appear that they do not suffice for themselves: but these are signs of falling into extreme necessity: therefore all poor people must be subvened by anyone having something beyond what suffices for himself: and if he does not do so, it is a mortal omission, which is grave to say. If however in the second way: against this is, that a man is not in extreme necessity, except when he has nothing else he can do, if that one does not subvene him: and this never appears to anyone, because there is always such a probable state that if I do not subvene, nevertheless another will subvene: therefore it seems that that time will never be in which anyone is bound to subvene: and this is ridiculous to say.

§ Solution. It must be said that giving alms is considered in two ways, namely on the part of the giver, and of the receiver. On the part of the giver in two ways, namely by reason of superfluities, and by reason of necessities. If it is considered on the part of the giver by reason of superfluities, then it is a precept: if however on the part of the giver by reason of necessities, then it is a counsel.

§ But what things are superfluous, and what necessary, we say here briefly: because it will be in a question below, namely that superfluous things are those which being taken away, the house and family can still be conserved and the licit business and office of that person can be exercised: and this according to the estimation of a wise and good man. But necessary is that which being taken away, these things cannot be commodiously done.

§ Similarly on the part of the receiver it is considered in two ways. For either signs appear of his falling into extreme defect, unless one gives something, or not. If they appear, then it is a precept to give even from what is necessary. But I call necessary, as before, not that without which there is no life, but that without which the house cannot be commodiously maintained and the office congruous to the person exercised. If however such signs do not appear, then it is a counsel to give.

§ Therefore it must be said to the first to the contrary, that that interlinear authority concerning Luke does not prove that it is a counsel, except in a case, and concerning a certain kind of almsgiving, as has been said.

§ To that however which is further asked, To which precept is it reduced? whether to an affirmative, or to a negative?

§ It must be said, that it is reduced to an affirmative, and according as it is done from the superfluous, it is reduced to this precept, Thou shalt not steal. And according as it is taken on the part of the indigent in whom signs of indigence appear, it is reduced to this precept, Honor thy father and thy mother: because nothing prohibits the same thing from being reduced to different precepts according to different aspects.

526. Hosea 14:3.

§ To that however which is objected, that if it is reduced to a negative precept, that then it is negative: it must be said that this does not follow: just as this is not valid, this is reduced to the genus of substance: therefore it is in the genus of substance; or this is reduced to the genus of quantity: therefore it is quantity. For no precept is so negative that it does not have in itself an affirmative act, and certain consequent affirmations, just as thou shalt not steal has in itself the willing not to steal as an affirmative act, and the willing to possess and receive whatever is one's own as a consequent affirmation: and as to this consequent affirmation this precept concerning almsgiving is reduced to not stealing: because the superfluous is not ours, and we ought to will that the poor man receive what is his own.

§ To that however which is objected concerning Ambrose, it must be said that he himself speaks interpretatively, not properly. And the sense is: If you have not fed him, you have killed him, that is, by occasion it will be reputed to you as a fault, although not as great as it would be if he killed him by his hand: and this is so, because since he could prolong his life by giving, he did not do so.

§ To that however which is further asked concerning the mode of obligation: It must be said that it obliges when signs appear of falling into extreme necessity. But signs are of two kinds, as is said in another faculty: for some are proper, which convert with the cause and are immediate, from which sometimes even the demonstrator argues: and those are not to be expected, because such cannot appear concerning the future poverty of someone. But some signs are common, which probably argue such a future poverty, if I do not give something: such as that I see him to be in need, and others to be lazy to give. For these ought to suffice especially for giving from the superfluous. Nevertheless, all things which ought to be said concerning these signs, I do not think anyone knows, except him whom the unction teaches concerning all things. For I know that some wish to be excused from the poor, seeing that they are tramps (trutanni), feigning a poverty greater than they suffer: and let those hear John Chrysostom speaking thus on John, in Homily 76, in the moral part of that homily: "How is it not unfitting for us indeed, laughing, to sit at the table and enjoy pleasures: but others, passing through the crossroads, we hear howling, and we do not turn our attention to the howling, but bear it ill, and call him a deceiver. What are you saying, O man, does anyone deceive for the sake of one loaf of bread? Why not, you say? Because of this, therefore, this necessity is to be removed. But if you do not wish to give, neither should you hurl insults. If you do not wish to solve the shipwreck, do not push him into the abyss."

Articulus 17 — Whether Almsgiving Is A Part Of Satisfaction

Whether almsgiving is a part of satisfaction?

§ Fourthly it is asked, How is it distinguished from other parts of satisfaction?

§ And by reason of this, two things are asked here, which must be determined at the same time, namely whether it is a part of satisfaction? and if it is, how is it distinguished from the others?

§ But it seems that it is not: because 1. Satisfaction respects a preceding sin, nor is anyone bound to satisfy unless he has sinned: but a man is bound to almsgiving, even when he has not sinned: therefore almsgiving is not an essential part of satisfaction. The first is proved from the rationale and definition of satisfaction, posited above in the text. But the second is proved from things previously held: because almsgiving is done from the superfluous, and it is in precept even for him who has not sinned, and is not bound to satisfy.

1. Again, Matthew: This kind of demons, etc., the Gloss of Jerome says: By fasting the plague of the body is healed, by prayer the plague of the mind. But there are no plagues to be healed except of the mind and the body. Therefore it seems that almsgiving does not heal any plague: but every part of satisfaction ought to heal some plague: therefore almsgiving is not a part of satisfaction.
2. Again, that is not an essential part of something, without which the thing can be according to its substance and effect: but it happens that satisfaction is made for sin, and satisfaction exists without almsgiving: therefore almsgiving is not a substantial part of satisfaction. The first is evident per se. The second is proved in those for whom in the sole contrition of heart sin and penalty are remitted, as for Mary Magdalene.
3. Again, it is not a general part, which cannot be in every satisfaction: but almsgiving cannot be in the satisfaction of a poor man, because he has nothing to give: therefore it is not a part of satisfaction.

§ But against this is what is said in Tobit: Prayer is good with fasting and alms: where the Gloss says, that prayer has wings, fasting and almsgiving: therefore just as a bird is elevated by its wings, so is prayer by fasting and almsgiving: therefore without almsgiving it is not valid.

§ Solution. It seems to me that it must be said in this question with a distinction, namely that there is almsgiving from the superfluous, and this is not essentially a part of satisfaction: but it is pre-required for it like a foundation, and it has the act of satisfaction in another, because the poor man whom it respects prays for him, and satisfies, and sometimes obtains first grace for the giver, if the poor man to whom it is given is in charity. There is also almsgiving which is from the necessary: and this is an essential part of satisfaction: and I call necessary, not that without which a man cannot live, because this no one ought to subtract from himself, but rather that which by the estimation of the wise is conceded to him to have for the dispensation of his house, and can be repaired by the industry of a businessman or daily revenues.

§ To this however which is objected first, it must be said that he who is without sin is bound to the first kind of almsgiving, and not to the second.

§ To the other it must be said, that there is a conjoined healing agent, which is conjoined with the disease in the subject: and that Gloss touches upon these healing agents: because prayer humbles the spirit, and fasting attenuates the body: hence those two heal plagues on the part of the one sinning. But one must moreover have healing agents on the part of the occasions of sinning: and these are the principal goods conceded to infirmity: and by communicating these, almsgiving heals plagues of mind and body: because both are occasioned from them.

§ To the other it must be said, that in almsgiving there are two things, as will be evident below. One is the will of communicating oneself and one's goods to the indigent poor of the Church: and on that part it altogether has the force of merit, when that will is through grace making pleasing (gratia gratum faciens). And the other is the given thing itself: and this sometimes is not had. And it must be said, that the first makes almsgiving to be a part, when it is perfect: and without that part there is no satisfaction.

§ And through this the solution to the following is also evident: because every man can give this almsgiving: and it is called by the Apostle, in Romans, communicating to the necessities of the Saints.

Articulus 18 — How Almsgiving Is Distinguished From The Other Parts Of Satisfaction

How is almsgiving distinguished from other parts of satisfaction?

§ Then it is asked secondly next to that, how almsgiving is distinguished from other parts of satisfaction?

§ But it seems that it is in no way regarding satisfaction: because 1. The parts of satisfaction satisfy through this that they are penal: therefore it seems that all three convene in the ratio of penalty, and are not distinguished except materially.

1. Again, over that in Luke: Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of penance, the Gloss says: To give alms is a part of penance. And it is certain that it is not a part of contrition or of confession: therefore of satisfaction.

§ And again they are not parts of penance except by reason of penalty: therefore it seems that these three parts convene in this that they are certain penalties.

§ But against this is that 1. If they did not differ except according to the ratio of penalty, then there would be no reason why these three would be posited as parts of satisfaction, rather than others in which there is naturally a penalty: and this is not true.

1. Again, if one were multiplied, the penalty which is in it would be multiplied: therefore one alone could suffice for satisfaction, if it were commanded to be done many times.

§ To this some say, that in a homogeneous whole all parts are denominated by the name of the whole: and because satisfaction is, as it were, a homogeneous whole with respect to the parts, therefore each of them satisfies in the ratio by which satisfaction is a part of penance: and this is a certain penalty.

§ But against this, first, is that this solution in no way responds to the reasons introduced: hence this solution being given, the question still remains.

§ Again, because this solution seems to suppose a falsehood: because in a homogeneous whole the parts are of one name only, for every part of fire is fire, and is called fire: but here one part has a different name from another: therefore it seems that they are not parts of a homogeneous whole.

§ Solution. It seems it must be said to this, that those three parts of satisfaction are distinct: although they convene in this common aspect, which is to be penal: for the penalty of loss (poena damni) has one ratio of penalty, and the penalty of sense (poena sensus) another: and thus almsgiving in its species of penalty differs from the other parts of satisfaction.

§ Again, that which punishes a proud spirit has one ratio of affliction, and that which afflicts the body another: and thus fasting differs from prayer, even formally in the species of affliction, although they convene in genus.

§ And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

§ But if it is objected, that one of them without the other can satisfy: which would not be true, if they were integral parts: but if they are subjective parts, then all ought to convene in ratio and species.

§ It must be said that there are many genera of parts: hence it must be said, that these parts are by the mode of a potential whole: and although one alone can satisfy, nevertheless the others are in purpose and virtue: and there is there what is meritorious of them in this way which was said in the preceding article.

Articulus 19 — Whether Almsgiving Consists More In The Interior Will, Or In The External Gift

Whether almsgiving consists more in the interior will, or in the exterior given thing?

§ Fifthly it is asked, Whether it consists more in the interior will, or in the exterior given thing?

§ And it seems that it is in the interior will. 1. For exterior things are rooted in interior things, and from them have praise or blame: therefore since compassion is interior, and the given thing exterior, the given thing is praised according to the interior devotion and compassion, and not per se: therefore that which is interior is better than that which is exterior.

1. Again, Matthew: A good man out of a good treasure, namely of his heart, bringeth forth good things: therefore the treasure and cause of the good thing brought forth is in the heart: but the cause is always better and worthier than the effect: therefore the devotion and compassion of the giver, or the will, is better than the given thing itself.
2. Again, 2 Corinthians, over that: For this is profitable for you, etc., the Gloss says: I give you counsel, that you give alms to the poor: for this is profitable for you not only to do, but also to be willing, which is more than to do.
3. Again, the will is computed for the deed, even if it is without the work on account of impotence: but the deed without the will is never meritorious: therefore the will is better than the deed: therefore also concerning almsgiving the will is more attended to than the given thing.

4. Again, 2 Corinthians: He that had little, had no want, etc., the Gloss: He who gives much as a rich man, and he who gives little as a poor man, if the will is equal, they shall have an equal reward. Therefore it seems that the given thing itself contributes nothing or almost nothing to the ratio of merit.

5. Again, Luke, where it is read concerning the poor widow, who put two mites into the treasury, and the Lord praised her, that she had put in more than all: because the others out of their superfluity, but she out of her necessity, which showed greater devotion in the will.

6. Again, over that: They that sow in tears, the Gloss says: A great will gave much, sowed much. In this will also that widow who put in two mites, sowed not a little. And from this the same is accepted as before.

7. Again, it is commonly said, and it is a word of Augustine, that God does not attend to how much, but from how much it is given. Therefore since from how much is the same as from how great a will, it seems that the will is attended to simply, but the given thing only relatively (secundum quid), namely according as it proceeds from the will.

9. Again, poverty is praised in sacred Scripture, and riches are blamed: therefore it seems that in nothing should the condition of the rich man be better than that of the poor man: but if the substance of the merit of almsgiving were more attended to in the given thing than in the will, merit would be more in the faculty of the rich man than of the poor man: therefore the substance of the merit of a greater almsgiving is more in the will than in the given thing.

§ But on the contrary: 1. In the suffrages of the dead he is liberated more quickly for whom more things are done, as is said by all, and will be proved below: but for him who gives more, more things are done, than for him who wishes to give more, and does not have it: therefore it seems that the rich man is liberated more quickly than the poor man, even if in other things they are equal: and he is not liberated except on account of a more abundant merit: therefore it seems that there is more abundant merit in the given thing than in the will.

1. Again, enjoined penance is done according to the proportion of the sin. Therefore let there be two of equal will in penance, but of unequal sin, a discreet priest enjoins more alms to be given to the one sinning more, and enjoins less to the one sinning less: therefore the one giving more expiates the sin more with an equal will, than the one giving less: therefore it is of virtue in meriting: therefore merit is attended to in accordance with the given thing.

§ Solution. It must be said to this as before, that there is merit per se, and merit per accidens. Merit per se is what is for acquiring the good of grace and glory. But I say the gift of grace, as it is the augmentation of grace, and the perfection of grace: and not as it is the first grace, because that is not given for merit, but from a gift. But merit per accidens is like the diminution of penalty, and the merit which is acquired by the intercession of another, who are as it were bought for this by prayers or by the gifts of alms.

§ Therefore it must be said that merit per se is attended to in accordance with the devotion of the will, if it is perfect. But it is not perfect unless the given thing attests to it, and the quantity of the given thing, if he is able to give so much. But merit per accidens is attended to concerning the given thing, which nevertheless in some way proceeds from the will informing it. But Gregory seems to attest to this, who says: Charity works great things, if it exists: but if it ceases to work, it is not charity.

§ And from this distinction the solution to all those things which are introduced first is evident, except the last.

§ And to this it must be said, that nothing prohibits the condition of the rich man from being better than that of the poor man in those things which contribute to merit per accidens, such as riches, and the like. And similarly it is in happiness and the act of happiness to which certain virtues contribute per se. But certain goods, as the Commentator says on I Ethics, operate towards it organically, such as riches, and secular powers, and nobility, and bodily strength, and the like: and in the same way merit operates in the given thing: and it is not unfitting in such a case that the condition of the rich man is better than that of the poor man.

Articulus 20 — Whether Almsgiving Can Be Without Compassion, Or Compassion Is Essential To It

Whether almsgiving can be without compassion, or is compassion substantial to it?

§ Sixthly it is asked, Whether almsgiving can be without compassion, or is compassion substantial to it?

§ But it seems that it is substantial to it: because commiseration is nothing but the work of mercy: but the work of commiseration is almsgiving, as is evident in the interpretation of the name-

§ 1. [Argument concluded] ...from the argumentation and distinction posited above: therefore, almsgiving is not without mercy; but compassion is substantial to mercy, as is evident from the definition itself; therefore, compassion is substantial to almsgiving.

§ 2. ON THE CONTRARY: There are many who do not have compassion on the miserable, and yet give for God's sake. Therefore, almsgiving does not always arise from compassion; therefore, it is not substantial to it.

§ 3. Solution. It is to be said that just as it was said above concerning the sorrow of penance, that it is twofold, namely sensible and rational, so too it seems it must be said concerning compassion. For the will to have compassion is spiritual compassion, owing to the fact that someone, out of their constitution (complexion), can scarcely feel sensible passion upon observing the miseries of a neighbor; and from such compassion, almsgiving always proceeds.

§ 4. And by this the solution is clear, because the argument made to the contrary proceeds regarding sensible compassion.

Articulus 21 — Whether Burial Is Almsgiving, Or A Species Of Almsgiving

Whether burial is an alms, or a species of almsgiving?

§ 5. Next, inquiry is made concerning that which is said there, chap. 2, in the middle: "Not only he who gives food to the hungry, and to the thirsty, etc."

§ 6. Here the question concerning the species of almsgiving is to be treated, regarding which we will inquire into three things: First, concerning the sufficiency of corporal alms. Secondly, concerning spiritual alms. Thirdly, concerning the comparison of spiritual to corporal alms.

§ 7. Therefore it is asked: Is burial an alms?

§ 8. It seems that it is, because: 1. Tobias is praised because that work proceeded from compassion; therefore it is an alms.

§ 9. 2. Again, this is said by everyone, that the corporal alms are seven, one of which is assigned as burial.

§ 10. Again, an alms relieves a defect; but the defect to which everyone is ordered is death. Therefore, it ought maximally to be relieved. But the relief is burial; therefore, it seems that it is an alms.

§ 11. 3. Again, something is owed to a body that will rise again, which is not owed to a body not rising again. But the body of man will rise again, and the bodies of brute animals will not rise again. Therefore, since brute animals are cast away unburied, this one ought to be buried out of compassion, as it seems.

§ 12. 4. Again, it is reputed a sign of faith that someone dying chooses burial in the place of the congregation of the good, and in sacred places. Therefore, such a burial is praiseworthy, and it is exhibited to one failing; therefore, it is a work of mercy, as it seems.

§ 13. 5. Again, epitaphs are read posited on the tombs of the fathers, as that Simon built the tomb of his father and brothers, and is praised. Therefore, it seems that death does not stand in the way of good things being able to be done concerning the dead out of compassion; but burial is the principal thing which is exhibited to the dead. Therefore, it is a work of almsgiving, as it seems.

§ 14. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Almsgiving relieves the indigence of the poor or of the failing person concerning whom it is done. But burial does not profit the dead person concerning whom it is done; therefore, it is not an alms. The proof of the minor premise: Augustine says, and it is contained below in the Letter: "The pomp of a funeral, the processions of obsequies, and the sumptuous diligence of burial, are whatever sort of consolations for the living, not helps for the dead."

§ 15. 2. Again, Aristotle says that good and evil no longer change the dead. Therefore, neither do they help them; but almsgiving always helps him to whom it is done.

§ 16. It is also asked concerning the others, namely concerning feeding? 1. For it seems that some food is not required on account of a defect, but on account of delight. Therefore, he who gives those does not seem to do an alms.

§ 17. 2. It is objected secondly concerning garments, which are sometimes sought for the sake of adornment, as it seems.

§ 18. 3. Furthermore, there are many other corporal defects about which human services are ordered. Therefore, it seems that there are more genera of alms. For example, to medicate, to lead the erring back to the way, to raise up the falling, and many such things which are around men. Therefore, the works of almsgiving seem to be insufficiently enumerated by the Saints.

§ 19. Solution. It is to be said that almsgiving (as was held above) is named from the mercy of the one doing it, and not necessarily from the misery of the one receiving it, because it suffices that there be in the recipient an opined or presumed misery which ought sufficiently to move the heart of man to succor him.

§ 20. Therefore, regarding what is objected concerning burial, I well concede that it is an alms which is bestowed upon a man for the sake of the body that will rise again, so that it may be stored more honorably than other bodies not rising again, and be removed from the horror of men.

§ 21. But to the first which is objected to the contrary, it is to be said that it relieves a defect which man incurs for the sake of the body.

§ 22. To the saying of Augustine, it is to be said that he means that it profits only those who have made themselves worthy in life so that these things might be able to profit them. Hence, just as suffrages referred to preceding merit profit or harm, so also does burial. Whence Gregory narrates that certain wicked men buried in sacred places were cast out by demons.

§ 23. To another, it is to be said that Aristotle speaks of civil goods and those ordered to civil happiness; and it is true that those do not change the dead, such as the fortunes of descendants, and the like. But the Church does not speak thus, which believes that suffrages in alms profit the dead who live unto God.

§ 24. To the first which is further asked concerning food, it is to be said that nature sometimes fails in desiring necessaries on account of some infirmity; and then it is necessary to succor by means of delicate things moving the appetite, and those things in this way according to such a state are ordered against misery.

§ 25. To another, it is to be said that a delicate garment can be given out of mercy in two ways. Indeed, in one way, when a weakened constitution requires soft clothing, being impotent to sustain the necessary. In another way, when although he is poor, he nevertheless held an honorable state, and it is shameful for him to use common ones; just as it is read of Blessed

Nicholas, that he gave gold to the virgins and the father, who, blushing to beg, were being disposed for the brothel.

§ 26. To another, it is to be said that there are many secondary defects; but these are the principal ones. Just as medicine is reduced to the visitation of the sick; and because a sick person is taken generally, and his visitation generally is every help, a falling person can also be called sick, and his visitation the raising up of the same.

§ 27. But if it is asked: According to what are defects of this kind taken?

§ 28. It is to be said that the relief which is given to the miserable is either done to remove the defect in itself, or indeed not to remove it, but to mitigate it, lest it generate horror in others. If it is done in this last way, it is burial. If in the first way, it is either against a natural defect, or an accidental one. If against a natural one, it is either in a defect of the hot and dry, and then it is to feed; or of the cold and moist, and then it is to give drink. For we naturally desire these, because, as the Philosopher says, from the same things we are generated and nourished. And because we consist through generation from those four, on account of this we also desire them for the preservation of the individual. But if it is in accidental things, it is either according to a defect of interior things, or of exterior things. If in the first way, then it is an infirmity which proceeds from the corruption of the interior constituent elements (complexionants). If in the second way, it is either in those things which impede in removing them, or in bringing useful things. If in the first way, then it is the succor and ransom of the imprisoned. If in the second way, then it is concerning things conserving against those which, standing around the body, dissolve it by contrary qualities, and thus is clothing; or concerning those things which recreate through rest after labor, and thus is hospitality, in which the poor traveler rests.

§ 29. And by this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 22 — On Spiritual Alms

On spiritual alms.

§ 30. Secondly, it is asked concerning spiritual alms.

§ 31. For it seems that to teach is not an alms: 1. For alms are not ordered against nature; but nature produces everyone ignorant; therefore it seems that no alms is ordered against ignorance.

§ 32. 2. Again, if teaching is an alms, as the Master seems to say in the Letter, it seems that a wise or instructed person is obliged to it. Therefore, according to time and place he is bound to succor. But this is the time of ignorance, namely when that one is ignorant and is present. Therefore, it seems that the instructed person is bound to teach every such person; therefore, if he does not teach, he sins mortally, just as if he does not give food to the hungry in the time of necessity; and this is grave to say.

§ 33. 3. Again, it is objected concerning what he says: "We forgive what anyone has sinned against us." For this precept seems to be in the precept of the love of enemies. Therefore, this is an act of charity; therefore, of mercy; therefore, not of almsgiving, because in the Letter he hints that he who bestows mercy gives an alms; and without mercy there is no alms.

§ 34. 4. Again, counsel which is given to someone seems to be reduced to the teaching of the ignorant, because everyone seeking counsel is ignorant. Therefore, it seems that it is superfluously posited among the works of almsgiving.

§ 35. 5. Again, those works do not seem to belong to mercy, but rather to charity tending toward the neighbor through effect. For as it is said, 1 Cor. 13:5: "Charity seeks not her own."

§ 36. 6. Again, among the corporal works of mercy there are some which help after death; and since the soul remains more nobly after death than the body, it seems that there ought to be a spiritual work for this which may be done to man after death. Therefore, they are insufficiently enumerated, as it seems.

§ 37. 7. Again, to remit seems to be a work of justice, as is clear in Matt. 6:15, where he says: "If you will not forgive men, neither will your Father forgive you your offenses."

§ 38. Solution. It is to be said that in truth there are seven spiritual alms, as is commonly said, ordered against a defect of the spirit. For either that defect is of fault, or of punishment. If of fault: it is either in oneself alone, or it is sinned against you through the infliction of injury. If it is sinned against you, against this is ordered to endure patiently and to forgive: because there are two things in an inflicted injury, namely the fault, and this demands forgiveness; and the inflicted punishment, and this demands endurance, lest one judge for oneself. But if it is in oneself alone: it is either with the hope of amendment, or without such hope. If in the first way, then chastisement has place; if in the second way, then prayer to God has place, that He Himself may supply what is lacking in human help. But if it is a defect of punishment: it is either according to the intellect, or according to the affect. If it is according to the affect, thus is sorrow, or fear which is ordered to the same; and then he needs consolation. But if according to the intellect: either according to how it itself is speculative, and then he is ignorant, and needs teaching; or according to how it is practical, and then he is deficient in the knowledge of things to be done (agibilia); the succor of which will be through counsel. And thus it is clear that there are seven spiritual alms.

§ 39. To the first, therefore, which is objected first, it is to be said that ignorance is not the nature of instituted man, but of damned man; and therefore it is a defect in man.

§ 40. To another, it is to be said that although generally ignorance is a certain defect, there is nevertheless a certain ignorance which is dangerous, like of those things without which there is no salvation; and in such matters I think that the instructed person is bound to teach others not taught. And on account of this, priests are posited for the people, who may instruct in such things; and therefore a wise instructed person probably presumes that there are others who may succor out of duty, even if he himself does not teach; and therefore he does not sin mortally, because the time of necessity is not pressing.

§ 41. To another, it is to be said that nothing prohibits one work from belonging to multiple virtues, according as diverse ends move in it. Whence I well concede that to forgive can be a work of justice, and of charity, and of mercy; but it will belong to mercy properly as eliciting it, and to the others as commanding it; and this is so done because it is ordered to the relief of misery which is a fault against the neighbor; and mercy, proceeding from compassion for the neighbor, elicits such a work.

§ 42. To another, it is to be said that teaching and counsel differ: because teaching is about anything ignorant; principally, however, it ought to be about those things which pertain to salvation, like certain parts of Sacred Scripture and the articles of faith. But counsel is sought in doubtful things to be done by us (agibilia), as is proven in the second book of the Ethics.

§ 44. To another, it is to be said that the soul remains alive after death; and therefore some of those things which help it while it is in the body, suffice to help it after death. But it is not thus concerning the body; and therefore it is not necessary for there to be a spiritual work for this by which the soul is specially helped after death.

§ 45. To another, it is to be said as was held before.

Articulus 23 — Whether Spiritual Alms Are Better Than Corporal Alms

Whether spiritual alms are better than corporal ones?

§ 46. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the comparison of corporal alms to spiritual ones.

§ 47. Now it seems that the spiritual ones are better, through that which is posited a little below in the Letter: 1. "But that is greater by which we forgive from the heart what anyone has sinned against us."

§ 48. 2. Again, the spirit is nobler than the body. Therefore, the succor of the spirit is better than that of the body; but a spiritual alms succors the spirit, while a corporal one the body. Therefore, the spiritual is better than the corporal.

§ 49. 3. Again, operations differ in their essences. Now it is established that the spiritual are better than the corporal, just as the spirit is better than the body. But spiritual alms are spiritual operations, while corporal alms are corporal operations. Therefore, the spiritual are better.

§ 50. 4. Again, the body does not have life, nor vice, nor virtue except through the spirit; therefore, all those things first belong to the spirit. Therefore, also in operations there will be no praise except through the spirit. But each thing is more efficacious in its own proper things, than in alien ones; therefore, the spirit too will be more efficacious in spiritual things, than in corporal things. Therefore, spiritual alms are more efficacious; therefore also better.

§ 51. 5. Again, corporal alms have a difference of goodness according to their matters: for he who gives gold makes a better alms than he who gives silver, if they are equally abundant in the faculty of giving. Since therefore spiritual gifts are better than all corporal ones, spiritual alms seem to be better than corporal ones.

§ 52. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Alms are for the succor of indigence. But man is more indigent in body than in soul; therefore those alms are better. Proof of the minor premise: the indigence of the soul can be removed through inquiry, and in many other ways, and once removed does not return, or does not naturally return; but the indigence of the body afflicts continuously, and cannot be avoided, and once removed it returns, such as hunger.

§ 53. 2. Again, the less it is recompensed to the one giving an alms in the present, the better and more fruitful is the alms. But it is less recompensed in corporal things than in spiritual things; therefore, an alms is more fruitful in corporal things than in spiritual things. Proof of the first is Matt. 6:3 and 16, where He says of those seeking the reward of praise, that they have received their reward; and He teaches to invite the poor who cannot repay. Proof of the second is that spiritual goods communicated to another grow in the possessor.

§ 54. 3. Again, corporal indigences are felt more than spiritual ones. Therefore, the supplying of the defect is more desired; and that alms is better which is more according to the desire of the poor person, because it consoles more. Therefore, a corporal alms is better than a spiritual one.

§ 55. Solution. It is to be said that a corporal alms has more of the supplying of need, but a spiritual one has more of utility and moral goodness (honestas). Simply speaking, however, an alms in spiritual things is better than in corporal things, as is said in the Letter.

§ 56. And the first reasons do not conclude except in a qualified sense (secundum quid), namely that that alms is nobler; but they do not conclude that it is more required: because corporal defects are felt more than spiritual ones.

§ 57. But to those things which are objected to the contrary, it is to be said that this does not make an alms more meritorious, that it is of greater indigence, but rather that it is given from a greater affection. Or it is to be said that it is not concluded to be better except in a qualified sense: for if the comparison ought to be made well, parity ought to be supposed in all things, except in this, that one is spiritual and the other corporal; and then it is plainly clear that the spiritual would be better.

§ 58. To another, it is to be said that although this is true in teaching and counseling, it is nevertheless not true in the others. And if it is in some way also true in the others (because the more often someone pardons an injury, the more easily he can do this), nevertheless the merit of the alms is not diminished on account of this. For what the Lord says concerning the reception of reward is not understood of spiritual reward, but of corporal and transitory reward, and not of the augment of grace, which often happens by the merit of almsgiving.

§ 59. To the last, it is to be said that sensation does not make it more meritorious, but more necessary, according to that time in which the defect is felt.

§ 60. Note, moreover, that these genera of alms are comprehended in two verses, of which the first is this: "I visit, I give drink, I feed, I ransom, I cover, I harbor, I bury." (Visito, poto, cibo, redimo, tego, colligo, condo.) The second is this: "Instruct, chastise, console, forgive, bear, pray." (Instrue, castiga, solare, remitte, fer, ora.)

§ 61. And these verses are clear throughout, except in this alone, that 'instruct' (instruo) ought to be taken in a twofold signification, namely for the instruction of the one teaching the ignorant, and for the instruction of the one informing for counsel.

Articulus 24 — From What Almsgiving Can Or Ought To Be Made

From what can or ought an alms be made?

§ 62. Next it is asked concerning what is said there, chap. 2, past the middle: "Give alms, and behold all things are clean unto you, etc."[527]

§ 63. But here the question is: From what can or ought an alms be made?

§ 64. Now it seems that from everything which is possessed, and can out of compassion be bestowed on the miserable. Because: 1. For giving, nothing is required except the faculty on the part of the giver. But one possessing in whatever way, has the faculty for giving; therefore, possessing in whatever way, he can make an alms.

§ 65. 2. Again, that which is superfluous cannot be retained out of justice; and yet an alms can be made from it. Therefore, an alms will be from that which is possessed, although it cannot justly be retained. And from this it follows that an alms could be made from usuries and other illicitly acquired things, which many deny.

§ 66. 3. Again, of two evils the lesser evil is to be chosen. But it is a greater evil to acquire illicitly and to retain unmercifully, than to acquire illicitly and to disburse mercifully. Therefore, the second is to be urged, namely that an alms be made from illicitly acquired things.

§ 67. 4. Again, concerning that of which someone is the master (dominus), he can do what he wills. But according to many, one is the master of usury; therefore he can do what pleases him; therefore he can also make an alms from it. That he is the master of usury is clear from the fact that many say dominion transfers in usury.

§ 68. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Gregory in the Decretum, cause I, quest. 1: "It is not to be thought an alms, if what is acquired from illicit things is dispensed to the poor."[528] Therefore, an alms cannot be made from illicitly acquired things.

§ 69. 2. Again, Gregory, in the same place: "For whatever in a sacrifice to God is offered from crime, does not placate the wrath of Almighty God, but irritates it."

§ 70. 3. Again, in the same place treating that of Solomon, Ecclus. 34:24: "He that offers sacrifice of the goods of the poor, etc.," he speaks thus: "Now let us perpend how great is the sorrow of a father, if a son is sacrificed in his sight: and from this it is easily known how great a sorrow is exasperated before God, when a sacrifice from rapine is rendered to Him."

§ 71. 4. Again, in Decretum XIV, quest. 5, Augustine in his homilies: "Perhaps someone thinks, and says: There are many avaricious and covetous Christians, I shall not have sin if I take away their property and give it to the poor: for whence they do no good, I shall be able to have a reward. But a thought of this kind is suggested by diabolical cunning: for if he bestows upon the poor all that he had taken away, he rather adds to his sin, than diminishes it."[529] There are also many other authorities for this.

§ 72. 5. But let us insist upon reason: What one receives illicitly, he is bound to return. Therefore, he must do nothing whereby he is rendered impotent to pay. But by giving to another, whether poor or rich, he is rendered impotent. Therefore he is bound not to give to another; therefore he is bound not to make alms of this.

§ 73. 6. Again, as the Apostle says, evils are not to be done that good things may come. [530] Therefore, no one ought to do evils that good things may come about. But to acquire illicitly is to do evil; and to give an alms is for good things to come about. Therefore, an alms cannot nor ought to be made from illicitly acquired things, etc.

§ 74. 7. Again, to fornicate with some Jewish or pagan woman so that she might be converted, is illicit and a mortal sin, and ought not to be done, owing to the fact that it is a sin in itself. Therefore, since an unjust acquisition is no less a sin than fornication, an illicit acquisition ought not to be made so that an alms might be given from it.

§ 75. BUT THEN it is asked concerning cases which are around this question.

§ 76. Let us posit, therefore, that someone has things illicitly acquired through usury or rapine, and he sees someone placed in extreme necessity, and he does not have anything else from which to pay the one from whom he illicitly took it. And it is asked: Is he bound to give it to the poor person, or not?

§ 77. It seems that he is, because: 1. In such necessity all things are common. Therefore, if he gives to this one, it seems that he is absolved from the other.

§ 78. 2. Again, in such a case he could violently snatch from another, and give to this one. Therefore, he can also give the illicitly acquired thing to him, such that he is not further bound to pay.

§ 79. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A sin is not remitted unless the taken thing is restored. But he does not restore the taken thing by the fact that he gives it to another; therefore the sin is not remitted to him.

§ 80. 2. Again, the other has an action against this one, as long as he retains his property. Therefore, since he is said to retain as long as he does not pay, an action still belongs to him after such a giving. Therefore, he is still bound to return; therefore he is not absolved by such a giving.

§ 81. FURTHER, it is asked in the same case, if he to whom he owes it is present, and denies permission to give to him who is in extreme necessity, whether he is still bound to give?

§ 82. It seems that he is not, because: 1. He gives another's property against the will of the master (dominus); and this is illicit.

527. Luke 11:41.

§ 83. 2. Again, from another's property (as was clear before) an alms cannot be made. But this which he has is another's; therefore, he can never give it, against the will of him to whom he owes it.

§ 84. ON THE CONTRARY: Ambrose says: "Feed him dying of hunger, etc.:" but this one is able to feed, and does not do it: therefore he kills. Therefore it seems that he ought to give to such a needy person.

§ 85. AGAIN it is asked here concerning other cases, whether an alms can be made of gambling winnings (aleato) and the price of prostitution?

§ 86. It seems that it can, because in such things he who lost does not deserve to receive it. Therefore, by giving, one is not rendered impotent to pay; therefore it can be given to the poor.

§ 87. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. "Thou shalt not offer the hire of a strumpet:"[531] but an alms is a certain sacrifice; therefore it ought not to be made of those things.

§ 88. Again, in an Epistle of Jerome, the priests of Babylon are rebuked, who accept the gifts of harlots; therefore an alms is not to be made of this.

§ 89. 2. Again, by illicit commerce nothing is licitly acquired. But prostitution is illicit commerce; therefore by it nothing is licitly acquired. Therefore neither is the price; but from an illicitly acquired thing an alms cannot be made, as was clear from the words of Gregory introduced above. Therefore, neither from prostitution, nor from gambling.

§ 90. Solution. As those who have taught the laws (jura) with probability say, it seems to me that a distinction must be made regarding the illicitly acquired thing. For either dominion is transferred, or it is not transferred. It is transferred, as in usury, according to some: and concerning this you will find a note above at the end of the third book of the Sentences. It is not transferred, as in rapine. If it is transferred: either an action for recovery (repetitio) from the canon belongs to him from whom he accepts, or not. It belongs, as in usury. It does not belong, as in prostitution and gambling, because the patron of a harlot and the gambler deserve to lose it.

§ 91. I say therefore, that if it is an illicit thing in which dominion is transferred, and an action for recovery does not apply, an alms can be made from it.

§ 92. But if it is an illicit thing in which dominion is not transferred, as in theft, rapine, or a deposit; or if it is transferred, yet an action for recovery applies to him, an alms cannot be made.

§ 93. And according to this distinction I respond to the first, saying that there is a faculty from the abundance of a thing which can be given, and there is a faculty from the right of giving. The first does not suffice for almsgiving, but the second; and he who illicitly acquires what he is bound to restore does not have this.

§ 94. To another, it is to be said that it is not similar: because that which is superfluous, although it ought not to be retained, is nevertheless his own, and he is bound to no one for it. And therefore he can give this; but concerning an illicitly acquired thing which he is bound to restore, it is not in this way.

§ 95. To another, it is to be said that although for one placed in necessity, who cannot escape otherwise, the lesser evil is to be chosen, nevertheless the law determines neither to be licit, nor a lesser evil, nor a greater, but one is less illicit than the other. And therefore both are sins, although two are a greater evil than one.

§ 96. To another, it is to be said that if he is master (dominus) in such a way that the other cannot take action against him—neither from the fact that dominion was transferred, nor from the canon—then the objection truly proves, and then it is conceded. But if he is not master from the settled law of the canon, then it is not valid. And thus it is in usury: because although according to some dominion is transferred, nevertheless from the canon he is bound to restore.

§ 97. But to those things which are objected to the contrary, it is to be said that all those decrees speak of that illicitly acquired thing which someone is bound to restore.

§ 98. To this which is objected by reason, it is to be said to the first, that it proceeds well concerning an illicit thing which someone is bound to return.

§ 99. To another, it is to be said that in order that one may have whence an alms may be given, one must not acquire from shameful means, as the decree says, cause I, quest. 1, and cause XIV, quest. 5. But if it was acquired shamefully, nothing prohibits that it can sometimes be disbursed in alms, as was already said.

§ 100. To another, it is to be said in the same way, that it must not be thus acquired. But having been acquired thus, nothing prohibits dispensing it well. And in that objection, Eustratius on the V book of the Ethics seems to be contrary to the decree and to us, who says that although the law commands another's wife not to be known, nevertheless it is good to know the tyrant's wife, so that through her the tyrant may be mitigated towards the citizens. But Eustratius errs in that place, or he himself speaks by reporting the laws of the pagans.

§ 101. To another, it is to be said that it seems to me in such a case, that he who has another's property ought to signify it to him to whom he owes it, if he can. And if he cannot, he ought to give it to the needy person in his name, and he is absolved from the debt: just as also certain ancient Doctors before us said. But if he signifies it, whether he gives permission or not, he himself is nevertheless bound to give it to the needy person, and he is absolved, as I think, from the debt simply: such that he is never further bound to pay, unless he to whom he owes it is in similar indigence.

§ 102. To those things which are objected, it is to be said that this one pays: because in such a case that other, if he had it and willed not to give, would sin mortally. And therefore, since this one gives in his name, this one is absolved: just as if I owed you a hundred, but you owed another a hundred, and I paid for you to him whom you owed, I am not bound to pay you again.

§ 103. To another, it is to be said that an action does not belong to the other against this one in such a case—provided it is established to him that he gave in such necessity, and he had nothing else to give besides his own necessaries. But rather, he is simply absolved from the debt by the law of nature: because those things which were the creditor's, he makes to be owed to the poor person in such necessity.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that, with permission denied, he still ought to give on account of necessity: because many goods (as Augustine says) are bestowed upon the unwilling: and thus even this is done well despite his unwillingness, when from his goods nature, failing in a neighbor, is sustained.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that this person gives alms not from what belongs to another, but returns to the poor man what is his own: and the alms-giving is done in the name of him to whom restitution was owed.

§ 3. To this that is further asked concerning prostitution and gambling, it must be said that alms can be given from such things, and especially from prostitution, but not an offering at the altar on account of scandal: and the authorities introduced are speaking about sacrifice, not about alms.

§ 4. To that which is objected by reason, it must be said that in truth it is acquired by illicit commerce. But nevertheless what is "illicitly acquired" is spoken of in two ways: in one way commonly, namely when the act by which it is acquired is illicit: and this does not always prohibit that alms might be made from what is so acquired. It is also called "illicitly acquired" when it is acquired with unjust damage to a neighbor in his goods, which is proper to avarice, which according to Aristotle is properly called a special injustice: and then alms cannot be given from it to me: because it is owed to another, either from the fact that ownership is not transferred, or from the fact that an action is competent to him from whom it is taken away, by the authority and law of the canon.

Articulus 25 — Whether A Wife From The Goods Of Her Husband, Or Conversely, And Whether A Monk, A Son Under A Father's Power, Or A Servant Can Give Alms

Whether a wife from her husband's goods, or conversely, whether a monk, or a son in a household, or a servant can give alms?

§ 5. But still it is further asked concerning certain cases, namely those which do not suppose something illicitly acquired, but as being in the power of another, such as whether a wife can give alms from her husband's goods?

530. Romans 3:8.

§ 6. It seems that she can: because 1. Augustine says that she was taken from his side for this reason, that he might know her as a companion to her husband, not a handmaid: therefore she herself has power over goods just as the man: therefore she can give just as he can.

1. Also, Aristotle in Ethics V, where he distinguishes economic justice from justice strictly speaking, says that justice is more with a wife, than with a son, or a servant: but it is evident that he says this on account of some equality which is between a man and a wife: therefore since she is equal, she can give just as the man.
2. Also, the dearer good that a man has, namely his own body, is in the power and dominion of the woman: therefore much more are other things: if therefore she is mistress in those things, she herself can distribute to the poor, as it seems.
3. Also, it is read in the life of blessed Lucy, that she secretly, with her betrothed being ignorant of it, divided and sold her patrimony and gave to the poor: and yet she is praised: therefore it seems that this would also be praiseworthy in others.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If two are partners in trade, neither can give without the other consenting: since therefore goods are common between a man and a wife, it seems that she can give nothing without the consent of the husband.

1. Also, Concerning her own body she can do nothing without the man's consent, which nevertheless seems to be more her own: therefore much less concerning things.
2. Also, Things are given to a husband by the wife's father, such as a dowry, and other things, on account of the burdens of matrimony: therefore without his consent those things are not to be alienated: therefore much less other things, which are his, or acquired by him.
3. Also, 1 Corinthians 11:3: I want you to know that the head of every man is Christ: but the head of the woman is the man . But without the consent of the head a member can do nothing. Therefore neither without the consent of the man can a woman give anything, as it seems.

§ 7. Further it is asked, Whether a son of a household or a daughter can give anything?

It seems that they cannot: because 1. He has nothing in his power: therefore he can give nothing.

1. Also, Galatians 4:1: As long as the heir is a child, he differs nothing from a servant, etc. Therefore he can give nothing.

ON THE CONTRARY: The inheritance pertains to him: therefore it seems that as from his own he can give something.

§ 8. Further it is asked here, Whether a monk or a nun can give anything?

531. Deuteronomy 23:18.

It seems that they cannot: because 1. It is said, that a monk having a halfpenny, is not worth a halfpenny: but he who has nothing, can give nothing: therefore a monk can give nothing.

1. Also, The renunciation of property is of every rule of religious: but he who has nothing proper to himself, can give nothing: therefore a monk cannot give anything: therefore neither can he give alms.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Suppose that he sees someone placed in necessity: either he gives, or he does not give. If he gives, I have my proposition. If he does not give, since he could give from the goods of the monastery, he kills him, as Ambrose seems to say.

1. Also, One good does not prejudice another: but religion is good, and giving alms is good: therefore religion does not prejudice the giving of alms: therefore it seems that from religion he is more bound to give, than if he were not a religious.

§ 9. Further it is asked concerning servants and handmaids who give bread, and the like of their masters, whether they can do this?

It seems that they cannot: because nothing is their own: therefore they can give nothing of this.

ON THE CONTRARY: The dispensing of them is left to some in the house: but a dispenser can give alms under the hope of ratification: therefore both a servant and a handmaid.

§ 10. Solution. It must be said with a manifold distinction.

First thus: Either the woman has paraphernalia [property outside the dowry], or not.

Also, Either the woman is gainful like the husband, or even more than the husband, or not.

Also, Either from the woman's giving the husband is impoverished, or not.

Also, Either the husband expressly prohibits her from giving with a sign that he so intends in his heart, or not.

§ 11. If the woman has paraphernalia, and is gainful, even with her husband prohibiting she can and ought to give alms, which do not impoverish the man: and if he prohibits, yet not by a sign that he so intends, but because by prohibiting he wishes to draw her back from a superfluity of giving, I still say that she ought to give with that conscience that it would please the husband in his heart, even whatever he might say with his mouth. If however she does not have paraphernalia, and is gainful: I say the same as before. If however she has paraphernalia, and is not gainful: still the same seems must be said. If however she neither has paraphernalia, nor is she gainful by her own labors: then it seems must be said, that she ought not to give without the consent of the man, except perhaps bread and wine and other things which are in the daily use of the house: and this moderately lest she make the matrimony too burdensome for the husband by her giving.

528. Decretum Gratiani, C. 1, q. 1, c. 27.

§ 12. To the first therefore it must be said that although she was taken from his side, yet she ought to be ruled by the man: and she is not equal to him, except only in the conjugal act and debt: just as will be shown below, when matrimony is treated.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that Aristotle does not intend that justice strictly speaking is between a man and a woman, but less improperly than between a master and a servant: because it more approaches equality, although she is not entirely equal.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that only the body of the man is given to the woman: because this is pertinent to the undivided custom of life of the sacrament, according as it is for the good of offspring, and as a remedy for concupiscence: and therefore she is mistress of it. But it is not so concerning other goods: and therefore those remain in the dominion of the husband, unless by a mode predetermined in the distinction.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that blessed Lucy was only a betrothed: nor was the matrimony yet ratified or consummated: and therefore it was lawful for her to choose the safer part of chastity, and to divide the goods, which had not previously passed into the dominion of the betrothed.

§ 16. To those things however which are objected to the contrary, the solution is evident through the distinction.

§ 17. To that which is asked concerning a son of a household, it must be said that he can give nothing without the consent of his parents, except perhaps bread, and the like, which do not inflict a sensible loss.

§ 18. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although he is the heir, yet he is not yet the master: and therefore he cannot give.

§ 19. To that however which is asked concerning a monk, it is fitting to distinguish. Either some dispensing is committed to him, or not. If so: then from that he ought and can give alms, just as the Abbot himself in the name of the chapter. If however he does not have the dispensing, either he himself is in the monastery, or not. If he is in the monastery: then he ought not to give except by permission, unless he sees someone placed in extreme necessity, because then he could even receive from the altar, and give to him: unless perhaps he gives under the hope of ratification, with the Abbot being in no way present. If however he is outside, as in study by permission of the Abbot: then he can give alms: because since expenses are given to him, the dispensing of those things which are given to him is committed to him.

§ 20. To this however which is objected against, it must be said that although he has nothing in possession, yet as a dispenser he can have something in use.

§ 21. Through this also the solution to the following is evident: because no religion renounces use: because without the use of the goods of fortune life cannot be.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that that proposition is false: because religion, by the fact that it renounces what is proper to oneself, makes that which in itself is good, evil for him.

§ 23. To that which is asked concerning a servant and a handmaid, I say through itself, that they can give nothing of their masters' things without their consent, except from their own wages.

§ 24. To that which seems to be objected against, it must be said that they are not dispensers as having some power in the thing, but as handling them for the utility of their masters.

Articulus 26 — Whether One About To Give Alms Ought To Begin In An Ordered Way

Whether one about to give alms ought to begin ordinately?

§ 25. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, § 2, after the middle: He who wishes to give alms ordinately, ought to begin first from himself, etc.

For it seems from this that order is in almsgiving, just as in charity.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. No precept is given concerning loving oneself, because nature suffices for this: since therefore nature orders each one to subvene himself as much as he can, it is not necessary for an admonition to be introduced for this.

1. Also, No misery moves so much in another, as in oneself: since therefore alms is given from mercy, which is compassion for misery, it seems that the sense of one's own misery suffices for this without exterior doctrine.
2. Besides, It seems to be impossible, that a man give alms to himself: because it is given to someone who does not have: therefore if a man gives to himself, he simultaneously has, and does not have, which is impossible.

§ 26. Besides it is asked further, Why does he say this rather of spiritual alms, than of corporal? For he says: Have mercy on your soul, etc. not your body.

For it seems that he ought to say a similar thing about the body because just as men are found to be cruel to their soul, so they are found to be cruel to their body: like those who irrationally afflict themselves, and sometimes even kill themselves.

§ 27. Solution. It must be said that in truth in the bestowing of alms order is attended to, according as it is informed by charity: for the order of charity is posited concerning all things, which are informed by charity: and concerning this many things are said upon the third book of the Sentences, in the tractate on charity.

§ 28. To the first however it must be said that we do not have a precept concerning corporal alms, because in corporal misery we suffer enough with ourselves: but concerning spiritual: and this is understood in the precept of giving alms to a neighbor: just as also the precept concerning loving oneself is understood in the precept of loving one's neighbor, as Augustine says.

§ 29. To the next and the third it must be said that misery is nearer in us than in another, if it is felt as misery: and in this way it is not except concerning corporal misery. Spiritual misery however, which is more truly misery than corporal, is not felt as misery, but as a good now on account of the sweetness of sin: and therefore spiritual alms which supplies the defect of sin especially, needs a more ample admonition, than exterior alms.

§ 30. To the last it must be said that spiritual things in a certain way one can give to oneself: because in truth he does not have spiritual things, and so properly someone can receive; and someone can cause that they be given to him, although properly he cannot give: and thus he is said to give in this way in which he who causes that it be given is said to give.

Articulus 27 — Whether This Saying Is True, "He Who Loves Iniquity Hates His Own Soul"

Whether that is true, He who loves iniquity, hates his own soul?

§ 31. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, § 2, after the middle: He who loves iniquity, hates his own soul, etc. For this seems to be false: because

1. Ephesians 5:29: No man ever hated his own flesh therefore much less the soul which is the better part of man.
2. Besides, This seems to be a good thing, that he hates it: because it is said, John 12:25: He who hates his life in this world, keeps it unto life eternal . Therefore he does not seem cruel to his soul who hates it: therefore what is said in the Letter seems false.

§ 32. Solution. It must be said that the sin is of equivocation in "to love", and "to hate": because love is of affection, and of effect: by love of affection no one hates his soul: and of that the Apostle speaks to the Ephesians. By love of effect however he who loves iniquity does not love his soul: because he acts against his own soul: and of this the Psalm speaks.

§ 33. To the second it must be said that the equivocation is in the word "soul" [anima]: because Christ in John calls the soul, animal life: which he hates, who flees delights, and embraces the cross: and he keeps it, not in that it is animal, but according as it is beatifiable stripped of animality unto eternal life: here however he speaks of the soul according as it is spiritual and the principal part of man in meriting or demeriting.

Articulus 28 — Whether Nothing Is Clean To The Unclean

Whether to the unclean nothing is clean?

§ 34. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, C, § 2, before the end: To the unclean nothing is clean, etc.

For this seems false: because 1. Sinners consume the body of Christ: and yet that is clean: and they communicate in many other sacraments.

1. Also, A creature is not made unclean by this, that sinners have it for use: therefore he seems to speak falsely.

§ 35. Also it is asked, Whether it follows, to the unclean nothing is clean: therefore the unclean thing which they consume?

And it seems that it does: because as is evident, Leviticus 11, throughout, between clean and unclean there is no middle: if therefore it is not clean, it seems that it is unclean.

§ 36. Solution. It must be said with the Apostle, that to the unclean nothing is clean . And it is understood compositely, not dividedly, that is, to the unclean insofar as they are unclean nothing is clean: because the effect of cleanness is made by nothing in them.

§ 37. To the first it must be said that the body of Christ is not clean in them, because it does not make the effect of cleanness in them: yet in itself it is clean: for just as it is said of divine Wisdom, Wisdom 7:25, that on account of its cleanness nothing defiled runs into it: so conversely concerning these it can be said, that on account of their uncleanness, nothing clean runs into them by effect.

§ 38. To the next the solution is evident through what has been said.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if it is not clean to them, that it is unclean: for uncleanness is twofold, namely in itself, and with respect to us. And that which is of the thing in itself, has no middle: but that which is with respect to us, has a middle with respect to us. Just as contrariwise every man is clean in himself, or unclean: and yet for a certain thing not every man who is clean is clean, just as in the loaves of proposition not everyone clean in himself, was clean.

Articulus 29 — Whether It Is True That It Profits Nothing To Pray, Fast, And Do Other Good Things, Unless The Mind Is Recalled From Sin

Whether it be true, that it profits nothing to pray, to fast, and to do other good works, unless the mind be recalled from sin?

§ 40. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, § 2, toward the end: It profits nothing to fast, and to pray, and to do other good works, unless the mind be recalled from sin, etc.

1. For it seems if they profit nothing, that these things are not to be advised to sinners, which would be impious to say: therefore what is said in the Letter seems false.
2. Also, To Nebuchadnezzar the impious king Daniel said: Redeem your sins with alms therefore they profit.

§ 41. Solution. It has been said above in what way they profit, namely for obtaining grace more nearly: but they do not profit unto eternal life: and because these things have been disputed above, I will dismiss them here.

Divisio Textus

To some however it seems, etc. Here he touches upon the opinion of certain ones, and solves it in a twofold way, and recoils from the solution had.

And it is divided into three: and the beginning of each part is evident through itself.

Articulus 30 — Whether Satisfaction Outside Charity Ought To Be Repeated When Charity Returns

Whether satisfaction outside charity, is to be repeated when charity returns?

Whether satisfaction outside charity, is to be repeated when charity returns?

§ 42. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, § 2, at the end: Concerning both satisfaction must be imposed: because concerning the first he did not satisfy condignly.

For this seems to be harsh. For let us suppose, that he first accepts from the priest, that he give a hundred, and pays it in mortal sin: therefore afterwards he must again give a hundred.

The same objection is concerning going beyond the sea, and other things which cannot be repeated without heavy expenses and labors.

§ 43. Solution. It must be said, that as is evident from previous things, in penance there are two things, namely sorrow of heart, and exterior work. The interior things however because he was not contrite, are worth nothing. In exterior things however it must be distinguished for certain exterior things are, which by loss and affliction remain in the agent after they are done, such as giving, and pilgrimage, and the like: certain others however pass away entirely, such as prayer, and other such things. I say therefore, that works which remain in some way, afterwards revive through grace: and those it is not necessary to repeat: but others ought to be repeated: and this was noted above in the question concerning dead and mortified works.

Articulus 31 — Whether A Good Work Done Outside Charity, Being Dead, Can Ever Revive

Whether a dead good done outside charity, can ever revive?

§ 44. But it is objected concerning the error itself first.

For it seems, that these say true because: 1. Good is more powerful in acting, than evil in destroying: but evil destroys a previously had good, not only conjoined to evil, but also a good of grace had by itself: therefore much more does a following good vivify a had good, which was not conjoined to good, but was done outside charity.

1. Also, Baptism with fiction removed operates salvation: therefore it seems that penance ought to do similarly.

§ 45. Solution. All these things can be gathered from being sufficiently broadly disputed above in the preceding distinction.

Therefore it must be said, that these err, because a dead good cannot be vivified: by reason that nothing is vivified of those things which die, unless it contracts the possibility for life from conjunction to something which perpetually lives: just as through charity the goods of eternal life are conjoined, and the body when it will rise is conjoined to the soul: but a good done outside charity, is conjoined to none of such things, and therefore can never revive.

§ 46. To the first objection however it must be said, that it is not from a defect of the following good, that it is not vivified, but rather from a defect of the preceding, that it is not vivifiable: because it is impossible for life, as has been said.

§ 47. To the next it must be said that it is not similar what is introduced for similar: because baptism imprints a character, by reason of which it remains in men: but penance imprints nothing of such things.

Besides, The baptized immediately receives the virtue of operating from the passion of Christ: but the works of penance are partly from us, and especially those which are in attrition before contrition: concerning which the Master speaks here.

Articulus 32 — Whether Good Works Done Outside Charity Diminish The Fire Of Hell

Whether good works done outside charity diminish the fire of hell?

§ 48. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, D, before the end: But it must be estimated perhaps that the future judgment will be more tolerable for him, etc.

This seems to be false: 1. For in the fire of hell each one burns as much as he made himself combustible through sin, as Gregory says: but those goods do not diminish sin: therefore he burns as much with those goods, as without them.

If you say, that they diminish sins. On the contrary: Whatever is apt by nature to diminish something, has contrariety to it: these goods thus diminish sin: therefore they have contrariety to sin, which is false, since it is saved with it in the same subject.

1. Also, Whatever diminishes something, if intensified will destroy it, if it itself is finite: therefore if these goods diminish sin, when multiplied they will destroy it, which is false and heretical: therefore this is also false, that they diminish the fire of hell.

§ 49. Solution. It must be said, that they do not diminish directly, but indirectly: just as he is said to diminish a fire, who prohibits wood from being placed on it: for goods from the genus of goods accustom to the good, and consequently elongate from the custom and appetite of evil, and thus they diminish sin, which would not happen if those goods did not exist: and thus by diminishing the cause of the fire, they diminish the fire.

§ 50. To those things however which were objected, the solution is evident: because they proceed as if they diminished directly: and this we do not say.

§ 51. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, around the middle: When we commit evil, not without cause do we recall past goods to memory, etc.

For from all the previously had disputations this seems to be false: because whether they were done outside charity, or in charity, it has been shown, that they avail much: therefore they are not recalled to memory without cause.

§ 52. Solution. It must be said, that he does not intend to say "without cause" simply, but as to this that eternal life is hoped for from them, if he continues in sins.

§ 53. F. He introduces other authorities against those who say that penance is done for one sin while another is kept silent.

I consider that sufficient response has been given to those, who assert that penance is done for one crime, and pardon is granted, with another retained in delight, or not exposed through confession, who are confuted not only by the premises of the authorities, but also by those subjoined. For Augustine says: "There are many who repent of having sinned, but yet entirely reserving to themselves certain things in which they might delight, not animadverting that the Lord simultaneously freed a mute and deaf man from a demon": through this he teaches us that we are never healed except of all. For if he wished sins to be reserved in part, he could have perfected the one having seven demons, with six being expelled: but he expelled the seven that he might teach that all crimes are to be cast out simultaneously. Moreover ejecting a legion of demons from another, he left none of all of them, to possess the freed man: showing that even if sins are a thousand, one must repent of all of these. For the Lord never healed anyone, whom he did not entirely free. For he healed the whole man on the sabbath: because he freed both the body from all infirmity, and the soul from all contagion: indicating that the penitent ought simultaneously to sorrow for every crime. For I know that the Lord is an enemy to every criminal. How therefore will he who reserves a crime, receive pardon concerning another? He would obtain pardon without the love of God, without which no one ever finds grace. For he is an enemy of God as long as he offends perseveringly. For it is a certain impiety of infidelity, to hope for a half pardon from him who is just and justice. For then he would find grace without true penance. For true penance endeavors to lead to the purity of baptism. For a penitent ought rightly to absolve whatever of dirt he contracted after the purification of baptism at least with the tears of the mind: but he is hard enough, the sorrow of whose mind the eyes do not declare. But let him know himself to be culpably hard, who weeps for the losses of time, or the death of a friend, and does not show the sorrow of sin in tears. Whom therefore it repents, let it repent entirely." The same, "Penitents, if you are truly penitents, and are not mocking, change your life, be reconciled to God. You do penance, you fix your knees, and you laugh: you mock the patience of God. If you do penance, let it repent you: if it does not repent you, you are not a penitent. If therefore it repents, why do you do the things you did badly? If it repents to have done them, do not do them: if you still do them, certainly you are not a penitent." Also, Innocent II: "We admonish our brothers, lest they suffer the souls of the laity to be deceived by false penances, and dragged into hell. Moreover a false penance is established to be, when with many spurned, penance is done concerning one alone: or when it is so done concerning one, that it is not departed from another.

Divisio Textus

I consider that sufficient, etc. Here begins that part in which he confirms the solution through an accident. And he does two things here: namely he introduces his express authorities, and repeats what true penance is, there, G, From the premises it is perspicuous, etc.

Articulus 33 — Whether God Can Heal From One Sin And Not From Another

Whether God can heal of one sin and not of another?

§ 54. However a question falls in concerning this which he says, there, F, after the beginning: Through this he teaches us never to be healed except of all, etc.

For it is asked, Whether God can heal of one, and not of another?

It seems however, that he can: because 1. To God nothing is impossible: therefore neither that.

Also, A corporal doctor can heal of one disease, with another left: therefore much more God, who is more powerful than a corporal doctor.

1. Also, Corporal healing is a sign of spiritual healing in the miracles of the Lord, as is evident in the Letter: but in Mark it is read, that a certain blind man received sight in a certain respect, who namely saw men walking as trees: therefore for a part in that time he was also healed in a certain respect and not simply in mind: therefore God can do this not only in body, but also in mind.
2. Also, Just as in the work of creation according to the opinion of most, namely of Gregory, John Chrysostom, and others, God first produced matter according to its substance, and afterwards distinguished and adorned it: therefore it seems, that he could do similarly in the works of recreation, that namely he might make it according to something, and leave it infected according to something.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever God can do according to his goodness, someone can hope for from him: but no one ought to hope for a half pardon from him, as is said in the Letter: therefore he does not seem to be able to make a half pardon.

1. Also, Let it be given that he could: from thence thus, If he cures, he cures through some good, which conjoins to life, and puts flight to death: but with all such goods the Holy Spirit is given: therefore with such a good the Holy Spirit is given: but the Holy Spirit inhabits all such, to whom he imparts such goods: therefore the Holy Spirit inhabits such a one: but again on account of sin it is the habitation of demons: therefore the same man is the habitation of demons, and of the Holy Spirit through grace, which is absurd, and against the Apostle saying: What convention of Christ with Belial? And, What consent to the temple of God with idols?

§ 55. Solution. It must be said, that God cannot do this: because it would be impotence, and not power: just as medicine which cures half a disease, is impotence.

§ 56. To the first therefore it must be said, that nothing of those things which are of power and nobility, is impossible to God: but he cannot do weak things, such as to run, to eat, to lie, to be imperfect, and other things of this kind.

§ 57. To the next it must be said, that he was entirely healed inside and out: but the habit of sight not being coordinated, signified faith interiorly not yet confirmed from enrooting in the subject and determination of articles.

§ 58. To the next it must be said, that it is otherwise in the works of creation: because in those the imperfect is not imperfect from malice contrary to itself: but in recreation nothing is imperfect except from malice contrary to God, and to the good of his grace.

Articulus 34 — Whether All Whom Christ Healed In Body He Also Healed In Soul

Whether all whom Christ healed in body, he also healed in soul?

§ 59. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, F, around the middle: The Lord never healed anyone, whom he did not entirely free.

1. The Gloss upon John 9:1 and seq. It is asked, How did Christ illuminate this man without faith? Therefore it seems, that he did not entirely cure that man born blind, because not except on the outside.
2. Also, Another Gloss in the same place upon that: Who is he, Lord, that I may believe, etc. Now the Lord washes the face of the anointed one, now he illuminates the eyes of the heart: therefore it seems, that before he was not illuminated: therefore he was not then illuminated in heart, when he was illuminated in body.

§ 60. Solution. I think, that it is universally true what is said here in the Letter, that namely the Lord rendered healthy in both body and soul all whom he healed in body. However the Gloss upon John solves it otherwise saying, that it is understood of those who were infirm on account of sin: because in them it was necessary first to exclude the cause, before the disease would be healed: and therefore with the cause removed, they were healed in soul: and with the effect removed, they were healed in body. But I think, that that Gloss is marginal, or of a certain Victorinus, whose sayings are not of great authority.

§ 61. To that therefore which is primarily objected, it must be said that that blind man was illuminated inside, and outside but he first received an indistinct and implicit faith, which afterwards, when the Lord was known, became distinct.

§ 62. To the next it must be said, that that Gloss...

§ 1. ...is understood thus: he illuminates the anointed, that is, he determines the light of his faith and makes it distinct, so that he distinctly knows and believes him to be the Son of God in person. § 2.

Articulus 35 — Whether A Half Pardon Can Be Hoped For From God

§ 3. Whether a half-pardon can be hoped for from God? § 4. Next it is asked concerning what he says there in F, in the middle: "For it is a certain impiety of infidelity to hope for a half-pardon from him who is just and justice itself, etc." § 5. For this seems to be false: § 6. 1. For it does not contradict human justice to receive satisfaction according to a part: since therefore human justice is patterned after the divine, it seems that it ought not to contradict divine justice either. § 7. 2. Item, it seems that this would rather go against mercy than justice: because it belongs to mercy to relax sins both in whole and in part: therefore he seems to speak badly when he says, "who is just and justice itself." § 8. Moreover, why does he say, "just and justice itself"? For "just" would suffice. § 9. Solution. It must be said that it contradicts human justice to receive an amendment when the person still intends to multiply the fault: but if he offends no more, then he can satisfy by parts. But it is similar in divine justice: for he who satisfies for one and persists in the will of another, thus multiplies the fault: and therefore amendment is accepted for none. § 10. Or it may be said, as was noted above at the beginning of the distinction, that it is one way in human justice, and another in divine. § 11. And this is because man sees those things that appear, but the Lord looks at the heart: and therefore unless he has the heart, he does not receive satisfaction: but man looks to external works, which are divided, and therefore he receives divided satisfaction for them. § 12. To the argument, however, it must be said that although human justice is patterned after the divine, nevertheless something belongs to it insofar as it is human, which does not belong to the divine: and this is with respect to the outer man, and not to the inner. § 13. To the other it must be said that it belongs to mercy to relax sins freely: but to remit with the demand for amendment belongs to justice: and he speaks of such pardon here. § 14. To the other it must be said that he says "just and justice itself" by reason of simple essence, and of the effect in us: because, namely, he effects general justice in us, by which he deletes sins with the purpose of amendment: just as Aristotle says that it is called wisdom and justice insofar as it fills us with wisdom and justice. § 15.

Articulus 36 — Whether And What The Tears Of The Mind Are, And Whether He Is Culpably Hard Who Does Not Show The Sorrow Of Sin By Tears

§ 16. Whether and what are the tears of the mind? And, whether he is culpably hard who does not show sorrow for sin by tears? § 17. Next it is asked concerning what he says there in F, after the middle: "It is necessary that he wash at least with tears of the mind, etc." § 18. For it seems that there are no tears of the mind: because § 19. 1. Nothing is difficult to the mind in itself, because it is of a spiritual nature: therefore it is not subjected to passion: but no tears are without passion: therefore there are no tears of the mind. And that a purely spiritual nature is not subject to passions, Aristotle says that sorrows and pleasures are generations into the sensible soul. § 21. 2. If you say that tears of the mind are tears of the will, which are in the mind, that is, to will to have tears, and to will to weep. On the contrary: A will not coming to act is imperfect: but this is not reputed for the deed: therefore such a will does not suffice: therefore neither do the tears of the mind, as it seems. § 22. 3. Item, to will to weep for sins belongs to many who still persist in sin: therefore they have tears of the mind: therefore they wash away the filth they contracted, which is false: therefore what is said here about tears of the mind is false. § 23. 4. Item, it was held above that the penitent ought to rejoice about his sorrow: but it is manifest that he ought to rejoice according to the mind, and not according to sense and flesh: therefore he ought to have tears and joy according to the same thing: and this because it is said that he ought to have tears of the mind: therefore he is commanded to have contraries at the same time, namely sorrow and joy, and according to the same thing, which is impossible: therefore an impossibility is commanded him: which is contrary to Jerome who says, "Let him be anathema who says God has commanded the impossible." § 24. Further it is asked concerning what he says there in F, before the end: "Let him know himself to be culpably hard, who weeps for the losses of time, or the death of a friend, and does not show sorrow for sin in tears." § 25. For this seems to be false: because § 26. 1. Weeping is not a sign of greater sorrow. Hence we do not see the most constant men weep in maximum sorrows, but rather we see women weep. § 27. 2. Item, let us posit that he who weeps at the death of a friend cannot weep for sins, and yet would will to be able: then therefore according to this Letter he is culpably hard. § 28. On the contrary: He does what is in him: therefore God gives him grace: therefore he has no fault: therefore he is not culpably hard, as it seems. § 29. Further it is asked, § 30. 1. Since there are many other signs of sorrow, such as thinness of voice, sighing, and other such things, why does he make no mention of these? § 31. 2. Moreover, thinness of voice is a more infallible sign of sorrow than weeping, as the wise in natural things say: therefore he ought to have made mention of that rather than this. § 32. Item, that which is a sign of temperate sorrow does not signify supreme sorrow insofar as it is such: weeping is a sign of temperate sorrow: therefore it does not signify sorrow in the highest degree. The minor is proved from this that, as the wise in natural things say: great sorrow is more drying of the moist than of resolution through tears: therefore the Master posits this sign badly. § 33. 3. Item, we often see some weep much in confessions, and yet not be prompt for works of satisfaction: but some weep nothing at all, and are prepared for all things enjoined for sins: therefore it is clear that weeping is a fallible sign of sorrow: therefore if he does not weep, he is not culpably hard on this account. § 34. Item, we generally see women weep more than men, and yet men frequently sustain harder things for sins: therefore, etc. § 35. If this be conceded: it will first be against the Letter. § 36. Secondly, against what is said of Mary Magdalene , that she began to wash his feet with tears, etc. § 37. Item, against what is said that Peter, going outside, wept bitterly: and washed his crimes through weeping, as Ambrose says. § 38. Item, Gregory: "Among the feasts she offered tears, and by tears she washed the stains of crime." § 39. Item, Gregory: "You ask, By what art could Magdalene be cured? She wept bitterly, and drawing sighs from her inmost parts, kindled by saving sobs, she vomited forth the gall-like humors." § 41. Item, this seems to be against the example of the Lord, who wept for us. "Who in the days of his flesh, offering prayers and supplications to him who was able to save him from death, with a strong cry and tears, was heard for his reverence." § 42. Item, he wept over the city of Jerusalem . And over Lazarus . § 43. And: "Let us weep before the Lord who made us." § 44. Item: "I have heard your prayer, and seen your tears." § 45. Therefore it seems that tears are exacted in penance. § 46. Solution. It must be said without prejudice that tears of the mind are a complete will to weep, if by accident tears were not impeded. But I say this accident is twofold, namely dryness of complexion, because the heat excited by the sorrow of penance then dries the brain more than it resolves it into tears. § 47. Item, excessive sorrow exciting heat that consumes the moisture of the brain: just as we see in the external world that dry air does not rain: and when it is temperately moist, the strong heat of the sun consumes the moisture, and again it does not rain: and in these two ways the one who does not weep can sorrow more than he who weeps much: and in such the tears of the mind are possessed. § 48. There is also still one mode not founded in nature, but in constancy of mind, namely when a man contains himself lest he weep, so that he may be more hidden before God, and then again the tears of the mind suffice before the priest: but when he is alone, he lets go the reins to tears, as blessed Augustine did in his conversion: because when he is alone, he has no witness except God, before whom he is ashamed of the sin. But in others bodily tears are exacted. § 49. Therefore, to what is first objected, it must be said that the mind is considered in two ways, namely as the mind which is absolute from the body, existing as the act of no body, and as a nature moving and ruling the passible nature on the part of sense, where there is conjunction to the body. And in the first way indeed passion does not pertain to it, but rather in the second, yet by redundancy from the lower nature of the sensible part which is subjected to passions in itself. § 50. To the other it must be said that a complete will of weeping is reputed for the tears of the mind themselves: and that this does not have effect, is impeded by accident, as was said. § 51. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is an imperfect will from the imperfection of desire: and of this it is true that it is not reputed for the deed. There is also an incomplete will, not insofar as it is a will, but insofar as the faculty of fulfilling what it desires is lacking: and this is reputed for the deed. § 52. To the other it must be said that in such persons the will is imperfect from the imperfection of desire and appetite, because they do not desire sufficiently: and therefore it is not reputed for the deed for them. § 53. To the other it must be said that it is not impossible to rejoice about sorrow: because sorrow is there as the matter of joy, and then it does not have contrariety to it, just as you will also find noted above: but to rejoice and sorrow simultaneously about the same thing and according to the same thing, cannot happen: and therefore no impossible thing is commanded to the penitent. § 54. To the other it must be said that the Letter speaks there of him in whom tears are not impeded by an accident of complexion, or constancy, but only from imperfection of desire for pardon for sins: and of him it says the truth. § 55. And to the argument the solution is clear through the things said before. To the other it must be said that women without doubt weep more, and the Letter speaks of such. § 56. To the other it must be said that he who weeps at the death of a friend can be disposed in two ways in repenting: for if the sorrow for sins is greater than for temporal death, then the greater sorrow dries up the moisture of the brain in him, so that he cannot weep: and then he is of greater praise than if he wept. But if it is of lesser sorrow: then it is a sign that he sorrows less about a spiritual thing and the loss of the soul, than about a temporal thing and loss of the body: because the heat aroused concerning a temporal thing sufficed to resolve the moisture of the brain into weeping: but the small heat aroused concerning a spiritual loss does not suffice to move it: just as we see that when cold exists in the macrocosm, even if the air is temperately moist, it does not rain, because the cold constricts and impedes resolution: and the Letter speaks in this way. § 58. To what is asked about other signs that could be posited, it must be said that those signs do not indicate one thing, but dubiously indicate two or more: just as thinness of voice is more a sign of weakness of the spiritual parts than of voluntary sorrow which is in penance: but groaning can be a sign of weakness, or sadness, or melancholy, because melancholic persons groan much: and therefore those signs are less common: but sorrow as it happens frequently is indicated by tears, unless it is impeded by accident, as was said: and therefore he does not posit other signs like tears. § 59. To the other it must be said that great sorrow is indicated by great tears, unless the complexion is repugnant, as was said. § 60. To the other it must be said that tears indicate sorrow: but nevertheless the confessor ought to test whether that sorrow is of the contrite or the attrite: and the sign that he can best have of this is that he tests whether the penitent freely receives the enjoined penance: for if he receives it freely, it is a sign of contrition: if not, it will be judged to have been a sign of insufficient attrition: nor is it inconvenient that several signs are required for the same thing. § 61.

Articulus 37 — Whether This Saying Holds, "If Therefore You Repent, Why Do You Do What You Have Done Badly"

§ 62. Whether this saying holds, "If therefore he repents, why do you do the things you have done badly?" § 63. Next it is asked concerning what he says there in F, near the end: "If therefore he repents, why do you do the things you have done badly?" § 64. For this seems not to hold: because often penance is of the past, and not of the future by reason of the sweetness adjoined to the future: therefore it seems that what he says is not true. § 65. Item, concerning that of which there is no fruit, but shame, there is penance when it has passed: and such is sin: therefore penance is of the past, and it is not necessary that it also be of the future: for as the Philosopher says, in such things we rather will to act than to have acted: because it is better to be delighted, than to have ceased to be delighted. § 66. Solution. It must be said that Augustine speaks of those who repent of sin insofar as it is an offense against God: and not insofar as there is a shameful delight in it which we will when it has passed: and therefore we are drawn to it in the present and in the future: and then what he says is plain: because he who repents of sin insofar as it is an offense against God, avoids the future, which is also an offense against God. § 67. And through this the solution to the whole is clear. § 68.

Articulus 38 — Whether The Two Modes Of False Penance Are Well Assigned By The Master

thers, lest they allow the souls of the laity to be deceived by false penances, and dragged into hell, etc." § 72. For he posits two modes of false penance in the Letter, namely "when having spurned many, penance is done for one alone, or when it is done for one such that there is no departure from another." § 73. But it seems that these two modes are one mode: because § 74. 1. He who does not depart from another spurns it: and to spurn many is the same as not to depart from them through affection and purpose of not committing further: therefore it seems that these modes are one mode alone. § 75. 2. Item, since there are many other modes of false penance, namely when those responding to the sin are not enjoined, but heavier or lighter ones, why does he not touch upon those modes? § 76. Item it is asked: for it is manifest that here he calls "penances" that which is enjoined externally by the priest for the amendment of the fault. But it seems that by no such thing are they deceived and dragged into hell: because before the enjoined penance, contrition wrought the remission of the fault of sin: and he whose fault is remitted, is not dragged into hell: therefore what he says seems to be false. § 77. 3. Item, this is of common right, that a man recognize the quantity of his offense in general: therefore ignorance of it excuses no one: therefore since all are bound to know it, it seems that they cannot be deceived about this. § 78. 4. Item, from a similar case they can understand that such penances are false: because they do not satisfy a man, who thus placate him in one thing that they provoke him to anger in another: therefore they can know by themselves that they do not satisfy God, who so repent of one that they sin in another: therefore they are not deceived about this, as it seems. § 79. To this it must be said that he calls false penance here a false mode of repenting, which is of one such that it is not of another. § 80. To the first, however, it must be said that those two modes differ: because the first is when penance is done for one, and not for another, which yet is not reiterated in act. But the second is when it is done for one, and another is reiterated: and that is more false than the first. And what he says, "having spurned many," is understood to spurn in the sense of making little of a sin, so as to do penance for it, because he does not consider it to be so great. § 81. To the other it must be said that that is not always false penance, when little or more is enjoined: because this can and ought to be done for diverse causes: and he does not treat here except of penances which are always false and damnable. § 82. To the other it must be said that it is of common right that a man know his sin: and this indeed every man does when offering himself to the priest: but it is not of common right that he repent thus or thus, but rather of special right, about which even the wise feel diversely: and therefore he is not bound to know it, unless he learns it by another's teaching: and therefore he can be deceived about these things. § 83. To the other it must be said that it may well be that conscience dictates such a mode of penance to be false: yet on account of the sweetness of the sin he is made ignorant, not in the speculative intellect, but in the practical: and therefore then he can be deceived: because he wills as it were to be deceived, just as the Lord says: "They deceived my people, etc." , and: "The prophets prophesied a lie, and the priests applauded with their hands." On account of which he commands: "Cry, cease not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and announce to my people their wicked doings, and to the house of Jacob their sins." § 84.

Articulus 39 — Whether And What True Penance Is

§ 85. Whether and what is true penance? § 86. Next it is asked concerning what is said there in G, after the first words: "For that is true penance, which abolishes sin, etc." § 87. For it is asked, what is the difference between true penance, and worthy penance? § 88. But it seems that there is none: because § 89. 1. They have the same opposite: for an unworthy penance is insufficient: therefore it does not correct the crime, nor abolish the sin: therefore it is not true: since therefore they have one opposite, it seems that they are one. § 91. 2. Item, since "true" is said in many ways, it is asked, according to what mode is "true" taken here, when it is called "true penance." For if "true" is said to be the indivision of being and what is: since such truth is from the form, it seems every penance is true: because every penance is penance from the form of penance, which signifies what it was to be: and the circumstance of the letter does not seem to will this, because "true" seems to restrict penance: therefore some penance will be non-true, as it seems. § 92. Solution. To the first it must be said that worthy and true differ: because true speaks of a penance unmixed with the contraries of penance: just as it is called truly white, which is unmixed with other intermediate and contrary colors: and true gold, unmixed with other baser metal. But "worthy" signifies the due quantity of penance, namely that it be according to the quantity of the fault made at discretion without fraud. § 93. To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the argument is invalid, "They have one opposite: therefore they are one and the same": and it is the fallacy of the consequent. And there is an instance: because involuntary through ignorance, and involuntary through violence, have one opposite which is voluntary: nor however on account of this are they the same. And because the Philosopher says, that if one of the opposites is multiplex, so is the other, the proposition must be understood in many ways: and this solution is taken in book V of the Ethics, in the text and in the commentary. § 94. Or it may be better said, that the opposite is not said in one way, insofar as it is opposed to those two: for "unworthy" can be said by reason of quantity, or by reason of essence: and in the first way it is opposed to "worthily": in the second way it is opposed to "truly". § 95. To the other it must be said that "true" here signifies unmixed with a baser alien thing, as was said: just as we say true gold and true silver: and truth is not taken there in common as it is the indivision of being and what is, unless being is taken as pure and unmixed. § 96. And through this the solution to the whole is clear. § 97.

Articulus 40 — Whether Perfect Penance Compels The Sinner Willingly To Endure All Things

§ 98. Whether perfect penance compels the sinner to sustain all things freely? § 99. Next it can be asked, Whether perfect penance compels the sinner to sustain all things freely? § 100. For this seems false: because it is not necessary that he freely sustain all things, nor do all things, but rather only things necessary for salvation. § 101. If you say that the distribution is accommodated, and it distributes only for things necessary for salvation. § 102. It still seems to be false what he says, because § 103. 1. Confession is in the mouth, contrition in the heart, total humility in the work: because contrition alone frequently works salvation: therefore it seems that the rest are not exacted. § 104. 2. Item, a crime was always corrected by penance: but there was not always confession of the mouth, and enjoined satisfaction: therefore those, as it seems, are not exacted. § 105. But concerning this there will be a question in the following distinction: and therefore let us pass over it here. § 106. It must be said to the first, that the distribution is accommodated: and it is understood of the things necessary to the penitent in such or such a crime for salvation. § 107. To the other it must be said that just as we said above in the treatise on baptism, something operates in another or with another in two ways, namely by power, and by essence. And it is true indeed that essentially those three are not always required for the deletion of any sin even accepted singularly: hence contrition does not in its own power alone delete sin, but as it is with the vow of confessing and satisfying: and then confession and satisfaction are in it by power, and not by essence: and this suffices when an article of necessity, not contempt of religion, excludes the sacrament. § 109.

Articulus 41 — Whether It Can Be Said That Someone Has Been Unable To Amend A Sin

§ 110. Whether it can be said that someone was unable to amend a sin? § 111. Next it is asked concerning what he says there in G, in the middle: "So that he was not only unable to amend, etc." § 112. For this seems to be false: for if he was unable to amend it, then it is not to be imputed to him: but it is imputed to him: therefore he was able to amend. § 113. Solution. It must be said that according to the common mode of speaking he is said not to be able who cannot while remaining in such a state, although simply speaking he could do it: just as we say, those persisting in the will of transgressing cannot amend their faults. And this mode is attributed to Judas: because being led by penance concerning the betrayal, he persisted in the will of transgressing, namely of hanging himself. § 114.

Articulus 42 — What Restitution Is

§ 115. What is restitution? § 116. Next it is asked concerning what is said there in G, near the end: "Nor should anyone think on that account, who unjustly abstracted an alien thing, etc." § 117. Here four things are asked about restitution: namely, what is restitution? Secondly, what ought to be restored? Thirdly, to whom ought restitution to be made? And fourthly, how does restitution relate to the works of penance? § 118. To the first, the Jurists say thus, that restitution is the returning or compensation of an abstracted thing. § 119. But it seems that this does not fit: because § 120. 1. Many things are restored which are not abstracted, like deposited, leased, and loaned things: therefore it seems that this description is invalid. § 121. 2. Item, it happens that something is abstracted which cannot be compensated, such as fame, which is better than any other temporal good: therefore it is not compensated by it: therefore restitution is not made by it. § 122. 3. Item, virginity is violently abstracted from some girl: and that cannot be compensated: and yet it happens that satisfaction is made for the sin: therefore it seems that it is not compensation of an abstracted thing. § 123. 4. Item, many are bound to restitution who do not abstract, but command to be abstracted, or give counsel about abstracting, or do something of this sort: therefore it seems that it is not generally true, that restitution is of an abstracted thing, etc. § 124. For the sake of this it is further asked, Who are they who are bound to restore? And verses are given about this: § 125. Command, counsel, consent, flatterer, recourse, Participant, mute, non-obstructor, non-manifester. § 126. But concerning the first, it seems that command does not always make one bound to restitution: because § 127. 1. There is the command of one not having jurisdiction over him to whom he commands: and then it is not done on account of his command: therefore he is not bound to restore. § 128. 2. Item, no more is exacted in restitution than was inflicted in damage: but only one inflicted the damage, namely the one robbing: therefore he alone is bound to restore, and not the commander. § 130. It is also objected concerning the second which is counsel: for one counseling a deed does not directly operate towards its being done: therefore it seems that he does not directly act: therefore also he is not directly bound to restitution. § 131. But it is objected concerning the third which is consent: for all consent who will something to be done, and rejoice about the deed: if therefore consent makes one bound to restitution, it seems that all who will the damage of someone, and rejoice concerning the inflicted damage, are bound to restitution: which would be burdensome to say, because § 132. 1. Not all such persons can be induced to restitution. § 133. 2. Item, the Philosopher in the fifth Ethics, where he speaks of justice, seems to mean that no one is bound to restore unless he has more than he ought: but neither the counselor nor the consenter, on account of the fact that he consents or counsels, has more than he ought: therefore it seems unjust that he be compelled to restitution. § 134. It is further objected concerning the flatterer. For the flatterer is an adulator: but it seems that he operates nothing towards inflicting damage: therefore it seems that he is not bound to restore the damage. § 135. Moreover, if the flatterer is bound, what will be of clerics and religious who persuade the prince of the land to such appropriations which are unjust, or do not make him restore, or are silent? For if the flatterer is bound, they too are bound: and this they do not concede. § 136. It is further asked concerning what is called recourse. For it is understood of him to whom those illicitly robbing have recourse, as to a defender, or preserver, etc.: and since he receives nothing of the alien property, as is supposed here, but preserves those having recourse to him for affection or consanguinity, it seems he is not bound to restore. § 137. But concerning participation it is asked, whether they are bound for the whole (in solidum)? And it seems not, since they receive only a part. § 138. It is also objected concerning the mute: for a mute is one who does not reprehend, nor protest: but many are such, especially in the robbery of princes, even religious: therefore all such are bound to restitution, which is difficult to say. § 139. It is further objected concerning the non-obstructor. Because not all would easily restore who could prohibit, and do not prohibit. § 140. Item, they are not bound to prohibit: therefore it seems they do not sin if they do not prohibit. § 141. The last especially seems untrue, namely the non-manifester. For sometimes the abstractor would be manifested with danger to the body: and then it seems that he is even bound not to manifest. § 142. Item, thieves are often known by holy men: and they are not manifested: therefore it seems that this does not make one bound to restitution. § 143. Solution. It must be said that restitution is sufficiently well defined through that mode, namely that it is the returning or compensation of an abstracted thing. Because an abstracted thing is either restored as numerically the same, and then it is returned: or in equality, and then it is compensated. § 144. To what is first objected, it must be said that restitution is only of an abstracted thing: and returning also respects this: because what is had is not returned, but what was in some way lost: and therefore it is nothing against this that is objected concerning leased things, and other things of this sort. § 145. To the other it must be said that these and such things are solved in the Letter, namely that it is understood of goods of fortune which can be restored: because if an action which the debitor's poverty excludes is void, much more void is an action which the impossibility of restitution excludes. § 146. Or it may be said, that one happens to restore in two ways, namely according to the value of the abstracted thing, or according to the acceptation of him from whom something was abstracted. And th-

...although in the first way certain things cannot be restored, nevertheless it happens that they are restored in the second way: and this is restitution according to the arbitration of good men: and this is done whenever the debtor does whatever he can to satisfy the injured party: for whether the injured party then remits it or not, the one who took it is nevertheless excused before God.

§ 1. To that which is further asked about the number of those things which work toward the taking away, and make one bound to restitution: some have said that not all of those things make one bound, but five of them make one bound unconditionally, and the others only in certain cases. And it seems to me that they speak the truth. Now, the five which unconditionally make one bound to restitution are these: command, consent, recourse, participating, and not hindering when one is bound to hinder.

§ 2. Now, command makes one bound: because he acts principally who commands [a thing] to be done: and the taken thing falls to his use or that of his people: for otherwise masters who do not take with their own hands, but command to be taken, would not be bound to restitution.

And through this the solution to the first objection about this is evident.

To the next it must be said that this is false, that only one inflicted the damage: rather, many and diverse persons inflict the damage, and therefore they are bound to restitution: especially, however, when the taken thing falls to the uses of the commander: but nevertheless, even if it did not so fall, if because of his command the thing is lost, he himself is bound to restore.

To that which is objected about the second, namely about counsel, it must be said that not every counselor, in my judgment, is bound, but only he who gives efficacious counsel, such that his counsel probably causes the thing to be lost.

To that which is objected about counsel and consent, it must be said that the counselor or consenter himself operates directly in his own way: because many things concur for one act, without any of which it would not be done: as there are counselors like Achitophel, who, wishing to please robbers and tyrants, invent evil modes of extorting and taking; and emissaries who execute what is dictated by their counsel: and of those it is understood that they are bound to restore.

To the next it must be said that Aristotle accepts "having more" very broadly. For someone is said to have more who by any means whatever has extorted the thing of another, not because he has it in use, but because the other has lost it by injury: and in this way directive justice makes him compensate the damage which he inflicted.

To that which is said about the flatterer, it must be said that not every flatterer is bound: but he who, by praising in the act of taking, incites to the taking: saying that this is a sign of vigor, or that otherwise he could not rule, or that this is owed to him by common right as the lord of the land, or something of this sort.

To the next it must be said that, as it seems to me, whether clerics or religious, flattering in this, they are bound to restitution.

To that which is objected concerning recourse, it must be said that it is understood of him to whom recourse is had, as to a defender and preserver of robbers and robbery: as are certain hosts of thieves, and others who make themselves defenders and advocates of such men. But if he is sometimes bound by proximity of blood, I do not believe that because of this he is bound to restitution: or even if he were bound, when he is sought for judgment, by reason of the compassion of nature and the hope of repentance, I believe that in such a case he to whom recourse is had gains merit.

To that which is objected further about the mute [i.e., the silent person], it must be said that only that silent person is judged [liable] who is bound ex officio to cry out, and does not cry out: and even he, I do not believe, is bound universally to restitution, but rather then when he is silent while consenting to and promoting what is being done. But it is true that if he is bound ex officio to cry out, and does not cry out: if he wishes to do penance, he is bound by crying out to cooperate with the injured party, so that satisfaction may be made to him.

And through this the solution to what was objected against this is evident.

§ 3. To that which is objected concerning the one not hindering, it seems it must be said that it is understood of him who is bound ex officio to hinder: such as a baron, or prince, who, since he receives the tributes of the land in order to pacify the land, if he does not hinder those taking illicitly, he himself is bound to restore.

Concerning the last, namely concerning the one not manifesting, it must be said that it is not understood of every one who does not manifest, but only of him who by concealing is a participant in the gain and the crime.

And therefore the objections against this do not hold.

Articulus 43 — What Ought To Be Restored, And How It Is To Be Restored

What ought to be restored? and, How is it to be restored?

§ 1. Secondly, it is asked what ought to be restored?

And this is a difficult question. For since the taken thing ought to be restored, it happens that a reputation is taken, sometimes by truth, and sometimes by a lie: as if we suppose that someone defamed the crime of another, a true one indeed, but nevertheless hidden: if he ought to restore it, it seems that he sins: because if he says, "I said this falsely in order to defame him": he himself lies, because he spoke the truth. Therefore, since every man ought to avoid a lie, it seems that he ought to avoid restitution. But if he says thus: "I indeed spoke the truth, yet with the evil intention of defaming", he will defame him more: because he will be believed more than before: therefore he will injure more the second time than the first.

If you say that a reputation ought not to be restored. On the contrary: 1. That which is possessed more dearly, is lost most unwillingly: but a reputation is possessed more dearly than gold and silver: therefore it is lost most unwillingly: therefore it seems that it mostly ought to be restored.

1. Again, Jerome: "Cruel is he who neglects reputation" but he who does not demand the restitution of reputation, neglects reputation: therefore he is cruel: therefore it seems that even this injury ought not to be remitted without compensation: therefore anyone is bound to demand the restitution of such a thing: therefore someone is bound to pay: but it is certain that no one is, except he who took it: therefore he is bound to restore.

§ 2. In the same way, there is a grave case concerning him who impedes someone so that he does not attain what he would have had if the other did not impede him, such as a prebend, or a dignity, or whatever spiritual or secular things, because with respect to this case they do not differ, whether he is bound to restitution if he is able?

If you say that he is. On the contrary: 1. Nothing has been taken from this man: because nothing is taken except what is possessed, but this man did not yet possess it: therefore it seems that he is not bound.

1. Again, How will he restore if he is bound: for if he has the prebend or Church, and impeded the other from attaining it, it seems that he is bound to withdraw from his own, and cause the other to be invested: and this is grave to say, because few or none would do this.

But if you say that he is not bound. On the contrary: He gives the occasion of damage: therefore he must be interpreted to have done the damage: therefore he is bound to restitution.

Again, If I were to ask you, whether he who thus impeded his neighbor: sinned, or not? And if you should say that he sinned. Let it be asked therefore further, whether against God only, or against God and against the neighbor? You will say, that against God and against the neighbor. But if it is again asked, by what genus of sin did he sin against the neighbor? you will say, by damaging the neighbor. Therefore, since every one who causes damage is bound to restitution, this man will be bound.

§ 3. Again, It is asked concerning him who by plowing turns over seeds, how is he bound to restitution?

For if you say that he is bound to pay the future fruits. On the contrary: Fruits could be impeded by many causes: therefore they were not yet held to be certain: therefore he did not take fruits: therefore he is not bound to render them.

But if you say that only the seeds. On the contrary: A thing is worth as much as it can be sold for: but he would receive more for a sown field by selling it than for the seeds: therefore he is bound to render more.

§ 4. Again it is asked, Whether those laws of the Lord which are touched upon concerning restitution, Exod. 22:1, namely, that a sheep be rendered fourfold, and an ox fivefold, still hold or not?

It seems that they do: because they are concerning morals and necessary for salvation: therefore they still hold. The proof of the first is: because restitution is of things necessary for salvation, and of the morals of men.

On the contrary: 1. Here in the Text no more is said, except that the taken thing be restored: therefore it seems that he is not bound to more.

1. Again, We see that in a judgment one is not condemned to more than he inflicted in damage: therefore he is not bound to more.
2. Again, Aristotle says that the just is of such a kind that one renders as much as he inflicted in damage: but it is certain that if he renders more, there will be inequality: therefore, since inequality is the same as injustice, it is unjust if he is forced to give more, as it seems.

§ 5. Solution. It seems it must be said that for everything taken which is lost with sorrow, and which is possessed with pleasure and utility or honesty, there follows an obligation to restitution on the part of the one taking it by whatever means he takes it: as many modes were held in the preceding article of this question.

To that, however, which is first asked, I say that the detractor is bound to restitution, but reputation is twofold, namely in a matter pertaining to true praise, the opposite of which is truly blame: and this is virtue and life according to virtue, or at least without vice, because nothing is truly worthy of praise except the act of virtue. There is also reputation in knowledge, or military service, and the like: in which there is no praise except a vain one. And the first, he who took it unjustly is bound to restore. But he does not take unjustly who speaks where it ought to be of benefit, namely to a Prelate, or to several reproving persons: and if this does not avail, denounces it to the Church, so that by confusion the sinner may repent: for he does not take away such a reputation, but manifests the veil of malice. But if with the intention of defaming he vomits forth evils, I say that he is bound to restore, provided however he vomits forth criminal things.

To this, however, which is objected, I say that even if what he said is true, he himself can go to those to whom he spoke, and say that he spoke with the intention of defaming. But if it is asked whether he spoke the truth or not? To this he is not bound to answer, but to evade cautiously without a lie, as Augustine teaches in the book De Mendacio. And through this the solution to the second is evident, and to all the things that are asked concerning that.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that he who impedes another: either impedes justly, namely because he knows him to be unworthy of such an honor or such a thing, and then he is not bound: or unjustly, and then I say that he is bound to make satisfaction, but not however to render the thing, because the other had not yet attained that thing: but this satisfaction ought to be made according to the possibility of the one satisfying, and the arbitration of good men.

To this, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that he does not give the occasion of damage for a thing which is possessed, but which it was probable to possess, yet by some chance it could happen not to be possessed, because unforeseen misfortunes often occur.

To the next it must be said that this man sinned against his neighbor by damaging him: but not as much as if the thing itself had quietly already been possessed: and therefore he is not bound to so much, but according to the arbitration of good men.

§ 7. To that which is further asked concerning the third case, it must be said that to solve it is not difficult: but he is bound to as much as a sown field was accustomed to be sold for at that time: and this is more and less, according as the fruits are expected nearer or farther from the harvest.

§ 8. To this which is asked about the laws, Exod. 22:1, it must be said that today they do not hold unless they are sanctioned by a new constitution. For judicial laws of this sort were having something of signification about the future: and as to the fact that they were judicial, for the time and place they aggregated more or less into a terror of that vice which was vigorous in the populace, so that namely they might more quickly turn the populace away from such a vice. But according as they had something of signification about the future, along with other ceremonies they are fulfilled and evacuated in the New Testament.

To this, however, which is objected, that they are concerning morals, it must be said that they are indeed concerning morals: but they are not properly moral, according as moral things are divided against judicial ones: because in this way moral precepts are only those which command the acts of some moral virtue: but this does not happen in those [laws], rather it was for the terror of those aggravating damage, because through avarice they freely snatched the things of others, especially animals, which were abundant in that populace at that time.

Articulus 44 — To Whom Restitution Ought To Be Made

To whom ought restitution to be made?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, To whom ought restitution to be made?

For let us suppose that he who has the thing of another does not know whose it was: then, since he does not know to whom he owes it, he seems to be absolved from the obligation: because everything which someone owes, he owes to someone.

Again, let us suppose that someone knows: but the person is so remote that he cannot reach him without great difficulty: and it is asked, what should be done then? or if he knows him to whom he owes, yet does not know where he remains, or he cannot be found? For if he then gives to the poor, it can be that the person is by chance found afterwards. Since therefore it has not been restored to him, it would be necessary that he restore a second time: and this would be unjust: therefore he is bound to keep it until he comes, or his arrival is despaired of. And then it is asked, when is that? It can be that he makes sons in a distant place: and tells them that such a man is bound to him, and when his own life is despaired of, afterwards the sons to whom he must restore will appear: and in this way his arrival will never be despaired of, either in himself or in his heirs.

§ 2. Again, let us suppose that someone has unjustly taken [something] in some military expedition, and does not know to whom he did damage specially. For if he gives it to the poor, it is asked to which ones he is bound, and at whose arbitration ought the compensation to be made?

For it seems that he is bound more to the poor of that land in which he did the damage, than in another in which the damager dwells: because perhaps some one of the poor of the land in which he inflicted the damage was reduced to poverty by him, and that one ought to have the compensation.

§ 3. Again, let it be supposed that someone, by the license of some Prelate, unjustly claims for himself the goods of the Church, which the Prelate cannot give, it is asked, to whom ought restitution to be made?

If you say, to the Church. On the contrary: The Prelate holds the goods of the Church: and he conceded or gave the goods to this man: therefore they are not taken away from him; therefore restitution ought not to be made to him, [and] since no one else has a right, it seems that to no one: which is absurd, since the goods of the Church cannot be held by him.

§ 4. Again, let us suppose that someone lent his money to someone gratis until a certain day of the fairs, and then he does not return it, and the other is impeded from his licit business: it is certain that he damaged him: therefore he is bound to render: and it is asked, in what, and how much?

§ 5. Solution. These and such things have to be considered more by Jurists than by Theologians: and therefore without prejudice I say what seems reasonable.

To the first therefore it must be said that when the true master is not known, the poor are the heirs: and he is not absolved from the obligation unless he gives it to the poor.

To the next it must be said that one must distinguish: for either the debt is so great that he ought deservedly to undergo the journey, or not. If so: then he is bound to send or carry it to him, unless the return of him to whom the damage was inflicted is hoped for. But if it is little, and his return is not hoped for, I say that it must be given to his relatives with such a protestation, that they should give or compensate the principal party if he should come. But if he does not have relatives, I would counsel that it be given to some monastery with such a promise confirmed by writing, that if ever any of his heirs appears, or he himself, the monastery would restore it, or would be bound to answer for it.

To the next I well concede that he who is in an expedition, what he took, he is bound more to render to the poor of that land in which he did the damage, than in another where he dwells. And also at the arbitration of the Bishop of that place which was damaged, the restitution ought to be made, namely for the common work of the town, or to the poor of the same town, or in another way as it will reasonably seem expedient to the Bishop.

To this which is asked about him who has the goods of the Church, I say that he is bound to restore to the Church, so that it may devolve to the Prelate who is the successor: because he who conceded it, does not merit to receive it.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 45 — How The Works Of Restitution Relate To The Works Of Penance

How are the works of restitution related to the works of penance?

§ 1. Lastly it is asked, How do the works of restitution relate to the works of penance?

It seems that they are of penance. 1. For penance itself is a remedy for actual sin; since therefore restitution is for the emendation of any such sin, it seems to be a part of satisfaction: therefore it is also a part of penance: because whatever is a part of a part, is a part of the whole.

1. Again, In penance according as it is a sacrament, a man is perfectly reconciled to God and neighbor: but to restore is for compensation and reconciliation to the neighbor: therefore it is a part of penance, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Penance [poenitentia] is said as if a holding of a penalty [poenae tenentia], and sorrow for what one has forfeited: but for restitution such sorrow is not required, but however he restores, whether sorrowing or not sorrowing, he himself is released from the obligation by which he was bound to restore: therefore it is not of penance as a part.

1. Again, Penance releases from sin: but rendering only releases from the debt of obligation to the neighbor, and not from sin: therefore it is not a part of penance.
2. Again, One must do penance from one's own property: but restitution is always from another's property: therefore, etc.

4. Again, If it is a part of penance, it is certain that it is only a part of a part, which is satisfaction, which is either almsgiving, or prayer, or fasting, because satisfaction does not have more parts in genus: but it is certain that it is none of those: therefore it is not a part of penance.

§ 2. Solution. It must be said according to the ancients, that it is not a part, but is presupposed in the penitent, as a disposition of the penitent lest he be fictitious: and this the ancients called the foundation: whence they said that restitution is the foundation of satisfaction, and consequently of penance.

To that, however, which is first objected, it must be said that it itself is not a remedy of a certain sin, or a destroyer of sin, but rather is a disposition presupposed in him in whom through penance sin is destroyed.

To the next it must be said that the restorer is reconciled to the neighbor in two ways, namely insofar as he is bound to him for the damage inflicted, and in this way restitution reconciles, not penance properly speaking: or insofar as the neighbor was de-edified [i.e., scandalized] through the evil example: and thus satisfaction by good works reconciles, and penance consequently. And so it is understood that a man through penance is reconciled to God and neighbor: for restitution is received even from one who is not penitent: as the things objected to the contrary well prove.

DISTINCTIO XVI

Divisio Textus

"Now in the perfection of penance three [things are required]", etc. Here begins that part which is about the parts of penance.

And it is divided into two parts, in the first of which the difference of these parts is handed down. But in the second it is asked, Whether one without another can work the destruction of sin? and this begins in the following distinction.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sacrament Of Penance Is One

Is the sacrament of penance one?

Is the sacrament of penance one?

§ 1. To the FIRST it is thus objected: 1. The sacraments of the Church are only seven: but this would not happen if penance were several sacraments: therefore penance is only one sacrament.

1. Again, A per se cause whose effect is one, is itself one according to the ratio of that causality: but the effect of this sacrament is one, namely the deletion of actual sin: therefore penance which is the cause of the sacramental deletion, is one. The minor is evident per se: but the major is evident from this, that in one ratio of causality, there is only one cause of one effect, as is proved in the second book of the Physics, and the fifth of the Metaphysics of Aristotle.

Again, The act is one, namely to weep over committed things with a purpose of emendation: therefore penance also is one, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing is one for the perfection of which three things are required: but for the perfection of penance three things are required: therefore it itself is not one. The proof of the first is in the fifth book of the First Philosophy, where the Philosopher says thus: "The substance of anything is according to once, as six is not twice three, but once; for six is once six." But the minor is written in the Text at the beginning of this distinction.

1. Again, It is impossible that one habit acting (unless nature acts) be the principle of acts separated diverse in species: but if penance is one, it will be a habit of this sort, as is certain from the things said above: therefore it cannot be the principle of diverse acts separated in species: but it is the principle of such acts: therefore it is not one. Proof that it is the principle of such acts: because to be contrite, to confess, to pray, and to fast, and to give alms, are acts diverse in species, to which penance moves: therefore it itself is not directed to one thing, as it seems.

§ 2. It is asked further, If it is one, of what sort is that one?

For many modes of 'one' are posited by diverse Authors, as well Saints, as Philosophers. The Saints are Bernard in the fifth book On Consideration. And Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, and Boethius in the book On Unity and the One. The Philosophers however are Aristotle in the fifth book of the First Philosophy, and Avicenna in his metaphysics, and Al-gazel: and it would be long to posit the distinctions of all of them: nor is it necessary, because some do not say 'one' absolutely, but only in a certain respect.

It is asked therefore, whether it is one by form?

And it seems that it is: 1. For everything which is truly one, is one by some form making it one: but this sacrament is truly one: therefore it is one by form.

1. Again, 'One' is converted with 'being': therefore whence there is being, thence there is one: but being is from form: therefore also 'one'.

ON THE CONTRARY:

The form of this sacrament seems not to be one: because one is the form of contrition, another of confession, and another of satisfaction: therefore it seems that it is not one by the unity of form.

If you say that this is the unity of the sacrament which none of the Philosophers posits: because it was not of their consideration. On the contrary: It is asked, what is that unity of the sacrament?

For it seems that it is of the form which Bernard calls native or constitutive: because a sacrament has form and matter: but whatever things have form and matter, have them as essential parts: but in all such things the unifying principle is the form itself: therefore this unity is of form: and then the above posited argument proceeds, namely, since the form is not one, that the sacrament is not one, as it seems.

If you say that the unity of the sacrament is that it be united in one effect: it seems again that it is not one: because the effect is not one. For either sin according to guilt is remitted in contrition, or not. If so: therefore confession and satisfaction do not operate against guilt: therefore they are not directed to the same effect with contrition: therefore they are not thus united.

If you say that it is not remitted in contrition. On the contrary: therefore it will not be anything except attrition, and not contrition: and this does not stand with the hypothesis: because it was supposed that contrition had occurred, when it is asked, whether it is remitted in contrition?

1. Again, Dionysius implies that every multitude is reduced to some one thing: because many things by parts are reduced to one whole, and many by accidents into one subject, and many in number or in powers into one species, and many in species into one genus, and many in genera or processes into one principle. And the Philosopher says altogether the same thing in other words in the fifth book of the Metaphysics, in the distinction of 'one'. It is asked therefore, If these many things which are here, are many by parts: then they ought to be reduced into one by a whole. And it is asked, what is the form uniting the whole, and it will scarcely be assignable.

§ 3. Solution. It seems it must be said that this sacrament is one by the unity of the sacrament, as was said in objecting. And further it seems it must be conceded that it is one by the unity of the sacramental form. Now the form of this sacrament is not accepted in the same way as in the others, in which the minister of the sacrament who performs the act with words gives the form by pronouncing the words: for the matter and form of this sacrament are not so accepted, as the Master will determine below: for it does not have exterior matter, nor a form outside the Penitent: but that is said to be matter, from which it receives the ratio of signifying, as it is in baptism, and in others: but because sorrow manifested in certain signs is that, I say that sorrow is the matter, I mean voluntary sorrow manifested in exterior signs, through which signs it signifies the thing which it causes: but the form of that sacrament is properly whence it has the power of sanctifying, as in all other sacraments sanctification is from the form. Whence the form of it itself is the information of grace, or grace informing this sorrow, insofar as it is thus informing.

And if it is objected, that according to this the form and the reality [res] of the sacrament are the same, which happens in no case: because according to this the maker and the effect, cause and effect, would be the same, which are altogether impossible. It is answered, that the same objection is concerning contrition which is informed by grace, and otherwise it would not destroy sin, nor would it be contrition: and nevertheless it confers grace. Whence I say that grace not in its genus, but a certain grace is that form, namely which gives power to the sorrow, so that it becomes destructive of sin: but its proper effect is the remission of sin: but this form accepted in the general sorrow, namely which informs the sorrow in contrition, confession, and satisfaction, I say that it is the form of this sacrament, from which the sacrament is said to be one.

But if anyone says that the form of penance is the word which is said by the priest when he absolves, or that it is some sign: it is certain that he does not attend to what the form does in a sacrament according to Augustine and Hugh of St. Victor: because it is that which coming to the sacrament, makes it potent to sanctify: and this is not done in penance by the word which the priest says, or even by signs, or by the voluntary sorrow itself, but rather by this which has been said, namely grace informing that sorrow, so that it can destroy sin: and the reality [res] of it is the all-encompassing deletion of sin in guilt and penalty.

It must be said therefore to the first, that this sacrament is one.

To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that for the perfection of something, something or some things are said to be required in a twofold way, namely as that out of which it is perfected, and as the completing perfection itself. But if it is said as that out of which it is perfected potestatively or universally, the first proposition is false: because for the perfection of every composite in this way many things are required. But if it is said as the ultimate completing perfection: then it is true: because every ultimate completing act according to species, is one simply: and thus the proof which was adduced from the fifth book of the First Philosophy is understood: and it does not have a place here: because the three things which are required for the perfection of penance are potestative parts of penance, as will be evident below: and it itself is perfected in them as a potestative whole is perfected from its parts.

To the next it must be said that penance according as it is a habit moving to the detestation of sin, is a virtue, and not a sacrament, and in this way it does not have parts: but as it is a sacrament, it is sorrow informed by grace manifested in exterior signs, and thus it has parts in which a medicinal disposition is perfected against the disease of actual sin.

Or it is said and perhaps better, that nothing prohibits secondary acts from being plural, provided they are ordered to one end: and so it is concerning to be contrite, and to confess, and to make satisfaction, because all have one end, which is the full destruction of actual sin.

§ 4. To that which is asked further, By what unity is it one?

I say that nothing is truly one, unless it be one by form. But it happens that the ultimate form is accepted: and to this the proper matter responds. And it happens that the first form in a genus is accepted: and to that the first matter in that genus responds: as is the example of Aristotle concerning minerals: for if the form of gold is accepted, matter responds to it, because it is out of subtle and combustible sulphur, and clear subtle quicksilver well mixed together. But if minerals are accepted according as they are dryable by dry heat, the matter which is water responds to them. Thus I say that if the proper form of this sacrament is accepted, which is grace operating the destruction of actual sin, according as it is of this sort, the matter responds to it which is sorrow dispositively operating toward that destruction: and this is the unity of the sacrament from its sacramental form.

To that therefore which is objected to the contrary it must be said that these three are parts of penance, and are united in the form of the whole, and in the whole: because in all of them the above-said sorrow operates: whence it does not follow that from this there are several forms there simply: just as it does not follow concerning man from this that the form of the foot is one, and that of the hand another: or concerning the soul from this that the form of the intellect is one, and that of the will another, which are its potestative parts.

To the next it must be said that the multitude of these parts is reduced to the whole: because the sorrow destroying sin is in a certain way one, and is subjected as a whole to contrition, confession, and satisfaction.

Articulus 2 — Whether This Sacrament Has Parts, And What Those Parts Are

Whether this sacrament has parts, and what those parts are?

§ 1. Secondly it is asked, Whether this sacrament has parts, or not: and what those parts are?

For although in part this has already been held, nevertheless it must still be distinguished more subtly.

But it seems not to have parts: because 1. Ambrose says, that a sacrament is unconditionally moreover, everything that is simply [one] is : that which does not have parts: therefore this sacrament does not have parts.

§ 2. Again, a certain medicine is ordered against the original disease; and it is established that it does not have parts except form and matter, about which parts we are not speaking here, because those are in every sacrament. Since therefore another medicine is against the actual disease, which is called penance, it seems that it ought not to have parts, just as that one does not.

§ 3. Again, of one disease there seems to be one medicine by way of contrary: but actual [sin] is one disease. Therefore, it ought to have a single medicine by way of contrary; therefore not diversified into parts.

§ 4. Again, if it has parts, this is either because by itself it does not suffice for the expulsion of sin, or for another reason. If in the first way: then the grace informing the sorrow would be imperfect in its act, which is absurd. Therefore, it seems that this is not the reason why it should have parts. If in the second way. On the contrary: to whatever nature gives parts pertaining to a determinate act, it gives them for the sake of perfection in acting. Proof: because otherwise nature would abound in superfluities. Therefore much less is this the case in the works of grace which are ordered with greater diligence. Therefore the whole is imperfect without them in acting: and this is held to be unfitting, because the form of the whole is grace.

Further it is asked here, of what kind are those parts which are of penance?

§ 1. For all parts are reduced to integral or subjective parts: just as the parts of a whole in quantity to the integral, and the parts of a whole in mode to the universal or subjective. Therefore, they are either integral, or subjective. If integral: then they do not receive the predication of the whole, which is false. But if subjective: then that which is the essential form of one is the form of another. Therefore, that which is the form of confession, is itself the real form of contrition, which is false.

§ 2. Again. If they were such parts, it would be necessary that there be one name and one definition of them, which is again false.

If you say that it is otherwise with homogeneous parts and the whole, and otherwise with heterogeneous parts, as Aristotle says in the fifth book of the First Philosophy[532], where he distinguishes the modes of a whole: because the parts of a homogeneous whole, although they are material, yet because the whole is predicated of them, they follow the nature of a universal whole: whence it is said, "every water is," and it is not said, "the whole water," except by metaphor. But parts in which position makes a difference, because they are heterogeneous, follow the nature of an integral whole; and therefore it is said "the whole bed," and not "every bed," or "every man," so as to distribute for the integrating parts. And thus, although these parts integrate the power of penance, nevertheless they receive the predication of the whole, because those parts are homogeneous. On the contrary: Every homogeneous whole has parts that are not diverse in the form of the parts, as water, oil, and other liquids: penance has parts diverse in the form of the parts. Therefore it is not a homogeneous whole with respect to them.

Solution. It must be said, without prejudice to the many who say many diverse and almost contrary things here, that penance has parts, and those parts are potential (potestative). For penance is a certain thing operating for the destruction of the actual disease; but the actual disease is not only the fault, but also the guilt (reatus) following the fault, and it is a difficulty toward the good generated from custom and the dispositions of sin. Moreover, the consequent guilt is threefold. For one is conjoined to the fault, which is the debt of eternal punishment; and when that is dissolved, there still remains the guilt and debt of purgatorial punishment not proportionate to the powers of the penitent. When that is dissolved, there still remains the guilt and debt of arbitrary expiatory punishment according to the measure of the fault, and the powers of the penitent. But when that is dissolved, the guilt does not remain, but there can still remain the difficulty of acting well. Now, to destroy this entire disease of sin, I say that three things are required, namely contrition destroying the first, confession destroying the second, and satisfaction destroying the third; the difficulty, however, is removed by the custom of good in all these. And thus it is evident, that the power of penance is perfected in these three, and without these three it is not perfect.

To that which is first objected, it must be said that that authority is doubted: because it was sought in that book and not found. But if it is conceded, it must be said that a sacrament is called simple by reason of a simple effect, and not from the fact that it has no parts: in this way in which one is called simply of one, because 'simply' is said in many ways, just as is said about the four coevals in another Summa, in the question concerning heaven.

To the next, it must be said that baptism does not have such potential parts, because it is not ordered against the whole disease of origin, but a part, namely the fault. But the punishment of concupiscence remains for exercise in the struggle. Penance, however, is ordered against the whole actual disease, insofar as it is actual: whence just as that is diversified in its effects, so the parts of penance are varied, insofar as it is a sacrament ordered against that disease.

To the next, it must be said that of one disease, insofar as it is one, there is one medicine: but just as the parts of the disease are diversified, so also the medicine ordered against it is varied, as was held before.

To the next, it must be said that this does not happen from the imperfection of grace, but rather on account of the order of perfection: because otherwise the consequences of sin in us could not be ordinarily destroyed. For thus it also could be objected that sorrow would be superfluous, because grace would suffice for the whole: for sufficiency is not given in nature or grace except according as it can be done most ordinarily according to the fittingness of that nature which ought to be perfected: just as to man the ambulatory power is not given without feet. So to the actual disease a destructive agent is not given without our act, and its destructive agent is diversified according to the diversity of the disease.

To what is further asked, the answer is already evident: because we say they are potential parts. And if one considers it subtly, they are parts of such a whole that it is a mean between the homogeneous and the heterogeneous. Nor is this absurd to posit: because the Philosopher posits this in book V of the First Philosophy[533], saying that in wholes in which transposition makes a diversity according to something, and does not make it according to something, they receive 'whole' and 'every', like number. For according as number is a multitude numbered by one, it is called 'every number'; but according as it is numbered by two or three, in which order makes a diversity, it is called 'the whole number': and therefore it is a mean between a homogeneous and a heterogeneous whole. And so it seems it must be said here: because these parts are such that they indeed receive the predication of the whole, according as sorrow informed by grace acts in all of them; but according to their relation to the diversity of effects they do not receive it, namely the name of 'whole' (totius), but rather 'every' (omnis): because thus neither is the whole penance in contrition, nor the whole in confession, nor the whole in satisfaction, but in all together.

And through this the solution to all the objections is evident.

Articulus 3 — Whether Penance Is Predicated Of All Its Parts Together In Sum, Or Severally

Whether penance is predicated of all its parts together in sum, or singly?

Whether penance is predicated of all its parts together in sum, or singly?

Thirdly it is asked: Whether penance is predicated of all those parts together in sum, or singly?

It seems, however, that the whole is preserved in contrition: because

§ 1. We believe many are saved through contrition alone, in whom not contempt of religion, but an article of necessity excludes confession.

§ 2. Again, Luke 7:37ff., concerning Mary Magdalene, whose signs of contrition are written, yet not confession, nor enjoined satisfaction.

§ 3. Again, concerning Peter, Matthew 26:75, whose contrition is signified, not confession, or satisfaction. And in the following distinction many authorities are introduced concerning this in the Letter. Therefore it seems that these three are neither integral nor essential parts, but only according to well-being.

§ 4. Again, this seems [true] concerning satisfaction: because often the lament of contrition suffices for the deletion of the whole. Therefore then it is not necessary to enjoin satisfaction for the sin; and if it is enjoined, this is done for preserving in the good rather than for the deletion of sin.

§ 5. Again, let us suppose that someone contrite dies immediately: it is established that he will be saved. Therefore, confession and satisfaction are not required for salvation.

§ 6. From these reasons it seems that contrition is more substantial than any of the others: because contrition is sometimes done without the others and suffices; but the others never without contrition.

Solution. To these and all similar things it seems it must be said that these three are potential parts of penance, and all operating together in it, and also successively. All indeed together, according as one is in act, and two, or one in desire (in voto): as when contrition is in act, and confession and satisfaction are in desire; and when confession is in act, the virtue of contrition is in it, and satisfaction in desire; and when satisfaction is in act, the force of confession is in it according as it is enjoined for sins, and the force of contrition with respect to sorrow and the detestation of sin: and thus one is never separated from another; and these are not repugnant. And penance is perfected in one without another, and is not perfected in one without another. And these again have no repugnance.

And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the next, it must be said that it is otherwise in those in whom the Lord himself had the form of an absolving priest: because presentation sufficed before him who knew both the disease and the circumstance of the disease. And a general satisfaction is understood in this which Jesus said to the adulterous woman: "Sin no more."

To the third about Peter, the same must be said: nevertheless in these the desire of confessing, or even the act of confession, is not excluded: because many things were done which are not written, as is said at the end of the Gospel of John.

To the next, it must be said that satisfaction is required at least in desire and interior lament: because the mode of satisfaction is manifold, namely through interior and exterior punishment, according as even something adjoined to confession is reduced to satisfaction, like the shame and lament of contrition. And in this way there is also a certain satisfaction: because, as we said, in penance it is in a certain way as in number, which according to something is homogeneous and according to something is heterogeneous.

To the next, it must be said that he who is thus contrite has confession and satisfaction in desire.

To the next, it must be said that those parts can be considered in habit, or in act, or desire, and execution. If in the first way: then contrition is more essential to penance than the others. But if in the second way: then all are substantial, but ordinately, as was said before, where it is assigned how one is in another.

533. Cf. Pseudo-Jerome, Epistola de honorandis parentibus, PL 30, 114: "Crudelis est qui famam suam negligit."

Articulus 4 — Whether, Just As We Offend God In Three Ways, Namely In Heart, Mouth, And Deed, So The Three Parts Of Penance Correspond To These Three Ways Of Offending

Whether just as we offend God in three ways, namely in heart, mouth, and work: so the three parts of penance correspond to these three ways of offending?

Whether just as we offend God in three ways, namely in heart, mouth, and work: so the three parts of penance correspond to these three ways of offending?

Then it is asked concerning those things which are said in the Letter, there at A, around the beginning: "This is fruitful penance, so that just as, by three, etc."

For this seems to mean nothing: because

§ 1. For a sin which is committed in the heart, we are bound to be contrite, to confess, and to make satisfaction. Therefore if the other two modes of sinning also cease, all parts of penance concur for the sin of the heart alone. Therefore the three parts of penance do not correspond to these three modes of sinning.

