To the next it must be said that the union which is through the grace of virtues and gifts, is through a habit which seeks a proper subject for itself in which to be as in matter: and because that subject can only be a rational substance, therefore God is not in this way except in a rational substance, which is man, or Angel, or rational soul: but the other union which is toward being, although it is greater, is nevertheless not a habit, nor does it seek such a proper subject: because that which is united by that union is assumed to the deity by the power of the deity which is infinite: and this can be a body having an order to a rational soul: whence all those reasons assume propositions as if this properly belonged to a nobler thing because it would be united to a nobler thing: and this is not true.

To the next it must be said that God is in three ways in those things which have no order to a rational creature: but a body, although in itself it is not rational, is nevertheless a part and the matter of a rational being: and therefore the bodies of the Saints are called the temple of the Holy Spirit: and therefore in Christ it had a special relation to union.

Articulus 2 — How What Christ Says, I Lay Down My Life, Ought To Be Understood

How should that which Christ says, "I lay down my soul," be understood?

Next it is asked concerning that which He says, there, C, I lay down my soul, that I may take it up again [249].

§ 1. For what is it to lay down? If to lay down is to depose: since this pronoun, I, signifies any given utterer of it, and the utterer of this word was Christ according as He is a person, then the person inasmuch as He is a person laid down and deposed His soul: which is false, because thus He would not have been united to the soul in the three days. But if to lay down is to place in some location, since many things can locate themselves, it will seem that the soul could place itself. But Augustine says the contrary of this.

§ 2. Moreover, to lay down implies the power to effect something: but there is no power to effect anything in the body, but only in the soul or the deity: therefore it seems that to lay down the soul belonged to one of those, and not to the flesh, as it seems to say in the Letter?

§ 3. Moreover, if to lay down is to separate: then by the same reason the flesh was laid down, by which the soul is said to be laid down: why then did He not say, No one takes my flesh from me, but I lay it down, and I take it up again?

§ 4. Moreover, it seems to be false, because since a natural union is dissolvable, and since between Christ's soul and body there was not

§ 1. ...unless the natural union itself was dissoluble. Now, every such union is dissoluble in two ways, namely, by violence and by natural separation: therefore, Christ's soul could be extorted by violence: therefore, it could be taken from him: therefore, what is said seems false: No one takes it (namely, my soul) from me.[250]

§ 2. Solution: It must be said to the first [objection] that "to lay down" (ponere) is to put off from that to which the soul is naturally united, and this is the flesh; and it is not "to lay down" simply to remove it from that to which it is united in whatever way. And I readily concede that the person lays down the soul: but because everything the person does, he does in a nature, it is necessary that he lays down the soul in a nature, or a part of a nature. Since, therefore, that which is laid down according to nature is not the same as that in which the laying down occurs or the one laying down, it is clear that neither could the soul lay down the soul in the soul, nor could the Son of God lay down the soul in the soul: therefore the Son of God laid down the soul in the body. And this is what Augustine means to say, that the body laid down the soul by the power of the divinity hidden within it: because the separation which is in death belongs to the body, not to the Son of God, or to the deity.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that, although in a dead body not united to a power of nature, there is no power of effecting anything, nevertheless, it was not so in the body of Christ, because the supremely powerful deity still lay hidden in the body.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that the Lord speaks by responding to the intention of the Jews: because the persecutor and tyrant pursues the cause of life, and therefore, even when the cause of life is separated, he rests from the persecution of the body. And to that which they desired to extort, the Lord responded that they could not alienate [it], namely the soul, from his power by their persecution: because the soul always remained in his power.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that it is one thing in Christ, and another in other men: because although Christ had a natural union of soul and body which were dissoluble, nevertheless he had a stronger [principle] able to act to the contrary, namely the deity: and therefore the tyrant's persecution would extort nothing from him if he himself did not will it. In others, however, there is nothing resisting violence, and therefore in others the soul is indeed extorted.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Deity Is Called The Fountain Of Life Efficiently Or Formally

Whether the deity is called the fount of life efficiently or formally?

§ 6. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, around the middle: For if this were so, the fount of life would have dried up.

§ 7. 1. For either the deity is called the fount of life from pouring life into that to which it is conjoined sufficiently, or deficiently. If in the first way: since no fount flows unless something receives the flow, it is necessary that something then receives the flow of life: [and this is] nothing but the body: therefore the body then received the flow of life: therefore it was living.

249. John 10:17.

§ 8. 2. Also, whatever suffices for the containing [whole], it is necessary that the antecedent without which that containing [whole] does not exist does this first: now, to be a man-God follows upon being a man according to the order of nature: and to be a man according to nature follows upon being one: therefore if the union made the man-God, it was necessary first to make the man and for [him] to be one: therefore it seems that that union made life.

§ 9. If perhaps you say that the deity did not do these things without a medium, which is the rational soul. On the contrary: A power is imperfect which needs another mediating [principle] by which it acts: but since the deity is powerful in itself with respect to all things, it seems the deity flowed life in by itself.

§ 10. ON THE CONTRARY: If the deity by itself gave life, it gave either a divine life to him, or a created [life]. If divine, that [life] cannot undergo death; therefore Christ would never have been truly dead—

§ 1. —which is false and heretical. If, however, it gave a created [life]: either rational or irrational. If irrational: then the soul is superfluous, because the deity could have been in place of the soul for Christ. If rational: then the deity is less able to flow in a noble life than the rational soul which flows in a rational life, which is false.

§ 2. Solution: It must be said as before, that the deity is called the fount of life efficiently, not formally: because it effects the life of all things, itself living through itself.

§ 3. To that which is first objected, it must be said that it does not flow [life] into the body because without the soul [the body] is not receptive of life, and this expresses a natural impotence in the body, not in the deity. Nor does that impotence properly express a defect: because a defect is of those things which according to nature ought to be present and are not present: but it was never the nature of the body that it should live without the soul.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that the deity united to itself the body and the soul [already] united: and from this union it follows that God is man, and man is God. But to be a man and to be one are not ordered to this except materially on the part of the subject receiving; and therefore the deity did not do this, that it formally flowed in life or humanity, but rather effectively only, and it made life through the soul, and it made man through the form of man which is called humanity.

§ 5. To the last the solution is clear through what has been said before.

Articulus 4 — Whether It Can Be Said That Christ Suffered And Did Not Suffer, Died And Did Not Die

Whether it can be said that Christ suffered and did not suffer, died and did not die?

§ 6. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at D, near the end: Soundly therefore it can be said that God died, and did not die, etc.

250. Isaiah 53:6.

§ 7. For this seems false: because thus contradictories are verified of the same thing, which can never be, because the Philosopher says: Of anything an affirmation or negation is true: but of nothing both at once.

§ 8. Also, Augustine: Such was that taking up, which made God man, and man God: and all things that are true of the man are true of God. Of the man it is true that he is dead:

§ 1. ...therefore of God it is true that he is dead: therefore God and man died.

§ 2. ON THE CONTRARY: That Christ died is an article of faith: therefore the opposite of that is that Christ did not die: therefore that is a heresy.

§ 3. Solution: It must be said that in truth locutions of this kind are not to be conceded without determination: for although I may concede that an Ethiopian is white with respect to his teeth, and is not white with respect to his jaw, nevertheless I do not concede absolutely that he is white, and not white. And especially in Christ: because to be dead, or to have suffered, or to be born, when they are said absolutely, are referred to the person, and do not belong to the person. And therefore although the Master posits locutions of this kind without determination, nevertheless they are not to be understood, nor taken up without determination: which determination if it is added, as he died according to humanity, and did not die according to divinity, it is clear that they are not contradictories, nor contrary to faith.

§ 4. And through this the solution to all [the objections] is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXII

Divisio Textus

DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 5. Here it is asked, Whether in that three-day period, etc. Here begins the distinction concerning the questions following the death of Christ, or Christ dead.

§ 6. And there are here four questions, of which the first is, Whether he was a man during the three days [the triduum] or not? The second, Whether he, according as he is man, is everywhere or not? and this begins there, B, Here it is asked, If Christ in death, etc. In the third, it is asked concerning Christ's burial and descent into hell, there, C, And certainly he was whole at the same time in hell, etc. In the fourth, it is asked concerning his ascension into heaven, there, D, It is also usually asked, If congruently, etc.

§ 7. From these therefore the sentence is clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether Christ Was A Man In The Three Days

Whether Christ was a man during the three days?

§ 8. Now the first question occurs, Whether Christ was a man during the three days, as the Master seems to say here?

It seems, however, that he was: because § 9. 1. Christ had a rational soul during the three days: but whatever person has a rational soul, that person is rational: therefore Christ was rational during the three days: but every rational thing is a man: therefore Christ was a man during the three days.

§ 10. 2. Also, everything which has in itself, as its parts, the parts of human nature, that is a man: but Christ during the three days had the parts of human nature: therefore Christ was a man during the three days.

§ 11. 3. Also, every supposit in human nature is a man: but Christ during the three days is a supposit existing in human nature: therefore Christ was a man during the three days, as it seems.

§ 12. 4. Also, Master Hugh of St. Victor: What is more foolish to say, than that he then ceases to be a man, when he begins to be [so] more truly? And he intends that a man is more truly a man after death than before: therefore Christ was more truly a man after death than before death, as it seems.

§ 13. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Avicenna says that form does not have that it is predicated of the whole because it is form, but because it is the form consequent upon the conjoined whole: therefore where there is not a conjoined [whole], there is not a form consequent upon the conjoined [whole] which may be predicated: but in Christ there is not a conjoined [whole] during the three days, because the soul was not conjoined to the flesh: since therefore this that I say, man, is a form consequent upon a conjoined [whole], he was not a man during the three days.

§ 14. 2. Also, nothing belonging to a whole as a whole is predicated when that whole does not exist: but the ratio of man belongs to the whole as a whole: therefore it is not fitting for "man" to be predicated where there is not a whole in the ratio of a whole: but the soul and flesh were not in the ratio of constituting any whole during those three days: therefore Christ was not a man during the three days. The first premise is proved from this, that the ratio of the whole is other than the ratio of the parts, because they are opposed relatively. The second is proved from what Boethius says, that the species is the whole being of the individuals, and not of a part.

§ 1. Further it is asked concerning the solution of the Master: for one objects that

§ 2. 1. If before death he had assumed flesh and soul not united, he would not be called a man: therefore neither in death is he called a man on account of their separation. And he solves [this by saying] that it is otherwise in Christ than in other men, and otherwise than he was in himself before death and after the resurrection: because then he is called a man on account of the body and soul being conjoined, but during the three days he is called a man on account of the having of those [parts] even separated. And this does not seem to be true then:

because no ratio of a species or form belongs according to one and another ratio to one and the same hypostasis according to different times.

§ 3. 2. Also, when it is said, "dead man," there is an opposition in the adjective: therefore it deprives [the subject] of the ratio of man: therefore a dead man is not a man: but Christ during the three days was a dead man: therefore he was not a man, as it seems.

§ 4. If perhaps you should say, as some say, that the rational soul of itself gives to the man that he is a man, and to the body that it is a supposit, and to the man that he is a person: but when separated it retains that in itself which it gave to another. On the contrary: Therefore according to this if Christ had assumed only a rational soul, he would truly be called a man, which is absurd.

§ 5. 3. Also, there can never be a composite with respect to some third thing from both components, which has in itself the perfect ratio of the whole: therefore if the soul has the perfect ratio of the whole man, it is not composed with the body with respect to some third thing: therefore there is not a true and natural composition between soul and body, which is false.

§ 6. Therefore some others say that this is twofold, Christ during the three days was a man, from the fact that the word (ly) "man" can be taken materially, or formally. If materially: then Christ was a man during the three days, because he had the matter of a man. If formally: then they say that it is false.

§ 7. But against this is: because 1. Matter is predicated of nothing: therefore if "man" stands for the matter of man, it will not be predicated of Christ, nor of the Son of God during the three days.

§ 8. 2. Also, to take man materially is to take man only in a certain respect (secundum quid): therefore it should not be said that Christ was simply a man during the three days, but that he was a man in a certain respect.

§ 9. 3. Also, the matter of man is the nature of man: but the nature of man (as was proved above) is neither predicated of Christ the man, nor of the Son of God: because this is false, The Son of God is the nature of man. This also is false, Jesus Christ is the nature of man. If therefore during the three days the word "man" stands only for the human nature, this will be false, Christ during the three days is a man: just as this, Christ during the three days is a human nature.

§ 10. Solution: Almost all moderns agree in this, that it is false, and that the Master was deceived here by certain locutions which we use, saying that Christ lay in the tomb, which does not belong except by reason of the human nature: and since it is attributed to the supposit, it seems that "Christ" there stands for the supposit of the human nature, and thus stands for this man. But it must be said that those locutions are synecdochical: just as we also say, "Holy Peter, pray for us," putting the soul of Peter for the whole. Thus we say that Christ lay in the tomb on account of the part of the man which is the body, and descended into hell on account of the part of the man which is the soul.

§ 11. To the first therefore it must be said that Christ had a rational soul during the three days, but he was not rational. Nor does it follow that whatever person has a rational soul is rational: but it ought to be added, that he has it as the act of a body flowing life according to act. Nor is this true, that from rationality, which is a part of the soul, a man is denominated when he is called rational, but rather from—

§ 1. —the difference of man, which is not a part of the soul, but rather the form of the whole as it is a whole, like genus, and species.

§ 2. Similarly it is not true what some object, that if a man is denominated from the property of a less worthy part, as he is called corporeal from the corporeity of the body, that then he could also be denominated from the property of a more worthy part, so that he is called rational from the rationality of the soul: because when a man is called a body, or corporeal, or rational, or an animal, or white, or risible, and in every universal whatever is taken up, the ratio of predicating will never be found, except according as it is a form consequent upon the whole and not a part.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that this is false, "Everything which has parts, etc.," unless it be added: united by that union in which they constitute a man.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that Christ during the three days was indeed a supposit existing in human nature, but this does not suffice for this, that he was a man, but it is necessary to have some ratio of a supposit from the nature itself: and this was not there, because the nature does not give to the supposit its being a supposit, nor according as it is fitting in constituting a supposit through composition.

§ 5. To the saying of Master Hugh, it must be said that he speaks falsely in this, saving his peace, because neither is the soul a person, nor is a man more truly a man after death, or in death, than before.

Articulus 2 — Whether This Is True, Christ Is Man Everywhere

Whether this is true, Christ is a man everywhere?

Whether this is true, Christ is a man everywhere?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, Here it is asked, If Christ in death, etc.

For it seems that this is true, Christ is a man everywhere.

§ 2. 1. For whatever two things are the same and one in supposit, wherever one of them is, there is the other. Now the Son of God and the man are one and the same in supposit: therefore wherever the Son of God is, there is also the man: but the Son of God is everywhere: therefore also this man is everywhere.

§ 3. 2. Also, this is true, This man is the Son of God everywhere: therefore by simple conversion, this is true, The Son of God is a man everywhere.

§ 4. 3. Also, let it be granted that this is false, The Son of God is a man everywhere: therefore its contradictory is true: therefore this is true, The Son of God is not a man everywhere: therefore the Son of God is somewhere not a man, which is false: because it is nowhere possible to assign a place in which the Son of God is not a man, for the reason that he never and nowhere laid down the assumed man.

§ 5. 4. Also, it follows, Socrates is here, and he is not a donkey here: therefore Socrates is not a donkey: therefore by similarity, The Son of God is here, and he is not a man here: therefore he is not a man, which is false: therefore the Son of God is a man here, and by the same reason everywhere.

§ 6. Also it is asked, What prevents that it is not conceded, This man according as he is a man is everywhere?

For it seems that nothing [prevents it]: for Christ's body and blood are consecrated in many places: and in all places in which it is consecrated, it is: therefore it is in all: therefore it is possible for Christ's body to be in all places: therefore Christ can be everywhere according to human nature, as it seems.

§ 7. To the contrary is that Christ is circumscribable in place: but whatever is circumscribed is in a determinate place, not in all places: therefore Christ in human form cannot be in all places.

§ 8. But further it is asked, Since there are two things by way of extrinsic measures, namely time in lower things, and eternity in God responding to time, and place: why is eternity communicated to this man, so that it is said that this boy created the stars, and was from eternity: but the category of "where" is not communicated to him, so that he is said [to be] everywhere, just like the Son of God?

§ 9. For it seems that it ought to be communicated more: because eternity means the lack of a beginning, which is repugnant to human nature: "everywhere" means nothing but extension according to place, which is not repugnant to a creature, because universal being is everywhere: therefore what is less repugnant to the created, seems to be more communicable, than what is repugnant to every created thing: therefore it seems that to be everywhere ought to belong to this man.

§ 10. Solution: It must be said that the Son of God is not everywhere a man. That the composite may be understood. For this is twofold, The Son of God is everywhere a man, from the sense of composition, and of division. For if the adverb "everywhere" determines the verb by grace of composition with the predicate, as it properly ought: then it is false under this sense, The Son of God according to [his being] man is everywhere. If, however, it is referred to the subject with the composition of an understood participle: then it is true under this sense, The Son of God, being everywhere, is a man, and then it is divided. However, in the sense of composition the Master denies it: because without doubt the locution pretends that sense, and it is actually composite, but only potentially is it divided.

§ 11. To the first it must be said that it is not—

§ 1. —valid, that if some things are the same in supposit, that whatever belongs to one by grace of nature, that this also belongs to the other: because the natures are not one: and to be everywhere belongs to the Son of God by grace of the nature, and not of the person except consequently. And there is an instance: for when it is said, This is a Bishop: it is not necessary that wherever he is, that he is a Bishop in that same place: because sometimes he is in another Diocese in which he is not Bishop: and yet the Bishop and he are the same in supposit.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that the conversion is not valid: because when "man" is placed in the subject, then by grace of the supposit it well belongs to him to be everywhere; but when [it is placed] by grace of the predicate, then the nature is respected by the adverb, and then the determination does not belong to it: whence since the terms are not taken uniformly, the conversion is not valid: but it ought to be converted thus, This man is everywhere the Son of God: therefore the Son of God, being everywhere, is this man: and then both are true.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that in the composite sense this is true, The Son of God is not everywhere a man: because in that sense the negation is carried to the composition, including the adverb which determines the composition in comparison to the predicate. Similarly the further conclusion, The Son of God somewhere is not a man, is twofold, just like the other: and in the composite sense it does not follow from that, because it is true under this sense, The Son of God is not somewhere a man, because [he is not] there where he is not in human form.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because neither Socrates nor a donkey express natures exceeding themselves according to place: and in this way "this man" and "the Son of God" do not hold themselves: but it is similar when it is said, "this is a Bishop": for it does not follow, "this one is here, and he is not a Bishop here: therefore he is not a Bishop."

§ 5. To the next it must be said that even if this were granted that the body of Christ is consecrated everywhere (which nevertheless is impossible) still it does not follow that the body of Christ is everywhere, just as the Son of God is everywhere, such that he himself is whole in every place, and in every part of the place. But the body of Christ will not be in all places: because it will not be in the place of another glorious body, nor is the whole body in every part of its place: because it is not that where the head is, there is the whole body: therefore it is clear that that argument does not proceed.

§ 6. To the last it must be said that eternity is equally referred to the nature and to the person, and even more immediately to the person, according as it is the whole, simultaneous, and perfect possession of interminable life: and therefore it is conceded by grace of the supposit that this man is from eternity, as was held above. But "where" does not belong to God except by transference, and this according to those things which belong to the divine nature in itself: and therefore it is not referred so immediately to the supposit, and therefore does not belong to this man, according as he is such.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Whole Christ Was In The Sepulcher, In Heaven, And Whole Everywhere

Whether the whole Christ (totus) was in the tomb, in heaven, and whole (totus) everywhere?

Whether the whole Christ (totus) was in the tomb, in heaven, and whole (totus) everywhere?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, C, And certainly he was whole (totus) at the same time, etc.

For totus [masculine: whole] and totum [neuter: the whole] seem to be referred to the same thing: because

§ 2. 1. A doctrine is given between the whole (totum) and every (omnis): because "every" distributes for subjective parts, but "totus" for integral parts. But the integral parts of Christ were not all in hell, nor all in the tomb, nor all in heaven.

§ 3. 2. Also, it was held above that the ratio of that composition which is in Christ is inexplicable, which is not the ratio of parts, as was said there: because it is composed from three substances, and two natures: but Christ in two natures and three substances, was neither in heaven, nor was he in the tomb, nor in hell: therefore not totus.

§ 4. 3. Also, it seems to be nothing what he says, that totus is referred to the person: because the person is simple. But totus always seeks the composition of integral parts: therefore it never belongs by grace of the person, as it seems.

§ 5. 4. Also, totus and totum signify the same thing, although under a different mode: therefore they are to be referred to the same thing under a different mode: therefore if totum is referred to the nature, then totus is referred to the same.

§ 6. 5. Also, it seems that the totum was in heaven. Proof: Wherever I am, there it is necessary that what is essentially in me is: therefore wherever Christ was, there it was necessary that what was essentially in Christ was. Now human nature was and still is essentially in him: therefore wherever he was, there it was too: but he was in heaven: therefore it too: therefore the totum was in heaven, because the divine and human nature were there. By the same reason it follows that the totum was in the tomb, and the totum in hell.

§ 7. 6. Also, we find three persons in one nature, and different accidents in one supposit, and very many parts in one whole: in all these we find that by virtue of union it follows that where one of them is, in that same place is the other: therefore since the union of two natures, and three substances in one person is not less than all these, it seems also that by virtue of union it ought to follow that where totus is, there totum in nature is.

§ 8. Solution: It must be said that the Master says well, that totus [whole Christ] is everywhere, but not totum [the whole]: and this speaking of the time of the three days when there was a division between the soul and the body. And the reason is touched upon in the letter in the authority of John Damascene, that totus, since it expresses a formed being, pertains to a distinct being, and this is the perfect person. But totum, since it is of the neuter gender, expresses nothing but an unformed and indistinct being, and is attributed to the nature with its parts: therefore where the nature with its parts is not, there totum is not.

§ 9. I respond therefore to the first, totum is taken in two ways, namely for distribution and for the perfect, as the Philosopher says in Physics III: I call the whole and the perfect the same. And by distribution it is not properly said of a simple thing: but in the second way it can be said of a simple thing. And thus totus Christus is said, that is, perfect in person to be everywhere: for he does not have personality from human nature, or from man according as he is man, but rather he had it from eternity.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that it is well true that the composition is there in the way expounded above, not properly [speaking]: but by grace of the masculine mode of signifying, the word totus respects the perfection of the person, and not the integrity of the composite nature.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that although the same thing is signified, nevertheless another and different mode causes one to be referred to the integrity of the person. Whence that reason does not compel.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that that reason proceeds in those things whose essences are coextended according to place: but it is not so in all things, as was clear above, as it is said, This one is here, and this one is a Bishop, etc.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that in all those compositions, one is of as much composition according to being as the other: and even three persons one in nature are similarly related to place. But in certain accidents pertaining to jurisdiction and power or dignity it is not so, as was said before, as Bishop, King, Prince. And similarly it is not so in the natures of Christ, which are not similarly related to place.

Articulus 4 — Whether Christ Descended Into Hell

Whether Christ descended into hell?

Whether Christ descended into hell?

§ 1. Next it is asked concerning what he says: Whole... was in hell.

§ 2. And three things are asked here: namely, whether Christ descended into hell? and, Whether he illuminated those who were there with the light of divinity? and, How long did he remain there?

§ 3. For that he did not descend into hell, seems from the incongruity of the place:

1. For the best place is congruent with the best: but Christ was the best: therefore it is not congruent for him to descend into hell.

§ 4. 2. Also, Augustine says that "hell" is always taken in an evil sense: but Christ could not descend into evil: therefore neither into hell.

§ 5. 3. Also, Luke 16:26: Between us and you a great chaos is established, so that those who wish to pass from here to you cannot, nor pass from there to here. Therefore much more is this chaos between Christ and the place of the damned.

§ 6. 4. Also, if Christ descended, by virtue of whom all ascend who do ascend, how will anyone hope that he will ascend?

§ 7. But to the contrary however is what is said, at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, on earth, and under the earth.[251] Therefore it seems that he came to the lower regions.

§ 8. Also, Psalm 23:7, 9: Lift up your gates, O princes, and be lifted up, etc.

§ 9. Also, in the Gospel of Nicodemus it is said that David in hell hearing this voice, exulting said: I recognize this voice which I foretold.

§ 10. Also, Acts 2:24: Whom God raised up, having loosed the sorrows of hell, since it was impossible that he should be held by it.

§ 11. Also, Ecclesiasticus 24:45: I will penetrate all the lower parts of the earth, and I will behold all that sleep. But in the lower parts of the earth (as Jerome says) is hell.

§ 12. Also, the Apostles' Creed says: He descended into hell.

§ 13. But it is asked further, Whether he descended to the lower hell?

It seems that he did.

§ 14. 1. Job 17:16: All my things shall descend into the deepest hell. Thinkest thou that at least there my rest will be? Now it is certain that he did not seek rest through anything else except through Christ's descent: therefore Christ descended to the deepest part of hell.

§ 15. 2. Also, he had said thus: Who will grant me this, that thou mayest protect me in hell? And below, And that thou mayest appoint me a time in which thou wilt remember me.[252]

Also, Psalm 85:13: Thou hast delivered my soul from the lower hell.

§ 16. 3. Also, Zechariah 9:11, upon that text: Thou also by the blood of thy testament hast sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water: the Gloss says, that those who were held bound in prisons, where no mercy had refreshed them, which that rich man sought, thou hast freed. But in hell there is no redemption, and especially in the deepest part. Therefore in vain would Christ have descended there.

§ 17. Also, Isaiah 66:24: Their fire shall not be extinguished. Therefore again in vain would Christ have descended there.

§ 18. Solution: It must be said that without doubt Christ descended to the lower regions. But "hell" is said in multiple ways, — namely interior, as the Gloss says upon that of James 3:6: Set on fire by hell, that wherever demons go, they carry hell with themselves. And exterior: and this is multiple, such as the dark and afflictive place of punishment of the damned; and the place of punishment not entirely dark, because of the light of grace of those to be purged; and the place without the punishment of sense and without light, as the limbo of infants dying in original [sin]; and the dark place having something of light on account of the great faith and hope of those dwelling there, like the limbo of the holy fathers before Christ's descent: and to this place Christ descended, and not to another: because concerning this Jerome says, that there dwelt those who were brought out by Christ.

§ 1. To the first therefore it must be said, that Christ as man was made for the sake of man, and not for Himself: so for the sake of man and not for Himself He descended.

§ 2. To the next it must be said, that 'hell' signifies the evil of the punishment of loss or of sense: and I call the punishment of loss that which consists in the taking away of some good, just as is the lack of light: but the punishment of sense is that which consists in something existing and afflicting, like fire: but Christ did not descend to the punishment of loss or of sense, but to the place only.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that this was not said concerning those dwelling in limbo with certain hope, but concerning those dwelling in the place of the damned, of whom there was no hope: and that certainty of liberation, and despair is called the chaos [or chasm] there: and therefore it is nothing to the proposition.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that from this very fact we are raised to the hope of ascending, because He Himself by descending made satisfaction for us: so that He might thus gather His own in all places, and put death to flight from them in all places.

§ 5. To that which is further asked, Whether Christ descended to the deepest hell? It must be said with blessed Gregory in the Gloss in the same place on Job, that He did not. And hell is called deepest there not absolutely, but in a certain way: because it is a deep prison with respect to the pleasantness of heaven, and it is this misty air into which the demons have been thrust down: but deeper is the earthly habitation, obscure and penal: and limbo is called the deepest with respect to these, into which the soul of Job and all his goods descended, until he was liberated through Christ: and therefore He did not descend to the deepest [hell] absolutely, but in a certain way.

§ 6. To the next it must be said, that it can in the same way be called the lower [hell] if he speaks in the person of Christ. But if he speaks according to himself: then his soul was liberated, when it was liberated from the cause of descending to the lower hell, such as from mortal sin, namely adultery and murder.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that that Gloss is very improper [or figurative]: and yet it can be expounded, that there was not a liberating mercy in limbo, but a relaxing one: because they did not have the punishment of sense and of loss. And if you say, that the rich man asked for nothing but a relaxing one, it must be said that he asked for a twofold one: first a liberating one through a return to life. For the expositors say, that he presumed that Abraham would not send Lazarus back to the evils which he had endured in life, and thus he himself would be sent: and he was not then in limbo, but arrived through Christ. Afterwards he asked for one relaxing a little of the punishment, which was not granted to him, but was granted to those dwelling in limbo on account of their merit.

§ 8. But those things which are objected to the contrary, are said concerning the simply lower hell.

§ 9. And through this the solution to all [the arguments] is evident.

251. Phil 2:10.

Articulus 5 — Whether Christ Enlightened Those Who Were Held In Limbo

§ 10. ARTICLE V. Whether Christ illuminated those who were held in limbo?

§ 11. Secondly it is asked, Whether He illuminated those who were there?

§ 12. But it seems that He did: because

§ 13. 1. It is so held in the preceding chapter B, in the words of Ambrose: Upon those placed in hell He poured the light of eternal life. The true light of wisdom radiated there, it illuminated hell, etc.

§ 14. 2. Item, Augustine: The deified soul descended to hell: so that just as to those who are on earth, so also to those who are in hell [and] sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, it might shine upon them.

§ 15. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 16. 1. Corporeal light does not irradiate one without illuminating another: therefore it seems that, since the divine light is more powerful, it did not illuminate one unless all saw it: but not all who were in hell were worthy: therefore it seems that no one was illuminated.

§ 17. 2. Item, A place deputed to perpetual darkness ought never to have the benefit of light: but hell is such a place: therefore it ought never to have been illuminated.

§ 18. 3. Item, He Himself said to the thief, Luke 23:43: Today you will be with me in paradise. Therefore it seems that He led others also out into paradise, and did not show the light of deity in hell: because it is clear that He willed the thief to be with Him, that is, where His soul was going to be, not everywhere where the deity always was.

§ 19. Solution. It must be said without doubt according to the sayings of the Saints, that Christ showed His deity to His saints in hell, and turned the place of the horrendous prison into paradise for them, with respect to this, that they saw His deity face to face, the price of redemption having been paid.

§ 20. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the objection is foolish: because neither did they dwell in the same place: and even if they had dwelt with the others, the others would not have been able to see the light: because it is not received except by an eye glorified by grace and glory: just as those fathers then according to the soul were blessed immediately upon Christ descending to them: and this belongs rather to the potency [or weakness] of light, that corporeal light is perceived by all: because this happens to it insofar as it is a positional form proportioned to powers, and an agent acting by altering through the necessity of nature: which things, since they are all marks of ignobility, none of them belongs to the divine light.

§ 21. To the next it must be said, that limbo was not condemned to perpetual darkness, but rather to temporal [darkness] until the redemption which was accomplished through Christ.

§ 22. To the next it must be said, that paradise is spoken of in three ways, namely the interior which is the open vision of the deity, and of this Christ understands [it] speaking to the thief: and the exterior of bodies, which is a place in Eden: and the exterior of spirits, which is the place of the empyrean heaven.

Articulus 6 — How Long Christ Was In Hell

§ 23. ARTICLE VI. How long was Christ in hell?

§ 24. Thirdly and lastly it is asked, How long was He there?

§ 25. For it seems that He departed immediately: because § 26. 1. It is so read in the Gospel of Nicodemus, that when the Saints had been led out into paradise, there appeared someone horrible in appearance, bearing the cross of a thief: who, when he was asked who he was, said that he was the thief to whom Christ had promised that he would be with Him today in paradise: therefore they exited immediately, as it seems.

§ 27. 2. Item, In certain Churches it is sung: You have come, desirable one, whom we were awaiting in the darkness, to lead forth this night the bound ones from the cloisters, etc. Therefore it seems that they were led out on the same night.

§ 28. 3. Item, Samson did not sleep in Gaza for three days or nights, but for one only, when he carried the gates of Gaza to the peak of the mountain. But Samson, 'the strong sun' (as Gregory says), signifies Christ sleeping in the night, and Gaza hell, and the gates of Gaza the gates of death and hell, which He carried to the peak of eternal vision and elevation.

§ 29. 4. Besides, For what purpose would He have been there so long?

§ 30. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 31. The soul ought to have been in the place of departed souls for as long as the body was in the place of departed bodies. But the body was in the sepulcher for three days: therefore the soul ought to have been in hell for that long. And Augustine renders the reason for this, because He lay for two nights, and only one perfect day: so that by His single death of the body, by which He shone as the day before the eyes of God, He might destroy our double foul and misty death, namely of body and soul, and that by His full light of truth He might signify to have wiped away the darkness of the law and of sin: so that by His light He might show Himself to illuminate two places filled with darkness by the very quality of death, namely the place of bodies, and the place of souls, in the sepulcher, and in hell.

§ 32. Therefore to the first it must be said, that Nicodemus speaks of the exit after the resurrection: and he also speaks there of Elijah and Enoch who were congratulating the liberated ones, just as they also had held a discourse beforehand concerning the departure which He fulfilled in hell by redeeming them. And as to what the thief said, that he was the one to whom Christ said: Today, etc., it is understood that the saying of Christ is materially signified.

§ 33. To the next it must be said, that the Saints there call 'night' the darkness of the infernal prison, from which they were led out when they saw the deity of the soul of Christ.

252. Job 14:13.

§ 34. To the next it must be said, that the history does not correspond to the allegory in all things: because Samson also slept with a harlot, which is not fitting for Christ: but only the sleep and the resurrection and the breaking of the gates are referred to the allegory.

§ 35. To the last the solution is evident through those things which were said at the beginning of the solution, where it is shown why it was fitting for Christ to remain so long in hell.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Ascended By Reason Of Both Natures, Or Of One Only

§ 36. ARTICLE VII. Whether Christ ascended by reason of both natures, or of one only?

§ 37. Next it is asked concerning this which He says, there, It is also usually asked, Whether it can be fittingly said, etc.

§ 38. And the question here is concerning the ascension of Christ.

§ 39. And it is asked first here in the Letter, whether He ascended and descended by reason of both or of one nature?

§ 40. Secondly it can be asked, Whether the ascension is to a place, or to a dignity?

§ 41. Thirdly it can also be said, Whether ascension denotes a local motion? and, Whether that [motion] is in time, or in an instant [nunc]?

§ 42. Lastly it can be asked concerning the time of the ascension.

§ 43. To the first one proceeds thus:

§ 44. 1. Damascene says, that ascension and descension are motions of bodies: therefore it seems that He ascended and descended by grace of the human nature.

§ 45. 2. Item, That which is everywhere does not change place: but the deity is everywhere: therefore it does not change place: but ascension and descension denote a change of place: therefore it seems that they do not belong to Christ by reason of the divine nature.

§ 46. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 47. Before the incarnation He did not have a human nature, and yet He previously descended into the womb of the Virgin, in which He took a human nature: therefore it seems that He descended by reason of the divine nature: because Jerome says, that it does not belong to human nature to ascend by its proper power, but by another power: and therefore the Angels marvel saying: Who is this, who comes from Edom. And below: Walking in the multitude of his strength.

§ 48. Solution. It must be said, that ascending and descending are spoken of properly, and by translation [or figuratively]. Properly they are motions of bodies, and thus they do not belong to Christ, except by reason of the human nature: and yet in that He did not descend: therefore He is said to have descended according to the divine nature, but to have ascended according to the human: because in the divine only the entity descended, and in the human it ascended: but according to person He was always in heaven, and everywhere. By translation, however, that is then said to descend, where it was indeed before, but was not present there before, just as to the union with our substance, when He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant: and in this way the Master speaks here.

§ 49. To the next it must be said, that the deity through itself does not change place, but through some effect it appears in some place through which it did not appear in it before, and does not appear through the same in another.

§ 50. To the last which is objected, it must be said that ascending is not attributed to the human nature as the power to which the motion belonged, but as the proper subject of that motion.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Ascension Is To A Place Or To A Dignity, And Whether To The Place Of The Crystalline Heaven

§ 51. ARTICLE VIII. Whether the ascension is to a place or to a dignity? and, Whether to the place of the crystalline heaven?

§ 52. Secondly it is asked, Whether the ascension is to a place, or to a dignity?

§ 53. But it seems that it is to a place: because § 54. 1. Every straight local motion is to some place: but ascension is a straight local motion: therefore it is to some place.

§ 55. 2. Item, A place congruent to his contemplation is owed to a contemplating and blessed Angel: therefore much more strongly to a glorified body: therefore it seems that the ascension is to that [place].

§ 56. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 57. 1. To Colossians 3:1 and 2, upon that: Seek the things that are above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God: mind the things that are above: the Gloss says, that the things above are virtues: therefore it seems that the ascension in which Christ resides is of dignity in virtue, not an exaltation of place.

§ 58. 2. Item, It is a principle among the Philosophers, that nothing is moved to that which is viler than itself: but every corporeal place is viler than the body of Christ: therefore it seems that it was not moved to any corporeal place.

§ 59. 3. Item, Place is given to a body on account of containment: therefore it seems that a body which has the necessity of existing from itself, and no flowing away in its parts, ought not to have a place: therefore that body ought not to be moved to a place.

§ 60. 4. Item, Among physical bodies, the most noble bodies do not move to a place, although they are moved in it: therefore since the body of Christ is infinitely more noble, it itself is not moved to a place.

§ 61. For the sake of this it is asked, Whether Christ's ascension was to the place of the crystalline heaven only, as some have said?

§ 62. But it seems that it was: because

§ 63. 1. A body and a spirit differ by genus: therefore the proper place of blessed spirits ought to differ from the proper place of bodies: since therefore the proximate place below that is the place of the crystalline heaven, it seems that the ascension of the body of Christ was to that.

§ 64. 2. Item, The place is different according to reason, namely of that which never was subject to the mutation which is caused by the motion of the heavens, and of that which at some time was subject: but an Angel and a spirit were never subject to motion and to the variation of time and of the heaven: but the body of Christ and of the blessed Virgin were at some time subject: therefore spirits ought to be in the place of the standing and not moving heaven: and bodies, namely of Christ and His mother, ought to be in the place of the first mobile heaven: but this is the crystalline heaven, as the opinion of almost all says: therefore it seems that the ascension of Christ was not locally except to the crystalline heaven.

§ 66. To that which is more worthy than any place, if a place is given, consequently the most worthy place is given. But the body of Christ and the sacrosanct womb of His mother are more worthy than any place: therefore if a place is given to it, the most worthy place will be given to them: but this is the empyrean heaven: therefore they are in the empyrean heaven.

§ 67. Solution. It must be said, that the ascension of Christ, is to a place, and to a dignity: to a place according to the body, and thus it is to the most worthy place of all places, namely into the highest of the empyrean heaven. But according to the divine person it is to the dignity of equality with the Father, which is called the right hand: not that it was not there before, but because sitting there in humanity through the ascension, He appeared to the faithful through faith, and to the Angels through cognition. But with respect to the soul and body it is to a dignity, which consists in the more potent goods of the Father, which are there called the right hand, if the ascension is referred to the humanity.

§ 68. But to that which is objected against this, it must be said to the first, that that Gloss by positing the ascension to be to the more potent goods which are above in dignity, does not on account of this exclude the ascension from being to a place, but rather includes it as a consequence: because the more potent goods of the Father appear more in a more worthy place.

§ 69. To the next it must be said, that it is one thing to be moved to a place, and another to be moved to a place on account of the place, namely because they need the place for their being and conservation. But glorified bodies were moved to a place which is more congruent to them, but not on account of the place, as if they needed it for their being: because if they needed that place for their being, they would be corrupted outside those places, just as fire going outside its place is corrupted.

§ 70. To the next it must be said, that in that reasoning a place is not owed to a glorified body, especially to the body of Christ, but rather by reason of congruency only, that is, because it is not congruent for it to be except in the most noble place.

§ 71. To the next it must be said, that heavenly bodies are moved in place for the generation of the elements, and they are not in place in all those ways in which generable bodies are in place, as was said in the second book of the Sentences: yet in some way they are in place. Thus also glorified bodies are not in place in every one of those ways, because their being does not depend upon a place: but they are in place by reason of congruency according to a mode which more closely approaches their nobility, since none attains to equality.

§ 72. But to that which is further asked, it must be said, that it is a foolish fantasy to say, that the body of Christ and of the blessed Virgin are in the crystalline heaven, or even that the Saints are in the crystalline: and only Christ and the blessed Virgin are in the empyrean: because the empyrean is the place of beatitude, but the crystalline heaven together with all the lower ones is ordered to generation and corruption: and therefore the Saints say, that the Philosophers did not know the empyrean heaven: and this is so, because their principles concerning the heavens are taken from motion. Whence what cannot be investigated through motion, or through a property of motion, does not belong to the Philosophers, and is unacknowledged by them.

§ 73. But to that which is objected, it must be said to the first, that this would be true, if a spirit and a glorified body by their nature were determined to the place of their generation and salvation: but this is not true: and therefore since no dignity of place according to truth suffices for glory, all glorious bodies are in one place by one account, according as they are related to that glory more distantly or more proximately.

§ 74. To the next it must be said that the body of Christ with respect to generation never was subject to the motion of the heavens, because it was effected by the Holy Spirit: but perhaps with respect to the alteration of cold, and heat, and hunger, and thirst, and the like; but from these every glorified body is liberated by glorification: and therefore it cannot be located under any mobile thing, but above every mobile thing.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Ascension Signifies Local Motion, And Whether It Was In Time Or In A Now

§ 75. ARTICLE IX. Whether ascension denotes a local motion? and, Whether it was in time or in an instant? § 76. Thirdly it is asked, Whether ascension denotes a local motion? and, Whether that motion is in time or in an instant?

§ 77. It seems that it denotes a local motion: because § 78. 1. Acts 1:9, it is said, that while they were watching, He was elevated, and a cloud received Him out of their sight.

§ 79. 2. Item, In the same place, v. 10: And while they were looking up into heaven as He went, etc. All these posit a local motion.

§ 81. 1. Local motion is through a space: therefore in the middle of the space through which the motion is, that which is moved is partly in the term from which, and partly in the term to which: therefore it is divisible: therefore the glorious body is divided by some division, which seems false.

§ 82. 2. Item, Every motion (as Avicenna says) is an exit from potency to act. But a glorified body is in no potency: because it cannot receive anything more than it has. Therefore it seems that it is not moved.

§ 83. 3. Besides, Either it is with the other through which it passes in the same place, or it excludes it. If it is in the same place, as the Saints seem to say: therefore the dimension of that quantity and of the body with which it is in the same place is the same: but of whatever bodies the quantity is the same, those are one body, as Avicenna says: therefore the body of Christ with that through which it is moved, is one body: which is false: therefore it is not moved.

§ 84. If perhaps you say, that it excludes that through which it is moved, from the place through which it passes. On the contrary: It passes through some things that do not give way, like wood and stones: for He entered with closed doors: therefore He was at some time in the same place with them, not excluding them.

§ 85. If perhaps you say, that what Avicenna says is not true, that if two bodies are in the same place, they are one body: the saying of Avicenna is proved to be true thus: Let there be a place of one cubit, in which there are two bodies, and let the center of that place be A, but the extremes up and down, right and left, B C D E, and let the bodies be equal: and let a line be drawn from A to B upwards of each body, measuring from the center upwards. I ask therefore, whether there is one line, or two? If you tell me that there is one: therefore the subject of that line is one: because of one form there is one subject: for otherwise an accident one in number would be in diverse subjects, which is impossible: therefore the located body is one. But if you tell me that there are two lines, two incongruities follow from this: one geometrically, the other naturally. For since AB is taken upwards in the place of both, the point B is one in number. Similarly the center is one in number. But between any two lines there is a surface. Therefore two straight lines drawn from one term to one term, enclose and contain a surface: which is against the postulate of Euclid in book I, where he says that two straight lines contain no surface. Another incongruity is: because one straight line is between two points. If therefore they are posited to be two, there will be two contiguous lines without any intermediate surface, which is against nature, and is disproved in Physics VI. Therefore two bodies cannot be in one [place] at the same time.

§ 86. But if you say, that a body insofar as it is a quantified body does not fill a place, but insofar as it is gross and material: everyone who knows anything in Philosophy knows this to be false: because the contrary is said by all the Philosophers, and is necessarily disproved by the already stated demonstration. Therefore it seems that a glorious body is not moved: since it excludes a body, nor can it be in the same place with the body through which it passes.

§ 87. Further it is asked, Whether it is moved in an instant, or in time?

§ 88. But it seems that it is in time.

§ 89. 1. For everything commensurate with a place through quantity, is moved in time, and not in an instant, as the Philosopher proves: such a mobile is the glorious body of Christ: therefore it is moved in time, and not in an instant.

§ 90. 2. Item, Created spirits are moved in an instant, as was said in the first book of the Sentences: therefore it belongs to bodies to be moved in time, and not in an instant, as it seems.

§ 92. The Philosopher says, that the motion of light in a diaphanous medium, and the motion of color to the sight is in an instant, for the reason that they are in the medium according to a spiritual being: but glorious bodies are more spiritual, and especially the body of Christ: therefore it seems that it is moved in an instant.

§ 93. Solution. It must be believed without a doubt, that Christ was locally moved by ascending, and that He can still be locally moved according to His will: and here a faithful ignorance is more pleasing to God, than a rash knowledge, or a figment of a lie. For some said that there ought not to be motion of glorified bodies. Others fashioned lies to solve the incongruities, namely that a place is due to a body, not from its quantity, but from the grossness and filling of the place: which is absurd to say.

§ 94. Whence it must be said to the first, that there is division according to reality, and this is repugnant to an incorruptible body: and there is division according to reason, namely to have the notion of a term from which, and a term to which: just as everything has which is in the medium, according as it is moved: and this is not repugnant: which can easily be proved: because thus the motion of the sun is divided by the diurnal motion, and by the declining circle: and yet it is posited by all as incorruptible.

§ 95. To the next it must be said, that there is an exit from potency to act which is received in the mobile itself, such as a form, and that is of imperfection: and there is an act not received inside, but outside: and this is not repugnant to perfection. Thus the body of Christ existing on earth, is not in act in heaven, but in potency: but when this potency comes to act, nothing is received in it, but rather it holds itself differently to place than before: and this exit, according to the Philosophers, happens constantly in incorruptible bodies: as the sun existing in the angle of the East, is in potency to the angle of the mid-heaven: and when the potency is reduced to act, the sun is in no way better than before, but holds itself differently according to position.

§ 96. To the next it must be said, that according to the sayings of the Saints, to which consent must be given without doubt, a glorious body is with any other body in the same place, and does not exclude it: but this is not insofar as it is a body, but insofar as it is glorious: and this I repute to be a miracle, and concerning those things by which the Lord gives us glory: just as He does in many other things in the body, namely that an elemented body should be immortal and impassible, shining seven times more than the sun. Whence God who can do more than we can understand, gives it this, that it may be in the same place with another body.

§ 97. But to the adduced demonstration, it must be said that lines are not commensurate in the nature of a body: and therefore physical reasons of this kind do not hold.

§ 98. To that which is further asked concerning time: I say that He is moved as He wills: and I well think, that He has it in His power to be moved in an instant and in time.

§ 99. But to that which is objected, that the motion is divisible according to the medium: it must be said that this does not prevent it from being able to be moved in an instant: because the moving power overcomes [it]. Just as the Philosopher also proves, that every infinite power, such as magnitude or multitude, exceeds every finite thing: and thus it would move in an instant, if there were such a power, as he himself proves there. Thus it must be said, that the moving power in the body of Christ, is not proportioned to any passive potency, no matter how fast: and therefore it overcomes the space so as to make the transit in an instant if He wills, and in time if He wills. Nevertheless such things are hidden from us: and therefore I assert nothing concerning the sayings, except what the authorities of the Saints hand down, namely that those bodies are moved, and that other bodies do not obstruct them.

Articulus 10 — Whether After The Resurrection Christ Remained With The Faithful Forty Days On Earth

§ 100. ARTICLE X. Whether after the resurrection Christ remained with the faithful for forty days on earth?

§ 101. Lastly it is asked concerning the time of the ascension.

§ 102. 1. For He conversed with the disciples, as is held in the beginning of Acts, appearing to them for forty days, and speaking of the kingdom of God. Since therefore other bodies are immediately moved to the place connatural to them, it seems that He violently detained the upward flight of His body.

§ 103. 2. Besides, Since those liberated from hell went out from hell with Him, did they ascend before Him? It seems that they did not: because Micah prophesied saying, that He will ascend opening the way before them.

§ 104. But to this and to the like it must be said, that He Himself was on earth for forty days, so that by apparitions He might teach the faith to the Apostles, and might prove the glorious resurrection of the same body, which they had seen dead with their own eyes: and this is to be proved at the end of the fourth book of the Sentences, where there will be a discussion concerning the arguments for the resurrection made through the ten apparitions, which are collected from the four Gospels. And it follows concerning His body alone that He has it in His power to move where He wills, and a place is not owed to Him on account of the necessity of Himself, but from congruency only: and therefore according to the order owed and useful to redemption, the ascension had to be deferred.

§ 105. To the next it must be said, that the opinion of all says, that no one ascended before Christ: and this is true. But whether they were with Christ, wherever He appeared to the Apostles (which I believe to be more true on account of the joy which they had in the presence of that body by which they had been redeemed) or were in paradise for those forty days, which certain others say, is not to be rashly asserted, but either can be opined without danger.

Articulus 11 — What The Latchet Of The Shoe And The Bones Of The King Of Idumea Signify

§ 106. ARTICLE XI. What do the thong of the shoe and the bones of the king of Idumaea signify?

§ 107. Next it is asked concerning the last word which the Master says as if by way of epilogue, there, D, § 2: These things concerning the thong of the shoe, etc.

§ 108. For what is called the thong here? what the shoe? what the king of Idumaea? and, What are his bones? and, How are they burned even to ashes?

§ 109. Solution. It must be said, that the shoe is the humanity directing the foot of the divinity, which standing alone, sustains all things by the sack of this dead and animal skin. But the binding thong is the union of the two natures into the singularity of the person. But the king of Idumaea is Christ the king of the world through the conformity of blood: because He communicated in flesh and blood. And Idumaea is interpreted 'bloody', just as the Psalmist says: Upon Idumaea I will extend my shoe. But the bones are those things which are stronger to be understood among the sacraments of His humanity. But to be burned to ashes, is to wish to investigate even to the least things by the fire of the fervor of study through arguments. And this is not to be done, as the Master says.

§ 110. And thus distinction XXII is evident.

DISTINCTIO XXIII

§ 111. DIVISION OF THE TEXT.

§ 112. But since it has been declared above, that Christ was full of grace, etc. Here begins that part in which he treats of the formal restorers ordained to act, and not against the defect of sin: as was said in the beginning of this book.

§ 113. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he treats of the gratifying and restoring habits. But in the second concerning the precepts which regard works. And this begins below, in distinction XXXVII, there, A, But now the distribution of the decalogue, etc.

§ 114. Still the former of these is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master hands down the knowledge of these habits individually. But in the second he treats of their connection: and this begins below, dist. XXXVI, there, A, It is also usually asked, Whether the virtues are so conjoined to one another, etc.

§ 115. Still the first is divided into two, according to the twofold aspect of the habits. For there are virtues concerning which he treats first: and there are gifts concerning which he treats second: and this begins at dist. XXXIV, there, A, Now concerning the seven gifts, etc.

§ 116. Still the former is divided into two, accor—

§ 1. ...while there are two genera of virtues: the theological, which are treated first, and the cardinal, which he treats second, in distinction 32, there, A, After the aforesaid, concerning the four virtues, etc.

§ 2. The first is divided into three, according to the three theological virtues: and the first is on faith; the second on hope, which begins in distinction 26, there, A, Now there is hope, etc. And the third on charity, which begins in distinction 27, there, A, But since Christ did not have faith and hope, etc.

§ 3. The treatise on faith is divided into three parts by three distinctions: in the first of which the Master explains two definitions of faith. In the second, he raises and resolves certain doubts concerning that explanation, which begins in distinction 24, there, A, Here it is asked, if faith is only concerning things not seen, etc. In the third, he treats of faith according to the state of the believer in which he is: and this begins in distinction 25, there, A, To the aforesaid must be added, etc.

§ 4. The present distinction is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master continues his treatment. In the second, he posits a distinction of Augustine, with its definition, there, B, Faith is a virtue, etc.

§ 5. In the third, he posits another definition with its explanation, there, H, For the Apostle says: Faith is the substance, etc.

§ 6. In the second of these parts the Master does two things. For first the Master posits the definition of faith: and this in the second chapter of this distinction. Second, he posits the explanation: and this in the five following chapters. And this begins there, C, Now faith is taken, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is A Virtue Or Not

In what genus is the virtue of faith?

§ 7. Many questions arise here in the Text: but before the Text there are two, namely, in what genus is the virtue of faith?

§ 8. And, whether it is a virtue, or not?

§ 9. To the first it seems one can object thus: 1. Every speculation of the true is in the genus of science: faith is a certain speculation of the true: therefore it is in the genus of science. The PROOF of the first is that science is a habit perfecting the intellect as regards the speculation of the true. But the SECOND is proved by the fact that faith sees the true (as the Apostle says) through a glass in a dark manner . Now to see is to speculate in a certain way.

§ 10. 2. Also, Hugh of St. Victor: Faith is the assent to the first truth established below the understanding of truth, and above opinion. Now it is established that the extremes are in the genus of science and cognition. Therefore it seems that the mean is as well. But the mean is faith: therefore faith is in the genus of science.

§ 11. 3. Also, the Philosopher says that opinion aided by reasons becomes faith: therefore faith is in the same genus with opinion: but opinion is a certain science.

§ 12. The same is accepted through Boethius, who says that an argument is a reason making faith regarding a doubtful thing. Now whatever an argument makes in the genus of science, is faith: therefore it is in the genus of science.

§ 13. 4. Also, Romans 10:17: Faith is from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ. But Gregory says that God gives understanding when he illumines the mind from the things heard. Now that illumination which is from the things heard, is in the genus of science. Therefore also the faith which is generated from that hearing, as the Apostle says: therefore faith is in the genus of science.

§ 14. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Nothing is science which has contrariety to a vice: but faith has contrariety to a vice: therefore faith is not in the genus of science. The first is self-evident: because a virtue is in some way from us, and we are its cause, or God; but science is from a thing. And similarly science has no opposition except to ignorance: and this is the opposition of privation and habit: but faith has the contrary habit of infidelity, which is a vice.

§ 15. 2. Also, there is no science of that for which there is no reason, and which is not manifest by itself: but for the credible there is no proving reason, and it is not manifest by itself; therefore of the credible there is no science. But faith is of the credible: therefore faith is not science. PROOF of the first: Every science is either of a principle, or of a conclusion: of a principle, like that which is manifest by itself; but of a conclusion, like that concerning which there is a proving reason. The PROOF of the second is that the credible is elevated beyond our reason, nor is it manifest to us by itself, as for example that God is three and one, through the saying of Gregory, who says that faith has no merit where human reason offers experience.

§ 16. Solution. It must be said that faith is not in the genus of science, as the last reasons prove. For although it has cognition, nevertheless that rather arises from affection than from reason. Whence Augustine: Other things a human being can do unwillingly, but he can believe only willingly. Whence it must be known that the intellect is related to the will in two ways: antecedently, and consequently. Antecedently it is related with respect to certain knowable things, to which it can be forced to consent from themselves or from reason. Consequently with respect to certain others, to the consent of which it is not compelled unless it wills it from a free will, because such things are not apparent to it, and concerning such things is faith: and therefore the Masters were accustomed to say that the cognition in faith is material, and the affection formal.

§ 17. To the first it must be said that not every speculation of the true is in the genus of science: but a speculation of the true in which the things that are, are formally perfective of science, such as a proving mean, and the true considered as true, which is the principle of science, as in universals. Wherefore it does not follow that faith is in the genus of science simply speaking, unless in the way practical science is called science: and this is not to be science simply, but mixed with affection, which dominates in it and informs it.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that Master Hugh calls the "science of truth" the vision face to face, while he calls "opinion" certain credible things in Sacred Scripture concerning which one doubts without peril: such as what the Master posits below in the Text, whether formed faith becomes unformed. And it is clear that these are not simply in the genus of science: because affection dominates in that science of truth, nor does it fluctuate as opinion does: because the one knowing the truth assents to what he sees, the one opining fears contradiction, while the one believing assents, but does not see the reason of his assent.

§ 19. To the next it must be said that faith is taken in many ways, namely for the truth sometimes, which is in promises: just as it is said, a faithful God, and faithful prophets. Whence the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 10:13: God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, etc. And, Ecclesiasticus 36:18: Give reward, O Lord, to them that wait for thee, that thy prophets may be found faithful. Sometimes it is taken for the certitude of a conclusion had from the certitude of the principles of an argument. And an argument is called a reason making faith regarding a doubtful thing, that is, for a question, which is the same in subject with the conclusion. And so it is even taken by Aristotle, that faith is opinion aided by reasons. Sometimes it is taken for legality between human beings: as human beings are called faithful, as one is called a faithful friend, or a faithful companion. Whence in Proverbs 20:6: Many human beings are called merciful: but who shall find a faithful man? Sometimes faith is taken for the confidence of a secure conscience, as the Apostle says, Romans 14:23: All that is not of faith is sin. And thus it is also taken among the common people. Sometimes in works: as Damascene says, that by faith the farmer ploughs and sows the earth: for he has the confidence of the fruit. And it is taken in other ways. But in this question faith is not taken except for the consent to the first truth in articles not apparent to reason.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that "hearing" is taken there generally for everything that induces to faith: such as the hearing of a word, and the sight of a miracle, and the like: but such things do not cause consent in faith, but only induce a thought concerning the credible thing. And because they do not sufficiently prove it, therefore they do not serve faith except on the part of the material part, which is a tenuous cognition: and it is formally perfected on the part of the affection.

Articulus 2 — Whether Faith Is A Virtue

Whether faith is a virtue?

§ 21. Secondly it is asked, whether faith is a virtue, or not?

§ 22. And it seems that it is not: 1. For Cicero says that virtue is a voluntary habit by mode of nature, agreeable to reason. But faith does not seem to be a voluntary habit, because it is not in the will: nor even by mode of nature, since nature does not incline by mode of cognition, but faith is a certain cognition: therefore it seems that faith is not a virtue.

§ 23. 2. Also, the Philosopher says that virtue is operative of the best things in passions and operations. But faith is neither in passions, nor in operations, as it seems: because operations are upon something outside, and in determinate matter: nor is it operative of the best things, but rather it leans upon the true: therefore it seems that faith is not a virtue.

§ 24. 3. Also, the Philosopher says in book VI of the First Philosophy [Metaphysics] that the end of speculative intelligence is the true, but of the practical it is the work: but as the potencies are related, so are the habits perfecting the potencies: therefore every habit whose end is the true, is in the speculative intellect. But faith is a habit whose end is the true: therefore faith is in the speculative intellect. But in the speculative intellect there is no virtue: therefore faith is not a virtue.

§ 25. 4. Also, it does not seem to be true what was said, that faith is in the intellect insofar as it is consequently ordered to the will: because affection through cognition precedes every motion of the will and affection: for first a reporting is made to the affection, and afterwards the affection rises toward what is reported. Therefore it seems that faith, since it reports divine things, and opens the eye, as Augustine says, is prior to every affection: therefore it has nothing except what belongs to cognition: therefore it is not a virtue: because no pure cognition is a virtue, from the fact that it is in no way from us: for although we consent to the known true, this is not from us, but from the truth of the thing compelling reason.

§ 26. If perhaps you say that faith is of the true by mode of the good, and thus is in the practical intellect: this cannot be true: because thus the true in faith would be material, and the good formal: therefore as regards the formal in the object it would not be distinguished from charity, whose end and object is the good: therefore faith and charity would not differ except materially, which is false.

§ 27. But if you say that they differ in this, that the true is the good of the rational potency, and as regards this faith tends into it: but this again is nothing; because no potency is so speculative that it does not have an end: and that [end], according as it is an end, is thus a good for that potency, and desired by it: and thus already every science would be made a virtue, which is false: therefore faith is not a virtue.

§ 28. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Every habit moving a potency not by mode of art and science, but by mode of nature (as Cicero intends) is a virtue: faith is such a habit: therefore faith is a virtue. The first is written by Cicero. The second is proved through the things said before: because a habit which is an art and science, has reasons, and leans upon them: but faith does not have them, nor lean upon them: therefore it moves by mode of nature, like a heavy thing downwards, and a light thing upwards, except for this, that it knows the reason.

§ 29. 2. Also, Virtue (as the Philosopher says) is the disposition of the perfect to the best: but faith orders everything that it perfects and disposes to the best, because to God: therefore faith is a virtue.

§ 30. 3. Also, everything that is a principle of justification and of the purification of the heart, is a virtue: faith is of this sort: therefore it is a virtue. PROOF of the first: because nothing justifies except what is formally contrary to the impure of sin: and this is also only virtue. The SECOND is written, Acts 15:9: Purifying their hearts by faith. And Augustine says that faith is that by which we are justified. And, Romans 4:11: He received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the justice of the faith which he had, being uncircumcised.

§ 31. 4. Also, Augustine says that faith is a virtue: and it is posited in the Text.

§ 32. 5. Also, the Apostle to the Hebrews 11:6: Without faith it is impossible to please God. And, Ecclesiasticus 45:4: In his faith and meekness he sanctified him. And, to the woman who was in a flux of blood for twelve years, Luke 8:48: Thy faith hath made thee whole. And because the whole Scripture proclaims this, therefore let these suffice.

§ 33. Solution. It must be said that faith is a theological virtue. For the theological virtues are those immediately ordering into God, just as the cardinal virtues order into the mean of passions and praiseworthy operations: and therefore these and those have their rectitudes in different ways: because the cardinal ones are called straight from the act, or from the approach to the mean, and their opposite curve is the deflection into the superfluous or the diminished: but the rectitude of the theological ones consists in the right order into the end, according as it has the nature of beatitude in the true and the good and the unfailing, the high and the arduous: and the obliqueness opposite to it, is the deflection from the end to a mutable good. Thus therefore we say that faith is one of the theological virtues.

§ 34. To the first therefore it must be said that a virtue is not called a voluntary habit on the ground that every virtue is in the will as in a subject: but rather for this reason, because in the work of virtue and of the generation of the habit the moving principle is the will; and this is soundly said in the consuetudinal [moral] virtues: but the will in theological and infused ones at least cooperates through consent. Similarly faith is inclining by mode of nature: because it does not have a reason sufficient for consent, and if it had, nevertheless it does not lean on it. Whence in science and the arts, reason is the cause of consent, and first the reason is accepted so that afterwards it may be consented to: but in faith it is the contrary: for first there is consent to the first truth for its own sake, and afterwards reason is sought so that what is believed may in some way be understood: and after it is found, faith still does not lean upon it: and therefore it is clear that the whole proceeds from the liberty of the will, which makes faith assent: and therefore it inclines as a nature.

§ 35. To the next it must be said that the Philosopher is speaking of the political and consuetudinal virtues, and not of an intellectual virtue: because even in the VI book of the Ethics, he gives another doctrine concerning intellect and prudence and phronesis than he himself gave concerning chastity and fortitude. Or it can be said that faith has an interior work, which is to tend into the first truth, and in that potency it operates the best: but it does not have passions: because not every virtue is in passions, properly speaking.

§ 36. To the next it must be said that the end of speculation is the true, which is as the principle of the science of the thing: and this is as it were moved from the thing to the intellect, and it consists in the universal reason of the thing: and there is the true beatifying the intellect, and this is the true outside the intellect, into which it itself tends: and it is not the reason of a thing, but rather the highest thing, and the one light of eternal felicity: and that light is the end of the intelligence affected around that very true. Whence I well concede that the solution of those who say that faith is in the true by mode of the good is nothing: for this is impossible, since it leans on the first truth for its own sake: for if it tended into it under the aspect of the good, it would already not lean on it for its own sake, but for the sake of the good, which is false. And therefore the saying of the Philosopher does not impede us: because the "true" of which he himself speaks is equivocal with respect to the end of faith.

§ 37. To the next it must be said that it was said above that this is necessary as regards consent, which is the substance of the act of faith: because it is after some cognition to which the will efficaciously tends through consent: but the true which is the reception of the credible through hearing, precedes affection: but that intellect is nothing but the one receiving the what it is that is meant by the name of the credible: and therefore not through a proving reason that or why it is so: but by free will it consents. And thus it is clear that the reason does not proceed except concerning the intellect which is the what it is that is meant by the name.

§ 38. Nevertheless if someone wished to subtly distinguish, he could say that there is the intellect as intellect, and in that there is no virtue: and there is the intellect as it is through extension to a work: and this extension is done in two ways. In the first way, because affection holds the principate in that which makes operable things to be inquired into. In the other way, because the form received by it is the principle of a work and of science: and thus it is extended into affection in the first way, and the knowable true into the operable good in the second way. And this is the practical intellect in which there are certain virtues, like prudence, phronesis, and intellect, and such intellectual virtues. But there is an intellect of the true, whose principle of consent is the will: and that is the affective intellect: and in that is faith: and although it is one in subject, nevertheless its being through such forms, and its rational account, is not one.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Definition Of Faith, According To Dionysius And Master Hugh, Is Well Assigned

Whether the definition of faith according to Dionysius and Master Hugh is well assigned?

§ 39. Next it is asked concerning this which is said in the Text, that faith is a virtue by which are believed the things that are not seen.

§ 40. Other definitions are found taken alongside this one: which, because they are almost similar, therefore we will posit two.

§ 41. For Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names, that faith is the unique foundation of believers, placing them in the truth, and the truth in them, having the simple science of the truth for those credulous in the credible truth.

§ 42. But Hugh of St. Victor thus: Faith is the certitude of absent things, established below the science of truth, and above opinion.

§ 43. Other definitions are posited below in the second part.

§ 44. 1. But it seems it is not the unique foundation: because humility also founds. If you say that it does not found believers as believers, but rather the humble: this is nothing: because already according to this every virtue would be a foundation, because charity founds the loving one, and so of others.

§ 45. 2. Also, this does not seem to be true what he says, Placing them in the truth: because it rather places them in a mirror, and in an enigma, than in the truth.

§ 46. 3. Also, faith is below the science of truth: therefore it does not place to the truth, that is, in the truth: because so another translation has it.

§ 47. 4. Also, neither does this seem true what he says, And the truth in them, for which another translation has, and the truth in themselves. If you say that it places the truth in us through faith: this is nothing: because thus faith places through faith, and the same operates through itself: and is the principle of the work, and the mean or instrument: and this cannot be.

§ 48. 5. Furthermore, what does it mean that through faith truth is placed in us? because truth is in species [vision], and not in faith, 2 Corinthians 5:7: We walk by faith, and not by sight. And therefore while we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord, as the Apostle had said immediately before . Therefore faith rather causes us to be absent from the truth, than places it in us, and locates it.

§ 49. 6. Also it is asked further, what is it that he says: In the credible truth? If this is in the believed truth, as the other translation hints, how is it true that the credulous, that is, the faithful in the believed truth have the simple science of truth, since there are so many believed articles according to both symbols [creeds]?

§ 50. Further again it is asked concerning the other definition, that faith is the certitude of absent things:

§ 51. 1. For either he understands of things absent in place, or of things absent to reason. If in the first way: this is nothing: because even things absent in place can be present to reason. But if of things absent to reason: this is even less so: because it cannot be certain to reason, what is not present to reason.

§ 52. 2. Also what he says, Below science, faith seems in this to fall short of the certitude of a moral virtue, concerning which the Philosopher says that virtue is more certain than every art: therefore it is also more certain than every science. If therefore faith falls short of the certitude of a less certain thing, such as moral virtue is: thus faith will seem less certain than moral virtue, which God forbid.

§ 53. 3. Also, why does he say, Established above opinion? For opinion is a habit of imperfect certitude: because it fears the contrary out of the weakness of the persuasion: therefore it seems that it is not a habit comparable to faith.

§ 54. 4. Also, we opine that we know when we cognize the first cause, and that it is its cause, and that it is impossible for this to be otherwise: is faith above that science, or below it? For it seems that it is above: because we see that the certitude of faith is so strong that before it is denied, death is chosen by many, as the Martyrs did: but the Philosophers, who knew many true things, did not do this: therefore he ought to have said it is established above the science of truth, and not below. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: Faith is proved by authority, as is said in this lecture. And, Hebrews 11:1 throughout, in the Gloss. But the locus from authority is weak, not making anything but opinion: therefore it seems that the certitude of faith is established even below opinion.

§ 55. Solution. It must be said that the definition of Augustine posited in the Text is also disputed by the Master in the Text: and therefore we defer that one.

§ 56. But to the first we say that the definition of Dionysius is given concerning faith according to the proper effect which it has in the believer: for thus in the fact that it itself is first by nature in the spiritual edifice, it founds and places in the truth of the believed thing or article and of the hoped-for beatitude: but in the fact that it has something of cognition, it places the truth of the believed thing in us through a most certain consent: but in the fact that it is not the truth of a complex expression, as in a proportion, which is called an axiom, or the principle of a syllogism, therefore the credulous are said to have in it a simple science of the truth, that is, a simple light, which makes one in some way know the truth of the credible article. And thus it is clear that faith does three things: namely in the fact that it is first by nature, it founds us in the truth: but in the fact that it is a certain cognition, it founds the truth in us: and in the fact that it is a simple light similar to the first truth, it gives a simple science of the truth of credible things.

§ 57. To the first it must be said that humility founds, not as being laid in the foundation, but rather as making deep trenches by emptying oneself, in which trenches the foundations are placed.

§ 58. To the next it must be said that it places the truth in us in the fact that it in some way holds it through the assent of cognition, but not through species. For the truth is in a mirror and an enigma as an object and end, although it is not in them as in its proper light.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that the "science of truth" is there called the vision through species, and the liquid and open truth: but it is not taken here thus, but rather for the truth as if veiled by a mirror and an enigma.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that faith places the truth in us through consent and a certain cognition which it makes in us: and I well concede, that it is not through faith [as an instrument separate from the habit]: but that cognition is of a mirror and an enigma.

§ 61. To the next it must be said that truth is in both, but differently: but it is not said to be in species, for the reason that there it is unmixed with similitudes.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that although there are many articles, nevertheless one thing is subject in all, which is the first truth: and therefore faith is called a simple light, which is a similitude of that truth, and is not composite from many things, like the light of intellective science.

§ 63. To that which is objected concerning the other definition, it must be said that "of absent things" is said there as regards reason: and this in two ways. For a thing is absent to reason, the cognition of which is in no way in it: neither is it as a proving reason, nor even as an object: and thus what is absent to reason is ignored: and in this way proceeds the reason adduced. In a second way that is called absent to reason which indeed is present as an object, but there is no proving and convincing reason for the sense: and thus faith is called the rectitude of absent things: and therefore the Gloss says, on Galatians 5:6, that faith is the certitude of invisible things. And invisible things are called there, what here are called absent things, namely those of which a proving reason is not had: and nevertheless the consent is most strong.

§ 64. To the next it must be said that the virtue of faith is more certain than every art and every moral virtue: because the science of truth is not understood to be the science of art, but rather contemplation through species in the Word, which overcomes all certitude through the light which proceeds from the Word. Whence that objection sins by equivocation of the "science of truth".

§ 65. To the next it must be said that faith overcomes opinion, concerning which it was spoken above: because Augustine says that there are three things by which the intellect is aided in divine things, namely opinion, intellect, and faith. And what we opine, is due to error: since we do not know how to pronounce anything certain about it, namely whether those rising with the Lord were incinerated, or not. But what we believe, is due to authority, which is supported by the revelation of the Holy Spirit: and what we understand, this is of open reason: and as regards this, faith is posited as a mean, as was said above, and not otherwise.

§ 66. To the next it must be said that faith is led by the hand by the authority of the fathers who bought it: but it does not consent because of this, nay rather it consents because of the truth itself without a reason. And as regards this it is said to be above the consent of opinion which consents because of a reason, yet fearing contradiction.

§ 67. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Divisio Textus

§ 68. Now faith is taken in three ways, etc. Here the Master explains the definition of Augustine, and introduces five chapters: in the first of which he explains how faith is a virtue. In the second, he explains this that he says, which are believed, there, D, It is one thing to believe, etc. In the third he asks, Whether faith which is not a virtue, can become a virtue? there, E, But if it is asked, etc. In the fourth, he determines concerning the universality of faith, there, F, And since in diverse ways, etc. In the fifth, he explains the last part, which is which are not seen, namely how faith is of non-apparent things, there, G, It is also to be noted, that faith is properly of non-apparent things, etc.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Threefold Division Is Well Assigned Concerning Faith According To The Master

Whether the threefold division concerning faith is well assigned according to the Master?

§ 69. But a doubt arises concerning the first chapter concerning the division which he posits, that faith is spoken of in three ways, namely for that by which it is believed, and it is a virtue: and for that which is believed, and it is not a virtue: and for that into which it is believed, which is other than that by which it is believed.

§ 70. 1. For since there are three things, namely the habit, the act, and the object, he ought to have posited yet another by reason of the act: or if he does not attend to the act, then he ought to have posited only two, namely the habit, and the object.

§ 71. 2. Also, in the names which name the habits of other virtues, the name is not equivocated except to the habit, and the act: as love is an act, and love is a habit: and hope is a habit, and hope is an act, and so of others: therefore it ought similarly to be done here: therefore what is believed will not be called faith, as it seems.

§ 72. 3. Also, faith is spoken of in other ways which he does not posit here: therefore he seems to distinguish the multiplicity of faith diminutely.

§ 1. Solution: It must be said to the first that the Master does not intend here to distinguish the multiplicity of the name of faith, but only to explain those things that fall in some way into its definition: for into it fall the things that are not seen, and those are the articles: and into it falls virtue, and not the virtue which is unformed faith, which he calls a non-virtue, which is with respect to the same things. But the act in faith is not so properly called by the name of the habit as in the other virtues: and this is because the perfection of faith is from two things, namely from the intellect giving the act, and from the affect as informing: but "to believe" names only one of those, namely that which is from the intellect: and therefore it cannot receive the name of the whole habit, as is the case in the other virtues, which consist in only one potency as regards their material and their formal element.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that the Master does not intend concerning those, and above several modes have been posited: and besides those faith is also called the sacrament of faith, which is baptism, when infants are called faithful, because faith in a gift is given to them, just as the other virtues: and therefore the aforesaid definition is fitting to them, not that they can immediately believe according to act, but they have the habit by which they can believe when the time comes for the use of free choice.

Articulus 5 — Whether Unformed Faith Is A Virtue

Is unformed faith a virtue?

§ 3. Next, it is asked concerning this which he says: Because of that which is believed, and is not a virtue, etc.

§ 4. For from this it is held that unformed faith is not a virtue: and this seems to be proved in the Letter.

§ 5. It can also be proved by reason thus: because 1. A dead human is not a human: but unformed faith is dead: therefore it is not faith.

§ 6. 2. Likewise, Nothing unformed in a certain species is named by the name of the species or genus of that form, unless it possesses the form of another species of the same genus, by reason of which it receives the predication of the genus: but unformed faith is unformed by the form of the species of faith, and it does not possess the form of another species of virtue by which it receives the predication of the genus: therefore unformed faith cannot be called a virtue. The proof of the major is from this, that there is no order to a genus except through a species and the difference by which it proceeds from the genus. The second, however, is evident per se: because faith is not called unformed except from a lack of the form of faith.

§ 7. 3. Likewise, A virtue is a good quality by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly, which God operates in us without us: but unformed faith is not such a quality: therefore it is not a virtue. The first premise is proved by the authority of Augustine. The second, however, is proved from this, that a formally good quality does not suffer along with itself a formally bad quality: but unformed faith suffers along with itself the stain of sin, which is a formally bad quality. Similarly, we clearly see that by it one does not live rightly: because many have it who do not live rightly.

§ 8. 4. Likewise, Augustine: Virtue is a quality by which one lives in the spiritual life: therefore it seems, since one does not live by unformed faith, that it is not called a virtue.

§ 9. 5. Likewise, If it is a virtue: either it is infused, or customary. If infused: either it is of those directing to the end, as the theological virtues do, or directing to that which is for the end. If you say that it is of those directing to the end: but all such virtues make one pleasing [grace]: therefore it seems that it makes one pleasing: which is absurd, because then the worst sinners would be pleasing. But if you say that it is a grace freely given, then I have the proposition: because a grace...

...freely given, qua such, is not a virtue, just as the word of wisdom, and the word of knowledge, and the working of miracles, and prophecy, and the like.

§ 10. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Virtues are defined through their acts, just as potencies are: therefore if the definition of virtue applies to it, it is a virtue. But the definition of virtue is that it is a voluntary habit in the manner of nature consenting to reason. Yet it was proved earlier that faith, because it lacks sufficient reason and art, consents only in the manner of nature: but unformed faith does this: therefore it is a virtue.

§ 11. 2. Likewise, Many virtues are common to the good and the bad: for Augustine says, and it is held in the book of the Sentences, that charity alone divides between the children of the kingdom and of perdition: therefore this is not a cause for it not being a virtue, because it can exist along with sin existing in the same subject.

§ 12. 3. Likewise, To believe what is not apparent is beyond the power of our reason: but to believe what is apparent is beneath it: therefore it belongs to another virtue than reason or intellect: and I ask, to whose? and there is no other to assign than unformed faith: therefore that which is called unformed faith is a certain virtue.

§ 13. Solution: It seems to be said here that virtue is spoken of primarily and secondarily through that definition, that virtue is called the disposition of the perfect to the optimum. For according to this mode, gratuitous virtues are called virtues primarily, and unformed ones secondarily, and lastly customary ones, because they are the most remote dispositions of their perfected subjects to the optimum. I say therefore that unformed faith is a virtue, but it does not have the complete rationale of a virtue to the same extent as formed faith, or another virtue that makes one pleasing.

§ 14. To the first, therefore, which is objected, it must be said that unformed faith is not dead in such a way that the potency for life is deprived in it, but rather from the inability of its subject for the inflow of the life of faith from God: and therefore it has the cause of its death outside itself: and therefore there still remains in it a respect to the rationale of virtue, albeit secondarily. But this is not so of a dead human, or an ass, as is per se evident to anyone.

§ 15. To the other it must be said that faith is called unformed due to the lack of the form that gives to the species the perfection of virtue, and not due to the lack of the species: because otherwise unformed faith would not be faith, which is false. But what that form is will be clear below, when it is asked, Whether it becomes formed, or not? For perfection is more properly according to the potency of attaining the end, than is perfection according to the being of the species of faith. And therefore it is clear that the species is in some way in unformed faith: and consequently the predication of the genus is verified of it.

§ 16. To the other it must be said that faith is a good quality, but it does not have the complete goodness that excludes sin: but it is called good because, as much as is of itself, it is repugnant to sin. Similarly, as much as is of itself, one lives rightly by faith.

§ 17. To the other it must be said that the spiritual life is not an act of virtue, except insofar as it is conjoined to grace: because grace is the life of the soul: and therefore this saying is understood of a virtue infused with grace.

§ 18. To the other it must be said that faith is a virtue infused by God and a gift of the Holy Spirit, according as "gift" is taken broadly for whatever is given by gift for the direction of life. And it does not follow if it is freely given, and not making pleasing, that it is not a virtue: because those graces are diverse. Hence those that have to order life to God possess the rationale of a virtue, such as servile fear, and unformed faith, and the like, even if they do not possess the rationale of the most complete virtue.

Articulus 6 — Whether Demons Believe, And Whether Their Faith Is In The Practical Or The Speculative Intellect

Do demons believe? and, Is their faith in the practical or speculative intellect?

Do demons believe? and, Is their faith in the practical or speculative intellect?

§ 19. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the same chapter C, towards the end: Another [faith] is of the demon: for the demons also believe, and tremble, etc.

§ 20. For this seems to be false: 1. For since the unformed of itself is formable, as the Master says below, it seems that it does not belong to the demons, who are in no way apt for the formation of grace.

§ 21. 2. Likewise, Unformed faith (as has also been held) is a gift of the Holy Spirit: but a gift of the Holy Spirit does not apply to demons: therefore it seems that neither does unformed faith.

§ 22. 3. Likewise, Unformed faith works in the faithful the gift of servile fear: but servile fear causes one to flee the act of sin: therefore it seems, since this does not apply to demons, that they do not have unformed faith.

§ 23. 4. Likewise, Whence would unformed faith have come to them? For before the fall they had knowledge in the Word. And this knowledge is not faith: therefore, since nothing remained of it, if they have it, it is necessary that God infused it into them after the fall: which is not probable: therefore they do not seem to have unformed faith.

§ 24. 5. Likewise, Faith is knowledge through a mirror in an enigma. But an angel, whether good or evil, knows through concreated species which it has within itself: therefore it seems that it does not have unformed faith.

§ 25. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: It is certain that they do not have knowledge in the Word: therefore they either have knowledge from reason concerning the articles of faith, or from faith. If from reason: then faith could be proved, which is absurd according to the sayings of the Saints: and this is presupposed here, because it will be proved below: therefore it remains that they have the knowledge of faith because otherwise they would know nothing of the articles to be believed, which is false.

§ 26. Likewise, Mark 1:24: What have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know who thou art, the Holy One of God. And thus it is certain that they have faith: because that voice could not proceed from the proof of reason, nor from the contemplation of the Word: therefore it is clear that it is from faith.

§ 27. By grace of this it is further asked, due to the opinions of various people, Whether their faith is in the practical (or affective) intellect, or the speculative?

§ 28. But it seems that it is in the speculative because 1. They have no affect concerning what is believed: but every habit which is in the affective intellect is affected concerning what is believed or its object: therefore their faith is in the speculative intellect alone.

§ 29. 2. Likewise, The will of God is always good: but the will of the devil is always evil, although his power is just, as Augustine says: therefore the will of the demon is never to assent to what is believed: because this is one of the best things in life: therefore he always believes coerced. But the affective intellect is not coerced, but only the speculative: therefore it seems their faith is only in the speculative intellect.

§ 30. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In the Letter, and James 2:19: The demons believe, and tremble. Therefore the motion of trembling follows the believing of the demon: but no motion follows the speculative intellect (as the Philosopher says) anymore than if we were looking at terrible things in pictures: therefore the believing of the demon is not according to the speculative intellect:

therefore it is necessary that it be according to the practical.

§ 31. 2. Likewise, the Philosopher says thus in Book III of De Anima: Neither the reasoning power nor the so-called intellect is the mover: for the speculative intellect understands nothing practical [actuale]: nor does it say anything about what is to be avoided or pursued [imitabili]. From this it is gathered that the faith by which the demons tremble is not according to the speculative intellect, as some have said.

§ 32. Solution: It must be said that the Saints expressly say that demons have faith. But I well think that that faith is not the unformed faith which humans existing in life have, but a credulity arisen from natural knowledge: for although the demons lost contemplation in the Word, they nonetheless did not lose natural knowledge, by which through the species of effects and the conjectures of operations they know God as creator, and as judge, and as the rewarder of His own. And this is what Dionysius says in the book On the Divine Names: We say that the natural gifts given to the demons have by no means been changed: but they are integral and most splendid, although they themselves do not see, closing the inspectorial powers of their own good. And therefore Augustine says here, that another [faith], that is, unformed, is of the demons: because it causes the trembling of fear, and does not abstract from the act of sin, just as the credulity of the demon does not either. Hence what is said here is said by a similitude of the act of credulity, and by a similitude of the effect: namely because it causes trembling and not the flight from sin. Hence the first reasons seem to be granted, that unformed faith is not in the demons, although there is in them a credulity similar to it in certain respects.

§ 33. To the 1, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that that knowledge which they have is not the remains of vision in the Word, just as faith is in a certain way the remains of formed faith, nor is it infused after the fall: but it is resulting from the knowledge which they have of God through experience and effect, and the sight of miracles and judgments, and natural knowledge.

§ 35. To the 1 which is further asked, it must be said that it is not in the speculative intellect: for this is impossible, that a speculated thing as speculated should move to trembling: but it is in the practical, which however has nothing of the will of the thing believed, but has a spurning of the thing believed, which however through experience it is necessary to believe: for the practical does not always speak of what is desirable, but also of what is terrible: whence even then fear and flight follow.

§ 36. And to what is objected, that according to this it seems the article can be proved: it must be said that it does not follow: because for a trembling of this sort a persuasion a posteriori is sufficient: for every practical intellect (as Avicenna says) is from probabilities, namely in those things which are done by us or around us.

§ 37. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Is The Same To Believe God, To Believe That God Is, And To Believe In God

Is it the same to believe God, to believe that God is, and to believe in God?

§ 38. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in chapter D, there, For it is one thing to believe in God, etc.

§ 39. For it seems that these three are unfittingly posited concerning the act of faith: 1. For every single virtue relates in one way to its object: therefore one does not believe God, that God is, and in God.

§ 40. 2. Likewise, Since there could still be a greater diversity, namely to believe concerning God, and toward God, just as in God, why does the Master not posit the diversity of the object of faith according to those?

§ 41. 3. Likewise, Nothing tends into another unless that is known: therefore into whatever a certain virtue tends, it is necessary that that be first shown to it: but faith opens the eyes, as Augustine says: therefore it belongs to faith to show the object of all virtues: therefore it belongs to faith not only to believe God, that God is, and in God, but also the good and the arduous, and the just debt, and the like: therefore the Master insufficiently distinguishes the object of faith here, as it seems.

§ 42. Likewise it is asked, In what do believing God, believing that God is, and believing in God differ?

§ 43. For it seems that they do not differ except in matter: because 1. To believe God is to believe to be true those things which He says: and those manifest Him to us: therefore believing God is terminated as in an end manifested to us in believing that God is.

§ 44. 2. Likewise, It seems that he unfittingly attributes believing in God to be "by believing to love": for to love belongs to charity, and not to faith: therefore it ought not to be attributed to the act of faith.

§ 45. 3. Likewise, Every lover tends into that which he loves through affect: therefore when he said, "to believe in God is by believing to love," he superfluously added, "by believing to go into Him."

§ 46. 4. Likewise, It does not belong to faith to go, as it seems, but only to direct the eyes to the way: but to hope to be extended toward the journey, and to charity to set out, as Augustine seems to hold.

§ 47. Likewise, To adhere rather belongs to hope, than to faith: because it is commonly said that it belongs to hope to adhere, and to charity to inhere.

§ 48. 5. Likewise, Every lover and one tending into God is already incorporated: therefore to the other three sayings it was not necessary to add the fourth.

§ 49. Solution: It must be said that in truth "to believe" is defined here in relation to the object: and it is defined according to every mode by which the object can relate itself, and according to the maximum and optimal power. For faith leans upon the First Truth: and this is taken in a sign, or in itself. And I call a sign, an expressed infallible sign, such as is a word which is known to be the Word of God. If it leans upon it in a sign: then it is to believe God, that is, to believe the truthful one who speaks, whether He speaks in Scripture, or in the heart, or in revelation, or through creatures, provided it is infallibly known to be the Word of God. But if it leans upon it in itself, either it does so such that it tends into it, and thus it is to believe in God: or such that it assents without tension, and then it is to believe that God is. Hence the optimum state of believing gathers all these together: because through words it comes to God, and through God into God.

§ 50. To the first therefore it must be said that faith is one virtue, and it has one object which is the First Truth, and one rationale which is the same Truth, and it leans upon the First Truth on account of itself: and this diversification is nothing but a difference of the object according to accidental properties, as the truth is in a sign or in its being. And another difference of these two is according to the power of faith in tending, or not tending, as is clear: and this can also be in other virtues besides charity, which cannot have a lesser power in tending, or a greater: because it never becomes unformed, but nonetheless loves God in Himself, and in a sign similar to the prime goodness.

§ 51. To the other it must be said that the preposition ad [to/toward] denotes the rationale of an end, and not the rationale of an object: and this does not apply to faith: just as it is also said that the human is ad imaginem [to the image], and not the image: but it does not denote the penetration of the believed itself by the affect of the believer.

§ 52. To the other it must be said that that proposition is indeed proposed by many, and it is most false in the whole of nature, and in all moral and customary virtues, which all tend in the manner of nature, and are more direct than any art from the efficacy of the habit itself: for a heavy body does not cognitively know the medium of its descent, and yet it tends perpendicularly by the most direct way to the center more certainly than a geometer: and similarly chastity in this that the chaste works, and justice in this that the just, it is not necessary to preratiocinate concerning just and chaste things, because without deliberation they touch the mean of innate passions according to the delectable of touch: because of which the Philosopher also says, that those who are brave and just without deliberation, possess virtue more truly than those who do so from deliberation and reason: because the first follow nothing of art, but the whole is of virtue what they do: but the second are in some way moved from art. Hence any virtue is per se certain in its object: and it is not necessary that it be shown to it.

§ 53. To the other it must be said that there is no difference of the object according to species, because thus it would diversify the virtue of faith into diverse species: but the difference is according to a property of the object, and a greater or lesser power of the virtue.

§ 54. To the other it must be said that no virtue alone can attain beatitude: hence the act of faith is defined here according as faith works through love: and then those four are so diversified, as they are the things which are required for attaining the perfection of the end: for then some are on the part of the one tending into the end, some on the part of the conjunction to the end, and some on the part of the consequent effect according to nature. On the part of the one tending there are two, of which one is the mover, such as love: and the other is the motion itself, such as to go into Him. On the part of the consequent effect is to be incorporated into His members: and this is in a certain way to become one with the end of faith. On the part of the conjunction with the end is to adhere. And through this the solution to the first is also evident: because in that believing charity is not separated from faith.

§ 55. To the other it must be said that the following does not superabound: because it differs in the believer just as the effect from the cause, and the motion from the mover.

§ 56. To the other it must be said that faith sees in a certain way: but vision is outside the thing, and not within: and therefore to adhere is attributed to it: although it could also belong to hope through expectation, but to that it rather belongs to cohere.

§ 57. To the other it must be said that although the lover is incorporated, yet prior in nature, not in time, it is necessary that he tend from love to God, who incorporates him to Himself, and adhere to Him. Otherwise it could be said if we wished, that these belong to the act of faith in itself: and then to love does not denote for faith the act of charity conjoined with its own act, but it denotes the affection of the end which is proper to every single virtue tending into its end: and by that affect to go outside oneself into the end denotes the progress of the same: but to adhere denotes the conjunction of consent, and to be incorporated denotes union with Him. But the first exposition is of the intention of the Master in the Letter.

Articulus 8 — Whether To Believe Is To Think With Assent

Is to believe to cogitate with assent?

§ 58. Next it is asked concerning this which a certain note affixed here in the Letter says: Augustine in the book On the Predestination of the Saints: To believe is itself nothing else than to cogitate with assent.

§ 59. For here the act is defined according to the substance of the act, whereas before it was determined through comparison to the object.

§ 60. It seems that it is not true: because 1. "To cogitate" [cogitare] is said as if "to agitate together" [coagitare], as Augustine seems to hold in Book IX of On the Trinity, because to cogitate (as he himself says there) is to discern a known thing from other known things: therefore to cogitate belongs only to the cogitative power: but to believe does not proceed from the cogitative alone: therefore it seems that to believe is badly defined through to cogitate.

§ 61. 2. Likewise, Faith (as was held above) is the simple light of believers: therefore it seems that to cogitate does not apply to it: because cogitation cogitates many things simultaneously.

§ 62. Likewise, Our assent in faith does not arise from our cogitation: because then it would not be a virtue, but a science, or an art: therefore it seems that it ought not to be defined through to cogitate.

§ 63. Further it is asked concerning assent: For every virtue assents to its object and proper end: therefore it is not definitional of faith alone: therefore it ought not to be posited in its definition, since those things which are posited in a definition ought to be separated from others.

§ 64. Solution: It must be said that faith has an act which belongs to it according to itself, and it has an act which belongs to it according to what is from hearing, according to what the Apostle says, Romans 10:17: Faith is from hearing: but hearing through the word of Christ. In itself according as it is a light informing the intellect, nothing belongs to it except to assent to the invisible thing shown. But according to what is from hearing, then it assents with cogitation concerning this which it heard from a reason not proving indeed, but manually leading: so however, that hearing is taken generally: as we said above concerning the sign, when believing God was being expounded, namely that it includes within itself exterior hearing through the word, and the sight of a miracle and of the works of God, and interior hearing: for hearing causes cognition. And in this way to believe is defined in two things, that it has the thing cogitated from hearing, and the assent from itself: because I well concede that it does not assent on account of the thing cogitated.

§ 65. To the first therefore it must be said that believing is essentially in assent: yet by accident, insofar as it is nourished and fostered and manually led, it relates itself to the cogitative power inquiring concerning what is believed: not because it doubts, but because it asks of God a reason for that to which it consents: not by which it may be certified, but in which it may rejoice and admire.

§ 66. To the other it must be said in the same way, that assent does not proceed because it cogitates, but rather from this proceeds admirable rejoicing: as Augustine says of himself in the book of the Confessions: I was not satiated in those days for the wondrous sweetness to consider the altitude of the divine counsel concerning the salvation of the human race.

§ 67. To that which is objected concerning assent, it must be said that assent is of the true as true, properly speaking: and therefore the other virtues do not properly have assent, but rest in the end: because they do not consider the true as the First Truth.

Articulus 9 — Whether Unformed Faith Becomes Formed

Does unformed faith become formed?

§ 68. Next it is asked concerning this which he says in the following chapter H, there, But if it is asked, Whether that unformed quality, etc.

§ 69. For here the Master says that unformed faith becomes formed: and concerning this there are diverse opinions of the Masters: and therefore here the disputation must be more strongly insisted upon, so that we may ask three things. The first is, Whether unformed faith becomes formed, or not? The second is, Whether it is formed by a proper form, or by charity, or by grace: because all these have been said by diverse people. The third, How is it diversely formed by a proper form, and by charity, and by grace?

§ 70. To the first of these it is proceeded thus: 1. In natures if a certain potency is toward an act in a subject, but is not expedited, nature does not evacuate it, but perfects it to the act by directing there spirits and the other things informing that potency: therefore it is similarly in grace, which is no less ingenious than nature. But it is certain that unformed faith is a virtue which can assent to all the articles: therefore advancing grace will give it nothing but to tend into what is believed, and does not evacuate it, as it seems.

§ 71. 2. Likewise, Nature always operates by the shortest way: because it neither abounds in superfluous things, nor is deficient in necessary things, as the Philosopher says. Therefore much more does grace, which in all ways is more ordered than nature: but it is shorter to inform that which already is, than to create a thing to be informed, and afterwards to inform the created thing: therefore it seems that grace proceeds in this way: therefore it informs unformed faith.

§ 72. 3. Likewise, Every unformed thing is formable: therefore unless there is an impediment from the corruption of the potency, it will of necessity be formed upon the advancing of the form: but here there is no impediment unless the human dies, for as long as he is on the way, he is possible toward grace: therefore his faith is formable by grace.

§ 73. 4. Likewise, Why would unformed faith be destroyed upon the advancing of grace? for either this would be from the contrariety of its cause: or from the contrariety of itself to grace. If it should happen in the first way, just as we see a white thing destroyed in a bright surface upon the advancing of heat, because the cold containing and causing the whiteness departs: therefore it seems that unformed and formed faith are from opposite causes, which is false, since both are caused by God and are a gift of the Holy Spirit. But if it had contrariety from itself: then the gifts of God would be contrary to each other, and virtue to virtue, which cannot be.

§ 74. 5. Likewise, A grace freely given and a grace making pleasing are less distant than a natural or customary virtue and a grace making pleasing: but an advancing grace (as many say) does not destroy a natural virtue, but perfects and orders it: therefore much less does it evacuate a grace freely given, which is faith.

§ 75. Likewise, There is lesser diversity of a grace freely given ordered to the same act with the making pleasing, than of a freely given not ordered to the same act: but an advancing grace does not evacuate freely given ones, such as wisdom, knowledge, prophecy, which are not ordered to the same act with it: therefore much more does it not evacuate unformed faith which is to the same act.

§ 76. 6. Likewise, On the part of the act and the object there is no repugnance: because believing that God is and believing God are saved, and believing in God: therefore it seems that the habit of unformed faith is saved in the habit of formed faith.

§ 77. 8. Likewise, Before the fall someone had formed faith. But it is certain that through the fall he did not merit any gift of God: therefore it seems that no other faith is infused into him than before, but only the form of that is taken away: therefore it can be restored without the restitution of unformed faith.

§ 78. Likewise, It would be ridiculous that someone should have as many new faiths as times he had fallen: and yet this would be necessary, if we were to say that the same which was unformed cannot become formed.

§ 79. If perchance you say that it is evacuated like a lesser light by a greater: this is nothing: because a lesser light conjoined to another greater one is not evacuated by it, just as one ray of the sun is not evacuated by many other rays, nor is the light of one candle evacuated by the light of another candle united to it: but unformed faith on the part of the efficient, and on the part of the object is a light of the same rationale with formed faith: therefore it is not evacuated by the light of formed faith.

§ 80. 9. Likewise, If the sun could separately infuse light, and heat: and first infuse light, afterwards by infusing heat, it would not take away the infused light, so that afterwards it would infuse both, but rather it would place heat over the light: therefore it seems that the First Truth does similarly, and first infuses light, and afterwards informs it through affect.

§ But against this it is objected as follows: 1. Sanctifying grace does the same thing in one subject as it does in another. But in someone who had nothing of faith, it confers the fullness of all virtues. Therefore, since it is not more deficient in someone who had unformed faith, it seems to confer the whole [virtue] upon him as well. Therefore, it seems that it does not form the preceding [unformed faith], but rather confers the whole.

§ 2. Also, if a soul were infused into a body that previously had some operation of the soul, the soul would nonetheless be infused into that body with all its powers, even though another power for the same act had previously been in it, because the soul could not be divided such that on account of this one power would be separated from it. Therefore, it seems that it is similar in the case of grace, which is like a certain whole with respect to all the virtues, that nothing is separable from it on the basis that it finds an unformed virtue already there. Since therefore nothing superfluous remains, it seems that unformed faith is evacuated.

§ 3. Also, servile fear does not remain when charity arrives, because perfect charity casts out fear. Therefore, similarly, its cause is also expelled, namely unformed faith.

§ 4. Also, a dead work is not vivified when charity arrives, but perishes, and a new grace for acting is given. Therefore, it seems that similarly dead faith is not vivified either.

§ 5. Also, when it is said, "Formed faith is a virtue": either this is predicated essentially [per se] or accidentally. If essentially, it seems that the whole species is supposed by formed faith, because a genus is not predicated essentially of a subject with an added form. But if it were not essentially predicated, then it seems it would only be predicated accidentally, and this is unacceptable, because everyone says the opposite.

§ 6. Also, one accident is not made from two accidents, nor can there be a composition between them unless one is like a genus and the other like a difference. Therefore, since unformed faith is a certain habit, and formed faith is also a habit, it seems that one habit is not made from them. Therefore, it is not formed by it.

§ Solution: I think it must be said here with the Master that what is unformed becomes formed through the arrival of grace and charity. And therefore, the first arguments seem to me to be conceded.

§ As to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that sanctifying grace, insofar as it is of itself, does in one what it does in another, but it is not so on the part of the subject. For in some it perfects the natural virtues of those who have them; in some it does not, who do not have them. And in some it removes sin, and in some it does not. So it also happens to it in some to form unformed faith, while in others to infuse the whole of faith. And this is not due to its own deficiency, but due to the different disposition of the subject.

§ To the next it must be said that if a soul were infused into some body, it would be infused wholly; because the power that was previously in the body could only be rooted in the body's complexion, and thus it would not be unifiable to the soul, just as the corporeal is not made essentially one with the spiritual. But unformed and formed faith, according to their cause, are from the same efficient principle, namely God, and therefore they are unifiable. And therefore, there is no similarity between grace with its parts and the soul with its parts.

§ To the next it must be said that I say the same thing concerning servile fear: for it is not evacuated insofar as it is fear, but only insofar as it is servile. Hence it is properly the servility that is expelled, not the fear. And so I also say that the unformedness of faith is removed, but not faith itself; just as in the homeland [heaven], the substance of faith is not removed, namely the vision of truth, but rather the form of faith in act, which is to see through a glass and in a riddle.

§ To the next it must be said that there is no similarity with a dead work: because this is not from a living cause, but from free choice which lies dead in sins. But faith is from the First Truth, which cannot die, and it does not die essentially and in itself, but rather from the defect of another.

§ To the next it must be said that the predication is essential [per se] when it is said, "Formed faith is a virtue," and a perfect species of virtue is supposed. And when it is said, "Unformed faith is a virtue," the predication is by posteriority, as was explained above.

§ To the next it must be said that that proposition is false both in rational things and in nature. In rational things it is clear that a habit is made from the disposition of one act and from the disposition of another; for no reason can be assigned as to why one act should leave a disposition while another merely confirms it. In nature it is also false; because light at the extremity of the transparent becomes one with the color existing in act, according to what the Philosopher says, that color is the extremity of the transparent in a determinate body. But it is true that one is always related as potency to the other, and the other as act. And so I say here that unformed faith is as a potency, and formed faith is as its act, for the purpose that it might be able to tend toward the end and be conjoined to the end, which it could not do before.

§ But because many great thinkers maintain that opinion, one can also respond on their behalf to the opposite arguments first introduced: so that it might be said to the first, that there is not complete similarity in nature and in grace. Because in nature, natural potencies are rooted in diverse principles, especially corporeal virtues; and therefore, while those principles exist, the virtues remain, even if they are sometimes impeded. But in grace, all virtues have one thing in which they are as in their virtual whole, which is grace, and when it is removed, all are subtracted, and when it is posited, all are posited. And this is due to the perfection of grace, and the connection of virtues in grace.

§ To the next it must be said that this is the shortest way of justification, that the whole be infused at once, and that which does not cause justification be removed.

§ To the next it must be said that an unformed virtue is not called unformed because it is unformable, but rather from the privation of the form which is grace, and the privation of potency for the form. And if it is asked, "What is the impediment?" it can be said that it is its own imperfection, by reason of which it is not unifiable with perfect grace, just as a ray of fire is not united to a ray of the sun, but is evacuated by it.

§ To the next it must be said that unformed faith is destroyed as not unifiable to grace. And therefore, just as the light of the sun, being unifiable to that to which the light of fire is united, excludes it, so formed faith excludes unformed faith from the same subject. Nevertheless, there are some of that opinion who say that it remains with formed faith, and not superfluously; because it contributes to making the intellect go forth more easily into the act of believing.

§ And consequently they say similarly: because some of them say that natural things remain along with gratuitous things; and some say that by reason of imperfection they are absorbed: just as two qualities successively existing in a body according to the same thing, if they are of the same species, one is absorbed by the other.

§ To the next it must be said that although on the part of the act and the object there is no repugnance, nevertheless there is imperfection in the one. And therefore, it cannot stand with the perfect light supervening. Or, as others say, it stands with it towards the same thing, yet otherwise ordered: because unformed faith believes God [to be] and believes God [His words], whereas formed faith believes in God.

§ To the next it must be said that it is not absurd for the good habit of unformed faith to be created so many times: not that this fallen person merits it, but because God is supremely merciful, and He gives gifts even to the wicked by which they might be able to return to Him if they wish. Or, as others say, it always remains the same, and is not removed through sin, just as neither are other gratuitously given virtues, nor customary ones.

§ To the next it must be said that unformed faith does not have complete equivocation with formed faith, and therefore it can be evacuated by it. Or, as others say, both remain.

§ To the last it must be said that there is no similarity with the light and heat of the sun: because these are divided in effect, but it is not so with grace and faith. Hence, grace infuses nothing of virtue unless it gives the whole; and if it gives the whole, it does not need another. And therefore it evacuates what is imperfect. Or let it be conceded that it remains with formed faith.

§ Although it could be solved in this way, nevertheless it is apparent enough in these very solutions that the first opinion is sounder.

Articulus 10 — By Which Form Faith Is Formed

By what form is faith formed?

§ Secondly, it is asked: By what form is faith formed?

§ It seems that it is by grace: because 1. It needs nothing except that, according to a pleasing being [esse gratum], it tend toward the believed object. But grace does this. Therefore, grace forms it.

§ 2. Also, it needs nothing except that it merit, for it believes all the things that formed faith believes, but it does not merit. But grace operates toward merit. Therefore, grace forms it.

§ 3. On the contrary, it seems that charity forms it: because it seems to say so in the Text.

§ 4. Also, it was established above that charity is the mother of all virtues. Therefore, also of faith.

§ 5. Also, it belongs to that to form which never becomes unformed. But this is charity. Therefore, it belongs to charity to form.

§ BUT AGAINST THIS: 1. Form gives being and intelligible nature [rationem] to a species. Therefore, charity does not form faith; because otherwise faith would be charity, which is false.

§ 2. Also, whatever is divided disparately with another species under the same genus, that is not its form, but an opposite species. But charity and faith are divided disparately under the genus of theological virtue. Therefore, charity is not its form, but an opposite species.

§ It is similarly proven that grace, in that it is grace, does not form. For nothing that is the same in intelligible nature and is found in many species of a certain genus is the form giving being to any one of them. But grace is found according to one intelligible nature in many species of virtue. Therefore, it is not the form of any of them. The first premise is proven by the fact that things are distinguished from one another by their forms. The second premise by the fact that it belongs to grace to make pleasing [gratum facere], and as to this it is equally in all virtues. Therefore, grace is not the form of faith.

§ Solution: In my judgment, faith is formed by its proper form, just as any other virtue. And if you ask: What is that form? I say that it is a light forming the affective intellect according to its tending toward the end, and that is formal with respect to the habit assenting to God. For as it is in the habit, so it is in the act. Now, in the act, the act of faith is to assent to the First Truth for its own sake and above all things; to which, however, when "tending into that to which it assents" is added, no material thing is added, but upon that which is the act there is placed a perfection resulting from the attainment of the end to which the act is directed. And that is the perfection of the form, insofar as the end is the form, and this form is principally in morals and virtues. Therefore, it will also be so in the habit, that to the light there is added a light conjoining the intellect of the believer to the truth which he believes.

§ Therefore, to what is first objected, it must be said that it is not sufficient for it to be pleasing in itself, but there must be something specified by reason of which it tends into the First Truth, as it is the First Truth.

§ To the next it must be said that it is not true that it only needs to merit: on the contrary, there must be something specifying the habit, which ought to elicit meritorious acts in this virtue that are not elicited by another.

§ To what is objected about charity, it must be said that charity is not the form giving being, but rather giving well-being [bene esse], as will be evident below.

§ To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if it is the mother, that it is the form giving being: because it is called mother from the fact that in the bowels of charity the virtues are formed as to a certain kind of being, and not absolutely.

§ To the next it must be said that charity is not rendered unformed; but it does not from this possess the ability to form as to being, but as to well-being; because it is impossible for multiple things differing in species not to have diverse forms.

Articulus 11 — How Diversely Faith Is Informed By Its Proper Form, And By Grace, And By Charity

How diversely is faith formed by its proper form, and by grace, and by charity?

§ Thirdly it is asked: How is faith diversely formed by its proper form, and charity, and grace?

§ For there is only a twofold being, namely substantial, and accidental, which is well-being. Therefore, it seems that there ought to be only a twofold form, and not a threefold one.

§ Solution: It must be said that in faith there are three things, namely that which is proper to faith; and the relation of its act to merit, namely that it avails for eternal life; and the relation of faith to common perfection, and the cause of all our works. And as to the first, faith needs its proper form which gives it being in its species. As to the second, it needs grace; because grace makes the one having it pleasing, and renders his work pleasing. And as to the third, it needs charity; because charity is the bond of perfection, because all works are directed toward the supreme goodness, which is the object and end of charity. Moreover, it is called mother insofar as it is, as it were, impregnated by conceiving all things in its bowels: because the charity by which we love God is the cause of all the works and virtues by which we worship Him. And thus, in a certain way, all are born from charity.

Articulus 12 — Whether Faith Is One Or Different According To The Things To Be Believed, As Science According To The Knowable Things

Is faith one, or differentiating according to believable things, just as science differentiates according to knowable things?

§ Next it is asked concerning chapter F, there, And since faith is spoken of in diverse ways, etc.

§ For it seems that faith is not one. 1. For since a certain science is faith, or is not without science, and science differentiates according to knowable things: it seems also that faith differentiates according to believable things. But believable things are many, because the articles are the believable things, which are twelve, or fourteen according to the different divisions of the Creeds: [therefore] faith is not one.

§ 2. Also, wisdom and science are distinguished from one another, because one is concerning eternal things, the other concerning temporal things. Therefore, in the same way, faith concerning temporal things differs from that which is concerning eternal things. But it is concerning eternal and temporal things, as is said in the Text. Therefore, it is diverse.

§ 3. Also, fear, which is with respect to eternal punishments, differs from the love which is concerning eternal good, and hope which is concerning eternal goods. Therefore, faith also, which is with respect to those articles that are concerning eternal punishments, differs from that faith which is concerning [eternal goods], etc. And thus again faith is diverse, and not one.

§ 4. But if you were to say that faith is in the affection of the will more than in cognition, and is not diversified as science is: this is nothing. Because even wills differ according to the things willed. Therefore, faith tending toward one article is not faith tending toward another, as it seems.

§ BUT AGAINST THIS: In all the articles, the First Truth is supposed as the essential and final believed object. But this is one in all the articles. Therefore, faith is as well.

§ Furthermore, it is asked concerning what he says, that the faith by which one believes is one in genus, and not in species. For it seems to be one in species: because it does not differ in me and in you through a difference of species, but rather only through matter.

§ Solution: It must be said that faith, taken according to the intelligible nature and first subject of the believed object, is numerically one: because there is one reason for believing in all the articles, namely the First Truth, and this is abstracted from every article. For I do not believe that Christ suffered because He suffered, but because of the First Truth, and so with the others. Now, the first object of faith is one, namely the believed object, namely the First Truth about which faith is concerned in every believed thing. But the subject as contracted and specified by the matter of the article is not one, but rather in this way there are twelve, or fourteen. Thus the solution to the first is evident.

§ To the next it must be said that there is no similarity: because science receives its intelligible nature from the consideration of temporal law, and wisdom from the consideration of eternal principles. And therefore wisdom and science differ, as the temporal and the eternal. But the believed object of faith is not concerning the temporal as it is temporal, but as it is the matter of the eternal and of the First Truth; and therefore it does not receive from it a difference in species.

§ To the next it must be said that fear consists in a simple fleeing affection, and hope in eternal things: because fear receives its intelligible nature from punishment insofar as it is an evil, and therefore it is opposed to hope which is concerning the eternal insofar as it is a good or unfailing. But faith is not concerning punishments as punishments are evil, but rather as they are subject to the First Truth. And therefore in this respect the articles regarding eternal punishment do not differ from the article in which eternal glory is believed, because both are the First Truth believed. And therefore what is introduced is not similar.

§ To the next it must be said that even if faith is called an affection, nevertheless it will not be said to be diversified: because it does not tend into diverse things by the intelligible nature of diverse things, but by the intelligible nature of the one thing that underlies them all, which is the First Truth.

§ To the next it must be said that he calls a "genus" here that which is predicated of multiple things differing in species, such that material species are taken on the part of the multitude of articles. Some have said that it is one in genus, that is, in generation. Or it may be said that by reason of states it is called one in genus: because a state diversifies as to species the articles taken in enunciations, even if they are not taken as one in reality, as if it is said that Christ is incarnated, and that Christ is to be incarnated, and so concerning the others.

Articulus 13 — Whether Faith Is Of Things Not Apparent

Is faith concerning non-apparent things?

§ Next it is asked concerning what he says in this chapter G, there, It is also to be noted, that faith properly, etc.

§ Here he shows that faith is concerning non-apparent things.

§ And it seems that it is not: because 1. One article is that God is one, and another is that God is the creator of heaven and earth. And these can be proven by reason, just as we brought forward arguments for this in the first book of the Sentences. Therefore, it seems that it is concerning some things apparent to reason.

§ 2. Also, the disciples saw Christ suffer, and the same men believed. Therefore, they believed even that which was apparent to the eyes.

§ 3. Also, that which has an evident sign of its truth is said to be apparent, even if a necessary cause is not seen: because otherwise all topical [dialectical] matters would be non-apparent. Since therefore the resurrection had an evident sign, namely the apparitions that were made to the disciples, certain articles seem to be apparent to reason.

§ 4. If perhaps you were to say that it is said to be concerning non-apparent things according to the things that in reality will be apparent in the future: this is nothing. Because according to this, faith would only be concerning future things, and not concerning past and present things.

§ 5. Also, faith seems contrary to a sophism. For a sophism is concerning apparent and non-existent things, while faith is concerning non-apparent and certitudinally existent things. Since therefore a sophism has the reason for its appearance, but not for its existence, it seems that faith ought to have some reasons for its existence, but not for its appearance.

§ Solution: It must be said that faith is concerning non-apparent things to the intellect, because they cannot be proven. And the cause of this was stated in the first book of the Sentences, since we suppose among ourselves certain principles by which we receive science, which are contrary to the articles of faith. Such is the following: Everything that is entirely disposed in one way, and in which there is no variation of essence, intelligence, or will, nor cause of variation: if it moves or acts, it always acts. Yet we nevertheless believe that He began to create just now, and not before this. Also: That which is of one simple nature according to reason and being, and is not multiplied accidentally, nor distinctly by substantial form, can only be one hypostasis. Also: That of two natures differing in species and genus, preserved on both sides in being and properties, there cannot be one hypostasis. Also: That from pure nothing into some being there is no mutation. Also: That every mutation supposes and leaves behind matter as such. And therefore, in every article, the fantastical intellect must be taken captive to the obedience of Christ.

§ Therefore, to the first it must be said, as was stated in the third distinction of the first book of the Sentences, that the reason proving that God is and that He is one, does not show anything except the fact that He is, and not what He is. Moreover, although through faith we cannot entirely grasp what God is, because He alone is the perfect contemplator of Himself, nevertheless we approach more than reason leads us, saying even what sort of one God is, and what sort of substance: namely that His unity does not contradict a plurality of persons, and that His substance remaining indistinct encloses distinct hypostases within itself. And it is impossible to prove these things. And therefore, in this way faith is about God, that He is a substance, and that He is one; and not in that way by which it is concluded that He is God, and a substance, and one.

§ To the next it is solved in the Text by Gregory, that the disciples saw one thing, and believed another: because that a man suffered is not an article of faith, but that God suffered. And this could not be proven.

§ To the next it must be said that a sign is twofold: namely, that which is taken from the nature of the thing to be proven, even if it is not its immediate cause; and this sign makes for a topical opinion. The other is a persuasive sign by way of a miracle, the reason of which we cannot reach from ourselves; and this leads by the hand to faith, just as the apparition is a sign of the resurrection, and one was as hidden from reason as the other. And through such a thing faith is well proven. But on account of that proof, it is not made to be concerning apparent things: because both the proving reason and the proven conclusion are concerning non-apparent things, because we cannot reach either from reason.

§ To the next it must be said that that solution is not valid.

§ To the next it must be said that faith is well contrary to a sophism, and excludes it, but it cannot have the reason for its existence: because every reason is apparent. And if it had a reason, it would be concerning apparent things, and thus the merit of faith would be evacuated, which cannot be.

§ But if you object, saying that the Doctors of our time adduce many reasons to prove the things we believe: I say that those reasons are founded upon principles supposed by faith, and not upon sophistic (or alternatively, physical) principles, because faith by its profundity exceeds all sciences. And therefore it seeks for itself proper principles from which it may be proven. And because the principles are non-apparent, faith is not made to be concerning apparent things on account of those reasons.

Articulus 14 — Whether The Division Of The Things That Are Seen Is Good

Is the division of the things that are seen good?

§ Next it is asked concerning what Augustine says, there, Each one sees faith itself, etc.

§ For here a certain division is given of the things that are seen, which contains six members. The first of these is of things which are by their essence in the soul. The second, however, is of things which are seen in sensible species when matter is present. The third, of things which are seen through memory retaining the images of absent corporeal things. The fourth is of things which we do not see, but form them by cogitation from the things which we do see. The fifth is of things which we know from similarity, as the soul of another from nature. The sixth is of things which we learn through motion and effect.

1. Those things which are by their essence in the soul are not in it in one way. For God is in the soul by essence in one way, the soul itself or the intellect in another, and the virtues in another. Therefore, it seems that the first mode is insufficient.

§ 2. Also, since interior vision is concerning things heard, smelled, tasted, and touched through images: why is it called here by Augustine interior vision rather than interior hearing, or smelling, or touching, or tasting?

§ 3. Also, it seems not to be true what he says in the third mode: because, as Avicenna and Algazel say, the treasury of imaginable forms differs from the treasury of particular intentions. And the treasury of imaginable forms is the imagination, and not the memory; whereas the treasury of particular intentions is the memory, not the imagination. Therefore, the images by which we cogitate absent things, we do not hold in memory, but in imagination.

§ 4. Also, the fourth mode seems to be doubtful, namely, Things which we do not see, and from those which we see we form a cogitation in some way, and commend them to memory. For this can happen in three ways. Namely, things which we do not see as a whole, but we see in part, and we form a cogitation by inventing, such as a goat-stag, a buck-deer, or a chimera. And this will perhaps be of the imagination composing and dividing images. Or, things which we do not see, namely those whose species are not sensible, but are intentions elicited from sensible things, yet not separated from the appendages of matter. Just as a sheep seeing a wolf elicits that it is an enemy, and flees; and a man seeing fire elicits that it is harmful, and fears; and this belongs to the sensible estimative power. Or thus, that there are certain things we do not see in their proper and essentially sensible species, but accidentally, by separating their intelligible natures from all matter and appendages of matter through cogitation. Just as, seeing this white or curly thing, we understand 'man', and we receive the universal from the particular and sensible. Therefore, it seems that Augustine ought to have divided this.

§ 5. Also, Cicero in his Rhetoric says that we often see a contrary from its contrary. And Aristotle says the same thing in a certain chapter of On Memory and Recollection. Therefore, it seems that he ought to have posited that mode outside of this one, which says that we know the similar from the similar.

§ 6. Also, in the last he seems to say nothing: because we do not know a man by proper cogita-tion from his motions, but rather from his proper form. Therefore, it seems that this sixth mode does not have a proper knowable object.

§ But if you were to say that Augustine's example is not 'man', but 'animal', as some books have it: then it seems that he says nothing in the fifth mode, where he supposes that the soul sees itself, and from itself knows the soul of another.

§ Solution: It must be said that these modes of vision are good. But because Augustine does not intend to distinguish visions in every way, but only to give examples of certain general modes; therefore he does not subdivide the general modes. And therefore I well concede that the first and fourth are subdivided, as the objections prove. Now the rationale of Augustine's division is this: Everything that is seen, is either seen through its proper species, or in the species of another. But if it is seen through its proper species, either its species itself is its essence, such that to be seen and to be by essence in the seer is the same thing; or its species is only an intention of the thing seen, and is not its essence. If in the first way: then it is the first mode. If in the second way: either it is with the presence of matter, as sensible vision happens, and then it is the second mode; or it is without its presence, and then it is the third mode. But if it is not seen in its proper species: either it is seen in that which results from proper species per se, or what results from them through comparison to another. If in the first way: then it is the fourth mode in its threefold diversity, as is evident in the objections; because the objection teaches the art of receiving those modes. If in the second way: either it is a comparison of species from which the seen intention results according to the comparison of the caused to the cause, and then it is the last mode: because we receive a certain cause which cannot be known through its proper species, but through the species of its effect and work, as a mover through motion, and the like; or it is according to the collation of similar and proportionable things, and thus it is the fifth mode understood generally.

§ For to the first it must be said that the things which are by their essence in the soul: either they are of the substance of the soul in a certain way, such as the soul itself and its powers; or they are gliding into it through the substance of the soul, like God; or they form it in its powers, like habits.

§ To the next it must be said that interior vision is called "vision" rather than the act of another sense for a twofold reason. One of these is touched upon by the Philosopher, namely that sight is more immaterial, and considers more differences, and is therefore more fitting to formal interior powers. And therefore it is also higher in the head of man, who has the senses completely; and it has a more lucid sensible spirit, which runs down through the optic nerves. Although in certain other animals hearing is higher, as in the horse, and the lion, and in almost all quadrupeds. But in flying animals it is like in man as to hearing and sight; but not as to smell, because that in flying animals is higher than hearing: to inquire into the cause of which belongs to another inquiry. Another cause can be that the acts of the other senses are not fulfilled without acting upon corporeal matter, and corporeally, not spiritually. As is clear in hearing according to act, because it is not fulfilled without a percussion reaching the fracturing of the air, as the Philosopher says. Odor, moreover, is not fulfilled without a fuming evaporation. And concerning taste and touch it is self-evident. And therefore the Commentator says that visible species are in the medium according to spiritual being, whereas the species of the others are through material being. And therefore again the name of sight is more fitting to interior powers than the name of another sense.

§ To the next it must be said that Augustine here calls "memory" in a general way every treasury, whether it contains the images of the common sense, or the intentions of the estimative power, or even intelligible principles. Because he himself does not intend to distinguish the powers of the soul, but only to show diverse visions through examples, so that the first might be proven to be the most certain.

To another, the solution is clear through the things said before.

To another, it must be said that seeing the contrary in the contrary does not make a proper genus of vision, which cannot be seen in another way and more properly: and Augustine intends here only such things which have some certain vision, as he proves from the very degrees of visions, that the first genus of visions is most certain.

To another, it must be said that Augustine intends a special genus of visions, namely of those in whose substance we cannot [know], except by the species of their work or effect: and therefore he does not subject man there, except as a material and common example, and he intends at the same time those things which we know through works, and not otherwise, like the virtue of sapphire through shining gold, and the virtue of the magnet through the attraction of iron, and the mover of the heavens through the motion of the stars.

Articulus 15 — Whether Someone Can Know With The Most Certain Knowledge Whether He Is Worthy Of Eternal Life, Or Not

Whether someone can know with most certain knowledge whether he is worthy of eternal life, or not?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, around the middle: Faith does not thus appear in the heart in which it is, from him whose it is, but he holds it with most certain knowledge, etc.

For this does not seem to be true: because it has been proven that whoever has one virtue, has all: therefore, if I see myself having all virtues, thus with most certain knowledge I know myself to be worthy of eternal life: which is against Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred. Again, the Apostle: I am not conscious to myself of anything, yet I am not hereby justified. Also, in Proverbs: There is a way that seems right to a man, but its end leads to death. Also, Job 3:23: To a man whose way is hidden, and God has surrounded him with darkness. And there the Gloss of Gregory says that the chief cause of weeping for holy men is because they do not know about their state, whether it pleases or displeases God.

To this some have said that indeed faith is seen in the heart: but it is not known whether it is given gratuitously or makes one pleasing: and therefore it is not known whether thus all are had. But this solution is remarkable: because the same objection is made concerning grace that makes one pleasing: for this is only in the soul by essence, if it is. Therefore, it is seen by itself: therefore, with most certain knowledge it knows itself to be in grace that makes one pleasing, which is evident to all to be false.

But if you say that it is understood only concerning faith: this is nothing: because in the original, namely in book VIII of On the Trinity, Augustine gives an example of faith, of justice, of charity, of temperance. Therefore, it is evident that that solution is nothing: because Augustine understands concerning all things which are in the soul by essence.

Therefore, others have said that in truth a man indeed knows according to the present state whether he is worthy of hatred or love: but he does not know whether he will persevere, or not: and thus the aforementioned authorities are understood. But this solution again cannot stand: because everyone would know with most certain knowledge whether he is in grace, or not: and it would be more certain to him about the state of grace than about the state of what he sees before the eyes of the body: and this his own conscience says to each one to be false.

Therefore, it seems to me to hold the way of some, that according to Augustine, to know is one thing which is converted with to be aware: and to know is another thing which is from discretion and thought. For Augustine says in the place from which this authority is drawn, that to be aware is nothing other than to hold the knowledge of a thing with oneself: but to think is to discern a known thing from other known things.

Therefore, it is said that there is a twofold certainty, namely the certainty of awareness: and this is stronger and better, the better and more nobly the knowledge of a thing is held with oneself: and thus nothing is so certain as those things which are in the soul by essence: but those have degrees among themselves, as has been said. Another is the certainty of discriminative knowledge of one from another: and this is done in the consideration of the proper differences of a thing according to act: and with this certainty it is more certain whose differences and properties of nature are more investigated.

But if you object by distinguishing, that if faith and other virtues are in the soul, that the soul can turn upon them when it wills, and see, and discern: because nothing is required for understanding according to act, except the assimilation of the intellect: and it is well assimilated to that which it has with itself by essence. I respond, that Augustine raises a similar question about the soul, since it is present to itself, why does it seek itself? And I say, that this is because the intellect in this life is joined to phantasms, and it does not receive except from a phantasm, and it cannot separate such from itself: and therefore if it ought to discern a thing and know discretively, it is necessary that it receives another knowledge of the same, which it essentially has with itself, from a phantasm: and thus it learns to discern faith through works, of faith, and through matter: and in this way it is true, that the soul cannot turn upon everything which it has with itself, and the cause of this has been said: but it can only turn upon that which it receives through invention, or discriminative teaching of one from another, and not upon others, except imperfectly, because it has the knowledge of those only in the universal habit of confused principles, not able to conclude the knowable, unless it is determined to particulars and specials accepted through discipline. And this is what Boethius says in book V of The Consolation of Philosophy, concerning the human intellect, placing verses which are extracted from the sentence of Augustine:

Whether when it saw another mind, It knew equally the highest and the singular: Now hidden by the cloud of limbs, It is not entirely forgetful of itself, It holds the highest, losing the singular. Therefore, whoever seeks the truth, Is in neither state: for he neither knows, Nor yet is entirely ignorant of all things. But retaining the highest which he remembers, He consults deeply, retracting what he has seen, So that he may be able to add the forgotten parts to the preserved.

And he calls the highest deeply seen, the knowledge clouded in the confused habit of the most universal principles, which is innate to us: because otherwise, as Augustine says, he would not know that he has found what he seeks, unless he had some knowledge of it with himself, to which he might examine the sought and found: nor would he seek, nor follow, because he cannot seek nor follow in any way the unknown: nor desire to know, because there is no desire except of that which is known in some way. And this also Aristotle wants at the end of the Posterior Analytics II.

Articulus 16 — What Conformity The Aforesaid Visions Have To The Heaven Into Which Paul Was Caught Up

What conformity do the aforementioned visions have to the heaven into which Paul was raptured?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, G, near the end: Not corporally, not imaginarily, but intellectually, etc.

For from this it seems that 1. All kinds of visions enumerated above revert to the three enumerated here.

1. Likewise, since Augustine says in book XII on Genesis literally, and it is placed in the Gloss on the words of the Apostle, II to the Corinthians, xii 1 and following, that these three kinds of visions are the triple heaven into which Paul was raptured. Therefore, it is asked, What conformity do these visions have to heaven?

Solution: It must be said to the first, that by dividing according to the modes of the visible, there are six general modes enumerated above: but by taking according to the subjects of the parts of the seeing soul, then there are only three visions enumerated here. For either it is external, and thus it is a corporeal vision through the senses: or internal, and then either corporeally, or intelligibly: and in the first way it is imaginable, but in the second way it is intellectual vision.

To the other it must be said, that I do not think that these three visions are in all ways called heaven: but they are then said to be heaven when heaven is opened in them, that is, the secrets of heaven are revealed. For this happens sometimes to the sense, as in Genesis xviii, 1 and following, where the Angels sensibly revealed to Abraham the mystery of the promised seed. And sometimes by imagination, as to Ezekiel the heavens were opened in the mystery of the animals. And intellectually, as to Daniel and Joseph, to whom the understanding of visions was revealed. And by the last alone is heaven said to be simply opened: but in the others only in a certain respect: just as in prophecy it is said simply by the last alone, and by the others not unless perhaps according to what understanding (as Damascene says) is needed in the vision.

Articulus 17 — Whether Faith Has Certitude Prior To All Cognition

Whether faith has certainty before all knowledge?

Then it is inquired concerning what Augustine says there, G, towards the end: We believe in order to know, etc.

For this seems contrary to what Augustine says in the book LXXXIII Questions, where he says that certain things are understood simultaneously and believed.

1. Likewise, if all certainty is through knowledge, then it seems that faith has no certainty before knowledge.
2. Likewise, the certainty of all knowledge is through reason; however, faith is knowledge, or not without knowledge; therefore, it seems that it does not have certainty except from reason; but it does not have reason; therefore, it does not have certainty, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY:
The foundation in any science is of great certainty; therefore, much more in divine science. However, faith is the foundation both of divine science and of life, as the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 3:11: "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Therefore, faith is most certain, because otherwise the whole would be void.

Solution: It must be said that faith is more certain than any art and demonstration, with a certain certainty. For there is a twofold certainty, namely the certainty of intellectual truth and the certainty of affective truth, or the certainty of truth which is according to piety, as the Apostle says to Titus. Certainty of intellectual truth: either it is in the first principles of that science in which that truth is, or in those demonstrated from the first principles, or from those which have received faith through the first and true principles. However, the certainty of truth which is according to piety is above reason; and therefore it does not draw certainty from the principles of reason, but rather from the light, which is similar to the first truth, which is simple, as if opening the eye to see the first truth, just as the light of the sun falling on the eye opens it to receive what is offered; and this is the certainty from the light of faith informing the conscience, and convincing through affection concerning the truth of credibility, and that one should tend towards that which is believed, even beyond the bounds of proper reason; and this is the certainty of faith: and therefore the Saint, knowing mathematical disciplines, would rather deny that a triangle has three angles equal to two right angles than deny the truth of faith.

And through this, the solution to the last two is clear.

To the first, however, it must be said that to believe is said in many ways, just as faith is. And therefore Augustine takes believing there broadly, according to which believing means any assent to any truth; for thus in disciplines, believing and understanding are simultaneous, unless perhaps understanding is called the knowledge of what is said through speech. For that understanding precedes all assent, whether in intellectual sciences or in the science which is according to piety, as it is in faith.

Articulus 18 — Whether Faith Is Well Defined By The Apostle As The Substance Of Things To Be Hoped For, The Argument Of Things Not Apparent

Whether faith is well defined by the Apostle, which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen?

Whether faith is well defined by the Apostle, which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen?

For the Apostle says: Faith is the substance of things hoped for, etc.

Here he begins to present another definition of faith and to explain it. And therefore this part is divided into two parts: in the first of which he presents the definition of faith and explains it. In the second, however, he objects against the definition, and solves it, there, 1, If it is asked, Whether this description is fitting, etc.

Here begins the first question about the definition given by the Apostle, and a question commonly disputed by all.

And it can be objected thus: 1. Every definition ought to be from prior and more known and essential things to the defined: but things hoped for as hoped for, are neither prior, nor more known, nor essential to faith: therefore it ought not to be defined by those.

1. Likewise, Nothing one in species according to the reason of definition is placed in diverse genera not placed subordinately: but faith in this definition is placed in the genus of substance and evidence, which are diverse genera, and not placed subordinately: therefore the definition errs.
2. Likewise, No one virtue is definable by a double act: but the virtue of faith here is defined by a double act: therefore it is ill-defined. The first is proved by this that the act of one virtue is unique. The second is proved by this that to make things hoped for subsist in us, and to argue about things not seen, are diverse acts even in species, as it seems.
3. Likewise, Acts are prior to powers, and prior are objects to acts according to reason, and similarly to habits: therefore if a habit is defined as a power by object or opposite, it ought to be defined by that which is its proper object: but the proper object of faith is not the hoped for: therefore it is ill-defined by that.
4. Likewise, Substance is said in many ways, as the Philosopher says in the fifth book of Metaphysics, namely matter, form, composite, genus: how then is substance taken here in this definition? If for matter: this does not seem so: because things hoped for are not all from faith as about matter, nor are all in faith as in matter. Since therefore it is not said matter in many ways, unless from which, or in which, or about which, it seems faith is not substance as matter of things hoped for. If indeed it is said as form: this is absurd: because thus faith would be the form of all things hoped for: which is false: because many things are hoped for, not one according to the reason of form, unless in as much as they are hoped for: and this reason of form they do not have from faith, but rather from hope. If indeed it is said substance as composite: then again it is evident by itself not to be true: because faith is not composite: nor as composite does it subsist under things hoped for: because then things hoped for would be in it as something is in a composite, and this is as an accident is in a subject or property, which is absurd. If indeed it is taken according to the intention of genus: then faith would be the genus of things hoped for: which again is absurd to all, because thus it would be predicated of all: therefore in no way is it the substance of things hoped for.

5. If indeed it is said, that it is called substance as it is a foundation. Against: because it is the foundation of all virtues: therefore it ought to be called the substance of all virtues, and not of things hoped for only.

6. Likewise, Charity is more perfect than hope in the spiritual edifice, of which that definition is customarily expounded: therefore it ought more to be called the substance of things to be loved, than of things to be hoped for.

1. Likewise, Since faith is about eternal punishments of which there is fear, just as about eternal rewards of which there is hope: why rather is it called of things to be hoped for, than of things to be feared?

2. Likewise, Since faith is not only about future things which are to be hoped for, but also about past and good and evil things: it seems that it does not only subsist under things to be hoped for, but also others: therefore it is insufficiently said, when it is said to be the substance of things to be hoped for.

Likewise it is asked, How is it the evidence of things not seen?

For it is said evidence, the reason of a doubtful thing making faith: and it is evident, that in this way faith is not evidence: because it is neither syllogism, nor induction, nor enthymeme, nor example.

Likewise, It is sometimes called evidence a certain collection of a brief following sentence, as Jerome makes arguments in books and letters: nor in this way is faith called evidence.

Likewise, It is also called evidence according to Boethius, the greatest proposition which confirms the habit of the argument, because it argues the mind about the certainty and habit of the induced reason: and thus again faith does not seem to be called evidence, because it confirms no place or habit. Therefore it is ill-called evidence.

1. Likewise, Since every evidence, either is reasoning, or the support of reasoning: and reason evacuates the merit of faith, as Gregory says, it seems also to oppose the reason of evidence to faith.

2. Likewise, How is it called evidence of things not seen? In no way can there be evidence of things not seen: because every evidence is apparent, and through the apparent. But articles in no way appear. Therefore of them there is no evidence.

3. Likewise, Evidence makes appear that of which it is evidence: but faith does not make the article appear: therefore it is not evidence of it, as it seems.
4. Likewise, Since faith is a certain enigmatic knowledge, it seems to be more substantial that it is evidence, than that it is substance: therefore it ought first to have been placed in the definition: therefore the order of parts in the definition is perverse.

Further it is asked: because John Damascene seems to add something to this definition, thus saying: Faith is the hypostasis of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen, the unshakable and unjudgable hope of those things which are announced to us by God, and the making of our petitions.

How then is faith said to be the unshakable and unjudgable conviction: because nothing argues the mind except by judging.

Likewise, How is it called the hope of those things which are announced, and the making of our petitions? For faith is not hope.

But here further it is asked about another definition which he gives in the following chapter saying, that faith is not inquisitive consent, as some false books have, because the truth of the letter is as appeared in another translation, faith is inquisitive and this altogether does not consent: it seems to agree with faith: because it does not inquire, nor investigate. Proof: For he says a little before Damascene: For if anyone considers how from non-being to being, and for what reason God led all things: and wants to find by natural cogitations, he does not receive: for this inquiry is animal and demonic.

Solution In my judgment it must be said to the aforementioned, that faith is not defined by the Apostle in itself considered and according to its substance, but rather according to what is considered in the subject by the effect which it produces in it. But there are two effects of it following each other; one of which is, that it shows eternal things, and thus by some consent places them in the faithful. The second, however, is, that it convinces the mind of the truth of those things: as also, the Apostle says after this definition, in Hebrews 11, 6: It is necessary for the one approaching God to believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him: as also in other credible things first we know what is proposed by speech, and afterwards the mind is argued by consent: and for the sake of the first it agrees with faith, that it is the substance of things hoped for; and for the sake of the second, that it is the evidence of things not seen, because things hoped for are not seen, as the Apostle says, in Romans 8, 24 and 25: For what a man sees, why does he hope for? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait with patience. And this is what the Doctors commonly say, that faith is defined by the Apostle, as it is the foundation in the spiritual edifice: because thus it is first according to the nature of its act, as the Master says in the Letter of the following chapter, and it subsists under all others, and places others in us, that is, it makes them to be placed.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that that reason proceeds from the essential definition, and not from that which is given by the effect in the subject consequent: because that effect is always posterior to that of which it is the effect.

To the other it must be said, that substance is not placed here as the genus of faith, but rather as a certain property found in comparison to the effect in faith. And similarly evidence is rather a certain property here, than a genus: but it is true that in comparison to the diverse mode of the subject, it is taken in this double property: for according to the affective intellect, thus to subsist in it makes things hoped for about which one is affected: but according to what it has something of cognition, thus it argues it about the consent of things not seen.

To the other it must be said, that the objection proceeds from the essential and first act: but in the definition is placed the act which is the effect, not which is the motion and substantial operation of faith. But such an act which is the effect, every virtue can have multiple, which has a subject diversified in some way, as is the affective intellect which says two things, namely that it is intellect, and that it is of affection.

To the other it must be said, that also that objection does not conclude except about the act, which is the operation of the virtue and first and proper: because to that responds the object according to reason as to vision the visible, and to faith the credible: but it does not conclude about the act which is the effect in the subject: yet the proposition that acts are prior to powers, is not generally true: but this is of another consideration.

To the other it must be said, that some say, that substance is said there as matter: but matter is said in many ways: for matter is said from the subject of matter, that is, from that which is the first subject, and thus it is said in three ways, as is evident in objecting: and matter is said the disposition which is reduced to matter, because it itself with matter is subject to form, as heat to the form of fire, and in this way they say, that faith is material substance, because according to nature it is subjected to all others in the spiritual edifice. But it can better be said, that substance is said here from the act of subsisting, and not from the nature of substance or quiddity: and then it is clear to respond: because then substance is taken from the property of the act of substance, and in no way of the four modes introduced is it called substance: but because it subsists in the spiritual edifice, in which faith founds, hope erects, piety and charity conclude the vaults.

To the other it must be said, that it founds all virtues in us: but virtues are not desired except for the sake of things hoped for, and therefore things hoped for are the end of all things which are in the spiritual edifice: and therefore rather in comparison to things hoped for faith is called the foundation.

To the other it must be said, that in this does not consist the reason of foundation, that something is more perfect, but in this that it imports the reason of the consummation of the whole life and spiritual edifice: and this is never in loving according to what is to be loved, because this is common to the way and proper, and temporal and eternal: but what is to be hoped for is always eternal, and the whole eternal falls under what is to be hoped for: and therefore rather the assignment of faith is made according to what is to be hoped for, than according to what is to be loved.

To the other it must be said, that it is about punishments not as about the end: and therefore it is not defined according to those.

And by the same it is evident the solution to the following.

To the other it must be said, that evidence is placed in the definition of faith by similarity to evidence which is called principle. Proof. Thus says a certain John the Bishop: Faith places the faithful in truth, as the immobile principle of the highest truth. But the difference is, that the principle of science argues the mind by the light of the composition of terms, but faith by the simple light which informs the conscience or intellect: because otherwise it would not be a virtue, but an art, as was said above.

And by this it is evident the solution to that which is objected against about the evidence, which is the greatest proposition according to truth, and this is not faith.

To the other it must be said, that evidence which consists in the complexion and course of one into another, is the foundation of reason: but in this way faith is not called evidence, but in the aforementioned way: and therefore the objection holds.

To the other it must be said, that there can be no evidence of things not seen to reason, which is through the course of reasoning: but evidence which is the light of infused truth, can be of things not seen to reason, because in it they begin to appear, as articles appear in faith, although they do not appear in species.

To the other it must be said, that it is false that faith in no way makes the article appear: rather it makes to see the credible and believed in a mirror and enigmatically, and to assent to that which is thus seen.

To the other it must be said, that the parts of that definition are not ordered according to what are more substantial to faith, but rather according to what follow each other, not in time, but in nature in the subject. But first in nature on the part of the subject is to be placed in us what is to be hoped for, than to assent by the conjunction of conscience: as it is first to understand indeed what is said by speech, than to assent to it by belief.

To the last which is further asked about the definition of John Damascene, it must be said, that in truth, as Augustine says, Faith is the light leading to the first truth, and it is called unjudgable, because it cannot be discussed by the judgment of reason: and it is called unshakable light, because it does not consist in the course of reason, because every such course is in some way distant, as the more known is distant from the less by the whole. But faith is a light not distant from the truth to which it leads: because it subjects it as the subject about which it is, and the end for which it is, and the exemplar to whose likeness the soul is impressed.

To the other it must be said, that faith is not called hope essentially, but by cause because it makes some certainty of hope, and opens the eyes to that which is to be hoped for and petitioned: and therefore the predication is by cause.

To that which is further asked about another definition, it must be said that another translation has, inquisitive consent, that is, not sought, so that the preposition in comes privatively: whence the translator in another letter which he places, explains, that is, not searched: and thus the objection ceases.

Articulus 19 — Whether Those Things That Do Not Appear, Of Which Faith Is, Can Be Proved Through Faith

Whether those things which do not appear, concerning which there is faith, can be proven through faith?

Whether those things which do not appear, concerning which there is faith, can be proven through faith?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, H, If anyone doubts about them, they are proven through faith: as the future resurrection is still proven, etc.

For here almost everything that has been said is destroyed: because
1. Then it seems that it is apparent, if it can be proven.

1. Likewise, If faith draws its firmness from a place, then it does not have the nature of primary firmness.
2. Likewise, If it draws its firmness from the authority of the Fathers, then it is most uncertain: because among the places creating opinion, the weakest place is from authority.
3. Likewise, It ought to draw its firmness better from reason: because reason is prior to authority, in time and nature. Whence John the Bishop defines authority saying: Authority is nothing other than the truth of reason discovered, and committed to writing for the utility of posterity.

Further, it is asked concerning another reason which he introduces saying, that it is called an argument, because it is proof and certainty that there are some things not apparent. Because according to this, that argumentation would be necessary, Faith is: therefore some things not apparent are: which seem to have no relation. However, whether falsehood can be subject to faith, will be asked below.

Solution It must be said, that the first exposition of the Master does not serve faith, except insofar as it is from hearing, as we said above: for thus it has insufficient persuasion, and especially from the authority of the Fathers: but this is not the cause of consensus, but of easier assent to hearing. For if faith were in this way called an argument, it would rather be a conclusion than an argument.

And through this the solution to everything that is objected concerning this is clear.

To the other it must be said, that the argument is necessary by necessity of consequence: just as if it is said, divine truth is concerning this: therefore this will be, or is: and there is there the relation of cause from the supposition of the other: for with faith supposed, it is necessary that there be something not apparent, of which there is faith as cause: because things not apparent are the cause of exemplary and final faith: and therefore the process is from the supposed effect to the cause.

Articulus 20 — Whether Faith Is A Foundation

Whether faith is a foundation?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, H, at the end, "Because it is the foundation of good things, which no one can change."

For it seems that faith is not the foundation, but fortitude: because
1. Luke 12:4, on that: "I say to you," etc., he says to my friends: "Do not be afraid," Gloss: Fortitude is the foundation of faith.

1. Likewise, it seems that humility is the foundation: because Blessed Bernard says:

"Precious is the foundation of humility, in which other virtues are founded."

1. Likewise, it seems that fear is: Ecclesiasticus 25:14: "The fear of God is above all things." And, in the same place, verse 16: "The fear of God is the beginning of his love."
2. Likewise, Augustine: "Fear introduces charity, as a needle does a thread." Therefore, it seems first to establish the building.

Solution: It must be said that faith is...

simply prior and founding. But the others do not found except relatively: and this is clear, because humility is after faith, but it makes the heart concave so that what is already a foundation through faith may be founded more deeply, and therefore it, as it were, prepares the trench in which the founding takes place. Fortitude, however, founds by way of a prop against the towering storms of temptation and persecution. But fear founds by excluding things that subvert the structure of the edifice, by the fact that it turns away from sin. But faith alone [founds] by the fact that it is subjected and stands under substantially as first in the edifice.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 21 — Whether Believing, Which Is The Act Of Faith, Naturally Precedes Hoping

Whether believing, which is the act of faith, naturally precedes hoping?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says in the last chapter, there at I, around the beginning: And therefore believing, which is the act of faith, naturally precedes hoping, etc. For the contrary of this is held:

§ 1. On Psalm 36:1: Be not emulous, where the Gloss says: "Hope is the entrance to faith." [253]

§ 2. Again, it was held above that charity is the mother and form of all virtues: and this is again said by the Master here: therefore it is false that faith is first.

§ 3. Again, when one virtue is had, all are had: therefore none is prior to another.

§ 4. Again, it is prior to withdraw from evil than to do good: but fear causes one to withdraw from evil, whereas faith teaches one to approach the good, and it itself approaches the true, which is a good: therefore fear is prior.

§ 5. Again, Ecclesiasticus 1:27 seems to say this: The fear of the Lord drives out sin. For he that is without fear cannot be justified.

Solution. It must be said, in my judgment, that faith or the act of faith naturally precedes, just as the Master says here: because unless faith shows the evil, fear will not flee it. Similarly, unless faith shows the good, love will not desire it. Therefore, although they are simultaneous in time, nevertheless faith precedes in nature, as has already been said: because according to reason it is prior to the motion of a man to justice.

But if we consider justification according as it is a certain motion: then we will say that in that motion there is a terminus from which (terminus a quo) and a terminus to which (terminus ad quem); and by comparison to the terminus from which, that is, from sin which ordains to punishment, the first mover is fear: but by comparison to the terminus to which, the first [factor] disposing the movable thing itself is hope, elevating it so that it is moved from the presupposition of obtaining pardon; but love is the first moving [factor]. And thus nothing prohibits different things from being first in justification. But nevertheless, faith will always be naturally prior to all of them: because it itself, by the ratio of understanding, is prior to the whole motion, showing from what, and to what one is moved, and how.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear, except for the Gloss on Psalm 36:1. And to that it must be said that faith is not taken there for the habit by which it is believed, but for the believed thing itself, and this is the eternal good, into which hope introduces, because it itself is the expectation of the eternal good.

DISTINCTIO XXIV

Divisio Textus

Here it is asked, If faith is only concerning things not seen, how the Truth said to the Apostles, etc. In this part, certain things are treated which can be objected against the last part of the definition of the Apostle, which was expounded in the preceding distinction.

And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master asks, Whether the same thing could be seen and believed? But in the second, Whether the same thing could be known and believed? there, at C, After these things it is customarily asked, etc.

The first of these is divided into two: in the first of which he shows generally that faith is not concerning things seen, nor concerning things proven. But in the second, he specifically resolves a difficulty which concerns the article of the Passion: because the Apostles saw Christ suffer, and yet they believed, there, at B, But if it is asked, Whether Peter, etc.

253. Glossa ordinaria on Ps. 36:1.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Thing Believed Can Have The Testimony Of Reason

Whether what is believed can have the testimony of reason?

Now a doubt occurs concerning the first, Whether what is believed can have the testimony of reason?

But it seems that it can: because § 1. Peter says: Always ready to satisfy every one that asketh you a reason of that hope and faith which is in you, namely, to render it. [254] Therefore a reason must be rendered.

§ 2. Again, For we have not followed cunningly devised fables,... but having been made eyewitnesses, etc., such a voice having come down to him from the excellent glory. [255] Therefore it seems that the contemplation of that glory was for them a reason for believing.

§ 3. Again, 1 John 1:1 et seq.: That which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life,... this we declare unto you. Therefore sight and hearing and touch prove faith.

§ 4. Again, in the Acts, Paul to Agrippa: Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not incredulous to the heavenly vision: [256] therefore sight was a reason of faith for him.

§ 5. Again, Damascene says: "The Lord's disciples and Apostles, illuminated in every way by the Holy Spirit, and by His power and grace working divine signs, fishing with the net of miracles, brought back the infidels from the depth of ignorance to the light of divine knowledge." [257]

§ 6. Again, Hebrews 2:3–4: How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation? which having begun to be declared by the Lord, was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him, God also bearing them witness with signs, and wonders, and with divers miracles, etc.

§ 7. Again, it seems that it has reason. Chrysostom on John 1:46, on that text: Can any thing of good come from Nazareth? says: "Nathanael, in not receiving that Christ was from Nazareth, showed the diligence he had concerning the Scripture." [258]

Therefore it seems that before an article is believed, the testimony of Scripture must be examined. Therefore it has reason.

§ 8. Again, Romans 10:17: Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ. Expounding which, Gregory says in the Morals: "He gives intellect, while He illuminates the mind concerning the things heard." Therefore it is necessary to be heard and for the mind to be illuminated before it is believed.

§ 9. Again, Peter, Archbishop of Ravenna: "It is not safe to believe without reason."

§ 10. Again, Augustine to Paulinus: "We believe those things which are absent: but it seems suitable that testimony is offered for them."

§ 11. Again, in the same place: "In those things which we have seen or see, we ourselves are witnesses: but in those things which we believe, we are aided by others witnessing to the faith." Therefore it seems from all these that faith will accept reason.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Chrysostom on John 3:12, on that text: If I have spoken to you earthly things, and you believe not, etc., says thus: "For indeed, when someone is weighed down regarding things which are to be received through the intellect, and does not easily receive them, he is fittingly accused of madness. But when he does not receive things which indeed are not to be received by reasoning, but by faith alone, the accusation is one of infidelity." Therefore faith is not through reasoning, that is, through reason: because he calls this reasoning throughout the whole book.

§ 2. Again, in the same Homily, below: "You see that faith is everywhere needed: for he says the cross is the fountain of life, which reasoning indeed would by no means easily receive, and the Gentiles who deride it still testify to this: but faith, overstepping the imbecility of reasonings, indeed easily receives and retains it."

Solution. It must be said, as above, that faith has no merit for which human reason offers an experiment. However, we must distinguish here with a twofold distinction: one of which Damascene posits, namely that a certain faith is by hearing, and a certain faith is a charism of the Holy Spirit. That which is by hearing can have an inductive reason, not a probative one: not so that someone may consent, but so that he may more easily consent to that to which he is nevertheless inclined and prepared to consent through affection. But a charism is an infused light tending into the First Truth, and this does not have an inducing reason, so to speak.

And so that this may be better understood, what was held in the preceding distinction must be resumed, where believing is defined by Augustine: that to believe is to cogitate with assent. Whence on the part of cogitation it admits reason: because on that part it is by hearing: and this reason which it admits is not proving, but as it were alluding to the believed thing unto delight, not unto consent: but on the part of consent it rests upon nothing except infused light.

Peter also posits another distinction in the Itinerary of Clement, namely that faith does not demand proof, except so that the Prophet who handed it down may be proven to be true: for if he exists as true, without a doubt all things that he teaches will be true, although some of them may not be understood on account of their altitude.

According to these things, therefore, it must be said to the first that Peter is speaking of reason defending and inducing faith, not causing faith, in him who is faithful.

Through this the solution to all is clear, except for the last three authorities.

To the first of those it must be said that Peter of Ravenna is there speaking of the believing of a judge in legal cases.

254. 1 Pet. 3:15.

To the other two it must be said that believing is also not taken there as it is in faith, but rather according to how it bespeaks an improbable consent, which many testify to.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is The Praise Of Faith To Assent To What Is Not Seen, And Whether It Is Of Things Not Present

Whether it is the praise of faith to assent to what is not seen? And, whether it is concerning things not present?

Whether it is the praise of faith to assent to what is not seen? And, whether it is concerning things not present?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, around the beginning: This is the praise of faith, if what is believed is not seen.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. To deny reason is to deny the light which God has placed in us. Whence, Psalm 4:7: The light of Thy countenance, O Lord, is signed upon us. Again, Man when he was in honor did not understand: he is compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them. [259] Therefore it seems that by denying reason, we are more turned away from the light of God than we are converted to it.

§ 2. Again, of two things ordered to the same thing, neither is contrary to the other: but reason and faith are lights ordered to the same thing, namely, to the First Truth: therefore neither is contrary to the other: therefore it is not the praise of faith not to see through reason, but rather this would be a vituperation of faith, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, faith is an enigmatic and specular cognition: therefore according to this it is imperfect: therefore it needs assistance: therefore it ought not to be the praise of faith to believe what is not seen, but rather a vituperation of faith.

§ 4. Again, according to this we could believe any irrational things, and afterwards say that this would be the praise of faith, because they are irrational.

Again, it is asked, How could faith be the argument of things not seen, since appearance is lacking in faith, according as it is in part, because it is in an enigma and in a mirror?

For it seems that in no way: since indeed everything arguing the mind, by itself convinces the mind by its own light: and yet faith has an overshadowed light, it does not seem that it can argue the mind concerning unknowns.

If perhaps you say that faith is the argument of things not seen: and this is its praise, because it makes them be seen not now, but when in the future we will contemplate through species. On the contrary: A lesser cognition is not an argument of a greater cognition: but faith is below the understanding and vision of truth, as Hugh of St. Victor says: therefore it is not the argument of it.

To this some say that an inferior cognition can well be an argument of a superior one, just as we see that experience is a cognition accepted in singulars, and yet it argues by assisting toward the cognition of principles: and what is cognized in sense that it is, is perceived in the intellect why it is, because a principle is known on account of itself.

But on the contrary: This acceptation of why it is in principles: is either by the power of sense, or by the power of understanding separating the principles from the appendices of matter, in which sensible cognition solely accepts. If you say that it is by the power of sense, ON THE CONTRARY: That on account of which each thing is such, is itself more such: therefore if why it is is known in the intellect on account of sensible cognition, that [sensible cognition] will be more known why it is: and this is absurd, because the why does not shine forth in what is not fully separated from matter. But if by the power of understanding: then the similitude is false: because then the experiment of sensibles does not assist toward the cognition of why it is, except by inducing and not by manifesting the light itself.

Solution. It must be said without prejudice that the praise of faith is to assent to what is not seen: yet not against reason. For it is one thing to be above reason, and another thing to be against reason. The authority of revelation, upon which the cogitation of faith rests, according as it is by hearing, is above reason, but not against reason: and the article is according to that cogitation: and therefore we dare not say or cogitate anything (as Dionysius says) beyond those things which are expressed to us in the sacred oracles.

It must be said therefore to the first, that we do not deny reason according as it is a light: but it is not a light unless aided by revelation and authority: but we deny it according as it is blind, and overshadowed by the senses and phantasms.

To another it must be said that faith and reason are ordered to the same thing: but in all things where two are ordered to the same thing, a third corrects the error of the more uncertain one. Thus faith corrects reason: and therefore in this way reason is not denied according as it proceeds into the First Truth, because then it supposes the principles of faith, and is not deflected by the phantasms of error.

To another it must be said that faith is an enigmatic cognition: but an enigma and a mirror have in themselves two things, namely light and shadow: and on the part of the light it is an argument, but faith on the part of the shadow works towards the merit of this state: but if it were so shadowy that it did not sufficiently show the believed thing according to the state of merit, then it would be true that it needed assistance.

To another it must be said that this does not follow: for faith is not concerning irrational things, but rather concerning those things which are above reason, proven by revelation and the light of God infused within. Faith does not reject this proof: because it itself proves in that way, and is not proven, because it itself is a light infused in us, arguing the mind and convincing it concerning external things.

To another it must be said that it was answered above in the explanation of the Apostle's definition: because that appearance is not lacking to faith by which it argues from information through tension into truth: indeed thus it is more certain than any art: and therefore although the appearance of reason may be lacking, it is nevertheless not lacking in a greater certitude along with reason.

To another which is objected against the solution, it must be said that a lesser cognition can well be an argument of a greater one: not what it is, but that it is: and in this way faith argues the cognition of eternal things, as the Master expounded at the end of the preceding distinction. For what that vision is, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man: whence through faith it is not cognized what it is except imperfectly, namely that it is inexplicable, and ineffable, and of this sort.

To that which is objected concerning the other solution, it seems to me to stand, that sensible cognition (as it seems to me) does not make the why it is appear in principles, but rather the abstracting intellect [does], not proving them, because those things which do not have priors cannot be proven.

Articulus 3 — Whether Faith Can Be Of Present Things, Since Seeing Nevertheless Takes Away Faith

Whether faith can be concerning present things, since nevertheless vision evacuates faith?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, towards the end: Elsewhere Augustine says that faith is concerning present things, etc.

Therefore it seems that vision will not evacuate faith: which is against the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 13:10: When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away. But it is manifest that faith is in part, since it is a mirror in an enigma.

Solution. It must be said that he calls faith here the genus or substance of faith, which is the vision of truth: for this is contracted to a mirror and an enigma, as to a constitutive difference, and then it makes the vision which is the whole reward, inasmuch as it is not solely a vision sprinkling itself extrinsically upon a thing, but rather the vision of what is loved and possessed.

Articulus 4 — What An Article Of Faith Is According To The Definition

What is an article of faith according to definition?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says: But if it is asked, Whether Peter had faith of the passion? etc.

For by reason of this there is here a great question concerning the articles of faith, around which for the sake of brevity we shall ask five problems, namely: What is an article by definition? Secondly, what is it in reality? Thirdly, concerning the number of articles according to each symbol [creed]. Fourthly, concerning the differences of the symbols. Fifthly and lastly, whether we are held to believe some things which are not articles: and if so, how those things relate to the articles of faith?

257. John of Damascus, De fide orthodoxa IV, 17.

To the first one proceeds thus: Richard of St. Victor says that an article is an indivisible truth concerning God constraining us to believe. [260]

But Isidore is said to define it thus:

An article is the perception of divine truth, tending into it.

Certain of the Masters also attribute this one to Hugh: An article is a nature which nevertheless as it is proposed with grace: it is not found in his book.

But IT IS OBJECTED against the first thus: § 1. Because when it is called an indivisible truth, the sense is, in which the division of the symbol stops. But there are different divisions according to different symbols: and one thing is sometimes divided in one which is not divided in another: therefore it seems that it is not simply indivisible: therefore it seems that for some cause an article could be divided into several.

§ 2. Furthermore, an article is the joining of a member with a member: therefore it seems to rather bespeak that in which credibles are connected, than that into which they are resolved through division.

§ 3. Furthermore, Augustine says that the subsequent member has the force of its motion in the joint [article]: since therefore the motion into the credible is from a habit, it seems rather that the faith by which we believe has the ratio of an article, than the faith which is that which we believe.

§ 4. Furthermore, what is said, concerning God, does not seem to be generally true. For the resurrection of the flesh is an article: and it is not concerning God, as it seems. Again, the Holy Catholic Church, and the like.

§ 5. Again, what it says, constraining us to believe, seems false. For if constraint is spoken of by way of a natural inclination, just as a virtue is constrained to its act and object: then it rather belongs to the faith by which it is believed, than the faith which is believed.

§ 6. But if constraint is spoken of by way of an open truth, which convinces the intellect, it is again false: because the more powerful articles, since they are against the principles of reason, seem more to drive away from believing, than toward believing.

In the same way it is objected concerning the second which is of Isidore. § 1. For an article is not the perception of truth, but rather the perception of the shadow of truth and of a mirror. Again, certain philosophers had a certain perception of truth tending into the truth itself: therefore it seems that they themselves had articles.

§ 2. But if you say that it is understood of the tension of love: this cannot stand: because thus one existing in mortal sin, who believes all the articles by an unformed faith, would not have faith, which is false.

258. John Chrysostom, In Ioannem, hom. 20 (al. 19), 1.

I do not wish to object concerning the definition of Master Hugh: because they are fabricated words, and falsely imposed on him, as will be clear later, when we posit his own words which he says concerning this.

Solution. It must be said that Richard defines the faith which is believed, that is, the articles, through their form, and proper matter, and act. For the form which is as a genus, is truth: but what is as a contracting difference, is indivisible: but the matter is concerning God: because unless it is an indivisible truth in such an object as God is, it is not an article: which is clear through the definition of what it is to believe, which is commonly posited, that to believe is to assent to the First Truth on account of itself, and above all things: but one does not assent to any truth absolutely on account of itself, except to the divine truth, namely so that the term on account of itself bespeaks the efficient, and final, and formal cause. Efficient: because by it effecting, and not by any reason of ours, we believe it: and on account of it, not on account of anything else, because no truth after it is more powerful than it. But he says formal: because we do not believe on account of another, nor through another: just as in metaphysical principles we believe the truth of the principles on account of the divine light in them, which makes them true effectively: but the First Truth is not made by another. But he touches upon the effective when he says, constraining us to believe.

But that which is of Isidore touches upon the form, and the act, and not so much the property of the name, because it does not posit that which is proper to the defined name, as to constrain, and to be indivisible, which nevertheless "article" sounds like.

To the FIRST therefore it must be said that division is taken in two ways, namely according to the act of the one dividing, and according to the act of the divisible. According to the act of the one dividing, the articles are multiplied in the Apostles' Creed: and therefore certain things remain undivided, which can be divided according to the aptitude of the thing, as will be clear below: and in both ways the definition is commonly given with respect to different symbols, namely so that the privative preposition [in indivisible] deprives in some the act of division alone, and in others the act with the potency: and why this occurs will be explained below, when the differences of the symbols are treated.

To another it must be said that an article has a twofold acceptation, namely a material one, and thus an article is a bound member: and a formal one, and thus an article is the binding of members: and both are fitting, but the first with respect to the parts, and thus the article is taken by Richard. But the second is fitting with respect to the whole symbol, and thus it is not taken by him: because in the symbol the whole binding is of material articles, and the joining of one with another.

To another it must be said that the motion of faith begins from the truth of the article, and not from the habit: for the truth of the article causes to be left behind by its similitude in the soul, namely the habit to tend into the same truth: so that thus there is a motion of the movable thing beginning from the divine truth, and through the article of the First Truth

tending into the same, so that the circle of the exiting ray from eternity into the temporal soul of the just is concluded, and through the truth of the article into eternal truth: just as Dionysius says in the first book of The Celestial Hierarchy: Every procession of the manifestation of lights, set in motion by the Father, proceeding optimally and abundantly to us, again, as a vivifying power fills us, and converts us to the unity of the gathering Father, and to the deific super-simplicity. [261]

To another it must be said that every article is concerning God: for we do not believe (as Damascene says) that the resurrection is future, except by divine truth and command: and therefore the promised resurrection is an effect of divine truth. And similarly the Church is not united, nor are sins remitted, nor is baptism valid, nor the other sacraments, unless by divine truth operating this through the Holy Spirit: and thus it is easy to reduce all of them to divine truth.

To another it must be said that this constraint is through the medium of the simple light, from which proceeds the reflected light which is the habit: and therefore the truth of the article, prior according to nature, constrains.

To another it must be said that this argument would proceed if it constrained according to a habitude of complexion: but it was said above that it does not, but rather in the mode of a nature convincing the intellect itself from the power of the simple light of the gift, so that it may tend into that which it believes.

To that which is objected on the contrary, it must be said according to the other definition that the philosophers did not have the perception of divine truth, except materially: but it was human, because it was through natural reasons: nor did it tend into the truth in the mode of a nature consonant with reason, but rather by way of consent from reason.

To another which is objected concerning a false Christian, it was answered above that unformed faith, as much as it is of itself, tends, but the subject does not follow it.

TO THE DEFINITION of Hugh, it must be said that he posits his words in the tenth part of the sacred books, whence certain ones signify that definition. For he says thus: "Two things are proposed to faith: the Creator, and the Savior. The Creator, and those things which pertain to the Creator: this is one part of faith. The Savior, and those things which pertain to the Savior: this is the other. In the first part faith discerns in the Creator and His works. In the second part faith discerns between the Savior and the sacramentals. To the Creator pertain the works of condition [creation], which were made in six days. To the Savior pertain the works of restoration, which are completed in six ages. The first part of faith pertains to the debt of nature. The second part of faith pertains to the debt of grace. Those things we ought to believe, because we are founded through nature: these things we ought to believe, because we are repaired through grace." From this it is accepted what he intends: that in the symbol certain articles express the work restoring nature, and certain others the work restoring grace: and he does not intend to define an article: and then what was asked is plain.

260. Richard of St. Victor, De Trinitate, I.

Articulus 5 — Whether An Article Is Something Complex Or Incomplex

Whether an article is something complex or incomplex?

Secondly it is asked, What is an article in reality? Namely, whether it is complex, or incomplex?

But it seems that it is incomplex, like the passion, and the resurrection, and the like: § 1. For faith is a simple light, as was proven above according to Dionysius: therefore it is of the simple, and not of the complex. § 2. Again, in God there is no complexion: since therefore an article is concerning God, it seems that it is not complex. § 3. Again, an article is defined to be an indivisible truth concerning God: therefore it cannot be complex: because nothing complex can be indivisible. § 4. Again, if an article were complex, so that enunciables were articles, then time would be of the essence of an article. Therefore let Christ have suffered in instant A: therefore another time would make another enunciable: and if He had suffered in B, it would not be the same article, namely that Christ suffered in B.

Furthermore, since time under a certain difference would be of the essence of an article, what Augustine says in the following distinction would not be true, that the times are varied, but faith has remained unchanged: and thus the moderns and the ancients would not have the same faith with respect to the articles.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Consent is only in a complex: but in an article there is the consent of reason and of faith: therefore it itself is not incomplex, but complex. But that faith is a consent, was held above from Damascene. § 2. Again, according to this it seems that the Jews who believe the incarnation of Christ, would believe the article, although they believe it as future, while we as past. § 3. Again, according to this, if an article were simple, one should not be left as a heretic who would believe the incarnation of Christ, but not Christ incarnate: since these things are false, it seems that an article is an enunciable, and not a thing. § 4. BUT STILL it is objected against this for the first part, that if an article were an enunciable, Cornelius, who did not believe Christ incarnate, was not justified through faith: [262] because he could not have charity without faith: and his alms and prayers could not have been heard without faith, because without faith it is impossible to please God. [263] But if you say that he had faith concerning Christ already incarnate and having suffered, then Peter was sent to him in vain to evangelize.

Solution. Without prejudice I say that determinate time is not of the essence of faith with respect to the articles: nevertheless I well concede that a certain complexion is of the essence of an article: and this can be manifest in this way. For in every article divine truth is subjected, which is determined according to different things befitting the essence and the persons, and with respect to different effects pertaining to the instatement of nature and the restoration of grace. But this determi-

...the determination of divine truth cannot be signified by us except through composition, even though without a mediating composition it is determinate in itself toward those things:

261. Pseudo-Dionysius, De caelesti hierarchia 1, 1.

just as if white in a surface must be signified, it is indeed white in the surface without any medium, yet it is not signified by us as being in the surface without a note of composition. I say, therefore, that the determining of one thing in another, namely in a determinate thing, is presupposed in an article: but the note of composition which the act of the signifying soul adds, which essentially belongs to a certain difference of time, is in my judgment not of the essence of the article.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that although the light of faith is simple, nevertheless, because it is by way of inclining to consent, it therefore requires a complex in the article, but not that which makes an enuntiable in a certain difference of time.

To the next it must be said, that although in God there is no complex according to reality, there is nevertheless according to the mode of signifying of certain articles, as when it is said, "God triune and one": and also for the sake of certain things on account of diverse effects, and for the sake of some things on account of the nature united to Christ.

To the next it must be said, that an article is called an indivisible truth, because the division of credibles stops at it, not because it is entirely incomplex.

To the next it must be said, that an enuntiable in my judgment is not an article, but a complex thing ordered to all time.

To that which is objected to the contrary it must also be answered, that consent seeks only a complex thing: and about that it posits the mode of composition, which is determined by that truth to which the composing reason consents: which, although it is true in the thing itself, nevertheless, as it makes a composition, it is in the soul, as the Philosopher says at the end of the sixth book of First Philosophy .

To the next it must be said, that we are not bound only to believe the article, but those things which are determined concerning the articles from the preaching of the Apostles: and these regard faith on that side which is from hearing: for many things from the determination of time and preaching accrue and have accrued to the hearing of faith, although they are not of the substance of the articles.

Through this also the solution to the following is evident.

To that which is objected concerning Cornelius, it must be said that in that time when the time was not determined, neither according to the state of the ages of the world, nor according to the state of prophecy, nor from the preaching of the Apostles, certain people could relate to every difference of time without distinction. But now it is not so: because the time is determined according to the course of the ages and the number of the prophecy of Daniel, and "their sound hath gone forth into all the earth" .

SECTION: Article 6

262. Cf. Acts 10.

Articulus 6 — On The Number Of The Articles According To Both Symbols

Article 6: On the number of articles according to both creeds.

On the number of articles according to both creeds.

Thirdly, it is asked concerning the number of articles according to both creeds, namely the Nicene and the Apostles' creed.

It seems first that the number is diminished from the number of articles of the creed of Athanasius: because

§ 1. Just as omnipotence expresses an article, so too concerning the divine properties there is omniscience, and God's goodness, and yet they are not posited as articles.

§ 2. Item, in the creed of Athanasius it is said, "The Father almighty, the Son almighty," etc., "The Father immense," etc., and, "The Father uncreated," etc.: and none of those is expressed among the articles, except only omnipotence: therefore the number seems to be diminished.

§ 3. Item, it is said, "The Father is Lord, the Son is Lord," etc.

§ 4. Item, similarly, since properties are in the divine persons, by which the persons are distinguished, it seems that there ought to have been some article concerning them: and since none is posited in either of the creeds, the number seems to be diminished.

§ 5. Item, around the union of natures in Christ there was manifold error, some saying that the natures were confused, others commixed, others that they passed into one another: and since an article of faith is for excluding errors, we ought to have had many more articles concerning the mode of union than we have.

§ 6. Item, moreover it is asked concerning the division which almost all the Masters commonly posit, namely of the two creeds: for in one creed, namely that of the Apostles, it is posited as one article, "I believe in God the Father almighty, creator of heaven and earth." If therefore this is an indivisible truth, then it ought not to be divided: and yet it is divided in the Nicene creed, and is posited as two: for in that creed the first article is, "I believe in one God." The second is, "The Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible." Therefore it seems that one or the other errs.

§ 7. Item, in the Apostles' creed one undivided article is, "Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary." And this again in the Nicene creed is posited as two, such that one is concerning Christ's conception, and the other concerning Christ's nativity.

§ 8. Moreover, it seems if the article concerning nativity is divided in the Nicene creed into two on account of two nativities, namely in the womb, and from the womb, that by the same reason the article of the passion ought to be divided into five, namely that he was captured, reproached, suffered, died, and was buried: and yet all these are referred to the same article in both creeds.

§ 9. Item, in the Nicene creed nothing is posited concerning the descent into hell. Whence also Anselm says that it does not entirely contain the faith. Therefore it seems that it is diminished: especially since the descent into hell according to both divisions is posited to be one article.

§ 10. Item, in the Nicene creed the descent to hell and the resurrection from the dead are posited as two articles: in the Apostles' creed as one: therefore it seems that one or the other division is invalid.

§ 11. Item, in the Apostles' creed for two articles is posited, "The Holy Church, and the communion of Saints": and in the Nicene these two are posited as one, namely "And in one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church. I confess one baptism for the remission of sins": for all this is posited for one article in the Nicene: and it is asked, by what right did the Apostles divide it?

§ 12. Moreover, since we have one article concerning eternal life, and we also believe in eternal punishments, it seems that we ought also to have one concerning eternal punishments.

§ 13. Item, it seems that by Cassian and Leo yet a third creed is posited, in which are found certain things which are contained in neither of those: and it is of the synod of Antioch, and says thus: "I believe in one and only true God, the Father almighty, creator of visible and invisible creatures: and in our Lord Jesus Christ his only-begotten Son, and the firstborn of every creature: born of him before all ages, and not made, true God from true God, homoousion, by whom also the ages were framed and all things made: who for us came, and was born of the Virgin Mary, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and buried: on the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into the heavens, and again shall come to judge the living and the dead," etc., because the other things are not changed from the Nicene creed.

§ 14. Item, it is added in the third article, "The firstborn of every creature": and this article is found in neither of the others:

therefore there seems to be a diminution in both.

§ 15. Item, since the Apostles' creed was issued by the Apostles themselves, it seems that every preacher of the faith ought to have added his own sentence: but none is found of Paul and Barnabas, who nevertheless were chosen by the Holy Spirit himself: therefore the first creed seems to be diminished.

§ 16. Item, it is objected concerning individual articles: for the article, "I believe in one God," does not seem necessary: since this is also proved by the Philosophers by necessary reasons, as is clear in the First Philosophy of Aristotle, of Avicenna, and of other Philosophers.

§ 17. Moreover, why is it not posited there, "One simple God": since nevertheless simplicity is more proper to God than unity?

§ 18. Item, it is objected secondly concerning this which it says, "The Father almighty," etc. For omnipotence does not belong to the Father alone, but commonly to the three: therefore it seems that this article could be an occasion of error for some: therefore it is badly posited.

263. Heb. 11:6.

§ 19. Item, since in the Antiochene creed it is said, "The creator of visible things," etc., why in the Nicene is it said, "The maker": since nevertheless to create is more agreeable to omnipotence than to make?

§ 20. Item, it is objected concerning the third, "And in one Lord," etc. For he alone is not Lord, as the creed of Athanasius says, but the Father is Lord, the Son is Lord, the Holy Spirit is Lord.

§ 21. Moreover, many expositions are posited specially around this article. For it is said, "In one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, and born of the Father before all ages, God from God, light from light, true God from true God, begotten, not made, consubstantial with the Father, through whom all things were made": and it seems that all the subsequent things are added superfluously: because when it was said, "The Son of God," it was understood to be only-begotten and all the other things: and this was proved in the first book of the Sentences therefore there seems to be superfluity.

§ 22. Item, when it follows, "Who for us men and for our salvation descended from the heavens, and was incarnate by the Holy Spirit of the Virgin Mary, and was made man," etc., it seems to have many superfluous expressions: because when it said, "For us men," it was superfluous to add, "And for our salvation": because it seems to be the same according to the intellect.

§ 23. Item, to have descended and to have been incarnate seem to be the same: because it is certain that he did not descend being moved locally, as was proved above, because he descended in the divine nature, and to descend was to appear visible in the flesh.

§ 24. Moreover, what follows, "And was made man," does not seem to express a special article other than that one: because it is the same to be incarnate, and to be made man.

If perhaps you say, that it is not a special article. Against this is: because then in the Nicene creed the article which is concerning Christ's nativity will be lacking, which nevertheless is posited by everyone as one of the seven which are attributed to the Son.

§ 25. But concerning that which follows, "Crucified also for us," etc., it was objected previously up to there, "And was buried": where it is asked, why the Nicene creed is thus diminished in the descent into hell, and similarly the Antiochene creed, but not the Apostles' creed?

§ 26. Item, concerning that, "And he rose again," it was objected previously. But it is asked, since between the resurrection and ascension there was a multiform apparition, why is nothing of it posited among the articles? Because the Apostle, 1 Cor. 15:4 et seq., seems to touch upon it among the credibles which he himself handed down to the faithful, saying thus: "That he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures: and that he was seen by Cephas; and after that by the eleven. Then he was seen by more than five hundred brethren at once: of whom many remain until this present, and some are fallen asleep. After that, he was seen by James, then by all the apostles. And last of all, he was seen also by me, as by one born out of due time" [264].

§ 27. Item, concerning this which follows in the subsequent article, "And he shall come again with glory to judge the living and the dead." Because this seems to pertain neither to nature, nor to glory, but to severity, since the judgment then happens strictly: therefore according to this it ought not to be an article.

§ 28. Similarly, it is objected concerning this which follows, "And in the Holy Spirit the Lord," etc. And it is asked, why so much expression is made concerning him, that he should be called Lord, and vivifying, and the mode of procession, and the equality of his dignity, and his inspiration in the Prophets?

§ 29. Similarly, what is the cause that in the subsequent article two symbols of the Apostles, namely of Matthew who posited, "The Holy Church," and of Simon who posited, "The communion of Saints," are posited in the Nicene creed in the place of one article: and it is added there, "I confess one baptism for the remission of sins"? For this was not done by the Fathers without cause.

Solution. It seems to be said to the first, that the Apostles' creed has a division into twelve articles according to the number of those conferring the credibles: because twelve published that creed, who were signified by the twelve oxen breaking the furrows of the world, who supported the brazen sea [265], that is, the sea for the sake of the world, and brazen on account of the resonance of the confession of faith which would be in the whole globe. These are the stones concerning which it is read in Joshua 4:20, which were chosen from the Jordan, where the ark of the Lord remained, and the feet of the priests stood. The stones, I say, are the articles on account of the solidity of faith. But the ark is Christ in humanity and deity. And the Jordan is the scripture of the Old Testament, which stood then. And the priests standing upon the articles are the Lawgivers, and Prophets, and Patriarchs, who all leaned upon the articles of faith. But concerning the field of the widest preaching of the Gentiles, they were reposited in twelve: because in the Scripture of the Old Testament they are twisted back through confirmation, so that there was a wheel within a wheel, and exhibition in promise, and the blessing of the sons in the Fathers.

Now the articles are distributed according to that division by the ancients thus: that one, the first, is attributed to the Father, which Peter posited, and is this, "I believe in God the Father almighty, creator," etc.

But six are attributed to the Son.

The first according to the divine generation, which Andrew posited, and is this, "And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord."

But the second pertains to his two-fold human nativity, both in the womb and from the womb: and John, the guardian of the Mother bearing him, posited this: and is this, "Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary."

But the third pertains to the sacrament of his passion according to all the things that circumstanced his death, just as the antecedent passion is, and the subsequent death, and the burial which is the office that is exhibited to the dead: and James, the brother of John, posited this: and is this, "Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, died, and was buried."

But the fourth pertains to the sacrament of the redemption of those who were enclosed in the limbo of hell, according to which

Zechariah had prophesied (Zech. 9:11): "Thou also by the blood of thy testament hast sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit, wherein is no water": and Thomas posited this: and is this, "He descended into hell, on the third day he rose again from the dead." And the resurrection of the dead is conjoined here with the descent into hell: because this article states the whole that Christ merited by his death: but this was redemption in the soul which was completed by the breaking of hell in the descent into hell, and redemption in the body which was completed in the resurrection through the glory of the body. The first David had prophesied, saying: "He hath broken the gates of brass, and burst the iron bars. He took them from the way of their iniquity" [266]. But the second the Apostle says: "We look for the Saviour, our Lord Jesus Christ, who will reform the body of our lowness, made like to the body of his glory" [267]. For man is not perfectly redeemed, unless he is saved in body and soul. But Thomas appropriately posited this article, who touched the scars of the rising one, and therefore was certain of the resurrection; and he confessed the power of deity in the breaking of hell, when he said: "My Lord, and my God."

But the fifth pertains to the opening of the place of beatitude, where the precursor entered for us, Jesus ascending, and laying open the journey before us, as Micah foretold and James the less posited this, called the brother of the Lord on account of the likeness of body and religion: and is this, "He ascended into the heavens, he sitteth at the right hand of God the Father almighty." And he says three things, namely "to the heavens," to show to what the ascension is according to place: and "he sitteth at the right hand," to note that he is in the better goods according to humanity: and he adds, "of God the Father almighty," so that he is noted to be equal according to deity, just as David had foretold: "His going out is from the end of heaven" [268].

The sixth and last is about the return to judgment: since the Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son: so that he who posited the law, should judge according to the law: and he who was judged for the living and the dead, should judge concerning the living and the dead: and Philip posited this: and is this, "From thence he shall come to judge the living and the dead."

But the remaining five pertain to the Holy Spirit, both in himself, and in his gifts. In himself indeed, by which his personality is expressed: and Bartholomew posited this, saying, "I believe in the Holy Spirit."

But in gifts the first is by which he sanctifies and generally unites the Church: and Matthew the Evangelist and Apostle posited this second article, who specially experienced this gift, when from a publican he was made a public Evangelist and Doctor: and is this, "The Holy Catholic Church": and the sense is, "I believe in the Holy Spirit, sanctifying the Catholic Church," that is, the universal Church: for Καθολικήν in Greek sounds as 'universal' in Latin. And it says 'universal' (as Boethius says in the book On the Trinity) for two reasons, namely because it is universally preached through the four quarters of the earth: and because it has universally true articles, to which nothing false can underlie.

264. 1 Cor. 15:4-8.

But the third is according to the effect of grace against sin: and Simon the Canaanite posited this: and is this, "The communion of Saints, the remission of sins": for the communion of Saints in goods cannot happen, except through the Holy Spirit uniting and vivifying the whole mystical body, and making the members solicitous for one another: nor can communion happen, except by the removal of that which is proper alone: and this is the sin of each one. Whence the sense is: I believe in the Holy Spirit communicating the goods of the Saints, so that each one has in another what is lacking to him in himself: and remitting sins. But these two are conjoined into one article: since one follows upon the other, because once the proper thing which is sin is removed, nothing is left except the communion of the Saints.

The fourth is concerning the Spirit blowing upon those infected by the poison of the first serpent, as Ezechiel also foretold: and Judas Thaddeus posited this: and is this, "The resurrection of the flesh": and the sense is, I believe in the Holy Spirit through the immission of the created Spirit to the body, making the resurrection of the flesh by his power.

The fifth and last is, "Life everlasting, amen": which was posited by Matthias, who was elected last: and the sense is: I believe in the goodness of the Holy Spirit rewarding the Saints in eternal life, for the reason that the Holy Spirit himself is the vivifier.

But there is another division of the Doctors according to the Nicene creed, which almost all follow, although some strive to say others which are of no value, and by fourteen: but two are contained in those articles only implicitly and from a cause, as will be clear below in the response to the objections, namely the article of the nativity from the womb, and the descent to hell. And according to this the sayings of the Doctors revert to this, that seven pertain to the deity, and seven pertain to the deity in humanity. For it is said, Apocalypse 1:16, that John saw seven stars in the right hand of the Angel appearing to him: and these signify the seven articles which are about the deity: and, in the same place, verse 13, he saw one like the Son of man in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, which signify the seven others about the deity in humanity.

But the seven pertaining to the deity, are these. For the deity is known in three ways, namely, through essence, and in persons, and in effect. If in essence: then it is the first article, because thus it is not to know except one: and is this, "I believe in one God." If in persons: either the person of the Father, or of the Son, or of the Holy Spirit. If of the Father: then according as faith is from hearing, and the Father is never sent, as was proved in Book I of the Sentences [269], we cannot proceed into him except through the work appropriated to his person: and this is omnipotence, and his proper act which is to create from nothing: and then the second article is introduced, which is, "The Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible." Or in the person of the Son who is sent, and therefore knowable through himself in effect: and therefore both are known there, "And in one Lord Jesus Christ the only-begotten Son of God, and born of the Father before all ages, God from God, light from light, true God from true God, begotten, not made, consubstantial with the Father, through whom all things were made": and this is the third. Or it is knowable in the Holy Spirit: and then is this fourth, "And in the Holy Spirit the Lord and vivifier, who proceeds from the Father and the Son, who with the Father and the Son together is adored and conglorified, who spoke through the Prophets." But if the deity is known in an effect specially pertaining to the reformation of man, because concerning the other effects it has been held with the articles of the persons: then this cannot be except in three ways, namely in the effect pertaining to recreation, or the effect pertaining to the glory of the flesh, or to eternal life, which follows both. For the first pertains to the soul, the second to the body, the third to both. If in the first way: then is the fifth posited by the Fathers, which is, "And one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church. I confess one baptism for the remission of sins."

265. Cf. 3 Kings 7:23-25; 2 Paralipomenon (2 Chronicles) 4:2-4.

For all these things look to the same effect, which is the recreation of the soul through sanctifying grace. But if it be in the second way: then is the sixth posited by the Fathers, which is, "I expect the resurrection of the dead." And if it is in the third way: then is the seventh, which is, "And the life of the world to come, Amen."