The same objection applies to the sin of the mouth alone, and to the sin of work alone.

§ 2. Again, Penance is ordered to the expulsion of actual sin according to punishment and fault: but it is established that fault and punishment are in the sin of the heart alone. Therefore the whole penance is ordered against it. Therefore it is false that the parts of penance are so taken, that according to the three instruments of sinning, there are three parts of penance.

If you say that here the mouth of the flesh is not understood, but rather the mouth of the spirit: just as the Lord says, that those things which proceed from the mouth, come forth from the heart, like evil thoughts, thefts, blasphemies, etc. These are the things that defile a man.

On the contrary: That mouth is either of sensuality, or of pleasure according to the lower part of reason, or of the thought by which a man inwardly speaks to himself about committing a sin. And in whatever way it is said, what is called the sin of the heart is superfluous: because it will be the same to say the sin of the heart, and of the mouth.

§ 3. Again, Then a third part is superfluous in certain sins, namely in the sin of the heart and the mouth.

Again, According to this the parts of penance do not correspond to it: for we do not say, that just as there is an interior mouth by which we sin, that so it suffices to confess with the interior mouth, but rather confession must be made with the exterior mouth. Therefore it is not the interior mouth of which he speaks here, that confession corresponds by way of contrary to the sin of the mouth.

§ 4. Further, It seems that according to this assignment there ought to be only one part of penance, namely contrition: because in every disease it suffices to counter the cause: for when the cause is amputated, the disease is cut off. But the motive principle in man is the heart, while the mouth and hands are merely moved. If therefore the motive principle will be well-disposed, those things which are moved will necessarily be well-disposed. But through contrition the heart is well-disposed, as is said in the Letter: therefore through contrition the others will be well-disposed immediately: therefore confession and satisfaction are superfluous.

§ 5. Again, It seems to speak badly, that confession corresponds to the sin of the mouth: because the sin of the mouth supposes the sin of the heart as a cause. Therefore two correspond to the sin of the mouth, namely contrition and confession.

The same objection applies to the sin of work: because that also supposes the sin of the heart: therefore contrition and satisfaction will correspond to it without confession, as it seems.

Solution. Some have said, just as was said in the objection, that in every sin those three concur, namely heart, mouth, and work: and this is drawn from Augustine in book XII of De Trinitate, who, expounding that word of the Lord, Matt. 15:18: "Those things which proceed from the mouth, come forth from the heart," etc., posits an interior mouth, and it returns to this, that the heart makes the first conception of sin. But because the mouth serves two uses, namely speech, and eating, therefore the perpetration of sin within oneself is called the speech of the heart, and is the act of the interior mouth, according as it serves the use of speech. Again, according as it serves the use of eating in which there is the pleasure and incorporation of food, the interior pleasure of sin corresponds to it. Moreover, besides these two there is the act of sin itself, which is interior or exterior. And thus some wanted to say, that for every sin three parts of penance are required. But I judge that this is not according to the intention of this Letter. Whence I say that the parts of penance correspond to sin in two ways, namely as medicine only, and thus all three parts of penance correspond to all sins; they also correspond as medicine simultaneously having a congruence in act and in the instrument of acting, and thus contrition corresponds only to the sin of the heart, and confession only to the sin of the mouth, and satisfaction only to the sin of work. And this is not difficult for anyone to understand; and this is the understanding of the Author introduced in the Letter.

It must be said therefore to the first, that all parts are required against any difference of sin whatever, as they are medicine, and in this way they are parts of penance: but it is not necessary on account of this that all should have an agreement with any difference of sin whatever in the act and instrument of acting.

Through the same, the solution to the following is evident.

To what is further asked concerning the adaptation of some, it must be said that it is from Augustine, as was said, but not to the point according to the intention of the Letter.

But to the other which is objected on the contrary, it must be said that the heart, when all things are posited within, is taken more strictly. For although all those three acts are of the heart, nevertheless in conceiving it is in the act of the heart, which is the first cause of movements; and in speaking inwardly or taking pleasure it is the heart, not as heart, but in the office of the mouth, and in ministering the interior act, it is in the office of the hand.

To the next, it must be said that it is not similar entirely in the perpetration of sin, and the medicine of sin: because the medicine is from without, while the perpetration of sin is from within: and therefore the parts of penance do not correspond to it in the same way according to this adaptation. And therefore confession must be made from without: because it receives medicine from the keys of the Church, which cannot be done unless the sin proceeds into the knowledge of the one having the keys. And for this the interior mouth does not suffice, but the exterior must be present.

To the next, it must be said that the heart cannot be sufficiently well-disposed except through the work of the mouth and hand: because, as was said, the medicine of sin in fault and punishment is from the parts of penance. And the part of the medicine which is from the keys is not received except by confession by which the sin proceeds into the knowledge of the one having the key. But the other part is drawn from custom which makes a good habit of the heart removing the difficulty of acting well: and that cannot be in the heart except through work.

To the next, it must be said that the parts of penance correspond to sin in two ways, as was said: and that objection does not proceed except in one way: and yet what it concludes is true. Because confession supposes contrition, if it is true; and satisfaction supposes contrition and confession. But it does not follow that in the sin of work two suffice, namely contrition and satisfaction, and in the sin of the mouth another two, namely contrition and confession. And the reason for this has already been stated above.

Articulus 5 — Whether To The Three Differences Of Sin, Which Are Heart, Deed, And Habit, The Three Parts Of Penance Correspond

Whether to the three differences of sin which are heart, deed, and custom, the three parts of penance correspond?

Whether to the three differences of sin which are heart, deed, and custom, the three parts of penance correspond?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, around the beginning: "For there are three differences of sin, etc."

For this is another adaptation of those parts.

But this seems insufficient: because § 1. There is nothing here to which confession properly corresponds: for satisfaction corresponds to every deed.

§ 2. Again, It seems that this assignment does not suit every sin: because many sins are not brought forth in public, but remain hidden. Therefore neither confession nor satisfaction will correspond to them, as it seems.

Again, Many sin once, and do not draw it into custom: and to those again this adaptation does not seem to suit.

If you say that confession corresponds to the defense of sin, and satisfaction to custom: still it seems not to apply: because there are many who never defend their sin, and yet are bound to confess.

§ 3. Again, Gregory in the Gloss on Job 3:11-12, distinguishes otherwise there: "Why did I not die in the womb, etc." For according to him, sin in the womb is sin in the heart; coming forth from the womb, in work; received by the knees, in which the flattering fomentation flatters it through adulation; and nursed at the breasts, nourished through the custom of evil. Therefore it seems that according to this there ought to be four modes of making satisfaction.

§ 4. Again, According to the kinds of diseases diverse medicines are multiplied: but it is established that there are seven kinds of capital diseases in actual sin. Therefore according to this the parts of the medicine ought to be multiplied. But the medicine of actual sin is penance: therefore there ought to be seven parts of penance, as it seems, and not only three.

If you say that the medicine is ordered against the root of the disease. On the contrary: Because according to this there ought not to be except two parts or one: because, as Augustine says, "Every sin is either from fear badly humbling, or from love badly inflaming." And this is the Gloss on that of Psalm 79:17 "Burned with fire."

Furthermore, the same Augustine reduces that root which is badly humbling fear, to that which is badly inflaming love. Therefore according to this there ought not to be except one part of the medicine, which is ordered against evil love.

Again, If against differences of sins of this sort the parts of penance are ordered, it is asked:

§ 1. What is ordered against those which John touches upon in his 1st Canonical Epistle 2:16 "All that is in the world, is the concupiscence of the flesh, etc."? For against none of those is any part of penance directly ordered.

§ 2. Again, It seems that Augustine's adaptation in the Letter is insufficient: because he does not adapt except against a killing or mortifying disease. But a venial disease does not mortify; therefore against it no part of penance is ordered: which is against those things which will be said below in this same distinction in the Letter, where the Master makes a treatise on the confession and satisfaction of venial sins.

Solution. It must be said that this adaptation which Augustine makes also occurs through congruence to the parts of penance: and it is not made according as those parts are taken in the ratio of medicine alone. But this adaptation differs from the preceding one: because the preceding one was made through the congruence of the substance of sin and its instrument, to the substance of the parts of penance; but this one is made through the conformity of property to property, and can be done thus: Every mortal sin commonly has the mortification of spiritual life. But with this, three things are conjoined to it, namely two in comparison to the sinner, and a third in comparison to the neighbor. In comparison to the sinner there are two: the zeal for turpitude lest it be reproved, and this is evil; and iteration or defense when he is reproved, and this signifies hardness of heart, or obstinacy of will in sin. The third, in comparison to the neighbor, is scandal through bad example. And these are signified in the three dead persons, as is clear in the Letter. Now, compunction, through the fact that it is a hidden sorrow of the heart, is ordered against pleasure in secret; and confession against the evil manifestation of sin, because the one confessing through the minister of the Church is reconciled to the Church; but satisfaction through the altitude of good is contrary to evil custom by inducing a contrary habit, which removes the difficulty of acting well.

To the first therefore it must be said, that this adaptation is by way of congruence to that which is more frequent in sin. Or it must be said that the manifestation of sin is twofold, namely in the present before men, and in the future judgment, and then before God and the Angels. And the shame of confession now abolishes the shame which would happen in the judgment, if it were not manifested now.

To the next, it must be said that every evil act leaves a weak or strong disposition inclining to a similar act: and that disposition is called custom here.

But to this which is objected concerning the distinction of blessed Gregory, it must be said, that it is taken according to those things which retain a man in sin, and sometimes are not the sins of the same person: as when one is flattered by the vice of adulation, the adulation is in another, namely in the flatterer. But nursing is the same as custom, and coming forth from the womb is the same as manifestation generally taken, and conception the same as the hidden part of the heart: and therefore with the fourth removed, that division reverts to this one signified under another metaphor.

To the next, it must be said that the parts of penance are not adapted to the capital vices: because since penance is in an interior work, it is necessary that it be multiplied according to the instruments of operating, in which it cuts out the root of the disease. Now all the capital vices can be perpetrated by the three instruments of sinning; and therefore all the parts of Penance correspond to each capital vice.

To the next, it must be said that the root of sin is twofold, namely innate from a corrupt root, and made from the work of sin. And against the first the parts of penance are not ordered, but against the second. Whence it was held in the preceding distinction, that satisfaction is to cut out the causes of sin, etc. But the roots which Augustine touches upon are innate from a corrupt nature.

But I call roots made from sin such things as guilt and proneness, which are left behind from actual sin and incline to a subsequent sin of the same species.

To the next, it must be said that John does not touch upon the roots of sin on the part of the sinner, but rather on the part of the object moving to sin. But the parts of penance are not ordered against sin on the part of the moving object, but rather on the part of the sinner, according to what is left behind in him through the work of actual sin inwardly or outwardly. And through this the solution to all that is objected concerning the roots of the vices is evident.

To the last, it must be said that a venial sin is not a sin except in a qualified sense: and its penance is penance in a qualified sense, and not simply; and therefore the parts of penance are not adapted to it.

Articulus 6 — What Contrition Is In General

What is contrition in genus?

Then it is asked concerning what is said, there, at A, after the beginning: "Compunction is commended to us, etc."

And six things are asked here concerning compunction: the first of which is, What is it in genus? The second, What is it by its proper definition? The third, What is the difference between contrition, attrition, and compunction? The fourth, Of what part of the soul is contrition? The fifth, Whether it is always made in the same way in the New and the Old Testament? The sixth, What moves one to contrition, whether faith, or another virtue? And if faith, by reason of which article does it move to it?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Every sorrow is in the genus of passion: contrition is a certain sorrow: therefore it is in the genus of passion. The first is evident of itself. The second is evident through that saying of Augustine held above: "Let him always sorrow, and rejoice in the sorrow, etc."

§ 2. Again, Augustine: "If you repent, punishment holds you." This is said chiefly on account of contrition: therefore contrition is a punishment holding the penitent: but every punishment is a passion. Therefore, etc.

§ 3. Again, Contraries are in the same genus: but sorrow and pleasure are opposed contrarily; therefore they are in the same genus: but pleasure is in the genus which is passion, as the Philosopher says. Therefore sorrow is too, and consequently contrition.

§ 4. Again, Everything according to which something is properly altered is a passion, or a passible quality. But according to sorrow an alteration of man properly occurs; therefore it is a passion or a passible quality. The first is written in the seventh book of the Physics[534]. The second is evident through this, that the Philosopher says in VIII of the Ethics[535], that in having sense, alteration is by sorrow and pleasure. Since therefore contrition is a certain sorrow, it will be in the genus of passion, etc.

§ 5. Again, If contrition is contrary to sin, insofar as it relates to something it has contrariety to it. Now there are two things in sin, namely libido or pleasure in a mutable good, and aversion from the immutable good. But it is established, that it is not contrary by reason of the aversion; therefore by reason of the pleasure in a mutable good, because contrition sorrows over the pleasure. Since therefore pleasure is a passion, sorrow is also a passion, as it seems.

§ 6. Again, It was held above that penance is a bitterness of the soul for the evil that one has committed. And this belongs to it chiefly by reason of contrition. Therefore contrition is a certain bitterness of the soul: but bitterness of the soul is a passion; therefore also contrition, etc.

§ 7. Again, As the body relates to a passion inflicted on it, so the spirit to a passion which is inflicted on it. But everything immuting the body, is a certain passion of the body; therefore also everything immuting the spirit, will be a certain passion of the spirit. But the sorrow of contrition immutes the spirit; therefore it is a certain passion of the spirit.

§ 8. If you say, as some say, that in contrition the sorrow is material, and the actual will is around the sorrow, and that is the act and the formal part of contrition: and therefore contrition is not in the genus of passion except by grace of that which is material in it. On the contrary: Anger, mercy, nemesis, are not without the will: and yet they are said by the Philosopher to be passions. Therefore from the fact that the will is around something, it does not make it not to be a passion.

§ 9. Again, From the fact that the will is around something, its essence is not varied: because otherwise it would be necessary to say, that any thing is varied in essence when it is willed, and when it is not willed. But it is established that sorrow or sadness in itself is a passion. Therefore also whether the will is around it, or not, it will still be a passion. But contrition is sorrow; therefore it is in the genus of passion.

§ 10. Again, Everything inflicted by a certain agent is a passion: but every sorrow is inflicted by a certain agent; therefore it is a passion.

§ 1. [Conclusion]. The first is proved from the definition of a passion. The second is proved from the fact that sorrow is from a corrupting contrary; and a corrupting contrary is a certain agent other than that which is corrupted.

§ 2. But ON THE CONTRARY: 1. By no passion do we merit: contrition is a certain passion: therefore by contrition we do not merit. The first premise is proved both by those speaking commonly, and by the fact that the principle of merit is in us, while the principle of a passion is in another. The second, however, is taken as a hypothesis by the adversary.

§ 3. Again, nothing whose effective principle is not in us as patients falls under a precept: the effective principle of a passion is not in us as patients: therefore it does not fall under a precept. But contrition falls under a precept; therefore, by the destruction of the consequent, it is not a passion. The first premise is proved because no work is commanded except that of which we are masters and the cause. The second is evident through the definition of a passion.

§ 4. Again, no passion is a virtue or a part of a virtue; contrition is a virtue, or a part of a virtue: therefore contrition is not a passion. The first premise is proved from what is found in the second book of the Ethics, that virtues are habits, not passions.[536] The second is proved by what was established earlier, because it was said that penance is a virtue, and contrition is a virtue, or a part of penance.

§ 5. Again, no passion is operative of the best things; but contrition is operative of the best things: therefore contrition is not a passion. The proof of the first is because nothing works the best things except a habit, which is not in the genus of passion, as the Philosopher says. The second is evident by the fact that the work of contrition is praiseworthy and rewardable.

534. Aristotle, Physics VII, c. 3.

§ 6. Again, no passion has contrariety to any habit; but contrition has contrariety to the habit of vices: therefore contrition is not a passion. The first premise is proved from the fact that contraries are in the same proximate genus. The second, from the fact that nothing expels another except its contrary; and contrition expels all habits of vices.

§ 7. Solution. Without prejudice [to other views], it seems to me that a distinction must be made regarding contrition: for it belongs either to penance as a virtue, or to penance as a sacrament. What the difference between these is, is sufficiently clear from the foregoing. Since it belongs to penance as a virtue, it is thus not a part, but a certain act to which the virtue of penance moves, insofar as it detests the perpetrated sin precisely as a perpetrated sin. And because this act is self-punishing and vindicative, it is not without punishment; yet that punishment does not give it its formal essence, because the punishment is related to the act of the will as the thing made is to the maker. And then it is called contrition, not the passion of the contrite person, but rather the act of the one contriting, which is productive of punishment in the contrite person. And although the one contriting and the contrite person are the same in substance, their being is nevertheless not the same, as will be clear below.

§ 8. If, however, penance is taken as a sacrament, then nothing prevents passion from being something of the essence of contrition: because penance is ordered against sin, satisfying for sin through punishment. Thus, in my judgment, contrition is the passion of the contrite person voluntarily undertaken or produced for sin. Therefore, according to these two ways, one must respond to the arguments adduced for both sides.

§ 9. To the first objection, therefore, maintaining that contrition is a certain movement of the virtue of penance, we say that sorrow is indeed in the genus of passion, but contrition taken in this way is not sorrow, but rather the act productive of sorrow in the contrite person. Therefore, contrition is either a virtue, if taken in habit, or an act, if considered in act; and it is not in the genus of passion when taken in this manner.

§ 10. To the proof, it must be said that Augustine calls it sorrow insofar as it is the matter of the sacrament of penance, and not insofar as it is a virtue or an act of virtue.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that Augustine is speaking of the signs of penance in this way, insofar as the cause is signified by the effect; for punishment is the effect of penance and contrition, as has already become clear, and he does not intend that punishment is essentially penance or contrition.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that contrition, insofar as it is an act or habit of the contrite person, is not contrary to pleasure, but only insofar as it is a passion of the contrite person. And I call contrition a habit according to what it is, although properly it names either an act or a passion, because it is a verbal noun and can descend from both the active and the passive. But we also name the habit by the same name for this reason, that certain habits do not have proper names.

535. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics VIII.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that, in truth, everything that alters, speaking physically, is a passion or a passible quality. But we do not say that the one receiving habits is altered, but rather perfected; nor is the one who acts from a habit altered, unless this be a different kind of alteration, as the Philosopher says in the second book of De Anima.[537] But we do not say that contrition, insofar as it is called the act of the one contriting, is altering the contrite person, but rather insofar as it is a passion of the contrite person and subject. And this is indeed only in the genus of passion; but in this way it is neither a virtue nor an act of virtue, but rather its effect in that about which the virtue of penance or contrition acts, as was established earlier.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that contrition and any other virtue have a twofold contrariety to vice and sin. One is in the essence of its species, just as white is contrary to black, and thus one virtue is opposed to two vices or to one, of which it is the mean. It has another contrariety to sin in its whole in which it is rooted, which is sanctifying grace (gratia gratum faciens), which is contrary to sin not in this species or that, but to all sin, insofar as it is a fault and an offense against God; and with respect to this also, one virtue is not without another. And according to this mode, by the power of the whole and of the others conjoined to it in that whole, it has one contrariety to every sin. In both of these ways contrition is contrary to sin in its entirety. But it is true that the pleasure which is from the act of sin has as its contrary the sorrow which is from the act of the one contriting, just as it happens that a passion is contrary to a passion.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that penance is taken there in the sense of a sacrament, in which sorrow is the matter, as was said before.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that it is well granted that sorrow mutating the spirit is a passion as such; but that is essential only to the sacrament, not to the virtue, as has been established. Nor should anyone take what I say—"the spirit to be mutated"—to mean anything other than that the man is mutated according to the spirit; because the soul, properly speaking and intrinsically (per se), is not moved, but rather accidentally (per accidens).

§ 17. To the next it must be said that this solution is good, provided it is properly understood: for it is not understood in such a way that sorrow is material in the way a material part is essential, but rather it is that about which the will of the one contriting is concerned, as about an effect. And then it is clear that nothing is a part of contrition insofar as contrition is a virtue. But I do not consider it absurd that sorrow should be essential to penance insofar as it is a part of the sacrament and remaining in the genus of passion.

§ 18. And by this same point, the solution to the following is also clear: because the will does not vary the object willed, but rather the converse. But contrition does not name this insofar as it descends from the active verb, but rather the habit or act of the one contriting, as has been said.

§ 19. To the next it must be said that even if we speak of sorrow, it is not inflicted by another agent, but rather by the same, though not taken as the same; and how this occurs is inquired into below. But here it suffices that the contrite person inflicts sorrow upon himself.

536. Aristotle, Metaphysics V, c. 26.

Yet I plainly concede that sorrow is a passion, and also contrition, insofar as it is on the part of the contrite person and not of the one contriting; but in this way it is a part of the sacrament, and not a virtue, or a part of a virtue.

§ 20. To the proof it must be said that the contrary does not cause sorrow, but rather the same thing affecting contrarily through the will concerning sin; because first he willed it when he committed it, but now he detests it and grieves. And these two fittingly respond to sin by reason of two things that are in it, namely, lust or the love of a mutable good, and the aspect of divine offense.

§ 21. To the one [argument] which is objected to the contrary, we must again say that we have conceded that by sorrow we merit, insofar as it is something of the sacrament, as the matter in which the sacrament is perfected; for this sacrament seeks for itself internal matter, just as others seek external matter. And the cause has already been stated above.

§ 22. It must be said, therefore, that passions are considered in two ways, namely in comparison to the agent, and in comparison to the patient. In the first way they are considered twofold: for the agent of them is either within, voluntary and discrete (that is, willing and discerning in acting), or outside. If within: then that passion can be meritorious or demeritorious, because it is voluntary, excluding violence and ignorance; and thus is the sorrow in contrition. But if it is outside: then it is neither meritorious nor demeritorious, and in this way it is proved that by passions we do not merit. If, however, it is considered on the part of the recipient, it is again considered in two ways: either insofar as it is only transmuting the patient, or insofar as it is well or badly informed by the will to sustain it for an honorable or dishonorable cause. If in the first way: then it is also true that by passions we do not merit, and this is to consider passion as passion. If in the second way: then it happens that someone merits or demerits by passions, according to how it is well or badly informed through the will; but the passion will not be meritorious from itself, but from that which the will places around it.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that the first premise, speaking strictly (per se), is true. But the second, proposed universally, is false, though particularly it is true. And the reason for this is clear from the distinction previously drawn.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that the passion which is sorrow, insofar as it is a passion, is not the virtue of contrition, nor anything of its essence, but is something of the sacrament.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that it is not contrary to vice by the fact that it is a passion, but rather by the fact that it is a habit, as was said. Nevertheless, the passion itself expels sin, but by the operation of the sacrament, not of the virtue.

Articulus 7 — What Contrition Is By Its Proper Definition

What is contrition by its proper definition?

537. Luke 7:37ff.

§ 26. Secondly, it is asked: What is contrition by its proper definition and essence, or what is it to be called?

§ 27. Now, some say that it is a voluntary sorrow for sins, always punishing in oneself what one grieves to have committed.

§ 28. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. As was established above, this is a certain definition of penance; therefore, it is unfittingly applied to a part of penance.

§ 29. 2. Moreover, it seems not to be sorrow: for Augustine says in the book The City of God: "Sorrow from the flesh is a certain disagreement from its passion: just as the sorrow of the soul, which is called sadness, is a disagreement from those things which have happened to us against our will."[538] Now, it is clear that sins did not happen to us against our will, especially actual mortal sins, against which contrition is specially ordered. Therefore it seems that there is no sorrow for them. And contrition is for them; therefore contrition is not sorrow, as it seems.

§ 30. 3. Again, it seems that the phrase "voluntary sorrow" is meaningless: for either this is to say that the will sorrows, or that the will is concerned with a sorrow by which something other than the will itself sorrows. If in the first way. On the contrary: The will does not sorrow for anything regarding which there is a will as of an object willed affecting the will, but rather it rejoices in the attainment of it. But in this way, as the adversary says, the will is concerning sorrow; therefore it does not sorrow, but rejoices in its attainment.

§ 31. 4. Again, it does not seem to be a philosophical saying that the will sorrows: for Damascene, Gregory Nazianzen, and Aristotle say thus: "Every will is in reason; and if it is not rational, it is not a will." But Aristotle says in the seventh book of the Ethics, that every pleasure is a coming-to-be or movement into the sensible soul.[539] Therefore no pleasure is in the rational soul. And the will is a part of the rational soul; therefore no pleasure is in the will. But opposites are bound to occur concerning the same subject; therefore also no sadness is in the will. But sorrow is sadness, as Augustine says in the authoritative text, such that the will itself is affected by sorrow, as it seems.

§ 32. 5. Again, nothing can be affected by sorrow intrinsically (secundum se), except that which has a contrary intrinsically. But the will taken intrinsically, insofar as it is a part of the rational soul, has no contrary intrinsically; therefore it is not affected by sorrow intrinsically.

§ 33. 6. If, however, sorrow is called voluntary in the second way, namely because there is a will for a sorrow by which something outside the will sorrows. On the contrary: Sorrow which is generally destructive of sin is concerning every sin. But sorrow taken in the sensible soul is not concerning every sin; therefore it is not destructive of sin. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved by the fact that there are many sins which have no object or pleasure in the sensible soul.

§ 34. Hence thus: The sorrow of contrition is general, and generally destructive of sin. But sorrow spoken of in the aforesaid way is not general, nor generally destructive of sin; therefore it is not the sorrow of contrition. But it was said that it is the sorrow of contrition.

§ 35. 7. Furthermore, it is asked about what it says there, "always punishing." For it is clear that it does not speak of punishment according to habit, but according to act. But when punishment exists according to act, another act cannot intensely be present; therefore one could never be intensely moved by another act, and therefore one could not intensely love, or believe, or anything of the sort, which is a great absurdity.

§ 36. FURTHERMORE, it is inquired about several other definitions which are found.

§ 37. For Isidore defines it thus: "Contrition is the compunction and humility of the mind with tears, coming from the remembrance of sin, and the fear of judgment."

§ 38. Now, it seems that this definition is insufficient for many reasons.

§ 39. 1. First, because humility is a virtue distinct from contrition, whether it be a sacrament or a virtue; therefore it ought not to fall into its definition.

§ 40. 2. Secondly, because it seems that compunction or contrition does not properly belong to the mind, but rather to the sensible part. For all sorrow is in the sensible part, as Augustine intimates, saying that sorrow is "the sense of those things from which the soul dissents, arising from the flesh."

§ 41. Again, the Philosopher says that sorrow is "the sense of the division of a continuum."[540] Therefore it seems that it does not belong properly to the mind.

§ 42. If you say that the mind is what makes the compunction: then I ask, what is called "mind" there? For it is clear that the mind does not refer there to any part of the sensible soul. Therefore it refers either to reason, or memory , or will, or something else which is in the rational part of the soul. If reason. On the contrary: Sorrow is said to be voluntary, as has already been established from the preceding definition; therefore it does not refer to reason, but to the will. If it refers to memory, the same objection applies. But if it refers to the will, this is clearly against the sayings of the Saints and Philosophers, who never put "mind" for the will.

§ 43. 3. If you say that it is put for the higher part of the soul, in which there are three powers of the soul, namely memory, intellect, and will. On the contrary: To be contrite is a determinate act; therefore it proceeds from a determinate power; therefore it does not belong to the mind insofar as it is common to those three powers.

§ 44. 4. Moreover, what does it mean by saying, "With tears"? For many are contrite without tears, as was established above in another distinction.

§ 45. 5. Again, it is asked, why does it say, "coming from the remembrance of sin"? For the remembrance of sin is suited by nature to induce pleasure. Since, therefore, the same thing behaving in the same way is not the cause of contraries, it seems that it ought not to induce sorrow.

538. Augustine, The City of God XIV, c. 15.

§ 46. 6. Again, the fear of judgment is servile fear, and that is not in contrition; therefore contrition does not come from the fear of judgment, as it seems.

§ 47. AGAIN, some put forward yet another description from the words of Gregory thus:

"Contrition is the humility of the spirit, annihilating sin between hope and fear."

§ 48. 1. Since, however, many virtues move to contrition, it seems that it ought not to be defined solely by humility, but also by others.

§ 49. 2. Again, it cannot be an essential predication when it is said, "contrition is humility": therefore either contrition is the cause of humility, or conversely. If in the first way: this does not seem to be any more than it is of another virtue; because it is thus the cause of justice, and of temperance, and of the other virtues which are infused in contrition. Therefore, since it is not said to be the cause of the others, neither does it seem to be the cause of this one. If in the second way. On the contrary: Faith and fear are rather the cause, because one shows whence one ought not to be proud, and the other flees insofar as it is ordered to punishment. Therefore it ought not to be called the contrition of humility, but rather the contrition of faith and fear.

§ 50. 3. It is also asked about what Gregory says, "annihilating sin." Because on that text of Job 3:19: The servant is free from his master, Gregory says that he who committed sin is not perfectly freed from it in this life. Therefore it seems that sin cannot be annihilated in this life.

§ 51. 4. Again, it is asked about what it says, "Between hope and fear." For faith is the first of the virtues; therefore the penitent is rather moved between faith and fear, than between hope and fear.

§ 52. 5. Again, hope does not arise except from merits and from grace, as is clear from its definition; but the contrite person in this present moment does not initially have merits. Therefore he cannot have an act of hope; therefore he is not moved between hope and fear, as Gregory seems to mean.

§ 53. THERE IS FOUND also another definition in the Gloss, on Psalm 50:1 (Miserere mei, Deus), where it is said thus: "Contrition of heart is a sacrifice in which sins are loosed."

§ 54. 1. But it is asked here, why is it called contrition "of heart", since it is general?

§ 55. 2. Moreover, it is asked concerning what it says, "a sacrifice." For this seems to belong most of all to that part of penance in which a man offers himself to the minister of the Church, to whom he ought to offer sacrifice. But this happens in confession; therefore confession is more a sacrifice than contrition.

539. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics VII.11 (1152b12-14).

§ 56. 3. It is also asked concerning what it says there, "in which sins are loosed." For since the whole of penance is only for the loosing of sin, it seems that the other two parts are superfluous.

§ 57. 4. Again it is asked, how are sins loosed in contrition? If with respect to fault. On the contrary: Contrition is a certain punishment of the contrite person, or a certain act of the one contriting, as is clear from the foregoing. If it is the punishment of the contrite person, since punishment is not contrary to fault, it does not seem it ought to loose fault. But if it is the act of the one contriting, then it is an act of some virtue which is informed by grace. Therefore, prior to that act, the fault was remitted. Therefore it is not remitted through that act. Therefore sins are not loosed with respect to fault in the sacrifice of contrition.

§ 58. If you say that they are loosed with respect to punishment. On the contrary: With respect to punishment they are also loosed in confession and satisfaction; therefore it is not proper to contrition, and so it ought not to be set down as the ultimate difference in its definition.

§ 59. THERE IS FOUND still another which is Augustine's, namely this: "Contrition is sorrow with the remission of sin, or remitting sin."

§ 60. And this has the same objection as the previous one, and another proper to itself.

§ 61. 1. For the sorrow of contrition is either finite or infinite. If finite: now, it is established that fault and sin are infinite; therefore the finite can act upon the infinite, which is against the Philosopher. If infinite: now, it is established that it is a passion of the contrite person, or an act of the one contriting, and principally it is a passion; therefore of a finite thing there will be an infinite passion, which again is against the Philosopher. Therefore it seems that it is not a sorrow remitting sin.

§ 62. 2. Again, it is established that that sorrow is from us, and is ours; but what is remissive of sin is never from us and ours; therefore that which is remissive of sin is not sorrow. The first premise is evident from the fact that to sorrow belongs only to an infirm, sensible nature such as ours. The second is evident through that of Isaiah 43:25: I am, I am he that blot out thy iniquities for my own sake, and that of Augustine, "He who created you without you, will not justify you without you."

§ 63. Response. It must be said that contrition is defined well enough by all these descriptions; and at the end we shall state the respect in which they differ.

§ 64. For although the first is given concerning penance, nevertheless it most of all befits it on account of contrition, just as certain men before us have said, with whom we agree in this. And by this the solution to the first is clear. Because, as was said above, although penance has three parts, nevertheless its essence is saved most of all in the first, which is contrition, because that must be present in act in every penance, while the others sometimes are not, except in the will, or in vow, or in purpose.

540. A definition of pain frequently attributed to Aristotle (or reflecting Avicenna's medical philosophy).

§ 65. To the next it must be said that the will is twofold, or rather is considered in a twofold way: namely, before the act, and after the act with respect to that which remains of the act in the agent, as a disposition, or habit, or guilt, or stain, or all of these. Hence, although the sin did not happen while we were willing it with a will preceding the act, it is nonetheless present in us while we are willing it with a subsequent will; and this suffices to arouse sorrow in the manner noted in the preceding article of the question.

§ 66. To the next it must be said that sorrow is called voluntary in both ways. Nor do we say this is to be solved in the way some have written, namely that the will is twofold: as deliberating, and as nature; and as it is deliberating, thus it is concerning sorrow, and the sorrow is called voluntary; and as it is nature, thus it sorrows. For this is absolutely nothing, because the will as nature sorrows over things contrary to nature, and rejoices over things agreeable to it; and such things are not sins or grace, because sin is not contrary to the nature of the individual, although it is contrary to the good of nature. How this is so, we have discussed in the second book of the Sentences.

§ 67. But it must be said that the deliberative will is that by which the sorrow is voluntary, and which sorrows, in one way, according to what St. Bernard says, that nothing is punished except the will. For it is not unfitting that the will should be concerning sorrow. And therefore sorrow is there the matter about which the will is concerned. And therefore joy in the attainment of what is willed, and sorrow, are not related to the will under the same aspect, and therefore they are not contraries. Because this sorrow is made by the will, and it is sorrow insofar as it is punishing a misdeed, and voluntary insofar as it is curative and expulsive of sin. And in this way nothing prevents the same subject from sorrowing and rejoicing over that sorrow insofar as it is of such efficacy. An example of this is in one cut for an abscess: for out of his will he causes himself pain, and he rejoices in it according as it is curative of the abscess.

§ 68. Against this some object thus: because according to this, the sorrow of contrition is not voluntary strictly speaking (per se), but accidentally (per accidens); and they consider this unfitting. But I consider it unfitting that any sorrow should be sought for its own sake (per se), since all sorrow is an evil of punishment, and no punishment insofar as it is such is desired.

§ 69. Through this the solution to the first point objected concerning this is clear.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that pleasure is spoken of in two ways, namely properly and improperly. Properly speaking, according to our usage, pleasure is a passion of the sensible soul arising from the conjunction of what is suitable to it with what is suitable. And the Philosopher speaks of pleasure in this way, reducing all pleasures to sense, and further to the pleasure which is in touch, which alone according to him and Avicenna is simply pleasure. But we extend the name of pleasure more broadly, namely for any joy and pleasantness resulting from the conjunction of the suitable with the suitable. And thus it is fitting for the rational soul to take pleasure, as Psalm 36:4 says: Delight in the Lord, and he will give thee the requests of thy heart. And opposite to this, sadness or sorrow can also be in the rational part.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that what is simply spiritual has no contrary in its being; but insofar as it is ordered to something, it can have a contrary to that order. And in this way the rational soul has sin as its contrary, because it is contrary to conjunction with, and order to, God.

§ 72. To the next it must be said that if sorrow is in sense, it is particular; but in contrition it is nevertheless universal. For it is considered in two ways, namely on the part of the subject in which it occurs, and on the part of the efficient cause, together with which there flows into it the form by which it perfects the efficient cause. If in the first way: then it is particular, and thus the objection proceeds. If in the second way: then it is universal, just as the will is the universal mover of all those things which are in the realm of the soul; and in this way grace, perfecting the will, flows into it with the movement of the will, by reason of which it can expel sin.

§ 73. To the next it must be said that, in my judgment, "always punishing" is said in the habit of one punishing, not in act. Or it may be said that to punish always occurs in two ways: namely by the proper act of contrition, and thus it does not always punish in act; or by an act restraining or containing the flesh lest sin arise from it, and blocking the root of sin, and this punishment takes place in the difficulty of every virtue. And thus one can repent always. But nevertheless, the first solution is more to the point.

§ 74. To what is further objected concerning the definition of Isidore, it must be said that humility is not posited there for the virtue of humility itself, but rather for humiliation, which is the same as abasement. And this is the first thing in contrition, namely that it casts down the mind erected against the commander and the command in the transgression which is sin. And therefore the expression ought to be expounded through the cause: because contrition is said to be humility not by essence, but by cause, because it is the cause of it, just as it is said, "Day is the sun shining upon the earth."

§ 75. To the next it must be said that "mind" there is taken, in my judgment, for the whole inner man.

§ 76. And to the objection that to be contrite is a spiritual act, it must be said that to be contrite is, according to its essence, a spiritual act. But something of it belongs to one faculty, and something to another. For to be contrite is to detest sin by sorrowing over it; and for this there is required a consideration of the sin in its state, in its fault, in its time, and in the other circumstances which Augustine mentions in the text. This consideration belongs to reason and intellect. The knowledge of past sin is also required, and this belongs to memory. And a dissent is required, which belongs to the will. Hence, although the act is one in itself, it nevertheless requires and co-requires several things for itself, and by reason of them it also has something in other powers of the soul.

§ 77. And by this the solution to everything that was objected concerning the mind is clear.

§ 78. To the next it must be said that tears there are the tears of the will; and the reason for this is clear from what was said in the preceding distinction. Or if sometimes they are the tears of the eyes, those are there as a sign, and not as the essence of contrition, nor as anything essential to it. Nor do the Saints care so much about proper definitions in which there is nothing but what is essential, because they intend to make known the thing of which they are speaking; and this frequently becomes better known to us through signs than through substantials.

§ 79. To the next it must be said that the remembrance of sins designates a certain common thing which can cause pleasure or sorrow. But here is understood the remembrance of sins with indignation toward oneself and detestation of the sin; and thus the remembrance is by nature suited to cause nothing but sadness and sorrow.

§ 80. To the next it must be said that the fear of judgment is spoken of in two ways: namely, that which has its principal eye upon the judgment; and that is caused by unformed faith; and according to Gregory, the will to sin lives in such a man, and the deed would follow if impunity were hoped for. And this is servile fear, and it is not in contrition, but in attrition. Again, there is a fear of judgment (or rather of the judge than of the judgment) which has its principal eye upon eternal things, namely upon God who is the judge, from whom through love one shrinks from being separated, and out of that separation falling into the punishments of those to be judged. And this is initial fear, which is in contrition. For Gregory says: "When punishment is feared in such a way that the face of the judge is not loved, the fear is from fear, not from love; but when it is feared in such a way that the face of the judge is loved, the fear is from love, not from fear." And in this way the fear of judgment is understood in the definition of Isidore.

§ 81. To what is further asked concerning the definition of Gregory, it must be said that humility here is taken for humiliation, as has been said. Yet the act of humility is caused by the act of contrition, as has already been said, and thus Gregory speaks here. And thus humility is nearer to it than any other virtue on account of the conformity in the act of abasement in the one sorrowing and humbled, who everywhere casts himself down.

§ 82. To the next, which seems to be against this, that contrition should cause humiliation: it must be said that contrition in a certain way causes all the others, as was noted above, but yet specially humility in act. Because the abasement of oneself is the beginning of divine reconciliation, just as pride is the beginning of apostatizing from God, as is said in Ecclesiasticus 10:14.[541]

§ 83. To the objection concerning faith, which shows whence one ought not to be proud, and fear, which flees punishment, it must be said that these two move toward contrition not proximately, but as immediate prerequisites (quasi ante quae nihil): one according to the intellect, and the other according to the affection. But humiliation is the proximate consequent of contrition, insofar as through it there is access to God, because one must cast oneself down so as to be subject to the precept and the commander. The other virtues, however, are caused in some way by contrition, insofar as it is the term of justification, not as conjoined

§ 1. ...to the act of contrition insofar as it is contrition.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that sin can be annihilated in three ways, namely according to the guilt of the fault, and according to the fear lest it rise again or according to the potency of sinning, and according to the certainty of forgiveness. In the first way, sin is annihilated in the penitent; but not in the second and third ways, because as long as a man lives, he can sin, and therefore he fears; and as long as he lives, he does not have certainty of forgiveness, because as it is said in Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man knows not whether he is worthy of love or hatred. And this is the slavery of which Gregory speaks, that the servant who has once served sin is not freed as long as he lives.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the penitent and contrite person is moved between hope and fear, rather than between faith and fear; because faith only points out, but hope elevates desire to expectation, and fear by stinging interiorly incites to flight from sin. Hence, since the contrite person is elevated to eternal things and flees sin, he is moved rather between hope and fear than between faith and hope, or between faith and fear.

§ 4. To what is objected concerning that definition which is posited on Psalm 50:3: Have mercy on me, O God, it must be said that it is metaphorical, and not properly a definition, but a certain assignation of a certain property of contrition, through which it is similar to a sacrifice. For two things happen in a sacrifice, namely the assumption of the animal body in the fire, and the purification in the offerer; and contrition is assimilated to these two, because in the fire of the heart it consumes the bestial habits which are sins, just as Psalm 38:4 says: My heart grew hot within me: and in my meditation, etc. And sin is forgiven in it.

§ 5. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the similitude is not taken in this, but rather in the intention of the sacrifice.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that sin is considered in two ways, namely in the guilt [and penalty] due to it per se insofar as it is a sin, and in the penalty which is due to it from the subsequent event. In the first way, indeed, eternal penalty is due to it. But in the second way, a temporal penalty, because contrition and confession were made concerning it; and as to the first way it is dissolved in contrition, and therefore it is said to be properly dissolved there. But when it is said that penance according to all its parts is ordered against sin, sin is understood in its guilt, and the penalty commonly due to it per se and from the event; because against that which has been made venial from the event, confession and satisfaction are ordered, as was held earlier.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that contrition, whether it is a passion or an act, is destructive of sin, and also the sorrow, because it is not sorrow in itself, but informed by grace; and therefore it can expel sin.

§ 8. To what is objected, that if it is an act of virtue, that it is consequent to the expulsion of sin: it must be said that it is true that it is consequent according to nature, but nevertheless it is simultaneous according to time; and therefore it operates toward the expulsion of sin.

541. Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 10:14: "For pride is the beginning of all sin..." or "The beginning of the pride of man is to fall off from God."

§ 9. To what is further asked about that which seems to be Augustine's, it must be said that an infinite sorrow by reason of its form, which is of infinite virtue, namely grace, can [avail] into infinity; and therefore the objection concerning it ceases.

§ 10. But if anyone doubts how grace is of infinite virtue, let him seek in the questions held concerning grace on the second book of the Sentences; and he will find there all that is expedient for the solution of this difficulty.

§ 11. But if it is asked: According to what is the diversity of these definitions attended?

§ 12. It must be said that contrition is considered in two ways, namely as to the essentials,

§ 1. ...which are voluntary sorrow, and punishment of oneself, and the proper object which is sin; and according to the accidentals which manifest it by way of signs. And in the first way, the first definition is given above. But the accidentals vary: for they are either in the act, or in relation to the cause exciting one to be contrite, or in relation to the effect, or in relation to the virtues helping in the act, because one virtue helps another. And in the first way, through the sign of the act and through the relation to the exciting cause, the second definition is taken, which is Isidore's, which cause is the remembrance of sin, and the fear of judgment. But the third, which is Gregory's, is taken through the sign and the effect. The fourth, however, through conformity to its figure in the Old Testament. And the fifth and last, through the instrument and the effect; because sorrow is like an instrument of contrition, by which it grinds down sin.

Articulus 8 — What The Difference Is Between Compunction, Attrition, And Contrition

What is the difference between compunction, attrition, and contrition?

§ 2. Thirdly it is asked: What is the difference between compunction, attrition, and contrition?

§ 3. For it seems that compunction and contrition are entirely the same: because on that verse of Psalm 4:5: The things you say in your hearts, be sorry for them upon your beds, the Gloss says: "In your hearts be pricked (compungimini) with the sorrow of penance, so that the soul punishing itself may prick itself, lest it be tormented, damned in the judgment of God." [542] But all these things belong to contrition. Therefore it seems that compunction and contrition are the same.

§ 4. But against this is the fact that 1. In the same place another Gloss says: "Be pricked (compungimini), that is, as if by applying certain goads arouse yourselves not for the sorrow of sins, but for seeing the light of Christ, namely not for the lower irrigation, but for the higher, so that you may burn with the love of invisible things." [543] Since, therefore, contrition is only for sins, while compunction is not [always] for sins, contrition and compunction are not the same.

§ 5. 2. Also, this seems to follow from the meaning of the names: for nothing is pricked (compungitur) unless it has the sense of a puncture, and it is not wholly toward annihilation, but rather ought to incite to something through the sense of compunction; but that which is contrite (conteritur) is ground into dust and annihilated. Therefore contrition and compunction are not the same.

§ 6. FURTHERMORE it is asked concerning attrition, whether it is the same as contrition?

§ 7. And it seems that it is: because whatever is contrite is attrite, and conversely. Therefore it seems that contrition and attrition are either the same, or are convertible.

§ 8. If you say this: Against this is what is commonly said, that attrition is sorrow without sanctifying grace, whereas contrition is sorrow for sin with sanctifying grace. Therefore they are not the same.

§ 9. But then a difficult question is further asked: Whether attrition can become contrition?

§ 10. And it seems that it can: 1. For every material for some form can receive that form while the same substance remains; but sorrow for sins is material for grace; therefore it is susceptible to it while the same substance remains; but according to itself it belongs to attrition; therefore the sorrow of attrition is, or can become, the sorrow of contrition; therefore attrition is also contrition.

§ 11. 2. Also, the Philosopher says at the end of the first book of the Physics, that matter is one in substance and subject, according as it is under privation and under a form, although its being is not the same. [544] Therefore

§ 1. ...similarly there is one sorrow according to substance under the privation of grace, and one [under] grace, although according to being it varies. Therefore attrition can become contrition.

§ 2. 3. Also, grace is said to inform sorrow; but nothing is informed which does not exist; therefore that sorrow is prior to grace. Either, then, it is at that time a sorrow of attrition, or of contrition. But it is clear that it is not of contrition, since it does not have the sanctifying grace which makes contrition; therefore it remains that it is the sorrow of attrition. Therefore the same thing in the substance of matter is in attrition and in contrition; therefore the sorrow of attrition becomes the sorrow of contrition; and this is what we intend.

§ 3. 4. Also, nature operates by the shorter route; and therefore it does not give a new matter: because the one matter which belongs to one thing can also be the matter of another, the substance of the matter remaining the same; but it gives a new form, because there cannot be one form of two things in species. Since, therefore, grace is more ordered in its works than nature, it seems that grace also expedites itself by fewer things [as much as] it can. Therefore, since the shorter route is to inform a found sorrow than to make a new one and inform it, it seems that it informs the found one which is nothing other than the sorrow of attrition. Therefore, etc.

§ 4. 5. Also, there are three principles of transmutation, although there are only two of the existing and generated substance; but this could not be unless the same material principle remained under privation and form. Therefore it is similar in the works of grace by which man is justified: because otherwise it would be necessary to posit two material things, and thus there would be four principles; since, therefore, the subject of privation and of form is the same, the sorrow before the form of grace and after will be the same. Therefore, etc.

§ 5. But against this is the fact that 1. Things whose principles are diverse are themselves altogether diverse; but the principles of the sorrow of attrition and of contrition are diverse; therefore they are diverse. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved from the fact that initial fear and formed faith generate the sorrow of attrition [read: contrition]. [545]

§ 6. 2. Also, according to the common opinion, natural things do not become gratuitous; but the sorrow of attrition is of natural things, because whatever is prior to grace is called natural. Therefore it seems that it does not become the sorrow of contrition.

§ 7. 3. Also, in natures there is not one univocal matter of corruptible and incorruptible things, as the Philosopher says in Book X of the First Philosophy [546]; but it is clear that a divine form is more distant from a natural form than a natural form is from an incorruptible one. Therefore there is not one univocal matter for a divine form and a natural form; but in contrition there is a divine form, whereas in attrition there is a natural one; therefore they do not have one matter, as it seems.

§ 8. 4. Also, those things of which the matter is one (as the Philosopher says) have a transmutation into one another; but of contrition and attrition there is no transmutation into one another; therefore of them there is not one material sorrow. The minor is proved from this, that of those things of which there is a transmutation into one another, each is transmuted into the other; but no one says that contrition can become attrition, although conversely some have sometimes conceded that it can be done. Therefore the proposition is clear.

§ 9. SOLUTION. It must be said that, in my judgment, one and the same sorrow in substance can be of attrition and of contrition, just as unformed faith can also become formed. Nevertheless, there are opinion-holders on both sides, but what has been said seems more probable to me.

§ 10. To what is first asked about the difference between contrition and compunction, it must be said that although the Saints often use one for the other, nevertheless they differ in two respects. One of which is that compunction is of greater extension than contrition; and this difference is had from the collation of the two Glosses introduced, namely because compunction is a stinging sorrow, whether it be for sins,

§ 1. ...or for the habitation of misery.

§ 2. There is also another difference from the name: because compunction properly signifies the sorrow of penance, according as it pricks the penitent; whereas contrition signifies the same sorrow, according as it annihilates the repeated sin upon individual differences: just as contrition in a contrite thing [is], when a blow is made upon the individual divided parts.

543. Aristotle, Metaphysics, X, 10 (1058b 26-28).

§ 3. And through this the solution to everything that is asked concerning the difference of compunction and contrition is clear.

§ 4. To what is asked about the difference between contrition and attrition, it must be said that the difference assigned in objecting is good. And it seems to me that the sorrow of attrition can become the sorrow of contrition: because attrition does not posit any form around the sorrow, but only states the lack of the form which is grace; and this is clear from the fact that it is defined by a privation, when it is said that attrition is sorrow for sin not informed by grace.

§ 5. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the principles of a thing are twofold, namely those entering into its essence and constituting it, and principles making a thing and not entering into its essence. And concerning principles spoken of in the first way, it is true that those things of which the principles are diverse, etc., but not concerning principles spoken of in the second way; and such are those by which that proposition is proved in objecting.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that, whatever may be the case concerning that opinion, I firmly think that natural things do not become gratuitous: here it seems it must be said that the sorrow of attrition is not of natural things, rather it is a gift of the Holy Spirit: just as servile fear is also said by some to become initial fear, and unformed faith becomes formed.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that in the natures of corruptible and incorruptible things there can be one matter, although not the proper matter, but the primary one. And whatever the case may be about this, here it is a different matter: because both of these are gifts, but one is a diminished gift, like a gratuitously given grace (gratia gratis data), and the other is as something perfected by sanctifying grace.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that it is not true according to the Philosopher that of those things of which the matter is one, there is a transmutation into one another such that each is transmuted into the other: because when it is said that "this becomes from that," the word from (ex) sometimes denotes order and privation simultaneously; and then it is not reversed, just as from a boy comes an old man, and from the morning comes the day. And so it is here: for the order of sorrow in attrition is as of an antecedent to contrition; and therefore from the sorrow of attrition comes the sorrow of contrition, but not conversely.

§ 9. But if anyone is of another opinion, he can easily solve the reasons previously introduced; and therefore I pass over them.

Articulus 9 — Of Which Part Of The Soul Contrition Is

To which part of the soul does contrition belong?

§ 10. Fourthly it is asked: To which part of the soul does contrition belong?

§ 11. It seems that it belongs to the will, because: 1. It is said to be voluntary sorrow.

544. Aristotle, Physics, I, 9 (192a 1-3).

§ 12. 2. Also, Bernard says that nothing sins except the will; but it belongs to the same thing to be contrite as it does to sin; therefore to be contrite belongs to the will alone.

§ 13. 3. Also, contrition is destructive of mortal sin; therefore it must be in the same thing as mortal sin; but mortal sin is in the free choice, as Augustine says; therefore it seems that contrition is in the free choice.

§ 14. BUT THEN IT IS ASKED further: Since contrition is the act of the one crushing, as was held above, and the passion of the crushed, to what does it belong as crushing, and to what as crushed? And whether these are the same, or diverse?

§ 15. It seems that the act itself belongs to reason, because:

§ 1. 1. That act is the detestation of sin with an indignation by which one is indignant at the sin and the sinner; but to compare such things belongs only to reason; therefore the act of contrition belongs to reason, as it seems.

§ 2. 2. Also, penance is moved against sin insofar as it has been perpetrated, and thus there is a certain collation (comparison) there; but to compare belongs solely to reason; therefore it seems that contrition belongs solely to reason.

§ 3. 3. Also, in an exterior judgment the crushing of robbers or malefactors is attributed to two as agents, namely to the judge by command, and to the beadle or lictor by execution. Therefore it will be similar in the interior judgment: but Augustine says in the book On Penance that the judge is reason. Therefore contrition, which is the act of the one crushing, can be of reason, or of the executioner, who is fear according to blessed Augustine.

§ 4. It seems, however, that contrition as a passion belongs to every power of the soul: because in whatever power partakes in some way of reason, sin is committed or can be committed; but in whatever power there is sin, in that it is necessary to be contrite. Therefore it is necessary that one be contrite in every power. Therefore it will not be the passion of one power, but of all those called rational in whatever way.

§ 5. But as to this which could be objected, whether it belongs to the same thing to sorrow and to will to sorrow, it has been objected and solved in what preceded.

§ 6. SOLUTION. It must be said that contrition is chiefly of the part of the soul which is called the will, just as was proved in certain objections. Although some have sometimes said that it is in the irascible power, because one is indignant at oneself; for it does not belong to the irascible power to be indignant at oneself, but rather at an extrinsic injurer. But the perpetrated sin, insofar as it is perpetrated, is properly detested by the will dissenting from it.

§ 7. To that, therefore, which is objected, that the action of contrition belongs to reason: it must be said that it does not, but rather to the rational will. And therefore order and collation belong to reason discerning what is to be detested; but nevertheless the sorrow itself belongs to the will.

542. The text has dolorem attritionis (the sorrow of attrition), but the sense requires contritionis (of contrition), since formed faith and initial fear are principles of contrition, whereas unformed faith and servile fear belong to attrition.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that in many things it is the case that an act of the will, because it is from pre-ordaining reason, is of a certain compared thing, although it does not compare, such as loving a friend for the sake of the friend, and loving a parent more than an enemy, and so of others. Hence, although the will does not compare, nevertheless its affection sometimes falls upon compared things; and so it is here.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that reason does not crush except by way of discerning, just as the judge does not; but the will executes by way of crushing through dissent and sorrow.

§ 10. To what is objected concerning contrition as a passion, that it belongs to every power of the soul, it must be said that nothing prohibits this. Nevertheless, it will not be primarily except of the will dissenting from the perpetrated sin: because this is, as it were, punished in all the others, and is participated by the others, insofar as it is their mover. And through this the solution to everything is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether Contrition Has Always Been In The Same Mode In The New And Old Testament

Whether contrition was always in the same mode in the New and Old Testament?

§ 11. Fifthly it is asked: Whether it was always in the same mode in the New and Old Testament?

§ 12. And it seems that it was, because: 1. That whose cause is in one and the same mode, is itself in the same mode; but actual sin is the cause of contrition, and it was in the same mode in the New and Old Testament; therefore contrition also was in the same mode.

§ 13. 2. Also, contrition is not ordered against a sin of nature, but rather of the person; and these have always been divided, and are, and will be. Therefore it seems that the re-

§ 1. ...medy of actual sin ought always to have been by one mode; therefore contrition was in one mode in the New and Old Testament.

§ 2. 3. Also, Joel 2:12 says, Be converted to me, etc. And after, v. 13: Rend your hearts, etc. But nothing else is imposed on the contrite and penitent person in the New Testament. Therefore it seems that in the same mode, etc.

§ 3. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. The other two parts, namely confession and satisfaction, were not in the same mode as they are now; therefore neither was contrition.

§ 4. 2. Also, the law brought nothing to perfection, as it is said in Hebrews 7:19. Therefore a sacrament of perfection did not belong to it; but contrition as it is observed in the New Testament leads to perfection; therefore in the Old Testament it ought to have been according to a type, and lesser, as it seems.

§ 5. SOLUTION. It must be said that contrition was in the Old Testament just as in the New, as the first reasons prove.

545. The text has dolorem attritionis (the sorrow of attrition), but the sense requires contritionis (of contrition), since formed faith and initial fear are principles of contrition, whereas unformed faith and servile fear belong to attrition.

§ 6. But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is otherwise with confession and satisfaction, because those had to be done by the ministry of priests; hence, since the priests of that state were different from those of this state, those two parts could not be in the same mode in the New and Old Testament. But in contrition, nothing is looked to except God who blots out sins; and therefore it was always in the same mode always both in the law of nature, and of Moses, and of grace.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that although contrition was observed in the law, nevertheless it is not of the law like the moral commandments, as was disputed above at the end of the third book of the Sentences; and therefore contrition could lead something to perfection in the faith of the one to come.

§ 8. And through this the solution to everything is clear.

Articulus 11 — What The First Mover To Contrition Is

What is the first mover to contrition?

§ 9. Lastly it is asked: What moves one to contrition?

§ 10. 1. It seems that it is fear, through the definition of contrition posited by Isidore.

§ 11. 2. Also, Isaiah 26:17-18: From your fear, O Lord, we have conceived, etc. But this parturition is in contrition. Therefore it seems that it is conceived from the fear of the Lord; therefore fear first moves to contrition.

§ 12. BUT AGAINST THIS it seems that faith first moves: because faith shows the penalties due to the perpetrated sin as harmful; therefore it first causes flight and detestation; and this is contrition; therefore contrition is conceived and caused by faith.

§ 13. And because enough was held about this above in the question on penance, it is asked: by reason of which article does it move to contrition?

§ 14. And it seems that it is by reason of this one: And he will come again with glory to judge the living and the dead; because that article moves to sorrow for sin concerning those to be judged in the judgment, and that fear or sorrow is contrition; therefore faith moves to this, that someone be contrite.

§ 15. But it seems that it is the one which is: The forgiveness of sins; because in contrition sins are forgiven; therefore that article moves to contrition.

§ 16. RESPONSE. It seems it must be said that

§ 1. ...faith moves on the part of the intellect, and fear and the affection of love on the part of the affect: because on that part by which the eye is to punishment, fear moves; but on that part by which it is to glory, love moves.

§ 2. But to the first which is against this, it must be said that fear moves, but not primarily, but proximately on the part of the contrite person according to the affect.

546. Aristotle, Metaphysics, X, 10 (1058b 26-28).

§ 3. Through this also is solved what is objected concerning Isidore.

§ 4. But to what is asked: By reason of which article?

§ 5. It must be said that it is by reason of the one which is concerning the judgment, as is expressly held in the aforementioned definition of Isidore.

§ 6. But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the forgiveness of sins moves to this; but nevertheless faith conjoins the hope of forgiving sins; but the consideration of the judgment, because it strikes fear, excites to contrition. And through this the solution to everything is clear.

Articulus 12 — Whether Confession Is Of Precept And Binds All

Whether confession is under a precept and obliges everyone?

§ 7. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at A, after the beginning: Confession is there: The just man in the beginning of his speech is his own accuser [Proverbs 18:17].

§ 8. Seven things are asked here concerning confession. First, Whether confession is under a precept, or not? Second, Whether it is of natural or positive right? Third, How it was in the natural and the old law, and whether in the same mode or diverse? Fourth, Whether it is an work of some virtue, or only of a sacrament; and if of some virtue, which virtue is that? Fifth, What it is by definition, and essence, or being? Sixth, Which article of faith moves to confession? Seventh, On which attribute in God does it rest, whether of mercy, or of wisdom, or another?

§ 9. To the first it is objected thus: 1. Whatever is necessary for salvation is under a precept; confession is necessary for salvation; therefore it is under a precept. The first premise is clear from the common distinction of all between a precept and a counsel. The second is proved from the saying of Ambrose, who says thus: "No one can be justified, unless he has confessed his sin."

§ 10. 2. Also, a fulfilled precept gives entrance to life; but one who does not confess does not enter into life; therefore it seems that confession is under a precept. The first premise is proved by that of Matthew 19:17: If you will enter into life, keep the commandments. The second is commonly supposed by the Church.

§ 11. 3. Also, it is commanded to the pastors of the Church that they diligently know the face of their flock [Proverbs 27:23]; but they cannot know unless they know in what things it is sick, because in that part it needs guarding, not in the part where it is healthy. Therefore it seems that the flock itself is bound to expose the causes of its sicknesses; but this does not happen except through confession. Therefore it is commanded to them that they confess; therefore confession is under a precept.

§ 12. 4. Also, in corporal medicine the sick person is commanded to expose to the corporal physician in how many things, and in what things, and where he hurts. Since, therefore, spiritual sickness is more dangerous than that of the body, much more ought the spiritually sick person be commanded to expose the causes of his sicknesses to the spiritual physician.

§ 1. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. If it is under a precept, then it equally obliges everyone; but some have been cleansed from sin who are not read to have confessed; therefore it does not seem to be under a precept. The proof of the first premise is from what is commonly said, that we are all bound to precepts, but not to counsels. The second is proved from what is held in Luke 7:47 concerning Mary Magdalene, to whom many sins were forgiven, not because she confessed, but because she loved much. And concerning Peter who denied, and yet is not read to have confessed, but to have wept. [547]

§ 2. 2. Also, nothing is required for the expulsion of one contrary except the introduction of the other contrary in the same subject; but without any confession, through the infusion of virtues which takes place in contrition, and the consuetudinal justice which takes place in satisfaction, a virtue contrary to any sin is introduced in the subject. Therefore it seems that this suffices for the expulsion of sin. Therefore the confession of sin is not necessary. Therefore it is not of precept.

§ 3. 3. Also, in sin there are only two things, namely the guilt and the penalty: because even if it is said that there is a difficulty in acting well there, that also is a certain penalty. But the guilt together with the eternal penalty conjoined to it is sufficiently expelled through contrition. But the remaining penalty, namely the debt of temporal penalty with the difficulty of acting well, is sufficiently expelled through satisfaction. Therefore confession is necessary for nothing. Therefore it ought not to be under a precept.

§ 4. 4. Also, in natures, for the perfection of a thing in being and in potency, nothing is required except the induction of form in matter, and the strengthening of the same in it. Therefore it is similarly in spiritual being: but the form of grace is sufficiently induced in the soul through contrition, and is sufficiently strengthened through satisfaction. Therefore confession is altogether superfluous. Therefore, etc.

§ 5. 5. Also, if confession is under a precept and among the things necessary for salvation, then it operates toward the forgiveness of sin in some way: either, therefore, in the penalty, or in the guilt. If in the guilt. AGAINST THIS: Before confession the guilt is frequently forgiven; therefore it does not operate toward the forgiveness of the guilt. But if it operates toward the deletion of the penalty. AGAINST THIS: Either that penalty is eternal, or not. If eternal. AGAINST THIS: It is adjoined to the guilt, and while the guilt stands it stands, and when it is dissolved it is dissolved: but it has been held that the guilt is dissolved in contrition; therefore confession does not operate against the eternal penalty. But if it is a temporal penalty. AGAINST THIS: Nothing operates against another thing except through the fact that it is contrary to it; confession does not have contrariety to the penalty temporally due to sin. Therefore it does not expel it, as it seems.

§ 6. 6. Also, a wholly corporal act does not seem to be expulsive of sin; but confession of the mouth is a wholly corporal act; therefore it is not expulsive of sin.

§ 7. FURTHERMORE it is asked here: If it is under a precept, of what kind is that precept?

§ 8. For it is either ceremonial, or sacramental, or judicial, or moral.

§ 9. 1. If purely ceremonial: then it seems that it ought not to be kept in the New Testament. PROOF. Whatever things have their whole use in signifying, cease when the truth which they signified arrives; the whole use of ceremonials is in signifying; therefore they cease in the New Testament, in which the truth which they signified has been made manifest. The first premise is proved from the fact that nothing is useless in the works of the Church; and it would be useless that what has use only in signifying should be kept when the truth has been made manifest: because anyone is better instructed through the manifestation of the truth than through a type and figure. But the second premise is prescribed by the Master in Book IV of the Sentences. [548]

§ 10. 2. But if it is said to be sacramental:

§ 1. ...either of the New Testament, or of the Old. Now it is established that it is not of the Old, because then it would have ceased in the New, just like the other sacraments of the Old Testament. If it is of the New Testament. On the contrary: Nothing in the New Testament is a sacrament except by divine institution: confession is not read to have had divine institution: therefore it does not belong to the sacraments of the New Testament.

§ 2. But if it is said to be a judicial precept. On the contrary: Judicial precepts vary according to the diversity of humans and sects; but confession does not vary in this way: therefore it does not belong to the judicial precepts.

§ 3. But if it is said to belong to the moral precepts: then it is asked, to what is it reduced? For in word [i.e., regarding speech] they consist only of two: one pertaining to God, namely, 'You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain'; and the other to neighbor, 'You shall not speak false witness against your neighbor'. But it is established that it is not reduced to the first, because it is not an oath; nor to the second, since nothing is said there against a neighbor: therefore it seems that it falls under no genus of precepts, namely moral ones.

§ 4. 3. If perhaps it is said that it belongs to the precepts of the Fathers. On the contrary: Nothing that is of the precepts of the Fathers is a part of a sacrament, or a sacrament: confession is of the precepts of the Fathers: therefore it is not a sacrament, or a part of a sacrament. The first is proved by this, that all sacraments with their essentials have their force from divine institution. The second is supposed from the hypothesis.

§ 5. Item, the precepts of the Fathers admit of dispensation, on the grounds that they are not concerning things necessary for salvation: therefore if confession is of the precepts of the Fathers, a dispensation could be made, such that someone might die without confession: which is not done in the Church, nor is it judged possible to be done.

§ 6. 4. If perhaps you say that this precept has divine institution, as when the Lord said to the lepers: 'Go, show yourselves to the priests.' On the contrary: Those priests to whom the Lord commanded the lepers to present themselves were legal [i.e., of the Old Law], and not true priests: therefore from this it is not held that confession should be made in the way the faithful confess in the New Testament.

547. James 5:16.

§ 7. Item, They were not commanded to confess, but only to show themselves cleansed: therefore from this it is not held that there must be confession by mouth: so that individual sins are recounted, as happens in the New Testament: therefore it still seems to be held that it is not commanded.

§ 8. 5. If perhaps you say that on account of enjoining penance the disease must be known: and therefore it is commanded to confess, and this precept is promulgated [549] where it says: 'Confess your sins to one another.' It seems that this is nothing: because penance cannot remit sins from condignity, but rather from congruity according to the priest's judgment, having weighed the powers and state of the penitent: and in this way sufficient satisfaction could be made in common, even without the sins being known: therefore it seems that it is not necessary on this account.

§ 9. 6. Item, Some bind themselves to perpetual penance and to a greater one than they would be forced to undertake according to the priest's judgment: therefore according to this they would not be bound to confess, which is false: therefore it seems that confession is not in any precept.

§ 10. Solution. I answer without prejudice that in confession there are three things that logically follow one another: of which the first is the manifestation of the sin with detestation and a sign of detestation. The second is the recounting of the perpetrated acts of sin which occur to memory. The third is the accusation of oneself in blaming oneself, and not excusing the act of sin through circumstances. And it seems it must be said that with respect to all these three, it is under precept: but with respect to the first, it is only under divine precept, and the Church, by determining it, added and commanded the second and third, first in the Apostles, and afterward in the other successors of the Apostles: yet according to the testimony of the divine will: for the testimony of the divine will in the confession of the act of sin in species is held from the first question that He asked the first sinner, namely Adam, when He asked, 'Adam, where are you?'; for He did not ask about his place, but so that he would simply confess the act of sin. But the testimony of the divine will concerning the accusation of oneself, and that one should not excuse the sin, is held from the fact that He condemned Adam and Eve excusing themselves. Similarly in their descendants it has a sign of the recounting of acts in species, in the canticle of Hezekiah saying 'I will recount to you all my years in the bitterness of my soul'. The sign of accusation is had where it is said 'Incline not my heart to evil words, to make excuses in sins'. Therefore the Church, considering these things, taught by the Holy Spirit, instituted that every faithful person of either sex should confess their sins once a year: and because it was done by the instigation of the Holy Spirit, therefore also the precept of the Church in this is reduced to a divine precept.

§ 2. It must be said therefore to the first, that although the confession of blessed Peter and Mary Magdalene is not read, yet they confessed: because many things were done which are not written, as is hinted at the end of John [550], as is said in the following in the Letter by the Master.

548. Isaiah 38:15.

§ 3. Or it can be said perhaps better, that confession is made on account of two things, namely so that the penitent, according to his past way of life, might become known to the priest enjoining the penance, and so that he might merit from his shame. But since Christ was a true priest and God, neither had to be done before Him: because He Himself as God saw those things that were in the heart, and penitents were more ashamed at His gaze than at the hearing of a priest alone: and therefore it was not necessary to impose the recounting of sins upon those penitents who were absolved by Him immediately: but before the vicars of Christ who do not see inward things, and at whose bodily gaze a human is not so shamed, there must be a hearing of sins in confession on the part of the one confessing.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that because of the inherence of one of the contraries in a subject, many things are sometimes required for the removal of the other contrary: and especially when there is fear of its return, and when the cause holding the contrary in the subject lies hidden from the one expelling it: and so it is with sin which is feared to return: there is also a hidden proneness on the part of the one sinning: and therefore many things are required for the expulsion of sin, such as the detestation of sin, and the induction of a contrary custom through works of satisfaction: but if the contrary could immediately be expelled without fear of return, and it were known by what it could be best expelled: then what the objection proves would be true.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that (as was said above) all these three parts of penance operate jointly against sin: but it is not necessary that all be present in act, but it is sufficient for two or one to be in purpose, and the other or others to be in act.

§ 6. But if what it says is conceded: then it must be said that temporal penalty is twofold, namely disproportionate and proportionate by the power of the keys: and the penalty disproportionate to the powers of the penitent is owed to the one not having confessed, because the power of the keys has not yet operated in him, which keys, I say, having power from the passion of Christ, dismiss the greater part of the penance or penalty owed to sin through the rationale of condignity: and therefore after confession, by the virtue of the keys, the penalty is made taxable and arbitrary, which in itself was not taxable, because it was disproportionate to the powers of the penitent, but corresponding to the condignity of the sin: and therefore it is clear that confession is necessary for the deletion of sin.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, that in nature things are different where nature operates, and where art aids nature: for what is said in objecting is true where nature alone operates. But this is not similar to the work of sacramental grace: because then a minister of the sacrament would not be required, who is called a physician in Scripture 'Will you work wonders for the dead? Or shall physicians raise them up, and praise you?' But rather it is that work where art aids nature, and in that it is required that the artisan know the disease and the cause and the quantity and duration of the disease before he can aid in the expulsion of the disease: and so it is in the work of penance: and therefore confession is required for the manifestation of the sin: yet especially for that cause, because confession operates to the diminution of the penalty: which is why also satisfaction is so called by Augustine saying: 'He offered much satisfaction who, mastering his shame, hid none of the things he committed from the messenger of God'.

549. James 5:16.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that (as has already been established) it operates per se to the deletion of the penalty, or of the sin according to the debt of penalty.

§ 4. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that it happens in two ways that something is contrary to another, namely in itself, when they are most distant in the same genus, and mutually expel one another from a susceptible subject: and thus penalty is not contrary to penalty, nor confession to sin in penalty. There is also a contrary, because it somehow makes a contrary in effect: and thus confession makes a contrariety to sin, and pays the debt of penalty. For in the perpetration of sin there was a shamelessness before God who sees all things and His Angels, and a casting away of the passion of Christ for sins through contempt, which is the root of every mortal sin: and confession has the contraries of these when a man is ashamed before the vicar of God, and humbly submits himself to the keys having power from the passion of Christ: therefore it operates to the expulsion of sin.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that it is not entirely a bodily act: because it proceeds from a lower virtue of the mind: just as also giving bodily alms has its force from the virtue of the mind which inclines to giving.

§ 6. But if it is asked, How can this be? It must be said that the power of the mover is in the motion and in the movable thing, whether it moves in the manner of nature, or in the manner of will: just as the power of the mover in the motion of heaven, on account of which it is said to be a certain life for all things existing below. So also, because virtue and grace move in the manner of nature, the power of virtue and grace remains even in bodily motions and works: and through that power it operates to the deletion of sin, and the augment of merit.

§ 7. To that which is further asked, the solution is clear through the things which were said in the beginning of this solution, that it is of divine precept according to the fact that it is a certain manifestation of sins: but this manifestation according to the progress of time had an increment, as also other things operating for salvation: and therefore it received determination from the Apostles and from the Church: and it can still receive a further one than it has, if it seems expedient.

§ 8. To this, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that penance was instituted in paradise according to all its parts: because otherwise it would not put sin to death, and give life to justice: and some say that it was in that word: 'On whatever day you shall eat of it, you shall die the death': and it received innovation from Christ in the New Testament

550. John 21:25.

§ 1. 'Do penance: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' Now it is established that he did not intend penance, except insofar as it is perfected in its parts: and therefore confession is understood to have been instituted.

§ 2. Yet special mention is made of confession , where it is said that they came to John confessing their sins: and this same thing is understood that they did when receiving the baptism of Christ, as the Master says in the second part of this distinction.

§ 3. There it is also understood to have been instituted, as was said in the objection, namely , where Christ said to the lepers that they should show themselves to the priests, and offer for themselves the gift which Moses appointed.

§ 4. To this, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is a sacramental precept variously in the law of nature, the old, and the new, receiving determination through the Fathers by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit: but as it is now observed, it is a sacramental precept of the New Testament: and it is already clear where it was instituted.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that it is not of the Fathers in such a way that the Fathers promulgated the whole of it, but rather because the Fathers determined it: and therefore it does not admit of dispensation from a pure man.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that those priests and lepers are considered in two ways, namely as simple men serving God in the state of the Old Testament, before legal observances were deadened by the passion of Christ: and as a figure of future things, indeed the lepers are those confessing, and the priests are the priests of the New Testament. And in the first way indeed the objection proceeds: but in the second way the will of Christ is signified to be about the showing of sin signified by leprosy, and about satisfaction signified by the gift: and this will of Christ was expressed by the Apostles in the precept of confession , where it is said: 'Confess your sins to one another.'

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that it is necessary to know the disease, as was said before: but this is not the principal reason for which confession was instituted, but rather on account of the operation of the keys which joins perfection to the penitent: hence what the objection posits is secondary in the cause of confession: and yet what it intends to prove does not follow, because an arbiter must know concerning the cause of which he is the arbiter: hence since the priest does not only look at the powers, but the cause of taking up the owed penalty, he must know in how many and in what things one has offended.

§ 8. To the last it must be said that even if one binds oneself to perpetual penance, than which no greater will ever be enjoined, nevertheless for the said reasons he must make a confession of all sins.

Articulus 13 — Whether Confession Is Of Natural Or Positive Law

Whether confession is of natural or positive law?

§ 9. Secondly it is asked, Whether it is of natural or positive law?

§ 10. Now it seems to be of natural law: 1. For Adam is blamed for this, that he excused his offense when he should have humbly confessed: therefore he sinned against a law not yet written, because there was none written or positive: therefore it is left that he sinned against natural law: therefore confession is of natural law.

§ 11. 2. Item, it is objected concerning Cain, of whom the Lord asked what he had done: and he is blamed because he did not humbly acknowledge and confess: therefore since at that time there was nothing but natural law, he seems to have sinned against natural law.

§ 12. 3. This also seems through the Gloss on that text, 'Adam, where are you?' where the Gloss says thus: The words of one rebuking and compelling to confession, not of one who is ignorant. If therefore He compelled to confession, he was bound to confess: and it is established that he was not bound from positive law, because then there was none: therefore he was bound from natural law: therefore confession is of natural law.

§ 2. 4. Item, on that text of Genesis 'The woman, whom you gave me as a companion, gave me of the tree, and I ate': the Gloss says: Not humbly confessing, but proudly excusing himself, and throwing the blame back on the author of the woman. Therefore humble confession was then owed, because otherwise he would not be blamed for the opposite: and from this as before.

§ 3. 5. Item, on that text of the Psalm 'Incline not my heart to evil words, etc.', the Gloss says: For this place a door, that my sin may not be excused: which highest vice dominates in men, whence they are slower to repent. Now it is established that, other things being equal, it is more and a greater thing to sin against natural law than against positive law: since therefore this vice is the highest, it seems to be against natural law: therefore its opposite, namely the humble confession of an offense, is of natural law.

§ 4. 6. Item 'If I have hidden my sin as a man, and concealed my iniquity in my bosom.' Now it is established that Job was under natural law: therefore it is of natural law to confess sin.

§ 5. 7. Item, in the same place, Gregory in the Gloss: One who is truly humble both knows his evil deeds, and opens them with the voice of confession. Since therefore true humility concerning sins is of natural law, it seems that to open sins with the voice of confession is of natural law.

§ 6. 8. Item, Gregory in the same place in another Gloss: To conceal iniquity in one's bosom, is to hide one's conscience in the hiding places of sin, and not uncover it through confession. Since therefore Job says this in the state of natural law, it seems that confession is of natural law, and its opposite is against natural law.

§ 7. 9. Item, It is established that penance is of natural law: therefore its parts as well, because it itself is not without them: but one of its parts is confession: therefore confession is of natural law.

§ 8. 10. Item, Penance is a certain whole, as was held before, which has several parts constituting it from a certain order: and in that order the first is contrition which is of natural law, and the last is satisfaction which is of natural law: therefore since confession is the middle, it itself is also of natural law. Or let it be said why not.

§ 9. But if this is conceded, it is objected to the contrary in this way: 1. Isidore says that natural law is the same among all people: but confession was not always the same among all: therefore confession is not of natural law. The minor premise is proved from this, that confession is otherwise in the New Testament, and was otherwise in the Old.

§ 10. 2. Item, the Philosopher in the V of the Ethics [551] says that the right of nature is in the same mode in all things: as fire has the same power of burning in Persia and in Greece. And from this it is argued as before.

§ 11. 3. Item, Tully: The law of nature is that which opinion did not engender, but a certain power inserted in nature. Now it is established that no power inserted in nature commands man to confess his sin, but rather teaches him to hide it lest he be shamed by men: therefore confession is not of natural law, as it seems.

§ 12. Solution. I answer without prejudice, that natural law is spoken of in two ways, namely what the nature of man dictates is to be done: and thus it is called natural law strictly. In another way that is called natural which is constituted by naturing nature [the Creator]:

and thus whatever is contained in the Old or New Testament is said to be of natural law: and in this latter way confession can in some way be of natural law, but not in the first.

§ 2. To this therefore which is first objected, through which it seems to be proved that it is of natural law in the first way said: it must be said that Adam is blamed for this, that he did not acknowledge his sin in himself, and before God, but not for this, that he did not confess to a human: because then there was no one besides his wife, who could not hear confession: and this recognition of sin which is before God, is of natural law.

§ 3. And through this the solution is clear to the following which is objected concerning Cain.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that confession is twofold, namely the recognition of sin between oneself and God, and the manifestation of sin through a recounting made to a priest. And concerning confession spoken of in the first way it is said 'I said: I will confess against myself my injustice to the Lord: and you forgave, etc.' But concerning it spoken of in the second way it is said 'With the mouth confession is made unto salvation.' And the Gloss introduced from Genesis is understood of it spoken of in the first way, and not of it spoken of in the second way, which is only sacramental: nor were all bound to that at that time.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that it is argued concerning the excusing of sin before God, not before man, as was said.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that that is not called the highest vice simply by reason of guilt or deformity, but because it is a sin among others more contrary to penance: because penance is only in one recognizing, but one excusing does not recognize sin: and a similar saying is in Romans [552], on that text: 'Do you not know that the benignity of God leads you to penance?' where the Gloss of Ambrose says: You sin most gravely if you do not know: not by reason of the quantity of the sin in guilt and deformity, but rather of the danger: because one not knowing his fall, does not seek a remedy, and therefore remains in danger.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that Job does not understand this of the hiding which is in confession made to a priest, but rather of the hiding which one does when caught in a sin, when he denies having committed the sin, so that he may seem just to others. And this exposition is drawn from the Gloss in the same place: and therefore that is not to the proposition.

§ 8. To the next it must be said, that it does not follow, if one who is truly humble opens his sin with the voice of confession, and if true humility is of natural law, that confession made by voice is also of natural law: because confession made by voice does not always in every state follow upon one who is truly humble and recognizing his state: hence this happens to one who is truly humble in some state, not in every one: hence the sophistic locus of accident [i.e., the fallacy of accident] happens there.

§ 9. To the next it must be said, that Gregory speaks of one who, caught in a sin, denies having committed it: or he speaks mystically of the time of grace in which a man is bound to confess his sins to a priest.

§ 10. To the next it must be said, that penance is considered in two ways, namely according to the fact that it is in the genus of virtue, and according to the fact that it is in the genus of sacrament. According to the fact that it is in the genus of virtue, it does not have parts, but is saved in contrition alone, according as contrition is the act of the one contrite: and satisfaction then will be a species of justice, and then confession made to a man is not required for penance, but that which is made to God in the heart in the recognition of sin is sufficient. But according to the fact that it is in the genus of the sacrament of the new or old law, it is not of natural law, just as certain other sacraments are not: and thus it has these three parts, which are attributed to it.

§ 11. To the next it must be said, that these three parts of penance are not in the same way: because the first and last parts regard the sin in the penitent according to fault, or according to penalty. But confession does not regard this except what is in the minister of the Church, who is constituted for the dispensation of the sacrament, and has the power of the keys: and therefore the first and last parts are of natural law, but not the middle, which does not regard anything except only those things which belong to the sacrament, and not to the virtue of penance, except perhaps with respect to the recognition of sin before God. But this is not confession as we are now inquiring about confession: and therefore it does not follow, if the first and last parts are of natural law, that the middle one is too: because its parts are not in the same way.

Articulus 14 — Which Were Of Natural Law Therefore Confession Was Not Then Observed Moreover It Is Not Asked Here What Someone Did But That To Which All Were Bound

How differently was confession in natural, old, and new law?

§ 2. Thirdly it is asked, According to what different mode was it in the natural, old, and new law?

§ 3. For it seems not to have been in the natural law: because, as has already been held, 1. Confession is not of natural law: but at that time only those things which were of natural law were observed: therefore confession was not observed then.

§ 4. 2. Item, it is not asked here, What anyone did, but that to which all were bound? Therefore even if someone then confessed his sin, provided however that not all were bound to confession, it seems that confession was not in natural law.

§ 5. 3. Item, Since there was no use of the keys, there could not be that which did not have its effect except through the keys: but in the natural law there was no use of the keys: therefore neither was there even confession which is not had except through the keys.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whenever there is a disease, it is time for medicine: but there was always the disease of actual sin in the natural law: therefore confession was always a medicine: therefore in the natural law confession was necessary, as it seems. Similarly, It seems that it was in the law of Moses: because [553] it is said: 'Relate if you have anything, that you may be justified.' As if saying: If you do not relate, you will not be justified.

§ 7. 2. Item [554], it is said that the priest shall imprecate the sins of the whole multitude upon the head of the goat, and send it away into the desert. Now it is established that he cannot imprecate sins which he did not know: therefore he had to know: but he could not know unless through confession: therefore they were bound then to confess to the priest.

§ 8. 3. Item [555], concerning lepers it is said that they were separated at the judgment of the priest, and he recognized concerning the leprosy: but leprosy according to the Gloss in the same place signifies sin: therefore the priest must recognize concerning sins: but he cannot unless they are manifested to him through confession: therefore they were bound then to confess to the priest.

§ 9. ON THE CONTRARY: As was held above, the principal cause of confession is on account of the benefit of the keys: but there were no true keys in the Old Testament: therefore neither was there true confession.

§ 10. Solution. It must be said that in truth the recognition of sin is in confession, and with this the manifestation of sin: and thirdly, the unraveling or exposition of sins in species and of their circumstances. And confession was not in the natural law except with respect to the recognition of sin between oneself and God, as was said. But in the law of Moses there was added some manifestation of sin, but in general, not in species: in a sign, not in a word. Because by offering a she-goat or a kid, it was known that they had sinned: but because this sacrifice was for any sin done through ignorance, there was no manifestation except in general, and not in species. In the New Testament, however, the recounting of species and other circumstances is required on account of a greater expression of truth and appearance of grace.

§ 11. To the first therefore it must be said, that the recognition of sin is always of natural law: and with respect to this alone there was confession in the law of nature.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, that all were bound to a recognition of sin of this sort, and that they should not deny it if they were caught, as is held from the authorities of Gregory introduced in the preceding article of the question.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that it is true that then there was no use of the keys: yet then the passion operated and made the penalty proportionate, which otherwise would have been disproportionate: but it operated in the faith of those believing implicitly or explicitly.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that in the old law there was some confession, but not as it is now in species and circumstance, but in general: and of this the saying of Isaiah is understood.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that the priest did not confess the sins of the multitude except in general: and he understood them in general by the mode of sacrifices, and not by recounting of mouth.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that the diversity of leprosies did not signify what was to be done then, but what is to be done now in the time of grace: and therefore it is not concluded that they confessed sins then in species and circumstances.

Articulus 15 — Whether Confession Is An Act Of Virtue, Or Only Of The Sacrament

Whether confession is an act of a virtue, or only of a sacrament?

§ 7. Fourthly it is asked, Whether it is an act of some virtue, or only of a sacrament? And if it is an act of some virtue, what is that virtue?

Now it seems that it is of the virtue of penance: because 1. It is for the detestation of sin: and the virtue of penance detests sin: therefore confession is of the virtue of penance, as it seems.

§ 8. 2. Item, Acts are defined by their opposites, that is, objects: therefore those of which there is the same object, are acts of the same virtue: but a perpetrated sin is the same object of confession and of penance: therefore confession is an act of the virtue of penance.

553. Isaiah 43:26.

§ 9. 3. Item, Those of which there is the same end, are of the same virtue if it is a proximate end: but the end of penance and confession is the same, namely the destruction of sin: therefore they are of one virtue: but they are not so of one that both are acts of a single third virtue; therefore the virtue itself is penance, and its act is confession, or one of its acts, as it seems.

§ 10. 4. Item, Some virtue elicits this act whatever it may be: now it is established, as Tully says, that virtue moves in the manner of nature: therefore it omits nothing of what is necessary for it: but what is necessary for the expulsion of sin is confession: therefore it does not omit this motion: therefore it seems that confession itself is a motion of the virtue of penance.

§ 11. But on the contrary it seems that it is a motion of the virtue which is truth: because 1. On that text of the Psalm 'For behold you have loved truth, etc.', the Gloss says: Truth, because I do not refer the fault to you, but I profess the truth which you love: now it is established that to speak truth is of the virtue which is truth: therefore confession is of the virtue which is truth.

§ 12. 2. Item, In the same place another Gloss: Here the penitent receives [grace], because in confessing he spoke the truth which God seeks above sacrifices, he supplicates that he be assisted. From this the same thing is accepted as before.

§ 13. 3. Item, Some act is proper to truth, as it is in sayings. Now it is established that there is none, except to speak the truth: but this especially happens in confession: for concerning all things which he says of himself, the penitent is believed without a witness: therefore confession is an act of truth, as it seems.

§ 14. 4. Item, The opposite of the truth which is in confession, is not the same in penance, namely the lie of confession: therefore confession is not an act of penance.

§ 5. Also, the statement of the one confessing generates belief in the listener: but it is established that it does not do this except insofar as it is under the form of truth: therefore it seems that confession is under the form of truth: but this form of truth which is in act, emanates from some habit: but it is established that it emanates only from truth: therefore it seems that it is an act of truth.

BUT AGAINST both of these it is said that: § 1. The act of no sacrament is necessarily of some virtue: but confession is an act of a sacrament: therefore it is not an act of any virtue.

§ 2. Also, no act equally proceeding from a vicious person who has neither infused nor customary virtue, is an act of virtue: confession is an act of this kind: therefore it is not an act of any virtue. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proven from the fact that someone wishing to turn away from sin, and who even to others is not accustomed to tell the truth, often confesses in truth concerning all his sins. And it is established that then he does not have infused virtues, nor does he even have the customary one which is called truth, because that is not innate except through custom: therefore the proposition is established.

§ 3. Also, virtue is concerning the difficult and the good: but it is not difficult to tell the truth: therefore there is no virtue concerning it: therefore it is not of any virtue which is truth. Proof of the middle premise. It is more difficult to speak against one's mind, than according to one's mind: but a liar speaks against his mind, while a truthful person speaks according to his mind: therefore the truthful person labors less than the liar: therefore the proposition is established.

Solution. I respond that some good and praiseworthy act is said to belong to some virtue in two ways, namely as commanding, and as eliciting. As commanding, however, the act of confession can belong to several virtues: but more frequently it belongs to the virtue which is called penance, concerning which it was treated above. As eliciting, indeed, this act is of the virtue which is called truth, as is proven in objecting.

To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that confession has certain things from its own rationale and substance, and certain things from the commanding virtue. From its own substance it has nothing but the simple narration of truth, but from the commanding virtue it has that it be with detestation of sin. And still it must be added, that according as it takes on the rationale of a sacrament, it has that this narration be made to a minister of the Church with certain signs signifying the detestation of sin, and the obedience of the will toward undertaking exterior penance through the judgment of the priest: and thus what is attended to in confession is made up as if from three things. But the objection would proceed well if it had what it says from its own substance.

To the other it must be said that that matter is given to it according to the command of penance, and according to the being of a sacrament, which is concerning whatever matter in which the form of truth is present.

To the other it must be said that the proximate end of confession and of penance is not the same, but the remote end is: for the proximate end is that into which the act terminates, and that is the knowledge which it generates in the listener: but the ultimate end does not make it so that the things which are for that end are the same in species or in number.

To the other it must be said that penance is not lacking in the motion itself, but it only has it through the mode of command.

To the other it must be said that nothing prohibits some act from being both of a sacrament and of a virtue, according to different rationales: and this especially in this sacrament, which is ordered against actual sin, which is contrary to the virtue that regards the act of free will. Hence, regarding the simple enunciation of truth itself, it is the confession of truth which is a virtue: but according as it is in such a forum and form and with such signs, it is an act of a sacrament: and nothing prohibits this.

To the OTHER it must be said that this act does not proceed from a vicious person insofar as he is vicious, but from one having some truth, either in the power of free will, or according to grace, or according to a civil habit. For if the penitent is in charity when he confesses, then there is no objection. If however he is truthful by custom, even if he is in other vices: again there is no objection: because of customary virtues, in my judgment, one can be possessed while another is not possessed. If however he does not even have a customary virtue: then it must be said that that act of truth in the one confessing is from the free will capable of passing into an act generative of a customary virtue: for although virtues according to habit and the vice opposed to them cannot be present together, nevertheless an act ordered to generating a virtue can be present together with a vice, even one opposed to the virtue: and therefore that act is not from a vicious person insofar as he is vicious.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Definitions Of Penance Are Well Given

Are the definitions of penance [i.e., confession] well given?

Are the definitions of penance well given?

Fifthly it is asked, What is it in definition and essence?

Now, several definitions of confession are found, all of which that occur to us we shall set down.

It is defined by the Masters who preceded us thus: "Confession is the sacramental accusation of his sins by the delinquent, from shame and satisfactory through the keys, obliging to the performance of enjoined penance."

But other predecessors of ours define it thus: "Confession is the legitimate explanation of sins."

Gregory: "Confession is the uncovering of sins, and the breaking open of a wound."

Augustine thus: "Confession is that by which a hidden disease is opened in the hope of pardon."

Certain novices, indeed, like Raymond, have defined it thus: "Confession is the legitimate declaration of sins before a priest."

It is objected concerning the first definition thus: § 1. "Sacramental" is denominative from sacrament: but no denominating term becomes substantial to that which it denominates: therefore the sacrament is not substantial to confession, which is false, since confession is under the sacrament as a part under the whole.

§ 2. Also, since confession is an act of the virtue moving to confession, it ought thus to say, "the accusation by the delinquent of virtue," etc., just as "sacramental."

§ 3. Also, as the act of virtue is related to virtue, so the act of a sacrament is related to a sacrament: but no act of virtue is said to be virtuous, but rather properly of a virtue: therefore no act of a sacrament ought to be "sacramental," but rather of a sacrament.

555. Leviticus 13:44.

§ 4. Also, intinction is not said to be a "baptismal" act, nor consignation a "confirmational" act: therefore it seems that neither should confession be called "sacramental."

§ 5. Also, why is it not denominated from its proximate genus, so that it would be said, "Confession is the penitential [accusation] of the delinquent," etc.? For it seems that it ought to be done thus: because confession is related more proximately to penance, than to sacrament in general: therefore it ought rather to be denominated from that.

§ 6. Also, it is objected concerning what is said, "Of the delinquent": for confession does not seem to belong to the delinquent [i.e., one currently offending], but to one who has offended, and is repenting.

§ 7. Also, no delinquent, insofar as he is such, is a penitent: but every confessor, insofar as he is such, is a penitent: therefore no penitent, insofar as he is such, is a delinquent: therefore confession is not of a delinquent.

§ 8. If perhaps you say that it is understood of venial fault, in which we all offend in many things: without which, as Augustine says, life is not led. Against this: the act of such a delinquent is prayer and many other things: therefore just as it falls into the definition of confession, so it ought to fall into the definition of prayer, contrition, charity, and all other things.

§ 9. Moreover, this is accidental according to that exposition, "confession is the sacramental accusation of his sins by the delinquent": because the sense is, of him who daily offends: but nothing accidental ought to be posited in a definition, especially what is accidental in this way, because this is infinite, and nothing can be made known through it: therefore the ancients spoke badly in defining that confession is the accusation of the delinquent.

§ 10. Further, it is objected concerning what is said, "Accusation." For before a rhetorician and in civil law the accuser and the defendant are not the same: but here the one confessing presents himself as the defendant: therefore it seems that he is not the accuser: therefore confession is not an accusation.

§ 11. Also, no one is justly accused in judgment to whom a place of defense is not granted: if therefore the confessor is accused by someone, whether by another or by himself, a place of defense ought to be granted to him in the same forum: and thus it will not be a vice of confession if it is with a defense of sins, which is false, since Psalm 140:4 says: "Incline not my heart to evil words; to make excuses in sins."

Moreover it is asked, since conscience is the witness, why is it not called "testification" just as "accusation"?

§ 12. Further it is asked concerning what it says, "From shame." Because this does not seem to be substantial to confession: because not everyone can have shame.

§ 13. Also, as sensible sorrow is related to contrition, so shame is related to confession: but contrition is not defined through sensible sorrow: therefore neither is confession to be defined through shame, as it seems.

§ 14. Also, upon that of Psalm 68:20: "Thou knowest my reproach, and my confusion," etc., Augustine distinguishes in the Gloss between shame or modesty, and confusion: because confusion is with a remorse of conscience, when true things are objected. But shame is when false things are objected with modesty. Since therefore the one confessing feels modesty with a remorse of conscience, it seems that it ought rather to have said, "from confusion," than "shame."

§ 15. Also, it does not seem to be true that from this shame it is satisfactory: because that passion of shame is also corporeal: and no corporeal passion is meritorious: therefore from that confession is not satisfactory.

§ 16. Further it is asked concerning what it says, "Through the keys." For what is satisfactory without the keys, does not have the power of satisfying through the keys: confession is of this kind: therefore it does not have the power of satisfying through the keys. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proven: because in the Old Testament there were no keys, and yet there was there in some way sacramental confession: and in the New Testament sometimes confession is made to one not having the keys, and yet the confession is satisfactory.

§ 17. Moreover, it is objected concerning what is said, "Satisfactory." Because satisfaction is a dividing part of penance with confession: therefore one ought not to be posited in the definition of the other.

§ 18. Also. Things which are diverse in species, their proper acts and effects are diverse: confession and satisfaction are diverse in species: therefore their proper acts and effects are diverse: but it is established that the most proper act of satisfaction is to satisfy: therefore that act does not belong to confession: therefore confession is not satisfactory, as it seems.

§ 19. Further it is asked concerning what it says, "Obliging," etc. For the one confessing is not obliged from the fact that he confesses, but rather from the subsequent will, by which he receives the satisfaction heard and taxed for him: therefore confession is not obliging, as it seems.

§ 20. Also, if it obliges to satisfaction: therefore every confession obliges to it. Let us posit therefore, that someone frequently confesses the same sin to several priests, and they enjoin different penances, any one of which by itself would suffice: therefore this person is obliged to perform all of them: therefore from confession he is obliged to a greater penance than he ought to sustain from the sin. And this is incongruous, since confession according to itself diminishes something of the penalty due to sin.

§ 21. Also, whether the enjoined penance is insufficient, or too great: still it seems that he would be obliged to it: and thus confession would burden him, and not alleviate him, which is very incongruous.

§ 22. Also, it is objected concerning what it says, "Enjoined." For it seems from this that that penance cannot be changed by another: and this is false.

§ 23. Also, we see relaxations being made all day long through indulgences concerning enjoined penances: therefore it seems that confessors are not obliged to perform enjoined penances.

But concerning the second definition it is objected, by which older authorities said that "confession is the legitimate explanation of sins."

§ 1. For "legitimate" is what is taught by law, or issued by law: and we do not find the manner of confession expressed in the new or old law: therefore it seems that it is not a legitimate explanation of sins.

§ 2. Also, it seems that it is not only of sins: because he is also bound to confess circumstances sometimes: and thus it seems to be diminished.

§ 3. Also, it does not seem to be an explanation, but a simple narration: for the one confessing does not expound sins, but simply narrates them.

IT IS ALSO OBJECTED concerning that of Gregory concerning what he says, "The uncovering of sins." § 1. For since uncovering a sin is ordered toward the scandal of the neighbor, it seems that sins are not to be uncovered, but rather covered.

§ 2. Also, Isaiah 3:9, those who uncover their sins are blamed, when it says: "They have proclaimed abroad their sin as Sodom, and they have not hid it." Therefore confession will not be an uncovering.

§ 3. Further it is asked concerning what he says, "The breaking open of a wound." For this is a metaphorical locution: therefore it ought not to be posited in the definition of that to which the metaphor is applied: but this is confession: therefore it ought not to be posited in the definition of confession.

§ 4. Also, it is established that the uncovering of a sin and the breaking open of a wound are the same, differing only through significant locution: therefore neither contracts the other: but the uncovering of sin can be done well and badly, and confession only well: therefore the uncovering of sin is related more commonly than confession, and it is contracted: therefore the definition is not convertible with the defined: therefore it is not proper to it: which is incongruous, whether it be a definition, or a description through proper attributes.

FURTHER it is asked concerning that of Augustine: "Confession is that by which a hidden disease is opened in the hope of pardon." § 1. For not only a hidden disease is opened by confession, but also an open disease: because general confession is of all things, whether hidden or open: therefore he says badly, "hidden disease."

§ 2. Also, if it is hidden: then let it be asked, to whom is it hidden? Either to the priest and others: or to the priest alone, or to others alone. And whichever of these is given, there will not be confession concerning a crime open to the priest and others, or to the priest alone, or to others alone: which is incongruous, since confession is of all things.

§ 3. Moreover, it is asked concerning what he says, "In the hope of pardon." Because frequently, confession is made more from the fear of penalty: therefore it ought to have been defined through the fear of penalty.

§ 4. Also, let us grant that this person does not confess in the hope of pardon: and yet conceals nothing of the things he did from the priest: therefore this person will not have confessed, and is bound to iterate the confession, which is not said.

§ 5. Further it is asked concerning what he says, "Is opened." For it seems that it is rather closed: because that which is said in confession, is closed by the seal of confession: therefore it does not open.

FURTHER it is asked concerning the last, which says that "confession is the legitimate narration of sins before a priest."

For it seems that it is not always before a priest, since it is said, James 5:16: "Confess your sins one to another." And there the Gloss says: "Greater ones to greater persons, lesser ones to lesser persons." And it does not say that it ought always to be done to a priest.

And because a great tract on this occurs in the following distinction, let these suffice for now.

Solution. It must be said that the first definition is better than all the others: because it gathers all the essential things, and the proper subject, and the end, and those things whence it draws the power of deleting sin. For the essential things are those which are touched upon when it is said, "Sacramental accusation." For accusation is the genus, and sacramental is the difference distinguishing it from civil and rhetorical accusation. "Of the delinquent," however, contracts it just as the subject specifies a passion: because as the Commentator says on Metaphysics VII: "The proper subject in the definition of a passion is in place of the ultimate difference which is convertible, as the Philosopher says in First Philosophy VII." Those things, however, whence it draws the power of deleting sin, are shame and the keys: while its end is that satisfaction be taxed, which he obliges himself to perform.

To THAT therefore which is first objected concerning what it says, "Sacramental," it must be said that a contracting difference through the mode of quality is in the definition, although it is an essential quality: and because accusation is not properly a sacrament, but its act, therefore it is not an essential quality of a sacrament except informatively and denominatively: and therefore although confession according to itself is a sacrament, nevertheless because it is defined here through an act, and the act is denominated from the sacrament, therefore it is defined denominatively.

Or it can be said that "sacramental," just like "rational," is said in two ways, namely as a difference which makes a sacrament to be a sacrament: and in this way it is not predicated denominatively of the defined, just as neither is "rational" when it is said, "Man is a rational animal": and thus sacramental accusation is said here, which is a certain sacrament, just as a rational animal is a certain animal: and sacramental is not posited as denominating, but rather in the act of a constituting difference. In another way sacramental is said from the power of a sacrament following upon the being of the sacrament itself: and concerning that it is true that it is denominative, just as "rational" is accepted concerning the power of reasoning following upon the being of man: and through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the SECOND, it must be said that a falsehood is supposed in the objection: because an act is sometimes denominated from a virtue: hence it is called a "virtual" act or an act "of virtue": and nevertheless if it is not granted to be done, it must be solved like the preceding.

To the other it must be said that sacramental dipping is called baptism, but not properly "baptismal": because baptism denominates the whole species of the sacrament, and not solely its difference by which it is signable through the mode of quality, but not the species: and thus it is called here "sacramental" and not "penitential"; and through this the solution to the following is evident.

To THAT which is objected concerning what it says, "Of the delinquent," it must be solved that he is called delinquent here according to habit, not according to act: not in such a way that he has the habit of sins, but because he had it, and is in the process of changing it into the habit of virtues: and such a person can well be in the state of penance.

To the other it must be said that it is true that no delinquent in act is a penitent, but a delinquent in the aforesaid way can be a penitent.

To the other it must be said that I well grant that it is not understood of venial fault.

To THAT which is further asked by objecting concerning accusation, it must be said that it is one thing in the forum of penance, and another in the forum of judgment. For in the forum of penance no one, however truthful, is believed against the one confessing, but nevertheless he is believed against himself: and therefore the accusation of the one confessing is stood by. But in the forum of exterior judgment it is totally the contrary: because nothing is believed there to a man for himself, but rather to another who is greater by exception: and therefore in that judgment one is the accuser, and another is the defendant and the accused.

To the other it must be said that when an accusation is made after conviction, no place of defense is given. And it is similar in confession: because the accusation is a testimony convicting the confessor through relation to conscience: and therefore no place of defense is given to him.

To the other it must be said that shame is twofold, namely spiritual, and that which leaves a passion in the body. But spiritual fear is in a base accusation lest it be manifested, or when it is manifested: as can be drawn from the words of Damascene: and that which is spiritual is required for confession, and not that which occurs in the body through exterior blushing: for as was held in the preceding, that varies according to the diverse complexion of men.

To the other it must be said that that proof is good enough: because it is granted that nothing is required except spiritual shame.

To the other it must be said that that Gloss most properly accepts confusion and shame: but here shame is taken commonly for confusion.

To the other it must be said that a passion, according as it is done and informed by the will, even if it is inflicted, is meritorious, as is evident in the preceding question concerning contrition.

To the other it must be said that a confession which is not subjected to the keys actually, is not a confession simply speaking, but in a qualified sense: and I well grant that in the Old Testament there was no confession except in a qualified sense: and the reason for this is evident from the preceding article of the question. But a confession which is made to someone other than a priest, is not a confession except insofar as it supplies the place of confession: just as the baptism of penance [i.e., of John] is not baptism, except insofar as it supplies the place of baptism.

To the OTHER it must be said that there is one mode of satisfaction in confession, and another in that part which is strictly called satisfaction: because in confession there is satisfaction through the death and passion of Christ concerning the part of the penalty which is unproportionable, and therefore inarbitrable: but in satisfaction there is the deletion of the fault by a taxed penalty. Nor is it incongruous that contrition and confession take on the rationale of satisfaction in some way, according as satisfaction is taken broadly: because, as was held above, penance in some way is a totally homogenous whole in its parts: and thus a satisfying penalty is in all three.

To the other it must be said that those middle parts are between diverse and homogenous things: and therefore since they are not entirely diverse, what is objected does not hold. And the reason for this is very easily evident, if one looks at what was noted concerning those parts at the beginning of this distinction.

To the other it must be said that in truth the will of embracing enjoined penance is signified in confession: because just as it presupposes for itself according to reason and time contrition in reality or in the presumption of the priest, so it co-requires the will of obeying in the reception of enjoined satisfaction: and therefore from confession itself, by reason of what it requires in the penitent, he is obliged to it.

To the other it must be said that no penitent and confessor has several proper priests, but one only, and of that one alone is he bound to perform the penance which is enjoined according to the statutes of the canons: because otherwise it is not properly called enjoined satisfaction. If however he confesses out of abundance to others, he ought to inquire about the things enjoined by his proper priest, and superordinate nothing, if it is enjoined according to the statutes of the canons.

To the other the solution is evident through what has already been said: because it is not satisfaction properly, unless it is according to the judgment of the canons or of a canonical priest, and not according to the judgment of a man's will, which someone ignorant or malicious enjoins.

To the other it must be said that an enjoined penance can be changed for a cause by one who has authority: but then he perfects it in an equivalent either simply or according to the reputation of the Church.

Through what has been held the solution to the last is also evident: because indulgences are made in commutations according to an equivalent in the reputation of the Church, or simply.

To that which is objected concerning the second, it must be said that it does not gather anything except the essential things constituting confession.

To that however which is first objected, it must be said that it is called "legitimate" from the law ordering the mode of accusation in the forum of confession: and this law indeed was promulgated universally by God, as was evident above when it was disputed what kind of precept that concerning confession was: but this which was universally said by God, was explained and interpreted by Ecclesiastical Doctors and Prelates, and therefore it is called legitimate both by the old law and the new law and the law of the fathers.

To the other it must be said that a circumstance posits something of a sin: and therefore a sin according to itself is not explained, unless the circumstances are supposed, as will be said below in this same distinction.

To the other it must be said that it is not a simple narration, but it is necessary that the mode be explained, so that the priest may understand the quantity of the crime. But a simple narration does not suffice for this.

To the other however which is objected concerning the third which is of Gregory in the Morals, treating that of Isaiah 38:21: "Isaiah had ordered that they should take a lump of figs, and make a poultice upon the wound," etc.

It must be said that it is not a definition or a description, but rather a certain allegorical adaptation. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the other it must be said that there is an uncovering of a sin as a sin, and an uncovering of that which is a sin. But a sin as a sin is not uncovered except in confession to a priest: just as a disease of nature as a disease is not uncovered except to a physician, or to one who is in the place of a physician in the counsel and aid of medicine. But that which is a sin is sometimes uncovered boastfully: but then it is uncovered as a praiseworthy act, according as it is praiseworthy among those who are glad when they have done evil, and rejoice in most wicked things. And it speaks of them, Proverbs 2:14 et seq.

To the other it must be said as was said before.

To the other it must be said that if the locution is understood through itself, then it is convertible as a proper attribute, but not as a definition: because it seems well to me that Gregory did not intend to define or describe confession.

To THAT which is further asked concerning the fourth, it must be said that it is given in comparison to the moving or inclining factor toward confession: for this is the hope of pardon.

To that however which is objected against it, it must be said that sin is opened and closed in confession: for it is closed from others, but it is opened to him who is in the place of God: and this Augustine here calls "opening."

§ 2. To the other it must be said that even if it is known, yet it is not known through the mode of conviction: just as a judge also does not judge concerning that which he knows as a man, but concerning that which he knows as a judge. Similarly a sin is called "hidden" when a judgment cannot be made concerning it: because it has not been denounced in that forum, namely of confession.

To the other it must be said that fear is not as essential to confession as hope is: for if fear were alone, it would not incline to confession, but rather to silence because of desperation: and therefore confession was not to be defined by fear as much as by hope.

To the other it must be said that if someone confesses without hope, he is not bound to iterate the confession, on account of the fact that the priest knows whatever he did: but he is bound to confess the desperation to the same priest. If however he confesses to another, since he did not receive condign satisfaction, I say that in total with opined hope he is at least bound to make a confession.

To the other the solution is evident through what was said before: because that which is said in confession, is both closed and opened.

To that which is asked concerning the last, it must be said that it is the same as the second, except that it adds the proper listener of confession who is the priest.

To that however which is objected against it, it must be said that in the Gloss mortal sins are called "greater," and venial sins are called "lesser," which we are not bound to confess except in a general confession: and this is not a confession simply speaking, but in a qualified sense.

And thus the solution to all the questions asked is evident.

Articulus 17 — Whether Some Article Of Faith, And Which, Moves One To Confession

Whether some and what article of faith moves to confession?

Sixthly it is asked, What article of faith moves to confession?

But it seems that by reason of the one that is, "Life everlasting": § 1. For hope is concerning everlasting life: because the hope of pardon, as is evident from the definition of Augustine, moves to confession on the part of faith: therefore it seems that the article concerning everlasting life moves to confession on the part of faith.

§ 2. Also, it seems that either that one, or the one concerning punishments moves to confession: but the fear of punishment is not praiseworthy, because Augustine says concerning such fear, that no one does well unwillingly, even if what he does is good. Therefore since confession is concerning praiseworthy things, it seems that the faith of everlasting life moves to it more than [the faith] of everlasting punishments.

But against both of these it seems to be objected: for the passion of Christ operates in the keys, and through the keys confession is satisfactory: therefore it seems that faith mo-move [one] to confession by reason of Christ's passion.

It seems, however, that [it does so] by reason of that [article]: Who is to come to judge the living and the dead: because the one confessing anticipates this judgment upon himself, and discloses his sins lest they be disclosed to all in the judgment: therefore, if faith moves [one] to confession, it seems that it does this by reason of that article which is about the judgment.

Solution. It must be said to this, that faith chiefly moves to confession by reason of the article which is about eternal life: because, in the hope of pardon on account of eternal life, one confesses whatever one confesses.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the passion gives efficacy to confession, and faith illuminates to this [end], that such an effect is believed to be in the keys: but nevertheless it does not move to confessing by reason of that [passion]: because the one confessing does not confess on account of this, but rather because he hopes that on account of this he will obtain the pardon of his sins.

To the other, it must be said that that article can help: but nevertheless it is not principal in moving: because he would not obtain pardon from this, since this is more an inducement of fear than of love.

Articulus 18 — Upon Which Attribute In God Confession Rests

On which attribute in God does confession rely?

Seventhly and lastly it is asked: On which attribute in God does confession rely?

It seems, however, that § 1. [It relies] on wisdom and truth: because created truth is exemplated and caused by uncreated truth: but created truth is in confession: therefore it is caused by uncreated wisdom and truth: therefore it relies most on them.

§ 2. Also, confession is said [by rule] that it ought to be prudent: and it is established that all prudence goes forth in an exemplary manner from wisdom: therefore also confession.

To the contrary: Confession is made in the hope of pardon: therefore it entirely relies on mercy and goodness.

Reply. To this it must be said that, in truth, penance in its three parts is configured to the uncreated Trinity: for compunction or contrition, which by a small penalty exchanges eternal torments, entirely relies on goodness, which is attributed to the Holy Spirit. But confession, which is a legitimate and prudent computation of sins so that it may be appraised for penance, corresponds to wisdom, which is attributed to the Son: and satisfaction, which embraces enjoined things according to [one's] powers, is supported by power, which is appropriated to the Father.

Therefore, let the first two arguments be conceded, although they are not very valid for proving this.

But to the other let it be said that, although the motive for confession relies on mercy, nevertheless the confession itself, having been made, is rather compared to wisdom on account of the said cause: for it is not true that if the motive for it corresponds to goodness, it also corresponds to it in itself. And there is an instance [counter-example]: because the hope of building up the Church relies on goodness and charity: and yet the study and teaching to which that hope inclines are exemplated by divine wisdom.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Institution Made Through John Suffices For Satisfaction

Whether the institution made by John suffices for satisfaction.

Next it is asked concerning what he [the Master] says there, [Dist. 16] cap. 1, after the beginning: Satisfaction is commanded by John, where he says: Bring forth worthy fruits of penance, etc.

And we will ask three things here, because many things have been held about satisfaction before, and again will be held afterwards. The first of these is, Whether the institution made by John suffices for satisfaction? The second is, Whether satisfaction is under a precept, or not? The third is, What are the worthy fruits of penance? and, Whether to make satisfaction and to bring forth worthy fruits of penance are the same thing?

It seems concerning the first, that it does not suffice: because § 1. Satisfaction is a part of the sacrament of penance: but in this sacrament a divine institution is required: therefore also in satisfaction.

§ 2. Also, the effect of grace is only from God, as Bernard says on the Canticles therefore also the vessel necessarily containing grace, provided he who approaches is not unrepentant [fictus]: therefore to determine that [vessel/satisfaction] belongs only to God. It is established, however, that sacramental satisfaction is also a part of the sacrament: therefore it seems that the institution of John does not suffice.

§ 3. But it is objected differently to the same point: For satisfaction was always necessary for one actually sinning: therefore even before John: therefore it is not commanded [for the first time] by John, as it seems, but it was under precept before him.

§ 4. Also, satisfaction corresponds either to a sin of nature, or to a sin of the person. It is established, however, that [it does] not [correspond] to a sin of nature: because a mere man cannot make satisfaction for that, as Anselm proves in the book Cur Deus homo. If it corresponds to a sin of the person: therefore it obligates the person in himself, in whatever state, to make satisfaction for his sin: therefore it seems that it is not commanded by John then for the first time when the faith of the New Testament began to be preached.

§ 5. Also, satisfaction is of natural law: therefore opinion did not beget it, but an innate force implanted it: therefore it is not instituted by John, as it seems.

Reply. In satisfaction three things are to be considered, namely, for what satisfaction is made, and what the state of the one satisfying is, and to whom satisfaction is made. That for which satisfaction is made has always been, from the time sin began to enter the world, and there was no diversity in it except in the quantity of sins. But the state of the one satisfying was not always the same: and since the mode of satisfying corresponds to that state by congruence, it was not the same [always]: for since all our satisfaction draws its force from the satisfaction of Christ, as Ambrose says and because all our penance draws its force from His penalty and satisfaction, therefore for those future penalties [or penances] which were not yet except in the faith of those making satisfaction, a mode foreshadowing that penalty and satisfaction was congruent: as in the law of nature through sacrifices and figures, and also in the law of Moses through ceremonies. But in the new law which begins from John, as it is said, Luke 16:16: The law and the prophets were until John. And, Matt. 11:12: But from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent bear it away, a congruent mode is satisfaction through the imitation of Christ, because from then the foreshadowing of the future ceased, and the form of truth which we should imitate was manifested. But He to whom satisfaction is made is God, always holding Himself in one way.

These things having been noted beforehand, it is not difficult to answer the objections.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the mode of satisfaction is proclaimed in one way, and instituted in another: by John it was only proclaimed, but by Christ it was instituted, when it is said: Do penance .

To the next it must be said that, according as satisfaction is sacramental and has its force from the passion of Christ, it has its institution from God: but it is not necessary that it be by a different institution [from the sacrament as a whole]: because the whole and the parts are instituted by one institution: hence it has its institution in its whole, which is penance. Some, however, say that He instituted it there, where He told the leper that he should offer for his cleansing what Moses instituted: but this is not true, except concerning a figurative institution.

To the next it must be said that satisfaction in itself, abstracting from this mode and from that, always was, even before John: but inasmuch as it is considered as accepted with a mode of signification or imitation of the truth, it was not always: and as to this mode it is promulgated by John, and confirmed by Christ, as the Master says in the Text.

To the next it must be said that that objection only concludes that it was always necessary to make satisfaction on the part of the one satisfying, and on the part of Him to whom satisfaction is made: and this indeed seems to be conceded, because it does not vary except in mode, as was said, because they could not look back to Christ making satisfaction, from whom our satisfaction draws its force, except by foreshadowing it in signs. But those who were from the days of John could not look back to Him except by imitating the form of truth which was manifested in Him.

To the next it must be said that satisfaction in itself is of natural law, which opinion did not beget, but an innate force implanted: but the mode of satisfying which has been spoken of, is entirely sacramental and divine, and therefore it has varied according to the times of the diverse sacraments.

Articulus 20 — Whether Satisfaction Is Of Precept

Is satisfaction under precept?

Secondly it is asked, Is it under precept?

But it seems that it is not: because § 1. Jerome says: Let him be anathema who says that God has commanded anything impossible: but it is impossible to make satisfaction: therefore satisfaction is not under precept. The proof of the middle [premise]. An offense grows according to the one against whom it is sinned: but God is infinite in all His attributes: therefore an offense against Him is infinite: therefore it does not happen that one makes satisfaction for any sin, because we can repay nothing for an infinite [offense].

§ 2. Also, the Philosopher says in the fifth book of the Ethics, that one striking a prince does not suffer back [only] as much, but is condemned to death: therefore much more if he offends someone infinitely greater than any prince is: but God is infinitely greater: therefore one offending God ought to pay back infinitely more: but it does not happen that one can pay this: therefore he is not commanded to pay, because he would be commanded in vain.

§ 3. Also, the very name of satisfaction seems to show this: because to make satisfaction [satisfacere] is said to do enough [facere satis]: but it is never enough, unless it is according to the estimation of the sin and the offense: but this is infinite, as has already been proved: therefore there is no satisfaction unless one pays infinitely: but it does not happen that one pays this: therefore it seems that it ought not to be commanded.

§ 4. Also, this same thing is proved by another way: For let us suppose that someone is a debtor to someone else for several reasons, namely that he owes him by right of servitude, which is such that he possesses nothing except by the title of his lord, and is bodily a serf of the soil, and then he is bound to him from a loan: because he has nothing, except what he has received as a loan from him: and he has not received more as a loan, than he has in those very goods: and again, thirdly, he owes him from an offense, because he has offended him most grievously concerning the lord's property: it is established that he cannot make satisfaction. Because if you say that he will make satisfaction from his own goods: against this is the fact that those belong to the lord. If from his person: against this is the fact that he is a servant in his person, and owes his whole self to the lord even beyond the reason of the offense. But it is established that a similar case exists in man in comparison to God: therefore it seems that man cannot make satisfaction to God for sin: therefore it is not commanded to him.

Besides. If it is commanded, let it be asked, where is it commanded, in the New or in the Old Testament?

If it is said that [it is commanded] there, Do penance . To the contrary: To repent is not to make satisfaction: because someone repents of that concerning which, nevertheless, he never thinks of making satisfaction.

If you say that [it is commanded] there where the Lord commanded the leper to offer for his cleansing what Moses instituted . To the contrary: What Moses instituted did not correspond to the quantity of the sin: therefore it was not satisfactory.

If you say that it is commanded by John, Matt. 3:8, where it is said: Bring forth fruit worthy of penance, etc., as the Master seems to say in the Text. To the contrary: Worthy fruits of penance are in the same impossibility in which satisfaction is: therefore it does not happen that one produces them: therefore it is not commanded.

If you say that it is found in Matt. 12:36, where it is said: But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall render an account for it in the day of judgment. To the contrary: As has been held, it does not happen that one renders an account of the infinite: and mortal sin is an infinite offense: it does not happen that one renders an account of it.

But to the contrary: § 1. Of whatever debt it happens that one can pay as much and tenfold, of that it happens that there is a sufficient payment: but of sin it happens that one pays as much and tenfold: therefore of sin it happens that there is a sufficient payment: therefore satisfaction can be commanded, and ought to be commanded. The proof of the middle [premise]. Baruch 4:28: For as it was your mind to go astray from God; so when you return again you shall seek him ten times as much.

§ 2. Also, Matt. 18:24 and 26: One was brought to him, that owed him ten thousand talents... But that servant falling down, besought him, saying: Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. Therefore it happens that one pays: therefore also to make satisfaction.

Solution. It must be said that, although some place great force here, nevertheless in truth there is little force in the question: and from what has been held in the preceding [distinction], it is easily determinable, by distinguishing that the mode of satisfaction is twofold, namely according to the estimation of the offense, and according to the will and judgment of him to whom satisfaction is made: and in the first way it does not happen that one makes satisfaction, nor is it commanded: but in the second, as it is said, Micah 6:8: I will shew thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requireth of thee. As if he were to say: Not what is just [in strict estimation], but what He requires, which suffices for Him. And this is confirmed by what is held, Luke 7:41 and 42: A certain creditor had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And whereas they had not wherewith to pay, he forgave them both. And, Matt. 18:27, where it is said that the lord of that servant, being moved with pity, let him go and forgave him the debt.

To all therefore that were introduced afterwards, the solution is clear: because they prove nothing except that it does not happen that one makes satisfaction according to the estimation of the perpetrated sin:

and this indeed is true: and on account of this, it is entirely of grace what we are, as it is said, I Cor. 15:10: By the grace of God I am what I am.

To that, however, which is asked, Where is it commanded? It must be said that [it is commanded] in many places: nevertheless, according as it is a sacramental mode of satisfaction, as the Master says here, I say that it is promulgated by John, and is confirmed by a precept by Christ, Matt. 4:17, where Jesus preaching says: Do penance, etc.

To this, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that to repent is said in two ways, or even three ways. For in one way, repentance for a perpetrated act is a sign of the involuntary through ignorance, which merits mercy and pardon, as is said in the third book of the Ethics. In a second way, repentance of some perpetrated act is not satisfying on account of the injury, when he does not wish to make satisfaction to the injured party, or on account of despair, as Judas repented. In a third way, penance is the affliction of oneself with the purpose of confessing and making satisfaction for the evil committed. And this alone is penance as a sacrament and a virtue: and Christ commanded this, because this alone finds the fruit of salvation: and in that is commanded all that is required for it, namely confession and satisfaction. Yet it could be said that it is commanded in Luke 13:24, where it is said: Strive to enter by the narrow gate, etc., and Matt. 25:19, where it says that he reckoned an account with his servants, who had received his goods.

To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does not happen that one pays the tenfold of sin intensively, but as it were extensively through discretion or distinction, because [one observes it] in the obedience of the ten commandments: and this is the sense of Baruch.

To the other it must be said that that servant did not intend that he would pay according to the estimation of the damage inflicted, but rather according to the estimation of the mercy of the one demanding the debt: and therefore he premised, saying: Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 21 — Whether To Satisfy Is The Same As To Make Worthy Fruits Of Penance, And What The Fruits Worthy Of Penance Are

Is making satisfaction and bringing forth worthy fruits of penance the same? And what are worthy fruits of penance?

Thirdly it is asked, What are the worthy fruits of penance? And, is it the same to make satisfaction as to bring forth worthy fruits of penance?

The Author [Peter Lombard] says in the Text, and it is in the Gloss on Matt. 3:8, that worthy fruits of penance are such that, according to the quality and quantity of the fault, there is the quality and quantity of the penalty.

But it seems that this cannot be: § 1. For either this quality is understood of the lust delighting in the sin, or the quality of the act of sin. If in the first way. To the contrary: Sensible delight is what is in sin: but it is never sensible in virtue and in works of mercy: therefore there is no likeness in quality. If in the second way. To the contrary: Those acts are contraries: therefore they do not have likeness in quality, because the Philosopher says in the fifth book of First Philosophy [Metaphysics V], that things are alike whose quality is one.

§ 2. Also, it seems impossible that the quality of the penalty should be according to the quality of the sin, in this way: because the quality of the fault cannot be except according to the act, because the fault, insofar as it is an evil, is nothing: but in the act there is no quality except according to the relation to the agent: but this is either according to lust, or according to contempt: but according to lust there cannot be the quality of the penalty, because a penalty is bitter to the sense, and lust is sweet: but according to contempt it is also related through an opposite: because just as the one sinning contemns God and His precept, so by the opposite the penitent in the penalty subjects himself to God and His precept: therefore it seems that the penalty of the penitent and the fault of the transgressor are never according to the same quality.

§ 3. If perhaps you say that it is called a likeness in genus, through the contrary, namely that just as the fault pleased in delighting, so the penalty may please in enduring: this does not fit the Text: because this is equally so in one sinning little and [one sinning] much: but that likeness of quality is not equally in one sinning little and much: therefore a likeness in genus is not denoted, as it seems.

Further it is asked concerning what he says, That according to the quantity of the fault is the quantity of the penalty.

For either the equality is in genus, or in species. If in genus. To the contrary: According to this it is equally in one sinning little: because to a great fault a great penalty is owed, and to a lesser a lesser: but worthy fruits are not equally in one sinning little and much, as is said in the Text: therefore it is not understood of quantity in genus. But if it is understood of quantity in species. To the contrary: The quantity of the fault is infinite, and the quantity of the penalty finite: therefore it seems that it never happens that one makes satisfaction through worthy fruits of penance.

Besides it is asked, What is the difference here between quality and quantity?

For it is established that there is not continuous quantity here per se, but per accidens: but this seems to be the intensity of the quality, which makes the vigor of the sin and a great sin, and the vigor of the penalty and a great penalty; but the likeness or proportion in quality seems to be regarding the same thing: therefore here quality and quantity come back to the same thing.

Besides it is asked, Why are they called worthy fruits of penance, since they are not fruits except in the future?

Moreover, these works when done are rather assimilated to cultivation or labor ordained toward perceiving fruits: as James also says: Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit, namely the fruit of his labor .

Reply. As was also held above in the preceding distinction, fruit is not taken here properly, but is taken for the cause of the fruit, which is the cause of fruition in the future. For the works of penance are called fruits, not that we enjoy them properly here, or in the future: but because with the joy of hope we use them to obtain that which is to be enjoyed. Nor is it the same to be good fruits, and worthy fruits of penance: because every tree, that is, man, is bound to good fruits, and worthy fruits: which are called good from the root, which is good when free will is informed by virtue and grace. But worthy fruits are from the proportion of the fruit to the state of the fructifying tree: because it is one thing for a cleric, another for a prelate, another for a subject, and so according to the other differences of those bearing fruit. And in this way, by having a proportion to a special state with regard to the works of penance, they are called worthy fruits, when according to the quality and quantity of the sin there is also the quality and quantity of the penalty.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the quality of the one sinning is considered here together with the quality of the sin. The quality of the one sinning is the free servitude of sin: because, namely, not coerced, nor exacted, but freely he served the devil in joy: and in this way let him freely and with joy serve God in penance. But the quality of the sin according to the form of the sin in species, according as one is carnal, and another spiritual, and another as it were a medium, like anger, and avarice: and thus it ought to be in bodily and spiritual and medium penalty: just as fasting is a penalty of the body, prayer humbles the spirit, and almsgiving inflicts a loss of exterior things.

To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does not correspond in the species of the delight: but rather in the likeness of the subject of the delight, and of the penalty, namely because each is bodily, and sometimes spiritual, and medium, as has been said.

To the other it must be said that likeness can be considered in two ways, namely in the proximate affect, and in the affect which is the cause of the proximate affect: and in the proximate indeed there cannot be a likeness: because one is lust, and the other is charity: but in the remote, that is, in the will, there can well be a likeness: and it is even more in the good, because Augustine says that charity infinitely more loves God, than cupidity loves gold.

To that which is asked about quantity, it must be said that quantity here is twofold, namely intensive, and discrete. The one corresponds to the magnitude, and the other to the numerousness of the sins: but that which is intensive, is considered from many things, yet the principal is the species of the sin or the genus: just as we say that in genus homicide is greater than adultery, and adultery than fornication, and in genus avarice is greater than fornication: but in species adultery is greater than theft. The other quantity, however, is from the circumstances of the agent and of the act, from which it is called a great sin, and to that a greater penalty is owed than to a lesser: just as to one sinning many times either in one genus of sin, or in two, more penalties, or one more enduring, is owed.

To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in genus it is called quantity, as has been said: and what it infers does not follow: because sins even in genus are not equal, but one is greater, and another lesser: and therefore also the penalties will be unequal.

To the other it must be said that quantity and quality are founded in the same thing, but are not the same thing, as is clear from what has been said: because quality is a vice from that part by which it is drawn into a distinct species, as carnal, spiritual, and the like: or more specially still, like fornication, the delight according to the act in fornication: and gluttony, the delight according to the act in gluttony: but quantity is taken from the quantity to the whole.

Articulus 22 — Whether Circumstances Aggravate Sin

Do circumstances aggravate sin?

Next it is asked concerning the words of Augustine which are had, there, [Dist. 16] cap. 1, in the middle: Let him consider the quality of the crime, in the place, etc.

But six things are asked here for the understanding of that place.

First, do those things which he mentions aggravate a sin? Second, do they aggravate by leaving the act in the same species, or by conferring a new species of sin? Third, is the penitent bound to confess all those things exactly as they were in the individual acts? Fourth, is he bound to turn them over [in his mind] in contrition and satisfaction? Fifth, what and how many are those circumstances? Sixth and lastly, what is the comparison among them, namely whether some aggravate more, and others less, or do all aggravate equally?

To the first of these it is objected thus: § 1. From whatever things an argument for the accusation of a defendant or for defense in judgment is drawn, those things aggravate or excuse the act on account of which the defendant is called to judgment:

but from circumstances arguments of this kind are drawn: therefore circumstances aggravate or excuse the act of the defendant on account of which he is judged: but that act is a sin: therefore circumstances aggravate a sin. The first premise is evident per se. The second is written by Cicero in the first book of the Rhetoric, where he says that circumstances are those from which arguments for the accusation or defense of a person in judgment are drawn.

§ 2. Also, whatever things are the constitutive particles in which an act consists, give to the act the form of evil or good, and of greater evil and greater good: circumstances are of this kind: therefore they give to the act the form of good or evil, etc. The first of these again is evident per se. The second is written by Damascene thus: The individual things which are called constitutive particles by the rhetorician: for instance, who is it that did it, who is it that suffered, what did he do, with what, namely with what organ, where, namely in what place, and the like.

§ 3. Also, whatever things make a rhetorical question about the praise or blame of a person, increase the good and the evil in the act of the person: but circumstances are such: therefore they increase the good and the evil in the act of the person. The first premise is evident per se. But the second is written by Boethius in book IV of his Topics, where he says that circumstances are what make a rhetorical question about the praise or blame of a person.

§ 4. Also, Ecclesiastes 3:4: All things have their time. Therefore in their own time they are better: therefore their contraries in that time are worse: therefore time aggravates. And the same argument applies to the others.

§ 5. Also, Bernard to Eugenius: In the mouth of a secular, trifles are trifles: but in the mouth of a priest, trifles are a sacrilege [556]. Therefore the circumstance of person aggravates. It is similar with the others.

§ 6. Also, Ezekiel 8, passim, is much aggravated against the Jews, because they had placed idols in the temple, so much so that then the glory of the Lord is written to recede from its place: and this is not written when they worshipped them elsewhere than in the temple: therefore place also aggravates.

§ 7. Also, Isaiah 57:8: Thou hast uncovered thyself near me, and hast received an adulterer. As if he were to say: Elsewhere it would have been more tolerable. Therefore it seems that similarly all the other circumstances aggravate.

But to the contrary: § 1. Augustine says in the second book of On Free Will, that evil is nothing but an aversion from immutable good: it is established, however, that a privation is not intensified except through a recession from a habit [or state]: therefore it is not a greater evil except because it recedes more: therefore not from circumstances: but circumstances do not aggravate, except by making a greater evil: therefore it seems that circumstances do not aggravate.

§ 2. Also, it is established that a mutable good is a good: but a conversion to a good is not except in a good: therefore a conversion to a mutable good is a good. It is established, however, that all those circumstances surround the act from that part by which a conversion to a mutable good occurs: therefore none of them creates a majority in the act, or increases it, as it seems: therefore none aggravates a sin.

§ 3. Also, it is established that malice in an act is a defect: therefore it is not caused or increased by something positively, but rather defectively, namely because something is lacking there of those things which ought to make or increase the good: since therefore circumstances positively cause what they cause, such as place, time, and the like, it seems that none of them either makes an evil, or increases it.

§ 4. Also, as has been said, malice in an act is a defect: if therefore it is caused by circumstances, it is established that multiple and different causes leave multiple and different effects: but in the act of sin there are multiple and different circumstances: therefore they leave multiple and different malices: therefore any sin would be made as many [times evil as there are circumstances].

sins, as it has circumstances, which is absurd to say.

§ 5. Again, it seems that evil cannot be aggravated: for nothing is made heavier, unless it receives intension or remission. No privation receives intension or remission: therefore it is not intended. The first is self-evident. The second is proved thus: That which is nothing, is not more nothing now than before: but privation is nothing: therefore the proposition stands: therefore circumstances do not aggravate it, as it seems.

Solution. To this it must be said without any doubt that circumstances aggravate a sin: for although they do not produce good in an act either of grace or of political virtue, nevertheless they produce and increase evil in an act: and they also produce legal civil good which the judge considers, who does not judge about habit, but about act. For that they do not produce the good of grace is doubtful to no one who is not of the heresy of Pelagius: because that good, both in habit and in act, is from God alone. That again they do not produce the good of political virtue, is necessarily evident from what is held in the second book of the Ethics,[557] where it is said that they are not just and chaste who do just and chaste things, but those who, as just and chaste, do just and chaste things: who nevertheless consider the circumstances in which the act is. But that they produce evil is clear, because the Philosopher and Blessed Dionysius hold that evil is caused by all particular defects, whether in the circumstances of the act, or in habits.

And thus the three things that were premised in order stand firm.

It must therefore be said to the first, that in evil there are two things, namely that it is evil, and that it is a vice. And the whole ratio of evil is a receding from the good. But because the good perfects nature, and when perfection is removed it is necessary that what was perfect be corrupted, therefore consequently, as if in relation to the subject of evil, vice occurs, which is the corruption of the good of nature and of natural things. And this is what Augustine says, that evil is because it harms: and it harms because it takes away the good: for unless the good were taken away, it would not vitiate, nor corrupt. And therefore the corruption of circumstances necessarily follows the aversion from the good. I mean aversion from the good in act: because we are speaking of that; and in this way evil is aggravated from corrupted circumstances, as will be more evident in the solution below.

To the next it must be said that in truth conversion to a mutable good, insofar as it is such, is not evil, as Augustine proves. But such a conversion that concieves an aversion by reason of a defect of mode and harmony due to that conversion, is evil: for example, a conversion as if to the end of a mutable good. For since there cannot be two ends, it is necessary that aversion is conceived in such a conversion, and a defect of due mode and harmony or commensuration necessarily falls into such a conversion. For the due mode of this conversion is that the conversion be made in relation to the end to which that good is ordered: and that mode is lacking. And harmony is that concerning God, as the left hand may be under the head, and the right hand may embrace: and this again is lacking. And from this defect the conversion is evil, and not from the fact that it is to a mutable good. But since that conversion is conceived with such a defect which is evil, in this way circumstances surround it, and not insofar as it is a conversion alone: and therefore they aggravate the evil itself.

To the next it must be said that from no position is evil caused or increased through itself, but by accident: as Dionysius also says, that evil is repugnant to the good. But I say through another: because they increase such a conversion that is to a conceived good with evil, through the good in which it is; and necessarily from this a fouler defect occurs from the fact that a mode is deprived in place, or time, or person, or something else, which is a circumstance of the person or of the business of his act.

556. Bernard of Clairvaux, De Consideratione, lib. II, cap. 13.

To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if there are multiple circumstances in an act, that they make multiple sins or evils; but rather, that from the defects of multiple circumstances in mode and harmony, multiple deformities will be caused in one act: and I plainly concede this. The ancients called such a sin a single multiple sin, or double, or triple, or in some other number of deformities.

To the next it must be said that privation is not intended essentially, because it is not any essence: but it is intended by recession from a habit. And thus one evil is worse than another, because it is elongated from the good by more things or to a greater degree. That it is so, Aristotle says in book IV of the First Philosophy [i.e., Metaphysics] speaking against Heraclitus: [558] for thus he contends that there is a falser than the false. Just as he who says five is a thousand lies more than he who says five is six. Then it would be necessary to concede one thing to be true, by recession from which something is said to be false and falser.

However, against this solution it can be objected what Anselm says, namely that blindness is not more a something in a stone, than in a non-seeing man, nor conversely. But it is certain that in a stone it recedes more (because it is not born to have it) than in a man who is born to have sight: therefore it seems that a greater or lesser recession does not cause intension and remission in evil.

And to this it must be said that privation is considered in two ways, namely in itself, and in comparison to its cause which it has by accident. In the first way it is neither intended nor remitted. But in the second way it is intended and remitted. Now the cause by accident of a privation is that which, when it is, a privation necessarily coincides. And we see this in bodily things: just as if someone is dividing the veins that are called varicose, or the tibia, limping in gait necessarily coincides. Thus if such a conversion is to a mutable good, a defect of mode and harmony necessarily coincides, both in things circumstancing the act, and in the act itself, as was said before. And the more of such things there are, the more deformities coincide.

Articulus 23 — Whether Circumstances Aggravate While Leaving The Act In The Same Species

Do circumstances aggravate while leaving the act in the same species?

Secondly, it is asked whether they aggravate by leaving the act in the same species, or by conferring a new species of sin?

It seems that they confer no new species: § 1. For it is certain that a privation is not specified except by its subject and the habit of which it is the privation. But all circumstances are of the same habit and subject. Therefore, all of them confer only one species.

557. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, II.4 (1105b5-9).

§ 2. Again, the good is more powerful than the evil. And the good from all its circumstances confers only one species: therefore neither does the evil from its circumstances confer anything but one species.

§ 3. Again, intension and remission do not vary the species. But a circumstance does nothing but intend evil or good in an act: therefore it does not vary the species, but leaves it the same.

§ 4. Again, that which is extrinsic to an essence, as it is extrinsic, confers no species. But place and time and the like are extrinsic. Therefore they confer no species: therefore neither do other circumstances, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, accidents do not vary the species. Circumstances are accidents of an act: therefore they do not vary its species.

The second is proved from the fact that the circumstances of place, time, person, and assistance, and of all others, of diverse actions of the same species, are diverse and the same; and yet the actions are not thereby varied in species.

But against this: § 1. Dionysius says that evil is caused in every way: therefore from the corruption of any of the circumstances: therefore the corruption of any circumstance causes a singular species of evil.

§ 2. Again, circumstances confer a different being upon the act. But it is certain that it is not a being of nature: therefore it is a being of morality. Therefore, they confer a species according to the being of morality. Therefore, when some corruption of a special circumstance is added, there will be a new being of morality: therefore also a new species of sin, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, it is certain that an act of intercourse with a woman is one in species in nature and in the species of nature. But I see that to have intercourse with an unmarried woman makes one species of sin, and to have intercourse with a married woman another, and again another with a blood relative, another with a veiled nun. And those acts do not differ except by circumstances, as it seems. Therefore a circumstance aggravates by conferring another species to the act.

§ 4. Again, to steal is a certain simple sin: but to steal a sacred thing, or from a sacred place, is sacrilege. Since therefore stealing here and there does not differ except by circumstance, it seems that a circumstance aggravates outside the genus, conferring another species to the act, because conferring another species to the act is called aggravating outside the genus.

Solution. It must be said that no circumstance properly aggravates by conferring another species. For the substantial being of a moral act according to species is from the end of the will: for as the Philosopher says, Acts are defined by their opposites, that is, their objects: and this is understood of objects which are ends. For although that same thing is the matter about which the act is, nevertheless because the act which is about that object is not of a potency unless formed by the species of the object, therefore the act itself receives its being from the nature of the subject insofar as it is moving in the intention of the end for the sake of which the act is. This is evident from the very naming of sins: Fornication is pleasure according to an act in a fornicator, and adultery in an adulteress or a married woman, and avarice in money, and other such things. But circumstances are those conferring well-being or ill-being by way of a passion to the act itself, whether they are circumstances of the person or of the business. And therefore none confers a species properly speaking, nor varies it.

Therefore it must be said to the first that Dionysius does not understand this of the corruption of circumstances or omission: because it may well happen that a good is less praiseworthy when it is not in its proper time or place. But nevertheless from this it is not made an evil through itself, or a species of vice, or of a mortal sin. But Dionysius understands this, like the Philosopher, with respect to the matter around which virtue is. It is around three things, namely choosable things toward an operation, the operation itself, and passions. Thus prudence is around choosable things toward an operation operable by us, as the Philosopher says in the sixth book of the Ethics; justice is around operations, as he says in the fifth; and temperance and fortitude around passions, as is taught in the third. Since therefore virtue is around so many things, it is always substantially a mean in that around which it is, although differently: but vice is not a mean, but an extreme. And because it happens in every way to decline from the mean in whatever matter, and to not be in the mean except in one way, therefore he says that virtue is from one whole and single cause, and vice in every way: because the mean is corrupted by any declination to an extreme. Yet that it is a mean, it does not have from circumstances: but rather circumstances are caused by that which is substantially a mean, and therefore they do not confer another being.

To the next it must be said that circumstances do not confer first being, nor second being, but they do confer accidental being, but rather of an accident per se. And because from that which is frequently, is drawn a rhetorical question, therefore they make a rhetorical question, and praise or blame: and this is the being of morality. The first being an act has from the species of the object around which it is: which species, I say, is the end of the one operating.

To the next it must be said that intercourse is compared to a potency in two ways, namely to the generative potency which is natural: and thus, with whoever it may be, it is of one species, because it is an act of the generative potency shedding seed for the salvation of the species. It is also compared to a potency ordainable by reason: and this is informed by many species of diverse subjects, such as delectability in a fornicator, or in a married woman, or in a male, or in a blood relative. And according to this it confers a new being to its act: and thus that act is diversified in the species of morality as to the first being of a moral act.

And if you object that this does not seem to be a solution, because he does not delight in a married woman or a blood relative as a blood relative, but in a woman as she is a woman.

It must be said that this is false: because if he delighted in a woman as she is a woman, he would delight in every woman, which is false. Whence, although he would wish her not to be a blood relative or married, yet the will is of delighting in this one whom he knows to be married or a blood relative: and therefore consequently there is a will of delighting in a married woman or a blood relative. Because otherwise no sin will be voluntary, there would never be a will for evil, and we would not be the cause of evil through the will: all of which are against the Saints, and excellently disproved in the third book of the Ethics.

To the next it must be said that to steal from a sacred place, or sacred things, has a will which is of stealing from a sacred place, or sacred things, in the same way as was said of the will of lying with a married woman. And thus that moving species makes another sin: because there is not a circumstance only there, but an end and form giving species and being to the act.

Articulus 24 — Whether The Penitent Is Bound To Confess All His Sins And The Circumstances

Is a penitent bound to confess all his sins, and their circumstances?

Thirdly, it is asked whether a penitent is bound to confess all these things, as they are in individual acts?

It seems that he is: § 1. For divine judgment is more strict than human judgment. But in human judgment one is accused from individual circumstances: therefore from individual circumstances one ought to be accused in divine judgment. And he himself is his own accuser in confession as if in divine judgment: therefore he is bound to accuse himself.

§ 2. Again, the quantity of evil and foulness ought to become known to the priest in confession: but it cannot become known unless all aggravating things become known. Therefore the one confessing is bound to narrate them. But all circumstances aggravate or alleviate: therefore he is bound to narrate all of them.

§ 3. Again, in the Letter this seems to be said expressly by Augustine here: therefore it seems that he is bound to confess all of them.

§ 4. Again, in Genesis 19:17, Lot is commanded to depart from Sodom: and it is added that he should not stay in all the surrounding region. Now it is commonly expounded that Sodom signifies sin, and the surrounding region the occasions and circumstances of sin. Since therefore penance is the way of going out through confession, it seems that he ought to go out from circumstances through confession by confessing them.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The Canon says that nothing ought to be confessed except sin: therefore circumstances do not need to be confessed.

§ 2. Again, in Psalm 31:5: I said, I will confess my injustice against myself: it does not say, the circumstances of the sin.

§ 3. Again, just as there are circumstances aggravating a sin, so there are alleviating ones. If therefore circumstances ought to be confessed so that the quantity of the sin may be known, then alleviating ones ought to be confessed just as aggravating ones, which is false: therefore aggravating ones alone do not need to be confessed either.

§ 4. Again, it is one thing in the judgment of men, and another in divine judgment. For in the judgment of men circumstances are not sought except so that a presumption may be formed by the judge: which is not necessary in the divine judgment, since the witness is the conscience before him who is in the place of God, namely the priest. Since therefore the conscience suffices to convict the one confessing, it seems that it is not necessary to say the circumstances in confession.

I RESPOND, without prejudice, according to the ancient Doctors, that it is not necessary to confess circumstances, unless they draw the sin into another genus. Nevertheless it is safe to also say the others, especially if someone's conscience bites him. But still they say that he is not bound from a precept. Whence to say circumstances which do not draw into another genus of sin, is for the well-being of confession. Now the utility that is from this, is that which they say, namely that as was held above, confession through shame satisfies some part of the penalty: and it often happens that a man is more ashamed of a circumstance than of the sin: and therefore it is good to confess it. There is also another utility: because the priest better knows the deformity of the sin, and will better know how to tax the penance and satisfaction. A third again, the greater humility of the penitent.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that if in human judgment mention is made of circumstances, this is not for the sake of distinction, but rather because of the doubt of the judge who does not know the truth: and a presumption about the quantity of malice cannot be made for him, except from circumstances. But out of confession by accusing himself the penitent manifests his whole self, and therefore it is not necessary to say certain circumstances.

To the next it must be said that, as was said above, the substantial quantity of evil and foulness is not from circumstances, but rather from the aversion from the incommutable good. But a certain foulness is from circumstances: and because it is accidental, it does not have its own proper penance, but rather one conjoined with penance: and therefore it does not need to be singularly and discretely confessed.

To the next it must be said that Augustine says these things not by commanding, but toward well-being. Nor does he say they are to be done in confession, but rather in contrition between himself and God.

To the next it must be said that the exit from sin is in contrition: and this is good enough, that one does not remain in circumstances. But nevertheless it is a consequence that whoever exits from sin, exits from circumstances: but not conversely. And therefore that does not touch upon it, except that it may be for the well-being of confession.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Penitent Is Bound To Consider The Circumstances In Contrition And Satisfaction

Is a penitent bound to revolve circumstances in contrition and satisfaction?

Fourthly, it is asked whether the penitent ought to revolve them in contrition and satisfaction?

It seems that he ought, because: § 1. Augustine says in the Letter: Let him consider the quality of the crime, in place, and time, in perseverance, in variety of person, etc. And below: Let him dwell on each of these, and feel the mode of the crime, purging with tears every quality of the vice. Therefore it seems that he ought to revolve all things in contrition.

§ 2. Again, "contrition" is said to be a rubbing together (simul tritio), in that it wholly deletes sin. But a circumstance is something of the sin: therefore it itself is to be rubbed away. But it is not rubbed away, unless an act of sorrow is reiterated over it: therefore the penitent ought actually to sorrow over the individual circumstances of the sins. And he cannot actually sorrow over them, unless he revolves them in his mind: therefore he ought to revolve them in his mind.

§ 3. Again, in things which are bodily rubbed away, those things over which the rubber does not reiterate are not crushed: therefore it will be similar in spiritual things: because that word "contrition" is transferred from bodily things to spiritual things. If therefore the sorrow which crushes is not reiterated over the circumstance, the circumstance of the sin is not crushed: therefore neither is it remitted, as it seems: therefore it is necessary to actually sorrow over each one, and revolve them in contrition.

§ 4. Again, Isaiah 14:22: I will destroy the name of Babylon, and its remnants, and its seed, and its offspring, says the Lord. Now it is certain that circumstances are of the offspring: therefore they are to be destroyed; but they are not destroyed, except through contrition: therefore contrition ought to be had for them. And it cannot be had unless they are recalled to mind. Therefore they ought to be recalled to mind, as it seems.

§ 5. By the same reasoning it seems it can be proved that they ought to be recalled to mind in satisfaction, and by another reasoning proper to it: A wise physician in applying medicine actually turns his attention to the dispositions of the disease: therefore a spiritual physician will do the same. But the application of medicine is satisfaction: therefore in satisfaction the disposition of the spiritual disease ought actually to be attended to. But the spiritual disease is sin, the disposition of which is circumstance. Therefore in making satisfaction one ought to attend to the circumstances of the sin.

§ 6. Again, whenever one thing is proportioned to another, it is necessary to turn attention to both of the proportionable things. But the one making satisfaction proportions and compares his work to the sin and the circumstance. Therefore it is necessary that he actually rethink the sin and the circumstances of the sin.

§ 7. Again, Bede: What heals the heel does not heal the eye. But it is satisfaction he is speaking about: therefore one satisfaction is necessary for one sin, and another for another. But in every such antidote it is necessary to rethink that to which the antidote is counterposed: therefore it is necessary for the one making satisfaction actually to rethink the sin and the circumstances of the sin.

BUT TO THE CONTRARY is this, that: § 1. According to this, few would be compunctious and do penance: because very few are seen to do this.

§ 2. Again, the Apostle says, I Corinthians 6:18: Flee fornication. And it is expounded that it should be fled even lest it be thought about: because being thought about it moves one. Therefore it ought not to be recalled to mind in thought, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, Avicenna says that a pleasant bodily species sometimes even moves the one remembering: but that movement is toward the illicit: therefore to be fled. Therefore the cause is also to be fled. But the cause is thought: therefore thought is to be fled. Therefore not every sin is to be recalled to memory in contrition or satisfaction.

§ 4. Again, some prove this from a simile. For we see a pomegranate or another fruit whole does not move the appetite or intellect: but if it is divided, it will move. Therefore by a simile sin is to be recalled to memory in the universal, but not dividedly through individual circumstances, because thus it would move to the illicit.

I RESPOND that he is not bound at all times, although it is good sometimes to revolve circumstances. I well believe that in the contrition which first deletes sins, because it must be virile, he is bound to revolve, and to confess all those things which he remembers, but not circumstances, except those which draw into another genus, which also are not properly circumstances, as was said above.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Augustine counsels this to excite compunction: because the consideration of quantity makes one more vehemently compunctious, and sorrow more bitterly: and he does not say this for the reason that a penitent is bound to them.

To the next it must be said that it is called "contrition" because it is of two things, namely grace, and sorrow proceeding from free choice, or sensible and rational sorrow. Or because it is of all the sins at once that are in memory. But it does not need to be of all circumstances, except as to the well-being of contrition, namely so that it may be more fervent and more devout.

To the next it must be said that it is true in those things which are bodily crushed, because those are crushed successively. But sins are crushed simultaneously in a single moment of the infusion of grace: and therefore it is impossible that then all of them are thought of individually, but in the universal. And therefore then the circumstances are crushed in them: and they do not need to be recalled to actual memory individually.

To the next it must be said that the whole seed of Babylon is destroyed through the infusion of grace: but it is not necessary to actually think of the whole, because some are even unknown, which nevertheless are remitted there. And the reason for this universal destruction and contrition has already been said, namely that the sorrow is concerning all things in the universal, although not individually and in particular.

TO THAT which is objected concerning satisfaction, it must be said that it is not always necessary to actually turn attention to them: because the penitent is not the physician, but rather the priest, and he in confession discerns the genera of diseases. But just as a physician does not seek all the accidents of a disease, but only the dangerous causes: so also the spiritual physician does not seek accidental circumstances, but only those drawing into another genus.

To the next it must be said that satisfaction is not proportioned to individual sins and circumstances, because it would be impossible that the penitent could sustain this; but rather to the roots of the sins, as was held in the preceding distinction. For if the sin is rooted in the flesh, he enjoins things afflicting the flesh: but if in goods of fortune, he enjoins almsgiving, and so of others. And thus it is not necessary that the one making satisfaction always think of whatever sin and circumstance.

To the next it must be said that in this way Bede's saying is understood of the roots of sins, and not of the sins themselves, and the circumstances of the sins.

BUT TO THOSE THINGS which are objected to the contrary, it is only to be noted that they hold only when the recollection of sins does not harm the penitent. And this happens in two ways, namely when he declines into despair from the mere consideration of guilt: or when they move the appetite from the memory of the previously had pleasure in them. For then it seems to me that the thought is to be averted. But otherwise it is good often to rethink all one's years in bitterness of soul before God, to excite greater compunction and humility.

Articulus 26 — What And How Many Are The Circumstances Aggravating Sin

Which and how many are the circumstances aggravating a sin?

Fifthly, it is asked which and how many these circumstances are?

Now if one inspects the Letter diligently, one can collect nine diverse things which it posits, namely the quality of the crime, the place, the time, the perseverance, the variety of the person, the temptation, the multiple execution of the vice. And after many things he adds two, namely the loss of the virtue which meanwhile he lacked, and the ingratitude by which the offender is made guilty of all, and deprives himself of all received graces.

Moreover he seems to divide the variety of the person into three, namely dignity, order, and age, whether a youth, or an old man, or in many years. And as it seems to me, more cannot be collected from the Letter.

BUT IT IS OBJECTED concerning these, and first concerning the individual ones.

For it seems that: § 1. The quality of a vice is not a circumstance. For it is understood either of the essential quality which gives the species to the vice, or of the accidental one. If in the first way, it is not a circumstance. If in the second way, then it is asked, what is that quality? And if it is said that it is the mode of the act. ON THE CONTRARY: That mode which belongs to a mortal sin is one, namely because it is from contempt of the precept, and from the lust for a mutable good. But it is certain that there is not one quality of many sins or of all. Therefore that mode is not the quality of the crime.

§ 2. Again, place does not aggravate unless it is sacred. And then it makes sacrilege, which is another genus of sin. Therefore place does not remain a circumstance simply, but also gives the form of a species of vice.

§ 3. Again, it is objected concerning time, because it does not aggravate unless it is a time established for prayer or for festivals. And this again induces sacrilege which is another genus of sin, as some have said.

§ 4. Again, perseverance is a certain virtue: therefore it is not a circumstance of a criminal vice. Again, perseverance adds nothing over the act of sin, except continuity. But continuity does not say something in the act, but rather concerning the agent, that he remains in the vice.

§ 5. Similarly, it is objected concerning the variety of the person: for he implies that there are various things in the person which aggravate sin. And this does not seem right, because thus every act of a person would aggravate, because every man has a variant person from another.

§ 6. Again, the dignity of a person insofar as it is such, does not increase merit: for we do not say that a Bishop merits more by praying, other things being equal, than a non-Bishop: therefore it seems that it does not aggravate a sin.

§ 7. Again, if it aggravates a sin: either this is on the part of the root of the sin, or on the part of the act, or on the part of the end of the act, or on the part of the harm which it inflicts. Now it seems that it is not on the part of the root: because a non-Bishop fornicates or can fornicate from as great or a greater lust as a Bishop. Therefore the Episcopate does not contribute to a greater quantity of the root. Similarly it seems that it is not on the part of the act: because there can be as great an act of fornication in a non-Bishop as in a Bishop, or greater. The end can also be just as foul or fouler, and similarly the harm greater. Therefore it seems that it in no way aggravates.

§ 8. Again, if we are to speak per se, according to the doctrine of the Philosopher, things which confer no power to an act upon a person, do not have themselves toward eliciting or aggravating the act, but rather are related to that act by accident. But such is dignity or order in a person: therefore it neither elicits nor aggravates the act of sin, but has itself by accident to it. THE PROOF of the first is this. If I say, "The white sculptor makes a statue," white confers nothing to the act, and therefore is not related to the act to elicit or aggravate, but only by accident. THE PROOF of the second is, that if I say, "The Dean or Bishop fornicates," the Episcopate or the deanship does not confer the power of fornicating; just as the art of building confers on the carpenter the power of making a house: therefore the proposition stands.

§ 9. Similarly, it is objected concerning age which he posits among the things varying the person. For he seems to speak imperfectly: because diverse ages make sins fouler, and not one age. For the Philosopher says that old men are more covetous, and young men more luxurious: therefore by the opposite, there is greater in youths the baseness of avarice, and in old men the baseness of lust is greater: therefore he ought to have distinguished age.

§ 10. Further, it seems that age again does not do this, but rather another disposition of the one having the age: for it is evident that such a person from choler in youth, when heat increases, is dried out, and is made impotent for intercourse from dryness: and as time proceeds, the heat being remitted and the moisture increasing, he is made potent: therefore he desires lust more in old age than in youth. Since therefore the rule according to the Theologian [Augustine] and the Ethicist [Aristotle] is that a sin is greater which proceeds from greater lust, it seems that the cause of this aggravation is not age, but another disposition of the one having the age.

§ 11. Furthermore, concerning this it is objected that he says temptation aggravates sin. For this seems to return to age: for age does not aggravate except insofar as it is an incitement to greater temptation: therefore age and temptation are the same circumstance, as it seems.

§ 12. Further, temptation makes greater merit in the good, as the Saints say: therefore it seems that it is not productive of greater sin in the evil: because it cannot be that the same thing is the cause of contraries.

§ 13. Further, temptation is prior to the essence of sin: therefore it is also prior to the quantity of sin, because the quantity of sin does not extend beyond the essence of sin: therefore it seems that it does not give any quantity to the sin.

§ 14. Furthermore, it is inquired concerning this which he calls the multiple execution of vice. For this multiplicity is either in the mode of the act, or in the species. If in the mode: then it returns to that which is concerning the quality of the vice, which he posited earlier. If in the species: then it adds nothing above the species of the vice except discrete quantity: therefore it does not aggravate towards this singular sin.

If perhaps you say that it aggravates sin from multitude. On the contrary: Unity, which is the principle of discreteness, adds nothing above the entity of the thing which is an essence, but rather a mode which is rooted in negation, as Aristotle maintains in multiple places of the First Philosophy but that is the principle of multitude: therefore multitude does not posit anything added to any single one of the many, except that mode of negation: therefore it does not aggravate: because every aggravation is from some added entity of the thing itself which is aggravated.

§ 15. Furthermore, it is objected concerning this that he says, that he should bewail the virtue which he lacked in the meantime. For this does not seem to bring quantity to the sin: for what follows every sin in whatever quantity, great or small, does not give any quantity to the sin: but to lack virtue follows every mortal sin in whatever quantity, great or small: therefore it does not give any quantity to the sin.

§ 16. Further, since there are many other goods which we lack in the meantime, namely grace, the natural good, or its integrity, virtue, and merit: why does he not say that the others are to be bewailed just like that one?

§ 17. Furthermore, it is inquired concerning this that he says, that he should bewail the ingratitude, that offending in one, he is made guilty of all . For from this God seems to be more ungrateful than he himself who sins: for if there were some master whom a servant served much, and it happened that the servant sinned in one thing, and the master imputed to him sin in all things, and not in one only, the master is more ungrateful for the servant's service than the servant: therefore by a simile it will be so here as well.

§ 18. Further, it seems to be the greatest injustice that offending in one, he is made guilty of all: for if someone were caught in a single robbery or theft, and the judge were to heap upon him adultery, homicide, and the crime of high treason, he does him an injustice. Since therefore human laws are patterned upon divine laws, it seems that they are not contrary to divine laws: therefore if anyone transgresses one precept, he is dealt with unjustly if he is reputed to be guilty of all.

§ 19. Furthermore, it is objected here that Tully posits many more circumstances in the first book of the Rhetoric for he says that in common there are indeed seven, namely who, what, why, when, where, how, by what aids. According to Tully and Boethius, however, some of these seven are attributed to the person, and some to the business: to the person indeed one, which is who, and to the business the remaining six. And Tully himself divides that which is who into eleven circumstances, namely name, nature, manner of living, fortune, habit, disposition, pursuits, counsels, deeds, chance occurrences, speeches. And again he subdivides some of these, as nature into sex, nation, fatherland, kinship, age: and manner of living he divides into nine, namely society, love or the choice of association, pedagogues or preceptors, all those whom he used, in what business he is occupied, in what trade he transacts business, of what craft he is, how he manages his domestic affairs, with what justice, with what domestic custom. Similarly he divides the others, as is clear to one examining the first book of the Rhetoric. Therefore it seems that this one [Augustine] also ought to have posited more.

Solution. It must be said first to this last point, that it does not belong to the present instruction to treat of circumstances, except insofar as they aggravate the act of sin, and make for it some quantity, either according to guilt, or according to baseness: and therefore Augustine does not touch upon them, except for the circumstances from which this kind of quantity in sin is notably effected. But Tully treats of circumstances as they are a rhetorical topic. Now a rhetorical topic is that from which through an enthymeme (which is a rhetorical syllogism) one argues two things concerning the accused before a judge, namely the notice of the thing, and the notice of his guilt. And therefore not all of his circumstances aggravate, but all make known to the judge concerning the accused or his guilt. But in penance no notice of these things is made to a judge: but rather the quantity of his guilt is shown to the guilty party, so that it may incline him to a greater lamentation. And therefore none are posited here except the circumstances that only aggravate guilt: and this suffices for the present lesson. However, we have disputed at length concerning circumstances elsewhere: and whoever wishes can inspect this: but here we shall say all things which pertain to the present passage, and no others.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the quality of a vice is understood in my judgment as the essential quality, which constitutes its species: for one vice is distant from another vice from the quantity which the specific difference brings. In which manner, all other things being equal, we say that one vice in species is greater, and another lesser, as adultery rather than theft, and homicide rather than lying, and so of the others.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that circumstance is spoken of in two ways, namely circumstancing the act, and circumstancing the agent, as is expressly gathered in the circumstances which Tully posits: and in this way what he did is reduced to a circumstance taken on the part of the act or business: for although what expresses the essence of the act, nevertheless insofar as it brings with it a quantity of baseness, it conceives also that which stands around it, and thus it is called a circumstance.

To that which is objected concerning place, it must be said that place as such does not draw into another genus, even if it be sacred, unless another act supervenes violating the place. Whence Jurists say that he who secretly takes something in a place, does not incur the excommunication which the Bishop consecrating the place bears against violators of the place: but he incurs it who takes violently in a sacred place: because by another act than the handling of another's property he injures the immunity of the place: and thus it is clear that when nothing is added to the act of sin except a sacred place, it will not be place drawing into another genus of sin, but an aggravating circumstance.

In the same way the solution is clear to the following point which is objected concerning time: because it can relate to the act in two ways, just as place does.

To that which is further objected concerning perseverance, it must be said that perseverance is not called here solely remaining in the act of crime, nor even the actual intention of persevering, because this would be an actual sin divided from the others: nor even the gift of perseverance which is a virtue or something conjoined to virtue: but perseverance here is called that which is left behind from the iteration of a vicious act. And it is twofold, namely the evil disposition, through which a man is made apt for sinning: and the diminution of the natural good, through which he is distanced from the immutable good. And the more he is thus disposed, the more prone he is made to sinning: and from such proneness a certain quantity of sin is effected, especially in this that he sins more voluntarily and more freely, and as to this it is posited among the things aggravating sin.

To that, however, which is objected concerning the variety of person, it must be said that he does not consider all things which can be considered in a person, but only those which make the baseness in the act greater from a comparison to the agent. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

Moreover, Person is taken as it is a name of dignity, both according to the science of law, and according to the dignity of nature: according to which manner we say a dean is a person, and we do not say that a simple cleric is a person.

To the other it must be said that that argument is invalid: this does not increase merit, therefore it does not increase sin: because merit and what increases merit is from God alone, and not from man: but sin and what increases sin is from man, and not from God: and therefore something posited concerning the Person, such as dignity, makes a greater congruity of the act in the good, and a greater incongruity in the evil: and in the good indeed it does not increase the merit, but it increases the debt of congruity: but in the evil it increases the sin on account of the reason previously assigned.

To the other it must be said that it increases the deformity, not on the part of the root, nor on the part of the act considered absolutely, but from the comparison of the act to the state of the agent: for such a state ought to draw him back from sin, and it has a greater incongruity with sin: and therefore the baseness of the sin is aggravated from the state of the person. Whence that argument proceeds from an insufficiency.

To the other it must be said that the Philosopher speaks of those things which confer power from art in doing this act or that: but Augustine speaks here of those things which from congruity or incongruity increase or diminish the baseness of a vice, which is from the consideration of the sin to the sinner: and therefore what the Philosopher says is not to the point.

To that which is objected concerning age, it must be said that Augustine does not touch here except upon the genera of aggravating factors, and he well consents to this, that if the genus is drawn apart through species, that there will then be a diverse comparison.

To the other it must be said that among those speaking commonly, age is understood according to that which age leaves behind in the subject, both on the part of the body and on the part of the soul: for in the body it leaves behind growth, and gray hair, and such things: but in the soul the confirmation of reason, and of counsel, and such things: and according to this mode the disposition of the one having age is understood in age.

To that which is objected concerning temptation, it must be said that temptation and age are not the same, although certain causes of temptation aggravate more in a certain age, and certain ones in another: because age signifies a disposition left behind from time in the subject: but temptation does not signify except an impulse to the illicit, whether the impulse be from the flesh, or from the demon, or from the world: and it does not signify that impulse according as it is left behind from time.

To the other it must be said that temptation does not increase merit in itself, but the merit which is the remission of punishment: but when an aggravating circumstance is posited, this is not in the same way by which it increases merit: for it increases merit from the fact that it draws back from the good, and yet is overcome: for on account of the greater difficulty in the work a greater merit of the remission of punishment is had: but it increases sin by the opposite mode, namely because the lesser the temptation is, the greater is the sin: because he resisted less, and thus fought less: and consequently he was more voluntary in the sin.

To the other it must be said that those things which are prior to the essence of sin by way of inclinations and causes of sin, can well increase and diminish sin: because then they are reduced to the circumstances of the agent, or of the person, as Tully says.

To that which is further inquired concerning that which is called the multiple execution of vice, it must be said that it is understood in the mode: but the mode here is accidental: and in this way it appears especially in sexual intercourse, which has one mode of baseness in lying down, another in standing, and another in sitting, according to what is perceived from confessants. And in lying down it has modes according to the disposition of the one lying on the back, or on the side, or otherwise, according to what confessants promulgate under the instigation of concupiscence. And through this the response to the first is clear: because this is not the quality of the vice, as was said above.

To the other it must be said that Augustine advises to bewail the virtue which he lacked in the meantime, not as a circumstance of sin absolutely, but as a certain aggravating factor from the harm done: because through this the sin is baser and greater, in that the privation is of a greater good and a greater virtue. Nor is it understood of the privation which follows every sin, but of that which follows the sin in itself, according to which we say that the sin which is contrary to a greater virtue is greater, as hatred which is contrary to charity, and the like. And thus the solution to the argument is clear.

To the other it must be said that none of the greater goods is directly contrary to sin, except virtue: because virtue perfects the potency for the act, but not grace, or merit: but vice or sin weakens the potency for the act, and therefore he does not name the other goods which the sinner lacks, like that one.

To that which is objected concerning ingratitude, it must be said that God is not ungrateful: because since any sin whatsoever is against the infinite good, it deserves the loss of every good. But it is otherwise concerning human judgment: because one does not sin against a man except insofar as he is harmed: and since he does not harm except in one thing, it would be unjust to heap other harms upon the sinner: and therefore what is introduced as a simile is not similar.

To the other it must be said that it is not understood in the way the objection proceeds, that offending in one he is guilty of all: but rather, as the Master says in the text, namely because he is deprived of the good which is acquired by the obedience of all the precepts: and this is because any sin whatsoever is opposed to the end of all the commandments: but grace is not given without the end of grace, because God giving grace does not come to man through Himself [without His end]. And therefore that objection is founded upon a false understanding of the text.

To all the others, however, the solution is through those things which are said in the beginning of these solutions.

Articulus 27 — Which Of The Circumstances More Aggravates The Vice

Which of the circumstances aggravates a vice more?

Which of the circumstances aggravates a vice more?

Sixthly it is inquired, Which of these circumstances aggravates a vice more?

And it seems that § 1. The variety of person, and the mode which is changed in the multiple execution of vice: because these two circumstances are especially required from the confessant, but the others not so: therefore it seems that these are more potent.

§ 2. Further, these two circumstances are those which make the incongruity of the act greater: and from incongruity they aggravate the sin: because as great as the incongruity is, so great is the baseness: therefore it seems that these two aggravate more.

§ 3. Further, place and time are extrinsic, but mode is intrinsic, and the order or dignity of the person are intrinsic to the agent: but the intrinsic aggravates more than the extrinsic: therefore dignity and mode aggravate more than the other circumstances, as it seems.

But it seems that that which is concerning the quality of the vice aggravates more: because

§ 1. It signifies the quantity of the vice which determines the very species of the vice: but this is greater than that which is from other accidents: therefore it seems that it aggravates more.

§ 2. Further, in natural things it is thus, that every species of corporeal substance has a quantity naturally following its species, in which the power of the species itself is completed: as the Philosopher says in the second book of De Anima , that of all things constituted by nature there is a certain limit and ratio of magnitude and growth: therefore proportionally that will be so in those having spiritual quantity: but this is the quantity following the very species of the vice or virtue. Since therefore this is essential to the vice, it seems to aggravate the vice more: but this is attended to in the quality of the vice, or in the circumstance which is called what: therefore that aggravates more.

Moreover, it seems that temptation aggravates more than all: § 1. For Augustine says that every sin is voluntary: if it is not voluntary, it is not a sin: therefore it seems that the will gives being to the sin insofar as it is a sin: therefore the quantity of the will will give quantity to the sin: but the quantity of the will is greater or lesser from the fact that the temptation is greater or lesser, because in a greater temptation there is less will, and in a lesser one there is less [Wait, the text says "in minori minor": in a lesser temptation, lesser will—actually it should mean greater will, but Albert responds to this]: therefore from the quantity of the temptation the quantity of the sin is maximally attended to: therefore it maximally aggravates, as it seems.

§ 2. Further, the Gloss on Matthew As much as you intend, so much you do: and the Masters commonly say that this is true in evil. But Augustine says that intention is the will with an end: therefore the will final, or conjoined, or tending to an end, gives quantity to the work: therefore it also gives the aggravation to it: but everyone sinning mortally, tends to a creature as to an end: therefore he has a will with an end in every mortal sin: therefore according to that a greater or lesser quantity is attended to. But it is evident that the quantity of the will is greater or lesser from a greater or lesser temptation: therefore it seems that the aggravation of sin is attended to principally according to the temptation.

But ON THE CONTRARY it seems that place and time: because

§ 1. Those two are principally inquired of the confessant: but they would not be principally inquired, unless they were greater: therefore it seems that they aggravate more.

§ 2. Further, 2 Maccabees 3:38, it is said of a place, that in the place is a certain divine power . And in Genesis 28:16: Truly the Lord is in this place, etc . But concerning time, 1 Corinthians 7:5: Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent for a time, that you may devote yourselves to prayer . Since therefore these two are specially expressed in the canon, it seems that these two among the rest bring a notable quantity to the sin more.

§ 3. Further, those which can more draw a sin into another genus, it seems also that remaining the same they can more aggravate it: but place and time can do this maximally: therefore it seems that they maximally aggravate sin. Now the first is PROVED from this, that unless those which draw into another genus according to their own proper deformity bring something to the sin, they cannot draw it into another genus. But the SECOND is proved from this, that sacrilege is committed in the injury of a sacred place, or time.

§ 4. Further, for the fulfillment of sacred acts we do not see anything determined by God and the Church in all circumstances, except only place and time: therefore by opposition these maximally bring deformity to works opposed to sanctity: but such works are sins: therefore it seems that place and time bring the maximal quantity of baseness to sins.

BUT IT SEEMS that perseverance aggravates more than all.

§ 1. For whatever of itself is apt to give quantity to a habit, by which a potency is disposed to act, that consequently maximally gives spiritual quantity to the act: but frequency and perseverance do this: therefore it maximally gives quantity to sin. The first is clear through this, that the act of a more intense habit is more intense. But the second is written in the second book of the Ethics because from such operations similar habits are generated.

§ 2. Further, the quantity of evil is nothing except a distancing from the good: but it is evident that the longer one has persevered in sin through the frequency of sin, the more he is distanced from the good: therefore the greater the evil is made in him: but this is the aggravation of evil and of sin: therefore perseverance in evil maximally aggravates sin.

Moreover, it seems that ingratitude maximally aggravates: because on account of ingratitude, as is held below, even remitted sins return: but nothing of the others bears such a heavy weight, as does the return of sins: therefore it seems that ingratitude, among all those which Augustine enumerates here in the text, maximally aggravates sins.

Solution. It must be said that the gravity of sin is attended to in three ways, namely essential, which is owed to it according to its species, or its genus: and accidental, which is owed to it from something extrinsic to it, which is in some way measuring it, or the agent: or mediate, which relate to the sin almost by way of a passion.

And the first gravity is indeed twofold, namely from the nature of the genus, and from the nature of the specific difference contracting the genus. Now an example of gravity in the genus is what Gregory says , that spiritual sins are of greater fault than corporeal ones: although corporeal ones are of greater infamy than spiritual ones. But an example of gravity from a specific difference is, that covetousness or avarice in its genus is greater than sexual intercourse: and yet adultery according to Solomon in Proverbs is greater than theft. Whence he says, that the fault is not great when someone has stolen, etc . And this twofold quantity is manifested in the very name of the sin: because immediately in the very name the genus and specific difference of the sin become known. And I say that this quantity of sin is to be weighed more than every other quantity, although it is not inquired about in confession: because through itself it becomes known as soon as the sin is named: just as if a whale and a polyp [octopus] are named, by the very name it becomes known that the whale is greater than the polyp, provided the hearer knows both of these fishes.

But the accidental quantity is from two extrinsic things, one of which is the measure of the act, and the other of the agent, which are place and time. And because sometimes the accident does not become known with the name of the thing, therefore it is necessary to express them: yet they do not make as much gravity as the first two.

But because the mode of the act, and the varieties of the person, are as it were intermediates between them, therefore they confer a quantity more essential than the second, and less essential than the first, because they are not of the intelligible account [ratio] of the sin, and therefore when the sin is named they do not immediately become known, but must be expressed so that the quantity which is from them may be known: and in this they agree with the accidental ones. However, because the mode is a certain form of the act, and the variety of the person is a form of the agent, and both are inseparable from the baseness of the sin whose quantity they increase, therefore in some respect they agree with the essential ones: and thus they are intermediates, lesser indeed than the first, and greater, as it seems to me, than the second, if all those are understood as equal.

It must be said therefore to the first, that it proves that there is a greater quantity from these, because these two are more required from the confessant: and the inquiry is made because in the name of the sin these two do not become known by themselves: nevertheless the other two give a greater gravity to the sin.

To the other it must be said that speaking of the accidental incongruity of the sin it concludes truthfully: but it is false speaking of the essential incongruity.

To the other it must be said that as is clear from what has been said, it is well conceded that other things being equal, those two aggravate more than place and time.

To the two following objections where it treats of the quality of the vice, I think it is simply to be conceded.

To that which is further inquired concerning temptation, it must be said that the will of the tempted without doubt is greater and lesser even according to the Ethicist, as Aristotle intimates in Book VIII of the Ethics , according as the temptation is greater or lesser; therefore he says that the profligate is more blameworthy than the incontinent: we call a profligate him who anticipates his will, but incontinent him who is drawn by the force of pleasure. However, because the will is the efficient cause of the act, it does not give it an accidental quantity only, like the mode or the dignity of the person, because those add a baseness as if new, which otherwise would not be in the act: but a drawn will adds nothing except a greater or lesser blameworthiness of the essential baseness, which nevertheless would be in the act: and therefore even that circumstance is rarely inquired of the confessant, unless he spontaneously wished to say it himself.

But to the objection it must be said that the will which is the root of the sin is not meant here: but rather a certain quality of affection is called the will, when it is said that temptation increases or diminishes the will.

To the other it must be said that that Gloss says well, and the Masters expound well: but nevertheless that is the will by which the interior act is, and from the conceived end is the cause of the exterior act, or the potency itself which by conceiving the end is the cause of the interior act: but the will which increases when temptation decreases, and decreases when it increases, is a certain quality and affection of that will: and therefore it is not necessary that it bear a greater quantity to the sin.

To that which is further objected concerning place and time, the solution is clear through what was said before: because that such circumstances are inquired into in confession, this is not because they bring a greater quantity to the sin: but rather because they do not become known with the naming of the sin.

To the other it must be said that in truth from that argument nothing is proved, except that these two aggravate: because it is falsely supposed that the mode and the persons of sacred acts and their office are not determined. For order is that by which power is given for a sacred act and office: and their mode is in the rite, which is taught all day long in Scripture.

To the other it must be said that in the canon it is thus determined on account of doubt: for there could be doubt whether these aggravated the sin, because they are extrinsic: but the mode and the dignity of the person aggravate even according to the dictate of proper reason.

To the other it must be said that these do not draw the sin into another genus of themselves only, as was said above: but from this, that the sin is not absolutely simple, but is as it were composed of the act of sin, and the act injurious to the place: as is the infliction of vengeance, and the like; and therefore sacrilege is also more committed concerning a place, than concerning a time: because no injury can be done to time.

To that which is further inquired concerning perseverance, it must be said that although perseverance in some way aggravates the harm which is from the sin, nevertheless it does not properly aggravate the sin: because it is not properly said to aggravate the sin, except what brings to the act itself some aspect of baseness, which without it it would not have: and perseverance does not do this by strengthening or generating a habit: but nevertheless it wickedly disposes the sinner, and therefore the frequency is to be bewailed: yet it does not properly make the quantity of the sin: and from the first argument nothing more is proved, except that the one sinning is wickedly disposed from the frequency of the sin.

To the other it must be said that that distancing is not in any one act of sin whatsoever, as would be required if it aggravated the sin: but rather it is in the possibility through the diminution of the natural good: and therefore that objection does not conclude to a direct aggravation of the sin, but rather to a certain harm of the sinner, which is to be bewailed from the fact that he was long in sins.

To the last point which is objected, namely concerning ingratitude, it must be said that ingratitude does not aggravate any sin, but rather is an effect of the sin following it from the state of the sinner: nor do sins absolutely return on account of it, but in a certain manner, as will be clear below.

Articulus 28 — Whether The Penitent Ought To Put Himself Entirely Under The Judgment And Power Of The Priest, Reserving Nothing Of His Own Right To Himself; And, Whether He Is Bound To Enter Religion If The Priest Enjoins It Must the penitent place himself entirely in the judgment and power of the priest, reserving nothing of his own right to himself? and, Is he bound to enter religion if the priest enjoins it?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, § 1, around the end: Let him place himself entirely in the judgment and power of the priest, etc.

For this does not seem to be required of the penitent: because the priest's judgment can be erroneous or malicious: and then it would be dangerous to place oneself entirely in the judgment of the priest.

Furthermore, for the sake of this a useful question is inquired here, Whether a penitent is bound to obey the priest if he enjoins him to enter religion?

It seems that he is: because § 1. The canons enjoin such a penance: therefore since the priest follows the canon, the priest is to be obeyed just as the canon.

§ 2. Further, Genesis 19:17, the Angel enjoined Lot to go out of Sodom, and not to stand in all the country round about. Sodom...

Moreover, [Sodom] signifies sin, and all the surrounding region signifies worldly conversation; therefore, since the priest is an Angel of the Lord, it seems that he too can enjoin [entry into religion].

§ 3. Again, it often happens that someone frequently suffers a relapse from the fact that he is of his own right (proprii juris), which he could not do if he were in the custody of another; therefore, since the priest ought to beware of the penitent's relapse almost before all other things, it seems that he can enjoin him to place himself in the custody and power of another. But this cannot be done except through entry into religion; therefore it seems that he can, from his office, enjoin entry into religion.

§ 4. Again, certain sins require a seven-year penance, according to what the canons say; therefore, if those are repeated, it seems that the penance could be extended throughout one's whole life; and this in fastings and vigils and prayers. But the observance that is in religion seems to add almost nothing to such things; therefore it seems that the priest can enjoin the observance of religion.

§ 5. If perhaps you say that religion is bound to counsels, but a penitent is not, and therefore religion cannot be enjoined. On the contrary: we are not bound to a seven-year penance by precept, unless we have merited it through sin; and yet it is a counsel to do it, and he who does it is praised; therefore, that which is simply in counsel can be enjoined by precept for some sin; therefore by a similar reason, religion too.

§ 6. Again, for a certain sin I see that someone is condemned by a spiritual judge to perpetual prison, and also to a meager diet, such as bread and water. But it is certain that this is much heavier than any religion; therefore, much more can someone be condemned in penance to the observance of religion.

§ 7. Again, in the text it is said, Reserving nothing of his own right for himself [559]; but as long as a man does not have the profession of religion, he is always of his own right. But the penitent ought to reserve nothing of his own right for himself; therefore he ought to make a profession of obedience and religion, as it seems.

§ 8. Otherwise it is also objected against that text: For whoever puts himself entirely in the judgment of the priest, retains nothing of his own judgment for himself; therefore he is bound to do whatever the priest enjoins, the key not erring. But if another changes his penance, he does not do what this one enjoins; therefore it seems that this other cannot change his penance for him.

§ Solution. To this it seems it must be said regarding the first objection, that the judgment and power of the priest, insofar as he is a priest having the keys and the authority of a judge in the forum of penance, is one thing; and the judgment of a man is another. For the judgment of the priest as such is according to the canons, having weighed the sins and the state of the penitent, and this never errs, nor is it malicious; but the judgment of a man, which is often erroneous and malicious, the penitent is not bound to undergo.

§ To that which is further asked, I say without prejudice, that because the observance of religion is of will, and not of necessity, as Augustine says, it cannot be enjoined in the forum of penance, except conditionally, if the penitent should will to undertake it; for all things that are of supererogation are indeed praiseworthy if done, but no one is to be compelled to them.

§ To the first thing that is objected against this, it must be said that the canons do not enjoin by way of necessity, but by way of counsel for the terror of some sin that requires a greater penance than others, and throughout one's whole life.

§ To the next it must be said that the region around Sodom signifies things inclining to sin, such as society and other things; but nevertheless it was permitted for Lot to dwell there, unless out of his will he had turned aside to the mountain; and therefore the saying of the Angel is reduced to a counsel, and not to a precept.

§ To the next it must be said that a relapse can be guarded against otherwise; for there are many ways of avoiding sin, even if one cannot avoid it as well. However, the principal reason why religion cannot be enjoined is that in religion a man's right over himself is taken away; and this cannot be done in penance, except with respect to certain things, and not with respect to all things.

§ To the next it must be said that penance can well be prolonged throughout one's whole life, and even more, if life could last longer; but yet it does not follow that religion can be enjoined; for religion, beyond perpetuity, posits the abdication of one's own will in all things and the lack of personal property, to which no one is bound, unless he chooses them of his own will; and therefore it cannot be enjoined.

§ To the next it must be said that it well happens that out of sin something becomes a precept which otherwise would not be a precept; for what is commanded to the one sinning and to the one not sinning is different. For penance is a precept with respect to him who has sinned, and also confession; but it is not a precept for him who has not sinned. But nevertheless, not all things which are not a precept become a precept, but only those without which the sin cannot be justly amended; and therefore no other things than those can be commanded to him in the forum of penance.

§ To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if the priest can command what is more difficult, that he can also command what is less difficult; and this happens because they do not have the same order of necessity for the amendment of sin: for without religion a sin can be amended, but without canonical penance it cannot; and therefore canonical penance can be commanded, and not religion, even if sometimes it is more difficult than religion.

§ To the next it must be said that this is not understood in all things, but only in those which pertain to the canonical amendment of sin.

§ To that which is further objected against the text, it must be said that without doubt the penitent ought to stand by the judgment of the priest; but the judgment of the priest is preserved not only in that which he enjoins, but in what is equivalent to the Church or to the penitent; and therefore commutations and relaxations subsequently have a place.

Articulus 29 — Whether Contrition Can Be Intensified

Can contrition be intensified?

§ Then it is asked concerning what is said there, at A, § 1, near the end: That he may be prepared to do all things at his command for recovering the life of the soul, etc.

§ Let us inquire here into six things concerning the quantity of contrition: of which the first will be, Can contrition be intensified? Second, According to what is the intensification of contrition measured? Third, Concerning its quantity, how great ought it to be? Fourth, Whether it ought to be equal concerning all sins, or greater for some and less for others? Fifth, Concerning its quantity with respect to time, whether it ought to last throughout one's whole life, or not? Sixth and lastly, Concerning its quantity with respect to the will of sinning or not sinning.

§ To the first of these, namely whether contrition is intensified, it is objected thus:

§ 1. In no genus is there anything less than the minimum. Contrition denotes the rending of the heart into the smallest parts (per minima); therefore it seems that it cannot be rent more and more; therefore neither can there be intensification in contrition. The second proposition is proved from the fact that the notion of "contrite" (crushed) differs from the notion of "broken"; for the contrite is divided into the smallest parts, but the broken is not. The first proposition, however, is self-evident.

559. Aristotle, Metaphysics.

§ 2. Again, nothing can be intensified to infinity; but contrition is infinite; therefore it cannot be intensified. The first proposition is proved from the nature of the infinite. The second from the effect by which it deletes sin and unites to God: neither of which belongs to anything but divine and infinite power.

§ 3. Again, everything that is intensified is intensified by this, that it approaches more to the true imposition of the name, as the Author of the Six Principles says . If therefore contrition is intensified, it is intensified by such an approach. But everything that approaches something by motion is not yet in it; therefore the contrition which is intensified is not in the true notion of contrition. But what is not truly contrition does not delete sin; therefore such contrition which can be intensified does not delete sin, which is false: because since all contrition preserves grace, and grace cannot exist with sin, all contrition deletes sin. Therefore this is also false, from which it follows that contrition cannot be intensified.

§ 4. Again, that which is intensified is intensified in a twofold way, namely by purification from a contrary mixed into it—as the Philosopher says, that the whiter is that which is more unmixed with black—and by approach or recession towards that which expresses that thing at its terminus, as the good is better by approach to that which is good in itself and substantially, and the evil is worse by recession from it. If therefore contrition is intensified, it will be done in one of these modes: either therefore by purification from a contrary, or by approach and recession from something. If in the first mode: then that contrary is either on the part of the grace informing the sorrow of contrition, or on the part of the sorrow which is about the sin. If in the first mode: since grace has no contrary except sin, contrition would be mixed with sin, which is false, because this would be against the notion of contrition. If in the second mode: it is certain, however, that the sorrow for sin has no contrary in the genus of passion except joy for sin, and not joy for sorrow; therefore someone could be contrite and have joy for sin. But joy for sin cannot exist without sin; therefore someone would be contrite and have sin, which is absurd.

§ Again, if it is said to be intensified by approach to a one which is contrition in itself: then there follows that which was concluded in the preceding, that it is not truly contrition: therefore it does not truly have the effect of contrition: therefore it does not truly delete sin, which is unfitting.

§ But against this it is objected thus: § 1. Everything that can be intensified on the part of its formal and material principle can truly be intensified; contrition is of this sort; therefore it can truly be intensified and remitted. The proof of the second proposition is: because grace is greater in one than in another, and in the same person it can be greater than it is: and this is the formal principle in contrition; sorrow also can be greater in the same person than it is, and is greater in one than in another, which is the material principle in contrition. The first proposition is self-evident.

§ 2. Again, what cannot be intensified or remitted is equal in all those in whom it is present; if therefore contrition cannot be intensified or remitted, it is equal in all in whom it is present; but contrition being equal, it is necessary that grace and sorrow be equal; therefore all the contrite receive equal grace and have equal sorrow for their sins, which is absurd.

§ 3. Again, it is certain that contrition is an act from some virtue, whether that be penance or another, because no force is placed on this as regards the present question: but any virtue can be intensified; therefore that one too; but the virtue being intensified, its act is intensified; therefore actual contrition too can be intensified.

§ I answer. It must be said that without doubt contrition can be intensified absolutely and simply, both on the part of form and on the part of matter, as has been proved; and it seems to me rather insanity than an opinion of those who say otherwise.

§ Therefore it must be said to the first, that there are three things in contrition, namely sorrow, grace, and the object of sorrow: and with respect to the first two it is intensified. But with respect to the third, it is at the minimum of its genus, because it crushes all differences of mortal sin found in the mortar of the heart. Whence, just as it happens in a mortar, that what is crushed is reduced to dust: that crushing can be done with a larger or smaller pestle, and with stronger or weaker blows, provided however that each reduces it to dust: so it is in contrition in which sin is always crushed, even if with unequal sorrow and grace. Whence it does not follow, if the dust of weaker contrition is not greater than the dust of the blows of the stronger, that because of this the action of contrition, or the blow of the pestle, is not stronger in one contrition than in another. For although it is not possible to admit "less" in the effect of the deletion of sin, it is nevertheless possible to admit "less" and "greater" on the part of the crushing action, which is actual contrition, and also on the part of the passion.

§ To the next it must be said that grace in its essence is finite, and also sorrow; but because grace is such a gift that when it is given God inhabits us, an infinite power follows from that gift. But this is rooted in that which deletes sin effectively: and this indeed cannot be intensified; but grace and sorrow which are finite can be intensified.

§ To the next it must be said that this intensification is by approach to the highest in grace; because, as Augustine says, "in the good, to be greater is to be better" and thus by a greater assimilation to the highest good grace is said to be greater and to be intensified. But on the part of sorrow it happens that there is the true imposition of the name, when it is entirely separated from its contrary. I mean voluntary sorrow from deliberating reason, which is required in contrition.

§ But as to what is objected, that what approaches something is not in it, it must be said that it does not follow: for the approach of something to something is twofold, namely as to a nature, and as to a terminus, or to the highest peak of that nature. And what is in a certain nature can still approach the perfection and highest peak of that nature, as a boy who is in the nature of a man, and yet is in motion toward manhood, as the Philosopher says. And similarly sorrow has the true nature of the sorrow of contrition, but can approach the terminus and highest peak of that nature.

§ To the next it must be said that since there are two things in contrition, namely form and matter, intensification is measured differently according to the two: for grace by approach to the per se good, but sorrow by separation from its contrary. And on the part of grace the answer is clear from what was established in the immediately preceding reading; but the intensification of sorrow through recession from a contrary is not as transparent. And therefore it must be noted, that not everything that is intensified through recession from a contrary has that contrary in itself, or mixed with it: because according to this, everything that is so intensified would be an intermediate, and the extremes would never be intensified, which is also against the logic of grammar. But that which is intensified has the contrary mixed in itself, or something of it by which it is held back from being at the terminus; and that which is "something of the contrary" is sometimes not the essence of the contrary, but rather the cause or the remnants following the contrary, or dispositions of the subject left from the form of the contrary which was inherent: and through separation from them it happens that the remaining contrary approaches the terminus of its imposition. And so it is here: because the remnants of sin and the corrupt nature which is as a cause of sin, and the evil pronenesses left from sin, sometimes hold back the sinner so that his sorrow of contrition is not intensified, even though he has the true sorrow of contrition separated from the contrary, which is joy in sins.

§ And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 30 — Whether The Intensity Of Contrition Is Considered By Means Of Something, And With Respect To What

Whether intensification of contrition is according to something and measured by something?

Whether intensification of contrition is according to something and measured by something?

§ Secondly it is asked, According to what is the intensification of contrition measured?

§ For it seems that nothing is found in the penitent according to which it may be intensified: because § 1. Whatever form is intensified in something, is intensified by this, that its causes are intensified, as is evident in all things, namely the white, the hot, and so of others. But contrition does not have a cause in the contrite person; therefore it seems that nothing can be taken in him according to which it is intensified. The proof of the middle premise is because contrition is a gift of God, and not from man.

§ 2. Again, contrition is the cause of justification and salvation; therefore if contrition had a cause in the contrite person, since whatever is the cause of the cause is the cause of the effect, something in the contrite person would be the cause of justification and salvation, which would be the Pelagian heresy.

§ 3. Again, if something in the contrite person is the cause of intensification, this is nothing but attrition; but attrition is not contrition, and according to many Doctors it cannot even become contrition; therefore it seems that when attrition is intensified, contrition is not thereby intensified; therefore the intensification of contrition is not measured according to that.

§ If on account of this it is said that it is intensified on the part of God intensifying it, so that God is the cause of its intensification:

§ It seems that this is not so: because § 1. Blessed Dionysius says: God holds Himself equally toward all things, and especially toward all men ; therefore He would be the cause of equal contrition in all, which is false; therefore it seems that He Himself is not the cause why contrition is intensified.

§ 2. Again, a multiform effect is not from a uniform cause in all things and always. But contrition is a multiform effect, because sometimes it is great and sometimes small; therefore it does not have a cause which is always uniform. But such a cause is God; therefore it does not have God as its cause, as it seems. If perhaps you say that sorrow is intensified on the part of the contrite person, and grace on the part of God intensifying it. On the contrary: then it is asked, whether these hold themselves equally in intensification, or the intensification of one is the cause of the intensification of the other according to nature, even if perhaps in time they are simultaneous? It seems that they are not equal: for everything that is a meritorious act in us is caused by prevenient grace. But meritorious sorrow is a meritorious act in us; therefore it is caused by prevenient grace; therefore they are not simultaneous in nature. But if this is so, then the same thing returns: because then the intensification of sorrow follows upon the intensification of grace. And then it will be asked concerning the intensification of grace, what is the cause of its intensification, as before.

§ 3. Again, it is certain that one does not grieve meritoriously before one wills to grieve; but Augustine says that grace preveniently causes us to will; therefore it does not preveniently cause us to grieve; therefore a greater sorrow is due to greater grace, and a lesser to a lesser; and then the difficulty will return again.

§ Response. It must be said to this that the cause of intensification is twofold, namely the efficient cause, and that which is by way of preparation and disposition in the subject. And the efficient cause does not seem to be any other than God. But the preparing and disposing cause in the subject is on the part of man. And I well concede that grace preveniently causes the actual sorrow which is in contrition, just as a habit prevents the acts which it informs. But what that sorrow is, whether sensible or rational, was partly evident in another disputation which was held concerning contrition, and again it will be evident below in this same disputation.

§ I say therefore to the first that contrition does not have a sufficient and efficient cause...

...in the subject, but it has a preparing and disposing cause: and this suffices for intensification, when the efficient is not lacking, as is evident when, with an equal combustible present, a greater heat flares up in dry wood than in green wood.

§ To the next it must be said that it is indeed true that contrition is the cause of justification and salvation; but it is not generally true that whatever is the cause of a cause is the cause of the effect, unless it is understood in the same mode in which it is a cause. And thus nothing prohibits a cause of justification and salvation from being in the subject, but by way of disposition and preparation, and not by way of efficient cause and form. And this is what Augustine says on Matthew: Something precedes in sinners by which, although they are not yet justified, they are nevertheless made worthy of justification; and conversely, something precedes in others by which they are worthy of blinding.

§ To the next it must be said that attrition and other preparatory acts are a cause, yet in the mode which has been stated: and it is clear to anyone that that argument does not hold.

§ To what is objected against the other part, it must be said that although God holds Himself in one way toward all, yet not all hold themselves in one way toward Him in receiving the grace of contrition: and the diversity of the preparation that was mentioned makes the diversity.

§ To the next it must be said that a multiform effect is not from one simple uniform cause; but if it has multiple causes, according to a different mode of causality nothing prohibits that effect from being multiform; and so it is in contrition, whose multiformity is caused by the multiformity of the recipients, as has been said.

Articulus 31 — How Great Contrition Ought To Be

How great ought contrition to be?

§ Thirdly, it is asked concerning the quantity of contrition, namely, how great ought it to be?

§ It seems, however, that the minimum suffices: § 1. For the minimum is conjoined with grace; and the minimum grace deletes all sins; therefore minimal contrition suffices to delete all sins. Since therefore the deletion of sin is the effect of contrition, it seems that the minimum contrition suffices.

§ 2. Again, minimal charity suffices for the expulsion of all sin, and for resisting any temptation. But minimal contrition is conjoined to charity; therefore it suffices to delete all sins and to resist every subsequent temptation. But it is given for nothing else than to delete sin; therefore it seems that the minimum suffices.

§ 3. Again, minimal contrition has grace and every virtue; but nothing is required for the crushing of sin except that the contrary of any sin, which is virtue, be in the subject; therefore it seems that through the minimum all sin is excluded by the virtue contrary to any sin; therefore the minimum suffices, as it seems.

§ But on the contrary it seems that the minimum does not suffice: because

§ 1. It is thus commanded, Jer. 6:26: Make for yourself the mourning of an only son, a bitter lamentation. But the mourning for an only son is not the minimum; therefore since the mourning of the contrite ought to be so great, it seems that the minimum contrition does not suffice.

§ 2. Again, Romans 6:19: I speak a human thing, because of the infirmity of your flesh, etc. There Augustine says in the Gloss [560] that we ought to exhibit to God as much...

...as to sin; although we ought to exhibit infinitely more because of the dignity of virtue. But it is certain that minimal contrition does not mean this. Therefore it seems that the minimum does not suffice.

§ 3. Again, on that verse of Psalm 118:127: I have loved thy commandments above gold and topaz, Augustine says that charity loves the law of the Lord more than cupidity loves gold and topaz. But it is certain that contrition is informed by such charity. Therefore it seems that the quantity of contrition ought to be above all the pleasure of sin; therefore the minimum does not suffice, as it seems.

§ Again, it seems it can be further proved that contrition must be infinite: because § 1. However great the pleasure and the harm of sin was, so great or greater ought to be the contrition deleting the sin. But in sin something was loved, on account of which the infinite good, which is God, was lost; therefore it seems that the contrition deleting it must be with infinite sorrow and contrition: therefore the minimum does not suffice.

§ 2. Again, Revelation 18:7: As much as she hath glorified herself and lived in delicacies, so much torment and sorrow give ye to her. And in Deuteronomy 25:2 it is said that according to the measure of the sin shall the measure also of the stripes be. But the measure of the glorification and of the sin is according to Him against Whom it is committed. But it is committed against God, and God is infinite; therefore the measure of the sin is infinite. And Anselm also proves this in the book Cur Deus homo [561]. Therefore it seems that the contrition which excludes that sin ought to be infinite.

§ BUT ON THE CONTRARY it again seems that:

§ 1. The sorrow of contrition is, as it were, the least of all sorrows that are sustained in this life. For it is certain that that whiteness is the minimum which has the most admixture of blackness; therefore that is the minimum of all sorrows which has the most admixture of joy. But such is the sorrow of contrition; therefore it is the minimum. That the sorrow of contrition is such is evident from Augustine saying that the penitent should grieve, and rejoice concerning his sorrow [562].

§ 2. Again, in many other troubles we sensibly experience greater sorrows; therefore it seems, since experience is the most certain judgment of sorrow, that there are greater sorrows even in such things.

§ 3. If, however, you say that the sorrow is maximal, but is not felt: this will be against the Philosopher in Book VII of the Ethics, where he says that every pleasure is a certain producing into a sensible nature. But it is certain that since opposites are produced around the same thing, sadness too is produced around a sensible nature. Since therefore sorrow is sadness about a contrary, it seems that all sorrow is around a sensible nature. But it is certain that that in which sorrow is by essence, that is what grieves. Since therefore it is in the sense, the sense alone has sorrow; and thus sorrow is felt, if it exists.

§ 4. Again, the Philosopher in Book VI of the Topics reproves the definition of sorrow given thus: Sorrow is the distancing of natural parts with force. Because in this way even insensible things would grieve. But this definition is praised: Sorrow is the sense of the division of a continuum. Therefore it seems that sorrow supposes sense; and thus there will not be a sorrow which is not felt. It seems therefore that in contrition the sorrow is minimal: because less is felt there than even in the beating of a rod, in that none of the sensible parts is divided.

§ 5. Again, on the part of the intellect the Philosopher says that it is unfitting that any of the knowable things should escape our notice, possessing the noblest habits; therefore also on the part of the affection, possessing the noblest passions and affections, it is unfitting that this should escape our notice; therefore if anyone has the maximal sorrow in contrition, it cannot escape his notice, as it seems.

§ Response. To this it is not difficult to respond.

§ For it must be said that in contrition the minimum sorrow is spoken of in a twofold way: namely, minimum on the part of the passion according to the sense, or of the action (because, as was said above, the penitent acts his sorrow, and is the cause of it); or minimum according to reason. If it is called minimum according to the experience of the senses, that suffices, provided it is of contrition. Because that sorrow, along with its quantity, varies rather according to the diversity of the constitution of the penitents, than according to the quantity of the detestation of the sin. And the reason for this, as far as it seemed to suffice for the present treatise, was had in the question immediately preceding this one. But if it is called minimum according to reason—in such a way, however, that the essence of the sorrow which is of contrition is preserved in it—I still say that it suffices. But if this is not preserved in it, then it does not suffice, because there is no contrition there. But I say that the minimum according to reason suffices: because, as we said above, in the sorrow of contrition three things are considered, namely the informing grace, and the sorrow as action and passion, and the object of the sorrow or the cause of the passion. And through any grace whatsoever, however minimal, it has an infinite power to delete sin; and therefore it suffices for the deletion of sin as to the whole fault and the eternal punishment; although the penitent remains a debtor to temporal punishment on account of the smallness of the sorrow as action and passion: because that sorrow could be so great that it would delete the whole punishment due to the sin. Hence a greater one would be better than a smaller one; but nevertheless the smaller suffices.

§ Therefore it must be said to the first three objections that what is concluded is true concerning the deletion of the fault and the eternal punishment communicating with it: but it does not suffice for the deletion of temporal punishment. And penance is not only ordained against sin so that it may delete eternal punishment with the fault, but also so that it may delete the temporal.

§ To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this is said with respect to the measure of the sorrow, which is also in minimal contrition. But this measure is that one should grieve more for the sin through which God was lost, than for any temporal thing. Hence it is not said that he should make for himself the mourning of an only son, on the grounds that it ought not to be even greater, but because in external sign it could not be compared to any greater thing. In the text here, in the words of Augustine, more is said, namely that he should be prepared to do all things for recovering the life of the soul, which he would do for avoiding the death of the body: for this measure is required for the minimum sorrow of contrition; however, there will be a fuller question about this below. And therefore, because minimal contrition is thus measured, what was adduced is not unfitting.

§ To the next it must be said that this is understood concerning the disposition of the will, and not that we ought not to exhibit ourselves more to God. But that disposition of the will is that we should serve God just as freely and uncoercedly, and pleasurably according to reason, as we exhibited ourselves to sin. Yet to no sin did we so exhibit ourselves that we would not have been separated from it out of the fear of death; but nevertheless neither death nor life ought to separate us from the charity of Christ.

§ To the next it must be said that charity loves the law of God infinitely more as to appreciation than cupidity loves gold and topaz: because it loves it above life, which cupidity does not do, which loves gold for the sake of the sufficiency of life, as Boethius and Augustine say; although perhaps cupidity experiences more sensible pleasure in gold: and the reason for this will be evident below.

§ To the next it must be said that the minimal sorrow is of infinite power, as was said before, and also of infinite estimation in value: because just as he lost the infinite good, so now he appreciates that same good above every price, even that of bodily life, since he loves God above all things: because unless he does this, without doubt it will not be the sorrow of contrition.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that a twofold equality is noted in that authority, namely in genus and in species. In genus it is noted regarding exterior lamentation, so that just as by inordinately offering himself he gloried in sins, so then by ordinately repenting he might humble himself. In species, however, equality is noted regarding interior mourning, so that just as by glorying in sins he preferred a temporal thing to God, so now in receiving God he would place the loss of God under no price, not even under the price of his own life or that of his relatives.

§ 2. To the first objection, that it is the least of all [sorrows], it must be said that that conclusion does not follow from the reason introduced: because no joy remits sorrow, unless it is contrary to that sorrow: just as heat is not remitted by humidity, which is not contrary to it, but rather by coldness, which is contrary to it. For joy about sorrow is not contrary to that sorrow, and thus it does not remit it. Moreover, this was held above, as well as how there can be the sorrow of affliction and yet it be voluntary.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that we are not speaking here of sensible sorrow, but of rational sorrow: and we experience that this is greater regarding sins than even in the piercing of our vital organs. This is evident, because we choose rather for our vitals to be pierced than [to commit] a sin: therefore we detest sin more than the piercing of vitals; and according to the quantity of that detestation is the quantity of sorrow in contrition.

§ 4. To the first counter-objection, it must be said that the Philosopher [563] speaks there only of natural sorrow, and not of that which is through grace, because he could not know the latter through reason. And I readily concede that "sorrow" is said almost equivocally of sensible or natural sorrow, and of rational sorrow: because, since the rational nature does not have a contrary in nature, the Philosopher calls it impassible, except perhaps accidentally in the body; and yet our faith posits that it suffers naturally in itself in the fire.

§ 5. But I say "naturally" means the same as to suffer in its own nature. Now, as to what the Philosopher says, that pleasure is something "brought about in the sensible soul" [564], he takes pleasure in the most proper sense, according as it changes and alters; or rather, according to him, insofar as it is the terminus of alteration from some passion, as he himself says in the tenth book of the Ethics [565]. But taken more commonly, it indicates the rest of the will in an attained desirable object: and in this way there is rational pleasure.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that he is speaking of natural sorrow.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that sorrow does not escape our notice: but it escapes our notice whether it is of contrition or not: because we know that we detest sin and sorrow over what is committed, but we do not know that we have grace. Because, as is said in Ecclesiastes 9:1: "Man knows not whether he is worthy of love or hatred." [566]

§ 8. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 32 — Whether Contrition Ought To Be Equal For All Sins

Must contrition be equal for all sins?

§ 9. Fourthly it is asked, whether contrition must be equal for all sins?

§ 10. And it seems not: because 1. As was held, contrition is a rational sorrow. Now reason estimates the sins concerning which one must sorrow; but the things estimated are not equal: therefore the sorrow for them is not equal.

§ 11. 2. Also, there is greater sorrow for a mortal sin than for a venial one, on account of the distance between mortal and venial: therefore, since there is also a distance [in gravity] among mortal sins, the sorrow will be greater for one than for another.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Contrition is entirely about this, that God is lost through sin: but this is equally the case through every mortal sin: therefore contrition for any mortal sin is equal, as it seems.

562. Augustine, De vera et falsa poenitentia, ch. 13.

§ 14. 2. Also, contrition deleting fault and penalty is momentary: but in a single moment it cannot be greater for one thing and lesser for another: therefore it seems that it is equal for all.

§ 15. 3. Also, whatever acts upon many things simultaneously, in such a way that it does not act upon them individually, does not act upon one thing more and another less, so far as it pertains to the part of the agent itself. The sorrow of contrition acts upon sin in this way: therefore, so far as it pertains to the part of the acting sorrow, it does not act upon one thing less. The proof of the first premise is: because if it were to act upon one thing more and another less, so far as it pertains to itself, it would be necessary that the action be divided by reason of those things, and thus it would not act upon all things simultaneously, which is contrary to the hypothesis. The proof of the second premise is: because in contrition sin is not deleted after sin, but all are deleted simultaneously through the act of contrition.

§ 16. Answer. It must be said that contrition is twofold, namely, that which operates in the justification of the ungodly, and that which crushes sin regarding the debt of penalty, although not in the fault. The first contrition is a movement of free will regarding sin, and this movement is directed at all sins simultaneously; and it is the same as the detestation of mortal sin insofar as it is such. That detestation is considered in two ways, namely in act, or in the order of reason eliciting the act. If in act: then there is an undivided action regarding all sins, and not more for one and less for another. But if it is considered in the order of eliciting reason, then there is greater detestation for a greater sin, and lesser for a lesser one in the habit of reason.

§ 17. And this distinction is the same as the one [which says] that actual sorrow is considered in two ways, namely on the part of the object, and on the part of the agent. On the part of the object, indeed, it is equally about all simultaneously in sum. On the part of the agent, however, the order of reason is presupposed. But contrition which is the destroyer of penalty is successive: and this is greater for a greater sin, and lesser for a lesser sin.

§ 18. And through this the solution to all arguments is clear, all of which proceed according to the parts of this distinction.

Articulus 33 — Whether Contrition Can Be Brief And Finite

Can contrition be brief and finite?

§ 19. Fifthly, it is asked concerning its quantity with respect to time.

§ 20. And it seems that it can be brief and finite with respect to time: because § 21. 1. If the parts of any whole constitute it simultaneously, when one fails the whole fails. Now penance is constituted in this way by contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Since therefore satisfaction is finite, and confession is finite, it seems that penance is then finished in time: therefore contrition too.

563. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, IV, dist. 16.

§ 22. 2. Also, no medicine is extended beyond the disease. But contrition is a certain medicine: therefore it is not extended beyond the disease. But the disease is often deleted in time regarding fault and penalty, such that a man may not have any mortal fault, and may not be a debtor of any penalty: therefore he ought not to have a sacramental medicine at that point: therefore neither contrition, which is the sacramental medicine for actual sin.

§ 23. 3. Also, nothing is crushed which in no way exists: therefore a sin which in no way exists cannot be crushed either: and contrition is only regarding sins: therefore it seems that contrition is then finished. That an actual mortal sin is in no way possible to exist is proved from what has been said, that this man can become immune from mortal fault and penalty.

§ 24. 4. Also, God is more prone to showing mercy than to condemning: which is evident from the fact that He remits the entire fault and eternal penalty, and demands only corporal or temporal penalty: therefore He Himself does not desire our penalties when we are not debtors. But this man can be a debtor to no penalty: therefore not to interior penalty either: therefore God does not desire it either: therefore the penance of contrition is finished in him.

§ 26. 5. Also, it was held above that penance restores one to the pristine state of innocence. Now it is established that an innocent person is not bound to be contrite: therefore neither is he who has fulfilled what he owed for sin: therefore the sorrow of contrition is finished in him according to time.

§ 27. But if this is conceded, it will be: 1. Against Augustine, who says this: "Let him always sorrow, and rejoice in his sorrow: and where sorrow is finished, penance is finished: and where penance is finished, life is finished" [567]. It seems that contrition or the sorrow of contrition ought not to be finite in this life.

§ 28. 2. Also, Job 3:19 says: "The small and great are there, and the servant is free from his master." Expounding on this, Gregory says that he who is once a servant of sin will not be free from sorrow except in the next life [568]. Therefore it seems that sorrow is not finished in this life.

§ 29. 3. Also, no one knows whether he is worthy of hatred or love: therefore neither does he know whether his sins have been remitted: but while that doubt exists, there ought always to be sorrow for perpetrated sin. Since therefore that doubt is extended through one's whole life, the sorrow ought to persevere through one's whole life: therefore the sorrow of contrition is not finished in time.

§ 30. 4. Also, let us posit that it is revealed to someone that his sins have been forgiven in penalty and in fault. And if it is then asked of him whether he sorrows for the perpetrated sin, it is established that he will answer, 'yes'. Since therefore he is not lying, he truly sorrows: but he does not sorrow except with the sorrow of contrition, because every rational sorrow for perpetrated sins which is informed by grace is the sorrow of contrition. Therefore he still has the sorrow of contrition: and thus he will always repent until death: therefore the sorrow of contrition always perseveres in him: therefore contrition is not finished in him before death.

§ 31. 5. Also, the Saints assign the cause why God punishes eternally for the sin of a single hour, saying: because a man sinning mortally commits himself to a sin from which he cannot of himself be separated in his own eternity, that is, in his life; and because, so far as it pertains to himself, he sins in his own eternity, God punishes him eternally in God's eternity. Therefore, by a similar reasoning, through the same justice, if contrition commutes eternal penalty, it is necessary that he himself punish the sin in his own eternity: but his own eternity is the whole time of this life: therefore the sorrow of contrition ought to be made in the whole time of this life.

§ 32. I answer that the latter objections must be agreed with: because the sorrow of contrition is not finished in this life, but is finished in the next. And thus penance and contrition are of infinite quantity regarding the eternity of man: because if he were to live eternally in this life, he would sorrow eternally for perpetrated sin.

§ 33. Therefore it must be said to the first, that penance is not equally saved in those parts, but properly in contrition: and this has been verified above as much as we could. And therefore penance in contrition has the eternity of man, although not eternity simply speaking, because penance is a mean between a universal whole and an integral whole, and its parts are a mean between homogeneous and heterogeneous parts: and this whole point was explained above.

§ 34. To the next it must be said that it is impossible for the disease to be entirely finished: for it remains, as Master Hugh of St. Victor says, regarding the bond of perpetual detestation in the memory of the perpetrated offense, insofar as it was perpetrated. And therefore that [objection] is founded upon a falsehood; and the reason for this will be clear in the solution to the subsequent objection.

§ 36. To which it must be said that a certain penalty of sin is assessed by the priest, and a certain one follows the sin in the penitent. And the first indeed is capable of being finished, but the second is not: and this is the perpetual detestation of sin, which the Lord indicated, John 8:11, when He said: "Go, and now sin no more" , that is, will not to sin, which is to detest sin.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that penalty is twofold, namely afflicting only, and promoting along with affliction. And it is true that the Lord does not delight in penalty insofar as it is afflicting; but He well desires our penalty insofar as it is promoting. And such is the penalty of contrition, and it is a medicine which is simultaneously against the disease, as persevering away from the disease, and it fittingly remains through one's whole life.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that penance does not restore one to the pristine state of dignity, but to the pristine state of merit and of immunity from sin regarding fault and exterior penalty here, but not regarding absolution from every penalty, except insofar as it is extended through one's whole life, as has been said.

Articulus 34 — How Great The Quantity Of Contrition Ought To Be With Respect To The Will To Sin Or Not To Sin

How great ought the quantity of contrition to be with respect to the will of sinning or not sinning?

§ 39. Sixthly and lastly, it is asked concerning the quantity of contrition with respect to the will of sinning or not sinning.

§ 40. Now it seems to be accepted here from the Letter [of the Sentences] that 1. The quantity of contrition ought to be so great, that not even for the ransom of this natural life would one will to sin. Since therefore life is possessed more dearly than any other things, it seems that for no other thing ought one to will to sin.

§ 41. 2. Also, the Apostle, to Romans 8:35: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" etc. Therefore nothing can be preferred among created goods or evils which is to be put before God: therefore it seems that he who puts anything before [God] is not in charity: therefore he is not contrite. Therefore the quantity of contrition ought to be so great that for no prosperous or adverse thing would one will to sin.

§ 42. 3. Also, Joel 2:12: "Convert to me with all your heart, in fasting, and in weeping, and in mourning." Therefore nothing is to be retained of the whole heart which is not converted in contrition to God, setting aside all separating things. If therefore one's conscience tells someone that he would rather be separated from God through mortal sin than see himself or any of his dear ones hanged, or even killed more foully, he would not be contrite.

§ 43. 4. Also, in simony there is sin because what is unpriceable is put under a price. Therefore wherever this occurs, there is sin, although not simony. But he who on account of something difficult or prosperous would will to be separated from God, places God as sellable for that thing: therefore he puts what is unpriceable under a price: therefore he sins. And one sinning actually and mortally is not contrite; therefore he himself is not contrite.

§ 44. 5. Also, Augustine in the book of Confessions: "He loves You less who loves anything along with You" [569]. Therefore it is not permitted to love anything equally with God in affection or effect: therefore much less is it permitted to love anything in affection or effect above God. But everyone loves something in effect above God who would rather be separated from God than lose some created thing: therefore every such person sins mortally: therefore he is not contrite. Therefore for contrition there is demanded the conscience of that will which, for no prosperous or adverse thing, wills to be separated from God. This is held through what is said in Deuteronomy 6:5: "You shall love the Lord your God with your whole heart," etc. For if even in his heart he puts anything before God, it is established that he does not love with his whole heart: therefore he does not have charity: therefore neither does he have contrition.

566. Augustine, De Trinitate, VI, 8.

§ 46. If perhaps you say that this precept is not given to be fulfilled on the way [in this life], but in the homeland [in heaven], as Augustine says [570]. On the contrary: It is commonly said that there is a totality of the way, and a totality of the homeland. And the totality of the way is said by all to be that nothing is put before God in the heart; whereas the totality of the homeland is that the whole heart, through thought and affection, is directed toward Him. And it is fulfilled on the way according to the totality of the way. But this person in his heart prefers something to God: therefore he does not love: therefore he is not contrite either. And you will find much disputed concerning this in the third book of the Sentences, in the questions concerning love [571].

§ 47. But if this is said, it seems difficult to some: because § 48. 1. There are many in whom the signs of penance appear, yet to whom if it were proposed that they would see themselves and all their dear ones suffer foul deaths, they would rather choose to sin: therefore it seems that they are not bound to these things.

§ 49. 2. Also, in love there is something to which the perfect is bound, and something which suffices for the imperfect. Therefore it is so in contrition as well: therefore, since the perfect cannot be more contrite except by placing nothing before God, it seems that a lesser contrition suffices for the imperfect: therefore he can put something before God, as it seems.

§ 50. 3. Also, charity grows and is perfected, and sometimes it is imperfect: therefore contrition too. But contrition cannot grow beyond the aforementioned state: therefore it seems that a beginning contrition is short of that [state]; but it cannot be short of it except by placing something before God: therefore a beginning contrition can place something before God. Since therefore that suffices for salvation, just as beginning charity does, it seems that the contrition which gives salvation does not demand that quantity by which nothing is put before God.

§ 51. Answer. Here one must speak cautiously, so that the truth is saved and no snare of despair is cast.

§ 52. I say therefore without prejudice, that the reasons first adduced conclude an irrefragable truth according to the way of our faith and Catholic doctrine: yet a priest ought not to demand this kind of quantity such that the penitent must profess it before him, but he ought to suppose it in him habitually through signs, even if perhaps the penitent, on account of his recent conversion, does not yet experience the same in act. If, however, the penitent professes it spontaneously, and says he has such a disposition, he is to be encouraged in it. Because blessed Gregory says in his Moralia that a man is made bold to suffer for Christ from the fact that he frequently imposes terrible things on himself, and strengthens himself in his heart to endure them [572]. But if the penitent should profess that he is in ambiguity as to whether he would yield or endure rather than sin: I think that the matter is safe, because the cause of that ambiguity is natural fear, which we experience in act more than charity. Therefore such a person already has a sign of charity, which causes the ambiguity; and with the help of God such a person would endure—without whose help nothing can be done meritoriously. But I say that ambiguity suffices: because no one is certain whether he would yield or endure, as Augustine says in the book On Holy Virginity [573]. If, however, from a deliberate conscience he should say he is certain that he would rather sin: I do not believe this person is contrite, nor does he perceive any remission of sins. Yet he is not to be cast away, because the custom of attrition induces contrition, just as servile fear induces initial and filial fear.

§ 53. To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that many by the grace of God are in ambiguity: and also having hope in the consolation of God's help of not returning [to sin], although future falls are unknown. And therefore this is not terrible.

§ 54. To the next it must be said that in interior love the perfect is not separated from the imperfect, but in exterior signs. But this quantity of contrition is entirely in the interior will and conscience: and therefore both the perfect and the imperfect are bound to it.

§ 56. To the next it must be said that a beginner by this posits charity, loves God before all things, and to have Him above all things and for His own sake. But he grows in the vigor of meriting and in assimilation to God's goodness. And similarly, contrition does not grow in that quantity, because this is demanded for every contrition, but it grows in other ways, namely regarding its essence and its potency to purge the relics of sin.

Articulus 35 — Whether There Is Some State Beyond Which Contrition Is Neither Intensified Nor Grows

Is there some state beyond which contrition is not intensified, nor does it grow?

§ 57. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, A, § 4, near the end: And this with desire, because he recovers an infinite life. [574]

§ 58. For it was held that contrition is intensified and can grow. Therefore let it be asked: Is there some state beyond which it does not grow, but stands still in it?

§ 59. And it seems that there is: because 1. The Philosopher says that for all things constituted by nature there is a limit and a formula for magnitude and increase therefore, since those things which belong to grace are more ordered, it seems that those things which belong to grace also have a state of their perfection.

§ 60. 2. Also, as is said in Revelation 21:16, the sides of the city are equal: and the sides are virtues: therefore the virtues are equal. Therefore if any one stands still and does not grow beyond, all the others will stand still: but charity stands still: therefore all the others too: therefore contrition too. Proof that charity stands still: for Augustine says that charity, nourished, is increased; and increased, is perfected; and after perfection nothing is added to it [575]. Therefore the proposition stands.

568. Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job.

§ 61. 3. Also, Macrobius on the Dream of Scipio, following Plato, says that virtues do not progress beyond the state of the virtues of a purified soul, insofar as they are in a man [576]. Therefore they stand still there: and contrition is of some virtue: therefore it will stand still in that state.

§ 62. 4. Also, nothing is perfect unless it has its ultimate according to nature: if therefore contrition will not have its ultimate according to nature, it will always be imperfect: but always growing, it will never have its ultimate according to nature: therefore always growing, it will always be imperfect, which is unfitting.

§ 63. 5. Also, it is established that human virtue is finite. Let it be therefore that a man is contrite out of his whole virtue, for this is possible: since therefore his whole virtue is finite, its act will be finite, and so great that there cannot be a greater one from that virtue: therefore it then stands still. Therefore there is some state beyond which it cannot grow.

§ 64. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Bernard: "To stand still in the way of God is to go backwards" therefore there is no standing state in the way of God, as it seems: therefore any merit whatever can grow: therefore contrition too.

§ 65. 2. Also, Seneca: "There you cease to be good, where you cease wanting to become better." [577] Now it is established that this will is not an empty desire. Therefore one can become better in any good whatsoever: therefore in contrition too: therefore contrition can always grow.

§ 66. 3. Also, in the reward concerning men there is no state which cannot have under God a better and higher state: therefore neither is there in the merit ordained to the reward. But one of the merits is contrition: therefore in contrition there is no state beyond which it could not grow.

§ 67. Solution. It must be said that there is no state of contrition in which it cannot grow; yet every act of contrition is a state, but it can be greater both in the same man and in another.

§ 68. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that things are perfected in two ways, namely from the ultimate of their nature, both on the part of essence and on the part of quantity: and in this way natural things are perfected in the form and quantity due to them. But certain things are perfected from the fact that in assimilation they approach more to something that is substantially such per se. And in this way moral things, and especially divine things, are perfected through grace and merits. And because these are infinitely distant from that [exemplar] which they approach through assimilation: therefore there is no state of that good which could not be greater and better.

§ 69. To the next it must be said that charity does not stand still: whence Chrysostom says that charity flows from the fountain of God more and does not stand still, but always progresses or regresses . And therefore its perfection is not a standing still in some state, but rather in the exclusion of imperfection regarding signs: then it is said to be perfect when it suffices for the works and signs of perfection.

569. Augustine, Confessions, X.29.40 (paraphrased).

§ 70. To the next it must be said that in the same way the virtues of a purified soul are called those virtues which perfect the soul in such a state in which nothing is manifested of a passion contrary to virtue: yet it is not called [of a soul] "purified" for the reason that it cannot grow in approach to the exemplar virtue.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that "ultimate" is said in two ways, namely essentially completing, and only concerning this is it true what is objected. "Ultimate" is also called that to which there is an approach and which alone is simply perfect. But everything else is more perfect by as much as it approaches it more: and concerning this, what he says is not true: because such things have perfection which is simply in one only, and in others through participation and assimilation of it: just as the Philosophers and Saints also said that intelligences are all the more perfected and united and made simple, by as much as they participate more in the goodnesses which are in the first cause. And in such things each one is perfect, but it can always be more perfect.

§ 72. To the next it must be said that potency is twofold, or better, there is a consideration of potency according to itself, and according to comparison to a perfecting habit. For if the potency is considered according to itself, then the objection introduced necessarily concludes. But if it is considered in comparison to the habit to which it is conjoined: either that habit perfects only by a created virtue, as every acquired and innate habit; or it perfects simultaneously by a created and uncreated virtue, by the fact that the virtue of the uncreated essence is conjoined to it. If in the first way, it is still true what the objection concludes. But if in the second way: then it has no force. Because although in itself the virtue is finite, yet its capacity always grows in itself, from the fact that it receives a greater sanctifying grace: and then it is capable of more. And because it thus makes good use of the grace received, a greater grace is given to it again, by which having been received, it is capable of a more ample act of merit: and there will never be such a state of merit in which man cannot grow.

§ 73. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 36 — Whether Confession Ought To Be Integral

Ought confession to be integral?

§ 74. Then, through the preceding questions had concerning almsgiving, all things are clear up to that place, there, A, § 2, where he says: Let him beware lest, led by shame, he divide confession within himself, etc. [578]

§ 75. For it is asked here concerning the integrity of confession.

§ 76. And it seems that it does not need to be integral: 1. For confession is on account of the judgment of sin: but an equal or even better judgment is made concerning sin when one part is laid bare to one, and another part to another, because "the mind intent on many things is less attentive to single things." Since therefore division is useful for a better judgment of sin, it seems that a divided confession is better than an integral one.

570. Augustine, De perfectione iustitiae hominis or similar.

§ 77. 2. Also, there is no danger in penance: because if each one enjoins a competent penance concerning the things he has heard, the penance collected together will be competent and condign for all. Therefore it deletes the sin, although it is divided.

§ 78. 3. If perhaps you say, that just as is said in the Letter, this happens on account of shame: because one is more ashamed to say all things before one person, than dividedly before many. On the contrary: Shame is accidental to confession. But a thing ought not to be varied in its substance on account of an accident. Therefore on account of shame it cannot be that a confession is not divided, provided otherwise it is a confession.

§ 79. 4. Also, if this happens on account of shame: then also other things inducing greater shame ought to be commanded to the one confessing. Now it is established that one is much more ashamed before one priest than before another: therefore it seems that it ought to be commanded to him that he confess to the one before whom he is most ashamed—which is false: therefore shame is not the cause.

§ 80. 5. Also, it is possible for someone to divide confession not from the cause which is assigned in the Letter, namely so that he praises himself through hypocrisy: because someone can do this out of ignorance, or out of the quantity of his contrition, because he wishes that more [priests] would enjoin more [penances], and thus he would better satisfy. Therefore it seems that then such a person could divide his confession.

§ 81. 6. Also, what he says seems to many to be impossible. For Psalm 18:13 says: "Who understands sins? Cleanse me from my hidden faults." Let us posit therefore, that someone in his confession has forgotten some things, which he would gladly confess if he had them in memory; and after he has confessed all that he had in memory, the priest departs from him, or conversely he from the priest, such that he cannot opportunely approach him; and then he remembers some things which he did not confess. Then therefore I ask, whether the confession previously made was valid, or not? If it was valid: then he is not bound to repeat it: therefore he can say those things which he has in memory and previously did not have to another [priest]: therefore a divided confession is valid. But if it was not valid: then from the [subsequent] remembrance no confession is valid in which not all things even forgotten are said, which is to damn almost all men, and therefore this is absurd.

§ 82. 7. If perhaps you say that it was valid: but immediately as he remembers more, it begins not to be valid, unless he confesses those things which he remembers, and also those previously said, to some single person. On the contrary: That which is not conjoined to something in time nor in essence, seems not to destroy it. But the subsequent remembrance of sins is not conjoined to the previously had confession: therefore it does not destroy it. Therefore if it was valid before this, it also is valid afterwards, as it seems.

§ 83. 8. If you say that this reason is not valid: because a subsequent sin mortifies prior good deeds done, to which however it is not conjoined essentially or in time, but in the same subject only. On the contrary: That a subsequent sin mortifies prior good deeds done, happens on account of the contrariety of fault and grace. But a prior confession and a subsequent remembrance do not have this kind of contrariety: therefore one does not destroy the other.

§ 84. 9. Also, if from a subsequent remembrance he is obliged to the confession of preceding ones: it is asked, whence does this happen? For this could not happen unless because the previously made confession was not valid, or now is not valid from the time that [the memory] of more...

remembers. If it was not valid previously: then that part of penance is deficient: therefore true penance is deficient: but nothing except true penance is deletive of sin: therefore sin was not deleted in him previously, which is false: because it can be that all things are deleted, both those which he previously confessed, and those which he subsequently remembered. If, however, it was valid previously, and now is not valid: it seems that this is from the contrariety of the subsequent remembrance to the confession: but a subsequent remembrance is a certain good, and a previously held confession is a certain good: therefore a good is contrary to a good, which is absurd.

§ 2. Further it is asked, Whether, supposing that he has perfected the penance previously enjoined, and afterwards remembers some things, he is bound to confess the whole anew, or not?

§ 3. 1. If so, since confession is only on account of the penance concerning the whole: therefore he is punished twice on account of that sin: which is false, since a double tribulation does not arise, as was held above. If not: therefore he will not receive penance except for a part: but he is not bound to confess except for the assessment of penance: therefore he is not bound to confess except that part of the sins for which he did not receive penance: therefore he can divide confession, which is against the Letter.

§ 4. 2. Item, From this a certain perplexity seems to be generated: for there is scarcely anyone who simultaneously remembers all his sins. Let us posit, therefore, someone successively recollecting some things which he had not confessed, for a hundred times or more, always after some interval of time, and that he is always passing from place to place, where he cannot have the opportunity of the same confessor: this man, therefore, is always bound to repeat his confession from the beginning: therefore he will scarcely ever rest secure in his conscience that he has confessed well: and this is difficult to say: therefore it seems that in some case a confession can be divided.

§ 5. But against this it is objected: because 1. If confession is divided, none of the priests hearing it will know the total quantity of the disease: therefore no due satisfaction will be enjoined upon him: therefore such a confession is not valid.

§ 6. 2. Item, Penance is enjoined by way of medicine against the habit of an old sin: but if confession is divided, no one sufficiently knows the habit: therefore no one sufficiently knows how to counter the disease of the sin: therefore such a confession is not valid.

572. Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job.

§ 7. 3. Item, In bodily medicine, if some sick man suffers from diverse kinds of sicknesses, and one physician knew one, and another knew another, it happens that the sick man is endangered: because one physician would only operate against one sickness, and then perhaps the other would be aggravated: therefore it is similar in spiritual sicknesses: therefore one priest who is a spiritual physician ought to know all the diseases.

§ 8. Solution. It must be said that a confession divided on purpose is worth nothing, as is said in the Letter, but rather causes harm: because it accumulates the sin of simulation, as is said in the Letter: and the causes of this are most properly touched upon in the objections lastly introduced: and it is not difficult to collect them into three, according to the number of things that were objected.

§ 9. It must be said, therefore, to the first, that the judgment of sin is twofold, namely, the judgment of sin as to what the sin is, and the judgment of the proportion of the whole sin to condign penance. And the first judgment is in the confessor proceeding from hearing: and concerning this alone is what is objected true. But there is a second judgment, which is more substantial to confession, and this cannot be made by anyone, unless he hears the total quantity of the sin simultaneously: and if there are many [priests], such that each one hears the whole, then it is true that it is better done by many than by one: but nevertheless it is impossible for it to be done by many, if each of them does not know the total quantity of the sin.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that the priest, since he is bound to correct the endangered penitent, intends by works of justice to habituate him to the contrary: and therefore this is impossible, unless he knows the whole old habit. But that question proceeds as if satisfaction were imposed on sins individually and divisibly in penance: and this is not true.

§ 11. To that which is objected concerning shame, it must be said that shame is twofold: one is a bodily passion which consists in the blushing of the body, and this is accidental to confession. There is also a rational shame, which is a certain confusion of oneself in the magnitude of the fault: concerning which it is said, Romans 6:21: What fruit did you have then in those things of which you are now ashamed? And this is substantial to confession, as is said in the Letter.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that a greater shame contributes to the well-being of confession: and because the precept is not about a better good, but only about what is necessary: therefore that is not commanded.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that although confession is separable from that shame which is a bodily passion, it is not, however, separable from that which is an interior confusion of the mind with a detestation of sin.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that such a confession is and was valid, because it is concerning all those things which were in memory: and yet he is bound to repeat it on account of that which he subsequently recalled to memory. For it does not follow, if it is valid, that he is not bound to repeat it: because it was valid for the state in which he then was, and intrinsically so. But that it is repeated, this is by reason of another state, and accidentally: because what is subsequently brought back to memory causes it not to be concerning every remembered sin, nor to be integrated.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that although the remembrance is not joined in act to the preceding confession, nevertheless that which is remembered makes it imperfect: because it is a part of those things which ought to be confessed, and it is lacking to the confession: but every such thing is imperfect, as the Philosopher says, to which something of its essentials is lacking: and therefore the preceding confession is imperfect, because it is not concerning all remembered things.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that it is not necessary that that which shows something to be imperfect be contrary to it: but it is indeed true that that which destroys another is intrinsically contrary to it: but a later remembrance does not destroy a previously held confession: because it was valid, and is valid, if that which is lacking is supplied to it. That this is true is clear thus, because a subtracted part is not contrary to the whole: and yet when it appears as subtracted, it shows that the whole is imperfect, and that it is perfected if it is added.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that if he fulfilled the penance previously enjoined, he ought to tell this itself along with the sins to the second priest if he cannot have the first priest, or to a third if he could not have the first or the second, and so on successively: and then he will not enjoin penance for the previously stated things, except insofar as what is now stated manifests to him a danger of habit in some sin, which danger the other priest could not understand, because he did not know the total quantity of the sin.

§ 18. From this it is further evident that a double tribulation does not arise, and yet he is bound to confess anew.

§ 19. To the next it must be said that no perplexity is generated, because he is not bound to confess except what is remembered: and this he can easily do: and if he recalls some past things to mind, let him tell them to the same [priest], or if to another, let him repeat the prior things: and this is not difficult, since they are in memory. But if he does not wish to study so much into the discussion of himself, so as to comprehend simultaneously all that he can, I think that he is damnably negligent, nor does he have sufficient care for his salvation.

§ 20. Hence, however, some have determined otherwise, saying that it suffices, along with what is remembered, to say the prior things in the genera of each, and that it is not necessary for them to be expressed in the individual instances of the genera: but I repute this to be contrary to the sayings of the Saints, and presumptuous.

Articulus 37 — Whether Hypocrisy Is Well Defined

Whether hypocrisy is well defined?

574. Peter Lombard, Sententiae IV.

§ 21. Next it is asked concerning this which it says, there, A, § 2, after the beginning: To tend toward hypocrisy.

§ 22. For we shall ask here incidentally five things concerning hypocrisy, namely: What is it? Second, Whether it is a special sin, or a general one conjoined to several others or to all? Third, In what works does it frequently appear? Fourth, How is it related to vainglory? Fifth and lastly, Whether it is always a mortal sin, or venial?

§ 23. To the first of these it is objected thus: Upon that of Matthew 6:16: Do not become like the hypocrites, sad, the Gloss says: A hypocrite is one who simulates what he is not, a representer of another person.

§ 24. But this definition seems not to be general: because 1. A hypocrite sometimes simulates what he is, or dissimulates what he is, namely when he boasts of a hidden good, or hides a hidden evil: and yet he is a hypocrite: therefore he does not always simulate what he is not.

§ 25. 2. Item, Simulation and dissimulation are related as opposites, just as similar and dissimilar: but the dissimilar is never similar insofar as it is such: therefore neither is dissimulation a simulation: but dissimulation is an act of the hypocrite, as Master Hugh of St. Victor says: therefore it is not always a simulation: therefore it is not a [good] definition.

§ 26. 3. Item, Master Hugh of St. Victor seems to posit four acts of penance, treating that of Daniel 7:6, concerning the leopard which had four wings, saying that the four wings of the hypocrite are boasting of a manifest good, excusing a manifest evil, simulating a hidden good, and dissimulating a hidden evil: therefore this is badly defined through simple simulation.

§ 27. 4. Item, Still otherwise it is objected against that definition: because simulating what is not happens sometimes to be done well, as for the sake of avoiding scandal: and then it is not evil: but it is certain that all hypocrisy is evil: therefore simulating what is not is not always hypocrisy.

§ 28. 5. Further, It seems that Joshua simulating flight, and the Savior the form of a pilgrim and a gardener, and by pretending to go further, simulated what they were not, and presented other persons: nor yet were they hypocrites: therefore that definition does not apply, as it seems.

§ 29. 6. Item, Since virtues are certain wills, or not without will, as the Philosopher says, it is certain that vices too are similarly certain wills: but a will receives its species and quality from its end and what is willed: therefore this ought to be posited here in the definition of hypocrisy: and this is not done: therefore the definition is bad.

§ 30. 7. Item, This same thing is clear by another reason: because Augustine says that all human perversity is to enjoy things to be used, and to use things to be enjoyed. But it is certain that one enjoying things to be used loves something temporal for its own sake, and more than God: since therefore this is in all human perversity, this will also be in hypocrisy:

575. Augustine, Tractates on the First Epistle of John.

therefore in hypocrisy something is loved for its own sake, from which it contracts both its species and notion: therefore this ought to have been posited in its notion.

§ 31. 8. Further, if it is asked, In what does pride differ from avarice, and these two from fornication? It will be answered, that it is with respect to the ends of the will: because avarice rests in riches, pride in dignities, and fornication in the pleasurable things of venery. Therefore it is thus in hypocrisy: but that with respect to which those things which are of the same genus differ, is in the place of the constitutive difference of the species, or is the difference itself: therefore it will hold similarly in hypocrisy: but it is certain that this is most potent in the definition and completes it: therefore this especially ought to be posited in it: but here it is not done so: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 32. Response. It must be said that the hypocrite is defined, in the previously held assignation, from his proper act: because acts are prior to habits according to notion. And if one wishes to sustain it, he will say that "to simulate" is taken broadly, namely for showing oneself in another disposition than one is, so as to represent the person of another: and since he himself is evil, it can be understood as the person of another in genus, not in species, in this way in which the Philosopher says that good and evil are the existing genera of others. And in this way also must be understood what it says, that he simulates what he is not, namely in genus, not in species. Furthermore, it must be understood that this very thing which it says, to simulate what he is not, is done for this end, which is to please concerning simulated goodness: for this is the end of the hypocrite's will. If anyone, therefore, wished to comprehend the entire essence of hypocrisy, he would say that hypocrisy is a vice desiring to please another concerning simulated goodness under the appearance of an extrinsic good, or by the palliation of an evil.

§ 33. To the first, therefore, it must be said that a hypocrite never simulates what he is in genus, because he is evil: and thus it is understood here. But that it is so is clear through Gregory upon that of Job 15:34: The congregation of the hypocrite, etc., where he says thus: The mind of the hypocrite is never empty of evil: because what he appetites, he envies in others, so that out of their despising he might be more illustrious: whence he also sets snares so that he alone might capture esteem.

§ 34. And as to what is objected concerning a hidden good, it must be said that this is understood concerning a good in genus, or concerning a civil good: because he does not have a good in genus, unless it is simula- ted: and therefore, understanding according to genus, he always simulates what he is not.

§ 35. To the next it must be said that simulation and dissimulation are not related as opposites, except as concerning the same good or evil: and therefore the simulation of good is not opposed to the dissimulation of evil, but rather here both are comprehended under simulation, because both show the cloak of a good man, but extrinsically.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that Master Hugh descends to the special acts of hypocrisy, and it is true that these are multiplied according to how, in the appearance of good and evil, insofar as it comes in some way into the notice of another, he can attain the pleasure of apparent holiness. But these in genus are good and evil, and each is either hidden or manifest: and thus four wings are produced: yet all these acts are comprehended under one according to genus, which is the showing of holiness or goodness in order to please the neighbor.

576. Macrobius, Commentary on the Dream of Scipio, I.8.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that this is true, that it happens that someone simulates what he is not, but not in genus: and therefore such a one does not entirely simulate what he is not: because he does not care about this, that he be judged holy or good, but rather he cautiously guards his neighbor as much as he can, lest he be scandalized, and this is the mark of a prudent man.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that, as is clear in a certain chapter of the Decretals, there is a good simulation, and a bad simulation: and it is a distinction of Augustine: but nevertheless those things which seem to be simulations in the Saints or the Lord, are not purely simulations, but indications of mysteries: because just as the Lord feigned to go further as a pilgrim, and was further in the minds of the disciples: but this [hypocrisy] is a pure simulation of something, which does not even pertain to the simulator according to genus, and with a dishonest end.

§ 39. To all those things, however, which are subsequently induced, it must be plainly conceded: but it must be said that the end here is imported by this, that he is a representer of another person in genus. But since another person, insofar as he is another, would not move any will, it is understood that it moves it, and is its end, by reason of the adjunct in the notice of others, which is the pleasing of apparent holiness.

Articulus 38 — Whether Hypocrisy Is A Special Sin, Or A General One Conjoined To Others

Whether hypocrisy is a special sin, or a general one conjoined to others?

§ 40. Secondly it is asked, Whether it is a special sin, or a general one conjoined to others?

§ 41. But it seems that it is a general one conjoined to others: because 1. Here it is defined through simulation: and it is certain that simulation is a sin other than hypocrisy, as is clear in 1 Kings 14:6, where the Prophet says to the wife of Jeroboam: Enter, wife of Jeroboam: why do you simulate yourself to be another? yet that wife was not a hypocrite on account of this. Since, therefore, it is conjoined to simulation, it seems that by the same reason it is conjoined to others.

§ 42. 2. Item, From the authority of Gregory previously induced, it seems that it is conjoined to others, and especially to envy, and to pride: because from this that he says, that the mind of the hypocrite is never empty of evil, it seems that it is adjoined to all evils: because there is no special evil of which the mind of the hypocrite is ever empty. But from this that he says, that he envies others, he shows that it is conjoined to envy: and from this that he says, that he despises others so that out of their despising he might become more illustrious, he shows it is conjoined to pride: and by the same reason it is conjoined to all others.

§ 43. 3. Item, Especially it seems to be conjoined to lying and guile and fraudulence: because those vices show something other than they are: and this is the proper act of the hypocrite, as has been said.

§ 44. 4. Further also otherwise by a universal reason this same thing is seen: because good and evil cannot be reduced to some common thing which is one genus: because the Philosopher says that they are not in a genus, but are the genera of others: therefore the simulation of good and the dissimulation of evil cannot similarly be reduced to one genus of one appetible thing in which they might rest, as it seems: therefore this is in every genus: therefore it is not an evil in one, but in all: therefore it is conjoined to all, as it seems; therefore it is not one special evil.

§ 45. But against this it is objected: Whatever divides one genus diversely with others which are species of that genus, is a species, not a genus; hypocrisy divides this genus which is 'vice' with other special vices: therefore it itself is a special vice: therefore separated from others.

§ 46. Further also, Although charity loves every good, yet it is a special virtue on account of a special end: therefore by similarity, although hypocrisy desires to appear in good, yet it will be a special vice on account of the end, which is to please another concerning holiness.