But the other seven look to the sacrament of the incarnation, in which the deity is known in the person of the Son united to the flesh: and those can be multiplied by this mode, that some pertain to the merit of the redemption made through Christ: but some to the effect of his redemption and merit. If they look to the merit: this cannot be except in two ways, namely according to the entry into the state of meriting, and according to the most noble act by which he satisfied for us. If it is in the first way: this is still two-fold, namely according to the union of natures in Christ: and as to this the first article is posited in these words, "Who for us men and for our salvation descended from the heavens, and was incarnate by the Holy Spirit of the Virgin Mary." Or according to the nativity from the womb, after he conversed with men, and endured human things through all of thirty and a half years: and I believe that all this is expressed by what follows, "And was made man": and it is the second article which is called by the Masters, "Born of the Virgin Mary": but these words are not had in the creed. But if according to the most noble act of our redemption: then is the third expressed in these words, "Crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, he suffered, and was buried." But if it is expressing the effect of redemption: this is in two ways: either according to the stole of glory, or according to the judicial power, which he merited by the fact that he permitted himself to be judged. If in the first way: this is three-fold, namely according to the terminus from which he redeemed, and according to the terminus into which he led, and according to the recovery of the place which we had lost. The first two were understood by the Fathers in that they said, "And he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures": for this was to rise again through an effect in the members from both deaths, namely of hell into which he descended: and as to this the fourth article is introduced. And the terminus of life, into which the head raised himself: in which also the members received the security of rising again: and this is the fifth. But if it is according to the recovery of place; then is the sixth which is, "He ascended into heaven, he sitteth at the right hand of God the Father." But if it is expressing judicial power: then is the seventh and last, "And he shall come again with glory to judge the living and the dead: of whose kingdom there shall be no end": in the good by rewards, and in the bad by vindicating justice.

These things having been held, it must be responded to the objections in order.

To the first therefore it must be said, that to the Father is attributed what is appropriated to his person, and his act: because he was not knowable otherwise, for the reason that he is not sent, so that he might be known through a special effect in us, or through union: but omniscience and omnibenevolence do not thus express the divine essence (quid divinum): because omniscience was given to the soul of Christ, but not omnipotence. Similarly omnibenevolence is nothing said: because his goodness and will is not with respect to all things, as knowledge, or power. Or it can be said, that omnipotence is declared in one act, which is creation: but not omniscience, or omnibenevolence, and therefore it could not be posited for an article. But this solution is nothing: because neither is omnipotence an article except under the aspect of an attribute of the Father.

To the next it must be said, that immense, uncreated, and all such things are explanatory of the unity of persons in essence: and this also Athanasius intends to explain, namely what the Fathers said: and this explanation does not make an article, because the whole explanation is presupposed in the explained.

To the next it must be said, that Lord is not said of the Son alone, but also of the Holy Spirit in the Nicene council: and the Fathers provided this against two heresies, namely against the heresy of Arius, who willed the Son to be a creature, and therefore not to be Lord: and against the heresy of Nestorius and of a certain Theodore the Greek, who willed the Holy Spirit to be the servant of the Father and of the Son. But because concerning the person of the Father no one suspected this, therefore in the article concerning the person of the Father, they did not append this, but understood it: and Athanasius explained it.

To the next it must be said, that the properties in the divine are not distinguished from the persons, but are the persons themselves: nor is there a further real distinction, than the distinction of persons: and therefore there ought not to have been a special article about the properties: because the persons would already be signified otherwise to be composite and to differ substantially, if the subject of the property were one thing and the property another.

To the next it must be said, that around the mode of union there is only one article: because the union was not except in one mode, namely with the natures preserved in the unity of the person: and this is expressed by the fact that he is incarnate. Whence just as one virtue by the fact that it is in the mean in only one mode, excludes every multiform multitude of vices, so the faith by one confession excludes every heresy: because as Boethius says in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ, faith is the mean of heresies, just as virtue is the mean of vices: and he says this himself regarding the article on the union of natures in Christ. Nevertheless Athanasius expounded this broadly in his creed.

To the next it must be said, that the Apostles conferring the creed, were proportioned to the number of the Apostles, and not to the number of credible things: and therefore sometimes they conjoined certain things, which were divisible according to reality, and sometimes they divided them: and this is the common solution. Or it can be said, that in the Father there is a two-fold ratio of principle, namely to creating, and by which he himself is the principle of the whole divinity: and therefore unity is also attributed to him, as was held in the book of the Sentences [270]; and therefore his article by Peter the Apostle is conjoined with the essential principle and essential unity.

To the next it must be said, that certain things were conjoined in the Apostles' creed which afterwards on account of heresies had to be divided. For Manichaeus said afterwards, that Christ was not truly born, nor truly made man, but appeared in a phantasm. Certain others said, he was indeed truly born, but not truly conceived, who (as they themselves said) brought a body with him from heaven, and did not receive it in the Virgin: and therefore the congregated Fathers divided it, so that one article would be about the true conception and the other about this, that he was made a true man: so that thus each heresy would be excluded: and this was not necessary in the times of the Apostles, when the heresies did not yet exist.

To the next it must be said, that it was not necessary to be done thus concerning the passion: because all those five things are ordered to the passion of death, and the time between them was continuous and short: but it was not so in the conception, and nativity: nor even (which I think the more potent cause) did a heresy press, as in that one: for concerning the death of Christ there was no heresy except one, namely of the Manichaean, who said that he neither suffered, nor died, except according to the appearance of men only: but there was none, that he indeed suffered, and did not die: or that he indeed died and suffered, but was not buried.

To the next it must be said, that Innocent renders the reason concerning this why the descent into hell was posited implicitly and not explicitly in the Nicene creed: because namely a certain error was then pullulating in the people, that Christ had descended into hell, and would not have returned, nor would He have been free among the dead: and therefore it pleased the Fathers to blow away, as it were, that heresy, by passing this over in silence concerning Him and including it in the resurrection: for if He rose, it was necessary for His soul to return from the lower regions, just as His body from the tomb. Others say differently, that according to Gregory, it was still doubtful whether it was an article in itself: on the grounds that John had doubted whether He wished to descend in Himself, or send another who would lead out the souls of the Saints after the redemption had been accomplished: but I consider this unsafe to say.

268. Ps. 18:7 (Vulgate).

§ 1. To the saying of Anselm, however, it must be said that it is understood not to contain it sufficiently explicitly, although it contains it implicitly, as the Master says in book I of the Sentences [271].

§ 2. To the next, it must be said that both can be saved according to a twofold consideration of the resurrection: for if the resurrection is taken as a certain motion, then it has a terminus a quo and a terminus in quem, and then the descent to the lower regions and the resurrection are of the same motion: because the descent to the lower regions designates the terminus a quo by reason of place. If, however, these are considered as things done surrounding Christ: then they are two things, and Doctors consider them in this way, thereby making them two articles.

§ 3. To the next, it must be said that the Apostles, by dividing them into two articles, considered the act of grace: for one act of grace is sanctifying the Church, and another is communicating goods by remitting sins: but the Fathers, considering the unity of the grace of the Holy Spirit in substance, although it has different acts, joined them into one: and therefore both have a rationale.

§ 4. To the next, it must be said that concerning punishments it is believed by way of the opposite: because if He will give rewards, it follows by consequence that by the same justice He punishes the wicked: however, there is no special article of faith about this, because faith does not move toward this, but rather away from it.

§ 5. To the next, which is objected concerning the Antiochene [Symbol], it must be said that it is not as widely promulgated as these two: and this is because there is an occasion for doubting: for when it was said, Only true God, it could be understood such that solitude was implied concerning God, and thus the plurality of persons would be excluded: and therefore this was removed in the Nicene [Symbol].

§ 6. To the next, it must be said that what was said, Firstborn of every creature, although it is soundly understood to be true, as Basil says, because receiving is common to the Son with every creature, but having it by nature is proper to Him: nevertheless, it should not have been posited: because among the simple it insinuated the heresy of Arius, who said that He was the firstborn among creatures, and thus a creature: and therefore this too was removed in the Nicene [Symbol].

§ 7. To the next, it must be said that Paul and Barnabas were chosen after the promulgation of the symbol: and therefore they added nothing to the symbol, as is read in Acts 13:2: Separate me Paul and Barnabas, for the work whereunto I have taken them.

§ 8. To the next, it must be said that the article is posited in one God, not according as it is proved, but according as it is supposed by the faithful: and this is in a way to say in what manner He is one, namely, to which the trinity of persons is not repugnant: and no Philosopher ever understood this, but they proved His unity by the mode of science, that it is, and not what that one is.

269. Peter Lombard, Sentences, Book I.

§ 9. To the next, it must be said that simplicity is included in the "one," as Boethius says in his book On the Trinity, that this is truly one in which there is no number, because it rests upon nothing: and in this way nothing is one unless it is simple.

§ 10. To the next, the solution is clear through what has been said before: because omnipotence is appropriated to the Father, and creation is the act through which it is manifested, since otherwise He is not read to be sent. Through this, however, no error is introduced, because since the Father is substantially and He spirates the Spirit in the same substance, it is certain that He communicates the same power to Him, as the symbol supposes when it says, and consubstantial, and the Holy Spirit who is co-adored and co-glorified.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that this was done most wisely. For certain heretical philosophers said that God first created the world in principal principles, and afterwards committed the making of it to Angels or to nature: and therefore they said, Maker of heaven and earth: because heaven cannot be made except out of nothing, since it does not have matter out of which it is made that exists before it: and therefore by the nature of that which is made, the act of creation is supposed, because according to the Philosophers heaven can in no way be made except by creating it out of nothing: and by the rationale of the word it is supposed that He not only creates, but also makes all things that are made in the matter which He Himself created.

§ 13. To the next, it must be said that all those expressions were made against the heresy of Arius: for because he said that He was created, and not God, therefore they said, In one Lord. But because he said He was not co-eternal, therefore they said, The Only-begotten, light from light: because that is coeval with the one generating. But because he said He was God only by acceptation, therefore they said, True God from true God. And because he said He was made, therefore they said, Begotten, not made. And because he said He was not of the same substance, therefore they said, Consubstantial with the Father. And because he said that not all things were made through Him, because He did not operate from eternity with the Father: therefore they said, Through whom all things were made. And this for the sake of the people, lest they could be deceived by the Arians in any of these matters.

§ 14. To the next, it must be said that when it is said, For us men: there the love of the conformity of nature with us is noted, against the Manichaean. But when it is said, And for our salvation, etc., the effect of our redemption accomplished through Him is noted: and it flows forth.

§ 15. To the next, it must be said that to descend does not import to be incarnated, except when understood catholically: but this does not suffice for expression against heretics. For some said that He did not descend, like Paul of Samosata, a certain heretic of the Greeks, but He was only incarnated, and was a mere man. Others, however, like the Manichaean, said that He descended, but did not assume our flesh: and therefore, so that both heresies might be excluded, it was necessary to express both.

270. Peter Lombard, Sentences, Book I.

§ 16. To the next, it must be said that He was made man was posited for the expression of the article concerning nativity from the womb: because He then begins to be a man per se, when He is separated from the mother's womb: yet it is said, He was made man, so that all things which He did up to the passion might be understood [as having been done] in man. Some, however, have said that those things which He did in life do not pertain to the article: because they cannot be expressed in a single sacrament. But this is nothing: because provided they are of the articles, they would then have to be expressed in many ways, and there would be many articles. And therefore I think that the baptism and all those things by which He founded and taught the faith, and planted the Church in the Apostles, are reduced by the Fathers through that which is said, And He was made man. For this reason also they did not speak of the nativity from the womb, because that only expresses a single sacrament.

§ 18. To the next, it must be said that the apparition is the proof of the resurrection: and therefore it does not make a special credible thing, but is supposed with the resurrection of Christ as proving it.

§ 19. To the next, it must be said that it pertains to the grace of the advent for judgment: because there the just will be rewarded, which is the end of all grace: and conversely the wicked will be punished, because they neglected all grace. For just as there is the same discipline of opposites, so too one is understood in the other through the discipline of faith.

§ 20. To the next, it must be said that this was done against the most impious Nestorius and Eutyches, who said that the Holy Spirit is the servant of the Father and the Son, and obeys Him, like a certain power foreign to their essence, and does not give the life of grace nor inspiration: and therefore it was said, And in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and giver of life. And so that coessentiality might be signified, they added, Who proceeds from the Father and the Son: who with the Father and the Son is together adored and conglorified. But a certain heretic, Montanus, and later Porphyry told their disciples that the Prophets spoke with a fanatic spirit: just as energumens and the possessed speak: and so that their heresy might be excluded, they added, Who spoke through the Prophets.

§ 21. To the last, it must be said that, as was said above, this is done on account of diverse considerations of grace, namely according to substance, and thus they return to one article: or according to acts, and thus they are diverse.

Articulus 7 — On The Diversity And Difference Of The Symbols

On the diversity and difference of the symbols.

Fourthly, it is inquired concerning the differences of the symbols.

1. And first it is inquired, from whence is it called a "symbol"?

271. Aristotle, Metaphysics VI.

2. And secondly it is inquired, why these two symbols are specially approved?
3. Thirdly, why the symbol of the Apostles is called the "greater," when nevertheless it contains fewer words?
4. Fourthly, why the symbol of the Apostles is said twice a day, at Prime and at Compline: and the symbol of the Fathers only on Sunday at Mass after the Gospel and before communion.
5. Fifthly, why the symbol of the Apostles is said in silence, but the symbol of the Fathers loudly?
6. Sixthly, why the symbol of Athanasius, according to the use of some, is said once a week, and this at Prime?
7. Seventhly, it is inquired whether still more symbols could be made, and articles expressed, if there were the same cause that existed previously?

§ 23. Solution: To the first, it must be said through the words of Cassian to Pope Leo , where he says as follows: "The symbol received its name from 'collation'. For what is called symbolon in Greek, is named 'collation' in Latin: and it is a collation for this reason, because the faith of the whole Catholic law having been collated into one by the Apostles of the Lord, whatever is poured forth in an immense abundance throughout the universal body of the divine volumes is wholly gathered into the symbol with perfect brevity: according to that saying of the Apostle to the Romans: For the Lord will execute a shortened word upon the earth ." This therefore is the shortened word which the Lord made, namely, gathering the faith of His double testimony into a few things, and concluding the senses of all the Scriptures in brief [statements], condensing His own things from His own things, and perfecting the force of the whole law in brevity. But the Masters of our time say that it comes back to the same thing, namely that it is said from syn which is "with," and bola, "sentence," as if they were sentences of divine truth piled together into one.

§ 24. To the next, it must be answered through the words of Ambrose in his book On the Holy Spirit , that the symbol of the Apostles is the exemplar of all of them on account of the authority of those who framed it. But with the other symbol, which is the Nicene, there harmonizes a figure in the number of the Fathers who framed it. For there were three hundred and eighteen, just like the home-born servants of Abraham when he pursued the enemies: for just as he did, so did they capture the enemies of the faith, and bring back the spoils of the faithful, and Lot, that is, the faithful people captured by the wiles of the heretics. Another reason can be: because that Nicene symbol contained fewer doubtful things than the Antiochene one.

§ 25. To the next, it must be said that the symbol of the Apostles is called "greater" on account of the authority of those who framed it: and because this is what all the other symbols interpret: and they add nothing, but they explain what was inherently there before.

§ 26. To the fourth, it must be said that the greater symbol is said twice a day, to signify that its remembrance is necessary twice in the Church, namely in the primitive Church, and at the end against Antichrist: and twice in the life of a man, at the beginning when he receives the sacraments, and at the end when he departs from the body. And twice in the day, at the first hour of the day so that it may fortify him throughout the whole day. Whence also it is sung then:

Jam lucis orto sidere, etc. And at the first hour, as it were, of the night, at Compline: and therefore it is sung then:

Te lucis ante terminum Rerum creator poscimus, etc.

But the symbol of the Fathers, which is an explanation against heresies, is sufficient to say sometimes for understanding: and this on Sunday, when there is a cessation from servile works, and the people can assemble to listen: and therefore also in some lands that symbol is expounded in the vernacular every Sunday. It is said after the Gospel: because it is confirmed by the Gospel. And before communion: so that he who does not believe should not approach: because that is the sacrament in which faith is at its highest, inasmuch as it cannot be proved by reason.

§ 27. To the fifth, it must be said that the symbol of the Apostles is said in silence for two reasons: one of which is on the part of the believers: because since that symbol contains nothing but a simple confession of faith, and this suffices for anyone in himself, therefore it suffices to say it in silence. The second is on the part of those who promulgated it, who were then placed in fear with the doors closed, and did not dare to confess Christ openly. But the symbol of the Fathers is said in public, on account of two causes opposite to those, namely because it contains the explanation of faith by disputing against the clamor of the heretics: and therefore the Church thus echoes loudly against them: and because it was promulgated when the liberty of the Church was already prevailing, when they openly confessed Christ.

§ 28. To the sixth, it must be said that the symbol of Athanasius chiefly contains an explanation, or rather an extirpation of the Arian perfidy, and prolixly all the things which are posited in the Nicene: and therefore it is sung at Prime, so that the one following in the Mass can be understood from it.

§ 29. To the next, it must be said that if necessity urged it, the Pope could still, having convoked a council of experts, and having invoked the Holy Spirit, explain something that is implicitly contained in the symbol of the Apostles, and place it among the explicit articles: because this would not be inventing a new article, but explaining one that was always there: and Anselm says this in his book On the Procession of the Holy Spirit .

Articulus 8 — Whether We Are Bound To Believe Some Things That Are Not Articles

Are we bound to believe any things that are not articles?

Fifthly, it is inquired whether we are bound to believe any things that are not articles? And it seems that we are: because 1. He who does not believe that fornication is a mortal sin is considered a heretic: if therefore this is infidelity: therefore its opposite is faith: therefore that fornication is a mortal sin is an article. And the same objection holds for all others.

1. Again, certain things seem to belong to the articles which are believed prior to faith, as was said: because the Apostle says that he that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and is a rewarder to them that seek him . If therefore it is necessary to believe this when coming to God: it seems that this is a credible thing prior to faith.

If on account of this it is said that "fornication is a mortal sin" is an article of faith, and "God is" is not. ON THE CONTRARY: That fornication is a mortal sin is not a truth about God: therefore it is not an article.

1. Again, that God exists is either posited in the symbol as an article, or as part of an article: therefore it seems that it is false that it is antecedent to faith, as it seems.
2. Again, it binds to believing: therefore it is an article.
3. Again, it is an indivisible truth about God: therefore it is an article.
4. Again, he who does not believe is an infidel: therefore by the opposite, faith is about it as an article.

§ 31. Solution: It must be said that just as in other sciences certain things are principal and certain things substantial, like the principal conclusions of the art: but certain things are consequent, like the secondary conclusions: from which nevertheless something further can be inferred in the work of the art, just as in geometry there are suppositions, theorems, and corollaries: so it is also in faith. And first it is necessary, in my judgment, to suppose that which is required to believe God and to believe to God: and this is that God exists, and that His words in Scripture are true: and these are suppositions and axioms. But the articles themselves are like the principal conclusions of the science: and the things which pertain to good morals are like consequent corollaries. And all these things must be believed and received through faith, according to how it is taken in a broad sense. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 32. To the next, it must be said that this belongs to faith, insofar as it is to believe God and to believe to God: for that faith which believes in God first approaches through a tendency toward God: and although these are sometimes simultaneous in time, nevertheless they are prior and posterior by nature.

§ 33. To the next, it must be said that as has been said, we believe many things by faith as they follow consequentially, which are not articles, namely not principally.

§ 34. To the next, which is objected concerning believing God, it must be said that the articles are posited according as they refer to believing God and believing in God: but not to believing to God, because this pertains to the understanding of Scripture, as a thing heard.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Same Thing Can At Once Be Known And Believed

Can the same thing simultaneously be known and believed?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says in that chapter C, After this it is usually inquired: Since faith is concerning non-apparent things, etc.

For it seems that the same thing could be simultaneously known and believed.

1. For sensitive cognition is lower than intellective: and yet the intellective does not exclude it, nor conversely: rather it aids it in many things: therefore it seems, since faith and science relate to each other in this way, that one does not exclude the other.
2. Again, a lesser light does not remove a greater one, although it may be seen less than before: therefore it seems that neither does faith remove science, nor conversely.
3. Again, some Philosopher comes to the faith, like Justin, Dionysius, Apollophanes, and many others, who knew through natural reasons that there is one God: if therefore faith evacuates science, it would be necessary that they forgot those reasons, which is false: therefore science and faith can be concerning the same thing.
4. Again, we daily seek natural reasons, and those not founded upon the principles of faith, and we find many by which the faith can be defended: but it is certain that those can generate the habit of science: therefore the same thing can be known and believed.
5. Again, Job 12:7 says: Ask the beasts, and they shall teach thee. And, Psalm 18:2: The heavens shew forth the glory of God. Therefore it seems that from the creatures themselves natural reasons can be had by which something is proved about God.
6. Again, an example is usually given concerning the blessed and glorious Virgin: because she knew by experience that she had conceived without male seed by the Holy Spirit, and she believed the same thing: therefore the same thing is believed and known.

§ 36. BUT AGAINST this it is commonly objected:

1. Through that of John 14:2: I go to prepare a place for you, where the Gloss says: "Let the Lord depart, lest He be seen: let Him be hidden, so that He may be believed. For then a place is prepared, if having been believed by faith He is desired, so that being desired He may be possessed ." Therefore it seems that faith is aided by being hidden. Reason, however, does not make one believe.
2. Again, it was held above that faith is of non-apparent things: therefore it is not of known things, because known things are highly apparent.
3. Again, Master Hugh says, and it was held above, that science is above faith: therefore it evacuates it: because an imperfect habit is useless when the perfect one is had: because the Apostle says, I Corinthians 13:10: But when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away.
4. Again, in things which are under opinion, science evacuates opinion: therefore also faith.

5. Again, they object with a secular objection, that the love of God for His own sake, when it enters the heart, evacuates the love of God for the sake of temporal things: therefore similarly faith, when it comes, evacuates assent on account of reason.

6. Again, John 4:42: And they said to the woman, namely the Samaritans: We now believe, not for thy saying: for we ourselves have heard him, and know that this is indeed the saviour of the world. But the woman there holds the place of science which is through reason: therefore science accepted through reason in some credible thing, is evacuated by the arriving faith.

§ 37. Solution: It must be said that faith and science are concerning the same thing, but not in the same respect: and therefore one does not evacuate the other: and therefore I concede the reasons first adduced, understanding it in this way: but faith does not assent on account of reason, but reason is there under faith, and similarly science.

§ 38. To the first therefore which is objected, it must be said that the Gloss there wishes to say that the assent of the Apostles is more meritorious if it is hidden as to corporal sight: and this is true, because faith has the greater merit by as much as reason provides it less experience.

§ 39. To the next, it must be said that in the manner in which faith is of that article, there cannot be science or reason concerning the same: and how this is so has already been explained quite often above.

§ 40. To the next, it must be said that Hugh is speaking of the science which is intellective of the truth, which is by vision face to face, not of the science which is in the wayfarer from reason: because that is much less certain than faith is: although concerning this we also gave another rationale above.

§ 41. To the next, it must be said that I think it is false: for there can be opinion and science about this: and especially among different people, and even in the same person, although he relies more on science.

§ 42. To the next, it must be said that I do not believe him to be without mortal sin who loves God only for the sake of temporal things. But if he loves God for His own sake, and with Him temporal things only for use, not for fruition: then that love need not be evacuated.

But if you say that he loves God indeed above all things, but nevertheless loves temporal things immoderately below God: then the simile which is adduced is of no value: because this love is then a venial sin, the appetite for which is absorbed by perfect charity. Science, however, is meritorious, and not a sin at all.

§ 43. To the next, it must be said that that allegory proves nothing, except that faith does not assent merely on account of reason: and this is true, and conceded by us.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Master Sufficiently Posits The Number Of The Things To Be Believed

Does the Master sufficiently posit the number of credible things?

Does the Master sufficiently posit the number of credible things?

Then it is inquired concerning what Augustine says, there, C, around the middle: There are other things, which unless we understand, we do not believe, etc.

For here the Master seems to introduce the credible things deficiently: because

1. In the original, namely in the book of Eighty-Three Questions , one more credible thing is posited, which namely is always believed and never understood, such as the histories of all deeds: and he does not adduce this here.
2. Again, here in the Letter he intimates, and in the original he says, that in divine things one must believe first, and afterwards understand: and this is not seen in all divine things, such as that God is one.
3. Again, there is no assent to anything unless it is first understood what it is that is being said by the name at least: therefore the intellect indeed precedes every act of believing: and he denies this in the Letter.
4. Again, II Corinthians 3:5: Not that we are sufficient; where the Gloss says: "It is not believed, unless it is first thought."

§ 45. Solution: It must be said that if we speak of assent as it respects the antecedents and consequents to the articles themselves, then this credible thing is in faith: because then that which will be in the history of the canonical books is always believed, and never understood: and to believe what precedes understanding will be in the credible things into which natural reason is capable of reaching: and to believe what precedes the understanding of truth will be with respect to the credible things which are not apprehended through reason, such as that God is triune and one, and things of this sort. But the Master here does not intend except concerning the latter two: and therefore he omits the first.

And therefore the solution to the first and the second is clear.

§ 46. To the next, it must be said that it seems to me it must well be conceded that every believed thing is preceded by the understanding of what it is that is said by the discourse: but the Master is not speaking of this here, but rather of the understanding of the thing.

§ 47. To the next, it must be said that that Gloss is speaking of faith according as it is from hearing, or of the intellect which is to know what it is that is said by the discourse.

Articulus 11 — Whether To Know God Is To Behold Him With The Mind And To Perceive Him Firmly

Is knowing God to behold Him with the mind and firmly perceive Him?

Then it is inquired concerning that definition which Augustine gives, there, C, around the middle: What is it to know God, but to behold Him with the mind, and firmly perceive Him?

For how is "to behold with the mind" understood here? For either he understands it through a mirror, and in an enigma: or through a species. If in the first way: then it is not to know, but rather to believe. But if in the second way: this does not seem true: because thus He will only be seen in the fatherland: therefore it seems that God is not known.

§ 49. BUT AGAINST: Damascene: "The cognition of God's existence is naturally inserted into all ." Therefore it seems that God is known.

§ 50. Solution: Augustine is speaking of the science of approbation which is mixed with the affect: for thus He is beheld by the mind, while He is tasted through experience in gifts, and this is something beyond faith and short of vision.

§ 51. To the first therefore it must be said that the mirror is not the only thing in which He is seen: for sometimes it is an exterior creature having a vestige: and sometimes with an image of grace, which is similar to beatitude: and thus he speaks here: whence also the firmness of this perception is from faith adhering through sight, and charity penetrating through affect.

Articulus 12 — Whether Faith Is Rather Through Sight Than Through Hearing

Is faith rather through sight, than through hearing?

Then it is inquired concerning what he says, there, C, toward the end: Nor are those things which are believed before they are understood utterly unknown, since faith is by hearing, etc.

For since faith is a certain thought: and thought is produced by invention and doctrine, it seems rather to be through sight, than through hearing: because

1. Sight serves invention, and hearing serves doctrine: and invention is more powerful than doctrine.
2. Again, sight is a more noble sense than hearing, and of more doctrines, and more certifying of those things which belong to every sense: therefore it seems that it ought rather to be from sight, than from hearing.

§ 53. Solution: It must be said that hearing always receives discipline from another: and because faith is from another higher light, and not from our own invention: therefore hearing is more fitting to it than sight: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 54. To the next, it must be said that sight is more noble when they are referred to their proper objects: but here it is not so: but rather it is called an interior hearing, which is the acceptance of the notice of the First Truth from another: and therefore that objection does nothing to the proposition.

DISTINCTIO XXV

Divisio Textus

§ 55. Division of the Text

To the aforesaid things must be added concerning the sufficiency of faith, etc.

Here begins that part in which faith is treated according to its comparison to believers.

And it has two parts; in the first of which the state of faith is touched upon according to the diversity of time. In the second, its equality in the believer to hope and charity, which begins, there, E, That also is not to be passed over, that faith, hope, charity, etc.

But in the first there are three parts: for first he posits concerning the faith of the Fathers: secondly, he touches upon the faith of the simple ones, there, B, What therefore shall be said of those simple ones, etc. In the third, it is adjoined concerning the faith of Cornelius, there, D, It is also usually inquired concerning Cornelius, etc.

Now four doubts are incident concerning the first. First, namely: Can faith grow? Second: Was it ever sufficient to believe about God, that He is, and that He is a rewarder to them that seek Him? Third: Can falsity underlie faith? Fourth: Since an article is said to bind one to believe, does it bind one to believe explicitly, or implicitly?

Articulus 1 — Whether Faith Can Grow

Can faith grow?

To the first it is objected thus: 1. Master Hugh of St. Victor in his book On the Sacraments, part ten, says thus: "There are two things according to which faith is said to grow: thought and affect, that is, constancy, or firmness of believing, and according to cognition, when one is erudite unto science: according to affect, when one is excited to devotion, and strengthened unto constancy [272]." From this it is accepted that faith can grow.

1. If perhaps you say that it does not grow in the number of articles, but in the illumination of believers: because some understand more clearly those things which they believe, from study, than others do. Against this: Hugh, in the same place, "Faith grew over time in all, so that it might be greater: but it was not changed, so that it would be another faith before the law, when God was believed as creator, and salvation and redemption were expected from Him. But through whom and how the same salvation would be fulfilled and perfected, excepting a few to whom it was singularly given as a gift to know this, was not known by the rest even of the faithful." Therefore it seems that there was then neither an article of the incarnation, nor of the passion, nor was there then any expression of an article concerning the faith: of those articles, I say, which are concerning the humanity of Christ. Therefore faith grew according to the number of articles, as it seems.

Adonai I did not reveal to them. However, it is established that later He revealed. Therefore, faith increased.

1. Likewise, Psalm 118:100: I have understood more than the elders. Therefore, it seems that the elders did not believe as many articles as he who was after them.

Likewise, Acts 2:17: I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams. Therefore, the young see something of the credibles, which the elders did not see. Therefore, faith increased.

Likewise, Gregory in a certain Homily on that of the Gospel: Blessed are the eyes that see what you see?, says thus: Therefore, it seems that according to the increments of times the knowledge of the holy spiritual Fathers increased: and the closer they were to the advent of the Savior, the more fully they perceived the mystery of salvation. Faith increased.

1. Likewise, above it was held in the division of symbols, that from twelve articles fourteen were made: and with the same cause existing, they could still be distinguished further: therefore, it seems that faith could increase in the number of articles, and still can increase, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Faith is a simple light, illuminating to eternal truth: but eternal truth cannot increase: therefore, neither can faith.

1. Likewise, in every article divine truth is supposed and explained through those things which pertain to our salvation, or through those things which are from eternity in God: and on the part of the eternals it is established that it cannot increase: but on the part of the temporals there is a disposition ordained from eternity, which also cannot be increased: therefore, faith cannot increase in terms of articles.
2. Likewise, if faith increased in the number of articles, since articles are of the substance of faith, faith would be changed according to substance: and this is denied in the Letter: therefore, it seems that the number of articles does not increase.
3. Likewise, implicit faith is of as many as explicit: because implication or explication are on our part, and not on the part of the articles: since therefore the faith of the ancients and ours do not differ except by explicit and implicit, it does not seem that it increased in the number of articles.
4. Likewise, if it were said that faith increased because of implication and explication, since continuously through the study of Doctors the articles are more explained, it would seem to increase continuously: and this is said by no one: therefore, faith did not increase, as it seems.

Solution: It must be said with Master Hugh, that faith increases in two ways on the part of the believer: but in no way in itself, whether as to the believed. On the part of the believer it increases as to the intellect, and as to the affection. But as to the intellect in four ways, namely by revelation illuminating from above, by doctrine explaining, by the thing believed happening, and by the study of truth opening the intellect. By revelation indeed: because he who receives more ample revelations, sees the believed more clearly, and perceives better. By doctrine explaining: because the more an article is expressed with more properties, or more articles are expressed, the better they are understood, as we said above: because concerning the article of eternal generation, and the procession of the Holy Spirit, the Fathers made more expressions in the Nicene synod: and therefore the faithful understanding better, more guarded against the heretical sense concerning the articles. Some Fathers also taught more articles, some more explicitly than others: and therefore they had better knowledge of the faith. By the thing believed also happening, the knowledge of faith increases: because as Jerome says, What is seen with the eyes is better understood than what is predicted to happen. Also, the reason for understanding the believed is opened through study, as Anselm says in the Proslogion: because faith itself sometimes seeks understanding through study. But on the part of the affection it increases in three ways, namely because it purifies the affection more and more, according to how it teaches to be more removed from sins. Secondly also, because it removes from the phantasms of natural reasons: because they do not begin to taste as before, on account of the devotion and fervor of the affection concerning the believed. Thirdly also, it gives constancy, as in certain works, such as martyrdom: and thus the faithful dares to confess the faith before kings and princes. But on the part of the articles in themselves, I well concede that it did not progress, nor does it progress: because they rely on the first truth: and the number of them is determined by that and not by man.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Master Hugh understands concerning the progress, which is rather of the faithful in faith, than of faith in the faithful.

To the other, it must be said that the articles did not increase in themselves, but the explanation and revelation of the articles increased: and this is not for the article to increase, except per accidens: for although perhaps the passion was not then determinately known to someone, yet it was an article, and was believed implicitly by them, when any mode of liberation from future things was believed by them.

To the other, it must be said that it is not understood concerning the manifestation of the article, but rather of God, in which man increases from day to day: and the knowledge of God always becomes marvelous in the progress of man in it, nor can it be perfectly in it, on account of which the Psalm says 104:4: Seek the Lord, and be confirmed. Seek his face always.

TO THE THREE following authorities, it must be said that they prove nothing except the progress of man in the knowledge of the articles according to number.

To the other, it must be said that the division of articles is made in many ways: yet the thing remains one, which is divided in different ways by different considerations, yet the thing is not increased: just as if conception and nativity are referred to one article, or to two things, one remains, but they are considered in different ways.

272. Hugh of St. Victor, De Sacramentis, lib. I, pars 10.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Ever Sufficed To Believe Of God That He Is, And That He Is A Rewarder Of Those Who Seek Him

Whether it ever sufficed to believe about God, that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether it ever sufficed to believe about God, that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him?

It seems, however, that it does: because

1. The Apostle says this.
2. Likewise, this suffices for tending towards God through the knowledge of the first truth: but to believe that He is, shows towards what one tends: and to believe that He is a rewarder, moves from hope and love of the reward, so that we may tend: therefore these two sufficed and suffice.
3. Likewise, for a movement to be made through appetite in us towards something, only two things are required, namely that a delightful apprehension is made, and there is an appetite for it: but to believe that He is, makes apprehension: however, to believe that He is a rewarder, makes appetite: therefore those two suffice for the movement of faith: therefore it suffices to believe those two.
4. Likewise, in the state of innocence Adam did not foresee, nor pre-believe, so to speak, his fall: but if he had not fallen, there would have been no need for a redeemer nor mediator: therefore he was not bound to believe anything about the mediator: therefore it sufficed to believe that God is, and that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him: because the same reason applies to the articles that are about the mediator and others.

1. Likewise, in the state after sin there was no open prophecy, nor revelation that we know of: therefore since the article is above reason, reason was not bound to be moved towards it without revelation: therefore it seems, that it sufficed then to believe those things which nature alone dictated, as it seems.
2. Likewise, let us suppose, that no revelation has been made to someone: and he does what natural law dictates, and we are in the time of the law of Moses or natural law: it is certain, that he will be saved: because the Apostle says, that what is by nature will judge the foreskin, fulfilling the law, you, who through the letter and circumcision are a transgressor of the law.

Since therefore nothing then dictates anything about the mediator, it is not necessary to believe, except those two things which reason dictates.

But against this is

1. What is said in the Letter through several authorities, where it is proven, that it was necessary to have faith in the mediator.

1. Likewise, for the salvation of the sick it was necessary to know beforehand the disease, and the quality of the disease: but the quality of the disease was such, as Anselm proves, that it could not be satisfied for, unless by God and man: therefore it was necessary to believe in the liberator and mediator.
2. Likewise, all who were saved from the beginning, knew that they were to be saved not by their own merits, but by the grace of God: since therefore there is no grace except through Jesus Christ, as it is said, John 1:17: Grace and truth came through Jesus Christ: it was necessary to believe that the savior was to come, and to satisfy for man.

Solution: It seems to me well necessary and true, that from the beginning of the state of sin no one was ever saved by grace, except through faith in the mediator. But the mediator is to be considered in two ways, namely in particular according to the sacraments by which he mediated, or universally according to whatever he wished to mediate: and in the first way it seems to me according to Master Hugh, who expressly says this, that the ancients were not bound to believe explicitly, but in the second way all were. However, in the first way only those to whom revelation was made, and others who were instructed by them, provided they could understand their instruction. In the state of innocence, however, it seems to me, that Adam had clearer knowledge than we, but only about the deity, and what pertains to the eternal distinction of persons: but not in those things which pertain to the reconciliation made through Christ.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that this suffices for one approaching God: but when it is said that He is, I do not believe that it is supposed, that He is only in the universal, because this is investigated by reason alone or natural knowledge, but because He is determined in certain articles determined by revelation: and when it is said that He is a rewarder of those who seek Him, this contributes to hope and love.

To the other it must be said, that because He is in the universal simply, it does not suffice to show the end in this way by which one tends towards Him through faith: but it is necessary, that in some distinctions of articles it is specified: for indeed because He is does not move towards anything, because knowledge in the universal does not move, but in the particular distinction of which the property is known.

Through this also the response to the following is clear.

To the other it was previously answered: because what sufficed for Adam, does not suffice for him who knows himself to be in sin, and cannot be cured by himself: however, I do not believe, that Adam in the first state only believed, because He is in the universal: but rather he believed certain articles, although he did not believe in act those which pertained to the mediator.

To the other it must be said, that it supposed something false: because Master Hugh says, that immediately the signs of healing through the offering of Christ began to be manifested from the beginning of the world, and consequently revelation to be made, as in the sacrifice of Abel, and thereafter in all: and the Apostle touches on this, in Hebrews 11:4, saying: By faith Abel offered to God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain:... and through it, though dead, he still speaks.

To the other they commonly say, that it is impossible, that there was anyone who did what was in him sufficiently to prepare himself, and did not receive revelation from God, or doctrine from inspired men, or a sign of the mediator: and I think, that this is true because of God's providence providing good equally to all, and offering to all, provided we are prepared to receive.

Articulus 3 — Whether Something False Could Fall Under Faith, And Whether Necessary Truth Falls Under Faith

Whether falsehood could be present in faith? and,
Whether necessary truth is present in faith?

Whether falsehood could be present in faith? and,
Whether necessary truth is present in faith?

Thirdly, it is asked, Whether falsehood could be present in faith?

It seems that it could: because
1. Faith was about the mediator: and Augustine says that another mode was possible for healing our misery, but none more fitting. However, if another had occurred, then falsehood would have been present in faith: therefore, it is not necessary that what is believed should occur.

1. Likewise, it is commonly objected concerning Abraham, who believed he would sacrifice his son, and did not: therefore, he believed something false: therefore, falsehood was present in his faith.
2. Likewise, falsehood can be present in the will: just as the Apostle wished to go to the Spaniards, and did not: therefore, falsehood can also be present in faith.

Likewise, falsehood can be present in hope: because many hope to have eternal life, and yet will never have it: therefore, falsehood could also be present in faith.

1. Likewise, let us suppose that some priest in the Mass elevates some unconsecrated host at the time and place when a consecrated one ought to be elevated: then those present believe it to be consecrated, and it is false: therefore, falsehood can be present in faith.

But on the contrary:
1. The Philosopher says that virtue is more certain than art: but falsehood is not present in art: therefore, neither in virtue: therefore, neither in faith.

1. Likewise, faith on the way is about those things of which there is vision in the homeland: and falsehood cannot be present in vision: therefore, neither in faith.
2. Likewise, faith is an assimilation to the first truth: and falsehood cannot be present in the first truth: therefore, neither in faith.
3. Likewise, divine truth is above every truth of all science: but one adhering to known truth never falls into falsehood, because falsehood is not known: therefore, much less one adhering to faith.
4. Likewise, faith is the argument and conviction of things not appearing most true: yet it is more certain to us than the divine nature which is supposed in the articles: but in secular sciences, the reason and principle of the argument is never about falsehood: therefore, much less faith: therefore, falsehood cannot be present in faith.

But then it is further asked, Whether necessary truth or contingent truth is present in faith?

It seems, however, that it is contingent: because

1. In the first book of the Sentences, in the treatise on omnipotence, it is proven that the contingent follows lower causes, and the necessary likewise, because otherwise all things would be necessary: but the remission of sins, which is believed in one article, depends on the will of him to whom they are remitted: therefore, it is not necessary: therefore, contingent truth is subject to faith.
2. Likewise, another mode was possible for our liberation: therefore, this one was not necessary, but could not be: therefore, contingent truth is present in faith.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
If contingent truth is subject to faith: and what happens contingently, contingently does not happen, as the Philosopher says: therefore, it happens otherwise than is believed: therefore, falsehood would be present in faith, which is impossible: therefore, only necessary truth is present in faith, as it seems.

Solution: It must be said that only immutably true is present in faith, yet not necessary: and this is because, as we said in the question on the necessity of predestination, there is a necessity of order, which is the immutable event of the consequent if the antecedent is supposed: and if the consequent changes, then the antecedent never was, although the consequent in itself is contingent: thus we say here, that faith is about immutably true: for if faith is about something, it will immutably occur: yet it will not be necessary in itself: and if it does not occur, then faith was never about it.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that faith was about the mediator: and given this, that faith was about this, it immutably happened that the mediator came to be. And what Augustine says, he understands of this said mediator being considered in itself. Some solve it to the man, not to the reason.

For it is objected thus: Abraham believed the mediator would be: this is said of the past true: therefore, it is necessary: therefore, the contingent is necessary, namely, that the mediator would be. They say, therefore, that this saying depended on the future: and therefore it does not follow the rule and necessity of past things: and this is nothing: because it does not happen in the past, but in the order of faith: to the believed. Hence others say otherwise, that namely Abraham did not believe the mediator would be, but that the mediator would be future. For it is one thing for a thing to be future, and another for a thing to be: because when it is said that a thing is future, only the order in the disposition of the material cause to a certain outcome expected in the future is noted: and that order is, whether the thing was or not: for the Philosopher says in the book on Generation and Corruption, that one who is future to walk, does not walk. But when it is said, the Mediator will be: then the extremes of that order are noted to be placed in the future, and thus they can not occur with the order itself remaining. However, this solution holds well in contingents of the future, in which the order of the power of speech is noted only to lower causes: but in faith and predestination, the order of divine illumination to the future is noted, which illumination is certain, and in the extremes of the order the outcome of the future, and in the ordination itself: hence also Abraham did not only believe that Christ would be future, but that Christ would be incarnated and from his seed: hence it is clear that that solution does not hold. But the previously stated solution is valid and common.

By this also the solution to all similar objections is clear.

To the other it must be said that it was not that believing of faith that Abraham believed he would sacrifice his son, but rather of the opinion of obedience, and to that falsehood can well be present.

To the following it must be said that those do not pertain to the proposed: because the will and hope do not have a proper object, and truth, nor the opposite falsehood, as faith does: and therefore the will of the Apostle which was caused by human opinion, could be frustrated in the willed, because the opinion did not occur.

Similarly, hope which speaks of the expectation of future beatitude, does not have a true object, nor the opposite falsehood: but it can be frustrated from the expected beatitude, not from a defect of hope, but from a defect of the one hoping, who does not continue a good life until death, like Judas.

To the other it must be said that this was responded to above: because the condition is either supposed or added on the part of the worshiper, that it be celebrated rightly, and then it is always true: yet it is nothing to the proposed, because this believing by which I am said to believe this host is consecrated, is not an act of faith, but of opinion.

Articulus 4 — Whether An Article Constrains To Believe Explicitly Or Implicitly

Does an article bind to believe explicitly or implicitly?

Fourthly, it is asked, since an article is said to bind to believe, whether it binds to believe explicitly or implicitly?

It seems, however, that it binds to believe implicitly.
1. By authority: for a man is not bound to believe what in no way becomes known to the intellect, which is what is said by the word, concerning which it was held above, which precedes all that is credible: but what even the Angels are ignorant of, in no way becomes known to man: but, Isaiah 63:1: concerning that, "Who is this that comes from Edom?" the Gloss of Jerome says thus:

It is openly declared that certain Angels did not fully know until the mystery of the incarnation was completed.

1. Likewise, Ephesians 3:10: "That it might be made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places," etc. Therefore, it seems that man was not bound to know that explicitly.
2. Likewise, Chrysostom in Homily 1 on John: "We are greatly honored, that the Angels learned with us through the voice of John."
3. Likewise, on that: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost," the Gloss says: "The fragments are sacred mysteries, which the common people cannot grasp: therefore, it seems that not everyone is bound to believe the articles explicitly."
4. Likewise, Ephesians 3:9, on that: "What is the dispensation of the mystery hidden," the Gloss says: "hidden from the creatures of all ages, and existing in the knowledge of God alone."
5. Likewise, by reason thus: In the demonstration of knowable things, it happens that something is known implicitly in the universal, which, however, is doubtful in the particular: just as we know universally that every triangle has three angles equal to two right angles: and yet I can doubt about this wooden triangle, whether it has three angles equal to two right angles: therefore, much more can this happen in faith, which is entirely above reason.
6. Likewise, if an article were said to bind to believe because it binds explicitly, then many would have been damned and would still be damned today, who do not know the distinction of articles.
7. Furthermore, according to this, other things than articles would also bind to believe: because it is said, Hebrews 11:3: "By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear."
8. Likewise, Moses, when he was born, was hidden for three months, etc. And, Rahab the harlot did not perish with the unbelievers, and many such things which are not articles, and yet are accepted under faith as consequences of faith. Therefore, it seems that one is not bound to believe explicitly.

9. Furthermore, this is said in the Letter in the second part of this distinction.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY!
1. Boethius says that evil is not avoided unless it is known: but everyone is bound to avoid infidelity against any article: therefore, one is bound to know each explicitly.

1. Likewise, Galatians 5:3: "I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law." Therefore, it is necessary to believe all articles explicitly.
2. Likewise, if it sufficed to believe implicitly in the omnipotent and redeemer in whatever way one wished, then all philosophers and many heretics would have had implicit faith: but this is false: therefore, explicit faith is required.
3. Likewise, Leviticus 14:12, concerning the cleansing of the leper, it is said: "He shall offer, namely for his cleansing, a sextary of oil," and the Gloss says that the sextary of oil is the measure of faith, in which if there is more, it is poured out: if less, it fails: therefore, one is bound to offer the whole measure of the articles.
4. Likewise, Deuteronomy 27:8, it is commanded to Moses that he should write the law clearly and openly on stones: and the Gloss says that the stones are the laity: therefore, they are bound to believe the articles clearly and distinctly.
5. Likewise, faith is from hearing: but hearing is through the word of Christ, as it is said, Romans 10:17. But hearing explains all things, and similarly the word of God contains nothing implicitly: therefore, it seems that the faithful ought to believe explicitly.
6. Likewise, we see that the laity are taken and examined concerning the most hidden articles of faith: and if they are found to err or not know, they are left as heretics: therefore, it seems that they are bound to know and believe explicitly.
7. Likewise, let us suppose some simple and pious old woman having reverence for her pastor, about whom she knows nothing evil, hears heresy from her pastor, and believes it because she thinks whatever he says is to be believed: shall we say she is damned if she dies in such a state: or if she is apprehended, shall she be burned as a heretic? It seems not: because ignorance excuses from all. But if you say, yes: then she will be bound to know the articles explicitly, even if untaught by another: because if she must be taught, it will be necessary for her to be taught by her own pastor.
8. Likewise, charity is about loving God and neighbor: and it is necessary to know each distinctly: therefore, since faith similarly relates to articles, it seems that faith ought to know the articles distinctly.

Solution: Without prejudice, I say that neither before the advent nor after, without divine revelation and teaching, is one bound to know the articles explicitly, but implicitly, but this being most certainly supposed, there is no doubt that revelation is of the Church, and it has always been made to the Church: and whoever such are called the greater, because others are to be instructed by them: and this is done differently now, differently in ancient times. For in ancient times, that revelation was made for the manifestation of the articles, but now it is made for their exposition, because all are declared which must be believed. Therefore, the simple before the advent and the simple after the advent are not bound to know explicitly, nor even implicitly, except insofar as they are taught by the greater, and can perceive with the intellect through teaching: but those who preceded were less bound because of the shadowy teaching which was then: but these are more bound because of the open teaching of truth.

Therefore, it must be said to the first objection that what Boethius says is true: but there is a twofold knowledge, namely explicit and implicit: for it is not necessary for me to know every evil in particular, but only under the counsel of the wise, namely if something uncertain occurs whether it is evil, I will recur to the wise, and by his judgment, I will avoid it. So in faith, if a new doctrine is proposed, I will recur to the priest, and by his judgment, I will believe or not believe.

To the other, it must be said that one is a debtor to the whole faith implicitly, so that he does not disbelieve any of all.

To the other, it must be said that philosophers and heretics did not believe implicitly, because they disbelieved: but the one believing implicitly disbelieves no article, although he does not know explicitly.

To the other, it must be said that the measure is fulfilled by not disbelieving any, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that this is provided so that it may be often and clearly explained to the laity: but this can be done now in the time of grace: and yet because they have a dull sense, they are not bound to understand as explicitly as it is explained to them: because they receive the explanation according to their power of understanding, and not according to the will of the explainer. Before the advent, however, it could not be done except as the time then permitted, namely in shadow and type: and they were less bound than now.

To the other, it must be said that although faith is received distinctly in hearing, yet by the simple, what is heard is not understood, except under a veil, and not distinctly, as was said before.

To the other, it must be said that the laity are not left as heretics because they do not know how to distinguish certain articles: but because they contradict them pertinaciously when they are explained to them: for this could not happen unless they had already received infidelity from heretics against the article: for if they were burned because they do not know how to distinguish or explain articles, the inquisitors themselves would have to be burned, because they do not know much better either.

To the other, it must be said that in that case, the Doctors respond doubtfully: but all agree that they sin mortally by disbelieving an article pertinaciously. But if she doubts, ready to amend, they say it is a human temptation. Hence some say that if she insists on works of piety, whatever she can, God will illuminate her, that she should not believe that priest in such doctrine. But if she does not do whatever she can, then she should impute the cause of her blindness to herself. But because this response is based on uncertainty, for which we can find no reason: therefore others say differently, that if it is about an open article which is solemnized in the Church, then she ought to examine with others, whether it is commonly said so: because faith is not of one, but common: and then she can be instructed: but if it is about something hidden, like fornication not being a sin, or the body of Christ not being on the altar, but signified: she should not receive this which is beyond her strength, except under the condition, if the universal Church believes it, and she ought to remain in implicit faith, especially when it is about the body of Christ, because concerning fornication, even the baseness of the act sufficiently shows her that it is a mortal sin. However, this case often occurs in confessions because of the lust of priests, persuading certain women.

To the last, it must be said that it is not similar concerning charity: because charity does not seek reason, but only the object: and it does not distinguish, because it does not love the neighbor except materially: but faith is mixed with a certain knowledge and intellect: and not all are sufficient for that.

Articulus 5 — Whether And How Faith Can Grow

Whether and how faith can increase?

Next, inquiry is made concerning those things which are said in the Text, there, A, in the beginning: Faith indeed is said to be great by knowledge, etc.

1. For this seems to be against what was predetermined, where it was said that it does not increase by the quantity of articles.
2. Furthermore, upon what is the number of this quantity of faith considered?
3. Likewise, should it be conceded that faith is equally great in all articles, or not? It seems that it is not: because one article is about the deity, and another about humanity: and deity is greater than humanity: therefore greater...

It is an article concerning the deity, rather than concerning humanity.

Likewise, it seems that something has been handed down which is not an article, which is the greatest and most difficult to believe, such as the body of Christ being from the transubstantiation of bread and wine. Therefore, it seems that faith is not only great in the quantity of articles, but also in other things, which are not articles, but adjuncts to articles.

Further, it is asked here, if the body of Christ being on the altar is not an article, under what is it contained as an adjunct to the principal?

1. It seems that it is under the omnipotence making all things: because Ambrose says, as if giving a reason: How can it be, which is not great if the word of Christ converts the nature of bread into his body, who created all things from nothing?

Likewise, it seems that it is joined to the article of the passion: because the Apostle said, to the Corinthians 11:26: As often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the death of the Lord until he comes. And the Lord himself, Luke 22:19: Do this in remembrance of me.

1. But it still seems that it is reduced to that, the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of Saints: in the bread collected from many pure grains, it signifies the unity of the Church collected from the persons of the faithful, as the Apostle and Augustine say. Likewise, this seems to show the name: because in Latin it is called communion, in Greek synaxis, because it communicates in the bread of life of the faithful.

Solution: It must be said that the quantity of the article is not said here with respect to number, which increases or decreases, but rather with respect to the quantity of dignity, which each has, by this that the first truth is subjected to it: nor does the Master here enumerate, that in all these it increases: but to show in which it increases, and in which it does not increase.

To the other, it must be said that these are taken according to the four things which are in faith. For faith can be considered in itself: and thus it is said to be great in the quantity of articles: because they are great, who have nothing except the honest, true, and divine: and thus it is not of the laws of other nations which believe shameful, false, and demonic things. On the part of the believer, faith is in the heart, and in the confession of the mouth, as the Apostle says: With the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. On the part of the heart with respect to the intellect and affection, according to the intellect it increases in knowledge, and according to affection in devotion: with respect to confession, however, in the constancy of preaching and boldness of confessing before kings and princes.

To the other, it must be said that with respect to the subject of the articles, which is the first truth: and with respect to the mover to believing, which again is the first truth: and with respect to the end, which again is the same truth: faith is equal in all articles: but with respect to that according to which the diversity of articles is considered, which is as it were connoted in which the truth is expressed in this way and not another, in my judgment it is not equal: and this in two ways. For some are expressed by more dignified things than others, as the objection proves. Some, however, are less repugnant to reason than others, and therefore in those faith is lesser: just as faith is greater in God being triune and one, than in one God being.

To the other, it must be said that the body of Christ being on the altar, and being made from bread and wine, in my judgment is joined to the passion: because the same host is now immolated, which was then immolated: and there its memory is repeated, which was once done for all.

But concerning what is objected about omnipotence, it must be said that omnipotence is in a certain way the proof of all articles: whence also the Angel proved the article of the incarnation to the blessed Virgin thus saying: Because no word will be impossible with God: and therefore that objection does not conclude.

To the other, it must be said that the communion of Saints is the effect of that sacrament, and is not reduced to it as an adjunct to it, and therefore it is called communion, but because the sacrament is a likeness of that of which it is the cause: therefore it also has something similar with it.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Ancients Were Bound To Believe About The Mediator All That We Now Believe, Or It Sufficed For Them To Believe Only Four Things, Namely The Nativity, Death, Resurrection, And Coming To Judgment

Whether the ancients were bound to believe all things about the mediator that we now believe, or was it sufficient for them to believe only four things, namely, the nativity, death, resurrection, and coming to judgment?

Whether the ancients were bound to believe all things about the mediator that we now believe, or was it sufficient for them to believe only four things, namely, the nativity, death, resurrection, and coming to judgment?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, C, around the beginning: To some it seems that it would suffice for them to believe the four, namely, the nativity, death, resurrection, and coming to judgment, etc.

For it seems that there is one reason for all: therefore, according to all, they could believe implicitly or according to none.

1. Likewise, it is asked whether now also these four ought to be believed more explicitly by the simple than others?
2. Likewise, it is asked why those rather than others?

To this it must be said that since there was a disease, the knowledge of the disease was required for salvation, and consequently the nativity of the liberator: and therefore the belief in the coming of the liberator was required, in my judgment, implicitly without specification of the mode, except in those to whom a revelation of the special mode was given: or who received the doctrine from them. However, the presence of the liberator could not be liberation, as was proven above, except through satisfaction for us: and therefore the belief in death was required implicitly. With satisfaction believed, it was necessarily required, as a consequent through effect, the restoration of lost beatitude which is done by implicitly believing in the resurrection, and such a penalty for those despising salvation, which is further done through the coming to judgment. Therefore, since these four are consequently related concerning redemption: therefore, it was more necessary to believe these four.

And through this, the solution to the first and third is clear.

To the second, it must be said that even now, because these are solemnized and more frequently preached, in my judgment, in one who was Christian for some time, it is required that these four be explicitly believed, and implicit faith does not suffice, except perhaps in some adult newly converted.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Is True That John Doubted About The Descent Of Christ To Hell According To The Exposition Of Gregory

Whether it is true that John doubted the descent of Christ into hell according to the exposition of Gregory.

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, around the middle: Who takes the testimony of this matter from John the Baptist, etc.

For this opinion seems to be heretical:

1. With respect to this, that it is expressed in the symbol in the part of the article which Thomas placed, "He descended into hell, on the third day he rose again from the dead."
2. Likewise, Anselm in the book on the Procession of the Holy Spirit says that it is necessary for salvation to believe in the descent into hell.
3. Likewise, all the expositors, except only Gregory, unanimously say that John did not doubt this for himself, but acted in the manner of the disciples who were envious of Christ and doubting. And this appears: because concerning this the Lord responded nothing, whether he himself or another would descend into hell: but rather he showed the disciples arguments of his divinity. And this is also taken from John, where John shows the disciples with many persuasions how he himself ought to decrease, but Christ to increase: because he who comes from heaven is above all.

Solution: I think that it is rashness to say that John doubted, and the beginning of the heresy of the Manicheans, who say that he doubted, and therefore that he is damned: wherefore I excuse Gregory saying this, that he could have doubted concerning the manner of the descent on account of the disciples, who could not doubt this on account of himself: and therefore, about to die, he sent the disciples envious of Christ, so that they might be confounded by sight, and adhere to Christ.

Articulus 8 — Whether Cornelius The Centurion Had Faith In The Incarnation Before Coming To Peter

Whether Cornelius the Centurion before the coming to Peter had faith in the incarnation?

Then it is asked about Cornelius where it says:

It is also customary to inquire about Cornelius, etc.

This especially because of the words of Augustine which are found in the Letter.

1. For it seems that faith is the first truth, as was held above: therefore he did not come to faith through mercy, but rather through faith to mercy.
2. Again, he would not pray to one in whom he in no way believed, as Augustine says there: therefore it seems false that Peter was sent to teach him faith. If perhaps you say that he had implicit faith, but Peter explained it: and this seems to be nothing, since Cornelius was among the greater, and he ought to have had explicit faith.

Solution I think that Cornelius had explicit faith: but nevertheless implicit faith would have sufficed for him: because he was not among the greater except according to the dignity of his office, not among the greater in revelation. However, the explicit faith which he had was concerning the incarnation of Christ related to any time, as we said above, and therefore Peter, the architect of the Church, was sent to determine for him the article which he explicitly believed, to a certain difference of time lest he should expect any longer the one whom Peter himself taught had come. And thus I understand Augustine, who says Peter was sent to instruct in faith, that is, to the determination of faith, not the explanation of the article: and this determination, as we said above, happens to faith in that part in which it is through hearing.

Articulus 9 — Whether Faith, Hope, And Charity Are Equal In The Present

ARTICULUS IX,

Whether faith, hope, and charity are equal in the present?

Then it is asked about what is said in the last chapter, there, "It is also not to be omitted, that faith, hope, charity, and operation, etc."

For this does not seem so: because

1. We believe much more than we love: because there is nothing we do not believe, and yet love is lacking.
2. Likewise, in natural motions it is not necessary that we always love what we know ought to be loved: therefore, neither in spiritual matters is it necessary that we love what we believe ought to be loved.
3. If perhaps you judge that what is said here is understood of the habits themselves, which are infused together and contained in grace making one pleasing: this seems to be nothing, because operation is not infused together with them, but follows them as an effect from them.
4. Likewise, in the text it is also said that the aforementioned equality is properly considered according to the intensity of the interior acts: therefore, it seems that almost none of the solutions of those saying that this is understood according to the spiritual quantity of the habits is valid.

If for this reason it were said that what is said here is not true:

1. This is against the sayings of the Saints, both here and in Apocalypse 21:16, where it says that the sides of the city are equal: and the Gloss says that the sides are faith, hope, and charity, and operation.
2. Likewise, with one virtue infused, all are infused because of the grace from which none is separated, because each is a part of that virtual whole: therefore, for the same reason, with one increased, all are increased: therefore, they are equal.

3. Likewise, if this equality happens to all, why is it posited here more about those three than about others?

4. Likewise, Gregory in the Homily of Pentecost says that charity is great, therefore it seems that if it is, if however it ceases to operate, charity is not: also operation follows the quantity of charity.

Solution: It must be said that this equality is considered in two ways, namely according to habits: and then it is among the three virtues: and according to acts, and thus it exceeds the fourth which is operation. But operation can be considered in two ways, namely according to its relation to that which informs and elicits it. If the act is considered in the first way, I do not think it is true that the operation of one virtue is equal to the operation of another, nor that the operation of the same virtue is always according to the whole power of the same virtue: for it happens that one loves more fervently than the great charity is in the heart: and it happens that one loves less fervently than the charity is in the heart. However, if the operation is considered in relation to that which informs it, since this is grace, then I say it is equal: because a lesser operation in the genus of operation informed by greater grace and charity is worth more for the substantial merit of eternal life than a greater one informed and elicited by lesser charity.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that that objection proceeds from the operation comparable to free will, which administers the act: which because it behaves differently in devotion and sadness, just as a man never remains in the same state, therefore also the acts are different, but in comparison to the grace eliciting and informing they are equal.

To the other it must be said that it is not so in natural affections: because they are not united in one, as virtues are in grace: and from that union it is that with one increased, all are increased, and that all are equal.

To the other it must be said that I well concede that it is not understood of habits only, and that this happens to all virtues: but it is especially attributed to these: because these alone are theological: and they tend immediately to God, and direct all others as if leading to God, to whom all our work is referred.

To the other it must be said that the saying of Gregory is understood according to the comparison of the act to the informing habit, and not to the acting free will. However, it must be noted that some easily extricate themselves, saying that it is not understood as equal in species, but only in genus; as if one is great, and the other is great, and vice versa: but not that so much by equality. But the solution does not stand: because equality is expressed in the text by "as much" and "as great," as is clear to the one inspecting.

DISTINCTIO XXVI

Divisio Textus

Hope, moreover, is a virtue by which spiritual and eternal goods are hoped for, etc. Having treated of faith, he touches here in one distinction on hope, about which he determines in two ways, namely in itself, and on the part of the one hoping, there, C, After this it remains in the trace, etc.

In itself, however, he touches on three things concerning hope: first, namely, what it is? And second, in what it agrees with faith, there, B, And just as faith, Third, in what it differs from faith and hope, etc. there, B, §2: Nevertheless, faith is distinguished from hope, etc.

And from this the division is clear. The sentence is plain in the Letter.

Articulus 1 — Whether Hope Is In The Genus Of Virtue

Whether hope is in the genus of virtue?

There arise, however, before Siéferam three questions, of which the first is, whether hope is in the genus of virtue?

Secondly, supposing that it is a virtue, it is asked whether it is a virtue separate from certain other virtues, or conjoined with them?

Thirdly, it is asked, In which power of the soul is hope, and what is its act, and object, and end?

To the first, it is thus proceeded: It seems that hope is not a virtue thus:

1. From Horace and Tully and certain other Philosophers, hope is posited as one of the four natural passions: but no passion is a virtue: therefore hope is not a virtue.
2. Likewise, Every virtue has a determinate act and object: but hope does not have these determinate: therefore hope is not a virtue. The first is proved by induction in particulars. The second is proved by this, that to expect does not denote an act according to operation, but rather immobility according to place: but the object of hope is any good expected in the future: therefore the conclusion follows, that it is not a virtue.
3. Likewise, The Philosopher in the VI Physics posits remembrance of the past, just as hope is of the future: but it is evident that remembrance is not a virtue: therefore neither is hope.

Likewise, In the number of natural passions, they are not opposed according to the difference of time, but according to the object hope and fear of future evil: but it is evident that fear is not a virtue: therefore neither is hope, as it seems.

1. Likewise, Augustine says, that the mind according to the mind is the image of God having the image according to the power of understanding, and likeness in the power of loving: there are only two powers: therefore only two virtues perfecting: but in the power of knowing God is perfected by faith, and in the power of loving by charity: therefore it seems that hope does not perfect according to the order in God: therefore it is not a theological virtue: and it is evident that it is not cardinal: therefore in no way is it a virtue.

If perhaps you say, that the affective power is bifurcated, and one part of it affects the good, and that is perfected by charity which is called concupiscible: but the other part detests evil, and that is perfected by hope. This seems to be nothing at all: because each power is appetitive of its object, and detestative of the contrary: therefore according to these are not taken two powers, nor two virtues.

1. Likewise, Every virtue is of the difficult and good: but hope is not thus: therefore it is not a virtue. The proof of the middle is: because to expect has nothing of difficulty.
2. Likewise, Virtue is a good quality of the mind by which one lives rightly, by which no one uses badly, which God works in us without us: but this which is called hope does not work in us without us: therefore it is not a virtue. The proof of the middle is, that hope is from merits, as the Master says in the Letter.
3. Likewise, If something is hope in the soul, it seems to be mercenary, and thus lacking the reason of merit, because it expects retribution: since therefore every virtue is meritorious, but hope is not, it seems not to be a virtue.
4. Further, it seems not to be a theological virtue. For a theological virtue is not a mean between excess and defect: but hope is a mean between excess and defect: therefore it is not a theological virtue. The first is proved by this that it was held above concerning faith, that faith relies on the first truth for its own sake, and above all: and above this no excess can be thought. Likewise, Bernard says of charity in the book On Loving God: The cause of loving God is God, and the mode is to love without mode: beyond which also there is no excess. The mean, however, is proved by this, that the extreme of hope in excess is presumption, and it is a vice: and the extreme in defect is despair, and it is also a vice: therefore hope is not a theological virtue, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. 1 Corinthians XIII, 13: Now these three remain: faith, hope, and charity; but the greatest of these is charity. But what is enumerated with virtue, is virtue: but here hope is enumerated by the Apostle: therefore it is a virtue.

1. Likewise, Theological virtues consummate the spiritual edifice: but in that faith lays the foundation, as was held above: charity, however, consummates, as will be held below.

Solution.

IN THE SENTENCES, DISTINCTION XXVI, ARTICLE 1.

Therefore hope is required for building: therefore since in the edifice nothing builds except virtue, hope is a virtue.

1. Likewise, Nothing saves except virtue: hope saves: therefore hope is a virtue. The first is proved by this, that nothing saves except what is in the reason of meritorious good: and such is virtue. The second is written, to the Romans VI, 24, where it is said: We are saved by hope.

Solution It must be said that hope is a theological virtue, which perfects according to the order in God immediately. For in this the theological differ from the cardinal: because the acts of theological rectitude have their terminus in God and end, as faith tends to the first truth, but hope to the beatitude of uncreated, unfailing glory, charity to goodness. But the acts of the cardinal terminate in the mean, and place the end in God: as temperance terminates the act in innate passions between too much and too little, and places the end in God, because it does this for God.

Therefore, in order to understand the solutions to the objections, it must be known that hope is said equivocally in many ways, and from this it is placed by different people in different genera, and different things are posited as opposed to it. For sometimes it is in the genus of passion, and in this way it is considered by Philosophers: and because passion is brought upon the sensitive soul: because as the Philosopher says, Every delight is generation in the sensitive soul: then an opposite is posited to it in the genus of passion, because of the same genus of opposites: but this opposite is either taken according to the object alone, and then it will be fear according to which it is a passion of future evil: or according to the difference of time which it signifies, and thus it is opposed to delight, which is from remembrance, as the Philosopher says. But sometimes it is placed in the genus of motion or act, as in Romans VIII, 24, where the Apostle says: We are saved by hope. But sometimes it is placed for the effect of hope, which it has in the soul, for it protects the soul and certifies about future things to be had and obtained, not only being, as faith which also says that certain future things are, but hope says that they ought to be obtained: as the Apostle says, to the Hebrews VI, 18 and 19: We have fled to the hope set before us: which we have as an anchor of the soul safe and firm. Knowing that tribulation works patience, and patience experience, and experience hope. There the Gloss: That is, the certainty of hope: because, as Gregory says: The more anyone rises in God, the greater things he has endured for His name. But sometimes it is placed for the thing hoped for, as to Titus II, 13: Awaiting the blessed hope, and the coming of the glory of the great God, that is, the thing hoped for, which is the coming of glory. But sometimes it is taken for the theological virtue, perfecting the soul to hope, and thus it is inquired about here: as the Gloss says, to Titus II, 13, We await the blessedness, which is subject to the virtue of hope.

According to this, therefore, it must be said to the first, that equivocation impedes the conclusion.

To the other it must be said, that to expect does not denote the whole act of hope, as will be clear below, but to hope denotes it, just as to love the act of love, and to believe the act of faith.

To the other it must be said, that in that process also equivocation deceives, as was held before in the distinction.

To the other it must be said, that as Augustine takes the mind under the affective power or of loving, many powers are comprehended, namely free will, will, concupiscible, and irascible. And then to the object it must be said, that to detest evil is not of the irascible, according to which the irascible is, but rather it is of any power to flee its evil: but the irascible is to exclude fighting evil, which is arduous and most difficult, and is brought upon from outside, and it is its rising to the height of the end, and to the height of that which is to the end: and according to which it rises to the height of the end, thus it is perfected by hope, as will be clear below: but according to which it rises to the height of that which is to the end, thus it is perfected by fortitude. And thus the solution to the argument is clear. However, it must be known, that that reason is founded on falsehood: because when Augustine speaks of the image, he speaks of the supreme part of the soul, which is ordered to God by natural habits according to which He is three and one: and this is not perfected by habits ordered to work, unless the image is taken improperly, namely as it results in the lower powers, and free will, and reason, and will, and in such things.

To the other it must be said, that the difficult and good about which virtue is, is differently determined in theological and customary virtue: for in customary it is determined according to difficulty and the reason of the mean, which is by equidistance in passions, or by right reason taken in rational virtues, as are prudence, and justice: but in theological virtue the difficulty is according to elevating the soul outside itself, and above itself: just as faith elevates reason to deny itself, and tends above itself to the truth which it does not know how to prove: and hope elevates the soul, to hope for those things about which there is no persuasion of reason, and from those things which it sees, it is elevated to seek those which it does not see: and charity elevates, to tend to the highest good, which is sought by faith, with the love of private good set aside: and this is more difficult than the difficulty of civil virtue: and the good of theological virtue is the end, but the good of civil is the honest related to the uncreated end. Whence it is clear, that that objection supposes falsehood.

To the other it must be said, that God works in us the habit of hope without us, although not the act of hope: and it is understood of the act of hope when it is said, that it comes from merits.

To the other it must be said, that the good reward is God, and not blameworthy, and this reward hope expects: but temporal reward for spiritual, is Jezebel-like and leprous merchandise: and hope does not care for this.

To the other it must be said, that hope is a theological virtue: and those things which seem to stand around, it must be said that they do not stand around, but are corruptions of the conditions of hope: just as when hope is made from the largesse of God, the despairing neglects it: and when it is made from merits, the presumptuous neglects it. For every mediation and excess is attended according to the same matter which is not here: because it does not have matter of this kind, in which according to the reason of matter it is to abound, and to fail, as it is in certain other customary virtues; but rather just as faith has opposed to it multiple infidelity from the corruption of various things which are required for faith, and charity similarly has opposed to it hatred and enmity, yet it is not determined to some mean: so also hope: and this is clear from the fact that on the part of the thing hoped for it is never too much: for hope relies above all on the goodness and largesse of the uncreated: and therefore the presumptuous does not exceed in hope, but rather each corrupts according to something, which is required for the substance of hope.

Again this is clear by another reason: because the mean has composition from both extremes, just as largesse from prodigality and avarice: but it is not said that one who hopes hopes for things to be hoped for and not to be hoped for, and one who despairs hopes for neither things to be hoped for nor not to be hoped for, which is false, because all those are about that which is altogether above all to be hoped for: but one hopes as he ought, others however corrupting.

Again by another reason this is clear: because if hope were a mean, now compared to the extremes it would take something of the reason of the extremes, just as the brave according to the Philosopher is timid to the audacious, and audacious to the timid: but hope is not said thus despair to presumption, and presumption to despair.

And let this be said against some, who say that hope is a mean between despair and presumption, because they think in every virtue there is a mean by one reason, which is absurd, because not even in customary (as the Philosopher says in the V Ethics) is it by one reason.

Articulus 2 — Whether Hope Is A Virtue Separate From Certain Other Virtues, Or Conjoined With Them

Whether hope is a virtue separate from certain other virtues, or conjoined with them?

Secondly, it is asked, whether it is a virtue separate from certain other virtues or conjoined with them?

It seems, however, that it is conjoined.
1. For those things which have one property, also have one subject, or at least not separate: but to endure and to expect is of longanimity and patience, which are parts of fortitude: and these are also of hope: therefore it seems that hope is a virtue conjoined with them.

1. Likewise, those things which perfect the soul against afflictions seem to be parts of fortitude, or conjoined with its parts: but hope thus perfects the soul: therefore it is either a part of fortitude, or conjoined with them. The first is proved by this, that fortitude is the perfection of the soul against rising and afflicting adversities, as the Saints say. The second, however, is written in Proverbs 13:12: Hope deferred afflicts the soul, that is, the thing hoped for: therefore it needs hope to endure.
2. Likewise, it is commonly objected that it is a virtue conjoined with fear thus: In natures, the same is the mover to retreat from the terminus from which, and to approach the terminus to which, just as from above, and in below: therefore similarly it will be in morals: but hope is the mover to the terminus to which, fear however from the terminus from which: because hope moves to the good, and fear from the evil: therefore hope and fear are the same.

3. Likewise, aversion and conversion in sin do not make a different sin: therefore in the opposite, aversion from evil and conversion to good do not make a different virtue: but fear averts from evil, and hope converts to good: therefore they are the same virtue.
4. Likewise, the same is faith concerning punishments and rewards: therefore also the same virtue fleeing punishments as fear, and hoping for rewards as hope.
5. Likewise, of contraries the same is the discipline: but to flee and to pursue are to be held as opposites: therefore of them there will be one science and one virtue, as it seems.
6. Likewise, one virtue in number is the mean of two malices: but fear is between despair and presumption, and similarly hope: therefore hope and fear are one and the same virtue.
7. Further, it seems that hope is the continuation of all virtues: because it is of hope to expect: but this is nothing else than to remain immovably in virtue: therefore it seems that hope is nothing but a dwelling in the continuation of virtue: therefore it is not a virtue separate from all others.

ON THE CONTRARY:
1. It is enumerated singularly by the Apostle: therefore it is one singular virtue.

1. Likewise, upon that: "The light of your countenance, O Lord, is signed upon us," etc., Augustine says that the image is the recreation of Job, 1, 2, Gregory says, is grace according to faith, hope, and charity. That the three theological virtues are signified by the three daughters of Job; therefore it is a singular virtue.

Solution: It must be said that hope is a virtue separate from others, and has a singular act, as will be clear below, and an object in a special reason.

§ 1. To the first, therefore, it must be said that expectation, longanimity, and endurance equivocally express the conditions of the hoping person and of the brave person. § 2. For the conditions of the hoping person are according to the progression into the hoped-for thing which does not afflict of itself, but accidentally, namely because it is delayed: but according as they are conditions of the brave person, they express the comfort of the mind in the endurance of that which afflicts of itself, from the confidence of victory and of the end, because the passion will not always lie upon him.

§ 3. But to that which he says, that fortitude is against afflicting things, etc., it must be said that this is understood concerning things afflicting of themselves, and not accidentally from delay.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that those arguments are completely invalid: because hope is not taken in the rationale of moving from evil into good, but rather in the rationale of eliciting an act: for fear by itself suffices to move from evil into good. For if it is servile, it moves from an evil act; but if it is initial, then it moves from an evil habit in consideration of punishment and of the love of God. § 5. For hope is not called moving in such a way that it perfects that which fear began. Whence it is clear that those arguments do absolutely nothing to the purpose.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that in sin one thing is by reason of another: for it would not avert [from God] unless it converted to illicit things. But this is not the case here: rather, hope is no less supported by fear, for it does not regard the punishment, but only the liberality of the giver.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that faith is concerning those things as they are articles of uncreated truth, and thus they agree: but they do not agree in that they are punishments, nor in that they are rewards, and therefore they are regarded by diverse habits.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that hope and fear are not contraries: for unformed [hope] is preserved with servile [fear], and formed [hope] with chaste fear. Nor are they of contraries, because hope is of achieving the glorious, while fear has an act toward punishment: and these are not opposed: for punishment and reward are not opposed, according as one is the object, and the other is as that to be achieved.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that as we said above, hope is not a virtue determining for itself a mean from the rationale of the matter. And if despair and presumption are opposed in the rationale of corruption, then fear will not be their mean, because fear fears to be separated, and despair supposes an irremediable fault: whence there is nothing to what is objected.

§ 10. To that which is further objected, it must be said that hope [spes] does not express expectation [exspectationem], but an act of hoping [sperationem], and this expresses more, since the hoping person extends himself, just as the believing and loving person, in his own way into the hoped-for thing, and he may have it in his own way, just as the believing and loving person.

Articulus 3 — In Which Power Of The Soul Hope Is

In what power of the soul is hope?

§ 13. Thirdly it is asked, In what power of the soul is hope? and, What is its act, and object, and end?

§ 14. But it seems it is not in the irascible [power]: because 1. It belongs to every virtue of the soul to expect that which it appetites, and to have when it has, and to reject the contrary: but hope expresses the expectation of that which is appetited: therefore it is not of the irascible alone, but of all the powers.

§ 15. 2. Also, hope is defined in the Letter, that it is the certainty of expectation: but certainty implies cognition: therefore hope is of the reason or intellect: therefore not of the irascible.

§ 16. 3. Also, Avicenna and Damascene (and it is also taken from Aristotle at the end of the first book of the Ethics) say that the irascible is a part of the sensible soul. Since, therefore, it does not belong to the sensible soul to be borne immediately to God, it seems that hope, which is borne immediately to God, is not in the irascible.

§ 17. FURTHERMORE it is asked concerning its act.

§ 18. 1. For the act of a power of the soul is accustomed to be denominated according to its name, as the act of the intellect is to understand, and of the will to will, and thus of others: but to hope does not name the act of the irascible: therefore it seems that it is not the act of hope, or hope is not in the irascible.

§ 19. 2. Also, what does "to hope" add beyond "to expect"? It seems that it adds nothing: because thus says the Apostle, to the Romans 4:18, concerning Abraham: Against hope he believed in hope. And he adds thus, Bearing longanimously, he obtained the promise . Therefore it seems that it expresses nothing but expectation alone.

§ 20. 3. Also, it is defined by expectation alone, when it is said, hope is the certain expectation of future beatitude, etc.

§ 21. 4. Also, what does expectation express? If it expresses only immobility in the place of virtue or of life: then it would add nothing above the other virtues except continuity: and this does not express a special act: therefore hope according to this would have no special act.

§ 22. Also it is asked concerning its object and end.

§ 23. For if it is said that its object is beatitude, as the Saints commonly seem to say, and it is supposed in the definition: then it seems that hope is every virtue: because beatitude is the end of every virtue.

§ 24. Solution: To the first it must be said that hope is a virtue separated and divided from other virtues, and it is in the irascible power of the soul. Nor is "to expect" merely its act, although it belongs more appropriately to it than to another virtue, as will be said below. But rather [its act is] to extend oneself into the hoped-for thing with a certain amplitude of mind, and this amplitude, because it is with respect to the great and the high in that which is such, belongs to the irascible according as it is human.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that certainty is twofold: one which is in the manner of an argument in cognition, and this belongs to faith. Another is that which is by way of nature, and this belongs to any virtue: for nature is more certain than art in works and in the end, as we said above: and because virtue consents to reason in the manner of nature, as Cicero says, therefore virtue is also more certain than art. § 26. But this certainty which is in the manner of nature is twofold: namely, the certainty and efficacy of a habit improving directly toward the work and toward the end, and this belongs to every virtue according as it is a virtue. § 27. Another is from the efficacy of the inclination of the habit and of the cause joined to the habit, and this is greater: just as if generated fire had joined with it the generating thing, which would give the motion that follows the form, then it would ascend more certainly, because then the motion in it would be as following its proper form, and as following the impulse of the generator. And hope has such certainty, namely from the nature of the habit and the cause, because proceeding from merits and grace, which are the cause of certainty. And therefore also among the virtues it is specially defined through certainty: and not, as some wrongly say, because it receives certainty from faith. And the Apostle touches upon the certainty from the cause, 2 Timothy 1:12: I know whom I have believed, and I am certain that he is able to keep my deposit until that day.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that I indeed think this to be true, that the irascible is a part of the sensible soul: but, as the Philosopher says, it participates as it were in reason, and therefore it is made elevated above the nature of the sensible considered in itself, and then it is capable of that which it could not do of itself. § 29. Nevertheless, there are some moderns who say that there is a twofold concupiscible and irascible in us, namely sensible and human: and in the human they place charity and hope, but in the sensible temperance and fortitude. But this opinion has no root in any authority, neither of the Philosopher, nor of the Saints.

§ 30. To that which is further asked concerning the act, it must be said that three things concur to the act of hope which is to hope, namely a disposition on the part of the agent, and this is a fixation in the place of protension, and this is called expectation. For just as one who is moved according to place cannot be extended into something that is proper to one place, so neither can motion in life attain the hoped-for thing; but this expectation is a permanence in life, and it happens to hope from that part by which it is supported in merits, because he who expects from merits must be immobile in a meritorious life. § 31. Another thing is what is required, which is the substance of the act interiorly in the soul, although not exteriorly, namely that with a great mind it be extended into eternal things. § 32. The third is the rationale of the object: because every act has to be defined and specified through its object: and the object is the embrace of eternity and of beatitude, according as it places one in glory, because the glorious expresses the great and honored: and this properly belongs to the irascible. § 33. Therefore to hope is its act which embraces these three, namely by expecting in merits, to be extended into the amplitude and magnitude of eternal glory: because eternity also expresses the ample through this, that it sounds as unfailing.

§ 34. But to the second it must be said that this is not true in all acts, but only in those which belong to the powers themselves according to themselves, such as to understand, and the like. § 35. But there are others which belong to the powers according as they are joined to other powers, just as to enjoy belongs to the concupiscible and the will, and to know to the reason, and to believe to the intellect according as it is joined with the affect, and to hope to the irascible according as it is joined to the believing intellect, and concerning these what is objected is not true. § 36. And you will find this noted above on the first distinction of the first book of the Sentences, in the question concerning the act of enjoyment.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that expectation is placed in the definition of hope, and the rationale of this has been stated. But protension is understood through this, that it says, of future beatitude: for if it is future, then the hoping person is not in it, but must be extended unto it: and beatitude is taken in the rationale of the great and glorious, as will be said afterward. And thus the whole of what concerns the act of hope is understood.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that it does not express the immobility of life as it is the continuity of virtue, but rather as it is a motive in the act of hoping: and it adds this motive or the rationale of the motive above the immobility from life, or from merits.

§ 40. To the next it must be said that beatitude is defined by Boethius as a state made perfect by the gathering together of all goods: and then the term of all goods can come distributively and collectively. § 41. If distributively, then it is true what the objection concludes: because then it responds to any virtue by reason of its good. § 42. But if it comes collectively and formally, it sounds a certain ample and great thing in glory, embracing the state of every good: and that state is high in the rationale of the high, and thus it is properly regarded by hope alone. And this is the cause that the Saints always say that vision succeeds faith, and beatitude succeeds hope: and others say that comprehension succeeds it, because comprehension also expresses the conclusion of the ample and contention. § 43. And others say that eternity succeeds it: because that also, as the Commentator says upon the books of Dionysius On the Celestial Hierarchy , expresses a protension into perpetual life.

Articulus 4 — What Hope Is By Definition, And Whether The Definitions Of Hope Are Good

What is hope by definition? and, Are the definitions of hope good?

§ 47. Next we must come to the Letter at the beginning of chapter A, where it says: But it is hope, a virtue by which spiritual and eternal goods are hoped for, etc.

§ 48. And it must be asked, What is hope by definition? Since it is already held in what genus it is, and in what as in a proximate subject.

§ 49. Here two definitions are given by the Master: and it is objected concerning the first thus:

§ 50. 1. Spiritual and eternal goods are hoped for by any meritorious virtue: therefore it seems that it is poorly defined by them.

§ 51. 2. Also, concerning the exposition of the Master which he appends, that is, they are expected with confidence: for confidence is either called the certainty from faith; or that which Cicero says is a part of fortitude, and calls confidence. § 52. If in the first way: this seems incongruous, because then hope would draw something of its essentials from faith: which does not happen, since they are diverse species of virtue. § 53. But if in the second way: then it would be a part of fortitude: and this also seems through the fact that Cicero thus defines confidence saying, Confidence is that by which the mind itself has greatly placed trust in itself in great and honorable matters with certain confidence alongside hope .

§ 54. It is also objected concerning the second definition which the Master posits, saying that hope is the certain expectation of future beatitude coming from God's grace and preceding merits, whether charity by nature precedes hope itself, or the hoped-for thing, that is, eternal beatitude.

§ 55. And it is asked first, By what certainty is hope certain?

§ 56. But it seems [it is the certainty] of faith: because 1. Thus says Augustine in the book City of God: Hope is a virtue, by which someone presumes himself to be going to arrive at that which he believes. Therefore it seems that it receives certainty from faith, which was denied above .

§ 57. 2. Also, it seems not to be certain: because the hoped-for beatitude is often lost, as happened in Judas, who according to the state of present justice hoped for beatitude, which nevertheless he attained with no certainty.

§ 58. 3. If perhaps you say that this certainty of condition, namely of immobile hope, remained in the meritorious life, from which hope proceeds. On the contrary: A condition is of doubt: therefore it is contrary to certainty, as it seems. If therefore hope has a condition, it ought not to be defined according to certainty. Also, a condition belongs to reason which compares: but hope is in the irascible: therefore it seems that it is not its part to append a condition.

§ 59. 4. Also, let us posit someone to be foreknown [to damnation], and yet to be in the state of present justice; he has hope: and yet his expectation will be frustrated: therefore it is uncertain.

§ 60. Also let it be asked, Who has a more certain expectation between two, of whom one is foreknown, and expects by formed hope: the other predestined, and expects by unformed hope? It seems that the predestined: because he most certainly achieves beatitude.

§ 61. ON THE CONTRARY: Formed hope expects from actually existing merits: but unformed hope does not: therefore it seems if merits are the cause of certainty, as was said above, that the hope of the foreknown is more certain than that of the predestined.

§ 62. Also it is asked, What is the grace upon which hope relies?

§ 63. For this does not seem special to it, since 1. Every virtue is a certain grace: therefore it ought not to be defined specially through grace.

§ 64. 2. Also, from this it seems that it cannot be unformed, since it is always with grace: and this is false, as will be clear below. Therefore it is not always with grace.

§ 65. 3. Also, from what merits does hope proceed? For all merits proceed from virtues: but virtues are infused simultaneously: therefore hope precedes every merit: therefore it does not proceed from merits. § 66. If perhaps you say that it is understood concerning the act of hope. On the contrary: The first act of hope, whichever is that which is immediately after the infused virtue, does not proceed from merits, because it itself is among the first merits: therefore it seems that neither concerning the act is it true.

§ 67. 4. If perhaps you say that this is on account of charity, because charity (as the Master says) is the mother of all goods and by nature precedes it: and therefore the merits of charity precede the act of hope: this is nothing: because the Master understands concerning uncreated charity, and not created: because hope by nature precedes charity, as the Gloss says upon the beginning of Matthew 1:2, upon that: Abraham begot Isaac, but Isaac begot Jacob, that is, faith [begot] hope, hope charity.

§ 68. If perhaps you say that it is necessary to be moved by the acts of other virtues before hope, and then the merits which are the good acts of other virtues, precede: this is a fiction: because Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, that a habit is that by which one can act when he wills. And thus also say all the Philosophers. If therefore someone has the habit of hope, he himself can be moved by hope, when he wills, either before other acts, or after them: and thus what you say is nothing.

§ 69. Furthermore, by certain Philosophers hope is defined otherwise, namely that hope is the suspicion of a future good.

§ 70. Also, the Gloss on Romans 8:24 says that hope is the certain expectation of future glory. And in none of those definitions is it posited that it proceeds from grace and merits.

§ 71. Furthermore, since of one thing there is a single definition, On what basis are so many definitions of hope given?

§ 72. Solution: To this last point I first say that hope is in diverse genera, as was previously held: and therefore by Philosophers it is defined as it is in the genus of passion, and then it is the suspicion of a future good, and therefore the suspicion itself affects and alters the soul. § 73. But according as it is in the genus of virtue, thus it consists in the difficult and the good of a theological virtue, concerning which it was determined above, and thus it is defined by three definitions, of which two are in the Letter, and the third is posited in objecting from Augustine in the book City of God. § 74. Now the first is given through the genus and the object in general, not specified by proper differences, which object is spiritual and eternal goods. § 75. But the second is given through the act and the cause of the act in part, which is certain expectation, etc. § 76. But the third is given through the relation of hope to faith, from which it is generated according to nature: because faith is the foundation, and hope is proximately super-edified.

§ 77. But to the first that is objected against the first definition, it must be said that for any virtue spiritual things are expected, just as the essence of merit, but not as eliciting the act of hope formally: and thus it is understood when it is said, By which spiritual and eternal goods.

§ 78. To the next it must be said that confidence is received neither from faith, nor from fidence (which is a part of fortitude), but rather confidence is called there the security from the efficacy of hope and the cause of security, which is the conscience of merit, and the presumption of divine grace, as we said above. § 79. There are those, however, who say that it is received there from faith according as it generates hope: but this is not pleasing to me, that any virtue should be posited to receive something of its essentials from another: because then it would follow that it would be a part of it, or adjoined to it inseparably, just as a property to a subject.

§ 80. To that which is objected concerning Cicero's definition, it must be said that hope and confidence are taken equivocally there, namely for the presumption of victory from the magnitude of a constant mind: and therefore it does not make to the purpose.

§ 81. To that which is objected against the second definition, it must be said that certainty is proper to hope, by that rationale which has been stated.

§ 82. To that which is objected concerning Augustine, it must be said that he himself is speaking of the certainty of the hoping person rather than of hope, and therefore he says, that it is a virtue by which someone, etc.: for the hoping person has conjoined virtues, and according as in him hope is founded upon faith, it receives something from faith, just as every virtue: and this does not make to its being, but to its well-being. § 83. And thus is understood what Augustine says, that hope is a virtue, by which someone presumes himself to be going to arrive at that which he believes: and thus also charity loves that which it believes, and thus of others.

§ 84. To the next it must be said that there is a certainty of act and of order toward the end, and hope has that more than another virtue, as was previously clear: and there is a certainty of achieving the end according to effect, and no virtue has that, because that is not given except after this life: and hope is not defined by that.

§ 85. To the next it must be said that hope appends no condition: because the order to the end through the act is always certain as much as it is of itself.

§ 86. To the next it must be said that if a comparison is made according to certainty taken uniformly, which is proper to hope: then the foreknown person existing in formed hope, has a more certain hope than the predestined person. For that it is frustrated, is not from the uncertainty of hope: but rather from the flexibility of the will: whereas the other does not have the certainty of the cause of merits in act. § 87. But if a comparison is made of the eternal order to the temporal thing, the predestined person is more certain: but then that certainty will not be proper to hope, for hope orders temporally: and that it is frustrated, is not from its own defect, as was said. But predestination is an eternal order to salvation, which cannot be frustrated.

§ 88. To the next it must be said that, as I think, grace here is called the maximal and affluent liberality of the giver without reproach: and, as I think, grace here does not express a habit in the hoping person, but rather a property, upon which hope relies on the part of the giver of the hoped-for things. § 89. But if anyone wishes to say that it is a habit: then it must be said that hope specially arises from grace, according as it itself is the cause of the hoped-for thing, and the motion, as was said above: but other virtues are referred to grace, as parts to a whole only, and not to the motion of the act.

§ 90. To the next it must be said that this would follow, if hope were always conjoined to grace in the subject: but this is not true, rather sometimes it is supported by grace, which is in the purpose of conversion only, as will be clear below, and then it is unformed.

§ 91. To the next it must be said that hope is taken there for the act of hope, and merits precede this act according to the purpose of the hoping person: because he himself expects beatitude, and is moved already to hope from the merits which he has in purpose. § 92. And this can be in five ways, namely that merit precedes the act of hope in the cause of merit only, and this is because he already has grace, but not merits, and then he hopes from the merits which are already present through the cause. § 93. In a second way it can be from preceding merits by cause and effect: and then it cannot be understood of every act of hope, but of the truly first as the objection proves. § 94. In a third way it can be, that merit precedes in cause and purpose of meriting: and thus again it will be true of every act of hope. § 95. In a fourth way it can be, that the cause precedes with an alien merit, as is that of Christ, and of the saints: and thus again it will be true of every act of hope. § 96. In a fifth way it can be, that it neither precedes in cause nor in effect, but in purpose only: and thus what he says is true only of the act of unformed hope.

§ 97. To the next it must be said that charity does not precede hope by nature, unless uncreated, or in purpose, or in cause, as was already said, if hope is taken in act: for if the habits are considered as parts of grace, they are simultaneous: but if they are considered according to the order of the spiritual edifice, then by nature hope precedes charity, as the Gloss says upon the beginning of Matthew.

Articulus 5 — Whether Hope Can Be Unformed Like Faith

Can hope be unformed like faith?

§ 101. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, at the end: For without merits to hope for something cannot be called hope, but presumption.

§ 102. For from this it seems that hope is never unformed: which certain ones also strive to prove in other ways thus:

§ 103. 1. That faith can be unformed, it has this from the fact that something of it is in cognition, which remains, taking away that which is of affection: therefore where that cause is not present, there is no unformedness: but hope is entirely in the affect, and has nothing in the cognitive part: therefore either the whole remains, or the whole is taken away: therefore it cannot be unformed, as it seems.

§ 104. 2. Also, hope cannot tend without love, and if it does not tend, it does not remain: therefore it seems that without charity nothing of hope remains.

§ 105. 3. Also, if it were to remain, then afterward the same thing would become formed, when grace would arrive: how therefore would that which arrives relate itself to that which remains? For it cannot be said that it is as a material, as was said concerning faith: because hope is not of a twofold essence, namely affective and intellective, as faith is.

§ 106. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Faith generates hope: therefore unformed faith will generate unformed hope, and formed faith formed hope.

§ 107. 2. Also, faith relates to fear in this way, that unformed [faith] generates unformed fear, which is servile: but formed [faith generates] formed fear, which is initial or chaste: therefore it will do similarly according to order into the good concerning hope.

§ 108. 3. Also, if hope were always formed, then the effect would be more noble than the cause: because according to nature faith is the cause of hope, and faith can be unformed and formed, as was held above.

§ 109. 4. Also, hope is in part, just as faith is: therefore it seems that the same imperfection happens to it which [happens] also to that: but this is unformedness: therefore it also can be unformed.

§ 110. 5. Also, Augustine holds that charity alone divides between the sons of the kingdom and the sons of perdition: therefore hope just as faith will not divide: therefore it will be common to the good and the bad: but it cannot be present in the bad unless unformed: therefore it can be unformed.

§ 111. But if this is granted, then it is asked, What is the difference between hope which does not have merits and is unformed, and presumption which also does not have merits and expects beatitude?

§ 112. Solution: It must be said that hope can be unformed just as faith can. And to the last point I respond first, that unformed hope is not without merits, but it does not have them except in purpose: and that was the fifth mode by which merits precede the act of hope, as we said previously: but the presumption which is called the hope of fools, is from the grace of God's liberality without all merits: for the presumptuous person expects beatitude even while continuing in sins, on the grounds that he reputes God's mercy to give beatitude without conversion, and not to attend to sins. And through this the difference is clear.

§ 113. To the first it must be said that in that argument there is a supposition of the false: because even unformed faith has something of affection, as we showed above: and therefore it is not the cause which it posits as the cause.

§ 114. To the next it must be said that every theological virtue has it of itself to tend, and not from love, except in a certain way: and that unformed hope does not tend, this is from the contrariety which it has in the subject, and not of itself.

§ 115. To the next it must be said that I readily concede this, just as above concerning faith, that with the arrival of grace that which was unformed is formed, and it is imperfect with respect to it and material, just as also in faith, just as a material disposition is with respect to the species: yet it does not differ thus, as a disposition from a species, but as the imperfect from the perfect in the same genus of quality, and as the imperfect toward the act of hoping which unformed hope well elicits, but as the imperfect toward tending.

§ 116. But to this which could be objected, that two qualities of the same species are not in the same thing according to the same respect: because the simple is not united to the simple, and the like, it was answered above in the question concerning faith.

Articulus 6 — Whether Hope Is Of Invisible Things, And Whether Faith And Hope Are Distinct From Each Other

Is hope of invisible things? and, Are faith and hope distinct from each other?

§ 119. Next it is asked concerning this which he says: And just as faith, so also hope is of invisible things, etc.

§ 120. 1. Since virtues of which the object is one, are one virtue: therefore if faith and hope have one object, then they are one virtue.

§ 121. 2. Also, hope does not seem to be only of invisible things, but also of these things which are possessed here, as the hope of grace and of pardon: for these species are found posited by the Saints.

§ 122. Solution: Hope is of invisible things, not insofar as they are invisible, but insofar as they are future absences: and therefore in the object faith and hope do not agree except materially: and therefore it is not necessary that they be one virtue.

§ 123. To the next it must be said that every definition is given from the end, and the denomination is made from the end in the same way: and therefore hope properly is of glory: and if it is of pardon and of grace, this is according to the order to glory.

Articulus 7 — Whether Hope Is Of A Future And One's Own Good

Is hope of a future and proper good?

§ 126. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, §2, at the end: But hope is not except of good things, nor except of future things, and pertaining to God, etc.

§ 127. 1. Against this seems to be what the Poet says: If I was able to hope for [foresee] such a great grief [273] From this it seems that hope is also of evil things.

§ 128. 2. Also, it seems that it is of a common good. Luke 24:21: We were hoping that he was going to redeem Israel.

§ 129. 3. Also, Augustine: Concerning no one is it to be despaired, while he is on the way. Therefore hope is of the salvation of all.

§ 130. 4. Also, faith commonly relates itself to oneself and to others, and similarly charity: therefore it seems that hope does too.

§ 131. Solution: It must be said that if hope is taken properly, then it is not of anything, unless in which these three concur, which the Master posits, namely a good, future, and proper thing. § 132. But if it is taken improperly in place of its genus which is the suspicion of any future thing whatever, then it could be of an evil: and thus the Poet takes it. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 133. But if it is taken broadly, then it will also be of a common good. And through this the solution to the second and third is clear.

To the last it must be said that it is not similar concerning faith, charity, and hope. Because hope regards merits, and those are proper to an individual. But charity and faith are not founded on anything proper: and therefore they can be with respect to what is common. However, it must be known that the act by which I believe a man to be good is not an act of faith, for faith is only simply and universally directed upon the First Truth; but it can be an act of opinion.

Articulus 8 — Whether Christ, The Angels, And The Blessed Souls Have Hope

Whether Christ, the Angels, and the blessed souls have hope?

Then it is asked concerning what he says in the second part, there: After this it remains to investigate, etc.

For there the Master says that neither Christ, nor the Angels, nor the blessed souls have or had hope. And concerning these three it is objected in order.

For it seems that Christ had hope: because

§ 1. He had the fullness of graces: but faith and hope are parts of grace: therefore he had them.

§ 2. Also, In thee, O Lord, have I hoped.[274] Also, Because he hoped in me, I will deliver him.[275] And in infinitely many other places.

§ 3. Also, a certain part of beatitude was lacking to him, namely the glory of the body: therefore it seems that he could hope for that.

§ 4. Also, just as he was a comprehensor, so he was a wayfarer: therefore just as what belonged to a comprehensor was not lacking to him, so what belonged to a wayfarer ought not to have been lacking to him: but hope belongs to a wayfarer: therefore he had hope.

SED CONTRA: Christ had no imperfection according to the soul except passibility alone: but faith and hope bespeak imperfection: because faith is knowledge in an enigma, and hope is the expectation of that which is not comprehended. Since therefore Christ saw openly and comprehended perfectly, as being united to the Deity, he never had faith or hope.

Further it is asked, Whether the angels had or have hope?

It seems that they do: because § 1. They still await a reward which accrues after the day of judgment from the ministry of guardianship, by which they serve us: therefore since hope is the certain expectation of a reward, it seems that they have hope.

§ 2. Also, On whom the Angels desire to look.[276] But desire is only for what is not had in the present: therefore it seems that there could be hope in them for that absent thing.

SED CONTRA: They have in the Word and see all things pertaining to their beatitude: therefore they hope for nothing in the future which they do not see presently. But vision is not hope, as the Apostle says.[277] Therefore they do not have it.

273. Virgil, Aeneid, IV, 419.

Also, they do not have faith which precedes hope: therefore neither do they have hope.

Further it is asked, Whether the blessed souls presently existing in heaven have hope?

And it seems so: because § 1. In the Apocalypse it is said: It was said to them that they should wait yet a little time. Therefore it seems that they expect the glory of their bodies: and to expect future beatitude belongs to hope: therefore they have hope, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, even certain ancients said that by the desire for their bodies they are drawn back a little from the intensity of contemplation: therefore it seems that they have hope.

SED CONTRA: Hope that is deferred afflicts the soul: but they cannot be afflicted any further: therefore they cannot have hope.

Solution. It must be said that Christ, nor the Angels, nor the blessed souls properly speaking have hope: and this for two reasons: of which one is that hope properly is only of substantial beatitude, and this is the beatitude of the soul, not of the body: because the glory of the body is, as I opine, a certain overflowing from the soul into the conjoined body. The other reason is: because hope founds the hoped-for thing in a mirror and in an enigma: and therefore because even that which they expect, they see in the light of the Word, they are not said to have hope of it: and this reason the Master seems to touch upon in the Letter.

Therefore according to this it must be said to the first that Christ did not have hope: and hope is taken improperly in those authorities for the expectation of an accidental reward or the glory of the body, of which there is no hope except subsequently: or they speak of Christ by the grace of his members.

And through this the solution to the two following is also clear.

To the last it must be said that he was a wayfarer by reason of passibility: and therefore to have faith and hope does not pertain to a wayfarer, but rather to the imperfection of a wayfarer: because one could be a wayfarer and merit without this, just as some say concerning the Angels before confirmation. Hence also whatever of grace was in hope and faith, he had: but not whatever was in them of imperfection: for the vision of grace is in faith, and the holding or comprehension is in hope. For he who hopes (as the Master says in the first book of the Sentences, distinction 1) to some extent holds the thing, although not perfectly.

To that which is further asked concerning the Angels, it must be said that neither did they have hope, nor do they have it, for the same reasons: for that which they expect is of the accidental reward.

To the other it must be said that there is a desire for a thing not had, and this the Angels do not have: and there is a desire for a thing had, to remove satiety, and it is of this that the saying of Peter is understood.

To that which is again further asked, Whether the holy souls have hope? It must be said that they do not, for the same reasons. Nor do I think this to be true, that they are drawn back from contemplation by the desire for bodies: because a time is determined for them, and they await it with joy in a single Robe, because they have security concerning the rest.

274. Ps. 30:2 (Vulgate).

Articulus 9 — Whether The Fathers In Limbo, And The Souls In Purgatory, And The Demons Have The Virtue Of Hope

Whether the Fathers in limbo, and the souls in purgatory, and the demons have the virtue of hope?

Then it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, towards the end: But concerning the ancient Fathers who were in hell until the passion, etc.

For it seems that they did not have hope: because

§ 1. Hope measures itself to the way: but they were already secure: therefore they were not on the way.

§ 2. Also, hope is given for meriting: but they were not in a state of meriting: therefore they did not have hope.

SED CONTRA: Bede says, and it is posited in the fourth book of the Sentences, distinction 1, that the Fathers in limbo awaited the entrance of the heavenly door with happy hope. Therefore they had hope.

Besides, this is said here in the Letter.

Further it is asked, Whether the souls in purgatory have hope?

And it seems so: because they do not yet have open vision through species: therefore an enigmatic one: but hope accompanies this, as the Master says: therefore they have hope.

SED CONTRA: According to this the damned would also have hope: because they have an enigmatic knowledge of God: if therefore hope accompanies such knowledge, the damned have hope, as it seems: which is false, since they are utterly damned and know themselves to be damned.

Further it is asked concerning the demons, whether they have hope?

It seems so: because of Behemoth it is said: Behold his hope shall fail him.

SED CONTRA: He knows his sin to be irremediable: therefore he has despair: therefore he does not have hope of salvation.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that the Fathers had hope, just as the Master well proves in the Letter.

To the first objection it must be said that in a certain way they were on the way: for a mansion is not distinguished, as Augustine says, except into perpetually remaining places, namely in heaven, or in the hell of the damned: and therefore as to security some say they were at the term, and as to the state of meriting: but as to the transition of ulterior glory they were still on the way, not at the term.

275. Ps. 90:14 (Vulgate).

To the other it must be said that this belongs to hope by reason of the state, that one merits or does not merit: and therefore this is not per se of hope, that it is only in a state of meriting: because it can be apart from that.

To the other that is further asked, I also well concede that those who are in purgatory have hope and faith: because they expect salvation seen in an enigmatic cognition.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not similar: because they neither have faith by which they tend into truth, or which is a virtue, but such as the demons have, of which it was spoken above: and even if they had faith, they do not have the expectation of salvation, and therefore they do not have hope.

And through this the solution is clear to that which is further asked concerning the demons: for we concede that they have no hope.

And to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that hope there is taken most improperly for the expectation of the delay of judgment, in which they will be punished more bitterly than now: for that [hope] will be frustrated, because they will be judged more quickly than they would wish.

And through this the solution of those things which are asked concerning hope is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXVII

Divisio Textus

But since Christ did not have faith and hope, etc.

Here lastly the Master posits the treatise on love: not that it is more unworthy than the others, but because it is born in its act from the acts of the others: and therefore those are prior by generation.

And this treatise is divided into two parts: in the first of which he treats of the love of man, by which he loves God and neighbor. In the second, of the love of God, by which He loves us: and this begins in distinction 32, there, A, To the premises it must be added concerning the love of God, by which he himself loves, etc.

The first is still subdivided into two: in the first of which he treats of love according to its substantials. In the second he treats of love in comparison to the lover, where he asks, Whether charity once had can be lost? And this begins in distinction 31, there, A, That also is not to be passed over, that some assert, etc.

The first among these is further subdivided into two: in the first of which he treats of love by comparison to the genus which is virtue, and by comparison to the act substantial to it, and by comparison to the mode which is the form of the act. In the second, he treats of it by comparison to the object which is lovable; and this begins in the following distinction

28, there, A, Here it can be asked, Whether by that mandate of love, etc.

In this distinction which contains the first part, he treats of love in four ways. For first he treats of it according to the comparison to our Head, how it was in Christ: and this in the first chapter. Secondly, he asks about it, What it is, and whether it is one or many? and this in the second chapter, there, B, Charity is the love by which is loved, etc. Thirdly, he asks concerning the mode of the act of love, as much in loving the neighbor as in loving God, there, D, Consequently let us turn our attention to the mode of both loves. Fourthly and lastly, he determines concerning the precept which regards the act of this virtue, there, F, But that precept is not completely fulfilled by man, etc.

From the division and disputation the sentence of this reading will be clear.

There are three preambular questions here: of which the first is, Whether love is a virtue? Second, If it is a virtue, whether it is a general or special virtue? Third, If it is a special virtue, whether it is the general form of every virtue? and, Whether it can be made unformed?

Articulus 1 — Whether Love Or Charity Is A Virtue

Whether love or charity is a virtue?

To the first question it is objected thus: § 1. That for which nature suffices in itself, does not need to have an elevating virtue for this: but nature by itself suffices for loving the highest good for its own sake and above all things: therefore it does not need to have an elevating virtue for this. The first is proved from this, that grace is not less ingenious than nature: but nature does not abound in superfluities, as the Philosopher says: therefore neither does grace. The second is proved by the opinion of many, who say that nature in the first Angel and the first man sufficed for this.

§ 2. Also, by Tully in the book On Friendship, who says that friends are to be loved for themselves: and similarly Aristotle in VIII of the Topics: Friends are to be preferred to all things: therefore much more God.

§ 3. Also, the powers of the soul in man are proportionate: therefore for what reason suffices in knowing, reason suffices in loving: but reason in the first state sufficed for this, that it should know God to be supremely good, and to be loved for himself, and above all things: and it also suffices for this now, as is proved from the sayings of many Philosophers: therefore affection suffices in loving God for himself, and above all things: therefore it is not necessary to give a special virtue for this.

§ 4. Also, every virtue is given on account of the difficult and good: therefore none is given on account of the most sweet and easiest: and Augustine says in the book of Confessions, that nothing is sweeter than to love and be loved: therefore no virtue ought to have been given for this, as it seems.

SED CONTRA: § 1. To the soul of man in the state of man in which we are, those things which are to the end are closer than the end itself: therefore their conjunction with the soul is easier, because there is greater convenience among closer things: but it needs virtues ordering it in those things which are to the end: therefore much more in those ordering it to the end itself: but the end is the good according as it is good: therefore it needs some virtue ordering it to that: but it is established that nothing regards the good as good, except charity: therefore charity is a virtue ordering to the good which is the end.

§ 2. Also, that which has contrariety to vice, is necessarily a virtue: but charity has contrariety to vice: therefore it is necessarily a virtue. The first is proved: because nothing is opposed to virtue except vice. The second is proved through this, that charity and vice mutually expel each other from the same susceptible subject.

§ 3. Also, that whose act is meritorious of eternal life, is a virtue: but the act of charity is especially meritorious of eternal life: therefore charity is a virtue.

Solution. It must be said that charity is a virtue, just as all the Saints concordantly testify, whose authorities to induce would be a waste of time.

To the first therefore it must be said, that nature never suffices, nor sufficed for the act of charity: but for the act of natural love to man, nature sufficed more potently before sin, and less potently after sin. But what that love is, the Philosopher well determines in I of the Ethics, where he proves that just as to each thing there is a proper work and act, so also to man insofar as he is man: and that this work is not sought in him according to the vegetative and sensitive, but according to the rational: but this is to choose and love above all things that which is good through itself and not in relation to another: and this he indeed proves to be happiness. And it is true, that it is uncreated happiness, which is the highest good sought for its own sake alone, and not for the sake of any other. If however it should be asked of the Philosophers, Whether this is sought because it is good, or because it is a good to him? it would be found that this would be sought, because it is a good to man. For no other good is sought by the Philosophers themselves, except the good to man according to civil life. But charity does not thus seek the good, but rather what is absolutely good, and the cause of the good: nor does it lean upon it on account of reason, because reason proves this, which is the opposite, but because that good effects such a love: whence when it is said, To love God for himself, and above all things, is an act of charity: the term for himself does not state one cause there only, but three, namely that which is as object, and that which is as efficient, and that which is as end: and in the first and last it could convene to the Angel and man in the first state according to the opinion of some, but not as to the middle: because reason effects this in them.

Through this the solution to the second is clear.

276. 1 Pet. 1:12.

To the other it must be said, that that reason is founded upon a falsehood: because although the powers are proportionate in order, they are not however equal in power: for practically they can do less, than cognitively: for we know many things, which we cannot operate: and we know many things, concerning which as we know them, we cannot be affected, unless we are elevated above our power by the gift of God given to us. And so it is in the love which is charity. For I cannot be affected through affection unto God for Himself and above all things liberally, with no one compelling at all, as long as I am invited on account of reason convincing the affection, so that it is something to be done: and therefore our natural love is not it: and even if this could be done, as some say, yet it is difficult even to believe this, that nature loves anything above itself, except insofar as it is good to itself, among some, who say that nature is curved in on itself, and by such love does not love anything above itself: and therefore they distinguish a twofold love, namely of friendship and of concupiscence, and they say that by the love of friendship something is loved for itself, but not above itself: but by the love of concupiscence which is natural, nothing [is loved for itself], but all things are loved as good to oneself. Nevertheless, because it is read in the books of the Philosophers that the love of the honest is so great, that even the brave commit themselves to dangers, who nevertheless do not have charity, it is difficult to say that no one loves anything above himself, except from charity: and therefore then we must return to the prior solution.

To the other it must be said, that the difficult in theological virtues does not consist in the act: because (as we said above) not in one way is the difficult and the good taken in a theological, and moral, and intellectual virtue: but in the theological the good is taken which is the end, and the difficult which is to be raised above that which nature can do, and to deny nature: but in the moral the difficult is taken, which is to touch the mean or approach it: but in the intellectual the difficult which is about the mean, which is called the right reason of operable things: and the good in both according to the reason of the honest regarding happiness. But this which Augustine says is understood of the sweetness of the act to the object, and not of the denial of nature.

Articulus 2 — Whether Charity Is A General Virtue Or A Special One

Whether charity is a general or special virtue?

Secondly it is asked, Whether it is a general virtue?

And it seems that it is. § 1. For whatever is universally the effective habit of salvation, it is a general virtue: but charity is universally the effective habit of salvation: therefore it is a general virtue. The first is proved from this, that universal salvation is not had except by the expulsion of all vices: and these are not expelled except through contrary habits to them. The second is supposed by Blessed Augustine, who says that charity alone is only of the pious: but the other virtues are common to the good and the bad.

§ 2. Also, whatever has in itself the acts of all other virtues, it is universal to all virtues: charity thus holds itself to the acts of the other virtues: therefore it is universal to all virtues. The first is evident through this that virtues are distinguished and defined through acts:

therefore from a special act there is a special virtue, and from all a universal one. The second is written, 1 Cor 13:4, where the Apostle says: Charity is patient, is kind, etc.: and he enumerates there fifteen works of diverse virtues with charity.

§ 3. Also, Augustine in the book On the Morals of the Catholic Church, defines every virtue by love, as faith is love believing God, fortitude tolerating all things on account of the beloved: therefore charity is universal to all: therefore it is a universal virtue.

Also, Jerome (so that I may briefly embrace every definition of virtue) says: Virtue is charity, by which that is loved which is to be loved: therefore as before.

Also, Bernard in the book On Loving God, and Augustine in the book On the City of God: Virtue is the order of love. And in the same place: Virtue is nothing else than ordered love. Therefore it seems that charity is every virtue.

Also, it seems that charity is in the fatherland, and that it will remain from all virtues in the reward: for it is the reward of virtues: because it is defined perhaps by Augustine, that to enjoy is to inhere to any thing by love for its own sake: therefore it seems that charity is general in merit, and general in reward: and is never a special virtue.

§ 4. Also, below the Master says, that every precept is referred to the mandate of love: but there is nothing in a precept except the work of some virtue: therefore every work of virtue is reduced to the precept of love: but just as work holds itself to work, so habit to habit: therefore every habit of virtue is reduced to the habit of love: therefore charity is a general habit to every virtue, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, in natural virtues moving those things which are in matter, the reduction is to the four primary ones, and the reduction of these further to one mover in the whole of generation, which is the sun: therefore it seems that in morals it ought to be similarly. Since therefore those things which are in those ordered to the end, are reduced into the four cardinal ones, it seems that those are further reduced into one, as the sun, which is charity: because charity is the mover in all merit, and according to its quantity the whole quantity of merit is attended to.

SED CONTRA: § 1. A special act divided from the acts of other virtues, exacts a special habit: to love God for himself and above all things, is a special act separated according to reason from the acts of all other virtues: therefore it has a special habit. The first is proved through this that acts are prior to powers and habits at least spiritually, and as to us. The second is clear through this that if to love God is defined, the act of any of the other virtues is not taken in its definition.

§ 2. Also, the Apostle, 1 Cor 13:13, enumerates it singularly with other special virtues, when he says: But now remain faith, hope, charity, these three: but the greatest of these is charity.

§ 3. Also, from the special reason of the object a special virtue is taken: but the highest good is a special reason of the object, just as the highest truth, and the highest glory: therefore it has a special virtue corresponding to itself just as those do.

§ 4. Also, it is accepted by Blessed Gregory in the beginning upon Job, where he says that it is signified by one daughter specially, and not by all the sons and daughters of Job.

Solution. It must be said that charity is a special virtue, by which God is loved for Himself, and the neighbor for God and in God.

To the first therefore it must be said, that charity does not universally effect salvation, as formally opposed to all vices, but rather as conjoined to all the others, without which it never is, because they are infused with it: and therefore this is attributed to charity: and how this is, will be declared below by the Master, where he treats of the connection of virtues: because to charity in one way all the others are connected, and therefore it is called the mother of all others: and through this also the solution to all the probations of the premises of that reason is clear: because they prove as if charity had a formal opposition to all vices: and this is not true.

To the other it must be said, that charity does not have in itself the acts of the others as a habit, out of which or out of whose parts those acts are elicited: but it has them as a mover not proximate and conjoined to the mover, but rather as the mover of the mover to the act: for the love of God moves all virtues to the act. For if it is asked, Why is the patient man patient? he will answer on account of the love of God, wishing to assign the cause moving his patience to work. And if it is asked, Why does the hoping man hope? he will answer again on account of the love of God, wishing to assign the same cause. And therefore charity is well the universal mover of virtues to the act, but it is not a universal virtue: for a universal mover in one way also has a proper motion by which it is distinguished from others, and it has in another way a motion which it influences to other movers for moving, on account of which influence it is called a universal motion, as is clear in the movers of the spheres, where the first mover moves with a divine motion, and influences into all others as the desired to the desiring, motion to each one, by which also anyone moves with its proper motion, in that any inferior seeks to be assimilated to it in causing the universe to be through its proper motion as much as it can. And so it is of charity with respect to the virtues: and therefore the works of the other virtues are attributed to it: but this will be better expedited in the following article.

To the other it must be said, that the opinion of certain Masters convenes in this, that the love which is posited in the definition of other virtues, is not the love which is charity, but a certain general love, by which every power of the soul and virtue loves to be conjoined to its proper object. If however it pleases one to say, that the love is charity, as seems to be the intention of Augustine: then it must be said that charity falls in their definition, not according to the substance of the habit, but according to the order and end of the habit to the act, which is the highest good. And so Augustine seems to will, who in every definition posits the act of virtue and the loved thing which is the end: and this is not inconvenient: because charity is the universal mover, and its object is the ultimate end of the other virtues: however it is a special virtue in relation to its proper act. But whence it happens to it that it can be a universal mover, and a certain form, and end, and yet be a special virtue, will be declared in the following article of the question.

Through this same thing the solution to the following sayings of Jerome, Bernard, and Augustine is clear.

To the other it must be said, that that objection would proceed, if the works of the precepts were reduced to the precept of love, as to a genus: but it is not so: but they are reduced as to one singular mover, which influences its virtue to others: and as to the ultimate, and not to the proximate end. And it does not follow, except that the habit is one, but universally moving and conjoining all virtues to the ultimate end.

To the last it must be said, that this is well similar. And I well concede that the other virtues are reduced to love as particular movers to the heat of the sun: because just as the heat of the sun moves in all natural virtues, so the heat of charity in all meritorious works of whatever virtues are the proper works: but it is not necessary that on account of this it should be a general virtue, just as the sun is not a genus to all particular movers in nature.

Articulus 3 — Whether Charity Is The Form Of Every Virtue, And Whether It Itself Can Become Unformed

Whether charity is the form of every virtue? and, Whether it can be made unformed?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether it is the form of every virtue, and whether it can be made unformed?

And it seems that it is a form: and this the Saints say commonly, and that it is the mother, and that it is the root, and that it is the end.

SED CONTRA: § 1. Form is said in two ways, namely exemplary, and resting in matter. If therefore charity is a form, it will be a form in one of these ways, or both. But it is established, that it is not a form as exemplary: because according to its species others are not made, just as the exemplated is made according to the species of the exemplary: therefore if it is a form, it will be an intrinsic form giving being to the virtue according to species: and this again cannot be, because just as that which is informed by humanity is a man, so that which is informed by charity is charity: therefore not faith, or hope, or other virtues: therefore it seems that charity is not a form.

§ 2. Also, form gives being and reason: but of those diverse in species there is not one being and reason: therefore of those diverse in species there is not one form: but virtues differ in the species of virtues: therefore of them there is not one form: since therefore charity is one, as has been had, it itself is not a form.

If by chance you say, that in virtue there are two things, namely that which is to the end, and that which tends into it. And that which is to the end, this gives it species, because virtues are distinguished through proximate ends, although they are not distinguished through the ultimate end; but that it tends into the ultimate end, this it has from the form which is charity in itself-

§ 1. On the contrary: The habit of virtue differs from the habit of science in this, that virtue is operative of the best things; but science is caused by a thing, and does not tend into it, but rather from it into the soul. But no virtue can be operative of the best things except by tending to and conjoining itself to its own best. Therefore, any virtue whatsoever of itself tends to its best. Therefore, it does not receive this from the informing of the virtue of charity.

§ 2. Furthermore, we see certain political virtues reach their best without charity: as is evident for example in the virtuous Philosophers, who attained the best of any virtue, and even happiness, without charity. Therefore, the virtue itself does not receive this from charity.

§ 3. Because of this, some say that in the act of any virtue there are two things, and also in the virtue itself, namely the substance of the act according to the species of the virtue, and that which makes it worthy of eternal life. And it is not informed by charity as to the first, but as to the second. They say this is present in all of them in one way, and they prove this: because the quantity of merit is evaluated according to the quantity of charity, which would not be the case unless it itself, by itself, produced merit in all the others. Moreover, that merit is from charity, the Doctors commonly say, and this is taken from the Apostle in 1 Corinthians 13:1: If I speak with the tongues of men, and of Angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal, etc.

§ 4. ON THE CONTRARY: Grace making pleasing [sanctifying grace] is that which makes the one having it pleasing, and renders his work pleasing. But to make pleasing is to make worthy of eternal life. Therefore, it is this which makes the works of the virtues, and the virtues themselves, pleasing. Therefore, it is necessary either that charity of itself does not do this, or that charity is the same thing as grace making pleasing.

§ 5. Certain ones further concede this conclusion, saying that grace making pleasing and charity are the same thing, and they do not differ except by relation: because it is called grace according as it is referred to the soul, but charity when it is referred to a power, which is the concupiscible or the will, as they say.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. The perfective of a whole, according as it is a whole, if it is referred to the parts, is referred by priority to the more principal parts. Grace is the perfection of the whole, as they say. Therefore, if it has a relation to the parts, it is referred by priority to the more principal part. But the intellect is more principal than the concupiscible power. Therefore, the perfection of the intellect will more have the nature of grace than the perfection of the concupiscible power. But faith is the perfection of the intellect, as was held earlier. Therefore, faith ought more to be grace than charity, which is the perfection of the concupiscible power.

§ 7. 2. Item, Does that relation of grace to a power make it to be a principal virtue co-divided with another that is received under grace, or does something else? If you say that it does: then charity does not differ from the whole which is grace, except accidentally. Therefore, it is not a principal part of it. Therefore, it ought not to be co-divided with the other parts, which are faith and hope. But if something else makes it a special virtue, then the solution relies upon a falsehood, namely that it does not differ from grace except by relation to another.

§ 8. 3. Item, Since form gives being, it gives either its own nature (ratio) or that of another. If you say that it gives its own: then every virtue informed by charity will have the being and nature of charity, which is absurd. But if it gives another: this is even more absurd, because thus it gives what it does not have.

§ 9. 4. Item, Whatever is found generally in one way in many things differing in species cannot be in any one of those things which, like species, divide the whole. That its meritorious act is pleasing is found in one way in all the parts of grace, which are the infused virtues in grace itself. Therefore, it is not from some special virtue which is co-divided with the others. Therefore, this is not from it as informing, as it seems.

§ 10. 5. Item, As perfected things are related, so are perfections related. Now, there are three motive powers of the soul which are perfected by all the virtues, namely reason, the concupiscible, and the irascible. Therefore, as they are related to one another, so are their perfections related. But among them, reason orders and forms the others; and if the opposite happens, a perverse act goes forth in morals. Therefore, the habit of reason will similarly order the habits of the others, rather than be ordered by them. Therefore, faith rather informs charity, than is informed by it.

§ 2. 6. Item, So it is in the habits of the cardinal virtues, that those which are in reason order and in a certain manner form the others. Therefore, it will be similar in the habits of the theological virtues, as it seems.

§ 3. To this, again, some wished to say that the concupiscible is a power diffused in all the other powers, and moving them; and therefore its habit is also called a form diffused in all the other powers, and moving them. ON THE CONTRARY: This cannot be said except by reason of the appetite for its own end, which every power of the soul appetites. But if by reason of this the concupiscible is said to be diffused in the others, since every power flees the contrary of its end, by the same reason the irascible will also be diffused in all the others. Therefore, by similarity, its habit too. Therefore, hope will also be the form of the other virtues, which is absurd.

§ 4. Furthermore, appetite has parts: for the motive reason has something of appetite, and similarly the will, and similarly the concupiscible, and in the same way the irascible. Therefore, not only the concupiscible will be said to be diffused in all the others on account of appetite.

§ 5. From all these things it seems necessarily left that charity is not the form of the virtues in any mode, and that merit is not evaluated according to it.

§ 6. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Ambrose: Charity is the mother of all virtues, which informs all of them, and without which there is no true virtue.

§ 7. 2. Item, Above the Master [Lombard] said that by the approach of charity, unformed faith is formed, and becomes a virtue. Therefore, charity is a form.

§ 8. FURTHERMORE it is asked: Why cannot charity, like another virtue, become unformed (informis)?

§ 9. For it seems that it can. 1. For in a man not having charity, there is a love by which he loves God; yet he does not tend into Him through a work, just as it is in him who believes the First Truth without tending into it. Therefore, just as faith is unformed in him who does not tend, so charity can be unformed.

§ 10. 2. Item, The others which are co-divided can be unformed and formed, like faith and hope. Therefore, itself too.

§ 11. 3. Item, Just as on the part of the intellect or reason, and on the part of the irascible, there is left to a man falling into sin something unformed, by which he might return more easily, so much more ought something to be left on the part of the concupiscible, since that one is more in need, inasmuch as it is corrupted and infected.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: Form can never be unformed (informis). But charity is a form. Therefore, it cannot be unformed.

§ 13. Solution: It seems to me, without prejudice to the many who proceed by another way here, that it must be said that charity is not the form of virtue, neither according to the species of the virtue, nor even according to the being of grace making pleasing, which is found in the individual virtues that exist with grace making pleasing. But charity informs in the nature of a threefold cause which respects the caused thing as a form: namely, as an efficient cause, whose species according to something remains in the caused thing; and as a certain form; and as a final cause, which is form in optimal being. To see how this is, one must see what things are in the act of a virtue, so that from the acts we may also understand concerning the virtue itself. Now, in the act of a virtue there is the species of the act, by which it is said to be the act of this or that virtue. Similarly, in the act of that virtue is that which makes one worthy of eternal life, and this agrees with all the acts of formed virtues. Also in the act is the reason by which it is from the agent, namely that it is similar to the disposition of the agent, in this that it is toward the ultimate end which the agent intends, and that is the first goodness which is intended. A fourth thing that is in the act is its liberality, that it is not out of the motive of utility, or private delight, but out of the liberality of the love of the highest good. Similarly, on the part of the end, I see three things, namely the matter into which the act is terminated; and the reason why rather upon this matter than upon another; and the ultimate end, which is intended by the operator. And so that this may become more manifest, let us give an example in natural and civil things.

§ 2. In natural things, we see a form-giving power in a seed of wheat, in whose act we find the species of the power, which it has from the fact that it is the power of a grain of wheat, and not of barley or another. And we find in it the act of fire, separating by digestion the pure from the impure in the humid. And we find in it a celestial power through motion to a determinate being in species and figure. And we also find an expedition toward the act, according as it is more or less impeded. And we find on the part of its end the matter in which it impresses the species it intends rather than in another, and the impressed species, and the ultimate intention, so that the common nature may be saved in such a succession. And we say that these things are from diverse sources: since the species of the power is from the form giving special being to the power, and the work of digestion is from the act of the heat of fire, and the operation toward being is from the heat of heaven, and its expedition is from the place and heat of the sun, with the intrinsic powers which dispose the subject assisting. But on the part of the end, that such matter is sought is from the nature of the form which seeks a due matter; and the end of generation is from the agent; and the end of intention is from that which universally makes succession in generation, not in one thing, but in many.

§ 3. Item, we see also in civil things, in which one mechanical art is under another: just as the equestrian art moves the art of bridle-making to this, that a bridle competent for a horse be made. And therefore there is one form of the bridle which is from the art of bridle-making, and another art teaches how to apply that form to the horse. Similarly, charity (as it seems to me) gives proper being in the species of virtue to no virtue, nor does it give the being of grace: because, in my judgment, charity is not grace, but a part of it, just like another virtue. But it gives it the species of an efficient cause, moving generally, namely so that it may be done out of love and liberally; and it gives it the form of order, that is, ordering it not to a proximate end, but to the ultimate end, which is not intended by one act, but by all, and that is God, so that it may be done for the sake of the highest good which God is; and thirdly, it gives it conjunction with Him. For it is one thing to order to the ultimate end, and another to touch it. For it would not touch it unless there were something of love in any given virtue; because for any special virtue, if it be without love, it is sufficient to touch its own proper end. Just as also for the art of bridle-making, if it were without the equestrian art forming it, it would be sufficient to attain the form of the bridle, and it would not intend further how it would be useful for the military or equestrian art.

§ 4. To the first, therefore, it must be said that form is called here in some way intrinsic. It is extrinsic by the fact that it is universally moving: but because universally moving in merit it does not move except by influencing its species into the others, therefore a certain love is made intrinsic to any virtue whatsoever. But by that it does not lose its own species, because it is according to well-being, and not according to being absolutely. But this well-being is in the attainment of the ultimate end, which belongs to charity.

§ 5. But that charity is not a form giving being seems to be something that must be conceded.

§ 6. Similarly, it also seems to be conceded that it does not give gratuitous being, but nevertheless it gives quantity: and this is because gratuitous being is from grace; but quantity is according to something that is there of our own, because otherwise there would not be greater merit in one than in another. But that which most places there something of our own, and most liberally, is charity, which makes us wholly expend ourselves, and freely; and therefore according to the quantity of that is evaluated the quantity of merit.

§ 2. But if it is objected that merit according to being and according to quantity ought to be from the same thing, it must be said that this is false. Because this is true in nothing: for never is being, and quantity in that being, from the same thing, neither in nature, nor in grace.

§ 3. As to that which is objected against the response, that charity makes all tend to their end, it must be said that there is a twofold end, namely the nature of each virtue in species, and into that it can tend without charity, just as faith into the true, and hope into the high, or the glorious, and things of this sort. But there is an ultimate end, which is the end of charity; and into that no virtue can tend unless moved by charity, and through the love of that end which charity influences into it, according as it is the universal mover of all to that end.

§ 4. As to the other thing which is further objected, that charity is not grace, nor does it make pleasing in all things, it seems to me that it must be conceded: since I cannot see how it could reasonably be said that charity and grace do not differ except by relation to the subject; nevertheless, concerning this there is more to be disputed in the Second Book of the Sentences.

§ 5. As to the simile also which is stated, that the concupiscible is diffused in all the powers, this seems to me false, just as was proven.

§ 6. As to that which is further asked, why it cannot be unformed? It must be said that this is not the cause which some say, because it itself is grace making pleasing; but of this there are four other causes. The first of these is that it itself is the first gift in which all other things are given. Now I say "first" on the part of the Giver, not on our part: because charity is after faith on our part, as was proven above; but the first on the part of the Giver is charity. And therefore, if the first were unformed, or could become so, it would be necessary that there be another prior to it by which it might be formed, which cannot be, since in no genus is there anything prior to the first. Another cause is because it itself is according to the whole capability of man, but no other [virtue] is; and therefore it is impossible that it be without grace making pleasing. And this is evident thus: for he who believes God above all things does not on account of this do whatever he can, nor does he who hopes, and thus of the others; but he who loves God for Himself and above all things retains nothing of himself which he does not expend in the love of God. The third cause is because it itself is founded in the intimate affection, just as you will find noted in Book I of the Sentences; and therefore nothing of formlessness is left in the affection in which it is. The fourth cause is because it itself is the likeness of goodness as it is divine goodness; and therefore it also tends into it as it is in the nature of goodness, and not in another nature, and it cannot not be like that best. And it is not so concerning faith, which is concerning truth, and therefore the nature of goodness which forms in the species of virtue can be lacking; and thus similarly without charity there is natural love, and therefore it does not form unless charity of another nature supervenes.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that the reason has been stated why it is not similar.

§ 8. To the last it must be said that to a man falling on that part nothing is left, because his fall is through a love contrary to truth; but he does not fall through something contrary to faith, or hope; and therefore faith and hope are not destroyed in whole. Or if you say that he falls by something contrary to faith, or hope: then it follows inevitably that that [virtue] is destroyed in whole, just like charity: because the infidel does not have faith, nor the desperate hope. But we are not speaking of this, but of one falling into bad morals through the appetite of a mutable good.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Definitions Of Charity Are Well Assigned

Are the definitions of charity well assigned?

Next it is inquired concerning the definition of charity which he states in the second part, there at B: Charity is the dilection by which God is loved for His own sake, and the neighbor for God's sake, etc.

For other definitions of charity are found.

For Augustine says: Charity is the virtue by which we desire to see and fully enjoy God.

Also, Dionysius in the book On the Divine Names, and it is drawn from the words of Hierotheus thus: Whether we call love divine, or angelic, or intellectual, or animal, or natural, we shall understand a certain unitive and concretive power, moving indeed superior things to the providence of those having less, and again coordinate things to an alternating communicative disposition in the extremes, and subject things to the turning towards what is better and placed above.

In the same place the Commentator gives two others: of which one is this: Love is the connection or bond by which the universality of all things is coupled in an ineffable friendship and indissoluble unity. The second is this: Love is the natural motion of all things that are in motion, the end and quiet resting-place, beyond which no motion of a creature proceeds.

Also, the Apostle The end of the commandment is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith: and the Gloss says there that the Apostle there defines charity.

It is objected however concerning the first thus: § 1. When it is said, Charity is a dilection, it seems the same thing is defined by itself: because Dionysius says, Dilection is the same as love or charity.

§ 2. Also, when God is said to be loved for His own sake, charity does not seem to be separated from the love of the honorable in virtue: because the honorable is (as Tullius says) what is loved for its own sake.

It is ALSO OBJECTED concerning the second: because § 1. To see is rather definitive of faith, than of charity, since it succeeds faith, and not charity.

§ 2. Also, since vision is the whole reward, to enjoy is understood in to see: therefore after he said, To see God, it was superfluous to add, And to fully enjoy, etc.

§ 3. Also, to fully enjoy does not respond only to charity, but we enjoy by all virtues: therefore it is wrongly posited as definitive of charity.

§ 4. Also, to enjoy is also defined through charity: because Augustine says, that to enjoy is to inhere by love to some thing for its own sake: therefore there is a circle there, and the same thing is more known and less known than itself.

§ 5. Also, when it is said, We desire, an act of the sensible part of the soul is posited: for the Philosopher says in II On the Soul, that in the rational part there is will, but in the irrational part desire and animus. Since therefore charity is of the rational part of the soul, it is badly defined through desire.

§ 6. Also, desire is imperfect and of what is absent: therefore since charity is most perfect, it ought to be defined by another act, namely by to will, and the like.

It is ALSO OBJECTED concerning the third: because § 1. Since love or charity is in the affection: and affection does not order anything, but rather aspect [does], it seems love does not move superiors to inferiors, and means to each other, and inferiors to superiors.

§ 2. Also, love does not move except to loving: therefore not to providing.

§ 3. Also, there does not seem to be a difference between intellectual and animal: because the intellectual is animal.

§ 4. Also, what is natural love? It seems, that there is none: because Augustine says, that nothing is loved unless it is known: but nature does not have cognition; therefore neither love.

§ 5. Also, of what love does Dionysius speak? For it is evident that not all things have charity; therefore that definition does not befit charity.

Also, it is objected concerning the other, that it is the bond and friendship of the universe.

§ 1. For contraries do not love each other, but rather hate each other, and do not suffer together in the same subject.

§ 2. Also, what is the indissoluble unity by which they are coupled? For whatever things are composed can be dissolved, both in will and in nature.

It is ALSO OBJECTED concerning the following: § 1. For love rather sounds like a passion or a habit, than a natural motion: therefore it is badly posited in the genus of motion.

§ 2. Also it is inquired, when love is said of natural, animal, intellectual, and angelic, and divine, and gratuitous love, whether it is said univocally or equivocally?

Further it is inquired concerning that which the Apostle gives about charity. Because that is more to the point, and was held last, in distinction XXV.

And it is inquired first, Of what sort of end is charity said to be?

§ 1. For the end is that to which motion is directed, and in which one rests. But charity is that from which the motion of the precept arises: because it moves to fulfill what is commanded: therefore it is rather the principle of the precept, than the end.

§ 2. Also, charity is the root of good, and from the root is the motion of increment and the principle: therefore it ought rather to be the principle, than the end.

§ 3. Also, since it is also the end of counsel, why is it rather defined as being of precept, than of counsel?

§ 4. Also, what does it mean to say, From a pure heart? If you say, from a purified intellect: this is nothing, because charity is not intellect, but rather affection. But if you say that heart is taken there for affection: then it does not belong to charity alone, because every virtue belongs to a pure heart.

§ 5. Also, the heart is purified by faith, as is held therefore it is the same to say from a pure heart, and unfeigned faith. If you say that they differ as effect and cause: then at least the order of the parts of the definition is inverted: because unfeigned faith ought to be prepended to pure heart, just as the cause precedes the effect.

§ 6. Also, what does it mean to say, A good conscience? For a conscience does not become good except through merit, which is known to be in the conscience: and this is only from charity: therefore a good conscience is rather from charity, than conversely.

§ 7. If you say (as the Gloss expounds) that a good conscience is a firm hope: then again the order is inverted: because faith generates hope, and hope charity.

§ 8. Also, why is purity attributed to the heart, and goodness to hope, since the good is proper to love?

§ 9. Also, unfeigned faith is faith that is not simulated, or not fragile: but this is none other than that which works from dilection: therefore it is rather from dilection, than dilection from it.

§ 10. Moreover, it is otherwise defined by Augustine in the book On the Morals of the Church thus: Charity is the right affection of the mind conjoining us to God.

Also, in the book On the Spirit and the Soul: Charity is a certain life, coupling the lover with the beloved.

Since THEREFORE of one thing there is a single definition, it is inquired, According to what are so many definitions diversified?

Solution It must be said to the last, that some of these definitions are of love in general, but some of charity. The distinction, however, of charity, love, and dilection, noted according to the notions of the names, you will find in book I of the Sentences.

Concerning love, however, three are given in general, namely that of Dionysius, and the two that follow in the commentary: and the first of those indeed is given according to the order of lovers. The second according to the essence of love: because the essence of love is that it be a connection or bond. Or otherwise and better, the first is given according to things ordered by love. But the second according to the ordering itself formally. And the third according to act: and therefore, he says love is a motion. But those that are given concerning charity are five: of which the first is given through genus and act and object, and is commonly charity regarding the way and the homeland. But the second is given through the charity of the way ordered to the homeland: because desire belongs properly to the way, but to fully enjoy and inhere to the beloved belongs to the homeland. The third, however, which is of the Apostle, is given according to the things generating charity in the subject. The fourth according to the effect in species, that it ought through affection to be conjoined to God. And the fifth and last is given through the twofold effect in general: because in the lover it makes life, and it couples with the beloved.

These things being held, it must be said to the first, that although dilection is the same as charity in the usage of Sacred Scripture, which posits one for the other, nevertheless in name they differ, because love is the common affection for the good: but dilection is the affection for the good with diligent election, and thus expresses the love of reason: but charity is when the affected and elected is valued at an inestimable price: and therefore dilection according to name is the genus of charity.

To the other it must be said, that (as was above said) the word 'for its own sake' expresses there a threefold cause, namely the efficient, the formal, and the final. And this is proved thus: because charity makes us love, not we ourselves: and it does this insofar as it is a likeness of the divine goodness: and therefore the goodness of God which is God, does this. Also, by grace of its form and notion: because we do not love accidentally, but for its own sake insofar as it is itself. Also, the final: because not for the sake of another. And this is evident also through the negation of opposites: because not from another, not accidentally, not for another. But in the dilection of the honorable or of friends these three do not concur, but only the middle one, namely because we do not love accidentally. And this was shown in book I of the Sentences, where it is inquired whether virtues are to be enjoyed or used.

TO that which is objected concerning the second, it must be said that it is given through the act of the charity of the way ordered to the homeland. But that vision is of the beloved and possessed, and it is a feeding vision: and therefore it responds to faith alone, but is rather perfected in conjunction through love: and therefore charity is defined through it.

To the other it must be said, that to fully enjoy is not superfluous: because to enjoy expresses an inherence and a taste following upon the beloved, which is seen and possessed: and because it adds the taste of sweetness, therefore it does not abound [superfluously].

To the other it must be said, that although all virtues concur towards enjoying, nevertheless none concurs as its end and perfection, except charity: but rather the others are as dispositions preparing the subject: and therefore it falls maximally into the definition of charity.

To the other it must be said, that nothing prohibits the same thing from being in the definition of another for diverse reasons, and conversely. For when charity is posited in the definition of that which is to enjoy, it is posited as the cause perfecting the act of fruition on the part of fruition. But when to enjoy is posited in the definition of charity, to enjoy is posited in the notion of the ultimate affection to which charity is directed. And therefore charity is prior to enjoying simply: but enjoying is prior to charity with respect to us.

To the other it must be said, that desire is taken here commonly, and not properly, and therefore it can express the appetite of the rational soul, as there: My soul hath coveted to desire thy justifications at all times: where coveted expresses the imperfect act of gratuitous grace, and of the heart into the desire for God: while desire expresses the appetite of sanctifying grace.

To the other I think it must be conceded, that it is defined by an imperfect act: because the definition is given concerning the charity of the way ordered to the homeland.

To that which is further objected concerning the other definition, that it, as well as the two following, are given concerning love in general, which is expressed when it is said, The good is what all things desire or opt for: for this appetite is manifested in diverse ways, namely through order alone and motion, as in nature: or through motion and life, as in vegetables: or through order and sensible life with the cognition of the good, as in sensible beings: or with these it also has the cognition of the good of reason, which is simply of the good, and is intellectual. But if with a deiform intellect of the good outside itself: then it is angelic. But the divine is the appetite of the known good, which is entirely within, and is the same as the knower and the desirer.

To the first it must be said, that love of itself does not order: but its motion is twofold, namely that it diffuses the good which is within, and thus it moves the lover. But the one having the good insofar as it is such, is superior. Hence such diffusion is upon inferiors differently by God, differently by an Angel, and differently by a superior nature: for by God through creation and recreation, by an Angel through illumination, by a nature through the motion by which superiors flow into inferiors. Another motion is to the good which is outside, according to which it is said, that all things desire the good: but the good which is outside, this is inferior: and therefore from that there follows the order of the inferior to superiors: and this Dionysius intends, and he speaks excellently. Hence a twofold order follows the order of love communicating the good, or receiving it.

To the other it must be said, that providence is said here materially for the thing in which provision is made for inferiors: for this thing is the inflowing good, and this belongs to love diffusing itself into the good.

To the other it must be said, that the intellectual expresses the appetite for the good with the notion of cognition of that which is simply good: but the animal is called sensible, which does not know the good, except as now.

TO THE OTHER the solution is clear through what was said before.

To that which is objected concerning the other definition, it must be said that although contraries flee each other, nevertheless by mutual action and passion they continue to be in generable and corruptible things: and on this part the contrariety itself returns into the bond of the love of the universe, as Boethius says

Thou bindest the elements by numbers, that colds may agree with flames, Dry things with liquid, lest the purer fire Fly away, and that they may draw down the submerged lands by weight.

TO that which is objected concerning the following, it must be said that it is given according to the act of natural love: and therefore motion is not posited in that definition. Hence that objection does not proceed.

To the other it must be said, that it is not said equivocally, but by priority and posteriority: and by priority it is said of the divine, and of those others according to their approach to it more or less: hence angelic charity, which is of the homeland, has more of the notion of love than that of the way, which is intellectual: and to this also (as Augustine says) sensible and natural love strives to assimilate itself as much as it can, although sometimes it is deflected.

To that which is further inquired concerning the definition of the Apostle, it must be said that that definition is given according to those things that generate charity in us. But charity (as was held above) is efficient and form: because something of itself and of its form flows into all meritorious works and virtues. But the end is of consummation or perfection. And therefore the Apostle says, that charity is the bond of perfection: and this happens in it in two ways. In one mode effectively: and that mode is easy, because it conjoins with the ultimate end: and thus it is called an end and a bond, because by ending it binds with the highest perfect. In another mode and more obscurely, because it itself is the end to which all tend, so that in it they may be conjoined to perfection: for all exist to this end, that the affection may be conjoined to the highest good: but the ultimate conjunction is through love, as is clear, when to enjoy is defined, which is to inhere by love for its own sake: therefore all virtues and precepts and works thus tend into it, and through it they are joined to the end: and thus it is itself the end of others, which end is as a terminus: and through it other things come to the uncreated end, which is the highest good, the object of fruition: and therefore there is nothing unfitting, that from it there is a motion, as it is efficient and form: and to it, as it is the end.

To the other it must be said, that charity is called the root in which the whole plant of life and of the other virtues takes its increment of sweetness: for nothing makes the yoke of difficulty sweet in all others, except the affection for divine goodness, which is charity: and according to this mode it is a principle of a certain kind: but in another mode it is the end to which the virtues are ordered, as has been said. Yet the Gloss seems to expound effectively, when it says, It is an end not of consumption, but of consummation: because he who has charity fulfills the whole law. Hence also the Gloss distinguishes a multiple end, namely of consumption, just as bread is finished when it is eaten; and of dilatation, just as a cloth is finished at the extremity of the cloth, and any body at its extremities; and of consummation, as that in which a thing is consummated, that is, fully perfected: and thus charity is called an end. And it is further called an end in other ways, such as that for the sake of which there is a motion, or whatever it is: and thus God is the end. And fifthly it is called an end, as terminating the motion in which motion is into the being of motion: and thus in this mode, even by subtly understanding, charity can be called the end of every good work and virtue, because the others are referred to it, and it is united to the goodness which is the end, and the union with it is fruit and taste.

To the other it must be said, that a counsel does not regard everyone as a precept does: and therefore it is not defined by this: because it is not the end of a counsel, except in some.

To the other it must be said, that many have said many things in expounding this: but that which is in the Gloss seems better to me, that heart be posited for intellect: and its purity be the separation of the beloved from other things, which together with it cannot be loved except impurely: and thus the Gloss expounds: But a good conscience would be hope founded in a good conscience, and unfeigned faith would be that which does not feign for itself phantasms lovable in another way: nor does it claim to love that from which it withdraws on account of adversities. And then it must be said to the first thing which is objected to the contrary, that although charity is from the affection, not from the intellect, nevertheless it has something from the intellect, namely the separation of the beloved from other things that can be loved: for this is done by the intellect discerning among lovable things.

To the other it must be said, that faith purifies the intellect, and the heart from errors and heresies: but from adulterous lovable things faith does not purify, but rather the affection of charity, which so sets one thing in value, that others become vile in comparison to it.

TO the other it must be said, that the Gloss rightly concedes that a good conscience causally expresses hope, because faith is founded on a good conscience. And as to what is objected concerning the order, it must be said that these are ordered according to the motion of generation, which is from evil into the perfect conjunction of the good. But the pure regards the term from which, because it expresses separation from the impure, and therefore it is posited first. And consequently the order into the good and the true follows: but the order into the true is twofold, namely into the true simply, or a firm or strong conjunction to the true, and to inherence: and that which is to the true simply, precedes hope, which expresses the order into the good. But hope precedes the other, which elevates by confirming a good conscience, so that it may be firmed in truth, averting at the same time from the vanity of the world and the falsity of error: and in this mode unfeigned faith is taken here: and this is noted by the Gloss which expounds it in two ways, that is, not fragile in adversities, so that it might recede from the beloved, and not feigning vain things which it might follow besides the beloved. For from these there issues forth the inmost motion of affection into God, which is charity, the end of all and conjoining to God. Others say that these three are ordered according to dignity, and not according to time or generation: and they say that the purity of the intellect is most worthy, because it is from a good conscience: and that again is better than unfeigned faith from which it is. But they suppose what is false: because unfeigned faith, in the mode in which the Gloss expounds it, has nothing better besides the sole affection of final dilection, by which all are conjoined to the highest goodness.

To the other it must be said, that every good merit is from grace and charity, so that grace makes one pleasing, and charity makes the quantity of value, as we said above: nevertheless charity as it is an end, does not proceed absolutely even from good merits in act, or existing as a cause habitually in the conscience.

§ 1. To the other it must be said that purity is attributed to the heart: because the intellect, through the discretion which it applies concerning the directable object, first separates it from impurely loved things. However, the good of hope is not attributed to it, but a good conscience, because it specifically leans upon it. The solution is clear through what has been said.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that nothing prohibits that unfeigned faith operates through love, and is finalized in it, as we said above.

§ 3. To the other definitions the solution is clear through what has been said.

Articulus 5 — Whether There Is One And The Same Habit By Which God And Neighbor Are Loved

Whether it is one and the same habit by which God and neighbor are loved?

§ 4. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, Here it is inquired, If by that same love God is loved, by which the neighbor is loved, etc.

§ 5. For it seems that there are two habits, and two virtues of loving God, and of loving the neighbor.

§ 6. 1. For there are in the cognitive powers diverse gifts of the Holy Spirit, wisdom, and knowledge: because one is about eternal things, namely wisdom: and the other about temporal things, namely knowledge. Therefore, since the affection is also divided here, so that in the charity of God it is about the eternal only, and in the charity of the neighbor about the temporal only, it seems that there are two virtues moving to this.

§ 7. 2. Also, nothing is common to temporal and eternal things: therefore there is not one moving formal aspect [ratio] in God and in the neighbor: therefore neither is there the same habit for loving both.

§ 8. 3. Also, the good of God is not the good of man, since there is not one formal aspect of the good in all good things, as the Philosopher proves in Book I of the Ethics therefore the habit also respecting this and that good will not be one.

§ 9. 4. Also, although faith is explicated in certain articles through temporal things, nevertheless it leans only upon the first truth: hope also is only about eternal things. Therefore it seems that charity too is one habit co-dividing the theological virtue, since that is only about God, and there is another habit about loving the neighbor.

§ 10. 5. Also, wills differ according to the things willed: since therefore charity is a certain will prepared by the ability of a habit, it will be distinguished according to the things willed. But the thing willed is not the same in the love of God and of the neighbor. Therefore charity is not the same habit.

§ 11. 6. If perhaps you say that the end is one in both loves. ON THE CONTRARY: Because the ultimate end of all virtues is one: therefore according to this all virtues would be one virtue.

§ 12. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. There are only three theological virtues: since therefore the love of neighbor is not reduced to any of the cardinal virtues, it must be of charity, which is one theological virtue.

§ 13. 2. Also, the Philosopher says in Book II of the Topics[278], that one science is of multiple things, as of both ends: of one which is the end, of the other as of that which is directed to the end. Therefore one virtue also can be in this way of multiple things, so that God is the end of the love, and the neighbor is loved as directed to that end.

§ 14. 3. Also, Augustine says in the text here, that in the neighbor nothing is loved but God: therefore by the love of God and the love of neighbor the beloved is the same: therefore it is charity.

§ 15. Solution. It must be said that it is only one habit by which God and neighbor are loved, and all things which are referred to charity as lovable out of charity: as the last arguments well show, and especially the authority of Augustine.

§ 16. But to the first it must be said that it is not similar in wisdom and knowledge: because there is not a mover of the same formal aspect in both habits: for the formal aspect of the eternal as it is eternal, and the formal aspect of the temporal as it is temporal , move in the habit of wisdom and of knowledge. And this is not so here: because in the neighbor the uncreated good moves, shining forth in him, from the fact that he is capable of that good through the act of beatitude. For no things (as the Master says below) are properly loved out of charity, unless they are ordered with us to participate in the same beatitude as we are.

§ 17. To the other it must be said that in both there is the uncreated good: but in the charity of God as in itself, while in the charity of the neighbor as it is shining forth in another. However, that argument proceeds as if in the love of the neighbor a created good moves to loving.

§ 18. To the other it must be said that this is false: rather, nothing is the total good of man except God Himself, as Augustine says.

§ 19. To the other the solution is clear through what has been said: because just as divine truth in certain articles shines forth in temporal things, so the divine good shines forth in the good of the neighbor.

§ 20. To the other it must be said that wills differ according to the things willed, not by matter only, but differing by species. And this is not so here. Whence that objection does not conclude.

§ 21. To that which is objected against the solution, it must be said that this is quite true, that virtues differ according to their proximate ends, which are the formal aspects of acts in their matters and their objects: but in charity the proximate and ultimate end of all is the same, namely the highest goodness. And therefore in it the formal aspect of the act is also the end: for goodness moves the love, and the same is the end of all operations and virtues. Because all things that we do, we do so that we may fully enjoy goodness, as Augustine says, and it is posited in Book I of the Sentences, where it is shown that man uses man differently by loving, and God uses man differently. And therefore it is not similar concerning other virtues and concerning the love of God and neighbor.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Commandment About Loving God And About The Neighbor Is One Commandment Or Two

Whether the commandment concerning loving God and concerning the neighbor is one commandment or two?

§ 22. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, C, in the middle: For which also there are two commandments, etc.

§ 23. For it seems that there ought to be only one commandment: because § 24. 1. Of a work of one formal aspect there is one commandment.

§ 25. 2. Also, there are two commandments concerning this: You shall not covet a wife, and, You shall not covet a thing. Because the formal aspect of covetousness in the lust of the flesh is one, and in the avarice of the eyes is another: therefore, from the opposite, where there is one moving formal aspect, there is the same commandment. But it was conceded before that there is one moving formal aspect in God and neighbor: therefore it ought to be one and the same commandment, as it seems.

§ 26. ON THE CONTRARY: Commandments are multiplied according to the formal aspects of works: which is clear, because there are many negative ones on account of the many formal aspects of corruptions. Therefore, since there is not one formal aspect of operating concerning the beloved which is God, and concerning the beloved which is the neighbor, although he is loved on account of God, it will not be one commandment.

§ 27. Solution. It must be said that we concede the last argument: and therefore we also say further, that although there are only two commandments of love, their quality is expressed according to those things concerning which we are commanded to operate. Since if one considers further the formal aspect of the work concerning God, and the diverse formal aspect of the work concerning the neighbor, that formal aspect which is concerning God will be explicated through three precepts, and that formal aspect which is concerning the neighbor will be explicated through seven. And therefore there are two in the aforesaid manner, which have to be specified through ten, as will be clear below.

§ 28. Therefore it must be said to the first, that it supposes a falsehood: because the formal aspect of a work is not taken from the universality and multiplicity of the habit, but rather from the formal aspects by which it is undertaken or sinned concerning that which we operate upon: and this is God and neighbor.

§ 29. To the other it must be said that those commandments are two: because one sins in diverse ways concerning that which is the neighbor's through covetousness. For a wife is ordered to the conservation of the species, and the goods of fortune to the continuation of the individual: and thus also there are diverse formal aspects of operating concerning the beloved which is God, and the beloved which is the neighbor.

278. Aristotle, Topics, II.

Articulus 7 — Whether It Is The Same Movement By Which God And The Neighbor Are Loved

Whether it is the same movement by which God and neighbor are loved?

§ 30. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says in the same chapter C, there, towards the end: Or on account of two movements which are begotten in the mind, while God is loved and the neighbor, etc.

§ 31. For this seems to be false: because 1. Although there are two precepts, yet one is in the other: therefore one movement seems to be into one through the other.

§ 32. 2. Also, in natures the same movement is to the means, and to the extreme: but the neighbor is the means, and God the end of love: therefore it is the same movement by which I love the neighbor, and I love God.

§ 33. 3. Also, Augustine says here, that in the neighbor nothing is loved but God: and he says this same thing in many places concerning the Trinity: therefore it is the same movement into the neighbor, and into God, as it seems.

§ 34. 4. Also, Damascene says, that the adoration of an image is referred to the prototype: therefore the love of an image is also referred to the exemplar: but the neighbor is loved as an image: therefore the movement reaches all the way to God.

§ 35. 5. Also, the neighbor is not loved unless by the love of use: but such a beloved is referred to another, namely to that which is to be enjoyed: therefore it seems that the movement does not rest unless in God.

§ 36. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. There are three things which are required for one movement, namely unity of space, of time, and of the mobile object. But at this time in which someone loves his neighbor, he does not actually think of God. Therefore it is not necessary that it be one. If you say that it is habitually referred: this is nothing, because we are inquiring about the identity of the movement, for which a habitual relation does not suffice, but an actual one must be present.

§ 37. 2. Also, a movement is numbered from the matter concerning which it is in number: but here there are matters diverse in number: therefore also diverse movements.

§ 38. 3. Also, if on account of the end there were one movement, then there would also be one movement when I love Peter and when I love Paul, each on account of God, which is absurd.

§ 39. 4. Also, one is more intense than the other: because we love God with our whole heart, but the neighbor as ourselves. But there cannot be one movement thus more intense and more remiss: therefore it cannot be one movement in number.

§ 40. Solution. It must be said that it can be one, and there can be several. One, when the neighbor is not taken except as an image of the divine goodness, into which the love actually tends: and in this way proceed the arguments first inducted. But diverse, when one does not actually proceed further, except by a habitual intention: and in this way the following arguments conclude.

§ 41. However, the solution to the inducted arguments is easily clear to anyone: because those which are inducted to the contrary, are the solutions of the preceding ones.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Mode Of Loving That Is Enjoined, You Shall Love Your Neighbor As Yourself, Is The Mode Of Ordered Charity

Whether the mode of loving by which it is commanded, You shall love your neighbor as yourself, is the mode of ordered charity?

Whether the mode of loving by which it is commanded, You shall love your neighbor as yourself, is the mode of ordered charity?

§ 42. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, Consequently let us turn our attention to the mode of each love, etc.

§ 43. For the mode by which I love my neighbor as myself does not seem to be of ordered charity: for if by ordered charity I love more what is more conjoined to me, it seems that I ought chiefly to love myself; therefore not as much the neighbor as myself.

§ 44. Solution. It must be said that, as he will say below, the principal status is left to the matter: nor is the similitude taken from the quantity of the affection or effect in loving, but rather from the mode which is taken from the part of the end. And therefore Augustine expounds, that is, to what end yourself, in what yourself: because in grace you love yourself, and to beatitude you love yourself; if you love yourself in charity, both in the same and to the same end you love another out of charity: or if you love otherwise, you do not love out of charity.

Articulus 9 — Whether He Who Loves Iniquity Hates His Own Soul

Whether he who loves iniquity, hates his own soul?

§ 45. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, in the middle: But he who loves iniquity, hates his own soul.

§ 46. 1. For this seems to be against Augustine in the book The City of God, where he says, that no one hates himself, or his own life: but those who kill themselves, hate their misery, and their own non-being, or living: and they prefer not to be, than to be in such misery.

§ 47. 2. Also, concerning the demon who seems less, it seems to be false: because Dionysius says, that they desire the good and the best, to be, to live, and to understand.

§ 48. Solution. There is a hatred of affection: and in this way no one hates himself. And there is a hatred of effect, namely when someone does something to which his own evil follows: and in this way is understood what is said here.

§ 49. To that which is objected concerning Augustine, it must be said that to be, to live, and to understand are considered in two ways, namely absolutely, and in relation to punishment. Considered in the first way, it is desired by all things which are and live and understand. In the second way, not: because they prefer not to be, than to be thus: as the Lord says concerning Judas, Matt. 26:24: It were good for him, if that man had not been born.

Articulus 10 — Whether In Love There Is To Be Observed A Mode, And What That Mode Is

Whether a mode should be had in love? and, What is that mode?

§ 50. Next, it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, E, But the mode of the love of God is insinuated, etc.

§ 51. For that mode is, not to have a mode, as Bernard says in the book On Loving God: The cause of loving God is God, the mode is to love without mode.

§ 52. FURTHER it is inquired concerning the exposition which he makes of with your whole heart, that is, with the whole intellect without error: and with your whole soul, that is, with the whole will: and with your whole mind, that is, with the whole memory.

§ 53. 1. For either it is understood according to act, or according to habit. If according to act: then it seems impossible: because when we understand something else, then the intellect is not actually conjoined to divine things: and even Christ does this often, and other Saints.

§ 54. 2. Also, the mode of charity ought to be assumed totally from the affection, just as charity itself is totally in the affection.

§ 55. 3. Also, he posits a twofold mode of charity in the cognitive part, which seems to be inconvenient, since charity itself is totally in the affection.

§ 56. 4. Also, Bernard expounds otherwise, namely wisely, sweetly, strongly: but strongly does not pertain to the memory. Therefore it seems that mind is not put for memory.

§ 57. FURTHER it is inquired, If it is impossible for this precept to be fulfilled in this life [in via]?

§ 58. It seems that it is: For Jerome says: Cursed is he who says God commanded the impossible.

§ 59. Also, Jerome: O rashness of men! o insanity of the insane accusing God of all knowledge with double ignorance, namely that He does not know what He has done, and that He does not know what He has commanded, as if He imposed a commandment which could not be fulfilled!

§ 60. Also, Augustine in the book On the Words of the Lord: He would not damn the lazy servant, if He commanded those things which could in no way be done.

§ 61. Also, To what end would it be commanded, if it could not be fulfilled?

§ 62. Also, Matt. 19:17: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. And he says there, that the first commandment is what is posited here. Therefore it is necessary to be kept, if we wish to enter into life.

§ 63. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Bernard says, that it is impossible to be fulfilled in this life: and that the impossibility of the precept does not make a transgressor, but a humble person.

§ 64. 2. Also, there is one among the negative commandments which cannot be fulfilled, namely, You shall not covet: for as long as there is the battle of the flesh against the spirit, it is necessary that something of illicit movement of concupiscence fall in: and it is impossible for every thought and life and intention to always be referred to God.

§ 65. Solution. It must be said to the first, that this is the mode in love, to have no mode, as Bernard says: and thus it is in all theological virtues.

§ 66. To the other it must be said that nothing prohibits that charity should have a mode on the part of the intellect and memory: because the will is from those two, according to which love is in it, as we showed above: because love posits rational love, and that properly is charity, according as it is of the uncreated good which is of inestimable price.

§ 67. To the other it must be said that it is understood according to act, but it does not obligate continually [ad semper], as will be clear below: for I do not think that any precept is concerning a habit.

§ 68. To the other the solution is clear through the things said before in those which were said to the second little question.

§ 69. To the other it must be said that Bernard attends more to that which is said, Deut. 6:5, where it is said: You shall love the Lord your God with your whole heart, and with your whole soul, and with your whole strength, than he attends to those things which are posited in the Gospel: because without a doubt the mind is nearer to the memory than the other powers, as the Master implies in the words of Augustine.

§ 70. To that which is further inquired, Whether it is fulfilled in this life [in via]?

§ 71. It seems to me it must be said that there is a totality of the way, and a totality of the homeland [patriae]: or a totality simply speaking, and a totality possible for us. The totality of the way or possible for us, is that we have nothing contrary in the intellect, or memory, or will: and in this way the inducted authorities are understood. And similarly the other precept is understood, which is, You shall not covet: for as to that which is directly prohibited in the precept, which is mortal concupiscence, it can be fulfilled in this life. But as to that which indirectly falls into the precept, it is not fulfilled: nor is it even directly commanded in this way. However, the totality of the homeland is to be totally borne actually into God and always: and in this way the saying of Bernard is understood: and this which is said in the text, that it is commanded for the showing of the future glory in us, not that we might fulfill it: for this will be our glory, that God be all things in our intellect, will, and mind.

§ 72. And the other things are clear through those which are posited in the text, namely why they are commanded.

§ 74. It must be noted, however, that it is not similar concerning this, You shall not covet and concerning the commandment [of love]: because that is negative, and obligates always and continually [semper et ad semper]: and it is not proper to say that it does not obligate except as to those things which directly fall under the prohibition. But this, You shall love the Lord your God, etc., is affirmative: and therefore it obligates always, but not continually [semper, sed non ad semper]: and therefore a certain totality is not in the precept: but it is not fulfilled according to totality, except sometimes.

DISTINCTIO XXVIII

Divisio Textus

§ 75. Here it can be inquired, Whether in that commandment, etc. In this part he treats of love in comparison to the lovable.

§ 76. And it is divided into three parts according to the three distinctions which are contained here: in the first of which he treats of the number of things to be loved. In the second, of the order, which begins there, Distinct. XXIX, A, After the premises it must be treated of the order of charity.

§ 77. In the third part, he treats of certain doubtful matters which follow the order of things to be loved: and this begins in distinct. XXX, there, A, Here it is accustomed to be inquired, What would rather be of more merit, etc.

§ 78. The first of these, which is of the present reading, is divided into four parts: in the first of which the Master determines the number of things to be loved out of charity. In the second he inquires, How do Angels fall into this number? In the third, How does Christ fall into that number? In the fourth, In how many ways is someone called neighbor? The second, there, B, § 1: Moreover here arises a question concerning the Angels, etc. The third, there, B, § 2: Concerning which also the Lord calls himself our neighbor, etc. The fourth, there, C, Here it must be noted that neighbor is said in diverse ways, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether More Substances Than The Master Enumerates Ought To Be Loved

Whether more substances than the Master enumerates are to be loved?

§ 79. But it is inquired here before the text concerning the number of things to be loved out of charity.

§ 80. And it is inquired first, Whether more substances are to be loved, than is determined here.

§ 81. Secondly, Whether virtues or other graces are to be loved out of charity?

§ 82. Thirdly, Whether irrational creatures are of the number of things to be loved out of charity?

§ 83. To the FIRST it is thus objected: 1. In the text it is said, that this is to be loved out of charity, which with us is referred to participating in the same beatitude: therefore the body of the neighbor is to be loved out of charity.

§ 84. 2. But if you say, that a part does not make a number with the whole: and therefore the body of the neighbor will be loved in the neighbor: this is nothing. Because by the same reason it does not make a number in yourself: yet in you the body and soul are posited in place of two lovable things.

§ 85. 3. Also, in the following distinction he posits six lovable things out of charity: therefore it seems, that there are more than the four posited here.

§ 86. 4. Also, in whatever things there is not one formal aspect of the good moving charity, in those there is not one formal aspect of the lovable: but in the body and the soul there is not one formal aspect of the good: therefore there is not there one formal aspect of lovability. Therefore it seems, that the body of the neighbor constitutes another lovable thing.

§ 87. 5. Also, it seems that one's own body is not to be loved out of charity, because the Lord says in the Gospel: He who loves his life, will lose it. And the Saints hate their own bodies, as Paul says: I chastise my body, and bring it into subjection. But what is held in hatred, is not loved. Therefore one's own body is not to be loved out of charity.

§ 88. 6. Also, the body is corruptible: but charity never fails: therefore charity and the body are not proportional. Therefore it seems, that the corruptible body is not to be loved out of charity.

§ 89. Solution. It must be said that there are only four things to be loved out of charity. And to understand this advert, that the formal aspect of the division is insinuated in the text: for the good which moves to loving, is either beatifying: and this is above us in a threefold way, namely by dignity: and by cause, because we are from it: and by end, because we are to it, and it is our total good. And therefore that has a special formal aspect of moving our love. Or it is what we are: and that has a twofold formal aspect of moving, namely according to the principal which is the soul: and according to that which is below us, yet from its conjunction to us, it specially moves to loving. Or it is that which is beside us, whether that be the soul of the neighbor, or his body, and these do not add a special formal aspect which moves us to loving, except because by a certain society it is conjoined to us as capable of beatitude. But it is not so concerning the body which is conjoined to us as inferior, not as beside us conjoined to us by society. And because there are no more diversities in the genus of the good ordered to beatitude, therefore only four things to be loved are posited.

§ 90. Therefore it must be said to the first, that the body of the neighbor is not to be loved except as conjoined by society, just as that which is beside us related to the society of beatitude: and therefore it does not have another formal aspect of lovability outside the four.

§ 91. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not similar: because our body makes a grade of lovable things in respect to our soul, namely as an inferior related through it to beatitude: but whatever is in the neighbor, has the formal aspect of a good which is beside us, whether it be taken in the body, or in the soul.

§ 92. To the other it must be said that Ambrose does not assign there the number of things to be loved, but rather the order in the enumerated things: and therefore four of those fall under one member, as will be clear below in the following distinction.

§ 93. To the other it must be said that there is one formal aspect of loving in the body and soul of the neighbor, if the formal aspect is taken in genus, namely the good which is beside us: because neither in the body, nor in the soul is the neighbor above us, nor below us: and thus it is clear, that he is not loved, except as that which is beside us.

§ 94. To the other it must be said that this is sufficiently solved in the text: because the Saints do not hate the body, but the corruptions of the body weighing down the soul.

§ 95. To the other it must be said that this has little value: because although the body is corrupted, yet it does not perish to God, but is changed for the better, as it is said, Job 19:26: Again I shall be surrounded with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see my Savior. And in the Collect for the dead: God to whom all things live, and to whom our bodies by dying do not perish, but are changed for the better.

Articulus 2 — Whether Virtues And Other Graces Ought To Be Loved From Charity, And Whether Created Beatitude Ought To Be Loved

Whether virtues and other graces are to be loved out of charity? and, Whether created beatitude is to be loved?

§ 96. Secondly it is inquired, Whether virtues and other graces are to be loved out of charity?

§ 97. But it seems, that they are: because 1. Augustine says, that he who loves his brother, loves love itself: but love is a virtue: therefore it is to be loved out of charity.

§ 98. 2. Also, that is to be loved out of charity, which is referred to beatitude: but nothing is so referred to beatitude, as that which essentially remains in beatitude. But virtues essentially remain in beatitude: therefore virtues are to be loved out of charity.

§ 99. 3. Also, someone loves virtues, for the reason that he merits by them: but it is established, that by that love he merits: therefore it is gratuitous, not natural: therefore it must be, that it is of charity: therefore it seems, that virtues are loved out of charity.

§ 100. 4. Also, he who loves sins, demerits by that love. Therefore he who loves virtues as they order to God, merits by the opposite act: and someone does not merit except out of charity: therefore it seems, that they are to be loved out of charity.

§ 101. 5. Also, the Lord says: Seek first the kingdom of God, and His justice. Therefore we ought to seek the justice leading to the kingdom: but whatever we seek ordering to the kingdom, we seek meritoriously: therefore out of charity, from which is all merit, as Augustine says.

§ 102. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. In the text it is said, that there are only four things to be loved in charity: therefore virtues are not to be loved out of charity.

§ 103. 2. Also, they do not participate in the same beatitude with us, because they are not rational substances, which alone are capable of beatitude: therefore they are not to be loved out of charity.

§ 104. Next to this it is further inquired, Whether created beatitude is to be loved above us out of charity?

§ 105. But it seems, that it is: because 1. That which beatifies, is to be loved above us: but created beatitude beatifies: therefore it is to be loved above us.

§ 106. 2. Also, Augustine defines supreme, middle, and lowest goods: and among the supreme he posits virtues, and much more beatitude. But it is established, that the good moves: therefore a greater good, moves more. But beatitude is a good above us, because it is greater than the powers of the soul, which are middle goods: therefore it is to be loved above us, as it seems.

§ 107. 3. Also, the end is to be loved more than that which is to the end: beatitude is the end, and we are to the end: therefore beatitude is to be loved above us.

§ 108. But on the contrary: 1. In the number of things to be loved beatitude is not posited: therefore it is not to be loved out of charity: therefore neither is it to be loved above us.

§ 109. 2. Also, in the text it is said, that one thing above us is to be loved, which is God: but created beatitude is not God: therefore it is not to be loved above us.

§ 110. Solution. Without prejudice I say, that virtues can be loved out of charity, and they can not be loved: and these are not repugnant. For they can be loved out of charity, as forms ordering to beatitude: but they cannot be loved out of charity, as living in beatitude beatifying us effectively, and as the object of beatitude, and as participating in beatitude with us. And only concerning these is the division given, which is had in the text, and not concerning the first: and this is because those are loved as formal aspects of lovability; for if it is inquired of someone, Why does he love another? he will answer, that on account of virtue, and to virtue: and therefore there is not one formal aspect of love in such habits and graces, and in the lovable things which are enumerated here.

§ 111. Others however say otherwise, distinguishing a twofold love, namely of friendship, and of concupiscence: and they say, that virtues and those goods which pertain to life, we love with the love of concupiscence: but the lovable things which are enumerated here, we love with the love of friendship. But this is plainly false; because no love of enjoyment, is love of friendship insofar as it is such: and yet we love God with the love of enjoyment. Similarly it is not well said, that someone loves himself with the love of friendship: because friendship is a relation, requiring diversity in the lover and the beloved: and therefore one must return to the prior solution.

§ 112. Also, certain others say, that by natural love we love virtues: and therefore they are not posited among the things to be loved out of charity: and this again is false, if it is understood generally: because we can love both the neighbor and ourselves and God and virtues with a natural love, and we can also love each one of these with a gratuitous meritorious love, which is charity.

§ 113. Through this also the response to all the arguments first inducted is clear: for when Augustine says, He who loves his brother, loves love itself: he does not understand the same formal aspect of lovability to be in both, but one, and another.

§ 114. To the other it must be said that virtues are not referred to beatitude, as participating in it, but as formal dispositions adapting the subject to this that it may be beatified.

To the other, it must be said that one who loves virtues merits; but from this it does not follow that he loves in another respect, in which he loves other things, as has been said.

And through this, the solution to the others is clear.

To what is further asked, it must be said that created beatitude is not to be loved above us, but for our sake: because we do not seek it except for our sake, so that being disposed by it, we may enjoy uncreated beatitude.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that it does not beatify except formally: but when it is said that the beatifying is above us, it is understood of the beatifying to be loved effectively, and as it is the object of beatitude.

To the other, it must be said that the quantity of good is intensified in two ways, namely according to the order to life, or according to the dignity of nature which is referred to participating in the glorifying God. In the first way, the distinction of Augustine is understood: and therefore he calls great or supreme goods, by which one lives rightly, and without which one cannot live rightly: but the middle goods without which indeed one cannot live rightly, and by which nevertheless one does not live rightly, as the powers of the soul. But the lowest goods by which one neither lives rightly, and without which one can live rightly, as the forms of any bodies, and the goods of fortune, which make happiness pleasant, as the Philosopher says: and therefore the distinction of Augustine does not hold for the proposed matter: because all such things are loved for our sake, and we are better goods than they according to the degree of participating in uncreated beatitude: but only in that way is it to be loved above us, which is better and higher in that order.

To the other, it must be said that created beatitude is not the ultimate end, except as the terminus of a work is the end - but it is not the ultimate end in which the intention rests: and therefore it is not necessary that it be loved above us for the sake of the work, which is for its sake.

Articulus 3 — Whether All Creatures, Even Irrational Ones, Ought To Be Loved Out Of Charity

Whether all creatures, even irrational ones, are to be loved out of charity?

Thirdly, it is asked whether all creatures, even irrational ones, are to be loved out of charity?

It seems that they are: because 1. They are a vestige of God: if therefore we love our neighbor out of charity because he is the image of God, by the same reason we ought to love all things that are a vestige.

1. Likewise, we ought to conform to God in loving: but of Him it is said, Wisdom 11:25: "For you love all things that are, and hate none of the things you have made." Therefore, since He does not love anything except out of charity, we ought to love all things out of the same charity.
2. Likewise, let us suppose that someone loves temporal goods only for the reason that they are material for meriting through alms: it is clear that he merits by that love: therefore it is a love of charity: therefore temporal goods can be loved out of charity.

ON THE CONTRARY: When it is said, This is loved for the sake of another, and not loved for its own sake, the act of love is not signified to pass into that except accidentally: but that which is loved accidentally does not make a number among the lovable: therefore irrational creatures, since they are loved only for the sake of another, do not make a number among the lovable.

If you say that we love ourselves and also our neighbor for the sake of another, and yet they make a number among the lovable: and thus that reasoning does not seem to hold. On the contrary: When we love ourselves or our neighbor for the sake of another, the love is not referred to use, but rather to the enjoyment of God, so that we may enjoy God: and therefore the capacity of being enjoyed makes the reason for love per se, although not for its own sake: but when we love irrational things, the whole love is immediately referred to use, and use ends in God: therefore the reason for love per se is excluded, because there is nothing in them for which they are loved per se: therefore they are not among the number of things to be loved out of charity.

Solution: It must be said that irrational things are not loved out of charity in which there is a reason for lovability: but charity is a universal mover, as we said in the preceding distinction: and thus it is carried by its motion into everything that is, whether it is its proper object or not: but we do not speak here in this way, but rather we inquire about the proper reason for the object of charity in the number of things to be loved out of charity.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the reason of the vestige is not a reason for loving the vestige, but rather the one of whom it is a vestige: and the same would be in the reason of the image, if there were not in it the capacity for beatitude, by which it can grasp God through beatitude and remain in eternity.

To the second, it must be said that God loves all things that are, equally and with one charity as regards Himself: yet He does not imprint on all the same reason of lovability, but there are many: and therefore some things are lovable for use, and some for participating in beatitude, and those are the proper objects of charity. But other things are loved out of charity for the sake of another, and do not have the reason of a proper object of charity.

To the third, it must be said that he merits who thus loves temporal things: but he merits because he does not love temporal things as those in which his charity is refreshed, but rather because by not loving them he disperses for the sake of the one whom he loves: and this is what some say in other words in the same sense, that many things can be loved by charity eliciting the motion of love, but only four by the reason of the good moving charity.

Articulus 4 — Whether Among The Four Things To Be Loved, No Precepts Were To Be Given About The Second And The Fourth

ARTICULUS TY.

Whether among the four things to be loved, concerning the second and fourth, no precepts were to be given?

Then it is asked concerning what is said there, A, around the beginning: Concerning the second and fourth, no precepts were to be given, etc.

For this seems false: 1. For a precept ordering the act of some virtue ought to order it universally: if therefore the precept of love orders the act of love, it ought to order it universally: therefore it ought to give a precept concerning the love of oneself and of the body.

1. Likewise, it seems to be nothing that is said in the Text, that no one hates himself or his flesh: because many hate both, as it seems: because he who loves the Trinity, hates his own soul.
2. Likewise, granted that it is true what is said, it is still not true, except concerning natural love: and that is not referred to the number of things to be loved out of charity: therefore it ought not to have been given in a precept that we should love ourselves out of charity.

Solution It is easy to respond to this through the aforementioned.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the precept orders the act differently, when it is said, You shall love your neighbor as yourself: because in this is included the love of yourself, and primacy is given to you.

To the other, it must be said, as above in the preceding distinction.

To the last, it must be said that by this it is understood that it was not necessary for a special precept to be given distinct from the precept of love of neighbor: and this for the reason that nature assists in grace, because both incline to the same. Therefore, since a precept is a certain bond binding through obligation, it was not necessary for bonds to be multiplied there, where it is not necessary.

Articulus 5 — Whether Angels Ought To Be Loved Above Ourselves

Are Angels to be loved above us?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, "But here arises the question concerning Angels," etc.

For it seems that Angels are to be loved above us, because

1. Christ is to be loved above us, who was made a little lower than the Angels: therefore, much more the Angels.
2. Likewise, the Saints are above us: which is proven through their acts, because they perform illuminations, purgations, and perfections: therefore, they are to be loved above us.
3. Likewise, in loving we ought to conform to God: but God loves the greater good more: therefore, we also ought to love the good above us more than ourselves.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
It is not set forth in the Scripture except that we love as a neighbor—therefore, the primacy of love is granted to us, as Augustine says: therefore, we can love ourselves more than them.

Solution: It must be said, in my judgment, that they are not to be loved above us: because charity perfects nature: and therefore charity with nature is always more moved by loving one's own good than that of another: hence only God is to be loved above us: because He is above us as our whole good.

To the other, it must be said that they are above us: so that "above us" indicates the degree of that which is loved, and not the intensity of the act of love: but it does not follow that for this reason they are to be loved above us, for the reason which has been stated.

To the other, it must be said that we conform as much as we can, preserving the order of nature, which God has implanted in us, and wishes to be preserved: and this is that we wish more good for ourselves than for others.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Wicked Ought To Be Loved From Charity, And Whether Demons And The Damned Ought To Be Loved

Whether the evil are to be loved out of charity? And,
Whether demons and the damned?

Whether the evil are to be loved out of charity? And,
Whether demons and the damned?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, C, § 4, around the middle: Love your enemies, etc.

Therefore, it is given that the evil are to be loved out of charity: which also seems for another reason, namely because

1. They are referred through the image to the capacity for beatitude with us: therefore they are to be loved just as we are.

2. Likewise, Isidore and Augustine: Therefore the evil are to be loved.
   Thus they are to be loved, so that their vices are not loved:

3. Again it is asked, Whether demons and the damned are to be loved out of charity?
   It seems that they are: because

4. Upon that Leviticus xix, 18: You shall love your neighbor, the Gloss says:
   For it is established that neighbor is not by proximity of blood, but by society of reason. And they are rational just as we are: therefore they are to be loved as we are.

5. Likewise, In them is the image of God: this however is the reason for loving us and our neighbor: therefore they are to be loved out of charity.

BUT on the contrary, they are deformed to such an extent, that they will never participate in beatitude with us: therefore they are not to be loved for that which we love ourselves: but this is to love the neighbor as ourselves: therefore they are not to be loved as a neighbor.

Solution It must be said that the evil are to be loved as neighbors: not because they are evil, but for the good to which they are possible: however, the damned and demons are not.

To the first and second reason, it must be said that the society of reason or image is not sufficient, unless it is ordered to the receiving of beatitude.

Articulus 7 — Whether Christ Insofar As Man Ought To Be Loved Above Ourselves

Whether Christ, insofar as he is man, ought to be loved above ourselves?

Then it is asked concerning this which is said, there, B, § 2: "By which also the Lord first called himself our head," etc.

And it is asked here, Whether our Lord Jesus Christ, insofar as he is man, ought to be loved above ourselves? And it seems that he should: because

1. The head ought to be loved above the member: but he, insofar as he is man, is the head: therefore he ought to be loved above us.

2. Likewise, he is our redeemer: but the redeemer is above the redeemed: therefore he ought to be loved above them. And many other things can be introduced.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Nature with grace is more affected concerning its own good: therefore it loves that more: therefore it loves nothing which is not its whole good more than itself: but Christ, insofar as he is man, is not its whole good: therefore it does not love him more than itself.
2. Likewise, in the text it is said "neighbor": therefore he ought to be loved as ourselves: therefore priority is conceded to us: therefore we love ourselves more than him.

Solution: It must be said that the first is twofold, when it is said, Christ insofar as he is man, etc. From which the phrase "insofar as" can signify the union of the person, and thus he ought to be loved above us: or the condition of nature, and this in two ways, namely of nature as not united, and then he is neither head nor redeemer: or of nature as united and thus head and redeemer. In the first way he is not to be loved above us: but in the second way he is to be loved above us.

And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXIX

Divisio Textus

After the aforementioned concerning the order of charity, it is necessary to treat, etc. Here begins the part in which he discusses the order of charity.

And it is divided into three parts: in the first of which the Master determines the order of charity according to the number of lovable things taken up, which Augustine sets forth. In the second, he touches upon the order taken according to the degrees of lovable things set forth by Ambrose, there, C, to which that precept is opposed. In the third, he discusses the degrees of charity concerning the love of parents, Honor, etc., there, H, It must also be known that there are different degrees of charity, etc.

In the first, two things are contained: in the first of which he touches upon the order; in the second, concerning the order, he raises a question, there, B, Whence also upon this a question is often raised, which the words of the Saints make perplexing, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Charity Has An Order

Whether charity has order?

A double question arises concerning the first, namely, Whether charity has order? and concerning the sufficiency of its order.

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Charity is an affection of the simple: but affection is not the collating of thing with thing: since therefore every order is according to collation, no order seems to be according to affection: but charity is in affection: therefore there is no order according to charity.