§ 47. Which we concede, saying to the first, that simulation is taken in two ways, namely generally, and specially. Taken generally, simulation is not a sin: but taken specially, it is again taken in two ways, namely insofar as it sounds a certain appetite to deceive, and thus it is not a special sin, but conjoined to several sins, as was proved in objecting: as it is said, Job 36:13: Simulators and crafty men provoke the wrath of God. In another way it is taken most specially for the simulation of non-existent goodness, and thus it is hypocrisy, which the very name hypocrisy shows, which is said from hypo which is 'under', and chrisis, 'conversion', as if malice lurking under the figure of conversion and exterior goodness: or 'turned under', that is, having a hidden conversion: because he converts the good outside, while he is evil inside.

§ 48. To the next it must be said that Gregory does not mean that it is a sin conjoined or commixed with others: but he says this for the reason that it is more frequently sought by them, on account of which it is also posited as a daughter of vainglory : as he also says in the last Gloss upon Job.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that it is not conjoined to lying except accidentally, namely if the lie seeks the pleasing of apparent holiness. But that a lie shows what is not, is not understood concerning the disposition of the man quantum to the virtue of goodness, but rather specially with truth: because since it is false, it pretends truth in speech.

§ 50. To the next it must be said that this is solved by the last objection adduced to the contrary: because although the matter in which the hypocrite seeks to appear is not in a single genus, nevertheless the end is special: and this is the completing difference in wills, and from its specialty the vice is drawn into a species.

578. Peter Lombard, Sententiae IV.

§ 51. Through the same thing, the solution to the subsequent query is clear.

Articulus 39 — In Which Works Hypocrisy More Frequently Appears; And, In Which Act It Is Worse

In which works does hypocrisy more frequently appear? and, In which act is it worse?

§ 52. Thirdly it is asked, In which works does it more frequently appear?

§ 53. But it seems that 1. In confession, through those things which are said in the Letter.

§ 54. 2. Item, By such a reason: Where there is a place of accusation in a civil judgment, there is also properly a place for the showing of innocence and purity of life: but this is in confession quantum to divine judgment: therefore there properly is the place of the showing of goodness and purity of life: therefore, since the hypocrite principally intends this, it seems that in confession he maximally pretends hypocrisy.

§ 55. But it seems that it maximally shows itself in fasting: 1. Through that which is specially prohibited there by our Savior, Matthew 6:16, saying: When you fast, do not become like the hypocrites, sad.

§ 56. 2. Item, By reason: For in this the hypocrite maximally seeks to appear holy, which is maximally suited to pretend exterior holiness: but this is fasting: therefore he maximally seeks hypocrisy in fasting. The first premise is proved through the astuteness of the hypocrite: because he knows which act is more useful to him for attaining the end. The second is proved from this, that fasting exterminates and macerates the body, which is proper to exterior holiness.

§ 57. 3. Further, the Lord says in the Gospel, that hypocrites exterminate their faces. Since therefore fasting maximally exterminates, in that maximally does the hypocrite seek to appear.

§ 58. But it seems that in almsgiving: because Gregory says, that in almsgiving hypocrites especially sound a trumpet before themselves, so that they might appear good.

§ 59. Further it is asked, In which act is hypocrisy worse?

§ 60. But it seems that in almsgiving: because Chrysostom says: Everywhere vainglory is evil, but maximally in philanthropy: but philanthropy is the love of men: and thus he calls piety concerning the poor, because it proceeds from the love of men.

§ 61. ON THE CONTRARY: Chrysostom: In other things it is nothing admirable to glory vainly, but in fasting and prayer it is extraneous and full of tears.

§ 62. Solution. It must be said that hypocrisy principally seeks to appear in acts of holiness, and those are parts of sanctification or of satisfaction, namely fasting, prayer, and almsgiving: and therefore it more often turns itself to those than to others, unless hypocrisy is taken very generally for every other showing that is, whether it be done by word or by a sign of holiness: as Blessed Bernard says, that a hypocrite is every Doctor who does not correct himself before another.

571. Albert the Great, In III Sententiarum (dist. 27).

§ 63. To the first, therefore, it must be said that hypocrisy is often shown in confession, but not as frequently as in the other aforesaid things: because there are not as many judges of apparent goodness there, since confession is made to one alone.

§ 64. To the next it must be said that in truth the hypocrite excuses himself: but yet that is not the act by which he more frequently obtains the end, as has been said.

§ 65. To the next it must be said that according to the diversity of hypocrites, diverse works of the three works of penance are exercised. For a rich man who is not avaricious, but a hypocrite, more frequently turns himself to almsgiving: because he obtains a double pleasing, namely from what is given, and from the apparent holiness: but a poor man prays more often: and no one fasts more frequently on account of its difficulty, unless he cannot do otherwise on account of men: and therefore among all men, certain heretics fast less.

§ 66. And to that which is objected against this, it must be said that the Savior prohibits the vice of hypocrisy in this and in other things, in which it is more frequently accustomed to be found.

§ 67. To the next it must be said that the hypocrite does not seek the extermination of the face for its own sake, and therefore in truth he does not love leanness, but the similitude of leanness: and yet he wants to have a fat belly: and therefore he is not as frequently in fasting, as in prayer, and in the corners of the squares.

§ 68. To the next it must be said that he is speaking of a certain hypocrite, and not of every one.

§ 69. To that which is further asked, it must be said that such operations of sins are related as exceeding and exceeded on account of diverse circumstances which can aggravate on either side.

§ 70. But if it is asked, In what genus is hypocrisy more grave? I think, that in that which is least according to truth in the hypocrite, whatever that is, if it pertains to holiness.

§ 71. But to that which is objected concerning Chrysostom, we could say that although he says this concerning vainglory, nevertheless it is not consequent that this is true concerning hypocrisy: because hypocrisy and vainglory are diverse vices, as will be shown below. If, however, force is not placed in this: then it must be said, that as to something, it is worse in philanthropy: because there it extinguishes a work which has the promise of the life that now is, and of the future: but in the others it does not extinguish a work which thus has a double promise, and as to this, it is worse in that one, because it is of greater harm.

§ 72. To the next it must be said that Chrysostom does not say this because it is worse there, but because it is more irrational there: because the affliction itself of the flesh and spirit ought to draw one back from the appetite for praise, and this is not so in the others, which almost consist in a certain laudable excellence, as almsgiving which is conjoined to the excellence of liberality, and the like.

Articulus 40 — How Hypocrisy Stands In Relation To Vain Glory

How does hypocrisy relate to vainglory?

§ 73. Fourthly it is asked, How is it related to vainglory?

§ 74. But it seems that it does not differ from it: because 1. Vices are wills, or not without will, as the Philosopher says concerning virtue: but such wills are defined by the end: therefore those of which there is one end, are one vice of the will: but there is one end of hypocrisy and of vainglory: therefore they are one vice of the will. But that the end is the same is proved, Job 8:16, upon that: In its rising its sprout shall go forth, where Gregory says: The hypocrite, when he acts well, wants to be seen by all: for through all things that he does, by hidden thought he seeks praises: but praise is the end of vainglory: therefore the proposition is certain.

§ 75. 2. Item, A daughter in no generation differs in species from the mother: but hypocrisy is the daughter of vainglory: therefore it does not differ in species from vainglory. But the middle [premise] is proved from this that is said in the Gloss at the end of Job, thus: From vainglory are born disobedience, boasting, and hypocrisy.

§ 76. TO THE CONTRARY of this is, that just as one of the daughters differs from the mother, so does the remaining one differ: but disobedience differs from vainglory: therefore hypocrisy does too.

§ 77. Response. It must be said that they are diverse vices.

§ 78. But to the first it must be said that the substantial end of vainglory and of hypocrisy is not the same: because vainglory rests in praise, but hypocrisy in the opinion of goodness, or it does not seek praise except accidentally, namely insofar as vainglory is conjoined with it: and because this is frequent and almost always, on account of this Gregory says that the hypocrite seeks praise.

§ 79. To the next it must be said that this is true of univocal generation: but Gregory in that Gloss calls generation the exit of an effect from a cause: whence the daughter of a capital vice is named by him as that mediating thing by which the capital vice more often obtains the end which it intends: and it is not a univocal generation, as is excellently proved by the objection which was made to the opposite.

Articulus 41 — Whether Hypocrisy Is Always Mortal Or Venial Sin

Whether hypocrisy is always a mortal sin, or venial?

§ 80. Fifthly and lastly it is asked, Whether it is always a mortal sin, or venial?

§ 81. But it seems that it is mortal, 1. Through this which is said, Isaiah 16:13, upon that: In three years, like the years of a hireling, the glory of Moab shall be taken away over all the great people, the Gloss of Jerome: In comparison of two evils, it is lighter to sin openly, than to simulate holiness: but to sin openly, as it is taken there, is mortal: therefore much more is hypocrisy mortal.

§ 82. 2. Item, To Ephesians 6:7, upon that: As to the Lord, and not to men, Augustine: Simulated equity is not equity, but double iniquity: but simple iniquity is mortal: therefore also simulated equity: but this is hypocrisy: therefore, etc.

§ 83. 3. Item, Lamentations 4:6: The iniquity of the daughter of my people is made greater, etc., the Gloss says: The crimes of the soul which slips in hypocrisy are lamented, whose iniquity is greater than the sin of Sodom. But it is certain that the sin of Sodom was grave and mortal: therefore hypocrisy is too.

§ 84. 4. Item, Upon that: He takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself[579], the Gloss says, that the spirits of simulation are more wicked than those of open iniquity. For it says, that the spirit of pride is evil, but worse than it is the simulator of humility, and so concerning the other capital sins: therefore, etc.

§ 85. 5. From those things it is further elicited, that it is graver to sin secretly than manifestly, other things being equal.

§ 1. But against this is the fact that one who sins openly scandalizes; whereas one who sins secretly does not scandalize: therefore, all else being equal, one who sins openly sins more gravely than one who sins secretly.

§ 2. Response. It must be said that hypocrisy is not always a mortal sin, but sometimes it is venial, and sometimes greater, and sometimes lesser, according as it is clothed in different circumstances.

§ 3. Therefore, to the first it must be said that Jerome is speaking in a qualified sense (secundum quid), and not absolutely (simpliciter), for it is simply more grave to sin openly. However, in this respect, that which has a greater power to deceive is called more grave, and it is in this respect that the Gloss speaks there.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that Augustine's statement is not understood of every mode of hypocrisy, but only of that in which simulation is accumulated with sin: because then, on account of a double deformity, it is called a double iniquity. If, however, it were merely a simulation of holiness, it would not be a double iniquity.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that this is not understood absolutely, but only with respect to the efficacy of the deception: because he who proclaims his sin like Sodom cannot deceive; but the simulator deceives his friend with his mouth.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that it is called more wicked by reason of accumulation, and not by reason of the simulation taken in itself.

§ 7. To that which is asked further, the solution is already clear through what was said previously.

Articulus 42 — Whether The Strengthening Of A Good Conscience Is Required In One Who Ought To Communicate

Is the comforting of a good conscience required in him who is to communicate?

§ 9. Next, a question is raised concerning what he says there, A, § 2, after the beginning: "Let him also beware lest he approach the Lord's body before his good conscience is comforted," etc.

§ 10. For this seems to be false: because 1. The comforting of a good conscience implies more than a good conscience: therefore, more than having grace is required for communion, which almost all deny.

§ 11. 2. Moreover, nothing is required for communion except that the communicant not be unworthy: but unworthiness arises only from mortal sin: therefore, one who does not have mortal sin can communicate. However, not everyone of this sort is comforted by a good conscience: therefore, someone who is not comforted by a good conscience can communicate.

§ 12. 3. Again, in natural things we see that being and living are prior to being comforted in being and life: therefore, it is similar in spiritual things. But spiritual being is through grace, and living is through virtue perfecting one for action: therefore, comforting follows both of these. If therefore this is required for communion, more is required for communion than having grace and virtues, which everyone denies.

§ 13. 4. Again, in the Letter he says that he should mourn that he does not yet dare to receive the saving food which he greatly desires. Now it is evident that this desire for the saving food comes from the love of charity: therefore, one having charity still ought not to receive the saving food, which everyone considers absurd.

§ 14. But against this is that if 1. Hugh of St. Victor says the following in his epistle to Bernard on the Paschal Epiphany: "I say boldly that even if he is contrite, nevertheless he ought not to communicate before he has confessed." But it is established that one who is contrite has charity and grace: therefore, as he says here, he is still bound to await the comforting of a good conscience through meritorious works.

§ 15. 2. Again, in the primitive Church, the newly penitent were not only segregated from communion of the body and blood of the Lord, but even from the place in which they were consecrated, namely from the Church. Yet the newly penitent had grace and virtues: therefore, as is said here, comforting through meritorious works is required for communion, even after grace is possessed.

§ 16. But if this is said, let us ask concerning certain cases.

§ 17. Let us suppose that someone, in approaching the body of Christ, remembers one or two things which he never confessed: it seems, according to Hugh's statement, that he ought not to approach.

579. Cf. Luke 11:26.

§ 18. But against this is the fact that the communion of the body gives greater grace to the recipient: therefore, if he withdraws himself, he distances himself from grace or from the augmentation of grace: and he ought to do neither of these things: therefore, he ought to approach and receive.

§ 19. Again, let us suppose the case of a priest who has a congregation, and there is no one else to celebrate, and he has not confessed, and there is no priest present to whom he can confess: yet he is contrite. What must he do? For either he must approach, and then he seems to act against the authority adduced above and against what is said in the text; or he will not approach, and then he scandalizes the people: therefore, he seems to be perplexed.

§ 20. Response. It must be said that a man having grace, or presuming from a probable sign that he has grace, can approach the body of Christ. And a probable sign is if he has confessed, and his conscience dictates to him that for no reason does he will to sin further, and that he will willingly undertake penance at the due time.

§ 21. To that which is objected first, it must be said that, in truth, if one carefully considers the Letter, Augustine then intends that a newly penitent person ought not to communicate: but he said this by way of counsel, or concerning one solemnly repenting for the terror of others. If anyone wishes, however, he can resolve it thus: that every conscience of an adult having grace is comforted: because the act of contrition detesting sin is a meritorious act: similarly the act of faith in God, and the like, and by these acts he is moved when he is justified: and thus immediately after the first moment of contrition, the conscience is comforted by an interior meritorious work, even if not an exterior one.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that, regarding suitability, nothing more is required for communion than what the objection states: but because amendment cannot take place except through detestation and sorrow for sin, therefore a meritorious act comforting the conscience accompanies that suitability: and thus he is already comforted when he approaches.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that as it is in nature, so it is in grace, because "the grace of the Holy Spirit knows no slow efforts," as the Gloss of Ambrose says on Acts 8:1 and following . Therefore, although the habit of grace is naturally prior to the meritorious act, yet in time they can be simultaneous.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that Augustine, as was said, states this by way of counsel, or concerning one solemnly repenting. And I well think it is cautious that a man fresh from the wounds of sins should not communicate for some time: but nevertheless, it is not necessary.

§ 25. To what Hugh says, it must be said that he is speaking of one who has a confessor ready without hardship: because he is negligent if he does not confess: and this negligence impedes him from communion.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that in the primitive Church this was done either to strike terror, or it was done only concerning solemn penitents, as was said.

§ 27. To that which is further asked concerning cases, I say that one approaching who previously made a general confession ought not to step back on account of remembering some sins which he did not confess specifically: because in the general confession those were remitted: nay, he can wait for an opportune time until he confesses, as was said above in the question on confession.

§ 28. To what is asked about the priest, it must be said that such a priest can celebrate with sorrow, and should have a firm purpose of confessing at an opportune time.

§ 29. And what is objected to the contrary is resolved by the foregoing: because his good conscience has already been comforted in some mode.

Articulus 43 — Whether Games Are A Mortal Sin, And Which Are, And Which Are Not

Are games a mortal sin, and which are, and which are not?

§ 31. Next, a question is raised concerning what he says there, A, § 2, around the middle: "Let him also restrain himself from games, spectacles," etc.

§ 32. For according to this, it seems that games are a mortal sin: and then let it be asked, concerning which games is this understood?

§ 33. 1. For it is said in 1 Corinthians 10:7, Neither become idolaters, as some of them, as it is written: The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. And according to this it seems that dances are a mortal sin, because playing is lustful gesticulation in dances.

§ 34. Moreover, this seems true by four reasons, of which the first is this: because in such play immodest gesticulations are shown: but signs of immodesty are mortal sins, because in them there is progressive concupiscence: therefore such a game is a mortal sin.

§ 35. 2. The second is: because a dance is first read to have been done before an idol: and it is established that idolatry only invented this so that men would be more moved to lust: therefore it seems that it is a mortal sin.

§ 36. 3. The third is, because in Isaiah 3:16 and 17, the Lord specially threatened this game, saying: Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and have walked with outstretched neck, and went with winking of eyes, and were clapping, walked on their feet, and proceeded with a composed step: the Lord will make bald the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the Lord will lay bare their hair. Now all these things are done in dances and prancing. Therefore it seems that it is a mortal sin.

§ 37. 4. The fourth reason is taken from the word of the Apostle, 1 Thessalonians 5:22, which says: Abstain from all appearance of evil. Now it is clear to all that it is an appearance of evil by which the lustful mutually reveal their concupiscences to one another: and this especially happens in dances.

§ 38. Further it is asked: Are hunting, and lyre-playing, and the like, called spectacles?

§ 39. And it seems so: because 1. On Romans 13:10, regarding that text: Therefore love is the fulfilling of the law, Augustine says in the Gloss that in human spectacles the hunter is one thing, and the lyre another: therefore it seems that one doing penance ought to abstain even from such things, as is said in the Letter.

§ 40. 2. Moreover, those things are called vain and idle which are not done by reason of just necessity or with the intention of pious utility: but all human games and spectacles are of this sort: therefore they are vain and idle. But an account will be rendered for such things on the day of judgment, as is said in Matthew 12:36: therefore such things are sins: therefore the penitent ought to abstain from them. Now this seems to apply much more to chess and dice, in which there is no goodness or utility.

§ 41. 3. Again, it was held earlier in the Letter that the penitent ought to restrain himself even from licit things, so that he might more easily find grace: therefore much more from superfluous things. Now it is established that games and spectacles are superfluous: therefore he ought to abstain from them.

§ 42. 4. Again, whatever draws a neighbor to vanity ought to be avoided: but such things draw one to vanity: therefore they ought to be avoided.

§ 43. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Exodus 15:20 and 21: Therefore Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a tambourine in her hand: and all the women went out after her with tambourines and choruses, for whom she led the singing—namely, dances: and in this she merited: therefore that act is not evil in itself.

§ 44. 2. Moreover, in Psalm 67:26 and 28: In the midst of the young maidens playing on tambourines... there is Benjamin the youth. And it is established that according to the literal sense he speaks there of dances, and does not reprehend such signs of joy.

§ 45. 3. Moreover, Jeremiah 31:4: Thou shalt yet be adorned with thy tambourines, and shalt go forth in the dance of them that play. And it is established that there, according to the literal sense, the Lord promises such signs of joy to those returning from Chaldea. Therefore they are not evil in themselves: therefore a penitent does not need to restrain himself from such things.

§ 46. Response. It must be said that dances and games of this sort, whether done with singing or with musical instruments, are not evil in themselves, as was proven last through the authorities. But they can become evil from circumstances for three reasons: one of which, and the principal one, is an evil intention, as when they are done to show or provoke lust, as almost everyone practices them now: and for this reason even ecclesiastical persons have set such things aside, because even of notable joy one must not commune with sinners. Another reason is when they are not done at their proper time, as in a time of sadness: because, as is said in Ecclesiasticus 22:6: Music in mourning is an annoying tale: and in this way it is forbidden for a penitent to be at games: because while he is repenting, it is a time for weeping, not a time for laughing and giving oneself to spectacles. A third reason is taken from the office of the person, just as hunting and other games are forbidden to clerics: because, being chosen for the lot of the Lord, they ought to be occupied with other exercises.

§ 47. Therefore, to what is objected first concerning dances, it must be said that a dance is not evil in itself: but it becomes evil through such circumstances, as was said.

§ 48. To the next it must be said that dancing also existed beforehand, and perhaps more often, and at least in Exodus 15:20 it was exercised by Miriam, the sister of Moses, and other women as a sign of joy, or of victory given from heaven over enemies.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that Isaiah is speaking of those who turn a sign of joy into the gesticulations of harlots: and it is well said that for them it is a sin.

§ 50. To the next it must be said that this is understood of an appearance of evil which is evil in itself, and not of those things which can become evil from a circumstance, and even good from other circumstances.

§ 51. I think, however, that when five conditions concur for a dance, it is not reprehensible. The first is that it be at a proper time of joy, such as at weddings, or at a time of victory, or the liberation of a person or the homeland, or at the arrival of a friend from a distant land. The second is that it be with honorable persons, concerning whom no presumption of evil arises, not with male and female libertines. The third is that it be done by laypersons: because for nuns, monks, and clerics, owing to the fact that they ought to be occupied with other things, I consider all dancing to be illicit. The fourth is that it be done in an honorable manner, not with excessively inordinate or dishonorable gesticulations. The fifth is that the rousing singing in such things, and the music, not be about illicit things, but about morals. The melody, however, is not to be worried about, as I think, because in such things I think it is necessary that a light melody be made, which in some way expresses the mode of dancing.

§ 52. To what is further asked concerning other spectacles, it seems the answer must be given under a distinction: for either they have an annexed utility, or they are invented only to remove boredom as a solace for the tediousness of this life. If the first way: either they are exercised by lay persons or by spiritual persons. If by laypersons, in whatever way they are done at a time and place not forbidden: I think they are to be tolerated, such as hunting, and fowling, and the like. If, however, they are exercised by spiritual persons, a distinction must be made: for since in a spectacle there is both utility and vanity, either the utility moves one to the work, and the vanity is only mixing itself in there: and then, in that case, hunting is conceded to religious and clerics—namely, in the case if their revenues consist in such things, and they derive their necessities from there, such that they are in forested lands, as are the revenues of certain monasteries in wild game and fowling and the like. Or it is the case that vanity moves them: and then I think it is a grave sin for spiritual men, and especially religious: because they excessively distract the mind, and as it were turn them away so that they do not return to spiritual study. However, in non-harmful games of hoops (troci), throwing sticks (asticularum), chess (scaci), and dice (aleae), I believe they are not a sin: because such things are done only to remove boredom, and do not excessively turn the mind away from spiritual study.

§ 53. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 44 — Whether The Worthy Fruits Of The Virtues Are Called The Worthy Fruits Of Penance

Are worthy fruits of virtues called worthy fruits of penance?

§ 55. Next, a question is raised concerning what he says there, A, § 2, near the end: "For there are worthy fruits of virtues, which do not suffice for penitents," etc.

§ 56. For this seems to be false: because 1. Even penance is a certain virtue, as was held above: therefore the fruits of penance are fruits of virtues: therefore the worthy fruits of penance are also worthy fruits of virtues: for if one thing follows upon another, if the same thing is added to both, it still follows upon that.

§ 57. 2. Again, virtue is concerning the difficult and the good, as the Philosopher says: but penance is also concerning such things, nor can it extend itself beyond them: therefore it cannot extend itself beyond the work of virtue: therefore the fruits of virtue and of penance are the same.

§ 58. 3. Again, nothing is enjoined according to the law except a work of virtue: but that which is enjoined is a fruit of penance when it is put into work: therefore the work of virtue is a fruit of penance: and the same is a fruit of virtue: therefore the fruit of virtue and of penance is the same.

§ 59. I respond to this that the fruits of penance and of virtue are not the same: because virtue is in all good things, and penance is not.

§ 60. To the first, therefore, it must be said that penance is in a manifold genus, as was said above, and here it is taken insofar as it is in the genus of a sacrament having three parts, namely contrition, confession, and satisfaction. For these three are not required of everyone having virtues, but only of the penitent.

§ 61. To the next it must be said that there is something more difficult than the difficult: now virtue is concerning what is difficult in act, but penance is concerning what is excellingly difficult—not regarding the power of the agent, but regarding the mean of virtue according to the common mode of observance: because a penitent restrains himself from licit things, and gives from his necessities, and the like, which is not required of one simply having virtue.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that according to the law, more is enjoined than the mode of virtue demands, although it is always reduced to some virtue moving one to that act. And this happens on account of the spiritual mode of the penitent, who is bound to more than is commonly required by all living according to virtue: and this is how what is said in the Letter is understood. For it is not absurd that a virtue which is the same in species moves diversely according to the diverse state of the man whom it moves, just as justice moves one who causes injury differently (to make satisfaction), and differently moves anyone else in common to works of justice.

Articulus 45 — Whether Penances Which Are Not Imposed According To The Quality Of The Crimes According To The Authorities Of The Canons Ought To Be Called False Penance

Ought penances which are not imposed for the quality of crimes according to the authorities of the canons be called false penances?

§ 64. Next, a question is raised concerning what Gregory says there, B, after the beginning: "We call false penances those which are not imposed according to the authorities of the canons for the quality of the crimes," etc.

§ 65. For this seems to be false: because

§ 66. 1. The canon says simply that fornication is to be punished by a seven-year fast. Therefore, according to this, one who has fornicated a thousand or a hundred times could not make satisfaction through his whole life: and this would draw a man to despair. Therefore what is said in the Letter seems false.

§ 67. 2. Moreover, penances are at the judgment of the priest. Therefore it seems that they can be less than the quality of the crimes demands.

§ 68. To this, however, it must be said that this Letter does not intend that nothing be enjoined upon any penitent except what the canon says and what the quality of the crimes demands: but rather it says that the canon should be the rule for enjoining penance: yet the proportioning of this rule to this or that penitent is according to the judgment of a discreet priest. For just as authors give the rules of medicine, yet to moderate them belongs to the discreet doctor, so it is in the premises instituted by the canon.

§ 69. Therefore, to what is objected first, the resolution is that the canon does not draw the proportion of adaptation for this one or that one, but is only an exemplar of the rule in universal: and this could not be done for every faculty and state of penitents: because that is according to particular things which are infinite. And for this reason, the canon forces no one to despair.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that the proportioning of the penance is in the judgment of the priest, as was said.

Articulus 46 — Whether Military Service, Public Commerce, Taxes, And Tolls Are Lawful Or Unlawful

Are military service, public commerce, taxes, and tolls licit or illicit?

§ 72. Next, a question is raised concerning what he says there, B, after the beginning: "And therefore a soldier, or a merchant," etc.

§ 73. And it is asked, if these things which he touches upon here are illicit businesses?

§ 74. It seems that they are not: because 1. In Luke 3:14, John the Baptist does not forbid military service, but only commands that they be content with their pay: therefore it seems that military service is not illicit in itself.

§ 75. 2. Again, the Gloss on that text: Be content with your pay, says this: "By a just moderation he prohibits them from seeking plunder by false accusation from those whom they ought to have benefited by their military service: teaching therefore that wages are established for the military so that, while sustenance is sought, the plunderer might not roam at large." From this the same is gathered: that military service is not illicit in itself, but rather the abuse of plunder that happens around it.

§ 76. 3. Again, nothing ordered to the preservation of civic life and the republic is a sin: military service is ordered most of all to the preservation of these two: therefore, it is not a sin. The first premise is self-evident. The second is written in the Ethics.

§ 77. Further it is asked concerning merchants.

§ 78. For what he says seems false: because 1. Genesis 49:13 says: Zabulon shall dwell on the seashore, and in the roadstead of ships, reaching as far as Sidon. And according to the literal exposition, the land of Zabulon is well spoken of by the gain of commerce by sea: therefore they are not illicit.

§ 79. 2. Again, Proverbs 31:14 says of the valiant woman: She is like the merchant's ship, bringing her bread from afar. Where, according to the literal sense, the same is argued.

§ 80. 3. Moreover, commerce is useful to the whole earth, by carrying away abundance in one land, and bringing back what is deficient: but nothing serving the utility of the community is a sin: therefore such commerce is not a sin: therefore he ought not to have said generally concerning commerce that it was a sin.

§ 81. 4. Moreover, nothing of those things without which civic life is dissolved, and with which it is optimally preserved, is a sin: but commerce is something of this sort: therefore it is not a sin. The first premise is clear from this, that every laudable study of morality is concerning things that preserve civic life. The second is taken from Book V of the Ethics, where he speaks of commutative justice, for the sake of which he says even ministries were invented: because it consists entirely in the exchanges of commerce.

§ 82. 5. Moreover, that which the common law judges to be just can in no way be a sin: but in many commercial dealings the common law judges the contract to be just: therefore it is in no way a sin: therefore commerce generally is not a sin.

§ 83. But against this it is objected by that text of Ecclesiasticus 26:28: A merchant is hardly freed from negligence: and a huckster shall not be justified from the sins of the lips: therefore he who engages in commerce commits himself to a danger from which it is difficult to escape sin: but no one ought to commit himself to a danger: therefore no one ought to engage in commerce.

§ 84. Further it is asked here concerning publicans, who...

§ 85. 1. As it is said in the Gloss on that text: And the publicans also came, it says thus: "Publicans are those who exact taxes, or who are contractors of the revenues of the treasury and of public affairs: and also those who pursue the gains of this world through commerce: each of whom in his own degree he equally restrains from doing injury: so that while first they restrain themselves from the appetite for the things of others, they might at length reach the point of sharing their own things with their neighbors." From this Gloss it is gathered that even just taxes and tolls can be received: and publicans who preside over such things are not to be restrained from the act, but from injustice.

§ 86. 2. Moreover, this seems true also by reason: For tolls and customs and taxes are paid to the prince so that the land may be defended in peace: so that inhabitants may travel through it, and procure their own utilities: but the prince can justly receive this: because in such things he acts for the commerce of all in labor and expenses: therefore they too ought to give: therefore there is no sin on either part. But the publicans are only the ministers of his giving and receiving: therefore they give their labor to a licit thing: therefore they do not sin.

§ 87. But against this it is objected by Gregory on that text of John 21:3: I go a fishing: who in a certain homily asks why it was licit for Peter to return to fishing after his conversion, and not for Matthew to the tax office: and he resolves it, speaking thus: "There are many affairs which can scarcely or not at all be exercised without sin: therefore to those things which implicate one in some sin, it is necessary that the mind not return after conversion." Therefore, since the tax office is discussed there, it seems that tolls and taxes implicate one in some sin: therefore they are illicit.

§ 88. Solution. It must be said that military service, considered as military service, is not illicit in itself, but rather the abuse, which although it is manifold, nevertheless consists principally in three things: namely, in the extortion of the innocent, in the exaction of a larger salary than can be earned by military service, and in exercises for the display of strength with harm to men and property, such as tournaments, jousting, and the like, as they were invented. Yet there are certain exercises of the military that are necessary: such as the running and turning of warhorses, and the art of striking, defending, and projecting weapons, which are not prohibited. And this is taken from the Second Book of Kings, everywhere, where David commanded the people that they should teach their sons the bow, that is, the art of archery.

§ 89. Now, what the Master says in the Letter is said for this reason: that according to customary use, it is practiced with difficulty without sin. And through this sin is the solution to all those things which were objected concerning military service.

§ 90. To those things which were objected concerning commerce, it must be said according to a certain Gloss which is on that text of Ecclesiasticus 26:28, A merchant is hardly freed from negligence, etc., which says thus: "A very bad act, not an honorable thing, is condemned; he who through immoderate ambition burdens his mind more with perjury than with price." From this it is gathered that licit commercial dealings are not prohibited.

§ 91. However, they are made illicit in several ways. But in modern times three things principally seem to make commerce illicit: namely, person, time, and manner.

§ 92. The person, such as a person consecrated to divine offices, like a cleric and a monk: because these ought not to buy and sell, but they can sell their own things given to them, arising from annual fruits: and yet I do not believe that they ought to sell them in a bad manner, as wine is sold in a tavern, unless they could not otherwise sell them all at once. And the reason for this is because gatherings of bad men take place in a tavern, and an immoderate consumption of wine: the patronage of which the tavern-keeper provides. And therefore it is not licit, as it seems to me, for a religious or a cleric to exercise an office of this sort.

§ 93. Furthermore, the time makes commerce illicit in two ways: namely, by reason of a feast day, that is, when it is a feast day; and in the case when the commerce can probabilistically induce a scarcity (caristiam), such as if too much grain is bought at the new harvest, or too much wine at the vintage, so that when it is not possessed by others, this man may sell it for as much as he wants.

§ 94. The manner concerns the contract, such as if the contract is vicious, namely with deception and fraud regarding the price. Now the just price is what the thing sold can be valued at according to the estimation of the market of that time.

§ 95. And through this the solution to all the things asked concerning commerce is clear.

§ 96. Through this also the solution to the doubtful case is clear: such as if someone defrauds another of his property, when it is worth more in the common market, whether it be grain, or wine, or something else; and he wants to restore the same in number or species to him when it is worth less according to the common market: for it is clear that he has not made satisfaction, unless he adds the profit of the time when it was worth more: because he damages him to that extent, namely in the greater price which could then have been had for that thing according to the common market.

§ 97. To what is asked concerning publicans and taxes and tolls, without prejudice it seems it must be said that four things are required for such gains to be just. One is that they be imposed by the consent of those whose interest it is to rule the land, and by the consent of the prince. The second, that they not be imposed except for a cause of necessity or common utility, namely because without such expenses the land cannot be pacified. The third is that the defense of the land actually be provided by those receiving. The fourth is that they not be immoderate, but according to the estimation of the expenses and the works which are expended by those defending the land: and thus speaks the Gloss on Luke, which intimates that such things are licit. And this is what is said in Romans 13:7: Render to all their dues: tribute, to whom tribute is due: custom, to whom custom: honor, to whom honor.

§ 98. To that which blessed Gregory says to the contrary, it must be said that he does not say that they cannot be exercised without sin, but scarcely or not at all. For they can scarcely be exercised unless they are justly imposed: and this is because of the agents who force the unwilling givers: and therefore it is difficult that they do not exceed the debt in exacting it. But they can not at all be done where the four aforesaid conditions are not observed.

§ 99. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 47 — Whether Penance Is Well Divided By The Master

Is penance well divided by the Master?

§ 101. Next, a question is raised concerning what he says in the second part of this distinction, there, C, "But to the aforesaid it must be added that penance is done in three ways," etc.

§ 102. And two things are asked here: namely, concerning the division of penance which he posits here, and concerning penance before baptism.

§ 103. To the first one can object thus: 1. A common element which remains according to one formal concept in all its dividing parts, in such a way that the dividing parts add no new form upon it, is not divided except by matter and accident. But penance...

penance before baptism and after baptism is of entirely the same formal character [ratio]: therefore it is only divided by matter and accident.

§ 2. Also, "before" and "after" baptism express nothing but a difference in time: but a thing is not divided according to form and species by differences of time: therefore, penance is not divided according to species by the fact that it is before or after.

§ 3. Furthermore, man who existed in the past, who exists in the present, and who will exist in the future, is not divided in species: therefore, neither is penance divided by such differences of time.

§ 4. And if you say that these are modes of penance, and not species, as the Letter seems to say. On the contrary: That mode is either essential or accidental. If essential: therefore it is founded upon some diverse essence. But it is not founded upon a diverse essence of the genus: therefore it is founded upon a diverse essence of the species, and then the first argument returns. If, however, it is accidental. On the contrary: The accidental modes of each and every single thing are many: therefore there ought not to be only three, but many, and as it were infinite.

§ 5. Furthermore, prior sins are grave and light: therefore it seems that the first mode is of as great a scope as the other two: and thus it seems that the division is null.

§ 6. Furthermore, penance for venial sins does not seem to be of the same formal character as penance for grave sins and in genus: because neither confession nor an assigned satisfaction is exacted for them: therefore it seems that it makes a poor division: because it posits dividing parts which are not univocally contained under the same common whole.

§ 7. Response. This division is of the modes of repenting: because the modes are taken from the part of the object of penance, about which it is, namely from the part of the sin: and I well concede that something essential corresponds to them. And to understand this, it must be known that penance is taken here insofar as it is integrated and constituted from contrition, confession, and satisfaction, just as was said at the beginning of this distinction: for then, an essentially different penance is required before baptism, which brings it about that no obstacle is found to the Holy Spirit in the one receiving baptism: and a different one is required in him who sins after baptism: because in the one receiving [baptism] exterior penance is not required, unless perhaps a confession by which it becomes known to the minister that he is not insincere [fictus]: but in the other it is required. Similarly, there is one penance for mortal sin, and another for venial: because for mortal sin confession with the expression of aggravating circumstances is required, and with assigned satisfaction: none of which is required in penance for venial sins, but only sorrow with daily satisfaction. It is evident, therefore, that if penance is considered under the formal aspect of a potestative whole, it is different on either side. Hence, this threefold mode is founded upon this sort of threefold potestative being of penance.

§ 8. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that if the common whole is taken according to the formal character of a potestative medicine with its parts, it will not be the same in all the dividing parts, but rather in one it will abound more than in another.

§ 9. To the next, it must be said that "before and after baptism" here do not only express differences of time, but also the status of the penitent for one sin, from which the diversity of penance is understood according as it is considered in its parts, as has been said.

§ 10. To the next, it must be said that even that objection proceeds as if "before" and "after" differed only by the succession of time, and this is not true, but rather it is a diverse being of penance, according to whether it is concerning this or that sin.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that the mode is founded upon a certain being of penance, as was said at the beginning of the solution.

§ 12. To the next, it must be said that it is true that the first mode regards both venial and mortal sins: but nevertheless, by reason of status, it is required for a different being of penance.

§ 13. To the next, it must be said that it is not of entirely the same formal character as the penance of mortal sins: and therefore it says there are two modes for venial and mortal: nevertheless, the common penance in its genus is preserved in the penance of venial sins, because sorrow with some satisfaction is there.

Articulus 48 — Whether Penance Is Before Baptism

Is there penance before baptism?

§ 15. Secondly, it is asked concerning penance before baptism, and two things are asked, namely: is there penance before baptism?

§ 16. And, What is it, and of what sort is its foundation?

§ 17. To the first, one proceeds thus: 1. It was held above that penance is the second plank after shipwreck; but the first in the shipwreck is baptism: therefore penance does not precede baptism, but follows it: and this is against the things that are said in the Letter.

§ 18. 2. Furthermore, Augustine says that baptism is the door of the sacraments: but before the door there is nothing pertaining to the mansion of the house: therefore before baptism there is nothing pertaining to the mansion in the sacraments: therefore no one can abide in penance who has not been baptized.

§ 19. 3. Furthermore, just as disease relates to disease in order, so does cure to cure, or medicine to medicine: but the disease against which baptism serves is the first one, which we have contracted from birth, while the second against which penance is ordered is the one we commit by our own will: therefore it seems that baptism is altogether before penance.

§ 20. 4. Furthermore, baptism does not seem to have a different order to penance than it has to the other sacraments, according to the order of those preceding penance and those following: but to all the others it is so ordered that unless baptism has been received, nothing is accomplished in the others: therefore [this applies] to penance as well: therefore there is no penance preceding baptism, as it seems.

§ 21. 5. Furthermore, Blessed Dionysius in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy says that the non-existent acts nothing: and in the same place he says that existing is given through baptism: therefore the unbaptized person acts nothing of spiritual actions: but penance is among the spiritual actions: therefore the unbaptized person does not do penance: but thus penance always follows baptism.

§ 22. BUT AGAINST THIS is: 1. The saying in the Letter of Augustine against Felicianus, and the Gloss which is set down concerning Acts 2.

§ 23. 2. Also, Augustine in the book of Eighty-Three Questions: The old life is ended unto penance: but where the old is ended, the new begins: therefore the new begins from penance: but that is first, where the new life begins: therefore penance is the first of all the sacraments.

§ 24. 3. Furthermore, upon that passage of Acts: Do penance, and let every one of you be baptized, etc., the Gloss says: "Being about to speak of baptism, he premised the laments of penance: so that they might first bedew themselves with the water of affliction, and afterward wash with the sacrament of baptism." From this it is gathered that penance is before baptism according to the order of receiving the sacraments.

§ 25. 4. Furthermore, upon that passage: Do penance, the Gloss says: "It is the first virtue, to destroy the old man through penance." Therefore it seems that penance is the first sacrament.

§ 26. 5. Furthermore, according to the process of sin in the world, actual sin was prior to original sin: because Adam first sinned actually, from which sin, as from a cause, nature was corrupted, which corruption of vice and passibility is original sin from concupiscence [fomes]: therefore the medicine of actual sin ought to be before the medicine of original sin: therefore penance is prior to baptism.

§ 27. 6. Furthermore, above in the treatise on baptism it was held that there is a certain baptism of the Spirit [flaminis], and that is of penance: since, therefore, the baptism of the Spirit is before even the baptism of water [fluminis], just as is determined in the same place, it seems that penance is generally before baptism.

§ 28. Solution. It must be said here that there is a prior simply [simpliciter], and a prior in a qualified sense [secundum quid] and with respect to something. Baptism, indeed, is the first sacrament simply: but in a qualified sense and with respect to something, penance is prior according to a certain mode by which it is preparatory to the interior act of compunction, and not as it is satisfactory through the power of the keys: because baptism of itself does not demand mourning or weeping: but he who intends to be baptized, if he is constituted as the arbiter of his own will, requires compunction, lest the Holy Spirit of discipline who operates in baptism flee a feigned [insincere] person.

§ 29. AND IT MUST BE SAID to the reasons first introduced: to the first, indeed, that this is true according to the order of the general floods: because the first flood is that of original sin, and the second is that of actual sin.

§ 30. To the next, it must be said that there are certain sacraments in which there is nothing but the divine, such as Confirmation, Eucharist, Holy Orders, and Extreme Unction: and Baptism is the door, such that nothing is accomplished in them unless baptism is first received. There are others in which the divinity operates around our works and presupposes something in us, such as Penance, and Matrimony: because Augustine says of Penance that he who created you without you will not justify you without you: because in such things we must remove the obstacle to the operating Holy Spirit: and concerning these, with respect to that which is from our work, Baptism is not the door, but only with respect to that which is divine: just as it is in Penance, that it be satisfactory through the keys of the Church: and in Matrimony, that it be entirely indissoluble: because those who contract matrimony not in the faith of the Church can, in some cases, be separated: nevertheless, with respect to that which is divine in them, baptism precedes: hence the penance which is before baptism does not satisfy through the keys: but through interior grace man is disposed to receive baptism, lest he be found insincere.

§ 31. To the others, the solution is evident through what has been said: because they necessarily conclude concerning the order of the sacraments simply, with respect to that which is divine in them.

§ 32. To the first objection made in opposition, however, it must be said that this is said with respect to the separability of sin, not in all, but in adults, in whom a certain mode of penance must precede: and the following objection is understood in the same way.

§ 33. Or it could be said that baptism in the resolution of the penitent works the deletion of sin in this way, just as was noted above in the treatise on baptism: but nevertheless, the first response is better.

§ 34. To the next, it must be said that although it is the first virtue in an adult, it is nevertheless not the first in the order of the sacraments simply, as has been said.

§ 35. To the next, it must be said that it is not necessary that the order of the sacraments of the Church be according to the order of the disease in a person: because although in one person actual sin preceded original sin as its cause: nevertheless, in all people generally, actual sin is rooted in original sin: and the sacraments are given not to a single person, but to the Church, and rather to the children of Adam than to Adam himself: and therefore baptism simply is still prior, although penance is prior with respect to something and in someone.

§ 36. To the next, it must be said that this happens by accident: because the baptism of the Spirit suffices, namely where there is no contempt for religion, but the article of necessity excludes the sacrament: and therefore from this it cannot be concluded that baptism simply follows penance, but only in a qualified sense and in a certain case: and that penance is not there in its total integrity, but there is there something of penance which does not have exterior satisfaction: nor does it even need the interior, except insofar as this is required to remove insincerity, and not with respect to the remission of fault or penalty: because for this, baptism suffices. Hence although fault and a certain part of the penalty are remitted there, this is nevertheless not exacted by baptism, but it is done by the grace which is given to the penitent preparing himself for baptism.

Articulus 49 — Whether Penance Is A Foundation, And How It Is

Is penance a foundation, and in what way is it so?

§ 38. Secondly, it is asked, Whether penance is a foundation, and in what way is it so? And concerning this, four things are asked, namely: is it a foundation, and in what way is it so? Secondly, What things are in that foundation? Thirdly, Concerning the number of them. Fourthly, In what order are they placed in the foundation?

§ 39. It seems, concerning the first, that penance is not a foundation.

§ 40. 1. Through that text of the Apostle: For no one can lay another foundation than that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus: but in one building there is only one foundation: therefore it seems that penance is not a foundation.

§ 41. 2. Furthermore, in Hebrews 11:1: Now faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, where the Gloss says, that is, the foundation: and from this follows the same as before.

§ 42. 3. Furthermore, the foundation is what first occurs in a spiritual building. But faith occurs first: therefore faith is the foundation and not penance. The proof of the minor premise is what the Apostle says: He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and is a rewarder to them that seek him.

§ 43. 4. Furthermore, nothing is a foundation in a spiritual building whose being is preceded by something else spiritual in the same building: but the being of penance is preceded by something else in spiritual matters: therefore it is not a foundation. The proof of the minor premise is what was held above, where it was said that the virtue of penance is conceived by fear: and because all those things which are found disputed first (how penance is the first virtue) are valid for this point, therefore let all things concerning this suffice for the one side.

§ 44. BUT ON THE CONTRARY it is objected: 1. Through that text of the Apostle: Not laying again the foundation of penance: where the Gloss says, that is, not laying penance down, as it were for a stone in the foundation: therefore penance is a foundation.

§ 45. 2. Furthermore, the new life is first founded in that from which the prior old life fails: but that, as has often been held, first fails in penance: therefore there the new life is first founded: therefore penance is a foundation, as it seems.

§ 46. Solution. It must be said that "foundation" is taken in multiple ways in Sacred Scripture, namely, as the first founding externally, namely in God: and this is the immobility of divine election: and concerning this it is said: But the sure foundation of God standeth firm, having this seal. Hence in the same place the Gloss says: "Those stand whom God has elected, and founded immovably in faith."

§ 47. In another way, foundation is spoken of as founding in the mystical body, and not in the spiritual member: and it is the foundation of virtue infused from heaven, concerning which: I will lay thy stones in order with sapphires: and I will make thy bulwarks of jasper, where the Gloss says: "Because by sapphires, which have a heavenly color, virtues are signified."

§ 48. Thirdly, foundation is spoken of as founding the member singularly: and this in multiple ways, namely on the part of the intellect, and on the part of the affection. Now on the part of the intellect, in two ways, namely, according to what is from exterior hearing, or according to what is through the infused light of the intellect founded in the truth of things to be believed: and in the first way, the doctrine of the preaching of the Apostles and Apostolic men is called a foundation: concerning which it is held: The foundations of the wall of the city were twelve, which foundations are the doctrines of the twelve Apostles. The foundation of the intellect, however, is called faith. But on the part of the foundation in the affection, penance is the foundation, and certain other things about which it will be spoken below in the following article of the question.

§ 49. To the FIRST objection, therefore, it must be said that there he is speaking of the foundation of one coming to the building, not of one existing in the building itself: because faith first opens the eyes of the one coming: but penance places him, and brings about the contrary from the spiritual building.

§ 50. To the next, it must be said that faith is the first, which through cognition makes the things to be hoped for subsist in us: but nevertheless, it is not the proximate placing of the building, but rather penance clearing the place, and initiating the foundations in the good.

§ 51. To the next, it must be said that it is not necessary that this be the foundation: and this is because faith and fear, according to their unformed acts, can precede the substance of the foundation: because faith is like pointing out the cause for building, and fear is like digging: while penance is like constructing the whole building through contrition, confession, and satisfaction, although the habits of fear and faith, informed by grace and charity, belong to the foundation and the building.

§ 52. And through this, the solution to the following is also evident.

Articulus 50 — What Things Are In That Foundation; And, Whether Penance Which Is A Foundation Is A Virtue Or A Sacrament

What things are in that foundation? and, Is the penance which is a foundation a virtue or a sacrament?

§ 54. Secondly it is asked, What things are in that foundation?

§ 55. Now the Gloss on the epistle to the Hebrews 6:1 says that there are six things belonging to this foundation: and these are the words of the Gloss: "Now he divides this foundation into six things, which are the beginning, namely penance, faith, the doctrine of baptisms, and the laying on of hands, and the resurrection, and judgment." Concerning penance indeed it has been sufficiently disputed in the preceding question.

§ 56. But it is asked, Concerning which penance is it understood that it is a foundation, whether concerning that which is a virtue, or that which is a sacrament?

§ 57. It seems, however, that it is concerning that which is a virtue: because 1. Virtue is contrary to vice: and penance is the virtue which destroys the old man: therefore it first begins the new man: and this is to be the first foundation in the building: therefore the virtue of penance is that which is the foundation.

§ 58. 2. Furthermore, the virtue of penance is that which moves to the detestation of sin, as was held above: but this is what must be done first, namely the motion unto the destruction of sin: therefore penance, according as it is a virtue, is the first thing founding the penitent in the spiritual building.

§ 59. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. Upon that text of the Apostle: Not laying again the foundation of penance, Jerome says: "Whoever converts any persons to the faith, first teaches them to repent, and to be baptized for the remission of sins": but penance according as it is taught by a minister of the Church, is a sacrament: therefore penance according as it is a sacrament, is the foundation.

§ 60. 2. Also, certain other sacraments are placed in the foundation, namely baptism, and confirmation: therefore penance is also taken there for the sacrament.

§ 61. 3. Also, John who taught repentance, taught to confess and to satisfy. Hence it is said there that they went out to him confessing their sins: and he gave them counsel on how to bring forth worthy fruits of penance in satisfaction: but penance thus considered in its parts is a sacrament: therefore according as it is a sacrament, it is a foundation.

§ 62. THEN it is asked concerning the second thing which is in the foundation, namely concerning faith.

§ 63. For it seems that charity is more a foundation: because 1. The foundation is the root: but charity is the root of the good: hence Gregory: "A branch of good work has no greenness, unless it remains in the root of charity": therefore charity is the foundation.

§ 64. 2. Also, to the Ephesians: Rooted and founded in charity, that you may be able to comprehend, with all the saints, etc.

§ 65. 3. Furthermore, fear seems to be the foundation: because fear is the beginning of wisdom. But certain other things availing to this were noted above, where it was asked how penance is the first virtue.

§ 66. THEN it is asked concerning the doctrine of baptism. 1. Since indeed a neophyte is not only taught to be baptized, but many other things, why is the doctrine of other things not placed in the foundation, like the doctrine of baptism?

§ 67. 2. Furthermore, there is only one baptism, as the Apostle says: One Lord, one faith, one baptism: therefore he says inappropriately, "of baptisms".

§ 68. THEN it is asked concerning the fourth, namely concerning the laying on of hands which is done in Confirmation.

§ 69. It seems, however, that the Eucharist is more a foundation: because 1. In it is the Lord of the sacraments, from whom every sacrament draws its vigor: therefore it founds more than confirmation.

§ 70. 2. Furthermore, without a foundation nothing of the spiritual building is had: but without confirmation something is had with respect to grace and glory: therefore confirmation is not a foundation. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved from the fact that many dying unconfirmed pass over to glory, such as many infants and adults, since it is not a sacrament of necessity.

§ 71. 3. Furthermore, the confirmation of buildings is rather at the summit through the subtle closing of the vault [the keystone], than in the foundation: therefore it seems that confirmation pertains more to perfection than to the foundation.

§ 72. 4. Furthermore, that which is founded, is not [yet complete]: but that which is confirmed, is [already complete]: therefore that which is founded, is not confirmed: therefore confirmation is not a foundation.

§ 73. THEN it is asked concerning the fifth, which is resurrection.

§ 74. For it seems that this is superfluous: because 1. It is understood in faith.

§ 75. 2. Furthermore, since all sins are remitted in the unity and communion of the Church, it seems that the penitent in whom the new life is founded ought to be moved more by believing that article which is, In the holy Church and the communion of saints, than that which is, The resurrection of the body: therefore the former ought more to be placed in the foundation, than the latter.

§ 76. LASTLY it is asked concerning the sixth, which is judgment.

§ 77. For in judgment there is the terror of the judge: therefore an inclination to desperation: because the second coming terrifies, and the first soothes the sinner to hope: therefore since hope is more expedient to the penitent than terrifying fear, the article of the incarnation which is about the first coming ought more to be placed in the foundation, than the judgment which is about the second.

§ 78. Solution. It must be said that, just as the Gloss on the epistle to the Hebrews 6:1 says, those six things are of the foundation of the Christian religion, which is founded in the one coming to it: and certain of these are like the proximate foundations of the building: and certain ones are like the first foundations placing the proximate foundation, as will be held in the following article.

§ 79. To that therefore which is first asked concerning penance, it must be said that according to the state of an adult coming to the Christian religion, the sacrament of penance with respect to a part of itself, namely removing insincerity, is among those things which are first required: and therefore it belongs to the foundation, just as both the Gloss seems to intimate, and the objection made to the contrary.

§ 80. But to that which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is true that virtue is contrary to vice: but according to this it is prior by infusion rather than from doctrine: for penance here is called the rudiments of penance, which are proposed to the penitent: just as also faith refers to the rudiments of faith, which are expounded to those who are catechized, when they are neophytes: and these rudiments are rather of the sacrament than of the virtue.

§ 81. To the next, it must be said that the virtue of penance is not the first foundation: because certain things to be done for the foundation are prior to all virtue, such as those which are the elements of the beginning of the word of justice, and those are what the Apostle calls the foundation, as the Gloss on the epistle to the Hebrews 6:1 says.

§ 82. To the next, it must be said that almost all of those have been resolved above. It must be said, nevertheless, that charity does not properly found, but connects perfection, as it is said, in 1 Timothy 1:5 and following.

§ 83. But to this which is objected concerning Gregory, it must be said that it is the foundation of a meritorious work: because it gives the form of being a merit: but it is not the foundation of the Christian religion, which is proposed to one assuming the Christian religion: and therefore that has no validity for the proposition.

§ 84. To the next, it must be said that to be rooted and also founded does not happen in charity, except with respect to the form of a meritorious work: and this is not to be the foundation of the Christian religion, as has been said, except accidentally and in a qualified sense.

§ 85. To the next, it must be said that fear, according to its act, is as it were digging a trench in the foundation through the flight from evil, but not as disposing the stones, which are a part of the building, but rather penance does this.

§ 86. To that which is further asked, it must be said that to neophytes only those things first occurring that are necessary for the beginning are proposed: and one of these is baptism, which gives spiritual being to the baptized person, as Dionysius says: and therefore just as being is first required before operation in natural things, so also in gratuitous things: but other things are not so primarily congruent.

§ 87. To the NEXT it must be said according to the Gloss, that he speaks in the plural, of baptisms: because baptism is threefold: and much has been held about this in the treatise on Baptism, and let it be sought there, because these points are valid: but it is called one baptism because there is one substantial cause, and one character, and it is not reiterated: nevertheless, its effect is given in multiple ways, and because of this it is spoken of in the plural, of baptisms.

§ 88. But TO THIS which is asked concerning the fourth, it seems it must be said that Confirmation, insofar as it confirms in the fight, belongs to the building: for a building not only saves, but also fortifies in battle.

§ 89. TO the first therefore which is against this, it must be said that the Eucharist, although it is the most worthy of the sacraments with respect to the reality contained, is nevertheless not necessary for him who is being built up in the Christian religion, like confirmation is: because a continuous fight presses upon the Christian: and therefore it is necessary that the Christian be founded in it.

§ 90. To the next, it must be said that it is true that Confirmation is not a sacrament of necessity: but because the Christian religion attends not only to those things which are of necessity, but also to those things which are of perfection, therefore it is necessary that the things sustaining the perfection of the building be placed in the foundation. Now the fight of persecution belongs to the perfection of the Christian life and religion: and therefore, as that upon which it may be built, Confirmation is premised in the foundation. Hence in the primitive Church they were immediately confirmed after they were baptized.

§ 91. To the next, it must be said that the confirmation of a building already made is one thing, because that happens through consolation and the increase of grace: and the confirmation which is in the foundation is another, because that is nothing else than the collation of grace, upon which many things can be founded without fear of ruin, and in this way confirmation confirms, in which the Holy Spirit is given for strength, and this confirmation belongs to the foundation.

§ 92. To the next, it must be said that, just as it is said in Romans 6:4, resurrection is shown in an exemplary way in justification, which is in penance: and therefore justification is also called the first resurrection: and therefore the penitent must be founded in the resurrection: for the resurrection of grace prefigures the resurrection of glory, and is ordered to it.

§ 93. To THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that faith is not placed in the number of those six, except for the sake of the rudiments of faith, especially for the sake of the articles concerning the Trinity and unity, which operates in the sacraments: therefore they are also asked about in exorcisms and catechisms: and this is not posited by reason of all the articles: and therefore this one is not superfluous, nor is its position.

§ 94. To the next, it must be said that justification itself is one thing, and its foundation is another: but the foundation is the resurrection, because if it is not believed the whole is overthrown, and because it is shown in an exemplary way in penance.

§ 95. To the next, it must be said that judgment induces a fear which makes one repent, lest one fall into the future judgment: and therefore it belongs to the foundation.

§ 96. But TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that hope follows fear: because fear flees evil, and therefore judgment founds first through fear. Or it may be said that in the second judgment both are understood as moving, namely both fear by reason of the punishments which will be inflicted there on the wicked, and hope by reason of the rewards which will be given there to the good: and both of these are not in the first coming, but only one of them: and therefore not the faith of the first coming, but of the second is placed in the foundation.

Articulus 51 — Whether The Foundation Of The Things To Be Hoped For Of The Christian Religion Is The Same As The First Zeal

Is the foundation of the things to be hoped for of the Christian religion, and of the eternal reward the same?

§ 98. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the number of those things which are in the foundation. But it seems that there is only one, through that text of the Apostle: For no one can lay another foundation, etc. And since of any corporeal building there are not multiple foundations: therefore neither of the spiritual building.

§ 99. But because this entire disputation is almost determined by the preceding article, it must be said that foundation (as was said above) is spoken of in multiple ways, namely of faith, of things to be hoped for, and of the Christian religion, and of the reward.

§ 100. Concerning the foundation of faith, it is understood what is said in 1 Corinthians 3:11, because the whole faith is upon Christ's deity or humanity: for according to His deity He is from the Father, and from Him is the Holy Spirit, who is sent to the Saints and unites the Church: but according to His humanity He is incarnate, suffered, and rose again as the cause and argument of our resurrection.

§ 101. But of things to be hoped for—through which namely the things to be hoped for subsist in us—faith according to its act is the foundation: because it first opens the eyes to see the things to be hoped for, and consents to them that they are: and through this it founds them in us.

§ 102. But the foundation of the Christian religion is gathered from the six things which are numbered in the Gloss on the epistle to the Hebrews 6:1: because the Christian religion begins from what is hidden to our reason, and difficult, and the removal from sins: and therefore it is founded, that is, it is begun from three things in genus, namely from the removal and destruction of the contrary, and this is as it were making a place for the building: and this is penance either according to order into the difficult good which it begins, or according to conserving in it. If according to order, this is in two ways, namely to being and to strength in the difficult fight: and with respect to being it further happens in two ways, namely with respect to the grace itself giving being to the Christian religion, and with respect to the order which is in the acts of virtues: and with respect to the order of acts, faith founds; but with respect to the grace giving being, the doctrine of baptisms founds. To the fight in the difficult, the strength of grace given in the laying on of hands founds: but the conserving things are those inducing hope and fear: and this happens especially from the future judgment, for which two things are required, namely the judgment on the part of the judge, and the possibility of presentation in judgment on the part of the one to be judged: and on the part of the one to be judged, the resurrection induces hope and fear, and thus it founds: but on the part of the judge, the future judgment founds.

§ 103. And through this the solution concerning all the things which are required here is evident.

Articulus 52 — Whether Faith Precedes Penance

Does faith precede penance?

§ 105. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the order of these things.

§ 106. For it seems that faith precedes penance: because 1. In Hebrews 11:6, it is said that he that cometh to God must believe that he is, etc.: but the penitent has already approached: therefore before this approach faith already existed: therefore it has to be ordered before penance in the foundation.

§ 107. 2. Furthermore, Augustine says that faith is the first virtue, and the first foundation: therefore, et cetera.

§ 108. 3. Moreover, in the catechisms they are instructed first concerning the resurrection of the dead and concerning the judgment, before they receive baptism: therefore it seems that they ought to be ordered in the foundation before baptism: and the Gloss says the contrary.

§ 109. Furthermore, it is asked concerning the Lord's Prayer, which is touched upon in a certain Gloss as being of the beginning of the Christian religion: why is it not ordered among those things which belong to the foundation?

§ 110. For a certain Gloss says thus: "It is of the beginning of faith, by which the uninstructed to be catechized..."

§ 1. ...are, as is the symbol of faith, and the Lord's Prayer.

§ 2. Response. To this it seems it must be said, that these are ordered in the foundation according to the manner in which they are explained by him who approaches the Christian religion. Hence, because penance first removes one from the contrary, therefore it is placed first; but faith distinguishes the things to be believed which are in the Christian religion, and therefore it is placed second; and baptism gives being to the affection prepared by penance, and to the intellect prepared by faith: and therefore it is placed third. But that which corroborates being itself is fourth: just as in natural things perfection of quantity follows being, and after these come conserving factors. But because the resurrection makes one fear or love the judgment: for if one does not rise, one will neither fear nor love: because one will receive neither good nor evil there: but if one rises, one will fear or love: therefore the resurrection is placed before judgment.

§ 3. To this, however, which is first objected concerning faith, it must be said that faith is twofold, namely indistinct: and in this way, regarding a certain act of confused cognition of God and of sin, it precedes penance. But there is a faith distinctly assenting to the believed article, and this does not exist unless grace has already been given through penance, and such is that upon which the Christian religion is founded: and therefore the articles of faith are explained to catechumens.

§ 4. To the other it must be said, that faith is the first virtue both in the intellect, and as to the act of confused cognition, and not distinctly: but distinctly assenting, it follows the destruction of sin through penance.

§ 5. To the other it must be said, that resurrection and judgment as believed things, are supposed in faith, as are other articles of the symbol of faith, as the Gloss says, introduced in this same article of the question: but as conserving factors in the Christian religion they follow as things constantly remembered, thus they are ordered in the foundation.

§ 6. To the other it must be said, that the Lord's Prayer is not essentially of the foundation, although it is in some way of the inchoation: because before the essence of the Christian religion someone can pray: but by that Gloss it is posited of the inchoation extrinsically, and thus it is impetrating the foundation of the Christian religion.

§ 7. And let these things said concerning the modes of penance suffice.

Articulus 53 — Whether Every Sin Is Expressed In The Decalogue

Whether every sin is expressed in the Decalogue?

§ 8. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, just below the middle: Another is the action of penance after baptism, etc.

§ 9. For it seems from this, that every sin is contained in the Decalogue, which seems false.

§ 10. 1. Concerning pride, hypocrisy, vainglory, envy, and many others, if one descends to particulars: since therefore penance is for these, it does not seem to be only for those which the Decalogue of the law contains.

§ 11. 2. Furthermore, bad will prohibited in the Decalogue is not except as regards the sin of avarice, since a bad word prohibited there is not except by reason of perjury and lying: since therefore sin occurs in many other ways, both in heart and in mouth, and pardon is granted for every sin through penance, Augustine seems to distinguish imperfectly the mode of penance which is after baptism.

§ 12. If by chance you say, that just as something is in a predicament [category] in two ways, namely as directly contained in it, like a subalternate genus, or species, or individual: but something else as reduced to it as a first genus, just as we say matter and form are in the genus of substance, and a point and unity and the "now" in quantity: thus something is in two ways pro-

-hibited in the Decalogue, namely as directly prohibited, and as reduced to the prohibited according to the ratio of cause or effect. Against this: When something is reduced to a predicament, it is not sufficient that it be in some way or other first, but it must be the first from which the essence of the predicament flows: therefore it will be similarly in the precepts: but no sin essentially flows from another: therefore no sin can be thus reduced to the prohibition of another sin.

§ 14. 3. Furthermore, the precepts are not only prohibitive, but rather some are affirmative: therefore according to this solution every good which must be done must be reduced to the honoring of parents or the keeping of the Sabbath, as a principle or a principiate: and how this could be is difficult even for those wishing to imagine it.

§ 15. Response. It must be said that every mortal and venial sin is understood to be prohibited in the Decalogue, and every good to be done is commanded to be done there, that is, what is so to be done that unless it is done, the one omitting it will not be saved. Now, sin is understood in general to be prohibited in two ways, namely directly, or indirectly. Directly indeed all mortal sins are prohibited, and indirectly venial ones. But mortal sins are prohibited in three ways, namely expressly, or because they are causes of things expressly prohibited, or because they are their effects. Expressly again in two ways, namely by the name itself and by the scope of the community of the name itself: expressly, as under moechia (adultery) adultery is prohibited: because when it is broadened, under the name of moechia within the scope of the name all illicit coitus is prohibited, and any illicit effusion of seed: and thus fornication, defloration, rape, incest, sodomy, and the vice of pathics are prohibited. But as a cause, gluttony, and drunkenness, and all things which excite the concupiscence of the flesh to the illicit. And as an effect, scurrility, impurities, illicit dances, and all such things: and thus it is plain also to understand concerning others. And it is similar in affirmative precepts: for it is necessary that by the broadened name of "parent" the neighbor is understood, and the neighbor is (as Augustine says) he who is created with us to possess eternal joys: and by the name of "honor" is understood due reverence and subvention, as much in spiritual things as in temporal things. But there are some things as inducing to this by way of cause, like love or affection for the neighbor: and certain effects, like congratulation, speaking well, and such like: and thus it is plain to see in others.

§ 16. But to that which is objected against this reduction, it must be said that it is impossible in the whole to find a perfect likeness between two things: because thus the similar things would not be two, but one: but just as it is in the predicaments, and in first essences, and in those reduced to them, so it is in the primary things to be done, and to be avoided, and those reduced to them: and just as those flow from their principles essentially, so these flow from their principles voluntarily: because in morals the greatest of principles is the will: and because the nature of an essence is subject to necessity, therefore those necessary things flow from their principles. But because these are causing and caused mediating the will, and the will is free: therefore these remain in liberty inclining the will.

§ 17. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 18. But something must be added to this disputation from that which was disputed upon the end of the third book of the Sentences concerning the precepts.

Articulus 54 — Whether Penance Belongs To The Good; And, Whether The Good And Humble Ought To Do Penance For Venial Sins

Whether there is penance for the good? and, Whether the good and humble ought to do penance for venial sins?

Whether there is penance for the good? and, Whether the good and humble ought to do penance for venial sins?

§ 19. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there C, in the middle: There is also a penance of the good, etc.

§ 20. For it seems that this is false: because 1. The good and humble have more cause for joy than for penance: therefore penance is not of them.

§ 21. 2. Also, penance is of evil: therefore it is not of the good and humble, because those things are best: therefore it is not of the good and humble.

§ 22. If by chance you say, that it is not of the good and humble, insofar as they are good and humble, but insofar as they admit venial sins,

§ 23. Let it be asked, Whether the good and humble ought to do penance for venial sins?

§ 24. But it seems that they should: because to whomever it belongs to satisfy, to him it belongs to repent: but it belongs to the good and humble to satisfy for venial sins: therefore it also belongs to them to repent. The proof of the middle premise was held above, that to satisfy is to cut out the roots of sins, and not to indulge further access to their suggestions: but in the good and humble there are the roots of sins, because of the fomes, and the corruption of vices, and the proneness to sinning: therefore the proposition stands.

§ 25. But on the contrary is this, that 1. It is said to be a topic from commonly occurring accidents: he repents: therefore he sinned.

§ 26. 2. Furthermore, it was held above, that penance is of perpetrated evil insofar as it is perpetrated: therefore he who has not perpetrated evil, does not have to repent; and therefore penance is not of the good and humble, as it seems.

§ 27. 3. Furthermore, the Philosopher in IX of the Metaphysics, and Avicenna in VI of his Metaphysics say, that from a potency for good or evil no one is good or bad: because in evil the act is worse than the potency, and in good the act is better than the potency: but in the good and humble who have not sinned, there is nothing but the potency for evil: therefore they have not sinned: therefore they are not bound to repent.

§ 28. Solution. It must be said that penance is of the good and humble, as the Letter says: but it is not insofar as they are good and humble. Now the penance of such persons is two-fold, namely for good, and for evil: for good not insofar as it is good, but insofar as it is mixed with evil: because thus it is said, Isa. 64:6: All our justices are as the rag of a menstruous woman. Hence the negligence and indevotion that fall upon them force the good and humble to fear even their own good works, and thus in a certain way to repent of them: and this is what Job 9:28 says: I feared all my works, knowing that thou didst not spare the offender. In another way they repent of venial sin which falls daily in the use of life: concerning the penance of which is treated in the following chapter.

§ 29. But to the 1st thing which is asked, Whether the good and humble not sinning are bound to repent?

§ 30. It must be said that they are not.

§ 31. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that the root of sin is twofold, namely contracted and made, according to the fact that similar dispositions and habits are left behind from works, as the Philosopher says. Now the first root is weakened and dried up, not by penance, but by the contrary use of doing good: and the second is that which is eradicated through the satisfaction of penance: and concerning that root the introduced authority is understood.

§ 32. And through this the solution is clear.

Articulus 55 — Whether Someone Not Having A Debt Can Say The Lord's Prayer

Whether someone having no debt, can say the Lord's prayer?

Whether someone having no debt, can say the Lord's prayer?

§ 33. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, in the middle: Saying: Forgive us, etc.

§ 34. For it is asked, Whether someone having no debt, can say the Lord's prayer?

§ 35. It seems, that he cannot: because 1. He does not have a debt: therefore he will not truly ask for a debt to be forgiven him: therefore he cannot say the Lord's prayer.

§ 36. 2. Furthermore, in a certain parable of Matthew 18:23 et seq., where the Lord speaks about the forgiveness of debt, he supposes those servants to owe something: therefore he who owes nothing cannot demand that a debt be forgiven: therefore such a one cannot say the Lord's prayer, as it seems.

§ 37. If by chance you say, that that case never happens in anyone: because as it is said, 1 John 1:8: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. AGAINST: Augustine glosses this passage thus, saying that this is said because we cannot be without sin for a long time: but we can be without sin for an hour: therefore it seems, that in that hour such a one could not say the Lord's prayer.

§ 38. 3. Furthermore, James 5:15 speaks doubtfully of the state of sin, saying: If he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him: for speaking thus he intimates that it is possible for someone to be without sin for a long time: and then the question stated above has a place.

§ 39. 4. Furthermore, Augustine says that venial sin does in a just man what a drop of water does in a furnace of fire: but a drop by its very fall into a furnace is immediately consumed, and does not remain: therefore venial sin falling into the soul of a perfect man is immediately consumed: therefore he remains without venial sin: and it is established that he is without mortal sin: therefore such a one has no debt of venial or mortal sin: therefore he cannot say the Our Father.

§ 40. Solution. It must be said that every Christian man can and ought to say the Our Father.

§ 41. But to this which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that such a state is rare, on account of three things, namely the multitude of venial sins, and ignorance, and adherence. I call "multitude" the mode of sinning venially, of which there is a great noise around us, as much in the senses as in the heart: "ignorance," because it seems to me impossible to notice everything: hence the Psalmist says by reason of the multitude: Who can understand sins? And by reason of ignorance: From my secret ones cleanse me, O Lord. And by reason of adherence he says: From those of others spare thy servant: because certain things adhere to us alienating us from the fervor of charity, but they do not alienate from the habit. Yet if such a state exists, I still say, that even if it is, nevertheless a man ought not to presume to be in such a state: because, as blessed Gregory says: It is the mark of good minds to acknowledge a fault there, where there is no fault.

§ 42. But if you say that it is so, that through revelation he knows that all sins have been forgiven him: I say still, that it does not yet follow that he himself is not a debtor of some punishment, and by reason of that he can say the Our Father.

§ 43. But if you posit that he is not even a debtor of punishment, and knows this through revelation: I say still, that he ought to say it in the person of the members of the Church: for thus Christ the head of the Church, by reason of the members, says that the faults are His in the Psalm where it is said: O my God, look upon me, etc.

§ 44. Thus one member ought to transform into himself that which belongs to another: hence He teaches to pray in the plural by saying: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive, etc., not, Forgive me my debts.

§ 45. And through this the solution to all the questions asked is clear.

§ 46. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, a little before the end: For what does it matter to a shipwreck, whether by one great wave, etc.

§ 47. For from this it seems, that venial sin becomes mortal: and concerning this let it be asked below.

DISTINCTIO XVII

Divisio Textus

§ 48. Here arises a manifold question, etc. The Master in this distinction makes a collation among the parts of penance taken individually, and touches first on three questions, as is clear in the Letter: and according to the prosecution of those three the whole distinction is divided into three parts: and this is easy for anyone to see, and therefore we must insist on the disputation.

Articulus 1 — Whether In Contrition Alone Sin Is Remitted

Whether sin is forgiven in contrition alone?

§ 49. First therefore it is asked concerning the first question, namely Whether sin is forgiven in contrition alone?

§ 50. But it seems, that it is: 1. For what can do more, can also do less: but contrition alone in a case of necessity can supply the place of baptism: therefore it can also supply the place of confession and satisfaction.

§ 51. 2. Furthermore, whatever medicine includes within itself all things which are opposed to the disease and the causes of the disease, that per se without another is efficacious for the expulsion of the disease: but contrition is this kind of medicine against actual mortal sin: therefore without confession and satisfaction it expels the disease. The first is evident per se. The second however is proved from the fact that in actual sin there is nothing but guilt and punishment: and the contraries of those are in contrition because grace is contrary to guilt, and the punishment of sin is contrary to passion, which is delight, and the sustaining of that sorrow loosens the obligation of punishment which is in the guilt.

§ 52. 3. Furthermore, a medicine which is sometimes given, and sometimes not given, with the same causes of diseases existing, and other things holding themselves similarly, is not necessary, but of well-being (de bene esse): but confession is sometimes given to contrite sinners, and similarly satisfaction, but sometimes not: therefore confession and satisfaction are of the well-being of penance, and not of its very being. The first is evident: because art insofar as it can always exhibits all things necessary for a cure. But the second is proved in Mary Magdalene, who (as Gregory says) had seven demons, because she was full of all vices: and yet, Luke 7:37 et seq., by the contrition of the heart alone she was healed: therefore the proposition stands.

§ 54. 4. Furthermore, whatever things are of the essence and necessity of something, never leave it: but confession and satisfaction were sometimes not of penance, or not as they are now, as is proved from the disputation held above concerning confession: therefore they are not of the essence: therefore since penance by its essence is sufficient for the expulsion of the disease, and contrition alone is essential, it seems that it without confession of mouth and satisfaction of work suffices for the deletion of actual sin.

§ 55. 5. Furthermore, in the moment of the infusion of grace guilt and eternal punishment are loosed: but this moment is in contrition before confession and satisfaction: therefore it seems, that confession and satisfaction are not necessary for the loosing of guilt.

§ 56. 6. Furthermore, let us posit, that someone is contrite in truth: it is established, that in truth sin according to guilt and eternal punishment is forgiven him: let it be therefore, that this man dies unconfessed: therefore he will be saved, because in dying he does not sin, because nothing falls between contrition and death: therefore confession and satisfaction are not among the things necessary for salvation.

§ 57. 7. If by chance you say, that penance exacts a vow of confession and a vow of satisfaction. AGAINST: Either it exacts this, on the ground that it is of the essence of penance, or because it is commanded that he confess: if it is exacted for this reason, because it is of the integrity of penance, then there was never true penance without it: which is evident to all to be false. If it is exacted for this reason, because it is commanded: therefore it is not exacted except accidentally, and on account of another thing: therefore by itself contrition sufficed.

§ 58. 8. Furthermore, the constitution of the Church either weakened the force of contrition, or conferred nothing upon it, neither harmed it, nor helped it. If it weakened it. AGAINST: Blessed Bernard says: What is instituted by charity, ought not to militate against charity: but whatever the Church statutes it institutes by charity: therefore it ought not to militate against it: but everything weakening the force of a sacrament, militates against charity: therefore it ought not to be observed: but contrition is a sacrament, as will be held below in the Letter: therefore the constitution concerning confession ought not to be observed. But if it neither conferred, nor harmed: therefore it was useless: but nothing useless is to be universally observed in the Church, especially against the sacraments: therefore again this constitution ought not to have been kept. But if it helped. AGAINST: What by itself can produce some effect, is stronger than that which with another and not except with another which is in will or in act: but contrition without the purpose of confessing, could delete actual sin: and you say, that now it cannot without the will of confessing on account of the constitution of the Church: therefore its force is lessened on account of the constitution of the Church: therefore that constitution is not to be observed.

§ 59. 9. Furthermore, it is established, that God absolves in contrition: therefore He either absolves him simply, or with a condition. If simply: therefore not under that condition, that he confess and satisfy: therefore he is not bound to confess and satisfy. If with a condition: but every condition belongs to one doubting: therefore doubt falls upon God absolving the sinner himself, which is absurd: therefore He absolves simply: therefore he is not bound to confess and satisfy.

§ 60. 10. Furthermore, in all judgments it suffices the cognition of the cause and the amends of the fault, according to which the cause is cognized: therefore this suffices in the judgment of God, who judges the penitent: but the cause of the fault is in the heart which God intuites, and perfectly cognizes: therefore if He cognizes the amends according to the same, it suffices for the whole correction of the sin: but contrition exhibits a perfect amends in the heart: and this God cognizes: therefore it alone suffices for the whole correction of the sin.

§ 62. 11. Furthermore, in every kind of disease it is countered at the source and not in the members over which the stream of the disease flows: therefore it ought to be done thus in spiritual medicine: but every sin has its cause in the heart: and if the heart were not, there would be no deformity in the mouth, nor in the work: therefore it seems, that the medicine ought not to be except in the heart: but this is done by contrition alone: therefore the contrition of the heart alone suffices.

§ 63. 12. Furthermore, whatever contains in itself the perfect ratio of penance, this per se suffices without another for the expulsion of the disease: but contrition contains in itself the perfect ratio of penance: therefore contrition alone suffices for the perfect expulsion of the actual disease. The proof of the first is from the fact that nothing but penance is given against actual mortal sin, and not another spiritual medicine. But the second is proved from what Ambrose says in the Letter: Penance is the true sorrow of the heart and bitterness of soul for the evils which each one has committed: and it is established, that this does not belong to penance except by reason of contrition.

§ 64. But against this it is objected, and 1. All the authorities introduced in the Letter are subjected, which prove that without confession sin is not forgiven.

§ 65. 2. But by reason it is objected thus: Nothing can be detested unless recognized: but sin in every penance must be detested: therefore it must be recognized: but recognition is diversified according to the things in which it is: for recognition is one thing in intellectual things, and another in corporal things, and another in sacramental things: therefore just as in intellectual things intellectual recognition is exacted, and in operations operative recognition, so in sacramental things sacramental recognition is exacted: but this is in the narration of sins: and this is confession: therefore to the sacramental detestation of sin and penance confession is exacted.

§ 66. 3. Furthermore, every sacrament consists in the dispensation of the ministers of the Church: but nothing is dispensed unless cognized: therefore in order that the minister may operate about the sins of the penitent, he must cognize the sins: but he cannot know them except through confession: therefore to the dispensation of the sacrament of penance confession is exacted.

§ 67. 4. Furthermore, the sorrow of the penitent is satisfactive through the keys: but the force of the keys consists in the discretion of the sin, and in the absolution of the penitent: therefore before the effect of the keys the minister must cognize concerning the sins: and he cannot except through confession: therefore to the penitent, in order that he be absolved, confession is necessary.

§ 68. 5. Also, Daniel 9:4 et seq., and in other places of the Old Testament it is said, that when they wished to impetrate grace, they confessed their sins: therefore much more is it exacted in the New Testament in which grace is greater. [580]

§ 69. 6. Furthermore, Joshua 7:19: Joshua said to Achan: My son, give glory to the Lord God of Israel, and confess, namely, your sin, and tell me what thou hast done, hide it not. [581] Therefore he who returns from sins cannot glorify God, except through confession: therefore confession of fault is exacted in penance.

§ 70. 7. Also, in every judgment of condemnation the conviction of the condemned is exacted: but in penance there is a certain judgment in which the penitent is condemned to a determined punishment: therefore conviction is exacted: but it cannot be done through witnesses: therefore it must be done through confession: therefore in penance confession is exacted.

§ 71. Response. I say, as was held above in the beginning of the preceding distinction, that penance, insofar as it is a sacrament ordained against the whole disease of sin, has three parts: contrition, confession, and satisfaction: and in this way it must well be conceded, that the absolution of sin never occurs without confession existing in vow or in effect.

§ 72. But how it operates against sin, is manifest from the higher things [treated earlier], as far as I can understand.

§ 73. But if penance is accepted as it is in the ratio of a virtue, or a grace, or a passion only, I well think that it is not necessary that confession be present: hence also all the reasons introduced for that part, that confession is exacted, are taken from the ratio of penance insofar as it is a sacrament, because otherwise they seem to have no appearance [of truth].

§ 74. To this therefore which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that contrition never excludes the vow of being baptized in the unbaptized, but only the effect: and thus I well concede, that in a similar article of necessity it can exclude the effect of confession, but never the vow if the faculty is present: but all the said things operate existing in a vow, because God looks upon the will: and thus it is said, 2 Cor. 8:12: If the will is prompt, it is accepted according to that which it hath, not according to that which it hath not. [582] And this is what is said by the Doctors, that a complete will is reputed for the deed.

§ 75. To the same it must be said, that the first proposition is not true, unless just as it contains all things, so it contains them sufficiently: and this is not true of contrition, because it itself is not sufficient without confession existing in vow, or in act and vow. Or it may be said, that it does not contain all things: because in penance there is the edification of the neighbor, and contrition of itself does not contain the edification of the one satisfying: and therefore through the minister in confession it is exacted, that the Church be reconciled: and this last solution is common, but yet the first is truer.

§ 76. To the other it must be said, that some recognition of sin was always exacted producing the sin in general, or in species, or in number, as was held above in the question concerning confession: but that which according to itself is divine, can well receive a diverse determination in the process of time: and therefore when the true Church had the keys, not merely the figure of the keys, then it was determined, that a man having sin should recognize it by detesting it before a man through confession: and therefore although penance was sometimes without such confession as now is in the Church, nevertheless it was not simply without confession as to the substance of confession in general.

580. 2 Corinthians 8:12.

§ 77. To the other it must be said, that although the confession of Mary Magdalene, and of Peter, and of certain others is not read, nevertheless it was done: because many things were done, which nevertheless were not written.

§ 78. Yet you have another solution above in the preceding distinction, that it was one thing concerning those who received from the Lord Himself, and another concerning others: because the Lord cognized it, and the blush of the heart before His presence according to humility was greater, than to us is the blush of the face before a priest cognizing the face: and therefore for such persons the confession of the heart could suffice, but not for us: because not from Him, but from a human priest, the vicar of God, do we receive penance.

§ 79. To the other it must be said, just as to the preceding, namely that they are almost the same.

§ 80. To the other it must be said, that although guilt is loosed in a moment, nevertheless a movement of free will in the detestation of sin is exacted: because in the justification of the impious four things are simultaneous in time habitually, although not actually, and they are simultaneous according to nature: of which one is the movement of free will upon the sin by detesting it, and that movement supposes the vow of confessing and satisfying: and thus it is evident, that nothing prohibits that three things be in one and the same moment: one in act, namely contrition, and two supposed in vow, namely confession and satisfaction.

§ 82. To the other it must be said, that such a position is well possible: but it is never true contrition which excludes confession and satisfaction, not by an article of necessity, but by contempt of religion: hence if he is truly contrite, he himself has the vow of confessing and satisfying: and if he dies thus, confession and satisfaction operate in him existing in vow.

§ 83. To the other it must be said, that confession in general has a divine precept, but in species it receives determination through the Church, as was said above in the same question.

§ 84. To the other it must be said, that the institution of the Church confers much upon penance: because, as was said, contrition never suffices without some confession: but now a time has been determined, which is once a year: and a mode through the narration of the sin with certain circumstances on account of the judgment of the keys and their effect: and this confers very much upon the penitent for the remission of the punishment of sin, and also for a greater detestation of the guilt: and yet it weakens contrition in nothing: nor does it make the state of moderns worse than that of the ancients, on account of the great benefit which they attain from the force of the keys, which the ancients did not attain: just as the state of him would not be worse who gives a denarius and a half-penny, so that he may receive something bought with a great addition, than his who buys it for a denarius without the addition.

§ 85. To the other it must be said, that God simply absolves in contrition: but absolution is accepted in one way from the part of the absolver, and in another way from the part of the absolved. For from the part of the absolver there is no condition and no doubt: but from the part of the absolved the vow of confessing and satisfying is supposed, without which there is no contrition. Nor is this unfitting, that on the part of God creating nothing is material, nothing is temporal, nothing is conditioned: and yet on the part of the created thing materiality, temporality, and condition fall upon it according to the nature of the created thing: and perhaps Master Hugh of St. Victor considered this, saying in the book On the power of binding and loosing to blessed Bernard, that God looses by binding, but the priest binds by loosing: because God looses from the bond of damnation by binding with the bond of confession and expiation: but the priest binds with the bond of satisfaction, and looses from the bond of confession: and this does not state a condition except on the part of the penitent and of those things which are supposed in the penitent.

§ 86. To the other it must be said, that this is true according to the form of the forum according to which the judgment proceeds: for the judiciary order must be observed, and it is varied according to the diversity of the forum. But the judgment of penance is not only divine, but also Ecclesiastical: for it is divine by inchoation, and perfected by a human minister in the Church: and therefore it is necessary, that it be more than that which is of the heart which God intuites: but the future judgment is only divine: and therefore the confession of the mouth is not necessary there, but only the testimony of conscience accusing or defending.

§ 87. To the other it must be said, that although a fever is always from the heat of the heart increasing the smoke of putrefied matter, nevertheless the matter of the fever is not always in the heart. And so it is also in spiritual diseases: because although originally they are in the heart, nevertheless the matters about which they occur are not of the heart, but also of the mouth and the hand: and therefore for a perfect cure it is necessary, that the disease be countered in all the members, into which the matter of the disease is diffused, although principally it is countered in the heart: and thus it is concerning spiritual diseases: hence the medicine of the heart alone does not suffice.

§ 88. To the other it must be said, that that definition, as was evident above, was given concerning peni-

[pen]ance, according as it is in the genus of a passion and not of a sacrament: and thus it is well conceded that he has only contrition, and not confession, and satisfaction.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Vow Ought To Be Reckoned For The Act

Whether a vow ought to be reputed as a deed?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, in A, § 5, near the beginning: For a vow is judged as an operation [deed].

For this seems to be false: because § 1. If there are two things of which one suffices, the other is superfluous, or belongs to well-being and not to necessity: but a vow and an operation are two things, of which one suffices, as is said in the text: therefore the operation is superfluous, or does not belong to necessity: which is false.

582. Psalm 21:2 (Vulgate).

§ 2. Moreover, what he says does not seem to be general, because someone gives three pennies for God, and wishes to have given seven or a hundred marks, and there the vow is not computed as the deed.

§ 3. If perhaps you say that this is understood of a vow preceding the act, which is accompanied by an inability to act. Against this is the following: because a certain woman wishes to have lost her virginity, and only inability prevents her from losing it: therefore according to this she is reputed to have lost it: therefore if she later repents, the aureole is not owed to her, which is false: therefore what he says is not general.

§ 4. Moreover, someone has the full will to kill someone, and only inability prevents him from killing him: therefore he is reputed as for the deed: therefore he is just as irregular for the will as for the deed, which is false: therefore what Cassiodorus says here in the text holds neither in good nor in evil.

Response. It must be said to the first that a vow is twofold, namely full, and half-full or imperfect. A full vow is impossible in certain acts due to vehement pleasure willed in the act. But a full vow is possible in all acts that do not have vehement pleasure in the flesh, as is the case in lust: but in other things the act does not add much to the pleasure, but rather brings sorrow, as in anger, prodigality, mercy, compassion, and the like.

Therefore it must be said that whenever the will is full, such that nothing excludes the work except inability alone, as to the substance of merit or demerit it is reputed as the deed, but not as to the adjuncts or consequences of the merit or demerit: such as the harm or benefit, which are in the act: and therefore a vow of murder has the same guilt in species as the act of murder, but nevertheless the act harms more than the will: just as also in good purposes a vow has the same merit in substance as the act, although not as much in quantity: and this because the benefits are not as great.

Through this the solution to almost everything is clear: for although they are two things, namely the vow to confess and the confession itself, nevertheless the vow is never full if an act of contempt for religion excludes it, and not an article of necessity: but if it is full, and only inability hinders the act, the vow suffices as to the substance of the indulgence: although it does not attain all those things in continuous or discrete quantity which follow upon and are adjoined to confession existing in act: such as the diminution of penalty through the power of the keys, and de-obligation from the debt of confession simply, and the like: and the actual shame in the act of confession also removes something from the penalty which it would not otherwise attain.

To the next it must be said, that it is not a full will if he is able to give more and does not wish to: but if he cannot give more, then he attains the same indulgence in substance as the one giving more: although the one giving more has something accidental which he who gives less does not have.

To the next it must be said, that the aureole is owed to continence not according to itself, but according to the integrity of the flesh: and therefore although that accidental reward is not lost except by a deed of the flesh, nevertheless substantially the reward of continence is lost through a full vow of fornication, and is restored through penance, just as all other spiritual things are restored in full through penance, as was said above.

Through the same is clear the solution to the last, that irregularity is an accidental penalty which the Church, according to divine counsel, determines only for the act of murder: and therefore although substantially the guilt of a will for murder and of the act is the same, nevertheless the accidental penalty is only for the one.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Suffices To Confess To God Alone

Whether it is sufficient to confess to God alone?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, A, § 5, after the beginning: There is not yet a voice in the mouth that man may hear the confession, etc.

For from this it seems that § 1. It is sufficient to confess to God alone.

Also, this seems true by another reason: For Adam, who is the form [pattern] of all sinners, is not reproved except concerning this, that he excused himself before God in confession: therefore it seems that in other sinners it is sufficient to accuse oneself before God.

§ 2. Moreover, a double tribulation never arises, as was established above: therefore only one confession is owed to one sin in penance: but this is made to God, as Augustine says here: therefore it is not necessary to add a second, which is made to a man.

§ 3. Moreover, no other part of penance is doubled: for even a single contrition alone suffices for all sins, and a single satisfaction enjoined through the power of the keys: therefore a single confession suffices: but this is made to God: therefore an oral confession is not necessary, as it seems.

But to the contrary of this it seems that § 1. The Church establishes nothing unless it is just, nor does she aggravate burdens upon her children in general statutes: but it is of the constitution and precept of the Church that everyone must confess to his priest once a year: therefore this is just, nor is there salvation without it.

§ 2. Moreover, if someone were to say that one should not confess to a priest, and that the confession made to God alone suffices, he would be condemned as a heretic: therefore this belongs to the necessities for salvation, that a man is bound to confess to a human priest: therefore that confession which is made to God alone does not suffice: the contrary of which the text seems to say.

Response. It must be said to this, that if the faculty to confess to a priest is present, the confession made to God alone does not suffice: and what is said in the text is understood of the remission of sin as to the fault and the eternal penalty: which remission precedes the act of confession, but not the vow.

To that which is objected first, it must be said that there were not yet truly keys, nor priests: and therefore the Lord then acted by Himself alone what He now does by Himself and a vicar: and together with this He taught Adam how he ought to recognize his sin by accusing himself in confession, and how he should instruct others to do this same thing.

To the next it must be said, that a double tribulation does not arise, because in sin there is an offense against God and against neighbor: and therefore through the neighbor who is the vicar of God the sinner also has to be reconciled: and again, because the law of divinity is (as Dionysius says) to lead back through the lowest means: and therefore the sinner, as such, since he is in the lowest state, has to be led back through him who is in a higher grade concerning the order and the power of the keys.

To the next it must be said, that this part is not doubled: because what is done before God is not properly confession, except insofar as it is ordered to that which is done before man: and therefore that confession is full which is the narration of sin with detestation, proceeding from the recognition made before God.

Articulus 4 — Whether By The Groan Of Penance Before Oral Confession Sin Is Remitted

Whether sin is remitted through the groan of penance before oral confession?

Next it is inquired concerning what is said there, A, § 5, around the middle: It is not said, he shall have confessed with the mouth: but being converted he shall have groaned, etc.

From this it seems to follow expressly that confession is necessary for nothing.

Response. It must be said that groan is taken there for the groan of contrition, which presupposes the vow of confessing and satisfying according to canonical sanction, because otherwise he does not properly groan with the groan of penance: and he intends to say nothing else, except that in such a groan of penance before oral confession and the satisfaction of a work, sin is remitted according to fault and the guilt of eternal penalty, but not before the vow of confessing and satisfying: and this is clear according to what was disputed above.

Articulus 5 — Whether We Are All Bound To Oral Confession

Whether we are all bound to oral confession?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, A, § 5, after the middle: Hence also, those lepers, etc.

For from this a valid argumentation seems to be drawn for the fact that we are not bound to oral confession. For in Luke 17:14 and seq., it is said that while they were going, the ten lepers were cleansed: and only one returned. And it is probable that he alone fulfilled the command of Christ in making an oblation to the priest, and nevertheless they were cleansed. Since therefore the return signifies a return through thanksgiving, and the showing signifies confession: it seems that without confession and thanksgiving someone may be cleansed from the leprosy of sin.

To this it must be said, that the Lord wished to show in this what He does by Himself, and what He would do through priests. For priests, who are called physicians in the Psalm, do not raise up, nor do they vivify, nor do they heal from fault: but the leprosy signified fault, and therefore before they presented themselves to the priest, they were cleansed, lest their cleansing be believed to have been done by the priests: nevertheless, they were not absolved from the debt of presentation and oblation except by presenting themselves to the priest, and the Lord accomplishes that de-obligation from remaining outside the camp through the reconciling priest: for he is not reputed to be within the spiritual camps of the Church who has wandered away and has not been reconciled through the ministry of a priest. And it is no objection that the leprosy did not return: because in allegorical matters a similitude is not expected in all things, but only in certain ones.

Articulus 6 — Whether Confession Necessarily Ought To Be Made In Charity

Whether confession must necessarily be made in charity?

Whether confession must necessarily be made in charity?

Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, A, § 5, towards the end: No one can confess unless raised up, etc.

According to this, a confession which is not made in charity avails for nothing. And this also seems to be the case:

§ 1. Through that which is brought forward in Ecclesiasticus 17:26: From the dead, as from one who is not, confession perisheth.

§ 2. Moreover to the same point, No dead work avails for eternal life: but a confession made in mortal sin before the raising up of the soul is a dead work: therefore it does not avail for eternal life, nor for grace: because if it availed for one, it would also avail for the other.

Moreover, confession (confessio) is named from con [with/together] and for, faris [to speak]: but he does not speak together, who speaks with the mouth and not with the heart: therefore he does not confess: therefore that confession does not avail.

§ 3. Also, Ambrose: "That confession liberates the guilty, which is made with penance: true penance is sorrow of heart and bitterness of soul for the evils which one has committed": but a confession which is outside charity is not a confession with penance, although it can be with affliction: therefore it does not liberate: therefore it does not avail, because it was not invented except to liberate man.

§ 4. Moreover, every true and liberal confession is with perfect detestation of sin: but he does not perfectly detest it who is still dead through the will for sin: therefore such a one makes no availing confession, and he is bound to make an availing one: therefore such a one is still bound to confess.

ON THE CONTRARY: Everything that is ordered to something as a cause, precedes it: but confession is ordered to justification as a cause: therefore it precedes it. The first premise is self-evident. The second is written in the text of the following chapter, where he says: No one can be justified, etc.

Then it proceeds thus: § 1. Everything that precedes justification, precedes charity: confession precedes justification: therefore it precedes charity: therefore it is not necessary that the man who confesses be alive through grace and charity.

§ 2. Moreover, confession is made so that the confessor may be instructed concerning the quality and quantity of sins: but this can equally be done in grace and outside of grace: therefore confessions made in grace and outside of grace avail equally.

§ 3. Moreover, confession differs in something from contrition and satisfaction: for since contrition is of the heart, and satisfaction is of the work, confession will be of the mouth: but the mouth is equally free for pronouncing in a sinner and in one having grace, although they are not equally free for meriting in work and in heart: therefore it seems that confession may be made equally by one having grace and by one not having it.

§ 4. Moreover, no one is bound to what is impossible for him: but every man is bound to confession by precept: therefore the mode of confession is not impossible for him: but it is impossible for us to have grace, because we cannot from ourselves attain grace: therefore we are not bound to confess in grace.

§ 5. Moreover, what is equally imposed upon the sinner and the just must and ought to be done in a mode that corresponds to both, namely both the sinner and the just: but confession is imposed equally on the sinner and the just: therefore it must be done in a mode corresponding to both: but this mode is not that it be done with grace, but rather from free will: therefore confession is not an act of grace, but of free will alone: therefore it is not required that it be done in grace.

§ 6. Moreover, in certain other corporal acts enjoined for penance a man is absolved, even if he performs them existing outside charity: as if someone is enjoined to give a hundred marks, and he gave them outside charity, it is not enjoined upon him that he give them again when he has charity. Similarly, if it is enjoined upon him to cross over to Rome or beyond the sea. Since therefore confession is a corporal act of penance, if it is done outside charity, it ought not to be enjoined that he do it again: but if it avails nothing when done outside charity, it would be enjoined upon him that he do it again: therefore, etc.

§ 7. Moreover, in another sacrament which is of necessity, such as Baptism: and others which are not of necessity, such as Confirmation and Orders, one can receive the sacrament: and it begins to avail from the moment the fiction [feigning] recedes. Since therefore Penance is a sacrament of necessity, it seems to have something similar: but this cannot be in contrition and satisfaction: therefore this will be in confession: therefore a confession made in mortal sin avails, and even begins to avail for eternal life from the moment the fiction recedes.

§ 8. Moreover, in Ecclesiastes 9:1, it is said that man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred: if therefore someone is bound to confess in charity, and this cannot be done unless he knows he has charity, and he cannot know this, it follows that he does not know whether he has made a confession: therefore every man is perplexed in this regard, and confessions will have to be repeated all day long: nor should a man do anything through his whole life except confess, so that at least one may avail: therefore, etc.

Response. It must be said that there are two things in confession, one on the part of the one confessing, the other on the part of the one hearing the confession. On the part of the one confessing is the act itself, according as it is from the agent, such as the shame and penalty in narrating. But on the part of the hearer is the knowledge of the hidden disease and its circumstances. I say therefore without prejudice, that that which is on the part of the one confessing avails nothing for justification and the merit of eternal life, unless the confessor is in charity: however, it avails for more easily impetrating grace, and for the humiliation of the confessor, and for certain other things for which those goods are said to avail which are called of the genus of goods done outside charity. But as for that which is on the part of the hearer, it seems to me that it simply avails regarding this, that it fulfills the precept of the Church, and he is de-obligated from the debt of confessing: and the fact that he himself does not obtain the effect of the keys in the diminution of penalty, is by accident, namely because he is fictive [feigning]: and because the effect of the keys is founded more upon the passion of Christ than upon human merit, it seems to me that when the fiction recedes, if no other sin intercepts the confession and the enjoined satisfaction, the effect of the keys to which he submitted himself will avail for him, the fiction receding.

To that therefore which is objected from the text concerning all those things which are brought forward for that side: it must be said that all those things speak of what is in confession on the part of the one confessing, according as they avail for grace and eternal life: but they do not speak according as they avail for drawing oneself near to grace, nor do the objections proceed, nor do they avail even for that which is in confession on the part of the hearer and the power of the keys which operate through the hearer: and in this way they are true, and in another way they are false.

To the first, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that confession is optimal in grace, nor is it ordered to justification as a cause by procession of time, nor even according to that mode of priority which the Philosopher states, that the cause is prior by nature: but it is ordered thus primarily according as it is supposed in the vow from the act of contrition, and not according as it is in the actual narration of sins.

To the next it must be said, that although confession is for this, yet it is not only for this: rather it has many causes on the part of the one confessing, from which it is made a part of the penalty, as Augustine says in the text of the preceding distinction : and therefore that argument proceeds from a diminution.

To the next it must be said, that pronunciation is considered in two ways, namely in substance with the due form of penitent pronunciation, insofar as he is a penitent: and in the first way indeed what that reason concludes is true: but in the second way it is false. Nor can it be concluded through that argument, because the form of the whole is in all the parts: and this is penitential grace, although the parts differ among themselves in the form of the parts.

To the next it must be said, that impossible is said in two ways, namely that which we can in no way do, nor do anything which having been done it would become so, just as subverting mountains is impossible for us: and this is not commanded to anyone. In a second way that is called impossible for us which we cannot do in itself, but we can do something which having been done it will inevitably happen: and this by reason of an antecedent which is in our power, and is in a certain way possible for us, and this is to have grace: because if we do what is in us, God will inevitably give us grace: and this by reason of the antecedent can be under precept: and this is according to the opinion of those who say that the form of the work is in the precept, and not only the substance of the work.

Concerning this you will find many things before the end of the third book of this work.

To the next it must be said, that although it is equally commanded to the just and the sinner: to the just, I say, who has something to confess: nevertheless it is not intended that the sinner remaining a sinner should do it, but rather having been justified through confession. If, however, existing as a sinner he does it, it avails him as to those things which belong to confession on the part of the one hearing the confession, as was said: and also for certain other things, although not for the merit of eternal life.

To the next it must be said, that in grievous corporal actions distinction also has a place: for such things chiefly have two aspects, namely, action and passion: for a similar action is the very exercise of giving or going on pilgrimage: and this is attended to according to the root from which it proceeds: and if that is grace, the work is meritorious. But if it is a good of the genus of goods, the work itself is of the genus of goods: nevertheless it does not make a meritorious work, but it avails for drawing oneself near to grace. Passion, however, is the effect of the action, and the confessor intends this more when enjoining penalties that cut away the petulance of sins, from which the wanton person sinned: just as the penalty of loss is effected by the giving of alms, and this penalty remains in him who gave, even after the giving has passed: and the penalty of weakness in the limbs remains with the pilgrim, even after the pilgrimage has passed. Hence just as we said that the passions of the martyrs are considered in two ways, namely, insofar as it is merely a passion, and insofar as it is the will of the martyrs concerning it: and in the first way it does not merit, but in the second way it merits: so it seems it must be said that this remaining penalty is considered in two ways, namely insofar as it is a remaining penalty, and avails nothing for merit, although it avails for the taming of petulance: and insofar as there is a will concerning it: and if that will has grace even after the deed, because the remaining penalty can have a will concerning itself which follows the work, then I say that that remaining penalty so informed begins to avail for eternal life: because it pleases him to have been impoverished for God, and weakened in the honor of God. But confession is not penal in this way, as to a penalty remaining after the act of confession: and therefore it is not similar.

I concede, however, that on the part of the hearer it avails for absolution from the debt of confessing, and for the other things which were said above.

To the next it must be said, that it is not entirely similar regarding Baptism, Confirmation, Orders, and Penance: because in those a character is imprinted which remains, and a grace whose operation the sacrament begins to effect when the fiction recedes: but in Penance no spiritual character is imprinted at all: and then that preceding operation does not operate as an operation that has passed, because it remained neither within nor without: nevertheless, by reason of new contrition and penance, new grace is given, and he is not bound to confess by the reason stated above.

To the next it must be said, that although no one knows with certitude that he has charity, nevertheless he can opine this from signs, if sin displeases him, and the vow of confessing or satisfying is present, and of perpetually detesting sin: and this suffices for us in this life, because no more can be required of us here than it is possible for us to pay.

And through this the solution to all the queries is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether, As The Soul Is The Life Of The Body, So God Is The Life Of The Soul

Whether just as the soul is the life of the body, so God is the life of the soul?

Next it is inquired concerning what is said there, A, § 5 at the end: Which just as it is the life of the body, so God is its life.

For this seems to be false: because § 1. It is the life of the body by nature, because it is the act of a body in potency having life: and whatever is organic is of this kind: but God is not the life of the soul except through grace: therefore there seems to be no similitude.

§ 2. Moreover, as the Philosopher says, when the soul departs, the body expires and decays: but when God departs from the soul, the soul still lives: therefore it seems that there is no similitude of life on either side.

If perhaps you say that all things would fall into nothingness unless the hand of the Omnipotent held them, as Gregory says: and so, God departing from the soul, the soul would fall into nothingness: just as the body falls, the soul departing presentially. ON THE CONTRARY: According to this mode of containment by which He is essentially, presentially, and potentially in all things, He does not contain the soul of the just more than that of the sinner: but here he speaks of the Death by which the sinner dies: therefore it is clear that that is nothing to the proposition, and is not an instance.

Furthermore, in that mode of containing He does not contain the body less than the soul, nor the animate less than the inanimate, or conversely: but in the text he speaks only of the one having grace and the one not having it: therefore it is clear that it is not an instance against the adduced objection.

FURTHERMORE it is inquired, Whether the life by which God vivifies the soul belongs to it according to essence or according to power?

It seems that it is according to essence: because § 1. For living things, to live is to be: and to be is an act of essence rather than of power.

§ 2. Moreover, the life of the soul is primarily the act of the essence of the body, rather than of a bodily organ. Proof. For whatever is related to something as first act, and to something as second act, primarily belongs to that which receives it as first act, rather than to that which receives it as second act: but the soul is related to the essence of the organic body as first act, and to the organ as second act, because it moves it to operations: therefore it primarily belongs to the essence of the body rather than to the organ. But if God is related to the essence of the soul and its power just as the soul is related to the essence of the body and its organ: therefore the divine life primarily belongs to the essence of the soul rather than to the power.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Life is not spoken of except in two ways, namely of nature, and according to well-being: but well-being is to live according to order, and this is not except according to the order and distinction of powers: therefore to live according to well-being primarily belongs to power rather than to essence: and such is God's living in grace: therefore it primarily belongs to the power rather than to the essence of the soul.

§ 2. Moreover, life is also said according to well-being in the sense, according to which pleasure is called life: but pleasure is according to the powers prior to being according to the essence: therefore in reason similarly, living according to the being of reason will be prior according to power, than according to essence.

Response. It must be said that there is not a similitude in all things, but in certain ones: such as namely in this, that just as the soul is the indefectible principle of the life of the body insofar as it is of itself: and if the body is not vivified indifferently by it, this is not on the part of the soul, but rather on account of the corruption of the body itself: so also God is the indefectible principle of the life of the soul of Himself: and if the soul is not always vivified, this happens on account of the corruption of the soul itself, and its aversion from the fount of life.

Again in this there is a similitude, that there is no life in the body except that which is the continuous act of the soul in the body, the being of which is continuously to be made by the soul itself, as also seems to be said in the book De motu cordis: so there is no life of grace in the soul except through the continuous presence of God indwelling in us through grace. There is, however, a dissimilitude in this, that God is not united to the soul for the constitution of any third thing, as the soul is united to the body. And in this, that God is not the natural act of the soul, as the soul is of the body: and in many other things.

And through this the solution to the first and second is clear.

And it must be well conceded, that although the instance adduced contains in itself a certain appearance of truth, nevertheless it does not stand against the proposition.

To that which is inquired further, it must be said that that "living" is spoken of in two ways, namely according to the object of life which is the good in the state of grace and glory, and according to the habit of life: and the object indeed primarily respects the power, because the soul is capable of it through reason and will: but according to the habit of life it is primarily in the soul according to essence, and in the power by consequence.

To the first it must be said, that there is no similitude regarding the life of nature and the life of grace: because the life of nature is the essential act of the soul, but the life of grace is by metaphor, and is taken according to well-being: and this is to be optimally according to the good of reason, and therefore it must be through the perception of that which vivifies according to reason and intellect: and this perception is the apprehension of the good which is God, and affection concerning Him: but this first happens according to power, and by consequence according to essence: and therefore what is brought forward as similar is not similar.

To the next it must be said, that the soul is not the act of the body in the same way that the formal aspect of the object is the act of the power: because the soul is the act of the body giving being to it, which is to live only in living things, or to sense in sensing things, and to understand in understanding things: but to live, spoken of in this way, is not to exercise life or sense or intellect, but rather to have the being of a living thing, and the being of a sensing thing, or an intellective being: but when the formal aspect or species of the object is called the act of the power receiving it, it is understood indeed as an act inferring a passion upon some thing to which it infers itself, as color to the eye, and sound to the hearing according to act in fact, and so of others.

Articulus 8 — Whether In The Penitent Confession Precedes Justification

Whether in a penitent confession precedes justification?

Tell your iniquities, etc.[583] From this it seems that the spoken iniquities precede justification: but before justification a man is in mortal sin: therefore according to this, confession always happens while the one confessing is still existing in mortal sin.

§ 1. On the contrary: Man is justified in contrition, and confession follows contrition: therefore, it follows justification: therefore, confession belongs to one who has been justified.

§ 2. Response: that confession, operating in a vow along with contrition, operates justification: and in this way it precedes it necessarily, not in time, but by nature. But confession taken in act does not operate otherwise, except by absolving from the debt of confession, which belongs to justice.

No one can be justified from sin, etc. Concerning the justification of the ungodly, nine things are asked here. First, What is it? Second, What things are required for the justification of the ungodly? Third, Concerning the order of those things. Fourth, Whether it is natural or miraculous? Fifth, Of which attribute is it the proper effect? Sixth, What is the motive towards it? Seventh, Whether it is a work of justice, or of mercy, or of both? Eighth, Concerning its comparison to dilection, calling, and magnification. Ninth, Concerning its comparison to the healing of the mind and the renewal of the image.

What is the justification of the ungodly?

Articulus 9 — What The Justification Of The Ungodly Is

What is the justification of the ungodly?

§ 5. Concerning the first, namely, what is the justification of the ungodly? Bernard: Justification is the revelation of the divine counsel.

§ 6. But the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans 8:1 and following: "Justification is the remission of sins, and the consummation of good works."

§ 7. But some define it thus: Justification is the effect of general justice, by which the ungodly becomes godly.

§ 8. Against the FIRST definition it is objected as follows: 1. The revelation of the divine counsel is only according to the intellect in the soul: but justification occurs according to every part of it: therefore, justification is not the revelation of the divine counsel.

1. Also, the revelation of the divine counsel happens in prophecy, and it produces the gift of prophecy: but the gift of prophecy does not necessarily place one in grace that makes pleasing (gratia gratum faciens): therefore, neither does the revelation of the divine counsel. But justification always places a person in the state of grace that makes pleasing: therefore, etc.
2. Also, the revelation of the divine counsel is given equally to the good and the bad: but justification is given only to the good: therefore, etc. PROOF of the first premise: God revealed His counsel to Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel 2:29: "God who reveals mysteries, has shown to you what things were to come," etc. And God revealed to Isaiah, and also to many other good men.
3. Also, it seems unfitting to call it the revelation of the divine counsel, because justification is the effect of predestination, which concerns grace in the present and glory in the future, and it is not the effect of counsel, which is an immovable disposition concerning future things, whether good or bad: therefore, it should rather be said: Justification is the revelation of divine predestination, rather than of the divine counsel.

§ 9. Against the SECOND it is objected as follows: 1. For the remission of sins is an effect of grace, and justice has a different formal character (ratio) from grace: therefore, justification is not well defined through the remission of sin.

1. Moreover, in Proverbs 10:12, it is said that charity covers a multitude of sins:

therefore, the remission of sins should rather be attributed to charity, than to justification.

1. Also, a multitude of sins can be destroyed in two ways, namely, through that which is contrary to it in genus, or through that which is contrary to it in species. But justice is not contrary to fault (culpa) in genus, but rather grace is: therefore, its destroyer in genus is grace, not justice. But in species, not just one virtue is opposed to it, but many,

583. Cf. Isaiah 43:26.

because one is opposed to fornication, another to avarice, and so on: therefore, its destroyer in species is not one thing, but many virtues, or all of them: therefore, this should not be attributed to justice.

2. Also, since the theological virtues are more efficacious than the cardinal virtues, the remission of sins should rather be attributed to a theological virtue than to a cardinal one: but justice is a cardinal virtue: therefore, it should not be attributed to justice.

3. Similarly, it is objected concerning this statement that justification is the consummation of good works. For this seems false, because the consummation of a thing follows the completed thing according to the order of nature and reason: but justification precedes good works in reason and nature: therefore, justification is not the consummation of good works.

4. Also, the law prescribes works: therefore, what is the consummation of the law is the consummation of works: but charity is the consummation of the law, as is held in Romans 13:10 and 1 Timothy 1:5: therefore, charity is the consummation of works.

§ 10. Against the THIRD it is objected as follows: 1. The Philosopher says in the fifth book of the Ethics, that general justice is the same as every virtue, differing only by reason (ratione): therefore, if justification is the effect of general justice, justification is the effect of every virtue. But the effects of the virtues are divided, just as the virtues themselves are divided: therefore, justification is not just one single thing.

1. Also, in justification virtues are infused: and that which is infused in another is not the other thing itself: therefore, justification is not every virtue, or the effect of every virtue: and general justice is every virtue: therefore, justification is not the effect of general justice.

2. Also, to make a godly person out of an ungodly one belongs to a special virtue only in a qualified sense (secundum quid), but rather it belongs to grace in its genus: therefore, this does not belong to justice.

§ 11. Response: that the first is not a definition, but rather, as Bernard says, a certain consequent of justification by accident. For the divine counsel, which is an immovable disposition of future things, is made manifest in every effect of its own: because we do not arrive at the divine cause except through its effect. Hence, when God has disposed to give grace to someone, this lies hidden before it happens; but when it becomes known through a sign, then it is revealed, and this follows justification by accident, namely, insofar as the divine counsel is known to us through signs: and therefore it must not be granted that it is a definition.

§ 12. To the first argument, therefore, which is objected against the first definition, we say that revelation is twofold, namely, through the inspiration of a hidden truth by illuminating the intellect, and through an effect. And the first happens according to the intellect; but the second belongs to any thing to manifest through its work.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that in the gift of prophecy there is revelation through inspiration, and not the manifestation of the divine will or good pleasure through a work. For this counsel is restricted only to those things concerning which there is a disposition to confer grace. And through this the solution to the following argument is also clear.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that this manifestation by which a person is manifested to himself, is only through the effect of grace, and this befits only the good.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that counsel is taken here for the definition in the knowledge of the good pleasure concerning the future granting of grace: for this counsel is both made manifest and revealed in justification, when grace is applied.

§ 16. To what is objected concerning the second, it must be said that justification is described there through its proper effect: for since justification implies a "made just" (factum justum) or a "making just" (justificatio), if it is taken for a "made just," it signifies the terminus of a certain motion, which is from sin to general justice. And since the termini of a motion are contraries, it will belong to general justice to destroy and remit sin, like a formal contrary. And therefore, speaking in this way, the remission of sin will be the proper effect of justice. But if it implies the very "becoming just" (fieri justum) or "justification": then it will still be the expulsion of sin and the induction of justice: just as whitening is the expulsion of blackness and the induction of whiteness.

§ 17. To the object raised against this, we say that nothing prevents the same thing from being considered by different people under a different formal aspect. For sin does three things in the soul. First, it turns one away from the immutable good; second, it perverts the right order of the powers toward one another, and toward what is higher, and toward what is alongside, and toward what is lower. Third, it also corrupts the powers in relation to special and particular works. And therefore, in the motion of justification there are three things that perfect the soul: of which the first is grace, which is contrary to sin turning away and disturbing the image of God. The second is general justice, reordering the powers into a right and due state toward one another, so that reason rules and the others are ruled, and toward what is higher, and toward what is equal, and toward what is lower. The third is the infusion of every virtue, perfecting the individual powers for individual works.

§ 18. But then it is asked: Why is this motion named from the middle state rather than from the ultimate or the first? Namely, why is it called justification rather than gratification, or the infusion of virtues, or perfection?

§ 19. Response. It must be said that grace by itself denotes only gratitude toward God; but in conversion there is much more, and therefore it would be imperfectly denominated from grace. But it cannot be denominated from the ultimate, because this implies perfection for individual acts, and justification implies a state of rectitude in general.

§ 20. To that, therefore, which is secondarily objected concerning the second definition, we say that charity does not cover a multitude of sins as a general covering formally contrary to sin, but rather as the form of merit, insofar as it is a merit: because the quantity of merit is attended to according to the quantity of charity.

§ 21. To the next it must be said, as was clear before, that there are three considerations of sin: and therefore the argument proceeds from a diminution.

§ 22. To the next we say that the theological virtues are not general: and therefore general rectitude cannot be attributed to them as an effect.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that the consummation of works is spoken of in two ways, namely, either in cause or in effect. In effect, indeed, it follows the works; and in cause, it precedes them. And that which is in the cause is further spoken of in two ways, namely, either in the habitual cause, or in the efficient cause. In the habitual cause, every infused virtue perfects the works; but on the part of the efficient cause, general justice is the consummation of the works, because it consummates the operating powers toward what is higher, and toward themselves, and toward the neighbor, as has been said.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that charity is the consummation of works as a motive habit; in the termination of its proper end, charity moves to every act, and on account of the good which is its end. And thus it itself is not the terminus of that motion by which he who from ungodly becomes godly is moved: but general justice perfects, as placing the powers of the soul into a right and due state according to nature.

§ 25. To that which is objected against the third definition, it must be said that justice is spoken of multiply. For it is called divine and human justice. Concerning divine justice, nothing for the present. But human justice is spoken of in three ways, namely, as a genus, as general, and as special. As a genus, it is the same as virtue in general: but it is called justice insofar as it accords with the ordination of the law, for which reason the Philosopher also calls it legal justice. But it is called virtue insofar as it perfects the soul or power for an act. But general justice is a certain disposition (habitudo) that signifies a right state of the powers, as has been said, resulting from grace: and it is understood of this when it is said that justification is the effect of justice. But special justice is that by which, in exchanges, one renders to each what is his own.

§ 26. And through this it is clear that what is objected concerning justice as a genus is nothing: because genus and general are not the same.

§ 27. And through this the solution to the following argument is also clear: for general justice is rather a certain disposition resulting from grace, than a habit of virtue.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that one is made godly from being ungodly in three ways, as was said at the beginning of the solution to the second definition: however, that these things may be well understood, they depend upon the questions we have disputed elsewhere concerning justice.

What are those four things that are required for the justification of the ungodly?

§ 30. To the second we proceed thus: It is said by all that four things are required for the justification of the ungodly, namely, the infusion of grace, the motion of free will toward sin or contrition (which is the same thing), the motion of free will toward God, and the remission of sin. Now, these are noted in Psalm 59:4: You have moved the earth: behold the infusion of grace. And You have troubled it: behold contrition. Heal its breaches: behold the remission of sin. For it has been moved: behold the motion of free will toward God.

§ 31. But against this it is objected: because 1. Bernard says: "By fear we are called to God, but by love we are justified": therefore, two things are required besides the four mentioned, namely, fear and love.

1. Also, Proverbs 15:27: By mercy and faith sins are purged: therefore, more things are required than those mentioned.
2. Also, Acts 15:9: Purifying their hearts by faith: but justification is nothing other than the purification of the heart from sin: therefore, faith is required for justification.
3. Also, it seems that charity is required: because Augustine says that this alone is what divides the sons of the kingdom from the sons of perdition. But the sons of the kingdom are those who are conformed to the image of His Son, as is said in Romans 8:29. Therefore, etc.

Also, Luke 7:47: Many sins are forgiven her, because she has loved much. And from this follows the same as before.

1. Also, Chrysostom on John: "Let us reconsider with diligence all the things we presumed to do in our former time, and let us strive to wipe them away in every manner; for God has opened many ways to us for this. Say your sins (he says) that you may be justified." And again, Psalm 37:19: I will declare my iniquity, and my sorrow, etc. "For a continual accusation and memory of our sins is of no small benefit to us for diminishing their magnitude. There is also this more manifest way, that we keep no memory of the wrongs of those who have sinned against us. Do you want to learn a third? Listen to Daniel 4:24: Redeem your sins with almsgiving, etc. There is certainly also another with this: continual prayers, and also persisting with expectation in supplications directed to God, which bring us no small consolation. Similarly, and fasting , which, together with charity toward the neighbor, extinguishes the vehemence of God's wrath: for water extinguishes a blazing fire, and alms expurgate sins." From these words it is held that there are five things by which sin is expelled and justice is put on, and none of these were enumerated above: therefore, that enumeration is defective.

§ 32. But it seems that there are fewer: because 1. The infusion of grace either suffices by itself for justification, or it does not. If so, then none of the others is required. If not, on the contrary:

Because whiteness suffices by itself for whitening, and spiritual forms are more perfect in operations than corporeal ones: therefore, much more does grace suffice by itself for justification.

1. Also, in corporeal mutations there is no other mutation of the subject except the expulsion of one form and the induction of another: and it is not necessary that the subject move itself toward the artisan or toward expelling the color: therefore, similarly, in spiritual mutation nothing is required except the expulsion of sin and the infusion of grace: and it is not necessary that the free will be moved toward God, or toward sin: and thus two suffice.

§ 33. Also, it is asked about each of those four individually: 1. For since justification is denominated from justice, it should rather be said that the infusion of justice is required there, rather than of grace.

1. Moreover, that motion is either of the intellect only, or of the intellect and affectus together, or of the affectus only. If of the intellect, on the contrary: Virtue is more on the part of the affectus than of the intellect, and virtue operates maximally toward justification: therefore, that motion should maximally be on the part of the affectus.
2. Moreover, the motion of free will toward God is meritorious and informed by grace, or not. If it is: every such motion is consequent upon justification and grace: therefore, it follows justification. But what essentially follows something else is not required for it as a cause: therefore, the motion of free will toward God is not required as a cause for justification: therefore, it is wrongly placed among the justifying things.
3. Also, the motion of the intellect toward God is common to the justified and the unjustified: therefore, it is not properly required so as to be enumerated among the things that justify the ungodly.
4. Also, it is asked about the remission of sin: because this seems to be the same thing as the infusion of grace: because, as the Philosopher maintains, the generation of one thing is the corruption of another.
5. Similarly, it is objected concerning the motion of free will toward sin. For this motion is a recognition of sin, and this motion is common to all, both good and bad.
6. Moreover, there is one argument common to the above division and to this member: because into whatever free will is moved, it has the power to move into that. If, therefore, free will is moved into God and into sin, whether through the intellect or through the affectus or through both, then it has the power of itself to move into God and into sin, which is false. Therefore, these are not required for the justification of the ungodly.

§ 34. But against all these members together it is objected: For that motion of free will toward God and toward sin, is either making pleasing (gratum faciens), or merely natural. If the first way: then it follows justification, just as a motion that makes pleasing follows the justification of the one operating: because Augustine says that we do not work justice in order to be just; but rather we receive justice from God, in order that we may work. But if it is a natural motion of free will, since to such a motion no justification is owed, it seems incongruous to place it among the justifying things.

§ 35. Solution. It must be said that these four are required for the justification of the ungodly.

There are two things effecting justification:

one which is as an agent through a habit which, by creating it, He gives in the heart contrary to sin, and this is God. The other is as disposing and preparing the subject, and obeying the first operator, which is God. And so I say, that on the part of the operator through the habit which He gives by creating, two things are taken: one on the part of the terminus to which the motion of justification is directed, and in this way it is the infusion of grace; the other, however, on the part of the terminus from which, which is the remission of sin.

But on the part of the dispositions, two things are taken: one on the part of the terminus from which, and this is the motion of free will toward sin by detesting and expelling it; the other on the part of the terminus to which, by receiving and embracing grace, and this is the motion of free will toward God. But if it is asked why these two motive elements are required? I say that, as Augustine says, "He who created you without you, will not justify you without you: but He will justify you with you." For just as in a subject in which some blackness is held by glue, it is impossible for whiteness to be induced unless that glue is dissolved, so it is impossible for grace to be induced in the soul unless the evil will holding the sin is dissolved: and this is not dissolved unless it is moved toward sin and toward God.

And this is the reason why the ancient Doctors posited that these four are present in the justification of the ungodly.

§ 36. To the first, therefore, it must be said that there are certain things preceding justification as inclining toward it as causes: and these Bernard touches upon. But the Masters touch only upon those things in which the motion of justification itself is perfected.

§ 37. To the next about Proverbs, it must be said that those things destroy sin by way of merit, and not only sin regarding its fault, but also regarding the punishment owed to it.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that the passage from Acts is understood of the purification of phantasms from the intellect. Or it can be said that the motion of faith is comprehended under the motion of free will toward God; and similarly the motion of love which Bernard posits, and the motion of chaste fear is comprehended under the motion of free will toward sin. And how this is so, will become clear below.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that explicit charity is not required, but only the love supposed in the motion of free will toward God. And what is said, that charity remits sins, is understood by way of merit, and not by way of the essence of the motion of justification.

§ 40. To the next it must be said that Chrysostom is speaking about things remitting sins in punishment by way of satisfaction, and not about the remission of fault alone: and these are indeed many, but the ones he enumerates here are the principal ones.

§ 41. To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in its own way the infusion of grace suffices, just like a form in nature: for it suffices by itself to perfect matter, but not so that there may be motion: because there are more principles of motion than of a composite being. Hence, just as dispositions preparing the matter, and privation, and form are required there in order that there may be a mutation to a form: and these do not cause an imperfection in the form, but rather exist on account of the imperfection of the matter which is perfected by the form: so also here. Hence, infused grace is most perfect for perfecting free will and the whole soul; nevertheless, when the soul is under sin as under the privation of grace, it is imperfect: and therefore it is necessary to seek dispositions that make the sin soluble, and grace driving away the privation. And therefore, just as in a natural motion, so also in the motion of grace, multiple things are required.

§ 42. And what is objected is understood concerning the perfection of a form in perfecting matter, and not concerning its perfection in initiating a mutation: because more things are necessary for mutation than for the composition of a being, as has been said, both in corporeal and in spiritual matters.

§ 43. To the next it must be said that in corporeal mutations there must be dispositions which render soluble the privations from the matter, or contrary forms, in which the privation of the form to be induced is supposed: as is evident in air which is said to become fire; for it is necessary to dry out the moisture that holds the air, before the "air-ness" is driven out and the "fire-ness" is induced. And it is similar here, because the will turned away from God and loving sin is a disposition to itself holding sin in the soul and impeding the induction of grace. But the will moved toward God and against sin is a disposition to itself inclining to the expulsion of sin, and the introduction of justice and grace.

§ 44. To the next it must be said that, as we said in the preceding question, the infusion of grace is first, which the rectitude of powers and perfection for works follows: and since here only the essential principles of justification are enumerated, nothing is touched upon here except the infusion of grace, and not the conferring of justice or virtues: because from the infusion of grace these two result, just as a stream from a fountain, and an effect from a cause. And this imagination is according to how the light of a star is in itself, and in its image; and then in its expansion within the body of the star; and third, according to the divergence of the travelling light in its rays. So grace is in itself, and as if expanded in the general rectitude of the powers; and third, divergent in the perfections of individual powers for works through individual and special virtues.

§ 45. To the next it must be said that the motion of free will means there a composite motion, whether it be toward God or toward sin. For there are some simple motions of the soul, which belong to one virtue in itself, and to one power of the soul in relation to one special object, such as to understand, to love, or to believe. But some are composite, which do not belong to the virtue of one power in itself, but rather to one insofar as it behaves consecutively to another, whose act in some way remains in it, such as to enjoy (frui) and to use (uti): and this is treated in the first book of the Sentences . And so I say here, that this motion toward God and toward sin is composite, and it is of the affectus insofar as it follows from the intellect illuminated by faith, and through chaste fear fleeing, and hope elevating the affectus with love: and therefore the motion toward God is a motion of the affection fearing and loving, which presupposes faith from the preceding intellect showing whatever is to be feared and loved and hoped for.

§ 46. Similarly, the motion of free will toward sin is from the intellect illuminating the motion of the affectus crushing and destroying sin through the sorrow of compunction: so that the immediate or proximate mover in them is the affectus, but the showing principle is the intellect, just as in enjoying and using.

§ 47. To this, however, which is asked, whether it is informed by grace? We say that it is. And what is objected, that it follows justification, has no force: because as is evident in the following article, all these four are indeed simultaneous in time, but not in nature: whence it follows that although by nature it follows the infusion of grace, nevertheless justification follows it: because justification is as that in which the rest of that motion consists: and that motion of free will thus dissolves or renders soluble the contrary on the part of the subject.

§ 48. To that which is objected concerning the remission of sin, we say that although one follows upon the other, nevertheless one is not the other. And what is said, that the generation of one is the corruption of the other, is understood through causality, and not through essence.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that the composite motion spoken of above is not common to the good and the bad, but only the motion of the cognition of sin: and we do not say that this motion is such a one.

§ 50. To the next we say that free will alone does not move that motion, but rather by the force of grace moving it: and therefore that objection does not follow.

§ 51. To that which is asked, whether it is natural or making pleasing (gratum faciens)? The solution is clear through the things said beforehand: because it is making pleasing: and nevertheless by nature it precedes justification, although it does not precede the infusion of grace.

What is the order of those things which are required for the justification of the ungodly?

Articulus 11 — What Is The Order Of Those Things Which Are Required For The Justification Of The Ungodly

What is the order of those things which are required for the justification of the ungodly?

§ 53. Third, it is asked concerning the order of those four.

And it seems that these are not simultaneous: because 1. Boethius says that vices must be extirpated before virtues are implanted: therefore, the remission of sin precedes the infusion of grace.

1. Also, in every mutation of nature it is necessary to remove the privation before the form is induced. But sin is in the soul as a privation: therefore, it is necessary first to remove it, before grace, which is like a form, is induced: therefore, the remission of sin precedes the infusion of grace.

2. Furthermore, if the soul ceases to have sin in the justification of the ungodly, there is some instant in which it will have it for the last time: let that, then, be A. And if it begins to have grace, there will be some instant in which it will first have it: and let that be B. Then B and A are either the same instant, or different. If the same: but things which are in the same instant of time are simultaneous in time: therefore, sin and grace are in the soul simultaneously in time. Therefore, contraries and privative opposites are simultaneously in act in the same subject, which is absurd; and a man is simultaneously worthy of eternal life and eternal death, and simultaneously the dwelling of God and of the devil: and many such incongruities follow. Therefore, A and B cannot be the same instant. But if they are different. On the contrary: The Philosopher says that between any two instants there is an intermediate time: therefore, between A and B there is an intermediate time. But A is the ultimate instant in which the soul is in sin: therefore, after it, it is not in sin. Also, B is the beginning instant in which the soul is in grace: therefore, before it, it is not in grace. But the time which is intermediate between the two instants is after A, and before B. Therefore, in that whole intermediate time the soul is neither in grace nor in sin. Since, therefore, the man is mortal then, if he were to die then, he would neither descend to hell, nor ascend to the kingdom.

3. Furthermore, it seems to be false that the motion of free will toward God and the motion of free will toward sin are simultaneous with these two: for just as it was held from the preceding article of the question, those motions are meritorious: therefore, before those motions it is required that he have grace. Thence I proceed thus: In nature, motion toward being, which is the act of some form, is prior to the operation of a composite existing in that form: therefore, it is also thus in spiritual things: therefore, the infusion of grace is prior in time to the motion of free will toward God, or to that toward sin.

4. Also, a second act depends on the first, and presupposes it: just as to consider presupposes to know, and to carve presupposes the figure of the art which is a species of being: therefore, the first act must precede the second. But the habit of grace, regarding being moved according to that habit in a meritorious work, is related as a first act to a second act: therefore, the infusion of grace seems to precede the motion toward God in time.

5. Furthermore, it seems that moving toward God and moving toward sin are not simultaneous either: because the motions of one power toward diverse objects cannot be simultaneous: therefore, they are not simultaneous. But there we have motions of one power toward diverse objects: therefore, they are not simultaneous. PROOF of the first is:

...because the power is simple and acts as a whole in itself, and the whole cannot simultaneously be turned toward diverse things. The proof of the second is: because there are movements of free choice into God, and into sin.

§ 1. Solution. It must be said that these four are simultaneous in time, but not in nature. However, according to priority and posteriority of nature they are ordered in various ways, on the grounds that nature is spoken of in multiple ways: for as the Philosopher says in the second book of the Physics [584], nature is said to be matter, form, and the path which is in nature, namely generation. And according to that mode by which nature is called form, because the form is the end of the efficient cause, that which is nearer to the efficient cause in the justification of the ungodly is prior: therefore according to this the infusion of grace is the first. But because the being of grace is followed by the movement of grace, namely its act, therefore the movement of free choice into God is the second: and the movement of free choice into sin to be destroyed is the third, because for the destruction of sin there operates the dissent from sin lest an obstacle be placed against the Holy Spirit. And the fourth and last is the remission of sin. But if we begin from nature which is the subject and matter: then since that subject is first turned away from sin, and second is turned to God, and third receives the help of grace, and fourth the effect of the help follows: the first in this path will be the movement of free choice into sin, and the second into God, and the third the infusion of grace, and the fourth the remission of sin. And this is easily evident to someone considering how someone first seeks to withdraw from sin. If however we begin according as nature is called the path in nature, namely generation, then since in that movement or mutation there is first made the terminus from which the movement is, and second the path itself, and third the terminus to which the movement is: the first in nature will be the remission of guilt: the second, the movement of free choice into sin: and the third, the movement of free choice into God, which are by way of a path to exit from sin: and the fourth is the infusion of grace.

§ 2. But having established these things, one must respond to the objections.

§ 3. To the first and second it must be said that these proceed according to the third mode of nature: and thus they must be conceded, as is evident in the last ordering.

§ 4. To the other it must be said that as we noted in the second book of the Sentences [585], time is spoken of in multiple ways: for there is a certain physical time, which is the measure of the movement of the first movable thing, by the fact that it is its number according to prior and posterior, which is in it and in its movement: and about this the Physicists teach, that it is the measure of all that movement, which as to its cause is reduced to the movement of the first movable thing: and it makes this nature to be moved according to alteration, and increase, and decrease, and place and generation, and corruption. And concerning this blessed Dionysius says, that time is what is measured along with generation and corruption . But this time is not the measure of movement unless a divisible movable thing is subjected to it, which is partly in the terminus from which, and partly in the terminus to which, when it is moved, on account of which it takes on act and potency, and prior and posterior, according to how movement is defined by the Philosopher, that it is the act of what exists in potency according as it is in potency and therefore he says that it is an imperfect act, because it does not remove the entire potentiality from the movable thing: but form is a perfect act, by the fact that matter no longer remains in potency toward that form. But in divine mutations, to which either nothing is subjected, or nothing divisible is subjected to them, a time of this kind does not measure: for nothing is subjected to creation: and yet Augustine says, and it is posited in the first book of the Sentences , that time is coeval with the creature. And therefore it is necessary to distinguish time spoken of otherwise: in spiritual movements, where there is movement from act to act, rather than from potency: and to which nothing divisible is subjected, and in which the forms themselves are not remissible and intensible, and intercepting nothing of their contrary. Similarly, a time of this kind cannot be called measuring: on account of which the Philosopher also says in the book On the Soul , that the soul is not moved in any way.

§ 5. It must therefore be said, if A is the last instant in which one is in sin, that sin is not present in him then absolutely, but in exiting and ceasing: but grace is present absolutely: and therefore sin is corrupted in B, and in B there is grace: nor is this unsuitable: because the Philosopher maintains that the corruption of a thing and the death of anything is indeed in time, but not its being or life: just as to be made or to fail is in time, but not to have been made. For if it is posited that sin is present in A, it must be said that in this reckoning of time nothing prohibits an instant being after an instant. Whence Augustine says , that God moves a spiritual creature through time only, but a corporeal creature through time and place. And what the Philosopher says , that between any two instants there is an intermediate time, is understood of time spoken of in the first way: because there it is partly in the terminus to which: and therefore in such a movement it is not possible to assign a last divisible part in which the movement is wholly and solely, nor even is it possible to assign a first in such a movement: but in all spiritual movements it is possible to assign them, in my judgment. And therefore because they are not truly movements, but rather certain successions of intellects and affections: neither do they have a measuring time of the same ratio as other movements. Concerning this however inquire above, and upon the first distinction of the second book.

§ 6. To the other and the following there is one solution according to my judgment, namely that if those four are always taken in act, then it is impossible for all to be simultaneous, as those reasons necessarily prove. But if they are taken habitually, then nothing prohibits them from being simultaneous: and thus the ancients said. But there are moderns who say that it is not unsuitable to simultaneously accept being according to first act, and to act according to the form giving that being in second act: and therefore it is not impossible for one power in number to simultaneously do diverse things not ordered to one another, and to be moved by multiple movements simultaneously, and for us to be able to understand multiple things simultaneously, just as to know. To whom not prejudicing, I say only this, that it seems wondrous to me, if anyone could ever experience this in himself. And if experience does not prove it, then it is wondrous if anyone understands it.

584. Cf. Glossa Ordinaria on Romans 8:30.

§ 7. Through this therefore the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Justification Of The Ungodly Is Natural Or Miraculous

Whether the justification of the ungodly is natural or miraculous?

Fourthly it is inquired, Whether justification is natural or miraculous?

§ 1. But it seems that it is miraculous: because 1. Augustine says , that it is a greater thing to make a godly man from an ungodly one, than to create heaven and earth: but it is established that the creation of heaven and earth is not natural from any lower nature: therefore neither is the justification of the ungodly, and much less so.

§ 2. Further, The natural is that to which nature moves: but no created nature moves to that: therefore it is not natural.

§ 3. Further, When the Philosopher speaks concerning certain habits , whether they are natural, namely the customary virtues: he himself determines that in a certain respect they are natural, and in a certain respect not: because we are innately disposed to receive them, but to perfect them is from habituation: but it is established that if that perfecting of habituation were not in us, he himself would not have said that they were natural in some way. Since therefore to perfect grace is in no way in our power, it seems that justification is in no way natural.

§ 4. Further, The natural is called either caused by nature, or given by nature, or given in nature: but in none of these ways is grace related to nature: therefore the grace of justification is not natural.

§ 5. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A miracle, as Augustine says , is something arduous and unusual, appearing beyond the hope and capability of the one marveling: but this does not happen beyond hope, because we hope for justification: therefore it is not miraculous.

§ 6. Further, The event of a miracle is rare: which is evident, because in its definition 'unusual' is posited: but the justification of the ungodly is frequent: therefore it is not miraculous.

§ 7. Further, Chrysostom says , that the course of miracles is caused by the will of God alone: but the justification of the ungodly is not by the will of God alone: therefore the justification of the ungodly is not miraculous. And the second premise is proved from the saying of Augustine: He who created you without you, will not justify you without you .

§ 8. Solution. It must be said that, as the Masters say, the justification of the ungodly is marvelous. And they posit the marvelous as a sort of mean between the natural and the miraculous. I say natural according as the natural is taken broadly, namely for all that which is done by the course of lower nature, and according as it includes voluntary things caused by the will. For they say that in the three things which were touched upon in the last three objections, it falls short of a miracle: but in the others it exceeds the course of natural things. But it seems better to be said, that the justification of the ungodly is miraculous.

585. Cf. Peter Lombard, Sententiae, Book I.

§ 9. And to what is first objected, it must be solved through a distinction of hope: because, as the Gloss says on the epistle to the Romans 4:18, upon that: Who against hope believed in hope: Hope is twofold, namely of nature, and of grace. Whence it must be said that hope, according as it is posited in the definition of a miracle, is the hope of nature, and not the hope of grace: and it is true that a miracle happens beyond the hope of nature, although not beyond the hope of grace.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that 'unusual' is spoken of in two ways, namely in cause, and in effect: and when 'unusual' is posited in the definition of a miracle, it is called unusual in cause, namely that it does not have a standing and ordained cause from which it proceeds: which is evident from this, that if the dead were to rise more often every day, the resurrection of the dead would nevertheless be miraculous, on account of the cause being unusual and supernatural to us. It must be responded therefore, that the cause of justification is unusual to us: and therefore it is a miracle.

§ 11. To the other it must be said that it is not said in the definition of a miracle that it is 'beyond capability' on the grounds that our capability in no way concurs with it: because thus even the parturition of the Virgin would not be miraculous, since it was not done without the Virgin consenting: but it is called 'beyond capability' on the grounds that it is done without us operating. And thus God justifies us not without us consenting, but without us operating.

§ 12. And through this the solution to the whole is evident according to that path, which I believe to be sounder.

§ 13. Holding the other path which has customarily been that of the Doctors, it must be said to the first, that something is called greater for God or in divine things in two ways, namely because it is of greater power in the substance of the effect, or because it is of greater power in the mode of effecting. And indeed the creation of heaven and earth is of greater power in the substance of the effect, than the justification of the ungodly: but the justification of the ungodly is of greater power in the mode of effecting: because in the creation of heaven and earth nothing opposes the voice of the Creator, but the whole obeys: but in the justification of the ungodly, in some respect there resists the sin which lies within the soul, and is contrariwise to justification. Others have customarily said, that Augustine notes it is 'greater' there, because it is indicative of greater mercy: but this solution is crude.

§ 14. To the other it must be said that it is well conceded that it is not natural, that is, existing under the power of nature, but above nature.

§ 15. To the other it must be said that although 'to perfect' is not in us, but in God, nevertheless nature is innately disposed to receive grace, just as toward its end and complement. For it is one thing concerning the perfection of man, another concerning the perfection of natures: because man, created in the image of God, is capable of grace which no one infuses into him except God, and he is not perfectible except by God Himself, just as neither is an Angel: for each thing, with its superior moving it, proceeds by a certain natural movement toward perfection.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that if justifying grace is called natural, it will not be said otherwise, except because from the highest nature which is God, that creature is innately disposed to perceive it, which from the imitation of the image of God is capable, and not otherwise. And I well think that the Philosophers were ignorant of this mode of nature, because it cannot be apprehended through philosophical reason: but rather the pious mind strives to apprehend it by the vivacity of its faith.

Articulus 13 — To Which Attribute The Justification Of The Ungodly Belongs

To which attribute does the justification of the ungodly belong?

Fifthly it is inquired, Of which attribute is it the proper effect?

§ 1. But it seems that it is of power. 1. Through the authority previously adduced, namely that it is a greater thing to make a godly man from an ungodly one, than to create heaven and earth: for it is established that the creation of heaven and earth indicates power: therefore also the justification of the ungodly.

§ 2. Further, To overcome what resists some efficient cause belongs to power: but in the justification of the ungodly the resisting sin is overcome: therefore it belongs to power.

§ 3. Item, To bring something into being from nothing belongs to power: but in the justification of the ungodly the ungodly man is brought into the being of grace from the nothing of sins: therefore it belongs to power. The proof of the minor. Augustine says: Sin is nothing, and men become nothing when they sin .

§ 4. Item, Through that of Psalm 50:12: Create a clean heart in me, O God: but that is created which is drawn forth into being from nothing.

§ 5. BUT IT SEEMS that it belongs to wisdom: because, 1. Job 26:13, it is said: His hand acting as midwife, the twisting serpent was drawn forth: but the serpent is drawn forth in the justification of the ungodly, and to act as midwife belongs to wisdom: therefore it seems that the justification of the ungodly belongs to wisdom.

§ 6. Item, Ecclesiasticus 4:12: Wisdom inspires life into her children: but that life is inspired in the justification of the ungodly: therefore it seems that it is the effect of wisdom.

§ 7. Further, For the justification of all the ungodly there was not sent the power of the Father, nor the goodness of the Holy Spirit, but the wisdom of the Son: therefore it seems that even particular justification is the effect of wisdom, not of power, nor properly of goodness.

§ 8. But against this again it seems that it is the effect of goodness: because 1. It is said, in Romans 3:24: Being justified freely by his grace: but grace is the effect of goodness: therefore also justification.

§ 9. Further, In Romans 2:4: Knowest thou not that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance? But in penance the grace of justification is given: therefore benignity leads to the grace of justification: therefore it is the effect of goodness.

§ 10. Further, Augustine says in the second book On the Trinity , that the Spirit is sent to sanctify the rational creature: and the sentence of Augustine is posited in the first book of the Sentences but in justification the rational creature is sanctified: therefore it seems that to sanctify belongs to the mission of the Holy Spirit: but goodness is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore it is the effect of goodness.

§ 11. Response. In truth it must be said that justification principally is the effect of goodness: but nevertheless because the works of the Trinity are undivided, there is one thing there which is attributed to power, and another to wisdom, although the substance of the work is the attribute of goodness, and consequently of the Holy Spirit. For the fact that being is made there from nothing with some contradiction of sin, although there is no contradiction of the sinner there, because he consents to receive grace, and detests sin: in this there is a certain showing of power.

§ 12. And according to that mode the first three reasons proceed. And through this the solution to them is evident.

§ 13. But if the mode and order of the work itself is attended to, because namely it is done most suitably and best with such an order, which moves to the giving of thanks, and more fervent penance, and perseverance in good things, which God foresees in thus justifying the sinner: as to this, wisdom appears in that work: and thus the following three reasons proceed.

§ 14. But the substance of the deed is entirely good in itself, and of the first goodness as a cause: and thus the last three proceed.

§ 15. And through this the solution to all the objections is evident.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Justification Of The Ungodly Is An Effect Of Justice Or Of Mercy

Whether the justification of the ungodly is an effect of justice or of mercy?

Sixthly it is inquired, Whether it is the effect of justice or of mercy?

§ 1. It seems that of justice: because 1. Ambrose says: There precedes a certain something in sinners, by which they are worthy of justification: and in others a certain something, by which they are worthy of obduration . Therefore all who are justified, are worthy of justification: but when things are distributed according as is worthy, this belongs to justice, as Tullius says , and this also Aristotle intends in the V of the Ethics therefore it seems that it is a work of justice, and not of mercy.

§ 2. Item, Every effect which it is better to be simply than not to be, has an exemplar in God: but to be just is simply better to be, than not to be: therefore it has an exemplar in God. The first premise is proved from that word of Anselm , that whatever is better simply to be than not to be, is attributed to God. And the second is evident per se: because it is simply better to be just, than not to be just. Thence one proceeds thus: God makes good, because He is good: therefore He also makes the one capable of justice just, because He Himself is just: but in the justification of the ungodly a man is made capable of justice: therefore it is done by Him insofar as He is just: therefore it is a work of justice, not of mercy.

§ 3. Item, Origen says , that God is wise insofar as He is the bestower of wisdom and knowledge: therefore by a similar reasoning He is just insofar as He is the bestower of justice: therefore our justice is the proper effect of divine justice: therefore not of mercy.

§ 4. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Mercy is to relieve misery: but no misery is greater than that which is of sin: therefore to relieve the misery of sin is of the highest mercy: but this is done in the justification of the ungodly: therefore the justification of the ungodly is a work of mercy, and not of justice.

§ 5. Item, in Psalm 50:3: And according to the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my iniquity. Therefore the blotting out of iniquity is the effect of mercy: but the blotting out of iniquity is done in the justification of the ungodly: therefore the justification of the ungodly is the effect of mercy.

§ 6. Item, Augustine says , that the sinner is not worthy of the bread he eats: therefore it is not just that any good be given to him: but grace is the best thing that can be given to a man in this life: therefore he is not worthy that grace be conferred upon him: therefore when grace is given to him, it is not a work of justice but of mercy.

§ 7. Response. It must be said that in every work of the Lord there is mercy, and truth, that is, justice: but this work is principally of mercy. For according as justice is called that which becomes the goodness of God, as Anselm says justice is called , thus in the work of justification there is justice. But as it is called that justice is the rendering for merits, thus there is no work of justice there, if merits are taken in act: but merits in the future, or in foreknowledge, cannot be the cause of preceding grace: and therefore in no way is there justice there, except according as justice is the becomingness of divine goodness. Whence Anselm at the end of the Monologion When you punish the evil, it is just: because it accords with their merits. But when you spare the evil, it is just: not because of their merits, but because it is condign to your goodness.

§ 8. Whence the arguments lastly made seem to be conceded.

§ 9. But to that which is first objected, it must be said that justice is twofold, namely of congruity, and of condignity. But concerning the justice of condignity, nothing precedes in sinners by which they are worthy of justification: but concerning the justice of congruity, in certain sinners there precede works from the genus of good things, which are not in certain other sinners: and therefore they are only worthy of reprobation, that is, of the effect of reprobation, which is obduration in sin. And when it is said that they are worthy of justification, the sense is that they hold themselves more congruously or less incongruously to justification than others. Yet the ancient Doctors said to that authority, that it was of Ambrosiaster, and falsely inscribed in the books of blessed Ambrose.

§ 10. To the other it must be said that justice made in the copy has the justice of God for its exemplar: but the cause of the exemplar is one thing, and the cause inclining the efficient cause to the act is another. And indeed the cause of the exemplar is justice: but the cause inclining the author to this, that He justifies the ungodly, is divine mercy.

§ 11. Through this also the solution to the following is evident: because they have one force, except that the one proceeds through reason, the other through authority saying the same thing.

Articulus 15 — What The Motive For The Justification Of The Ungodly Is

What is the motive toward the justification of the ungodly?

Seventhly it is inquired, What is the motive toward it?

§ 1. But it seems that it is fear: because 1. It is said, Ecclesiasticus 1:16: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: but wisdom is called there the savor of grace in the one justifying: therefore it seems that fear initiates it: but what initiates it, moves toward justification: therefore, etc.

§ 2. Item, Bernard By experience I have learned, that nothing avails so much for acquiring, recovering, and preserving the grace of God, than always not to savor high things, but to fear: but that which acquires and recovers, inclines and moves to justification: therefore the fear of God in act moves to justification.

§ 3. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Acts 15:9, it is said: Purifying their hearts by faith: but to purify is the same as to justify: therefore faith moves to justification.

§ 4. Item, Augustine says , that the justification by which a godly man is made from an ungodly one, is faith itself: and from this the same follows as before.

§ 5. Against this Hugh of St. Victor says , that we are justified by love: therefore it seems that love moves to justification.

§ 6. Response, that justification is a certain movement from sin or the evil of guilt to the good of grace and rectitude: and therefore nothing prohibits there being diverse moving things, namely from evil to good: for from evil, which is the terminus from which of justification, fear moves in the affect: but toward the good it happens in multiple ways, namely as to the intellect, and as to this faith moves: and as to the affect, and thus charity moves: and thus there are three moving things.

§ 7. Yet it must be known that if any virtue moves to justification, this is not except as to the order of acts: because the habits are all infused simultaneously: and how this is so, was stated above in the first article of this question.

§ 8. And much was noted concerning this in the second book of the Sentences.

§ 9. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 16 — How Love, Predestination, Calling, Election, Justification, And Glorification Stand In Relation To Each Other

How do love, predestination, calling, election, justification, and magnification relate to one another?

Eighthly, It is inquired concerning the comparison of justification to love, calling, and magnification, with which it is conjoined in the epistle to the Romans 8, passim.

§ 1. But it seems that calling is an intermediate between justification and predestination: because, in Romans 8:30, the Apostle enumerates thus: And whom he predestinated, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified, etc.

§ 2. But then it is inquired, Whether calling bespeaks sanctifying grace (gratia gratum faciens), or freely given grace (gratia gratis data)?

§ 3. And it seems that it is freely given: because 1. The immediate consequent of predestination, just as the effect follows the cause, is justification: because predestination is the preparation of grace in the present, and of glory in the future: the justification of a man seems to be of a man still existing in sin: but calling is prior, as was proved: therefore it is of a man existing in sin: but of a man existing in sin there is nothing but freely given grace: therefore calling is freely given.

§ 4. Item, One is not called unless distant: since therefore in spiritual things there is no distance of place, but of dissimilarity, as Augustine says on the Gospel of the prodigal son [586], it seems that calling is of one distant through merit: and that one is in mortal sin: therefore calling bespeaks a grace which can befit mortal sin: and that is freely given grace, not sanctifying grace: therefore calling does not bespeak sanctifying grace.

§ 5. Item, What befits the good and the evil, cannot be a grace unless freely given: but calling befits the good and the evil: therefore in its genus calling does not bespeak a grace except freely given. The first of these is evident per se to any faithful person. But the second is evident through what is said in Proverbs 1:24, concerning certain ones: I called, and you refused: I stretched out my hand, etc., where it is evident that calling befits the evil. But in Matthew 4:19, it is said concerning Peter and Andrew, that Jesus called them: and there it befits the good.

§ 6. If perchance you say, as the Gloss says on the epistle to the Romans 8:30 [587], that calling is twofold: interior, and exterior. Exterior is that which is through preaching: and concerning that the Apostle does not speak. But interior is to assist the cognition of faith, or to cause compunction in him whom He knows will listen. And that the Apostle does not speak of the exterior, is evident: because this belongs to both the good and the evil: but the interior belongs to the good only, and of that the Apostle speaks. Against this: The cognition of faith which is assisted, is either of formed faith, or of unformed. If of formed. Against: Formed faith is not formed except through grace and charity: but what is formed from something is subsequent to that from which it is formed: therefore this faith follows grace and charity: therefore it does not precede justification. And this is against the enumeration of the Apostle, who enumerates calling before justification. But if it is the cognition of unformed faith. Against: This belongs to both the good and the evil: therefore it is nothing but freely given grace, as was proved before: and thus it can be of a man existing in mortal sin.

§ 7. Further it is inquired, What is the difference of these to election, of which the Gloss makes mention saying, that calling belongs only to the elect?

§ 8. But it seems that this is false. For election is only of those having final grace: calling belongs only to the elect: therefore calling is only of those having final grace. And whom he called, them he also justified, as the text says: therefore he did not justify anyone except men having final grace, which is openly false, since there are many who are just according to present justice, who are not just according to final grace.

§ 9. It is inquired also concerning the magnification which the Apostle posits there in that order.

§ 10. For it seems not to differ from justification: because the Gloss says, that he magnified with every genus of virtues: but every genus of virtues is given in justification: therefore in justification itself he magnified.

§ 11. Response. It must be said that these follow one another according to order: love, predestination, election, calling, justification, magnification. And indeed the first three posit nothing in man, but in God, who is the author of justifying grace: yet they posit something with respect to man: but the other three posit grace in the justified man according to diverse considerations. For in God there is something inclining the will to giving grace, and this is love, and it is the first which befits the good only, because foreknowledge is with respect to the good and the evil. But there follows upon the inclined will the preparation of that which will be given in grace and glory, and this is called predestination according to its name. But from the giving there follows the distinction of him to whom it must be given, from him to whom it must not be given, and this is the separation from the mass of the lost and this is called election. But in the effect of the giving, which is concerning man, there is a movement from evil to good and to perfection in it. And regarding the terminus from which, it is calling, because...

§ 1. [one] is not called unless one is distant: but with respect to the terminus ad quem, there is justification; and with respect to perfection in it, there is magnification. And these things are expressly gathered from the Epistle to the Romans 8:29-30 [588], both from the text and the Gloss: and their difference is manifest, and will be clearer in the response.

§ 2. To the objection, therefore, it must be said that calling, according to its substance, signifies the same grace as justification, but under another notion, namely insofar as it turns one away from evil. And because this is prior in the motion of the soul of the one who is justified, it is therefore placed in the middle between predestination and justification: since it is not before justification in time, but in nature, according as nature is called the way into nature, which is generation.

§ 3. To the next objection, it must be said that 'distant' is spoken of in two ways, namely distant through an obstinate will, and this one is not called by the interior calling which belongs only to the elect. And one is said to be distant through the vicinity of sin, namely one who is already fleeing, and in fleeing is closer to sin: and to this one belongs the interior calling: but this person is not in mortal sin, but rather in grace: but is in it according to the detestation and flight of sin.

§ 4. To the next objection, it must be said that there is an exterior calling, which belongs to both the good and the wicked: but the interior calling belongs to the good alone: because in it a human being is called practically, when he is drawn away from sin by grace. And the following distinction is to be conceded.

§ 5. To the disproof, however, it must be said that the Gloss speaks of formed faith. And this is assisted, when that which is formal in faith is assisted, and this is of attrition when by drawing it helps so that what cognition dictates may come to be, according to Psalm 110:10 [589], saying: "A good understanding to all that do it."

§ 6. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that faith is considered in two ways, namely in act, and in habit. And in act again in two ways, namely in an act tending to God through merit, and in an act as it were showing God: of which Augustine says that faith first opens the eyes: and the Apostle, in Heb. 11:6 [590], that "he that cometh to God must first believe that he is, and is a rewarder to them that seek him." If therefore it is considered in this ultimate act: then it precedes justification, not in time, but in nature: because thus it inclines toward it on the part of the one who is justified, according to Acts 15:9 "Purifying their hearts by faith." But if it is considered as tending to God for the sake of God, insofar as it is an act willing to obtain eternal life, thus it follows justification in time. But if it is considered in habit: thus they are infused simultaneously in justification itself.

§ 7. To that which is further asked concerning election, it is already clear from the solution to the question, namely what the difference is.

§ 8. To the objection, however, it must be said that according to the Gloss, in truth, calling belongs only to the elect, who are to have final grace - but it does not follow that justification belongs only to them: because although in order justification always follows calling in the elect, yet it is not necessary that in everyone justification be ordered to an interior calling.

§ 9. And there is a counter-instance: supposing that four human beings are not whitened unless they be knowing, others without knowledge can be whitened: it can truly be said that those who are knowing are whitened: yet it does not follow that none are whitened unless they be knowing. And there is an error according to the sophistic topic of the consequent.

§ 10. To that which is further asked concerning magnification, it must be said that the order of virtues is considered in two ways, namely in itself, and in the efficacy of the work. In itself there is no magnification, and thus it is given in justification. But in the efficacy of the work a virtual quantity is required: and it is called magnification by the Gloss: nevertheless, another Gloss expounds this concerning the magnificence of the reward in penance.

587. Glossa Ordinaria on Romans 8:30.

Articulus 17 — What The Healing Of The Mind Is

What is the healing of the mind?

What is the healing of the mind?

§ 11. Ninth and lastly, it is asked concerning the operation of justification with respect to the healing of the mind, and the renewal of the image.

§ 12. But here seven things must be asked. First, we will ask, What is the healing of the mind? Second, What is the renewal of the image? Third, Whether these two have a difference, or not? Fourth, Whether they are accomplished by prevenient or subsequent grace? Fifth, Whether they are accomplished by the grace of a sacrament, or of virtues, or of gifts? Sixth, Whether they occur suddenly, or successively? Seventh, In what do they differ from justification?

§ 13. To the first of these it is objected thus: 1. Joshua 5:8 [591], upon that text: "But after they were all circumcised, they remained in the same place of the camp": in the Gloss which thus begins: "But the circumcised children of Israel rested in the same place, etc. In this time therefore, as if in the pain of our circumcision, we are said to reside, until the scar being drawn over we are healed, that is, we fulfill the new institutes without difficulty, and what was formerly unusual and seemed difficult is turned into use: and then it will deservedly be said to us: Today I have taken away the reproach of Egypt from you." From this it is gathered that the healing of the mind is the perfect drawing over of the wound that is inflicted from sin. But it seems according to this that the mind could never attain health, because the wound is not drawn over in this life: therefore health will not be attained. That the wound is not drawn over, the Gloss says upon Psalm 102:3 "Who healeth all thy diseases", thus: "Now by cherishing with blandishments, now by cutting with harsh things he heals: for no incurable languor occurs to the omnipotent physician. But especially in the end he will heal languors, when this corporal being shall put on incorruption."

§ 14. 2. Also, it is certain that in this life that which is said in 1 John 1:8 [592] will never be falsified: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us": and that, "In many things we all offend" [593]. Therefore the wound always remains in this life: but sin in itself is an infirmity, and the cause of the infirmity of punishment: therefore it seems that in this life infirmity never ceases: therefore health will never be attained in this life.

§ 15. 3. Also, extreme unction which is the sacrament of the departing, is given against the remnants of the infirmity of sin: therefore up to that point the infirmity of sin remains: but after that nothing remains of life: therefore it seems that health is never possessed in this life.

§ 16. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Psalm 146:3 "Who healeth the broken of heart": therefore the broken of heart are healed: but many in this life are broken of heart: therefore many in this life are healed.

588. Rom. 8:29-30.

§ 17. 2. Also, Jerome says that the Lord healed no one in the body, whom he did not first heal in the mind: but he healed many in this life in the body: therefore he healed many in this life in the mind.

§ 18. Response. It must be said that infirmity is twofold, and health is twofold: for there is an infirmity of the soul, just as there is an infirmity of the body. Hence just as in a fever there are two things, namely the cause of the fever, and the essential substance and form of it: so it is in the soul. For the cause of the fever is the smoke of putrefied matter kindled by the heart: but the form is the inequality of humors in which and in the members which are nourished by those humors, it has the formal being of a fever.

§ 19. Similarly it is in the soul: causally indeed infirmity is sin: but formally it is the distemperature of the powers of the soul to themselves, and to acts, and to the body which it has to rule. But causal infirmity is twofold, namely mortal, and venial which does not extinguish the life of grace, but impedes fervor.

§ 20. It must be said therefore, that mortal causal infirmity is healed in this life, and venial according to every venial sin this and that demonstrated, but not in universal so that there is not always some infinite number. But the proportion and contemperature of powers is twofold, namely to the life of merit, and to the life of felicity and beatitude. And according to the first mode infirmity is put to flight, and health returns in this life, but not according to the second mode.

§ 21. And through this the solution to the first is clear; because the Gloss speaks of perfect formal curing, not causal which is grace, which will be in the fatherland when this mortal shall have put on immortality, as is said, 1 Cor. 15:53 [594].

§ 22. To the next it must be said that in this life there will always be causal infirmity: but that does not take away health, but diminishes some delight of health: just as in corporal health the delight of health is diminished from some raised pustule: yet health is not taken away. For as the Philosopher says, we do not say someone is healed from an infirmity, unless he is healed according to the whole, or a principal part, such as the head, or the heart.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that the remnants do not cause infirmity except in a certain respect (secundum quid): and against that extreme unction is given, so that anointed with the oil of gladness one may pass to the state of felicity: because as to this state no one is healed in this life.

§ 24. To the following the solution is clear through what has been said.

Articulus 18 — Whether The Renewal Of The Mind Is Brought About Through The Virtues And Through Grace

Whether the renewal of the mind is accomplished through virtues, and through grace?

§ 25. Secondly, it is asked concerning the renewal of the mind.

586. Augustine, Quaestiones Evangeliorum, II.33.

§ 26. 1. Now the Gloss says upon the Epistle to the Romans 6:4 [595], upon that text: "Let us walk in newness of life", that "innovation begins from justification, and is perfected in immortality": therefore it seems that innovation is accomplished through virtues and grace: and thus it does not seem to drive away entirely the oldness.

§ 27. 2. Also, in Heb. 8:13 [596], it is said: "That which decayeth and groweth old, is near its end." It seems therefore, that destruction is the effect of oldness: but the old remains in us, while we live: therefore also oldness.

§ 28. 3. Also, Job 16:9 "My wrinkles bear witness against me." But those wrinkles remain, because Job was holy. Therefore the testimony of oldness always remains: therefore oldness is not taken away in this life, as it seems.

§ 29. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: "Thy youth shall be renewed like the eagle's" [597]. Therefore the saints are renewed here.

§ 30. Also, Col. 3:9-10 "Stripping yourselves of the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new, him who is renewed unto knowledge, according to the image of him that created him."

§ 31. Also, 1 Cor. 5:7 "Purge out the old leaven, that you may be a new paste, as you are unleavened." But a new paste does not come to be except through the innovation of this life. Therefore innovation can happen in this life.

§ 32. Solution. It must be said that there is an oldness of guilt, and an oldness of punishment: and renewal from the oldness of guilt, that is, from guilt proceeding from the old guilt of Adam, and rendering the soul old through defect and corruption, happens through grace in this life. But oldness from all punishment is not perfected except in the other life, although it is begun here.

§ 33. And through this the solution to all the objections is clear except for that which is adduced concerning Job: and it must be said that literally he speaks of the oldness of punishment insofar as it is indicative of guilt which is meritorious of punishment: for although Job had not sinned, yet he seemed to have sinned from so great a scourge which he sustained. Allegorically however Christ speaks there in the person of his members, and indeed of his members, that is, of those who are members through election, although they do not yet adhere to the body through present justice, because they are subject to oldness.

Articulus 19 — Whether The Health Of The Mind And The Renewal Of The Image Are The Same, Or Differ

Whether the healing of the mind and the renewal of the image are the same, or differ?

§ 34. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the difference of these.

§ 35. And it seems there is none: because if the cause of both is considered, it is grace: and if the effect of both is considered, it seems to be a certain reintegration of the virtue of the soul,

589. Ps. 110:10 (111:10).

which was in a certain manner corrupted from sin: therefore there is no difference between healing and the renewal of the image, as it seems.

§ 36. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Health is attributed to the whole soul, renewal to the image alone: therefore they are not the same: for forms are diverse, whose proper subjects are diverse.

§ 37. 2. Also, all who transfer well, transfer according to some similitude: but those things from which this similitude is taken are not the same: therefore neither will those to which the transfer is made be the same. PROOF of the middle. Health in the body and youth are not the same: therefore the proposition is certain.

§ 38. Response. It must be said that the healing of the mind and the innovation of the image differ in notion, but not in substance: for healing is spoken of insofar as it drives away the weakness and infirmity of sin. But innovation is spoken of insofar as with strengthened virtue, the oldness of ancient sin and its effect is driven away. Hence innovation signifies a strengthened virtue, which healing does not do.

§ 39. And through this the solution to the first part of the objections is clear: because we concede that they are substantially the same.

§ 40. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that renewal is not attributed to the image, as if that were its sole subject, but as to a subject in which its act chiefly appears: because it is made in act imitating the exemplar, whereas before it only imitated in potency, and had an actual aversion from the ratio of imitation, when it was under sin.

§ 41. To the next it must be said that corporal youth is twofold, namely from time, and from the effect which time leaves concerning the subject: and according to the first mode it is not the same as health, nor is it founded upon health. But in the second mode, because youth is the time of augmentation in the state of an existent in which the power is strengthened, by reason of that the transfer is made: and therefore it signifies strengthened virtue for works, and therefore it is founded upon spiritual health, according to notion adding something to it, but substantially it is the same.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Health Of The Mind Is Brought About Through Prevenient Grace

Whether the healing of the mind is accomplished through prevenient grace?

Whether the healing of the mind is accomplished through prevenient grace?

§ 42. Fourthly it is asked, Whether it is accomplished through prevenient, or subsequent grace?

590. Heb. 11:6.

§ 43. 1. For Augustine says in the fifth book of On the Trinity: "Who heals all thy diseases, unless he who will be propitious to all thy iniquities?" As if to say, no one: but the propitiation of iniquity is through prevenient grace: therefore also the healing of infirmity.

§ 44. 2. Also, in bodily matters the driving away of infirmity and healing is not accomplished by another medicine, but by the same one: therefore similarly in its own way it is in spiritual matters: but spiritual infirmity is driven away through prevenient grace: therefore the soul is also healed through the same.

§ 45. 3. Also, prevenient grace is not more impotent than some bodily or natural form: but a natural form gives being to matter and purges the privation which was in it: therefore much more strongly will grace do this in the soul: but the privation is the infirmity of sin in the soul: therefore grace gives being to the soul, and also wipes away the infirmity.

§ 46. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The drawing over of the wound is health, as was held above: but the wound is not drawn over immediately in its entirety once grace is possessed: therefore health is not accomplished through prevenient grace.

§ 47. 2. Also, circumcision signified the taking away of sin through grace: but it is certain that, circumcision having been done, the circumcised was not immediately healthy: therefore it seems similarly that, spiritual circumcision having been done through grace, spiritual health is not immediately returned.

§ 48. Response. It must be said that health is twofold, namely imperfect which is in the cause of health: and perfect which is attained in perfect habituation to acting well, the remnants of evil custom having been purged. And the first indeed is accomplished through prevenient grace: but the subsequent through subsequent grace: and these graces are the same in substance, although they differ in notion: and this was noted in the second book of the Sentences.

§ 49. And through this the solution to both parts of the objections can be clear to anyone.

Articulus 21 — Whether The Health Of The Mind Is Brought About Through The Grace Of The Sacrament

Whether the healing of the mind is accomplished through the grace of a sacrament?

§ 50. Fifthly it is asked, Whether it is accomplished through the grace of a sacrament, or of virtues, or of gifts?

§ 51. But it seems that it is through sacraments. 1. Ecclesiasticus 38:7 "The apothecary shall make sweet confections, and shall make up ointments of health": but those ointments, as the Saints say, signify the sacraments: therefore health will be accomplished through the grace of a sacrament.

§ 52. 2. Also, in the beginning of this fourth book of the Sentences, the Master adduces that which is found in Luke 10:34 [598], that the Samaritan approaching the wounded man, and pouring in oil and wine: and he expounds it of the grace of the sacraments, and the infirmity of sin: therefore it seems that sacramental grace properly effects health.

591. Jos. 5:8-9.

§ 53. 3. Also, if there were always health, a perfective of health would never be sought: therefore that which is sought at the time of infirmity , and not unless it be the grace of health, seems to be the proper perfective of health: but this is sacramental grace, not of virtues, or of gifts: therefore the grace of the sacraments is properly the perfective of health. But that sacramental grace is not sought, except at the time of infirmity, is proved from this, that if sin had not existed, the virtues and gifts would nevertheless exist according to their substance, but the sacraments would not exist.

§ 54. 4. Furthermore, above in the beginning of this fourth book it was proved that sacramental grace differs from the grace which is in virtues and gifts: because sacramental grace regards sin, or the disease of sin: but the grace which is in virtues and gifts does not: therefore it seems that properly speaking health and justification and renewal are accomplished through sacramental grace.

§ 55. But to the opposite of this it is objected: 1. Through this which the Gloss says upon that text: "Who healeth the broken of heart, and bindeth up their bruises" [599], thus: "by repenting and by faith God binds up their bruises": but faith is a virtue: therefore it is accomplished equally by sacraments and by virtue.

§ 56. 2. Also, contraries are cured by contraries: but virtues are contrary to vices: therefore the disease of vices is properly healed through the infusion of virtues: therefore not by the grace of the sacraments, because sacraments are not contrary to vices.

§ 57. 3. Also, Gregory says that the gifts were given in assistance to the powers against the defects into which human beings fall from sin: therefore it seems that the gifts cure those defects: but those defects are infirmities: therefore they cure infirmities: therefore the cure is not accomplished through sacramental grace alone.

§ 58. Response. It seems it must be said that through sacramental grace alone properly speaking the healing of the mind or of the inner man is perfected, and this is clear from what was disputed in the beginning of this fourth book.

§ 59. To that therefore which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that faith heals, according as it has the effect of a sacrament, and not through itself: hence it belongs to faith to heal by accident: for if infirmity had never existed, faith would still exist, and it would be better than it is now.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that virtues are contrary to vices: but a human being would not be healed by political virtues alone, but they are made curative according as the virtue of the passion of Christ is conjoined to them through the reception of the sacraments, and then they heal by the force of the sacramental grace in which they are infused.

§ 61. To the last it must be said that the gifts are not given as an assistance of powers against sin, but rather for higher acts, than could be perfected from the habits of the virtues:

and this assistance a human being would need, even if he had not sinned. And how this is so, must be inspected in the third book of the Sentences, in the tractate on the gifts, where this is found noted.

§ 62. To this however it was otherwise solved by a distinction, namely that infirmity is twofold, namely of sin insofar as it is sin, and the infirmity of powers to act. And the first indeed is cured by sacramental grace, the second by grace in virtues and gifts. And let the reader say whatever he wishes, yet I repute the first solution to contain the truth.

Articulus 22 — Whether The Aforesaid Health Comes About Suddenly, Or Successively

Whether the aforesaid health is accomplished suddenly, or successively?

§ 63. Sixthly it is asked, Whether it is accomplished suddenly, or successively?

§ 64. But it seems that suddenly: because the grace of the Holy Spirit knows no slow endeavors: therefore it operates nothing except suddenly: but it operates healing and renewal: therefore it operates it suddenly.

§ 65. 2. Also. Divine operations proceed from an infinite power: but an infinite power acts suddenly: therefore all those operations are done suddenly: but healing and renewal are divine operations: therefore they are done suddenly.

§ 66. 3. Furthermore, in some respect a divine work ought to be distinguished from a natural one which signifies potency: but the work of nature is successive: therefore the work of God is done suddenly.

§ 67. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. We are renewed more from day to day but to be renewed from day to day is to be renewed successively: therefore this renewal is accomplished successively.

§ 68. 2. Also, Hezekiah, Isa. 38:21 [600], was not immediately healed when he received the promise of health: but a poultice was laid upon the boil: therefore it seems that the healing of the mind is accomplished successively.

§ 69. Response. It must be said that according to the twofold health, health occurs suddenly, and successively: for causal infirmity is cut off suddenly: but formal infirmity which adheres to the powers of the soul is cured successively, and gradually through the custom of good works.

§ 70. To the first therefore we say that this is said of purifying grace, not of the effect of subsequent grace.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that although God operates with infinite virtue, yet he does not operate all things through himself alone, but certain things we operate with him, namely health, which is accomplished by the purgation of the remnants of sin: and therefore on the part of our work a succession of time accedes to the effect.

593. Jas. 3:2.

§ 72. To the next it must be said that a work of God which he alone operates, is suddenly, just as creation: and justification is a work of God according as it is with us, and with nature, it does not anticipate our faculty and the infirmity of nature: because otherwise he himself would destroy our faculty and that of nature: and therefore it is not necessary that that divine work be distinguished from the work of nature in this.

Articulus 23 — In What Healing And Renewal Differ

Healing and renewal, in what do they differ?

§ 73. Seventhly it is asked, In what do these two, namely healing, and renewal, differ from justification?

§ 74. And it seems that they differ: because those things whose opposites are different, are themselves different: but the opposites of these are essentially different: therefore they themselves are different. PROOF of the middle, because the first is certain. Impiety is opposed to sanctification, and oldness to renewal, and infirmity to health: and these are diverse both in name, and in notion: therefore the proposition is certain.

§ 75. I respond that they differ in notion, as was said before: and so that this may be better seen, it must be noted that two things are considered in sin, namely the absolute foulness, according as it is the privation of justice, where justice ought to be, according as it is also called injustice or iniquity or impiety: and according to that which is left in the subject through the effect, or rather defect, because its effect is a defect. In the first mode justification is opposed to it, which makes the impious pious, and the unjust just. But in the second mode it is considered in two ways, namely according to the simple relation to the cause of all sin and the effect, or according to the effect alone according as it is the privation of a natural good. And in the first indeed it makes the soul taste the first oldness: and thus it is oldness, and renewal is opposed to it. But in the second mode it is an infirmity of mode and commensuration and harmony in the natural habits of the soul: and the health of the mind or healing is opposed to it.

§ 76. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 24 — Whether Confession Frees The Soul From Death

Whether confession delivers the soul from death?

Whether confession delivers the soul from death?

§ 77. Next it is asked concerning this which it says, there, A, § 6, after the beginning: "Confession delivers the soul from death, confession opens paradise, confession bestows the hope of salvation, etc."

§ 78. For it seems to touch upon three effects of confession, none of which seems to belong to it:

594. 1 Cor. 15:53.

§ 79. 1. For that which delivers from the death of sin, is that which takes away sin, and first vivifies: but this is contrition with grace: therefore this is not the effect of confession.

§ 80. 2. Also, "Shall physicians raise to life, and give praise to thee?" [601] there the Gloss says that priests do not resuscitate the soul: but rather having been resuscitated, it is presented to them in confession, already resuscitated by the Lord in contrition: just as Lazarus was resuscitated inside the tomb, but was presented living to the disciples to be loosed: therefore since in confession a human being is presented to the priest, it seems that it is not the effect of confession that it vivifies the soul, but rather of contrition.

§ 81. 3. Also, above in the Letter was had that of Ecclesiasticus 17:26 [602], that "From the dead, as nothing, confession perisheth." Therefore he is vivified beforehand so that he can confess.

§ 82. 4. Also, Isa. 38:19 "The living, the living, he shall give praise to thee, as I do this day." Therefore it seems that to vivify is not the effect of confession.

§ 83. SIMILARLY it is objected concerning the second effect which is, that confession opens paradise. For this seems false: because § 84. 1. In the genus of a sacrament, as was held above, baptism opens paradise: therefore this is not the effect of confession: for the effects of the sacraments are distinct, just as the sacraments themselves.

§ 85. 2. Also, to the passion of Christ this effect is given, namely the opening of paradise, according to what Christ said to the thief: "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise" therefore it seems that it does not belong to confession.

§ 86. 3. Also, with respect to what does confession open paradise, if it opens it? For either it opens with respect to the loosing of the closing guilt, or with respect to the loosing of the deferring punishment. If in the first mode. On the contrary: Before confession, the guilt is loosed in contrition: therefore to open paradise belongs to contrition rather than to confession. If in the second mode. On the contrary: Satisfaction removes the entire punishment deferring paradise: therefore to open paradise is attributed to satisfaction rather than to confession, as it seems.

§ 87. Similarly it is objected concerning the third effect which is, that it bestows the hope of salvation:

§ 88. 1. For this does not seem proper to confession, but to all meritorious acts, because hope rests upon every merit: therefore this ought not to be specially attributed to confession.

§ 89. 2. Also, Gregory says that a person rises up stronger in hope toward God, by as much as he has endured stronger things for his name. Therefore it seems that the hope of salvation is generated by the tolerance of passions rather than by confession: which is taken in the Epistle to the Romans 5:3-4 [603], where it is said that "tribulation worketh patience; and patience trial; and trial hope." Therefore this does not seem to properly belong to confession.

595. Rom. 6:4.

§ 90. Response. It must be said that these effects in a certain respect properly belong to confession, and in a certain respect are more properly of others. And it is taken according to the three things which are in confession. For confession, as Gregory says, is the opening of a wound: but in the first opening of the wound is the first seeking of the physician and medicine: but according to this, confession is the recognition of sin in itself, and before God, with the purpose of confessing before the priest-physician: and then a human being begins to be vivified: and thus the first effect is attributed to it, which is the justification of the soul. But because a human being still remains a debtor to purgatorial punishment, from which he is not absolved except through the power of Christ's passion constituted in the keys, which passion loosed the flaming sword, therefore through the telling of the sin with the purpose of avoiding them, paradise is opened to him. But because the hope of salvation does not belong to a human being unless while he is conjoined to the head Christ and his members through the reconciliation of the Church, and in confession a human being is first reconciled and incorporated into the Church, therefore then first is it shown that the hope of salvation is given to him: because there is no salvation, except in the mystical body of the Savior.

§ 91. Therefore to the first it must be said that although the soul is first vivified in contrition, yet this is not according to the act of contrition and its name: because contrition signifies the act of one crushing the cause of death, after it is inquisitive of the vivifying one and medicine according to a vow: and this confession does in its origin, because confession begins in the cognition of sin in itself before God, with the purpose of telling this before a priest. Hence although to crush sin and to renew life are the same, yet the notion of both is not one, and one is done in contrition, the other in the vow of confessing.

§ 92. To the next it must be said that physicians do not resuscitate, nor is confession begun before the priest-physician: because confession is a divine act: otherwise it would not differ from confession which is in law, or another human telling: but rather confession begins before God, and there the confessing one first begins to receive life.

§ 93. To the next it must be said that there he speaks of the act of confession, which is the telling of sins: because vivification preceded that.

§ 94. Through the same the solution to the following is clear.

§ 95. To that which is asked concerning the other effect, it must be said that the opening of paradise belongs to baptism in one way, and to confession in another, and to the passion of Christ in another. To baptism indeed it belongs with respect to the loosing of original sin, which is contracted from the vice of origin: and if it looses actual sin, this is by accident, because it finds it, as was noted above in the question concerning baptism. But to confession it belongs with respect to the removal of purgatorial punishment: for although someone, as the Master says below, in contrition which is with the vow of confessing, may be loosed from mortal sin and eternal punishment before confession: yet still the punishment temporally owed would be disproportionate and insupportable, if the punishment of Christ who satisfied for us did not diminish it: and this punishment is conjoined to us through the faith of the keys in confession, and as to removing that insupportable thing, which removes one from the entrance of paradise, because no one still a debtor of punishment may enter paradise, it is said that confession opens paradise.

596. Heb. 8:13.

§ 96. And through this the solution to the first two is clear.

§ 97. To the next it must be said that it opens with respect to the absolution of a certain punishment, namely that insupportable to the powers of the penitent, which a human being would owe, if he did not submit himself to the keys and the passion of Christ: for this cannot be deleted through satisfaction: rather satisfaction does not have a place, except when that absolution has been made in confession, if he himself has the opportunity of confessing: and if he does not have it, then necessity and not contempt excludes the act of the sacrament, and this power of the keys descends into such a person by merit and the unity of the mystical body, to which he is united by grace.

§ 98. To that which is objected concerning the third, it must be said that the hope of salvation is spoken of here as to the first exclusion of the cause of desperation: for the medicine having been received through confession, he is shown to be reconciled to Christ and the Church: and therefore the devil does not have power over him, as he does over those who [are in sin].

they are outside: and this, according to this reason, does not pertain to every merit.

To the other it must be said that hope is one thing, and firmness and strength of hope is another. But hope of salvation is from the first giving security of life, just as a confessor gives to one confessing to Christ and to the sacraments and to the Church. But the strength and firmness of hope is from the greatness of merit: and through this it is especially in the more difficult things which are, namely, the endurance of sufferings. For this reason Gregory says that higher hope follows stronger sufferings. Through the same the solution to the word of the Apostle is clear.

Articulus 25 — Whether The Modes Of Purging From Sin, According To The Master, Are Well Distinguished

Whether the modes of purification from sin according to the Master are well distinguished?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, § 6, around the middle: No one can receive the grace of God, etc.

For here he seems to touch upon three modes of purification from sin, namely through penance, through confession, and through baptism.

597. Ps. 102:5 (103:5).

And it seems that the first two do not differ: because

1. Penance has three parts, as was held above: but a part with the whole does not make a number: therefore, there is not a different mode of purification through penance and through confession.
2. Likewise, it seems that the third requires the two preceding: because in the preceding distinction it was held concerning the modes of penance, that an adult approaching baptism ought to repent and be contrite for sins: therefore, it seems that these modes are conjoined.

Response. It must be said that these three modes of purification from sins are different: for either one needs purification which is with external lament, or not. If not, then it is purification through baptism: because that does not require external lament of sin. But if it is needed: then it is either for the solution of guilt, or for the disproportionality of punishment. If in the first way, it is penance purging: if in the second way, it is confession. And this is clear from the prior disputation.

But if it is asked, Why is satisfaction not posited?

It must be said that nothing is posited here as purging, except that which purges without us working, although not without us consenting: but satisfaction does not purge without us working, but rather purges us through our work informed by grace.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the purification of sin is considered in two ways, namely divided as to those things which are in sin, and conjointly. And if it is considered divided, namely guilt, and disproportional punishment, and expiatory punishment, then they will have divided purifications: because guilt with eternal punishment is purged in penance, as already defined in the Letter, where he said: Penance is true, etc. And this definition you have disputed above. And this most fittingly pertains to contrition. If as to disproportional punishment, it is purged in confession; and the punishment of expiation through our work in satisfaction. But if all are taken conjointly: then through total penance in all its parts accepted conjointly they are purged. In the first way, however, the saint speaks here. But concerning the second, you have many things noted at the beginning of distinction XV.

To the other, it must be said that he speaks here of purification which is through external lament, which spreads ashes and sackcloth. And although baptism requires penance and confession in adults, yet it does not require these except to remove the obstacle to the Holy Spirit: and therefore nothing is enjoined except the faith of the one baptizing: because in that all things are resolved, and no external lament is assumed.

Articulus 26 — Whether The Penitent Is Bound To Manifest His Penance To Others Besides The Priest

Whether the penitent is bound to manifest his penance to others besides the priest?

598. Luke 10:34.

Then: it is asked concerning this which is said, there, A, § 6, around the middle: No one says to himself, I act secretly, etc.

From this it is clearly concluded, it is necessary to confess.

However, it is asked, If someone is bound to make known in penance, except to the priest alone?

However, it seems that he ought to make known to all who saw him in sin: because

1. As much as someone has harmed, he is bound to benefit, if he can. However, this one by sinning openly harmed many through scandal: therefore in penance he ought to make known to the same at least, so that he may benefit by example.
2. Likewise, spiritual harm is greater than corporal: but in corporal harm someone is bound to restitution: and sin is not forgiven, unless what was taken is restored: therefore much more in spiritual harm: however, this one harmed many by bad example: therefore to all those he ought to restore by good.
3. Likewise, Gregory says concerning bad prelates, that they are guilty of so many souls, therefore by a similar reasoning those who by bad example sent many to perdition to hell: they are bound to edify their neighbor by good example, but they cannot unless they make known: therefore to those they ought to be made public in penance.

If perhaps you say, that by the very fact that we see them cease from sin, and do works of the kind of good, they are made known to be in penance. On the contrary: these works are of many, even of those not penitent: therefore by these works penitents are not necessarily made known: therefore it is seen, that this does not suffice.

If this is not conceded, it proceeds thus: | Against: Some penances are prescribed for crimes: if therefore penance is made known, the crime will immediately be known: but no one is bound to manifest the crime: therefore neither is he bound to make known by penance, as far as penance is concerned.

Response. It must be said, that no one is bound to disclose his penance to anyone, except to the priest alone.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that anyone who caused scandal in common, is not bound except to the showing of good example in common: because by this very fact that they see a good example, since concerning anyone it is to be presumed good, they ought to presume penance and remission concerning past things.

To the other it must be said, that although spiritual harm is greater, it is not so injurious to the neighbor: and this is because in spiritual harm only the willing is harmed, but in corporal harm even the unwilling is harmed: and therefore he is not bound so directly to restitution: because spiritual harm, which is done by imitated scandal, can be an occasion: but he by his own will is the cause: and therefore in restoring he is not bound except to show a good example, which is an occasion of good, although it is not a cause.

To the other it must be said, that Gregory extends there the name of guilty, namely who is guilty by giving occasion of perdition: but he is not as guilty as he who was the cause.

To what is objected against this solution, it must be said that works of the kind of good are sufficiently an occasion of good, although they are not causes: and this suffices by the reason previously assigned: because namely by giving a bad example, even it was only an occasion of evil, and not a cause.

Articulus 27 — Whether We Are Bound To Confess In The Sight Of The People

Are we bound to confess in the sight of the people?

Then it is questioned concerning what is said there, A, §6, after the middle: Job says: If I was ashamed in the sight of the people, etc.

For from this it seems that we are bound to confess in the sight of the people:

1. For the word of Job is an oath of execration: and it should be added: If I did this, woe to me, that is, may it happen badly to me.
2. Likewise, Mary Magdalene, because she was gravely ashamed inwardly, nothing that she should be ashamed of outwardly was growing: therefore, he who is well ashamed inwardly, also ought to confess before the people.

But against this is that which is instituted for charity should not fight against charity: but confession is instituted for charity: therefore, it should not fight against charity: but if we were bound to confess publicly, many would be drawn away from confession: and this would be to fight against charity: therefore, it seems that it should not be confessed publicly.

Solution. It must be said that it should not be confessed publicly: for there is neither a precept concerning this, nor counsel, unless perhaps it were a crime that moved the entire city, or even the world, like the heresy of Arius or another heresiarch, which for the greater confusion of others would be said publicly. But nevertheless, general confession is not advised to be done publicly: because it would be to the harm of many, and the humiliation of one should never be advised in such a way that it generates an occasion of harm to another.

However, the text which is introduced here is according to the translation of the Septuagint, which is corrupted, especially in Job, as Jerome says: and it is taken from Job 31:33, and our text has thus: If I have hidden, like a man, my sin, and concealed my iniquity in my bosom. And this text does not say that it should be confessed before the people.

But if anyone wishes to sustain that text, it must be said that to confess before the people is said in two ways, namely, the narration of confession: and this is not necessary: or the manifestation of penance enjoined in confession through good example, and this is necessary, as was said before: and thus Job was not ashamed to confess sins before the people.

To the other, it must be said that Mary was not confessed publicly, but she manifested herself as penitent publicly: and from this shame did not draw her back: and this Gregory intends to say.

Articulus 28 — Why Some Sin Is Called Venial

Why is some sin called venial?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, 6, after the middle: Venial is the fault, which confession of sins follows, etc.

For it seems that this is false: because it is said there to be venial by genus, or by event. If by event: then it is not venial except that which subsequent penance with grace makes venial, that is, to have pardon: but this is first done by contrition, before confession arrives: therefore it is not venial on account of this, that confession follows: but on account of this first, that contrition follows. But if venial by genus. On the contrary: This is not held to be confessed in number, except by general confession, as was held before in the preceding distinction: therefore it seems, that what is said in the Text, is false.

Response. It must be said, that it is called venial here by the event of subsequent grace. And because although contrition removes the fault and eternal punishment, it does not yet take away the intolerability of the punishment, but rather this is done by the power of the keys in confession: after the effect of the keys, however, the punishment becomes arbitrary, which is tolerable and light for the penitent for the expiation of the sin: and therefore this is not attributed to contrition as to confession.

Articulus 29 — Whether Despair Comes From Contempt Or From Fear

Whether despair arises from contempt, or from fear?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, § 6, before the end: He closes over him who in the depth despises, etc.

For this is taken from Proverbs, xvii, 3, where it is said: The impious man, when he has come into the depth of sins, despises.

However, it seems that this is false: because
1. Despair does not arise from contempt, but from excessive fear: excessive fear, however, humbles, as Augustine says. Therefore, since contempt proceeds from pride, it seems incongruous to join these, to come into the depth of iniquity and to despise.

1. Furthermore, if he despises, it is asked what he despises? If it is said, that he despises God. On the contrary: No one despises him whom he excessively fears, but he excessively fears here: therefore he does not despise God.

600. Isa. 38:21.

2. If it is said, that he despises to repent and confess. On the contrary: If someone does not subject himself to that which he believes to be of no value to him, it is not contempt, but wisdom, either apparent only, or existing and not apparent: but the despairing person does not believe repentance and the sacraments to be of value to him: therefore if he does not subject himself to them, it is not contempt, but apparent wisdom.

And it seems not to be to the purpose what he introduces here. For he says a little before:

Therefore confess, and say: Out of the depths I have cried to you, O Lord. From this it seems that he does not intend, as Augustine does, except concerning the confession of praise before the Lord: and thus that authority will prove nothing concerning the purpose.

Response. It must be said, that every impious person in the consideration of the most profound iniquity despairing, despises in his own sense at least: because he relies more on his own sense than on the words of God and the Church consoling and recalling him: and this is the greatest pride. Hence Gregory says: When the judge is so feared, that the face of the judge is not loved, fear is from fear, not from humility.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that although he does not despise God in himself, yet he despises God recalling from sins in his words.

To the other, it must be said, that he despises God in his words and sacraments, in the manner which has been said: because unless he preferred his erroneous sense to the words of God and the Church, he himself would return to repentance.

To what is further asked, it must be said that this authority is much to the purpose. And what Augustine says:

Out of the depths I have cried, he does not intend, that he cries only before the Lord, but before the vicar of the Lord he confesses not only the sin, but the depth of it: and this is called crying.

Articulus 30 — Whether It Is True What The Master Says, That No One Duly Receives Pardon For A Heavier Punishment

Whether it is true what the Master says,
No one duly receives pardon for a graver penalty?

Whether it is true what the Master says,
No one duly receives pardon for a graver penalty?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, § 6, before the end: No one duly of a graver, etc.

1. For there is no mention of confession: therefore it is of no value to the proposition.

2. The same objection is concerning the authority of Jerome following.

601. Ps. 87:11 (88:10).

3. Furthermore, it is asked concerning what Jerome says there: Let him sleep in sackcloth. - For it seems that many are truly penitent, and yet are clothed in linens and not sackcloth.

Response. It must be said that the force is in the first authority in what it says: Although the penalty is indeed lessened through the effect of the keys in confession, it is far less than it ought to be, he has paid the penalty.

Likewise, the force is in what it says, He pays: because he cannot pay the penalty unless it has been assessed at the discretion of the Church through the vicar of Christ: otherwise he does not pay, but only endures the penalties.

To the objection, it must be said that Jerome places force in what he says, Enter, because he cannot enter the Church unless through penance he is shown to be reunited to the mystical body which is the Church: otherwise he enters only in number, and not in merit and truth.

To the other, it must be said that sackcloth is placed here for the humility and harshness of penance, through that trope of speaking by which the species is often placed for the genus.

Articulus 31 — Whether Confession Is A Virtue

Is confession a virtue?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, B, towards the end: "Now he has the gift of the Holy Spirit," etc.

For it seems according to this that confession is a virtue, which is false: since it is a certain external act, suitable to both good and evil.

Response. To this it must be said that he speaks of fruitful confession, which is a meritorious act, and is called a gift of God, because it is not from us in that part where it is meritorious, although free will gives the act and substance. And concerning this, more has been noted upon the second Sentences. Throughout this whole chapter, the solution of the Master is notable and good, and in agreement with what has been disputed thus far.

Articulus 32 — Whether One Ought To Confess To A Man

Whether it is necessary to confess to a man?

Whether it is necessary to confess to a man?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, Now according to the article of the question let us consider, etc.

Let there be a disputation first concerning the principal question, Whether it suffices to confess to God alone, or it is necessary to confess to a man?

It seems, however, that it suffices to confess to God:
1. For two things suffice for the deletion of sin, namely God and the sinner: but on the part of

602. Ecclus. 17:26 (17:28).

God, mercy giving grace is not lacking, and on the part of the one confessing before God, there is recognition of sin with detestation: therefore it seems that these two suffice for the deletion of sin: therefore it is not necessary to confess to a priest.

1. Furthermore, Sin which is transmitted through another is also deleted without the consent and work of our will, as is evident concerning original sin in infants: therefore for sin which is committed by us, it suffices if we cooperate with God in deleting it: but this is sufficiently done when someone confesses to God, recognizing his sin before God with detestation: therefore it seems that it is not necessary to confess to a man.
2. Furthermore, More should not be required in amendment than was committed in fault: because the Lord commanded that according to the measure of the offenses, the mode of stripes should also be: but in the act of sin, insofar as it is sin, only God and the sinner are harmed: therefore in its deletion, no one should be sought except God and the one who sinned: therefore it suffices to confess before God alone. But that no one is harmed in sin except God and the sinner, this is evident from this, because if the divine is separated from sin, the neighbor is not harmed in sin: and thus the Proposition is established.

Moreover, For what reason is confession applied to a man? If it is said, for counsel. On the contrary: There is one substantial counsel in every confession, namely, Go, and sin no more. And if nothing else is added, that observed saves the man: therefore it seems that anything else is only for well-being. Since therefore the substantial counsel is one, this can be made known to the penitent by public preaching and doctrine: therefore confession which is made to a man is not necessary.

1. Likewise, An earthly king has a vicar and needs him because he cannot personally be everywhere in his kingdom: therefore a king who is everywhere in his kingdom by himself does not need a vicar; but God is such a king, who does not need a vicar: therefore it is not necessary for someone to confess to the vicar of God in place of God.
2. Likewise, That an artisan works with many cooperating, that cannot be unless either because of the inexperience of the art, or because of the impotence of the artisan, because he cannot work the whole through one: for the Philosopher says that it is better to work many things through one if it can be done, than many things through many: but God, who is the highest artisan, knows and can work the remission of sins by himself: therefore it seems that he superfluously applies a human vicar to himself: therefore it suffices to confess sin before God and detest it: and it is not necessary to confess to a man.
3. Furthermore, The judgment of confession is divine judgment, and therefore it does not need witnesses except the conscience alone: but in every judgment it suffices that the cause is made known to the judge alone: and it is not necessary that it be made known to another: therefore in confession it suffices that the sin is made known to God alone, nor is it necessary to confess the sin to a man.

1. Penance with its parts is a sacrament, as has often been held above: but the being of a sacrament consists in the dispensation of ministers: therefore also that: nothing, however, is dispensed by another unless known by him: therefore it is necessary that the minister recognizes the quality of penitents in that they are penitents: but this cannot be known unless the sin is known: therefore it is necessary for the minister to recognize the sin: and this cannot be done except through confession: therefore confession must be made to a man.
2. Likewise, Satisfaction is not except after the power of the keys, as was previously held: but the keys operate in confession made to a man: therefore it is necessary that confession be made to a man.
3. Likewise, Penances are arbitrary, as the Saints and Doctors say: but penance can never be arbitrated unless the quantity of the offense is known through confession: therefore it is necessary for the penitent who wishes to do penance to make confession to a man.
4. Moreover, If confession were not required for the sake of man, then no confession would need to be made: for to him who knows all things, confession is not necessary: but God knows all things: therefore confession is not necessary to Him: if therefore confession is sought from the penitent, it is evident that this is done for the sake of man, and not for the sake of God.

However, there are many authorities on both sides of this disputation in the Text.

Response. It must be said that without doubt confession must be made to a man, and not to God alone, as the Master determines in the Text.

To THAT therefore which is first objected, it must be said that although in sin there is no guilt except for the sinner, nevertheless he alone does not suffice for deletion: for more things are required for reconciliation than for departure through sin: for the merit of Christ in the keys must be present, and also the intercession of the Church through its minister: for just as in the first sin one man alone sinned, and yet he alone could not repent for all nor even for himself unless the merit of Christ supported him, so also it is in the sins of others in that more things must concur for reconciliation.

To the other it must be said that that sin is not entirely deleted through another: because at least the sacrament of the Church must be received: and thus something is done there through the Church. And similarly it is necessary in actual sin that through the Church in its minister the merit of Christ, which is in ecclesiastical power in the keys, is joined to it.

To the other it must be said that it is already clear from the foregoing: because it does not follow that more things are required in amendment than were committed in fault. However, lest we be thought to avoid the argument, it can be said that in sin there is a certain harm to the sinner, namely that he is divided from the mystical body of Christ through sin, and from the head Christ: and thus God has ordained that he does not return except through the minister in vow and work, if he has the ability: and thus to what is in amendment, something corresponds in fault.

To the other it must be said that a benign earthly king uses a minister for three reasons, namely because of his own imperfection, and for the utility of the subjects, and for the beauty of order. Because of his own need, because he cannot be everywhere, nor judge all things by himself. For the utility of the subjects, however, in two ways, namely of the inferiors and superiors. Of the superiors: because he wishes that the superior be honored with this dignity, and serve him in this to perfect the inferior. Of the inferiors, however: because perhaps the inferior has more boldly access to some inferior than to the king himself. And for these last two reasons God has a vicar. And the first cause is of Augustine and Gregory speaking similarly concerning the Angels, whom God uses in perfecting men. The second, however, is of Master Hugh. For himself, however, he does not use a vicar: because he is everywhere, and able to judge all things by himself. The third cause is order: and this is of blessed Dionysius: because although God can perfect all things by himself, and illuminate, and consummate, nevertheless for the beauty of order it is the law of divinity to lead through the first to the middle, and through the middle to the last to purification, illumination, and perfection: and therefore in the ecclesiastical hierarchy grades are constituted as in the celestial.

To the other it must be said that the Philosopher understands concerning that which is in every way better, both on the part of the doer and on the part of him concerning whom he operates: and if God were thus, then God would operate by himself: but in the solution of the preceding argument it was shown that it is not so.

To the other it must be said that it is one thing concerning the judgment of conviction to condemnation, and another concerning the judgment of reconciliation of the thing to perfection, through purification and illumination: for in the first, nothing is required except that the judge knows the cause as to the substance of the judgment: and if it is made known to others, this is done so that the condemnation may seem more just: and such will be the judgment in the future, which God will make by himself. But the judgment of confession is the judgment of reconciliation and reduction: and therefore those things are required which were said above.

Articulus 33 — Whether This Saying Of The Master Is True, Saying, "Tears Wash Away The Sin Which It Is A Shame To Confess By Voice"

Whether this saying of the Master is true, saying, "Tears wash away sin, which is to confess with the voice of shame?"

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, GC, after the beginning: "Tears wash away sin, which is to confess with the voice of shame," etc.

For either this is understood, that someone confesses with shame: or thus, that it would be shame if he confessed. If in the first way: then there would be nothing that follows: "Repentance advises pardon and modesty," for modesty does not advise if it is necessary to undergo modesty by confessing. But if in the second way: then it will be against what the same Ambrose said: "I read Peter's tears, I do not read satisfaction."

1. Furthermore, what is it that he says: "What cannot be defended, can be washed away," for if it is absolved, then it seems that it comes to the knowledge of the absolver: and therefore it is not valid for the proposition.
2. Furthermore, it seems there is nothing in what he says: because if sin cannot be defended, in no judgment should the accused be absolved: therefore if the sinner is absolved, it can be defended: and thus he says nothing, "What cannot be defended, can be washed away."

Furthermore, it is further asked here, whether this opinion is heretical or can be sustained?

However, it seems that it can be sustained: because 1. Both here and also in the Decree it is recited only as an opinion, and not as an error: therefore it seems that the Church judges it as an opinion and not an error.

1. Likewise, this practice was not always in use, that a man would confess to a man: therefore it seems that it is not of morals that a man confesses to a man, because morals always hold: and it is also evident that it is not of things to be believed, since it is not an article of faith, nor even reduced to any article: therefore it is neither of things to be believed, nor of things necessary to be done: in all such things, however, the Masters say that we can opine for either side: therefore it is of things to be opined, and it is not to be judged heretical what they say.
2. Likewise, Augustine and Bernard distinguish things to be believed, understood, and opined, saying that what we believe, we owe to authority: what we understand, to reason: what we opine, to error or uncertainty of doubt: but in this question we do not have certain authority of the canon of the Bible, therefore it is not of things to be believed: nor do we have firm and stable reason, therefore it is not of things to be understood: therefore it remains that it is of things to be opined: but in such things the opposite speaker is not blamed: therefore this opinion is not to be condemned, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Whatever dissolves the ecclesiastical order and ecclesiastical power, that is heretical: this assertion dissolves: therefore it is heretical. The proof of the first is: because this is against the article, in the Second it is proved from this, "the holy Church and the communion of Saints," that he who denies the act, consequently denies the power: but the act of purification, illumination, and perfection is denied to proceed according to the order of ecclesiastical power in reducing inferiors: therefore the proposition is evident.

1. Further, what contradicts sacred Scripture is heretical: but that contradicts sacred Scripture: therefore it is pure heresy. The first is evident by itself: because we have no rule of believing except Scripture. The second is evident: because with the mystery of sacred Scripture, which in the Old Testament says that the leper does not return to the camp except by the judgment of the priest, this assertion contradicts, it is evident that it contradicts sacred Scripture: and thus the proposition is evidently proved.

Response. It must be said that the Letter is understood thus: "What is to confess with the voice of shame," that is, what someone confesses with shame.

To the objection, however, against, it must be said that the Letter not only implies that it does not read confession: but also expressly says that it does not read satisfaction: and yet natural law does not permit that he has satisfied if he has sinned: and thus it must also be understood concerning confession: although elsewhere we have noted two other solutions on this, which we do not repeat here, lest it become prolix.

To the other it must be said that the sin which cannot be defended is the sin manifested to the priest in the judgment of confession: because such is that judgment which absolves the accuser and condemns the defender of his sin.

To the objection, however, it must be said that it is true concerning the judgment of conviction and the judgment of condemnation, and not concerning the judgment reconciling the accused: and I well concede that it is not valid for the proposition for this assertion: because falsehood cannot have a good testimony of authority.

To what is further asked, it seems it must be said that heresy is twofold, namely open and implicit. Open heresy, which expressly preaches the contrary, either what precedes the article or follows it: as that God is not triune and one, is heresy against the article: that fornication is not a mortal sin, is heresy against the consequent article: that sacred Scripture speaks falsely, is heresy against the preceding article. Implicit heresy, however, is an assertion from which heresy follows, as is this: because although we are not now bound to confess to three or two bishops, if however it is commanded by the Church, then we are bound. Hence if I say it is not to be confessed to those bishops, from this it follows that the power and ordination of the keys is not to be obeyed: and therefore it is heresy. And I judge this assertion as such: because although sometimes a man would not confess to a man by narrating the sin orally, as now, yet by the precept of the Church he is bound to that.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that neither the Master here, nor...

§ 1. Gratian in the Decree recites this, not approving it, but rather condemning it, and manifests the error by disputing for the opposite side.

§ 2. To the other [objection], it must be said that from that reasoning it cannot be held that it concerns matters of opinion, but rather that it is not entirely a moral matter, but partly disciplinary: just as was established above through disputation, that it is substantially a moral matter, but its determination is disciplinary, and made by the Church: and this can be done all day long for the utility of men and of Ecclesiastical unity.

§ 3. To the other [objection], it must be said that although the authority of the canon is not about the whole determination, nevertheless the canon hints that this can be done, and is useful both in the Old and in the New Testament: for in the Old it commands one to diligently recognize the face of the flock; while in the New, in the canonical epistle of James, explicitly saying: Confess your sins to one another.

§ 4. But many things concerning the mode of that precept were noted above: and therefore it must be passed over here.

Expositio Textus

§ 5. Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, after the beginning: Reveal your way to the Lord. For from that authority of Chrysostom, it is held that we are not bound to confess except before God.

§ 6. Response. It must be said that sacramental confession is one thing, and the confession of supplication is another: it is necessary that sacramental confession be made to a man, and Chrysostom is not speaking of this. But the confession of supplication is when someone, humbling himself in prayer, accuses himself, so that he may thus be more easily heard: and this is done before God alone: and the Saint speaks of this: just as Daniel 9:20 also, where it is said that he confessed his sins and the sins of his parents in prayer, so that, being humbled, he might be more easily heard.

Articulus 34 — Whether One Acknowledging One's Sins Can Hold Anything Against One's Neighbor In One's Heart

Whether one who recognizes his sins can hold anything against his neighbor in his heart?

§ 7. Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, around the middle: If you have your sins in mind, etc. For this seems not to be necessary: for we see many recognize their own evils, who nevertheless do not forgive their neighbor, and who plan out many evils.

§ 8. Response. It must be said that it is understood concerning holding them in memory with perfect detestation: for he who perfectly detests the remembered sin, as a truly penitent person does, does not multiply his sin by plotting evil for his neighbor.

Articulus 35 — Whether Someone Can Confess To His Fellow-Servant

Whether anyone can confess to his fellow servant?

§ 9. Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, around the middle: I do not say that you should confess them, etc. For a fellow servant of a man is any man: therefore he ought to confess to no man: and thus all that was disputed above is false.

§ 10. Response. It must be said that emphasis can be placed on "fellow servant": because a fellow servant can be called one equal in condition and grade, and thus a priest is not a fellow servant: and then what is understood here is only the confession of a lay and common person, which is often made for the purpose of reproach: because laypeople, not having the discretion of the seal of confession, reproach the confessor for what they have heard.

§ 11. Or it can be said otherwise, because the emphasis is on what he says, So that he may reproach you: because although a priest is a fellow servant, one nevertheless ought not to confess as to a man, because thus he could reproach the one confessing, but one ought to confess as to God: because thus the priest is prohibited from reproach by the seal of confession: because he knows this as a secret of God, and not as a human narration.

Articulus 36 — Of What Sort Confession Ought To Be

What kind of confession ought there to be?

§ 12. Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, around the middle: Say it groaning and weeping, etc.

§ 13. Here a useful question must be posed: What kind of confession ought it to be? And the Masters say that sixteen [conditions] give it due quality, which are noted in these verses: Let the confession be simple, humble, pure, faithful, And frequent, naked, discrete, willing, shameful, Integral, secret, tearful, accelerated, Strong, and accusing, and thus ready to obey.

For these are the sixteen qualities which are assigned to confession by the Masters.

§ 14. 1. It is asked, however, in what way is it called simple? For it seems that it would be better if it were multiplex: because another of its conditions is that it be frequent.

§ 15. But if it is said that it is called simple with respect to the recounting of the sin. On the contrary: A sin ought not to be recounted simply, but rather a sin with its circumstances: therefore it seems that it ought not to be simple.

§ 16. But if you say that it is understood of the simplicity of the one confessing. On the contrary: To the Romans 16:19: I want you to be wise in what is good, and simple in what is evil. But confession is one of the best of those acts: therefore in it one ought not to be simple.

§ 17. 2. Then it is asked, in what way is a confession humble? For humility seems to be a quality not of confession, but rather of the one confessing. Moreover, it seems that every confession is humble: for every act humbling the agent is humble: but nothing humiliates the agent so much as confession: therefore it seems that every confession is humble.

§ 18. 3. Then it is asked concerning what he says, Pure. For this does not seem to differ from simplicity. For pure is that which has no alien thing mixed in, and similarly that is the same as simple: therefore it seems that these two in confession are one. But if you say that purity refers to the one confessing. On the contrary: Because according to this no impure person would confess, that is, one having mortal sin: and this was disproved above: therefore it seems that it ought not to be posited that it be pure.

§ 19. 4. Then it is asked concerning what he says, Faithful. For either it is understood of the faith of the one confessing, or of the confession. If in the first way: then it is not proper to confession, because nothing pleases God without faith. But if of the faith of the confession, as is commonly said: then for a confession to be faithful is the same as for it to be true: and this truth is presupposed in simplicity and purity: and therefore that member seems to be superfluous.

§ 20. 5. Furthermore it is asked concerning what he says, Frequent. For this is not necessary: because a confession well made once suffices. Also, every act frequently repeated becomes light, and is done with greater negligence by the agent, because study is not applied except to what is difficult: therefore a frequent confession becomes more negligent: but this is a bad quality: therefore frequency is not a good quality of confession.

§ 21. 6. It is also objected concerning what is said that it ought to be naked. Because this seems to differ in no way from simplicity, which was assigned above: therefore it ought not to be posited as a diverse quality.

§ 22. 7. It is also objected concerning what is said, Discrete. For if discretion is understood with respect to computing all things, then it is the same in reality, even if not in reason, to be discrete as to be integral: and thus one of them is superfluous. But if discrete is understood with respect to the one confessing, who ought to be discrete. On the contrary: Confession obliges both the discrete and the indiscrete equally: therefore it belongs to the discrete and indiscrete equally: therefore it ought not to be called discrete from the discretion of the one confessing.

§ 23. 8. Also concerning what he says, Willing. For it is impossible that something be both willing and bitter at the same time: but confession ought to be with bitterness, as is said, Isa. 38:15: I will recount all my years to you in the bitterness of my soul. Therefore it cannot be willing, as it seems.

§ 24. 9. But concerning what is said that it ought to be shameful [or modest], it seems false: because nothing drawing one away from confession is a good quality of the one confessing or of the confession: but shame, in itself, draws one away, unless someone masters it: therefore it is not a good quality of confession. Also, in nature whatever impedes a certain act in itself is not a good quality of the agent insofar as he is an agent: therefore it will be so in holy morals as well: but shame in itself draws one away from confession, as is clear to anyone: therefore, etc. Also, Blessed Gregory praises Mary Magdalene because she was not ashamed among the banqueters, saying in confession: Because she heavily shamed herself inwardly, she believed there was nothing outwardly to be ashamed of: therefore for others too, not to be ashamed is a praiseworthy quality. Also, a little earlier it was held in the Text: If I was ashamed to confess my sin before the people. Therefore if Job says, praising himself, that he was not ashamed, shamefulness cannot be a praiseworthy quality of confession.

§ 25. 10. Then it is objected concerning what he says, Integral. For this seems impossible: because Psalm 18:13 says: Who understands his offenses? Therefore no one confesses integrally. But if you say that what is remembered must be integrally confessed with its circumstances. On the contrary: It was held above that circumstances do not need to be confessed, unless they drag it into another genus: therefore this is not an essential quality of confession. But if you say that it is called integral because the whole must be confessed to one person. On the contrary: Let us posit that two [priests] enjoin two halves of true penance: but in any thing, two halves of the thing are equivalent to the whole: therefore those two halves suffice:

therefore confession can thus be halved: and moreover it seems better, because shame is greater before two or three than before one.

§ 26. 11. But it does not seem that it ought to be secret: because already earlier in the Text the confession which is made before the people was praised. Also, Magdalene confessed in deed at least, namely by weeping, before the people: and her confession is highly praised: therefore it seems that it ought not to be secret. Also, we already said earlier that it ought to be shameful: therefore a more shameful one is better: but one which is made before many is more shameful than a secret one.

§ 27. 12. Also, it does not seem that it should be tearful. For from a certain disputation held above, it is held that sometimes one who sorrows less weeps more: and one who sorrows more, [weeps] less or not at all: therefore since a confession made with greater sorrow is more praiseworthy, it seems that a non-tearful one is more praiseworthy. Also, Augustine said above that a penitent ought to rejoice in sorrow: but it seems impossible to simultaneously rejoice and weep for anguish: therefore it seems that confession ought not to be with tears, but rather with joy.

§ 28. 13. But it does not seem to be accelerated and discrete at the same time: because nothing that in its making requires great deliberation of discretion can be accelerated: but confession thus requires precognition and deliberation: therefore it cannot be accelerated. But if you say that it ought to be accelerated by reason of time, because it ought not to be delayed. On the contrary: The Church does not oblige, except that it be done once a year: therefore beyond this time one does not need to confess: therefore it does not need to be accelerated in this way. But concerning this there will be a special question below.

§ 29. 14. But it does not seem that a confession is in any way strong: because there is nothing difficult in recounting sins: but fortitude is only required in what is difficult: therefore it seems that fortitude is not a due quality for confession.

§ 30. 15. Confession is indeed accusing: but this seems to be presupposed in what is called shameful: because it is not shameful except from a divine accusation: therefore when it is posited to be shameful, that [other condition] seems to be superfluous.

§ 31. 16. But it seems that it need not be ready to obey: because even if it is not ready, it is still a confession, as was proved above. Also, he who confesses, and does not amend, nevertheless fulfills the mandate of the Church: therefore it is not necessary that it be always ready to obey. Also, some priests strive to enjoin what the penitent is not obliged to do: therefore in such a case it is not necessary that it be ready to obey.

§ 32. 17. Still, it seems that this number does not fit the words of St. Bernard on the Canticles: Let it by no means be judged of that which is neither voice nor sense: if nevertheless the confession has proceeded from a humble and faithful heart: therefore whatever bites the conscience, confess humbly, purely, and faithfully, and you have fulfilled these roles. From this it is gathered that there are only three qualities of confession: and thus the others seem to be superfluous.

§ 33. Response. To this it must be said that those conditions of confession are of a confession not of just any sort, but of one perfect according to a meritorious state: and therefore they do not apply to all confessions.

§ 34. But those conditions are drawn partly from the consideration of the one confessing, and partly from the consideration of the confession.

§ 35. For on the part of the one confessing, seven are taken, namely that it be humble, willing, tearful, accelerated, strong, discrete, and ready to obey: but all the others circumstantiate the act of confession. For confession in the one confessing is considered in four ways, namely insofar as it is an act of a sacrament, and insofar as it proceeds from the virtue of penance, and in order to the subsequent satisfaction, and insofar as it is a recounting of sins: and this is to consider it in its proper species. And in the first way indeed it is willing: because thus the will of the penitent assents to it, on the grounds that the sacrament purges sin, and he supremely desires to be purged. But if it is considered as an act elicited by the virtue of penance, thus it is with difficulty: and with respect to this it is required that the penitent be strong. But if it is considered in order to the subsequent satisfaction, thus it belongs to it that it be ready to obey. But if it is considered insofar as it is a recounting of sins, it is considered in two ways, namely in the genus of evil, and in species: and in genus in two ways, namely according as the sin committed is shameful, and thus it is shameful [modest]; and according as it is evil, and thus it is tearful. In species similarly in two ways, namely according to those things concerning which it is according to species and number, which are many, and thus it requires that it be discrete: and according as there is a precept concerning it, and thus it ought to be accelerated, because swiftness in fulfilling the precept is required lest transgression occupy [the time].

§ 36. But in the confession itself, all the others are [found] in this way. The act of confession has three things in itself, namely the object, the mode, and the act. But the object is the sin itself, which is in a shameful multitude, clothed with evil circumstances, having an attracting pleasurable adjunct. But if the object is considered as in a multitude, thus it seeks integrity lest it be divided: but if as clothed with aggravating circumstances, thus it seeks the accusation of oneself: but if it is considered by reason of the pleasurable adjunct, thus it ought to be secret, lest anyone be infected by hearing it, and be dragged by the force of pleasure to similar things. But if the act which is declarative of sin is taken, it is either compared to the speaker, or to the hearer: and to the speaker in two ways, namely insofar as it is meritorious, or insofar as it is merely fulfilling a precept. If in the first way: then it ought to be frequent. If in the second way: then it ought to be simple, that is, simply recounting the deed without any excuse, by which the one confessing intends to oblige the Church. But if it is compared to the hearer, the confession ought to be naked, so that the priest can openly understand the whole heart of the penitent and confessor. The proper mode of confession is twofold, namely that it be unmixed with the contrary act, which is sin, and thus it is called pure: and that it be true as it is spoken, and thus it is called faithful, that is, truthful.

§ 37. Therefore to the first, it must be said that the simplicity which is opposed to addition, is not opposed to the frequency of the same act, but rather to the interposition of fables and deeds which are not sins: just as many confess by reciting the whole history of their life, against whom it is said, Isa. 43:26: Tell if you have anything so that you may be justified: namely, tell your iniquities so that you may be justified: do not tell all the fables of your life. To the other [objection], it must be said that it is not opposed to the recounting of sins and circumstances, but only to that which has already been said.

§ 38. To the other [objection], the solution is clear by the same: because it is not denied by this that the one confessing ought to be very wise: because the wiser he is, the more simply he confesses without the interruption of other acts.

§ 39. To that which is objected concerning humility, it must be said that he ought to be humble: and we well concede that this belongs to the one confessing, but nevertheless because it belongs to him according as he is in the act of confession, therefore it is assigned to the confession as a quality.

§ 40. To the other, it must be said that every good confession is humble: but nevertheless not every confession is humble: for some confess their sins while boasting, of whom Isa. 3:9: They have proclaimed their sin like Sodom, and have not hidden it. And especially those sin against this condition who confess an ignominious sin, such as theft or something similar, with lowered head: but another which sounds of worldly vanity, such as a tournament, or victory in disputing, or audacity in fighting, they confess with raised head and a smiling mouth.

§ 41. To that which is objected concerning this, that it ought to be pure, it must be said that it is called pure because by confessing one does not multiply the impure: just like some who by the very act of confession multiply sin, by boasting, or by lying, or by despairing, or by presuming, or from some act of this sort.

But to the objection to the contrary, it must be said that from the aforesaid it is clear in what purity differs from simplicity: because purity denotes the non-admixture of sin, and simplicity excludes the admixture of a story, not of an existing sin.

§ 42. To the other, it must be said that it is well conceded that purity there does not mean immunity from sin on the part of the one confessing.

§ 43. But to this which is objected concerning the fourth, namely in what way it is faithful, the response is clear through the things said before: because it is faithful through the truth of what is said, according as conscience attests to what is said: and through this the solution to the first part of the objection is clear, because it is not understood of the faith of the one confessing.

§ 44. To the other, it must be said that a true confession is not always simple: because it is called true for the reason that the reality is as it is said: and sometimes many true things concerning the history of life are interposed, which take away its simplicity.

§ 45. To the other, it must be said that frequent confession is not necessary: nor are only the essential conditions of confession assigned, but also the conditions of confession according to its optimal state: and this is one of them: for the more frequently one confesses, the better, although it is not necessary: because shame always removes something of the punishment, and also the power of the keys, and the prayer of the confessor.

§ 46. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there are certain acts which nevertheless have an added gravity such that frequency never induces pleasure, although in some way it diminishes gravity: as is clear in the acts of fortitude: and what fortitude has by reason of gravity in sustaining, this confession has by reason of shame in manifesting oneself to diverse persons: and then just as it always remains a grave act, so negligence never creeps in, but it is always done with attention and sorrow: nevertheless I well concede that the shame is diminished: and this is supplied by the devotion of one frequently confounding himself before diverse persons.

§ 47. To that which is asked sixthly concerning what he says, that it should be naked: it must be said that from the definition it is clear in what it differs from simplicity: because naked sounds like open, not wrapped up in circumlocutions, so that it may be openly understood by the hearer: but simple means the privation of history not pertaining to the sin.

§ 48. To this which is objected concerning discretion, it must be said that it expresses the mode of the one confessing in the act of confession, according as the confession is of many things: because sins are diverse: for a discrete confessor ought to state a greater sin with greater detestation, and a lesser with lesser: and thus it is clear that it differs from integrity: because integrity dictates lest it be divided between two hearers, but discretion dictates that each thing be weighed with its due weight by itself: whence an integral confession can be indiscrete, and a discrete one can be not integral. Whence it is clear that these are separated from one another.

§ 49. To the other, it must be said that a confession can be willing and bitter, but not according to the same thing: for it is considered as a purging sacramental act, and thus it is willing and willed, done with great devotion: it is also considered according as it is rememorative of committed sins, and thus it is done with bitterness, yet done through the will, as we noted above in the preceding matters concerning voluntary sorrow.

§ 50. To that which is objected against the ninth, namely that it ought to be shameful, it must be said that this is one of the most praiseworthy conditions of confession, if it is moderate.

§ 51. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that shame is twofold: one namely before God concerning the shamefulness of the act, and the other before men. And the first is good and incites to confession so that what is shamefully shameful may be purged. The second is evil and drawing away: and from that proceed the first three objections. And concerning that which is before God, Bernard says: With what face do I now lift up my eyes to the face of so good a father, being so bad a son? It shames me to have done things unworthy of my birth, it shames me to have lived degenerate from such a father. And a little below: Unhappy and insane, I was not ashamed to prefer what is falling, vain, and almost nothing, and whose end is death, to the love and honor of the eternal Father? I am confounded, I am confounded to hear, If then I am a father, where is my honor? But even if he were not a father, he would overwhelm me with benefits. He institutes witnesses against me (to keep silent about innumerable others): the food of this body, and the use of this time, and above all the blood of the beloved Son crying out from the earth. I am ashamed of my ingratitude, although to the accumulation of my confusion I am even accused of having returned evil for good, and hatred for love. Blush and grieve nonetheless, my soul, since even if it befits him not to repeat and not to reproach, it entirely misbecomes us to have existed as ungrateful and unmindful.

§ 52. But to the last, it must be said that just as was clear above, where it was distinguished concerning that word, that one ought not to confess before the people for the sake of the proper act of confession, but for the sake of what follows, which is the example from the enjoined satisfaction: so that just as he sinned before the people, so he may show a good example, and shame from these may not draw him away, but rather the shame which is before God may incite him.

§ 53. To the tenth, which is objected concerning integrity, it must be said that integrity is opposed to division with respect to the hearer: and therefore the first argumentations do not do anything against it.

§ 54. But to the last, it must be said that the quantity of a sin, namely, is in the act, and in the root of the act: and although the quantity of the act becomes known in a divided confession, nevertheless the quantity of the root does not become known, because those many turns indicate a great habit, and a great root, and one difficult to dissolve, and this quantity the priest principally intends to cut out through the enjoined satisfaction: and that is why a halved confession is never sufficient, nor can it be: and also for the reason assigned above, because to neither does he appear as evil as he is, and this is to excuse oneself, and to tend to hypocrisy, and to always lack pardon, as was said in the preceding distinction.

§ 55. To that which is asked eleventh concerning secret confession, it must be said that it is good that it be secret because of scandal.

§ 56. To that which is objected first to the contrary, the solution is clear through what has been said.

§ 57. To that which is objected concerning Mary Magdalene, it must be said that she did not expose her sin in public, but showed herself in public as a sinner in genus: and this does not incite nor instigate those who do not know to sin: and nevertheless even this itself is not necessary, unless someone wishes it in great crimes.

§ 58. To the last, it must be said that it is understood concerning the shame which is discrete before God, lest it procure harm or scandal to anyone.

§ 59. To that which is objected twelfth, that it ought to be accelerated, it must be said that in the act there ought to be no swiftness, as the first objection proves: indeed, delay is required for the sake of deliberation, and the sobbing of penitents: but an accelerated [confession] removes the procrastination of penitents, lest they delay to be converted to the Lord, and lest they put it off from day to day, as is commanded, Ecclus. 5:8.

§ 60. But to the objection to the contrary, it must be said that although the Church has commanded a time, it nevertheless has not excluded counsel: because the sooner, the better:

whence it is secure to accelerate as much as one can: and as was said, here the conditions of confession are assigned according to its optimal state.

§ 61. To this which is objected thirteenth concerning tearfulness, it must be said that tearful is posited for groaning, as is said here in the Text: and as Blessed Gregory says in a certain homily concerning Mary Magdalene thus: Who while tearful groaned inwardly to him, is presently cured from the plague by which she had miserably languished. And Blessed Bernard on the Canticles: O whatever soul you are, let not that place seem vile or despicable to you, (namely before the feet of the Lord which are judgment and mercy) where the holy female sinner laid down her sins, and put on holiness. There the Ethiopian changed her skin, and restored to a new whiteness, already then she faithfully and truly answered the word to those reproaching her: I am black, but beautiful, O daughters of Jerusalem. Do you wonder by what art she could do this, or by what merits she obtained it? Receive it in a few words. She wept bitterly, and drawing long sighs from her inmost bowels, shaken inwardly by saving sobs, she vomited forth her bilious humors.

§ 62. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is called tearful more from the tears of reason and hope, than of the spirit and the body.

§ 63. To the other, it must be said that Augustine does not intend that that joy should exclude sorrow and tears: and the reason for this has been assigned very often above.

§ 64. To that which is objected concerning the fourteenth, that it be strong, it must be said just as was clear in the division, that to confess is among the most difficult of works. For just as Augustine says above in the Text, that he seems to purge perfectly who, mastering his shame, hides nothing of the things he has done from the messenger and vicar of God: and by reason of the difficulty which human confusion induces, fortitude is required in the one confessing: and this the Psalmist asked for, Psalm 68:16: Let not the pit urge its mouth over me: just as was clear above in the Text, where this is brought in by Augustine.

§ 65. To this which is objected fifteenth, namely concerning accusation, it must be said that shame is not presupposed there: because it is accusing when one does not pour back the fault from oneself onto another, as Adam did: and this the Psalmist asked for, Psalm 140:4, saying: Do not incline my heart to evil words, to make excuses in sins. But shame denotes a passive confusion before God, while accusing makes for oneself an active shame before the human priest: and therefore it is clear that one is not presupposed or left behind in the other.

§ 66. To that which is objected sixteenth, that it be ready to obey, it must be said that this condition belongs to a fruitful confession: and through this the solution to the first two is clear.

§ 67. To the last, it must be said that it is understood that one ought to be obedient concerning those things which are necessary for salvation: and concerning this a special question was had in the higher sections, namely, Whether counsels and works of supererogation can be enjoined?

§ 68. To that which is objected concerning the conditions of Bernard, it must be said that he does not assign any except the necessary and essential ones, in which sacramental confession differs from other recountings of sins. And humility indeed is its movement according to the consideration of its object which is humiliating, because it is sin. Purity is called here the exclusion of everything alien, both of history and also of sin cumulating sin through boasting, or something of this sort: and fidelity is truthfulness in what is said.

§ 69. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 37 — Whether Eternal Punishments Are Changed By Temporal Punishments

Whether eternal punishments are changed into temporal punishments?

§ 70. Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, before the end: By temporal punishments

§ 1. ...will change eternal punishments, etc.

§ 2. It seems this is false: 1. First, indeed, because we do not merit by a passion [i.e., by undergoing suffering passively]; but temporal punishments are certain passions; therefore we do not merit by them; therefore we do not change eternal fires by meriting via temporal punishments.

§ 3. 2. Furthermore, even positing that we do merit by punishments, it seems impossible to say: because no temporal thing can reach into eternity; but bodily punishments are temporal; therefore they cannot reach into eternal punishments; therefore they ought not to change them; therefore what he says in the Letter is false.

§ 4. 3. Likewise, Furthermore, the Doctors commonly teach that eternal punishment is conjoined to mortal guilt, and that once the guilt is dissolved, the punishment is dissolved: but mortal guilt is not dissolved by punishment, but by grace making one pleasing [sanctifying grace], which is infused into the contrite person; therefore the eternal punishment also; therefore the destroyer of eternal punishment is not bodily punishment.

§ 5. 4. Furthermore, everything that deletes and destroys something is more powerful than it; but, as the Letter says, temporal punishment deletes eternal punishment; therefore the former is more powerful; therefore a temporal thing is more powerful than an eternal thing of the same genus, which is impossible.

§ 6. Response. It must be said that temporal punishment deletes the eternal, as the Letter says: but this temporal punishment begins and is rooted primarily in the sorrow of contrition informed by grace at the first infusion of grace: because four things exist simultaneously in the justification of the ungodly, as was determined above.

§ 7. To the first, therefore, it must be said that according as punishment is merely a passion, we do not merit: because, as the Author of the Six Principles says, passion is the effect and undergoing of an action: and thus it is from another, and not from us. But every praiseworthy, remunerable, and meritorious work is from us. But one must consider punishment brought about and willed by us, of which sort is the punishment of penance: and according to this mode it is meritorious of eternal life and of the diminution of punishment.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the temporal, through the fact that it is temporal, cannot reach into eternity, but the temporal informed by a form having the power of eternity —such as is grace, which is a likeness of the divine goodness—and through this divine power, it has the power of deleting the eternal contrary to itself.

§ 9. And through this the solution to the last is also clear.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that sin, together with its punishment, is deleted by grace and sorrow: but sorrow immediately acts upon the punishment, and consequently upon the guilt, and grace conversely: and this has very often been said above in the disputation of this fourth book of the Sentences: and thus it must be said here, that grace alone deletes sin; and if anything else deletes sin, this is from the virtue of grace, namely because it is itself informed by grace.

Articulus 38 — Whether Someone Can Do Penance With Others Not Knowing, And Whether Someone Can Excommunicate Himself

Whether someone can do penance with others being ignorant [of it]? and, Whether someone can excommunicate himself?

§ 11. Then it is inquired concerning what he says there, at C, before the end: With others being ignorant, they voluntarily pass the sentence of excommunication upon themselves, etc.

§ 12. For he seems to say, or to suppose, two false things here.

§ 13. 1. One is that, with others being ignorant, someone can do penance, which is false, since it is necessary that at least a confessor know his sin.

§ 14. 2. The second is that he seems to suppose that someone can excommunicate himself: which again seems false: since excommunication belongs to the jurisdiction of a superior; but no one is superior to himself; therefore no one can excommunicate himself.

§ 15. 3. Thirdly, what he says seems incongruous: And to be separated from the altar at which they ministered, not in mind, but in office.

§ 1. For participation in the altar confers the maximum grace: therefore one needing grace will maximally seek participation in the altar; but no one so needs grace as a penitent sinner; therefore he maximally ought to conjoin himself to the altar, and thus he ought not to separate himself in mind from the altar.

§ 2. 4. Likewise, to no one returning is the way of returning forbidden: but there is no return from sin except through the sacraments; therefore the sacraments ought not to be forbidden, but the most powerful of the sacraments is participation in the altar; therefore that ought not to be forbidden; therefore he ought not to separate himself in mind from the altar: and thus what is said in the Letter seems to be nothing.

§ 3. Response. To the first it must be said that it is not said, With others being ignorant, on account of the exclusion of the confessor: but because no one knows in a human mode, but in the mode of God the confessor alone knows: and this is what was said above, that one condition of confession is that it be secret.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that excommunication is posited here for the likeness of the effect of excommunication, and not for excommunication itself: now a certain effect [of excommunication] is suspension from sacred places and from participation in the Eucharist: and this someone sometimes does of himself out of humility; and then it denotes that he strikes himself with excommunication.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that although the Eucharist is the most worthy sacrament, for the reason noted above in the treatise on the Eucharist, nevertheless it is not necessary, and therefore out of humility it is good sometimes to distance oneself from it: and multiple reasons for this were stated above.

§ 6. To the last it must be said that the way of returning is denied to no one: because the more compendious way is the humility of the penitent: and the Eucharist is not a necessary way, but it is expedient for taking up a suitable way.

Articulus 39 — Whether One Ought To Confess To The Priest Alone, Or A Confession Made To Any Man Avails

Whether one must confess only to a priest, or whether a confession made to any human being is valid?

§ 7. Then it is inquired concerning what he says there, at D: But that it behooves one to confess to priests, etc.

§ 8. For this is the principal question to be treated first, namely whether one must confess to a priest, or to any human being? Then, Whether it behooves one to confess to one's proper [i.e., parish] priest? Third, Whether there can be multiple proper [priests]? Fourth, If in some way there are multiple confessors, whether, with confession having been made to one, the confessed person is bound to confess also to another, if that one commands confession to be made to him? Fifth, Whether someone out of privilege can hear the confessions of those who are subjects of another? Sixth, Whether afterwards, when they have confessed to the privileged one, they are bound to confess also to their proper priest? Seventh and last, What follows regarding absolution from him who has the privilege?

§ 9. To the first of these one proceeds thus:

§ 10. It seems that a confession made to any human being is valid: because 1. James 5:16, upon that text: Confess your sins one to another, the Gloss says: Greater sins to greater men, and lesser to lesser: but lesser men are not priests; therefore it seems that some confession is valid which is not made to a priest.

§ 11. 2. Likewise, in confession two things are considered, namely the one confessing, and the one to whom confession is made: and it is established that on the part of the one confessing there is no impediment preventing confession from being made both to a priest and to a nonpriest . Moreover, it seems there is none on the part of him to whom it is made: because in him, besides what God operates, nothing is required except the counsel of making satisfaction; but this counsel is sometimes found even more so in a non-priest; therefore it seems that it can be made to a non-priest.

§ 1. 3. Likewise, Penance is a sacrament of necessity for the one who sins: but in sacraments of necessity, both the matter and the minister ought to be common, as is evident in baptism, where a common element is the matter, and the minister can be both a man and a woman, and even the proper father and mother of the child; therefore it seems that such a minister ought to be common in penance as well; therefore not a priest alone; therefore confession can be made to anyone.

§ 2. 4. Furthermore, if confession is made to a priest alone, either this is done on account of what God operates in confession, or this is done on account of what the human being operates. If on account of what God operates: either this is because God operates according as He is in all things essentially, presentially, and potentially; or according as He is in the rational creature through indwelling grace; or according as He is in the human Christ through union. If in the first mode: then He is equally in the good and the bad priest, and in the non-priest; therefore it seems that confession made to all of these is equal. If in the second mode: then He is only in good and holy men and women; therefore confession made to all of these is equally valid. If in the third mode: then confession made is not valid, unless it were made to the human Christ. If, however, it were done on account of what the human being operates there: but this is only on behalf of the intellect, or the affect; and according to the illumination of the intellect there is nothing but counsel, which is equally found in a priest and a non-priest; and according to goodness and charity in the affect, it is again equally found in a priest and a non-priest; therefore confession made to a priest and a non-priest is equally valid.

§ 3. 5. Furthermore, there was confession when there was no priest who truly had the sacerdotal character: but things that are divided in time do not essentially have a dependence upon one another; therefore it seems that confession does not essentially depend upon being made to a priest; therefore one can confess to anyone.

§ 4. 6. Furthermore, in James 5:16, no mention is made of a priest: but he seems to speak indifferently to all who are in the Church, saying: Confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another that you may be saved. Therefore it seems that it is not necessary for confession to be made to a priest.

§ 5. But to the contrary of this it is objected thus: 1. An act proceeds from some proper power of that act itself: to absolve in confession is an act; therefore it proceeds from its own proper power. Now it is established that this act is not in a human being by nature, because then a human being could absolve himself; therefore it is in a human being from some reception of a superior power, namely God's: but this power is not received except in the sacerdotal order; therefore no one can absolve except a priest: but absolution does not happen except in confession; therefore confession cannot be made except to a priest.

§ 6. 2. Furthermore, every act ordered to justification is in some way ordered to the justifier: but no one justifies except God; therefore it is necessary that it be ordered to God: but what is ordered to God is a vicar of God precisely as he is a vicar of God; therefore it seems that such an act always ought to be done to God, or to His vicar; but not to God in Himself; therefore to His vicar: but confession is such an act: because it is said in Isaiah 43:26 Declare if you have anything, that you may be justified. Therefore it seems that it ought to be made to a priest alone, who is the vicar of God.

§ 7. 3. Likewise, the Constitution says that confession ought to be made to one's proper priest; therefore it cannot be made to anyone.

§ 8. 4. Furthermore, in John 20:23, the Lord did not speak to all, but to the disciples who were already priests: Whose sins you shall forgive, etc.: therefore it seems that to others He did not give the power of absolving, except to priests.

§ 1. 5. Furthermore, in John 11:44 , when He raised Lazarus, He did not tell just anyone to unbind Lazarus, but only to the disciples who were priests; therefore, since only priests regarding the succession of office are in the place of the disciples, only priests have the power of absolving: but confession is not made except for the sake of absolution; therefore only priests have the power of hearing confessions.

§ 2. Solution. It must be said that only priests have the power of hearing confession: for the power of hearing confession is a power of office; and order, as Isidore says, is the name of a dignity and an office: therefore no one has the power except him who has the sacerdotal order, because no one has the power of binding and loosing the mystical body except he alone who receives the power of dispensing the true body, which is called communion, because the absolved communicate in it. Now these are none other than priests alone.

§ 3. To the first, therefore, it must be said that Bede in the Gloss on that passage speaks of the distinction of confession. For there is a twofold confession, namely general and private. General is that which is made at Prime and Compline concerning venial sins, without which this life is not led: and because we are not bound to confess those except in general, this can be made at any time to anyone: although it is better that it be made to a priest when one can be had. But private confession is that which is about mortal sins, and this cannot be made except to a priest, except in necessity, where the article of necessity does not exclude the sacrament out of contempt for religion: nevertheless, such a person can depart [this life] in the vow of confessing, and he is not bound to confess to another unless to one having the keys: and if he does so, that humility and shame diminish the punishment.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that on the part of the one to whom confession is made, something else is required than a confessor, namely the absolution of authority, which the Lord gave to the disciples, and not everyone has that: and this authority, through the power of the key, remits part of the punishment.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that penance is a sacrament of necessity: but there is a different necessity in an adult and in a little child: because any person can baptize a little child who cannot signify his defects, although not anyone can hear confessions.

§ 6. And if perhaps someone objects that if an old woman baptizes even an adult, he is baptized, and no one dares to rebaptize him: but it is not thus with confession. It must be said that this happens on account of several causes: one of which is the impression of a character, which baptism imprints, and not penance: and therefore it cannot be iterated.

§ 7. But there is another differing cause of necessity: because the cause of baptism is from another, and through a vitiated nature, namely through original [sin] which is contracted only once: and therefore only once does one die together in that Christ, and is buried in baptism: but in confession the necessity is more from the institution of the Church, and for personal sin: and therefore a determinate minister is given for it, unless one is excused in the article of necessity: and then, if he survives, he is bound to iterate the confession before a priest who has the keys.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that confession cannot be made to a non-priest for this reason, because it is made to him in whom God operates in a certain mode, in which He does not operate in another. For God is in a human being through grace in a twofold way, namely making pleasing [sanctifying] and freely given [charismatic]: and according as He is in a human being through grace making pleasing, the objection made holds; but according as He is in a human being through freely given grace, which is the office and power in the keys, the objection does not hold: because just as those graces differ, so too differ those divine operations which He operates through the human being: and this is what the Apostle says, 1 Cor 12:11 All these things one and the same Spirit works, dividing to each one as He wills.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that when a priest did not exist, confession was not sacramental, not only signifying, but also causing a diminution of the sin according to punishment: for in this mode the causation of the sacraments of the New Testament is understood. And through this it is not held that sacramental confession, such as it is made now, ought not to be made to a priest.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, as to the first, that the Apostle there intimates a distinction of a twofold confession, which is further explained in the Gloss of Bede on the same place.

Articulus 40 — Whether One Ought To Confess To One's Own Priest, And Whether A Confession Made To Any Priest Avails

Whether confession must be made to one's proper priest? and, Whether a confession made to any priest is valid?

§ 3. Secondly it is inquired, whether confession must be made to one's proper priest? or whether a confession made to any priest is valid?

§ 4. But it seems that to one's proper [priest], because: 1. Thus says Urban II: It has pleased us that it should henceforth be lawful for no priest to receive to penance anyone committed to another priest, without the consent of him to whom he first committed himself, unless through the ignorance of him to whom the penitent previously confessed. From this it is gathered that one must confess not to just anyone, but to one's proper priest.

§ 5. 2. Likewise, Extra in the Decretals, book V concerning penances and remissions, Innocent III says in the General Council: Let every faithful of either sex, after having reached the years of discretion, faithfully confess all his sins alone at least once a year to his proper priest, and strive to fulfill the penance enjoined upon him according to his strength, reverently receiving the sacrament of the Eucharist at least at Easter. From this the same is gathered as before.

§ 6. 3. Likewise, Jerome says, writing to Bishop Heliodorus: The cause of a monk is one thing, that of a cleric another. Clerics feed the sheep, I am fed: they live from the altar, for me the axe is laid as if to the root of a fruitless tree: if I do not bring a gift to the altar, it is not lawful for me to sit before the presbyter: if I sin, it is lawful for them to deliver me to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord. From this it is gathered that it is not lawful for monks to bestow care upon the flock: therefore no one ought to confess to them: and the reason is the same concerning other priests to whom one is not committed: therefore no one ought to confess except to his proper priest.

§ 7. 4. To the same point, Jerome writing to Villicus says thus: The Church has a senate, an assembly of presbyters, without whose counsel it is lawful for monks to do nothing: Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, lost the kingdom for this reason, because he refused to hear his presbyters. The Romans also had a senate, by whose counsel they did all things: and we have our senate, the assembly of presbyters. From this it is argued thus: It seems rather that it would be lawful for a monk, who knows in some way how to direct himself, to do something without the counsel of his priest, than for a layperson who cannot direct himself and does not know how: and it is not lawful for a monk: therefore neither for a layperson: therefore he cannot direct himself in confession without the counsel of his proper senator, who is his priest.

§ 8. 5. Furthermore, Pope Eugene says thus: It has pleased our common council that no monk for earthly gain should presume with most wicked daring to exit the monastery, nor to give penance, nor to receive a godchild from baptism. From this it is gathered that it is not lawful for just any priest to hear confessions: therefore it is not lawful to confess to just anyone: therefore it behooves one to confess to his proper one. To the same point there are many decrees which can be seen in the Decree.

§ 1. 6. Furthermore it is objected: As the subjects of a Bishop stand in relation to the Bishop in episcopal rights, so parishioners to their proper priest in parochial rights: but the subjects of a Bishop cannot have recourse to another except to their proper Bishop: therefore neither the subjects of a priest except to their proper priest.

§ 2. But that it is not lawful for the subjects of a Bishop to have recourse to another bishop is proved by many decrees, as is that of Pope Callixtus: Let no one usurp the boundaries of another, nor presume to judge or ordain or excommunicate another's parishioner: because such a judgment or ordination or excommunication or condemnation will neither be ratified, nor have any force: since no one will be held or condemned by the sentence of another judge than his own.