1. Likewise, the Philosopher says that it is the wise man's to order: therefore order pertains more to wisdom than to charity.
2. Likewise, in faith there are many articles, which presuppose others, as the resurrection presupposes the passion, and the passion the incarnation: and yet on account of such order, faith is not said to be ordered in beliefs: therefore it seems that although love of neighbor in this way presupposes love of God, it is not on account of this that charity is said to be ordered in loves.
3. Likewise, on the part of the neighbor, no order seems to be in loves: because Augustine says that we love nothing in the neighbor except the reason of the image, because it is in the image of God: but this is equally in all: therefore all are to be loved equally: not therefore according to degrees of any order.
4. Likewise, it seems especially that there is not that order which Ambrose touches upon, namely, that first God, and second ourselves, third parents, and fourth children and brothers, fifth those of the household, sixth enemies. For charity is of itself the love of the good: therefore the greater good will have greater love, and the great great: therefore according to the degree of good the order of those to be loved is to be determined, and not according to the degree of affinity or consanguinity.
5. Likewise, wisdom savors the good: therefore if charity is the savor of wisdom, as Augustine says, it savors the greater good more, and the lesser good less: therefore it is not the order which Ambrose posits.
6. Likewise, Augustine: Perfected charity has or makes justice, so that greater goods are loved more: perfected justice, if any of the virtues can make perfected justice, since it is the form of virtues: therefore it loves greater goods more, not attending to the degree of carnal proximity.
7. Likewise, our charity configures us to uncreated charity: but uncreated charity loves the greater good more, and not according to the degree of carnal proximity: therefore our charity will be according to the order of good, and not according to the order of proximity.
8. Likewise, charity makes us conform our will to the divine will: but the divine will is more of the greater good, because it applies more affection to the greater good: therefore ours ought to be so.

9. Likewise, grace corrects nature in that in which it is curved: just as therefore on the part of the love of God it corrects it, so that it loves above itself that which is above itself, which before it could not: so it also corrects on the part of the love of neighbor, so that it loves more that which is more to be loved: therefore it does not attend to degrees of carnal proximity.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
4. The Apostle says, to the Galatians vi, 10: While we have time, let us do good. Therefore some are to be preferred to all, especially to those of the household of faith according to the degrees by which they are joined to us.

1. Likewise, the Saints say this in the Letter, Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose.

Solution: It must be said that in this question there are many opinions of different people. For some concede that charity of itself does not have order, except according to the reason of good taken: and that the degrees of conjunction which Ambrose touches upon are rather of the order of the lover than of love: and they have for themselves the reasons induced, and some others, namely that such degrees will be evacuated, because in the homeland we will love the greater good, except for ourselves: and therefore since charity remains in the homeland, they say that such degrees are not of themselves of charity.

To what Ambrose and other Saints who are induced in the Letter say, they respond that this is understood with other things being equal: because then nature agrees with grace. But if there is inequality in grace, they say that charity follows more the order of grace than of nature. But because there is a threefold order, namely of nature only, and of grace only, and of grace in nature. The order of nature only is that it principally loves itself, and others more and more according to how they are more and more joined: and this order is curved and needing correction. The order of grace only is that it loves God above all, and others more and more according to how God shines in them: and this order will be in the homeland, except for this alone that one's own good will be loved more than the good of another: whence there God will be loved more, then us, and afterwards more who is better and whom God loves. The third order is of grace in nature, and this corrects nature in that in which it is curved, and sustains it in natural things. It is curved in that it does not love God more than itself: and therefore it elevates that. But that it loves itself more than another, and one joined by consanguinity more than one not joined, this God wills us to will: because He planted this in our nature: and therefore grace does not correct this, but permits the movement of nature with itself.

Therefore, sustaining this opinion, it must be said to the first, that charity is in affection according to order to the intellect, namely that it is from the intellect: and therefore it can have order on that part, although not in itself, according to which it is considered only in itself.

To the other, it must be said that it is of wisdom to order in this way in which the one ordering places the reason of order in the ordered: but charity is ordered, more than it orders:

whence it is of the ordered according to the degree of order: and this it has according to which it is in the subject which is affection, through the intellect of the ordering wisdom.

To the other, it must be said that it is not similar concerning faith: because faith is not united to the articles by reason of that in which the articles differ, but rather by reason of the first truth, which is in all of them: but charity is of greater affection and lesser according to the difference of degrees.

To the other, it must be said that finally in the neighbor nothing is loved except the reason of the image related to God above all loved, but materially not: because the differing degree is the matter of love, according to which charity is in nature, and with the nature of the lover, not evacuating it.

To the other argument, it must be said that it proceeds concerning the order of charity in itself, and not according to which it is moving joined with the nature of the lover.

To the other, it must be said that every savor which we can have here is tempered to nature: and therefore not only the good will be the reason moving love, but the good to some nature by the order of conjunction.

To the other, it must be said that that authority proceeds concerning greater goods, and other things being equal, and not simply.

To the other, it must be said that we conform our will to the divine will in this that God wills us to will this: for this is sufficient conformity on the way, as was proved in the first book of the Sentences.

Through these, however, the solution to the following is clear.

To the other, it must be said that it corrects it in that in which it is curved: and this is only in the love of God, because it is just that He is loved more than us, who is the whole good, which is the reason of the love of all things to be loved. But it is not so in others: therefore it is not necessary that in that part nature be corrected.

Articulus 2 — What Is The Sufficiency Of These Orders In Charity

What is the sufficiency of these orders in charity?

Secondly, the question is asked about the sufficiency of these orders: and to better understand, let each order be set forth.

Therefore, the order of Augustine is this, that God is to be loved first and for His own sake and above all things: secondly, ourselves: thirdly, the neighbor, who is next to us, as ourselves: fourthly, our body, which is beneath us, less than the soul of the neighbor. Ambrose, however, says that first is God, second ourselves, thirdly parents, fourthly sons and brothers, fifthly household members, sixthly enemies.

However, the first order seems insufficient; because

1. If the soul of the neighbor is postponed to our soul, then it seems that the body of the neighbor should also be postponed to our body: and this is not said by Augustine, because he places the order only among four.
2. Likewise, it seems insufficient on the part of God: because there are many benefits of God, one of which joins God to us more than another, as redemption more than creation, as blessed Bernard says: He assumed much difficulty, so that he might constitute you a debtor of much love, and the difficulty of redemption might admonish you of thanksgiving, whom the ease of creation had made less devout. Therefore, it seems there should be an order according to this mode, which are creator, redeemer, glorifier, and governor, and the like: and neither touches this order.

Likewise, Ambrose seems diminished 1. For between the household member and the enemy there are many degrees, namely relatives, fellow citizens, and godparents, and the like: and he does not place them.

Likewise, between sons and brothers and household members there are many degrees of consanguinity, which he omits: therefore it is diminished.

1. Likewise, a wife is to be loved as the Apostle commands, in Ephesians 5:25: Husbands, love your wives: and yet he does not place her.
2. Likewise, there are many societies of men, as lord and servant, master and disciple, prelate and subject, and the like: of which nothing is touched here: therefore it seems insufficient.
3. Furthermore, Ambrose himself seems to pervert the order because he says that good household members, who are in the fifth place, are to be preferred to bad sons, who are in the fourth place.
4. Likewise, it seems that what is in the fourth place should be preferred to what is in the third place: because the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians 12:14: It is not for parents to lay up treasures, but parents for children, therefore children are to be preferred to parents: although children are placed in the fourth place, and parents in the third.

In response, it seems to me that the order which Augustine places is taken according to the general differences of what is to be loved: these are, what is above us, and what is us, and what is next to us, and what is beneath us related to beatitude from the fellowship of the rational soul: nor can more connections be understood, since right and left only say what is next, and similarly before and behind: therefore only what is above, and what is ourselves, and what is next to us remains. How what is next comprehends angels and certain other things was said before. The order which Augustine touches is understood according to prior and posterior thus: because charity is one virtue, it is necessary that it has one reason of the good moving, and what has that good, or will also have it, this will be first and per se and above all loved, this is God who is placed in the first place: and other things are loved in God and to God, as the Master says in the preceding distinction. In God, if they are in God, as friends who act friendships, that is, good works, which alone are said to make friends. To God, however, if they are not in God, as friends acting enmities, that is, sin. And among those there also intervenes order: for when it is said, You shall love your neighbor as yourself, the "as" says two things, namely order, and the reason for loving the neighbor. Order, because no one loves another as himself, unless it is first supposed that he loves himself: therefore himself first, and another consequently: behold the order. Augustine touches the reason: because he thus explains, that is, to what you yourself, namely in God, or to God. However, there is not one relation to God of the body and soul in us: and therefore there is a double grade in them: but not in the neighbor, because he is entirely next to us both in body and in soul.

And thus the solution to the first is clear, and the reason for the order which Augustine places.

On the part of God, however, there cannot be order: because every order is among diverse things: and therefore the order of love supposes the diversity of what is to be loved. Hence, although we love God for many reasons, yet it is the same thing we love, and therefore there is no order there. And through these the solution to the second is clear.

The order of Ambrose, however, is taken otherwise: because it is of charity not simply, but in our nature, and therefore it admits the inclination of nature: either therefore only according to the reason of charity, or according to the reason of nature more. If in the first way: then the first grade is, which is entirely in the reason of the highest good, as to love God per se and above all. If, however, it is according to the reason of nature: either it says only the conformity of nature, or the bond of society is superadded.

If in the first way: then it is the last grade, as to love enemies, with whom we have nothing in common except nature. If, however, it is from the bond of society: either that society is from living together, or from lineage. If from living together: then the fifth is understood, which is the household member: and it is not understood only of the material house, but of the Church, and of those who live in a conforming life: as the Psalm says, 54:14: We walked in the house of God with consent. If, however, it is from lineage: either according to the line of descent, or ascent, or according to what descends, or from whom the descent is. If according to what descends: thus it is the second grade, which is what we are: or according to the line of ascent, and thus it is the third, which is to love parents. If according to the line of descent, whether directly from us, or from what we both descend from one, it makes only one general grade, which is the fourth, as sons, and parents, brothers, and the like.

To what is objected against this, it must be said in my judgment, that all those grades are contained under the household member of the spiritual house, and they only say different modes of conversing in the house of God which is the Church.

To the objection, that the wife as wife is joined, is the same body, as it is said in Genesis 2:24: They shall be two in one flesh. And therefore it is understood as to the body in the love of ourselves as to what is beneath us, and as to the soul in the love of God.

To another objection, it must be said that those societies are special, and they say different modes of the household member. There are, however, those who concede those reasons, saying otherwise that this order is not touched here, except to which nature inclines. However, the wife is joined by the mode of sacrament, and other conjunctions are by the mode of benefit or grace. But this is nothing: because it is said in the text, that spiritual parents are understood in parents: and this is clearly false, that nature does not incline to love the wife, or the lord, but inclines to love the enemy.

To another objection, it must be said that the order is not perverted: because this order is understood with other things being equal: but with unequal circumstances, it can well happen in some case that the third or fourth is first: and this will be determined below.

To another objection, it must be said that parents fail, when it increases for children: and therefore parents are more destitute: and therefore if they are in need, they are to be preferred to children, if both cannot be helped.

To the saying of the Apostle, it must be said that to lay up treasures does not say the supplement of need, but rather of abundance: but in that we are more bound to children who are entering, than to parents who are departing.

Articulus 3 — Whether These Orders Can Be Varied, Or Are Of Necessity

Whether these orders can be varied, or are of necessity?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, A, around the beginning: For he sins who acts preposterously, etc.

For from this it seems that this order is of necessity. And this does not seem:

1. For let it be supposed that I do whatever I owe to my father: then in nothing will I be guilty against him. However, since what I do for him is not finite, I can do more for another: therefore, by loving him who is domestic more than my father, I act preposterously, yet I do not sin.
2. Likewise, someone is in religion, and sees his father in need, and cannot help unless he leaves religion to make gains: either then he is bound to apostatize, or not. If so: then since apostasy is scandal and against obedience, he is bound to sin. If not: therefore in some case he can act preposterously, namely, to prefer the love...

§ 1. [...] [leaving the associatio]n of his congregation for his carnal father, and he will not sin.

§ 2. 3. Also, let us suppose someone is in the world, and has a needy father, and lives perilously in the world with constant fear of falling: it is established that he is bound to provide for himself more than for his father: therefore he ought to leave his needy father and flee to a place of security.

§ 3. 4. Also, this is seen through the sons of Zebedee, who, called by the Lord, having left their father, followed the Lord, even though the father was poor and old: and also nothing is read concerning their perilous way of life. Therefore it seems that those orders can be varied: therefore they are not orders of necessity.

§ 4. Solution: Without prejudice I say that, supposing the cause of a sufficient order, the order is of necessity, such that without it a sin occurs. I say the cause of the order is need on the one hand, namely of parents or others, and security on one's own part, and the possibility for assistance from the goods of fortune or a trade.

§ 5. To the first, therefore, it must be said that I never do for my father what I ought, unless I bestow upon him more affection than upon another, other things being equal: because if the father is evil, and another is good, the affection of nature indeed remains concerning the father, and the effect of grace, which is stronger, tends to the other: and in this I do not sin, and in effect if I satisfy the father, it is no fault if I do more for the other out of grace than for the father: because this does not corrupt the order, since, other things being equal, regarding affection there is always more toward the father, and regarding effect, as much as is fitting.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that he who is in religion, in my judgment, ought to remain in religion: and if he can have permission while remaining in it, he ought to assist his needy father through his trade, if otherwise he cannot have or beg [for him]: but he is not bound to go out [of religion] on account of the danger of his own way of living.

§ 7. To the next which is objected concerning him who is in the world, I well concede that if he is secure in the world, he is not bound to enter religion, but to assist his needy father: but if he probably fears a fall, or perhaps has fallen, then he is more bound to provide for himself, and can leave his father.

§ 8. To the next which is objected concerning the sons of Zebedee, James and John, it must be said that perhaps he [the father] had other means from which to live: or they knew that He who called them could provide for him better than they themselves could: but it is not so concerning others who are not God, whom we follow when calling us to religion.

Articulus 4 — Whether Charity Has An Eye To Any Remuneration

Whether charity has an eye to any remuneration?

§ 11. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, around the middle: God is to be loved for Himself, etc.

§ 12. From this it seems that charity cannot have an eye to any remuneration: and this also seems by another reason: because § 13. 1. Tully says that true friendship, although it has conjoined to itself very much utility and delight, nevertheless itself is founded neither upon the useful, nor upon the delightful: since therefore the charity of God denotes true friendship, it seems that it does not look upon the utility of nature: therefore neither a reward, nor a remuneration.

§ 14. 2. Also, Aristotle: Friends are to be loved, even if nothing ought to be done for us: much more God.

§ 15. 3. Also, Augustine: Although God could not be served without a reward, nevertheless He must be served without looking toward a reward: therefore since this is of charity, charity does not look upon a reward.

§ 1. 4. Also, the mercenary is disparaged, John 10:12 et seq. Since therefore the mercenary has an eye to a reward, it seems that charity is not mercenary.

§ 2. 5. Also, perfect charity casts out fear, because it is servile: therefore also the hope of reward, because this is servile and not liberally complying.

§ 3. BUT AGAINST: 1. Luke 15:17: How many hired servants in my father's house abound with bread! It is established that he speaks of the house of eternity: therefore those who serve out of charity, who alone inhabit the house, can be hired servants [mercenaries].

§ 4. 2. Also, Job 7:1: Are not his days like the days of a hired servant?

§ 5. 3. Also, to Abraham perfect in charity God said, Genesis 15:1: I am... thy reward exceeding great.

§ 6. 4. Also, the Apostle, to the Hebrews 10:36: Patience is necessary for you, that doing the will of God, you may receive the promise: therefore we can clearly expect a reward.

§ 7. 5. Also, in the same place, 10:35: Do not therefore lose your confidence, which hath a great reward.

§ 8. 6. Also, the Apostle concerning himself, 2 Timothy 1:12: I know whom I have believed, and I am certain. And in the same place, 4:8, he adds: As to the rest, there is laid up for me a crown of justice, which the Lord the just judge will render to me in that day.

§ 9. 7. Also, charity is generated from hope: and hope is always of a reward, because it is the expectation of beatitude from merits.

§ 10. Solution: To this it must be said that there is a reward which is nothing other than God and those things which conjoin God to us: and charity does not exclude the intuition of that reward, although it does not look upon it as it is a reward, but as a beloved thing to be thoroughly enjoyed. And there is a temporal reward: and charity excludes that: because although it may receive sustenance from temporal things, nevertheless it does not comply [serve] for them: and the reasons and authorities first induced speak of that [temporal reward], while the authorities and reasons consequently induced speak of the first [eternal reward].

§ 11. And through this the solution to all objections for both sides is evident.

§ 12. And because charity does not look to the eternal reward as it is a reward, but as a beloved thing to be enjoyed, therefore Bernard says that one must not confess to the Lord because He is good to you, just as he says of the wicked: He will praise thee when thou shalt do well to him [Ps 48:19]; but, Because He is good absolutely, just as the Levites did, who received no earthly portion among the sons of Israel, because the Lord was the portion of their inheritance. But concerning others who have eyes to temporal things, that is verified which was said of the servilely serving people, Deuteronomy 32:28: The eye of Jacob in a land of corn and wine, etc.

Articulus 5 — Whether We Are Able From Charity To Love The Neighbor And Created Beatitude As Much As God, And The Neighbor More Than Ourselves

Whether we can out of charity love our neighbor and created beatitude as much as God, and our neighbor more than ourselves?

§ 15. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, around the middle: Every one ought to love God more than himself.

§ 16. For it seems possible that someone out of charity loves his neighbor as much as God: because § 17. 1. His grace does not destroy, but perfects nature: since therefore nature before grace loves itself more than God, it seems also that after grace it will do the same.

§ 18. 2. Also, Nature loves itself, and loves God: if therefore I add equals to unequals, the things which are left will be unequal as before: therefore with grace added, nature still loves itself more than God.

§ 1. 3. Also, the charity by which we love God is finite, and its act is finite: similarly the act by which we love ourselves and our neighbor is finite. Let therefore the act of the love of God stand [fixed], and let the act of the love of neighbor be intensified, it can be so much intensified that it will equal or grow beyond that [first act]: and yet it will always be an act of charity: therefore it is possible out of charity to love a neighbor or oneself more than God.

§ 2. 4. Also, in the neighbor nothing is loved except God: therefore God is equally in Himself and in the neighbor: since therefore this is to love the neighbor, the neighbor can be loved as much as God.

§ 3. 5. Also, Augustine: We can love things unseen, not things unknown: therefore he whose knowledge is greater, his love is greater: but we know our neighbor and ourselves better: therefore we love [them] more.

§ 4. 6. Also, a habit is equally disposed to one thing as to another, because in a sleeping man both are equal: therefore also it equally progresses into both acts.

§ 5. BUT AGAINST: 1. If he can love one equally as the other, then there is no order.

§ 6. 2. Also, charity is the estimator of goods: therefore it loves the infinite good without proportion more than the finite: but God is the infinite good: therefore without proportion it loves God more than the neighbor.

§ 7. 3. Also, God is loved above all things: therefore always both above oneself and above one's neighbor.

§ 8. Further it is asked, whether created beatitude can be loved as much as God?

§ 9. For it seems that it can: for as much as this man loves God, so much he loves to thoroughly enjoy God: and as much as he loves to thoroughly enjoy God, so much he loves the beatitude by which he enjoys: but this is created beatitude: therefore as much as he loves God, so much he loves some creature.

§ 10. Further it is asked, whether we can love our neighbor more than ourselves, or [only] as much.

§ 11. It seems that we can: because 1. The rationale of the good is the rationale of love: therefore where there is a greater good, there will be a greater love: but in the neighbor there is frequently a greater good: therefore there will be a greater love of the neighbor than of ourselves.

§ 12. 2. Also, there is one rationale of the love of ourselves and of the neighbor, namely in God, or toward God: therefore if the neighbor is more in God than we are, it seems that we should love the neighbor more than ourselves.

§ 13. 3. Also, by virtue of the expression an order between us and our neighbor does not seem to be imported: because it is said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: therefore it seems that we ought to love our neighbor as much as ourselves.

§ 14. But against this is what Augustine says, and it was held above, that to us is given the principality of love, when it is said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

§ 15. Solution: It must be said that it is impossible out of charity to love anything as much as God, as the reasons induced for this well prove. But nevertheless it is to be noted that when it is said that God is infinitely loved more than the neighbor, an actual infinite is not posited: but it is understood thus, that the neighbor is never loved so much that God ought not to be loved without comparison more: and this is for this reason, because there is no reason why we should love anything out of charity unless God alone be it: therefore He always remains loved through Himself, and more loved than anything which we love on account of Him.

§ 16. Therefore it must be said to the first, that not being able to love God above oneself (if indeed this is true, as some say) is not a potency of nature, but rather that impotence: and therefore adventitious grace amends that imperfection: but with respect to the neighbor there is no impotence, because it is not against the right order, in which one's own good is set before the good of another.

§ 2. To the next it must be said that this is true where the addition on both sides is equal, and those things to which the addition is made are equally disposed to what is added. But this is not true here: because when it is said, Nature loves God, there is an impotence in the love. But when it is said, It loves itself, there is a potency in it: and therefore adventitious grace excludes the impotence, and does not destroy that which was a potency.

§ 3. To the next it must be said that the act of charity in itself, by which God is loved, is finite: but nevertheless it is disproportionate to that by which the neighbor is loved, because of its rationale: whence there is no reason for intensification in the act of love of oneself or of the neighbor, except in the reason of the intensification of the love of God: and therefore it will never be compared, or if it is equaled, it will not be an act of charity, but of perverse love.

§ 4. To the next it must be said that although finally in the neighbor nothing is loved except God, nevertheless materially something else is loved in him: and those material dispositions, as created grace, and familiarity, and things of this sort, are the rationale of the act of love, although they are not of the charity of the neighbor or of ourselves.

§ 5. To the next it must be said that 'better known' is said in two ways, namely that the word 'better' can be a noun, and thus it signifies the disposition of the object of love: or an adverb, and thus it signifies the disposition of the act of knowledge: and in the first way it is true that the better known is more loved by charity, if it is the uncreated good. In the second way it is false: because Augustine says that nothing prohibits us from loving more what we are ignorant of, as long as we believe it to be better than what we know.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that it is false that a habit is equally disposed to both: because to God it is disposed as to the cause and rationale of all other lovable things, but it is not thus disposed to others.

§ 7. To that which is further asked, it must be said that there is a sophism in the process from the first to the last: because the same rationale of lovable things is not taken: for when it is said, As much as he loves God, so much he loves to enjoy, 'to enjoy' is taken for the inherence of the uncreated: and when it is said, As much as he loves to enjoy, so much he loves the beatitude by which he enjoys: if 'by which' signifies the efficient cause, then it is true, because then beatitude stands for uncreated beatitude: but if 'by which' signifies the formal cause, then it is false, because then it stands for created beatitude, and then the rationale of the lovable thing is varied.

§ 8. To that which is still further asked, it must be said that the neighbor neither ought nor can be loved more than ourselves according to the soul.

§ 9. To that which is objected against this, it must be said that this would be true if the rationale of the good alone moved in this order: but this is not true: rather, the good ordained to nature moves: and in this one's own good moves more than another's: just as the Philosopher also says that nothing prohibits certain lesser goods from being more choiceworthy for certain people than greater goods, as for a poor and needy man it is more choiceworthy to grow rich than to philosophize, although to philosophize is simply better.

§ 11. To the last it must be said, as was said above in the beginning of this reading, that when it is said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, there as thyself imports the order of love and the rationale: and then the objection ceases.

Articulus 6 — Whether These Orders Are To Be Considered According To Affection, Or According To Effect, Or According To Both

Whether these orders are attended to according to affection, or according to effect, or according to both?

§ 14. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B: Whence also upon this a question is often moved, etc.

§ 15. For here a scrupulous question occurs: Whether these orders are attended to according to affection, or according to effect, or according to both?

§ 16. It seems, however, that according to affection: because 1. There is one rationale of love in all lovable things, namely God: but God weighs affection more than effect: therefore it seems that the order of all lovable things is to be attended to according to affection.

§ 17. 2. Also, Nature moves to this, that he who is nearer is loved more in affection than he who is more remote: therefore it seems that the degrees of love are received according to affection.

§ 2. 3. Also, from a chance event I can bestow more of an effect upon one who is more remote, as if he is in need, and the nearer one is not: since therefore the order always remains in one mode whatever chance event occurs, it seems that the degrees of charity will be taken according to affection and not effect.

§ 3. But against this it seems to be that 1. Affection seems more to follow the rationale of the good: and the good is found more in him who is in a more remote degree, than in a nearer one: therefore it seems that the order is received not according to affection, but effect.

§ 4. 2. Also, let us suppose that I do for a brother whatever I ought: and yet I do not have as much affection for him as for another whom I believe to be more good: it is established that I do not sin: therefore it seems that the order is not attended to according to affection.

§ 5. Solution: It must be said in my judgment that the order is taken according to both, other things being equal: but there can never be a reason of nature inclining to one part, if there is vice in that one, and much of grace in another, without grace being able to preponderate in affection.

§ 6. To the first therefore it must be said that it is true that God weighs affection more, yet He weighs both: but affection ought to precede effect.

§ 7. To the next it must be said that nature moves to both, if both are necessary, as is evident in that precept: Honor thy father and thy mother.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that this does not proceed: because the order in affection is understood other things being equal: for no one is bound to assist one who is not in need: whence then the greater affection is toward the nearer one, but the greater effect toward him who is in need.

§ 9. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that this would be true if the rationale of the good alone were moving: but this is not true, rather the good and nature move simultaneously.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that I never do for a brother whatever I ought, unless I give him more of affection and effect, if other things are equal: because then he is conjoined to me by more reasons than another: but otherwise I think it to be true what is said in the Letter, that the bond of minds is holier than that of blood.

Articulus 7 — Whether In Charity Strangers Can Be Preferred To Blood Relatives

Whether in charity strangers can be preferred to blood relatives?

Whether in charity strangers can be preferred to blood relatives?

§ 2. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, I: It is also customarily asked, If parents, etc.

§ 3. And two things are asked here, namely whether strangers can in any way be preferred to blood relatives?

§ 4. It seems that they can: because 1. If someone is a Prelate, and can give ecclesiastical benefices, he ought to seek the better man: therefore he ought to prefer a better stranger to a blood relative.

§ 5. 2. Also, this is seen in Ezechiel 44:6 and 7: Let all your wicked doings suffice you, O house of Israel: in that you have brought in your sons uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary.

§ 6. But TO THE CONTRARY it seems to be 1. What the Apostle says: But if any man have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel [1 Tim 5:8].

§ 7. 2. Also, to the contrary seems to be what is said in the Letter, that if we do not suffice for all, we ought to provide especially for those who are conjoined to us by some society.

§ 8. Further it is asked here, Whether sons can be preferred to parents?

§ 9. And it seems that they can: because Chrysostom says that juice ascends from the root into the branches, rather than conversely: therefore the love of God descends from parents into sons, and not into parents: therefore sons are to be preferred to parents.

§ 10. But to the contrary seems to be the precept of Exodus 20:12: Honor thy father and thy mother. And it is not said there: Honor thy sons.

§ 11. Solution: To the first it must be said that in spiritual goods which are not devolved as it were naturally by inheritance, the better man ought to be sought without attention to degree [of relation], if he can easily be had: but if not, it can be given to a good man who is present. But in temporal goods possessed by hereditary right, I think that he is more bound to assist the nearer one in need, even if he is less good.

§ 12. And through this the solution to the first question is evident: because the authority of Ezechiel is understood concerning spiritual goods, and the authority of the Apostle concerning temporal ones.

§ 13. To the second question it must be said further, that we are more bound to assist parents: and yet I well think that affection is more inclined toward sons, on account of this, that in them the nature of the father is preserved, and they are as it were a pledge of the parents.

§ 14. But to the statement of Chrysostom it must be said that by 'juice' is understood the effect: because parents decline: and therefore there is less in them of affection [toward them], but they need more of effect.

Articulus 8 — Whether All Are Bound To Perfect Charity

Whether we are all bound to perfect charity?

§ 16. But afterwards it is asked concerning this which he says, there: It is also to be known that there are diverse degrees of charity, etc.

§ 17. And three things are asked, namely whether we are all bound to perfect charity?

§ 18. Secondly, Whether a perfect man is bound to love more according to act, than an imperfect man?

§ 19. Thirdly, Whether a perfect man is bound to love his neighbor more, than an imperfect man [loves] God?

§ 20. To the first it is objected thus: 1. The sign of perfect charity is to lay down one's life for one's brethren, as it says, John 15:13: Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends: but everyone is bound to this: therefore he is bound to perfect charity. Middle proof. The soul of the neighbor is better than our body: therefore, if we love according to the order assigned above by Augustine, we ought to expose our body for the soul of our neighbor.

§ 21. 2. Also, Matthew 5:48: Be you perfect, as also your heavenly Father is per-

§ 1. -fect: but He Himself loves the soul more than the body: therefore we also ought to love thus: therefore we ought willingly to expose our life for the better thing.

§ 2. 3. Also, Luke 9:26: He that shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him the Son of man shall be ashamed, when he shall come in his majesty: therefore it seems that for the confession of faith we ought to be prepared to die: but this is of perfect charity: therefore we are all bound to perfect charity.

§ 3. 4. Also, the unpriceable ought not to be placed under any price: but virtue is unpriceable, and especially grace: therefore anyone is bound to be prepared to die for justice and faith: but this is of perfect charity: therefore he is bound to have perfect charity.

§ 4. 5. Also, 1 Maccabees 3:58 and 59: Be ye girded, and be valiant sons:... for it is better for us to die in battle, than to see the evils of our nation, and of the holies: therefore all are bound to die for faith and justice, which is of perfect charity.

§ 5. 6. Also, they who denied on account of punishments, sinned mortally: therefore it seems that they were bound not to deny: and this they could not do without perfect charity: therefore they were bound to have perfect charity.

§ 6. BUT AGAINST: The perfection of charity does not depend on our will: therefore it is not in us: but to nothing are we bound except to that which is in us: therefore we are not bound to the perfection of charity.

§ 7. Solution: It must be said that perfection is multiplex, namely of sufficiency, and to this all are bound: concerning which, Matthew 5:48: Be you therefore perfect, as also your heavenly Father is perfect: and this consists in the observance of the precepts. There is also the perfection of comparison, concerning which it is said, Genesis 6:9: Noe was a just and perfect man in his generations, he walked with God: and concerning this, nothing at present. There is also the perfection of a vow or of religion, concerning which it is said, Matthew 19:21: If thou wilt be perfect, go sell what thou hast, and give to the poor. Perfection is also annexed to a vow, as Chastity to Holy Orders: and concerning this, Matthew 19:12: There are eunuchs, who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven. And it follows: He that can take, let him take it. There is again a perfection sought in the security of conscience, concerning which it is said, 1 John 4:18: Perfect charity casteth out fear: and such men say with the Apostle, Philippians 1:23: Having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. And to these four perfections not all are bound: but to that which is annexed to orders and religion those are bound who have bound themselves. But there is another perfection of prelacy, concerning which it is said, John 15:13: Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Prelates are bound to have this, that they may run about the flock: and if the flock is sought, not just the person of the shepherd, they are bound to expose themselves to the wolves, so that by their example faith may stand in the flock.

§ 8. But if you ask, How is it known that the flock is sought? I say that the flock is then sought when they seek to extinguish in the people those things which make it a flock to the Lord, and this is faith and justice. But when on account of hatred of a person someone persecutes the flock, then the shepherd can absent himself, because his absence will give rest both to himself and to the flock: and thus the Apostle permitted himself to be let down by the brethren through the wall of Damascus, that he might escape the hands of the Provost of the Damascenes.

§ 9. According to this therefore it must be said to the first and all the following, which all have the same solution, that this is true in a case, namely when we know in this mode a brother can be liberated from the danger of the soul. But when we probably doubt, we are not bound. Also, when we are comprehended [arrested], for faith or justice we are bound to stand strongly: but before we are comprehended, we can flee, unless we are prelates, because then for the danger of the flock we are bound to run about, and to expose ourselves to the teeth of the wolves: and this when the flock is sought commonly, and not the person of the shepherd. Whence also I think that if a preacher had for some time admonished the people to constancy, and afterwards persecution came, that he would be bound to remain with them, lest by the example of his flight they should fail in the faith and justice which he had preached: but nevertheless he is less bound to this than a Prelate, because a Prelate is bound from office, but a preacher from the act which he did, and not from profession, because he never professed this.

Articulus 9 — Whether The Perfect Are Bound To Love More In Act Than The Imperfect

Whether a perfect man is bound to love more according to act, than an imperfect man?

§ 4. Secondly it is asked whether a perfect man is bound to love more according to act, than an imperfect man?

§ 5. It seems that he is: because Gregory says: When gifts increase, the reasons for the gifts also increase: but in the perfect man the gifts have increased: therefore the reasons for the gifts: therefore he is bound to love more according to act.

§ 6. Also, Gregory: From him to whom more is committed, more is exacted: but to the perfect man more is committed: therefore more of love is exacted from him.

§ 7. BUT AGAINST! We see this daily, that neophytes in conversion love and pray more fervently than mature and perfect men: therefore it seems that they are not bound to be more fervent according to act.

§ 8. Moreover, merit is not attended to according to fervor, but according to the very quantity of love: therefore they are not bound to this, that they be fervent.

§ 9. Solution: It must be said that a perfect man is bound to love more according to act from what is committed [to him], not from precept: but to love more according to act, in my judgment, is not attended to in fervor, but rather according to the quantity of the will, because he inheres more strongly to the beloved, and the perfect man is more difficultly separated than the imperfect. For concerning a novice it is like new wine, which has two undigested heats, namely of the place, and natural: and those disturb with inordinate motions and make it ferment: but when the heat of the place has evaporated, and the natural heat is digested, then it is stronger in its convenient and natural operations than the heat of the must, and then it is drunk with sweetness. Thus in novices the new heat of warmth from charity, and the retained heat of concupiscence still fight together: and from this fervor often appears in them, which however is immature, and would quickly yield to adversities or prosperities, unless it were first digested by a long custom of good life.

§ 10. And through this the solution to the authorities of Gregory is evident: because they speak of intensification from what is committed, and not from precept.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Perfect Can Love The Neighbor More Than The Imperfect Can Love God

Whether a perfect man can love his neighbor more, than an imperfect man loves God?

§ 13. Thirdly it is asked, If a perfect man can love his neighbor more, than an imperfect man loves God?

§ 14. It seems, however, that he can: because a perfect man would more quickly die for the salvation of his neighbor than an imperfect man for the sake of God; since this is of greatest charity, it seems he himself loves his neighbor more, than an imperfect man [loves] God.

ON THE CONTRARY: God and the neighbor are disproportionable goods. Therefore, since the good is the reason for love, it seems that God is loved immeasurably more by any charity whatsoever than the neighbor is loved by anyone.

And this seems to be something that must be conceded.

AND TO the first argument it must be said that, in that deed, the perfect man would principally die out of the love of God rather than of the neighbor, and therefore it does not follow that he loves the neighbor more, but rather God.

Articulus 11 — A Difficult Question On The Increase Of Charity

A difficult question concerning the augmentation of charity.

Next, it is asked about what he says there, D, near the beginning: That it may be perfected, it is born; when it has been born, etc.

For here there is a difficult question concerning the augmentation of charity, which was indeed disputed in the first book of the Sentences. But it is still inquired into on account of its difficulty.

§ 1. For every form is simple, and there is no intension in it except through the intension of its causes in the subject, just as whiteness is intended when its causes are intended. Therefore, since charity has no cause in the subject, it cannot be intended, as it seems.

§ 2. Again, a form which is intended: either it is intended through separation from its contrary, just as the Philosopher says that the white is unmixed with the black, and the whiter is that which is more unmixed with the black; or it is intended through approach to a terminus or to the true imposition of the name, as the whiter is that which is nearer to the true white, and the better is that which is more similar to the true good; or it is intended through recession from that, just as an evil is called worse because it is further removed from the good. If therefore charity is intended, it is intended in one of these modes. Not in the first mode, because the least charity has nothing of mortal sin with it; therefore it is universally removed from it. Nor can it be said that it is intended through separation from venial sin, as it seems, because even the greatest charity that exists in the present wayfaring state is compatible with this, as Augustine says, and as was established above, that as long as we are on the way, on account of the battle of concupiscence, that precept is not totally fulfilled by us: You shall love the Lord your God, etc. Therefore charity cannot be intended in this mode.

§ 3. Again, it does not seem that it can be intended through approach to the true imposition of the name. For the true imposition of the name belongs either to that which is truly the habit of charity, or having an admixture of the contrary; or to that which is substantially its own charity. If in the first mode, it is no longer intended, because this is in the least charity. If in the second mode, again it does not seem able to be intended, because charity is not predicated according to one ratio of essential and habitual charity; but every intension and remission is according to the same ratio and species, because the Philosopher says that more and less do not vary the species. Again, nor in the third mode, because the same question returns: what would make one charity approach the terminus more than another? For it is necessary that there be some cause of that excess. Again, nor in the fourth mode, because things are not intended in that mode unless they are spoken of according to privation, such as evil, dark, and the like; but charity is not spoken of in this way. If perhaps you wish to say that charity is intended through fervor. AGAINST this is the fact that fervor is from it: but intension is taken according to the cause of the quality that is intended.

§ 4. Again, the quantity of merit is attended according to intense charity. But it is commonly said that the quantity of merit is not attended according to fervor; for if it were attended according to fervor, the charity in some perfect man would not be of the same quantity when he sleeps and when he is awake: because when he sleeps, he does not burn with charity.

§ 5. Again, according to this, since the pain of death abstracts the soul from the fervor of charity, merit would be diminished in perfect men by death itself, which is absurd.

§ 6. Again, fervor is according to the lower sensible soul, and does not reach charity which is higher: therefore it does not intend it. For Aristotle says in book XVI of On Animals: If it does not touch, it does not act, and alteration does not follow.

§ 7. Besides, it seems that the Text implies that this intension happens through the addition of essence to essence, because it says that it is augmented. But augmentation is the addition to a pre-existing quantity. Therefore it seems that something is added to a pre-existing quantity. But if this is granted, it is asked: How could this be? For the simple cannot be added to the simple, as it seems. Since therefore charity is simple, it does not seem able to be added to any simple, nor anything to it.

§ 8. Again, things which are added to one another must be such that one is related by way of potency, and the other by way of act: but this is not found here.

§ 9. Again, if a simple is added to a simple, it is not made any greater, as the Philosopher says: therefore from such an addition nothing greater is made, as it seems.

§ 10. Again, augmentation is a transmutation: therefore that which is augmented is transmuted. Therefore further, that which is augmented essentially [per substantiam], is transmuted essentially. Therefore if something is added to charity, it is augmented essentially. But that which is transmuted essentially does not remain the same substance. Therefore augmented charity does not remain the same charity as the one that was, which is false.

§ 11. Again, augmentation (as the Philosopher says) does not occur without nourishment: but it is nourished materially [per substantiam], and augmented quantitatively. And similarly Augustine seems to say here that when it is born, it is nourished, and having been nourished it is augmented. Therefore it seems that what is added is in the ratio of some essence, and has quantity, and again is incorporated into this prior charity by the virtue of another that subsumes it into itself; and this is not easy to find in charity. Therefore it seems that it is not augmented.

§ 12. Again, if so much is added to so much, it increases twofold. If therefore the added charity is like the one to which the addition is made, in that both are simple, and one is not more simple than the other, it seems necessary that either it is not augmented at all, or that in every augmentation it increases twofold.

§ 13. Again, augmentation occurs in another way through extension or rarefaction: but when something is extended, as much as it increases in one dimension, it decreases by that much in another. And we cannot say this of charity. Therefore it seems that it is not augmented in this way. Nor can we say that it is augmented through rarefaction, because it is not a rarefiable substance.

§ 14. Again, augmentation is found through the multiplication of a thing in itself, just as the Lord augmented five loaves to the satisfaction of many thousands. And this again does not seem to be fitting, because what is multiplied in itself is done either through the creation of new matter under its form, or through the sudden conversion of other matter, such as air, into the form of that which is multiplied. Therefore it seems, since charity is not a thing consisting thus of form and matter, and does not have parts, that it cannot be augmented in this way.

§ 15. Again, an augmentation of power occurs when its proper matter is multiplied, just as a natural color is multiplied and augmented in its proper matter, and the heat of fire is multiplied in its proper matter, and a heavy thing is heavier in a greater quantity, and so for others.

But this again does not apply to charity: because it has no matter except the soul; and this cannot be multiplied. Therefore it seems that it is in no way intended or augmented in essence, but only in motion and fervor.

ON THE CONTRARY: Because according to this every man would have charity equal in essence with another, and the least of the saints or the just would have as much as Christ or the Blessed Virgin, which is absurd to believe.

Besides, I ask about that stronger motion of charity of one than of another, whence does it proceed? It is certain that it is from the greater power of charity: but that greater power must necessarily be rooted in some essence. Is that essence equal to another of lesser power, or not? If so: then there is no reason why it should be of greater power than the other. If not: then the same question returns, why is the essence of this charity augmented over the essence of the other charity?

Moreover, the same question applies to the augmentation of every virtue that is not material or bodily.

SOLUTION: To this I say without prejudice, with certain Masters, that it is augmented through the addition of essence to essence: for fewer inconveniences follow from this position. And I suppose two propositions: one from a Saint, and another from a certain Philosopher. For Augustine says that in those things which are not great in bulk, to be greater is the same as to be better; and to this I add: And this is what it is to be better, which is to be more similar to the first goodness. And if it cannot be more similar through purification from a contrary, as has been sufficiently proven, it will be more similar through an added effect of goodness, which makes it approach closer. The other proposition is from the Philosopher in the commentary on book XI of the First Philosophy, that infinite power is not compared by augmentation to an infinite power in duration or in quantity, but in the vigor of the moving power; and it has this vigor from that nobility by which it is the first mover, which is capable of doing through one simple motion what others cannot do except through multiple motions that are not entirely simple. And they have more and more from this, because they approach the first in goodness more and more. According to this, therefore, it only remains to solve how a simple can be added to a simple so that it becomes greater, and whether it is augmented twofold, and by virtue of what the addition takes place.

AND I SAY to the first that this is false: "a simple cannot be added to a simple"; and it has many counter-instances. For a simple species is added to a simple intellect; but it is true that a simple in the ratio of potency and a simple in the ratio of act are added to each other. And it is not like this here, because both charities are in the ratio of perfection and act. And I say that such an addition is of light to light, and of vigor to vigor.

To the next it must be said that a simple is added to a simple, and it does not become greater in that ratio by which they were called simple through the privation of quantity. But it is not so here, because each of the simples has a quantity of good in its essence: and since to be greater is to be better, the whole is made better.

To the next it must be said that although what is added to that to which it is added is not of greater or lesser bulk, nevertheless it is of greater or lesser quantity in "good-value"; and therefore it need not augment except in that proportion by which it is greater, that is, better.

To the next it must be said that it is not as in an augmented body, that one enters into another, and one is attracted by the virtue of the other, but rather one is united to the other by the virtue of the first goodness.

But to that which is objected, that augmentation is a transmutation, etc., it must be said that augmentation is not a transmutation of essence which is a substantial form: but it is true that it is not without the transmutation of another into itself. And therefore it does not follow that the augmented thing is transmuted essentially, but it follows that something is transmuted essentially into it. And yet this is not true of charity: because in this respect it is not similar, because that which is added is not transmuted, since it is never dissimilar, like nourishment to a body, but always similar. Hence it is not transmuted, but is united by the virtue of the first goodness.

Moreover, this question occurs once more before the end of book IV of the Sentences, and then, what God will deign to give, we will say again.

DISTINCTIO XXX

Divisio Textus

Here it is customary to ask, what is better and of greater merit, to love friends, etc. In this distinction only one thing is contained, namely what is of greater merit, to love friends, or enemies. And therefore we will ask two things here before the Text, which also depend on the preceding reading, namely whether all are bound to the love of enemies?

And, if all are bound, we will ask, whether all ought equally to exhibit affection and effect to enemies, or only the perfect?

Articulus 1 — Whether We Are All Bound To The Love Of Enemies

Whether we are all bound to the love of enemies?

To the first of these we proceed thus: § 1. On that verse of Psalm 118:18: Open my eyes, and I will consider the wondrous things of your law, the Gloss says that the wondrous things which are considered are to love enemies. But it is certain that we are not bound to wondrous things: therefore we are not bound to love enemies.

§ 2. Again, Luke 6:27: Love your enemies, the Gloss says: This belongs to the perfect. Therefore, since we are not all bound to perfection, we are not all bound to love enemies.

§ 3. Again, the Gloss in the same place: Here the Church is not nourished with milk, which is for the simple and imperfect, but is strengthened by the stronger food of charity. Therefore it seems that none are bound to this except the perfect.

§ 4. Again, Matthew 5:43: You have heard that it was said: You shall love your neighbor, and hate your enemy. Since therefore we are not bound to more things than they were, it seems that we can hate our enemies. But that we are not bound to more things than they were is gathered from Matthew 15:36, on that text: And taking the seven loaves and the fishes, and giving thanks, etc. The Gloss: He preaches no other things than those which were written, but demonstrates that the law and the Prophets are more weighty.

Again, this is gathered from Matthew 19:17: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. Therefore the commandments which had been given to the ancients were sufficient for his salvation.

Again, this is gathered from 1 Kings 7:23, on that text: He also made a molten sea of ten cubits, etc.: there the Gloss says: In the ten precepts of the law the Lord expressed everything we ought to do. But it is certain that the love of enemies is nowhere [mentioned] there. Therefore we are not bound to it.

§ 5. Again, Ezekiel 20:11: I gave them my precepts... which if a man do, he shall live in them, the interlinear Gloss says: Adding nothing. Since therefore this is not contained in the Decalogue, it seems that we ought not to add it.

§ 6. Again, it is often read in the Old Testament that the Lord killed and commanded enemies to be killed, such as Amalek, and those who dwelled in the promised land before the sons of Israel. Therefore it seems that He wants us to hate our enemies.

§ 7. Again, there seems to be a reason for this: for enmity is the cause of fighting. But the cause of fighting and the cause of friendship are contrary: therefore enmity will not be the cause of love, but of its contrary; therefore it will be the cause of hatred. Therefore the enemy is not to be loved.

§ 8. Again, we see this in every nature, both inanimate and animate, that each fights against its enemy. Therefore it seems that loving enemies is against the natural law implanted in everything: therefore we are not bound to it by charity, because charity is not contrary to the natural law.

But against this are: § 1. Those things which are contained in the Text, and which were held in the preceding distinction.

§ 2. Again, Leviticus 19:18: Seek not revenge, nor be mindful of the injury of your citizens: therefore it seems that the ancients were bound to the love of enemies.

§ 3. Again, Sirach 28:3-4: Man keeps anger against man, and does he seek healing from God? He has no mercy on a man like himself, and does he entreat for his own sins? As if to say: He will neither receive healing, nor be heard.

§ 4. Again, Proverbs 24:17: When your enemy falls, do not rejoice.

SOLUTION: It must be said that all are bound to the love of enemies, both the perfect and the imperfect.

TO the first, therefore, it must be said that there is something wondrous, which is only unusual: and in this way to love enemies is called wondrous: and to this we are indeed bound. And there is a wondrous thing that is unusual and appears above the faculty of the one admiring it: and to this we are not bound.

To the next it must be said that the Gloss speaks of the perfection of sufficiency. But if it calls perfect those who are in the state of perfection, then it is understood of the following verse, which is: Do good to them that hate you, so that it is understood of the exhibition of familiarity through benefits and external signs: because to this none are bound except the perfect.

To the next it must be said that those servile ones who served under the bark of the letter in the Old Testament are called simple there. Or, if it is understood of the perfect, then it is to be glossed like the preceding.

To the next it must be said that it was never said to the ancients, You shall hate your enemy, except by their Doctors, and not by the law: but they observed it as if it had been said, and from that Christ assumed this.

Or it may be said that this was said to them concerning an enemy of the faith, and not concerning a personal enemy: and they understood this of a personal enemy by a perverse intellect. But concerning an enemy of the faith it was said in a precept that they should kill every male in the land which God was going to give into their possession: but the Lord understood this of the good killing, which is by the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God.

To that which is objected, that we are bound to nothing but what they were, it must be said that if what is contained in the law is taken explicitly, then it is false: because they were bound to many things to which we are not bound, and we are bound to many things to which they were not bound. But if it is understood spiritually and implicitly, according to which the truth is in the shadow: then this is true. But we do not fulfill the same thing through the same works: because they were bound not to eat swine's flesh, and nevertheless to be continent; but we are continent, and we eat [swine's flesh], and we fulfill the same thing. And this is what the Gloss means when it says that they demonstrate that the law is filled with spiritual sacraments.

To the next it must be said that it is contained in that commandment: Honor your father and your mother, namely parents: because under the name of parents every man is understood there, as Augustine says. And through this the solution to the following is clear.

To the next it must be said that the Lord showed in this that the enemies of the faith should be killed by the sword of the spirit, so that the masculine, in which the vigor of sin is noted, might be killed, and human infirmity might live, which is noted by the virgins who have not known men in intercourse, that is, those not having the appetite to fornicate away from the faith. But if they do not wish to be converted, there is nothing else except that they should pay in material fire the penalties of the harm they inflict on the Church through the subversion of the simple.

To the next it must be said that enmity as enmity is not to be loved, but rather the enemy, who is the image of God, to the end that he may no longer be an enemy.

To the next it must be said that this is not against the law of human nature: because man is an animal tame by nature, conformable to God rather than to beasts.

Articulus 2 — Whether All Are Equally Bound To Show Signs Of Affection And Familiarity, Or Only The Perfect

Whether all are equally bound to exhibit signs of affection and familiarity, or only the perfect?

Secondly it is asked: Whether all are equally bound to exhibit signs of affection and familiarity, or only the perfect?

It seems that this is a precept only for the perfect.

§ 1. By the Gloss on Matthew 5:43, introduced earlier. If perhaps it is said that it is spoken concerning the perfection of sufficiency. Against this seems to be the fact that the Lord there adds upon the state of imperfection of the Old Testament: therefore all are bound to it.

§ 2. Again, in the same place, another Gloss says that the summit of perfection is to love enemies and to pray for them: therefore it seems that not even all the perfect are bound, but only those in whom there is the summit of perfection.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. In the same place another Gloss says: Sins against the Church are committed in three ways: by hatred, by words, by bodily torture; but the Church on the contrary does three things: she loves, she prays, she does good. Therefore it seems that whoever neglects these things is not a member of the Church. Therefore all are bound.

§ 2. Again, this was commanded even to the ancients, Proverbs 25:21: If your enemy is hungry, feed him.

§ 3. Again, Exodus 23:4: If you meet your enemy's ox or ass going astray, bring it back to him. The Gloss:

This means, love your enemies. And it follows, v. 5: If you see the ass of him that hates you lying under a burden, you shall not pass by, but shall lift it up with him. The Gloss: This means to do good to them that hate us.

SOLUTION: Without prejudice I say that to me it seems harsh if all are said to be bound to exhibit signs of love. Hence it seems to me that they are not bound except in a particular case, if they see him suffering necessity: for then they are bound. But still it seems to me that if he asks for pardon without mocking, then a sign of love must not be denied to him.

Again, it seems to me that if he greets you, he ought to be greeted in return, unless a man probably fears that he is doing it as a mockery, as if not caring that he has provoked a brother.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear. For the perfect are bound on account of scandal to offer signs of love even spontaneously, especially in the presence of those who know that they have been offended.

Articulus 3 — Whether It Is Better To Love An Enemy Than A Friend

Whether it is better to love an enemy than a friend?

Next it is asked concerning what he says at the beginning of the reading: Here it is customarily asked, What is better and of greater merit, etc.

For it seems that to love enemies is better and of greater merit, because:

§ 1. The Gloss on Matthew 5:43 says that this is the summit of perfection: therefore this is better.

§ 2. Again, the Gloss on that verse of Psalm 118:18: I will consider the wondrous things of your law, says: In the works of God nothing is more wondrous than to love enemies. Therefore nothing is higher and better.

§ 3. Again, Bernard on that verse of John 15:13: Greater love than this no one has, that one lay down his life for his friends, adds: Indeed you, Lord, had greater love, who laid down your life for friends and enemies. Therefore it seems to be better and preferable.

§ 4. Again, Matthew 5:46: If you love those who love you, what reward will you have? The Gloss: None in heaven. Therefore to love enemies is better.

§ 5. Again, Romans 5:8-9: But God commends his charity towards us, because when as yet we were enemies, according to the time Christ died for us, namely for the impious. If therefore God's charity is commendable in this, ours will be commendable from the same.

§ 6. Again, Matthew 5:44, on that verse: Love your enemies, the Gloss says: Behold to how great a perfection he advances us! Therefore perfection is taken according to that: therefore it is better.

§ 7. Again, a virtue is said to be the utmost of a power concerning a thing or in a thing. But charity is of greater power above nature when it loves an enemy than when it loves a friend. Therefore its virtue is greater. Therefore this is better than that.

§ 8. Again, what involves a greater battle belongs to a greater glory. But to love an enemy involves a greater battle: therefore it is of greater glory: therefore it is better.

§ 9. Again, nature and grace incline to loving a friend; but the more grace elevates nature, the purer and better the motion is, because in this way it approaches more to conformity with grace. But this is maximally the case in the love of enemies. Therefore, speaking absolutely, to love enemies is better than to love friends.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. For merit to be in a certain quantity is for it to be according to the quantity of charity. But in the degrees of charity the love of enemies is placed in the last place: therefore this is of the least merit, as it seems.

§ 2. Again, if there is a comparison of one to the other, this cannot be by grace of the habit: because without contradiction it is true that an act of greater charity, insofar as it is such, is of greater merit. Therefore this was in the same or an equal act. But then I see that the love of a friend burns more fervently: therefore it seems that it is of greater merit on account of the fervor.

§ 3. Again, friend and enemy are contraries; to love and to hate are also contraries. But to hate a friend is more evil than to hate an enemy. Therefore its opposite is more good and more eligible than the opposite of the other. But the opposite is to love a friend. Therefore this is more good than to love an enemy. And the Philosopher seems to concede this.

SOLUTION: In my judgment it must be said that absolutely and simply it is better to love an enemy than to love a friend, just as the first reasons prove. However, some say that in these two there can be a comparison of state to state, or act to act, or habit to habit; and all these either in the same man, or in different men. If a comparison of state to state is made in different men, they say that it is better to love an enemy: because this indicates a state of perfection, but the other does not. But if the comparison is made in the same man, it is still better: because loving an enemy presupposes much more loving a friend as well, but not conversely. And just as two things are better than one of them, so it will be here too: for he who is in such a state that he loves an enemy, is also in that state that he loves a friend. But if a comparison of habit to habit is made in the same man, there is no comparison: because the habit is the same, but in different objects they are related as exceeding and exceeded. But if a comparison of act to act is made: because the acts both in the same man and in different men are separate, and I am speaking of the act in comparison to the object alone, then they say that in a certain respect one is better, and in a certain respect the other. For since the habits are equal, as the comparison supposes, then on account of sweetness and fervor the love of a friend avails more for the accumulation of beatitude; but on account of difficulty and labor the love of an enemy avails more for the remission of sin regarding the penalty which we are bound to pay for sin. And the solution of almost all the Masters comes back to this. But it seems to me that Christ meant that it is simply better to love an enemy: because it is of a stronger charity above nature, and because it also presupposes loving a friend. For just as a fire is stronger which acts upon the near and the remote, than one which acts upon the near alone, so also the fire of charity is stronger toward what is distant from nature than toward what is near to nature. And therefore I concede the reasons introduced first.

To the first objection to the contrary, it must be said that Ambrose posits the order of charity, not according as charity is of a stronger power towards this or that, but according as it agrees with the nature which it perfects. And from this it does not follow that one is better than another: because merit is not attended according to how charity moves with nature, but rather according to how it moves according to the mode of grace alone.

To the next it must be said that that fervor receives only an accidental reward: because the comparison supposes the habits of both acts to be equal, because otherwise there would be no rationale. But I think that that which belongs to charity in a difficult matter can outweigh this accidental [reward].

To the next it must be said that this reason errs in multiple ways. In one way: because it is posited by the Philosopher according as he speaks of the diversity of the love of some fool, who loves an enemy insofar as he is an enemy, and not for the sake of God or directed to God: and that man deserves reproaches, and thus the authority is solved. But the Saints say

§ 1. ...love enemies, so that they might become friends to God, or towards God. In another way: because such a form of arguing is more attended to in a consequence to the contrary, than in a consequence in itself: and in reasoning, the process is according to the consequence in itself; and then it is taken [to mean] to hate friends, and to hate enemies. Consequently, it is inferred that since the antecedent is less eligible than the consequent, its opposite—namely, to love friends—would be more eligible than the opposite of the consequent, which is to love enemies. Thus, the greater opposite of the antecedent would follow from the opposite of the consequent according to what is more and less eligible. Thirdly, it fails [sins]: because given that the consequence were valid according to the eligible and non-eligible, it still would have no force in those things where positing one presupposes the other. And it is so here, because in charity and in holy men, to love enemies presupposes loving friends; therefore, it is invalid.

Articulus 4 — Whether There Is One And The Same Movement Toward Friend And Enemy

Whether there is one and the same motion towards a friend and an enemy?

§ 2. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, around the beginning: Whether there is one and the same motion towards a friend and an enemy, etc.

§ 3. For this seems impossible, that it be the same.

§ 4. 1. For it is impossible for one motion to be compared and terminated at two termini; but the two termini are the friend and the enemy: therefore, they cannot be one motion at the same time.

§ 5. 2. Also, a line on one part is not terminated at two points: therefore, neither is a motion towards two termini. If perhaps you say that one is as the terminus and the other as the end: this is ridiculous, because the love of an enemy is not referred to the love of a friend, or to the friend himself, as to an end, but rather to God.

§ 6. Solution. It seems to me that it must be said that this is false. Nevertheless, there are others who object to the contrary thus, that the sensible [power] is less potent than the intellectual; but by the sensible we apprehend many things at once, because one by sight, and another by hearing: or by sight two things sometimes as two, as when one of the eyes is displaced [pressed]: therefore, much more does this happen to the intellectual; moreover, the will belongs to the intellectual parts. Also they say that what the Philosopher says, We can indeed know many things, but understand very few , is not true, but probable: because the Philosopher introduced this as a probable example even in that science; for he introduces many examples in that book which are not entirely true. I, however, think this to be an error. For it is not similar to apprehend many things by multiple organs and multiple powers, and by one power composing as if by many. For I well concede all these things to this extent, that by one non-composing motion, but tending directly to the object, it can apprehend many things. For the visual power is not numerically one in each pupil, but in its principle it is one, namely in the conjunction of the optic nerve at the part of the common sense. Similarly, when it is said, I see the white son of Diares, or the white sweet thing , this will be an apprehension of the common sense composing and dividing. In such cases, many are not apprehended as many, but as many in one subject, which is a magnitude that is per se the object of the common sense. And it is the same in the composing intellect: because in it many things are apprehended in one act of composition. But it is not so in the simple intellect. And therefore Aristotle's statement is most true. However, granting that this could be on the part of the apprehensive power from within, not from without, we still will not grant that this is so in the affection, which brings nothing together: but rather it pursues or flees the intentions of good or evil elicited from the comprehension.

Articulus 5 — Whether All Are Bound To Love Their Enemies

Are all bound to love their enemies?

§ 7. Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, in the first part: Nor this by such a great multitude, etc.

§ 8. According to this, it seems that not all are bound to love their enemies, which is against what was previously determined.

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that it is understood of a love showing an effect through signs of familiarity: for to this, not all are bound.

Articulus 6 — Whether One Not Forgiving His Debtors Ought To Say, Our Father

Should one who does not forgive his debtors say the "Our Father"?

§ 10. Next, it is asked concerning what he says around the middle: If you forgive men, etc.

§ 11. Through this it seems that he who does not forgive ought not to say the Our Father: because he lies: but if he lies, he kills his own soul.

§ 12. But on the contrary: It is enjoined upon him to do whatever good he can, so that God may illuminate his heart: therefore, it is enjoined upon him to pray: therefore, he ought to say the Our Father, because that is the most preeminent of all prayers.

§ 13. Solution. We concede that he ought to say the Our Father. And that clause, And forgive us, etc., is either said by him and verified in the person of the Church; or, because he asks for future forgiveness, it is verified by him as present for the future, that is, just as we propose to forgive in the future, either in act or in habit.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Opinion Of Certain People, Who Say That The Precept To Love Every Man, Even An Enemy, Was Given Only To The Perfect, Savors Of Heresy

Is the opinion of some, who say that the precept of loving every man, even an enemy, is only given to the perfect, smacking of heresy?

§ 14. Next, it is asked concerning what he says, around the end of the Text: Some say that what is simply stated here, etc.

§ 15. For this seems contrary to the Gospel: therefore, it is heresy.

§ 16. Solution. I think that this opinion possesses heretical depravity, unless it is understood of the love of affection in signs of familiarity: because this is given to the imperfect only as a counsel, and is not a precept.

DISTINCTIO XXXI

Divisio Textus

§ 17. That also must not be passed over, which some assert, etc. Here begins that part in which he treats of charity in comparison to the one loving.

§ 18. And it has three parts: in the first of which he asks, Whether charity, once possessed, can be lost or not? In the second, he shows incidentally how the other theological virtues are on the part of charity, there, C, It must also be noted, how faith, etc. In the third and last, he touches upon the charity of Christ, there, D, Now it remains, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Charity Once Possessed Can Be Lost

Can charity, once possessed, happen to be lost?

Can charity, once possessed, happen to be lost?

§ 19. Now two questions fall around the intention of the first chapter: the first of which is, Whether charity, once possessed, happens to be lost? And in the second, In what degree does it rise again after charity is lost?

§ 20. To the first, one proceeds thus: 1. The rationale of charity is the same in man and in Angels; but in Angels, once possessed, it does not happen to be lost, according to the opinion of those who say the Angels were created without grace: therefore, neither in man does it happen that, once possessed, it is lost.

§ 21. 2. Also, a less strong thing does not cast out a more strong thing, but the least charity is stronger than every sin and every temptation: therefore, it is not cast out by any sin or any temptation.

§ 22. 3. Also, if it is cast out, the law of contraries must be preserved between it and sin, which Boethius posits in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ, namely, that no things mutually transmute one another unless they mutually act and suffer upon one another; but these are always proportioned in their powers: therefore, since there is no proportion of the power of charity to sin, it seems it cannot be transmuted by any sin.

§ 23. 4. Also, if it is expelled: it is expelled either by a sin that is, or by a sin that is not. If by a sin that is: either in the same [subject], or in another. If in another. To the contrary: The Philosopher says in book XVI of On Animals , that if it does not touch, it does not act, and no alteration follows. Therefore, it does not expel it from the subject. If in the same: therefore, contraries are simultaneously in the same thing, which cannot be.

§ 24. If you say that they are not in the same instant [nunc]: but in one instant charity departs, and in another sin is present. A twofold inconvenience follows from this: one of which is that one of the contraries yields to the other before it is touched by it, or before it acts upon it. The other is: let those two instants be designated, and let A be the one in which charity yields, and B the one in which sin is present. Since between any two instants there is time, in that time the soul is neither in charity nor in sin, which is absurd. Therefore, it is left that charity, once possessed, is not lost.

§ 25. 5. Also, the will of itself is indifferent: therefore, when by charity it is made actually good, it is therefore more prepared for good than for evil: therefore, it cannot be conquered by sin.

§ 26. 6. Also, every motion is according to the exigency of the dominant: the dominant is charity, because it can [prevail] over all things: therefore, it never sins.

§ 27. 7. Also, this seems to be said in (1 John 3:9), that he who is born of God, does not sin.

§ 28. 8. Also, Song of Songs 8:6-7: Love is strong as death, jealousy is hard as hell... Many waters could not extinguish charity, that is, many temptations.

§ 29. 9. Also, in Psalm 26:1: The Lord is my light. Gloss: If the gift is taken away, the giver is conquered; but it is certain that the giver cannot be conquered: therefore, neither can the gift be taken away.

§ 30. 10. Also, Chrysostom on John: Love is great, and more vehement than fire: and there is nothing which can sustain its proper impetus. Much less can sin sustain that impetus.

§ 31. 11. If perhaps you wish to say that God takes it away. To the contrary: To the Romans 11:29: Without repentance are the gifts and the calling of God. Therefore, it seems that He Himself does not take it away.

§ 32. 12. Also, 1 Sam. 16:13: The spirit of the Lord was directed into David from that day forward. However, it is certain that he often sinned mortally. Therefore, charity is not lost on account of mortal sin: therefore, it cannot be lost on account of anything.

§ 33. 13. Also, 1 John 4:16, on that verse: He who abides in charity, abides in God. Gloss: You may abide in God so that you are contained; God abides in you, so that He may contain you.

§ 34. 14. Also, it seems that since God the container is most powerful, he cannot fall: because through charity He inhabits him.

§ 35. 15. Also, upon that of Matthew 7:25: The rivers came, etc. Gloss: He who falls is not built upon Christ. But it is certain that he who has charity is built upon Christ: therefore, he does not fall.

§ 36. 16. Also, Augustine in the Enchiridion: If anyone in the time of temptation prefers to retain temporal things rather than Christ, he does not have Him in the foundation. But he who has charity, has Christ in the foundation: therefore, this one does not fall on account of temporal things.

§ 37. 17. Also, Bernard concerning Peter seems to mean that on account of his denial he did not lose the Holy Spirit or charity. Since therefore the denial of Christ is the greatest of all sins, on account of no other sin does it seem that charity can be lost.

§ 38. 18. Also, Bernard in the book On Loving God: Charity is never without fear, but chaste fear: never without desire, but ordered desire. Therefore, fear expels sin, and the desire for the incommutable good never gives place to the desire for a commutable good. Therefore, no sin will ever fall upon it: because every sin is either from an evilly humiliating fear, or from an evilly inflaming desire, as the Gloss says on that of Psalm 79:17: Set on fire and dug down, they shall perish at the rebuke of your countenance.

§ 39. 19. Also, 1 John 4:1: Many false, etc. Gloss: false prophets went out from us: They were never in us of the number of those having charity.

§ 40. 20. Also, the Philosopher maintains that the mutable and the immutable are not of the same rationale, nor of the same genus. But it is certain that the charity of the way [via], and the charity of the homeland [patria] are of the same rationale: therefore, since the charity of the homeland is immutable, the charity of the way will be immutable. The Master in the Text also introduces many things to this end.

§ 41. But to the contrary is that 1. The Apostle says, 1 Cor. 10:12, Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall: therefore, he who stands through charity can fall.

§ 42. 2. Also, Rev. 2:4: I have against you, that you have left your first charity. Therefore, it can be left behind. And because we see this happening continuously, let these suffice.

§ 43. Solution. It must be said that charity can be lost and recovered quite often in the way [i.e., in this life].

§ 44. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not similar: because an Angel, according to that opinion, simultaneously receives charity and confirmation, but man does not; but as regarding the act of making pleasing and of loving, it is similar.

§ 45. To the next, it must be said that sin does not conquer charity: but the will spontaneously casts it out, when it is deflected toward that with which it cannot coexist.

§ 47. To the next, it must be said that sin is a privation, and not some positing contrary.

§ 48. If perhaps it is said that this is an evasion and not a response: I say then that this is false, that two contraries can in no way be in the same thing simultaneously: but two contraries, such that both are in act, cannot be in the same thing; but when both are in potency, or one is in act and the other in potency, nothing prohibits them from being in the same thing. And so it is here: because charity in that instant is not simply present, but as corrupted and receding, and sin as in generation and approaching. And there is a counter-instance against the proposition in every physical action and passion.

§ 49. To the next, it must be said that the will, of itself indifferent, is habilitated by charity: but it is never so habilitated prior to confirmation that it cannot spontaneously lay aside charity and be deflected into sin. Whence nothing compels it.

§ 50. To the next, it must be said that this is true of a motion in which the mover acts through the intention of nature and not of the will.

§ 51. To the next, it must be said that this is understood of the predestined and of final sin. Or better let it be said that, as much as is in itself, the generation through charity preserves him: but he himself can destroy himself.

§ 52. And through this the solution to the following is also evident.

§ 53. To the next, it must be said that this would also be true if the gift succumbed from its own weakness: however, this is not true.

§ 54. To the next and the following, one must answer in the same way.

§ 55. To the next, it must be said that this is not understood with respect to the act of charity, but with respect to the act of governing the people and of prophecy, which is a freely given grace, and not a grace making pleasing.

§ 56. To the next and the following, it must be said that, as much as is in itself, it contains, but you can fall away from its containing power.

§ 57. To the next, it must be said that he who falls is not built up with respect to permanence, although perhaps he was built up with respect to the essence of charity, as the Master says in the Text.

§ 58. To the next, it must be said in the same way.

§ 59. To the next, it must be said that (as Bernard says) it is understood with respect to the proposition of having mercy, and not with respect to the act of separation from charity.

§ 60. To the next, it must be said that this is true as long as charity exists: but it can be cast out by its opposite, as was said before.

§ 61. To the next, it must be said in the same way.

§ 62. To the last, it must be said that this is true of substances that are immutable by nature. Forms, however, are not mutable through themselves, but through the subject. And therefore it does not hold concerning them.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is Necessary To Rise Again In A Lesser, Greater, Or Equal Measure

Is it always necessary to rise again in lesser, greater, or equal charity?

§ 63. Secondly, it is asked, Whether it is always necessary to rise again in lesser, or greater, or equal charity?

§ 64. However, it seems that it is in lesser: because 1. In all things it is so, that the first beginning of a being is not according to the perfection of that being, but in a lesser degree, but afterward it advances to the perfect: since therefore charity begins after sin, it seems that it begins according to an imperfect and minimal charity.

§ 65. 2. Also, Amos 5:1-2: The house of Israel has fallen, and it shall not add to rise again. The virgin of Israel is cast down upon her land, there is none to raise her up. There the Gloss: He does not deny that she can rise again, but denies that she can rise again a virgin: because once going astray, even if carried back on the shoulders of the shepherd, she will not have as much glory as one who never went astray. Therefore, it is impossible that one rises again in equal [charity].

§ 66. 3. Also, Ezek. 44:10, 13: The Levites who went far away from me... shall not draw near to me to serve me in the priesthood. Therefore, it seems that they will never become as near as before. Therefore, they will never have as much charity.

§ 67. 4. Also, this is seen from a similar case: because a woman going astray through fornication is afterward not loved by her husband as much as before; therefore neither does God love the soul as much: but His greater or lesser love is the greater or lesser effect of love; therefore she will never have as much charity.

§ 68. But to the contrary, it seems that 1. He will rise again in equal charity: because penance, as Ambrose says, restores all things taken away: therefore it also restores as much charity as was lost.

§ 69. 2. Also, Malachi 3:4: The sacrifice of Judah and Jerusalem will please the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in the ancient years.

§ 70. 3. Also, the Gloss in the same place: Just as they pleased in the beginning, so after sin, through penance, they began to please, all the filth of vices having been purged.

§ 71. 4. Also, Zech. 8:13, on that verse: I will save you, and you will be a blessing. Gloss: They shall return to their pristine state, when they have done penance.

§ 72. 5. Also, Lev. 6:25, on that verse: This is the law of the victim, the Gloss says: The virtue of the just and the worthy penance of sinners, which restores to the pristine degree, please God equally.

§ 73. 6. Also, Luke 15:22: Bring forth quickly the first robe. Gloss: He restored the son to his pristine dignity.

§ 74. From these things it follows that anyone rises again in equal charity.

§ 75. But it seems that it is in greater: because 1. The Apostle says, Romans 5:20: Where the offense abounded, grace has superabounded.

§ 76. 2. Also, Romans 8:28: For those who love God, all things work together for good. Gloss: Even the fall into sin.

§ 77. 3. Also, Gen. 1:5: There was evening and morning, one day. Gloss: The evening light is eminent, and from which one fell, but the morning is that in which one rose again: but the morning is greater than the evening; therefore one always rises again in greater charity.

§ 78. 4. Also, Baruch 4:28: As it was your mind to go astray from God, so turning back again you shall seek Him ten times as much. Therefore, it is necessary also that one rises again in much greater charity.

§ 79. Solution. The opinion here is that someone can rise again in lesser, in equal, and in greater charity, according as he devotedly prepares himself to receive it, and according as God deigns to infuse it: because we cannot prescribe the bounds of His generosity.

§ 80. And according to this, to the first it must be said that it is not similar concerning charity, and concerning those things which are caused by nature: because natural principles have the beginnings of their being in matter; and these at first are soft and weak, and afterward are strengthened: because all matter of a natural thing relates itself in four ways, as Rabbi Moses says in the Guide of the Perplexed , namely: otherwise when outside the terminating form, and otherwise when running toward it when it is already drawn by the formative power, and otherwise when formed, and otherwise when consolidated in perfect quantity. But God does not operate thus: therefore, it is not similar concerning charity.

§ 81. To the three following, it must be said that this is understood concerning the degree according to dignity, not according to immunity from fault or the quantity of charity: for one who has sinned will have a certain indignity which he will never wipe away, namely, that he cannot boast of innocence.

§ 82. To that which is objected against this, it must be said that all those six which are objected have one solution, namely, that it is understood with respect to the rectitude of immunity from fault, not necessarily of dignity, nor of the quantity of virtue.

§ 83. To those which are further objected, it must be said that the saying of the Apostle is understood that grace superabounded with respect to conquering the offense. And he understands it of the grace of redemption accomplished through Christ, which is greater in good than the offense of the first man was in evil.

§ 84. To the next, it must be said that the fall does not cooperate toward greater charity except occasionally and remotely, as was said, and noted in book I of the Sentences.

§ 85. To the last, it must be said that Baruch says this, that just as they provoked by sinning against ten, so now turning back they will seek ten times in precepts: not that it is necessary to rise again in ten times as great a charity.

Articulus 3 — What Is The Book Of Life

What is the book of life?

What is the book of life?

§ 86. Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, towards the end: The names of some Christ says are written in the book of life, etc.

§ 87. For on the occasion of this, that mention is made here of the book of life, four things can be asked here concerning it, namely: What is it? And, What is it to be written in it? And, Whether anything is written in it under a condition? And fourthly, Whether anyone who is written there can be deleted?

§ 88. To the first, one proceeds thus: 1. Augustine says that the Son of God is what the art of the omnipotent God the Father is, full of all rational plans (rationes). Therefore it seems that whatever is in God through exemplary rationes, this as a living ratio is in the Word; but to be in the book is this, namely, to be written through exemplary rationes. Therefore it seems that the Son of God is the book of life.

§ 89. 2. Also, John 1:3-4: What was made in Him, that is, in the Word, was life, and the life was the light, etc. Since therefore this is the book of life, that the things written there live, it seems that the Son is the book of life.

§ 90. 3. Also, Augustine in book XX of The City of God: The book of life is the prescience of God, in which all things are contained. But it is clear that knowledge by attribution belongs to the Son: therefore He Himself is the book of life.

§ 91. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. All things made and future and those which are, are written in the Word: but not all are in the book of life, because only the elect are: therefore the book of life is not the same as the Son of God, or prescience.

§ 92. 2. Also, it seems that by appropriation it rather belongs to the Holy Spirit that He be the book of life: because life is an act of goodness; and goodness is attributed to the Holy Spirit: therefore it belongs more to the Holy Spirit.

§ 93. 3. Also, life is the act of the Spirit, as the Lord Himself says, John 6:64: It is the Spirit that gives life: therefore this belongs more to the Holy Spirit than to the Son.

§ 94. Solution. It must be said that the book of life, according to Augustine, is prescience, according as prescience is taken for predestination preparing grace in the present, which it has by way of exemplar from eternity, and glory in the future. And this indeed is common to the three persons, but by attribution it specially belongs to the Son.

§ 95. To the first, therefore, it must be said that it is not the same to be the art, and to be the book of life: because the art indicates the order of the artifact to a happy life, although the rationes of the art live in the artisan; but the book of life signifies the order of that which is written in it, to the life of grace and glory.

§ 96. And through this the solution to the following is also evident: because in Him all things are called life; not that in themselves or from Him they have an order to the life of grace and glory, but because in the artisan their rationes live.

§ 97. To the following, the solution is evident through what was said in the beginning of the solution.

Articulus 4 — What It Is To Be Written In The Book Of Life

What is it to be written in the book of life?

§ 98. Secondly, it is asked, What is it to be written in the book of life?

§ 99. It seems that something is written there temporally, because 1. The Saints say that with respect to present justice Judas and many others were written there: but present justice is temporal: therefore something is written there temporally.

§ 100. 2. Also, if it is called the book of life because the things written there ordain to the life of grace and glory, since every justice and work of charity, whether of present justice or of predestination, ordains to life, it seems that every temporal good work is written there.

§ 101. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: To be written denotes the reception of a book: but God temporally receives nothing: therefore nothing is written there temporally.

§ 102. Solution. It must be said that predestination is taken according to a complete signification, and according to a diminished one. In its complete signification it implies the preparation of grace in the present, and of glory in the future: and thus only the predestined and the goods prepared for them are written there. According to its incomplete signification, grace in the present, of itself ordaining into glory, is called preparation, but not the preparation of glory: and thus all the just are written there, and their good works, because all the good works of the Saints, whether they finally remain Saints or not, God prepared from eternity, and they can only do them by His gift.

§ 103. To the first, therefore, it must be said that present justice is written there: not when it is done, but from eternity.

§ 104. Through this the solution to the following is evident.

Articulus 5 — Whether Something Is Written In The Book Of Life Under A Condition

Is anything written in the book of life under a condition?

§ 105. Thirdly, it is asked, Whether anything is written there under a condition?

§ 106. And it seems that it is so. 1. For it is certain that predestination does not infer the necessity of salvation, because thus our works would be nothing: therefore it seems that the possibility of damnation always remains: therefore he who is written, is written under a condition, [namely] if he perseveres.

§ 107. 2. Also, this is taken from Jeremiah 18:7 ff., where the Lord says that when He pronounces good to any nation, and that nation turns and does evil, He will not give the good pronounced, but the evil which they deserved: therefore the pronounced good which the Prophet read there, was not written there simply, but under a condition.

§ 108. 3. Also, Gregory says that the Lord there changes His sentence, but not His counsel: but it is certain that a sentence is not promulgated unless it is written in the prevision of God: therefore it seems that it was written under a condition, because otherwise it would be falsified.

§ 109. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: Every condition imports doubt: but in the First Truth there is nothing by way of doubt: therefore nothing is there by way of a condition. If perhaps you should say that the truth is immobile in order to its cause, although in itself it is mobile, as that Nineveh was to be subverted according to merits. This also is and always was and will be true, that Hezekiah was to die according to inferior causes: and in this way it is written there, and not simply. This is nothing: because thus God's ordination would depend on our work, which is impossible: and thus the eternal would in some way be caused by the temporal.

§ 110. Solution. It must be said that nothing is known there under a condition, but all things simply: just as predestination itself is a simple truth: but what is simply in God, cannot be said simply by us. Also, what is simply foreseen by God, is not explicated except according to succession in time. Whence pronouncements of this kind are concerning foreseen things insofar as they go forth [into time].

...they are ordered into a work, and thus they have an order, because punishment is against fault, and reward is unto merit. And in this way there are pre-announcements and sentences which God sometimes changes, as we have said elsewhere.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that there is not any condition there, but rather a reason of concomitance and of the term of the work of predestination or of the effect: for these concomitantly accompany each other according to the order of wisdom, namely, to do well and to be saved; and the effect of predestination is terminated at this, as well as to do ill and be damned.

To the next it must be said that Jeremiah speaks of predestination as to its effect in time, and not concerning eternal prevision: for the effect is indeed well caused by our work, although the prevision itself is not.

To the next it must be said that the sentence is called by Gregory the enunciation of the effect, and not of eternal predestination.

To that which is objected to the contrary, the solution is clear through what was said before.

Articulus 6 — Whether Someone Written In The Book Of Life Can Be Blotted Out

Whether someone written in the book of life can be erased?

Fourthly it is asked, whether anyone is erased who is written there?

It seems that they are: 1. Let them be erased from the book of the living, and not be written with the just.

1. Also: Either forgive them this trespass, or if you do not, erase me from your book which you have written.
2. Also, otherwise it would seem to posit a necessity for salvation: therefore virtue or salvation would no longer be voluntary in any way.

ON THE CONTRARY! 1. I will not erase his name from the book of life.

1. Also, the Gloss says: Let them be erased from the book of the living: This is not to be understood as though they are written and erased, but as to the hope of those who think themselves written there.

But then it is asked concerning Judas, who is said to be written there as to present justice, what this saying might be.

Solution. It must be said that no one written there is erased, nor is anything written there erased.

TO THE FIRST, therefore, it must be said that it is said, Let them be erased, with respect to the relation of present justice to a just person who falls from justice. For as long as he is just, the relation of the writing to him remains concerning the works eternally prepared for him. But when he falls, with no change made in the book, he now falls outside the relation of the order to his merits. How a relation is changed when one of the relatives is changed and the other remains immutable, has been sufficiently said according to my ability in the first book of the Sentences. This, therefore, is called being erased from the book.

To the next it must be said that Moses did not desire this: but he predicted the consequence of the fact. For if He had not forgiven the trespass, in some respect he would have fallen from the writing of the book, namely as to the accidental glory of their leadership, and the introduction into the promised land, and the bestowal of the law. And he does not speak of deletion from the book simply, nor as to the substantial reward.

Articulus 7 — Whether Faith Can Be Made Void

Can faith be evacuated?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, It must also be noted how faith, hope, and knowledge are said to be evacuated, etc.

And four things are asked: the first of which is concerning the evacuation of faith. Second, concerning the evacuation of hope. Third, is charity evacuated? And why not, if it is not evacuated? Fourth, concerning the evacuation of knowledge.

To the FIRST it is objected thus:

1. Faith is the foundation in the spiritual edifice: but if the foundation is evacuated, the whole edifice collapses: therefore if faith is evacuated, all graces and virtues and hoped-for things collapse into nothing, which would be a great incongruity.
2. Also, a greater light does not obscure a lesser light, but perfects it: but face-to-face vision succeeds faith: therefore it does not evacuate it, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY! It was proven above very often that faith is of the non-apparent: but in the homeland nothing is non-apparent: therefore there will be no faith there.

Solution. It must be said that in faith there are two things on the part of that by which it is cognition. And a third is that which is an affection. One thing in cognition is a kind of vision. For faith is a certain vision of divine truth: and it is called by some the primary substance of faith, because around specifying that, all forms and differences are posited, which constitute faith in the species of a virtue. But the second is the form informing this cognition or vision to the species of faith. This, moreover, is the mirror and enigma of the non-apparent. And with these removed, there is no faith. Yet there can be a vision of the face, or of another knowledge. The third is an affection, which assents not on account of anything except on account of the first truth absolutely: because if it had a reason, it would not believe on account of it. It can therefore be said that faith is evacuated as to the second, which is the form, and the mode of vision: but not as to the first and last: but rather those remain and are perfected. And thus vision, which is the total reward, succeeds faith: because it is the vision feeding upon what is loved and possessed.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that faith is substance here: and by reason of that which is vision, it is substance: and this does not collapse there. And therefore the edifice remains entire; because that which is distant, and in a mirror and in an enigma, cannot be the ratio of a foundation, since it is of an imperfection, which is not fitting for the glorified.

To the next it must be said that this is true of lights which are not ordered to one another as imperfect and perfect: but it is not thus here. For the imperfect yields to the perfect in all things, just as privation yields to form in nature.

Articulus 8 — Whether Hope Can Be Made Void

Can hope be evacuated?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the evacuation of hope.

For it seems that nothing succeeds hope, and thus it seems to be totally destroyed, and not evacuated.

1. For the Gloss says that beatitude succeeds hope: and this cannot be, since it succeeds all the virtues.
2. Also, Augustine says that vision succeeds faith, which is the total reward: therefore nothing is left that succeeds hope.
3. Also, every change happens according to some common subject: but in hope there is nothing but the expectation of the future, and protension into it: but none of these remains, because neither expectation remains, nor protension into something not possessed; therefore it seems to be totally destroyed: because even faith would be totally destroyed, if no common subject to the mirror and the face or presence remained, as we said, that the vision remains.

ALSO it is asked, Why are these virtues evacuated, since this is not said of the cardinal virtues, that they are evacuated? For what is ordered toward that which is toward the end ought rather to be evacuated than what is toward that which is unto the end immediately: but the cardinal virtues have their acts in that which is toward the end, and the theological virtues in the end immediately: therefore the cardinal virtues ought rather to be evacuated than the theological ones.

Solution. It must be said that hope and the habit of hope and its act are evacuated, but it is not totally destroyed. And to this it must be noted that in the transit of grace to glory, four things must be observed. For some remain in act and habit substantially and formally, but they are changed as to the mode which they have not from themselves, but from the fact that they are in such a state of their subject: and thus charity is changed and transits in the transit into glory, as will be clear below. But some remain in habit substantially and formally, but not in act, like the cardinal virtues, as will be shown below after the whole tract on charity. But some remain according to substance and not as to form and act, like faith. But some neither as to substance, nor as to form, nor as to act, but remain only in a communion of proportion, like hope. In a fifth way is that which is not a virtue, like knowledge of the way, which will be totally destroyed, in my judgment. And this will be disputed later.

But as to how this which has been said of hope can be understood, it must be noted that the habit of hope has an expectation of glory and a protension: and expectation shows, as it were, that which is, and protension shows that which is the formal element of hope, by which it is distinguished from others to which expecting belongs: and both of these are removed. But because every hoping person, according to what he hopes, is proportioned to the hoped-for thing, therefore that proportion remains when he attains the hoped-for thing: and thus I understand the saying of certain Doctors, who say that in the transit of hope into glory, nothing remains but what is common according to proportion.

To the first it must be said, as we said above concerning hope, that beatitude is taken materially for all the goods remaining in it, and thus it succeeds all the virtues: and it is taken according to a property conjoined to itself, which is great, or high, and glorious, and in this way it succeeds hope.

To the next it must be said that vision is the total reward: yet not every vision, but that which is of what is loved and possessed: and then the seen, insofar as it is seen, succeeds faith, and the possessed succeeds hope, and the loved corresponds to charity.

To the next it must be said that what is common by proportion remains there, as has been said.

To the next it must be said that these are evacuated: because that which is material to them, unformed and formed, is imperfect, and not competent to the state of beatitude. But it is not thus with the cardinal virtues: because although their act is ordered to the way, nevertheless their habit can be common to the way and the homeland, as will be clear below.

But IT IS STILL objected because it seems there is hope even in fruition.

1. For it is said: They who eat me will still hunger, and they who drink me will still thirst. But one hungering and thirsting expects something in the future. Therefore there is hope with respect to that, since this is concerning the substantial reward by which they enjoy.

2. Also, Anselm in the Proslogion: If they love God with their whole heart, their whole mind, their whole soul, such that nevertheless the whole heart, whole mind, and whole soul do not suffice for the dignity of the love: surely they will so rejoice with their whole heart, whole mind, and whole soul, that the whole heart, whole mind, and whole soul will not suffice for the fullness of the joy. Therefore it seems that there is a vicissitude of joy there, and that joy is continually in a state of becoming: therefore something of it is expected in the future. But this is against Augustine in Book XII of the Confessions, where he wills that that contemplation makes the blessed participators in eternity, and elevates them above all mutability.
3. Also, the Philosopher in the Ethics says that change is not delightful except on account of a bad condition: and if anyone's nature were entirely simple, the same operation would always be most delightful to him.

And to this it must be said that I think, without prejudice to others, that there is no hope there, nor change, but rather what is perfect. Nor do I say that there is a future there properly speaking: for although they continually participate in the goodnesses of God according to multiple ratios, nevertheless those are in one uncreated thing, which they always have: and therefore there is no transit there, but delight in him.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that that hunger removes satiety [fastidium], and it does not have a future properly speaking, because if they participate in something whence they are called new, as Dionysius seems to say, nevertheless this is not according to a mode of succession, but rather a recession from succession into a simple one which is beatifying through its essence.

To the next it must be said that Anselm does not intend to posit motion or change, but the immensity of the beatifying good. However, certain ones say that that is measured by the aevum, and that it has a before and an after. But I do not understand this, how something might have a before and an after through the fact that it is made immutable: nor can I understand how something might have a before and an after which is not time.

Articulus 9 — Whether Charity Is To Be Done Away With

Is charity to be evacuated?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether charity is to be evacuated?

Now it seems that it is: because 1. It was held above that faith, hope, and charity are equal: therefore it seems that one follows upon another: therefore if one is evacuated, so is the other: but the first two are evacuated: therefore also the third.

1. Also, Augustine says in Book VIII On the Trinity that nothing is loved unless known: therefore love is founded through cognition: but knowledge will be evacuated: therefore also charity.
2. Also, faith and hope generate charity, as the Gloss on the beginning of Matthew says: but faith and hope are evacuated: therefore also charity.

3. Also, what is for attaining some end, once the end is possessed, is no longer necessary: but charity is for attaining the end of beatitude: therefore once that is possessed, it will not be necessary: it is established that nature does not abound in superfluities: therefore much less does grace: therefore there will then be no charity, because it would be superfluous.
4. Also, if faith will be destroyed for this reason, because it sees in a mirror: therefore by the same reason charity ought to be destroyed, because it loves in a mirror: for it is not conjoined, but rather sojourns, as long as it remains in the body.
5. Also, in the Letter we have that it is imperfect: but all imperfection will be destroyed in the homeland: therefore charity will also be evacuated.

But against this is what the Apostle says, that charity never falls away. Therefore it will never be destroyed, neither totally nor partially.

Solution. It must be said that charity never falls away, but remains the same in number and species in the way and in the homeland. The Master nevertheless says in the Letter that it is increased and perfected: and I do not understand this according to the substance of charity, but as to the mode which it receives from the subject, namely because now by a subject which is subjected to concupiscence, it is drawn back lest it be able to fulfill its proper impetus: and that mode of imperfection will be removed, and as to this it is said to be increased. But in act, now it desires an absent beloved, but then it loves a present one, and penetrates its intimacies by tasting. For on account of this it is attributed to it by blessed Dionysius to be acute and mobile and super-fervid: because by the acumen of affection it penetrates the beloved, and is moved into it, and super-fervents it according to whatever ratio of divine sweetness. And these things are taken from fire; because in fire (as certain Philosophers have said) there is a composition of acute angles, by which fire is penetrative of the combustible, and is motive into it through the nature of heat, and super-fervents every part by igniting it.

To the FIRST, therefore, it must be said that it does not follow: because they are not equal except for the reason that they concur together for every merit: but they are not equal in substantial perfection ordered to glory.

To the next it must be said that nothing loves unless it is known in some way: but although the knowledge which is through the mode of the way is destroyed in the homeland, nevertheless cognition will not be destroyed, but will be most perfect: and therefore most perfect love: for charity is not founded upon knowledge according as it is of the way, but rather absolutely according as it is of the beloved in general.

To the next it must be said that faith and hope do not generate charity except according to the mode of the way. Or let it be said, and better, that vision on the part of that by which it is a certain vision of the beloved, generates charity: and hope on the part of that by which it is proportioned to the beloved to be possessed. And according to this, faith and hope remain in the homeland, as was said before: and therefore charity will not be destroyed.

To the next it must be said that that proposition is absolutely false, unless it be understood thus, that it is toward that end through the mode of inquiry and the way. But if it has the ratio of a conjunction and a bond or of holding the end, it is false: for if it seeks, it seeks only so that it may be conjoined and hold.

To the next it must be said that faith essentially from its specific form is in a mirror and an enigma: but charity accidentally, and more essentially, is of a present beloved.

To the next it must be said that that imperfection is not in the substance of charity, but rather in the subject, as has been said.

Articulus 10 — Whether Knowledge Will Be Done Away With In The Fatherland

Will knowledge be evacuated in the homeland?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the evacuation of knowledge.

For it seems that it will be evacuated: because 1. The Apostle says: We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect has come, that which is in part shall be evacuated.

1. Also, the Gloss in the same place says that knowledge will be destroyed. And the text there says this: Whether tongues shall cease, or knowledge shall be destroyed.
2. This is also proved by reason: because all our knowledge is caused by the cognition of sensibles, and is abstracted from them: but such a known thing does not have the ratio of glory: therefore it seems that that habit will be destroyed.

But ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Certainty is a condition of knowledge: but there a greater certainty of vision and intellection will be possessed than here: therefore a greater knowledge: therefore it will not be destroyed, but will be perfected.

1. Also, knowledge is a part of beatitude, because otherwise beatitude would not be a state perfect by the aggregation of all goods: therefore it seems that it ought not to be destroyed.
2. Also, even the Philosophers and the Master in Book II of the Sentences commonly say that the soul was placed in the body so that it might be perfected in it by sciences and virtues. Therefore, since it receives the perfection of knowledge in the body, that perfection ought not to be destroyed after death, because otherwise the entire order of its life would be in vain.
3. Also, if knowledge is destroyed, then we labor in vain all day from early youth by studying, and by laboring for the sake of the slight light of a corruptible life.

Solution. There are two opinions here. For some say that knowledge will be destroyed as to the mode of learning and inquiring, but not as to the substance of the habit.

But it is objected to them, that according to this, a cleric educated in philosophical and theological matters, having lesser charity, would, as to something—because as to knowledge —have a greater beatitude than an old woman of greater charity. Or if not: then knowledge will be destroyed. Also, the habit of knowable things seems to remain uselessly, since we will then cognize through another mode, namely in the Word. To this they say that such things remain for the sake of beauty and for the cognition of things through another mode than through the Word. I think it is better that one agree with the Master saying here in the Letter that it will be entirely destroyed: because after death, whether we have been good or evil, we will necessarily have another mode of cognizing things in their proper nature, which the demons and Angels have from creation. And I think that it will then be given to us through species, namely those which are similitudes of the universal order of the causes of the world: which mode is more noble than this one. Moreover, the Blessed will also see in the Word: and therefore I consent to this, that the knowledge which is through acquisition will be entirely destroyed. For I do not see rationally, if we posit that there will be knowledge then as there is now, how one of two incongruities would not follow: namely, that either it will be superfluous, or we will have that which is given to the Angels by the Creator, or we will be ignorant of many things by nature, and it will be necessary to study and learn there; and we will fall short of the power of the knowledge of the Angels: both of which I repute to be absurd.

It must therefore be said to the first, that that certainty is not of the same ratio as this one, but of another: because that one will be either in the Word in which all things are present, or according to a deiform intellect which receives nothing from the thing, but rather receives the similitudes of all the causes of the thing from God, who is the principle of universal being.

To the next it must be said that this mode of knowing is not a part of beatitude, but of misery. Nor did Adam have it, but rather he knew all things through the nature of his first condition: and therefore he called all things by their proper names, each one according to the congruence of its nature.

To the next it must be said that that position in the body is for the sake of the merit of a better state: but merit is assisted by sciences and virtues: and therefore this is said.

To the next it must be said that we do not labor in vain: because from this we merit much and we defend our faith against the error of uprising infidels.

To that which is objected afterward, I well think that one having greater charity attains more of knowledge in the Word: but the knowledge which is through the mode of the natural perfection of an Angel, I think will be greater and lesser: just as also in the Angels according to the subtlety of their essence, and the perspicacity of their intelligence.

Articulus 11 — Whether Christ As Man Observed The Prescribed Order According To The Master

Did Christ, according as He is man, keep the prescribed order according to the Master?

Next it is asked concerning what he says in the last chapter, D, there: Now it remains to investigate, if Christ, according as He is man, kept the prescribed order of loving, etc.

Now it seems that Christ kept the prescribed order: because 1. Otherwise not all things would have been in the best order in him, if the order of charity had been lacking to him, as it seems.

1. Also, if it be granted that he did not have this order, this is said only by reason of the love of enemies: but I prove that he loved enemies, because he willed every man to be saved, who offered himself for all.
2. Also, Your commandment is exceedingly broad: and this even in us miserable ones extends even to enemies: therefore much more in Christ.
3. Also, He himself bore the sins of many, and prayed for the transgressors. Therefore it seems that he loved them.
4. Also, the Angels also serve the damned: therefore, since Christ was more perfect than all the Angels, therefore he loved the damned, as it seems.

BUT IF this is conceded, to the contrary is what the Master objects in the Letter:

1. For he does not love his neighbor who does not love him unto that unto which he loves himself, that is, unto salvation: but thus the foreknown, whom Christ himself knew, could not be loved.
2. Also, Augustine says in Book XXI of the City of God, that if the Church were certain concerning some people that they were foreknown to eternal fire, it would not pray for them any more than for the devil. But Christ was certain. Therefore he did not love them.
3. Also, the Master objects in the Letter, that if he loved them, then he willed them to be saved, and desired salvation for them: and this was not done; therefore he did not do whatever he willed: and what he prayed for did not come to pass, one of which is against the Prophet saying: He has done all things whatsoever he willed. The other against the Apostle, saying that in all things he was heard for his reverence.

Solution. It must be said that Christ loved all with an antecedent love, but not with a consequent one. Now antecedent love is that which is in him in no way depending upon us. But consequent love is that which is from our work. Now that he loved all is gathered from this, that to all he offered the gifts of his graces and of redemption, and extended his hand: but some do not accept grace from him. But what the Master says in the Letter, this is true of consequent love or foreknowledge, which as a concomitant has our merit as to the effect of foreknowledge, although not as to eternal prevision.

And through this the solution to almost the whole is clear.

For it must be said to those things which are first objected, that all those show nothing but a love as much as is in him. And this is antecedent love, which relies upon nothing but his goodness. But those things which are to the contrary, are all concerning the love which concerns our merit in some way, either as accompanying the effect of foreknowledge, or temporally respecting a bad merit.

Articulus 12 — Whether In The Fatherland There Will Be An Order Of Charity Among The Blessed

Will there be an order of charity among the blessed in the homeland?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, D, around the middle: And that he fulfilled the order of loving, which is kept in the homeland, not in the way, etc.

For by reason of this it is asked concerning the order of love in the homeland.

For it seems that it is according to the ratio of goodnesses, because

1. In the homeland there will be full conformity with the will of God: but God loves the greater good more: therefore so do we.
2. Also, Anselm says a little before the end of the Proslogion, that anyone rejoices more concerning the good of a better person in the homeland, than concerning his own. But this cannot be, unless that order which is now does not remain.
3. Also, Augustine says that in unequal clarity there will be equal joy: and this cannot be, unless the joy of all and singular is one: and this further (as Anselm says) will not be unless I rejoice more concerning the good of one better than me, than concerning my own, so that his joy becomes mine.
4. Also, the Lord answered the Sadducees when they inquired about the conjugal bond if it would be in the homeland: You err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they shall neither marry nor be given in marriage: but they shall be like the Angels of God in heaven.[279] Therefore the conditions of carnal degree will cease there, as it seems. Therefore the order of charity will not remain with respect to them.
5. Also, Between us and you a great chaos is established.[280] There Gregory says that blessed sons can by no means feel compassion for parents placed in hell: therefore neither can they love them: therefore the order will cease.

BUT AGAINST this is, that 1. Such an order will be in the homeland as there was in Christ: but Christ loved one more than another from another cause than from a greater grace, because Augustine says on John 19:26, upon that word: When Jesus had seen… the disciple standing whom he loved.[281] that he loved John more: and yet he was loved more by Peter: therefore it seems that order by reason of consanguinity and familiarity will remain.

1. Also, grace does not destroy nature, but elevates it: since therefore this is natural, it seems that it remains in the homeland.

2. Also, according to this it would not be necessary to labor much that we might be better than a swineherd: because for anyone made better, I will rejoice as much concerning his good as he himself.

FURTHER it is asked, If the order remains as to our body: such that, namely, we will love the good of the neighbor's soul more there, than the good of our own body?

It seems that we will: because 1. One estimating well prefers a spiritual good to a corporeal good: but the good of the neighbor's soul is spiritual, while the good of our body is corporeal.

1. Also, the soul of our neighbor enjoys with us: which our body does not do: therefore the good of the neighbor's soul is to be preferred.

BUT AGAINST this seems to be, that 1. Our body will then have a perpetual and proper good, which seems to move more than the good of another.

1. Also, without the glory of the body there is no perfect glory of the soul: but we ought to love the perfection of our own soul more than that of another: therefore we ought to love the good of our body more than the good of another's soul.

Solution. It must be said that, as I think, charity among the blessed will have an order: such, nevertheless, that the degree of propinquity follows the impetus of charity, and is a ratio of joy accidentally: because essentially charity rather follows the charity of God. Whence if one rejoices more concerning the good of someone who is conjoined to him by blood, this will be an accidental reward, not a substantial one.

It must therefore be said to the first, that God wills us to will the good of one more conjoined to us in some ratio more than one less conjoined.

To the next it must be said that Anselm speaks of the mode of accidental joy, not of substantial and intrinsic joy. Or let it be said that I will rejoice more concerning a better alien good, in such a way that the word more does not signify the intensity of joy as to the affection of joy, but signifies the ratio of quantity in the object of joy: because in a better person more good is presented to me rejoicing, than in myself, but nevertheless I will not be as much affected, as I think.

To the next it must be said that I understand that thus, equal joy in unequal clarity, that is, concerning what is equal, because one will rejoice concerning the same thing and concerning as many things as the other.

To the next it must be said that the degree is removed which served the state of the way, such as to give birth, and to procreate, and the like: but not as to the affection for the good.

To the next it must be said that it is otherwise for those who are in hell, because they are added to the hostile party: and therefore nature before charity then hastening into the justice of God (as Bernard says) detests them.

279. Matt. 22:29-30.

TO THAT which is asked further, Whether Christ without cause loves one more than another? It must be said that he does not: for Peter and John were unequally conjoined to him by blood: and I well think that they were equally loved in different things, and equally loved in different things. For Augustine says that Peter loved more: and I understand this to mean that he loved God more in the neighbor, and therefore received the divine care over the neighbor in the commission of the sheep. He also says that John loved more, upon that: The two ran together.[282] Thus, He who loved more, ran more strongly, and arrived more quickly. It is established, moreover, that he was John: and this I understand as to the love of God in himself, not in his members: just as contemplatives love God more in himself, as John: and actives more in the neighbor, as Peter: and Christ's greater or lesser love is attended according to the greater or lesser effect of grace. But he received the greater in contemplation, who reclined upon his breast: and Peter the greater in the active life, because he received the pastoral care of the Church after the threefold inquiry and threefold confession of love. If, nevertheless, we wish to collect the sayings of the three Saints: then we would say according to Bernard, that Peter loved more fervently, and was loved more strongly: but John loved more sweetly, and was loved more familiarly: according to Jerome, on account of the privilege of chastity: according to Augustine, on account of the privilege of a special love: according to Chrysostom, on account of a gentleness innate to him.

To that which is further inquired, Whether we will love our body more there than the soul of our neighbor? Some say, no: because there a different agreement is reformed than here: because here we place for the neighbor, in that we are to regain in the resurrection, and because it is only corruptible: but there it is not so: and therefore it can be loved more. I, to confess the truth, do not know what is more true about this, yet it seems more probable that the good of the soul of the neighbor outweighs in love.

And then to that which is contrary, it must be said that although it is perpetual, yet it is inferior in the estimation of good.

To another it must be said, that the beatitude of the soul does not depend on the body, but rather the contrary. But it is true, that not fully, as now a man would be blessed: and this does not contradict: because it is more opposed to it in another than it would lose in that, if it were possible to be lost.

DISTINCTIO XXXII

Divisio Textus

Having set forth the premises, it is to be added concerning the love of God, etc. In this last part, the Master discusses the love of God in comparison to us.

And concerning this, he determines two things, the first of which is whether it is the immutable divine essence. The second, resulting from this, is namely how God is said to love one more and another less according to it. And this begins there, "But when the love of God," etc.

We will inquire for easier understanding concerning the first in four ways, the first of which is whether it is true what the Master says, that charity is the divine essence. The second, why this is more fitting to charity than to faith or hope. The third, why the Apostle attributes to charity the works of other virtues, and not to faith or hope. The fourth will be whether the love of God admits of more and less, about which the Master inquires in the second part of that lesson.

Articulus 1 — Whether It Is True What The Master Says, That Charity Is The Divine Essence

Whether it is true what the Master says, that charity is the divine essence?

To the first, it is objected thus:

1. Whatever things are entirely the same, whatever agrees with one of them by substance, agrees also with the other: charity and the divine essence are the same, as the Master says, and we speak of the charity by which He loves us: therefore, whatever agrees with charity, agrees with essence: but charity substantially ordains to the act of loving - therefore essence ordains to the act of loving: therefore God loves us by His essence, in such a way that "by His essence" is construed formally with the verb, which is false: therefore charity and the divine essence are not the same.

1. Likewise, Nothing is loved unless known: nothing is known unless true: therefore nothing is loved unless true: but each thing is related to being as it is related to truth, as the Philosopher says: therefore nothing is true, unless it is in truth in its mode of existing, as the complex exists as complex, and the simple as simple. Further, We did not have being from eternity: therefore neither truth: therefore neither could He love us from eternity: therefore neither is the love by which He loved us eternal: but the divine essence is eternal: therefore love is not essence.
2. Likewise, When it is said, Creator God, the word denotes an effect in the creature: and creation is not posited in God on account of this, but rather concerning the thing which is made: therefore similarly, when it is said, God loves us, an effect is denoted, and nothing is posited in God by loving.
3. Furthermore, Either love connotes affection, or effect: because it cannot be considered in multiple ways. Not affection: because thus God would be passible by affections, which is absurd: therefore it denotes effect: therefore it does not denote the divine essence.
4. Likewise, Hugh of St. Victor:

   The power of love is recognized, that it transfers the lover into the beloved. Therefore

281. John 19:26.

love requires the beloved to exist: but we were not from eternity: therefore He did not love from eternity: therefore love is not essence: because the essence of God is eternal.

5. Likewise, This is taken from Augustine who says, that charity is nothing other than the bond of the lover and the beloved.

6. But on the contrary, it is held in the first book of the Sentences, where many authorities are introduced, that He loved from eternity. That charity is the divine essence is held in the first book of the Sentences.

7. Likewise, Whatever is in God, God is: charity is in God: therefore charity is God. The first is evident from the suppositions in the first book of the Sentences. The second is evident from this, that if charity were lacking to Him, since it is the best good, and since it makes all good things delightful, He could not be the best, nor God.

Solution: It must be said, that there is no doubt that charity is in God, and is God, and the divine substance.

To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that that argument does not hold in divine matters because of the attributes, which in divine matters vary the mode of signifying and not the thing. And this is also true according to the Philosophers, as is evident: because they prove, that their will and their action and their substance are the same as being, and yet according to the Philosophers not whatever agrees with one, agrees with the other.

To the other, it must be said, that we are known from eternity, and we had the truth of causes from eternity in ideal reasons, although not in the being of nature properly: and this suffices for love and proper knowledge, as is proven in the first book of the Sentences.

To the other, it must be said, that it is not similar: because creation, when it is the thing of this word, creates, it denotes something new: and therefore formally it is not to be made except in the creature as in subject and matter, but efficiently it is in God: but charity denotes the most perfect thing in the notion of good, and therefore it agrees with God to whom every good and best thing is to be attributed: and therefore it not only denotes effect, but also the divine essence, under another mode of signifying.

To the other, it must be said, that it does not denote effect but the divine essence, as the principle of the act of loving, because habit and affection and such things do not fall in God due to the highest simplicity.

To the other, it must be said, that charity always joins, but it is not necessary that the joined are in one mode, but God is simply: man, however, in the notion of the word from which all proceed to origin.

By this the solution to the following is evident.

Articulus 2 — Why Charity Is More The Divine Essence Than Faith And Hope

Why is charity more the divine essence than faith and hope?

282. John 20:4.

Secondly, it is asked, Why does this more pertain to charity than to another?

And it is said by all: that this is the reason: because

1. It is the most perfect virtue and the form of virtues, which will never fail: and therefore it is principally in God, but in us by imitation.
2. But against this is what the Apostle says, to the Galatians 5:6: Faith works through charity. Therefore, as it seems, charity is the efficient cause of the works of other virtues, and not the form.
3. Likewise, on that: "The just shall live by his faith," the Gloss says: Charity is the form of virtues, without which faith is unformed.
4. Likewise, the Apostle, to Timothy 1:5: The end of the commandment is charity. Therefore it is the end.

Therefore, on account of these four reasons, why is charity essentially in God and not faith? And, why is it called efficient and mother and root? And, why is it the form, and why the end?

And because much has been disputed about this above, it is sufficient to touch upon it here.

Solution: It must be said that charity is an exemplary virtue in God: and this happens to it because of its perfection, namely because it has the most perfect act which will never fail: and because its object is the highest goodness, which is desired by all: and because again it is the greatest good among spiritual goods: which is evident from this, because it divides between the children of the kingdom and of perdition.

To another it can be said that charity is efficient, like the universal heat of organs: as the Philosopher says, each sense has its act and object, which it does not share with another, and all senses have one thing hindering them from act, like the cold descending from the brain, and closing the senses: so also they have something moving them to act, which is the heat expanded outwardly in wakefulness with the animal spirit to the organs of the senses in wakefulness. Hence also a certain Philosopher says that wakefulness is caused by the expansion of heat and spirit outwardly.

In this way we can say that charity is said to be efficient and moving in virtues: which nevertheless takes away from no virtue its proper object and proper act, just as neither does natural heat from the sense. And that this is true seems from what is said: The charity of God is poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. For the Spirit moves all things. And charity seems to be like the instrument of its motion.

Through this also that it is the heat of the will related generally to all that is good: just as also in the animated body we posit the spirit to cause motion and sense, and that heat is its instrument through which it acts. And through this the reason for the first question is clear.

280. Luke 16:26.

How it is mother and root has been said above. And through this the solution to the second question is clear.

Charity, however, can be called the form, according to which it is the love of good simply, so that it is said simply that no difference is contracted and specified. For that will be preserved in every good contracted and specified by a special reason, as blessed Augustine seems to say: This good, that good: take away this and that, and you will see the good of every good. The good willed in faith is a certain good having something of the simply good and arduous in hope. And similarly the beautiful in temperance, and the strong in fortitude, and the just in justice, and the desirable for work in prudence. But each of these adds something to the good. Charity, however, is of the good absolutely and simply, which is the first good. Since therefore this as a certain reason of every good is preserved in all contracted goods, it will be the form to which all goods strive as much as they can, and from which they have the reason of good, because if it is not good through itself, no particular and contracted good will be. According to this mode, therefore, the love of good through itself is in every virtue, as the reason of the good which that virtue desires, and thus it is the form not giving being simply, but a certain reason from which and under which is taken the reason of the good which the particular virtue desires to acquire through its proper act: and thus again it does not exclude the form giving being, although it is a certain reason of it: just as that which is through itself is the reason of that which receives from it: hence it imitates it in something according to possibility, and not simply: and in this way I say it is the form of virtues. And through this the reason for the third question is clear.

The end, however, is said almost in the same way: because also form and end differ little: yet there is some difference. For the Philosopher says that every operation and choice seems to be the worker of some good: and therefore defining the good he says, that the good is what all things desire or seek or wish for. Let us therefore consider two things, a certain good as true or arduous or beautiful which is the terminus of the act of this or that virtue, and having which it ceases from motion. And let us ask, Whether it desires to acquire that through act because it is this good, or because it is good simply? If because it is this good: then it is necessary that the reason of this good is the cause of desire generally in all desiring good, which is evidently false: therefore that which moves the efficient virtue or whatever else, will be good: and this Boethius proves at length in the book of the Consolation of Philosophy: therefore the good loved simply and the love of good move the efficient: but that which moves the efficient is the end. Therefore the good loved simply, and not this or that, is simply the end. Charity therefore not on the part of the lover, but on the part of the good loved simply, is the end of the commandment and of every good work. This, however, I wished to place here: because it gives a certain more intelligible vision than what is determined above.

And from this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Why The Apostle Attributes To Charity The Works Of The Other Virtues

Why does the Apostle attribute to charity the works of other virtues?

Thirdly, it is asked, Why does the Apostle attribute to charity the works of other virtues? For justice is a general virtue, as the Saints say: therefore it seems that such works belong more to justice than to charity.

Furthermore, it is asked, By what are they received?

Solution: It must be said that in truth, as was said before, charity is a certain likeness of divine goodness in us, and a heat moving all things, like the heat of the sun: and therefore, in my judgment, not only those works but all works can be attributed to it. However, justice is not a general mover, but a general virtue, and a general state of virtue. For the Philosopher says that general justice is the same as virtue: and this I understand, that is, the same as a certain state generally containing virtue: and this state is the right order of man or of the soul: in the substance of the soul and in the powers towards itself and towards the neighbor and towards God: and therefore, since it is not ordering into act as a general mover, the works of other virtues cannot be attributed to it.

To the other it must be said that those works are either from evil, or are ordering the diligent one into good. If into good: either into the good which is the end, or into the good which is towards the end. If into the end: either with respect to the good, or with respect to the manner of behaving towards both in the state of merit. If with respect to the true: then it believes all things. If with respect to the good: then it hopes all things which it believes. If with respect to the manner of behaving towards both in the state of merit in which promises are deferred: then it endures all things delayed and promised. But if with respect to that which is the end: then either this is with respect to the good existing in itself, or with respect to that which is in the neighbor, or in both ways, or with respect to what is possessed, or with respect to what is not possessed. If with respect to what is possessed in itself: then it is not puffed up in itself about the good received. But if with respect to what is not possessed which it does not receive: then it is not ambitious, because it does not seek those things which are above itself, which God does not wish to give. But if with respect to what is possessed in the neighbor, either according to the order in the true, or according to the order in the good. If according to the order in the true: then it rejoices with the truth. But if according to the order in the good: then it does not envy. But if it is with respect to possessing what is not possessed by the neighbor: then it does not hinder, because it does not seek what is its own, but rather what is of others. But if according to the order from evil from which it turns away, either from the evil of punishment, or from the evil of fault. If from the evil of fault, either it is born to be within, or outside. If it is born to be within, either it is born to be within according to the rational, and thus it does not think evil: or according to the concupiscible, and thus it does not rejoice over iniquity: or according to the irascible, and thus it is not provoked. But if it is born to be outside, thus it does not act wrongly. But if it is from the evil of punishment: either that evil is in another, and thus it is kind in the punishments of others as if melted by goodness flowing to the aid of the afflicted: or it is in itself, and then either it is contracted, and then it suffers it, that is, it bears it for the love of justice flowing: or it is inflicted by another, and thus it is patient of injuries inflicted upon itself.

And from this the solution of the question is clear: and this is also one reason why this is the most divine virtue.

Articulus 4 — Whether God's Love Admits Of More And Less, And, Whether He Loves More The Foreknown Just Man Or The Predestined Unjust Man

Whether the love of God admits of more and less? And, whether He loves more the foreknown just, or the predestined unjust?

Fourthly and lastly, it is asked, whether the love of God admits of more and less?

And this seems evident from what is said in the Text, there, A, at the end: He loves all things that He made: and among them He loves rational creatures more, and of those, He loves more those who are members of His Only Begotten, and much more the Only Begotten Himself.

Likewise, since love places an effect in the creature, as the Saints say, and that effect is found greater and lesser, it seems that the love of God admits of intensity. Or if it is said that as to Himself He loves all equally, as the wise man seems to say, that He has equal care for all?: then it seems that He loves you as much as Himself and as much as His Only Begotten, which is absurd: therefore it seems that it admits of intensity and remission.

Further, it is asked, whether He loves more the foreknown just, or the predestined unjust?

It seems that the foreknown: because
1. In him appears a greater effect of love: therefore He loves him more.

1. Likewise, He Himself says: I love those who love Me: but the foreknown now loves more: therefore he is loved more.

ON THE CONTRARY:
Malachi 1:2-3: I have loved Jacob, but Esau I have hated. Therefore love simply refers to the predestined, and in a certain respect only to the foreknown.

Concerning Peter and John, who loved and was loved more, here could be a question, but it has been determined above.

Solution: It must be said that the love of God is said in three ways, namely, eternal only, and that does not admit of intensity and remission: because it falls only upon the eternal, namely, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit: and because they are one and highest goodness, therefore there is one essential love of them. In another way, it is called the love of predestination, and that signifies the divine essence and the order of preparation for the effect of grace in life, and of glory after death: and by the grace of that good which is prepared, it admits of more and less, as the Master says in the Text. In a third way, the love of God is said, which signifies the divine essence, and places an effect in the present.

And by this it is clear that He loves the Only Begotten with the first love, and not the members. But with the second and third, He loves Christ the man more than the members. And by this the solution to the first is clear.

For when it is inferred that in Himself He loves the members as much as the Only Begotten, it is nothing: because charity considered in itself is not referred to the members: and therefore there is no comparison.

To the other, it must be said that simply He loves the predestined more: because to more, that is, to eternal life. In a certain respect, however, the foreknown, because as to the state of present justice, and inasmuch as he is actually loved more, and not simply.

And by this the solution to all that is doubtful in this reading is clear.

DISTINCTIO XXXIII

Divisio Textus

After the aforementioned concerning the four virtues which are principal, etc., here the Master presents a single and small distinction concerning the four cardinal virtues, about which he determines three things as if under one chapter, namely the definitions of each, and why they are called cardinal, and whether they will remain in the homeland.

However, it should be noted that what virtue is in general has been determined in the second book of the Sentences.

Here, however, we will inquire about these four virtues, namely first about their number and sufficiency. Second, why they are called cardinal? Third, about the definitions which the Master presents.

And fourth, whether they will remain in the homeland or not?

Articulus 1 — On The Number Of The Cardinal Virtues

On the number of cardinal virtues.

To the first, it can be objected thus: 1. Augustine says that virtue is love, the order of love or ordered love. However, what is ordered is only one. Therefore, it seems that there is only one virtue.

1. Likewise, if one suffices in nature, nature itself does not seek more, because it is better and more noble to act through one than through many: but charity suffices for every good: therefore, it seems that other habits are superfluous.
2. Likewise, there are only two, namely the end and that which is for the end: therefore, it seems that according to these two, there should only be two virtues.

3. Likewise, we see in art that in the same work there is not one art teaching and another executing, but one and the same executing and teaching to operate: therefore, it seems that since virtue is more certain than art, no virtue should be as teaching and another as executing: therefore, it seems that prudence is not a virtue.

4. Likewise, there are only three powers perfectible for work, namely rational, concupiscible, and irascible, therefore there should only be three perfecting habits, and thus again it is left that there are only three virtues.

5. But still it seems that the number of virtues is diminished: for we have a certain virtue ordering in innate delight, which is temperance, and in difficult inflicted passion, which is fortitude: but there are many other things by which man is ordered in himself like these: therefore, it seems that virtues should be taken according to those, as there is the delight of doctrine, and the delight of honor, and the like: therefore, the number is diminished.

6. Likewise, according to the philosophy of Aristotle, there is no virtue which is called chastity, except in the delightful of touch: since therefore other senses have their delights like touch, it seems that they should have ordering virtues. That this is true, Aristotle intends and says, is clear from his words in the fourth book of the Ethics, where he says: They seem, etc. Therefore, it is clear what was said: animals use taste little or not at all. For taste is an indication of flavor, which those who test wines and dishes or spices do: but they do not greatly delight in such things, but not incontinent, but by use which is entirely through touch in foods and drinks and in venereal and other acts. And the Commentator explains in the same way.

7. Likewise, fortitude according to the same Philosopher is only in distressing inflicted losses, not concerning any death, but concerning that which is in war and for the sake of good. Since therefore there are many other difficulties, like confession, and infirmity, and poverty, it seems that we ought to have virtues directing in these: and we do not have: therefore, the number of virtues is diminished, as it seems.

8. Likewise, to the neighbor, it happens that a man is ordered in many ways beyond the passions of debt: therefore, according to those, there should be virtues: and they are not posited: therefore, the number is diminished.

9. Likewise, it seems that there are not those four which he posits here: because, Mark 8:9, on that: And those who had eaten were about four thousand, the Gloss says: By the four thousand, therefore, it seems that four virtues are signified, namely prudence, temperance, and fortitude, and the fourth which diffuses itself through all, the love of God and neighbor: the love of God and neighbor is one of the cardinal virtues.

10. Likewise, Matthew 5:6, on that: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for justice, the Gloss: To hunger and thirst for justice, is to have the love of good. Therefore, it seems that either charity is one of the cardinal virtues, or charity is the same as justice.

Solution: It must be said that there are four cardinal virtues. And many here have made many assignments of this: but one is substantial. For it is evident that civil virtue is that which pertains to the good state of the city. For the good state of the citizens, two things are required, namely a habit determining the right to works through reason, and this operative habit, because knowledge is of little or no use: and this habit is prudence: and therefore prudence according to Augustine, wisely chooses those things by which it is helped, from those by which it is hindered. According to what is required, it is to behave well in difficulty and optimally, concerning which is every virtue, since in the easy man does not need a governing habit, because in that he suffices for himself. To behave well happens in oneself and in another according to the order of right reason. To another indeed according to the reason of debt: because another reason of behaving towards another does not take the order of law, and then justice is the governing habit. In oneself, it happens to behave well in a double difficulty, namely in innate delight contemporary to life according to touch, as in taste according to what is touch, and in venereal: and thus the governing habit is temperance. Or in difficulty brought from outside, as the danger of war which seeks the subversion of the good of citizens, like justice, faith, or liberty, or something of this kind: and then the governing habit is fortitude. And in this way, virtues are multiplied according to philosophical consideration.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that love, as it falls in the definition of virtue, as some say, is not the habit of charity, but rather general love, by which everything that is loves its perfection. Others intend to say that it is charity: and then it is not true except of formed virtue, and not unformed: and charity then is in them as a general form. For just as good simply is in some particular good, so the love of good simply will be in the love of this or that good, as we said in the preceding distinction: and this then does not exclude the existence of multiple virtues, as was shown in the immediate distinction.

To the other, it must be said that one does not suffice for all acts according to the special being of works, but one suffices as a general mover and agent. Thus heat relates to senses, and the heat of the sun to generables: and this also you will find before how it is understood.

To the other, it must be said that it is true that there are two in general, but there are special differences of each of them: and therefore according to the end, three theological virtues are taken, and their definition was touched upon above.

According to that which is for the end, the cardinal virtues are accepted thus: That which is for the end: either it is according to reason which orders to the end and good: or the good of the end in some way shines in it according to the definition of honesty: because virtue is only about that. If in the first way: then prudence considers that reason, because that reason is helping, distinct from that which hinders in good work. But if it is the good which is the end shining in itself: either it is according to the order of one to another, and then according to it is justice: or in each one per se: and then either it is according to innate, or inflicted: and in the first way is temperance, in the second way fortitude.

To the other, it must be said that operative art through an instrument brings forth the form which is in itself, in the matter which is outside itself: and therefore preparation and the preparative and inductive virtue of the form must be outside in wood and stone, but in ethics, habits are born in the operator: and therefore it is left from such operations such a habit: and therefore it does not suffice in virtue, what suffices in knowledge: but if art induced the form in the artisan himself, then it would be similar to what is proposed, just as the work of virtue induces the form in the operator himself according to virtue.

To the other, it must be said that although there are only three powers, one nevertheless behaves in two ways, namely reason, namely as governing others, and thus in it is prudence: or as ordering us mutually to others, and thus in it is justice. In the concupiscible, however, temperance, and in the irascible fortitude. And thus now the three multiplications of these four virtues have been had.

To the other, it must be said that virtue is considered differently according to Aristotle, and differently according to Cicero in the Rhetorics, and in the book of Offices. For Aristotle does not take virtue except as it is in difficulty and optimal according to the material in which virtue is: and therefore he does not say there are virtues in the love of doctrine, and the love of honor. Others, however, posit virtues according to those, and reduce them.

§ 1. them to temperance. However, also according to Aristotle, virtue is in one thing as that in which it has its highest state, and from which it is defined, and it uses another thing well: just as he says about the brave man, who is not concerned with just any difficulty of fortune or danger from a natural death, but nevertheless the brave man uses those well through the same habit by which he approaches inflicted dangers. And we can say according to Aristotle, that temperance in its greatest extent and according to its maximum capacity is in the pleasurable things of touch according to nourishment and sexual intercourse: but nevertheless it is well disposed in other innate pleasurable things according to the same habit: and this agrees with the statements of Aristotle in many places in the Ethics, as is clear to those diligently examining that book.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that there is order to another in many ways: but the order falling under the notion of civil life is the order of right and debt. For in other things it happens that one exhibits himself to a neighbor and does not exhibit himself beyond the reproach of the legislator: and therefore concerning those orders no civil virtue is received, nor even can be received. But perhaps species of justice are received according to special notions of debt which is multiplied from the notion of nature, as in natural justice: and from the notion of contracts, and from the notion of state and benefit and condition, just as the Philosopher determines in multiple ways concerning justice in the Ethics in the book on justice, and Tully posits many species of natural and positive justice.

§ 4. To the next it must be said, that these two civil virtues are not condistinct among themselves and cardinal, namely justice, and the love of God and neighbor: and what the Gloss on Matthew says does not intend that charity is a civil virtue, but rather that it orders justice to neighbor and God, so that out of love it does what it is bound to do out of debt.

§ 5. To the next it must be said, that he intends that justice insofar as it is meritorious, is moved by love, and not that love is a civil virtue. However, note that Aristotle seems to hold another way. For he seems to mean that the virtue which is in one thing and is customary, is threefold, namely according to the difficult [arising] from innate pleasure, in which chastity or temperance rules, and according to the difficult of an inflicted thing, in which fortitude rules, and according to the difficult which is in that which we have for the use and sustenance of life, and the virtue which rules in this he calls liberality, and he makes a special treatise about it. But intellectual virtue, as he himself says, does not have a mean in this way, but right reason is present to it through a mean, just as prudence with its associated virtues, which according to him are synesis, science, and intelligence, and the like. But justice, since it is not said simply, is of another order: since it falls under the order of civil right, namely according to statutes and plebiscites, and cases vary in it: and therefore it regards the order of the common city: and this order Aristotle seems to hold in the Ethics, as is plainly evident in the new translation.

Articulus 2 — Why These Virtues Are Called Cardinal

Why are these virtues called cardinal?

§ 6. Secondly it is asked, Why are these virtues called cardinal?

§ 7. For Jerome seems to assign the reason for this in the Text: because by them one lives well in this mortal life, and afterwards arrives at eternal beatitude.

§ 8. But this seems false: because 1. Many wrote about the cardinal virtues, and made no mention of eternal beatitude, such as Aristotle, Tully, Macrobius, and other Philosophers.

§ 9. 2. Also, Basil on the beginning of Proverbs says, that concerning the four virtues which are called cardinal, many, even those who are outside, have written.

§ 10. 3. Also, many infidels also had them, such as Tully himself, and Africanus, and certain other Stoics, whose life is still written by the Philosophers. Therefore it seems that this is not the reason which Jerome posits.

§ 11. 4. Also, by the theological virtues one lives well in this mortal life, and afterwards arrives at eternal life: therefore the theological virtues are cardinal, which is false: therefore it is not the reason which he posits.

§ 12. 5. If perhaps you should say, that they are called cardinal for the reason that in them, as on hinges, all others and civil virtue turn: it seems according to this that only charity is a cardinal virtue: because it alone, as has already frequently been held, seems to cause the whole good that is in the life of a man.

§ 13. 6. Also, among these one seems to be more cardinal than another. For concerning prudence Bernard says, that it is not so much a virtue, as the charioteer of the virtues: therefore the others seem to hinge upon it.

§ 14. Further it is asked, Why are they called principal, and why civil or political?

§ 15. Solution. It must be said without prejudice, that Jerome does not touch upon the general cause, but rather the cause according to the optimum being of those virtues: and this they do not have unless when they are infused and formed: and then they are called cardinal with respect to those which are in the things that are directed to the end circumstantiating the consideration of man, and not with respect to the theological ones.

§ 17. But others, such as the Philosophers, call them cardinal, for the reason that they are the hinge of the revolution of human life according to the civil state and that of honesty: and this is the proper and customary reason among Tully and other Philosophers speaking about them.

§ 18. But to that which is objected concerning charity, it must be said that it is not the hinge to whose notion other particular virtues are reduced, just as sobriety to temperance, in that sobriety tempers in a certain innate pleasurable thing, and similarly continence and parsimony and the like which Tully and Macrobius posit: and to justice piety and mercy and religion, in that all those are concerning particular notions of debt. But human life is referred to charity as to a general mover and a certain form and end, and not as to a hinge, as was said.

§ 19. To the next it must be said, that none of those is more cardinal than another, but one can be of a more general matter than another. And for this it must be noted, that every political virtue posits a special notion concerning a matter, just as fortitude posits the notion of the arduous and firm for the sake of the good, and continence or temperance posits the notion of the beautiful concerning the restriction of the pleasurable things of the flesh, and especially in the sense of touch, because in that alone, as Avicenna proves, there is simply and absolutely pleasure: and therefore to temper in that is difficult. But justice, although it has a more general matter than an inflicted or innate passion, nevertheless attends to a special notion concerning it, that is, the notion of debt ordainable by natural or human right. But of a more general matter among all is prudence, because its matter is that which avails for a moral work: but nevertheless it posits a special notion concerning this, namely the eligible thing concerning the right reason of the civil good: and according as it is the inspector of that notion, thus it is a special virtue divided against the others. But according as this eligible thing is shown to the other virtues either in act or in circumstances, thus it is the charioteer of the virtues according to the intention of the blessed Bernard. For just as reason relates to the other motive powers, so too does the habit perfecting reason: because reason has its object under a special notion, namely the true under the notion of the good insofar as it is practical, which good tends to the end of the concupiscible and irascible according to the diversity of their nature. So also is it concerning the habit ruling reason, that it is of a special notion which it posits about a general matter that is determinable to the work of any other. Therefore it must be said, that the cardinality of the virtues is attended to according to the notion which they posit concerning the matter, to which notion those inferior to them look, which are called their parts by Macrobius and Tully, and not from the matter. And because in their notions they are simultaneously equally principal, therefore one is not more cardinal than another, but they are equally cardinal.

§ 20. To the next it must be said, that the notion of cardinality is in this, that the inferior ones look to their notions, as was said. But they are called principal, insofar as they consist in that which is per se of virtue, as fortitude concerning the most difficult inflicted thing, and temperance concerning the most pleasurable thing: and others will then be secondary, which are about a matter that is close to the matter of the virtue, although it is not entirely it, such as sobriety concerning the tempering of things obstructing the paths of reason and the senses, which is not as difficult as restraining the pleasures of touch, and so concerning the others. But they are called civil, according as they constitute the good state of one with another in the order of citizens and this is the same reason why they are called political, except that one is Greek, and the other Latin.

Articulus 3 — On The Definitions Of The Cardinal Virtues

On the definitions of the cardinal virtues.

§ 21. Thirdly, It is asked concerning the definitions which the Master posits here.

§ 22. And first, It is asked concerning that definition which he touches upon, there, A, Justice is in aiding the wretched.

§ 23. 1. For this belongs to mercy, which is a part of justice according to the Saints, and not a cardinal virtue: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 24. 2. Also, Justice is to render to everyone what is his own, as Augustine says, and also the Philosopher. But this is in many ways: therefore it seems, that he badly descends to a certain determinate matter by assuming justice.

§ 25. 3. Also, he who aids a wretched person does not seem to render what is his own, but rather from his own property: therefore this belongs more to charity than to justice: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 26. Further it is asked concerning another definition which he posits: Prudence is in taking precautions against snares.

§ 27. 1. For there are, as Tully says, three parts of prudence, namely memory, intelligence, and foresight: and it does not belong to any to take precautions against snares except to foresight: therefore this does not per se belong to prudence, but to a part of it: because if it per se belonged, it would behove that it belong to every part.

§ 28. 2. Also, It seems that what he says is impossible: for ensnaring things are not necessary, because thus they could not be avoided: therefore they are contingents concerning the future: but those are not known, nor can they be known: therefore neither can they be avoided: because nothing is avoided, except what is known and foreknown.

§ 29. Further it is asked concerning the third which he posits, saying: Fortitude is in enduring hardships.

§ 30. For since virtue is about pleasures and sorrows, every virtue endures the hardships of certain passions about which it is: therefore this is not specially definitive of fortitude.

§ 31. But it is asked concerning the fourth: Temperance is in coercing depraved pleasures. For to coerce does not denote any act: but every virtue seems to ought to be defined by an act substantial to it: therefore it is badly defined.

§ 32. The same objection is concerning the definition of fortitude.

§ 33. Also, Both of these are posited through the said definitions in passions, namely inflicted ones: fortitude, because it endures hardships: temperance, because it coerces bad pleasures: but one does not merit by passions: therefore since virtue is given on account of merit, it is badly defined concerning passions.

§ 34. Further it is asked concerning the order of the virtues. Because in defining the Master posits justice first, then prudence, and fortitude, and temperance: and the book of Wisdom which he adduces in the Text posits sobriety or temperance, and afterwards prudence, and then justice, and lastly fortitude, or virtue.

§ 35. Solution. It must be said to the first, that the Master does not strive to define these virtues except according to conformity to Christ in whom they were in the greatest state. But although the act of justice, to render to everyone what is his own, is more general, nevertheless it is not so excellent in merit, nor does it so conform us to Christ, as that which is of a part of justice, because it is in aiding the wretched, whose wretchedness he makes his own, and [he makes it] that what is ours is owed to him: just as Christ also was made ours, in that by aiding us wretched ones he was made our redeemer.

§ 37. To the next it must be said, that that which we exhibit to the wretched, is both ours, and is his: ours by dominion, and his by the notion of the debt of natural right, which in necessity communicates goods: because according to natural right in necessity all things are common.

§ 38. To that which is objected against another definition, it must be said that prudence is in its highest degree through caution against snares, which ensnare virtue and the good life: and therefore it is defined by that act and not for the reason that it is a general habit saved in all the parts of prudence.

§ 39. To the next it must be said, that it happens to take precautions against snares in the universal, although not in the particular: and then prudence fortifies against all snares which can happen.

§ 40. To that which is objected concerning the third it must be said that hardship is principally in fortitude: because an inflicted passion is more bitter and more saddening than another: and therefore it principally belongs to fortitude.

§ 41. To the next it must be said, that to coerce posits an interior act, namely the will of tempering. And through this the solution is clear.

§ 42. To the other thing which is asked concerning the order, it must be said that virtues are considered in two ways, namely in comparison to the subject, and in themselves. But in themselves they have two things substantial to them concerning which they are, namely the difficult, and the good. Therefore they can be ordered according to the notions of the difficult, or according to the notions of the good. If in the first way, thus fortitude is first, and temperance second, and prudence third: because it is more difficult to choose operable things sagaciously, than to render to everyone what is his own: and this order Aristotle seems to pursue in the Ethics. But the reason for this is: because ethica in Greek is the same as consuetudo [custom] in Latin: and according as a virtue is more concerning the difficult, so it more needs habituation generating it: and therefore according as they are more customary, thus Aristotle puts them before and after.

§ 43. But if they are ordered according to the good which is in them: then, as Tully proves in book I of On Duties, by many reasons, he teaches that the good of justice is better than all, both justice, and virtue, on account of which also one's own things are to be left behind and the exercises of the other virtues: thus therefore then justice will be first: and because the beautiful and the good, as he himself says in the same place, are determined almost concerning the same thing, and the beautiful is especially in temperance, therefore it is second, and fortitude third, and prudence fourth, because it has something similar to art which does not have the notion of a proper good, but its good is in other things.

§ 44. But if virtue is regarded according to the order to the subject in which it is: then first is prudence, second temperance, third fortitude, and lastly justice. And the reason for this is, that there is not a right operation unless there is first a right choice: therefore prudence is first. And similarly he is not brave in adversities, who is resolved by delights, and therefore temperance is before fortitude.

§ 45. But the book of Wisdom attends to yet a fourth order, namely that something of temperance is before prudence: for unless the spiritual senses are sober, there will not be a judgment concerning a right choice, and as to this temperance is prior according to act, than prudence. But according to act justice is placed before fortitude, because it is a common good, which is always better than a private one.

§ 46. But note, that there are many other orders of these virtues, and sufficient groupings are found, which we pass over in silence: because elsewhere by a very long disputation they have been inquired into in common, and concerning each in special.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Cardinal Virtues Will Remain In The Fatherland

Will the cardinal virtues remain in the fatherland?

§ 47. Fourthly it is asked, Whether these virtues will remain in the fatherland [heaven]?

§ 48. But it seems that they will not: because 1. Faith which is theological, and Hope similarly are evacuated: therefore much more so the civil ones.

§ 49. 2. Also, That which is directed to the end, is not possessed except for the sake of the end: therefore once the end is obtained it will already be superfluous to retain it: therefore since these four are concerning that which is to the end, it seems that in the end or in the fatherland they will not remain.

§ 50. 3. Also, To what purpose would they remain? For there will not be snares there which we ought to take precautions against through prudence, nor hardships which it is necessary to endure through fortitude, and so concerning the others: therefore they will not remain.

§ 51. 4. Also, Acquired science seems to be less 'in part' [i.e., imperfect] than political virtue: because science is about the incorruptible, and political virtue regards corruptible particular matter: and yet science will be destroyed, as the Apostle says. Therefore also virtue.

§ 53. Solution. It seems to me, that the Master well disputes here through the words of the Saints, and well determines, namely that they will indeed remain, but having other acts. And the reason for this is, because those things which are to some end, and those things which order to that end, are otherwise disposed when conjoined to the end, and otherwise when they are in those things which are ordered to the end, just as reason, and free will, and all other things: and so it is also concerning habits.

§ 54. Hence it must be said to the first, sustaining the dictum of the Master in the Text, that it is not similar: because it is not the reason why a virtue is evacuated, or is not evacuated, that it is theological or cardinal: but rather this is the cause, that imperfection in comparison to the end itself is of its substance, just as of faith and hope, which are imperfect habits in comparison to the end itself. But these four are not in comparison to the end, but through comparison to those things which are to the end: and therefore when these cease their imperfection will cease, and they themselves will remain in the act which belongs to the end, as the Master says.

§ 56. To the next it must be said, that science is 'in part' insofar as it is from sense: for then it will not be possessed in that mode, but through forms instilled by the Creator, just as the Angels have science: and therefore this as imperfect will be taken away. But it is not thus in virtue: because it according to some mode conjoins to the end as a perfect and perfecting disposition, and therefore it will remain as the Master says.

§ 57. But note, that there are those who say the total opposite: but because I consider them to speak irrationally, therefore I do not pursue their opinions.

DISTINCTIO XXXIV

Divisio Textus

§ 58. Now concerning the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, etc. Here in the third place among the habits perfecting the soul, the Master treats of the gifts.

§ 59. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he treats of the gifts in common. In the second, he treats of the gifts in special, which begins in this same distinction, there, D, And because concerning fear, etc.

§ 60. In the first part he inquires about four things concerning the gifts in common, the first of which is, whether they are virtues, and whether they are in the Angels? And these two are determined simultaneously. Thirdly, Whether they were in Christ? there, B, But in Christ, etc. Fourthly it is asked, Whether they will be evacuated or will remain in the fatherland? there, C, But to these it seems to object, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Gifts Are Virtues

Are the gifts virtues?

§ 61. But concerning these we will ask five things. First, Whether they are virtues? Second, how they perfect the soul, and for what? Third, concerning their number. Fourth, concerning the order and combination which they have two by two. Fifth, Whether they are in the Angels and Christ?

§ 62. To the first one proceeds thus:

§ 63. 1. On that passage of Job 1:2: Seven sons were born to him, etc., Gregory says: By the seven sons seven virtues are understood, wisdom, understanding, etc. Therefore the gifts are virtues.

§ 64. 2. Also, in the same place, Against individual temptations, the Holy Spirit imbues the mind with seven virtues: against foolishness wisdom, against dullness understanding, etc. Therefore the gifts are virtues.

§ 65. 3. Also, Those habits which are truly virtues, are called gifts by the Saints: hence the Gloss on that passage of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 14:1, says: Pursue charity, than which there is no greater among all the gifts.

§ 66. Similarly, James 1:17, on that: Every perfect gift, the Gloss says generally, that gifts are gratuitous: therefore it seems, that the general name is gift, and it is convertible with virtue.

§ 67. 4. Also, Charity is also called the first gift, in which all gifts are given: and this the Master proves in book I of the Sentences.[283] Therefore it seems, that gifts are in no way distinguished from virtues.

§ 68. 5. Also, The seven virtues are defined by a general definition, which is fitting to the theological and cardinal ones: such a definition is also found to be fitting to the gifts, as is, that virtue is the disposition of a perfect thing to the optimum: and as is, that virtue is that which makes its possessor good and renders his work good: and as is, that virtue is operative in the difficult things of the optimum: and as is, that virtue is the ultimate of a power in the thing of which it is the virtue. All these are fitting also to the gifts: and just as that, virtue is a good quality of the mind by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly, which God works in us. Therefore it seems, that the gifts are virtues.

§ 69. If perhaps you should wish to say, that gifts denote something more perfect, than virtues: this does not seem true.

§ 70. 1. For Macrobius on the Dream of Scipio divides virtue into purgatorial, and of a purged soul, and exemplary: and one is more perfect than another, nor does it thereby lose the name and notion of virtue: therefore neither will this perfection give another notion according to the name to the gifts.

§ 71. 2. Also, More and less do not vary the species; but faith, and understanding, and wisdom lean upon the first truth through consent. Similarly prudence, science, and counsel illuminate towards operable things through the notions of operable things, except that one does more and another less: therefore it seems, that there is no difference according to the notion of species between virtues and gifts.

§ 72. 3. Furthermore, This very thing, that gifts are more perfect than virtues, and thus differ from them, seems false: because the Philosopher says, that virtue is the ultimate of a power in a thing: but after the ultimate there is not something to be taken: therefore there is not a perfection more ample than virtue, as it seems.

§ 73. But if you should wish to say, that there is a difference quantum to the name: this again seems false, for the Philosopher says in the Topics, and Boethius similarly in his Topics, that a gift is an unreturnable giving: and this same notion is fitting to virtue just as to gifts: therefore they are not distinguished as to this, as it seems.

§ 74. To this Doctors are found to have five opinions. For some say, that virtues and gifts do not differ except according to reason [notion], and not according to any substantial definition and difference: but they give this accidental difference, that virtues are principally for acting, and therefore they are defined by acts, and have proper operations: but gifts are for resisting temptations which assail the life of a virtue already possessed. But that this saying is not fitting, immediately appears: because fortitude is for assailing in the difficult and temptation. Similarly it is commonly said, that the least charity can resist any temptation whatsoever. And, 1 Peter 5:8 and 9: Your adversary the devil goes about, seeking whom he may devour: whom resist, strong in faith. And, Ephesians 6:16: In all things taking the shield of faith, in which you may be able to extinguish all the fiery darts of the most wicked one. Therefore it is clear through this, that this also more principally belongs to virtue, than to a gift: and therefore the saying of these men is not fitting.

§ 75. Also, Others wished to amend the saying through subtlety, and said, that there are two things in free will, reason, and will: and virtue is principally in the will, secondarily in reason: but a gift conversely is principally in reason, secondarily in the will. But for this assignment of theirs they adduce such a reason, that among the virtues there is only one which is in reason: and among the gifts, four are posited in reason, namely wisdom, understanding, counsel, and science. But it is clear that this is ridiculous, because two virtues are in reason, namely faith, and prudence. Also, It is ridiculous to say, that gifts are more principally in reason for the reason that more of them are in reason. For then it would follow, that they would be more principally in the irascible, than in the concupiscible: because two are in the irascible, namely fear, and fortitude: and one is in the concupiscible, namely piety. Also, It is false concerning the cardinal virtues: because two are in reason, namely prudence, and justice. For since justice consists in ordination to another, and all order is of reason, thus justice will necessarily be in reason.

§ 76. Therefore thirdly come those who say, that gifts are so called by comparison to God the giver, and therefore they are in the superior part of reason: but virtues regard special works which are upon special matters, and therefore they are in the inferior part of the soul or reason. And this again is nothing: because on that passage: The light of thy countenance is sealed upon us,[284] etc., the Gloss says, that the image is threefold, of creation, of recreation, and of similitude. And the image of recreation is that through which the image of similitude and creation is perfected: and that is faith, hope, and charity. Therefore since according to Augustine, the image is in the soul according to that part than which it has nothing more excellent, it will seem that faith, hope, and charity are in the highest part of the soul, and thus the gifts will not be higher in the parts of the soul, than the virtues. Also, What altitude of the soul does fear denote? None at all. Hence what they say is nothing.

§ 77. Therefore there are fourths who have a great part of the multitude following them: because this opinion was and is very celebrated among many, that virtues are for acting rightly according to the life which suffices for each one according to himself, and for sustaining passions whether innate or inflicted. But gifts are in aid of the powers of the soul, so that we may suffer in conformity to Christ: and this they prove reasonably enough thus: For Christ to suffer three things were required, the first of which is the fear of reverence towards the Father sending him and handing him over for the redemption of the human race: and from that the spirit of the fear of the Lord filled him. But the second was, that he should do this out of love for men, because he was suffering for the sake of saving men, and there the gift of piety acceded. But the third was that he should offer himself to passions manfully and intrepidly: and from that part came the gift of fortitude. But the other gifts accompany these, just as science accompanies piety, counsel fortitude, but understanding and wisdom accompany the intention of the one suffering towards God. And what is objected is not contrary to this opinion, except this alone which, as it seems, cannot be reasonably solved, namely that the gifts would have been given, even to Christ not incarnate and not suffering, as if man had not sinned: therefore this is not a substantial difference of gifts and virtues, but rather an accidental one according to the state of sin.

§ 78. Therefore fifthly they say, that virtues are for acting simply: but gifts are expeditions of the virtues, and are for acting expeditiously: and this opinion once had many defenders on account of the word of Gregory who says, that the gifts were given in aid of the virtues against defect. But this again is clearly not true: because

§ 79. 1. The Philosopher says in the second book of the Ethics, that one ought to take the sign of a ha-

§ 1. ...[con]ceiving delight coming to be in the work. For one is not just and chaste who works just and chaste things, but rather who works these things and rejoices in this very fact. But one rejoicing in the work does not have difficulty: therefore he does not need further help.

§ 2. Also, what is it to say that a virtue, which is a perfect habit and perfecting toward a work, would further need another thing perfecting it? For thus there would be a perfection of a perfection, and thus concerning other perfections it would be necessary to have many.

§ 3. If on account of this it were said that in truth the gifts are virtues, and do not differ from them. Against this:

§ 4. 1. Virtue and gift are not of the same definition: therefore they are not of the same nature. This is evident, because counsel is not a virtue: and similarly neither is science, nor wisdom.

§ 5. 2. Also, on Matthew 6:9, on the Our Father, the Gloss says: "In prayers it is so that gifts may be obtained; in gifts, so that we may work the commandments." Therefore gifts are obtained by prayer: but not virtue, because one must have virtues before prayers are heard: therefore gifts are not virtues.

§ 6. 3. Also, in the same place, another Gloss: "We must labor in prayers, so that we may perceive the gifts." And the same thing follows from this. But nevertheless this Gloss itself has a difficulty: because when one part of grace is had, all are had: and thus gifts are had before prayer is heard, just as virtues are. Whence it seems that nothing is proved through those Glosses.

§ 7. Solution. Without prejudice, I consent to the latter opinion which is founded upon the word of Gregory, because Gregory spoke more concerning the gifts than any other saint. And therefore a certain Doctor holds that opinion: and it is good, although it has not been well explained by some who reject it. For Gregory expressly says that the gifts were given as a help to the virtues. And to understand this, it must be noted that there is a certain impediment of a virtue toward its proper act: and it has this only accidentally from some disposition of its subject: and the virtue itself, growing strong in the use of the work, excludes this through itself. And concerning this Bernard says in the first book of On Consideration to Eugenius: "Nothing is so difficult that custom would not make it easy."[285] And this is especially true in customary things, concerning which the Philosopher introduces that we are innately suited to receive them: but to perfect them is from habituation.[286] But there is another impediment of the power arising from the imperfection of the habit, which is as it were contrary to the first impediment, just as the power of our intellect is directed toward the first truth, and toward this virtue perfects only imperfectly, namely "in a mirror and in an enigma," and therefore "it shall be emptied out":[287] and therefore the power needs another habit assisting it higher into that truth, and on that part as a second perfection, a gift is infused higher. How this is so will be explained more in the following article. And in this way it is understood that the gifts are given as a help to the virtues or powers.

284. Ps 4:7.

§ 8. To all the things which are first objected to prove that a gift is a virtue, there is one solution, namely that virtue is spoken of in two ways, namely broadly, and strictly. Strictly, virtue will then be the first perfection of the powers of the soul toward the acts of a life ordered to the end, or that which is for the end: just as a theological virtue is toward the end, but a political virtue is toward that which we have for use, which is for the end: and in this way, since a gift is a second perfection toward a higher act of certain virtues, it is not a virtue, but a habit distinct from virtue. Broadly, virtue is taken for a habit perfecting toward an act according to the rationale of the good. Thus a gift is a virtue, and a beatitude, and similarly the fruits concerning which mention will be made later. As to what Gregory seems to say, that the gifts are given against the defect into which we fall from sin. I respond that this is said accidentally, namely concerning the gift by reason of the state of the man to whom the gifts are given. For otherwise... § 9. ...the gifts would not be in the Angels and in Christ.

§ 10. But to that which is objected last, that gifts are obtained by prayers, it must be said that we concede the conclusion: nevertheless the argumentation does not proceed according to the intention of the Gloss, because the Gloss is understood concerning the obtaining of the use of the gift, not the habit: because all are infused simultaneously with the virtues.

§ 11. But to that which is objected against this opinion lastly, it must be said that virtue rejoices in its operation, but this is only insofar as the removal of the impediment which it has in the subject: and against this a gift is not given, but rather against that which virtue has of itself, as faith from the fact that it is in a mirror and an enigma, and prudence from the fact that it is through the principles of human law, which is wrapped in the clouds of errors: and all these things are to be discussed in the following article.

§ 12. To the other it must be said that this is not unfitting, that after one perfection there should be another in the same thing, provided they are not of the same rationale: just as opinion and science concerning the same thing, and both remain, although some deny this: for by having science, I do not on account of this lose opinion through signs, since I can still proceed through signs when I wish. Thus one seeing the truth in the light of the intellect does not lose faith on account of this. And therefore this is not unfitting.

Articulus 2 — How These Gifts Perfect The Soul

§ 13. Article 2: How do these gifts perfect the soul?

How do these gifts perfect the soul?

Secondly it is asked: How do they perfect the soul?

§ 14. And so that this may be explained more clearly, I will make a general disputation concerning the mode of the perfection of the soul through the virtues, and gifts, and beatitudes, and fruits, and the grace of the sacraments.

§ 15. And it is objected thus: 1. Every perfectible thing is found to be perfectible in only four ways, namely in being (esse), in power (posse), in action (agere), and in the end (fine). For accidents do not confer perfection: because they are infinite, as the Philosopher says: nor can perfection be attended to with respect to them. The soul is in the number of perfectible things. Therefore it will be perfected by all these perfections. But it is certain that it simultaneously receives perfection in being and in power in its creation: because it is perfect, and has all the powers: therefore if it is perfected further, this will be in action and in the end. But the virtues sufficiently perfect the soul in action: and charity, which is the bond of perfection (as has been proved), perfects by conjoining to the end: therefore the gifts and beatitudes and fruits are superfluous.

§ 16. 2. Also, it cannot be said that the gifts are given against the wound of sin: because, as the Master says in the beginning of the fourth [book] of this volume, sacramental grace is ordered against this. But if you say that man through sin fell into two things, namely into the despoiling of gratuitous goods, and the wounding of natural goods; and for the restitution of the despoiled goods grace is given in the virtues, and for the healing of the natural goods the gifts are given. This seems to be nothing: because, as has already been held, sacramental grace is ordered against the wound of natural goods. Also, according to this, other habits, namely the beatitudes, and fruits, and the grace of the sacraments would be superfluous, which is unfitting. Also, the intellect informed by grace, intending toward invisible things, can be elevated through differing degrees. For example, cognition through a mirror in an enigma elevates it above itself, so that it believes those things which it does not see through reason. But it can take illumination from an interior or exterior hearing, so that it may have from them a light greater than faith: which, because it is greater, will not be faith: therefore it is of some higher grace than faith is: therefore it seems, since the gifts are for such acts (which I will prove), that it is saying nothing [to say] that the gifts were given against the defect which is from sin. But the proof of that which is supposed is this: because wisdom is defined as a gift which is the cognition of divine things with a savor; and understanding [is defined] as a light causing one to know heavenly things: just as Gregory says, that He gives understanding when He illuminates the mind concerning things heard: therefore it seems that they are not against sins.

§ 19. But again, in Gregory's assignment it is asked: Why does he posit six punishments, and orders the seventh against a sin, namely fear against pride?

§ 20. Also, concerning that preceding position which is supposed, if a gift is toward a higher act than a virtue, why do we not have individual gifts corresponding to individual virtues through something higher? Because none among the gifts corresponds to hope. Also, none to charity. Also, none to temperance. For what some say concerning piety is not fitting, since by Philosophers and Saints piety is posited as a species of justice, and not of temperance. And then again the question is: Why does a gift correspond to a species of justice by the same name, and not to others, and not similarly to justice in itself? Also, Why does a gift correspond to fortitude by the same name and not to others? Also, Since charity is more perfect than the others, why does a gift not correspond to it?

286. Peter Lombard, Sentences I.

§ 21. Also, it is asked concerning beatitude. For this is a state perfected by the aggregation of all goods. Therefore it seems that it is not had absolutely except by God, and is not had by participation except by the blessed in the fatherland: therefore it seems that there is no perfection of beatitude here on the way.

§ 22. Moreover, if someone is called blessed, how is the congregation of good saved in him? For it seems that it ought to be saved: because Augustine says in the Gloss on Matthew 5:10, on that [text]: "Blessed are they who suffer persecution for the sake of justice": that the last one reverts to the head: so that we may understand that it is separated from none, so that the sense is: "Blessed are the poor in spirit with persecutions, and blessed are the meek with persecutions," and so concerning the others. But if that one reverts, the same rationale will apply to the reversion of the others. Therefore it seems that beatitude posits a state of the blessed perfected by congregation.

§ 23. Also, Aristotle says speaking of felicity, that one swallow does not make a spring, nor does one clear day. And another translation is clearer, and says that by one swallow and one clear day there is no prognostication of the spring time. And he understands that there must be many. And by a similarity he infers that felicity will not be the perfection in act of one good, nor of him who had the congregation of goods for a short time, but in all goods, and for a long time.

§ 24. Therefore if these things are of the rationale of beatitude, it seems that the habits of beatitude are not had simultaneously with the virtues and gifts through infusion: which nevertheless is against the common opinion, because God gives all habits simultaneously.

§ 25. Also, the virtues which are first perfections, are multiplied into seven, and the beatitudes into eight.

§ 26. Also, the fruits speak of a certain perfection of the mind, and since a fruit is only of a good to which we adhere by love for its own sake, as Augustine says, it seems to be the ultimate perfection of man on the way tending toward the fatherland: but the fruits are virtues, as the Gloss seems to say in the same place: and the names... § 27. ...of the fruits which it posits, such as charity, patience, meekness, and others which it posits there, although it interweaves certain ones which do not name virtues, such as joy, and peace, and certain others: therefore much more do all things which are prior to the fruits fall into the rationale of virtue, such as the gifts, and the beatitudes.

§ 28. Solution. Speaking without prejudice, I say as before, that the virtues perfect the soul toward first acts, and the gifts toward second acts, and the beatitudes toward third acts, and the fruits toward the end, according as it happens through a good work to be conjoined to the end. And how this happens, let it be taken from the part of reason: because faith is not perfected by a virtue toward the consent of the first truth, which it does not see, except in a mirror and in an enigma: but it happens to see this better in the light of illumination through the inspiration of grace, and it happens to savor it through the experience of itself in the reason (otherwise, in the thing) itself: and thus the gifts perfect.

§ 29. Also, it happens that the gaze is fixed on it higher with maximal certitude: and then it is the act of the beatitude of perfect cleanness, as it is said: "Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God." It also happens to be refreshed in the taste of that certitude: and thus it will be the habit which is called a fruit, and is called faith by the Apostle. And the Gloss says there, that faith is the same as the certitude concerning invisible things: and there ought to be added, through the experience of the spirit: because otherwise it would not be true what Ambrose says in the same place in the Gloss, that it delights its possessors with an unconquered and holy delight: and therefore they are called fruits of the spirit. And according to this, the gifts are second perfections of the soul, and they presuppose the virtues according to nature, although they are infused simultaneously.

§ 30. Also, it must be noted according to this opinion, that there is a perfection of the soul toward an act which is concerning the difficult and the good: and there is a perfection of the soul toward the state of the good, and the acts which are of the best state. If the soul is perfected in the first way toward an act: this happens in two ways, namely toward a first act which is first, by the fact that it itself is first from a good habit: and in this way virtue perfects. But if it is toward a higher or second act: thus a gift perfects. But if it is a perfection according to state: since a state is not in one or two goods, but in all things which can be had according to the perfection which can be in a state: then it is a perfection through infused beatitudes. But the fruit approaches from the part of the conjunction with the end, as was said before. Therefore, sustaining these things, one must respond to the objections.

§ 31. To the first, therefore, it must be said that all perfections are referred to power (posse). For there is a power from a potency: and nature receives this when it receives the potencies in its creation. And there is a power from an infused or acquired habit: and it does not have this perfection except when it acquires the habit, and furthermore this is the cause of perfection in act. But since habits are manifold, it is evident that all of those are necessary.

§ 32. To the other it must be said that the Saints say that they were given as a help to the virtues and powers against the wound of sin: and that they were given as a help, by the fact that they are toward more perfect acts, this is substantial to the gifts: but that they are against the wound of sin, this is accidental from the subject in which that wound is. And this is proved through that objection, that they are in the Angels, and in Christ, and they would have been in us, even if no one had sinned. Therefore it is evident that it is accidental to the gifts to be against the wound of sin. Nor is this saying of certain persons fitting, namely that it is substantial to the gifts to be against the wound of sin, and that in the Angels they are like a preservative medicine: because there is no rationale for a preservative medicine in him in whom there is no potency for disease. Whence, since in Christ there was an impossibility toward disease, in no way was anything present in Him as a preservative medicine; and yet the gifts are in Christ:

therefore they are not ordered substantially against sin, but accidentally, as has been said.

§ 34. But to that which is objected concerning Gregory, it must be said that he speaks concerning the gifts according to the effect which they have in man condemned on account of sin, and reformed through them: and not concerning the substantial act of the gifts.

§ 35. To that which is objected concerning the sacraments, it must be said that it is not valid: because those punishments and wounds are other than these. For there is a wound of a power toward the act to which it was born, and this wound is only a punishment and not the cause of a fault: and against this punishment gifts are given to us according to the said rationale, such as folly, dullness, and the like. There is also a wound which either is conjoined to sin as inclining toward it, or is a sin: and against this the sacraments are ordered, as baptism against original sin, and confirmation against the kindling of the fomes which is toward evil, and the Eucharist against the defect of the spiritual good lost, from which man is habilitated toward evil, and so concerning others, as is evident in the disputation which is posited in the beginning of the fourth [book] of the Sentences.

§ 36. But to that which is asked: Why does Gregory posit one sin with six punishments? It must be said that pride there does not name a sin, but a punishment which is from sin, and pride is called there "pridefulness" (superbilitas) which fear represses: and thus there is no question.

§ 37. To the other I well concede that the gifts are consequences of the virtues, and are of a higher perfection, but not all of them. For charity is of the highest perfection, and that cannot have anything consequent to it [more perfect] than it itself is. But faith, indeed, according to its substance by which it is the vision of truth, is perfect, and therefore on that part it will remain in the perfect state of the fatherland: but on the part of its form, insofar as it is in a mirror and an enigma, it is imperfect: and therefore two gifts follow from that part: one as showing the first truth under an accepted light, which is understanding; but the other as tasting the sweetness of the truth acknowledged and accepted in the gifts of grace: and this is wisdom. But hope, because it is imperfect in substance and in form, can in no way remain in the perfect state, in which the gift remains more than the virtue: and therefore neither a gift nor a beatitude follows it.

§ 38. Also, among the cardinal virtues temperance is in innate delectables, in which it is not very difficult to be temperate perfectly: whence the Philosopher says that the incontinent man is more blameworthy than the timid man, because [he fails] in that which can be done more easily: and therefore in that delectable thing virtue suffices for the act of ultimate perfection, and therefore no gift follows temperance. But in fortitude it is not so: because that in which it is, is most difficult even for the most constant person: and therefore it requires a habit of a higher perfection.

§ 39. And if it is asked: How can this be, since fortitude is against the perils of death, than which nothing seems more difficult? It must be said that the gift is against the state in which man is bound to such things if it is necessary: just as even in jousts they are brave who repel or sustain incidental perils: but braver than these are those who voluntarily offer themselves to such a joust when they are not bound: and for this there is the gift in which a man is placed in a state of perfection, either from degree or profession so that he is often compelled to undergo such perils: and for this man needs a gift. And because it is against the same act and the same difficult and good thing as the virtue of fortitude, therefore it is named by the same name with it. But justice according to its genus respects a debt, as was held above in the question on the virtues: and therefore it does not have great difficulty in that: but in the species... § 40. ...which is of piety, and is benevolence to those conjoined by blood, it has further that it should expend through the likeness of the image to those conjoined [by the image] this which it expends to those conjoined by blood: for toward this a customary or civil virtue does not elevate, but rather the gift of the Holy Spirit. And therefore justice according to itself did not have a corresponding gift, but in that part by which it is moved through the rationale of a debt to those who are conjoined by blood, so that it may be moved into those who are conjoined by conformity to the heavenly Father. And because the act of benevolence is the same in both, therefore the virtue and the gift have one name. But that this is true is seen from Augustine, who takes piety [as] the cult of God, and the service of the neighbor, and also [as] a special virtue in the book The City of God, and it is also held from the words of the following distinction. But in other species of justice the rationale of debt is sufficient to complete an act however perfect, as in religion, and in others, and especially in the species of justice which are according to positive law.

§ 41. But to prudence, which is the practical cognition of eligible things, two gifts correspond. For there is a civil prudence using the principles of natural and human law, but it is not raised up to those things which are divinely inspired, except through the gift of the Holy Spirit. But those which are inspired are most certain. And this happens in two ways: either according to those things to which all are bound, and thus it is exalted to the gift of science: or according to those things which do not oblige all, and thus it is exalted in the gift of counsel. But fear according as it is a gift of the Holy Spirit, does not follow any virtue principally: because it principally attends to the majesty which it reveres, because the highest act of fear is to revere: and because one [kind of fear] is initial, or servile, those are gifts according to the state of the receiver, and not according to the perfection of the holiness of the Spirit, nor according to conformity to Christ.

§ 42. But if you ask: Why does it not follow some virtue? It must be said that virtue according to itself orders toward an act. But a gift is added as a help to virtue: and therefore a certain one helps in the act, and a certain one helps according to the removal from the contrary on account of the reverence of God: and on that part fear helps, and therefore it does not follow any virtue properly, unless perhaps you wish to say general justice as to that part by which it is the declination from evil.

§ 43. But to that which is further asked concerning the beatitudes, I say that the beatitudes are higher perfections than virtue or gift. But beatitude is twofold, namely of the way (viae), and of the fatherland (patriae). The beatitude of the way is further twofold, namely of hope, and of reality (rei). It is called the beatitude of hope when someone is in a state in which he can hope for beatitude by formed hope which comes forth from grace and merits. But the beatitude of reality is a habit perfecting toward the acts of the highest state on the way, and not to one, but to one in comparison to all others. For it is well seen that beatitude is never in one except in comparison to all things which are of that genus. And through this the solution to all things which are objected concerning beatitude for the present is evident: because also concerning the beatitudes it is required elsewhere in a special tract.

§ 44. To the last thing which is asked concerning the fruits, I well concede that they are habits pertaining to the taste of the end, by the fact that they delight their possessors with a holy delight: and if virtue is taken properly, they are not virtues, as was said in the beginning of the solution. But taking virtue broadly, as was said in the preceding article, the Gloss calls them virtues. Nevertheless the tract concerning the fruits seeks a special disputation to be posited elsewhere.

Articulus 3 — On The Number Of The Gifts

§ 45. Article 3: Concerning the number of the gifts.

Concerning the number of the gifts.

Thirdly, it is asked concerning the number of the gifts.

§ 46. For it seems that there are only six: because 1. Fear, as was held, does not follow any virtue.

§ 47. 2. Also, it seems that there are more: because below the Master assigns four differences of fear: therefore it seems at least that there are ten.

§ 48. 3. Also, second perfections toward higher acts are multipliable into many things: therefore it seems that according to all these things gifts ought to be given.

§ 49. Solution. It must be said that a manifold division of the gifts can be assigned: but a threefold one suffices for the intention of this work, of which one is proper, which is according to objects, namely that a gift is either ordered against evil, or into the good. If in the first way, fear. But in the second way: either into the good which is the end, or which is toward the end. If in the first way: either through the mode of the true, and thus is understanding; or of the good, and thus is wisdom, called from savoring (sapore) more than from knowing (sapere). But if it is toward those things which are toward the end: either through the mode of executing, or of directing: and in each way doubly, namely in those things to which all are bound, and thus executing is piety, and directing is science; or to those things which not all [are bound], and thus executing is fortitude, and directing is counsel.

§ 50. And another multiplication is that a gift, as was held, is a perfection higher than a virtue. Therefore that "higher" is either taken from the part of the intellect, or of the affect. If the intellect: either according as it itself is into the end, or according as it itself is into those things which are toward the end. Into the end in two ways, namely as in motion into it, or as resting in it. If in the first way, thus is the gift of understanding, and therefore below it will be held that understanding is of invisible creatures through which one is moved into God. But in the second way is the gift of wisdom: as Augustine says, that it adheres to eternal things through taste. But if it is into those things which are toward the end, and higher than virtue: either that "higher" is taken from the part of that into which it directs, or from the part of the directing rationale. If in the first way: then it is counsel which directs into higher things than the virtue of prudence. But if from the part of the directing rationale: then it is science, which directs through divine principles in commonly operable things, since prudence directs through civil ones, as is evident from the aforesaid. But if from the part of the affect it is perfecting higher than virtue: either from the part of the end, or of that which is toward the end. If from the part of the end: then it cannot be from the part of goodness, because nothing orders higher into that than charity: nor from the part of charity, because there the gifts of the intellect perfect: therefore it will be from the part of goodness, power, and majesty, or excellence: and to that perfects the holy fear of the Lord enduring forever and ever: and the other fears (as will be evident below) are called gifts through respect to that one. But if it is according to those things which are toward the end, and higher than virtue; either in oneself, or in respect to the neighbor. If in oneself: then it cannot be in respect to innate love: because it does not have so much difficulty that it cannot be well contained by the perfection which is virtue: therefore it will be in respect to inflicted passion according to the state ordering to the sustaining of martyrdom: and then it will be the gift of fortitude, as was held. But if it is in respect to a good which is common and also in the neighbor, it cannot be through the mode of a debt, because this is ordinable enough by the perfection which is the virtue of justice: nor can it be in respect to a good, as charity loves the neighbor, because nothing is more perfect than charity: therefore it will be the force of benevolence to the image of God, and thus is the gift of piety. And this multiplication is proper according to the disputation held above concerning the gifts.

§ 52. The third multiplication belongs commonly to all the ancient Doctors, and it is very good, namely that the number of the gifts should be taken according to the perfection of the twofold life. And thus the contemplative life indeed is perfected by sight and taste: and sight shows what is to be tasted, and as to sight it is understanding, and as to taste it is savoring wisdom. For just as the Philosopher says, savor is a sequel of the complexion: and therefore it is necessary to penetrate the nature of a thing through taste. But if it is concerning the perfection of the active [life]: either according to the rectification of the directing reason, or according to the executing affect. In the first way: either in those things to which not all are bound, and then it is counsel; or it is according to the rationale of those things to which all are bound, and then it is science. But if it is in the executing affect: either away from evil, or into the good. In the first way, fear. In the second way: either toward those things to which all are bound, or toward those things to which not all are bound. In the first way is fortitude; in the second way piety.

§ 53. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that it is true that fear does not follow any virtue according as it is a gift: and nevertheless it is a higher perfection than a virtue: and I say this concerning the fear of reverence, which has the first rationale of fear as a gift. But from this it does not follow that it is not a gift: and the rationale of this is evident from the things said above: because a theological virtue on that part is less imperfect by which it is into majesty: and the rationale of that imperfection is: because the proper definition of a virtue is toward an act into something determinate either concerning the end, or concerning those things which are toward the end. But majesty cannot be the object of an act which tends into majesty: but rather everything that is recoils from it: and therefore none of the virtues could be in respect to it: but a gift does not necessarily posit such an act, but it suffices that it be a higher perfection than a virtue in whatever way, whether through a tending act or through a recoiling venerating and honoring majesty.

§ 54. To the other it must be said that although below four fears or six or two are touched upon according to diverse divisions, one alone is the fear primarily and through itself called the gift of fear, namely the one which filled Christ: and that is the fear enduring forever and ever, and the others are called gifts through comparison to that one.

§ 55. To the last it must be said that higher perfections in habits respecting singular acts in a genus are not multipliable further than has been said. But habits perfecting according to the highest state, and not existing in one thing, but in one thing in comparison to the use of others, are perfections and multipliable according to eight differences, as the beatitudes of the way: or according to the twelve fruits of the spirit, concerning which the Apostle speaks in Galatians 5:22 and 23.

Articulus 4 — On The Order And Combination Of The Gifts

§ 56. Article 4: Concerning the order and combination of the gifts.

Concerning the order and combination of the gifts.

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the order and combination of the gifts.

§ 57. For it seems that the order is touched upon badly: because 1. First is to withdraw from evil, and afterwards to advance into the good: but in the advance into the good the way occurs prior to the end, and on the way the common perfection of the commandments occurs prior to that of the counsels: therefore it seems that fear is first, and so concerning the others according to a converse order than they are numbered by Isaiah.

§ 2. Again, why is none combined with fear, since all the other gifts have a combination of one ruling and another executing?

§ 3. Again, a certain Gloss says that wisdom rules the intellect: therefore it is asked, how is this so?

Again, since in the others the ruling one precedes, if wisdom rules, then it seems that it ought to be placed before the intellect, so that the intellect is at the extreme.

Besides, it seems false that it rules: because ruling belongs to the intellect and reason, and not to affection; but wisdom is in the affection through savor: therefore it ought to be ruled, not ruling, as it seems.

Solution: It must be said that the order in the gifts is twofold, namely according as they are in us, or according as they are from the Holy Spirit giving them. If according as they are in us: then the first objection holds, and that is the order of the genus of their acts, although they are infused simultaneously in habit. But in the second way, wisdom is closer according to reason than intellect, and thus of the others; and thus they are enumerated by Isaiah[288].

To the next, it must be said that fear signifies a springing back or a flight, and for this it does not need its own ruling principle, but a common one: just as the motion of flight itself is not so that it persists in flight, but rather so that it is converted to the good; and therefore the one ruling the motion toward the good, that will be the rule in flight. And therefore fear receives its rule from the ruling principle of the others, whether it is chaste or initial: but chaste fear receives it from the intellect and from wisdom, whereas initial fear from knowledge and counsel.

To the next, it must be said that intellect simply, as it seems to me, rules, and wisdom in a certain way: just as certain animals follow odors, and the perception of odor rules them on the way, and their sight rather follows upon smell than conversely, so wisdom through the taste of divine sweetness rectifies the intellect according to something, so that what it tastes is more frequently reiterated around it: and according to this a certain Gloss on Isaiah speaks. However, some Doctors concede that wisdom simply rules, but the intellect relatively.

And because treating of fear, etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the gifts themselves specifically: and he treats in the following distinction of the other gifts pertaining to the perfection of the intellect or reason, there, Distinction 35, A, After the aforesaid diligently, etc.

That part which is entirely about the gift of fear is subdivided into three parts: in the first of which he sets down the division of fear. In the second, he sets down Augustine's definition, long indeed in words, and short in meaning, concerning the contrariety of David and John: one of whom says fear remains forever and ever, but the other says it does not remain in charity, there, G, But there is another opinion, etc. In the third, he objects according to what rationale fear was or was not, there, K, That also diligently, etc.

Articulus 5 — How These Gifts Are In Christ And In The Angels

How are these gifts in Christ and in the Angels?

How are these gifts in Christ and in the holy Angels?

Fifth and lastly it is asked, How are these gifts in Christ and in the holy Angels?

For it seems that they were not in them: because § 1. It will be held below that fear is born from faith: but faith is not in Christ and in the holy Angels: therefore neither is fear.

§ 2. Again, he who cannot do evil does not need to have a fear that makes him flee evil; but Christ and the holy Angels cannot do evil: therefore they do not need to have a perfecting habit for this.

§ 3. Again, it belongs to fortitude to sustain dangers: but in the homeland there will be no dangers: therefore it seems that the gift of fortitude will not remain in the homeland.

§ 4. Again, knowledge teaches how to converse well in the midst of a depraved and perverse nation: and there will be none of these in heaven: therefore there will be no knowledge there.

Again, the Master said above that knowledge will be evacuated: therefore there cannot be the gift of knowledge in the Angels.

§ 5. Again, Damascene says that counsel is concerning doubtful things. But Christ doubted nothing: therefore He did not have the gift of counsel: therefore all these gifts are not now possessed by the holy Angels and by Christ.

Which is against the text.

Again, to the contrary is what Gregory says on that text of Job 38:31: Will you be able to join together the shining stars the Pleiades? There he seems to say that no one joins together these gifts of wisdom except Christ: therefore they were and are in Christ: therefore also in the other comprehenders.

But there again a question arises: because if no one joined them except Him alone, then when one is not had, [not] all are had: therefore they are not infused simultaneously. But the contrary of this will be held below.

Again it is asked beside this, why does he specifically say that the spirit of the fear of the Lord filled him, rather than another gift?

Solution: It must be said that these gifts are in the homeland more fully with respect to use than on the way, and they are, will be, and always were most fully in Christ.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that faith generates servile fear; and of this it is not said primarily and principally that it is a gift of the Holy Spirit: because this is said only of chaste fear; and this latter better arises from open cognition than from faith.

To the next, it must be said that that objection proceeds as if chaste fear fled evil; and this is not true, but rather springing back in itself, it reveres majesty.

To the next, it must be said that of the gift of fortitude, just as of the other virtue of fortitude, there is one act in the homeland, another on the way: for in the homeland it has it to adhere most firmly to the first fortitude comforting all things, as Augustine said above concerning the virtue of fortitude.

To the next, it must be said that knowledge is called a light sent forth by the Holy Spirit: and its use on the way is to know how to converse, etc.; but in the homeland it is not so, but rather to intuit the rationale of justice in the act of reason of all operable things.

288. St. Bernard of Clairvaux, De consideratione ad Eugenium, Bk. I, ch. 11.

To the next, it must be said that counsel is not spoken of here from him who seeks it, but from him who gives it: because he does not doubt, but rather the abundance of discretion dissolves doubts and certifies and makes light in the ways, namely by the Holy Spirit.

To the next, it must be said that Christ alone joined them together as regards the most excellent uses in work: but other holy ones join them in habit.

To the next, it must be said that Christ is said to be filled with fear, because taking the form of a servant, He revered the Father, giving us an example in this, so that we may follow His footsteps, rather than in knowledge, or wisdom, or any others: because reverence causes all other good things to be done, and evil things to be avoided; for he who is without fear cannot be justified.

Articulus 6 — What Fear Is

What is fear?

What is fear?

But here concerning fear in general it must first be asked, what is it? Secondly, concerning the division of fear. Thirdly, whether it can be a gift in any rationale? Fourthly, concerning the individual dividing parts.

To the first, the definition of Damascene can be taken: Fear is a desire moving according to systole.

For this definition is true according to him both of natural and of unnatural fear: therefore it seems that fear is a certain desire; but since it belongs to love to desire, it seems that fear is love.

This seems true, § 1. Through Augustine in book XIV On the Trinity, who says that love longing to have what is loved, is cupidity; but having it and enjoying it, is joy; but fleeing what is adverse to it, is fear: therefore fear is love fleeing what is adverse to it.

§ 2. Again, it seems to be held through Augustine, where he says on that text: The hireling flees, Fear is the flight of the mind lest it lose what it loves.

§ 3. Again, it seems that fear ought not to be defined through flight: because flight speaks of nothing but a turning to oneself, or a yielding from that which is feared; but the fear of the Lord does not teach departing from the Lord: therefore the fear of the Lord is not to be defined through flight.

§ 4. Afterwards, what is it that he says, through systole? He himself expounds it, that is, according to contraction. But this seems to belong to some sensible part; but we are asking about the fear of spirits, which also belongs to the Angels.

§ 5. Again, it does not suit a spirit to be moved according to systole: therefore it seems that fear does not suit spiritual substances; since therefore all the gifts are in the Angels, as was held earlier, fear does not seem to be well defined according to that definition.

Solution: It must be said that these disputations are of little worth, and are easy: and therefore one must not linger long on them. It must be said, therefore, that fear is posited in a twofold genus, namely of passion, and of habit: and according as it is in the genus of passion, it is defined by Augustine and Damascene. But according as it is in the genus of habit, thus it has an act which is to revere, and out of reverence to flee certain things which are contrary to what it reveres. And through this the solution to almost the whole is clear.

To the FIRST therefore and the second there is one solution: because those things are said of fear which is in the genus of passion; which nevertheless is not essentially love, but is caused by love; and therefore those statements of Damascene and Augustine are understood through the cause, so that the sense is: Fear is the love of a thing, that is, it is caused by love.

To the next, it must be said that fear which is in the genus of habit does not fear and flee the same thing: because its act is principally to revere, and accidentally to flee: and therefore it rises up into the same thing that it reveres, but flees from the contrary.

To the next two the solution is already clear: because the systole in the motion of that fear which is a habit and a gift is not in the constriction of the heart, or of a sensible part, but rather a springing back from majesty into the recognition of its own smallness, so that from this it may rise up into the reverence of Him who is great over us; and this systole is well in the Angels and the saints and the blessed.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Division Of Fear In The Text By The Master Is Well Assigned

Whether the division of fear in the Text by the Master is well assigned?

Secondly, it is asked concerning the division of fear. For the Master posits two in the Text: first a four-membered one, namely that fear is mundane or human, servile, initial, and chaste. But it seems to be insufficient: because

§ 1. Mundane and human fear are two genera of fear: one is a superfluous fear of the things of this world, and the other is a superfluous fear of one's own body; and one is born from love of oneself, and the other from love of the world.

§ 2. Again, natural fear is not posited here: therefore it seems that there are six.

§ 3. Again, a son, a friend, and a spouse do not fear the same thing: because a son fears reverently, a friend fears a dissonance of wills, a spouse fears a delay of embraces: therefore it seems that chaste fear is divided into five fears.

§ 4. Again, since there is a state of incipient, proficient, and perfect chastity: it seems that just as one fear is taken according to the first and the last, so one ought to be taken according to the middle: and this is posited by no one: therefore the division is not sufficient.

Again, it is objected concerning the division of Bede, which was held in the preceding chapter, that there are two genera of fear, namely servile and friendly: therefore either Bede is deficient, or Cassiodorus is superfluous.

Again, Damascenus gives a division having six members, none of which is any of the enumerated members. For he says there are six genera of fear, namely shrinking [erubescentia], sluggishness [segnities], shame [verecundia], admiration [admiratio], stupor [stupor], and agony [agonia]. Accordingly, sluggishness is the fear of future operation. Shrinking is fear in the expectation of reproach. Shame is fear in a base act. Stupor is fear in an unaccustomed imagination. Agony is fear through a misfortune of chance.

Again, Damascene in Book II, speaking of the fears of Christ, divides fear into natural systole and irrational systole.

Since therefore there are so many genera of fear, it is asked, according to what is the division of them taken?

Besides, it seems that there ought to be no division: because the Philosopher says that if one of opposites is spoken of in many ways, so is the other; but hope is not divided in many ways: since therefore hope is opposed to fear, it seems that neither is fear.

Solution: It must be said that he means this, that hope is opposed to fear according as it is in the genus of passion, and not of habit; and in as many ways as fear is spoken of in the genus of passion, in so many ways is hope in the genus of passion. But in a genus in which it has no opposition, neither hope nor anything else except to suffer, it is not necessary that a division be taken according to the opposition of hope. But that hope and joy are spoken of in many ways in the genus of passion according to the expectation of a natural good or a concupiscible one in sense, is clear through the sayings of the Saints who curse those who place their hope in nothing, as is clear above in the tractate on hope.

These things being held, it must be said to the first division that it is given concerning fear in common, and according as it is related by analogy to passion and habit; and therefore he takes mundane and servile in the division, which I think are passions; and initial and chaste, which I think are habits.

To the first that is objected, it must be said that he does not consider mundane and human, except insofar as they are opposed to the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and in this respect they are of one rationale, according as they serve with the world: yet in themselves they have a division, as was objected.

To the next, it must be said that natural fear is neither good nor bad: but he himself by the division does not intend to take any except that which is a gift, and its opposite.

To the next, it must be said that spousal and friendly or filial fear do not differ in the state of charity, nor in the proper act which is to revere; and therefore they are posited as one, and are one fear; but they differ perhaps accidentally in the things which they fear according to rationale: yet they agree in this, that they all fear separation from God, although under one or another rationale accidentally, namely from a spouse, or from a father, or a friend; and this does not make diverse species of fear.

To the next, it must be said that the middle state of charity does not have a fear diverse from initial fear: because initial is that which still has something of the anxiety of punishment and the doubt of perfection: and therefore the same fear accompanies those two states of charity, in which there is no perfection.

But that division is taken thus: because fear is either a gift, or it is opposed to a gift. If opposed, thus it is mundane or human. If a gift: either with the opposite of the gift, or not with the opposite. If with the opposite, then it is servile. If not with the opposite: either according to the perfected in grace, and then it is initial; or according to the state in perfection, and then it is filial.

But the division of Bede only divides that which is a gift in genus, namely into that which is with the opposite of the gift, or with the Holy Spirit—which is what some say in other words, into that which is from the Holy Spirit, and not with the Holy Spirit, and this is servile; and into that which is from the Holy Spirit and with the Holy Spirit, and this is initial and chaste.

But the division of Damascene is given concerning fear as it is a passion: and then it is either with respect to evil, or with respect to something great. If of evil: either of the evil of punishment in itself, or of punishment in order to fault. If of the evil of punishment in itself: either in a difficult work which is above our power, and this is the fear which is called sluggishness; or which is not in a work nor from nature, but from fortune and chance accidentally, and this is agony. If with respect to the evil of punishment in order to fault: either a fault which is, and then it is shame in a base act perpetrated, for which a man expects reproach; or a fault which is not, but can be, and with respect to that it is shrinking. If it is with respect to something great: then it is a springing back into one's own smallness: either therefore it is into what we are not able by knowing and working, and then it is admiration; or such that we spring back from it because it is unaccustomed, and then it is stupor.

To the next, it must be said that Damascene divides fear there as a passion only into natural fear contracted from vice, so that he may show that natural fear was in Christ, and not unnatural.

Articulus 8 — Whether Fear Is A Gift

Whether fear is a gift?

Thirdly it is asked, whether fear is a gift?

And it seems that it is not: because § 1. Other passions with fear, such as joy, and hope, and sadness, or sorrow, are not gifts: therefore neither is fear.

§ 2. Again, a gift is given for higher acts, as was said above: but to fear is an act of weakness: therefore it seems that it is not a gift.

§ 3. Again, a gift is given as a help to the powers against a defect, as Gregory seems to mean: but to fear does not signify a help, but rather the destruction of a help: therefore it seems that fear is not a gift.

§ 4. Again, for every nature which can be harmed, the punishment itself is sufficient per se for fearing: therefore also human nature: therefore it does not need any gift for this, that it may fear.

Beside this it is asked, since there are four natural passions, namely joy, sadness or sorrow, and hope, and fear, why does one fall into the rationale of a gift, and another into the rationale of the act of a sacrament, like sadness or sorrow; and a third into the rationale of a fruit, like joy; and a fourth into the rationale of a virtue, like hope?

Again, why does none of these communicate with a political virtue in name?

Solution: It must be said that fear, as was held earlier, is said equivocally of passion and gift. But why it agrees in name with passion by analogy, is stated below. Through this the solution to the first is clear.