§ 3. Likewise, in the same place: Let no Primate, no Metropolitan, none of the rest of the Bishops enter another's city, or access a possession which does not pertain to him, and the parish of another Bishop over his disposition, unless called by him to whose right it is known to belong: so as to dispose or ordain or judge anything there, if he wishes to possess the honor of his grade: but if he presumes otherwise, he shall be condemned, and not only he, but also his cooperators and those consenting to him.

§ 4. In the same place, from the Council of Antioch: That no Bishop ought to dare to make a transit from one province to another, and ordain any persons in the Church, or promote them to the sacred ministry: nor let a Bishop be drawn there by others, unless perhaps requested by letters he departs, not only by the Metropolitan, but also by all the Bishops of his province who are with him.

§ 5. Likewise, from the same council: That a Bishop ought not to rush into an alien city, which is proved not to be subject to him, nor into a region which is known by no means to pertain to his care, to ordain anything.

§ 6. In the same place, from the Council of Constantinople: Let Bishops who are outside a diocese not approach Churches which are outside their boundaries, nor let them confound and mix Churches according to the established rules. Very many other things concerning the same matter are in Decree 9, quest. 2, which can be read there.

§ 7. BY REASON it is objected to the same point thus: 1. Anyone who is bound to render an account of something committed to him, ought to have the entirety of what is committed under his disposition: but a priest is bound to render an account of his subject: therefore, etc. The first premise is proved. If the opposite is granted, that he ought not to have the entirety under his disposition, it will be unjust to demand an account from him of that which he did not have under the disposition of full obedience. Thence thus: A subject existing entirely under the obedience and disposition of his proper priest cannot have recourse to another except by permission: but everyone is thus subject to a proper priest: therefore in confession he cannot recur to another except by permission of his priest.

§ 8. 2. Furthermore. The Church Militant descends from the Triumphant, and orders from orders: as is said in Apocalypse 21:2 I saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, descending from heaven from God. But in the Triumphant, each subject has recourse and reduction to his proper superior, and not to another. Therefore it also ought to be thus in the Church Militant: therefore it is necessary that everyone in the reception of penance have recourse to his proper priest.

§ 9. 3. Furthermore, in 3 Kings 10:4 and 5 [604], the queen of Sheba marveled at the order of those ministering to Solomon, so that there was no more spirit in her: but it is established that it is no order for anyone to have recourse in sacraments to just anyone: therefore it is necessary that recourse be to one proper [superior]: but that is the proper priest: therefore in confession recourse is to be had only to the proper priest.

§ 1. 4. Furthermore, Dionysius writing to the monk Demophilus says that the correction of laymen pertains to proper priests, of priests however to Bishops, and of Bishops to the Hierarch: but to whom the correction of a crime pertains, to him also pertains the cognition of the same crime: therefore the proper priest has to cognize the sin of each subject, and not another: but it cannot be cognized except through confession: therefore in confession he ought to recur not to another, but to his proper priest.

§ 2. 5. Furthermore, whatever things in the logical predicables of reasons are reduced to one absolute first, are first reduced to their proper immediate proximate, and not to another: as individuals into species, species into a subaltern genus, and subalterns into the most general: therefore reason reduces things thus, and a similar reduction happens in the Militant Church into the grades of rulers, and it is necessary that the inferior multitude of people be reduced into the proximate grade of spiritual power, and through that into the superior, and finally into the supreme: but it is established that the proximate superior over the people is the proper priest: therefore in all sacraments to be received the people will not have recourse except to him: therefore not to another.

§ 3. 6. Furthermore, we see this in the natures of things which proceed from their causes. For if metallic things are reduced (as the Philosopher says) into their first material cause, they have to be reduced into quicksilver and sulfur, and quicksilver into subtle aqueous and subtle earthy strongly commingled, and this further into water. And it is the same in efficient, formal, and final causes. Since therefore the regiment of men has proceeded from nature, as Tullius says, such ought to be also the reduction of the regiment into proximate grades: therefore the people will not have recourse to another than to their proper priest.

§ 4. 7. Furthermore, that is held in offices. For as the Philosopher says in Book I of the Ethics: Whichever acts and doctrines fall under some one power, in the way that the making of bridles and whatever other equestrian instruments fall under horsemanship: but in this mode also every military operation falls under the military art. And according to the same mode utique others under others. Therefore, by similarity, this also ought to be the case in the order of the faithful among the ministers of the Church: therefore it seems that the people ought not to have recourse except to their proper priest.

§ 5. 8. Likewise, Dionysius says: The law of the divinity is to reduce the lowest through the middle, and the middle through the firsts. Since therefore the grades of reduction are determined, there will be no reduction of the lowest except through their proper superior grade: but the proper priest is in that grade: therefore the proper subject cannot be reduced into the divine in confession except through his proper priest.

§ 6. 9. Furthermore, the order of the universe is that inferior things be reduced into their proper superior movers, as the Philosophers say: just as the moisture of water into the orb of the Moon, and complexional moisture into the orb of Venus, and so of others: and this further into the starry orb of the signs, and this into the non-starry orb, and through this all things into the prime mover: therefore it is necessary, since the reduction of men into the divine does not contradict the natural order, that in this way the inferior populace be reduced into the proximate grades of superiority, and through them finally into one highest grade: now in the proximate grade over the people there are none but priests distinct in their proper parishes: therefore it is necessary that subjects have recourse in divine matters only to these, and not to others.

§ 7. But against this it is objected thus: 1. First through authorities: John 20:22 and 23 [605], the Lord says thus: Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them. And He does not distinguish or order among them: therefore it seems that without distinction anyone having the power of a disciple from the received order can remit sins in confession: therefore confession can also be made to him without distinction.

§ 1. 2. Likewise, Ambrose says: We commend that learned and upright monks dedicated in the honor of a presbyter ought to preach, baptize, give penance, relax debts for the miserable, and enjoy a just portion of the tithes, first-fruits, and oblations of the living and the dead by a moderate dispensation. From this it is gathered that monk presbyters can give penances: therefore a confession made to them is valid: but monks are not proper priests, as is evident from the authorities of Jerome introduced earlier: therefore confession does not always have to be made to one's proper priest.

§ 2. 3. Likewise, Gregory: By the governance of the Apostolic see (or authority) we decree that monks, if they are dedicated in the honor of a presbyter, with the power of binding and loosing, may commendably vindicate for themselves no less than the rest of the priests a portion of the tithes, first-fruits, oblations, and donations which are made for the living and for the deceased, according to the canon for the utility of themselves and their neighbors, by the merit of a more perfect justice. From this the same is gathered as before.

§ 3. 4. Likewise, Gregory: By apostolic governance and the office of piety it has been constituted by us: It is lawful for monk priests holding the figure of the Apostles to preach, baptize, give communion, pray for sinners, impose penance, and loose sins. From this again the same is gathered as before.

§ 4. 5. Likewise, Pope Boniface: Yet there are some, supported by no dogma, inflamed most audaciously indeed with a zeal more of bitterness than of dilection, asserting that monks who are dead to the world and live to God are unworthy of the power of the sacerdotal office, and cannot bestow penance or christianity, nor absolve by the power of the sacerdotal office divinely enjoined upon them: but they completely lapse: for the blessed Benedict, the bountiful preceptor of monks, was by no means an interdictor of this thing. From this again the same is gathered as before.

§ 5. Many other things acting to the same point may be sought in the text 16, quest. 1.

§ 6. BY REASON it is objected thus: 1. In whomever there is complete power for some act, in him is the execution and exercise of that act whenever he wishes: but in every priest there is complete power for the act of absolving in the forum of penance: therefore he can exercise that act whenever he wishes: therefore he can exercise it in anyone: therefore anyone can make confession to him, because he obtains full absolution. The first premise is self-evident, and by induction if it is denied. The second is evident through this, that there is no grade of spiritual power above the priesthood: therefore a priest is of the most complete power.

§ 7. 2. Likewise, the confection of the true body and the absolution of the communicant in the sacrament are conjoined acts in the priesthood: but it is established that the confection is more perfect than the absolution: but I see that any priest indifferently can confect: therefore much more can anyone absolve anyone: therefore anyone can make confession to him, because confession precedes absolution.

§ 8. 3. Furthermore, the spiritual grace of the sacrament always effects what is signified in the sacrament: but I see that in the ordination of every priest the power of binding and loosing is signified through the collation of the long stole: therefore that power is given to every priest: therefore whoever wishes can advance to another without dispensation of his proper or non-proper [priest]: therefore anyone can make confession to the same.

§ 9. 4. Furthermore, the benefits of God are generous and in many ways occurring to all men: therefore they are not to be restricted in any way: but it is evident that they are restricted if it is said to be done by one and proper, what could be done by anyone having order: therefore it is not to be said that a penitent cannot be absolved except by his own priest.

1. Further, spiritual powers are no less than corporeal ones: but in corporeal powers I see that a body having power acts on anything approaching it, as is evident in fire, which burns anything combustible approaching it: therefore much more strongly this is in spiritual power: therefore it seems that any priest can absolve anyone coming to him.
2. Further, any lock of the same kind is opened and closed by a key of the same shape: but sin is like a lock closing heaven, and of one kind, because it closes not insofar as it is a conversion to a changeable good, but as it is an aversion from the unchangeable, as Augustine wills.
3. Likewise, the power of order in every priest is of one species: therefore like a key of one shape: therefore it seems that any power of any priest can open and close the sins of any sinner confessing to him: therefore a proper priest is not required for this, as it seems.
4. Further, whatever is luminous dispels material darkness, and a determined and proper luminous thing is not required for the dispelling of these or those darknesses: since therefore spiritual light is more powerful than corporeal, any spiritual light removes any spiritual darkness: this power is like light, because a priest is an illuminator and perfecter and purifier, as Dionysius says: therefore any power of order dispels any spiritual darkness: but sin is spiritual darkness, as Damascene says: therefore any priest having order can absolve anyone: therefore any sinner can confess to any priest, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that the first part of this disputation contains truth - but the second part induced to the contrary has falsehood in its conclusions: for only a proper priest can absolve, and one can only confess to one's own priest.

To the first authority therefore which is first objected from the Gospel, it must be said that the Lord presupposed the order in the disciples which he had made before, namely that Peter was over all, and over all others. For in Matthew, X, 4 and following, he chose twelve and under them designated another seventy-two. He set Peter over all, Matthew xvi, 19, where he said; I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And, Luke x1, 32, where he said: And you, when you have turned, strengthen your brothers. Therefore this order of jurisdiction was instituted by the Lord before, he set him over it so that according to it he might confer the execution of the office which he gave, when he breathed on them, and said: Receive the Holy Spirit, etc.

604. 3 Kings 10:4–5 (1 Kings 10:4–5 in modern Bibles).

To all the decrees of the Fathers brought forward, there is one solution, namely that one is a presbyter, and another having the honor of a presbyter according to the canons of the Fathers. For a presbyter is one who has order, not the honor of priesthood or presbyterate. But he has the honor of priesthood or presbyterate who, elected by the people or by others whose concern it is to elect him, and confirmed by a superior, is established in the jurisdiction of a parish priest. And concerning this, namely who has the honor of priesthood, the canons speak, and not of the first, decreeing that a monk and anyone else of good life and learned can be elected and confirmed in the promotion of such honor: and then through such jurisdiction he becomes a proper priest: and therefore the canons say nothing contrary.

To what is first objected by reason, it must be said that the first is true, and the middle false: because there are two things that complete the power of absolving, namely order, and jurisdiction. And a priest from order has only one of those, and lacks jurisdiction, unless it is committed to him: and this is what is said, that although a priest has wings, yet he has them bound, and cannot fly, unless they are loosened by jurisdiction.

To another it must be said that according to something those acts are coordinated like major and minor, and according to something not. For if the object or matter around which they operate is considered, there is no doubt that the act of consecration and confession is greater than the act of absolution: and in this way the objection proceeds. But if jurisdiction is considered, which is rather of office than of order, because order is an imperfect disposition for this, and the office enjoined is formal: then the act of absolving is greater than confessing: and in this way it is not always necessary that he who can do one, can do the other, because a priest has from order complete power in one, but does not have complete power in the other.

To another it must be said that the visible form in the sacrament does not lie, but effects what it signifies: but it does not signify jurisdiction, but only the disposition to that power accepted from order: and therefore although a priest in order receives a certain power, yet he does not receive jurisdiction: and therefore he does not have all that is required: and therefore he cannot absolve and bind.

To another it must be said that the benefits of God are never in their ministers without order: for the best or one of the best is order. And this is signified in Psalm cxxxii, 2, where the ointment descends on the head, and from the head to the beard, and from the beard to the garment, and from the garments to the hem of the garment.

To what is objected, that it is restricted, it must be said that it is not: because what is done by the proper does not diminish the abundance of grace: because it flows as abundantly through the proper as through all together: just as the benefits of an earthly king would not be said to be restricted, if all were given rather through one than through many.

To another it must be said that it is not similar concerning corporeal and spiritual powers: because corporeal things act by necessity of nature, and such things suffer by the same necessity, and this necessity is of impotence and ignobility: but spiritual things, although they are more powerful, are free and have greater order: and therefore they do not approach those in which they act, except according to order and freedom: yet they act more powerfully than corporeal things, because they consume the contrary, namely sin, in whole, and do not destroy nature: which corporeal things do not do, and the more powerful they are, the freer and more ordered they are: because order is part of power.

To another it must be said that the similar brought forward is not well adapted in every respect, and therefore the objection does not proceed: for a key applied by itself to a lock neither closes nor opens: because it does not have the motion by which it moves the lock, but moved in the hand it opens. And it is evident that the motion of the hand is not the same in closing and opening in different cases: and jurisdiction in the ordained is like the motive force of the key, and that is not one in one priest and in another, but differs by distinctions of the people: and therefore he who solves this, does not for this reason solve that.

If it is objected, however, that this jurisdiction is only of one species: it must be said that the species of jurisdiction is the species of office, and it does not act unless joined to matter: and therefore it is inseparable from its matter around which it is: and therefore invisible dignity suffices there for this, that he who can do one, cannot for this reason do another: just as we see in human offices, that he who is a cupbearer in one court, is not for this reason a cupbearer in another court: because such things are committed over determined matter, from which it is not permitted to separate them, because the species of such things is always conceived with its proper matter: as Aristotle said the species of natural things is related to material and divine things.

To the last it must be said that order is not similar to any light, but to light mixed with the nature of a luminous body: for as the Mathematicians say, the light of Jupiter or Saturn reaches many, to whom the utility of the star does not reach, because it is not viewed by the illuminating star at the same angle: and under the angle is the diffusion of utility and harm. And so order is in itself as a certain indistinct light, but in jurisdiction it is like mixed light, and then its utility is determined to those specifically regarding it, from jurisdiction. And therefore although others can be edified by example or doctrine, yet the utility of absolution, or even the harm of excommunication, or of any such thing, is not diffused into them.

Articulus 41 — Whether Several Can Be One's Proper Priests

Whether there can be several proper priests?

Thirdly, I ask, whether there can be several proper priests?

And it seems that there cannot be, and this 1. From the reason of the proper: because the proper is that which belongs to one alone: therefore there cannot be several proper ones.

1. Further, in no multitude is there a reduction to two equally immediate: therefore neither should the multitude of people be reduced thus: therefore it seems that there are not several equally proper priests.
2. Likewise, in no kind of degrees are there two equally high. For the centurion is under the chiliarch, and the quinquagenary under the centurion, and under this the decanus, and under him there are ten who have regard to him and not to another, because two decani are not constituted over the same ten: therefore it seems that those who are under the same priest do not have regard to different ones as to their proper priests.
3. Further, in the order of the universe we see that a multitude which is ordered to one as a motive is not ordered to another in the same order: just as generation and corruption to the motion of the stars in the oblique circle, and this motion to the divine in the straight circle: and thus it ascends to the first mover: therefore it seems that it should also be so in the degrees of the Church: therefore there are not several proper ones to whom one multitude has regard.
4. Further, in the orders of the army we see that those looking to one assigned to them as their proper leader do not look to another: therefore since the Church is as an army set in array, as it is said in Canticles vi, 3, it seems that those ordered under one priest do not have to look to another proper one, except to him.
5. Further, confusion seems to be induced if there are several proper ones: for they do not necessarily agree in precepts: therefore then the people are bound to obey two commanding contrary things, which is against the Gospel, because the Lord says, Matthew vi, 24: No one can serve two masters. And the Gloss there says: to those commanding contrary things.
6. Further, the people relate to the priest as the priest to the Bishop, and the Bishop to the Archbishop, and he to the Primate, that is, the Pope: but never is one priest under two Bishops, nor a Bishop under two Archbishops, and so of others: therefore never is the same multitude of people under two proper priests: therefore there cannot be several proper ones.

On the contrary, it is objected thus: 1. To whomever a proper priest is appointed, another can be constituted by the same Bishop: but by the same Bishop over the same people several can be constituted: therefore there can be several proper priests. The proof of the first is that priests do not have jurisdiction except conferred on them by a superior Bishop, and he who confers on one can confer on another.

1. Likewise, we see this all day, that one hears confession by parochial right, and another by the authority of the Bishop, and a third by the authority of the Legate, and a fourth perhaps in the place of the Pope, and thus many perform the office of a proper priest: therefore it seems that many can be proper priests or vice-proper.

2. Further, it seems that it should be so according to reason. For the Church ought to have more aids than the devil has impediments for himself: but, as the Glosses of the Saints say, many demons strive to weaken one man: therefore many more perfect in holiness ought to be: but priests are more perfect in holiness, as blessed Dionysius says: therefore several priests ought to be ordained for the same man: therefore much more will there be several immediate priests in the same people.

3. Likewise, just as the triumphant Church perfects the militant, so the ministers of the militant Church ought to perfect holiness as much as they can: but many guardian Angels are ordained for the same man: therefore also many proper priests. The first is proved by this that the militant, as much as it can, imitates the triumphant. The second, however, by what is held in IV Kings vi, 14 and following, where the whole mountain was full of horses and fiery chariots around Elisha: of which he said to the boy: Do not fear: for more are with us than with them. Similarly, it is held by that in I Maccabees x, 29 and 30, where namely five men appeared around Maccabeus, of whom two holding Maccabeus in the middle, surrounded him with their arms and kept him safe: but against his adversaries they threw darts and lightning, from which, confused by blindness and filled with disturbance, they fell.

4. Further, in the triumphant Church there is not placed only one perfecter and illuminator and purifier of the inferiors: but anyone superior of his own order or of a superior can do this, as the Doctors say: since therefore the militant Church descends from the triumphant, it seems that in the militant Church there ought to be several perfecters and illuminators of one: therefore there will be several proper priests, since this is the office of a proper priest.

Solution. There cannot be several proper ones, but one alone is proper: however, others can cooperate with one proper, as will now be clear in the solution of the arguments.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the Bishop cannot by the power of law constitute several proper ones: because thus one Church would have many who have equal right in it, and one would be equally bound to two, from which perplexity could arise: but the Bishop can give assistants to the proper priest: and this in three ways, as it seems to me, namely in grave cases, in which, so that they may be more abhorred, the Bishop reserves to himself the power of absolving, and he can commit that to one or several who absolve those coming to them, and in this they bear the burden of the proper priest: because in those cases the penitent is bound to obey those having the place of the Bishop more than the proper priest, if they are found to be contrary.

In another way also he can give some, who by preaching and giving example, generally move the people, and hear those whom they have moved in preaching: but nevertheless they do not exempt their subjects from obedience to the priest, and therefore in penance already constituted by them they ought to make it known to the proper priest, and through his approval perform that penance.

In the third way, when the people are many, and one cannot hear all, or even the priest is weak and unable to hear: then indeed again some can be constituted by the superior who hear and absolve, and they are not bound to recur to another priest: yet all those are rather assistants of the proper prelates than proper prelates. And therefore if the proper prelates reasonably command something, they cannot contradict: and therefore they are not prelates, but as it is said, assistants.

To the other it must be said, that those who hear by the authority of superior prelates, hear as assistants, and not as proper priests.

To the other it must be said, that according to reason it cannot be that there are several proper ones: nor does a man have a proper demon for exercise except one, and all others come as assistants. And yet if he had several demons as exercisers, it would not follow from this that he ought to have several proper priests: because he would have another remedy against this, namely several Angels helping.

To the other it must be said, that when individual guardians are ordained, one is the guardian, and others are either his prelates or assistants: and those who appeared around Elisha were assistants: but prelates, who were around Maccabeus: for Maccabeus was the prince of the Jewish people, and therefore the Angel was the prince with him: Maccabeus also was a singular man, and thus he had a guardian: and those two were bound to surround him. But it was the power of the Potestates to ward off the enemy's strength in the opposing army, and of the Virtues to meet with miracles of blinding, and of the Archangels to reveal the machinations of the adversaries, and those are signified by the other three who were around him: and therefore nothing contrary is proved by that.

To the other it must be said, that according to blessed Dionysius this is false: because no two Angels in heaven according to him are of the same height: and therefore one does not have two equally principal above him.

But yet otherwise some of the Doctors, not supported by any authority, say that many are equal in the supreme, middle, or lowest hierarchy, or even in one order: then it must be said that it is not similar concerning the orders of confirmed Angels and the orders of men: because in the orders of Angels perplexity and confusion cannot arise from those commanding contrary things, but the concord of illuminations is from the first front of light descending: but the commands which proceed from men are frequently mixed with diverse opinions: and therefore confusion and perplexity would be induced from several, which cannot happen in heaven, where all things are reduced to concord by the light of God: and this is what Job says, xxv, 2 and 3: Who makes peace in his high places, Is there any number of his armies? and upon whom does not his light arise?

Articulus 42 — Whether, Supposing That One Proper Priest Has Several Coadjutors, After Confession Has Been Made To One, The Penitent Is Bound To Confess To Another If He Commands

Whether, assuming that one proper priest has several coadjutors, having made confession to one, the confessed is bound to confess to another if he commands?

Fourthly, it is asked, if it is so that one proper priest can have coadjutors, whether, having made confession to one, the confessed is also bound to confess to another if he commands?

It seems, however, that he is:

1. By that which is defined by Innocent II in the general council:

If anyone wishes to confess his sins to another priest for a just cause, let him first ask and obtain permission from his own priest, since otherwise he cannot absolve or bind him. For, by giving permission to confess to another, he does not exempt him from his obedience: therefore he is still bound to obey, as before: but before he was bound to confess to him once a year: therefore also afterwards if he commands him, he is bound to make confession.

1. Likewise, Suppose that the Bishop sends a coadjutor or even the Pope: it is clear that by this they do not intend to remove subjects from the care or obedience of their own priest. Therefore, since by obedience he is bound to show himself to him in confession, it seems that if he has confessed a thousand times to others, he is still bound to confess to him if he commands.
2. Further, He who is the proper priest is bound to administer the sacraments to him: but absolution precedes the administration of the sacraments: therefore he is bound to know that he is absolved: and this he cannot know unless he hears him, and first sees the signs of penance: therefore, since this is not done in confession, he is bound to confess to him if he commands.
3. Further, It seems that danger would arise if he were not bound: because many under the pretext of hiding could say they have confessed, and remaining unconfessed, communicate: and then the proper priest could not restrain them: therefore it seems, since that which is instituted for charity should not militate against charity, as Bernard says: and coadjutors are introduced for charity, that because of these a man is not absolved from the necessity of confessing to his own priest if he commands.
4. Further, In the orders of Angels, although one Angel is sometimes illuminated by another of a different order, as is clear from the exposition of blessed Dionysius on Isaiah, vi, 6, where it is said: One of the Seraphim flew to me: where the holy Father says, that is, another of the lower ones in the place of the Seraphim, and thus illuminated by the Seraphim. Although, I say, it is so, yet he is not exempted from the illumination of his own superior, but still, as before, he receives illuminations also from him: therefore, since the militant Church descends from the triumphant, it seems that although one man confesses to another, and is absolved by another coadjutor of his own priest, yet he is not thereby absolved from his own priest, but is bound to confess to him if he wishes.

On the contrary, however, it is objected:

1. Let us suppose that the proper priest does not know how to discern between leprosy and non-leprosy: therefore, since the Lord says, Luke vi, 39: Can the blind lead the blind? Will they not both fall into the pit? it seems that he is not bound to confess to him even if he commands.

If perhaps you say that he ought to ask and obtain permission. On the contrary: Let us suppose that he asks and cannot obtain it, as often happens: either then he will obey his own priest, or not: if he obeys, he will be in danger and peril, because he is blind: if he does not obey, the proposition is held.

If perhaps you say that he can ask permission from a superior, it may be that he lives far away, and cannot approach him either because of the expense of the journey or danger: it may also be that he does not wish to give permission, nor can a man always in such a case approach the court: therefore it seems that he is not always bound to obey his own priest in making confession.

1. Further, Let us suppose that the proper priest is malicious, as many are, and strives in confession to tempt concerning consent to sin, as many priests do, threatening women with betrayal of confession unless they consent to them, and intending to touch them impudently in the secrecy of confession, even superiors, namely Archbishops and Bishops, do likewise, as I most certainly know that in many places many do: it seems that in such cases to ask for permission is dangerous, because they will deny it, and then they sin more: therefore it seems that in such a case he ought not to obey his own prelate concerning making confession.
2. Further, Let us suppose that the priest is a hidden heretic, and strives in confession to draw to heresy: therefore, since this is especially to be avoided, it seems that in such a case even out of contempt for his own priest, he can confess to another, and is not bound to his own.
3. Further, Let us suppose that someone who is a parishioner of one sins in the parish of another: it is clear that the priest is indeed a spiritual judge: but by reason of the offense he becomes of the jurisdiction of another judge, who otherwise would not be of his jurisdiction: therefore he also becomes in such a case of the jurisdiction of another priest: but he who is of the jurisdiction and has sinned, is bound to the judge for amendment: therefore he also. But amendment is through confession and enjoined penance: therefore it seems that he is bound to confess to him even if his own priest objects.
4. Further, Let us suppose that he has changed his domicile and lives in the parish of another: it seems that then he is not bound to confess to his own priest: because he receives the sacraments in the Church of him in whose parish he lives: but he is bound to know him through confession: therefore he is bound to confess to him, and not to his own priest, as it seems.

5. Further, Let us suppose that he is a wanderer through lands: for he is removed by a great distance of place from his own priest in whose parish he was born: therefore, since no difficulty of salvation should be generated for anyone in the sacraments of necessity, it seems that he can confess to any priest, and is not bound to another however much he commands the contrary.
6. Further, Let us suppose that he is sick in the article of necessity: since salvation is denied to no one, it seems that he can confess without the permission of his own priest to the nearest one he finds: therefore he is not bound to confess to his own, as it seems.
7. More generally, it is objected about this thus: If the sacrament of baptism is given by another than one's own priest, even against the obedience of one's own priest, it is not repeated when returning to the obedience of his own priest: therefore it seems that penance should not be repeated.
8. Likewise, It is said below that no sacrament is repeated upon the same matter: therefore concerning the same sin confession should not be made twice: but it has once been made to a coadjutor or another by the permission of one's own: therefore it should not be repeated: therefore if his own commands him to confess, it seems that the confessed is not bound to obey unless he wishes.
9. Likewise, Confession, as was held above from the words of Augustine, is the greatest penance because of the shame it has attached: but, as it is said, Nahum 1, 9: Affliction shall not rise up the second time: therefore it seems that concerning the same sin even if the proper priest commands, it is not necessary to make confession twice.
10. Further, If a Bishop gives permission to a cleric to be ordained by another: and he, being ordained, returns to him, he cannot command him to also receive ordination from himself: therefore similarly, if a priest gives permission to confess to another, when he returns, he cannot require him to also confess to himself.

Further, By giving permission he uses the power he has once a year: therefore since he is not bound to confess to him except once a year, and his priest has already used his power which he had in him, it seems that he cannot compel him to confess again.

Further, it is asked concerning superior prelates, such as priests, Archdeacons, Bishops, and the like, who are their proper priests?

It seems that none: because

1. In no nature is there a motion of motion, or a rest of rest: therefore neither is there a priest of a priest: therefore they are bound to confess to none. Likewise, there is a different grade of superior and inferior, and they are not to be mixed: therefore nature in spirituals, being superior, does not descend under the inferior: therefore by this at least the Pope will not have any confessor, which is false.

2. Further, Superior Angels never descend for the reception of sanctity under inferiors: therefore, since the militant Church descends from the triumphant, neither should this be done in the militant, as it seems.

Response. It must be said without prejudice, it seems, that if someone confesses to another by the permission of his priest, that year unless he incurs the danger of illness, and has something new to confess, he is not bound to confess to his own priest: but if he confesses to another coadjutor appointed to that priest by a superior, and not by the permission of the priest, he is bound to also confess to his own priest: nor should he impose penance on him except by indicating to him that as soon as he can, he should present himself to his own priest, except in the cases which are five, as will be said below.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that although he does not exempt him from his power by giving permission, yet by giving permission he is deprived of his jurisdiction for that year. It would be otherwise if another gave permission, namely the prelate of the priest: because he would neither intend to impede the jurisdiction of the priest, nor to exempt the subject from the power of the priest.

And by this the solution to the following is clear.

To the other it must be said that the proper priest administers the sacraments, and in such a case when he gives permission for a reasonable cause, he knows the face of his flock through another worthy of faith, and this suffices for him to administer the sacraments to him.

To the other it must be said that no danger arises from the fact that he himself gives permission, because he knows to whom he gives it, and to whom: but if the permission of another than the proper priest sufficed, then danger could arise.

To the other it must be said that in truth the inferior Angel is not illuminated except by a superior, whether proximate or remote: and so it can also be done in the Church: because what the priest can do, the Bishop can do, and much more, and so on ascending. Nor is he thereby exempted from the obedience of the proximate prelate: but if the priest gave permission, he would not be subject to him that year concerning this precept: just as also after he has once confessed to the priest, he is not bound to confess again, nor is he thereby exempted from his obedience.

And thus the solution to the first part of the objections is clear.

However, these things which have been said are to be understood only of him who has the authority to impose penances from a superior Bishop, namely either a Legate or the Pope: because the proper priest cannot give permission to go to another. And the reason for this is, because although the priest could release the subject to confess to another, he cannot transfer jurisdiction to him who has bound wings, but only the superior: and therefore although the subject in such a case could confess to another, not just any other can hear him.

To those things which are objected in opposition, saving a better opinion, it seems to me to be said that in five cases, according to what the Jurists say, he ought to seek permission to confess to another than his own priest, namely first, if the priest is deficient in knowledge, or even malice impeding confession, as if he solicits to sin. Second, if he sins in the parish of another. Third, if he lives in the parish of another. Fourth, if he wanders on a long journey. Fifth, in the article of necessity. And in this last case, it is to be confessed to anyone having bound or unbound wings, whether cleric or layman, provided he is faithful.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that in such a case by permission he can seek another.

To the objection against, it must be said that it should be believed that permission has been obtained: because it is reasonably obtained, namely when the priest or his prelate hears and approves reasonable causes, or is said to have approved: for then even if permission is denied...

In my judgment, another can and ought to complain: because otherwise foolishness is judged: because, with all the ordinances of the Church contradicting, I can avoid danger in the body, and it would be foolish to say that in some case I would be bound to follow myself willing to cast down in mind.

To the other, it must be said that even in that case when he tempts, it ought to be signified to his superior, and it is probable that he will restrain him: but if he does not, as, alas! it frequently happens, then he ought to confess secretly to another discreet person, lest scandal be generated: and I say this without prejudice to a better sentence.

To what is objected concerning the heretic, it seems it must be said that not even in the article of such necessity is it to be confessed: but rather with sorrow without confession one must die, if another to whom confession might be made is not found.

In the following four cases in four objections, the solution is clear through the aforementioned.

To what is objected generally, it must be said that it is not similar concerning baptism and penance, because baptism cannot be repeated: and the reason for this has often been noted above. But penance is so much the better, the more often it is repeated in contrition, confession, and satisfaction.

To the other, it must be said that penance and confession, insofar as they are subject to the keys of jurisdiction, follow order: and therefore when they are done before one not having jurisdiction, they are interpreted as not having been done: and therefore it is not done twice when repeated, because the prior was not sacramental confession.

To the other, it must be said that what is said, Nahum 1:9, is not understood thus, that no double penance is made for the same sin, since it is written, Isaiah 12:2: "He has received from the hand of the Lord double": but in this way it is understood for all his sins, if he sustains the due punishment, that it is not necessary to repeat it. However, it has been said that we do not believe it due, unless it is done before one's own priest, except in the cases assigned above.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar: because order is indeed given outside the Church, yet in the form of the Church, just as baptism: but it is not so with confession in which no character is imprinted, and there is the act of the penitent man: and therefore it is not valid except before one's own minister, or one who has the place of one's own by the license of the superior and the consent of the priest, as has been said.

To what is further asked, it seems it must be said with some Jurists, that a priest and Bishop, and especially a Bishop, can choose for himself a confessor whom he wishes near him: because for the danger of salvation this is not to be denied to him, since it is difficult for a confessor, whom Prelates always need at hand for the sacraments which cannot be handled except by the pure, to travel far.

To the objection against, it must be said that as the Philosopher says, that a physician heals himself, not insofar as he is a physician, but insofar as he is suffering: so also it happens that a priest is of a priest, namely insofar as the priest is in the place of a subject in the infirmity of sin, and not insofar as the priest existing from a higher degree. But what the Philosopher says, that there is not a motion of motion, it must be said that it is understood thus, that there is not a motion to motion as generation to generation, etc.: and thus a priest is not of a priest, but of a sick sinner, to whom it happens to be a priest.

To the other, it must be said that some ancients denied this saying, that superiors receive certain illuminations from inferiors, because of that of the Apostle to the Ephesians 3:10: "That it might be made known to the principalities and powers in the heavens through the Church," etc. And this has been disputed over the second Sentences. However, I think that it is true as the objection says. Hence it must be said that in superior men the infirmity of sin is found, by reason of which they sometimes need the help of inferiors: but it is not so in an Angel: and this is what the Apostle says, to the Hebrews 5:2 and 3: "Because he himself is also surrounded by infirmity, and therefore he ought, just as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins from the infirmity of sin."

Articulus 43 — Whether Someone By Privilege Can Hear Those Who Are Subjects Of Another

Whether someone by privilege can hear those who are subjects of another?

Fifthly, it is asked whether someone by privilege can hear those who are subjects of another?

1. It seems that he can: because
2. By the privilege of a prince, someone who is a subject of another can be exempted from him without prejudice to the one to whom he is subject: therefore, by privilege, jurisdiction can also be conferred regarding confession in the subject of another.
3. Furthermore, a lower prelate does not have any jurisdiction over a subject except by the authority of a superior: therefore, if the superior limits or diminishes the authority, it does not cause any prejudice: therefore, if he sends another who also hears the subjects, it is not prejudice.

4. Furthermore, it is permitted for a prince to do what he wills, provided his will is useful to the community: but it is evident that it is useful to appoint many who hear the multitude, and expedite and absolve doubts: therefore, it seems that the privilege of hearing confessions can be conferred on many without any prejudice.
5. Furthermore, whoever the inferior can hear, the superior can also hear: but it is not converted: therefore, from his power, he can send others to hear, and give them privilege concerning this.
6. Furthermore, in 1 Chronicles 24:1 and following, it is read that David expanded the worship of the Lord, who was praised for this because he appointed twenty-four chief priests, so that the people could be more expedited: therefore, it seems that it is also praiseworthy that the privilege of hearing be conferred on many.
7. Furthermore, in 2 Chronicles 30:13, Hezekiah sent messengers running, who would admonish the people to return to the Lord God of their fathers. And it is evident that they were not Levites: therefore, in the New Testament, there ought to be some messengers subordinate to priests, who, by hearing the people, admonish them to return to the Lord God of their fathers.
8. Furthermore, in Esther 8:10, Ahasuerus sent couriers, swift messengers bearing letters, who were subordinate to the governors of one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, who announced the liberation of the people of God. Therefore, in the New Testament, without any prejudice, there ought to be such messengers, ordained for the liberation of the people in hearing confessions.

This could also be proven in countless other ways: therefore, it seems that some can and ought to be appointed by privilege to preach and hear confessions: and in this, no prejudice seems to be generated.

But on the contrary, it is objected thus: Privileges are not to be conferred to the injury of anyone: but for the subjects of someone to go to another without his will is to the injury of him who is their prelate: therefore, a privilege should not be conferred on anyone concerning this.

Again, suppose someone has the privilege of hearing: it is asked whether priests and bishops can prohibit their own from confessing to him?

It seems that they can: because 1. By that privilege, they are not exempted from the power of their priests: therefore, just as before they were bound to obey him, not to confess to another, so also now: therefore, if the priest prohibits, they ought not to confess to him who has the privilege.

1. Likewise, to whom the care of tending the sheep in the administration of the sacraments and rendering account falls, to him also falls when and to whom they confess: therefore, without his license, they ought not to go to anyone: therefore, even if someone is privileged, he still cannot hear the subjects of another, if that one prohibits.

2. Furthermore, although this one is privileged to hear, yet the subject of the priest is not privileged not to obey his priest: therefore, if he prohibits him from confessing to the privileged one, he ought to obey by not confessing: and from this, it follows that he who has the privilege will not hear, although he is privileged.

BUT on the contrary: 4. The benefit of a privilege is not to be rejected, so that it is useless to him to whom it is given: but if confessors can be withdrawn so that they do not confess to the privileged one, which even in the prohibition of the priest they cannot be withdrawn so that they do not confess to someone having a privilege concerning this.

1. Likewise, to whom some benefit and principal thing is granted, to him is also granted the accessory, without which the principally granted cannot be exercised: but the hearing of confession cannot be unless someone confesses: therefore, it seems that to whom it is granted to hear confessions, it is also granted to the subjects that they can confess to him without the license of another.

Solution. It seems without prejudice to be said that it is useful to grant the privilege of hearing confessions to religious and honest persons. And it is confirmed by the authority of the Old and New Testaments. And many things from the Old Testament have been introduced. From the New, however, in Luke 14:23, it is held, where the householder sent his servants, who went out into the highways and hedges, and brought in and compelled to enter so that the house of God might be filled. And this is especially necessary in the last times, when perilous times are imminent due to the abundance of wickedness. And if the privilege is conferred, the privileged can hear all whom they move by word and example to repentance in preaching: whence I concede the first part of this disputation.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that no prejudice is done to anyone in this: because even a priest, or another prelate, does not have any jurisdiction over subjects, except insofar as it descends from the head: and therefore if others are called and privileged in his aid, it is not prejudice, but solace, especially since the fruits of the revenues from this are in no way diminished for him.

To what is further asked, it must be said that if such a privilege were granted, in my judgment, the privileged one ought to induce the subjects to confess to him with the conscience and license of their priest. However, if the priest would maliciously wish to impede this, he could not: because in this, his subjects are not bound to obey him. For he who gives the privilege seems consequently to give the subjects the power to confess to the privileged one: because otherwise, the grace which he grants would be frustrated.

To the other, it must be said that the priest does not have the care except by the will of the superior, and therefore he ought to presume that those sent by him dispose the people well for salvation, nor will he render account for that.

And finally, it must be said that to this privileged one for hearing, it is permitted for another to confess to him: because he who grants the principal, grants also the accessory without which the principal cannot be done, as was said in the objections which are brought in the contrary.

Articulus 44 — Whether Someone Having Confessed To A Privileged Person Is Also Bound To Confess To His Own Priest

Whether someone who has confessed to a privileged confessor is also bound to confess to their own priest?

Whether someone who has confessed to a privileged confessor is also bound to confess to their own priest?

Sixthly, it is asked whether, after they have confessed to a privileged confessor, if such a person exists, they are also bound to confess to their own priest?

And it seems that they are:

1. For it is commanded to one's own priest, "Diligently know the face of your flock": but this cannot be known except through the confession of the spiritual face of the flock: therefore, one's own priest is bound to hear their confessions: therefore, they are also bound to confess to him.
2. Furthermore, in Jeremiah 33:13, it is said, "The flocks shall pass again under the hands of him that telleth them": but the hand of the one who counts touches each one: therefore, the hand of the priest who examines should measure each sheep by the touch of confession and knowledge: but this cannot be except through confession: therefore, they are bound to confess to him.
3. Likewise, in John 10:3-4, it is said that the good shepherd calls his own sheep by name... and goes before them. And below, verse 14: "I am the good shepherd, and I know mine, and mine know me." But all these things can in no way be done without confession: therefore, to whomever the subjects have confessed, it seems that they are still bound to confess to their own priest.
4. Furthermore, in Acts 20:28, Paul says: "Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." But it is of no small estimation, that which is bought with the blood of Christ: therefore, with all diligence, the sheep must be seen and known by their own shepherd: but they are in no way sufficiently known, except through confession in which a man shows his whole heart and conscience to the priest: therefore, it seems that they are bound to confess to him.
5. Furthermore, in 1 Thessalonians 5:14, the Apostle says: "Admonish the unruly, comfort the fainthearted, support the weak, be patient with all." But this can in no way be done, unless they are known to be such or such: therefore, they ought to be known: but they cannot be suitably known, except through confession: therefore, all are bound to confess to their own priest, even if they have confessed to another.

But if you say that he knows through another. On the contrary: This only generates opinion: and opinion is not sufficient for human judgment: therefore, much less will it suffice for divine judgment: and this is in penance: therefore, it does not suffice in penance.

1. Furthermore, in Hebrews 13:17: "Obey your leaders, and submit to them: for they watch over your souls, as those who must give an account." He who must give an account, even of temporal things, seeks to know the account by himself: therefore, much more is this required in divine matters: therefore, the priest ought to know by himself about the confession.

On the contrary, however, it is objected thus.

1. If someone confesses to a privileged confessor, it is certain that he is absolved, because otherwise the privilege would be of no value: but the absolved is not bound to confess: therefore, he is not bound to confess to the priest, nor to another more than once a year.
2. Furthermore, Master Hugh of Saint Victor in the book on the Power of Binding and Loosing says that among other bonds which the priest hearing confession loosens, one and the first is that he loosens the debt of confessing to which God bound him, when he absolves him in contrition from the debt of eternal death: he is not bound to confess to anyone: therefore, since he has confessed, he is not bound to confess to his own priest.
3. Furthermore, if someone confesses to the penitentiary of a superior, he is not afterwards bound to confess even to an inferior: but the privileged is as it were a particular penitentiary of the Lord Pope: therefore, having confessed to him, he is not bound to confess to anyone else.
4. Furthermore, there are never two remedies entirely of the same species against one disease: therefore, neither should it be so in spiritual matters: but these two confessions would be remedies entirely similar and of the same species against one disease: therefore, it seems that they should not be: therefore, having confessed to one, he is not bound to confess to another.
5. Furthermore, nature does not abound in superfluities, nor does it lack in necessities: and this is because, as the Philosophers say, it is most disordered: but the divine work is more ordered than the work of nature: therefore, it does not abound in superfluities: but it is superfluous to posit two, when one suffices: therefore, it seems that since confession made to one avails, he is not bound to confess to another.

I respond without prejudice, that if the privilege of hearing confessions in the manner above said were given to someone, as the privilege of hearing those whom some move by the word of their preaching is given: it is most firmly to be believed that the Supreme Pontiff gave this because of the excessive negligence of priests: because with our sins increasing at this end of the age, very few priests are found who are true shepherds, but rather vicars hired for a cheap price: and what is more abominable, they are not perpetuated in many lands, but hired for a year, or even for half a year, or a month. And I know all this because I have seen it: so that it seems to fulfill that of Ezekiel 13:19: "For a piece of bread and a handful of barley, they corrupted me and my people?" Therefore, those who hear and absolve the people by life and knowledge are quite necessary: yet for the pastoral office and reverence of priests, and because it is not to be detracted from them before the subjects, it seems that the privileged absolver should enjoin the one confessed to him, that at least in general he shows himself to his own priest if he is a shepherd, or even a perpetual vicar. But if he is hired for a time, then it seems that it is not necessary.

To what is objected against this, it must be said that such a confessed person is absolved: but nevertheless, the absolved ought to make himself known to the governor of his Church who is his own priest, and therefore he ought to show himself to the priest at least in the kind of sins in which he was; and also for the priest's conscience, and so that he may be secure about him: because he ought to minister the sacraments to him, and give an account for him.

To another it must be said, that as it has been said, he is absolved before God: but nevertheless, many things are required of him: because no one is so absolved, that he cannot fall again into mortal sin due to contempt of the ministers of the Church: and therefore, to assure his governor, he is bound to show himself to him in kind if he wishes.

To another it must be said, that even if he confesses to the penitentiary of a superior, it is still useful, lest the penitentiary dissolve the order of the Church and the office of priests to the people, and in some way remit him to his own priest. And I would believe that the penitentiary sins gravely, who would not do this: yet if he does not remit, then it must be said that it is otherwise in that case, because the penitentiary of a superior imposes penances in the place of the superior, and so there is sufficient presumption of the priest, that he does all things well, nor does he have to judge the deed of the superior: but others hearing by privilege are called as it were to relieve the negligence of priests: and it is more their concern to beware lest they dissipate the office of priests to the people, and the reverence of the people to priests: and therefore it is not similar what is induced for the similar.

To another it must be said, that multiplied remedies avail for a hidden and grave disease: because even if they do not cure the disease, yet they contribute to the confirmation of health: but here it is not otherwise: because he was obliged to the priest, and for abundant caution he goes to the privileged.

To another it must be said, that even nature does many things for the strengthening of the species, so that it can resist subsequent alterations, and those are not superfluous: and so it is also in the works of grace: whence also from him who presides over the utility of the Church, such are sometimes sent for abundant caution for the strengthening of the people in penance and confession. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 45 — Whether Any Advantage Is Gained If One Confesses To A Privileged Person

Whether any utility is obtained if someone confesses to a privileged person?

Whether any utility is obtained if someone confesses to a privileged person?

Seventhly, it is asked, What utility is obtained from a privileged person?

Although it is almost determined from the preceding, nevertheless without dispute it must be said to this, that at least three utilities are obtained. One is perfect absolution, which makes a due diminution of penalties doubled and a strengthening of grace. The second is the abundance of counsel, from which the penitent becomes more secure about the sufficiency of the penance enjoined upon him. The third is the multiplicity of prayers and witnesses before God: because the more people one confesses to, the more intercessors and witnesses one has before God.

Articulus 46 — Whether The Definitions Of Scandal Are Good

Whether the definitions of scandal are good?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said there, D, after the beginning: But even in such scandal, etc.

We will inquire about scandal, first, what it is? Second, about the division of scandal. Third, whether it is a special sin distinct from other sins, or always conjoined with others? Fourth, whether it is a mortal sin or not? Fifth, whether to scandalize in any way befits the good? Sixth, of whom is it to be scandalized? Seventh, what things are to be omitted on account of scandal, and what not?

To the first of these, it is proceeded thus: Matthew xvi, 7, upon that: Woe says the Gloss: from scandals! Scandal is a word or deed less right, providing others an occasion of ruin.

Another notification of scandal is had upon that of Numbers, xxxi, 2: Avenge, etc., thus, to deceive first the sons of Israel Scandal is, where to one walking rightly deception is submitted to ruin.

However, it is objected thus against the first: because 1. Every sin which is in words or deeds, is an occasion of ruin to another: therefore every sin existing in words and deeds is scandal, which is false.

1. Further, every sin proceeding to the knowledge of a neighbor, is an obstacle placed to one walking rightly: but every sin existing in words or deeds, is proceeding as far as it is of itself to the knowledge of a neighbor: therefore every sin existing in words and deeds is an obstacle placed to one walking rightly, which is false, because many sin, and do not scandalize.
2. If perhaps it is said, that a sin which is in words or in deeds, becomes scandal when someone falls by the example of it. Against: It happens to the sinner, that someone falls by the example of it or does not fall: therefore scandal is by accident in the one scandalizing, and per se in the one scandalized: but in whom it is per se, it is of that one and is imputed to that one: therefore scandal is more in the one scandalized and is imputed to him, which is against the whole Scripture which always blames those scandalizing.

Further, it is inquired, why is not the sin of the heart placed?

For it seems that it can be an occasion of ruin: because the heart comes forth to knowledge through signs: therefore it can be an occasion of an obstacle: therefore it is an occasion of scandal: therefore it itself ought to be placed, as it seems.

It is also objected against the second definition: 1. Not only those walking rightly are scandalized, but also others: therefore it is badly said, Where to one walking rightly.

1. Further, there is not always deception in scandal: but also this one knows, that he does badly by imitating: therefore it is badly said, Deception is submitted.
2. Likewise, it does not matter to the fall to the obstacle, whether the obstacle is hidden, or manifest, as long as it throws down the one walking: therefore it is similarly in the way of morals: therefore it is not always necessary to be deception.

Response. It must be said, that scandal is Greek, and it sounds in Latin as much as impact or fall: hence in spiritual scandal which is transumptively called scandal, there must be something to which impact or fall is made: and this is sin opposing one walking rightly insofar as it opposes. I say then one walking rightly, all and him who in that work in which he is, does not deviate, so that it may be said to be right that which recedes from the curvature of sin or deviation: and thus all acts are comprehended under right which are licit, that is, which are prohibited by no precept: thus indeed is defined licit in the Gloss upon that of the Apostle, to the Corinthians vi, 12: All things are lawful for me, but I say not all things are expedient because if sinning insofar as opposing had a circumstance making it not oppose one walking rightly, it would not be scandal, as is the circumstance of concealment. However, the circumstance making it oppose the feet of one walking rightly, is that which places sin before him: and this is that which is said manifestly. For this before one walking rightly in the way of morals places sin as an obstacle impeding the steps of works.

To the first, therefore, it must be said, that this is false, Every word or deed, because not every word or deed etc., is manifest in the spectacle of those walking rightly, and does not of itself come forth to knowledge, when it is hidden.

To the other, it must be said in the same way, that it does not yet come forth, when it is concealed and closed: for it is withdrawn as if from the way of morals, when it is withdrawn from the knowledge of neighbors.

To the other, it must be said, that circumstance is not entirely accidental to the act and this is evident in morals, where the species of right and oblique are distinguished by when it is necessary, and how much, and where, and with what aids, and why, etc. It is also evident in rhetorical places from which arguments of accusation or defense of a thing are drawn from circumstances: and therefore it does not by accident belong to every sin, that it belongs to it by circumstance. However, one of the circumstances is open; and therefore of itself it has, that it is scandal when it is open. But that another falls, or not, this is contingent to him: because scandal is not the sole cause of ruin, but also requires a cause on the part of the other imitating it in sin. Hence whether he falls or not, this one nevertheless gave as far as it is of itself an occasion of ruin: occasion, however, is called an imperfect cause, which requires with itself another principally causing, which it excites and invites to cause, and of this kind in scandal is the will of the one imitating the one scandalizing in the sin which it places before his eyes.

To the other, it must be said, that the sin of the heart is by its nature hidden: because the sin of the heart is discretively said, which is so of the heart, that it is not of the mouth or of the work.

To the objection, however, it says, that a sign is multiple, namely common, and convertible sign: common does not certify: but makes a weak estimation, and therefore it is not scandal. However, a convertible sign is equivalent to a cause, as the Philosopher says: and such is not manifest in the sin of the heart. If, however, it were, something would be found which would show the sin in its proper species, and place it before the eyes of one walking rightly: therefore it would not be a sin of the heart only, but would be reduced to the sin of the mouth or work.

To what is objected against the second, it must be said that one not walking rightly insofar as of this kind, is not scandalized, because inviting to sin does not take from outside in sin, but has the cause of his sin within: but one walking rightly and not walking crookedly, for he inviting to sin when he does not have within, takes from outside in the sin of a neighbor opposing him in the way of morals.

To the other, it must be said, that deception is here taken broadly for not foreseen: for suddenly and beyond hope it presents itself the sin of scandal inviting to sin on the part of the one scandalized: and this is called here deception, because when the neighbor insofar as he is the image of God ought to invite to good, beyond foresight it presents an occasion of ruin.

But then it is objected: because according to this if a public sin is foreseen to be future, it will not be scandal, and thus again it would follow, that it would happen to it to be scandal on the part of the one scandalized, from this that it is foreseen, or not foreseen. Response, that there is a double foresight, namely speculative, and practical. Speculative does not invite to sin: because thus all premeditating some sins, would be moved to sin, which is false. Hence if such precedes on the part of the one scandalized, it is no less scandal or sin of another, because it is the first inviting him to sin of itself. If, however, practical foresight precedes: then there is consent or pleasure of that sin, which moves to the seen sin. And then it is indeed still of itself scandal: but nevertheless this scandal does not first scandalize him, but rather the first inclining to sin brought with it in the will of sinning: hence this one sins as if he were not scandalized, because if the sin of the neighbor were withdrawn from him, he would still be moved to sinning.

To the other, it must be said, that much matters in the way of morals, although it does not matter in the way of feet: because it never throws down as the first inviting to sinning, unless it proceeds into the knowledge of another: and this is to be manifest to another. It has been said already, since of the essence of scandal properly is, that it is the first inviting to sinning others, not sinning by that kind of sin.

Articulus 47 — Whether Scandal Is Well Divided Into Active And Passive

ARTICLE XLVI. Whether scandal is well divided into active and passive?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the division of scandal.

It is divided into active and passive. And active is said to be that which acts in scandal, passive, that which suffers in the same. For example, if I give occasion for ruin, I act in scandal: but if you receive it, you suffer: and in me is active scandal, but in you passive.

But against this it is objected thus: 1. For the most principal agent is the agent immediate to the deed or work: but the agent immediate to the work is the will of the one imitating manifest sin: therefore it is the most principal agent: therefore in the imitator there is not passive scandal, but active, which is against all speaking of scandal.

1. Further, Occasion does not act, because it is not a cause, but less than a cause even per accidens: therefore it seems, since manifest sin is only an occasion of another's sin, that it ought not to be called active scandal.
2. Further, Augustine says that every sin is so voluntary that if it is not voluntary, it is not sin. But it is evident that actual mortal sin is not called voluntary unless by the will of the agent itself: but I see that sin perpetrated by imitation of sin is called voluntary by the will of the scandalized, and not by the will of the scandalizer: therefore it seems that the scandalized is the agent in the ruin of scandal, and not the scandalizer.
3. Further, A cause by occasion is a cause in some way disposing: but this in some way is reduced to a material cause, since it speaks of the preparation of matter, as the Philosophers say: therefore to give occasion in scandal is a cause reduced to the material: but that is the scandalizer: therefore it causes in scandal only as matter or disposition: and that is to suffer, not to act: therefore it is more fitting for the scandalizer to suffer in scandal, and for the scandalized to act, than conversely.

Response. It must be said that the definition of scandal introduced stands, and is good.

To the solution of the objections it must be said that there is a first agent, which is only an agent: and a second agent, which is an agent suffering, and a mover moved, because it is moved by the first mover. An example of this is the desired and the desire, as the Philosopher says. For the desired by itself, that is, by its species, which is delightful, moves the desire: the desire, however, moved by the species of the desired, moves to the work, and into conjunction with the desired. And in this way active scandal is said to be that which is the first mover of the desire of the one seeing it: the desire, however, moved by the seen sin, is the second mover to the act of sin, and is a mover moved, and an agent suffering. Since therefore the sin of the scandalizer is the first object to the eyes of the one walking rightly, it is only an agent: and therefore it is called active scandal. The desire or will of the scandalized, however, is a mover already moved, and an agent already suffering: and it follows the moving passions, by which it is suffered from another: and therefore passive scandal is with it.

With these things established, it is easy to respond to the objections.

For it must be said to the first, that the most principal agent is said in two ways, namely that which has more of the nature of an agent, and that which is the cause of action. And in the first way the first agent in any order is the most principal agent: and thus it is said the most principal agent in active scandal. In the second way, however, the immediate agent is the most principal agent, although not the agent according to the species of the agent.

of the first, by which it has already been acted upon; and in this way the will of the scandalized person is the principal cause of the sin that occurs in the scandal.

§ 1. To the other it must be said that it is called an occasion because it is not the perfect cause of that passion which occurs in the will of the one falling by the example of that person: because the object of desire moves desire per se.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that Augustine is speaking of the will which is the proximate cause of the sin, and not of the first cause.

§ 3. To the last it must be said that a disposition is not an occasion, but rather it follows the efficient cause, as is clear through Aristotle in Book II of the Physics, where he places the accidental cause next to the efficient cause.

§ 4. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 48 — Whether Scandal Is A Special Sin Distinct From Other Sins

Whether scandal is a special sin distinct from other sins?

§ 5. Thirdly it is asked, whether it is a special sin divided from others, or conjoined to others?

§ 6. 1. Now it seems that it is a general sin through the definition introduced above, which says: Every word or deed, etc.: for this is in every public sin: therefore it seems that it is not a special sin.

§ 7. 2. Moreover, here in the Text he seems to imply that it is a circumstance of sin rather than a sin, when he says, If his sin was not only in the grave evil of it, but also in so great a scandal to others, etc. A circumstance is not separated from the sin whose circumstance it is: therefore it seems that scandal is not separated from other sins, of which it is a circumstance: therefore it seems that scandal is not separated from other sins: therefore it is not a species of sin in itself.

§ 8. 3. Moreover, every corruption orderable to the acts of diverse sins in species, is a corruption of a common circumstance, and not of a proper act according to species: but scandal signifies a corruption of this kind: therefore it is a corruption of a common circumstance, and not of the proper act of anyone according to species. The first [premise] is clear through the fact that ultimate and completive specific differences are not orderable to diverse sins. The second is proved through the fact that the corruption of scandal is found in every public sin. Thence thus: Whatever is conjoined to the species of diverse sins, is a certain common thing, which in itself does not constitute a species: scandal is of this kind: therefore scandal is a certain common thing conjoined with other sins, in itself not constituting a species.

§ 9. 4. Moreover, one can argue to the same by the second definition: Through every public sin an occasion of falling is given to one walking rightly: therefore scandal is conjoined to every public sin.

§ 10. On the contrary to this it is objected: 1. A special sin is from a special evil will, and special harm, and end: but a special evil will is one that wills to make another fall, and a special harm is the ruin of another, and a special intention, because the scandalizing person intends the fall of another. Therefore, since these are in scandal, it seems that scandal is a special sin.

§ 11. 2. Moreover, Numbers 31:2 and following, it expressly appears that it was special: because there they intended, through the exposing of girls serving gods, to cast them down to idols: therefore it seems that it is a special sin.

§ 12. Response. It must be said that scandal is sometimes called a conjoined sin, sometimes separate. It is conjoined, when it does not have a will and intention separate on the part of the agent from another sin, but only has a separate harm. For example, someone sins publicly, and does not intend to harm another, nor wills it: and yet he harms, because he draws him to ruin by his bad example, and then it is conjoined to another sin, and is not a special sin in itself: and the Saints speak of scandal in this way, because scandal is rarely committed otherwise. In another way scandal is spoken of, when someone specially intends and wills to provide ruin through his word or deed: and then in one action he has two intentions: one as instrumental to the other, because he uses the sin he commits only as an instrument to another sin, which is to cast his neighbor down into sin: and in this way it is taken in Numbers, where the Midianites scandalized the sons of Israel.

§ 13. Moreover, through this distinction the solution to both parts of the objections is clear: because the objections proceed directly upon the parts of the distinction.

Articulus 49 — Whether Scandal Is Always A Mortal Sin

Whether scandal is always a mortal sin?

§ 14. Fourthly it is asked, whether it is always a mortal sin?

§ 15. Now it seems that it is. 1. Matthew 18:7: Woe to the world because of scandals! Gloss: "Eternal damnation threatens the worldly on account of scandals": but eternal damnation does not threaten except for a mortal sin: therefore scandal is a mortal sin.

§ 16. 2. Moreover, in the same place it is said (v. 6), that he who scandalizes one of these little ones who believe in me, it is expedient for him that an ass's millstone be hung about his neck, and he be drowned in the depth of the sea: but this would not be said unless it were a mortal sin: therefore it seems that scandal is always a mortal sin.

§ 17. 3. Moreover, it is a lesser harm to harm corporally unto the subtraction of things or of bodily life, than to harm spiritually unto the perdition of the soul: but the former is a mortal sin, as is clear in robbery, theft, and homicide: therefore also scandal.

§ 18. 4. If perhaps it is said that scandal does not take away [life]. Now this is against the definition: because there is no ruin except through the fall of a mortal sin, which is ruin simply.

§ 19. If perhaps someone says, as some of the ancients solved it, that scandal is mortal when conjoined to a mortal sin, and venial when conjoined to a venial sin. Against this: To eat meats offered to idols in itself is truly venial, and yet on account of the stumbling block it is a mortal scandal: therefore it is not mortal from the fact that it is conjoined to an act of mortal sin. The minor is proved, Romans 14:15, where it is said: Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. And, 1 Corinthians 8:11: And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? And in the same place, v. 12: Now when you sin thus against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, you sin against Christ. Now a brother is not destroyed except through mortal sin: therefore they sinned mortally in scandalizing in an act licit in itself: therefore the proposition is held.

§ 20. But on the contrary to this it is objected thus: 1. Through what is said, Matthew 16:23, where Christ said to Peter: Go behind me, Satan, thou art a scandal unto me: because thou savorest not the things that are of God. And yet the Gloss says there, and it is a Gloss of Bede: "But to me the error of the Apostle coming from an affection of piety, will never seem an incentive of the devil": therefore Peter scandalized, and yet he did not sin mortally. But yet another Gloss says there: "He does not think it possible that the Son of God be killed." But this is not against the proposition: because even if it be granted that he sinned mortally through infidelity (which however is not true), yet he did not sin mortally through scandal, as the first Gloss seems to imply.

§ 21. 2. Moreover, certain sins are mortal in their genus: while others are venial in their genus. Therefore, since scandal adjoined to other sins seems sometimes to be venial and sometimes mortal, it seems that scandal is sometimes venial and sometimes mortal.

§ 22. 3. Moreover, one sin belongs to one will and one act: but scandal is adjoined to the same act of sin, and to the same will, and does not have a divided will and act, as was clear above: therefore it seems that it is not a difference of sin in itself: or if it is, that it does not fall into another difference than that to which the sin is determined through its act, venial or mortal: but not every such sin is mortal: therefore neither is scandal always mortal.

§ 23. Response. It must be said that scandal is sometimes mortal, and sometimes venial: but mortal scandal is threefold, as it seems to me. Namely, from conjunction with a mortal sin: and this is self-evident to anyone. And sometimes it has a division of a special will and intention of casting down the neighbor into mortal sin: and this again is clear. Thirdly, also when it is conjoined to an act which from a circumstance can probably be believed mortal, although it is not [mortal] as regards the agent; because then the negligence and inconsideration of the agent make that act to be a mortal sin. As was the sin of the Corinthians who reclined in the idol's temple to eat meat offered to idols at a time when such a rite was observed in honor of the idols: for then every weak person, ignorant of the faith of the one eating, could according to common judgment judge nothing else than that he ate to honor the idol: and since he was a Doctor of the faith, the disciple was also built up to eat in honor of the idol: and therefore he actively gave his brother a cause of ruin through the sin of infidelity. But in whatever other way it is done, it is a venial sin. And I say this without prejudice: because perhaps to another more modes of mortal scandal will occur, but to me now no more come to mind.

§ 24. To the first two, therefore, it must be said that the Saints speak there only of mortal scandal, and not of venial.

§ 25. To the other it must be said that it is true that he who acts directly to the injury of the soul, harms more than if he harmed corporally: yet it does not follow that he sins more, because the quantity of the sin is not measured from the quantity of the harm, but rather from the quantity of the deformity in the act and the root and the will of the sinner. That this is so is plainly clear, because the harm is in another, and not frequently in the sinner, and the quantity of the sin is taken from those things which are in the sinner. If however it is granted that a certain deformity of the act is also taken according to the harm, as is true, then it must be said that the argument still is not valid: because to a corporal harm one acts directly intending through the will to harm: but to a spiritual harm in a scandal conjoined to another sin, one does not act directly intending, but it coincides with his sin. If however the scandal were specially intended, and it were unto mortal sin, then the reason would not have to be conceded.

§ 26. To the other it must be said that when scandal is defined through ruin, ruin is taken commonly for absolute ruin which is mortal sin, and for an occasion of ruin which is venial: and thus the definition befits both, yet it primarily befits mortal sin.

§ 27. To the other which is objected concerning Peter, it must be said that scandal is taken there equivocally in comparison to the scandal of which we speak: for an obstacle for men on the right path of morals is the scandal about which we inquire here. But scandal is sometimes called an obstacle to joy or to the equanimity of affection: and thus whatever disturbs is called a scandal: and in this way Peter is called a scandal to Christ: because as far as was in him, he was disturbing the path of our salvation. And in this way Christ, disturbing the Scribes and Pharisees, is said to have scandalized them in life: and He says, Matthew 17:26, to Peter concerning those receiving the tax: But that we may not scandalize them, go to the sea, etc., that is, lest we disturb them.

§ 28. Some, however, distinguish this a little, namely that there is material scandal, and formal. They call material that in which someone by his own fault, not by the vice of the doer, receives an occasion of falling: and in this way they say Christ scandalizes. But formal, when by his own vice he gives an occasion of falling. And both distinctions conjoined, I think are truer than either alone by itself.

§ 29. Whatever the case may be, it must be said that Peter did not sin mortally by scandalizing: because the impediment of redemption which he strove to interpose, did not issue forth except from piety: because he willed Christ not to suffer, and yet to redeem the human race:

and these things indeed were compossible: but even if they were not compossible, then one of them could be separated from the other by an act of the soul.

§ 30. To the other it must be said that the Gloss says that Peter was not an infidel: because suddenly terrified at the word of God, he did not ponder nor confer: and therefore immediately corrected by the Lord he received discipline.

§ 31. To the other it must be said that in truth scandal is both mortal and venial, in diverse ways as has been said: and yet it does not follow that the sin of the one scandalizing is two sins: but Master Praepositivus used to call such sins double or composite, when in one act there are two or more deformities from diverse corruptions of diverse circumstances: and therefore also a separate penalty is not enjoined on the one scandalizing, but only that by the example of the enjoined penalty he may edify his neighbor. And this is drawn here from the Text, where it is said: Yet let him do that which not only profits himself unto salvation, but also which may be an example to the rest.

§ 32. And through this the solution of all the objections is clear.

Articulus 50 — Whether It In Any Way Befits The Good To Cause Scandal

Whether to scandalize in any way befits the good?

§ 33. Fifthly it is asked, whether to scandalize in any way befits the good?

§ 34. 1. For concerning Christ it is said, Luke 2:34: Behold this child is set for the fall, and for the resurrection of many in Israel. Now the occasion of ruin is scandal: therefore Christ scandalized many: therefore also other Saints could scandalize.

§ 35. Also, Matthew 15:12: Dost thou know that the Pharisees, when they heard this word, were scandalized? Therefore Christ scandalized the Pharisees: therefore also other Saints can do this.

§ 36. Also, Isaiah 28:16: Behold I will lay a stone in the foundations of Sion, a tried stone, a corner stone, etc., and it follows: He that believeth, let him not hasten. As if he were saying: If he hastens, he strikes against it and falls. Now it is certain that Christ is speaking: therefore Christ was an occasion of ruin in the Jews: therefore he scandalized.

§ 37. Also, 1 Peter 2:8, it is said that Christ was a stone of stumbling, and a rock of scandal: therefore, etc.

§ 38. 2. Moreover, concerning Blessed Anthony it is read, that a certain hunter was scandalized in him because he comported himself more relaxed by walking with the brothers through the woods: therefore it sometimes happens to the good to scandalize others.

§ 39. But on the contrary it is objected thus: Because they are contraries, to provoke by examples to the good, and by examples to draw back from the good, and to provoke to evil: but the Saints are bound by their examples to call back from evil, and to provoke to the good: therefore it does not befit them to draw others back from the good, and to provoke them to evil. The proof of the first is: because they are done by contraries, namely by good and evil.

The proof of the second is what the Lord says, Matthew 5:16: So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.

§ 40. Response. To this it must be said that scandal is material, and formal. Materially the Saints were made a scandal to some, but formally to none. And what material scandal is, and what formal, has been said above.

§ 41. And through this the solution to those things which are objected concerning Christ is clear.

§ 42. To the other which is objected concerning Anthony it must be said that in truth it was nothing but the matter of scandal: because he did not give a bad example by an illicit act, but after too much rigor he had led the brothers out to recreation: whence that hunter was not scandalized unto anything illicit, but thought there was something less of the good of religion in them than he had believed: and therefore Blessed Anthony cured him through the tension of a bow, which if it were bent beyond what is bendable, would break. And thus he said it is concerning the virtue and strength of a man, on whom if more is imposed than he can bear, his virtue will break, and his strength will not be able to sustain it.

Articulus 51 — To Whom It Belongs To Be Scandalized

Whose is it to be scandalized?

§ 43. Sixthly it is asked, whose is it to be scandalized?

§ 44. Now it seems that it is of all: 1. For because an agent has itself in the same way, if the patient also has itself in the same way (as the Philosopher says in Book X of the Ethics), it always does the same thing: but a bad example has itself in one way with respect to the species of evil, and every onlooker according as he is an onlooker, has himself in the same way: therefore it seems that if one is scandalized, all are also scandalized: therefore it belongs to all equally to be scandalized.

§ 45. 2. Also, it is certain that everyone giving a bad example, scandalizes by this very fact, as is clear from what has been previously held: therefore, to object grammatically, since it is a transitive verb, and there is nowhere for its act to pass except into a passive, it is necessary that someone be scandalized: but he is not scandalized unless looking upon him: therefore of all onlookers, by the fact that they are onlookers, it is to be scandalized: but these are all indifferently: therefore of all it is to be scandalized.

§ 46. But on the contrary: 1. Matthew 18:6, where the Lord speaks of scandal, He does not seem to speak except of the scandal of the little ones: therefore it is of the little ones to be scandalized: but not all are little ones: therefore it is not of all to be scandalized.

§ 47. 2. Moreover, the Gloss in the same place says that it is of the little ones to be scandalized, not of the advanced and perfect.

§ 48. 3. Moreover, 1 Corinthians 8:10, the Apostle seems to mean that it is of the weak to be scandalized: for he says thus, If any man see him that hath knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not his conscience, being weak, be emboldened to eat those things which are sacrificed to idols? And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?

§ 49. 4. Moreover, to be provoked to evil by the example of another is not characteristic of one having a habit confirmed to the good: therefore it does not belong to them to be inclined to evil by another's example.

§ 50. 5. Moreover, in the second book of the Ethics it is said that the wise men of the people suffered differently towards Helen, and differently the young men living in concupiscence: for the wise men fled from her all the more when they saw her, but the young men were attracted: therefore much more does this befit the perfect when they see evil: therefore it seems that it is not of them to be scandalized.

§ 51. Which we concede, saying to the first that the passives are not disposed in the same way, except as regards the extrinsic condition, that is, as regards solely the seeing: but because seeing is not the cause of passive scandal, unless concupiscence of evil and consent are adjoined, therefore it does not follow that those are scandalized, although others act unto scandal. And it is similar, that fire burns, and yet dry wood is burned by fire in one way and green wood in another.

§ 52. To the other it must be said that in grammatical matters the mode suffices, even if sometimes the reality is lacking. Just as a stone grammatically is said to be "injuring the foot", even if it never injures: so the verb is called transitive, because as much as is of itself, it passes over, but yet in reality a passive cannot always be inferred from the active, namely when it receives nothing of the action of the agent from its immutation: and so it is here. And therefore it does not follow according to reality: this one scandalizes, therefore that one is scandalized, or someone is scandalized. Nor does it validly hold conversely: this one is scandalized, therefore someone scandalizes him: as is clear in material scandal, because the Jews were scandalized, and yet our Lord Jesus Christ did not scandalize them.

Articulus 52 — Which Are Those Things That Ought To Be Omitted On Account Of Scandal

What are those things that must be laid aside on account of scandal?

§ 53. Seventhly it is asked, what things must be laid aside on account of passive scandal, because actively no one ought to scandalize?

§ 54. For it seems that all things not pertaining to salvation [must be laid aside]: 1. For the tranquility of the neighbor is better than all such things: therefore it is to be chosen before all such things: therefore before he is disturbed, all things not pertaining to salvation ought to be laid aside.

§ 55. 2. Moreover, concerning Blessed Bernard it is read in his Life, that when dying he said: "To no one did I ever cause scandal, but when it happened, I settled it as best I could." Therefore it seems that for no thing not pertaining to salvation ought anyone to cause scandal.

§ 56. 3. Moreover, we ought to love our neighbor as ourselves: but we love ourselves in such a way that for a temporal thing we do not wish to be disturbed or scandalized by others: therefore neither ought we to scandalize another for a temporal thing.

§ 57. 4. But according to this it seems that it is not licit to demand back one's own things with scandal: because without demanding back one's own things there is easily salvation.

§ 58. Also, this seems [to follow] from the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 6:7, where it is said: Why do you not rather take wrong? Therefore it seems that injury is rather to be sustained, than to litigate in judgment to recover one's own things.

§ 59. Also, Hebrews 10:34: You took with joy the being stripped of your own goods, knowing that you have a better and a lasting substance. For from this the same follows.

§ 60. But against this again it seems to be: because an incentive to delinquent acts must be furnished to no one: but if one's own things are not demanded back, an incentive will be given to always detain the things of others: and this is worst: therefore one's own things are to be demanded back, even however much he may be disturbed.

§ 61. Next to this it is further asked: Since the works of mercy are better than [those] of justice: but the works of mercy are sometimes laid aside on account of scandal, lest they be believed to be done with the intention of vain praise: why are the works of justice not similarly intermitted?

§ 62. To this without prejudice it seems to me to be said, that the one suffering the injury does well if he sustains the loss without demanding back his own things, but he is not bound [to do so]. And what the Lord says, that to the one taking the tunic the cloak is also to be relinquished, I repute as a counsel.

§ 63. To this, however, which is objected, that an incentive to delinquent acts is not to be furnished: it must be said that this man does not furnish it, but that man had it when he robbed another's things. But this man by the patience of sustaining [it] provokes him more to the good than by the demanding back of his own things. And this is clear from what is said, Romans 12:20 and 21: If thy enemy be hungry, give him to eat: if he thirst, give him to drink. For, doing this, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head. Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil by good. And by many other things which are said in the text and in the Gloss.

§ 64. That however he is not bound, is clear through Gregory saying thus upon that of Job 39:16: He hath labored in vain, etc. [Gregory:] "Gathering from these things we say: When the necessity of the journey imposes upon us the care of things, some, while they rob them, are only to be tolerated: but some, charity being preserved, are to be prohibited; yet not by the sole care lest they subtract our things, but lest they who rob what is not theirs, destroy themselves. For we ought to fear more for the robbers themselves, than for the irrational things to be defended. For these things, even if not robbed, we lose when dying: but with them [the robbers] we are one both now in the order of condition, and, if they strive to be corrected, after the perception of the reward. But who would not know, that we ought to love less those things which we use, and more what we are? If therefore even for his own utility we speak to the robbers, already we vindicate not only the temporal things for ourselves, but also the eternal things for them. In which matter this must be shrewdly considered, lest through the fear of necessity the cupidity of things creep in: and the prohibition, inflamed by zeal and distended by a more immoderate impulse, break out into hateful words and the baseness of contention. And while for an earthly thing peace is torn from the heart with the neighbor, it clearly appears that the thing is loved more than the neighbor." From this [it is gathered] that it is licit for all to demand back: but yet it is also licit for all to dissimulate, unless in some case it could probably be estimated that the robber would be corrected more by the fear of judgment than by the example of patience: because Gregory speaks thus.

§ 65. To the first, therefore, it must be said that in some way it is reduced to salvation, namely insofar as, having compassion on the neighbor more than on our own things, we will that he be corrected by judgment: for thus the Lord also commanded evildoers to be struck. Or if they are despaired of being corrected through judgment, the tranquility of life in others ought to be intended: because without this we cannot serve God; and thus the demanding back of one's own things is reduced to those things which produce salvation.

§ 66. To the other it must be said that this which Bernard did was characteristic of the perfect: and perhaps he knew that they were corrected more by patience than by the severity of judgment.

§ 67. To the other it must be said that we ought to will that we be disturbed unto penance or to the recovering of the tranquility of life, which we disturbed when robbing the things of others: and what we ought to will for ourselves, suffices to bestow on the neighbor. § 68. To that which is objected on the contrary, the solution is already clear. However, some distinguish, that to the perfect it is not licit to demand back their own with scandal, but to the imperfect it is licit to demand back their own with scandal. But it does not seem it should be said thus, because the scandal here is only material, because demanding back one's own is a licit act. And on the part of the doer it is a just disturbance, and vexation can give him understanding. Whence I think that it is licit for all if they will, whether in their own name, or in the name of their chapter, or of their proctor, to demand back their own things.

§ 69. To the other objections the solution is clear through the aforementioned things.

Articulus 53 — Whether An Indulgence Is Received In Contrition Or In Confession

Whether indulgence is received in contrition or in confession?

§ 70. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, a little before the middle: Unless they can obtain the indulgence of God by the supplications of the priests, etc.

§ 71. For it seems from this, that indulgence is not received in contrition: because § 72. 1. The supplication of priests is not in contrition, but rather in confession, which is false.

§ 73. 2. If it is said, that it is understood as regards the remission of the entire fault, not only in the fault, but also in the debt of punishment. Against: It is certain that contrition deletes something of the punishment: but the debt of punishment is finite, from the moment the fault is remitted: and the sorrow of contrition is a certain amount which deletes an aliquot part of the punishment, let it be a tenth: therefore if the sorrow of contrition is tenfold, it deletes the whole: now it is possible for the sorrow of contrition to be tenfold: therefore it is possible for the whole punishment to be remitted in contrition: therefore in such a case the supplication of the priests is not necessary: therefore what he says is not generally true.

§ 74. Furthermore, it seems to follow from the saying in the Text, that the form of absolution made by the priest in confession is by way of supplication: therefore it seems that the Church errs which absolves by a common judicative enunciation; which is false.

§ 75. Moreover, the sacraments most certainly attain their end: but certainly the attainment of the end is not expressed, except by the indicative: therefore the form of absolution ought to be made by the indicative, and not by the supplication of the priest, but rather by the absolution indicatively signified does the sinner attain pardon.

§ 76. On the contrary, first seems to be the mode of speaking in the Text: because § 77. 1. The supplication of the priests through which the sinner attains pardon, cannot be by the indicative mood, but rather by the deprecative mood: therefore it seems that the form of absolution ought to be made deprecatively, and not indicatively.

§ 78. 2. Also, divine power is not bound to the sacraments, as Augustine says: therefore it seems that if it ought to operate there, it behooves it to operate through supplication: therefore the form ought to be made through supplication.

§ 79. 3. Moreover, penance is ordered against actual [sin]: and God does not cure that without us: but we are impotent and in need of grace: therefore supplication ought to be made in the sacrament to obtain that grace: therefore absolution from sins ought to be made in the mode of supplication, as it seems.

§ 80. Response. To the first it must be said, that as we have often said above, in contrition the other parts of penance also operate, through the fact that they are in the resolve of the contrite person, and they give power to contrition: just as Augustine says, that the faith of the Redeemer also availed before there was a Redeemer: because although He was not [yet] through an assumed nature, He was nevertheless in the faith of the believers. Therefore, since confession is in the vow of the truly contrite, it operates in the vow to the sins...

§ 1. ...for the remission of sin: and consequently the supplication of the priests operates there.

§ 2. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the remission of sin never occurs without supplication existing in this way: but it can well be that it is sometimes remitted such that a supplication in act does not approach it, namely where the article of necessity, not the contempt of religion, excludes confession.

§ 4. To that which is further asked, it must be said that the form of absolution, on account of the certitude of the sacrament, ought to be done through an indicative enunciation: but that a deprecation precedes it, belongs to the well-being (de bene esse) of the sacrament, and not to its essence (de esse).

§ 5. To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that "supplication" here is called the suppliant and devout ministry of the priests in the forum of penance.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that although the grace of God is not bound by force to the sacraments, nevertheless, by the inevitability of the divine promise and the honesty of the truth of the divine utterance, the sacrament always attains its effect, unless the one who receives it is feigning: and the grace of this inevitability is pronounced indicatively: for otherwise all the sacraments of the Church would be placed under doubt.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that the grace of God is to be invoked upon the conversion of the will, because that is doubtful: but the grace of God is never to be invoked upon the effect of the sacrament: because this would be a sign of doubt regarding the entire foundation of the Church: grace can, however, be invoked for the preparation of the one receiving the sacraments, and for the sanctification of the matter of the sacraments. But that the sacrament itself, celebrated in due matter and due form, has its full effect as far as it is from itself, ought to be left as a constant by every Christian: nor should God be prayed to for this in any way, lest we seem to place our faith under doubt.

Articulus 54 — Whether Confession Can Be Made By Signs Or Writing, And Whether By An Interpreter

Whether confession can be made through signs or writings? And, whether through an interpreter?

§ 8. Next it is asked about what he says, there, D, around the middle: Not to be manifested through writings, etc.

§ 9. For according to this, people of an unknown tongue would not be able to confess.

§ 10. Also, neither would the mute, who cannot speak.

§ 11. Furthermore it is asked, when someone confesses through an interpreter, whether the interpreter is bound to conceal the confession just as the priest?

§ 12. For it seems that he is: because otherwise he would draw many men back from confession: and the concealment of confession, as will be held below, is done for this reason, lest men be drawn back from confession: therefore the interpreter is bound to conceal the confession.

§ 13. But to the contrary of this it is objected because he himself is not a priest, and only priests receive what is heard under the form of confession: therefore this man receives it only like another worldly thing: but he is not bound to conceal another thing, unless he wishes to or has promised: therefore neither this.

§ 14. Response. It must be said that he is speaking of those who communicate with priests in the potency of speaking and in language. For others can confess through writing or through a sign by themselves, or through an interpreter.

§ 15. And through this the solution to the first question is clear.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that the interpreter ought to be obligated by the priest to retain it: and even if he is not obligated, he is nevertheless bound to remain silent.

§ 17. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that he is there as the ear of the priest: and therefore he shares in the act of the priest in some way on account of necessity: and therefore he does not receive this like another rumor, but rather as a confession, which is to be concealed entirely: and therefore he is to be severely punished if he reveals it: and yet the one revealing it is not to be believed to any prejudice of the one confessing.

Articulus 55 — Whether Sins Are Sometimes Remitted In Contrition, Sometimes In Confession

Whether sins are sometimes remitted in contrition, sometimes in confession?

§ 18. Next it is asked about what he says, there, D, a little after the middle: And if it is not immediately purged, it nevertheless becomes venial, etc.

§ 19. For what is said seems false: because there are many who are also absolved from the whole in contrition, and many who in confession: and the sign of this is that no penance was enjoined upon Mary Magdalene by the Lord: therefore many are immediately purged in confession.

§ 20. Further it is asked about what he says, that it becomes venial, which he had committed as mortal: for Avicenna says that the artisans of alchemy know that species cannot be transmuted: but mortal and venial are diverse species of sin: therefore one is not transmuted into the other.

§ 21. Response. It must be said to the first, that he speaks of what happens frequently: because frequently all three parts of penance are required.

§ 22. Or it may be better said that he speaks of what happens always: but then one must return to the solution often noted above, namely that the parts of penance operate, namely insofar as they are in vow, not only in act: because then it is true that the sin which he had committed as mortal, is made venial through the taxation of penance with pardon following.

§ 23. To that which is further asked, it must be said that "venial" is said in three ways, just as we noted in the second book of the Sentences, namely from its genus, like an idle word: from the outcome (ex eventu), just as when a mortal sin having been remitted through contrition, penance is also enjoined through the keys giving pardon in whole through satisfaction. Thirdly, anything in itself mortal is called venial: if nevertheless it has something in its circumstance, by which it can be excused through pardon. And this is opposed to the sin unto death, which is against the Holy Spirit. For a sin proceeding from ignorance or infirmity, which is said to be against the Father or against the Son, is a venial sin in this way.

§ 24. To the argument, however, it must be said that venial and mortal are not diverse species of sin: and seek the proof of this around the end of the second book of the Sentences.

§ 25. If nevertheless this is not done, then it seems it must be said here that a mortal sin is not changed into a venial sin, insofar as "venial" is called another species of sin, dividing sin with mortal; but the mortal sin is destroyed, and no venial sin succeeds it: but because the guilt (reatus) is not entirely destroyed, rather the debt of temporal punishment remains, therefore it is said to be changed into venial: and this is venial from the outcome. And it is similar to if someone, by the grace of the judge or the senate, is absolved from the judgment of death, and it is commuted for him into a judgment of the satisfaction of money or of something else.

Articulus 56 — Whether God Uses Justice Alone, Or Also Mercy In Condemnation

Whether God uses justice alone, or also mercy in condemnation?

Whether God uses justice alone, or also mercy in condemnation?

§ 26. Next it is asked about what he says, there, D, before the end: For justice alone condemns, etc.

§ 27. Against: 1. Immediately below he says, that he preserves mercy in justice, and justice in mercy: therefore it seems that justice alone does not condemn.

§ 28. 2. Furthermore, the Saints commonly say that in every divine work there is mercy and truth: and the Master will prove this below: therefore what is said here seems false.

§ 29. Further it is asked about what he immediately adds: And since shame is a great punishment, he who blushes for Christ becomes worthy of mercy.

§ 30. For according to this it seems that the first grace falls under the merit of the one receiving it: because to blush at our sins is in our power: and this was proven to be false at the end of the first book of the Sentences, and also in the second book.

§ 31. Response. It must be said to the first, that the Master here recites the words of Augustine, who speaks under a certain hypothesis, namely that if God were to use justice alone towards sinners, then indeed it would be true that He would condemn all: and this without doubt seems to be the meaning of the Letter. Others, however, solve this otherwise, namely that in punishing God principally uses justice: and that mercy precedes, or as it were follows, because it is not mercy liberating in whole, but as it were relaxing something of the punishment: and it does not impede justice, but as it were holds it back lest it avenge upon the sinner as much as he merited: and therefore the whole is attributed to justice. But the first solution speaks the truth of the Letter, not the second.

§ 32. To that which is further asked, it must be said that the first grace does not fall under the merit of condignity (meritum condigni), as far as the one who receives it is concerned, but under the merit of congruity (meritum congrui); for it is congruous that he who has prepared himself to receive grace through attrition, confession, and the flush of shame should receive grace. Grace, however, falls rather under the merit of another, than of the receiver: because one can well merit the first grace for another, although the same cannot merit it for himself. And this was disputed above in the treatise on reprobation.

Articulus 57 — Whether It Is Always Necessary To Confess To One's Own Priest

Whether it is always necessary to confess to one's own priest?

§ 33. Next it is asked about what he says, there, D, towards the end: For confession suffices, which is first offered to God, etc.

§ 34. For it seems from this, that it is necessary to always confess to one's own priest. 1. Let us suppose therefore, that I probably know that he would reveal the confession, then I will fall into the improbable custom which is condemned here.

§ 35. 2. Furthermore, let us suppose that someone has fornicated with the daughter or sister or mother or concubine of the priest, and he probably knows that if he were to tell him in confession, he would always hate him: it seems that then it would not behoove him to confess because he will scandalize him.

§ 36. 3. Furthermore, let us suppose that a woman must confess, and she probably estimates that the priest will incline her to evil through prayers or an unchaste touch, it seems that in such a case she ought not to confess.

§ 37. Response. It must be said that in all these cases, if he can conveniently do so, he ought to recur to a superior, or someone who has the power of a superior. But if he cannot because of the danger of the road, or the quality of her sex, because perhaps she is a woman, and she fears being corrupted on the road: she ought to ask this through another, that license be granted to her to confess to another, lest the order which is in the prelates of the Church be contemned. But if she cannot even do this, which nevertheless rarely happens: then under the hope of ratification, by the fact that the superior ought not to deny such license, she can confess to another until she comes into the presence of the superior, and can obtain license.

§ 38. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 39. I also say the same concerning an ignorant priest or one not knowing how to distinguish between venial and mortal.

§ 40. But in this chapter above it was treated of shame and blushing, and therefore we ask nothing here about it: and above it has been disputed much about it, and let it be sought there.

Articulus 58 — Whether Someone Can Confess To His Companion, And To What That Confession Avails

Whether someone can confess to his companion, and what is that confession worth?

§ 41. Next we must transition to that chapter E, Now before to the premised authorities, etc.

§ 42. And it must be asked first concerning what he says, there, after the beginning: But is it equally valuable for someone to confess to a companion? etc.

§ 43. Secondly, whether that confession is a sacrament, or not?

§ 44. To the first, it is thus objected: 1. Confession is made for the sake of absolution: but a layman does not have the power of absolving: therefore confession made to a layman seems to be worth nothing.

§ 45. 2. Furthermore, a part of the punishment is remitted by the virtue of the keys: but a layman does not have the keys: therefore it seems that confession made to him confers nothing.

§ 46. 3. Furthermore, the reconciliation of the Church is done through a minister of the Church: but a layman is not a minister of the Church: therefore it ought not to be made to a layman.

§ 47. But because many things have been held concerning this, let these suffice.

§ 48. Solution. It must be said, however, to the objection, that a confession made to a layman is valid, where an article of necessity, not a contempt of religion, excludes one's own or another priest.

§ 49. To the objections, however, our fathers in this science have responded, saying that the power of absolving is manifold. For there is the power of absolving from authority which is of God. And there is the power of superexcellence: and this belongs to Christ as man, who absolved penitent sinners without confession made outwardly, and without the exaction of a taxed satisfaction. The third power is from the merit of life, and the suffrages of prayers: and this belongs to the saints in the Church, by which one merits for another the first grace by which he absolves from sins. But another power is from the office of ministers, conceded to priests. And the last is from the unity of faith and charity, and this descends for the article of necessity into every man for coming to the aid of his neighbor: and the layman has this power in the article of necessity, and similarly a woman.

§ 50. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 59 — Whether A Confession Made To A Lay Companion Is A Sacrament

Whether a confession made to a lay companion is a sacrament?

Whether a confession made to a lay companion is a sacrament?

§ 51. Secondly it is asked, whether this confession is a sacrament?

§ 52. And it seems that it is not: because 1. Every sacrament is in the dispensation of the ministers of the Church: but this man is not a minister of the Church: therefore it is not a sacrament.

§ 53. 2. Furthermore, the power of the keys precedes the form of absolution which is a sacrament: but this layman does not have the keys: therefore he does not give a sacrament.

§ 54. To the contrary is that baptism, by whomever it is given, is a sacrament: therefore similarly penance, as it seems.

§ 55. Solution. It must be said that the ancients said that contrition and confession are not a sacrament, but absolution alone. But it will be proven below in the Letter that this is nothing. Whence it must be said that it has the sacrament of confession.

§ 56. To the first therefore it must be said that the minister is twofold, namely true, and there is a vicar, and such a vicar minister suffices here for the article of necessity.

§ 57. To the next [it must be said] that absolution through the keys is that in which true confession abounds over a confession made in necessity: but nevertheless there is a certain absolution here, namely that which is done by the merit of the unity of the Church. Therefore although it may not attain as much effect as if he were to confess to a priest, nevertheless it attains absolution in common, and for this the power of the keys is not necessary, where a priest cannot be had.

Articulus 60 — What Kind Of Priest Is To Be Sought, And What Are The Conditions Of The Confessing Priest

What kind of priest is to be sought? And, what are the conditions of a confessing priest?

§ 58. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, after the beginning: But let everyone take care to seek a priest who knows how to bind and loose.

§ 59. For it seems that there is no such person: because some things in the genus of sins are so perplexed that even great clerics can scarcely untangle them through the greatest distinctions, and many doubts still remain after their discussion: therefore it seems that such a one can scarcely or never be found.

§ 60. Further it is asked here concerning the conditions of a confessor priest, which some express in verse:

A confessor sweet, affable, and smooth, Prudent, discreet, mild, pious, and benign.

For such a one is scarcely ever found, who has all these things in himself.

§ 61. Besides, these conditions do not seem to be necessary, but rather only those which contribute to the act of confession: but these are to discern things heard, and to extract hidden things, and to medicate salubriously the things found: therefore it seems that no more is required in the one hearing confessions: for the discerning of things heard is done through the science of discerning between leprosy and non-leprosy, while the extraction of hidden things is done through discreet inquiry, and the medication of found wounds is done through a discreet injunction of penance or satisfaction.

§ 62. Solution. It must be said that a priest is not bound to know how to discern except in common, namely which are the common capital mortal sins, and which are venial from their genus: and this is very easy. For the doubt which happens among the wise, whether something is venial or mortal, happens from an incoming morose delectation, or from contempt, or the like, and not from the genus of the act. He who knows those things which have been said, therefore, is sufficient or is reputed so for the necessity of this time for hearing confessions. But nevertheless I think that one not knowing these things sins mortally in hearing confessions, and the one instituting him sins even more than he does. And the one permitting the instituted one to minister also sins mortally, if it is his concern to prohibit such a one.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that the Masters do not posit only the conditions of a confessor from the disposition toward the act of hearing confession, but also those which can lead and attract men to confessing: and therefore they do not belong to the essence (de esse) of the confessor as he is a confessor, but rather to his well-being (de bene esse): but the three mentioned are those without which he cannot be without sin.

Articulus 61 — Whether For One Willing To Confess, But Prevented By Death, The Vow Is Reckoned For The Deed

Whether for one willing to confess, but prevented by death, the vow is reputed for the deed?

§ 64. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, before the middle: Lest since he existed negligent concerning himself, etc.

§ 65. For let there be two, each of whom has an equal vow of confessing, and one dies unconfessed, because prevented by necessity he could not have a priest: but the other confesses to a priest: and in all other things they are equal: it is asked therefore which will be liberated sooner, and will fly away?

§ 66. But it seems that equally: because the vow is reputed by God for the deed, who looks at the heart: therefore one flies away just as quickly as the other.

§ 67. Against: Something is bestowed upon one from the power of the keys, which the other does not receive: therefore it seems that by reason of that, he will also fly away sooner.

§ 68. Response. It must be said that the one having confessed to the priest flies away sooner, just as the last objection proves.

§ 69. To the first therefore it must be said that the vow is reputed for the deed in all things which ought to be done by himself, and as to substantial merit: but as to those things which are done through another, it is impossible that the vow be reputed for the deed: but there is a diminution of punishment through the keys which are in the ministry of the priest, and by the virtue of the passion of Christ: and therefore in that the vow is not reputed for the deed: but the diminution of punishment is neither of substantial merit, nor of substantial reward. And in such things exterior works avail more than the will: and as to this they are unequal.

Articulus 62 — Whether Different Solicitude Ought To Be Had With Respect To Penitents

Whether a diverse solicitude is to be had regarding penitents?

§ 70. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, around the middle: He raised her inside, whom he found inside, etc.

§ 71. For it is asked here concerning the diverse solicitude of priests to be had regarding penitents.

§ 72. 1. For the one dead inside is he whose sin lies hidden within himself, or in the heart alone: but he is raised through penance: therefore something of an exterior work ought not to be enjoined upon him, but only something hidden: therefore those enjoining fasts, alms, pilgrimages, and the like sin, which is false.

§ 73. Furthermore, the presence of the three disciples, namely of Peter, James, and John, imports something. But it seems from this that a priest could admit with himself to hear hidden confessions good persons who can benefit and not hinder, so that they may pray for the penitent. And this is condemned by the Church: for it is not licit for a priest to admit anyone to the hearing of anyone's confession.

§ 74. 2. Furthermore, from the raising of the second dead person it seems that confession and the injunction of penance ought to be made in the presence of a multitude: therefore it seems that everyone who has manifestly sinned ought to manifestly confess, and undergo public penance: and this also is not read.

§ 75. 3. Also, it is objected concerning the third who was raised by the cry of the Lord, in which it seems to be signified that the sin of the obstinate must be cried out into the ears even of those not knowing: and this is most false: therefore it seems that these three things are badly brought forward regarding the deed of priests in hearing confessions.

§ 76. Response. It must be said that the girl of whom Matthew speaks (9:23 ff.) and Mark (5:37 ff.), who was raised inside, in truth signified hidden sin: but that the disciples were admitted was done for the sake of the disciples who were future priests and doctors, and for the instruction of priests, so that in a figure by detecting the mystery they might learn to veil the hidden sins of men.

§ 77. But as to what is objected concerning hidden and manifest penance, it must be said that manifest penance is spoken of in two ways, namely either that which is manifest as the penance of such a sin, or that which is manifest, not as penance, but as a meritorious deed undertaken from devotion from the stole of the priest. And in the first way indeed, a manifest penance ought never to be imposed for a hidden sin, because this would be in some way to betray the confession. But in the other way a manifest penance can be done, because from this no sin is detected: since even without the confession of sins such works are often undertaken by the faithful from the stole of the priests.

§ 78. Nevertheless some say that the virtues which ought to be in priests are morally signified by the three disciples: by James the constancy of the fight against the devil, that he may snatch away the sheep committed to him: by Peter power and knowledge: and by John grace in the bowels of mercy: and we do not care for this, because this is a place of disputing more than of preaching.

§ 79. To the next it must be said that a public sin, which has drawn all or many into scandal, ought to be punished by a public penance, as was held above in the authority of Augustine in this same distinction. So that if his sin is not only in his grave evil, but also in so great a scandal of others, and this seems to the Bishop to be expedient for the utility of the Church, he should not refuse to do penance into the notice of many or of the whole people.

§ 80. To the objection, however, it must be said that this is not to publish the confession, but rather to punish the sin with a condign emendation: so that just as he de-edified the Church by sinning publicly, so he may emend it by publicly satisfying.

§ 81. To the next it must be said that the cry does not signify public proclamation, but rather a devout postulation of suffrage from God, and a petition of intercession from the Church, which is signified by the crowd led to the tomb. The gate, however, in which the youth is raised signifies the opening of the notice of those whom he scandalized.

Articulus 63 — Whether One Excommunicated By The Church And Not By God Is To Be Avoided

Whether one excommunicated by the Church, and not by God, is to be avoided?

Whether one excommunicated by the Church, and not by God, is to be avoided?

§ 82. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, before the end: Let no one seek priests divided from the unity of the Church by any fault, etc.

§ 83. The Church seems often to err by excommunicating those who are not excommunicated: if therefore such a one is sought who is not excommunicated as regards God, but as regards the Church, it seems that he ought not to harm the penitent.

§ 84. Solution. It must be said that by the very fact that he knows him to be divided, he begins to harm if he seeks him: because God approves and commands that man should judge according to the face, because faith cannot be made to man except from the face. Whence although the Church may err, nevertheless God approves that this man conduct himself as excommunicated, and that others avoid him. And he who does not wish to avoid him contemns the bond of the Church, and therefore sins. And yet the Letter seems to excuse them from the objection: because it says, by some fault, etc., but if he is divided from the Church even without real fault, but only for an opined fault, then the first solution has place.

Articulus 64 — Whether We Are Bound To Confess Venial Sins, And Whether The Confession Of Those Things That Have Been Said Is To Be Repeated

Whether we are bound to confess venial sins? And, whether the confession of those things which were said is to be reiterated?

§ 85. Next it is asked about what he says, there, E, before the end: To coequals daily and light things, etc.

§ 86. For it seems that we are not bound to the confession of venial sins: because 1. Those are what escape our notice, concerning which it is said: Who understands his offenses? therefore it seems that we are not bound, because it is impossible to confess the unknown.

§ 87. 2. Furthermore, venial and mortal have no proportion: therefore neither do their medicines: but some medicine is confession for a mortal sin: therefore there will be none for a venial sin.

§ 88. Although it has been held and solved concerning this above, that, as I think, we are not bound to the confession of venial sins except in general, namely by the confession of Prime and Compline and before the altar: nevertheless for two cases we begin to be obligated as much as we can, namely because it is not very certain what is venial, what is mortal on our part, although in genus it is easy to distinguish: and the second case is for the sake of security.

§ 89. To that, however, which is first objected, it must be said that we are not bound as to the unknown ones, but we are bound to confess the known ones in the predicted way, and in no other, unless it is doubtful to us how great they are on account of adherence and custom.

§ 90. To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if mortal and venial sin are improportionable, that their medicines are improportionable: because on the part of the aversion some sins are improportionable, but on the part of the conversion they are proportionable: and the medicine of penance regards them on the part of the conversion, not of the aversion, as was held above in the question on satisfaction, and in the question of how a venial sin becomes mortal.

F. Here he opens how the abovesaid authorities are to be understood.

§ 91. Since therefore from these and many other testimonies it becomes perspicuous and is indubitably established that sins are to be confessed first to God, then to the priest: and if he is lacking, even to a companion: that statement of John Chrysostom placed above is not to be understood so that it is licit for anyone, if he has time, not to confess to a priest: but because it suffices where a crime is hidden, to speak to God alone through a priest, and once. Nor does it behoove what is hidden to be published in the presence of many. Which he noted saying: I do not say to you that you betray yourself in public. For just as a public harm needs a public remedy, so also a hidden one is purged by a secret confession and a hidden satisfaction. Nor is it necessary that what we have confessed once to a priest, we confess again: but we ought to continually confess it by the tongue of the heart, not of the flesh, before the true judge. Whence likewise John says: But now if you remember your sins, and frequently pronounce them in the sight of God, and pray for them, you will more quickly destroy them. But if you forget them, then you will remember them unwillingly, when they will be published, and brought forth in the sight of all friends and enemies, and of the holy Angels. Thus also that statement of Ambrose: Tears wash the offense, which it is a shame to confess with the voice: is to be referred to public penance. For there, showing the virtue of tears and of confession, he wished to signify that hidden tears and a secret confession, such as that which is made to a priest alone, wash the offense which shames someone to confess publicly. But because he says that he has read of Peter's tears, not of his satisfaction or confession: he does not exclude those by this. For many things were done which are not written: and perhaps the institution of confession, which now exists, was not yet made. Similarly also that statement of Prosper: If they become judges of themselves, they will commute eternal punishments. And that statement: They will more easily placate God for themselves, who either betray their crime by their own confessions, or, while others are ignorant, bring a sentence of excommunication against themselves: behooves to be referred to public confession and satisfaction. For the right of binding and loosing is not given to priests alone, if it is licit for anyone by his own judgment to bind himself with a penalty or a sentence of excommunication, and to reconcile himself to God or the altar without priestly judgment: which is thoroughly repugnant to ecclesiastical institution and custom. Rather therefore if you have sinned publicly, publicly confess yourself guilty, and emend it. But if you have offended hiddenly, even so you should not remain silent: nor yet do I say that you should publish it. For the taciturnity of a sin is born from the pride of the heart. For someone conceals his sin for this reason, lest he be reputed outwardly such as he has already exhibited himself to the divine sight: which is born from the fountain of pride. For it is a species of pride to wish oneself to seem just who is a sinner: and he is convicted as a hypocrite who, in the likeness of the first parents, either contends to lighten his sins by a tergiversation of words, or like Cain seeks to suppress his sins by remaining silent. Where therefore pride reigns and hypocrisy, humility has no place. But without humility it is not licit for anyone to hope for pardon. Where therefore there is the taciturnity of confession, the pardon of the crime is not to be hoped for. Now it is most certainly clear how detestable is the silence of a sin, and conversely how necessary is confession. For confession is the testimony of a conscience fearing God. For he who fears the judgment of God, does not blush to confess his sin. Perfect fear looses all shame: the confession of a sin has shame, and blushing itself is a grave punishment. And therefore we are commanded to confess sins, so that we may suffer blushing for a punishment: for this itself is a part of the divine judgment.

§ 92. If therefore it is asked, whether confession is necessary, since the sin has already been destroyed in contrition? We say that it is a certain punishing of the sin, just as the satisfaction of a work. Through confession the priest also understands how he ought to judge concerning the crime. Through it also the sinner becomes more humble and more cautious.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

§ 93. Next that chapter F is to be taken up, Since therefore from these and others, etc.

§ 94. And it must be asked concerning what he says, there, Nor is it necessary that what we have confessed once to a priest, we confess again, etc.

§ 95. For let us suppose that he has suffered a relapse: for then it behooves him to confess again: therefore what he says is false.

§ 96. Response. He does not speak of this case:

§ 1. ...but rather when someone fulfills the enjoined penance.

§ 2. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at F, before the end: Which is born from the fount of pride, etc.

§ 3. For according to this, pride seems to be the fount of other evils: which is against the Apostle, in 1 Timothy 6:10, where it is said: The root of all evils is cupidity.[606]

§ 4. And the solution to this should be sought in the second book of the Sentences, where the roots of sins are disputed.

§ 5. Let these things suffice for this distinction.

DISTINCTIO XVIII

Divisio Textus

§ 6. Here it is usually asked, if sin entirely, etc. Here, confession is treated on the part of the one absolving, namely on the part of the priest's power.

§ 7. Moreover, it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he treats of the power of the keys, and their essence and use. And in the second, concerning the keys on the part of the one receiving the keys, there, Distinction XIX, A, After it has been shown, etc.

§ 8. Further, the first is subdivided into three par-

Articulus 1 — Whether Some Keys In The Church Are Necessary

-ts: in the first of which he treats of the power of binding and loosing in the penitential forum; in the second, concerning the power of binding in the forum of causes, there, G, § 2: There is also another mode of binding and loosing, etc. In the third, indeed, he adapts the words of the Gospel to these two, there, H, According to these modes of binding and loosing, etc.

§ 2. Further, the first of these has three parts. For first it is asked, whether there is a key? Second it is asked, what and how many they are? there, B, Those keys are not corporeal, etc. Third, he treats of their use, etc., there, C, The use of these keys, etc.

Whether any keys are necessary in the Church?

§ 3. Moreover, according to these three things we will also inquire concerning the keys.

§ 4. First, upon the first chapter by reason of that word which he says: Where are those keys, etc., we will ask: Whether there are keys?

§ 5. Now, it seems that there are not: because: 1. Fault (culpa) and penalty (poena) are annexed: therefore, one remitting the fault necessarily absolves from the penalty: therefore, keys are not necessary: and if they are not necessary, they do not exist, because nothing is in vain in the works of grace: therefore, it seems that there are no keys.

§ 6. 2. Further, the power of contrition often looses the whole before every act of the priest: but the acts of the priest are in the keys: therefore, keys are not necessary.

§ 7. 3. If perhaps you should wish to say that in contrition the whole fault is relaxed, but not the whole penalty: and the key remits a part of the penalty. On the contrary: That which is dismissive of the greater is also capable of the lesser: but contrition looses the eternal penalty: therefore, it can also remit the temporal part of the penalty which remains: therefore, the key is given uselessly: because it is better done by one what is done by two, provided it can be done by one, as the Philosopher wills.

606. Ps. 18:13.

§ 8. 3. [sic] Further, someone is not a debtor to a penalty except from a fault: if therefore nothing remains of the fault, nothing seems to remain of the penalty: but after contrition nothing remains of the fault: therefore nothing remains of the penalty: therefore the key is given uselessly.

§ 9. 4. Further, this is proved by a simile: because if whiteness is not made in something, except what is caused in the whiteness of milk, either by the hot or the cold: if nothing remains of the cause of whiteness, nothing will remain of the whiteness: but it is certain that one is a debtor of no penalty, except from fault as from a cause: therefore if nothing of the fault remains after contrition, nothing of the penalty remains: and from this it follows as before, that the keys are useless.

§ 10. 5. If perhaps you should wish to say, as Master Hugh of St. Victor says to Bernard inquiring about this question, that the bond by which a sinner is bound from sin is manifold, namely, of obduracy, of diabolical captivity, of servitude which compels giving the usury of eternal death, and of obligation to confession. And from the first four indeed God absolves by Himself, binding to the fifth, from which He absolves through the priest by binding to one, namely, the penalty of expiation to be carried out in satisfaction: for he says that He looses from the bond of obduracy by the softening of the heart to penance: moreover, from the bond of diabolical captivity by which he is held lest he be able to rise by himself, He absolves by the aid of uplifting prevenient grace: moreover, from the bond of servitude by the aid of cooperating grace, by which he can work good things: but from the bond of eternal death by absolution from the guilt of eternal penalty. If, I say, you should say thus: I ask first, what necessity does God have to loose from the four said bonds by binding to a fifth? For since it is said, in Deuteronomy 32:4: The works of God are perfect,[607] it seems to be a more perfect work of God if in nothing he should remain bound, than that He absolves from four, and binds to a fifth bond.

§ 1. 6. But further, the work of God seems to be conditioned, in this namely, that He does not absolve this one unless he be obligated to confession: but a condition induces doubt and time: therefore the work of God seems rather to be subject to doubt and temporality: and every wise person reputes this the greatest absurdity: for the work of no one is certain, if the work of the intemporal and eternal God is rather uncertain and temporal.

§ 2. IF PERHAPS on account of this you say that these are not the keys of the Church. On the contrary:

§ 3. 1. Matthew 16:19, it is said: To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, etc.[608] Therefore priests have the keys.

§ 4. 2. Further, the entrance to paradise signifies the entrance to the Church: but I see that that entrance is closed by the power of a ministering Angel: therefore the entrance to the sacraments of the Church ought also to be closed by the power of the ministers of the Church: but that power is called a key: therefore the keys are in the ministers of the Church.

§ 5. Moreover, many other authorities are adduced for this in the Letter: and therefore let these suffice.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that without ambiguity there are keys of the Church, which the Church has (as Jerome says) in its Bishops and priests: by which not only the sacraments, but also heaven is opened to the worthy, and is closed to the unworthy.

§ 7. Moreover, concerning the solution of the objections, it must be said to the first that the key opens the kingdom in two ways, by working toward the removal of the impeding sin: and one mode is often stated, and it is a good one, namely when someone is contrite, his sorrow has power from informing grace, and from the vow of confessing and satisfying, which he has in his purpose. Therefore, just as it is in composite medicines, which expel the whole disease, in such a way, however, that any simple medicine placed therein operates against some part of the disease and its cause: so I say that in sin there is fault and penalty, and there is an eternal penalty disproportionate to the powers of the penitent, and harsh in proportion to the debt of the guilt: and grace indeed has an effect against the fault, and sorrow against the harshness of the penalty: but the sorrow of the passion of Christ against its eternity: and the vow of submitting oneself to the keys having power from the passion, has the power to loose that disproportion, by which it is greater than the powers of the penitent: and the vow of satisfying sometimes looses the whole remainder, but sometimes it is loosed through subsequent satisfaction in act. Whence nothing prohibits the key from operating before the outward act of the priest: just as the grace of the mediator also operated before He was a mediator in nature by true mediation. In another way, the key operates in the absolution of confession by dismissing a part of the owed penalty through the grace of the ministry of the priests of Christ, which is not to be believed to lack grace, but rather to possess grace maximally. Although therefore penalty and fault are loosed in contrition, this is not done, however, by the power of contrition alone, but rather also by the power of the keys: just as although some disease is loosed in a medicine, yet this is not done by the virtue of one of the ingredients received in the medicine, but by the virtue of each one something of the disease is loosed.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the power of contrition never looses the whole in such a way that its effect is not there, as is evident through what has been said before: and also he is bound to submit himself in act afterwards, because otherwise, through contempt of religion, he would begin to be as malignant as before.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that sometimes the whole penalty is dismissed in contrition, but never by the power of contrition alone: and therefore so that the vow which he had in contrition, and which he was bound to have, may be fulfilled, he ought also to submit himself afterwards to the confessor and to satisfaction: but it is true that if the priest knew such a person to be absolved in his vow, he would not impose upon him a penance in satisfaction for past things: but he would either impose none, just as the Lord did not for Mary Magdalene: or if he were to impose something, he would do this as a medicine for future things, just as preservative medicines are given: but because the priest cannot know this, therefore he enjoins penance for all venial sins.

607. Matthew 16:19.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Definition Of A Key Set Forth By The Master Is Well Given

§ 1. To the next it must be said that it is otherwise in an effect and cause conjoined by nature, and a cause and effect conjoined by will in the behavior of man: for in nature on account of this, when the whole cause is loosed, the whole effect is loosed, because nature acts by necessity: and therefore when the agent is removed, nothing remains of its effect. But in the will, because the will is deliberative, it falls into blame and praise from its work: and therefore when the cause passes, the effect does not pass, but rather remains: just as when fault passes in act, it does not pass in guilt (reatus), but rather remains. And similarly as to the debt of satisfying, it can well remain in whole after the recession of the fault. Whence such arguments in morals, even speaking civilly, are worth nothing, as has already become clear.

§ 2. To that which is objected concerning Hugh, it must be said that in truth that is the whole science of that little book, and it is understood, not such that the Lord looses conditionally, but the Lord absolves simply: nevertheless because in contrition there is a vow of confession, and without that there would be no contrition, on account of this he is bound to confession. And because the vow is conjoined to the absolution from the four said bonds, therefore Master Hugh says that God absolves by binding: but the priest conversely binds by loosing: for by binding to the penance of expiation he absolves from the vow of confession, by dismissing a part of the owed penalty if any remained after contrition. And through this it is clear that in the work of God, according as it is of God, there is no condition, nor temporality, but the necessity of that obligation is from the vow of confessing and satisfying at the arbitration of the ministers of the Church, without which there cannot be true contrition.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the last is clear.

§ 4. TO THE THIRD, however, it must again be said that although all things are equally possible for Him, yet not all things are equally useful for us: for it is useful for us that we be bound by such vows on account of shame and expiation, which not only avail for the expiation of past things, but also as a caution against future things. And whatever things are more useful for us, these God has ordained in the sacraments.

Whether the definition of the key posited by the Master is well given?

Whether the definition of the key posited by the Master is well given?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, Those keys are not corporeal, but spiritual, etc.

§ 2. And four things are asked, namely: What is a key? Second, How many keys are there in number? Third, Concerning the key which is called the science of discerning. And fourth, Concerning the key which is called the power of binding and loosing.

608. Matthew 16:19.

§ 3. As to the first, moreover, let the definition of a key be extracted from the Letter, where from the words of Jerome the Master says, that the keys are the science of discerning, and the power of judging, that is, of binding and loosing: by which the ecclesiastical judge ought to receive the worthy, and exclude the unworthy from the kingdom. All these words are also in the Gloss on Matthew 16:19, and they are of Jerome.

§ 4. Now, the definition is formed in common thus: A key is the power of the ecclesiastical judge, by which he receives the worthy, but can exclude the unworthy from the kingdom.

§ 5. 1. Since however an ecclesiastical judge is from jurisdiction, not from order, it seems that he does not have the keys, unless having jurisdiction in the forum of causes: and this is false.

§ 6. 2. This seems also by another reason: because every power which is entirely perfected by some one thing, when that is had, it can be reduced to act: if therefore the power which is called a key were perfected from that one thing which is the sacerdotal order, with the sacerdotal order having been had, it could be reduced to effect: which is false, because according to this all monk-priests could absolve and bind, which is false: therefore it seems that the ecclesiastical judge is the one having jurisdiction. From this it is argued as before.

§ 7. 3. Furthermore, it is objected concerning what he says, By which to receive the worthy, etc. For the worthy, by the very fact that they are worthy, are received by the merit of their dignity: and therefore they are uselessly received afterwards by the priest, or are in no way received.

§ 8. But if you say that to receive them is to show them as received: then according to this the power of the key would be nothing except in relation to men, which will be shown below to be incongruous.

§ 9. 4. Furthermore, it is objected concerning what he says there, From the kingdom: because the power of man seems not to be over the kingdom. PROOF. The power of man in ministry is over that which is handed over to the dispensation of his ministry: but only the sacraments are handed over to the ministry of priests to be dispensed, and not the kingdom: therefore it seems that he ought not to say, from the kingdom, but from the sacraments.

§ 10. Response. It must be said that that definition is optimal: because in it is posited the genus, which is power, and the proper subject of that power, which is the ecclesiastical judge: and the differences pertaining to the special and substantial act, which is to receive the worthy, and to exclude the unworthy: and the end intended through all things, which is the introduction into the kingdom.

§ 11. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that the ecclesiastical judge is taken here in the penitential forum, and not in the forum of causes, unless the power is enlarged for him: and it is not necessary that he have jurisdiction over subjects, but that he be apt to have it from order, and that nothing be lacking to him except the commission: for the act is not posited in the definition by saying, by which he receives: but, by which he avails or can receive, so that the faculty from the habit is noted: and the fact that he does not operate, is only because he does not have the subjected matter, which he cannot have except through jurisdiction.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that, the order being had, nothing is lacking as to the one operating: and therefore no perfection is added to the one operating...

Articulus 3 — How Many Keys There Are

§ 1. ...more than the order: and this is evident from the fact that if a people is committed to a priest, he does not receive any consecration on account of this. Now it is certain that all power is given through consecration in spiritual things: and therefore it is evident that he who has the order is entirely perfected insofar as it is from the part of the agent: but because every faculty demands matter, it is suspended from operation for as long as the matter is not determined for him through jurisdiction.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that the worthy become more worthy: for the dignification of God precedes, removing the indignity of the fault: and the work of the order and the key follows, removing something of the indignity of the penalty: and therefore they not only show them to be loosed by God, but they also absolve from something by which they came bound, and thus imbue them with the sacraments.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the ultimate end of the act of the order is posited: because reconciliation to the sacraments does not occur except on account of the kingdom.

§ 4. Moreover, to the argument it must be said that the ministry of the priest is not over the kingdom immediately, but through a medium, namely through reception to the sacraments: and in this way it is well committed to them to dispense the kingdom.

How many keys are there?

§ 5. Second it is asked, How many keys are there in number?

§ 6. For it seems that there is only one: 1. For the Gloss on Matthew 16:19 says that the keys are the science of discerning, and the power of binding and loosing: but the science of discerning is certain to be informing and directing toward the act of loosing and binding: and such things, of which one is directing and the other executing, are not two, but one in act: therefore the keys are not two, but one.

§ 7. 2. Further, in us three things are required for a perfect work, namely to know, to will, and to be able: and yet the work going forth from these is one: now it is certain that the science of judging holds itself as 'to know' in us: therefore it seems that there is one key according to act, and one act of the key.

§ 8. 3. Further, in material things there is only one key to one lock: but in all spiritual things there is only one lock which is sin in common: therefore it seems that only one key is required: and thus it seems that there are not two keys.

§ 9. Also, of one effect there is only one power: but the effect is one, namely to bind and loose: therefore there is only one power: therefore one key.

§ 10. FURTHERMORE it seems that there are two keys: because: 1. Thus it is proved in the Letter through many authorities both of the Bible and of the holy Fathers: and let those suffice.

§ 11. 2. Through reason the same is argued thus: There are two things in free choice making a sin, namely reason and will: but the one committing sin is closed off by the sin so that he may not enter the kingdom: therefore each requires an unlocking: since therefore these differ between themselves, it seems that the keys unlocking them differ: but these are two different things: therefore the two keys unlocking them will differ.

§ 12. 3. Further, sin impedes the cognitive in one way, and the affective in another: because it impedes the cognitive like an interior spiritual darkness: but it impedes the affect through a downward inclination, and aversion from the incommutable good: but it is certain that whatever is in the rational soul is reduced to these two: therefore it seems that with these loosed, all other things are absolved: but the cognitive is bound in one way, and the affective in another: therefore they require different unlocking principles: since therefore they are two, it seems that the unlocking principles are two.

§ 13. 4. Further, and it is more to the point: The work of the priest in confession where he uses...

§ 1. ...a key, is twofold, namely the drawing out of the sin, and the absolution of the guilty: as is evident through that of Job 26:13: By His obstetricating hand the tortuous serpent is drawn out: behold the first work.[609] And, John 20:23: Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them: behold the second work.[610] Now it is certain that each work requires a power in the priest, because every work goes forth from some power: but the drawing out of the sin is not done except through the judgment of discretion, which shows how vile the sin is, how detestable, how much one is viler than another, and such things: therefore for this act the key of the science of discerning is required. Now it is certain that after contrition follows the absolution or retention of sins: and this work similarly is not done except by some power which is called a key. Therefore, since there are not many substantial works, except this one over the sin, and the other over the sinner, it seems that there are two and not more keys. Now this objection is to be noted: because it concludes the truth from proper things, and from those things according to which the definition of the keys is properly taken.

§ 2. HOWEVER it seems furthermore that there are three keys: because 1. There are three persons from whom all sacramental power flows: but one of them is according to what is appropriated to the Father, namely the power of binding and loosing: another is according to what is appropriated to the Son, namely the science of discerning: therefore there remains yet a third according to what is appropriated to the Holy Spirit.

§ 3. 2. Further, in every rational creature free to act, three things concur for a work, namely to know, to will, and to be able: therefore since a key is taken according to two of them, it seems that by the same reason one key is taken according to the third: therefore there will be three keys.

§ 4. 3. Further, to know and to be able are imperfect for an act: but if willing should supervene, then they will operate. Since therefore a key is a most perfect power for an act, it seems that necessarily there ought to be something there corresponding to the operating will: and besides that there are two: therefore with that one there will be three, as it seems.

§ 5. Furthermore it seems that there are four; 1. For every mode of opening or absolving requires a different instrument: but four modes of binding and loosing are determined by the Master in the Letter: therefore there will be four instruments: therefore four keys: for he says that he looses and binds, when he demonstrates someone to be absolved or bound. Also, when he reconciles and restores to the Church, and when he dismisses a part of the penalty, and when he bears excommunication, or absolves from it.

§ 6. 2. Further, when the Lord speaks to Peter concerning the keys, He names not only the keys of the kingdom of heaven, but also the gates of hell: if therefore there are two for the gates of the kingdom, by the same reason there will be two for the gates of hell: therefore there will be four.

§ 7. 3. Further, it seems that there are more than four: because there are the gates of hell, of paradise, of limbo, of purgatory, and of heaven: but it is certain that all these gates are opened: therefore it seems that they exercise distinct and determinate keys: therefore since two keys are adapted to one gate, it seems that at the least there are ten keys.

§ 8. RESPONSE. It must be said that, as is had in Isaiah 22:22, where it is said: I will give the key of the house of David upon his shoulder: and he shall open, and there shall be none to shut: and he shall shut, and there shall be none to open.[611] The Son of God is the true key of the kingdom of heaven, because He Himself unlocked for us the entrance of the kingdom, which Adam by his sin had shut off: whence it is read in the Easter prayer: Almighty God, who through Thine Only-begotten, our Redeemer, having conquered death, hast unlocked for us the entrance of eternity. Now in the divine Son there are two things, as is said, in 1 Corinthians 1:24, namely, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.[612] And therefore because He Himself unlocked the kingdom with these two, He gave to His priests the power of unlocking in these two. And according to these two, two keys are taken.

§ 1. Now to this reason let the three be conjoined which are posited in the three objections adduced for this part, and especially the third: and there will be four according to which the two keys which the Saints speak of are distinguished.

§ 2. To that therefore which is first objected, that there is only one key: it must be said that the keys are not distinguished according to the ultimate end, but rather according to the proximate, substantial, and necessary acts. Now it is certain that a necessary act is the distinction of sins in confession, which is over the sins: and also a necessary act is absolution. And therefore according to those, although one directs to the other, there are nevertheless two keys. And it is similar: because although the virtue of prudence is the charioteer of the virtues, as Bernard says to Eugene, and directs the others, nevertheless because it has a proper act, it is called and is one cardinal virtue distinct from the others which it directs.

609. 1 Timothy 2:4.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that those three which are in us, although they refer to one ultimate act, nevertheless have proper and proximate acts that are different, according to which they are also distinguished, and are distinct faculties: and therefore also the proper and proximate acts of the keys are different, although the end is one: and this suffices for the divisibility of power and faculty, as has already been touched upon.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that in material things, to one lock holding itself in one way and closed in one way, there is one key: but to one lock having two closures, nothing prohibits there being two keys, because then one lock is as two: and so it is here, because there is one lock from the fact that sin is not discerned and distinguished, and another is from the guilt (reatus) which is innate to the sinner from the sin: and therefore necessarily there are two modes of unlocking and opening, as has already been said.

§ 5. To that which is objected, that there are three keys, it must be said that only two are necessary on account of the said cause.

§ 6. Moreover, to the first objection it must be said that the will or goodness appropriated to the Holy Spirit is not equal toward binding and loosing: but a key speaks of such a power that closes and opens equally: but God's will or goodness is always toward opening, as He who wills all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth;[613] and this is true as far as it is of itself: and if He wills otherwise, as Damascene says, He wills this from our cause: and therefore in the keys there could not be any power corresponding to the Holy Spirit: but He Himself gives the gift, through which sin is dissolved.

§ 7. Otherwise it could be said, and less well, namely that the two keys are not taken according to the attributes of the Father and of the Son, but according to the attributes of the Son alone, because He first closed and opened: and this was proved above through the authority of Isaiah.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that, as the Auxerrois (William of Auxerre) said, it is not necessary that anything concerning the keys respond to the will of man, because in the keys man ought not to follow his own will, but the will of God first absolving through grace: and this solution seems to be optimal.

§ 9. Others said more subtly and worse, that these acts, to open and to close, are not on our part: and therefore their faculties ought not at all to be taken on our part: but the will is on our part, and therefore no key is to be taken according to the will.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that it is true that where the first two follow the liberty of the will, there they are imperfect for the work, unless the will should supervene: because, the confession having been made and the power had, the will is still free to act or not to act if it wishes. But because in divine things the operation follows from the necessity of the divine precept, therefore, the first two faculties having been had, perfection is sufficiently had for the work.

610. John 20:23.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Knowledge Of Discerning Between Leprosy And Not Leprosy Is A Key Of The Church

§ 1. To that which is furthermore asked, Whether there are four? It must be said that there are not.

§ 2. To the objection it must be said that the first premise is false: because all those modes are reduced to two: for that he demonstrates someone as absolved and bound, is not done except through the dismissal of the penalty, as will be evident in the Letter: and through this very thing he reconciles to the Church. But to bind and loose the anathema is another mode: but because it is not except through the cognition of the fault, or rebinding or loosing, it agrees in form with that which is in the forum of confession and penance: and therefore it does not require other keys: and thus it is evident that that objection was nothing.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that although there are gates of hell, nevertheless the keys of the Church are not determined toward those: for each thing, as the Philosopher says, is determined and denominated through a definition toward the best things of itself: moreover, the closing and opening of the doors of hell follows upon the closing and opening of the gates of heaven, and the gates of heaven are the intended and final things of the keys, and therefore they are named from them: and there are two keys, because from the moment heaven is closed to someone, hell is yawning over him with open gates: and by the very fact that heaven is opened, the entrance of hell is closed.

§ 4. To the next the solution is clear through the same, except concerning paradise, and purgatory, and limbo.

§ 5. And to these it must be said that there is no entrance for us to the beatitude of the animal life which we lost in Adam: and therefore a way of coming to the place of the corporeal paradise, where Adam would have lived forever in an animal life, is not given to us through the keys: and therefore the Church does not receive the keys to that place. Now why there is no entrance for us to paradise is to be determined elsewhere, namely on the second book of the Sentences, where the ejection of Adam from paradise and the re-closing of paradise is treated.

§ 6. But concerning purgatory and limbo it must be said that they do not have perpetual fastenings, but are continually open for flying out at a determined time: the fathers indeed from limbo when the debt of Adam was loosed through Christ, and souls from purgatory when each is purged to the full: for we are speaking here of the limbo of the fathers, not of the limbo of children, which is perpetually closed.

§ 7. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Whether the science of discerning between leprosy and non-leprosy is a key of the Church?

§ 8. Third, it is asked concerning this key which is called the science of discerning between leprosy and non-leprosy.

611. Isaiah 22:22.

§ 9. For it seems not to be a key. § 10. 1. For everything which does not always follow one having the keys, seems not to be a key, since the key always follows one having the key: but the science of discerning between leprosy and non-leprosy does not always follow one having the keys; therefore it is not a key. The FIRST premise is evident of itself. The SECOND is proved from this, that every priest has the keys: yet not every priest has the science of discerning between leprosy and non-leprosy.

§ 11. 2. Further, nothing had indifferently besides the order and after the order and before, is a key: the science of discerning is such a thing: therefore it is not a key. The FIRST premise is proved by this, that the keys are given in the order of priesthood, and never without it. The SECOND is proved from this, that many before priesthood have this sort of science, and some non-priests have it more than priests.

§ 12. 3. Further, as the Philosopher says in VI Ethics, science is an intellectual virtue: therefore its generation is through experience and time: therefore it is not given in the order: but every key is given with the order: therefore science is not a key.

§ 13. If perhaps you should say, that the science is infused...

§ 1. ...key, not an acquired one; and the acquired one is that of which the Philosopher speaks. On the contrary: We see expressly that priests do not receive an infused knowledge in Orders: therefore, the infused is not the key, as it seems.

§ 2. Furthermore, infused knowledge is more certain in judgment than acquired: therefore, if infused knowledge were the key, every priest having the keys would judge more certainly than the Doctors who have acquired knowledge through long study: and this we do not see; rather, they either judge badly, or in doubtful matters they have recourse to those who have studied.

§ 3. But if this is said, it will be: 1. Against the Letter, where Jerome says that the two keys are the knowledge of judging and the authority of absolving.

§ 4. 2. Moreover, four reasons were adduced above, [showing] that knowledge must be a key.

§ 5. 3. Furthermore, every act of a purely motive power needs some ruler, or else sometimes it will be perverse: but to bind and loose is an act of a motive power: therefore, it needs a ruler, so that it may not sometimes be perverse. But the ruler can be nothing other than the knowledge of judging who is to be absolved and who is not; therefore, it must precede that [act]: therefore, the key is the knowledge of judging.

§ 6. Response. It must be said that many have said many things here, whose sayings, because I do not understand them, I pass over, up to three opinions, of which one is the Master's in the Letter, namely that it can be conceded that not all have the key of the knowledge of judging: but those who lack it, lack it to their own damnation, if they have the jurisdiction of using the keys and wish to remain in it. But I think this opinion is false, unless the key is said to be the matter of the key, as will be clear below: for it is well conceded that not all have the matter of this key, that is, that which is material in the key.

§ 7. Others say that there are those who have knowledge as a key: and there are those who have it as a little key. For those having acquired or infused knowledge concerning discerning good and evil according to the differences of sins which it is necessary to know, have this knowledge as a key: but those having less, and following natural industry, have only a little key in themselves. And this too I consider false, unless it is understood in the same way as the preceding, namely that as to that which is material in the key, some are said to have a key, and others a little key; but as to the formal, all who are priests are said to have a key.

§ 8. The third say, of whose number I am, that knowledge is not a key, but rather the authority of discerning and judging: and this every priest receives in Orders, even though he does not receive knowledge. If, however, he has knowledge along with the other things that are required, he receives Orders well. But if he does not have knowledge, even if he is adorned with all the others, and he receives pastoral care, he receives it to his damnation.

§ 9. According to this, therefore, it is plain to answer the objections.

§ 10. To that which is first objected, it must be said that knowledge is not a key: but it is sometimes called a key, because it is the matter in the key: and the key is not in act except through it, because it itself is the disposition which the key wishes to find in the subject: and granted that it does not find it, then the key is frustrated from act. And it is similar in natures and in grace: for the motive power wishes to find the sensible power in the subject; and if it does not find it, it will not move. Similarly, a subsequent Order, such as the diaconate, wishes to find the preceding subdiaconate in the subject: and if it does not find it, it will not be in act: rather, it is suspended until he receives the Order which he skipped. Similarly, the visive power wishes to find pure and illuminated crystalline humor in the eye: and if it does not find it, it is suspended from the act of seeing, until the crystalline humor is purified. That it is thus in the priesthood is evident through that [word]: "Because you have rejected knowledge, I will reject you, so that you may not serve me in the priesthood." And that, "The lips of the priest shall guard knowledge, and they shall seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts." And that, "Furthermore the sons of Heli were sons of Belial, not knowing the Lord, nor the office of the priests to the people." And many other such things which are found throughout the whole Scripture.

§ 11. To the other it must be said in entirely the same way: because the authority of discerning is never given except in Orders: but the disposition which it is necessary to find in the subject, is had indifferently before and after.

§ 12. To the other it must be said that the Philosopher in truth speaks of knowledge acquired by the habit of moral matters, and experience and teaching concerning them: nevertheless, the response introduced against this is also, in my judgment, worth nothing; but the solution to it and the rest is evident through what was said before.

613. 1 Timothy 2:4.

Articulus 5 — On The Second Key, Which Is The Power Of Binding And Loosing, Whether It Is Communicable

On the second key which is the power of binding and loosing, whether it is communicable?

§ 13. Fourthly, it is inquired about the second key, which is the power of binding and loosing.

§ 14. For it seems that this power is incommunicable: because 1. Augustine says: He was unwilling to give the power of cleansing interiorly in baptism to a servant, lest hope be placed in man. Since, therefore, to absolve is the same as to cleanse interiorly from something spiritually obligating, it seems that such a power ought not to have been communicated to a minister, lest hope be placed in him.

§ 15. 2. Furthermore, in the Gospel of Mark, 2:7, where Christ said that he forgave sins on earth: thinking him only a man, they said: "Why does this man speak thus? He blasphemes. Who can forgive sins, but God alone?" Therefore, no one but God can forgive sins: therefore, the power of binding and loosing from sins is not conceded to a man who is a minister of the Church: therefore, this power is not a key.

§ 16. 3. But if you say that they do not forgive sins, but the punishment for sins. On the contrary: John 20:23 expressly says: "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them: and whose you shall retain, they are retained." Therefore, it is understood concerning the remission of sins.

§ 17. BUT ON THE CONTRARY to this it is objected: because to anyone to whom the principal is committed, the accessory is also committed, according to the rules of law. But it is committed to the priest that he consecrate the holy communion, and minister it to the people: therefore, the preparation of the people for that holy communion is also committed to him. But the preparation can be nothing other than by absolution: therefore, the power of absolving is committed to priests: therefore, they themselves have this key.

§ 18. This same thing is proved in the Letter by the authorities of many saints: and therefore let these suffice.

§ 19. It must be said, therefore, without a doubt, that the Church in its priests has the full power of absolving: and this is the key of the ministering priests. But what its use is, will be evident afterwards in its proper place.

§ 20. To the first, therefore, it must be said that hope is not placed in man on account of this: because man does not operate except as a minister. Whence a good and an evil one have it equally: but God operates as the author and bestower of the gift of absolution in every way, just as he does in baptism, namely through his grace which he gives in the ministry, whether it be through a good or an evil one.

§ 21. To the other it must be said that man does not remit sin on the part of the guilt: because it belongs to God alone to do this. But through his ministry a part of the punishment is remitted to him, sometimes in act, sometimes also when the key exists in desire, as was said above: and this by the power of Christ's passion, which is in the keys, and not by the power of the minister.

§ 22. To that which is objected concerning John, it must be said that it is understood concerning the remission of sin on the part of the punishment.

Articulus 6 — Whether A Heretic Having Orders Also Has The Key

Whether a heretic having Orders also has the key?

§ 23. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, at B: "It is certain that the Church is permitted both, heresy has neither."

§ 24. For this seems false: because 1. In the treatise on Orders it is proved that true Orders are also those which are received from heretics in the form of the Church: therefore, those things which follow upon true Orders are there. But the keys are among the things following upon true Orders: therefore, it seems that heresy has the keys of jurisdiction.

§ 25. 2. Furthermore, a true stone, like a true man, and a true ass, is said to be that which has the act of a stone and of a man and of an ass: and these are called dead, when they lack their acts. But let it be supposed now that a true Order is received in the form of the Church among heretics: therefore, that Order has the act of an Order. But the act of a priest's Order is the act of a key: therefore, it seems that he has the act of a key or of the keys.

§ 26. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: One who knowingly goes to a heretic sins mortally: therefore, he is not absolved: therefore, on the part of the one confessing, the final act of the key does not take place in him. Likewise, neither on the part of the one hearing the confession: because he does not have jurisdiction, and is suspended, and also sins mortally by involving himself. Therefore, from neither part can the act of the Order be preserved there: therefore, it seems that heresy does not have the use of the keys; therefore, neither [does it have] the keys, as it seems, unless false and dead ones: just as a dead man is not a man simply, even if he is called a man.

§ 27. Response. It must be said in this question that there is the power of a key from Orders, and there is power from jurisdiction: for, as was clear above, every act seeks matter about which it may be, and those in the keys are subjects, who cannot be had except through jurisdiction descending from the Supreme Pontiff. It must be said, therefore, that heresy having Orders in the form of the Church, has the keys, according as power is taken from Orders: but it does not have it from jurisdiction, and therefore it can execute nothing at all; and if in fact it absolves, it does nothing at all: and yet moreover both the one absolving and the one absolved have sinned mortally, if he knowingly approached such a one. And in this way is understood what is said in the Letter.

§ 28. To that which is first objected, it must be said that the execution of the key does not follow upon Orders, but only the power in one having the power, but not being able to act on account of a defect of matter: because the matter is not a man being heard, but rather a subject determined for himself through jurisdiction descending from the Supreme Pontiff. And as to the latter, heresy is said in the Letter not to have the keys: because it does not have the execution.

§ 29. To the other it must be said that there are essential acts, of which this is true which is said in objecting, and those are the ones which follow upon the substance, and such an act the key well has in everyone having Orders. But this act is to perfect the one having it according to that power, just as the act of light is to shine, and the act of essence is to be, and the act of knowledge is to be knowing, and the power of the key is [to have] power according to the key. But this is not to be understood of the act which is an operation upon external matter: for a true stone, even if it never acts upon anything externally, possesses essence, and similarly a true man, and the like.

Articulus 7 — Whether A Priest Is Able To Absolve From Guilt And From The Liability To Eternal Punishment

Whether a priest is able to absolve from guilt and from the guilt of eternal punishment?

§ 30. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, at C: "But the use of these keys," etc.

§ 31. For by reason of this it is inquired concerning the use of the keys: and because this question is manifold, we will deduce each article of it where it falls upon the Letter.

§ 32. And first, let us inquire concerning that common use which the Master determines first in the Letter, namely whether a priest is able to absolve from guilt, and from the guilt of eternal punishment?

§ 33. And it seems that he is: 1. For it is greater to merit first grace for someone who is unworthy of grace, than to absolve from guilt one who is worthy of absolution. And a man can merit the first, even one who is not a vicar of Christ: therefore, a man can also do the second, especially one who is a vicar of Christ. But this is the priest in confession: therefore, in confession the priest can absolve from guilt and the punishment of eternal death, as it seems.

§ 34. 2. Likewise, Hugh of St. Victor in the booklet On the Power of Binding and Loosing says thus: Just as in divine absolution eternal punishment is changed into purgatorial, so in sacerdotal absolution a divine sentence is transferred into a human one. But the divine sentence is eternal punishment, and the guilt of eternal punishment: therefore, in human and sacerdotal absolution eternal punishment is transferred. But this cannot be transferred unless the guilt is absolved: therefore, it seems that in the priest's absolution guilt is relaxed.

§ 35. 3. Furthermore, if an earthly king were to commit his stead to someone in the judgment of affairs, he would give him plenary power of absolving those willing to make satisfaction, and of binding and condemning those who remain impenitent: that minister would be able to absolve from guilt and punishment. Therefore, since divine indulgence is freer than any human [indulgence] can be, it seems that the vicars of Christ, to whom in the forum of penance he said: "Whatever you shall loose," etc., can absolve from guilt and punishment.

§ 36. But if this be conceded, the contrary is proved through those things which are said in the Letter from the sayings of Jerome and Cassiodorus, which it is not necessary to adduce here.

§ 37. But through reason it is objected thus: A finite temporal thing cannot act upon the infinite and eternal: but all the power of priests is temporal and finite: therefore, it cannot act upon the infinite and eternal. But guilt is infinite and eternal: therefore, no priest can act unto the remission of guilt and eternal punishment.

§ 38. Response. It must be said that a priest cannot absolve from guilt and eternal punishment: but he absolves only by relaxing a part of the punishment, except in that way which was stated above, that the desire for the keys is in contrition, having a certain power towards the remission of the whole sin.

§ 39. To that, however, which is objected first, it must be said that what is introduced is not similar: because he who merits first grace for someone, does not give the grace, but inclines God to give it: but ministers in the sacraments act in some way towards this, that the effect of the sacrament be brought about: and therefore it cannot be in the power of the minister to confer grace, but only the diminution of punishment.

§ 40. To the other it must be said that Hugh calls the "divine sentence" a temporal purgatorial punishment, not however proportioned to the powers of the penitent: and he calls the "human sentence" a bearable punishment proportioned to the powers of the penitent: and this indeed takes place in the absolution of a man.

§ 41. To the other it must be said that the vicar of a king is not appointed except over a finite and temporal offense: and that can be placed in the power of a man. But concerning an offense against God it is otherwise, which is infinite, and therefore it cannot be placed in the power of a man.

§ 42. D. Whether a priest can forgive or retain sins? But it is asked, whether a priest is able to loose from sin, that is, from guilt: so as to wipe away the stain of guilt, or is able to loose the debt of eternal death? Some have judged that, since the sinner is held bound in two ways, as was said before, namely by the contagion and blindness of the mind, and by the debt of future punishment: the one is cured by God, the other loosed by the priest. For through sin he suffers certain interior darknesses and stains, from which unless he is freed, he will be cast into the exterior darkness. But when he is freed from these, he is raised from the death of sin. Whence the Apostle: "Rise, you who sleep... and Christ will enlighten you." For Christ alone, not the priest, resuscitates the soul, and, with the interior darknesses and stains driven away, enlightens and cleanses it, who washes the face of the soul; but he conceded to priests to loose the debt of eternal punishment. Which they assert was signified in the resurrection of Lazarus: whom Christ first vivified interiorly by himself, and then ordered to go outside; and him still bound he commanded the Apostles to loose: because, as they say, he himself interiorly cleanses the soul from the mist and stain of sin, but gave to priests to loose the bond of eternal death.

§ 43. But others say that God alone, not the priest, remits the debt of eternal death, just as he also interiorly vivifies the soul by himself: nor yet do they deny that the power of forgiving and retaining sins has been handed over to priests, to whom it was said: "Whose sins you shall forgive," etc. For just as Christ retained for himself the power of baptism, so also of penance. And therefore just as he interiorly enlightens the soul with his grace, so also at the same time he relaxes the debt of eternal death. For he himself by himself covers the sins of penitents: and he covers them then, when he does not reserve them for punishment. Then, therefore, he covers, when he looses the debt of punishment. But that he himself covers, Augustine says in part, expounding that place of the Psalm: "Whose sins are covered," that is, covered over and abolished. For if God has covered sins, he did not wish to advert to them: if he did not wish to advert, he did not wish to animadvert, that is, to punish, but to pardon. Thus therefore he says they are covered by God, so that God may not see, that is, eternally punish. For God to see sins is to impute them to punishment. But to turn away the face from sins, this is not to reserve them for punishment.

§ 44. Likewise, Jerome: To whom God forgives sins, he covers them lest they be revealed in judgment. Likewise, Cassiodorus: As to those who have grave sins, to some God imputes them, to others through mercy he does not impute them. From these it is openly shown that God himself looses the penitent from the debt of punishment: and he looses it then, when he inwardly enlightens by inspiring true contrition of heart. Reason supports this opinion, and authorities attest to it. For no one is truly compunct for sin, having a contrite and humbled heart, except in charity. But he who has charity is worthy of eternal life. No one, however, is at the same time worthy of life and of death. He is not therefore then bound by the debt of eternal death. For he ceased to be a child of wrath from the moment he began to love and repent. From then on, therefore, he is loosed from wrath, which does not remain upon him who believes in Christ, but upon him who does not believe. He is not, therefore, afterwards freed from eternal wrath through the priest to whom he confesses, from which he has already been freed by the Lord from the time he said, "I will confess." Therefore, God alone interiorly cleanses a man from the stain of sin, and looses from the debt of eternal punishment, who through the Prophet says: "I alone blot out the iniquities and sins of the people."

§ 45. Likewise, Ambrose: The Word of God forgives sins, the priest is the judge. The priest indeed exhibits his office, but exercises the rights of no power. The same: He alone forgives sins, who alone died for our sins. Likewise, Augustine: No one takes away sins except God alone, who is the lamb taking away the sins of the world. Moreover, he takes them away both by forgiving what has been done, and by helping lest they be done, and by leading to life, where they can absolutely not be done.

§ 46. By these and many other testimonies it is taught that the Lord alone by himself forgives sins: and just as he forgives to some, so also he retains the sins of some others.

Articulus 8 — Whether Sin Ought And Can Be Called Darkness

Whether sin ought and can be called a darkness?

§ 47. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, at D, after the beginning: "For he suffers through sin certain darknesses," etc.

§ 48. It is inquired here, What are these darknesses? For since light is the proper perfection of the intellect, and darkness is opposed to light, it seems to be according to the intellect only. But: 1. Sin is principally according to the affect: therefore, it seems that sin is not a darkness.

§ 49. But if it is said that sin is called darkness because it deprives the soul of the uncreated light of grace: in the same way it could be called cold, because it deprives of the heat of the Holy Spirit.

§ 50. 2. Furthermore, sin is more opposed to charity than to faith, because it deprives of charity in whole, and does not deprive of faith except as to form. Since, therefore, charity is heat, and faith is light, it seems that sin should rather be called cold than darkness.

§ 51. 3. But if you say that the effect of sin is the darkening of the intellectual virtues. On the contrary: We see many existing in sins understand more quickly than others: therefore, it seems that sin does not induce interior darknesses, which are a darkening of natural endowments.

§ 52. 4. Furthermore, if anyone through sins should have darkened natural endowments, that would most of all be the devil, who "did not stand in the truth," but "is a murderer from the beginning," as it is said, John 8:44. But on the contrary, Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names that "the natural gifts given to them, we by no means say they have been changed: but they are entire and most splendid, although they themselves do not see, closing up their own virtues capable of inspecting the good." Therefore, others are not darkened from sin either.

§ 53. If perhaps you say that it is understood concerning infused knowledge: for in that the sinner does not perceive as much as the just. An instance against this seems to be concerning Balaam, who "knew the doctrine of the Most High, and beheld the visions of the Almighty." [614] Therefore, it seems that it cannot be understood concerning that either.

§ 54. Furthermore, the Lord says in the Gospel that "the children of this world are more prudent in their generation than the children of light." [615] Therefore, it seems that sin is not a darkness.

§ 55. To the contrary of this it is objected that Damascene expressly says that sin is an intellectual or spiritual darkness. And, 1 John 2:11, he says that "he who hates his brother is in darkness," etc. And, John 8:12: "He who follows me does not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life," says the Lord. Therefore, it seems through the opposite, that every sin is an intellectual darkness.

§ 56. FURTHERMORE it is inquired here concerning the other things which he touches upon here in the Letter, namely "the contagion and blindness of the mind." And above, in the first chapter of this distinction, he touched upon two, namely "stain" and "stench." And it is inquired concerning the difference of these among themselves, how they agree with the effect of sin.

§ 57. Likewise, he touches upon guilt, by this that he says "the debt of eternal death." But there are things which he does not touch upon, namely fault, and sin, and evil, and vice: and the difference of all these is inquired.

§ 58. It seems, moreover, that not every sin produces contagion. 1. For contagion is a disease proceeding from a similar contact: just as a contagious disease is said to be that which is contracted from living together and a certain contact of association and of communication which is in association: but not every sin is such: therefore, not every sin produces contagion.

§ 59. 2. Furthermore, contagion is always in someone other than the first one sinning: therefore, it seems that not every sin produces contagion: therefore, it seems that it ought not to be universally attributed to sin.

§ 60. Furthermore, contagion is more apt by nature to happen concerning the body than concerning the mind: therefore, he ought much more to say contagion of the body, than contagion of the soul or mind.

§ 61. 3. Furthermore, blindness bespeaks a defect of the organ: but it is certain that through sin the organ of the body is not taken away, nor even the organ of the mind, which is the power that is the form of the organ: therefore, it seems that the sinner does not incur blindness.

§ 62. 4. But if you say that through sin there comes to be a privation of the habit of spiritual light which is grace: against this it will then be that it is still called darkness: therefore, spiritual blindness is superfluously posited there.

§ 63. 5. Similarly, it is objected concerning stain: for stain is not spoken of except in two ways, namely through the defect of that which ought to be for the comeliness and for the integrity of the beauty of a thing: just as we say that one whose nose is cut off or who has one eye has a stain. Or it is spoken of through the power of something defiling the comeliness: just as we say that one having morphea in the face has a stain. In neither of these ways, however, does sin seem to be called a stain: because it neither amputates natural endowments, nor does it posit anything in the soul, because it is nothing and posits nothing: therefore, it seems that it is not a stain.

§ 64. 6. Moreover, the stench which he names seems to be posited entirely irrationally: because there is no stench in spiritual things: but these are spiritual things: therefore, there is no stench in them.

§ 65. But concerning fault, sin, and evil, enough has been said upon the last part of the second book of the Sentences.

§ 66. Response. It must be said that all these things correspond to sin. For in sin there is an aversion from the incommutable good, and a conversion to the commutable good. Insofar as it is an aversion from the incommutable good, it is itself interior darkness, or the intellectual blindness of the mind. But insofar as it is a conversion to the commutable good, it is contagion and stench. For light is the universal form of the first movable thing, through which primarily the whole matter of generable and corruptible things is moved to the reception of the form of any species. But I say universal: not that the first movable thing universally shines, but because it moves to every form, and not specially to this one or that one. And through this, light has a convenience with grace, which is the first form moving to the formation into well-being of all the powers, and the essence of the soul itself, producing as if out of itself the other particular forms of the powers, namely the theological and political virtues, according as they are infused. And in this way infidelity is not opposed to light, nor any sin in species: but sin in genus, insofar as through aversion it is privative of this kind of general grace. But insofar as superior light is the perfective of exterior and interior sight, and sin depriving of the reception of light causes blindness in the spiritual sight of the soul, which the very name of darkness (tenebrae) shows: because tenebra is derived from tenendo (holding), because it holds the eyes lest they be able to see. But insofar as it is toward the commutable good, which is corporeal and corrupting, it is considered in three ways, namely insofar as the first impression of this kind of passing good remains in the soul; or insofar as it is inveterate by an impression of this kind; or insofar as it makes defective the beauty of proportion which the soul had through conjunction to the highest good. And in the first way indeed it is called contagion, in the second way stench, and in the third way stain. But concerning evil and sin it has been spoken elsewhere, namely at the end of the second book of the Sentences.

§ 67. It must be said, therefore, to the first, that light is not taken there for the spiritual perfection of sight, but rather in that general property which was stated. And in this way it is better called darkness than cold: because heat is not the total universal form, leading the forms of generable things to being, as is light which, according to the diversity of luminous bodies and angles and figures of those luminous bodies, leads all forms of generable things generally to being.

§ 68. To the other it must be said that it is true that sin is more opposed to charity than to faith: but it is not opposed to it more than to grace. And through this the solution is evident.

§ 69. To the other it must be said that in truth, as the Philosopher says in the sixth book of the Ethics, [616] the speculative intellect indeed is not corrupted through sin: but nevertheless the intellect of the prudent and of the happy man is corrupted through sin, even of the happy man according to speculative happiness, because that [happiness] wishes to be pure and not filled with [base] delight. It can therefore be said that the intellect is toward the pure true, or toward the true under the aspect of making, and toward the true under the aspect of happiness. And in the first way indeed it is not corrupted. But in the second way it is doubly toward the true under the aspect of the good, namely speculatively and practically: for there are some who are wise concerning those things about which prudence is, and yet are not affected concerning operable things. But others have the knowledge which doing follows, which is moving of itself, as the Philosopher says: just as one knowing how to play the cithara has it in habit to play the cithara, and operates when he wishes. And this is darkened through sin: just as the Philosopher says, disputing against Socrates, that the estimation of the prudent man is corrupted through delight in the minor premise, where it is mixed with the operating affect: and in this way the intellect is darkened toward the good: because thus every evil man is ignorant. But according as it relates to the felicitating true, it is that true affected under the aspect of delighting the powers, which does not have repentance admixed: and then again it is darkened and impeded through sin.

§ 70. But to the other which is objected concerning Dionysius, it must be said that he himself speaks of the speculative virtues, according as they are only speculative: for thus it is true that they are not darkened.

§ 71. To that which is objected concerning contagion,

§ 1. It must be said that every sin imprints a contagion: for here contagion is called not only that which merely creeps from one to another, but also a corruption contracted from the impression of what defiles and putrefies, just as a bodily good to which the affect is subjected.

§ 2. To the next, it must be said that a contagion spoken of in this way is not always in another, but in the same one to whom the contagion is united as a corrupting agent.

§ 3. To the next, it must be said that blindness is spoken of here from the lack of the influence of light descending from above to the practical intellect on that part where it is mixed with the operative power or the affect: just as if the light descending into the eye were deprived as to the discernment of certain workable things, and not of others: and in this way the interior power of the mind is well hindered.

§ 4. To the next, it must be said that it is not called darkness with respect to this, but insofar as it deprives of the general form forming all spiritual things, as is clear from what has been said above.

§ 5. To the next, it must be said that a stain is spoken of through the defect of natural beauty, which it has from the corruption of the natural good conjoined with the gratuitous and uncreated. But that sin does this insofar as it is evil, and takes away the good, no one doubts who reads well those things which were said in the second book of the Sentences, in the tract on evil.[617]

§ 6. But to that which was objected concerning the stench, it must be said that it is taken spiritually in the way that Dionysius says in the book on the Celestial Hierarchy,[618] that the intellectual distribution is signified by odor: in which with respect to the lost devotion of the soul it is called fetid by the evaporation of concupiscence following the corruption of the true complexion, as was said.

Articulus 9 — Whether Absolution From The Debt Of Eternal Punishment Is Effected Through Absolution Made By A Priest

Whether there is an absolution from the debt of eternal punishment through the absolution made by a priest?

§ 7. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, before the middle: But others say God alone, not the priest, etc.

§ 8. For it seems that they say what is false: because 1. Master Hugh says so to blessed Bernard in the book On the Power of Binding and Loosing: "The Lord by Himself looses the bond of obduracy, but by Himself and by a minister the debt of eternal damnation." Therefore they say what is false, who plainly say the contrary.

§ 9. 2. Furthermore it is also evident, that without a priest [someone] through contrition is not absolved from the debt of eternal damnation, unless he confesses and is absolved if he has the ability: therefore if he does not confess and is not absolved, he will still remain a debtor of eternal punishment: therefore the absolution made by the priest works something toward the payment of that debt.

§ 10. But against this is the fact that the debt of eternal punishment is eternal and infinite, as was proved above: but what is temporal cannot act upon what is eternal: but absolution is temporal: therefore it seems that absolution from the debt of eternal punishment is not accomplished by the absolution made by the priest.

§ 11. Response. It must be said that in no way does the priest absolve from the debt of eternal death: but the keys work towards this in one way, as was said above.

§ 12. But to the saying of Master Hugh it must be said that he is speaking of the absolution that impedes the return of that debt, not numerically the same, but similar in species , as will be clear below, when the guilt of sins is discussed. For the absolution of the priest operates toward this: because he absolves, as he himself said, from the debt of confessing: which if he did not fulfill, the debt of eternal damnation would return: moreover, he absolves by binding to the temporal punishment enjoined.

§ 1. To the next, it must be said that the absolution of the priest does not operate toward the payment of that debt: because God pays it simply and without an intermediary order: but toward the payment of that which would be born if confession and absolution were not received, as is just and due.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Word Of God Remits Sins

Whether the Word of God forgives sins?

§ 2. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, before the end: The Word of God forgives sins, the priest, and the judge, etc.

617. Hos 4:6

§ 3. For he seems to imply by this enunciation that these three forgive sins in diverse ways: and this does not seem so, because

1. The Word of God is understood either of a created word or of the uncreated Word. If of a created word: then it does not forgive sins except by way of persuading and inducing: therefore his division is worthless, because there are many things remitting sins in this way, such as grace, and good work, which he does not enumerate here, which nonetheless are more efficacious in forgiving sin than the word of God. If, however, the division is understood of the uncreated Word: then it seems that it does not differ from the judge whom he also posits here.

§ 4. 2. Furthermore, it seems that the judge does not forgive sins: because when he shall have taken up judgment and time, he will judge justices: but by judging justly, sin is not forgiven, but punished: therefore it seems that it is nothing when he says that the judge forgives.

§ 5. Moreover, when the Lord comes to judgment, it is not believed that he will forgive sins even for the faithful: therefore it is nothing when he says that the judge forgives sins.

§ 6. 3. Furthermore, he seems to speak falsely, when he says concerning the forgiveness of the priest: The priest indeed exhibits his office, but exercises the rights of no power. For the priest does exercise his power by forgiving a part of the punishment, as was said above: therefore what he says is false.

§ 7. Response. It must be said that the Word of God is called the only-begotten Son, insofar as he speaks to the Father in the world: for he forgives sins by a power of excellence, as was noted above, because his merit was of infinite value: and the Father has given all things into his hand. Hence it is said: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sin of the world. But the judge is God by forgiving through authority, and the priest through ministry: and thus it is clear how these three differ.

§ 8. To the objection, it must be said that the way the uncreated Word forgives is one thing, and the way the judge forgives is another: for God the Trinity is called the judge, yet is not called the word. But the Incarnate Word forgives in the manner of redemption by which he pays the price for us, which God the Trinity does not do: hence the objection supposes what is false.

§ 9. To the next, it must be said that it is understood of the judgment by which God will judge penitents with a judgment of mercy, in which there is little of justice, and much of mercy: for he remits all eternal punishment, and exacts temporal punishment: but in the future he will not remit.

§ 10. To that which is objected concerning the office of the priest, it must be said that it is not denied that he has power in ministry: but it is denied that he has power for wiping away interior stains, and relaxing the debt of eternal death: but he has power over a part of the punishment in ministry: hence when he says, Of no power, etc., this is understood of absolute power in relaxing guilt.

618. Mal 2:7

Articulus 11 — What And Of What Kind Is The Power Of Priests In Remitting Sins

What and what sort is the power of priests in forgiving sins?

§ 1. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E: Yet we do not therefore deny, etc.

§ 2. But here a useful question is asked: What is the power of priests in forgiving sins?

For it is evident that this is not over guilt, nor over eternal punishment: let it be asked, therefore, over what punishment does it extend?

§ 3. 1. Now it is possible to accept in the genus of punishment three modes of punishments, namely eternal punishment, and transitory punishment unproportioned to the strength of the penitent, and transitory punishment proportioned to the strength of the penitent.

Likewise, there are three things in penance operating against the punishment for sin, namely sorrow formed by grace which operates against eternal punishment, and confession making a transitory punishment proportioned to the strength of the penitent, and satisfaction which destroys the punishment assessed to the strength of the penitent. Therefore, since the power of the keys is in the middle, after the first and before the third: it seems that it operates upon the middle punishment which is indeed transitory, and yet not proportioned to the strength of the penitent.

§ 4. 2. Furthermore, once eternal punishment is forgiven, man has not yet departed from divine judgment, because there remains for him the punishment of purgatory: but it is not taken away by the keys and satisfaction: therefore purgation according to the order of justice is intermediate between eternal punishment, and that which is enjoined in satisfaction: therefore it seems that the eternal punishment is immediately commuted into that one, and that one through the keys into the one which is of satisfaction: therefore the power of the keys is over purgatorial punishment: but this exceeds all punishment of this life, as Augustine says, and will be held below: therefore it itself is not proportioned to the strength of the penitent according to this state: and thence as before.

§ 5. 3. Furthermore, the key operates through the virtue of the sorrow of Christ's passion: but that sorrow is unproportioned to every passion which anyone can endure in this life, as was proved upon the third book of the Sentences: therefore it seems that it operates against that punishment which is indeed transitory, yet is not proportioned to the strength of the penitent: and thence it is argued as before.

§ 6. 4. Furthermore, Ambrose says, and it is posited in the third book of the Sentences, and Anselm proves in the book Cur Deus homo, that no penance of ours would suffice, unless the merit of Christ were co-assisting: but there is no cause why our penance does not suffice except that we are debtors of greater than we can pay: and this is the unproportion of the power of paying in us: and this Christ paid for us: therefore again as before, the passion of Christ which operates in the keys has an effect against that mode of punishment which exceeds our strength.

§ 1. BUT TO THE CONTRARY of this it is objected thus: 1. The punishment of purgatory is not of the forum of the Church, because those existing there do not demerit: but the priest can change and remit through the keys of the Church only the punishment which is of the forum of the Church: therefore he can neither change nor remit purgatorial punishment.

§ 2. 2. Furthermore, let us posit that someone dies before he completes the penance enjoined on him by the priest, which was due to his sins: it is evident that he will cross over into purgatorial [punishment]: but he would not cross over, unless he were a debtor of that punishment: therefore he is still a debtor of that punishment: therefore it was not commuted, as it seems.

§ 3. If you say that in such a case the expiatory punishment through satisfaction is changed into purgatorial. Against this: Purgatorial punishment is incomparably heavier than expiatory punishment through satisfaction: therefore if the expiatory punishment through satisfaction was sufficient, the one that is in purgatory will be beyond condignity: but God punishes no one beyond condignity: therefore God will not punish him with the punishment of purgatory, which is false: therefore this too is false from which it followed, namely that the expiatory punishment enjoined on him through penance was changed into purgatorial.

§ 4. FURTHERMORE it is asked, Since many punishments respond to sins besides the sensible punishment in the harshness of heat and cold, namely the punishment of the worm of conscience, and the punishment of the lack of the vision of God, and the punishment of the horror of prison and of evil society, into what are all these punishments changed?

For it seems that they ought to be commuted: because the reason is the same for one and for the other: and one is changed, namely the sensible one in the harshness of heat and cold: therefore the others ought also to be changed.

§ 5. Response. To this it must be said that in truth, in my judgment, the essential act of the key is over that punishment which is called purgatorial, just as the reasons first brought forward seem to conclude quite probably: yet it does not seem to be denied that he who has greater jurisdiction in the keys, such as a Bishop, a Legate, and the Pope, could also forgive more and less of the expiatory punishment according to the discreet judgment of a cause of necessity or utility, as we will say below, when there will be a discussion about indulgences and relaxations.

§ 6. To that therefore which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that this punishment is not called purgatorial from the place or forum of purgatory, because thus it would not be except after death: but it is called purgatorial from the likeness of property in two respects, namely because it is according to the judgment of God, and because it is unproportionable to the strength of man, just like the punishment of purgatory if it were now imposed to be endured. For since the mutation to the extreme is not except through a middle at least according to reason, and one punishment is eternal, but the other temporal assessed according to the strength of the penitent, the expiatory punishment is intermediate according to reason, which is indeed temporal and finishable like the second, and not assessed according to the strength of the penitent, but due to the sin commuted in contrition: and this is called purgatorial by the reason stated, and it is at least intermediate according to reason: and also, if the merit of Christ were not in the keys, I think that it would be exacted from man: therefore the commutation of that one into the third is the essential effect of the key, which it has in everyone submitting himself to the keys through a vow.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that although such a one crosses over into purgatorial punishment whether after confession is made, or before, provided that contempt of religion has not hindered him from confession, the punishment called purgatorial in the first way is always commuted in him. And therefore the objection does nothing to the proposition. But that the punishment which is after death is greater, this is by accident, namely because the state is changed: and the former is voluntary, and the latter necessary, and therefore has less virtue in purging: and therefore it is necessary for it to increase in harshness, and perhaps also in duration. Hence it is clear that God does not punish him beyond condignity: but this happens from the mutation of the state of him who ought to be purged.

§ 1. To that which is asked furthermore, it seems to me that the question is null: because although a punishment is evil, because it is from evil, and contrary to a good nature, yet it is not expiatory insofar as it is of this sort, but insofar as it is voluntarily undertaken: and not every punishment is expiatory in this way: because the punishment of loss in spiritual things is contrary to such expiation, likewise the punishment of the remorse of conscience: hence these are cast away, but expiatory punishments are inflicted, which alone are those that promote towards virtue, and they alone are the ones around the difficulty of which vices are eradicated, and virtues are implanted: and therefore it is not necessary that those punishments in which this is not present should pass over into something: but they are cast away with the sins just like darkness, and blinding, and stench, and such things, concerning which it was spoken above.

§ 2. And if you object that either God punishes, or man: therefore it is necessary that these punishments pass over into some punishments of man, or God will reserve them. It must be said that this is true, that either God punishes, or man: but it is not necessary that man punishes with the same punishment as God, because certain punishments are adjoined to sin, and pass away with sin, such as the corruption of the natural good, and the lack of the light of God, and such things which are punishments. In which every inordinate act is a punishment to itself: and therefore those do not remain toward virtue, and therefore those must be fled from, and other punishments promoting towards virtue must be undertaken: and therefore this question is null, as it seems to me.

§ 3. However, the ancients said in the solution to this question, that the punishment of the lack of the vision of God is changed into the delight of the presence of God through grace, and the punishment of the worm into the detestation of sin, and the punishment of the prison into the long-suffering joyfulness of the Church, by which the penitent is bound: and the punishment of horrendous society into the joy of Ecclesiastical unity and communion, so that he may say: Make me a partaker, O God, of all those fearing you, and keeping your commandments, O Lord.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Charity Of The Church Remits Sins

Whether the charity of the Church forgives sins?

§ 4. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, after the beginning: The charity of the Church which is poured out by the Holy Spirit in the hearts of those, namely the faithful, who are its partakers, forgives sins, etc.

§ 5. For it seems that this does nothing for the proposition: because 1. The charity of the Church does not forgive except by way of merit: and it is not treated here of forgiveness through merit, but rather through the power of the keys, which is done equally by the good and the bad, who are unequal in merit.

§ 6. 2. Besides, an inconvenience seems to follow, if it is said as the Letter sounds: for given that there are only three or four men, and none of them is in charity: then the charity of the Church will be in no one: therefore if one of them repents, it seems that sins are not remitted to him, since they are not forgiven except in the charity of the Church.

BUT AGAINST THIS § 1. 1. It is said: Make me a partaker, O God, of all those fearing you, and keeping your commandments. Therefore sins are forgiven in the participation of the goods of the Church: but charity is what makes goods common and participable by diverse people: therefore sins are forgiven in charity for those participating in them.

§ 2. 2. Furthermore, one article is, I believe in the Holy Spirit, the communion of Saints, and it is usually expounded by all through charity communicating the goods of the Church: but evils are remitted through goods: therefore it seems that offenses are absolved through the charity of the Church.

§ 3. 3. Furthermore, it is said: Charity covers all offenses.

§ 4. Response. It must be said that every sin is forgiven in the charity of the Church: for this which is the mother of the good, communicates goods, so that what is lacking to one may be supplied in another, and those common riches are under the keys, and are communicable through the ministers of the Church according to the dispensation to be made by the discreet judgment of one key, which is the authority of discerning.

§ 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that certain sins are forgiven by way of merit: but to dispense or give this merit to this or that person belongs to the power of the key.

§ 6. To the next, it must be said that there is one dove whose charity never fails: because at least it is in the triumphant [Church], and in its charity it forgives sins, and especially in the charity of Christ, by which he suffered for us.

§ 7. And if you object that the Saints of the triumphant Church do not merit, it must be resolved that this is true, that they do not merit for themselves, but they merit all day long for others who are in the militant Church: and therefore in litanies we ask that they intercede for us.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Evangelical Priest Differs From The Legal Priest

Whether an Evangelical priest differs from a Legal priest?

§ 8. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, F: But he did not concede this to the priests, to whom nevertheless he gave the power of binding and loosing, that is, of showing men to be bound or loosed, etc.

§ 9. 1. For according to these things which are said here, it seems that an Evangelical priest with respect to power does not differ from a Legal priest, which is absurd.

§ 10. 2. Also, this especially seems from the authorities brought forward in this chapter, especially of Jerome.

§ 11. But against this it seems that 1. As priesthood is to priesthood, so the power of the key is to power: but the priesthood of the new law abounds over the priesthood of the old law: therefore the power of the key also abounds over the power of that one: but they only showed the cleansed: therefore these do something more than showing: therefore they remit something from the sin, either from the part of guilt, or from the part of punishment.

§ 12. 2. Furthermore, as disease is to disease, so medicine is to medicine: but in the Old Testament they were presented to the priest for a bodily disease, but in the New for a spiritual disease: therefore in the Old Testament there was only bodily medicine, and in the New it will be spiritual: therefore just as the priest of the Old Testament restored to the camp bodily, so the priest of the New Testament restores to the camp spiritually: therefore he does something more than showing them loosed or bound.

§ 13. Response. It must be said that a showing is done in two ways, namely by a demonstration alone, just as what is colored is shown by a finger: and through an exhibition in a work, just as a craftsman demonstrates an artifact when he makes it stand perfect before the eyes of the beholders. And a showing is not taken here in the first way, but according to some mode of the second demonstration and showing: but that one is twofold, namely when the artifact is completely made, or when it is made in the ultimate completive part: for then that which is according to a part demonstrates the perfect whole. Thus it is here: for God has forgiven the guilt in contrition, and has relaxed the debt of eternal death: and for completion there remains that which is committed to the ministers of the Church, namely the relaxation of purgatorial punishment, and the enjoining of expiatory [punishment]: and this is a part of the cure and absolution of sin, and demonstrates that the whole is complete, because it is the ultimate part, as is clear from the aforesaid. And in this way all the authorities of this chapter are to be glossed.

§ 1. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Legal Priest Had The Keys

Whether a Legal priest had the keys?

§ 2. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, F, after the beginning: Just as formerly the Legal [priest] in those who, etc.

§ 3. For it is asked, Whether a Legal priest had the keys?

It seems that he did: because 1. He had an order: and the key is a sequel of order: therefore he had the keys.

§ 4. 2. Furthermore, the keys are the knowledge of discerning and the power of binding and loosing: but the office of the priests was to discern between cleanness and uncleanness, and also to send outside the camp, and to restore to the same: which is to bind and loose: therefore the Legal priest had the keys.

§ 5. 3. Furthermore, it is evident that power in spiritual matters was committed to the Legal priests over the people of God: but spiritual power consists totally in the power of binding and loosing with respect to those things which pertain to the cohabitation of the people: therefore the Legal [priest] had the power of binding and loosing: therefore he had the keys.

§ 6. BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. The whole fact of the sacraments of the old law consisted in an exterior work, just as also the law itself which prohibited the hand and not the mind, because it did not confer grace toward the prohibition of the mind: therefore the order of the old law did not confer anything interiorly: therefore it did not imprint a character, nor give an interior and spiritual power: but spiritual power is a sequel of a character and a key: therefore the Legal priest did not have a key.

§ 7. 2. Furthermore, the sacraments of the old law signified and did not confer grace: therefore the order signified what is conferred in the order of the New Testament, and did not confer it: but spiritual power, which is the key, is conferred in the order of the New Testament: therefore it was not conferred in the Old, but only signified.

§ 8. 3. Furthermore, the New Testament abounds over the Old in some spiritual power: but it does not seem to abound in another, except because it is in spiritual matters, whereas that was in bodily matters: but the key is a spiritual power: therefore it is necessarily among those things in which the New Testament abounds over the Old Testament.

§ 9. Response. It must be said that in the Old Testament the Legal priest did not have the keys but he had a shadow of the key, that is, the power of absolving and binding concerning bodily uncleannesses, which signified the spiritual uncleannesses in which the Evangelical priest absolves and binds. Therefore we concede the reasons last brought forward.

§ 10. TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said that the priest had a key just as he had an order; but he had a shadow of an order, because it did not imprint a character, and therefore he had nothing but a shadow of a key either.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that the authority of discerning in spiritual matters, and the power of binding, is the key, and not in bodily matters, but rather it is a shadow of the key, when it is concerning bodily uncleannesses.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that the spiritual things of the Old Testament and of the New are said to be spiritual almost equivocally: for those are spiritual which signify spiritual things, and they are divided concerning the kingdom, and such things, which are dispensed through secular persons and laymen: and in such a way spiritual matters were committed to the priests of the Old law, and these are spiritual matters relatively speaking. Then there are spiritual things conferring the spirit, and these are the spiritual things of the New law, and therefore power in such things is simply the key: but power in the former is a power relatively speaking.

Articulus 15 — Whether That Saying Of The Savior Is True, "Whatever You Shall Bind Upon Earth," Etc

Whether that saying of the Savior is true, "Whatever you bind upon earth, etc."?

§ 3. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G: The priests also bind while [enjoining] satisfaction, etc.

§ 4. For it seems that in this way not whatever they bind is bound also in heaven: and whatever they loose is loosed also in heaven.

§ 5. 1. For the priest can impose a lesser [penance] than condign, with the key not erring, because punishments are arbitrary: and then if that one dies having fulfilled the penance which the priest enjoined on him, he does not fly up, but finishes it in purgatory: therefore it seems that what he loosed even with the key not erring is not loosed in heaven.

§ 6. 2. Furthermore, there seems to be an instance in someone approaching falsely: because he is absolved by a man even with the key not erring, and yet he is not absolved by God. But that he is absolved by a man with the key not erring is clear: because a man ought not to judge nor can he, except according to exterior signs: and let us posit that all these concur in a false deceiver: therefore he is to be absolved: and yet he is not absolved by God: therefore it seems that there is an instance to the proposition.

§ 7. 3. Furthermore, if any judge is constituted in the forum of causes, he will not be bound to judge except according to exterior things, not interior things: therefore it seems, since the one hearing confessions is also a man, that signs ought to suffice: therefore he is bound to absolve according to exterior signs: and yet it very often happens that those are not absolved before God.

§ 8. Solution. To this some say that the Lord uses a verb of the subjunctive mood both in Matthew and in John: and this signifies the reality of the verb already perfected, because otherwise another [act] would not be conjoined and subjoined to that act. Hence the sense is: Whatever you shall loose, that is, of whoever you shall perfect the loosing begun by me in contrition, it will be loosed also in heaven. And likewise it must be said concerning the verb noting binding.

§ 9. And thus they say to all the things brought forward, that there is no instance: because their loosing is not perfected by the priest.

§ 10. But that this is completely nothing, is proved thus:

1. Let it be posited that the priest enjoins a condign penance for the sins: and yet that one dies before he fulfills it: he goes to purgatory: and yet according to this grammar, the priest had perfected the absolution: therefore the solution is worthless, because God does not immediately repute him absolved.

§ 11. 2. Furthermore, it is also objected against this solution: because once absolution is made, the priest has already discharged his office entirely: therefore then he absolves: and yet that one is still bound by the bond of satisfaction: therefore God does not repute entirely loosed him whom that one loosed.

§ 12. But if you say that the absolution of the priest is first completed then when the penance is fulfilled: this is ridiculous, because Master Hugh of St. Victor says that the priest looses by binding:

moreover, he binds to temporal punishment: therefore his entire absolution is perfected when he binds with every bond of expiatory satisfaction.

§ 1. Response. It must be said that that solution in my judgment is completely null: but it is understood that God reputes him loosed for as much as the priest absolves him, that is, by relaxing a part of the punishment: for God never exacts that part from him: and whatever he binds, with the bond remaining, he never absolves.

§ 2. To the first therefore it must be said that there is no instance: because God absolves him only relatively, namely from a part of the punishment, and not from the whole: and therefore he pays the other part in purgatory.

§ 3. But to this which is objected concerning the false approacher, it must be said that the Holy Spirit of discipline flees him: and therefore he has the sacrament, but not the reality of the sacrament. But this which the Lord says is understood of those participating in the reality and the sacrament: just as also in baptism it does not follow, "If baptism cleanses from every sin, that on account of this it cleanses the false approacher."

§ 4. But to those two things which are brought forward to prove it, it must be said that in truth the priest does not err, nor is there a defect on his part, because he reconciles well: but that one is not reconciled on account of the impediment of falseness.

§ 5. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 16 — Whether The Definition Of Excommunication Given By The Master Is Good

Whether the definition of excommunication given by the Master is good?

§ 6. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, G, § 2: There is also another mode of binding and loosing, which is done through excommunication, etc.

§ 7. But let us inquire here first, What is excommunication? Second, In how many modes is it done? Third, Against whom is it to be brought? Fourth, By whom is it to be brought? Fifth, How is it to be brought? Sixth, Whether minor excommunication is a mortal sin?

§ 8. Excommunication is defined by the Jurisprudes thus: Excommunication is separation from the communion of the Church with respect to the fruit and common suffrages of the Church.

§ 9. But it seems that it is not general: because 1. Someone is excommunicated unjustly, or even justly with respect to the exterior man, and yet unjustly with respect to the interior: and then he is not separated from the communion of the Church. Proof. The Church does not commune in bodily things, but in spiritual things: and this one still partakes of the spiritual things of the Church, because he does not lose charity on account of this, but has it: therefore not every excommunicated person is separated from the Church: therefore excommunication is not generally separation from the communion of the Church.

§ 10. 2. Furthermore, the Church prays for heretics publicly on Good Friday, and privately often: therefore it does not withdraw from them the suffrages of the Church: therefore it seems that the last part of the definition is also false, and does not apply, etc.

§ 11. 3. Besides, what is called fruit there? For it is evident that it is not the fruit of temporal goods there: because he is not spoiled of his goods on account of the fact that he is excommunicated. But if it is said that it is spiritual fruit of which it speaks: then it seems that it does not differ from that which follows, namely the suffrages of the Church.

§ 12. To the first of these, one proceeds thus: Response. It must be said to this, that

§ 1. Excommunication is defined inasmuch as it expresses a privation of communion: and thus the Decretists say: Excommunication is a separation from any licit communion or legitimate act. And that communion is said to be what is done in these cases, which are noted in this verse: Os, orare, vale, communio, mensa negatur. (The mouth [kiss], praying, greeting, communion, and the table are denied.) Namely, lest he be received with a kiss, lest one pray with him in the same oratory, lest anyone have communion with him in the sacraments, lest one eat with him at the same table. For these are called legitimate acts: hence since privation is spoken of in this way, it is clear that it belongs to the same genus as communion, which is a relation of ecclesiastical unity and conjoined society according to those acts. § 2. Therefore it must be said to the first, that if that definition is sustained, that when someone is excommunicated before man, and is not excommunicated before God, this happens from error and a defect of proof: and then he is even for that reason separated before man, although before God he is conjoined: and this suffices for excommunication, according as it is a bond of the Church by which it is united in this life, which is full of errors. § 3. To the next it must be said, that one prays for all, so that they may be brought near to grace: nevertheless one does not pray with all, and as long as they remain in true excommunication, they will not perfect fruit: but the Church asks that they be made worthy of absolution, and thus participate in the fruit of the Church's communion. § 4. To the next it must be said, that the fruit in the Church is manifold besides suffrages: because the very living-together of the members of the Church provides a great fruit for remaining with God. There is also fruit from the communion of the sacraments. But suffrages consist in prayers and oblations, in which the excommunicated do not participate, as long as they are justly excommunicated.

Articulus 17 — In How Many Ways Excommunication Is Carried Out

In how many ways does excommunication occur? § 5. Secondly it is asked, In how many ways does excommunication occur? § 6. It seems, that in many ways: because 1. We see men excommunicated for so many and diverse and new causes: therefore it seems that the mode of excommunication cannot be reduced to one certain number. § 7. 2. It seems again, that everyone sinning mortally is excommunicated, and that a new mode of excommunicating is a mortal sin: because one sinning mortally does not communicate in the sacraments and the spiritual fruits and suffrages of the Church: therefore he himself is excommunicated. § 8. 3. Moreover, the Apostle says, that if he who is named a brother, namely among you, is a fornicator, or covetous, or serving idols, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a one not even to take food therefore it seems that he himself is excommunicated. § 9. 4. Moreover, in the same place, he excommunicates a fornicator, who had his father's wife, namely his stepmother. And by the same reasoning one can be excommunicated for any other sin: therefore it seems that there are as many species of excommunications as there are species of mortal sins: and these are not reducible to one certain number, because evil is manifold, as the Philosopher says, and blessed Dionysius confirms: therefore it seems that the species of excommunications are not reducible to a certain number. § 10. BUT ON THE CONTRARY to this it is objected, that excommunications are not inflicted by those having jurisdiction except in two ways, namely major, and minor. The major is said to be that which cuts off from three things, namely the participation of the sacraments, entry into the Church, and the communion of the faithful in legitimate acts: and this is also called anathematization. The minor, however, is that which only removes from the participation of the sacraments, and not from the other two: therefore it seems that there cannot be more species of excommunications. § 11. Response. To this it must be said, that there are only two species or modes of excommunications, as the last adduced objection proves, the reason for which is this: because excommunication is a privation: and therefore it is necessary that it be known from its habit: but the communion of the faithful regarding the militant Church is generically in these three things, namely in the purely spiritual which is the participation of the sacraments, and the purely corporeal which is the legitimate act without which there is no human conversation and conjunction: because as the Philosopher says, man is a political animal: and he must communicate with his neighbor in legal and legitimate acts. The third, however, in which he communicates, is partly corporeal and partly spiritual, which is the gathering at the place of worship and the consecration of the sacraments. If therefore it is a privation from the whole that constitutes communion, it is anathema, or major excommunication. If, however, it is a spiritual privation only, it is the excommunication which is called minor. § 12. But if you should ask, Why is there not one minor which would deprive only of the corporeal, just as one minor which deprives only of the spiritual: and again another which would deprive of two of these, namely the purely spiritual and purely corporeal, or purely spiritual and the middle between corporeal and spiritual, or purely corporeal and the middle, so that thus we would have five minors? It must be said, that excommunication is a spiritual bond, and for it to be an excommunication it must always deprive of the spiritual. Hence also it never deprives of the corporeal, except in order to the spiritual: and therefore it is necessary in the minor to deprive of the participation of the sacraments. But another reason for the same is: because frequently a just excommunication supposes a mortal sin in the excommunicated: and he would add to the sin, if he communicated in the sacraments, namely the Eucharist: because penance is forbidden to no one: but he does not sin mortally by communicating in corporeal things, unless he ought to withdraw himself by the precept of the Church in major excommunication. And therefore again there are no minors which deprive of communion in those four ways which have been stated. § 13. To all those things which were first adduced, it must be said that one sinning mortally is excommunicated as regards the triumphant Church: but the militant Church cannot live in the perfection of that one, and therefore it is necessary to sustain those sinning mortally in the communion of corporeal things for a time in many cases: because otherwise, as the Apostle says, it would behoove us to go out of this world, if we ought to associate with no one existing in mortal sin. To that which is objected concerning the Apostle, it must be said that he did not command to excommunicate those sinning mortally by the very fact that they sinned mortally, but because having been rebuked by their Bishop they were found contumacious, and refused to make satisfaction: and even today for any mortal sin anyone can be excommunicated. § 14. To the others the solution is clear from what has been said.

Articulus 18 — Upon Whom Excommunication Is To Be Imposed

Against whom is excommunication to be pronounced? § 15. Thirdly it is asked, Against whom is excommunication to be pronounced? § 16. It seems, that against no one: 1. For harm is not to be done to anyone in corporeal things: therefore much less harm in spiritual things: but the subtraction of spiritual things is harm in spiritual things: therefore it is not to be done to anyone: but this is done through excommunication: therefore excommunication is not to be pronounced against anyone. § 17. 2. Moreover it seems, that as long as there is another way of correction and salvation, the sentence of excommunication is not to be pronounced: but as long as there is hope of salvation through conversion, so long does another way remain: therefore as long as there is hope of conversion in someone, so long he is not to be excommunicated: but the conversion of no one is to be despaired of, as Augustine says: therefore no one is to be excommunicated. § 18. 3. Moreover, Augustine says, that rash judgment is committed in two ways, namely when doubtful things are judged as certain, or when someone is finally condemned who is able to repent: but one who excommunicates condemns in this way: therefore he himself sins mortally: therefore no one is to be excommunicated. Proof of the middle premise. As has been said, excommunication is not to be pronounced as long as the hope of conversion remains: but the hope of conversion remains as long as a final condemnation is not yet made before the one excommunicating: therefore the sentence is not pronounced unless a final condemnation is made, and thus the proposition is held. § 19. But if this be said, it seems that the whole Church errs, which excommunicates many. § 20. Further it is asked here, Why the whole multitude as a community cannot be excommunicated? For a multitude can consent together into contumacy: therefore it seems that it ought and can be excommunicated: although nevertheless a new constitution establishes the contrary. § 21. Response. It must be said, that every contumacious person insofar as he is contumacious, can and ought to be excommunicated, and for no other vice is anyone to be excommunicated: the cause of which is this, because excommunication is a medicine by accident which is given to the desperate, when there is no other way of health and salvation for him, just as to a desperate sick man it is permitted to live according to his own will, so that from some aroused cause nature may multiply its forces to expel the disease. Thus to the contumacious one who can be corrected by no other way, the bond of communion is cut off, so that thus rushing from sin to sin without a bridle, having considered his own utility and his defect, he may return to humility and full conversion, and the grace of conversion. § 22. To the first therefore it must be said, that harm is not done to him simply: but because he himself has despairingly deprived himself of the fruit of spiritual things, the Church seeks a remedy by accident, where nothing else is able to bring back such a one. § 23. To the next it must be said, that the Church does not so despair of him, that she does not labor for his return, and therefore she excommunicates him: but she despairs of another mode of conversion inasmuch as it is from the signs considered in him: but the Church never despairs of the mercy of the Lord which converts sinners. § 24. Through this the solution to the following is also clear.

Articulus 19 — Whether Anyone Who Has The Keys Can Excommunicate

Can anyone who has the keys excommunicate? § 25. Fourthly it is asked, By whom is excommunication to be pronounced? § 26. It seems, that by everyone who has the keys: 1. For as the Philosopher says, to whom the power belongs, to him also belongs the act: but the power is the key, as is held from the Text, and its act is to bind and loose through excommunication and absolution: therefore everyone having the keys can excommunicate. § 27. 2. Moreover, a simple parish priest has some coercion over the people committed to him: but he cannot have it except through spiritual bonds, which are excommunication, and other spiritual penalties: therefore he can excommunicate. § 28. 3. Moreover, it seems to belong to the same person to give communion, and to excommunicate: but a simple parish priest gives communion to his people: therefore he can also excommunicate. § 29. If this be said, the use of the Church holds the contrary, saying that a simple priest cannot excommunicate except in general cases, as for unknown thefts, or violated thefts, and the like. § 30. Further it is asked, Whether Archdeacons can excommunicate? § 31. And it seems that they cannot: because to whom the power does not belong, his is not the act: but the power does not belong to him who does not have the key: therefore neither does the act. But that Archdeacons do not have the keys is proved from this that the key is of the sacerdotal order, as will be held in the following distinction, and they are not priests. § 32. But against this is, that one having jurisdiction ought to have the arms of such a judge. Archdeacons have jurisdiction: therefore, etc.: but such arms are excommunications: therefore, etc. § 33. Further it is asked here, Whether one suspended or excommunicated can excommunicate? § 34. It seems, that he cannot: because one bound by a corporeal bond, can neither bind nor loose another: but spiritual bonds are stronger than corporeal ones: therefore also one bound by a spiritual bond, can neither bind nor loose another: but the spiritual bond is excommunication, and suspension. § 35. But against this is, that one suspended from office has not on this account lost jurisdiction: similarly neither has the excommunicated, because his jurisdiction is not given to another, nor is he himself invested again, when he is absolved from excommunication: therefore it seems that he also has those things which are annexed to jurisdiction: but this is the power of excommunicating and absolving: therefore he still has the power of excommunicating and absolving from excommunication. § 36. Response. It must be said, that one having the jurisdiction of an ordinary judge or a delegate can excommunicate and absolve, as some say who are knowledgeable in law: and it is reasonable enough to be so: because these bonds are coercions in the forum of cases: but judges have to cognize cases: hence it is reasonable that they have power in these bonds. § 37. To the first therefore it must be said, that this act is of a complete power, and not of a diminished one: but diminished is the power from order alone, and not outside of jurisdiction: and therefore not everyone having a key, also has the power of excommunicating. § 38. Another reason for this is: because the key of jurisdiction is greater than that of order: and therefore again it does not follow, that everyone having a key, also has the power of excommunicating and absolving. § 39. A third reason for this is sufficiently pious: because since excommunication is the greatest loss which can be done to a Christian in this life, it is to be done rarely and with moderation: and therefore to a few and only to superiors who are presumed to be more discreet, such power is committed. § 40. To the next it must be said, that in many other ways through communication and rebuke a parish priest can turn his subjects away from evil: and if he cannot do this, he ought to have recourse to a superior, and by his authority denounce him as excommunicated. § 41. To the next it must be said, that the argument is not valid: because the Church is more prone to communicate spiritual things, than to subtract them: and therefore the first she committed in many ways, but the second to a few and discreet ones. § 42. To that which is further asked, it must be said, that Archdeacons are the eyes of the Bishop, and they have jurisdiction, although they do not have the key. And because they are the eyes of the Bishop, there descends into them from the Bishop who has the keys and jurisdiction that which belongs more to jurisdiction than to the key, but not that which belongs more to the key than to jurisdiction: and therefore they can absolve and bind through excommunication in the forum of cases, but not in the forum of confession or penance. § 43. To the objection to the contrary the solution is clear: because the power of excommunicating is more of jurisdiction than of the key and order, and therefore it descends into them. § 44. To that which is further asked, it must be said, that it differs concerning one suspended and one excommunicated: because one suspended can be suspended in three ways, namely from office only, from jurisdiction only, or from both: and however he may be suspended, then it must always be said, that he cannot do those things which belong to that from which he himself is suspended. For if he is suspended from office, he cannot do those things which belong to the office, such as to celebrate, to consecrate, and the like: but he can do those things which belong to jurisdiction, such as to excommunicate, and the like. But if he is suspended from jurisdiction, then in his capacity it is the converse. But if from both, then he can do neither. § 45. To the argument however adduced it must be said, that it is true provided the simile is well understood: for one bound in some member, does not have the use of that member, so that he may bind or loose another with it: but with another member not bound, he can loose or bind another: but one bound universally in his entirety, can neither absolve nor bind anyone: and so it is in spiritual things, as is clear from the aforesaid distinction of the suspended one. § 46. To that which is asked concerning the excommunicated, it must be said that one excommunicated with the major excommunication cannot excommunicate anyone. § 47. To the argument however made to the contrary, it must be said that jurisdiction is in habit, and not reducible into act, as long as he is excommunicated, it resides with him: and this such jurisdiction can neither loose nor bind.

Articulus 20 — How Excommunication Is To Be Imposed

How is excommunication to be pronounced? § 48. Fifthly it is asked, How is excommunication to be pronounced? § 49. But it seems, that with the greatest diligence: because the greatest danger is in excommunication: but where there is the greatest danger, there it seems the greatest diligence is needed: therefore in excommunication the greatest diligence is needed. § 50. But against this seems to be this abuse of the Church: because excommunications are cast with even less diligence, than anything else which is done in the Church. § 51. Next to this it is further asked, When someone in necessity due to infirmity is absolved, because then he can be absolved by any priest, and afterwards he does not fulfill the mandate of the Church as he promised by swearing, whether the excommunication returns upon him? § 52. It seems, that it does because: 1. To the servant not forgiving his fellow-servant the debt was revoked. Therefore by a similar reasoning to this one not doing what he ought and promised, the excommunication is revoked: therefore it returns. § 53. 2. Moreover, to one who ought to confess and does not confess, the guilt is revoked which had been loosed in contrition: therefore also to this one by a similar reasoning the excommunication is revoked on account of a similar cause. § 54. But on the contrary: This one through the priest in truth was absolved: therefore the excommunication was annihilated: but those things which are annihilated, do not return numerically the same: therefore this excommunication never returns: but he was not excommunicated by any other excommunication except that one: therefore this one is excommunicated by no excommunication: therefore the excommunication does not return upon him. § 55. Response. It must be said, that for the just form of excommunication three things concur, namely that the excommunication be from intention, and from order, and from a cause. From intention, as with a zeal for rebuking, not of avenging oneself, with a diligent admonition sent ahead. From the order of right which is described in the new constitution, namely that after the admonition, and the despair of another way, the judge should write the cause of the excommunication, and the contumacy of the excommunicated one, and the sentence itself, and by sitting as though quiet he should pronounce it, and within forty days he should be ready to give it, when he will have requested, to the excommunicated. But the cause is what he himself who is excommunicated merited according to the truth or through things alleged, which is also given to him in writing, if he requests it within forty days. And therefore the first reason is to be conceded. § 56. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is an abuse, and they sin mortally thus hurling sentences of excommunication: and beyond this in the new constitution the penalty is that for forty days he should abstain from entering the Church, and the excommunicated one should be absolved by a superior without difficulty, and moreover the one excommunicating should be condemned to all the expenses which the excommunicated one incurred in the case of his absolution, and to all interest. § 57. To that however which is further asked, it must be said that in my judgment it is impossible for an excommunication once loosed to return numerically the same: hence such a one is absolved simply, and will always be absolved, unless he be again excommunicated, on account of the fact that he did not keep the mandate of the Church as he promised by swearing. § 58. To those things which are to the contrary, there is a single solution, that neither in those cases does the preceding debt return numerically the same: but another one specifically the same is born for the subsequent contempt. § 59. But this will be better declared below, where it will be treated concerning the return of sins.

Articulus 21 — Whether To Participate With An Excommunicate Is A Mortal Sin

Is it a mortal sin to participate with an excommunicated person? § 60. Sixthly and lastly it is asked, Whether to participate with an excommunicated person is a mortal sin? § 61. But it seems, that it is: because 1. As of a mortal sin the Apostle rebuked the Corinthians, who communicated with such a one, 1 Cor. 5:6, where he says, that a little leaven corrupts the whole lump. Therefore it seems, that in others it is a mortal sin. § 62. 2. Moreover, to act against a precept is a mortal sin: but the precept of the Church is, that no one should communicate with such persons: therefore it seems, that to communicate with such persons is a mortal sin. § 63. But on the contrary: I see, that the one excommunicating communicates with him in food and word and kiss, if it is necessary, and this is seen all day long in the Bishops of our time. Since therefore I am not bound to be more perfect than my Prelate, it seems that I too can licitly communicate with such persons. § 64. Solution. To this without prejudice it seems it must be said, that it is one thing to communicate with him who is excommunicated, and another thing to communicate with the excommunicated person insofar as he is excommunicated: for one communicating in the second way, communicates with him in the cause of the excommunication, or in the crime for which he is excommunicated: and he is excommunicated with the major excommunication just as the first one is. § 65. But to communicate with him who is excommunicated, happens in two ways, namely by the major excommunication, and by the minor. But one communicating with an excommunicated person by the minor excommunication, is not excommunicated: but he who communicates with a person excommunicated by the major excommunication sins in an unpermitted case. But the permitted cases are for those whose association cannot exist without him: such as if it be a wife, son, servant, bailiff, peasant, or the like, which look to civil association, if he is ignorant, if there is evident utility, or necessity. And this is noted by this verse: Utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, necesse. (Utility, law, lowliness, ignorance, necessity.) Law is said to be marriage, and lowliness namely servitude, and the others are clear. However if two are excommunicated by such a communion in an unpermitted case, one can absolve the other. And therefore they commonly say, that one communicating with an excommunicated person, either not caring, or contemning the bond of the Church, sins mortally. But he who induced by the cause of fear, or by the bond of friendship, communicates only by word with fear, I would not dare to say, that he thereby mortally sins. § 66. To that which is objected, the solution is clear through the distinction. § 67. Note also, that no one is bound to believe someone to be excommunicated, unless he is present at the denunciation, or it is intimated to him through the one denouncing, or he is so certified through public fame, that in no way could a doubt about this be generated for him: because good is to be presumed of anyone, until the contrary is proved. § 68. Next the verses concerning that which he says, there, G, § 2, after the beginning, are to be noted: The sentence of the Church from the place of prayer, etc. Grace is subtracted, more and more with the barrier broken, From vice he rushes into vice, he loses the suffrages Of the Church, he is handed over to Satan to be vexed, Whom anathematization binds from his own faults.

Articulus 22 — Whether Stain, Darkness, Fomes, And Other Things Which Are In The Sinner, Can Be Said To Be From God

Can the stain, darkness, tinder, and other things which are in the sinner, be said to be from God? § 69. Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, I, Here it is asked, What is that stain, etc. Namely whether the stain and darkness is from God, or not? § 70. But it seems, that it is: because every penalty is from God: but the stain and darkness are penalties: therefore they are from God. § 71. But on the contrary: 1. God does not make anything by which His work would be worse, as Augustine says: the stain and the fault make the work of God worse: therefore God does not make them: therefore they are not from God. § 72. 2. Moreover, Fulgentius says, that God is not the author of that thing, of which He is the avenger: but He avenges onto the stain and darkness: therefore He is not the author of the stain and darkness. § 73. Response. It must be said, that a penalty has a twofold comparison, namely to the inflicting cause which is the just and right judgment, and to the meritorious cause which is iniquity. But spiritual penalties are sometimes named by a name which does not express only the penalty, but also the other of those comparisons: as when to suffer burning for a sin is named, it is named in comparison to the judgment, just as a thief is said to suffer hanging. But when it is called tinder, or darkness, or stain, the penalty is named by a name enclosing in its notion also the order to the meritorious cause, which is the fault: and because in such an order it is not from God, it must be said that the tinder is not from God, nor the stain, nor the darkness, nor anything of this kind. § 74. To that which is objected against this, it must be said that a penalty does not speak of a comparison to the fault: and therefore when he assumes the stain, he assumes it not directly under the middle term, but with an accident which is extraneous to the middle term. And therefore that argumentation sins according to accident: just as, you know Coriscus: Coriscus is the one coming: therefore you know the one coming.

DISTINCTIO XIX

Divisio Textus

§ 75. After it has been shown what they are, etc. In this distinction it is treated concerning the keys on the part of the one receiving the keys. § 76. And it is divided into two parts. In the first it is asked and determined who has the keys. In the second, who has them worthily, there, C, But to others it seems, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Had The Keys

Did Christ have the keys? § 77. But circa the first four things are doubted, namely whether Christ had the keys? Secondly, Whether the key is equally for closing and opening, or for only one of these? Thirdly, How are the keys related to order? Fourthly, Whether one not having the sacerdotal order has the keys? § 78. To the first it is thus objected: 1. Christ had the plenitude of all power: therefore He also had the power of the key. § 79. 2. Also, He fully had the power of baptizing and confirming: therefore also of operating in penance: and this is done through the keys: therefore, etc. § 80. 3. Also, He absolved sinners, namely Magdalene, Zacchaeus, and the like: but this could not be done except through the keys: therefore, etc. § 81. 4. Also, Nothing gives what it does not have: but He gave the keys to Peter: therefore as before. § 82. On the contrary: 1. One having the keys, does not have the power of binding and loosing except through them: but Christ did not have anything from the keys, but rather the keys from Him: just as also whatever baptism has, it has from Christ: therefore Christ did not have the keys. § 83. 2. Also, The keys are the instruments of the ministers of the Church: but Christ existing as the head of the Church according as He is man, is not a minister of the Church: therefore He did not have the keys. § 84. 3. Also, In worldly things we see, that it does not befit royal excellence to have the keys of his treasuries, but they are committed to faithful ministers: but Christ is more excellent than any king: therefore it does not befit Him to have the keys, but His ministers. § 85. Response. It must be said, that power through the keys is said in two ways. For the preposition through can speak of an instrumental cause: and in this way nothing prohibits Christ from having the keys, not from the key, but from the Father: because even in natural things every motion by which an instrument is moved, is from the motion of the one moving it. But in this way we say, that He had the keys excellently: because without inquiry and labor He used both the authority of discerning, and the power of binding and loosing. But if the key or the power through the key, should speak of the cause of the power, by such a reasoning it would not befit Christ to have the keys: because this would be of minoration. § 86. And through this the solution to the first which is objected against this is clear, and to the second and third: because in truth the keys as they are in the ministers, give them a power which they would not have from others, and they are the sign of their office which they received from the Lord. § 87. But to the first we say, that Christ had power from Himself, although He had it from the Father: for, as Hilarius says, Christ does not thus act through Himself, that is, from the power of His nature: because whatever He is, and can do, and does, He has the whole from the Father from whom He proceeds through generation. § 88. And through this the solution to the three following is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether The Key Is Equally For Shutting And Opening

Is the key equally for closing and opening? § 89. Secondly it is asked, Whether the key is equally for closing, and opening? § 90. Which it seems it is: because 1. A material key is equally for both: therefore also a spiritual one. § 91. 2. Also, Matt. 16:19 and John 20:23, mention is made of both: therefore as before. § 92. But on the contrary: Nothing is for two things, namely for two equally principal ends, as the Philosopher proves: just as medicine is of two things, namely of health, and of sickness, yet not as of two ends: but of one as an end, and of the other as by accident, or as of that which is towards the end: therefore neither is the key for two equally principal works as for an end. § 93. Response. It must be said, that it is only of one per se, namely for opening: and the other is not intended, rather it happens from a defect of opening on account of the fault of sin. § 94. To the first however we say, that a key in corporeal things is made out of fear of thieves: and therefore on account of the possibility of the loss of things it is more principally for closing. But in spiritual things it is the converse: and therefore principally from its whole intention it is for opening. § 95. To the next it must be said, that the Lord makes mention of the things consequent upon the key, and not of the principally intended end: for they only follow upon the key from our work to close and to open, but nevertheless they are principally intended for opening, and for this they were given by the Lord.

Articulus 3 — How The Key Is Related To Order

How is the key related to order? § 96. Thirdly it is asked, How is the key related to order? § 97. But it seems, that it is as a separable accident. 1. For it happens that the sacerdotal order is preserved with the key separated, as in the degraded, who retain the character of order, and not the key, because they can neither bind nor loose: but that which can be separated with the other preserved, is related as an accident to that thing: therefore, etc. § 98. 2. Also, When someone is degraded, it is not said, I de-ordain you, but I de-authorize you: therefore since the key principally regards authority, it seems that the key is taken away while order remains: and thus it seems the same as before. § 99. But on the contrary: 1. Order is a potential whole: therefore it contains parts under it: but these are not as is commonly said, except the power of consecrating, and the power of binding and loosing: it seems, that the power of binding and loosing are a part of order. § 100. 2. Also, If a degraded person is restored, the power of binding and loosing is not conferred upon him, but only his jurisdiction is relaxed: therefore it seems, that he previously retained it with the order. § 101. Response. It must be said, that the key is a potential part of order, and is not separated from order, while order remains. § 102. To the first therefore it must be said, that in the degraded person the power of absolving remains, not reducible to act: and the reason for this was said above, because namely it is not reduced to act except through jurisdiction, and right.

The jurisdiction is taken away from him who is degraded.

To the other we say, that this is said to denote that the power which is from the character of the order cannot be taken away from him, but the administration, insofar as it depends on the jurisdiction which is lost through degradation.

Articulus 4 — Whether Doorkeepers Have The Keys

Whether doorkeepers have keys?

Fourthly, it is asked whether one not having the priestly order has keys?

And here four questions are asked.
First, whether doorkeepers have keys?
Second, whether kings anointed with holy unction have keys?
Third, whether a congregation has keys, such that no one from the congregation?
Fourth, whether women, namely prioresses and abbesses, have keys?

To the FIRST, it is objected thus:
1. Isidore says: Doorkeepers holding judgment, however, that they have keys, guard all things inside and outside: and having judgment between good and bad, they receive the worthy and reject the unworthy. To have power between good and bad is a key, as was held above.

Likewise, some key is the power of rejecting or receiving to the sacraments. Therefore, doorkeepers have keys.

1. Likewise, when doorkeepers are ordained, the keys of the Church are given to them by the Bishop: but it is evident that in the promotion of spiritual power, the visible and corporeal is referred to the spiritual, as is done in all sacraments: therefore, since the corporeal key is referred to nothing more fittingly than to the spiritual key, doorkeepers receive in their order the keys of spiritual power: and thus they have keys.
2. Likewise, Isidore says in the same place: To whom the act belongs, to him belongs the power: the act of the key is to receive the worthy to the sacraments and to eject the unworthy: and this is of the doorkeepers according to Isidore: therefore, such power is of the keys: therefore, as before.

But on the contrary, it is held,
1. Here in the Letter, that it is of the priests and Jerome on Matthew 16:19: The Church has the keys in its Bishops and priests. Others are excluded.

1. Likewise, in ordination, it is said to no one except the priest: Whose sins you remit, they are remitted to them. Therefore, no one has this power except the priest.
2. Likewise, in the sacraments, nothing spiritual is given that is not signified by a visible and corporeal element, as is evident from the definition of a sacrament disputed at the beginning of this book: but the stoles' bands directly descending are given only to the priest: and these are signs of incorporeal and spiritual bonds: therefore, only priests receive the power of binding and loosing from bonds.

3. Likewise, to whom the power of communion in the true body of Christ is given, to him should be given and is given the power in the mystical body to prepare for communion: but only to the priest is given the power of confecting the true body of Christ, which is sacred communion: therefore, only to the priest is given the power in the mystical body to prepare it for that communion: but this is done through the keys in penance and in the forum of causes: therefore, only the priest receives the keys.

What we have conceived, saying that doorkeepers receive only material keys ordered to the custody of sanctified things. And we say that Isidore speaks of the keys of the temple where holy things and sacraments are kept: and some call this key the key of those keeping watch in the temple: and that name pleases me well.

To the reasoning formed from authority, we say that this judgment is not over the cause of unworthiness, but rather over some determined by someone as worthy or unworthy, namely by a priest or Archdeacon: but the priest knows by himself who are worthy and unworthy.

Similarly, the power of receiving or excluding of the doorkeeper is not to the sacraments, but to the place of the sacraments: and therefore he does not have keys to the communion of the sacraments, but to the place of the sacraments fitting: and those are material lest the unworthy intrude upon the holy things.

To another, we say that they receive keys from the Bishop, not spiritual, but ordered to something spiritual, because to the custody of the place of the sacraments: and it is false that all things are received in the sacraments: yet, because something spiritual is understood in them, the persons themselves handling the sacraments need ordination, so that they may dare to touch and handle the vessels themselves.

To another, it must be said that they neither exclude nor receive, except in the aforesaid manner, namely determined by a superior to be unworthy or worthy and to the place of the sacraments, not to their communion: and this is not the act of the key of binding and loosing of which is treated here, as is evident from the aforesaid.

Articulus 5 — Whether Anointed Kings Have The Keys

Whether anointed kings have the keys?

To the second, it is objected thus:
1. 1 Kings 16:13, concerning David: "The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward," and it speaks of the day of anointing; but the Spirit of God operates for the remission of sins: therefore kings receive the power for the remission of sins; and this is the key: therefore they receive the keys.

1. Likewise, anointing signifies the Holy Spirit: therefore, since through it one is established over the multitude of the people of God, it seems that he receives the power of that act which the Holy Spirit operates in the multitude: but that is to communicate with the multitude and to sanctify by remitting sin: therefore the king receives the power of that act: but that act is the key: therefore, etc.

On the contrary:
Chrysostom in a certain Epistle to Basil says thus: "Indeed, the princes of the world have some power of binding, but only in bodies: however, the bond which is committed to priests touches the soul itself: therefore kings do not have the keys."

Response. It must be said that kings have no key, nor any spiritual jurisdiction: and the cause of this is that they receive power over blood, and spiritual power would be unsuitable to be joined with such power.

To the first, therefore, we say that the Spirit of the Lord was directed in David to accomplish royal works: such as victory over bodily enemies, discretion in governance or peace of the land, and the good disposition of the people. For as it is said in VIII Ethicorum: "The perfection of the kingdom is governance and statutes tending to the utility of the people, not the king: and its corruption is in tyrants, when they seek not the utility of the people, but their own in governance, and accomplish statutes and laws for their own profit."

To the other, it must be said that the Spirit of God operates in each as an organ ordered to its proper act. Hence in the king, it perfects royal acts, and in the priest, priestly acts. And therefore the argument is not valid: because although the Spirit remits sins, yet it does not operate only this act: because, Wisdom 7:22, it is said that the spirit of wisdom is manifold in its acts and gifts.

To the other, we say that the anointing of the king signifies the gentle power of the kingdom in the Holy Spirit, as it befits the faithful to command subjects; but the anointing of the priest is different, therefore it signifies a different power.

Articulus 6 — Whether A Congregation Has The Keys

Whether a congregation has the keys?

Thirdly, it is asked whether a congregation has the keys, such that no one from the congregation? And this is especially asked because of that use of the keys, which is to excommunicate and absolve.

However, it seems that it does not:

1. The key is only of sacramental order: but no congregation has such an order: therefore no congregation has the keys.
2. Likewise, the key of knowledge cannot be had by a multitude, such that no one singularly, nor the key of absolving and binding in confession: therefore by a similar reasoning, neither the key of the power of excommunicating.
3. Likewise, whose is the power, his is the action: therefore whose is not the power, his is not the action: but the action cannot be of a multitude, such that of no one: therefore neither the power.
4. Likewise, as the new constitution says: A multitude cannot be entirely excommunicated, such that no one: but individuals from the multitude can be excommunicated, and then the multitude will be excommunicated: therefore neither can it excommunicate, such that no one.

CONTRA: 1. Just as there is jurisdiction, so there is the instrument and power of jurisdiction: but jurisdiction is of one over many, and of many over one, and of many over many, such that of no one by itself: therefore also the power of excommunication, which is as it were an instrument and power of spiritual jurisdiction: therefore the multitude has the power of excommunicating, such that no one.

1. Likewise, one is the servant of some multitude, such that of no one according to itself: therefore thus it can be in spiritual matters: therefore the multitude has the power of coercing by excommunication those who are rebellious to it.

Response. It must be said that the multitude of some congregation which is reduced to one can have spiritual power of jurisdiction of excommunicating and absolving, such that no one from that multitude: and thus civil matters agree. For the Philosopher says in the eighth book of the Ethics, that ordered power is divided into two: both in politics, that is, in the governance of the city, and in economics, that is, the governance of the house. In politics indeed it is divided into a kingdom or monarchy which is the principality of one, and aristocracy: and it is called from &pisto¢ which is prince, and xpacocs which is power: and it is the power of many together according to the virtue of those commanding, such that of no one: as it is read of the Romans, 1 Maccabees 8:14 and following, that when they did many praiseworthy things, no one imposed a diadem on himself, but they followed the senate. The third polity which is called democracy is not a polity, but a certain corruption: and it is called from time which is price, and xpdcos which is power; and it is the principality of many rich having nothing of right in the principality, except because they excel in riches and prices. There is another governance in economics of the father over the sons, similar to a kingdom, and the governance of the man over the wife, or over wives, as in the Old Testament, similar to aristocracy. Thus therefore we can say that in spiritual matters there are two kinds of jurisdiction, namely the first which is of the royal priesthood, and the second of many together who have one heart and one soul, which is like a spiritual aristocracy.

To the first objection against this, we say that (as was said before) this use of the key is more of jurisdiction than of order: and therefore from one having the key and jurisdiction in the excellence of power it can descend even to one not having order, yet having jurisdiction: and if we wished to speak properly, such a personal multitude has the use of the key rather than the key.

To the other it must be said that it is not similar concerning the keys of penance: because those are only according to personal acts, and in causes which regard persons separately, such as sins: for the sins of one are not of another: and as the new constitution says, the sins of the multitude are none at all, but the jurisdiction of the multitude is not none, as has already been proven, both in urbanities and in congregations of the Church.

To the third we say that it does not follow: just as there is no act, etc., because acts are of individuals, but powers are caused from the multitude itself. Or let the reasoning be conceded, and let it be said that the act of such excommunication or absolution is of the multitude, and not of any person according to itself.

To the fourth we say that it is most reasonably constituted that the multitude cannot be excommunicated, because the multitude does not sin. And another reason is natural: because the multitude well causes active power in excellence, but never defect and impotence or passion. An example of this is that the multitude can draw a ship and draws it, and no one by itself from the multitude: yet the multitude does not draw unless each one draws: nor does the multitude lie unless each one lies: because the abundance of virtue in acting well is generated in the multitude, but not defect in suffering: and therefore it does not follow, if it can excommunicate, that it can also be excommunicated; or if it cannot be excommunicated, that it cannot excommunicate.

Articulus 7 — Whether Abbesses And Prioresses To Whom The Rule Of Women Is Committed Have The Keys

Whether abbesses and prioresses to whom the governance of women is committed, have the keys?

To the fourth it is objected thus:
It seems that abbesses and prioresses to whom the governance of women and sometimes of men is committed, have the keys: because

1. It is from the use approved by the Church, that men and women make profession in their hands: but through profession jurisdiction is received over the professed: therefore they have jurisdiction: and by that power is the key or the use of the key, as has been said: therefore such women have the keys.
2. Likewise, priests professing to them and living with them are suspended: therefore they have jurisdiction: therefore the use of the key or the key.
3. Likewise, Judges, iv, 4 and following, Deborah the prophetess judged Israel. Therefore she had jurisdiction: therefore other women can also have it.
4. Likewise, women communicate in greater spiritual matters than these: which is evident through Anna, and certain others, who were prophetesses: therefore they can also communicate in these.
5. Likewise, in polities a woman receives jurisdiction: therefore also in spiritual matters.

On the contrary:
1. Genesis iii, 16: You shall be under the power of a man. Therefore a woman ought not to be in authority: therefore neither to have jurisdiction: therefore neither the keys, nor the use of the keys.

1. Likewise, 1 Corinthians xiv, 34: Women in the churches should be silent: for it is not permitted for them to speak, but to be subject, since to be subject is not to have jurisdiction, it seems, etc.
2. Likewise, 1 Timothy ii, 12: I do not permit a woman to teach, nor to have authority over a man.

If it is said that these authorities speak of women joined to men, and not of nuns. On the contrary: The Philosopher says that the corruption of civility is for a woman alone to take power. Therefore much more is this judged a corruption in spiritual matters: therefore a woman alone, whoever she may be, should never receive jurisdiction.

1. Likewise, on that of the epistle 1 Timothy ii, 12: I do not permit a woman to teach, nor to have authority over a man, the Gloss says: Therefore she cannot have spiritual preeminence, even in her own sex: but she can have jurisdiction over women.
2. Likewise, Chrysostom: Women can do nothing, but accomplish all things through others.

Response. It must be said that a woman has no key, neither in the forum of penance, nor in the forum of causes: but she can govern a power committed to her only as to use. I say, however, a power committed, granted by an order or abbot or by the pope: because a woman is not a proper subject of power, but of subjection in spiritual matters. But nevertheless, by reason of danger, because it is dangerous for men to govern women with continuous communication and cohabitation with them, therefore the governance of power is committed to them: and only as much governance as she can, such as to command according to the rule or customs of the Church, or to appoint officials, and to impose certain penalties for excesses: although they are not properly called penances. But no key or keys can be committed to them.

To the first, therefore, we say that obedience is not promised to the abbess as superior or having the care of souls: but through her it is promised to the abbot, or bishop, or pope: and because of the danger of cohabitation it is permitted for the abbess to receive. And this seems to me, unless the authority of a superior perhaps judges otherwise: because in such matters I think one should stand by the judgment of the Pontiffs and superiors: but according to the sayings of the Saints, that seems to be said.

To the other it must be said that a woman does not suspend, but the excesses: and it is the sentence of the canon, when it comes against the constitution or custom from a woman denounced.

To the other it must be said that Deborah judged in temporal matters, but in divine matters judgment belonged to the priests.

To the other it must be said that it is not similar: because prophecy is according to divine illuminations in which there is neither male nor female, but the image of God is illustrated in both. But in jurisdiction and power, man and woman are not equal.

To the other we say that in polities she can have dominion both alone and with others: because this is temporal, but not in spiritual matters, for the reasons above introduced.

To the objection that the Gloss seems to say that she does not have dominion except in the same sex, we say that it is understood of borrowed power, as to certain things, namely the imposition of penalties, and such things as have been said above: and not as to the keys or the use of the key.

Articulus 8 — Whether By The Key Of Jurisdiction Someone Can Validly Be Excommunicated More Than Once Before Absolution From The Former, And Whether One Absolved From One Excommunication Is Absolved From Another

Whether by the key of jurisdiction someone can be excommunicated more than once before absolution from the prior excommunication? And, whether absolved from one excommunication, he is absolved from another?

Whether by the key of jurisdiction someone can be excommunicated more than once before absolution from the prior excommunication? And, whether absolved from one excommunication, he is absolved from another?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, at the end: So that it may be used to close or open.

Here four questions are asked.
First, Whether by the key of jurisdiction in causes someone can be excommunicated more than once before absolution?
Second, Whether that key can be used against someone greater than oneself, or against oneself?
Third, If it can be used on others, or only on one's own subjects?
Fourth, If a subject unwilling to submit can be absolved?

TO THE FIRST, it is objected thus:
1. Origen says: He who is outside cannot be more excommunicated: he is outside; therefore, etc.: therefore the following excommunication does nothing to him.

1. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 5:12: What have I to do with judging those who are outside? Therefore, he who is outside by penance no longer pertains to the Church to judge him: therefore, he cannot be excommunicated more than once.
2. Likewise, one who is killed cannot be killed again: but the excommunicated is killed by the spiritual sword: therefore, etc.
3. Likewise, privations do not admit of more and less: for one is as blind by one blindness as by two or three: nor can one blind by one blindness be blind by another: since therefore excommunication is nothing but the privation of communion, one cannot be more excommunicated than once.

But against this is the entire practice of the militant Church. For someone is excommunicated multiple times for multiple causes, but the universal Church does not err. Therefore, someone can be excommunicated multiple times.

Likewise, it is further asked, Whether absolved from one excommunication, he is thereby also absolved from another, if he has been excommunicated by multiple excommunications?

And it seems that he is not: because the cause for which he is excommunicated does not depend on the cause: therefore, neither does excommunication depend on excommunication: therefore, neither does absolution depend on absolution: therefore, absolved from one, he is not absolved from another.

But ON THE CONTRARY:
1. He is as much outside communion by one as by many: therefore, absolution from one without the other is of no value to him: but the Church does nothing that is of no value: therefore, the Church does not absolve him from one without the other.

1. Likewise, one is not absolved from excommunication unless he is absolved from sin: but one is not absolved from one sin unless he is absolved from all: therefore, etc.

Response. It must be said that someone excommunicated by one excommunication can also be excommunicated by another for two reasons. One is that although privations in themselves are not multiplied in the same species, nor are they intensified and remitted, yet in their causes they are multiplied, and intensified, and remitted. Hence, one blind by one blindness can be blind for multiple causes; and the more and stronger the causes, the further he is from sight: and one cause can be resolved without another. And thus excommunication distances more because it is multiplied by more and stronger causes. Another reason is that there are two effects or rather defects of excommunication: one is to cast out, the other is to retain outside. As to the first, although excommunication done multiple times does not increase, yet the cause increases as to the second.

To the first, therefore, the solution is clear from the aforesaid because one can be retained outside more, although not made more outside.

To the other, it must be said that the Apostle speaks of those who were never inside by the reception of faith and sacraments: and they cannot be excommunicated except in the case, namely if they do wrong to those who are inside: and that excommunication then does not make such a one outside, but withdraws the insiders from his conversation and communion in legitimate acts.

To the other, we say that the excommunicated is not entirely killed as to the militant Church, but is handed over to the devil to be vexed: and therefore he can be further wounded.

To the other, the solution is clear from the principle of this solution.

To what is asked, we say that he can be absolved from one excommunication, so that not from another.

To the objection against, we say that absolution from one is of value to him: because he is now retained outside by fewer bonds and causes: and therefore his return to communion is more easily open to him.

To the other, we say that it is not similar: because someone can be excommunicated even without sin. Hence, since excommunication is done according to the forum of the militant Church, and the remission of sins according to the mercy of God who reigns in the triumphant Church: it is not true that excommunication is not absolved unless sin is remitted: rather, with sin remitted by contrition, excommunication can still remain, and with excommunication remitted by absolution, sin can still remain as to God. Hence, that objection is founded on a falsehood.

Articulus 9 — Whether A Priest Can Use The Key Of Jurisdiction Against One Greater, Equal, Or Lesser Than Himself

Whether a priest can use the key of jurisdiction against someone greater, equal, or lesser than himself?

Secondly, it is asked whether a priest or bishop can use the key of jurisdiction against someone greater than himself, or equal, or himself?

It seems that he can:
4. By that in the epistle to the Galatians 1:8, where Paul excommunicates himself, and excommunicates an angel preaching another gospel: therefore he can excommunicate himself and someone greater: therefore much more an equal.

If it is said that he speaks of an evil angel who is lesser than Paul. On the contrary: the Gloss says: the angel from heaven is good or if you say that the angel is evil, lesser than Paul. On the contrary: it is said in Matthew 11:11: He who is lesser in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he, namely John the Baptist: than whom no greater has arisen among those born of women: therefore also greater than Paul.

Furthermore, Christ was made lesser than the angels because of the passion: therefore also Paul.

1. Furthermore, a priest in the Church excommunicates for theft: and let it be supposed that someone greater than him or he himself did it: therefore he will then excommunicate someone greater or equal, or himself.

ON THE CONTRARY:
The canon says that an equal does not have jurisdiction and power over an equal: therefore neither the power of excommunicating someone greater, or equal, or himself: because as it is said in geometry, anything equal to itself is such that it neither exceeds itself nor is exceeded by itself.

On the contrary.

Response. We concede that no one can excommunicate someone greater, or equal, or himself.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, we say that Paul speaks hypothetically, as Altiodorus says: just as it is impossible for an angel to do this, or us: so, etc. it is better to say that the Apostle does not pass sentence, but states the justice of excommunication to be passed. As if he were saying: It is just to excommunicate such a one: because he already ceases to be a good angel, or apostle, and attacks the faith and sacraments.

TO THE OTHER, we say that in such a case the priest excommunicates no one: because there is no jurisdiction of an equal over an equal.

Articulus 10 — Whether Someone Can Use The Key Of Jurisdiction Upon Another's Subjects

Whether someone can use the key of jurisdiction on foreign subjects?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether he can use it on foreign subjects?

It seems that he can: because
1. A diocesan can, by reason of a crime, excommunicate and absolve even those not subject to him, as the Decretal and priest say: therefore, etc.

1. Likewise, a Legate in transit also absolves those who are not of his legation: therefore a parishioner and Bishop can similarly do so.
2. Likewise, Matthew 15:24, where Christ says: "I was not sent, etc.," yet he saved a foreigner: therefore, etc.

Likewise, by the Samaritan woman who was not of Israel, the same is proven.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. The Constitution says that no one should send a sickle into another's harvest: but another's harvest is a foreign subject: therefore it is not lawful for him to excommunicate or absolve a foreigner.

1. Likewise, there are many decrees that the bishops of Egypt have Egyptian subjects: the bishops of Thrace, the Church of Thrace: and that it is not lawful for one bishop to ordain or receive the subject of another: therefore he cannot excommunicate or absolve him.

Response. It must be said that no one can extend his jurisdiction beyond what is permitted to him by his superior on a foreign subject by excommunicating or absolving, or even by absolving in penance, except in the manner which was said above.

To the FIRST, we say that by reason of a crime, by Papal constitution, one becomes of another's forum: and this is done as a punishment: hence it cannot be done in other cases.

To the second, we say that it is not similar concerning Legates and others: for a Legate of the Apostolic See ought to have reverence: and therefore the Pope allows that he bestows benefit on those through whom he passes, so that they may be more devoted to showing him honor: but it is otherwise with other bishops and parish priests: and therefore they cannot do such things.

To the other, it must be said that in the place of Christ on earth there is only one Pope: and he can do in all things - but others are called to a part of the solicitude, and therefore it is not lawful for them to extend jurisdiction beyond what is permitted to them.

Articulus 11 — Whether A Bishop Can Absolve The Unwilling

Can a Bishop absolve an unwilling person?

Fourthly, it is asked, if a Bishop or priest can absolve an unwilling subject?

It seems that he can: because
1. Augustine says that many goods, but the highest good, are bestowed upon the unwilling: absolution from excommunication is a good on the way: therefore, this can be bestowed even upon an unwilling subject.

1. Likewise, a carnal father does many things concerning his son, with the son unwilling: but a priest or Bishop is a spiritual father: therefore, by similarity, etc.
2. Likewise, one can be excommunicated unwillingly: since therefore the Church is more powerful in benefits than in penalties, one can be absolved unwillingly.

ON THE CONTRARY:
Whatever you shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and if it is not bound in heaven, it shall not be bound on earth: but no one dissenting from absolution is absolved in heaven: therefore, neither on earth can he be absolved.

Response. It must be said that someone can be absolved from the bond of excommunication even unwillingly, but not from the bond of sins in confession.

To the objection against, we say that: this is understood of the absolution which is done in the forum of confession from sins, and not of that which is done in the forum of causes and jurisdiction from excommunication. Or it may be said that he is also considered absolved by God from excommunication, although he is not considered absolved from sin: and then this is false, which destroys the consequent: but he is not absolved in heaven, that is, before God.

Articulus 12 — Whether The Good And The Bad Who Have Jurisdiction Have The Keys

Whether the good and evil having jurisdiction have the keys?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said there, B, after the beginning: For some think this power is granted only to those who keep both the doctrine and life of the Apostles, etc.

These are those heretics who are called Caractari.

However, it seems that reason argues for them.
§1. Matthew 16:19, where the Lord gave the keys to Peter and his successors: He wished to precede with the testimony of confession, because flesh and blood did not reveal it to him. Therefore, those who live according to flesh and blood do not persevere in that confession: therefore, such do not have the keys.

§2. Likewise, Wisdom 1:4: Wisdom will not enter into a malevolent soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sins. Therefore, since Christ is the power and wisdom of God, Christ does not inhabit such. Therefore, neither does He exercise the works of His power through such: but the works of His power are the works of the keys: therefore, such do nothing through the keys, nor do they have them.

§3. Likewise, from the unclean what will be cleansed? But one not having life and knowledge is unclean: therefore, he can cleanse nothing: therefore, neither does he have the keys: because the keys operate towards cleanness.

§4. Likewise, in the preceding distinction Augustine says that God remits sins through the dove, or the members of the dove: but these are not the dove, nor members of the dove: therefore, neither do they remit: therefore, neither do they have the keys, because the keys are given for the remission of sins, as it is said, John 20:23.

§5. Likewise, it seems to be against the whole nature: because nothing in inferior nature moves by the operation of some form which it does not have by itself: but it will be by accident if it moves thus. For example, the hot heats; and the not hot cannot heat, and so with others: therefore, since grace is the perfection of nature, it seems that neither in grace can it be otherwise: therefore, a sinner cannot cleanse from sins: therefore, neither does he have the keys, nor the use of the keys.

§6. If you say that Christ inhabits such by power, but not by the sanctity of life: and therefore by the power of Christ accepted in the keys they can operate remission in others, while they themselves are subject to sins. On the contrary: 2 Corinthians 6:15: What agreement has Christ with Belial? Therefore, there is no man who is partly of Christ, and partly of the devil: rather, he is wholly of Christ, or wholly of the devil.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
§1. Matthew 23:2: Upon the chair, etc. Therefore, it is to be obeyed in sa-

§ 1. [to] Moses of the sacraments and the dispensation of doctrine even to the wicked: but this would not be so, if they did not have the keys: therefore they have the keys.

§ 2. Also, it was proved above, that even the wicked have the power of dispensing other sacraments: therefore they also have power in this one: therefore they have the keys, because they do not operate in this sacrament except through the keys.

§ 3. Also, all things operating more excellently in nature produce the act of a form by which they themselves are not disposed: just as Jupiter heats and moistens, and yet is neither hot nor moist: and Mars heats and dries immoderately, and yet is neither hot nor dry, and so for the others. Therefore, since the principles of grace are not less efficacious than the principles of nature, someone to whom sins are not remitted can operate toward the remission of sins.

§ 4. Also, in human offices it does not matter whether the key-bearer consents to the distribution of those things which are unlocked by the keys, or dissents, provided that the lord wills to dispense them. Therefore, it is similar here in the divine keys: therefore it does not matter whether the minister is good or bad, provided the Lord is good.

§ 5. Response. It must be said that good and bad priests have the key, if they have jurisdiction: they also have the execution of the keys.

§ 6. To the first against this, therefore, we say that the Lord praised two things in Peter, namely the dignity for receiving the key, and the solidity of the truth of faith. But yet he did not found the reception of the key except upon the second of these, namely upon the truth of faith. And it is true that every priest ordained in the form of the faith and of the faithful receives the keys, but he receives them to his own damnation if he is not of good life and sufficient knowledge.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that it is understood with respect to inhabiting grace, and not with respect to the operation of gratuitously given grace.

§ 8. To the next we say that that authority speaks regarding those who work impurities out of a habit: and these are bad works, and bad examples. And this is evident through what follows there "What truth will be spoken by a liar?" because many true things can be spoken by a liar: but he speaks nothing true when speaking from the habit of a lie.

§ 9. To the next we say that the members of the dove are twofold, namely with respect to motion, and with respect to sensation. Prelates of this sort, therefore, are members of the dove that are moved only for the utility of others: but they do not feel by experience the grace of the dove vivifying in the spirit.

§ 10. To the next we say that although it is so in the lower elements and elemented things, yet in the higher things it is not true, as the objection made to the contrary proves. Or otherwise and better it must be said, that that simile shows what kind of men worthy ministers ought to be, and not what kind they necessarily are: because it is only per accidens that something can cooperate toward its contrary, as the Philosopher says in II Meteorology, because being hotter sometimes cooperates toward greater cold: just as a hot cloud is rare, and being rare it receives the surrounding cold from all sides, on account of which it happens that the cold sinks deeper into such a cloud, and solidifies into hail: yet from another, less hot cloud, only rain is generated. For it is not a general rule in nature which is brought forward for the simile.

§ 11. To the next we say that Christ does not inhabit such men: because he is not said to inhabit except those whom he inhabits through grace making pleasing: but he is in others, yet does not inhabit them. And that this is not unfitting is evident: because in some he is only through the operation of miracles and prophecy, and yet they are members of the devil: and he operated through a donkey, and yet he did not inhabit the donkey: and therefore this that is brought forward from the epistle does nothing, because there the Apostle is speaking of those who thought God could be held in sins through inhabiting grace.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Good And The Bad Equally Rightly And Worthily Have The Power Of The Keys

§ 13. Next, it is inquired concerning what he says there, C, after the beginning: "But they do not have it, namely the key of binding and loosing, rightly and worthily," etc.

§ 14. AGAINST: Everyone who uses a power for the use to which it is destined, rightly has the power. But these men use the power in this way: therefore they have it rightly. But such men rightly baptize, and rightly absolve: therefore, etc.

§ 15. Response. The rectitude of power is twofold, namely with respect to the act and with respect to the subject. And with respect to the act some hold themselves rightly, but not rightly with respect to the subject.

§ 16. Through this the solution to both is clear: because they proceed in that sense in which rectitude is taken with respect to the act.

Articulus 14 — Whether Moses And Aaron Were Priests, And How Differently

§ 17. ARTICLE XIV. Were Moses and Aaron priests, and how differently?

§ 18. Next, it is inquired concerning what he says there, B, around the middle: "It was said by the Lord in Numbers to Moses and Aaron the priests," etc.

§ 19. AGAINST: Aaron alone was the high priest, and not Moses, as appears .

§ 20. Response. It must be said that Moses is called a priest, not by the office of offering oblations, but of revealing sacred things: because he gave the sacred things immediately received from God to the people, and he ordained the oblations for them.

Articulus 15 — Whether Caiaphas Is Rightly Said To Have Prophesied

§ 22. Next it is inquired concerning what he says there, C, after the middle: "Since he was the high priest of that year, he prophesied," etc.

§ 23. 1. This seems false: because the Gloss says: "One is not a prophet except by intellectual vision." But he did not have an intellectual vision, because he did not understand what he said in the way that the Evangelist says the Holy Spirit understood it: therefore he did not prophesy.

§ 24. 2. Also "Intelligence is needed in a vision." Since therefore this man did not have intelligence, he did not prophesy.

§ 25. 3. Also, what the Evangelist says seems false: "But he did not say this of himself." Because he who speaks falsehood and sin, speaks of himself. This man speaks falsehood and sin: therefore, etc. The proof of the first is "When he speaks a lie, he speaks from his own." The proof of the second is: because when he said, "It is expedient," etc., he understood it of temporal utility, and of the unjust death of Christ. And in this way it is false; therefore, etc.

§ 26. Response. In the utterance of Caiaphas there were four things, namely the intention of the speaker which moves the speaker, and the understanding of the speaker which he himself understood in the words, and such a mode of the words through which he spoke, and the voice itself which he spoke. The first of these was wicked, the second false, and neither was from the Holy Spirit. But the third was from the Holy Spirit. For when he wished to speak, the Holy Spirit guided the utterance, so that it might be expressed in such a mode, in which the necessity of Christ's passion was pronounced. Moreover, the voice itself, referred to the eternal exemplar, offered one true sense to Christ's faithful: but referred to the understanding and intention of the speaker, it offered another sense to the infidels. Whence it must be said regarding that which the Evangelist reports, that "he did not say it of himself": and it ought to be understood with precision, so that the sense is, that he did not say it only of himself.

§ 27. To the first therefore we say that he was not a Prophet. But it does not follow, if he was not a Prophet, that therefore he did not prophesy: just as the donkey was not a rational animal, but it had the act of a rational animal; and someone who is not a singer, nevertheless sometimes sings.

§ 28. And through this the solution to the next is also clear: because in the vision constituting a prophecy, intelligence is needed, but not in every vision of one prophesying. Because thus every prophetic vision would be intellectual: and this is false, because according to this two genera of visions would be emptied out, namely the corporeal and the spiritual.

§ 29. To the next, the solution is clear through the distinction posited at the beginning.

Articulus 16 — Whether Heretics Or Evil Christian Prelates Confer A Blessing

§ 31. Next it is inquired concerning the words of Malachi, there, D, "I will curse your blessings," etc. From this and certain other things introduced it seems that heretics and bad Christian prelates confer no blessing: yet this was disproved above in the treatise on baptism and the Eucharist, where it treats of baptism given by heretics, and of the Eucharist consecrated by them.

§ 32. BUT AGAINST: A heretic baptizes and it is baptized; he confirms and it is confirmed, and so for the others. Therefore also if he excommunicates, it is excommunicated, and if he absolves it is absolved; which is false.

§ 33. Response. When it is said: "I will curse your blessings," it is understood by virtue of grammar through the discrete pronoun "your," that is, which are so "yours" that they are not "mine"; for the Lord never curses his own. Now it is certain that in the sacraments God alone operates inwardly by Himself, but man performs the ministry outwardly. And therefore the effects of the sacraments are the blessings not of man, but of God. But it does not follow: he baptizes and it is baptized, etc., therefore if he excommunicates it is excommunicated, etc.: because excommunication belongs to jurisdiction, which belongs to man, and in it occurs the act of a man who is a prelate and has jurisdiction over other men. And therefore this act is sometimes cursed by God, and [sometimes] blessed: it is blessed when the heretic curses by excommunicating, and it is cursed when he blesses by absolving.

Articulus 17 — Whether Fraternal Correction Is Well Defined By The Master

§ 35. It is now inquired concerning what he says there, E, "But what sort of person he ought to be who is constituted as a judge of others," etc.

§ 36. For the sake of this, because correction pertains to judges, we will inquire concerning fraternal correction as to six things, namely: First, What is it? Second, Whose is it? Third, Whether all are bound to fraternal correction? Fourth, Whether it belongs to all toward all, or toward certain persons only? Fifth, In what order ought it to be done? Sixth, In what does it differ from judicial correction?

§ 37. Concerning the first, the Masters say that fraternal correction is: 1. "An admonition of a brother concerning the emendation of a fault proceeding from fraternal charity." But since admonition is of one who has forgotten, and one sinning in act does not sin out of forgetfulness, "admonition" is badly placed there.

§ 38. 2. Also, admonition does not sound like any sort of accusation. But one correcting a brother sometimes accuses him before a judge: therefore as before.

§ 39. 3. Also "If your brother sins against you, go and correct him." But "correcting" sounds like a certain harshness and rebuke through words, but "admonition" does not. Therefore fraternal correction, which is called a "correction" [correptio] by the Lord, is badly defined by "admonition."

§ 40. 4. Also, it is inquired concerning what he says, "Concerning the emendation of a fault." For I can correct a brother not only concerning a perpetrated fault, but also concerning a sign of a fault to be perpetrated, so that he may beware. Therefore it is badly said, "Concerning the emendation of a fault."

§ 41. 5. Also, it is objected concerning what he says, "Proceeding from fraternal charity." Because according to this no one would correct except one who had charity; although nevertheless this is not required, as will be evident below.

§ 42. Response. This definition is excellent. For admonition is correction in the spirit of gentleness, so that he seems to correct rather by admonishing than by exasperating.

§ 43. To the first therefore we say, that everyone who sins falls away from the intellect, as Aristotle says, and follows the part of rational concupiscence, especially with respect to the judgment of the higher rational part and of synderesis, which is always right. And with respect to this it is called here an admonition toward a reversion to the light of the intellect, which rules the way of right and does not err. And in this way it is said "Return, transgressors, to the heart."

§ 44. To the next it must be said, that generally correction is made for the sake of an admonition of a brother of this sort. And if he wakes up, it is good for the one correcting. If not, then accusation first has a place, and therefore accusation is an act consequent to correction, and is owed to one confirmed in evil who is difficultly corrected. And therefore the first and essential act is admonition, and it is defined through that.

§ 45. To the next we say, that admonition as it is taken here in the aforesaid manner has a certain correction in it: because it points out the evil with a moderate rebuke, inasmuch as he fell away from the rule of the intellect. For this is what admonition sounds like here.

§ 46. To the next we say that "fault" is taken here conjointly, as it is in the exterior and interior act, which is demonstrated outwardly through a sign, because it already begins to be a fault when it begins to be rooted inwardly.

§ 47. To the next we say that "fraternal charity" is named from the mode of fraternal charity in the act of correction, just as the Apostle commands "Correct him in the spirit of gentleness." Whence it is not required that it always proceed from this habit, but that sometimes it proceeds from the mode or zeal of fraternal charity.

Articulus 18 — Whether He Who Ought To Correct Ought To Be Irreprehensible

§ 49. Secondly it is inquired, whose is it to correct with fraternal correction, or more truly, what sort of person is he who corrects or ought to correct?

§ 50. Now many authorities are introduced in the Letter. But 1. Moreover, that he ought not to be reprehensible seems to be said by Gregory in the Pastoral Care: "No one in the Church harms more than he who, acting perversely, has the name or order of dignity. For no one presumes to correct this delinquent; and the fault is vehemently extended into an example, since for the reverence of his order the sinner is honored." Therefore it seems that he sins mortally who, uncorrected, accepts the office of correcting others.

§ 51. 2. Also "First cast out the beam," etc.

§ 52. 3. Also, the Gloss there: "It is impossible that he should remove a speck who bears a beam." But he who has the office of correcting is bound to remove the speck. Therefore as before.

§ 53. 4. Also, another Gloss there: "The moderation of judgment is that one anticipated by greater [sins] should not judge others in lesser or equal ones."

§ 54. 5. Also, there: "With what mind does he prepare to heal, who carries a wound on his face?"

§ 55. 6. Also "Will you build a house for me?" There Gregory says: "He is unable to wipe dirty hands, who retains mud."

§ 56. 7. Also "He among you who is without sin," etc. The Gloss: "Let them first be just, and afterwards [judge] the guilty woman," etc.

§ 57. 8. Also, on that word of the Apostle "The judgment of God is according to truth against those who do such things," the Gloss: "Who do such things, concerning which they reprehend others."

§ 58. 9. Also, the Philosopher says: "The straight is the judge of itself and of the crooked."

§ 59. 10. Moreover, he sins against the order of nature who is not himself straight, and straightens others through correction: therefore, etc.

§ 60. 11. Also, every corrector insofar as he is such, is like a judge of the one corrected. But the Philosopher says in V Ethics that they flee to the judge as to animate justice. Therefore the one judging is bound to be just; otherwise he ought not to be a judge nor to correct, because the corrector is a judge, according to this that he corrects.

§ 61. 12. Also, every corrector corrects according to some norm or rule. The perverse man does not match the rule: therefore he ought not to correct.

§ 62. 13. Also, if a perverse man corrects, contentions arise from this: because the one corrected can also object similar things against him, and from the objection of similar things perturbation and contention arise. Since therefore these are to be avoided, a perverse man ought not to correct anyone.

§ 63. BUT AGAINST: 1. Philippians 1:18: "Whether by occasion or by truth Christ is proclaimed," etc. But in a certain way Christ is proclaimed when a neighbor is corrected in Christ. Therefore whether it is done by occasion or by truth, in this one is to rejoice. But in no way is one to rejoice concerning an evil. Therefore it is not an evil: therefore he does not sin who corrects.

§ 64. 2. Also "If your brother sins against you," etc. The Gloss: "He sins who sees a brother sin and is silent, just as he who does not forgive the penitent." Therefore if some sinner sees this, he sins if he is silent. Therefore he is bound to correct, and it is not an evil if he corrects.

§ 65. 3. Also, a spiritual alms is better than a corporeal one. And someone existing in mortal sin is not prohibited from giving corporeal alms. Therefore neither ought he to be prohibited from giving spiritual alms. But spiritual alms is the correction of a delinquent: therefore, etc.

§ 66. 4. Also, suppose someone is seeing evils being done, and if he corrects them, they would be dismissed on account of him. It seems then that he is in a dilemma (perplexed). For if he does not correct, he will be culpable: because he who gives an occasion of harm seems to have given the harm. But this man gives an occasion of harm, who could prohibit and did not prohibit: and from this follows the same. Also, if the one correcting is in a similar or worse sin, he has sinned: therefore he is perplexed. Also, he is said to have done it who could prohibit it and did not prohibit it: and from this follows the same.

§ 67. 5. Also, he still seems to be perplexed. For suppose that he has the office of correcting, inasmuch as he has the care of souls; he is bound to correct, and he does not do it: therefore he sins. Also, he is in a similar sin: therefore if he corrects, he himself sins. Therefore he is perplexed. But no one is said to be perplexed: therefore this man can correct even existing in a similar sin.

§ 68. Response. It must be said that one correcting another ought not to be existing in a similar notorious or greater sin. And if he is in a notorious sin, he is not bound to correct, unless perhaps by way of prayers, in this way: "I beg you lest you sin through my example." But if he does not will to acquiesce, he cannot judge him without a mortal sin, nor even denounce him to the judge by way of an accuser. And according to this we concede the authorities and reasons first introduced.

§ 69. To the 1st therefore which is objected against it, it must be said that the thing done pleased the Apostle; but nevertheless the action according as it proceeds from the agent did not please him. And it is similar concerning the passion of Christ, which in itself was gracious, and yet the action displeased [God]. Thus this worked work (opus operatum) was good: but the action on the part of the agent was bad.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that one existing in sin, if he sees and can prohibit by way of prayers, let him do so. But if he is in a notorious similar crime, or of whatever other species, he is not bound to judge: because he would scandalize, and would not profit, except that he would rouse indignation against himself.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because scandal is not conjoined to corporeal alms, inasmuch as it is received with benevolence. But correction is received with harshness, and denunciation follows it, if he does not amend. And therefore it has scandal adjoined to it.