To the next, it must be said that fear as a gift is spoken of in many ways. Sometimes it is taken according to what is properly a gift, and then it is considered according to the most perfect state in which fear is in the greatest and best state; and thus it was in Christ, and in the Angels: and this fear has another act which is to revere. But sometimes it is considered according as it is generated by something at least which is above nature, and yet has the act of fleeing evil, the cause of which is present or can be present; and in this way it is called servile or initial fear: and this is of imperfection and is evacuated: and in this way it is not primarily called a gift, but consequently and secondarily. And therefore that gifts are of a higher act, is understood of the gifts according to the best state of the gifts.

To the next, it must be said that to fear reverently does not destroy the power to fear servilely or initially at least: therefore the generator of fear also elevates the power; because the generator of servile fear is faith, which is above nature; and the generator of initial fear is faith working through love: but to fear naturally or mundanely is a sign of a destitute power.

To the next, it must be said that nature is sufficient to fear a harmful injury imminent to itself; but the punishment of hell or sin are not known by one fearing servilely or initially, except by that which is beyond nature, because only faith shows them.

To the next, it must be said that each of those four is spoken of by analogy: because fear is always in the systole of the heart and flight; but the things by which it flees are not of the same rationale. For to flee natural evils does not need a habit: because deficient nature per se suffices for the flight of them. Besides, it is not of perfection according to the rationale of the good to flee such evils: and therefore it does not further need a habit for this. But to flee majesty by a springing back into one's own smallness and the exhibition of honor is indeed a flight, but it is not of one rationale with the flight of evil. Similarly, to flee the evil of fault on account of the evil of separation from God which follows the fault, and this on account of the reverence by which one reveres God: again is of another rationale. Similarly to flee the act of sin on account of the punishment of hell is as regards the generator of another rationale. Whence only fleeing according to analogy regards the perfect state according to the act of reverence. But joy does not signify a perfect act, but rather a womanish passion: because as Augustine says, Joy is a certain diffusion of the mind in the taste or conjunction of the good: and therefore it sounds in fruit: because we enjoy these known things, as Augustine says, in which the will per se being delighted rests. But sorrow does not signify an act, but rather an afflicting passion: and therefore it does not take the order of a virtue or a fruit or a gift: because a virtue or a gift wishes to have perfection according to a common act, and a fruit according to the womanishness of passion wishes to have sweetness: and sadness or sorrow is not proportioned to this: but it receives the order of sacramental grace, because by voluntary afflictions satisfaction is made for sins. But hope is imperfect with respect to the good: because it signifies expectation, and expectation and being stretched out into the expected do not signify an act of greater perfection than a virtue: because since nature per se expects a reward, what is added to it is the stretching out into the thing hoped for: and therefore a gift does not correspond to hope either, as was said earlier.

To the next, it must be said that none of these communicates with a political virtue: because those virtues are towards determinate matter, such as temperance and fortitude: and therefore the acts of those mediate in these passions, and therefore they cannot agree with them in name.

Articulus 9 — Whether Servile Fear Is Good Or Evil, And, Whether To Fear Servilely Is Good, And, Whether Initial Fear Is The Same As Servile And Chaste Fear, And, Whether That Remains Forever, And, Why It Is More Easily Called Amicable

Whether servile fear is good or bad? and, Whether to fear servilely is good? and, Whether initial fear is the same as servile and chaste fear? and, Whether it remains forever and ever? and, Why is chaste fear called friendly?

Whether servile fear is good or bad? and, Whether to fear servilely is good? and, Whether initial fear is the same as servile and chaste fear? and, Whether it remains forever and ever? and, Why is chaste fear called friendly?

Fourthly, it is asked concerning the individual fears which have the name of a gift.

And let it be asked first concerning servile fear, whether it is good, or bad?

It seems that it is good: because § 1. It is a gift of God, as the Master says: and every gift of God is good: therefore it is good.

§ 2. Again, in the Text it is said that it is useful: and every useful thing is good: therefore servile fear is good.

§ 3. Again, in the Text it says that it introduces wisdom and charity: but everything that introduces charity is good: therefore, etc.

§ 4. Again, it teaches to flee the act of sin: but to be such is good: therefore, etc.

§ 5. Again, that whose generation is good, is itself good: but the generator of servile fear, namely unformed faith, is good: therefore, etc.

This could also be proved by many other reasons from the Text.

ON THE CONTRARY it seems to be § 1. What Gregory says, that when punishment is so feared that the face of the judge is not loved, the fear is rather from trembling, than from charity; but servile fear so fears punishment, that it does not love the face of the judge: therefore it is from trembling: but nothing that proceeds from trembling is good: therefore servile fear is not good.

§ 2. Again, on that text of Psalm 30:2: In you, O Lord, I have hoped, the Gloss says that to hope is from God, and is a gift of God; but what you fear is from yourself: therefore it seems that it cannot be a gift: because a gift is an irreddible giving, and what we have from ourselves is not given to us: therefore neither is it good: because as Augustine says, Every good of ours is from God[289]De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, ch. 6, n. 15..

§ 3. Again, in the Text it is said that in servile fear the will of sinning lives, and the work would follow if impunity were hoped for: but nothing is good in which the will of sinning lives: therefore servile fear is not good.

Again it is asked, Whether to fear servilely is good?

And it seems that it is not: because Augustine says in the Text that one fearing servilely does not do well, even if what he does is good: therefore to fear servilely takes away the rationale of good even from that which is good: but whatever takes away the rationale of good from the good is evil: therefore, etc.

Besides, one good well comparts itself with another good: but to fear servilely does not compart itself with another good of grace making pleasing: therefore, etc.

Again, it is further asked concerning initial fear, whether it is one with servile fear?

And it seems that it is: because § 1. Of one object according to rationale there is one act: but eternal punishment is one object of flight according to rationale: and this is fled by servile and initial fear: therefore it seems that it is one fear.

§ 2. If perhaps you say that it is not, because servile fear is with mortal sin, and initial is not: this does not seem to impede it, because unformed faith also, which generates servile fear, is with mortal sin: and yet it, according to the Master above, is made the same with formed faith: therefore it seems that it is similarly with servile and initial fear, that the servile is formed by the initial.

Again, from the other side it is asked, Whether initial fear is the same as chaste fear?

And it seems that it is: because § 1. Just as perfect and imperfect charity differ, so initial and chaste fear differ: but perfect and imperfect charity do not differ in substance: therefore neither do initial and chaste fear.

§ 2. Again, initial fear is cast out by perfect charity, either by reason of substance, or of the accident which is to have punishment. If by reason of substance: then initial fear and charity would have contrariety by reason of substance, which is false, since they comport with each other in the same person, and one is the beginning of the other. But if by reason of the accident, which is to have punishment: then the substance remains in chaste fear: therefore it is substantially the same and differs accidentally.

§ 3. Again, chaste and initial fear have an eye to the same thing, namely to possible separation: and both are caused by love: therefore since habits are distinguished by their objects, it seems that they are the same fear.

But against this it seems to be: because § 1. If initial is the same as servile, as seemed to be proved earlier, and initial is the same as chaste: then servile is the same as chaste: and no one says this, since chaste remains forever and ever, and servile is cast out by charity.

§ 2. Again, it seems that initial is not the same as chaste either: for the evacuatable and the permanent forever and ever cannot be the same: but initial fear is evacuatable in this life by perfect charity: therefore it is not the same as chaste fear which remains forever and ever, as it seems.

§ 3. Again, having an eye to punishment, and having an eye to separation, are not moved by the same object according to rationale; but chaste fear has an eye only to separation, initial fear has an eye only to punishment: therefore they are not of the same nature.

FURTHER it is asked concerning chaste fear, whether it remains forever and ever?

And it seems that it does not: because on that text of Psalm 104:11: Let my heart rejoice, etc., the Gloss says that in human fear the cause of danger precedes, but it follows in initial fear, and each fear is mixed with hope: but in the future there will not be fear, but perfect joy: therefore it seems that fear will not be in the future.

But against this is that § 1. Christ was filled with fear, and the holy Angels: since therefore nothing imperfect was in Christ, fear is not an imperfect thing: but every perfect thing will be in the homeland: therefore fear will be there.

FURTHER here it is asked, why is chaste fear called friendly, and chaste, and filial?

Solution: It must be said to the first, that servile fear is a gift of God, and is good, and useful: but "gift of God" is taking "gift" generally of all things that are given by God, and are above nature for ordering life into the good of grace: therefore just as unformed faith is a gift of God, so also servile fear is a gift of God. But it is good: because it removes from the act of sin through this that it is fear, because it flees the act of sin. But it is useful: because it introduces charity: for by gradually receding from the act of sin, the pleasing of sin is also removed, and the love of God is introduced.

To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not from fear through this that it is fear, but through this that it is servile. And for understanding this it must be noted that servile fear is spoken of in two ways, namely from the condition of servitude, because one is a servant: and from the property of a servant, because by serving he still feels the punishment of a servant, not the liberty of the justice of sons. In the first way it is properly called servile: because one thus fearing is still a servant of sin: and with respect to this Gregory says that it is from fear, and that in him the will of sinning lives...

§ 1. [the] will: and not simply insofar as it is a fear fleeing evil. But in the second way initial fear is called servile in the Text, because it still feels punishment, as will be said below.

§ 2. And through this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 3. To the next it must be said, that to fear servilely, insofar as it is to fear, is good.

§ 4. But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said through two reasons, that this belongs to fear accidentally on the part of its servility: and that [servility] is not from God, nor is it a gift of God, nor is it good.

§ 5. But to what is further asked about initial fear, it must be said without prejudice [to a better judgment], that servile and initial fear are not the same in substance.

§ 6. But to the first that is objected to the contrary, it must be said that they do not have the same first and proximate mover: because servile fear immediately looks to eternal punishment: and there the cause of flight is principally that, and not the love of the kingdom from which one would be separated: and therefore it does not proceed from gratuitous fear, but rather from the natural love of one's own good: but initial fear is not properly moved by punishments immediately, but rather by separation from the kingdom, and consequently by punishments: because it is necessary that he who is separated from the kingdom be punished in hell: and it arises from the gratuitous love of the heavenly kingdom. And therefore the first objection does not proceed, except concerning what moves consequently in initial fear.

§ 7. To the next it must be said, that there is no similarity: because unformed faith is immediately about all the same things that formed faith is about, although it does not tend [to them] as formed faith does: and it is already clear that servile fear and initial fear are not immediately moved by the same thing, nor on the part of the affection is it caused by a love of the same nature, although on the part of the intellect it is caused by faith, just as initial fear is.

§ 8. To what is asked lastly, Whether initial fear is the same as chaste fear? I think it must be answered that they are substantially the same, and they differ accidentally, namely because initial fear has a punishment which chaste fear does not have, by reason of which it is even called servile by Augustine in the Text: and it has a threefold punishment, namely the anguish of conscience from the fear of insufficient satisfaction for past sin, and the fear of still-infesting temptation, lest perhaps one day it cast him down: and the solicitude of doubt, whether perhaps God despises his service. This threefold punishment is continually evacuated more and more through charity: and then it itself is made chaste through the purification of that penal quality.

§ 9. But to what is first objected to the contrary, the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ 10. To the next it must be said, that it is not evacuated substantially, but rather purified: and as to this it is said to be cast out by charity.

§ 11. To the next it must be said, that initial fear does not immediately have its eye on punishment, but on the separation which is still possible to happen through sin: and therefore it does not look to punishment, except consequently: and this happens to it because of the state in which it is with imperfect charity, just as chaste fear has one act in the present life [on the way], and another in the homeland [in heaven].

§ 12. To what is further asked, Whether chaste fear remains forever? It must be said that it does: but in another act, as was said above in the question on the gifts in general.

§ 13. But to what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that he is speaking of fear according as it has punishment: because thus it is contrary to joyousness.

§ 14. To the last it must be said, that fear is called amicable [friendly] according to the conformity of the will to the lord: because a friend flees those things which would make the will nonconforming: because, as Cicero says, It belongs to friends to will the same thing, and to reject the same thing: but it is filial through the act of reverence and the flight from those things which show an act to be of irreverence to so great a father: but it is chaste from the property of a spouse, who fears nothing except what separates from the embrace.

DISTINCTIO XXXV

Divisio Textus

§ 15. After the premises one must diligently consider, etc.

§ 16. In this part he treats of the difference of the gifts which are in the soul according to the intellect. And the intention of this distinction turns upon five things: in the first of which he distinguishes between wisdom and knowledge. In the second, between wisdom and understanding, there, B, § 1: The difference having been shown, etc. In the third, he similarly distinguishes between wisdom and knowledge and understanding, there, B, § 2: Thus therefore it can be distinguished, etc. In the fourth, he distinguishes between wisdom and knowledge and understanding as gifts, and the same according as they are habits acquired through study and not gifts, according to how gifts are understood here, there, C, And it must be noted, etc. Fifth and lastly, between wisdom as a gift of God, and divine wisdom, there, D, That also must be known, etc.

Articulus 1 — What Wisdom Is

What is wisdom?

§ 17. Concerning the first, two things are asked, namely about wisdom, and knowledge.

§ 18. About wisdom, three things are asked: of which the first is, What is it? Second, What is it about? Third, about the distinction of wisdom from the gifts of understanding and knowledge and counsel.

§ 19. Concerning the first it is objected by accepting the definition of Augustine in the Text about wisdom. But in the Text it is this, that wisdom is the cognition of divine things.

§ 20. Also from the Text this is drawn: Wisdom is in the cognition and love of that which always and unchangeably remains, which is God.

§ 21. But from Gregory this is accepted: Wisdom is a gift refreshing the mind with the hope and certitude of eternal things.

§ 22. But it is objected against the first: because 1. It seems that wisdom is the same as faith: because faith is the cognition of divine things, as was held above: because in all the articles nothing is cognized except divine truth: therefore it seems that faith is wisdom. 2. If perhaps you say, that wisdom is about eternal things without a medium, but faith with a medium, because through a mirror and in an enigma: this is nothing: because wisdom is a gift which is had on the way, and on the way no cognition of God is had without a medium.

§ 23. If perhaps you say, that wisdom is in the affection, and faith in the intellect alone: it does not seem to be true: because if faith were in the intellect alone, it would not be a virtue, as was proved above: therefore it seems that wisdom and faith differ in nothing.

§ 24. But if you say, that it happens that God is cognized in three ways on the way, namely in a vestige, in the image of the soul, and in the likeness of grace, according as likeness means the beautification of the image through the apposition of grace: it seems that this is nothing: for faith is of God in a mirror: but a clear and a clearer thing in a mirror do not substantially diversify the vestige as well.

§ 25. 3. Also, it happens that someone in mortal sin cognizes in the image of the soul and the likeness of grace, not in himself, but in others: and yet he has no gift of sanctifying grace: therefore that cognition in him is of unformed faith: therefore this does not belong to wisdom and understanding.

§ 26. 4. Also, to the same knowable object it happens that one has many mediums, speaking topically, as is clear through the locus from genus, from case, from whole, and thus of others: and yet the habit is not diversified by such things: therefore it seems that neither vestige, nor image, nor likeness can make a diversity of habits: and thus it will not belong to faith to cognize through a vestige, and to understanding through an image, and to wisdom through a likeness.

§ 27. 5. Also, the definition seems not to convert: for the cognition of divine things is had by many, who nevertheless do not have the Holy Spirit. Since therefore the Holy Spirit is always had with His gifts, and especially with the gift of wisdom, it seems that the cognition of divine things is not always the gift of wisdom.

§ 28. Also, it is asked about the second, which is also drawn from the Text, that wisdom is in the love and cognition of that which always and unchangeably is. According to this it seems that: 1. Wisdom is a habit composed out of the cognition of faith and the love of charity: and this cannot be, because habits cannot be so mixed together, or composed, that two make a third. 2. Also, from two virtues nothing is constituted except a virtue: therefore even if they could be mixed together, they would not seem to constitute a gift, but rather a virtue. 3. Also, concerning this it is objected that in the same place he says, wisdom is worship: which is called latria: because worship is referred rather to justice, than to a gift, as was proved above, when it was asked about latria: therefore what he says, that wisdom is worship, seems to be nothing.

§ 29. Furthermore it is asked about the third: because 1. To refresh is proper rather to a fruit, than to a gift, as was held above: therefore it ought not to be defined by refreshing. 2. Also, hope and certitude belong to faith and hope: since therefore refreshment belongs more to charity, than to faith, or hope, it seems that in the definition of wisdom charity ought rather to be posited than hope, or the certitude of faith.

§ 30. Moreover it is asked, Since of one thing there is one definition, according to what are so many definitions given?

§ 31. Solution. To this last it must be said, that the first respects the matter around which wisdom is, according as it is in the genus of cognition: because it is not placed in one genus, but in diverse ones. Therefore the second will respect those things which are placed in the genus of affection, which are cognition and love, that is, the love of what is cognized, which is proper to the intellect and affection, and not only to affection alone, just as charity is in simple affection. But the third is given according to the affection following the gift itself: and therefore this does not express the substance of wisdom, but its proper operation.

§ 32. To the first therefore it must be said, that wisdom is not the same as faith, although it is about the same things: for it is another light. Whence just as it was said above about faith, that it is a certain light under which the articles are seen: so it must be said here, that wisdom is a certain light of divine things under which divine things are seen and tasted through experience. Whence the gift of wisdom is properly the taste of God in gifts, as Dionysius seems to say of Hierotheus, that by suffering and experiencing and tasting divine things, he learned divine things. Therefore the light shining and warming towards such knowledge of divine things through the taste of God in gifts without which He Himself is not, is called, in my judgment, the gift of wisdom. And through this it is clear, that it is not faith: because in faith God is not tasted in gifts without which He Himself is not.

§ 33. To the next it must be said, that although wisdom is cognition through a medium, yet that medium has more than a mirror and an enigma: because it itself is a gift of sanctity similar to the first goodness, received in the mode of truth, or conversely the likeness of truth in the mode of goodness, for the reason that wisdom illuminates and kindles, and thus it belongs to truth and goodness, according as one is in the other, namely truth in goodness, and goodness in truth.

§ 34. To the next it must be said, that for wisdom the cognition of God in a likeness does not suffice, unless taste is also present, as has been held: and then through taste and a fuller light it is separated from faith: because faith only assents, and receives the gift insofar as it is an emanation of divine goodness containing the sweetness of God.

§ 35. Through this also the solution to the following is clear: because such cognition is not through the experience of taste, nor through a light causing one to experience.

§ 36. To the next it must be said, that that [cognition] which many have, is a speculative cognition, and a habit acquired through doctrine and study, and not a light making an experience of the sweetness of God in His gifts, in which He sanctifies the soul.

§ 37. To the second it must be said, that wisdom is not a habit composed out of cognition and love, but rather it is a light having its proper act according to itself: but Augustine speaks there as regards appropriation, because it has something of cognition and of love: and therefore it is not without those as disposing the intellect, although it is not those, but rather a perfection consequent upon both.

§ 38. To the next it must be said, that this would be true, if we were to say that wisdom is composed out of the composition of cognition and love: but we do not say this, because that habit thus composed, would be nothing but the love of what is cognized: and wisdom does not consist in this, which is rather the taste of the sweetness of what is cognized in a gift of sanctity perceived from God.

§ 39. To the next it must be said, that wisdom is not worship formally, but materially: because namely it is referred to worship, as was said above about faith and charity: because any virtue whatsoever can be referred to the profession of divine worship.

§ 40. To what is objected about the third, it must be said that refreshment, which is the rest of the appetite, is proper to a fruit: but it is refreshment as if through flavor and odor, and not through the touch of the substance: and this incites to a higher progress, and this belongs to the highest gift, namely of wisdom: and therefore the wise man progresses in cognition: but the one enjoying rests in what is cognized.

§ 41. To the next it must be said, that hope and faith are dispositions on the way to taste. But charity perfects the fruit even of the homeland: and therefore in the taste of wisdom mention is made more of the disposition, than of that which does not dispose, but perfects [the ability to] truly enjoy.

Articulus 2 — Whether Wisdom, As A Gift, Is Only Of Eternal Things

Is wisdom as a gift only about eternal things?

§ 42. Secondly it is asked, What is it about?

§ 43. For it seems, that it is about all things: because 1. Solomon says: A wise man hearing, will be wiser therefore it is through hearing: since therefore hearing is through those things which are signs of all things, as the Philosopher maintains, it seems wisdom is about all things. 2. Also, the Philosopher seems to say, that the wise man inquires to cognize the reason of any thing as it is: but this is about everything: therefore it seems, that wisdom is not only of divine things. 3. Also, in the first book of the Metaphysics he seems to posit certain definitions of wisdom, from which it cannot be held that it is only about divine things. For he says thus, We suppose therefore that the wise man knows all things as is fitting, not according to each one having knowledge of them. Therefore the wise man will be knowing a being through the proper nature of each thing, by which it belongs to it through itself, and not according to each of its individuals, because this is to know accidentally: but this belongs to many non-divine things, as to all demonstrative things, about which are the doctrinal sciences. 4. Also, the Philosopher, We suppose again thus that the wise man cognizes difficult things, and not to cognize easy things, etc: but thus wisdom would be about all metaphysical things, whose principles are most difficult for man to cognize, because through being and definitive reason they recede from sense and image, through which man receives knowledge: and again wisdom would not be only about divine things, which are God Himself. 5. Also, the Philosopher in the same place, Furthermore we suppose that the more certain and most learned knowledge of all causes is the wiser. Therefore it seems, that in no way is wisdom about divine things only, because in none of those modes does it consist about divine things only.

§ 44. If perhaps you say, that wisdom is not so accepted by the Saints, as by the philosophers: and thus these reasons do not hold. To the contrary is, that Augustine divides the definition given by the Philosophers. For when the Philosopher said, that knowledge is the cognition of human and divine things, he himself divides, that it is the cognition of divine things only: and thus he seems to accept one part of the signification, as he does.

§ 45. If because of this it is said, that knowledge is about the others. To the contrary is, that the taste of nothing brings perfect sweetness except of divine things only: since therefore wisdom is the taste of God in gifts, wisdom is not except about divine things.

§ 46. Solution. It must be said, that wisdom as a gift is not except about divine things.

§ 47. To all the others it must be said, that wisdom is spoken of strictly and broadly. Broadly it is thus called from sapere [to know/be wise] only. Strictly from sapere and from sapor [flavor/taste]. And in the first way it is twofold, namely practical, and thus moral knowledge is called wisdom: and speculative, and thus the Philosopher diversifies it in his definitions. However properly it is called wisdom, which is to itself the cause of knowing, and whose end is within, and is not sought for the sake of another, but others are sought for its sake: and in this way only divine knowledge is wisdom, and especially that which is according to piety, as was held in the first distinction of the first book of the Sentences. But wisdom strictly is called from the taste of that which is simply tasty: and that is nothing but divine things: and therefore wisdom is only of divine things.

Articulus 3 — How The Gift Of Wisdom Differs From Knowledge And Understanding

How does the gift of wisdom differ from knowledge and understanding?

§ 48. Thirdly, it is asked about the distinction of the gift of wisdom from knowledge and understanding.

§ 49. But it seems, that it does not differ from knowledge: because 1. Augustine says, that there is no difference except because wisdom is of eternal things, and knowledge of temporal things: but this difference is only material: therefore it seems, that formally they do not differ. 2. Also, there is one habit of charity by which we love God and neighbor: and God is eternal and the neighbor temporal: therefore by similarity there will be one habit of the gift of wisdom, by which we contemplate eternal things and dispose temporal things. 3. Also, he says in the Text, that understanding is about the Creator and creatures, and wisdom about the Creator only: therefore it seems, that wisdom and understanding differ as a more general and more special habit of cognition: but genus and species do not make diverse species, because the genus is in the species: therefore it seems, that the gift of understanding and wisdom do not differ as diverse species of gifts.

§ 50. Solution. It must be said, that wisdom is cognition through taste, and tasting divine things in gifts most similar to them: but understanding is not through taste, but rather is a light given by God to the cognition of that creature of God, in which God results through grace, and this is spiritual: or in which He is to result through glory or through grace: and therefore it is the light by which we cognize the gratuitous dispositions of heavenly things, and we tend unto God so disposing. And therefore it is clear that understanding and wisdom differ from knowledge: because knowledge is a divine light towards operable things pertaining to this life: and therefore he says in the Text, that it teaches how to converse well in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation.

§ 51. To the first therefore it must be said, that there is not only a material difference: since there is one reason of cognition through a light making taste, and another through a light disposing operable things in time.

§ 52. To the next it must be said, that it is not similar: because in the neighbor there is no reason for love except God, as was said above: but in wisdom the governing light is of another reason than in knowledge.

§ 53. To the next it must be said, that understanding is not about the Creator through taste, but as a sight only tending into the true through a light elevating to those things in which God results more highly than in a vestige and image: such as is the disposition of rewards in the beatitude of spiritual substances. But wisdom has a light which makes the taste of flavor. And this is what Augustine says: In Isaiah understanding is that by which hearts are cleansed from the infirmity of carnal pleasure, so that a pure intention may be directed to the end. For carnal pleasure seems to be called by him a carnality depressing from the contemplation of divine things in which God results more clearly than in these which are corporeal: and of these is understanding, and through them it is directed to the sight of the Creator. And therefore it is said in the Text, that understanding is of divine and spiritual creatures and of all the good affections of the soul. And it is always understood, that it is also of their opposites and through a higher light than is faith: because faith simply assents to the things believed, but understanding sees them in an interior light.

Articulus 4 — On The Acts Of Knowledge, What And How Many They Are, And How Knowledge Differs From Prudence And Counsel Concerning the acts of knowledge: what and how many they are, and how knowledge differs from prudence and counsel?

§ 54. Next, it is asked about knowledge. And two things are asked, namely about its acts which he posits in the Text, and about its difference from counsel and prudence.

§ 55. As to the first, those things are accepted which are said in the Text which seem to hint, that knowledge has four acts.

§ 56. For he says first, that knowledge is the cognition of human things: therefore to discern human things seems to be the proper act of knowledge.

§ 57. Also, he says that he does not attribute to knowledge all things which can be known by man, but only those by which the most salutary faith which leads to true beatitude, is generated, nourished, defended, and strengthened.

§ 58. But a third act is elicited from this that he says, that it belongs to knowledge to abstain from evil things.

§ 59. A fourth is elicited from this that he says, that when we say: We saw him full of grace and truth, that grace is referred to knowledge, and truth to wisdom. For in this act of knowledge it will be to cognize the grace of the humanity of Christ.

§ 60. But it is objected against the first, that 1. To discern human things, either is accepted generally for all things which can be discerned by man, and then knowledge will be the same as wisdom: or it is accepted for those things which pertain to the life of man, and then it will be the same as prudence, as it seems. 2. Also, as wisdom relates to divine things, so knowledge relates to human things: but wisdom relates to divine things such that it itself is that virtue which is about divine things, namely faith: therefore knowledge relates to human things such that it itself is that virtue which is about human things like prudence. But that wisdom is the same as faith, is proved through Gregory, speaking thus on Job: In the hearts of the elect, the wisdom of following goods is born first, and this through the gift of the Spirit is as it were the firstborn. Which wisdom is surely our faith, as the Prophet attests who says: Unless you believe, you will not understand.

§ 61. Also, it is objected about the second act. For he says in the Text, that faithful peoples do not excel in that knowledge, although they excel in faith itself: therefore it seems, that what will be said in the following distinction is not true, that one being had all are had, since knowledge is not had by all.

§ 62. Also, it is objected about the third act, which is to abstain from evil things. And this he explains, when he says, that to abstain from evil things is to converse prudently in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation: for this is fitting to prudence, as the saying itself also manifests, because to converse prudently belongs to prudence.

§ 63. Also, it is objected about the fourth. Those things which spectate to the humanity of Christ, are adored with one adoration with the deity: therefore it seems, that by the habit of wisdom they are to be cognized just as the divinity: therefore they do not pertain to knowledge.

§ 64. Also it is asked, Since of one habit there is one special and substantial act, how does Augustine here give four acts to the gift of knowledge?

§ 65. Solution. It must be said, that the gift of knowledge is a simple light received from God, in which are seen the reasons of operable things pertaining to life: and therefore it relates to prudence like a better and more perfect habit of operable things. And therefore also is solved that which some could object, whether knowledge is of complex things or incomplex things, or of principles or of conclusions: since it is none of these, but it is a light just like faith towards credibles is a simple likeness of divine truth and justice, under which are seen the divine reasons of things operable by us, which pertain to the mode of living holily and meritoriously, as the Apostle says: Let us live soberly, and justly, and piously in this world, etc.

§ 66. To the first therefore it must be said, that it is only about those things which are operable by us: nor is it however prudence: because that relies on the reasons of human right, and receives reasons from those, but knowledge does not, because it relies on the divine light, which illuminates towards conversation according to divine reasons.

§ 67. To the next it must be said, that that act is not proper to the gift of knowledge, but rather is fitting to it through the matter appropriated to it: for just as to prudence, as Cicero says in book I of De Officiis, the matter of sciences and knowable things is in a certain way appropriated, so also to the gift of knowledge is appropriated the knowledge of Sacred Scripture, through which faith is nourished by exhorting, and is defended by disputing: and therefore this act is fitting appropriately and not properly.

§ 68. But to that which was objected before this, that wisdom is the same as faith, and knowledge the same as prudence: it must be said, that it is invalid: because the saying of Gregory is not understood except for so much, that wisdom and faith are about the same things: and not that it is one habit: and so also knowledge and prudence are about the same things and not by one ratio.

§ 69. To what is objected about the third act, it must be said that prudence rules otherwise, and knowledge otherwise, and towards another thing as to the end and proximate [object]: because prudence through the reasons of human right, and towards honorable things according to the statutes of cities and plebiscites: but knowledge through divine reasons, and towards a holy conversation commending itself to every conscience of men: whence it attends rather to the holy, than to the honorable.

§ 70. And as to what is objected concerning this that Augustine says, to converse prudently: it must be said that he takes it broadly, according as it is the same as providently, just as the Apostle: Providing good things not only before God, but also before all men.

§ 71. To the next which is asked about the fourth, it must be said that knowledge is not about the humanity of Christ, except insofar as it is a governing exemplar both in work and in disposing life through divine doctrine: and therefore if the humanity is considered as on the way, I well concede that there is in it the flavor of deity, and it pertains to wisdom as the objection proves: but according as it is proposed to us as an exemplary form governing in the works of sanctity, and according as it confers upon us a law of life relying on the reasons of divine right and towards sanctity, thus it pertains to knowledge: and so I think Augustine is to be understood.

§ 72. To the last it must be said, that as is clear from the aforementioned, there is only one substantial act, which is to rule in works of sanctity in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation: and to this they are reverted, namely the first, third, and fourth. But the first touches specially upon those things in which it rules, because in human things. But the third touches upon the mode of ruling, because it teaches to converse well through the reasons of divine right, which exhorts to the sanctity of life rather than to the republic. The fourth preestablishes the exemplar. But the second is not the proper act of knowledge, but an appropriated one.

Articulus 5 — Whether Counsel Is A Gift

Is counsel a gift?

§ 73. Secondly it is asked, In what does it differ from the gift of counsel? because concerning the difference of prudence itself it has already been held.

§ 74. And so that we may better understand this, we will introduce a question which the Master omits in the Text about the gift of counsel, and we will ask four things, namely whether counsel is a gift, and what it is, and what is its act, and how it is distinguished from the gift of knowledge?

§ 75. But it seems not to be a gift: because 1. All the gifts were in Christ: but counsel was not in Christ: therefore counsel is not a gift. The first is clear through things said before. The second is proved through John Damascene, who says, that counsel is not fitting to Christ: because counsel belongs to an ignorant one, and Christ was ignorant of nothing. 2. Also, Damascene says, that counsel is about doubtful things: for concerning certain things no one counsels: but doubtfulness is not as any aid of our potencies, nor is it given as an aid: since therefore the gifts were given as an aid, it seems that counsel is not a gift. 3. Also, Counsel is against precipitation, as Gregory says: but caution is against the same, as Macrobius and Cicero say: therefore it seems counsel does not differ from caution: but caution is a certain condition of the virtue of prudence according to that part of it which is providence: therefore counsel is a part of the virtue of prudence: therefore it is not a gift: because as was said, gifts are of a higher habit than virtues.

§ 76. Solution. It must be said, that counsel is a gift, as is commonly said by all the Saints.

§ 77. But to what is first objected, it must be said that counsel is spoken of in two ways, namely from the one giving counsel, and in this it signifies a plenitude of light directing in doubtful things: and thus it was in Christ and is in God: and in this way it is a gift. It is also called from the one seeking counsel, and thus it belongs to a doubting and ignorant one, and thus it was not in Christ, nor is it a gift in this mode.

§ 78. Through this also the solution to the following is clear.

§ 79. To the next it must be said, that caution properly is an impediment against the snares of enemies, and against dangers which can arise: but counsel is a light directing towards great, not dangerous things, for which man is not sufficient without a special aid, such as to sell everything and give to the poor, and things of this sort, which in Sacred Scripture are called counsels, as will be clear in the last chapter of this distinction.

Articulus 6 — What Counsel Is

What is counsel?

§ 80. Secondly it is asked, What is counsel?

§ 81. But it is defined by Cicero in the Rhetoric thus: Counsel is a true contrived reason for doing or not doing something.[290]

§ 82. But Gregory seems to maintain, that counsel is a gift given to man against precipitation.

§ 1. However, according to the first definition, counsel is not a gift: because

§ 2. 1. We anticipate with thought-out reason all contingent things that are matters of action workable by us: and the virtue of providence, which is a part of prudence, seems to do this. Therefore, it seems that this does not belong to a gift.

§ 3. 2. Also, even according to Gregory, the name of counsel is not restricted to something specific: because rashness lies in wait for all matters of action. Therefore, counsel concerns all things. Yet it does not seem to be taken in this way in Sacred Scripture, in which "counsels" are things to which not everyone is obligated.

§ 4. Further, alongside this, it is asked: Why is it called counsel and not rather choice [eligentia], since choice is more noble according to the Philosopher and John Damascene? Because:

§ 5. 1. Choice is a determined will, whereas counsel is a certain inquiry into things to be done.

§ 6. 2. Also, upon that verse of Psalm 118:24: My counsel is your justifications, the Gloss says: Counsel is to observe justifications. But to observe justifications either belongs to justice or to every virtue. Therefore, it seems that counsel is the directive of every virtue or of special justice. Therefore, it does not exclusively direct the gift of fortitude, as they say.

§ 7. Solution. It must be said that counsel is taken in a general sense according to how it is defined by Cicero. Nevertheless, it can be specially adapted to the gift of counsel, such that it is defined as the thought-out reason of those things in which a human being needs special assistance due to their arduousness. And therefore, counsel here is not about what is doubtful, but rather about the arduous, to which, on account of its difficulty, not everyone is bound except in cases of necessity. And Gregory's statement is understood in the same way, because rashness lies in wait more in a difficult, arduous matter; and therefore, the soul there needs special assistance.

§ 8. To the next objection it must be said that choice is generally about all actionable things to be done by us, and therefore it could not be the name of a special gift. But counsel, as it is taken here, is not about all things, but about those things in which we need a special directing light. And therefore, its name as a gift follows from its being from the Holy Spirit giving counsel, rather than from one acquiring it, as was said before.

§ 9. To the next objection it must be said that counsel directs nothing but the gift of fortitude. Now, observing justifications occurs in three ways: namely, in the special definition of justifications, and thus it belongs to justice. Or in a general sense, such that observing justifications is the same as persevering in justifying virtues: and thus it belongs to every virtue or to general justice. In neither of these ways is it counsel, except insofar as counsel is taken broadly as the thought-out reason for doing or retaining anything whatever. Thirdly, observing justifications means guarding justifications against those attacking them, that is, defending them from temptations that are difficult to resist: and in this way, executively it belongs to fortitude, and directively it belongs to the gift of counsel.

§ 10. And through this the whole matter is resolved.

Articulus 7 — On The Act Of Counsel

On the act of counsel.

§ 11. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the act of counsel.

§ 12. But it seems from what has been said that counsel is meant to direct in great matters to which not all are bound. Yet, since every directive habit of reason concerns the doubt that can arise in them, and since concerning those things which are called "counsels" in Sacred Scripture there is no doubt, it seems that the gift of counsel is superfluous: for there is no doubt that it will be good to do those things which are called counsels in Sacred Scripture.

§ 13. Solution. Through the aforesaid it is easy to determine these matters: because the acts of counsel in which it differs from other gifts are to direct, through a light divinely inspired, toward higher goods which a human being is insufficient to perform and know through common virtue: such as to sell all things, and give to the poor, and have treasures in heaven. We do not know these treasures and the reward of contemplations except by the light of counsel.

§ 14. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there is no doubt that they are good; but it is doubtful to a human being whether they ought to be chosen, because he is not elevated to see that it is useful to leave all things behind except by divine counsel. And he also needs counsel in such matters regarding the mode of fulfilling them, because they are arduous: and for this reason they are closer to rashness.

§ 15. But against this seems to be what blessed Gregory says: Through the solidity of the gift of counsel, one passes from the flux of vices to the solidity of virtue. Therefore it seems that to call one back from vices is the act of counsel.

§ 16. And to this it must be said that Gregory there adapts the seven gifts to the seven days of the works of creation: and then counsel fits in the third place, when the water is divided from the dry land. In this way, that act of counsel will be an appropriated one, not its proper one. Or it may be said that it is one thing to pass over to virtue, and another to pass to the solidity of virtue: because solidity chiefly consists in the counsels, in which there is perfection, and then this will be proper to counsel.

290. Cicero, De Inventione II, 54, 162.

Articulus 8 — In What Knowledge And Counsel Differ

In what do science and counsel differ?

§ 17. Fourthly, it is asked in what do science and counsel differ, since both are about matters of action?

§ 18. Now it seems that they differ in nothing: because 1. A gift that is for the assistance of a power perfects it insofar as it is directed toward act. But, as John Damascene says, reason takes counsel in all works. For first it inquires and takes counsel. Then it chooses and passes judgment. Then it wills, and afterward it makes an impulse toward the work. But in all such things science also directs. Therefore, it seems that counsel and science do not differ regarding the things they are about.

§ 19. 2. The same seems to be held by Aristotle in Book III of the Ethics, where among the general efficient causes of virtue (such as the voluntary, the will, and choice) he also posits counsel. Therefore, it seems that counsel regards the work of every virtue; and in that work, science directs. Therefore, regarding the things they are about, science does not differ from counsel.

§ 20. But to the contrary is that, just as piety and fortitude are related in execution, so counsel and science are related in direction. But piety and fortitude are not about the same things: therefore, science and counsel do not direct in the same things.

§ 21. And this must be conceded: since John Damascene says that counsel is about great things; for we do not take counsel about small things and things readily operable by us.

§ 22. Hence it must be said that there are great things for which we are not sufficient without assistance, and to which not everyone is bound: and in these things counsel directs, as was said earlier.

§ 23. To the objections to the contrary, there is one solution: that "counsel" is spoken of in two ways. Namely, as a general pre-ordering of things to be done with foresight of the work's outcome and end: and the objections proceed from this counsel, about which Solomon also says: Son, do nothing without counsel, and after the fact you will not repent. But "counsel" is spoken of specially as a directing light in undertaking arduous things elevated above human industry, which God has revealed only for the state of perfection. And in this way, counsel is a spiritual gift that the faithful receive from the Holy Spirit, either so that they may fulfill the counsels, or so that they can fulfill them if they wish.

Articulus 9 — What The Gift Of Understanding Is, And, Whether It Is A Gift By Way Of A Complexion

What is the gift of understanding? And, Is it a gift by way of a proposition?

§ 24. Next, it is asked about what he says there, at B, Having shown the difference between science and wisdom, etc.

§ 25. For here one must inquire about the gift of understanding. And three things are asked: namely, what it is, what it is about, and how it relates to faith and contemplation? Because all the others have been named above.

§ 26. To the first we proceed thus: 1. Augustine says in a certain sermon: Understanding is called that by which hearts are cleansed from all carnal infirmity, so that pure intention may be directed to the end. But it seems that all of this ought to belong to faith: because it is said in Acts 15:9: Purifying their hearts by faith: therefore faith purifies the heart from carnal pleasure.

§ 27. 2. Also, Augustine says that intention makes a work good, and faith directs intention. Therefore, it also directs to the end. Therefore, both of these belong to faith.

§ 28. Further, alongside this, it is asked: Is the gift of understanding by way of a proposition [complex apprehension]?

§ 29. And it seems that it is: because 1. Gregory says that God gives understanding when He illuminates the mind concerning things heard. But things heard are taken in a kind of proposition. Therefore, understanding consists in a kind of proposition, as it seems. 2. Also, on that verse: The Lord will shake the desert of Cades, an authority says: He will shake it, as the understanding of the Holy Spirit matched according to anagoge. But anagogical understanding is composite and complex. Therefore, this understanding consists in a kind of proposition.

§ 30. 3. Also, Dionysius says that it is not possible for the divine ray to shine upon us unless circumvelated by the variety of sacred veils. But this circumvelation is a proposition, or not without a proposition. Therefore, it seems that understanding is composite.

§ 31. ON THE CONTRARY: Faith is simple: and the gift of understanding is more perfect than faith. Therefore, much more so is the gift of understanding simple.

§ 32. Solution. It must be said that, just as was stated above in the question on the gift of wisdom, the gift of understanding is a simple light under which God is seen in those who are blessed, and in their special offices and acts.

§ 33. To that which is objected concerning the description, it must be said that it is given through its effect: because understanding cleanses hearts, even in a mirror and an enigma, so that one may see by the light perceived in it in which truth shines according to a greater clarity than that of a mirror and an enigma; whereas faith does not cleanse except from the falsities of errors.

§ 34. To the next objection it must be said that faith directs to the end in one way, and the gift of understanding in another. For faith directs the work by showing the reward and Him who is simply the end of all good; but understanding directs to the end by seeing the end through its light, either in itself or in the blessed, and it does not direct the work.

§ 35. To that which is further asked, Whether it is by way of a proposition? It must be said that it is in no way so; rather, it is a simple light, as has been said.

§ 36. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that understanding is from hearing just as faith is from hearing, namely, with respect to the spoken understanding, but only through the light of the gift of understanding. And therefore the hearing of Scripture is subservient to the act of the gift of understanding, but it does not generate the light itself: because this is infused by God Himself along with the other sanctifying graces. Hence that proposition which is in things heard is under the gift, and not in the gift itself, just as it is in faith.

§ 37. Through this the solution to the next objection is clear: since the understanding of Scripture which is anagogical helps the understanding to be elevated, but it does not generate the light under which spiritual things are seen.

§ 38. Dionysius also speaks in this manner. Yet all these things are under the gift of understanding.

Articulus 10 — On The Objects Of The Gift Of Understanding

What is the gift of understanding about?

§ 39. Secondly, it is asked what the gift of understanding is about.

§ 40. And the Master seems to say that it is about God and spiritual creatures, such as Angels, and souls, and their affections.

§ 41. 1. But if it is about spiritual creatures, it seems to be about God in His image: and then, according to this, it seems again to coincide with faith.

§ 42. 2. Also, if it is about the Creator, then it seems that in this respect it does not differ from the gift of wisdom.

§ 43. 3. If perchance it is said that understanding is about God as the first truth, and wisdom is about Him as goodness: this also does not seem true, because if truth were its end, it would seem to be in the speculative intellect and not the practical: and thus it would not be a sanctifying grace.

§ 44. 4. Also, Augustine on Matthew 5:8, in the Gloss, says thus: Let man strip himself of the world, love eternal things, embrace God, until he can see God, whom he sees only as much as he dies to the age. In the future, as He is, He will be seen by the eye of the mind. Therefore the spirit of understanding is adapted to this step: because understanding is the eye of the mind. From this it is gathered that the understanding of the gift is to know God and to love and embrace Him: therefore it seems that it differs in nothing from wisdom.

§ 45. Solution. It must be said that, in my judgment, the gift of understanding is principally about God, and about those spiritual things in which divine truth shines forth: and I well concede that it does not apprehend God except by way of truth in Himself. But this spiritual creature possesses more than the image alone: and therefore it is not properly upon the image, but rather uses the image as an instrument and a light infused into it, as illuminating it first: and this is greater than faith.

§ 46. To the next objection it must be said that from the principles already established, it is clear how it differs from wisdom.

§ 47. To the next objection it must be said that this does not follow: because faith also belongs to truth; and yet, because it tends toward Him, faith is a virtue. And thus the gift of understanding tends and receives what is given to it solely under the ratio of the true: and therefore the gift of understanding has the ratio of a virtue, according to how virtue is taken generally. Because truth, which is the end of intelligence, according to the Philosopher is truth abstracted from the thing; here, however, truth received in the thing is the end to which the gift of understanding seeks to be really united.

§ 48. To that which is objected concerning the Gloss on Matthew 5:8, it must be said that Augustine is speaking in order to adapt the gifts to the beatitudes: because although the gifts are less perfect perfections than the beatitudes, they are nevertheless adaptable to them. And according to this, the cleansing of the heart and death to the world is a disposition preceding the act of the gift of understanding, and does not pertain to understanding itself. But because the gift is a virtue by taking virtue in a general sense, therefore it is necessary that it proceed from love. But still, that love does not belong to charity, except insofar as charity is the general mover in every good, as was said above. But although in this way it would also have charity moving it, nevertheless it would differ from wisdom: because wisdom consists in the taste of goodness, as has often been said, but understanding in the contemplation of truth alone.

Articulus 11 — How Understanding Relates To Contemplation

How does understanding relate to contemplation?

§ 49. Further it is asked, How does it relate to faith and contemplation? One of these has already been treated. But how does it relate to contemplation? This must be inquired into.

§ 50. Now it seems that it precedes faith and contemplation: because understanding neither assents nor contemplates: therefore it seems that understanding precedes both faith and contemplation.

§ 51. But against this seems to be what Isaias says: Unless you believe, you shall not understand: therefore faith precedes understanding.

§ 52. Solution. It must be said that there is a certain understanding concerning that which is spoken through discourse: and this is not the gift, but it precedes faith and contemplation. And there is a certain understanding intuiting in a light received from God, which light makes one pleasing [sanctifies], and this is the gift, and it is a nobler perfection of our intellect than faith or contemplation: and therefore, according to the path of the generation of the act (though not of the habit), it follows faith and contemplation. But I say not according to the path of the generation of the habit: because the habits are infused simultaneously; but not the acts, rather the acts follow one another.

Articulus 12 — What The Gift Of Fortitude Is

What is the gift of fortitude?

§ 53. From an abundance [of matter] one can here inquire about two gifts which the Master does not treat here, namely the gift of piety and of fortitude.

§ 54. Concerning the gift of fortitude we ask three things: namely, what is it? And, according to what act does it exist on the way [in this life] and in the fatherland [in heaven]? And thirdly, how does it differ from the virtue of fortitude?

§ 55. To the first it is objected thus: Augustine in the book On the Spirit and the Soul: It belongs to fortitude not only to depress earthly desires, but thoroughly to forget them.

§ 56. Moreover Gregory says: It belongs to fortitude to give confidence to the trembling.

§ 57. Also, Augustine in the book On Christian Doctrine: It belongs to fortitude to be sequestered from all the deadly pleasantness of transient things.

§ 58. Also, Gregory on the Works of the Six Days: The spirit of fortitude is to shine with miracles and doctrine.

§ 59. Against the first statement it is objected: because 1. According to Macrobius, this is rather characteristic of the virtue of a purified mind than of the gift.

§ 60. 2. Also, this belongs rather to temperance, whose role is to repress desires or pleasures for temporal things, than to fortitude.

§ 61. 3. Also, concerning the second. To give confidence to the trembling belongs rather to patience, or long-suffering, or magnificence, than to the gift.

§ 62. 4. Furthermore, the virtue of fortitude itself does this: therefore for this it does not need a higher assistance by which to be helped, that is, the gift of fortitude.

§ 63. 5. Similarly, it is objected concerning the third. Because that seems to belong more to gratuitously given grace, which is the "working of miracles" spoken of by the Apostle, than to be an act of the gift.

§ 64. Solution. All these things in some way belong to the gift of fortitude.

§ 65. And to understand this, it must be noted that the gift of fortitude principally regards the arduous. Now, the arduous, the difficult, and the laborious differ: because the arduous involves an elevation withdrawing one from common interaction, and from what the many desire, and from what the many will attain as the end which is the terminus of the work. The difficult, on the other hand, is what exceeds the faculty of the power, though not infinitely. But the laborious is what inflicts a penalty on the one laboring or enduring it. Hence the gift of fortitude principally regards the arduous; and because counsel is about such an arduous thing, it is directed by counsel.

§ 66. Therefore, to the first it must be said that the purgatorial virtue or the virtue of the purified mind indeed teaches to forget the desires of vice or pleasures, but not the common ones which the many have: because there are many who keep the precept. But the gift of fortitude perfects one toward the arduous, which elevates above what the many do, and above their pleasures.

§ 67. But if it is objected that according to this Augustine speaks badly: Deadly desires or pleasures: because some who keep the precepts do not delight in deadly pleasures. It must be said that they are called deadly because they dispose to death through the subreption of venial sins, from which fortitude turns one away toward the state of perfection in the counsels.

§ 68. To the next objection it must be said that temperance does not depress pestiferous pleasures in this way, but rather through approaching the mean in them, and not through a flight toward the arduous which is above them.

§ 69. To the next objection it must be said that giving confidence equivocally applies to fortitude, its species, and the gift of fortitude: because fortitude is properly against the difficult and laborious, and the habit of fortitude perfects one in those. But the gift is against the arduous, which elevates the mind beyond those things that inflict difficulty. Fortitude or patience does not do this, but rather dismisses one in them; yet it nevertheless comforts one to endure them by professing the faith. Hence from this nothing more is gathered than that the gift of fortitude is present in the same act of enduring or attacking alongside the virtue of fortitude, but it does not comfort according to the same ratio.

§ 70. To the next objection it must be said that Gregory is speaking by appropriating the gifts to the works of the six days. Or it can be said that miracles and doctrine show the altitude of life: and therefore they belong to the fortitude that fulfills the counsels, not as acts, but as signs.

Articulus 13 — Which Is The Act Of Fortitude On The Way, And Its Act In The Fatherland

What is the act of fortitude on the way, and its act in the fatherland?

§ 71. Secondly it is asked, What is the act of fortitude on the way, and its act in the fatherland?

§ 72. Now it seems that on the way it has no act differing from the virtue of fortitude: because the virtue of fortitude is against the greatest danger that can exist, namely, against inflicted death. Since, therefore, nothing is higher than the gift of fortitude, there cannot be any act separated from the virtue of fortitude according to the ratio of altitude.

§ 73. But in the fatherland it seems it can have no act: because 1. There will be no deadly pleasures there, as the first authority introduced above said: therefore there will be no separation from them there.

§ 74. 2. Also, there will be no danger there: therefore it will not be necessary that a habit giving confidence to the trembling be there.

§ 75. 3. Also, miracles will not be there, because they are for the sake of unbelievers, so that they may be converted.

§ 76. 4. Also, since all fortitude is against inflicted passions, and no one inflicts passions there, fortitude will seem superfluous there.

§ 77. 5. Also, Faith and hope, which are directed to the end and are theological virtues, will not remain in the fatherland: therefore much less those things which are directed to the things that are for the end. Therefore it seems that, once the end is attained, all habits will be evacuated.

§ 78. Solution. It must be said that the gift of fortitude has a proper act in its ratio on the way, although not in the fatherland, and it is separated from the act of the virtue of fortitude. Because, as was held earlier, it is the arduous elevating and withdrawing from common interaction—not just from the anxiety of evil—and this is the ratio of the act in the gift of fortitude. And therefore the gift of fortitude comes into danger under a different ratio, and the virtue of fortitude otherwise. Because the virtue endures danger when it is necessary to suffer or when withdrawing from the good of virtue, such as when faith is sought, or justice, or the liberty of the fatherland, or something of this kind of good for the sake of grace or citizens. But the gift of fortitude from superabundance offers itself to a state in which such things are sought more often, such as to the state of the perfection of the counsels. Similarly, they do not comfort themselves to conquer according to the same ratio. Because the gift of fortitude is out of superabundance, for it itself is the salt of perfection; if it vanishes, with what will the others be salted? That is, if the perfect one falls, how will the imperfect one stand? But the virtue of fortitude comforts itself from the good of virtue necessary for salvation.

§ 79. But if it is objected that, according to this, none but the perfect possess the gift of fortitude: therefore, having one sanctifying grace does not mean all are had. It must be said that this is not true, nor does it follow from what has been said: because the perfect have it in act, and generally all those existing in grace have it in habit. Yet the habits of virtue perfect toward the act in different ways, as was said: for he who is imperfect possesses that from which he can do the work of perfection if he wishes.

§ 80. To that which is asked concerning its act in the fatherland, it must be said that it will remain in the fatherland according to substance and a different act. According to substance: just as weapons are not taken away from the best fighting soldier when he returns to the emperor—not so that he may fight in them before the emperor, but so that they may be as the decoration of his preceding victory. But according to act, it remains as the firmest adhesion to that good which was the end of the battle and of the arduous thing he undertook. For it belongs to no virtue to pursue a good in such a way that, after it is possessed, it did not remain in it thus; but just as temperance delights in what is sweet, so fortitude holds most firmly to the arduous, and this according to one ratio for the gift, and according to another for the virtue, as was said.

Articulus 14 — In What The Gift Of Fortitude Differs From Fortitude As A Virtue

In what does the gift of fortitude differ from the virtue of fortitude?

§ 82. Thirdly it is asked, though it has already been almost determined, in what does it differ from the virtue of fortitude?

§ 83. And for this, let the statement of Augustine in the book On Christian Doctrine be accepted, where he says thus: Let them rise up next to fortitude, that the world may be crucified to them, and they to the world; let them make use of the perversity of life: and for this, from the depths of iniquity charity does not grow cold, but the hunger and thirst for justice are deleted, until satiety of it is reached in that immortality: and thus it will be true: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for justice, for they shall be satisfied. But this seems to be proper neither to the gift of fortitude nor to the virtue, but rather to be the act of every virtue: because one is not crucified to the world through the hatred of one vice, but of all.

§ 84. Solution. Almost everything that can be asked concerning this article has already been said in the preceding ones.

§ 85. To the authority of Augustine introduced here, it must be said that crucifying oneself to the world is spoken of in two ways. Namely, materially, according to those things in which one is generally crucified, according to what the Apostle says: Those who belong to Christ have crucified their flesh with its vices and concupiscences: and thus it belongs to every virtue. It is also spoken of formally, as if according to its ratio, and thus it sounds like a certain high thing pertaining to the work of perfection: because the greatest battle of Christ was on the cross. And thus it principally belongs to the gift of fortitude, which fulfills more than it is bound to, just as Christ did for us. Similarly, the thirst and hunger for justice are taken according to the ratio of general justice only, and thus it is not appropriated to the gift: or according to the ratio of the thirst and hunger which out of desire break forth into the most difficult exercise against enemies, as when David asked for water from the cistern which is in Bethlehem: and thus it is fitting for the gift of fortitude. Hence two gifts assist fortitude: for insofar as it exists concerning a terrible thing to be feared, it fears things to be feared, and thus it is assisted by the gift of fear: so that now out of reverence it fears or attacks such things, because this is higher. But on the part where it dares difficult things that ought to be dared, it is assisted by the gift of fortitude arising from the firmness of adhesion to the supremely arduous, which it strives to apprehend and hold, whereas the virtue of fortitude attends only to civil good (and this for the sake of God, if it is infused).

Articulus 15 — What The Gift Of Piety Is

What is the gift of piety?

§ 86. Next, it is asked about the gift of piety.

§ 87. And we will ask four things: namely, what is it? And secondly, what is its act on the way, and in the fatherland? Thirdly, whether it is one in species, or many? Fourthly, what is its difference from mercy, or meekness, or mildness?

§ 88. To the first we proceed thus: 1. Augustine says in Book X of The City of God, near the beginning: Piety is properly understood to be the worship of God, which the Greeks call theosebeia. Yet this is also said to be dutifully held toward parents. By the custom of the vulgar, moreover, this name is frequently used even for works of mercy: which I judge to have happened because God commands these especially to be done for Him, and testifies that these please Him in place of sacrifices.

§ 89. Moreover, at the beginning of his commentary on Job, Gregory says that piety is that which teaches works of mercy.

§ 90. Also, Cicero, before the end of the first Rhetoric, says that piety is benevolence toward parents.

§ 91. Now it is objected concerning the first: because that seems to make piety identical with three things, none of which is the gift of piety. For if piety is called the worship of God, piety will be the same as latria: and it is certain that the gift of piety is not latria. Because, approved in this way, piety executes what the gift of science teaches: but this teaches to converse well in the midst of a depraved nation. Therefore piety lives well in relation to neighbor. But worship orders in relation to God.

§ 92. Also, that which is said, that through it one also lives dutifully toward parents, seems to coincide with what Cicero says, that piety is benevolence toward parents: but this again does not seem to fit the gift of piety, because the gift of piety regards all people.

§ 93. 2. Furthermore, it was conceded above that the gifts belong to a wider perfection than the virtues: but piety, spoken of in this way, is a virtue and a species of natural justice, as Cicero says. Therefore the gift of piety will be of a wider perfection than piety spoken of in this way: therefore it seems that it is not benevolence toward parents.

§ 94. It is also objected concerning the third designation which Augustine introduces, saying that by the custom of the vulgar this name is frequently used even for works of mercy. For it seems that it should rather be used frequently for works of meekness: because on Matthew 5:4, upon that verse: Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land, the Gloss says that piety is ordered to meekness. Therefore, since the second beatitude is meekness, and mercy is the fifth, it seems that it is not concerning works of mercy, but of piety.

§ 95. Solution. It must be said that piety is spoken of in many ways, and sometimes it is in the genus of virtue, and sometimes in the genus of a gift: and it is spoken of in those ways by priority and posteriority. Hence it is necessary to posit one way in which it is spoken of per se: and the other ways will be taken in relation to that one. Therefore it can be said that piety is properly benevolence toward the image of God, insofar as it is the image of God. But this is taken in multiple ways: for either it inclines the affection on the part of the exemplar from which that image proceeds, and thus piety is carried more toward the exemplar, and in this way it will be in the genus of the virtue of la-[tria...]

[...just]ice: and according to Augustine it is said especially in this manner, that the exemplar is the root of benevolence in all the other ways by which the affection is inclined toward the image. But benevolence is also inclined toward the image descending from the divine exemplar: and this in three ways, namely, such that it is inclined with nature, and then it is benevolence toward parents, and it is again a virtue and a species of natural justice: or it is generally borne toward the image according as it is an image, and then it is properly a gift, and it is benevolence of the image of God in a rational nature, and it teaches one to bear oneself benevolently toward it: or it is borne toward the image insofar as it is conjoined to an inferior nature, by which the image is surrounded by misery, and thus piety is brought about concerning works of mercy, and it differs from mercy, because mercy has the rationale of works upon another's misery, whereas piety [regards] the image with its conjunction to the misery that surrounds it in a miserable nature.

Therefore, to the first it must be said that the solution is already clear: because Augustine there takes piety broadly in a community [of meaning], by which it is said through prior and posterior [i.e., analogously] of many things: and through this the solution is clear to all except the last.

And to that it must be said that piety has two things in itself, namely benevolence, and that concerning which is its act: and on the part of benevolence it is ordered to meekness: and the Gloss does not intend that it be meekness according to substance, but that it is ordered to it on account of the similarity of the affection: because he who is benevolent toward all is neither exasperated by anyone, nor does anger or rancor tempt him. Now the act of piety (because it is to expend good upon the image) is especially concerning the indigence of the image: and thus as to its matter it is concerning the works of mercy; and thus nothing prevents it from being ordered to different beatitudes with respect to different things.

Articulus 16 — Which Is The Act Of The Gift Of Piety On The Way

What is the act of the gift of piety for someone on the way (in via)?

What is the act of the gift of piety for someone on the way?

Secondly, it is asked concerning its act on the way and in the fatherland.

§ 1. Now it seems that the act is manifold from the words said above, namely to worship God, to honor parents, to do good to all, to dedicate oneself to works of mercy. Therefore it seems that it is not one gift.

§ 2. Also, on Job 31:19: If I have despised him that was perishing, etc., the Gloss says that this was a work of piety: for in a pious mind nature avails more than acquaintance. Therefore it seems that its principal act is to dedicate oneself to works of mercy.

§ 3. Also, on 1 Tim 4:8: Piety is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come, the Gloss says that the whole sum of Christian discipline lies in mercy and piety. And it does not seem there that the act of one is distinguished from the act of the other: therefore it seems that its act is to relieve the poor.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine says in the book On Christian Doctrine, and the same is in the Gloss on Matt 7:6: It is the property of piety to honor holy things, not to contradict Scripture whether understood or not understood. Therefore it seems that its principal act is not to intend works of mercy.

§ 2. Also, Augustine in a certain sermon on the Trinity: In the second degree one ascends to piety, so that one does not resist the will of God, and so that in His sermons a depraved sense is not taken, nor is a stumbling block taken in the governance of the creature, since many things happen which private will does not demand. From this it is accepted that the act of piety is concerning two things, namely to understand Scripture religiously, and not to be offended in the manner in which God governs the world, since many things seem to be done contrary to our will.

§ 3. Also, it seems that none of these is its act. For Gregory says that knowledge teaches, and piety executes: therefore its act will be that which knowledge teaches: but it was held above that knowledge has three acts, namely to defend Scripture, and to know how to converse well in the midst of a depraved and perverse nation, and to know how to distribute temporal goods: therefore it seems that those are of piety by way of execution.

Solution. This last seems to me to be conceded: but nevertheless, just as knowledge has one principal act through which it is in all who have the gifts, namely to know how to use temporal goods well to converse well in the midst of a depraved and perverse nation: so piety has one act which is benevolently and without complaint to desire and do good to all who are marked by the image of God.

To that which is objected first, it must be said that those acts are of piety insofar as it is said in manifold ways: and insofar as it is a gift it is mixed with meekness and mercy, as was said before: and therefore its act is not separated from their acts: and in this respect that Gloss on Job is understood, because piety and mercy do not differ, except that piety respects nature insofar as it has the image, whereas mercy respects misery. Or, to speak more properly, piety respects the nature of the image in misery, and mercy conversely [respects] misery in the image: and therefore it also has a twofold promise, of the life that now is on account of the alleviation of the misery of Christians, and of the life to come on account of reverence for the image.

To the other it must be said that honoring holy things accrues to piety from that part by which it is worship, and relates the image to the exemplar. Similarly, not contradicting and not murmuring accrues to it from a twofold part, namely insofar as it attains the exemplar, and insofar as through benevolence it is conjoined to meekness, whose proper feature is not to be offended in those things that happen contrary to private will: but it belongs to one who worships God not to accept a perverse sense in Scripture, but to honor the sense that the Doctors promulgate. There are, however, some who say that this act, which is not to accept a perverse sense, is reduced to the act of the gift of knowledge by which faith is defended.

And note that when it is said that piety does not accept a perverse sense, it is understood of practical acceptance, that is, it does not imitate it in work, but venerates Scripture by fulfilling it through work out of the benevolence it has toward holy things.

To the last the solution is clear.

Now to this which could be asked further through the foregoing, what act does it have in the fatherland?

It must be said that it has the act which is to rejoice in the goods of the image of God insofar as it is an image: for that is left by way of reward from the one which belongs to the way (in via), namely to do or to expend through affection and work what is good to one marked by the image.

Articulus 17 — Whether Piety Is One Gift Or Several Whether piety is one gift or many?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether it is one according to itself or many?

Now it seems that it is many: because all the acts enumerated cannot be reduced into one habit: therefore it seems, since according to the sayings of the Saints those are acts of piety, that piety is not one in species.

Solution. Some say that piety is not one in species on account of the adduced words of the Saints, and especially the words of Augustine set forth above from Book X of The City of God. But it must be said otherwise, that the gift of piety is one in species: but the name of piety is said in manifold ways according to analogy, as was held before: and it must be said to the argument that the gift of piety has one act principal and substantial to itself, which is to expend good to one marked by the image of God. The others, however, are non-principal, according as it is conjoined to other habits with which it has some similarity.

Articulus 18 — How Piety Differs From Meekness

How does piety differ from meekness?

Fourthly and lastly it is asked, How does it differ from meekness and mercy?

Now it seems not to differ from meekness: because the Gloss on Matt 5 and 6 reduces it to meekness: therefore piety is meekness or mildness.

For by the same reason it seems not to differ from mercy: because the Gloss, on 1 Tim 4:8, reduces it to mercy. And similarly the Gloss on Job 31:19: and these Glosses were posited above, nor is it necessary to repeat them here.

Solution. It is easy to answer these according to the foregoing: because the Gloss does not intend that piety is mildness or mercy, but that it has an affinity with them: for since two things are part of the constitution of piety, namely benevolence by which it is defined on the part of the affection it informs, and the object which is the image, especially immersed in miseries, from which there is indigence so that it might be helped. On the part of the affection it approaches mildness or meekness, whose property is to be benevolently affected concerning all, and not to be provoked by injuries. But on the part of the effect or work it is conjoined to mercy, although nevertheless it is substantially disjoined from both, as is easy to see through those things which were said in the first problem.

DISTINCTIO XXXVI

Divisio Textus

It is also usually asked, Whether the virtues are so joined to one another, etc.

This distinction is divided against the whole preceding treatise concerning the infused habits: because here it is asked about the comparison of these habits to one another.

And it is divided into three parts according to a threefold comparison: in the first of which he treats of the connection of the virtues in a subject. In the second it is asked, Whether virtues possessed at the same time are also necessarily equal? and this begins there, at B, Whether indeed one possesses all equally, etc. In the third, he treats of the relation of charity to the others and to the works of the precepts, there, at C, And since there are two precepts of charity, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Political Virtues Are Connected

Whether the political virtues are connected?

Whether the political virtues are connected?

Now a threefold question falls upon the first part of this distinction. For first it is asked, Whether the political virtues are connected?

And if the political ones are not connected, it is asked secondly, whether the theological ones are necessarily connected?

Thirdly, if the theological virtues are connected, whether vices or sins are also connected or not?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. Bernard says in the first book On Consideration to Pope Eugene: It is most sweet to notice a certain harmony and embrace of the virtues, and that one hangs from another: just as in this place you see that prudence is the mother of fortitude, and that any daring which prudence has not brought forth is not fortitude but temerity. Therefore it seems that the virtues are connected.

§ 2. Also, Bernard, in the same place: Justice seeks the measure in every virtue, prudence finds it, fortitude claims it, temperance possesses it. Since therefore these are necessary in any virtue whatever, the political virtues seem to be connected.

§ 3. Also, Seneca says: Everything that is done well, is done justly, is done bravely, and temperately: but the work of any virtue whatever is done well: therefore it is done justly, bravely, and temperately: therefore in any work of virtue four virtues concur, and they cannot concur to a work unless they are connected in the operating subject: therefore they are connected.

§ 4. Also, Tully: If you lose one of your curtains, you will be able to say your furniture is safe to you: but if you lose one of the virtues, you must confess you will have none. Therefore, having one, all are had, and one being lost, all virtues are lost.

§ 5. Also, Jerome to Pammachius: The Stoics describe the four virtues as being so connected and mutually cohering to each other, that he who does not have one lacks all: and he who has one has all.

§ 6. Also, Augustine to Jerome: The Stoics seem to me to be deceived, who refuse to allow a proficient man to have wisdom entirely: but only then when he is perfect do they say he is wise. Therefore it seems that according to Augustine, the proficient and the perfect man is entirely wise; but he is not entirely wise unless he is wise according to every virtue: therefore he himself has every virtue: therefore he who has one, has all: therefore the virtues are connected.

§ 7. To the same point the rationale seems to be thus: Just as a power is related to a power, so a habit to a habit: but the inferior powers which are parts of the sensible soul, such as the concupiscible and irascible, are not ordered and perfected except through reason: therefore the habits perfecting them will not be perfect without the habits perfecting reason: but the habits of the inferior ones are temperance and fortitude, and the habits of reason are prudence and justice: therefore temperance and fortitude are connected to justice and prudence.

§ 8. Also, Prudence is the virtue sagaciously electing by those things by which it is aided, from those by which it is impeded: but it does not elect except in the matter of justice, or temperance, or fortitude: therefore prudence is not without them: and by the same rationale neither are they without it: therefore the virtues are connected.

§ 9. Also, To know how to elect is required in any work of the virtues whatever, etc., and this belongs to prudence: therefore prudence is required in any work of virtue whatever. Similarly, since the work of any virtue whatever is between the superfluous and the diminished, it is necessary that in any work of virtue temperance be required: and since the work of virtue is as it ought to be, justice seems to be present: therefore it seems that all are connected to each other in any work of virtue whatever.

§ 10. Also, Every virtue is about the difficult: fortitude claims the difficult for itself, as Bernard says: therefore fortitude is required in any work of virtue whatever.

§ 11. Also, He who is chaste, has a virtue: but he who has chastity, is chaste: therefore he who has a virtue, is virtuous: therefore he is not vicious: therefore from the first, he who has chastity is not vicious: but someone is vicious by one vice: therefore no vice is present in him who has chastity: therefore the opposites of the vices are present in him, which are the individual virtues: therefore he who has chastity, has all virtues: therefore the virtues are connected.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine says to Jerome that the science is not divine by which it is said that he who has one, has all. Therefore it seems that it is not necessarily true.

§ 2. Also, Political virtues are generated from acts: but acts are divided and are present divisively: therefore also the habits generated from them: therefore it seems that the virtues are not necessarily present simultaneously.

§ 3. Also, Someone is chaste in work and avaricious: but similar habits are left behind by similar acts: therefore the habit of chastity and of avarice is born in him: but liberality cannot be present with the habit of avarice: therefore the one having chastity does not necessarily have liberality: therefore it is not that he who has one, has all.

Solution. It must be said that even among the Philosophers there were many contentions concerning this matter. For some used to say that operations do not generate virtues, but merely dispose someone to receiving them, and virtues are given by separated substances in the perfection of wisdom above the four natural affections, namely fear, hope, joy, and sorrow or perturbation. And they used to say that three ordered affections remain in the wise man upon the collation of virtue, and not perturbation or sorrow, which does not fall upon a wise man. And this was the opinion of the Stoics. And they used to take the rationale of virtue according to what is the ultimate of a thing or of a power, nor did they call one prudent who is prudent in a qualified sense, unless he were universally prudent with respect to the act of every virtue: and therefore they used to say that, one being had, all are had. And their most potent rationale was this, that every virtue is either in reason, or from reason: whence every virtue is perfective of reason: but reason is not perfect as is fitting for a wise man whose role is to order and not be ordered, unless it be perfect in itself and in the subordinate powers: but this does not happen through one virtue, but through the virtue of all: and therefore they used to say that every virtue must be present for the perfection of a wise man. But as for him who is not wise, but is exercised in the work of some of the virtues, they used to say that he is in a disposition, and has no virtue: for the reason that operation does not generate virtue, but it is given by the intelligences which are separated substances. And this is taken from the words of Augustine adduced above, where he said that the Stoics refused to allow a proficient man to have virtue entirely, but only a perfect man. But because Augustine does not approve this sentence, therefore it must be said otherwise according to Aristotle in the Ethics, namely that political virtues have their generation from works, if they are customary: or from experience and time, if they are intellectual: and because generating causes are not connected, therefore the virtues do not have a connection.

Now to all the authorities which are first adduced, there is one solution, namely that there are certain general acts of virtues, according to which they are not distinguished: and with respect to those there is something of every virtue in every virtue: for the eligible is in every one, but this is not proper to prudence. Similarly the difficult is in every one, but this is not proper to fortitude, but rather the difficult concerning a determinate matter which is a passion inflicted according to the sense of touch. Similarly the measure according to the superfluous and the diminished is in every one, but this is not proper to temperance, but rather in the matter of innate passions concerning the delectable of taste and touch. The debt also which is in every virtue is not the debt of justice, but rather in a matter ordered to a neighbor according to natural or positive right. Therefore it must be said that there is a harmony in the virtues with respect to that which generally encompasses every work: but when this is had, all the virtues in special are not necessarily had, because this does not belong to some virtue according to species, except by adaptation: but it is a disposition of matter in general in which afterwards this or that virtue may receive its proper rationale.

To that which is objected through reason, it must be said that this is true: because the habit of reason rules the habit of the irascible and concupiscible, just as a power rules a power: but from this it does not follow that, having had one, another is had, except in a qualified sense: for he who is chaste has prudence with respect to the election of that which is required for chastity, but not prudence in an absolute sense, and of fortitude sometimes he has nothing according to how fortitude is properly taken.

To another it must be said that prudence can be had in a qualified sense in each one divisively: but it is not necessary that, having had some one of them, another is had absolutely: or even that, having had one, others are had: because there are many operating to the contrary.

To another it must be said that the difficult and the measure which are in the work of virtue in general, are not properly of fortitude and temperance, except in a qualified sense, and through appropriation: and therefore it is not necessary that on account of that they be had absolutely, but they are had in a qualified sense only.

To the last it must be said that he who has chastity is chaste: but it does not follow that he is virtuous: because virtuous says more than the genus of chastity, namely a plenitude, which is not present except by perceiving all the species. Hence there is not merely a progression from the species to the genus there, but from the habit of the species to the habit of the genus along with an accident, which is the condition of participation with all the species: and therefore the argumentation is not valid, just as this one is not: 'This is a man: therefore he participates in animal according to every species.'

Articulus 2 — Whether The Theological Virtues Are Connected

Whether the theological virtues are connected?

Secondly it is asked, Whether the theological virtues are connected to one another?

Now it seems that they are. § 1. For a perfection ought to correspond to the perfected: but the perfected, which is the soul, is not without the parts of the virtues united in one substance: therefore the perfection, which is grace, is not without the virtues united in the substance of grace.

§ 2. Also, There is no convention of Christ with Belial therefore someone cannot simultaneously be a vessel of God and a vessel of the devil: but through a theological virtue informed by grace someone is a vessel of God and a temple: therefore he is not a vessel of the devil: but through any vice whatever he would be a vessel of the devil: therefore he has no vice: but vices are not expelled except through opposite virtues: therefore he himself has every virtue, who has one informed by grace.

§ 3. Also, Augustine says that it is impious to hope for half a pardon from God: therefore he who receives pardon for sin through one virtue expelling sin, himself receives pardon according to every virtue expelling any sin whatever: therefore he who has one, has all.

Also, He who has charity, has perfection for merit: therefore he has everything by which he can merit: but this is any virtue whatever: therefore he himself has any virtue whatever.

§ 4. Also, on Isa 16:11: My bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab, the Gloss says: A harp does not emit a sound to the composition, if one string has been corrupted. So the spirit or bowels of the Prophet, if one of the virtues is missing, will not resound a sweet melody. Therefore it is necessary that all be present.

§ 5. Also, James 2:10: Whosoever shall keep the whole law, but offend in one point, is become guilty of all. Therefore by opposites he who has one, has all.

§ 6. Also, on that: I have done judgment, etc., the Gloss says: The whole from the part, so that he who has one, has all: and he who lacks one, lacks all.

ON THE CONTRARY § 1. If someone has one, he has all: but Christ had one, namely charity: therefore he had faith, which is false. The same objection holds for the blessed who have charity, and do not have faith.

§ 2. If perhaps it is said that what is said, 'He who has one, has all', is understood according to the state of a pure wayfarer: then there is still a counter-instance: because an innocent has charity, and does not have penance.

§ 3. Also, One having charity does not necessarily have virginity.

§ 4. And if it is said that virginity signifies a virtue with a state: and virtue can be had without such a state. It is objected still concerning perseverance without which there is no salvation: and it is certain that he who has charity does not necessarily have perseverance.

§ 5. Also, We see expressly that he who has faith and hope does not necessarily have charity: therefore not, etc.

§ 6. Also, With charity increasing, initial fear decreases, as was proved above in the Text: therefore fear is lost: and it is a virtue according to how virtue is generally accepted: therefore it is not that he who has one has all.

§ 7. Also, Of every Saint it is read that there was none found like unto him: but this cannot be according to the figure of the body or nature: therefore it is referred to virtue: therefore any Saint whatever has a virtue which another does not have: therefore he who, etc.

Solution. It must be said that infused and formed virtues are connected, such that one being had, all are had. Now of this connection there are three species. The first and principal is from grace, which is a potential whole to the virtues: and therefore just as the perfection of a potential whole consists in all the parts taken simultaneously and united in the whole, so the perfection of grace consists in all the virtues taken simultaneously and united in the whole. Now how this is, and how it differs from the virtues, seek in Book III of the Sentences. Therefore, in order that the perfection of grace be in the essence of the soul and the powers, it is necessary that every virtue be infused in grace. The second rationale is from charity, which is the form of every virtue in its meritorious being: and to the end that the formed be proportioned to the form, it is necessary that all be infused with it. And how this also is, that charity is the form and end of virtue, was noted above in the treatise on charity. The third rationale of connection was touched upon in objecting: and this is of general justifying justice, which does not permit any vice to be present: and since a vice is not formally expelled except through the opposite virtue, it is necessary that all virtues be present.

With these things held, it is plain to respond to the objects to the contrary.

For it must be said to the first, that he who has one, has all, according to what is essential and of perfection in them: and as to this Christ had faith, because he had the cognition which is of perfection in faith, and he had comprehension which like a perfection corresponds to hope.

To another it must be said that penance signifies a virtue by which one is moved to the detestation of sin along with an accident, which is sorrow for what has been committed. Hence as to the substantial act it is in an innocent person, which is to rise up against sin insofar as it is a sin: but that which is accidental to penance is not necessary to be in an innocent person: and from this accident the name of penance is imposed: and therefore he is not said to have penance, although he has the substance of the virtue of penance.

To another it must be said that virginity also names continence with an accident on the part of the body: and it is not necessary for that accident to be present with any virtue whatever, even if the virtue is present.

To another it must be said that perseverance is said in a twofold way, namely the purpose of persevering, and the habit moving to persevering: and the latter is had with any virtue whatever. Alternatively it must be said that perseverance is the consummation in the good according to act, and this is not given except in the last instant of life: and therefore that is not a virtue, but a gift given by God at the end: and it is not necessary to have this with any virtue whatever.

To another it must be said that it is understood of formed virtues, not unformed ones: but the faith and hope which are had without charity are unformed, and not formed.

To another it must be said that with charity increasing, the imperfection of fear decreases, but the essence of the fear of the Lord remains forever and ever: and how this is, was held above in the question concerning fear.

Therefore to the last it must be said that this is said of the Saints as to the use, and not as to the habit of the virtue. Or it is said according to some according to a gift of gratuitous grace (gratiae gratis datae), and not making one pleasing (gratum facientis). But the first solution is more probable, and fits the sayings of the Saints more.

Articulus 3 — Whether Vices Also Are Connected

Are vices also connected?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether vices are connected just as virtues?

Now it seems that they are: because § 1. Just as good works and virtues have charity as their root, so evil ones have lust (libido) from which they arise: therefore, just as virtues are connected on account of the root of charity, so vices are connected through the root of lust.

§ 2. Also, If a vice is present in someone, no virtue is present: therefore a privation of every virtue is present: therefore to him in whom a privation of every virtue is generally present, every vice is generally present: therefore he who has one vice, has every vice: therefore vices are connected just as virtues.

§ 3. Also, He who offends in one, is become guilty of all but he is not guilty of all except through the vices opposite to all: therefore every vice is present in him: therefore they are connected, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, If some virtue and some vice were present simultaneously, someone would be good and evil: but this cannot be: therefore he who is evil, is universally evil: but he is not universally evil except according to every vice whatever: therefore he has every vice whatever: therefore they are connected.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. If vices are connected: therefore they are all infused by some one infused thing: which is false, because they are not infused, but are caused by us.

§ 2. Also, There is no vice which is not caused by our works: but our works are divided: therefore also vices: therefore it is not that, having had one, all are had. And because it is easy to object to this, let what has been objected suffice.

Solution. It must be said that vices are not connected on account of the cause which was touched upon in the last objection: because namely they are caused by works divisively, of which one being had the rest is not had: and therefore neither are the vices left behind from them conjoined to one another, such that with one inhering, another inheres.

Therefore to the first it must be said that lust is not of one rationale which is in the vices: but rather they are distinguished according to delectable objects, which are diverse according to their rationale. But it is not thus concerning charity: because charity is the love of the highest good, which is always one and the same in whomever it is loved, and therefore it unites the virtues in itself.

To another it must be said that no virtue formed through grace is present in him in whom one vice is present. But when it is said that this person is deprived of every virtue: It must be said that privation is twofold, just as also in natures: for sometimes privation is in matter from the absence of a form, as it is in substantial forms, when the absence and presence of one form makes a mutation: but sometimes it is founded upon a contrary form: just as if we say, From a non-man a man is made, we signify by 'non-man', which sounds like a privation, the subject of humanity without the form, and not a form contrary to humanity. But when we say, From non-white, white is made, we designate by 'non-white' black or a medium which compared to white is black: and then the privation posits a contrary form. So we say that one is deprived universally of formed virtue, such that contrary vices are not supposed, but a bare subject. And from that universal privation it cannot be inferred that vices are present: because that privation does not posit a vice, but a bare subject not having a virtue.

To another it must be said that he who offends in one, is become guilty of all with respect to the punishment of loss, and not with respect to the habits of all guilts, or sensible punishments, that is, he loses the virtues responding to the obedience of all the precepts: but nevertheless from this the contraries of the virtues are not posited, as was said: and therefore it is not necessary that vices be connected.

To another it must be said that no formed virtue is present even in him who has one sin: and therefore he is simply evil: but it is not necessary on account of this that the contrary of every virtue whatever according to species be present: and the cause of this has already been assigned.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Informed Virtues Are Like Or Equal

Are formed virtues equal or alike?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says: Whether indeed one possesses all equally, etc.

Now here two questions fall upon this part, of which the first is, Whether formed virtues are equal or alike? The second, Whether one being intensified, another is intensified?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. In the Text it is held that the cardinal virtues are equal: therefore much more the theological ones.

§ 2. Further, it was established above that faith, hope, charity, and their operation are equal: therefore the other virtues are as well.

§ 3. Further, if one of the virtues were stronger or better than another in the same human being, one would make the human being better, and more meritorious, than the other: therefore the same human being would be good and better, and more and less worthy of eternal life: which is incongruous: therefore it seems that the virtues are equal.

§ 4. Further, they are all infused at the same time: but if they were not equal when they are infused, it would be necessary that that increase which one has over the other would be either on the part of the efficient cause, or on the part of the grace in which they are infused. But it is evident that it is not on the part of the efficient cause, because God, who is the efficient cause of an infused virtue, relates equally to the virtues which He infuses simultaneously: therefore as much as He creates of the one, so much does He create of the other. Again, if the increase were on the part of the subject, since they are continuously in the subject, they would continuously grow, which is false. But if it were on the part of grace, then it would be necessary that the same human being would have greater grace according to one virtue than according to another, and thus he would be more and less pleasing [to God] according to diverse parts of the soul: and this is ridiculous, because all parts of the soul of any human being whatsoever are equally pleasing to God.

But against this is: § 1. What was established above in distinction 35, that many excel in faith, and not in science: and yet science is a gift and a virtue (taking the name 'virtue' generally): therefore the virtues are not on par or equal.

§ 2. Further, 1 Corinthians 13:13: But now there remain faith, hope, charity, these three: but the greatest of these is charity. [291]

Resolution: It should be said that the virtues are equal in their essence, and in the formation of grace: in essence, because they are simple in the same genus of simplicity, and in one quantity of grace in the same human being: but in the formation of grace, because grace that makes pleasing informs all of them equally. But in four other things following upon the essence of virtue, they are unequal. And the first is concerning dignity: because charity, by the fact that it never falls away, is the greatest and more worthy among them all. But the second is in the generality of form and end and efficient cause: and thus again charity is greater, because it moves generally in a meritorious work, which another virtue does not do: and it itself is the form and end of the virtues, and as to this it is greater. The third is its radication in the subject: because a disposition through a work operates toward this: and the work of all of them is not equally frequent: and therefore whichever one is more frequently in operation is more radicated than another. The fourth mode is use: because it is not necessary that the virtues which are present equally according to essence, should also be present equally according to use.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it is understood as to use.

To the other it must be said, that it is understood as to dignity.

And thus the resolution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 5 — Whether By One Intensified Virtue All Are Extended, And, Whether Charity Alone Suffices For Salvation

Whether by one virtue being intensified all are intensified? and, Whether charity alone suffices for salvation?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether by one being intensified all are intensified?

And it seems that they are: § 1. For let it be granted that when one is intensified another is not intensified: then the virtues can be unequal: and this is against what was proven above: therefore it is necessary that when one is intensified another is intensified.

§ 2. Further, the intensification of the virtues is only through the intensification of grace: but grace is in each single virtue: therefore it is equally intensified in each single one.

§ 3. Further, a virtue is not intensified except by God on account of merit, as has frequently been proven above: but God relates equally to all virtues: and merit, as to that which is to elicit all meritorious acts, belongs equally to all the virtues: therefore since the causes of intensification relate equally to all the virtues, they seem to be intensified equally.

§ 4. Further, if on account of their connection in grace and on account of the bond of charity, it is necessary that when one is possessed all are possessed, for the same causes it seems necessary that when one is intensified all are intensified.

§ 5. Further, Augustine in book VII of On the Trinity: "The virtues which are in the human mind, although being diverse they are understood in individual ways, yet they are not separated from one another, but are always equal." Therefore it is necessary that when one is intensified another is intensified: because otherwise they would become unequal.

§ 4. Intensification seems to be from work: and the operation of all of them does not seem to be equal: therefore neither are the virtues equally intensified.

291. 2 Cor 6:15

§ 5. Further, the reason which is posited, that when one is intensified another is intensified, due to the charity which equally informs them, does not seem to be valid: because in bodily things we see this, that two combustible things are not equally heated by the same fire at an equal distance: therefore also in the virtues it can be thus, that one receives more of the heat of charity than another.

§ 5. Further, it was established above that as charity increases, wisdom increases, and fear decreases: therefore fear and wisdom are unequal virtues.

§ 4. Further, in diverse human beings the virtues are not equal: therefore even in the same human being they can be unequal.

Further, next to this it is asked, Whether charity alone suffices for salvation without the others?

And it seems that it does: because § 1. The merit and quantity of merit consists according to it alone: therefore it seems that the others are superfluous, since they are not possessed except for meriting.

§ 2. Further, Augustine says that charity alone divides between the children of the kingdom and the children of perdition: therefore the others are considered as nothing.

§ 3. Further, in the following part of the distinction it is held that it alone completes the law, and if we are not able to unroll all the scrolls, that we should have charity which fulfills the whole: therefore it alone suffices, and all the other virtues are superfluous, as it seems.

Resolution: It must be said to the first part of this disputation, that when one virtue is intensified all the others are intensified as to a certain mode: and as to another mode one can be intensified without another. For if a virtue is compared to its efficient cause, or to its efficacy of meriting, or if it is considered in its substance, one cannot be intensified without another. But if it is compared to its radication in the subject, one can be intensified without another: because this is from the work in which the virtues are necessarily not conjoined, but divided.

And through this the resolution to all the other things objected concerning the first part of the question is clear: because the arguments proceed according to this distinction.

For to the first which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that according to operation a virtue is not intensified except according to its radication in the subject: and this is well conceded: for thus one virtue is intensified while another is not intensified.

To the other it must be said, that it is not similar, because pieces of wood and other things relate unequally to the reception of fire: but the virtues relate equally according as they are infused to the information of charity.

To the other it must be said, that fear does not decrease in what is substantial to it insofar as it is a gift of the Holy Spirit, but as to its imperfection, as has frequently been said elsewhere.

To the other it must be said, that the virtues in diverse human beings do not have a connection in one thing by the growth of which they would grow: but in one human being they are connected in grace and charity: and therefore when those are intensified, it is necessary that all be intensified.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that charity suffices as a mover: but for motion there is required not only a universal mover, but also a particular one by which the act may be specified. And something similar to this is in nature, and also in a human being. For in nature, the sun moves universally in generation: but for the generation of this or that thing there must also be a particular mover in this or in that, such as a bean, or a pea. But in a human being, reason or the will moves in mechanical works: but for the motion of the foot or the hand there is also required the particular mover of the hand or the foot. Thus in a meritorious motion the universal mover is charity: but specifying movers of the acts are required, such as those of faith, hope, and temperance, through which we merit.

And through this the resolution to the whole is clear: because those arguments which are brought forward only conclude concerning the force of the universal mover, and not concerning the force of the particular mover.

Articulus 6 — Whether We Are Bound To Fulfill The Decalogue With Respect To The Deed And The Mode Of The Deed

Are we bound to fulfill the decalogue as to the work and the mode of the work?

Then it is asked concerning the third part of this distinction which begins there, C, Since there are two precepts, etc.

And the principal question here is, Whether the mode is in the precept or the work alone? That is to ask, Whether we are bound to fulfill the decalogue only as to the works which the precepts utter, or whether we are bound to fulfill the decalogue as to the work and the mode of the work, so that we may do it in charity?

§ 1. For the text [of the Sentences] seems to mean this: and it has often been held what is said in 1 Timothy 1:5, that the end of the precept is charity and the Gloss says that it is called the end of consummation: therefore the law of the decalogue is not perfectly fulfilled without charity: but we are bound to the perfect fulfillment of the law: therefore we are bound to the mode so that we fulfill it out of charity.

§ 2. Further, Matthew 19:17: If you will enter into life, keep the commandments. Therefore the observation of the commandments leads into life: but it does not lead [into life] except through charity: therefore they ought to be fulfilled out of charity: therefore the mode is in the precept.

§ 3. Further, Deuteronomy 6:5: You shall love the Lord your God with your whole heart. But it is evident that this is a precept of the law, and it must be referred to a work, and not except to a work of the decalogue: therefore the decalogue is to be fulfilled in it: therefore we are bound to the mode.

§ 4. Further, the deformation of works is in the prohibition: therefore from opposites, the formation is in the precept.

§ 5. Further, Matthew 5:20: Unless your justice abounds more than that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. But it is evident that they did the works: therefore we are bound to the mode.

§ 6. Further, James 2:10: Whosoever shall keep the whole law, but offend in one point, is become guilty of all. The Gloss: that is, in charity: therefore charity is in the precept: and it itself is the mode: therefore the mode is in the precept.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Augustine and Jerome say that let him be anathema, who says that God has commanded what is impossible to be fulfilled: therefore nothing is in the precept which is not in our power: but to have charity is not in our power: therefore it is not in the precept.

§ 2. Further, the virtues are not in our power: therefore neither is their mode: therefore we are not bound to do works with the mode of virtue.

§ 3. Further, someone loves God with natural love: and it is evident that he does not sin by loving: but if he were bound to love out of charity he would sin: therefore we are not bound to the mode.

§ 4. Further, someone existing in mortal sin honors his parents: it is evident that he does not sin, but rather is absolved from the commandment: therefore he was not bound to do it out of charity.

§ 5. Further, Augustine says that to turn away from evil always avoids punishment: therefore he does not merit punishment: therefore he who turns away, yet existing in mortal sin, is absolved from that prohibition: therefore he was not bound to fulfill it out of charity.

Resolution: It must be said that concerning this question the opinions of great men are diverse: and as far as I can recall, the sayings of the Masters are diverse concerning this matter in four ways. For some say that the mode is in the precept: and they are divided into two opinions. For some say that to fulfill the decalogue is only an affirmative precept, and obliges always, but not for always. Rather, it obliges for a time and place: and they determine that time as when a human being is bound, when he has charity, and turns his attention to the fact that he is bound to fulfill it out of charity. And it is easy for them to respond to the objections: because they say that a human being is not obliged to the impossible: because although a human being is obliged to do it out of charity, nevertheless he is not bound to discharge and fulfill it except when he has it: and then it is not impossible for him to fulfill the commandment out of charity.

Others say that a human being is bound to the mode always, and for always.

And to the first which is objected to the contrary, they say that although it is impossible for a human being to have charity of himself, nevertheless he can do something, having done which he will have charity, and thus in a certain way it is possible to have charity. And in the same way they respond to the second.

To the third they say that he who loves God with natural love, does not sin from the fact that he loves, but from the fact that he omits the form.

To the other some say that he is absolved from the work wrought (opus operatum): but because he did not do it as he ought, therefore he sinned.

To the last they say that he avoids the punishment which is due to that transgression who avoids a sin of commission: but he does not avoid the punishment which is due to an omission, from the fact that he omits the mode.

But those opinions have few followers. Therefore others say that one is not bound to the mode: and they have a twofold mode of opining. For some say absolutely that we are in no way bound to the mode, as the last arguments prove.

And they respond to the first which is objected to the contrary, that charity is not the end of the precept according to the work which is in the precept, but according to its being meritorious. And this is true, that without the form the law is not fulfilled meritoriously.

To the other it must be said, that it is one thing to fulfill the decalogue, and another thing to do a meritorious work of eternal life: and the Lord speaks there of him who wishes to come to life through a work, and he ought to have the mode.

To the other it must be said, that in that commandment a human being is not bound to do except what he can, and therefore he fulfills it if by natural love he sets nothing before God: and this is according to the charity of the way, not of the homeland.

To the other it must be said, that it is not similar: because deformation is in our power, but formation is not in our power.

To the other it must be said, that that abundance refers to having life, and not to the absolute fulfillment of the decalogue.

To the other it must be said, that charity is not in the precept, although it is lost through guilt: because guilt is in our power, and charity is not.

But because it is expressly held above in the second book of this volume, that it is the Pelagian heresy that a human being without grace is able to fulfill all the divine commandments, therefore a fourth group comes and distinguishes a threefold intention [or fulfillment]. The first is that which, not fulfilled, induces the guilt of transgression. The second is that which, fulfilled, leads to life, and not fulfilled, does not lead to it. The third is that which, fulfilled, gives life. As to the first they say that we are not bound to the mode: because provided we do the works of the precepts, we are un-obligated from the precept, and we do not transgress: but as to the second we are bound to the mode: because otherwise we shall not have life, unless we act in charity. As to the third we are bound to the mode and to perseverance: because that immediately joins to life. And this has more defenders than any of the superior views: and it is sufficiently clear how according to them it will be responded to the objections for both sides through the responses previously made.

DISTINCTIO XXXVII

Divisio Textus

But now the distribution of the decalogue, which in two commandments, etc.

Here begins that part which is concerning the repairing dispositions through works: and these are the works which fall under precept.

And this part is divided according to the number of the precepts into ten parts, in which however the Master posits three distinctions. And in the first part is posited the exposition of seven precepts, namely of the three which are in the first tablet, and of the four precepts contained in the second tablet. In the second and third, which are 38 and 39, is contained the exposition of the eighth precept which is the fourth of the second tablet. And that part begins there, A, The fifth precept is, etc. But in the third part which contains distinction 40, he expounds the last two precepts, which begins there, A, The sixth precept is: You shall not desire, etc.

And through this the division of the whole is clear.

Articulus 1 — What A Precept Is

What is a precept?

But before the Text there occur here four things to be inquired, namely what is a precept?

Secondly, What is the distinction of the precepts and of the tablets in which they were contained according to diverse authors? Thirdly, According to what is the sufficiency of the precepts taken? And fourthly, How are the capital vices prohibited?

To the first however, what is a precept, let the definition of Augustine be taken, given in the book On Virginity, where he says thus: A precept is this to which not to obey is a sin.

But against this assignation it is objected thus: § 1. A counsel is that to which not to obey in a given case is a sin: therefore a counsel is a precept: for in a given case I am bound to sell all things and give to the poor, and in a given case to expose myself to danger for the faith: therefore a counsel is a precept.

§ 2. Further, a vow is that to which not to obey is a sin: therefore a vow is a precept, as it seems.

§ 3. Further, anyone is bound to observe obedience, for to act against it is a sin.

§ 4. Further, a Prelate is one to whom not to obey is a sin: therefore a Prelate is a precept.

§ 5. Further, Scripture is that to which not to obey is a sin: therefore Scripture is a precept.

§ 6. Further, if not to obey a precept is a sin: therefore a commanded work is a meritorious work: which is false according to the opinion of many, as is clear from the preceding distinction.

§ 7. Moreover, since the work of any virtue falls within a precept, it ought to be defined through another virtue just as through obedience: and most of all it seems, that through charity: because as the Apostle says, The end of the precept is charity from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith.

Resolution: It must be said that the assignation of a precept which is given by Augustine, is given concerning it insofar as it is obligatory, to differentiate it from a counsel: and therefore it follows in the text thus: A precept is that to which not to obey is a sin: not a counsel, which if you wish to use, you will obtain less good, but you will not perpetrate any evil. And therefore if someone wanted to define a precept according to the substance according to which it is obligatory, he could define it thus: A precept is a command obligating to the observation of a commanded act out of the authority of the one commanding, or out of the rationale of the commanded thing. For a precept is in every genus of command, and sometimes it obliges only because it is commanded and not of itself: but sometimes of itself. But Augustine takes in common the mode of obligation which is in a precept.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that a counsel of itself never obliges, as Augustine says: but by accident that which is counseled obliges, namely if in a given case there is a precept concerning the same thing of which there is a counsel: as if I cannot honor my neighbor unless I sell all things, then I am bound to sell all things and give to the poor in a time of necessity, when the poor are dying of hunger unless I sell: and if from a vow a counsel becomes necessary, because to render it is of precept, although to vow is of counsel.

To the other it must be said, that a vow is considered in two ways, namely in vowing, and in rendering. If it is taken in vowing: then not to obey is not a sin, because to vow is of counsel: but to obey obtains a greater good. But if it is considered in rendering: then it obliges necessarily: but this is because to render it is of precept.

To the other it must be said, that one need not obey obedience except insofar as it respects a precept: but obedience obeys a precept: and therefore nothing is said by stating that obedience is what is obeyed, unless obedience is taken in a vulgar sense for the thing enjoined out of a precept: just as religious are accustomed to say,

"I have the obedience of doing this", that is, I have the mandate.

To the other it must be said, that a Prelate is obeyed in one way, and a precept in another: namely a Prelate as the one commanding: but a precept as that which is mandated to execution through the obedience by which we are obligated to it.

To the other it must be said, that we obey Scripture as the rule and doctrine of faith and morals, but precepts as obligating to a work. And the difference of this obedience is taken from this which he says, to which not to obey is a sin: for it is not universally a sin not to obey Scripture.

To the other it must be said, that it does not follow if not to obey is a sin, that to obey is a merit: because many things are required for merit besides the fulfillment of the act of the precept: but nothing is required for a sin besides the transgression of the precept, which is in our power.

To the other it must be said, that particular precepts can be affirmative, and are concerning the work of any virtue: but in the decalogue precepts are not assigned except generally, as they are contained in natural right, as will be clear below.

To the last it must be said, that love or charity does not respect the precept, but rather that which is commanded insofar as it is a meritorious work: but obedience respects the precept insofar as it is a precept, and therefore a precept is rather defined through the act of obedience than of charity.

Articulus 2 — On The Distinction Of The Precepts

Concerning the distinction of the precepts.

Secondly, it is asked concerning the distinction of the precepts and of the tablets according to diverse authors.

§ 1. For Josephus says that there were two tablets, and in each of them were contained five commandments. But Gregory posits four in the first, and six in the second. But Augustine three in one, and seven in the other. And there seems to be contrariety among them.

§ 2. Further, Origen says the first commandment is: You shall not have strange gods before me. The second: You shall not make to yourself a graven thing, nor any likeness, etc.: and Augustine computes these two as one, as is held in the Text. And this is again a certain contrariety.

Further, Origen says it is one commandment: You shall not covet your neighbor's wife: and, You shall not covet another's goods. And Augustine says these are two commandments. And behold again a certain third contrariety.

Moreover, Origen seems to speak better as to the first: because, as is held in the book On the God of Socrates, there were three kinds of gods, and some were spiritual invisible kinds of gods: for whom neither a sculpture could be made, nor a likeness, nor even a figment: and they seem to be prohibited when it is said: There shall be no other gods for you besides me. But there were other gods according to two kinds of bodies, namely celestial, and terrestrial, which are afterwards prohibited when he says: You shall not make to yourself a graven thing, etc. Therefore it seems that they are two commandments, and thus Augustine speaks badly by dividing the precepts.

§ 3. Further, as to the other part Origen seems to distinguish better: because the concupiscence of a wife and the concupiscence of a thing do not differ except through their matter, as it seems: but no distinction is taken according to matter: therefore those which Augustine says are two, seem to be one, as Origen says.

Further, it is additionally asked concerning the contrariety which is about these commandments. For it is said, Exodus 20:18, after these commandments were issued, that all the people saw the voices and the flames, and the sound of the trumpet, and the mount smoking, etc. and immediately below, vv. 22 and 23, it is subjoined, that they heard only one commandment from heaven from the mouth of the Lord, where he speaks thus:

You have seen that I have spoken to you from heaven. You shall not make gods of silver, nor shall you make to yourselves gods of gold. [292] Therefore there seems to be a certain contrariety.

If perhaps you say that in the second place where he repeats one, it ought to be understood that another is repeated. On the contrary: the Gloss says in the same place: He repeats what was said in the first commandment, so that through silver and gold, all other idols may be understood: as it is said in Psalm 113:4: The idols of the gentiles are silver and gold, etc. [293] But it is evident that there is some special cause why he repeats what was said in the first commandment, and not in the others.

§ 2. Moreover, the text seems to say first, that all the people heard the voices of the ten precepts. And Rabbi Moses says that the people heard only one, namely the first: There shall be no strange gods for you besides me. And he says that this is the opinion of many Doctors. Therefore this seems to be the same contrariety which is elicited from the text.

If perhaps you say that that hearing and seeing was not in the exterior sense only, but in relation to the interior sense, as the Gloss of Augustine seems to say in the same place making the question: How did the people see voices, since a voice is the object of hearing, and not of sight? then it seems that they ought not to have heard all the commandments: because not all have the same order to the intellect. Because nine are in themselves intelligible, and one does not fall in itself in the intellect, namely concerning the observation of the sabbath: therefore it seems that that one should have been specially expressed outside the number of those.

Further, the Jews ask, Why rather did the Lord speak these ten words or some of them before the people and in the hearing of the people, than all the judicial and ceremonial and sacramental ones which follow? For it cannot be that cause which they say, that these generally pertained to all: because those as well they were generally bound to observe.

Further, it is asked concerning the distinction of these commandments. § 1. Since it is commonly said that these are the commandments of natural law, why are those which belong to natural law not inserted into them, as was said to the first human being: Of every tree of paradise eat, etc. And again, Increase and multiply, etc.

If you say that this is so, because they had been given beforehand. Against this is, that according to this the precept concerning the sabbath ought not to have been repeated either, since it had been given beforehand.

Moreover, Augustine in the book On the Ten Strings says that the ten commandments return through reduction into the two commandments of the love of God and neighbor: and these two again are reduced into one commandment of natural law, namely that, Whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you also the same to them. And concerning this reduction nothing is determined here: and therefore it seems that it is a diminution.

§ 2. Moreover, either these ten commandments are determined particularly, or universally. If particularly: then there ought to be many more, because then the act of any [virtue] whatever will have a special affirmative commandment, and the act of any vice whatever will have a special negative one. But if they are determined universally: then it was sufficient to determine them according to that into which as into a first universal they are reduced, namely, Whatsoever you would that men should do to you, etc.

Further it is asked concerning the diversity of the precepts which the Master gives, namely that certain precepts have a cause on the part of that which is commanded, certain on the part of him to whom it is commanded: and those which have a cause on the part of the commanded thing, some have a perpetual cause, some a temporal one. For concerning this diversity nothing is held here, nor even in the law: and thus this treatise on the precepts seems to be diminished.

Further it is asked concerning another twofold diversity which is found in these commandments. For in the first tablet are posited three commandments, of which the first two are negative, and the third is affirmative. For the reason of the first is pre-posited, when it is said: The Lord your God, is one God: and that reason is a credibile of an article of faith. But the reason of the second is taken from the punishments which he will inflict on the transgressor, when he says, that he will not hold him guiltless who takes the name of God in vain. But the reason of the third is taken from past things which he did: because on the seventh day he rested from all work. But in the second chapter the first one posited is affirmative, and it is not confirmed except through the reason of a reward: and all the others are negative: and no other reason is applied moving to the mode of their obligation.

Therefore let it be asked, Whence comes this diversity?

A second diversity is: because in the affirmative ones it is universally found to use verbs of the imperative mood, as: Remember that you keep holy the sabbath day. Honor your father, etc. But in the negative ones he universally uses verbs of the indicative mood, as, You shall not have strange Gods, etc. And the reason for this is also asked.

Resolution: It must be said to the first, that the tablets of the Testament are considered in many ways, namely in themselves, and in the relation of those things which were contained in them, and to those things to which they ordered. But Josephus considers them in themselves: and therefore it is true what he says, that each contained five commandments. But according to the order of the commandments which were in Scripture, Origen and Augustine consider them. And because four or three order to God, but six or seven order to the neighbor: therefore, such an end having been considered, three or four were in one, and six or seven were in the other. Because there was no reason why two should be given, morally speaking, except so that it might be understood that they ordered to two things: or allegorically on account of the two Testaments.

But according to this resolution it seems that there ought to be three on account of the order of oneself to oneself. To this it must be said, that it was not necessary, because every order requires diversity in its extremes: but of oneself to oneself there is no diversity: therefore neither is there an order. Or it may be said otherwise (as was held above) that a commandment of the love of oneself is not given: because in the order to the neighbor there is given to the one loving a principality of loving himself. Thus here in the order to the neighbor the order to oneself is understood: and therefore it was not necessary for there to be a third tablet signifying this.

To the other it must be said, that in truth Augustine distinguishes better than Origen: because Origen attended only to the material diversity, which can be between a figment or idol, and a graven thing, and a likeness: for a likeness is called that to which something responds in the nature of things: but a figment or idol, to which nothing responds in reality, but the mind has fashioned it, such as a goat-stag or a chimera. But Augustine attended to the unity of the end, which is in a likeness and an idol, namely that both are set up for worship, or for invocation: whether it is taken of bodies, or of created unclean spirits, who delude the minds of men in this, that they make themselves to be worshipped as gods.

To the other it must be said, that in the twofold concupiscence there is not only a material diversity, but also of the end: because a wife is coveted for one thing, and a thing for another: for a wife for coitus and a thing for possessing.

And therefore Augustine distinguishes better and more subtly than Origen.

To the other, the resolutions of diverse authors are diverse. Some say, that therefore he om-

§ 1. ...all these things he spoke before the people: because they are of the natural law, and proper reason dictated them to each one.

§ 2. And to the objection to the contrary, they say that by the repetition of one, it is understood that the others ought to be repeated.

§ 3. To the other objection regarding the Sabbath, they say that as far as the rest of the mind in God, and not in a creature, it is of the natural law: but as far as the bodily rest of the Sabbath, it was of common observance among the fathers of the Old Testament, and known to all as if it were from nature: and therefore it was openly spoken among the others. But the others, namely the judicial and ceremonial precepts, needed human interpretation and the teaching of the wiser men: and therefore he proposed such things through the wise men and leaders of the people. But the better ones among the Jews, such as Rabbi Moses, and Rabbi Eleazar, and Rabbi Jochanan, said that although these are of the natural law, yet not equally: and therefore, with the people listening, he spoke only one which conscience commonly dictates to everyone: because men have always consented in this, that the principle of the universe is but one. But the mind does not so dictate the others: because God is named with many names, and His ineffable name is not understood. And similarly concerning the Sabbath, and other things which are directed towards the neighbor, they receive exceptions in determined cases. And therefore they say, that in the open he spoke to the consciences of men only one: and then that which is had first, that all the people saw the voices, must be referred to interior sight, as Augustine says in the same place in the Gloss:[294] and it is not subjoined in the catalogue of precepts on account of all the preceding things, but on account of the one alone which is first: and that one is also repeated a second time, as the Gloss seems to imply.[295]

§ 4. To the other, it must be said that he rather expresses these, as has been said: because they are natural, and of themselves approach the minds of all: and the others do not do this.

§ 5. To the other, it must be said that those things are of the natural law, concerning which the objection is raised, according as it is ordinative of nature in the necessaries for the being of the individual, and for the permanence of the species: and the care of them has not been clouded over by sin, but rather increased, because defect increases the desire for being: and therefore it was not necessary for those to be determined by the written law by repeating them, but the certain mandate of nature, which was not expressly given to nature outwardly in the beginning, because the mind of man was then well instituted, and by himself he would see in the justice of God what he ought to do for God and neighbor: yet it was written in the mind, namely, "Whatever you wish that men would do to you, etc.", that was the mandate ordering in morals towards God and man, and therefore it was clouded over by sin. But for this the written law was given, so that that which nature, clouded by sin, saw with difficulty, might be explicated by the determination of the Decalogue. And therefore nothing is posited in the Decalogue except what is the explication of the first mandate of nature, which was certain to man in relation to God and to the neighbor.

§ 6. Through this also the solution to the following is clear: because here it is treated of mandates by reduction to one universal first, because nature did not suffice for particulars from that universal: but rather the written law intends to explicate that universal through parts, so that thus corrupted nature may receive more light in morals. But the two precepts of love are not those into which the Decalogue is reduced, as into a common genus, but rather as into the form and perfection of works according as they are meritorious, as has often been said before.

§ 7. To the other, it must be said that these mandates are determined in particular: but by such particulation to which natural reason can attain through its natural power. But further particulation belongs to study and positive right. And therefore such particulation is not treated here: because that falls into many differences according to diverse causes, and cases.

§ 8. To that which is further asked concerning the division of the Masters, it must be said that they consider not that which is commanded, but rather the reason of the precept. And that is threefold, as the Doctors say: because if the reason is in him who commands, then it is a precept of probation and of testing whether he obeys, as was that which was given to Adam, that he should not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. But if it is on the part of the thing commanded: then either it has a perpetual cause, such as those which by themselves are of the genus of the honorable in affirmatives, as to honor parents, and to believe God, and the like: and such as those which are inseparably joined to evil in negatives, as "Thou shalt not steal." Or it has a temporal cause: and then it does not bind unless that cause exists, as was, "Increase and multiply": the cause of which was the paucity of men worshiping God: and when that cause does not exist, men are unbound from the mandate. But here precepts are determined only according to those by which man is ordered to God or to neighbor in common, as will be clear below: and therefore such differences are not posited here.

§ 9. To the other, it must be said that that question asks three things, namely why are there more negative than affirmative?

§ 10. And, why does he use a different verbal mood in the affirmatives and negatives?

§ 11. To the first, it must be said that the Decalogue is given according to the state of corrupt nature, which is more prone to harming: and moreover because it happens to sin in many ways, and to do well in one way, therefore there are more prohibitions than affirmative mandates.

§ 12. To the other, it must be said that God is better known through negation than through affirmation, and the neighbor conversely. The reason for which has been stated in the first book of the Sentences. And therefore in the first tablet which orders to God, the negatives are premised, and the affirmatives follow. In the second tablet which orders to the neighbor, for the opposite cause it is conversely. But the first mandate which pertains to faith, which is of truth, it was necessary that it should have an intelligible reason by way of interpretation. But the second pertains to the work of the mouth: and therefore this is not coerced except through punishment. But because prohibition does not merit a reward, but transgression can have punishment: therefore there is determination through punishment, and not through reward. But the third does not have a reason except by showing the end of rest, as will be clear below: because this pertains to reward. But in the second tablet only one is affirmative: because it has a conjoined remuneration on account of the congruity of the act. For as he does to others, so it is congruous for him to receive from God. But prohibitions of themselves do not merit: and therefore a reward is not attached to such: but punishment is not threatened, because it is manifest even according to human laws.

§ 13. To the other, it must be said that command is not over a negation, except in such a way that it is a negation of a command. But that a command should be of a negation, the very nod and inclination of the mind would be founded upon nothing: and no one commanding intends this. Whence just as no one commands himself, so also no one commands, except that something be done. And therefore the imperative mood would be improperly placed before negations, as in affirmations: but negations are well interpreted by indicatives, just as compositions are by affirmatives: and therefore negations are made by the indicative.

Articulus 3 — What The Sufficiency Of The Number Of The Precepts Is

What is the sufficiency of the number of precepts?

294. 1 Corinthians 13:13

§ 14. Thirdly, it is asked concerning the sufficiency of the number of precepts, according to what is it taken? § 15. For no intellect distinguishes in anything unless it has in itself the reason of distinction: and that which it distinguishes must be distinguishable.

§ 16. It is asked therefore, what is its reason, or what is the habit which directs the intellect distinguishing in the precepts?

§ 17. But it seems that there is none pertaining to the proposition: 1. For either they are taken from those things to which the precepts order: and those are none other than God, and the neighbor: and then there ought to be only two mandates: and this is false. Or according to the ways in which the neighbor is helped and harmed, and in which God is served and God is offended: and if they were taken in this way, there would be almost infinite precepts, and not only ten: therefore it seems that the intellect does not have a light directing it in the distinction of precepts: therefore it will not distinguish.

§ 18. 2. Item, if they are distinguished, it is necessary that the distinction be taken according to some of the causes: either therefore according to the efficient, or formal, or material, or final. If they were distinguished according to the efficient. On the contrary: Then there ought to be only one: because the efficient and commander in all mandates is only one, namely God. But if according to the form: then again there will be only one, because the form of obligation necessary for salvation is saved in all precepts. Item, the end is one, namely eternal life. Therefore if they are distinguished, this will be according to the matter of the work, or about what the work is. If according to the matter of the work, since this is very multiplex, as from the matter in which faith, chastity, charity, and all matters of virtues and vices operate: then there will be more precepts than ten. But if according to the matter about which is the act and work, there ought to be only two, namely God, and the neighbor: which again is known to be false.

§ 19. 3. Item, just as it is fitting to tend into one God, so it is fitting to tend into the triune, and thus concerning the other articles of faith: therefore it seems that next to the first there ought to be fourteen precepts according to the number of articles.

§ 20. 4. Item, just as one tends into one God by faith, so one tends by hope and charity: therefore at least there ought to be three mandates concerning the one God.

§ 21. 5. In the same way it is objected concerning the last mandates: because just as there is the concupiscence of the wife and the act of lying with her, so there is the concupiscence of killing and the act of killing: therefore there ought to be two mandates concerning concupiscence and act, as in those.

§ 22. Item, upon that of the Apostle to the Romans: "By murder, contention, deceit": the Gloss says that he speaks in the plural, "By murders", because murder is done by will and by work. Therefore they ought to have been prohibited in diverse mandates, as is done in adultery and the will of adultery, and theft and the will of stealing.

295. 1 Timothy 1:5

§ 23. And the same is the objection concerning the other mandates: therefore it seems that there ought to be more than there are.

§ 24. 6. Item, just as it happens to offend God with heart and mouth, so it happens to offend by work: but we have one regarding the heart or two, namely, "Thou shalt not have alien gods before me." And another concerning the mouth, "Thou shalt not take the name of thy God in vain": therefore it seems that we ought also to have one regarding work: therefore there are fewer than there ought to be.

§ 25. 7. Item, just as the neighbor is harmed in himself, in his possessions, and in his wife, so he is harmed also in his children: therefore it seems that a special mandate ought to be taken regarding this: and this again is not had: therefore they are few.

§ 26. 8. But on the contrary it seems that there ought to be fewer: because it is said in Genesis: "All these evils have fallen back upon me against God": and thus no mandate ought to be taken according to this that it is against the neighbor.

§ 27. Item, he who observes the day of the Sabbath (as Augustine says) abstains from vices in work: therefore he does not kill, nor commit adultery, etc.: therefore, the precept concerning the Sabbath day having been given, it was superfluous to give any other precept: therefore it seems that the number of precepts is abundant.

§ 28. And because all such objections are solved by one solution, therefore let these suffice.

§ 29. Solution. It must be said that the number of precepts is taken according to those things ordering to God, and the neighbor. And according to those ordering to God commonly a threefold difference is found: for either it commands a movement on the part of God simply related to our soul which is moved into Him, or according as conscience is invoked as a witness. If in the first way: either it is taken according to the intellect, or according to the affect. If according to the intellect: then it is the first mandate, which says: "Hear, O Israel, etc." And this is clear through this, because hearing is a disciplinable sense, and leads into the truth of the unity of God, which is the end of speculative intelligence. But if it is an end as the end of the affect: then it is the third mandate, which is concerning the rest of the affect in God insofar as He is good. But if it is according to the invocation of God in testimony of conscience: then it is the second mandate, which is: "Thou shalt not take the name of thy God in vain." But the objection which occurs here concerning vain and false swearing, which is prohibited in the second mandate and the eighth, we will solve below, when it will be disputed concerning each mandate in special. However, the Master distinguishes these three mandates otherwise in the Letter, namely according to the three persons: but his distinction is clear, and is good with respect to us; but with respect to those who receive the distinction of the mandates, and not of the persons, as the Jews and pagans, it is not as valid: and therefore this one which has now been stated is more general. But if it orders the mandate towards the neighbor: either this is according to the order into the good, or according to the removal from evil. If into the good: thus is the first of the second tablet, which is to honor father and mother. But if according to recession from the evil which is inflicted upon the neighbor: this is either by work, or by word, or by thought, or by appetite. If by work: either in respect to the person in the being of the individual, or in that which is conjoined to the person for the sustenance of the species, or in the things of fortune ordered to the solace of both. If in the first way: thus it is, "Thou shalt not kill." If in the third way: thus it is, "Thou shalt not steal." And these prohibitions are ordered according as they inflict a greater and lesser harm. But if it is according to word: then it is, "Thou shalt not bear false witness." But if according to the harm of appetite: either it is according to the delectable of the flesh: and then it is, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife." Or according to the delectable ordered to sufficiency: and then it is, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods."

§ 30. This assignation having been had, we must respond to the objections in order.

§ 31. To the first, therefore, it must be said that the habit of the intellect with respect to distinguishing the mandates is due reason according to the order of justice to God and to the neighbor in common as he is a man, not as he is a prelate, or subject: for it is in the notion of natural right with respect to this order naturally impressed upon the intellect: and that justice is the habit ruling the intellect in the distinction of mandates.

§ 32. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although there are only two to which natural right orders us, namely God, and the neighbor: yet it orders to God in many ways, and to the neighbor in several: and according to the diversity of those ways (as is clear in the aforesaid assignation) the plurality of mandates is attended.

§ 33. To that which is objected, that those ways are almost infinite, it must be said that this is true of particular ways: but the common ways are only ten, as was said before.

§ 34. To the other, it must be said that the distinction is taken according to the matter about which the act is, and that matter is God, and the neighbor: but it is in many ways about God, and in many ways about the neighbor: and therefore the number of precepts is multiplied beyond the binary.

§ 35. To the other, it must be said that although there are many articles, yet in all one divine truth is supposed, and one essence of deity: and since the law of the Decalogue is of the natural law, the other articles besides the unity of God are not so expressly but implicitly of natural right: and therefore they are not expressed in the Decalogue.

§ 36. To the other, it must be said that the unity of God is premised according as it is the object of the worship of God. But worship supposes interiorly faith, hope, and love: and exteriorly adoration, and sacrifices, and veneration. And all these are supposed in the first mandate: because under any of these mandates are contained many particular ways. And according to this the multiplication of the mandates of the first tablet can be taken otherwise than before, and better with that which was said pre-understood. To God we hold ourselves in three ways, namely by interior, and exterior worship: and with respect to this is the first mandate. Similarly in word by comparing the truth of our speech to His truth: and this is done through the invocation of the testimony of His truth: and with respect to this is the second mandate. In the third way we hold ourselves with respect to the intention of any work: because the intention always ought to be abstracted from its work and rest in God: just as God rested from all His work in Himself. And since man cannot be compared and moved into God in more ways, there are no more mandates in the first tablet except three.

§ 37. To the other, it must be said that concupiscence is not prohibited specially separated from the act, except in such concupiscibles which cause the mind of man to rest in themselves with a special love besides the act: and those are two, namely the delectable of the flesh, and the delectable of possessions or things: for in those sins it is sinned many times in the heart besides the intention of coming to the work: but in others, namely in murder and false testimony, there is no delectation besides the act, or it is itself caused from it: because many wish to kill so that they may have what they illicitly coveted in the delectations of the flesh or of worldly things: but those are appetized for their own sake: and therefore those concupiscences had a special prohibition, and not others.

§ 38. To the other, it must be said that that work which tends into God: either tends into Him as the term of the act and the end, and then it pertains to interior or exterior worship: and this is included in the first mandate, such as to believe, to hope, to love, and to adore, and the like. Or it tends into Him as the end of the intention, but not of the work, because the work is about the neighbor: and then it pertains with respect to intention to the first mandate, because it principally commands the intention abstracted from the work to rest in God, according to the exposition of Augustine, and in this way according to the work it will be the first, or third mandate.

§ 39. To the other, it must be said that children are not conjoined as a wife: and therefore they are not separated from parents. Whence they can be offended against in two ways, namely as they are in the power of the father, and are usurped into servitude: and then they are enclosed under that, "Thou shalt not covet the thing." Or it is offended against the persons of the children which are separable from the care of the parents: and then they are themselves neighbors like the parents, and have the general offenses which are in neighbors: and therefore there ought to be no special prohibition concerning them.

§ 40. To the other, it must be said that it is so of any mandate, if anyone observes it also meritoriously: because there cannot be merit with any mortal sin: but yet the observation of the Sabbath has only a special act divided from the others, which is the rest of intention in God.

Articulus 4 — How The Capital Vices Are Prohibited In These Commandments

How are the capital vices prohibited in these mandates?

How are the capital vices prohibited in these mandates?

§ 41. Fourthly it is asked, How are the capital vices prohibited in these mandates?

§ 42. 1. For just as there is a special precept in which lust is prohibited, so there ought to be a special one in which gluttony is prohibited: and there seems to be no such precept: therefore the division is diminished.

§ 43. 2. Item, envy does not seem to be prohibited, nor pride, nor acedia: but lust is prohibited, and avarice. And it is asked, why do those three have special mandates in which they are prohibited, and not others?

§ 44. Solution. It must be said that although Augustine in the book On the Ten Strings seems to reduce fornication to the first mandate, because it is an injury of God in His image which is spotted: yet it is understood here according to the Master, that every illicit lying-together whether according to nature, or against nature it be done, is understood to be prohibited in that mandate: "Thou shalt not commit adultery": and in my judgment gluttony is prohibited in the same, because these two vices have an order as cause and caused: because just as in natures the nutritive serves the generative, so in vices gluttony serves lust. Whence Jerome says: "A belly boiling with wine quickly foams up into lust." But avarice is prohibited there: "Thou shalt not steal": and, "Thou shalt not covet." But anger in that mandate, "Thou shalt not kill." And because envy generates anger through vice, therefore envy is understood to be prohibited in the same. But pride against God is prohibited in the first mandate, and pride against the neighbor is prohibited through the contrary in the first of the second tablet, when it is said: "Honor, etc." And in the same place some understand envy also to be prohibited: because someone cannot at the same time honor and envy. But acedia according to all is prohibited through the contrary in the third mandate of the first tablet: because acedia is a sadness in the difficulty of spiritual things, proceeding from the love of the world: and therefore when the Sabbath is sanctified, by rest in God acedia is understood to be excluded.

§ 45. To the other, it must be said that those vices which are of special harm to the neighbor, have express prohibitions: as anger by which the neighbor is harmed in person, and lust by which he is harmed in the conjoined for the propagation of nature, and avarice by which the sustenance of life is subtracted. But the other vices do not have a special harm, but consist in general acts: and therefore they ought not to be specially prohibited in the Decalogue.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Fashioning Of Idols Is Prohibited, And, Whether An Idol Is Nothing In The World, And, Whether In Negative Precepts There Is Simple Negation, Or Also Something Of Affirmation

Whether the formation of idols is prohibited? and, Whether an idol is nothing in the world? and, Whether in negative precepts there is simple negation, or whether there is also something of affirmation?

§ 46. Next it is asked concerning these things which are said in the Letter around the first mandate.

§ 47. And it is asked concerning this which Origen says: "He who makes a species which the eye has not seen, but the mind, etc." For it does not seem that it intends to prohibit this.

§ 48. Item it is asked, how is that understood which he says, that an idol is nothing in the world? For whatever is a thing of art, is something in the world.

§ 49. Further it is asked, whether in this precept and in the other negative ones there is a simple negation, or is some act commanded in them?

§ 50. It seems, that there is simple negation: because Basil says so upon that of the Psalm: "Blessed is the man, etc.", in a certain sermon: "Just as for those ascending a ladder the first step is to depart from the earth, so also the ascent of virtue and piety has its beginning from descending from evil: for any kind of leisure is to be preferred to any work not right, as are those things which are commanded, 'Thou shalt not commit adultery', 'Thou shalt not commit murder': all of which indicate rather the leisure and rest of the soul than the efficacy of any work. But those things which pertain to the profiting of perfection, exact a work, as that: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'" From this it is expressly taken, that the negatives consist in simple negation.

§ 51. But against this is the objection of many: because § 52. 1. Simple negation does not have praise: the observation of a precept has praise: therefore the observation of a precept does not consist in simple negation.

§ 53. 2. Moreover, according to this even he who would never think of the precept, would still observe the precept, which is inconvenient: because even brute animals according to this would observe the precepts.

§ 54. Solution. It must be said that there were certain idols among the ancients, which had as the cause of their error mixtures of virtues from the images of heaven: as in a bull the image of a bull was made with the head of a dog, and it had the virtue of opening secrets, and the like: and therefore such things induced to idolatry: and Origen considered this.

§ 55. To the other, it must be said that the form of art is something: but the form of the composition from the invisible virtue and the corporeal idol was nothing in the idol, except in the opinion of the erring. But what is in the opinion of the erring, is not something in the nature of things or in the world: and therefore the Apostle says, that an idol is nothing in the world.

§ 56. To the other which is further asked concerning negative precepts, one must consent to the Masters, that they posit an interior act: whence when it is said, "Thou shalt not have alien gods before me," the sense is: "You shall will not to have," so that there is posited there a dissent toward alien gods.

§ 57. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said, that Basil is speaking of the exterior act, and not the interior: because since there are two parts of justice: to decline from evil, and to do good: it could not be a part of justice to decline from evil, if it were a pure negation of act: whence the will of declining is posited in the declining.

Articulus 6 — Whether What He Says, You Shall Not Take The Name Of The Lord Your God In Vain, Is Of The Fifth, And, Whether The Master Expounds This Commandment Well

Whether this which he says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," is of the fifth? and, Whether the Master expounds this mandate well?

§ 58. Next it is asked concerning the second mandate which begins there, B, § 2: "The second precept is: 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.'" Where the Master says, that according to the letter it is commanded, that you shall not swear by the name of God for nothing: but it seems, that § 59. 1. This pertains to the fifth mandate of the second tablet, where the Master treats of perjury, which is done by speaking false testimony against the neighbor: and thus this ought not to be of the first tablet, but of the second.

§ 60. 2. Moreover, in speech there is no being false: but there is much difference between vain in speech and false in speech, because the vain can be true: therefore it differs much to take the name of God in vain, and falsely: therefore the Master seems to expound poorly.

§ 61. 3. Item, the Philosopher defines vain in the second book of the Physics, saying, that the vain is that which is towards some end which it does not include (attain): but such a speech is multiplex, as a prayer which is not heard, and a word of preaching which does not convert souls, and a word of truth which is not believed by the hearers: therefore it seems, that the precept is, that the name of God be not taken in all speeches: and thus he sins mortally who invokes God in a prayer which is not heard: and since God does not hear sinners, all such praying in mortal sin, would sin mortally by the prayer itself against the precept: and similarly those preaching, and those swearing true things, when their speech is not believed, which is false: therefore it seems to be inconveniently handed down a mandate of this sort: "Thou shalt not take the name of thy God in vain."

§ 62. Further it is asked concerning the second exposition which the Master posits in the Letter, that it is commanded allegorically, that you should not think Christ to be a creature, because every creature is subject to vanity. For since we are bound to morals from nature, morals oblige equally and approach to the knowledge of all, namely Gentiles, Jews, and Christians: but to know and to believe do not approach equally from nature to the cognition of all: therefore they do not fall under the precept.

§ 63. Solution. It must be said that this mandate according to the first exposition is moral, and obliges all.

§ 64. To that which is objected first, it must be said that he who swears falsely sins in two ways, namely by deceiving: and thus he sins on the part of the word which is ordered to the neighbor, against the neighbor: and with respect to this it falls under the fifth mandate of the second tablet. He sins also by invoking the divine truth as a witness, and thus he sins against God: and with respect to this it is posited under the second mandate of the primae tablet. But the Master treats of perjury under the fifth of the second: because the science of perjury depends on the science of a lie, because without that it is not well known: and a lie falls under the fifth of the second tablet.

§ 65. To the other, it must be said that vain is twofold, namely materially, and formally. But a speech true materially can be vain, that is, concerning vain things, which are not referred to eternal life. But formally a speech is not vain, unless it is frustrated of the end to which it is: and that is the expression of truth to another: because, as Plato says, for this speech was given to us: and when it does not have the end, then it is vain per se and formally: and therefore it is the same to say: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," as "Thou shalt not take the name of God to affirm a false speech." But to take differs from invocation and manifestation: because he who prays invokes the name of God, and does well. But he who preaches manifests the name of God, and does well. But he who takes, assumes to that which is his own, that is, to the speech which is from himself.

§ 66. To the other which is objected concerning a true oath which is not believed, it must be said that the end is twofold, in itself, and in another. But the truth expressed to another is the end in itself, and this suffices for the speech in order that it not be vain. But credulity is the end in another, which if it does not attain, this is from the vice of the other, not its own: just as the Philosopher says that the rhetorician will not always persuade, nor the physician heal: but if he omits nothing of the contingents, he will be said to have attained the end: and if not in another, yet in himself.

§ 67. To the other which is further asked, it must be said that that mandate does not fall in the Decalogue, except according to the first sense, and not according to that sense which is taken from the metaphor of the locution: and therefore that objection is nothing: especially also since the Master says, that that exposition is allegorical: for he would not know how to extract it, unless having faith: and therefore only such a one is obliged.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Observance Of The Sabbath Is Ceremonial Or Moral, And, Why The Sabbath Ceased, And, Whether The Lord's Day Succeeded The Sabbath, And, What The Mode Of Observing The Sabbath Is, And, Why He Used A New Mode Of Speaking, Saying: Remember To Sanctify The Sabbath Day

Whether the observation of the Sabbath is ceremonial or moral? and, Why did the Sabbath cease? and, Whether the Lord's day succeeded the Sabbath? and, What is the mode of observing the Sabbath? and, Why did he use a new mode of speaking, saying: "Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day"?

Whether the observance of the Sabbath is ceremonial or moral? And, Why did the Sabbath cease? And, Did Sunday succeed the Sabbath? And, What is the mode of observing the Sabbath? And, Why did He use a new way of speaking, saying: "Remember to sanctify the Sabbath day"?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, § 3: Remember that the day, etc.

And it is asked: Is this observance of the Sabbath ceremonial or moral?

It seems, however, that it is ceremonial: because 1. It is thus said in Ezekiel 20:12: I gave them my sabbaths, that they might be a sign between me and them. [296] But ceremonials are those whose whole use is in signifying, as the Master says in Book I of the Sentences:[297] therefore it seems that the observance of the Sabbath is ceremonial.

If perhaps you say that the whole use of the Sabbath is not in signifying. On the contrary: Augustine says thus in his book On the Ten Strings: But it is said to you to observe the Sabbath specially in hope of the future rest, which God promises to you: for whoever does whatever he can on account of that rest, however laborious what he does may seem, nevertheless if what he does is referred to the faith of the promised rest, he indeed does not yet have the Sabbath in reality, but he has it in hope.[298] Therefore it seems that the whole of it is as a sign of the future.

1. Again, Augustine in Book IV of A Literal Commentary on Genesis, treating that word: God rested on the seventh day, says thus: Probably it can be said that the observance of the Sabbath was commanded to the Jews in the shadow of the future: that it might figure the spiritual rest, which God, by the example of this rest, promised by a hidden signification to His faithful who do good works. Which rest our Lord Jesus Christ, who suffered only when He willed, also confirmed by the mystery of His burial.[299] From this again it is expressly gathered that the observance of the Sabbath is ceremonial, and not moral.
2. Again, Augustine, below in the same book: Now in the time of grace being revealed, that observance of the Sabbath which was figured by the designation of one day, has been removed from the observance of the faithful. For in this grace he already observes a perpetual Sabbath, who in the hope of future rest works whatever good he works, nor does he glory in his works themselves as if having a good that he has not received: for thus receiving the sacrament of baptism as a day of Sabbath, that is, of the Lord's cessation in the tomb, and understanding it, he rests from his former works, so that now walking in newness of life, he recognizes that God works in him, who simultaneously works and rests, both providing congruous governance for the creature, and having eternal tranquility within Himself.[300] From this the same is gathered as before.

But against this it is objected: because 1. Nothing comes into the same division of something, unless it is of the same genus as the other co-dividing members: but the observance of the Sabbath comes into the same division with other moral precepts: therefore it is of the same genus as they are: since therefore those are of the genus of moral precepts, it seems also that the observance of the Sabbath is of the genus of moral precepts.

1. Again, it was held above that according to the opinion of certain Masters, the Lord spoke all these precepts in the hearing of the people because they were of the natural law which is accessible to the common knowledge of all: but He spoke that precept among the others before the people: therefore it is of the natural law: but nothing is of the natural law unless it is purely moral: therefore that precept is purely moral, as it seems.
2. Again, Isaiah 58 throughout the whole chapter speaks of nothing but moral things: and at the end he subjoins about the Sabbath, saying: If you turn away your foot from the sabbath, from doing your own will in my holy day: and call the sabbath a delight, etc.[301] Therefore it seems that this too is moral.
3. Again, it is the opinion of all the ancients that the ten precepts are moral: but if the precept about the Sabbath is not moral, there are only nine: therefore the precept about the Sabbath is among the moral precepts.

296. Augustine, Glossa ordinaria.

Furthermore it is asked, If the precept about the Sabbath is ceremonial according to a certain respect, why did it cease?

For it seems that it ought not to have ceased concerning the fixing of the day: because

1. The burning of incense (thurification) did not cease, as the Saints and Masters say, because it signifies that which must always be done, namely the devotion of prayer. Therefore, by similarity, the observance of the Sabbath ought not to have ceased, because it signifies that which must always be done, namely to cease from vices and to work good things in the hope of future rest, as is gathered from the words of Augustine introduced earlier.
2. Again, Tithes did not cease, because they signify that which must always be done, as the Saints say: therefore neither should the Sabbath.

Furthermore it is asked, Did Sunday succeed the Sabbath?

It seems that it did: because 1. It is similarly observed in the New Law just as the Sabbath was in the Old.

1. Again, the Saints say that the fathers of the Old Testament served the hebdomad (the number seven): but the fathers of the New Testament serve the ogdoad (the number eight): but the eighth day is Sunday: therefore it seems that the seventh was changed into the eighth.
2. Again, Jerome seems to intend this in the Prologus Galeatus, where he says that Paul stayed with Peter for fifteen days: for by this mystery of the ogdoad and the hebdomad the future preacher to the Gentiles was to be instructed.[302]

But if this is granted, it seems to be contrary: because the seventh day is of divine institution: but no divine institution is read to have been made concerning the eighth: moreover, it does not seem to have been within the daring of man to change what God established: therefore it seems that the one was not changed into the other.

Furthermore it is again asked concerning the mode of observing the Sabbath, from what works must one abstain on festal days? And this article is the utility of this question regarding counsels.

And it is objected thus: 1. Augustine says in the book On the Ten Strings: It is said to you to observe the Sabbath spiritually, not in the way the Jews observe it with carnal leisure: for they wish to have leisure for their trifles and luxuries: for a Jew would do better if he did something more useful in his field, than to be seditious in the theater: and it would be better for their women to spin wool on the Sabbath day, than to dance immodestly all day in their new moons. But it is said to you to observe the Sabbath day spiritually by working in the hope of future rest.[303] Therefore it seems that the Sabbath is not violated except by a work that cannot be referred to eternal rest: but this alone is sin: therefore by doing other works men do not sin on the feast days of the Church.

1. Again, the Saints say that one must abstain from servile works on festal days. But servile works are only those things repugnant to the liberty of the spirit: but these are only sins: therefore it is sufficient to abstain from them.

But against this are the decrees of the Saints and the custom of the Church, which commands to abstain from bodily works, which are not sins.

Furthermore it is asked, Why does He use a new way of speaking in this commandment when He says: Remember to sanctify the Sabbath day? For we only remember past things: since therefore all the commandments of the Decalogue are also of the natural law which preceded the written law, just as the precept of the Sabbath or even more than it, it seems that in all the others He ought to have used the verb of remembering more than in this one: and yet in none of the others did He use that word.

Solution It must be said without prejudice to the first, that He does not say, Remember to observe the Sabbath day: but, Remember to sanctify the Sabbath day. Sanctification, moreover, implies the purity of rest: and therefore it must be said that the precept concerning the sanctifying of the Sabbath is moral as to sanctification, and it was ceremonial as to the mode of observance. And that this may be understood, a distinction must be made in this way. Sabbath is interpreted as rest: and according to the reasoning and authority of Augustine, rest is after labor: whence, since labor is throughout the whole of life, just as Ecclesiastes 9:10 commands: Whatever your hand is able to do, do it earnestly: rest will be after this life: therefore to sanctify the Sabbath is the same as to abstract the intention of rest from the work, and to continually fix it upon eternal rest: just as God, dismissing all His works, rested in Himself: and this is a precept, because whoever by intention rests in his work, that person enjoys his work, and enjoys the things to be used, which is human perversity. That this is so is gathered from two authorities of Augustine in the book On the Ten Strings: of which one is this: You are commanded to labor for this end, that you may rest in the future: but you wish to rest for this end, that you may labor, when you ought to labor for this end, that you may rest.[304] As if he were to say: In the precept of the Sabbath it is commanded to you that the rest of intention should proceed to future rest, and intention should not seek rest in the work of this life. The second is this: In the Holy Spirit, that is, in the gift of God, perpetual rest is promised to us; in the gift we receive the pledge of eternal rest, which will be the Sabbath of sabbaths. On account of that very rest pertaining to the gift of the Holy Spirit, namely toward this hope, whatever we do, if we do it, we observe the Sabbath.[305] Behold, Augustine expressly says what has been held: and therefore according to this it is moral, and not according to the observance.

To all the authorities of Augustine introduced above, therefore, it must be said that according to the observance of the fixed day, namely the seventh, the sign was ceremonial, but according to the sanctification of rest in intention, it is moral: and the authorities introduced are understood regarding the first, while the reasons adduced to the contrary are understood regarding the second.

To that which is further asked, it must be said that what was in the nature of a sign ceased and ought to have ceased: because it did not signify what was always to be done from institution, but rather what was to be awaited in Christ: for the future rest is held in its cause in Christ, and in the configuration of His death through baptism in which we are buried together with Christ, so that we may simultaneously work our salvation, and rest with Him through intention, just as He works even now with the Father, and rests, as was clear from the words of Augustine introduced above.

But to THAT which is objected concerning thurification and tithes, it must be said that it is not similar: because thurification did not primarily signify something to be awaited from its institution, but rather the devotion by which it is always and by all offered in every prayer. Tithes, moreover, remain for the sustenance of the ministers of the Church, and not for the purpose of signifying a further liberation from original sin, as they did in antiquity, as was noted above concerning the tithing of Christ.

But to that which is secondly asked further, it must be said that Sunday did not succeed the Sabbath day: because the Sabbath day was not in the Old Law as a precept insofar as it is moral, but rather insofar as it is ceremonial, of which ceremony there are two causes. One was the pre-showing of rest on that day in the works of the creation of the world. The other was the future rest through the works of re-creation in the tomb, and this was more principal in the intention of the Institutor: although the first was more manifest to the people, and therefore was more often indicated to the rude people as the reason for observance. But the Church instituted Sunday for three causes, and changed the Sabbath for two causes: and thus there will be five.

The first cause moved the Church to institute certain days of vacation: and it is this, because man, surrounded by misery, is compelled to labor for necessities, and cupidity also invites to this: but labor calls the mind out to attend to temporal things: and the mind, called out to temporal things, postpones spiritual things, and with spiritual things postponed, it does not refer labor to the hope of eternal rest, and then it does not observe the precept. Whence, to the end that man, by hearing divine solemnities, might be excited to think of the future rest, and thus learn to run to it by intention even when he is at work, the Church wholesomely provided feast days on which the word of God is proposed, and is sung more solemnly, and the people are commanded to abstain from other things, so that they may hear those things with their minds.

Another cause why the eighth day was chosen for this among other principal feasts is this, which is often assigned by the Saints: because the Lord rose on the eighth day, and demonstrated the rest of that beatitude in body and in soul, promising that we are to be conformed to Him after the resurrection. It also instituted other feast days, when there is some feast of God or of the Saints, whence a notable memory of that rest is made to the people.

The third cause is, so that by this the error of the Gentile mathematicians (astrologers) might be removed: for they considered in the beginnings of their works the dominion of the hour, and especially the dominion of the ascending sign, and the dominion of the thing for which they were working. But the lord of the first hour on the eighth day is the Sun: and then they used to say it was the most auspicious beginning of all works. And so that this might be thoroughly abolished, the Church decreed that no one should do any work on that day and especially in the morning.

Now the first cause of the cessation of the Sabbath was the principal one: because the reality of the Sabbath had already ceased according to its cause and reality in some way, as was said: and with the truth arriving, the shadow of the future ought to have ceased. The second cause, lest the Church seem to Judaize. The third cause was that the error of the Gentiles might be removed, who observed the lord of the hour: and the lord of the first hour of that day, according to them, is Saturn, who, as they themselves say, has the most inauspicious beginning of works, on account of which the Gentiles also observed the Sabbath. But so that this might be removed, the Church decreed that on that day work should be done.

But to that which is objected, it must be said that the seventh day did not have divine institution on the basis that it was of the substance of a moral precept: but because ceremonials were established by the Lord as signs: and therefore it was not out of human daring that the Church changed it, but rather so that there might be the understanding of the truth, after which understanding it would have been deadly to observe the shadows of future things.

To that which is thirdly asked further, it must be said that festal days do not have their observance from useful and bodily business except from the institution of the Church, for the said causes: and thus the Church can oblige subjects. Whence they are to be coerced from all works not conceded by the Church. But it is true that it would be a lesser evil to engage in useful business, than to be dissipated in theaters and to be idle in drinking: and priests ought rather to urge that they cease from sins, than from good bodily works: yet one must abstain from both, as was said earlier.

TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that Augustine is speaking of the comparison of a greater evil to a lesser evil: and therefore he indulges neither.

To the other it must be said that servile works are those which make one a slave of sin, and thus sins are servile works: or those which pertain to the servitude of the penalty of present misery, and thus other works are servile beyond those which are exacted rather than conceded, such as cooking foods, and other things of this kind.

To that which is asked lastly, it must be said that this commandment has less of the natural law than the others, and therefore it is fixed in the memory by that mode of speaking. Others say that that commandment was previously in observance: and therefore resuming it, not instituting it anew, He uses such a mode of speaking. But the first solution is better.

300. Augustine, De spiritu et littera, c. 14.

Articulus 8 — Whether Rather The Command Is To Be Given To Children Concerning The Honor Of Parents Than To Parents Concerning The Honor Of Children

Should the commandment rather be given to children concerning the honor of parents, than to parents concerning the honor of children?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, § 4: In the second table there were seven commandments.

For it is objected against the first commandment: because it seems He ought rather to enjoin upon parents the care of children, than conversely, since the Apostle says, 2 Corinthians 12:14: For children ought not to lay up treasure for their parents, but parents for their children.

Again it is asked, 1. Since by the name of parents every neighbor is understood as Augustine said, why did He not rather put the name of neighbor than the name of parent, so that He would have said: Honor your neighbor?

1. Again, Since by honor here is understood due reverence and the provision of necessities, it seems that He ought rather to say: Help your neighbor, than, Honor your parents.

Furthermore it is asked concerning the promise that is made in the commandment, when it is said: That you may be long-lived upon the earth. For either it is understood of the longevity of that life, or of the longevity of the other life. If in the first way, it seems to have an instance to the contrary: because many honor their parents, who on account of this are not long-lived upon the earth. If in the second way, then nothing seems to be said: because that longevity is not given to one good work in species, but to all, or to any whatsoever: and thus it seems that such a promise made to this commandment is unreasonable.

Solution It must be said that as virtue grows in children, virtue decreases in parents according to nature, and subsidy is owed to decreasing virtue: and therefore the Lord commanded that children should honor their parents. Conversely, however, there was no need: because nature compels that, for the reason that status ascends from the root into the branches, and not conversely.

To the other it must be said that by the name of parent every neighbor is understood, as was objected, and as was proved above in the question on charity: but the Lord simultaneously in one affirmative precept intends both to intimate charity for the neighbor, and the order of the same. But the order would not be insinuated by the name of neighbor, because that expresses nothing but the object of charity: but by the name of parent it is insinuated, because that expresses both the object of love and charity, and the degree. There can also be this other reason: because charity is the perfection of nature: and so that this may be shown,

301. Aristotle, Physics, II.

He puts a name there, towards which both nature and charity are simultaneously moved. But the first reason is better.

To the other it must be said that to help in necessities is not the general act of the precept: because it does not bind except in a particular case, namely if the neighbor is in need, and if we have the ability: but the image of God to be honored is found in every neighbor, and by every neighbor, and can always be exhibited, and everyone has the ability for this act: and therefore He rather put, Honor than help: although He also understands helping in a particular case according to time and place.

And note, that concerning other things which can be asked here, namely when, and from what we ought to help a parent, and in what things to prefer parents to other neighbors, has been held above in the question on the order of charity: because that whole question falls under this commandment.

Articulus 9 — Whether He Who Is Angry With His Brother Is Guilty Of The Same Judgment As He Who Kills, Or Of Another

Is he who is angry with his brother guilty of the same judgment as he who kills, or another?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, § 2: The second is: You shall not kill.

For the addition of which he speaks here which was made in the Gospel of Matthew, 5:22 and seq., is this: He who is angry with his brother, is guilty of the judgment. But he who says to his brother: Raca, shall be guilty of the council. But he who says: You fool, shall be guilty of hell fire.

And it is asked first, Whether he who is angry is guilty of the same judgment as he who kills, or another? If another: then it does not seem to be a super-addition in the New Testament.

But it seems that it is the same: because 1. The Interlinear Gloss says there: He who is angry with his brother, shall be guilty of the judgment, which was said above concerning murder.

1. But this seems to be unjust, that anger of the heart should be punished as much as murder.
2. Furthermore, According to everyone, he who is angry with his brother sins mortally, if every movement of anger is forbidden here.
3. Furthermore, Since raca according to the Gloss is an interjection of an indignant person, it seems that any movement of indignation is a mortal sin if it bursts forth into voice: because he who acts against a precept, sins mortally.
4. Again, What difference is there between these things, judgment, council, and hell fire, and being angry, and raca, and you fool? For since murder is greater than all these, the murderer seems to deserve something worse than hell fire; and this cannot be, because there is nothing worse in penalties than hell.

302. Augustine, De decem chordis (Serm. 9).

Furthermore, What is it that the Master says, that here according to the sense which spiritual men had, the will of killing is forbidden?

For it seems that the natural law always forbade that as regards everyone. For it is less to will to harm in goods than in person: and the old law forbade the first according to the sense of everyone, even carnal men, by that precept: You shall not covet your neighbor's goods. Therefore much more is it understood to have forbidden that too, namely the will of killing. But if this is granted: then it seems that no super-addition was made in the New Testament.

Solution It must be said that in truth nothing is posited in the Gospel except what is held in the Law, and understanding this of moral precepts: but due to the bad observance of the carnal people, it was not understood to be forbidden except what the Law punished: and therefore by interpreting, the Lord added it in the Gospel: and also because He gave the grace to fulfill what was not conferred in the Law: and concerning this some necessary things are noted at the beginning of the fourth book of the Sentences.

But to the first which is asked, Whether he who is angry is guilty of the same judgment as he who kills? It must be said, that it is the same in genus, although not the same in species: for God understands according to the Gloss on Matthew, of anger to which one consents to the harm or death of the neighbor, which although it is held in the heart, nevertheless will be punished by eternal damnation: but because it did not proceed into manifestation, therefore it will be made public by the judgment of condemnation and discussion of the Lord, so that it may seem just to all: however, a greater penalty in species is owed to murder.

To the other it must be said that there is anger through zeal, and anger through vice. Through zeal it is done with the zeal of correction, and that is not a sin. Through vice, moreover, it is sometimes in the first movement, to which consent is not given, and that is a venial sin: but that to which consent is given to the intolerable harm of the neighbor, such as death, or mutilation, or loss, is mortal: and of that the Lord speaks: and that is also directly forbidden here. But the first movement falls indirectly under the precept.

And through this same point the solution to the following is clear: because the definition concerning the movement of indignation is the same as that concerning death.

To the other it must be said that according to the Gloss there are degrees in fault, namely anger through consent in the heart, and anger bursting forth into a sign of indignation, and anger bursting forth into a word of reproach and harm to the neighbor: and the first is imported by being angry, the second by raca which is an interjection of an indignant person according to the Greeks, although in Hebrew it sounds like 'empty' or 'brainless'. But the third is imported by you fool. Now by judgment and hell and council the degrees in eternal damnation are significantly expressed (as the Gloss says there), not indeed equal degrees, but their inequality is understood from the mode of condemnation: because he who is judged, will indeed be punished: but it is still asked, Of what penalty is he worthy and how much? But he who is guilty of the council, it is indeed known by what penalty: but it is asked how much should be inflicted? But he who is guilty of hell, this one already has the species of the penalty and the quantity of the penalty: not that these things are done in the judgment of the Lord, but rather in a human way they demonstrate the difference of sins and penalties.

303. Origen, In Exodum, hom. 8.

To the last it must be said that although the voice of reproach is punished by hell, nevertheless there are differences in those penalties which are certain from the species and from the taxation of the quantity: because a greater penalty in hell is still owed to murder, than to reproach.

To that which is further asked concerning the law which forbids the will, it must be said that as for carnal repugnancies to the spirit, it did not forbid anything except the will proceeding into act through a sign: as if someone threatened or shook at him with whom he was angry. But according to them, if he had the anger of indignation in his heart or in his mind to which he consented, they said the law did not care about this: not because this was true what they said, but because they repelled the true understanding of the law: for in the natural law always both the evil mind and the evil work were forbidden: and this is what the Master intends to say.

But if it is asked, What spiritual understanding did Christ then express by adding? It must be said that there is a spiritual understanding in a moral precept as to the motive, and as to that which is commanded. As to the motive just as in this precept, that the act and will of murder should be dismissed for the sake of God, and for the sake of the love of God. But as to that which is commanded, there was nothing more of the spirit in moral precepts in the New Testament, than in the Old: but they are more amply explained and determined in the New than in the Old.

Articulus 10 — Whether In This Commandment, You Shall Not Commit Adultery, Simple Fornication Is Prohibited, Or Only Adultery, Or All The Other Sins

Is simple fornication forbidden in this commandment: You shall not commit adultery, or only adultery, or all other sins?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, § 3: The third is: You shall not commit adultery.

1. Since moechia (adultery) is the same as adultery, and the less grave is not understood to be forbidden in the more grave, it seems that simple fornication is not forbidden in moechia.

1. Furthermore, Matthew 5:28, upon that: But I say to you, that whosoever shall look on a woman to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart: the Gloss says, that there every carnal lust by which the soul fornicates from God, is understood to be forbidden: therefore it seems, since in every sin the soul fornicates from God, that in this commandment every sin is forbidden: and thus all the other commandments are superfluous.

304. Basil, Homilia in Psalmum 1.

2. Furthermore, Since fornication or adultery is twofold, just as the murder of the will and of the work is twofold: why does the Master not say here that spiritual and corporal fornication are forbidden, just as he said concerning murder?

3. Again, Since there are some things in this act more enormous, such as sodomy, or copulation with a beast: why does he not say by their name that illicit copulation is forbidden?

Solution It must be said to the first and the last simultaneously, that the prohibition of the second table orders toward abstaining from harms to the neighbor: and because the neighbor was not harmed by other acts except adultery (generally speaking), on account of this He expressed this one alone in the form of the precept, and understood the others, because they are of the same end, namely of carnal pleasure, although they are not of the same guilt in species.

To the other it must be said that that Gloss is understood either morally concerning spiritual fornication: and then it is nothing to the proposition, because the precepts are taken according to the literal sense. Or it is understood concerning the pleasure which is in the flesh, and this is of gluttony or of lust: and one of those is forbidden here as the cause of the other, as was explained above.

To the other it must be said that the will to fornicate has a special commandment, but not the will to kill: and the reason for this was expedited above: and therefore that commandment is not extended as generally as this one of not killing.

To the last the solution is clear through what was said before: for whether it is with a woman, or beside the order of nature, the whole is understood to be forbidden here.

Articulus 11 — What Is Called Robbery In The Present Matter

What is called rapine in the proposed text?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, § 4: The fourth is: You shall not commit theft, etc.

For there, as the Master says, rapine (plunder) is forbidden.

And it is asked, What is called rapine? For rapine sounds like violence: therefore it does not seem to be rapine, when exactions and tallages (taxes) of princes are made among the people of the land.

Again, Tolls and customs: which however in many cases is not true.

But to this it must be answered under a distinction: for either the tallage is upon serfs, or upon free tenants of the prince's land. If upon serfs, since the serf has nothing except in the name of his lord which he receives from him, the lord can indeed sin by excessively imposing burdens (corvée) and oppressing the serf, because it is of concern how each uses his own property: nevertheless I do not think that it is rapine, or that he is held to restitution. But if it is taken from the tenants of his land and the inhabitants: then the acceptance is to be taxed according to the labor of the prince, which he has in the defense of the land, and according to the expenses which it is necessary to make according to the prince's household and dignity in good faith; and if he exacts beyond this, it is rapine: and this is what John the Baptist says...

§ 1. [to the] soldiers: Be content with your pay.[306]

§ 2. But concerning tolls and tariffs it must be said, that these were instituted by the consent of the land to pacify the roads: and therefore according to the labor and expenses which they have in that pacification, they can be taken: and whatever is taken beyond that, is rapine.

Articulus 12 — Whether Sacrilege Is A Specific Sin, Or Denotes Only A Circumstance Of Sin

Whether sacrilege is a special sin, or only indicates a circumstance of a sin?

§ 3. Next one inquires concerning what he says, there, C, § 4: Sacrilege is committed in three ways, etc.

§ 4. For sacrilege does not seem to indicate a special sin, but a circumstance of a sin.

§ 5. 1. For stealing and stealing in a sacred place do not differ except by the circumstance of the place: therefore it seems that, just as he touches upon nothing in special concerning the many cases of theft, similarly he ought to touch upon nothing in special concerning sacrilege.

§ 6. 2. Also, sacrilege is said to be committed in three ways, as is had in the Letter: and a fourth way seems to be missing, namely when a non-sacred thing is taken from sacred persons, as when the goods of monks or clerics are taken.

§ 7. 3. Also, that seems to be sacred which is dedicated to divine worship: therefore, since the goods of Churches are given for divine worship, those who plunder the fields of Churches seem to commit sacrilege, which is not granted.

§ 8. Also it is asked, if someone snatches violently in a Church, and someone steals in it, do both commit sacrilege?

§ 9. It seems that they do not: because the snatcher is excommunicated at least by the sentence of a man, namely the one consecrating the Church, and pronouncing sentence against all invaders of that place, even if he is not excommunicated by the sentence of the canons. But he who steals is not excommunicated by the sentence of a man, nor of a canon, as the Jurisconsults say: therefore it seems that he does not commit sacrilege, because there is no reason why one should be excommunicated and not the other, except sacrilege and non-sacrilege: for the act which is the handling of another's property against the will of the master does not have excommunication attached to it.

§ 10. If this is granted: the contrary seems to be what is had in the Letter, namely that one takes the sacred from the sacred, or the non-sacred from the sacred: therefore he commits sacrilege, as it seems.

§ 11. Solution: It must be said that sacrilege in this case, or rapine, makes a special sin by reason of the place: and therefore it is another species: just as the violation of a nun is another species of sin than fornication.

§ 12. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that sometimes a circumstance has the force of a species or of a constituting form, and then it makes another species: and this circumstance is principal when it is done to the injury of some sanctity of the Church: because then, by reason of the harm that is joined to the act, the circumstance draws it into another genus of sin.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that it is not sacrilege when the non-sacred things of persons dedicated to God are taken, but it is a greater sin than simple rapine: because no injury to any sanctity occurs through this, because the sanctity is in the place or the person, and neither is involved in such a theft or rapine.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that something is dedicated to divine worship in two ways, namely because it is consecrated for an act of worship: and this is properly called dedicated to worship, such as the chalice, and the paten, and the stones of the Church, and the like: and these cannot be deputed to other uses, as long as the form in which they were consecrated remains: and thus there are places deputed for worship, such as a cemetery, and a dormitory: and therefore in such things sacrilege is committed through injury. In another way something is said to be dedicated to worship, by the fact that it is ordered for the sustenance of those ministering in worship, just as the goods of the Church: and in such things the sacred is not injured except accidentally: and therefore to take away such things is not sacrilege.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that, in my judgment, both commit sacrilege, because the place is injured: but that the snatcher is excommunicated, this is on account of the rash daring which he does not have who comes secretly to steal.

Articulus 13 — On The Definitions Of Usury, And The Doubts Arising Around Them

On the definitions of usury, and the doubts occurring around them.

§ 16. Next one inquires concerning what he says, there, C, § 4: Here also usury is prohibited, etc.

§ 17. And three things are briefly asked here concerning usury, namely what is it? § 18. And, is dominion transferred in usury? § 19. And, does the one giving usury sin just as the one receiving?

§ 20. To the first one proceeds thus: § 21. The Master defines usury in the Letter thus: Usury is when someone exacts more in money or any thing, than is received in the principal. But in the Gloss on Luke 6:35, and Matthew 5:42, he seems to give two definitions: of which the first is this: Usury is profit from a loan owed or exacted from a pact. Another is: Usury is the superabundance which is received beyond the principal. And these definitions are in the Gloss by sentence, not by words.

306. Ezekiel 20:12.

§ 22. But it seems that, according to these definitions, usury does not seem to be theft: because § 23. 1. Theft is neither exacted, nor owed from a pact.

§ 24. 2. Also, neither does a thief give anything for a principal. Therefore it seems that the Master speaks badly, that it is contained under theft.

§ 25. 3. Also, by constituting differences usury and theft seem to be contraries: because theft is the handling of a thing against the will of the master, but usury is received with the master willing and consenting: therefore it seems that one is not contained under the other.

§ 26. Also it is asked: What makes usury, either the will to receive beyond the principal, or the hope, or the pact?

§ 27. 1. If the will: then many will be usurers who never received anything beyond the principal, and we are speaking of usury of act, not of will. But if hope makes usury: then the merchant seems to be a usurer, because he hopes to receive beyond the principal. If you say that it is not similar: because the merchant gives money, but the usurer lends: this is nothing: because to lend is neither good nor bad in itself, but can be done well or badly: hence the whole rationale of evil lies in that which is there beyond the act of the loan: and this is the same in the usurer and the merchant: therefore if he commits a sin in one, he commits a sin in the other as well. But if the pact makes usury, this will be against the definition: because, on that verse: Lend, hoping for nothing from it, the Gloss says that usury is the hope of profit beyond the principal: and it does not say a pact.

§ 28. 2. Also, what makes usury to be a sin? For either it is a sin according to itself, or prohibition makes it to be a sin, or the injury of the neighbor. If it is a sin according to itself: then it was never permitted to anyone to receive usury from anyone: for neither was it ever permitted to anyone to fornicate with anyone: and this seems false, because it is thus read, Deuteronomy 23:19 and 20: You shall not lend to your brother at usury money, nor fruits, nor any thing, but to a foreigner.

§ 29. 3. Also, Ambrose: You may receive usury from him whom you deservedly desire to harm: but there are many whom we can harm: therefore there are many from whom we can receive usury: therefore it is not evil according to itself.

§ 30. 4. Furthermore, if prohibition makes it a sin: then before the prohibition it was not a sin: and thus in natural law they could give at usury.

§ 31. 5. Also, if prohibition makes it to be a sin, then concession would also make it to be licit: and thus after it is conceded, it would be licit.

§ 32. 6. Furthermore, if the injury of the neighbor makes it to be a sin, then not every usury is a sin, nor always: because some usuries do not harm, but help the neighbor much: therefore it seems that in no way is usury a sin.

§ 33. 7. Also, human law is derived from divine and natural law: but human law, as certain laws concede usuries: therefore it seems that they are not illicit even according to divine and natural law.

§ 34. 8. Also, to kill is a greater sin than to give usury: and yet in a case it is well done, and is conceded: therefore usury in a case can be conceded for utility.

§ 35. 9. Also, to concede houses and vessels of gold and silver for money and profit beyond the principal is not a sin: since therefore the concession of money does not differ from such concessions except materially alone, it also seems that to concede money for the hope of profit is not a sin.

§ 36. 10. Also, the creditor is made a debtor to him who gives a loan for mutual services: for if someone does well to me, natural reason dictates that I also am obliged to him to do well if I can: but every obligation which natural reason dictates can be deduced into a pact: therefore he who gives a loan so that he may receive something beyond the principal can deduce into a pact that the other is obliged to him in something beyond the principal: but this is usury: therefore usury is not a sin.

§ 37. Also it is further asked, if it is permitted to make such a pact: I give you a loan so that you may give something beyond the principal to the poor?

§ 38. It seems that it is: because to give to the poor is almsgiving and doing well: but it is certain that we ought to provoke others to almsgiving and doing well in whatever ways we can: therefore such a pact can be made.

§ 39. Against this is what the Lord says: Lend, hoping for nothing from it.

§ 40. Also I ask, if such a pact or hope can be held: I give you a loan, so that you may return the favor to me in giving a loan at another time, when I shall need it?

§ 41. It seems that it can: because he is held to this even without the loan which I make to him, that he should lend to me if he can: therefore I can well oblige him to this by the benefit of the loan, as it seems.

§ 42. But against this again seems to be what the Lord says: Lend, hoping for nothing from it.

§ 43. Also, it is difficult to remove from the heart the hope of goods or gifts for benefits. Let us posit therefore, that someone gives a loan to someone, deducing nothing into a pact, and receiving nothing beyond the principal, unless the other offers spontaneously, and he who gives the loan presumes that the other will offer something: is such a one a usurer?

§ 44. It seems that he is: because he hopes for something beyond the principal: and usury is the hope of profit beyond the principal: therefore he is a usurer on account of the loan.

§ 45. ON THE CONTRARY: If it were not done, yet he would give or would have given the loan: therefore it seems that it is a simple gift: but to receive this is not a sin: therefore such a one is not a usurer.

§ 46. Solution: It must be said, without a doubt, that usury is a mortal sin, and it was always so in natural and written law, and it was never permitted nor will it be permitted to give at usury.

§ 47. To the first, however, it must be said that usury is a part of theft and rapine, by the fact that it is rapine or theft in a certain respect. For a robber or a thief touches something alien against the will of the master, that is, he not willing with an absolute will: but a usurer handles something alien, the master not willing, yet willing with a conditioned will. Hence he who gives usury would indeed wish to return only that which is the principal, but he prefers to accept this [condition] than not to have the loan, which he needs: and so he is not willing except with a conditioned will.

§ 48. To the next it must be said that the solution is clear through the same thing: because to give something for a principal does not make a thing to be a sin or usury, but rather to touch that which is beyond the principal against the will of the master, that is, he not willing with an absolute will.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that the constituting differences agree, just as one who is unwilling simply, and one who is willing in a certain respect. For in theft the alien property of one who is unwilling in every way is touched: but in usury the alien property of one who is unwilling simply, and willing in a certain respect, is touched.

§ 50. To the next it must be said that the hope of receiving beyond the principal for a loan makes usury.

§ 51. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that the merchant does not hope for a loan: and therefore the objection is invalid. For it is not similar concerning trading and a loan: because trading is not about things to be done gratuitously from natural and divine law, but a loan is about things to be done gratuitously from natural and divine law.

§ 52. To the next it must be said that usury is a sin according to itself, and always was a sin.

§ 53. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that that law is understood just as the law concerning the bill of divorce: for it was commanded to give a bill of divorce, if a wife was dismissed: but that she should be dismissed, this was permitted: and that the dismissed woman could marry another, was permitted on account of the hardness of the heart of the Jews. Thus it was commanded that a loan should not be given at usury: but it was permitted, if it was given, that it should be given to a foreigner.

§ 54. There are however those who say that the law speaks in such a case, namely when foreigners detain lands owed to us, just as the Canaanites did the land of the children of Israel: and therefore by lending at usury with them they did not receive what was alien, but their own which was owed to them by lot. And they say that the Church could do this to pagans. Nevertheless, because it would be a bad example, I consider the first solution to be better. For one must abstain from every appearance of evil. They also say that one person from another who holds something of his own through violent oppression or other illicit reception, could lend at usury for the same cause. But, as it seems to me, this is not safe counsel: because it could not be done without scandal. Hence I rather agree that he could recover it from him by theft, than by usurious reception.

§ 55. To the next it must be said that Ambrose speaks by an hypothesis of the impossible: because it is impossible that we could desire to harm anyone without sin: therefore it is impossible that we should receive usury from anyone.

§ 56. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that no one is injured who uses his own right: hence to harm, and to use one's right, are not the same. But by using our right some are indeed burdened: but we do not burden them, but the right is contrary to their injury.

§ 57. To the next it must be said that the Emperor does not involve himself except in those things which a temporal judge has to judge. But these are things which pertain to the state of the republic according to a good state of time, not of eternity. But to give at usury contributes much to that good temporal state: and therefore the Emperor permits it and Kings similarly. But the Ecclesiastical judge judges according to the good state of eternity: and therefore he condemns it. Hence it is also clear why the Ecclesiastical judge judges concerning the penalty of the usurer, but the secular judge concerning the penalty of the thief, by inflicting a penalty, even though usury is theft in a certain respect: because the thief harms the good temporal state, which the usurer in a case helps: but the usurer corrupts the good spiritual state in the service of charity.

§ 58. There are however those who solve this otherwise, saying that those laws were revoked by the fact that the Emperor consents in all things to the four councils in which usuries were condemned.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that that argument is invalid. And there is an instance: because even fornication is a lesser sin than homicide: yet it cannot be conceded: and this is so because sometimes a lesser evil is inseparably joined to an evil end: and then a greater evil can be done for a good end, and not the lesser. But it would be valid if a greater sin were conceded insofar as it is a greater sin: but this is not true, but rather it is punished more severely than the lesser.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because in the leasing of houses and vessels there is a certain sale of utility for a time: and this utility is determinate, just as the inhabiting of a house or the use of a conceded thing. But in money it is not so, but only a loan and the sale of a loan, which is to be done gratuitously from the charity of the neighbor. Others however solve this otherwise: because in the leasing of such things something perishes in the thing through the use of vessels and the inhabiting of houses: but in loaned money it does not. But the first solution is better: because what the second says is not necessarily true in general. But those who opine that dominion passes in usury, solve it otherwise, saying that it is not similar: because in the leasing of houses or other things dominion is not transferred: and therefore the master of those things can sell the use for a time. But in a loan dominion is transferred: for this is what mutuum (loan) sounds like, as if from mine I make yours (de meo facio tuum): and therefore he cannot sell the use, since it is his own thing which he lends. And this seems to me more probable than all the solutions. But nevertheless below there will be a disputation concerning this, whether dominion is transferred or not.

§ 61. To the next it must be said that the creditor is made a debtor from the rationale of charity: yet this very obligation cannot be deduced into a pact, for the reason that it is contrary to the loan as to the gratuity on account of which it is to be done for the love of the neighbor. But the argument proceeds concerning those obligations which are not contrary to the contract or act in which they are made.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that such a pact cannot be made, for the reason that it is contrary to the gratuity of the loan. And there is an instance to the argument. To confer a prebend is good, and to give something to a poor person is good: therefore it is good to give to a poor person so that a prebend may be conferred. For in all such things in which the conjunction of one with the other evacuates the gratuity of the other, the division holds: but if it is inferred conjunctively, the form of argumentation is invalid, for the reason that it is not necessary to conjoin whatever things are true divisively.

§ 63. Through this the solution to the following is also clear: because concerning similar things the judgment is similar.

§ 64. To the last it must be said that such gifts can well be received without sin: and I well consider him ungrateful who does not offer himself for mutual services to the neighbor from whom he received a loan or a service.

§ 65. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the hope is not there on account of the loan, but as if from a gift: and therefore it does not make usury.

§ 66. And it is to be noted that, as the Jurisconsults distinguish, there are twofold usuries, namely those which are received beyond the principal, and those make a usurer: and there are usuries of usuries which he who receives, is infamous by the very action.

Articulus 14 — Whether In Usury Ownership Is Transferred

Is dominion transferred in usury?

§ 67. Secondly it is asked: Whether dominion is transferred in usury? § 68. And the Legists, wishing to prove that it is, object in this way:

§ 69. 1. Mutuum (loan) sounds like what from mine becomes yours: therefore also in that which is given on account of the loan, dominion is transferred.

§ 70. 2. Also, he who gives usuries is the master of his own things: therefore he can give to whom he wishes: but he gives to the usurer: therefore he transfers them into the dominion of the usurer.

§ 71. 3. Also, let it be that such a contract of a loan is made: I will lend you money, if you will give me so much beyond the principal by your free will: and he admits this form: it is certain that then he gives to him: therefore dominion is transferred, as it seems, into the power of the usurer: therefore in usury dominion is transferred.

SED CONTRA: § 72. 1. Anyone can make an alms of his own, although not a sacrifice at the altar: for an alms can be made from a prostitute, although not a sacrifice at the altar: but a usurer cannot make an alms from usuries: therefore the usury is not his: therefore dominion is not transferred to him. Middle proof. Ecclesiasticus 34:21: The offering of him that sacrificeth of a thing wrongfully gotten, is stained.

§ 73. 2. Also, a usurer is bound to return usuries: either he is bound from the fact that it is his own, or that it is not his own, but deposited with him. If because it is his own: then he is bound to return all his own things, which is false: therefore it remains that he is bound for this reason, because it is not his own: therefore dominion is not transferred to him.

§ 74. 3. Also, the Law says that it is not said to be one's own, which cannot permanently remain in one's possession: but usury does not permanently remain with the usurer: therefore it is not said to be his own: therefore dominion is not transferred.

§ 75. 4. Also from a similarity, if someone has a fief against the will of the master, the property of whose fief cannot be transferred into the power of another: but he who gives usuries has all things from the Lord God in fief: therefore against the will of the master he cannot transfer them into the power of the usurer. But it is certain that against the will of God he does what He prohibited from being done: for He Himself prohibited it, when He said: Lend, hoping for nothing from it. Therefore he cannot transfer it into the power of the usurer.

§ 76. Solution: It must be said that here there are diverse opinions of the Masters. For the Legists say that in usury dominion is transferred, and that this is the reason why the emperor permitted usuries: and because the laws were not established without reason, they have for themselves the reasons introduced above.

§ 77. And they respond to the contraries, saying to the first, that this is not true, that anyone can make an alms from his own: because it is his own in multiple ways: for a certain thing is his own licitly acquired, and a certain thing illicitly acquired, and a certain thing his own basely acquired. From the first an alms and a sacrifice at the altar can be made. From the third an alms, and not a sacrifice. From the middle neither an alms, nor a sacrifice: because from reason and from the order of charity he is bound to return what he acquired badly.

§ 78. To the next they say that he is bound to return from the law of the canon: and this is the law of the pole [the heavenly forum], and not of the forum [the earthly court]: and therefore the Ecclesiastical judge also compels him, and not the secular, and not because it is not his own among men.

§ 79. To the next they say that that law speaks interpretatively and not according to truth: because it is as if not his own, which by the authority of the canon he is bound and compelled to return, and does not permanently remain in his dominion.

§ 80. To the last they say that it is not similar: because God well permits many things which He prohibits: and an earthly master does not do this: hence by divine permission that translation is made. And this response seems to me more probable than all.

§ 81. There are, however, Doctors of Sacred Scripture and of Decrees of a contrary opinion: and they respond to the reasons introduced for the other opinion, saying to all one solution, that he does not have an absolute will of giving, but only a conditioned one: hence through an absolute [will] he himself remains the possessor of his own things, even though he could not act before a secular judge, because he himself renounced his action. Hence just as if someone detained is forced to swear that he will give a hundred pounds, he is indeed bound to give it on account of the reverence of the sacrament, but yet the will remains to have back what he gave through the authority of the canon: so they say it is in him who gives usuries, that he gives so that he may have a loan, not that he wills that the other simply have dominion.

Articulus 15 — Whether To Give Interest Is A Sin Just As To Receive It

Is giving usuries a sin just as receiving?

§ 82. Thirdly it is asked: Is giving usuries a sin just as receiving?

§ 83. It seems that it is: because § 84. 1. If there were no giver, neither would there be a receiver: therefore the giver is the cause of mortal sin to the receiver: but he who is the cause of mortal sin, sins mortally: therefore the one giving usury, sins mortally.

§ 85. 2. Also, Matthew 18, and Luke 17, it is said in the Gloss that saving a threefold truth we ought to avoid scandal, especially active scandal, lest we give to anyone an occasion of sinning mortally. But it is certain that the one giving usuries, saving the threefold truth, namely of life, doctrine, and justice, is able not to give: therefore by giving he sins by scandalizing the neighbor to a mortal sin: therefore they are not to be given.

§ 86. If perhaps it is said that they are not to be given except in necessity: it seems that this is nothing: because this necessity cannot be anything but bodily: and anyone is bound to love the soul of the neighbor more than his own body: therefore he ought rather to perish in body than to give the neighbor an occasion of sinning mortally.

§ 87. Also I ask: How much necessity is exacted for this, that usury be given?

§ 88. For it seems that he ought first to sell all his things, before he would turn to this mode of help, which is the cause of sinning mortally to another: therefore it is not permitted except after every sale.

§ 89. But then no one would give him a loan, because there would be no hope of restitution: therefore he is not bound to sell all things before he gives usury.

§ 90. Furthermore it is asked concerning a priest who teaches that usury should not be given, whether he himself could give it?

§ 91. It seems that he could not: because he ought not to act against that which he teaches.

SED CONTRA: § 92. The priest himself has need just as another: therefore he can contract a loan at usury.

§ 93. Solution: It must be said that in necessity it can be given at usury, but without necessity it is a sin, and, as I think, grave and mortal: just as to swear is licit in a case, and without necessity a sin.

§ 94. To that however which is objected, it must be said to the first, that the receiver and the giver do not similarly relate to scandal or the cause of sinning: because the one giving usuries gratuitously demands what the other from the command of the Lord is bound to expend, namely a loan: but because the other does not do what from the right of the Lord he is bound to do, therefore he gives usury, as if redeeming his vexation, and as if buying him for this that he may do what from right he ought to do gratuitously: and he does not scandalize, even though the other is scandalized: just as also the Jews were scandalized, although the Lord did not scandalize them. And through this the solution to the following is clear.

§ 95. To the next it must be said that the one asking for a loan impedes the salvation of the neighbor in nothing, but rather by asking for a loan, he provokes him to meritorious works: and that usury is given, this is extorted from the impiety of the usurer, not from the causality of the giver.

§ 96. To the next it must be said that to that question I wish to respond nothing of my own, because it seems difficult to me to determine how much necessity is required: but let anyone satisfy himself according to what the Lord will inspire, and let him have recourse to a superior whose it is to ponder and interpret rights. There are however those who say that a probable fear that one might perish in an inheritance by which he governs his family and inherits for his children or feeds the poor, suffices for this that he may give usuries.

§ 97. To the last it must be said that there is the same judgment concerning a priest, and concerning others: because a priest does not beatify him by the fact that he gives usuries, but rather condemns if he gives them unwillingly, not being able otherwise to do well according to the good state of his house and his family.

Articulus 16 — Whether It Was Lawful For The Sons Of Israel To Despoil The Egyptians

Was it permitted to the children of Israel to despoil the Egyptians?

§ 98. Next one inquires concerning what he says, there, C, § 4: But if it is asked concerning the children of Israel, etc.

§ 99. For since it is of natural law not to commit rapine or theft, it seems the Lord ought not to change this: but concerning this there will be a question below on the last distinction concerning natural law.

§ 100. But here it must be said that this was the cause: because the children of Israel were despoiled by the Egyptians, and they had their labor gratuitously: and therefore it was judged by the Lord, who had the power, that it should be compensated in this way.

DISTINCTIO XXXVIII

Divisio Textus

§ 101. The fifth commandment is: Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

§ 102. Under this fifth commandment the Master introduces two distinctions: one concerning a lie, the other concerning perjury.

§ 103. And this one which is concerning a lie is divided into three parts: in the first of which he touches upon the division of a lie. In the second, the definitions of a lie and of that which is to lie, there, B, Here it is to be seen what it is. In the third, he touches upon what...

a lie, etc., is to err, and he subjoins a question concerning the saying of Jacob, whether it was a lie or not? There, at B, It is also to be known that in some things, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether A Lie As Such Is A Sin

Whether a lie in itself is a sin?

Now a question arises concerning the first part in the text, Whether a lie in itself is a sin?

And, if it is a sin, Whether in itself it is a mortal or venial sin?

To the first it is objected as follows: § 1. Augustine says in the book Against Lying:[307] "Whoever thinks that there is any kind of lie that is not a sin, shamefully deceives himself, since he judges it honorable to be a deceiver of others." Therefore, every lie is a sin.

§ 2. Again, Augustine, in the same place: "It seems to me that every lie is a sin."

§ 3. Again, Augustine, in the same place: "Therefore every lie must be called a sin, because a man ought to speak that which he bears in his mind, whether it is true, or whether it is thought to be true and is not." Therefore, every lie is a sin.

§ 4. Again, it is proved by reason: For every man who is good is to be believed; no liar is to be believed; therefore no one who lies is good. But in a rational creature, he who is not good is bad before God, and not except through a lie: therefore every lie is a fault before God; therefore a sin.

But against this it is objected that: § 1. Just as it happens that one signifies an intention by a word, so it happens also by a deed, as Anselm says, whence he himself says that there is a truth of signification and of action;[308] therefore it is also possible to lie by a deed. But not every lie of deed is a sin; therefore neither does every lie of word seem to be a sin. The minor premise is proved by the fact that it is held in Joshua 8:6 that he feigned flight to draw the inhabitants of the city farther from the city.[309] And in Luke 24:28: He Himself, namely the Lord, feigned to go farther.[310]

§ 2. Again, it seems also that not even a lie of word is always a sin: because Doctors disputing often deceive by intention, even Doctors of Sacred Scripture, and in the doctrine of faith; and yet they are not said to sin when they put forward and strive to prove things that are false and which they know to be false; therefore not every lie is a sin.

Solution. It must be said that every lie is a sin.

Therefore, to the first objection, it must be said that such acts are to be referred to what is signified by the intention of the doers, and thus they are not a sin, because they are not done for the sake of deceiving. It is like a metaphorical expression, which according to its primary signification would be false if it were judged according to it; but when judged according to the secondary signification, it is thus true; and such true acts are to be referred to the thing signified. And so Augustine resolves it in a certain chapter in the Decrees.[311] But the Masters say that it is not similar concerning an act and a deed, and a word: because an act or a deed is not an immediate messenger of the heart, but can be referred to many things; whereas a word is the immediate messenger of the heart; and therefore there ought to be nothing else in the word than what is in the heart. But in a deed there can be something else, because it was not instituted for announcing the heart.

To the other it must be said that Doctors do not intend to deceive, but rather through exercise to teach; and that they show a lie, this is so that one may learn to beware of it, not that it may be approved as true; and therefore they themselves do not lie.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Lie As Such Is A Mortal Sin

Whether a lie in itself is a mortal sin?

Secondly it is asked, Whether a lie is a mortal sin?

And it seems that it is. § 1. For thus says Psalm 5:7: "You will destroy all who speak a lie:"[312] but a man is not destroyed except through mortal sin: therefore every lie is a mortal sin.

§ 2. Again, "The mouth that lies kills the soul;"[313] and the soul is not killed except through mortal sin, because nothing separates the life of the soul from the soul except mortal sin: therefore a lie is a mortal sin.

§ 3. Again, whatever is contrary to virtue and destroys virtue, is a mortal sin; a lie is contrary to virtue and destructive of virtue; therefore it is a mortal sin. The first premise is proved by the fact that venial sin does not destroy virtue in the soul. The second is proved by the fact that truth is a certain virtue, as Aristotle says in the second book of the Ethics,[314] which according to Augustine a lie destroys.

§ 4. Again, every sin against the Holy Spirit is a mortal sin: but a lie is a sin against the Holy Spirit: therefore it is a mortal sin. The first premise is proved by what is held in the penultimate distinction of the second book of the Sentences, where it is said that a sin against the Holy Spirit is graver and more abominable than other sins.[315] The second is proved by the fact that a lie attacks recognized truth: because unless he recognized the truth, he would not speak a lie, but a falsehood; but in the same place it is said that the attacking of recognized truth is a sin against the Holy Spirit.

307. Augustine, Contra mendacium, c. 15.

§ 5. Again, he who acts against his conscience builds toward Gehenna; every liar acts against his conscience: therefore he builds toward Gehenna. The first premise is presupposed from Augustine, whose authority it is. The second is proved by the fact that nothing is known in the conscience except the truth: and lying and a lie have this as directly contrary. From this it is further inferred: Nothing builds toward Gehenna except mortal sin, because venial sin builds toward Purgatory: therefore a lie is a mortal sin.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. In the text it seems that the lie of the midwives, and of Rahab the harlot, was venial on account of piety. But if it were mortal in itself, it would become venial by no adjunct. Therefore in itself it is not mortal.

§ 2. Moreover, all commonly say that an officious lie is not mortal: and what is said by all is true either in whole or in part: therefore not every lie in itself is a mortal sin.

Solution. It must be said that not every lie in itself is a mortal sin.

To the first and second, therefore, it must be said that according to the Master in the second part of this distinction, those two authorities first introduced are not understood of every lie, but only of a pernicious one. And the reason for this solution is that, since a lie is formally the intention of deceiving, and materially the false signification of a voice, as will be clear below, the intention of deceiving is not predicated equally of a pernicious, an officious, and a jocose lie, but by prior and posterior: and the intention of deceiving according to its primary intention is not found except in a pernicious lie: and the reason for this will be clear below. And therefore I think that only a pernicious lie in itself is a mortal sin: and so said all the ancients, Praepositivus, and William of Auxerre, and the Masters of the Decretals, although they do not assign a reason for their saying.

To the third it must be said that there is the truth of the saying, and the truth of the truth-teller or the truth of the habit, and the truth of the sign in the saying. But a lie in itself is not contrary to the truth of the habit in the mind, just as neither is the first motion in a continent man contrary to the habit of chastity in the soul, but [it is contrary] to the truth of the sign which is in the act of saying: just as also the first motion in a continent man is contrary to the act of chastity: and from such contrariety and destruction it is not a mortal sin, but a venial one.

To the other it must be said that a lie in itself is not a sin against the Holy Spirit: because then every sin would be a sin against the Holy Spirit. But some sin is against the Father, such as that which is committed through fear, or lust, or compassion for another's loss or penalty. But a certain kind is against the Son, as when it is spoken because it is not reputed to be a sin: for although he then knowingly speaks a falsehood, nevertheless he does not speak a falsehood with a conscience of the great quantity of the sin as it is: and then it proceeds from ignorance moving one to speak.

To that which is objected, it must be said that the attacking of recognized truth which is according to piety, is a sin against the Holy Spirit: but not every lie attacks that truth, nor does every lie attack the truth as a virtue of the mind, nor does every lie attack the truth of the gift out of malice, as is clear from what has been said.

To the last it must be said that a lie in itself does not build toward Gehenna, nor is it against conscience, but beside conscience, like a venial sin, and it disposes to Gehenna.

To that which is objected concerning the truth by which it is known, a distinction must be made as above: because the truth of the act in the saying is destroyed by a lie: and that is known by speculative knowledge, and not practical; and to act against this is not mortal: but to act against the conscience of doing—that is, what conscience dictates from a precept must be done, and if the contrary is done, dictates it to be a mortal sin—that is to act directly against conscience and to build toward Gehenna.

Articulus 3 — Whether A Lie Is Well Divided Into The Libidinous, The Pernicious, And The Officious

Whether a lie is well divided into libidinous, pernicious, and officious?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, § 2: Yet it is to be known that there are three kinds of lies, etc.

The division of anything ought to be given according to the things specifying the lie itself.

§ 1. But a lie is not placed in a species, as it seems, by the fact that it results in advantage or disadvantage, since neither the signification is false, nor is there an intention of deceiving: therefore it seems that it is not well divided according to these three.

§ 2. Moreover, a joke and lust are two moving causes to lying, and neither is contained under the other: therefore it seems that there are four kinds.

§ 3. Again, lust is the root of all vices, as Augustine says: therefore it is not separated from advantage as a moving cause or from malignity, and thus it ought not to make a special kind of lie, as it seems.

§ 4. Moreover, it seems that the third kind, which is from malignity, is a sin against the Holy Spirit: because it proceeds from that which is contrary to the goodness of the Holy Spirit: and this is a sin against the Holy Spirit, as was determined in the penultimate distinction of the second book of the Sentences: therefore it is a sin against the Holy Spirit, as it seems.

Solution. It must be said that this first division of a lie is taken according to the moving causes in general: and this is on the part of the mover: and since there are only three moving causes, there are only three kinds of lies. But that there are only three is clear thus: The mover to lying is either the lie in itself, or that for the sake of which it is done. If it is the lie in itself: then it is libidinous. If, however, it is that for the sake of which it is done: either this is evil, and then it proceeds from malignity; or it is good, and then it is officious.

309. Joshua 8:6.

Therefore to the first it must be said that that objection proceeds when a genus is divided into species: but here the genus is divided according to all the acts of that genus, which it can have on the part of the liar as moving to the act.

To the other it must be said that the Master places the libidinous and the jocose in one kind: because the lust alone is lying in both, for the reason that the joke adds nothing to which the lust might take on a circumstance of accusation or excuse.

To the other it must be said that habitual indeterminate lust, which is an inordinate habitual pleasure in a mutable good, is the root: but here lust is taken as actual and determinate to the act of lying, and that is a special moving cause: whereas the former is posited in other causes as the root of every sin.

To the other it must be said that it does not have to be a sin against the Holy Spirit through the fact that it is from malignity. For malignity is twofold. One kind is a mover against the goodness of the Holy Spirit: and from such proceeds a sin against the Holy Spirit. But a certain kind is malice intending to harm the neighbor: and from this there is not always a sin against the Holy Spirit, because it alone is not the moving cause, but sometimes personal advantage, or some cause of hatred. Nevertheless, I do not deny that a pernicious lie is frequently a sin against the Holy Spirit: but it does not have this from the fact that it is a lie, or from the fact that it is pernicious, but from a cause specially moving against the goodness of the Holy Spirit in Himself or in His gifts, in that intention by which the gifts manifest Him. And concerning this, let the question raised on the penultimate distinction of the second book of the Sentences be inquired into.

Articulus 4 — Whether It Is A Mortal Sin For The Perfect To Lie

Whether it is a mortal sin for perfect men to lie?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, § 2: It is not fitting for perfect men to lie.

And it is asked, Whether it is a mortal sin for perfect men to lie?

And it seems that it is: because § 1. In the text he says: "Lest for the body of another they kill their own soul:" but the soul is not killed except by mortal sin: therefore for perfect men it is a mortal sin.

§ 2. Again, a perfect man has professed to show the truth inwardly and outwardly: therefore if he is found to lie, he acts against his profession: but to act against one's profession is a mortal sin: therefore to lie is a mortal sin for perfect men.

Peter Lombard, Sentences, II, d. 43. Peter Lombard, Sentences, III, d. 38.

310. Luke 24:28.

Again it is asked, Whether a Doctor of truth, such as a Master of Theology and a Preacher, sins mortally by lying?

It seems that he does: because he acts directly against the doctrine of truth: therefore he sins mortally.

Again, he acts against what he says, because he preaches that one must not lie, and he lies: therefore he sins mortally.

Again, to this point there are many authorities of Augustine in the book Against Lying: because he says that it is not fitting for perfect men to lie. But there can be no reason why he specifically names the perfect, unless because for them it is a mortal sin, and for others venial: therefore it seems that for the perfect it is a mortal sin.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. No circumstance aggravates a sin infinitely: a religious person's lying posits nothing but a circumstance on top of the lie: therefore it does not aggravate the sin infinitely. But it would aggravate it infinitely if it made it mortal: therefore it does not become mortal by the fact that a perfect man lies.

§ 2. Again, if on account of the state of religion a perfect man sins mortally in that in which another sins venially, it seems that from the state of perfection he imports a detriment: but this is incongruous: therefore a perfect man by lying does not sin mortally.

Solution. It must be said that a lie is not a mortal sin for a perfect man, if for another it is venial in the same species.

To the first it must be said that Augustine without doubt is speaking of an officious lie: but he calls the perdition of the soul a disposition, and not a real perdition. Others say differently, that someone can lie for his own life out of a twofold love of life, namely mortal or venial: and similarly he can lie for another's. And Augustine is speaking of the case when someone lies, or the lie proceeds from a mortal love of his own or another's life. But this seems to be nothing, since Gregory says that an officious lie in the act itself is conjoined to piety. But if piety is the cause of the lie, it does not proceed from an illicit venial or mortal love of life. And therefore the first solution is truer.

To the other it must be said that to sin against one's profession is said in two ways, namely against the substance of the profession, and against the sign of the profession. Regarding the substance of the profession, it is nothing but the truth of life in continence and obedience and the renunciation of property: and to sin against these is mortal. Whence the Canon says, that a monk possessing a halfpenny is not worth a halfpenny. But to act against the signs happens in two ways: directly, and this does not happen except through mortal sin; or indirectly, and this does not happen except through a venial lie in them: because he has not professed the truth of speech except in the sign of the habit which is a sign of truth.

To the other it must be said that I think the same judgment should be held concerning a Doctor, and a Preacher, and a perfect man.

311. Gratian, Decretum, C. 22, q. 2.

To that which is objected, it must be said that the truth of the sign or of speaking is not the truth of doctrine, but rather the truth of teaching: and the one lying officiously does not act against it, but acts somewhat beside it.

To the other it must be said that he preaches and teaches that one must abstain from every mortal and venial sin, but he does not preach that to sin venially is mortal: and therefore he does not act against what he teaches.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Lie Of The Midwives Was A Mortal Or Venial Sin

Whether the midwives' lie was a mortal or venial sin?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, § 2 near the middle: But concerning the lie of the midwives, etc.

And it seems that it was venial: because

Gregory the Great, Moralia, XVIII. Gratian, Decretum.

§ 1. Augustine says this in the text.

§ 2. Again, it was officious: therefore the least among lies: therefore venial.

§ 3. Again, the midwives were not in a state of perfection: therefore they could lie venially, and especially in an officious lie: therefore they sinned venially.

§ 4. Again, if it had been mortal, it would have impeded merit: but it did not impede it, because Augustine says that because the midwives feared God, He built them houses literally, by enriching them and giving them children. And Jerome says that He built them spiritual houses. Therefore they did not sin mortally, but venially, as it seems.

But against this it is objected by Gregory, who says thus in the Gloss in the same place: "The reward of their benignity, which could have been remunerated with eternal life, was exchanged into an earthly compensation for the fault of the lie, so that they might receive goods in their own life which they had wished to protect by lying: and they would have no reward to expect further." But nothing exchanges an eternal reward for a temporal one, except a mortal sin. Therefore it seems that their lie was a mortal sin.

Solution. It must be said that in my judgment the midwives' lie was venial: but not to confess the truth on account of fear for the body in a place of confession of faith and justice could be a mortal sin. For at first, by sparing the infants, they had done well: but afterwards, summoned by Pharaoh and established in judgment, they ought to have confessed the faith of God and justice, and not prolonged their life by lying: and for this timidity in the place of confession it may be that they sinned mortally, and not in the lie in itself. And that this is the opinion of Gregory is clear: because he adds thus in the same Gloss: "For if it is subtly pondered, they lied out of love for the present life, not with the intention of a reward: for by sparing they tried to cover the infants' life, but by lying, their own."

312. Psalm 5:7 (Vulgate 5:6).

Others say differently, namely that there was a threefold will in the midwives, namely the will to spare, and this was remunerable according to Augustine and Jerome. Another was the will to lie, and it was a venial sin. A third was the will to free themselves through a lie: which will was conjoined to the act of sin in lying, and this was in such a case when it was time to confess both faith and justice: and therefore it was a mortal sin: and concerning this they say Gregory speaks.

But that according to Gregory their lie in itself was not a mortal sin, is clear in the beginning of the same Gloss, where he says thus: "A lie is to be guarded against with the utmost effort, although it be of a lighter fault: let no one lie in bestowing a benefit." But a lighter fault is customarily not called anything but venial by the Saints.

Again, Gregory in the same Gloss, below: "If any fault is purged by a subsequent pious operation, how much more easily is this one wiped away, which piety, the mother of a good work, accompanies!" Through this it is clear that he does not mean to say that a lie in itself is a mortal sin, but a venial one.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Eight Kinds Of Lies Are Well Assigned By The Master

Whether the eight kinds of lies are well assigned by the Master?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, § 2 towards the end: It is also to be known that there are eight kinds of lies, etc.

For it seems that that division is null.

§ 1. For it seems that to lie in the doctrine of piety or religion does not differ from a lie which is in common speech, except by the matter: but a material difference does not make diverse species, because otherwise there would be as many species as there are men: therefore it seems that it does not make diverse species of lying, and thus the division is null.

Augustine, Contra mendacium, c. 15. Jerome, Commentary on Ezekiel. Gregory the Great, Glossa Ordinaria on Exodus 1:21.

§ 2. Again, a lie that harms someone and benefits no one, and a lie that benefits someone and harms someone, do not differ except according to the matter: therefore it seems that they are not diverse species of lies.

§ 3. Exactly the same objection is about officious lies, namely to lie so that life, or chastity, or money may be preserved, which do not have a difference except a material one: therefore they do not constitute three species of lies.

313. Wisdom 1:11.

§ 4. Moreover, a lie that benefits someone and harms someone has as much of the officious as of the pernicious: since therefore the denomination is made from the worthier, it ought rather to be placed among the officious from utility, than among the pernicious from harm.

§ 5. Moreover, the officious seems to harm someone: because he who lies for preserving money, by lying brings it about that the other is deceived, and does not receive the money which he would receive if the first had told the truth: therefore it harms someone: and what harms someone is pernicious: therefore the officious in retaining money is pernicious.

Moreover it is asked, According to what is this division of lies taken?

Solution. It must be said that the answer to this last point is clear through the prior division, that there are three moving causes to a lie in general, namely harmfulness, lust, and utility: and according to harmfulness the first three species of lying are taken. But that harmfulness is either to the detriment of the spirit, or to the detriment of the body. If to the detriment of the spirit: then it is by way of subversion of the articles of faith, or of those things that precede or follow the articles: as if someone lying should say that fornication is not a mortal sin, or that the Scripture is not true, or that Christ was not incarnated, or something of this sort. But if it is to the detriment of the body: it is either a harm universally, or according to something. If in the first way: then it is the second kind of lie, which harms everyone, and benefits no one: and such is a lie detracting someone, and this harms the listeners, and the speaker, and the one about whom it is: the speaker, to the perdition of his soul; the listeners, to the perdition of the fervor of fraternal charity; the one about whom it is made, to the perdition of his reputation. But if the harm is not universally, it is the third species, which harms someone and benefits someone. But if the lust for lying is the moving cause: it is either with the intention of a lie, or it is with the intention of that which is conjoined to the lie in the listener: and in the first way it is libidinous, in the second way jocose. But if utility is the moving cause: it is either in the goods of fortune, or in the goods of the body, or of the soul, which can be lost: for these are what are so in the soul that they have a state in the body, such as virginity. And in the first way is the sixth. In the second way is the seventh. In the third way the eighth.

But to the first and second and third it must be said that such arguments do not proceed except concerning the matter out of which a thing is, and not concerning the matter about which: just as an object is that about which an act is, because acts are defined by their objects, and potencies or habits by their acts: because such objects have the rationale of moving causes and ends in relation to the acts which are about them.

To the other it must be said that although there is something of utility in the third pernicious lie, yet it is not the moving cause, but the consequent: and therefore it is not defined and specified by it.

To the other it must be said that it does not harm him, because he does not have a right to have that money: but rather it benefits him, because it preserves him from injustice: whence it harms no one except the speaker, because this harm is inseparable from a lie, for the reason that it is a sin.

314. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, II.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Rule That The Master Puts Forth Concerning Lying More Or Less Is Well Assigned

Whether the rule which the Master posits concerning lying more or less is well assigned?

Whether the rule which the Master posits concerning lying more or less is well assigned?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, § 2 at the end: But in these, by so much less does anyone sin when he lies, etc.

For this seems to be false. § 1. For let it be posited that someone out of ignorance says that Christ was not in Cana of Galilee, where He made wine from water; and let him speak out of malice a sin against a neighbor, whence the latter is hanged, and his sons are disinherited, such as that he is guilty of the crime of lèse-majesté; it seems that he sins more by the second lie than by the first: and yet the first is in the doctrine of piety, and the second is not: therefore it seems that sometimes the first is a lesser sin than the second.

§ 2. Again, through the first a word is sometimes spoken against the Son, and through the second a word against the Holy Spirit, because it can be out of malice: therefore the second will sometimes be a greater sin than the first.

§ 3. Again, through the first faith is injured, but through the second charity: but charity is a greater virtue than faith: therefore what is against charity is a greater sin than that which is against faith.

§ 4. In the same way this rule seems to fail concerning the fourth and the fifth. For a flatterer harms more than one simply lying: and yet the lie of flattery is the fifth, and a simple lie is the fourth: therefore the fifth lie is greater than the fourth, and thus the rule does not hold.

§ 5. Again it is objected concerning the seventh and eighth. Life is better than bodily cleanliness: since therefore she who is corrupted by violation does not incur anything but bodily uncleanness, it seems that the eighth benefits less than the seventh.

Solution. It must be said that this rule is universally true.

But to the first objection, it must be said that no one lies if he is ignorant: for it is necessary that he go against his mind if he lies: but in the doctrine of piety he cannot speak against his mind unless by intending to subvert the faith which is taught in it: and therefore the first case is null, because it does not posit a lie, but ignorance. But if he were to say that Christ was not in Cana of Galilee in order to show that the Scripture is not to be believed, then it would be to the point: and then the first would be greater than the second.

315. Peter Lombard, Sentences, II, d. 43.

To the other it must be said that it is by accident that some sin is made a sin against the Holy Spirit: but Augustine's rule is understood [to mean] that, other circumstances being equal, these lies differ according as they recede from the first.

To the other it must be said that that argumentation is worth nothing, and is a mere counterexample. Charity is a greater virtue than faith: therefore hatred, which is opposed to charity, is a greater vice than infidelity. For it is clear that it does not follow: because faith has the order of a foundation to the others: and therefore what destroys faith, not only destroys it, but all things built upon it, and by reason of that the evil contrary to faith becomes a greater evil than the contrary to charity, and than that of any virtue.

To the other it must be said that the flatterer does not lie with a jocose lie, but a pernicious one: but here empty talk is understood which intends to move to laughter: for he does not intend to deceive, but to make one laugh: and therefore the motive in such a lie is a lesser evil than where the pleasure of lying moves. Others say differently, that Augustine is speaking in the case when someone by flattering does not harm. But this solution is not valid: because the rule is universally understood concerning a jocose lie, that it is less than a libidinous one.

To the last it must be said that it scarcely happens that the chastity of the body is corrupted without the infection of the mind: and in this respect a greater good is lost in the violation of chastity than in the killing of the body. Or it may be said, and better, that this is true regarding the rationale of the goods preserved by a lie in general: because a good of fortune is less than that of nature: and a good of fortune is preserved by the sixth, but of nature by the seventh. Again, an honest good is greater than the preservation of fortune and nature, which have only the rationale of a useful good: but the honest is preserved by the eighth.

And thus it is clear that there is no counterexample to Augustine's rule, understanding it generally.

Articulus 8 — What A Lie Is, And What It Is To Lie

What is a lie, and what is it to lie?

What is a lie, and what is it to lie?

Next it is asked concerning that which he says, there, B: "Here it must be seen what a lie is, and what it is to lie."

For it seems that a lie, according to that definition, does not apply to every lie: because § 1. In a jocose lie there is no intention of deceiving, but rather of provoking laughter: therefore it is not a general definition, as it seems.

§ 2. Moreover, the intention to deceive is ordered to deception: but one who errs in the way of morals is more deceived than one who errs in the physical way: therefore the intention of deceiving is not equal: since therefore this differing intention of deceiving is in diverse species of lie, the intention to deceive is not predicated univocally of every lie.

§ 3. Moreover, it is more to intend to deceive in reality and in speech, than in speech alone: but in a pernicious lie, deception is intended according to reality and speech, and in an officious and a libidinous lie according to speech alone, namely that false things be accepted for true: therefore the intention to deceive is not said in one way in the general definition of a lie.

Further it is asked concerning what he says in that chapter, that a man can lie by speaking the truth if he thinks it to be false, but nevertheless it is not called a lie.

For this seems impossible: § 1. For to lie is nothing else than to tell a lie: therefore he who does not tell a lie does not lie, as it seems.

§ 2. Besides, the act which is imported by this verb, "He lies," does not add to the act of speaking anything but a lie: therefore he who does not tell a lie does not lie: but one speaking a truth that he thinks to be false does not tell a lie, as he says in the Text: therefore one speaking a truth that he thinks to be false does not lie, the contrary of which is in the Text.

Solution: It must be said, that without prejudice I think that the first objections are to be conceded, and that "lie" is predicated primarily and secondarily of the threefold genus of lie: and therefore absolutely and according to the perfect substance of a lie, there is no lie except the pernicious one: and this is why the Master says in the Text that the authorities which say that "the mouth that lies kills the soul"[316], and "you will destroy all who speak a lie"[317], are understood of a pernicious lie: because the others participate secondarily in the definition of a lie. There are some, however, speaking otherwise, namely that the intention to deceive according to reality is not of the substance of a lie, but rather a consequent effect: and because the intention to deceive according to speech is in every lie, therefore they say that the definition of a lie posited here belongs to all.

But to that which is said about the jocose, it must be said that the primary intention is that false things be approved as true, although it does not stop in those, just as it does not in the pernicious and the officious.

And through this the solution to all that were first objected is clear. The former solution, however, is truer, and according to it it can be better defended that a lie in itself is not a mortal sin, neither for the perfect nor for others.

But to what is further asked, it must be said that "to lie" expresses the procession of a lie from an agent, and therefore does not contract its substantial definition from the side of the speaker: and therefore it can be true, and yet a lie: because that truth is in the speaker, and with respect to the speaker it is as false: but "a lie" expresses it in rest and abstraction: and therefore it has its matter from the side of the reality, and not from the side of the speaker: and therefore it is that it must be false according to reality, if it is to be a lie.

To the other thing which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not true that to lie is the same as to tell a lie, as has already been shown.

To the other it must be said that it adds more, namely the procession of the lie as it is in the speaker: and this is to be a lie in a qualified sense: and therefore it suffices for it that it be false in a qualified sense, that is, with respect to the speaker.

Articulus 9 — Whether Jacob, Who Said That He Was Esau, Was Lying; And Whether He Could Speak 'With Heart And Heart' According To The Excuse Of Some

Whether Jacob, who said he was Esau, was lying? And whether they could speak in a double heart according to the excuse of some?

Whether Jacob, who said he was Esau, was lying? And whether they could speak in a double heart according to the excuse of some?

Next it is asked concerning what he says near the end of this distinction, there, B, § 2: "It is also usually asked concerning Jacob who calls himself Esau," etc.

For it seems that Jacob lied: because § 1. He spoke a falsehood with the intention of deceiving his father according to speech, that is, so that he would approve the false as true: therefore he was lying. But if you were to say that he is excused, [I reply that] he would also be excused from fornication, which is false: therefore neither can he be excused from a lie by the counsel of the Holy Spirit.

§ 2. Moreover, Augustine says that even if God were to sin, a sin would not on account of this be a good thing: therefore much less will a sin be made good and excusable by the counsel of the Holy Spirit: therefore Jacob is not excused, as it seems.

§ 3. Moreover, a lie (as Augustine says) belongs to those things which cannot be done well: therefore it belongs to those things which cannot be excused; therefore neither is Jacob excused from a lie.

And the same objection stands concerning Judith and others, who seem to have lied according to the surface of the text.

Further it is asked, whether they could speak in a double heart, so that they might say something true according to one sense, and wish to be understood in another sense in which it was false: as some excuse them?

It seems not: because § 1. The Psalm reckons it among sins "to speak with a double heart" (in corde et corde loqui) therefore it seems that this is a sin, just like the other.

§ 2. Moreover, it is held below in the Text in the following distinction, "With whatever art of words anyone swears, God as witness of conscience accepts it in this sense in which he to whom it is sworn, understands it": but there seems to be a similar judgment concerning a simple word, since the use of speaking was given so that we might lay open our affections and counsels to one another: but it is certain that the father understood a falsehood: therefore the statement ought to be interpreted in the sense of a lie.

316. Wis. 1:11.

Moreover it is asked, if Jacob could have sworn to what he said? For if he spoke the truth, and God is the witness of truth: therefore he could have invoked Him as witness of truth: this is to swear: therefore he could have sworn to what he said.

But against this: An oath is accepted in the sense of him to whom it is sworn: and according to his sense he would have spoken a falsehood: therefore he would have sworn a falsehood.

Solution: It must be said that we should not speak rashly concerning the counsels of the Holy Spirit: but rather such things should be venerated with silence than with discussion, were it not for the importunity of disputants. Therefore it can be said without prejudice, that Jacob said this not by his own motion, but by the motion of the Holy Spirit through the instruction of his mother. But although the intellect of man is not of itself sufficient for this, that in one locution it posits multiple senses at once and simultaneously, nevertheless the Holy Spirit has always brought it about, and will bring it about, that in His discourses many pass through, and knowledge is manifold: and no one discovers anything, if he has discovered a truth, that the Holy Spirit did not understand in that signification when He established the discourse. And therefore it can be said that according to the sense which the words make by referring to the reality, Jacob spoke a falsehood:

but he did not speak a falsehood according to the sense which the words make by referring to the mystery of the reality: and this Jacob intended implicitly by the fact that he intended to obey his mother and the Holy Spirit. For he was speaking by another's motion, not his own: and this is also the mode of excusing the others.

And through this the solution to almost everything is clear: for he was not speaking with a double heart, because he well willed that his father should understand the mystery: which also afterwards, when he understood it, he confirmed by a holy blessing. And as for what he said, that he fraudulently stole the blessing, it must be referred to the exterior mode, and not to interior fraud. It is also clear that he could have sworn this in this way, and he would have sworn a truth. Whence the solution to the whole is clear. Now this solution rests on the words of Augustine, who says that such things were said and done mystically: for this which has been stated is the mode of the mystery which the Holy Spirit placed in such words.

DISTINCTIO XXXIX

Divisio Textus

"Now let us see concerning perjury," etc. Here he treats of the oath and perjury, through which one also sins against the fifth commandment.

Now this distinction has three parts: in the first of which he treats of the oath considered in itself according to those things which are substantial to it. In the second, he treats of the oath from the part of the one swearing and the one exacting the oath, there, K, "This also must be known, that with whatever art of words anyone swears," etc.

In the third and last, it is treated with what reverence one ought to approach an oath, there, M, "The holy synod decreed," etc.

The first of these is divided into four: in the first of which the companions of an oath are treated. In the second, the cause of the prohibition of an oath, there, C, "But if it is asked, whether to swear is evil," etc. In the third he asks, by what must one swear? Whether by God or by a creature, and sometimes by an idol? there, D, "It is also asked, whether it is lawful to swear by a creature," etc. In the fourth and last, the obligation of an oath is asked about, there, H, "Now it remains to see, whether every oath must be fulfilled?"

From these the sentence is easily clear.

Articulus 1 — Whether 'You Shall Not Take The Name Of God In Vain' And Perjury Itself Are Of The Precepts Of The First Or Of The Second Tablet

Whether "Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain" and perjury itself belong to the precepts of the first or second table?

FIRST ARTICLE. Whether "Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain" and perjury itself belong to the precepts of the first or second table?

Now a doubt arises concerning the introduction of that part:

§ 1. For since the name of God is invoked in vain in perjury, it seems he ought rather to have determined it under the second commandment of the first table than under the fifth of the second.

§ 2. Moreover, in perjury one sins against God: since therefore the first table orders man to God, it seems that perjury should have been determined under the precepts of the first table.

Solution: It must be said that no one perjures himself with the intention of sinning against God, but in order to deceive his neighbor: and therefore perjury, insofar as it is committed in false testimony in lawsuits, is more principally and more frequently committed against a neighbor, than against God: and therefore it has to be determined not in the first table, but here.

But to the other objections it must be said that the name of God is indeed invoked: and this is done with the intention of deceiving the neighbor: and therefore it is ultimately against the neighbor, and not against God in Himself, but rather in His members.

Articulus 2 — Whether An Oath Has Three Companions, And In What Respect Those Companions Differ

Whether an oath has three companions, and with respect to what those companions differ?

317. Ps. 5:7.

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, A, around the beginning: "It must be noted, that an oath has three companions," etc.

It seems that two are superfluous: because § 1. He who swears with the judgment of discretion, swears justly and truly: because he discerns nothing else by the judgment of his discretion: therefore having said that an oath ought to be with the judgment of discretion, it was not necessary to add that it should be true and just.

§ 2. Moreover, nothing false is just: therefore having said that it was just, it is superfluously said that it ought to be true,

Besides, with respect to what is the number of these companions derived? Moreover, why is it said that these companions are rather to be appended to an oath, than to our other speech or work?

Solution: It must be said that these three companions are necessary to an oath: and although one is not perfect without another, nevertheless when one is posited another is not superfluous: because they have distinct properties regarding an oath, as will be clear below.

And there is an instance against the argument: because once one virtue is possessed all are possessed, and yet not on that account when one is possessed do the others become superfluous, on account of the distinct acts which they have.

And through this the solution to the first two is clear.

To the other it must be said that an oath is compared to three things, namely to the swearer from whose will it goes forth, to the thing concerning which it is, and to the cause for which it is made. And according to the first comparison it is ruled by judgment. According to the second it ought to be equated to truth according to the reality. And according to the third it must have justice: because it has no place in an unjust cause, as if someone swears that he will do what is unjust to be done, as is held below.

To the last it must be said that no oath is secure on account of the dubiousness of our speech, as it is said in the book of Wisdom: "The thoughts of mortals are timid, and our foresights uncertain."[318] And therefore when our speech is testified to by divine truth, it needs ruling companions, lest it be found dissimilar to the invoked truth.

Articulus 3 — What Perjury Is

What is perjury?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, "But better is he believed," etc.

For everyone perjuring himself incurs the guilt of perjury: but one swearing to such a falsehood which is thought to be true, perjures himself, as he says: therefore he incurs the guilt of perjury.

BUT against this is that the contrary is held three times in the same chapter.

Solution: To this it must be said that there is truth according to the conscience of the speaker, and truth of the reality. Truth according to the conscience of the speaker suffices concerning future things whose cause is the will: because they are not except in the will, and according to it they are true. But the truth of the reality ought to be in an oath concerning the present and the future. Whence what he calls perjury here is not perjury except in a qualified sense, namely insofar as it will not happen so in reality apart from the fault of the swearer.

Articulus 4 — Whether To Swear Is Evil

Whether to swear is evil?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, C, "But if it is asked, whether to swear is evil?" And two things are asked: Whether to swear is evil? And, Whether it is a mortal sin?

TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: § 1. Ps. 109:4 says: "The Lord swore, and He will not repent," etc.[319] But if it were evil, the Lord would not have sworn. Therefore to swear is not evil, but rather good: because whatever the Lord does is good.

§ 2. Moreover, Heb. 6:13: "God, since He had no one greater by whom to swear, swore by Himself," etc.[320] And there follows the same as before.

§ 3. Moreover, Rom. 1:9 says: "For God is my witness."[321] And, 2 Cor. 1:23: "But I call God as a witness upon my soul."[322] Now it is certain that the Apostle would not have sworn, if it were not good to swear. Therefore to swear is good.

§ 4. Moreover, Augustine: "To swear is not evil." Therefore the same as before.

§ 5. Moreover, in an oath there are two things, of which each is good, namely to tell the truth, and the invocation of the name of God: therefore adjoined they would make a greater good: therefore an oath is a greater good than a simple proving of truth.

§ 6. Moreover, it is asked again, why would swearing be called evil? If for the reason that it is without a cause. Against this: According to this even to speak and to walk is evil: because without a cause it is done idly: this is false: therefore from this it is not held that even to swear in itself is evil.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. Swearing is prohibited: but no good is prohibited by the prohibition of the Decalogue: therefore to swear is evil.

§ 2. Moreover, Exod. 20:7, upon that: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," the Gloss says: "that is, thou shalt not swear for nothing."[323] But to swear for nothing is the same as to swear simply. Therefore to swear simply is prohibited by the prohibition of the second precept.

§ 3. Moreover, Augustine: "False swearing is pernicious, true swearing is perilous, no swearing is secure." Therefore it is clear that every swearing is evil, as it seems.

318. Wis. 9:14.

§ 4. Moreover, if it were not evil in itself to swear, why would it be so diligently commanded to be avoided in the Gospel, Matt. 5:34, and in the epistle of James?[324]

Solution: It must be said that just as Augustine says in the Text, the Lord diligently prohibits swearing, lest anyone should desire swearing as a good, and harm himself by perjury through the habit of swearing. Whence it must be said without prejudice, that to swear in itself is not evil, but good: but nevertheless such a thing is incautious: and therefore it is diligently prohibited; because since man is subject to vanity, his speech is even more vain and unstable than the man himself, who never remains in the same state: and therefore it is difficult for one accustomed to swearing not sometimes to confirm what is doubtful or false. Therefore although it is good in itself, nevertheless such a thing is evil, because it is incautious: and thus it is good, but by accident it is evil insofar as it is incautious, and the name of God, or the truth of God shining forth in His creatures, is invoked with less reverence than it ought to be.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the reason for the prohibition is because it is incautious.

To the other it must be said that an oath is not prohibited by the precept of the Decalogue: because then it could never be done licitly, but perjury is.

To the other it must be said that to swear for nothing is not the same as to swear simply, but to swear for nothing, that is, to swear without a cause: and this oath does not have the companions of discretion and justice: and therefore this is prohibited, yet not swearing simply.

To the other it must be said that the reason for Augustine's saying is not from the side of the oath, but from the side of the swearer, who scarcely is sufficient for a perfect knowledge of the thing concerning which he swears.

Articulus 5 — Whether Every Perjury Is A Mortal Sin; And Whether A Jesting One Is Such; And Whether One Who Swears Falsely By God Venerates God

Whether every perjury is a mortal sin? and, Whether a jocose one is such? and, Whether one swearing a falsehood by God, venerates God?

Next it is asked secondly, whether every perjury is a mortal sin?

Now it seems that it is: because § 1. Perjury is directly against the precept: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain": but what is directly against a precept is a mortal sin: therefore every perjury is a mortal sin.

§ 2. Moreover, one invoking divine truth as a witness to a falsehood knowingly contemns God: but those knowingly contemning God sin mortally: therefore everyone knowingly swearing a falsehood sins mortally, as it seems.

319. Ps. 109:4.

§ 3. Moreover, a lie in itself is a grave sin: but it is certain that an oath supervening upon it draws it outside the genus of a simple lie: therefore it draws it outside the genus of a venial sin: therefore it is a mortal sin.

§ 4. Moreover, it seems less that the name of God ought to be invoked in vain, than in falsehood: and yet it is prohibited by the prohibition of the Decalogue that it be invoked in vain: therefore much more that it not be invoked in falsehood: therefore one swearing false things directly acts against the precept: therefore he sins mortally.

BUT AGAINST THIS: Just as it happens that one knowingly tells a jocose lie, so it also happens that one knowingly swears a jocose falsehood: and it would be grave to say this, that then it would be a mortal sin: therefore it is not always a mortal sin, because it is certain that this intention does not proceed from a mortal lust.

Further it is asked concerning those oaths which are made as if jokingly, as when someone swears by his boots or his shoes, whether such persons sin mortally, or not?

Now it seems that they do: because § 1. Matt. 5:34 et seq., it is prohibited to swear by a creature: therefore such persons act against the prohibition: therefore they sin mortally.

§ 2. Moreover, in the Text Augustine says that one swearing by a creature swears by God who shines forth in the creature: but one swearing a falsehood contemns that by which he swears: therefore one swearing a falsehood by his boots, contemns God who shines forth in his boots: but to contemn God is a mortal sin: therefore such a person sins mortally.

Further it is asked, whether one swearing a falsehood by God, venerates God?

It seems that he does not: because he sins against God insofar as he invokes Him as a witness of falsity: but one sinning against God does not honor God: therefore one swearing a falsehood by God does not honor God.

BUT AGAINST THIS: Augustine says that a man honors that by which he swears: therefore by swearing he honors: therefore one swearing a falsehood by God, honors God.

Solution: It must be said that perjury is manifold, namely an indiscreet swearing: and this is when he uselessly swears a truth, or when he swears without deliberation: and then I do not believe it to be a mortal sin. Perjury is also called a perverse swearing, when a man swears with deliberation that which ought not to be asserted by an oath, nor spoken simply, but rather the opposite: and then perjury seems to be a mortal sin.

TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said that the name of God is not taken in vain, except when with the deliberation of deceiving it is taken to assert a falsehood. But other takings, although they can be vain, nevertheless it is not a vanity destroying truth as a habit, just as was shown in the preceding matters concerning a lie: and therefore such an oath is beside the precept, and not against it.

To the other it must be said that such an invocation which is made jokingly, because it does not intend to deceive, but to joke, does not deliberate about the invoked truth, but rather invokes out of a certain custom: and therefore it does not contemn, but omits, because it does not discern what is to be sworn, and what not.

To the other it must be said that a lie is predicated primarily and secondarily of the jocose and the pernicious: and therefore an oath added without deliberation to a jocose lie does not draw it outside the genus of venial sin, but makes it graver than it was: but of an officious lie it is otherwise, because that is not done without deliberation, and therefore to swear that is not of small fault, but of great.

To the other it must be said that what is vain is there called false: because it does not agree with the invoked truth: and therefore it is invoked in vain. But when it is invoked idly or jokingly, then it is done beside an oath, and not against it.

To what is further asked, it must be said that by boots or by something else one can swear in two ways, namely so that what he introduces is not a mark of confirmation, but of joking: and then I do not repute it to be an oath, but a bad mode of speaking. But if he intends to introduce this for a sign of holiness, because religious make use of it, then he perjures himself gravely: but such oaths are not made in this way.

To the other it must be said that nothing prohibits that in the same work God be honored according to something, and dishonored according to something: and thus it is in an oath where the invocation is a mark of divine honor, because that is invoked which is worshipped. But according as it has the deformity of an act, thus it is against God.

Articulus 6 — Whether An Oath Is So Much The Holier As That By Which One Swears Is Holier, And Also So Much The More It Obligates

Whether an oath is by so much the holier, by as much as that by which it is sworn is holier, and also by so much more does it oblige?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, D, "It is also asked, whether it is lawful to swear by a creature," etc.

Now incidentally it is asked here, whether an oath is by so much the holier, by as much as that by which it is sworn is holier, and by so much more obligatory? Because what is principally asked here in the Text is sufficiently determined.

But that it obliges by so much more, by as much as that by which it is sworn is holier, is thus proved first: because § 1. Augustine plainly says this in the Text: therefore it is so.

§ 2. Moreover, one contemning God in Himself sins more than one contemning God in a creature: just as those contemning a king in his proper person sin more than those contemning him in his bailiff. But one perjuring himself by God contemns God in Himself: and one perjuring himself by Him in a creature, contemns Him in a creature: therefore one perjuring himself by God sins more gravely than by a creature: therefore it is stronger to swear by God than by a creature.

321. Rom. 1:9.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 1. God in Himself is nothing but one single uncreated good: but God in a creature is a created good and an uncreated good: now it is more to contemn two things than one: therefore one perjuring himself by a creature sins more than one perjuring himself by God, as it seems.

§ 2. Moreover, men would more abhor an oath which is made by the eyes or by the heart of God, than that which is made by God: therefore it is greater: but it is certain that this is by a creature: therefore some oath made by a creature, is greater than one made by the Creator.

§ 3. Moreover, one swearing by an idol, swears by a creature: and it is certain that idolatry is worse than all sins: therefore perjury which is made in an idol, is worse than perjury by God: therefore it seems that the oath is greater.

§ 4. Moreover, it seems that it is equal: for there is no cause that a creature be invoked as a witness to a saying, unless divine truth were shining forth in the creature: for whatever else is in the creature is vanity, and confirming nothing, because it itself is mendacious, just as every man is: therefore it is necessary that in every oath divine truth be invoked, because otherwise it would confirm nothing: but wherever divine truth is, there it is always equal: therefore it is equally contemned: therefore it is an equal sin to swear a falsehood by God, and by a creature.

Further it is asked, whether the oaths of idolaters are to be received?

It seems that they are: because § 1. Laban exhibited an oath, and Jacob received him, although he knew that he would swear by his idols:[325] therefore it seems that others can similarly receive them.

§ 2. Moreover, Christians in the faith of truces receive the oaths of pagans, although they know that they swear by Muhammad, or by idols: therefore it seems not to be a sin.

BUT AGAINST THIS: Rom. 1:32: "Those who do such things are worthy of death: and not only they that do them, but they also that consent to them that do them."[326] But one exacting that something be done, consents to it: therefore one exacting an oath by an idol, consents that it be sworn by an idol: therefore he sins equally as the one swearing.

Solution: It must be said that in truth Augustine's rule is true: because by so much is perjury graver, by as much as that by which it is sworn is holier: and by so much is the oath more obligatory, unless some expression of an excelling holiness in the creature is made, as when it is said, "by God, and by the holy Gospels," or "by the relics of these Saints": so that there is a divine invocation with the invocation of the creature: because then God is contemned twice, in Himself namely, and in the creature in which He shines forth by grace and glory.

TO THE FIRST therefore it must be said that when God is invoked in a creature, the intention is not directed to God except habitually, but actually upon the creature: and therefore according to act He is not contemned except in the creature, unless one expresses the opposite in voice, saying thus: "I swear by God shining forth in this creature": because then God is actually contemned in the perjury.

TO THE OTHER it must be said that men more abhor it on account of the special grace which they express to have been done in us by those creatures: whence in such oaths God is always actually named, and contemned in word: for one does not swear by the eyes, but by the eyes of God: nor by the Gospels, unless of God. And if it is not said, nevertheless it is understood: because it is not the Gospel, unless of Christ. It must be said therefore that those oblige more, for this reason that God is not only contemned, but His grace which He conferred upon us by the fact that He was made man, and posited the law of living in the Gospel.

To the other it must be said that swearing by an idol is a greater sin, not on account of the oath, but on account of the idolatry and infidelity. Whence in the argument there is the sophistic fallacy of accident.

To the other it must be said that the First Truth is always equal to Itself, but nevertheless It is not equally adverted to in Itself, and in a creature: and therefore It is not equally contemned.

To that, however, which is further inquired concerning consenting oaths which are made through idols, it must be said that they do not consent except in the oath: but they allow the swearing by idols which indeed he would make: and therefore they endure for utility, just as one receiving a loan consents to the reception, but being coerced allows the reception beyond the principal: and therefore they are not worthy of punishment.

Articulus 7 — Whether Every Oath Is To Be Fulfilled, And Especially One That Does Not Tend Toward A Worse Outcome; And Whether It Is Unlawful

Whether every oath is to be fulfilled, and especially this which does not tend toward a worse outcome? And, whether it is illicit?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, H, Now it remains to see, Whether every oath is to be fulfilled, etc.

For it seems that every oath is to be fulfilled, which observed, does not tend toward a worse outcome.
Prosatio: Because the Lord says: You shall not swear falsely, but you shall render your oaths to the Lord. Therefore, they are to be rendered: therefore, they are to be fulfilled.

Likewise, the Master proves this in the Letter.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Let us suppose that someone swears that he will not be a prelate: it is evident that this is licit, because it is good to despise honors: therefore, he is bound to observe and fulfill it. Let it be supposed, therefore, that it is commanded to him: either he will obey, or not. If so:

323. Exod. 20:7.

therefore, he sins mortally by not obeying, and he will sin mortally by not rendering the oaths: therefore, he is perplexed, as it seems.

If perhaps you say that he is absolved from the oath by obedience. On the contrary: He never had the power of exempting himself outside the ordination of the Church and the power of the superior: therefore, to the prejudice of the Church's ordination and power, he could never swear anything: therefore, he is bound to obey and to go against his oath.

1. Likewise, Deuteronomy 25:7 and following, it is said concerning him who does not wish to raise up seed for his deceased brother by taking the wife left by his brother, that the woman will remove his shoe, and his name will be called in Israel, the house of the unshod. And the Gloss says: He who refuses to undertake the care of those to be nourished, will bear the reproach of the unshod in the Church: he does not wish to take the wife of his brother, that is, of Christ. Therefore, he is bound to undertake it: but no one can swear anything against the precept of God: therefore, neither could this one swear that he would in no way be a prelate.
2. Likewise, someone sins by swearing that he will not enter religion: therefore, he is not bound to observe it: but prelacy is not of lesser perfection than religion: therefore, he cannot by his oath make it so that he is not bound to be a prelate if it is duly enjoined upon him.
3. Likewise, in such a case when the Church is in need, he is even bound to expend his own body for the Church: therefore, much more is he bound to expend the care of the pastoral office.

Further, it is asked, Whether any illicit oath obliges?

It seems that it does not: because observed, it tends toward a worse outcome: but in such a case, faith is to be rescinded: therefore, such an oath does not oblige.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
Augustine says that a prostitute who swears to keep faith with a sinner, is evil by adhering to him, but worse by not observing the oath: therefore, since greater evils are to be avoided, it seems that she is bound to adhere to him in fornication.

Solution: It must be said that every oath is to be observed, which observed does not tend toward a worse outcome, as it is said in the Letter, and as long as observed, it does not tend toward a worse outcome: because (as Bernard says) what is instituted for charity ought not to fight against charity. Hence, I say that one who swears that he will in no way be a prelate in whatever case may occur, swears foolishly and indiscreetly: because he cannot swear this, as the objections necessarily prove: for although he is conscious of his own fragility, and his heart dictates to him that it is not useful for him to be a prelate, nevertheless, the cause having been set forth why this seems to him, he ought humbly to acquiesce to the ordination of the Church and the superior: and if he indiscreetly swore the opposite, let him have penance for the indiscreet oath, because now by disobedience observed, it begins to tend toward a worse outcome.

324. Matt. 5:34; Jas. 5:12.

To that which is objected against, that it is good to despise honors: it must be said that it is true: but the burden is not always to be despised, because even existing in prelacy, one can not desire honors.

To that which is objected lastly, it must be said that an illicit oath does not bind. And to the saying of Augustine, it must be said that he does not intend to say that the prostitute should not depart from the sinner: but since she sins with two sins, he intends that perjury is the greater sin. Others say otherwise, namely that the prostitute has faith in a certain respect with the sinner, namely inasmuch as she does not admit another: and when she violates this, she sins against the oath: and in this respect only they say the saying of Augustine is verified, and not with respect to adherence.

Articulus 8 — Whether Words Ought To Profit One Swearing Deceitfully

Whether words ought to benefit one swearing deceitfully?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, K, This also must be known, that by whatever art of words, etc.

For it seems that when someone deceitfully demands an oath through multiple words, then those words ought to be understood according to how the one to whom it is sworn receives them: however, he deceitfully receives them in a non-straightforward sense: therefore he is bound to fulfill the oath according to that sense, which is false.

Further, it is inquired, When someone without fraud by chance swears through multiple words, in what sense ought the words to be received?

Solution: It must be said that what is said here is understood concerning one swearing deceitfully: and this is noted by what he says, using whatever art of words: for art is the same as deceit: but when he demands deceitfully, deceit ought not to benefit the demander.

To the other, it must be said that in such a case occurring, the oath ought to be received in the sense in which the one swearing believes that the one to whom it is sworn understood: and if he cannot know, it ought to be left to the judgment of good men, who judge according to which sense those words are more frequently accustomed to be received: and in that he is bound.

Articulus 9 — Whether Perjury Under Compulsion Is A Sin

Whether coerced perjury is a sin?

Then it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, L, It is also asked, If he sins, etc.

And two things are asked. First, Whether coerced perjury is a sin?

Second, Whether an oath obliges?

320. Heb. 6:13.

To the First, it is proceeded thus:
1. Augustine says: In no way is the reproach of the will drawn to the coerced, which the condition of necessity has extorted: however, an oath is extorted by the condition of necessity: therefore, it is not drawn to the reproach of the will: therefore, it is not a sin.

1. Likewise, Matthew 12:1 and following, where the Lord excuses those plucking ears of grain, the Gloss says: Necessity has no law. Therefore, an oath coerced by necessity does not follow the law of any sin of perjury.
2. Likewise, Necessity simply makes illicit things licit: as is evident, Luke 6:3, and 1 Samuel 21:6, concerning David with his men, who are excused who ate the bread of the proposition in necessity, which it was not lawful to eat except for the priests alone: therefore, perjury is also excused by necessity, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Lying is always a sin, and it cannot be done without evil, as Augustine wills: however, perjury is a lie, confirmed by the invocation of divine truth: therefore, much more is perjury always evil, and it can never be done well or without evil.

1. Likewise, the canon says: If anyone perjures for the preservation of the life of the body, because he loved the body more than the soul, let him abstain for three forties.

Solution: It must be said that perjury is always a sin, as the ultimate reasons prove: nor is it excused by coercion from the whole, although it is excused from so much: and this is because the will cannot be coerced: and every perjury proceeds indeed from the will, but not coerced.

To the First objection, it must be said that Augustine speaks of those in which coercion is absolute, as in the members of the body: as if someone is violated entirely against the will.

To the other, it must be said that there is a necessity of nature, and such is to be relieved by an act granted to nature, as hunger by eating. And in necessity, all things become common. Another is the necessity of threat: and on account of this, illicit things ought not to be admitted. And from such proceeds the coerced oath.

Articulus 10 — Whether An Oath Taken Under Compulsion Obligates To Fulfillment

Whether a coerced oath obliges to fulfillment?

Secondly, it is asked, Whether a coerced oath obliges to fulfillment?

325. Gen. 31:53.

It seems that it does: because 1. Let us suppose that someone swears to do something licit, such as to give a hundred marks: but licit oaths are to be kept: therefore, that ought to be fulfilled.

1. Likewise, someone consulted Pope Alexander about a certain coerced oath, whether it ought to be fulfilled? And the Pope responded: You will not have me as an author of perjury: therefore, it seems that the oath obliged.
2. Likewise, someone coerced swore to a certain concubine of his that he would take her as a wife, and would not ask her parents: and he asked blessed Augustine whether he was bound to fulfill the oath? Blessed Augustine responded with the counsel of blessed Ambrose, that he should take her. Therefore, it seems that coerced oaths oblige.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Coerced vows do not oblige, because authority says that coerced sacrifices do not please God: since oaths are certain vows confirmed by the attestation of an oath, it seems that they do not oblige.

1. Likewise, the coerced is involuntary, as the Philosopher says: but the involuntary does not oblige: therefore, neither does a coerced oath.
2. Likewise, Tullius in the Rhetorics introduces a law saying: What is done by force or deceit, such is not ratified, says the Praetor: but an oath is done by force and deceit together: therefore, it ought not to be ratified: therefore, it does not oblige to fulfillment.
3. Likewise, the fear of death with signs of death falls upon a steadfast man: but fear which falls upon a steadfast man excuses entirely, as the Jurists say: therefore, he who swears under such fear is released from the oath.
4. Likewise, fraud ought not to support anyone: but he who coerces to swear does this by fraud, deceit, and violence: therefore, it ought not to support him: therefore, the one swearing ought not to be obliged to fulfillment.

If you say that one swearing to give a hundred is obliged, and in this nothing is lost to him, because he has an action against that one. On the contrary: Let us suppose that he swears not to act against him: therefore, he is also bound to fulfill this for the same reason he is bound to fulfill the first.

If perhaps you say that in such a case he ought to denounce to the Church: and it is bound to act against that one. I also suppose that he swears the Church will not denounce: therefore, for the same reason, he ought to fulfill that: and thus in all ways he is unjustly harmed: and that one gains profit from deceit and fraud.

1. Furthermore, someone swears another thing, namely to consent to the marriage of someone: if therefore he is obliged, he cannot be separated from her.

326. Rom. 1:32.

But on the contrary: Coercion excludes conjugal consent: therefore, it also excludes an oath of consent.

The opinions of the Masters are diverse. For there are those who distinguish between an assertory oath and a promissory oath: and they say that an assertory oath coerced, such that he asserts something he knows to be true, obliges to say that: because he can assert what he knows to be true without just harm to anyone. But a promissory oath is when he promises to pay a hundred to some tyrant, lest he be killed: and then it does not oblige, as they say. Others say that in truth before God and in the forum of penance he is obliged by both oaths, but not in the forum of judgment: because the tyrant does not dare to present himself to the judge, since he has injured justice: and they concede the first part of the objections: and this opinion is held by Theologians.

To what is objected against, they say that an oath is not a vow, but rather an external promise confirmed by the invocation of divine truth, and therefore obliges out of reverence for divine truth: but a vow consists principally in the interior freedom of the will.

To another it must be said that the oath is not entirely involuntary, but involuntary simply, voluntary however in a certain respect, namely lest he suffer worse: as the Philosopher also says there about the simply involuntary and the involuntary in a certain respect. But that which is involuntary in a certain respect does not excuse entirely, but that which is simply involuntary, like being dragged by the hand, because he who drags by the hand dominates the hand, that involuntary is, whose effective cause and principle is in another, contributing nothing, that is, cooperating with the one suffering force, that is, he who suffers force.

To another it must be said that the Praetor speaks of his judgment regarding the civil forum: because the tyrant cannot act on what is promised to him, indeed he would be punished by the Praetor.

To another it must be said that no cause bearing fear of sin falls upon a steadfast man: because otherwise it would be false what is said: Do not be afraid of those who kill the body, and after this have nothing more they can do.

To another it must be said that he has an action after the promise: and if he abjures this, he has the right to denounce to the prince or the Church: and he sins mortally if he does not compel him to restitution: nor can he abjure, because this tends to a worse outcome, that is, the corruption of the state and law: and therefore it stands there.

To another it must be said that a coerced oath obliges: but not marriage, because marriage not only seeks consent, but also free will. This is evident from this, because if he goes against the oath by contracting with another, the subsequent marriage stands, and penance is enjoined for perjury.

DISTINCTIO XL

Divisio Textus

The sixth commandment is, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, etc. Here it begins to treat finally of the two commandments pertaining to the heart.

And this distinction has two parts: in the first of which it briefly determines concerning the two aforementioned commandments. In the second, it touches upon the difference between the old law and the new with respect to the decalogue which is in both, there, B, If indeed it is asked, what the Apostle says, etc.

In the first part, it does three things. First, it explains the two commandments. Second, it objects to the contrary of the commandments and resolves, there, A, § 2: But it seems the commandment concerning not coveting, etc. In the third, it raises the question, how it is said that the old law does not restrain the mind, when these two commandments restrain the mind? and resolves, there, A, § 3: But since here concupiscence is prohibited, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether These Two Commandments Are Separate, Namely, 'You Shall Not Covet The Wife,' Etc., Or Not

Whether these two commandments are separate, namely, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, etc.,
or not?

Whether these two commandments are separate,
namely, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, etc.,
or not?

A doubt arises here before the Letter, Whether these two commandments are separate from the others, or not?

Secondly, Whether they differ among themselves, and what difference they have?

To the first, it is objected thus:
1. Thought is ordered to work, or word: therefore, by itself, it does not have order: therefore, the prohibition of thoughts by itself should not fall under a precept.

1. Likewise, in the second book of the Sentences it was held, that will and Work are one sin, because otherwise anyone sinning in work would sin with two sins: however, of one sin there is one prohibition: therefore, will and act pertain to one sin: therefore, divided commandments should not be about will.

2. Likewise, nothing is blameworthy unless in so far as it proceeds from deliberative will, nor even praiseworthy: however, it is evident that work is not prohibited in the decalogue, unless because it is blameworthy in morals:
therefore, it is prohibited in so far as it proceeds from deliberative will: therefore, in work the will is understood to be prohibited: therefore, it is superfluous to add afterward a new prohibition.

Solution: It must be said that it is one thing in the concupiscence of the flesh, and another in the concupiscence of things, and another in other sins, as was said above in the question about the number of precepts: because these two concupiscences have their delights even before the work not joined to the work, as Augustine says. And therefore, because in work they have harm to the neighbor, on account of that baseness in which thought rests, the work is prohibited by a special precept:
and on account of the baseness of concupiscence before the work, there is another commandment which prohibits the thought of the heart. But it is not so in others: and the cause of this is said above.

To the other, it must be said that there is a double will, namely, of work, and of delight before work, or without work. And the first is prohibited in the precept in which the work is prohibited. But the second cause needs its own precept, in which it is prohibited.

To the other, it must be said that although work has the principal cause of blame or praise from the will, it does not, however, receive from the will the whole cause of harm: and as to harm, there can be one precept, and as to the baseness of rest in the affection of lust, there can be another.

Articulus 2 — Whether These Two Foregoing Commandments Are Distinct From Each Other

Are these aforementioned two commandments distinct from each other?

Are these aforementioned two commandments distinct from each other?

Secondly, it is asked whether these commandments are distinct.

However, it seems that they are not: because, 1, whether it is a wife or a concubine, when it is said: "Thou shalt not commit adultery," illicit intercourse with any woman is prohibited. Similarly, when it is said: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife," the concupiscence of a maidservant, which is desired for the same, is also understood to be prohibited. Therefore, when in the second it is said: "Thou shalt not covet the maidservant," the second does not seem to differ from the first.

1. Likewise, those things which are desired beyond the baseness of intercourse are manifold, and they are reduced to three, namely, the concupiscence of the flesh, the concupiscence of the eyes, and the pride of life: therefore, it seems that according to these three there should be three commandments here about not coveting.
2. Likewise, since there are certain knowable things illicit just as desirable things, such as the knowable things of incantations and certain divinations, it seems that there should be a commandment about not coveting certain knowable things, just as there are commandments about not coveting certain things.

Solution: It must be said to the first, that a maidservant is said to be coveted in two ways, namely, for intercourse, and thus it is prohibited in the commandment about not coveting a wife: and as a possession, and thus it is contained in the commandment about not coveting a thing which is a possession, like a servant, an ox, and an ass, etc.

To the other, it must be said that desirable things are desired because of need. However, need is only twofold, namely, for the conservation and sufficiency of the individual, and for the conservation and sufficiency of the species. And the first causes avarice in a broad sense, namely, in things and honors: but the second causes luxury: and therefore avarice of the eyes and pride of life are reduced to possessions, and thus they are prohibited in one commandment: but not the concupiscence of the flesh, because it does not arise from the same need.

Moreover, it must be said that no knowable thing, insofar as it is knowable, is evil: and this is evident from the fact that God has all knowledge, and the holy angels have knowledge of many evils: and therefore there should be no moral commandment about this, because moral commandments prohibiting are only about things that are evil in themselves. However, laws prohibit certain sciences because of the work joined and the proneness of affection.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Law Of The Decalogue Justified, Inasmuch As It Prohibited Hand And Mind

Whether the law of the Decalogue justified, since it prohibited the hand and the mind?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, § 3: But since here the concupiscence of another's wife is prohibited, etc.

For the sake of this it is asked, Whether the law of the Decalogue justified, since it prohibited the hand and the mind?

It seems, however, that it did:

1. For justice is the abstinence from evil in heart, mouth, and hand: but all these touch upon and order the precepts: therefore it seems that it justified.
2. Likewise, Matthew 19:17: If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. And he specifies them, namely, You shall not kill, you shall not commit adultery, etc.: since therefore no one enters into eternal life except through justice, it seems that the commandments justified.

1. Likewise, Bede: Justice of the law was not conferred unless kept in time, it conferred not only temporal goods, but also eternal life: therefore the law of the Decalogue justified.
2. Likewise, to the Romans 3:20: From the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before him. Augustine's Gloss says there: He speaks of the law according to ceremonies, not according to morals which justified.
3. If it be said that they did not justify unless done from charity: and therefore the work performed did not justify, but the work performing: then it seems there was no difference between morals and ceremonies, because in ceremonies also the work performing from charity availed for salvation, and not the work performed.

But on the contrary:

1. To the Romans 3:20: From the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before him. And he speaks of the work of the Decalogue: therefore it did not justify.
2. Likewise, to the Romans 8:15: You have not received the spirit of bondage again in fear, etc., the Gloss says: The precepts in the old law were kept with servile fear: but servile fear is with mortal sin, and one cannot be just and in mortal sin at the same time: therefore servile fear does not justify: therefore neither does the commandment fulfilled by servile fear.
3. Likewise, Exodus 20:17, on that: You shall not covet your neighbor's house, the Gloss says: The law prohibits the hand, not the mind: since therefore justice is principally in the heart, not in the hand, the law of the Decalogue did not justify, as it seems.
4. Likewise, on that of Psalm 19:8: The law of the Lord is immaculate, etc., the Gloss says: The old law did not make souls immaculate: but the Decalogue was in the old law: therefore it did not make souls immaculate: therefore neither just.

5. Likewise, 2 Corinthians 3:6: The letter kills, but the spirit gives life. The Master says in the letter, that the killing letter is the Decalogue: but it is evident that what gives life does not kill: therefore the Decalogue does not justify.

Solution: It must be said that justifying is said in four ways, namely effectively, and thus only God justifies. Formally, and this in two ways, namely as a proper form making an act just, like whiteness makes white, and thus only justice justifies - and as removing a contrary disposition, and thus sacramental grace justifies, which is principally ordered against sin, as is proven in the beginning of the fourth Sentences. In the third way it is said to justify, making worthy of eternal life and by the merit of the work, and thus only charity justifies. In the fourth way it is said to justify, inducing the habit of justice, and thus the work justifies, and consequently the precept which binds to the observance of the work: and in this way the Decalogue always justifies: but yet in two ways, namely by withdrawing from evil, and thus it justified in prohibitions: or in order to good, and thus it justified in affirmatives.

But yet it must be noted that when it is asked whether the Decalogue justified, it is asked concerning justification in the third way: because the habit of political justice, and even the work, can be with mortal sin: and therefore it is not asked concerning justification in the second way, but in the third way.

Therefore it must be said that according to that understanding of the question it did not justify: because from the legislation of the Old Testament it did not confer grace, since those sacraments were figures of grace, and not the truth: but in the New inasmuch as it justifies, that is, that fulfilling the Decalogue, one has the habit of the new sacraments: because from the legislation of the New Testament grace is conferred, by which the work of the Decalogue is fulfilled and informed: and therefore it justifies.

Yet it must be noted the word of Augustine, namely that the just in the Old Testament belonged to the New: because they received justice in the faith of the New: and the wicked in the New, serving with servile fear, belong to the Old as to not having grace.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that the work of the heart, mouth, and hand does not justify except by inducing servile customary justice: and God does not reward this, but that which proceeds from charity.

To the other it must be said that the Lord says to remove the obstacles to life, not that this alone suffices. Or it may be better said: because there the Lord understands the precept of charity to be included, to which all the commandments are referred, as was evident from what was held above.

To the other it must be said that that justice kept did not confer life except in those pertaining to the New Testament, and from the grace of the New Testament: and thus Bede understands.

To the other it must be said that Augustine understands the Decalogue to pertain to the state of perfect justice, because it is moral: but not the ceremonial which pertained to figurative justice: and therefore the Decalogue was in every law, both natural, and of Moses, and of grace: because its material work is always in merit, which is not the work of ceremonies.

To the last it must be said that although in this there is no difference between ceremonies and morals, because neither availed for merit without charity, yet there is a difference, because the Decalogue is of per se goods always moving in merit, but not ceremonies: just as also other virtues besides charity do not avail for merit, and yet they are per se good, and remain in merit, and specify it in this act and in that which each virtue elicits.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Letter Which The Apostle Says Kills Is The Decalogue

Whether the letter which the Apostle says kills, is the Decalogue?

Then it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, If indeed it is asked, Which letter does the Apostle say kills? etc.

For it seems that the spirit does not give life: because
1. The spirit is spiritual understanding: and many have this, who are not given life: therefore the spirit does not give life.

1. Likewise, Morals do not have another understanding than that which the letter sounds: therefore it is nothing to say, The letter kills, but the spirit gives life: because there is no other spirit there than the letter.
2. Likewise, Nothing removing dispositions and causes of death kills: but the Decalogue removes dispositions and causes of death: therefore it does not kill. The first is evident by itself. The second is proved from this, that the Decalogue removes sins, which are the cause of death.

Solution: It must be said that the killing letter is the Decalogue, the letter of the law heard without the grace of fulfillment: and it is a killing letter, not by itself, but by occasion: just as when water is shown to one feverish, thirst is more excited in him than before: and so also to a man burning in concupiscence, the Decalogue by the very fact that it prohibits, shows sin: and since it does not give grace, it is an occasion of provoking concupiscence: and this is one mode of killing.

However, another mode is: because every appetite by its nature is so much more fervent in that which it desires, as that is believed higher: but the precept by this that it prohibits a thing desirable by concupiscence, exalts it, and thus concupiscence is more provoked in that. Whence,

We strive for the forbidden always, and we desire the denied.

The third mode is touched upon by the Apostle in the Letter, namely because that which without the precept is only evil against the law of nature, the precept applied makes it also against the written law, and thus adds a certain deformity, which is the transgression of the written law, and thus again aggravates sin, and increases death.

Therefore, in these three ways the Decalogue is a killing letter.

Therefore, it must be said to the first, that the spirit is the grace of the spirit, in which the Holy Spirit is given: and this is given in the new legislation, not the old.

To the other it must be said, that morals do not have the spirit of another understanding, but the very one moving to fulfillment, which is love, not fear, as has been said.

To the other it must be said, that the Decalogue by itself orders to life: and this the Apostle intends, to the Romans vii, 12, when he says: Therefore indeed the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good, but by occasion in three ways it orders to evil. And this the Apostle notes when he subjoins, there, v.8: Taking occasion, sin through the commandment, namely good, worked in me all concupiscence, and therefore death. However, it is less than the cause by itself, and the cause by accident: because it has no influence over that of which it is the occasion, but is induced from its comparison to another prohibiting it from causality: just as from the comparison of the sun to an opaque body a shadow is caused, which by no means...

in the way the sun causes [it]. In this way, when the Decalogue is compared to a mind depraved by concupiscence, the appetite for the illicit is caused: and the aggravation of sin is not caused by the Decalogue in any way, but is occasioned by it.

§ 2. Here, however, whoever wishes can introduce a long question concerning laws and natural right, which we have disputed in the tract On Justice.

§ 3. Also, note that you will find that part of the reading which begins there, at B, around the middle: But the letter of the Gospel differs, etc., treated in the beginning of the fourth book of the Sentences, in this same work.

§ 4. And therefore I do not see that many things are to be inquired into here. But for what has been found, let thanks be offered not to us, but to God, to whom is honor and power and wisdom forever and ever. Amen.

LIBER IV

PROLOGUS

COMMENTARIES OF LORD ALBERT THE GREAT, OF THE ORDER OF PREACHERS, ON THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE SENTENCES. PROLOGUE.

Wisdom has built herself a house, she has hewn out seven pillars. In this word, in inverted order, are narrated the subject matter of this book, and its division. For we are the house of wisdom, whom she builds for perpetual indwelling through the resurrection of bodies, of which house the Psalmist says, Ps 25:8: Lord, I have loved the beauty of your house, and the place where your glory dwells . For the beauty of your house are the endowments of the body, which we shall have in the resurrection.

And therefore wisdom is also said to build these things wisely, and exemplarily, and effectively. Wisely, so that from the very conjunction of the clay of immortality with the spiritual part which is according to the image, the admirable beauty of wisdom may result. Exemplarily, because he himself will reform the body of our lowliness, configured to the body of his glory . Effectively, indeed: because, as the Gloss on 1 Cor 15:45 says, the resurrection of Christ is the efficient cause of our resurrection. And the Master treats of this part from distinction XLIII up to the end.

But then it is asked: Why are these parts taken up in an inverted order in this word? And to this it must be said that the reality [res] of this sacrament is twofold, namely the contained reality both signified and caused, which is the grace of the sacrament: and it is determined with each sacrament in the same part. And there is a certain reality not caused by any one sacrament, but rather in all of them according to some things which are figured and signified in it: and this is the glory of the rising: and this is intended through every sacrament. And because the intention is prior in the physician before the work, therefore Solomon in the aforesaid word placed first that which is intended. In the order of execution, however, that which is intended is acquired last: and therefore it is placed after all things by the Master.

In the second part of that statement, the first part of the book is taken up through what he says: She has hewn out seven pillars. For a pillar is that upon which the house rests, just as the Church uses the sacrament: and also restoring the ruin of the house, just as the Church is supported by sacramental grace. The seven pillars, therefore, are the seven sacramental graces, which are determined along with the sacraments themselves. They are hewn out, however, because they were diligently prepared in Christ himself. The Master treats of these in the first part of this book.

And that part is divided into two, in the first of which the Master treats of the sacrament of the New and Old Law. And this whole part is contained in the first distinction.

In the second, however, he treats of the sacrament of the New Law: and this begins in the second distinction, there, A, "Now let us approach the sacraments of the New Law, etc."

Now, the Master divides this first distinction into four, as is clear to anyone in the text, namely: What is a sacrament? Why was it instituted? In what does it consist and how is it effected? And what is the difference between a sacrament of the Old and New Law?

And it is also clear where these begin in the text.

A BRIEF EPILOGUE OF THE THINGS SAID ABOVE.

Having treated those things which pertain to the doctrine of things, which are to be enjoyed, and which are to be used, and those which enjoy and use, let us approach the doctrine of signs.

OF THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE SENTENCES OF PETER LOMBARD. ON SACRAMENTS AND SACRAMENTAL SIGNS.

DISTINCTIO I

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sacrament Is Necessary

Whether a sacrament is necessary?

Whether a sacrament is necessary?

Now, four questions arise before the text, namely: Whether there is a sacrament? And, concerning the difference of sacramental grace from the grace which is in the virtues and gifts. Thirdly, How many sacraments are there in number? Fourthly, concerning the order of them to one another.

To the first of these, one proceeds thus:

§ 1. Nothing is superfluous in nature: therefore much less in grace: but through the virtues and gifts a human being is sufficiently healed from sin, and helped toward the good: therefore sacraments are superfluous: therefore they do not exist, because the superfluous is not in grace. The first premise is established. The middle is proved from the fact that any sin whatsoever is expelled by the virtue opposed to it, and any virtue is ordered to the good of its own act.

§ 2. Also, it is not of the order of wisdom that the stronger should be helped by the weaker: but bodily elements in which every sacrament consists, are weaker and lower than the soul of man: therefore it seems that a sacrament ought not to exist.

§ 3. Also, either the artisan or his instrument is shown to be weaker, if he sometimes cured a certain disease with one instrument, and afterward needs two: but sometimes God cured a disease by faith alone, as we shall hold in the following distinction, but now he cures by faith and sacraments: therefore either he or faith is weaker, which, since it is false, it seems that a sacrament is not necessary.

§ 4. Also, the Philosopher says in book XVI of On Animals: If it does not touch, it does not act, and an alteration does not follow: but the corporeal [element] in which every sacrament is conferred, as we shall have in the text, does not touch the soul: therefore it does not act upon it, and an alteration of health does not follow in the soul: therefore a sacrament is useless.

But if perhaps you say, that this reasoning is valid only of those which are a cause of salvation, and not of those which are signs: because the spiritual is well signified by corporeal things: although that reasoning proves that he could not be cured in it. Against this: Master Hugh says in the eighth part of his book On the Sacraments, that those sacraments which are signs only, are not sacraments except insofar as they signify those which are the cause of grace: if therefore causing is not necessary, signifying will not be necessary: but causing is not necessary, as was proved: therefore signifying will not be necessary: and so a sacrament will be entirely unnecessary, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, a sacrament seems to be a rite of idolatry, and we as it were imitate the athletes of the Gentiles in them: because the Apostle says, Gal 4:9: How turn you again to the weak and needy elements, which you desire to serve again?

ON THE CONTRARY: In the medicine of bodies, the mode of governing the healthy and of curing the sick is not the same: therefore neither will the mode be the same in spiritual medicine. Now, it is established that the healthy is governed by the virtues and gifts: because if man had not sinned, he would have had the virtues and gifts: therefore he ought not to be cured by them, but by other things: and these are the sacraments: therefore the sacraments are necessary.

Solutio. It must be said that there are sacraments, and they are necessary for salvation, without which from the time of the disease there has been no salvation.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that through the virtues and gifts, in themselves, the disease is not substantially cured. For there are two things which are required in a medicine curing a disease: that it should expel the disease by contrariety, and this alone the virtues and gifts have; and that by soothing the pain, as it were by anointing and cherishing the nature of the soul, it should heal, and this the sacraments have essentially, in which the blood of Christ anoints and operates. And this solution is true.

Some say otherwise, that many medicines for the same thing are not superfluous: because health is acquired more quickly by many than by few. But although this is true, nevertheless the virtues and gifts are not substantially ordered against the disease of sin: because they would also be had if there were no sin: and therefore the fact that they sometimes heal it, this is per accidens, namely because they find it in the subject.

Or it may be said to these things more truly: and then the whole is solved, that there is a release from the disease on our part: and this takes place through the grace which is in the virtues and gifts, through which we merit the health of the mind, lost through sin.

And the other release is through the power of the Passion of Christ, without which no merit of ours avails anything, as was held in the third book of the Sentences: and this release from the disease takes place in the sacraments, in which Christ's Passion operates.

To the next doubt it must be said that it is of the order of wisdom that the proud should rise again through humility. And unless the higher nature had unjustly opposed itself to the one higher than it, it would not be relieved by the lower: but because it opposed itself and subjected itself, it was therefore most ordered that it should rise again through that which is lower than it.

To the next it must be said that faith never worked salvation without a sacrament of the New Law: but it only differed in that in ancient times the sacrament healed in the faith of those expecting, and now in the work of those exercising.

Others say otherwise, namely that if faith alone was sometimes efficacious for justification, this was in itself: but that it now does not do it alone, this is per accidens, namely by the grace of the state: and it is not weaker because of this: just as a precept is sufficient for someone for salvation without a vow of the counsels: but if a vow should supervene, it is not sufficient: and yet because of this, obedience in the precepts is not weaker than it was at first: but this is because of another state of the believer.

To the next it must be said that the sacrament touches: and therefore an alteration in the soul follows: for it touches insofar as it is a sign and a cause. For in a sacrament there is not only the visible element: but a conjoined sanctification, the power of which through faith reaches into the soul: and therefore alters and heals it. And this will be more clear below in the text, when it is asked: What is a sacrament?

To the next it must be said that in the sacraments there is no rite of the athletes of idolatry: because they turned themselves to the elements, believing a divine power to be in them from their own nature. And this in diverse ways: for some thought there were natural powers in the elements, and thought the elements were gods: and they established a proper god for each act of nature, as Varro said: and they called the stars gods. Others said the soul of the world was diffused in the whole orb, and especially the soul which is the power of intelligence which they posited in the tenth order, which is under the sphere of the moon. And therefore the Apostle says: How turn you again to the weak [elements], as regards the first, and needy elements, as regards the second: because they neither have power of themselves, so as to be called rich: nor are there souls in them, so as to be thus called needy. But our elements are powerful and rich: powerful, because the Passion of Christ operates in them; rich indeed, because they contain the grace which they figure: and therefore it is salutary to be converted to them.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Are Seven Sacraments, Or More; And, Whether The Sacraments Have A Substantial Order To Pardon

Whether there are seven sacraments, or more? and, Whether the sacraments have a substantial order to venial [sin]?

Whether there are seven sacraments, or more? and, Whether the sacraments have a substantial order to venial [sin]?

Secondly it is asked concerning the number of the sacraments.

For it seems that only one is necessary: because

§ 1. Baptism deletes the whole disease, for it deletes whatever it finds: but this is the whole disease: therefore a fuller medicine is not necessary, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, in the Eucharist the whole fullness of grace is contained, and the very author of grace: therefore it seems that the Eucharist alone should suffice.

§ 3. Also, it seems that there ought to be only two: because there are only two species of disease, namely natural sin, concerning which the Psalmist says, Ps 50:7: For behold I was conceived in iniquities, etc. [327] And personal sin concerning which the same says: To you alone have I sinned, and done evil before you [328]. Therefore it seems that there ought not to be except two species of medicine: therefore there ought not to be sacraments, except baptism, and penance.

§ 4. Also, Jerome says that the second plank after shipwreck is penance: but that shipwreck is the danger of the broken ship of baptismal grace: therefore before this there was no saving ship except baptism from the danger of the first innocence lost in Adam: therefore only two sacraments are necessary.

§ 5. It seems, moreover, that there are three. For a sacrament is instituted on account of the disease: but the disease has no remedy except in two ways, namely because a foulness which cannot be cured, is taken up by some honesty and excused: and because a healing medicine is posited against the disease. Now the first is sufficiently done through matrimony: the second through baptism and penance. Therefore only three sacraments seem to be necessary.

§ 6. Also, there are three powers in wounded man, namely the rational, concupiscible, and irascible: therefore a threefold medicine only is to be applied to the three: therefore there will not be except three sacraments, as it seems.

§ 7. It seems again, that there ought to be four: because every sacrament ought to be a sacrament of the Church: therefore it ought to be in the hand of the ministers: therefore for this a sacrament is necessary which constitutes a minister: and this is order. And moreover the disease is threefold, namely of a twofold fault, natural and personal, and of the penalty which is left from both.

§ 8. Also, there are three states under the ministers of the Church, namely entering, living, and exiting: but to consummate a minister order is required: but those entering receive baptism: those living, because this life is polluted, need penance: but those exiting extreme unction: therefore these four sacraments alone are necessary, as it seems.

§ 9. Further, it seems that there ought to be five: for the cure of the soul is according to the likeness of a bodily cure: but in the body the cure is multiplied according to the species of the disease, and according to the harms which the disease inflicted: as a wise physician cures a loss through restoratives of humidity, but weakness through comforting things, and the disease through expellers of the disease. Since therefore there are in the soul three species of disease, namely natural, actual mortal, and actual venial: and two damages inflicted, namely the loss and consumption of the natural good in the simplicity of the soul or its spirituality , and the weakness of standing or rising again: it seems that against these five only, five sacraments ought to be ordered.

§ 10. Further, it seems there ought to be six: for any genus of disease has its own penalty, and damage adjoined: since therefore the fault is threefold (as was said), there will be a threefold penalty conjoined to it. Since therefore a sacrament was invented so that the whole disease in fault and penalty might be excluded: it seems that there ought to be three against the fault, and three against the penalty.

Also, re-creation ought to correspond to creation according to number: but creation was in six days: therefore the whole salvation of re-creation ought to consist in six sacraments.

§ 11. But that there ought to be more sacraments than seven, seems from the fact that a sacrament is a cause and sign of grace: but holy water causes and signs grace: therefore it is a sacrament.

The same objection is concerning a pontifical blessing, in which venial sins are remitted: therefore it is a sacrament.

§ 12. Also, it is objected more strongly. In the old sacraments water in aspersion was the matter. Also, oil in many sacrifices. Also, flesh and blood were there in the sacrifices. Since therefore those sacraments are signs of our sacraments, it seems that we ought to have others, in which the material element is flesh and blood: and these we do not have: therefore we are diminished in sacraments.

Further for the understanding of the question it is asked, Whether any sacrament has a substantial order against venial [sin]?

It seems that it does: because § 1. It is a disease: therefore it receives a medicine: therefore the supremely wise physician prepared it: therefore some sacrament is substantially ordered against venial [sin].

§ 2. Also, James says: The prayer of faith shall save the sick man: and the Lord shall raise him up: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him but these are none other than venial sins which have adhered to him, as it seems: therefore it is to be ordered against venial sins. And this some concede.

327. Ps 50:7.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Venial sins are in the whole of life: therefore in the whole of life it ought to have a remedy, and not in death only: or the physician is insufficient.

§ 2. Also, by the same reasoning the Eucharist is said to avail against venial sins, just as extreme unction.

§ 3. Also, what cures the greater, cures also the lesser: therefore penance avails against venial and mortal [sin].

§ 4. Also, below, in the treatise on Penance, the Master makes a special treatise concerning the confession and satisfaction of venial sins: therefore it seems that this is ordered against venial [sin], just as extreme unction.

§ 5. Also, if any thing is cured equally by multiple divided causes, none of those will be substantially ordered against it: but a venial sin is cured dividedly by multiple sacraments: therefore by none as a substantial medicine ordered against itself.

Solutio. Without prejudice, this last seems to me to be conceded, that no sacrament is in itself ordered against venial [sin].

Now, the division of a sacrament is taken in multiple ways by the Masters, as will be clear below in the beginning of the second distinction. But it seems to me here, that if a true division ought to be handed down, it would be necessary for it to be taken according to the multiplication of those things which are substantial to a sacrament: but these are cause, and sign. Hence according to the division of the cause we will give one, and according to the division of the sign we will give the other.

Therefore that is supposed which will be treated below...

§ 1. [It must be] proved in the fourth article of the question, that every sacramental grace is ordered against the disease of sin. Also it is supposed, that every sacrament of the Church confers some grace against a disease, as is marriage. Then I say, that a disease is either according to fault, or according to penalty left indeed from fault, although also ordering toward fault, as is the proneness of concupiscence. But fault is twofold, namely original, and personal mortal. But the proneness to sin is twofold, namely according as it is proneness, because thus it induces a fight: or according to the effect which it induces from the frequency of inclination into evil: and this is only twofold, namely the loss of spiritual good in the soul, so that it needs restoration, and the inability of organic members, to the end that they be moved by the soul into good, and the inability of the soul to move: and this is a certain remainder of sin inducing languor in the moving soul, and in the body moved toward good through every same mode, as we see a burning of unnatural heat do in the body: for this consumes the moisture which is the root of life, and makes the members dull, and weakens the powers affixed to the members, and takes away flexibility from the members, and facility of moving from the powers. But the proneness which makes the fight, again has two considerations: according to that which is corrupted only: or according to that which is corrupted and infected in delights, according to concupiscence which is in the generative [power].

328. Ps 50:6.

§ 2. We say therefore, that remedies are multiplied according to these wounds. For the disease of sin is either natural: and thus against it substantially is Baptism through grace contained and caused. Or it is personal mortal, and then it has a twofold remedy, namely on the part of the keys of the Church, making through the merit of Christ a taxable and proportioned penalty, and therefore it is Order which is given to this, that there be the power of binding and loosing in the Church: or of commuting eternal penalty into temporal through the remission of the whole fault, and to this is Penance. But the disease of concupiscence according as it induces a fight from common corruption, against itself has as a remedy Confirmation: but according as it suffocates from corruption simultaneously and infection, against itself it has as an opposite remedy Marriage. But the effect or rather defect left from the continuity of fighting, that indeed which is the loss of spiritual good in the soul which was as it were the moisture and fomentation or root of life, against itself has as a remedy the Eucharist, which restores the lost through spiritual fattening food. But the remainders as it were immobilizing, the members, and the powers of the soul moving, against themselves have Extreme Unction: and therefore also that is given to the departing in remedy of soul and body: and if it does not take away the fever from the body, nevertheless it alleviates the members from that evil habit and disposition of contrariety, according as it is an impediment to the overclothing of glory in the resurrection: and similarly it does in the soul, because each is weakened by the other. This I think to be the proper division of the sacrament.

§ 3. Or thus: The moving evil is either in itself, or in another. If in another, then it does not have a remedy unless a repressive one: and to this is given Order: because it is the power to the vengeance of evildoers, but the praise of the good[329], that we may lead a quiet and tranquil life[330]. If in itself then as before, either according to fault, or according to penalty which orders into fault: and there will be had six others.

§ 4. Or thus: A sacrament is against a defect which is from sin: therefore either against a common defect of the Church, or against a defect of the person. If in the first mode this defect is from mortality which diminishes the members of the Church, and destroys: therefore either it will be bodily mortality, and against this is given Marriage as to its principal good of offspring: or spiritual death, and against this is given Order in the spiritual generation of the word, and through the exhibition and dispensation of the sacrament. But if it is against a defect of the person: either it is from an evil, or against a difficulty which is toward good. If in the first mode: either from a natural evil, and then it is Baptism: or from a personal evil, and then it is Penance. But if it is against a difficulty which is into good: either through the mode of one comforting in the fight, and thus it is Confirmation: or through the mode of one restoring the lost, and thus it is the Eucharist: or through the mode of one healing hidden inflicted things, and thus it is Extreme Unction.

§ 5. And in other modes it can be divided according to the sign: but now we will give the division according as the sacrament configures us to the head Christ. But all things are in Christ suffering and rising: because His passion operates in all the sacraments. Let us say therefore, that Christ by suffering for us fought bravely, He Himself priest and victim offered Himself, the spouse of the Church through death and blood, and rose anointed with the oil of grace. Penance therefore draws power from Christ suffering and configures us to Him, Order from Christ offering, and the Eucharist from Christ the victim, Marriage from Christ espousing the Church to Himself in the earnest of blood, as it is said, Exod. iv, 25: A spouse of blood you are to me: and therefore also because there having extended His arms into the embraces of highest love, when He laid down His soul for her: and thirdly, because just as from the side of the first sleeping Adam Eve was fabricated, so from the side of the dying and dead Christ the Church was fabricated, when the two principal sacraments flowed forth from His side, namely the blood of redemption, and the water of expiation. But through Unction we are configured to Christ rising: because it is given to the departing in the figure of the foretaste of future glory, when all mortality will be cut off from the elect. But below in the beginning of the second distinction we will return to these, and we will object to the opinions of the Masters concerning the number of the sacraments.

§ 6. To the first therefore it must be said, that although baptism deletes whatever it finds, nevertheless it is not ordered substantially against every genus of disease: and therefore by its virtue it deletes only original fault, and the guilt annexed to it. But because God does not cure in part, but in whole, therefore God curing in baptism, cures the whole that He finds. But the sacraments are invented for this that from a substantial order against sin they delete it, and the defects which are from Christ [i.e., healed by Christ].

§ 7. To another it must be said, that although in the Eucharist is contained the Author of all grace, nevertheless He is not contained there as causing all graces, but only as a spiritual food causing one: and therefore the others are necessary.

§ 8. To another it must be said, that the wound of sin is other than the sin itself: and the sacraments are not only against sins, but also against the wound, as is clear in the division posited above.

§ 9. To another it must be said, that Jerome is not speaking of planks of evading the danger of penalty or of wounds, but only of these which evade fault.

§ 10. To another it must be said, that that reason would proceed well if medicine were not posited unless against fault: but this is not true, as has already appeared.

§ 11. To another it must be said, that although there are only three powers ordered to operation, nevertheless more are corrupted than three: and granted that there were only three corrupted, it would not be left, that there ought to be only three sacraments, because although three are corrupted, nevertheless there are more modes of their corruption than three.

§ 12. To another it must be said, that penalty which is the third disease, demands more medicines, because it is varied in more modes.

§ 13. To another it must be said, that the sacraments are not taken according to the number of the states of the Church: because the middle state which is of the living remaining in this life, needs more remedies on account of the many modes of corruption.

329. 1 Pet. 2:14.

§ 14. To another it must be said, that no sacrament is ordered against venial [sin] substantially: but prayer, and many other things, as holy water, beating of the breast on account of the multiplicity of that sin: but there are more defects than those which are enumerated: and it is not altogether similar concerning the cure of the body: because the soul in a certain part is corrupted and infected, and in a certain part there is a burning fighting against the good of nature: and according to such is taken confirmation, and marriage, which are necessary besides the five enumerated.

§ 15. To another which seems to prove, that there are six, it must be said that according to that division the number of sacraments is not taken; because we concede this, that according to venial [sin] no sacrament is taken, nor according to its penalty: and therefore that reason does not proceed.

§ 16. To another which is objected, that there ought to be more than seven, it must be said that there ought not to be more: because holy water and blessing and such things do not justify ex opere operato, but rather ex opere operante. Also, they do not have a special form of words in which they are done. Also, they are not instituted for this. And these three are required in every sacrament, namely that it justify ex opere operato, and signify from institution, and confer invisible grace from the sanctification of the word, as Master Hugh says.

§ 17. To another it must be said, that flesh and blood cannot be matter in our sacraments: because neither in the sacraments of the old law did they signify a sacrament according to the reality of our sacrament, as we now have them in reality, namely in the Eucharist.

§ 18. And through this the solution to the following is almost clear: because we concede, that venial [sin] does not have one sacrament substantially ordered against itself.

§ 19. But to the first it must be said, that it has a medicine, but not per se, not on account of its multiplicity and because it is not a disease per se: but insofar as it is a disposition to mortal sin.

§ 20. To another it must be said, that this is of well-being [de bene esse] which falls under penance, and not of being [de esse], as will appear below.

Articulus 3 — It Is Asked Concerning The Order Of The Sacraments

The question is about the order of the sacraments.

Thirdly, it is questioned about the order of the sacraments. However, it seems that Order ought to be first: because in it is imprinted the character of excellence: therefore it is instituted in a higher degree than others: therefore it is more worthy and prior.

Likewise, Order has all things in dispensation: therefore it seems that it is prior to others.

Likewise, it has the power for the most excellent act, which is to consecrate the body of the Lord: and that which has a more excellent act is first: therefore it is the first sacrament.

330. 1 Tim. 2:2.

But it seems that Penance is first: because the Lord begins to preach from it: however, the order of work corresponds to the order of doctrine: therefore penance is to be received first.

Likewise, Augustine says, and it is placed below in the Letter, that no one can begin a new life unless he repents of the old life: therefore penance is prior.

Likewise, if any adult comes to baptism, he does not receive the reality of the sacrament without penance, because he is fictitious: therefore it is required before baptism: therefore also before other sacraments.

But still it seems that the Eucharist is prior: because it is called by the Saints the sacrament of sacraments: therefore it is most worthy: therefore it precedes all others.

Likewise, it contains the Author of all grace: but the Author of grace is before any universal and particular grace: therefore it is before all sacraments: because all others imprint spiritual graces.

However, it seems that Matrimony is first: because it was instituted before all in paradise, as the Master says below.

However, it is proven by the Master that Baptism is first, because he first acts concerning it: and he proves that it is the foundation of all sacraments.

Solution. The sacraments are to be ordered according to the order of defects against which they are ordained, among which the first is original sin, and this is removed by baptism. And the consequent is the inclination to evil, which baptism does not remove, but diminishes: and therefore confirmation is ordained against this. From the struggle of inclination, and as if from the heat of concupiscence, arises the loss of spiritual goods: and therefore the Eucharist is ordained against this in the third place. However, there is the fall of concupiscence into actual sin, against which penance is ordained. However, the remnants of weakness always arise, against which extreme unction is ordained. However, Order and Matrimony are ordained against a common defect: and Order is before Matrimony: because it is according to a more worthy generation, as was evident from the division. And the Master holds this order.

To all objections, there is one response, namely that they do not prove the order simply: but with respect to that which the reason proceeds: but here the order is not considered by the Master according to that: because none of those is the end of the sacrament except that which has already been said, namely that which it effects in the disease against which it is ordained.

Articulus 4 — What Is The Difference Between The Grace Of Gifts And Of Virtues, And That Which Is Conferred In The Sacraments

What is the difference between the grace of gifts and virtues, and that which is conferred in the sacraments?

Fourthly, it is asked, What is the difference between the grace of virtues and gifts, and that which is in the sacraments?

It seems, however, that in the sacraments only grace freely given is bestowed. For either the sacrament is received by a fictitious person, or by a non-fictitious person. If by a fictitious person, he receives no grace. If by a non-fictitious person. On the contrary: He already has the grace making pleasing when approaching: but nothing is in potency to that which he already has: therefore he cannot receive it further: therefore either he receives nothing, or he receives grace freely given.

If perhaps you say that he receives an increase of grace. On the contrary: If it is substantial to the sacrament that it confers an increase of grace: since grace is always to be increased, it would seem that sacraments are always to be repeated: but this is false, because the principal ones are not repeated: therefore they are not for the increase of grace.

Likewise, it seems that in all sacraments only one grace is conferred. Proof: For there is one grace, whose act is one: but the act is to remit sin: since therefore every sacrament is for this, it seems that all sacramental grace is one.

Moreover, in what does it differ from the grace which is in gifts and virtues?

It seems that in nothing: because both make the possessor pleasing, and render his work pleasing: therefore they do not differ.

If you say that sacramental grace is against sin: but the virtues and gifts are for good. On the contrary: In nature, the same mover in number is from the terminus and to the terminus: therefore also in spiritual things the same is the mover from evil and to good.

Likewise, the same and one motion has only one moving form: but from evil to good is the same and one motion: therefore grace moves in it as one.

Likewise, Gregory says that gifts are given as aid against the defect of sin: therefore there is no distinction.

If perhaps you say that the same grace is conferred in these and in those. On the contrary: Grace in virtues and gifts has a connection, so that he who has one, has the others: but it is not so in the sacraments, because having one sacrament, he does not have all the others.

Likewise, with no precept or sin existing, there will still be virtues and gifts and the grace which is in them; but it is not so with the sacraments: therefore the grace is different.

Solution. I well concede that sacramental grace differs from that which is in virtues and gifts, in those two ways which have been proven, namely, because having one sacramental, the others are not necessarily had: and because with no sin existing, there would be no sacraments. And still in two other ways, namely, because they are against the defect which is ordering to sin, or against sin itself: and because in them the passion of Christ operates specially: none of which per se belongs to the grace of virtues and gifts.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that having the grace of virtues, the grace of the sacraments is not per se had: because virtues are ordered to meritorious acts, but sacraments against the defect of sin: and therefore although the non-fictitious person has the grace of virtues, it is not necessary that he cannot well be in potency to receiving sacramental grace:

and this is the first grace for him, if he did not have it before: or an increase of grace, if he had grace before.

But that the sacrament itself increases grace, does not belong to it per se: but insofar as it finds another grace, not the same, first in the subject.

And by this the solution to the first is clear.

To the other it must be said that one false thing is supposed, that the act of sacramental grace is one: for although in kind it is one which is to make pleasing, yet it differs specially, as was evident above in the division: because one grace per se removes original sin, and another actual sin, and so with the others.

To the other it must be said that it differs from gifts and virtues in this, that gifts and virtues denote perfections of powers to act: but sacramental grace denotes perfection against the disease of sin: but the motion from evil to good is sometimes one, and sometimes two: for when good is intended per se, then there is motion to it, and it consequently recedes from the contrary, and then there is one motion: but when graces are not considered in motion, but as perfecting habits, then it is not necessary that they are against evil per se: because virtues and gifts are not against evil per se, but rather habits perfecting powers to acts: but sacraments are not, rather they heal the wounds of sin per se.

To the other the solution is clear by the same.

To the saying of Gregory it must be said that he does not call aid in the manner of medicine, nor does he note such a defect which is from sin and inclining to it: but he calls defect a punishment, as ignorance of things to be done, and weakness of things to be done. But the sacrament is medicine against the defect inclining to evil universally: and therefore no sacrament or sacramental grace is determined to a special power of the soul, like gifts and virtues.

Articulus 5 — It Is Asked Concerning The Definitions Of A Sacrament

It is inquired concerning the definitions of a sacrament.

Then it is inquired concerning those things which are said in the Text.

And it is first inquired concerning this which is said, there, B, A sacrament is a sign of a sacred thing,

And so that the question may be better understood, let all the definitions of a sacrament be gathered together at once.

And the first is this: A sacrament is a sign of a sacred thing. The second is placed below in the Text: A sacrament is a visible form of invisible grace, bearing a likeness, and being a cause.

Augustine defines thus: A sacrament is that in which, under the cover of visible things, divine power secretly works salvation.

Hugh defines thus: A sacrament is a corporeal or material element outwardly presented to the eyes, representing by likeness, signifying by institution, and conferring invisible grace by sanctification.

However, it is objected against the first: because 1. The serpent set up on a pole, Numbers 21:8-9:

Likewise, the Cross, the tabernacle, the temple: for all these are signs of sacred things; and yet they are not sacraments of the old law or the new: but every sacrament is either of the old law or the new: therefore it seems that the definition is more than defined: therefore it is bad.

1. Likewise, Hugh says that a sacrament is perfected in three things, namely words, things, and deeds: words, as prayers: things, as oil, water, chrism, and the like: deeds, as genuflections, blessings, and the like: therefore it seems that according to this definition there are many more sacraments than those which are enumerated.
2. Likewise, a good life is a sign and cause of a sacred thing, because of eternal life: therefore it seems to be a sacrament, which is false.

Further, it is objected concerning the second:

1. For when it is said visible form, it does not seem to agree with every sacrament: because in some it is not visible, as in confession it is rather audible than visible.
2. Likewise, the baptismal character (as will be said below) is a sacrament, and yet it is not visible: therefore it seems that it is not general, what is said about the visible form.

Furthermore, it is inquired, How is form taken there? For it is either external or internal. If external, then it is exemplary. But on the contrary: Exemplary is that according to which another is made to the same form: but no one is immersed, so that as it is done in baptism, or another sacrament, so he himself may do by baptizing, or perfecting another sacrament: therefore the form is not taken there in such a way. But if it is internal form. On the contrary: It always consists in words, as Augustine says below: Let the word come to the element, and it becomes a sacrament: therefore it should not be called visible, but audible.

Furthermore, speaking according to this, it is false: because a sacrament is not its form, just as neither is it its matter: but it is that which is composed of both,

But if you say that form is said as if remaining outside, as the fourth form of the species of quantity is said: this seems to be nothing: because that form does not seem to be except of something quantified: for that form is the same as figure, differing only in reason: but a sacrament is of no figure: therefore neither of any such form.

1. Likewise, it is objected concerning what is said, That it bears a likeness. For likeness (as Boethius says) is the same quality of things differing in number: but the same quality is not of spiritual and corporeal things: since therefore the element is material and corporeal, the sacrament itself cannot have the same quality with the soul inwardly: therefore neither does it have likeness.

Further, it is inquired, Of what kind of cause does it exist?

1. For it is either efficient, or formal, or material, or final. But it is clear that it is not efficient: because nothing is the efficient cause of grace except God alone, as Blessed Bernard says: but a sacrament is not God. Likewise, it is not formal: because then there would be some intrinsic sacrament that gives being to grace, which cannot be. Likewise, the corporeal cannot be the form of the spiritual: therefore a sacrament, which is always corporeal, is not the form of interior grace. Similarly, it seems not to be material: because neither is it the matter in which grace is, nor from which. That it is not in which, this is clear: because nothing is the matter in which, except that which is the proper subject of grace: but this is never corporeal, but the soul or another rational substance. That it is not from which, this again is clear: because grace does not have such matter, since it is a simple form. Similarly, it is not final: for grace cannot be for the sake of the sacrament, but rather conversely: therefore in no way does it seem to be a cause.
2. But if you say, as was supposed above, that it is a disposing cause in the subject: this does not seem so: because a disposing cause ought to reach the subject which it disposes: but a sacrament does not reach the soul in sacramental being, but only the body: therefore it seems that it is not a disposing cause.
3. Likewise, disposition is either the last necessity, or is around the last. But if it is the last: therefore such a form is never without it: which is not true, because grace and salvation (as will be said below) are not bound to the sacraments. But if it is before the last: therefore it is not necessary: but it can happen that a sacrament is received by someone not fictitious, and grace is not received, as it seems: therefore in no way is it a cause.
4. But if you say, as almost all the ancients said, that a sacrament is a cause like a vessel: for a sacrament is said to contain grace, as a box contains medicine: this seems to be nothing: because a box is no cause of medicine or health: therefore a sacrament according to this would not have any causality with respect to grace.

Further, it is objected concerning the third which is Augustine's:

1. For it does not seem proper to a sacrament, that it covers, but rather that it reveals, since it ought to show grace.
2. Furthermore, what is said here, divine power, does not seem to agree with a sacrament: because a sacrament ought to have causality by itself: because otherwise it would be badly defined by the reason of cause.

It is also objected concerning the fourth which is Hugh's: for there does not seem to be a difference between representing and signifying: therefore it seems that one of them is superfluous.

Summary. These four definitions are given of a sacrament, so that the first is of a sacrament in general, but the following three are given of the sacrament of the new law. And the first considers those things which are the properties of the matter and form of the sacrament itself: for from the matter it has to be a sign, from the form it has to be a cause. The second considers the effi-

§ 1. Thus it is clear that the fourth point collects all material and formal aspects existing in the sacrament: just as the corporeal element in the sacrament is matter, to which a natural property is joined, giving it the aptness to represent grace, in the way the refreshment of water represents the cooling of grace from the fire of concupiscence, and the moisture of water signifies the ablative power of grace to remove spiritual stains from the soul. The fact that this representation actually leads to grace is due to divine institution: but it is through the sanctification of the form of words that it confers invisible grace.

§ 2. Thus, the solution is evident for what might be queried, regarding under what consideration these definitions are taken, since a single thing has a unique definition.

§ 3. To the first, it should be said that in the definition of a sacrament, the sacred thing and the sign are taken in a restricted sense, namely, so that a sacred thing is said to be that which is ordained as a remedy against disease, and a sign is said to be that which offers a likeness to that by divine institution: and then that definition only applies to a sacrament of the old law or the new.

§ 4. However, if one wishes to say that a sacrament is defined for any sacred thing, whether actively or passively called a sacrament, it would not be incorrect because this seems to be the intention of the Master in relation to the divisions of the sacred thing and the divisions of the sign which he submits. However, since a sign is not a signified thing, properly speaking, there should be a difference between a sacrament called a sign and a sacred thing said to be the signified; for the serpent, the cross, and similar items are not instituted to signify such a sacrament but rather to dispel demons, to show a passion in a typological manner, or to signify God's disposition as the tabernacle did.

§ 5. As for stating that Master Hugh speaks there of any sacrament that pertains to worship, it should not be taken to mean it applies to the proper reason there.

§ 6. Concerning another issue, one must say that a good life is the cause of grace and salvation, but does not show it in the sign of likeness: rather, it shows in a sign akin to merit as the cause of reward, and such a sign is not understood when a sign is placed in the definition of a sacrament. Alternatively, one could say that a good life does not signify salvation by institution but inherently. One might also assert that a good life operates salvation from the operative work, not from the work accomplished, whereas a sacrament is from the work done; thus, it is clear that a good life is not a sacrament.

§ 7. To the issue raised about the second point, it should be said that the visible, in the extended name, is placed in the definition for the sensible, because vision is the more general and noble sense concerning objects.

§ 8. Regarding another issue, one should state that the baptismal character is taken as a thing and as a sign: insofar as it is taken as a thing, it is not a sacrament; but insofar as it is taken as a sign, it is a sacrament; and although it is invisible, it is visible when related to an external action: in itself, it is not a sacrament, but rather it is reduced to external animation.

§ 9. With respect to another issue, the form is said to remain externally and is transposed: because just as it is configured by the fitness of figures, so does the external action conform to the inner action in the sacrament: in this manner, the objection does not proceed, because, with a transposed formula, the form is taken.

§ 10. On another point, a resemblance is derived there according to proportionality: For according to Boethius in the second book of Arithmetic, resemblance of differing things is the same quantity, and proportion is the resemblance of relation between two, whereas proportionality is the likeness of proportions between four. Then we shall say that the property of the external element must be taken concerning its effect on the body on one side, and the property of grace through its effect on the soul on the other side: allegorically or metaphorically a resemblance should be posited between those two proportions. As the refrigerative and washing power of an element is to the body, so is grace to the soul according to the metaphor. And then the objection ceases.

§ 11. Furthermore, it should be said that the sacrament serves as a disposing cause in the subject, and the disposition that is necessary in itself: however, it does not follow that it always operates, but it follows how it is naturally disposed, unless there is an obstacle by the false.

§ 12. To another objection, it is stated that it touches the likeness of proportionality and virtue from sanctification, as Augustine writes in a distich concerning Sacramental Matters[331]. Hence, the force of water is that it touches the body and washes the heart, except through the invocation of the word.

§ 13. Concerning the statement that salvation is not bound to the sacrament, Master Hugh says, although it is indeed in those, it is not from them as an efficient cause, and it should be understood that he did not bind it. If, however, it is questioned, to what cause this disposition is reduced, the response would depend on the matter: since anything before the form from dispositions of the matter is subjected to the form along with that matter, as is evident in the bronze when whitened, for example.

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Sacraments The Sign Is Some Thing

Whether in the sacraments a sign is a thing?

Then the question arises about what is stated there, B, near the beginning: "A sign, however, is a thing beyond the appearance it presents to the senses," etc.

1. For in the first book of the Sentences, the Master divides the treatment of sacred Scripture, which is about things and signs: therefore, it seems that a sign is not a thing.

2. Likewise, it seems that he speaks falsely in what he says, from itself: because a sacrament does not act from itself, but from institution, as it seems.

Response. The Master here takes a sign as it falls under the intention of the thing: because, as was said in the first book of the Sentences, when the treatment is divided into things and signs, that division is rather through different modes of the thing than through different things, and it holds as much as the absolute and the related to another for signifying.

To the other, it must be said that a sign acts from itself, that is, from itself as a sign, or formally accepted: for a thing acts from itself, which it does from its form, and what falls into its definition. And this does not contradict its institution: because a sign from God, and especially a sacramental one, receives its form from institution, although it has aptitude from nature, as was said before.

Articulus 7 — Whether Those Things Which Are Instituted For The Sake Of Signifying Only Are Only Signs And Not Sacraments

Are things instituted solely for the sake of signifying merely signs and not sacraments?

Next, the question arises concerning what is stated there, B, in the middle: For things instituted solely for the sake of signifying are merely signs and not sacraments, etc.

Against this, it seems to be what was said above, that

1. A sacrament is the visible form of invisible grace: however, those things which were merely signs were such as the paschal lamb and certain others: therefore, they were sacraments.
2. Likewise, he later divides the sacrament into the sacrament of the old and new law: therefore, those are sacraments just as these are.
3. Furthermore, he calls them here carnal sacrifices and ceremonial observances: and this does not seem so. For the Apostle says, in Romans vii, 12: The law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good.

If you say that it was carnal for those understanding carnally. Against: Because an understanding person cannot change anything about a thing with their intellect: for a thing is in itself what it is, not from the comparison of my intellect or another's.

Furthermore, according to the same reasoning, the new law could also be carnal: because some understood carnally, and still understand, as Christ says, John vi, 64: It is the Spirit that gives life; the flesh profits nothing.

1. Moreover, why are they called ceremonial? For it cannot be said that they are called ceremonial from decay, which is the rotting of wood, because they were unclean: for I hold it as inappropriate that God commanded something unclean for any reason.

331. Augustine on Distinctio HM.

Also, nothing unclean pertains to the worship of God: however, those sacrifices pertained to the worship of God: therefore, those sacrifices had nothing unclean.

Furthermore, it is often said of the sacrifice that it was a most sweet odor to the Lord: therefore, there was nothing of decay there.

But if you say that they are called ceremonial from wax, it seems that this is not true: because wax does not signify anything pertaining to divine worship.

Solution. It must be said that the Master determines the sacrament according to its greatest capacity: and this is only in the sacrament of the new law, which is both cause and sign: and therefore, those things which were merely signs he says are not sacraments: because even in truth, they were not sacraments, except because they signified our sacraments: and this will be proven below by authority.

Through this, the solution to the following is also clear: because below he takes the sacrament more generally than here.

To the other, it must be said that they were carnal because of the carnal rite, and because of the state of those serving carnally: for at that time sacrifices were offered from carnal things, which signified things that are spiritual sacrifices, of which the Psalm x, 19 says: A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit: a contrite and humbled heart, O God, you will not despise. And at that time, it was the state of the carnal, and if some offered spiritual things, they pertained to the New Testament.

To the other, it must be said that the law is called holy, by reason of morals, and by reason of figure: because it sanctifies only through faith in the Mediator.

To the last, it must be said that they are called ceremonial, as it seems to me, because they pertained to divine worship. Hence, Tullius at the end of the First Rhetoric says, that religion is, which brings care and ceremony to a certain nature which they call superior. And it is composed of munia, which is service or worship, and Ceres, who is the goddess of crops; because perhaps she was first worshipped: and from her worship, it was transferred to divine worship.

Articulus 8 — Whether To Offer Carnal Sacrifices Is Good In General; And, Whether It Was Of Natural Law; And, Whether They Justified

Whether offering carnal sacrifices is good in general? And, whether it was of natural law? And, whether they justified?

Then it is inquired about what is said there, B, in the middle: Which could never make the offerers just.

And three things are inquired, the first of which is, Whether offering such things was good in general?
Secondly, Whether it was of natural law?
Thirdly, Whether they justified?

To the FIRST, it proceeds thus:
1. Good in general is good according to the principle subject to morals, and this is a voluntary act like the due matter, as to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked: therefore, similarly, it will be to offer to whom it is to be offered: therefore, it seems that if it were informed by charity, it would be meritorious: but to offer a creature to God is to offer to whom it is to be offered: therefore, this informed by charity could be meritorious of eternal life.

1. Likewise, Nothing is in the species that is not in the genus: offering sacrifices is in the species of the virtue of latria: therefore, it is in the genus of good: therefore, it is good in general, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
To kill a beast to be burned seems entirely useless. Psalm 49:13-14: Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Offer to God a sacrifice of praise, etc. Therefore, it seems that offering sacrifices was never of the genus of goods.

To the SECOND, it proceeds thus:
1. The offering of sacrifices began in the natural law and was in the law of Moses: therefore, it seems that nature inclined to this: therefore, it is of natural law.

1. Likewise, All were bound to acknowledge the future liberator by the inclination of nature: but sacrifices showed him: therefore, nature inclined to the offering of sacrifices.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. Whatever is of natural law remained and remains in the new law: the offering of sacrifices does not remain: therefore, it was never of natural law.

1. Likewise, What is natural is the same among all: however, it is evident that not all offered sacrifices: therefore, it seems that it was not natural.

To the THIRD, it proceeds thus:
1. Bede says that sacrifices in their time conferred eternal life: but nothing confers eternal life unless it justifies: therefore, those sacrifices justified.

1. Likewise, Whatever God commands to be done, He wills to be done: and I say to be done, because of the command made to Abraham, not to be done, but to be tested: God commanded sacrifices to be done: therefore, He willed them to be done. Thus: Whatever God wills to be done, if it is done out of charity, is meritorious: God willed sacrifices to be done: therefore, if they were done out of charity, they were meritorious: therefore, they justified. If you say that this merit is from the virtue of charity, and not of the work: this is nothing: because all merit is by the virtue of charity, and not of the work.

Likewise, moral acts also did not justify unless they were done with charity: therefore, this is not the reason.

1. If perhaps you say that they had this from the fact that they signified our sacraments. On the contrary: Let us circumscribe the signification, and let the command remain about offering sacrifices: then God commands them to be done, and then the same reason as the first.
2. Likewise, In the second part of the distinction, in the treatise on circumcision, Gregory says: What water of baptism effects among us, circumcision or the virtue of sacrifices effected among the ancients: sacrifices had the power of absolving from guilt: and this is not absolved without grace: therefore, they conferred grace, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. There is a difference between those sacraments and the new law, that those are not vessels containing grace, but ours are. But what is not grace in itself, and does not contain it, does not justify: therefore, those sacrifices did not justify.

1. Likewise, If they justified, it is asked, To what effect did they justify? It is evident that not to the conferring of grace: because the Apostle denies this, and it is held in the Letter. But neither to the remission of punishment, this is proven: because punishment is connected to guilt: therefore, it seems that they justified in no way.
2. Likewise, Isaiah 1:11: The burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts, etc., I did not want. The Gloss says, never.
3. Likewise, On Ephesians 5:2, on that: He gave himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savor, the Gloss says that other sacrifices were not for a sweet-smelling savor, except insofar as they were a figure of that: therefore, of themselves, they conferred nothing, as it seems.
4. Likewise, Jeremiah 7:22: I did not speak with your fathers, and I did not command them... concerning the word of burnt offerings and sacrifices: therefore, He never willed those.
5. Likewise, Ezekiel 20:25: I gave them statutes that were not good, and judgments by which they shall not live: therefore, they did not justify, because otherwise, they would have conferred life.
6. Likewise, Hesychius says that they were not pleasing, and he speaks of sacrifices.
7. Likewise, Augustine in the book on the City of God: God is not pleased with the sacrifice of a slain beast, but with a contrite heart: it seems that they did not justify.

But still, two or three things seem to be very probable against this.

1. One is that in the Canon of the most holy host, it is said, after it is consecrated: Upon which may you deign to look with a propitious and serene countenance: and to accept, as you deigned to accept the sacrifice of your just servant Abel, and the sacrifice of our patriarch Abraham: and what your high priest Melchizedek offered to you: it seems that it was pleasing: therefore, they justified.

2. Likewise, Exodus 20:1 and following, in the same part sacrifices are joined with morals: the reason for this does not seem to be other than because they justified like those.

3. Likewise, This is taken from the tradition of the Hebrews, who say that morals do not differ from sacrifices, except that the people heard morals directly from the Lord, whence it is said there that the whole people heard the voices: but the people did not hear sacrifices, but Moses alone heard: and therefore, they received sacrifices through a minister, but morals (as some Hebrews say) from the Lord: therefore, sacrifices justified, just as morals themselves.

Solution. It must be said to the first, that in general it is good to offer to whom it is to be offered: but good in general receives determination of circumstances according to the diversity of acts: and therefore, determination concerning this good is especially determined by reason to the state and to the time: but the time was when there was disease and the time of the signification of medicine: and the state was a state in sin. And concerning this, the sacrifice is determined. And because now such a sacrifice cannot be determined in this way, therefore now such a sacrifice is pernicious. For although to offer to whom it is to be offered is good in general, yet the determination of what is offered, as a goat or a sheep, does not regard good in general according to the determination which is taken through the knowledge of signification.

To the other, it must be said that at that time it was well drawn to the species: but this was not by the virtue of the matter which is a goat or a sheep, but rather by the reason of the act which is the offering. And it is well conceded by all that that act informed by charity was meritorious: because it is the work operating, not the work operated.

To what is objected on the contrary, it must be said that it was not useless for the beast to be killed in this way in which it was killed: for it was not burned to be consumed by fire, but rather to show the spirituality and warmth of devotion around the sacrifice of a contrite spirit.

To what is secondly inquired, it must be said that sacrifice in general is indeed of natural law: for human reason well dictates this, that one's liberation ought to be prefigured: but it did not dictate that it should be in this way or that, but reason added this determination by conferring and inquiring how the true sacrifice might be better prefigured.

To the other, it must be said that all were bound to acknowledge their liberation, not explicitly, but implicitly: just as they also behaved concerning the articles.

But to those things which are said on the contrary, the solution is clear: because they are not determined in natural law: and therefore, they neither remain, nor are they the same among all.

To the other, it must be said that there is a threefold state, namely before idolatry and the written law, and under idolatry and the written law, and under grace promised and expected in both the natural and Mosaic law. Before the law and idolatry, sacrifices were pleasing in the figure of the future offering which was made through Christ: but under the law, they were simply displeasing, because then they were offered to idols: but they were pleasing in a certain respect, namely that they were offered to Him rather than to idols. But under grace, they are entirely displeasing: because neither the time nor the state under grace allows them to be determined.

To what is thirdly inquired, it must be said that the Masters rightly say that it is the work operating, and this is the act which was good for the time, and this could be informed by charity: and it is the work operated, as the immolated goat, and this contributed nothing that would inwardly aid beyond the merit of the act. Hence, the statement of Bede is understood in the first way, and not in the second.

To the other, it must be said that signs of will were concerning such things, and not the good pleasure which signifies a quiet will in good: but signs of will as command and counsel were indeed for doing, but for the time and state, for the reason already stated.

To the other, it must be said that if the sign of future liberation is circumscribed, and there is a command concerning them, they will still be meritorious concerning the operating acts; but although the signification is circumscribed in this way or that, it is necessary that the state of liberation is prefigured in some way whatever it may be: and then, even with the sign of the future circumscribed, I say that merit remains in the operating work by the virtue of the command: but reason does not dictate that they are to be offered in this way.

To the other, it must be said that the virtue of the sacrifice is referred there to the future, and not to the present operated work. And this is clear from what Augustine says, that never without faith in the Mediator did anyone have salvation, from a newborn child to an old decrepit man.

But those things which are objected on the contrary, I concede well.

To the other, it must be said that what is in the Canon is understood as the comparison of state to state, of truth to figure. Hence, it is understood thus: That just as that was pleasing in the state of signification and figure, so may this be pleasing in the state of truth and liberation: not, however, only so much, but much more: because even through that, as it was determined, no one had the reason of pleasing except through this: but it is indeed true that the offering in general always pleased God, when what was God's was offered to Him: just as even now it pleases, although the same mode which was then does not please.

To the other, it must be said that they are joined with morals, not because they pertained in species to morals: but because the act in general was moral in ceremonial matters: for nature dictated the act in general, just as it did the act of morals: but the species of the offering is diversified according to place and time, as has been said.

To the other, it must be said that there is a twofold tradition of the Hebrews concerning this, as Rabbi Moses the Egyptian says in the second collation of his book which he calls the Guide of the Perplexed: for the wiser Jews, as Rabbi Moses himself, and Rabbi Joshua, and Rabbi Eleazar say that the hearing of the people was nothing other than that by popular reason it could be known: and therefore, they say that the people heard only one commandment, which even a simple man immediately dictates by conscience and reason: and this is the first, namely that: Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord. You shall have no other gods before me, etc. But the other nine were heard by the wise who were more prepared to receive the illumination of revelation: because this is dictated by natural reason also, although not as perspicaciously as the first. But all other things were heard only by Moses alone: because he knew even those things through the illumination of God, which none of the others could investigate by reason.

But others say that the whole people heard the ten commandments: because natural law dictates these to man, and all were capable of them; but they did not hear sacrifices: because they are not of natural law except in general, by reason of which they are also joined with morals: but they had to be determined by the Prophet who understood the worship of God more for the state and time.

Articulus 9 — Whether Venial Sin Was Remitted By Virtue Of The Sacraments Of The Old Law

Was venial sin remitted by the power of the sacraments of the old law?

Next, the question arises concerning what is stated there, B, towards the end: I understand nothing else by the purification than what the law cleanses, etc.

And two questions are asked here: the first is, Whether venial sin was remitted by the power of those sacraments?

The second, Why in the new law is there nothing that cures irregularity as in the old?

To the first, the procedure is as follows:

1. Below, Augustine says that venial sins were always remitted through sacrifices and ceremonies: therefore, it seems that they at least remitted some sins.

1. Likewise, it has greater conformity with grace that which is not a cause but a sign, than that which is neither a cause nor a sign: but some things which are neither a cause nor a sign, because they are not sacraments, like holy water and the pontifical blessing, remit venial sin: therefore, much more those which were a sign and not a cause: such were the sacrifices of the old law: therefore, they remitted venial sin.

ON THE CONTRARY:

Sin is never forgiven by God without grace: however, those sacraments conferred no grace by their own power: therefore, by their own power, they never cured any sin: which seems to be conceded, except accidentally, namely through the work of the worker, especially since the Saints and the Apostle to the Hebrews expressly say this.

To the FIRST, therefore, it must be said that venial is taken equivocally: because in the law, venial was that which was not punished by temporal death, but was punished by expulsion outside the camp, or by expiation, or in another way: and Augustine speaks of this, and not of that which by its own nature is worthy of pardon.

To the other, it must be said that that argument does not have necessity, unless it were first proven that something according to its substantial effect as a sacrament was ordained against venial sin: but we do not confess this, as was evident above.

Articulus 10 — Why In The New Law There Is Not Something Curing Irregularity As In The Old

Why is there nothing in the new law addressing irregularity as in the old?

To the second objection, it is argued thus:
The new law is more perfect than the old: therefore, the sacraments of the new law are more perfect than those of the old. Since the latter expiated irregularities, it seems that the former should also do this, and much more.

Furthermore, it is asked, why does irregularity especially impede this sacrament, which is Order, and not others? For no one is irregular for Baptism or the Eucharist, provided they are willing to prepare themselves, nor for Penance, and so on for others.

Solution. It must be said that this very fact indicates the greatest dignity and loftiness of the New Testament. Because in the Old Testament there was only a shadow of the priesthood and priestly act, therefore a light remedy was prepared there, through which a person is made suitable for that act. But here, because it is the true act of the offering of Christ and the true priesthood, irregularity is expiated with difficulty, and sometimes it cannot be expiated.

To the other, it must be said that Order places a person in a dual state, namely of bridegroom and bride: for the whole Church is betrothed to God in the Prelate, and God is united with the people in the Prelate: and therefore he is a mediator between God and the people, and holds the place of both, and therefore, inasmuch as he is the bride, he has the ring of faith and charity, and it is signified that he is not divided, just as the Church is indivisible in heart.

of and signifies the body, and is united to God: and in this respect, bigamy induces unsuitability and irregularity. Since it is he who brings about the communion of the whole people in the place of God, who makes the people common, therefore, communion induces irregularity in excommunication. By reason of spirituality and the worship that the state pretends, the shedding of blood causes unsuitability. And the fact that these are not abolished is not a defect of the new law: because they are not sins, unless perhaps incidentally, but rather unsuitability of certain persons for the act of excellent dignity and the signification of bride and bridegroom.

Articulus 11 — Whether Oblations And Sacrifices Ought To Have Existed Before The Law; And, Whether Then All Were Bound To Know The Reasons For The Figure In Which They Were Placed

Whether offerings and sacrifices ought to have existed before the law? And, whether then all were bound to know the reasons for the figure in which they were placed?

Then it is questioned concerning what is said there, B, at the end, "Because God imposed them in servitude," etc.

For according to this, it seems that they ought not to have existed before the law, which is not true, since Abel offered, and Abraham, and certain other Patriarchs.

Furthermore, by the reason of the second cause which says that they are placed in a figure, it is questioned whether everyone was bound to know the reason for that figure, or not?

It seems that they were: because
1. Otherwise, the offering would have been useless or harmful to some figure: for he would believe that it was accepted by God in itself: therefore it seems that all were bound to recognize the reason for the figure.

1. Likewise, every man was bound to recognize the necessary future liberation: therefore he was bound to pre-signify it: just as we now believe with the heart for righteousness, and confess with the mouth for salvation*: since therefore the pre-signification is through sacrifices, he was bound to know the reason for the sacrifices.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:
1. They did not have such a determined relation to the passion of Christ which was signified in them, that reason would dictate this without revelation: therefore unless it was revealed, it seems that no one was bound to know that signification.

1. Likewise, another mode was possible, as Augustine says. Therefore, let it be granted that another would have been: therefore then those sacrifices would not have figured the Passion of Christ: therefore they were not bound to know that these figured those things, namely, which were to be in the New Testament.
2. Likewise, further it seems to follow from this, that they were not bound to sacrifices: because the spiritual ones recognized themselves to be oppressed by the burden, and that those were not pleasing to God: therefore it seems that they could desist from sacrifices whenever they wanted, which is false: therefore they were commanded to do them, and not only imposed for the sake of the figure, as the Master says here.

Solution, It must be said that according to what was said above, there is a threefold state. Before the law, indeed, I think that they simply pleased God, inasmuch as worship was signified in them and the figure of future liberation: and in this way the Patriarchs offered. But after the people learned in Egypt to offer to idols, such a rite did not please God, except in a certain respect, namely, that it was offered to Him rather than to idols.

To the other, it must be said as above, that all were bound, but not explicitly, but in this way that they intended to offer them in the signification and greater rite which those who understood the future revelation understood.

To the first objection: the solution is indeed clear.

To the second, however, it must be said that the mode of liberation was signified in general, namely, that it was necessary for it to be in the mode of satisfaction, so that a contrite and humbled heart would be offered on our part: and whatever mode it would have been, that was always required on our part: and thus the mode of liberation on our part always remains to be signified in the future through sacrifices.

Articulus 12 — What Is The Effect Of The Ashes Of The Red Heifer And Of The Water That Was Made Through Its Mixture

What is the effect of the ashes of the red heifer and the water that was made by their mixture?

Then it is asked about what is said there, B, at the end: The Apostle, however, speaks of the works of the law, etc.

There is a particular doubt concerning the ashes of the red heifer from which the water of sprinkling was made throughout the year, as it is read in Numbers 19:2 and following.

It seems that this water performed two contrary actions: because it rendered the priest who sacrificed it unclean, and it was commanded that he remain outside the camp and be unclean until evening; however, it cleansed the sprinkled people, the vessels of the tabernacle, the tabernacle itself, the book, and all other things that were sprinkled with the water. For if it is said that this was because he touched a corpse while sacrificing, it does not seem so: because even when sprinkled with the blood of the corpse, he was touched, and yet he was cleansed: therefore, it seems that the priest sacrificing should become cleaner from this.

Solution. Here is a twofold good solution, and others are trifles. Augustine says that the ashes of the heifer, which are the remnants of fire, signify sins already cooled by concupiscence and burned by the fire of contrition: the blood, however, is the blood of Christ's redemption: the water mixed, however, is the union of the people with Christ, or the fountain of tears: and from these, a clean sprinkling is made. But the priest is unclean: because we are never sprinkled in such a way that the uncleanness of venial sins does not adhere to us: therefore, we will remain outside the camp of pure society until evening, and then, purified by purgatory, we will enter pure into the lot and dwelling of the Saints: and this is the best solution.

The Masters give another, that the sacrificing priest signifies our priest celebrating and taking the body of Christ: which, although it is most holy, yet because we ought to consider ourselves unworthy in respect to it, therefore when we celebrate, we wash our hands, and consider ourselves outside the camp of the Saints until the evening of death.

And through this, the solution to the contrary is clear.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Threefold Cause Of The Institution Of The Sacraments Is Well Assigned By The Master

Is the threefold cause of the institution of the sacraments well assigned by the Master?

Next, inquiry is made into the second part of that section, where it is stated: "The sacraments were instituted for a threefold reason," etc.

Inquiry is made concerning these causes.

It seems, indeed, that there are none: because 1. It is against the proper order for a man to humble himself under that which is beneath him: a corporeal element is beneath the dignity of man: therefore, it is against the proper order for a man to humble himself to the point of seeking salvation in a corporeal element.

1. Likewise, one is not helped to rise who is further cast down than he had fallen: therefore, it seems that there is no cause which is sought first.
2. Similarly, the second cause seems to be none: because the more open some instruction is, the more effectively it instructs: therefore, something else that would openly show and confer grace would instruct and confer grace more than a sacrament which shows us in a corporeal element.
3. Likewise, if that instruction exists, it is according to some reason or way of reason: but no way of reason investigates grace in that which is not the cause of grace, but rather expects it from God who is the author of all grace: therefore, it seems that there is no instruction in the sacrament.
4. Likewise, objection is made concerning the third cause, which is exercise. For a single act cannot be called exercise: since, therefore, the greater sacraments are not received except once, they do not seem to be instituted for exercise.
5. Likewise, virtues seem to be given more for exercise: because their acts are repeated throughout life, and not the acts of the sacraments: therefore, it seems that none of these causes is reasonable.

Likewise, it is asked, by what is the number of these causes taken?

Solution. To this last point, it must be said first that in a sacrament there are three things, namely matter, the nature of a sign, and the nature of causing. And the first cause is taken according to the matter, which is inferior. The second is taken according to the nature of the sign: because a sign makes something come to the knowledge of a thing beyond the appearance which it presents to the senses.

The third is taken according to the nature of causing: because it causes grace, whose act is repeated in the exercise of life.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that the humiliation of one existing in sin is different from the humiliation of nature considered in itself. I say, therefore, that because man, by humbling himself, had cast himself down, it was fitting that he should be humbled under that which was beneath him, for the sake of God: so that he might descend more humbly under that which was beneath him by nature, as much as he had arrogantly raised himself to that which was above him, by desiring equality with God.

To the second, it must be said that if he were humbled under the element for the sake of the element, then that reasoning would proceed: but he is humbled under the element for the sake of God: and therefore he rises by that humility.

To the other, it must be said that instruction is from our own things, as Dionysius says: because our intellect does not receive divine things except veiled in material things: and therefore, although in itself it is more obscure than the truth itself, yet it is more suitable for us: just as also in philosophy, often the teaching is easier from things that are simply more unknown, but more known to us, than the contrary.

To the other, it must be said that that instruction is by way of reason which contemplates the requirement of our sin: because by the reason of what is fitting, the sinner must be led by things connatural: but, as Dionysius says, to rise from the likenesses of corporeal things to the unknown: and by those things which he has now learned, he learns spiritual things which he did not know. Although reason seeks salvation in corporeal elements, it does not seek it from them, as noted above in the authority of Master Hugh.

To what is objected concerning the third cause, it must be said that exercise is not referred here to the act of the sacrament, but to the act of sacramental grace, which is frequently to be repeated.

To the other, it must be said that exercise is not in the act of virtue, but is of another nature: because it is not so directly ordered against sin as the act of sacramental grace.

Articulus 14 — Whether In Every Sacrament There Are Two, Namely, Words And A Thing

Are there two things in every sacrament, namely words and matter?

Are there two things in every sacrament, namely words and matter?

Next, the question is raised concerning the third part of this distinction, there, D, at the end: "There are two things in which sacraments consist," etc.

For this does not seem to be general in all cases, because:

1. In marriage, consent makes the marriage, even if words are absent; therefore, it seems that not every sacrament consists in words.
2. Likewise, in contrition, the sorrow of the contrite with grace erases sin, and there are no words there.
3. Likewise, an objection is raised from the other side, about which it is said that matter is in the sacrament. For there is a certain matter of the sacrament, chrism: and this matter was not in the Old Testament. And it is asked, why, since there was oil, and wine, and bread, and water, which are matters of other sacraments?

Solution. It must be said that words are in every sacrament insofar as it is a sacrament of the Church. For marriage is considered in multiple ways, namely insofar as it is a duty of nature, and insofar as it is a good of the Church: and in this respect, it can be sufficiently effected by consent to marital union: but in the third way, it is a remedy, and thus it is placed under the keys of the Church: and it is in the dispensation of ministers, and in this respect, it has a form expressed in the face of the Church, and it receives the blessing of the Church, and it becomes not indeed a sacrament of the Church in itself, but a sacrament of the Church, so that it is a remedy by the power of the keys of the Church.

To the other, it must be said that words are in penance, according to which it is one sacrament in its three parts, and these are the words that the priest says when, binding to satisfaction, he absolves.

To what is objected against the other part, it must be said that in confirmation the Holy Spirit is given for strength: and therefore it is also given only by one who is in a higher degree of the Church: and therefore in a state of imperfection, it was not fitting to have its own proper matter.

Articulus 15 — Whether The Sacraments Of The Old Law Gave Salvation, Just As The Sacraments Of The New Law

Did the sacraments of the old law grant salvation, just as the sacraments of the new law?

Did the sacraments of the old law grant salvation, just as the sacraments of the new law?

Next, the question is raised about the fourth part, which is divided into two parts. In the first part, it determines the difference between the sacraments of the New and Old Testaments in general. In the second part, it touches upon an exception regarding circumcision, because it does not seem to fall under the stated difference. The first part begins there, "E, Now it remains to see the distinction." The second part begins there, "F, however, among those sacraments, a certain sacrament, etc."

However, the question arises first about what is said concerning the first difference.

It seems that those sacraments granted salvation just as these do, because:

1. The Apostle says in Galatians 3:12: "He who does them shall live in them." He does not speak of bodily life, therefore of spiritual life; therefore, they gave spiritual life; therefore, consequently, salvation.
2. Likewise, Master Hugh of Saint Victor in the book on Sacraments: "From the effect by which man fell into sin, God immediately provided sacraments, some before the law, some under the law, some under grace, differing indeed in species, but having one effect." The effect of the sacraments is to confer salvation; therefore, also those which were before the law and in the law; therefore, all healed and gave salvation.
3. Likewise, 1 Corinthians 10:1 and following:

"I do not want you to be ignorant, brothers, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and all ate the same spiritual food, and all drank the same spiritual drink (for they drank from the spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was Christ)." It seems that their sacraments did the same for them as ours do for us.

1. Likewise, Augustine: "The same effect was for those eating manna as for those receiving the body of Christ."
2. Likewise, Wisdom 16:20: "You provided them with bread from heaven without labor, containing every delight and the sweetness of every taste." This could not be unless it contained all the spiritual good of grace, just as ours; therefore, it seems that those did the same as ours.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. Hebrews 9:9: "Which cannot make the worshiper perfect in conscience."
2. Likewise, Hebrews 7:19: "The law made nothing perfect."
3. Likewise, if a law had been given that could justify, truly righteousness would be by the law.

Solution. It must be said that the law did not justify concerning the sacramental, but promised salvation. And multiple differences are assigned; however, three are touched upon here: the first is that our sacraments are signs of grace, but those sacraments are not immediately signs of grace, but of our sacraments. The second is that our sacraments are signs and causes, but those are only signs. The third is that those promise what they do not contain, but these give what they contain. Others assign the difference on the part of the fulfillers, through Augustine, who says that the briefest difference between the law and the Gospel is fear and love.

Therefore, it must be said to the first that the Apostle there speaks of the Decalogue, and not of the sacramental; however, neither did the Decalogue confer grace of itself, as the New Testament does. And to understand this, it must be known that the old law was entirely in fear, in fire, and smoke, and terrors; but the new law, entirely in kindness and grace; and even the Mediator himself brought and gave the grace of sanctification for all.

To the other, it must be said that Master Hugh understands this concerning the effect of the sign, not the effect of causality, because all these signified the same.

To the other, it must be said that the fathers did not drink sacramentally, but in spirit, as Christ says in John 8:56: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; he saw it and was glad." And therefore, the argument does not proceed, because that was more the power of devotion than the power of any sacrament.

To the other, it must be said that it was the same in general and spiritually, but not in species and sacramentally. For we thirst in two ways, namely spiritually and sacramentally; but they spiritually and only in type; and this they did not have by the nature of their state, but rather by a certain privilege, insofar as they belonged through charity to the New Testament.

To the other, it must be said that this was in type and spirit, and not in truth and sacrament.

Divisio Textus

There was, however, among those things, etc. Here the Master begins to discuss circumcision.

And he touches upon five aspects concerning it: the first of which is about its effect. The second, about the recipients, there, G, Where The third, however, is about the institution of men, etc., there, H, Here it must be said, in The fourth, about the rite by which it was instituted, etc., there, I, It was done on the eighth day, etc. The fifth and last is about certain doubtful questions concerning the rite, there, L, If indeed it is asked about infants, etc.

Articulus 16 — Which Of The Testaments Was More Grave

Whether the Testaments were more burdensome?

But here arises the question, which of them is more burdensome?

It seems, however, that the New Testament is more burdensome: because it is more difficult to relinquish all things which are in the New Testament than to subject all things which are in the Old Testament.

Moreover, Christ added many things to the old laws, as seen in Matthew 5:1 and following. That which has both as much and more is more burdensome: therefore, the New Testament is more burdensome than the Old Testament.

Furthermore, the Old Testament restrains the hand, but not the mind; whereas the New Testament restrains both the hand and the mind. It is more difficult to restrain both the hand and the mind than the hand alone: therefore, the New Testament is more burdensome.

ON THE CONTRARY:
It is said in Acts 15:10: "Why do you test God by putting a yoke on the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" Therefore, it seems that the Old Testament is more burdensome than the New Testament.

Also, in Matthew 11:28 and 30: "Come to me, all you who labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart: and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Therefore, it seems that they are equally light.

Solution. It is easy to determine all such arguments: because as the authorities and reasons go, they indicate a certain distinction. Therefore, it must be known that the New and Old Testaments can be considered as type and truth: and thus one is in the other. However, if they are considered in terms of the material of the precepts and the motivation to fulfill them, then the Old Testament is much more burdensome: because it has more precepts, and fear motivates the fulfillment of them. But if they are considered in terms of the perfection of the state of those things which are commanded, then the New Testament is more difficult.

And through this, the solution to all is now clear.

Articulus 17 — Whether Circumcision Is Well Defined By Damascene

Is circumcision well defined by Damascene?

The first question that arises here is, What is circumcision?

John Damascene defines it thus: Circumcision was a sign distinguishing Israel from the Gentiles with whom they interacted.

But against this definition, there are multiple objections.

1. First, as was previously evident from the statements of Hugh, the sacraments of the old law are called sacraments in comparison to the sacraments of the new law which they signify: therefore, it seems that they should be defined in comparison to those; and this is not done with circumcision.
2. If perhaps you say that it is different with circumcision because it effected what it prefigured. On the contrary: Damascene says in the same place: Circumcision was a type of baptism, but a type should be defined in comparison to that of which it is a type. Also, a little below: With the truth appearing, the type and shadow become useless. Therefore, it is superfluous to be circumcised, and contrary to holy baptism.
3. Furthermore, it is objected regarding what he says: Distinguishing Israel from the Gentiles, etc. Either he speaks of the distinction of interaction or of the distinction of place concerning habitation. If of the distinction of interaction, on the contrary: The law was given for this, as Psalm 147:20 says: He has not dealt thus with any nation, and his judgments he has not made known to them. Therefore, it seems that circumcision was not given for this. If he speaks of the distinction of habitation, then it seems that later, those dwelling in peace in the promised land should not have been circumcised, because then they were not mixed with other Gentiles, which is frivolous: therefore, it determines in no way.
4. Also, every distinction is given through a manifest sign: circumcision is a certain determination: therefore, it should be done on the forehead or in another manifest place, as it seems.
5. Also, since there are two things in a sacrament: to sanctify and to signify: sanctifying is more principal: therefore, circumcision should be defined more by that than by the determination which pertains to the sign. If you say that it does not sanctify of itself, but by the virtue of faith. On the contrary: Hugo says: The sacrament of circumcision was given for sanctifying and signifying the seed of Abraham: therefore, circumcision was given for sanctifying: and thus it should be defined principally by the act of sanctification.

Solution. It must be said that the principal act of circumcision is the remedy for original sin, and a certain sanctification of the time, namely, such as could be provided by circumcision at that time.

As for what is objected concerning Damascene, it must be said that he does not define it in comparison to baptism: because it had a certain effect of grace in the law as a remedy against original sin: and such an effect is always principal in a sacrament: although it was also a type of baptism.

To the other objection, it must be said that the determination of interaction is understood principally from the grace of circumcision, and consequently also the determination of habitation: and therefore Damascene himself says that during the forty years they were in the desert, they were not circumcised: because then they were not mixed with other nations: and in this, he only touches on a secondary cause: because the true cause was that they were under the cloud, and they had to move at the movement of the cloud, and their wounds could not have healed if they had been circumcised.

And to what is objected against this, it must be said that the law was given for interaction, as a rule of morals and works, but circumcision as a sign and mitigator of concupiscence moving towards bad interaction.

To the other objection, it must be said that there were two things in circumcision: because there was a sign, and a remedy for original sin: and from both together, it was necessary to determine its place, namely, in the place of the propagation of original sin, as the Master will say below: but on the forehead or another place, it would not have signified in this way.

To the other objection, it must be said that sanctification does not pertain to circumcision except indirectly, as will be evident in the following question: and therefore it is not explicitly placed in the definition, but implicitly in what is said, distinguishing, it is implied.

Articulus 18 — Whether Circumcision Also Impressed A Character

Does circumcision also imprint a character?

Next, the question arises concerning what is stated there, F, near the beginning: Since circumcision was instituted among the people of God, which was then the sign of the righteousness of faith, etc.

From this, it seems that:

1. Circumcision imprinted a character because a character is the same as a sign.
2. Furthermore, there are other reasons: because the non-repetition of imprinting a character accompanies all sacraments, as is proven by induction: however, circumcision was not repeated: therefore, it imprinted a character.
3. Furthermore, an internal distinction should correspond to an external distinction, of which the external is the cause: therefore, since circumcision is an external distinction, it seems that some internal distinction should correspond to it.
4. Furthermore, that sacrament effects what it signifies; however, suppose that someone fictitiously received it, it is clear that once the fiction is removed, it begins to be valid for him: therefore, it is necessary that something is placed in him in which the sacrament remains, as we do in baptism: but this can only be a character: therefore, it seems to have imprinted a character.

ON THE CONTRARY:

1. The most perfect sacraments imprint a character: but circumcision is an imperfect sacrament, as is evident, because it was changed into baptism: therefore, it did not imprint a character.
2. Furthermore, suppose it imprinted a character on someone, and he was later baptized, it is clear that he would receive the character again: therefore, he would have two: and since both are of faith, because baptism (as Augustine says) is the sacrament of faith, and circumcision (as the Apostle says) is the sign of faith: therefore, there would be two characters of the same species in one person, which cannot be: therefore, it did not imprint a character.
3. Furthermore, a character is configuring to the Trinity: and this is suitable for both males and females: but circumcision was only for males: therefore, circumcision did not imprint a character.

Solution. It must be said that circumcision did not imprint a character: because a character is a spiritual configuration of the created trinity, which is in the image of the uncreated Trinity.

To the first, it must be said that it was a bodily sign, and not a spiritual one: namely, in that it signifies the diminution of concupiscence from the part of the body, besides the fact that it would imprint a sign on the soul.

To the second, it must be said that that proposition is true of the sacraments of the new law, which can in no way be repeated: but it is not true of those which are not repeated on the same matter, although they are repeated on another, such as penance, anointing, and marriage, and the Eucharist: but circumcision was not repeated, because it signified that which is not to be repeated, namely baptism. Or it is better to say that it was not repeated because it was against the disease of original sin, which is not repeated, and not because of the impression of a character.

To the third, it must be said that it does not follow that an external distinction is in vain unless it is given as a cause to an effect: and this is false: because it has another act with respect to which it is not in vain, but useful.

To the fourth, that once the fiction is removed, circumcision begins to be valid, it must be said that it is not because grace is contained as in a vessel in some character: but rather because the Holy Spirit does not find an obstacle that prevents grace, and what was to be done bodily has been fulfilled: and therefore it is not required to be repeated: just as in other bodily actions, which someone is obliged to, if they perform them fictitiously, it is not necessary to do them again. For if I vowed to give a hundred pounds to the poor, if I give them while in mortal sin, and later repent, it is not enjoined upon me to give again: because although the giving passes, nevertheless the loss remains, and yet it can later be valid for me according to approval. So I also say about circumcision: because it was also a bodily sign, if some proselyte received it fictitiously, it was not necessary for him to be circumcised again when not fictitious.

If perhaps it is objected that someone circumcised is recognizable from someone uncircumcised by the sight of an angel or spiritual eye: and this cannot be unless there is some sign in the soul, just as also by the character the soul of the baptized is recognized from the soul of the unbaptized. It must be said that that mark is not a character: because thus even the mark of mortal sin would be a character: but it is only called a character when it is a configuration of the image to the uncreated Trinity, and this is not in circumcision.

Articulus 19 — Whether Circumcision Justified

Did circumcision justify?

Next, the question is raised about what is stated there, F, near the beginning: "It was effective for the purification of both the great and the small from original and old sin," etc.

From this, it is inferred that it justified, which also seems to be the case for another reason: because

1. At least against the disease into which it was necessary to fall, not by will but by corrupted nature, it was necessary to have a remedy, especially for the little ones, of whom innumerable would otherwise have been damned: but this remedy was nothing other than circumcision: therefore, circumcision was effective against original sin, as it seems.
2. Likewise, circumcision was not from the law, but from the fathers, and it was given as a sign of the righteousness of Abraham the just: but to others, it was given as a cause of justification, as it is said here in the text: therefore, it was effective against original sin.
3. Likewise, nothing remits sin unless it confers grace: but circumcision, as is evident in the text, remitted sin: therefore, it conferred grace.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

1. The disease was never interrupted: therefore, if circumcision was instituted substantially against the disease, circumcision should not have been interrupted: but it was interrupted for forty years: therefore, it seems that since no other remedy was instituted at that time, it was not a substantial medicine against the disease.
2. Likewise, the disease is universal in males and females: therefore, if the medicine is substantially ordered against the disease, it should have been universal: but it was given only to males: therefore, it was not universal.
3. Likewise, in a sacrament, there are two things, namely the sign and the cause: and causality does not extend beyond the nature of the sign: therefore, any sacrament causes as much grace as it signifies of it: but circumcision conferred nothing, but removed: therefore, it did not cause the bestowal of any good, but only the removal of evil.

4. Likewise, in evil, there are two things, namely guilt and punishment: but if guilt is removed, it is removed entirely: but circumcision only removes a part: therefore, it does not signify the removal of guilt, which is removed entirely: therefore, it does not cause it, since causality does not extend beyond the nature of signifying.

therefore it seems that circumcision caused only the remission of that penalty which is remitted in part, and not in whole: and this is the proneness of concupiscence, and not the guilt of the lack of the vision [of God]: therefore it caused only the diminution of the fomes [tinder of sin], as it seems.

SOLUTION. It must be said that sin was remitted in circumcision: but circumcision operated the destruction [i.e., removal] of sin a posteriori. For example, in sin there are three things connected to each other, namely guilt, the lack of the vision of God, and the kindling of the fomes: and if something ought directly to delete sin, it must have primary causality toward the deletion of guilt: and because the other two are connected to it, therefore the penalty of the lack of vision is remitted posteriorly in whole, and the kindling of the fomes in part. And thus baptism operates: because by its power grace washes away the stains of guilt first, and posteriorly the adjoined penalties also fall away. But circumcision, as the last objection proves, posits causality against the kindling of the fomes, and therefore it begins to delete sin a posteriori: for it remits the kindling of the fomes: and because that cannot be diminished unless the guilt [reatus] ceases in whole, therefore that [guilt] is remitted in whole: but because that is connected to guilt, therefore guilt is also remitted. And this is what some of the ancients wrote, that circumcision of itself operates the diminution of penalty: but the virtue of faith in it operated the remission of guilt: and thus are understood the first reasons which prove that it was a remedy for original [sin].

To the first, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it was indeed ordained against the disease, but not substantially: and therefore for some cause (which was stated above) it could be intermitted.

To the next it must be said that although the disease was universal, nevertheless propagation is in one [the male], and in the other only passively: and therefore the remedy had to be placed in the former. And this will be more evident below.

To the next I readily concede, namely, that circumcision began to delete sin from the posterior part and not directly.

Articulus 20 — What Is Meant By The Bosom Of Abraham; And, Whether Little Ones Dying Are In Any Misery

What is called the bosom of Abraham? and, Are infants dying [without baptism] in any misery?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, F, toward the end: However, in the bosom of Abraham after death, consoled with a blessed rest, etc.

For what is here called the bosom of Abraham? If perhaps you should say according to Jerome, that the rest of the good fathers is called the bosom of Abraham: this does not seem right, because

§ 1. That rest is in heaven in which the fathers were not before the advent of Christ.

§ 2. Next, If you should say according to some, that the bosom is called a protection from interior and exterior misery: again it does not seem fitting: since misery is not removed, except by its contrary, which is beatitude: and the fathers at that time were not blessed [beati], since they were not enjoying the vision of God.

§ 3. Furthermore, If you were to say that it is called protection from not being burned by fire, and not being harmed by the worm of conscience: this again does not seem fitting: because even children dying before baptism (as it is believed) are not burned by fire, nor are they gnawed by the worm of conscience, since they bring with them no personal offense, concerning which alone is there a worm: therefore it seems that this bosom could not be spoken of in this way.

§ 4. Furthermore, It seems that this bosom was not in hell: because, in Luke 16:23, it is said that the rich man, lifting up his eyes, when he was in torments, saw Abraham from afar, and Lazarus in his bosom: therefore the bosom was far above hell: therefore not in hell.

But to the contrary: this is what Christ did in death when He descended to Limbo: and this was to descend to hell: therefore this Limbo and bosom is in hell.

Next it is asked, Why is it called the bosom of Abraham rather than of Adam, or Abel, or another: since from Adam all who have multiplied descended, and from Abel the Church began, as Augustine says.

SOLUTION. It must be said that the bosom is spoken of properly, and commonly. Commonly it is the rest of the blessed fathers, as the Gloss on Luke 16:23 says. Properly, however, it is called a place on the border [ora] of hell sequestered for the habitation of the elect, because before the advent of Christ the dead, in happy hope of redemption, were awaiting the price. Hence it is also called Limbo. A limbus is the hem [border] of a garment, just as that place was on the border of hell. And through this the solution to the first is evident.

To the second it must be said that protection is spoken of from the one actually punishing, and therefore it is called [protection from] misery: for protection from all indigence is not what is called this here: because this was not except through beatitude.

To the next it must be said that misery is in children, namely the despair of the vision of God: and therefore they are not protected from all misery: nevertheless I readily concede that children do not have the fire nor the worm.

To the next it must be said that this place is higher up on the border of hell, and far from the hell of the damned, by place, and by difference of mansion: because according to spatial distance hell is far below, and according to the difference of habitation in hell there is eternal afflicting penalty, and dense darkness, and the worm of conscience: nothing of which was in the Limbo of the fathers, because they had some light on account of the faith and hope which they had.

To the last it must be said that it is called the bosom of Abraham on account of three things: one of which is that he obeyed to go out from the idolaters and his homeland: and therefore he merited to be a father in the homeland. The second is because he was the first to receive the blessing of the blessed seed. The third is because he is the Father of believers in circumcision, and of believers in uncircumcision: and in both he had seed through Ishmael and Isaac.

Articulus 21 — Why Women Were Not Circumcised

Why were women not circumcised?

Next it is asked concerning what is said: But it is asked concerning the men who were before circumcision, and concerning the women, etc.

And there is a doubt, § 1. Why were women not circumcised, since they had original [sin], just as males did?

§ 2. Next, Why was circumcision in males made circular, and not the cutting off of a certain portion?

§ 3. Next, Why was it done on the member of generation rather than in another place?

§ 4. Next, Since in Genesis 17:11 it is said: You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, it seems that this was never fulfilled: because Ambrose says that the flesh of the foreskin is said to be that flesh of the member which is before the cartilaginous sinews: and that was not cut off, but the skin.

§ 5. Next, If that cutting off was done for the tempering of the heat of concupiscence: then it seems that the incision should have been made in the flesh: because sensation and delight flourish more in it than in the skin.

§ 6. Next, It is nothing what some seem to say as to why women were not circumcised: namely because that in which libido is condemned in women is inside: because in men that in which libido is condemned is not cut off: for this, as physical discourses say, is not the skin, but the flesh at the head of the member: but the skin in a woman could be cut off just as in a man.

SOLUTION. It must be said that it was not done to women for three causes: one of which is because our nature is not corrupted in the woman, because in her it was not total, but rather in Adam: and therefore in the sons similar to him it was fitting for the remedy to be placed. The second cause is that the man is the principal in generation, and in the seed of the man is the formative power, and the seed of the woman is like formed and patient matter: and therefore the Doctors also say, that if Adam had not sinned, but only the woman, original [sin] would not have been transfused into us regarding guilt, but regarding the penalty which is called the passibility of nature, not the vice: and therefore it was fitting again that the mark of obedience to the mandate of circumcision be placed in Adam. The third cause is so that the imperfection of the sacrament might be shown, and another more general and better one might be expected: and I think that this cause is better.

To the next it must be said that it was made circular: so that the circle of sin might be noted: because that (as the Apostle says) was first in the person in the first parents, and then the serpent like a cancer corrupted nature in them, and from that [corrupted] nature in children, and the corrupted nature in children corrupts the person of the children: and thus the circle is concluded from person to person. Or thus: because the soul corrupted the flesh in the parents, and the flesh [corrupted] the sown flesh in the children, and the flesh [corrupted] the soul infused into them: and thus again the circle of the first curse is concluded. To the next it must be said, as the Master says in the Letter: because disobedience was first perceived in that concupiscence of its own libido was corrupted and infected in that place.

To the next it must be said that that cutting off is dangerous, and against the good of offspring in matrimony: but the incision is made in the skin covering that flesh, so that it may be noted that the same flesh ought to be cooled from the heat.

To the next it must be said that women were not circumcised for the reason stated above.

Articulus 22 — Whether All Were Bound To Circumcision

Were all bound to circumcision?

Next it is asked concerning what is said, there, H, Here it must be said, in what circumcision was instituted, etc.

For it seems that all were bound to circumcision: because in all libido was condemned.

Next, Genesis 17:12, it says: whether homeborn, or bought : and no one is excepted: therefore the generation of Rachel is obligated to this, and the generation of Esau.

But against this is what the Gloss of Ambrose says on the Epistle to the Romans 4:13 We cannot say that the peoples of the nations are bound to circumcision, unless they were nourished in the house of the Patriarchs, or bought for a price.

And briefly it is asked, Who were obligated by the mandate of circumcision, and who were not, and by what reason were they obligated?

SOLUTION. It must be said that the reason for circumcision was the diminution of concupiscence in those who pertained to the blessed and promised seed: but they pertained in two ways, namely in receiving the inheritance, and as those through whom the seed would descend: and therefore no others were obligated, as Ambrose says, except those only: but the household was obligated as long as it had a relation through its lords to the service and use of the inheritance, that is, as long as they were in the house of him who was the true heir: and therefore Ishmael and Esau and others, when they were separated from the right of inheritance, and the hope of the promised seed, straightaway as the cause of circumcision ceased in them, they were absolved from the mandate of circumcision, and were no longer bound. And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 23 — Whether The Three Causes Of Circumcision Touched Upon By The Master Are Well Assigned

Are the three causes of circumcision touched upon by the Master well assigned?

Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, H, around the middle: But circumcision was given for multiple causes, etc.

For he touches upon three causes here, namely the proving of Abraham's obedience, and a sign of the great faith of Abraham, and the distinguishing of the people from whom Christ willed to be born. To these three are added two in the Gloss on the Epistle to the Romans 4 , namely so that it might indicate chastity of mind and body, and so that it might be a figure of baptism.

And it is asked, According to what are these causes taken?

§ 1. Next, It is asked concerning the first: because Adam was tempted in one indifferent matter: but Abraham in two: one sacrificial, so to speak, and the other sacramental, and both very penal. And it is asked, why this?

§ 2. Next, Concerning the second: because the sign and the signified ought to have some similitude: but circumcision seems to have no similitude. § 3. Next, Against the third: because circumcision is a figure of baptism: and baptism distinguishes no one, but unites all: therefore neither should circumcision have distinguished anyone.

§ 4. Next, Against the fourth: because the human race had failed in other virtues, just as also in chastity: therefore it seems that it ought to have received a sign availing for those, just as it received [one availing] for chastity.

Next, It was a sign of faith, as the second cause says: therefore it was taken rather to indicate faith, than to indicate chastity.

§ 5. Next, Against the fifth: because it does not seem to have a similitude with baptism, neither in matter, nor in form: therefore it was not a sign of it.

SOLUTION. To the first it must be said that these causes are partly taken from the side of the one receiving it first, and partly from the reason of circumcision.

From the side of the receiver in three ways, according to the fact that three things are required for attaining the promised seed. One from the side of life which makes worthy by way of congruity, and this is obedience. Another from the side of the promised thing, and this requires faith: and these are the first two. The third is from the side of suitability for the carnal descent of the blessed seed: and this is chastity, and this is the fourth cause.

But from the reason of circumcision two are taken, because from that part by which it is a sign, the matter is taken: so that that people might be distinguished by a carnal mark, and this is the third. But from the side of the effect the fifth is taken: because through the effect it signified baptism.

It must be said therefore to the first, that Adam was tempted according to the mode of his state, in that in which great obedience was commendable: and only in one thing, because he did not yet need many, but only that he might receive an experiment of his obedience, in an indifferent matter. But Abraham was tempted as a man needing liberation and a liberator: and therefore in difficult matters: and the temptation regarding the immolation of his son prefigured the need for a liberator, while the temptation regarding circumcision [prefigured] the liberation.

To the next it must be said that circumcision is a sign of faith, not as to any article whatsoever, but, as Augustine says, because he believed that he would have a son in whom the blessing of all would be made: and as to this through the place of generation it posits a similitude to the thing believed.

To the next it must be said that it is a figure of baptism, just as the imperfect of that which is perfect, and just as a particular of that which is universal: and therefore it distinguishes, although baptism distinguishes nothing.

To the next it must be said that although the human race had failed in other things, nevertheless as to the generation of the seed a reparation was chiefly required in faith that it might be cured, and in chastity that it might be fittingly received.

To the last it must be said that it has an agreement in effect with baptism, and as to this it figures it.

Other things which are to be asked, the Master well determines in the Letter, except this alone, which the Hebrews relate, that none but the principal circumcisions were made with stone knives, namely [that] of the sons of Moses when the people of the children of Israel were to be led out at the hill of foreskins into the land of promise: because this signified the state of resurrection, when by the rock Christ all corruption would be circumcised from the elect.

DISTINCTIO II

Divisio Textus

Now let us approach the sacraments of the new law, etc.

Here begins the treatise in particular. And it is divided into seven according to the seven sacraments: and the places of inception of each part are manifest enough.

This treatise which is about Baptism, is divided into two parts: in the first of which the Master treats of the baptism of Christ: and this begins in the following distinction, namely the third, there, A, After these things it must be seen what baptism is, etc.

This distinction is again divided into two parts: in the first of which he touches briefly upon the number of sacraments and the time of inception and institution. In the second, however, he posits a brief treatise on the baptism of John, there, D, But now let us see concerning the sacrament of baptism, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether Sacraments Ought To Be Ordained Against All Punishments; And, What Their Division Is

Ought sacraments to be ordained against all penalties? and, What is their division?

Concerning the first note, that besides the divisions which we posited above according to the division of sign and cause, others indeed make other divisions. And therefore we may object thus:

§ 1. Above it was supposed from the Letter, that a sacrament is ordained against sin: because Luke proved this through the parable of the wounded man who fell among robbers: but since there are certain defects into which man falls from sin, it seems that we ought to have sacraments against those. Now there are four, as Gregory and Bede say, namely ignorance of what is to be done, weakness in doing it, concupiscence for harmful things, and malice against good things. But we have no sacrament against ignorance, and none against malice as such.

§ 2. Next, Even in the works of mercy there is a septenary against the defects into which we fall. One septenary indeed on the part of the body, which is noted in the verse:

I visit, give drink, feed, give a roof, gather, bury. For six are expressed here in words: but the first is taken in a twofold signification: in the visitation of the sick, and for the visitation of captives.

If perhaps you should say that these defects are corporeal, and sacramental grace is not ordained against them: then there is the question concerning the seven spiritual ones which are noted in another verse:

Instruct, chastise, console, forgive, bear with, pray. These also are expressed in six words: but to chastise is taken for the public reproof of delinquents, and the occult admonition of delinquents. Thus indeed these all seem to be spiritual. Therefore it seems that we ought to have remedies against them, or the number of sacraments will be diminished.

SOLUTION. Here we will assign the congruences of the Doctors, and there are three.

For some wish to take the number of sacraments according to the number of virtues: so that Baptism is the sacrament of faith: Extreme Unction of hope, because he who is anointed hopes for the state of resurrection: but the Eucharist is the sacrament of charity: Confirmation, however, of fortitude, on account of the battle for which he is confirmed: Penance, however, of justice, on account of satisfaction: and order of prudence, on account of the keys of science which are conferred upon the ordained: and Matrimony of temperance, by the fact that libido in that sacrament is honorably received by nuptials.

Others wish to ordain them against the seven capital vices thus: that baptism is against pride, by the fact that man humbles himself there under a more common element: but the Eucharist against envy, because envy is contrary to charity, on account of this that envy grieves over what charity rejoices in: confirmation against acedia, by which man is confirmed so that he may be strong in spiritual labors, in which one is saddened, and thus is called acedious: extreme unction against anger, because anger proceeds from a swelling whose mit-igant is oil: order is against avarice, because the Levites, content with God alone, had no portion among their brethren, just as also clerics when they receive the crown or first tonsure, say through the mouth of the Bishop: The Lord is the portion of my inheritance, etc. Penance operates against gluttony through the affliction of the flesh and abstinence: and matrimony against lust, by receiving base concupiscence with the honesty of nuptials.

Others wish to take them according to the states of contemplatives and actives in the Church thus: The state of actives is of those entering, and fighting, and healing wounds, having over them a leader and aid, whence falling soldiers may be restored, and there are departing veterans. But the state of contemplatives is in the taste of divine things. They say therefore, that baptism is of those entering, confirmation is of those proceeding to battle, but penance is of those healing their wounds, and in the place of a leader is order or the ordained, the departing and veterans are anointed, and their number is restored through matrimony, but the Eucharist is of contemplatives tasting, or even of entering actives on account of the fact that it is a viaticum [provision for the journey].

We say therefore to the first, that those penalties of sin which are not directly ordained into sin, but rather are promotive of good, do not have sacraments ordained against them, such as hunger, thirst, and the like. And through this the solution to the second number of defects is evident. But the other spiritual penalties which are effects: either they have from elsewhere a medicine more substantial to them, as ignorance of what is to be done which is provided for through doctrine: or they are reduced to these against which there are sacraments, just as weakness in doing things is cured in confirmation, but concupiscence chiefly in matrimony: but malice does not state a special defect, but an inclinability into evil, and that is cured not in one but in multiple sacraments, by the fact that it is a general defect more easily inclinable into evil than into good. And through this the solution to that which is objected concerning the first division of penalties or defects is evident.

To the last it must be said that all these defects except one are reduced to penance: because all those consist in the actual sin of another man, who is our neighbor by nature: but that one is the defect of ignorance, which has a more substantial cause, as much through exterior doctrine as through a sacrament: and therefore sacramental graces are not multiplied according to them, but rather the modes of the virtue of mercy, which we cannot have without aiding others who need ours.

Articulus 2 — Why The Sacraments Were Not Instituted Immediately After The Fall Of Man

Why were the sacraments not instituted soon after the fall of man?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, B, But if it is asked, Why were these sacraments not instituted soon after the fall of man, etc.

It seems that they ought to have been immediately: because § 1. A disease is more easily cured at the beginning than at the end: therefore a wise physician ought rather to have applied the medicine from the beginning.

§ 2. Next, The solution which is posited in the Letter, that man had to be convinced of the natural and written law, is not valid: because a disease long continued in a subject turns into a stupor, as Bernard says in the first book to Pope Eugene therefore it seems that the longer he waited, the less man recognized his disease: and thus the cause which is assigned in the Letter is nothing.

§ 3. Next, Hugh says, that as soon as there is a disease, so soon is it the time for medicine: but the disease was from the beginning from which Adam sinned: therefore from then it was the time for exhibiting sacraments as medicine.

§ 4. Next, The cause he touches upon seems to be nothing, that sacraments having their power from the Passion of Christ ought not to have been instituted before the advent of Christ: because even the ancients were saved by virtue of the Passion in faith of the one to come, as was held in the third book of the Sentences: therefore in the same way the Passion to be handed down, although not completed in work, could operate in the sacraments of the old law and of the natural law.

Further it is asked, Why did the fathers have certain sacraments in the law of nature, and of Moses, just as we do: but certain ones according to a part, and not according to the whole: and certain ones in figure only: and certain ones neither in whole, nor in part, nor in any determinate figure? For example, they had matrimony in whole: penance in part, because they were contrite just as we are, but they did not confess just as we do: but they had order and the Eucharist in figure: but confirmation and extreme unction they seem to have had in nothing: for it cannot be said that in the three unctions of David a threefold unction is signified, but rather none: because he was not anointed with the unction of Levites, nor the unction of fighters, nor the unction of the dying or sick: therefore it is evident that it figured none of these.

Furthermore, the unctions of David were singular: but two of these, namely confirmation, and extreme unction, are universal: therefore they were not signified in that, nor in any other royal unction, as it seems.

Next, It is asked concerning this which some say here, that not only was matrimony instituted before the sin, as the Master says in the Letter in this word, when he said: On whatever day you shall eat of it, you shall die the death: which certain Saints expound of the death of penance. For it seems not to be fitting: because penance is the direct medicine of actual sin: therefore it ought not to have been instituted before sin.

Next, If the Lord understood this so that He might institute a time of penance there for man who was about to fall, lest he perish totally, just as the Angel fell once, and is damned, why did He not say openly: If you shall eat, I will give you a space of penance in another place than in this one: which place will be of mourning, and of death, and of labor?

SOLUTION. It must be said that from the beginning of the disease it was the time for medicine, either in signifying it, or in causing it: for it was otherwise concerning a disease of the mind, and a disease of the body: because a man must pre-recognize that he is sick, and the destitution of the aid which he believes he has from himself: and he must recognize the power of the physician, and the mode of the medicine. And this is because the cure of the mind depends on our consent and devotion: but it is not so concerning a disease of the body: and therefore a disease of the mind demands a long delay beforehand: for it is not recognized through experience, since it is in the sweet delectables of concupiscence, but rather it is investigated by reason, with divine illumination elevating it to this.

And through this the solution to the first three is evident.

To the next it must be said that the sacraments of Christ did not have power before the Passion: but the Passion had power in faith: and this is not the power of the sacraments of the new law. For the power of these sacraments is in containing, and giving immediately: but to those fathers the whole was promised in the future: and therefore they could not exist before the Passion which actually paid the price of redemption.

To the next it must be said that I do not say that the ancients had the total effect of matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament before the Passion: because I think that it confers grace, namely the sacrament ordained under the keys of the Church, and celebrated in the faith of the two natures united in Christ. But this is true, that it had the integrity of its goods in antiquity. And then we will say that this happens on account of the generality of that material defect, which is repaired by a corporeal act. But in others an act of spiritual grace operates against the defect: and then either it is a sacrament of the fullest grace as to state, or not. And if it is of the fullest grace as to state: then they had it in no way, just as in confirmation, which gives the Holy Spirit for strength: and extreme unction, in which is signified the full purity of body and soul through the removal of all things impeding the glory of both parts of man. Now I say of the fullest grace as to state: because some are of full grace as to state, as the two said sacraments: but some as to effect, such as baptism: some as to the dignity of the thing contained and signified, as the Eucharist: and some as to the degree of prelacy, as order. And through this the solutionis evident to almost everything except the last. For the ancients had penance in part, and in part they did not have it, on account of the personal sin against which penance is ordained. And it is necessary that each person satisfy for himself interiorly and exteriorly if he is able. But because they did not have the power of the keys, and penance in confession presents itself to the keys, they did not have confession except in figure: but the other sacraments they had in figure.

To the last it must be said that penance either was not instituted in the state of innocence: or if this is found, then it was as a purgative medicine, and then it ought not to have been openly signified: lest from the foreknowledge of the fall despair should distress those who had not yet sinned: because if God had predicted it openly, they would have conceived some estimation of their future state: and this is shown to be impossible in the second book of the Sentences.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Baptism Of John Conferred Grace

Did the baptism of John confer grace?

Next it is asked concerning what he says: But now let us see concerning the sacrament of baptism, etc.

For there he touches upon the baptism of John, determining four things concerning it in order in the Letter, namely whether it had an effect? And, why is it called the baptism of John? And, Whether it is a sacrament? And, Whether those who were baptized by him were to be rebaptized?

Now a question arises concerning the first, Whether the baptism of John conferred grace or not?

It seems, moreover, that it did not.

§ 1. For whatever was before the Passion from which all sacraments draw their power, this did not confer grace, as was held in the preceding chapter: but the baptism of John was before the Passion: therefore it did not confer grace.

§ 2. Also, it is so in charity, that that which introduces it, does not give charity or sanctifying grace, like servile fear: therefore, naturally, that which is the introduction of baptism, ought not to give the grace of baptism: but this is the baptism of John: therefore it did not confer grace.

§ 3. Also, if it had conferred grace, by the same reasoning it would have imprinted a character: therefore those later baptized with the baptism of Christ would have had two characters, which is impossible.

§ 1. When the shadow ceased, grace ought immediately to have come: but the Law and the Prophets were until John therefore in the baptism of John grace ought to have come: therefore it conferred grace.

§ 2. Also, it is established that it was not a sacrament of the Old Law: therefore of the New: therefore it effected what it figured: therefore it conferred grace.

§ 3. Also, the baptism of John was closer to the baptism of Christ than circumcision was: because it was a middle between the baptism of Christ and circumcision: therefore it seems that it conferred a fuller grace than circumcision: but circumcision in some way conferred grace, as was held before: therefore much more so the baptism of John.

§ 4. Also, John was sent to prepare a perfect people for the Lord but the people could not be perfect unless his baptism conferred grace: therefore it conferred grace.

§ 5. Also, the baptism of John is after the Law: therefore it adds something over and above the sacraments of the Law: but those signified grace: since therefore the nearest step after acknowledgment is healing, it seems that the baptism of John healed.

Solutio. It must be said that the baptism of John conferred no grace, as all the Saints commonly say.

To that, however, which is objected [in § 1], it must be said that the shadow did not cease before the Passion, as will be said in the following distinction: but it began to decline in the baptism of John: and therefore it is said that the Law and the Prophets were until John: just as a fever is said to cease when it is in decline, and a shadow to cease when it is in decline.

To the next it must be said that it was not properly a sacrament, as will be clear below: but it was a middle between the sacraments of the New Law and the Old, and therefore it agreed with both: with the latter in not conferring grace, but with the former in act and matter.

To the next it must be said that it was closer to the baptism of Christ in a certain respect, and farther in another respect than circumcision: for in respect to act and matter it was closer, but in respect to effect it was farther: and therefore it is posited as a middle only in the order of signifying, not of causing.

To the next it must be said that the perfection which John brought about was a perfection of doctrine, not of grace. Hence it is said in John 1:8: He was not the light, but was to give testimony of the light. Now, testimony pertains to doctrine, and not to grace.

To the last it must be said that it was after the signification of circumcision: and it does not follow that if it added to the ratio of a sign, it added causality, because a sign compared to a sign of the same thing is more explicit: and it added that explicitness: and therefore it does not follow that it conferred grace.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Baptism Of John Was Unto Penance, And Not Unto The Remission Of Sins

Whether the baptism of John was unto penance, and not unto the remission of sins?

Whether the baptism of John was unto penance, and not unto the remission of sins?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there in D, around the middle: The baptism of John was unto penance, not unto remission, etc.

§ 1. It seems that penance was rather unto baptism, than conversely: because first he taught to repent, and afterward he baptized: therefore penance was rather unto baptism, than conversely.

§ 2. Also, it seems to have been a baptism unto baptism: because it was ordered to the baptism of Christ: therefore it was unto baptism, and not unto penance.

§ 3. Also, if it was unto penance, then it seems that it was an occasion of error: because baptism does not require groaning and mourning: therefore if the baptism of John was unto penance, this seems to be a teaching in a sign that baptism requires groaning and mourning: therefore it was an occasion of error, as it seems.

Solutio. It must be said that the baptism of John is said to be unto penance which was prerequired, lest the baptism of Christ should find those being baptized by it to be feigned: and therefore penance followed the baptism of John in the order of intention, although perhaps it preceded it in time.

To the next it must be said that it is not said to be a baptism unto baptism unless it is determined: because otherwise it would be taken for the same baptism, and then it would be the same thing: but because it immediately ordered to the penance which removed the obstacle of feigning for the baptism of Christ, it is therefore said to be unto penance.

To the next it must be said that the baptism of Christ does not require exterior groaning and mourning: but nevertheless, as Augustine says, everyone who is established as the arbiter of his own will cannot begin a new life unless he repents of his old life: and therefore it requires interior groaning and mourning, lest those who are to be baptized be found feigned.

Articulus 5 — Why It Is Called The Baptism Of John

Why is it called the baptism of John?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there in E, § 2: But it is asked, why was it called the baptism of John, etc.

§ 1. For it seems that by the same reasoning one should speak of the baptism of Paul: since Paul also baptized.

§ 2. Also, this seems to be taken from what is said, 1 Cor 1:12: I indeed am of Paul; and I am of Apollo; and I of Cephas: therefore he was glorying in the baptism of Paul: therefore anyone's baptism was called his own.

§ 3. Also, it is called the Gospel of Paul which Paul preached, and of Peter which Peter preached: therefore by a similar reasoning the baptism with which Paul baptized will be called the baptism of Paul, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, if perhaps you say that the disciples baptized in the name of Christ: and baptism, as Augustine says, is given in his name: therefore it seems that it should not be called the baptism of John, but of Christ: because he himself baptized (as it is said) in the name of the one to come, and the one to come was Christ.

Solutio. It must be said that it is called the baptism of John because there was nothing in it except the operation of John, as Augustine says in the text: but it was not so in the baptism of the disciples, in which the whole principal operation belonged to Christ, namely the interior operation or baptism. For since there are two operations in baptism, exterior and interior: the interior is more principal, and the exterior is various: and therefore it is called the baptism of him who operates by the more principal operation. However, because this is lacking in the baptism of John, it is therefore called nothing other than the baptism of John.

To the first and second, therefore, it must be said that that contention was reprehensible, and was corrected by the Apostle: hence he said: Is Christ divided? or, Was Paul crucified for you? As if he were to say: You, by your contention, dismiss Christ, as if baptism were divided according to the merits of the baptizers: which is not true, since Christ crucified baptizes in every baptism of the baptizers.

To the next it must be said that the Gospel and baptism are not similar: because the former does not have its power from the work worked [ex re operata] immediately from the Passion of Christ: but the word of preaching is often hindered or promoted by the good or bad merits of the preachers: therefore that act is said to belong to the one exercising it in ministry: but it is not so said in baptizing.

To the next it must be said that John did not baptize in the name of Christ as in the form of the one baptizing: but rather as in the name of him unto whom he directed those baptized by himself. The Apostles, however, baptized in the name of Christ or the Trinity as in the form of the one baptizing.

If, indeed, you object that this is against the text in which it is said that this was his form, because he baptized in the name of the one to come. I answer that it was not a form in which there was an invocation for the sanctification of the baptism, but rather a form, that is, a mode in baptizing: because, namely, he named the one to come, and admonished the people to believe in him: nevertheless no sanctification of baptism was conferred from this by him upon another.

Articulus 7 — Whether Those Baptized By John Ought To Have Been Rebaptized

Were those baptized by John to be rebaptized?

§ 10. Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, at F: Here it is to be considered whether those baptized by John were baptized again, etc.

§ 11. For it seems that John baptized some who were not to be baptized [again]: because § 12. 1. It is said in the text that if someone was baptized by John, not placing his hope in his baptism, but having faith in the Trinity, that he was not rebaptized: therefore not all were to be baptized again.

§ 13. 2. Also, in Acts 8:15 and following, it is said that Peter and John prayed for them, namely the converts in Samaria, that they might receive the Holy Spirit: for he had not yet come upon any of them, but they were only baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. Then they laid their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Spirit.[332] Therefore it seems that by the imposition of hands alone what was lacking to them was supplied, and they were not to be baptized again.

§ 14. 3. Also, let us suppose that someone was baptized only with the baptism of John, and has the faith of the whole Trinity: will we dare to say that he is baptized on account of the faith which he has? It seems not: because then the expressed form of words which is required in baptism would be nothing: therefore it seems that such persons were to be baptized.

§ 15. 4. Also, no baptism confers grace in which the hope of grace cannot be had, just as hope is had in a sacrament: therefore it is a meaningless statement, as it seems, that those who did not place hope in his baptism obtained grace in it, while those who placed hope do not obtain it.

§ 16. 5. Also, although it is said below that the word which makes baptism to be a sacrament is the invocation of the Trinity: not because it is spoken, but because it is believed: nevertheless the three persons must be expressed, whether it is believed or not: therefore it seems that our hope or faith does not confer upon baptism any form of sanctification: therefore, whether they placed hope [in it] or not, those who were baptized with the baptism of John were always to be baptized [again].

§ 18. Solution. On this question some strive to introduce opinions, as if it were permitted for anyone to opine that without the form of a sacrament there could be a sacrament from our faith or from our hope.

§ 19. Whence it must be said that without a doubt grace was never conferred in the baptism of John, as all the Saints say in common: just as he himself also said, John 1:26: I baptize in water, etc.

§ 20. To that, therefore, which is said in the text, it can be answered thus: that one baptized by John not placing hope [in it], and for this very reason seeking another baptism, as of the disciples of Christ after the Passion, was not baptized [again].

§ 21. But as to what is objected concerning the Acts, it is not compelling: because there it speaks of what belongs to confirmation, not baptism. For confirmation supplies the defect of baptism, as Augustine seems to intimate: not in the being of the sacrament, because baptism is a perfect sacrament, but rather in this, that baptism diminishes the fomes [of sin], and does not extinguish it: but confirmation further weakens it. And this is clear in Acts 19:2, where those baptized by John are found not having knowledge of the Holy Spirit in hearing the form of baptism: and therefore they were baptized.

§ 22. But to the other I well concede, that faith and hope do not give the being of baptism, but only remove fiction [i.e., insincerity], so that baptism can obtain the effect of justification in us.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Baptism Of John Was A Sacrament

Was the baptism of John a sacrament?

§ 5. Next, it is inquired concerning what he says, there, at E, § 3: But if it is asked whether it was a sacrament, etc.

§ 6. For it seems to have been a sacrament: because it was a sign of a sacred thing: therefore it was a sacrament.

§ 7. But against this seems to be that divine institution is required for every sacrament. But the baptism of John was not instituted by God: therefore it was not a sacrament.

§ 8. Solution. It is easy to answer this according to what has been said before. For it should be said that it is rather a continuation of the new sacraments to the old: but nevertheless, on account of its likeness to the sacraments in the character of signifying, it receives the name of a sacrament.

§ 9. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it can be said that it was not without divine institution: for thus it is said, John 1:33: He who sent me to baptize in water, said to me: He upon whom you shall see the Spirit descending, and remaining upon him, he it is that baptizes in the Holy Spirit.

DISTINCTIO III

Divisio Textus

§ 23. After these things it remains to be seen what baptism is, etc. Here the Master approaches the subject of baptism.

§ 24. And this treatise is divided into three parts: in the first of which he treats of the substantials of baptism. In the second, however, he treats of baptism on the part of the recipient: and this begins in the following distinction, namely the fourth, there, at A, Here it is to be said that some receive the sacrament, etc. In the third, he treats of baptism on the part of the giver or baptizer: and this begins in the fifth distinction, there, at A, After these things it is to be known that the sacrament of baptism is given by good and by evil ministers, etc.

§ 25. In the first of these, five things are determined concerning baptism: the first of which is, what baptism is, and what its form is: because these pertain to the same thing: because the definition is given according to the form. Secondly, he treats of its institution, there, at F, Concerning the institution of baptism, when it began, etc. Thirdly, he treats of the matter, there, at H, Now this sacrament is celebrated only in water, etc. In the fourth, he treats of the manner of immersion, which is the act of baptism, there, at I, But concerning immersion, if it is asked how it ought to be done, etc. In the fifth and last, he treats of the cessation of circumcision with the advent of baptism, there, at K, It is also usually asked: If circumcision lost, etc.

§ 26. The first of these is divided into three: in the first of which it is treated what baptism is in reality and definition. In the second, concerning the form of baptism which is, and which sometimes was, there, at B, But what is that word, etc. In the third he raises certain questions concerning the form, there, at C, Here it is asked whether the baptism would be true, etc.

§ 27. From these things the meaning is clear, and from the following disputation.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Definitions Of Baptism Are Well Assigned

Are the definitions of baptism well assigned?

§ 28. But first a doubt arises here: what is baptism?

§ 29. And in the text this definition is posited: Baptism is a dipping made in water, sanctified by the word of life.[333]

§ 30. But Dionysius in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy [says]: Baptism is the principle of the most holy commandments of sacred action, forming our animal habits toward the receptive fitness for other

332. Acts 8:15-17.

divine utterances and sacred actions, making our journey toward the anagogy of supercelestial rest, and the sacred tradition of our most divine regeneration.[334]

§ 31. Damascene again gives another in the fourth book on the Orthodox Faith: Baptism is that through which we receive the firstfruits of the Holy Spirit, and it becomes for us the principle of another life, and regeneration, and a seal, and a guard, and an illumination.[335]

§ 32. And it is asked first: Since of one thing there is a single being, according to what are the three definitions of baptism taken?

§ 33. Also, it is objected against the first. For it is asked: What, according to that definition, is called baptism—is it either the water, or the dipping, or the character, or the grace?

§ 35. 1. It seems that it is the water: because since every sacrament is signifying from likeness, and its causality does not extend beyond the power of the sign: it seems that the whole substance of the sacrament is in that in which is the whole rationale of signifying: but this whole rationale is in the property of water, which washes, makes to shine, cools, and even enlivens on account of the nature of the transparent which is in it through its agreement with the heavens: therefore it seems that it itself is the sacrament: therefore it ought to have fallen in the nominative case (in recto) in the definition of the sacrament, and not in an oblique case.

§ 36. But against this seems to be that the water does not remain in baptism: but baptism always remains: therefore water is not baptism.

§ 37. 2. If perhaps it should be said, as Augustine seems to intend in the text, that the dipping itself is baptism.

§ 38. Against this is the same objection: because the dipping passes away after the dipping is done: therefore since baptism remains, it does not seem that dipping is baptism.

§ 39. Also, dipping does not seem to belong to every baptism: therefore it is not substantially posited in the definition. For that it does not belong to every one is seen, because there is a baptism of blood, and of penance, to which the dipping of baptism in water does not apply: therefore dipping is not called baptism except accidentally: therefore it ought not to be defined by dipping.

§ 40. Also, when it is said, Baptism is a dipping, etc.: the proper form ought to be expressed in baptism: for the word of life is the word of preaching, and of all the other sacraments: therefore just as one would define man badly, defining him materially thus, "Man is what is composed of body and sense": so it seems to be defined badly when it is said, Baptism is a dipping, etc.: because the word of life belongs to many things, and not to baptism alone.

§ 41. 3. If perhaps it should be said that the character is baptism.

§ 42. On the contrary: The definition of a sacrament in no way belongs to it: because it is not a visible form of invisible grace: therefore it itself is not called baptism.

333. Peter Lombard, Sentences IV.

§ 43. 4. Furthermore, it seems that grace ought to be called baptism: because each thing is denominated from its ultimate and best part: but grace is the ultimate and best part of baptism: therefore it itself denominates baptism: and baptism has to be defined by it, as it seems.

§ 44. But against this it seems: that grace is the effect of baptism: but the effect and the cause are not the same in substance: therefore grace is not the sacrament.

§ 45. Also, in the following distinction he says that some receive the sacrament, and not the reality (res) of the sacrament: therefore the sacrament according to substance can be without grace: therefore grace is not the sacrament.

§ 46. But it is objected concerning the second definition: because § 47. 1. Baptism is not said to be the principle of the commandments of sacred action: for confessions and renunciations precede it; for there one confesses the faith, and they renounce the devil and his pomps before baptism.

§ 48. 2. If perhaps you should say that godparents do this: this is nothing: because if he were an adult, he would have to do it by himself.

§ 49. Furthermore, the godparents themselves do this in the person of the child. Whence Dionysius says in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy: For neither does he here—namely, the godparent—say thus: I make renunciations and sacred confessions for the child: but rather that the child renounces, that is, I confess that the child believes, coming into the sacred sense by our divine anagogies, to renounce indeed universally what is contrary, but to confess and cooperate with divine confessions.[336] Therefore it seems that the child does these things, who is not capable of a commandment: and yet he is capable of baptism, as has been said: therefore it ought not to be defined by this, that it is the principle of the commandments.

§ 51. Also, it is objected concerning the second part: For to form animal habits does not seem to belong to baptism: but since 'animal', as Augustine says in the Gloss on 1 Timothy 3, is said in two ways, namely, regarding life, and regarding sense, it seems that the virtue of temperance forms the animal life, and faith seems to form the animal sense, and not baptism.[337]

§ 52. 4. Also, it is objected concerning the third part: because contemplation makes our journey to the anagogy of supercelestial conversation more than baptism does: therefore it ought not to be placed in the definition of baptism.

§ 53. Concerning the third definition of baptism it is also objected:

§ 54. 1. If someone already sanctified approaches baptism, as Cornelius the centurion and many others, he does not receive there the firstfruits of the Holy Spirit.

334. Pseudo-Dionysius, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, ch. 2.

§ 55. 2. Furthermore, man has in his nature a seal by which he is configured to the Trinity in the image: therefore he does not receive this in baptism, as it seems.

§ 56. 3. Furthermore, why does Damascene put so many clauses in the definition there? For illumination pertains more to the intelligible virtues, such as faith, science, understanding, wisdom, prudence, and the like, than it pertains to baptism, as it seems.

§ 57. Solution. It must be said to the first, that that definition which is Augustine's and is posited in the text through other words, collects the essentials to baptism in matter and form: because the dipping in water, insofar as it is on the part of the one dipped, not the one dipping, is the matter of baptism: but the form is in the word of life. But the second is given concerning baptism insofar as it is the foundation of all the other sacraments, without which it does not happen that one enters the door of the Church: and this will be clear in the explanation of it. But the third, which is Damascene's, is given through the general effects of baptism: and this also will be clear below.

§ 58. To the other, therefore, which is asked: What is called baptism according to the definition? we can now answer in two ways: namely, either that baptism is called the dipping in water in conjunction with the character which it imprints, and thus Augustine seems to intend in the text; or conversely, that baptism is called the character, insofar as it is from such a dipping, and not absolutely.

§ 59. If we speak in the first way, then we answer the argument by saying that although properties of this sort are found in water, nevertheless it does not exercise them in act except insofar as it is dipping: and therefore it itself is not the sacrament except considered in this way, and then it is material: but the dipping itself names the thing constituted from it and the sanctifying word.

§ 60. To the other it must be said that the water and the dipping do not remain in themselves, but according to their conjunction to the remaining character, and therefore they do not pass away simply.

§ 61. To the other it must be said that the baptism of blood and of the Spirit are not called baptism absolutely, but only in a qualified sense (secundum quid), namely insofar as they supply the place of baptism where the article of necessity, and not contempt of religion, excludes the sacrament.

§ 62. To the other it must be said that the word of life is in one way in the sacraments, namely in the invocation of the Trinity, excepting the Eucharist, and extreme unction, and penance, and matrimony: for in the three the invocation is of the Trinity. But this is so because it is not so with God as it is with created forms: for in created forms no two equally special forms relate in one way to what is formed by them: but God relates in one way to everything that is, and not all things relate in one way to Him: and therefore the word of life which is in the others, namely the invocation of the Trinity, is also in baptism: but it is true that it is adapted to baptism through the act of baptizing and a special intention. Or we can say that life is the first act of a spirit, and to live is the first being for living things: and because in baptism the first being of spiritual life is given, since it is the foundation of the whole life, the word of life spiritually befits baptism more than the others. That this is true is clear from Dionysius in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, where he says thus: If to be divinely is divine generation, by no means at any time would he know any of the things handed down by God, nor indeed what he has done, who has not had divine subsistence.[338] And he intends to say that just as in natures that which does not exist neither understands nor acts: so also in divine things, he who is not first [constituted] through baptism cannot act, nor understand well.

§ 64. To that which is objected against this, that the character is called baptism. It must be said that most properly, in my judgment, the character is called baptism. And to the objection it must be said that it is visible, not in itself, but in comparison to the dipping by which it is imprinted, or in which it is imprinted by God, which is more properly said.

§ 65. To the other it must be said that grace can in no way be called a sacrament. And to the objection it must be said that the denomination is from that ultimate thing which is the perfection of the thing intrinsic to its essence: but grace is in no way of the essence of the sacrament, but is its effect.

§ 66. To that which is asked concerning the second definition, it must be said that we can better understand it through the words of another translation, which says thus: It is asked what is the principle of the most venerable precepts of sacred operation, which forms our animal habits toward the reception of other holy speakings and sanctifications, and conducts us to the upward action of the supercelestial region, which hands down our holy and most divine regeneration.[339] From this also it is clear that he means that baptism is the principle of the precepts, that is, because it is commanded to be done for us, because through it we enter the door of the Church: and it ordains us to three things, namely to being through regeneration, and he touches on this last: and to acting, and he touches on this second, because it ordains the animal senses to spiritual things in works and words according to the active [life]: and it reordains us to higher things so that we may rest in them as in the end of our actions in the contemplative [life]: and this is what he intends.