§ 72. To the next we say that no one is perplexed: because it is in his power to correct his life: and then he may correct another as well. Moreover, in the second case, either let him yield the office of correcting, or let him change his morals for the better; and then there is no obstacle to him doing it.

§ 73. But I said, "In a notorious [sin]": because if his sin were occult, he would have the face of correcting and he ought to; because nothing could be objected against him.

Articulus 19 — Whether We Are All Bound To Fraternal Correction

§ 75. Thirdly it is inquired, whether all are bound to fraternal correction? Which seems true from the Gloss on Matthew 18:15 stated above:

§ 76. 1. For all equally, greater and lesser, men and women, religious and seculars, and such like, are bound to forgive a sinning neighbor: therefore by similarity they are bound to fraternal correction.

§ 77. 2. Also, all are bound to almsgiving according to place and time. But spiritual alms is to correct the delinquent: therefore, etc.

§ 78. 3. Also, this seems to be the form of the precept, which says thus: "If he sins against you," etc. But by the name of "brother" there is understood every neighbor. Therefore also on the part of the one correcting, every man is supplied.

§ 79. 4. Also, I ought to will to be corrected by every man if I have sinned. Therefore since anyone ought to do to another what he would will to be done to himself, every man ought to correct the delinquent.

§ 80. BUT AGAINST: 1. The Lord said this to Peter alone. But Peter is the prelate of the others. Therefore from the form of the precept none are obligated to this except prelates.

§ 81. 2. Also, he who corrects expends care. But none has care except a prelate: therefore, etc.

§ 82. 3. Also , the Apostle speaks to the Prelate alone, saying: "Those who sin, reprove before all, so that the rest may also have fear." Therefore as before.

§ 83. 4. Also, Jerome: "Let priests strive to fulfill that Evangelical word, 'If he sins against you,' etc. For what mercy is it to spare one, and lead all into peril? The people is polluted by one sinner, just as the entire flock by one diseased sheep." Therefore none are bound to this except priests alone.

§ 84. 5. Also, it belongs to the same person to correct and to punish the corrected one with condign penance. But it belongs only to the Prelate to give condign penance to the corrected one: therefore, etc.

§ 85. Response. It must be said that from office none are bound except prelates: but from charity every man is bound to correct a delinquent brother, and to guard him from sin. Whence Augustine in his Rule: "If you see him doing this very thing, admonish him immediately, lest the evils begun should progress, but let him be corrected closely. If your brother has a wound in his heart," etc. In this way therefore we concede the first objections.

§ 86. To that which is objected against it, there is one solution to all, namely that prelates are bound more than others: because [they are bound] from charity, authority, and office. And therefore it is said specially to them.

§ 87. To the last it must be said that what it says is not generally true: because a common corrector is not bound except to simple denunciation, if that one does not hear him.

Articulus 20 — Whether Fraternal Correction Is Of All Toward All

§ 89. Fourthly it is inquired, whether it is from all toward all? Which seems true: because:

§ 90. 1. On that text: "If he sins against you," etc., the Gloss says: "That is, with you alone knowing." But anyone can do this with respect to anyone. Therefore anyone is bound to correct another.

§ 91. 2. Also, by the name of "brother" any man is understood: but in the form of the precept the Lord uses the name of "brother": therefore as before.

§ 92. 3. Also, we are bound to will the good to every man, and to guard him from sin, as much as we can: but fraternal correction guards from sin: therefore as before.

§ 93. BUT AGAINST: 1. Hebrews 12:20: "If a beast touches the mountain, it shall be stoned." And it is expounded: If a subject touches a Prelate with the hand of correction, he is rebuked.

§ 94. 2. Also, Dionysius rebukes the monk Demophilus, who corrected a priest because he led an unclean man into the Church. Therefore that monk did badly by correcting a priest.

§ 95. 3. Also, Miriam was struck with leprosy because she murmured against Moses her brother. Therefore she did badly by correcting.

§ 96. 4. Also, Gregory in the Pastoral Care, as was held above: "For no one presumes to correct this delinquent." Therefore it is a presumption to correct such a one: and presumption is a sin: therefore it is a sin to correct a Prelate.

§ 97. Response. It must be said that every man is bound to admonish and correct every man concerning a fault with reverence and meekness, but he cannot denounce him further if he is disobedient. Because if he is the supreme Prelate, he has no judge. Thus therefore we concede the first part of the disputation.

§ 98. To that which is objected against it, there is one solution, that this is understood of those who from a certain presumed authority wish no longer to admonish, but by a certain coercive force through a jurisdiction which they do not have, wish to compel to correction. And through this the solution to all is clear.

§ 99. Note however, that according to the discretion of the wise, moderation must be had, looking to four things, namely the quantity of the fault of the delinquent, and the hope of emendation, and the state of the person who is admonished, and the zeal which moves the one correcting. For if the fault is light, and it is feared that a more grave disturbance will follow, he is not bound to correct: because something worse is aroused.

§ 100. Also, if there is probable despair of an amendment, he is not bound to correct, because he would do nothing except provoke to worse.

§ 101. Also, furthermore if the state of the person is high, he ought with reverence and excuse of the fault to admonish rather than correct, and to ask rather than rebuke.

§ 102. Fourthly, if he sees himself to be moved from rancor or envy, or some other root, then he ought not to do it: because such men quickly break forth into words of insult: and then from a lesser evil a greater evil is made. And this distinction is excellent.

Articulus 21 — Whether In Fraternal Correction Some Order Ought To Be Observed

§ 104. Fifthly, it is inquired concerning the order of fraternal correction. For it seems that the order is determined "Correct him between you and him alone... If he does not listen to you, take with you one or two... But if he does not listen to them, tell the Church."

§ 105. Now it seems that this order cannot be observed. 1. For through this, that it proceeds, it is clear that it is understood of an occult sin, because it proceeds: "If your brother sins against you." And the Gloss says, "With you alone knowing." Since therefore he takes with him one or two, either he takes those to whom the sin of the brother is known, or to whom it is unknown. If in the first way: therefore he did not know alone, which is against the Gloss. If in the second way: then he will be a betrayer of the crime of his brother, which is not to be done: therefore such an order is not to be observed.

§ 106. If you say that it is understood of those who can profit, and not hinder. It is inquired, who are they? For either they are Prelates who have the power of correcting, or they are from inferior associates. If in the first way: then he would immediately denounce the brother before the Prelate, and testimony would be competent to him. And a Prelate also cannot be a witness in a case in which he is a judge. But in the Gospel it is said: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word stands." Therefore it cannot be understood of Prelates. But if it is understood of associates. Against: They can profit in nothing, but they can hinder by defaming: therefore they are not to be assumed. Moreover, that they cannot profit, is clear: because they do not have the power of correcting.

§ 107. 2. Moreover, when he takes with him one or two: let us suppose that he denies [the sin] before them. Then what is to be done by him with whose knowledge he sinned? For he cannot announce it to the Church, because he does not have proof before the Church, and the Church will not believe him, but rather will punish him who defamed a brother.

§ 108. 3. Also, it seems that the testimony of one is insufficient: because [619] it is said: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall stand." Therefore he says badly: "Take with you one or two."

§ 109. Also it is inquired, whether the same order is to be observed with respect to any man whatsoever? And it seems that it is: because Christ does not determine except one: therefore toward every man this order is to be kept.

§ 110. Against: 1. Suppose that a Prelate sins; he cannot be denounced to the Church: because it would be a scandal, and there would be no one before whom he would be denounced: because no one can be denounced before himself.

§ 111. Also, he cannot be compelled through excommunication just as a heathen and a publican: because he cannot excommunicate [himself].

unless having jurisdiction: and he who is to be excommunicated is the one who has jurisdiction: therefore, since no one can excommunicate himself, that order cannot be maintained.

1. Likewise, it seems that the Lord did not maintain this order in the case of Judas: because he did not first rebuke him privately, nor afterwards did he take one or two with him, but immediately announced it to the Church of the disciples: therefore, by his example, the aforementioned form is no longer to be observed.
2. Likewise, this seems especially evident from the deed of Peter, Acts 5:1 and following, who did not first rebuke Ananias and Sapphira privately, nor afterwards admonish them before one or two others, but immediately excommunicated them: therefore, he learned this from the example of the Lord: therefore, we also ought to do likewise, and immediately pronounce in common, so that the sentence may be given.

Response. It must be said that the sentence of the Lord as it stands is to be observed.

And we say to the first question, that it is understood concerning the hidden: because concerning the manifest, the Apostle prescribes another form, 1 Timothy 5:20: "Rebuke those who sin before all, that the rest also may fear."

To what is objected against this, it must be said that those are to be taken to whom it is not known, but made known by the one knowing, or by him who did it, which is better, if he can be induced: and yet the crime will not be betrayed: because they can benefit, and not harm: they can benefit by praying and admonishing and bearing penance with him, and consoling the penitent. And we say that they are to be taken from the number of companions.

And what is objected is not true: because in a brother is understood the name of one loving and guarding the honor and reputation of the brother: hence such are to be taken from whose life and conversion it is presumed that they will bear the burden with him, and will not defame the crime, since they desire correction and not defamation.

To what is posited, that he denies before them and conceals, it must be said that then nothing remains but to pray and lament to God for him: because then he demonstrates himself to be incorrigible. And it must be cautiously observed whether at another time he does it before some who can testify against him: and if the testimony of someone can be had, he is to be punished: but if no opportunity is found against him, then nothing remains but to pray for him. But the Lord speaks in the case in which before witnesses he acknowledges, or by some similar act manifests his sin, so that it can be brought to light.

To the other, we say that in fraternal denunciation the testimony of one approved man suffices, not that the accused be condemned, but that custody be applied to him by the Prelate: because if two witnesses make full faith, one makes a presumption against the accused: so that custody be applied to him lest he have such liberty as he had before: and this suffices for the amendment of the offense: and the Lord in the Gospel intends nothing else, because he does not delight in punishments, but in the repentance of the sinner, and the correction of offenses.

To the other, some skilled in law say that a Prelate ought not to be corrected by fraternal correction for a past sin, but to be admonished for the future lest it happen again. But this solution is null: because the Gospel of Matthew 18:15 speaks of a past sin, and not of the future. Therefore, others have said that fraternal correction is among equals: but it does not extend to Prelates. And this especially by that of Gregory said above: But against this again is the Gospel: because it excepts no one. Therefore, with some others we say that it extends to all: but to all Prelates the admonition of denunciation does not proceed. In others, however, it can proceed to denunciation: and this has been said above and answered to the authority of Gregory.

To the other objection concerning the Lord and Judas, it must be said that in the deeds of the Lord there are many things which we ought not to observe, but to admire: for he had knowledge of all knowable things, even contingent ones: and he knew who would betray him alone, or with one other, or two: which we cannot imitate. Therefore, that he did not observe this in Judas, it is clear that this was the cause. And since it has now been made clear, this is not to be observed by us: because we ought to presume the corrigibility of everyone, unless he himself exhibits the contrary in himself after being admonished repeatedly.

To what is objected from the deed of Peter, it must be said that perhaps his sin was public. Or better, it must be said that he sinned in the community, and being questioned before the common chapter, he was admonished: and therefore, for the terror of all others, he was punished publicly. This manner is still to be observed in religious orders: because if those things which come to the knowledge of many were corrected in secret, the discipline of religion would quickly be dissolved.

Articulus 22 — How Fraternal Correction Differs From A Judge's Correction

How does fraternal correction differ from the correction of a judge?

Sixthly, it is asked, In what does that correction differ from the correction of a judge?

However, it seems that in no way: because in the Gospel it is said that witnesses are to be brought, and the Church is to be informed: by which is understood accusation: and that one is to be cut off from communion by sentence, and be as a heathen and a publican: and all these are in the correction of a judge: therefore in no way does fraternal correction seem to differ from the correction of a judge.

But on the contrary of this is: because a brother does not have coercive correction over a brother, as it is said in X Ethics, just as neither does a father over a son. However, a judge has coercive correction over him whom he judges by law. Therefore, this is not that.

To this it seems it must be said that they differ in the reason which the last objection introduces.

To the first, however, it must be said that sometimes from fraternal correction it can become judicial, as is clear from what has been disputed above: but nevertheless this is not that: as the Philosopher says, that a father does not compel a son: but nevertheless the stubborn one, if by law, even according to the Philosopher, he denounces to the judge, then he compels him.

Articulus 23 — Whether God Justly Freed The Harlot, When No One Was Found To Cast The First Stone

Whether God justly liberated the harlot, no one being found to cast the first stone?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, after the beginning: For He liberated the sinner*, because there was no one who justly could cast the stone, etc.

From this it seems, that if there had been someone just there, He would have commanded him to stone her.

But if this is conceded, it will be against what is said, Ezekiel 16:23: Is it of my will that the wicked should die? says the Lord God: and not that he should turn from his ways, and live. Hosea 6:6: I desired mercy, and not sacrifice: and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.

To this it must be said, that without doubt even if there had been just ones, the Lord would have wished the adulteress to live for repentance: but He used the mode of simulation with those present, so that He might confound them, and, making them blush, incline them to faith in Him and to repentance.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 24 — Whether In The Old Law Venial Sins Were Remitted Through The Ceremonials

Whether in the old law venial sins were remitted through ceremonial acts?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, E, shortly after: For venial sins were remitted through ceremonies.

On the contrary: No sin is remitted to one not having grace: but they did not have grace: therefore no sin was remitted to them.

Response. It must be said that it does not say they were remitted, but that they thought they were remitted, because according to the law they were not punished.

Note also that ceremonies are called from "acarie" which is the decay of wood, and "mene" which is defect: because they were deficient commands having no use except for signifying: whence some made thus saying:

From decay and defect ceremony derives its origin.
"Mene" is defect, "caries" is called decay.

But because Tullius and other Gentile philosophers had ceremonies, and understood no use of signification: it seems to be false what they say. For Tullius says that religion is a species of justice and defining this he says that it is a virtue which brings care and ceremony to a certain superior nature which they call divine. And therefore every divine worship is called a ceremony: and it is said to be from "munia" and Ceres who is the goddess of crops: for out of the necessity of crops divine worship was first invented: and therefore from Ceres the term is transferred to all divine worships.

Articulus 25 — Whether Everyone Who Binds Others Is Just

Whether everyone who binds others is just?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, E, § 2: And by these things it is sufficiently considered, etc.

For we see that not everyone who binds and looses others is just.

Response. It must be said that it does not say that he is, but that he ought to be: and this is plainly true.

DISTINCTIO XX

Divisio Textus

It must also be known that the time of penance is, etc. After it has been determined concerning the power of the keys, here it touches upon penance at death, and after death, and the return of sins previously mentioned. And therefore, he sets forth here in order three distinctions of those enumerated: in the first of which, namely this one, it touches upon the penances of the dying. In another, concerning the remission of sins after death. In the third, concerning the return of sins.

However, in this distinction, there are two principal questions: in the first of which the Master inquires about the time of repenting. In the second, however, about the mode of extreme penance, there, B, If indeed it is inquired about those who in this life, etc.

And let these suffice as to the division.

Articulus 1 — Whether At The End Of Life Penance Can Be Given

Whether at the end of life penance can be given?

It is first inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, after the beginning:
We can give penance, etc.

However, in the following part of the same distinction, it immediately contradicts, saying that penance is not to be given at the end of life, but to be made known.

But "to give" is here taken to mean to admit to penance: but penance is later set forth as external penance enjoined: and that is not to be given to the dying, but to be made known.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Healthy Penitent Can Conjecture Concerning The Certainty Of Charity, Whether He Is Worthy Of Hatred Or Of Love

Whether a healthy penitent can conjecture about the certainty of charity, whether he is worthy of hatred or love?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, a little later: Hold the certain, and dismiss the uncertain.

AGAINST:
Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred. Therefore, a penitent and confessing healthy man is not certain whether he is worthy of hatred or love.

Response. He understands this concerning the certainty of conjecture: because he can conjecture about the love of charity, when he repents while healthy: but it is a sign of fear only, when he does not repent except when sick. However, Ecclesiastes speaks of the certainty of knowledge: for no one has this.

Articulus 3 — Whether God Hears Late Repentance

Whether God hears late repentance?

Then it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, A, a little later: In whatever day he is invoked, etc.

ON THE CONTRARY:
Micah 3:4: They shall cry to the Lord: Gloss: internally, and He will not hear them, it is understood concerning late repentance: but none is so late as that which is at the end of life: therefore God will not hear such.

Response. It must be said that late repentance is twofold according to the two things moving to repentance, which are servile fear and love. Therefore, God does not hear repentance from fear: and the Gloss speaks of that: but here it speaks of that which is from love: and God hears this: but because weakness is rather an indication of fear, therefore it rarely happens that someone then repents from love.

Articulus 4 — Whether One Who Repents Late Has Freedom Of Choice

Whether the late penitent has freedom of will?

Then it is questioned concerning this which he says, there, A, shortly before the middle: God seeks the freedom of wills, so that they might be able to be erased, etc.

For from this it seems that late penitents do not have freedom of will, which is not true: because as long as a man lives, he has freedom of will and the power of doing good.

Response. It must be said that free will is frequently taken away in infirmity with respect to use: however, it is always impeded. The use of free will is taken away when the mind is seized upwards and hinders discretion: however, it is impeded when the violence of the disease is averted and drawn away: and this always happens in the infirm: for this is the nature of the powers of the soul, that when one is in vehement act, the other is drawn away from action. Therefore, since in the infirm there is vehement pain in the sense, free will is impeded from the judgment of the discretion of sins. And in this way he understands: whence he says that the time must be sought when he has free will, supply, unimpeded and not hindered by the violence of the disease with sensible pain.

Articulus 5 — What The Fire Of Purgatory Is, Whether Corporeal Or Spiritual

What is the fire of purgatory, whether corporeal or spiritual?

Then it is inquired about this which is said, there, A, after the middle: First, it must be purged by the fire of purification, etc.

However, two things are inquired here at the beginning about the purgatorial fire, namely, what it is in reality, and where it is according to place?

To the first of these, the procedure is as follows: 1. The name is of the fire of the body: therefore it seems that the purgatorial fire is corporeal fire.

1. Furthermore, many saints say that the fire of hell is corporeal: therefore, as it seems, so is the fire of purgatory.
2. Likewise, Gregory? The fire of Gehenna is corporeal, which corporeally burns the wicked.
3. Likewise, Augustine: Why should we not say, although in wondrous, yet true ways, that even incorporeal spirits can be afflicted by the punishment of corporeal fire, if the spirits of men, although incorporeal, could be enclosed in corporeal members?
4. Likewise, Augustine: Gehenna, which is called the lake of fire and sulfur, will be corporeal fire. From this it is gathered that it is corporeal fire tormenting souls. Since, therefore, there is one reason concerning the fire of hell and purgatory, it seems that the fire of purgatory is corporeal.
5. Furthermore, if it is said to be incorporeal, an inconvenience seems to follow. For Aristotle says, and proves in the fourth of the Ethics, that purely spiritual pleasure has no contrary, nor is it a remedy: but future pleasure is purely spiritual: therefore it has no contrary: therefore it has nothing contrary acting towards sadness: if, therefore, that fire is only spiritual, it will not act towards causing sadness: and then those punished there would not be saddened: and this is false.
6. Moreover, purely spiritual things are separated from motion and matter: but all contrariety is with motion and matter: therefore in spiritual things there is no contrariety: therefore neither is there any action of contrariety: but all punishment is from a contrary agent: therefore in such things there is no punishment. If, therefore, it is granted that the fire is purely spiritual, it seems that it is in no way afflictive: and this is heresy: therefore it is necessary to posit it as corporeal.
7. Moreover, no substance as such is changeable, as Aristotle says, giving an example even in fire, which neither acts nor changes anything as it is a substance: if, therefore, it acts and changes, this will be from some quality of the substance itself: therefore the agent by changing is a substance disposed by quality: but it is evident that not every quality acts, but only the physical, as all philosophers say: therefore it is necessary that it has a physical quality.

Likewise, not every physical quality acts: but it happens that the contrary is active: therefore it is necessary to have such contrariety: but every such substance is corporeal: therefore every changing and acting thing is corporeal: but the purgatorial fire acts by changing and punishing: for there is no punishment except by the change of the patient: therefore it seems that the fire of purgatory is corporeal.

But if this is said, it is objected on the contrary first by authorities, and afterwards by reasons.

1. For Gregory says in the Moralia: A corporeal fire, to be able to be fire, needs nourishment from the body: which, since it must be preserved, is undoubtedly nourished by gathered wood: nor can it exist unless it is kindled and sustained by heat. On the contrary, however, the fire of Gehenna, since it is incorporeal, corporeally burns the reprobates in itself, nor is it kindled by human effort, nor nourished by wood: but once created, it lasts unquenchable, and does not need succession, nor lacks heat. It is clearly held that it is neither corporeal nor nourished and sustained in the manner of corporeal fire.
2. Likewise, in the same: If we take the gnashing of teeth and the weeping of eyes spiritually, we must also believe the flames of torments in them to be not corporeal, but spiritual.
3. Likewise, Augustine in book XXI of the City of God says that the flame in which the rich man was tormented was such as the eyes which he lifted when he saw Lazarus, such as the tongue for which he desired moisture to be poured, such as the finger of Lazarus from which he asked that it be done: but it is evident that those members were not corporeal, but spiritual: therefore it seems that neither was the flame corporeal: therefore, as it seems, neither is the fire of purgatory.
4. Likewise, Damascene in the last chapter of his book: But this fire is not corporeal, but such as God knows.
5. By reason, however, it is objected thus: Every agent and patient agree in matter with transmutation, as Boethius says in the book on the Two Natures in one person of Christ: but the purgatorial fire and the soul to be purged relate as agent and patient according to the transmuted: therefore they communicate in matter: but the soul is either not of matter, or not of corporeal matter: therefore it seems that that fire is either not of matter, or not of corporeal matter: therefore it is not corporeal.
6. Moreover, the author of the book of the Six Principles says that it is impossible for a non-body to be moved by a body: but the soul is not a body: therefore it is not moved by a body: but it is moved and changed by the purgatorial fire: therefore the purgatorial fire is not a body: therefore neither is it corporeal: because it is evident that that fire, whatever it is, is without quantity.

These, however, up to the treatise on the resurrection, suffice for objections: because there will again be a place to inquire about this there.

Response. All the saints disputing this question say that what they say, they wish to be taken without the arrogance of their assertion. Thus also I say what the fire of purgatory is, I do not think anyone knows, except to whom God has revealed it. However, whether it is, will pertain to the following distinction to inquire.

Concerning this, however, which is inquired here, it seems to be said that it is corporeal. And I think that whoever attentively considers the inconveniences to which the reasons first introduced lead, will scarcely incline to another opinion, unless it is corporeal. Unless perhaps, which may it not be, someone falls into the heresy of certain philosophers, to say that all things written about the places of punishments and punishments are altogether frivolous and vain. Therefore, consenting to the reasons first introduced, I say that it is corporeal.

To what is objected against, it must be said that a distinction is made between the first afflicting and the proximate afflicting: for the first afflicting a spiritual substance, whether in the body or outside the body, is corporeal: but the proximate afflicting is spiritual. To better understand this, let us give an example: for the incision of a wounded hand is corporeal, and the body suffers, and the soul suffers with it. The first afflicting of both of these is the sword: but since the soul suffers from the passion of the body, it is evident that what causes movement in the affection of sadness in the soul is the likeness of the wound apprehended as contrary to the conjoined: however, as such a likeness is in the soul, it is spiritual: and thus the proximate afflicting of the soul is spiritual. Thus I say in purgatory, that the first afflicting is corporeal fire, having the power to afflict the spirit from the fact that it is an instrument of divine justice avenging iniquity. And the proximate afflicting is the likeness of fire received by the punished souls, as it is an instrument of justice avenging sin, to which the soul itself submitted according to its will. This, however, will be more discussed in the treatise on the resurrection. This seems to be the opinion of Gregory in the fourth book of the Dialogues where he says: This is to burn in the fire for them, which is to see the fire, drawing punishment from the fires, not giving life to the fires.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that Gregory speaks of the immediately afflicting, and not of the first afflicting: and in the same way, it must be said to all the following authorities.

To what is objected by reason, it must be said that that proposition is understood of agents and patients physically: but the soul suffers from the purgatorial fire having power from the fact that it is a body existing as an instrument of divine justice: and this is another power of heat than the natural power of heat alone. An example of this is that heat according to the Philosopher is fiery: and yet according to what it is an instrument of the soul governing the body, it does not act by the action of fire alone, because thus it would incinerate, but by the vivifying action of the soul, and we see that by digesting it assimilates to flesh and bone and nerve, as Aristotle says in the second of the Soul, speaking against the opinion which said that it acted by the power of fire alone. From a similar it seems to be said of the heat of the purgatorial fire, that insofar as it is moved by the power of avenging justice, it has the power of punishing incorporeal souls, which have lost the order of their dignity either irrecoverably or recoverably, as those existing in hell irrecoverably, and those existing in purgatory recoverably have lost.

To the objection, it must be said that this is understood of every corporeal and physical motion, as has been said. For in other things, even in natures, it is false: because a body is moved by an immobile incorporeal first: and this will be more expressly proved in distinction XL.

Articulus 6 — In What Place Purgatory Is

In what place is purgatory?

Secondly, it is asked, Where is purgatory?

For it seems that it is here on earth. 1. For Gregory says in the fourth book of the Dialogues, that Paschasius, in the place of the baths where by the advice of the doctors the Capuan Bishop prepared himself for the bath, stood ready for service: and Paschasius was already dead, and there he rendered service, to induce that Bishop who was sanctified to intercede for him. Therefore, it seems that some are punished here near us.

1. Furthermore, Gregory expressly says this in the same place.
2. Furthermore, by reason it seems the same: because by what things one sins, by these he is tormented: but one sins by those things which are here near us: therefore by the same he will be punished: but by these he cannot be punished unless being here near us with us: therefore some are punished here near us.
3. Furthermore, in the life of blessed Patrick it is read, that he obtained that some in Ireland be punished in a certain place in the manner of purgatory: therefore it seems, that similarly others can be punished in their places.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The place of reward and merit is not the same: but here is the place of merit: therefore here is not the place of reward: but they receive in purgatory what is worthy for merits: therefore it seems, that the purgatorial fire is not here.

1. Likewise, Gregory seems to want that the fire of hell and purgatory is the same: but the same fire is in the same place: therefore in the same place is hell and purgatory: but hell is under the earth, and not here, as the Saints seem to say: therefore purgatory is not here, but under the earth.

By the composition of the name of the Dialogues: because it is said in the lower part: therefore it is necessary that it is under the earth: but purgatory is a part of hell, as the Saints and Masters say: therefore it is under the earth, and not here.

Solution. It must be said that in this question nothing is to be asserted. And therefore without prejudice I say, that purgatory is different by the order of justice determining the place of penance for him who lived in sin and did not fully satisfy: and another by dispensation. In the first way, there is only one place of purgatory, which I think is the upper part of hell having in itself affliction for purification with some consolation of hope for future liberation through mercy. However, by dispensation there are many purgatorial places. And this dispensation is sometimes made for the living, sometimes for the dead. And although it is done for many reasons, yet a threefold cause sometimes occurs more frequently in the life of the Saints, namely to demonstrate merit in someone requesting this: as it was read about Patrick, who requested that someone be punished there. Another cause is faith concerning the punishments of the dead: and therefore, as Gregory says, some are shown to be punished here around us, so that we may presume the same about others, of whose punishment it is not certain, although it is certain about their similar guilt. The third cause was in Paschasius who performed a miracle by healing a certain demoniac, who had touched his bier: and yet he had a sin, which to show it was a sin, because he had consented ignorantly and deceived in the conspiracy of some which seemed to be done out of zeal for justice: therefore he appeared to the holy Bishop of the city of Capua, and there he was shown to be punished.

And by this the solution to all is clear except one, namely that by which one sins, etc.

And to this it must be said, that it is understood by all in a similar way concerning eternal punishments, and as it frequently happens in temporal punishments. And the book of Wisdom speaks of those who say this. For just as the Egyptians sinned in water by casting the Hebrew children into the river, so they were punished by water with the river boiling with frogs, and the sea submerging them. And just as they sinned by shedding innocent blood, so they were also punished in that the river offered them blood for drink.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Fire Of Purgatory Is Eternal Or Temporal

Whether purgatorial fire is eternal or temporal?

Then it is inquired concerning what is said in the Text, there, A, before the end: However, this fire, although it is not eternal, is nevertheless in a wondrous manner grievous, etc.

But it is inquired here, Whether purgatorial fire is eternal or temporal?

And it seems that it is eternal: because
1. Gregory says that just as in a furnace under the same fire gold glows and straw smokes, so in hell under the same fire the damned are burned and the elect are purified: but the fire of hell is perpetual: therefore also the fire of purgatory, as it seems.

1. Likewise, To the same, the fire of the Last Judgment will envelop the reprobate as coals, and it will never end in them, and it will purge what is criminal in the elect: therefore it seems to be similar concerning the fire of purgatory and of hell: therefore it seems that it does not end: therefore it is perpetual.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY is this
1. Which is said here in the Text.

1. Likewise, That whose act and end are finite, itself is finite, or it will be useless: but the act and end of purgatory are finite: therefore it itself ends, or it will be useless: but nothing will remain useless in divine works: therefore it itself will not remain, as it seems.

2. Further, All elements in whatever way they serve man, will receive an end according to this state, and will be in another state, in which they will receive the reward of their labor: therefore also those which serve man outside the world: but purgatorial fire serves man: therefore it will be in another state in which it will be rewarded, and it will end according to the state of purging.

Response. It seems to me to be said without prejudice, that purgatorial fire is finite according to the purgatorial reason, but it is not finite according to substance: because I suppose that it is the same in species of fire with the fire of hell, as Gregory seems to wish.

Therefore, what is first proven, that it is perpetual according to the substance of fire, in which it agrees with the fire of hell, seems to be conceded: because all objections proceed in this manner.

To that which is secondly objected on the contrary, it must be said that in truth this objection only proves it to be finite according to this use in which it now is: and this is conceded: and it will then be for another use, because it will be for burning the damned.

Moreover, it seems to be said without prejudice, that this is understood of those serving man according to the state of merit: but purgatorial fire does not serve man.

§ 1. ...to this state. Hence it seems to me it must be said that just as in the state of grace the pure exists alongside the impure of sin and penalty, so too in the serving elements and elemental bodies pertaining to the state of grace, the pure is mixed with the impure; and in the renovation, the pure that contributes to delight will be separated upwards to the place of the elements above the circle of the earth, while the impure will descend downwards below the gloomy orb of the earth into the center. But in those things that precede the state of impurity, nothing is posited to be impure: and therefore such things will never be renovated, but will remain, punishing the damned.

§ 2. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 3.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Punishment Of Purgatory Excels Every Punishment That Someone Has Suffered, Or Can Suffer, In This Life

Whether the penalty of purgatory exceeds every penalty which anyone has suffered, or can suffer, in this life?

§ 5. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at A, before the end: For it exceeds every penalty which anyone has ever suffered in this life, etc.

§ 6. For it seems that what he says is false: because 1. The more something is conjoined to an agent, the more it feels the penalty in suffering if it has sense: but an animate composite of contraries is more passible than what is simple, and an uncomposed spiritual thing, not composed of contraries: therefore, what is conjoined to the agent acting upon it feels the penalty more: but the body on the way (in this life) is thus composed: therefore, someone is punished more here in this life than he is punished in the soul after death: and thus he seems to speak falsely.

§ 7. 2. Moreover, a passion transmuting and casting away from substance is greater than one transmuting and not casting away: the passion of this life is transmuting and casting away from substance, whereas that of the other life is transmuting and not casting away: therefore this penalty is greater than that one.

§ 8. 3. Moreover, whatever active and passive principles have a greater contrariety, their undergoing (passion) comes with a greater sense of penalty: but there is greater contrariety of fire to the body on the way (in this life) than to the soul in purgatory: therefore, etc.: and thus again what he says is false.

§ 9. 4. Moreover, whatever patient is more susceptible to the form of the agent according to one aspect, more deeply feels its action if it has sense: but a corporeal patient is more susceptible to the species of fire according to the nature of fire than an incorporeal one is: therefore it feels its passion more than the incorporeal. The first premise is proved from the fact that all action and passion are ordered to this, that the patient receives the species of the agent as much as it can. The second is proved from the fact that the heat of fire disposes the body so that it may be called and may be hot: but to call the soul hot seems ridiculous.

§ 10. 5. Moreover, theologically it is objected against the Text thus: God punishes no one beyond what is deserved (condign): therefore neither one sinning venially: but the least penalty is owed to venial sin in this life, and it is lesser than many temporal penalties: therefore one is punished there by a lesser penalty as well: therefore not by a greater one than any present penalty: but a purgatorial penalty is owed to it: therefore the purgatorial penalty is not greater than every present penalty: and thus what he says is false.

§ 11. 6. Moreover, a mortal sin and a venial sin are disproportionable: but a mortal sin is sufficiently punished by a temporal penalty: therefore an infinitely lesser one is owed to a venial sin: therefore it is not punished by a penalty that is greater than every temporal penalty: but it is punished by a purgatorial penalty: therefore the purgatorial penalty is not greater than every temporal penalty.

§ 12. 7. Moreover, Blessed Gregory says that certain souls are not punished except by remaining for a time in a certain shadow: but this is not more grievous than every temporal penalty:

therefore it seems that what he says is not a general rule.

§ 2. Response. It must be said, just as the Text says simply, that the penalty of purgatory, even the least, is greater in sadness than any corporeal penalty of this world could be. How this is so can be seen in this way. For the soul, having been stripped of the body, desires the highest good as the object of beatitude in that manner by which a perfected thing desires its own place when existing outside its place: and this is seen from the words of Gregory in the fourth book of the Dialogues, where he says that souls are elevated after death by their own powers, or depressed by their demerits.[620] Hence if sadness is caused by the absence of something delectable, as the Philosopher says,[621] maximal sadness will be caused by the absence of the supremely desired. And since health or life or the delight of sense in this life have no comparison to the highest good that beatifies the blessed, the things taking away delights in this life will bear no comparison to the things taking away or deferring the delectable thing which is in the other life. And therefore the sadness of the other life is incomparably greater than any sadness is in the present.

§ 3. But if you object that the damned do not desire the highest good, it must be said that this is false: rather, even demons desire the highest good and the optimum, as Dionysius says.[622] But in what manner they desire it is the business of another inquiry.

§ 4. But these statements suffice to show that this sadness is incomparable to other sadness. And that this consequent follows is expressly gathered from Book X of the Ethics, where by a similar consequence the Philosopher proves that intellectual pleasures are infinitely more delightful than corporeal ones which are in the sense.[623]

§ 5. With this established, it should be responded to the first by saying that the first proposition is simply and universally true. But the second has a counter-instance because "more passible" is said in two ways, namely externally, and thus that proposition is true. "More passible" is also said from the order of divine justice correcting errors through penalties: and thus what has made itself more passible by sins is more passible: and thus it has a counter-instance in souls and Angels made obstinate through sin.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that a greater passion is said in two ways, namely as more afflicting, and as receiving more of the species of the agent. In the first way the first proposition is not true, if even in life someone is posited to suffer in such a way that he remains in the complexion and composition of his members, that he lies in fire, he is afflicted more than another whose substance is cast away: because in the first the sense remains alive and whole, and excellently feels the thing altering it. But in the second the sense is deadened after a short while, and then it grieves less, and after a little time it dies and grieves not at all. Hence in that first way the proposition is false: but in the second way it is true: because the more it receives of the species and properties of the agent, the more its own proper species and properties are cast away.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that there is a contrariety of the soul and fire in the manner by which contrarieties exist in moral matters: just as the rectitude of hanging or beheading is contrary to iniquity or robbery: for a correcting penalty has an effect contrary to the fault disordering nature: hence the rational soul which has transgressed the order of its dignity is subjected by the omnipotent judge to a nature inferior to itself, namely to fire having not only the power of fire, but also the power of its mover which is the justice vindicating what was admitted through sins: and this contrariety is stronger than natural contrariety and therefore is more presumed, and the action against the soul is greater according to the quantity of affliction than against any animate body before death.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the species of the acting fire is twofold, just as is the species of natural heat. For according to what is the heat of fire, fieriness is its species. But according as the motion is derived from the soul, flesh is its species, and nerves, and form, and the like. So I say of the fire of hell, that according to its nature it has a species which it does not impress upon the soul: and therefore the soul is not called hot. But according as it is an instrument of vindicating justice, it has another species, which I consider to be an affliction from heat for him who has transgressed: and it impresses this on the transgressing soul: and therefore I do not think the soul is hot, but rather that it is inestimably afflicted by what is hot: and the stripped soul is more susceptible to this species than any animate thing in this life.

620. Gregory the Great, Dialogues, Book IV.

§ 2. Note, however, that some here assign other reasons for this which Augustine states, such as, for instance, that the soul suffers more after death than before: because that passion belongs to the soul, and so it comes wholly upon it. Likewise, it is more to suffer in oneself, than to co-suffer. For in the body it only co-suffers, but after death it suffers. Likewise, because here it is in some way voluntary: but there entirely involuntary. And they touch on reasons of this sort which are more ridiculous and vulgar than true: because those things which they bring forward are not true reasons, nor of a greater passion in a spiritual substance, but rather of a lesser one, or even none at all: and therefore one must recur to the things said above.

§ 3. As for that which is objected from the order of justice, it must be said that a venial sin is twofold, namely venial from its kind, and venial from the outcome. According to Gregory in the fourth book of the Dialogues, where he speaks of purgatory, he gives the example of an idle word: yet God does not punish beyond what is deserved: because the venial from outcome is changed by mercy into such a thing that it is expiable by punishment: and this is always a mercy and a punishing short of what is strictly deserved, wherever it may be punished. But that it is stronger there and lesser here, I consider to be from the change of state: and this is accidentally so. However, the penalty there is sharper for those reasons which are hinted at in the resolution and at the beginning of the resolution. For in each resolution one reason for the sharper penalty is hinted at. But a venial sin from its kind is a disposition toward mortal sin and toward aversion from God: and therefore a lesser penalty is owed to it here, and a greater one there by the stated reason.

§ 4. To the next we say, that a mortal sin remaining mortal is not expiated by any penalty: and therefore if the objection is understood concerning that, then the first proposition is false: but a mortal sin made venial by its outcome is expiated by some penalty: but then it is made proportionable to a venial sin from its kind, and then the conclusion does not follow.

§ 5. To that which is objected concerning the sayings of Blessed Gregory, it must be said that that penalty insofar as it is a deferment of the supremely desired glory, itself bears a greater sadness than that which takes away health and life in this body: and the reason for this was made clear at the beginning of the resolution.

Articulus 9 — Whether It Is A Terrible Thing To Fall Into The Hands Of God

Whether it is a horrendous thing to fall into the hands of God?

§ 8. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at B, around the middle: It is a horrendous thing to fall, etc.

§ 9. On the contrary: God is infinitely more merciful than any human being: therefore it is less horrendous to fall into the hands of God, than into the hands of human beings: because His mercies are many: therefore it seems that he speaks falsely in the Text.

§ 10. Solution. It must be said that, in the work of mercy supremely exalting judgment, it is lighter to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of man, that is, while it is the time for mercy and penance: but when He will judge instances of justice in the future, it is more horrendous to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of man: because then, as is said, Prov. 6:34-35: The zeal and fury of a husband will not spare in the day of revenge, nor will he yield to anyone's prayers, nor will he accept many gifts for ransom. And by this the solution is clear.

Articulus 10 — Whether Venial Sin Can Be Changed Into Mortal Sin

Whether a venial sin can be changed into a mortal sin?

Whether a venial sin can be changed into a mortal sin?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at B, toward the end: For certain mortal sins, etc.

§ 3. On the contrary: The artisans of alchemy know that species cannot be transmuted: but the species of sin are diverse, namely venial and mortal: therefore one is not transmuted into the other.

§ 4. Solution. It must be said that a venial sin from its kind never becomes mortal except by the mode stated above: nor does a mortal sin become venial in this mode, but a mortal sin becomes venial from the outcome, that is, expiable by a penalty through pardon, for the reason that God deletes the fault through His grace, which afterwards makes the guilt capable of being loosed.

Articulus 11 — Whether If A Sinner Lived Forever, He Would Always Sin

Whether if a sinner were to live always, he would always sin?

§ 7. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at B, at the end: For if he were to live always, he would always sin.

622. Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names, Ch. 4.

§ 8. This conditional seems to be impossible: because there seems to be no consequence in: He who has sinned, lives always: therefore he always sins. For he is able not to sin, and nevertheless to live always.

§ 9. Response. It must be said that man is a spirit going, and not returning: hence man has it from himself that he sins: but man does not have it from himself that he rises again.

§ 10. Therefore it must be said to the Text that, just as "to see", according to the Philosopher, is said in two ways, namely to have sight, and to use sight: so also "to sin" is said in reference to having sin, and using sin. And here it is understood in reference to having sin: because he who sins once, as far as it depends on himself, is always in sin and always will be: and according to this the consequence is good: and so the Text is understood.

Articulus 12 — Whether One Who Has Not Completed The Enjoined Penance Will Be Bound To Complete It In Purgatory

Whether he who has not completed an enjoined penance will be bound to complete it in purgatory?

Whether he who has not completed an enjoined penance will be bound to complete it in purgatory?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at C: But if it is asked concerning him who has fulfilled the enjoined satisfaction, etc.

§ 3. For it seems that 1. He is treated unjustly if God punishes him: for he did what the Lord commanded, Matt. 23:2: All things whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do:[624] but this man did whatever he sitting upon the chair of Moses commanded him: therefore it seems that he is absolved in totality.

§ 4. 2. Moreover, this man is not bound to know the taxations of penances: therefore it seems that if even a lesser one is enjoined, and he completes it, his ignorance absolves him from the residue: therefore he ought not be punished any further in purgatory.

§ 5. Moreover, as was evident above, a penance is enjoined not only for the quantity of guilt, but also that it might be a medicine: hence although sexual intercourse is a greater sin in an old man than in a young man: nevertheless sometimes a greater penance is enjoined upon the young man than the old man: because that disease in the young man needs a greater medicine than in the old man. Let us suppose, therefore, that such a person fulfills only as much as is appropriate for the guilt he committed, and yet does not fulfill in totality what the priest enjoined. And let it be asked, whether he will complete it in purgatory?

§ 6. It seems that he will: because he did not fulfill the whole penance enjoined upon him here: therefore in purgatory he will fulfill the residue according to those things which are said here in the Text.

623. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Book X, Ch. 7.

§ 7. On the contrary: According to the measure of the sin shall be the measure of the stripes: [625] but he has already received a penalty according to the measure of the sin; therefore he is treated unjustly if he is punished further.

§ 8. Response. To the first question it must be said that, just as he himself says in the Text, he will fulfill it in purgatory.

§ 9. To the first objection raised to the contrary, it must be said that it is understood thus: all things whatsoever they shall say to you according to the discretion of divine right and of the sinner: but here the discretion of divine right is not observed.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that it is ignorance of the right, although the right may be obscure: because he is bound to know that the satisfaction ought to be proportioned to the fault: and this sort of ignorance, as Augustine says, excuses no one so that he does not burn: but it can excuse so that he burns less.

§ 11. To that which is asked further, it must be said that such a one flies out immediately: because he needs no further medicine.

§ 12. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that it is understood of things enjoined solely to delete guilt.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Thief, As Soon As He Was Converted, Deserved To Enter Paradise

Whether the thief, immediately as he was converted, merited to enter paradise?

§ 15. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at C, after the beginning: Immediately as he was converted, namely the thief, he merited to enter paradise.

§ 16. On the contrary: Before the ascension no one entered heaven except the thief: because it is said, Micah 2:13: He shall ascend opening the way before them.[626] Therefore it seems that he speaks falsely in the Text.

§ 17. If perhaps you say that the proposition which lies in the Text is twofold, from the fact that the word statim (immediately) can determine the verb merited, and thus it is true; or the verb to enter, and thus it is false. On the contrary: Luke 23:43: Amen I say to you, this day you shall be with me in paradise.[627] Therefore it seems that it determines to enter: and in this sense it was false: therefore it is false simply.

§ 2. Response. It must be said that there are three general opinions concerning paradise, as Augustine says at the beginning of Book XII of The Literal Meaning of Genesis, namely that it is corporeal, that it is spiritual, and that it is a place for both. Therefore it must be said that the spiritual paradise is that in which the Saints converse with God: and it has three things, namely rest, and delights in the object of those enjoying it, and congruity of place which is the empyrean heaven. And as to the first two, the thief immediately entered paradise with Christ after death, namely as regards rest and the delights of fruition. But as to the third, it is true that no one entered except after the Ascension.

§ 3. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 4.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Measure Of Time Is Prescribed Sufficiently Clearly For Penitents

Whether the measure of time is clearly enough prescribed to penitents?

§ 6. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at C, a little before the end: The canons therefore do not clearly enough prescribe the measure of time in doing penance, etc.

§ 7. For what he says seems false, because the canons determine penances of seven years, and three years, and forty days, and more, and less, as is evident in the Decretum: therefore it seems that Jerome speaks falsely here.

§ 8. Response. It must be said, as was noted above, that the rule of penance is never clearly prescribed: but nevertheless three things at least must be attended to, namely the quality of the sin, the quantity of contrition, and the state of the penitent. The canon, however, attends to only one of these: and therefore what it says is only like an exemplar to direct one in other cases either to diminish from it, or to add to it, according to the judgment of a discreet priest solemnly observing these three things.

Articulus 15 — Whether It Ought To Be Made Known To The Penitent How Much He Ought To Do According To The Canon, Yet Not Enjoined

Whether what one ought to do according to the canon should be notified to the one confessing, yet without enjoining it?

Whether what one ought to do according to the canon should be notified to the one confessing, yet without enjoining it?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning what he says there at D, after the beginning: Yet the quantity of penance is not to be imposed on them, etc.

§ 3. For it seems that it is a danger to make the penance known to them: because a grave penance indicates a grave sin: and once known it induces them into despair: since therefore it must be supremely avoided that an infirm penitent falls into despair, it seems that the penance should not be made known.

§ 4. To this it must be said that in truth it is to be made known: because it is good for the infirm one to know the quantity of his fault, so that he may be more contrite: nevertheless the priest ought to indicate to the infirm one the mercy of God, for Whom it is as though nothing to relax many sins, and equally as easy for many as for few: and then he will not fall into despair. And through this the solution of the objection is clear.

§ 5.

Articulus 16 — What An Indulgence Or Relaxation Is

What is an indulgence or relaxation?

§ 7. Next it is asked concerning the rationale of what he says there at D, a little after: And the weight of penance is to be alleviated with the prayers of friends and the giving of alms, etc.

§ 8. It is asked concerning relaxations or penances.

§ 9. And seven things are asked, namely, what is a relaxation or indulgence? Second, whether it is valid, and has an effect, or not? Third, for whom is it valid? Fourth, whether it is valid for one not giving but having the will to give? Fifth, whether the Pope can grant indulgences while existing in mortal sin, and to one who is in mortal sin? Sixth, whether a Bishop can grant indulgences? Seventh and finally, whether a parish priest can grant them, or an abbot to his monks?

§ 10. To the first of these it is objected thus:

§ 11. The Masters define relaxation thus: Relaxation is a fitting and discreet commutation of a greater satisfaction into a lesser one. Others define it thus: Relaxation is the promised diminution of a temporal penalty owed.

§ 12. But neither of these seems to fit: because 1. Relaxation speaks of a remission: but a commutation is not a remission, but the exaction of something else in place of it, equal in quantity, or value, or both: therefore relaxation is not a commutation: therefore the first definition is bad.

§ 13. 2. Moreover, because those whose concern it is to give relaxations do not use relaxations in this way. For they say: We mercifully relax: and they do not posit anything into which they commute, nor do they use the word commutation: therefore it seems that relaxation is not a commutation.

§ 14. 3. Moreover, in 2 Cor. 2:10, the Apostle makes a relaxation, saying: And to whom you have pardoned anything, I also: for, what I have pardoned, if I have pardoned anything, for your sakes have I done it in the person of Christ.[628] And it is plain here that there is no commutation: therefore it seems that relaxation is not a commutation.

§ 15. 4. Moreover, commutation belongs more to the will than to power: the proof of which is that humans even not having power commute wills: but relaxation more regards the will (or rather, power): therefore relaxation ought not to be defined by commutation.

626. Micah 2:13.

§ 2. 5. Moreover, in corporeal matters a commutation does not occur by way of relaxation, but by way of remission: therefore it seems that neither should it happen thus in spiritual matters: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 3. But against the second definition it is objected thus: For let us posit that someone is sufficiently contrite for the dismissal of both fault and penalty: it is certain that he is a debtor to no penalty: therefore no diminution of penalty occurs for him: and yet a relaxation can be made for him: therefore it seems that a relaxation is not a diminution of penalty.

§ 4. To the contrary of this it is objected: because divine relaxation is the exemplar of the relaxation of the Church: but every divine relaxation involves the commutation of a greater penalty into a lesser one: therefore the relaxation of the Church ought also to be of this sort. The first premise is self-evident. The second is proved by Master Hugh of St. Victor who says that the remission of the fault and the eternal penalty obligates one to a temporal purgatorial penalty: and thus it is a commutation of a greater penalty into a lesser one: and thus the proposition stands.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said that the given definitions can be adequately sustained. If someone, however, wanted to give this one, I think he would define it better, namely that an indulgence or relaxation is the remission of an enjoined penalty proceeding from the power of the keys, and from the treasury of the supererogation of the perfect: then "remission" is there as the genus. But because there is the remission of fault which God alone does, and the remission of penalty which God and man do, therefore "of a penalty" is added. But because, again, there is an eternal penalty which God remits, and the temporal penalty of an enjoined satisfaction which man remits, therefore "enjoined" is added. Because, in truth, only one having jurisdiction and the keys can make this remission, therefore "from the power of the keys" is added. And because what is enjoined for sins upon one cannot be duly and discreetly remitted, unless recompense is made by another who does more than he owes, therefore it subjoins "proceeding from the treasury of the supererogation of the perfect." For in this treasury the Church holds the riches of the merits and passion of Christ, and of the glorious Virgin Mary, and of all the Apostles, and Martyrs, and the living and dead saints of God. And for the utility and necessity of the Church they can be expended as suffrages for those who serve the Church in her necessity. And therefore I judge this definition to be better than the others.

§ 6. Nevertheless, sustaining the first definition, I say to the first objection that a commutation into something lesser is accompanied by remission: and because the Church demands something profitable to herself in her necessity, therefore commutation is posited there.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that they do use them in that manner in relaxations: because they receive either the vow of the cross, or the collection of alms, or the hearing of the word of God: and these are certain lesser penalties: and then they make the relaxation when these are held.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the Apostle relaxed the penalty because that man had been greatly contrite: and the rebuke which he had sustained from many was sufficient for him, as is said in the same place,[629] and he needed relaxation: and there was no commutation there: because he was sharper in punishing afterwards for the edification of the Church which he had scandalized.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the commutation of contracts is subject to the will: but a commutation which is of a greater into a lesser, respects the authority of him who has to govern the Church: because without his power it cannot be done: and such is the commutation of indulgences or relaxations.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that in corporeal matters relaxations are also twofold, namely of the whole, or of a part: and the indulgence of the Church is likened to an indulgence in which a part is indulged and relaxed, and not the whole.

§ 1. To the next which is objected against the second definition, it must be said that it may well be that one who is thus contrite is not a debtor with respect to God, but nevertheless he is a debtor with respect to the Church, as is expressly gathered from the Text of the preceding chapter from the words of Augustine and Jerome. And therefore a diminution and relaxation can be made for him concerning that.

§ 2. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 3.

Articulus 17 — Whether Relaxation Also Has An Effect, And Whether It Avails

Whether relaxation also has an effect, and whether it is valid?

§ 5. Secondly it is asked, whether a relaxation is valid? and, whether it has an effect, or not?

§ 6. But it seems that it is valid for nothing.

§ 7. 1. 2 Tim. 2:13: He remains faithful: he cannot deny himself.[630] Gloss: Which he would do if he did not fulfill his words. But he said that according to the measure of the sin shall be the measure of the stripes.[631] Therefore he can relax nothing of that: therefore it seems that relaxation is valid for nothing.

§ 8. 2. Moreover, Augustine: Either God punishes, or man punishes: but man does not worthily punish what is relaxed: therefore God will punish it: therefore the relaxation was not valid.

§ 9. 3. Moreover, Isa. 40:2: Her iniquity is forgiven: she hath received of the hand of the Lord double for all her sins.[632] Therefore it seems that penalties are rather to be doubled, than to be indulged: therefore an indulgence is valid for nothing, as it seems.

628. 2 Corinthians 2:6.

§ 10. 4. Moreover, the Gloss on that passage of Isaiah: She received torment in body and in soul for all her sins. Therefore relaxation was not valid for her: therefore neither is it valid for another, because concerning similar things the judgment is the same, as Boethius says.

§ 11. 5. Moreover, a corporeal disease cannot be cut out and cured except through an antidote: and if the antidote is relaxed, the disease remains: but a spiritual disease is more difficult, and an enjoined penance is its antidote: therefore if anything of the penalty were to be relaxed, the disease would remain: therefore relaxation of an enjoined penance is valid for nothing, but rather it even hinders.

§ 12. 6. Moreover, it seems to be a mockery to buy an indulgence of forty days, or of one year, or of five, or of more, for a halfpenny (obol).

§ 13. 7. Furthermore, it seems that simony is even committed in such things: for it is certain that what is remitted by the Church is spiritual, and what is exacted and expended for it is temporal: therefore a buying of the spiritual with a temporal price occurs there: and this constitutes simony: therefore simony is committed in such things.

§ 14. 8. Moreover, let us posit that seven years of fasting are enjoined upon someone, and he comes in one day seven times to a Church which has an indulgence of one year from the Pope, and each time he offers one halfpenny: therefore this man, in a single day, by seven halfpennies, is absolved from seven years of penance justly enjoined upon him: but this is a marvel if even the infidels do not mock it.

§ 15. If, however, it is conceded that it is valid for nothing. On the contrary: 1. 2 Cor. 2:10: For, what I have pardoned, if I have pardoned anything, for your sakes have I done it in the person of Christ.[633] The Gloss: As if Christ had pardoned: but it is certain that what Christ pardons, is pardoned: therefore also what the Apostle pardoned: but the Pope is of as much power as Paul was: therefore also what the Pope pardons, is pardoned: therefore also what they pardon who, so that they might be able to pardon, have it from the Pope: therefore indulgences are as valid as they are said to be valid by those who grant them.

§ 16. 2. Moreover, Chrysostom on Matthew 16:19 on that phrase: I will give to thee the keys, etc.[634] To a mortal and earthly man. It is certain, however, because God has entrusted the power of all things that are in heaven, and has shown the Church to be stronger than heaven. What is granted in heaven is entirely granted: therefore, since the Church is stronger than heaven, it seems that what is granted is that which is relaxed in the Church.

1. Furthermore, the universal governor of the Church, especially in those things which the whole Church receives and approves, is not to be believed to wish to deceive anyone: it is evident, however, that he preaches indulgences to be valid and causes them to be preached: therefore, as it seems, they are simply valid, just as they are preached to be valid.

627. Matthew 23:2-3.

2. Furthermore, Luke 22:32: "I have prayed for you, Peter, that your faith may not fail." But this was said to Peter in the person of the Church: therefore the universal Church does not err: therefore it seems that indulgences are valid.

3. Furthermore, we see that such things are promised to Peter in the person of the Church when it is said: "I do not say to you, Peter: Dignit: therefore it seems that the more indulgences the ecclesiastical dispenser gives, the better he acts: but he would not act better if indulgences were worth nothing: therefore indulgences are valid and have effect.

4. Furthermore, in the human body we see that the weight and infirmity of one member is received by another member: for a wise physician causes it to flow over another less dangerous one: therefore it will be so also in spiritual matters: therefore one can act for another: therefore, since indulgence is made for one from this that he has done more for another, it seems that indulgence has effect and is true.

Response. It must be said that there were three opinions of old concerning indulgences. For some, moved more by the aforementioned reasons than was necessary, said that indulgences were worth nothing at all, and that they were now a fraud by which a mother, deceiving her children, provokes them to good, namely pilgrimages, alms, and hearing the word of God, and such things, and they gave the example of a mother provoking little ones to walk, which is useful for little ones, and at the end of the way promising them an apple, and afterwards withdrawing it: which deception is even pious. But these distract the deeds of the Church to the play of children: and I think this almost savors of heresy: for nothing would be believed of the Church, if in those things which are preached to the people and exhorted to do, deception is found. Therefore others, contradicting more than was necessary, said that indulgences, as they are pronounced, are simply valid without any other condition understood or said. But because these give too good a forum to the mercy of God, therefore it seems to me that the third opinion is to be consented to, which chooses the middle way of opinions, namely that indulgences are valid as the Church preaches them to be valid: but six conditions are required which are supposed or said by the Church.

Two, however, are on the part of the giver, of which the first is the authority of the giver from the jurisdiction he has, such as the Pope, Bishop, Legate, and the like. The other is the pious cause moving the giver, not private, but public. This cause, however, is divided as it were into two, so that there is a just necessity of requesting such things from the faithful, or public utility. Just necessity, such as the danger of the homeland, the liberation of the holy land, endangered faith, endangered study, and the like: utility, however, such as the poverty of the place, hearing of the word of God, frequentation of relics, and the like. Two others are supposed on the part of the recipient, namely that he is contrite and confessed in vow or in purpose, and that he has faith that this can be done for him through the power of the keys. And therefore it is always contained in the letters of indulgences: "To all who are contrite and confessed," etc., otherwise the penalty would not be solvable by him, unless remission of guilt had already preceded in him. Two others are required on the part of grace or the Church in which the remission of sins is made, namely the abundance of the treasury of merits stored in the spiritual chests of the Church, of which merits it has been said above: and the just estimation of its solution, for which the indulgence is instituted. I call just estimation, however, not that which is made according to the estimation of the recipient of the indulgence, who perhaps would estimate too little what he gives, as some said: nor even according to the estimation of the giver of the indulgence, who perhaps would estimate too little what is given: and this others said. But I call just estimation that of good men according to the necessity of the Church, considering the time and the ability of the person: because at one time a little help is worth more than at another a great deal: and it is more for one to give a little than for another to give much. However, some wish to add two other things, namely if the priest imposing the penance has promised, and if it is useful for the penitent to receive such a penance. Hence they note the verses thus:

If the confessor promises you, if it is perhaps expedient for you and in a devout place, with salt the bishop makes you secure, after this let the offering be made.

But I think it is not necessary to add these last two: because indulgence is always given by a superior, who has nothing to seek from the priest who imposed satisfaction, but rather can do what he wills even against the will of the priest concerning the subject. Of the second it is evident, that it is not to be added: because I do not think it is doubtful to anyone that indulgence is always good.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that God does not deny Himself by confirming the indulgence of the Church, but rather shows Himself truthful in what He said: "Whose sins you forgive, they are forgiven them" and He fulfills these words, because according to the measure of the offense the penalty is proportioned in two ways, namely in quantity, and this the key attends to in confession: or in the value of the Church, and this the key attends to in relaxation, when it commands to do what is more valuable to the Church, in which all sins are forgiven.

To the other it must be said, that man presumes this, but not the same man, but another who has the Church in the power of dispensing in the penalties of supererogations: and this can well be done: because as it is held, 1 Corinthians 12:14 and following, in the Gloss and text, just as the goods of the natural body are communicated from one member to another, so the goods of the mystical body are communicated.

To the other it must be said, that the double do not say in the penalty a duplicity: because this would be to punish beyond what is deserved, which does not befit God, whose property is to have mercy and to spare: but this is to be punished in body and soul. And indeed in the soul every penitent is punished by the pain of contrition: in the body, however, by some satisfaction: which although it is not that which the confessor imposes, is nevertheless that which he who gives the indulgence requires: because, as it has been held above, there is a certain commutation of penalty into penalty, although it is less in quantity, yet it is greater in value, time of utility, and necessity of the Church.

To the other it must be said, that the Gloss does not intend by the penalty of body and soul, anything other than what has been said.

To the other it must be said, that in truth that objection is good: but it must be said, that in spiritual matters it is different than in bodily matters: because in spiritual matters all diseases depend on one cause which is perverse will, and that is supposed to be converted before indulgence has place: and therefore whatever penalty is satisfactory of the residue remaining, so that the disease does not return: but in bodily diseases not all diseases depend on one root, and therefore medicine cannot be changed into medicine: however, my counsel in such matters is accustomed to be, that even after relaxation the penitent remains in the penance which the discreet confessor imposes after diligent examination of confession because he does not impose only for the guilt to be deleted, but also that it may be a medicine against the proneness contracted from old sins, which are not deleted by indulgence, but rather by works of satisfaction imposed in the aforementioned way. And although he is not bound to keep fasts to satisfy for guilt, it is nevertheless useful that he keeps them for the medicine of the remnants of sin just as also the bodily physician gives medicine, and orders a diet: for this is imposed as the ordering of a certain diet, suitable for him who has sinned in such a way.

To the other it must be said, that there is no simony: because that which the Church requires, is not referred to the corporeal, but to the spiritual: nor is there buying, but the largess of the Church thus provoking her children to good.

To the other it must be said, that in truth there is no deception: because for a penny he receives, as much as according to his ability and the Church it is worth: the offerings also do not receive as much as the deceivers believe.

And by the same it is also clear the solution to the following, and the whole is solved.

Articulus 18 — To Whom An Indulgence Avails

To whom does indulgence avail?

Thirdly, it is asked, To whom does it avail?

And there, under one article, three questions are asked, namely, whether it avails one existing in mortal sin? And secondly, whether it avails equally the secular and the religious? And thirdly, whether it avails one existing in hell or purgatory?

It is argued, however, that it avails all those existing in mortal sin: because

1. Indulgence is preached to all, but the Church deceives no one: therefore it avails equally to all.
2. Likewise, the Church devised indulgences because of the necessity which sinners suffer, doing more in sins than they can satisfy in penalties: but according to this, none are in such need as those existing in mortal sin: therefore it seems that indulgence chiefly avails them.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY, it is said that 1. No penalty is absolved by anyone unless the guilt is absolved by the same: but by this one the guilt is not absolved: therefore the penalty is insoluble: but the Church does not relax anything except the penalty: therefore it seems that it relaxes nothing for such.

1. Furthermore, the key in confession absolving the confessors is more certain in its effect than the key in relaxations: but in confession, it does not absolve unless one is first absolved by God from the guilt of mortal sin: therefore in relaxation, nothing is absolved from the penalty unless the guilt is first remitted by God.

Further, it is again asked about the second, whether it equally benefits the religious and the secular?

It seems, however, that it benefits the secular more: 1. For remission is due to those in need, who do less in satisfaction: but such are the seculars. Therefore, relaxation is chiefly given to them.

1. Furthermore, there is not one state of giving stipends in temporal matters and receiving them: therefore neither in spiritual matters: but spiritual ones are those from whose abundance the defects of others are supplied: therefore it seems that whatever is relaxed in seculars, this is all imposed on the religious to supply: therefore it seems that when indulgence of one year is given to seculars, one year is added to the religious for satisfaction for sins.

On the contrary, it is objected: because more combustible is more burned: and it is so in all other things, that what is more susceptible of something, receives more of it: therefore what is more susceptible of spiritual benefits, receives more of them: but what is more purified is more susceptible of spiritual benefits: therefore it seems that such receive more: but religious are more frequently pure and susceptible: therefore they receive more of spiritual gifts: but indulgence is among spiritual gifts: therefore religious and spiritual men receive more indulgence, as it seems.

But it seems that indulgence is necessary for both: for to anyone to whom their own goods are not sufficient, common goods and indulgences of the Church are necessary: but to no religious or secular are their own goods sufficient: therefore it seems that indulgence and the common goods of the Church are necessary for both the religious and the secular.

Further, it is asked whether indulgence can be given to both the living and the dead who are in purgatory or in hell?

It seems, however, that it can: because 1. The Church preaches the cross and makes it preached for itself and for two or three or sometimes ten souls of both the living and the dead, at the choice of the one signed with the cross: but those souls are sometimes in hell, sometimes in purgatory, sometimes, however, they are still of the living: therefore it seems that the indulgence of the cross avails all those souls mentioned.

632. Isaiah 40:2.

1. Furthermore, the suffrages of the Church extend to those existing in purgatory, because otherwise the Church would offer for them in vain: and according to a certain opinion, they extend to those existing in hell: but indulgence is among the chief suffrages of the Church: therefore it seems that indulgences extend to all those.
2. Furthermore, to whomever the personal merit of one from the Church benefits, the common merit of both the head and the members of the Church can benefit much more, if it is derived to them: but the personal merit of one from the Church sometimes benefited the damned in hell: therefore the common merit of both the head and the members of the Church can benefit the damned in hell, if it is derived from them: it is derived, however, through indulgence: therefore if indulgence is given to them, it will benefit them. The first is evident by itself: because the common merit is of greater efficacy than the personal. The second is evident from what is read about Trajan and Gregory, because Trajan was extracted from hell at the prayers of Gregory: therefore the proposition is established.

On the contrary of this, it is objected: because 4. It is said to Peter: Whatever you bind, etc.: but the dead whom you bind on earth are not among those existing on earth: therefore it seems that the keys of the Church do not extend to them.

1. Furthermore, indulgence has no place except where merit has a place: therefore indulgence has no place except on the way: but the dead are not on the way: therefore indulgence has no place in the dead. The first is proved from this, that indulgence is satisfactory by way of merit. The second is evident from the distinction of the way and the homeland or the terminus: because they are distinguished by merit and reward both by the Saints and by the Masters.
2. Furthermore, When I shall take the time, I will judge justices*: but after death, the Lord takes the time, as is commonly said: therefore then He will judge according to justice and not according to indulgence: therefore then indulgence has no place.

Response. It seems to be said in response to those things asked in the first article, that indulgences avail all those both existing in mortal sin and in the state of grace, but differently: because to those existing in the state of grace they avail for the diminution of expiatory penalty: whether imposed or to be imposed, if the priest imposing it erred. But to those existing in mortal sin, it avails in two ways: in one way, in the manner in which we said one can merit the first grace of conversion for another, if he prays and fasts and does other good works for him: for if one can do this, much more can the Church do this through the treasures of common merits which it places upon him by indulgence. In another way, as we said, that works of the kind of good things bring a man closer to grace, because something precedes in some sinners, as Augustine says*, by which they are worthy of justification, by the dignity of congruity not of condignity: so also much more does indulgence with even unformed faith bring a man closer to grace and makes him more suitable for conversion. Otherwise, I do not think indulgences avail those existing in mortal sin.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that in this way they would avail, and thus the Church understands them to avail. And sinners suffer the greatest necessity for conversion.

To what is objected, it must be said that it is well conceded that it does not avail them in that manner: because indulgence never has a place as to the remission of penalties unless first the penalty of contrition is placed in the penitent, namely the pain of contrition, which makes the penalty soluble, changing the eternal into the temporal.

And by this also the solution to those things asked in the first article is evident.

To those things which follow in the second, it seems to be said that indulgences benefit both: but yet I think that according to the first intention of the Church, they are not given except to those in need of another's merit because of the defect of their own: and those are the seculars building wood, hay, stubble, as will be said in the following distinction: or religious only in habit, who imitate the life of seculars, because truly they are to be called irreligious.

By this, the solution to the first two which proceed according to the first intention of the Church is evident: and I well think that they conclude truly in this way: nor is the condition of the religious worse because of this, but rather better: just as the condition of one abounding in merit is better than that of one in need, and therefore not receiving another's: just as the Lord according to the sentence of Paul in Acts says: It is more blessed to give than to receive*: this is especially true in spiritual matters.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that spiritual gifts are twofold, namely according to the order to good which are gifts and virtues: and of these, the better are more susceptible. Others are according to the order from evil, like the good of contrition and satisfaction and indulgence: and of these, the more in need are more susceptible.

And there is an instance to the argument: because the innocent as such is purer than he who has sinned: yet nevertheless, the innocent is not more susceptible of penance and contrition or satisfaction, although all those are spiritual gifts.

To the other, it must be said that if it is dealt with strictly with us, no one's own merit suffices except Christ's: because He did not need anything for Himself: but one thing is condign, and another is required of us: for God does not require impossibilities from us, but certain few and light things, namely the keeping of the commandments: and we can super-erogate much with those, and these we store in the treasures. And it is similar, that if the Lord from the profit of the talent entrusted to the servant, from a thousand marks demanded one denarius: for the servant could store all the rest in the treasures: and having that from the benevolence of the Lord more than from justice, he would not need to beg for another's suffrage.

634. Matthew 16:19.

To what is asked about the last article, it seems to be said without prejudice, that indulgences do not benefit those existing in hell: but they benefit those existing in purgatory much. And the reason for this is that they are insusceptible of good, just as the demons who are in hell. Hence Damascene: What death is in men, this is in demons the fall. Because just as men are insusceptible of penance after death, so also are angels after the fall.

To what is first objected, it must be said that I have never seen such a form issued from any authentic source from the court: but rather it is always added: To those who have confessed and received penance, or who have confessed and received penance: or are still on the way penitent, or in purgatory satisfying by suffering in penalties what they have done: and therefore it avails only to them. If, however, any other form were issued, which did not mention these, yet it should be understood in this way.

To the other, it must be said that as will be proved below, the suffrages of the Church do not benefit the damned for the mitigation or absolution or suspension of penalties, except very incidentally for a certain diminution of the penalty which is called the worm of conscience: and therefore from this it is not inferred that indulgences benefit such.

If, however, you say that it is an opinion, it seems to be said that that opinion is more an error than contains any probability. And in it especially is true what Augustine says, because what we opine, we owe to error.

To the other, it must be said that the miracle of blessed Gregory is not sufficiently proven, nor is it authorized, but apocryphal. Hence it is not read afterwards what happened to Trajan, where he repented, and how he was saved: and therefore I consider this a fable. If, however, something else is found by which that miracle is confirmed, then I say that Trajan was not dead, so that he received the final sentence of his condemnation, but rather that the glory of God might be manifested in the merits of blessed Gregory: just as the Lord says of Lazarus, that this sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified through it*: for if he had fulfilled the time granted to him for merit, and thus had died, even if he were raised a thousand times, he would never repent: because he would be confirmed in evil, and insusceptible of penance: without penance, however, a sinner cannot be saved: and then it does not follow that it benefits the damned, because he according to this was not condemned by the final sentence, but suspended from life for a time, that the glory of God and goodness might be more exalted through the merits of Gregory.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be solved for those who are in purgatory, by saying that according to something those existing in purgatory are on earth: because namely they merited while living, that even after death they might be able to avail for a quicker liberation. And this is held in the following in the Letter from the words of Augustine. For purgatory is in a way the way and in a way the terminus: for as to confirmation, because they can no longer sin, they are in the terminus: but as to not yet having reached the amendment by which they are amended, they are still on the way and in transit to the homeland.

To the other, the solution is evident by the same: because the alien merit for the reason stated has a place in purgatory: and this will be more proved below.

To the other, it must be said that the Lord judges justices in this regard, because with a stricter penalty of penance: but they are not entirely on the way: and this they merited while living: and in this it is mercifully dealt with them, that the alien merit benefits them.

And by this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 19 — Whether An Indulgence Avails Equally For The Giver And For The Doer Of What The Church Requires, And For The One Having The Will To Do It But Not Doing It Because Of Lack Of Ability

Whether an indulgence equally avails the giver and the one doing what the Church requires, and the one having the will to do, but not doing due to lack of ability?

Fourthly, it is asked, Whether it equally avails the giver and the one doing what the Church requires, and the one having the will to do it, but not doing due to lack of ability.

And it seems that it does: because
1. The will is reckoned for the deed: but this one would willingly give if he had [the means]: therefore it seems that it is reckoned to him as the deed.

1. Further, the Lord praises the widow putting in two mites, saying that she put in more than all+: but this could not happen except on account of the will: therefore it seems that the will even avails better than the deed.
2. Further, in 2 Corinthians 8:12: If the readiness is there, it is acceptable according to what one has, not according to what one does not have, the same as before.

On the contrary, it is objected: because let us suppose that many indulgences are distributed on account of different gifts or deeds, which the Church requires for indulgences: therefore they do not avail him who cannot do these: therefore the will alone does not avail as much as the deed for all: therefore they are not equal for all.

Response. It must be said that this question is light: for there are certain things substantial to merit and reward, and certain things accidental: for the quantity of charity is substantially required in merit, and according to the quantity of that, the quantity of merit and reward is considered together: but in accidental reward, the work is more considered, as is the diminution of punishment or quicker liberation. Hence it can well be that one having many indulgences will be liberated more quickly than one not having, but having the will to have: but he will not be more fully liberated, nor will he have fuller glory, but quicker: because the quantity of glory is according to the quantity of charity.

To the first three, it must be said that it is understood concerning merit by reason of substantial reward, what is objected, and not with respect to accidental reward.

And through this, the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 20 — Whether The Pope, Being In Mortal Sin, Can Grant Indulgences, Even To One Who Is In Mortal Sin

Whether the Pope existing in mortal sin can grant indulgences, even to one who is in mortal sin?

Fifthly, it is asked whether the Pope existing in mortal sin can grant indulgence to one existing in mortal sin?

However, it seems that he cannot: because
1. Works done in mortal sin are dead: but a dead work vivifies nothing: since therefore indulgence is ordained for vivifying or for spiritual life, it seems that such indulgence is not valid.

1. Further, a stream into which the source does not flow can flow nothing: but the Pope who is in mortal sin is a stream into which the source, that is, the Holy Spirit, flows nothing, because the Holy Spirit flees from the feigned discipline. And, Wisdom will not enter into a malevolent soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sins: therefore he cannot flow into others: therefore neither indulgence.
2. Further, a ray of the sun which a cloud intercepts does not come to us: but the grace of the Holy Spirit is called a ray by blessed Dionysius, and sin a cloud by Isaiah: therefore grace which sin intercepts does not come to us: but indulgence flowing or ought to flow from such a Pope is grace intercepted by sin: therefore it does not come to us: therefore such indulgence is not valid.

On the contrary of this is: because prophecy is grace and a divine ray: and yet it flowed through Caiaphas, because he was the high priest of that year, as the Evangelist John says, xi, 51. The same is held by what is read in Numbers, xxii, xxi and xxiv, because the most illustrious prophecy flowed through the most wicked Balaam to the whole Synagogue and Church.

For this reason we say that indulgences are equally valid, whether they are given by a bad or a good person.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, which is objected against, it must be said that to grant indulgences is a grace freely given, which is of power, not of the goodness of life: and all such graces are equally done through good and bad.

To the other it must be said that the first is true: the second is false, because to such a Pope the Holy Spirit flows those things which are of power.

To the other it must be said that sin does not intercept the ray except of grace making pleasing. But it has already been said that this ray is of power, and of grace freely given, just as prophecy.

Articulus 21 — Whether A Bishop Can Make And Grant Indulgences

Can a Bishop make and grant indulgences?

Sixthly, it is asked whether a Bishop can grant indulgences?

It seems, however, that he cannot: because he does not have power over the treasures of the Church, but only the Pope, who is established over the whole: and indulgences draw their force from the treasures of the Church, as has already been shown: therefore a Bishop cannot dispense.

On the contrary, it is argued that he who has jurisdiction and the keys has the power of granting indulgences, because the power of granting indulgences accompanies the keys with jurisdiction: therefore it seems that he has the power.

Further, it is asked concerning what is done in our times, that a Bishop of another diocese grants an indulgence not in his own diocese due to the approval of the diocesan: and thus many indulgences are gathered by forty and forty days. And it seems that this can be done: because a Bishop can grant the power to a non-Bishop to grant indulgences: therefore he can also grant this to a Bishop: therefore such an indulgence is valid.

On the contrary, it is argued that the Constitution determines that even many Bishops cannot grant at the same place and time more than forty days: therefore what is added beyond this does not seem to be valid.

Response. To this it must be said that a Bishop in his own diocese can grant an indulgence, and as much as he wishes, unless it is distinctly set by the constitution of the Lord Pope.

§ 1. [is] limited: just as now it is up to forty days.

§ 2. To the first, therefore, it must be said that he himself has in his power the treasures of his diocese and of the passion of Christ, although not as fully as he who has the universality of power. And therefore he cannot confer so great and full an indulgence. Hence the first [proposition] is not true.

§ 3. To what is further asked, it must be said that, as it seems to me, the limitation is reasonable on account of the excessive abuse of indulgences which is currently taking place. Hence it seems right that they should not confer more than forty days at a time. If, however, the power were not limited, they could undoubtedly, by the concession of the diocesan, confer more or less, according to what the diocesan would permit.

Expositio Textus

Exposition of the Text

§ 1. Yet a priest ought not, etc. But this is not observed: because even with the Bishop present in the same town, the priest does not always have recourse to him, but absolves and reconciles.

§ 2. Response. It is understood of a penitent bound by the Bishop or another priest, or of a public penitent.

§ 3. Another distinction follows.

Articulus 22 — Whether A Simple Priest Can Confer Indulgences, And Whether A Layman Can Give His Indulgences To Another

Whether a simple priest can confer indulgences? And, whether one layperson can give his indulgences to another?

§ 1. Seventh and lastly it is asked: Whether a simple priest can confer indulgences?

§ 2. And it seems that he can: because he himself has in the power of his keys the riches of his flock: therefore from those he can communicate to the more indigent: and this ratifies indulgences: therefore such a one can confer indulgences.

§ 3. To the contrary of this it is objected: parish priests do not have power in jurisdiction: hence they cannot even excommunicate, except in common. But the giving of an indulgence follows the key conjoined with jurisdiction. Therefore it seems that parish priests cannot give indulgences.

§ 4. Further, it is asked here concerning the abuse which currently takes place, that even laypeople receive indulgences, and give what was given to them to another, either in whole or in part. For example, I receive ten days of indulgence, and anyone else of the people the same; afterwards, out of those ten, I give three to my dear one, and someone else gives three; and thus in one people many are gathered three by three, and given to one living or dead person.

§ 5. But it seems that this can be done: because spiritual goods are more exchangeable than corporeal goods. But in corporeal goods it is the case that what is given to me I can give to another either in whole or in part as I wish. Therefore I can do this in spiritual goods as well, as it seems.

§ 6. To the contrary of this is the fact that the giving of indulgences requires jurisdiction in the giver. But that layperson has no jurisdiction. Therefore it seems that he cannot give what was given to him.

§ 7. If perhaps you say that there is a counter-instance, because I see that simple preachers having no jurisdiction give indulgences by the permission of the Bishop, and thus a layperson can as well: there is no counter-instance, because in such cases the preacher is the pronouncer of the indulgence rather than the giver: and therefore the conferring is done by the Bishop, and not by the preacher.

§ 8. Response. It must be said that a simple parish priest cannot give any indulgence, for the reason introduced earlier.

§ 9. To what is introduced to the contrary, it must be said that although he may have some treasures in his flock, nevertheless he does not have abundant ones: but an indulgence requires the abundance of many Churches and flocks.

§ 10. To what is further asked, it must be said that such an indulgence is worth nothing, except for the delusion of the people, for the reason introduced.

§ 11. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is otherwise with an indulgence than with other spiritual goods, as was shown above ; because Augustine says that nothing has indulgence except sin: and this is private, not common, like the good, virtue, and grace. And therefore the one receiving the indulgence, being weak in his private penalties for sin, receives it; and therefore, because it is private, it cannot be derived to another. He can, however, communicate to another the merit of his labor, insofar as he acts for the indulgence; but then it is not taxed at a third, or a fourth, or the like, but rather as much as God grants it to be worth, in the way that any meritorious work done for a neighbor avails him for meriting grace or retaining it if he has it.

DISTINCTIO XXI

Divisio Textus

§ 1. It is also usually asked, Whether after this life, etc.

In this distinction two things are determined, the first of which is about the remission of certain sins after this life. Second, however, certain doubts regarding confession left over from the preceding [distinctions]: and it begins there, at E, After these things it must be considered, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Some Venial Sins Are Remitted After This Life

Whether any venial sins are remitted after this life?

§ 1. But a question arises concerning the beginning of the reading: Whether any venial sins are remitted after this life, as seems to be proven in the Text?

§ 2. And it seems that they are: 1. Gregory in book IV of the Dialogues: Certain faults are relaxed in this age: but certain small ones both in this and in the future [age].

Bede says the same words on Matthew 12:32, in the Gloss: It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in the future.

§ 3. 2. Also, 1 Corinthians 3:12: But if anyone builds upon this foundation... wood, hay, stubble. Throughout the entire Gloss it is expounded concerning venial sin. Suppose that someone existing in grace, yet having venial faults, is in the last instant of his life, and dies with the will for venial sins, not grieving over them. It is certain that he will be saved, because he is in grace, and venial sins do not take away grace. It is certain again that a sin remaining in the will is not remitted. Therefore it seems that it is necessary that they be remitted after death.

§ 4. If perhaps you say that it is converted into a mortal sin on account of the will to repeat it: this is ridiculous, that on account of this an idle [word] would be converted into a mortal sin, because he has the will to repeat it.

§ 5. If perhaps you say that the will is confirmed in the state in which he dies: this indeed which you say is not proven. But suppose what you say is true; according to this, the will of that person will be simply conjoined to God also according to habit, yet having a disposition to aversion according to act: and there is no such state of a confirmed person. Hence it is clear that what you say is a fiction. Therefore it seems that some fault is remitted after death.

§ 6. But TO THE CONTRARY of this some object thus: 1. After death is not a time for meriting: but the deletion of a fault occurs through merit: therefore after death is not a time for the deletion of any fault: therefore not of a venial one either.

§ 7. 2. Moreover, a venial sin arises from the fomes [tinder of sin]: but the fomes belongs to the composite, and not to the soul in itself: therefore the venial sin does as well. Therefore, once the fomes is dissolved, the venial sin is also dissolved. But the fomes is dissolved in death: therefore the venial sin is too.

§ 8. 3. Moreover, a penalty does not liberate except from a penalty: but after death there will be nothing expiating except a penalty: therefore it only liberates from a penalty: therefore not from any fault.

§ 9. 4. Moreover, it was held above that a venial sin is not destroyed, unless some contrition has been premised: but after death there will be no contrition: therefore after death a venial sin is not destroyed as regards the fault.

§ 10. 5. Moreover, whatever some penalty can destroy, the greatest penalty can destroy even more. But the greatest penalty is death. Therefore whatever some penalty destroys, death will destroy it. But a penalty can destroy a venial sin, as you say: because after death the penalty of purgatory relaxes [it], as you say. Therefore it destroys it even before death, and thus he will not come to purgatory. Therefore no fault is remitted after this life, as it seems.

§ 11. Solution. Since Gregory in book IV of the Dialogues not only says, but also proves that penalty and fault are destroyed after this life, I consider it a presumption to say that no venial fault can be destroyed after this life. But it seems it must be said and asserted with the Saints that many venial sins can be destroyed after death.

§ 12. To the first against this, it seems it must be said that after death is not a time for increasing merit, but for using merit toward the efficacy to which it touches upon. But Augustine says that some, while they lived, merited that suffrages could profit them. So I say that those, while they lived, merited this, that grace and penalty could profit them toward the deletion of venial sins. And therefore they receive the use of their merit after death aside from an increase in merits; and the increase in merits looks to a greater crown, and they will have a greater one.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that this is invalid: "If something arises from something, that it is destroyed only with the destruction of that thing." For every sin arises from the fomes, and yet remains in the soul when the fomes is destroyed; and the universal arises from sense, and yet remains in the soul when sense is destroyed. Hence that consequence is in no way valid where something is caused in a remaining subject: and the grace of a subject can also remain even when its cause is destroyed.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that a penalty in itself liberates only from a penalty: but a penalty in a subject which is informed by grace can liberate also from a fault: and such are those who are in purgatory.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that a venial sin is not destroyed otherwise [than by contrition], but that in this way it is more fittingly destroyed: for since it is rather a disposition to a fault than a fault, it can also be destroyed in another way.

§ 16. To the last it must be said that the penalty of death would indeed destroy [it] if it were ordered to this, as in the martyrs: but it is not directed to this in others who commonly die: and therefore it does not destroy [it].

Articulus 2 — Whether There Are Some Who Build Wood, Hay, And Stubble, And What Those Things Signify

Whether there are some who build wood, hay, and stubble? And, what do those signify?

§ 1. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, before the middle: Also concerning those who build wood, hay, etc.

§ 2. Two things are asked here, namely, what these are, and concerning their difference.

§ 3. And it seems that they are differences of mortal sins: because 1. In the original on Isaiah 5:8, on that verse: Woe to you who join house to house, etc., Jerome says: Heretics join dogmas to dogmas: and they who upon the foundation ought to have built gold, and silver, and precious stones, on the contrary build wood, hay, stubble. But it is certain that heretics do not build anything except mortal sins, insofar as they are heretics and preserve heresy. Therefore it seems that these three express differences of mortal sins.

§ 4. 2. Moreover, on Joshua 4:1 and following, a certain Gloss of Adamantius expounds it in this way.

§ 5. But against this it seems to be that: 1. Here they are taken for venial sins. 2. Moreover, wood, hay, stubble are consumable in the fire: but mortal sins are not consumed in the fire. Therefore they are not well expounded by wood, hay, and stubble.

§ 6. To the second it is proceeded thus: 1. Many and quasi-infinite are the differences of venial sins: therefore it seems that they cannot congruously be assigned by three differences.

§ 7. 2. Moreover, Augustine in the Text does not seem to distinguish the venial sin which is signified by these three, except in the love of temporal things. But venial sins occur in many other ways. Therefore it seems that it is insufficiently signified by these three.

§ 8. Response. It must be said that by these three the differences of venial sins are most congruously signified. Hence what Jerome says, and the Gloss on Joshua, is a certain adaptation beyond the literal intention.

§ 9. To what is further asked, it must be said that a venial sin is not signified by these three according to the diversities of its species, but rather according to its quantity which accompanies every species of venial sin, according to the diversity of the act, and of the root, and of the adherence, from which it proceeds. For the Philosopher says that of all extremes determined according to quantity, a mean is determined. Hence, since there is a venial sin of the greatest adherence which can be around God, and of the least which is scarcely sensible, there is a venial sin of mean adherence. And therefore the quantity of a venial sin is signified only in a threefold manner, and this metaphorically: just as the diversity of a cause is signified in the diversity of the effect, for the duration of remaining in the fire shows the quantity of the adherence of the venial sin. But it is certain that among consumable combustibles, wood generically remains longest in the fire, and stubble least, because it is dry and weak and highly combustible, and hay in a middle way. And therefore the diversity of venial sins is signified by these three.

§ 10. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Wood, Hay, And Stubble Are Built Upon The Foundation

Whether wood, hay, and stubble are built upon the foundation?

§ 1. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, after the middle: Who have built wood, hay, stubble, etc.

§ 2. For it seems that such things are not built upon the foundation: because faith does not have an order except to good works: but venial sins are not good works. Therefore it seems that they are not built upon faith.

§ 3. To this it must be said that the foundation of the spiritual edifice at the bottom is faith, which makes the things to be hoped for subsist in us, in that it is the first thing for those approaching God. But that which concludes at the top is charity, which is the bond of perfection: and the erecting wall is hope extending itself to eternal things. But the cardinal [virtues] are the matter, which give substance to the edifice. And matter is said to be upon the foundation only in three ways: namely, by direct position, and in this way nothing is built upon it except good works.

§ 4. Upon is also said, that is, next to, as there, Upon the rivers of Babylon, etc.: and in this way venial sins are built upon it.

§ 5. Thirdly, upon is said, that is, after, as in Ezekiel 48:3: Upon the border of Asher, etc. The Gloss says, that is, after the border of Asher.

§ 6. And in this way mortal sins are built upon it, according to the exposition of Jerome introduced above.

Articulus 4 — Whether There Is Or Is Not A Purgatorial Fire After Death

Whether a purgatorial fire is or is not after death?

Whether a purgatorial fire is or is not after death?

§ 1. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, before the end: I do not refute it: because perhaps it is true, etc.

§ 2. For here Augustine seems to doubt whether purgatory exists or not. And in the same mode of doubting Gregory speaks in book IV of the Dialogues.

§ 3. Therefore it is asked: Whether there is or is not a purgatorial fire after death?

§ 4. And it seems that there is not, thus: 1. Of contraries the effects are contrary: charity and mortal sin are contraries; therefore their effects are contrary. But mortal sin condemns immediately after death. Therefore charity saves immediately after death; therefore there is no purgatorial place between salvation and damnation.

§ 5. 2. Moreover, charity is of no less efficacy in saving than mortal sin in condemning. But mortal sin condemns immediately after death, even if many works of the genus of goods are present, which are dispositions to the good. Therefore charity also saves immediately after death, even if many things are present which are dispositions to evil: but these are venial sins. Therefore purgatory is not owed to a multitude of venial sins; and it is for no other use: therefore purgatory does not exist, as it seems.

§ 6. 3. Moreover, there are two genera of evils, namely venial and mortal. Likewise, two genera of goods, namely gratuitous good, and works of the genus of goods. Likewise, two genera of rewards, eternal and temporal: and again two genera of penalties, namely temporal and eternal. From there I proceed thus: As the good is related to the reward, so the evil is related to the penalty: but a good of the genus of goods does not merit any reward: therefore neither does the evil corresponding to it [merit] any penalty: therefore there is purgatory for nothing. The proof of the middle premise is: If he who does works of the genus of goods were to merit a reward, then God would deal unjustly with him, because He would not confer it. But we see that He often does not confer it: therefore he merited nothing; because it is unfitting for God to deal unjustly with anyone.

§ 7. 4. Moreover, upon the same division: as a mortal and a venial sin together are related to eternal and temporal penalty together, so charity and a good in its genus are related to the reward of both together. Therefore, as a mortal sin and a work of the genus of goods together are related to an eternal penalty and a temporal reward, so charity and a venial sin are related to an eternal reward and a temporal penalty. But I see that for a mortal sin with a good in its genus, nothing is owed out of condignity except an eternal penalty, and no temporal reward. Therefore, for a venial sin with charity, nothing is owed out of condignity except an eternal reward and no transitory penalty. Since therefore purgatory is only for such people, it seems that purgatory does not exist.

§ 8. 5. Moreover, God does not reward after death anyone except one who is similar to Him through charity and love: therefore He does not punish after death anyone except one turned away from Him through pride and divine hatred. But such a one alone is he who dies in mortal sin: therefore it seems that he alone is punished after death. Therefore it seems that venial sin is not punished after death. And for that [sin] there is purgatory: therefore it seems that there is no purgatory after death.

§ 9. To the contrary of this it is objected thus: 1. Matthew 12:31 and 32, it is said that the blasphemy of the Spirit shall not be forgiven, neither in this age, nor in the future. From this it is implied that some sins will be forgiven in the future. It is certain that not in the kingdom, nor in hell, because in hell there is no redemption. Therefore it is necessary that there be some purgatorial place for such things: and this we call purgatory.

§ 10. 2. Moreover, 1 Corinthians 3:15: But he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire. And it is certain that he speaks [of something] after death, because there is no true salvation except after death: and certifying this he says, He shall be saved. Therefore a fire purging crimes will be after death.

And this we concede.

§ 11. 3. Moreover, a certain Greek expositor says upon that text of the Apostle: Yet so as by fire, etc.: This fire we believe to be a katharterion, that is, a cleansing, in which the souls of the deceased are tested like gold in a furnace. From this it is accepted that the purgatorial fire is after death.

§ 12. 4. Moreover, Anselm in the book, Cur Deus homo: It is impossible for a defiled soul to enter paradise. But, as was proven above, many die defiled by a venial sin. Therefore it is necessary that there be a place in which they are purged: and that we call purgatory.

§ 13. 5. To the same it is objected by reason: In the II [book] of the Ethics: Of civil faults there are two kinds of penalties, namely rebukes of the acts of civility, and perpetual condemnations. Therefore it seems that similarly they are in the divine judgment: therefore some will be judged and punished with a light penalty with restitution, and others will be perpetually condemned. But such a mode of punishment which is with restitution after penance, we call purgatory. Therefore it seems that purgatory exists.

§ 14. 6. Moreover, there are two habits perfecting nature, namely grace and glory; but differently: because grace is compatible with a disposition to its opposite, but glory is not. But it is certain from what was said before, that some depart from this life with depraved dispositions: therefore it is necessary that they be purged before they put on the habit of glory. But the place of purgation we call purgatory: therefore it seems that purgatory exists.

§ 15. 7. Moreover, in every nature we see that before the ultimate perfection is induced, the subject must be purged from contrary dispositions. Therefore, since the form of glory is purer than any natural form, the subject must similarly be purged before it. But it is certain from what was previously maintained that such dispositions are found in many souls after death. Therefore it will be necessary for them to be purged before they are glorified.

§ 16. 8. Moreover, in medical matters, before the induction of health, it is necessary that nature be purged from corrupt humors. But in ethical matters vices are proportioned to humors. Therefore also in those matters purgations must precede perfect health; but perfect health is according to glory alone, which excludes fault and penalty. Therefore it is necessary that after death a purgation takes place before the induction of glory.

§ 17. Response. It must be said that in every way it is necessary according to all reason and faith that purgatory exists. The principal reasons here are moral: and it is certain that according to them it is fitting that there be a purgatory.

§ 18. Furthermore, the Saints expressly say so: therefore it is a heresy to deny it.

§ 19. To the doubt of Augustine, therefore, it must be said that he himself did not doubt whether it exists: but he doubted whether the Apostle understood what he says [to refer to] this. For that you should not doubt that purgatory exists, is clear through his many words which are posited here in the preceding distinction.

§ 20. In the same way it must be said to the doubt of the other Saints: for such a doubt belongs to a good and humble Expositor, who, however well and divinely he may expound, does not presume that this is the understanding of the divine eloquence which the author inspired by the Holy Spirit intended.

§ 21. To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning charity conjoined with a venial evil, and concerning a mortal sin conjoined with a good in its genus: because a venial evil with charity is in the being of evil, and disposes to the contrary of charity: but that which is of the genus of goods with a mortal sin is not in the being of a good, but is rather dead, having no efficacy toward another good after death. And therefore it does not follow, if a mortal sin condemns immediately without works of the genus of goods impeding, that charity saves immediately without venial sins impeding.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that charity is of greater efficacy for saving than mortal sin is for condemning. But from this it does not follow that it saves more quickly than the other condemns, notwithstanding the goods and evils conjoined to them, but rather that it saves more fully, and liberates from more things. And this is true, because one charity liberates from every sin, and from every penalty: which one sin does not do with respect to penalties. Similarly, it confers every virtue, and glory according to any virtue: but no one sin confers every sin, and [causes one] to be condemned according to every genus of sins. But there is a counter-instance to the arguments, that every form of art and nature is stronger for perfecting, than corruption is for destroying: and yet a thing is destroyed more quickly than it is generated and perfected.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that those things which are posited in the division are not true.

§ 24. But to the first objection upon that division, it must be said that what is inferred does not follow: because a venial evil and a good of the genus of goods are not opposed: because a venial evil is not an evil in its genus which could well be done by some circumstance, and yet a good in its genus or of the genus of goods can be done badly by some circumstance.

§ 25. Likewise, as was said in the first book of the Sentences, a good in its genus is imperfect according to the being of a good: but a venial evil is a species in the being of evil. And therefore it does not follow, if the former does not have a reward, that the latter does not have a penalty: nor is there a single proportion in all things which says that as such a good is to a reward, so such an evil is to a penalty.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that both proportions are false, or are not universal. For it is not true that as a mortal and a venial sin together are related to an eternal and temporal penalty, so charity and that which is of the genus of goods are related to an eternal and temporal reward together: for to a venial sin conjoined with a mortal sin, an eternal penalty is owed: and yet it is not at all said that to a work of the genus of goods conjoined with charity an eternal reward is owed. But if that proportion is in some way conceded, the second is invalid, namely that as a mortal sin with a work of the genus of goods is related to a temporal penalty and reward, so charity with a venial sin is related to an eternal penalty and reward. And the reason for this was assigned above: because a venial sin conjoined to charity still remains in the being of evil and having the rationale of a sin: but a work of the genus of goods with a mortal sin does not remain in the being of a good, and having the rationale of something remunerable: and if it is remunerated, this is out of mercy, and not out of condignity. Therefore it does not follow, if for the former there is no coordinated remuneration before the condemnation of penalty, that for the latter no purgatorial penalty is ordered before eternal premination.

§ 27. To the next it must be said that it is true that God after death remunerates no one except one similar to Him through charity, and condemns no one except one turned away from Him and hating Him. But it does not follow: He does not condemn: therefore He does not punish by purging: because no one of those who are purged will be condemned.

Articulus 5 — Why The Punishments Of Hell Are Named By Many Names, But Those Of Purgatory By Only One Name

Why the penalties of hell are named by many names, but of purgatory only by one name?

§ 1. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, B, at the end: They shall be purged by a cleansing fire, etc.

§ 2. And it is asked, Why are the penalties of hell not named by one name, but by many, such as that they will pass from the snow waters to excessive heat; and by certain others, such as the worm; but the purgatorial penalties are named by only one name, namely the fire of purgatory?

§ 3. For it seems that they ought to be named by many and diverse names: because of things of which there are many, diverse, and dissimilar causes, there are many, diverse, and dissimilar effects. But of the penalties of purgatory there are many, diverse, and dissimilar causes. Therefore the penalties are many, diverse, and dissimilar. Therefore they are not to be named by one name.

§ 4. Response. It must be said that hell is only for punishing: and therefore all things that punish are gathered there, such as the hot, the cold, and the like. But purgatory is for emending and purging; and therefore it cannot be named except by such a name of a punisher which has a purgative and consumptive power: and this is the heat of fire. And therefore it is named only by the name of that. For the cold, although it punishes , nevertheless does not purge, because it does not have a consumptive power.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that although there are many venial sins meriting that fire, nevertheless they are nothing but a disposition to evil, and a certain rust. And they agree in this, that they are compatible with charity. And therefore a penalty does not correspond to them according as they are diverse, but according as they agree in this, which is to be a disposition to evil. But concerning mortal sins it is otherwise: because they agree in nothing, and they perfectly turn away from the incommutable good through diverse conversions to a commutable good.

Articulus 6 — What Is Understood By Those Building Gold, Silver, And Precious Stones

What is understood by those building gold, silver, and precious stones?

§ 1. Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, after the beginning: In gold is understood contemplation, etc.

§ 2. For it seems that those building gold, and silver, and precious stones, will feel the purgatorial fire. 1. For it is said in 1 Corinthians 3:12, upon that: Gold, silver, etc., in the Gloss: They shall not be consumed by the fire who build gold, silver, and precious stones, but they will feel [it] nothing [or] little. Therefore they will feel it.

§ 3. 2. Likewise, in the text it is said: The fire shall prove every man's work, of what sort it is, even of the one building gold, silver, etc.

§ 4. Further, it is asked here concerning the rationale of this exposition, that gold is contemplation, and silver the love of neighbor, and the precious stone the work.

§ 5. Response. It must be said that we could say by adaptation that, just as in dividing fire by its matter there are three species of material fire, namely light, flame, and coal: and light indeed is in the pure surrounding airy [element], but flame is in an earthy and moist vapor, whereas coal is in the matter of earth. Thus we could say that as it were a certain light burns the venial sins of the perfect: and there is no notable feeling and resistance to the fire there, but rather a momentary one: just as it is said in the Text, that like a drop in a furnace, so does a venial sin fare in a just man; and this is noted by the Gloss as feeling little or nothing: and they are obscured little or nothing, but remain luminous. But others are inflamed and obscured more, who build wood, hay, stubble: and yet the impurity is extracted from them, like a certain vapor; but the damned are enveloped and blackened like an inconsumable coal.

§ 6. And through this the solution to the first two is clear.

§ 7. To what is further asked, it must be said that he reduces every remunerable good to three general things: of which two are as motives, and the third as the motion itself. For the intellect is contemplating God: and there is the highest fortification and the highest happiness, as Aristotle proves. But charity relates to works as a mother and general form, and no other virtue. But the work is universally meritorious. And therefore by these three general things all goods are comprehended.

Articulus 7 — Whether Those Existing In Purgatory Are Purged Voluntarily Or Involuntarily

Whether those existing in purgatory are purged voluntarily or involuntarily?

Whether those existing in purgatory are purged voluntarily or involuntarily?

§ 1. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, before the end: Nevertheless, they will feel the most severe punishment, etc.

And here it is asked: Whether those existing in purgatory are purged voluntarily, or involuntarily?

It seems that it is voluntarily, because: 1. They have an upright heart. But Ambrose says that one having an upright heart conforms his will to the divine will; but God wills them to be purged: therefore they themselves also will to be thus purged.

1. Furthermore, every wise person wills that without which he cannot attain his end; but those who are in purgatory are wise: therefore it seems that they will that without which they cannot attain glory; but this is purgation through punishment: therefore they will to be purged, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, one who is bodily ill wills to be cut so that he may be healed. Therefore, since spiritual health is more to be chosen, he wills to be burned so that he may be cured, if he cannot be cured otherwise; but it cannot be otherwise on account of divine ordination: therefore they will to be purged in this way, as it seems.

§ 2. If perhaps you should say (as certain ancients said) that the sense of pain is so great that the collation of reason is totally absorbed, and they cannot confer about the one thing or the other, and therefore they will neither the one nor the other: this is very much contrary to the statement of blessed Gregory. For everyone seeking those things that deliver more quickly knows that he is to be delivered, and he confers about deliverance; but the souls of the deceased seek these things, as Gregory says in book IV of the Dialogues.[635] Therefore they confer about such things.

§ 3. If on account of this it is conceded that they will to be so punished that they may be purged. To the contrary:

1. Almost all the Masters assign one cause for the slower deliverance in purgatory than on the way [in this life]: because that punishment [in this life] is voluntary, and that [in purgatory] is necessary. Therefore they do not suffer it voluntarily, as it seems.
2. Furthermore, everything that someone suffers, whether he wills it or not, he suffers necessarily, and not voluntarily; but those having combustibles with them suffer the punishments of purgatory whether they will it or not: therefore they suffer necessarily, and not voluntarily.

§ 4. Response. Without prejudice it must be said that the will is twofold, namely, conditional, and the will simply speaking [unqualified]. Therefore I say that simply speaking they would will not to suffer the punishments of purgatory; yet by a conditional will they do will it, namely upon the condition of purgation and salvation. For they well will to be purged, and they well will to be saved; but they do not will to be thus purged except under a condition, namely because otherwise they cannot be saved and delivered: and all the reasons previously induced are understood of this will.

§ 5. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it does not follow, if it is necessary, that it is not voluntary. For it can be necessary in two ways, namely, on the part of the will acting, or the will receiving [undergoing]. Concerning the acting will it is true that if it is voluntary, it is not necessary, because the will acting in this mode is not a cause of necessity, but it freely operates when it wills, and when it wills it ceases from the work. But in the one receiving it is not true, because what is necessary to endure or receive on account of the violence of the agent can nevertheless also be received and endured voluntarily. And there is an example in the punishments of the martyrs: because it was necessary for the one beheaded to die, and the one burned to feel pain; yet these things were endured voluntarily. And so it is concerning those enduring in purgatory. But the punishments which are satisfactions here [in this life] are voluntary by an acting will.

§ 6. To the other argument that follows, the solution is exactly the same.

Articulus 8 — Whether In The Damned Venial Sin Is Punished Externally

Whether in the damned a venial sin is punished eternally?

Whether in the damned a venial sin is punished eternally?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at D, But perhaps you will say, etc.

For it is asked: Whether a venial sin in the damned is punished eternally?

And it seems that it is not, because: 1. Venial and mortal are incommensurable: therefore their punishments are incommensurable; but the punishment of a mortal sin is eternal: therefore the punishment of a venial sin will not be eternal, but temporal, and proportionate to it.

1. Furthermore, Master Hugh says that a venial sin is that to which a transitory punishment is due. Since therefore God does not punish beyond what is condign [strictly deserved], it seems that God does not punish it eternally.
2. Furthermore, as the retributions are disposed, so are the good and bad merits disposed: but there are two punishments retributing the wicked, namely eternal, and transitory; and there are two evils which are retributed, namely venial, and mortal: since therefore eternal punishment is due to mortal sin, transitory punishment is due to venial sin. And thus the proposition is held.

§ 2. To the contrary of this it is proved: 1. By that of Luke 12:59: You shall not go out from there until you pay the very last mite: but the "last mite" is a venial sin; and it is established that one dying in mortal sin can pay nothing acceptable to God: therefore he is closed in an eternal prison even for a venial sin: therefore the venial sin is punished in him for eternity.

1. Also, Matthew 5:26: You shall not go out from there till you pay the last farthing. The Gloss: Minute sins, because nothing is unpunished. From this the same follows as before.

2. Furthermore, it is established that fire corresponds to this kind of sin, and the worm of conscience, as it is said in Isaiah 66:24 concerning the damned: Their worm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. Therefore they will burn for eternity, and they will suffer the worm for venial sin.

3. If perhaps you say that in the death of the wicked such venial sins are released: the things determined here in the Text are to the contrary.

Furthermore, the death of the good is better, and more meritorious, than that of the wicked: and it does not necessarily blot out venial sins, as is proved here: therefore neither does the death of the wicked.

1. Furthermore, no sin, neither small nor great, can be loosed without grace; but the damned are not susceptible to grace: therefore no sin will ever be blotted out in them. But with the sin remaining, the punishment will also remain: therefore the punishment of a mortal sin remains for eternity: and thus the proposition is held.

§ 3. Response. It must be said that a venial sin conjoined to a mortal sin is punished for eternity in hell: but for eternity a lesser punishment corresponds to it than to the mortal sin, just as the final arguments and authorities prove.

§ 4. To the first argument, therefore, it must be said that in themselves a venial and a mortal sin are incommensurable; but by accident they are made proportionate in the duration of their punishments, namely if the subject is not expiable from the fault to which he is subjected, as in the damned. Whence what the objection proves is true essentially [per se], and false by accident: and it does not hold except essentially, namely that a mortal sin is taken as a mortal sin, and a venial sin as a venial sin; but when a venial sin is in a subject not susceptible to grace, it is made into something that never has nor ever will have pardon: and then the argument does not hold.

§ 5. The solution to the two following arguments is exactly the same.

Articulus 9 — Whether Souls In Purgatory Are Punished By Demons

Whether souls in purgatory will be punished by demons?

Whether souls in purgatory will be punished by demons?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at D, after the beginning: He is good, and has charity, and in charity passes from this life, etc.

Here it is asked, which many desire to know, whether souls existing in purgatory are punished by demons as ministers of punishments?

And it seems that they are: 1. By those things which are read in the deeds of the Saints, just as in the life of blessed Martin, that the devil stood by him. And it is established that he [the devil] knew by his [Martin's] works that he was not to be damned: therefore he stood by him so that, according to his estimation, he might be dragged to purgatory: therefore it seems that demons are the ministers of the punishments of purgatory.

635. Gregory the Great, Dialogues IV.

1. Furthermore, in the judgments of this world certain wicked torturers are appointed: therefore also in the divine judgment: therefore those to be purged are tortured by demons.
2. Furthermore, even Saints who will fly away [immediately to heaven] and are perfect in this life, are permitted by God to be vexed by demons, as is read concerning blessed Anthony and others established in the desert: therefore, since those who are in purgatory are not holier than these, it seems also that God permits them to be vexed by demons.
3. Furthermore, a venial sin arises from temptation: but the ministers of temptations are demons; yet an authority says that a person will have as torturers in punishment the very ones he had as instigators in fault: therefore it seems that those sinning venially will have there, as torturers in the punishment of purgatory, the very demons whom they had as instigators in the venial fault and temptation.

§ 2. To the contrary of this it is objected, that:

1. Blessed Gregory says in book IV of the Dialogues that the souls of the wicked descend to punishments by themselves. Therefore much more will the souls of the Saints to be purged be in punishments without the violence of the devil.
2. Furthermore, a consent is not made to the devil in the one who sins only venially: rather, he habitually consents to God: therefore it seems that by justice he ought to be subjected to no one except God: therefore it seems that justice alone condemns him, and he is not subjected to the devil as a torturer.
3. Furthermore, Saints are not handed over to the devil here except for a greater crown; but there will be no such necessity in the future: therefore it seems that they are not handed over there, but are simply purged.
4. Furthermore, in politics we see that the one punishing a son is different from the one punishing a robber or an enemy: for over a son there is only the discipline of the father, but against a robber and an enemy an emissary is directed: therefore it seems, since our justice is patterned after the divine, that it is similarly so in God's justice. But it is established that those who are in purgatory are sons: therefore over them there ought not to be anything but the discipline of a father: therefore a fatal torturer ought not to receive power over them.

§ 3. Response. In this question I do not know what can be asserted; but I piously think it should be believed that souls existing in purgatory are not punished by demons as ministers of punishments: however, I well think that demons delight in their punishments, and therefore they are sometimes read to stand by them: and by this the first argument concerning blessed Martin is solved.

§ 4. To the next argument it must be said that this is true concerning the judgments of those to be condemned, as is clear from the final objection, because that solves that argument: but it is not true in the discipline of a father toward a son.

§ 5. To the next argument it must be said that the rationale is one thing here, and another there: because here is the place of temptations and of growing in merit, but not there: and therefore He permits the tempters here to exercise the office of temptation, but not there.

§ 6. To the next argument it must be said that a venial sin is a sin relatively speaking [secundum quid]: and therefore it does not behoove it to be so tyrannically avenged as a mortal sin: and therefore that authority is understood of mortal sins.

Articulus 10 — Whether This Error Of The Greeks Ought To Be Approved, Who Say That No One Enters Heaven Or Hell Before The Day Of Judgment, But Is Kept In Middle Places

Whether this error of the Greeks is to be approved, who say that no one enters heaven or hell before the day of judgment, but they are preserved in middle places?

Whether this error of the Greeks is to be approved, who say that no one enters heaven or hell before the day of judgment, but they are preserved in middle places?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at D, a little before the end: Therefore after this life he will be purged by it, etc.

For it can be disputed here concerning a certain error of some Greeks, who say that no one enters heaven or hell before the day of judgment, but they dwell in middle places up to that point.

And it seems that they speak well: 1. By that of the epistle to the Hebrews 11:39–40: And all these, being approved by the testimony of faith, received not the promise: God providing some better thing for us, that they should not be perfected without us. Therefore it seems that one will not be perfected without another; but the perfection will be on the day of judgment: therefore until then no one will receive glory in heaven, nor punishment in hell. Because God is not more prone to condemn swiftly than to reward swiftly.

1. Furthermore, Revelation 6:11: And it was said to them that they should rest for a little time, until their fellow servants and their brethren should be completed in receiving the robe of glory; and from this the same is held as before.

If it is said that they were in glory with respect to the soul, but they were seeking to be glorified with respect to the body. Against this is what is said there: because it was said to them that they shall endure a little time; but endurance implies punishment; and in glory there is no punishment: therefore it seems that with respect to the soul they will not be in glory.

1. Furthermore, Matthew 13:30, it is said: Suffer both to grow until the harvest:... they shall be bound in bundles to burn, but the wheat gather ye into my barn. Therefore up to that point they will not be bound to burn, nor will the wheat be placed into the barn of heaven.

2. Furthermore, Matthew 25:33 ff.: And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on his left. Then the king shall say to them that shall be on his right hand: Come, ye blessed, etc. And to them that shall be on his left: Depart from me, you cursed, etc. Therefore it seems that up to that point they will not be separated, nor will these be sent into hell, nor those called to the kingdom: and thus again the proposition is held.

3. Furthermore, Matthew 20:8: And when evening was come, the lord of the vineyard saith to his steward: Call the laborers and pay them their hire, namely their own. But the evening is the consummation of the age: therefore it seems that neither the good nor the bad will receive their reward before the consummation of the age.

4. Furthermore, in Psalm 16:15 (according to another translation): I shall be satisfied when thy glory shall appear. But glory will not appear before the day of judgment, as He Himself says, Luke 21:27: Then they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with great power and majesty. And truly, that is, He shall so come in like manner as you have seen Him. Therefore until then they shall not be satisfied: therefore neither shall they have glory: therefore neither the damned the punishments of hell.

5. Furthermore, by reason the same is argued: For of no thing that is to be possessed through judgment will the attainment occur before the pronouncement of the sentence; but hell and heaven are to be possessed through judgment, as is proved, Matthew 25:33 ff.: therefore the attainment of neither is before the pronouncement of the sentence. But the sentence will not be pronounced except on the day of judgment: therefore up to that point no ones will attain heaven or hell: and thus the proposition is held.

6. Furthermore, it does not belong to a highest and magnificent king to give anything, except what is declarative of great magnificence; but God is supremely magnificent: therefore, etc. But it is more magnificent and more joyous to give an infinite good simultaneously to all at once in body and soul, than to give it individually to this one and that one: therefore He will give it to all simultaneously, and not individually to this one and that one. And thus again the proposition is concluded: because it is supposed by all that God does all things in the mode in which they are most honorably done, and according as they show the greatest glory and virtue.

7. Furthermore, in civic affairs in which strife is engaged in common, the crown is not imposed on anyone without another, but triumphing in common, they are crowned in common; but these earthly things descend from the divine through the similitude of imitation: therefore in divine things it is similarly so. But it is established for all that the Saints engage in common triumph over every enemy impeding salvation: therefore it seems that all have to be crowned simultaneously in common. But this cannot be done except commonly: therefore it seems that no one will receive full beatitude, except after the resurrection: therefore neither the punishments of hell: because by opposition the rationale is the same for the punishments of hell and the joys of the kingdom of heaven.

8. Furthermore, there are two parts of the rational nature, namely that existing in flesh, and that separated from flesh. But it is established that that which is separated [the angels] was wholly rewarded at once on the part of the good, and wholly punished at once on the part of the evil: therefore similarly it will be in the other part of the rational creature, namely in that which is conjoined to flesh: and thus again the proposition is held.

§ 2. To the contrary of this it is thus objected: 1. Luke 23:43: Amen I say to thee, this day thou shalt be with me in paradise.

If perhaps you say that he was not in full fruition: but paradise there means rest from punishments. To the contrary: Chrysostom expounding that word says thus: Some say that the thief has not yet attained paradise: but the thief indeed possessed paradise: for He cannot lie who says: Today thou shalt be with me in paradise.

If perhaps you say that, even according to us, the thief was not in the empyrean heaven on that same day, although he was in full fruition of the deity of Christ. Let it be proved by another authority descending from the opposite, Luke 16:22: And the rich man also died: and he was buried in hell. But it is established that he speaks of the hell of the damned, as is proved by the fire which he was suffering: therefore by a similitude before the day of judgment hell is entered: therefore since God is more prone to have mercy than to condemn, even before the day of judgment the kingdom of heaven is entered.

1. Furthermore, upon that of the epistle to the Hebrews 11:40: That they should not be perfected without us, Chrysostom says thus: Some received according to their labors, but not according to their crowns. For if we are all one body, a greater delight is effected for the body itself when it shares in common and not particularly. From this it is clear that the Saints already in their soul have received according to their labors, although according to the glory of bodies they still await the common resurrection of men; but the labors of men are meritorious of the kingdom of heaven: therefore they have already received this: therefore they have entered heaven.
2. Furthermore, Revelation 6:11: And white robes were given to every one of them one; and it was said to them, that they should rest for a little time. But it is established that individual robes signify the beatitude of souls: therefore they are already in heaven where they were seen by John, and they have received the beatitude of the soul.

4. Furthermore, Athanasius in the book of Questions: We are taught from the divine Scriptures, that the souls of sinners are in hell beneath all the earth and sea, as Psalm 38:7 [LXX] says: In the dark places, and in the shadow of death. But the souls of the just after the coming of Christ, as we say concerning the thief, are in paradise: because not only on account of the soul of the thief did Christ open paradise, but also on account of the remaining souls of the saints. But it is established that he does not speak of the earthly paradise, because that is the region of bodies, not of spirits: therefore he speaks of the empyrean heaven, which is the region of blessed spirits.

1. Furthermore, by reason: Whatever things are disposed differently in merit and the cause of merit, ought to be disposed differently in reward: but it is established that the soul and the body are differently the cause of merit, because the soul is the whole cause, and the body merely obeys: therefore it seems that they ought to be disposed differently in reward. Therefore they ought not to be rewarded simultaneously; but the soul was more principal than the body in merit: and thus it is held that the soul, as soon as it is loosed from the body, is to be rewarded in heaven.

2. Furthermore, in the first state if innocence had been preserved, not all would have been translated simultaneously into another state of beatitude according to Basil (otherwise, according to the opinion of those speaking more probably), but rather the fathers having been translated would have given place to their sons: therefore it seems that neither is this to be done in this state.

3. Furthermore, one who is supremely influential infuses his beatitude and goodness immediately to every perceiver as much as it can perceive; but God is in this mode supremely influential: therefore, etc. But immediately resolved from the flesh the soul is susceptible to beatitude supremely in heaven: therefore God immediately infuses it to it: and thus the proposition is held.

4. Furthermore, one who is supremely wise does nothing vainly, and that does not proceed to some utility; but God is supremely wise: therefore, etc. But no utility, but rather a detriment would proceed from the delay of the Saints according to their souls until the day of judgment: therefore He Himself does not delay them according to the glorification of the soul. Proof of the minor premise: If any utility or honor or advantage were to proceed from this, either this would be on the part of God, or on the part of the Saints. On the part of God it is not: because His goodness shines forth in an equal number of goods and equally great ones by rewarding them divisively just as conjointly, because there are as many and they are rewarded with as much in one mode as in the other. But on the part of the Saints a detriment of expectation would proceed. And thus the proposition is established.

5. Furthermore, it does not belong to the supremely just one to defer the wages of the laborer, even until the morning, if the laborer is able to receive it; but no one doubts that God is supremely just: therefore He does not defer the wages. But the soul resolved from the flesh is immediately receptive: therefore immediately after death God gives to it: therefore it immediately enters the kingdom of heaven.

§ 3. And because this has no doubt if the Gospel and the Apocalypse and the Epistles are read, in which Saints were also caught up to the vision of God in the heavens, just as Paul says he was caught up: the Saints are also said to follow the Lamb in white robes in heaven, and to sing a new canticle before the throne of God: therefore the first [position] is condemned as the worst heresy.

§ 4. And IT IS RESPONDED to the first argument, that according to the understanding of the Text that is not the understanding of the Apostle: but according to the Text he enumerated the Saints of the Old Testament, and showed that they cannot be perfected without the grace of the New Testament which perfects the Saints of the New Testament who are the faithful of Christ: whence that whole perfection was done through Christ. And that this is the understanding of the Text is clear to anyone reading the preceding and following parts of the epistle.

But if someone wishes to argue from the Glosses: then the authority of Chrysostom cited to the contrary solves it: because it speaks of the Saints according to the perfection of bodies, and not according to the perfection of the soul. But why bodies are rewarded simultaneously, and not souls, is to be sought in the tract on the resurrection.

§ 5. To the next argument it must be said that the very vision of John proves that the souls of the Saints are under the throne of God in heaven with individual robes of souls: and to "endure" is the same as to await the robe of the body with certitude.

But to that which is objected, that to endure implies a punishment, it must be said that this is false: because often it is put for expectation alone. However, the Saints say that souls vehemently desire to be incorporated into glorious bodies, and out of desire they are drawn back a little from the contemplation of God: and the word for enduring can name this.

§ 6. To that which is objected concerning the tares [zizania], it must be said that the mingling of the evil with the good in the militant Church is noted there: and this is signified by "to grow": for after death neither the tares grow, nor the wheat. And this is true, that a general separation of the good from the evil will not be, except then when the warfare of the Church will be finished, and it will be universally segregated from its enemies.

§ 7. To the next argument it must be said that the Gospel there touches upon the judgment that will be in body and soul, and not in the soul alone: whence it does nothing for the proposition.

§ 8. To the next argument it must be said that at the end of the age is the time for calling the laborers in every part in which they labored, namely in body and soul: but even before the end in the evening the householder-soul receives a consolation which was more principal in the labor: just as even now in the labors of rustics we see that the better laborers have a special consolation from the one who hired them.

§ 9. To the next argument it must be said that the glory of the Lord immediately appears when the body is not disobedient: but it is true that the majesty of the judge will not appear.

§ 10. TO THE FIRST REASON it must be said that judgment is twofold, namely particular which is of the man, and universal which is of nature: and a supremely just judge fails in neither judgment. And therefore in the death of a man there is adjudicated to the soul what it merited, and on the day of universal judgment it is adjudicated also to the body. And this we see in every perfect human judgment: for a judge would be most impious who would delay one man in his own case which is singular, until he could judge an entire nation simultaneously.

§ 11. To the next argument it must be said that in truth God is supremely magnificent; but this is not magnificence, to crown simultaneously and not divisively, because they merited divisively: for the Saints have divided merits according to time and according to works. But it is of magnificence to enrich many and great ones. But that this is done simultaneously or divisively is not magnificence, but happens from this, that they came to the magnificent one simultaneously or divisively.