§ 67. It must be said therefore to the first, that all those confessions and sacred actions contract power from baptism, as it is in the will: for Augustine holds that everything preceding and following baptism operates by the power of baptism: and thus it is first according to nature, although it follows according to time. And that this is true is taken from his own words at the end of the first book of On Marriage and Concupiscence, where he says thus: Thus it must be taken what the Apostle says: Christ loved the Church, so that by the word of sanctification absolutely all the evils of regenerated men might be cleansed and healed: not only sins, all of which are now remitted in baptism, but also those which are contracted later by human ignorance or infirmity: not so that baptism is repeated as often as sin is committed: but because by that which is given in it, it comes to pass that pardon of any sins whatever is impetrated for the faithful not only beforehand, but also afterwards: for what would penance profit, either before baptism, unless baptism followed: or after, unless baptism preceded?[340] As if to say: Nothing. And from this the proposition is clear.

§ 68. To the other it must be said that a child is not capable of a precept except according to habit and order to the precepts: and in this way also baptism is the principle of the operation of the precepts.

§ 70. To the other it must be said that animality is taken here broadly for the habitual obedience to concupiscence: but here baptism forms the sense by conferring the general grace of spiritual life, which begins in it by debilitating the fomes [of sin] universally.

§ 71. To the other it must be said that through the reality (res) signified and not contained it leads to the anagogy of supercelestial rest: but this reality is the brightness and splendor of the future resurrection, when we shall be washed from all corruption, filth, and stain: hence it leads otherwise than the contemplative [life] does: because the contemplative [life] leads through confession and study, but the sacrament through the likeness which it has with eternal things.

§ 72. But to that which is objected concerning the third definition, it must be said, as has already been made clear, that even if the firstfruits of the Spirit are given before baptism, that is nevertheless in the power of baptism existing in purpose as a habit, as in Cornelius: or in act, as in others who know and believe the articles [of faith] explicitly.

§ 73. To the other it must be said that man in nature has a seal of likeness as to the image, but not as to the character configuring in such a habit, as baptism gives: and therefore the objection does not proceed.

§ 74. To the last it must be said that these five things are posited in the definition of baptism, insofar as baptism operates in five ways against original sin: for original sin names a proneness to every evil by reason of the lack of due justice: but the lack of justice is followed by our dissimilitude to God, and guilt unto death: but the proneness to evil is followed by inconsiderate fall, as a blinding by which one is blinded through affection for mutable good. Against guilt, therefore, it gives the firstfruits of the Spirit; against the guilt unto death it gives the principle of life through regeneration; and against dissimilitude it gives a signet or seal; against the precipice of falling it gives a guard; and against blindness on our part it gives illumination: and thus it is clear why he posits these five clauses in the definition.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is Any Form Of Baptism; And On Each Word Placed In The Form Of Baptism

Is there any form of baptism? and, Concerning the individual words posited in the form of baptism.

337. Glossa Ordinaria on 1 Timothy 3.

§ 75. Next it is inquired concerning what he says, there, at B, But what is that word, which coming to the element, makes the sacrament?

§ 76. For here arises a question concerning the form of baptism. And it is asked: When it is said, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," whether the pronoun ego (I) is of the essence of the form?

§ 77. 1. It seems that it is: because the intention of the baptizer is required. But this is not expressed except through the demonstration of the one intending, and demonstration is not made except through the pronoun ego: therefore the pronoun is of the form.

§ 78. 2. Also, to baptize is proper to the minister of the Church: therefore it seems that the ministering one ought to be expressed: therefore since he is not expressed except by the pronoun, for that reason it seems to be of the form.

§ 79. But against this seems to be the rule of the Grammarians who say that in verbs of the first and second person a certain and determinate nominative is understood:

therefore it is not necessary that it be added.

§ 81. Also it is further asked: Whether the word baptizo (I baptize) is of the form?

§ 82. It seems that it is not: because

§ 83. 1. It is more to express by deed than by word: therefore since there is an expression by deed, it is not necessary that it be said by word.

§ 84. 2. Also, when Christ says: Going therefore, teach ye all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit [341], he seems to enjoin the exercise, and not chiefly the expression of the act: therefore by virtue of that baptizing it is not imported that it is of the form, nor can the form be obtained by further power.

§ 85. 3. Also, He himself said: Go, teach, baptizing: but when they taught, they did not have to say beforehand: "I teach you," but by merely exercising the act they fulfilled the commandment: therefore by likeness, also by exercising the act of baptism, they fulfilled the commandment of baptism.

§ 86. 4. Also, in other blessings and sealings, as is the blessing of bread, the act of blessing is not expressed beforehand: therefore this is also not required in the act of baptizing.

§ 87. 5. Also, Exod. 14:15: Why criest thou to me? the Gloss says that he cried out with the desire of his heart:[342] therefore it seems that it is sufficient to intend, and not to express.

§ 88. 6. Also, water is of the substance of baptism: and yet it is not required that it be expressed in speech, so as to say thus: "I baptize you in water": therefore it seems that neither is the expression of the act of baptism required.

§ 89. 7. Also, since Christ is the one who truly and inwardly baptizes, it seems that it would be better expressed by saying: "May Christ baptize you," etc., than, "I baptize you."

338. Pseudo-Dionysius, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, ch. 2, part 3, § 1.

§ 90. 8. Also, the Greeks and Dalmatians baptize thus: "Let the servant of Christ be baptized in the name," etc.

§ 91. If perhaps you say that they are not baptized. On the contrary: Blessed Nicholas and other saints were baptized in this way, as it is said.

§ 92. Also, the Lord Pope Gregory, consulted upon this, responded concerning the counsel, that those who are under the Roman Church in Dalmatia should not be rebaptized, but caution should be taken lest it be done further: therefore it seems that this suffices for the form: because otherwise they would have to be rebaptized.

§ 93. 9. But if you should say that on account of the intention the expression of the act is required. On the contrary: According to this it would be better said: "I intend to baptize you," etc.

§ 94. But on the contrary: This sacrament is a sacrament of necessity for which the intention of the act which the Church does is required: therefore in order that all error may be excluded, the expression of the act is required through a verb of the first person and present tense of the indicative mood.

§ 95. Further it is asked: What does this mean which he says, in the name?

§ 96. For either it supposits for essence, or for person. If it supposits for essence: therefore it seems that essence could be posited in its place, so that it be said: "I baptize you in the essence of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." But if it supposits for person, then it seems that it ought to be posited in the plural, so that it be said: "In the names of the Father," etc.

§ 97. Further it is asked: Whether other names signifying the same thing can be posited in place of these?

§ 98. And it seems that they can: because

§ 99. 1. Augustine says that the Son is called Word in the same way, as He is called Son: and the Holy Spirit is called gift, and love, in the same way by which He is called Holy Spirit: [343] therefore it seems that baptism could be done thus: "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Word and of the Love or Gift."

§ 100. 2. Also, since begetter and begotten are the same as father and son, it seems that baptism could be done by saying thus: "I baptize you in the name of the Begetter and of the Begotten and of the Proceeding Gift."

§ 101. 3. Also, since the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit operate in baptism by one indivisible operation, and they ordain to operating by power, wisdom, and goodness, it seems better to be said: "I baptize you in power, wisdom, and goodness," than, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

339. Pseudo-Dionysius, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, ch. 2 (translation of John Scotus Eriugena).

§ 102. Also, it is asked concerning this which is said by Luke, that the Apostles baptized in the name of Christ.[344]

§ 103. 1. For the Apostle says, to Ephes. 4:5: One Lord, one faith, one baptism. But it is certain that that is one which is one by unity of form, just as any thing is one: therefore it seems that since the baptism of Christ is one, it ought always to have had one form: but it is certain that if the Apostles baptized in the name of Christ, they did not have the same form which we have: therefore it was not one baptism: therefore the baptism of the Church is not one, and so the faith was regarding this article, which is one baptism, which is impossible: therefore the Apostles baptized badly in the name of Christ.

§ 104. 2. Also, whence were the Apostles of such audacity that they changed the form handed down by Christ, since in baptism no institution has validity except divine?

§ 105. Also, could the same have been done in another name as in the name of Jesus?

§ 106. It seems that it could: because Jesus and Christ name the same person: therefore what could be done in one, could also be done in the other.

§ 107. But on the contrary: In this name, Jesus, the faith of the Trinity is not thus expressed: because Jesus is interpreted as savior, which name by its force sounds only the power of deity without distinction of person: therefore it could not be done in it.

§ 108. Also, it is asked by similarity: Whether the Pope could now institute the same if he wished?

§ 109. But it seems that he could: because he is the Vicar of Christ on earth: if therefore the Apostles did this, he likewise seems to be able to do this.

§ 110. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 111. 1. In the sacraments only divine institution operates: but the Pope is not God: therefore he cannot institute it.

§ 112. 2. Also, the water in the sacrament is inferior to the form, because it is as matter: and it is certain that the Pope cannot change the matter: therefore much less can he change the form.

§ 113. Further it is asked: Whether baptism could be done in the name of one person?

§ 114. And it seems that it could: because § 115. 1. So it is said in the text.

§ 116. 2. Also, relatives when posited posit one another, and one is understood in the other: therefore it seems that it suffices to name one.

§ 117. To the contrary is that there is no form in baptism except the invocation of the Trinity: but the Trinity is not one person: therefore the invocation of the Trinity is not the invocation of one person.

340. Augustine, De nuptiis et concupiscentia I, ch. 33, n. 38.

§ 118. Also, it is asked: Whether one could baptize in the name of the Trinity, so that it be said thus: "I baptize you in the name of the Trinity"?

§ 119. It seems that one could: because then

§ 120. 1. None of the persons is omitted, who would not be invoked over the baptism: therefore it will be true baptism.

§ 121. 2. Also, it is said in the text that provided the faith is whole, it suffices to name one: therefore much more does it suffice if the Trinity itself be named.

§ 122. Further, it is asked concerning apposition, whether it is permitted to add something, so that it be said: "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit and of holy Mary," or another, or many things of this sort?

§ 123. And it seems that it is permitted: because this contributes to greater devotion, and yet does not destroy the form.

§ 124. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 125. According to this I could say: "In the name of the greater Father, the lesser Son, and the Holy Spirit the servant of both." It seems that it would be baptism, since nothing has been omitted from the form.

§ 126. Further, it is asked concerning transposition thus: "I baptize you in the name of the Son and of the Holy Spirit and of the Father."

§ 127. And it seems [it would be baptism], because the persons are equal: therefore it seems that it makes no difference which of them is prior in the sentence or posterior.

§ 128. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 129. 1. According to this the order of nature which Augustine posits in divine things is not preserved.

§ 130. 2. Also, according to this we could say: "I baptize you in the name of the second Son, and the first Father, and the third Holy Spirit": in which form the Sabellian heresy is expressed through the ordered sequence of distinctions.

§ 131. Further, it is asked concerning corruption, so that it be said: In nomine patria et filiabus et spiritibus sanctibus [In the name of the fatherland and to the daughters and to the holy spirits], whether it is baptism?

§ 132. And it seems that it is: because otherwise those who cannot pronounce [correctly] on account of stammering of the tongue and inexperience, would all baptize badly: and according to this many little ones would be damned, and many would have to be rebaptized.

§ 133. BUT ON THE CONTRARY:

§ 134. Declension is in the beginning [of words], just as also in the end: therefore if it is permitted to corrupt in the end, it is also permitted to corrupt in the beginning.

341. Matthew 28:19.

§ 1. ...which no one says: for it is not baptism if one should say, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son," etc.

§ 2. Solution. I say without prejudice that what belongs to the form according to the statute of the Church is one thing, and what belongs to it according to divine institution is another.

§ 3. As for what exists as part of the form according to the statute of the Church, if it is violated while the divine institution is observed, the one baptizing sins, and the Church can proceed severely against him: but the baptized person is not to be rebaptized. And in this way some say that the pronoun "I" (ego) belongs to the form: yet I do not think so, but rather I think that it can be omitted if someone wishes, without grave fault, though I say it is safer to add it. But as regards the institution of the Church, many say that the word "baptize" belongs to the form: in such a way that one who omits this would be reproved as for a criminal offense. But I think it more true that it belongs to the form according to necessity, such that if it is omitted, the one being baptized is not baptized: but by the judgment of all, the invocation of the Trinity also belongs to the form according to divine institution.

§ 4. Therefore, according to this opinion of mine—which belongs to many and is more celebrated today—one can respond to the first objection that the intention is better expressed in the act and pronunciation of the word: and this is because it is not the intention of a determinate person that is required, but rather that of the Church, in whose person he baptizes.

§ 5. And through this the solution to the next objection is clear.

§ 6. To that which is asked concerning the word "baptize," I say without prejudice to others that it belongs to the form of necessity of baptism, without which there is no baptism, unless a case arises on account of which it must be done otherwise for a time, just as the Apostles did.

§ 7. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the intention of baptism is not expressed by the act itself: because that mode of dipping also exists in other washings—especially since it is said below that an infant may be immersed once or three times, and one must express with a word signifying the Church's act of regeneration, as it seems to me.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that Christ enjoined upon them an exercise with a determination of the mode, and He included both in this when He said: Baptizing them in the name, etc. And this is because that is a sacrament of necessity, and therefore the greatest caution is required concerning it.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the case of teaching is not comparable: because that can be outside of intention, nor does it belong to the things necessary for salvation: and therefore such an expression is not required there.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that those blessings are prayers, in which the force of intention is not great.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that it is not comparable, because in prayer—which is a pious affection directed toward God—nothing is principally regarded except the heart. But in the sacraments, divine power operates under a visible species: and therefore intention must be expressed concerning it.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that the case of water is not comparable: because the intention is not referred to the water, but to the act, and therefore it must be expressed in the act.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that although Christ operates interiorly, nevertheless His operation only occurs with the pre-existing operation of the minister, and therefore that requires the expression of intention.

§ 14. To the next which are objected concerning the rite of the Greeks, I think that they would have to be corrected if they would acquiesce. However, concerning those who have been baptized, it may be that this form was first handed down to them on account of the fact that they thought nothing was done in baptism except the operation of a man: and therefore just as the Apostles baptized in the name of Christ, so too by the counsel of the Holy Spirit they handed it down to them, so that the act might be referred to Christ, or impersonally to Christ and the Church: and this for a time: and therefore they sin in observing this rite, just as we also would sin if we were to baptize in the name of Christ.

§ 15. Or let it be said that when it is said: "Let the servant of Christ be baptized," etc., the expression or understanding of a first-person verb is pre-understood, and in this respect it could be tolerated for a time on account of scandal, and by the command of the Holy Spirit inspiring the Church. However, the Pope was doubtful regarding this: because concerning those who are in Dalmatia, he first replied that they should be rebaptized, and later permitted it, but commanded that caution be taken in the future. Moreover, for certain brothers existing in our order (at least three in the city of Rome), he commanded that they be rebaptized.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that it is not well said: "I intend to baptize you": because from this it could not be inferred that I was baptizing according to the act, or that he was baptized according to the act: because we intend many things which we do not do: and therefore it could not be suitably expressed except in the enunciation of the act of baptism.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that the word "name" designates the known essence rendering itself in the effect of grace, which the three persons operate indifferently: and therefore the objection falls away, because although it posits the essence, it nevertheless posits it under another mode of signifying: and therefore it cannot be substituted in its place.

§ 18. To the next it must be said that no names can be substituted in place of these: because they alone express the persons as they are perfect in themselves and distinct from one another, as was proved in the first book of the Sentences.

§ 19. To the next which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that "Word" and "Son" differ by the same formal notion which is a relation, but not by the same formal notion of the name: because "Word" as "Word" does not name a person perfect in Himself, but rather

343. Augustine, De Trinitate XV.

"Word" as applied in divine matters: and similarly "gift," and "love": and therefore they cannot be placed in place of those.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that "begetter" and "begotten" are spoken of as relatives, which according to the intellect arise from the act of generating: but God the Father, and the Son, state distinct persons: hence every father generates, but not conversely: and similarly every son is begotten, but not conversely: and therefore it is clear that those names and these are of different signification.

§ 21. To the next it must be said that power, wisdom, will or goodness, although they name those things which are required for operating, nevertheless only name the unity of essence, because these are in the individual persons: but the form of baptism, according to a distinct confession of faith, must name the unity of essence and the three persons: and therefore those names are not suitable.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that three things concurred for the Apostles to baptize in the name of Christ, one of which is the signification of the name which implicitly expresses the Trinity. The second was necessity, because that saving name—in which every man must be saved—was odious: and therefore, so that by seeing the Holy Spirit visibly descend at the invocation of this name, the name might be shown as lovable and reverend, the Holy Spirit willed that for a time baptism should be in that name, until it became known and venerable. The third is divine institution through the instinct and revelation of the Holy Spirit; although it is not read in Scripture, nevertheless I think that the Apostles would never have presumed to do this unless the Holy Spirit had commanded it to be done.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that the unity of form is preserved implicitly: because in the name of Christ is understood the Father anointing, the Son anointed, and the anointing which is the Holy Spirit.

§ 24. To the next the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that this name, "Jesus," was not as suitable: because it does not as clearly express the Trinity: nevertheless I do not wish to contradict that, if the same causes concurred, this could be done in another name just as in that one.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that the Pope cannot do this, just as neither could the Apostles, except through a revelation of the Holy Spirit and a great necessity of the Church.

§ 27. To that which is asked concerning the name of one person, it must be said that it cannot be done, nor was it ever done: and what Ambrose says is understood thus: "He who says one by expressing in faith the Trinity, which occurs in the confession also of the others." Or it may be said better that he speaks of the same case in which the Apostles baptized in the name of Christ: for then it could be done when those three conditions concurred, but otherwise what is said in the text is absolutely false.

344. Acts 2:38, 8:16, 10:48, 19:5.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that although relatives posit themselves via the intellect, nevertheless they are not in this way the form of baptism, but rather expressed vocally: for it is not enough to think or understand; one must express it with the voice.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that "Trinity" does not name the persons by a proper name: and therefore it is not the form: because the articles of faith and the form of baptism lie in the proper names.

§ 30. To that which is further asked concerning addition, it must be said that the one adding sins. But if he adds what does not sound like a corruption of the form, the person is not to be rebaptized.

§ 31. And through this the solution to the next is clear: because that addition, "In the name of the greater Father," etc., sounds like a corruption of the form: and therefore I do not think that someone baptizes who baptizes in this way.

§ 32. To the next it must be said that he who transposes sins: nevertheless I think it is a baptism, if nothing more is done than transposition. But if he adds what sounds like a corruption of the form, then I think it is not a baptism, such as "In the name of the first Father," etc.

§ 33. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the order of nature, even with the names transposed, is preserved in the intentions of the names: because the Father is always spoken of as He who is not from another, from Whom another is; the Son as He who is from another, from Whom another is; and the Holy Spirit as He who is from others, from Whom no one is.

§ 34. To that which is further asked concerning corruption, it must be said with the Doctors that if, on account of a speech impediment or ignorance of the language, one corrupts at the end of a word, it does not impede baptism. But if by this he intends to mock and induce error, then he signifies that he does not intend what the Church does, and then he does not baptize.

§ 35. To that which is asked concerning corruption at the beginning of a word, it is commonly said and is true (as the Grammarians say) that declension at the end of a word varies only what is co-signified, and not what is signified: and therefore that corruption does not remove the form of baptism: but declension at the beginning of a word varies the signified meaning, and therefore corruption at the beginning of a word removes the form of baptism.

§ 36. If it is still asked: Why is this form called an "invocation" of the Trinity, since an invocation ought to occur in the deprecatory mode: while the form of baptism is expressed in the indicative mode by way of enunciation in the present tense?

§ 37. And to this it must be said that there is a certain deprecation having the force of indication, as some Prophets, when they desired to prophesy what they were prophesying, like Isaiah 64:1: O that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down. [345] So also, conversely, there are certain enunciations which have the force of invocations: because what is uttered enunciatively is done so because the expression of intention is required in them, and such is the enunciation in the sacraments, and the sense is: "I baptize you," etc., that is, "I exteriorly baptize you by invoking the Father," etc., "so that He may interiorly baptize you."

342. Glossa Ordinaria on Exodus 14:15.

§ 38. But if it is asked: Why is it not said thus: "I invoke you"?

§ 39. It must be said that this is done so that no doubt is cast upon whether the Holy Spirit baptizes interiorly.

§ 40. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — When Baptism Was Instituted

When was baptism instituted?

When was baptism instituted?

§ 43. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at F: Concerning the institution of baptism when it began, etc.

§ 44. For it seems that baptism ought to have been instituted from the beginning: because an efficacious medicine is more valuable at the beginning than at the end of the disease.

§ 45. If you say that it draws its efficacy from the passion of Christ, and therefore ought not to have been instituted before the passion: this seems to be nothing: because the passion profited those who were before the incarnation of Christ in the faith of Him who was to come: therefore baptism also could have been profitable.

§ 46. Moreover, that variety which the Master touches upon in the text must be reduced to some harmony; what then is it?

§ 47. Solution. It must be said that baptism ought not to have begun before the passion of Christ: and the cause of this is because baptism is a sacrament of full effect and full cure: but a full cure of the disease did not exist except after the passion and resurrection of Christ: because then original guilt ceased entirely, and the gate of heaven was opened with respect to the perception of beatitude.

§ 48. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that those who were before the incarnation of Christ did not have full liberation, but rather each one only made satisfaction for himself: but the guilt of nature remained up to Christ with respect to the descent to Limbo and the closing of the gate.

§ 49. To the next it must be said that baptism was instituted in multiple ways, namely officially, causally, and with respect to the effect of salvation.

§ 50. Officially, in Matthew 10:1ff., when He sent the Apostles to baptize in the same form in which baptism is now performed, as he says in the text, commanding them there: Go ye not into the way of the Gentiles, and into the city of the Samaritans enter ye not.

§ 51. Causally, however, in four ways. Materially, Matthew 3:16ff., when by the touch of His most pure flesh He conferred regenerative power upon the waters in baptism, namely in the one by which He was baptized: in which baptism, nevertheless, the reality of the Trinity was present, although not under the prescribed form of words: because the Father was in the voice, the Son in the flesh touching the water, the Holy Spirit in the dove. Because water is also not matter unless it is sanctified by the word of life, unless one calls it totally indisposed matter: for matter relates to baptism in a threefold way. Namely, as matter only: and in this way water from the beginning of creation is matter, when the Spirit of the Lord was borne over the waters, as Chrysostom says. It also relates as disposed matter, as after the Lord by the touch of His most pure flesh conferred regenerative power to the waters. It also relates as formed matter, when it is under the invocation of the Trinity. According to the formal cause, baptism was instituted in Matthew 28:19: Baptizing them in the name of the Father, etc. And with respect to the final cause, John 3:5: Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. But efficiently and significatively with respect to the operating cause in baptism, it was instituted in John 19:34, where water and blood flowed from the side of Christ, to show that it has the efficacy of salvation from the side of Christ.

345. Augustine, De Trinitate XV.

§ 52. But with respect to the effect of salvation, it was instituted in Mark 16:16, where He says: He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Suitable Matter Of Baptism Is Water

Is water the suitable matter of baptism?

§ 55. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, at H: This sacrament is celebrated in water, etc.

§ 56. But it seems that the suitable matter is not water:

§ 57. 1. For baptism, as was held above, is the principle of new life: but the principle of life is not in the grace of baptism unless it is signified in the property of the matter of the sacrament, because a sacrament is the cause of no reality of which it is not a sign: but the cause of life in the elements is not the moist with the cold, but rather the moist with the warm: since, therefore, water is cold and moist, and oil or wine is warm and moist, it seems rather that the matter ought to be oil or wine than water.

§ 58. 2. Also, grace in a sacrament has something similar to light, like the character: and something similar to healing, because grace heals sin: and sacramental grace also refreshes, as the Master says below, in the following distinction, that it refreshes those already sanctified with a more abundant grace: since, therefore, oil (as he says) shines and heals and refreshes, it seems oil is the suitable matter for baptism.

§ 59. But to the contrary is that: 1. The state of re-creation through conformity ought to correspond to the state of creation: but in the creation of the greater world the first living soul appeared in the waters, over which [the Spirit] was borne: therefore in the re-creation of the lesser world the soul ought to begin to live in the waters, over which the Spirit was borne.

§ 60. 2. Also, it has no generative power except what was touched by the most pure flesh of the Savior: but this element is water: therefore water alone is the matter, and nothing else.

§ 61. 3. Also, Chrysostom in Homily 36 on John: "Water is assumed in baptism as the mother of the offspring being born: what the womb is to the fetus, water is to the believer: for in water he is molded and shaped."

§ 62. 4. Also, in the same place: "At first indeed it was said, 'Let the water bring forth the creeping creatures having life': but since the ruler ascended from the streams of the Jordan, the water renders no longer creeping creatures having life, but rational and spirit-bearing souls."

§ 63. 5. Also, Ambrose on the Epistle to the Romans: "Therefore baptism is uniformly commanded to be done in water, so that it may be understood that just as water washes away the dirt of the body and of garments, so baptism wipes away the stains of the soul and the dirt of vices by cleansing them."

§ 64. But then many side-questions arise. Can baptism be done in water, whether in simple water or in composite?

§ 65. If only in simple water, then it could not be done in the sea: because it has burned earthy matter mixed in, because of which this is false.

§ 66. Also, it would not be done in broth, nor in thin beer, nor in mead, nor in other mixed waters.

§ 67. Also, no rainwater, nor any water among us [is purely simple]: therefore baptism would be done in no water among us, as it seems. But that all water among us is mixed is proved by the fact that it is congealed by cold, and this would not happen unless it were mixed, as Alexander the Philosopher says.

§ 68. Solution. It must be said that water alone is the matter of baptism: of which there are many causes, but six may suffice. Three of these are found in the text, of which the first is taken from the properties of water: because it has the power of cooling through its coldness, and of washing away dirt through its moistness: and therefore it signifies grace washing away the stains of fault, and cooling the fire which is in the heat of the fomes [inclination to sin] and of concupiscence: and these are the principal and first effects of baptism. The second is taken from the ease of obtaining it: because water is prohibited to no poor person, and this is fitting for a sacrament of general necessity. The third is taken from the commonness of finding it: because it is found near every part of the world where men dwell, and this again is fitting for a generally necessary sacrament. The fourth is also implied in the text: because water, not wine or oil, flowed from the side of the Savior. The fifth and sixth are introduced in the authorities of Chrysostom in the objections, namely because the life-giving spirit first appeared over the waters: and because the Savior touched this element in the streams of the Jordan, giving it the power so that it could make spirit-bearing souls.

§ 69. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that baptism is the principle of new life: but that is not its first effect, but rather the washing of the stain and the cooling of the fomes, and consequently grace in the virtues produces a new life in the soul. And it is not necessary that a sacrament have a likeness to everything it causes in whatever way, but to that which it causes substantially and primarily, according as it is ordered against the defect of sin.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that a certain property of illumination shines forth in water with respect to the nature of transparency, and this suffices to signify the character: but oil posits a likeness more to the healing of punishment, and therefore it is assumed as part of the matter in chrism, where there is an anointing against the punishment of the fomes lest one slide headlong, and in the oil of the sick: but the health of baptism is perfected rather through the washing away of fault.

§ 71. To that which is asked concerning the diversities of waters, I say generally that if it is a mixture destroying the species of the element and drawing it toward another species, baptism cannot be done in that water, such as a broth of fats or other things which, when cooled, congeals. And it is similarly evident that beer, and urine, and a certain lye which has much admixture of sharp bodies, and the waters which Alchemists make for transmuting metals [are invalid]. But there is a certain mixture which does not remove the properties of water, such that it remains in its impulse of cooling and its power of washing: washing, I say, not dissolving the body as sharp waters do, like urine and a certain lye: and in such things baptism can be done, and it is not impeded: hence baptism can be done in the sea, in rain, in turbid waters, and in other things of this kind. And even if it were a broth not removed from the species of the element by the fact that it is cooked, I would well believe that baptism could be done in it.

Articulus 5 — Whether In Baptism A Triple Immersion Is Necessary, Or One Suffices

Whether triple immersion is necessary in baptism, or one suffices?

§ 74. Next it is asked concerning what he says: But concerning immersion, if it is asked, etc.

§ 75. For it seems that it is to be immersed only once: because 1. By the word, the trinity of persons is expressed: since therefore the unity of essence ought also to be expressed, it seems that this ought to be expressed in deeds: therefore by the mode of immersion: therefore one must immerse and lift up once, so that the unity of essence may be signified.

§ 76. 2. Also, by immersion we are conformed to the burial: but Christ was buried once and rose: therefore one must immerse and lift up once.

§ 77. 3. Also, Chrysostom seems to say this on John, thus: "As in a certain tomb, by submerging our heads in the water, the old man is buried, and being submerged downward is totally hidden; then as we look up from the water, the new man ascends. Again, for just as it is easy to baptize and look up, so it is easy for God to bury the old man and show the new." But all this can be done by a single immersion. Therefore others are superfluous, as it seems.

§ 78. BUT TO THE CONTRARY: 1. Chrysostom, in the same place: "A triple immersion is done, so that you may learn that the power of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit fulfills all these things."

§ 79. 2. Also, Damascene: "Since baptism is a type of the death of Christ, by three immersions the three days of burial are signified."

§ 80. 3. Also, Dionysius in the book On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy: "The sacred symbolic doctrine of those to be baptized mystically teaches by three submersions and elevations in water to imitate the divine death of Jesus the Giver of Life for three days and as many nights in the tomb, as much as divine imitation is possible for men."

§ 81. To this also the Master adduces very many things in the text.

§ 82. But then it is asked: 1. By reason of the Churches that immerse only once.

§ 83. 2. Also, certain Churches do not immerse, but pour water once or twice: therefore it seems that what is exhibited in this way is not baptism.

§ 84. 3. Also, certain priests divide the invocation of the Trinity according to the number of immersions: because in the first immersion they say, "In the name of the Father," and in the second, "In the name of the Son," and in the third, "In the name of the Holy Spirit."

§ 85. And it is asked according to them, if the one being baptized dies after the first immersion is done before the second, whether he is baptized?

§ 86. And it seems that he is not: because the invocation of the Trinity is not complete: therefore the form is not there.

§ 87. Also, he is not conformed to the burial of Christ: therefore he is not dead to sin: therefore it seems that such a person is not baptized.

§ 88. Solution. It must be said to this that among all customs the custom of the Roman Church, which immerses three times, is more reasonable: because in that custom the act is conformed to the form of burial and to the effect of baptism: because, as Augustine says, by His one death Christ absolved us from a double death, namely of fault, and of eternal punishment: or of the soul, and of the body: because although the body dies, yet it cannot be detained in death. If nevertheless it is immersed only once, I think the one baptizing is to be corrected: but the infant is by no means to be rebaptized: because he has the full sacrament of baptism.

§ 89. To the first objection, therefore, it must be said that the act ought to correspond to the form: because in the form the unity of essence is expressed by the fact that it is said, "In the name," and in the figure the unity of baptism corresponds to this unity, and triple immersion ought to correspond to the Trinity.

§ 90. To the next it must be said that we ought not only to be conformed to the burial, but also to the mode of burial, as was held in the authorities adduced.

§ 91. To the next it must be said that as is clear in the following passages, Chrysostom does not intend that one should immerse only once, but that one should immerse absolutely, and afterward he teaches the form of immersion.

§ 92. To that which is asked, Whether the form should be divided according to the three immersions?

§ 93. I say no, but it must be pronounced continuously because of the danger to infants. If, however, someone divides it, and the infant dies with the Father having been named and one immersion having been done, I say that he is baptized: because the High Priest then supplies what the minister could not fulfill: and therefore I think it must be said that if, with one named, the priest should die, that boy is baptized because of the supply of the High Priest.

§ 94. To the next it must be said that pouring water over the whole body, or when the stronger part, that is, the head, is immersed and dipped in waters, one is baptized: but it does not seem to me to be a laudable custom, but rather the custom of immersing is more laudable.

§ 95. But regarding what some ask, whether baptism may be done in a bath, or warm water or hot springs?

§ 96. It is clear that yes: indeed if priests caused warm water to be made, it would be better, because sometimes little ones are so penetrated by the coldness of the water that they contract mortal illnesses and die.

Articulus 6 — Whether With The Advent Of Baptism Circumcision Ceased

Did circumcision cease when baptism came?

§ 99. Next it is asked concerning what he says last, there, at K: It is also usually asked, Whether circumcision immediately lost its force, etc.

§ 100. 1. For it seems that with the coming of the truth, the shadow ought to have ceased: therefore when baptism came, circumcision and other legal observances immediately ceased: therefore it seems that from then on they were dead and deadly.

§ 101. 2. Also, the typical lamb was terminated in the true lamb at the Supper, because it was a figure of Him: therefore similarly since circumcision was a figure of baptism, as soon as baptism appeared, circumcision ought to have been invalid and ceased.

§ 102. 3. Also, it is superfluous to keep the less perfect when the perfect has taken its state: therefore since baptism, which is more perfect than circumcision, took its state, it was superfluous for circumcision, which was less perfect, to remain.

§ 103. 4. Also, the reality which circumcision accomplished was being done through baptism: therefore it remained uselessly.

§ 104. But still the question returns: Why were other legal observances not permitted by the Apostles to be exercised in converted believers after the passion, yet they permitted circumcision to remain for some time after the passion?

§ 105. Also, why did the Apostle circumcise Timothy, and not circumcise Titus?

§ 106. Also it is asked: Did he sin by circumcising Timothy, since he himself rebuked Peter because he compelled the Gentiles to Judaize, and since he said: If you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing?

§ 107. Solution. It must be said that with the truth coming, the shadow ceased: but the truth came in two ways, namely with respect to the showing forth of the Son in the flesh, and then they ought not immediately to have ceased. It also came with respect to the operation of salvation, and this was done in the passion, and then the legal observances were dead in themselves, although not immediately deadly to those observing them.

§ 108. Hence it must be further distinguished that it is one thing to be dead, and another thing to be deadly. What is "dead" is that which of itself does not confer salvation: what is "deadly" is that which brings eternal death to the one doing it. And this the legal observances did after the Gospel was divulged and the sound of the Apostles went out into all the earth. And this again happens in two ways, namely through hearing the preaching, and through the passage of time: through hearing the preaching, as among those who heard the Apostles; through the passage of time, as it is among us now, even if we had not heard the preaching of the word of God: because it would not be reasonable that God, having rejected the people and the state of the old law, would have abandoned the care of the world for so long.

§ 109. Therefore to the first objection it must be said that Christ before the passion (as Master Hugh maintains) revealed the rite of baptism to His friend Nicodemus as a counsel. Hence before the passion baptism was nothing but a counsel: which nevertheless availed as medicine for all receiving it, and therefore because it was a counsel, circumcision ran efficaciously alongside it. But after the passion, the price of universality having been paid, it became a precept, especially after the time of the resurrection when it was said: Teach ye all nations, baptizing them, etc.: and then circumcision was dead, but to be carried to the tomb with honor. Yet to those placing their hope in it, it was not deadly to all, except to those for whom the time of the passion was determined either by hearing the preaching, or by consideration of the state of the time: for to those, if they placed their hope in it, it was deadly: but to those who did not place their hope in it, but by the dispensation of the Apostles on account of the scandal of the Jews, and lest it seem to be rejected as sacrilegious, remained in the rite for a time, it was not deadly, but dead.

§ 110. To the next it must be said that before the passion two things were directed to the same end but not in the same way: one as a counsel to be initiated, and the other in a precept to be terminated.

§ 111. To the next it must be said that that reasoning holds from the moment the perfection of baptism was determined and commanded, and not before.

§ 112. To the next it must be said that according to some, the reasoning is the same for all legal observances: but according to others, circumcision especially ran its course for a time, because it alone was as a remedy for original sin: and according to them, the case of the lamb and of circumcision are not comparable.

§ 113. To the next it must be said that the Apostle circumcised Timothy for the stated reasons, because not placing hope in circumcision, but rather because he was the son of a Jewish woman, with a Gentile father, and he wished to set him over the Jews dwelling in those places: but he did not circumcise the Gentile Titus, because he was being set over the Gentiles dwelling in Dalmatia.

§ 114. To the next it must be said that he rebuked Peter because his act was before the weak, who believed that hope was to be placed in the legal observances, of which sort Timothy was not.

§ 115. To the same it must be said that Christ had already been preached to the Galatians, and they had received it, and afterward they turned away to the faith of circumcision, and therefore it was deadly to them.

Articulus 7 — Whether Baptism Opened Heaven

Did baptism open heaven?

§ 118. Next it is asked concerning what he says there: If it is asked, whether baptism opened heaven, etc.

§ 119. And two things are asked here, namely, what opened heaven?

§ 120. 1. For above, in distinction 1, Bede said: Yet that was, etc. And he makes an exception, saying: Except that it did not open the gate of the heavenly kingdom. [346] Therefore if that exception is good which distinguishes between the effect of circumcision and of baptism, it seems that baptism opened the gate of the heavenly kingdom.

§ 121. 2. Also, Matthew 3:17 on that text: And behold a voice from heaven, etc., the Gloss says: "The water of baptism extinguished the flaming sword which prohibited the way to paradise."

§ 122. 3. Also, Luke 3:21, on that text: Jesus being baptized and praying, heaven was opened, [347] the Gloss of Bede says: "While the Savior went down into the waters of the Jordan, He opened the gate of heaven for us: while innocent flesh is touched by the cold waters, the sword formerly set against us is extinguished."

§ 123. 4. Also, Mark 1:10: And forthwith coming up out of the water, etc., [348] Bede says that by the power of baptism the heavens are opened.

§ 124. But if this is conceded, the contrary is said here in the text.

§ 125. Also, Colossians 1:20: Making peace... [349]

§ 1. ...whether they are on the earth, or whether they are in heaven.

§ 2. There Augustine in the original speaks thus: "At the hour when the blood of the redemption of Christ flowing from His side went forth, the sin of Adam was forgiven, and then the entrance into the kingdom of heaven was laid open." But it seems again that it was through this, because He said to the thief: "Amen I say to you, today you will be with me in Paradise" [350].

§ 3. But on the contrary, it seems that it was at the resurrection: because it is said thus in the paschal prayer: "O God, who on this day through Your Only-begotten Son have unlocked for us the approach to eternity, having conquered death," etc.

§ 4. Also, it seems that it was the ascension: because He then ascended, laying open the way before them, as the Prophecy had foretold.

§ 5. Further it is inquired about the second point, what is called the "door" (janua) here? But this was determined above.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that all these things in a certain way opened it differently: because baptism [opened it] with respect to the loosing of the hindering guilt and fault on our part; but the passion with respect to the payment of the price that was established to be paid by the decree of the Father; the resurrection with respect to the attainment of glory in the head, which is the earnest money for the glory to be attained in the members; but the ascension with respect to the entrance into heaven, which determines the fitting place for beatitude.

§ 7. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

§ 8. To the other thing that is further inquired, What is called the door?

§ 9. It must be said, that [it is] the bar of guilt on our part, and the established debt on the part of God's established decree. Others, however, say otherwise, but it has no force.

DISTINCTIO IV

Divisio Textus

§ 10. Division of the Text

§ 11. Here it must be said that some receive the sacrament, etc. § 12. Here baptism is treated from the part of the recipient. And here a threefold question is posited, and the doubts arising from them are subjoined.

§ 13. The first part of the question is about those who receive the reality (rem) and the sacrament. The second is about those who receive the sacrament and not the reality, there, at B, But those who approach without faith, etc. The third is about those who receive the reality and not the sacrament, there, at C, There are also others, as we posited above, etc.

§ 14. Now the questions following from these are four: of which the first is, What do the already just receive when approaching baptism? Which he treats there, at F, §1: It is also customarily inquired about those who are already sanctified, etc. The second is, why is penalty not removed in baptism, just like every fault? there, at F, §2: But since in baptism sin is wiped away, and exterior satisfaction, etc. The third is, there, at G, If it is inquired, Of what reality is baptism, etc. The last is, What do little children receive in baptism, whether grace only, or virtue only, or both? there, It is also customarily inquired, If to little children in baptism, etc.

§ 15. And all these things are prolixly and well determined in the Letter (the text of the Master); and therefore the questions here are succinct.

346. Bede, Hexaemeron, on Genesis 17.

Articulus 1 — Whether In Infants Who Receive The Reality And The Sacrament There Is An Equal Effect Of Baptism

§ 16. Article 1 § 17. Whether in little children who receive the reality and the sacrament, the effect of baptism is equal?

§ 18. ARTICLE I. Whether in little children who receive the reality and the sacrament, the effect of baptism is equal?

§ 19. It is inquired, however, first concerning the first part of the question, Whether in little children who receive the reality and the sacrament, the effect of baptism is equal?

§ 20. And it seems that it is: because 1. The Philosopher says, "One cause behaving in the same way, produces one effect": but baptism is one cause, and behaving in the same way: therefore it produces one effect. 2. Also, the one passion of Christ operates in baptism, whether it is received by this one or by that one: therefore it seems that it is equally so. 3. Also, the faith of another operates in all little children toward justification: it seems that it is equally so.

§ 21. But against this it seems to be, that 1. According to their natural endowments, the Angels also received gratuitous gifts differently, as the Master says in book II of the Sentences: therefore it seems that similarly also for little children: therefore they did not receive equal grace. 2. Also, we see when they grow up, that they are not equally disposed to acts. Since therefore acts are from habits, it seems that neither did they receive habits equally. 3. Also, some receive grace finally (unto the end) in baptism: but others do not, such as the foreknown (the reprobate): therefore it seems that the effect of baptism is unequal in all little children.

§ 22. Solution. It must be said that the effect of baptism is equal in all little children, as the first objections prove: but it does not hold thus in adults, as will be proved below.

§ 23. But to the first that is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the case is not similar concerning the Angels: because by the judgment of many, according to the difference of orders they differ in species, but little children are in one species. Nor is the quantity of grace given to human beings according to the proportion of natural endowments, but rather according to the mode of preparation; and this is equal in little children, because they do not have preparation except from the merit of Christ, and that is equally exhibited to all.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that a differing use arises not from a deformity of habit, but rather from a deformity of free will.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that to have grace finally, or according to present justice, do not express a quantity of grace, but a quality: and therefore in that argument there is a change of what (quid) into what sort (quale).

Articulus 2 — What Fiction Is § 26. Article 2 § 27. What is fiction (feigning / hypocrisy)?

347. Luke 3:21.

§ 28. ARTICLE II. What is fiction?

§ 29. Next it is inquired concerning the second point which he touches upon, there, at B, But those who approach without faith or fictitiously (feignedly), etc.

§ 30. And here three things are inquired, of which the first is, What is fiction? Second, How does it impede baptism? Third, How does the effect of baptism return when the fiction ceases?

§ 31. TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. He is fictitious (fictus, feigning) (as Augustine says) who does not believe, or who approaches without devotion, or who celebrates the sacrament otherwise than it was instituted, or who despises to receive it. But he who does not believe, does not subject himself to the sacrament: therefore it seems that he does not receive it. 2. Also, Baptism is the sacrament of faith: therefore it seems that what is contrary to faith is contrary to the sacrament. But disbelief is contrary to faith: therefore it is contrary to the sacrament: therefore he who does not believe receives nothing. 3. Also, since there are many articles of faith, someone can disbelieve one, and believe another: as not believing the resurrection, he can believe baptism: and it is inquired, Whether that one receives baptism? And it seems that he does: because this one intends to receive what the Church exhibits: therefore it seems that he will receive it.

§ 32. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the fictitious (deceitful) therefore the Holy Spirit operates nothing in his baptism: therefore he receives nothing.

§ 33. Further it is inquired concerning the second mode, which is called indevotion. For devotion is a certain fervor of the soul in the compunction for sins, or in the love of charity, as Ambrose says on the Epistle to the Romans: but there are many who do not approach baptism thus: therefore it seems that there are many who do not have the affection of mortal sin, who nevertheless are fictitious: and no one says this.

§ 34. FURTHER it is inquired concerning the third mode of being fictitious: 1. For he who celebrates otherwise, does not observe the form of the sacrament: therefore he does not receive the sacrament: and the contrary of this is said in the Letter. 2. Also, he who despises to receive it, does not seem properly to be called fictitious, but openly evil: because the fictitious man simulates at least.

§ 35. FURTHER it is inquired concerning the number of these fictions.

§ 36. Solution. To this last point first I respond, that a fourfold fiction is gathered from the sayings of Augustine: however, a threefold fiction is posited especially in the recipient of the sacrament of the Eucharist, but by similarity it is also in the recipient of baptism. And that is either on the part of the one giving the sacrament, or on the part of the recipient. Or otherwise and better, either on the part of the rite or act of the sacrament, or on the part of the worked work (operis operati) that the Church does. If in the first mode, then it is he who receives otherwise than the Church exercises the rite, and this I understand of him who derides the rite of the Church, and yet intends to receive what the Church does, even if he derides it: for that one receives the sacrament. But if on the part of the worked work: then it is either according to the rational part, and then he is not believing; or according to the concupiscible part, and then he is indevout; or on the part of the irascible part, and then he is despising.

348. Mark 1:10.

§ 37. To the FIRST therefore it must be said that he is not believing, yet willing to receive that very thing according to what he sees the Church doing: and he is the one of whom the Master speaks in the Letter, that he receives the sacrament as to the impression of the character. But if infidelity were to turn him away so that he would not will to receive nor receive, then there would be no doubt that he would receive nothing.

§ 38. To the next it must be said that baptism is the sacrament of faith as to this, that it is the foundation of the sacraments, just as faith is of the spiritual edifice in life. But what is contrary to faith, provided he intends to receive what the Church does, is not contrary except to the sacramental grace, and not to the character: and therefore the character is received.

§ 39. To the next it must be said that the disbelief of all the articles impedes the reality (rem) of the sacrament, and if he were to disbelieve all at once, and yet will to receive it according to that which he believes the Church to be doing nothing, he receives the character.

§ 40. To THAT which is inquired concerning the second fiction, it must be said that the indevout here is called from the privation of the habit of devotion, and this is when he is in the state and effect of mortal sin: because such a one receives nothing except the character.

§ 41. To the next it must be said that he who celebrates otherwise, if he does not observe the form, exhibits nothing. But here it is principally taken on the part of the recipient, who namely receives otherwise than is the rite of the Church. For he receives according to a certain abuse, yet he intends to receive this very abusive thing, and on account of the efficacy of the sacrament he is said to receive the character.

§ 42. To the next it must be said that there is a contempt casting away the work, and there is a contempt vilifying it as vile, which nevertheless he intends to do. And the first indeed receives nothing, because he does not subject himself to the sacrament; but the second receives the character.

Articulus 3 — Whether Fiction Can Impede Baptism

§ 43. Article 3 § 44. Whether fiction can impede baptism?

§ 45. ARTICLE III. Whether fiction can impede baptism?

§ 46. Secondly it is inquired, How does it impede baptism?

§ 47. For it seems that it cannot impede: 1. For the stronger is not impeded by the less strong: but sacramental grace is stronger than fiction, and than every sin: therefore it seems that it ought not to impede, nor can it. 2. Besides, if sin impedes: then also original sin in little children seems to be able to impede: and this is not true. 3. Also, certain venial sins are in unbaptized adults. Let us posit therefore, that some adult loving his wife too much, or his little children, and more than God, and yet is baptized: it is evident that he does not lose that love in baptism, nor lay it aside. Therefore the sin remains: therefore he seems to be fictitious: because God indulges either nothing, or everything.

349. Colossians 1:20.

§ 48. Solution. It must be said that fiction impedes from the fact that it places an obstacle to the Holy Spirit through the actual dissent of the will to the effect of the sacrament: for he wills something that cannot stand with sacramental grace.

§ 49. To the first therefore it must be said that sin of itself is weak, but with a will resisting grace it is made strong to impede grace: because He who created you without you, will not justify you without you: for God does not will malice, as Damascene says, nor does He compel virtue, because then the praise of the good would become sordid, if it were given even against the will.

§ 50. To the NEXT it must be said that in little children there is no resisting will, but rather there is there the preparation of the merit of Christ against another's sin, as was said before.

§ 51. To the next it must be said that nothing prohibits a venial sin from remaining on account of the adherence of the venial: because this does not make fiction: because neither is it in the same part with grace, nor is it even contrary to grace: and therefore total pardon is had, and total sanctity even without having the remission of the venial [sin].

Articulus 4 — How The Effect Of Baptism Returns Upon The Cessation Of Fiction

§ 52. Article 4 § 53. How does the effect of baptism return when fiction ceases?

§ 54. ARTICLE IV. How does the effect of baptism return when fiction ceases?

§ 55. Thirdly it is inquired, How does the effect of baptism return when fiction ceases?

§ 56. Because it seems that it does not return: 1. For dead works are not vivified: but works done in mortal sin are dead: therefore they are not vivified: but baptism of this sort is done in mortal sin: therefore the effect of baptism does not return, but he ought to be baptized again. 2. If you say that the character is imprinted in the fictitious one, and the grace of it [returns, so] he ought not to be baptized [again]. It seems that it is not imprinted: because the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the fictitious therefore He does not imprint anything on him: therefore neither the character. 3. Besides, the character is a spiritual light, as will be held below, and spiritual light cannot stand with spiritual darkness: but sin, as Damascene says, is spiritual darkness: therefore it seems that the character cannot be imprinted on the fictitious one. 4. Also, sacramental grace is effected by the sacrament of baptism: but when it is not, it is not effected: therefore it is not effected lest this fictitious one be baptized. Similarly it seems that neither is it effected afterward: for when there is no cause, then the cause effects nothing: but afterward there is no baptism, because it has already passed away: therefore it does not effect afterward: therefore that grace is never effected by baptism: therefore it does not return. 5. Also, what never was present does not return: but grace never was present to this fictitious one: therefore it does not return to him afterward when fiction ceases. 6. Also, let us posit that this fictitious one commits many sins between his baptism and before his penance, and afterward he repents of his fiction: either those sins are remitted without exterior groaning and lamentation, or not. If yes: then actual sin committed after baptism is remitted without exterior satisfaction, which is not said by the Doctors. If it is not remitted: then the grace of baptism does not delete whatever it finds. 7. Besides, a cause ought to be conjoined to its effect: but the grace deleting sin is the effect of baptism: therefore it ought to be conjoined with it: and this is not so in such persons: therefore it seems that it is necessary to be baptized again.

350. Matthew 10:1ff.

§ 57. If perchance it is said, that the character remains, and that it is the cause of grace in such persons: that does not seem to be true, because the character is equally in the good and in the evil: therefore it is not more the cause of good than of evil: because a cause per se of good cannot be with evil, just as neither can the good [itself]; and a cause of evil per se and formally, cannot be with good, just as neither can the evil [itself].

§ 58. Solution. It must be said to the first, that the fictitious receives the character: and it is one way for the work of man, and another way for the work of God. For the work of man can be dead and mortified by man, and this is what proceeds from free will: but the work of God cannot be dead, and this is the sacrament, in which, as will be held below, divine virtue under the covering of visible species works salvation in baptism: and therefore this objection does not hold concerning the sacraments. But the fictitious places an obstacle or bar to grace lest it be made in him.

§ 59. To the next it must be said that the Holy Spirit inasmuch as He is holy, will flee the fictitious, because He does not work holiness in him, but not inasmuch as He is the Spirit operating in the sacraments.

§ 60. To the next it must be said that the character is a spiritual light on the part of the created image distinguishing the faithful from the infidel according to the state of faith, as we will say below in the question about the character: but that light does not have contrariety to sin, just as neither does the light of unformed faith: nor is this said for this reason, that it is unformed faith, but it is a certain splendor proceeding from the uncreated character into the created image, to distinguish the baptized from the unbaptized: and therefore it can be preserved with sin.

§ 61. To the next it must be said that baptism remains in the fictitious one through the remaining of the character, which is properly called the sacrament: and therefore not having an obstacle it works grace, in the mode in which it itself is a cause, namely disposing, and God then effects grace in that one: whence this was false, that baptism passed away, because it remained as it is the character.

§ 62. To the next it must be said that the effect is not said to return: but it is said in the Letter, that baptism begins to avail from that time when fiction recedes. If however it is said to return, then it must be said that it was previously present in the disposing cause, although not in itself.

§ 63. To the next it must be said that by the virtue of baptism only those things are deleted in that one which he committed up to the hour of baptism: but by the virtue of penance the following things are deleted: and therefore for those he ought to receive exterior penance.

§ 64. And as to what is said, that baptism deletes whatever it finds, it is well expounded by Augustine in the Letter: because the external day is deleted there, and the hour itself before baptism, but not those things which are done after, but rather by the virtue of contrition and penance: because a half-pardon cannot be received from God: so that a man would have grace at the same time as fault: and God and the devil would inhabit him at the same time.

§ 65. To the last it must be said that baptism as it is the cause of grace, remains in the character.

§ 66. And as to what is objected concerning the remaining of the cause, it must be said that this is true of a formal cause: but baptism is only a disposing cause, which nevertheless necessarily induces the effect, unless it is impeded by a contrary will.

§ 67. C. How is that to be understood: Whoever of you are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ?

§ 68. Therefore it is inquired how that is accepted: Whoever of you are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ ? It can be said, that those who are baptized in Christ, that is, in conformity to Christ, namely so that they die to the oldness of sin, just as Christ to the oldness of penalty, put on Christ, whom they have inhabiting [them] through grace. It can also be solved otherwise. For in two modes are we said to put on Christ, either by the assumption of the sacrament, or by the perception of the reality. Whence Augustine: Men put on Christ sometimes up to the perception of the sacrament, sometimes up to the sanctification of life: and that first one can be common to the good and the bad, but this latter is proper to the good and the pious. Therefore all who are baptized in the name of Christ, put on Christ, either according to the perception of the sacrament, or according to the sanctification of life.

Articulus 5 — Whether That Saying Of The Apostle Is True, 'As Many As Have Been Baptized Have Put On Christ'

§ 69. Article 5 § 70. Whether that saying of the Apostle is true, Whoever of you are baptized, have put on Christ?

§ 71. ARTICLE V. Whether that saying of the Apostle is true, Whoever of you are baptized, have put on Christ?

§ 72. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, Therefore it is inquired how that is accepted, etc.

§ 73. 1. For Christ is not possessed as a garment except through the habit of virtue: therefore it seems that such men receive the habit of virtue. 2. Also, Christ is not put on except through the new man, as the Apostle seems to say, saying: Put on the new man, who is created according to God in justice, and holiness of truth . But the fictitious one is not renewed. Therefore he does not put on Christ. 3. Also, according to those things which he says in the Letter, then the character is the sacrament: therefore it is the visible form of invisible grace: and this is clearly false, because the character is not sensible, nor visible. If you say, that it is seen by the glorified and blessed: this is nothing: because according to this even grace is visible, because it is seen by them. 4. If you say, that it is seen in another thing, that is, in the tinting (tinctio) done in water: this seems to be nothing: for if something is seen in another thing, when that in which it is seen is not existing, that which was seen in it will not be seen: but the character is not seen except in the tinting: therefore when the tinting is not existing, in no way will it be seen: but when the tinting ceases, the tinting is not: therefore then there is no visible form in that one: therefore no sacrament.

§ 74. Solution. It must be said that although the character according to its name is in the predicament of relation, as a distinguishing sign, nevertheless according to that which it is, it is the habit of a certain light illustrating the image by way of disposition, not altogether sufficiently for salvation: and that will be called here the habit by which the sacrament is possessed, and in it in a qualified sense (secundum quid) Christ is put on, and not simply: and therefore also the Letter does not say that they simply put on Christ, but with this determination, up to the reception of the sacrament.

§ 75. Through this the solution to the following is clear, because the Apostle speaks of those simply putting on Christ.

§ 76. To the next it must be said that the character is the sacrament, and it is visible in the tinting.

§ 77. To this which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although the exercised act of tinting passes away, nevertheless according to having received it, it does not pass away, just as when concerning the past, from its having passed it does not pass away: and to that tinting is referred the visibility of the character: because that tinting was visible in its exercise, and left the cognoscibility of the character in itself thus completed.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Baptism Of Blood And Of Penance Supplies The Place Of The Baptism Which Is Done In Water

§ 78. Article 6 § 79. Whether the baptism of blood and of penance supplies the place of the baptism which is done in water?

§ 80. ARTICLE VI. Whether the baptism of blood and of penance supplies the place of the baptism which is done in water?

§ 81. Next it is inquired concerning the third part of the first question, there, at D, There are also others, as we posited above, etc.

§ 82. And there distinct modes of baptisms are inquired about, which the Master touches upon: because 1. If the baptism of blood supplies the whole baptism, then it seems that it imprints the character. And the same objection is concerning the baptism of penance: but they do not do this: therefore they are of more imperfect effect than the baptism of water. 2. But against this seems to be what Damascenus says, that the baptism of blood is very good, because it is not defiled by secondary filth. 3. Also, penance in one who is already adult is required before the baptism of water, and yet he is bound to baptism: therefore it seems that it cannot supply the place of it. 4. Besides, if these supplied the place of baptism, it would be necessary that they have something similar to it: and what is that? If it is said, that grace remitting sin: this is nothing: because according to this any virtue would supply the place of baptism: but nothing else is found in which they are assimilated, as it seems: therefore they do not supply the place of baptism. 5. Also, John Damascene does not posit only three kinds of baptisms, but nine, namely the baptism of the flood by which the world was baptized, and the baptism of the Red Sea, concerning which the Apostle says: Our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, namely the Red Sea, and all were baptized in Moses, in the cloud and in the sea . The third is the baptism of lustration in the Old Testament. The fourth, the baptism of John. The fifth, the baptism by which the Lord was baptized. The sixth, the baptism of Christ by which we are baptized. The seventh, the baptism in the Holy Spirit and fire, concerning which the Lord said to the disciples: But you will be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days hence . The eighth, the baptism of penance. The ninth, the baptism of blood.

§ 83. Why therefore does the Master touch here upon only three kinds of baptisms?

§ 84. Solution. It must be said that the Master does not touch here upon baptisms unless they are similar to our baptism in the principal effect, which is the remission of sin: and those are only two, namely penance, where an article of necessity, not the contempt of religion, excludes the sacrament: and the effusion of blood, where also the water of baptism, due to an impeding tyrant, cannot be had.

§ 85. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that they do not imprint the character, because the character is a part of the sacrament: but they supply the whole effect, but they do not exhibit those things which are of the sacrament: and thus are the authorities introduced in the Letter understood.

§ 86. To the next it must be said that the baptism of blood is better in this, that it is not defiled by secondary filth, and because it brings the merit of the aureole, and because it scrapes away with the sickle of bitterness the adherence of venial sins: none of which the baptism of water necessarily does: but not in this that it imprints the character, because that is due to the invocation of the trine benediction in the element of water.

§ 87. To the next it must be said that that penance is not required on account of the imperfection of baptism, but rather that fiction may be removed from him who wills to be baptized lest he place an obstacle to the Holy Spirit.

§ 88. To the next it must be said that a certain authority of Augustine noted above must be resumed, through which he proves that whatever of faults is remitted before and after baptism, the whole is done by the virtue of baptism: and therefore penance does not supply the place of baptism, except inasmuch as baptism is in purpose (in proposito): and similarly martyrdom, and this is what he says in the Letter, where an article of necessity, not the contempt of religion excludes the sacrament. And through that purpose it is not only made similar, but the same thing operating differently: because in the baptism of water it operates per se, but in the baptism of penance and blood it operates in purpose, inasmuch as it is in him who dies prevented by the necessity of natural death or of martyrdom.

§ 89. To the division of John Damascene it must be said that the Master does not posit here except those which approach the similarity of baptism on the part of causality: and those are only two directly, and one which approaches it, inasmuch as it is a diminution of the penalty which is the infirmity and proneness of concupiscence, which is the baptism in fire and the Holy Spirit, when infirmity and carnality were removed from the Apostles: but the Master does not touch this, because this is rather of confirmation than of baptism.

§ 90. But if it is inquired concerning the sufficiency of Damascene's division, it must be said that the eight kinds of baptisms are taken according to a nearer or more remote approach to the new, which is the true baptism. But they can approach either on the part of the sign, or on the part of the cause: because true baptism is a sign and a cause. If it is on the part of the sign: either that sign is with respect to water only, and it is the baptism of the flood: or with respect to water and the Spirit and thus is the baptism of the Red Sea, on account of the pillar of fire and the cloud which signifies the Spirit: whence also the Apostle says, that in the cloud and in the sea they were baptized or on the part of water and the Spirit and the passion operating in the sacrament of baptism, and thus the sign was the baptism of lustration in the old law, in which there was water and ashes through the fire of the victim as to the spirit, and blood mixed in on account of the figure of the passion. Or it approaches on the part of water, spirit, passion, and act: and thus is the baptism of John, in which there was a form in the name of the one to come, pre-signifying the Spirit, and the one suffering, and water, and the act of immersion. Or he could posit a sign as to the form and regenerative virtue on the part of the matter, and thus the sign was the baptism by which the Lord was baptized, where the Trinity appeared in the form of a figure, and regenerative force was conferred upon the waters. Nor are there more things in true baptism on the part of the sign except water, the passion, the operating Spirit, and the act, and the regenerating force, and the form: and therefore there are no more kinds approaching it in the rationale of signifying. But in the rationale of causing the approach is either on the part of the diminution of penalty, and thus approaches the baptism in the Holy Spirit and fire, with which the Apostles were baptized on the day of Pentecost: or on the part of the remission of fault, and thus approaches the baptism of penance and blood: and all these again true baptism collects together: because it remits the whole fault, and a part of the penalty of infirmity and proneness.

§ 91. Elsewhere however more questions are found concerning this, which it was not necessary to posit here.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Thief On The Cross Was A Martyr, And Baptized With The Baptism Of Blood

§ 92. Article 7 § 93. Whether the thief on the cross was a martyr, and baptized with the baptism of blood?

§ 94. ARTICLE VII. Whether the thief on the cross was a martyr, and baptized with the baptism of blood?

§ 95. Next it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, at D, around the middle: Concerning that thief to whom, not baptized, it was said, etc.

§ 96. For it seems that this thief was a martyr, and thus was baptized with the baptism of blood, not of contrition and faith in penance. 1. For Jerome speaks thus: "Christ from the cross brought the thief into paradise: and lest anyone should ever think a late conversion too late, He made the penalty of murder into a martyrdom." 2. Also, the act of martyrdom is the penalty of death inflicted in the charity of Christ: but thus the thief suffered: therefore he was a martyr. 3. Also, the Innocents are reputed martyrs on account of an act without will: therefore much more will the thief be reputed a martyr, who had both the act and the will.

§ 97. But against this is, that 1. It is commonly said that the cause makes the martyr, not the penalty: but the thief did not have the cause of the death of a martyr, but of a thief. 2. Also, Peter: If you suffer as malefactors, what glory will you have? As if he were saying: None. Therefore it seems that he was not a martyr.

§ 98. Solution. It must be said that in the truth of the matter he was not a martyr: and what Jerome says is first to be understood as to a certain effect of martyrdom, namely as to the deletion of the guilt of fault: because the temporal penalty informed by charity and the confession of faith deleted for him that penalty which he already had to suffer for his faults: nevertheless it did not confer the accumulation of glory in the aureole which the martyr has.

§ 99. To the next it must be said that the act of martyrdom is one in the thief and in the martyr: but that does not make a martyr, as is clear in the objecting.

§ 100. To the next it must be said that in the infants along with the act there was the cause: because in them Christ was sought, and the cause makes the whole rationale of martyrdom, although it does not make the whole glory of the martyr: because the charity of the sufferer and his devotion contribute to the accumulation of the glory of the sufferer.

Articulus 8 — Whether Infants Who Die In The Mother's Womb, Or Are Born And Depart Without Baptism, Are Punished With Eternal Punishment Or Sensible Punishment, Or With The Punishment Of Loss Only

§ 101. Article 8 § 102. Whether little children who die in the womb of the mother, or pass away born without baptism, are punished with eternal torment, or with sensible punishment, or with the penalty of the loss only?

§ 103. ARTICLE VIII. Whether little children who die in the womb of the mother, or pass away born without baptism, are punished with eternal torment, or with sensible punishment, or with the penalty of the loss only?

§ 104. Next it is inquired concerning this which is said, there, at E, toward the end: Most firmly hold that little children, etc.

§ 105. 1. From these words Augustine seems to imply that little children suffer with sensible penalties: because it is not called a torment (supplicium) unless it is a sensible penalty. 2. This also seems to be the case by another reason: For every deformity of sin is corrected through penalty by the justice of the judge: because otherwise sin would remain unordained in nature: but the foulness of sin is felt in the body of little children, and in the soul, because the flesh is sprinkled with concupiscence which makes the little child concupiscible, and the adult concupiscent, as Augustine says: therefore it seems that it ought to be punished with a sensible penalty. 3. Also, fire will purge the world on account of the infection of sin: and if the world in its elements had sense, it would be sensibly punished: therefore it seems that much more the bodies of infants infected with sin ought to be punished with fire, and also their souls.

§ 1. ON THE CONTRARY: § 2. 1. A sin which is contracted entirely apart from one's own will, and which it was necessary to incur, and could not be avoided, merits the greatest innocence: but the sin of infants is such: therefore it merits the greatest innocence: therefore it ought not to be punished with a sensible penalty.

§ 3. 2. Also, the involuntary through ignorance of fact and through invincible violence merits innocence, since nevertheless in it the doer is in some way not willing: but in original sin there is the involuntary and impotence, and no concomitance with an act: therefore it ought much more to be excused, therefore it ought not to be punished with any sensible penalty.

§ 4. 3. Also, Augustine says that they prefer to be thus than not to be: but it is certain that those who are eternally damned to sensible penalties desire death, and death flees from them: therefore it seems that they do not suffer sensible penalties.

§ 5. This we grasped by saying that they suffer nothing but the punishment of loss [351]. For the ancients distinguished, and well, between the punishment of loss and the punishment of sense, saying that the punishment of loss consists in the taking away of something which is owed to us by the order of nature, such as is the lack of the vision of God, and the lack of eternal felicity: but the punishment of sense is that by which a contrary pain is felt from something afflictive, as the burning of fire, or the constriction of cold, or the like, such as the penalties will be in hell.

§ 6. To the first, therefore, it must be said that Augustine speaks improperly, calling the punishment of loss a torment.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that that evil in the body is punished by the necessity and bitterness of death and reduction to ashes, and not by a subsequent penalty, unless a penal guilt is present, not merely a natural one.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that that fire will burn away the rust of actual sin infecting the elements: because paradise, in which original sin was committed, was cleansed by the casting out of the sinners.

§ 9. But it is further objected: § 10. 1. For it is certain that they know the eternal kingdom has been taken from them on account of original sin: therefore either they grieve concerning the loss, or they do not grieve. If they do not grieve, then it seems that they are foolish and obstinate in malice. If they grieve: then they have an actual penalty.

§ 11. 2. Also, either the worm bites them, or not. If not: then they do not murmur against every sin. If so: since therefore the gnawing of the worm is a certain actual penalty, they seem to be punished sensibly and actually.

§ 12. And to this it must be said that they know themselves to be deprived of the kingdom, but without their own fault, and therefore they excuse themselves inwardly, and would will to have the kingdom: but that will does not induce anguish on account of the cause of the loss: for the reason that it is not their own [fault], but another's, with sufficient excuse.

§ 13. To the other it must be said that the worm never bites concerning that which is not done by one's own fault, but rather from another's fault with the severity of the decree of God: and therefore that objection is founded upon a falsehood.

Articulus 9 — Whether One Ought To Pray For Infants

Whether one ought to pray for infants?

§ 14. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, E, near the end: They are not separated from the fellowship of the faithful, when the Church prays for the faithful, etc.

§ 15. For an injury seems to be done to such, when prayer is made for them: because it is held that they immediately fly away [to heaven].

§ 16. And to these things it must be said that the prayers are praises for the secure, and suffrages for those who have remained on the way.

Articulus 10 — Whether The Effect Of Baptism Is One And Equal In All The Baptized

Whether there is one and equal effect of baptism in all the baptized?

§ 17. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, F, § 1: It is also customarily asked concerning those who are already sanctified, etc.

§ 18. And concerning sanctification in general it could indeed be asked here, but it has been disputed in Book II of the Sentences , and pursued at length.

§ 19. But it seems here that there is one effect in all those approaching baptism: § 20. 1. For of one cause causing in one way the act is one: but baptism is one cause causing in one way in all the baptized: therefore the effect is one.

§ 21. 2. Also, all are justified in the merit of the passion of Christ: but this is related to all in one way: therefore all receive equal grace in baptism.

§ 22. 3. Also, if you should say that in baptism preparation is required: but preparation is only so that it may not find an obstacle, because otherwise infants would not receive grace in baptism: therefore it seems that the infant and the adult receive equal grace in baptism, and any non-fictitious adult with any non-fictitious adult.

351. Luke 23:43.

§ 23. 4. To this some say that the act of baptismal grace is threefold, namely the deletion of universal fault, and the diminution of penalty, and the order of virtues in merits. And as to the first acts, grace is given equally in all, but not as to the third.

§ 24. But it seems to be contrary to this, because to one a hundred sins are remitted, and to another ten: because they have sinned unequally: therefore it seems that the act of the remission of fault is not equal in baptism.

§ 25. Solution. It must be said that this solution is good: and to the first it must be said that although baptism is one cause, nevertheless those approaching baptism do not relate to that cause in the same way: and therefore a different effect is produced as to merit: just as fire is also one cause of burning, yet it burns green wood and dry wood unequally.

§ 26. To the other it must be responded in the same way: because the passion of Christ does not cause grace in us unless it is continued to us: but it is continued through faith and devotion, and these possess a great difference on our part.

§ 27. To the other it must be said that preparation does not consist merely in the avoidance of an obstacle: for although that suffices as to the operation of baptism, nevertheless the quantity of contrition and devotion operates much toward the accumulation of merit, as has been said.

§ 28. To that which is objected against the solution, it must be said that in one it deletes more and in another fewer, this is by accident, because it finds more or fewer in the subject: but it is the same as to its efficacy concerning one and a thousand.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Penal Condition To Which We Are Bound By Sin Is Not Removed Through Baptism

Whether the penalty to which we are bound through sin is not removed by baptism?

Whether the penalty to which we are bound through sin is not removed by baptism?

§ 29. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, F, § 2: It is asked why the penalty to which we are bound for sin, etc.

§ 30. For it seems that that cause which the Master touches upon is nothing: because § 31. 1. Just as the exercise of battle avails to the diminution of sin, so the joyousness of justice avails to the increase of merit, and this is a better good than the diminution of debt for sin.

§ 32. 2. Also, there seems to be no other cause, lest men should place the hope of beatitude in baptism: because if every penalty were removed, then ignominy would also be removed, and thus they would know well that the hope of beatitude must be placed in another.

§ 33. 3. Also, it seems that the penalty of concupiscence is deleted, or that original sin returns: for given a sufficient and efficient cause, the effect is posited: but the infection of the flesh through penalty, and not fault (I mean the penalty of concupiscence) is the entire cause that the soul is fouled by original fault when it is infused: therefore if the same cause remains in the body after baptism, the same effect will return: therefore it will be infected with original fault, as before.

§ 34. If you should say that then it has grace repugnant to the form: and therefore it cannot infect. ON THE CONTRARY: Let grace be removed just as it is removed by subsequent actual sin; therefore then with actual sin original sin will return. Lest therefore this should happen, it seems that at least the whole penalty of concupiscence ought to have been removed.

§ 35. If perchance this should be conceded. ON THE CONTRARY: One having original sin ought to be baptized, or else the original sin is not deleted in him; but no one is to be baptized repeatedly: therefore no one receives original sin after he has once been without it.

§ 36. Solution. Besides the causes assigned here, the Doctors have been accustomed to posit seven others, of which the first is that man might be humbled. Whence, Job 6:4: The arrows of the Lord are in me, the indignation whereof drinketh up my spirit , that is, pride.

§ 37. The second, that fear of this kind may be struck into him, Job 6:4: The terrors of the Lord war against me.

§ 38. The third is, that an example of not sinning may be given from the trace of ancient plagues, Zech. 13:5: Adam is my example from my youth .

§ 39. The fourth is, that man might recognize himself, Isa. 28:19: Vexation alone shall make you understand what you hear.

§ 40. The fifth, a stimulation to one going to the Lord, Micah 2:10: Arise, and go, because you have not rest here.

§ 41. The sixth, a showing of friendship, Heb. 12:6: For he scourges every son whom he receives. Hosea 11:4: I will draw them with the cords of Adam, with the bands of love.

§ 42. The seventh, the exercise of virtues, Judges 3:1-4: These are the nations which the Lord left, that by them he might instruct Israel.

§ 43. The Master assigns other causes in the Letter, as is evident.

§ 44. To the first, therefore, it must be said that for a man punished and made proud through a disposition to sin, nothing is better and more cautious than a cause of humiliation: because if he did not have that whereby he might be humbled, then he would be disposed to evil: so that it is fitting that after the first fall he would never believe that he would fall through the appetite for sublime things, as he fell at first. Whence another thing can be better in itself, and yet not be better for a man thus disposed.

§ 45. To the other it must be said that the whole penalty cannot be removed in this life, nor can this be the effect of the sacrament, but rather it is the effect of glory: but the Master assigns a certain cause why God did not will that it should be the effect of sacramental grace.

§ 46. To the other it must be said that the fomes remaining in the flesh does not remain in the same power in which it was before: because it does not remain in the power of infecting the soul of which it is the subject. But it is true that from it can be separated the seed which will infect the soul that will be created to be united to it. And this is so because the fomes has been weakened as to this soul, and not as to another, through the passion of the Lord and the sacrament: and this well happens: because when the grain is shaken out from the chaff, it does not produce chaff for the same grain, but for another. Similarly, when the uncircumcised is circumcised, he can no longer be uncircumcised, but he well generates one uncircumcised.

§ 47. And if the cause of this is asked, I say that this is because the fomes draws the power of infecting the soul from the sentence of the Lord, and from fault: and therefore it cannot infect except where it is in the character of the first origin: but in this one who has been purged, it is not in the character of the first origin: because it is not infected in the seminal principle of Adam: and therefore it infects him no more, but another in whom it is in the character of the first origin, namely in every father who, as he generates, is Adam with respect to his offspring.

Articulus 12 — Whether In One Baptized With Fiction The Reality Precedes The Sacrament; And Whether, The Fiction Not Receding, It Is Truly A Sign

Whether in one fictitiously baptized the reality precedes the sacrament? and, Whether, the fiction not departing, it is truly a sign?

Whether in one fictitiously baptized the reality precedes the sacrament? and, Whether, the fiction not departing, it is truly a sign?

§ 48. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, G, about the middle: Neither should you marvel that the reality sometimes precedes, etc.

§ 49. For it seems that the solution of the Master here does not suffice: because § 50. 1. Let us posit that the fiction never departs, then it does not seem to be a sign, nor a cause: therefore it is not a sacrament.

§ 51. 2. Also, every sign is a sign of something: therefore one must posit that either in the future, or in the present, or in the past: therefore if it is posited in none of these ways, it seems that it is not a sign.

§ 52. Solution. It must be said that it is a sign of the grace which it causes, so far as it is in itself: just as the sun always causes splendor so far as it is in itself, although it may be hindered by the opposition of a cloud: and through this the solution to the first is clear.

§ 53. To the other it must be said that the effect is posited as to the order of the cause to the caused: and here there is nothing unfitting because many future things are in the order of causes, which will never happen: and therefore it is also a sign of a thing which is future in a certain respect, that is, in the order of cause.

Articulus 13 — Whether Grace Is Given To Infants In Baptism; And Whether They Have The Virtues

Whether grace is given to infants in baptism? and, Whether they have virtues?

§ 54. Next it is asked concerning the last chapter of this distinction, there, H, It is also customarily asked, etc.

§ 55. For it seems that they have virtues: because § 56. 1. Virtue is a good quality of the mind by which one lives rightly, which no one uses badly, which God works in us without us: therefore they have virtues.

§ 57. 2. Also, it is certain that the evil habit of sin is inborn in them: therefore the sacrament of the Redeemer would now be able to do less than the sin of Adam, if a generally justifying habit were not caused in them: therefore the habit of virtues.

§ 58. 3. Also, the potency of the soul always looks to a determinate object, whether it proceeds into it, or not: therefore it is perfected by a determinate habit: but this is virtue: therefore infants have virtues, and they receive them in baptism.

§ 59. But against this is what is said upon that, For perhaps for a good man one would dare to die, etc. . For there the Gloss distinguishes between good and just: because good is the innocence of life, as infants: but just [is understood] by the exercise of virtues: therefore infants do not have virtues.

§ 60. 2. Also, if infants have virtues, and he who has one, has all: then they have faith and hope, which Augustine notes, because he says: They do not have faith except according as baptism is the sacrament of faith.

§ 61. Solution. It must be said that it is easy to determine the prolixity here, which some posit as great. And the Master excellently solves it in the Letter, namely that they have the virtues in gift (in munere), and they do not have them in use: and this does not happen on account of the imperfection of the virtues, but rather on account of the imperfection of free choice which is the subject of the virtues.

§ 62. Whence in the first argument the force is in what is said, by which one lives rightly: for if it is understood by which one lives rightly in habit, it is true: because as Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, a habit is that by which one does something, when it is time: and thus the infant has within himself that whereby he can live well: as Dionysius says: Coming into sense, that is, into the use of free choice.

§ 63. To the other it must be said that they have the virtues in the gift of habit, as the Master says.

§ 64. And through this the solution to the following is also clear.

§ 65. TO THAT which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it seems to be nothing: because the Gloss says just in the exercise of virtues, and exercise names an act: but infants are called just from habit.

§ 66. To the other it must be said that they have faith in habit: and the sacrament of baptism for this much is said to be the sacrament of faith, because it gives faith in habit, although not in act.

DISTINCTIO V

Divisio Textus

§ 67. After these things it is to be known that the sacrament of baptism, etc. In this fifth distinction the Master asks, If anyone can baptize? because a good and a bad man equally. Secondly, that the power of authority remains with God: but the power of ministry is with men, there, B, Because they have only a ministry, etc. Thirdly, he determines what is the power which He could have given and did not give, there, C, Here it is asked what is that power, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether He Who Ought To Baptize Ought To Have Order And Jurisdiction, And Be Just

Whether he who ought to baptize, ought to have order and jurisdiction, and be just?

§ 68. A question occurs here, however, around the beginning, who ought to baptize. And three things are asked, namely whether it is necessary to have order and jurisdiction for this, that one may baptize? Secondly, Whether it is necessary to have a good life? Thirdly, concerning certain cases which occur sometimes around those being baptized.

§ 69. To the first it is objected thus: § 70. 1. Baptism is a sacrament of the Church: therefore it consists in the dispensation of ministers: but ministers are those having order and jurisdiction: therefore it seems , that he neither ought nor can baptize, unless he has both.

§ 71. 2. Also, Isidore: It is certain that baptism has been handed down to priests alone, and its ministry: nor has it been permitted to the deacons themselves: therefore it seems that he neither ought nor can baptize, unless he is a priest having jurisdiction.

§ 72. 3. Also, among the sacraments there is one which is the sacrament of sacraments, and this is Order: therefore he who does not have this, does not have the power of baptizing: since to baptize is to dispense the greatest sacrament.

§ 73. 4. Also, the order of the Church is like the order of the body: but in the body nourishment does not descend from the mouth to any member whatsoever, but to the stomach, and from that through the veins ordinately to the liver, and heart, and other members consequently: therefore similarly it ought to be in the mystical body: therefore if that order is not observed, the baptized does not attain grace: therefore it seems that he ought not to baptize, except he who is constituted in grade by the Church.

§ 74. ON THE CONTRARY: An old woman baptizes, and it is baptized: therefore what was said is not required.

§ 75. But it is FURTHER asked concerning the second: § 76. 1. For Augustine says, and it is held in the Letter, that those baptizing ought to be just: the ministers of so great a judge ought to be just: therefore one of two things seems to follow: either that the unjust do not baptize, or if they baptize, that they sin mortally by baptizing.

§ 77. 2. Also, in baptism there is an act of man and an act of God: but the act of man is never pleasing unless he is in grace who makes it pleasing to him: therefore when this sinner immerses, his work is unpleasing to God: because immersion is the work of man: therefore either nothing is conferred upon the boy or the baptized, or the baptizer sins mortally: because upon the one or upon both it is necessary that the offense of divine ingratitude fall.

§ 78. 3. Also, we see in our body, that a withered member, although official by form and figure, merely on account of the defect of spirit in it, life and sense are not derived from it to others: but rather if it is of the principal [members], all the other members die: but those dispensing the sacraments are members of the Church, through whom the life of grace and the sense of the intelligence of God is transfused into the whole Church: therefore if they themselves wither in life, all the other members are corrupted: therefore it is necessary that the ministers be good.

§ 79. 4. Also, when Christ determined the ministers, he determined them by signs of sanctity, as is held, Mark 16:20, and Heb. 2:4: God witnessing with signs, and portents, and various virtues, and distributions of the Holy Spirit according to his will. But it is not lawful to transgress the determination of Christ. Therefore it is necessary still to be such that they might not dispense the sacraments.

§ 80. 5. Also, Malachi 2:2: I will curse your blessings. And in the same place, the Gloss of Jerome: Whatever is blessed by you, is cursed by me. Therefore it seems also that it is dangerous to permit such to baptize.

§ 81. ON THE CONTRARY: § 82. 1. In the Letter it is held that Judas baptized, and they were baptized.

§ 83. 2. Also, whether he be a drunkard or a homicide, etc., it is always baptized if he baptizes.

§ 84. FURTHER it is asked here concerning a simoniacal priest who sells the sacraments, and is unwilling to baptize unless hired for a price, whether in such a case he ought to be permitted?

§ 85. It seems, that he ought not: because § 86. 1. Evils are not to be done that good may come but the buyer is made simoniacal, just as the seller: therefore it seems that such a one rather ought to die without baptism.

§ 87. If perchance you say that in that case another can baptize. ON THE CONTRARY: Let us posit that there is no other except the priest, and an adult is to be baptized: then it seems that he rather ought to die than be thus baptized.

§ 88. 2. Also, let us posit that no one has water except the priest, and the father of the boy sees the boy perishing: either he will buy, and then he commits simony: or not, and then he permits the boy to perish when he could help: but it seems that he ought to permit him to perish: because no one ought to commit himself to peril even by a venial sin so that another may escape eternal death: therefore much less on account of the liberation of a boy ought he to commit himself to the peril of simony.

§ 89. Solution. It must be said to the first, that the true minister with respect to the Lord and the Church is one having order and jurisdiction and [good] life: but in a time of necessity it is anyone, even an old woman, having neither male sex, nor order, nor jurisdiction, nor good life.

§ 90. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that those reasons do not prove, except what kind of minister there ought to be: but in this sacrament something reshapes the sin, namely necessity: and therefore the most generous piety of God, who wills no one to perish: just as He provided a common matter which can be had by all, and found everywhere: so also He willed that in a time of necessity anyone could immerse another.

§ 91. It must nevertheless be said to the first, that dispensation is in two ways, namely as to office, and thus that reason speaks truly: and as to the abundance of God's mercy and the necessity of the sacrament, and thus it does not hold.

§ 92. To the other it must be said that Isidore excepts the time of necessity from that authority, saying, except in a time of necessity, in which it is permitted to all.

§ 93. To the other it must be said that a layman baptizing or an old woman, baptizes, and does not have the power of baptizing from order. For there is a power from order, and the objection proceeds from that: there is also a power from the necessity of salvation, and this descends immediately upon anyone from God who has not bound His power to the sacrament of order.

§ 94. To the other it must be said that that similitude of the Apostle of the mystical body to the natural, is not attended to except in the order of offices, and not in the descent of grace: because anyone has grace immediately from God: and therefore also the act of the ministry of salvation, when necessity compels, anyone receives from God.

§ 95. To that which is further asked in the part or distinction, it must be responded that one must also distinguish the times. For as much as it is on the part of baptism, baptism is equal whether it is given by a good man or by a bad one: but on the part of the baptizer, if he is in mortal sin, I say that either that sin is notorious, or occult. If notorious, either it is in a place of necessity, so that namely there is no other baptizer, and thus a peril: then I say that with fear on account of necessity the baptizer is not made guilty, but does well. But if it is not a time of necessity: then he scandalizes, and unworthily usurps the act of the sacrament, and I think that he sins mortally or gravely. But if it is occult, either scandal is feared if he does not baptize: and it is a time of necessity, or not a time of necessity, or scandal is not feared from this for this reason if he does not baptize. But if the scandal of the presumption of sin against his reputation is feared, and it is a time of necessity, he can baptize without sin. Also, if it is not a time of necessity, and scandal is feared, I think that still with fear he can baptize. But if no scandal is feared, nor is it a time of necessity, I think that he sins gravely by presuming to baptize: and through this the solution to the first two is sufficiently clear.

§ 96. To the other it must be said that it is not similar concerning the official members in our body, and concerning sacramental grace: because our members give and prepare nourishment for each other by an interior preparation: but in the Church the minister does not operate except exteriorly: and grace is not from him, but immediately from God: and therefore without corruption grace passes to the soul through the ministry of man which is only exterior.

§ 97. To the other it must be said that Christ does not so much determine the minister as to suitability as also according to the optimum state of ministers: nevertheless because He did not repel Judas, He intimated that bad ministers must also sometimes be tolerated.

§ 98. To the other it must be said that the pronoun your notes a discretion, namely, I will curse your blessings, namely, because they are so much yours, that they are not mine: but such blessings are not sacraments, because those are divine blessings.

§ 99. To the Gloss of Jerome it must be said in the same way, that when it is said: Whatever is blessed by you, it notes discretion in the pronoun.

§ 100. To that which is further asked concerning the cases, there are those who respond diversely: for some concede the objects as they conclude. But it seems to me that they are not to be conceded: for the reason that one seeking baptism does not buy water, nor does he buy the act of baptizing: but in a time of necessity he can redeem the vexation of his right, both for himself if he is to be baptized, as the first case says: and for a boy, if he has a son or another whom he wills to be baptized. And then evils are not done that good may come, nor is simony committed on the part of the one seeking baptism, nor does he even commit himself to peril for the salvation of another.

§ 101. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Drunkard, A Murderer, An Adulterer Can Baptize

Whether a drunkard, a homicide, an adulterer can baptize?

§ 102. Next it is asked concerning what is said, there, A, around the middle: If therefore a drunkard, a homicide, an adulterer baptized them.

§ 103. For drunkard (ebriosus) names an obstruction of discretion: and if discretion is not had, intention is not had, but perversity in the act of baptizing: but the intention and the due act not being had, there is no baptism: therefore a drunkard cannot baptize, as it seems.

§ 104. Next to this it is asked, When someone is so drunk that his tongue is tied, and the use of reason and discretion is not lost, whether he can baptize?

§ 105. If so: then the form of words not being uttered by him who is knowledgeable in Latin speech, it can be baptism, which seems to be false, because the form is of the substance of the sacrament. If not: this seems false: because let us posit that it is a time of necessity, and in no way is there one who could baptize, except such a one, and he has not lost discretion through wine: therefore conscience dictates to him that he ought to succor this one: therefore if he does not do it, he sins mortally: therefore he would be perplexed [in a moral dilemma], which is against the Doctors who say that no one is perplexed.

§ 106. Solution. It must be said to the first, that it is one thing concerning one who is drunk (ebrius) and one who is a drunkard (ebriosus): for a drunkard is not always drunk: and therefore when he is sober, retaining nevertheless the sin of drunkenness, he can baptize, the sin not resisting: and in such a case Augustine speaks. But one who is drunk, in whom reason is suffocated, does not seem to be able to baptize.

§ 107. To the other case it must be said that if there were no other, then such a one ought to baptize: because although such drunkenness strikes the nerves with an inordinate motion of the tongue, nevertheless he can form the words with study: and because he has discretion, he can and ought to study to do this: but if he could express no form, it would be otherwise: but such drunkenness which does not bind reason does not avail to have so great an effect.

Articulus 3 — Whether A Heretic And A Schismatic Can Baptize

Whether a heretic and a schismatic can baptize?

Whether a heretic and a schismatic can baptize?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, A, around the middle: "If in any heresy or schism," etc.

For against this is the following: § 1. He who does not believe does not seem to be able to intend; therefore, a heretic does not baptize, since intention is required for the sacrament.

§ 2. Again, it is said that faith is first premised, and baptism follows, when it is stated: "He who believes and is baptized," etc. [352] Therefore, faith is necessary for the sacrament; therefore, a heretic cannot baptize.

§ 3. If you say that this is true on the part of the Church or of the baptized, but not on the part of the baptizer: this is nothing, because there it is also premised concerning the baptizer. For when He had commanded the Gospel to be preached, He afterwards added: "Baptizing them," etc. Therefore, faith is required on the part of the baptizer.

§ 4. Again, Baptism is called the sacrament of faith. Therefore, it seems that faith is required for that sacrament.

§ 5. Again, a confession of faith is required even from the baptizer when he baptizes, so that the due solemnity of baptism may be preserved, as is clear in the interrogations of the godparents. Therefore, it seems that he himself must also have faith. Therefore, a heretic does not baptize. The contrary of this, however, is proved in many ways in the following distinction.

§ 6. Solution. It must be said that a heretic baptizing in a heretical form does not baptize; and according to this understanding the martyr Cyprian said that heretics do not baptize. But a heretic baptizing in the form of the Church, even with the intention, baptizes in the form of faith and the faith of the Church, and therefore that which he so baptizes is baptized. And Augustine in the book against the Donatist gives a fitting example of this: for just as Jacob begot the blessed seed not only through the womb of the free women, but also through the womb of the handmaids, so Christ regenerates not only by the ministry of the faithful, but also by the ministry of infidels, because the act is His, not man's; and in this the efficacy of the sacrament is shown.

§ 7. Therefore, to the first it must be said that he who does not have faith can intend to do what the Church does, even if he does not intend to induce the effect of baptism. But such an intention of the act which the Church performs suffices for the sacrament of baptism.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that the faith which is required for baptism is the faith of the Church, and not of the baptizer.

§ 9. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that preaching the Gospel does not precede baptism as necessary, but as expedient, in which we are taught how baptism will be preserved; and therefore it contributes to the well-being, and not to the essence of the sacrament.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that all this is of the well-being, and not of the essence; because the sacrament is said to be the sacrament of the faith not of the giver, but of the receiver; and if he also is an infidel, and yet receives the sacrament in the form of the Church, it is called of the faith which ought to be, not which is, just as the Master says above about the feigner remaining in his fiction unto the end of his life.

Articulus 4 — What Is The Power That The Lord Retained To Himself, And That Which He Gave To Ministers, And That Which He Could Have Given And Did Not Give

What is the power which the Lord retained for Himself, and which He gave to the ministers, and which He could have given and did not give?

Next, it is asked concerning what is said there, B: "Because they have only the ministry, not the power of baptism," etc.

It is asked here, what is the power which the Lord retained for Himself, and which He gave to the ministers, and which He could have given and did not give?

For it seems that: § 1. He could have given the power of cooperation toward interior cleansing, so that just as one cooperates with the Lord exteriorly, one would thus cleanse interiorly with Him. First, because the Master says this in the text of the following chapter.

§ 2. Secondly, because He gave man the power to expel demons. But it is less to expel an effect than its cause. Since, therefore, sin is the effect of the demon, He could have conferred on man that he should expel sin.

§ 3. Again, a creature which is a substance is more worthy than that which is an accident, and among substances the rational is the most worthy. But grace is an accident, and man is a rational substance; therefore, man is more worthy than grace. But to grace God conferred the power of expelling sin; therefore, much more could He have conferred this on man or the rational soul.

352. Cf. Augustine's concepts on the punishment of unbaptized infants, often referred to as poena damni (the punishment of loss) as opposed to poena sensus (the punishment of sense).

§ 4. Again, upon that text: "He it is who baptizes," the Gloss says: "That is, cleanses from sins."

Also, in the same place Augustine says that John learned from Christ that He could have given the ministers the power of cleansing from sins, and did not give it. But this is through the power of remitting sin, and of cooperation toward interior cleansing; therefore, He could have given this.

§ 5. Again, it is commonly objected that He gave to certain herbs and words and stones the power of curing spiritual diseases.

But against this seems to be that: § 6. Augustine says that it is a greater thing to make a pious man out of an impious one than to create heaven and earth; but He could not have given the power of creating heaven and earth, as they say; therefore, neither the power of making a pious man out of an impious one.

§ 7. Again, the impious does not become pious except by some creature created out of nothing, namely, grace; since therefore the act of omnipotence is to create, as was proved at the beginning of Book II of the Sentences, this could not befit any creature; therefore, He could not communicate that power.

§ 8. Again, suppose that He gave that power to man. Then man can go forth into the act of cleansing. Therefore, he can cleanse the sinner whether the sinner wills it or not, which would be inordinate. Therefore, He could not have conferred that power on man.

§ 9. Again, if you say that God could have conferred it, but none of the ministers could have received it: this is nothing, because here it is asked about the power which He could have given and the minister could have received, but God did not give it.

§ 10. Solution. The Doctors distinguish here a multiplicity of power, namely of authority, of invocation, of excellence, of ministry, and of cooperation. The power of authority is that by which God is the first cause of justification in baptism, and without which no other power can do anything; and this (as they say) He could not communicate to another: just as He cannot communicate to another that he be God. And this is found in the text.

The power of invocation is that He would give to the name of some man the power that at the invocation of his name sanctification and the effect of baptism would be brought about, as happens at the invocation of the Trinity, as also sometimes happens at the invocation of the name of Christ; and this (as they say) He could have conferred, but willed not to do so, and this wisely, lest the hope of salvation and help be placed in man, and thus gradually he should be worshipped in place of God, or begin to be worshipped.

The power of excellence is expounded in two ways by different people. The common exposition is that according to the merits and ranks of the baptizers the effect of baptism would be more excellent or less excellent, so that it would be better if given by a better or greater person in the Church; and this again (as they say) He could have given, but willed not to, lest there be as many baptisms as baptizers; because there had to be one baptism, just as there is one Passion which operates in it, and one original sin which is substantially cured in it.

Certain others, being few, expound the power of excellence differently, namely that it is of excellence in act, so that without the rite of baptism he could absolve from sin, opening the kingdom as if without a key; and they say this was conferred on Christ alone. And the first exposition is better and more common. He gave this, however, only to Christ who is God and man, so that there would not be many heads of the Church, just as the Church is only one.

The power of ministry is that the exterior rite of baptism be committed to dispensation; and this God conferred on all ministers of the Church.

The power of cooperation is that which the Master touches upon in the text, namely that man should have the ministry of curing interiorly or cooperating with God, just as he has it exteriorly; and this, according to the Master, He could have conferred, but willed not to, lest the hope of salvation be believed to be in another, or to depend on another than God, and lest grace be thought to depend on the act of man, if God were to require the work of man to confer grace.

Therefore, the power of authority He neither could have conferred, nor did He confer; but the power of the exterior ministry in which the minister cooperates with God, He could have conferred and did confer. However, the power of invocation, of excellence, and of interior cooperation He could have conferred, but did not confer for the aforesaid reasons.

§ 11. According to this distinction, to the objections it must be said that the first objections seem to prove that He could have conferred on man [the power] to justify; and this is not true. But He could have conferred that, by some operation of spiritual power, he might dispose to justification, just as a sacrament operates by disposing.

Therefore, to the first it must be said that the Master in the text understands [it] concerning the cooperation of disposition.

To the next it must be said that to expel a demon from the infestation of a body is less than to expel sin, because God alone remits sin through the fact that God alone creates grace, by which sins are formally remitted.

To the next it must be said that such arguments are worth nothing, because the dignity of grace and of the rational creature is equivocal. For the dignity of the rational creature is among substances, because it is capable of beatitude, and in this it is preferred to grace. But the dignity of grace is the dignity of a form expelling sin by contrariety, and grace is preferred to man in this, because man or the rational creature cannot be such a form.

To the next it must be said that this is understood concerning the power of disposition toward cleansing, and not concerning the power of giving or creating grace.

To the next it must be said that there is no similarity between the curing of bodies and of souls; because stones and herbs, out of powers consequent upon contrarieties, have their complexions [related] to the causes of bodily diseases; but man can have no such comparison to the cause of spiritual disease; and words do not cure except through invocation.

§ 12. To the other which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that all those things prove only concerning the effective power of justification and vivification, and not the dispositive power. And it is well conceded that He could not give that, neither to Christ as man, nor to another, nor even the power of creating; and the reason for this was dispatched in the Third Book of the Sentences.

Articulus 5 — Whether John Knew Christ, And What He Knew About Him

Whether John knew Christ, and what he knew about Him?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, B, near the beginning: "What did John the Baptist know? The Lord. What did he not know," etc.

For Augustine says that he knew Him to be the Lamb taking away the sins of the world; but he did not know that He was going to retain for Himself the power of baptizing and not give it to others. But Jerome and Chrysostom say the contrary to this, namely that he did not know Him to be the Christ born in the world, and that through His death He was going to redeem the world. Therefore, there seems to be a contrariety between them.

§ 1. Solution. It must be said that both are true, because there is a simple knowledge of Christ, and there is a knowledge of Him in this or that form in which He came to John. Therefore, he knew that He was born and was going to redeem the world, but he did not know that this man who came to him among others was the Christ, before he saw the dove descending, just as God had said to him in the desert; and then he said: "I ought to be baptized by You, and do You come to me?" And Chrysostom assigns the cause for this in his Commentary, saying that in his youth he had known Him, but having dwelled for a long time in the desert he had lost the imagination of His face; and therefore he did not know Him under the form of coming to him, and yet knew Him to have been born as such in the world.

Articulus 6 — Whether Christ As Man Had The Power Of Forgiving Sins

Whether Christ as man had the power of remitting sins?

Next, it is asked concerning what he says there, C, toward the end: "Thus therefore He could have given," etc.

Therefore, it seems that Christ as man had the power of remitting sins: because

§ 1. It is said: "But that you may know that the Son of Man has power on earth to forgive sins," etc. For the Son of Man is Christ according to human nature. Therefore, it seems that He can also confer it on another man.

§ 2. Again, in the Third Book of the Sentences it was held that Christ according to human nature is the redeemer; but He could not redeem unless sin were remitted; therefore, it seems that He Himself could remit sins according to this nature.

§ 3. Again, it is more to redeem than to create, as Augustine says. If therefore He could redeem according to human nature, He could also according to it create the grace by which man is justified.

BUT AGAINST THIS: § 4. Bernard says that grace is not from the man Christ, but only from God. Therefore, He could not have the power of cleansing the soul. But it has often been proved above that to create is an act of infinite power, and of divine omnipotence alone. But Christ as man was not susceptible of that power, that He should justify souls interiorly.

§ 5. Solution. Almost all say that Christ as man was not susceptible of that power.

Therefore, to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the Son of Man wished there to prove His deity; and therefore this belongs to the Son of Man insofar as He is God.

To the next it must be said that God is the redeemer, and baptism is attributed to the man, because in human nature He endured the passions by which He satisfied for us.

But if it is asked, what was the power which the Father gave Him above others?

§ 6. It must be said according to the Doctors that it was the power of excellence toward act, namely that He could loose without the office of the keys as the Lord of the universal Church. For Christ is not read to have received orders, but to have given them; nor to have had power by measure, but for all things. And this power of excellence was given to Christ, which to others in virtue of the keys and of order is both limited and handed down.

DISTINCTIO VI

Divisio Textus

Division of the Text

"Now let us add to whom it is permitted to baptize," etc. In this last part, he treats of baptism on the part of the baptizer.

And this distinction is divided into two parts: in the first of which he touches upon five questions concerning those baptizing and those to be baptized. But in the second part he treats of the sacramentals, there, G: "Furthermore, all coming to baptism," etc.

In the first of these (as has been said) there are five questions, namely, concerning the power of those baptizing. The second is, whether anyone attains the habit of baptismal grace in the mother's womb? there, B: "By this word also it is to be known, that in the maternal womb," etc. The third is concerning the corruption of words out of ignorance of the language, there, C: "It is also customarily asked, If corruptly," etc. The fourth is concerning that of which it is doubted whether it is baptism, there, D: "Furthermore it is to be known, that those of whom no indications exist," etc. The fifth, concerning those jokingly baptized, there, E: "It is also customarily asked concerning him who jokingly," etc.

Also there are added some things concerning the intention of those baptizing, and concerning the time of baptism.

Articulus 1 — Whether Anyone At All Can Be A Minister Of The Church

Whether anyone can be a minister of the Church?

A doubt arises concerning the first part: Whether the minister of baptism is anyone, as seems to be said in the text?

But it seems not, because: § 1. Baptism is a sacrament of the Church. But the sacraments of the Church are committed to the dispensation of the ministers of the Church; therefore, baptism also. Since, therefore, the ministers of the Church are none but the Prelates, it seems that none but the Prelates alone have the power of baptizing.

§ 2. Again, among the sacraments there is one which is the sacrament of sacraments, namely that of Order. Therefore, it seems that the administration of all the others pertains to the ordained person; not therefore to anyone, as seems to be said in the text.

§ 3. Again, Christ sent only the Apostles and disciples to baptize. Therefore, it seems that none have the power of baptizing except their successors; but these are the Prelates. Therefore, it seems that none ought to baptize except a Prelate.

§ 4. Again, there is no power except from God, as is said by the Apostle; and those things that are from God are ordained. Therefore, it seems that the power of baptism falls under that order. But no ordered act from any power is committed to all indifferently; therefore, neither is this act. Therefore, not anyone can baptize, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, the Apostle says that just as in one body we have many members, but all the members, though they are many, do not have the same act, so we, being many, are one body in Christ. Therefore, just as it is in the natural body, so it ought to be in the mystical body. But in the natural body nourishment is digested in one member and transmitted to others, because it is not given immediately to each single one; therefore, it ought to be similarly in the mystical body. Therefore, there will be determinate ministers through whom baptism and baptismal grace are given, and not anyone will be a baptizer, as it seems.

But against this is that: § 6. It is said in the text.

§ 7. Again, because baptism is a sacrament of necessity. And if it were committed to some, since they could not be near to everyone, it would happen that many would be endangered, which would be against God's mercy and the providence of the Church. Therefore, the power of baptizing ought to have been committed to all.

§ 8. Solution. It must be said that there is power and the commission of power. Due power is in him who has power from order, and authority or jurisdiction from authority, and suitability from the merit of his life; and such a one alone is worthily and truly a minister. But he who has order and jurisdiction and not the life, is indeed truly a minister, but not suitably or worthily; and in this way the arguments first introduced proceed. But on account of the necessity of this sacrament and the mode of the fault against which it is, that sacrament receives administration from anyone. And the necessity is from the generality of the danger, as was said in objecting, but the mode of the fault is original [sin], for which Christ satisfied as far as He was concerned, and alien faith suffices for that satisfaction to avail the baptized. Now this faith can be protested in the act of anyone; and therefore in time of necessity anyone can baptize.

§ 9. Therefore, to the first, second, third, and fourth, it must be said that this is true as regards order from jurisdiction and suitability; but another pact reforms in baptism, as was said.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that grace, which is the nourishment of the mystical body as regards spiritual life, is given immediately by God to every member, and therefore as regards this it is not similar. But there is a certain utility in exterior graces which are for well-being, such as prophecy, knowledge, and the like; and as regards those, there is a similarity between the mystical and natural body; and such a grace is the order of power and jurisdiction. And therefore in such graces one member of the mystical body receives from another.

Articulus 2 — Whether A Heretic Can Baptize

Whether a heretic can baptize?

Next, it is asked concerning what is said there, "... baptized by heretics," etc.

For it seems that a heretic cannot baptize. § 1. For the Psalm says: "The sparrow has found herself a house, and the turtle-dove a nest for herself, where she may lay her young." Therefore, outside the house there is no laying of young. But it is clear that a heretic is outside the house; therefore, he does not lay the young of the Church. Therefore, he does not baptize.

§ 2. Again, it is written: "Whatever the unclean person touches, he shall make unclean." And this authority is introduced in the text; therefore, it seems that he does not baptize.

§ 3. Again, John saw the earthly Jerusalem descending from the heavenly. Therefore, because it does not descend from the heavenly, it is not of the earthly Jerusalem, that is, of the Church militant. Therefore, it seems that since the church of malignant heretics does not descend according to order from the heavenly, it confers nothing in the earthly.

§ 4. Again, a stomach or liver ejected outside the body of a man can in no act subserve the remaining members. But a heretic is like a member ejected outside the body; therefore, he subserves the mystical body in nothing; therefore, he cannot confer the baptismal character.

§ 5. Again, Dionysius, speaking of the sacramental character, says that it is given to the receiver by the hierarch. The hierarch is constituted in a sacred order in the Church, and a heretic is not such; therefore, it seems that he himself cannot confer the sacramental character.

§ 6. Furthermore, for the generation of the Church the womb of the Church is required. But the womb of the Church and the womb of the conventicles of heretics are not the same. Therefore, it seems that those who receive the sacraments in the conventicles of heretics do not receive the character.

But against this is: § 7. Whatever is said in the text, except for the authorities of Cyprian.

§ 8. Again, it was said to John, as was held in the premises, that "He it is who baptizes." Therefore, by whomever the prescribed form of words is said in due matter, God is always the one baptizing intrinsically. Therefore, the character is imprinted, because it is clear that grace is not conferred in a baptism which a heretic known to be cut off confers, if an adult is baptized who knows him to be outside the Church.

§ 9. Solution. It must be said that whoever baptizes, intending and observing the form of the Church, whether he be a heretic or not, he confers the baptismal character, at least, as was held above concerning those putting on Christ up to the reception of the sacrament.

§ 10. But to the first that is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the nest of the Church is the form of the sacraments; and those are not the nests of heretics. And therefore when they lay their young in them, they lay them not outside the Church, but in it; and even if they are afterwards trampled upon by the devil, this is not because of the imperfection of the sacraments, but rather because of the perniciousness of fiction.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that this is understood of a touch which is similar to physical touch: so that if in touching he imitates the touch according to the quantity of the one touching, that is, that the heretic touches in imitation of heresy: for thus it is true that he who is touched will himself be unclean. But when a heretic touches in the form of the sacraments of the Church, that touch is likened to a leper having his hands wrapped in a exceedingly clean white cloth, and therefore unable to make unclean.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that although the rite and convention of heresy does not descend from the triumphant Church, yet it usurps that which descends from the triumphant Church, when it usurps the sacraments of the Church.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that it is not similar; because a heretic is not entirely outside the Church, because he usurps the act of an interior member and its ministry, when he takes the form of the sacraments of the Church. Whence the dependence of spiritual members on one another and the dependence of corporal members on one another is not similar in all respects, as was said in the preceding question.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that Dionysius speaks of the minister according to the order of power, the authority of administration, and suitability for the act; and he is the one who has complete ministry to his own salvation; and it is not understood that the character cannot be imprinted otherwise.

§ 15. To the next Augustine responds that Donatus does not beget through the fact that he is outside, but through the fact that he is inside, when he observes the form of the Church in conferring the sacraments; and therefore it does not follow that he himself is inside, but rather that he himself is outside, and begets through that which is inside.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that the Church, according to Augustine, receives the blessed seed from the seed of her husband Christ: and this sometimes through her own womb, as Rachel and Leah, and sometimes through the womb of a handmaid, as in the handmaids of Rachel and Leah, who bore upon their knees: by whom are signified heretics using the form of the Church in conferring sacraments. Sometimes, however, the seed perishes in the proper womb, just as Esau was reprobated; sometimes in the womb of the handmaid, just as Ishmael was reprobated: by whom are signified false Christians and heretics baptizing in the form of heresy and not of the Church.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether Character Is In Some Genus, And In What Genus; And If In The Genus Of Quality, In What Species

Whether the character is in some genus, and in what genus: and if in the genus of quality, in what species?

Next, it is asked concerning what is said there, A, § 2, around the middle: "The character of Christ being preserved," etc.

For the sake of that, a question concerning the baptismal character is to be introduced here. And because the knowledge concerning character is easier if it is disputed here in general, namely [including those] of Confirmation and of Order, therefore we will make a general disputation concerning character.

Therefore, let it be asked concerning character in three ways, namely in itself, and on the part of its effect; and on the part of the receiver; since on the part of the giver it is the same to ask about the one giving the character, and the one giving the sacrament, and this has already been held.

Now concerning character in itself five things are to be asked, namely, in what genus is it? Secondly, what is it definitively? Thirdly, which and how many sacraments imprint a character? Fourthly, concerning the number and order of the characters. And fifthly, concerning the comparison of the sacraments of Christ to the mark of the beast.

§ 1. To the first one proceeds thus: It is said by almost everyone that a spiritual character is a quality.

Let it be objected therefore thus: There is nothing in a genus which is not in some one of its species. Character is in the genus of quality; therefore, it is in some one of the species: therefore, it is either a habit and disposition, or a natural power or impotence, or a passion or passible quality, or a form or a figure consisting about this somewhat: and all these species have had an opinion concerning this matter.

But it seems that it is not a habit and disposition: because § 2. Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage that a habit is that by which someone does something when it is time. Therefore, every habit is for some act of the power in which it is. But character is not for an act of a power, but for distinction or consignation or both. Therefore, it seems that it is not a habit or disposition.

§ 3. Again, a habit of the soul is natural, or infused, or acquired. Natural, as the habit of sight in the visual power; but infused or acquired is customarily divided into knowledge and virtue. But character is neither knowledge nor virtue. Since therefore it is not a natural habit, it will not be a habit, as it seems.

But against this seems to be what the Philosopher says, that there are three things in the soul, namely passions, powers, and habits. Now it is clear that character is not a passion; therefore, if it is in the soul, it is a habit, as it seems.

But it seems that it is also not a natural power or impotence.

§ 5. For a natural power or impotence is caused by natural causes: just as some say that a natural power is caused by the victory of form over matter, and a natural impotence by the imperfection of the victory of the same: just as the hard has a natural power not to be cut, and the soft an impotence of the same. But it is clear that a character is not caused by such a cause; therefore, it is not a natural power or impotence, although some have said this.

§ 6. Again, natural powers follow nature; but character does not follow nature. Therefore, it is not in the species of natural power.

§ 7. It also seems not to be in passion or passible quality: since this according to the Philosopher is either infused into the sensible soul as are the objects of the senses, or inflicted in the sense or sensible soul, as pleasure and sadness. But it is clear that character is about the intellectual soul; therefore, it is not a passion or a passible quality, although some have also said this.

§ 8. Again, it seems that it is not a form or a figure consisting about this somewhat: because that, according to the Philosopher, is not in spiritual things, but in quantified things. For a figure is a surface contained or terminated by one or more lines; but nothing of such things belongs to a spiritual nature. Therefore, neither is character in that species, as it seems, since it is only in a spiritual nature.

Because of this some have said that even in a spiritual nature there is a spiritual quantity, and according to that character is attended to. But this seems ridiculous for many reasons, one of which is:

§ 9. The spiritual quantity of a virtue is attended to according to the intensity of the virtue toward an act. But this intensity does not change the genus. Therefore, the quantity of a virtue does not signify something in which the rationale of figure is saved, because that is not saved without continuous quantity.

§ 10. Again, every figure is attended to according to the ultimate terminated at this; but virtue, although it is defined by the ultimate of power, is nevertheless not defined by the termination of the ultimate. Therefore, it seems that the quantity of a virtue cannot have the rationale of figure, and thus a character is not figural or a form consisting about this somewhat.

§ 11. Again, if virtue is terminated in the ultimate, that terminus is not one surrounding the substance of the virtue within, but rather the ultimate into which it can [act] on the part of the object into which the virtue acts, just as the virtue of Hercules can [act] upon the thirty whom he defeats. But figure is a terminus surrounding the substance of the terminated thing, enclosing it within itself. Therefore, even if virtue is called the terminus of power, that terminus is said equivocally with respect to the terminus of a figure. Therefore, if character is in the quantity of virtue, it is nevertheless not of the rationale of figure.

§ 12. Again, virtue is the terminus of power terminated at the ultimate; but figure according to the rationale of figure is the terminus terminating the ultimate. Therefore, terminus in the rationale of figure and in the rationale of virtue will be said equivocally; and thus that solution is null which some have posited, and which almost all have followed.

§ 13. Therefore certain others, taking up the word of the Philosopher which he says in the Categories, "Perhaps, however, other modes of quality will also appear," say that character is a quality outside the four species of quality; because Aristotle implies that there are other species of quality. But that this is nothing is easily proved: for although every form predicates what sort, nevertheless not every form is in the predicament of quality according to reality, but a form really existing in...

§ 1. [the] predicament of quality does not exceed its four species: therefore it is clear that what they say is nothing: because if it were really a quality, it would be necessary that it be in some species of quality.

§ 2. But it seems to be in relation: for things are relative (ad aliquid), whose very being what they are, is towards another: but the very being of a character, just as of a seal or a sign, is towards another: therefore it is in the predicament of relation, and not of quality, as it seems.

§ 3. But since this is conceded by all who understand well, let it be asked: Is the being of a relative founded upon something else or not?

§ 4. But it seems that it is founded in some other nature: because 1. Augustine says that every relative is also something else besides being relative, just as a father is a substance in which there is a relation. Therefore, if the character is a relative, it seems there is also something else besides the relation upon which the relation is founded.

§ 5. 2. Also, the character, as the Masters say, consigns us to the uncreated Trinity through a certain assimilation: but similitude is the same quality of different things: therefore it seems that it is founded upon some quality, whatever that may be.

§ 6. Solution. It seems it must be said without prejudice that the character, according to the being it imports, does not signify an entity in the predicament of relation, such as paternity. For the relative is twofold, namely that itself which is and is spoken of towards another, such as 'father'; and the accident which signifies absolutely and in abstraction, such as 'paternity', and this signifies the mode of disposition by which the relative is spoken of towards something: and in this way the character is also towards something: and [so is] the characterized.

§ 7. But to what is asked last, one must first respond, namely whether it is founded upon the powers of the image barely from the very reception of baptism, or whether it has a subject quality from the matter. It must be said that both are said by diverse [authors]: but nonetheless it seems more probable that it has a subject quality from the matter in which it is founded, and this I think to be a certain habit of spiritual light, which behaves in the manner of an aptitude for faith and for grace through spiritual light and heat, so that the light enables for faith and the heat for morals.

§ 8. And according to this response, one must first reply to the objections, by saying that the character is founded in a habit just as similitude is in a quality: but habit is twofold, namely perfect and distinct, and imperfect and indistinct: the first is like a habit determined to this matter, and that is divided into science and virtue: and concerning that it is true what Augustine says, that habit is that by which one does something when the time is right. But the imperfect, confused, and indistinct is that which precedes it, and enables one for it. And we can see a likeness of this in the eye, in which, in the pupil and crystalline humor, there is a certain transparency with a light connatural and inseparable from it, and yet it does not suffice by itself for seeing distinctly unless the spirit from the soul, determined toward colors, arrives: so too for the intellect there is a connatural confused light by which it examines what is heard and received according to the Philosopher, and yet that does not suffice for distinctly understanding this or that.

§ 9. Thus we can say that there is, in a certain manner, an indistinct light inseparably infused in the baptized, in which shines a certain assimilation to the uncreated Trinity, although it is not sufficient without faith: and this light is that in which the character is founded, and it is in the genus of gratuitously given grace. And this, I think, was noted by those who placed the character in the species of habit and in the genus of quality: whence those things which are objected against other qualities seem to have to be conceded.

§ 10. And what certain ones have said about an intellectual figure, I either do not understand it, or what they said is not true.

§ 11. And through this the solution is clear to all that was asked concerning this article.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Definitions Of Character Are Well Assigned

Are the definitions of the character well assigned?

Are the definitions of the character well assigned?

§ 12. Secondly it is asked, what is the character by definition?

§ 13. Now, some say that Blessed Dionysius in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy defines it thus: 'The character is a holy sign of the communion of faith and of sacred ordination given to the one approaching by the hierarch.' Although they say so, nevertheless in no translation of Dionysius is this definition found, neither by words nor by sense: and whoever inspects the text of Dionysius knows this well. For there, whence they wished to draw those words, he speaks thus according to the old translation, showing what it signifies that the one to be ordained comes to the high priest, that is, to the Bishop, etc.: And him, namely the one to be ordained, approaching thus, namely to his Bishop the hierarch, the divine beatitude receives into its participation, and delivers [him] by its own light as in a certain sign, perfecting him as divine and communicating parts of divine things and of sacred ordination: of which the sacred symbol is the seal given by the high priest, and the saving description of the priests, commemorating him among the saved and in sacred memories.

§ 14. But so that the words which are obscure may be understood, they are to be expounded thus: 'And him', namely the one to be ordained approaching thus in the reception of orders to the hierarch, 'the divine beatitude', that is, God, 'receives' to parts of power, and this is signified in that the hierarch, that is, the Bishop, gives a part of his power when he receives him: and 'by its own light', that is, from its own light delivers to him: 'as in a certain sign delivers to him', that is, in a certain sign, because in the received sacrament: 'perfecting him as divine', that is, that namely the light perfecting him as divine, that is, so that he may be divine in power at least, that is, he has a part of divine power: and 'communicating parts of divine things', that is, perfects him so that he may communicate parts, that is, in a part of divine things as to the power 'of sacred ordination', that is, perfects him so that there may be a community of sacred ordination, that is, in sacred ordination: because the Greeks do not have an ablative case: 'of which the symbol', that is, of which, namely of the divine perfection and the communion of a part of divine things, and the symbol of the communion of ordination, that is, 'the sacred given by the high priest', that is, that which is given by the high priest: because the sacrament given by the Bishop is a sign that divine power and grace are given to him by God. And he subjoins what that is which is given by the Bishop, this is namely the 'seal', that is, that the pontiff signs him, by imposing hands, and by handing over [instruments], and the like: and 'the saving description of priests', that is, that he describes him as a priest by making him through order: 'commemorating him', if he will have used the power well, 'among the saved and in sacred memories'.

§ 15. If, however, this (as I think) is the intention of Dionysius, it is clear that that definition is not his, and is never found elsewhere: and therefore I do not take it as from a Saint, but as approved by the Doctors.

§ 16. But certain ones also give another, namely this: 'The character is a distinction imprinted by the eternal character upon the rational soul according to the image, consigning the created trinity to the creating and recreating Trinity, and distinguishing from the unconsecrated according to the state of faith.'

§ 17. Now there are multiple objections concerning these definitions of the Masters:

§ 18. Against the FIRST thus: The character is a holy sign: but every sign is natural or by convention: now it is established that the character is not a sign by convention: because then it would not be the same among all, and would vary at will: therefore it is natural: but every natural sign has some similitude with the signified, just as smoke has an agreement with fire: therefore it seems that the character has some agreement with the uncreated character.

§ 19. And it is asked, what is that? But it seems that it is none: because man has conformity through the character: therefore it seems that the character is a disposition found in both extremes, namely in the sealed man, and the uncreated character to which he is consigned: just as if two are similar in whiteness, whiteness is a disposition found in both: and this is false here: because the Son of God does not have a character, as will be proved below.

§ 20. Also, of signs one is a prognostic principle of future things: such as the signs which diviners have in stars and other things, and physicians in sicknesses. Another is rememorative of past things, such as the ring of faith given to a bride by her spouse, and the necklace of the continence of the marriage bed, and the like. Another is demonstrative in the present, just as present substance is signified by accidents which fall under the senses.

§ 21. Let it be asked therefore, if the character is a sign, what kind of sign is it? 1. For it does not seem to be a sign except of grace: and it does not necessarily signify this, neither in the present, nor in the future, nor in the past, as in the feigned recipient who dies in his fiction: therefore it seems that the character is not a sign of grace.

§ 22. 2. Also, if it is a sign, it will not be except a sacramental sign: but a sacramental sign is a visible, or at least sensible, form of invisible grace: therefore it seems that the character is a certain sensible form, the contrary of which was held in the preceding question, and again will be held afterwards, when it will be proved that the character is not imprinted except in the rational soul.

§ 23. 3. Also, according to Master Hugh in the book on the Sacraments, a sign is taken in the properties of a corporeal element: but the character is neither a corporeal element in the sacrament, nor its property: therefore the character is not a sign, as it seems.

§ 24. Also, if it is a sacramental sign: it is either of the old or the new. But it is established that it is not of the old: because the old law speaks nothing of a spiritual character, although it speaks of circumcision as a carnal character given to a carnal people, as was held above in the tractate on circumcision: therefore it will be a sign of the new law.

§ 25. ON THE CONTRARY: It does not necessarily effect what it figures, as is clear in feigned recipients: therefore it is neither a sign of the old law nor of the new: therefore neither is it a sacramental sign.

§ 26. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'Of the communion of faith'.

§ 27. For this seems not to be true: because a non-believing feigned recipient receives the baptismal character: and yet he does not communicate in faith.

§ 28. Moreover, the communion of faith can be as to the participation of articles, or of the faithful, or of the habit of faith: and it seems it cannot be in more ways. But it is established that it does not necessarily cause one to communicate with the faithful, as is clear in adults knowingly baptized by heretics, who do not communicate with the faithful.

§ 29. Also, there is no communication as to the articles: because a feigned recipient disbelieving the articles receives the character, as long as he offers himself not contradicting to what the Church does, although he believes this itself to be nothing or of no avail.

§ 30. Also, it seems that he does not communicate in the habit of faith: because he can be an infidel, as was already said: and yet he receives the character: therefore it seems that it is not a sign of the communion of faith.

§ 31. Also, why is it defined more as a sign of the communication of faith, than further of virtue?

§ 32. For it seems that it is a disposition and sign for every virtue. For there are three things in the sacrament, namely the sign only, as the washing made in water; and the reality and sign, which is the character; and the reality only, which is grace with all the virtues. If therefore it is a sign of the reality of the sacrament, and the reality of the sacrament is the fullness of virtue and not of faith: then it seems the character is a sign of every virtue, and not a sign of faith: therefore it is poorly defined by this that it is a sign of faith.

§ 33. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'And of sacred ordination'.

§ 34. 1. For this does not seem to belong except to the character of order: therefore through that the character in general is poorly defined, according as it is in confirmation and baptism and order in common.

§ 35. 2. Moreover, the character of order and confirmation does not seem to be a sign of faith: but the character of confirmation seems to be a sign of fortitude for fighting, and the character of order seems to be a sign of power for spiritual acts, as is confecting the Eucharist, binding, and loosing: therefore again it is poorly defined by a sign of faith and of sacred ordination.

§ 36. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'Given to the one approaching by the hierarch'.

§ 37. For this seems to be false: for if a peasant baptizes, the baptized receives the character: therefore it is not necessary that it be given by a hierarch, as it seems.

§ 38. Moreover, if you say that 'hierarch' expresses the proper minister: again it is false: because the hierarch is the high priest or Pontiff: and he is not the proper minister of baptism, but rather even a simple priest, as is said in the Text in this distinction: therefore it is not necessary to approach a hierarch, as it seems.

§ 39. Further it is asked concerning the second definition: and first concerning what it says, 'The character is a distinction'.

§ 40. For if it is a distinction, and a distinctive sign otherwise distinguishes the baptized from the non-baptized: then either to the Church militant, or triumphant, or to God: but not to the Church militant, because that does not distinguish nor discern through invisible signs, since it judges according to the face, and not according to those things which are in the heart: neither does it distinguish as to the Church triumphant, because that does not need it, since the baptized receives sufficient distinction from the non-baptized in the contemplation of the Word: also as to God it is not necessary, because God does not know through signs, but through Himself knows all things.

§ 41. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'Imprinted by the eternal character'.

§ 42. 1. For the Son is the character, as is held in Heb. 1:3: 'Who since he is the splendor of glory, and the figure of his substance.' In another translation, 'And the character of his substance': therefore it seems that the Son of God imprints the character.

§ 43. 2. Also, to the same, the similitude of the Father is the Son: since therefore the created character is assimilating, it seems that congruently it is imprinted by the Son.

§ 44. 3. Also, the sacrament of baptism is the sacrament of regeneration, by which sons of grace are made: but the filiation of grace has some similitude with the eternal generation: therefore it seems that the character of regeneration is imprinted by the Son as the eternal character.

§ 45. ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Through the invocation of the Trinity in the element the character is imprinted: therefore the impression does not pertain more to the Father than to the Son, nor conversely, but to the whole Trinity.

§ 46. 2. Moreover, if on account of the sacrament of regeneration the impression of the character in Baptism belongs to the Son: therefore also on account of the sacrament of spiritual power the impression of the character in Order belongs to the Father, which is false, because by reason of congruence every impression of the character will be appropriated to one person.

§ 47. 3. Also, more is owed to the Father than to the Son, because it belongs to the Father to generate: therefore also to imprint the character of spiritual regeneration: therefore it is not imprinted by the eternal character, as it seems.

§ 48. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'Imprinted upon the rational soul according to the image'.

§ 49. 1. For no numerically one thing is imprinted upon numerically diverse subjects: but the character is numerically one something: therefore it cannot be imprinted upon the three powers of the image, unless it is multiplied according to number.

§ 50. 2. Also, just as the preceding sign in the sacrament and the following reality are related: so must the middle be related which is sign and reality together: but the sign of perfect washing of the whole soul, and the following reality perfectly cures and perfects the whole soul according to all powers: therefore also the middle which is the sign must be imprinted according to all powers, and not according to the powers of the image only: but the middle is the character: therefore according to all powers the character must be imprinted in the soul.

§ 51. 3. Also, of the same thing is the disposition and the habit: but the habit is the following reality of the sacrament: since therefore that habit is in the whole soul, it seems also that the disposition which is the character, must inhere according to the whole soul.

§ 52. 4. Moreover, it seems that if the character is imprinted in the image (as the second definition says) that it is not light only: because the will, which is the chief part of the image, is not perfected by light, but rather by love: therefore it seems that the character in itself supposes diverse habits and of diverse formal characters (rationum).

§ 53. Further it is asked concerning what the second definition says, 'Consigning the created trinity to the creating and recreating Trinity'.

§ 54. 1. For it does not consign unless it makes to imitate: but we do not imitate except by gratuitously making grace (gratia gratum faciens): therefore it seems that the character is gratuitously making grace.

§ 55. 2. Also, by one habit multiple things cannot be consigned, unless they are of one formal character: but the powers of the image are not of one formal character: therefore they cannot be consigned by one habit.

§ 56. 3. Also, on the part of the uncreated Trinity one thing is not appropriated: therefore it seems that if the character is a certain light, that it does not consign to the uncreated Trinity, but only to one person in the Trinity.

§ 57. Further it is asked concerning what it says, 'Distinguishing from the unconsecrated according to the state of faith'.

§ 58. For it seems that the subtler thing of the character is to distinguish than to sign: because § 59. 1. The character, as Damascene often says, is the same as the distinctive: therefore the character is a distinction: therefore it seems that in the definition the ultimate particle ought to have been placed prior to the penultimate.

§ 60. 2. Moreover, why does he say, 'According to the state of faith', rather than according to faith? For distinction according to faith is prior to that according to the state of faith.

§ 61. Solution. Without prejudice it seems to me the second definition is better than the first: yet neither has the strength of authority, except insofar as the custom of the Masters does: because concerning the character in the sense in which the Masters dispute, little is found concerning it in the sayings of the Saints.

§ 62. Therefore, sustaining the first definition, it must be said to the first, that the character is a natural sign of grace which is the effect of the sacrament.

§ 63. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that similitude is twofold, namely of two things in a third, and thus it is necessary that one quality in which the similitude is founded be in both; but sometimes similitude is between things such that one expresses the formal character of the similitude of one thing to another, just as an image by which it expresses the formal character of the similitude of this statue to Hercules: and then it is not necessary that the same thing be in both of the similar things, but that one be the exemplar, and the other imitate it: and thus the character is similar: because it expresses the formal character of the assimilation of the soul to God.

§ 64. To the next it must be said, that it is a sign demonstrative and causative of grace in the present insofar as it is of itself, and that it does not demonstrate, this is by accident, namely because it finds a resisting obstacle in the subject.

§ 65. To the next it must be said, that although the character is not visible or sensible in itself, it is nevertheless visible in relation to the washing in which it is imprinted, as was said above in the question on the sacraments.

§ 66. To the next it must be said, that the character is not founded in the corporeal element, as in a subject, but as in the cause inducing it: and this suffices for it to be a sacramental sign of the new law.

§ 67. But to what is objected against this, it is [already] solved.

§ 68. To that which is further asked, it must be said that it is a sign of the communion of faith according to the state of faith, as the second definition says: and it can well be that someone does not participate in the habit according to the communion of the faithful, or of the articles of faith, and yet does according to the state, because that is participated also according to the sacrament of faith.

§ 69. Whence the solution to the whole is clear. To the next it must be said that other virtues do not distinguish those things which are in the affection, but faith alone which is in the intellect: and therefore the distinction is taken only according to the state of faith, although it is a disposition for all virtues. Or let it be said, and better, that the state of faith distinguishes the character of the sacraments: because faith is the foundation of the spiritual edifice, and according to its primary distinction the distinction of the whole life is primarily taken.

§ 70. To that which is further asked, it must be said that that definition, as to that member, touches upon the character of excellence, which is in Order: and because it is a character of excellence, therefore it has something special in the definition.

§ 71. To the next it must be said, that the character of Confirmation is not of fortitude except in relation to faith: because namely without blush he preaches faith, and even without fear confesses it before kings and princes. So too the character of Order is not of spiritual power, except for propagating, and multiplying, and confessing the faith: and therefore it always regards the state of faith.

§ 72. But how it regards it differently, will be said below in the question on the number of characters and Order.

§ 73. To that which is further asked, it must be said that in that definition the proper minister is determined from power and authority and fitness. But that it is otherwise given, this happens therefore, because it is a sacrament of necessity, as was said in the beginning of this distinction.

§ 74. To that which is further asked, it must be said that the second definition is better than the first: because it touches the proper act which is to consign, and the secondary which is to distinguish, and the efficient cause which is the uncreated character, and the material which is on the part of the proper subject, because it is imprinted according to the mind in the rational soul: and the final cause, because it is on account of the state of faith.

§ 75. Therefore let it be said to the first, that it distinguishes in itself, and it is not necessary that others be distinguished [by it], although in the soul itself it leaves an indelible mark of beauty, which in the blessed is a reason for glorying in a certain assimilation of themselves to the Trinity, and in the damned a conviction and testimony of just condemnation: and therefore it is not idle.

§ 76. To that which is further asked, it must be said that this which is first proved is well conceded: because although by the common work of the persons the character is imprinted by the three persons, nevertheless by congruence and appropriation it belongs to the Son, of which multiple causes were touched upon in objecting. One also is, because the character (as was said above) is a certain light by attribution to the begotten wisdom which is the Son.

§ 77. To that which is objected against it, it must be said that the invocation operates there commonly in the persons: but nevertheless the appropriated work belongs to the Son, and this is often the case in almost all divine works.

§ 78. To the next it must be said, that although in confirmation and order there are fortitude and power, nevertheless they are referred to the state of faith: and faith signifies something of cognition, and therefore it is appropriated to the Son.

§ 79. To the next it must be said, that although it belongs to the Father to generate, nevertheless properly to regenerate is more congruently of the Son: because regeneration is not done without mission and redemption: and both of these belong to the Son, and neither to the Father: and therefore that argument proceeds from falsehoods.

§ 80. To that which is further asked concerning what it says, 'Imprinted upon the rational soul according to the image', it must be said that through this the immediate subject of the character is touched upon: but the image, although it is in three powers, nevertheless is principally in the power of knowing. Whence Augustine says that man has the image in the power of knowing, and the similitude in the power of loving. Whence the image is principally according to memory and intellect: and the will follows these two. Similarly, the perfection of cognition is in act according to the intellect, and not according to the memory, and therefore the character, in my judgment, is imprinted according to the intellect, namely according as the intellect is formed from memory and eliciting the will, and thus as in a subject it is in the intellect, yet it has an order to memory and will.

§ 81. To the next it must be said that the character is a disposition to grace in which are all the virtues: but nevertheless in its genus it agrees more with faith: and this is not inconvenient; because just as is often the case in corporeal dispositions, so too in spiritual ones: just as heat is a disposition to the whole fire as to all the properties of fire, and yet in its genus it only agrees with burning: and similarly it is in spiritual things: for as was said above, although the character is essentially a certain light, nevertheless it also has heat.

§ 82. To the next it must be said that this proposition, 'Of the same thing is the disposition and the habit,' can be understood in three ways: and in two ways it is true, in the third way it is false. For it can be understood thus, of whatever essence the disposition is, the habit—that is, the habit which is made from that disposition—is of the same essence: and then it is true of the disposition from which a habit is generated, as an easily movable knowledge and a difficultly movable one, after it is strengthened, are of the same essence, and differ in accident. In another way it can be understood, that is, of whatever subject the disposition is, of the same is the habit: and then again it is true: because the habit is induced in the same subject. In a third way it can be understood, of whichever part of the subject the disposition is, of that is the habit: and then it is not always true: because the disposition is frequently in one part, and the whole habit is not induced in that part: and this happens because that disposition does not equally regard the habit as to all its parts, just as the character regards faith according to generic agreement, and not other virtues except consequently: because one is not given without the other, when it is infused with grace.

§ 83. To the next the solution is clear through what was said before.

§ 84. To that which is further asked, it must be said that there is consignation in an indelible mark, which is imperfect and of gratuitously given grace: and the character makes this: but consignation in the act of imitation, what the objection posits is true: because nothing makes that except formed virtue.

§ 85. To the next it must be said, that although the powers of the image are not of the same formal character, nevertheless the extremes are ordered to the middle, and conversely: and therefore they can be consigned in it.

§ 86. To the next it must be said, that equally through the character a man is not consigned to the Trinity as to those things which are distinctly proper to the persons: but the character, although it is essentially a light consigning to the Son, yet virtually has in itself two things, namely power in faith or battle or grade, and goodness in this that it is a disposition to grace: and through these two it regards the person of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

§ 87. To that which is further asked, it must be said that the character principally consigns, and consequently distinguishes: and when it is named 'character', it receives its name from the more known [though] not more principal act, just as names are often imposed from that which is more known to us.

§ 88. To the next it must be said, that the character does not distinguish faith, nor anything in faith, but it signifies the distinction of the state of faith according as faith is the fulfillment of beginners or of proficients or of the perfect, and therefore it is rather said according to the state of faith than according to faith simply.

Articulus 5 — Which And How Many Are The Sacraments Imprinting Character

Which and how many are the sacraments imprinting a character?

§ 89. Thirdly it is asked, Which and how many are the sacraments which imprint a character?

§ 90. But it seems that all do, because 1. Just as by some mark the baptized is distinguished from the non-baptized: so by something the communicant [is distinguished] from the non-communicant, and the married from the unmarried, etc.: therefore it seems that a character is imprinted in any [sacrament].

§ 91. 2. Also, if baptism on account of dignity imprints a character, since the most dignified sacrament, as Ambrose says, is the sacrament of the Eucharist, it ought to imprint a character, as it seems.

§ 92. 3. Also, if the invocation of Christ in certain sacraments imprints a character in the invocation of the Trinity, because it was held previously that the created character is imprinted by the uncreated character, it seems that where the whole Christ is received, there it most imprints a character: but in the Eucharist the whole Christ is received: therefore it most imprints a character there.

§ 93. 4. Also, the sacraments in which a character is imprinted have their unctions, namely baptism, confirmation, and order: therefore since there is a fourth which similarly consists principally in unction, like extreme unction, that ought also to imprint a character.

§ 94. 5. Also, the character regards the state of faith: but the state of faith is diversified according to the law of nature and of Moses and of grace, just as is signified in those who went before and followed the Lord, crying out: Hosanna in the highest. Therefore it seems, that it also imprinted something in those laws. Now circumcision in those laws was a testimony of the great faith of Abraham, as is said in the Gloss on Rom. 4:14. Therefore it seems that circumcision imprinted a character.

§ 95. If perhaps it be said, as was solved above in the tractate on Circumcision, that circumcision had a corporeal character, not a spiritual one. Against this is what Origen says, that circumcision was not only corporeal, but also spiritual, and was understood spiritually by the Jews.

§ 96. 6. Moreover, it seems that every sacrament imprints a character: because what can do what is greater, can also do what is lesser: but grace is greater than a character: since therefore every sacrament gives grace: it also seems by an argument from the lesser, that it also imprints a character.

§ 97. 7. Also, the sacrament is sufficient to act, since it can do what is more, as was already proved: and the soul is receptive whether it be feigned or not: because the feigned well receives the character: therefore every sacrament imprints a character, as it seems.

§ 98. Further it is asked next to this, what is the reason that in the baptism of water and confirmation and order a character is said to be imprinted?

§ 99. For either the cause of this is special matter, or the invocation of the Trinity, or grace, or the Passion of Christ operating in these sacraments, or the intention of those giving the sacraments, or the faith of the Church: for we find no more things operating in the sacraments.

§ 100. 1. If it be said that special matter is the cause, it does not seem so: because matter is diversified in the three sacraments, nor is there any matter in order which is of the necessity of the sacrament, except only the one ordained: therefore it seems that this operation is not from the matter. But if it is said that in baptism this operation follows the matter, it seems false: because the same matter is in the baptism of Christ and in the baptism of John, and yet in the baptism of John a character was not imprinted.

§ 101. 2. But if it be said that this operation is the invocation of the Trinity, a twofold inconvenience seems to follow, namely that if the invocation of the Trinity occurs in other sacraments, a character is also imprinted in them. The other is that those who were baptized in the primitive Church in the name of Christ [received the character].

§ 102. 3. And if you also say that the Trinity is understood in the name of Christ. Against this: It is the same to baptize in the name of Christ, and in the name of the one to come, because Christ was the one to come: if therefore a character was imprinted at the invocation of Christ: therefore a character was also imprinted at the invocation of the name of the one to come: which is false: because thus a character would have been imprinted in John's Baptism.

§ 103. If perhaps you say that in the baptism of John the Baptist a character was imprinted. Against this is that they were baptized anew by the Apostles: therefore they did not have the character: because otherwise an injury would have been done to the character of the sacrament.

§ 104. Moreover, if one had received one character from John, and another from the Apostles, and for the same thing, that is, for the initiation of the state of faith: the other would be superfluous, which is inconvenient: therefore the invocation of the Trinity does not imprint the character.

§ 105. But if you say that the Passion of Christ operating in the sacrament does this. It seems that then the baptism of blood imprints the character more: because in that there is a greater expression of the Passion: and that is better, because it is not defiled by secondary filth: and concerning this it was held above.

§ 106. Moreover, the Passion of Christ operates in all sacraments: therefore in all it imprints a character, which is not said by any of the Doctors.

§ 1. But if you say that intention does this: it seems to be false, because intention, as is held here in the text, is required for every sacrament; therefore, it would imprint a character in any of them. But if the faith of the Church operates [this]. Against this: The faith of the Church does not suffice except in baptism, and only for infants, not for adults. Therefore, no one will receive a character except in baptism, and only infants, not adults, which is false. Therefore, it seems that the disputation about the impression of a character is founded upon nothing.

§ 2. Further, it is asked next to this: Do the virtues imprint a character?

§ 3. It seems that they do, because: 1. They imprint certain marks consigning us to God, and this is the definition of a character; therefore, they imprint a character.

§ 4. 2. Also, a virtue is more distinctive than a sacrament, because a sacrament does not distinguish the good from the bad. Therefore, since distinguishing or consigning is the primary act of a character, as was held, it seems that a virtue imprints a character more than a sacrament does.

§ 5. Solution. It must be said that only three sacraments, which regard the state of faith, imprint a character, according to a threefold distinction which they make among the faithful who are of the household of the heavenly law, as will be clear below when the number of characters is discussed.

§ 6. Therefore, it must be said to the first [argument] that it is one thing for the recipient of a sacrament to be discerned from one not receiving it, and another thing to have an indelible mark for this purpose. But an indelible mark is imprinted only by three sacraments.

§ 7. And if you object that it is impossible for a married person not to have been married, and thus the mark is indelible: it must be said that this argument is sophistical. For that is not through an indelible or perpetual mark in the subject; rather, a statement about the past is true, and therefore necessary, and thus although the thing changes, the statement nevertheless does not change. But three sacraments leave a perpetual mark in the thing [the soul], and therefore that is a character, whereas the other sacraments leave nothing perpetual in the thing.

§ 8. To the next it must be said that it does not belong to the dignity of a sacrament to imprint a character, but rather from the invocation of the Trinity for a state of the distinction of faith, or a distinct state in faith, as will be said below. And therefore that objection accomplishes nothing.

§ 9. To the next it must be said that although the uncreated character imprints the created one, nevertheless it is not in just any sacrament, but in the one in which there is an invocation of the Trinity according to the state of faith. The Eucharist, however, does not regard the state of faith, but rather charity, whence it is also called the sacrament of charity.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that in the law of nature and of Moses there was not a state of explicit faith as in the New Law. But all sacraments imprinting a character imprint it according to the explicit state of faith, not implicitly. And the reason why circumcision did not imprint a character was explained above in the question on Circumcision; [353] for it was nothing but a figure of the baptismal character, just as the spiritual is understood in a corporeal sign.

§ 11. To that which is objected concerning the saying of Origen, it must be said that he understands that certain people understood the virtue of circumcision to be spiritual, not that it imprinted a spiritual character, just as Abraham and others, who in the law understood the future sacraments of Christ.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that this proposition, "what can do the greater can do the lesser," is not true except concerning those things in which one power is ordered to a greater and a lesser; and therefore there is no place there for an argument from the lesser, because the sacrament could also do the lesser if it were ordered to this. Others resolve this differently, saying that although a character is something less than grace in value for salvation, nevertheless with respect to this it is greater, because it is in-delible, whereas grace is delible. But the first solution is stronger.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that not just any sacrament is sufficient to produce a character, since it is not ordered to this, as has already been said.

§ 15. To what is further asked, it must be said that the cause of the impression of a character does not arise from the matter, but from the invocation of the Trinity—not simply, but in a sacrament that places a person in a special state of faith: just as faith is generated, defended, and to be propagated to others, or nourished in others.

§ 16. To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that in the other sacraments, even if there were an invocation of the Trinity, they nonetheless do not place one in a special state of faith. And therefore, an invocation of the Trinity, even if it were in them as the form of the sacrament (which, however, is not true), would still not produce a character.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that in the name of Christ, as was clear above in the explanation of Ambrose, the Trinity is understood, and again this was by dispensation for a time, as was said above. Hence, partly because of the command of God, and partly because in that name the invocation of the Trinity was preserved, which is understood implicitly in it: in that [baptism in the name of Christ], and not in the baptism of John, a character was imprinted in the primitive Church.

§ 18. To what is objected concerning the name of the "One to come," it must be said that although to baptize in the name of Christ and in the name of the "One to come" was the same in reality, nevertheless it was not the same in the mode of signifying. For the "One to come" did not have the same mode of signifying as this name, "Christ," has. And therefore, in the argument about the baptism of John, there occurs the sophistical topic of the accident.

§ 19. To what is asked further, whether the virtues imprint a character? It must be said that they do not, because whatever a virtue effects in a subject is delible and not perpetual. But it belongs to the nature of a character that it be perpetual. And if an objection is raised regarding a statement about the past, it has already been shown above how it is to be resolved.

§ 20. To the next it must be said that although [the virtues] distinguish among the faithful, nevertheless this distinction is not according to an order to morals: but the distinction of a character is according to a special state of faith.

§ 21. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 6 — Whether In The Three Sacraments Imprinting Character, The Character Impressed Is One, And Whether In Any Of Them It Is Several

Whether in the three sacraments imprinting a character, the imprinted character is one, and whether any of them is multiple?

§ 22. Fourthly, it is asked concerning the number and order of characters.

§ 23. For the number has already been shown by the fact that only three sacraments imprint a character. But it seems to be the same character in all the sacraments, because the faith that is generated, strengthened, and capable of being propagated to another is the same. Therefore, the character of faith is also the same, as it seems. But the first is baptismal, the second of confirmation, the third of orders. Therefore, it seems that there is one character in the three according to substance.

§ 24. Moreover, it is asked concerning Order. For the baptismal character is first: because if someone does not have the baptismal character, and receives orders, he is not considered ordained, but is ordained again after baptism. Therefore, it seems that since the character of confirmation is intermediate, it also must necessarily be possessed before the character of orders. And from this it follows that an unconfirmed person cannot be ordained; and the Church does not hold this.

§ 25. Solution. Many accept the number of characters in multiple ways, but a more probable acceptation seems to be according to the number of distinctions in the state of faith. Just as in the household of David we read that there were three distinctions, of which the first was general, namely of the peo-ple of God from a non-people: because David was king over the people of God, as is said in Psalm 77:70-71: He took him from the flocks of sheep: he received him from following the ewes great with young, to feed Jacob his servant, and Israel his inheritance. Another distinction was of the mighty men of David, of which it is spoken in 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 23:8 et seq., who defended the worship and the people by fighting manfully: in which the distinction of the character of confirmation is noted. In the same place it is also read that certain ones were distinguished as Prelates, and priests, and scribes, and the like: and in those is signified the character of excellence in order. Therefore, the state of faith is [threefold], namely first, when faith is given so that the faithful are distinguished into the lot of the people of God: and this is through the baptismal character. Second, when they are confirmed as recruits, so that faith may stand firm in them and be defended: and this is the character of confirmation. But the third is that they may propagate it: and this is of orders. And there are no more states, and therefore there are no more characters. Otherwise, it can be said that Christ imprinting a character is wisdom teaching the faith, fighting bravely for the faith, and a priest showing the sacrifice of faith; and according to these three He imprints the character of holy faith. Insofar as He is wisdom teaching divine truth, which is in the articles of faith, He imprints the character of baptism. But insofar as He fought so that faith would stand firm in us, He imprints the character of confirmation. But insofar as He as priest offered the sacrifice of faith, He imprinted the character of orders. But the first acceptation is better.

§ 27. Therefore, to that which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that characters differ in essence, but faith does not differ except by accident. And this is because a character is not the same as faith, but the distinction is taken according to the state of faith. But the state of faith is diverse, and therefore the character is diverse. The argument, however, proceeds as if the diversity of character were taken according to the diversity of faith.

§ 28. To the next it must be said that order is twofold, namely of necessity, and of congruity. The baptismal character has an order of necessity and of foundation to the other sacraments. But the character of Confirmation does not have a necessary order to the character of Orders, but only one of congruity.

§ 29. And if an objection is made concerning matrimony, which is even in the unbaptized, it must be said that this is not only a sacrament of the Church, but also an office of nature. Yet, insofar as it is a sacrament, it does not have perfect indissolubility except insofar as it is founded upon baptism and faith. For otherwise, if some case compels, it can be dissolved: as if one of the spouses refuses to cohabit except to the insult of the Creator, as will be said below.

§ 30. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — How The Character Of The Sacraments Of Christ Stands In Relation To The Character Of The Beast

How is the character of the sacraments of Christ related to the mark of the beast?

§ 31. Fifthly, it is asked concerning the comparison of the character of the sacraments of Christ to the mark of the beast, concerning which mark it is read, Apocalypse 13:17: That no man might buy or sell, but he that hath the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.

§ 32. But it is asked whether these characters are founded in the same thing.

§ 33. It seems that they are, because contraries are naturally suited to occur around the same thing. But the character of Christ and that of the beast are contraries. Therefore, they are naturally suited to occur around the same thing.

§ 34. ON THE CONTRARY: Contraries are not simultaneously in act in the same thing. But let us posit that some baptized person sins mortally; it is established that through the sin he does not lose the charac-ter of Christ. Therefore, the character of Christ and of the beast, or the devil, are simultaneously had in act in the same thing, which is impossible if they are contraries, as it seems.

§ 36. Further, it is asked next to this: What is the cause of the perpetuity of the character of Christ, and not of the beast?

§ 37. It seems that there is no efficient cause, because: 1. God, who imprints the character, also infuses virtue: and yet virtue is not perpetual.

§ 38. 2. Also, it does not seem that the cause of perpetuity is the non-iteration of the sacrament: because rather the reverse is true, namely that the perpetuity of the character is the reason why the sacrament is not iterated. Therefore, it seems that there is no cause other than the subject. But then the mark of the beast will be perpetual, just like the character of Christ, since they are in the same thing as in a subject.

§ 39. Solution. It must be said that the mark of the beast is mortal sin: and it is not a character according to the full ratio of a character, except that it is made indelible [i.e., in hell]. And even then it still does not have the full ratio of a character, because it does not configure the creature to the Trinity, but rather makes it dissimilar: whence it is called a "character" equivocally.

§ 40. To the first [argument], however, it must be said that the character of Christ and that of the beast are not directly contrary, nor are they entirely according to the same thing: but sin is according to free choice, and the character is according to the intellect, which is part of the image. And because they are not contraries, they can exist simultaneously.

§ 41. To what is further asked: What is the cause of perpetuity? It must be said that the cause of indelibility is the power of the invocation in the sacrament of faith, according to a perpetual subject. For from this it follows that the sacrament itself produces something perpetual, which is either a disposition to a better perpetual good, or a testimony of just condemnation if the power of the sacrament is cast away. But the other sacraments, which give grace without a character, do not have such an invocation, nor a relation to the state of faith: and therefore their entire effect is delible, and therefore they are iterated.

§ 42. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 8 — What Is The Effect Of Character

What is the effect of a character?

§ 43. Next it is asked concerning the effect of a character.

§ 44. But it seems from what has been said previously that: 1. Grace is the effect: because a sign in a sacrament of the New Law is a cause: but the character is a sign of grace, as was held: therefore, it is also the cause of grace.

§ 45. 2. Also, a character is the mean between the first [element], which is only a sign [sacramentum tantum], and the last, which is only reality [res tantum]. Since therefore the last is only in the ratio of effect, and the first is only in the ratio of sign, the mean will be in the ratio of effect and cause. Therefore, the mean, which is the character, is the cause of the last, which is only reality, namely grace.

§ 46. But against this it is objected through the definition of a cause. For a cause is (as Boethius says) that upon whose existence something follows by necessity: but the existence of a character is not necessarily followed by grace, as is clear in one who feigns [fictus]. Therefore, it seems that it is not the cause of grace.

§ 47. But because infinite things have already been said about this both here and above where feigning was discussed, it must be said that the character is the cause of grace in the same way that a sa-

-cramental sign is a cause, namely as disposing in the subject, as was held above in the definition of a sacrament.

§ 49. To the last point, however, it must be said that it is a cause insofar as it is of itself, and thus grace follows: but it is impeded accidentally on the part of feigning.

Articulus 9 — What Grace Sanctification In The Womb Is, And When It Is Given, And How Much It Avails; And Whether Such A One Would Have To Be Baptized If He Were Now To Be Born

What grace is sanctification in the womb, and when is it given, and how much is it worth? And, whether such a person would have to be baptized if he were born now?

§ 50. Next it must be asked concerning the character on the part of the recipient. And concerning this it will be determined below in this same distinction, and therefore let it be deferred until then.

§ 51. And let it be asked concerning this which he says there, B, § 2: Also, this must not be ignored, that no one can be baptized in the maternal womb, etc.

§ 52. For there is no disputation concerning those sanctified in the womb, namely concerning John and Jeremiah, concerning which many things were also disputed in the first book of the Sentences [354].

§ 53. Let it be asked, therefore, what grace is sanctification in the womb, and when is it given, and how much is it worth? And this question pertains to Jeremiah and John, because concerning the Blessed Virgin it was handled above; and, whether an infant ought to be baptized if someone sanctified in the womb were to be born now?

§ 54. But it seems that the grace of sanctification in the womb is not baptismal grace: because 1. That cannot be given, as Isidore says in the text, to one not born according to Adam. But one existing in the womb is not born according to Adam. Therefore, he cannot receive sacramental grace.

§ 55. 2. Also, the whole time of conception is assigned to the primary curse in Psalm 50:7, where it is said: For behold I was conceived in iniquities, and in sins did my mother conceive me. Therefore, it seems that the time of conception is repugnant to sanctification. Therefore, it seems that no one can be sanctified in the womb.

§ 56. 3. Also, whatever is drawn from the mass of corruption is infected with the primary corruption, if it was in it through a seminal cause, as Augustine says. Therefore, at the time of conception it seems that it is not sanctified, when the whole time is one of infection. But the time of conception is the time of drawing the flesh of the child from the flesh of the parents. Moreover, it continuously contracts either substance or nourishment from the infected flesh of the parents. Therefore, it seems that it again cannot be sanctified. Therefore, no one can be sanctified in the womb.

§ 57. But against this there are many Glosses. 1. On that [passage] of Luke 1:44: For behold as the voice of thy salutation sounded in my ears, the Gloss says: In the very moment that the voice enters the ears of the body, the spirit enters the heart of the listener: and it inflames not only the mother, but also the offspring with the love of the One arriving. Therefore, it seems that the child was sanctified, because otherwise he would not have been inflamed with the love of charity.

§ 58. 2. Also, in the same place another Gloss on that [text]: The infant in my womb leaped for joy, says this: John leaped first, because he sensed grace first: and just as she sensed the arrival of Mary, so he sensed the arrival of the Lord. But he could not sense except through an excellent grace of sanctification. Therefore, it seems that he was sanctified.

§ 59. 3. Also, in the same place another Gloss says this: The mother was not filled with the Holy Spirit before the Son. Therefore, it is clear that he was full of the Holy Spirit, and this cannot be without sanctification. Therefore, he was sanctified in the womb.

§ 60. But then it is asked further, When is it given?

§ 61. It seems that it is before animation: 1. Through that [passage] of Jeremiah 1:5: Before I formed thee in the womb, I knew thee: and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee. But the child is formed, as Augustine says on Exodus, when the embryo in the womb is animated. Therefore, he was sanctified in the womb by grace before formation; he was sanctified before animation.

§ 62. 2. This also seems through a certain Gloss on Luke 1:44, which says: He did not yet have the spirit of life, and he already had the spirit of grace. But the spirit of life is the soul. Therefore, he was sanctified before animation.

§ 63. 3. This also seems by reason: because the cause of infection is the matter in the womb. Since, therefore, God is more prone to have mercy than to condemn, it seems that sanctification ought to have preceded the soul.

§ 64. 4. Also, a wise physician cures the cause of a disease from the root. But God is most wise. Therefore, it seems that He began the cure of the original disease from the root. But the root in the body is before the soul. Therefore, it seems that He began sanctification there.

§ 65. ON THE CONTRARY: Sanctification is only through grace. But nothing is susceptible of sanctifying grace, which is in the virtues, except a rational spirit. Therefore, before the rational spirit there could not be any sanctification. Therefore, he was not sanctified before animation.

§ 66. Further it is asked, How much is that grace of sanctification in the womb worth?

§ 67. For it seems to be worth less than baptismal grace, because: 1. Baptism imprints a character, but the grace of sanctification in the womb does not imprint one. Therefore, it seems that it is worth less.

§ 68. 2. Also, baptism operates by the power of Christ's passion, and by divine power, and by the faith of the Church. But the grace of sanctification in the womb operates only by divine power alone. Therefore, it seems that it leaves a lesser effect than baptismal grace.

§ 69. But against this it again seems to be, because the vigor of a singular privilege always transcends a common benefit. But the common benefit is baptismal grace; and the grace of sanctification in the womb operates only by divine power alone. Therefore, it seems that the grace of sanctification in the womb transcends baptismal grace.

354. Cf. Albert the Great, In I Sent.

§ 70. Further, it is asked fourthly, If someone were to be born now in this manner, would he have to be baptized?

§ 71. It seems that he would not, because: 1. Divine power is more efficacious than the power of a sacrament. But in those sanctified in the womb, divine power is operating. Therefore, the sacrament ought not to be applied.

§ 72. 2. Also, in nature nothing is done in vain, therefore much less in divine works. But it would be in vain if there were two operations to induce a single habit, since it would be sufficiently possessed through one. Therefore, since sufficient grace is possessed through sanctification in the womb, it seems that he would be baptized in vain.

§ 73. 3. Also, a sacrament is not iterated lest an injury be done [to it]. Therefore, the sacrament ought not to be conferred lest an injury be done to the divine operation in sanctification in the womb.

§ 74. But on the contrary is the fact that: 1. If some holy person approaches baptism, like Cornelius, he nevertheless has necessity to be baptized, as was held above concerning those who come holy to baptism. [355] Therefore, by a similar reasoning, it seems that even if he is sanctified in the womb, he is still bound to be baptized.

§ 75. 2. Also, it is established that he does not have the character.

§ 76. Therefore, he is bound to receive it; and he cannot except through baptism. Therefore, he is bound to be baptized.

§ 77. And let these suffice for the present, because more things concerning this were asked above in the third distinction.

§ 78. Solution. It must be said that the grace of sanctification in the womb took place concerning three persons, who had a spiritual order of the Holy Spirit to that holiness in the womb, concerning which it is said, Matthew 1:20: For that which is conceived in her, is of the Holy Ghost. And, Luke 1:35: The Holy which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. And this order was expounded upon the third book of the Sentences [356].

§ 79. To the first, therefore, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that someone is "born according to Adam" in two ways, namely by birth in the womb when the child is formed, and by birth out of the womb when he proceeds into the light. And concerning the first birth, what Isidore says is generally true, on account of the sentence of the Lord: because He holds all to be conceived by the law of concupiscence, as is said to the Ephesians 2:3: We were by nature children of wrath. But concerning the second, it does not hold except concerning those reborn through the sacrament, and not through the spiritual benefit of sanctification.

§ 80. To the next it must be said that this [premise] is false, that the whole time of conception is assigned to the curse: because then he would receive diverse curses from individual moments, or would draw one successively. But there is only one moment of the curse, namely that in which the soul is infused.

§ 81. To the next it must be said that although the embryo throughout the whole time of conception draws nourishment from a corrupt mother, or from corrupt parents, nevertheless he does not draw a cause of new corruption. For the nourishment does not become a new body to be animated, but is united to a body already made and animated, and therefore he does not have a cause of corruption except in that.

§ 82. To what is asked further: When is that grace given?

§ 83. It must be said that it is after animation. For in the loins of Adam or Abraham or others, or even in the flesh of parents, or before conception, no one can be sanctified. And this whole [matter] was shown upon the third book of the Sentences, and the cause was stated there [357].

§ 84. To that, therefore, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the knowledge by which He knew Jeremiah before sanctification was the knowledge of predestination. And therefore He adds concerning the sanctification of present justice, when He says: Before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee.

§ 85. To the next it must be said that the Gloss is understood thus: He did not yet have the spirit of life, that is, the free breath by which he himself is nourished and fostered separated from the mother: but nevertheless he had the spirit which is the cause of life. And this is proved by the saying of the Angel who said to the Blessed Virgin: This is the sixth month with her that is called barren: but no conception is without being formed in the sixth month, especially in hot lands, such as the land beyond the sea, in which sometimes even the seventh month is immediately assigned for birth.

§ 86. To the next it must be said that He is more prone to have mercy; but nevertheless He does not do what cannot be done. But every form, in order to be determined, seeks its proper subject. And therefore He does not give grace before there is a subject in which grace and virtue can be received: and this is not the body. Moreover, spiritual medicine ought to be derived from the spirit to the body according to a reason of congruity.

§ 87. But if anyone should object that God could have removed the cause of infection from the body, and then the soul would not be infected when it is infused: It must be said that God could have done so: but it did not befit His justice, because He condemned all to be conceived in sins. Moreover, he who would be conceived in this way would not be sanctified from this, but would be in the state of pristine innocence: and this would not be an adornment of justice, but would be a deformity, that one should need a redeemer and another not.

§ 89. To the next it must be said that the cure of the disease of fault cannot begin in the body, because in the body as in a subject there is no fault, but only punishment. And that remains in part after baptism, but it does not infect after baptism on account of the grace of redemption, and on account of the baptismal character, as was said upon the second book of the Sentences, in the tractate on original sin [358]. And therefore the medicine begins in the most congruous way from the soul.

§ 90. To what is asked further, it must be said that this grace is simply greater than the grace of a baptized person: because it more greatly weakens the fomes [tinder of sin], as was noted upon the third book of the Sentences. But baptismal grace is greater in a certain respect, because it imprints a character, and according to this it is greater.

§ 91. And thus the solution to all objections against this article is clear.

§ 92. To the other thing that is further asked, it must be said that if an infant in the womb were born with the grace of sanctification, he ought to be baptized on account of the command of the Lord, and on account of the character, just as Jeremiah was circumcised, and John and the Blessed Virgin, as I think, were baptized.

§ 93. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the divine operation is most sufficient for what it operates; but it does not operate the baptismal character, nor the fulfillment of His command. And therefore, although He gave grace, nevertheless the necessity of baptizing still remains.

§ 94. Through this the solution to the following [objection] is also clear.

§ 95. To the second and third [arguments] it must be said that no one is so full of grace that he cannot be made more full. And therefore there he receives fuller grace and a character; and therefore no injury is done to the divine operation. But if he were baptized to have the same thing which was had through the divine operation, then the objection made would hold.

Articulus 10 — Whether Someone Unwilling, Insane, Asleep, Can Be Baptized

Whether someone unwilling, out of his mind, or sleeping can be baptized?

Whether someone unwilling, out of his mind, or sleeping can be baptized?

§ 96. Next it is asked concerning what is said there, D: Furthermore it must be known that those in whom there are no evident signs, etc.

§ 97. And it is asked next to this: Whether, if someone is mute, or sleeping, or unwilling and objecting, he could nevertheless be baptized?

§ 98. It seems that he could, because: 1. The motion of free choice is not required for baptism, since infants do not have the use of free choice, in whom nevertheless the power of baptism operates.

§ 99. 2. Also, for an alien sin an alien faith seems to suffice, that is, the faith of the Church. But original sin is alien [i.e., contracted from another]. Therefore, it seems that the faith of the Church suffices for them, which is offered equally to the unwilling, and the deaf, and the mute, and the sleeping, and the insane, just as to infants. Therefore, it seems that he obtains the character and baptismal grace.

356. Cf. Albert the Great, In III Sent.

§ 100. Solution. It must be said that it is one way in the unwilling, and another way in others. For the Pope distinguishes between the unwilling and the unwilling. For there is an unwilling person who does not believe, yet submits himself to the operation of the Church without objecting, so that he may obtain the very thing that he believes the Church is doing; and this one obtains the character. There is also an unwilling person who openly objects, and does not submit himself to the operation of the Church; and this one obtains nothing, even if he were immersed a thousand times.

§ 101. But concerning the insane, I think that they are to be baptized, especially if they are the children of Christians. And even if others are baptized, I think that they receive the character and the power of baptism, if they are insane from birth [a natura]. If, however, while they had the use of reason they objected, I think that they obtain nothing if they are baptized in their insanity.

§ 102. Concerning the sleeping I say the same thing, that if they are baptized, and they objected while awake, they obtain nothing. But if they consented, or being asked did not object, I think that those baptized obtain a character at least, and also grace if they were compunctious before sleep: but it is not to be done except in extreme necessity of danger.

Articulus 11 — Whether Someone Can Be Baptized In Jest Or In Mimicry

Can someone be baptized in jest or in mimicry?

§ 103. Next it is asked concerning what he says there, E: It is also customarily asked concerning one who joking, like a mimic, etc.

§ 104. For it seems that it is not baptism: because as is immediately said in the text, intention is required in this and in other sacraments. But one immersing in mimicry intends to jest and not to baptize. Therefore, he confers nothing.

§ 105. BUT THE CONTRARY seems to imply that something else is obtained, because Augustine doubts about this.

§ 106. Also, it seems that intention operates nothing for the sacrament, because: 1. Augustine says that a drunkard baptizes, and [the subject] is baptized. But a drunkard cannot intend, because, as was noted upon the second book of the Sentences, intention is a will with an end, or reason determining an end; and a drunkard does not have the use of reason. Therefore, intention in the sacrament operates nothing.

§ 107. 2. Also, in the Gospel no mention is made of intention, when it is said at the end of Matthew 28:19: Going therefore, teach ye all nations, baptizing them, etc. But it does not say, "Intend to baptize."

§ 108. 3. Also, on the part of the recipient the intention to receive is not required. Therefore, it seems that neither on the part of the giver is the intention to give [required].

§ 109. 4. Also, we are all exposed to danger by this, because we do not know whether the priest intends or not. And it seems that out of hatred he could neglect many by not intending.

Therefore, it seems that since baptism is a sacrament of necessity, intention ought not to be [required].

§ 110. 5. Also, concerning a heretic it was held above that he baptizes: and yet he does not intend to do what the Church does. Moreover, that the work of a heretic imprints a character, Ambrose says thus in the book on Free Choice, concerning the baptism of infants: Many wolves infix a character: who seem to be inside, yet are known by the fruits of their morals not to pertain to that sheepfold which is one out of all.

§ 111. 6. Also, in the same place: The Lord's character, when an erring sheep is freed from error and returns to Christian truth, is recognized, not disapproved.

§ 112. 7. Also, it was expressly held in the text above. Therefore, one not intending baptizes, as it seems. Therefore, intention is not required, as is said in the text; and thus one baptized in mimicry is baptized, even if the whole was mimicry, as it seems.

§ 113. Solution. It must be said that intention on the part of the giver is required for baptism: not the intention of consecrating something, but only of doing what the Church does. And this is expressed by the word of baptizing, when it is said: I baptize thee, as was said above in the question on the form.

of baptism. Hence, if it is pronounced jokingly with the intention of doing what the Church does over an unbaptized person who does not object beforehand or at the time, it is baptized: and then the whole thing is not mimical, because the intention expressed in the first person verb was not mimical. But if it is mimical, and the person objects, then he attains nothing.

§ 1. To the other objection, it must be said that it is one thing to baptize a drunkard (ebriosus), and another a drunken person (ebrius); for a drunken person does not have the use of reason in act, but a drunkard is not necessarily drunk.

§ 2. To the other, it must be said that intention is expressly signified in the act of baptizing, because an action is not ordered by a wise person without intention.

§ 3. To the other, it must be said that on the part of the recipient, intention is placed towards the deed of the Church when he submits himself without objecting: and such an intention is sufficient.

§ 4. To the other, it must be said that from this he is not exposed to danger: because a general intention is expressed in the word of baptizing: and that expression suffices for the intention of the Church, namely, for doing what the Church does: even if he does not believe that this has any value: for such an intention suffices, as has already been said.

§ 5. And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 12 — Whether In The Elect To Be Baptized Two Times Ought To Be Observed, Namely Easter And Pentecost

Whether in baptizing the elect they ought to observe two times, namely Easter and Pentecost?

358. Cf. Albert the Great, In II Sent.

Next, it is asked about what is said, there, F, It must be acknowledged also in baptizing the elect, etc. What is the reason for those two times? for It seems that baptism ought to be on the Epiphany: because 1. Then the Lord was baptized, and conferred the power of regeneration on the waters.

1. Likewise, then the heavens were opened over him, just as baptism opens the heavens: therefore then it is more the time for baptizing according to congruence.
2. Likewise, on the day of the Nativity it seems to be the time: because baptism has a similitude with spiritual regeneration: therefore it is ordered to birth rather than to resurrection, as it seems.
3. Moreover, since it is a sacrament of necessity which it is a danger to defer, it seems always to be the time for baptizing.

§ 1. SOLUTION. The time of necessity is always, when little children are born: but the time of congruence is twice a year, as is touched upon in the Letter: because through baptism we are consigned to death and resurrection, as the Apostle says in Romans 6:4, since we are buried with him by baptism into death, etc. and we are immersed three times on account of the three-day burial: and we are extracted naked on account of the testimony of the resurrection. This is what he says: We were buried with him by baptism into death, so that just as Christ arose from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too might walk in newness of life. And at Pentecost: because the Holy Spirit operates in baptism, who is then celebrated as sent.

§ 2. To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the regenerative power is imperfect for regenerating, which the Lord conferred by the touch of his most pure flesh upon the freezing waters, as Bede says, and it is reduced to act through the truth of the Passion and the invocation of the Trinity: and therefore in the Passion water with blood went out from the side of Christ, so that the blood operating in the water might be understood.

§ 3. To the other, it must be said that heaven was then opened for the exit of grace: but for the entrance into glory it was opened in the Passion and Resurrection, and as regards place in the Ascension, as was determined above.

§ 4. To the other, it must be said that as Peter, Gregory's disciple, says in the blessing of the paschal candle: It profited us nothing to be born, unless it had profited us to be redeemed and therefore spiritual regeneration pertains more to resurrection than to birth: because in the resurrection Christ laid aside the old penalty, just as man lays aside the oldness of sin.

Articulus 13 — Whether Those Coming To Baptism Ought To Profess The Faith, And Whether That Profession Is A Vow

Whether those coming to baptism ought to profess the faith? and, Whether that profession is a vow?

357. Cf. Albert the Great, In III Sent.

Next, it is asked about what is said, there, G. Furthermore, all coming to baptism ought to profess their faith, etc.

For from this the promise which is made in baptism seems to be a vow: because a vow is a spontaneous promise of a better good, confirmed by deliberation and obligation: but it is evident that one sinning against a vow sins doubly by one sin, because he commits an illicit act, and because he acts against the vow: therefore it seems that every baptized person, by sinning after baptism, sins doubly: therefore the baptized makes his condemnation worse.

§ 5. SOLUTION. It must be said that it is not a vow except very generally and improperly taking it: because a vow is the conception of a better condition of good, and a deliberate promise confirmed by obligation: but a better good is not said except of a counsel, not of a precept: but the one to be baptized does not promise anything except the good of precept, to which he is merely obligated: and therefore it is not properly a vow.

§ 1. And thus the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 14 — Whether A Child Coming To Age Is Bound To Those Things Which The Sponsors Have Vowed For Him, And Whether The Sponsors Are Obligated As Sureties Of Their Faith, And In What Sense The Sponsors Say, 'I Believe'

Whether a little child coming to age is bound to those things which godparents vowed for him? and, Whether godparents are obligated as guarantors of their faith? and, In what sense godparents say, "I believe"?

Next, it is asked about what is said, there, G, §1: But if it is a little child, not able to believe or speak, etc.

Whether a little child coming to age is obligated to those things which godparents promised for him?

It seems, however, that he is: because 1. Dionysius says that the sense of the words which the godparents say is, that that boy, coming to his senses, will hold the sacred confessions which they promised there: therefore he is obligated to this, as it seems.

1. Likewise, it is greater that a human being be ordered to good than to evil: but we are bound to evil by the transgression of another: therefore we can also be obligated to good by the obligation and confession of another: therefore boys are obligated by the words of the godparents, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: If someone vows his son to religion before the years of discretion, the son coming to the years of discretion is not obligated: therefore, by a similar reason, he is not obligated by the responses of the godparents.

FURTHERMORE it is asked, Whether godparents are obligated as if they were guarantors (fidejussores) of their faith?

It seems, however, that they are: because 1. Thus says Augustine in a certain sermon: But I admonish you all, both men and women who receive children in baptism, to recognize yourselves to have been guarantors before the Lord: admonish them therefore to always guard chastity, to cherish justice, to love charity, and above all to learn the creed and the Lord's prayer: and you yourselves hold them, and show them to those whom you have received.[359] Therefore it seems that they are obligated.

1. Likewise, Ambrose: We ought to love the children whom we have raised from the sacred font far more than those whom we have begotten.[360] But it stands that we are obligated to provide goods for carnal boys: therefore much more for spiritual ones: therefore we are bound as guarantors for them.

FURTHERMORE it is asked, In what sense does the godparent say for the little child, "I believe"?

For he either speaks in his own person, or in the person of the little child. If in his own person, this is nothing: because the priest, seeking faith, names the little child, and asks about the little child. But if he speaks in the person of the little child: then he seems to speak falsely, because the little child does not believe.

§ 2. SOLUTION. It seems it must be said that the little child is obligated to faith, and to the morals which are contained from the reception of baptism.

§ 3. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that there is no similarity: because in baptism nothing is promised for the little child to which he is not obligated by natural law: but in a vow there is a spontaneous obligation beyond this: and therefore one cannot do this for another. Hence a little child in baptism does not make nor receive a new obligation: but rather receives a benefit from the confession of another's faith, which ought to become his own.

§ 1. To what is further asked, it must be said that godparents are obligated to diligence, if the children are not otherwise instructed: but because the Our Father and I believe in God are sung in the solemn Church, and morals are preached, and are shown in the examples of good people now: therefore not as much solicitude is applied as in the primitive Church, when little children were nourished among infidels: and this is what the authority of Augustine intends.

§ 2. To what is objected from Ambrose, it must be said that we ought to love spiritual children more relatively (secundum quid), but carnal ones simply: however I say more relatively, insofar as spiritual filiation is more noble than carnal: simply speaking, however, we are more obligated to carnal children: and in the order of those to be loved, carnal ones are placed before spiritual ones, as was noted above in the Third Book of the Sentences.

§ 3. To what is further asked about the sense of the words, it must be said that when "I believe" or "I renounce" is said, it is said in the person of the little child: and "I believe" is worth as much there as "I am prepared to receive the sacrament of faith, since I do not have the obstacle of a contrary will and dissent": and for this kind of believing the use of free choice is not required.

§ 4. Hence from this the solution to the objection to the contrary can be clear.

Articulus 15 — Why Children Are Catechized, And For What The Catechism Avails

Why are little children catechized? and, What is catechism for?

Next, it is asked about what is said, there, H, But that interrogation and response occurs in the catechism, to which is added exorcism.

For it is asked, Why is the little child catechized, since he is not yet receptive to discipline?

For the Church seems to deviate.

Likewise it is asked, What is exorcism for?

For it either expels the demon from a bodily obsession of the little child, or a spiritual one. If bodily: then it ought not to be done except in those bodily obsessed and furious from the oppression of the demon: and this is not done. But if it is done to expel spiritually from the little child: it either has an effect, or not. If it has an effect: therefore an exorcised person not baptized can be saved, and be in the state of those to be saved: which is false and heretical. But if it does not have an effect: then it is done for nothing and ridiculously.

§ 5. There are, however, some who say to this, that it has an effect not in itself, but in baptism, so that namely baptism may attain a fuller effect. But this seems nothing to me: for this cannot be except by strengthening baptism, or by disposing the subject so that he becomes more apt to perceive grace. If in the first way: this is impossible: because what is not, cannot be conferred: but the person is not yet baptized when the little child is exorcised. Nor does it seem to be in the second way: because it cannot dispose the subject, unless either on the part of the penalty, or on the part of the fault. Not on the part of the penalty: because that is connected to the fault: and it is not weakened, unless the fault is weakened. Nor on the part of the fault: because that is either wholly remitted, or wholly remains: but it is evident that it is not wholly remitted in exorcism: therefore it wholly remains: therefore the subject is equally disposed before exorcism and afterwards: therefore he is in no way disposed by exorcism.

§ 6. Furthermore it is asked here about those things which are done in exorcism and catechism, what and how many they are, and according to what order, and when they are done?

§ 7. SOLUTION. It must be said to the first, that the power of the demon is twofold, namely interior, and exterior: hence through exorcism I think that the exterior power of the demon is weakened, and not the interior: just as the objection proves. But the exterior power of the demon is that by which he stirs up the fomes (tinder of sin) in an adult, so that he may not attain baptism: and in a little child he places actions of death before baptism: and against this exterior power I think exorcism avails.

359. Pseudo-Augustine (Caesarius of Arles), Sermo 228 (PL 39:2165).

§ 8. And through this the solution to the first questions is clear: because baptism operates against the interior power, and exorcism against the exterior power which is in the fomes.

§ 1. But to what is further asked about the number and order of those things which are required in baptism: it must be said that according to the diverse customs of the Church they are varied in number and in order. But more frequently, first he is breathed upon (exsufflated): so that the exterior power of the demon may be driven away. Second, the sign of the cross is made on him on the breast and on the forehead: so that the devil may know himself to be driven from him, both in the secret of the heart, and in the openness of confession. Third, he receives salt in the mouth: so that he may be prepared for the taste of wisdom, and the stench of the fomes may be restrained. Next is made the smearing of the nostrils and ears with spittle: so that he may have the discernment of faith, and that grace, which is signified by the saliva descending from the head, and his senses as regards doctrine in the hearing of faith, and the discernment of faith sealed in the nostrils, may be opened to Christ. Next is made the anointing on the breast for preparing the heart for God, and on the shoulders for the burdens of the Lord with the invocation of the Trinity, without whose help we can do nothing.

§ 2. But after baptism is made the anointing of chrism on the crown of the head: so that the incorruptible mind may be opened to God, so that with the mind he may contemplate eternal things: which are signified by the chrism confected from shining oil and balsam preserving from corruption. Next is made the clothing with the white garment in sign of the innocence which is received in baptism, and of the glory which is received in the resurrection. Finally a lit candle is placed in his hand, so that the word of God may be a lamp to his feet, and a light to his feet against spiritual darkness.

§ 3. And let these things said about baptism suffice.

DISTINCTIO VII

Divisio Textus

Now concerning the sacrament of confirmation, etc. Here in the second place the Master touches upon the sacrament of confirmation, concerning which he determines three things, namely the minister in the beginning of this chapter: secondly, where he also indicates the form and matter and effect, there, A, §2: But the virtue of this sacrament is the giving, etc. In the third place, he touches upon the cause of its non-iteration, and the recipient, there, B, §2: This sacrament ought to be received only by the fasting, and handed over to the fasting, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Sacrament Of Confirmation Is Necessary

Whether the sacrament of confirmation is necessary?

360. Pseudo-Ambrose (Maximus of Turin), Sermo 13 (PL 17:610).

But here a question falls before the Letter: Whether this sacrament is necessary for salvation, or instituted only for well-being?

But it seems that it is necessary: because 1. That without which a human being is not a full Christian, this is necessary for the Christian life: but without confirmation a human being is not a full Christian: therefore it is necessary for the Christian life. The first is evident through itself. The second is written above, where Urban says: After baptism they ought to receive the Holy Spirit, so that they may be found full Christians.[361] Thence further: Without the Christian life there is no salvation: therefore without confirmation there is no salvation.

If perhaps you say, what almost all say, that fullness is twofold, namely of sufficiency, and of copiousness: or fullness of grace, and fullness of its strength: and the saying of Urban is understood of the second fullness. On the contrary: According to this the same could be said of the counsels and works of supererogation: because without them there is not the fullness of copiousness: therefore it seems that confirmation belongs to the fullness of necessity and of sufficiency.

1. Likewise, Hugh of St. Victor says: What does it profit if you are raised up through baptism, unless you are confirmed for standing through confirmation?[362] As if to say: Nothing. Therefore it seems that baptism does not profit for salvation without confirmation: therefore confirmation is necessary for salvation.
2. Likewise, without the expulsion of the disease there is no health: because fear always remains, and the cause of danger with the disease remaining: but every sacrament (as was said above) is ordered against the disease of sin: therefore it seems that the cause of danger is not perfectly expelled, unless the grace of the sacrament is perceived: therefore it is necessary that the grace of confirmation be perceived.
3. Likewise, since there are two parts of justice, namely to decline from evil, and to do good: that part which is to do good operates more substantially to salvation than that which is to decline from evil: because as authority says, the avoidance of sin does not merit the palm, but avoids the penalty: therefore by similarity since baptismal grace is ablutive of sin, and thus is ordered to expelling evil: because the grace of confirmation has an order to good: it seems that the grace of confirmation operates more substantially to salvation than baptismal grace. Therefore since without baptism there is no salvation, neither will there be salvation on the way without confirmation.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. If confirmation is necessary for salvation: therefore he who dies baptized before confirmation, even he who is not feigning, is condemned: which is heretical to say.

1. Likewise, it was held above that in baptism grace and the fullness of virtues are conferred; but one having grace and virtue has all things necessary for salvation: therefore for salvation he does not necessarily need confirmation.

§ 1. SOLUTION. It must be said that necessity is multiplex, as is determined by the Philosopher in book V of the Metaphysics.[363] For there is absolute necessity: and by this necessity confirmation is not necessary for salvation. There is again necessity of condition, namely of some end: as if a human being ought to remain in life, he has necessity to eat. Thus it can be said that confirmation is necessary for salvation: if the faith ought to be defended robustly and without fear in the impugnations of the enemy: for although otherwise from the grace perceived in baptism he has whence he may stand, yet he does not have this from a grace specially ordered to strength against the weakness which is from the depressing fomes, as will be clear below: and if this strength ought to be had, it is necessary to be confirmed.

§ 2. Let it be said therefore to the first, that that solution of the Masters is legitimate concerning the fullness of sufficiency and of copiousness: or the fullness for being, and the fullness of strength.

§ 3. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is one way in graces ordered to merit, such as are in the virtues and gifts and beatitudes, as was said above: and another way in sacramental grace which is ordered against the defect proceeding from sin. Because those give the fullness of copiousness changing the state of the person: just as the state of one observing the counsels is one thing, and the state of one observing only the precepts is another. But those which are in the sacraments expel sin in whatever state, or the defect proceeding from sin: and therefore without them there is not the fullness simply ordered to salvation or ordering. Hence sacramental grace pertains more to the fullness of Christian salvation than the grace of perfection in counsels and supererogations.

§ 4. To the other, it must be said that the saying of Hugh can be understood in two ways: in one way that he speaks in a case where contempt of religion excludes the sacrament: because to contemn a sacrament is condemnable, although in itself it is not necessary. In another way it can be said, that he does not say this because condemnation follows from this, but because as it frequently follows from weakness of falling in spiritual battle.

§ 5. To the other, it must be said that disease is expelled in two ways by the grace of the sacrament: in one way as regards fault, and thus it is expelled in baptism as regards original fault, and in penance as regards actual fault: and from this expulsion is had the sufficiency of salvation. In another way it is expelled as regards the penalty inclining into fault, and as regards this it is expelled in confirmation, and the sacrament of the altar, and extreme unction: and from this is had the sufficiency of strength for fighting against spiritual enemies.

§ 6. To the other, it must be said that baptism does not consist in the mere ablution of filth: but brightness and beauty from the ablution is placed around the body, which signifies the brightness of the soul posited in grace and in virtues. Although confirmation also sounds of an order into good, nevertheless the grace of confirmation principally speaks of strength from the ablution of the contrary disposition to spiritual boldness which is in the confession of the name of Christ, as will be clear below. And therefore on neither part is it similar.

§ 7. Moreover, the objection presupposes a falsehood: because to decline from evil is said in two ways, namely not to do evil by simple negation: and this is not a part of justice, but avoids penalty. In another way to decline from evil means not to will to do evil, that is, to will not to do evil; and this posits an act of the interior will tending away from evil, which is an interior act in one having grace: and this is properly a part of general justice: and as regards that it merits the palm: and with this baptism has similitude which consists in ablution and positing, and also confirmation which takes away disease and posits strength from grace given simply for standing in battle. But the objection supposed that in the first way to decline was said to be a part of justice, and would have similitude with baptism.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is Some Determinate Matter Of Confirmation, And Which It Is

Whether there is any determined matter of confirmation, and what is it?

Next, it is asked about what he says, there, A, § 4, around the beginning: For the form is open, etc.

For the Bishop says these words when he confirms: I consign you with the sign of the cross, and I confirm you with the chrism of salvation in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, Amen. But some have this usage: I confirm you with the sign of the cross, and I confirm you with the chrism of salvation, etc. But the first mode is more general.

But many things are asked concerning this form.

1. First, because the Apostles seem to have used no form in the Acts, but confirmed by a simple imposition of hands. Acts 8:17: Then they laid hands upon them, and they received the Holy Spirit. And below, v. 18: When Simon had seen that through the imposition of the hand of the Apostles the Holy Spirit was given.
2. Likewise, in the Gospel, when little children came to Jesus, he laid hands upon them.[364] And it is not read that he signed them with the sign of the holy cross, or confirmed them with the chrism of salvation.
3. Reason also seems to demand this: because in confirmation the Spirit is given for strength: and therefore it is given by him who holds a more excellent grade in the Church: therefore it seems that the Spirit is signified to be translated from him into the one to be confirmed: therefore it ought not to be retorted to another: but it is retorted to another when it is said, I confirm you, etc.: therefore it ought not to be said, as it seems.
4. Moreover, if a sacrament does not have institution except divine, as was determined above, and all Doctors hitherto have said: and the Apostles and the Lord confirmed, not using any form: it seems that neither ought the Church use any form.

362. Hugh of St. Victor, De sacramentis, Lib. 2, p. 7, c. 2 (PL 176:459).

5. Likewise, nowhere is it read in the canon about the institution of this form of confirmation, which the Bishops of our time use: therefore it seems that it is apposed by the Church for well-being, and is not of the form.

ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Hugh of St. Victor says that a sacrament is a corporeal and visible element signifying from institution, representing from similitude, and conferring invisible grace from sanctification.[365] But a corporeal element (as was held above) is nothing without the word accessing the element: therefore in confirmation there must be had words which are the form of the sacrament, whatever they may be.

1. Moreover, in the fore-had definition Hugh says that the corporeal element confers grace from sanctification: but sanctification is not except through the words of divine invocation: therefore in this sacrament the words of divine invocation are required, which is the form of the sacrament.
2. Likewise, it was held above that God did not confer on ministers the power of cleansing or operating interiorly, but only exteriorly, lest hope be placed in man: therefore confirmation consists in the interior cleansing of the infection of the fomes, drawing into weakness and noxious shame of the confession of faith: but God did not confer that upon ministers: therefore this grace ought not to be signified to descend from the minister, as seemed to be proved before, but rather from God through the work of the sacrament: but this cannot be done except mediating a form of words of the invocation of God by which he operates: therefore a form of words is required.

§ 1. FURTHERMORE it is asked here about the very words which are of the form: and it is asked about what is said, I consign you with the sign of the cross, etc.

For it seems that this is posited superfluously: because 1. He is signed in baptism with the cross both on the breast and on the shoulders and on the crown of the head.

1. Moreover, in the word which is of the form of the sacrament the proper act of the minister ought to be expressed, just as when it is said, I baptize you in the name of the Father, etc.: but the proper act of the minister in this sacrament is not to sign, but rather to confirm: therefore it seems that the minister ought not to use the word of signing in the form of this sacrament.

§ 2. MOREOVER it is asked, 1. Why in confirmation is mention made of the cross rather than of glorification and resurrection, so that he is said to be consigned with the cross?

1. Likewise, of one sacrament there is only a unique sacramental act: confirmation is one sacrament: therefore it has a unique sacramental act: therefore a double act ought not to be expressed in the form: therefore it ought not to be said, "I confirm and I consign," because these two words express two acts.

363. Aristotle, Metaphysics, V, 5 (1015a20).

§ 3. Likewise, it is asked concerning this which is said, I confirm you with the chrism of salvation, why does he say of salvation, rather than of grace or eternal life?

And it seems that it ought to be said, "of grace": because 1. Salvation which speaks of the evasion of danger is not except from conferred grace: therefore grace according to the intellect is prior to salvation: therefore the collation of grace is more immediate to the act of the sacrament than salvation: since therefore the act of the sacrament ought to be determined through an immediate terminus, it seems that it ought to be said, "with the chrism of grace", and not "of salvation".

1. Likewise, in the form of baptism no mention is made of the matter, or the end, or the efficient cause of the effect of the sacrament: but it is simply said, I baptize you in the name, etc.: therefore it seems that neither here should any mention be made of the matter, and the efficient cause: therefore it ought not to be said, "with the chrism of salvation": but simply, I confirm you in the name of the Father, etc.

§ 4. Moreover, all the questions which were made in the tractate on baptism concerning smearings, additions, diminutions, and corruptions, have to be made here: and they are solved in the same way as there.

§ 5. SOLUTION. It must be said that this sacrament is against the weakness arising from the fomes, from the fact that it is not wholly purged in baptism, but remains weakened for the exercise of battle: but the greater difficulty is in the confession of the name of Christ and the sign of redemption, in this way in which he must be confessed by mouth and work proceeding from the heart, as is said, in Romans 10:9: Because if you confess with your mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.[366] The demon also does not sustain this confession: but rises up against scandals: and therefore for this act confirmation is necessary.

§ 6. It must be said therefore to the first, that in my judgment confirmation was never celebrated without a form of words by the Apostles: but Christ who had both the power of authority insofar as he is God, and the power of excellence insofar as he is a human being united to God, was able to confer as he willed: because he did not hold the place of a minister, but of the head in the Church. But, as I think, the Apostles never confirmed without a prescribed form of words: although some have said this and sought the reason why they confirmed without a form of words and a determined matter, but our Pontiffs with a form of words and the matter of chrism.

Hence, to the arguments it must be said that although this is not read [in Scripture], nevertheless the form was instituted by the Lord, and handed down by the Apostles, just like that of baptism. However, it can be said that confirmation is twofold: one is for standing firm in the good universally, and this is done by anyone else, but especially by superiors who hold a place of greater holiness and merit of life, through prayer; and the Apostles used this confirmation, frequently confirming the same person. The other confirmation, which imprints a sacramental character for the expulsion of timidity arising from the fomes, was never done by the Apostles without words and determinate matter. Because of this, we have a special chapter in Dionysius, who was with the Apostles, concerning those to be perfected in the myron, and he speaks of the sanctification of the chrism and the things to be offered in it[367].

361. Aristotle, Metaphysics, V, 5 (1015a20).

Therefore, to that which is objected to the contrary through reason, it must be said that sacramental grace does not descend from the merit of life, nor from the minister, as has been proved: but from the work of the sacrament, and therefore it must be referred to the work in the matter with the words.

To the following two, the solution is clear through what was said before.

To that which is further asked concerning the words of the form, it must be said that the highest thing in the Christian life is the confession of faith. And this is proved as follows: for although love is high, yet it leans on the knowledge of faith, and hope likewise: because Augustine says[368], "Nothing is loved unless it is believed or known; nor is anything hoped for, unless it is in some way presumed and believed." But what is difficult in the cardinal virtues, although it is difficult for the operating power, nevertheless reason proves and persuades it. This [confession of faith], however, is difficult inside and outside: first inside, because one's own reason is denied; outside, because this is principally sought by visible and invisible enemies. But first, because faith is first and does not lean on another [virtue]: therefore, the grace of confirmation operates principally with respect to this act. It is necessary, therefore, to have a twofold act in confirming: one which is initiative and demonstrative, to which confirmation is principally directed; and another which expresses the proper operation of the sacrament of confirmation. And therefore it is premised by way of insinuation, I consign you [Consigno te], and there follows, with the sign of the cross. I confirm [Confirmo]: and the first is on account of the difficulty within, to which confirmation is ordered; and the other on account of the difficulty without, for which it confirms one to stand firm.

Therefore it must be said to the first and second, that consignation in baptism is a sacramental [sacramentalis], and not of the sacrament [sacramenti]: and it is for expelling the power of the enemy in the fomes, lest it impede the attainment of baptism: and so that the baptized may meditate on God, and think, and carry the yoke of God on his shoulders, as was said above concerning the sacramentals of baptism: but here confirmation becomes as it were insinuative of the banner under which the act of the sacrament of confirmation is to be exercised.

To the other it must be said, that in the incarnation, burial, and resurrection there was not the battle of Christ, but only on the cross: but we are enrolled under the banner of his cross through confirmation: and therefore mention is made of the cross only, and not of the others. This is what the Apostle says We preach Christ crucified, a scandal indeed to the Jews, and foolishness to the Gentiles, but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Hence this was maximally attacked by the Jews and by the Gentiles: and therefore the act of confirmation is properly with respect to that.

364. Romans 10:9.

The second difficulty is of the same [kind] regarding spiritual battle: because the demon lost his prey there [on the cross], regarding the payment of the debt and the fulfillment of satisfaction: and therefore he maximally impedes us from conforming to Him, since this is to take up the cross and follow the Savior: and therefore mention is made especially of the cross.

To the other, the solution is clear from what was said before: because the first act is imported by the first word: the end to which the act of confirmation is directed is also insinuated, and the true cause of this necessity has been stated.

And through this the solution to the following is clear, why a twofold word is necessary here.

To the other it must be said, that as is clear from the questions held above concerning the grace of the sacraments, every sacramental grace is against a danger: but confirmation has a special order: because it is against danger within, and against danger without: within, because it removes weakness and the noxious shame of confessing Christ arising from the fomes. But without, because it strengthens to stand before kings and princes and demons: and therefore it is called [the chrism] of salvation rather than of grace: because salvation is there substantially, which speaks of the evasion of danger.

To the reason moreover it must be said, that although this is done through grace, nevertheless it is not done through grace as grace, that is, which makes the one having it pleasing, and renders his work pleasing: but rather through grace as saving interiorly, and saving exteriorly from the terrors of timidity.

To the other it must be said, that in baptism there is an ordering against a general disease in a universal element, for which it is not necessary to have any insinuation, because it has no difficulty on the part of the receiver; but in confirmation an insinuation is necessary, as has been said. And because a sacrament insinuates principally in a similitude that is invented, not in the property of the material element: therefore it was necessary in the form of this sacrament for mention to be made of the matter: because according to Master Hugh, a sacrament represents from a similitude.

And through this the solution to all the queries is clear.

Articulus 3 — Whether The Matter Of The Sacrament Of Confirmation Is Chrism

Whether the matter of the sacrament of confirmation is chrism?

Then it is inquired concerning that which he says, there, A, § 1, near the beginning: He signs with sacred chrism.

And it is inquired concerning the matter of this sacrament.

365. Hugh of St. Victor, De sacramentis, Lib. 1, p. 9, c. 2 (PL 176:317).

And it seems that 1. The matter of this sacrament ought not to be chrism: because for a general disease a medicine is required which can be had generally: therefore it seems that chrism ought not to be the matter.

1. Moreover, in baptism which is a sacrament ordered against original fault, the matter is a simple element: it seems therefore, that in confirmation which is ordered against the weakness following from the fomes of original [sin], the matter should also be a simple element.

Item, why in this sacrament rather than in others is a mixed liquor the matter?

It seems that it ought not to be: because the effect of the sacrament is single: therefore a single matter ought to be demonstrated: therefore in a single liquor.

Further it is asked, why are these liquors, namely oil and balsam, taken rather than others?

For it seems that 1. Wine ought rather to be assumed: because this renders a man of good hope, as the Philosopher says in book IV of the Ethics and makes the bold strong, as is held in 3 Esdras and seq. Since therefore confirmation is for fighting, it seems that wine alone ought to be assumed. 2. Item, concerning bread it is said And bread confirms the heart of man; therefore bread is the proper matter of confirmation, as it seems.

1. Item, oil which floats on top, seems to signify mercy and charity more than corroboration: therefore it is not the proper matter of confirmation, as it seems.
2. Item, concerning balsam it is objected: because, as Hugh says, it signifies the odor of good fame: but fame is rather in another than in him who is famous, just as honor is: since therefore the matter of a sacrament ought to have a sign in the one receiving the sacrament, and not in another, it seems that balsam works nothing toward the matter of this sacrament.

Further, it is asked whether unconsecrated oil and balsam can be the matter of this sacrament?

And it seems that no: because chrism is consecrated at a determinate time of the year: and Bishops cannot use another in confirming.

But against this it seems: because 1. The matter of baptism is an unconsecrated element: therefore it seems that similarly the matter of this [sacrament] should be thus.

1. Item, in the Eucharist the bread and wine are not necessarily blessed beforehand, but there is one consecrating and transubstantiating form: therefore it seems that in this sacrament these unconsecrated liquors ought to be the matter of the sacrament.

Solution. It must be said that this sacrament, just as it is against a special disease, so it has something special in its form and in its matter: and therefore such arguments are of little worth: it is so in this or that sacrament: therefore it must also be so in another. For what is special in this one is that it is confirmative and operative; and therefore it vindicates principally for itself three causes for which the sacraments were principally instituted: because from the matter and form it is for erudition insofar as it is insinuative, as was said before: and again from the exercise of the act it confers grace: and from the bodily element it humbles man, so that he may seek salvation from God and for the sake of God in lower things.

It must be said therefore to the first, that considering substantially, neither the necessity of the sacrament, nor its generality are the cause why it has this or that matter: but it has for matter that in which sensible signs signifying and confirming the reality of the sacrament are expressly found, as is clear above from the definition of a sacrament: and therefore in the sacrament of baptism water is the sacrament: because it is ablative of filth, making the washed shine, and the element upon which the spirit of life appeared in the creation of the world, and in which living creatures first appeared, as well as the living and mobile soul: by these properties it has an agreement with the reality of baptism, in which man is first regenerated to spiritual life, and being is given to him through the Holy Spirit: and therefore the first reason is not valid, that if confirmation is against a general disease, it ought to have a general element for matter: because this is not the cause of the matter of a sacrament, as has been said: but it has chrism for matter: because among other liquors it posits a more express insinuation through signs for understanding the reality of confirmation.

Through this the solution to the next is also clear: for these are the arguments of some, and they posit a non-cause as a cause.

To the other it must be said, that although the reality of the sacrament is primarily one, nevertheless it is manifold in virtue and power, according to those things for which it expedites man, such as spiritual battle, and the open confession of faith without trembling, and the like: and therefore it could not be represented in one element with respect to all these, as has already been said concerning the form, that it has a twofold word, namely I confirm [confirmo], and I consign [consigno].

To the other it must be said, that this sacrament has these two special liquors, as almost all those following Hugh of St. Victor say, namely the oil of conscience on account of grace, and the balsam of good fame. And what they say is true, if it is well understood: for oil does three things in conscience, especially that of olives, because another oil cannot be the matter: for this oil illuminates, anoints, and nourishes: and its light is referred to the similitude of the character which is a certain light, as was proved in earlier [questions], but the anointing is referred to the soothing of the pain of the fomes, the wound of which introduced fear, and makes one tremble where there is no fear: and therefore pugilists in the contests of the Olympics were anciently anointed, so that they could not be held by an adversary; but it nourishes not by eating, but by entering into the substance, and administering to it a fomentation of moisture, lest it fail in labors, and become rigid in battle. Moreover, from the nature of the tree it has greenness in summer and winter: and signifies constancy in prosperous and adverse things. Balsam, moreover, as Moses the Egyptian [Maimonides] says, is not born except in the eye of the sun which signifies Christ, who comes anointed for us as prince and leader of the war: from which we are called Christians, because we are similarly anointed. And balsam preserves from putrefaction those things which are anointed with balsam, and has a similitude against the putrefaction of the fomes drawing one into pusillanimity and the fear of the Christian name in persecution. It is clear therefore, that these two liquors joined together posit a greater agreement to the reality of this sacrament than others.

To that which is objected concerning wine, it must be said that wine does not heal, nor does it confer boldness from robustness: but rather from malice and infirmity, because it elevates the spirits and the blood to the higher parts, and blocks the ways of discretion lest the danger into which one precipitates be discerned: and therefore it has no agreement with the reality of the sacrament which confirms from the robustness conferred.

To the other it must be said, that bread confirms one to remain in being and life, but not to fight from the robustness that it ministers: and therefore the unity of the mystical body in the charity of the head and members responds to this confirmation, for which grace is conferred in the sacrament of the Eucharist: and therefore bread is a sacrament there, and not here.

To the other it must be said, that although oil with respect to the property of floating on top has a similitude with mercy, nevertheless with respect to other things it has a similitude with the reality of confirmation, as has been said: however, even this property can be reduced to the similitude of the reality, because the confirmed is not less depressed by threats and terrors.

To the other it must be said, that Hugh touches upon the cause accidentally and consequently: but the principal one is that which was said above: for fame operates accidentally toward the act of this sacrament, namely so that it may be known that he is intrepid not from obstinacy and temerity or pride, but from the robustness of the Spirit: for this is not known except through the good opinion which is held of him.

To the other it must be said, that unconsecrated oil and balsam are not, nor can they be, the matter of this sacrament. For just as it is in the political virtues, so there is also a difference in the sacraments. For in the political virtues it is thus, that some are not perfect virtues unless they have delight in the act, as the Philosopher says: One must take as a sign a habit not producing delight in the act [as being imperfect]. And those do not consist simply about the most difficult thing, but about the most difficult thing of their matter. But some are such, that it suffices in their acts, if they are not saddened to the point of a deduction or perturbation of reason: and those consist in the most difficult thing of their matter and in the most difficult thing simply. So it is also in the sacraments, that the act of the sacramental reality, that is, to which the sacramental grace is ordered, is in the greatest difficulty: and therefore an ampler preparation is required in the matter insinuating that act than in the matter of another sacrament: and so it is here the intrepid confession of faith, having a threefold reason of difficulty, as was said above, on account of which the matter must be consecrated even by him who holds the greater place in the Church: so that abundant grace may be signified.

And from this determination the understanding of the distinction of matter which the ancients gave results, namely that it is one way regarding the matter of confirmation, and another way regarding the matter of baptism: because not the whole water of the river or vessel is the matter of baptism, but only that which adheres by contact to the baptized, and it does not have regenerative power except when touching the baptized: but the whole consecrated chrism is the matter of confirmation: because the whole is prepared for this: and it is only necessary that the form approach, and it is a perfect sacrament.

And from this the solution to those things which are objected to the contrary is clear: because it is not similar concerning this sacrament, and concerning others.

Articulus 4 — Whether One Not Ordained Can Confirm, And Whether One Ordained But Not A Bishop Can Confirm

Whether an unordained person can confirm? and, Whether an ordained person who is not a Bishop can?

Then it is inquired concerning that which he says, there, A, § 1, near the beginning: This sacrament cannot be perfected by others except by the highest priests, etc.

And here is the question concerning the minister of this sacrament, and it should be diversified: either he ought to be good, or he could be bad: and whether a heretic or not? But these were disputed in the tract on baptism.

But here we will ask two things: first, whether an unordained person can confirm? Second, whether an ordained person who is not a Bishop can?

To the first it is objected thus: 1. Let us posit that someone is in necessity, and desires the sacrament, and cannot have an ordained person or a Bishop, it seems to be better that he receive it from a layman, than that he depart without the sacrament: especially since he is not a full Christian who does not have this sacrament.

1. Item, In necessity a layman baptizes, and the person is baptized: and he hears confessions, and that person is absolved from sins: therefore it seems, that in necessity someone can also confirm.
2. Item, Sometimes there is more abundant grace in a layman than in a Prelate: if therefore the robustness of grace ought to be transfused by abundant grace, it seems that sometimes it is better transfused by a layman than by a Prelate or Bishop.
3. Item, In natures it is thus, that where a thing is by essence and presence, there it operates its effect, and not there where it is not, but ought to be: but since the order of grace is not contrary to the order of nature, it seems that in grace it is similarly so: therefore where there is actually abundant grace, it more quickly transfuses grace, than where it is not but ought to be: but often abundant grace is in a layman, and not in a

368. Hugh of St. Victor, De sacramentis, Lib. 1, p. 9, c. 2 (PL 176:317).

Bishop: therefore sometimes confirmation can be done better by a layman than by a Bishop.

Item, Let us posit that someone bears himself as a Bishop, but is not a Bishop, as those do who call themselves Armenians: and someone comes to him probably thinking him to be a Bishop, and receives confirmation from him: it is asked, whether he is confirmed?

It seems that he is: because 1. He who probably believes himself to be baptized will be reputed baptized: and if he dies, he flies away [to heaven], unless actual sin impedes him.

1. Similarly, If someone confesses to him whom he thinks to be his priest, and that one does not have orders, he is reputed to have confessed: therefore it seems, that that one is also confirmed.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: The Church, subsequently knowing that he was not a Bishop, confirms him again: which it would not do if he were confirmed, because an injury must not be done to the sacrament: therefore he is not previously confirmed.

Further it is asked concerning the second, whether a simple priest can confirm?

And it seems that he can: because 1. Gregory permitted this on account of scandal, as is held in the text: but if it were of the truth of life and doctrine, that this sacrament be conferred by a Bishop, it would not have been permitted for any scandal: it seems therefore, that if a simple priest confirms, the person is confirmed.

1. Item, A simple priest anoints with chrism, and in a more eminent place than the forehead is, because on the crown of the head: therefore it seems, that neither in the matter, nor in the place is there a repugnance, that a simple priest cannot confirm.
2. Item, If a Bishop alone can confirm: either this is from orders, or from jurisdiction. If from orders: then a priest can: because a Bishop has no order which a simple priest does not have. If however from jurisdiction: then an elect before consecration can do this: because an elect has total jurisdiction even before he has orders.

Solution. It must be said that a Bishop alone can confer this sacrament: and the reason for this is the reality and the act of this sacrament: for the reality is the Spirit conferred for robustness: and therefore it is fitting with respect to the sacramental sign, that it descend from fullness: but the act is most excellent, as was said before: and with respect to this it is also necessary to have a more excellent minister.

It must be said therefore to the first, that it is not better that he receive it from a layman: because for one desiring the sacrament nothing is lost of the virtue of the sacrament, although he may not have the character: but concerning baptism it is otherwise, as is clear from the things said above: because baptism does not require an act of free will, because otherwise it would not be given to little ones: and it is a sacrament of necessity.

To the other it must be said, that by simple necessity baptism is a sacrament of necessity: but it is not so concerning confirmation.

To the other it must be said, that there is the grace of the person ordered to the merit of life, and there is the grace of the minister of the Church ordered to the power of the keys and the operations of the sacraments: and of the first what is objected is true, and not of the second: but from the second grace descends according to order in the sacraments.

To the other it must be said, that in the minister of the Church grace is present according to act, although it is not personal grace ordered to the merit of life, as has already become clear.

To the other it must be said, that he is not confirmed, nor does he have the character of confirmation: and the objection concerning the sacraments of necessity is worth nothing concerning this one, as has already been said often.

To the other which is asked concerning the second, it must be said that a simple priest cannot confirm: and this is not on account of the place or the matter, but on account of the sign toward the reality of the sacrament, which is not preserved in him in whose keys grace is contracted and diminished, as was said at the beginning of this solution.

To the other which is objected concerning Gregory, it must be said that he never permitted that there should be a confirmation which was conferred by a simple priest: but on account of scandal , abuse and ignorance he did not correct it. Or let it be said, that it was a certain blessing given to those to be confirmed, just as blessed bread is given to some in place of the Eucharist: and Gregory permitted this for a time.

To the other it must be said, that neither from orders alone, nor from jurisdiction alone can a Bishop do this: but from orders and jurisdiction together: for this is annexed to the Episcopal office, just like the consecration of Churches, and the ordination of clerics, and the veiling of virgins, and the like: and thus the objection is not valid.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Sacrament Of Confirmation Confers Grace, And Whether That Grace Is Grace That Makes One Pleasing, And Distinct From The Grace Of Baptism

Whether the sacrament of confirmation confers grace? and, Whether that grace is sanctifying [gratum faciens], and distinct from the grace of baptism?

Then it is inquired concerning that which he says, there, A, § 2: Moreover the virtue of this sacrament is the donation of the Holy Spirit for robustness, etc.

And three things are inquired. The first is, whether this sacrament confers grace? The second is, if it confers it, whether that is freely given [gratis data] or sanctifying [gratum faciens]? The third is, whether that is special, or the same as baptismal grace?

TO THE FIRST one proceeds thus: 1. In natures it is thus, that that which is in some act, as long as it is having it, is not in potency to it, in the way in which it has it: but the baptized non-feigner is in act having grace: therefore as long as he has it, he is not in potency to it according as he has it: therefore it seems, that through confirmation and the following sacraments no grace is conferred: therefore that sacrament either does not confer grace, or does not always confer it.

1. Item, Above in the tract on baptism, distinction four, it was held that those who approach baptism holy do not receive there the grace which they previously had, and that in such persons the reality precedes the sacrament: therefore it seems, that neither in this sacrament does he who has grace receive any grace.
2. Item, Grace is not considered except in a twofold ratio, namely in itself, and in the virtues: in itself according as it informs the soul, and renders it pleasing: but in the virtues according as it perfects the powers of the soul, and elicits acts: but with respect to both the fullness of grace is conferred in baptism, as was often held; therefore there is not anything of grace which is received in confirmation, as it seems.
3. Item, It cannot be understood, that the same subject with respect to the same part of itself is susceptible of two accidents of the same species: but sanctifying grace is of the same species: therefore two are not in the same thing according to the same: but the soul according to its essence receives grace in baptism: therefore while that remains, it is not susceptible of grace in confirmation: therefore it confers no grace, as it seems.
4. Item, A feigner receives confirmation, or a non-feigner. If a feigner: it is evident that he does not receive grace: because it is said The holy Spirit of discipline will flee from the feigner. But if a non-feigner receives it, then he has grace before confirmation: but nothing receives that which it already has: therefore he does not receive grace: therefore no grace is received in confirmation.

If perhaps you say, that he who has lost baptismal grace, and comes not as a feigner to confirmation, receives grace in it. Against: He receives grace by the virtue of penance, and not from the virtue of confirmation : and this is clear, because he is bound to confess, and exterior satisfaction is enjoined upon him: which is not done to one approaching baptism, because baptism does not require exterior groaning or mourning: therefore if approaching confirmation, he does not receive grace from the virtue of confirmation: therefore no grace is received in confirmation, as it seems.

BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. A sacrament of the new law is the cause of every reality of which it is a sign, as was determined above in the text: but confirmation is a sign of grace, because it is given for robustness: therefore it is its cause: therefore it confers grace.

1. To the same [point] are the authorities adduced in the text.
2. Moreover, Exterior unction attests to interior unction: but interior unction does not happen except through grace: therefore it confers grace.

It is asked further, Whether that grace is sanctifying, or not?

And it seems that it is: because 1. The sacraments are given as a help against sin: but grace ordered against sin is sanctifying: therefore confirmation and the other sacraments confer sanctifying grace.

1. Item, Confirmation sounds of robustness of spirit: but robustness of spirit is not except through sanctifying grace: therefore confirmation confers sanctifying grace.
2. Item, In the text it is said, that the Spirit is given with all fullness of grace in this sacrament: but this does not happen except through sanctifying grace: therefore, etc.: and because all concede this.

IT IS OBJECTED to the contrary thus: 1. Just as natural being relates to natural well-being, so spiritual being relates to spiritual well-being: but natural being relates to natural well-being in such a way that it can be without it: therefore spiritual being can also be without spiritual well-being. But being and robust being relate as being and well-being: therefore spiritual being can be without robust being: but robust being is through confirmation: therefore spiritual being can be without confirmation: but everything without which salvation can be, is of the superadded and freely given graces: therefore the grace given in confirmation is freely given, or of the freely given ones, and not of the sanctifying ones.

1. Item, Whatever is such that it does not directly oppose sin, that is of the freely given graces and not the sanctifying ones: but the grace given in confirmation does not directly oppose sin: therefore it is of the freely given graces, not the sanctifying ones. Proof of the first: grace is contrary to fault: hence the Gloss on the Apostle says, that grace is reconciliation to God: and the grace which is in the virtues is contrary to the acts of sins, and to spiritual sins. But the minor is proved from the fact that the grace given in confirmation is given to one having no fault: therefore it seems, that it is not ordered against fault: therefore it is not of the sanctifying graces, as was previously concluded.
2. Item, Grace given to expel bodily infirmity is a freely given one, not a sanctifying one, as is held in the text[369], where the grace of healings is numbered among the freely given graces, not the sanctifying ones: therefore also that which expels punishment, not spiritual fault, is of the freely given graces, not the sanctifying ones: but such is the grace of confirmation: therefore it is not sanctifying, but freely given.

It is asked further thirdly, which is more difficult, Whether the grace of confirmation is distinct from the grace of baptism, or is it only a confirmation of it?

And it seems that it is only a confirmation or comforting of it.

1. So it is in bodily robustness, which is founded in natural virtue, that it is nothing other than the valuation and comforting of it, from whatever causes it proceeds: there-

Therefore, it is similar in spiritual strength, which is nothing other than the strengthening of spiritual virtue. But spiritual virtue is given in baptism, and strength in confirmation. Therefore, it seems that confirmation is nothing other than the vigor and strengthening of the virtue given in baptism.

§ 2. Again, the operation of medicine is like a minister of nature, and nature, strengthened by medicine, operates of itself. Therefore, it is similar in spiritual matters. But a sacrament is like medicine. Therefore, its operation regarding spiritual being is like a minister. Therefore, the operation of the sacrament granting strength will concern the matter of pre-existing virtue and grace, and will not be distinct in itself.

§ 3. Besides, since a simple thing is of the same ratio as a simple thing, it is not distinguished in anything, just as a point from a point. But if it were of different rationes, it would be distinguished, as a point from unity. Since, therefore, baptismal grace is simple, whether considered in itself or in the virtues, it will not be distinguished from the grace given in confirmation, which is considered in itself or in the virtues.

§ 4. Again, confirmation also seems to imply this: for nothing is confirmed except what already exists. Since, therefore, in the order of the sacraments there is nothing before confirmation except baptism, it seems that the grace of confirmation is a confirmation of baptismal grace.

§ 5. Again, if grace is distinguished from grace, this will be according to the cause, or the subject, or the act of grace. But on the part of the efficient cause there is no distinction, because that is God, the author of all grace. Likewise, neither on the part of the subject, because that is the soul, and baptismal grace and the grace of confirmation are present to the soul according to the same part.

§ 6. Again, nor on the part of the act, because in baptism the grace of fortitude is conferred for spiritual strength, just as the other virtues, just as in confirmation. Therefore, it seems that it has no distinction from it; and thus it seems that it is nothing else but a habit of the same genus, placed around it and united to it.

§ 7. Furthermore, it seems that it is entirely superfluous. For in natural virtue it is such that it is generated, nourished, and strengthened from the same things. Therefore, also the spiritual virtue that is given in baptism has in itself that by which it may be strengthened without any other sacrament being added. Therefore, the sacrament of confirmation is added superfluously.

§ 8. Again, political virtue is generated and strengthened from the same thing, because it is from acts. Therefore, infused virtue too. Therefore, the virtue given in baptism is strengthened from itself, or by its own acts, and not by another sacrament.

If perhaps you say that the grace of confirmation increases it: then it is asked, how is it concerning that increase?

369. 1 Corinthians 12:28, 30.

§ 1. For the Philosopher says: If you add simple to simple, you will make nothing greater. But grace is simple. Therefore, if simple grace is added to preceding [grace], nothing will thereby be greater. Therefore, neither will it be increased.

§ 2. Besides, from this it would follow that it would not be posited except concerning baptismal grace: because the increase of an existing magnitude is an addition. Therefore, the grace of confirmation would also be an addition to the pre-existing magnitude of baptismal grace.

§ 3. But if you say that it increases it by way of the separation of a contrary intension: then the question is, what kind of intension is it? For it is either by way of separation from the contrary, just as what is whiter is what is more unmixed with black, according to the Philosopher; or according to an approach to some terminus, or to the true imposition of the name, for what is in the terminus is not intensified. If you say that it is intensified in the first way, this is nothing: because through the least grace the whole contrary, which is sin, is separated; therefore, the least grace would be like the greatest, which is false. But if in the second way, then I ask, how does this happen? For if it has entirely nothing of the contrary, then it seems to be in the true imposition of the name, and in the terminus of its purity. Therefore, it seems that it ought not to be intensified.

§ 4. Besides, an accident that does not depend on the subject, nor on the acts of the subject, nor on the principles of the subject, can have no cause of its intension in the subject. But grace is such an accident. Therefore, it seems that it is not intensified by any of such causes through the act of the sacrament.

§ 5. If you say that it is intensified by the act of the sacrament. On the contrary: the same act ought to be intensifying and generating according to species, as is evident in political virtue. But the act of baptism generates grace; therefore, if anything were to intensify it, it ought to be of the same species, which is false.

§ 6. Besides, to dismiss this disputation, which is introduced here incidentally, let it be intensified in whatever way this can happen: for intension is not posited except concerning what exists previously in baptism, and it is not distinguished from it. Therefore, it seems that the grace of confirmation is not distinguished from baptismal grace, but is posited around it.

§ 7. Again, this seems [clear] from the act to which the grace of confirmation is ordered, namely, the intrepid confession of faith. For this act is elicited by faith, and commanded by charity, according as charity is the general mover of the virtues, as was said above in the third book of the Sentences. But faith and charity are given in baptism. Therefore, it seems that nothing is given in confirmation, except perhaps some improvement and expediting of the grace given in baptism.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. As the sign in a sacrament is related to a sign, so the effect is related to the effect. But the sign in confirmation in no way depends on the sign in baptism. Therefore, neither does the effect on the effect.

§ 2. Again, it was held above that sacramental graces are not so united that, when one is had, all are had, as is the case in the infused virtues. Therefore, the grace of confirmation in no way depends on baptismal grace.

§ 3. Again, the characters of confirmation and baptism are distinct, nor is one the confirmation of the other; therefore, neither is the reality [distinct].

§ 4. Again, when someone is confirmed, it is not asked that baptism be confirmed, but the baptized human being. Therefore, it seems that the grace of confirmation is not referred to baptism, but to the human being.

§ 5. Again, if baptism needed confirmation, it would already be weak in itself, which is unsuitable to say, since it is a necessary and most strong sacrament. Therefore, confirmation is not referred to baptism, but to the baptized human being, who has many reasons for weakness even after he is baptized.

Solution. It must be said that, as was evident above in the disputation on the communion of the sacraments, where sacramental grace is distinguished from grace in the virtues and gifts: one sacramental grace does not depend on another, nor when one is had is another had, but they are divided.

Whence to what is asked first, it must be said that this sacrament confers a grace ordered against the weakness left from the infirmity of the depressing fomes [tinder of sin].

To the first, therefore, it must be said that baptism is not in potency to baptismal grace, but it can be in potency to another grace of another species: just as what is actually white can be in potency to sweet; and in such a way we say that the grace of confirmation differs in species from baptismal grace.

To the next it must be said that the Master is speaking there of baptismal grace ordered against original guilt; and this is not given in contrition except insofar as one has baptism in desire, as was said above, and therefore it is the same as that, which is why one cannot receive it afterwards. But baptismal and confirmation grace are not related in this way, as will be evident below, but they are different according to species.

To the next it must be said that baptismal and confirmation grace agree in certain respects, and differ in certain respects, and on the part of the difference they are drawn to the most special species. Now, they agree in this, that they make the subject pleasing and the work pleasing, and that they are in the soul and the virtues as expediting the virtues, according as one virtue and grace expedites another, just as also one power of the soul expedites another (as sense [expedites] intellect, and the like). But they differ by ultimate differences, namely, insofar as they are curative of this or that disease, as was shown above in the distinction of the sacraments. Whence, since the grace of confirmation cures a disease that baptism does not cure, it is evident that it is another grace in species from it. That it is so, however, is supposed from what was established previously in the distinction and sufficiency of the sacraments.

To the next it must be said that the unfeigned receiver of confirmation receives in it a grace that he did not have before: not regarding the making-pleasing of himself, or of his work, because he had this before (since in this also the grace of confirmation does not differ from baptismal grace), but regarding the act of curing a disease that was not cured before. And this cure (as was said above) is the expulsion of the weakness left from the fomes drawing one back from the bold confession of faith.

To the next it must be said that it is well conceded that grace according to that act which is making-pleasing is had by virtue of contrition. But one who is gratuitous [pleasing] for one reason can be pleasing also for another reason, and regarding that other reason he receives grace in confirmation, as has already become clear.

To what is asked secondly, it must be said that the grace given in confirmation is making-pleasing [sanctifying], as the first arguments prove.

To what is objected to the contrary, it must be said that as it is in the soul, so it is also in grace: and as it is in the powers of the soul, so it is in the virtues, and the other spiritual graces. But the soul (as the Philosopher says in the second book of De Anima [370]) is the act of the whole, and giving being to the whole body, and the parts of the soul, which are the powers, give being to the parts of the body. Whence he says that if the eye were an animal, sight would be its soul; and a blind eye is equivocally called an eye, just as a dead animal is equivocally called an animal. Whence it is evident that as first being is from the soul in the nature of the animal as a whole, so first being in the parts is from the parts of the soul. And speaking proportionally, it is thus in spiritual being which is from grace, which gives spiritual being to the soul: and its parts give [spiritual being] to the parts of the soul. And the virtues indeed give spiritual being to the powers regarding works, but sacramental grace gives it regarding the expulsion of the contrary. Whence it is evident that it pertains to being in some way.

But to what is objected, that this grace is not ordered against guilt: it must be said that it is ordered against guilt, but not immediately. For it is ordered against the penalty that is an impediment to good and an incitement to evil; and this has a certain likeness with guilt, as Augustine says, like a daughter with a mother. And many things about this are noted in the second book of the Sentences, in the tractate on original sin.

And through this the solution to the questions against the second point is evident.

To those things that are asked against the third point, it must be said that this grace is distinct from the sacramental grace that is in baptism, and is always different from it, just as one virtue differs from another in species, although all are united in infused grace. But here there is a greater difference regarding the fact that sacramental graces are not all infused at the same time.

But to what is objected first, it must be said that that argument proceeds only in those things in which strength and what is strengthened are posited around the same thing, and around a virtue of the same ratio. But this is not the case here, because no one is strengthened in confirmation by the grace of baptism, but the baptized human being [is strengthened], as is evident through the objections made to the contrary, which are very good and illuminating for the solution.

To the next it must be said that the grace of baptism is not related to the grace of confirmation as nature is to medicine. And therefore that objection is invalid, nor does it prove anything.

To the next it must be said that a simple thing can differ from a simple thing in two ways, namely through nature or ratio (just as unity and a point), and by position or respect to a subject, if it has positions (as a beginning point from a terminating point and one continuing in the middle). And these two differences are to be found in these two graces, namely of baptism and of confirmation, which are of different rationes, as was held. And also they differ in effect through their order to the subject, because one is substantially ordered against the guilt of original sin, but the other against the faintheartedness left from the fomes even after baptism, toward acts of excellent difficulty: such as the act of the confession of faith, in which a threefold difficulty is found, as was said above. And therefore it is evident that that argument was sophistic.

To the next it must be said that regarding that act which is to make-pleasing [sanctify] in general, it is not distinguished; but regarding making-pleasing according to a special ratio of pleasingness [gratitude/grace]. Because those special rationes can be multiplied, for nothing prohibits what is pleasing according to one ratio from being made still pleasing according to another ratio. Likewise, although faith eliciting the act of the confession of faith is given in baptism, and fortitude expediting in this that one not tremble at terrors, yet nothing prohibits that a grace evacuating the fear left from the fomes could be received; because the gift of fortitude does not evacuate that by way of medicine, nor even the virtue of fortitude.

To the next it must be said that it is neither superfluous, nor is it the confirmation of baptismal grace. For that [baptismal grace] is confirmed from other causes: for regarding its rooting in the subject, it is confirmed from use, from which it is conferred for increase according to congruity from the merit of acts, and according to efficient causality by God.

And through this the solution to the disputation introduced later is largely evident.

But to what is asked concerning the mode of increase, it is indeed said elsewhere on the third and first books. But because it is touched upon here, it can be said that grace is like a certain light that is in the soul from the continuous influence of the divine light: as the Psalm seems to say, where it says: The light of thy countenance, O Lord, is signed upon us, etc. [371]

And its increase I do not understand to be possible except in one of three ways: and all those ways have diverse opinions around them. For Chancellor Philip used to say that it was increased by the addition of similar grace, which God, the author of graces, unites by creating, and creates by uniting with the preceding. And this seems to me more reasonable and probable than all the opinions. Others, however, said that it grows regarding fervor, but not in itself; and this opinion is held by few, for the reason that lesser grace sometimes is more fervent in devotion than a greater. The third opinion is that God adds nothing, but multiplies grace in itself, just as he multiplied the five loaves. And this opinion would be more probable than all, if it were well proven that something without any addition of extrinsic essence, and without conversion into itself, were multiplicable otherwise than by extension. Because it is not ratified that God, by multiplying the five loaves, did not create matter there under the form of loaves, or did not convert the matter of the elements to loaves. And therefore that opinion is not pleasing, and it would hold well if it were well proven to the intellect. But this is nothing to the proposition, because we do not posit that the grace of confirmation increases the grace of baptism, but rather that, united in the act of making-pleasing in general, they differ in the special mode of making-pleasing, and in the special effect against the disease of original sin, and also in expediting toward the act of the confession of faith, as is evident from what has been said.

370. Psalm 4:7.

To what is objected concerning the confession of faith which faith elicits, it must be said that William of Auxerre found a good solution regarding the solution of such arguments, namely, that an act is said to be of grace or virtue in many ways, namely elicitively, just as a proper act is elicited from a habit: and thus confession is an act of the virtue which is faith. An act is also said to be of someone who commands that it be done, and thus every act of virtue can be of charity, which commands it to be done. It is also said to be expediting someone: and thus again since any virtue expedites another by removing some impediment of it, in this way the act of one virtue is attributed to another. And in this way the confession of faith, as of faith, is of faith; as for the sake of God, it is of charity; but that it be done without fear and shame, it can be of fortitude regarding magnanimity; and regarding the removal of the disease of the debilitating fomes, thus it is of this, namely the sacrament of confirmation. And this is what many say, and not many subtly consider, that sacramental grace heals, and the grace of the virtues orders to merit: because the grace of the sacrament removes the disposition of the disease intrinsically [per se], and consequently orders to the act; but the grace of virtue orders to the act intrinsically and primarily, in which merit consists.

And through this the solution to all the questions is evident.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Sacrament Of Confirmation Ought To Be Said To Be A Greater Sacrament Than The Others

Should the sacrament of confirmation be called a greater sacrament than the others?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there: Know that both are a great sacrament, but one is to be held with greater veneration, as it is given by greater [ministers], etc.

For this seems false: because § 1. If it is called greater by reason of what it contains, then the Eucharist is the greatest of all. But if by reason of what it effects, then baptism seems to be greater. But if someone wishes to say to this, as the Master seems to solve in the Text, that it is called greater because it is given by greater [ministers]: still this does not seem to be true, because Order is also given by greater [ministers], because likewise only by Bishops; and yet it is not called a greater sacrament.

371. Psalm 4:7.

§ 2. Besides, the giver is related to the sacrament as an efficient and ministering cause. But an efficient cause is nothing of the reality, but is entirely outside the caused thing. Therefore, the quantity of the reality is not from it. Therefore, it will not be called greater or lesser from the fact that it is effected or ministered by a greater or lesser [minister]. Therefore, the Master's solution does not seem fitting.

§ 3. Again, that solution seems to be against the authority of Rabanus in the Text, who says that in the unction of baptism the Spirit descends to inhabit, but in the unction of confirmation the sevenfold Spirit is given with all the fullness of sanctity and virtue. Therefore, it seems that by reason of the reality effected this sacrament is called greater.

Furthermore, it is also asked concerning the authority of Rabanus just touched upon. For the sevenfold Spirit seems to be given in baptism, because the seven gifts are given there, and every virtue, because he who has one has all. Therefore, it seems that this does not especially belong to confirmation.

Solution. It must be said that one sacrament is called greater than another in five ways according to a distinction of the ancients which is good. One of these is the reality itself: and thus baptism is called greater, because the grace in baptism remits guilt and external penalty, and does not require groaning or weeping. In another way by reason of what it contains, which is the reality and the sacrament: and thus they say the Eucharist is greater among the sacraments. In a third way by reason of the degree in which it is placed from the power of the character: and thus they say Order is greater. In a fourth way by reason of the things signified with respect to a reality not contained but only signified: and thus they say matrimony is greater among the sacraments, because it signifies the union of natures in Christ, and the union of the faithful soul with God. In the fifth and final way, that sacrament is called greater which is given by a greater minister: and thus confirmation is greater among the sacraments.

It must therefore be said to what is objected to the contrary, that although Order is given by greater [ministers], nevertheless that greatness does not attest to the strength of grace for an act, as in confirmation, whose grace expedites toward an act of maximal difficulty: for there the attestation of greatness is in power, and not in the strength of the one ordained.

To the next it must be said that a certain efficient cause is entirely extrinsic: just like that which does not actualize its own property or species in the effect, like an equivocal efficient cause: and concerning this the objection holds. But there is another efficient cause which posits its species and property in the giver: and this is likened to this sacrament: because through the greater minister it is understood, not indeed that the grace is greater, but that it has been conferred for a greater [effect] in the strength of the spirit. And therefore a certain greatness of the sacrament also follows the greatness of the minister.

To what is asked further concerning the authority of Rabanus, it must be said that, according to the Philosopher, it is different to speak according to "every" [omne] and according to "each one" [unumquodque]: for "every" regards the universality of nature and species, but "each one" the number of individuals and of matter, just as having three angles equal to two right angles follows a rectilinear triangle through every triangle, and yet it does not intrinsically follow it according to each and every [material] triangle. Thus we can say that in baptism grace is given according to every species of virtue: and yet not according to each and every [individual thing] which is of grace, but what is according to each and every [individual] is given in all the sacraments together. But according to this it can also be objected concerning confirmation: because there it is not given according to each and every [individual thing]: for certain things are given in other sacraments which are not given in confirmation. And therefore it must be said that Rabanus places force on these words: with all fullness: because there is a fullness of copiousness, as was said above, and Rabanus is speaking of this. And there is also a fullness of sufficiency which is given in baptism: and Rabanus is not speaking of this.

Through this the solution to the last point is also evident: because although the sevenfold Spirit is given in baptism, he is not, however, given through the fullness of copiousness.

Articulus 7 — Whether Confirmation Is Given In The More Honorable Part Of The Body, Namely, The Forehead

Should confirmation be given on the more worthy part of the body, namely on the forehead?

Next it is asked concerning what is said there, B, § 4, near the beginning: And it is done on the more worthy part of the body, namely on the forehead, etc.

For this seems false: because § 1. The top of the head [vertex] seems more worthy than the forehead, since it is the seat of reason, and the forehead is as it were the seat of the senses, as the Philosophers say, that the senses descend from the inner part of the head, and motion from the posterior.

§ 2. But this also seems through that passage of Jeremiah 2:16: The children of Memphis and Tahpanhes have deflowered thee even to the top of the head. And the Gloss of Jerome says there: Even to the evacuation of faith, which has its seat in the top of the head in which reason is.

§ 3. Besides, from this it seems that a simple priest could confirm: because he anoints in a more worthy place than the forehead, namely on the top of the head; therefore he can also anoint on the forehead.

§ 4. Again, since the confession of faith is in the tongue in which the motive power for interpreting resides, and confirmation orders toward the interpreting confession of faith, it seems that confirmation should be done on the tongue, and not on the forehead.

§ 5. Again, if the heart is firm, the whole is firmed. Whence Solomon: With all watchfulness...

...keep thy heart, because life issueth out from it . Therefore, it seems that confirmation, as in the root of firmness, should be signed on the heart, and not on the forehead.

Solution. Because, as a certain Gloss on Apocalypse 7:3 says, the seat of shame is in the forehead. Whence to take away evil shame, and to confirm, the sign of the cross is placed on the forehead, as if in the open, so that he may bear it in the open for honor, even when he is put to flight.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that reason does nothing to the proposition. Because although reason dictates the confirmation of faith, nevertheless the open sign is not in the place of reason, because that place is not exposed in all, but rather the forehead. Nor is confirmation given for just any confession of faith, but an open one, putting aside blushing and shame.

To the next it must be said that faith is in the intellect. But nevertheless the sign of confirmation is in a place to which men look: and this is the forehead. And therefore the seat of shame regarding the sign of blushing is also there.

To the next it must be said that confirmation is not so that one speaks expeditiously, which pertains to the expediting of the tongue, but so that one may confess the faith openly without shame.

To the next it must be said that that argument proceeds as if confirmation confers the grace of keeping the heart. And this is not true; but rather it confers a grace expelling the fear and shame of the name of Christ, the seat of which, regarding manifestation to men, is in the forehead.

And through this the solution to the whole is evident.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Sacrament Of Confirmation Ought To Be Given To Both Sexes, And At What Age It Ought To Be Conferred, And How The One To Be Confirmed Ought To Be Presented

Should the sacrament of confirmation be given to both sexes? And at what age should it be conferred? And how should the one to be confirmed be presented?

Next it is asked concerning what he says there, B, § 2: This sacrament ought to be received only by the fasting, and handed on by the fasting, etc.

And three things are asked here. First, whether this sacrament is to be conferred on both sexes? Second, at what age? Third, how the one to be confirmed ought to be presented by his godparents?

To the first it is objected thus: § 1. In the tabernacle of God none were enrolled to minister except males. Therefore, also none ought to be confirmed (so that the truth may correspond to the shadow) except males.

§ 2. Again, those readied for battle with Abraham; and the men of war, concerning whom it is held in Numbers 1 almost throughout, and Joshua; and the most strong, as it is said in 2

Kings [2 Samuel] 23:8 and following, were none but males. Therefore, it seems that for the battle of the Lord none ought to be confirmed except males, and not females on account of the softness of the sex.

But against this is what § 1. The Apostle says, Galatians 3:28, that in Christ there is neither bond nor free: there is neither male nor female, but a new creature. Therefore, females are to be confirmed just as males.

§ 2. Again, 2 Maccabees 7:20 and following, it is said concerning the mother of the seven brothers: Now the mother was marvelous above measure, and worthy of the memory of good things, who beholding her seven sons perishing in the space of one day, bore it with a good courage, for the hope that she had in God: and she bravely exhorted every one of them in her own language, being filled with wisdom: and joining a man's heart to a woman's thought... Therefore, the sacrament of confirmation is also to be given to women. But because this does not fall into doubt, it is light work to dispute concerning this.

Secondly it is asked, at what age is confirmation to be conferred?

Now it seems that only in adolescence: because § 1. Battle is not declared except to the robust, and in the law none were counted except from twenty years and upwards, who could proceed to wars. Therefore, spiritual battle too is to be declared to the understanding and robust.

§ 2. Besides, the faith of another does not operate except in the sacrament of baptism; therefore, in the others one's own faith operates. But it is not one's own before adult age. Therefore, it seems that adult age is to be awaited.

§ 3. Again, he would seem foolish who armed a boy: because he would rather oppress him than instruct him for war. Therefore, it seems that it is similar in spiritual battle.

§ 4. Again, Judges 8:20, Jerubbaal, namely Gideon, said to Jether his firstborn, that he should rise up and rush upon Zebah and Zalmunna, the princes of Midian, and kill them. And it follows, v. 20: Who did not draw his sword: for he was afraid, because he was yet a boy. Therefore, it seems that the age of boys is not fit for spiritual battle. Since therefore confirmation is given for spiritual battle, it ought not to be given to little ones or boys.

If perhaps you say that it is otherwise in spiritual battle, and otherwise in corporal battle: because spiritual battle is declared to little ones, but corporal is not. ON THE CONTRARY: Spiritual battle requires more than corporal: because it requires the understanding of the cunning of the demon, as the Apostle says, 2 Corinthians 2:11: We are not ignorant of his devices. A special virtue is also required. Whence, Psalm 44:4: Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O thou most mighty. [372] Therefore, it seems that if corporal battle is not declared to boys, much more strongly will spiritual battle not be declared to them.

Further it is asked thirdly, how are they to be presented?

And it seems that they ought to approach by themselves: § 1. For a sponsor [godparent] is not required except where confessions are to be made for another; but here he confesses for himself, as is said, John 9:21: He is of age, let him speak for himself. Therefore, it seems that he ought to present himself.

§ 2. Again, it seems that a woman can present no one: because in her the fragility of the sex is shown, and thus she is impotent to establish another. Therefore, it seems she ought not to present another who is to be established in battle.

Again, it is asked concerning the rationale of the ancient Ordinals, in which it is found that the sponsor representing another ought to hold him between his hands, and place his foot upon his own foot, and express his name to the Bishop, and afterwards bind the place signed with chrism: for such a custom is now rarely or never observed.

Again, in the ancient Ordinal it is found that a prayer concerning the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit is to be premised over those to be confirmed, and again afterwards others are subjoined, when they are sent armed to spiritual battle: and the rationale of this is asked.

Besides, it is asked concerning what a certain Pope says, that a woman represent a woman, and a man a man. From this it seems that they cannot represent one another from an unequal sex.

Again, it is asked concerning what he says here, Let it be conferred by the fasting and to the fasting: for why is this not observed now? Therefore, it seems that this sacrament is celebrated otherwise [than it should be].

...[sacrament] than he ought, or that nothing at all should happen.

§ 1. Solution. It must be said to the first that this sacrament is to be conferred upon men and women equally, because warfare is declared upon both. To the Ephesians 6:12: For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood; but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in the high places.[373]

§ 2. But to all the objections raised to the contrary, it must be said that those objections hold concerning those who have a softened mind and cast away the armor of God, to whom nevertheless it must be conferred, so that they may be a testimony to their more just condemnation. And for this reason males in antiquity were led to war; nevertheless in the battle against Sisera, Jael cast down the enemy, and Judith Holofernes, and Esther conquered Haman by prayers; and to the first woman as a type of the glorious Virgin it was said: She shall crush thy head.[374]

§ 3. And through this the solution is clear to all the questions which are about this matter.

§ 4. To that which is asked secondly, it must be said that either can be done, but it is better and safer that they be confirmed first. Nor however is battle declared upon them then, because then they do not understand temptations, and the age is immature for the strong motions of concupiscence; but they are prepared, and weapons are given to them so that they might have the means to fight when the time comes; and it is good to be prepared. Now this is signified in Genesis 14:5, where it is said that those who served rebelled in the fourteenth year; because in that year the goads of concupiscence begin, for the reason that, according to the Philosopher, in the second septennary [seven-year period] the seed begins to distill, and the ways of concupiscence begin to be opened.[375]

372. Ephesians 6:12.

§ 5. And through this the solution is clear to the whole that is objected: for he is not armed so that he might fight [immediately], but they are given to him so that he might have them prepared when there is need. And this is signified in David preparing the expenses of the temple for Solomon.

§ 6. TO THE THIRD question it must be said that no one can present himself: because the one to be confirmed must be sealed, as not having proper virtue to stand: but he must be set up by another, and therefore he must be presented by another.

§ 7. To the first [objection], therefore, it must be said that this is not done so that he may confess for him, but so that he may signify that he needs alien virtue, namely Christ's, for this, that he may be able to stand in the battle.

§ 8. To the next, the solution is clear through what was said before: for the woman is one having a softened mind, and yielding in every spiritual battle: and by this she is repelled from the army of the Lord, as is contained in Numbers 1:2 and 3.[376]

§ 9. To the next it must be said that the reason of those Ordinaries is excellent, and they express the mode of the Apostles and Fathers: for because the one to be confirmed seeks corroborative virtue, therefore it is signified that he cannot stand by himself, but in the footsteps of someone confirmed whom he may imitate in battle: and therefore one who is not confirmed ought to present no one, as much as pertains to the nature of sacramental fittingness. And if he should presume to do so, the sacrament is not indeed invalidated, but nevertheless he himself sins and must be rebuked. And because spiritual affinity is contracted there, a woman ought not to hold [as sponsor] her husband, nor conversely; nor a man his son, sister, or brother, because the carnal bond suffices to conciliate friendship among such persons.

§ 10. To the next it must be said that that Pope said this to avoid the ensuing danger: because sometimes a man presented a woman, and afterwards contracted [marriage] with her, which cannot be done; and therefore he wished that a woman should present a woman, and a man a man, lest there be made an impediment to marriage.

§ 11. To the next it must be said that this is said on account of the reverence of the sacrament: if however it is done otherwise on account of a lack of Bishops, it does not harm: for it is better to be confirmed after a meal when a Bishop can be had, than that, the Bishop departing, he could not be confirmed.

Articulus 9 — Whether Confirmation Imprints A Character

Whether confirmation imprints a character?

373. Ephesians 6:12.

§ 12. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, B, § 2: For no injury is to be done to any sacrament, etc.

§ 13. For this is commonly said, that it is done on account of the character which it imprints.

§ 14. But it seems that it does not imprint one: 1. For spiritual warfare was equally declared upon those who were in the natural law, and in the law of Moses, as upon those who are in the New Testament; and yet they did not have confirmation and a spiritual character. Therefore it seems that neither in the New Testament are fighters to be distinguished by a character.

§ 15. 2. Besides, what is the reason that a sacrament is not to be reiterated? For either this is done because it is a sacrament; or because it is a sacrament of the new law; or because it imprints a character; or because it confers an immovable effect.

§ 16. And it seems that it is by none of these ways. For if because it is a sacrament it were not reiterated: then no sacrament could be reiterated, which is false in penance and extreme unction, as will be held below. If however because it is a sacrament of the new law: again the instance is in extreme unction, because that was not in the Old Testament, except in type and in figure. Nor because it imprints a character: because by this circumcision, which did not imprint a character, could have been reiterated, which is false. Nor even therefore because the effect of the sacrament is immovable: because the effect of the sacrament is grace, and this is often lost. Therefore it seems that there is no cause why it ought not to be reiterated.

§ 17. 3. Also, it seems that it is necessary to be reiterated: for Augustine says, and it is posited below in the treatise on Extreme Unction: If the disease cannot be prevented from returning, why ought medicine be prohibited? Therefore since pusillanimity and timidity frequently return upon someone, it seems that frequent confirmation is necessary for him, and so it ought to be reiterated.

§ 18. Further it is asked: What order does the character of confirmation have to the character of order and of baptism?

§ 19. And it seems that it is that of a foundation: because one ought not to be ordained unless baptized [i.e., confirmed]; therefore it seems that if he does not have the character of confirmation, he is rendered unsuitable to receive the character of Order; therefore if one not confirmed is ordained, he is not ordained.

§ 20. Solution. It must be said to the first, that three sacraments in particular are not to be reiterated, namely baptism, confirmation, and order, because they imprint a perpetual effect and character. And an injury would be done to them if they were reiterated: because either the two characters will be the same in species, which cannot be; or the second sacrament would confer nothing, and this would be useless and injurious if the sacrament were celebrated. But other sacraments, as is said in the Letter, are not reiterated over the same matter, although those sacraments are reiterated concerning the same men receiving them.

374. Genesis 3:15.

§ 21. To the objection to the contrary, it must be said that the ancients had a heavier battle, or as heavy as we do: and yet they did not have the sacrament, because it was not the time of the sacrament. But they had the fortitude of the Lord and of virtue, by which they could stand. Nor could they have a character, because the leader of the war was not yet with us in the battle line, to whom they would be enrolled through a character; and this was expedited above in the common question of the sacraments, why the sacraments began with Christ.

§ 22. To the next it must be said that two things concur jointly, not divisibly, to this that a sacrament is not reiterated: namely the impression of a character (and this is the cause why those three sacraments, baptism, confirmation, and order, are not reiterated), and the unity of the sin against which the sacrament is ordered, just as original sin is only one, and does not infect except once and no more; and this was proved in the second book of the Sentences, where it was asked whether original sin returns after baptism from the infection of the flesh, just as it did in the infusion of the soul. And this is the cause why circumcision was not reiterated, and this cause concurs with the first, and maximally in baptism, but not in the other two sacraments.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that although debility returns, and the tinder [of sin] resumes its forces through the iteration of sin, as Augustine says, nevertheless the character with recuperated grace suffices for the expulsion of that [debility]. And therefore the sacrament ought not to be reiterated, lest it seem that what was conferred was less than sufficient.

§ 24. To that which is further asked, it must be said that it has an order of fittingness to the character of Order, and not of necessity.

§ 25. And as to what is said, that one ought not to be ordained unless confirmed, it imports a debt of congruity: because he who ought to dispense sacraments to others ought to be firm. But nevertheless, because the effect of the sacraments does not depend on the virtue of the minister, he can be unconfirmed.

DISTINCTIO VIII

Divisio Textus

§ 26. After the sacrament of baptism, etc. Here the Master treats in order concerning the third sacrament, which is the Eucharist.

§ 27. And the treatise on the Eucharist is divided according to him generally into two parts: in the first of which the Master sets forth certain preambles, namely concerning its utility, and figures. In the second he divides the treatise, and treats the parts thoroughly. But this begins in the second chapter, there, B, Here however other things to be considered occur, etc.

375. Genesis 14:5; Aristotle, History of Animals VII, 1.

§ 28. He touches upon the utility in the first chapter, where he says: Through baptism we are cleansed, etc.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Eucharist Is A Sacrament Of Greater Grace Than Baptism

Whether the Eucharist is a sacrament of greater grace than baptism?

§ 29. And it seems FALSE: because according to him baptism seems to be of lesser grace than the Eucharist:

§ 30. 1. For "to cleanse" denotes nothing but the removal of evil, whereas "to be confirmed in the good" denotes the firm attainment of the good, and this attainment is a good per se, while the removal of evil is a privation. Therefore baptism is of lesser sacramental grace than the Eucharist, which the Master denied in the preceding distinction.

§ 31. 2. Besides, to confirm in the good seems to be the act of confirmation, as was held before; therefore this ought not to be posited here as the effect of the Eucharist.

§ 32. 3. Similarly it is objected concerning that effect: the Eucharist spiritually refreshes: but this is the act of all grace; whence it seems that it is not special to this sacrament.

§ 33. 4. Besides, it is proved from this which is held in Job 1:4, that the sons of Job went and made feasts every one; which Gregory expounds concerning the refreshment of gifts and virtues.[377]

§ 34. 5. Also, through that of Isaiah 4:1: We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: which is the word of seven women taking hold of one man; and the Gloss there expounds this concerning the seven gifts.[378]

§ 35. 6. Also, Matthew 6:11: Give us this day our supersubstantial bread. The Gloss expounds this concerning the bread of the word, and the bread of grace.[379]

§ 36. 7. Also, Matthew 4:4: Not in bread alone doth man live, but in every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God.[380] Therefore through all these it seems that in no way is spiritual refreshment the proper effect of this sacrament.

§ 37. Solution. It must be said that our Masters assign many utilities to this sacrament.

§ 38. The first is principal and proper, namely that just as man lost life through eating the forbidden apple, so he might recover it through eating the tree of spiritual life; and this is for that reason called proper. Because man fell from life in many ways, namely through original and actual guilt, and through the weakening wound of concupiscence, and through the loss of spiritual goods in piety and goodness, and the like, which, as a certain moisture, vegetate and infuse the soul. Against guilt, however, are baptism and penance; and against the debility of concupiscence is confirmation. But for restoring lost spiritual strength, there is the spiritual food, the Eucharist. And a more subtle proof of this was held above in the distinction on the sacraments.

§ 39. The second is as it were close to that one, that it might be the spiritual nourishment of man. Whence man ate the bread of Angels.[381] Upon which Augustine says: That man might eat the bread of Angels, the Creator of Angels was made man.[382] Wisdom 16:20: Thou didst provide for them bread from heaven prepared without labor; having in it all that is delicious, and the sweetness of every taste.[383]

§ 40. The third is that it might unite the members of the body to Christ the head through charity. For it is otherwise in this food, and in others: because other foods are converted into the one fed; but this food converts the one fed to itself, and unites the fed members to itself; and the reason for this will be stated below. Whence, John 6:57: He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him.[384] And to Augustine it was said: Believe, and you shall eat me: nor shall you change me into yourself, but you shall be changed into me.[385]

§ 41. The fourth is not as proper and substantial to the sacrament, but follows upon it, namely that the merit of faith might be increased, which in this sacrament is exalted above all things, for the reason that reason can do nothing here without faith. And this the Master touches upon below, where he says why He gave His body under another species.

§ 42. The fifth is the uplifting of hope. Whence, Matthew 28:20: Behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world.[386]

§ 43. The sixth is the dilation of charity: because it is in memory of our redemption and liberation. 1 Corinthians 11:24: Do this for a commemoration of me.[387] And in the same place, v. 26: For as often as you shall eat this bread, and drink the chalice of the Lord, you shall shew the death of the Lord, until he come.[388]

§ 44. The seventh is the diminution of venial sins, although it was not principally instituted on account of venial sins, as was proved above. And therefore, in Matthew 6:11-12, after Give us this day our supersubstantial bread, there immediately follows: Forgive us our debts.[389]

§ 45. It can therefore be said to the first, that if the removal from evil and the attainment of good were the termini of the same motion, and baptism caused the terminus from which, and the Eucharist caused the terminus to which: then the objection would proceed. But this is not true: rather baptism removes evil, and induces good. And confirmation in such a good is not the terminus of baptism: but rather in another good of grace which the Eucharist confers, as was shown before: because sacramental graces are not had simultaneously.

§ 46. To the next it must be said that confirmation in the good is twofold, namely from the Holy Spirit given for the strength of battle, and this is the effect of confirmation. There is also confirmation in the good for the restitution of the virtue lost through disobedience, and this confirmation has to be done through spiritual food, and is the effect of the Eucharist.

§ 47. To ALL THE OTHERS there is a true solution, namely that there is spiritual refreshment with the sign and cause of food, and that refreshment is solely of the Eucharist. There is also refreshment through the containment of virtue lest it fail, and it causes its augmentation without reason in a sign, and this is fitting for the word of God and grace. And the authorities introduced speak of this.

377. Job 1:4; Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job, I, c. 8.

Articulus 2 — On The Four Figures Of The Eucharist

On the four figures of the Eucharist.

§ 48. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, A, near the beginning: Whose figure preceded, when God rained down manna to the Fathers in the desert, etc.

§ 49. For here the Master touches upon the fourfold figure of this sacrament, namely manna, and the blood of Christ flowing forth from his side, and the blood of the paschal lamb which liberated from the exterminator, and the oblation of Melchizedek.

§ 50. But it is asked concerning these figures. First indeed, why do baptism and the Eucharist have figures manifesting them, rather than the other sacraments?

§ 51. For it seems that the others ought to have them just as these do: because Master Hugh says that as soon as there was the disease, it was fitting for it to be signified by a medicine: therefore every sacrament ought to have been presignified in figures.

§ 52. However, that the sacraments ought not to have been exhibited immediately, is sufficiently proved above, and therefore it is not to be disputed here.

§ 53. Besides, since there are many other figures of this sacrament, especially those of which mention is made in the canon, such as the oblation of Abel, and of Abraham by which he offered his son, why does the Master not make mention of those just as of these three?

§ 54. Also, it seems that manna is not a figure of the Eucharist: because § 55. 1. Manna had every taste: but the Eucharist confers only grace, of one taste: because it is only one: therefore it is not a figure proportionate to the figurated [thing]. But if you say that the Eucharist confers every grace, from this it seems that the other sacraments and the rest of the virtues would be superfluous, which is unfitting: therefore it confers only one grace.

§ 56. 2. Besides, the bread in which our Lord Jesus Christ is consumed, is the bread of oblation and offered to God: but that [manna] was not offered to God: therefore it seems that it does not signify this.

§ 57. Further it seems that nor is the blood flowing from the side of the Lord a sign of this sacrament: because § 58. 1. Nothing is a sign of itself according to how "sign" is taken in the definition of a sacrament: but the same blood which flowed forth from the side of Christ, is received in the sacrament: therefore it is not a sign of it, but rather a sign in the sacrament.

§ 59. 2. Also, the ratio of flowing and effused blood is one thing, and that of the blood of drink is another: for flowing and effused blood has the effect of redemption and not of drink, but the blood in the sacrament is the effect of drink: therefore it seems that the effused blood does not signify the sacrament of the Eucharist.

378. Isaiah 4:1; Glossa ordinaria.

§ 60. 3. Besides, in the Eucharist, blood flowing from the body is not received, but rather contained in the body: but in the passion, blood was effused from the body: therefore it seems that it has nothing similar by which it could signify the blood of the Eucharist, except through identity, namely because it is the same, and this has already been proved above to be impossible.

§ 61. Further it is asked concerning the third figure which he introduces, namely concerning the blood of the paschal lamb with which the doorposts of the sons of Israel were smeared, so that they might be liberated from the exterminating Angel.

§ 62. For it seems that it did not have any similitude with the blood of Christ as it is received in the Eucharist: because § 63. 1. That [blood] specially liberated from the Angel slaying the firstborn of the Egyptians, by which is signified original sin from which the passion operating in baptism liberates, and not in the Eucharist: therefore that blood also posits a similitude to the blood operating in baptism, and not to the blood as it is given for spiritual drink in the Eucharist.

§ 64. 2. Also, that was the blood of the leading out from Egypt: but the Eucharist does not lead out from Egypt, but baptism: therefore it signifies the blood operating in baptism.

§ 65. Further it is asked concerning the fourth figure which he introduces, namely the oblation of Melchizedek: for in that there was an oblation made to Abraham, not to God, as is clear, Genesis 14:18, where it is said that he offered bread and wine to him, namely to Abraham, saying: Blessed be Abram by the most high God, by whose protection the enemies are in thy hands: but in the Eucharist the bread offered to God is received. Therefore it seems that it does not have this figure.

§ 66. BESIDES it is asked: Since form is in the Eucharist just as res [reality/thing] and species and location, and we have a figure regarding the res and species and location: why did nothing precede which would signify as to the form? For it seems that there ought to have been a figure regarding the form: because in the baptism of John a certain figure preceded the form of the baptism of Christ: therefore it ought also to have preceded in this one.

§ 67. Lastly it is asked: According to what is the number of these four figures taken?

§ 68. Solution. It must be said to the first, that there are four sacraments which are principally of the New Testament, namely baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, and extreme unction. The other three are also of the New Testament, namely because they had the plenitude of effect in the New; although in some way they preceded in the Old. But among the four which are of the New Testament, there are two which are so of the New, that they could not have any express figure in the Old. One indeed because of the imperfection of the Old Testament, such as Confirmation, in which the Spirit is given for strength: and therefore it ought not to have had a figure in the Old Testament where there was an imperfection of state according to the Spirit. But the other because of the state of original sin, by whose weight before Christ's Passion all were drawn to Limbo: and therefore there could not be a figure of Extreme Unction, which removes the relics of sin to this end that one may fly away immediately to glory. But Baptism and the Eucharist are sacraments, one of which is directly against original sin, against which there was also a remedy in the Old Testament, namely circumcision, and it had many figures. But the other is that in which the liberator Himself who operates in all the sacraments is conjoined to us: and therefore it was also fitting that figures of it precede: and this is the Eucharist. Penance, however, is against the defect of actual sin, which is singularly of every man in whatever law: and Matrimony is for the material multiplication of the faithful, which also was always necessary: and therefore those sacraments always existed, although not with as full grace as under Christ. Order, however, has a spiritual power which was in shadow in the Old, and in truth in the New. And thus it is clear what kind of difference there is in the sacraments in common.

§ 69. To the next it must be said that although there are other figures of the Passion of Christ, or of the effect of this sacrament, such as the oblation which represents the Passion of Christ according to human nature on the cross, and the sacrifice of Abel which represents the oblation by which Christ offered himself on the cross: nevertheless these four specially express not the Passion of Christ, but the sacramental res or species, according to how the res is received under the sacrament, or the species is referred to the res of the sacrament. And this is clear enough in manna, and the oblation of Melchizedek. But that the blood of the Egyptian or paschal lamb is not taken simply, but in the use of the faithful, is clear from this that the doorposts of those liberated are smeared with blood; and in this way the passible Christ is conjoined to the faithful, not as he hung on the cross, but as he is received in the sacrament, and smears the doorposts of the intellect and affection. The blood also flowing from the side of Christ, by the fact that it was with flowing water which signifies the people, has a relation to the blood in the sacrament, where water is conjoined signifying the people. But none of the other figures so expresses the species of the sacrament, or the res according to how it is under the sacrament: and therefore the Master does not make mention of them, but the canon of the Mass does, because it not only posits the substantials to the sacrament, but also expresses those things which were done concerning Christ in the Passion, as Innocent says, just as the paten signifies the stone of the sepulchre, the extension of the hands of the priest the extension of Christ on the cross. And therefore it also makes mention of certain figures signifying Christ's Passion, according to how it was represented on the cross, and not under the sacrament.

§ 70. To the next it must be said that although the proper effect of this sacrament is nothing but one grace, and of one substantial act: nevertheless that which in this sacrament is the res and the sacrament [res et sacramentum], is the whole and perfect Christ, who is full of grace, of whose plenitude we all have received, and grace for grace.[390] And manna expressed this diversity in the diversity of taste.

380. Matthew 4:4.

§ 71. To the next it must be said that manna was bread offered to man by God, and offered to God by man: which is clear in the golden urn, which was placed full of manna in the ark of the testament before the Lord: and so it is in the sacrament of the Eucharist, insofar as God offers the res of the sacrament for food, and we [offer it] to Him as the price of recompense for offenses.

§ 72. To that which is further asked, it must be said that nothing prohibits that the same thing, taken in different dispositions, be a sign and figure of itself, not as it is the same, but rather as it is taken conjoined to different species: and so it is of the blood flowing from the side of Christ: for by this very fact that it was conjoined to water, it had an expression of itself, as it unites the people to itself in the sacrament in which water is conjoined to wine to be transferred into blood. Or let it be said better, that there are two things in the sacrament, namely the consecration [confection] and the use: but in use it unites man to itself, while in the consecration it is made to be presentially under the sacrament. Let it be said therefore, that the blood of Christ joined to the water flowing from the side of Christ, has a similitude with the use in which it unites the people to itself, although it has identity with the blood which is in the consecration of the sacrament.

§ 73. To the next it must be said that blood according as it is for drink, is blood flowing to us. But although in the sacrament it is not without the body, this however is not from the virtue of the sacrament, but rather from the virtue of the indissolubility of blood from a glorious body: whence sacramentally it is received as flowing, although it is contained in the body through union to the body.

§ 74. To the next it must be said that as was said before, that the blood in the sacrament is contained in the body, this is not by virtue of the sacrament, but rather from the nature of a glorious body, in which one cannot be separated from the other.

§ 75. To that which is further asked concerning the third figure, it must be said that in truth that figure according to different things expresses two sacraments: because in baptism there are three things, namely liberation from the demon, and dipping in water, and the remission of sin. And the first of these is done by the Passion of Christ, and this is expressed by the liberation from the exterminating Angel. But the second was expressed by the crossing of the Red Sea. And the third by the submersion of the Egyptians: because otherwise the figure of the Eucharist would even precede the figure of baptism, which I consider unfitting: but it is not unfitting that the figure of the Passion precede, which operates in all the sacraments: but nevertheless the use of the blood and flesh of the lamb expresses the use of the sacramental res of the Eucharist.

§ 76. To the next it must be said that the blood by the fact that it led out, figures the Passion operating in baptism: but the use of the flesh and blood insofar as it comforted and prepared for the exit from Egypt to the fatherland, was a figure of the viaticum in the Eucharist.

§ 77. To that which is further asked concerning the fourth figure, it must be said that according to what was had before, in the Eucharist there is an oblation made to us by God, and to God by us: and Melchizedek expresses both: the first in offering to Abraham after the killing of the kings by whom sins are signified: but the second by this that he blessed the most high God.

§ 78. To the next it must be said that in the form of this sacrament the uncreated Word operates in the created word, and not by the work of the minister as in other sacraments: and therefore the words are uttered by the Priest in the person of Christ, which is not done in the others. And on account of this maximal perfection the form could not be prefigured.

§ 79. To the next it must be said that the four figures are divided so that two are referred to the res which is the res and sacrament [res et sacramentum], and two to the species of the sacrament in the matter. But the species in the matter can be taken absolutely, or according to a comparison to the effect of the sacrament which it signifies through the species: or it can be taken in the matter in comparison to the effect and the rite of the sacrament. If in the first way: then it is prefigured in the manna, which through the species of bread figured the matter, through the taste the effect. If in the second way: then it was figured in the oblation of Melchizedek: because there was both species there, namely wine and bread, and the effect of comforting with the rite of oblation and benediction. But if the figure is referred to the res which is the sacrament and res: this again is twofold, namely as it is in the use of the faithful only, or as it unites us to Christ the head through the effect of spiritual love. And in the first way it is signified in the eating of the paschal lamb, in the second way in the flowing from the side of Christ, where the blood was united with water which signifies the union of the people with Christ the head, as Pope Gelasius says.

Articulus 3 — What The Cause Is Why This Sacrament Is Called A Viaticum

What is the cause why this sacrament is called viaticum?

§ 80. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, A, near the end: Whence it is rightly called viaticum, etc. For above he gave it another name, namely the Eucharist.

§ 81. And the reason for these names is asked.

§ 82. And it must be said that it is called viaticum for three causes, namely, because it is a preparation of wayfarers for the way, as is said in the Letter. Whence, 1 Kings 19:7 and 8: Arise, eat, for a great way remains for thee, it was said to Elijah: and he ate, and drank, and walked in the strength of that food... unto the mount of God, Horeb.[391]

§ 83. The second reason is, because this is not a sacrament except on the way. And therefore in what

§ 1. ...in a certain Collect Gregory says: "Grant that what we now enact in the appearance of things, we may receive in truth." And Dionysius in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy: "We judge that the partaking itself of the most divine Eucharist is an image of the participation in Jesus." § 2. The third cause is, because it is a certain memorial of the way of the Lord crossing over to the Passion for us. Exod. 12:11: "For it is the phase (that is, the crossing) of the Lord." And

381. Psalms 77:25 (Vulgate).

Dionysius: "The most divine communion of one and the same bread and wine and chalice and the peaceful handing-over promulgates for them a similar divine life as eating similarly, and brings into sacred memory the most worthy supper and the principal symbol of perfection." § 3. Moreover, it is called Eucharist for three reasons. One is, because it contains him who is the ark and fount of all grace. John 1:14: "Full of grace and truth." The second is the diversity of utility which the sacrament accomplishes: and concerning this it was had above in the first question. The third is, because it is the sacrament of principal grace, that is, of love, in this that it unites us to the head, Christ, just as charity is unitive.

Divisio Textus

§ 10. Here also four other things to be considered occur, etc. This part is divided by the Master into three parts: in the first of which he treats of the substantials of the sacrament, which are to be considered before all things. In the second, he treats of the sacrament on the part of the recipient, which begins in distinction IX, there, A, And just as there are two realities of this sacrament, etc. § 11. But in the third he treats of the sacrament on the part of the celebrant, namely there in distinction XI, there, F, After these things it is asked, if what the priest enacts, etc. § 12. But the remaining part of that distinction is divided by the Master into four parts: in the first of which he treats of the institution: in the second, of the form, there, C, But the form, etc. In the third, what is the reality and the sacrament? there, D, Now what the sacrament is there, etc. But in the fourth, he touches upon what he first enumerates, namely the sacrament which is referred to the material species of this sacrament, which are the species of bread and wine, there, D, § 2: Furthermore that visible species, is a sacrament, etc.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Sacraments Of The Christians Are Prior To The Sacraments Of The Jews

Whether the sacraments of Christians are prior to the sacraments of the Jews?

§ 4. Next it is asked about this which Ambrose says, there, A, at the end: It is given to be understood that the sacraments are prior, etc. § 5. For either this is understood regarding the species, or regarding the reality: because there are not many things in a sacrament. If regarding the species, that does not seem true: because certain sacrifices were to be made even in the natural law for the remission of original sin, as Gregory says, as was had above in the beginning of this book. But if regarding the reality, then it is plainly false: because the reality of the sacraments of the new law was not until after the advent of Christ. § 6. Moreover it is asked, What sort of thing was thus special in this one, that it is called more ancient even than the sacraments of the old law, rather than the others? § 7. Solution. It must be said that it is understood regarding the species and the rite of this sacrament: because Melchisedech exhibited in figure both species, and the rite of oblation, and the use of the sacrament, before circumcision in the natural law, before the sacraments of the old law were instituted. § 8. But to the objection to the contrary, it must be said that those sacrifices were not sacraments, nor figures of the old law, but rather figures of the Passion of Christ and of the mortification of the flesh of penitents, as a certain Gloss says on Leviticus. § 9. To the other it must be said, that this sacrament has a special dignity of its reality which is Christ perfect in deity and humanity, which perfection the other sacraments do not have.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Was Instituted By Christ At A Due And Fitting Time

Whether the sacrament of the Eucharist was instituted by Christ at the due and fitting time?

§ 13. But a question falls concerning the first, namely concerning the institution. § 14. For it seems that 1. Medicine is suitable from the time of the disease: and so it ought to have been instituted from the beginning of the world. § 15. 2. Also, to the life lost through the eating of the forbidden tree there was no return except through the eating of the tree of life: therefore if he thought to drive away death, as indeed he did, he ought to have provided for everyone from the time of the first fall of Adam the food of the tree of life: but this is in the Eucharist: therefore he ought to have instituted it from then on. § 16. 3. Also, a way was always indicated to wayfarers from the beginning of the age: therefore a viaticum [provision for the journey] ought not to have been denied: but the viaticum is the body of Christ in the sacrament: therefore this sacrament ought to have existed from the beginning. § 17. BUT CONTRA it seems that 1. It ought to have been instituted after the Passion and Resurrection: because baptism is the gate of life, and the generation of spiritual life: but no one is nourished unless he first lives and is generated: therefore the institution of baptism ought to have preceded the institution of the Eucharist: but baptism was formally instituted after the Resurrection, as was held: therefore even the Eucharist much more so. § 18. 2. Also, As the reception of the Eucharist is to the reception of baptism, so the institution of the Eucharist is to the institution of baptism: but the Eucharist is not received except by the baptized: therefore neither ought the Eucharist to have been instituted unless baptism was instituted, as it seems. § 19. 3. Also, It seems that it ought to have been instituted neither from the beginning of the world nor after the Resurrection, but rather in the beginning of the children of Israel in the promised land: because this is said in the letter, that after the typical lamb he gave his body, so that by this he might signify that the legal rites had ceased, and the sacraments of the New Testament had begun: since therefore the more express figure of the Eucharist was the manna, or the oblation of Melchisedech, as was held above, at the cessation of those things this sacrament ought to have been instituted, and not after the supper of the typical lamb, as it seems. § 20. Solution. It must be said to that which is first objected, that such objections would hold optimally, if the disease and the medicine were corporeal: because in those cases both nature is supposed to be operating by necessity, and medicine assists it, and unless it assists quickly, from the corruption of principles through disease nature succumbs. But, as was said from the beginning of this fourth book, it is otherwise in spiritual disease: because in that case nature does not act by necessity, but by will: but to the will a thought is pre-required, and therefore it was necessary that the disease and the medicine be pre-signified by many signs and figures, as Master Hugh says, so that afterwards grace might cure what the will would assist: and therefore the remedy of the sacrament of the new law was not fitting to be given immediately. § 21. To the other it must be said, that it is true, that there was no return except through the eating of the tree of life: but below it will be held, that the mode of eating is twofold, namely spiritual, and that was always in the faith of believers. Whence Augustine: "Why do you prepare teeth and belly? Believe, and you have eaten." And through that there was a return as regards satisfaction, although not as regards the reception of the price. The other is sacramental, and it was not always fitting for that to be, as was held earlier. § 22. To the other it must be said, that to wayfarers, because the way is spiritual, the eating of the spiritual viaticum was sufficient. § 23. To the other it must be said, that it is one thing in this sacrament, and another in baptism: for baptism is a figure of the Passion, and burial, and resurrection: of the Passion in the subversion of sin, of burial in the hiding and threefold immersion under water, and of Resurrection in the shining brightness of the washed: and therefore it could not be formally instituted, except after all these things: but the Eucharist is a commemoration of the Passion only, and therefore it ought to have been instituted immediately before the Passion: although the use of the Eucharist is not given except to the baptized. And therefore the use and institution of these sacraments have no similarity. § 24. To the other it must be said, that it is not true, that as the reception is, etc. And the reason for this has already been assigned: and therefore that proportion is worth nothing. § 25. To the other it must be said, that although those figures may be more express regarding the material species, as was said earlier, which are signs only: yet it was not more fitting to be instituted after this than after those. Otherwise it can also be said, that those were signs, not sacraments: and therefore the species which was prefigured in them, ought not to have ceased, but rather the rite of that species ought to begin: but the legal sacraments ought to have ceased, as was held above in the question concerning legal rites. And therefore after that as if to be terminated, the Eucharist ought to be instituted, not after those things which considered through the species in a genus are not terminated, but are still frequented.

383. Wisdom 16:20.

Articulus 6 — Whether This Is The Due Form, This Is My Body

Whether this is the due form: Hoc est enim corpus meum [For this is my body]?

§ 26. Next it is asked concerning this which is said in the second part, there, C, § 1: But the form is that which he himself there uttered saying: This is my body, etc.[392] § 27. For it is objected in manifold ways concerning this form thus: § 28. 1. The form of a sacrament is that which formally makes the sacrament, just as Augustine says: Let the word accede to the element, and it becomes a sacrament: as is clear in baptism in which the form does nothing, unless the baptizing is exercised on the part of the recipient: therefore similarly here when it is said, This is my body, it will not have an effect unless it is exercised on the matter due to the sacrament: therefore this sentence, This is my body, at the supper signified nothing concerning the body of Christ in heaven; and he cannot say, This is my body, unless having demonstrated his body in heaven, which is false: therefore the form ought not to have been handed down through the verb is, but rather through a verb denoting the transition of one thing to another and a mutation. § 29.

384. John 6:57 (Vulgate).

2. Also, It is one thing to signify that something has been made, and another to command its use, and another to make it. But when it is said, This is my body, it is signified that it is the body of Christ, or has been made so. And when it is added, Take and eat of this all of you: the use of what exists is commanded. Therefore that form imports nothing concerning the confection of the sacrament. Since therefore the form of a sacrament is that which makes and confects the sacrament, this does not seem to be the form of the sacrament. § 30. 3. Also, It does not happen that vocal sounds are used except in two ways, namely materially and significatively, or as the vocal sound itself is a sign and a reality: a sign according to which I say, Man is a rational animal: a reality or materially, according to which I say, Man is of two syllables and three letters and an aspiration. Therefore with this vocal sound too, This is my body, it does not happen that it is used in several ways. But it is clear, that it is not taken materially here: therefore significatively: therefore the body of Christ already made is demonstrated, and not that it itself as a form makes it. § 31. 4. Also, A demonstration whether it be to the sense, or to the intellect, is always for signifying that which is: therefore here too, when it is said, This is my body, it is signified that it is the body of Christ, and not that it comes to be. § 32. Also, It is objected concerning the first particle which is the pronoun, this [hoc]. § 33. 1. For since it is a pronoun, it is either demonstrative, or relative: because otherwise its understanding would be void and vain: but not relative, since it does not bear relation to any antecedent suppositum in relation: therefore it is demonstrative: therefore it either demonstrates the substance of bread, or of the body of Christ under the accidents which are seen or understood. If the substance of the bread: therefore the sense is, the demonstrated bread is the body of Christ, and this is false: therefore that locution is false too. If the substance of the body of Christ: therefore nothing else is said, This is my body, than my body is my body: and this is always true, and never makes a translation [change] of anything. Therefore that form does not refer to the sacrament, but to signifying the body of Christ always without any conversion into the body of Christ. § 34. 2. Also, This is false, that the bread will be the body of Christ. Proof: Whatever proposition is true concerning the future, there will be some time in which it is presentially true: but there will never be a time in which this is true, The bread is the body of Christ: therefore this is never true, The bread will be the body of Christ. But the cause of falsity is the discoherence of the predicate with the subject which is noted to cohere in the future: therefore since a nearer coherence is noted by a verb of present tense, that one is much more false which is, The bread is the body of Christ: therefore also this one, This is the body of Christ, or my body, since nothing is demonstrated by the word this [ly hoc], except the substance of bread before transubstantiation. § 35. 3. Also, Either the demonstration is to the sense, or to the intellect. If to the sense: since therefore nothing is subjected to the eyes except the species of bread and the substance of bread, by accident it seems that the sense is, the demonstrated bread is my body, and this is false. But if the demonstration is to the intellect: this again seems unable to be: because then it would behoove, that at least the demonstrative together with the understood reality, would be of a similar species, just as when it is said, This herb grows in my garden: but nothing of a similar species is in the bread with the body of Christ: therefore there cannot be a demonstration to the intellect. § 36. 4. Also, This would never be true, This herb grows in my garden, unless the notion of herb unequivocally agreed with the demonstrated and understood reality: but nothing here unequivocally is in the bread and the body of Christ: therefore there cannot be a demonstration to the intellect. § 37. 5. Also, Dupliciter [in two ways], as the Sophists say, it happens that demonstration and negation and certain other things are signified, namely as conceived, as is signified in the pronoun this. Therefore when it is said, This is my body, it is signified as exercised: therefore it wishes to fall upon the sensible accidents, whether they are of the same in number, or in species, just as a personal demonstration is distinguished from a simple demonstration. But it is clear, that in both ways the locution is false: therefore it is simply false, This is my body, with the bread demonstrated. § 38. 6. If perhaps you say, as some have said, that the pronoun here is a part of the sentence , and its demonstration is not to be separated from the sentence, therefore what is there in the final term of the sentence is demonstrated here. CONTRA: As the whole relates to the whole, so the part to the part: therefore if the whole is made in the final term of the sentence, the part is made when the demonstrative pronoun this is uttered. § 39. 7. Also, In other sentences a pronoun does not demonstrate that which is future after the sentence in which it is posited, but rather a pre-existing reality: therefore similarly here too: therefore it seems, that the demonstration falls upon the substance of bread under such accidents. § 40. 8. Also, It is prior according to the intellect to take the demonstrated reality than to affirm or deny something of it: therefore when it is said, This is my body, the reality of consecration subjected to the sense having been demonstrated is taken according to the intellect prior to its being said of it that it is the body of Christ: therefore the demonstration of the pronoun does not seem to depend on the following part of the sentence, as that solution says. § 41. 9. If perhaps you say, as certain others have said, that the demonstration refers not to the sign, but to the signified, according to what the Gloss seems to say on that Matthew 26:26: This is my body, saying, that it is seen under the species of bread: therefore according to this already in the utterance of the pronoun the body of Christ was under the species of bread: therefore it would not be effected under the species of bread by virtue of the sentence, which is false, and contrary to the saying of Augustine, in which he says: Let the word accede to the element, and it becomes a sacrament. § 42. 10. And therefore others again say, that it demonstrates the signified in the final term of transubstantiation. But against this it is also objected, that a substantial or accidental term supposing [standing for], is restricted by a verb of present tense to copulatively supposing for present time: but in this sentence the pronoun supposes, with a verb of present tense not being amplified, nor signifying a confused time: therefore it supposes for the present only: but the present is nothing except the supposed substance which was before the utterance of the sentence, and this is the substance of bread: therefore it does not suppose except for that: and then the locution is false, as was proved earlier. § 43. 11. Also, Whence does this pronoun have it that in this locution it demonstrates the reality under the final term rather than in another, since nothing is posited in this one which is not posited in another? § 44. Further it is asked concerning this verb, Is [Est]. § 45. 1. For Is signifies a reality in the present: but the truth of the locution does not admit this, because the bread is not the body of Christ. § 46. 2. Also, In other sacraments a verb signifying the act of the minister and of God is posited, as I baptize: because

385. Augustine, Confessions VII, 10.

386. Matthew 28:20.

God baptizes interiorly, and the minister exteriorly: therefore similarly it ought to be done in this sacrament: but this verb, is, imports no act of the minister or of God: therefore it ought not to be of the form. § 47. 3. Also, The act of the verb in other sacraments in some way says the proper act of the matter: just as I baptize says the act of washing, which is the proper act of water: and I anoint says the act of anointing, which is the proper act of chrism and the oil of the sick: therefore it seems, that even in this sacrament an act ought to be imported, which is proper to the matter of bread and wine, such as I nourish, or I feed: and so he ought to say, I nourish you with my body: and not, This is my body. § 48. 4. Also, A sacrament of the new law effects from its form what it figures: therefore it seems, that a verb denoting this efficiency ought to be posited in the form: and a substantive verb does not do this: therefore it is poorly posited in the form. § 49. 5. Also, In the works of creation, where no becoming [fieri] is a medium between the creator and the work, nevertheless we use a verb of becoming: therefore it seems, that similarly we ought to use it here too. § 50. 6. Also, The bread is passing into the body of Christ: therefore it is poorly said, that it is the body of Christ: because thus the transition of the bread is not signified. § 51. 7. Also, A substantive verb noting the inherence of the predicate with the subject, supposes the subject with form and matter: just as when it is said, Man is an animal, or, Man is white: therefore it does similarly here: therefore the bread which is remaining in form and matter is the body of Christ, which is heretical and most false: therefore it seems, that the word is is poorly posited in the form. § 52. Further it is asked concerning this particle, Body. § 53. 1. For it seems, that it would more fittingly say, flesh: because when he speaks, John 6:56, of the food of this sacrament, he posits flesh, saying: My flesh is food indeed, etc.[393] § 54. 2. Also, No body as organized is apt for eating, nor are all its parts: but flesh alone is apt, or more apt than all other similar and dissimilar members: therefore it seems, that he ought to posit flesh and not body. § 55. 3. Also, Bread is a body similar in the whole and in the parts, which is called homogeneous: because any part of bread is bread, and any part of wine is wine: therefore it seems, that it is a sign of homogeneous food: therefore of flesh, and not of the whole organic body: therefore flesh ought to have been posited, not body. § 56. 4. Also, Wine by the force of the sacrament is not converted except into blood, which is homogeneous: therefore by the same reason bread is not converted by the force of the sacrament except into flesh, which is a homogeneous part. § 57. Further it is asked, Why does he say, My [Meum]? § 58. For it seems more fitting to have said, the body of Christ because § 59. 1. If on account of the reverence of the name God also willed that for a time baptism should be done in the name of Christ: therefore also on account of the greater dignity of this sacrament that name ought to have been posited here. § 60. 2. Also, The form is of greater efficacy in this sacrament than in the others: because here an inanimate and non-glorious body is converted into an animate and glorious body united to the divinity: therefore here the greater effect ought to be attributed to the most worthy name, namely Jesus Christ: therefore he ought to have said, This is the body of Jesus Christ, as it seems. § 61. Further it is asked concerning those things which are added in the Gospel, namely concerning this, Take, and eat, whether it is of the form? § 62. It seems, that it is: because 1. Those things refer to the use of the sacrament: but this which he says, This is my body, refers only to the insinuation of transubstantiation: therefore it seems, that equally or more so, take and eat, are of the substance of the form: just as this which is said, This is my body. § 63. 2. Also, An act noting the exercise and use of baptizing is of the form in baptism, when it is said, I baptize thee, etc.: therefore similarly those words which note the use of this sacrament, ought to be of the form, as it seems. § 64. Further it is asked concerning the mutation, addition, and diminution, and corruption: just as in the question concerning the form of baptism, and of confirmation. § 65. Solution. It must be said, that this is the form, This is my body, in my judgment, and no more. § 66. But to the solution of those things which were objected, it must be noted, that that sentence has to be considered in a triple force: for it has one force, according as it is a vocal sound significative of a reality: and from this mode it makes a sign of some demonstrated reality. Also, it has a force, according as it is the form of the sacrament from divine institution: and according to this it is conversive of bread into the body of Christ, and makes a transition or the transubstantiation of the bread. It has a third force, according as the uncreated Word operates in it, in whose person it is uttered by the priest: because said by the priest as if recitatively, it refers to the uncreated Word, according as he operates in the vocal sound of this sentence. And in this mode the more ancient Theologians said, that the vocal sound has to be referred to the reality and the reality operates indivisibly and with indivisible force together with the uncreated Word conjoined to it: and one part is not to be separated from a part, as in another construction: and although it has the capacity to signify insofar as it is a created vocal sound, yet it does not have sacramental operation insofar as it is of this sort, but insofar as the signified uncreated Word indivisibly operates in it, to which this sentence has to be reduced whence it is, namely the body of Christ: although it is expressed by several vocal sounds according to the mode of suppositum and appositum and composition. § 67. To the first therefore it must be said, that that triple use of the form, according as these words are taken with signification, institution, and the operation of the uncreated Word, is not except in the sacrament: although that argumentation proceeds as if the use of this sentence has nothing from the institution and operation of the uncreated Word: and this is not true. § 68. To the other it must be said, that even that objection supposes a falsehood, namely that the sentence is nothing but insinuative of a fact, and not making a transition from the institution and operation of the uncreated Word, in whose person those words are uttered. But why a verb noting transition or mutation is not posited in that sentence, we will determine below, as we will be able. § 69. To the other it must be said, that this is true of vocal sounds instituted solely for the use of signifying, but not of vocal sounds which are the forms of sacraments, in which institution makes the vocal sounds to be operative of invisible grace. § 70. To the other it must be said in the same way, that the pronoun has three forces, according as the whole sentence does: and those argumentations which are made from the common use of speaking, to sentences which are the forms of sacraments, have no force. § 71. To that which is objected concerning the first part of the sentence, namely concerning the word This [Hoc], which is a demonstrative pronoun, without prejudice I will recite the three opinions of the Masters first, and afterwards I will touch upon what seems better to me. § 72. The first opinion is of those who say, that the word this makes a demonstration to the sense, and that it falls upon the

387. 1 Corinthians 11:24.

388. 1 Corinthians 11:26.

substance of bread, not simply, but insofar as it is substanciated into the body of Christ: and these say, that it demonstrates the content of the bread, insofar as it is the term of transubstantiation. And if it is objected, that the bread transubstantiated into the body of Christ, is not bread, but the body of Christ: They say, that this is true: but it is not simply the body of Christ, but insofar as it is the end of sacramental conversion. But how they solve those arguments, will be open later: because there is one solution of all of them according to all these opinions. § 73. Others say, that there is a demonstration to the intellect there, and the demonstration falls upon the accidents of the species of bread and wine insofar as they are sacramental species, and not insofar as they are simply species: and therefore the sense is, The signified sacramentally in the species of bread and wine is the body of Christ. And these say, that such a demonstration simply does not demand identity in species between the demonstrated and understood reality, but only the agreement which is between a sign and what is sacramentally signified. And thus they solve the arguments objected to the contrary. § 74. But against both of these solutions and opinions, it seems to be objected. Against the FIRST indeed: because it is impossible in itself, or as a term, for that to be demonstrated which is not before the demonstration: but the body of Christ neither in itself, nor on the altar, nor as the term of conversion, is before the demonstration: therefore it can be demonstrated in neither mode. But against the SECOND it seems to be objected: because that is demonstrated sacramentally which is in act under the sacrament, with the demonstration falling upon the sacramental species: but the body of Christ is not contained under those species, with the demonstration falling upon those species: therefore it does not happen that it is demonstrated sacramentally. § 75. And therefore a third way seems to me to be more probable, that it be said, that the word this is demonstrative and simultaneously operative or conversive: and it has this insofar as it is a part of the sacramental form, from institution, and together with the uncreated Word: and therefore it does not have it dividedly, but rather the vocal sounds are referred to the realities signified in those vocal sounds, and to the uncreated Word simply: and thus in the virtue of one indivisible operating, that sentence which is the form of the sacrament operates, and operating demonstrates, and demonstrating operates: just as is said of the creation and infusion of the soul. § 76. To that therefore which is first objected, it must be said that it demonstrates the body of Christ under the accidents, and by making it to be there it demonstrates it: and therefore more is said, This is my body, than my body is my body: because the sense is, This is my body, that is, the contained under the species is my body, and by virtue of this sentence it has been made there from the substance of bread. § 77. To the other it must be said, that it is true that this is false, that the bread is the body of Christ: and it is not similar unless we were to say, that this verb, is, would denote nothing but the inherence of composition with the consignified present time. But we say, that from institution and conjunction to the uncreated Word, it is conversive just as the whole sentence is: and therefore it does not denote inherence here, but conversion and the existence of the body of Christ under the species of that which is converted into it. § 78. To the other it must be said, that whether a demonstration to the sense is said, or to the intellect, it is always said diminutively: but if it is said to be to the intellect with a conversive force demonstrating to the intellect, then it will be more probable: and yet the inconvenience which the objection concludes does not follow. There are nonetheless those who say the demonstration is to the sense, in the mode in which the sensible reality of the sacrament is said under the sacramental species. § 79. To the other it must be said, that when it is said, This herb grows in my garden, it is nothing but a part of that demonstration: because that one is only ostensive, but this one factive first, and consequently ostensive. § 80. To the other it must be said, that the demonstration is signified here as exercised: but nevertheless this is not its whole virtue, nor is it the first: but rather that which it has insofar as it is the form of the sacrament: and this is operative of that which is demonstrated, and afterwards demonstrates. Whence just as although the soul by being infused is created, and by being created is infused, nevertheless creation according to the intellect precedes infusion: so here although the demonstration of the pronoun simultaneously makes it to be demonstrated and demonstrates, nevertheless the operative virtue according to the intellect precedes the demonstration in the form of the sacrament: and therefore such argumentations have no force. § 81. To the other it must be said, that it is true, that the sentence is not to be divided: and this is on account of the operative virtue which it does not have from the construction or order or conjunction of parts, but rather from divine institution, according as the vocal sound refers to the sense, and in the sense of the word the uncreated Word operates. And therefore the objection made to the contrary has no force: because this is true of a sentence which is only significative: because the construction of that depends on the mode of signifying and the signification of the parts. § 82. To the other it must be said, that it contains this for this reason, because other sentences do not operate their signified, but insinuate only: and therefore nothing is similar. § 83. To the other it must be said, that this is true of a demonstration which is only ostensive of a reality, and not factive by the virtue of the operation in which it itself is: but this demonstration with the virtue of the other words makes that which is demonstrated under the accidents, and by demonstrating makes it.

389. Matthew 6:11-12.

§ 1. To the next, it must be said that the Gloss is well to be assented to, provided it is understood, namely that what is seen under those species is made there by the power of the prayer along with the demonstration. And it is clear from the foregoing that the objection raised against this is invalid, unless we were to grant that demonstration is merely significative of the thing demonstrated, and not operative.

§ 2. To the next, it must be said that it is true that the word hoc ("this") stands as subject to a present-tense verb, and it stands for that which is in act: but by demonstrating hoc it is effected there, and by effecting it is demonstrated there. And therefore it does not stand for the substance of the bread, but rather for the body of Christ. And it is meaningless to say that the word hoc makes up a part there, as was said before: because the whole expression has this [power] indivisibly referred to the signified thing, and by institution. And therefore it is irrelevant to speak of a final term or an initial term: because the whole operates toward that indivisible effect as one indivisible thing.

390. John 1:16.

§ 3. To the next, it must be said that in this relation the pronoun has what it does not have in another, on account of the fact that it is the form of the sacrament, operative through divine institution.

§ 4. To what is further asked, it must be said that just as it was said of the demonstrative pronoun, that it is not only demonstrative but also operative, so too must it be said of the verb est ("is"), that it does not only denote coherence, but is operative and conversive, as has been said. And there is one and simple operating power in all those words, insofar as they are referred to the unity of the institution, and of the uncreated Word operating in these words. And therefore, just as here is admitted that into which the bread is converted into the body of Christ, so is it admitted here: This is the body of Christ, since the conversion and the signification of the present body of Christ happen simultaneously, and by the power of the same prayer.

§ 5. To the next, it must be said that it is otherwise in this and in the other sacraments: because in the others the minister operates something at least in the matter, just as the minister performs the dipping that takes place in water; but here, neither upon the exterior matter which is the bread and wine, nor interiorly in the effect of grace, can there be any work other than divine. And therefore the act of the minister could not be signified in the form here.

§ 6. To the next, it must be said that in the other sacraments the sacrament is consecrated and confected when it is received, as baptism when baptism is received, and confirmation when someone receives confirmation, and so of the others. In this sacrament, however, it is not so: but the conversion is before the reception of the sacrament. And a verb denoting the congruent act of the matter could not be placed [in the form], because that [act] belongs to the use of the sacrament after the confection: and the Lord touched upon this when He said, Take and eat, etc.

§ 7. To the next, it must be said that a verb denoting motion or mutation is not suitable in this sacrament, because every motion and mutation supposes a common matter for both terms of the motion and mutation upon which it occurs. But here there is no such thing: because bread is not the matter out of which the body of Christ is made, such that some new matter is converted into the body of Christ, which previously was not under the form of the body of Christ (because this could not be without an augmentation); but here there takes place a transubstantiation of the entire composite of bread, from form and matter, into the pre-existing substance of the body of Christ, without any intermediary mutation, and without a temporal interval. And therefore the verb est is more competently placed there with the power of transubstantiating, than any other verb denoting motion or mutation.

§ 8. To the next, it must be said that in the works of creation there is at least a substance made anew, which previously was not, although it is not properly motion or mutation. But here no substance perishes, nor does anything new come to the body of Christ, but rather the transubstantiation is of this sort by the power of the words. And therefore words signifying motion cannot properly be placed here in the form.

391. 1 Kings 19:7-8 (Vulgate: 3 Kings 19:7-8).

§ 9. To the next, it must be said that this objection would proceed if the verb were only denoting the inherence of the predicate with the subject; but it has already been said often that it itself along with hoc, and conceptually before hoc, is conversive, in such a way that the transubstantiation of the whole bread into the whole body of Christ can be called a conversion. And therefore the objection is invalid.

§ 10. To what is further asked about the third particle, which is corpus ("body"), it must be said that a sacrament of maximum perfection was not fitting to be of a part: and therefore the form could not be of the flesh, but of the whole body. And what the Lord says in the Gospel of John, [394] is said by synecdoche, and is understood of the whole. However, my flesh is food indeed is posited there, because by an argument from the lesser it is shown concerning the whole: for if the flesh, which is the more defectible part, gives life, how much more the spirit and the whole Christ.

§ 11. To the next, it must be said that that objection proceeds sophistically. For what it proposes is true of food that is converted into us, not of that into which we are converted. But concerning this food it is true that it converts us into itself, as was said above. And therefore corpus is better placed there in the dissimilitude of parts than caro ("flesh"); because it does not unite us to itself in the use in the ratio of a single grace, but in one it works the use of the spiritual eye, in another the use of the spiritual foot, and so on for the others.

§ 12. To the next, it must be said that although bread is a homogeneous body, nevertheless it is not gathered from one grain, but from diverse grains; and by this similitude it is taken in the sacrament, as is said in the text of the Sentences. And in this way it establishes a congruence with a body dissimilar in its parts, rather than a similar body.

§ 13. To the next, it must be said that the fact that the wine is sacramentally converted only into blood is not because of the homogeneity of the matter, but because of the ratio of its use: because it is given as a spiritual drink and for the effect of redemption. Yet, insofar as it is given to diverse faithful, the wine is gathered from diverse grains of the grape. But concerning the body it is not so: because it is given in the figure of the mystical body of Christ united to Christ the Head: and this body has a diversity of use in the graces of its members: and to this operation a dissimilar body is more fitting than a similar one.

§ 14. To the next, it must be said, regarding what is further asked about the fourth particle, which is meum ("my"), that meum is better placed there than Christi ("of Christ"): because those words are recited by the priest as if in the person of Christ. If, however, Christi were placed there, then it would seem to be ordered to another person, and thus another person would be signified to operate in these words. And it has already been shown that this is not fitting, because the uncreated Word fittingly operates in the created word, as has been established.

§ 15. To the next, it must be said that it is otherwise in baptism. For there the minister operates and invokes God; and that invocation was reduced to the name of Christ for a certain reason. But in this sacrament nothing operates except the Word, the Son, in the created word which He instituted for this purpose. And therefore that word ought to be pronounced as if of 392. Peter Lombard.

His own proper person, and the speech should not be made of Him as of another—which would happen if Christi were placed there, on account of the fact that the noun would signify a person other than the one speaking, or other than the one in whose person the priest pronounces.

§ 16. To what is further asked, it must be said that take and eat pertains to the use of the sacrament, and not to the confection. And therefore I think that it is not of the form. However, what is said, This is my body, is not only insinuative, but operative of the sacrament, as has been said.

§ 17. To the next, it must be said that the act which the verb baptize signifies does not only mean the exercise, but also the coming to be of baptism. Here, however, it is not so, because the confection of this sacrament is prior to perception, as has been said.

§ 18. To the next, which is asked last, let the answer be as in the preceding.

§ 19. From this the falsity of a certain opinion is clear, and the solution to a certain question of the ancients, who on account of this did not know how to distinguish between the use and the confection of the sacrament. For they said that God Himself confected His body with other secret words, and afterwards gave the power of confecting through these words, This is my body. For this is not reasonable; but rather that even then those words were not only significative of the Lord's body, but operative.

§ 20. If, however, it is asked concerning the word enim ("for"), which is said in the Roman books and is found in the ancient books of the Fathers, whether it is of the form?

§ 21. It must be said that it is safe to add it; nevertheless it is not found in the Gospel, and it touches more upon the cause of the use which is imported in the verb of taking and eating, than it is of the substance of the form.

Articulus 7 — Inquiry Is Made Concerning The Form That Is Said Over The Wine, And Concerning The Individual Words Set In It

§ 22. Article 7 It is asked concerning the form that is said over the wine, and concerning each word posited in it.

§ 23. ARTICLE VII. It is asked concerning the form that is said over the wine, and concerning each word posited in it.

§ 24. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, G, § 1, near the end: Take and drink from this, all of you, etc.

§ 25. For it is asked concerning the form which is said over the wine.

§ 26. And two things are asked, namely concerning the words posited in it, and concerning its comparison to the form which is said over the bread.

§ 27. 1. For it seems that the form which the Church frequents is not the form, namely this: For this is the chalice of my blood, of the new and eternal testament: the mystery of faith: which will be poured out for you and for many unto the remission of sins. For the Church posits all of this; and it is established that it is found in none of the Evangelists. Therefore, since a sacrament does not have a form unless instituted by God, it seems this is not of the form. This is clear to one running through the individual Gospels. In Matthew, [395] it is held thus: Drink of it, all of you. For this is my blood of the New Testament, which will be poured out for many unto the remission of sins. In Mark, [396] thus: And having taken the chalice, giving thanks he gave it to them, and they all drank from it. And he said to them: This is my blood of the New Testament, which will be poured out for many. In Luke, [397] thus: This chalice is the New Testament in my blood, which will be poured out for you. It is clear, therefore, that it is in none of the Evangelists.

393. John 6:56.

§ 28. 2. Moreover, it seems that it was presumption to add what the Lord did not add: therefore it seems that they even sin in so great a sacrament by holding this form.

§ 29. 3. Also, it seems that what is added has no power of transubstantiating. For words do not have this power except insofar as they belong to the uncreated Word establishing them, as will be held below in the text of Ambrose, that the word of Christ changes the creature. Therefore it seems that those things which man added are not of the form, and they are not found instituted by God.

§ 30. 4. Also, Jerome says: "Let me not be believed if I say anything which I cannot prove through the New or the Old Testament." But that in the form there should be mystery of faith and of the eternal testament can be proved neither by the New nor by the Old Testament: therefore it is not to be believed to be of the form, especially of so great a sacrament, which is entirely above man.

§ 31. Further, it seems that it is not fittingly placed there, Chalice of blood.

§ 32. 1. For those things which are of the form or the matter are of the essence of the sacrament: but the chalice, a vessel, is neither the form nor the matter of the sacrament; therefore it is not of the essence of the sacrament; therefore it ought not to be placed in the form.

§ 33. 2. Also, if you say that the chalice is posited in the form by transumption [metaphor]: from this a manifold inconvenience seems to follow.

§ 34. First, indeed, because a transumed concept presupposes for itself another upon which it is founded, which is proper: because one must first consider the properties of the thing through which the transumption is made, before the concept is transferred to another. Therefore a simple person not knowing how to transfer something or make metaphors can relate to it dangerously. Since therefore the danger of error ought especially to be avoided in this sacrament, on account of the fact that reason can least assist itself in it, it seems that nothing ought to be placed metaphorically in it.

§ 35. Second: because every transumed concept, from the fact that it presupposes another, consists in a certain multiplicity of concepts: but a multiplicity of concepts is a cause of mental wandering. Since therefore in this sacrament, which man scarcely attains by faith with his whole effort, it is necessary for man to recollect himself entirely within himself, and not to wander, it seems that nothing in it ought to be said by metaphor.

§ 36. Third, it seems [to follow], because metaphor is made from one thing to another: therefore the metaphor is made either to the body or to the blood. If to the body: then by the power of those words the body is effected there. And no one says this: because although the body is in the chalice, nevertheless it is not there by the power of the sacrament, but by the power of the connection which it has with the blood. If, however, the metaphor is made to the blood: then the metaphor cannot be made, except from that property by which it is drunk from the chalice. And then the sense will be: The chalice of blood, etc., that is, the drink of blood, etc. Therefore He ought similarly to have said of the body: This is the food of my body. And He did not say this. Therefore the use of this mode of metaphor does not seem [to apply] here.

§ 37. 3. Moreover, if it is placed for the contained, as some have said, then there should not be in the construction the mode of diversity from transumption which oblique cases denote; because between the contained and the blood there is no diversity, as it seems.

§ 38. Further it is asked concerning what it says, Of my blood.

§ 39. 1. For since the principal thing which the form effects is the blood, it seems it ought to be placed there in the direct case [nominative], and not in the oblique case.

§ 40. 2. This also seems from the form of the body: because there it is said, For this is my body. Therefore it should also be said, For this is my blood.

§ 41. 3. Also, where the Master in the text says this is done, and the two Evangelists, namely Matthew and Mark [say so]: therefore it seems that it ought to be conveyed in the direct case.

§ 42. 4. Also, since oblique cases are transitive and denote diversity, there seems to be a diversity between the reality of the sacrament and the blood. But since there is no diversity there, it seems that blood is wrongly placed in the oblique case.

§ 43. Further it is asked concerning what it says, Of the new and eternal Testament.

§ 44. 1. For new is, as a certain Philosopher says, what is near in respect to its beginning. But the reality of this sacrament is eternal, because it is the Son of God; therefore it is not new.

§ 45. 2. Moreover, it is new either as to the reality, or as to the rite. If as to the reality: this is false, because according to this it would not be eternal. If as to the rite: then it is false what Ambrose said above, that our sacraments are prior to the sacraments of the Jews; and this is said for the sake of this sacrament, whose rite preceded in Melchizedek.

§ 46. 3. Also, new and eternal are opposites: because new is what is near in respect to its beginning, and eternal is what lacks a beginning. Therefore, when it is said, Of the new and eternal Testament, opposites seem to be posited concerning the same thing.

395. Matt 26:27-28

§ 47. 4. Also, a testament does not seem to be of blood, but rather of commandments: whence also the tablets containing the commandments are called the tablets of the testament. Therefore it seems that it ought not to have been said, Of the new and eternal testament.

§ 48. Further it is asked concerning what it says there, The mystery of faith.

§ 49. 1. For the mystery of faith is in all sacraments, as is clear from the definition of a sacrament which was posited in a gloss above from the words of Augustine at the beginning of the book, that a sacrament is when under a visible species divine power works salvation more secretly; but mystery means the same as secret: therefore in any sacrament there is a mystery of faith, and not only in this one: therefore it ought not to be specially placed in this one.

§ 50. 2. Also, this sacrament is specially said to be the sacrament of charity. Whence Chrysostom says that to give His flesh to eat was an indication of intimate love. But baptism is especially called the sacrament of faith: therefore it seems to be more fitting for the latter that it be the sacrament of faith, and for the former that it be the sacrament of charity or mystery: therefore mystery of faith is wrongly placed in the form.

§ 51. Further it is asked concerning what it says, Which will be poured out for you and for many.

§ 52. For pouring out is contrary to drinking, as it seems; therefore it ought not to be placed in the sacrament of the chalice which we drink alongside the body in the communication of the blood.

§ 53. Also it is asked: Why does it indistinctly posit, It will be poured out for you and for many?

§ 54. 1. For there is one ratio of pouring out for all: therefore there is no distinction regarding the Apostles and others with respect to the cause of the pouring out.

§ 55. 2. Also, the blood availed all for redemption as to sufficiency: therefore it ought not to be said, For many, but for all.

§ 56. 3. Also, the power of each thing is determined to its maximum. Since therefore the power of the shed blood of Christ is maximal, it ought to have been determined to the maximum effect: therefore it seemed better to be said, for all, rather than for many.

§ 57. 4. Moreover, it seems that this part is not of the form: because it does not speak as it were of the essential of the sacrament, but rather of the effect of the sacrament in us: therefore it seems that it ought not to be placed in the form.

§ 58. Further it is asked concerning what it says, Unto the remission of sins.

§ 59. 1. For this states the end of the entire Passion and Redemption on the part of liberation from evil: therefore it ought not more to be placed in the form of the blood than in the form of the body.

§ 60. 2. Moreover, in Luke, [398] it is appended to the form of the body: which is given for you: and it is not said to be of the form which is said over the bread. Therefore, even although there is added here, Which will be poured out for you and for many unto the remission of sins, nevertheless it ought not to be said to be of the essence of the form.

§ 61. Solution. It must be said to the first, that although that form which the Church holds is not found in one Gospel and in one place, nevertheless by parts it is found for the most part. And moreover it is found handed down by the Apostles who received it from the Lord. For what is said, This is the chalice of my blood, is taken from Luke. And similarly what is said, Of the new testament, is taken from three, namely Matthew, Mark, and Luke. But what is added, eternal, is held from the tradition of the Lord; and similarly that, The mystery of faith. For the Apostle says, 1 Corinthians: [399] For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you. But that the Church received it handed down from the Apostles, Innocent III says thus: "The Roman Church has always preserved this in integral faith, which it received from the Apostles themselves who presentialy instituted it with sacred doctrines and taught the rule of the Ecclesiastical rite. For from the Apostles Peter and Paul themselves, whom it had both as living Teachers and as deceased guardians, it received this rite of sacrifice, which it has hitherto preserved in inviolable cult." And this is what is commonly said by the Masters, that although this form is not written all at once, nevertheless it is understood to be handed down by God to the Apostles.

§ 62. And through this the solution to the first three is clear.

§ 63. To what is objected concerning Jerome, it must be said that he did not intend that all true things are written word-for-word in the New or Old Testament. But as Augustine says, "Every truth accords with Sacred Scripture which does not contradict Sacred Scripture." Now it is sufficiently consonant with Sacred Scripture that the Church should frequent this, which Christ handed down. And it is drawn from that word, 1 Corinthians: [400] For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you; where he is speaking of the rite of this sacrament. And from that: Be imitators of me, as I also am of Christ.

§ 64. To the next thing which is further asked, it must be said that chalice is placed there transumptively [metaphorically], and is transferred to the passion. As He said to the two brothers, sons of Zebedee: Can you drink the chalice that I am to drink? And the chalice of blood means as much as the sacrament of the passion of blood, which is frequented in the use of the faithful through the participation of the chalice.

§ 65. But to what is objected against this, it must be said that in two ways are some things of the essence. Namely, as entering into the constitution of the thing, just as the body and blood of Christ are of the essence of the reality which is the sacrament in the Eucharist; but certain things are essentially joined to them, such that without these the reality cannot be. And in this way the chalice is of the essence on our part: because it is done in memory of the passion when this sacrament is consumed. [As the Apostle says:] [401] As often as you eat this bread and drink the chalice, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes. And therefore the chalice in this sense is adjoined to the form of the sacrament, and is of the form.

§ 66. To the next, it must be said that the principal solicitude of devotion and faith ought to be in this sacrament. And therefore mention of the chalice is made, so that the passion may be recalled to memory. And therefore if anyone errs in the primary signified thing, he is not excused, because his solicitude ought to induce consideration. And therefore things necessary to the sacrament were not to be omitted on account of someone's negligence.

§ 67. To the next, it must be said that although a multiplicity of concepts is the cause of a certain discursive movement of reason from one thing to another, nevertheless the solicitude and devotion which is enjoined upon those celebrating contains it. And therefore there is no danger there, except with respect to the culpably negligent; but on account of this nothing necessary to the sacrament ought to have been omitted.

§ 68. To the next, it must be said that it has already been said to what chalice is transferred there—to the passion: because the Lord was accustomed to call His passion a chalice, [as in Matthew:] [402] My Father, if this chalice cannot pass unless I drink it, your will be done. And the passion is especially what is recollected in the sacrament, as was said before.

§ 69. But to what is asked, why with the body there is not placed in the canon a commemoration of the passion, as with the blood, since in certain Evangelists it is appended even to the body: This is my body, which is given for you; yet it is not said, This is the chalice of my body?

§ 70. It must be said that in the truth of the matter the drink of the chalice responds more to the passion according to the pouring out of blood, than according to the wounding of the body. And this is also clear from the usage of speaking in the Prophets. Whence, in Isaiah, [403] where He consoles the Church after the torments of the martyrs, He says: Behold, I have taken out of your hand the chalice of stupor, the dregs of the chalice of my indignation; you shall not drink it anymore. And I will put it into the hand of those who have humiliated you. And in many other places. And this is done for this reason, because the chalice inebriates through drink, and so does the passion through anguish. And therefore the chalice is more appropriately appended to the drinkable thing, namely the blood, than to the eatable thing, which is the body.

§ 71. To the next, it must be said that the chalice is metaphorically referred to the passion of blood, and the blood referred to the passion has some diversity of ratio relative to the blood ministered as drink in the sacrament: and that [diversity] is imported by the oblique case.

§ 72. To what is further asked concerning the blood, it must be said that the reason why it is placed in the oblique case has been stated. For although the blood is effected by the power of the sacrament and not the chalice, nevertheless in order that the blood could be effected in the sacrament, it had to be poured out first in the passion. And therefore in the ratio of the first agent—not to the blood in the sacrament, but to the celebration of the sacrament in itself—it is better said the chalice of blood than the blood of the chalice.

§ 73. To the next, what is objected concerning the Master in the text, it must be said that the Master does not expressly determine the form in several sacraments, just as he does not do so in confirmation, and in penance, and in extreme unction, and in order. And thus he does not do so here: because the intention of the Master is to hand down a notice of those things in which the sacrament consists materially. And therefore he says that the form is about the blood, before he determines the form: because the Master supposes the form to be known from the frequentation of the Church.

§ 74. But to what is objected against this by the Evangelist, it must be said that the Evangelists did not intend to hand down the form of the sacrament by writing the Gospel, but to hand down a simple notice of history as to the true things said there and the deeds done. And therefore that proof is not efficacious.

§ 75. To the next, it must be said that the transitivity of the oblique case here does not import a diversity between the blood and the reality of the sacrament, but rather a diverse ratio of the blood as it is referred to the passion which conferred the possibility of the celebration of the sacrament, and of the blood as it is ministered in the sacrament for the use of the faithful, as was said before. And because mention of both had to be made in the form, it was better to posit the oblique case rather than the direct case [nominative]. In the body, however, the ratio is not similar, as has been said.

§ 76. To what is further asked concerning what is said, Of the new and eternal Testament, it must be said that it is called new with respect to the use of the sacramental reality under such species.

§ 77. But to what is objected concerning the ratio of that which is new, it must be said that the Son of God is eternal. But the Son of God is not in the chalice by the power of the sacrament, but by the connection of the body and the soul with the deity and the blood. And therefore there still remains something by which the use of the blood is new under the sacrament.

§ 78. To the next, it must be said that it is already clear to what the newness refers. The rite, however, preceded only in the species without the reality in the oblation of Melchizedek: and with respect to this Ambrose says that our sacraments are older than those of the Jews.

§ 79. To the next, it must be said that nothing prohibits opposites from being concerning the same thing or posited, provided they are not posited concerning the same thing in the same respect. For what is called new, he says with respect to the use of the reality under the sacrament; what is called eternal, he says with respect to the person, as some say; or with respect to the predestination of so great a grace which God owed the Church from eternity: and this is more probable. Or with respect to both: and then no objection remains.

§ 80. To what is further asked, why is mystery of faith posited? It must be said that although in all sacraments there is something of faith, nevertheless in this one, through the mode of conversion and reception, and the accidents which remain without any subject, it is entirely of faith: because reason can do nothing in it. Now the fact that baptism is of faith is not because faith is more active there and reason less, but because it confers the first state of fidelity. Whence just as faith is in a certain manner the door of the virtues, so baptism is the door of the sacraments. But this sacrament is called the mystery of faith from one thing, and the sacrament of charity from another: it is called the mystery of faith because it is entirely of faith, as has been said; but of charity on account of the similitude of its effect, and as the greatest sign of the charity by which He gave Himself to us. I say, moreover, the similitude of effect: because just as charity unites the members, so that sacrament converts and unites the members to the Head.

§ 81. And through this the solution to all that was asked concerning this part is clear.

§ 82. To what is further asked concerning what is said, Which for you and for many, etc. It must be said that although there is one ratio of pouring out and reception in all, nevertheless the pouring out in which the blood was separated from the body operated toward the celebration of the sacrament. For the sacrament effects nothing but the blood. But that it thus separated could effect what it does not [effect] unseparated, this the pouring out does, and therefore mention of the pouring out had to be in the form of the blood.

§ 83. To the next, it must be said that the priest in that place is commemorated as offering. And therefore he represents a dual person, namely of Christ offering, and with respect to this he does not need an oblation for himself; and he represents his own proper person, and thus he needs to offer for his own and the people's indigence: because, as the Apostle says, he himself is encompassed with infirmity. And therefore, so that that indigence might be noted, the Lord willed the indigence of the Apostles to be expressed in the form, who were the first priests and handed down the rite of the sacrament to others.

§ 84. To the next, it must be said that although it avails for all sufficiently, it does not do so efficiently. And therefore He did not say, for all, but for many.

§ 85. To the next, it must be said that this sacrament does not work salvation without another cooperating thing: and this is faith and devotion which joins the effect to us. And because the cooperating thing fails in some, therefore it could not be determined to all: but according to its maximum effect it is poured out for many.

§ 86. To the next, it must be said that some of the ancients said on account of that objection that it was not of the essence of the form, but nevertheless he who omitted it would sin. But some others of the moderns probably seem to feel that it is of the form as an end: and a ratio conjoined to the form makes the perfection of the thing.

§ 87. To what is further and finally asked, it must be said that in my judgment that too is of the form: Unto the remission of sins. And this utility of the blood is spiritually commemorated in the Psalm, [404] where it is said: What profit is there in my blood, while I go down to corruption? And this is so because just as the soul seems to be the price of redemption offered to the Father, so the whole passion consists in the violent extortion of blood. But the passion made satisfaction for us, and therefore the passion is especially signified according to nature in the shedding of blood, in which is the life of the body. And therefore the remission of sins is more referred back [to it]...

400. 1 Cor 11:23

§ 1. ... to the blood, than to the passion of the body. § 2. To the last point, the solution is clear through the same.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Form That Is Said Over The Bread Awaits The Form That Is Said Over The Wine

§ 4. Secondly, it is asked concerning the operation of the form of the blood, with respect to the form which is said over the bread: and this on account of the ancients who said that these forms await each other in operating. § 5. But it is objected thus: § 6. 1. This sacrament is a sacrament of highest and simple truth: therefore nothing ought to be shown in the sacrament that is not in some way in the reality of the sacrament: but when it is said over the bread, "This is my body," there is shown to be a body there without blood, because by the power of the sacrament there is nothing there except the body: since therefore a body is not without blood, a falsehood is shown there in the sacrament of truth, unless the efficacy of the words of the body awaits the efficacy of the words of the blood: therefore these two forms await each other in operating. § 7. 2. Also, Just as reality is related to reality in the sacrament, so form ought to be related to form: but the reality of the body is simultaneous with the reality of the blood, and conversely: therefore the form of the body operates simultaneously with the form of the blood, and conversely: therefore they await each other in operating: because it is clear that they are not simultaneous in their utterance. § 8. 3. Also, If the form of the body operates without the form of the blood: either it operates the body without the blood, or with the blood. If without the blood: then it operates an imperfect reality, and it operates the body of Christ as it is not: because it is clear that it is with blood. But if it operates the body of Christ with blood: then by the power of the sacrament the blood is there: therefore the form subsequently said over the blood is superfluous: which is again unfitting: because if nature does not abound in superfluous things nor fall short in necessary things, much less does grace do this. § 9. 4. Also, Below in this same distinction it will be shown that this sacrament is one: but of one thing there is a single being: therefore also a single sacramental form; because form gives being: therefore a single form operates over the bread and over the chalice: but the act of one form is undivided: therefore it does not operate divisively over the bread and over the chalice: therefore simultaneously: therefore the work of one does not precede the work of the other. § 10. On the contrary: § 11. 1. When it is said, "This is my body": either the body is there made and demonstrated by the power of the statement, as was said above, or not. If not: then the expression is false: for it is not said, "This will be my body," but "This is." If so: then the efficacy of this statement does not await another statement in effecting. § 12. 2. Also, According to the whole usage and utility of the Church, the body is elevated after these words are said, "This is my body," and then it is adored by the faithful. Either therefore it is there, or not. If so, I have my proposition: because the form over the chalice has not yet been said. If not: then the ministers of the Church cause to be adored with latria that which is not God, and thus compel the people to commit idolatry, which is absurd to say of the Church. § 13. 3. Also, What would be the cause of this dependence, that one should depend on the other? For it is not the division of Christ, because Christ is always perfect: nor the dependence of the thing

signified, because the signification of one statement is absolute, just as is that of the other: nor institution, because just as Christ divisively gave his body and his blood to the Apostles, so he divisively instituted it: therefore there can be no cause for dependence: therefore it is clear that one does not await the other. § 15. Solution. It must be said that these statements fulfill their effects divisively [i.e., separately], and one does not await the other. § 16. To the first, therefore, it must be said that, as was said above, this statement, "This is my body," is in a triple power: for it has one from institution, and another according as it is uttered in the person of the eternal Word who operates in it, and it has a third according as there is in it the truth of the sign: and as to the first two it is true that it does not extend itself in operating except over the body, and not over the blood. But the third extends itself to signifying the perfect body, contained not by the power of the sacrament, but under the sacrament: and therefore it shows the truth and the body just as it is. § 17. To the other it must be said, that this is false, that just as reality is related to reality, so form is to form: for although the form in the sacrament is effective of the reality, it is not necessary however for form to depend upon form. And so some say. Better yet, the proposition premised in the argument can be conceded: and it can be said that it is one thing for blood to be simply, and another for blood to be by the power of the sacrament under the sacrament. But in this way it can be without the body which is by the power of the sacrament being under the sacrament: and although for blood to be simply without the body is impossible, nevertheless for blood to be by the power of the sacrament under the sacrament, can be without the body being by the power of the sacrament under the sacrament: and in this way the reality of the sacrament is properly taken as of a sacrament: and thus it is clear that just as reality does not depend on reality, so neither does form on form. § 18. To the other it must be said, that sacramentally the perfect body is operated with the blood, as has been said: but that blood in it for the use of the faithful which is the drink of redemption, is not operated by the form said over the bread, but by that said over the chalice. And therefore that objection is not valid: because although the perfect body is under the species of bread, nevertheless it is not according to what is fitting for both uses of the faithful, namely of food and drink. And therefore it is commonly said by the Doctors that the blood is there not by the power of the sacrament, but from the natural connection of the blood and the body: because a perfect and living body has blood in the liver, and veins, and other parts of the body which ought to be suffused with blood. Now an objection against the argument concerns the soul: because either it operates the body and the soul, or not. If not: then it is imperfect, and thus it is not so. If so: then the bread is converted into the soul, which is impossible. And concerning the divinity there is the same objection. § 19. To the other it must be said, that this sacrament is not one from the unity of species or the form of words, but rather from the unity of that which is there reality and sacrament, and from the unity of that which is there reality only, as will be proved below. And therefore to the argument it must be said, that form gives being in this way in which it is form: and therefore the form of bread gives being as to the containment of the body, and the form of wine gives being as to the containment of the blood. But because Christ is the reality and the sacrament in this sacrament, and He himself is truly one: therefore the sacrament is one. § 20. Concerning this, however, there will be a disputation below because it has great difficulty, and requires diligent discussion.

Articulus 9 — Whether This Sacrament Ought To Be Frequented After Supper Just As Christ Instituted It

§ 22. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at C, § 2, around the beginning: "Where it is worthy of consideration, why that sacrament after supper," etc. § 24. For it seems from this that it should also be celebrated and frequented after supper: § 25. 1. For it is more to instruct by deed, than by word: since therefore He himself instituted this by word and work after supper: it seems also that it should be celebrated after supper. § 26. 2. Also, The instruction of the Master avails more than that of the disciple: therefore even if the Apostles decreed the contrary, it seems they should not be obeyed, but rather the Lord: and thus it is to be received after supper, as it seems. § 27. 3. Also, The less the need of food on the part of the body, when spiritual food is received, the more the spiritual food partaken is signified not to be received for the need of the body, but of the soul: but when the refreshment of the body has been made, the need of the body is less than when it has not been made: therefore if the body of Christ is received after refreshment is made, from this it is signified that it is received not on account of the body, but on account of the soul: but it is clear that it should be received in this way, namely on account of the soul, and not on account of the body: therefore it is more fitting that it be received after a meal, than before. § 28. 4. Furthermore, It seems that nothing prohibits it from being received after a meal: for what enters the mouth does not defile the soul, as the Lord says. But nothing impedes from the perception of this sacrament, except sin: therefore it seems that it can be celebrated and received after a meal. § 29. On the contrary: § 30. 1. Augustine says in the Text, that on account of the honor of so great a sacrament, the Lord's body ought to enter the mouth of a Christian before other foods. Therefore it is to be received and celebrated before a meal. § 31. 2. Also, I Cor. 11:20-21: "When you come together in one, it is no longer to eat the Lord's supper: for each one takes his own supper beforehand to eat." Therefore the Apostle posits this for a reason, that the body of Christ is not to be eaten, because one's own supper has been taken beforehand to eat: therefore it ought not to be received after food, as it seems. § 32. 3. Also, This sacrament on the part of the receiver requires the highest devotion: but the highest devotion requires the greatest sobriety of the senses and of reason: the highest sobriety requires fasting: therefore the body of Christ is to be received on a fasting stomach. § 33. Further it is asked here concerning the causes which the Master touches upon in the Text, that Christ gave His body after supper. § 34. For the first does not seem to be valid, namely that the last of the legal observances, which is the typical lamb, might be terminated at the Passion which is recollected in this sacrament: § 35. 1. For if two things are to be continued with each other according to succession, the last of the prior ought to be with the first of the posterior: but it is clear that the first sacrament of the New Testament is not the Eucharist, but rather baptism: therefore it seems that it ought to have been continued to baptism. § 36. 2. Also, Just as the eating of the typical lamb was to be terminated at the eating of the true lamb, so circumcision was to be terminated at baptism: therefore by the same reason He ought to have circumcised the Apostles lastly after supper, and afterwards baptized them, just as He gave them the typical lamb, and afterwards the true. § 37. The second cause also does not seem to be valid, namely that He might more closely commend it to the memory of the disciples: § 38. 1. For that which is most necessary, is most to be commended to memory: but baptism and penance are most necessary: therefore they are most to be commended to memory: therefore both those and not the Eucharist ought to have been instituted lastly after supper. § 39. 2. Also further, According to the Philosophers, that which first occurs to memory before other motions are made in it, is more deeply rooted in memory and is more retained: if therefore that was to be commended to memory, as is said in the Text, it seems by that very fact that it should have been given to the disciples before other things, and not lastly. § 40. Solution. It must be said, that in truth, just as the Master proves in the Text, it is one way concerning the institution of this sacrament, and another concerning the frequentation by the faithful: for it was fitting for its institution that it be instituted after supper immediately before the Passion: but for its frequentation, that it be perceived and celebrated before a meal for the reverence and discernment of so great a food and for sobriety of devotion: for as the Apostle says, I Cor. 11:29: "He who eats and drinks unworthily, eats and drinks judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord." Whence that food is to be discerned, as is said in the Text, and distinguished from other foods: and for this the vigor and sobriety of reason is required: but reason after a meal is obstructed because of fumes raised to the brain from the place of digestion, and is rendered less potent in discerning, and devotion is impeded: and also it can scarcely be that some delight, at least venial, does not creep in regarding the food, from which also a man is rendered less suitable: and therefore it had been wholesomely instituted, that it be frequented before a meal. But the causes why the Lord instituted it not only after a meal, but even after supper, are sufficiently touched upon in the Text. § 41. To the first therefore we say, that the Lord did not intimate by this that it should be frequented after supper: but in the Text it is held for what causes He instituted it after supper, so that thereafter it should be frequented before a meal. § 42. To the other it must be said, that this is true in those cases where the instruction of the Master and of the disciple are separate: but if the Master establishes in the disciple, that he not contradict the first operation of the Master which he does by himself according to intention, then the disciple is to be obeyed just as the Master. § 43. To the other it must be said, that satiety is contrary to the reception of the Eucharist from incongruity and non-conformity: but since even before a meal faith supposes that the body of Christ is not to be converted to us, but we to Him, it is sufficiently evident that it is never received on account of bodily need. § 44. To the other it must be said, that the greatest preparation is required for this sacrament: and therefore it is necessary to abstain not only from illicit things, but also from licit things not congruous with so great a sacrament: and attending to this the Church decreed that the faithful approach the sacrament fasting: and therefore one having dined sins by receiving, not indeed by dining, but because against the reasonable prohibition of the Church he receives so great a sacrament having dined. § 45. To that which is further asked concerning the causes given in the Text, it must be said that they are excellent: and one is taken on the part of the order of truth to the shadow: while the other is on the part of the ingratitude for the love shown to us in the sign of the Passion and the Eucharist: for to forget that love by which He suffered for us, and gave Himself as food for us, is of damnable ingratitude. § 46. To the first therefore which is objected against this, it must be said that although baptism is the first sacrament on the part of its effect in us, nevertheless it is not the first on the part of the worker in all the sacraments: for the worker in all the sacraments is the Passion of Christ and the suffering Christ: but this, as was said before, is specially recollected in this sacrament. § 47. To the other it must be said, that baptism has a reality, which is the newness of spiritual life: and this was exemplarily shown in the Resurrection: and therefore it was more fitting for it to be instituted formally after the Resurrection, than immediately before the Passion: and concerning this enough has been asked in the treatise on baptism. § 48. To that however which is objected against the second cause, it must be said that although baptism is necessary because it is the sacrament of spiritual life, and the door of the sacraments, nevertheless it is not to be frequented: because it is given against original sin which is only one, and infects the soul once: and therefore there did not need to be a memorial of it. But in this sacrament frequency is required, because, as Bernard says in his epistle to the Carthusians, it is the memorial of our friend going away for us to the Passion, of which we ought never to be unmindful. § 49. To the last it must be said, that it is known that the first things are more deeply rooted in memory for retaining, but for frequenting, upon which the mind should always return, the last things are commemorated: because those are like outstanding things in the mind which more quickly present themselves to memory and meditation by themselves: just as in a similar case we can see what Cicero teaches, that the stronger arguments of Rhetoricians are to be placed at the end: so that those, standing out more prominently than other forms which are in the soul of the judge, may present themselves more to the meditation and reason of the judge.

403. Isa 51:22-23

Articulus 10 — Whether This Sacrament Ought To Be Celebrated After A Meal, And What Eating Or Drinking Bars From The Reception Of The Sacrament

§ 51. But still further it is asked, Whether this sacrament can be celebrated after a meal? § 52. Now it seems, that it cannot: because the Apostle says, I Cor. 11:20 and 21: "It is no longer to eat the Lord's supper: for each one takes his own supper beforehand to eat." But it is one thing not to be eating, and another not to ought to be eaten: for what is not eating, does not happen to be eating: and this is so because it is not confected, or because it is not ready for eating: therefore it seems that it is not confected after a meal. § 53. But against this is: that for a sacrament nothing is required except form and matter, and on the part of the confector order and intention: therefore supposing these, it seems that the sacrament is confected: therefore it is confected after a meal and before a meal, as it seems. § 54. Further it is asked, What eating debars one from the perception of the body and blood of the Lord? § 55. For physicians say, that some things are medicine and not food, and some food and not medicine, but some are food and medicine at the same time: let it be asked therefore if someone were to receive those things which are medicine and not food, which exhaust the body rather than are converted into the body, whether he can receive the body of the Lord? § 56. And it seems that he can: because § 57. 1. He did not receive food: and nothing else impeded him: therefore he is not impeded by such things, as it seems. § 58. 2. Also, Such things, as they say, do not break the fast: therefore they do not impede celebration or communion. § 59. On the contrary: § 60. From such things fumes and vapors are well provoked to the brain: therefore they impede reason from the discernment and judgment owed to this food: therefore it seems that they impede from celebration and communion. § 61. Further it is asked concerning those drinking water, whether they are debarred from celebration and communion? § 62. It seems that they are not: because § 63. 1. Simply speaking, water does not nourish: therefore it does not break the fast, nor impede celebration. § 64. 2. Also, Certain Doctors of law say this in their apparatus, that a drink of water does not impede from celebration. § 65. On the contrary: § 66. Although water inasmuch as it is such does not nourish, nevertheless through the act of moisture it is the vehicle of food: either therefore it conveys the food mixed with the food, or not. If not mixed: then pure water would flow and flow back to the members, and the food upon it, which is false and absurd: therefore it conveys the food mixed with it: but mixed with food it is converted to the members and the body substantially: therefore water nourishes: therefore it breaks the fast, and impedes from celebration and communion, as it seems. § 68. Solution. Without prejudice to the judgment of my elders it seems to me to be said to the first, that if someone having orders and intention confects after a meal while preserving the form and matter of this sacrament, what is confected is confected: but he sins mortally by coming against the institution of the Catholic and Apostolic Church. § 69. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it seems to be said, that the Apostle says there, "is not," that is, "ought not": and not in the sense that it would not be if it were confected. § 70. But to that which is further asked, it must be said that in my judgment every food which we commonly and usually call food, that is, which passes into the stomach, even if it is not converted to the body, impedes celebration. § 71. To that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that it is not only instituted on account of refreshment, because refreshment is no evil: but also on account of the vice of the body and the disturbance of the soul, which does not comport with the perception of so great a sacrament: but the body and the powers of the soul are sometimes disturbed more in that which is medicine and not food, than in that which is food: and therefore after the reception of such things the sacrament is not to be celebrated: nevertheless the sick for whom the law is not set, can receive in the hour of necessity, whether after a meal, or before a meal. § 72. To the other it must be said, that it is otherwise concerning fasting: because this is done for the affliction of the body: and therefore the disturbance of the senses is not contrary to fasting: and therefore it is conceded by some, that such things do not break the fast. § 73. To that which is further asked concerning the drink of water, it seems to me to be said, that celebration is not to be done after a drink of water: because materially it is also converted into food, and multiplies fumes to the head. § 74. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that simple water remaining simple, does not nourish: but through digestive heat it is mixed with the food which is in the stomach: and then it nourishes, just as the works of farmers show who mix it with dung when they want to irrigate plants: and then, as the Philosopher says, it begins thus intermixed to be nourishment. And what happens in plants externally by artifice, happens in man internally by nature mixing better. § 75. To the other it must be said, that simple fasting is one thing, and fasting by the usual reputation of the Church is another: for water without doubt breaks a simple fast: but because its aid is small, therefore by the Church the fast is not reputed to be broken by a drink of water. § 76. To the other it must be said, that Jurists do not have to speak of this, but rather the Physicist or Physician: but the Theologian taking this from the Physician has to determine, whether it is to be confected after a drink of water or not.

404. Ps 29:10 (Vulgate), which is Ps 30:9 in English Bibles.

Articulus 11 — Whether The Eucharist Is Also A Sacrament, Or Not

§ 78. Next it is asked concerning what he says, there, at D, "Now what is the sacrament there," etc. § 79. Here three things incidental are to be asked, the first of which is, Whether it is a sacrament? because the Master supposes this. The second, what is the sacrament there and what the reality, and what the sacrament and reality? and this he touches upon in the Text. The third is consequent to this, namely whether it is one sacrament, or many? § 80. To the first one proceeds thus: Every sacrament effects what it figures: the sacrament in the Eucharist does not effect what it figures: therefore that which is only a sign or sacrament (as he says in the Text) is not a sacrament of the new law at least. The first premise is supposed from what was held above at the beginning of the book. But the second is proved from this that the species of bread and wine, which are signs, effect nothing: therefore it seems that the conclusion follows. § 81. 2. If perhaps you say, that to effect is to act, and action is not owed to matter, but to form: but the species of bread and wine are material in the sacrament: and therefore action is not owed to them, but to the form of the sacrament. On the contrary: In baptism and confirmation I see, that at least the matter has a corporal act in which the spiritual act of the sacrament is understood: for water washes dirt, in which the washing of sins is understood: and chrism on account of the balsam renders unputrifiable that which is anointed with it, in which the constancy of the confirmed is understood: but the species of bread and wine since they are accidents, have no likeness with the act of nourishing spiritually, because an accident does not nourish: therefore it seems, that in no way is it only a sacrament. § 82. Further it is asked concerning the true body of Christ, Whether it itself is a sacrament? § 83. And it seems, that it is in no way a sacrament: because § 84. 1. It is not visible or sensible: since therefore a sacrament is a visible and corporal element, externally subjected to the eyes, etc., it seems not to be a sacrament. § 85. 2. Furthermore, A sacrament of the new law effects what it figures: the true body of Christ does not seem to effect what it figures: therefore the true body of Christ is not a sacrament of the new law. The first premise is clear from what has been held often. The major premise is proved from the fact that the effect is not before the efficient cause: but the mystical body of Christ and its unity was before the true body of Christ: therefore it is not its effect, as it seems. § 86. 3. Furthermore, In other sacraments something is effected in us: therefore also in this one: but the mystical body of Christ is not something in the faithful, but rather the Christian faithful themselves: therefore it is not the effect of the sacrament, but rather the reality, as it seems. § 87. But if you say, that the reality is signified, not caused, nor contained (as some say, and as seems to be said in the Text) then it follows, that with respect to that the Eucharist ought not to be determined to be a sacrament of the new law: because the sacraments of the old law well had signified realities not contained, just like the sacraments of the new law. § 88. Solution. Without ambiguity it must be said, that the Eucharist is not only a sacrament, but also the sacrament of sacraments, as will be consequently proved. § 89. But to the first it must be said, that in truth, just as the Master said in the Text, and Hugh of St. Victor, in this sacrament there are three things, the first of which is the sacrament in the ratio of sign only, namely the species of bread and wine. The second is the sacrament and reality, and the sign and cause of the third, and this is the true body of Christ. The third is the reality only, and is the virtue of the second, and the thing signified of the first and the second, and this is the unity of the mystical body. § 90. To that therefore which is objected, that the species effects nothing, it must be said that it is not necessary that the material species be effective, but significative, according to what the solution posited in the objection says. § 91. To that which is objected against this solution, it must be said that the species can be taken in two ways, namely according to what it is, and in comparison and relation to that which it contains, and of which it was as a subject. If in the first way: then it is true, that it is an accident, and does not nourish. But if in the second way: then it contains spiritual food, to whose act it posits a sign by the fact that it is the proper accident of corporal and natural bread, in which it was as in a subject before the conversion: and therefore according to some it still retains after the conversion some act of the bread: concerning which however the question will be manifest below. And in this way it posits a likeness to the spiritual refreshment, which unites us to the mystical body of Christ. § 92. To that which is further asked concerning the true body of Christ, it must be said that it is sacrament and reality, and is the cause and sign of the unity of the mystical body of Christ, and the thing signified and effect of the first, namely the bread and wine with the transubstantiating form. § 93. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that the effect of this sacrament is not the mystical body (and those objections proceed from a bad understanding of the Text) but rather the unity of the mystical body. But that unity is effected in many ways, namely by the unitive spirit, and by the effect of virtues compaginated and connecting and uniting, as the Apostle touches upon. And in this way the unity of the mystical body of Christ precedes the true body of Christ. But there is another unity from sacramental grace according to which this sacrament converts to itself, and unites to itself whoever is fed in this sacrament: for in this that it unites anyone to itself, it unites all to one another: because whatever things are united to one and the same thing, are also united among themselves: and in this way the unity is the effect of the true body of Christ; and follows it as an effect its cause. § 94. Through this also the solution to the last point is clear, which is that to effect the mystical body of Christ is twofold: namely materially, and thus it is not the effect of any sacrament except perhaps matrimony. And it is to effect the unity of the body as to spiritual grace by reason of the food converting to itself: and in this way the unity of the mystical body of Christ is effected by the sacrament, and speaks of the grace contained in the faithful receiving the true body of Christ, and not the faithful themselves.

Articulus 12 — What A Sacrament Is, What The Thing Is, And What Sacrament And Thing Together Are

§ 96. Secondly it is asked. What is the sacrament here, and what the reality only? § 97. Now it seems, that the visible species of bread and wine cannot be the sacrament only: § 98. 1. For that which is the sacrament only, has the expression of a sign to that which is sacrament and reality, and to that which is reality only: but the species of bread and wine do not seem to have such a ratio of sign: therefore they are not the sacrament. The first is clear from what was held before. The second is proved from this that bread and wine are homogeneous bodies: but such things do not have a likeness with a heterogeneous thing, but rather a certain opposition: therefore they will not signify that. § 99. 2. Furthermore, Since the natural likeness to a natural thing is greater than an artificial to a natural thing, it seems that that which is the sign of the true body of Christ which is a natural body, ought to have been a natural body, and not artificial: therefore it seems, that it ought not to be the species of baked bread and pressed wine. § 100. 3. Also, Hugh of St. Victor says: "Since the sacrament is one, three discrete things are proposed in it, namely the visible species, and the virtue of the body, and the virtue of the spiritual soul: and the first is the sign of the second: but the second is the cause of the third: but the third is the effect of the second, and the thing signified of the first." Therefore it seems, that the first has the ratio of signifying both with respect to the second, and with respect to the third. Since therefore the signs of the New Testament ought to be the most fitting, and signs of truth, it seems that the sign ought rather to have been placed in a heterogeneous thing: because a heterogeneous thing expresses the composition of organs in the true body, and the unity of diverse faithful in the mystical body, neither of which seems to be in a homogeneous body. § 101. Solution. It must be said by the authority of Damascene who says, that because it was customary for men to be washed with water, and to be anointed with oil, He joined the grace of the Holy Spirit to the elements of oil and water, so that it might be made a sacrament spiritually washing and spiritually anointing. And because it was customary for men to use bread in food, and wine in drink, He made from these His body and blood united to the deity, and ministered it for spiritual food. And therefore in other things the ratio of signifying spiritual food would not be found so universally and fittingly. § 102. But to that which is objected first, it was also objected and solved above in the question concerning the form of the body of Christ. And it must be said, that there are two things in the bread, namely the ratio of food, and the matter from which the ratio of food is made: one is more in a homogeneous thing than in a heterogeneous thing: and because the body of Christ is food universally and simply, as to these things a homogeneous thing is more fitting than a heterogeneous thing. But if it is considered materially: then it is confected from many discrete grains, and as to this it has a likeness with the operation of the organs of the true body of Christ, and with the aggregation of the faithful. And because both must be signified in the matter of the Eucharist, on account of this it was necessary to have both in a certain way, namely heterogeneous in the matter of the bread, and homogeneous in the being of the confected bread, on account of the single ratio of feeding in the whole Christ: and the same reason applies to the wine. § 103. But to this which is objected concerning the artificial, it must be said that Christ having suffered and having been baked for us by the passion is signified in the Eucharist. But in the passion there was the work of man, and as to this a work of art has a likeness, which is the work of man's will in which the bread is related as a patient: and he touches upon this exposition... ```

§ 1. Master Hugh of St. Victor says in a certain Epistle to Bernard concerning the paschal epistle: "and therefore Christ is called the unleavened bread of sincerity, because he was baked in the innocence of his passion."

§ 2. And through this the solution and response to the whole is clear.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Sacrament Is One Or Many

Whether the sacrament is one or many?

§ 1. Thirdly it is asked, whether it is one sacrament or many? And this is more difficult.

§ 2. And it is objected thus: It is said in a collect of Blessed Gregory: May the sacraments which we have received purify us, we beseech thee, O Lord, etc. Therefore there are many sacraments.

§ 3. Again, May thy sacraments, we beseech thee, O Lord, perfect in us what they contain, etc. Since therefore it speaks only of the sacrament of the Eucharist, it seems that there are many sacraments.

§ 4. Again, in the authority of Hugh posited above which says that "three discrete things are proposed in this sacrament": but three discrete things are many; therefore this sacrament is many sacraments, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, to be a sign is toward another: therefore if the sign is multiplex, the sacrament will be multiplex: and if there are many signs, there will be many signified things. But here there are two signs, namely the species of bread and the species of wine: and the mystical body of Christ and the true body of Christ are multiple signified things. Therefore there are multiple sacraments.

§ 6. If you say that one of these sacraments is ordered to the other. On the contrary: The species of bread is not ordered to the species of wine, although both are ordered to the body and blood of Christ; but the species of bread and wine are multiple signs, and the true and mystical body of Christ are multiple signified things: therefore multiple sacraments.

§ 7. If you say that the true body and blood of Christ are not diverse but one, and therefore multiple things do not respond to them but one, and from that one signified thing there is one sacrament, as is said by almost everyone. On the contrary: It is one thing for blood to be simply, and another for the blood of Christ to be had upon the altar by virtue of the sacrament. And it is similarly so of the body. But when the confecting of the body of Christ takes place, the blood is not had by virtue of the sacrament, as is clear from what was disputed above; and when the blood is confected, the body is not had by virtue of the sacramental form. Therefore the true body and the true blood, although they are naturally united, are nevertheless sacramentally divided; and in this way they are signified by the species of bread and the species of wine. Therefore in this way there are multiple signified things, and divided according to the virtue of the sacramental form: therefore there will be multiple signs sacramentally: therefore multiple sacraments, as before.

§ 8. Again, what is commonly said—that from the unity of the ultimate signified thing there is one sacrament—seems to be nothing. For no ratio of union with respect to the preceding things is ultimate, as it seems, because the first things precede it, and therefore even if they are previously many, they are also many with it; and if they are one beforehand, they are also one with it.

§ 9. Again, a universal and a particular cause flow together into one ultimate effect, as is clear when it is said that a man and the sun generate a man out of matter. For the sun is the universal cause of generation (not of this man only), and the man is the particular cause of the generation of this man (not of universal generation); and yet, on account of that one thing which they effect, the man and the sun do not become one cause, but remain multiple causes. Therefore it seems that from the unity of the ultimate effect the things preceding that effect are not made one, but remain many.

§ 10. Again, "one" (as the Philosopher says) follows upon "being": and from that by which being is, from that unity is, because both are from form. Therefore where there are many things giving being, there are multiple unities, and multiple "ones," if one may speak thus. But in this sacrament there are multiple beings, because there are multiple forms. Therefore multiple "ones." Therefore multiple sacraments, as it seems.

§ 11. Again, things which agree neither in genus nor in species are simply many. The signs which are in this sacrament agree neither in species nor in genus: therefore they are simply many. The first premise is evident per se. The second is proved from the fact that the visible species of bread are the signs of the true body, and the wine is the sign of the mystical body; and these signs are neither in the same proximate genus, nor in the same species. Therefore they are simply many.

§ 12. Again, the signified things are also many. Proof: That which is simply one is not the same as that which is one in a qualified sense, namely by aggregation only. But the true body of Christ is simply one and by a natural unity, whereas the mystical body of Christ is one in a qualified sense and by aggregation only. Therefore they are not the same. Since therefore there is neither unity in the signs nor unity in the signified things, this sacrament seems to be simply many, and not one.

§ 13. Again, from two perfect things existing in the same genus, one thing is not made. But Christ is perfect under the reason of bread, and perfect under the form of wine. Therefore He is perfect in both places: therefore one is not made from that which is there and there. Therefore multiple sacraments remain.

§ 14. Again, we see that the unity of a signified thing in the imposition of names (which are signs of things) does not make the same name, nor does diversity make diversity. For Marcus, Tullius, and Cicero are diverse names and signify the same thing; and albus, alba, album (white) are the same name and signify diverse things. Therefore by similarity the same will hold in the sacraments: because the unity of the signified thing does not make the unity of the signs, nor does diversity make diversity. Therefore it seems again that nothing is said by stating that, although there are diverse species here and diverse signs, nevertheless these are one sacrament on account of the unity of the signified thing.

§ 15. If on account of this it is said that these are multiple sacraments. On the contrary: Above it was proved that the sacraments of the New Law are only seven. But if this one is many, there will be more than seven. Therefore this is only one.

§ 16. Again, one sacrament is that which is effective of one grace. But this sacrament effects a single grace, because it effects the unity of the body of Christ. Therefore it is a single sacrament, and not many.

§ 17. Again, Ambrose says that a sacrament is simple. But what is simple is not many. Therefore this sacrament is one, and not many.

§ 18. Solution. A distinction made by certain Doctors preceding us was that there is something which is simply one (such as that which is of one form and one matter and one effect, like baptism); and there is another which is simply many (such as two or three sacraments which have different forms and matters and effects). But there is a middle between these which is one in a multiplex way, which by many matters and forms effects one effect; and to this they reduced this sacrament. But this distinction does not please me, insofar as one effect is not effected by two equally proximate causes, unless one of them is imperfect; and since grace is not more imperfect than nature, even in grace it seems absurd to me to say that an entirely single effect is effected by two equally proximate causes. And therefore it seems it must be said, without prejudice, that this sacrament is simply one, just like the others; but nevertheless, on account of the mode of grace which it effects, there are materially many things in it. And the reason for this will appear more lucidly in solving the objections.

§ 19. It must be said, therefore, to the first three objections, that they regard those things which are material in the sacrament. And therefore they say "sacraments," consignifying the plural number; yet they do not say "multiple sacraments" signifying the plural number as a concept, or as two or three sacraments, signing the plural number in exercised distinction.

§ 20. But if it is objected that Master Hugh says there are three things in this sacrament, and thus signifies an exercised distinction, it must be said that he signifies it obliquely. Hence he says that, although it is one sacrament, there are three discrete things in it: and therefore the discrete things refer to the matter of the sacrament, which nevertheless are terminated by one form: just as the distinction of the members of the body is terminated by the unity of the form of the whole, and the body from that form is simply one, yet it materially has within itself multiple members.

§ 21. To the next it must be said that, in truth, the being of a sign is not toward another, but toward the same: yet the sign of the species of bread and of the species of wine is referred in a different way, and yet by a single relation, which nonetheless seems marvelous. But I well concede that if multiple things were referred by multiple relations to the same or diverse things, they would be simply many. However, the same thing to which it is referred is the unity of the body, but not in the same way. For the species of bread has a relation of fittingness to the union with the head, that the members might be bound to the head, just as bread is also confected out of many grains. But the species of wine has a relation to the grace of redemption which unites by a descent from the head: so that, as it were, our relation to the head might be signified in the bread, and His relation to us through the redemption of the ministered blood might be signified in the blood; and without these two there is no perfect union. And this is noted when He says, He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. Moreover, these species are referred by one relation, because that relation is the relation of a sign. For as Augustine says in the book On Christian Doctrine: Of signs, some are natural, and others by convention, and others from divine institution. And it is true that, as far as it is from a natural likeness, there is not one relation in the species of bread and of wine, because that likeness responds in a diverse way to the perfect unity; but from institution, which is the principal cause in the sacraments as to why they signify and cause, they have one relation: because by institution they were instituted to signify the same thing in diverse ways.

§ 22. And through this the solution to almost all the objections is clear: and this is the root of the whole truth in this article of the question.

§ 23. To the next it must be said that sacramentally the body of Christ and the blood are not entirely divided: because they are for effecting the same thing, namely the union of the mystical body, albeit in diverse ways, as was said.

§ 24. To the next it must be said that the first things are not entirely diverse, since in one there are four from the institution which is principally first: but it is noted that if they were united in none of the preceding things, then they could not be united in the ultimate thing.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning a particular and a universal cause: because those are united in nothing by substance, but only in the effect, which is posterior to both causes. But this institution precedes all things, and unites them in one.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that there are not simply multiple forms in this sacrament: and therefore just as the form of the part is one thing, and the form of the whole another, so the form of the whole is one thing and the form of the part of the sacrament another. For both of the forms, related to the unity of the institution, simultaneously confer complete being to the sacrament: but when they are taken divisively, they are material, and do not confer complete being to the sacrament according as it is a sacrament, although they confer the complete Christ, as will appear lower down. And therefore related to the unity of the institution by which Christ intended to institute one sacrament, they do not confer except one being and the unity of one sacrament.

§ 27. To the next it must be said that it is one thing to take that which makes the genus of a sacrament and the species, and it is another to take that which makes the genus of nature or the species: and concerning the genus of nature the objection proceeds, but concerning that which makes the being of a sign according as it is a sacrament it does not proceed: because thus they are not only in the same genus and species, but even in number, as was said before. Similarly the signified things are not in the same mode of unity of nature, but only in the being of a sacrament one is ordered to the other, just as a sign and a cause are ordered to the signified and caused effect.

§ 28. To the next it must be said, without prejudice, that perfection is twofold, namely of Christ, and of the sacrament according as it comes into the use of the faithful, and perfects and signs the perfect unity of the mystical body. In the first way it is true that Christ is perfect under both species, namely of bread, and of wine: but in the second way it seems to me false, because the use of the faithful and the unity of the mystical body is not perfectly caused and signed except by a double sign, as was said before. And therefore by virtue of the sacrament it is necessary to have both; and these are united in one institution and one sign, although the modes of unity are diverse, as was said before.

§ 29. To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning names, and signs instituted by God to signify sacramental graces. Because although sometimes it is the same thing upon which multiple names are imposed, nevertheless the institutor does not impose them from the same thing: because since a name signifies a substance with a quality, the institutor respects the quality; and this is sufficient for the Grammarian, if he also has a diverse mode for a diverse institution. And therefore multiple names imposed from such modes of qualities can belong to the same thing; and because even one quality and mode is in diverse things, one institution is made for diverse things signified by the same name varied in its consignifications, such as albus, alba, album. But it does not happen thus in the institution of a sacramental sign: for there the perfect signification of one grace is respected, although the mode of participating it may be diverse. And therefore there is one institution over all those things which avail to express the force of that grace; and all those things are united in that institution.

§ 30. And through this the solution to all is clear.

DISTINCTIO IX

Divisio Textus

§ 1. And just as there are two realities of that sacrament, etc.

§ 2. Having gone through those things which pertain to the substance of this sacrament, he touches upon it in this part according to its comparison to the celebrant or confector, there, Dist. XI, F, After these things it is asked, if what the priest does is properly called a sacrifice, etc.

§ 3. In this part, however, he touches upon the sacrament on the part of the recipient. And it is divided into two parts: in the first of which he touches upon the two modes of receiving, and the opinions and errors which surround those modes. In the second, he touches upon the mode of conversion, and certain consequences of the mode of that transubstantiation, such as concerning the accidents, and fraction, and such things: and this begins there, Dist. XI, A, But if it is asked, What kind of conversion is that, etc.

§ 4. The first of these is divided into two: in the first of which he contains the first chapter of this new distinction, and touches upon the two modes of eating. But in the second, by reason of the authorities introduced, he touches upon the errors which surround this matter: and this begins there, B, These words and others of this kind, where concerning spiritual eating, etc.

§ 5. In this chapter, therefore, he proves that there are two modes of eating, namely sacramental, and spiritual. And concerning these modes three things can be asked in common. The first is about the distinction of these modes. The second is about that mode in particular which is called spiritual. The third, about their number.

Articulus 1 — Whether There Are Two Modes Of Receiving The Eucharist, Namely, Sacramental And Spiritual, And How They Are Distinguished

Whether there are two modes of receiving the Eucharist, namely sacramental and spiritual, and how they are distinguished?

§ 1. To the first it is objected thus: For it seems that these modes are not distinct on the part of the sacrament, but on our part. For in baptism there is always the reception of a spiritual effect, unless there is an impeding fiction [i.e., obstacle]. And therefore baptism of itself works salvation: therefore similarly since the Eucharist is a sacrament of the New Law, it always works spiritual grace: therefore the sacramental in it is not to be distinguished from the spiritual.

§ 2. Again, an earthly king is not less powerful where he is present by himself than where he is present by a minister, but more so. Therefore it is similarly so of the heavenly King: but Christ by Himself is in the sacrament of the Eucharist in three substances and unity of person, whereas in the other sacraments He works only by the virtue of His Passion. If therefore the reception of the other sacraments, as far as it is of itself, is always spiritual, much more will the reception of the Eucharist always be spiritual: and thus there is no distinction, unless it is understood on our part.

§ 3. Again, the operation of a sacrament is distinguished from the operation of virtue and grace, because in the sacraments the divine virtue operates salvation more secretly in a corporal element. Therefore unless the operation of some corporal element precedes, it does not happen that one comes to a spiritual effect. Therefore it seems that the spiritual mode of receiving is never distinguished from the sacramental.

§ 4. Again, in baptism, although a feigned person approaches, nevertheless we do not say that he receives nothing of the spirit, because he receives the character. Therefore much more will this be so in the sacrament of the Eucharist: therefore he who eats sacramentally, eats spiritually. And thus sacramental eating is not distinguished from spiritual; and thus again the distinction seems to be evacuated on our part.

§ 5. Again, in the Text we have from Augustine: Why do you prepare a tooth and a belly? Believe, and you have eaten. Therefore this food does not pass into the body. Therefore it is not of a corporal element. Since therefore in all receivers there is some food, it must be that it is spiritual in all: therefore to receive spiritually is never separated from sacramental reception: therefore there is no distinction.

§ 6. Again, if there is some mode of receiving sacramentally only, this will be by reason of something which happens in the sacrament: therefore either by reason of the accidents, and then he would more truly receive sacramentally who received the accidents; or by reason of the truth of the body of Christ received, and then either the truth of the body passes into the belly, or into the mind. Not into the belly, because this is denied in the Text: therefore into the mind: therefore it is united to the mind, or the mind is united to the body of Christ, and this is to receive spiritually: therefore he who receives sacramentally, receives spiritually, as it seems: and thus the distinction is worth nothing.

§ 7. If perchance it is said, just as some evade this, that to receive spiritually is to be spiritually united to Christ, and to remain in Christ. On the contrary: To be united to Christ is not the act of the sacrament: therefore to be united to Christ is not to receive the sacrament spiritually. The proof of the first premise is: because before the institution of this sacrament the faithful were united to Christ and to the mystical body.

§ 8. Again, charity toward God and neighbor unites to God and neighbor: yet not everyone having charity receives the sacramental reality spiritually. Therefore it seems that this solution is not true.

§ 9. Again, although grace is the spiritual reality of the sacrament, yet it is not just any grace, but that which properly operates in the sacraments. But the proper effect of anything is never had, without that thing being had. Therefore the proper effect of this sacrament is never had unless the sacrament itself is perceived.

§ 10. Solution. It seems it must be said, without prejudice, that these modes are sometimes distinct, and sometimes joined. They are distinct when there is a perception of the true body of Christ without the effect of interior grace, but rather with spiritual harm, just as is said in the Text in the second part of the distinction, that he who receives this sacrament unworthily acquires for himself a great torment. And again, that a good is an evil, when a good is received badly: and such a mode of sacramental reception is divided from the spiritual. Conversely, there are some who by memory or the habit of the passion of Christ and a spiritual sacrifice unite themselves to Christ the head, and they receive spiritually, and not sacramentally.

§ 11. Therefore it seems it must be said to the first objection, that this distinction is not only on our part, but also on the part of the sacrament: because the sacrament has a twofold contained reality: one from the force of the consecration, which is the true body of Christ which is confected outside us. It has another contained reality, just as a cause contains the caused thing virtually within itself: and that is grace on our part. And this is not so in the other sacraments which do not have a contained reality except as caused in us: and therefore in those there is no distinction of a twofold mode as in this one. Yet this seems to be conceded, that although it has a twofold reality, as was said, nevertheless it is not impeded from that other one of them which it ought to cause in us, except on our part.

§ 12. To the next it must be said that Christ by Himself in a threefold substance is the reality contained in the Eucharist by virtue of the consecration, and it is not from His defect that the ulterior spiritual reality is not induced, but rather from our defect: but nonetheless because one of these realities does not denote anything in us, nor is it effected in us, but outside us by virtue of the consecration in the sacrament, while the other is effected spiritually in our spirit: therefore the ratio of the discretion is on the part of the reality of this sacrament in some way, as was said.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that, without a doubt, that argument has more probability than the others; yet without prejudice it can be said that that objection would hold well in the other sacraments, and especially in those which imprint a character. For although something may supply the place of a sacrament, nevertheless some effect is so proper to the sacrament that it is not effected except by the sacrament. But in the Eucharist the sacramental mode of receiving is totally referred to the spiritual, and is for the sake of it: and therefore the spiritual also by itself can operate the same grace, although the presence of Christ in the sacrament bears a certain delight which the spiritual mode of eating does not have in itself.

§ 14. To the next it must be said that it is otherwise in baptism, and in this one. Because baptism has a special and principal ordering against original sin which is contracted from another, and it places a man in the state of faith (which state is concerning unformed and formed faith, as was said above in the question concerning character): and therefore a feigned person receives the character remaining with him. But in this one he receives the true body of Christ: because that is not caused in the recipient, but outside him: and therefore the unfitness of the recipient cannot impede it.

§ 15. To the next it must be said that Augustine speaks there of incorporation and union through incorporation, and not of the presence of the truth of the body of Christ. However, afterwards there will be a question about this in its own place. Hence I think it must be conceded that the true body of Christ passes into every place into which the species pass, with the species of bread and wine remaining.

§ 16. To the next it must be said that the sacramental mode of receiving is so called by reason of the presence of the truth of the body of Christ in the sacrament, and I well concede that it does not pass into the mind: because Christ as man does not glide into the mind. And what is objected about passing into the belly has already been solved.

§ 17. To the next it must be said that to receive spiritually is to be united to Christ through the spiritual effect of this sacrament: and indeed the sacrament did not have this before it was a sacrament, but the union by which the faithful were united was the union of charity and faith. Yet after the sacrament is, the reality of the sacrament can come to be in the soul through meditation and devotion, which Christ spiritually conjoined works, because (as was said in the beginning of this book) He has not bound His grace to the sacraments. Others say otherwise, and perhaps better, namely that the reality of the sacrament and the union occurs in a twofold way, namely by sacramental grace, and one does not have this unless one worthily receives the sacrament: and thus it can also happen in someone supplying the force of the sacrament, just as martyrdom and penance sometimes supply the place of baptism. And in this way the faithful receive the reality of this sacrament through the devotion and love of the head and the members.

§ 18. And through this the solution to the following and to the last is also clear.

Articulus 2 — Whether There Is Some Spiritual Mode Of Receiving The Eucharist, And What There Is In Such A Mode On Account Of Which It Is Called Eating

Whether there is any spiritual mode of receiving the Eucharist? And what is it in such a mode whence it is called an "eating"?

§ 1. Secondly, it is asked especially concerning that mode which is called spiritual. For this one seems to be nothing.

§ 2. For although it is said by the Saints and Masters that some things supply the place of a certain sacrament as to something, yet it is not conceded that this sacrament is perceived in them: for no one perceives baptism in penance, nor in martyrdom: therefore it seems that the reality of this sacrament is similarly never perceived except through the act of the sacrament, although something can be perceived in its place.

§ 3. Again, although penance supplies the place of baptism, nevertheless I cannot say that the penitent is baptized. Since therefore the proper act of this sacrament, which is the bread of life, is to be eaten sacramentally, just as of baptism to be baptized, it seems that on account of no devotion ought it to be conceded that someone eats spiritually: although the contrary is said in the second chapter of this distinction.

§ 4. Again, through corporal things one comes to spiritual things in sacramental realities: therefore where a corporal thing has not preceded, one can never find the spiritual proper to this sacrament, as it seems.

§ 5. Again, the spiritual mode of eating either operates entirely the same thing as the sacramental, or it operates less. If entirely the same: since therefore it is nobler to do something by one thing than by two, it seems that the spiritual mode would be superfluous. But if it operates something less than that: then it is not a mode of the sacrament, but of something which supplies its place.

§ 6. Furthermore it is asked further, what is it in the spiritual mode of eating by reason of which it is called an "eating"?

§ 7. But it seems that it is nothing: because in corporal eating there are four things, namely the division of food, the passage of the food into the place of digestion, digestion, and union or incorporation. But none of these happen in the spiritual eating of Christ. For Christ is not divided, nor does He pass to the place of digestion, nor is He digested, nor is He incorporated, but rather He incorporates us to Himself. Therefore it seems that spiritual eating is not a reception of the body of Christ.

§ 8. Again, spiritual eating either occurs by any devotion whatever, or by any act of charity whatever, or by certain spiritual acts. If it is said that it occurs by any devotion, and by any act of charity: then it follows that this eating was from the beginning of the world, and was before the sacrament was; which cannot be. Because since the mode of perceiving the reality of a sacrament is after the sacrament, there could not be a mode of perceiving the Eucharist spiritually, except after the sacrament of the Eucharist. But if it is some spiritual act and mode of devotion and charity, let it be asked what that act is? And if it is said that this is by the charity of offering for us the price of the world in Christ the head and in the members, it seems that this was from the beginning of the world. Therefore the spiritual perception of the body of Christ was from the beginning of the world, which seems absurd.

§ 9. Solution. Here many have said many things: but it seems to me that it must be said, without prejudice, that the spiritual mode of eating is threefold. One is common, namely the participation in the effect of the sacrament in general, and not from the same cause, such as the participation in the incorporation of the mystical body of Christ and of Christ the head not from the sacrament, but from the faith and charity of the head and the members. And in this way it was perceived by the faithful from the beginning, and will be perceived. In a second way more properly, namely the tasting of the sweetness of the grace of the communion of the body through the meditation and devotion of those things of which the Eucharist is the sign. And in this way the sacramental grace is also perceived, not from the same cause of the sacrament, but from another, because namely it has its force. And in this way it was not perceived spiritually before the sacrament, unless the rite and signification of the sacrament had been revealed to someone. Thirdly most properly, namely the perception of the grace of the communion of the mystical body, and from the proper sacramental cause. And this spiritual eating is never separated from the sacramental: because in this way the spiritual is received in the sacrament, as medicine in a vessel, and the caused thing in the cause.

§ 10. It must be said therefore to the first, that it seems it must well be conceded that in such things there is no perception of the sacramental reality properly speaking, but commonly.

§ 11. And in this way, it seems it must be said to the second.

§ 12. To the third it must be said that if the spiritual is taken as the spiritual of the sacrament as a sacrament, then it seems to me that the objection proceeds. But if commonly or in the second way, then it is clear that it does not hold.

§ 13. To the next it must be said that it does not operate entirely the same thing, as has already been made clear: and therefore the sacrament is not received without cause, but rather with the greatest utility.

§ 14. To that which is further asked, it must be said that those things which are in spiritual eating are in some way similar to those things which are in corporal eating, but not entirely. For whenever two things are united such that one ought to be changed to the other, then that which is more powerful changes to itself that which is weaker. Hence since this food is of a more powerful virtue than those eating it, this food changes those eating to itself, just as is said to Augustine: You shall not change me into you, like the food of your flesh, but you shall be changed into me. There is also another reason for this: because if this food were changed into us, it would profit us nothing, because we are nothing except through Him; and therefore according to the order of grace it was fitting that we should be changed into Him. Hence the division which is in corporal eating is not except as it relates to the species: of which however there will be a treatise below. But mastication has something similar: for just as teeth frequently return upon that which is masticated, so meditation by the frequent act of discerning this food and the memory of the Passion operates something in spiritual eating. But the passage of the food to the place of digestion does not have a proper similarity. But digestion, which according to the Philosopher is a completion by the natural and proper heat out of contrasting passions, is referred to us: because we are as it were digested by charity, and completed; and the impure is separated in us from the pure; and then follows union, that we may be united to the food which we receive.

§ 15. But it is objected against this: because it seems to someone from this that this food ought to be frequently masticated, since there seems to be a danger here on account of the crevices of the teeth in which something of the species can adhere.

§ 16. Solution. To this it must be said that it is not necessary on this account that it be masticated more frequently, but rather it is to be broken by the tongue, and swallowed. Yet from the fact that the species are masticable, if there were no danger, it would sufficiently come to the memory of the Passion and the charity of Christ by which He loved us when He gave Himself for us.

§ 17. To the last the solution is clear through the distinction posited at the beginning of the solution.

Articulus 3 — Why There Are Only Two Forementioned Modes Of Eating, And In What Respect They Differ

Why are there only the two aforementioned modes of eating, and according to what do they differ?

Why are there only the two aforementioned modes of eating, and according to what do they differ?

Third, it is inquired concerning the number of these two. For it seems that there are more than two.

§ 1. For in the sacrament there are three things, namely one which is the sacrament only, another which is the reality and the sacrament, and a third which is the reality only. Therefore, to these three things three modes of eating seem to correspond; therefore there are three, and not two.

§ 2. Moreover, one who receives unworthily is in two modes, namely having neither faith nor charity, and having unformed faith but not charity: therefore it seems that to each a spiritual mode corresponds. However, it is certain that such persons do not receive spiritually: therefore there are two sacramental modes.

§ 3. Moreover, this is called the sacrament of charity: therefore it seems that at least the spiritual mode ought to be distinguished according to the states of charity: but there are three states of charity, namely beginning, progressing, and perfect: therefore the spiritual mode of receiving seems that it ought to be distinguished according to these three.

§ 4. Moreover, in other sacraments only a twofold mode of receiving is distinguished, according to the feigned and the unfeigned: therefore neither in this one should a distinction be made except according to this, as it seems: therefore it should not be distinguished thus, sacramentally and spiritually: but some receive feignedly, some unfeignedly.

SOLUTION. It must be said that there are two modes distinguished by the Saints, as is held in the Letter (the Sentences), and they are taken according to the twofold reality of the sacrament, of which one it contains by the power of consecration, and the other it causes in us from the fact that it confers grace just as other sacraments of the new law: and therefore it is evident according to what the number of these modes is taken.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that according to that which is the sacrament only, no mode is taken: because here it does not have the intelligible character of food, but rather it is in the use of showing and signifying the food which it contains.

To the next it must be said that, in my judgment, one who does not have unformed faith eats neither sacramentally nor spiritually, except in potency: however, there will be a question about this below. And therefore since he is moved by no motion of faith from the species to the reality, it seems that he does not eat sacramentally, and yet he eats the sacrament. Or, so that all caviling may be forestalled, let it be said that to receive or to eat sacramentally is spoken of in two ways. In the first way, such that the word "sacramentally" designates the mode of the food: and thus to eat sacramentally is to eat the sacrament: and in this way there is no inquiry here concerning the mode of eating. In the second way it can designate the mode of the one eating or receiving: and in this way an unbeliever, who is moved by no motion of faith, does not receive sacramentally. But in my judgment, for one to eat or receive spiritually, it is necessary that it designates the mode on the part of the receiver.

To the next it must be said that this distinction is according to the modes of receiving the body of Christ in a generic way; however, it is not denied that there are many particular modes by which one perceives greater grace, another lesser, according as they approach being diversely prepared.

To the next it must be said that its solution is already contained in the premises: because in this sacrament there is one reality outside, and another inside the soul: and therefore the ratio of distinction arises from those things which are in the sacrament, and it was evident above that it is not thus in other sacraments.

Articulus 4 — What Kind Of Union Is Required So That Someone May Eat The Body Of Christ, Whether Spiritually Or Sacramentally

What kind of union is required so that someone may eat the body of Christ either spiritually or sacramentally?

What kind of union is required so that someone may eat the body of Christ either spiritually or sacramentally?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says there, at A, near the beginning: "For he eats spiritually, who abides in the unity of Christ and of the Church which the sacrament signifies," etc.

And it is inquired, what kind of union is required for someone to eat the body of Christ either spiritually, or sacramentally?

§ 1. For there is a union according to the contact of bodies, and according to the agreement of the nature of Christ and of man, and according to the conformity of the grace of unformed faith, and finally again according to the conformity of charity. If, however, the first suffices for eating sacramentally, then a mouse whose body is united to the species would eat sacramentally, which will be denied below in the Letter. If, however, a natural union is required in addition, that is, an agreement according to nature by which one can be united and understand, it seems that anyone, even an unbeliever, receives the body of Christ sacramentally; which does not seem true, since thus it would be turned into a mockery by Jews and Pagans.

§ 2. Furthermore, in other sacraments, one who believes nothing, and protests that he believes nothing, nor wishes to receive what the faithful receive, perceives nothing at all: therefore much more does this hold in this one in which the whole is owed to faith: therefore it seems that one believing nothing, even though he has a nature ordered to faith, perceives nothing, neither sacramentally nor spiritually. But if it suffices to have unformed faith: then the inconveniences maintained above follow, namely that from the beginning of the world the body of Christ was received.

§ 3. Furthermore, it seems that having Christ abiding in oneself is not the effect of the sacrament, but of virtue: for so He says concerning one who loves Him: "My Father will love him, and we will come to him, and will make our abode with him." Therefore, to abide in Him is not to eat spiritually, as it seems.

SOLUTION. It must be said that if spiritual eating is taken strictly according to the distinction posited above, then to abide in Christ is to abide in Him through charity and devotion proceeding from the communication of the body of Christ according to act or according to purpose and desire.

And according to this it must be said to the first, that for sacramental eating more is required than the union of the body to the sacramental species, and more than the union or conformity of a nature capable of understanding the signification of the species: and I think that unformed faith is required, as the objection proves: nevertheless I do not deny but that the true body of Christ is there, as long as the species remain, and yet that person does not receive or eat: because to receive and to eat express the union and incorporation of the eater to the food which is received: and this in no way occurs in an unbeliever.

To that, however, which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although the ancients believed in Him who was to come and be incarnate, nevertheless, properly speaking, they did not receive spiritually: because to receive expresses the refreshment of the desire and the purpose of communicating, which the ancients did not have, since the sacrament did not yet exist.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Body Of Christ, Once Received, Passes Into The Stomach, And How Long It Remains

Does the received body of Christ pass into the stomach? and how long does it remain?

Does the received body of Christ pass into the stomach? and how long does it remain?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says there, at A, near the middle: "Why do you prepare a tooth, and a stomach? Believe, and you have eaten," etc.

For from this it seems that: § 1. This food passes into the stomach: which also seems from this which is held:[405] "Whatever enters into the mouth, goes into the stomach, and is cast out into the privy," which is unworthy and wicked to think concerning the body of Christ.

§ 2. Moreover, as bodily food is related to the body, so spiritual food is related to the spirit: but bodily food by entering into the body, refreshes it: therefore spiritual food by entering the spirit, refreshes it, and thus does not enter into the stomach.

§ 3. Moreover, what enters the stomach, goes to the offices of the stomach, which are to digest, and to transmute: but this does not happen concerning the body of Christ: therefore the body of Christ does not enter into the stomach.

But against this there seem to be authorities and reasons.

§ 1. For Pope Clement says, and it is posited in the Decretals in the treatise on consecration, thus: "Let those who consume the remains of the Lord's body which are left in the sacrament, not immediately convene to receive common foods, nor let them think that food which is digested and emitted through the privy is mixed with the holy portion." But there would be no reason why he should command them to abstain for a time, unless the host were cast into the stomach: therefore it goes into the stomach.

§ 2. Moreover, in the same place, Clement: "If the Lord's portion is eaten in the morning, let the ministers who have received it fast until the sixth hour: if they have received it at the third or fourth hour, let them fast until evening, so that the sacraments may be kept holy by sanctification." And from this the same is gathered as before.

§ 3. Moreover, in the same place, Bede: "If anyone through voracity or drunkenness vomits the Eucharist, let him do penance for forty days: clerics, or monks, deacons, or presbyters, seventy." This again would be said without reason, if it did not pass into the stomach.

§ 4. Moreover, Hugh of St. Victor: "As long as the bodily sense is affected, the bodily presence is not removed." But the species in which the bodily sense is visibly affected passes through the mouth into the stomach: and thus if vomiting occurs, sometimes the host or a part of it is found, and thus this food passes into the stomach.

§ 5. Moreover, it passes either into the stomach, or into the mind. If into the stomach, the proposition is held. If into the mind. On the contrary: Nothing flows into the soul except God the Trinity: the body of Christ is not God the Trinity: therefore it does not pass into the soul: therefore it seems that nothing remains except that it passes into the stomach.

Next to this it is further inquired, How long does the body of Christ remain?

For some have said that it immediately flies away from the mouth: but if this were true, since the body of Christ is not under the form of bread except from consecration, if someone removed the host from the mouth, the body of Christ would not be there: and this is not said by the Masters.

Moreover, Hugh holds that the bodily presence remains as long as the sense is affected: but the sense is affected in the vomited matter: therefore the bodily presence is in it.

Whether, however, it nourishes the soul, or not, will be a question below.

SOLUTION. Without prejudice, it seems to me that a distinction must be made in this question: for something is said to pass into the stomach in two ways, and it is said to pass into the mind in two ways. For something is said to pass into the stomach, passing to the act of the organs of the stomach: namely so that it may be digested in the stomach, and through the mesenteric veins be drawn to the liver, and there be formed into blood, and be distributed in the members, and be assimilated, and be united: and in this way the body of Christ does not pass into the stomach: for this passing is of bodily food, for restoring the loss of the body. It is also said to pass into the stomach: because it passes into it, as into any place of its containment: and thus it seems to me that the body of Christ passes into the stomach: because I do not see reasonably how the body of Christ does not pass to every place to which the species of bread and wine pass, under which according to the truth of the reality the whole Christ is contained. In the same way it seems it must also be said, that something passes into the mind in two ways, namely that it flows in by its substance: and thus only God the Trinity passes into the mind. In another way it is said to pass into the mind, that whose effect comes into the mind by information by perfecting the mind itself: and in this way the body of Christ passes into the mind by working sacramental grace in the mind.

And through this the solution to all the objections is evident: because the first part of the objections proceeds concerning the first passing into the stomach, which does not belong to the body of Christ. But the second part proceeds concerning the second passing: and in this way it passes into the stomach, as it seems to me. And I say this without prejudice: because some Masters say the opposite. Whence on account of reverence for the sacrament, penance is enjoined upon those who vomit the Eucharist through carelessness. And it is commanded, that after communion they fast for a little while, lest they seem to mix sacramental food with bodily.

405. Matt. 15:17.

To that which is further inquired, it must be said that Hugh says, "As long as the sense is affected," that is, as long as the species are able to be discerned, "the bodily presence is not removed," and for so long is Christ there. However, some have said otherwise: but their reason is not probable.

Articulus 6 — Whether The Ancient Fathers In Some Way Ate Sacramentally

Did the ancient Fathers in any way eat sacramentally?

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says there, at A, near the end: "Because he is not deprived of the benefit of that sacrament, when he to have," etc.

For here it is inquired, whether the ancient Fathers ate sacramentally in any way.

But it seems that they did: because § 1. Augustine says in the Letter: "Believe, and you have eaten." But they believed: because, as the same Augustine says, the faith of the ancients and of the moderns was and is the same. But the times have varied, while faith has remained unchanged. Therefore they ate.

§ 2. Moreover:[406] "They all ate the same spiritual food, and they all drank the same spiritual drink (and they drank of the spiritual rock that followed them)." Therefore at least they understood spiritually.

§ 3. Moreover, the Gloss, in the same place: "Because they understood the visible spiritually, they hungered spiritually, they tasted spiritually, so that they might be satisfied spiritually." Therefore it seems that they ate in the sacrament, which nevertheless they understood spiritually.

§ 4. Moreover, the Apostle says,[407] that "all were baptized in Moses, in the cloud and in the sea," etc. In the same way both in spiritual food, and drink they spiritually ate the Eucharist, and communicated in the body and blood of Christ.

§ 5. Moreover, to eat sacramentally nothing is required except the presence of a sign, which besides the species which it ingests into the senses, makes something else come into knowledge: and that this may be understood, the ancient Fathers had such a twofold sign, namely the flesh of the lamb, and the manna: therefore it seems that since they understood, as the aforementioned Gloss says, that they themselves ate sacramentally and spiritually.

ON THE CONTRARY: Nothing is received in the sacrament except what is contained in the sacrament: but Christ was not contained in their sacraments: therefore He was not received in the sacrament.

If you say, that He was contained, as the signified in the sign, and not as the caused in the cause? On the contrary: A reality signified and not caused is not perceived in the sacrament: Christ was signified, and not contained in the sacraments of the ancients: therefore He was not perceived in their sacraments.

Moreover, it is proved from this that baptism signifies washing from all punishment through glory in the Resurrection: and yet this is not perceived in baptism: and thus concerning the other sacraments of the old and the new law.

SOLUTION. Without prejudice it seems to me that one must not recede from the higher opinion, that properly speaking the ancient Fathers ate neither sacramentally nor spiritually: and this especially on account of the reason stated above: which is, that the mode of perceiving whatever reality, follows the existence of that reality in itself, and does not precede it: since therefore it is certain that that sacrament did not exist, except from when Christ gave His body to the disciples: it seems to me, that before this no one ate neither sacramentally nor spiritually, properly speaking, unless to eat spiritually is taken broadly, as was determined above.

To that therefore which is objected first, it must be said that if Augustine is speaking properly, he does not understand concerning faith according to just any motion, but according to that by which it is moved from a sign remembered or actually perceived to the signified and contained with the purpose and desire of tasting according to the reality, incorporating oneself to the reality contained: and this is not fitting except after the existence of this sacrament.

To the next it must be said that the Apostle calls spiritual taste, spiritual senses in the Scriptures, and the drink of wisdom in which they understood the future.

To the next it must be said that that Gloss speaks of a sacrament not containing the reality: just as it is equivocally called a sacrament, as was held in the beginning of this book. Whence there was not there a taste of a present reality in a containing sign, or proposed, but in faith alone: and this in my judgment does not suffice properly speaking.

To the next it must be said that neither were they baptized properly speaking: but he calls them baptized, because in the figure of baptism they understood something of the efficacy of the future baptism, and through devotion they perceived the remission of sins, and not from the power of the sacrament. And similarly it seems it must be conceded, that they ate, that is, in the type of the Eucharist they understood the future sacrament, and from devotion they were united to the head Christ and the members: but this does not suffice: because in the New Testament in those perceiving the sacrament, the sacrament makes that union from the power of the reality contained (otherwise, operated) and not only from the devotion of those perceiving.

To the next it must be said that this is true, that to eat sacramentally the presence of a sign suffices with faith directing to the signified: but this sign is signifying and causing and containing: but such signs were not in the Old Testament: and therefore they did not perceive the sacrament properly speaking.

Divisio Textus

Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, "These words and others of this kind," etc. For the Master touches upon two errors, the first of which he determines in this distinction, but the rest in the following distinction, which begins there, Dist. X, A, "There are also others transcending the madness of the preceding," etc.

The first is, that the wicked do not receive the body of Christ: and he destroys this in the Letter, and solves the authorities providing an occasion for erring, as is evident in the Letter.

However, five things are usefully inquired here: of which the first is, whether the wicked receive anything when approaching the body of Christ? and this is the question of the Letter. Second, whether they receive to their damnation, or without sin? Third, whether the wicked receiving the Eucharist sin more by receiving the body of the Lord, than by sinning by another sin? Fourth, whether one polluted by nocturnal pollution, or sleeping with his own wife, can receive the body of Christ? Fifth and lastly, whether bodily uncleanness, such as menstruation or flux of seed, impedes from the reception of the body of Christ, as some seem to say?

Articulus 7 — Whether The Wicked Who Approach Receive Anything Of The Body Of Christ, And How The Body Of Christ Remains In Them

Do the wicked approaching, receive anything of the body of Christ? and, How does the body of Christ remain in them?

To the first of these it is objected thus: § 1. The disconvenience of Christ to sin is greater than to the body: but He does not pass into the body, as was held above: therefore He does not pass into the sinful soul: therefore he perceives nothing in the sacrament: because He immediately flies away, as some say.

§ 2. Moreover:[408] "The holy spirit of discipline will flee the feigned": but Christ is not of lesser holiness than the Holy Spirit: therefore Christ also will flee him: therefore the wicked perceives nothing of Christ in the sacrament.

§ 3. Moreover:[409] "Wisdom will not enter into a malicious soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sins." Therefore Christ remains neither in the body nor in the soul of the sinner: therefore He departs from both: therefore he perceives nothing when he approaches.

§ 4. Moreover, the reality of this sacrament exceeds the reality of the other sacraments, as is said in the Letter, because here the whole Christ is received and in other sacraments He is perceived according to the effect of grace: therefore it seems less likely that the realities of other sacraments should depart from a sinner, than the reality of this sacrament: and they do depart, because he perceives nothing of the reality of the other sacraments: therefore He also departs from this one: therefore nothing is perceived by the wicked except only the exterior species.

§ 5. Moreover, an unseemly and harmful work is not the work of a wise man: but it is unseemly for a wise man to be in a place not competent for him: therefore it is also harmful if his presence harms and does not profit: if therefore a wise man does not do this, much less does the most wise Lord Jesus Christ do this: but the most unseemly place is the sinner, and again His presence would harm him who perceives: therefore it seems that He withdraws Himself, and is not perceived by the sinner.

§ 6. Moreover, what is given for the deletion of sin ought not to increase sin: but the reception of Christ in the sacrament was invented for the deletion of sin: therefore it will not increase it: but it would increase it if He remained: therefore it seems that Christ does not remain in the species when they are perceived by a sinner.

§ 7. Moreover, the disconvenience of Christ to an irrational creature which He Himself created is less than to a sinner: but we do not say that a brute perceives Him in the sacrament: therefore much less does the sinner perceive Him in the sacrament.

§ 8. Moreover:[410] "But to the sinner God has said: Why do you declare my justices? and take my testament in your mouth?" But the praise of Christ is less than Christ Himself. If therefore He takes away His praise from the mouth of the sinner, much more does He take away Himself.

§ 9. Moreover, it is said,[411] that he who against the precept of the Lord gathered manna on a day not due, or in a quantity not due, it putrefied and swarmed with worms: therefore much more will this be true of the sacrament of the Eucharist, which is of incomparably greater holiness: therefore he who receives unworthily, has received nothing: just as he who received putrid manna or swarming with worms, did not receive manna.

Truly these reasons and similar ones occasioned the error which is introduced in the Letter, and the authorities which the Master appends and expounds.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Hugh says, that as long as the bodily sense is affected, the bodily presence is not removed: but in the mouth of the sinner the bodily sense is affected, the species remaining: therefore the bodily presence is not removed.

§ 2. Moreover, if God flees the sin of the receiver, then much more does He flee the sin of the maker and consecrator: therefore according to this wicked priests could not confect the body of Christ, which is false.

§ 3. Moreover, since no one knows whether he is worthy of hatred or love, no one would know according to this whether he perceived the sacrament or not: and thus the greatest doubt would be generated concerning that which is principal in faith, which is foolish to say.

§ 4. Moreover, what would be the reason that He should recede? for the sin of the receiver does not fall upon Christ, and there is no other cause: therefore He does not fly away from the species, as some have said less cautiously sometimes.

SOLUTION. Without any ambiguity it must be held and felt that the wicked receive in the sacrament the true body of Christ, which He drew from the Virgin, and which hung on the cross, and He does not fly away unless when nothing more of the species of bread and wine remains, but when the whole has passed into another humor which was in the species, namely color, taste, quantity, and so on for the others: for then the sense which was affected by the species ceases, and then the bodily presence ceases, as Hugh says.

406. 1 Cor. 10:3-4.

To the first therefore it must be said that Christ does not pass from the body of the receiver, but He does not pass into the body. For it is one thing to pass from the body, and another to pass into the body: and I well concede that He does not pass into the soul through grace, yet there is the presence of Him in the sacrament: as long as the sacramental species are in the body of the receiver.

To the next it must be said that Christ flees the feigned as regards indwelling through grace, and so that word is understood: but on account of the efficacy of the sacrament He does not flee the sacrament in whatever place it may be, because the sacrament always retains its own holiness, and the uncleanness of the place in which the sacrament is, does not abolish it.

To the next it must be said that this also is understood regarding indwelling grace, and not of the withdrawal of Christ from the species of the sacrament.

To the next it must be said that the reality of this sacrament exceeds the reality of the others: yet it is not similar: because the place of the reality of the other sacraments is the soul of the receiver: and therefore the reality does not come to be in a soul having contrariety to the reality of the other sacraments: but the place of the reality of this sacrament is not in the soul, but rather the sacramental species: and therefore, as long as those forms remain, wherever they may be, Christ is in them. However, this sacrament also has another reality, as was said above: and this is not in the sinner, because that is grace.

To the next it must be said that that is not unseemly nor harmful except accidentally:

it is not unseemly: because it has already been shown that the place of Christ is not the soul of the sinner, but the species of the most holy symbols in which Christ is perceived: but that the species be in this place or in that, comes about from the ordination of the use of the sacrament, which is available to all. And in this the great benignity of the Lord is considered, commonly granting His sacrament to all for use. But that it harms, this is accidentally, insofar as someone provides to himself the cause of harm: just as is also the case concerning bodily food, which is taken for utility: but if after taking food he takes something which does not permit the food to be digested or emitted, the food putrefies, and the body is harmed.

To the next it must be said that the sacrament of itself always avails against sin: and if it harms, this is from the cause of the receiver, as has already been said.

To the next it must be said that according to something there is greater convenience in that proportion, according to something it is less. For if nature is compared to nature, the convenience of a sinful man with God, and with the sacraments, is greater than that of a brute: because a brute in the sacramental signs suspects or perceives nothing, nor understands: but a man, even a sinner, is moved at least by reason and faith from the sign to the signified. But if the unsuitability which is on the part of sin is attended to, then the disconvenience is greater:

408. Ps. 49:16.

but this does not impede, because it does not reach to Christ, whose proper place is not the soul of the receiver in sin, but rather the sacramental species: but it well impedes the effect of grace, because the place of grace is the soul, which informed by sin is not susceptible to grace.

To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning praise and the body of Christ in the sacrament: because since praise is the proclamation of some virtue, it is something of ours: for the act of proclamation is elicited by free choice: and on that part it can be foul in the mouth of a sinner: but concerning the sacrament nothing is ours, but the whole is of divine power: and therefore it is taken away by no one, but the use is given to all in common: but let them see for themselves how they use it.

To the last it must be said that the manna did not contain Christ: whence the putrefaction of the manna signifies the harm which we do to ourselves, by receiving the Eucharist unworthily, and does not signify the corruption of Christ.

Articulus 8 — Whether The Wicked Receive The Body Of Christ

Do the wicked perceive the body of Christ?

Secondly it is inquired, whether the wicked perceive the body of Christ to their damnation?

But it seems that they do not: § 1. For let us posit, that someone is in mortal sin, and is ignorant of it, for this is possible. Thence I proceed thus: One ignorant of his disease is less disposed to health, than one knowing his disease: therefore from what the ignorant is not prohibited, from the same much more the knowing is not prohibited: but one existing ignorantly in mortal sin is not prohibited: therefore neither ought one existing knowingly in sin be prohibited from the body of Christ.

§ 2. Moreover, the Gloss on the epistle to the Romans:[412] "You sin most gravely, because you are ignorant." Therefore ignorance rather works toward the aggravation of sin, than toward medicine: therefore again, from what the ignorant is kept away, the knowing ought not to be kept away.

§ 3. Moreover, given even that ignorance excuses from so much, and not from the whole, as is said by all, and knowledge aggravates: knowledge and ignorance will not relate to sin except as circumstances: therefore through them sin will not distance itself from sin into infinity, as venial and mortal differ. If therefore in some case the ignorant is not kept away from communion, the knowing ought not to be prohibited in the same sin, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, the same thing seems to be concluded in another way: because the more someone is ill, the more he needs medicine, and on account of the infirmity of the body he is not kept away from medicine: therefore it happens similarly concerning spiritual medicine; the one more sick in sin especially ought to use medicine: therefore he especially ought to use communion, in which a similar medicine is contained.

§ 5. Also, Augustine makes a division of goods, namely into the highest, by which one lives rightly, and which no one uses badly; and into middle goods, without which one cannot live rightly, but which one can use badly; and into lowest goods, without which one can live rightly, but which one can use well. And he gives virtues as the example of the first, the powers of the rational soul as the second, and the species of any bodies as the third. Since the body of Christ cannot be anything but among the highest goods, because it is not inferior to any created good, it seems that no one can use the body of Christ badly: therefore neither can a sinner. But that which someone uses well, by that he does not sin: therefore a sinner does not sin by consuming the body of Christ.

§ 6. Also, the divinity of Christ is greater than His body or His humanity: but one is not prohibited from approaching the deity, but rather is admonished to do so; nor does the deity withdraw itself from him, but rather it contains him, and is in him, as before, essentially, presentially, and potentially: therefore it seems that much less should he be kept away from the communion of the body and blood of Christ.

§ 7. Also, if on account of sin someone is kept away from communion, then it seems to follow that in no way should a man be permitted to communicate: because as it is said in Ecclesiastes 9:1: Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred. Therefore he doubts: but one who doubts ought not to commit himself to danger: therefore he ought not to communicate, which no one says: therefore neither should any sinner be kept away from communion.

§ 8. Also, it is objected to the same point in another way thus: He who approaches unworthily (indigne), approaches as one who is unworthy (indignus), and it is not converted [i.e., the reverse is not necessarily true]. Therefore, to approach as unworthy follows upon approaching unworthily. But in such things an accident which follows upon the antecedent follows upon the consequent, especially in individual accidents: just as if a man is white, the animal is white: therefore if one approaching unworthily sins mortally, then one approaching as unworthy sins mortally. But this is false: because according to this, one ignorantly approaching in mortal sin sins mortally. Therefore this is also false, that one approaching unworthily sins mortally.

§ 9. Also, what is white and not appearing so more truly participates in whiteness than what appears white and is not so: but one believing himself to be in mortal sin but not being so, and one being in sin but not believing himself to be so, are related just as what is truly white but not appearing so, and what appears white but is not so. Therefore since it is more true of the one being in sin and not believing it, than of the one believing it and not being it: and since the one being in sin and not believing is not kept away, it seems that the one believing and not being so ought not to be kept away. And thus no one by approaching becomes unworthy: and thus no one should be kept away, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. He who approaches unworthily approaches as unworthy, but it is not converted. Therefore the consequent is verified with the opposite of the antecedent:

410. Ps. 49:16.

therefore someone approaches as unworthy, and not unworthily. But this cannot be unless one does not have consciousness of sin, and yet is in sin: therefore such a one is not to be kept away from communion, although one approaching unworthily is to be kept away.

§ 2. Also, he would sin gravely who threw the body of Christ into mud. Therefore, since spiritual mud is viler than corporeal mud, he sins much more who throws it into a spiritual latrine than a corporeal one. But a spiritual latrine is a sinner who is not penitent: therefore such a one sins by receiving the Eucharist.

§ 3. Also, one who is knowingly in mortal sin, and not penitent, is also prohibited from contact with the altar: therefore much more is he to be kept away from the communion of the body and blood of the Lord.

§ 4. Also, it is said of Judas in John 13:27 [413] that he was in the resolution to sin, and after the morsel, Satan entered into him. Therefore, communion increased the sin in him: therefore he ought not to communicate.

§ 5. Also, Luke 18:13 [414] praises the publican because he did not even wish to lift his eyes to heaven: therefore he would be praised much more if he did not communicate: because the body of Christ is of infinitely greater dignity than heaven. And yet that publican was penitent: therefore much more should an impenitent sinner withdraw himself from communion.

Alongside this, it is further asked concerning one whose sin is occult, and who does not have the grace to resolve to leave it, whether he ought to communicate at Easter?

It seems that he should: because § 1. Since there is a precept for all the faithful to communicate, then this man is also bound to make a confession and communicate, and he scandalizes the Church if he does not communicate. But he is bound not to scandalize: therefore he is bound to communicate, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, if he does not communicate, his sin is thereby betrayed, and he is rendered infamous. But Jerome says that he is cruel who neglects his reputation: therefore, since he cannot retain his reputation except by communicating, it seems that he ought to communicate.

§ 3. Also, one who has a non-notorious sin can preach if it is necessary, and perform certain other spiritual acts: therefore by a similar reason it seems that he can also communicate.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. The sin of Judas was not notorious [415], and yet it is said that after the morsel, Satan entered into him. Therefore one communicating in occult sin sins mortally, as it seems.

§ 2. Also, 1 Corinthians 10:21: You cannot be partakers of the table of the Lord and of the table of demons [416]. But an occult sinner is a partaker of the table of demons. Therefore he ought not to partake of the table of the Lord.

SOLUTION. It must be said that one existing in mortal sin knowingly ought not to communicate for any reason, even if he were compelled by excommunication: because he is unworthy and approaches unworthily, like Judas. And this is sufficiently confirmed from two passages in 1 Corinthians 11, where in one place it says: For he who eats and drinks unworthily, eats and drinks judgment to himself [417]. And in another place, verse 27, it says: He shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord [418]. And the Gloss distinguishes a threefold unworthiness there, namely that one is unworthy who does not believe; or who celebrates sacramentally otherwise than it was instituted; or who approaches without devotion.

And the number of these unworthinesses is taken thus: There are two things which make one worthy, and a third is the effect of both. The first is faith, which is the foundation of the spiritual edifice: and from the privation of this is taken the first unworthiness. The second is operative charity which fulfills the law. Romans 13:10: Love is the fulfilling of the law [419]. And from the privation of this is taken the third unworthiness, which is when someone approaches without devotion: for here "lack of devotion" posits the remorse of conscience from a sin existing or believed to be in the conscience, with the resolution of not departing from that sin. The third, which is the effect of both, is union and consensus with the mystical body of Christ: for he who communicates is held in common, and from the communion of the Head he receives refreshment: and from the privation of this is taken the second unworthiness, which is in schismatics, who do not observe the rite established for celebrating the sacraments by the Lord and by the Church.

These things being held, It must be said to the first that ignorance is twofold, as was said in the second book of the Sentences, universal, and parti-cular, or of law and of fact. But particular ignorance excuses completely, and such is the case in one who perceives that he has sinned, recounting his years in the bitterness of his soul [420], and something has remained forgotten which perhaps if he recalled he would not dismiss. But the objection proceeds concerning ignorance of the law, and therefore it is invalid. Or it may be better said that although an ignorant person existing in sin is less disposed to health, he is nevertheless more suitable for the act of communicating, because he does not show contempt; but one who believes himself to be [in sin] shows contempt, and therefore by this very fact is rendered unworthy.

To the next it must be said that one who is ignorant sins most gravely, that is, most dangerously, because he does not seek a physician. The contempt is not equal, because in the ignorant person there is none, but in the one who opines [he is in sin] there is great contempt.

To the next it must be said that knowledge and ignorance considered in themselves do not make this difference in sins: but rather the contempt adjoined to knowledge, which is a new genus of sin: and therefore this is not attributed to knowledge except per accidens.

To the next it must be said that even that in the simile is false: because the force of the disease can be so great that a purgative medicine is not given, but he is only preserved from all things harmful to nature, and is comforted to sustain the fight of the disease. And so it is done to the sinner: for the sinner is counseled to abstain from all sins, or at least from some, and in the meantime to do whatever good he can, so that God may illuminate his heart.

412. Isa. 38:15.

Moreover, even if it were so concerning bodily disease, it would not necessarily be entirely so concerning spiritual disease: because medicine does not relate entirely to spiritual disease as it relates to bodily disease. And this has been determined from the beginning of the book: because spiritual medicine operates only by the will, whereas bodily medicine operates by necessity with nature. And therefore by receiving bodily medicine, if it is good and rightly given, one does not fall into another genus of disease. But by receiving spiritual medicine, since the will is free and can show contempt through lack of devotion in preparation, one can fall into a new genus of sin: and what is good in itself becomes evil to him, as Augustine says in the text of the same chapter.

To the next it must be said that although the body of Christ is a greater good than any created good, especially as it is in the sacrament (because it is there through the body, soul, and deity), nevertheless it does not follow that it relates to ordering the act of free choice in the same way as virtue does. Whence the fact that virtue is called the highest good must not be understood simply, but in comparison to the acts of a good life among those things which are called good by participation. That it is also called "that by which one lives rightly, and which no one uses badly" is not because it is the highest good, but because by informing free choice it orders and perfects it toward the good. And in this way Christ perceived in the sacrament does not inform free choice; and therefore the use of a good can be evil for us. And this does not prevent it from being a greater good than virtue.

To the next it must be said that the divinity of Christ is greater than the humanity of Christ; but there is no contempt with respect to the containing and presence of the deity within us, but rather it belongs to the penalty of the imperfection of created nature, which needs the Creator to contain and conserve it. But with respect to His humanity, we are ordered by a will which has liberty, and therefore it can show contempt.

To the next it must be said that this does not follow. For when it is said, Man does not know whether he is worthy of love or hatred [421], this is understood concerning right knowledge which is in-fallible through devotion. But when it speaks of one believing himself to be in mortal sin and not being so, "believing" is taken for one who has some signs and some reason by which he fears he is in sin. And therefore it is evident that it does not follow that on account of this every man ought to be kept away from communion.

To the next it must be said that when there is an agreement between antecedent and consequent, and afterwards an accident participated by the antecedent is inferred of the consequent, it is not necessary that the consequent participate in it except insofar as it is participated by the antecedent. For example, when it is said, "If a man is white, the animal is white," it does not follow that 'animal' is white in the scope of its commonality and predication, but rather the animal which is the white man. So it is also here when it is said, "He who approaches unworthily, approaches as unworthy," and afterwards it is inferred, "one approaching unworthily sins mortally: therefore also one approaching as unworthy." It is not necessary that this be true generally, but only for that unworthy person who, by approaching unworthily, was unworthy. Whence when the conclusion is subsequently inferred that the consequent is not generally true, therefore neither is the antecedent: it is evident that the argumentation is invalid. And such an argument—"an unworthy person made unworthy by approaching unworthily sins mortally: therefore similarly an unworthy person sins mortally"—commits a fallacy or error according to the sophistic topic of the consequent.

To the last it must be said that this would follow well if another sin of new unworthiness were not caused by the fact that he approaches with the belief of sin: just as no whiteness is caused by the appearance of whiteness. But it is evident from what was held above that a new sin is caused: and therefore that argumentation is invalid.

To what is further asked, it must be said that one having remorse of conscience with the resolution of not forsaking his sin ought in no way to receive the Eucharist.

To that which is first objected to the contrary, it must be said that not communicating with such a resolution pertains to the truth of life, which is not to be forsaken on account of scandal.

But if it is objected that in such a state he is perplexed: it must be said that this is not true, because he can do otherwise to evade the sin, namely by grieving for the sin with the resolution of amending it. For if he does what is in his power, God will infuse grace into him, and then he can communicate.

To the next it must be said that he does not thereby betray himself: because there are many causes for which communion is deferred, or even by which someone withdraws himself from communion, namely bodily impurity, humility, and many other causes.

But if it is objected: Let us suppose that a prelate commands that all communicate. I say that such a precept is null, because it is openly illicit. But he can command that all prepare themselves for communion: and then it seems it must indeed be granted that he who has not prepared himself incurs a sin of omission.

To the next it must be said that it is not similar concerning other acts and the act of communion. For other acts are over the members of Christ which need diverse things which for the time can be supplied by those who are not suitable. But in communion the Lord Himself is received, and therefore the greatest suitability is required, and therefore an unsuitable person sins by communicating, as was said.

Articulus 9 — Whether A Wicked Person Sins More By Communicating Than By Another Kind Of Sin

Whether a bad person sins more by communicating than by another kind of sin?

Thirdly it is asked, Whether a bad person sins more by communicating than by sinning with another kind of sin?

413. Isa. 38:15.

It seems that he does: because § 1. The less the contempt, the less the sin. But in certain other sins God is not contemned in Himself, whereas by communicating [unworthily] He is contemned in Himself: therefore one sins more by communicating unworthily than by fornicating or by sinning in another genus of sin.

§ 2. Also, one who communicates unworthily sins knowingly, and without temptation and concupiscence: and these aggravate the sin. But another person sins sometimes knowingly, but tempted by concupiscence: therefore he sins more by communicating than by sinning in another genus of sin.

§ 3. Also, the Apostle compares this to a most grave sin, 1 Corinthians 11:27: Whosoever shall eat this bread, or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and of the blood of the Lord [422]. Therefore it seems that it is most grave.

§ 4. Also, Hebrews 10:28-29: A man making void the law of Moses dies without any mercy under two or three witnesses: how much more, do you think, he deserves worse punishments, who has trodden under foot the Son of God, and has esteemed the blood of the testament unclean, by which he was sanctified? [423] Therefore one communicating pollutedly deserves worse punishments: therefore it is the most grave sin, as it seems.

§ 5. Also, it is clear that one would sin more gravely who threw the body of Christ into unclean mud, than one who fornicates or commits avarice. Since, therefore, a spiritual latrine is more foul than a corporeal one, one sins more gravely by receiving the body of Christ into a spiritual latrine, than by throwing it into a corporeal latrine. But what is greater than the greater, is greater than the lesser: therefore one communicating pollutedly sins more gravely than by any other sin, as it seems.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. If there are two things, of which one makes one approach God, but the other removes one from God: and they are compared to two other things, of which both remove: the two remove more than the one. But in the communion which is made by an unworthy person, the communion itself does not separate from God, but joins; whereas the contempt separates. But in fornication or another sin of the body, both separate, both the act and the contempt: therefore it separates from God more than the communion of an unworthy person. But a greater sin is that which separates more from God. Therefore another sin is greater than the communion of an unworthy person.

If perhaps you say that this does not follow: because that one thing which causes distance in the one case causes a longer distance than the two in the other. ON THE CONTRARY: That which causes distance in the communion of an unworthy person is nothing but contempt. But contempt is also in another sin. Therefore contempt is in both in common: therefore, with the common element removed in both, whichever causes more distance will similarly cause more distance from God even when the contempt is added to both. But with the contempt removed, the other sin causes more distance: therefore similarly it causes more distance from God [when both have contempt], and thus the proposition is established.

414. Eccl. 9:1.

§ 2. Also, let us suppose that someone communicates unworthily, intending by this not to be completely alienated from God per se, but to become nearer to God: then it seems that he does not sin as much as he who fornicates or commits another crime.

§ 3. Also, there can be a case where even a sinner can take the body of the Lord into his hands, as if he finds it in the mud and there is no one else to lift it up: therefore it seems that there can also be some case in which one communicating does not sin, or does not sin as much as one sinning with another sin.

§ 4. Also, what is evil in itself is more to be avoided than what is evil by accident. But to fornicate and other sins which are against the Decalogue are evil in themselves, whereas to communicate is good in itself, but evil by accident. Therefore another sin is more to be avoided than communion by an unworthy person.

§ 5. Also, what is evil in itself is more to be avoided than what is evil for someone, and not in itself. But to fornicate and other such vices are evil in themselves, and for the doer, whereas communion is not evil in itself, but for the doer. Therefore fornication is more to be avoided than communion, as it seems: therefore some sins are greater than this one.

§ 6. Also, what is never and to no one good, but always and to everyone evil, is a greater evil than what is sometimes and to someone evil, and not always, nor to everyone. But fornication and the rest relate in this way to communion: therefore those are greater sins than this.

SOLUTION. It seems it must be said to this that in some respect one communicating unworthily sins more, and in some respect one sinning with another sin sins more. For as regards contempt it seems to me that one communicating unworthily sins more, but not as regards the act, and other circumstances, from which the foulness of sins is caused.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that when it is said, "Where there is less contempt, there is less sin," that this is not true simply, but only in a certain respect, namely the root of the sin which is contempt: for as regards other things, a sin that is from less contempt can be greater.

The same solution applies to almost all of them: because that again which is objected secondly does not hold except as regards whether one sins tempted or untempted.

To the next it must be said that the Apostle says that one communicating unworthily is guilty of the body and blood because he incurs the guilt of blood, but not that he has the guilt of one slaying Christ: but in this he is similar to a slayer, because each is made guilty of the blood of Christ.

To the next it must be said that this is not understood of those communicating unworthily, but rather of those abusing the grace of baptism: because they thought that when someone returned to sin, he needed to be baptized again. And this would redound to the pollution, that is, to the infirmity, of the blood of Christ, as of a sacrament in which the blood of Christ operates and washes interiorly, unless it were of such great power that it made even frequent sins remissible through penance: and so it is expounded in the Gloss. But if it is generally extended to one communicating unworthily, then it must be said that one communicating unworthily deserves worse punishments, insofar as he sins out of contempt against a greater grace than he who transgressed the law: yet it does not simply follow that he deserves worse punishments.

415. Emended from notorium, which contradicts the argument concerning occult sin.

To the next it must be said that when it is said, "A spiritual latrine is worse than a corporeal one," the expression is metaphorical. And it is understood not to be of greater corporeal foulness: but insofar as sins are against a greater good, they also take away a better good than corporeal foulness does. Hence there remains greater exterior purity in the body of a sinner than in a corporeal latrine: and therefore he would sin more by throwing the body of Christ into a latrine than by communicating unworthily, because he would do greater insult and contempt to Christ. And therefore the Master says in the Sentences that an argumentation from tropes is not valid.

The same mode of responding applies to those things which are objected to the contrary. For I readily grant that one thing can sometimes distance more than two or three. And as to what is objected, that contempt is common to both, it must be said that it is not the same contempt, but greater, and lesser, and diverse in species: because contempt is specified according to that which is contemned, and according to the reason for contemning.

To the next it must be said that one knowing himself to be in sin cannot communicate well: because the intention is perverse and foolish, as was said on the second book of the Sentences, concerning one who intends to steal in order to give to someone, so that by this he might recall her from prostitution or adultery.

To the next it must be said that it is not similar: because then reverence and the necessity of lifting it up excuses and compels it to be done. But in communicating there is no necessity, nor is any reverence exhibited there to Christ, but rather irreverence and contempt.

To the next it must be said that it does not hold except as regards this, and not simply: and therefore the argumentation is invalid in the other cases.

Articulus 10 — Whether Nocturnal Emission Impedes From Communion

Whether nocturnal pollution impedes from communion?

Fourthly it is asked, Whether nocturnal pollution impedes from communion?

And it seems that it does: § 1. For in the Decree (distinction 6), Gregory says in a letter to Augustine, Bishop of the English: If it is born in the mind of a sleeper from the shameful thought of one awake, his guilt is entirely evident: for let him see from what root that pollution proceeded: because what he thought knowingly, this he bore unknowingly. And on account of such pollution he ought to abstain from the sacred mystery on that day. [424] From this it is accepted that pollution impedes from communion.

416. 1 Cor. 10:21.

§ 2. Also, Isidore in the first book of the Sentences: He who is polluted by a nocturnal illusion, even if he feels himself polluted outside the memory of shameful thoughts: nevertheless let him attribute this to his own fault that he was tempted, and let him immediately bind his uncleanness with weeping. [425] But it is evident that a fault is not to be wept over and communion taken at the same time: therefore it seems that he ought to abstain from communion, as it seems.

§ 3. Also, Leviticus 15:2: The man that suffers an issue of seed, shall be unclean. [426] But it is evident that an issue of seed is less in the power of a man than nocturnal pollution. Therefore much more is the polluted man unclean: therefore it impedes from communion, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, ibid., below, v. 16: The man from whom the seed of copulation goes out, shall wash all his body with water: and he shall be unclean until evening. [427] But it is clear that the sacraments of the Old Law were of less holiness than the New. If therefore it impeded from the perception of a sacrament of the Old Testament, how much more will it impede from the perception of the sacraments of the New Testament.

§ 5. Also, Deuteronomy 23:12 et seq., the Lord commanded that those going out for the relief of nature should carry a spade on their belt, and dig, so that if the Lord passes through the camp, the camp may be clean. [428] And the Gloss there says that God loves corporeal purity. If therefore that impurity impedes the decorum of the Lord's transit, much more does it impede from the perception of the body and blood of the Lord.

§ 6. Also, it seems less that corporeal impurity should impede from entry into the tabernacle, which is less holy, than from the communion of the body and blood of the Lord. But it impeded in antiquity: therefore this also impedes now.

§ 7. Also, 2 Kings 6:6 [429], it is said that when the oxen that were drawing the ark of the Lord kicked, Oza stretched out his hand to hold the ark, and the Lord struck Oza. And the reason is given in the Gloss and by the Masters, that he had slept with his wife that night. Since therefore he could do this meritoriously, whereas pollution is never done meritoriously, it seems that pollution much more impedes the communion of that which is signified by the ark, namely the body and blood of the Lord.

§ 8. Also, Gregory says that at the time of matrimonial intercourse, the Holy Spirit did not touch the hearts of the Prophets, on account of the inconvenience to a spiritual act of the act in which the whole man is made flesh. Therefore, since communion is much greater than prophecy, it seems that that delectation which is in the egress of seed impedes from communion.

§ 9. Also, union through spirit and love with Christ, and descent according to the flesh through delectation, are contraries: therefore they ought not to be together. But in pollution there is a descent according to the flesh through ultimate delectation, while in communion there is an elevation of the intellect through faith, and a union of the spirit through charity. Therefore these two do not comport with each other: therefore it seems that communion is to be forsaken on account of pollution.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Gregory says to Bishop Augustine, and it is posited in the Decree (dist. 6): And indeed when it happens from the superfluity or infirmity of nature, then pollution is not to be feared at all: because the mind, having unknowingly borne this, is rather to be grieved for than to have done it. [430] Therefore pollution does not always impede from communion.

§ 2. Also, Gregory, ibid., When the appetite of gluttony is taken beyond measure in consuming foods, and thereby the receptacles of the humors are burdened, the mind indeed has some guilt from this, but not unto the prohibition of perceiving the sacred mystery, or of celebrating the solemnities of the Mass. [431] From this it is clear that sometimes it even proceeds from some fault of gluttony, which does not impede from sacred communion.

§ 3. Also, nothing impedes from sacred communion except pretense, because the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the deceitful therefore in the sacraments He does not flee except the deceitful, as is said, Wisdom 1:5. But venial sins do not make one deceitful: therefore even if it is granted that he is polluted from some preceding shameful thought which was not mortal, it still does not follow that he cannot communicate.

§ 4. Also, if venial sins impeded, there would be no one who could communicate: because, 1 John 1:8, it is said: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. [432] Since therefore pollution proceeds from a venial thought, it does not impede from communion.

§ 5. Also, Gregory says that spiritual sins are of greater weight, although carnal sins are of greater infamy. But spiritual venial sins do not impede from communion: therefore neither do carnal ones. Therefore pollution does not impede, since it is not a sin, or it is a minimal one: because it is not the place here to define whether it is a sin or not.

§ 6. Also, someone goes to bed fortified by the sign of the holy cross with the devotion of prayer, and so on for other things: yet pollution happens to him. Since therefore no one sins while sleeping, he has nothing from which he should be impeded from communion: therefore he can communicate, as it seems.

ALONGSIDE this it is further asked, How long ought he to abstain?

It is said, Leviticus 15:16, that he shall be unclean until evening. But between evening and morning there are only twelve equal hours: therefore it seems that after twelve hours he could communicate. And yet this is not observed, because he abstains for a day and a night.

SOLUTION. It must be said with blessed Gregory that pollution happens from many causes, which must be treated elsewhere, namely from the infirmity of nature in retaining or converting into members: and in this way it is no sin, nor the sign of a sin. It also happens from diabolical illusion, and then it is a sign of negligence, namely that the man went to sleep not sufficiently devout. Sometimes it is also from excessive repletion, especially of foods which provoke venereal acts, such as hot and moist things together: because the hot moves, and the moist ministers the matter. And then it seems to me a distinction must be made regarding accidents in the engorged person: for either this happens to a starving man by surprise, or it happens because he prepared eats sumptuously, and is accustomed to feast splendidly. And in the first way, the subsequent pollution indicates nothing but negligence from the surreption of overindulgence: in the second way, it indicates a sin. In another way, a pollution becomes a sin from thought, namely when someone thinks about a certain woman singularly, and afterwards dreams that he copulates with her: and then it is a sign of fixed preceding thought upon a shameful thing. But sometimes it arises from the conjunction of several causes at once, as from thought and overindulgence: and then it signifies both. Sometimes from thought and illusion: and then it is a sign of the sin on account of which he merited that. But sometimes it arises simultaneously from overindulgence, thought, and illusion: and then the two preceding causes are meritorious of the third, and this whole thing is shown in the subsequent pollution, just as a hidden cause arises in a manifest subsequent effect.

And again a distinction must be made regarding the mode of pollution, which Gregory mentions in the previously cited Epistle, where he says that what comes from overindulgence does not impede communion, provided that the body is not shaken by shameful delight in the pollution. For from this it is understood that some are polluted with shameful imagination and delight: but others only through the emission of semen. But according to the Philosopher, a further distinction must be made among those who experience delight: because sometimes it is from flatulent foods, and in the delight a flatulent froth is emitted rather than a humor of nourishment.

With these things thus distinguished, I think that with Gregory one should say thus: that in the first and second cases it does not impede from communion: but if he humbly omits it on account of foulness, he is to be praised. In the third mode, however, if it is from a surreption and from rather flatulent foods, as legumes are, I do not think he is impeded: but in the fourth mode, and successively in the fifth and sixth, I think he must abstain from communion, on account of the doubt of lingering delight in the preceding thought.

As for the fourth distinction which Gregory posits, namely regarding the mode of pollution, it seems that it must be said that pollution rarely and in few cases occurs without a shameful imagination: and this is clear enough to anyone who inspects it according to the Philosopher's book On Sleep and Waking: because he maintains that certain dreams are signs, while others have their cause in the body. Hence the mode and cause of an illness are also recognized in dreams: but since that cause is a moving one, and the acts of active things are in a predisposed patient, as the Philosopher says in Book II of On the Soul, and this according to the power of the patient and not according to the power of the agent, these causes are in the sensible soul which has a colligation with the organs in which the moving cause toward copulation resides, and the matter through the mode of images pertaining to copulation: and therefore that imagination sometimes occurs in dreams without a preceding fault. And therefore, when Gregory says it is from a preceding fault, or thought, I think it must be understood by way of a sign: for the sign is the subsequent delight, that he meditated on such things while awake: hence it does not seem to me that the shaking always impedes from communion.

Having established these things, we must respond to the objections.

To the first, therefore, it must be said that Gregory is speaking of pollution arising from the fourth cause, or successively, as is manifest enough in the authority itself.

To another it must be said that Isidore does not bind one to abstain: because it is the mark of good minds to acknowledge a fault there where there is no fault.

To another it must be said that such things in the Old Testament, as is proven in the Gloss of Gregory and the Gloss of Hesychius on the same place, were spoken in a sign-bearing way: therefore this is expounded there concerning verbose persons, who always pollute the bed in which they rest with the guilt of a lie, of detraction, or of flattery.

To another it must be said that that law is understood of a man who is mixed with a woman in a fornicating concubinage, and therefore in the same chapter it is immediately added: The woman with whom he copulates shall be washed with water, and shall be unclean until evening[433], that is, she shall do penance until death.

To another it must be said that God loves cleanliness even of the body: but nevertheless all those things are also understood figuratively: because God is not defiled by bodily uncleanness, as it is said in Wisdom 7:25, because on account of her purity, nothing defiled incurs into her, namely wisdom. Although he therefore loves bodily cleanliness, insofar as it attests to the cleanliness of the spirit and to the love of spiritual beauty, nevertheless he does not reprobate us or bar us from the reception of the sacraments on account of the uncleannesses to which we are necessarily subject.

To another it must be said that all those things were figurative, and showing that one who communicates in Holy Things must be spiritually clean.

To another it must be said that perhaps Uzzah had known his wife out of lust, according to those who posit this as the cause: however, I think the literal sense is that, since he was of the Levites to whom it was commanded that the ark be carried on their own shoulders, he permitted what was entrusted to be put to the danger of transport by recalcitrant oxen, and therefore he was deservedly slain.

To another it must be said that a prophetic act has some deformity with the act of copulation: but nevertheless matrimony has that act. So also it is well conceded that there is a certain inconsonance from which they ought not to be simultaneously in act, but according to time, successively one after another sometimes: for I do not think that he prohibits it otherwise.

To another it must be said that it does not prove anything but a certain unfittingness: and he who abstains for a time from communion is to be praised, but nevertheless he is not barred by this, as I think, and thus Gregory seems to say.

420. Isa. 38:15.

To that which is further asked, How long one must abstain? I think the duration is for twenty-four hours in which a whole revolution is completed, except for a small amount because the sun in the meantime has receded backward. For a natural day is an equinoctial revolution with as much of a part as rises with the arc of the ecliptic: which motion of twenty-four hours the sun prescribes by its natural motion in setting through the signs. This arc, moreover, is about seventy minutes and eight seconds. Now, some give such a reason for this: because in that time every rising and setting of the images and stars of heaven occurs over the body for reordering: because although the heaven does not have power over free will, it nevertheless has power over the body to alter and contain it: and the Lord implies this in Leviticus 15:19, where he says: A woman who, when the month returns, suffers an issue of blood, etc. For blood flows when it cannot be digested: but it is not digested when heat is diminished: and heat is diminished as the light in the moon decreases.

Still, there is one more case to be asked, namely let us posit that someone comes to the place of celebration, and his conscience dictates to him probabiliter that the priest is in a bad state and will sin mortally by celebrating, and he himself has been polluted in the night without consciousness of a mortal cause, whether he ought to celebrate for him?

And to this it is answered in diverse ways. For some feel that he should not: because one ought not to sin even venially in order that another may avoid a mortal sin. But it seems to me that I would celebrate in such a case, having first had confession or compunction if a priest were lacking, and with some other prayer had beforehand with devotion.

Articulus 11 — Whether Some Bodily Foulness, Such As Menstruation Or The Like, Impedes The Reception Of The Body Of Christ

Whether any bodily foulness, such as menstruation or the like, impedes from the reception of the body of Christ?

Whether any bodily foulness, such as menstruation or the like, impedes from the reception of the body of Christ?

Fifthly it is asked, Whether any bodily foulness, such as menstruation or the like, impedes from the reception of the body of Christ?

And it seems that it does. § 1. Leviticus 15:19 and 20: A woman who, when the month returns, suffers an issue of blood, shall be separated for seven days. Everyone who touches her shall be unclean until evening, etc. Because it touches upon many things there concerning the uncleannesses of a menstruating woman. Therefore it seems that much more should it impede from the reception of the body of Christ, whose sanctity is greater than that of the old tabernacle, or of a man touching her.

§ 2. Again, the foulness of menstruation is greater than that of nocturnal pollution: therefore it ought much more to impede communion than nocturnal pollution: but nocturnal pollution sometimes impedes, as was held: therefore also the flux of menses.

421. Eccl. 9:1.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. That flux is from the infirmity or superfluity of humors: but neither of these is a sin: therefore it seems that neither does the uncleanness of menses impede from communion.

§ 2. Again, Gregory: A woman, while she suffers menstruation by custom, ought not to be prohibited from entering the Church: because the superfluity of nature cannot turn into a fault for her: and she cannot be prohibited from receiving the mystery of holy communion in those days. If, however, out of great veneration she does not presume to receive the mystery, she is to be praised: but if she does receive it, she is not to be judged: for it is the mark of good minds to acknowledge a fault there where there is no fault. From this it is manifestly grasped that the flux of menses is not an impediment to communion.

To this some wish to say that some women flow continuously, and in them the flux is from infirmity: but some flow intermittently, and those are curable, and they ought to wait concerning communion until after the flux, but the first ones not: and they render a reason for this: and Augustine seems to say that approach to a menstruating woman is not prohibited as a figure of some future thing, but even in itself it is a moral precept that copulation should not take place with a menstruating woman. Hence they say that menstruation bespeaks an uncleanness impeding from communion. Now Augustine's words are upon Leviticus 18:19, on that text: You shall not approach a woman who suffers menstruation, etc. For the Gloss says there thus: Since He had sufficiently prohibited these things above, what does He mean that He wished to add this also here to the same precepts? Was it perhaps lest what was said in the higher places be thought to be taken figuratively, it is also posited here, where such things are prohibited which even in the time of the New Testament, with the observation of the old shadows removed, must without doubt be guarded? However, without prejudice it seems to me it must be said that a woman is never to be prohibited from communion on account of menstruation, as Gregory says: because it is an indication of superfluity, or infirmity, and not of fault.

To that which is objected first, it must be said that in truth it was spoken figuratively concerning the uncleanness of a menstruating woman as to the entrance of the tabernacle, as it is expounded there in the Gloss: and therefore those arguments do not compel.

To the other which is objected concerning Augustine, it must be said that to approach a menstruating woman is a mortal sin: because the approach is ordained to conception: and if the woman conceives then, she conceives a corrupted offspring, such as elephantine [leprous], or leprous, as the Gloss says on Ezekiel 18:6, upon that text: He shall not approach a menstruating woman. And as to this, it is moral: but this was never moral, that she should be unclean for seven days, and be washed with water, and be outside the camp, and the like, which are determined in Leviticus 15:19 et seq.

422. 1 Cor. 11:27.

Articulus 12 — Whether One Receiving The Body Of Christ Unworthily Effects This, That What He Receives Becomes Evil

Whether one taking the body of Christ unworthily brings it about that what he receives becomes evil?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at B, around the middle: Behold, for evil is done, when a good thing is received badly, etc.

For he immediately says the contrary at the end of the same chapter: Whoever takes the body of Christ unworthily, does not bring it about that because he is evil, what he receives is evil.

Solution. It must be said that evil of itself is spoken of in multiple ways, namely formally, and thus the second authority is understood: because in this way the body of Christ cannot be evil, but is always good. Evil is also spoken of effectively: and this in two ways, namely as a cause per se, or as a cause per accidens: and in neither of these ways is the body of Christ said to be evil: because it is neither the cause of evil per se, nor per accidens. In a second way, the occasion of evil is called evil, just as the presence of light is called the occasion of injury to a weak eye: and so the body of Christ is good, and is an occasion of evil to him who receives it unworthily.

Articulus 13 — Whether The Priest Should Ask That Christ, Who Is Now Received Under The Species Of Bread, Be Received By Manifest Vision

Whether the priest asks that Christ, who is now received under the species of bread, be received in manifest vision?

Then it is asked concerning what he says there, at C, around the end: He asks that Christ, who is now truly received under the species of bread and wine, in manifest vision, etc.

This again seems false: because § 1. A sacrament will not have its reality (res) in the future: because in the future we do not need a viaticum: for then we will not be on the way, but in the homeland: therefore it seems that nothing has been said: because then he will be grasped by manifest vision, just as he is grasped now under the species of the sacrament.

§ 2. Again, to enjoy God through species in open vision is not an act of a sacrament or succeeding to a sacrament, but rather an act of beatitude succeeding to one or multiple virtues, as is determined in the first distinction of the first book of this volume: therefore it seems that in the prayers of the Church these two are unfittingly joined, that as now through the species of the sacrament, so at some time through the species of divinity in open vision we may grasp him.

§ 3. Again, now we grasp him by the taste of his body and blood: but then we will not grasp him thus, but through contemplation and fruition: therefore it seems that it is no prayer.

ON THE CONTRARY: In the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, Dionysius says that the reception of the most holy Eucharist is a symbol of the divine participation. Now it is established that he understands that divine participation which is through fruition in glory. Therefore it seems to succeed to sacramental eating and reception.

423. Heb. 10:28-29.

Solution. It must be said that this sacrament, just like the others, has a twofold reality (res): one which is contained and signified, and that it attains in the present, and this is proper to the sacrament: and concerning these realities of the sacraments it was often spoken of above. It has another which is signified and not contained: and because a sacrament is the cause of the reality which it contains, and it does not contain that reality, the consequence is that it also does not cause it: just as the reality of baptism is the shining of glory in the resurrection, and so on for the others. So it can be said here, that participation through the fruition of divinity in open vision is a reality signified, and not caused, nor contained in this sacrament, in the way that the fruit of the sweetness of glory in the taste of God is signified by the fruit: and the taste of spiritual sweetness in the sacrament in which Christ is the author of grace: and thus Dionysius understands it.

To the first therefore which is objected, it must be said that there is no need then for a viaticum, but there is the taste of felicity as an end, which is signified in the taste of the viaticum: just as those things which belong to the homeland are often signified by those things which belong to the way.

To another it must be said that it is the act of the sacrament as signifying, but it is not the act of the sacrament as causing it: just as even full glory in the dowries of the soul and the body is said to be the reality of baptism: and upon this the intention of the one praying is founded.

DISTINCTIO X

Divisio Textus

There are others of the preceding madness, etc.

In the previous sections the Master excluded the error of certain people saying that the body of Christ is not received by the wicked: which was an error of lesser unfittingness. Here, however, he touches upon an error of greater unfittingness, namely of those who deny that the body of Christ is on the altar.

Against this, first he introduces certain authorities of the Canon and of the Fathers, from which it had its origin: and secondly, he solves and determines them, there, at B, Which are all to be accepted from the same reason, etc. Thirdly, he posits the sophistical reasons by which they were deceived, and solves them, disproving their saying by authorities, there, at C, § 2: A sufficient response has been given to the heretics, and to the objections, etc.

And this is what he says up to the following part, in which he touches upon the mode of conversion.

424. Gratian, Decretum, dist. 6.

And through this the sentence is clear: and if anything is lacking, it will be manifested through disputation.

Articulus 1 — Whether The Body Of Christ Is Truly On The Altar, Or Only As Signed In A Sign

Whether the body of Christ is truly on the altar, or only as what is signified is in the sign?

Let this therefore be the first question concerning the error which the Master strives to strike down in the Letter, namely whether the body of Christ is on the altar, or not?

For it seems by many reasons that it is not: § 1. For whatever is immutable, discarding nothing, and receiving nothing, this does not come to be in any place through the conversion of something into it: the glorious body of Christ is immutable, discarding nothing, and receiving nothing: therefore it does not come to be in any place through the conversion of something into it. The major premise is evident per se: and if anyone doubts it, it is proven thus: Every mutation occurs through the discarding of something, and the arrival of something: therefore by destruction of the consequent, because it discards nothing, or receives nothing, this is completely immutable. But if it receives nothing, it seems to follow necessarily that nothing is converted into it.

§ 2. Again, everything that is circumscribed by a place, does not come to be in another place unless it first recedes from the place in which it is: the body of Christ is circumscribed by a place: therefore it does not come to be in another place than in heaven, unless it first recedes from the place of the empyrean heaven in which it is: but it does not recede, as all the Saints say: therefore it does not come to be in another place: therefore nor on the altar: therefore it is not on the altar, as that opinion says.

§ 3. Again, according to a manner of speaking, spirits are of greater dignity and simplicity than bodies: but no created spirit can be simultaneously in diverse places: therefore much less can a body be simultaneously in diverse places; but the body of Christ is remaining in heaven: therefore not on the altar.

§ 4. Again, concerning God this is false, God is elsewhere than where He is, even though God is everywhere: therefore much more is it false concerning those things which are defined and circumscribed by a place: but the body of Christ is circumscribed by a place: therefore it is in a determined place, and is not elsewhere than where it is: therefore it is not elsewhere than in heaven, because it is there: therefore it is not on the altar.

§ 5. Again, if it were granted that it could be elsewhere, and this simultaneously and at once, it seems to follow from this that it could be everywhere: and this by two reasons, one of which is: because, as is said elsewhere, if two bodies could be simultaneously in one place, by the same reason infinite bodies could also: so it seems to follow here, that the circumscription of place is not more repugnant to being simultaneously in multiple places than to being everywhere: if therefore it can be in multiple places, it can also be everywhere. The second reason is: because let it be granted that it is consecrated everywhere, and it is in every place where it is consecrated: therefore it will then be everywhere. But if perhaps this does not seem unfitting to someone, it is shown to be unfitting thus: Augustine says that it is proper to God alone to be everywhere: but the body of Christ is not God, just as neither is the soul of Christ God, although the man is God: and thus it does not belong to the body of Christ to be everywhere: therefore it seems not to be on the altar.

§ 6. Again, it seems that it is not intelligible that the body of Christ is on the altar: for it is circumscribed by place, to which a beginning, a middle, and an end are assigned according to the diversities of place: but it is established that that which is never outside the contained limits, which are the limits of the thing located inside, is never outside the containing limits, which are the place of the body: but the body of Christ is never outside the contained limits in the empyrean heaven, which are its dimensions: therefore it is never outside the limits of the containing place: but it cannot be on the altar unless it is outside the containing limits, namely of the place: therefore it is never on the altar, as it seems.

§ 7. If perhaps you say, as almost everyone says, that the body of Christ has three things, and through those three it relates to place. For it is a body having dimension, and through this it has it that it is circumscribed by place. It is the same glorious body, and through this it has it that it can be with another body in the same place. Again, it is united to the divinity, and from this it has it that it can be in multiple places simultaneously. But that seems unable to stand. First indeed: because the body of Christ before it was glorious, according to this, could not have been with another body in the same place, which is erroneous: because He Himself in the supper gave His body before it was glorified: hence that distinction seems to be worth nothing to the proposition.

§ 8. Furthermore, it is one thing to ask, What can God do? and another, What can happen in things? as Augustine says. For that a quantum be moved locally in a 'now' or in an instant, God can do: and yet God cannot bring it about that a first and a last not be necessarily taken: therefore succession necessarily occurs in its motion, and motion in an instant cannot belong to it. By a similar reasoning, although that body is united to the divinity, nevertheless this union does not take away from it its circumscriptible dimension: but with that remaining, it seems impossible that it be simultaneously in diverse places.

§ 9. Again, what is the necessity that Christ be on the altar with body and soul? For it seems He could operate more gloriously where someone is not present, than where he is: therefore it would also be more glorious for Christ to produce the grace of this sacrament where He is not present, than where He is present: therefore it seems that, since He always does what is better, He is not on the altar.

§ 10. Again, above in the beginning of the book, the causes for which the sacraments were instituted were touched upon, and one is posited there, which is the cause of humility, namely so that in this a human being might be humbled, that he seeks salvation in things inferior to himself. But if Christ is said to be on the altar, nothing in this sacrament is inferior to a human being: therefore the cause of the institution, and the fruit of the sacrament, perish: therefore it is better to posit that Christ is not on the altar, than that He is, as it seems.

426. Wis. 1:5.

IF THIS IS CONCEDED, § 1. It will be expressly against the faith, as is said in the Letter.

§ 2. Again, it would be against grace. For it is said in Deuteronomy 32:4 that the works of God are perfect: if therefore the works of creation are perfect, much more perfect ought the works of grace and recreation to be in the sacraments: but this grace is chiefly that we be conjoined to God, and He be conjoined to us: therefore in some sacrament this conjunction must be complete: therefore in some sacrament He ought to have been conjoined to us bodily.

§ 3. Again, in the gifts of sanctifying grace which is the gratuitous power of the Holy Spirit, essentially, potentially, and presentially, and through indwelling grace He is conjoined and slips into us. Since therefore there is still another part of sanctifying grace in the sacraments, through that He ought to be conjoined to those from whom it draws its effect: but that is Christ having suffered in body and soul, from whom every sacrament has its power; therefore He Himself in some sacrament in body and soul must be conjoined to us, as it seems.

§ 4. Again, in Hebrews 2:14: Because the children communicated in flesh and blood, and He Himself similarly participated in the same, so that He might be conformed to us in nature: but from the same things according to nature a nature is generated, and is nourished: therefore it seems that even in His nature, conformed to us, He ought to be our food.

§ 5. Again, in every way we needed to be conformed to Him: therefore this had to be done through something incorporating us into Him: but this could be nothing but Himself: therefore it was necessary that through Himself we be incorporated into Him: therefore it was necessary that He give us His body in something: but in nothing is it so fittingly given as in food: therefore it ought to have been given to us in food, as it seems.

Solution. Without any ambiguity it must be held that Christ is bodily on the altar: and that what the Master recites in the Letter is a heresy, namely that Christ is not on the altar except as the signified is in the sign.

To the first objecton against this, it must be said that without a doubt the body of Christ is now immutable, receiving nothing and discarding nothing, because it is glorious: nevertheless, it does not follow as a consequence from this, as if it were still further inferred, that it does not come to be somewhere through the conversion of something into it: for it is one thing concerning conversion into another according to the whole essence, and another concerning conversion into another according to parts: but by parts I mean the essential parts which are matter and form: and this is true, that nothing according to matter is converted into another, unless its matter is received by the other, and not its form, because the form is discarded. But it is not so here: because the whole essence of the bread, not annihilated, nor remaining as the substance of bread, passes over into the whole body of Christ according to matter and form: and therefore it is necessary that it remain in the same way receiving nothing, and yet come to be there where such a transubstantiation takes place.

427. 1 John 1:8.

To the proof, however, it must be said that there is a mutation which is made by an imperfect mover, to which the whole mobile matter does not obey, so that what it intends is induced in it: just as natural mutation is: and concerning that the proof holds. There is also a mutation of a mover with infinite power, to which the whole essence which is composed of matter and form obeys in conversion into that which it intends, and such is in the sacrament.

To the other which is objected concerning place, it seems it must be said that this is true of those things which do not have a relation to place except in one way, as are those things which are in a place only definitively or circumscriptively. But concerning the body of Christ it is not so: because it has a twofold relation to place: one per se where it is in its proper form, as where it is circumscribed by a place, and a first, middle, and last in the parts of the place are assigned to it: and where the first is, there the last is not. It also has another relation to a place through another in which it itself is whole in the whole, as is the form of the host: because it itself is whole in the whole host, and whole in any part: and it is not possible to assign to it a first, middle, and last according to the parts of the place of the host itself: and this will be held more fully below. Hence if Christ were to come to be in some place circumscriptively, then I would well concede that He would recede from the place in which He was circumscriptively: but in order that He come to be elsewhere in a place differently than He is here, it is not required that He recede or be moved in that in which He is circumscriptively.

To another it must be said that diversity of place, that is, that it can be diversely in diverse places, does not belong to a spirit insofar as it is a spirit, because neither does it to a body insofar as it is a body: but it belongs to Christ insofar as, living, He operates in Himself and toward those same others: but according to Himself He is in a place circumscriptively: but compared to the others whom He unites to Himself, He must be among them in the rationale and form of food which unites by way of nourishment. But that objection proceeds as if these things were attributed to the body through the fact that it is a body.

To another it must be said that although concerning God who is everywhere, this is false, God is elsewhere than where He is: because He Himself is everywhere, and in itself by the word elsewhere a diversity of place to everywhere is imported, and therefore it is false: nevertheless this is true, God is differently in a stone, and in the Saints, and in Himself, and differently in the temple, and differently in the marketplace, so that the mode of otherness is bent back to the effects. So too it seems it must be well conceded that this is false, that the body of Christ is elsewhere than where it is: because where otherness or aloneness of place to a 'where' is noted: in which it is simply without distinction of the mode of being 'where' circumscriptively or sacramentally: and therefore contradictorily opposite things follow upon those: because since He is where He is, and He is elsewhere than where He is, it would be required that in every place in which He is, He also would not be, but in another. But nevertheless this is true of the body of Christ: The body of Christ is elsewhere than where it is circumscriptively: because it is in the sacrament in which it is not circumscriptively, but essentially whole in the whole, and whole in any part.

428. Deut. 23:12-14.

To another it must be said that if it be granted that Christ can be here circumscriptively, and in many other places sacramentally: it does not follow from this that He could be everywhere: and this is clear, because when it is said, God is everywhere, the sense is, God contains every place and every particle of a place, and infuses into it the power by which it can contain what is located: but in neither way does Christ relate to place: because existing circumscriptively in a place, He Himself is not whole in any particle of the place. Similarly existing sacramentally in a place, although He is whole in any part of the form, nevertheless that form through which Christ is in the place is not whole in any part of the place. And Christ on the altar, as I think, does not have a relation to place except mediating the form of the sacrament: and thus it is clear that it does not follow from this that He Himself is everywhere according to the way it is proper to God to be everywhere.

§ 1. Furthermore, Christ's body cannot be consecrated, or even be had as consecrated, in all places and parts of a place: and therefore again it is not fitting for it to be everywhere: nevertheless, this second reason does not prove that Christ's body can be everywhere per se, but per accidens. But the first reason proves that it is everywhere per se: which does not befit it, but it does befit it to be able to be in multiple places.

§ 2. To the other [objection], it must be said that in truth whatever terminating [surface] within touches the bounded [surfaces] of the locating body outside, that is measured by an interior and exterior quantity: and if it does not have another relation to the place than that by which it is converted by the interior quantity, thus by the exterior quantity it cannot be in diverse places at once, but only successively: and this is so because the dimensions of the locating [body] which are here, cannot be elsewhere at once and at the same time. But in the body of Christ it is not so, because it relates to place in diverse ways, as was previously held: and therefore it can be in diverse places.

§ 3. To the other, it must be said that in order for Christ's body to be able to be a food converting us to itself, it is necessary that it be united to the divinity: and since by the grace of that [union] it befits it to be in multiple places where there are members to be fed or fed [already], some have said that insofar as the body is divine, it possesses [the ability] to be able to be in multiple places: and I well concede that it well has this: not insofar as it is glorious, but rather insofar as it is food.

§ 4. To the other which is objected against this, it seems it must be said that although the united divinity does not remove quantity, nevertheless from the union itself a power is conferred on it which it did not have, namely the power of feeding spiritually: and consequently it is conferred on it that it can be where the members to be fed are in diverse places: and therefore it is not similar regarding a moved quantified thing, on which a new power is not conferred beyond the divisibility of quantity: because it is necessary in the place of its motion to first traverse what is less than itself or equal, before it traverses what is greater than itself, as is proved in the Physics IX, before the end.[434]

§ 5. To the other, it must be said that there is a great necessity: because although Christ absent could give grace, nevertheless that grace would not have complete perfection: because it itself is not He Himself, and the whole of what He Himself is is that grace itself: and therefore so that He may operate in us with His whole self, it is necessary to give His whole self to us in the sacrament.

§ 6. To the other, it must be said that the cause of institution in the sacrament is still preserved, namely humility, by reason of the species of bread and wine after conversion, and by reason of the substance of bread and wine before conversion: and therefore this does not impede it.

Articulus 2 — Whether It Is True, As The Master Says, 'You Are Not Going To Eat This Body Which You See'

Whether it is true what the Master says, "You are not going to eat this body which you see?"

§ 9. Next, it is asked concerning what he says, there, at A, around the middle: "You are not going to eat this body which you see, etc."[435]

§ 10. For this is expressly false: because they ate the same body, and drank the same blood.

§ 11. If perhaps you say that the Master seems to solve it in the Text, as "not this body, etc.", that is, you will not eat it under the same species in which it will be crucified. On the contrary:

§ 12. 1. According to this, even in the form of the Eucharist, when it is said, "This is my body," we could say, "This is not my body": because it is not there under the species of a body, but under the species of bread.

§ 13. 2. Also, the pronoun "this" signifies substance and points it out: therefore since they are substantially the same body, it seems that he ought not to say, "This is not the body which you see, etc.", but rather thus, "This body indeed, but not administered under such a species."

§ 14. 3. Furthermore, what is this that he says, "The flesh profits nothing"?[436] For if the flesh profits nothing, then nothing which is done in respect of the sacrament profits anything. PROOF. By virtue of the sacrament nothing is converted there into an uncreated or created spirit: therefore concerning spirit there is nothing there by virtue of the sacrament, but only flesh and body: therefore if that profits nothing, it seems that the sacrament profits nothing.

§ 15. 4. Also, by what he said, "Have you understood spiritually? They are spirit and life" he instructed the disciples that they should understand concerning the mystery of the sacrament according to a spiritual intellect: and this is against truth, because Christ is given to us corporeally and essentially in the sacrament, and not spiritually only.

§ 16. 5. Also, the spiritual mode of eating is without the presence of the sacrament: therefore by understanding spiritually, if it is referred to the mode of eating, concerning which the Lord instructs the Apostles there, it seems that nothing is understood concerning the rite of the sacrament, which is false: and therefore Augustine's exposition seems to be null or imperfect.

417. 1 Cor. 11:29.

§ 17. SOLUTION. It must be said to this that Augustine optimally expounds in the Text: and because heretics did not understand the exposition, therefore they took the tinder of error in those words.

§ 18. Therefore it must be said to the first, that to eat is spoken of in two ways: in the first way carnally, according to which it posits a stronger power in the eater converting the food to himself: and in such eating the food is divided and suffers, and is converted from itself to the one fed: and the disciples who went back took this understanding: and they were made heretics and heresiarchs of other heretics who still are, through doctrine, or through imitation: and thus Augustine understands: "You are not going to eat this body and thus [what] you see": the demonstrative pronoun points out the substance. In another way to eat is spoken of, such that it is spiritual food spiritually refreshing, and by the power of which the one fed is converted to the food spiritually through union, and not corporeally through identity: and in this way Dionysius and Augustine understand it: and this he calls spirit and life: and Augustine calls it a spiritual intellect, that is, the intellect of spiritual food spiritually refreshing. Whence the Master in the Text of the following chapter says less: since it is contained by virtue of the words, and leaves the matter of inquiry to the readers. Through this, therefore, the solution is evident to what is objected concerning the form, when it is said, "This is my body."

§ 19. To the other, it must be said that the pronoun signifies substance: but when Augustine says, that "not this body which you see, etc.", he himself does not understand that they were not going to eat the numerically same [thing]: but rather, that they were not going to eat that numerically same [thing] according to the understanding of corporeal eating, as they understood: but that they were going to eat the numerically same [thing] sacramentally.

§ 20. To the other, it must be said that the whole is referred to the same understanding: because if the Savior's flesh were converted to us (as they believed) and divided by teeth, it would not profit us anything: because thus it would not unite us to what is better than we are: but rather it itself would fail in us, and perish: and therefore Augustine says in expounding, and well, that a carnal understanding profits nothing, but even harms very much.

§ 21. To the other, it must be said that what Augustine says: "Have you understood spiritually? They are spirit and life": does not exclude sacramental eating, but rather presupposes it: but it excludes in sacramental eating the understanding of carnal eating, as was already said.

§ 22. And through this the solution to the last is also evident.

Articulus 3 — Whether This Is True, As The Master Says, 'He Himself Indeed, And Not The Very Body That Was Seen, Is Eaten'

Whether this is true which the Master says, "It indeed, and not the body itself which was seen, is eaten?"

430. Gratian, Decretum, dist. 6.

§ 25. Next, it is asked concerning what he says in the following chapter, B, around the beginning: "It indeed, and not the body itself which was seen, is eaten, etc."[437]

§ 26. For according to this Text two contradictories seem to be posited concerning the same thing, since the "it" in the singular points out the body, namely that it was eaten, and it was not eaten. But this seems incongruous: because

§ 27. 1. Contradiction is an opposition of which there is no intermediate secundum se: and it is necessary that according to one it is false, and the other true.

§ 28. If you say that they are not contradictories: because with respect to diverse forms it is not incongruous for the numerically same body to be eaten and not to be eaten: it seems that this is nothing: because certain forms and acts and passions befit absolutely according to the substance of the thing of which they are: but certain ones are relative. For example, whiteness is an absolute form, and is in a white thing, whether it is compared to another or not: but similarity is a respective form: therefore it is not in [a thing] except according to comparison to another: and in those which befit absolutely, they always persist, and they are in [it] with respect to all things: but the eating of a body is concerning those so befitting: therefore if it belongs to a body that it be eaten or is eaten, it befits it both in the form of bread and in human form, that it be eaten, and it never befits it not to be eaten.

§ 29. 2. Also, the Philosopher in I On Generation and Corruption, in the chapter on augmentation, holds that nothing nourishes except according to that which is substance, and augments according to that which is quantified substance: if therefore Christ's body most truly nourishes and more truly than carnal food, it itself is eaten by substance: but what is eaten according to substance, is eaten simply: therefore concerning it itself it does not happen to be truly said, that in one way it is eaten, and in another not: and thus again it is nothing what is said in the Text.

§ 30. 3. Also, taste, insofar as it is the sense of nourishment, is also a certain touch, as the Philosopher says: therefore it does not receive a species except with the touch of the substance which is disposed by that species: therefore nothing is said [by saying] that according to one form something is eaten, and according to another not: because nothing is eaten except according to its substance.

§ 31. SOLUTION. It must be said that in truth Augustine here takes eating for sacramental eating, in which there are two [things], namely the division of the species through chewing and breaking, and the incorporation of the one feeding which occurs in the food, namely in the head, Christ. And Augustine holds that conjointly both together cannot be referred to the body which was seen by the disciples in its proper form: and thus what he says is verified, not it itself visibly: but both are verified in that in which it is invisibly, namely in which it is not seen in its proper form: because there the breaking and division refer to the species of bread, and the incorporation to the virtue of the body: and this is what he calls eating it invisibly.

§ 32. To that therefore which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that although to eat falls upon Christ's body accepted absolutely, nevertheless according as the [word] "to eat" imports multiple things, which do not befit the body by grace of one thing which is in it itself, but by grace of diverse things: just as division and breaking on the one part, and union or incorporation on the other part: thus it can well be attributed to it to be eaten according to one mode, and not to be eaten according to another mode: because not the whole ratio of sacramental eating is in the body according to the substance of the body: but something which is of the ratio of eating, is on this side of the species of bread and wine: therefore they do not contradict: but if both respected the substance of the body absolutely, then it would seem it must be conceded, that it would be eaten in all modes.

§ 33. To the other, it must be said that the body indeed nourishes us according to substance, and not according to accidents: according to the substance, I say, united to divinity: but that nourishment is according to the other only which is in the ratio of eating, and not according to that which is the chewing and division and a certain breaking of food: and according to this it is well conceded, that Christ's body existing in human form nourishes, although it is not thus exhibited in the sacrament, such that the act of chewing is upon the human species.

§ 34. To the other, it must be said that it is not so in this sacrament: because the accidents here have a certain virtue of substance in this that they are without a subject, and nourish bodies, and are corrupted, and are converted: and concerning this there will be a question below: and therefore since here the nourishment is solely in the accidents, not spiritual, but corporeal, the touch of the accidents alone suffices for taste.

Articulus 4 — Whether The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Is Well Said To Be Composed Of The Visible Species Of The Elements And The Flesh Of Christ

Whether the sacrament of the Eucharist is well said to be composed of the visible species of the elements, and the flesh of Christ?

§ 37. Next, it is asked concerning what is said, there, B, around the middle: "This is what we say, what we contend to approve in all ways, etc."

§ 38. It seems that there is no such confecting or composition which the Master touches upon in the Text, namely that the sacrament is composed of the visible species of the elements and the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, namely of the sacrament, and the reality of the sacrament (res sacramenti).

§ 39. 1. For the reality of the sacrament is the effect of the sacrament: but from a cause and an effect something is never made, especially from an efficient cause and its effect: but they always differ according to essence: therefore one sacrament is not made from the visible species of the elements, and the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ.

§ 40. 2. Also, one is in the ratio of a sign, and the other in the ratio of the signed: therefore they differ, and are opposed relatively: but from correlatives and opposites one thing is not made: therefore something one is not confected from these two: therefore neither is one sacrament: and thus again it is nothing what Augustine says in the Text.

432. 1 John 1:8.

§ 41. 3. Also, those which enuntiate the sacrament as essential parts, are as form and matter, as was shown above in all the other sacraments: but the visible species of the elements and the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, do not relate to one another as form and matter: therefore they do not constitute a sacrament: therefore Augustine seems to say nothing.

§ 42. SOLUTION. To this it seems it must be said, that Augustine does not intend here to determine the essential parts of the sacrament which is only a sacrament: but rather to say those things which are required for the truth and perfection of the sacrament, according as it is effective of the truth of Christ's mystical body which is the Church: but the visible species operate that through the mode of signing, as the Master says in the following distinction: because just as one bread is made from many purified grains, and wine flows together from many grapes, so the Church is congregated from many catholically purified faithful. But the true body of Christ effects that through the mode of such a cause, as the sacrament is a cause. In this way the sacrament, as it is a cause and sign of grace, is confected from these two, so that from one it may have the ratio of signifying, but from the other the ratio of causing.

§ 43. To the first therefore it must be said, that although one is the cause of the other in this mode by which a sacrament is a cause, nevertheless nothing prohibits that both have some order to a third, and are united in that order; just as also is in baptism where the character is caused by the exterior dipping, and with the exterior dipping is the sacrament of grace interiorly dipping and cleansing.

§ 44. To the other, it must be said that in the mode by which they are opposed, they are not united: but rather in the mode by which they are ordered to a third, as was said: and there is an example in a father and son who are opposed relatively in divine and human things: nevertheless they can be united with respect to a third which in some way is from both.

§ 45. To the other, it must be said that the sacrament is not confected by these two as by essential parts, which are form and matter: but rather in the aforesaid mode.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Flesh Is The Sacrament Of The Flesh, And The Blood The Sacrament Of The Blood

Whether flesh is the sacrament of flesh, and blood the sacrament of blood?

§ 48. Next, it is asked concerning what Augustine says, there, B, at the end: "Namely flesh of flesh, and blood is the sacrament of blood, etc."

§ 49. For according to what is said in the Text, the same thing seems to be the sacrament of itself. But that this is a great incongruity, is evident from this if it is said thus, because flesh [is the sacrament] of flesh, and blood of blood: for since a sacrament is a sign and a cause, the same thing will be the sign and cause of itself. But that this is a great incongruity, is evident from this if these are divided.

433. Gratian, Decretum, dist. 6.

§ 50. 1. For since every sign, in that it is a sign, is more known than the signed: if the same thing is the sign of itself, the same thing will be more known than itself, and less known than itself, which is impossible.

§ 51. 2. Also, since a cause is before the caused, if the same thing is the cause of itself, the same thing will be prior and posterior to itself: which is impossible.

§ 52. But if you say, as the Master seems to say in the Text and solve through metonymy, that the containing is posited for the contained in one of those expressions, and the signed for the sign, so that the sense is: flesh is the sacrament of flesh, that is, the species of bread, which is called flesh, because it contains and signs flesh, is the sacrament of flesh or of Christ's body: and in the same way concerning blood. If, I say, you say thus, it seems that what is said cannot stand, namely that by both, namely invisible, and intelligible, and spiritual blood and flesh, the visible, passible body of Christ, full of grace and divine majesty, is signified: for the signing flesh, which according to that exposition is the species of bread containing flesh, is not invisible, and intelligible, and spiritual: but rather visible, and sensible, and corporeal, since it has all the accidents of a body, although it does not have the prior substance of a body.

§ 53. If perhaps again to this it is responded, as the Master says in the Text, that the species of bread which contains Christ's body, is not simply called invisible: but because Christ's flesh is not seen in it in its proper species, but is understood in it just as the signed in a sign, and is spiritually covered in it, that is, in the ratio of spiritual food. If, I say, you say thus, it seems still that what he says is nothing: because it is said in the Text, that through that the visible, and palpable body is signified, as seems to be said by all.

§ 54. To this again the Master objects in the Text, that it ought to be called visible, and palpable: not here, but rather where it appears in its form, namely in heaven.

§ 55. But this seems to be nothing: because Gregory says, that every visible and palpable thing is corporeal: but Christ's body is not corporeal: therefore it is neither visible, nor palpable.

§ 56. To this it seems it must be said, that the Master well expounds, although the exposition is difficult: but this has been declared by disputing.

§ 57. And to the last it only remains to solve, that visible and palpable are spoken of in two ways, namely according to the power of the sentient [subject], and according to the power of the sensible [object], as Aristotle hints in II On the Soul, where he says that excellences are insensible: just as the light in the sun's disc is called visible according to its own power, but not [that] of the sentient [subject]. And what Gregory says, "Everything which is sensible, is corporeal," is understood concerning the sensible according to the power of the sentient [subject]: because that sense is through an organ, which has a harmony proportioned to this or that sensible: and such sensibles are composite and corporeal. But those which are sensible in themselves, do not need to be corporeal: whence I think well that glorious bodies are sensible of themselves: but that they do not immute our sense, this is from the imperfection of corporeal senses, which cannot apprehend light of such subtlety: however, there will be fuller discussion of this in the tract on the resurrection.

§ 58. Yet furthermore it seems false what was said, that every sensible according to the power of our sense, is corporeal: and according to some there is an instance concerning light, but according to all concerning the stars which we see. To this however I think it must be said, that it is understood concerning a sensible which is only an object of sense, and not the act and complement of the object according as it acts upon the sense of sight: as color is in the sense of sight, whose act is lumen and lux (light): but in the other senses there is no instance: but stars are seen under that which is the act of the lucid and diaphanous: and therefore it is not necessary that they be corporeal.

Articulus 6 — Whether Those Communicating Receive Their Lord, And Whether The Body Of Christ Is Formed Daily

Whether communicants receive their Lord? and, Whether Christ's body is formed daily?

§ 61. Next, it is asked concerning the reasons of the heretics which the Master proposes at the end of the following chapter: and first concerning that which he posits there, C, § 2: "Who would dare to eat his Lord, etc."

§ 62. For it seems to be well moved: 1. For either that eating is through the conversion of Christ's body to us, or through the conversion of us to Christ's body. If in the first way: then Christ is worn down by teeth, and is digested, and is assimilated to us, and is united to our members, as other food: which is strongly incongruous: because thus it would profit us nothing, just as neither can we profit ourselves. But if it is in the second way: then it is necessary, that we both be united: but whatever is united to another, it is necessary that it be removed from its proper species and substance: if therefore we are united to Christ, it is necessary that we recede from the natural species and natural substance, by which we are: but this is false: therefore neither do we eat Christ, as it seems.

§ 63. 2. Also, that which converts another to itself, is the eater: and that which is converted, is the eaten: but Christ's body converts us to itself: and not conversely: therefore it seems, that Christ's body rather eats us, than conversely we it: but no one dares to say this: therefore the reason seems to proceed.

§ 64. 3. Also, if Christ were truly on the altar, who would dare approach unless presumptuous and rash? since he said to Moses, Exod. 3:5: "Do not approach hither: loose the shoe from your feet: for the place in which you stand is holy ground." Therefore much more if Christ's body were on the altar, one should not approach to it, but recede far away.

§ 65. Also, Luke 18:13, the Publican is praised because he did not want to lift his eyes: much more would he be praised, if he did not want to touch Christ's body; and even more, if he did not want to eat it: therefore also anyone else is to be praised, who does not presume to eat his Lord: since therefore it is commanded to all Christ's faithful that they receive Christ's body prepared, it seems it is not on the altar except as the signed in a sign.

§ 66. Further it is asked concerning the second reason which he induces, "Who also would dare to say, that it is daily formed, etc."

§ 67. For this reason seems to have efficacy, because of the many incongruities which seem to follow if the opposite is granted:

§ 68. 1. For either the bread is converted into Christ's body, or not. If yes: then the reason seems to proceed, namely that Christ's body is formed from some matter, from which it was not before: therefore either in whole, or in part. If in whole: therefore let it be generated: therefore it is daily generated anew, which is false. If in part: then it seems necessary, that some part in it be restored, or that it has more parts than another body: both of which is heresy.

§ 69. But if you say, that the matter of bread is not converted into Christ's body: this firstly is against those things which are said in the Text. But secondly, because since it is not converted into something else, or does not remain in its proper essence, it seems necessary that it be annihilated.

§ 70. And if this is granted, this indeed is disproved in the Text below in the following distinction. Secondly also because something of universal matter yields into non-being: and thus already by daily frequentation matter would be much diminished: which is incongruous: because it would be necessary, that all things be contracted into a lesser place than they were on account of the annihilation of parts of matter, the place of which would need to be refilled, because a vacuum cannot be.

§ 71. 2. Furthermore, it is incongruous to posit, that God in the sacraments of all piety and grace annihilates something: since he is never the cause of destruction, but of the creation and governance and perfection of every thing: therefore it seems, that it is most suitable what this heresy says, namely that it is not on the altar except as the signed in a sign. Below, however, where it will be disputed concerning the three opinions in the following distinction, reasons will be posited against the annihilation of the substance of bread: but in this way these are solved: because the opinion in the Text and above is sufficiently disproved.

§ 72. It seems therefore it must be said to the first, that the heretic's argumentation has no power: because it is otherwise in spiritual food, and otherwise in corporeal: for spiritual food is consumed so that we may be incorporated into it: and the reason for this was assigned above in the preceding distinction: because the spiritual is immutable, and cannot be converted to another: but we can be converted to it through conformity of life: nor does it follow on account of this, that it rather eats us, than we it: because this is inferred as if it were a corporeal eating, which is not true, but rather it is a spiritual eating in the sacrament.

§ 73. To the other, it must be said that we do not recede from our natural species, on account of this that the spiritual things which are of grace do not destroy nature in anything, but rather perfect it; whence both those sophisms proceed as if it were a corporeal eating and a transmutation in corporeal substance: and this is not true.

435. Peter Lombard, Sentences, IV, dist. 10.

§ 1. To the next it must be said that if worthiness of receiving is sought, no one is worthy: nor is anyone so presumptuous that he approaches with confidence in his own virtue. But although we are not worthy, we nevertheless have the necessity of receiving, and confidence from the benignity of God, since he said: "Take and eat." And below: "Drink of this, all of you."

§ 2. To that which is objected concerning Moses and the Publican, it must be said that their humility is commended in the recognition of their own humility [i.e., lowliness]; but their foolishness would be reproved if they had been so foolish as not to approach when the Lord called them, especially since without him there is no salvation. And the ignorance of this distinction which is between proper worthiness and the necessity of our salvation from approaching Christ, causes heretics to err.

§ 3. To that which is objected for the second reason of the heretics, it is harder to solve. Nevertheless, it seems as to the first, that the argument is invalid: because we do not posit that the body of Christ is formed from the bread as from matter: but rather there is a transubstantiation of the whole into the whole body, without the body of Christ receiving anything new into itself.

§ 4. To this that is objected concerning annihilation, it must be said that although certain of the ancients conceded this, it is nevertheless not approved by the more celebrated opinion of the moderns: for what is converted into something else pre-existing is not annihilated, just as the whole substance of bread is converted into the body of Christ, as must be shown below.

§ 5. But because some, albeit few, say that it is annihilated, which however I do not think to be true: if anyone wishes to sustain their opinion, he can respond to the first argument made against this, that it does not follow from this that the heaven or the world is restricted [i.e., diminished], if something of matter returns to nothing: because matter (as some say) is of itself manifold, and in the multiplication of itself in itself it always restores itself in the work of propagation.

§ 6. To the next it must be said that God is not the cause of destruction for the sake of destruction alone: because that would be the operation of a fool, or of a malignant being. For it belongs to a malignant being to always destroy what is useful, while it belongs to a fool to destroy his own work. But nothing prohibits something being destroyed so that something else better may be constructed. And thus it is here, where the substance of the bread is destroyed for this reason, lest man's opinion cling there, but rather that it pass from the accidents to the true substance of spiritual food: and this is not contrary to piety. This response, however, is not according to me, but according to others: because I do not think that anything of this is annihilated, and below I will set down reasons.

436. John 6:64.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Power Of The Words Of Consecration Is A Created Or Uncreated Power, And When That Power Is Given: Whether At The Beginning, Middle, Or End Of The Words

§ 8. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the beginning: "If the word of Elijah availed so much that [it called down] fire from heaven," etc. Here there is a most difficult question concerning this power of the words, when this power is infused into the words. And before this can be perfectly known, it is necessary to ask: Whether that power is created or uncreated?

§ 9. For it seems that it is created: 1. For uncreated power operates without an intermediary: but this power has a manifold intermediary, because it has the priest's utterance, and the substance of bread and wine, and many other things which are set forth on the altar. Therefore it seems that it is created.

§ 10. 2. Also, the power of a created thing is created. The prayer uttered by the priest is entirely created: therefore its power is created. But the power of nothing other than the prayer operates in the sacrament: therefore it is a created power that operates in the sacrament.

§ 11. 3. Also, it is the form that operates in all things, because every action and every operation is from form. But the form of any sacrament whatsoever is created: therefore the form of this one. Now it is established that the power of acting in all things follows the essence and substance of the thing. Therefore the power of this form follows the essence of this form. Therefore it is created, just as the form is.

§ 12. But against this there seems to be a manifold reason, namely because: 1. The distance of the flesh of the glorious Virgin from the flesh of the Savior is lesser; and yet the flesh of the Virgin could not be converted into the flesh of the Savior, except by an uncreated power. Therefore neither is the substance of bread converted into the flesh of the Savior except by an uncreated power, as it seems.

§ 13. 2. Also, the Philosopher says in Book III of De Anima that the agent in all things is nobler than the patient, and the maker nobler than the thing made. But that power, whatever it is, makes the body of Christ from bread: therefore it is nobler than the thing made. Therefore some created thing is nobler than the body of Christ, which a faithful man will repute to be most absurd.

§ 14. 3. Also, if that power is created, it is given either to the written prayer or to the uttered prayer. If to the written: then in the confecting of the Eucharist it would not be necessary except to have the book, saying nothing, and thus transubstantiation would happen, which is heretical. It remains therefore that it is owed to the uttered prayer. But no power rooted in some essence extends beyond that essence, such that it would exist when that essence is not existing. Therefore it seems that when the uttered prayer ceases, that power also ceases. Therefore it is of small existence and weak being, as it seems. But such things cannot act upon that which is perpetual: therefore it cannot act upon the conversion of anything into the body of Christ, which is perpetual and lasting without end.

437. Peter Lombard, Sentences, IV, dist. 10.

§ 15. Let it also be further inquired: if it is created, when is it given to the uttered prayer? For since that prayer is a discrete quantity in which there is an order of parts, such that the sound of one is after another, as much in let-ters as in syllables, as well as in words; and there is not anything continuing among these, by the fact that speech is a discrete quantity; it seems that it is infused successively through the succession of the utterance of the elements, the letters, and is not infused all at once.

§ 17. If you were to say (as some have said) that it is given in the final terminus of the prayer. Against: Whatever of the prayer has been spoken, this cannot be taken of the prayer any further, according to the Philosopher. Therefore, by the final terminus, you understand either the last part of the uttered prayer, or the terminus at which the whole uttered prayer is terminated. If in the first way: then the rest of the prayer uttered beforehand receives nothing of the power, since there is nothing of that prayer, by the fact that it has been spoken and cannot be taken any further. But it is established that it was uttered only for the sake of the power: therefore, since according to this it has none, it is uttered uselessly in the sacrament. If in the second way. Against: In the terminus at which the utterance of the prayer is terminated, there is nothing of that prayer: because what has been spoken cannot be taken any further. But what is nothing has no power. Therefore, in that terminus, that prayer receives no power: since therefore it is uttered for the sake of the power, it is uttered in vain.

§ 18. If on account of this it is said that the power is infused into it successively. Against: Either the whole is given to each part of the uttered prayer, or its own part is given to each part. If in the first way: since therefore nature does not abound in superfluities, nor fail in necessaries, and much more so is this observed in grace: it seems that once the first part is uttered, whatever that may be, the other parts are uttered in vain, which is false: therefore the whole power is not given to each part. If, however, its own part is given to each part: then that power operates successively upon the matter of the sacrament. Therefore in the utterance of the first part of the prayer something of the bread is converted into the body of Christ, and something remains unconverted which is converted in the second part: and no absurdity can be greater than this.

§ 19. If perhaps you say that this argument also is invalid: because, granted that it is infused even successively, the first part of the prayer does not convert, but disposes, and so all of them up to the last one which converts; just as happens in natural generation, where alterations precede the transmutation of substantial form. If, I say, you speak thus: this is most absurd for two reasons. One of which is that this power is not alterative of the bread, but transubstantiative: and therefore every part of the power transubstantiates. The second is: because in all altered things the altered substance holds itself differently in its accidents when it is near transmutation, than when it first begins to be disposed: but we see that the substance of the bread in its form and accidents holds itself in one way at the beginning and at the end of the prayer. Furthermore, a created power that is successive, just as it demands a terminus from which the transmutation first happens, so it demands a terminus to which, which first was in potency in that which is transmuted, and afterwards in act: but this power does not have a terminus to which of this kind, as is clear to any faithful person: therefore it is not created and successive.

§ 20. Solution. It seems to me it must be said that the secret of God should be committed to Himself. But nevertheless, because heresy is troublesome in our time, I will attempt to respond without prejudice concerning those things which ought only to be set alongside the truth of faith that exceeds reason, by the fact that the word of God has more power than we are able to understand.

§ 21. It seems therefore better to be said here that the power of this prayer is created insofar as the uncreated power is in it: just as we also said above, that the uncreated Word operates in the created word. And this is what is said in the Text through the authority of Eusebius introduced at the end of the chapter, namely that the invisible priest commutes visible creatures into the substance of his body and blood by his word, with a secret power.

§ 22. The same is also introduced by the authority of Augustine introduced shortly before these, namely that just as through the Holy Spirit the true flesh of Christ is created without coitus in the conception of Christ: so through the same [Spirit] the same body and blood of Christ is consecrated from the substance of the bread and wine. The efficacy of this power is from the fact that it is conjoined to the uncreated power operating in it. Whence we say in this way, that it is created, and conjoined to the uncreated power within it.

§ 23. To that therefore which is first objected, it seems it must be said that a lesser distance does nothing to the effect that the transmutation should be easier: because there is no transmutation of things of the same species into one another, since transmutation is not from act to act, but rather from potency to act.

§ 24. But if you object what the Philosopher says, that the transmutation of those having a common symbol is easier, it must be said that this common symbol is not according to agreement in species, but according to agreement in the dispositions of matter: just as that which has no contrary except according to one contrariety, like air into fire, is more easily transmuted into something than that which has a contrary in two contrarieties, like water into fire. Whence that argument does not conclude.

§ 25. To the next it must be said that that proposition of the Philosopher is also confirmed by Augustine: and it is understood thus, that where the agent produces the effect from its entire and sole power, there the maker is more honorable than the thing made. But as was proved above by the authorities of the saints Eusebius and Augustine, the divine power operates in this prayer, and that created power which is infused into it by the divine power: and therefore it is not necessary that the created power be nobler than the body of Christ. Or let it be said more subtly that, since two things are proposed to that power which is created, namely the substance of the bread and the body of Christ, the operation of Christ does not extend itself except over the substance of the bread: because the body of Christ is not made:

but the bread is transubstantiated into the body of Christ, remaining in one way as it was before. And therefore it does not follow that that power is nobler than the body of Christ. The first solution, however, although it does not solve to the point as well as the second, is nevertheless more intelligible.

§ 26. To the next it must be said that this power is not given to the written prayer, as is well proved in the objecting: but it is given to the uttered prayer. But this is not true, that its power fails when it fails: for the power of the prayer is rooted in the signification of the uttered prayer, and the signification does not fail, as Augustine proves concerning the word of the mind, that it does not fail with the utterance of the motion of the voice; rather, this power signified by the prayer remains in the effect. And yet the argument also is invalid: because it is not necessary that if something is effected by something, the efficient cause should be of as much permanence as the effect: and there is an instance [i.e., a counterexample] in efficient causes, which being destroyed, the effect is not on this account destroyed.

§ 27. But to that which is further inquired, it is more difficult to respond well. Nevertheless, without prejudice it seems it must be said that that relation must be referred to the thing signified, and the thing signified to the reality. But the reality is incomplex and its power indivisible and one. And therefore it is nothing to ask: Whether part of it after part, or the whole simultaneously, is infused?

§ 28. But how this is to be understood can be clear thus: When it is said, "This is my body," in this prayer there is a subject and a predicate, and the composition of both is resolved to the thing signified: therefore the thing signified by this prayer will be that this demonstrated thing is the body of Christ. If further this is reduced into its total being, this is nothing but the body of Christ without composition and completion: and on the part of that, the reality of that prayer is one: and insofar as it thus looks to the unity of the reality without composition and completion, its power is one without composition and completion. And therefore it does not seem it must be said that syl-lable by syllable, or letter by letter, or according to the order of the utterance of words it is infused: but when it has been spoken, in the final terminus it has the whole power.

§ 30. But to that which is objected to the contrary, it must be said that understanding the terminus at which the utterance of the prayer is terminated internally, whether that terminus is composite or simple: because I make no issue concerning this, provided the terminus of the prayer is taken beyond which there is nothing of the prayer, and in which the whole has been uttered.

§ 31. But to this that is objected, that in the terminus of the prayer it has been spoken and cannot be taken any further, it must be said that this would be true if the prayer here were taken only according to the reason of utterance: but (as has been said) it is referred to the thing signified, and the signification of the prayer does not pass away with the prayer passing away. For the time in which it is uttered entirely is one thing, and the time for which it is uttered is another; just as when it is said, "I am sleeping," it is impossible for this statement to be verified for the time in which it is uttered. So I say here, that the signification of the prayer is an indivisible reality to which the whole prayer is referred for the time finishing the utterance, and then it has the power which is in it by the power of its signification. And thus it is clear that the first part is not uttered in vain, because without it, as it is ordered to the last, the last would not complete the signification of the whole prayer: and through this the solution to all the objections except the last is clear.

§ 32. To which it can be said that this is true of a created power, whose act is proportioned to the matter into which it acts as to both limits of the transmutation: just as natural power is. But it is not necessary that it be so here: because the other of the limits does not subjacently yield to the power: by the fact that it remains in one way always. And therefore this power has nothing except a terminus from which into which it may operate. However, there were some who said that no created power operates in substantial transmutation, except as to the terminus from which: because they posited here that the natural power which is in matter would not give the special specific form, but would only dispose the matter, and afterwards the form would be given by the giver of forms, namely the first intelligence or one of the secondary ones. And according to them the argument is invalid: because it would proceed from false premises. But I think that that opinion is false: and therefore I think and judge the first solution to be truer and better.

Articulus 8 — Whether It Is Of Greater Power To Make The Body Of Christ From Bread Than To Make Something From Nothing

§ 34. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the beginning: "The Word therefore, that is, the Son, who could make from nothing what was not," etc. For it seems that Ambrose says nothing here. 1. For when something is made from nothing: although the distance is infinite, that is, here the terminus of mutation has no proportion: nevertheless there is nothing reluctant to the divine operation on the part of matter, from which there is a transmutation into something. But when the body of Christ is made from bread, the form of the bread and the nature of the body of Christ are reluctant [i.e., resistant]: because the corruptible gross, inanimate, and artificial has no agreement with the spiritual, incorporeal, glorious, animate, divine. But the transmutation of reluctant things is more difficult than of non-reluctant things; therefore it is greater [i.e., harder] to make the body of Christ from bread, than to make something from nothing.

§ 35. 2. Also, Augustine says that it is a greater thing to make a pious man from an impious one, than to create heaven and earth. But since it is infinitely greater to make the body of Christ from bread than to make a pious man from an impious one, it will be infinitely of greater power to make the body of Christ from bread, than to make creatures subsist from nothing: therefore what Ambrose says in the Text is nothing.

§ 37. 3. Also, this seems from the fact that the first, namely to make something from nothing, is not so repugnant to reason as the second: whence many of the Philosophers apprehended the first, but none the second. Therefore it seems that it is of greater power to do the second than the first.

§ 38. Solution. It must be said to this that these two works of divine power can be considered in two ways. In one way according to the distance of the extremes: and thus it is doubtful to no one that non-being is more distant from any being, than being is from being. And in this way to create something from nothing is of greater power than to turn any being into any other. In another way the extremes of mutation can be considered, not according to themselves and according to their distance from each other, but according to the dispositions by which they are disposed to motion. And thus it is true that nothing is contraried to God on the part of nothing in creation, but something can resist the conversion of something into something. And thus the induced reasons proceed, and through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 9 — Whether One Ought To Seek The Order Of Nature In The Body Of Christ

§ 40. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the middle: "Why therefore do you seek here the order of nature in Christ's body," etc. For from this it seems that: 1. It is not licit to seek a reason here, and thus those who seek one in disputation concerning these things sin.

§ 41. 2. This also supports the fact that a reason is not sought in those things which are contrary to the principles of reason, by which reason receives science. But the principle of reason is that an accident is in a subject and cannot be without it; that a located body and place are such according to dimensions; that one body cannot be substantially converted into another without corruption; that substantial transmutation cannot happen without agents and patients or physically, and things of this kind: which hold themselves in an entirely contrary way in this sacrament. Therefore it seems that it is against the principle of reason: therefore a reason is not to be sought in it.

§ 42. But against this is: 1. The common disputation of all and of the Holy Masters.

§ 43. 2. Also, Peter says in his first canonical epistle: "Ready always to satisfy everyone asking you to render a reason concerning the faith and hope that is in you." Therefore there ought also to be abundant reason among us concerning the things we believe. Therefore a reason is to be investigated.

§ 44. 3. Also, no truth is contrary to truth. Therefore every truth is saved with any truth. If therefore the things we believe concerning the sacrament are true, they are not disproved or destroyed by any truth. Therefore we can sustain the disputation which is made against the sacrament, lest the truth be disproved.

§ 45. Solution. It must be said that without a doubt in this sacrament and in all other articles of faith there are many things above reason, and there is nothing in them against reason: because God would then be contrary to himself, if he had given us reason, and in the sacraments were to act against the dictate of reason. Therefore there are many things above reason in the sacraments, so that that of Psalm 138:6 might be fulfilled: "Your knowledge is become wonderful," etc.

§ 46. To the other therefore which is objected from the Tex-t first, it must be said that things are considered in two ways, namely according to their proximate causes, and dispositions, and properties, and powers: just as are matter and form, hot and cold, and things of this kind: and reason progressing from them and their effects often and greatly fails in divine things. They are also considered from relation to the first cause, and thus the thing itself and all that belongs to the thing, hold themselves in the ratio of obedience to the first cause: and whatever the first cause, which infuses more than any of the secondary ones, wills, is done in them. And in this way reason proceeds in divine works and miracles, and other things which are above nature. Therefore the reason which is denied to be sought in the Text, is reason proceeding in the first way, and not reason proceeding from principles taken in the second way.

§ 48. To the next it must be said that all those principles hold themselves as obedience according to relation to the first cause. And therefore reason does not suppose them except according to physical transmutation. But when it is inquired concerning divine transmutation, reason proceeds from higher principles: these indeed not contrary, but rather using those at will: because they hold themselves to the others like obedience.

Articulus 10 — Whether In The Sacrament Of The Eucharist The Body Of Christ Can Be Said To Be Created By The Holy Spirit, And Whether Transubstantiation Is Brought About By The Spirit

§ 50. Next it is inquired concerning this which he says, there, D, around the end: "Just as through the Holy Spirit true flesh," etc. For this seems inconvenient in two ways.

§ 51. 1. First indeed: because that is created which is made from nothing. But Christ, as to the substance of flesh, is not made from nothing, but from the most pure bloods of the glorious Virgin. Therefore the true flesh of Christ is not created by the Holy Spirit.

§ 52. 2. But secondly, what is more to the point: because transubstantiation in the sacrament does not seem to be by the Spirit, but rather by the power of the words: because otherwise the form of the sacrament would be useful for nothing.

§ 53. 3. If perhaps it should be said that there must be divine power in the word by which it operates, just as also in the other sacraments: then it seems still that it is inconveniently attributed to the Holy Spirit: but rather this will have to be attributed to the Son, because the uncreated Word has a common symbol for this with the created word. Whence the power of the operating uncreated Word is in the created word. Therefore this is not to be attributed to the Holy Spirit.

§ 54. But against: The same thing holding itself in the same way is not to be referred except to one operating cause. The flesh of Christ in the sacrament is the same as he drew from the Virgin, and holding itself in the same way in its substantials. Therefore it is to be referred in the sacrament to the same operating cause to which it is referred in the Virgin. But in the Virgin it is attributed to the Holy Spirit. Therefore also in the sacrament, as Augustine expressly says in the Text.

§ 55. Solution. It must be said to the first, that many things concerning this are said upon the third book of the Sentences. But insofar as pertains to the present treatise, it must be said that "to create" is said in multiple ways, namely on the part of the creator: and thus creation is a divine act not subjacent to time: and in this way the body of Christ is said to be created. In another way creation is spoken of according as it is of that which according to its ratio is not founded in anything prior to itself, but all other things are founded in it: because it is necessary that it be made from nothing if it is made. And in this way the Philosopher says that the first of created things is being, and there is not anything else created before it. And the Commentator says there that being is made through creation, but the good and the true through information: because they hold themselves to being as to a foundation in which they are founded. In a third way that is said to be created which according to its being is not from anything, although according to intention it has something prior to itself: and thus the world and heaven are said to be created from nothing.

§ 57. To the next it must be said that in truth the operation of the body of Christ in the sacrament is principally attributed to the uncreated Word, that is, appropriately, just as was said above in the question concerning the form of the sacrament. Nevertheless, according to something which is in the sacrament, it is appropriated to the Holy Spirit, namely as to the unitive love of the mystical body, and as to this the word of Augustine in the Text is understood.

§ 58. To the other objection, it must be said that in the womb the flesh of Christ was made according to the being of flesh which was not before: and that operation on account of the attribution of grace and goodness appropriately convenes to the Holy Spirit. But in the sacrament it is not made thus: because flesh which was not before is not made, but rather that same which is, and was before. Whence the operation of transubstantiation does not extend itself except over the substance of bread and wine: and this is done by the created word in which the uncreated Word operates. And therefore the mode of operating is not the same: and this is what Eusebius says in the last authority introduced in this chapter, there, "The invisible priest [commutes] visible creatures," etc.

DISTINCTIO XI

Divisio Textus

§ 59. Division of the Text. "If moreover it is asked, what kind that is," etc. Here the Master begins to treat of the mode of conversion.

§ 60. And it is divided into three parts. In the first of which he touches upon the conversion on the part of the act of transubstantiation, and on the part of the terms. In the second, he touches upon the mode of conversion on the part of the remaining forms; and this begins in distinction XII, there, A, "Under another species for three causes," etc. And also in the same place he touches upon the matter of this sacrament. But in the third, he touches upon the sacramental acts: such as breaking, partition, and eating, upon what are they? Whether upon the remaining form, or upon something else in the sacrament? And he touches upon this in distinction XIII, there, A, "It is also customarily asked concerning breaking and partition," etc.

§ 61. But concerning the first, in the remainder of this distinction the Master poses a question in the Text; and for its solution he introduces three opinions, proving some, and disproving another through authorities.

§ 62. But the question is this: Whether that conversion is formal or substantial? And he determines that it is not formal: because the form remains, but what is transmuted according to form does not remain.

§ 63. And afterwards in solving he introduces three opinions, which are evident in the Text, and from the disputation the intention of the chapter will be evident: because all three opinions are introduced in one chapter.

Articulus 1 — Whether In The Sacrament Of The Body Of Christ There Is Some Conversion Or Transmutation

§ 65. Let us inquire therefore around the beginning of the chapter four things: namely, whether there is some conversion in this sacrament? Secondly, what kind of conversion or transmutation? Thirdly, whether that transmutation is in time or sudden? Fourthly, and lastly it is inquired, how it holds itself to the transmutation of creation, and the operation of nature, and that operation by which miracles happen? And in the same place it will be determined, whether it is wonderful, or miraculous?

§ 66. To the first of these it is proceeded thus: 1. In every transmutation it is necessary to accept a subject, and two extremes between which the transmutation happens. But the subject is what is the same under both extremes, although they differ according to form and being. But in the sacrament it is not to be accepted thus. Therefore there is not any transmutation in the sacrament. The first proposition is proved by the sayings of all the Philosophers. For since transmutation is a way to being, it must be in something as in a subject. Similarly, when it is transmuted, there happens a renovation of position, or being, or some accidental form; and there must be two extremes, one from which, and the other to which the transmutation happens. But the second is proved by the fact that nothing is added to the body of Christ.

§ 1. ...nor is there anything according to matter under the form of the body of Christ after the consecration, which was there just before.

§ 2. Also, if there is a transmutation: it is either according to the whole, or according to a part. If according to the whole, such that the whole while remaining a whole is transferred to another place, then there will be a mutation of place, which is false. But if according to a part:

either an essential part, and then it will be generation or corruption; or an accidental part, and then it will be alteration, or augmentation, or diminution. Yet it is established that it is none of these. Therefore it is evident that there is no transmutation in the sacrament.

§ 3. If perchance you should say that those arguments do not hold here, but only in natural mutation, because this mutation is miraculous. On the contrary: In all miraculous mutations I see that there is an obediential potency which is afterwards terminated under an act miraculously introduced, and which remains under it. For although a blind man cannot see, when the potency has been conferred upon him, once that potency is terminated and completed, it remains under the sight restored by a miracle. Therefore it seems that here, too, something of the bread in which the obediential potency of conversion into the body of Christ is founded, remains under the act of the body of Christ; yet nothing remains, as the Saints say: therefore there is not here any conversion or transmutation, as it seems.

§ 4. Also, Boethius in the book On the Two Natures in the One Person of Christ says that every transmutation is according to something common [438]. Since therefore the Author says this while treating a matter of faith, it seems that he holds this also here in the sacraments which are received by faith: therefore if there were transubstantiation here, it would be necessary for something one in number and substance to be first under the form of bread and wine, and afterwards under the form of the body of Christ.

§ 5. Also, the same thing remaining in the same way is in no way mutated: therefore by the destruction of the consequent, if something same and one is mutated, it does not remain in the same way. But a diverse mode is not considered except according to the diversity of the form of bread, and afterwards under the form of the body of Christ. Therefore something same and one is first under the form of bread, and afterwards under the form of the body of Christ: but this is false, as is said by all, and in the Letter it is proved to be false by the sayings of the Saints: therefore nothing is immutated in the sacrament: therefore there is no transmutation in it, as it seems.

§ 6. If perchance you should say that it is otherwise in the works of nature, because God in operating does not seek matter upon which to operate, just as creation is a divine act neither seeking nor presupposing matter, and thus He can make a transmutation which is not founded in any transmuted thing. If, I say, you speak thus, that seems absurd and contrary to faith, for a threefold reason. First, indeed: because creation is out of nothing, but transubstantiation is from bread and wine, whence it presupposes to itself a being from which it is made, whereas creation does not.

§ 7. Secondly: because the transubstantiation which is in the sacrament is of something, and it cannot be said that it is of nothing. Now a transubstantiation which is of something, is either of it as "to which," or of it as "in which" and "from which." But here it is not as "to which," because then it would not be called the transubstantiation of bread, but rather of the body of Christ. Therefore it will be called of something as "in which," and thus the proposition is obtained: and if there is any transmutation there, it seems that something common remains there, which was disproved before: therefore there is no transmutation whatsoever.

§ 8. Thirdly, however, because it is not sought what God is able to do in things, but what is able to be done in things, as Augustine says in Book IV of The Literal Meaning of Genesis but neither does the intellect grasp, nor does nature sustain, that a transmutation should be from the whole substance of a thing, that is, from form and matter: because it would rather be an annihilation than a transmutation. Therefore there is not any transmutation in the sacrament, as it seems: because if there were, it would be from the whole substance of the thing.

§ 9. Solution. It seems it must be said here, without prejudice to a better opinion, that in this sacrament there is a transmutation, which is properly called transubstantiation, because it is from the whole substance of a thing into the whole substance of another thing; that is, from the whole substance of bread and wine into the whole substance of the body and blood of Jesus Christ with respect to substantial form and matter, and the whole composite of bread and wine ceases to be with respect to its substantials, and the whole Christ is there as to matter. But whether the bread is annihilated or not will be a question afterwards in this same chapter, where the second opinion will be debated.

§ 2. Therefore, to the first it must be said that, in truth, in every transmutation it is necessary to have two extremes, but it is not necessary in every transmutation to have a subject. And there is an instance of this in creation, the reason for which is that it is not truly a transmutation: for transmutation speaks of the becoming of the thing itself, and its exit from potency to act. But when the thing is in that act, then it is not under the form from which the transmutation is, nor is it under that form to which it is, except only in potency; and the transmutation itself is a certain imperfect act mixed with potency, and therefore such a becoming is not without motion, and motion cannot be except in that which is moved, on account of which it is necessary that something be subjected to such a transmutation. There is, however, a transmutation which is not a motion, but a mutation only. And this is twofold, namely by a physical agent: and thus there is simple generation considered absolutely, and thus again it needs a subject, because an agent acting physically does not act unless some matter is subjected to it into which it may act. There is also the First Agent of infinite power, whose transmutation is without motion and indivisible, because there is nothing there except the existence of this from that, and afterwards its substantial being: and therefore it is not necessary that any matter be subjected there. Whence in my judgment that transmutation has only terms, and not a common subject, which is the third element in physical mutation.

§ 3. To the second it must be said that it is well conceded that no transmutation which is posited by the Philosophers is here: because neither did they posit them all, but only those in which there is an exit from potency to act, which act is in the potency of being mutated before it is in the state of having been mutated.

§ 4. To the other objection concerning the works of miracles, it must be said that miracles are for restoring the defections of nature, as when the blind are illuminated, and the like. And therefore it is necessary that in them there be a perfect natural potency, through an act introduced miraculously: because if nature could introduce the act in this way, it would introduce no other than the same one. But the work of this sacrament is entirely of grace for the nourishment of the spirit, and therefore no corporeal potency can remain in it: but in it we receive the spirit to which we are to be united, not indeed mutated in itself or in another, because thus it would not be perfect, but remaining in the same way.

438. Matthew 25:26. Wait, the quotation is actually from Matthew 26:26-27.

§ 5. To the other it must be said that Boethius is speaking against the heretics Nestorius and Eutyches, who posited that the divine substance in the union of natures in Christ was converted into human nature, just as water is converted into wine. And he disproves this by those principles, that things are not transmuted into one another unless they have one matter communicable to both [439]. And he does not mean to say that there is no divine transmutation which does not presuppose some matter that is the subject of transmutation. Hence that does not contradict this; because although it is in the divine matter of faith, it is nevertheless not with respect to the same mode of article or mutation.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that it is well conceded that the bread is not disposed in the same way: but there is a not being disposed in the same way as to the whole substance and form, and a not being disposed in the same way as to a substantial or accidental part. I say, therefore, that it is not disposed in the same way in its whole substance, because it is transmuted from its whole substance. Christ, however, is disposed in the same way then, and before, and after, because nothing is added to Him nor does anything accrue to Him.

§ 7. To the last it is more difficult to respond:

Articulus 2 — What Sort Of Transmutation Or Conversion This Is because this is contrary to everything that has thus far been supposed in the solution: yet it can be said that although transubstantiation presupposes for itself a being from which it occurs, it does not nevertheless presuppose it as a matter which is one in the act of that from which and in which the transubstantiation occurs: because then it would not be a transubstantiation from the whole substance, but from the substantial form only; and therefore nothing remains, because just as nothing is subjected as a subject to the act of creation insofar as it is an action, so also nothing is subjected as a subject to this transubstantiation: but it is true that it is dissimilar in the terminus from which, because there [in creation] being is not presupposed, but nothingness, whereas here being is presupposed.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that, in truth, transmutation is of something not "in which", but as "from which," whence it denominates that from which it is: because that thing is transmuted, and that thing is a being, and it does not yield into non-being, although it is a mutation from the whole substance. But to what is objected against this, it must be said that the accidental forms of bread remain, and not the substantial form, and with respect to this there is a transmutation there.

§ 3. But if anyone should object that the species of transmutations are distinguished more according to the terminus to which than from which, such as generation, and corruption, and the like: therefore this also ought to be distinguished according to the terminus to which. It must be said that this does not follow: because those transmutations are a way into an act by which they are specified, and they introduce it, and that act is in a potency issuing into a pure act unmixed with potency. But here it is not so: because I do not think it is safe to concede that this transmutation in any way attains the body of Christ: whence it is not founded except in one of the terms, insofar as it expresses a mutation. However, there are some who say there are two terms of this mutation, as the mutation is from a whole existing substance into a whole existing substance; but about this inquiry will be made below.

§ 4. To the last it must be said that Augustine speaks there of the institution of the works of nature, namely, how water is above the heavens, and the like: in which matters certain ignorant persons wish to evade the issue [by saying] that they should be attributed to the power of God. And in that case what he says is true: because when He created the world, He did not dispose the parts of the world according to His raw power, but rather according to the exigency of each and every nature, according as this is conserved by that, and assists in the propagation of the world. But here the entire course of the work is miraculous; and therefore that saying does not hold here, just as it does not in other miracles either.

What kind of transmutation or conversion is this?

§ 5. Secondly, it is asked: What kind of mutation or conversion is this which is in the sacrament?

§ 6. For it seems that it is not from the whole substance. 1. For if it were a mutation from the whole substance, the proper act of that substance would not remain afterwards: therefore by the destruction of the consequent, if the proper act of the substance remains, it is not a mutation from the whole substance. But the act of the substance remains, which is to nourish: therefore the substance or something of the substance remains: and thus it is not a mutation from the whole substance.

§ 7. 2. Also, Damascene says that just as we are from a twofold substance, namely soul and flesh, so the food is twofold: for He joined divinity to the substance of bread to make for us an edible food . Therefore it seems that the substance of the bread remains.

§ 8. 3. Also, in the other sacraments, such as in baptism, confirmation, etc., the substance of the matter remains: therefore it seems that it ought to remain here as well. Since, therefore, the substance of the bread is the matter, the matter ought to remain there, and the mutation is not from it, as it seems.

§ 1. 4. Also, when the foundation does not remain, nothing of the things which are built upon it remains. But an accident is built as to its being upon a substance, like upon a foundation: therefore if the substance does not remain, neither does the accident of that substance remain. But the accident remains: therefore the substance of that accident remains, as it seems.

§ 2. 5. Also, it is commonly said that the accidental form remains for the reason that otherwise it would not lead to the notion of food: and this is contrary to the ratio of a sacrament, of the ratio of which is that it be a sensible sign making one come into the knowledge of something else. Now it is established that although an accident contributes to the cognition of "what a thing is," nevertheless each thing is more truly known by its substantial form than by its accidental form. Therefore the ratio and cognition of food which is to be received in the sacrament is more truly and better received through the substantial form than the accidental. Therefore the substantial form ought to remain rather than the accidental.

§ 3. Also, everything that is mutated is otherwise disposed than before. But what is caused to be mutated from its whole substance is not otherwise disposed after the mutation, because it has been annihilated. Therefore the transmutation ought not to be from the whole substance, as it seems.

§ 4. 6. Also, it does not seem to be intelligible that something is mutated from its whole substance: for what is mutated is otherwise disposed than before; but what is otherwise disposed than before is something else now than it was before: therefore it is necessary that something of it remain now as before. Therefore it is not a mutation from the whole substance, as it seems.

§ 5. 7. Moreover, let it be granted that something is mutated from its whole substance: therefore nothing remains, neither form nor matter. But of that which nothing remains, nothing of it is converted into anything. But if the mutation of the substance of the bread is from the whole substance, nothing of it remains: therefore nothing of it is converted into another. Therefore the substance of the bread is not converted into the body of Christ, which is contrary to all [theologians], because there is no transubstantiation here except of the bread and wine into the body of Christ, as it seems to all.

§ 6. 8. Also, it is one thing for this to be this, and another for this to be transmuted into this, and another for this to be after this. When therefore it is said that bread is transmuted into the body of Christ, it must be said according to one of those senses: namely, that the bread is the body of Christ without transmutation, and this is false, because bread and the body of Christ are disparate things, and one is removed from the other, like a man and a donkey. Or that it is mutated into it: and since everything that is transmuted is first in a state of becoming before it is in a state of having been made, it would be necessary that at some time bread is becoming the body of Christ, which is false; because thus the body of Christ would be in potency and in the exit from potency to act, and would begin to be anew: for everything that exits from potency to act is new and generated, either simply or according to something of itself. And faith abhors all these things concerning the body of Christ. But if it is said in the third way, that to be transmuted into this is the same as for this to be after that. On the contrary: It is not intelligible that the body of Christ is made from bread after bread without an intermediate mutation: therefore it seems that this is not the sense.

§ 7. 9. Moreover, if thus the bread will be the body of Christ, then at some time it will be true to say, "the bread is the body of Christ." For whatever will be true in the future will be verified in some present. But it will never be true to say, "the bread is the body of Christ." Therefore this was never true: "the bread will be the body of Christ."

§ 8. 10. Moreover, when it is said, "This becomes this," what does the term "this" supposit for? If for the bread, then the bread will be the body of Christ, which has already been disproved. If for something else, then something other than bread is converted into the body of Christ, which is false.

§ 9. Solution. It must be said, without prejudice, that in this matter and in the matter of the Trinity there are not sufficient words to express the mode of the divine operation: but babbling as much as we can, we resound the exalted things of God. Whence I think that this transmutation is more truly called transub-stantiation, just as certain of the ancients have also said: and its mode is that it is from the whole substance of the bread with respect to form, and with respect to matter, so that, namely, of the whole composite with respect to its essential parts, nothing remains.

§ 2. Therefore to the first it must be said that it is not necessary that the proper act of the substance does not remain when the substance does not remain. For the act of the substance is mediated by forces and powers; but powers are properties which are not of first being, but of second being. And therefore in this transubstantiation the act of feeding and nourishing remains in the powers, founded in those things which immediately follow the composition of the bread, which are flavor, and quantity, and the like: but if those did not remain, then it would be true that the proper act of the bread would also not remain.

§ 3. But if it is objected by the authority in which Damascene says that when a substance is destroyed its proper act does not remain, it seems it must be said that he understands destruction in whole with respect to essential parts and the powers following upon the substance: but such a destruction is not here, and therefore even when a mutation from the whole substance has taken place, the act of the substance still remains.

§ 4. To the other it must be said that the saying of Damascene is understood with respect to the forms and accidents of the bread, to which God joined the Lord's body: therefore not with respect to a remaining substance of bread.

§ 5. To the other it must be said that it is not similar here and in the other sacraments. Because in the other sacraments the divine act is not upon the matter which is subjected to the eyes, but rather upon the soul of the one receiving the sacrament, and transmutates it by altering it to grace. But in this sacrament, on account of the reality contained in the sacrament outside the receiver, of which we have spoken above, the divine act is upon the matter which is subjected to the eyes in the sacrament. And therefore that matter is transubstantiated.

§ 6. To the other it must be said that substance founds accident with respect to being: but the use of accident is twofold. One is in matter: and in this it is necessary that it be founded in a substance. The other is to show a divine work: and in this it is not necessary that it be founded in a substance, but the continence of the divine power whose work it demonstrates suffices for it, just as a sign shows the thing signified: and thus it is here. Whence it is not necessary that when the subject is removed the accident should not remain. Yet this will be inquired into below in the following distinction of the last chapter.

§ 7. To the other it must be said that a substantial form is properly of one thing according to being, and of things diverse in species there is not one substantial form. And therefore it does not make known except that of which it is properly the form. And therefore if the substantial form remained, it would lead to the substance of the bread, and not into the substance of the body of Christ, and thus it would be an occasion of error. But concerning an accidental form it is not so: because an accident is proper to many, and can lead into that of which it is proper, especially by consignifying diverse properties, such as that bread is gathered from many grains, and the true body of Christ from many drops of blood and many members, while the mystical body is from many faithful, and so on for others which have been touched upon in their own part. And therefore the accident more truly leads to the ratio of food than a being of another mode, whether it be an accidental form or a substantial form: and therefore it remains for the use of the sacrament.

§ 8. To the other it must be said that here something is said to be mutated in such a way that to be mutated is the same as to be transubstantiated from its whole substance, and in such a mutation it is not necessary that some one thing be disposed in a diverse way, but only that it itself according to its whole self be converted into another whole. But that argument is about physical mutation, and many such arguments were solved in the preceding article of the question.

§ 9. To the other it must be said that the middle sense is the one here, namely that it is converted into it: but it does not follow that it is in potency in it: because, as was said before, this transubstantiation does not have a "becoming" properly so called, nor does it have for this a common subject for both terms, but it is a simple conversion of the whole into the whole.

§ 2. To the other it must be said that when it is said, "the bread becomes the body of Christ," in the sense in which this is received, the substance of the bread which is subjected to the eyes under sensible accidents is demonstrated; and what is further inferred does not follow: because "to become" here is to be transubstantiated from the whole substance.

§ 3. And I readily concede that this is not true: "the bread will be the body of Christ": and concerning this there is a question below in this same chapter. Nor does it follow that sometimes it is true to say that "the bread is the body of Christ": for the reason that that "becoming" is said to be transmuted from the whole substance, and then neither bread remains, nor anything of the substance of the bread, by grace of which this could be verified: "the bread is the body of Christ."

Whether that transmutation occurs suddenly or successively?

§ 4. Thirdly, it is asked whether that transmutation occurs successively or suddenly?

§ 5. Now it seems that it occurs successively: because 1. The power of transubstantiating is the word, according as it is in pronouncement: but in pronouncement it is successive: therefore it operates the transubstantiation successively.

§ 6. 2. Also, the word, when it has been spoken, is not: but nothing operates when it is not: therefore the word does not operate when it has been spoken. Therefore it operates precisely as it is in the act of being spoken: but in the act of being spoken it is successive: therefore it operates the transubstantiation successively.

§ 7. 3. Also, whatever has a whole, especially a discrete one, has this from its parts: but this sentence, "This is my body," is a certain whole of distinct quantity, or a distinct quantity: therefore it has the power of operating from its parts. But the parts succeed one another: therefore it operates successively, as it seems.

§ 8. But against this is that 1. Everything which is transmuted into another successively is first in a medium before it is in the extreme. But the medium is neither of the extremes. Therefore there is a time when it is neither bread nor the body of Christ: which is false, because thus something would be subjected to the transubstantiation, which was disproved long ago.

§ 9. 2. Also, everything that is mutated successively is disposed by dispositions contrary to the form from which it is mutated, just as air, when it becomes fire, receives the dispositions of fire which are contrary to the form of air. But in this transubstantiation all the accidents of the bread remain: therefore it is not disposed by dispositions contrary to the form of bread; therefore it is not mutated successively.

§ 10. 3. Also, it was held above that the power of the Uncreated Word operates in the created word, as is held in the Letter, that the invisible Priest and the Holy Spirit operate in the created word. But the operation of these is not successive, but sudden.

§ 11. To this, however, I say that it is inquired concerning the instant of conversion, in which bread is last, and in which the body of Christ is first?

§ 12. For either this is one instant, or diverse ones. If one. On the contrary: In the instant in which bread is last, it is true to say that it is bread: and it follows from disparates that it is not the body of Christ. But in the instant in which the body of Christ is first, it follows that it is true to say that it is the body of Christ. If therefore those are the same instant, in that same instant that thing is the body of Christ, and is not the body of Christ. Therefore contradictories are simultaneously true with respect to the same instant. Therefore contradiction is not an opposition of which there is no medium in itself, which is contrary to the philosophy of Aristotle. But if they are diverse instants, and between any two there is time: therefore time is after the instant in which bread is last, and before the instant in which the body of Christ is first. Therefore in all that intermediate time, it is neither bread nor the body of Christ, which is false.

§ 2. To this, however, some wish to say that, in truth, motion is measured by time, and the end of motion without time. Whence the end of motion is "to have been moved," and the end of becoming is "to have been made." And therefore the "having been made" of the body of Christ is measured by an instant: but the last being of the bread, since this is "to be mutated," is measured by time. But time is well continued to "having been moved," such that no medium intercedes: and therefore they say that bread is last in time, but the body of Christ is first now in a "now" [an instant]. To confirm this argument another reason can also be adduced: because when fire is made from air, the desiccation of the air is with motion; but the "having been made" of the fire is the terminus of the motion, and without motion. Therefore it is measured by diverse measures. And similarly the transmutation of the bread is with motion, but the "having been made" of the body of Christ is without motion. And therefore one is measured by time, and the other by the "now" to which that time is continued. The third reason confirming that same thing is this: because in a permanent continuous thing having position in its parts, there are two terms in act, namely the first point and the last point. And one cannot receive in act a penultimate point, or that which follows the first: because those are only in potency, and wherever a quantity of a line is designated, there between two points there will be a line, although it cannot be marked except in a point. Therefore similarly it will be in successive continuity, that it is to take a "now" to which time is continued as to a terminus, and that is in the terminus of the transubstantiation, in which namely the body of Christ is first. However, one cannot take a penultimate "now" before this, but rather the whole time up to that "now," in which whole time the bread ceases to be, and this time is continued to the "now," and this is not incongruous. Thus therefore some have spoken, and it would be well said, as it seems, concerning physical mutation: but it avails nothing for the proposition at hand, which is proved thus: It has already been proved above that there is no mutation there which is a successive becoming. But only such a mutation is measured by time, and not another divine mutation which is in the sacrament. Therefore the bread would be in the last instant without motion: therefore just as it is true to say in the whole time and in whatever instant is after that in which the body of Christ first was, that it is the body of Christ; so it is true in whatever instant is before it, that it is bread. And thus the first incongruity follows. Also, Being is measured by a "now," just as mutation by time: but in all that time there is nothing except the being of bread, and not any mutation: therefore in whatever "now," it is verified that it is bread.

§ 3. Therefore there were others who said that in truth bread is, and the body of Christ is, in one instant: but yet it does not follow that contradictories are simultaneously true: because they are not according to the same respect in that instant: because that instant is the principle of the future, and thus the body of Christ is in it: and it is the end of the past, and thus the substance of bread is in it. But that this is not true, nor can it stand, is proved thus: That an instant is the principle of the future and the end of the past does not make the instant itself to be divisible: just as neither does a point which is taken as the end of one part of a line, and as the principle of the other. In that indivisible, therefore, according to being: either this which is on the altar is under the form of bread, or under the form of the body of Christ, or under both, or under neither. If under the form of bread: therefore nothing of it is that which is under the form of the body of Christ. Proof: For let it be granted that something of it is in which is if it is under the form of the body of Christ, it then follows that the instant would be divisible, which is false. Therefore, if there is nothing of it [the instant] in which there is the form of the body of Christ, the form of bread and the form of the body of Christ will not be in the same instant, and thus that position is false. But if it is under the form of the body of Christ, by the same manner it follows that there is nothing of that instant in which it is under the form of bread, and thus we must again return to this, that in the same instant nothing is under the form of bread and of the body of Christ. But if it is under each part in the same instant: then in one indivisible [instant], taken according to being, I can say that there is bread, and there is the body of Christ. Therefore in that [instant] it is true to say that bread is the body of Christ, and conversely, which is false. Therefore in that instant it is not under each form: therefore it is under neither, and this again is false, because in this way at some point there would be neither bread nor the body of Christ, and matter at some point would be under no form: all of which are impossible.

§ 2. Therefore, again, there are others who presume to say that in truth in one indivisible [instant] is the bread and the body of Christ: but in one indivisible [instant] they readily concede that there is a prior and a posterior, saying that there is prior and posterior in time, and these are not in one indivisible; and there is prior and posterior in nature, and these are indeed in one indivisible. Whence prior in nature is the bread, and posterior in nature is the body of Christ. However, they confirm this with two arguments, of which one is from similarity: for let there be two lines joined to each other lengthwise in the same space; it is manifest that they touch each other in one point, and that point relates to each according to prior and posterior in nature. By similarity they say here: because there are two beings, namely the being of bread, and the being of the body of Christ, which touch each other in one indivisible of time, in which one yields to the other without any intermediate change; and according to prior in nature the being of bread is there, and according to posterior the being of the body of Christ is there. The other argument is: because, as was proved above, in this sacrament there is no "changing" (mutatio), but rather "having been changed" (mutatum esse); and yet it necessarily follows that it is changed: therefore "having been changed" precedes, not in time, but in nature only.

§ 3. But that this, again, is nothing seems capable of being proved thus: When two lines are joined in a point, the point, namely of space, over which they are joined, in truth is not made actual in the continuum because of this, but only in potency. Proof: For when lines are thus joined, a line will indeed follow, and will touch a line: but that a point should follow a point, this is by accident, because it only has this insofar as it is the terminus of a line. If therefore these agree in a point by accident, it is clear that they do not thereby designate any point in a continuum which might be through itself like a place in which they touch. Furthermore, such contact is only possible in mathematical lines according to the Philosopher [440], who says that many things happen to a straight line insofar as it is a straight line, such as touching a brazen sphere in a point: yet a separate straight line does not touch this. But we are seeking a measure here; yet the being of the nature of bread is in the last [instant], and of the body of Christ in the first: whence this does not seem to make for the proposition. Also, although "to be changing" precedes "to have been changed" in some things in time, and in some things in nature only: nevertheless it is impossible to understand that there is one measure for both: therefore it seems that this is also not similar. Also, measures differ according to the measured things: therefore the being of bread is measured by a measure fitting for it. Since therefore a body is mutable, it will be measured by time, or by the nunc [now/instant] of time. But the body of Christ, since it is immutable in its being, will not be measured by time, or by the nunc of time. Therefore the body of Christ, since it is immutable in its being, will not have a measure of the same rationale: therefore it will be measured by the nunc of aevum, or by aevum. It is manifest, however, that these are not the same: therefore the being of bread and the being of the body of Christ are not in the same nunc, nor even of the same species in measure, as it seems. Also, without the change of bread, bread does not pass into the body of Christ, but by its change the body of Christ begins to be here: but the measure of being changed, and not being changed, is not the same: therefore these are not in the rationale of one nunc, nor in the rationale of one measure. And he who taught me used to concede this.

§ 4. But this again does not seem true: because the Philosopher says in the penultimate proposition of The Causes [441] that between the being whose substance and action are in a moment of eternity, and the being whose substance and action is in a moment of time, there is a medium, and it is a thing whose substance is in a moment of eternity, and its action in a moment of time. Therefore, although the body of Christ is immutable as to substance and accidents, it is nevertheless mutable as to place, or mobile: for it is manifest that it begins to be here. Therefore this very fact that it is now here, and before was not here, is measured by something; and it is manifest that it is not by the nunc of aevum or eternity, because those are measures of things behaving in the same way. It is left, therefore, that it is measured by the nunc of time. And thus the difficulty of the first opinion returns.

§ 5. Therefore there are others investigating the discourse more deeply, and saying that it is not entirely in time as it is in a continuum having position in its parts: and in this they follow Avicenna and Averroes [442]. One of them in the book De Sufficientia, and Averroes on the last chapter of the fourth book of the Physics, says that in any continuum having position it is possible to take two indivisibles which are in act in the continuum, although they are not separated according to being, just as in a line it is possible to take two points, and in a surface two lines. But concerning time, it is not possible to take anything except one nunc, which is the whole essence or substance of time, although it is not the being of time: because the being of time is the continuity of prior and posterior in the nunc itself. Whence they say that by taking time in its nature, it is not possible to take two nuncs, but only one alone. But if it is taken insofar as it is the measure of motion, which time exceeds, thus two nuncs can be designated, and between them is time, just as in motion there is a first being after which there is motion, and a last being, that is, taking the nunc insofar as it is measuring according to the first being and according to the last being. And in this way they say that it well happens to designate two nuncs following one another, when they are not in the same thing. Just as they say in a line there is nothing but one point in which the line is terminated in act, and it is not possible to take a penultimate one; but if the line is divided, then there will be two following one another in the two lines. Thus they say here, that in the measure of the same motion it is possible to take one nunc in which the motion is terminated, and it is not possible to take the penultimate of that motion because of the indivisibility of motion: if however some motion should be terminated at the next nunc, then it is designated in comparison to that one, and then there will be two nuncs in the comparison of the two termini of two motions, between which there is no intermediate time. But in one motion they say this is impossible, just as in one motion before the term of the motion there is nothing but time up to the term of that motion. Therefore these men speak thus, that in two nuncs there is ultimately bread and firstly the body of Christ: and these two follow each other, and there is no uncertain intermediate time: because that [statement] of the Philosopher is taken concerning nuncs designated with respect to the same motion, and not concerning nuncs designated with respect to two beings between which nothing is continuous.

440. Cf. Boethius, Contra Eutychen et Nestorium (also known as Liber de persona et duabus naturis), ch. 6.

§ 6. But this seems to be strange: for whatever things are ordered to one another according to preceding and following, it is necessary that they touch each other in something. If therefore the being of bread in rest is measured by one nunc, and the being of the body of Christ by another, it is necessary to posit something continuous between them, in which one passes into the other: for that passage is not the being of bread, nor the being of the body of Christ, as it seems.

§ 7. Solution. I think that none of these opinions should be prejudged. I, however, think rather that the last is to be chosen, and it almost agrees with the one which is the antepenultimate: because those two are more probable.

§ 8. To that which is objected against this last one, it must be said that in truth there is no third thing in which they touch, or by which that passage occurs, because this passage does not happen here by the mode of motion from potency to act, but rather being after being, and act after act; and the passage is only according to the rationale of terms, and not according to the rationale of a medium which is the substance of motion or change. And then it does not disagree with the antepenultimate, except in this, that that one says it is according to the nunc of aevum: and many have said that the nunc of aevum and of time is one. And according to this, the objection made against it must be resolved, because Christ being here does not mean a motion nor the term of a motion, and therefore properly it is not measured by the nunc of time, but by the nunc of aevum, namely because there is no conjunction of prior and posterior in the succession of motion. But if it has a prior and posterior, this will be in the order of nature.

§ 9. For the other opinions, let anyone respond as he pleases, whoever chooses any of them.

§ 10. To that which is asked first, Whether transubstantiation is sudden, or in time? It must be said that without a doubt it is sudden: because many derisions would follow if it were posited to be successive.

441. Cf. Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram, bk. 4, ch. 12.

§ 11. To that which is objected to the contrary, through those things which were said in the question concerning the form of the sacrament, and in the question concerning the power of the words, the solution is easily manifest.

§ 12. And it must be said to the first, that that speech is not taken in the power of speech only, but also in the power of the institution which is simple and one, and according to how it refers to what is signified and through that to the Uncreated Word which operates in it: and therefore although it is uttered successively, it nevertheless does not operate successively.

§ 13. To the other it must be said, that nothing operates when it entirely is not: but since this speech is referred to the Uncreated Word, and to the institution, it remains according to the power of operating, although it passes away according to the act of utterance, just as Augustine says on John [443], that the voice passes away, and the word remains even after the utterance.

§ 14. To the last it must be said, that that discrete thing which is the speech that is the form of the sacrament, although it has discrete parts, nevertheless refers to other things which are not discrete, namely to what is signified, and the institution, and the Word, and by the power of those it operates according as those are prolated in the speech: and therefore that objection which proceeds as if that speech operated in its utterance is not valid.

§ 15. And by this the solution to the whole is manifest.

Articulus 4 — How This Transmutation Stands In Relation To The Operation Of Nature And To Marvels Or Miracles

How does this transmutation relate to the operation of nature, and of wondrous things or miracles?

§ 17. Fourthly it is asked, How does this transmutation relate to the operation of nature, and of wondrous things or miracles?

§ 18. It seems, moreover, that it has something of nature.

§ 19. 1. For the potency of obedience is in every creature to the will of the Creator. But potency adds something upon essence. Therefore some disposition is present in the creature by which this can be done. Although therefore on the part of the agent it is not through nature, nevertheless on the part of the converted things, namely the bread and wine, it seems to have something of nature.

§ 20. 2. Also, Augustine on Genesis maintains that God placed the seminal reasons of both natural things and wondrous things in the works of creation: but a reason is ordering toward some form. Since therefore the reason of this conversion was in the works of the six days, there is in the matter of the converted bodies some reason why this can be done: therefore it has something of nature.

§ 21. 3. Also, it is either according to nature, or against nature. If against nature, since God reasonably instituted nature: therefore by coming against nature, He comes against His own institution: therefore He comes against the order of His wisdom and justice: therefore He comes against Himself, which is absurd. But if according to nature, then the proposition is held, that it has something of nature.

§ 22. Further it is asked, How does it relate to miracles?

§ 23. 1. For the act of miracles is potentially present in the subject concerning which it is done: which is manifest when a blind man is illuminated. For sight is potentially present in man even by nature: but by divine work potency is restored to a corrupted organ. And similarly concerning that which seems less so, the potency of bearing a child is present in a virgin, and childbearing is potentially in her. Can it therefore be said similarly that the bread is in potency the body of Christ? And it seems that it is so, through the similarities introduced.

§ 24. 2. Also, whatever in act becomes something, was first in potency that thing: but bread is transubstantiated into the body of Christ: therefore it was first in potency that thing: but whatever is in potency something, according to the same potency remaining in the subject it is subjected to it. But bread is in potency the body of Christ: therefore according to the subject it is the subjective potency of the form of the body of Christ: therefore the matter of bread remains in the body of Christ, which is absurd, and is denied in the Text . Proof of the first: because when air becomes fire, the subject of the same potency, which is of the matter of air, remains in the fire. And it is similar concerning all things, both natural and miraculous. But the second is supposed by the adversary.

§ 25. Solution. As it seems to me, one ought not delay much here: because I concede that that transubstantiation is neither natural nor miraculous, but wondrous (mirabilis): because a miracle is what happens beyond hope, and this is an arduous unusual thing: but this does not happen beyond hope, nay rather it happens with the certainty of hope: because hope is made certain from the words of the Lord. And therefore it is also not unusual, in that by the power of the Lord's word the use and course of that operation is held, just as by the power of nature the course of nature is made certain and frequented. It is left, therefore, that it is a wondrous work, in that we, by knowing and operating, cannot attain it, although we nevertheless hope for it as customary to us from the power of the Lord's speech.

§ 26. To that therefore which is asked first, it seems it must be said that it has absolutely nothing of nature, neither on the part of the matter, nor on the part of the agent, because the matter is bread and wine, but the agent is the word.

§ 27. To that which is objected concerning the potency of obedience, it must be said that the potency of obedience adds nothing upon the substance of the thing. The proof of which is: because if it adds something, since the thing and the substance of the thing according to nature is prior to it, the substance of the thing can be abstracted by the intellect from that added thing. Let it therefore be abstracted: then the potency of obedience will not be in that thing. Therefore what the Creator wills cannot be done from it, which is heresy. Therefore it is left that the thing substantially is the potency for whatever the Creator wills. Whence the first objection proceeded from falsehoods.

443. Cf. John of Damascus, De fide orthodoxa, bk. 4, ch. 13 (86).

§ 28. To the other it must be said that those reasons, insofar as they refer to a miracle (as Augustine says), are not in the thing so that it must happen thus, but as that from which it can happen: for the first condition did not have it that a woman would be made from the rib, but rather that she could be made from it. Whence that reason does not posit any disposition upon the substance of the thing, but only an order toward the will of the Creator.

§ 29. To the other it must be said that that division is not sufficient: for some things are neither according to nature, nor against nature, but above nature, namely all things toward which nature cannot act except by obeying: and such is this, and other miracles.

§ 30. To that which is further asked, the solution is already manifest through those things which were said before.

§ 31. To that which is objected first, it must be said that this is not so except in certain miracles, and differently: because if the potency to the act of the miracle is given to the subject, then the act remains conjoined to the subject through the given potency. But if an opposite disposition to the act remains in the subject, the subject is under the act like an indisposed potency, and therefore the act is then miraculous, as in the childbirth of the virgin while remaining a virgin. But here neither the subject remains, nor any disposition, but it is a change from the whole substance of the subject, as was held previously: and therefore that is wondrous above all wondrous things.

§ 32. To the other it must be said that this proposition is false, "Whatever becomes something in whatever way, was first in potency that thing." For the Commentator says on Book IX of the Metaphysics, that nothing is in potency in anything properly speaking, unless it is drawn out from it by one mover, as this bean is in the seed of the bean, because it is drawn out from it by the moving heat of the sun, and therefore the potency is in the seed, not in the earth. And it is true that he is speaking of proximate potency. But this is also false concerning remote potency: because in nature there is not anything of material potency which does not have some one potency acting and completing in nature and drawing out that material potency to act: and this is not so [here]: because neither the substance remains, nor anything [else]. And therefore what he proposes is false.

Articulus 5 — Whether The Change Which Is In The Sacrament Of The Eucharist Is Similar To The Change That Is Called Growth, And Whether Change Of Place Is Conjoined To It

Is the change which is in the sacrament of the Eucharist similar to the change which is called augmentation? And, Is local motion adjoined to it?

§ 34. Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, at C, around the beginning: "Therefore that the body of Christ, by the change of the bread, etc."

§ 35. For it seems from this that this change is not similar to the change which is augmentation: which is 1. Against Damascene, who says that it is similar.

442. Cf. Boethius, Contra Eutychen et Nestorium, ch. 6.

§ 36. 2. But this again seems false through this, that the Philosopher says that augmentation is the addition to a pre-existing magnitude: but there is no addition to the magnitude of Christ: therefore it does not have a similarity to augmentation.

§ 37. 3. Furthermore, the Philosopher says that where there is augmentation, the whole is augmented according to form, although not the whole according to matter: and this again does not fit here: because Christ is not augmented in form.

§ 38. 4. Also, where there is augmentation of a body, it is necessary that that which augments be in potency quantified flesh, as the Philosopher says. Bread is not in potency the quantified flesh of Christ: therefore it does not augment. Therefore this transubstantiation does not have a similarity to augmentation, as Damascene says.

§ 39. [Perhaps you might say that] Damascene means that augmentation is not similar in all things, but only in this, that the augmented thing is such that the augmenting thing is converted into that which exists beforehand according to form and species, because the augmented thing which was before is converted into a body: and thus here the bread is converted into that which was before according to form and being, because [it is converted] into the body of Christ. If, I say, you speak thus. Against this: Nourishment is also converted into the pre-existing, and it is not in potency except the substance of the nourished thing, and not quantified potency. But the augmentation which is converted into the pre-existing is in potency flesh, and quantified. Therefore that transubstantiation is more assimilated to nourishment than to augmentation, as it seems: and therefore John Damascene wrongly assimilates it to augmentation.

§ 40. Further it is asked, Whether local motion is adjoined to this transubstantiation?

§ 41. For it seems that it is: 1. For to every augmentation is adjoined a certain local motion, according as a change of place is said to be in a greater place than before: but this transmutation is similar to augmentation, as Damascene says: therefore local motion is adjoined to it.

§ 42. 2. Also, local motion happens to that which is where it was not before: but from transubstantiation the body of Christ becomes where it was not before: therefore local motion is adjoined to transubstantiation.

§ 43. 3. Also, that which is not essentially everywhere, if it must be essentially where it was not before, it is necessary that it come there through a motion which is local motion: but the body of Christ is not essentially everywhere: therefore if it must be in a place where it was not before, it is necessary that it come there by a motion which is local motion.

§ 44. But against this is that 1. Damascene says there is no local motion there.

§ 45. 2. Also, whatever by moving changes place, by approaching a place where it was not before, departs from the place where it was before: but the body of Christ does not depart from the place in which it was before: therefore neither is it moved locally to a place where it was not before. The first is self-evident. The second is supposed by faith and by the Text: because it does not depart from heaven when it is on the altar: therefore neither through this that it is on one altar is it any less on another.

§ 46. Solution. It seems it must be said, without prejudice, that this transubstantiation cannot very fittingly be assimilated to any motion or transmutation which is according to nature. Nevertheless, sustaining what Damascene says, it can be said that in augmentation there is what augments, and what is augmented: but on the part of the augmenting thing there is a corruption according to the substance of the augmenting thing, because it is necessary that it lose its proper form and be assimilated to that which it augments. Whence on that part there is no similarity. But on the part of the augmented thing there are many things: according to the terms of the motion it is an imperfect quantity, and a perfect one, and again on that part there is no similarity. And there is also there that to the thing converted to itself it gives the pre-existing form and species, and as to that alone is there a similarity, as Damascene says.

§ 47. And by this the solution to the first three is manifest.

§ 48. To the other it must be said that nourishment restores what is lost and heals a deficiency, and therefore it could not fittingly be compared to nourishment. Augmentation, however, is to the perfection of a body according to a due quantity, and to that it is compared according to something. Nevertheless I think that that authority of Damascene should not be extended: because it is safer to say that it is assimilated to no motion or change.

§ 49. To that which is asked further, If it has local motion adjoined? It must be said, in no way.

§ 50. But to the first objection to the contrary, it must be said that there is no augmentation here, although there is something similar to augmentation as to something.

§ 51. To the other it must be said that this does not suffice for local motion, that something be where it was not before: but it is required with this that it also depart from the place in which it was before: and this is not so here, as is manifest in the objection made to the contrary.

§ 52. To the other it must be said that although the body of Christ is not essentially everywhere, it is nevertheless essentially in many places, as was shown above. The objection made, however, is not valid, except concerning that which cannot be essentially except in one place.

§ 53. But what the cause of this is, must be sought where it was shown that the body of Christ is compared to place in multiple ways.

Articulus 6 — Whether These Expressions Are To Be Granted: 'Bread Can Be The Body Of Christ; Bread Is Changed Into The Body Of Christ; The Body Of Christ Was Bread; Bread Will Be The Body Of Christ'

Are these expressions to be conceded: "The bread can be the body of Christ," "The bread is changed into the body of Christ," "The body of Christ was bread," "The bread will be the body of Christ"?

§ 55. Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, at C, around the middle: "To this they truly concede, etc."

§ 56. This question is useful: Which expressions are to be conceded in the discourse of a transmutation of this kind, and which are not?

§ 57. Let examples be subjected of four modes of speaking which are extracted in the Text: and first concerning expressions with a verb coupling potency with an apposing nominative (cum recto apponente), as, "Bread can be the body of Christ." Second, with verbs noting motion or change with a nominative or oblique [case], as when it is said, "Bread becomes the body of Christ," or, "Bread is changed into the body of Christ." Third, concerning those which are made with a preposition, as when it is said, "From bread is made the body of Christ." Fourth and lastly, concerning those in which there are substantive verbs according to a difference in time, which are past and future.

§ 58. Therefore let it be asked first concerning this: "Bread can be the body of Christ."

§ 59. It seems that it is true: because 1. So says Ambrose: "What is bread, by consecration can be the body of Christ."

§ 60. 2. Also, bread is changed into the body of Christ: but whatever is changed into something, can be that thing. Therefore bread can be the body of Christ.

§ 61. 3. Also, these are very often written in the Text.

§ 62. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. Potency is twofold, namely material and active: but it is manifest that the active potency of bread cannot be the body of Christ: there is no potency in bread which could make the bread the body of Christ: therefore it is left that it is passive potency. But against this: There is no passive potency which cannot be completed in nature by some active one: therefore if a passive potency to the body of Christ is in the bread, some natural active potency will complete it, which is false.

§ 63. 2. Also, the appetite of a material potency is terminated in the act of that potency, when it has it: but there is no appetite in the substance of bread toward the substantial form of Christ, since the matter of bread cannot by nature attain such a thing: therefore a material potency to the body of Christ is not in the bread: therefore this is false, "Bread can be the body of Christ."

§ 64. Secondly it is asked concerning this: "Bread becomes the body of Christ," or, "Bread is changed into the body of Christ."

§ 65. It seems, moreover, that the first is true: because 1. It is very often posited in the Text by Ambrose and Augustine.

§ 66. 2. Also, Damascene: "Christ made them, namely the bread and wine, his body and blood": but what Christ made, this sometimes was becoming: therefore then it was true to say, "Bread becomes the body of Christ."

§ 67. 3. Also, Damascene: "Do you ask the cause, how bread becomes the body of Christ? I answer you, that the Holy Spirit supervenes, and does this." From this it is taken first in the question, that bread becomes the body of Christ: and again secondly in the response, which supposes this which was asked.

§ 68. BUT ON THE CONTRARY: 1. What becomes, unless the becoming is unto infinity, sometimes is terminated at having been made: therefore sometimes it is true to say, "The body of Christ is made from bread," which is false, because it is made from the most pure blood of the glorious Virgin, as is said in the Text.

§ 69. 2. Also, what becomes, when it has been made, is that which is made: but bread becomes the body of Christ: therefore when the body of Christ has been made, we can say that bread is the body of Christ, and this is false.

§ 70. 3. Also, what is made by another, receives dispositions from it transmuting the substance or the accidental forms: therefore if bread becomes [it], it is first disposed toward transmutation: and this has already been denied before in the question concerning this transmutation.

§ 71. 4. Also, to become requires having a subject as a nature which remains in each of the terms of the transmutation: but that this is not so here was proved above.

§ 72. Against the second expression, however, it has already been objected earlier where it was asked, Whether there is any change in this sacrament?

§ 73. Thirdly it is asked concerning this: "From bread is made the body of Christ."

§ 74. It seems, moreover, that it is to be conceded from this, that it is very often written in the Text by various Saints.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. Whatever is made from another, either it is new, or something new is made concerning it: but the body of Christ is neither new, nor is anything new made concerning it: therefore the body of Christ is not made from anything: therefore it is not made from bread.

§ 2. Furthermore, if it were true, the absurdity maintained above would follow: because what is made from something, by that very fact, of it it is true to say that it itself is made from it: therefore of the body of Christ made from bread it is true to say, the body of Christ was made from bread, which is false, since it was not made except from the blood of the glorious Virgin.

FOURTHLY it is asked concerning this [proposition], The body of Christ was bread, or, Bread will be the body of Christ.

For it seems that they are true: because § 1. Ambrose says: "What was bread before the consecration, is already the body of Christ after the consecration."[444]

§ 2. Also, Augustine in the book of the Sentences of Prosper: "We faithfully confess that what nature has formed is bread and wine before the consecration, but after the consecration it is the flesh and blood of Christ which the blessing has consecrated."[445]

§ 3. Also, Augustine in the book On the Trinity: "We call the body of Christ that which, taken from the fruits of the earth and consecrated by mystical prayer, we consume in memory of the Lord's passion."[446] The Text. Therefore it seems that not only with the past and future tense, but also with the present tense it is true to say, Bread is the body of Christ.

But against this it is objected: When it is said, That which was bread, is the body of Christ, etc., the word 'that which' (quod) is a relative of identity: therefore it requires to have the same substance in the antecedent and the consequent: but whether that be form, or matter, or the composite, the locution is always false: therefore all of them are simply false.

SOLUTION. Without prejudice, it seems it must be said here that those [propositions] concerning which it is first asked are all false, especially absolutely, on account of that proposition, that whose the potency is, his also is the act: hence if it were a potency of nature, it would also be an act of nature. And therefore as a rule it was set down by the ancient Doctors in this science, that locutions concerning transubstantiation with this word can (potest), and a following nominative case, are all false: and if they are found by the Saints, they are not to be extended, but glossed.

IT MUST BE SAID, therefore, to the first, that Ambrose does not say simply, Bread can be the body of Christ, but it can be by divine consecration: and this is the same as that it can be by the power operating in the sacrament: and this is true: because on account of the determination the word can (potest) couples not the material or active potency of bread, but rather the divine, whose [property] it is to use a creature as it pleases.

To the next it must be said that it does not follow, if bread is mutated into the body of Christ, that it can be the body of Christ: for an act does not infer a potency, when the following act belongs to the same thing to which the preceding potency belongs: and this is not true here: just as also it does not follow, A Virgin gave birth, therefore a Virgin could give birth without a determination: but if it is determined thus, A Virgin could give birth by divine power, or something of this sort, then it follows, because then the potency and the act are referred back to the same thing.

To the next the solution is clear through the things said before.

To that which is asked secondly it must be said, that the first is false, namely this, Bread becomes the body of Christ: because to become (fieri) couples a making concerning some subject, and asserts something new: and neither of these belongs to transubstantiation. But if it is found in authority in the Text, and in Damascene, it must be resolved, so that to become (fieri) means to be transubstantiated, and the nominative case is changed into the oblique case, so that it may be the meaning: Bread becomes the body of Christ, that is, bread is transubstantiated into the body of Christ, which the Holy Spirit does, according as the genus of making couples whatever mode of making, and not only physical action. And through this the solution to the first is clear.

TO THE SECOND, however, it seems it must be said, that it ought to be conceded, because the word is mutated (mutatur) in sacred Scripture couples a manifold mutation: for there are many mutations in sacred Scripture not having a subject: and then it is especially to be conceded, when the oblique case determines the word can (potest), so that it may be said, Bread is mutated into the body of Christ, and then is mutated asserts the mutation which is transubstantiation.

TO THAT which is asked thirdly, it seems to me speaking without prejudice, that it has many reasons why it is not to be conceded: but on account of the fact that we do not have words by which we may express the mysteries of God, this is found many times by the Saints and conceded by the Doctors under that sense, that the preposition from (de) does not denote matter, as when it is said, from iron a knife is made: nor power, as when it is said, The Son of the Virgin is from the Holy Spirit: but rather it denotes only the order of the starting term (terminus a quo) from which transubstantiation is [directed], as when it is said, from morning midday is made. And that the verb of becoming (fiendi) does not couple a becoming (fieri), but rather a divine mutation such as befits here, that is, to which nothing is subjected, which is from the whole substance of a thing into the whole substance of another thing without the mutation of the latter.

And through this the solution to the whole which is asked against those locutions is clear. And the judgment is the same concerning this one, Out of bread is made the body of Christ (Ex pane fit...): but if it were said, By bread is made the body of Christ (A pane fit...), it would be false: because it asserts an efficient cause.

To that, therefore, which is asked fourthly, it must be said that without doubt all those are absolutely false on account of this rule: Whatever is true of the past, was at that present in which it was verified: hence if the body of Christ was bread, it is necessary to have been at that present, in which it was true to say, The body of Christ is bread: and whatever will be true in the future, it is necessary to be at that present in which it is true to say, Bread is the body of Christ: both of which are false. Hence such locutions absolutely are false and to be denied.

To that, however, which is objected, it must be said that the relative there does not refer to the same substance, but rather to diverse ones under the same accidents, indeed affecting and containing the first, but containing and not affecting the second. Hence when it is said, That which is bread before the consecration, is the body of Christ after the consecration, the meaning is: under that under which there was bread before the consecration, there is the body of Christ after the consecration: just as a little before the Master says that in such locutions the Saints use a trope, by which things signifying are accustomed to receive the words of the things which they signify. And this trope is called metonymy by Donatus.

And through this the solution to the whole is clear.

Articulus 7 — Whether The Bread In The Consecration Is Annihilated, Or Reduced To Underlying Matter

Whether the bread in the consecration is annihilated, or is reduced into pre-existing matter?

445. Pseudo-Aristotle (Proclus), Liber de Causis, proposition 30 (or penultimate).

Whether the bread in the consecration is annihilated, or is reduced into pre-existing matter?

Next it is asked concerning this which is said, there, D, But some thus say that conversion, etc.

For this question is very useful concerning the comparison of these three opinions, which the Master touches upon in the Text.

But because all the preceding questions are concerning one of those, namely that the bread does not remain, nor is it annihilated, but there occurs a transubstantiation from the whole substance of bread into the whole substance of Christ: therefore concerning this we will say nothing more: but concerning the second and the third we will make a question.

But because the second says that the bread is either annihilated, or converted into pre-existing matter, therefore let it be asked concerning it.

And it seems that this is the truest, and having less difficulty, thus: § 1. In the transubstantiation of this sacrament, that which now is bread, will no longer be bread, neither simply, nor will anything of that bread remain: but whatever neither simply remains, nor anything of it, is either annihilated, or is converted into pre-existing matter. In other natural transmutations we can see this, namely when from air fire is made: for if nothing of the air remained in the fire, nor in any other body, the mutation itself would be the same as the annihilation of the air. But nothing of the bread remains in itself, or in the body of Christ. Therefore it seems that transubstantiation is the same as the annihilation of bread.

§ 2. Also, whatever is the starting term (terminus a quo) of a mutation there, which in no character of a cause relates to that into which the transmutation is [directed], is not preserved in itself, nor in that into which it is transmuted: but bread thus relates to the body of Christ: therefore it is neither preserved in itself, nor in the body of Christ: therefore it is either annihilated, or converted into another.

§ 3. Also, 'nothing' is the same as 'non-being' absolutely: but once transubstantiation is done, this is false, This bread is a being: therefore its contradictory is true, This bread is not a being: therefore also this one, This bread is a non-being: because a negative [proposition] with an infinite predicate is equipollent to an affirmative also with an infinite predicate: therefore the bread is nothing: and this occurs through transubstantiation: therefore through transubstantiation it is annihilated.

§ 4. Also, a generation succeeding a corruption does not remove the preceding corruption: therefore also the existence of the body of Christ on the altar after it was not, does not remove the preceding cessation (desitio) of bread: therefore it seems that the bread ceases to be: therefore it is annihilated.

§ 5. Also, when it is said, From nothing something is made, the preposition there denotes only order: and similarly when it is said, From bread is made the body of Christ: therefore of the reality of bread nothing remains in the successor to bread, and it does not remain in another: therefore it is annihilated.

§ 6. Also, of every single substance there is some proper act: therefore if that act does not exist, nothing of the substance exists: but the proper act of bread, which is to restore the body, does not remain: therefore neither does the substance: but a substance not remaining, neither according to form, nor according to matter, nor according to the composite, is annihilated: therefore the substance of bread is annihilated.

§ 7. Also, every thing falls into nothingness, whose being is not conserved: but the being of bread here is not conserved: therefore the substance of bread yields into nothingness.

§ 8. Also, let us posit that the universe be so converted as the bread, the universe neither in itself, nor in Christ is something or Christ: therefore the universe is annihilated: therefore by similarity also the bread is annihilated.

§ 9. Also, in everything transmuted in which something remains, there is a production of something: but in this transmutation nothing new is produced, as was frequently proven above:

therefore nothing remains of the transmuted: therefore nothing of the bread: therefore it is annihilated.

But against this it is objected: because § 1. God is not the cause of the destruction of any nature: therefore especially in the sacrament of piety most of all He does not destroy any creature: therefore He will not annihilate the bread, but will contain it in being.

§ 2. Also, whatever is converted into something, by that very fact it is impossible that it be converted into nothing, because nothing and something are opposed in the manner of contradiction: but the substance of bread is converted into something, because into the body of Christ: therefore it is impossible that it be converted into nothing: therefore it is not annihilated.

SOLUTION. It seems it must be said that the substance of bread is not annihilated: and yet it neither remains in itself, nor in anything of itself in Christ. This opinion, however, seems to be consonant with the words of the Saints: hence although it is less intelligible, nevertheless it seems to me it should be chosen on account of the holy Fathers, whose inspired revelation takes precedence over arguments which can be made against this matter.

Therefore it must be said to the first, that it does not follow: if that which now is bread, neither simply, nor according to anything of itself remains, that it is annihilated. And there is almost one response to all, namely that mutated things remain according to the exigency of their mutation: for in a mutation which is from subject to subject, the subject remains, and not the accident: but the subject remains according to matter and form and the whole composite of those: however in a mutation which is from a non-subject to a subject, or from a subject to a non-subject, such as is generation, and corruption, the matter remains, but not the substantial or accidental form. But in this mutation which is from the whole nature and substance of a subject into the whole substance of another subject, the accident indeed remains, but nothing of the substantials: but it is another according as the body of Christ is made through transubstantiation, and therefore it is not converted into nothing.

444. Aristotle, De Anima, I, 1 (403a12-16).

To the next it must be said that it is not similar with other transmutations to this one: because other transmutations are from the whole substance, but with the matter at least remaining: but here there is a mutation from the whole substance into the whole substance of another.

To the next it must be said that it does not follow, that what in no character of a cause relates, etc., that it is converted into nothing: for this is true in those things which make a transmutation and are imperfect for augmenting: but the Lord here transmuted, and therefore He Himself without any cause converted one into another through Himself: and therefore it is not annihilated.

To the next it must be said that bread is not a being after the transmutation, just as fire is not a being after corruption: and it does not follow that it is annihilated, because it is converted into another: hence that reason proceeds toward diminution: for it ought to be added, it is not a being and is not converted into another: therefore it is nothing, or is a non-being.

To the next it must be said that just as a subsequent generation does not remove the preceding corruption: so neither does the advent of the body of Christ on the altar remove the transubstantiation of the bread: but it does not infer a cessation in being (desitio in esse), since it is not the same to be transubstantiated and to cease to be.

To the next it must be said that although the preposition from (de) denotes only order, yet it does not infer annihilation: because the cause of that is, that the conversion is from the whole substance into the whole body of Christ: and therefore because it is the whole substance, it cannot assert matter: and because it is into the whole, it cannot be an annihilation.

To the next it must be said that the proper act of the substance of bread does not remain, because neither does the substance of bread: but it does not follow that it is annihilated, by the fact that it is converted into another, and its act is found, which is to restore the mind.

To the next it must be said that this is true of a thing whose being is in nothing conserved, nor transmuted into anything: and therefore it is proposed diminutely, when it is said, a thing yields into nothingness whose being is not conserved: for this is false in every substantial transmutation: hence it is clear that this argument is not valid.

To the next it must be said that, such a position having been made, it does not follow that the universe is annihilated, for the same cause which was said, namely because it is converted into another: and thence it does not follow, it does not remain in itself nor in anything of itself: therefore it is annihilated: but it follows: therefore it is annihilated, or the whole substance is converted into another.

To the next it must be said that this does not follow except concerning those transmutations which are not from the whole substance, as was frequently said above: for what is mutated from a whole substance into the whole pre-existing substance of another, is not annihilated, nor does it remain, nor is anything new produced in such a mutation.

Articulus 8 — Whether In The Sacrament Of The Eucharist The Substance Of Bread And Wine Remains Together With The Body Of Christ

Whether in the sacrament of the Eucharist the substance of bread and wine remains with the body of Christ?

Secondly it is asked concerning the third opinion which he touches upon, there, D, around the beginning:

But others thought the substance of bread and wine remains there, etc.

But that opinion seems more probable among all [of them]: because § 1. It has been said concerning the nature and character of the body, since it is glorious, that it can be with any other body, and in the same place: therefore also with the bread it can be under the same accidents, and under the same place: since therefore the effect of bread remains which is to feed corporeally, it seems that nothing more probable could be said, than that the body of Christ is with the bread and in the same place.

§ 2. Also, it is not intelligible how an accident taken according to its being could be without a subject: but it is certain that there is an accident according to its being there, because it is seen as white and round, and is touched as hard: therefore that accident will be in something as in a subject: but not in the body of Christ: therefore in the substance of bread: therefore it is necessary that the substance of bread remain.

§ 3. Also, from this a lesser occasion of derision would follow for infidels, since they do not believe this sacrament, because they see and touch some substance, which is not the body of Christ because it nourishes a material body: therefore it seems that this is more probably said than any other.

§ 4. Furthermore, an accidental form is not divided except accidentally: but it is certain that something is divided there: therefore that which is divided essentially (per se) cannot be an accidental form only: therefore [there is] some substance upon which it rests: therefore it seems that the substance of bread remains there.

§ 5. Also, if the substance of bread is destroyed, there will be something destroying it: either therefore the body of Christ, or God, or something acting to the contrary. Not the body of Christ: because this did not come for destroying, since it can be in the same place. Similarly God does not destroy it: because God is the conserver of things, and not a destroyer. Thus it seems that it is destroyed by nothing acting to the contrary: because then the accidents would not remain: for the bread would not suffer from a contrary by reason of its substance, but by reason of its forms: because nothing is contrary to substance. Therefore since nothing destroys the substance of bread, it seems that the substance of bread itself remains.

ON THE CONTRARY: § 1. If the substance of bread remains: then the word of the Lord is false, saying, This is my body because then the substance of bread subjected to the eyes through its accidents is demonstrated by the pronoun.

§ 2. Furthermore, in the Text several authorities are introduced to the effect that no substance is there, except only the substance of the Lord's body: therefore there is not there

§ 3. Also, if it is said that the substance of bread remains there: then the accidents affecting it lead the intellect into the substance of bread: therefore they do not lead into the invisible body of Christ: therefore they do not have there the character of a sign which is required in a sacrament, which is absurd: therefore it is necessary to say that this opinion is false.

SOLUTION. It must be said that this opinion seems false by these many reasons and almost by all, just as the second: yet although the first belongs to almost everyone and to the whole Church: the second still has some defenders: but the third, as I think, has none.

IT MUST BE SAID therefore to this one, that the substance of bread does not remain.

But to the first which is against this, it must be said that although a glorious body and especially the Lord's body could be with bread in the same place, yet the nature of a sacrament, not the nature of a place, is repugnant to it, and the cause of this was touched upon in objecting to the contrary: because an accident would not lead except into its proper substance, and thus it would fall away from the character of signifying. But if it is similarly objected concerning other sacraments, in whose matters the substance remains, above indeed a question was raised, and a certain solution given, in which many Doctors agree. But nevertheless it can be said without prejudice, that in other sacraments the character of signifying is taken from the proper act of the substance which is the matter of the sacrament: just as in the water of baptism there is the act of washing, and in chrism the act of anointing, etc. Hence since such an act is not without a substance, it was necessary for the substance to remain in the others. But here the character of signifying is not taken from that act, but rather from the accidental forms of bread: and therefore it was not necessary for the substance to remain.

To the next it must be said that this is not intelligible, how an accident according to its being remains for the use of nature: but for the use of showing the work of God it is well intelligible: because thus it is contained in being by God operating that work, not in the power of a subject: and this will be discussed in the following distinction.

To the next it must be said that the occasion for derision is removed through this, that either those forms have certain acts of bread in the sacrament, and in passing into the body, or the substance returns after the cessation of the forms, as some say. Since therefore the essence of the sacrament requires this, and impiety is sufficiently precluded, it was not necessary for the substance of bread to remain.

To the next it must be said that this objection proceeds as if the substance itself were divided essentially (per se): and this is false: but rather since a substance alone would be indivisible, as the Philosopher says, but a quantified thing can be divided, it is well conceded that quantity remains, by reason of which other situational forms, such as whiteness, and taste, are divided.

To the last it must be said that this objection supposes that the substance of bread is destroyed through annihilation: and this was proven not to be true in the disputation of the preceding opinion.

Articulus 9 — Whether At The Hour Of The Immolation The Heavens Are Opened, And For What The Heavens Are Opened

Whether at the hour of immolation the heavens are opened? And, for what are the heavens opened?

Whether at the hour of immolation the heavens are opened? And, for what are the heavens opened?

Next it is asked concerning this which he says, there, D, in the middle: Who of the faithful could have a doubt, that in the very hour of immolation, etc.

And it is asked there, For what is it necessary that the heavens be opened?

§ 1. For just as was maintained above, the body of Christ begins to be on the altar without local motion: therefore it is not necessary for this that the heavens be opened, that it may come to the altar .

§ 2. Also, supposing even that it came by local motion, it would not be necessary for the heavens to be opened: because in passing through the heavens, it would be with the heavens in the same place.

FURTHERMORE it is asked, What is it for the highest and the lowest to be joined together (sociari)?

For the bread which is the lowest, is not joined to the body of Christ, but is transubstantiated into it, since a fellowship (societas) is only between different conjoined things, either according to place, or according to effect.

FURTHER it is asked, What are those invisible things from which one something is made?

For the visible things are in the substance of bread and wine, the invisible are the body of Christ and the blood: and it is certain that from these one something is not made: therefore he seems to speak badly.

FURTHER again it is asked, What is it to be snatched up into heaven, so that it may be consociated with the body of Christ?

For what is snatched up changes place: therefore it seems that it does not remain on the altar.

Furthermore, what necessity is there, that it is snatched up into heaven to be consociated, when on the altar itself is the truth of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ?

SOLUTION. It must be said that the heavens are said here to be opened as to the presence of the celestial power operating in the sacrament: and this is for the heavens to be opened to us: just as it is frequently taken in sacred Scripture, when something celestial is shown, as Ezekiel 1:1, and Matthew 11:16.

Through this also the solution to the second is clear.

To the next it must be said that the visible species are said to be united: and the members of the mystical body: and this so that they may be one sacrament with the body of the Lord: and of what sort of one they are, this was determined above. But as to the members there is a special effect of the union of the members to the head.

AND THROUGH THIS the solution to the following is clear: because the visible things are the species, and the invisible things are the body and the blood, from which one thing is made in the being of relation in the sacrament.

To the next it must be said that the rapture befits the members according to the special effect of union to the glory of the body of Christ, according to which He appears in heaven. And therefore although He is on the altar essentially, yet the Church does not seek to be snatched up to Him through union according as He is on the altar, but rather according as He is in heaven.

And concerning this distinction let these things said suffice for the present.

DISTINCTIO XII

Divisio Textus

But under another species he bestowed it, etc. In this distinction begins that part in which transubstantiation is treated from the side of those things which are transmuted, namely the substance of bread and wine.

And that part is divided into three parts: in the first of which he touches upon the causes why he gave his body under a species other than its proper one. In the second, however, he touches upon what sort of body he gave, there, D, § 2: But he gave such a body, as he then had, etc. In the third, however, he touches upon the mode of remaining which befits the accidents, there, E, But if it is asked concerning the accidents, etc.

In the first part three things are further touched upon: in the first of which he touches upon why he gave his body under another species. In the second, he touches upon the causes why it is consumed under a double species, there, B, But why is it consumed under a double species, etc. In the third, however, he touches upon the mixed water, there, C, Water is indeed to be mixed, etc.

Articulus 1 — Why Christ Gave The Body Under Another Species Than Its Own

Why did Christ give his body under a species other than its proper one?

Why did Christ give his body under a species other than its proper one?

In the first it is asked concerning the causes which the Master touches upon in the Text.

And first it is asked concerning the first: Why did he give his body under another species? So that faith might have merit: because, as Gregory says, Faith has no merit, etc.[447]

§ 1. For if this cause is true, it follows that any other sacrament ought to be contained under another species, than under that in which its essential truth is preserved: but this is false: therefore that reason is not valid.

§ 2. Furthermore, then all those who seek to assign a reason concerning the things to be believed would sin: because they remove the merit of faith, as it seems.

§ 3. Furthermore, in any irrational thing it could be said that it ought to be believed, and a reason ought not to be sought: because if a reason is sought, the merit of faith is evacuated.

§ 4. Furthermore, it seems that the body ought to have been handed down under the same species: for under the same species it would more excite devotion: but devotion is highly necessary for the merit of faith: therefore it seems that it ought to have been handed down under the same species.

§ 5. Also, a sign containing truth is less distanced from the truth, than a sign not containing and only signifying: the sign of a sacrament of the new law contains the truth and signifies it, but the sign of the Old Testament signifies, and does not cause: therefore the new ought to be less distanced than the old: but the sign of the sacrament of the old law was in the same species with the Eucharist, because it was the body and flesh of the Paschal lamb: therefore much more strongly in the new it ought to be in the same species: therefore it ought not to have been handed down under another species.

§ 6. Also, form and species are the principle of understanding things, and the distinctions of forms are for the distinctions of the intellects which are had concerning things: therefore a determinate thing in its nature and its form is not understood except from the proper species of the form: since therefore the sacramental forms are for the understanding of the true body of Christ, and they are not twofold: therefore this sacrament ought not to have been handed down under a double species, as it seems.

FURTHER it is asked concerning the second cause which he touches upon in the Text, saying that if he had given it under its proper form, the human mind would abhor it: because it is a horror for a man to eat raw flesh, and to drink blood.

And this seems to be nothing: because § 1. Supposing faith, it seems that no horror, but very much devotion would be born from this.

§ 2. Also, it is sufficiently known by the faithful, that that food is not incorporated into us, but we into it: therefore the rawness of the flesh would operate or de-operate nothing towards the consumption: but rather our utility is considered.

FURTHER it is asked concerning the third, which is so that the occasion of deriding may be removed from the infidels who say that we drink the blood of a slain man: because § 1. The infidels, seeing that that blood would be a drink for us, would rather be edified than deride.

§ 2. Furthermore, we see that the Saints sometimes for the confession of the faith prayed, that the Lord [would appear] in his proper species he would show himself, as is read concerning the blessed Pope Gregory, that for strengthening the faith of the people, by his prayers he received the form of a finger turned into bleeding flesh: therefore if he were to be under his proper species, it would not be ordered to the derision of faith, but rather to its edification. § 2. Next, further on this it is asked: If it should happen that the Lord shows himself in the proper form of a man, or of bleeding flesh, or of some member, whether it should be received or not? § 3. But it seems from the Letter [of the Master], that it should not: because § 4. 1. In the second cause he says, that there is horror in eating bleeding flesh. § 5. 2. Also, he says it is not lawful to devour Christ with teeth: therefore it seems, that it should not be received. § 6. ON THE CONTRARY: § 7. That showing, and the removal of the accidents of bread does not happen except to increase devotion: but the more devotion is increased, the more worthily it is received: therefore the more openly he is shown, the more worthily he is received: therefore even then it will be more to be received, than at another time. § 8. Solution. It must be said, that the causes which the Master touches upon in the Letter, are good. And the first is taken from the words of Gregory. The second from the words of Jerome. But the third from the words of blessed Augustine. However, this cause could be rendered which seems cogent, that some things are to be considered in the sacrament with respect to it according to its essence, but some are to be considered with respect to its use, namely that it is given as spiritual food of the faithful. And in the first consideration the causes dictated in the Letter are touched upon. But in the second consideration there must be in the sacrament breaking, chewing, and the character of food in general. But the first two in no way can fall into the proper form of Christ's body: because that body since it is impassible and glorious, is not divisible or breakable in an alien form. Secondly, according to the third, which is the use of the thing under the character of food and drink in general, it was necessary that it have the form of food in general, and that is the form of bread: and the form of drink in general, and that is the species of wine. However, concerning this it will be asked below, why he gave it spiritually under these forms rather than under others. § 9. To the first therefore it must be said, that it is otherwise in the other sacraments: because in them the author of all grace is not contained, but in this one he is contained, and therefore in it especially, being the highest, faith had to be placed. § 10. To the next it must be said, that the rationale of faith is twofold: the first namely which is drawn from the principles of faith: and this builds up faith, because it presupposes the principle of faith, and presupposing the principle of faith, does not doubt concerning what is believed. But the second proceeds not by presupposing the principle of faith, but from physical reasonings: and this frequently strives to overturn faith, and to extinguish the merit of faith: and concerning this the saying of Gregory is understood: and therefore he says, to which human reason offers experience, not divine. § 11. To the next it must be said, that it is irrational [to believe] that it has no rectitude of truth, and this is not to be believed: and whoever believes it, is foolish: but there is something into which reason cannot enter, having nevertheless an argument of truth, because the Lord said it who cannot lie, and we are frequently unable to understand his words: and that must be believed, by the fact that falsity cannot underlie the words of the Lord. § 12. To the next it must be said, that perhaps for a time the natural species would excite greater devotion than the species of bread, but not always: however the principal cause is, because those things which are required for the use of the sacrament, could not be in the proper form: but they are well preserved in another form which is of a corruptible body. § 13. To the next it must be said, that the species of the reality and the species of the sacrament can in no sacrament be the same: because the reality of the sacrament is invisible, but the species of the sacrament must be sensible. And to the argument it must be said, that in the Old Testament flesh was a figure, not of the same species as the flesh of Christ, but rather the flesh of certain offered animals. And the cause of this has been said above: because it did not figure only the sacred reality, but also Christ's Passion, and the oblation which he offered to the Father on the cross. Hence the sacraments of the old law and of the new are not distinguished by the fact of signifying, but rather by the fact of causing. Hence through this the sacraments of the new law are closer to the truth, because they contain it, which the sacraments of the old law did not do. But if we want to say, that they are more express in signifying, then it must be said, that the species of bread is more expressly a sign of the spiritual food of the mystical body, than flesh is: because it is neither food in general, nor is it collected from diverse things as bread is: but yet flesh is more expressly a sign of the passion, and of the oblation on the cross. § 14. To this note, that the sacraments of the old law signified only the sacraments of the new law. But the sacraments of the new law signify not only the sacrament itself, but also together with this the effect of the sacrament in us. But for signifying this effect the species of bread is a more express sign, than the species of flesh. § 15. To the next it must be said, that the reality is understood in one way according to the proper nature of the reality, and in another way in its spiritual effect. In the first way the reality is understood from the proper principles of its species. But in the second way it is necessary, that it be understood through the symbol of corporeal images: and in this way the understanding of spiritual things occurs in the sacraments. § 16. To what is further asked concerning the second cause, it must be said that there is a horror which is born from devotion and reverence: and there is a horror which is born from abomination. In the first way there would be horror in the receiving of the sacrament: for no one would presume to receive the bleeding flesh of Christ, when it would be presented in its proper species. And thus it is understood in the Letter. § 17. To the next it must be said, that although it is known by the faithful, that he is not incorporated into us, but we into him: nevertheless man would fear even approach and contact out of reverence. Moreover, what is most powerful in the sacrament, the character of a sign would not be preserved there, as was touched upon before, nor those things which pertain to the use of the sacrament. § 18. To what is further asked concerning the third cause, it must be said that infidels seeing the bleeding flesh of Christ divided by teeth, and blood consumed through drink, would not be edified toward faith: because to be divided and to be consumed belong to corporeal things: and therefore they would then think that Christ was also corporeal, and they would think the effect of the sacrament to be a prestige [illusion] or incantation. § 19. To the next it must be said, that sometimes the Saints prayed in a given case for the showing of the effect of the sacrament: but yet in the receiving of the sacrament they prayed, that it would again be under the form of bread: and so did blessed Gregory with the matron, who had offered the bread itself of the sacred oblation, and was doubting concerning the efficacy of the sacrament: and when this was revealed to blessed Gregory, he prayed that God would show the effect of the sacrament: and again afterward he prayed, that the species of bread would return, and he gave it to the same matron to be received. § 20. But to that which is asked lastly, Whether it should be received thus, if it appeared in the proper form of flesh or blood? § 21. It must be said without prejudice, that either it appears to all under its proper form, or to some. If to some, I think that it should be received: but if to all, then it is not to be received, but to be reserved as relics. § 22. But if it is then asked, Whether a priest, to whom this happens, ought to celebrate mass without communion? § 23. It must be said, that if out of the fervor of devotion he can, he ought to celebrate another mass, and communicate in that one. And if the same thing happens in that one: then he can celebrate another, until he communicates in the person of the Church. But if he is impeded out of indevotion, or from the fact that this happens to him more often without intermission, then he can not celebrate: and the communion itself which he ought to have made in the person of the Church, is understood in spiritual reception through the fervor excited from the fact that the body of Christ appears to all in its proper form, etc.

Articulus 2 — Whether In The Sacrament Of The Eucharist A Double Species Is Necessary

Whether in the sacrament of the Eucharist a double species is necessary?

Whether in the sacrament of the Eucharist a double species is necessary? § 26. Next it is asked concerning the second part of this chapter, namely concerning this which he says there, B, "But why under a double species," etc. § 27. For it seems that a double species is not necessary: § 28. 1. For one thing is not terminated at two things, but at one only. But the paschal lamb which Christ ate with the disciples, was only one. Therefore it is not terminated at two realities: therefore neither at two sacramental species, as it seems. § 29. 2. But if you say, that there were many things in the eating of the paschal lamb, such as unleavened bread, and wild lettuces, and the flesh of the lamb: and something had to respond to those on the part of the sacrament: then there should be many more: because there ought to be at least three materials of this sacrament: and this is not true. § 30. Also, The lamb is not terminated at the unleavened bread, as to a reality which is of the same species with it: nor the wild lettuce to the wine, because it does not have conformity: therefore that response is nothing. § 31. Moreover, Those things were not of the truth of the sacrament, but rather they signified the preparation of those who were to eat the paschal lamb: therefore even in the truth of the New Testament nothing ought to have responded to them: therefore not on account of them ought there to be more species in the matter of this sacrament. § 32. 3. Also, None of the other sacraments has a double species for matter: therefore neither ought this one to have been handed down in a double species. § 33. 4. Also, that because we are twofold, namely corporeal, and spiritual, therefore the body is offered for the body, and the blood for the soul: this seems to be nothing: because by the same reason any sacrament would be to be handed down in a double species, since we who receive, are twofold, and we seek in it a twofold profit, namely of the soul, and of the body. § 34. 5. Also, The whole Christ in blood and soul and body is contained under either of those species: therefore it seems, that it is superfluous to offer the other in the sacrament. § 35. Solution. To this I think it must be said, that for many causes, of which some are touched upon in the Letter, and some by the Masters, this sacrament is handed down in a double species. One is which is touched upon in the Letter: because it is offered for the body, and the soul. Another cause is, as some say, that this sacrament is not only a sacrament of spiritual effect, but also a memorial. Hence through the species of bread which strengthens the heart of man, it makes the union of charity, as the union of the mystical body. But through the species of rich wine it is a memorial of the inebriation of the love of Christ, when in the blood of his passion he offered himself for us, as if forgetful of himself for our love. § 36. Again others touch upon another cause: because it is not only a sacrament of the passion, but also of the incarnation. Therefore the species of bread signifies the incarnation: because his body as if from drops of blood was commixed and coagulated and formed into the bread of the faithful: but through the species of blood it signifies the blood of the passion poured out. § 37. Some touch upon another, namely that this was done in sign of a twofold mode of receiving: for some receive with the difficulty of penance, as the bread of sorrow, and the bread of tears for past sins: and those as it were chew for a long time, and finally swallow. Others with the facility of devotion , hoping for eternal fruition in the fatherland, which is signified here in the sacrament: and those as it were drink and are inebriated from the drunkenness of the house of God, and are given to drink from the torrent of pleasure. § 38. Still others say, that this is in sign of a twofold effect, namely of the union of the mystical body through flesh, and of redemption through blood. Therefore the first is signified in the species of bread which by conforming to itself, unites both head and members: but the second in the species of wine. § 39. But all these causes are probable: but one is better than all the others, as it seems, namely this, that between things united to each other there must be a conjunction and a uniting power: since therefore we are united to Christ the head through this sacrament, there must be something in the sacrament by which our conjunction to him is signified, and something by which the uniting power is signified. But union cannot be signified in bread, because it is not an immiscible body, remaining in its proper species: and therefore there must be a liquid substance, to which another insipid one would be united: but again it could be, that our insipidity through it ought to return to savor. Hence that the union of Christ through nature might be signified, the species of wine is assumed. Because, as it is said, the children shared in the flesh and blood of the Lord, and he himself similarly participated in the same. But that our union to him through grace might be signified, water is added, so that our insipidity, reverted by its savor, may be understood to [return to] savor, and be absorbed, just
